Zechariah reports that he had a vision of (lit. ‘saw’) a man on a red horse among the myrtle trees (whose exact meaning and significance is uncertain). Behind him were three more horses of different colours: red, brown (RSV: ‘sorrel’) and white. Attempts have been made to give meaning to these colours (e.g. blood, confusion, peace) but it seems more likely that the details are merely background. The four horses in 6:2 have a different combination of colours (cf. also Rev. 6:2, 4–5, 8).

The horses have been patrolling the earth and found it at rest. The significance of this is that the nations who have oppressed Judah seem to be getting away with it. The angel of the LORD cries out for God to act (12) and receives the assurance that: his anger is now directed at the nations: he was a little angry with his people, but the nations went too far; and he has already returned to Jerusalem. This last point will be seen in the building of the temple (accomplished four years later) and of the city (measuring line signifies marking out the site for rebuilding houses).

Note the emphasis on jealousy (in the sense of ‘vehemence in devotion’) for Jerusalem and anger against the nations in vs 14b–15a. This is achieved by repetition and the arrangement of the words (cf. v 2) lit. ‘I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion—with great jealousy. And with great anger—I am angry against the nations who are at ease [NIV feel secure].’ The description ‘at ease’ may signify both escape from punishment and self-satisfied arrogance, as in 2 Ki. 19:28 (‘insolence’) and Ps. 123:4 (‘proud’ parallel to ‘arrogant’).

V 17 brings the first vision to a strong conclusion. The repeated again emphasizes the continuity with the past history of the chosen people, the people descended from Abraham with whom God made a covenant. He has chastened them but never rejected them. The phrase again ... choose Jerusalem is found also in 2:12 and 3:2 and serves to prepare for the prophecies to the divinely appointed leaders mentioned in the two central visions (chs. 3–4).

1:18–21 The second vision: four horns and four craftsmen

The prophet goes from the first vision to the second as if there was no time gap: then I looked up. He saw four horns. Horns were a symbol of strength (Dt. 33:17), often signifying aggression and/or pride (Ps. 75:4–5, 10; Dn. 8:3–9). The four horns represent the nations who have scattered Judah, Israel and Jerusalem. Then four craftsmen come to terrify [or ‘rout’] them and throw them down. The exact process is not specified. In fact, there is surprisingly little emphasis on the craftsmen, and huge emphasis on the horns. Note the ‘unnecessary’ repetition of the words horn (19, 21) and scatter (21). The prophet does not ask who the craftsmen are, but what they are going to do. It is unlikely that the four horns represent four individual nations. Rather, ‘four’ is a number expressing completeness, as when the four horses go in all directions (1:10; 6:5–7; cf. the references to ‘four winds’ in 2:6; 6:5).

Clearly, then, the prophet intends his readers to form a vivid picture of the strength of the nations, and to remember the devastation of Judah that they caused. God does not want the people to forget or underestimate the greatness of his deliverance. These nations lifted up their horns against Judah and God’s people were utterly cowed, no-one could raise his head (21). But, ominously for the nations, they are going to be dealt with.

2:1–13 The third vision: Jerusalem inhabited without walls

Vs 1–5 describe Zechariah’s third vision proper. To this is attached a closely related oracle. The last verse of ch. 2 is addressed directly to the whole world and stands powerfully on its own.

2:1–5 The vision. Zechariah sees a man with a measuring line (a different expression from 1:16 but with a similar function) who is going to find out the width and length of Jerusalem. We gather from God’s message to him in vs 4–5 that his purpose is (at least partly) to prepare for the rebuilding of the city walls.

It is difficult to keep track of the angels in this vision! The NIV makes good sense of the Hebrew and has three angels in all. The first (A1) is the man with the measuring line who went to measure Jerusalem; the second (A2) is the angel who had been speaking to Zechariah and who left (lit. ‘went forth’); the third (A3) is another angel who came (‘went forth’) to meet A2 and to give him a message for A1. A3 might well be ‘the angel of the LORD’ as in 1:11–12.) In other words A3 tells A2 to give a message to A1. Why should it be so complicated? Perhaps it is to emphasize the importance of this unexpected message. It would be natural to rebuild a city wall and strengthen its fortifications and this might well be part of God’s will for Jerusalem. But the message here is that this is not necessary, for two reasons: the city will be too big, and the LORD himself will be their wall, a wall of fire.

How literally is this to be taken? The wall of Jerusalem did have to be rebuilt in 445 BC under Nehemiah’s direction. On the other hand, the city spread out well beyond its walls. The important thing to note is that, when ‘God is within her, she will not fail’—with or without walls (Ps. 46:4; cf. 48:1–3, 8; 32:7; Jb. 1:10).

This fact, of God being in the midst of his people, is strongly emphasized in a number of ways in chs. 1–8: by direct statement (2:10–12; 8:3, 8; 13:9; 14:4); by the completion of the rebuilding of the temple as part of God’s plan (4:8–9; cf. 9:8); by the cleansing and recommissioning of the high priest, the representative of the people (3:1–7); and by the promise that many peoples will come to ‘seek [the favour of] the LORD’ in Jerusalem (8:20–23; cf. 2:11; 14:16–19).

2:6–12 The oracle. This prophetic oracle follows on smoothly from the first three visions. They have all been concerned with the reversal of the fortunes of both Judah and the nations. We are now given a picture of the first step in the restoration of the people—their release from exile in Babylon. In 520, of course, many had already returned. But many remained behind, and this oracle urges them also to flee Babylon and return to where God is re-establishing his dwelling.

In the first part (6–9), the prophet urges the exiles to leave Babylon immediately as that nation is about to be punished (the spoilers will become the spoil). When this happens they will know that the LORD Almighty has sent him. In the second part (10–11), the people are told that the Lord is coming and will live among them in Jerusalem, where many nations will join them. This also will be a sign that the message the prophet received was from God (‘then you will know that the LORD Almighty has sent me to you’). There is a concluding promise in v 12 that the LORD will inherit Judah ... and again choose Jerusalem.

The promise of v 11a is framed by the repeated ‘I will live among you’, forming a chiasmic structure. The refrain of vs 9b and 11b (and you will know ...) emphasizes the concern that God may be glorified as a result of his actions. This also occurs in 4:9 and 6:15. The phrase will again choose Jerusalem shows the connection between this oracle and the first vision (see 1:17) and also prepares a link with the fourth vision (see 3:2).

‘Come!’ (6–7) is simply a word to gain the attention of potential hearers. ‘After he has honoured me and has sent me against the nations ...’ (8) is an attempt to make sense of a very difficult phrase: ‘after glory sent me [or he sent me] to the nations ...’. Other suggestions are that ‘glory’ is a name for God himself (cf. v 5b) or else a way of referring to the vision. The ‘me’ has been taken to be either Zechariah (who was not actually sent to the nations, except in a very indirect way) or one of the angels. Whichever is correct, the main concern is to establish that what God has said to this situation (via the angel via Zechariah) is truly from God.

2:13 A call to the whole world. This appeal is wholly appropriate here. After waiting for a long time, the Lord is going to act against the nations who have oppressed his people. Let all the earth keep silent with awe before him (cf. Hab. 2:20), hardly daring to breathe.

3:1–10 The fourth vision: Joshua the high priest

Chs. 3 and 4 contain the two central visions of the whole series of eight. They are both concerned with two leaders; the high priest and the civil leader (governor). Together these figures represent the Lord’s rule over his people. Ch. 3 focuses on Joshua the high priest but mentions also my servant, the Branch (8; cf. 6:12, where it is said that he will build the temple of the Lord).

Ch. 4 has a picture of two olive trees who represent the ‘two anointed who are anointed to serve [lit. ‘stand by’] the Lord of all the earth’. The NIV’s ‘anointed to serve’ is inexact and misses the connection with the rest of the chapter established by means of the word ‘stand’ (cf. 3:1, 3, 4, 5, 7). (Note that the expression all the earth [‘land’] occurs in 4:14; 5:3, 6; 6:5. This helps to give unity to the last four visions.) 3:1 and 4:14 together establish Joshua as one of these two anointed.

3:1–5 Satan’s accusations dealt with. This section describes how Joshua the high priest is accused by ‘the Satan’. The word ‘satan’ in Hebrew means ‘adversary’ and occurs as a proper name only in 1 Ch. 21:1. The only other place in the OT where it means a superhuman adversary is in Jb. 1–2. Otherwise it indicates human adversaries, either personal or national. The Adversary’s function here and in Job is to accuse one of God’s servants.

Joshua, as high priest, should have stood before the Lord only in the clothes specified in Ex. 28. They signified the purity which was necessary in order to stand before a holy God. When we are told that Joshua stood before the Lord in filthy clothes, it signifies his unclean-ness (4b), and, since he is their representative before God, that of the people also.

The accusation of ‘the Adversary’ is true. The result, however, is not condemnation, but cleansing. This aspect of God’s restoration of his people is emphasized in the sixth and seventh visions: the thief and the one who swears falsely will be banished (5:3), and wickedness itself will be removed far from the land (5:7, 10–11).

The high priest also had to wear a turban (AV/KJV ‘mitre’; Ex. 28:4, 37–39). We are not told whether Joshua had any sort of turban on at first, but he is given a clean one. The word is different from that used in Ex. 28, but from the same root (tsaniph/mitsnepheth).

It seems strange for the Lord himself to say ‘the LORD rebuke you’ (2), but its meaning is ‘I, who am the LORD, rebuke you’, and it assures the reader that the Satan’s accusations are completely set aside (cf. Ps. 9:5; Is. 17:13). Burning stick snatched from the fire (2) recalls Am. 4:11, and implies that Joshua (and therefore the people of Judah) have escaped from just chastening. While the angel of the LORD stood by (5) probably signifies the fact that this action is approved by God.

3:6–7 Joshua receives a charge. Having been cleansed, Joshua is able to be in God’s presence. He receives the charge to walk in God’s ways and keep his requirements. Both expressions signify living and acting as God wants. The second is especially used of priestly duties or the care of the sanctuary (e.g. Nu. 3:7–8, 25–38). These standing here means heavenly beings who stand in God’s presence, as in v 4.

3:8–9 Joshua receives a further message. This looks like an addition to the original vision (it has an imperative such as often begins a new speech; and it introduces features not hinted at in the preceding description: the Branch, the stone, seven eyes). Nevertheless, its climax, ‘I will remove the sin of this land in a single day’ (i.e. swiftly and completely) is wholly appropriate to this vision, for the high priest represents the whole people.

Joshua’s associates or ‘companions’ are presumably his fellow priests. They are men symbolic of things to come (lit. ‘men of portent’). This probably means that the coming of the Branch has priestly significance.

The Branch is a Messianic title (Je. 23:5–6; cf. Is. 4:2; 11:1; see also the Introduction above). It has some connection with Zerubbabel, whose name is not found in any of the main parts of the visions themselves. The reason for this is not clear. It is possible that Zerubbabel fell out of favour with the Persian authorities and that his name had to be kept quiet. It is more likely that the reader is meant to connect the present leadership of Judah and Jerusalem with the promise of the Messiah, known from Is. 9:1–7 and 11:1–9. Zerubbabel was not thought to be the Messiah but a type of the Messiah. He gives insight into the nature of the Messiah’s rule. This will be spelt out in ch. 4 and 6:9–15.

It is not clear what the stone set before Joshua signifies. The context must help us to form a picture of it. The engraving suggests some type of commemoration, perhaps of the Lord's commission to Joshua. Eyes might be connected with 4:10, where the seven lamps are explained as the 'seven ... eyes of the LORD, which range throughout the earth', signifying his knowledge of everything that happens on earth. The word could just possibly mean 'spring', in which case it would fit with the end of the verse: cleansing the land of sin.

3:10 A concluding promise. The vine and fig-tree, which required a long time to produce fruit, are symbols of peace and prosperity. The picture is used in 1 Ki. 4:25 to describe the peaceful conditions of Solomon's reign. In 2 Ki. 18:31 it is a tempting (but untrustworthy) promise of the Assyrian king, and in Mi. 4:4 it describes the conditions of blessing 'in the last days' (Mi. 4:1).

4:1–14 The fifth vision: two anointed

The structure of this chapter is quite strange in that a question is asked in v 5 which is not answered until v 10b, and the joins between the outer sections and the oracle in the middle are quite abrupt. This has led many commentators to regard vs 6–10a as a later insertion, or to move the section to another place. The pattern can, however, be seen as deliberate. The chapter proceeds as follows:

1–3 A description of the vision, in particular about the seven lamps and two olive trees. 4 Then follows the question 'What are these?' assumed to be about the 'seven'. The angel responds with a counter-question (5) 'Do you not know ... ?', which is not answered until after the oracle about Zerubbabel (6–10a). Finally the prophet receives the answer to his question in 10b concerning the 'seven'. 11–14 Further questions about the two olive trees and two gold pipes follow, with the same response from the angel as in v 5 'Do you not know ... ?' In v 14 the prophet receives the answer to the question concerning the two.

Apparently one of the means Zechariah uses to heighten the impact of his message is a sort of delaying tactic. In chs. 7–8 a question is asked in 7:3 which is not answered until 8:18–19! So here, there is a minor delay caused by the counter-questions, and a major delay caused by the oracle of vs 6–10a.

A further function of the oracle in its present position is to show the connection between Zerubbabel and the two anointed. Zerubbabel is not mentioned by name in any of the visions themselves.

4:1–5, 10b–14 The fifth vision. Zechariah sees a central lampstand with seven lamps (NIV lights). On each side is an olive tree. It is usually assumed, from what follows in vs 11–12, that the olive trees supply the lamps with oil.

The Hebrew text most naturally means that each of the seven lamps had seven lips (as RSV). The Greek text suggests that there were seven channels leading from the central bowl to the seven lamps (as NIV). Either way the picture is of a very bright lamp. The interpretation of the seven lamps (10b; the brackets in NIV should be ignored) is that they represent the eyes of the LORD, which range throughout the earth. (Note that this is the same expression as in v 14, which is lost by the NIV; see also on 3:1–10 above.) The figure suggests lighting up dark places so that nothing can be hidden from the Lord's view. It is unlikely that these seven refers back to 3:9, since it is too far away from the answer and obscured by a question about another 'seven'.

The two olive trees represent the two anointed who stand by the LORD of all the earth. At one level these are the priest and governor of the time: Joshua and Zerubbabel. There is a difficulty in supposing that these could supply oil to the Lord to keep his lamps going! It could be that we are not meant to follow through the implications of the symbolism, since all symbols have their limitations. Perhaps, however, the pipes do not go from the olive trees to the lampstand, for the text does not state this explicitly. Some have supposed that the bowl supplies the trees with oil. This has the advantage of making the Lord the source of anointing for his anointed. On the other hand it is not in accord with what happens in life: olive oil comes from an olive tree, and thence to the lamp.

V 12 is very obscure, especially since neither the branches nor the pipes have been mentioned earlier. One proposed solution is to assume that the central bowl represents the LORD, and this supplies both the lamps and the olive tree.

4:6–10a An oracle about Zerubbabel. This section both delays the answer to the prophet's question (4) and helps to identify Zerubbabel as one of the two olive trees or two anointed. It is in two parts.

A word assures Zerubbabel that he does not need might or strength, but God's Spirit (6–7). If it were a matter of strength then there could be no contest between Zerubbabel and a great mountain, but, in this situation, a great mountain will be flattened before him. The opposition to Zerubbabel's work will vanish away. The shouts of 'God bless it!' are literally 'Grace! grace to it!' and signify both the beauty of the building and God's graciousness in enabling them to rebuild it. The capstone is literally 'head stone', an expression that does not occur elsewhere. It is obviously an important stone in the temple, signifying the completion of the building (cf. v 9), and probably signifies the 'head of the corner' (Ps. 118:22), the stone placed at the top corner of two walls to hold them properly together.

The second half (8–10) has its own introduction. It is a promise that Zerubbabel will be able to finish the temple rebuilding. It will not be as it was when the exiles came back from Babylon: they started to build and were persuaded to give up (Ezr. 4:4–5, 24). 'Who despises the day of small things?' (10) would apply to those who were discouraged in the face of the opposition and the powerlessness of the people who had returned to Jerusalem. They thought that they could not succeed, but they will rejoice when they see Zerubbabel's success. The prophet gives them a gentle rebuke, aimed also at encouraging them (the way a nurse might reprimand a patient). The phrase translated plumb-line in NIV is (lit.) 'the tin stone', or possibly 'the separated stone'. It is unlikely that tin would be used for a plumb-line, and so the meaning may be that the stone which finished the temple (7) indicates that Judah is separated off from other peoples, chosen to be God's own people. The completion of the temple will signify that God's message via Zechariah is true (see above on vs 9, 12).

5:1–4 The sixth vision

The next two visions belong together, as did the second and third. Both deal with the cleansing of God's people. The flying scroll represents a curse that goes through all the land (cf. 4:10b, 14; 5:3, 6; 6:5) as a judgment upon evildoers. In the next vision (5:5–11) a woman representing 'wickedness' is removed far away to the land of Babylonia (Heb. Shinar is Sumeria in Mesopotamia).

The scroll is described as flying which probably means that it is not rolled up, but open for anyone to read. This would make it possible to see its size: 30 ft. by 15 ft. (20 by 10 cubits). The size is enormous, giving emphasis to the message. The words on it presumably would be a curse against evildoers.

The curse also means 'oath' and is especially associated with a failure to satisfy an obligation, as in Dt. 29:20–21.

The two types of sinner mentioned are representative of evildoers, rather than the only ones who will be judged. Every thief would represent all who wrong their neighbour; and swearing falsely, which involves using God's name, is an insult to the Lord himself (cf. Lv. 19:11–12). Be banished is from a root meaning 'be clean, be purged'. It signifies being removed from the covenant people, and therefore outside of God's salvation. In days when 'lying' is regarded as comparatively unimportant, it is salutary to remember this prophecy and compare passages like Je. 28:15–17 and Acts 5:1–11.

The curse, which is a word from the Lord, is personified in v 4. It will enter the house ... remain ... and destroy it—completely: both timbers and its stones.

5:5–11 The seventh vision

Both the sixth and seventh visions have something to say about how God deals with sin. Whereas the former concentrates on judgment, this one is concerned with the purifying of the land by the removal of sin.

Zechariah sees a measuring basket, (lit. 'an ephah'), which was a unit of measure. We cannot be sure how large an ephah was, but it was probably not more than ten gallons. Perhaps it was enlarged in the vision, as was the scroll (5:2). This is the iniquity makes sense more easily than the Hebrew text 'this is their eye', and is supported by the ancient Greek and Syriac versions. It is possible that the ephah is chosen because of passages like Am. 8:5: 'skimping the measure, boosting the price', (lit.) 'make the ephah small and the shekel great'. It was a sign of dishonesty and a lack of concern for others.

The (heavy) cover is removed, and there sits a woman: wickedness. This does not mean that woman represents wickedness better than man. It may simply be that the word is feminine. Note that those who remove wickedness from the land are also women (9–11). The wind in their wings (9) could equally be translated 'the spirit ...' (cf. 6:5). This would indicate that the cleansing was the work of God's Spirit. The Hebrew for stork is from the same root as 'stead-fast love', and this may be why these particular birds feature here: the cleansing is a sign of grace.

Babylonia (11), (lit. 'Shinar'), was in Mesopotamia. It was the place that Abraham left when God made a covenant with him and where the tower of Babel was built—and destroyed by God (Gn. 11:2, 9; note also the further connection with this story through the phrase 'the face of the whole earth/land', Gn. 11:4, 9; cf. Zc. 5:3). The house for it may mean a temple of some sort (cf. the expression 'house of the LORD'). In any case it implies that wickedness has no place among God's people.

6:1–8 The eighth and final vision

The final vision is similar in several ways to the first vision. The two together have the effect of unifying the whole series: they form an 'envelope' for the other visions. In addition we note that this vision forms a climax to the whole series: in ch. 1 the nations were at ease and the Lord was angry with them and zealous for Jerusalem and Judah. In ch. 6 the Lord's spirit is at rest (and the nations have been judged).

There are also some surprising differences between the two visions e.g. chariots are mentioned in ch. 6 as well as horses. The colours of the horses are different. In ch. 1 there are two red horses, one brown and one white. In ch. 6, the four horses are red, black, white and dappled. The reason for the variation is not known, but a similar type of variation occurs in 6:10 and 14.

The horses go out to the four corners of the earth (the four points of the compass), although we have to infer that the red one goes to the east, since it is not explicitly stated. This expresses the fact that God's influence covers all the earth (cf. LORD of the whole world, 6:5; 4:14). There is a play on words which cannot be captured in English: the word for 'spirit' is the same as 'wind' (cf. John 3:8).

When the report is given (8) it simply mentions the north. Most probably this is because the north had various associations: it was the place where rival gods were said to have their headquarters (cf. Ps. 48:2); it was where the land of Shinar or Babylonia was situated (2:7; 5:11; cf. Je. 23:8); and it was the direction from which all major attacks on Israel and Judah came (Is. 41:25; Je. 1:13–15; 16:15), including the foes of the last times (Ezk. 38:6, 15). We are certainly meant to assume that in the end God is satisfied with the condition of the whole world.

Two mountains (1) seem to represent the gateway of heaven (cf. 5); of bronze may indicate either the rising sun (a new day is dawning; remember that the first vision was at night [1:8], and this might be significant), or the two pillars of the temple entrance. Bronze is used to indicate strength (e.g. Je. 1:18) against attack: the Lord's heavenly temple is impregnable.

It is unlikely that the colours of the horses (2–3, 6–7) have particular meanings (see on 1:8). Dappled horses is a rendering of two obscure words. The expression might mean 'dappled horses, powerful ones': the second word is used in v 7 to refer to all the horses.

Four spirits (or 'winds') (5) is intentionally ambiguous. The wind is invisible and everywhere, as is God's presence. 'Winds' is probably the primary meaning in view of v 8. But there is no need to look for consistency in poetic imagery (cf. 'seven spirits' in Rev. 1:4; 3:1; 4:5; 5:6).

6:9–15 An oracle

This oracle serves as a most important climax to the visions, and draws together some of the central ideas in the preceding chapters. The structure of it is basically chiasmic. The outer envelope is strongly indicated by the names of the exiles who have arrived from Babylon (cf. also chs. 7–8). The oracle can be set out as follows.

9 Introduction to the oracle.

10 Take from ... Heldai, Tobijah and Jedaiah ... and go ... to the house of Josiah son of Zephaniah.

11 Take the silver and gold and make (lit. crowns) and set [it/them] on the head of ... Joshua.

12 Say to him ... Behold, a man, Branch is his name and he will branch out ... and build the temple of the LORD.

13 He will sit and rule on his throne and he/there will be a priest on/by his throne and there will be peace between the two of them.

14 The crown will be(long) to Heldai (Heb. Helem), Tobijah, Jedaiah, and Hen the son of Zephaniah as a memorial in the temple of the LORD.

The strange features of this section are listed below.

(i) Two of the names of the people mentioned in v 10 are changed in v 14. Heldai (meaning 'mole'!) becomes Helem (NIV mg. meaning 'strength'), and Josiah becomes Hen (meaning 'grace', the same word used twice in 4:7 in connection with rebuilding the temple).

(ii) The word translated crown is actually a plural form, but it is used with a singular verb (14). Perhaps it is meant to hint at the two characters involved in the leadership of Judah. (See below.)

(iii) It is not clear from grammar alone whether there is one figure or two. In ch. 4 it was Zerubbabel who rebuilt the temple; and in ch. 3 ‘the Branch’ was different from Joshua. Harmony between the two (13) most naturally means between priest and civil leader, but might just possibly mean ‘priestly and political aspects of rule’.

(iv) Zerubbabel is not mentioned by name, and the fact that the crown(s) is put in the temple as a memorial, suggests that the oracle has to do with events after his death.

When we remember that ‘Branch’ is a term used of the Messiah, and apply the prophecy to Jesus, many features fall into place: he is both king and priest; he is the reality that Joshua and Zerubbabel imperfectly pointed to; he is the builder of the temple of God, the church.

The final verse is similar to the climax of chs. 7–8. Many people will come from far away, not just the few mentioned at the beginning of the section. This will be a sign that the Lord has really spoken through his messengers (15, see above on 2:9–11).

Notes. 11 ‘Crowns’, the plural form has been explained in different ways: as a type of circlet crown which could be worn singly or fitted together to make a composite crown (cf. Rev. 19:12); as a ‘plural of excellence’, i.e. there was one wonderful crown; or the text is either wrong or the word is an unusual singular form. It seems highly likely that there is an intended ambiguity here.

14 This verse is difficult to translate and understand. J. A. Motyer suggests ‘and the crown will be for a memorial of Helem etc.’, meaning that ‘when the Messiah sits as Priest-King, people from afar will come to own allegiance to him’. Perhaps there is a play on words: the crown will be a reminder of strength, goodness (Tobijah meaning ‘the LORD is my good’), knowledge (Jedaiah, ‘the LORD is knowing’) and grace—a commendation of the action of the exiles (10) who made the long journey to the temple bringing the silver and gold from which the crown was made, and a promise of blessing to them.

7:1–8:23 A question about fasting

Zechariah 7–8 is constructed as a large chiasmus with a promise mentioned at the centre (8:8). It refers to themes introduced in 1:1–6, giving an exhortation to obey, a promise for Jerusalem and Judah, and a wider promise (based on the visit of people from Bethel to ‘entreat the favour of the LORD’) to many peoples. This coherent whole is marked out for the reader or hearer by the use of key words and phrases which connect corresponding sections together. Despite the fact that there are passages where it is impossible to be sure what the intended meaning is in detail, the result is a very pleasing and powerful unity.

These two chapters begin a new section of the book of Zechariah. The message reinforces and fills out what has been said previously: the Lord punished his people for their disobedience, and withdrew his protection and the sign of his presence, the temple. But now he will again ‘dwell in their midst’ in a restored Jerusalem. He exhorts them to keep the commands they previously ignored.

The section starts with a question about fasting: the people of Bethel send a delegation to ask the priests and prophets (presumably including Zechariah) if they should observe the fast they had traditionally kept in the fifth month of the year. The prophet challenges them about their motives for fasting, and recalls the previous disobedience of the people which led to the judgment of the exile. He goes on to make a tremendous promise for the future of Jerusalem. This forms the centre of the section. He reiterates the commandments that the Lord expected the forefathers to keep, and at last answers the question about fasting. The answer is not what they would have expected: the fast of not only the fifth month, but the fourth, seventh and tenth also, will become seasons of rejoicing. God's grace, his delight to give more abundantly than they could imagine, comes through in these verses. And that is not all: his grace extends to the nations around, and they will come to Jerusalem to entreat the favour of the Lord.

The structure of these chapters is as follows:

7:1*

A (v 2) Men of Bethel come to ask favour of Yahweh.

B (v 3) Questions about fasting.

C (vs 9–10) Former prophets said 'don't devise evil in your heart'.

D (vs 12b–14) Great wrath came as the land became desolate.

8:1*

E (vs 3–8a) Promise of blessing for the remnant of this people.

F (v 8b) They will be my people, and I ... their God.

E¹ (vs 9–13) Promise of blessing for the remnant of this people.

D¹ (vs 14–15) But now God determines good for Jerusalem.

C¹ (vs 16–17) Don't devise evil in your heart.

8:18*

B¹ (v 19) Fasts will become feasts.

A¹ (vs 20–23) Many will ask favour of Yahweh.

This 'chiasmic' form is described in the Introduction on structure. The most important point is found at the centre (F).

An asterisk (*) indicates an introductory verse, which emphasizes the importance of what follows it. Notice how the passages with the same letter correspond to each other. All parallel sections have significant words or phrases which draw attention to the correspondence. Setting out the plan like this enables us to see the most important features of the whole section.

It leads from a comparatively unimportant question by an insignificant group of men, from a town in Israel, to a tremendous confirmation of God's election of his people and his constant purposes (8:8, the NIV obscures the continuity between this verse and the string of promises related to Ex. 6:7; e.g. Gn. 17:8; Je. 31:33; etc. lit. in each case: 'I will be to them (you for God'; cf. 2:11 '... will be to me for a people'). This occurs at the centre of the whole unit, often where the turning point of a chiasmic passage like this is found. The important position of the first half of the promise in ch. 2:11 was noted, and it occurs again in 13:9 at an important climax.

7:1–3 A delegation

The fourth year of King Darius (I) is 518, two years after Zechariah's first oracle, and two years before the completion of the temple (Ezr. 6:15). Bethel, in the northern kingdom of Israel, was where one of the idolatrous golden calves of Jeroboam I was set up. A promise to people from Bethel shows grace! The emphasis on Jerusalem as the authorized centre for the worship of the LORD is understandable. We do not know who Sharezer and Regem-Melech were. It could be translated: 'And Bethel-Sharezer sent Regem-Melech [possibly a title meaning "royal spokesman"] and his men'.

The expression entreat the LORD is only found here and in 8:21 and 22 in Zechariah. The envelope formed around chs. 7–8, by this and the question of fasting, is therefore very strong. The fasts mentioned in 7:3, 5 and 8:19 are thought to commemorate the following events: fifth month, destruction of the temple (2 Ki. 25:8–9); fourth month, wall of Jerusalem breached (Je.

39:2); seventh month, murder of Gedaliah the governor of Judah (2 Ki. 25:25; Je. 41:1–2); tenth month, beginning of the siege of the city by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Ki. 25:1–2; Je. 39:1).

7:4–14 A challenge for the present

7:4–7 A counter-question about fasting. Zechariah does not have to reason out the answer on the basis of the Law, but receives a direct word from the Lord. He asks them about their motives: were they fasting for the Lord or for their own benefit? He points out that the earlier prophets had given similar messages.

7:8–10 Words formerly given. The NIV is misleading here, for there is no word again in the Hebrew, and vs 8–14 refer to the past message and (lack of) response (see v 14). It would be better to translate vs 8–9: ‘And the word of the LORD came to Zechariah saying, “Thus did the LORD say ...”’ V 8 implies (as is often true of this formula) that Zechariah continued to speak according to the word of the Lord. Administer true justice is slightly expanded in 8:16, render true and sound judgment in your courts. In your hearts do not think evil of each other is the same basic expression as in 8:17, which is more accurately translated there: do not plot evil against your neighbour (cf. Gn. 50:20; Je. 48:2; etc.). These similarities draw attention to the fact that the requirements of the Lord are the same in the new situation as they were previously.

7:11–14 The fathers’ response and its results. This section refers to the response of the forefathers to the former prophets (as in 1:4). They made their hearts as hard as flint, impervious to God’s word. As a result ‘there was great wrath from the LORD’ (12). This is the literal translation, and it describes the action of wrath rather than a feeling. Since they refused to listen to the Lord, he refused to listen to them: they were scattered among the nations and the land was left desolate. The verdict to be passed on this account is that it is exactly what they deserved. However, God moves on from this to something totally undeserved.

8:1–8 Promise to Jerusalem renewed

8:1–3 Jealousy for Jerusalem. The themes of jealousy for Jerusalem/Zion and the Lord’s return to dwell in the city have been prominent previously (1:14, 16; 2:10–12). And when God dwells in the city, then she must be a city of truth and holiness. The mountain of the LORD Almighty [of hosts] was the raised part of Jerusalem on which the temple was built.

8:4–6 Peace in the city. The city will be at peace and safe from attack. People will not be rushing here and there repairing or building up the wall (see on Na. 2:4–5); there is no danger that a missile will fly over the wall. Even the most vulnerable members of the city can sit or play in the streets. To Zechariah’s hearers this still seemed a dream, for they had constant harassment from the people around. Marvellous is used in the sense of ‘extraordinary’ or ‘difficult’: it is not too hard for the Lord (see especially Gn. 18:14; Je. 32:17, 27, where the same root is used, and cf. Mk. 10:27). The word remnant occurs also in vs 11 and 12. It is a significant word which implies both the judgment of God (only a remnant is left) and the mercy of God (a remnant will be saved).

8:7–8 The covenant promise renewed. When Judah went into exile to Babylon many fled to neighbouring countries. They also will be able to return to Jerusalem. It is difficult for us to realize how important Jerusalem was to the people of Israel and Judah, for we take it for granted that we can worship God anywhere in the world. Even those who put great stress on Rome, Canterbury or Geneva do not regard them in the same way as the Jews do Jerusalem. It was the one place where sacrifices could be offered, the one temple authorized to be built as God's house, a sign that the Lord was in the midst of his people. So here, the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem means the confirmation of God's covenant promises (see on 2:10–12).

8:9–13 Renewed promise

This section begins and ends with the same word: Let your hands be strong, and this sets the tone: an encouraging challenge. Before the foundation of the temple was laid, people did not experience blessing. They had put themselves first, and had not prospered. Now they are to get their hands to work on the temple and they will prosper (cf. 1 Cor. 15:58).

8:14–17 A challenge from the past

This repeats Zechariah's message that the Lord is no longer angry with his people, but intends to do them good. He exhorts them to keep the sort of commands that the forefathers failed to keep (cf. 7:9–10).

8:18–23 Fasting and feasting

The 'answer' to the question about fasting (7:3) is that the fasts will become feasts. The events connected with the fall of Jerusalem will be totally transformed; occasions to inspire wonder at God's forgiveness and grace. The prophet goes on unexpectedly to an even greater promise; all nations (23) will seek God in Jerusalem, recognizing that he has blessed his people the Jews (i.e. people of Judah). There will be ten times as many as belong to God's people now (23). The section reaches a tremendous climax here as we note the contrast between the small delegation of 7:2 and this final vision.

9:1–14:21 Battles, leaders, and the goal of history

The last six chapters have been hotly disputed. Some argue that the heading 'An Oracle' (9:1; 12:1; cf. Mal. 1:1) marks these off as separate books, which should perhaps be treated along with Malachi rather than Zechariah. They do seem to reflect a later situation, though the question how much later is not easy to answer. They are so different from Zechariah 1–8 in language and imagery, and so similar in basic concerns, that they are likely to have come from a disciple of Zechariah. Most conservative commentators favour the view that Zechariah himself added to and edited his own original work. This cannot be ruled out. See also Introduction.

The same basic themes are found throughout chs. 9–14 in an alternating pattern. There are frequent references to Judah and Jerusalem and their enemies/the nations on the one hand, and the question of leadership on the other. The contents may be set out as follows.

9:1–8 Judgment for Judah's enemies (with a hint of salvation).

9:9–10 Judah's righteous, saved, humble king comes; peace is established.

9:11–17 Judgment for enemies and salvation for Judah/Ephraim.

10:1–5 Further concern about leadership: judgment of corrupt leaders; provision of true leadership.

10:6–12 Strengthening for Judah/Joseph/Ephraim (with mention of judgment for enemies).

11:1–3 Judgment on pride/shepherds/nations?

11:4–14 Judgment against bad leaders and stubborn people.

11:15–17 Judgment of a leader.

12:1–9 Judgment for Judah's/Jerusalem's enemies: victory in battle.

12:10–14 The pierced one. Yahweh's spirit of compassion brings mourning.

13:1 Cleansing 'on that day'.

13:2–6 Idols and false prophets are removed.

13:7–9 Judgment of 'my shepherd' brings refining and fulfilment of the promise: Yahweh their God etc.

14:1–15 Judgment for Judah's/Jerusalem's enemies: destroyed in battle by God's intervention. Phenomena of the last days; plagues for Yahweh's enemies.

14:16–21 Blessing for the nations: they come to Jerusalem for the Feast of Tabernacles (or else they suffer plagues). Jerusalem is purified ('holy to Yahweh').

It is not possible to reduce this to a neat diagram without distorting the picture. It is clear that there is a unity about the whole, despite the wide variety of materials from which this is composed.

The structure that does appear may be described in simplified terms as a sort of multi-layer sandwich, where the 'bread' consists of passages concerning the enemies of Judah and Jerusalem: it contains varying amounts of judgment and/or salvation for the enemies and for Judah/Jerusalem. The climax is that the nations are given the same opportunity to worship Yahweh as Judah. The 'filling' concerns the question of leadership. Here there are also variations in content: the right leader is to be installed and bad leaders purged; cleansing is to be achieved somehow in connection with God's representative. See also Introduction on Compilation above and the Commentary.

9:1–8 The Lord takes action

There are many obscure words and phrases in this section, as in chs. 9–14 as a whole, and it is necessary to check the overall sense by looking at the whole context. Even when precision is not possible, the central meaning is clear.

Oracle comes from the root 'lift up' and can be translated 'burden', i.e. something laid upon someone by compulsion. (Note the play on words in Je. 23:33.) This is a highly suitable way of describing a prophetic message (Je. 20:9). It is either a heading referring to chs. 9–11, or part of the opening sentence of this section: 'The burden of the word of the LORD is ...'.

The tone of almost all of vs 1–8 is judgment. Only in v 7 do we find a promise to Ekron, one of the Philistine cities. It will be incorporated into the people of Judah, as the Jebusites were, the inhabitants of Jerusalem before David took the city (2 Sa. 5:6–10). This comes after judgment (5) and cleansing (7). Four of the five main Philistine cities are mentioned (5–6) (Gath may be omitted because it had been destroyed by this time). The Philistines were, of course, Israel's traditional enemies, a thorn in Israel's side from the days of the Judges (e.g. Jdg. 13–16; 1 Sam. 13–14; 31). They were not very important in themselves after the exile, and the appearance of 'Philistia' here is not simply as a concrete nation, but as a symbol of the enemies of God and his people (cf. the use of 'Edom' in Is. 11 and 34).

The tone of vs 1–8 indicates that vs 1–3 are also a message of judgment against Hadrach (somewhere in the far north of Palestine), Damascus (capital city of Syria or Aram), Hamath (120 miles farther north) and the Phoenician ports of Tyre and Sidon. Tyre was very rich through its trading, and particularly difficult to conquer since it had to be reached by a causeway. But even Tyre will be destroyed, and its pride in its wealth and strength will be shown up as a hollow thing.

V 8 is also difficult to translate, but the NIV gets the right sense. The Lord will not allow his house (i.e. either the temple or the land of Judah) to be destroyed again, as he did when the people were taken to Babylon.

9:9–10 The humble king comes

V 9 is probably the best known in Zechariah. All the gospels tell how Jesus fulfilled this prophecy when he entered Jerusalem on an ass. Are we to assume that this is a prophecy of the Messiah with no reference for the prophet's own times? After the exile there was no king in Judah. The emperors of the major powers, Medo-Persia, Greece and finally Rome were sensitive on this matter (Jn. 19:12–15), and, although there was a brief period of Jewish independence following the Maccabean revolt in 167 BC, no-one remotely resembling this king ever appeared on the scene. The prophecy was still relevant for the people living five hundred years before Christ, for it spoke of God's intention and therefore his relationship with them. They remained his people and their king would come.

The coming king is to be righteous and having salvation (lit. 'saved'). The RSV gives the wrong impression with 'triumphant and victorious'. This king has been declared righteous and saved by God. This suggests a situation in which the king is both accused and attacked by his enemies but is vindicated and saved by the Lord. Clearly this fits Jesus very well! (Cf. Ps. 118, especially vs 22–23, also applied to the Lord Jesus).

In earlier times the ass or donkey was not thought of as a lowly beast, but important men rode on them (Jdg. 10:4; 12:14). Even the king of Israel only rode on a mule (1 Ki. 1:33; cf. 2 Sa. 13:29; 18:9). A horse or chariot would have been the normal conveyance for the king in a victory procession. The emphasis here is on humility and peacefulness. He will reign from sea to sea (i.e. the Mediterranean in the west and the sea known only vaguely to be in the east [the Dead Sea—NIV mg.] as in 14:8), and from the River Euphrates in Mesopotamia to the ends of the earth. In other words he will reign over all the world.

These qualities are surprising, so surprising that this prophecy was largely neglected by those who waited eagerly for the Messiah. (See comment on Pss. 22; 69; 110.)

Note. The expression donkey and colt, the foal of a donkey are parallel; they are two descriptions of one animal. In Mt. 21:1–7, Matthew mentions two animals, and 'sat on them' is best taken to mean 'on the cloaks'! Ephraim was the largest of the northern tribes of Israel, and is often used, as here, to mean the whole of Israel.

9:11–11:3 Prophecies of judgment and hope

At first sight this looks like a mixed bag of unrelated prophecies relating to a period long after Zechariah (Greece is mentioned in 9:13, and the Greek empire was not established till after 333 BC) There are, however, many points of contact between the various sections and also 9:1–8 (e.g. half the words in 10:11 have already occurred in this opening section). The themes going through the whole are the defeat of Judah's and Israel's enemies and the provision of a purified leadership (10:3–4).

9:11–12 A promise to prisoners. The Lord makes promises on the basis of the fact of his covenant with them, sealed by the blood of sacrifice (Ex. 24:5–8). I will free your prisoners from the waterless pit recalls Gn. 37:24 and Je. 38:6, for the expression is almost identical in Hebrew, 'pit/cistern/well ... there was no water in it'. This would recall the plight of Joseph and Jeremiah, both delivered from desperate situations because the Lord was with them. So these contemporaries of the prophet are now prisoners of hope, allowed to return to their fortress with the promise that the Lord is restoring to them double that which they lost.

9:13–17 Victory to Judah and Ephraim. After this promise of peace (9–12), we are told how this will come about; a military victory over ‘Greece’, the enemy of Judah and Israel (Ephraim). Greece was not a prominent power until c. 333 BC, and many believe that this verse has either been inserted into the prophecy at a late stage, or indicates that chs. 9–14 is a late prophecy. The word Javan does occur in Gn. 10:2, 4 and Is. 66:19 to refer to distant peoples at the edge of the known world. This would fit the sense very well (cf. 10b).

The pictures emphasize the fact that it is the Lord who gives victory in enabling his people to be successful in battle. Trumpets were used in battle to give clear signals to inspire confidence in the soldiers, and to terrify the enemy. This also recalls the victories of Joshua at Jericho, and Gideon over the Midianites (Jos. 6:3–5; Jdg. 7:16–22), where the Lord’s part was obvious. The storms (or whirlwinds) of the south were especially destructive (14). V 15 describes the boisterous victory celebration! A bowl used for sprinkling implies that their rejoicing is centred on the Lord.

Vs 16–17 sum up the result of the victory: the people are saved by the Lord, who regards them as his flock, and precious as jewels. They have grain and new wine (young men and women are mentioned as examples, not because the young women get all the new wine!), signs of prosperity which are often found as part of the description of Canaan as the promised land (Dt. 7:13; 11:14; Ho. 2:8, 22).

10:1–5 Blessing, leaders and battle. The transition from one section to another is not at all clear. Here we find all three main subjects that have occurred in the previous section: an invitation to ask for rain so that the crops etc. may grow (1, cf. 9:17); provision of a good leader (4, cf. 9:9) to replace corrupt ones (3); and a continuation of battle imagery (3b–5, cf. 9:10, 13–15). The prophecy appears disjointed, but a logical progression can be detected.

1 Ask the LORD for rain and not idols and those who serve them.

2 The idols speak deceit (or wickedness), and the result of trusting sources other than the Lord is that the people wander like sheep, oppressed for lack of a shepherd.

3 Therefore the Lord will act: My anger burns against the shepherds ... leaders.

3b Narrator’s comment and expansion, or else the Lord continues to speak of himself in the third person. God cares for his people and will therefore make them successful in battle and will provide a good leader.

4 The leader is described as (a) a cornerstone: a different word from capstone in 4:7, meaning that on which the building is supported; (b) a tent peg: which keeps the tent up.

4b means either that Judah will bring forth (effective) weapons and rulers, or else that battle-bow and every (oppressive) ruler will depart from Judah, giving peace to the land.

5 Description of the battle continues. This leads naturally into the next section.

10:6–12 I will strengthen them. This section is in the form of a promise spoken by God himself. Its basic content is indicated by the envelope formed by ‘I will strengthen ...’ (beginning of 6 and 12).

Throughout these verses the past judgment is acknowledged: they have been scattered among the nations by the Lord (6b, 9 [‘scattered’ is better here], 10–11), but in his compassion he will bring them back home, and give them as much as they had previously (6, 8).

The emphasis on Ephraim as well as Judah signifies the unity of God’s people. The northern kingdom was actually destroyed in 721 BC, at least two hundred years previously. At that time the Assyrians deliberately mixed up the population of Israel with those of other nations, seeking to destroy their identity, but the Lord has not forgotten his people. There are still those who remember that they are part of Israel, and the Lord will signal for them to return home. Even today the sense of looking to Jerusalem is very strong among Jews all over the world.

Some Jews fled to Egypt from the Babylonian armies (Je. 43–44) and not all returned from Assyria. In fact there were Israelites all over the known world. But Egypt and Assyria also signify oppression and bondage in all its forms. The references to passing through the sea and to the Nile, recall the exodus from Egypt through the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21–28) and the judgment of God in turning the Nile to blood (Ex. 7:17–21). Assyria and Egypt had been proud and acknowledged rulers, but this would change.

It is good to be cautious in speaking today of Egypt and Israel as if the modern nations known by these names are those to which the promises apply (see e.g. Is. 19:19–25!). We need to see the underlying concern of the prophet and realize that the Lord is God who redeems his (repentant) people from situations where they are helpless in themselves.

11:1–3 A call to lament. Lebanon has been mentioned in 10:10 as a destination for returning exiles, so we might think that ‘Open your doors’ would be simply to let them in. Not so. It is for fire to come in and burn up Lebanon’s impressive cedars. They are often used as a symbol of pride. The oaks of Bashan, in the far north of the land east of the Jordan, are similar. Both occur in Is. 2:13 (cf. Ezk. 27:5–6). It is possible that the regions of Lebanon and Bashan were guilty of particular wrongs against the Israelites, but their main purpose here is to stand for all proud opposition to God’s purposes.

This type of ‘call to lament’ is often used in prophetic passages of judgment as a graphic way of describing a coming disaster (Is. 13:6; 14:31; Je. 25:34; Zp. 1:11). The shepherds and lions indicate the leaders to be judged: their environment is destroyed and they cannot operate any more.

The passage has several links with the preceding verses (especially 9:4 consumed by fire; 10:2–3, shepherds; 10:10, Lebanon; 10:11, pride (of Assyria), translated lush thicket in 11:3). So it acts as a transitional passage, preparing the way for the allegory of the shepherds that follows.

11:4–17 Shepherds and sheep

This section describes the prophet as a shepherd of the flock marked for slaughter who acts on their behalf for a while and then abandons them, breaking his shepherd’s staffs (4–14). Then he represents a foolish shepherd who does not care for the flock and is cursed (15–17).

The passage is among the most difficult to interpret. V 13 is well known because of its use in Mt. 27:9–10, where it represents the price paid to Judas for betraying Jesus. In this passage it also represents the value placed on the shepherd appointed by God, though it is paid to the shepherd himself, and not to a betrayer.

It is not an account of actual events, for several references cannot be taken literally, e.g. revoking the covenant I had made with all the nations (10) and in one month I got rid of three shepherds (8) (cf. other occurrences of the same verb: perishing in v 9; Ex. 23:23, ‘wipe them out’; 1 Ki. 13:34, ‘destruction’). The allegory is a graphic way of describing the Lord’s dealing with his flock.

11:4–6 A shepherd of the doomed flock. The prophet reports a commission from the Lord (‘said’ would be better than says) to become a shepherd of the flock marked for slaughter. They are at the mercy of unscrupulous merchants and shepherds who only keep them for profit (5). V 6 adds an interpretation: the Lord’s pity is to be suspended, for the people must be judged. People will be oppressed by their neighbours (a sign of internal unrest) and their leaders. There was no king of Judah until the second century BC, so the word must be used figuratively. It shows a contrast with the ‘humble king’ of 9:9 and the Lord who will be ‘king over the whole earth’ (14:9). For a while the Lord will not rescue his people from their plight.

11:7–14 The fate of two staffs. The prophet pastures the doomed flock with staffs indicating that he will do the job well. Favour is a characteristic of God mentioned in Pss. 27:4 (‘beauty’) and 90:17 (‘favour’). It signifies some sort of protection for God’s people from attacks by the nations (10). Union is lit. ‘bands’, i.e. that which binds together (Israel and Judah, 14).

In the month ... three shepherds. Many have tried to identify three historical leaders, usually kings or priests, who were destroyed in one month, i.e. a short space of time, but it cannot be done with any confidence. In any case, it signifies the Lord’s action against bad leaders, but on behalf of an unresponsive people (9). Therefore, the shepherd abandons them to their fate, breaking the staff Favour and allowing the nations to oppress them again.

Either the afflicted of the flock or the traders in the sheep (as in the Gk. version of the Bible) observed this and knew it was the word of the LORD, i.e. recognized that the Lord had spoken to them through the shepherd’s actions (cf. also 2:9, 11; 4:9; 6:15).

In vs 12–13 the prophet asks for his wages, if they want to pay him. They paid ... thirty pieces (lit. weighed out thirty shekels) of silver, which he refers to ironically as the handsome price at which they priced me! The same sum was demanded as compensation for the death of a slave (Ex. 21:32). The shekel varied between about a third and two thirds of an ounce, but silver was quite valuable (see Ne. 5:15). Into the house of the LORD to the potter. It is possible that a potter would be there to make vessels used for the service of the temple. The word might also mean ‘metal worker’. A very slight change in the Hebrew would give ‘into the treasury’ and this is what one ancient version, the Syriac, reads. It may be correct.

The second staff, Union, is broken (14), signifying disunity between Israel and Judah who should have been united as God’s people.

11:15–17 A foolish, worthless shepherd. Take again ... of a foolish shepherd is strange, because the prophet started as a good shepherd. The meaning is either that he became a foolish shepherd when he broke the staffs, or, more likely, that the meaning is ‘Take again the implements of a shepherd, this time a foolish one’. The word foolish in the OT indicates ‘wilfully bad’, rather than simply lacking in intelligence.

It is strange to find one of God’s servants commanded to do something actually bad. The Lord uses evil instruments from time to time (Is. 10:5–11; Hab. 1:5–6) but this is different. Compare the ironical speech of Micaiah (1 Ki. 22:19–28; cf. Ezk. 20:25–26).

This indicates that God will punish the people by means of an oppressive ruler (16). Because of the shepherd’s deserting his flock a curse is pronounced against him (17): Woe to the (or ‘my’) worthless shepherd. It is difficult to know how the prophet’s hearers would have understood his words. They give a paradoxical picture of a shepherd who acts badly according to the Lord’s express command, and is punished for it. Christians can see a similar paradox in the cross: he made him who had no sin to be sin for us ... (2 Cor. 5:21).

The figure of the shepherd is continued in 13:7–9, but before that there is another paradoxical passage to deal with.

Notes. 7, 11 Particularly the oppressed of the flock is an attempt to make sense of a difficult Hebrew phrase. If this is allowed, then the passage makes sense. Many feel that it does not, and we must accept the ancient Greek version’s rendering ‘for the traders in the sheep’, which requires only a small change. The word ‘trader’ occurs in 14:21: it is the same as ‘Canaanite’.

12:1–13:9 Battle, victory and purification

It is difficult to be sure that this section belongs together, for it contains a variety of material. Yet there is an underlying unity to it, and we can see how one part leads on to another. The whole is constructed as follows:

12:1–9 The nations attack Jerusalem (and Judah [?] see v 2 below) but are defeated. Tension between Jerusalem and Judah is resolved.

12:10–14 The people who have pierced the Lord's representative (the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem) will mourn and grieve for him.

13:1 On that day these same people will be cleansed.

13:2–6 On that day idols and (false) prophecy will be removed.

13:7–9 The LORD's shepherd is struck, the sheep are scattered, there is severe purifying, and the covenant promise is reaffirmed.

12:1–9 Victory over the nations. There are some unusual features in this passage: (a) David is mentioned six times, but nowhere else in Zechariah, and the house of David is distinguished from the inhabitants of Jerusalem; (b) Judah and Jerusalem seem to be disunited (7); also in v 5 the people of Judah speak of those in Jerusalem as different (their God), and it is possible that v 2b means it (i.e. the cup of wrath) will be against Judah (as well as the nations) in the siege of Jerusalem.

The prophet starts with a reminder of the greatness of the Lord: he made the universe, and he gives life to each person, for it is the spirit within that makes a person a living being. This immediately puts the nations in their right place: they are nothing compared to this God. The Lord decrees that Jerusalem will be like a cup containing wine or something similar. The nations will drink and go reeling! The Lord will make Jerusalem a rock and anyone who tries to move it will simply injure themselves, meaning 'lacerate', as in Lv. 21:5. The panic and blindness mentioned recall other stories of judgment (Gn. 19:10–11; Jdg 7:19–22; 2 Ki. 6:18–22.) (See also ch. 14:12–13 and cf. Acts 9:3–9.)

The people of Judah realize that it is the Lord who gives strength and victory (5). In v 6 the metaphor changes: the nations attacking Jerusalem are like sheaves attacking flames, and they are consumed. Jerusalem will be unmoved and unharmed.

Judah will gain victory first (7–9), thus removing both Judah's envy of Jerusalem and Jerusalem's feelings of superiority over Judah, and restoring harmony. Even the feeblest will be as mighty as David and the house of David will be like God, like the Angel of the LORDS (i.e. the Lord when he comes to visit his people). For a similar metaphorical expression see Ex. 7:1, where Moses is 'like God to Pharaoh' and Aaron is his prophet.

Are these events a literal description of something that happened or will happen? Or are they a figurative description of God's protection of his people against overwhelming odds? It is impossible to demonstrate a detailed historical fulfilment, though it might conceivably have happened in one of history's obscure periods. It seems more likely that this gives us a pattern for God's working which may be seen in more or less detail at various times in history. The same is true of ch. 14, where there are more amazing events, connected with God's final purposes in history.

12:10–14 God's representative pierced: repentance. There follows a description of what happens to the house of David ... and the inhabitants of Jerusalem (7, 10). They have obviously 'pierced' someone whom we have not been told about. The text actually says: They will look on me, the one they have pierced, and they will mourn for him ... The change from

'me' to 'him' is abrupt and might be a mistake. But among the ancient versions of the OT, only Theodotion reads 'look on him ...' The other striking thing is that the Lord should say they have pierced him. It could be used metaphorically, since God is often spoken of as having human feelings (e.g. Ho. 11:8–9; cf. also the metaphorical expression 'pierced by hunger' in La. 4:9). The word 'pierce' is rare and usually refers to killing. In two instances it is used of a coup de grace (Jdg. 9:54; 1 Sa. 31:4; cf. Jn. 19:34–37).

Perhaps the best way to understand this is that the people have killed a historical figure, who was the Lord's representative, and in doing so they have pierced the Lord himself. This was, of course, literally true when the soldier pierced Jesus, God the Son, who was also a firstborn son. There may well have been a previous historical figure to whom these words refer.

After this piercing, the people realize what they have done and mourn and grieve for him. The words imply repentance for what they have done, and this is confirmed by 13:1. Hadad and Rimmon are both names for pagan deities, and Rimmon is also a place name (14:10; Jos. 15:32; 19:7). Hadad Rimmon may therefore be a place or a god. In Canaanite mythology Hadad's son was killed by the god of death (Mot) and there was probably an annual ritual marking these events. Our text, therefore, refers to some form of (pagan) festival, either at or for Hadad Rimmon. The prophet does not hereby approve of such rituals, but describes the intensity of the weeping.

The whole land will mourn. each clan by itself, and their wives by themselves. Probably this signifies genuine repentance: they are not weeping simply because others are. Even husbands and wives weep separately. Nathan and Shimei were the names of sons of David and Levi respectively, who may be singled out for their part, as political and priestly leaders, in the crime.

13:1–6 Cleansing continues: idols and false prophets removed. On that day occurs in vs 1, 2 and 4, and serves to bind these verses together. Some regard the formula as evidence of a later insertion into the text, but they add significantly to the sense of the whole. Following heartfelt repentance the same people again (cf. 12:7, 10) will be cleansed from sin and impurity, and thus fit to be in the Lord's presence.

V 2–6 elaborate on the theme of cleansing: idols and prophets who rely on the spirit of impurity will be removed from the land. If a false prophet utters a prophecy, even his parents will not tolerate him: they will 'pierce' him (the same word as in 12:10). The prophets themselves will be ashamed of their false prophecies: they will not put on the prophetic 'uniform' of hair (an animal skin: cf. Elijah in 2 Ki. 1:8; and John the Baptist in Mk. 1:6); they will deny that they have anything to do with prophecy (5), and if they have marks on their body from initiation as prophets or self-inflicted while prophesying (cf. 1 Ki. 18:28) they will pass them off as received during a brawl at the house of my friends. There is perhaps an ironical hint at the truth here, for 'friends' can be used of 'lovers', i.e. companions in idolatrous worship (Ho. 2:7–13; Ezk. 23:5, 9). He does not mention the names of the idols, as in v 2.

13:7–9 The Lord's shepherd struck and the sheep scattered: refining and restoration. This could be an alternative way of describing the piercing of 12:10. The one struck is described as my shepherd and the man who is close to me, and yet it is at God's express command that he is struck. As a result his followers are scattered and undergo a severe period of refining: first they are cut down to a third, and even these are tested further. The purpose is that what is pure and genuine may be saved. The climax of the section is v 9b, a reaffirmation of the covenant promise (see on 2:10–12; 8:8; cf. also Ho. 2:23).

14:1–21 Judgment and salvation of the nations

Ch. 14 is similar to ch. 12 in that it describes a battle of the nations against Jerusalem. Here, however, there is a greater emphasis on the final fulfilment of the Lord's purposes (9 especially). The first section (1–15) is arranged chiastically in a large ABCBA pattern:

- A (vs 1–3) Judgment and the Lord's intervention
- B (vs 4–5) Geographical upheavals
- C (vs 6–9) Ideal conditions: the Lord is king
- B¹ (vs 10–11) Geographical upheavals
- A¹ (vs 12–15) Judgment and the Lord's intervention

This leads into vs 16–19, which prophesy that the nations will go to Jerusalem to worship the Lord at the Feast of Tabernacles. This represents a great transformation from judgment to blessing for the nations.

The final section (20–21) tells of the holiness of Jerusalem at that time: even the bells of the horses, and the cooking pots will be HOLY TO THE LORD, and there will be no Canaanite or 'merchant' in the temple.

14:1–15 Battle in Jerusalem: the Lord becomes King over all the earth. We may set out the contents so as to show the logical flow of the section as in the summary below. Some changes have been made to the NIV in order to show how particular words emphasize the dominant ideas of each part.

1 Behold a day is coming for the Lord ... plunder divided among you.

2 And I will gather all nations to Jerusalem for battle ... Half city go forth into exile ...

3 The Lord go forth and fight against those nations as he fights on a battle day.

4 And his feet will stand, on that day, on the Mount of Olives ... on the east ... the Mount of Olives will be split in half eastwards and westwards, a very great valley and half the Mount depart northwards, and half southwards.

5 And you will flee, by my mountain valley for the mountain valley will extend to Azel, and you will flee as you fled from the earthquake in days of Uzziah king of Judah and the LORD my God will come, and all the holy ones with him.

6 And on that day there will be no light, nor cold (precious things?) nor frost.

7 And there will be one day; it is known to the Lord. No day and no night, and when evening comes there will be light.

8 And on that day living waters will go forth from Jerusalem, half to the eastern sea, and half to the western sea, in summer and winter.

9 And the Lord will be King over all the earth on that day the Lord will be one and his name one.

10 And all the land/earth, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem, will become like the Arabah. But Jerusalem will be raised up and remain in its place, from the Benjamin gate to the site of the First Gate, to the Corner Gate, and from the tower of Hananel as far as the wine presses of the king.

11 And they will dwell in it, and there will not be destruction and Jerusalem will dwell in trust/security.

12 And this the plague ... all peoples ... against Jerusalem flesh will rot while standing on their feet, eyes rot in sockets, tongues rot in mouths.

13 And on that day ... great panic from the Lord and each man will seize the hand of his neighbour, and each man's hand will be raised against the hand of his neighbour.

14 And also Judah will fight with/against Jerusalem and the wealth of the nations around will be gathered, gold and silver and garments, in great abundance.

15 And thus will be plague on the horses etc. in those camps like this plague.

The Lord himself apparently instigates this attack on Jerusalem (1–3), but the purpose is not to destroy his people. He allows the nations to inflict suffering on them, but not destroy them: a remnant of half the people is left in Jerusalem. Then the Lord himself will intervene.

In vs 4–5 the picture is of the Lord standing astride the mount of Olives, a ridge 2½ miles long, running from north to south, on the east side of Jerusalem. The mount is split by a valley which forms from east to west as the mount moves apart to north and south. This has not yet happened: some believe that it will happen literally; others that it is a figurative expression of the intervention of God (see note on the interpretation of chs. 9–14). Am. 1:1 refers to the earthquake in King Uzziah's time, and this may be reflected in Is. 6 (1–5; note the contrast between King Uzziah and the Lord the King, in both Amos and Zechariah).

Vs 6–9 form the central section and turning point of vs 1–15. The text is difficult, but the overall picture is clear: there is continuous daylight (a sign of banishing all the darkness of evil), and from Jerusalem (where the Lord dwells) living water will go forth to the eastern and western seas (bringing life to the whole breadth of the earth). The Lord will be king: this forms a contrast with the division mentioned previously in the use of the word 'half'. There will be one Lord and people will acknowledge only one Lord (his name the only name).

More geographical references (10) form a frame around vs 6–9. This time the purpose is to exalt Jerusalem, now delivered and inhabited by the Lord. It stands above the rest of the land, which has now become a plain. It is inhabited and secure.

Vs 12–15 match vs 1–3 in describing the nations' attack on Jerusalem. They give details of how the Lord defeats them. It may seem unsatisfactory to return to judgment and plagues after seeing the wonderful picture of vs 6–9, but this is how a chiasmic arrangement often works. The climax comes in the middle.

14:16–19 The nations come to the Feast of Tabernacles. Egypt is mentioned here as the people from whom Israel had to be delivered at the start of their existence as a people. They often stand as an example of those who are against God. Here it is emphasized that they are expected to come and worship the Lord. Nations who were previously excluded from worshipping the Lord are now a part of the covenant people (cf. Is. 19:18–25). The structure of the section is as follows.

16 And it will be that the survivors from all the nations that came against Jerusalem will go up year by year to worship the King the LORD Almighty [of hosts] and to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles.

17 And it will be if any of the peoples of the earth do not go up to Jerusalem to worship the King the LORD Almighty [of hosts], there will be no rain on them.

18 If the Egyptian people do not go up and take part, the LORD will bring on them the plague with which the Lord will plague the nations that do not go up to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles.

19 This will be the punishment of Egypt and the punishment of all the nations that do not go up to celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles.

This is clearly a positive prophecy (16) followed by exception clauses (17–19). Repetition serves to emphasize: going up to Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord Almighty ['of hosts'], and to 'feast the Feast of Tabernacles'. There is stern punishment for those who refuse the opportunity to join with Yahweh's people in worship and feast. Egypt is a representative nation. If it remains hostile, as in the days of Israel's bondage in Egypt, then she merits and will suffer plague (as previously, cf. Heb. 2:3).

14:20–21 Jerusalem cleansed and holy. The final section begins and ends in Hebrew with the words on that day, which form an envelope for the intervening material. The words HOLY TO THE LORD were inscribed on a plate of pure gold on the high priest's turban (Ex. 28:36). Here even the horse bells are inscribed: they are as holy as the high priest. There is no distinction between secular and sacred even in disposable pottery: all is sacred in the Lord's presence. The word Canaanite also means 'trader'. Probably the term is specially chosen to signify both trading (which does not usually have a holy motive) and impure religion which the Israelites were supposed to remove when they inherited the land of Canaan (Dt. 7:1–6, etc.).

Mike Butterworth

MALACHI

Introduction

Author

The Hebrew name Malachi means 'my messenger' or, if Malachi is a shortened form of 'Malachiah', perhaps 'messenger of [the LORD]'. Based on the LXX some scholars have argued that Malachi in 1:1 ought to be understood as a title, 'my messenger', rather than as a proper name. It appears more likely, however, that it is a man's name, as it is interpreted as such in other ancient sources. If this is so, the book of Malachi follows the pattern of each of the other fourteen writing prophets, where the author is introduced by name at the beginning, using language similar to that employed in 1:1 (cf. especially Hg. 1:1). Accordingly, 3:1 offers an important word-play on the prophet's name: 'See, I will send my messenger, who will prepare the way before me'. The implication of this word-play is that Malachi's own ministry was intended to foreshadow that of the coming messenger, who is identified in the NT as John the Baptist (see on 3:1 and 4:5–6). See the chart 'The prophets' in Song of Songs.

Date

In contrast to most of the other prophetic books of the OT, Malachi offers no clear pointer to the date of its composition. Nevertheless, most scholars agree that Malachi was probably a contemporary of Nehemiah in the mid-fifth century BC. The implied existence of the temple in 1:10; 3:1, 8, requiring a date after its reconstruction in 515 BC, supports this. The most compelling evidence for dating Malachi, however, is the substantial parallel which exists between the sins reported by Malachi and those addressed by Ezra and Nehemiah. There are shared concerns with the corruption of the priesthood (1:6–2:9; Ne. 13:4–9, 29–30); interfaith marriage (2:10–12; Ezr. 9–10; Ne. 10:30; 13:1–3, 23–27); abuse of the disadvantaged (3:5; Ne. 5:1–13); and the failure to pay tithes (3:8–10; Ne. 10:32–39; 13:10–13).

Setting

Malachi's ministry took place nearly one hundred years after the end of the Babylonian captivity and the inspired decree of Cyrus in 538 BC, which allowed the Jews to return to their homeland and to rebuild the temple (2 Ch. 36:23). This was nearly eighty years after the prophets Haggai and Zechariah had encouraged the rebuilding of that temple with glorious promises of God's blessing, the engrafting of the nations, prosperity, expansion, peace and the return of God's own glorious presence (cf. e.g. Hg. 2; Zc. 1:16–17; 2; 8; 9). To Malachi's disillusioned contemporaries, however, these misunderstood predictions must have seemed a cruel mockery. In contrast to the glowing promises, the harsh reality was one of economic privation, crop failure, prolonged drought and pestilence (3:10–11).

After the return from exile Judah remained an almost insignificant territory of about 20 x 25 miles (30 x 40 km) inhabited by a population of perhaps 150,000. Although they enjoyed the benefits of Persia's enlightened policy of religious toleration and limited political self-determination, the people felt acutely their subjugation to a foreign power (Ne. 1:3; 9:36–37), and they suffered persistent opposition and harassment from their neighbours (Ezr. 4:23; Dn. 9:25). Judah was no longer an independent nation, and more importantly it was no longer ruled by an anointed king from David's line.

Perhaps worst of all, in spite of the promises of the coming Messiah and God's own glorious presence (e.g. Zc. 1:16–17; 2:4–5, 10–13; 8:3–17, 23; 9:9–13), Israel experienced only spiritual destitution. Unlike the historical records of earlier periods, Esther, Ezra and Nehemiah are frank in their description of post-exilic Judah as lacking miraculous evidences of God's presence. In contrast to both Solomon's temple and the prophetic promise of the restored temple (as in Ezk. 40–43), the actual post-exilic temple was physically and spiritually inferior. As 3:1 reveals, the holy of holies in this second temple had no visible manifestation of the glory of God. Though God was certainly alive and well, as revealed, e.g. by his remarkable providences in the book of Esther, it was definitely a period of life 'after the fireworks' (cf. also Mi. 5:3). In other words, it was a period very much like our own, in which God's people have to live more by faith than by sight (Jn. 20:29; 2 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:8; 2 Pet. 3:3–13).

Malachi's message

Malachi's contemporaries may have been relatively orthodox in their beliefs and free from blatant idolatry (though cf. 2:11), but theirs had become a dead orthodoxy. They were all too ready to make ethical compromises and to dilute the strenuous demands of proper worship. In response to the cynicism and religious malaise of his fellow-Israelites, Malachi's prophecy comes as a wake-up call to renewed covenant fidelity.

In 1:2–5, the first of the book's six 'disputations', Malachi begins by defending the reality of God's elective love for Israel, a love which calls for robust covenantal obedience and sincere worship as its proper response. Far from this expected response, however, the people were dishonouring God by their feckless offerings and the hypocritical formalism of their worship.

In 1:6–2:9, the second disputation, Malachi exposes these offences and rebukes the priests for condoning them and thereby violating the Lord’s covenant with Levi.

In 2:10–16, the third disputation, Malachi condemns interfaith marriage as infidelity against Israel’s covenant with the Lord, and unauthorized divorce as infidelity against the marriage covenant between a husband and his wife, to which the Lord is witness. Malachi warns that these offences not only render offerings unacceptable but also place the offender’s life in jeopardy before a holy God.

In 2:17–3:5, the fourth disputation, Malachi broadens the focus of his indictment as he promises that the Lord will vindicate his justice. This will take place when ‘the messenger of the covenant’ comes to judge the wicked (when the Lord will function as a witness not only against adulterers, as in 2:10–16, but also against other offenders) and to purify his people so that their offerings will be acceptable at last.

In 3:6–12, the fifth disputation, Malachi returns to the subject of Israel’s begrudging offerings. The people had experienced material adversity and were under a curse, not in spite of their behaviour but because of it. Accordingly, Malachi challenges them to conscientious tithing, which will be rewarded with divine blessing.

In 3:13–4:3, the sixth disputation, Malachi assures his querulous contemporaries that evildoers, who may seem to escape divine justice because of their prosperity, will yet be judged, while the Lord will deliver those who fear him.

Finally, in 4:4–6 Malachi summarizes the main points of his prophecy: remember the law of Moses (the focus of disputations 1–3) and the promise of Elijah and the coming day of the Lord (the focus of disputations 4–6).

Malachi’s message is arranged in a structured ‘mirror-image’ pattern—ABCCBA—and this is reflected in the sections into which the commentary has been divided.

Further reading

J. Benton, Losing Touch with the Living God (Evangelical Press/Presbyterian and Reformed, 1985).

J. M. Boice, The Minor Prophets, 2 vols. (Zondervan, 1983, 1986).

P. C. Craigie, Twelve Prophets, Vol. 2, DSB (Westminster/John Knox Press, 1985).

J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, TOTC (IVP, 1972).

P. A. Verhoef, The Books of Haggai and Malachi, NICOT (Eerdmans, 1987).

Outline of contents

1:1

Heading

1:2–5

A The good and the arrogant wicked:
God’s love vindicated in judgment

1:6–2:9	B Israel’s begrudging offerings condemned
2:10–16	C The Lord’s witness against foreign marriages and divorces
2:17–3:5	C The Lord’s witness against adultery and other sins
3:6–12	B Israel’s begrudging offerings condemned
3:13–4:3	A The good and the arrogant wicked: God’s love vindicated in judgment
4:4–6	Conclusion

Commentary

1:1 Heading

Malachi, like the other prophets, emphasizes the authoritative word of the LORD. In this summary heading, Malachi acknowledges his own role as an intermediary and explicitly identifies his work as the word of the LORD. In keeping with this identification, nearly half of the remaining fifty-four verses of this concise and profound book are punctuated with ‘says the LORD’, ‘says the LORD Almighty’ etc.

Similar to the headings found in Zc. 9:1 and 12:1 (cf. Hab 1:1), 1:1 describes this work as An oracle or, perhaps better, ‘a burden’, with implications of urgent responsibility and even dread

(cf. Je. 23:33–40). While Malachi directs his message to the undersized post-exilic rump state of Judah, he boldly confers on this people the ancient comprehensive designation of Israel, thereby identifying them as those who are accountable for all of the covenant obligations and heirs of all the covenant promises of God.

1:2–5 The good and the arrogant wicked: God’s love vindicated in judgment

When the righteous suffer and the wicked seem to prosper, we are apt to question God’s love. In this first disputation Malachi exposes and answers the doubts of his contemporaries. Because of their political, economic and especially spiritual destitution, they had come to question God’s love. In a classic text, which Paul later quotes in Rom. 9:13, Malachi responds with an appeal to God’s elective and unconditional love of Jacob and corresponding hatred of Esau. Here ‘love’ is used to express choice and ‘hatred’ rejection, rather than personal animosity (which was explicitly prohibited against Edomites, Esau’s descendants, in Dt. 23:7). For a similar usage, see Lk. 14:26; 16:13.

Jacob and Esau are individuals from Israel’s patriarchal history. Although they were brothers, Jacob experienced God’s sovereign favour, which allowed him to enjoy a privileged role in redemptive history as a bearer of the Messianic promise, while Esau experienced God’s rejection in terms of this same role. Malachi’s concern, however, was primarily with the nations of Israel and Edom, of which Jacob and Esau were the representatives and founding fathers (cf. Gn. 25:21–23). Accordingly, it is no more possible to conclude that every Edomite was rejected or damned than to conclude that every Israelite was saved.

To Malachi’s contemporaries it must have seemed that the prophet had committed a terrible blunder in appealing to the contrasting national fates of Israel and Edom as a proof of Israel’s favoured status. If God had chosen Jacob/Israel over Esau/Edom, why did he allow his people to suffer the total devastation of their country in 587 BC by Nebuchadnezzar and then seventy years of Babylonian captivity, while Edom remained intact and seemed rather to benefit from Israel’s loss? Not only did the Edomites gloat over the ruin of their Israelite brothers, but they also actively helped the Babylonian invaders by acting as informants and cutting off escape routes (Ps. 137:7; Ezk. 25:12–14; 35:15; Ob. 8–16).

Malachi makes his point, however, by quoting Je. 9:11. Two hundred years before Malachi Jeremiah had announced what was at that time the Lord’s impending judgment against Judah: ‘I will make Jerusalem a heap of ruins, a haunt of jackals; and I will lay waste the towns of Judah so that no-one can live there.’ By applying this same threat to Edom, Malachi makes it clear that like Judah Edom would not escape God’s righteous judgment. It seems likely that Edom experienced this judgment through the agency of Nabatean Arabs who gradually forced the Edomites from their homeland in the period between 550 and 400 BC, causing them to resettle in southern Palestine in an area later called Idumea. Being semi-nomadic, the Nabateans allowed the cities of Edom to go to ruin while their grazing herds ate much of the plant life, thereby destroying previously arable land. While Judah would be graciously restored, reflecting the Lord’s love for his people, Edom’s judgment would be permanent and irreversible. Individual Edomites would continue to exist (as is implied by 1:4; cf. the Idumeans who later came to Christ in Mk. 3:8), but they had permanently forfeited their national identity.

The first disputation ends with a confession of the Lord’s universal sovereignty. This universal perspective, often misunderstood as if it implied a universalism where the religions of other nations are deemed acceptable to God, is a sub-theme of Malachi, to which the prophet returns in 1:11, 14 and 3:12.

1:6–2:9 Israel's begrudging offerings condemned

Do we really love God above all else? Does it show in the quality of our worship and service to him? In this second disputation Malachi 'turns the tables' on the complaint treated in the first. It is not God's love for Israel which is to be questioned, but Israel's for God. While recognizing that all the people were guilty of dishonouring God, as revealed in their begrudging offerings (1:14), Malachi focuses his attack on Israel's priests. This is so because it was their responsibility to guard the sanctuary from defilement and to inspect all sacrifices so as to prevent the offering of blind, lame or sickly animals (Lv. 22:17–25; Dt. 15:21; 17:1).

As a kind of shock therapy to bring the priests to their senses, Malachi contrasts the honour they readily give to people whom they respect with the heinous dishonour they have shown God. Malachi challenges his countrymen to test the quality of their sacrifices by offering them to their Persian governor instead. Malachi's logic is incontrovertible. Even a merely human governor, master or father deserves and receives greater honour than was being offered by Israel to its God, who was its supreme father, master and great king (1:6, 14; in its secular use the title great king is typically reserved for the emperor or suzerain king, as in 2 Ki. 18:19, 28).

When challenged by Malachi, the priests were nonplussed. Apparently they had deluded themselves into thinking that when it came to worship or offerings, something was better than nothing, lukewarm was better than cold. In fact, the Lord would prefer that such slovenly, irreverent, hypocritical worship would cease altogether (v 10; cf. Is. 1:11–15; 29:13; and Rev. 3:15–16).

Since the priests had failed to guard the purity of the temple, the Lord threatened to punish them in a manner which fitted their crime. Because they 'have shown contempt for' ('despised'; 1:6) and failed to honour the Lord's name (2:2), they will be despised and humiliated before all the people (2:9). Because they had defiled God (1:7), he will figuratively defile them and disqualify them for service at the altar by spreading on their faces the offal taken from their rejected sacrifices. Since that offal was to be removed from the sanctuary and burned (Lv. 4:11–12), so now they too would be expelled (2:3). Because they had presumed to bless the people of God as if Israel's sacrifices had been accepted and atonement made, God would now curse their blessings (2:2). As Matthew Henry wrote, 'Nothing profanes the name of God more than the misconduct of those whose business it is to do honour to it.'

1:11 has proved to be the most controversial verse in this book. Especially disturbing is the fact that Malachi refers to the presentation of incense and pure offerings in many places, rather than exclusively in the temple in Jerusalem, as would have been required by Dt. 12 in Malachi's day (cf. 3:3–4; 4:4). A key to the interpretation of 1:11 is to understand the expression from the rising to the setting of the sun as eschatological language (cf. Ps. 50:1; 113:3; Is. 45:6; 59:19). The two texts from Isaiah include a reference to an ultimate engrafting of the nations, suggesting a similar reference in Malachi. This hope finds further definition in such texts as Is. 19:19–25 and 66:19–21, where the nations are made to be 'Levites' and will offer acceptable offerings on approved altars to the true God. (Cf. also Ps. 47; Je. 4:1–2; Zp. 2:11; Zc. 2:11; 8:23.)

Malachi may have considered that these promises were beginning to be fulfilled in his own day in the conversion of Gentiles to Judaism. The bold language of 1:11, however, in contrast to the modest numbers of converts likely to have existed at the time, would seem to suggest that Malachi's reference pointed to a still future, more comprehensive fulfilment.

This reminder of the Lord's purpose for the conversion of the nations, a plan involving Israel's calling to be a blessing to them (cf. 3:12 and Gn. 12:2–3), features the temple as its focus (e.g. Is. 2:1–5). This is typical of Malachi's prominent interest in the end times (cf. e.g. 3:1–5, 17; 4:1–6) and adds force to his condemnation of the apathetic sacrificial cult of his contemporaries. Having exposed the priest's hypocrisy by contrasting the way they honour mere human authorities with the way they dishonour God, Malachi further rebukes that hypocrisy in 1:11 by contrasting their dishonour with the honour and acceptable offerings that will come to God one day from those who are truly redeemed. (Cf. Mt. 8:10–12, where Jesus uses a similar argument to rebuke his contemporaries.)

2:10–16 The Lord's witness against foreign marriages and divorces

Why is it that God requires a marriage to be in good repair before he will listen to a husband's prayer (see 1 Pet. 3:7; cf. Mt. 5:23–24)? Malachi reveals the answer: marriage is not just a contract, a two-way relationship between a husband and wife, but a covenant, a three-way relationship of responsibilities and privileges which involves God as a witness to whom the couple is permanently accountable.

In v 10 Malachi introduces his third disputation with a general description of Israel's infidelity against one another, which profanes their covenant with God, the Father and Creator of Israel (Dt. 32:6; cf. Is. 27:11; 43:15; Je. 31:9). Malachi condemns two parallel, though not necessarily related, marital offences. The first offence is that of intermarriage with pagans (11–12; cf. Ne. 13:29, where interfaith marriage by priests profanes the covenant of the priesthood), and the second is divorce based merely on aversion or incompatibility (13–16).

Malachi expresses a view of marriage that is radical in its conception (identifying marriage as a covenant between husband and wife). The demands it places on the husband are equal to those made by our Saviour and the apostles of the NT. Indeed, this exalted perspective on marriage has caused many interpreters to doubt whether Malachi was referring to literal marriage at all. Some suggest that Malachi only intended marriage as a metaphor for Israel's relationship to the Lord. Against this, however, is the observation that everywhere else in Scripture where the marriage metaphor appears God is uniformly depicted as the husband, not the wife, as would be the case here. Others suggest that the expression the wife of your marriage covenant (14) simply means a Jewish wife, i.e. a wife who shares in the same religious covenant with the Lord as her husband. The traditional view, reflected in the NIV, that Malachi intends a marriage covenant, however, is still to be preferred.

Malachi's contemporaries were distressed because God was refusing to accept their offerings (13), a fact which they perceived, presumably, from his withheld blessing. Malachi explains that God was acting as a witness against those husbands who were being unfaithful to their wives. Because marriage is a covenant, fidelity to one's spouse is of a piece with one's relationship with God.

V 15a may be a reference to Gn. 2:24, as is suggested by the NIV. If so, it is possible that Malachi derived his understanding of marriage as a covenant, and therefore his emphasis on the primacy of the husband's duty, from the pattern marriage of Adam and Eve. The translation and meaning of this verse is obscure, but the general approach taken by the NIV does account for the dire warnings in vs. 15b and 16b. These warnings show that for an unfaithful spouse divorce is an offence against one's own life. (So guard yourself in your spirit might be rendered, 'Therefore watch out for your lives'). In other words, concern for one's life and fidelity to one's legitimate spouse are virtually the same thing (cf. Eph. 5:28). This suggests the profound communion of life which God effects between a man and a woman within marriage, as established in Gn. 2:24. Thus interpreted, there is a remarkable similarity between the logic of 2:15 and the teaching of Jesus in Mt. 19:5–9.

Furthermore, this verse asserts that the Lord intends marriage to produce godly offspring ('seed of God'). In Malachi's view, divorce may have frustrated this purpose in a manner similar to interfaith marriage (cf. Ne. 13:23–27; Ezr. 10:3, 44). The expression 'seed of God' reflects the imagery established in v 10 (and 1:6) of God as our one Father, i.e. God as a father to his people in virtue of his redemptive acts and covenant, and it is an intentional contrast to the phrase, the daughter of a foreign god in v 11.

It is only with great difficulty and some changes to the text that the underlying Hebrew of v 16 can be made to say I hate divorce ... This apparent blanket condemnation of divorce seems to contradict the more lenient view of divorce in Dt. 24:1–4. Similarly, a more general right to divorce may be suggested by Dt. 22:19, 29, the Lord's figurative divorce of Israel in Je. 3 and certain NT texts (Mt. 1:19; 5:32; 19:8–9; 1 Cor. 7:15). It may be preferable, therefore, to understand the verse in this way: 'If a man hates and divorces (i.e. divorces merely on the ground of aversion or incompatibility, rather than for cause, such as sexual misconduct), says the LORD, God of Israel, he covers his garment with violence (i.e. visibly defiles himself with violence; for this metaphoric use of garment cf. Ps. 73:6; 109:18; Je. 2:34) says the LORD of hosts. Therefore, take heed to yourselves and do not be faithless [against your wife]' Besides requiring no changes to the Hebrew text, this rendering has the advantage that it understands the subject of 'hate' as the divorcing husband, rather than God. In support of this interpretation it may be noted that this verb for 'hate' appears frequently in marriage contexts, where it invariably refers to the attitude of the husband towards his wife (Gn. 29:31; Dt. 22:13, 16; Jdg. 15:2)

2:17–3:5 The Lord's witness against adultery and other sins

The prophet begins by accusing the people of wearying the Lord with their cynical complaints (cf. 3:13–15). Now that the people had returned to the promised land and the temple had been rebuilt, what had become of the promise of restored prosperity, international prominence and wealth (cf. e.g. Hg. 2; Zc. 1:16–17; 2; 8; 9)? In reality Israel was experiencing continued social and political oppression and economic privation (Ne. 1:3; 9:36–37). Still worse, it had been promised that God would return to Jerusalem and to his temple, which he would again inhabit with his own glorious presence (Zc. 1:16–17; 2:4–5, 10–13; 8:3–13). Since Moses' tabernacle and Solomon's temple were filled with the visible glory of God as soon as they were completed, it was natural to expect (though cf. Mi. 5:3) that the same would happen for the rebuilt temple (cf. Ex. 40:34–35; 1 Ki. 8:10–11; Ezk. 43:1–12). Indeed Hg. 2:9 had promised that this second temple would be filled with an even greater measure of glory than Solomon's temple. What glory could be greater than that described in vivid detail in Ezk. 1 and 10? As revealed in the fulness of time, only the glory of God in the person of Jesus Christ could be greater (Jn. 1:14). Far from enjoying such glory, however, the temple of Malachi's day was devoid of any visible manifestation of God. Yet it would not always be so: '... the Lord you are seeking will come to his temple; the messenger of the covenant, whom you desire, will come,' says the LORD Almighty (3:1). We can see part of the fulfilment of this prophecy when Simeon encountered the infant

Jesus in the temple and spoke of him as the one who had come to be ‘a light ... for glory to your people Israel’ (Lk. 2:32).

From the desire mentioned in 3:1 it appears that Israel had repeated the error of their forebears in the days of Amos (Am. 5:18) by supposing that the Lord’s appearance would be unmitigated good news. The answer to their complaint, Where is the God of justice? is that the God of justice is on his way! When he comes, however, it will be not only for blessing, as they assume, but also for judgment—he will come to be a ‘witness’ (the term in 3:5, rendered by the NIV testify, is the same as in 2:14) against all evil doers, including these blasphemous cynics! In preparation for this fearful visitation, the Lord promises I will send my messenger, who will prepare the way before me (3:1).

The name Malachi in 1:1 means ‘my messenger/angel’. The fact that this term reappears in 3:1, where it is generally translated my messenger, and the fact that the messenger of the covenant appears in the same verse raise some difficulties. Are these three messengers the same person, two different persons or three different persons?

The poetic parallelism in 3:1 shows that the messenger of the covenant, who is both desired and who will come, is one and the same divine person as the Lord, who is also desired and who will come. The ministry described in vs 2–3 confirms the divine nature of this Lord, who is the messenger of the covenant.

On the other hand, v 1 distinguishes my messenger from the divine LORD Almighty, who is the speaker and to whom the pronouns I, my and me refer. The forward looking context and the parallel between this verse and 4:5–6 imply that my messenger cannot be Malachi (see on 4:4–6).

The NT sees John the Baptist as the promised messenger who prepares the way for the Lord (Mt. 11:10–14; Mk. 1:2; Lk. 1:76; 7:27; cf. also Is. 40:3). Nevertheless, it is apparent from the play on Malachi’s name that his own ministry of preparation was intended to foreshadow the work of the messenger who was to come.

When the Lord comes, he will perform two complementary works: he will purify some sinners (2–4) and judge others (5). The images used for that purifying work, the refiner’s fire and the launderer’s (or fuller’s) soap, stress both its thoroughness and its severity. The heat of the refiner’s fire was intense in order to separate the dross from the molten pure metal (Is. 48:10; Ezk. 22:18–22; 1 Pet. 1:7; cf. also Mt. 3:11). Similarly, the ancient launderer washed clothes using a strong lye soap, after which the clothes would be placed on rocks and beaten with sticks. If modern sinners prefer their Lord’s cleansing work to his judgment, here is the price that must be paid (cf. Heb. 12:7–11).

3:6–12 Israel’s begrudging offerings condemned

The prophet returns to Israel’s begrudging offerings (cf. 1:6–2:9). There, however, the emphasis was on the priests’ failure in this matter; Malachi’s concern here broadens out to include the whole nation of you (9).

Although the translation of v 6 is uncertain, Malachi may have cited the example of Jacob in order to highlight the people’s sin. After Jacob’s exile in Paddan Aram, when he ‘returned’ both to the promised land and to the Lord, he built an altar at Bethel, and he offered a tithe to the Lord according to his vow in Gn. 28:20–22 (cf. also Gn. 35:1–7). When Jacob’s descendants similarly returned from their exile, they rebuilt the altar at Jerusalem, but they were grossly negligent in offering their tithes (cf. also Ne. 13:10–13). This negligence may have seemed justified because of crop failure, drought and pestilence (10–11), which would have been more than enough to deter such complacent worshippers. The Lord reveals, however, that these natural disasters were the result, and not the cause, of the nation's disobedience (8; cf. Hg. 1:6, 9–11; 2:16–19).

Without omitting the need for holiness (cf. 2:13; 3:3–4), God promises in vs 10–12 that as soon as his people become faithful in presenting their full tithes, the desperately needed rain will come (10), pestilence and crop failure will cease (11), and the Abrahamic promise wherein all the nations will call you blessed (12; Gn.12:2–3; cf. also Ps. 72:17; Is. 61:9; Zc. 8:13) will be fulfilled. In short God promised to meet all their needs, but not necessarily all their greeds. The NIV interprets v 10 ‘... and pour out so much blessing that you will not have room enough for it.’ A more literal translation is ‘... and pour out for you a blessing until there is no more need’.

3:13–4:3 The good and the arrogant wicked: God's love vindicated in judgment

The sixth disputation begins with Israel's audacious and blasphemous complaint that it is futile to serve God. What did we gain by carrying out his requirements and going about like mourners before the LORD Almighty? (14). After the list of sins exposed already by Malachi, one may wonder to what requirements they could be referring. The parallelism between carrying out his requirements and going about like mourners suggests an allusion merely to cultic requirements, probably the same ritual mourning about which Israel boasted in Zc. 7:1–6 and which was a case of hypocritical outward show (cf. 2:13; Is. 58:3–9).

Not all of Malachi's contemporaries were so arrogant and ready to charge God with wrongdoing. A second group is mentioned in v 16 and described as those who feared the LORD and honoured his name. Just as the Lord recounts the contemptuous blasphemies of the first group, so he overhears the faithful conversation of the second. Similar to the honour roll kept by King Xerxes, which recorded the long-unrewarded faithfulness of Mordecai (Est. 6:1–3), a scroll of remembrance is written in God's presence concerning these believers (cf. also Ps. 139:16; Dn. 12:1).

The insolent complainers had claimed that evildoers prosper, and even those who challenge God escape. The Lord Almighty promises that a day is coming when they will see how wrong they were (cf. v 2). For those listed in the scroll of remembrance it will be a day when they will be God's treasured possession (17; Ex. 19:5). It will be a day when he will spare these faithful ones who serve him and show them compassion. It will be a day when the sun of righteousness will rise with healing in its wings for those who revere God's name (4:2, cf. Is. 60:1–3, although the image in Malachi may be drawn from the winged sun disc found throughout the ancient Near East; cf. also Lk. 1:78), and they will subdue the wicked (4:3). For the rest it will be a day when the arrogant and every evildoer will be burned up like stubble (4:1).

4:4–6 Conclusion

The closing appeals of Malachi (4:4–6) appear to summarize the main points of his prophecy: remember the law of Moses and the promise of Elijah and the coming day of the Lord. Malachi's own thorough-going dependence on the law of Moses and the many allusions to texts from the Pentateuch scattered throughout his work prepare the reader for the first climactic charge. The reason for the identification of the coming prophet as Elijah in the second charge is less obvious. Perhaps the need for an Elijah-like ministry was suggested by the problem of a long-standing drought in 3:10 (1 Ki. 17:1; cf. Jas. 5:17). Alternatively, Malachi's concern with the corrosive effects of interfaith marriage (2:10–12) may have caused him to recall Ahab’s notorious marriage to Jezebel, which proved so troublesome to Elijah and so disastrous to Israel (1 Ki. 16:31; 18:4, 19; 19:2). No doubt Malachi would have welcomed an Elijah-like challenge to the religious compromise and complacency of his own day. It seems most likely, however, that Malachi recognized that of all the OT prophets, none fitted the portrait of the Messianic prophet ‘like Moses’, as predicted in Dt. 18:15, more exactly than Elijah (cf. Dt. 34:10–12). As such, Elijah stands alongside Moses in 4:4–6 as the representative of the entire OT line of prophets, much as he functions on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt. 17:3; Mk. 9:4; Lk. 9:30; cf. also Rev. 11:3, where the two witnesses are patterned after Moses and Elijah).

The promise to send Elijah before the day of the LORD comes confirms the interpretation of 3:1 that the promised messenger is not Malachi himself but some future prophet (the figure in both texts is sent by the Lord and precedes the coming day of the Lord). It is likely that this future prophet was identified with Elijah not because Elijah was spared from death, as if this might permit a literal return to this life, but because the future messenger would be called to carry on a prophetic ministry similar to that of the historical Elijah. Here one may compare the many predictions of the coming of a future ‘David’ that need not imply a literal return of Israel’s second king (Je. 30:9; Ezk. 34:23–25; 37:24).

The NT identifies John the Baptist as the fulfilment of this prediction (Mt. 11:10–14; 17:10–13; Mk. 9:11–13; Lk. 1:17; but cf. Jn. 1:21, 25). Though separated by over 400 years, John was the next canonical prophet to follow Malachi in the course of redemptive history. Wearing the same distinctive garments of camel’s hair and a leather belt as Elijah (2 Ki. 1:8; Mt. 3:4; Mk. 1:6), John functioned as Elijah in his courageous and uncompromising denunciation of sin. In a ministry which put him at odds with the king and his evil wife (1 Ki. 19; Mk. 6:17–18), John went ‘on before the Lord, in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to their children ... to make ready a people prepared for the Lord’ (Lk. 1:17).

Gordon P. Hugenberger

MATTHEW

Introduction

Matthew the teacher

Matthew has been called ‘the Teacher’s Gospel’ because its material is so presented that it is very suitable for use in teaching. It was probably for this reason that this gospel was the most widely used of the four in the early church. While Mark offers a vivid, flowing narrative, Luke a sensitive study of Jesus’ dealings with people, and John a more explicitly theological portrait of Jesus, Matthew collected stories and sayings of Jesus which bear particularly on the regular concerns of the life of the church and put them together in such a way that a teacher in the church could draw on them. Very probably Matthew was himself such a teacher and included in his gospel the material which he was already used to presenting to his own church members.

Most obvious are the five great ‘discourses’, or collections of Jesus’ teaching, which are all concluded with the formula ‘When Jesus had finished these sayings’ or the like (a formula which is much more striking in Greek than in our English versions). These discourses comprise chs. 5–7, 10, 13, 18 and 24–25. Each appears to be based on a much shorter ‘address’ in one of the other synoptic gospels (Mark and Luke), and each has a clear unity of theme running through it. Many of the sayings so collected occur elsewhere in the other synoptic gospels, so that Matthew seems to have made five careful ‘anthologies’ of the teaching of Jesus on certain subjects.

Both within these discourses and in the rest of the gospel Matthew likes to give clearly structured divisions of material, which are therefore relatively easy to memorize. Obvious examples are the three balancing sections of the genealogy (1:1–17; note the summary in v 17), the eight beatitudes (5:3–10; note the same conclusion to the first and last), the six ‘antitheses’ (5:21–48; note the recurring introductory formula), the three types of religious observance (6:1–18; with almost identical structure, apart from the expansion of the section on prayer) and the seven woes on the teachers of the law and Pharisees (23:13–36). Longer sections are also sometimes compiled with a balanced structure, notably the collection of miracles in chs. 8–9 and the parable discourse in ch. 13.

Compared with Mark’s lively narrative style, Matthew’s telling of the stories of Jesus can appear quite dull. While his gospel contains much more material than Mark’s, where they tell the same story, Matthew is typically much more concise. For example, the stories which make up ch. 5 of Mark (43 verses) take up only 16 verses in Matthew. He has omitted all the vivid narrative detail and cut out any ‘redundancy’ in the telling, so as to focus on the main point. But where the point of a story lies in the sayings of Jesus which it includes, he is as likely, while reducing the narrative, to offer the sayings in a fuller form (cf. Mt. 8:5–13 with Lk. 7:1–10).

In such ways, Matthew has shaped his material to make it more suitable for teaching in the church. It still serves that function admirably, as many a pastor can testify.

Matthew’s special interests

Jesus the Messiah

Matthew writes as a Jew who has found in Jesus the fulfilment of all that is precious in his Jewish heritage. ‘Fulfilment’ is a central theme of the gospel.

It comes to the surface most obviously in the repeated assertion that ‘All this took place to fulfil what the Lord had said through the prophet’ (1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 27:9); the wording varies slightly, but these ‘formula-quotations’, as they have come to be called, are a distinctive feature of Matthew’s gospel. Other similar quotations, without using the same formula, reinforce the argument that even in the details of Jesus’ life there is a pattern foreshadowed in Scripture which is finding its proper outworking. The OT passages are often not the obvious ‘Messianic’ texts, but quite obscure verses, some of them not on the face of it intended as predictions at all. But Matthew delights to search out patterns of God’s work in the OT and to trace them to their ‘fulfilment’ in Jesus.

The first two chapters of the gospel (in which an unusually large concentration of formula-quotations occurs) are devoted primarily to setting out the scriptural grounds for seeing Jesus as the Messiah of Israel. His mission was to fulfil the law and the prophets (5:17), and the rest of ch. 5 explores what that fulfilment means. A series of references to Jesus' ministry as 'greater than' key figures and institutions of the OT in ch. 12 (vs 6, 41, 42) develops an argument for his fulfilment not only of specific prophecies but of the essential dynamics of OT life and religion. In these and other ways Matthew 'claims' the whole OT revelation as the basis of the mission of Jesus.

Israel and the church

Matthew's gospel is rightly seen as one of the most Jewish books of the NT, with its focus on OT fulfilment, its frequent reference to matters of rabbinic debate, its assumption that its readers know about matters of Jewish ritual, and its use of Jewish terminology ('kingdom of heaven', 'Son of David') and occasional untranslated Aramaic words. It is only in Matthew's gospel that the mission of Jesus and his disciples is limited to 'the lost sheep of Israel' (10:6; 15:24), and that the authority of Jewish teachers of the law is apparently taken seriously (23:3, 23).

Yet this same gospel is also seen by many as violently anti-Jewish. It denounces the Jewish leaders (especially the Pharisees) as hypocrites and blind guides and threatens that 'the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit' (21:43). It envisages non-Jews brought in from east and west to the Jewish Messianic banquet, while the (Jewish) 'subjects of the kingdom' are thrown out (8:11–12; cf. 22:1–10). In it Jesus declares that the rebellion of God's people has reached the point where judgment must fall on 'this generation'; in particular, the temple in Jerusalem, the symbol of God's presence among his people, is to be destroyed so that not one stone will be left on another. It is only Matthew who records the terrible cry of 'all the people' in 27:25: 'His blood on us and on our children'. Some commentators have gone so far as to suggest that Matthew had given up hope of any further response from Israel, and was urging his readers to concentrate their mission on the other nations.

It is certainly true that this most Jewish gospel contains also a sustained expectation that Gentiles would henceforth be included in the true people of God. The foreign Magi of 2:1–12 give more than a hint of this, and as Jesus meets with Gentiles in the course of the story (8:5–13; 15:21–28), the wide extent of his mission becomes increasingly clear. It is, therefore, no surprise when the book concludes with the risen Jesus sending his disciples out to make disciples of all nations.

Matthew's 'love-hate relationship' with Israel is the wholly natural attitude of a faithful Jew who had found in Jesus the fulfilment of his national ideals, and yet who found the majority of his own people refusing to recognize that fulfilment. In Matthew's gospel we can feel particularly clearly the pain of that tension which eventually led the church, despite its Jewish roots, to see itself as the rival, rather than the sister, of continuing Judaism. For Matthew that separation was not yet complete, but it was inevitable, and his Jewish nature would not accept it with calm detachment. He had to think it out theologically, and Matthew's gospel, more clearly than the others, presents the view of Jesus as himself the true Israel, and of those who have responded to his mission as the true remnant of the people of God in whom his eternal purpose is continued. To be the true people of God is thus no longer a matter of nationality but of relationship to Jesus, and that relationship is open to Gentile as well as to Jew, as is exemplified in the 'faith' of the centurion at Capernaum (8:5–13). Israel as a whole had in OT times constituted the assembly (ekklēsia) of the people of God. Even in those days, however, it had often had to be through a faithful ‘remnant’ that God’s purpose had been continued, while the nation as a whole turned away from him. Now that remnant is focused in the ekklēsia (‘church’) of Jesus (16:18). That ekklēsia is no longer a national body but is to consist of disciples of all nations who are baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit and who follow all that Jesus has taught (28:19–20).

Jesus the king

The gospel begins with a genealogy which focuses on Jesus the true king of the line of David, the one in whom Israel’s monarchy found its fulfilment, and 1:18–25 explains how he came to be officially ‘adopted’ by Joseph, himself a ‘son of David’ (v 20), thus ensuring his royal status. He was then sought by foreigners as ‘the King of the Jews’ (2:2).

As 22:41–45 makes clear, however, Jesus’ role is more than a nationalistic one as ‘son of David’. He came to proclaim and to effect the kingship of God, but he himself also has a role as the universal king. Only in Matthew’s gospel do we hear of the kingdom of the Son of Man (13:41; 16:28; 19:28; 25:31–34), in language hardly less exalted than the OT uses of the kingship of God himself. At the outset of his ministry Jesus was offered, by the devil, the kingship of all the world (4:8–9); but he refused, and by following the way of obedience to his Father at last reached the point where he could declare ‘All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me’ (28:18). Paradoxically, it was as he was mocked on the cross as the (failed) ‘King of Israel’ that he was achieving his true destiny as king of heaven and earth.

The true dignity of this paradoxical king is revealed in two phrases which ‘bracket’ the gospel. His name is declared at the beginning as ‘Immanuel’, which means ‘God with us’ (1:23), and he himself declares at the end ‘I am with you always’ (28:20). Thus Matthew allows us to see in Jesus one who, while never less than the Messiah of Israel, is yet far more.

Authorship and date

Early Christian tradition unanimously attributed this gospel to the authorship of Matthew the apostle, the former tax-collector of Capernaum, whose call it records in 9:9 (Mark and Luke call him Levi). There was also a persistent tradition that it was written originally not in Greek but in Hebrew or Aramaic. Both of these traditions are doubted by most modern scholars.

The Greek of the gospel as we know it does not read like ‘translation Greek’, and the close literary relationship of Matthew with the (Greek) gospels of Mark and Luke makes its origin in any other language unlikely. It is quite possible that Christians in the first few centuries AD were familiar with a Hebrew or Aramaic work which was traditionally associated with Matthew, but unlikely that it was our gospel. Papias, the earliest writer to mention Matthew’s writing, attributes to him a compilation of ‘sayings’ in Hebrew or Aramaic, and some believe that he was referring not to the gospel we know but to one of its sources (perhaps the source ‘Q’ which many believe was used by the authors of Matthew and Luke; see the relevant section in ‘Reading the gospels’). But Papias’ statement is too brief to be clear, and its original context is unknown.

If it is improbable that Matthew’s gospel was written in Hebrew or Aramaic, can we take the other aspect of early tradition, the identity of the author as Matthew the apostle, any more seriously? Or does Papias’ statement suggest that this tradition arose in connection with a document other than our gospel? We cannot be sure, but the writers of the early Christian centuries offer us no other candidate for authorship, and a tradition which is both early and unanimous should not be simply assumed to be false unless the nature of the book itself makes it clearly inappropriate.

In fact the traditional attribution fits rather well, in that a Jewish tax-collector turned Christian leader might well be expected to exhibit the sort of tension in his attitude to Judaism which we have noticed above. Moreover, tax-collectors were, by virtue of their profession, used to handling records and documents, and so Matthew may well have functioned as a sort of ‘secretary’ to the apostolic group.

Such suggestions, however, fall far short of proof. Of the early Christians whose names we know, the Matthew to whom early tradition attributed the gospel is not an improbable candidate. But the text of the gospel itself does not say who the author was, and the matter may well be left open.

Until the nineteenth century it was almost universally believed that Matthew was the first gospel to be written. With the growth of belief in the priority of Mark, Matthew began to be dated later, and is now generally placed in the last quarter of the first century. But in recent discussion, both the priority of Mark and the whole relative dating scheme adopted by modern scholarship have been increasingly questioned, and it is wiser to look for any indications of date in the gospel itself. (See the introductory article ‘Reading the gospels’ for the changing opinions on the literary relationship between Matthew, Mark and Luke.)

The destruction of Jerusalem and its temple in AD 70 is a prominent concern of Matthew. But it is always spoken of as a future event (naturally so, since it is Jesus who is presented as speaking of it). Some commentators believe that the language used (e.g. in 22:6–7) reflects Matthew’s knowledge of the event itself, not just of its prediction by Jesus, and therefore date the gospel after AD 70. Others have no difficulty with such ‘circumstantial’ prediction, and point out that the language used is similar to that of other such prophecies in the OT and elsewhere, so that it need not depend on observation of the event. There are also some passages in Matthew which presuppose that the temple was still intact (5:23–24; 17:24–27; 23:16–22); and these have not been edited out in the way a writer after AD 70 might have been expected to do.

Other arguments depend on the relative scheme of dating in both the writing of the NT documents and the development of Jewish—Christian relations which is presupposed. There is little room for dogmatism here, and some scholars regard a date in the early 60s as an attractive alternative to the more commonly proposed date around AD 80.

Further reading

- J. R. W. Stott, The Message of the Sermon on the Mount, BST (IVP, 1978).
R. T. France, Matthew, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1989).
———, Matthew: Evangelist and Teacher (Paternoster/Zondervan, 1989).
D. A. Carson, Matthew, EBC (Zondervan, 1984).
G. N. Stanton, Interpretation of Matthew (SPCK, 1983).

Outline of contents

The plan of the gospel

The structure of the gospel has been analysed in different ways, none of which is generally agreed. Some use the five discourses with their prominent concluding formulae as ‘markers’ and suggest that Matthew wrote a gospel in ‘five books’. Others suggest that the repeated clause ‘From that time on Jesus began to ...’ in 4:17 and 16:21 is intended to mark the beginning of major new sections of the narrative. Others note that the story has the same general outline as that of Mark, with a geographical movement from the early ministry in Galilee towards the final confrontation in Jerusalem, and see this plot as the structural principle of the book. The following broad analysis takes this latter view as its starting-point, though recognizing that the turning-points in 4:17 and 16:21 fit in with it. More detailed divisions of the text will be noted in the commentary.

1:1–4:16

Introducing Jesus

1:1–17	The ancestry of Jesus the Messiah
1:18–2:23	Scripture fulfilled in the birth and childhood of Jesus the Messiah
3:1–17	John the Baptist and Jesus
4:1–16	Testing and preparation

4:17–16:20

Public ministry in and around Galilee

4:17–25	Introduction to the public ministry
5:1–7:29	First discourse: discipleship
8:1–9:34	A selection of Jesus’ miracles
9:35–10:42	Second discourse: the disciples’ mission
11:1–12:50	Varying response to Jesus’ public ministry
13:1–52	Third discourse: Jesus’ teaching in parables
13:53–16:20	Further responses to Jesus’ public ministry

16:21–18:35Private ministry in Galilee; preparing the disciples

16:21–17:27	Teaching on Jesus' mission
18:1–35	Fourth discourse: relationships among the disciples

19:1–25:46Ministry in Judea

19:1–20:34	On the way to Jerusalem
21:1–22	Arrival in Jerusalem
21:23–23:39	Controversies with the Jewish leaders
24:1–25:46	Fifth discourse: judgment

26:1–28:20The death and resurrection of Jesus

26:1–46	Preparation for the passion
26:47–27:26	The arrest and trial of Jesus
27:27–56	The crucifixion of Jesus
27:57–28:20	The burial, resurrection and commission of Jesus

Commentary

1:1–4:16 Introducing Jesus

The story of Jesus' public teaching and activity begins in Galilee and leads inexorably towards the final dénouement in Jerusalem, before it reverts to Galilee for the triumphant concluding scene. Before that story can begin, however, we need to be introduced to its chief character, and this is achieved by a series of scenes set largely in the southern part of Israel, leading up to Jesus' deliberate move to Galilee in 4:12. In this move, as in all that is recorded in these introductory chapters, Matthew traces the fulfilment of God's plan revealed in Scripture.

1:1–17 The ancestry of Jesus the Messiah (cf. Lk. 3:23–38)

The modern reader finds this list of names a dull way to begin a book. For Matthew and his readers, however, it was far from dull: it was all about the fulfilment of Israel's story in the coming of their true king. A record of the genealogy is, in Gk., the title of the 'Book of Genesis', so that the reader thinks of a new beginning. The list begins with Abraham (the hero of the book of Genesis and the patriarch from whom Israel traced its origin), leads on to David (the first true king of Israel), and continues down the royal line of Judah to the point where its monarchy was destroyed at the exile to Babylon. The division into three sets of fourteen generations (17) emphasizes these turning-points (and perhaps for a Jewish reader the point is reinforced by the fact that the three Hebrew letters of the name David, used as numerals, add up to fourteen!).

The prominent repetition of the title Christ (1, 16, 17, 18) draws out the theological implication of this list. For modern readers 'Christ' is no more than a 'surname' of Jesus, but Matthew clearly uses it here with its full force as a title, 'Messiah', the true king of Israel in the line of David, whose coming they eagerly awaited.

The names from Abraham to the exile are well known from the OT, but most of those in the third section are otherwise unknown. Luke's list of Joseph's ancestors (even including his father) is different. Probably Luke offers us a 'physical' family-tree, while Matthew gives the official throne-succession list (which would not necessarily pass from father to son, but would remain within the family). His concern is with Jesus' right (through Joseph) to the title 'King of the Jews'.

V 16 indicates unambiguously that Jesus was not the physical son of Joseph (of whom is feminine in Gk). The relevance of the genealogy to Jesus will therefore need to be established in the following section.

Notes. 3–6 The mention of four mothers is unusual. All were probably non-Jewish, and in each case there was some irregularity or even scandal. Perhaps Matthew thought that Jesus' birth of a socially insignificant and unmarried mother needed some scriptural support. 8 Three of the kings of Judah (Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah) are omitted (as is Jehoiakim in v 11) to keep the number of generations to fourteen. The list is in any case selective, since the thirteen generations after the exile cover 600 years.

1:18–2:23 Scripture fulfilled in the birth and childhood of Jesus the Messiah

This section of the gospel, commonly known as the infancy narratives, is not an account of Jesus' birth and childhood as such (indeed his birth is not directly narrated), but a series of scenes designed to show how God's purpose, declared in the OT, was coming to fulfilment. Each of the subsections discussed below focuses on a prominent quotation with a formula of fulfilment. Other scriptural themes run below the surface of the narratives; in particular, the hostility of Herod recalls Pharaoh's attempt to destroy the infant Moses, while the coming of the Magi recalls the visit of another Eastern dignitary, the Queen of Sheba, to the son of David in Jerusalem.

Note that the stories are told from the point of view of Joseph, while those in Lk. 1–2 are told from the point of view of Mary. This may reflect the source from which each writer obtained his information on this period.

1:18–25 Joseph accepts Jesus as his son. The previous section showed Joseph to be the descendant of David; but Jesus was not Joseph's son, as this section makes even more explicit. Only if Joseph formally 'adopted' him could he too be 'son of David' (20). It took a divine revelation to persuade Joseph to do so, by accepting the pregnant Mary as his wife and then giving the child a name.

In these verses Jesus' conception without a human father is neither argued nor explained (beyond the double mention of the Holy Spirit), but simply assumed as a fact known to the reader, though not at first to Joseph. It is, however, supported by the first of Matthew's formula-quotations, a passage which suggestively combines a virgin mother and a name, Immanuel, which has striking implications for who this child is.

Notes. 18 The birth of Jesus is not in fact the subject of the section; the Gk. word genesis (used also in v 1) means rather 'origin' or 'beginning'. 19 Betrothal was a binding contract, requiring 'divorce' to break it. The OT punishment for unchastity before marriage was death, but divorce had by this time become accepted instead, and a private divorce before witnesses was a humane option. 21 Jesus is the Gk. form of the OT name Joshua, meaning 'God saves'. 23 Virgin is the meaning of the Gk. text of Is. 7:14, though the Heb. is less explicit. The prophecy related to events in the late eighth century BC, but Matthew sees in the name Immanuel and in the developing theme of a special child in Is. 7–12 a foreshadowing of a greater fulfilment in the future.

2:1–12 The visit of the Magi. Magi were astrologers, who played a prominent part in court life in many eastern states, as advisers to kings. Their insights were derived from sophisticated astronomical observation combined with the sort of 'interpretation' which present-day horoscopes provide. By such calculations made in the east (probably Mesopotamia, mod. Iraq) they had concluded that an important royal birth had taken place in Palestine, which called for a 'state visit'. Matthew clearly sees this as an acceptable Gentile response to genuine revelation, despite its dubious means.

The sharp contrast between these well-motivated foreigners and the unscrupulous jealousy of Herod, the official King of the Jews (and all Jerusalem with him), foreshadows the response which official Judaism will make to Jesus, and the future welcome of Gentile believers into the true people of God.

In the whole episode Matthew finds rich material for meditation on the fulfilment of Scripture. The formal quotation of Mi. 5:2 shows how Jesus' birthplace indicates his status as the coming ruler, and the star probably echoes Balaam's prophecy of a 'star ... out of Jacob' (Nu. 24:17). The coming of foreign dignitaries from the east to Jerusalem reminds us of the visit of the Queen of Sheba to Solomon, the son of David, bringing gifts of gold and spices (1 Ki. 10:1–13), and of the prophecies of similar visits in the future in Ps. 72:10–11, 15 and Is. 60:1–6 (v 6 'gold and incense').

Notes. 1 King Herod ('the Great') died in 4 BC. This episode did not necessarily take place immediately after Jesus' birth, but within two years of it (16), so that Jesus' birth was probably not later than around 6 BC. 2 Many natural explanations of the star have been offered, including a comet (Halley's appeared in 12 BC), a nova or supernova (there was a prominent one in 5/4 BC according to Chinese records), or a planetary conjunction (that of Saturn and Jupiter in 7 BC would have suggested to Babylonian astrologers the idea of a king in 'the Westland', as they called Palestine). One or more of these may have contributed to the quest of the Magi, but v 9 suggests something out of the ordinary. 6 The quotation adapts the text of Mi. 5:2, partly by weaving in words from 2 Sa. 5:2, on which Micah's prophecy was based. 12 God communicates by a dream to another Gentile in 27:19. Like the star, it is a means of communication which would have been familiar in their culture. The only other such dream-revelations Matthew records are given to Joseph (1:20; 2:13, 19, 22).

2:13–23 Childhood travels. The rest of ch. 2 focuses on the geographical movements of the infant Messiah, from his birthplace in Bethlehem to Egypt, then back to Judea and on to Galilee, where he is established in the village which was to give him his title, Jesus of Nazareth. This section is remarkable both for its frequent formula-quotations (15, 17–18, 23) and for the recurrent dreams by which Joseph was guided from place to place (13, 19, 22). Both these features suggest that Matthew's primary concern was to show that these changes of location were not haphazard but were directed by God and had been foreshadowed in Scripture (notice that each of the formal quotations in ch. 2 contains a place-name: Bethlehem, Egypt, Ramah, Nazareth). Clearly geography matters!

Why is this? A clue may be found in the reaction of Jews to the suggestion that the Messiah might be from Galilee (Jn. 7:41, 52), or still worse, from Nazareth (Jn. 1:46). Everyone knew that the Messiah was to come from the Judean village of Bethlehem, so how could Jesus of Nazareth be taken seriously? To this objection Mt. 2 provides the answer. Jesus was indeed born in Bethlehem, as Scripture required, but by a series of divinely guided and scripturally justified movements found his way eventually to Galilee, so that the Messiah could after all be called a Nazarene.

Notes. 13 Egypt was a traditional place of asylum for Jews in political danger. 15 Ho. 11:1 speaks of the exodus of God's son Israel out of Egypt. Matthew uses it here on the basis of his conviction that Jesus was himself the true Israel. 16 In his last few years, Herod's paranoid defence of his throne led him to execute many imagined claimants, including even three of his sons and his favourite wife. The elimination of the handful of male infants in the small village of Bethlehem was entirely in character. 18 The tradition of Rachel's burial near Bethlehem makes this quotation appropriate; the children in Je. 31:15 were the Jews taken into exile (from Ramah, another traditional site of Rachel's burial), but the chapter goes on to promise their return. 22 Archelaus proved worse than his father and was deposed in AD 6, to be replaced by a Roman prefect. 23 He will be called a Nazarene is not a quotation of a specific text (as the formula indicates by a general reference to the prophets) but probably sums up the prophetic theme of a humble, despised Messiah (cf. Jn. 1:46).

3:1–17 John the Baptist and Jesus

3:1–12 John's proclamation (see Mk. 1:2–8; Lk. 3:1–18). John the Baptist was the leader of a significant religious movement. His call to repentance in the light of God's coming judgment was a clear warning that Israel, as so often in the past, was not living up to its calling as the people of God. His words about being children of Abraham (9) indicate that to be a Jew was not alone sufficient protection against judgment. His practice of baptizing those who responded, just as Gentiles who wanted to join Israel had to be baptized, marked them out as the 'remnant' who now represented the true people of God.

Matthew is careful to show the continuity between John's mission and that of Jesus. John's proclamation in v 2 is the same as that of Jesus in 4:17 (and of his disciples in 10:7). Echoes of John's words also occur later in Jesus' teaching (see 7:16, 19; 12:34; 13:30; 23:33), while 8:10–12 reinforces John's warning against relying on Jewish racial origin alone. John was thus not just a curtain-raiser for the coming of Jesus; he was already launching the mission which Jesus would develop. (Cf. 11:7–19; 21:23–32 for further indications of this close connection.)

John was, however, only the forerunner, as the quotation from Is. 40:3 (v 3) indicates and as his own words about the coming one who is more powerful confirm. The contrast between water and the Holy Spirit (11) leaves no doubt that it was in Jesus' ministry that real spiritual renewal would be found.

Notes. 1 The Desert of Judea is the uninhabited area near the Jordan. Passages like Is. 40:3; Je. 2:2–3 and Ho. 2:14–15 show the desert as a place of new beginnings. 2 The kingdom of heaven is Matthew's version of 'the kingdom of God' in the other gospels. It signifies God's effective rule on earth. Is near is lit. 'has come near' and is virtually an announcement of arrival. 4 John's clothes mark him as a second Elijah (see 2 Ki. 1:8), as 11:14 and 17:10–13 will explain.

3:13–17 Jesus is baptized (see Mk. 1:9–11; Lk. 3:21–22). In view of v 11, John's hesitation was natural. Jesus' explanation (15) is cryptic, but relates to the need for him to fulfil his mission, which involved his identification with the renewed people of God. (Righteousness may echo Is. 53:11, where the word 'righteous' is strikingly repeated.) The revelation which followed (16–17) marked Jesus out as the Messiah, anointed with the Spirit, as foretold in Is. 11:2; 42:1 and 61:1, while the declaration from heaven picks up the language of Ps. 2:7 and Is. 42:1. Jesus was thus commissioned as the Messianic king, and his status as Son of God was declared on no less an authority than that of God himself.

4:1–16 Testing and preparation

4:1–11 Jesus is tested in the desert (see Mk. 1:12–13; Lk. 4:1–13). 'Temptation' suggests a purely negative experience; but this was a divinely intended (1) preparation for Jesus' mission. The word more commonly means 'test', and this is a better translation here.

The focus is on Jesus' recently declared status as Son of God (3:17; 4:3, 6): what are its implications for his relationship with his Father? The three tests examine aspects of that relationship, and the ways in which a misuse of that status could ruin Jesus' ministry. He must be ready to accept privation in fulfilling his God-given task without 'pulling rank' (2–4); to trust his Father's care without the need to test it by forcing God's hand (5–7); and to reject the 'short cut' to the fulfilment of his mission which would be achieved at the cost of compromising his loyalty to his Father (8–10).

Each suggestion is rebutted by a text of Scripture, all of which come from Dt. 6–8. That passage relates Israel's experience of testing in the desert ('as a man disciplines his son', Dt. 8:5; cf. 8:2), and the texts quoted focus on the lessons Israel should have learned by that experience. Now a new 'son of God' is being prepared for his role, and the same principles of obedience, imperfectly learned by Israel, must be the basis of the ministry of Jesus, the 'new Israel'.

Notes. 1 The devil was the agent and tempted Jesus to misuse his position; but his hostile purpose was put to the service of God's testing of his Son. 2 Jesus' fasting and hunger show that the Son of God was not free from real human suffering. 6 The devil's quotation from Ps. 91:11–12 was quite accurate (and no doubt, if tested, would have proved reliable), but even a correct quotation of Scripture can be misapplied. 8 Contrast 28:18, where, by the path of obedience, Jesus has received all authority not only on earth but also in heaven!

4:12–16 Jesus moves to Galilee (cf. Mk. 1:14; Lk. 4:14). John’s imprisonment left Jesus, as his associate, in danger in the south, and at the same time left the field clear for Jesus to begin his own mission. Galilee is now the scene of Jesus’ activity right up to his final journey to Jerusalem in ch. 21. It was in Galilee that the light would shine (as Is. 9:1–2 predicted), and there Jesus’ mission would grow and flourish. Jerusalem, on the other hand, was to be the place of rejection and death. This contrast is carefully highlighted throughout the gospel, culminating in the return from Jerusalem to Galilee to launch the post-Easter Christian mission in ch. 28.

Galilee (of the Gentiles) was geographically and politically cut off from Judea and had a less predominantly Jewish population. Its people were regarded by Judeans as uncultured and irreligious, and there is ample evidence of strained relations between the two provinces in NT times. As a Galilean in Jerusalem, Jesus was virtually a foreigner.

4:17–16:20 Public ministry in and around Galilee

4:17–25 Introduction to the public ministry

4:17 Jesus’ proclamation (see Mk. 1:14–15). See the Outline of Contents for the function of this verse, to mark a new phase of ministry. See on 3:2 for the link with John the Baptist. In Jesus’ preaching the kingdom of heaven was to be a central theme: God is King, and his rule was now being made effective.

4:18–22 The first disciples are called (see Mk. 1:16–20; cf. Lk. 5:1–11). Jesus’ associates in this mission would not be merely supporters but would themselves become fishers of men, winning new subjects for God’s rule. These verses show the complete commitment which their involvement with Jesus would demand.

Simon, James and John (and to a lesser degree Andrew) formed a central core of the disciple group. Their call and ready response may be taken as typical of the group as a whole.

4:23–25 Summary of Jesus’ ministry (cf. Mk. 1:39; 3:7–12; Lk. 4:44; 6:17–19). This summary shows Jesus as acceptable in the synagogues (contrast the later hostility) and widely popular as a teacher and especially as a healer; the mission in Galilee was essentially a success story. While localized in Galilee, Jesus’ ministry attracted attention throughout ‘greater Palestine’ (which formed part of the Roman province of Syria). The prominence of healing marks a significant advance beyond the ministry of John: the power of the kingdom of heaven to which John looked forward was now being experienced in action.

5:1–7:29 First discourse: discipleship

This, the first of Matthew’s great ‘discourses’ (see the Introduction), is generally known as the ‘Sermon on the Mount’. It has the same general outline as the sermon recorded in Lk. 6:20–49 but is very much longer, including both material found elsewhere in Luke and a great deal found only in Matthew. The controlling theme around which this material is collected is that of discipleship, or ‘life in the kingdom of heaven’. Having called his first disciples, Jesus set out for them an overview of the privileges and the demands of their new situation.

Several parts of the discourse focus on Jesus himself as the one to whom they now owed allegiance; it is not only a code of conduct for the disciple but a revelation of the Messiah’s authority, as 7:28–29 reminds us. A parallel collection of Jesus’ miraculous deeds in chs. 8–9 rounds out a powerful account of the authority of the Messiah.

5:1–2 Introduction (cf. Mk. 3:13; Lk. 6:20). The audience is clearly specified as his disciples, as opposed to the crowds. The latter reappear as a wider audience in 7:28, but they are clearly not the main focus of the teaching, which typically contrasts ‘you’ (the disciples) with other people (see especially 25:11–16).

5:3–10 The good life (cf. Lk. 6:20–22). The discourse begins with a rounded portrait of the true disciple in the form of eight ‘beatitudes’. Neither blessed nor ‘happy’ adequately translates makarios, which is rather a term of congratulation and recommendation. These qualities are to be envied and emulated; they make up ‘the good life’. Each is followed by a reason, pointing out that no-one will be the loser by following this way of life, however unpromising it may appear in the short term. The rewards are at the level of spiritual experience and relationship with God rather than of material recompense. The key phrase, which opens and concludes the series, is theirs is the kingdom of heaven. This refers to the people who acknowledge God as their King and who may, therefore, confidently look forward to the fulfilment of his purpose in their lives.

Lk. 6:20–22 offers only four beatitudes, balanced by four ‘woes’. They are phrased in the second person and focus on the material and social condition of the disciples, rather than on the spiritual qualities set out here.

Notes. 3 Poor in spirit suggests the OT theme of the ‘poor’ or ‘meek’, the oppressed people of God who, nonetheless, trust in him for deliverance. This and the next verse echo Is. 61:1–2, while v 5 draws on Ps. 37:11, another passage which contrasts the ‘meek’ with the ‘wicked’.

5:11–16 The distinctiveness of the disciples (cf. Mk. 9:50; 4:21; Lk. 6:22–23; 14:34–35; 8:16). The change to the second person brings a direct application to Jesus’ audience. The last beatitude is picked up to emphasize that the persecution which results from following Jesus puts his disciples in the succession of God’s faithful servants. The distinctiveness which makes them the object of persecution is then illustrated by the two images of salt and light; each is essential but has its necessary effect on its environment only if it is both distinctive from it and yet fully involved in it. So disciples must function in society as an alternative and challenging community. It is by their visible goodness that they will bring glory to the God who has made them so.

Notes. 13 Either of the main functions of salt, as flavour or as preservative, fits the image. The rabbis used salt as a symbol for wisdom (loses its saltiness is lit. ‘becomes foolish’). 14 The image is of a brightly lit city on a hill-top, representing the corporate effect of the combined ‘lights’ of individual disciples. 16 Cf. 6:1. The difference is between deliberate ostentation for one’s own prestige in ch. 6 and the natural testimony of a godly life here.

5:17–48 Jesus and the law (cf. Lk. 16:17; 12:58–59; 16:18; 6:27–36). This long section is all on one theme, and it is important that its parts should not be interpreted in isolation from each other. The theme is Jesus’ ‘fulfilment’ of the law, which is expressed by general statements (17–20) followed by a series of six examples contrasting Jesus’ teaching with the accepted understanding of the OT law (21–47) and a concluding summary (48).

In vs 17–20 Jesus places the Law alongside the Prophets as finding fulfilment in him (for this sense of the law as ‘prophesying’ until Jesus came cf. 11:13; and Rom. 10:4; Gal. 3:24). To fulfil is to bring about that to which Scripture pointed, and that is what Jesus has now done. But the fulfilment of the law does not mean its abolition; it remains wholly authoritative and demands the fullest respect of the disciple (18–19). The question remains, however, how its function for the disciple is affected by its fulfilment in Jesus, and v 20 indicates that the meticulous legalism of the Pharisees and the teachers of the law is inadequate in the new context of the kingdom of heaven. Some higher approach is needed, and that is what vs 21–47 go on to spell out, by showing how Jesus' demand surpasses that of current ethical teaching based on the OT law. It does this not by being more scrupulous in literal observance but by penetrating to the true will of God enshrined in the law.

Thus in the first two examples (21–30) a mere literal avoidance of murder and adultery does not get to the heart of the problem. Underlying these outward acts are the fundamental attitudes of hatred and lust. Where the heart is not right, drastic action is needed to correct it before it results in outward sin.

Thirdly (31–32), a literal appeal to Dt. 24:1–4 had led to the sanctioning of divorce provided the due form of certification was observed, but Jesus restates God's original purpose of the permanence of marriage (see on 19:3–12 for fuller discussion).

Fourthly (33–37), Jesus sets aside the intricate discussion of the relative weight of different oaths (cf. 23:16–22) in favour of the ideal of simple truthfulness, which makes oaths and vows unnecessary. Here, as with the issue of divorce, Jesus refuses to allow the law's regulations, which were designed to control human sinfulness, to take precedence over God's original intention. Ethical standards must be built not on the law's concessions but on the positive purpose of God.

Fifthly (38–42), the natural desire for vengeance and retaliation may conveniently be justified from the OT's regulations, which were originally designed to limit the extent of legal retribution (An eye for an eye etc.). But to extend this principle to personal ethics makes it a charter for self-interest. By a series of vivid examples (39–42), Jesus calls instead for an unselfish attitude which not only refuses to retaliate but does not resist, even when it would be legally right to do so. Such an attitude is one which subordinates one's own rights to the benefit of others.

Finally (43–47), the natural inference that the OT's command to love one's neighbour carries the corollary that one should hate one's enemy is replaced by the extraordinary command to love one's enemies. Here again Jesus goes far beyond the explicit teaching of the OT law and offers an ethic in sharp contrast to natural human values.

Thus, in all these examples a superficial observance of the letter of the law has given way to a radical search for the true will of God. This goes beyond the literal interpretation of the law and may indeed in some cases leave it on one side, as Jesus' sovereign authority (I say to you) reveals the radically alternative value-scale which discipleship must involve. It is amazingly but appropriately summed up in the concluding verse, Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect. Legalism has been left far behind, and the law has been 'fulfilled'.

Notes. 19 Breaks is not a good translation of the Gk. word, which means unties, i.e. annuls; it is a matter of teaching rather than of practice. 22 Raca and You fool were both everyday terms of abuse. The three parts of the verse equally illustrate the consequences of bad relationships; they are not graded for seriousness. 23–24, 25–26 These two unconnected cameos illustrate the urgent need to take preventive action where relationships are wrong. The altar was in Jerusalem, a long journey from the home of Jesus' Galilean hearers. 29–30 Cf. 18:8–9. Jesus is talking about drastic corrective action, not literal mutilation. 31 Dt. 24:1–4 legislated for what must follow a certificated divorce (no remarriage of the original couple if the wife has since remarried); permission for legal divorce is assumed rather than stated. 33 This is a summary of various OT regulations relating to oaths and vows. 39–41 There is a legal flavour to these illustrations: a blow on the right cheek was a serious insult punishable by a heavy fine; the cloak was protected from forfeiture by Ex. 22:25–27; and the Roman soldier's right to commandeer civilian porters (forces you to go is the technical term for this) was limited. All involve not insisting on your rights. 43 Hate your enemy is not a quotation from the OT law, but was easily inferred from passages like Dt. 23:3–6 and Ps. 139:21–22.

6:1–18 Religion and its rewards. The general summary in v 1 is followed by three parallel illustrations of the wrong and the right way to go about religious observance. Almsgiving, prayer and fasting were central elements in Jewish religion, and all are assumed to be valid for Jesus' disciples. The issue is not whether you should do them, but how and why. And it is focused in the question of reward; the reward for ostentatious religion is the human recognition for which it is seeking; but that is all (they have received their reward in full). Secret religion, on the other hand, which is done for God and not for human approval, may expect a heavenly reward. Notice that, as in 5:3–12, there is no embarrassment about the idea of reward.

The neat symmetry of the three illustrations (2–4, 5–6, 16–18) is broken by an extended discussion of prayer, which further explains the wrong way (7–8) and the right way (9–15). The Lord's Prayer thus appears not simply as a prescribed liturgical form but as a model of what true prayer should be like.

Notes. 1 See above on 5:16. 3 This is not a recommendation of unplanned giving! 6 Room refers to the storeroom, probably without windows and the only lockable room in the house; it represents the least public place. 7 Keep on babbling translates a 'nonsense word' unknown elsewhere in Greek, suggesting what we mean by 'gibberish'. The focus is not on 'repetition' (as the AV suggested) but on meaninglessness and noise, on the attitude to prayer which thinks that God needs to be bullied into taking notice. True prayer is not a technique nor a performance, but a relationship. 9–13 Matthew's version of the Lord's Prayer is longer than Lk. 11:2–4. Our normal version is longer still, but the familiar doxology occurs only in later manuscripts of Matthew. 14–15 These verses might seem to suggest that forgiveness is earned by our forgiving others. See, however, 18:21–35, where the link between forgiving and being forgiven is more clearly set out. The word debts in v 12 reminds us of that parable.

6:19–34 Possessions and security (see Lk. 11:34–35; 12:22–34; 16:13). A collection of short sayings (19–24) and a more sustained argument (25–34) are united by the theme of possessions. In contrast with the materialistic concerns which occupy our attention most of the time, Jesus calls his disciples to put God first, both by giving priority to eternal issues and also by trusting our heavenly Father to meet our material needs here on earth.

Vs 19–21 focus on our sense of priorities, and point out that to be primarily concerned with material possessions not only shows a wrong perspective but is also foolish, since such possessions cannot last.

Vs 22–23 may seem out of place here, but they depend on a subtle word-play. The word which the NIV translates as good is lit. 'single', but it also denotes generosity, and the bad eye of v 23 is a metaphor for stinginess and jealousy. These verses, therefore, also attack a preoccupation with selfish materialism and call for wholehearted devotion to God.

V 24 reinforces the same point. Money translates the Aramaic word 'Mammon', a general term for material possessions (not necessarily ill-gotten gains).

There is a beautiful simplicity about vs 25–33, with their appeal to the example of the birds and flowers to illustrate God's lavish care for all his creatures. What is forbidden here is worry, not responsible provision for one's own and one's family needs; God provides food for the birds, but they still have to search for it! The basis of the disciple's confidence, in contrast with the anxiety of the pagans, lies in recognizing God as your heavenly Father (32). The proper attitude then is to put God first (33) and to trust him for our practical needs.

In today's world many (some of whom are Christian disciples) do not have all their needs met. This passage offers no answer to the problem, but we need to consider how God's provision relates to human misuse of what he has provided.

Notes. 22 The curious description of the eye as the lamp of the body means either that light enters the body through it or, more likely, that it enables the body to find its way. 27 Hour translates 'cubit', a measure of physical length which, like our 'span', can function as a metaphor for length of time. 33 To give priority to God's kingdom means to give our first allegiance to him as king; righteousness is the way of life which results from this decision. 34 This prudential but rather pessimistic maxim warns us that the preceding verses promise necessary provision but not freedom from trouble.

7:1–6 On judging other people (see Lk. 6:37–38, 41–42). 1–5 warn against criticizing other people without considering how open to criticism we ourselves may be; be judged may well refer to God's judgment, as well as that of other people. But v 6 indicates that there is also a right kind of judgment which the disciple is called on to exercise (cf. also vs 15–20).

Notes. 6 Holy and valuable things should be given only to those able to appreciate them. No specific application is indicated, but we may remember that there is a time to speak and a time to be silent (Ec. 3:7). God's truth must not be exposed unnecessarily to abuse and mockery.

7:7–11 Encouragement to prayer (see Lk. 11:9–13). Persistence in prayer (the imperatives are all in the present tense, which suggests continuous asking, seeking and knocking, not just a single request) can expect an answer not because of the technique used but because of the God who is being addressed. If even human fathers, who are evil (a recognition of the essential sinfulness of humanity), can be relied on to do the best for their children, how much more can God? This is not, of course, a guarantee that any prayer we care to offer will be successful; God gives only good gifts, which may not correspond to our ideas of what we should have!

7:12 The golden rule (see Lk. 6:31). This verse concludes and summarizes Jesus' instructions for living as a disciple. The Law and the Prophets picks up the issue from which we began in 5:17. For another summary of the law and the prophets see 22:37–40. Other teachers had given a similar instruction in the negative form, do not treat others as you would not wish to be treated; Jesus' positive form is more demanding.

7:13–27 True and false discipleship (cf. Lk. 13:24; 6:43–46; 13:25–27; 6:47–49). Four vivid contrasts between true and false conclude the discourse. The division between true and false is drawn at different points in the four scenes, so that the whole complex forms a searching basis for self-evaluation.

First (13–14), comes a straightforward contrast between the saved and the lost; the two gates and the two ways lead respectively to destruction and to life. True discipleship is a minority position, a matter of deliberately opting out from the mainstream, but it is a matter of life and death.

Secondly (15–20), there is a more subtle division, which falls within the group of professed disciples. False prophets present themselves as insiders (in sheep's clothing), but their intention is destructive (ferocious wolves). So not all alleged prophecy is to be taken at face value; it must be tested. And the test is not the prophets' profession but their fruit. The meaning of fruit is not specified, but the metaphor occurs several times in Matthew to indicate behaviour which is genuinely pleasing to God (cf. 3:8–10; 12:33–37; 21:43).

Thirdly (21–23), and even more searchingly, we are introduced to those who apparently believe themselves to be genuine disciples and can appeal to their charismatic activities to prove it, but nonetheless turn out to have no real relationship with the Lord to whom they appeal. The false prophets of v 15 were deceivers, but these are self-deceived. Acceptance depends not on profession, nor even on apparently Christian activity, but on whether Jesus knew them. Note the extraordinary authority he assumes as judge; to enter the kingdom of heaven depends on his acknowledgment and consists in being with him.

Finally (24–27), a further division on the basis of behaviour. Both wise and foolish are depicted as hearing these words of mine; the difference is in putting them into practice (cf. the ‘fruit’ of vs 16–20). This division too, therefore, runs through the middle of those who belong to the Jesus-circle. This whole concluding section of the discourse thus leaves us with the uncomfortable demand to consider not just what we profess but whether it is based on a genuine relationship with Jesus and issues in the life of a true disciple.

Notes. 15 False prophets are familiar in both Old and New Testaments. Cf. Dt. 13:1–5; Je. 23:9–32; Mt. 24:11, 24; 1 Jn. 4:1–3. 21 Lord translates kyrios, hitherto used only as a title for God. In everyday Greek it was a normal term of polite address and is so used commonly in the gospels. Here, however, it is clearly a mark of allegiance, even of worship. 22 On that day refers to the final judgment.

7:28–29 Conclusion (cf. Mk. 1:21–22). The regular formula to conclude the discourses in Matthew is here expanded to notice the reaction of the audience. The contrast of Jesus with the teachers of the law recalls the contrasts drawn in 5:21–47, where Jesus’ authority was shown in his willingness, unlike the teachers of the law, to declare simply ‘I say to you’. The concluding demands of the discourse have reinforced this impression. Jesus had to be noticed and demanded a response. The next two chapters go on to show this same authority exercised in action not just in word.

8:1–9:34 A selection of Jesus’ miracles

Matthew has here collected together nine miracle stories (one of which contains two miracles woven together; 9:18–26). They are arranged in three groups of three (8:1–17; 8:23–9:8; 9:18–34), with short passages in between focusing on the demands of following Jesus (8:18–22; 9:9–17). Matthew tells the stories much more briefly than Mark, leaving out most of the picturesque detail and focusing attention on Jesus himself. The resultant impression is one of irresistible authority, seen both in Jesus’ power over illness, demonic power and natural forces and in the radical response which he required of those who followed him. All this complements the authority which he demonstrated in his teaching in the first discourse.

8:1–17 Three healing miracles (see Mk. 1:40–45, 29–34; Lk. 5:12–16; 7:1–10; 4:38–41). These three stories are grouped together so as to lead up to the formula-quotations which draws out their significance in v 17. They are further linked by the fact that each of those healed belonged to a group excluded from full life in society: a leper, a Gentile and a woman!

The fact that Jesus touched a leper was a powerful demonstration of his willingness to put loving concern above social taboo. The command to show yourself to the priest (as Lv. 14:10–32 required) served as a testimony to them both of Jesus’ respect for the law and of his healing power as Messiah. But the balancing command don’t tell anyone reminds us of the danger of attracting popular enthusiasm for the wrong reasons.

The centurion and his servant were non-Jewish soldiers in the army of occupation. Behind the man’s reluctance to be visited by Jesus is the problem of relations between Jews and Gentiles: a Jewish teacher could not be expected to defile himself by entering a Gentile house. His simple acceptance, however, in soldier’s jargon, of Jesus’ practical authority over illness is evidence of a faith beyond that of anyone in Israel. By including Jesus' striking saying in v 11–12 (cf. Lk. 13:28–29), Matthew draws out the implications of this contrast for the future development of the people of God. Many will come from the east and the west (and this Gentile 'believer' is a prototype of them) and join the Jewish patriarchs at the Messianic banquet, which all Jews expected to enjoy as of right. At the same time, however, the Jewish subjects of the kingdom who did not share this Gentile's faith would find themselves outside, in the place which popular belief assigned to the Gentiles. The basis of acceptance in the kingdom of heaven would no longer be racial origin but faith. The unusual healing from a distance (cf. 15:21–28, also involving a Gentile 'patient') was thus an appropriate response to this Gentile's faith (13).

The simple story of the healing of Peter's mother-in-law then leads into a general summary of Jesus' healing ministry in Capernaum (Jesus' home base during his Galilean ministry; 4:13). Note the clear distinction between demon possession and illness and the different terms used for their cure. In describing this delivering ministry as a fulfilment of Is. 53:4, Matthew reminds us that there is more to the mission of God's servant than the atonement for sin which is the main focus of Is. 53; it also embraces our physical need.

Notes. 2 The term leprosy was used for a variety of skin complaints; not all were equally serious or contagious. 14 Peter's house was probably Jesus' home in Capernaum. 17 The Heb. nouns in Is. 53:4 do refer literally to physical suffering, even though the context suggests that they were used primarily in a metaphorical sense.

8:18–22 The cost of discipleship (see Lk. 9:57–60). Matthew maintains a distinction between the crowd of those who were interested but uncommitted and the disciples, whose personal commitment to Jesus had to take priority. They shared his homelessness when travelling around Galilee, and even family responsibilities had to take second place. Jesus' refusal of permission even to bury my father is astonishing; this was a son's sacred duty which took precedence over all regular commitments. The dead is a stark description of those outside the disciple-group as lacking spiritual life. The language, no less than the demand, is uncompromising to the point of offensiveness.

8:23–27 Authority over the elements (see Mk. 4:36–41; Lk. 8:22–25). This is the first 'nature miracle' in Matthew, showing Jesus exercising the same power over nature which Ps. 107:23–30 ascribes to God. The disciples' reaction (cf. Ps. 107:31–32) adds a new level to Matthew's account of Jesus' authority. But while the story is recorded mainly for this purpose, Matthew's mention that his disciples followed him (23), picking up the language of the preceding section, suggests he may also have seen it as an illustration of discipleship: when the storms come, faith in Jesus' saving power will be rewarded. Matthew often warns of the danger of little faith (26; cf. 6:30; 14:31; 16:8; 17:20).

8:28–34 A spectacular exorcism (see Mk. 5:1–20; Lk. 8:26–39). While exorcisms have been mentioned in general terms already, this first specific account of one adds another dimension of Jesus' authority: his control over supernatural beings. Matthew's drastically abbreviated version of the story omits most of the personal details and concentrates on the conflict of Jesus with the demons. Because of their superhuman insight they recognize Jesus as Son of God, but this testimony, though true, is not welcome from such a source.

Mark and Luke mention only one possessed man, but Matthew here (as in 20:30; cf. 9:27) says there were two, perhaps because the story is recorded as a witness to Jesus' power and in Jewish law two witnesses were needed.

This was Gentile territory (hence the presence of pigs). Matthew mentions no response other than the desire to get rid of this destructive visitor! Nor does he show any concern over the death of the pigs nor the economic loss to their owners. Presumably the liberation of two men was felt to be more important. But the story is told primarily to show Jesus in victorious conflict with an unusually powerful demonic force.

Notes. 28 Gadara was a Greek town which controlled territory on the east side of the Lake of Galilee. 29 The appointed time refers to the Jewish belief that demons were to be punished in the final judgment.

9:1–8 Healing and forgiveness (see Mk. 2:1–12; Lk. 5:17–26). Matthew does not mention the crowded house and the hole in the roof; his interest is in the dialogue. The link between illness and sin is not said to be causal; but the power to give physical healing is used as evidence of the greater authority to give spiritual deliverance. Another dimension is thus added to the account of Jesus' authority. The charge of blasphemy is because only God can forgive sins; for a man to claim the authority to do so is to put himself in the place of God. Yet Jesus does so as the Son of Man, a title which paradoxically combines his humanity with the supreme authority depicted in Dn. 7:13–14.

Notes. 5 It is obviously easier to say 'Your sins are forgiven', since no visible result is demanded; but if Jesus' word 'Get up and walk' is visibly effective, his hearers may assume that his other saying was not a bluff either. 8 The plural men is surprising, since it is Jesus' unique authority which has been demonstrated. Probably it means 'to Jesus as man'.

9:9–17 Breaking the mould (see Mk. 2:14–22; Lk. 5:27–38). V 3 was the first record of opposition to Jesus from Jewish teachers of the law. Here we see further grounds for the growing hostility of the religious authorities (here the Pharisees). Both in the dubious company he kept (9–13) and in his apparently lax attitude to the traditional duty of fasting (14–17), Jesus offended their sense of propriety. But in this he was deliberately challenging and superseding their outmoded understanding of the will of God.

Tax collectors were not only notorious for exploitation but also religiously and politically ostracized as collaborators with the pagan Roman government. For a pious Jew to eat with them was therefore unthinkable. Jesus' response in vs 12–13 offers the opposite perspective: a healer must 'get his hands dirty', and a mission of salvation cannot be achieved by staying in respectable company. His quotation from Ho. 6:6 (used again in 12:7) indicates that God's priority is costly love rather than careful ritual.

The reply to the question about fasting (which Jesus did not disapprove of in itself; 6:16–18) shows the same change of perspective. The formal regulations of the old religion must give way to the joy of the new. The patch and the new wine are images of a powerful, effervescent new relationship with God which bursts out of the dried-up confines of formal religion.

Notes. 9 Matthew is the same person as Levi in Mark and Luke. He would be a sort of customs officer at the border town of Capernaum. 15 This is an early hint of Jesus' coming death.

9:18–26 Raising the dead (see Mk. 5:21–43; Lk. 8:40–56). Here is yet a further escalation of Jesus' authority; even death is subject to him. Matthew's radical abbreviation of the story (23 verses in Mark, 9 Matthew!) suggests that the ruler's daughter was already dead when he made his request, rather than that she died while Jesus was on the way. If this was so, his request was the more remarkable. Matthew clearly does not intend us, therefore, to take Jesus' words in v 24 literally as indicating a false diagnosis (as they could be understood in Mark's account); he must mean that her death, though real, was not permanent.

Tucked into the story is another healing miracle, of a hopeless menstrual disorder. The woman's desire to touch his cloak may suggest a rather mechanical view of Jesus' healing power, but it arose from a faith sufficient to draw out Jesus' commendation—and her healing.

Notes. 20 The menstrual flow rendered her ceremonially unclean; even to touch the edge of his cloak was, therefore, to invite an indignant rebuff from a pious Jew. As with the leper (8:3), Jesus ignored the taboo. 23 Flute players were a regular part of mourning ritual.

9:27–31 Two blind men. This brief story closely parallels that in 20:29–34. The appeal to Jesus as Son of David, i.e. Messiah, occurs often in Matthew's accounts of healing. It indicates a faith which Jesus tests with his question in v 28 and which is the basis of their healing. The command to keep the healing quiet (cf. 8:4) was asking a lot: how do you conceal the cure of a blind man?! But apparently they did not even try. There is an inevitable tension between Jesus' desire to avoid inappropriate publicity and the powerful testimony which his miracles offered of who he was (cf. 11:2–5).

9:32–34 An exorcism leads to an accusation. This little episode too has a longer parallel later (12:22–24), where the accusation of collusion with Satan is developed and answered. Here this sinister new twist to the official hostility to Jesus is merely noted. Matthew normally distinguishes between demon possession and physical disability; here the one seems to have resulted in the other, but the language is still that of exorcism. The crowd's reaction in v 33 sums up the impression which the miracles in chs. 8–9 have been creating.

9:35–10:42 Second discourse: the disciples' mission

9:35–38 Workers for the harvest (cf. Mk. 6:34; Lk. 10:2). This little passage forms a bridge between the account of Jesus' ministry in chs. 5–9 (summarized in v 35) and the extension of that ministry to his disciples in ch. 10. The need was too great for Jesus to meet alone, so he called on some of his closest followers to help him meet it. The basis of this mission was in compassion, a strong word for an emotional response which always results in caring action. The imagery of harvest (like that of fishing in 4:19) suggests also the call to win new disciples. This is the concern of God, as Lord of the harvest, and so he may properly be appealed to for the necessary workers. It is worth noting that those who are here called to pray are in the next chapter sent out themselves!

10:1–4 Twelve apostles (cf. Mk. 6:7; 3:13–19; Lk. 9:1; 6:13–16; Acts 1:13). Apostle means 'sent' and so is appropriate here. This is Matthew's only use of the word; normally he calls Jesus' followers 'disciples' or 'the Twelve'. The authority given to them over evil spirits and sickness was an extension of Jesus' own, and in v 7 the charge to preach his message also is added. Five of this group have already appeared in the story (4:18–22; 9:9). Little is known of the others as individuals, except Judas Iscariot. Thaddaeus even appears under a different name (Judas, son of James) in Luke's lists. It was as a group, not as individuals, that they played their key role in the early days of the Jesus movement.

10:5–16 Instructions for mission (cf. Mk. 6:8–11; Lk. 9:2–5; 10:3–12). Here the 'discourse' begins. It is a specific charge for a limited mission, and we must be cautious of applying it simply to Christian mission in all circumstances.

The startling restriction in vs 5–6 parallels the limitation of Jesus' own mission to the lost sheep of Israel in 15:24. It is obvious that this was not meant to be a permanent restriction, both from Jesus' own openness to non-Jews in 8:5–13 and 15:21–28 and from his explicit instructions in 28:19–20. It was, however, an urgent appeal specifically to God's people Israel, which was the primary purpose of Jesus' mission while on earth. After the resurrection things would be different.

The disciples' message in v 7 is that of Jesus in 4:17, and their ministry in v 8 parallels his acts recorded in chs. 8–9 (even including raising the dead!).

Vs 8b–10 apply the principle of 6:25–34 to the mission. If Jesus' disciples are about God's work, they may expect his provision (the worker is worth his keep) and need make no elaborate preparations for their material needs on the way; the task is too urgent. They, and we, should beware of a mercenary approach to Christian ministry (8b).

Necessary sustenance (rather than payment for services rendered) would be provided not by a miracle but by appropriate hospitality (11–15). The standard greeting of 'Peace' (still in use in Hebrew and Arabic today) would be no mere formality but would serve to discern a deserving host. Where it met with an unwelcome reception it would return (like an uncashed cheque!). Rejection was sometimes to be expected and must be accepted; but to shake the dust off your feet was to mark out that home or town as one which had rejected the messengers of the Messiah, and was therefore ripe for judgment.

Disciples in a hostile society are as vulnerable as sheep among wolves. To survive and to fulfil their mission they need to be shrewd without being harmful; innocent without being gullible.

Notes. 10 Mk. 6:8–9 allows both sandals and staff. The verb translated take here in Matthew normally means 'obtain'. Is the prohibition, therefore, not of using normal essential travelling equipment but of buying extra?

10:17–39 Warnings of conflict and persecution (cf. Mk. 13:9–13; 4:22; Lk. 21:12–19; 12:2–12, 51–53; 6:40; 14:25–27). The focus is still on the Galilean mission of the Twelve (see v 23), but the discourse continues with principles more generally applicable to disciples facing opposition.

This opposition may have official sanction (17–18), but since it is incurred on my account, it provides an opportunity for witness. In such threatening circumstances, the disciples may count on the help of the Spirit of your Father and, therefore, need not worry (cf. 6:25–34). (This is no charter for inadequate preparation of sermons, however!) Even family relationships will be affected, and v 22 extends the opposition to all men. To follow Jesus is not a route to popularity and influence; it leads to life on the run (23a). But v 23b assures the Twelve that their mission would not be complete before the Son of Man comes (see note). However often they were repulsed, there would always be more of the cities of Israel to take the message to.

Vs 26–33 are all about the wrong and the right way of being afraid. To fear human opposition is to get things out of perspective, for people can do no more than kill the body. But God can destroy both soul and body in hell. Disciples should therefore be more afraid of failing him by concealing the truth which must, in any case, inevitably be publicly proclaimed (26–27). The same God, however, can not only destroy but preserve; within his will there is no need for fear (29–31). It comes in the end to a simple choice of loyalty, which has eternal consequences (32–33).

In vs 34–39 the cost of discipleship is set out in stark terms. V 34 is in striking contrast to 5:9; there are some things which are more important even than peace. Loyalty to Jesus may sometimes cause conflict even within a family (see Mi. 7:6), and if so his claims must come first. The language about taking the cross to follow Jesus will be made clearer in 16:21–28; it is the language of martyrdom, as v 39 indicates.

All this sounds very extreme, when read in the comfortable security of a society which at least tolerates Christian commitment. In some parts of the world, however, even today it is only too literally relevant. And the conflict and division of which Jesus warns are real enough for his followers even where their lives are not at risk. You cannot follow Jesus without having to make crucial choices of where your ultimate loyalty lies.

Notes. 18 Governors, kings and Gentiles point to the wider dimensions of the later Christian mission, not just that of the Twelve in Galilee. 23 Language about the ‘coming’ of the Son of Man derives from Dn. 7:13–14, where he ‘comes’ to God to receive sovereign power; it does not there refer to a coming to earth, still less to the specific ‘second coming’ of Jesus. Here, then, such language looks forward to the enthronement of the Son of Man in power (which we find already fulfilled through the resurrection in 28:18); the disciples’ mission to Israel would not be completed before that. 25 On Beelzebub cf. 12:24ff, (and already 9:34). 29–31 These verses do not promise immunity from death (the sparrows still die, but only within the will of your Father), but the assurance that even there God is in control.

10:40–42 Representing Jesus (cf. Mk. 9:37, 41; Lk. 9:48; 10:16). After the grim warnings of the preceding verses, this is a welcome relief; to represent Jesus is a privilege as well as a danger. In contrast with the opposition just considered is the glad reception of Jesus’ messengers and the assurance of reward for those who do so. The phrase little ones will be picked up in 18:1–14 (cf. 11:25; 25:40, 45); it refers not to children as such but to disciples in general, as they share the vulnerability and the lowly status of children.

Notes. 42 To give a cup of cold water is basic eastern hospitality and needs no reward; but God’s grace goes beyond our deserving.

11:1–12:50 Varying response to Jesus’ public ministry

So far Matthew’s narrative has focused attention mainly on Jesus himself, though the amazement of both disciples and crowds at his authority has been noted. Now Matthew looks more fully at people’s response to Jesus’ ministry, ranging from the glad recognition of the ‘little children’ (11:25) to the sinister charge of collusion with Satan (12:24). Between these extremes several different levels of enthusiasm, hostility or sheer puzzlement are recorded, so that by the time we come to the third discourse (with its emphasis on the division which results from Jesus’ ministry), Matthew has prepared the ground well.

11:1–19 John the Baptist and Jesus (see Lk. 7:18–35). The last reference to John the Baptist was to his imprisonment (4:12). It seems that from prison he followed the progress of the one for whom he had prepared the way. In this section we see not only John’s verdict on Jesus’ ministry (2–6), but also Jesus’ verdict on John (7–15) and his comments on how both of them had been received by people at large (16–19).

John’s question (3) suggests that he was surprised by Jesus’ style of ministry. The fierce judgment he himself had preached (3:11–12) was not yet obvious, and Jesus’ concern for the helpless and unimportant resulted in a far more ‘low-key’ image than John may have hoped for. In reply, Jesus wove together OT texts (mainly Is. 35:5–6 and 61:1–2), which found clear and visible fulfilment in his deeds recorded in chs. 8–9. Unexpected as they may have been to John, these acts of mercy were indeed the ‘deeds of the Messiah’ (the literal meaning of the phrase what Christ was doing; v 2). Those who do not recognize them as such have always found Jesus hard to take (6; fall away on account of is lit. ‘be scandalized by’).

Despite this implied rebuke, however, Jesus went on to commend John as a true prophet, and more. In his rugged, unconventional preaching the people had themselves recognized the authentic voice of God's spokesman. But, great as he was, John was still only the forerunner (10, quoting Mal. 3:1), the last and greatest of the prophets, the returning Elijah who was to inaugurate the last days (Mal. 4:5–6). God's decisive new initiative, the kingdom of heaven, had begun with Jesus, and John stood only on its threshold (as indeed his ambivalent response to Jesus indicated). Note in v 13 the strong sense of the whole OT revelation, law, no less than prophets, as pointing forward to Jesus and finding their fulfilment in him (cf. 5:17).

But, different as John and Jesus were in their style and their message, there was no pleasing some folk, as the playful little parable of vs 16–19 points out. John's ascetic lifestyle was branded as fanatical, and Jesus' convivial approach was thought scandalous. But God's wisdom is wiser than human prejudice and is justified (vindicated) by the very actions which this generation despised.

Notes. 7 The reed swayed by the wind may refer simply to desert scenery, but it is more likely an image for the sort of pliable person which John emphatically was not! 12 The NIV offers an interpretation of this difficult verse which attempts to liken it to Lk. 16:16. But the wording is very different and more naturally means, 'the kingdom of heaven has been subjected to violence, and violent men attack it'. The reference in that case is to the violent opposition which the true work of God has always aroused, seen already in the imprisonment of John and soon to be seen in the official rejection and execution of Jesus as well.

11:20–24 Those who reject Jesus' mission (see Lk. 10:12–15). The hostile response hinted at in vs 16–19 is now specified. The three towns mentioned were close together at the northern end of the Lake of Galilee, the area where Jesus' mission had so far been focused. Even the notoriously wicked pagan cities whose judgment figures in the OT (Tyre, Sidon and Sodom) would have been more receptive to what was so obviously the work of God. Notice that Jesus expected his miracles alone to cause people to repent. How much more his preaching of the good news, which these towns had enjoyed!

11:25–30 Those who accept Jesus' mission (see Lk. 10:21–22). It was not the important but the little children and the weary and burdened who responded to Jesus. The reason lay in Jesus' special relationship with God, as Son with Father. It is an exclusive relationship, and yet one to which we may be admitted, not by cleverness but by revelation. The initiative remains with the Father, who reveals the meaning of Jesus' ministry (25–26), and with the Son, who reveals the Father (27).

A yoke was intended to ease the discomfort in carrying a heavy load. But it also symbolized obedience and the acceptance of responsibility. The rabbis often spoke of taking on 'the yoke of the Law', and under their direction that burden could become heavy. Jesus' yoke, by contrast, is easy, not because his call to discipleship is less demanding (as we have seen in ch. 5) but because it makes us pupils of one who is gentle and humble in heart. The key lies in the personal invitation, Come to me.

12:1–14 The Pharisees and the Sabbath (see Mk. 2:23–3:6; Lk. 6:1–11). These two stories make clearer why some of Jesus' contemporaries found his mission unacceptable. As they saw it, he was a dangerous radical, undermining the obedience to the law which was at the heart of their religion. As such, he would be better eliminated (14).

Both stories focus on Sabbath law. The simple OT command to 'keep the seventh day holy' had been hedged about with a mass of subsidiary legislation to determine just what was and was not permissible on the Sabbath. Forbidden acts included reaping and healing where there was no immediate threat to life. The stories focus on Jesus' failure to observe these specific regulations;

there is no suggestion that he was opposed to the Sabbath principle as such. The issue was how it should be interpreted and who had the right to interpret it.

In vs 3–8 Jesus makes this an issue of his personal authority and claims the right to dispense with regulations as David had done (1 Sa. 21:1–6) and as the temple priests were obliged to do in fulfilling their duties. In putting himself in the same company, Jesus in effect claims to be at least equal with David and greater than the temple; the same argument will be carried further in vs 41–42. If that is his status, then surely he is Lord of the Sabbath too. And his authoritative dismissal of Pharisaic tradition is in line with Hosea's principle that God is concerned with love before ritual (7; see also 9:13).

The healing of the shrivelled hand could have waited until a weekday. Jesus, however, exposed the double standard of those who were prepared to make exceptions to alleviate animal suffering (or to avoid economic loss?) but not for human relief. His sweeping statement, 'It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath', was in striking contrast with the Pharisees' tendency to multiply regulations. No wonder they had to oppose a man who so openly flouted both their authority and the principles they stood for.

Notes. 5 The reference may be to the priests' 'work' in making the Sabbath sacrifices or, more relevantly, to their reaping of the offering of the first sheaves, which the Pharisees (but not the Sadducees) allowed on the Sabbath. 6 One greater is 'something greater' (similarly in 12:41–42) and is a reference perhaps to Jesus' whole ministry (and his disciple-community?) as replacing the temple as the focus of God's presence among his people.

12:15–21 Jesus' response to opposition. Jesus' response to the threat of violence was to withdraw for the time being from the public arena and to attempt to curb publicity. In this Matthew sees Jesus as fulfilling the portrait of God's servant described in Is. 42:1–4, gentle and non-violent, yet ultimately victorious. This is the first of the so-called 'Servant Songs' which recur through Is. 40–55, and from the last of which Matthew has already illustrated another aspect of Jesus' total ministry in 8:17.

12:22–37 Jesus accused of collusion with Satan (see Mk. 3:22–30; Lk. 11:14–23; 12:10; 6:43–45). Now the opposition becomes more 'theological'. Recognizing Jesus' supernatural power, his opponents attributed it not to God but to Satan. Jesus' response was first to show how inconsistent the charge was, and then to underline its seriousness, as blasphemy against the Spirit. This leads on to some comments on how significant, and how damning, words can be.

The encounter arose out of an exorcism similar to that in 9:32–34, where Matthew has already recorded the same charge that Jesus was drawing on demonic power. The obvious power of Jesus led more neutral onlookers to the suggestion that he was the Son of David, the Messiah working by the power of God. Since the Pharisees had already decided against that explanation (12:14), they had to find another which equally explained his more than human authority, and they found it in his alleged collusion with Satan.

Jesus' first reply (25–26) merely pointed out what a silly idea this was: Satan would not attack his own troops! Secondly (27), he reminded them that he was not the only person who was exorcizing; were they all in league with Satan? Thirdly, and more positively (28–29), he showed that, on the contrary, his attack on spiritual evil was a mark of the inbreaking of the kingdom of God and the defeat of Satan, the strong man. It is thus a sign not of demonic power but of the Spirit of God at work. There was, therefore, a radical division between those who recognized God at work, and therefore were with me (30), and those who by attributing God's work to his arch-enemy proved themselves to be against me. By this blasphemy against the Spirit they were deliberately lining up on the opposing side and putting themselves outside the scope of forgiveness.

It is important to read the terrible vs 31–32 in their context. Insensitive application of these words to situations which bear no resemblance to the Pharisees' deliberate perversion of the truth has caused distress to many vulnerable people. Jesus was speaking not of a temporary lapse but of a settled decision to oppose the work of God.

Vs 32–37 go on to warn us, however, in a series of striking pictures, against shrugging off 'mere words'. Our words reveal what we are really like, and thus even a careless word may be a proper basis for judgment.

Notes. 24 Beelzebul, 'Lord of flies', was originally the name of a Canaanite God (2 Ki. 1:2). By Jesus' time it had come to be used, in the form Beelzebub, as a name for the chief of demons, or Satan. 27 For other Jewish exorcists cf. Mk. 9:38; Acts 19:13. Jewish sources mention several such. 28 This is one of the clearest statements that in Jesus' ministry the kingdom of God was not only imminent but already present and visibly active. 29 This is a parable: in order to plunder a ruffian you must first overpower him. Jesus' exorcisms therefore proved that he had already overpowered Satan. 30 Compare Mk. 9:40, 'Whoever is not against us is for us'; both versions rule out any middle, 'neutral' ground. 32 This surprising contrast perhaps reflects the fact that even Jesus' own disciples took time to recognize him as the Son of Man, in his earthly incognito.

12:38–45 A warning to 'this generation' (see Lk. 11:16, 24–26, 29–32). The demand for a sign recurs in 16:1–4. Here it follows naturally from the preceding debate; if Jesus claims that his power is from God, he must prove it. The scepticism which underlies this demand is the mark of this generation (cf. 11:16–19), and the recurrence of this phrase in vs 39, 41, 42, 45 holds this little passage together.

Jesus' refusal of any special sign produced to order is based on a broader concept of his authority as one greater than Jonah or Solomon (cf. v 6 for the same argument in relation to the temple and its priests). If even pagans could recognize God's presence in those great men of the OT, why could not this (Jewish) generation accept the authority of the one in whom all those strands of authority (prophet, priest, king, wise man) found their fulfilment? To reject the call of such a spokesman could lead only to judgment.

The humorous parable of the homeless evil spirit (43–45) conveys a serious warning against a half-hearted response. Even if Jesus' warnings of judgment bring about 'repentance', unless this leads on to a positive reorientation to follow him, there will be merely a void which the devil can exploit.

Notes. 39–40 Jonah's miraculous escape authenticated his preaching; the resurrection of Jesus will do the same. Three days and three nights was a Jewish idiom for a period covering parts of three 24-hour 'days-and-nights' (cf. 1 Sa. 30:12–13; Est. 4:16–5:1).

12:46–50 Jesus' family (see Mk. 3:31–35; Lk. 8:19–21). Matthew does not tell us how Jesus' mother and brothers responded to his teaching, but by portraying them as outside the disciple circle he suggests that they were at least uncommitted. By contrasting natural family ties with the greater 'family' of those who do the will of my Father in heaven, Jesus emphasized the radical demand of his call to discipleship, but also its reward. The wide range of responses to Jesus set out in chs. 11–12 thus closes with a heartening glimpse of the new 'family' which was now established around him.

13:1–52 Third discourse: Jesus' teaching in parables

Chs. 11–12 have shown us a deep division among those who heard Jesus' teaching and a wide variety of responses. The parables which make up the bulk of ch. 13 will now explain why the preaching of the word of God meets with such a mixed response, and will underline the radical nature of the choice it presents.

The discourse is carefully structured. First, there is the introductory parable of the sower (3–9). This is followed by an interlude focusing on the purpose of parables (10–17) and an explanation of the parable of the sower (18–23). Then there are three parables of growth: the weeds (24–30); the mustard seed (31–32); and the yeast in the dough (33). This is followed by another interlude, which deals with the purpose of parables (34–35) and an explanation of the parable of the weeds (36–43), and then three further parables: the treasure (44); the pearl (45–46); and the net (47–50). Finally, there is the concluding parable of the householder (51–52).

The section combines eight actual parables with explanations both of the purpose of parables in general and of two key parables in particular.

We tend to think of parables as illustrative stories, but the Greek word parabole is broader: it conveys also the sense of mysterious sayings which do not carry their meaning on the surface. A parable needs to be interpreted. Like a cartoon, it is in itself just a story or picture; the challenge is to penetrate through to its meaning. That is why the same parable, without explanation, can enlighten some and leave others unmoved. It is this theme which is explored especially in the crucial vs 10–17, where the enlightenment of the disciples and the blindness of the unresponsive crowds are contrasted.

Each of the parables is explicitly about the kingdom of heaven. They set out the demands and paradoxes of the new order Jesus had come to establish, and in relation to which people were reacting so differently.

13:1–9, 18–23 The parable of the sower (and its explanation) (see Mk. 4:1–9, 13–20; Lk. 8:4–8, 11–15). Jesus' disciples must have found it hard to understand how his proclamation of the kingdom of God, to which they had responded so enthusiastically, was not welcomed in the same way by all who heard it. This parable, with its four 'scenes', indicates that the response depends not only on the message (the same seed is sown in each case) but also on the readiness of the hearers to receive it. The three unproductive areas (the path, the rocky places and the thorns) are interpreted in vs 19–22 as representing different types of hearers: those who simply will not listen, those whose response is superficial and those who are preoccupied with other concerns. All three are familiar to any preacher of the gospel, then and now. The disciples should not therefore be surprised at the divided response to Jesus' preaching.

The fault is in the hearers, not in the message. When the seed falls in good soil, it will be productive. In this way, Jesus assured his disciples that, despite the areas of hostility and inadequate response, there would be a harvest. Even in the good soil, however, there is room for some variation in the degree of productivity, a hundred, sixty or thirty times. In other words, disciples do not come in only one size or type, and there is room in the kingdom of God for the ordinary as well as for the spectacular.

As in 7:24–27 it is not mere hearing of the word which matters but understanding (19, 23). In this way the parable of the sower prepares for vs 10–17, where a sharp distinction is drawn between hearers who do not understand the parables and those who are in possession of the 'secret' which unlocks them. It is thus, in a sense, a parable about parables. It is appropriate, therefore, that it concludes in v 9 with an appeal to us all to take notice; how we hear will determine whether or not our discipleship is fruitful.

Notes. 1 The contrast between the privacy of the house (cf. v 36) and the large audience by the lake symbolizes the distinction, which is carefully drawn throughout this chapter, between the crowds whom Jesus taught only in parables and the disciples to whom he gave explanations privately.

13:10–17 How parables work (cf. Mk. 4:10–12, 25; Lk. 8:9–10, 18; 10:23–24). As v 12 indicates, what you get out of anything depends on what you can put into it. So it is with parables; the same message, as the parable of the sower has indicated, will meet with different response depending on the receptivity of the hearer. By explaining his parables to his disciples Jesus opened up the secrets of the kingdom of heaven. It has a logic all its own, which human reason cannot penetrate; its truth must be revealed. To be a disciple is to be in the school of revelation.

Those who do not have this gift will, as Is. 6:9–10 had so vividly predicted, never get beyond a superficial hearing of God’s message, and it will do them no good. But to belong to the group of Jesus’ disciples is a privilege greater than that enjoyed by the greatest of God’s people in the past (prophets and righteous men), who had a preliminary inkling of the kingdom of heaven, but did not yet know its reality.

Jesus is not here saying that parables are designed to conceal truth, and thus to keep people out of the kingdom of heaven, but that as a matter of fact not everyone has the ability to penetrate their meaning. That ability is given to disciples, rather than being the result of human cleverness. But this passage does not address the question of how a person becomes a disciple. Presumably, the disciples to whom Jesus was speaking were themselves once unenlightened; if they could receive the secrets through Jesus’ ministry, so could others. But as long as the division exists and there are different soils for the seed to fall in, parables will continue to reveal that division.

13:24–30, 36–43 The parable of the weeds (and its explanation). The division between true disciples and others is often difficult to discern, as 7:15–27 has already made clear. This parable warns us that the ultimate test is not in present appearances but in the final judgment. Until then, the disciples must be patient and not expect to be able to put everyone into neat compartments. The church on earth will always be a mixed community.

In the explanation in vs 36–43 the focus is particularly on the division at the final judgment and on the contrasting fates of the wicked and the righteous. Whatever the ambiguities on earth, there will be no uncertainty at the end of the age.

Notes. 25 The weeds are probably darnel, which looks very like wheat in the early stages of growth and after that is so closely entangled with it that it cannot be removed without damaging the wheat. 41 In referring to ‘the kingdom of heaven’ as the kingdom of the Son of Man, Jesus was making, by implication, a remarkable claim for his own authority (cf. 16:28; 19:28; 25:31–46).

13:31–35 More parables of growth (see Mk. 4:30–34; Lk. 13:18–21). Both the mustard seed and the yeast are parables of small beginnings. Mustard seed was proverbial for something minute (cf. 17:20), yet the full-grown plant could grow to 3 m. A handful of yeast eventually permeates a large amount of flour (lit. ‘three measures’, enough to make bread for 100 people!). So God’s work, the kingdom of heaven, may appear unimpressive at first, but appearances can be deceptive, and no-one will be able to ignore it in the end. In the meantime the disciples must be patient. Human valuation misses the point; little becomes great when God is at work.

V 34 reinforces the teaching of vs 10–17 about Jesus’ use of parables, and in v 35 Matthew offers another formula-quotation, drawn this time from a Psalm (78:2), to show how in this method of teaching too Jesus was fulfilling a pattern laid down in the OT.

13:44–52 Further parables. The parables of the treasure and of the pearl belong closely together, and illustrate the whole-hearted response which the kingdom of heaven requires; no sacrifice is too great, and no other concern must stand in the way of it. But the note is not of a negative ‘giving up’ but of joy and fulfilment. There is something about the kingdom of heaven which makes extravagant action the only proper response.

The parable of the net is closely related to that of the weeds, and is explained in similar words (compare vs 49–50 with vs 40–42).

V 51 shows that, as Jesus had promised (11), the disciples understood what the parables were about (cf. vs 13, 14, 15, 19, 23 for the importance of ‘understanding’). In that case, they were for the kingdom of heaven what the scribes (teachers of the law) were for Israel—able to teach others the way of God. The parable of the house-owner thus challenged them to fulfil this responsibility. The truths they were to teach included both the new treasures of Jesus’ teaching and the old truths which Jewish scribes could offer; for Jesus’ ‘new’ teaching itself goes back to ‘the foundation of the world’ (35), bringing God’s eternal truths to light.

13:53–16:20 Further responses to Jesus’ public ministry

This part of Matthew’s story comes to its climax in Peter’s recognition of Jesus as the Messiah and Son of God. Leading up to that point are a series of loosely connected stories which continue to illustrate the variety of ways in which people responded to Jesus’ ministry. They include both the growth of opposition on the part of scribes, Pharisees and Sadducees, and also a continuing display of Jesus’ miraculous power, which leads at least some to anticipate Peter’s great confession (14:33).

13:53–58 Disbelief at Nazareth (see Mk. 6:1–6; cf. Lk. 4:16–30). Since 4:13 Jesus had been based in Capernaum and around the lake and had become famous. His return to his home town, the remote hill village of Nazareth, provoked a predictable reaction to ‘the local boy made good’. Like his own family (12:46–50), his fellow-villagers could not take him seriously. V 57 picks up a common theme of proverbs: ‘Familiarity breeds contempt’.

Notes. 55–56 The carpenter was a general local building contractor, and his eldest son had shared his trade. The brothers and sisters (children of Joseph and Mary after Jesus was born) are largely unknown beyond their names, though James later became a leader in the church. 58 For the connection between miracles and faith cf. 8:10–13; 9:2, 22, 28–29.

14:1–12 The reaction of Herod Antipas (see Mk. 6:14–29; Lk. 9:7–9; 3:19–20). Herod the tetrarch is Herod Antipas, ruler of Galilee and the son of the Herod who was king when Jesus was born (ch. 2). Reports of Jesus’ miracles, combined with Herod’s tender conscience over his reluctant execution of John the Baptist, led to the bizarre idea that Jesus was John risen from the dead.

We last heard of John in prison (4:12; 11:2) and Matthew now explains what has happened. Not only was marriage to a [half-]brother’s wife against Jewish law (Lv. 18:16), but Herod and Herodias had both divorced their former partners in order to marry. It was not only a politically imprudent marriage but religiously scandalous, and John’s outspoken condemnation would have been damaging to Herod’s reputation among his Jewish subjects. John was therefore not only an embarrassment to Herod but also (as Josephus’ history confirms) a threat to his political security.

In reporting John's death to Jesus, John's disciples showed that they recognized Jesus as his true 'successor' as 11:7–19 has already indicated and as Jesus will further affirm in 21:23–32. Jesus' subsequent withdrawal (13) suggests that he was aware of the danger of this association in Herod's eyes.

14:13–21 Miraculous feeding of a large crowd (see Mk. 6:32–44; Lk. 9:10–17).

Luke tells us that the solitary place was near Bethsaida, across the northern end of the lake and outside the territory of Herod Antipas. That a large crowd was anxious to follow Jesus there may suggest, as Jn. 6:14–15 makes clear, that this was no chance gathering but a deliberate popular movement to force Jesus into political action (see on v 21 below).

Matthew, however, does not draw attention to this. For him, the story was a vivid expression of the compassion and the miraculous power of Jesus. Jewish readers could hardly have failed to note the parallel to two feeding miracles in the OT, the provision of manna in the desert (Ex. 16) and Elisha's similar multiplication of loaves (2 Ki. 4:42–44). Jesus is again seen as the 'one greater' (cf. 12:6, 41, 42) than the ancient prophets.

To eat together was a symbol of unity. Jesus acted as host to a large family gathering, and thus welcomed the crowd into a new community. While the menu was not out of the ordinary, perhaps we should see this meal as a deliberate foretaste of the Messianic banquet (for which see 8:11–12); sit down (19) is a relatively formal word for reclining at a banquet. It is also hardly accidental that the verbs in v 19 ('take', 'give thanks', 'break', 'give') are those used in the NT accounts of the Last Supper. The meal did, of course, satisfy hunger (20), but Matthew apparently sees it also as a symbolic act of communion in the newly established kingdom of heaven.

By his challenge in v 16, Jesus deliberately drew the disciples into the action, and he used the provisions which they could supply. Through their involvement, (and perhaps particularly through the remarkable experience of clearing up far more than they had brought in the first place!) they would remember and learn from the occasion; that learning was to be tested later (16:5–12).

Notes. 19 Loaves and fish were the basic Galilean peasant diet. 20 The twelve baskets are more memorable than deliberately symbolic; each of the twelve used one basket, presumably. 21 Besides women and children could be translated 'excluding women and children', i.e. only men were present, indicating a 'military' flavour to the gathering. But more likely it echoes Ex. 12:37, where the same phrase accompanies the roll-call of the old people of God.

14:22–33 Walking on water (see Mk. 6:45–52). The public miracle of the loaves was followed by one witnessed only by the disciples, which also showed Jesus' authority over material things. The combined effect was to lead them to a new appreciation of Jesus' more than human power (33).

In rough weather on the lake in the hours before dawn (the fourth watch is 3–6 a.m.) it is hardly surprising that the disciples' reaction to the sudden appearance of Jesus beside them was terror and the cry, 'It's a ghost'. What is much more remarkable is Peter's extraordinary proposal to join Jesus in walking on the water.

Peter sometimes appears in the gospels as an impulsive character, prone to ill-considered reactions. It may be that we are intended to see here an example not of great faith but of foolhardiness, presumptuously wishing to share Jesus' power over nature. But the fact that Jesus encouraged the attempt, and that it was initially successful, suggests that Matthew sees it is a genuine act of faith, even though it was not sufficient to survive the crisis.

At any rate, by the end of the story Peter had become an example of little faith and of doubt, an object-lesson for disciples who are tempted to take their eyes off Jesus and to take more notice of the threatening circumstances around them.

Notes. 22 The sense of urgency may be due to the danger that both disciples and crowd might try to force Jesus into political action (Jn. 6:14–15). 33 This instinctive reaction to a numinous experience prepares the way for Peter's more deliberately theological statement in 16:16.

14:34–36 Jesus the healer (see Mk. 6:53–56). Back in Herod's territory, Jesus was again the centre of attention. His popular appeal is seen as focused in his healing ministry, and Matthew's general summary indicates that this was far more extensive than the individual healings so far recorded might suggest. The desire to touch the edge of his cloak sounds almost mechanical, but see 9:20–22 for a healing by this means which was in fact a very personal encounter.

15:1–20 Cleanliness and godliness (see Mk. 7:1–23; cf. Lk. 11:37–41; 6:39). The opposition was never far away. Here again (as in 9:3, 11, 34; 12:2, 14, 24, 38) the trouble arose from Pharisees and teachers of the law, but now there is a sinister addition: they had come from Jerusalem. This was perhaps an official delegation sent to investigate this controversial teacher who did not belong to the rabbinic establishment. It will be increasingly clear from now on that it is from Jerusalem that Jesus must expect trouble (16:21; 20:18 etc.).

To wash their hands before they eat was not simply a question of hygiene but of religious duty. The OT law made no such rule, except for priests going about their cultic duty (Ex. 30:17–21). The Pharisaic tradition, however, had extended the principle to daily life, and Jesus, as a religious teacher, was expected to enforce ritual purity among his disciples.

Jesus' response to the charge comes in vs 10–11. He first launched a counter-attack on their whole attitude to religious authority. By insisting on their tradition they were in effect setting aside the command of God. Jesus thus drew a sharp distinction between the OT law (the word of God; v 6) and all human rules and regulations, and his quotation from Is. 29:13 indicates that a religion based on the latter is empty and not pleasing to God.

To illustrate this point he referred to the way the OT principle of respect for parents (Ex. 20:12; 21:17) was being undermined by the rabbinic legislation which allowed a man to keep his property out of his parents' reach by nominally dedicating it to God (while in practice retaining the use of it for himself). By this pious fraud, the OT provision for vows was cynically twisted to a purpose which infringed one of the most basic commandments of the law. (Note that the fifth commandment is introduced as what God said, not just as the law of Moses!)

Jesus then went beyond merely defending the OT law. In returning to the specific question of clean and unclean in v 11, he laid down a radical principle which would ultimately lead his followers to abandon the food laws of the Old Testament altogether. He stated that 'unclean-ness' is not contracted by what you eat but comes from inside. This was the lesson which Peter found so hard to learn (Acts 10:9–15), but until it was learned, the food laws of Israel would hinder the church from welcoming non-Jewish members on equal terms. Matthew does not here spell out these implications (though Mark does; Mk. 7:19), but the principle is clear enough, and vs 17–20 explain it yet more clearly.

This went right against the Pharisaic sense of priorities in religion. Jesus, however, made no apology for this, and indeed made matters worse by writing the Pharisees off as plants not planted by God, to be removed like weeds, and as blind guides whose misdirected zeal would bring only disaster to themselves and to any who depended on them. This strong language reflects not so much personal animosity as a total repudiation of the approach to religion which emphasizes externals and ignores what a person is really like.

There is an undeniable inconsistency in a passage which begins by accusing Jesus' opponents of undermining God's law and then goes on to repudiate the principle of 'uncleanness' on which part of that law was based. But here, as in ch. 5, Jesus was less concerned with the surface level of the law than with its essential principle: if external purity matters, how much more does internal. In the end, this focus would leave those particular laws without practical value in the new community of the people of God drawn from Gentiles as well as Jews. For the time being, however, the principle was applied only to the matter of hand-washing, which was not part of the OT law (20).

Notes. 15 Here parable is used in its broader sense of a 'dark saying', needing interpretation. 16 Dull is lit. 'not understanding'; cf. the emphasis on the need to understand parables in 13:13, 14, 15, 19, 23. Here again, the disciples were given a private explanation of a saying which was left uninterpreted for the crowd.

15:21–28 A Gentile woman's faith (see Mk. 7:24–30). The issue of defilement now recurs in a more practical form. Jesus, the Jewish teacher, had moved into Gentile territory and was confronted by a Gentile woman with a demon-possessed daughter. The dialogue which resulted focused on the question of how far a Gentile might expect any benefit from the Jewish Messiah (Son of David).

The story is closely similar to that of the centurion's servant (8:5–13), not only in that faith was rewarded by a healing word spoken from a distance, but also in the racial tension which put that faith to the test. By describing the woman as a Canaanite, Matthew sharpens the issue. The Canaanites were the traditional enemies of Israel in the OT.

Jesus' discouraging silence (23) was followed by an even more daunting statement of the Jewish focus of his mission (24; cf. 10:5–6). His words seem to have left no room for hope, but the woman persisted with a simple appeal for help, only to be confronted by a yet more wounding saying, comparing Gentiles with dogs (which for the Jews were unclean animals).

The language seems incredibly harsh, especially when spoken by the same Jesus who had earlier welcomed the faith of the Gentile centurion as a pointer to Gentiles sharing in future in the blessings of Israel. Perhaps cold print conceals an element of irony, even playfulness, in Jesus' tone. At any rate, he was confronting her with the sort of language a Gentile could expect to hear from a Jew, and her faith rose to the test. Her reply in v 27 recognized the priority of his mission to Israel but, nonetheless, claimed an extension of that mission to Gentiles. She had thus perceived the plan to which God had been working ever since the call of Abraham (Gn. 12:1–3), and which would in due time extend the church outside the bounds of Israel. For this faith she was appropriately rewarded.

15:29–31 Gentile response to Jesus (cf. Mk. 7:31–37). Just as Jesus had healed large numbers of Jews (14:34–36), so now he did the same in Gentile territory. Mark tells us that this was in the Decapolis, the Gentile south-east side of the Sea of Galilee, and it follows appropriately from Jesus' acceptance of the claim of Gentiles on his healing power in vs 21–28. The acclamation of the God of Israel confirms that the crowds were not themselves Jewish.

15:32–39 Second feeding of a crowd (see Mk. 8:1–10). Following so closely on 14:13–21 this may seem like an unnecessary repetition. The numbers involved indicate, however, that this is a separate incident. Its significance may lie in the context in which it occurred, as part of Jesus' extension of his ministry into Gentile territory (15:21; not until v 39 does he return to the Jewish side of the lake). Thus we have here a deliberate repetition of the Jewish feeding miracle, but this time for the Gentile crowd who had just praised the God of Israel. If the feeding of the 5,000 was a foretaste of the Messianic banquet, then this story indicates (as 8:11–12 has already predicted) that Gentiles too are to share in Israel's ultimate blessing.

The details of the story are different, but its essential character is the same (see on 14:13–21).

Notes. 37 An incidental mark of the non-Jewish context is the word for baskets, which is here a general one, whereas that in 14:20 denoted a specifically Jewish type of basket.

16:1–12 Pharisees and Sadducees (see Mk. 8:11–21; cf. Lk. 11:16; 12:54–56; 12:1). On a brief return to Jewish territory, Jesus again ran into official opposition. For the request for a sign from heaven and the refusal of any except the sign of Jonah see above on 12:38–42. The contrast between this Jewish scepticism and the enthusiastic response of the Gentile crowds is remarkable.

The questioners were a strange combination of Pharisees and Sadducees. The theological views and policies of these groups were markedly different from each other, but they had to cooperate as members of the Jewish supreme court, the Sanhedrin. This combination of parties in opposition to Jesus was to become clearer later (see on 16:21), but already it was sufficiently marked for Jesus to comment on the two groups as a united opposition in vs 5–12.

While Jesus had earlier used yeast as a symbol for the growth of God's kingdom (13:33), it was also sometimes a metaphor for the power of evil to extend its influence (1 Cor. 5:6–8; Gal. 5:9). Here the demand for a sign indicated an insidious resistance to Jesus' mission, and Jesus did not want his disciples to be infected with his opponents' scepticism.

The disciples' minds were, however, on more material concerns, and they thought he was talking about real bread! To be concerned about that was a sign of little faith (cf. 6:25–34), especially as their own eyes had twice witnessed how Jesus could meet physical need.

Notes. 2–3 The passage about weather signs does not occur in many early texts, and it may be a later addition based on Lk. 12:54–56.

16:13–20 Peter's confession (see Mk. 8:27–30; Lk. 9:18–21). Here we reach the climax of the first part of the gospel, in which we have seen very varied reactions to the authoritative ministry of Jesus. Other people's views are summarized in v 14, where Jesus is placed in the category of the prophets. Peter makes the definitive statement for which the whole story has been preparing: Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God.

Jesus' surprising response in all three synoptic gospels was to tell his disciples to keep his identity secret. The reason will become clear in vs 22ff. But Matthew (alone) includes in vs 17–19 a more positive response, which makes it clear that what Peter had said was true, however open it might be to misunderstanding. Indeed it was a revelation from God, and the fact that it was Peter who had received it indicated the important role he was to play in the development of the Messiah's mission.

The name Peter means 'Rock', and Jesus played on this meaning to designate Peter as the foundation of the new people of God. His leadership would involve the authority of the steward, whose keys symbolized his responsibility to regulate the affairs of the household. Peter would exercise his leadership by his authority to declare what is and is not permissible in the kingdom of heaven (to bind and to loose have this meaning in rabbinic writings). The story of the early years of the church in Acts shows how Peter fulfilled this role. But the same authority was shared with the other disciples in 18:18 (where you is plural; here it is singular). He was thus a representative leader rather than an overlord.

The church would be built by Jesus, not by Peter. To refer to it as my church was to make a remarkable claim, since the Gk ekklēsia ('church') is the OT word for the people of God! The gates of Hades is a poetic expression for death; this new community of those who follow Jesus will never die.

Notes. 16 This is the first time anyone in Matthew's narrative has given Jesus the title Christ ('the Messiah'), though Matthew himself has used it in 1:1, 16, 17, 18; 2:4; 11:2. 18 It is sometimes suggested that because the word for 'rock' (petra) differs from the name Petros, the 'rock' referred to is not Peter himself but the confession he has just made of Jesus as Messiah. In Aramaic, however, the same term kefa would appear in both places; the change in Greek is due to the fact that petra, the normal word for rock, is feminine in gender, and therefore not suitable as a name for Simon! The echo of Peter's name remains obvious, even in Greek; he is the rock, in the sense outlined above. The text does not of course say anything about the church in Rome, or about any succession beyond the unique founding role of Peter himself. 19 The future perfect verbs ('will have been bound', 'will have been loosed'; see the NIV mg.) suggest that the heavenly decision preceded Peter's declaration of it on earth.

16:21–18:35 Private ministry in Galilee; preparing the disciples

While Jesus remains in the north, the focus of the story now shifts towards Jerusalem, as Jesus warns his disciples of what was to come and prepared them to be followers not of a triumphant Messiah but of one whose mission was to be completed through suffering and death. This would demand a radical reorientation in their thinking, and so from now on until he arrived in Jerusalem (ch. 21), Jesus' attention was focused on teaching the disciples rather than on further public ministry.

16:21–17:27 Teaching on Jesus' mission

16:21–28 Death and glory (see Mk. 8:31–9:1; Lk. 9:22–27). While the scene remains near Caesarea Philippi and the story is continuous from vs 13–20, the formula From that time on Jesus began (cf. 4:17) marks the beginning of a decisive new phase of Jesus' mission. Its geographical focus was to be Jerusalem, and its character was dominated by the cross. V 21 is the first of three formal announcements of what is to come (cf. 17:22–23; 20:17–19); from now on the mission became a march to death, and the disciples had to learn to live with this new perspective.

This was, however, too much for Peter, whose triumphant declaration in v 16 no doubt carried the hope of sharing in the Messiah's glory. Like other Jews at the time, he probably understood the Messiah's work in primarily earthly and political terms; defeat and death (and still worse rejection by Israel's official leadership) was not on his agenda. In this, he expressed the things of men, and as long as Jesus' disciples shared this purely human perspective, Jesus' mission (the things of God) could never make sense to them. That is why Jesus had been anxious to damp down popular enthusiasm in v 20. Hence his remarkably fierce reaction in v 23. Already the foundation rock (18) had become a stumbling-block!

Any idea of sharing the Messiah's glory had to give way to sharing his humiliation and rejection. To take up the cross is to set off for public execution, not to suffer patiently some irritation (cf. 27:32). For the disciple, as for the Master, it may lead to literal death. But by a powerful play on words in vs 25–26 (the same Greek word means both life and soul) Jesus posed the question of what real life is anyway; there are more important considerations than merely physical survival.

For death, for the Son of Man, was the way to glory. It was he who would have the last word, and those who had been faithful to him would be rewarded. Jesus must die indeed, but before some of his earthly companions also taste death (in martyrdom?) they would see that he had conquered and was now reigning as king. How they would see it is not specified. Perhaps it would become apparent, in a preliminary sense, in the events of the next week (see on 17:1) and, more fully, in Jesus' resurrection, ascension and heavenly reign. The inauguration of this reign Matthew signals in 28:18. As the kingdom of God grows, and the church becomes increasingly a force to be reckoned with, the kingship of the Son of Man will be established for all to see.

Notes. 21 The elders, chief priests and teachers of the law were the three groups which made up the membership of the Sanhedrin, the supreme council of the Jews. This was to be, therefore, a full-scale official repudiation of Israel's Messiah by Israel's highest court. 28 See above on 10:23 for the significance of language about the Son of Man coming, drawing on the imagery of Dn. 7:13–14. It is enthronement language and has no necessary reference to the 'second coming' as such.

17:1–13 A vision of Jesus' glory (see Mk. 9:2–13; Lk. 9:28–36). The unusually precise note of time (After six days) may be intended to link this episode closely with Jesus' words in 16:28: here for a few moments some of those who were with Jesus then 'saw' Jesus' kingly glory. The whole story is told from the disciples' point of view as primarily a revelation to them of who Jesus really is. As such, it forms an important counter-balance to the depressing announcements of 16:21ff. Beyond death lies glory and already the three disciples are privileged to see the curtain temporarily drawn aside. Three elements add up to an extraordinary affirmation of Jesus as more than a merely human Messiah.

First, his changed appearance (transfigured), in bright light (2) and a bright cloud (5), shows that he is not just God's spokesman, but different in himself from other prophets.

Secondly, he is linked with Moses and Elijah, two of the greatest of those through whom God saved and spoke to his people in the past (even though both of them, like Jesus, suffered rejection by God's people). Both were popularly expected to return to inaugurate the Messianic age, so that their appearance here proclaims Jesus as the Messiah.

Thirdly, as at Jesus' baptism (3:17), God himself affirms Jesus as his Son. If that is so, his disciples must listen to him, however daunting they may have found his words in 16:21ff.

It was all too much to take in. Peter's inappropriate proposal to build shelters for Jesus and his august visitors there on the mountain was tactfully ignored! The three disciples were suitably terrified and were again sworn to secrecy (9; cf. 16:20). It is easy to imagine the unfortunate consequences which might have flowed from ill-considered reports of this spectacular incident.

In vs 10–13 the disciples were still trying to sort out what it all meant: was this fleeting vision the promised return of Elijah (Mal. 4:5–6)? Jesus pointed out that the real fulfilment of that prophecy had already taken place in the preaching, and the suffering, of John the Baptist. So the theme of necessary suffering, which they may have hoped had now been cancelled out by the vision of glory, is reasserted, for Jesus as well as for John.

Notes. 1 The high mountain is not identified. Mt Hermon, the highest in the area, is close to Caesarea Philippi (16:13); but other locations have been suggested. 4 Peter's proposal may have been simply a spontaneous desire to offer what hospitality he could; but it may also suggest that he wanted to tie down the vision in a more solid way.

17:14–20 The power of faith (see Mk. 9:14–29; Lk. 9:37–43). After the glory on the mountain, Jesus returned to a scene of suffering and unbelief. The suffering looks like a case of epilepsy (has seizures translates a rare word meaning lit. ‘is affected by the moon’, but the symptoms sound like epilepsy), but Jesus clearly treated it as demon-possession. The unbelief was that of the whole generation, but was focused in the disciples’ failure to help the sufferer, through their little faith. Indeed, v 20 implies that on this occasion they had no faith at all, since there is nothing smaller than a mustard seed! The ‘amount’ of faith is not important; even the smallest is enough. What matters is the God in whom that faith is placed, who can achieve the proverbially impossible (moving mountains).

17:22–23 Second prediction of Jesus’ death (see Mk. 9:30–32; Lk. 9:43–45). The content is similar to 16:21, though now the ominous note of being betrayed was added. As before, and as in 17:9, Jesus spoke of resurrection as well as death, but the disciples’ reaction suggests that their minds did not focus on that part of the prediction.

17:24–27 The temple tax. While most Jews resented Roman taxation, the annual payment of the Jewish two-drachma tax for the upkeep of the temple and its services was a matter of national pride. The collectors’ question suggests that Jesus now had a reputation for not conforming to social expectations. And Jesus here asserted his independence, in principle: as God’s son he was exempt (cf. 12:5–6: ‘one greater than the temple is here’), but he was willing to pay the tax in order to avoid giving offence. Jesus was quite capable of giving offence when the cause warranted it (see 15:12–14 and especially ch. 23!), but this was not such an issue.

We are not told whether Peter went fishing, or whether he succeeded. The point of the story is not in the proposed miracle but in Jesus’ attitude to social conventions.

18:1–35 Fourth discourse: relationships among the disciples

Already by this stage in his ministry Jesus had formed a distinct group of followers and had spoken of building ‘his church’ (16:18). In such a group there was great potential for good, in mutual care and concern, but also for evil, if relationships broke down. The sayings collected in this discourse focus on this theme. They are as relevant to local church life today as they were among Jesus’ Galilean companions.

18:1–5 True greatness (see Mk. 9:33–37; Lk. 9:46–48). Any human society is concerned to establish a proper ‘pecking order’, and the gospels record several disputes among the disciples on this subject. Over against all conventional ideas of status and importance Jesus offered the model of the little child (cf. 19:14). The point was not any supposedly childish qualities of innocence or unselfishness but the status of the child at the bottom of the pecking order, subject to grown-up authority, dependent and powerless. To accept this lowest rank (humble himself) is to be great, and to treat the least prominent as the most important is to echo the attitude of Jesus (5). Such an attitude is not natural; it involves a radical change (lit. ‘turn round’, conversion).

18:6–9 Stumbling-blocks (cf. Mk. 9:42–48; Lk. 17:1–2). These verses are bound together by the Greek word skandalon (‘stumbling-block’) and its related verb skandalizo (‘to trip up’). The NIV uses ‘cause to sin’ to translate these words, but they are less specific. Anything that gets in the way of effective discipleship is a skandalon, an unkind word or a cold shoulder no less than a ‘cause of sin’.

Such stumbling-blocks may come from others (6–7) or from ourselves (8–9). Both are equally serious. We are responsible for our own spiritual health (hence the vivid imagery of vs

8–9 for drastic remedial measures; cf. 5:29–30); but also for that of our fellow-disciples, and a quick drowning would be more merciful than the fate deserved by one who hinders one of these little ones. This last phrase refers not primarily to children but to disciples in general, who have just been likened to little children. To recognize one another as little ones, and therefore as vulnerable, is to accept our pastoral responsibility for each other, as vs 10–20 will explain.

18:10–14 Pastoral concern (cf. Lk. 15:3–7). The parable of the wandering sheep shows the pastoral concern of your Father in heaven for his little ones (14). But v 10 shows that it was told as a model for the concern we should also have for each other, as little ones. The temptation to look down on less confident or ‘successful’ fellow-disciples, and therefore to ignore their pastoral needs, shows an attitude out of tune with God’s concern.

In Luke’s parable the sheep was already ‘lost’; the focus there is on reaching out to outsiders rather than, as here, on pastoral care for disciples in danger.

Notes. 10 The idea that each individual has an angel to represent them in heaven is found only here in the Bible, though angels elsewhere represent nations (Dn. 10; 12:1) and churches (Rev. 1:20).

18:15–20 ‘If your brother sins’. These verses explain how the principle of vs 10–14 should work out in practice. They are addressed to you (singular), the individual disciple who is aware of his fellow-disciple’s sin and accepts (as vs 10–14 demand) that it is his responsibility to do something about it. The words against you (15) were probably not part of the original text and unhelpfully restrict the scope. Response to personal injury will come into focus in vs 21–35 here it is the brother’s danger, not any effect of his sin on me personally, which is at issue.

The aim must be to win your brother over, restoration, not punishment. To that end, the minimum of publicity must be used. The erring brother must be approached alone or at most with one or two others. Only if that fails is it necessary to involve the church (the local congregation); it is to be expected that the offender will listen to the united conviction of his fellow-disciples. If he does not, the only course open remains a severing of fellowship, though presumably still with the hope that this will jolt him into repentance and restoration.

The congregation’s right, and responsibility, to make such a serious decision rests on the same principle of delegation which was applied to Peter in 16:19, but now the whole congregation shares this authority (you in 18:18 is plural). See the comments on 16:19. The idea that the church on earth may bring the authority of heaven to bear on their situation is continued in vs 19–20, where the continued presence of Jesus among his people ensures that their united prayer will be effective. In the context this refers primarily to prayer for the ‘brother who sins’, but the principle may also be applied more widely. It is not, of course, an automatic guarantee that any petition will be granted, but only such as are compatible with gathering in my name.

Notes. 17 Treat him as you would a pagan (lit. ‘Gentile’) or a tax collector is surprising language from the Jesus who was known as the friend of tax-collectors and whose sympathy for Gentiles has already been demonstrated. It was, presumably, a traditional Jewish expression for ostracism. 20 Cf. 28:20. Such language implies an extraordinary claim for Jesus as more than an historic individual.

18:21–35 On forgiving others (cf. Lk. 17:4). Here the focus moves on to how disciples should respond to a fellow-disciple’s wrong-doing when they themselves are personally affected. It is assumed that the answer lies in forgiveness; the only question is whether there is any limit. Peter’s offer of seven times sounds generous (a later rabbinic discussion suggests three times as reasonable!), but Jesus dismissed any such calculation. Our willingness to forgive should be as limitless as the extravagant vengeance of which Lamech once boasted (Gn. 4:24 is being deliberately echoed in the figures seven and seventy-seven).

This demand is explained and made memorable in the parable which follows in vs 23–34. We forgive because we have been forgiven by God, and no offence against us can remotely compare with the incalculable amount we ourselves have been forgiven. Ten thousand talents combines the largest Greek numeral with the largest unit of currency. Even one talent was a small fortune; ten thousand was beyond the wildest dreams of ordinary people. A hundred denarii is not a negligible amount (a hundred days' wages), but is a mere six-hundred-thousandth of the first sum! Thus, in the light of God's incalculable grace to us, it is ludicrous, as well as wicked, for us to refuse to forgive others. The implied threat of v 34 is made explicit in v 35; God will not treat an unforgiving spirit lightly. This was the message of 6:14–15, and the parable reminds us of the way sins were described as 'debts' in the Lord's Prayer.

Notes. 22 Seventy-seven times is a more natural rendering of the Greek than 'seventy times seven' (490) and is the clear meaning of the Hebrew in Gn. 4:24.

19:1–25:46 Ministry in Judea

19:1–20:34 On the way to Jerusalem

The fateful journey to Jerusalem, and therefore to death, now began. Jesus would not return to Galilee until after his resurrection (28:16). The shadow of the cross grew deeper as the group moved south, and Jesus' teaching continued to re-educate the disciples to prepare them for what was to come.

19:1–12 Teaching on marriage and divorce (see Mk. 10:1–12; cf. Lk. 16:18). In Jewish law a man had the right to divorce his wife (but not the wife her husband) by a simple declaration; there was no trial and no appeal. This was assumed to be the intention of Dt. 24:1–4 (on which see above on 5:31–32), but the 'something indecent' which that passage gave as the grounds for divorce left room for debate. Some teachers restricted this to adultery or other gross sexual misbehaviour, but in common practice, supported by some rabbis, it was virtually a matter of the husband's whim, for any and every reason.

Rather than enter this debate, Jesus again (as in 5:32) declared that divorce, for whatever reason, was incompatible with God's purpose for marriage. In so doing, he set the original intention of the Creator, expressed in Gn. 1:27; 2:24, above the provision of Dt. 24, which was given only because your hearts were hard. The divorce regulations were a concession to deal with the result of sin, not an expression of the way God intended things to be. Divorce might be necessary, but it could never be good. The principle that the two become one flesh can be fulfilled only by unbroken marriage.

This uncompromising position is, however, modified by Matthew, here and in 5:32, by the clause except for marital unfaithfulness. Neither Mark nor Luke includes this much debated clause, and it is sometimes thought to be an attempt by Matthew to soften a total prohibition of divorce which soon proved unworkable in real life. It is more likely, however, that Matthew is simply spelling out what any Jewish reader would have taken for granted, that marital unfaithfulness (which would include not only adultery but also premarital promiscuity) automatically annulled a marriage by creating another 'one-flesh' union. In the OT the penalty for adultery was death, but by NT times a formal annulment of the marriage was the accepted response (cf. Joseph's dilemma in 1:18–19). This was not a voluntary 'divorce' but the necessary recognition that the marriage was already finished.

Jesus' demand for marital faithfulness without an 'escape route' dismayed the disciples. Who could live up to such a demand? Not everyone, Jesus agreed. Some do not have the 'gift' of marriage and are called to celibacy, either by their physical condition (whether congenital or man-made) or by their own choice in the light of the role to which they are called in the kingdom of heaven. In Jewish society it was very unusual to be unmarried (as Jesus was himself), so that this affirmation of voluntary celibacy is important. But marriage, with all its demands, remains the divine intention for those to whom it has been given.

Notes. 11 This word refers here to Jesus' pronouncements in vs 6 and 8, not to the disciples' wry comment in v 10. 12 Renounced marriage is the NIV's paraphrase for 'made themselves eunuchs'; it rightly assumes that Jesus did not mean the phrase to be taken literally.

19:13–15 Little children (see Mk. 10:13–16; Lk. 18:15–17). The disciples may have been simply insensitive and snobbish, or perhaps they were trying to protect Jesus from too much attention. At any rate, they had not yet absorbed his revolutionary scale of values, in which the 'little ones' were the greatest. To say that the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these was not to declare the automatic salvation of all children, but rather (as in 18:1–5) to set up their lowly status as a model for discipleship.

19:16–26 A rich young man (see Mk. 10:17–27; Lk. 18:18–27). Here was another shock for the disciples' scale of values. The man was rich, moral and eager for eternal life, the ideal recruit to the disciple band. To see him sent away by Jesus astonished them. If such a man could not be saved, who could be (25)?

The man's question assumed that eternal life could be achieved by doing some good thing (a conspicuous act of charity?). By emphasizing the goodness of God (17) Jesus questioned the man's idea of goodness; it is found in relation to God, not by 'good deeds' of our own devising. To keep God's commandments is to reflect his goodness, and this the young man had tried to do. But he was himself still conscious that something was missing, and he was looking for some additional thing to do. Jesus' response in v 21 was indeed something to do, but something so radical that it would undermine his whole way of life and leave everything at God's disposal.

Yet Jesus did not require all his followers to be destitute. His demands varied for different individuals and situations. But we should beware of using this truth as a convenient escape route. 'That Jesus did not command all his followers to sell all their possessions gives comfort only to the kind of people to whom he would issue that command' (R. H. Gundry).

Vs 23–26 make matters worse. The humorous picture of a camel trying to get through the eye of a needle means, as the disciples rightly discerned, that it is not simply hard but impossible for a rich person to be saved. The answer lies in recognizing that the humanly impossible is possible for God. Salvation is not earned, either by wealth or by poverty; the kingdom of God overturns all human valuations and possibilities.

Notes. 16–17 In Mark the man called Jesus 'good', and Jesus replied 'Why do you call me good?' In eliminating this part of the dialogue Matthew is guarding against the false deduction that, therefore, Jesus is not good and is not God. 24 The romantic idea that the eye of the needle was the name of a narrow gate in the city wall has no historical foundation. The picture is deliberately grotesque.

19:27–30 The rewards of discipleship (see Mk. 10:28–31; Lk. 18:28–30; cf. 22:28–30). These verses spell out the 'treasure in heaven' which Jesus promised in v 21 to those whose discipleship involves them in economic loss. They will share his kingly glory and authority, when he fulfils the vision of Dn. 7:13–14 (28). They will also be compensated a hundred times both in this life (as they share the family and material resources of the disciple community) and in eternal life (29). Yet even so, they should beware of assuming that their ‘sacrifice’ has earned them a place of special honour (30); the kingdom of heaven is full of surprises, as the following parable shows.

Notes. 28 The renewal of all things suggests the ‘new heavens and new earth’ of the Messianic age. Judging is probably to be understood in the OT sense of ‘ruling’. The idea of the church as the true Israel of the Messianic age is clear here (cf. 16:18).

20:1–16 The parable of unexpected wages. Following a discussion about rewards, and framed by two declarations that the last will be first and the first last (19:30; 20:16), this parable underlines the paradoxical values of the kingdom of heaven. In a society with no welfare provision or trade unions, where unemployment meant starvation, the action of the landowner in employing extra workers whom he did not really need so late in the day was an act of generosity. But even more extraordinary was the rate of pay, which made no economic sense, and understandably provoked grumbling among those who felt unfairly treated. It was not unfair, of course. No-one was underpaid; it was just that some were treated with ‘unreasonable’ generosity. That is what the kingdom of heaven is like. God’s grace is not limited by our ideas of fairness; his gifts are far beyond what we can deserve. But, like the elder brother in the story of the Prodigal Son, we find it hard to abandon our human scale of values (especially when comparing ourselves with others!) and to accept the large-heartedness of God towards those we regard as undeserving. Thus the disciples’ re-education went one stage further, to embrace the divine principle of the first being last and the last first.

20:17–19 Third prediction of Jesus’ death (see Mk. 10:32–34; Lk. 18:31–34). The repeated mention of Jerusalem underlines what lay ahead, and this time the prediction is more detailed, including being condemned to death (i.e. an official execution), turned over to the Gentiles, mocked, flogged and crucified. This is the first time crucifixion has been explicitly mentioned (though 16:24 implied it). The whole catalogue of humiliation and suffering leaves no room for visions of earthly glory for the Son of Man.

20:20–28 Greatness in service (see Mk. 10:35–45; cf. Lk. 22:24–27). In the light of the preceding paragraph, the request of the mother of Zebedee’s sons (James and John) is extraordinary. Was she still thinking of an earthly kingdom, or was she looking forward to the future glory predicted in 19:28 (and conveniently forgetting what must precede that glory)? At any rate, Jesus left them in no doubt that suffering must come first (22–23).

The point of the request was the desire to gain precedence among the Twelve (and particularly to supplant Peter, the other member of the inner group of three who witnessed the transfiguration?). This was what made the others indignant and caused Jesus to give another lesson to them all on the world’s ideas of greatness. Not so with you well sums up the theme of this whole section of the gospel; the kingdom of heaven creates an alternative society which challenges conventional values.

Jesus is himself the supreme example. His status as Son of Man gave him the right to be served (cf. Dn. 7:14), but he came to serve. In this unselfishness he is our model, even though his specific service took a form which could never be repeated, to give his life as a ransom for many. In these words, with their clear echo of Is. 53:10–12, is one of the simplest summaries in the NT of the redemptive purpose of Jesus’ death.

Notes. 22 To drink the cup is a metaphor for suffering; cf. 26:39, 42; also e.g. Is. 51:17; Ezk. 23:31ff.

20:29–34 Two blind men (see Mk. 10:46–52; Lk. 18:35–43). Jericho was the last town before Jerusalem on the route from Galilee. As Jesus approached his goal with a crowd of enthusiastic followers, he found an opportunity to stop and ‘serve’ (28) two needy men whom the crowd thought beneath his notice. He thus exemplified again the unconventional values of the kingdom of heaven. In Mark and Luke this is the story of one man, whom Mark calls Bartimaeus. Perhaps, as in 8:28, Matthew mentioned two men in order to give weight to the testimony that Jesus really is Son of David. Cf. 9:27–31 for another story of two blind men similar to this one. The use of an unusual poetic word for eyes in v 34 and the statement that they followed him may be intended to suggest that the story symbolizes the curing of spiritual blindness which leads to discipleship.

21:1–22 Arrival in Jerusalem

This is Jesus’ first, and last, visit to Jerusalem in Matthew’s story. Ever since 16:21 this has been the goal in view, and now the story reaches its climax, as the Galilean prophet approaches the capital city of Israel, whose temple was the focus of the earthly worship of the one true God. His arrival was marked by three symbolic actions in vs 1–22 which set the scene for the conflicts to follow.

21:1–11 The coming of the King (see Mk. 11:1–11; Lk. 19:28–38). Among the crowds of Galilean pilgrims arriving on foot in Jerusalem for the Passover festival, Jesus chose to make a conspicuous entry on a donkey. Since we have no other record of Jesus riding, this must have been a deliberate act, meant to be noticed. The instructions in vs 1–3 suggest that it had been carefully prepared. It was, as Matthew makes clear, an acted allusion to Zechariah’s prophecy (Zc. 9:9–10) of the coming of the Messianic King.

The disciples and the Galilean crowd recognized the allusion, and turned the arrival into a triumphal procession. Their shouts in v 9 made no secret of their belief that Jesus was the long-awaited Messiah, now coming to set up his reign in Israel’s capital.

The people of Jerusalem were, however, taken aback, and the whole city was stirred, not with enthusiasm but with concern: ‘Who is this?’ Jesus was to them an unknown countryman, little better than a foreigner, from the remote northern province. But the Galilean crowds responded by asserting the claim of ‘their’ prophet, from Nazareth in Galilee. So we see set up the polarization of attitudes to Jesus which during the next week would have some supporting Jesus (21:46) while others shouted for his crucifixion (27:20ff.).

Notes. 2 Only Matthew mentions the colt as well as the donkey. While the poetic language of v 5 does not refer to separate animals, Matthew sees in the presence of the colt a suggestive echo of its wording. 7 The second them does not, of course, mean that Jesus rode both animals, but refers to the cloaks.

21:12–17 Demonstration in the temple (see Mk. 11:11, 15–17; Lk. 19:45–46). The provocative nature of Jesus’ arrival in the city was matched by his arrival in the temple area. This was a huge open space of some 33 acres (13.5 hectares), within which stood the temple itself and associated buildings. In the porticos surrounding this area (not in the temple building) were the stalls of those who changed money for the temple offerings and sold sacrificial animals (including doves). They were there with the permission of the priestly authorities and performed a useful, even necessary, function for pilgrims coming from a distance. But the whole thing had got out of proportion, and worship and prayer were being squeezed out by commercialism. Jesus’ violent onslaught on all concerned (buyers as well as sellers) expressed his conviction that the temple was no longer fulfilling the purpose for which it had been built.

Onlookers who knew their Scriptures would have been reminded of Mal. 3:1–4, and perhaps also of Zc. 14:21 (where ‘Canaanite’ means ‘trader’). The Messiah was purifying the people’s worship in readiness for the great day of the Lord. This, together with his healing of the blind and the lame, was enough to provoke not only popular acclamation but also official resentment. But Jesus offered no apology and made matters worse by justifying the cries of the children who hailed him as Son of David by quoting Ps. 8:2, which is about the praise of God!

21:18–22 The withered fig-tree (see Mk. 11:12–14, 20–24). This apparently pointless act of power is generally understood from its context (and from the way Mark interweaves it with the story of the temple incident) to have a symbolic purpose. The fig-tree which produces leaves and therefore promises fruit but offers nothing to eat is a picture of the empty worship of the temple (cf. Mi. 7:1; Je. 8:13). The withering of the tree is then a visible pointer to the fate of the temple which Jesus predicts in 23:38; 24:2.

It was the sheer power of Jesus’ word that impressed the disciples, and Jesus used the incident as a model for the power available to faith, as in 17:20.

21:23–23:39 Controversies with the Jewish leaders

21:23–27 ‘By what authority?’ (see Mk. 11:27–33; Lk. 20:1–8). After Jesus’ provocative actions an official response was inevitable. It came from the chief priests and the elders, the officials responsible for the temple, who constituted the major part of the Sanhedrin. Jesus was implicitly claiming an authority which threatened their supremacy and must justify it if he could (cf. the earlier demands for a ‘sign’). But again he refused to be drawn. His counter-question about John the Baptist effectively put them in a corner. But it was not just a clever evasion, for it implied a continuity between John’s mission and that of Jesus (as has already been indicated in 11:7–19; 17:11–13). If John really was God’s messenger, which they dared not deny, then Jesus was no less. Jesus went on (31–32) to point out the results of their failure to respond to John’s mission and, therefore, also to his own.

21:28–22:14 Three pointed parables. It is important to take these three parables together and to read them in this context as Jesus’ response to the hostility of the Jewish authorities. Each of the parables speaks of one group of people losing their privileged position and being replaced by those whom they would have despised. The theme which runs through them is, therefore, the question of who are the true people of God, and they all suggest that a fundamental change is taking place.

(a) 21:28–32 The two sons. The simple story illustrates the difference between saying and doing and indicates that God is more impressed by our performance than by our promises (cf. the repeated message of 7:15–27). Jesus applied it directly to you (the chief priests and elders, v 23) and contrasted their response to God’s messenger John with that of those they most despised, the tax collectors and prostitutes. Because these ‘no-hopers’ had believed John, they would go first into the kingdom of God. Whether the unbelieving authorities would follow them in is not spelled out, but the next parable gives a clearer answer.

(b) 21:33–46 The tenants of the vineyard (see Mk. 12:1–12; Lk. 20:9–19). Here the theme of replacement is explicit. The story is of an absentee landowner and the tenant farmers who are obliged to pay him a fixed proportion of the produce as their rent. Their failure to do so is in itself sufficient reason for them to be replaced; the murder of his son makes matters far more serious.

The point of the story was obvious to the chief priests and the Pharisees (45) and would have been so to anyone who knew the book of Isaiah, where the memorable parable of the vineyard

(Is. 5:1–7) symbolized Israel’s failure to live up to God’s expectations. But the focus here was not on Israel as a whole but on its leadership, whose execution of God’s son was about to bring to a head the repeated rejection of his prophets in the past. They could now expect only a wretched end, while others took their place.

Vs 42–44 work out the implications of the story. V 42 (quoting Ps. 118:22) illustrates the divine reversal which was soon to happen, when the one rejected by Israel’s leaders was to be proved to be the one chosen for the place of highest honour. V 44 takes up the same metaphor with allusions to the destructive stones of Is. 8:14–15 and Dn. 2:34–35, 44–45. V 43 is more direct: the kingdom symbolized by the vineyard belongs to God not to them, and he will entrust it to someone more responsible. A people suggests not just a change of leadership but that the very composition of the people of God was to change (along the lines suggested in 8:11–12). It was not, however, a simple matter of Jews being replaced by Gentiles (that would have needed a reference to ‘peoples’ in the plural, the normal Greek term for Gentiles); rather a new community of God’s people was being created (cf. on 16:18), in which both Jews and Gentiles would find their place. What would characterize them was not their nationality, but that they would produce fruit (cf. 3:8, 10; 7:15–20; 12:33–37; 13:8, 26; and especially 21:18–20).

(c) 22:1–14 The wedding feast (cf. Lk. 14:16–24). The theme of replacement is even stronger here. Those who had been invited, but who refused repeated calls and even murdered the messengers, correspond to the first tenants in the previous parable, and the substitute guests to the ‘new people’ of 21:43. And as in 21:31, the newcomers are a pretty unlikely group, from the street corners, including both good and bad. It is another parable of the turning of the tables, of the first being last and the last first.

The story becomes quite bizarre, with the murder of the messengers and a military campaign taking place while the dinner gets cold! To burn their city is a very extreme reaction to a refused dinner invitation. But parables are imaginary stories, and do not need to mirror real life, and the symbolism is clear enough. Israel’s refusal (in its leaders) to respond to God’s call through Jesus would lead to the destruction of their city, Jerusalem, to which Jesus had come in order to be rejected and killed (16:21). The point is spelled out in 23:38; 24:2.

Vs 11–14 introduce a new note: even among the ‘new people’ there is no automatic guarantee of salvation; they include both good and bad (cf. the theme of 7:15–27). Even someone from the streets should have put on the clean white clothes which were appropriate for a wedding; to fail to do so is to insult the host. So while the kingdom of heaven is open to anyone, it does make a demand on them (cf. the need to ‘produce fruit’ in 21:43). There is no place for those who will not take their privilege seriously. V 14 then summarizes the situation not only for the originally invited guests but even for the newcomers as well.

Notes. 3–4 It was customary to send out both an advance invitation (which they had accepted) and a messenger to say the meal was ready. 11 There is no historical foundation for Augustine’s suggestion that wedding clothes were provided by the host.

22:15–22 Roman taxation (see Mk. 12:13–17; Lk. 20:20–26). The next three confrontations were initiated by Jesus’ opponents, in order to trap him into damaging statements which could be used against him. The first concerns the Roman poll-tax, which was fiercely resented by patriotic Jews as a symbol of their political subjection. Some twenty-five years earlier a major revolt against this tax had been sparked off by a Galilean popular leader, Judas (Acts 5:37), from whom the Zealot group took its inspiration. It was thus a loaded question: to support the tax was to be unpatriotic, while to oppose it was politically dangerous (especially for a Galilean popular leader).

In getting them to show him a denarius, however, Jesus exposed them as hypocrites, since no patriotic Jew should have been carrying this coin, with its 'idolatrous' portrait of the emperor and its inscription giving him the title 'Son of God'. If they were using Caesar's money, let them pay his poll-tax! Jesus thus distanced himself decisively from the Zealot position, and implied that loyalty to a pagan government was not incompatible with loyalty to God. He did not say what should be done when the two loyalties conflict.

22:23–33 The resurrection (see Mk. 12:18–27; Lk. 20:27–40). Unlike the Pharisees, who initiated the last 'test', the Sadducees held no belief in life after death, since it was not taught in the five books of Moses, the only Scriptures they accepted as authoritative. They felt this was an area where Jesus' teaching could be made to look ridiculous. Their 'question', based on the levirate law of Dt. 25:5–6, was not a serious enquiry but an attempt to poke fun at this new-fangled theological idea of resurrection. It does, however, raise a real pastoral issue for those who have been married more than once.

Jesus' reply was two-fold. On the specific issue raised, he pointed out (30) that resurrection life is not a mere continuation of life on earth. His words are sometimes read as offering a heavenly life which is less happy than married life on earth. On the contrary, it is a richer life. The exclusiveness of marriage is appropriate to mortal life, within which there is the need to procreate children. But those who are raised to immortal life, like the angels, can continue to enjoy loving relationships without the restriction and jealousy which the earthly marriage bond rightly involves.

On the more fundamental question of resurrection itself, Jesus found a basis for this belief even in the Sadducees' own Scriptures, the books of Moses (31–32). For God to describe himself in relation to the patriarchs who died long before (Ex. 3:6) implies that there is a continuing relationship; God's covenant with his people is not frustrated by death.

22:34–40 The greatest commandment (see Mk. 12:28–31; cf. Lk. 10:25–27). The Pharisees' second question was an important one and received an important answer. But it was still a 'test', since a less careful answer could have left Jesus open to the charge of trying to 'abolish [parts of] the law' (5:17). Both Dt. 6:5 and Lv. 19:18 were often quoted in rabbinic ethical discussion, but to bring them together like this as a summary of all the law and the prophets (cf. 7:12 for an alternative summary) was a brilliantly creative idea. In focusing on the two halves of the Ten Commandments (duty to God and duty to our neighbour) it offers a foundation for all our living; and by summing up that duty as love, it goes beyond the specific requirements of the law to the God-like attitude which must underlie them.

22:41–46 'Son of David?' (see Mk. 12:35–37; Lk. 20:41–44). Now Jesus again takes the initiative against the Pharisees. His question sounds like academic theology: is Son of David a proper title for the Messiah? But he has himself been repeatedly hailed by this title, most recently and publicly in 21:9, 15–16, where he clearly accepted, even provoked, this response. So it was his own status which was at issue.

Son of David was a traditional Messianic title, and one which not only occurs frequently in Matthew's narrative but formed the basis of the presentation of Jesus as Messiah in ch. 1. It is not likely then that these verses are meant to undermine that whole argument. Rather the point is that the Messiah is more than merely a son of David, as is shown by David's words in Ps. 110:1. The same text is used again in 26:64 to claim for Jesus a superhuman authority.

Here again, Jesus was warning people against judging his mission in traditional terms. Far from being enthroned in Jerusalem as a king like David, he would soon be rejected by his people.

But even then, on the cross, he would be recognized at last not as a son of David (the title does not occur again), but as ‘Son of God’ (27:54).

Notes. 43 The argument depends on the belief that David was the author of Ps. 110 and that he was speaking about the future Messiah. Both points are disputed by most OT scholars today, but would have been taken for granted in Jesus’ time.

23:1–12 A warning against scribes and Pharisees (cf. Mk. 12:38–39; Lk. 20:45–46). Jesus now goes on the offensive, and ‘offensive’ is not too strong a word for much of the language he uses in ch. 23. Only Matthew includes this concentrated attack on the Jewish religious authorities at this point. It shows Jesus as a fierce controversialist, quite willing to make enemies when the cause demanded it. And the cause was important, for what was at issue was the contrast between the values of the kingdom of heaven and the superficial approach to religion which has already been unmasked especially in 5:17–48 and 15:1–20.

The target was the scribes (teachers of the law, a class of professional interpreters of Scriptures and of rabbinic tradition), and the Pharisees, a religious ‘party’ to which most scribes belonged, and which was devoted to scrupulous observance of the full range of rabbinic legislation. They were, generally speaking, earnest, moral people, and Jesus’ attack here seems to many harsh and unfair. But his concern was not so much with their performance as individuals, but with the system of religious observance which they upheld. In insisting on a huge and growing corpus of rules and regulations, they were in danger of ignoring inner attitudes and motives and of putting adherence to the system before the will of God. It was this, rather than conscious deceit (though v 3 does charge them with this too), which made them, in one of Matthew’s favourite words, hypocrites.

In vs 2–7, however, the focus is on their desire to make a good impression (cf. 6:1–6, 16–18) by flaunting their status and authority. They were unconcerned with the problems their teaching was creating for ordinary people who tried to follow it (the heavy loads of v 4 refer to the practical demands which scribal legislation made on daily living; cf. 11:28–30). In contrast with this (8–12), disciples must not look for status but be happy to take the lowest place and serve others. This last section picks up the theme of 20:25–28, but whereas there the contrast was with ‘the rulers of the Gentiles’, here it is with the supposed leaders of the people of God. A desire for pretentious titles and positions of influence can still today be a signal that disciples are straying from the values of the kingdom of heaven.

Notes. 2 Moses’ seat represents the teaching authority of those responsible for interpreting the laws of Moses. 3 After 15:1–20 it would be surprising if Jesus really meant that everything in scribal teaching must be obeyed. The balance of the sentence falls rather on the second half: ‘Do what they say, if you like, but don’t do what they do.’ 5 Phylacteries (scroll-containers bound on the forehead and arm when praying) and tassels are not condemned as such (Jesus wore the latter; see 9:20, where the same Greek word is used); but they offered great scope for showing off and gaining a reputation for piety!

23:13–36 The scribes and Pharisees denounced (cf. Lk. 11:39–52). The previous verses were addressed to the crowd and disciples. Jesus went on to address the scribes and Pharisees direct, in the form of seven ‘woes’, which build up to a powerful climax of repudiation of their leadership. The scene is thus set for the prediction of disaster for Jerusalem with which the chapter ends.

The first woe (13) describes their approach to religion as a hindrance to those who really wanted to please God. Yet the second (15) recognizes that they were keen to win converts (to Judaism). The problem was that their religious system made people worse rather than better (son of hell means one who belongs there; cf. 'sons of the kingdom', 8:12). The rest of the woes then give examples of how perverted their religious values were.

Oaths (16–22) offered plenty of scope for legalistic distinctions and were the subject of much rabbinic discussion. Jesus had already shown that they should not be needed at all (5:33–37). Here he added that attempts to distinguish between more and less 'serious' oaths were futile, since all ultimately go back to God as the one whose name is invoked.

The fourth woe (23–24) does not condemn their tithing practice as such (NB without neglecting the former), but points out the absurd lack of proportion involved (strain out a gnat but swallow a camel!) when they went into meticulous detail over tithing garden herbs but forgot about justice, mercy and faithfulness. The prophets had often protested similarly against a religion which focused on ritual and forgot the things that really matter (cf. Mi. 6:6–8).

The fifth and sixth woes (25–26, 27–28) similarly deal with the priority of inward purity over outward cleansing. This is the issue which Jesus had already raised in 15:11, 17–20 in connection with ritual hand-washing. The reference in v 27 may be to ossuaries, the small chests into which human bones were collected, and which were often given a lime plaster covering to make them beautiful.

The seventh woe (29–31) leads into a devastating paragraph declaring that Israel's rebellion against God has now reached its culmination, in this generation (cf. on 12:38–45), so that the judgment, which had for long been brewing, must now at last fall on them. It was easy, with the passage of time, for the people to distance themselves from the way their forefathers had treated the prophets and the righteous and to build monuments in their honour, but in fact nothing had changed. They were still descendants of those forefathers, in attitude as well as in genealogy, as their treatment of God's messengers in their own day showed (34). So as they fill up the measure of the sins of Israel, the climax had come, and the righteous blood of all God's spokesmen in the past would come upon their generation. (cf. 27:25 for this way of expressing responsibility for death and liability to punishment.)

Notes. 34 Prophets, wise men and teachers (scribes) were God's spokesmen in OT times. Jesus described his own disciples in similar terms; they could expect no better fate than their Master. 35 Abel and Zechariah were the first and last martyrs mentioned in the OT (since 2 Chronicles is the last book of the Hebrew canon), and in both stories the call for the death to be avenged is explicit (Gn. 4:10; 2 Ch. 24:22). The Zechariah in 2 Ch. 24 is described as son of Jehoiada, while Berechiah was the father of a different Zechariah (Zc. 1:1). In neither case do we have enough information on the family to give a confident explanation of the confusion (which occurs elsewhere in Jewish writings).

23:37–39 The fate of Jerusalem (see Lk. 13:34–35). The seventh woe widened the scope from the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees to the total guilt of Israel in its rejection of God's messengers. Now the inevitable conclusion is drawn. Jerusalem had rejected the appeal of God's last and greatest messenger, and now the judgment must fall. In particular, your house (the temple) would be left desolate, not only destroyed (see 24:2) but abandoned by God, as had happened many years before when Jeremiah's appeal was refused (v 38 echoes Je. 12:7).

Jesus pronounced this 'sentence' not with vindictive glee but with sorrowful regret (37). He had hoped for a better response, Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord, and indeed that was how he had in fact been brought into the city by his Galilean followers (21:9). Only when Jerusalem was ready to echo that welcome could they hope to see me again. He did not say when this would be, if at all, and the Greek for until is deliberately indefinite ('if and when').

24:1–25:46 Fifth discourse: judgment

The subject of this last great collection of Jesus' teaching follows naturally from the preceding chapter, with its climax in the prediction that judgment was about to fall on Jerusalem. It is from that point that it begins, with the more explicit prediction of the total destruction of the temple in v 2. The discourse that follows was in response to the disciples' question, 'When will this happen?' But their question in Matthew's version (not in Mark's or Luke's) links the destruction of the temple (which in fact occurred in AD 70, when the Romans suppressed the Jewish revolt) with a second event, your coming (Gk. parousia) and the end of the age.

The chief problem in the interpretation of ch. 24 is to know which of these two events is in view at each point (by ch. 25 it is generally agreed that the focus has moved from the temple to Jesus' parousia). The following commentary is based on the view that up to v 35 Jesus was speaking (often in highly symbolic language) about the destruction of the temple, which was to happen (as indeed it did) before this generation had passed away (34). The unknown day or hour which is introduced in v 36 is then the beginning of his answer to the second question about his parousia (the word is used again in vs 37 and 39). Most interpreters think that the parousia theme begins earlier, including at least vs 29–31. Space does not allow a full argument for the view here presented (for a fuller discussion see R.T. France, Matthew (TNTC, IVP, 1985).

24:1–2 The temple to be destroyed (see Mk. 13:1–2; Lk. 21:5–6). When Matthew mentions that Jesus left the temple, and went on to the Mount of Olives opposite (3), he may have in mind not only Jesus's withdrawal from Jewish public life but also Ezekiel's vision of the glory of God abandoning the doomed temple and resting on the Mount of Olives (Ezk. 10:18–19; 11:22–23).

The temple buildings, recently rebuilt by Herod, were one of the architectural wonders of the ancient world. But Jesus' prophecy of not one stone left on another was to be literally fulfilled; all that survived the Roman assault was part of the platform on which they were built (including the 'Wailing Wall').

24:3–14 Beware of premature expectation (cf. Mk. 13:3–13; Lk. 21:7–19). While many readers search this chapter eagerly for 'signs of the end', the theme of much of it, especially this section, is the danger of jumping too quickly to conclusions that 'the end' (in whatever sense) is imminent.

Before AD 70, many nationalist rebels set themselves up as leaders of God's people (4–5), thus usurping Jesus' place as Messiah (in my name). Similarly (6–8), there were wars and natural disasters during that period, as there have been at all periods of history. While these were the beginning of birth-pains, they were not to be interpreted as specific signs that the end had arrived.

During this interim period the disciples must expect to be persecuted, as Jesus had already spelled out in 10:17–23; but whereas in ch. 10 the focus was on Jewish persecution, there is now a wider focus, including all nations. Vs 10–14 paint a disturbing picture of crisis among God's people as well as chaos outside. They call not for calculation of dates but for faithfulness. True disciples will not allow the adverse conditions to affect their love (12), their endurance (13) and their faithful preaching of this gospel of the kingdom (14).

V 14 does not specify which of the two aspects of the disciples' question the end is meant to refer to. In the period before AD 70 the gospel was in fact preached around much of the Mediterranean area (which is what most Greek-speakers would have understood by the whole world at that time). (Cf. Rom. 15:19, written in the mid-fifties, after which Paul's mission continued to spread, not to mention that of the other apostles.) Before the temple was destroyed the Christian church had already become a truly international community. Since then, of course, the gospel has been preached much more widely, as the known world has increased, though it is questionable how far the testimony is available literally to all nations even today.

Notes. 3 Parousia ('coming') is used mainly for formal visits by those in authority. In the NT it usually (but not always) refers to Jesus' predicted 'second coming'. For the end of the age cf. 13:39, 40, 49.

24:15–28 The coming crisis in Judea (see Mk. 13:14–23; cf. Lk. 17:23–24, 37; 21:20–24). Vs 4–14 have warned against too easily identifying 'signs of the end'; now the question of v 3 begins to be more directly answered. Vs 15–22 speak of the coming siege of Jerusalem, which would precede the temple's destruction; while vs 23–28 again warn against assuming that even that terrible period was the time of Jesus' parousia and the end of the age.

The abomination that causes desolation is an expression in Dn. 11:31; 12:11 (cf. 9:27) for the pagan statue which Antiochus Epiphanes set up in the Jerusalem temple when he deliberately desecrated it in 167 BC. (See the appropriate sections in the article on Daniel.) Jesus predicted some similar act of sacrilege as the precursor to the temple's destruction and the signal for God's people to escape while they could. What form it would take is left deliberately unclear (let the reader understand). Suggestions made with hindsight include a desecration of the temple by the Zealots in the winter of 67(8, of which Josephus speaks, or the arrival of the (idolatrous) Roman standards in the temple in 70. Lk. 21:20 speaks instead of 'Jerusalem being surrounded by armies'. The Roman siege marked the beginning of the desecration of the holy place.

In the light of Josephus' gruesome account of the horrors of the siege in AD 66–70, the words of v 21 (echoing Dn. 12:1) are not much of an exaggeration. But even so, God was not absent, but would cut short those days for the sake of the elect, i.e. to enable his people to survive.

A time of chaos would offer a renewed opportunity for the sort of impostors already predicted in v 5. The fact that they could support their claim with great signs and miracles is a useful warning against drawing too hasty conclusions from alleged signs and wonders today (cf. 7:22–23).

Similarly, Jesus' followers should beware of claims that he himself had returned secretly, in the desert or the inner rooms. His parousia, when it comes, will be no secret affair but as obvious as a flash of lightning. It is clear, therefore, that in this part of the discourse Jesus was not talking about the parousia, as some interpretations suggest; v 27 is saying precisely that this period is not that of the parousia. As the presence of vultures indicates clearly where there is a carcass, so there will be nothing secret about the parousia of the Son of Man.

Notes. 20 In winter the roads would be impassable, and on the Sabbath gates would be shut and provisions unobtainable.

24:29–35 The climax of the coming crisis (see Mk. 13:24–31; Lk. 21:25–33). These verses are often understood as referring to the parousia, and thus as moving to the second part of the disciples' question. But immediately after does not leave room for a long delay, nor does the explicit time-scale given in v 34. The word parousia does not occur in this section but is prominently reintroduced in the new paragraph which begins at v 36, where its unknown time is contrasted with the clear statement that the events of this paragraph will take place within this generation. This section is therefore in direct continuity with what has gone before, the account of the siege of Jerusalem. Here we reach its climax.

The words of vs 29–31 are almost entirely woven together from OT prophetic texts. V 29 is drawn from Is. 13:10 and 34:4, where the language of cosmic upheaval symbolized the political fall of pagan nations. The language about the Son of Man coming on the clouds is drawn from Dn. 7:13–14, which, as we have already seen (on 10:23; 16:28; 19:28) points to the vindication and enthronement of Jesus (rather than to his parousia). V 31 is based on passages which refer to the promised return of Israelites from exile.

In this context, therefore, this poetic language appropriately refers to the great changes which were about to take place in the world, when Jerusalem and its temple were destroyed. It speaks of the Son of Man entering into his kingship, and his angels gathering in his new people from all the earth. The fall of the temple is thus presented, in highly allusive language, as the end of the old order, to be replaced by the new régime of Jesus, the Son of Man, and the international growth of his church, the new people of God.

All this would happen very soon, once the preliminary signs of vs 15–21 have occurred, just as summer inevitably follows quickly once the leaves appear on the fig-tree. Within this generation it would all be over; we have Jesus' word for it!

Notes. 30 Sign translates a Greek word which elsewhere means banner; this, like the trumpet of v 31, is military imagery for the triumph of the Son of Man. All the nations of the earth is better translated 'all the tribes of the land' (of Palestine). The words are drawn from Zc. 12:10, where the picture is of Israel mourning, tribe by tribe, over 'the one they have pierced'. 31 The OT passages drawn on are mainly Is. 27:13; Dt. 30:4; and Zc. 2:6. 34 The NIV mg. offers 'race' as an alternative to generation. This suggestion is prompted more by embarrassment on the part of those who think v 30 refers to the parousia rather than by any natural sense of the word genea!

24:36–51 The unexpected coming of the Son of Man (cf. Mk. 13:32–37; Lk. 17:26–27, 34–35; 12:42–46). All talk of signs and times now disappears, as we turn from the events of this generation to the parousia. The only thing which may be said with conviction about the time of the parousia is that it will come when it is not expected!

V 36 is remarkable not only as the only admission of ignorance by Jesus, but also, paradoxically, because it at the same time places him above the angels and second only to the Father. This view of the status of the Son is equalled in this gospel only in 11:27 and 28:19.

If the time is unknown, people will be caught unprepared, as in the days of Noah. There will be only two groups, the prepared (who are saved) and the unprepared (who are lost). Vs 40–41 illustrate with vivid pictures from everyday life how this basic division will separate those whose situation is otherwise identical. The way to be ready is not to try to calculate the date, for that is impossible (just as a thief does not announce his time of arrival), but to be always keeping watch.

It is, however, impossible to live life on constant alert. So vs 45–51 explain in a parable what 'being ready' means. When the master leaves a servant in charge during his absence, he does not expect to find him waiting at the door when he returns, but rather getting on with the job entrusted to him. Neither of the two servants portrayed has advance knowledge of the master's return; the difference is in the way he finds them behaving. Our 'readiness' for the coming of Jesus is not in excited speculation but in faithful stewardship.

Notes. 47 The themes of reward and punishment constantly recur in Matthew's gospel. The reward for faithful service is greater responsibility (cf. 25:21, 23).

25:1–13 The parable of the bridesmaids. This parable continues the theme of readiness, and it concludes in v 13 with words which directly echo 24:42. It further underlines the division between the ready and the unready.

The scene is a village wedding, with the virgins (perhaps bridesmaids in our sense, or friends or servants of the bridegroom) waiting to escort the bridegroom in a torch-light procession at the end of the ceremony, as he brings his bride home. The lamps are probably torches made of oil-soaked rags wrapped on a stick, which would burn for several minutes before being dipped in oil again. Without a further supply of oil they would go out as soon as they were lit (8).

An important part of the story is the delay: the church must be prepared to wait for the parousia. All ten virgins fell asleep during the wait, so the point (as with the two servants in 24:45–51) is not that we should be on constant alert but that we must have the necessary provision for when the time comes. This parable does not spell out what that provision is, but the next one offers a hint.

At the end of the parable the story takes on the colour of its application, the possibility of ultimate exclusion from the kingdom of heaven; v 12 ominously echoes the words of 7:23.

25:14–30 The parable of the talents (cf. Lk. 19:11–27). Like the parable of the two servants in 24:45–51, this one envisages a master going away and leaving his servants with responsibilities to fulfil. Again there is a long time (19) to wait, and the issue is who will be ready for the master's return. This parable, however, unlike the last, suggests what that readiness must be. It is not to be in passive waiting but in getting on with the job and making the most of the opportunities entrusted to us.

Talent is simply the name of a (very large) sum of money, in modern terms equivalent to several thousand pounds. It is this parable which has given the word a metaphorical meaning in English, as it has been applied to the God-given gifts and abilities which we are responsible for using. This is probably a valid application of the story, but we should not imagine that the Greek word in itself conveys anything more than its literal monetary meaning.

Different amounts (though all very large) were given to each servant, according to his ability, and the return expected was in proportion to the sum entrusted. God recognizes that we are all different and expects of us only what is appropriate. It is significant that the two successful servants receive identical commendations from the master (21, 23), even though the scale of their original responsibility, and therefore of their achievement, is different. But to have a lesser 'gift' does not excuse us from appropriate effort. The fault of the third servant was that he did not recognize his master's intention, and opted for safety instead of service. Hoping to avoid doing anything wrong, he finished up by not doing anything right.

While the third servant's description of the master as a grasping capitalist (24) is not meant to be an allegorical description of God, God does expect, and reward, creative use of the opportunities for service which are open to us. If we mistakenly view God as a hard taskmaster it will be hard for us to respond to him in a loving and open way. We are to use his gifts responsibly, but also adventurously. That is the way to be ready for the parousia.

25:31–46 The last judgment. As judgment has been the theme throughout this discourse, it ends appropriately with this terrific description of the Son of Man enthroned in glory, judging all the nations. Though often described as a parable, it is not an illustrative story, but a vision of the future. The only 'parable' element in it is the simile as a shepherd separates the sheep from the goats in vs 32–33.

The language about the Son of Man coming, glory, angels, throne and judging all derives from Dn. 7:9–14. This is the ultimate outworking of the kingship and authority which that prophecy envisaged for the Son of Man, and which Jesus has already referred to in several connections (10:23; 16:28; 19:28; 24:30). The gathering of all the nations for judgment recalls the vision in Joel 3:2; but there the judge is God himself. The whole passage calmly attributes to Jesus the authority and kingship which in the OT belong to God alone.

This passage is often understood to teach that ultimate salvation is based on acts of kindness alone, so that there is nothing specifically Christian about the criteria of judgment. But that is to ignore the important description of the recipients of this kindness as the least of these brothers of mine (40; cf. v 45). This phrase suggests that it is not just anyone that the righteous have helped and the others have ignored: it is disciples in need. The phrase the least reminds us of the ‘little ones’ of 10:42; 18:6, 10, 14, and we have seen above that this is a term for Jesus’ disciples. When Jesus says that in helping them you did it for me, this moving identification of Jesus with his ‘brothers’ recalls the principle of 10:40–42, where to receive the disciples is to receive Jesus, and it is a cup of water given to ‘one of these little ones because he is my disciple’ which will be rewarded. In that case, the criterion of judgment is not mere philanthropy (good as that is), but people’s response to the kingdom of heaven as they have met it in the person of Jesus’ ‘brothers’.

Notes. 34 The kingdom prepared for you may refer simply to entering Jesus’ kingdom, but the language of inheritance suggests rather that they themselves share that kingship (as in 19:28), just as a share of the master’s authority was given to the successful servants in vs 21, 23. 41, 46 Eternal can mean ‘everlasting’, but more generally it means ‘of the age to come’; it is a statement of quality rather than duration. These verses, therefore, do not settle the dispute between those who understand hell as endless conscious torment and those who see it as annihilation or loss of existence.

26:1–28:20 The death and resurrection of Jesus

The scene has now been set for the climax of the drama. Jesus had thrown down the gauntlet by his dramatic arrival in Jerusalem, and in the confrontation which inevitably followed he repudiated Israel’s official leadership and declared God’s judgment on ‘this generation’. The response came quickly, and the events foretold in 16:21 and 20:18–19 now follow. At their centre was the cross, but that would not be the end of the story. Jesus would be violently suppressed, and yet Matthew does not allow us to see him as the helpless victim of circumstances. Rather he stresses that Jesus’ fate was the fulfilment of God’s purpose set out in Scripture; and the book ends with a dramatic reversal of the position, as the Son of Man enters into his kingship and launches the church’s mission to all nations.

26:1–46 Preparation for the passion

26:1–5 Setting the scene (cf. Mk. 14:1–2; Lk. 22:1–2). The Passover festival commemorated God’s rescue of his people from slavery in Egypt and in particular the sacrifice of the Passover lamb to protect them from death (Ex. 12:1–30). There is an obvious symbolism in the fact that Jesus would be crucified at this festival, as vs 17–29 make more explicit.

Jesus’ presence in Jerusalem (for the first time in Matthew’s story) gave the chief priests and elders the opportunity to kill him, as indeed the Pharisees had proposed earlier in Galilee (12:14). But Jesus had plenty of supporters (see 21:9, 15, 46), and a riot among the people was a serious possibility if he was publicly arrested. There was to be an unexpected solution to this dilemma (14–16).

26:6–13 Anointing at Bethany (see Mk. 14:3–9; cf. Lk. 7:36–50). Anointing suggests Jesus’ role as Messiah (which means ‘anointed one’) but at the same time foreshadows his death (12). The woman’s extravagant act thus symbolizes Jesus’ approaching Messianic suffering. It was an act of love and devotion, a beautiful thing, despite its grim message. But the disciples could see only waste. Jesus’ reply was not intended to belittle care for the poor, and v 11 implies that this would be a continuing concern for his followers. But even this proper concern could get out of proportion, if it ruled out the spontaneous extravagance of love in the special circumstances of their Master's approaching sacrifice. Individual acts of charity may soon be forgotten, but what she has done would remain a model of devotion wherever this gospel is preached (cf. 24:14).

Notes. 6 Bethany was the home of Martha and Mary, and Jn. 12:3 names the woman as Mary. This Simon is otherwise unknown; perhaps Jesus had cured him of his earlier leprosy. 7 The perfume was spikenard, an oil imported from India, which was sometimes used for anointing the dead (hence v 12) but was also valued as a luxury cosmetic.

26:14–16 The treachery of Judas (see Mk. 14:10–11; Lk. 22:3–6). Judas' inside knowledge of the movements of Jesus and his group during their stay in Jerusalem enabled him to show the authorities when and where Jesus could be arrested secretly (see v 5). Thirty silver coins was the sum due as compensation to an owner for the loss of a slave (Ex. 21:32), and the phrase is used for the 'wages' of the rejected shepherd (Messiah) in Zc. 11:12, which Matthew refers to in 27:9–10. This was a substantial sum (some four months' wages), but few have believed that money alone caused Judas to change sides. More likely he was already thinking of leaving Jesus, and decided to cash in on his opportunity. No-one knows why he changed sides. He was probably the only non-Galilean among the Twelve and so may have felt increasingly out of place, especially when the Galilean group came south to Jerusalem. Perhaps he had become disillusioned by the style of Jesus' ministry, especially if he, like Peter, had harboured nationalistic hopes. Maybe he had even concluded that Jesus was a false Messiah, so that it was his religious duty to stop him.

26:17–30 The Last Supper (see Mk. 14:12–26; Lk. 22:7–23). This was a Passover meal, with all the historical and theological symbolism that involved. It was now to be given a new meaning through the death of Jesus, which would make this meal thereafter the model for the central act of Christian worship.

The venue had apparently been prearranged; Jesus did have some supporters even in Jerusalem.

This is the first time Jesus presented the shocking idea that one of you will betray me. Their alarm (very sad is an unnecessarily weak translation) was such that none of them dared trust themselves. Jesus' reply in v 23 was not a specific identification of the traitor, since all of them would be sharing the same common cup, and his exchange with Judas in v 25 was presumably private. But even though he did not identify the traitor openly, he knew who it would be, and Judas' disingenuous 'Surely not I?' was answered clearly enough. Jesus could thus easily have revealed his betrayer's identity, and the disciples could have ensured that Judas did not get away to fulfil his bargain. Jesus had, however, already accepted that he had to undergo what is written about him (24), and he did not hinder it.

Jesus went on to use the bread and wine of the Passover meal as visual aids to explain the meaning of his coming death. If the broken bread represented his body, the reality of his coming death was put beyond doubt. But in telling them to eat that bread he indicated that in some sense they were involved in his death. The words over the cup made the point clearer, since his blood was to be poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins. These words echo phrases from Is. 53:10–12, and the idea of a death which brings forgiveness of sin is firmly based on that chapter. In eating and drinking, Jesus' followers were to be identified with his death, and thus to experience the forgiveness he would die to achieve. In this way the new covenant prophesied by Je. 31:31–34 (in which forgiveness of sin is an essential element) would be established through Jesus' blood. As the first Passover had led to a covenant which marked Israel out as the people of God, so now a new people of God was being formed. V 29 then looks forward, beyond Jesus' imminent death, to what it will achieve, the Messianic banquet which he and his disciples (and the Father) will share.

Notes. 17 John's gospel indicates that Jesus' 'Passover' was held on the evening before the official Passover (presumably because he knew that he would be dead by then). This would explain why the gospels make no mention of a lamb, normally the central feature of the Passover meal, since it could not be ritually killed before the official date. The synoptic gospels are generally supposed to disagree with John's dating, but this is not necessarily so. Since the Jewish day began at sunset, an evening meal held on the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread would be on the evening on which that day began; the following evening, the official Passover meal, would be the next 'day' in Jewish terms. 24 Note that what is done according to God's revealed will is, nonetheless, also the responsibility of the one who does it.

26:31–35 Peter's denial predicted (see Mk. 14:27–31; cf. Lk. 22:31–34). Not only Jesus' fate, but that of the disciples too, is written. But v 32 restores hope, both with yet another clear prediction of Jesus' resurrection and also with a pointer away from the doomed city of Jerusalem to Galilee, where the risen Messiah will re-establish his reign (see 28:7, 16–20). But before that Peter would conspicuously fail, despite his self-confidence. Note, however, that while Peter's failure was specifically predicted and recorded (69–75), he was not alone in it: the other disciples shared both his confidence (35) and his failure (31).

Notes. 31 Zc. 13:7 is one of a series of mysterious passages which relate to a rejected and suffering Messiah; cf. Zc. 12:10 quoted in Mt. 24:30, and Zc. 11:12–13 in Mt. 27:9–10 (also Zc. 9:9 in Mt. 21:4–5).

26:36–46 The garden of Gethsemane (see Mk. 14:32–42; cf. Lk. 22:39–46). This is holy ground. We have here a privileged glimpse into Jesus' intimate relation with his Father and a sobering insight into the cost of his mission.

The olive orchard called Gethsemane, just outside the city boundary, was the group's regular 'camp-site' during this week in Jerusalem. (Most Passover pilgrims had to sleep out, as the city was extremely overcrowded during the festival.) By going somewhere else that night they could have foiled Judas' plan, but again Jesus chose not to evade the fate he had predicted. These verses show that he accepted it not as a regrettable necessity but as his Father's will.

This was not, however, a calm, untroubled resignation. Sorrowful and troubled is a weak translation; better 'in anguish and distress'. The prospect of his coming suffering (see on 20:22 for the meaning of cup) repelled him, and he pleaded for some other way, if God's purpose could allow it. It is touching to note that in his distress he craved human companionship (38), though even that was denied him by the disciples' sleepiness. The whole passage is a powerful testimony to the reality of Jesus' human nature (as Heb. 5:7–9 makes clear). This makes it all the more impressive that there was in the end no question that the Father's will had to take priority, whatever the cost.

The failure of his disciples to give the support Jesus needed was not yet caused by cowardice (that will follow), but by sheer physical weariness (41). They would soon have to face the more serious temptation to deny Jesus, of which he had already warned them, and their failure to share now in Jesus' preparation for the coming ordeal would leave them defenceless when the test came.

Notes. 37 Peter and the two sons of Zebedee had been Jesus' companions on the mountain (17:1), and all three had declared their readiness to suffer with him (20:22; 26:35); yet they fell at the first hurdle. 46 The verb translated Let us go suggests not retreat but rather advance to meet the coming ‘enemy’.

26:47–27:26 The arrest and trial of Jesus

26:47–56 The arrest (see Mk. 14:43–50; Lk. 22:47–53). The large crowd Judas brought to Gethsemane were a detachment of the ‘police’ deployed by the Sanhedrin. The unprepared disciples were outnumbered and offered little more than token resistance (51). But in any case Jesus would allow no resistance (52; cf. 5:39); again he let events take their predicted course. It was not that he was powerless to prevent them (53), but that he chose not to do so, so that Scripture might be fulfilled (54, 56). Hence his non-violent style, in contrast with Zealot leaders (55). Thus, while the initiative appeared to be with Judas and his armed men, it was in fact Jesus who was in charge of the situation and the purpose of God which was being worked out.

Notes. 52 The proverbial saying, all who draw the sword will die by the sword (based on Is. 50:11?) repudiates violence in this specific situation. It is doubtful whether in itself it provides sufficient grounds for total pacifism. 54 A legion was made up of 6,000 soldiers.

26:57–68 The Jewish trial (see Mk. 14:53–65; cf. Lk. 22:54–55, 63–71). The death penalty could be pronounced only by the Roman governor (Jn. 18:31), so that another, Roman, trial would be necessary (27:11–26). But this hearing before the Sanhedrin, the supreme Jewish court, was the climax of the confrontation which had been building up since ch. 21. During the hearing Jesus openly declared his own authority (64) and the members of the Sanhedrin contemptuously repudiated it (65–68), thus fulfilling Jesus’ prediction in 16:21.

Luke’s account suggests that the verdict was reached in the morning (cf. 27:1–2). Probably this brief paragraph simplifies a complex and rather chaotic session which went on most of the night, rather than a well-prepared formal trial. The normal procedure of witnesses and cross-examination was observed, but Matthew indicates that the atmosphere was far from impartial (59).

We are not told what the false witnesses (59–60) charged Jesus with. But Jesus’ alleged claim, I am able to destroy the temple of God and rebuild it in three days is not said to be false and was offered by two witnesses, which made it serious (Dt. 17:6). While Jesus had not, in Matthew’s account, threatened to destroy the temple himself, statements like 23:38; 24:2 (and 12:6), together with his violent action in 21:12–13, gave it credibility, and Jn. 2:19 records words quite close to these. A threat to the temple was a threat to all that was most precious in Israel’s life and worship.

The Messiah was expected to restore, even rebuild, the temple, so that Caiaphas’ question in v 63 followed logically from the charge in v 61 but in more explicit terms. Jesus at last breaks his silence with a defiant declaration of who he really is. He is indeed the Christ, the Son of God, his guarded reply (lit. ‘You have said’) suggests, however, that he repudiates the construction Caiaphas would put on those titles. He preferred to use his own chosen title, the Son of Man, and by combining words from Ps. 110:1 and Dn. 7:13 he showed the true nature of the authority of the Son of Man. It was to be found not in any earthly reign, but through his enthronement at God’s right hand in heaven. They would see the truth of this when the prisoner they were about to condemn was vindicated by God through resurrection and the triumph of his gospel in the world.

If this outrageous claim was not true, it was blasphemy. The violent actions of the members of the Sanhedrin (65, 67–68) expressed their total repudiation of this impostor.

Notes. 62–63 Jesus' silence in the face of unjust condemnation recalls Is. 53:7–8. 63 Some Jews spoke of the Messiah as Son of God (on the basis of 2 Sa. 7:14; Ps. 2:7). The question was prompted by Jesus' implied claim in 21:37–39 (and his private teaching, passed on by Judas?). 64 The NIV in the future represents a Greek phrase which really means 'from now on'. See above on 10:23; 16:28; 24:30 for the meaning of language (drawn from Dn. 7:13) about the Son of Man coming on the clouds. It is enthronement language, rather than referring to a coming to earth. 68 It was thought that the Messiah would be able to recognize people when blindfolded.

26:69–75 Peter's failure (see Mk. 14:66–72; Lk. 22:55–62). In vs 31–35 Jesus foretold this pathetic failure, and v 58 set the scene. By interweaving the stories of Jesus and Peter in Caiaphas' house, Matthew invites us to compare the two men under pressure. While Jesus stood firm, Peter responded to increasing pressure with increasingly violent denial. In this hostile southern company, he repudiated Jesus of Galilee (69), Jesus of Nazareth (71), even though his Galilean accent could not be hidden (73). The story ends with Peter's remorse, but not his restoration. Matthew does not mention him again by name, though there is a broad hint in the 'eleven disciples' of 28:16.

Notes. 74 The words on himself are not in the Greek, and the verb used normally indicates cursing someone else. Peter was apparently prepared even to curse Jesus (as later Christians were forced to do in order to escape execution).

27:1–2 Jesus is transferred to the Roman governor (see Mk. 15:1; Lk. 23:1). The verdict already reached (26:65–66) was confirmed in full session, but it could be implemented only by authority of the Roman governor, Pontius Pilatus. He already had a bad record of insensitive rule and would later be removed from office for unnecessary and brutal provocation of his subjects. In order to convince such a man, the Jewish leaders would need some more substantial charge than a theological dispute over 'blasphemy'. No doubt this early morning consultation was devoted to preparing their case.

27:3–10 The death of Judas. Meanwhile, Matthew offers us another story of betrayal, but one which contrasts with that of Peter. That story of temporary failure under stress ended with Peter's tears of repentance, and his restoration is later implied. But Judas, by contrast, had taken a clear decision against Jesus, and his remorse when he realized his mistake led not to true repentance but to despair and suicide.

The theme of blood money picks up the idea of guilt for the blood of the prophets in 23:29–36, which reaches its climax in 27:24–25. Judas, unable to offload his guilt by returning the money, hanged himself; but the chief priests, by using that same blood money to buy the potter's field, were also implicated. The Field of Blood (Akeldama) is traditionally located in the valley of Hinnom (from which potter's clay was dug). These and other hints in Matthew's wording suggest that he understood the whole story in the light of Je. 19:1–13, where the valley of Hinnom is linked with burials and 'innocent blood' and with a potter. Other passages in Jeremiah may also be in mind (the potter's house in Je. 18; buying a field in Je. 32).

So it is appropriate that the story reaches its climax (9–10) in a formula-quotation, allegedly from Jeremiah, about using blood money to buy a potter's field. The words quoted are in fact most closely based on Zc. 11:12–13, with its mention of 'thirty silver coins' (see on 26:15) which are mysteriously thrown down in the house of the Lord 'to the potter'. The money in the Zechariah passage is the insulting price at which the God-given shepherd (Messiah) is paid off by his rebellious flock (see on 26:31 for other allusions to this strange prophecy). This is not, however, a simple quotation of a single passage but a subtle weaving together of themes from Jeremiah and Zechariah in the light of the events just recorded. The ‘fulfilment’ Matthew here traces is something much richer than the simple occurrence of a predicted event.

Note. 5 The account of Judas’ death in Acts 1:18–19 is different but again links it with Akeldama.

27:11–26 The Roman trial (see Mk. 15:2–15; cf. Lk. 23:2–5, 18–25.) The trial took place in public, outside the governor’s residence. Pilate had sole authority to decide such cases, yet the trial shows him manipulated by others and in the end renouncing his responsibility in favour of the Jewish leaders. It was they who called the tune and accepted the ultimate responsibility.

King of the Jews was presumably the title the Jewish leaders had accused Jesus of assuming. It was a more politically loaded title than ‘Messiah’, and therefore one the governor could not ignore; it made a man a potential leader of rebellion. It was on this charge that Jesus was eventually executed (37). Jesus’ reply (11), as in 26:64, was positive but guarded; he was aware of the misleading connotations of the title as a pagan governor would hear it. Thereafter, Jesus said nothing until he was on the cross.

Pilate’s attempt to use the customary amnesty to escape the responsibility of condemning an innocent man on a trumped-up charge was ill-judged. Barabbas was probably no ordinary ruffian but a popular nationalist leader, who would have a greater following in Jerusalem than the Galilean prophet. While the crowd were incited in their choice by the chief priests and elders, they probably took little persuading. There is no need to assume that these were the same people as the Galilean pilgrims who welcomed Jesus into Jerusalem in 21:8–9; rather these were people of the city (see on 21:10–11).

The final scene in vs 24–25 is about responsibility. While Pilate had to give the formal verdict, by washing his hands he disclaimed responsibility for Jesus’ death and transferred it to the crowd; and in the terrible words of v 25 all the people accepted it. In using that phrase, Matthew indicates that while the chief priests and elders had taken the initiative, the people as a whole carried a corporate responsibility for the death of Jesus. There is, of course, no basis for extending this principle to a condemnation of all Jews for all time (after all, the Matthew who wrote these words was a Jew, and so were all the foundation members of Jesus’ church). It was, as Jesus had already indicated in 23:37–39, that generation in Jerusalem who carried the responsibility, and in AD 70 it found its terrible out-working in the destruction of the city and its temple.

Notes. 16 Notorious translates a Greek word which can equally mean ‘famous’, ‘popular’.
16–17 Early manuscripts give the name here as Jesus Barabbas, and this is probably what Matthew wrote. Jesus was a common name. V 17 thus poignantly offers a choice between two ‘Jesuses’.
19 Nothing else is known of Pilate’s wife. This Gentile woman’s conviction of Jesus’ innocence is in contrast to the prejudice of the Jewish crowd.
22 Most Jews detested crucifixion as a barbaric Roman method of execution. But it was the inevitable consequence of asking for Jesus to be officially executed as a supposed rebel.
25 The Greek reads simply, ‘His blood on us and on our children’. It is not so much a wish as an acceptance of responsibility; cf. Jos. 2:19.

27:27–56 The crucifixion of Jesus

27:27–31 Mockery by the Roman soldiers (see Mk. 15:16–20). While there is physical brutality here, the main focus is on mockery. The Gentile soldiers had at their mercy a Jewish ‘king’, and they staged a mock enthronement, using whatever materials came to hand: a soldier’s red cape as an imperial robe, a stick as a royal sceptre and a crown made of twigs. Thus the 'king of the Jews', already ill-treated by his own people (26:67–68), was dishonoured by Gentiles as well.

27:32–44 The crucifixion (see Mk. 15:22–32; cf. Lk. 23:33–39). Matthew tells us little of the physical horror of crucifixion; the emphasis in this section falls again on rejection and mockery, this time by Jesus' own people. But even in this unlikely context some of the greatest Messianic titles come into play, even if in jest. Thus through the superficial jibes we are able to glimpse something of the real meaning of Jesus' death. And frequent echoes of the words of Ps. 22 and 69 remind us that in the suffering and death of Jesus Scripture was being fulfilled (Ps. 22:18, 7, 8 are echoed in vs 35, 39, 43, and v 46 quotes Ps. 22:1; Ps. 69:21 is echoed in vs 34, 48).

Golgotha was a regular place of execution, prominently located just outside the city (probably where the Church of the Holy Sepulchre now stands). The soldiers are an important part of the scene, since their watch results in a crucial confession in v 54. They are portrayed not as sadistic (the wine mixed with gall was probably a narcotic, designed to ease the suffering) but as neutral observers. The written charge recorded the official reason for Jesus' death and was a warning to other would-be nationalist leaders.

The mockery came from Jews, of various classes. The two robbers (38, 44) were probably political insurgents (part of Barabbas' gang?), so that Jesus died, ironically, in the very Zealot company he had been so careful to avoid. Those who passed by were ordinary Jews, who knew about Jesus' alleged claims concerning the temple and had heard of his claim to be Son of God. The invitation to exploit his supposed status as 'Son of God' echoes the temptations in 4:3, 6; but the temptation had already been faced in Gethsemane, and it was precisely because he was God's Son that he could not come down. Finally, the chief priests, the teachers of the law and the elders (note the full listing of Sanhedrin members, as in 16:21) repeated similar taunts, but added also in mockery the precious title King of Israel. The total rejection of Jesus by his people could hardly be made more obvious.

Notes. 32 Simon was just a random victim; but the fact that his name was remembered suggests that the experience may have brought him into the disciples' group. 38 The word translated robber is used by Josephus for Jewish freedom fighters. It is used in 26:55 (NIV 'leading a rebellion') and for Barabbas in Jn. 18:40.

27:45–56 The death of Jesus (see Mk. 15:33–41; cf. Lk. 23:44–49). So far Jesus had been silent, the butt of mockery. Now Matthew turns the focus on to Jesus himself, and as we read of him dying, we are allowed to see something of the significance of what was happening.

Jesus remained alive on the cross from noon until about 3 p.m. Darkness at this time (not an eclipse, since the moon is full at Passover) was a sign of God's displeasure (Am. 8:9). Jesus' extraordinary cry in the darkness (using Ps. 22:1) shows the depth of his suffering as he gave his life as a ransom for many (20:28). This is the only time Jesus does not address God as 'Father', an indication that for a time even the intimate relationship of Father and Son (11:27) had been broken.

The supposed appeal to Elijah rests on the sound of the word Eli, 'my God'. Some Jews believed Elijah could be summoned from heaven to give help in need. The wine vinegar (the ordinary soldier's cheap drink) was an act of kindness, mentioned because of the echo of Ps. 69:21.

Crucified men normally lapsed gradually into unconsciousness after many hours, even days, of agony. Jesus' death, however, is described as if he was himself in full control: gave up his spirit is an unusual expression, suggesting an act of will.

Vs 51–53 (together with the darkness of v 45) indicate that this was no ordinary death. The huge curtain of the temple separated off the sacred interior, so that its destruction was not just an act of divine power (from top to bottom) foreshadowing the greater destruction to come, but also a symbol of the opening of access to God through the death of Jesus. The earthquake too signified God’s power and judgment (Jdg. 5:4; Joel 3:16; Na. 1:5–6). The resultant raising of holy people who had died (in OT times?) suggests that the resurrection of the last days (Is. 26:19; Dn. 12:2) found its beginning in Jesus’ resurrection. Now was the time for all the hopes of God’s people to be fulfilled.

It is not surprising that these supernatural events terrified the Gentile soldiers, but the title the Son of God sounds oddly Jewish; perhaps they were simply picking up the Jewish jibes of vs 40, 43. At any rate, however little the soldiers understood what they said, Matthew intends his readers to recognize that here was the true response to what had happened. Once again it took a Gentile to see what Jews could not see (cf. 2:1–12; 8:8–12; 12:41–42; 27:19).

Notes. 52–53 There is no other record of this remarkable occurrence, and Matthew does not give enough detail for us to know exactly what he thought happened. For instance, why the delay between the raising of the bodies and their appearance in Jerusalem; and what happened to them afterwards? The symbolism is fairly clear, but we do not have the resources to determine the status of the story as sober history. 55–56 The same women witnessed Jesus’ death, burial (61) and resurrection (28:1); there is therefore no room for mistake over either the reality of Jesus’ death or the identification of his tomb.

27:57–28:20 The burial, resurrection and commission of Jesus

This last section of the gospel is constructed on a ‘mirror-image’ pattern, which vividly shows the effect of Jesus’ resurrection. The pivot point is the account of the empty tomb and the risen Lord (28:1–10). On either side of this, the setting of the guard (27:62–66) is balanced by the report of the guard (28:11–15), and Jesus dead and buried (27:57–61) is balanced by Jesus alive and sovereign (28:16–20).

27:57–61 Jesus dead and buried (see Mk. 15:42–47; Lk. 23:50–55). Crucified bodies were normally given, at best, a dishonourable burial in a public plot. In burying Jesus in his own new tomb, Joseph showed his devotion as a disciple. Many family tombs of this period can still be seen around Jerusalem, cut into the rock, with a small entrance (covered by a big stone) and inside spaces for several bodies (new in this case, therefore, probably indicates that no other bodies were yet in it). Only a rich man could afford such a tomb, so close to the capital.

27:62–66 The setting of the guard. Only Matthew mentions the guard. He needed to do so in order to contradict a false report which was in circulation (28:15). The guards’ presence also increases our awareness of the magnitude of the miracle of Jesus’ resurrection.

The day after Preparation Day means the Sabbath. In visiting Pilate and sealing the tomb the chief priests and Pharisees (note the two rival groups still united in suppressing the Jesus movement) were breaking their own Sabbath laws in their desire to make sure that Jesus was properly disposed of. Probably Judas had warned them of Jesus’ repeated prediction that he would rise again after three days. A guard of Roman soldiers offered maximum security.

Note. 64 The first deception refers to Jesus’ Messianic claim, the last to a faked ‘resurrection’ to support it.

28:1–10 The empty tomb and the risen Lord (cf. Mk. 16:1–8; Lk. 24:1–11.) This is not an account of how Jesus rose from the dead but of how his resurrection was discovered. The miraculous removal of the stone was not in order to let Jesus out but to let the women in to see the empty tomb. Each of the gospels presents a different story of how the fact was discovered, but none of them describes the event itself.

Unlike the Jewish leaders, the women had properly rested on the Sabbath. Now they could return to look at the tomb; Matthew mentions no intention to go in. But the appearance of an angel of the Lord (described in language appropriate to God himself; Dn. 7:9; 10:6) changed that. He had come to show them that Jesus had already risen, and to that end he removed the stone and showed them inside the empty chamber where he lay. The women should not have been surprised, since this was just as he said, and the angel went on to remind them (7) of a more specific promise of Jesus, to meet the disciples again in Galilee (26:32). The women's reaction, afraid yet filled with joy, is surely a very natural response. The angel himself was terrifying (4), and the absence of the body unnerving. But, however little they yet understood it, here was hope in place of despair and the promise of seeing Jesus again.

His disciples would have to wait until Galilee to meet Jesus, but not so the women. Only Matthew mentions their meeting with the risen Jesus in vs 9–10 (though their clasping his feet, and the message to my brothers remind us of Mary Magdalene in Jn. 20:17). In a society in which women were second-class citizens, their prominence in the accounts of Jesus' resurrection is striking. Jesus repeated what the angel had said, but with the lovely addition of the phrase my brothers: after the disciples' failure in 26:56, this would have conveyed a vital message of reassurance.

28:11–15 Report of the guard. While our sights are now set on Galilee and the triumph of the risen Lord, we have here one last glimpse of the city, Jerusalem, with its authorities in disarray, arranging a desperate cover-up. We are thus prepared for the final scene, where the contrast between Galilee and Jerusalem which has run through the whole gospel reaches its climax.

It would take a large sum of money to persuade the soldiers to spread the cover-up story, as sleeping on guard duty was a capital offence. But Pilate's reputation was well known; if the story reached his ears, he could be satisfied with a further bribe. Justin mentions that such stories were still being circulated in the second century to discredit the fact of the empty tomb.

28:16–20 Jesus alive and sovereign. It is a relief to return to Galilee. Here the Christian mission has its proper starting-point, in a meeting with the risen Jesus, now enthroned as king of all. The wording of v 18 echoes Dn. 7:14 yet again, but whereas earlier references looked forward to a future fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy of the universal authority of the Son of Man, now that fulfilment had already been achieved.

On the basis of that authority, Jesus now sent his disciples out to spread his rule over all nations by making more disciples. The nature of that discipleship is spelled out in two further participles, baptising and teaching. The disciples were to call not for a superficial response but for total commitment to the new community (symbolized in baptism), and to a life governed by everything I have commanded you. In this mission, they may be assured of the continued presence of the one who had earlier spoken of being 'where two or three come together in my name' (18:20). The words with you powerfully echo the name Emmanuel. 'God with us' (1:23); that is who Jesus really is.

Notes. 16 The eleven disciples pointedly excludes Judas, but equally pointedly includes Peter, despite his dismal failure at the trial. 17 Doubted is the same word as in 14:31; it denotes not intellectual unbelief but the hesitation natural to those confronted by a unique and 'impossible' occurrence. 18 Note the contrast with 4:8–9; all Satan could offer was the earth! 19

In the name of denotes the one to whom allegiance is pledged in baptism. The trinitarian ‘formula’ is striking; nothing like it occurs elsewhere in the NT, though the close association of the Son with the Father has been seen in 11:27; 24:36. Note how all three persons were involved in Jesus’ own baptism (3:16–17).

R. T. France

MARK

Introduction

Basic views

When we approach a gospel like that of Mark, we tend to have some basic views about the book and its writer which will influence the way in which we interpret it. Some of these views we may see as certain; some are only probable; all are at least possible. Some will be taken directly from what the early church said about the book, while others will be drawn from the material found in the book itself. If the evidence of the early church and the evidence of the book agree, then we can be fairly certain that the ideas are right.

The suggestions made below seem to make the greatest sense, and make it easier to apply Mark’s message to our own circumstances today. That is why we read his gospel. We are not merely interested to find out when or where or to whom or by whom it was written. We want to find out what God is saying to us today through the gospel. If we can understand Mark’s situation and find that in any way it was like our own, then it is easier to apply the message to ourselves.

The article ‘Reading the gospels’ earlier in this book covers many general points and the reasons for believing them, so there is no need for detailed repetition here. It is worth, however, going over some of these general principles briefly, as they will help us to understand the gospel better.

The first gospel

Mark was probably the first of the four gospels, and it may have been the first true gospel ever to be written. Mark may then have invented the form of book that we call a gospel; there does not seem to have been anything quite like it before in the ancient world. It seems likely, however, that all the other gospel writers knew of Mark, and Matthew and Luke are generally thought to have used his gospel when writing theirs (of course, they also added material from other sources). The ‘good news’ had certainly been preached by word of mouth long before it was written down. There were, therefore, probably many short collections of the sayings and doings of Jesus which had been made before Mark was written. Maybe, for instance, there was a written account of the last week of Jesus' life, including the story of the cross, since that was so important. Mark's gospel was probably the first time that so many of these stories about Jesus had been brought together, and this may explain why the gospel seems a little 'rough and ready' to some. Others, however, discern a skilful arrangement of material by the author and explain the apparent 'roughness' by saying that Mark reproduced much early material without making many changes.

Date

Mark's gospel was probably written quite early, perhaps between AD 60 and 70, i.e. only about thirty years after the death of Christ. That would put it around the time of the deaths of Paul and Peter, which we think took place about AD 64, and just before the Roman armies destroyed Jerusalem in AD 70. Although it would not matter if it was written later, this pre-70 date would fit better with what early Christians said about the gospel and also with what the gospel itself says. For example, in Mk. 13 Jesus prophesies the fall of Jerusalem, but there is no hint in the text that the prophecy has been fulfilled by Mark's time.

Author

The book was probably written by the John Mark of whom we read several times in the NT (e.g. Acts 12:12). We have to say 'probably' because, as in so many other cases, we cannot be certain. Although the gospel itself nowhere says that it was written by Mark (the heading at the beginning is not part of the gospel but only its 'title page'), the early Christians had no doubts about it. John Mark was not a famous figure like Paul or Peter, so there does not seem to have been any good reason for his name being given as author unless it was so. He was a younger co-worker at different times with Paul, Barnabas (his relative; Col. 4:10) and Peter. This last link may be important. John Mark probably lived in Jerusalem, where he would have known many of Jesus' followers, (though he was too young at the time to have been a follower himself). If the church in Jerusalem met in his mother's house (see Acts 12:12), it is possible that the Last Supper was held there. However, even without this, John Mark would have been a very valuable early witness to what Jesus said and did, especially during his last week.

The influence of Peter

The early church believed that Mark got many of his facts from Peter, for they knew that Mark himself had not been a disciple of Jesus during his lifetime. We cannot prove this point, but we do know that both Mark and Peter were together in Rome in later years (1 Pet. 5:13). We also know that Peter was intending before his death to make a permanent record of his memories of Christ (2 Pet. 1:15). Most of the early church fathers believed that Mark's gospel was this record. Certainly there are many details in the gospel that are best explained as personal memories of Peter, e.g. descriptions of incidents at which only Peter, James and John were present. Another possible clue is that the gospel is very uncomplimentary to Peter, pointing out all his faults and failings. As Peter later became such an important man at Rome, it is hard to see how these could have got into the gospel unless Peter himself had insisted on it.

Place of origin

If Peter was the source for the gospel, it is very likely that it was produced in Rome, where Peter was almost certainly martyred in AD 64. Most of the early records suggest Rome, or at least Italy, as the place of origin, though some suggest Alexandria. Rome was a sprawling city with a population of several millions. It had all our familiar problems of slums, pollution and communications. Mark's background was very close to ours: that makes his book even more relevant today.

Purpose of the gospel

It would seem that Mark had more than one purpose in mind when he wrote his gospel.

1. To make the good news accessible to Gentiles. Rome was a Gentile city, though naturally there were many Jews there as well, drawn by trade and business. To judge from Paul's letter to the Roman Christians, the church there contained both Gentiles and Jews, and feelings probably ran high between them at times. A gospel produced in and for such a 'mixed' church would have to explain carefully Jewish words and customs, so that the non-Jewish readers could understand. That is exactly what Mark's gospel does and in that sense it is a gospel for the non-Jew, the Gentile, the outsider. This also explains why Mark does not quote nearly as much from the OT as Matthew does. Mark's Gentile Christians would not have known the OT as well as Jewish Christians, nor indeed would they have had the same interest in it.

Mark seems to have been written with a missionary purpose, to spread the good news to the outsiders, the non-Jewish world. Naturally it had a teaching purpose as well (all the gospels were written partly to tell Christians who already believed in Jesus more about him; see Lk. 1:4). However, if we bear in mind this missionary thrust of Mark's gospel, it will help to explain a lot. For instance, it gives yet another reason why Mark avoids using 'insider' language. It also explains why he leaves out much that is true and valuable in order to concentrate on what he considers to be vital for his readers. In all these things we can learn much from Mark today. This making himself one with the people that he was trying to reach is all the more remarkable when we remember that he was just as much a Jew as Matthew was. Had he learned as a 'junior missionary' with Paul how to become like an 'outsider' in order to win 'outsiders' for Christ? (1 Cor. 9:20). This is a lesson that Christians today need to learn too: 'insider' language only confuses the 'outsider'.

2. To encourage those facing persecution. Rome, being the imperial capital and therefore directly under the eye of central government, was the very place where persecution was most likely to occur. We know both from the NT (Acts 18:2) and from Roman history that Jews had suffered persecution at Rome even before Christians had. We also know from Roman writers of the great persecution of Christians at Rome under Nero about AD 64. Many Christians, probably including Paul and Peter, died for their faith at this time. Mark's gospel, with its probable background in Rome, seems to have been aimed at preparing Christians, whether at Rome or elsewhere, for future persecution. It does this by telling of Christ's suffering and of how he had foretold similar suffering for his followers. In other words, it was written to encourage a minority church in a hostile environment, and because of this it speaks to and encourages many today.

3. To defend the faith. Mark could be described as an apologist for the Christian faith. Like Luke in Acts he wanted to show that Christians were good citizens of the Roman Empire, not revolutionaries, and that any fair-minded Roman official would see this at once, as would ordinary people, not blinded by prejudice. Mark makes clear that in the case of Jesus, the charges that he was a rebel against Rome were trumped up and completely false. Mark wants to explain the true nature of Christianity and remove false ideas about it that might hinder evangelism. This too is an important task before the church today, both in countries where other great organized religions co-exist (and Christians are sometimes at risk from jealous 'fundamentalist' religious leaders) and in so-called 'Christian' lands, where there is pagan ignorance and indifference.

4. To explain the significance of the cross. Mark is anxious to avoid not only political but also religious misunderstanding, which was a far more serious hindrance when preaching the gospel, his great task. He makes it clear that the death of Jesus was not a tragic accident but part of God's plan from the start, and that Jesus not only knew this but also told his disciples of it. True, Mark shows the disciples as being blind to this until after Jesus' death and resurrection, but that is another matter. Mark, unlike Paul, does not explain in detail, except for one or two places, why Jesus had to die. He is, however, clear that the cross was God's age-old plan of salvation, even if he does not quote as much from the OT as the other gospel writers do, to prove the point. That God's way for the establishment of his rule on earth should involve the death of the Messiah, his chosen one, was a hidden and mysterious plan, and none but Jesus saw it at first. That seems to be the meaning of the phrase 'the mystery of the kingdom of God' in Mk. 4:11. Even people who admired Jesus as a miracle-worker or even saw him as a prophet could not see this. That God should choose to bring in his kingdom through the shameful death of his chosen servant was a great stumbling-block to many, both Jews and Gentiles, who listened to the preaching of the early church. Today it is still a problem for some. For example, Muslims find it a great stumbling-block that God should have allowed such a good man, and indeed such a prophet, to die such a terrible death.

Mark points out in his gospel that Jesus was not merely a good man or even a prophet: he was the Son of God. He proves this, not by telling the story of the virgin birth (which he must have known) but by showing how God himself proclaimed Jesus as his Son at his baptism and later at the transfiguration.

Jesus never told anyone directly that he was God's Son or the Messiah; he did not even admit it publicly until his trial before the high priest. This silence of Jesus is what we mean by the 'Messianic Secret': he waited until God revealed it to others. For example, Peter came to realize that Jesus was the Messiah and acknowledged him as such, but the idea of a suffering Messiah was still very far from his mind (Mk. 8:29). Jesus accepted the title when it was given to him, but not if the witness was given by demons.

Part of the reason for Jesus' reluctance to reveal his true identity was that he did not wish to be known as a mere wonder-worker. Perhaps this is a word of warning for us today, in the midst of times of spiritual renewal in which we all rejoice, for such times bring their own danger. Jesus saw his task rather as that of bringing the good news about God and his rule, and that is why he warned healed people not to tell of their healing. It also explains why he escaped from the crowds when there was a danger of his mission becoming a mere 'healing campaign' and no more.

The secret became plain at the cross. The words of the Roman officer (15:39) were, for Mark, a clear confession that Jesus was the Son of God, whatever the centurion himself may have meant at the time. The second proof was the empty tomb and the message of the angel on the resurrection morning: the Son of God had conquered death and his identity need no longer be a secret.

The gospel's abrupt ending

One of the puzzling features of Mark's gospel is the way that it ends so suddenly, without a full account of all the times that Jesus appeared to his disciples after the resurrection. The other gospels give a much fuller picture of Jesus' post-resurrection appearances. The longer ending of Mark's gospel (which is separated from the rest in the NIV) is not in the earliest manuscripts, and was almost certainly not written by Mark himself, but added by the early Christians to 'round off' the book. Some say that Mark's original ending was lost. Others suggest that perhaps Mark was martyred before he could finish his book, but this is not likely. It is more likely that Mark meant his gospel to end in this way. It was not, as some have suggested, that he wanted to leave the question of the resurrection open, but that, in his day, evidence for the resurrection would be given by word of mouth by the living witnesses. That would be much more real and exciting; it would be like an actor appearing in person at the end of a play.

The apostles were first and foremost witnesses of the resurrection (Acts 10:41). The other gospels were probably written after the deaths of the apostles and so had to contain a full account in writing of the resurrection appearances. This probably also explains why Mark does not have as full an account of the teaching of Jesus as the other gospels do. He expected it to be given by word of mouth, as it still is in many parts of the world today.

The structure of the gospel

Mark's gospel is not just a collection of sayings and doings of Jesus with no particular plan or connection. If you read Mark through at one sitting, you will see this. It has a definite plan and outline, and the commentary shows how the different parts fit together. In the first part Jesus has a wide ministry in which he does many miracles. In the second section, he deliberately restricts himself to his own followers and teaches them. The last part (a third of the book) deals with the final week in Jerusalem, including Jesus' trial, death and resurrection.

Much of Jesus' teaching centred on the kingdom of God. There is also a strong element of kingship in Jesus' teaching about himself as it emerges gradually until we find him tacitly accepting the title 'King of the Jews' from Pontius Pilate. In the commentary on Mark, therefore, hindsight has sometimes been used to present Jesus as king, inaugurating his Father's kingdom in a royal manner. This is one way of interpreting the unfolding story.

The last week of Jesus' life was obviously of great importance to Mark. In a sense, all that goes before it can be seen as preparation. This tells us that Mark's theology is a theology of the cross. Mark lived and wrote after Pentecost, and of course he knew of and had experienced the Holy Spirit, but in his gospel he speaks little of the Spirit, and when he does it is always in connection with Jesus. This is because he was writing of a period before Pentecost, when the disciples had experienced the Spirit only in the person of Jesus. He knew well that Jesus was to give the Spirit to all believers, and that is why he put the words of the Baptist at the beginning of his book (1:8). Mark, however, never makes the mistake of putting Pentecost rather than Calvary at the centre of his faith, and he never isolates the Spirit from Jesus. This is a danger which we may face today in our glad rediscovery of the person and gifts of the Spirit. We need to remember that it is the task of the Spirit to bear witness to Christ.

If we bear in mind what has been said above, we shall see as we go along how all the parts of the gospel fit in, though of course we must not try to tie everything down too tightly to a pattern. Indeed, if the gospel was intended both as a missionary gospel and as a teaching guide for new Gentile Christians, then Mark may have worked it out gradually over a period. There may even have been several earlier versions before the final one that we have before us today. That is what scholars mean by a 'fluid situation'. Also, we must not think in terms of Mark being published in the modern sense of the word. There was probably only one copy of the gospel at first, or maybe one copy of each of the earlier versions of it. Then other copies would have been made by hand and sent to churches which asked for them. In this way the gospel would gradually circulate. That is, we think, how Matthew and Luke (and possibly even John) would have been able to see Mark and use it in writing their own gospels later. Only rich Christians would have been able to make a copy for their own use, although in recent years the Christians in China have shown us how even ordinary folk can copy out the scriptures for themselves in times of need or shortage.

We shall divide the gospel into the three main sections mentioned above i.e. roughly chs. 1–8, chs. 9–10 and chs. 11–16. We should remember, however, that Mark did not use chapters or verses, he just wrote straight on, and sometimes it is helpful to read the gospel in this way.

Further reading

D. English, The Message of Mark, BST (IVP, 1992).

R. A. Cole, Mark, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1989).

W. L. Lane, The Gospel according to Mark, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1974).

M. D. Hooker, The Gospel according to St Mark, BNTC (A. and C. Black, 1991).

Outline of contents

1:1–8:26

Preaching the kingdom of God

1:1–20	Foundations of the kingdom of God
1:21–3:35	Signs of the kingdom of God
4:1–34	Parables of the kingdom of God
4:35–8:26	Powers of the kingdom of God

8:27–10:52

The cost of the kingdom of God

8:27–9:13	The cost to Jesus
9:14–10:52	The cost to others

11:1–16:20

Bringing in the kingdom of God

11:1–13:37	Warnings of the kingdom of God
14:1–52	Dawning of the kingdom of God
14:53–15:47	Coronation of the King
16:1–20	Vindication of the King

Commentary

1:1–8:26 Preaching the kingdom of God

This long section shows Jesus preaching and healing widely all throughout Palestine. Great crowds flocked to him, but it was not merely a ‘happy Galilean springtime’ as is sometimes said. Not only did the crowds fail to understand Jesus, but bitter opposition from the religious leaders began almost at once and followed him to the cross. Throughout this period, Jesus kept the ‘Messianic secret’; he did not tell people openly that he was the Messiah.

1:1–20 Foundations of the kingdom of God

1:1–8 Proclaiming the king (see Mt. 3:1–12; Lk. 3:1–18). We have seen that Mark was an evangelist and like most evangelists, blunt and ‘to the point’. For example, he does not begin his gospel with an elaborate preface but by telling us that his subject is the ‘good news’ about Jesus the Christ (or Messiah), God’s chosen agent who is also the Son of God. Both of these points emerge gradually in the book. Jesus did not claim them for himself. Indeed, it is only as God opens our eyes that we can see the truth in what Jesus taught and from what he did. Mark’s gospel is the confident proclamation of the Messiah by one whose spiritual eyes had been opened; that is why healing the blind is a picture in Mark of what Jesus must do for all of us.

The ‘good news’ had been planned by God long before. Mark quotes the prophets Malachi and Isaiah to prove it, though he only mentions Isaiah by name. Mark shows that the ‘messenger’ prophesied was John the Baptist, while the Lord of v 3 is Jesus. So Mark is already equating Jesus with God, for ‘Lord’ usually means ‘God’ in the OT. These were the very claims for which the priests and elders would crucify Jesus. It is impossible to be neutral when faced with Christ: was he the Messiah and God’s Son, or not? Which side do we stand on?

John the Baptist preached the need for repentance which would lead to forgiveness of sins by God. This was the familiar message of the prophets of Israel; even John’s clothing was like that worn by them. The total change of heart signified by repentance was to be shown by accepting baptism. Again, this was not new. Jews had always had ritual washings, especially for those entering Judaism from outside. What was new was that John said that it was as necessary for Jews as for Gentiles. What was also new was that he announced that someone far greater than himself was coming after him. John could only baptize with water (an outward and symbolic washing), but the one coming after him would cleanse and renew hearts by the Spirit. That is what made the work of Jesus completely different from the work of John.

So, although Mark does not quote from the OT as much as other evangelists do, he believed just as firmly as they that the roots of the gospel were to be found in the Jewish Scriptures. Also, though he does not speak as much of the Spirit as other gospels do, he believed just as firmly that Jesus was the giver of the Spirit to every believer, and that the Spirit is the birthright of all, not just restricted to a few, as it had been in the OT. Just as every Jewish penitent who came to him received John's baptism, so every believer in Jesus will be baptized by Jesus with the Spirit. This is the inner reality of which water-baptism like that of John is the outward picture.

Note on Mark's prologue. There is a long-standing debate on the function and extent of Mark's prologue. It would appear that its purpose (like the birth narratives in Matthew and Luke and the prologue in John) is to introduce the reader to Jesus' true significance as Messiah and Son of God before the story about him begins. But where does the prologue end and the gospel 'proper' start? Is it just the first verse that is introductory or vs 1–8? If the introduction includes vs 2–11 then the place of John the Baptist is shown to be very important, not only as the promised herald or forerunner of the Messiah but also as setting the pattern for his life, rejection and death.

1:9–13 Testing the king (see Mt. 3:13–4:11; Lk. 3:21–4:13). Kings and judges in OT Israel were chosen by God and anointed. Times of testing would show that they were indeed God's choice for the task. So it was with Jesus. He came to be baptized by John. This caused problems to some early theologians who asked why was Jesus baptized if he had no sin and needed no repentance? Mark had no problem with this; he simply records what happened, without comment. Because baptism was often a sign of judgment, perhaps Mark saw it as a willing acceptance by Jesus of the path of suffering that he must endure as Messiah (see 10:38).

In v 10, it is most natural to take the he as referring to Jesus, although Jn 1:33 seems to indicate that the Baptist saw the vision as well. The opening of the skies is part of the OT picture of God descending, but here it is the Spirit which comes down, like a dove, the symbol of gentleness and peace. It is also reminiscent of the creation story in Gn. 1:2. Some early heretics said that Jesus was only a man on whom the Spirit came down, but Mark has already proclaimed him to be the Son of God (1:1) and here God's voice declares the same at his baptism.

Some manuscripts omit the words 'Son of God' in 1:1, but there is no doubt about their presence here. The voice from heaven declared Jesus as God's dear Son (sometimes the Greek word here is used to mean 'only son') with whom God is well pleased. God's voice was proclaiming God's word. The words are a combination of Ps. 2:7 and Is. 42:1. Taken together, they show that although Jesus was God's son, as God's servant he had to suffer and die to carry out God's work, and perhaps this reflects Mark's understanding of the meaning of Jesus' baptism, as the willing acceptance of this task. We shall see that his followers were unwilling to accept this path for Jesus, and even more unwilling to accept it for themselves. Yet, as Paul tells us in Rom. 6:3, we were all baptized into Christ's death, and this was literally true for many Roman martyrs. There is no other path in Christianity except death to self, for Jesus, our forerunner, deliberately took it.

Jesus passed his first test, by accepting his calling with all its cost, but would he pass his second test? The same Spirit that he had seen in the vision at his baptism led him into a lonely place, where he faced all the attacks of ‘the enemy’ or ‘the adversary’ (which is what the name Satan means). The other gospels give details of the ways in which the enemy tested Jesus: it is enough for Mark to show that the enemy did not defeat him. In a sense, this first victory over the enemy is what Jesus shows all through his ministry, by driving out demons, healing the sick and, most of all, by rescuing the prisoners of the enemy through preaching the good news. In that sense, the evangelism of Jesus is truly ‘power evangelism’, but the power is always that of the cross and the good news.

Son of God though he was, Jesus did not fight alone; all the powers of heaven were on his side, as they are on ours, even if unseen. We know what it is to come under fierce spiritual attack after some great spiritual experience. Jesus fully understands this, for he went through it himself. This is expressed theologically in Heb. 5:7; Mark simply describes it factually. There is no direct mention of any later testings of Jesus, but we can see from Jesus’ reaction to Peter’s suggestion that he should avoid the cross (8:33) and his prayer in Gethsemane (14:33–36) that he faced a constant temptation to turn aside from God’s path for him (as indeed all of us do). Perhaps this is Mark’s quiet way of showing the nature of Jesus’ testing in the wilderness. For a fuller account of the temptations see Mt. 4:1–11 and Lk. 4:1–13.

1:14–20 Calling the king’s followers (cf. Mt. 4:12–22, cf. Lk. 5:1–11). As soon as Saul or David were crowned king in the OT they began to collect a little band of faithful followers around them, who would face danger or death for their sake. Jesus did the same, and the reality of the danger he faced is shown by v 14.

After John had been thrown into prison (where he would be facing death soon), Jesus returned resolutely to Galilee, far from the scene of his earlier spiritual experiences of baptism and temptation. His purpose was to proclaim the good news of God, i.e. the good news that God had sent and also the good news about God—that he is willing to receive and forgive us. Because this was made possible by what Jesus did on the cross and because Jesus alone shows us perfectly what God is like, Jesus himself is the good news, and to preach the good news is to preach Jesus. To do this is the whole aim of Mark’s gospel: God’s great ‘countdown’ in history was over, and the time for ‘blast off’ had come. The rule of God was about to begin on earth. Of course, in one sense, it had always been present, but this is at a deeper level. The kingdom of God was shown first in the life of Jesus and then in the lives of his followers.

One of the things that Mark is anxious to explain is that this coming of God’s kingdom was a silent one, unnoticed by most people, for the world was not changed dramatically overnight. This fact, and also the way that God chose to introduce his kingdom by the suffering of his Messiah, are two things that Mark wants to show us through his gospel. This is the ‘mystery of the kingdom’ which we cannot see until God reveals it to us. This too is the reason why Jesus could not declare his Messiahship openly—until they realized that the Messiah had to suffer, the people would expect him to act like a king of this world.

John had called people to repent and be baptized; Jesus called them to ‘Repent and believe the good news’. We know, however, from John’s gospel that Jesus’ disciples also practised baptism (Jn. 3:22). To believe the good news is to believe in Jesus. To believe in Jesus is to follow him, so he called his first disciples, as he still calls us today. Simon and Andrew, James and John were all ordinary people at their ordinary tasks when Jesus called them to make them fishers of men. As usual, Mark gives only the bare bones of the story. John’s gospel shows us that these fishermen had had some contact with John the Baptist before they became Jesus’ disciples. However much we are prepared in advance, there comes a time for each of us when the call of Jesus comes to us personally, and we must make a decision whether to follow him or not.

Mark concentrates here on that one moment. These men had to decide to leave all that they had, whether little or much, and follow Jesus. In return, Jesus promised to make them fishers or 'catchers' for the kingdom of God, winning others for him as he had won them at that moment. This drawing of people into the kingdom of God was the whole purpose of Jesus' earthly ministry, and that is why preaching the good news, not healing or driving out demons, lay at the heart of his ministry. Miracles of healing and exorcism are only signs of the kingdom; they are proofs of God's power as well as of his love.

Note. At this point we might have expected a list of the Twelve, but this is delayed until 3:13–19. The reader might find it helpful to turn to that passage now.

1:21–3:35 Signs of the kingdom of God

In the OT, once a judge or a king had been anointed, proclaimed and given God's Spirit for the task, he had to go out and prove his calling. This is the purpose of these chapters. Mark has said that Jesus was the Messiah and God's Son, now he shows it. Jesus had already conquered the enemy in the wilderness; now he conquers him in the ordinary everyday life of Galilee.

1:21–28 Jesus drives out an evil spirit (see Lk. 4:31–37; cf. Mk. 7:28–29). In a synagogue at Capernaum, people were amazed at the confidence with which Jesus spoke; he was so different from their usual teachers and his words had the sound of authority. Mark often notes that people were amazed at what Jesus said or did, but he also notes, as here, that it did not necessarily lead to faith in him. We might say that it remained in their heads and did not reach their hearts. It was not only the worshippers in the synagogue who realized the authority of Jesus; so did a man who was under the power of an evil spirit. This man was completely under the power of the enemy.

It has been well said that there are two equally great dangers when thinking about the enemy. The first is to ignore him, or to try and explain him away scientifically. The second is to concentrate on him in an unhealthy way, instead of concentrating on Christ, and to concentrate on evil spirits, rather than on the Holy Spirit. People in the west have tended towards the first of these dangers, but it may be that experience of world wars and the breakdown of society is forcing psychologists to look more deeply for the causes of evil. Concentration on evil spirits has traditionally been the danger of the Third World. Neither extreme is biblical, and we must try to keep a balance between the two.

We may try to explain away the references in the Bible to those under the power of the enemy by saying that that was how people in an unscientific age spoke and thought of illnesses, bodily or mental. Those who work in non-Christian or post-Christian lands, however, know well that there is such a thing as demon-possession. In the NT a clear distinction is made between demon-possession and ordinary sickness, or even madness. Usually the Bible restricts 'demon-possession' to cases where there is some inner resistance to God through whom healing could come. We must be very careful not to use the term too widely or lightly, but equally we must be careful not to reject it altogether.

Here at the beginning of Mark's gospel Jesus is shown to be engaged in a conflict with the enemy which will continue throughout his ministry. The Bible makes it clear that until Christ sets us free we are all under the power of the enemy to a greater or lesser degree just as all Christians are to a greater or lesser degree under the control of the Holy Spirit. Sometimes there are those (as third-world Christians at least will well know) who are so totally given over to the enemy that they can be described as 'possessed'. The other side of this is being 'filled' with the Holy Spirit (Eph. 5:18). The man in the synagogue at Capernaum was completely controlled by an evil spirit, who recognized at once the claim to authority in Jesus' teaching and so reacted violently. Notice that in the Bible, driving out evil spirits is not a magical rite, needing the use of spells and names (as in other religions) but the bringing of the good news of Jesus to the person concerned. That is what is meant by driving out demons 'in the name of Jesus', not merely a mechanical repetition of the name itself. That is why 'exorcism' is not a good word to use as it brings up the idea of a 'spell'. The only sort of 'exorcism' that is lasting is the replacement of the enemy by Jesus as the centre of our lives. Anything less will only lead to worse troubles (Mt. 12:45).

The outburst of the man in v 24 was in response to the preaching of the good news by Jesus in the synagogue that day. The enemy within him recognized Jesus at once as the Holy One of God (which was at least a Messianic title, if not a divine one). Such unwilling forced witness Jesus would not accept; it was not the witness of the Holy Spirit. So he rebuked and expelled the spirit (25). Even this exhibition of power only produced amazement among those who saw it, not followers. Perhaps the man himself became a disciple of Jesus after his healing.

The witness of evil spirits such as this one to Jesus is in sharp contrast to Peter's confession (8:29), which in many ways forms the turning-point of the whole gospel.

1:29–34 Healing the sick (see Mt. 8:14–17; Lk. 4:38–41). Mark has shown Jesus expelling demons as a sign of the kingdom of God, now he shows him healing the sick. Simon Peter's mother-in-law was healed of a fever that very Sabbath evening, in her own home (are these details that we owe to Peter?). Next, after sunset (i.e. it was no longer the Sabbath and 'work' like healing the sick was allowed) it seemed as if all Capernaum gathered at the door, bringing both sick and demon-possessed. Mark makes a distinction between the two groups, but Jesus healed them both. When Mark says many were healed, he does not mean that some were left unhealed but is simply referring to the numbers involved. Again, Jesus refused to accept the witness of demons, though he drove them out.

One vivid detail in the story is the way in which the healed woman showed her love and gratitude to Jesus at once in practical ways by feeding both him and a dozen hungry disciples. Not all can preach, but all can love and serve in some way.

1:35–39 Jesus at prayer (see Lk. 4:42–44). Jesus, now a famous healer and expeller of demons, might have been expected to have taken advantage of this. We face the same pressures to choose the way of this world in our 'healing campaigns' or 'miracle rallies' today.

Here we see Jesus slipping away quietly to a lonely place to pray (35). Simon and the others seemed to think that he was making a mistake and losing the great opportunity the recent publicity had brought. This was not the last time that Simon's thoughts would be human thoughts, not God's (8:33). Jesus refused to be sought out as a mere miracle-worker; he wanted to be recognized as a saviour. The way to achieve this was to preach the good news, and Jesus committed himself to doing that in the nearby villages. He therefore took the disciples on a tour of the synagogues of thickly-populated Galilee, preaching the word, driving out demons and healing the sick. The driving out of demons is fundamental for it affects the soul, whereas bodily healing can only prolong earthly life for a while.

1:40–45 Healing a leper (see Mt. 8:1–4; Lk. 5:12–16). The word used here for leprosy covered many kinds of skin diseases as well as leprosy itself. They all cut off the sufferer from any contact with other people, since lepers were considered ceremonially unclean. In fact, the attitude to leprosy then was almost exactly that to AIDS today, a mixture of fear and disgust. Leprosy was often seen as God's punishment for sin, so although this man did not doubt Jesus' power to heal, he doubted his willingness. He need not have doubted because (as often stated in Mark) Jesus was filled with compassion for him and touched and healed him. The effect on the man of Jesus touching him must have been tremendous. Not only did Jesus risk infection, he deliberately became religiously 'unclean' so that the man might become clean. Did Mark intend this to be a picture of what Jesus would do for all of us on the cross?

Here was another wonderful chance for more publicity, which Jesus refused to take. Jesus warned the man in the strongest terms to do two things. The first was to go and get a 'health certificate' from the priests, without which he could not re-enter society and join in worship of God. The second was to tell nobody about his healing. Like many of us, the man thought that he knew better than Jesus, so he told everybody about his healing. Did he perhaps enjoy the publicity for himself? The results of his disobedience was that Jesus could no longer enter a town openly but stayed outside in lonely places.

Because of the attitude of Jesus, it is no wonder that the Christian church pioneered a work of love and mercy and healing to lepers, when all others rejected them. But what of sufferers from AIDS today? Will Christians show the same love and compassion to them? What would Jesus do?

2:1–12 Healing a paralysed man (see Mt. 9:1–8; Lk. 5:17–26). This next story shows us the result of the actions of the healed leper. When Jesus ventured back into Capernaum, the house was mobbed, presumably by people wanting healing. But Jesus continued to preach the good news to them, for that was his purpose. It must, therefore, have been a great temptation for him to be irritated when four men, anxious to get their sick friend healed, lowered him through the broken roof right in front of Jesus as he taught. But Jesus saw only faith. He never seems to have healed without faith, either on the part of the patient or of others. Perhaps the four friends thought that their action would bring Jesus back from 'useless' preaching to 'practical' healing. Jesus, instead of healing at once, publicly forgave the man his sins. Imagine their disappointment. Jesus saw that this was what the man both desired and needed most. Jesus never said that all disease was directly related to sin, as most Jews believed, and some Christians still believe today. Most doctors today would agree, however, that many sicknesses are indirectly related to our mental states and that a sense of guilt underlies some illnesses. Perhaps it was so in this case.

The story might have ended here (for in the joy of sins forgiven the man might not have cared whether he was healed physically or not) if it had not been for some teachers of the law who were there. They, quite correctly, observed to themselves that only God can forgive sins and so Jesus was committing blasphemy by assuming this right for himself. It never entered their heads to ask whether Jesus was more than mere man. The gospels make no secret of the insight of Jesus, and he, knowing their unspoken thoughts, asked a very obvious question: Was it easier to grant forgiveness or to grant healing? The unspoken answer was that there was no way to test the reality of forgiveness but a very easy way to test the reality of healing. To prove that he had the power to forgive, and as a sign of the kingdom, Jesus healed the paralysed man. There could be no argument about that. Again, amazement followed but not, apparently, faith in Jesus.

Jesus referred to himself indirectly as the Son of Man, which seems deliberately vague. In Mark this is the usual way Jesus describes himself. The title could be used in several ways e.g. either referring to 'mortal man' (a sort of representative of humanity) or echoing the heavenly figure of Dn. 7:13, coming down from God to exercise his rule.

This is the start of another theme in Mark, the opposition of the religious leaders to Jesus. As they had rejected John, so they would reject Jesus. Ordinary people, not blinded by prejudice, listened to both and received the good news.

2:13–17 The call of Levi (see Mt. 9:9–13; Lk. 5:27–32). Here is another sign of the kingdom: Jesus has driven out demons and healed sick bodies, now he shows that he can heal sick souls as well. The story begins with Jesus teaching. Mark never gives as full an account of the content of this teaching as Luke or Matthew do; for him the good news of the kingdom of God was the heart of it. The affect of Jesus on Levi was not a matter of hypnotic power or magnetic personality, as possessed by some leaders of false cults today. It is just that Mark has reduced the story to the bare minimum, keeping only the essential points.

We miss the wonder of Levi's call if we do not remember all that 'tax collector' meant in those days. It meant all that 'loan-shark' means to us today, with the added idea of collaborator, for it usually involved working for the hated imperial power or the equally hated local dictator, Herod. Tax collectors were usually greedy, dishonest and immoral. Worse still, to a Jew, they were ceremonially unclean through mixing continually with non-Jewish people. Who but Jesus would call a man like this to be his follower? If Levi is same as Matthew (although Mark does not say this), then who but Jesus would choose such a man to be an apostle? Jesus went to dinner at Levi's house; and this scandalized the teachers of the law who saw it as going too far. This was because the house was full of tax collectors and 'sinners', with not a 'righteous' person among them. 'Sinners' may simply be a bitter reference to the same tax collectors, or it may refer to the other people from the margins of society who also flocked to Jesus for forgiveness and a new life.

The teachers of the law asked Jesus' disciples why he behaved in this way. Jesus overheard them and answered by saying that just as it was only to be expected that a doctor should associate with sick people, so it was natural that he should mix with sinners. The whole purpose of Jesus' coming was to call such sinners to a change of heart and life (17). To those who were self-righteous and self-satisfied, he had nothing to offer, for the only way to enter the kingdom of God is as a self-confessed sinner. Do 'loan-sharks', cheats and prostitutes flock to our churches today? And would we welcome them if they came in penitence and faith? Or would we react in the same way as the teachers of the law? Would we be embarrassed and turn away?

2:18–22 The old and the new (see Mt. 9:14–17; Lk. 5:33–39). Jesus' unorthodox behaviour did not only provoke the criticism of the religious authorities, it also puzzled ordinary people. They wanted to know why Jesus' followers were different from those of the Pharisees and John the Baptist and did not seem to worry about some of the rituals of Judaism like, for instance, the weekly fastdays. Such practices, though not in the Law of Moses, had come to be just as important in Jewish eyes. Jesus gave a quick answer: nobody fasts at a wedding-feast. Fasting shows sorrow, and if there is any sorrow, it would be after the feast, when the bridegroom had left the party. This may have been a popular proverb (like the saying about doctors and sick people above) but Jesus clearly meant himself when he spoke of the bridegroom. The words taken from them imply violence (if not death), so Jesus may have been speaking about the cross, bringing sorrow to all.

There is an issue here that goes deeper than fasting alone. If Jesus had brought fresh spiritual life, could it be contained within the old rigid forms of Judaism or would it need fresh forms? That is the problem facing the church in many parts of the world today where there is charismatic renewal or a revival movement. Some accommodation and adjustment must be made or there will be splits and divisions, as sadly there have been already, with great loss to both sides. Jesus never condemned fasting; he fasted himself. But formal and compulsory Jewish fasting would not fit with the freedom and spontaneity of the new life which he brought. Are we stifling new life by old forms, however beloved they may be to us? Some forms we must have but have we worked out new forms and are they suitable?

2:23–28 Lord of the Sabbath (see Mt. 12:1–8; Lk. 6:1–5). It almost seems from the continual criticism of Jesus, that one of the signs of the kingdom of God is the opposition of those who are blind to it. In this passage, the opposition was because the disciples of Jesus, who were hungry, picked corn on the Sabbath and so broke the complicated series of Sabbath laws. Jesus replied to the Pharisees by quoting a scriptural example which they could not deny. The great king David had committed a far greater breach of Sabbath laws when he was in need, and he was not blamed for it. The irony of saying ‘Have you never read?’ to people who claimed to be experts in scripture is obvious and Jesus often used this in argument. The high priest at the time of David’s action was Ahimelech, the father of Abiathar, but the name is not the point of the story.

Some rabbis really believed and taught that humans were created in order to keep Sabbath. Jesus showed how absurd this was, teaching that the Sabbath was God’s loving provision to us for rest and worship. Jesus again used the enigmatic title the Son of Man, who he said was the Lord (or master) of the Sabbath. This could be interpreted as meaning that all humans have the right to decide how Sabbath is to be used. It is more likely that Jesus was referring to himself as the one who had the right to decide. If so, then he was clearly claiming to be equal with God, who had instituted the Sabbath. Once again Mark raises the question of who the Son of Man is and, indeed, of who Jesus is. This question becomes more urgent all the time.

Did those who opposed Jesus deliberately shut their eyes to the truth? If someone does not accept Christ and his claims, then they may come to oppose him more and more bitterly as the Pharisees and teachers of the law did. This is the negative side of the law of spiritual response to which Jesus often referred. The more we respond to truth, the more we will be able to grasp it. The less we respond to truth (by ignoring it or closing our eyes to it), the less we will be able to grasp it. This is a fundamental truth found in the parables of Jesus.

3:1–6 The maimed man (see Mt. 12:9–14; Lk. 6:6–11). Jesus’ opponents found another chance to accuse him of disregarding the Sabbath when he healed a crippled man, for whom they do not seem to have felt any pity. Healing on Sabbath was only allowed by the rabbis in cases of life and death, and this was clearly not one of them. Jesus made no attempt to avoid the trap, as he could have done. Instead, he called the man to stand before them all and asked a question which went right to the heart of the issue. Clearly to leave such a man unhealed, when Jesus had the power to heal him, was to do evil. To do good on the Sabbath by healing the man was obviously the right course of action, and surely the Sabbath law did not forbid it? (The second half of Jesus’ question, ‘to save life or to kill’ is only a stronger way of saying the same thing.) The Pharisees could not reply without condemning themselves, so they remained silent. Mark records that Jesus was angry as well as grieved at their stubbornness of heart. As this is one of the very few occasions when Mark records Jesus’ anger, it is important to see what caused it.

The healing of this man on Sabbath was the moment when two most unlikely allies, the Pharisees and Herodians, decided to get rid of Jesus and began to plot how they might kill him. If we do not believe in Jesus, then we must finally crucify him. Mark warns us of this choice right from the start of his gospel. The Pharisees were the ‘religious fundamentalists’ of their day, while the Herodians, unknown outside Mark, seem to have been a secular party, supporting the Herodian dynasty. This was a combination of cynicism and political opportunism, one that is often seen in the world where there is opposition to the gospel. The enemy will use any tools that he can.

3:7–12 The crowds come (cf. Mt. 12:15–21; Lk. 6:17–19). Although the religious teachers may have rejected him, the crowds did not; sometimes ordinary people can see what the theologians are blind to. The crowds continued to flock to Jesus, probably mostly for healing. On this occasion there were so many that Jesus had to sit in a boat in order to teach the people who were on the shore around. He also healed sick people and drove out demons, though he would not allow them to speak. The evil spirits recognized Jesus as the Son of God. God had called Jesus his ‘Son’ at his baptism (1:11), and the Roman officer would give the title to him at the cross (15:39). Jesus himself accepted it before the high priest at his trial, when there was no longer any need to hide it and the Messianic secret was soon to be open for all to see (14:62).

3:13–19 Appointing the Twelve (see Mt. 10:1–4; Lk. 6:12–16). We know from the other gospels that the reason Jesus went up the mountain was to pray before making such an important choice. Even the Son of God needed to find a place where he could be alone with God, and there was no quiet anywhere else. Jesus taught us to seek privacy for prayer if at all possible (Mt. 6:6).

When Jesus calls us to respond to him, his love compels us to follow. These twelve were Jesus’ ‘team’ (as we might speak of a football ‘eleven’ today) appointed to work together with him and with one another. He refers to them in terms of his wider family in vs 31–35. Mark does not elsewhere call them apostles, though this is the name that they were known by later. For this reason some manuscripts leave out the word here. But, whether we use the name or not, they were all Jesus’ missionaries, and Mark the missionary knew that very well. We can see what ‘apostle’ means from v 14. Jesus chose these men so that he could send them out to preach the good news, just as he was doing himself. However, before they would be ready to preach the good news they had to spend time with Jesus and learn to pattern their lives on him. If we do not follow their example, our preaching will be like loudspeakers blaring meaningless propaganda.

They also had to show the power of Jesus and the Spirit by conquering the enemy, as Jesus had done. So Jesus committed to them his power to drive out demons (Matthew adds the power of healing sicknesses in his name). These were both signs of the coming of the kingdom of God. It is important to notice that Jesus shared his power with very imperfect humans, like us. Indeed, Mark seems throughout the whole of his gospel to go out of his way to emphasize the imperfections of the Twelve and especially of Peter, who in many ways was the leader. In doing this, Mark was simply describing the facts; he was not trying to belittle the apostles, as some have suggested. It makes God’s grace all the more wonderful (as Paul saw; 2 Cor. 4:7) that there are no supermen or superwomen in the NT, only sinners saved by grace. The other gospel writers softened down some of the stories, but Mark wants to show us that the apostles were people just like us, with all our weaknesses. NT ‘saints’ do not have bright haloes around their heads; that was an invention of the later church!

Another point that also emphasizes the apostles’ ‘ordinariness’ is that they mostly had nicknames, some given by Jesus himself. In most parts of the world, people are known by nicknames describing their character rather than by their real names. These disciples were real-life people.

So there was Simon, whom Jesus nicknamed ‘Peter’ or ‘The Rock’, and James and John, whom he nicknamed Sons of Thunder (or ‘Thunder and Lightning’ as we might say today). Thomas was called ‘the Twin’, and another Simon was called ‘the Zealot’ which may have been a reference to his ‘zeal’ for the nationalist cause in Israel. Judas’s nickname, ‘Iscariot’, may also suggest connections with this movement. When we remember boastful Simon, who denied Jesus, Thomas, who doubted him, James and John, who were ambitious for themselves and all the disciples, who ran away terrified when Jesus was arrested, we are not glorifying their weaknesses but glorifying the God who can use people as weak as they were, and we are (2 Cor. 12:9).

3:20–30 Blasphemy against the Spirit (see Mt. 12:22–37; Lk. 11:14–23). Even the family of Jesus thought that he must be out of his mind. Many of God's most faithful servants, from Paul down to John Sung, the great evangelist of south-east Asia, have faced this same charge. But the teachers of the law who must have come down from Jerusalem on a special commission of enquiry, went further in their spite. They said that Jesus was not mad, but demon-possessed. Beelzebub seems to be another name for Satan here. For more on the spelling of the name and its exact meaning, see the larger commentaries. The Bible teaches us that we have only one spiritual enemy, even if he has many servants; and he is a defeated enemy already.

It is hard to believe that even the teachers of the law thought this accusation was true; that is why Jesus' rebuke was so severe. First, he showed how stupid the suggestion of a 'civil war' within Satan himself is. Then he pointed out that his expulsion of demons meant a victory over the enemy, not a siding with him. Lastly, he gave a grave warning about the only unforgivable sin in the Bible, the sin against the Holy Spirit. This seems to mean the deliberate closing of the heart and mind to the witness of the Spirit to Jesus, something of which the teachers had just shown themselves to be guilty. Such a wilful and deliberate twisting of truth makes repentance and salvation impossible, for it has shut the one gate to salvation that God has opened. It is not that God is unwilling to forgive, but that the person concerned is unwilling to receive his forgiveness. If we still fear that we might be guilty, it is a clear sign that we have not committed this ultimate sin and are in no danger of committing it. Indeed, as has often been said, the real emphasis is on the other side: the wonderful truth is that all other sins can be forgiven. To hold fast to these truths will save sensitive souls much agony, especially those who have been forced to blaspheme Christ in times of persecution. We may think of Saul of Tarsus, who tried to force early Jewish Christians to blaspheme (Acts 26:11), or dictatorships and Communist governments in our own day. Peter cursed and swore that he did not know Jesus, and if he could repent and be forgiven, so can we.

It is most important, especially in a world where he seems so powerful, that we realize that the enemy has already been defeated. Every time in Mark's gospel that Jesus drives out Satan from the life of a person and frees him or her from his power, we have another proof of that. Satan's defeat is equally true whether he shows his power in non-Christian religions (third-world Christians will know that while there may be some truth in them, there is also often something of the demonic), or 'magic' and 'spells', or the revival of satanism and the occult in the West today. The strong man has been already conquered and tied up: the battle has been fought and won, and now there are only 'mopping-up' operations. The reference to possessions being carried off indicates that those whom the enemy possessed before can now go free.

3:31–35 The family of Christ (see Mt. 12:46–50; Lk. 8:19–21). The misunderstanding of God's kingdom and its demands continues. In v 21, even his own family had thought Jesus out of his mind and had wanted to take him home. Here, his mother and brothers came looking for him—was it for the same reason? Both they and the crowd would have assumed that Jesus would stop his teaching at once and come out to see them, as respect for parents was one of the Ten Commandments. Instead, Jesus pointed to a loyalty and a commandment far more basic, a claim of God that went far deeper than the claims of any earthly family. The priorities of God's kingdom are different, and this is bound to be a stumbling-block in the eyes of this world. Jesus said that whoever does God's will (note the usual contrast between merely 'hearing' and actually 'doing') is closer to him than any of his blood-relatives.

Remember that, as yet, his brothers did not believe in him, and even Mary cannot have completely understood him, or she would not have come on this trip. This word will bring great comfort to some of us who were rejected by home and family when we became Christians, but who found in this 'family of Christ' love and support. This does not mean that Jesus ceased to love and care for his mother, or that Christians have no responsibility for their own family members who do not turn to Christ. It is only that Jesus must always come first, no matter how much pain that may cause to us or others. Only those who love Christ more than their nearest and dearest can be his disciples.

However, this is totally different from the teaching of the various cults who insist on total physical separation from family members who do not join the sect. Some extreme Christian groups also hold this wrong view.

4:1–34 Parables of the kingdom of God

This section is an example of what Jesus' teaching was like. Jesus used many parables, vivid illustrations of spiritual truth, drawn from everyday life. Those who preach the gospel in the open air, specially in the Third World, will know well the value of this method. It captures and holds the interest of ordinary listeners, and if they are thoughtful, will lead them to see the spiritual truth. Otherwise, they will just enjoy the story, laugh and forget it, as often happened in Jesus' day.

4:1–20 Sowing the seed (see Mt. 13:1–23; Lk. 8:1–15). Once again, Jesus took refuge from the crowds on board a boat, anchored just off the shore. This was not the first time that Jesus had used parables, for 2:17, 19 and 21 were all mini-parables of the same sort. This is, however, the first parable told at length and explained in detail. This parable of a farmer sowing seed is a vivid picture of the preaching of the gospel. It explains that the difference in the results all depends on the nature of the human heart that receives the gospel. We must always remember that a parable is not the same as an allegory (very rarely used in the Bible, if at all). In an allegory, every detail has some spiritual significance, while in a parable much of the detail may not be important; it is the story as a whole which conveys the message.

There may or may not have been a Galilean farmer actually sowing on the hillside above at the time: if there was, then it would have made the illustration even more vivid. But the real point is that, as he was speaking, Jesus was actually sowing the word, and the hearers were responding in the different ways that he described; they were all part of the parable themselves.

Only one of the four types of ground described proved fruitful, but it is unfair to blame the farmer for this, as some over-zealous commentators have done ('he should have prepared the ground better', 'he should only have sown in the good soil'). The farmer must have known that some parts of his land were better than others, but he was giving them all an equal chance; it was probably the only land that he had. Only the results at harvest would show which was the good soil, and that would produce an amazing crop. We are told that even a tenfold return was good in Palestine; here the good soil yielded a hundredfold. So we can see that the final emphasis of the illustration is positive, not negative, a promise to encourage us, not just a warning to sober us.

It may seem strange to us today that the Twelve totally failed to understand the parable (remember how often Mark shows them in this light) but then we have always known the explanation, which they received only later. Jesus often explained things afterwards in private to his disciples. It would have been of no use explaining the parable's meaning to those who had not even taken the first step of thinking over the illustration. The Twelve showed that they were ready for the explanation by asking for it. That is why Jesus warned his listeners to listen thoughtfully (9).

In a sense, this parable is the key to all the other parables, because in all of them Jesus preaches or 'sows' the word. The quotation from Isaiah in v 12 does not mean that God deliberately hides his truth from us; if that were so, what would be the point of any parables? What is expressed as the purpose of parables is in fact an observation of how they actually work in practice. In spite of all their looking and listening, some people will not really see or understand; if they did, they would turn to God for forgiveness. Isaiah was describing a hard-hearted people who had turned their back on God and stubbornly refused to listen to him. This is what many of Jesus' hearers are like, even today.

But, even in the case of those ready to listen, shallow response is a danger. Careless or superficial listeners, who have no root, or those whose lives are too full of worries or pleasures (sometimes equal dangers) will bear no fruit. Only those who listen, accept and act will be fruitful. Sometimes this parable is thought to teach spiritual persistence; but it is also a promise of spiritual reward. If we obey the laws of spiritual growth, as surely as there is a seed-time, harvest will come.

4:21–25 Lamps and lampstands (see Lk. 8:16–18; cf. Mk. 5:14–16). This section addresses the issue of whether the kingdom of God will always be a secret, hidden from the many and revealed only to the few. (Perhaps it still seems this way to some of us today?) Jesus said that one day God's kingdom will be plain to all. Lamps are meant to give light, not to hide it. In the same way, the final purpose of parables is to reveal truth, not conceal it. However, there is a time when parables are the best way to reveal truth, for they 'filter' or 'strain' the listeners, as we might filter a liquid through a fine cloth to purify it. The disciples must first absorb the truth that Jesus taught through parables, so that they would be able to absorb more truth later. Like any good teacher, Jesus teaches only as we are able to understand and willing to respond. There is no such thing as standing still in the spiritual life; if we cease to grow, then we shrink. This is either a promise or a warning, depending on our spiritual attitude.

4:26–34 Parables of growth (see Mt. 13:31–35; Lk. 13:18–19). Here are two more vivid parables of spiritual growth. The first reminds us of the quiet and continuous (we might almost say 'inevitable') growth of God's kingdom in our hearts. We do not need to be anxious and struggle: the seed will bear fruit of its own accord. We cannot understand the process of spiritual growth, any more than we can understand the process of natural growth, but we do not need to understand in order to share in it. The seed needs only the right conditions for growth. Harvest is a promise, but it may bring a hint of God's judgment as well, as it often does in the Bible.

The second parable again describes silent, almost unnoticed, growth, with amazing results. Mustard seed is tiny, but it grows in time, into a bush that is one of the biggest plants in the Near East. So the kingdom will grow from insignificant beginnings to final triumph. This is a great encouragement to those who live in lands where Christians are a tiny, despised and perhaps persecuted minority. We work with confidence, waiting for God to fulfil his promise. The earthly ministry of Jesus was like that too; it seemed insignificant, yet from it grew a mighty world-wide Christian church, which is still growing. The closing verses show that these are only samples of the many illustrations that Jesus used, and they show his graded method of instruction and explanation (as much as they could understand) to those who would listen. If the others had been ready to listen, then they too would have understood, and so would have received more teaching, as the disciples did. There is no unfair favouritism in the kingdom of God; we all have the same opportunities of spiritual growth, if only we will take them.

4:35–8:26 Powers of the kingdom of God

This is the start of a long section full of stories of miracles, all illustrating power in different areas. The NT is clear that Jesus performed miracles; even his enemies admitted it, although some of them said that he worked through the powers of evil not through the power of God. As we have seen, Jesus easily disproved this charge. How Jesus performed miracles we do not know or need to know. Of course, as Son of God he was not restricted in the same way that we are. The greatest miracle of all, however, was that he summoned imperfect human disciples to join him in his task. Once again, we must remember that miracles are not meaningless magic, but designed to show us who Jesus was. That is why, although Mark's gospel contains a great collection of miracle stories, they are all in the opening chapters. Once Peter recognized that Jesus was the Messiah, there was a change. From teaching the crowds, Jesus turned to teaching his own disciples, and there was no longer any need for more miracles to show them who he was.

Are such miracles still needed today, in preaching the gospel? Opinions have been divided on this question throughout church history, and it has come to the fore during times of charismatic renewal and revival. Some have felt firmly that all miracles ceased once the NT had been written; others have felt that 'power evangelism' demands continual miracles to support preaching; others have felt that God may perform or withhold miracles at his sovereign will. Whichever we believe, it is important that we do not see miracles as a suspension of the natural order, but as God working in all things and in all ways, whether usual or unusual to us.

4:35–41 Power over nature (see Mt. 8:23–27; Lk. 8:22–25). The first of the group of miracles is a 'nature' miracle. Jesus, who had already shown himself Lord over demons and sicknesses, now showed himself Lord over nature. The story is full of vivid eyewitness details (e.g. the cushion of v 38). We can almost see the storm on the lake and the terrified disciples (was this meant as a picture of the persecuted church at Rome, or in our lands today?). The frightened disciples rebuked Jesus by implication (38), and then he actually rebuked the wind and storm, and they obeyed his word of command (39). None but the Creator himself could have done this. In the OT God alone is the one who causes storms and calms them. The disciples only half grasped the truth and were too terrified to express it (41). The chief lesson for us is Jesus' rebuke to his disciples for their lack of trust in him. We must learn to trust completely, even if our obedience to him leads us into storms, whether persecution or anything else. (It was Jesus, not the disciples who had suggested crossing the lake; they were not out of his will.) Sometimes we assume that storms show disobedience, but this is not always so.

Some will say that this is 'spiritualizing' a miracle which dealt with the calming of an actual storm on the lake. They feel that we should trust Jesus to calm actual storms and save us when we are travelling. Of course, God can do whatever he wills, but he did not calm the storm for Paul (Acts 27), although Paul was a man of great faith. The disciples on this occasion had little faith, so the calming (or not) of a storm does not seem to depend on faith, but on God's will. God strengthened Paul to endure the storm in quiet faith. Sometimes God saves us from trouble; sometimes he saves us in trouble; sometimes he saves us from death; and sometimes he uses our death to glorify his name. Should we expect to be able to rebuke wind and waves, as Jesus did? According to the gospels, only Jesus did 'nature' miracles (for only Jesus is God), and there is no hint that he ever gave this power to his disciples. Only God can do God's work.

5:1–20 Power over demons (see Mt. 8:28–34; Lk. 8:26–39). Once again, the powers of God’s kingdom are shown by the driving out of demons from a man. This exorcism is different from the others. First, the man was probably not Jewish; he certainly lived in a Gentile area. Secondly, the witness of the enemy was more specific, although it was not accepted by Jesus and was not expressed in Jewish terms. The exact place where the incident took place is uncertain, but it was across the lake, i.e. on the eastern, Gentile side. This man was not someone sitting quietly in a synagogue until aroused by Jesus’ preaching; his state was desperate, and no human beings could help or even restrain him. (Some of us will know well the almost superhuman strength shown by the demonized.) This man was in agony, torturing himself and under the influence of evil powers. That seems to be the significance of the name Legion (‘Army’) that he gave himself. There is no hint in Scripture that we need to know the name of an evil force before expelling it, nor does the Bible suggest that multitudes of demons have different names and personalities. These are ideas taken over from other religions, which we should reject like the idea that there is one demon of lust, another of greed and so on. One enemy is enough for us to beware of. (In this account the evil spirit is described in the singular in vs 2 and 8 and in the plural in vs 9, 10, 12 and 13.)

Unlovable though the man was, Jesus loved and pitied him. His command to the spirit to depart came before the man’s outburst, which was therefore in a sense his response to the good news, which was before him in person in Jesus. Most High God was a typical Gentile name for the God of Israel.

We may guess that the entry of the demons into the pigs was necessary, especially in a Gentile area, so that both the man and everybody else might see that the forces of evil had truly left the man. It was an outward aid to faith, though one which prompts modern readers to wonder about the loss of animal life, let alone the economic loss to the owners of the pigs. It was also another clear outward sign of the powers of God’s kingdom. This story too is full of eyewitness touches, like the number of the pigs. It is true that pigs panic easily, but to say that does not explain why these pigs should. The true miracle was not what happened to the pigs but what happened to the man, who was completely changed (15).

This display of God’s power brought only fear to the unbelieving, not faith, and this often happens in the Third World even today. Instead of begging Jesus to stay, the local people begged him to leave, and so he went. What a disaster for them! The healed man begged to go with Jesus, but Jesus did not allow him. This was probably because his witness to Jesus in that non-Jewish area was supremely valuable. Perhaps that was also why in this case Jesus asked the man to witness to the mercy that God had shown him. God may lead different Christians to do different things for his own purposes.

5:21–43 Power over death (see Mt. 9:18–26; Lk. 8:40–56). This story concerns an area where the powers of God’s kingdom had not yet been shown by Jesus: the conquest of death, the last great enemy. The healing of Jairus’s daughter shows Jesus as Lord of life and death, but in typically Marcan style it is ‘sandwiched’ around the story of another healing, that of a woman with persistent bleeding.

Jairus was humble and believing and ready to confess his need. He admitted that his daughter was dying, but believed that a touch from Jesus would heal her. The woman showed even greater faith; she had faith that if she could only touch Jesus’ clothes, she would be healed. This was not superstition or sheer magic, it was faith. She knew in her heart that any contact with Jesus, however slight, would bring healing to her (28), and so it did. It is important to notice that Jesus did not say ‘Your touch has saved you’ but ‘Your faith has healed you’, and we have no mandate to place any reliance on the power of touch by sending handkerchiefs that have been blessed to lay on sick people in hope of healing. V 30 reads as if healing was costly to Jesus (just as all true preaching is costly to the preacher), but it may simply be an instance of his super-natural insight. The disciples found Jesus’ question absurd and told him so (31). The terrified woman knew that in touching Jesus’ clothing she had ceremonially defiled him and that contact with her had probably defiled every other member of the crowd as well. Menstruation made women ceremonially unclean and cut them off from any fellowship with God’s people for a part of every month. This woman’s sickness had meant that in her case the exclusion had been for twelve long years. Mark records that she had tried in vain all medical help, getting worse rather than better. Luke the doctor softened the language a little (Lk. 8:43). What she must have found hard to understand was that here was one who would willingly ‘defile’ himself for her sake, so that she might become ‘clean’. Jesus previously did this for the leper. Here is the true power of God’s kingdom, for here is the power of the cross and the power of love.

Jesus’ conversation with the sick woman meant that he was delayed in reaching Jairus’s house, and news came that his daughter had died (35). Jairus could already believe the difficult; could he now believe the impossible? That is what Jesus asked him to do, in spite of all the worldly-wisdom of the hired mourners who filled the house. Their scornful laughter shows the absurdity of the view that the girl was only unconscious; they knew death well. When Jesus said asleep, he was referring to the fact that he would raise her up, as well as the new view of death that he would bring by his resurrection.

This unbelief shut the mourners out from seeing the miracle. Only the ‘inner three’ (Peter, James and John) were allowed to witness it, along with the parents. (The eyewitness touches must have come from one of them.) These three may have been more responsive to Jesus than the others and so were closer to him. Jesus used a loving phrase in Aramaic (the native tongue of both Jesus and the girl) which is translated by Mark for his non-Jewish readers. The word translated little girl has the same affectionate tone to it as calling a child a ‘lamb’ in English.

Having brought the child back to life and seen her walk about, Jesus told her parents to give her something to eat. This last practical touch put the astonished family firmly back in everyday life.

It is probably better to call this incident a ‘reviving’ rather than a ‘resurrection’, for the girl would still have to die one day. When Jesus himself rose from the dead his body was changed, and when we rise because of him, our bodies will be changed and we shall never have to pass through death again (1 Cor. 15). Apart from this story, Luke records Jesus as bringing back to life only the widow’s son from Nain, and John adds the raising of Lazarus. We should not, therefore, assume that Jesus often did this sort of miracle: it was not necessary that he should, once he had shown his power. Both Peter (Acts 9:41) and Paul (Acts 20:10) raised dead persons, but they only did it on one occasion, so it must have had some special value. It is not a spiritual gift promised by Jesus to his disciples, and so we should not claim it for ourselves.

6:1–6 Limits of power (see Mt. 13:53–58; cf. Lk. 4:16–30). These powers of the kingdom seem to have had very little effect on some of those who saw them or heard of them, to judge from this next story. This shows that signs in themselves will never produce faith, for faith is a personal commitment and choice. Perhaps that is why Jesus gave signs so sparingly, and only in answer to faith. He was not trying to convince the unbelieving, for that would be impossible.

When Jesus came to his home town (probably meaning Nazareth, though he had actually moved to Capernaum, beside the lake, before this) those who heard him were amazed at his teaching and miracles, but this did not lead to faith in him. They repeated in puzzlement the names of his family members: had he not even worked there himself as a carpenter once? How could such a familiar figure do and say such things? The trouble was that they were too busy arguing about him to listen to his words. So even the Son of God could do no miracles there, apart from healing a few sick folk, humble enough and needy enough to believe in him. That does not mean that God's power is absolutely limited, but that God has chosen to act only in response to faith. Usually, Mark says that people were amazed at Jesus; here, he says that Jesus was amazed at them. The people of Nazareth were so familiar with Jesus that they enjoyed no blessing: a danger perhaps facing some of our churches today? Familiarity, the proverb says, breeds contempt.

6:7–13 Sharing of power (see Mt. 9:35–10:15; Lk. 9:1–6). In spite of unbelief, the work of spreading the good news had to go on, and so Jesus sent out the Twelve on a mission. The gospels differ slightly in describing what the apostles were to wear and to take with them, but that is not important. All agree that they were to 'travel light'. Those engaged in the work of evangelism must not be fussy about food or accommodation; they must realize that their mission is one of life and death for their hearers. Jews often shook off the dust of heathen places when they had left them, but on this occasion the disciples were to do it as a solemn legal witness to the rejection of the gospel.

Jesus committed to the Twelve his power to expel demons, but we can see from v 12 that their main task was preaching the gospel that leads to the expulsion of demons and healing of the sick. Anointing with oil is symbolic here, not medical, as it seems to be in the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10). There is no record of Jesus ever having used oil, and there are plenty of examples in the NT of healing without it. Jas. 5:14 is therefore not a universal rule, but an outward aid to faith; there is nothing magical in the oil itself.

6:14–29 The death of John the Baptist (see Mt. 14:1–12; Lk. 9:7–9, 19–20). John's imprisonment was the sign for Jesus' ministry to begin, so John's death was the sign of how that ministry would end. It is striking to see here the different ways of understanding Jesus' ministry there were. Some saw him as Elijah returned (his coming was expected before the coming of the Messiah). Others saw him as at least a prophet. Herod's guilty conscience led him to think that Jesus was John, risen from the dead to confront and rebuke him again.

The details of the sordid story need not detain us: a fearless prophet, a vicious king, a vindictive woman, a shameless girl (none else would dance in public to entertain party guests) and a lonely death. Where were the powers of God's kingdom here in this situation? Even John himself had been tempted to ask that question while in prison (Mt. 11:3). We can answer only in the light of Calvary, when Jesus himself walked the same path of undeserved suffering for us; for the cross, in spite of its apparent weakness, is God's power leading to salvation (Rom. 1:16). If Jesus took this path, then all his followers must be prepared to take it too.

6:30–44 Feeding the five thousand (see Mt. 14:15–21; Lk. 9:12–17). Mark follows this story of the apparent weakness of God's kingdom in the eyes of this world with some stories that show its power. In them Jesus demonstrates the power of the Creator God, still in control of the universe that he had created.

The first story begins in a typically matter-of-fact way. The disciples have returned from their evangelistic mission triumphant but exhausted, so Jesus understandingly led them to a quiet place to rest. They were followed by an expectant crowd, who disturbed their planned time of refreshment and relaxation. Jesus had compassion on these people and began teaching them many things. It does not seem as though he asked the disciples to do anything. At the end of the day they came to Jesus and asked him to send the crowd away to get something to eat. They were taken aback when he suggested that they feed the people themselves. The only food that they could find was five of the flat local loaves and two dried fish. To obey Jesus and get the eager hungry crowds sat down in orderly groups must have tested their faith that he could do something about the situation. The vivid description of the scene, with details such as the green grass, must have come from an eyewitness. In multiplying the loaves and fish God did in one moment of time what he does every day with the corn in the fields and the fish in the sea. To us, it is a miracle; to him, it is natural.

Mark rescues the miracle from appearing magical by giving it a matter-of-fact ending: the tired disciples bending double as they collected all the left-over bread and scraps of fish into baskets (possibly for the next day's meal). We should not expect to live a life entirely made up of spiritual thrills; that would be spiritually unhealthy and not help us to mature in Christ. It is strange that the disciples did not seem to have learned anything from this miracle; Jesus had to repeat the lesson later. This was not because they were particularly stupid and unresponsive; it was because they were just like us.

6:45–56 Lord of nature (see Mt. 14:22–33). When everyone had gone and Jesus had packed the disciples on to a boat to return to Bethsaida he climbed the hill for a time of prayer alone. He had fed the crowds as Moses had fed Israel in the wilderness with manna. Would they now be in danger of following him purely in hope of food, as before they had done purely in hope of healing? (see Jn. 6:26). Jesus' prayer was interrupted by his concern for his disciples. From the hill he could see the boat far below on the lake, making no headway because of the wind. So, at dead of night, he went to them, walking on the lake. It is impossible to think of this as meaning that he walked along the shore or along a sandbank, as some have interpreted it. The disciples, being fishermen knew their lake well, and they would not have been terrified by that. There are no difficulties with Jesus walking on the water if we remember that he was Son of God. In the OT God controlled the raging waters, and here his Son was doing the same.

We do not know why Jesus was about to pass by them. Perhaps he wanted them to recognize him and call for help, or to show their faith in some other way. If so, he was disappointed, for when they did cry out it was only in terror. But even this cry of fear was enough to bring Jesus on to the boat, from where he calmed the wind. They had forgotten the miracle of multiplying the loaves; they had forgotten that he had calmed one storm already. Their reaction was to be completely amazed because they did not understand, even though the powers of the kingdom of God had been clearly shown.

On landing the boat, Jesus was met by a crowd of people bringing the sick to him for healing. Their faith was like that of the woman suffering from bleeding; they only asked to touch the edge of his cloak, for they knew and believed that he could heal them. Sometimes the simplest of Christians can see at once spiritual truths to which theologians are blind.

7:1–23 The source of sin (see Mt. 15:1–20). We have seen that even the nature miracles had not convinced the disciples that Jesus was the Son of God; their hearts were hardened, or as we would say, their minds were closed. The ordinary people accepted his healings gladly, but still did not know who he was. The Pharisees and law-teachers continued with their endless criticisms; they were determined not to believe. This time, they complained that Jesus' followers did not wash their hands after any accidental contact with Gentiles in the street; it was not a matter of hygiene but religious scruples. Mark explains to his non-Jewish readers that this was only part of a complicated series of ritual washings used by the Jews. It all came from tradition, not from Moses, but was held just as fiercely, just as ‘traditions’ are in Islam today. Is this sometimes true of Christianity too?

Jesus did not deny that his disciples broke the traditions, but justified it by saying that these traditions were merely of men, and that in the case of the Pharisees, observing them often went along with a rejection of God’s plain command. If tradition contradicts Scripture, it must go, no matter how much loved. A stinging quotation from Isaiah proved the point, and then Jesus illustrated it with an example of a Pharisaic way of denying a Mosaic commandment by a typically rabbinic trick. If a man vowed to the temple the money that he would normally have spent on caring for aged parents, he was freed from the obligation of providing for them. As usual, Mark explains the technical word Corban, used to describe this sort of offering-vow. This legalistic trick, done in the name of religion, was sheer hypocrisy, as Jesus showed. Worse still, it was only one example out of many.

The laws about ‘purity’ were another example, so Jesus took the opportunity to explain to the crowds that the true nature of ‘contamination’ is not ritual but moral, and it springs from within not from without, as the Pharisees taught. This seems so obvious to us today that we cannot see why the disciples could not understand it (17). They, like most Jews of their time, thought of sin as a sort of germ, an infection caught by contact with others outside. (This is roughly the Confucian view, shared by most non-Christian religions.) Jesus taught that sin was like a cancer, growing within us, Jew and non-Jew alike. That is far harder to deal with, for we cannot avoid it by avoiding ‘infection’ from others; it needs radical spiritual surgery that will change our inner nature. That is what John meant by saying that the one coming after him would baptize with the Holy Spirit. Sometimes we associate ‘baptism with the Spirit’ solely with spiritual gifts; the Bible associates it more often with a changed nature.

Jesus drove home the absurdity of the views of the Pharisees by a commonsense illustration, called a parable here. What goes into the stomach is not going to affect our spiritual lives, but only our digestion, and our digestive processes will deal with it in due course. The view of the Pharisees about defilement was crude and over-literal, like those who think that either the Holy Spirit or demons live somewhere inside our physical bodies and, therefore, look for vomiting as a sign of the expulsion of demons. Jesus showed that the heart (we would say today, the mind) is the source of defilement and gave a sobering list of the awful things that can flow from it.

Mark gives the correct deduction that if this is so, all food is clean (‘halal’ as a Muslim would say) and permitted to be eaten (19). This would have been a great relief to hearers in a church like Rome, to Jew and non-Jew alike, for it would have made fellowship at the Lord’s table easier (Gal. 2:12).

7:24–30 Faith of a foreigner (see Mt. 15:21–28). Mark continues the theme of ‘impurity’ with the story of a Gentile (therefore ‘impure’) person. In a sense it is a missionary story. It seems as if Jesus was seeking a place of quiet in a Gentile region, but he could not escape notice. This time, it was not a crowd, but a Greek-speaking local woman who came, begging that he would drive out an evil spirit from her daughter. In his answer (27) Jesus was probably quoting a popular proverb, and was therefore not being as harsh as it sounds. In any case, the emphasis is on the first part of the sentence. While Jesus was on earth, his mission was in the first place to Israel (Mt. 15:24). After the cross, the turn of the Gentiles would come, in the universal mission so dear to Mark. But the woman’s faith was great and so was her persistence, for her need was great. She accepted good-humouredly that she had no right at this stage to claim God’s grace but simply threw herself on his mercy, turning Jesus’ parable back in his direction.

Was Jesus only testing her, to see if her faith was great enough? Such faith was rewarded. It is a miracle of grace that Gentiles share in all the promises of God made to Israel (Rom. 11:18). It is easy for us to presume on our position.

7:31–37 The deaf and dumb man. This story of a physical healing is an illustration of that fact that even if people are deaf to God (as the Pharisees were) Jesus can heal them. The actions used by Jesus were intended to make the man understand that this was not healing by magic but healing by God in answer to prayer. Jesus wanted to create faith in the man before he would heal. So, deafness was imitated by stopping the man's ears, and healing of dumbness imitated by touching his tongue and spitting out. Looking up to heaven and sighing were visible pictures of prayer that a deaf and dumb man could understand. The word of command was spoken in the man's own native Aramaic, which Mark interprets for his non-Palestinian church.

As usual, Jesus commanded silence, and as usual, he was disobeyed. The excited people said, 'He has done everything well', and were amazed, but did they believe? In a short while, Peter would make the leap of faith from this amazement to recognizing the true nature of Jesus: deaf Peter will hear, and dumb Peter will speak.

8:1–13 Feeding the four thousand (see Mt. 15:32–39). A few more exhibitions of the powers of the kingdom of God were given before Jesus decided that his disciples were ready for their final 'test'. Had they learned yet who he was? Had they learned the lesson of the feeding of the five thousand? Here was an opportunity for them to show if they had, and they failed miserably. Once again, there was a hungry crowd intent on Jesus' teaching. Once again, Jesus showed his compassion; and once again, the disciples showed their helplessness (4). Their thinking was still the thinking of this world; they had left Jesus out of their calculations. Once again Jesus patiently asked them how much bread they had, and they reported a pitifully tiny amount. Once again, he gave thanks to God and broke the loaves and gave them to the disciples to give to the crowd. Once again, God's provision for their needs was more than enough.

Perhaps it is not surprising that some critics have thought that this story is just a mistaken repetition of the feeding of the five thousand, but that is to miss the whole point. Mark is deliberately showing the slowness and dullness of the disciples, even when a second similar miracle was performed (see vs 17–20). In any case, the number of the loaves and of the baskets of fragments (as well as the number of people fed) is not the same as before. The eyewitness was reporting faithfully again.

8:14–21 The yeast of the Pharisees and Herod (see Mt. 16:5–12). Mark seems to have told this story to underline the total failure of the Twelve to understand, and perhaps to give the reason: they were still too much influenced by the thinking of this world. Perhaps they were busy blaming each other for forgetting to bring bread with them on the trip when Jesus gave them the warning (really a little parable). They had failed to see the spiritual meaning and, worse still, had forgotten that Jesus could and would meet any bodily needs of those seeking God's kingdom; he had shown that in the feeding miracles already. This time, Jesus rebuked them bluntly (21). They should have seen that the yeast of the Pharisees was their whole attitude to life, which would affect the disciples unless they took care. We too need to be constantly on our guard against the 'spirit of the age' or the thinking and teaching of the other religions that surround us. Christ's way is totally different from the way of the world, which we read about in papers, hear on radio, or see on television.

8:22–26 Healing a blind man. This last example of the powers of the kingdom of God may be a picture of the spiritually blind disciples, so soon to receive their sight. Friends brought a blind man to Jesus; their faith as well as his, would be rewarded. They led the blind man out of the shouting and confusion of the village so that he could listen to Jesus without distraction. To spit on the man's eyes and to lay hands on him are things that a blind man can feel. There is nothing magical about spittle, even if it is the spittle of Jesus; it is only an outward aid to faith and understanding.

Why did this healing take two stages? Was it perhaps because of the man's imperfect faith? Mark does not say. It is enough that Jesus did not leave the man half-healed but persisted until he saw everything clearly. Is this a picture of the way that even Peter would only half-see the truth about Jesus at first? The man was warned to go straight home without going back to the village, where people who saw him might be tempted to follow Jesus only as a healer, not as a saviour. There is always a danger where healing miracles take place in the preaching of the gospel that people will come to Christ for the wrong reasons.

8:27–10:52 The cost of the kingdom of God

We are now at the central turning-point of Mark's gospel and the beginning of the second section, which is marked by Peter's great spiritual discovery of who Jesus was. The blind disciples saw at last, but even Peter still had only partial sight (like the blind man just healed by Jesus). He saw that Jesus was the Messiah but not that he was a Messiah who must suffer. This was to be the cost of the kingdom, not only for Jesus but also for them.

From this point on, Jesus concentrated on teaching the small group of disciples, not the crowds outside. He performed few miracles, though he did not refuse to heal if sick people came to him. This was because there was no further need for miracles once the lesson had been learnt. The 'good news' was, however, still at the centre. From now on the story moves very quickly to the last week in Jerusalem, which takes up a third of the gospel. That is why Mark's gospel has sometimes been called a story of the cross with a long introduction.

8:27–9:13 The cost to Jesus

8:27–30 Peter's discovery (see Mt. 16:13–20; Lk. 9:18–21). Perhaps Jesus led his disciples to this place because it was quiet. Being on the very edge of Jewish territory, he could still preach in villages without being mobbed by folk seeking healing. This is an area which is green and cool and is certainly one of the most beautiful parts of Palestine. Like any good teacher, Jesus asked his class a leading question: 'Who do people say I am?' There is after all only one basic question in life: Who is Jesus? On our answer to that depends our eternal future. The disciples' reply indicated that the various opinions about Jesus had not changed since the early stages of his ministry—John the Baptist, Elijah, one of the prophets. To say, as Peter did, that Jesus was the Messiah was to go beyond these earthly ascriptions. If, with Peter, we say to Jesus 'You are the Christ', then we must follow him, and our lives will be totally changed.

Why did Jesus forbid his disciples to tell anybody that he was the Messiah? First, because people must find this out for themselves, though it is really a revelation from God. Secondly, because they must understand what sort of a Messiah Jesus was. He was not to be a spectacular and outwardly successful hero, driving out the hated Roman rulers and setting up a Jewish state, as many hoped. Instead, he was to be a humble, patient, loving, peaceful Messiah, God's suffering servant, as pictured in Is. 53.

It is remarkable, if Mark's gospel was produced in Rome, where Peter was such an important figure, that he does not mention here the great promises made to Peter by Jesus at this time (Mt.

16:18). Could it have been that Peter did not want them included? Certainly Mark did not see Peter as the first great founding bishop of the Roman church, in the way that later centuries did.

8:31–9:1 The cost of Messiahship (see Mt. 16:21–28; Lk. 9:22–27). Jesus taught his disciples that he would suffer many things—rejection by the religious leaders (who, as we have seen, were his enemies), a violent death and a rising on the third day.

Peter rebuked Jesus (32). We are staggered at his impudence; but have there not been times when we too have questioned God's way of working and suggested to him another pattern, closer to our way of thinking? We cannot afford to criticize Peter. Jesus, usually so gentle and patient with his disciples, was very outspoken on this occasion. Words like Simon Peter's, trying to turn Jesus aside from the cross, show Satan's thoughts, not God's. This was the temptation that Jesus had faced and conquered in the wilderness and would conquer again at Gethsemane. He would not yield to it, and neither must his followers. This is the reason for the stern warning of v 34. 'No cross, no crown' is as true of Christians as it is of Christ.

Did Peter object to Jesus taking this path because he was afraid of the path for himself? To take up the cross was a sign of accepting a shameful slave's death, in the eyes of the non-Christian world, and was a real possibility in the case of members of the Roman church in persecution. The image is of a condemned man on his way to the place of execution, shouldering the cross-bar of his own cross and walking through the mocking crowds, just as Jesus did on the way to Calvary. To deny self means refusing to follow any natural inclination, however innocent, that runs contrary to Christ's path for us. (It is something far deeper than going without sugar in Lent, as some Christians do.) Yet this is the only path to true spiritual life; to do anything else is to lose ourselves eternally. In this sense, loss is gain and gain is loss.

There is, however, a great promise linked with these stern words: those who walk this path will see, even in this life, the power of the kingdom of God realized (9:1). In the immediate future, this would be on the mountain of transfiguration (described in this next chapter); in the more distant future, it refers to the resurrection and ascension of Christ and the pouring out of the Spirit at Pentecost; and finally, no doubt it refers to the wonder of Christ's second coming. Like most prophecies it has several different 'layers' of fulfilment.

9:2–13 The Transfiguration (see Mt. 17:1–13; Lk. 9:28–36). Now that Peter, at least, had realized who Jesus was, Jesus appeared to Peter, James and John as he had been, and as he would be again in glory. The dazzling white of his clothing is typical in the Bible of angels and heavenly beings. Elijah and Moses clearly represent the OT hopes of God's kingdom. Moses was a prophet as well as the law-giver of Israel; Elijah was expected as the forerunner of the Messiah. Peter, like many of us, babbled senselessly when he was scared; we need not look for deep theology in his foolish remarks. Jesus was still only 'rabbi' or 'teacher' to him, in spite of his earlier discovery. Yet, by his use of the word shelters, Peter may have been remembering how God came down on Mt. Sinai long before and showed his glory in a 'shelter' ('tabernacle' is the old English word). But God's words, not Peter's, are the centre of the passage. Once again, as at the baptism in Jordan, God bore witness to his beloved son, and called all to listen to him (not to Peter or any other human voice). As at Sinai, the cloud is a symbol of God's presence. Suddenly Moses and Elijah faded away and only Jesus was left with the three disciples.

They were warned not to speak of what they had seen until after Jesus had risen from the dead. They could not understand what he meant by rising from the dead, although it seems so simple to us. They must have known that by Son of Man Jesus was referring to himself and, like all orthodox Jews, they believed in a general resurrection at the last day (Jn. 11:24), but what did this mean? Was it a coming back to life, like that of Jairus's daughter? Jesus identified Elijah with John, in the sense that John had fulfilled Elijah's task; and just as John had been rejected and killed, so would Jesus be (12–13).

9:14–10:52 The cost to others

9:14–32 The demonized boy (see Mt. 17:14–23; Lk. 9:37–45). The opposition of the teachers of the law and the unbelief of disciples and crowd grieved Jesus (19). His disciples had proved powerless, and the father's faith was limited (21). Healing depends, however, on the power of God, not on the extent of our faith, so Jesus was able to expel the demon and heal the boy.

In answer to the disciples' questions, Jesus explained that part of the cost of the kingdom is prayer (to which some manuscripts add 'fasting', which often accompanied earnest prayer in OT and NT alike). This is a warning that the victory over the enemy, of which this healing is an example, is not to be won cheaply. So it leads quite naturally to a further foretelling by Jesus of his coming death. The disciples still failed to understand what he meant (32).

It is interesting that, although the boy's symptoms appear to be those of epilepsy, all three parallel gospels describe his state as due to forces of evil. While we cannot simply dismiss this as language of the time, we must not make the even more serious mistake of attributing all epileptic-type attacks to forces of evil. There are many physical and chemical factors involved in epilepsy, and a doctor, not an exorcist, is the appropriate person to deal with them.

9:33–50 True greatness (cf. Mt. 18:1–5; Lk. 9:46–48). The Twelve still had to learn that part of the cost of the kingdom of God was ceasing to seek high places for themselves. Servanthood and humility are the only paths to true Christian greatness, which is why Jesus took a child as an example here (36). The subject of little ones recurs in v 42: in between Mark has 'sandwiched' another lesson in humility, which is part of the cost of God's kingdom. John seems to have been proud of the fact that the disciples had forbidden any outside their own circle to drive out demons. As the man was driving out demons in Jesus' name he must have been a believer in Jesus, even if not a follower. No-one has a monopoly of the work of the kingdom. We must accept the success of others humbly and rejoice in it, as Paul did (Phil. 1:18). No work done for Christ will go unrewarded, whoever does it.

The kingdom of God is a serious matter; that is why to put a spiritual stumbling-block in someone's way will be punished so severely (42). Indeed, the value of the kingdom of God is so great that no sacrifice is too great to make for it. Hand, foot, and eye stand for the most precious of human possessions, yet better lose them than the kingdom of God. Of course, this is meant metaphorically not literally, as some early fathers took it and and as some fundamentalist non-Christian religions still understand it.

Jesus spoke strongly about hell (48). It is the opposite of the kingdom of God, and there does not seem to be any 'third option'. Yet Jesus spoke of hell to believers in warning, not to sinners in condemnation. Is. 66:24, which Jesus quoted, describes Gehenna, the smouldering rubbish dump of Jerusalem, which was used as a picture of God's judgment on sin. Salt is another metaphor; it purifies, as fire does. If we purify ourselves now (there is no thought of some 'purgatory' after death), we will not come under God's judgment later. This is a very different concept from the hell of popular Buddhism or other faiths. If we are 'salted' like this with the values of the kingdom, we will not argue who is greatest but will live at peace with one another.

10:1–16 Marriage and the kingdom of God (see Mt. 19:1–15; cf. Lk. 16:18; 18:15–17). The cost of the kingdom is great, even in the area of the closest of human relationships. Moses may have allowed divorce because of human hardness of heart (failure to understand God's purpose in marriage), but Jesus made it plain that the kingdom of God demands lifelong faithfulness to one partner and he saw this as involved in God's plan of creation. This is so costly that, according to Matthew, the disciples said that it would be better to remain unmarried than face it. But both here and in Matthew, Jesus called remarriage after divorce (whether by husband or wife) plain adultery from the point of view of God's kingdom (11–12). We can imagine how radical a saying like this would have sounded in the lax moral atmosphere of Rome, as indeed it sounds in the lax moral atmosphere of our day when old moral conventions are breaking down. It is true that in Matthew there seems to be an exception in the case of unfaithfulness, but Mark gives the saying in its starkest form. Perhaps that was what was needed in Gentile Rome.

By contrast to this severity, Mark adds here a tender story of Jesus' loving concern for little children. This is the other side of his stern words about the sanctity of marriage. Children, after all, are the greatest sufferers from divorce. But there is also another truth about God's kingdom: only those who receive it with the simplicity and trust of children can enter it. This is one of the very few occasions where Mark records that Jesus was indignant, and it is interesting to see the cause. We might have thought that other matters were more important than the spiritual welfare of children, but Jesus valued them and often uses children as examples for us. Perhaps that is why the word 'children' is sometimes used to mean 'simple believers' in the gospels.

10:17–34 The man who had everything (see Mt. 19:16–30; 20:17–19; Lk. 18:18–34). Nowhere is the cost of God's kingdom brought out more clearly than in the story of this rich man. He had absolutely everything except eternal life. He wanted it but was unwilling to give up everything else to gain it (like the monkey in the well-known story that could not get out of the trap because it was unwilling to let go of what was in its hand). There is, however, no other way to enter the kingdom; even Peter and the other disciples had learned that (28). The man was clearly lovable (21) and eager and doubtless moral, but he could not face the cost. Yet Jesus would rather lose a possible follower than lower the standard for him; indeed, there was no other possible standard. So the man went away sad from Jesus and we hear no more of him; he had made his choice.

Jesus said (23) it is hard for the rich to enter the kingdom of God, indeed impossible without God's help (27). We are all tempted to trust our 'riches', whatever they are, not God. Jesus used a comical proverb to illustrate how difficult it is; clearly a camel cannot get through the eye of a needle.

Jesus taught that the result of giving money to the poor, or of any sacrifice we might make for the kingdom of God, will be treasure not on earth but in heaven; the more we give, the more we gain. This does not mean that if we give money to God's work, we get more back, as some 'prosperity cults' teach. It does mean that the spiritual rewards will far outweigh any sacrifices that we may have made for Christ, even if persecution comes along with them (30).

The passage ends with yet another foretelling of the suffering of Jesus, this time in even more detail, and this is another illustration of the truth about sacrifice. Something in Jesus' behaviour, as well as his words, made the disciples astonished and the crowd that followed afraid. Somehow they felt that a crisis was near.

10:35–45 A selfish request (see Mt. 20:20–28). If it had not been recorded we could have hardly believed that, after all this, James and John could have come with their ambitious and selfish request. We know only too well, however, what we are like ourselves, and so we can understand. If they had realized the true cost of high place in the kingdom of God, they would not have dared to ask, in spite of their brave words. Cup and baptism (or 'flood') are OT pictures of judgment and suffering. Jesus warned them that suffering would indeed come, but it would not necessarily lead to high place in the kingdom of God, for all must endure it. High place was for God alone to give.

The ten other disciples showed up just as badly as James and John when they were angry with them because of their request. No doubt they had wanted these places for themselves. So Jesus patiently explained to them once more the totally different pattern of God's kingdom, where true greatness is humble service. He himself is the great example of this. He came to be the suffering servant of God prophesied in Is. 53 and to give his life as a ransom for many (45). The use of the word 'many' does not mean that Jesus died only for some people, not for all; it stresses rather the great number of those ransomed by his death. This is one of the very few places in Mark where the way in which Jesus' death saves us is explained. Mark is far more interested in the plain fact that it does save us rather than the way in which it does. Ransom is one of the many pictures by which salvation is explained in the NT. It means the buying-back of people from slavery or prison or death by paying a price. We are all too familiar with it today from the demands of kidnappers and hi-jackers. In this case the price was to be the death of Jesus.

10:46–52 The healing of Bartimaeus (see Mt. 20:29–34; Lk. 18:35–43). This last recorded healing took place on the very road to suffering and death at Jerusalem. It is a picture of one in need with persistent faith being healed and, as a result, following Jesus. No doubt this was the story of many who followed Jesus, even during the terrible last week. Mark's eyewitness remembered the man's name, and Mark, as usual, translates it. Like many in the Third World, the man was simply known by his father's name, but he may have been well known to the early church later.

11:1–16:20 Bringing in the kingdom of God

Now we come to the last great section of the gospel, to which all the rest has been leading up. Mark introduces the 'Passion Narrative', the story of Jesus' betrayal, trials, suffering and death in Jerusalem. There are, however, many happenings also described here, all of which find their place in Mark's pattern.

11:1–13:37 Warnings of the kingdom of God

When the Messiah came he was rejected, but that rejection would in turn bring judgment. That is why there is a sadder note running through these chapters, for they are more than an exhibition of God's love. God's hour of decision had come for Israel, as it comes for all of us when we are confronted with Jesus and the cross. Israel's whole future would depend on the reception given to the promised Messiah.

11:1–11 Jesus enters Jerusalem (see Mt. 21:1–9; Lk. 19:28–38). 'Foal' would be a better word to use than colt here, for the other gospels make clear that Jesus rode on a young donkey, not a horse. Perhaps Mark did not know which it was, or perhaps his Roman audience would not care. They would not know the words of the OT prophet, telling of the meek and humble king, riding on a donkey (Zc. 9:9). V 2 may refer to an arrangement already made with the owner by Jesus, or it may be an example of his supernatural insight. If the NIV is right in translating v 2 as The Lord needs it, then it might be a rare use by Mark of the later title for Jesus. Usually in Mark the disciples simply call Jesus 'master'; after the resurrection they all called him 'Lord'. But the verse could equally mean 'The owner needs it', and then the second half would mean 'he [the bystander] will send it here at once'.

So Jesus rode into Jerusalem, as David or Solomon might have entered the capital, with branches and clothes spread on the road before him (like a red carpet at an airport today, or palm and banana leaves at a village festival in the Third World). We are used to the cheering crowds on these occasions, but these were not summoned by government decree; they were coming of their own free will. Their chanted slogans were taken from the Psalms and hailed a coming king of the family of David who would restore the kingdom of Israel to its old glory. They were expecting a political and nationalist leader, perhaps a violent social reformer, as many do today. Was this not exactly what Jesus had feared from the start, that all would misunderstand if he claimed to be God's Messiah? Nevertheless, on this day Jesus rode on in triumph into the capital that he would soon weep over (Lk. 19:41) to inspect the temple.

11:12–26 Jesus is challenged in the temple (cf. Mt. 21:12–22; Lk. 19:45–48). When Jesus confronted the merchants in the temple court, it was not that he, in irritation, was striking dead a healthy tree; he was giving a sad assessment of the tree's true condition. God's judgment on Israel would be the same. That is why the story of the clearing of the temple is 'sandwiched' by Mark between the two halves of the story of the fig-tree, to make the solemn warning to Israel plain.

When Jesus entered the temple, he probably came into the Court of the Gentiles, the only place in the whole complex where non-Jews were allowed to enter and worship. But worship had become impossible; the court had been turned into a typical bazaar area, with buyers and sellers and stalls everywhere. Birds and animals for sacrifice were sold there, and foreign money could be changed into the only currency accepted in the temple, one without the hated figures of Roman emperors and heathen gods. In one sense, all this was a service to the worshippers, but the noise and bustle made worship impossible. To make matters worse, this court was used as a short-cut by merchants bringing goods from the Mount of Olives to the city itself.

We know from other sources that the worshippers in the Jewish temple were exploited by the merchants, who charged high prices for the sacrificial animals, and the money-changers, who offered unfair exchange rates. We also know that this trade was controlled by the priestly aristocracy who profited greatly at the expense of ordinary pilgrims.

Jesus justified his action of driving out the stall-holders and their customers by showing that God's plan was for his temple to be a centre of worship for all nations, not just the Jews (17). That must have brought great encouragement to Mark's non-Jewish readers.

Jesus' disruption of the temple trade must have increased the chief priests' hatred for him, and they began looking for a way to kill him (18). They, above all others, should have recognized their king by what he did. All good kings of Judah had purified the temple, as Mal. 3:1–4 says that the coming one would do. If Jesus acted like this to the old earthly temple, how will he act towards the new temple that is his body, the Christian church?

Peter used the word cursed of the fig-tree (21); it is important to realize that in the Bible 'blessing' and 'cursing' do not have the same meaning as today. They are God's solemn judgments, his pronouncements of the results of either pleasing or displeasing him; he does not act without reason. The Bible knows nothing of magical curses; and we do not need to fear them, for they cannot harm the Christian. Likewise, blessing is not something that others can give us magically; it will come to us, if we remain in Christ (Jn. 15:4).

Jesus and his disciples seem to have spent the nights during their time in Jerusalem in their 'safe house' at Bethany. That is why Peter pointed out the withered fig-tree on the way back to the city next morning. Mark does not stress the application of this acted parable to Israel; the structure of his gospel has made that plain enough already. Instead, he shows how Jesus used the withering of the fig-tree as an example of the results of believing prayer (23). But it also shows that we cannot pray in faith for anything that we like. In this matter, Jesus was ‘thinking God’s thoughts after him’ and willing his father’s will. That sort of prayer, if asked in faith, will always be answered, for it is praying that God’s will may be done (as Jesus prayed in Gethsemane). We can only move the mountains that God wants removed, not those that we want moved. ‘Moving mountains’ was a phrase used by the rabbis to describe overcoming seemingly impossible difficulties; we must not of course take it in the literal sense. If we pray in this way, we can give thanks for the result before we see it, for the answer is sure in the will and purpose of God.

There is one other condition for effectual prayer: we must freely forgive others, as God forgives us (25). If we do not, how could we pray ‘in Jesus’ name’, that is, in the way in which he would and did? This verse may indicate that Mark knew the Lord’s Prayer, though he does not record it in his gospel.

11:27–33 ‘By what authority?’ (see Mt. 21:23–27; Lk. 20:1–8). The opposition to Jesus continued, as the angry priests asked what right he had to act in this way. Jesus, the gentle controversialist, said that he had the same right to do it as John had to baptize, and asked them where John’s authority had come from. They dared not answer as they would have liked to do, and so they dropped that question (but others would soon come up). Did they know in their hearts that they were fighting the truth, both in the case of John and of Jesus? If so, it only made them more bitter, as it did Saul of Tarsus (Acts 26:14).

12:1–12 The bad tenants (see Mt. 21:33–46; Lk. 20:9–19). Jesus exposed this wilful, stubborn opposition in a parable so plain that even the priests could see the meaning (12). Everybody would have recognized the vineyard as a picture of Israel; even the details of the owner’s loving care were drawn from the OT. The prophets were often seen as the servants of God, and everybody knew that they had been rejected and mistreated by Israel. But who was this much-loved son? Those who remembered the father’s witness at the baptism or transfiguration would know. Probably even the priests realized that it was a claim by Jesus to be the Son of God, because they brought the claim up at his trial and crucifixion. This is one of only two places where Jesus himself indirectly claimed to be the Son of God before his trial, though others (whether disciples or even demons) might have previously recognized him as such.

In this story the son was killed; that is the cost of God’s kingdom. But the warning is the main point of the parable (9). Those who rejected the king would themselves be rejected, and their specially privileged position would be taken away and given to others. Mark’s readers would have recognized the fulfilment of Jesus’ words in the church, where Gentile shared with Jew on equal terms at last. The neglected and despised stone left lying on the ground by the builders would become the keystone of the whole new temple that was the Christian church (10). There is irony in Jesus’ suggestion that the priests did not know the very Scriptures of which they boasted. No wonder that they wanted to arrest him, but no wonder they feared to do so.

12:13–17 Taxes to Caesar (see Mt. 22:15–22; Lk. 20:20–26). This question was asked by those who had already rejected Jesus and wanted only to trap him. If Jesus agreed with paying taxes to Caesar, the patriots would reject him; if he opposed it, the Romans would arrest him. This issue would have been important for those in the early church who were being persecuted, whether at Rome or elsewhere, but who were still trying to show that they were ideal citizens. Jesus’ answer meant that if we enjoy the benefits of a state, we must pay the price, in the form of taxation and so on. But the sting of his answer lay in the tail, as far as the Pharisees and Herodians were concerned. If we must give Caesar what is his, then we must give God what is his too, and that is something which they were not doing.

For a persecuted church in the Roman Empire, it would have an even deeper meaning although Mark does not raise it. If Caesar asks for what belongs to God, not to Caesar, they could not give it, for conscience sake. So Christians died for refusing to give a pinch of incense to Caesar's statue. In the same way, Christians suffer in our day for refusing to bow before pictures of emperors and dictators and presidents. We cannot worship person, party or state, but only God himself.

12:18–27 Marriage at the resurrection (see Mt. 22:23–33; Lk. 20:27–40). Having silenced the Pharisees, Jesus was approached by the Sadducees, the wealthy nobles who controlled both temple and Sanhedrin, the great religious council of Israel. They simply came to mock his belief in resurrection by giving an obviously ridiculous illustration of a much-married wife, probably not drawn from real life. The Pharisees had already ruled that such a wife would belong to her first husband at the resurrection (which they interpreted in a very material way, rather as popular Islam does today). The Sadducees approved, of course, of the Mosaic custom mentioned here, which was designed to keep property in the widow's family, but they rejected any idea of resurrection altogether. To them, this life was all that there was; no wonder that they were hard, materialistic and often rich. We all know of people like that. First, Jesus undercut the whole argument by rejecting crudely materialistic ideas of the resurrection, in which he, like the Pharisees, believed. As Paul says, our resurrection body will be of a different kind (1 Cor. 15:44). Jesus compares it here to that of angels. Questions like sex and bodily relationships do not arise. So too we must reject crudely materialistic ideas of the meaning both of resurrection and of 'Son of God', as though it meant simple physical fatherhood. These things are stumbling-blocks in the way of receiving the good news.

From the books of Moses, which the Sadducees accepted, Jesus showed them that the idea of resurrection could be proved from the patriarchs' relationship with the living God. They 'caught' eternal life from God, as we do from Christ today, but it is a new sort of life, demonstrating the power of God.

12:28–34 The greatest commandment (see Mt. 22:34–40; Lk. 10:25–28). This teacher of the law came to Jesus with what may have been a real question, to judge from Jesus' answer. In a sense, Jesus' reply to him contained nothing new; it was drawn from the Scriptures which would have been familiar to the teacher. Jesus placed love for God at the heart of the law; love for our neighbour should and will spring naturally from this as a consequence. If we try to put love of neighbour first or, worse still, leave out the love for God altogether, we shall make shipwreck of our lives and fail even to love our neighbour as we should. On the other hand, if we say that we love God, and do not love our neighbour, we are hypocrites (1 Jn. 4:20).

Although the teacher agreed that all this was true, and therefore was very near the kingdom of God, he was not yet a member of it as he had not yet acknowledged Jesus as king. Did he ever do so?

12:35–37 Is the Messiah divine or human? (see Mt. 22:41–46; Lk. 20:41–44). Now it was Jesus' turn to ask a question. Israel was looking for a Messiah, a king of David's line, to restore an earthly kingdom. As we have seen, it was probably because of this false hope that Jesus did not claim openly to be Messiah. It was also because of this that, as soon as Peter had recognized him as Messiah, he explained that God's Messiah must suffer and die. How was he to show that the Jewish earthly expectation was wrong?

All Jesus' audience would have agreed that Ps. 110 was written by David; they would also have agreed that 'my Lord' in the Psalm must refer to God's anointed, the Messiah. How then could David, the honoured ancestor, possibly call his descendant, the Messiah, 'my Lord', so giving him a superior position? Any one from a culture which reveres ancestors will see the point at once here. It would be unthinkable, unless this Messiah was more than human and thus far superior to his ancestor. Whether or not this particular Psalm was written by David, and whether or not this was the original meaning, is quite beside the point; Jesus was speaking in a way his contemporaries would have understood.

12:38–44 Teachers and widows (see Lk. 20:45–21:4; cf. Mt. 23:1–36). Here we have two contrasting pictures of those who reject and those who accept the values of God's kingdom. Those who reject are the teachers of the law who loved power and position and wealth. They made an outward show of religion, but 'gobbled up' the property of helpless folk like widows, perhaps by continually demanding religious contributions from them. On the other hand, there was a poor widow, who willingly and gladly gave to God all the money she had, on which her life depended (44). We all know the amazing generosity of the poor in our Christian congregations. This is the sort of giving that Jesus would show at Calvary, and so this is the sort of giving that he asks from us. In 14:3, we shall see another woman who gave like this, when she smashed an alabaster jar of perfume for Jesus' sake.

13:1–37 Signs of the end (see Mt. 24; Lk. 21:5–37). Jesus has given warnings in plenty to those outside God's kingdom; now, there are words of warning for those inside. They are given in terms of the coming judgment, which will only be a time of testing for the disciples, but yet will be a very real test. The whole subject is introduced by the prophecy of judgment on the temple (2). The 'inner ring' (Andrew is included this time) must have believed that the destruction of the temple would introduce the end times, and they were anxious to know the signs. Perhaps this was the same sort of curiosity that leads Christians today to try to work out the date of Christ's second coming. But Jesus turned it directly into a challenge to Christians living in every age, which is the function of all such prophecy in the Bible.

The chief need is to be watchful (5), especially of plausible deceivers, and not to be alarmed by terrible circumstances. Both of these would have been relevant at Rome, home of several early heresies, and disturbed around the time of the writing of Mark's gospel by the 'year of the four emperors' (AD 68), with several contenders fighting for the crown. Persecution will be unavoidable, but it is to be seen as an opportunity for witness with words that will be given at the time by the Holy Spirit. (This is one of the few direct references to the Spirit in Mark.) The prediction that the gospel must first be proclaimed to all the nations (10) is almost Mark's version of the 'great commission' at the end of Matthew (28:19). Had Mark seen some of this in the labour of Paul and the other apostles?

There is also the warning that even the closest of natural ties will break down under such stress (12), the opposite truth to that taught in the saying about the true 'family of Jesus' (3:34–35). Many of us will know how family members have betrayed each other in times of persecution, and the agony of seeming to be universally hated without reason, just because we are Christians (13). Yet there is a promise attached: faithful endurance to the end will bring eternal life, even if not safety in this world.

The four disciples had asked 'When?' In carefully veiled language, Jesus hinted that it would be when the idolatrous Roman army standards would be planted triumphantly in the temple at Jerusalem. Mark dare not report this openly (in Rome or all places) especially as, from the language, it does not yet seem to have taken place at the date of the writing of the gospel. But the little addition in v 14 shows that he expects his readers to understand. Jesus used language taken from the book of Daniel, telling in the first place of the desecration of the temple by the persecutor Antiochus Epiphanes in the second century BC. The abomination in that case was an idol, set up in the temple itself, thus defiling it. The following verses seem to describe the terrible suffering in the first Jewish wars, when Roman armies invaded Palestine. This took place only a generation after the death of Christ, and the Jewish Christian church would have shared in the general suffering. Tradition says that the Christians fled to Pella in Transjordan, taking Jesus' warning to heart (14).

An even more urgent warning, in our case, is that against false Messiahs and false prophets (22). These abounded in the time after Christ, and they still abound today, in false sects at the 'lunatic fringe' of the Christian church. Most important to remember in our rediscovery of 'signs and wonders' is that even these may be false and signs of false prophets; we must be on our guard (23). Perhaps this is why Jesus used signs so sparingly in his ministry.

Up to this point, everything Jesus predicted can be fitted into the time around AD 70, with Roman armies ravaging Palestine and emperors fighting for the throne. Mark's readers would have recognized the references, even if some are not clear to us now. From v 24 onwards it seems as though it is the end times that are being described (but for a different view see on Mt. 24). In these last days the greatest earthly powers symbolized as in the OT by sun, moon and stars, will fall, and the Son of Man will come in glory to gather his chosen ones (26–27). The ends of the earth is drawn from the imagery of Dn. 7, but the phrase may contain a hint of the Gentile mission. It cannot simply be a reference to the gathering in of faithful Jews from all over the world.

This time is apparently long after the period of the Jewish wars of AD 70, although they are a picture of the wider judgment to follow at the end times, as surely as summer follows spring in Palestine. It is most unlikely that the sprouting of the fig-tree here refers to the Jews' return to Palestine and the setting up again of the state of Israel. It is more likely to be another popular proverb of the sort still used widely in the Third World, though no longer common in the west.

As often in OT prophecy, Jesus passed directly from a time close at hand to the very distant future; it is as though we saw two great mountain peaks, but not the great valley between them. That is why he could say that this generation would not pass away until the first set of signs was fulfilled. Many of his listeners would still be alive in AD 70. It is most unlikely that this generation refers to the survival of the Jewish people as a whole, but those who understand the phrase to refer to both the immediate and distant future understand it in this way.

Just as the book of Revelation is often called 'the Apocalypse' (which means 'unveiling of the future'), so this chapter is often called 'the little Apocalypse', as in it Jesus also unveils the future. Three things should be borne in mind when reading this chapter. First, that open language is impossible in times of political danger. Secondly, that symbolic language is used to reveal things to us, not to mystify us; there is nothing 'mysterious' about it. Thirdly, all is designed to make us more faithful Christians here and now, not to enable us to make prophecies or speculations about the distant future (37). This is shown by the fact that not even the Son (this is another place where Jesus claims a unique relationship to God) knows the date of these things (32). But we have a promise, that in the shaking of all else, the words of Jesus will remain (31), a saying which is used of the words of God himself in the OT.

14:1–52 Dawning of the kingdom of God

This will take us right up to the trial of Jesus.

14:1–11 The king is anointed (see Mt. 26:6–13). Jesus and the disciples were still staying at Bethany, partly no doubt for safety's sake and partly because the city itself would be already crowded with Passover pilgrims. Jesus had a last quiet meal in the home of Simon the Leper, possibly their host. Simon (perhaps a leper healed by Jesus) is unknown to us, but was obviously known to Mark's eyewitness as well as to Mark. Only John tells us that it was Mary of Bethany who anointed Jesus (Jn. 12:3), so possibly Simon was the father of the family. Several rather similar stories of anointing are found in the gospels, but it is unlikely that they describe the same event or the same woman.

All that we know of this woman is the immense cost of the gift and the very different reactions of the eleven disciples, Jesus and Judas. The eleven were indignant at the waste. All that money could have been used to feed and clothe the poor, which was of course perfectly true. Jesus, however, though he fully recognized the claims of the poor (7), saw a greater priority even than the poor at this moment. Every king in Judah was anointed before his coronation, and this was to be his anointing, not by a prophet but by a woman. But it was more, for it was a symbolic preparation of his body for burial. This woman knew that her king must die; she had understood the gospel. That was why, wherever the gospel was preached in the whole world (another point to delight Mark), her loving sacrifice would be remembered (9).

But all this was senseless rubbish to Judas. He went at once to the chief priests to find out how much money he could make out of betraying Jesus before it was too late. In the Bible, Judas has no high or patriotic motives; sheer love of money was his downfall, as it has been of many church leaders since, whether in rich or poor countries. That is why Jesus warns so often against the love of money. If Judas could not understand the woman's action, then he would not understand the cross either. We cannot serve God and Money at the same time (Mt. 6:24).

14:12–31 The Last Supper (see Mt. 26:17–35; Lk. 22:7–34). Early on the next day, it seems, Jesus sent two disciples ahead into the city to prepare for the Passover evening meal. This by Jewish law had to be eaten within the city limits, so could not be kept at Bethany. It appears that, as in the case of the donkey, Jesus had already arranged with a friend or follower to lend the room that would be needed. There was nothing supernatural here, any more than there was in Peter's boat or Joseph's tomb, both borrowed by Jesus. But the knowledge that the man with the water-jug would meet them may have been supernatural insight of the kind often shown by prophets in the OT, unless it too was a sign that Jesus had arranged. This sort of insight is nowhere promised to Christians generally in the NT, though men like Peter and Paul show it at times. We should, therefore, neither seek nor expect it and be careful of those who claim it.

Mark seems to say that this meal was the Passover, while John seems to say that the actual Passover was on the next day (and that, therefore, Jesus died when the Passover lambs were being killed). If John is correct then this meal of Jesus would have been a preparatory meal. This would account for the fact that no lamb is mentioned, but only bread and wine, for Jesus himself was the lamb. There are several possible explanations of the difficulty. Some have suggested that there were two different religious calendars being used in Jerusalem at the time, with different dates for the Passover. Others have suggested that Mark was using the Roman reckoning of 'days' from morning to morning, while John used the Hebrew way of reckoning, from evening to evening. Whichever day it was, this was the evening when Jesus held the first 'Lord's Supper' celebrating his death.

The account of the meal is set between two more warnings of our human weakness. Jesus warned his disciples that one of them would betray him (18). They had no idea who it was but they still had such self-confidence that each refused to believe it could be he. Peter did not stand alone in his self-confidence, though he is usually the chief example. True, even this tragic betrayal finds its place in the plan of God, but that does not make the betrayer less guilty (21). Judas was not a helpless victim, predestined to betray Jesus (this view is the danger of some 'fatalistic' religions like Islam) but chose his own path deliberately, though all was known by God beforehand.

The description of the actual meal is very simple. Mark's hearers would not be familiar with, or interested in, Jewish customs. As usual, the head of the household gave thanks to God for the loaf (not 'blessed' it), just as we would before a meal today, broke the loaf, and gave the pieces to the others. This was exactly what he had done at the two miracles of feeding the crowds (were they a picture of the Lord's Supper too?). What was quite new was that Jesus told them, as he gave it, that this bread stood for and represented his body, so soon to be given and broken on the cross for them. In Aramaic, Jesus' own language, there is no word for 'is'. What Jesus would have said was 'This-my body'. We should not, therefore make any crude, literal interpretation of his words. That in turn will save us from superstitious uses of the bread, like taking fragments home to give to sick children in hope of recovery. The Lord's Supper is mystery but not magic. Perhaps Jesus meant too that, as our bodily life depends on bread or rice, so our spiritual life must be nourished by complete dependence on him in faith.

If bread was the common Jewish food, wine (usually diluted with water) was the common drink; life depended on both. As at all Jewish meals, God was thanked for the fruit of the vine. What was new was that Jesus told his disciples that the red wine in the cup stood for his blood, the blood that would seal a covenant by being poured out for many. Whether or not we read the word 'new' before covenant in v 24 makes little difference. Jesus was referring to the new covenant of which Je. 31:31 speaks, by which our whole natures would be changed, and God's law written on our hearts. When Jesus said that his blood would be poured out for many he was going even further, for this was a reference to God's Suffering Servant in Is. 53:12 who was to bear the sin of many. So we can see that the death of Jesus was to be a ransom-price, a covenant sacrifice and a sin-offering; all three are significant whenever we come to the Lord's table. But, if the wine-cup with its bitter dregs at the bottom of the cup, is a picture of suffering, it is also a picture of joy (25). This supper, before the crucifixion, is a picture of the triumphant 'Messianic banquet' in heaven, in which we all will share, with Christ in glory.

So the king, like all kings of Judah, had held his royal banquet. A second warning of the weakness of the disciples followed. It was made easier to bear by news that it had all been foreseen by God (who never expects us to be stronger than we are) and that it would be followed by a joyful reunion in familiar Galilee (28). Mark speaks much of Galilee and Jesus' ministry there, partly because that was where Jesus began his ministry and partly, perhaps, because Galilee, with its half-Gentile population, spoke of the coming mission to the Gentiles. Galilee was later a great centre of early Christianity, as archaeology has shown. Jesus' promise here links with the promise of the angel (16:7) that the disciples would meet the risen Christ in Galilee. For the fulfilment see Mt. 28:16, though Mark himself does not record it.

Not only was Peter's denial foretold but even when it would happen (30), in spite of Peter's self-confident rejection. (The reference to the cock crowing may be to the actual bird or to the blast of the Roman trumpets that marked that time of the night.) Peter is often singled out as the one who denied Christ, but we must remember that all the disciples insisted that they would never disown Jesus and they too failed to keep their promise.

14:32–42 The Garden of Gethsemane (see Mt. 26:36–46; Lk. 22:40–46). Many pilgrims camped close to Jerusalem at Passover time, and it may be that Jesus intended to spend the night in Gethsemane (which means ‘oil press’) instead of returning to Bethany. But there was to be no sleep for him there. With his ‘inner ring’ of three disciples, he prayed, under tremendous spiritual stress. We must never think that Calvary was easy for him; this prayer shows how hard it was (see Lk. 12:50). The sleepy disciples, perhaps especially Peter, must have heard and remembered his words (36) and told Mark, for nobody else was present. They even remembered that Jesus used the intimate Aramaic word ‘Abba’ (which Mark translates) to address God his father (this was later used by the early church; Rom. 8:15). ‘Abba’ is the name which every Jewish child still uses within the home to address his or her father.

Jesus’ prayer was very simple; he did not want to face the cross, but if it was God’s path, he would face it. In this way he conquered the enemy. But while he prayed, his disciples slept, in spite of his warnings. No wonder that they yielded to temptation later, when they had already yielded to temptation here. No fall is really unexpected or sudden, as Peter found.

14:43–52 The King is arrested (see Mt. 26:47–56; Lk. 22:47–53). Without the help of Judas, the priests would never have been able to find Jesus among the many groups camped around Jerusalem that night. Those who have seen the crowds of pilgrims camped around temples at a Hindu festival will understand. Even if they had found the place, they would never have been able to find Jesus himself in the darkness, and Judas knew well that his fellow-Galileans might fight. That is why the well-armed temple police were there (not a city mob, as is sometimes suggested). Night arrests of suspects are not unusual; the suspects are off guard, and there is less danger of a rescue by friends or neighbours. As it was, Peter (not named here; see Jn. 18:10) drew his sword in vain, for Jesus refused such help.

We may be used to police spies and paid informers, but the treachery of Judas still staggers us. The kiss on the cheek was the salute demanded by local culture, and the greeting was that of a disciple to his master, but both were only signs arranged in advance. What amazed all was the calm response of Jesus. There was, he said, no need for all this drama. They could have arrested him any day in the temple, if they had not been afraid of the people’s reaction. Then the secret of his quiet acceptance came out: he knew that all of this had its place in the plan and purpose of God (49).

There has been much discussion as to who the young man in this story was. Some have suggested that it was John Mark himself, in whose home the Last Supper may have taken place (the church later met in his mother’s house; Acts 12:12). If the priests could have arrested Jesus’ followers as well as Jesus, no doubt they would have, but they all ran away (50). Probably, that was why Peter feared being recognized in the high priest’s house later. It may, on the other hand, be only an irrelevant memory of Mark’s eyewitness, which Mark alone preserves faithfully. Whoever it was, he too had left Jesus, like all the rest, and run away.

14:53–15:47 The coronation of the King.

The early church liked to think of Jesus as ‘Christ the King’. They spoke of his royal robe of purple, his crown of thorns, his sceptre of cane, the acclamation by the soldiers, the placard on the cross and the words of Pilate. All this must have been in Mark’s mind too, from the way that he arranges his material. Was he thinking of the crowning of a Caesar in imperial Rome as he described a king who was greater still?

14:53–65 The King on trial (see Mt. 26:57–68; Lk. 22:63–71). These verses, describing Jesus before the Sanhedrin (the Jewish supreme court), led up to his acceptance of the title of Messiah or Christ (62). This meant that he claimed to be the expected king, descendant of David. This claim would not in itself have been thought of as blasphemy, but when it was joined to the claim to be the Son of God, and the heavenly Son of Man in the book of Daniel, it certainly would have been blasphemy if untrue. The trouble was that Jesus' accusers never asked themselves if perhaps it was indeed true, before they rejected it and him.

V 54 prepares us for the story of Peter's denial, but then the focus moves to the search for any and every evidence, false or true, sufficient to condemn Jesus to death. False witnesses are still easy to buy today, in many parts of the world. In some places they wait outside the courts, along with the 'petition-writers', who help, for a fee, those who cannot read and write themselves. The officials had already decided on the verdict in advance (an abuse of justice not unknown today), but lies are harder to prove than the truth (56), as even the Sanhedrin saw. This meeting was acting as a preliminary 'court of enquiry'. According to the Jewish laws drawn up over a century later, and perhaps already in force, the full Sanhedrin was not legally allowed to meet till daybreak (15:1), nor could it meet in the high priest's house, nor could it try and condemn within the same day. If the trial before Pilate was unjust, the trial before the Sanhedrin was irregular. This would have heartened persecuted Christians of Roman times, who knew that their trial and condemnation were equally unjust. If Christ endured, so could they.

Even after all of this, the priests could only find Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of the temple and his saying (not recorded in Mark) that he would rebuild it in three days (see Jn. 2:19) to use against him. Jesus' words about the temple were a reference to his coming resurrection and the new spiritual temple (his body, the Christian church) that he was about to build. Understood literally, however, they constituted a verbal threat to God's temple, which was a very serious offence indeed.

To all of this, Jesus made no reply, until the high priest asked him directly who he was (61). At once he accepted the titles of Son of God and Messiah, adding that of heavenly Son of Man. It is as though he was saying, 'Why did you not ask me directly at once instead of bothering with these foolish charges?' To the high priest, this was an amazing stroke of luck. He could not have believed that Jesus would admit in court what he had hidden all through his ministry. God's time had now come, and there was no need for concealment.

Ceremonially, the high priest tore his robes, which was the sign of hearing blasphemy. Death was the unavoidable sentence (as it is in some fundamentalist religious countries today), though the sentence could not be pronounced till the morning by the full court. Cruel and cowardly mockery followed (65). We know that this still goes on in countries where condemned people, or even prisoners, have no rights; the world has not changed. The court's mockery, though bitter, was different from that of Pilate's soldiers later. The Roman mockery was political; this was worse, because it was from religious motives. So Israel rejected her king.

14:66–72 The King denied (see Mt. 26:69–75; Lk. 22:55–62). We do not know why Peter had come to the courtyard; perhaps he had some mad idea of rescuing Jesus by the violence that Jesus had already rejected in the garden. He was soon recognized in the firelight, and a double denial did not help, for his broad Galilean accent gave him away (70). Finally, as a last resort, he began to use curses, probably equivalent to 'I'll be damned if I know the fellow' (71). Then the cock crowed, and Peter remembered, and, strong man though he thought he was, he broke down and burst into tears (the Greek could also mean 'hiding his face in his cloak for shame'). If the words second time and twice (only found in some manuscripts) are correct, they would refer to 'second cockcrow', just before dawn.

15:1–15 The King and the governor (see Mt. 27:1–26; Lk. 23:1–25). Here the power of heaven faced the power of Rome; this would have had a special significance for a Roman audience. The Sanhedrin had legalized their sentence of the night before, but they had no power to carry it out. Jesus had to be condemned by a Roman court, if he was to be put to death. Pilate was not interested in purely religious charges (cf. Acts 18:15) and so he asked Jesus the only question of interest to him as the representative of Rome (2). The NIV is probably right in translating Jesus' reply as 'Yes', although other versions make it more vague. Jesus did not deny his kingship; he only showed that it was totally different from this world's ideas of kingship. As he had accepted the other charges before the high priest, so he accepted this one before the governor. Other accusations the high priests would bring, but Jesus would pay no attention to them (4), to Pilate's amazement. Again, amazement is not belief. Pilate could not have believed that Jesus' kingship was any threat to Rome or he would have acted on it at once. Was this meant by Mark to reassure other Roman authorities that the early church did not represent a political threat?

It seems as if half the crowd before Pilate had no special interest in Jesus at all; they were simply there in the hope of getting the governor to release a well-known freedom-fighter named Barabbas. The chief priests had no interest in Barabbas. They belonged to the upper class and had too much to lose by any rebellion against the imperial power. They intended to use Barabbas as part of their scheme to secure Jesus' condemnation. As in many modern states, an amnesty for prisoners might be proclaimed on national or religious occasions. Pilate saw this as a way of escaping from an awkward situation; the crowd saw it as a chance of getting their hero back; the chief priests saw it as a chance of getting a death sentence for Jesus. The crowds and the chief priests got their way; Pilate was trapped.

When Pilate asked his deliberately insulting questions in vs 9 and 12, he must have known that it made Jesus' death certain. To ask the chief priests to acknowledge Jesus as king and to expect them to beg for his release was absurd. He must have been trying to taunt them for the difficulty that they had put him in. It had the obvious result: Barabbas was to be freed and Jesus crucified (the death that Barabbas would have faced, if Jesus had not undergone instead). Crucifixion was a cruel and lingering death reserved for slaves and rebels and it had already been used freely in Palestine. The more the crowd was asked for reasons, the more they shouted and refused to give any. Pilate, the moral coward, gave way to avoid the riot that seemed on the point of starting (15; cf. Mt. 27:24). But Mark has made his point: only an unjust Roman official would put to death a harmless religious teacher, and even Pilate would have known that the charges were false. Politics, not religion, was to be the deciding factor, as often today in time of persecution.

15:16–20 The mock coronation (see Mt. 27:27–31). The cruel mockery of the high priest's court was repeated by Pilate's soldiers. A scarlet cavalry cloak and a rough crown made from the thorn bushes that grow everywhere in Palestine were enough to show a mock king. The soldiers' 'Hail' was what they might have given to a king like Herod, or even to Caesar himself, but all was mockery. The Roman force of occupation was feared by the ordinary people of Palestine for its cruelty and oppression. Abuse, if not actual torture, was common, as we can see from John's words to the repentant soldiers in Lk. 3:14. So we should not be surprised at the beating and spitting, or even at the cruel flogging that left prisoners half dead before execution. Yet one soldier at least was so moved by what he saw and heard at the cross that he confessed that Jesus was the Son of God (15:39). (In Acts 10 we read of a Roman soldier who was baptized by Peter.)

15:21–47 The crucifixion (see Mt. 27:32–61; Lk. 23:26–56). Now we are at the heart of the coronation of the king, for now we come to the 'way of the cross', the walk from the governor's house to the place of execution. This last journey of Jesus' is still commemorated by Christians each week in Jerusalem to this day.

It looks as if Simon was not known to the Christian group in Mark's day but that his sons were. If Rom. 16:13 is a reference to the same Rufus, then he at least was known to the Roman church. It may have been that carrying his cross won Simon to Jesus. Usually, the condemned man carried the crossbar of his own cross to the place of execution, but Jesus must have been too weak after his flogging. People sometimes died as a result of the flogging (there was no limit to the number of strokes) that always preceded crucifixion. Those in whose lands flogging has been reintroduced as a legal punishment will understand how damaging it can be.

Golgotha ('Calvary' or 'Skull Hill') got its name from its shape. The site is covered over today by church buildings, but a nearby hill, sometimes called 'Gordon's Calvary', gives some idea of what it must have looked like. The wine mixed with myrrh would have had a bitter taste but was actually a narcotic, given by pious women of Jerusalem to deaden the pain of crucifixion (23). Jesus refused it to keep his mind clear for his last great fight. As usual at all such executions, the criminal's clothes were the reward of the executioners, and the soldiers threw dice to see who got which piece of clothing, for they would be of unequal value.

Mark does not play on our emotions when he describes the crucifixion, as modern accounts might do. He simply records the facts, for that is enough to move us. Perhaps because of his Roman background, Mark seems to count hours differently from the Greek way (cf. Jn. 19:14), so that we are not sure at what exact time Jesus was crucified. Asia and Africa also have, or have had, different ways of counting time too. All that matters is that Jesus died for us there.

Now Jesus' kingship was plain for all to see, on the placard nailed to the cross as Pilate's last taunt to the priests. The crowds mockingly called him the Messiah, the king of Israel; only a Gentile would speak of a king of the Jews. The jeers of the priests and people at the crucifixion are the strongest possible proof that Jesus did indeed claim to be king and Messiah and saviour. Otherwise, the bitter mockery would have had no point. The sign that they demanded (32) was an impossible one. If Jesus was to save us, as suffering Messiah, then he could not save himself from the cross. When he did give them a far greater sign, the sign of the resurrection, they still would not believe. That is why earlier in his ministry Jesus gave the answer that he did to the Pharisees (8:12). Faith would see a sign in everything that he did; unbelief would never be convinced by any sign.

Darkness at noon (by Mark's timing) was a symbol of God's judgment (Am. 8:9). What sort of darkness it was, we do not know. It might have been one of the blinding sandstorms of the area. It could not have been an eclipse of the sun, as Passover occurred at full moon. The darkness seems to have pictured God's wrath not just directed at those who had rejected his Son but also at the sin which Jesus was bearing at that moment for us, as our sin-offering. Why else would Jesus have cried aloud, in the words of Ps 22, that God had deserted him? (34). We cannot conceive what this separation meant to one who from before all eternity had known no separation from his loving Father; yet it shows, as nothing else, how terrible is sin. Jesus' cry came from his heart and Mark translates the Aramaic as usual. Half-understanding, or deliberately misunderstanding, the bystanders saw it as a call to Elijah, who according to Jewish legend would return to save Jews in great danger.

Perhaps, along with the soldiers' mockery there was some sympathy, for one soldier gave Jesus a drink from his rations of wine vinegar, egg and water. Jesus had refused the wine mixed with myrrh, perhaps he accepted this second drink (Jn. 19:30) to gain the strength to make his last great cry of triumph ring out. After this Jesus gave a loud cry and died. According to John,

Jesus' final words were 'It is finished' (Jn. 19:30). The Roman officer in charge of the execution squad heard and realized that the one who cried out like that, and died as he died, must be the Son of God (39). (The Greek could mean 'a son' but it makes little difference; he was a soldier, not a theologian.) The early church saw in these words the confession by a Gentile that Israel had failed to make, and if our suggestions about Mark are correct, this would have been very important to him and his church. In a sense the gospel of Mark is built around the confession of Christ by Peter at Caesarea Philippi, and the confession by this centurion at the cross. Alternatively, we can see it as the contrast between the denial by Peter and the confession by the centurion. This centurion may possibly have become a Christian later, though Mark does not say so. The later story that he went to Britain carrying the gospel is probably a pious fiction.

Mark does not record the earthquake mentioned in Matthew nor the earthquake that introduced Jesus' resurrection; but he does mention one of its results. The great woven curtain of the temple, shutting off the holiest place from the gaze of worshippers, was torn in two. Access to God was now open to all, Gentile as well as Jew, lay person as well as priest.

A group of faithful women had watched the crucifixion from a distance, those who had supported Jesus and the Twelve with money and food and loving care (41). If it is said, intended as criticism, that the church today is largely made up of women, the answer is that they have never been lacking, even in the time of Jesus. If Jesus had his band of men as apostles, he also had his faithful band of women followers, of whom we have some names here. Two of them witnessed the hurried temporary burial of Jesus before the Sabbath began. No pious Jew would leave the body of an executed man exposed after sundown, particularly if the next day was a Sabbath.

God had, as he always has, the right man for the moment. He was Joseph, influential enough to ask for the body (normally, the property of the Roman government in such cases), and rich enough to own a rock-cut tomb to use for the temporary burial (46). As customary, a great stone was slidden down a groove in the rock to protect the body from animals or tomb-robbers. The fact that the two Marys saw where Jesus was buried meant that there could have been no mistake when they returned when the Sabbath was over. Two 'witnesses' had seen the place, and they were women. For those who live in countries where a woman's witness is not accepted in court as being of equal value to that of a man, this is a liberating thought.

16:1–20 Vindication of the King

Mark's account of the resurrection breaks off rather suddenly at v 8. For the possible reason for this sudden ending (if it was not indeed an accident), see the Introduction. Vs 9–19 may be a later attempt to write a fuller ending to the gospel. They are not found in the best manuscripts, which is why the NIV prints them separately.

16:1–8 The resurrection of the King. These eight verses show that Jesus' last cry from the cross, 'Finished!' (which Mark records without giving the words) meant 'Mission accomplished!' This is what the Chinese characters on the cross on the hills high above Kowloon proclaim and what the triumphant figure of the Christ of the Andes in South America shows.

Sabbath ended at nightfall on Saturday. The shops would have been open then, so the women could have bought the spices needed for burial. To embalm the body of Jesus they had to wait until it was daylight on Sunday morning (known ever since to Christians as 'the Lord's day'). These preparations are the strongest proof that even Jesus' closest disciples were not expecting the resurrection and so would not have made the story up. Why did they buy spices or come to embalm him, if they believed that he was going to rise? Why worry about moving the stone from the door? (3). If Jesus had not risen, this stone would have been a real problem. The women knew well which tomb Jesus had been laid in (15:47); there was no chance of any mistake. They must have known how heavy the stone was and that three women would have been unable to move it. (Preparations for burial were usually done by women).

When they arrived they found that the stone had already been rolled away, the tomb was empty and a young man dressed in white was sitting inside. He told them the joyful news that Jesus had risen and sent them to tell his disciples. Although Mark does not say that the young man was an angel, shining white clothes are usually associated with heavenly beings (as we see from the story of the transfiguration; 9:3). It is nonsense to think of him as a mere disciple. Poor fallen Peter was specially included in the word of hope. Did Mark perhaps see this as a special word of comfort for Christians who had broken under persecution, at Rome or elsewhere? Best of all, the disciples would see Jesus again in the ordinary everyday world of Galilee, as he had promised (14:28).

We might have expected Mark to tell that the women triumphantly brought the news back to the disciples, but instead he just says that they ran away (like the men had done before). This was because they were full of both awe and joy (the NIV's trembling and bewildered does not quite convey the full meaning here), and so they said nothing to anyone. We know from the other gospels that it took a personal meeting with the risen Christ to change a private emotion to a living faith that would witness (Jn. 20:18). Perhaps Peter himself was able to confess to this in person to Mark's church (7).

16:9–20 The supplement. As mentioned in the Introduction, the early church was faced with the same question as we are about why Mark broke off so abruptly, especially since the other gospels give such full accounts of appearances of Jesus after the resurrection. It seems that 16:9–20 is made up of two attempts to complete the story (vs 9–18 and 19–20). These are largely made up of details taken from the other gospels or Acts, with a few additions from early church traditions as well. They cannot be said to be part of the Scriptures (like the rest of the gospel), but they are an honest attempt to 'complete' the story of Jesus.

Vs 9–18, largely taken from John's gospel, explain how Mary Magdalene was the first to see the risen Jesus. Vs 12–13 are a reference to the appearance of Jesus to the two disciples at Emmaus (Lk. 24:13–32), and v 14 has parallels in the other gospels, though the exact occasion is not clear.

Vs 15–18 are the equivalent of the 'great commission' of Mt. 28:18 which Mark had expressed in brief in 13:10. Baptism was to be the sign of commitment to Christ; unbelief was to be itself a condemnation. Most of the signs mentioned here are to be found either in the gospels or Acts (except that of drinking poison unharmed although it is mentioned in early tradition). It is important to realize that even this early church writer does not suggest that these signs happen always and for everybody. We must not presume upon them and put God to the test, like one Christian sect that handles poisonous snakes. They are signs of the kingdom of God. We should accept them gratefully if they occur, but our minds should be set on God's kingdom, not on its signs.

Vs 19–20 may be a further addition. They are a brief triumphal account of the ascension of Jesus and the apostolic mission of evangelism, and the way in which the preached word of the Lord was vindicated by the results produced.

These verses, as said above, are not part of Scripture, and so we should not use them for establishing any doctrine, but they are still a valuable summary of the beliefs of the early church, and in so far as they agree with Scripture we may accept them.

LUKE

Introduction

The theology of Luke

Luke's gospel differs from the other three in that while they are each independent, self-contained writings about the life of Jesus, Luke is part of a two-volume work which deals with the beginnings of Christianity. In the opening verses (1:1–4) Luke explains that he wanted to give an orderly narrative for the benefit of people who already knew something about Christianity. He believed that the Christian faith was rooted in historical events which were to be seen as acts of God, and he wished to show that what his readers had heard about Jesus and the early church had a firm historical foundation. Each evangelist has his own perspective on the life of Jesus; he selects and emphasizes those parts of the story which were thought to be of special importance. Luke's writing has four main characteristics:

1. He had fine literary gifts, and he used them to tell his story well.
2. He was more conscious of being a historian than the other evangelists.
3. He wanted to show the theological significance of what had happened.
4. He had a pastoral concern for the needs of his readers.

We can sum up his main theological points as follows:

1. Luke tells the story of Jesus as a piece of history. His gospel is more like a biography than the other gospels. Like the others, however, he has mainly recorded what was significant for the Christian faith, and has not told us about the appearance, character, etc. of Jesus. He is concerned to show the continuity between the story of Jesus and God's past dealings with his people in OT times and also between the story of Jesus and the rise of the early church. The story of Jesus is part of the ongoing history of God's activity in the world, but it is the most important part. By doing this, Luke has shown that the earthly life of Jesus is an essential part of the gospel.

2. The main theme in his account is the gospel of salvation. Two of Luke's favourite words are 'preach the gospel' and 'salvation'. The first of these sums up what Jesus did: his teaching, healing and acts of compassion were all part of the proclamation of the good news that God was coming to the world. The second indicates the content of this good news. It is summed up in 19:10: 'the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost'. By contrast, in Mark the message of Jesus was that the kingdom of God had drawn near (Mk. 1:14–15). Luke brings out more emphatically the fact that the coming of the kingdom meant that God was present in and through Jesus to save people. When Luke calls Jesus 'the Lord' (the name for God in the OT), this may help people to see that God was at work in Jesus.

3. If salvation is for ‘the lost’, it is ‘for all people’, since all are lost. Jesus brought salvation to the people who were under-privileged in Judea—to the poor, to women, to children and to notorious sinners. Although for the most part he confined his work to the Jews, he indicated plainly enough that his message was also for the Gentiles and in particular for the Samaritans, the hated enemies of the Jews, and that it had social consequences for the oppressed—and their oppressors.

4. It is a curious feature of Luke’s gospel that he has little about the significance of the cross as the means of salvation. Rather, he shows that suffering and death were the path appointed by God for Jesus before he could enter his heavenly glory. The relation of the death of Jesus to sinners and sin emerges only in 22:19–20 and Acts 20:28.

5. No writer has emphasized more clearly than Luke the ‘wideness in God’s mercy’; equally nobody has expressed more stringently the claims of Jesus. Intending disciples are warned that they must count the cost, deny themselves and follow Jesus daily. God’s grace is not ‘cheap grace’; sinners must be prepared to repent and renounce their sin.

6. Luke has a second volume about the story of the church. But already in the gospel he shows what the period of the church will be like. It is the time after which Jesus has ascended to heaven and sits at the right hand of God. Meanwhile his servants must continue his work of evangelism among all nations. They are enabled to do this by the power of the same Holy Spirit who equipped Jesus for his work, and they seek God’s help in prayer just as Jesus did. Only when the task of mission is complete will Jesus return as the judge of humankind and set up his heavenly kingdom.

The sources of the gospel

Luke mentions that other people had written about Jesus before him, and he refers to the early eyewitnesses and Christian preachers who handed down the story (1:1–4). The most commonly accepted theory is that Luke and Matthew both had access to copies of the earlier Gospel of Mark as well as to a further collection of sayings of Jesus (generally known as ‘Q’) which has not survived. But in addition to what he got from these sources, Luke had a considerable amount of further information of his own (sometimes referred to by the symbol ‘L’). In view of their origins among people with personal knowledge of Jesus and the early years of the church Luke rightly regarded these sources as reliable for his purpose.

By comparing Luke with Mark we can see that he rewrote Mark’s material and made many small changes in the narrative, but at the same time he was faithfully recording the story. His general accuracy and care in giving the political and geographical background to events and, above all, his fidelity to the actual words of Jesus show that he was using his sources responsibly. The accusation that Luke was not concerned for historical accuracy flies in the face of his own expressed intentions.

This is not to deny that there are places where the differences between the gospels in recording the same events are puzzling. Equally, it must be recognized that the gospel writers told the story in such a way as to make clear its continuing relevance for their readers, and therefore they were not bound to reproduce what Jesus said absolutely word-for-word. It was the faithful reproduction of the meaning, not necessarily of the actual words, that mattered. If, like John, Luke has given us an artist’s portrait of Jesus rather than a photograph, he has given us a true portrait. (For further discussion of the relationships between the gospels see ‘Reading the gospels’.)

The authorship and date of the gospel

From the second half of the second century AD onwards there is a clear and consistent belief that the writer of this gospel (and Acts) was Luke, the doctor and companion of Paul (Col. 4:14). It has sometimes been argued that this belief is nothing more than an intelligent deduction from the NT evidence that Luke-Acts was written by the companion of Paul who was present during the episodes described in Acts in the first person plural form (Acts 16:10–17, etc). Among Paul's possible companions Luke is a plausible choice. It can then be argued that the belief has no independent value as a testimony to the earliest tradition, but is simply one of several possible 'guesses'. However, we may note that the tradition is quite unequivocal in naming Luke and not any other companion of Paul. Moreover this tradition is fairly early (possibly c. AD 120), and there is not the faintest hint of any alternative view in the early church. Marcion, an early Christian heretic, who held faithfully to Paul alone as his apostolic authority, selected Luke's gospel as his one gospel; presumably he accepted the tradition that it was written by Paul's companion.

Against the tradition it has been argued:

1. The picture of Paul in Acts is so distorted that it can hardly have been written by a companion and contemporary of Paul.
2. The gospel has the atmosphere of a time, after the apostles, when the church had given up hope of the imminent return of Jesus and had settled down into the form of rather conventional, institutional life sometimes known as 'early catholicism'.

Neither of these arguments is strong enough to overcome the tradition.

1. On the picture of Paul, see the commentary on Acts in this volume.
2. The second argument depends partly on the assumption that at first the early Christians expected the return of Jesus at any moment and that only somewhat later did the continued delay in his coming lead them to think that they must have been mistaken and the return was postponed to the indefinite future. But, on the one hand, the evidence is decisively against the view that the early Christians expected the return of Jesus almost directly after the resurrection; and, on the other hand, it is not the case that the return has lost all significance in Luke (see 12:35–40; 17:20–37; 18:8; 21:5–36). As for the suggestion that the church has been institutionalized, this is obviously false. It is sufficient to compare Luke with the Apostolic Fathers to see that the outlook in the gospel is very different.

In short, the arguments against Luke's authorship of the gospel fail to carry weight.

The date of composition of the gospel is not known. There are two serious possibilities. The first is that the gospel was written in the early sixties of the first century; the second is that it belongs to the later decades, possibly around AD 80. The key factors are whether the gospel shows knowledge that Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem had actually been fulfilled, and whether Acts shows knowledge of the death of Paul. Most scholars would answer both questions affirmatively, but in fact we simply do not know.

The place of composition is also uncertain. Early traditions suggest that Luke wrote in Achaia (Greece), but the relation to Mark's gospel could suggest a connection with Rome. Again we just do not know.

Further reading

- M. Wilcock, The Message of Luke, BST (IVP, 1979).
L. Morris, Luke, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1988).

D. Gooding, According to Luke (IVP/UK, 1987).
 C. A. Evans, The Gospel of Luke, NIBC (Hendrickson, 1990).
 I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian (Paternoster/Zondervan, 1988).

Outline of contents

The structure of Luke is similar to that of Mark and Matthew. In Mark the story of Jesus is divided into a Galilean period and a Judean period. Luke has inserted the story of the birth of Jesus at the beginning (like Matthew), and he has developed at greater length the account of the final journey of Jesus to Jerusalem.

1:1–4

Preface

1:5–2:52

The birth and childhood of Jesus

1:5–25	The prophecy of John's birth
1:26–38	The prophecy of Jesus' birth
1:39–56	Mary's visit to Elizabeth
1:57–80	The birth of John
2:1–20	The birth of Jesus
2:21–40	The presentation of Jesus in the temple
2:41–52	The Passover visit of Jesus to the temple

3:1–4:13

John the Baptist and Jesus

3:1–20	The preaching of John
3:21–22	The baptism of Jesus
3:23–38	The family tree of Jesus
4:1–13	The temptation of Jesus

4:14–9:50The work of Jesus in Galilee

4:14–5:11	The good news of the kingdom
5:12–6:11	The beginning of controversy with the Pharisees
6:12–49	The teaching of Jesus to his disciples
7:1–50	The compassion of the Messiah
8:1–21	Jesus teaches in parables
8:22–56	A group of mighty works
9:1–50	Jesus and the Twelve

9:51–19:10The journey to Jerusalem

9:51–10:24	The duties and privileges of discipleship
10:25–11:13	The characteristics of disciples
11:14–54	Controversy with the Pharisees
12:1–13:9	Readiness for the coming crisis
13:10–35	The saving effects of God's rule
14:1–24	Jesus at table
14:25–35	The cost of discipleship

15:1–32	The gospel for the outcasts
16:1–31	Warnings about wealth
17:1–19	Teaching for disciples
17:20–18:8	The coming of the Son of Man
18:9–19:10	The scope of salvation

19:11–21:38

The teaching of Jesus in Jerusalem

19:11–27	The parable of the ten minas
19:28–40	Jesus approaches Jerusalem
19:41–48	The fate of Jerusalem
20:1–21:4	Teaching in the temple
21:5–38	The destruction of the temple and the last things

22:1–24:53

The death and resurrection of Jesus

22:1–38	The Last Supper
22:39–53	The prayer and the arrest of Jesus
22:54–71	The Jewish trial
23:1–25	The Roman trial
23:26–49	The crucifixion of Jesus
23:50–56	The burial of Jesus
24:1–53	The resurrection of Jesus

Commentary

1:1–4 Preface

Unlike Matthew, Mark and John, Luke began his gospel with a brief preface written in excellent Greek, such as one would find in the works of historians and other learned writers of his time. He was addressing the world at large and setting Christianity on the stage of world history, and so he adopted the contemporary literary style.

The things that have been fulfilled among us include all that is related in Luke-Acts. Part of the reason why Luke felt the need for a fresh treatment of the basis of Christianity was his conviction that the story of Jesus should be supplemented by an account of what followed.

Luke defends his work as an evangelist by mentioning that others had already written gospels, and then by pointing out his own qualifications to do so: having done careful research he could write a broadly chronological and lucid narrative. Like his predecessors he depended for his information on the apostles and their associates whom he regarded as reliable eye witnesses of what had happened.

His purpose was to give a historical account which would show Theophilus that what he had already learned about Christianity was soundly based. Theophilus is otherwise unknown; most excellent may simply be a piece of courtesy or may reflect his holding of an official position. You have been taught may indicate that he had received instruction as a new believer rather than that he had simply heard rather casually about Christianity.

1:5–2:52 The birth and childhood of Jesus

Luke begins the story of the ministry of Jesus with a prologue telling about his birth and showing how he was born as the Messiah and Son of God (1:35). Matthew's narrative tends to focus on Joseph; Luke is more interested in Mary.

Closely linked with this story is the parallel story of the birth of John the Baptist whose task was to prepare people for the coming of the Lord (1:16–17, 76–77). The careful structuring and interweaving of the stories indicates that John was a significant person whose birth was part of God's plan and that Jesus was an even greater person than his predecessor. The story contains many echoes of the OT which show that God's new acts were in harmony with his earlier mighty acts for his people and also in fulfilment of prophecy. The various super-natural occurrences recorded also mark out the two infants as God's servant and Son respectively.

We do not know how Luke learned the stories; presumably they were handed down in family circles but not made generally public. They have a poetic and dramatic quality about them, although the main facts are historical and are corroborated in Matthew's independent account.

1:5–25 The prophecy of John's birth

Luke introduces the story of John in words that are almost as majestic as those reserved for Jesus, since John was the greatest person of his generation (7:28). His parents were devout adherents of the Jewish religion of the time (the description of them echoes Gn. 17:1; 1 Ki. 9:4).

It was while John's father, Zechariah, who was a priest, was engaged in his duties in the temple that he had a vision of an angel who told him that his prayer had been heard and that he would be granted a son. The boy's name was to be 'John', which means 'God is gracious', and he was to prepare the way for the final coming of God to his people which was the hope of the Jews. He would be specially dedicated to God's service, like Samuel (1 Sa. 1:11), and he would be empowered by the Holy Spirit for his task. His coming would bring joy to the people, for he would fulfil the role of Elijah who was to come back and prepare the way for the coming of God (Mal. 4:5).

Like Abraham (Gn. 15:8), Zechariah could not believe what God had said and asked for confirmation. The angel replied by giving his credentials—his name and his commission from God—and added that Zechariah would become dumb (and deaf) and remain so until the child's birth. When Zechariah emerged from the building, the people outside were surprised at his inability to speak and thought that he must have seen a vision from God which had shocked him. In due course God's promise was fulfilled, and the child was conceived.

Notes. 5 Herod the 'Great' ruled over Judea until 4 BC (see on 2:2). 6–7 If a Jewish wife remained childless, this was considered a great disgrace to her (1:25; cf. Gn. 30:23), and was sometimes thought to be due to her sinfulness. Clearly this was not the case with Elizabeth (1:6). The birth of a child to somebody who was previously barren could be a sign that great blessing would come to the people through the child (e.g. Isaac, Gideon and Samuel). 8–12 The tribe of Levi supplied the priests who served in the temple. Because so many priests were available, the tribe was divided into twenty-four divisions, that of Abijah (5) being the eighth in order (1 Ch. 24:10). Each division did duty for two weeks in the year, and many priests spent the remainder of their time away from Jerusalem in secular occupations (cf. v 23). The incense offering was made twice daily, and the choice of the individual to make the actual offering in the holy place was fixed by casting lots. No priest was allowed the honour more than once in his lifetime, and many were never fortunate enough to be chosen at all. The priest went in by himself and made the offering, while the people waited outside in an attitude of prayer until he reappeared and dismissed them with a benediction. 13 Giving a child a name was the father's duty. For God to take over the task was a sign that he was making the child his responsibility. 24 Elizabeth remained in seclusion during the period when her pregnancy would not be especially obvious and she would still be liable to reproach for childlessness. The news was broken first to Mary, and the miraculous character of what had happened remained a secret from the people at large.

1:26–38 The prophecy of Jesus' birth

The announcement of the birth of Jesus is told in a way that is very similar to the preceding story so that readers may see the parallels. This time, however, interest centres on the mother (rather than the father) of the child. Mary was engaged to Joseph, but their marriage had not yet taken place. In the sixth month of Elizabeth's pregnancy (cf. v 36) she had an angelic vision. Like Zechariah she was very naturally filled with fear and perplexed by being addressed as highly favoured. This expression meant that she had been graciously chosen by God to bear a son (cf. Is. 7:14) whose name would be Jesus, which is the equivalent of Heb. 'Joshua' and means 'Saviour'. He would be a king in the line of David and be called the Son of God, like Solomon, and he would rule over David's realm—but for ever. These expressions indicated that the child was to be the Messiah, although the actual word is not used.

Mary's question to the angel (34) is puzzling. If she was engaged to be married to a descendant of David, as Joseph is explicitly described (27), why should she ask how this was going to happen and say I am a virgin (lit. 'I do not know a man' in the sense of having sexual relations with him)? Would not the child be the natural result of her impending marriage? Some have argued that Mary had taken a vow of virginity, but this would have been impossible for a Jewish girl engaged to be married. She may have taken the angel to be referring to an immediate conception which would have been out of the question before marriage. Whatever the explanation, the question enabled the angel to explain more fully that Mary's son would not be a merely human being, adopted by God as his Son (like David's son in 2 Sa. 7:12–14), but really and truly God's own Son whose birth would be brought about by the power of God's Spirit. The description is reminiscent of the glory of God coming to rest on the tabernacle (Ex. 40:35). Overshadow is not a euphemism for 'beget': the language does not indicate any kind of sexual intercourse between God and Mary.

Mary's child would be holy. Since the basic meaning of this word is 'separated to God' rather than 'morally upright', it can simply mean 'divine', 'sharing in the nature of God' (cf. Ps 89:5, 7).

To confirm the message, the angel spoke of the miracles already experienced by Elizabeth, and Mary quietly accepted the promise without any hint of the doubts that had worried Zechariah.

The story emphasizes not so much the virginity of Mary but rather the positive fact that this child would be conceived by God's power and not by human sexual intercourse. He would nevertheless be a descendant of David through being accepted as the legal son of Mary's husband.

Note. The historicity of the virgin birth. The birth of Jesus is presented as a miraculous or supernatural occurrence. Those who reject the possibility of supernatural events in principle will obviously not be able to accept it; their doubts spring from a world-view which cannot be discussed here. But there are other reasons why even people who accept the possibility of supernatural events may doubt the historicity of this particular story and look for another explanation of how Jesus was born.

a. The silence of most of the NT writers. The fact that the story is scarcely alluded to elsewhere in the NT (other than in Mt.) is not necessarily an objection to its historicity. If true, the story would have been known originally only in the family of Jesus, and it is not likely that it would have been told publicly. Slanders were made about Jesus' parenthood which would suggest that people knew or suspected that it had not been normal.

b. Pagan parallels. Ancient stories exist about great heroes who were the offspring of gods or of mortal women being visited by divine beings and having intercourse with them. It could be argued that the present story is due to the influence of such stories. But there is a world of difference between the atmosphere of the pagan stories and that of Lk. 1–2; and an adequate parallel to the Christian story can be gained only by some very speculative and complex reconstructions of ancient sources. Parallels are not necessarily sources!

c. Details in the narrative. Some parts of the story, especially the date of the census of Quirinius, raise historical difficulties (see below), but they hardly affect the question of the historicity of the central matter at issue.

d. Doctrinal difficulties. It is argued that, if Jesus was not conceived naturally, he was not in all respects a proper human being. But, on any orthodox view of his nature, Jesus was 'human-plus', and his unusual conception does not make him 'human-minus'. The crucial question is whether Jesus was simply a human being with special spiritual endowments (differing from us in degree rather than in kind) or whether he was the Son of God who became a human being. (See further D. F. Wright (ed.), Chosen by God [Marshall Pickering, 1989].)

1:39–56 Mary’s visit to Elizabeth

Mary responded to the angelic message by going to stay with Elizabeth until just before the birth of her child. Mary’s visit provided further confirmation of the message in that she was greeted by Elizabeth apparently spontaneously with a blessing. She realized that Mary was to be the mother of the Messiah, and she was overjoyed that she should visit her. She praised Mary for accepting the angel’s word. Even the movements of the foetus in her womb were seen as a response to Mary’s arrival.

Mary’s poetic reply is known as the ‘Magnificat’ (the Latin verb for ‘glorifies’). It uses the form and language of a Jewish psalm and is saturated with echoes of OT praise to God. Inspiration for the words came from 1 Sa. 2:1–10, the song of Hannah after God had given her a child.

The shape of the song is that a shout of exultation to God is followed by a series of clauses indicating why he is to be praised. After the briefest reference to Mary’s own reason for thanksgiving, the song tells of what God does for his people, speaking quite concretely of his judgments on the mighty and his blessings for the humble—all in fulfilment of his promises to his people long ago. The past tenses in vs 51–54 most probably express what God is going to do in the future through the Messiah—actions that have already begun to take place in that the Messiah has already been conceived, and actions that are of the same kind as what God has done in the past history of Israel. This is thus a metaphorical description of the work of Jesus.

Notes. 41 Nothing is said about the two unborn children subsequently having contact with each other. In later life John apparently did not know Jesus very closely (Jn. 1:31; Lk. 7:19) and there is no hint in the subsequent narrative that they were related. 46 Some MSS have ‘Elizabeth’ instead of Mary as the author of the song, and it has been argued that the sentiments expressed fit her better. But the overwhelming evidence is for Mary as the singer, and after Elizabeth’s words in vs 42–45 a reaction by Mary is a fitting and necessary conclusion to the scene (cf. v 38). 48 The humble state is Mary’s feeling of unworthiness for God’s honour and places her along-side the godly people in Israel. Humble and hungry (53) are terms that could refer simply to the pious people in Israel but more probably a reference to economic poverty and political oppression is included. The Messiah acted on their behalf by bringing in the kingdom of God with its associated blessings and by pronouncing God’s judgment on the proud (51) and rich (53), who would have been understood as owing their position to injustice. 49 God shows that he is holy by his saving actions for his people (as in Ps 111:9).

1:57–80 The birth of John

Elizabeth’s neighbours would have rejoiced simply because she had had a child despite previous childlessness. The eighth day was the appointed day for the Jewish ceremony of circumcision (Lv. 12:3). The association of the naming with this date was unusual, since names were customarily given at birth, but the link gave occasion for the public ceremony at which the people present were surprised that the child was not to be called after his father but given the name of John. Surprise upon surprise followed as the dumb father confirmed the choice. (It is unlikely that this was a miraculous agreement; more likely he had previously communicated with Elizabeth by signs or writing.) Then he regained his speech and praised God.

Zechariah's prophetic song, known as the 'Benedictus' (the Latin word for 'Praise be') is similar to Mary's in its general sentiments and Jewish character. Like hers it uses Jewish language based on the OT to express how God is worthy of praise because he has now acted in accordance with his promises to deliver his people through the coming of a descendant of David. Zechariah is thus represented as knowing about the impending birth of the Messiah. He refers back to the promises made to Abraham (Gn. 22:16–18; 26:3). Ps. 105:9–11 is understood to mean that God will make it possible for his people to serve him by living holy and righteous lives.

Then in vs 76–79 the song changes its form and becomes an address to the newly born child; he will act as a prophet and prepare the way of the Lord (cf. Is 40:3; Mal. 3:1) by assuring the people of forgiveness of sins (77). The Lord is ambiguous; it may refer to God himself (as in 1:46, 68) or to Jesus (as in 1:43). Because of the tender mercy of our God (78) goes with the knowledge of salvation in v 77. The salvation is spiritual, although vs 71 and 74 indicate that ultimately God's salvation will include the overthrow of the enemies of his people.

The rising sun (78) is an allusion to Mal. 4:2 (cf. Nu. 24:17), but the phrase (Gk. anatolē) might be a translation of the Hebrew word for 'shoot' or 'branch' (which is a title for the Messiah in Zc. 3:8; 6:12). Either way, the reference is to the Messiah and not to John. It is not clear whether v 79 should be linked to v 77 (indicating what John will do) or to v 78 (indicating what the Messiah will do).

The story of John's birth is completed with a brief note of his upbringing (cf. 2:40, 52) and his period in the desert. He remains offstage until the account of the birth of Jesus is complete. There are some interesting similarities between John's way of life and teaching and those of the Jewish sect in the desert at or near Qumran. They lived an ascetic life, bathed themselves regularly as a religious ritual, and looked forward to the coming salvation of God.

2:1–20 The birth of Jesus

During the reign of Augustus (31 BC–AD 14) the Romans reorganized their administration in several parts of the empire and carried out fresh censuses for the purpose of taxation. The execution of such an imperial decree in Syria (with which the area of Judea was associated) brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, long ago prophesied as the Messiah's place of birth. The fact that Mary travelled with Joseph indicates that they were now married, but the description of her as pledged to be married shows that they had not yet consummated the marriage (cf. Mt. 1:25). Although an early Christian tradition suggests that the child was born in a cave, Luke appears to mean a part of an inn (or of a house) where animals were kept. The traditional picture of a surly innkeeper refusing admission to the needy couple is somewhat dubious.

An angelic vision announced the birth and its significance to an unexpected and even despised group of people—shepherds. All the people refers to the Jews, the people of Israel. Not until v 32 do we get the world-wide significance of the birth of Jesus. The old wording of the announcement 'good will toward men' rests on inferior MSS, and the traditional translation 'men of good will' is mistaken. The point is rather that through the birth of the Messiah God extends his favour to people who have done nothing to deserve it; and he graciously grants them peace. Peace expresses the nature of salvation as the restoration of good relations between God and sinful people and the consequent reception of his blessings. The cloths were the normal covering of a newly born child, and might indicate (at least to some of Luke's readers) that it was a royal child.

Note. 2 The census of Augustus creates historical problems. Despite assertions to the contrary, it does seem possible that a listing of the people for taxation, such as was carried out in areas directly ruled by Rome, could have taken place in the kingdom of a subject king like Herod. The census was based on where one resided or held property. The major problem is that Quirinius did not become governor of Syria until AD 6, at which time he certainly imposed a tax which caused a sharp rebellion (Acts 5:37). Jesus, however, was born before the death of Herod in 4 BC.

Suggested solutions to the problem are: a. 'Quirinius is a textual error in the MSS for 'Saturninus' (who was governor of Syria 9–6 BC). b. Quirinius held an earlier appointment in the area, probably not the governorship of Syria but some kind of 'roving commission' in the eastern empire. c. Associated with this hypothesis is the view that, since a census and the imposition of taxes would take a lengthy period, Luke may be referring to a process begun under Herod and completed under Quirinius. d. A possible alternative translation is that the census 'took place before Quirinius was governor of Syria'. No firm decision between these possibilities is possible at present.

2:21–40 The presentation of Jesus in the temple

Again in parallel with the story of John we read how Jesus was circumcised and given a significant name (see 1:31). Prophecies about John's future had been made at his circumcision; in the case of Jesus these took place when he was at the temple. But first three significant facts are mentioned:

a. Jewish law required that after the birth of a male child his mother was regarded as 'unclean' for seven days and had to remain at home for a further thirty-three, after which on the fortieth day a purification sacrifice had to be offered (Lv. 12:1–8). This could be done only at Jerusalem and necessitated a journey there (24). Although Luke says their purification, it was only Mary and not her child who needed to be purified. Luke has run together the purification of the mother and the 'redemption' of her child (see below). The sacrifice offered was the less expensive one, permitted to poor people—a deliberate reference to the 'humble' status of Joseph and Mary (cf. 1:46–55).

b. The law required that a firstborn child had to be 'redeemed'. All firstborn creatures were regarded as consecrated to God. This was expressed by sacrificing the firstborn of animals and by making a payment of five shekels in lieu of children when they were a month old. (Ex. 13:13; Nu. 18:15–16). The law did not require the presence of the child at the temple for this purpose.

c. Jesus was present because Mary seems also to have made a special offering of her child to God for his service, just as Hannah had given Samuel to God at the tabernacle. (1 Sa. 1:11, 21–28).

In these ways all possible requirements of the law were fulfilled (See Gal. 4:4).

The narrative then focuses on the response of Simeon and Anna on seeing the child. Simeon was a godly Israelite who looked forward to God's consolation (i.e. deliverance; Is 40:1; 61:2) of his people and had received a divine promise that he would not die before the coming of the Messiah. Under divine inspiration that the moment had come he went into the temple, embraced the child and expressed both his gratitude to God and his readiness to die—a sign or testimony that the promise had been fulfilled. Simeon saw the child's coming as that of a Saviour for all people and not merely for the Jews; here is the first mention of the universal redemption promised in the OT (e.g. Ps. 98; Is. 49:6). But, said Simeon, the child's coming would lead to judgment as well as salvation, for people would be revealed as they really were in their hearts, and Mary herself would suffer anguish at the consequent treatment of Jesus.

Simeon's words were confirmed by the arrival of Anna, who prophesied that God would bring deliverance through Jesus to the Jewish people. Thereafter the family returned to Nazareth (but cf. Mt. 2 for a period spent in Egypt to which Luke makes no reference). There he grew up with the evident blessing of God upon him, and began to show the wisdom which is demonstrated in the next story.

Notes. 27 Luke refers to Joseph and Mary as the parents of Jesus because Joseph took Jesus as his own son and was thus regarded as his father. 33 It may seem odd that Mary and Joseph marvelled at what Simeon said about the child when they had already heard about the child's destiny. But this is to be somewhat pedantic. The surprise of the parents is psychologically probable: how was it that Simeon, a stranger to them, knew about Jesus? 34 It is not clear whether Simeon was referring to the falling of some people and the rising of others or to the penitence and restoration of the same people. 36 Asher was one of the tribes of northern Israel. 37 Anna was eighty-four years old, unless the meaning is that she had been a widow for that period (NIV mg.). The statement that she never left the temple is not to be taken too literally (cf. 24:53). 38 Jerusalem means the same as 'Israel' (cf. v 25). It was to be the place where God's deliverance of his people would start (Acts 1:8).

2:41–52 The Passover visit of Jesus to the temple

The age of twelve was normal for instructing a boy for entry to the religious community of Judaism, and therefore for a meaningful visit to Jerusalem. Jewish men were required by the law to keep the three annual festivals in Jerusalem, but only the Passover was strictly observed. Whole families would go up to Jerusalem, with an estimated 60,000–100,000 visitors packing themselves into a town whose normal population may have been no more than 25,000. People travelled in large groups for companionship and security on the way, and it is not surprising that Mary and Joseph did not worry unduly about Jesus on the first day's journey home. After a day spent in returning to Jerusalem they found him in the temple, which was a set of courtyards and buildings used not only for offering sacrifices but also for religious teaching and discussions (cf. Acts 5:25). His intelligent discussion with the teachers was an indication of the wisdom that he would show later. The story does not mean that Jesus was trying to instruct them, but rather that they were impressed by his unusual promise as a pupil.

Jesus' reply to his parents was in effect: 'You ought to have known where to find me, namely in my Father's house.' (The translation 'about my Father's business' is less apt.) It shows that from an early age Jesus was aware of an intimate relationship to God as his Father in a way which went beyond the normal religious consciousness of a devout Jew (cf. 10:21–22), and that he was putting this relationship first in his life—although he was careful to continue to obey his parents. But the incident showed them that their son had a character and role that went beyond their understanding. His perfect growth as a boy continued right through his adolescence and young manhood (like Samuel, 1 Sa. 2:26, and John, Lk. 1:80).

3:1–4:13 John the Baptist and Jesus

3:1–20 The preaching of John (see Mt. 3:1–12; Mk. 1:1–8)

Like the first Christian preachers Luke saw the real beginning of the events that formed the basis of the gospel in the appearance of John the Baptist (Acts 10:37). His witness to Jesus marked the end of the old age of the law and promise and the beginning of the new age of fulfilment (cf. 16:16). It is, therefore, this important event which he places in the context of world history and accurately dates by giving a brief description of the political situation at the time. Tiberius was Roman emperor during AD 14–37, and his fifteenth year was either AD 27–28 or AD 28–29. (Different methods of calculating dates inclusively in Roman times cause the slight uncertainty.) Pilate was governor of Judea AD 26–36; an inscription from Caesarea gives him the official title of ‘prefect’ (rather than ‘procurator’). The rulers of the other parts of Herod’s former kingdom are listed, including Abilene in the north-east corner. Although only one high priest held office at a time, two are named, Caiaphas (who held office AD 18–37) and his father-in-law Annas (who had held office AD 6–15 and continued to exercise influence).

John was both the fulfiller of prophecy and also the last of the pre-Christian prophets. He is therefore described in the same way as an OT prophet (cf. vs 1–2 with Je. 1:1–2). His coming fulfilled Is. 40:3–5, and his special task was to proclaim a religious ceremony of washing which pledged the forgiveness of sins.

John’s proclamation is expanded in three brief sections. In the first (7–9) he warned people that it was no use being baptized without a true willingness to turn from sin that was expressed in actions. Even for Jews repentance was necessary; their descent from Abraham was no defence against imminent judgment. They were no better than vipers, evil and destructive in character. Had somebody told them that they could escape judgment simply by being baptized (i.e. without repenting)? In fact the axe was already poised, ready to chop down unfruitful trees—but there was still a chance of repenting before it was too late.

A second paragraph (10–14), peculiar to Luke, indicates specifically how particular groups of people were to live. The crowds of ordinary people (poor people are obviously in mind) must show generosity to one another in their needs—a so-called ‘work of love’ that went beyond the minimal requirements of the law. Tax collectors and soldiers (who policed the country) were to act honestly and justly. John did not advocate a radical social upheaval, but insisted on moral principles that would lead to the transformation of society from within rather than by violent revolution.

A third paragraph (15–17; cf. Jn. 1:19–34) brings the vital point. Many people asked during John’s lifetime and later whether he was the Messiah. Whatever his followers thought, John knew his own position. One more powerful would come after him. This is unlikely to be God himself and is John’s way of referring rather cryptically to the Messiah. John could only cleanse people with the sign of baptism by water, but the Coming One would purify people’s hearts with fire. This could be a symbol for final judgment (cf. v 17) or for the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5). John could then mean that the coming of the Messiah might be experienced as judgment or as purification and power. The Messiah would carry through a sharp separation among the people, like a harvester who preserves the wheat but destroys the chaff. Repentance, therefore, was urgently needed!

This message is summed up positively as good news (18). It was closely associated with the coming of Jesus, who was the more powerful one. But before he appears on the scene, John’s story is rounded off with his arrest for his outspoken preaching (cf. Mk. 6:17–29)—a deliberate hint of what would also happen to Jesus.

Notes. 8 Stones and children could have been a deliberate pun in Aramaic. 11 A person might wear two tunics to keep warm on a journey or in the open at night. Or the reference may be simply to the possession of two tunics.

3:21–22 The baptism of Jesus (see Mt. 3:13–17; Mk. 1:9–11; cf. Jn. 1:32–33)

Luke mentions the baptism of Jesus almost in passing. He wants his readers to note that Jesus was praying at the time and above all that he received a divine revelation with two elements.

First, the Holy Spirit came upon him in order to equip him for his work as a prophet (cf. Is. 61:1, quoted in Lk. 4:18) and as the Messiah (Is. 11:1–5) and Servant of the Lord (Is. 42:1).

Secondly, a heavenly voice confirmed the divine approval of him in his role as the Son of God (cf. Gn. 22:2 and Ps. 2:7 for the wording) and as his servant (cf. Is. 42:1). The essential point of the story is the empowering of Jesus for what lay before him. We should jump straight to 4:1 to see the immediate result.

3:23–38 The family tree of Jesus (see Mt. 1:1–17)

But first we have a passage which might well have been placed in a footnote in a modern book. Jesus' family tree is meant to establish that he was legally a descendant of David (cf. 1:27, 32, 69) through his relationship to Joseph, and also to demonstrate that he was a member of the human race. It is not meant to show that Jesus was the Son of God by descent from Adam, since that would be true of all descendants of Adam. The fact that the family tree is traced through Joseph is not an argument against the virgin birth (cf. 2:27 note).

The family tree differs from that in Matthew. It is in reverse order, and it goes back beyond Abraham to Adam, and thus places Jesus in a wider context than does Matthew. But above all it contains a quite different and longer set of names between David and Jesus, only two names (Zerubbabel and Shealtiel) being common to both lists. Both lists give the descent of Jesus through his supposed father Joseph (so it was thought; 23). The theory that Luke really gives us the family tree of Mary rather than of Joseph is improbable. The theory with least difficulties is that Matthew gives the descendants of David down the royal line (i.e. who was heir to the throne at any given time), but Luke gives the particular line to which Joseph belonged. Even so there are still problems, and in the absence of fuller information the problems of explanation and harmonization with Matthew remain insoluble.

Notes. 23 The son of need not imply a strict father-son relationship with no gaps in between any more than Matthew's 'was the father of'; both family trees may contain jumps over the generations. For Heli Matthew has 'Jacob'. 24 It is uncertain whether Matthat is to be identified with Matthan (Mt. 1:15). 27 Zerubbabel was the leader of the Jewish community after the return from Babylonian exile. For Shealtiel see Hg. 1:1; but in 1 Ch. 3:19 (Heb. text, not the LXX) Zerub-babel's father is Pedaiah. According to 1 Ch. 3:17 Shealtiel was the son of Jehoiachin (graecized as Jeconiah, Mt. 1:12) and not of Neri; perhaps an adoption took place. 31 This Nathan is not the well-known prophet but a son of David (2 Sa. 5:14). 32 From this verse onwards the names agree with those in the Gk. version of the OT except for minor spelling differences. See Gn. 5:1–32; 11:10–26; Ru. 4:18–22; 1 Ch. 1:1–34; 2:1–15; 3:5–19. 36 Cainan occurs in the LXX, but not in the Hebrew OT.

4:1–13 The temptation of Jesus (see Mt. 4:1–11; Mk. 1:12–13)

The immediate result of Jesus' reception of the Spirit was that he was sent into the desert to face on his own the attacks of the devil. The temptations were attempts to deceive Jesus into doing wrong. He recognized and resisted them thanks to the power of the Spirit and emerged unscathed.

The first temptation (3–4) urged Jesus to use his newly-confirmed status (3:22) to perform an act of power to satisfy his hunger. The temptation was really directed against Jesus' obedience to the Father and suggested to him that the satisfaction of his bodily needs was more important than the spiritual experience which leads to a strong character (Rom. 5:3). Jesus responded by quoting the scriptural principle that a person's real life does not depend upon the satisfaction of physical hunger. The point of the quotation is that the devil made an attractive suggestion to Jesus, but Jesus refused it because it went against Scripture.

Then (5–8) Jesus was taken to a high point from which the entire world could be seen. As its apparent ruler (Jn. 12:31), the devil offered to surrender dominion over it to Jesus if he would acknowledge his higher authority. The temptation was less subtle this time. Ultimately, however, the world does not belong to the devil; his promises are not to be trusted; and to bow to him is incompatible with serving God alone (Dt. 6:13).

Finally (9–12), the devil, defeated by Scripture, tried to quote it in his own interests. He suggested that Ps. 91:11–12 justified Jesus in leaping down from the high colonnade of the temple into the Kidron Valley below. The devil made out this act to be a demonstration of Jesus' trust as a Son in his Father. It would in fact have been an act of unbelief; people don't test somebody in whom they have complete trust, especially when that person is God (Dt. 6:16). To have yielded to the suggestion would have been in effect to doubt that he was really God's Son and that his Father was trustworthy. Thus the devil was repulsed each time and withdrew from the conflict for the time being. Although he does not reappear in the story by name until 22:3, he was active in the period in between (e.g. 13:16; 22:31).

The temptations were all directed against Jesus as the Son of God. They were not specifically directed against his work as Messiah, encouraging him to win over people by spectacular miracles, but against his inner relationship to God on which his status as Messiah rests. Where Israel in the desert distrusted and disobeyed God (Dt. 6–8), its Messiah was trusting and obedient.

4:14–9:50 The work of Jesus in Galilee

4:14–5:11 The good news of the kingdom

4:14–15 Introductory summary (cf. Mt. 4:12–17; Mk. 1:14–15). Luke begins his account of Jesus' work among the people with a brief summary which shows that Jesus acted as a teacher, that he made a strong impression on the people far and wide, and that their immediate reaction was favourable.

4:16–30 Jesus teaches at Nazareth (cf. Mt. 13:53–58; Mk. 6:1–6). Luke has probably brought forward this incident ahead of its historical position (see Mk. 6:1–6) because it provided an ideal opening summary of the message of Jesus. The synagogue service consisted of prayers, readings from the law and prophets and a sermon. The leader of the service stood to pray and read, but sat to teach. Any competent person present could be invited to take part (cf. Acts 13:15). There was at this time a set list of readings for the 'first lesson' from the law, but there was probably freedom of choice in the 'second lesson' from the prophets. Jesus read from Is.

61:1–2 and gave a discourse (which is obviously much abbreviated here) concerning the fulfilment of this prophecy. He stressed the note of present fulfilment: what the prophet had foretold centuries before was now coming true. He taught that the prophecy had a personal fulfilment: the one anointed with the Spirit was Jesus himself. He also indicated that it was a gracious fulfilment: the era of God's salvation had now arrived. It may be significant that Jesus did not go on to complete the quotation with its reference to 'the day of vengeance of our God'. The text included a phrase from Is. 58:6, probably included by the author because of its obvious fitness to describe the ministry of Jesus. The various acts ascribed to the speaker in the prophecy are to be interpreted primarily spiritually rather than literally (cf. Lk. 1:46–55). The year of the Lord's favour is the time graciously chosen by him to show favour to his people; it reflects the description of the 'year of jubilee' when debts are forgiven.

Initial amazement turned to hostility, as the audience took exception to one of their own number (known locally as Joseph's son; but see Mk. 6:3) making such impressive claims for himself. They wanted some visible proof of the validity of his claims before their own eyes, like the mighty works which he was rumoured to have done at Capernaum. In any event, they failed to recognize Jesus as a prophet, and he could only tell them that when the prophets of Israel had been faced with similar disbelief they had performed their mighty works outside Israel (1 Ki. 17:8–16; 2 Ki. 5:1–14). So it was a word of judgment that Jesus in effect spoke against them. There was also the suggestion that the gospel would ultimately go to the Gentiles (although Jesus himself continued to work among the Jews). In their anger the people tried to lynch him.

Notes. 22 Although the swift change by the people from praise to disbelief is hard to understand, it is unnecessary to assume that accounts of two or more incidents (16–22, 23–24; 25–30) have been clumsily run together. It may be that spoke well (lit. 'bore witness') really means 'bore witness against him', and were amazed may indicate annoyance rather than acceptance. Gracious words are words speaking about God's grace. 25 Three and a half years: see Jas. 5:17. 30 A miraculous disappearance is probably not meant.

4:31–44 Jesus at Capernaum (see Mt. 8:14–17; Mk. 1:21–39). From the hill country Jesus went down to Capernaum on the lakeside. One of his main activities was teaching in the synagogues when the congregations met on the Sabbath. A person possessed by a demon would be regarded today as suffering from some kind of mental illness or handicap. This, however, is not a full diagnosis of the people described in the gospels, some of whom possessed an uncanny knowledge of things unknown to ordinary people. The presence of evil, supernatural powers cannot be rationalized away, and, just as theologians recognize that the Holy Spirit works through people's lives for their good, so too we may perhaps recognize a similar activity by evil spirits. This man had supernatural insight into the nature of Jesus and the purpose of his work. The Holy One of God means much the same as Son of God or Christ (41) and brings out especially the opposition of Jesus, perhaps as the bearer of the Holy Spirit, to all that was unholy. Perhaps the demoniac hoped that he could overpower Jesus by using his name—this was a common ancient superstition (cf. the fairy story of Rumpelstiltskin)—but Jesus commanded the demon to leave the man. The healing confirmed the impression of tremendous authority which Jesus' teaching had already made.

Illness too was seen to be subject to his power. A high fever may be a technical medical term. Jesus rebuked it almost as if it were a person. The point may be that he attacked the power of evil which expresses itself in human illness.

Once the new Jewish day had begun at sunset, the restrictions on work and on movement during the Sabbath were lifted, and the sick could be carried to Jesus. He silenced the cries of the demoniacs because he wanted people to learn for themselves who he was.

In the morning he deliberately left the crowds. Luke does not mention that Jesus was at prayer at this time (as Mk. 1:35 does; but see 5:16). His divine commission was to proclaim the good news of God's rule (see Mk. 1:15) far and wide, and he could not stay in one place and become the idol of an admiring throng. So he travelled around Judea, which here must mean Palestine as a whole, including Galilee, as Jesus did not go south into Judea proper for continuous work until later.

5:1–11 The call of the disciples (cf. Mt. 4:18–22; Mk. 1:16–20). Mark's briefer account of the call of Jesus' first disciples concentrates on the basic fact that the right response to the message of the kingdom of God is instant obedience to the summons to follow Jesus. Luke's longer account suggests that the call took place only after Jesus had won the friendship of Simon and shown his power to him. Simon, as an experienced fisherman, knew that there was little likelihood of a catch, since the best fishing was done by night in the deep water. (During the daytime they fished in the shallow water.) Nevertheless, he was already sufficiently impressed by Jesus to obey his command. When the full revelation of Jesus' power came to him, he was overcome by a deep sense of fear and unworthiness in the presence of somebody who demonstrated heavenly power and was thus shown to be a holy person. Simon was not necessarily especially sinful, but he felt the sense of fear which anybody ought to have in the presence of the divine (cf. Jdg. 13:21–22). Jesus, however, told him not to be afraid (cf. 1:13, 30) and gave him a call to discipleship in words that were suggested by Simon's present occupation. All the attention is focused on Simon as the leader of the Twelve: we are left to infer Andrew's presence from v 6.

Notes. 1 Gennesaret (Chinnereth in the OT) is another name for Galilee, and refers specifically to the area just south of Capernaum (cf. Mk. 6:53). 3 For Jesus, teaching by the sea and using a boat as a kind of pulpit see Mk. 4:1–2. 11 Theories that the great catch of fish was intended to provide provision for the dependants of the disciples or that it symbolizes the catch of people whom they would take (cf. Jn. 21:1–14) are speculative.

5:12–6:11 The beginning of controversy with the Pharisees

Luke relates five incidents in all, of which (apart from the first) various actions by Jesus and his disciples led to criticism from the Pharisees and showed how the new way of the kingdom of God contrasted with the Pharisaic emphasis on strict keeping of the law.

5:12–16 The healing of a leper (see Mt. 8:1–4; Mk. 1:40–45). The first story stands in contrast with the following narratives, for it illustrates how Jesus normally stood by the OT law. The word leprosy covered a variety of skin diseases, not all of them infectious. If people who had previously been certified as lepers claimed to be cured, they had to go through the proper form of discharge from the priests before being allowed to move freely again in society (Lv. 14:1–32), and so Jesus instructed this man to obey the law. The story illustrates how Jesus performed cures in response to faith—the idea is clearly present, though the word is not used—and it shows how his reputation was growing, both as a teacher and as a healer.

5:17–26 Jesus' authority to forgive sins (see Mt. 9:1–8; Mk. 2:1–12). The presence of Pharisees and teachers of the law at the beginning of the story prepares the reader to expect a hostile reaction to Jesus. The Pharisees were a religious party who placed great stress on strict observance of the law and the minute detailed regulations which had subsequently been added to it and were taught especially by the teachers of the law. These were a professional class of lawyers and teachers who generally belonged to the Pharisaic party. Luke describes the flat roof of the house as being covered with tiles (a form of construction familiar to his Greek readers), whereas Mark implies that it was made of hardened mud and sticks. Jesus did not heal the paralysed man immediately but said that his sins were (there and then) forgiven. This may possibly imply that the man thought that his illness was a punishment for some particular sin; it certainly does not mean that illness or disaster is always a punishment for sin (see 13:1–5). A prophet or priest could forgive sins in the name of God. The question was whether Jesus had the prophetic authority to do so; if not, he was falsely claiming to act on behalf of God. In fact Jesus claimed the higher authority of the Son of Man who is associated with God's final judgment on mankind (cf. Dn. 7:9–22; Lk. 9:26; 12:8–9). His response was to give indirect proof of this authority by showing that he also possessed divine authority to heal (17). Performance of the visible act should have convinced his watchers that he also possessed authority for the invisible, and therefore unprovable, act.

5:27–32 Jesus' attitude to sinners (see Mt. 9:9–13; Mk. 2:13–17). Unlike 5:1–11 this story tells only incidentally what is implied in discipleship. Its main purpose is to show the kind of people Jesus called and to justify his action. He was glad to bring the good news to Levi and his former companions, and his justification for his action was beyond criticism. No more than a doctor could he be expected to avoid people who are ill. His duty lay with the needy whom he invited to repent; those who thought themselves to be righteous were not his primary concern. The tax collectors were regarded by the Pharisees as religiously 'unclean' because they worked for the Romans and hated because they fleeced their fellow-Jews and filled their own pockets very successfully. The sinners who are here associated with them included prostitutes, criminals and other people with an unsavoury reputation.

5:33–39 Jesus' attitude to fasting (see Mt. 9:14–17; Mk. 2:18–22). The OT required people to fast only once a year, on the Day of Atonement. The Pharisees required fasting twice a week, but Jesus disregarded this innovation. He held that it would be as fitting for his disciples to fast as for the friends of the bridegroom to fast at a wedding instead of joining in the festivities. The new era of salvation had arrived, and the mournful rites of the past were incompatible with it. Only during the sad days between the death of Jesus and his resurrection would mourning be appropriate.

Further, it would be futile to try to combine the new religion with man-made legalism. The new religion would be spoiled, and in any case the two ways could not be combined, just as an unshrunk piece of cloth will pull away from an old garment or fermenting wine will burst old skin containers that have lost their elasticity. V 39 is probably an ironic comment on Jews who rejected the new wine of the gospel and held that the old ways were better.

6:1–11 Jesus' attitude to the Sabbath (see Mt. 12:1–14; Mk. 2:23–3:6). The first incident deals with the rigid attitude to the Sabbath which set out in elaborate detail what people must not do on it, even down to rubbing ears of corn in their hands. When the Pharisees heard, doubtless from some tell-tale, that Jesus was breaking their man-made law, they criticized him. He referred them to the example of King David who had been allowed by the priest to give the consecrated bread in the tabernacle to his men, although it was normally reserved for only the priests to eat (1 Sa. 21:1–6). David was not in fact breaking any law, and Jesus was not citing his action as a precedent for doing so but rather showing that the OT itself does not teach the kind of strict legalism which the Pharisees had developed. The Sabbath was made for people, and consequently the Son of Man is its Lord. Since, however, the Sabbath is the Lord's (God's) own day, this statement of Jesus probably concealed a claim to equality with God.

In the second incident the opponents of Jesus may have 'planted' the sick man in the synagogue to see what Jesus would do. He accepted the unspoken challenge and posed his searching question: If his action in healing a man on the Sabbath was to be considered sinful, how much more sinful was their plotting of his death? The penalty for transgressing the Sabbath law was death, and Mark tells us that from this time the Pharisees began to plot the death of Jesus.

6:12–49 The teaching of Jesus to his disciples

After his sketch of the general character of the work of Jesus and the opposition of some of the Jewish religious leaders, Luke now tells us about Jesus' choice of his close followers and the teaching which he gave to all who wished to follow him.

6:12–16 The call of the Twelve (see Mt. 10:1–4; Mk. 3:13–19). Only Luke draws attention to the way in which Jesus prayed all night before making the momentous choice of the Twelve. Out of the larger company of those who responded to his teaching he chose twelve apostles. This word reminds us of the group of people who held leading positions in the church after the resurrection of Jesus, but here it expresses the way in which Jesus spoke of sending out (Gk. apostellō) his companions on mission. Luke does not tell us when Simon received his new name of 'rock' (cf. Mt. 16:18; Jn. 1:42). Bartholomew is probably the same as Nathaniel (Jn. 1:45–51). Matthew and Levi (5:27) are the same person—it was not uncommon for Jews to have two names. A Zealot was an extreme Jewish nationalist. Judas (cf. Jn. 14:22) is the 'Thaddaeus' of Mark's list. Iscairiot may mean 'man of Kerioth' or 'assassin' or 'false one' (probably the first of these).

6:17–19 The assembling of the people (cf. Mt. 4:23–25; 12:15–21; Mk. 3:7–12). From the hills Jesus returned to a level place where the people could more easily reach him as they swarmed together from all over the area surrounding Galilee. They may have been especially attracted by his healing power, but Jesus took the opportunity to teach them.

By telling the story in this order (contrast Mark, where the call of the Twelve follows this paragraph), Luke shows that there was a substantial crowd present to hear the following sermon (cf. 7:1) and that it was not delivered only to the Twelve.

6:20–26 Two kinds of people (see Mt. 5:1–12). The 'Sermon on the Plain' is Luke's version of the much longer 'Sermon on the Mount' in Mt. 5–7. It is generally agreed that Matthew has enlarged a version of the sermon found in Luke by adding to it other sayings of Jesus on the same or related topics.

The sermon begins by contrasting two kinds of people. The first group are by all outward appearance to be pitied, but in the eyes of Jesus they are blessed or happy because of what is promised to them. They are poor and needy, hungry and sad. Although some take these expressions purely as references to their literal condition, they should probably be understood basically (but by no means exclusively) in a spiritual sense (cf. Mt. 5:3, 6) of people who feel dissatisfied with the present world and their lot in it and who long for what God has to give them. They are promised that he will hear them and fulfil their longings in the coming kingdom which was the theme of Jesus' message. People may hate and insult them for putting their trust in God's representative, the Son of Man, but, like the prophets, they will receive their reward from God. This fourth 'beatitude' shows that the persons whom Jesus has in mind right through are his disciples, and what he is speaking of are the privileges and the implications of being disciples.

The other group of people have what the present time can offer—satisfaction of their desire for material goods, happiness and a good reputation in the world—and want nothing more. No need for them to cry out to God in prayer, for they think that they have enough! But the time will come, says Jesus, when they will have nothing (cf. 5:34).

6:27–38 Love and mercy (see Mt. 5:39–48; 7:12, 1–2). The first part of the sermon dealt with the relationship of the disciples to God; this second part is about their relationship to other people. It plunges straight into the duty to love one's enemies. The basic principle is laid down in vs 27–28, where it is made clear that the enemies in mind are especially those who persecute the disciples (cf. v 22). Two brief examples of such love are given: submission to violence (rather than retaliation) when struck by somebody and readiness to give a mugger who robs you more than he asks for. The disciples must be prepared to give away their possessions freely, and their conduct is summed up in v 31 (the 'golden rule').

Jesus admits that even sinful people are quite ready to do good to those who have helped them or from whom they can expect some benefit in return. But disciples ought to go further and not stick simply to doing good for what they can get in return for it or as a way of thanking somebody who has done them good. There may well be no earthly credit for people who behave like this, but there will be a heavenly reward: God will regard them as his true sons who imitate their Father's merciful nature to those who are undeserving.

What this reward will be is indicated in vs 37–38. The person who loves like this will receive the same love—and more—from God. The person who does not judge other people will not be judged by God, and the person who gives freely will receive an ample return—like a container so full of corn that it spills over.

Notice again that all this is said to the disciples. Jesus is not saying that all that people have to do to inherit a heavenly reward is to love other people.

This sort of behaviour is revolutionary. It is a good question whether Jesus meant it absolutely literally or was using striking examples to make people think. Obviously Jesus was not promoting the kind of thoughtless generosity to any lazy scroungers which would simply confirm them in their ways. Things are here stated in absolute terms, and other Christian principles must also be taken into consideration.

Note. 32 Sinners is here a general term for the people of the world who are not bound by the principles of the kingdom of God.

6:39–49 Pictures of discipleship (see Mt. 15:14; 10:24f.; 7:3–5; 16–18; 12:33–35; 7:24–27; cf. Jn. 13:16; 15:20). The sermon ends with a series of short 'parabolic' sayings that bring out the kind of character that disciples should show.

39–42 The first group of sayings is about spiritual sight. Disciples must learn before they can become teachers of others. For a person who is taught will be no better than the teacher, and if the teachers themselves fall, so too will their pupils. Disciples must be able to see themselves clearly before they can point out the faults of others. Jesus makes his points using humour and exaggeration to drive them home.

43–45 Good conduct can come only out of a good heart. It is as foolish to expect good fruit to be produced by bad trees as to expect good deeds from a bad person. Only the person whose heart is richly stored with good will bring forth good teaching.

46–49 Finally, what matters most of all is actually obeying these (and other) words of Jesus. The person who hears them and then does not obey them is utterly foolish. The person who hears and obeys will be as secure on the day of judgment as the person who takes care to build a house with strong foundations on rock.

7:1–50 The compassion of the Messiah

Luke next brings out something more of the character of Jesus as the Messiah and particularly stresses that this was shown in acts of mercy which demonstrated the compassion of God. The coming of the kingdom means that God displays his compassion in powerful ways through Jesus.

7:1–10 The healing of a centurion’s servant (see Mt. 8:5–13; Jn. 4:46–53). The central figure in this story is a Gentile, possibly employed by Herod Antipas who had a Roman-type army (cf. 3:14). He had sufficient money to make a donation towards building a synagogue in Capernaum. (Even an honest man could readily make money in the security forces.) He is presented as a person of the highest character, demonstrated in his concern for his slave, his attitude to the Jews and his consciousness of unworthiness in the presence of Jesus. What shines out above all is the quality of his faith. As one who himself had been given authority from his superior officer to enforce the obedience of the soldiers under him, he recognized that Jesus had a higher authority, that of God, to quell disease, and he was prepared to trust Jesus to heal even by a simple word of command. Jesus commended such faith, and commented that a Gentile had surpassed the Jews in showing it.

Luke’s story differs in some ways from Matthew’s version. Here the centurion sends two groups of messengers to Jesus. The first consists of Jewish elders; these were the leading people in a small community and were closely linked with the synagogue. The second group consists of friends who repeat his message word-for-word as if he himself were present (cf. 2 Ki. 19:20–34). It may be that through abbreviation Matthew has given a different impression (cf. how Mt. 9:18–26 abbreviates the story in Mk. 5:22–43). Luke’s treatment stresses more the humility and faith of the centurion.

There is a very similar story in Jn. 4:46–53 about an official in Capernaum whose son was ill. The similarity is even greater if the word pais (used in Lk. 7:7 and Mt. 8:6) is translated as ‘boy’ (‘son’) rather than as ‘boy’ (‘servant’), and if it is assumed that Luke’s use of doulos (‘slave’) in vs 2 and 10 is mistaken. But nothing in Luke or Matthew suggests that a son is meant, and the details of the story in John are very different.

7:11–17 The healing of a widow’s son. The story of the healing of a person at the point of death (7:2) is followed by that of the raising of a dead man at Nain, a village south of Nazareth. Jesus was especially sympathetic because the mother was a widow with only her son to support her. The dead man was carried in an open coffin. Ignoring the fact that touching a dead body would make him religiously unclean, Jesus stopped the funeral procession and commanded the young man to get up. This simple word of command was sufficient to bring him back to life, and the people were filled with mingled terror and joy in the presence of the supernatural. They remembered that Elijah and Elisha had worked similar wonders (1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:18–37), and they saw God’s hand at work (cf. 1:68).

Notes. 13 Luke alone of the evangelists makes frequent use of the term the Lord to refer to Jesus. This was not a term that people used in referring to Jesus during his lifetime (except Mk. 11:3). When people addressed Jesus directly as ‘Lord’ (e.g. 5:8; 7:6), it generally meant no more than ‘Sir’ as a common title of respect.

7:18–35 Jesus and John the Baptist (see Mt. 11:2–19). By now John had been in prison for some time and was puzzled by the news that came to him from his followers. Jesus did not seem to be making the dramatic impact that John anticipated—and perhaps John was wondering why he had not been released from prison. Some have thought that John was disturbed by the omission of judgment from the teaching of Jesus (though it was there: see 11:13–14, 37–53). Was Jesus the promised one or not?

Jesus drew attention to the works of mercy which he was performing and sent messengers back to John with words that echoed Is. 26:19; 29:18–19; 35:5–6; 61:1. The fulfilment of these prophecies should demonstrate to John that the signs of the promised age of salvation were present. They showed that Jesus was not merely a prophet, announcing the coming of the new era, but rather the person who actually brought it into being. John, then, should not miss the point and lose faith in Jesus.

Whether the message did confirm John's faith is not said but there may be a hint in the fact that Jesus went on to praise John. He was not an easy-going person or a time-server (as easily bent as a reed) living in comfort and condoning the easy-going ways of his hearers. He was the greatest of the prophets, indeed the greatest man ever born, because he was the forerunner of the Messiah. (This description is based on Ex. 3:20 and Mal. 3:1; cf. Mk. 1:2.) The praise is lavish, but then comes a surprise: even the most insignificant person in the kingdom of God is greater than John, for John lived just on the edge of the era of salvation and did not experience its blessings for himself.

Vs. 29–30 tell us, in an aside, that John's supporters in the crowd praised God because their prophet had been upheld by Jesus, but that the Pharisees and the lawyers linked John and Jesus together and rejected them both.

This attitude shown by the religious leaders explains why Jesus said that they were like children playing games. When one group of children suggests playing at weddings and plays merry music, the other group refuses to dance. Yet when the first group suggests playing at funerals instead and sings a dirge, the others still refuse to join in. So the Jewish leaders did not like John with his ascetic way of life, and they bitterly criticized Jesus because he associated with people who did not take religion seriously. Doubtless the pictures of John and Jesus are both exaggerated here. But despite them all, said Jesus, God's wisdom is shown to be right by her children, i.e. by those who responded to John and himself.

Notes. 19 The one who was to come is probably a reference to the Messiah rather than to a prophet (as Jn. 6:14; 11:27 might suggest). See Heb. 10:37. 34 The Son of Man here refers to Jesus in the humble character of his earthly life as a person rejected by the people of his day. Some scholars think that here the phrase in the original Aramaic could be simply a roundabout way of saying 'I', and not necessarily recognizable as a title based on Dn. 7:13. See further on 9:22. 35 Instead of children Mt. 11:19 has 'actions'. Wisdom in effect means 'God in his wisdom'.

7:36–50 The woman who was a sinner (cf. Mt. 26:6–13; Mk. 14:3–9; Jn. 12:1–8). This story illustrates the accusation made in v 34. Jesus had been invited to the home of a Pharisee, called Simon, probably for a meal after a synagogue service. It was not uncommon for uninvited guests to be found at a banquet, and among them was a woman well known as a prostitute. Since people reclined on couches instead of sitting on chairs to eat formal meals, she was easily able to reach Jesus. She proceeded to anoint Jesus with perfume, very possibly bought with her immoral earnings, but she could not finish her task for tears. Her actions were no doubt unseemly, but she was under too great emotional stress to care what people thought. The Pharisee was disturbed by the way in which Jesus accepted this respect given by such an undesirable person in so embarrassing a manner. His feeling that Jesus might be a prophet was being contradicted by Jesus' being seemingly unaware that the person touching him was a sinner—and therefore 'unclean'. But Jesus knew what was happening and made his point to

Simon with a parable whose message was quite clear: love is the proof that a person has received forgiveness, and the more people are forgiven, the more they will love.

There is no need to blacken Simon's character by suggesting that his reply was haughty or indifferent (43). Nor was his treatment of his guest discourteous. He had performed the necessary duties of hospitality, but he had not gone out of his way to give Jesus a special welcome. By contrast the sinful woman had lavished her devotion upon Jesus. This proved that she had been forgiven for many sins. Jesus then underlined the fact that she was forgiven and asserted that it was her faith that had brought her salvation.

Some commentators have argued that the woman's love for Jesus was the cause of her forgiveness rather than its result. They would interpret v 47 to mean: 'the reason her sins are forgiven is that she loved much' and then see v 48 as the first declaration of forgiveness to her. This view would make nonsense of the parable (41–42) which clearly teaches that love follows forgiveness, and it ignores the stress on faith in v 50. The error is due to not recognizing that 'to love' is the Heb. phrase for 'to show gratitude'. We must assume that the woman had previously heard and accepted the gospel message.

Notes. 41 A denarius was roughly a farm worker's daily wage (cf. the NIV mg.). 46 Olive oil was vastly cheaper than perfume.

A somewhat similar story is told in the other gospels, but it probably describes a different incident.

8:1–21 Jesus teaches in parables

8:1–3 Travelling arrangements. Luke mentions a number of women who took part in Jesus' work and helped to provide for the needs of himself and his male companions (cf. Mk. 15:40–41). There is nothing to show conclusively that Mary of Magdala (a village on the Sea of Galilee) was the sinful woman in 7:36–50—demon-possession and sin are not the same thing!

Notes. 2 Seven is a round number, indicating the worst possible state of corruption (cf. 11:26). 3 For Joanna see 24:10 and 9:9 note.

8:4–8 The parable of the sower (see Mt. 13:1–9; Mk. 4:1–9). In 6:20–8:3 Luke gives his readers stories and sayings of Jesus that have no direct parallels in Mark. He now returns to the general framework in Mark and follows it to 9:50. He omits mention of the lakeside scene in which Mark sets the parables (Mk. 4:1).

The word parable was used in the OT to describe any kind of saying that was not to be taken literally; it included oracles, similes, fables, stories and riddles. Other Jewish teachers also used stories, but in general their quality was lower than those of Jesus. The parables of Jesus included brief metaphors and similes (e.g. 5:36–39), proverbs (e.g. 4:23), stories of typical happenings (as here) and stories of particular events (e.g. 10:30–37). Jesus used them to illustrate the nature of God's acts (e.g. 13:18–21) and the kind of response that people ought to make to them (e.g. 16:1–9).

The story here is a simple description of the varying fortunes of seed scattered over a field containing different kinds of soil, fertile and infertile. But nothing is said within the story itself about its meaning: the hearers were meant to ask themselves, 'What is all this about?'

8:9–15 The meaning of the parable (see Mt. 13:10–23; Mk. 4:10–20). When his disciples asked Jesus later what the parable was about, he began by making a general statement about his use of parables. He said that those who responded to his teaching had been given a knowledge of God's purposes. Secrets means the plans of God concerning his kingdom which had long been hidden but were now being made known to the people whom he chose. Other people refused to accept God's message, and so it was now being presented in a veiled form, so that, if they did not make the effort to understand and accept it, they would be none the wiser. In this way they would fulfil the prophecy in Is. 6:9–10 about people who did not understand the meaning of what they heard.

The wording of the explanation of the parable differs in some details from that in Mark because Luke has stressed the elements that he considered important for his readers. God's word must be met by faith and perseverance if the hearers are to be the kind of ground which produces good fruit. In some people's hearts the seed may never get a chance to germinate, in others its growth is arrested because they fail to endure.

8:16–18 The parable of the lamp (see Mk. 4:21–25). At this point Jesus is presumably addressing the crowds again. The point of lighting a lamp is that its light may be seen. Similarly, the disciples must reveal to others the light they have received. In this way the teaching of Jesus, which was known and understood only by a few people, would one day be expressed more clearly.

V 18 brings out the point of v 10: people who accept what Jesus says gain fuller understanding, but people who refuse to listen find that they lose even the little that they know already.

8:19–21 Jesus' true relatives (see Mt. 12:46–50; Mk. 3:31–35). Although this story comes before the parables in Mark, Luke has placed it after them in order to illustrate how people should respond to the teaching of Jesus. Those who receive it obediently are put on a level with his physical relatives. This does not mean that Jesus was in any way rejecting his family; rather their presence provided him with a good illustration of what he was trying to say. The brothers were Mary's later children by Joseph (cf. 2:7; Mt. 1:25). He is never mentioned in the gospels after the birth story, and we may fairly conclude that he had died.

8:22–56 A group of mighty works

8:22–25 The master of the storm (see Mt. 8:23–27; Mk. 4:35–41). The Lake of Galilee is surrounded by steep mountains with narrow valleys in between them; these form channels down which the wind can rush in sudden, strong gusts and disturb the water. Jesus' answer to the disciples suggested that they should have realized that, even if he was asleep, no harm could come to them. Nevertheless, he arose and addressed the wind and sea as though he was their master. This 'parable in action' led the disciples to ask the right question: Who is this? The answer is that it is God who rules the sea, and his power was at work in Jesus (Pss. 89:8–9; 93:3–4; 106:8–9; 107:23–32; Is. 51:9–10). The disciples, however, were only beginning to realize this.

8:26–39 The Gerasene demoniac (see Mt. 8:28–34; Mk. 5:1–20). When they came to the east side of the lake, Jesus was met by a man who showed the signs of being possessed by demons, since he had a supernatural insight into who Jesus was. His condition otherwise was similar to what would now be described as manic-depressive psychosis. The medical care of the time knew no other treatment for the mentally ill than to keep them under the strictest restraint, but this man had overcome all attempts to control him. He felt that he was driven by a mass of conflicting impulses and that he was possessed by as many demons as there were soldiers in a Roman legion (some 5,000 of them).

Jesus had sympathy for him and freed him from the demons. The man could see that they had gone, because a nearby herd of pigs promptly showed the signs of being possessed by them.

The people around were alarmed and frightened by what had happened, and they urged Jesus to depart. They could not recognize the gracious act of God in delivering the man from his plight. This was surely why Jesus urged the man to stay at home. If the people were frightened of Jesus, they might listen to a man whom they knew and who could tell them about God's goodness shown through Jesus.

Critics have deplored the destruction of the pigs, a large herd on which people's livelihood depended, but it can be replied that one (healthy) person is worth many pigs. Others have suggested that the story is to be explained rationally: the pigs were so frightened by the rampaging of the demoniac that they stampeded into the lake. But if the possibility of demon-possession is allowed (see on 4:33), it would be unwise to reject the explanation given by the evangelists.

Notes. 26 The name of the place is uncertain. 'Gerasa' (see also Mk.) was a city some 30 miles (48 km) south-east of the lake whose territories could hardly have stretched so far. Possibly a phrase meaning 'land of the strangers [i.e. Gentiles]' has been taken as the name of a place. Some manuscripts give Gadara (the chief city of the region, 6 miles (10 km) from the lake; so also Matthew) or Gergesa (modern Khersa) on the lakeside, which was probably the actual site. The tombs in which the man lived were caves. 31 The Abyss is the abode or prison of demons (Rev. 9:1–11). 32 The rearing of pigs shows that the incident happened in Gentile territory.

8:40–56 Jairus's daughter and the woman with a haemorrhage (see Mt. 9:18–26; Mk. 5:21–43). Back on the western, Jewish side of the lake Jesus found a ruler of the synagogue seeking help for his sick daughter. Jesus' journey to his house was interrupted by an incident which should have helped Jairus to believe, but perhaps simply made him worried and anxious at the delay. The woman's haemorrhage made her religiously unclean, and so she was afraid to approach Jesus openly. But she had sufficient faith to hope that mere physical contact with him would heal her. We may be tempted to dismiss her belief as superstitious, but Jesus did not do so. His healing power did not flow from him automatically at her touch, but it was under his control. He responded to the faith which he felt to be present. Then he called the woman into the open so that he could complete her cure by restoring her self-respect and establishing a personal relationship. She could no longer regard him superstitiously as a magical healer.

The delay seemed to be fatal, for messengers now came with news that in the interval Jairus's daughter had died. But Jesus assured him that this was not the end. At the house he went in quietly to the dead girl, and a simple word from him awoke her to life. The fact of her recovery could hardly be kept secret, but Jesus wanted what had happened to be kept as private as possible: nobody needed to know just what had happened in the sick room and whether the girl had really been dead. Jesus faced the danger that people might develop a superstitious awe of him as a wonder-worker instead of believing in him as the Saviour who revealed the love of God in powerful actions.

Notes. 41 The ruler of the synagogue arranged the synagogue services and its other affairs; the actual work was done by the attendant (4:20). 42 Attempts to deny that the girl was really dead go against the whole thrust of the story (cf. v 49). 43 Luke omits the details (reported by Mark) that the woman had consulted many doctors, but in vain, possibly because he is abbreviating the story, but also because he wanted to remove a possible criticism of doctors. 52 Funeral rites took place as soon as possible in the ancient east (cf. Acts 5:5–7), and the hired mourners would have started immediately the girl died. 55 The command to feed the girl may be simply to demonstrate that she really was alive and well, but it may also show the human compassion of Jesus.

9:1–50 Jesus and the Twelve

9:1–9 The mission of the Twelve (see Mt. 10:5–15; 14:1–12; Mk. 6:7–29). The spread of Jesus' ministry gave him both the need and the opportunity to instruct the Twelve in the work of mission. He shared with them his authority from God to preach and to heal the sick. They were to live as simply as possible, perhaps so as to avoid any criticism for making money out of their work, and also to avoid being mistaken for other travelling people who made money unscrupulously. (Mark's version allows the disciples to carry a staff: it is meant for later followers of Jesus facing more difficult conditions than those in Galilee.) They were not to go round looking for (better) hospitality. If a town did not receive them, they were to do what Jews did when leaving a Gentile town—shake the dust off their feet. This was a symbol that the townspeople had cut themselves off from the true Israel.

Between the departure of the missionaries and their return Luke notes the opinions which people were holding about Jesus, and thus he prepares the way for the question in v 18. The hope of Elijah returning was based on Mal. 4:5–6. (cf. Lk. 1:17).

Herod Antipas had a guilty conscience because he had put John to death. This made him fear that John had come back from the dead to plague him. His longing to see Jesus for himself was not from the best of motives (cf. 23:8). Herod does not go so far as to identify John and Jesus, by contrast with Mk. 6:16. Luke seems to have had some more detailed knowledge about Herod, possibly from Joanna (8:3).

9:10–17 The feeding of the five thousand (see Mt. 14:13–21; Mk. 6:30–44; Jn. 6:1–14). Jesus apparently intended to take the Twelve away by themselves for a rest after their tour, but the crowds prevented this, and Jesus seized the opportunity to teach them. At the end of the day the disciples were anxious about the people. They themselves had little food and certainly not the money to provide for everyone's needs. The story of how Jesus used what was available is told simply as an indication of his power. Mark and John both bring out more clearly the fact that it revealed Jesus as the supplier of human needs, the giver of bread from heaven.

Notes. 10 Bethsaida was at the head of the lake and was the destination of the disciples after the feeding (so Mk. 6:45). The feeding, therefore, must have taken place nearby. 12 Only Luke mentions the people's needs for lodging; they would normally camp out or go to neighbouring villages. 16 Jesus may have used the Jewish grace 'Blessed are you, O Lord our God, King of the world, who brings forth bread from the earth'.

9:18–27 The person and destiny of Jesus (see Mt. 16:13–28; Mk. 8:27–9:1). Luke leaves out the stories which Matthew and Mark record about Jesus between the feeding of the five thousand people and Peter's confession. He may have felt that the readers know enough to appreciate why Peter, speaking on behalf of the other disciples, now confessed that Jesus was the Christ (or Messiah), and not simply a prophet, even one who had come back to life. When Jesus told them not to tell this to anybody, it means that he accepted Peter's confession as true. He wanted it kept as a secret, because there was a danger that the word 'Messiah' might make people think that he was to be a political leader.

Now, however, a decisive new fact had to be learned. As the Messiah he must endure suffering and death and then be brought back to life. The disciples, like other Jews at that time, did not think that anything like that could happen to the Messiah. Jesus was probably comparing himself with the many righteous people who had suffered because of their obedience to God and identifying himself as the Suffering Servant prophesied in Is. 53. If the disciples did not understand this, it is not surprising that they also took a long time to realize that the disciples of the Messiah must also be prepared to suffer. Jesus taught that if people try to save their (earthly) lives, they will lose the life that really matters, but if they are prepared to lay down their lives for Jesus, they will know real life. For on the day of judgment those who loved their earthly lives so much that they despised Jesus will find themselves rejected.

Notes. 22 Jesus often referred to himself as the Son of Man (cf. 5:24; 6:5, 22; 7:34). The Jewish idea of the Messiah was of a human figure, but in Dn. 7:9–22 the Son of Man is a heavenly figure, and this better expresses the role of Jesus. Jesus' idea of his work was also so different from popular Jewish ideas of the Messiah that it was better to avoid open use of the title.

'Son of Man' seems to have been an ambiguous phrase. In Aramaic it could sometimes be a roundabout way of referring to oneself as a typical human being, and some scholars think this is all that Jesus meant. But the phrase could also allude to the passage in Daniel where the Son of Man is a figure of authority. In the gospels this authoritative figure appears in humility and his authority is not recognized or is rejected. Jesus appears to have linked together the roles of the Suffering Servant and the sovereign Son of Man. 27 It is unlikely that Jesus equated seeing the kingdom of God with experiencing the end of the world. More probably he meant that some of his followers would not die until after they had seen the coming of God's kingdom in his own mission or in the life of the church. The transfiguration was possibly seen as one fulfilment of the saying.

9:28–36 The transfiguration of Jesus (see Mt. 17:1–8; Mk. 9:2–8). Luke alone records how Jesus was praying, and thus in contact with the heavenly world. Perhaps the story is meant to show how the disciples' eyes were opened to see what was happening when Jesus communed with his Father (cf. 2 Ki. 6:17). His appearance and his garments took on a heavenly light, and he was joined by two men, long dead. Moses and Elijah, who represented the law and the prophets, had both had unusual departures from this world, and were both expected to reappear at the end of time. They spoke with Jesus about his departure (Gk. exodos), i.e. his death and resurrection, and in this way they confirmed what Jesus had prophesied in v 22. Peter felt that they should make three shelters for Jesus and the visitors, either to honour them or to provide somewhere for them to stay. But the story-teller insists that Peter had misunderstood the occasion. The real significance was to be found in the cloud (a symbol of God's presence) and the heavenly voice which repeated what had been said at the baptism of Jesus (3:22) but this time addressed it to the disciples. The Jesus whom Peter had confessed to be the Messiah was indeed the Son of God—not in spite of his imminent sufferings and death but because of them. Therefore, the disciples were to obey him—and him only. Luke omits the conversation which the disciples had on the way down from the mountain.

9:37–50 Experiences in the valley (see Mt. 17:14–23; 18:1–5; Mk. 9:14–41). In this final section on the work of Jesus in Galilee a number of incidents all show the need of the disciples for power and instruction.

37–43a In the first story a boy suffering from epilepsy and demonic possession was brought to the disciples who had not been up the mountain with Jesus, but they could not cure him despite their healing powers (9:1). Jesus expressed his disappointment at the faithlessness and perversity of people who required his personal presence before the power of God could operate. The act of healing was seen by the people as a revelation of the greatness of God's power.

43–45 A swift contrast to this revelation was given by the words of Jesus in which he again told his disciples that the Son of Man must suffer rather than make his way through the world in triumph. Like Mark, Luke stresses the obtuseness of the disciples who found this teaching beyond their grasp, but he attributed their blindness to the purpose of God.

46–48 Two further incidents stress this lack of comprehension. The first shows the disciples quarrelling about rank and position among themselves. Jesus was able to penetrate to the deep motives that struggled for mastery in their hearts. Setting a child—the most unimportant member of society in Jewish eyes—before them, he said that a person who was humble enough to receive a child would receive himself and his Father. When people have that kind of attitude, questions of precedence will not arise.

49–50 In this connection John remembered how they had treated a man who was casting out demons in the power of the name of Jesus and yet was not commissioned to do so as one of the Twelve. He was not to be despised, said Jesus, for a person who is not against you is on your side. See 11:23 for another side to this truth.

9:51–19:10 The journey to Jerusalem

Luke passes over the incidents recorded in Mk. 9:42–10:12. He does not return to the outline of events in Mark until 18:15. The intervening section gives us a lot of material which is not paralleled in Mark. We get the impression of a journey to Jerusalem which lasts throughout this section (cf. much more briefly Mk.10), but it is unlikely that all that is recorded here took place on one trip. Some of the incidents and sayings here may have belonged to Galilee or Jerusalem (10:38). Probably Luke has gathered together material from various periods in the work of Jesus and grouped it here because it fitted around various themes. (We may compare how Matthew did something similar with his ‘great discourses’ of Jesus.) We know from John that Jesus paid several visits to Jerusalem, and it could be that Luke reflects details of several journeys.

The ‘journey’ theme suggests a parallel with the journey of the people of Israel through the desert with Moses when they received much instruction about their way of life. It may also suggest a parallel between Jesus journeying to the cross and the disciples walking a similar path in life. The general themes of this section are discipleship and opposition, and we are not allowed to forget that the disciples are accompanying Jesus on his way to the cross.

9:51–10:24 The duties and privileges of discipleship

9:51–56 The Samaritan village. Jews and Samaritans deeply hated each other, but Jesus refused to meet human opposition to him as a Jew with judgment (cf. 2Ki. 1:10–11). The additional words recorded in the NIV mg. in vs 55–56 are not a true part of Luke’s text, but express aptly the mind of Jesus: he suffered opposition without retaliation because he had come to save (cf. 19:10)

9:57–62 Readiness for discipleship (see Mt. 8:19–22). Many people are willing to follow Jesus until they find out just what is involved. Jesus spoke of the homelessness of the Son of Man and hence also of his followers. Since many friends provided for the material needs of Jesus, the saying refers primarily to his being generally rejected by the people. No excuses for delay in following Jesus are allowed. Burial duties were regarded as prior to all other obligations. Let the dead bury their own dead means either ‘Let that duty look after itself’ or ‘Leave that task to the spiritually dead’. There can be no turning back in the service of Jesus, any more than a backward looking ploughman can expect to plough a straight furrow. Jesus’ reply is more rigorous than that in 1 Ki. 19:19–21. All three sayings express the idea of absolute commitment to him.

10:1–16 The mission of the seventy-two (cf. Mt. 9:37–38; 10:7–16; 11:21–23).

Luke alone records that in addition to the Twelve Jesus sent out a further group of disciples to do mission work. The number here and in v 17 varies in the MSS between seventy-two and seventy; either way it is symbolic and reminds us of the number of nations in Gn. 10 or the number of elders who helped Moses in Ex. 24:1. It probably symbolizes the Gentile nations to whom the message of Jesus would later be brought by the disciples, although the actual mission here was confined to the Jews.

The instructions to this group are very similar to those addressed to the Twelve in 9:1–6. The disciples were to go out in simplicity among a ravenous horde of wolves who would frustrate their task. They were to travel lightly, like the Twelve, and not waste time in long oriental salutations. They were to accept the hospitality given to them as fair recompense for their work but were not to seek for better conditions by going round from one house to another. Later the early church carried out this principle by providing for its teachers and evangelists so that they would not be dependent on those whom they evangelized (3 Jn. 7–8). Paul sought to impose no burden at all on his churches although he was fully entitled to do so and v 7 was quoted in connection with the rights of elders (see 1 Cor. 9:14; 1 Tim. 5:18).

Their message was to be that the kingdom of God had arrived: the signs of its presence were the mighty works which they would perform. When the gospel is proclaimed, the blessings of God's rule are near or within the grasp of all who will accept them (cf. Mk. 1:15). If the message was not received, a warning of divine judgment was to be given. The messengers were to disclaim further responsibility after they had clearly presented the message.

In passing, Jesus commented on the fate, at the day of judgment, of the towns which had refused his message. The Jews regarded the heathen towns of old as absolutely godless. To say that they would have given a warmer response to the gospel than these Jewish towns is a way of saying just how blind the Jews were to the gospel; their pride would experience a swift downfall. Finally Jesus emphasized that the disciples were to be his personal representatives and consequently God's representatives (cf. 9:48; Jn. 15:23).

Notes. 6 A man of peace is a peace-loving person, somebody worthy of the Messianic gift of peace. The greeting expressing peace is regarded as having an effect on the receiver. 13 Korazin was a town north of Capernaum.

10:17–24 The return of the seventy-two (see Mt. 11:25–27; 13:16–17). Jesus saw in the casting out of the demons a sign that Satan's throne was toppling. He appears to have been speaking metaphorically. He had a vision of the spiritual defeat of Satan which took place at the cross; and the exorcisms, the defeat of Satan's minions, confirmed his certainty of the coming victory over their master. (See Rev. 12:7–10.)

Yet it would be wrong to rejoice too much over this; people may cast out demons and yet be excluded from the kingdom (cf. Mt. 7:22–23). Far better to rejoice that one's own name is recorded in God's book (cf. Phil. 4:3).

Then Jesus thanked God that his revelation is given to ordinary people and he does not take account of human wisdom. His prayer closed with a confession that all such knowledge had been given to him by his Father. There is an exclusive, mutual bond of personal knowledge between the Father and the Son, so that only the Son can make the Father known to people. The disciples had received this knowledge from the Son. The people of the past would gladly have seen the coming of the kingdom, but only the disciples have been granted to see and hear the Son of God.

Notes. 19 Snakes and scorpions are symbols of spiritual wickedness (Dt. 8:15; Ps. 91:13). 22 The authenticity of this saying has been much attacked, but the language is thoroughly Jewish and quite possible on the lips of Jesus. All things means ‘all revelation’ rather than ‘all power’. The word know was used in Hebrew to express personal knowledge (as in Gn. 4:1 of the marriage relationship [RSV]) or choice of a person (as in Am. 3:2 [RSV]). The double use of the verb expresses the mutual communion between Jesus and his Father which was reflected in his prayers (cf. Mk. 14:36). Hence Jesus alone was qualified to reveal the Father to other people. The saying is thoroughly in keeping with Jesus’ teaching in Jn. (e.g. Jn. 10:15) and is a ‘bridge’ between the first three gospels and the fourth.

10:25–11:13 The characteristics of disciples

10:25–37 The good Samaritan. The introduction to the parable is not to be confused with the somewhat similar story in Mk. 12:28–31. Here Jesus is asked about how a person may qualify for eternal life (cf. 18:18), and in good Jewish fashion he replies by referring his questioner to the law. How does one summarize the essence and intention of the law? The lawyer gives the same reply as that given by Jesus in Mk. 12:29–31. This should not surprise us, since the link between Dt. 6:5 and Lv. 19:18 was already recognized before the time of Jesus. In view of Gal. 3:12 Jesus’ answer may sound legalistic, but it is not so when considered in relation to the total content of his teaching.

The lawyer had ‘lost face’ by being given this answer, and he tried to regain the initiative by asking for a more precise definition of the word ‘neighbour’. The parable given in reply is most remarkable. We might have expected a parable telling how a Jew should show love to anybody, even to a Samaritan, but in fact Jesus shows how even a Samaritan may be nearer to the kingdom than a pious, but uncharitable, Jew. For, although the lawyer asked, ‘Who is my neighbour (i.e. the person whom I should help)?’ Jesus suggests that the real question is rather ‘Do I behave as a neighbour (i.e. a person who helps others)?’ Jesus does not supply information as to whom one should help; failure to keep the commandment springs not from lack of information but from lack of love. It was not fresh knowledge that the lawyer needed, but a new heart—in plain English, conversion.

Notes. 30 A steep road, 17 miles (27 km) long, descended the 3,300 ft. from Jerusalem to Jericho, which was a country dwelling of priests when not on temple duty (cf. 1:23). 31–32 The priest and the Levite (a temple worker) may have feared defilement through touching a dead body, but no motive for their conduct is in fact given. 33 The story ‘works’ on the fact that the audience probably expected that the third character would now be a Jewish layman, thus giving it an anti-clerical point. 37 The lawyer perhaps could not bring himself to answer the question by saying ‘the Samaritan’!

10:38–42 Serving Jesus. When Martha rudely complained to the guest about her lazy sister, Jesus replied gently but firmly. He may have been implying that Martha was busy trying to provide an elaborate supper, when a simple meal would have sufficed. Mary had chosen to listen to Jesus, and that was more important than preparing a large supper. The story is not meant to teach the value of a contemplative life compared with a life of action, but to show that service to Jesus must not fill people’s lives to such an extent that they have no time to learn from him. One honours him more by listening to him than by providing excessively for his needs (cf. Jn. 6:27).

Notes. 38 Since the village was Bethany on the outskirts of Jerusalem (Jn. 11:1), the incident took place before Jesus’ last visit to Jerusalem or is recorded out of chronological order. 41 Jesus’ actual words are uncertain (cf. the NIV mg.); it is not clear whether he is contrasting many courses for the meal with only one or simply concern over many things with the one activity that matters.

11:1–13 How to pray (see Mt. 6:9–13; 7:7–11). Christian prayer goes back to the example and command of Jesus himself. The Lord's Prayer appears here in a different, shorter form from the more familiar one found in Matthew. It is generally thought that the early church adapted Jesus' words in different ways to meet its needs. Luke's form contains an address and two sets of petitions.

Father translates the Aramaic Abba used by Jesus (cf. 10:21; Mk. 14:36). Here, therefore, Jesus invited his followers to use the same intimate term to address God which he himself used.

Hallowed be your name is the first of two petitions concerned with God himself. May his name, i.e. his person, be honoured in the world at large. Such hallowing forms the basis for the second petition: Your kingdom come. May God's rule in peace and righteousness swiftly come into effect. This is a prayer for God to act by hastening the coming of the day of the Lord. Only after these petitions are the needs of the petitioner mentioned.

First, there is a prayer for the supply of daily bread. This may be a petition not just for ordinary food but also for the bread of life, the gift of God without which we cannot live. Daily (Gk. epiousios) is a word of uncertain meaning: 'for tomorrow' or 'necessary' are possible renderings. The former brings out the way in which the prayer asks for a foretaste of the blessings of the kingdom now.

Secondly, there is a prayer for daily forgiveness, which is granted only to those who forgive others.

Finally, the petitioner asks to be preserved from tribulation and testing which would weaken faith and lead to exclusion from God's kingdom.

The following parables give encouragement to people to pray.

5–10 Although the friend who has bread (cf. v 3!) in his one-roomed house (where everybody slept close together) is unwilling to get out of bed, yet because of the unblushing persistence of the caller, he will supply bread. The parable works by contrast: if even a human friend will respond to persistence, how much more will God respond without persistence, even if he seems to delay (cf. 18:1–8).

11–13 Similarly, as earthly fathers do not deceive their children with their gifts, God will give his good gift of the Spirit to all who ask. Jesus is speaking in broad terms of the spiritual blessings which the Father gives his children; he is not saying that people who ask, say, for specific charismatic gifts will necessarily receive them. With these assurances confident prayer can be a reality. Fish and snakes, and eggs and scorpions resemble one another in appearance.

11:14–54 Controversy with the Pharisees

11:14–28 In league with the devil? (see Mt. 12:22–30, 43–45; Mk. 3:22–27). 14–23 The Pharisees thought that they could explain away the casting out of demons by saying that Jesus was empowered by the devil (15). Others thought the matter could be settled if Jesus could provide some clearer sign that he had God's backing (16).

Jesus replied to the charge in v 15 by saying that a kingdom or household divided against itself soon comes to nothing: how, then could Satan, alias Beelzebub, promote civil war in his own kingdom? Moreover, the argument could equally well be turned against Jesus' opponents themselves, for their own followers also cast out demons. In fact the casting out of demons was an act of divine power and a sure token that God's era of salvation had come. One stronger than Satan was at work. In this situation to refuse support to Jesus was not to take up a position of being neutral but to join the opposition.

24–26 Opinions differ whether this story is meant to be taken simply on the literal level or as a parable of spiritual deterioration. Its point is not to satisfy curiosity about demons but to warn against the danger of a repentance that is purely negative. A relapse can lead to dreadful danger. What is needed is what Thomas Chalmers called ‘the expulsive power of a new affection’.

27–28 Mark tells a different story about Jesus’ relatives at this point (Mk. 3:31–35). Luke has already used it (8:19–21) and now gives a different incident with the same basic point. The woman’s rather sentimental benediction on Jesus’ mother simply meant, ‘If only I too had had a son like this man.’ But something else matters much more, namely, to hear and obey the message from God which Jesus proclaimed (cf. 6:46–49).

Jesus, then, is saying that people should have realized that he was speaking God’s word without needing wonderful signs to confirm it; acceptance of it would prevent the kind of relapse described in v 26.

Notes. 14 Cf. Mt. 9:32–34. 20 The finger of God reflects Ex. 8:19 (cf. Ps. 8:3) and means the same as the ‘Spirit of God’ (Mt. 12:28). 24 Arid places were regarded as the normal abode of demons, but they were thought to prefer to live in human beings.

11:29–32 The sign of Jonah (see Mt. 12:38–42). This section is in effect a reply to the demand in v 16. The people wanted some miraculous demonstration to attest the message of Jesus, but he did not want to perform powerful deeds that would overawe people. He wished, rather, to do things that would reveal the character of God his Father as judge and saviour. He therefore refused to give any sign at all (cf. Mk. 8:11–12) except for the sign of Jonah. Only in the way in which Jonah was a sign to Nineveh would he be a sign to the Jews.

In the parallel saying about the Queen of the South (cf. 1 Ki. 10:1–10, where she came from Sheba in south-west Arabia), she would be a witness against the Jews of Jesus’ time, for she made great efforts to hear Solomon, whilst the Jews were not impressed by the wisdom of one greater than Solomon. Similarly, the people of Nineveh responded to the preaching of Jonah, and yet the Jews failed to respond to the teaching of Jesus. The ‘sign of Jonah’ is thus the teaching of Jesus. But there is a deeper meaning. The use of the future tense in v 30 and the way in which Matthew 12:39–40 mentions the resurrection of Jesus as a parallel to the resuscitation of Jonah suggests that the sign is the preaching of the risen Jesus or possibly a reference to the second coming.

11:33–36 Light and darkness (see Mt. 5:15; 6:22–23). V 33 (which repeats 8:16) may urge hearers not to hide the light which they have received (Mt. 5:15) or it may refer to Israel which had hidden the light given to her by God (cf. v 52), or (most probably) it may be a reference to the light shining from Jesus which the people were unwilling to receive. In v 34 the eye is the means by which light reaches a person’s inward mind; a healthy eye lets light in, but an unhealthy eye leaves a person in darkness. The hearers of Jesus must be sure that what they accept as light really is light and not darkness (35). Then v 36 may mean that the person who is full of true light will illuminate others. The paragraph as a whole is a warning against spiritual blindness and hardness of heart.

11:37–54 The hypocrisy of the Pharisees and scribes (see Mt. 23:4–7, 13, 23–26; cf. Lk. 20:46). Jesus visited the home of a Pharisee (cf. 7:36; 14:1) for one of the two daily Jewish meals. The Pharisees washed before eating, not primarily to keep the body clean but to remove the supposed defilement of sin caused by contact with Gentiles and other sinners (Mk. 7:1–5). Jesus strongly criticized them and what they stood for. In washing their bodies (39) they resembled a person cleaning only the outside of a vessel full of filth. If God made both the inside and the outside of people, surely the inside demanded cleansing too. If the Pharisees were to give to charity instead of being greedy and wicked, this would make them truly clean in their hearts—and nothing further would be required. (Jesus thus rejected the idea of ritual defilement; cf. Mk. 7:15, 19).

In a series of three woes (42–44) the failings of the Pharisees were exposed. They so concentrated on the tiny details of religion that they had forgotten the great moral principles. They had grown to love the respect of people for their religiosity. They were as a result hypocrites who misled people, just like hidden graves which people might unknowingly tread on and be contaminated.

The lawyers (5:17) were already condemned by what Jesus had said, but now he made further charges against them. They had created the trivial regulations of the law, and they either did nothing to relieve the burden for other people or failed to shoulder it themselves. Although they built elaborate tombs for the prophets, they were really at one with their ancestors who had killed the prophets, by making sure that they stayed dead in that their message was disregarded! God in his wisdom had foreseen what they would do. The lawyers' attitude to the prophets and apostles of the church would be simply the last and worst event in a long history of attacking God's messengers, and judgment would follow. Finally, they stood condemned for obscuring God's revelation and keeping people out of his kingdom.

Notes. 41 Give to the poor may be Luke's paraphrase of what Jesus meant when he said 'clean' (Mt. 23:26). 42 These tithes went beyond the law's requirements.

43 This saying must refer to Pharisees who were 'teachers of the law' (cf. 20:46). 48 Building tombs is scarcely sympathy with murder: the saying is metaphorical and ironical. 51 For Zechariah see 2 Ch. 24:20–21, and on Mt. 23:35.

12:1–13:9 Readiness for the coming crisis

In this and some later sections (17:20–18:8; 21:5–38) Luke has gathered together teaching in which Jesus spoke of the crisis that was coming upon people as a result of his mission. The gospel of salvation had its dark side for those who refused the message. Jesus warned the Jews of the frightful consequences of rejecting him, in terms of both political destruction and rejection by God on the day of judgment. At the same time he warned his disciples to stand firm in the impending days of trial and be ready for the coming of their master. In the event, destruction came upon Judea in the war with Rome (AD 66–70), but the return of the Lord is still awaited. Some of the problems in understanding are due to the fact that Jesus saw both these events as part of one great act of judgment, and that he himself did not know the precise times settled by the Father (Mk. 13:32).

12:1–12 Fearless confession (see Mt. 10:26–33; 12:31–32; 10:19–20; cf. Mk. 3:28–29). V 1 links with the previous section on the Pharisees; their teaching penetrated society, like yeast in dough, and it had a corrupting influence because of their hypocrisy. Everybody, however, must beware of hypocrisy, for one day their hidden thoughts will all be revealed (cf. 8:17).

Disciples, however, might be tempted to a different kind of pretence, that of hiding their allegiance to Jesus out of fear. It is one thing to suffer at human hands, but it is far worse to be hypocritical and then have to face the judgment of God, who can throw people into hell. There is indeed no reason to fear human beings, for not even the worst that persecutors can devise can take place without God's knowledge and care for his people. But, depending on whether people confess or deny Jesus, the Son of Man will be a witness for or against them at the judgment seat of God (8–9).

In v 10, however, it is said that denying the Son of Man is excusable. It may be that v 9 was addressed to the disciples who had no excuse for ignorance about the significance of Jesus, but v 10 is addressed to the crowds for whom ‘Son of Man’ was a phrase that did not necessarily disclose who Jesus was. If, however, people refused to accept the clear evidence of the working of God’s Spirit in Jesus (e.g. by attributing his power to Satan), then they were liable to judgment. But if people do confess Jesus, then the Holy Spirit will sustain them when they are on trial before judges whom they would otherwise fear.

Notes. 1 First indicates that what follows is especially for disciples. 6 Mt. 10:29 has ‘two sparrows sold for a penny’; the point remains the same. 8–9 Jesus here appears to make a distinction between the Son of Man and himself. Since he wanted to include an allusion to Dn. 7, he had to switch to the third-person form.

12:13–34 Material possessions (see Mt. 6:25–33, 19–21). Jesus was commonly regarded as a teacher, and thus a member of a class which dealt with both religious and civil matters. It is not surprising, then, that his opinion was sought in a legal dispute over property. Possibly a younger brother was claiming that he was being defrauded of his share in an inheritance. Jesus, however, refused to settle the matter. He was not an ordained rabbi, and he preferred to go to the root of the matter by giving a stern warning against greed or, as some of the older Bible versions have it, covetousness. (Did he have personal knowledge of the details of the situation?) Covetousness is the desire to have more than one actually has (not necessarily out of envy for other people’s wealth). It not only leads to strife; it also expresses a fundamentally wrong attitude to life, according to which possessions are all that really matter. It only needs God to take away a person’s life, and at once it becomes apparent how useless possessions can be. Money cannot buy everything. The rich man had failed to gain the true riches of a right relationship to God—one step towards which would certainly be through giving to the poor (33). Thus he was a fool; a godless and therefore a senseless person.

How then should possessions be regarded? The disciples should not worry about food and clothing (the two essential requirements for the body) as if they were the most important things. The person is more important. If God feeds even carefree birds and clothes the flowers, surely he will all the more provide what is necessary for his children. In any case, worry cannot make a person live any longer. In a world in which people are set on a rat-race for better living conditions, let the disciples first seek out God’s will and his salvation; then they will find that their bodily needs are taken care of. Let them sell their possessions and give to the needy, and set their desire on a heavenly treasure that will not pass away.

Such teaching may seem to encourage laziness and lack of concern about the practicalities of everyday living—‘God will provide; therefore I do not need to do anything!’ Jesus, however, is not talking to lazy people but to worried people, and to those who are tempted to join in the rat-race. They should trust in God and get their priorities right.

Notes. 25 The Greek phrase is lit. ‘a cubit’ (a measure of length that could be used metaphorically for a period of time) to his ‘height’ (a word that could also be used for ‘span of life’). 31 To seek God’s kingdom is to set one’s aim in life on God himself and the accomplishment of his purpose of bringing all life under his rule.

12:35–48 The coming of the Son of Man (see Mt. 24:43–51). From the way in which people should set their minds on the kingdom of God, Jesus turns to their attitudes to the future. Ahead lies the coming of the Son of Man (40) at an unexpected and unknown hour. It brings with it both judgment (8–9) and the completion of God’s rule. The disciples, therefore, must make themselves ready for it by being diligently employed in God’s service like servants who are always prepared for the master’s return. The imagery of night-time stresses the need for vigilance and wakefulness. A second, very brief parable speaks of the situation of the householder who is surprised by the invasion of a burglar. This shows the other side of the expectation and expresses the serious effects of the coming of the Son of Man for those who are not ready.

But for whom was this teaching meant? Did it refer to all of the master’s servants or just to the leaders among them? Jesus appears to have had the latter principally in mind. A servant who is set over a household and does his duty properly will be rewarded with full responsibility. But if the servant left in charge takes advantage of his master’s absence to behave irresponsibly, he will get a shock when his master comes unexpectedly and find that his lot is with the unbelievers. His punishment will depend upon his knowledge and consequent measure of responsibility. The implication is that the heavenly judgment is not a simple matter of guilty or not guilty; there are varying degrees of judgment and reward.

The future tenses in vs 42–48 must refer to the situation in the church after the departure of Jesus. In fact all the parables in this section refer in their present setting to disciples in the period after the resurrection of Jesus and before his second coming (note the change of audience in v 54).

12:49–59 The crisis for Israel (cf. Mt. 10:34–36; 16:2–3; 5:25–26). Here and now, however, is the crucial time when people must decide whether or not to confess Jesus as their Lord. His coming brings division to the world. It is meant to set the world on fire, and he longs that the fire might be kindled and burst into full flame. This will lead to suffering for Jesus himself, and he longs that it might soon be over. He did not come to bring peace and ease; his work would inevitably arouse opposition to the progress of the gospel even within families.

In this situation people tragically fail to realize how serious things are. They can tell a change in the weather from the direction of the wind, but they cannot read the signs of the times and act accordingly. They fail to realize that they are like a person being hauled off to court by an accuser. A wise person will try to get a settlement long before arriving in court and being sent off to a term in prison. Now is the time to respond to Jesus; soon it will be too late.

Notes. 49 The fire stands for the spread of the message or the power of God, and Jesus longs that it might spread more quickly. 50 Being plunged into water is a metaphor for distress and suffering (cf. Ps. 69:1–3). Here, therefore, baptism (lit. being plunged into water or being deluged with it) is a picture for the sufferings of Jesus (cf. Mk. 10:38–39). For distressed see 2 Cor. 5:14; Phil. 1:23. 56 Hypocrites here has the Heb. sense of ‘godless’ rather than ‘acting a part’. 59 The parable cannot be pressed to teach a doctrine of purgatory.

13:1–9 The need for repentance. Two brief pieces of teaching stress the need for response to the crisis brought about by the coming of Jesus. Some pilgrims who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover had been butchered by Roman troops in the temple while they were slaying their sacrifices. The report is thoroughly in keeping with Pilate’s character, although this particular incident was too unimportant to excite the comment of Josephus in his history of this period. Jesus’ response to the story was to contradict the orthodox Jewish belief that the greatness of the calamity suffered by these people indicated that they were unusually wicked sinners. It would be equally foolish to say that people accidentally crushed to death by falling masonry were exceptionally sinful. (This incident, too, was not important enough to get into a history book.) Rather, the Jewish nation as a whole was sinful in God's sight, and its members would all suffer the fate of sinners if they did not repent.

The situation of the nation was like that of a tree that produced no fruit. It was fit only for destruction, and the ground which it occupied could then be used for a healthy tree. But just as the owner was prepared to feed it and give it another chance, so God was prepared to allow Israel an opportunity for repentance. If the people failed to respond, their fate would be their own responsibility. The servant in the parable may represent Jesus as an advocate to God for undeserving Israel.

Notes. 6 Fruit trees of all kinds were planted in vineyards. The fig-tree is used metaphorically for Israel in Ho. 9:10. 7 Fruit could not be taken from a tree during the first three years (Lv. 19:23); hence this tree was presumably six years old.

13:10–35 The saving effects of God's rule

13:10–17 The crippled woman. In the previous section the ministry of Jesus appeared as a period of crisis; the accent now falls again on the coming of salvation. A woman suffering from a spinal deformity was set free on a Sabbath by Jesus in the synagogue. The synagogue leader argued that where life was not at stake the healing could well have waited until a weekday. Jesus replied that if cattle could be loosed on the Sabbath to be watered (as the Jews on the whole allowed), how much more could a woman be loosed from her illness. Note how the disability is said to have been caused by a spirit (11) and to be a state of being bound by Satan (16). Human suffering is thus due to the same cosmic disorder as human sin. The final note brings out how the people rejoiced at the salvation revealed in Jesus while his opponents had nothing to say.

13:18–21 Two parables of the rule of God (see Mt. 13:31–33; Mk. 4:30–32). These two parables are here connected with the coming of God's saving rule in Jesus. They contain the promise that God's work would come to a glorious fulfilment, no matter how small its beginnings seemed to be. Just as a mustard seed grows to tree-like proportions and a small amount of yeast permeates a large amount of dough and makes it expand, so what begins as a small influence will increase and spread widely. Attempts to find separate meanings in the two parables are dubious, and the view that yeast here represents evil (rather than the kingdom) is certainly wrong.

13:22–30 Entry to the kingdom (cf. Mt. 7:13–14, 22–23; 8:11–12). The mention of Jerusalem—where Jesus was to be crucified—gives an abrupt reminder of the context of Jesus' teaching. Would many people be saved, i.e. enter the kingdom of God? The orthodox answer was that all Jews, except for notorious sinners and heretics, would find entry. But some Jewish groups limited the number to those who were truly religious according to their own rules. Jesus refused to speculate. It is much more important, he said, to ensure that one gets in personally. The kingdom is like a house with a narrow door offering limited admission. It is shut when the feast begins (Mt. 25:10), and then it will be too late to get in. It will be no use claiming to know Jesus if there has been no previous response to his message. There will be no question of automatic admission for anybody. Some Jews will be excluded, and in their place will be found Gentiles from all over the world alongside the saintly people of OT times. Those who thought that they ought to be first will find themselves placed last. Once again the lesson of the need for repentance (chs. 12 and 13) is emphasized: salvation and judgment cannot be separated from one another.

13:31–35 Lament over Jerusalem (see Mt. 23:37–39). Some Pharisees warned Jesus to flee from Herod’s dominions (i.e. Galilee and Perea). Whether they were friends warning Jesus of possible danger or enemies acting in collusion with Herod to frighten Jesus into silence is not clear. In any case Jesus had nothing but contempt for the murderer of John the Baptist and his threats. Fox typified cunning or possibly insignificance. Herod could not harm Jesus, for the divinely appointed path for him led to Jerusalem, and there at God’s appointed time he would suffer. For the present he would continue his work, and then finish his course as a prophet in Jerusalem. The thought made him break out in sorrow over the city which had so persistently rejected the messengers of God and which would in the end find itself locked out of the kingdom. Even in the face of the love and compassion of Jesus Jerusalem remained adamant. Therefore its temple would be empty of God’s presence, and it would not see Jesus until it was prepared to welcome him as the Messiah or was visited by him as its judge.

Notes. 32 The idiom in today and tomorrow is to be understood from Ex. 19:10–11 or Ho. 6:2 where ‘two days’ represents a short period of time before a crisis (the third day). Jesus expresses his determination to carry on his work until either it is complete or the time of his martyrdom comes (cf. 2 Tim. 4:7). 33 The point is repeated, but here a different time-idiom is used. 34 How often implies that Jesus had visited Jerusalem more than once. 35 Blessed ... is echoed in 19:38, but the reference here is to the second coming.

14:1–24 Jesus at table

14:1–6 The man with dropsy. A meal after the synagogue service on the Sabbath provided an opportunity for teaching in which Jesus made use of the imagery of a banquet. First, however, he healed a man suffering from dropsy (a swelling of parts of the body due to fluid collecting in the tissues). The miracle aroused the anger of a suspicious and hostile audience because it was performed on the Sabbath. Jesus claimed that his action was no different in principle from rescuing an animal which had fallen into a pit. The story makes a similar point to that recorded earlier in 13:11–17, and it is possible that the two stories were originally told as a pair (like the two parables in 13:18–20). Here, however, the main point may be the way in which Jesus showed compassion to an uninvited guest (cf. vs 13, 21).

In v 5 the best MSS have ‘son’, but others have ‘donkey’ which fits the context better. What Jesus here regards as permissible by orthodox Jewish law was forbidden in the more austere rules of the Qumran community: ‘Let no beast be helped to give birth on the Sabbath day; and if it fall into a cistern or a pit, let it not be lifted out on the Sabbath’ (Damascus Rule 11:13–14). Probably Jesus meant that, if people were willing to help an animal, they would all the more help a son.

14:7–11 Places of honour. Jesus’ teaching here to guests is not simply good advice on a social level, as in Pr. 25:6–7. As a parable it has a spiritual significance. A wedding feast was a recognized symbol for the kingdom of God and heavenly bliss (15). The parable is based on the practice of seating guests at table by rank and distinction. The more important guests would arrive last, and an unwary early arrival might have to be moved to a lower place so as to accommodate them. Far better to adopt a position of modesty and wait to be invited to a better seat. For God exalts the humble and debases the proud. (The passive verbs will be humbled/exalted in v 11 are used when God is the active subject.) Jesus is not, of course, commending the hypocritical attitude which deliberately takes a lower place in order to be publicly exalted later.

14:12–14 The choice of guests. This piece of plain advice is in line with what Jesus says elsewhere about deeds which receive their full reward in this life (Mt. 6:1–2, 5, 16). People ought rather to do those deeds which God will reward. But this can be misunderstood.

On the one hand, Jesus is not condemning outright the holding of a party for one's family or friends—he himself went to such parties (Jn. 2:1–11). The 'do not do one thing, but do the other' form of words was sometimes used (as here) with the force: 'Do not (merely) do one thing, but (rather and also) the other.' Jesus is condemning the attitude which does good mainly for the sake of a tangible, earthly reward.

On the other hand, he is not saying that we should do good purely to get a better and longer-lasting heavenly reward. That would also be a self-seeking attitude! We should do good to those who cannot give us anything in return, and leave the whole question of recognition and reward to God.

A resurrection of the righteous does not exclude a resurrection of the unrighteous for judgment (Acts 24:15). It is, however, only for the righteous that the resurrection has a positive character.

14:15–24 The heavenly banquet (cf. Mt. 22:1–10). The mention of the resurrection led one of the guests to comment on the happy situation of the people who would share in the heavenly banquet. In reply Jesus raised the question of what kind of people would be invited to be present. The double invitation to the guests (16–17) was characteristic of ancient practice. The excuses for not coming would have sounded extremely lame to the audience, who might well have enjoyed the humour of the story until they realized that this was how, in Jesus' eyes, they were treating God's invitation to them. It is, therefore, all very well to express the kind of pious sentiment uttered in v 15: the vital point is whether one has accepted the heavenly invitation. But the story moves on to show how God invites the people who have no standing in society. Jesus is already defending himself for taking the gospel to the 'tax collectors and sinners' (see 15:1–32).

The rather similar story in Mt. 22:1–10 raises the question whether Jesus originally told one parable which his disciples have developed into two different forms or told two similar, but distinct parables. Either way, we should ask what the particular point of each version of the story is.

Notes. A Jewish story, which goes back at least to the fifth century BC, and could be based on earlier tradition, tells of an ambitious tax collector who tried to gain social standing with the traditional aristocrats by inviting them to dinner but was harshly rebuffed by them. So that the meal might not be wasted he invited the poor instead. If the story was known in the time of Jesus, it throws an interesting light on his parable. 16, 17, 23 There may be allegorical allusions to the invitations from God in the OT, then through Jesus to the Jews, and finally to the Gentiles.

14:25–35 The cost of discipleship (cf. Mt. 10:37–38; 5:13; Mk. 9:50)

Before taking up directly the theme of 'the gospel for the outcasts', foreshadowed in vs 21–24, Jesus indicates the stringent demands which accompany his invitation to God's banquet.

Discipleship means a person's readiness to place his or her claims above those of both family and self. Disciples must be prepared to deny themselves completely—whether carry his cross means literally to be ready for martyrdom or metaphorically to 'die' to all personal desires.

People should count the cost involved in saying 'No' to self before starting on a course which they may not be able to follow to the end. How foolish is the builder who leaves a building unfinished because his funds run out before he anticipated. How foolish, too, is the army commander who does not reckon up on the strength of his army before engaging a stronger foe in battle. A disciple who gives up in midstream because the going is too tough is like salt which has lost its taste and is unfit for seasoning food or even for use on the ground; it cannot be made useful again.

Notes. 26 To hate means to 'love less'. 27 Crucifixion was a sufficiently common event in Judea for people to understand readily what Jesus meant (cf. 9:23). 34 The impure mixture used as salt could lose its salt content and become useless. Since salt makes land infertile, it is puzzling what Jesus meant; possibly use for killing weeds or slowing down the fermentation of dung is in mind.

15:1–32 The gospel for the outcasts

15:1–10 The lost sheep and the lost coin (cf. Mt. 18:12–14). Jesus' association with the members of society commonly regarded as sinful and unrepentant by the Pharisees led to continual criticism. 'Let not a man associate with the wicked, not even to bring him to the Law' is a later rabbinic saying which sums up their attitude. Jesus had already defended himself by speaking of the needs of these people (5:31–32). In the parable of the heavenly banquet he had further declared that he would convey God's invitation to such people rather than to religious people who spurned it. The issue receives fuller treatment in a set of three parables which offer the highest reason of all. God rejoices over the recovery of a lost sinner, and therefore it is Jesus' supreme desire to seek and save the lost (19:10). This divine attitude is illustrated by the willingness of a shepherd to go out over the hills searching, so that not even one sheep may be missing from his flock. There may well be shepherds who do in fact ask: 'What does one lost sheep matter compared with ninety-nine safe in the fold?' and ignore the value of the individual. Not so with God. He rejoices even more (if that is possible) over the return of the lost than over the safety of those at home. So too a housewife summons her friends to share in her rejoicing when she finds her lost coin. In just the same way, it is implied, the Pharisees should share in God's rejoicing over the salvation of the outcasts.

Notes. 3–7 In Mt. 18:12–14 the parable of the lost sheep is an object lesson to the disciples to care for the weaker members of God's flock. 7, 10 Rejoicing in heaven and in the presence of the angels are ways of saying that God himself rejoices, but they also indicate that God's people share in his rejoicing. 8 The description of the woman lighting a lamp and sweeping her house confirms that she was a comparatively poor person living in a peasant's small house with a low doorway and no windows.

15:11–32 The lost son. The third parable makes the same point at greater length. Its main character is really the father who in effect illustrates the character of God (even though God himself appears in the story; cf. v 18).

The narrative situation is that property could be disposed of either by a will or by a gift during one's lifetime. The younger son demanded immediately the full rights of possession over his portion (about one third) of his father's estate which he could expect to inherit when the father died. The elder son remained at home and the father retained his rights over the produce of his portion of the estate. The younger son, however, turned his share into cash and departed to enjoy the proceeds away from home and parental control. Extravagance and dissolute living reduced him to utter poverty, and the friends who had helped to spend the money disappeared. He could find only the most lowly and unpleasant employment possible, especially for a Jew to whom pigs were unclean animals. He would gladly have supplemented his miserable wages by sharing the carob pods which the pigs ate, but (it is implied) he was too disgusted to do so. His desperate state brought him to repentance. He realized not only that he had made a mess of his life but also that he was unworthy to be called his father's son; he was fit only to be a servant, and he was prepared to humble himself and seek reentry to the home at that level.

Before he reached home, however, his father was already looking for his arrival, and before he could blurt out the whole of his intended confession, his father had welcomed him back into the family circle, treated him with great honour, and given orders to celebrate the return of one who had been as good as dead.

One person, the older brother, refused to join in the celebration and grumbled at the lavish welcome. He accused his father of failing to treat him in the same free and joyous manner, only to be reminded that all the resources of the home were his. One can be lost even at home.

The vital question remains unanswered: Did the elder brother eventually join in the welcome to his brother? The absence of the answer to the question is surely deliberate. For the elder brother represents the Pharisees and all like them, and the parable is an appeal to them to change their mind about the outcasts.

Although the parable comes to a climax with this unspoken question, the centre of attention remains the pardoning love of God which should have shamed the Pharisees into a positive response. The story says nothing about his seeking the lost (as in 15:3–10) or about the need for atonement for sin, but that is because the story is a parable, not a detailed allegory, and other aspects of the seeking, sacrificial love of God are taught clearly enough elsewhere.

Notes. 18 Heaven here means 'God'. The son's repentance was not in any way insincere, even though it took utter desperation to bring him to the point. 21 The NIV mg., 'Make me like one of your hired men', is an addition by pedantic scribes who failed to see that the father interrupted the son's statement before he could finish it. 22 The gifts were signs of honour and authority. Shoes were the prerogative of free men, not of slaves. 29–30 The elder brother's complaints are expressed in extravagant language. He could not bring himself to say 'my brother' and spoke contemptuously of this son of yours.

16:1–31 Warnings about wealth

After showing his concern for the poor and the outcasts, Jesus gives some warnings against avarice and wealth (14, 19) which are directed to people who were in danger of failing to respond to the gospel before it was too late. They should in any case have listened to the teaching of the OT Scriptures about the moral law of God, which remains permanently valid. Sayings on these and related topics have been gathered together, so that the chapter also has something to say about the disciples' attitude to wealth.

16:1–9 The shrewd manager. The manager employed by a rich man to look after his estate and keep his accounts was suspected of mismanaging his affairs and possibly of actual dishonesty. When he saw that he was in danger of being dismissed, he called together his master's debtors and allowed them to put lower figures on the statements which showed how much they had promised to pay. This would make them feel a sense of gratitude to him and perhaps help him when he was out of a job. He had acted with considerable astuteness in providing for his own interests.

The message of the parable is disputed. It may simply be meant to urge people to prepare for the crisis brought about by the preaching of Jesus with the same zeal and prudence as the manager. On the other hand, Jesus' added comment that more astuteness is shown by worldly people than by those who belong to the people of God may indicate that the parable was directed at the disciples (8), or the Pharisees whose greed was excluding them from God's friendship (14; cf. 11:39–41). The point would then be that people should learn from the manager and use their wealth to make God their friend, so that, when money is no longer of any help to them, God will receive them into his presence (9). A third possibility is that the manager in the story was not in fact acting dishonestly. Instead he may have been releasing the debtors from the very high interest charges which had been imposed on them (quite illegally) when the loans were made. If this is so then the message of the parable is that keeping the law and showing generosity are ways by which wealthy people can make God their friend.

None of these interpretations can be excluded. In fact the parable may have a number of points, and vs 8b–13 bring these out.

Notes. 6–7 Since oil was cheaper than wheat, the reductions in the debts were about the same. 8–9 The master may be the manager's master (so the NIV) or Jesus himself (in which case the Greek word kyrios means 'the Lord'). The manager was commended for his astuteness and not necessarily for his morality. Dishonesty and worldly typify the people and the money (lit. 'mammon') of this present, evil age.

16:10–13 Faithful stewardship (see Mt. 6:24). Various general principles of stewardship, i.e. the care of what somebody has entrusted to you for safe keeping, now follow.

First, how people look after a little is an indicator as to how they will look after a larger sum (10). If people are poor stewards of money, they will hardly be entrusted with spiritual riches which are more valuable and important (11).

Secondly, if people cannot exercise proper care over something given to them in trust, and for which they can be brought to account, they will not be given wealth of their own to use as they please (12).

Thirdly, God's claims are quite exclusive over against wealth (13). The ancient idea of slavery did not envisage the sort of labour or devotion which could be practised by a person who works for one employer in the mornings and another in the afternoons.

16:14–18 The Pharisees and the law (cf. Mt. 11:12–13; 5:18, 32). People who try to combine gaining wealth and being pious do not like such teaching. Jesus had to warn them that, while they may have succeeded in persuading men that they were pious, in fact their secret greed was plain to God—and abominable in his sight.

Vs 16–18 answer the objection that the message of Jesus and his followers made the law in the OT and its moral demands out of date. Jesus denied the charge; God's will was still expressed in the OT (29). Certainly the era of the law and the prophets had ended, and now the new age of the kingdom had come. But this did not mean that the law had ceased to be valid. A specific example is given: divorce, followed by remarriage, is adultery. This particular example in fact made the law's demands more intense. The Jews thought of adultery as a sin by a woman against her husband or by one man against another; Jesus taught that a man may commit adultery against a woman and so sin against her.

Note. 16 Luke's version of this saying is probably his attempt to clarify the difficult phrase preserved in Mt. 11:12 which the NIV translates: 'the kingdom of heaven has been forcefully advancing'. Everyone is forcing his way into it probably refers to ordinary people eager to enter the kingdom rather than to demons or people opposing the kingdom violently or to Zealots attempting to force God to act more quickly.

16:19–31 The rich man and Lazarus. The parable implies that the rich man did scarcely anything to alleviate the beggar's utter misery and degradation. Street dogs were unclean animals and therefore especially unpleasant. We are to infer that Lazarus ('he whom God helps') was a pious person.

The beggar found a place of honour beside Abraham, the father of the Jewish race and the friend of God. The rich man found himself in Hades (the NIV's hell is misleading) in torment and agony. He called upon Abraham as 'father' for mercy, but, although Abraham addressed him as 'son', he offered him no hope.

So far the story follows traditional lines, but now there is a fresh element. Could the rich man's brothers, who were probably also rich and careless, be warned before they reached Hades? The reply given was that the teaching they possessed in the OT should be enough. Not even somebody returning from the dead could influence those who had shut their ears to God's voice in Scripture. Failure to practise the love and the mercy commanded in the OT leads to loss in the next life.

The story is a parable, and therefore does not necessarily give literal information about conditions in the next life. 'Hades' was the abode of the dead in popular Jewish belief, and it is not clear whether Jesus was referring to the time before or after the final judgment. Yet the clear implication is that the fate of the rich man was finally fixed. Although the language is manifestly symbolic when it talks of the poor man being beside Abraham, it speaks of real destinies for people.

17:1–19 Teaching for disciples

17:1–4 Stumbling blocks (cf. Mt. 18:6–7, 15, 21–22; Mk. 9:42). The first of a collection of teachings for disciples, this section is about things that cause people to sin (older versions have 'stumbling blocks'). Although these are inevitable in this present world, nevertheless Jesus warns his disciples sternly about being the cause of other people sinning, e.g. by tempting them or by setting a bad example. It would be better for such people to drown before they can do their evil work rather than suffer the fate reserved for tempters. On the contrary, the disciples should help any member of their group who falls into sin both by showing that they have gone wrong and by being ready to forgive, no matter how often this may be necessary.

17:5–6 The power of faith (cf. Mt. 17:20; Mk 11:22–23). Jesus commended the desire for the faith necessary to enable disciples to obey his commands; even a tiny 'amount' of faith can do great wonders. Increase our faith may simply mean 'give us faith'. The saying about the mulberry tree was never meant to be taken literally.

17:7–10 Duty. Servants who have completed their duty have no right to expect anything more than the agreed wage and remain unworthy in the sense that they have nothing of which to boast. Elsewhere Jesus taught and demonstrated a different attitude by himself serving his disciples (Jn. 13:1–16; cf. the teaching in Lk. 12:35–38; 22:27). This shows that here he is not teaching that God's dealings with us are on a basis of law and duty rather than of grace and faith. Rather, he is giving a necessary lesson to all who are tempted to feel proud of their faith or their good works for God.

Jesus' use of an illustration from slavery does not prove that he would have commended slavery as an institution any more than he would have commended dishonesty (16:8).

17:11–19 The grateful Samaritan. When some lepers sought healing from Jesus, he simply commanded them to go and show themselves to a priest (5:14) The implication is that their faith would be demonstrated by their obedience and would lead to their cure. All showed faith and were cured, but only one stopped to praise God and to thank Jesus for his cure. Jesus commented on the ungratefulness of the others (all presumably Jews) and confirmed that the Samaritan's faith had made him well both in body and soul. The story is both an illustration of wonder-working faith (cf. v 6) and a lesson on the need for gratitude as part of faith.

Note. 11 The location of the incident on the border explains the mixed racial character of the group. The geography, however, is not clear. It is possible that Galilee here includes Perea, the area east of the Jordan also ruled by Herod.

17:20–18:8 The coming of the Son of Man

17:20–37 The kingdom and the Son of Man (cf. Mt. 24:23–28, 37–41). Jesus had already spoken of the coming of the kingdom and of the Son of Man (9:26; 10:9, 11; 12:40). It was natural to ask when these events would happen. Would there be any indications as to when the end was near so that people could prepare themselves for it or take hope from the thought that it was not too far distant.

Jesus replied that the coming of the kingdom would not be accompanied by observable signs. People would not be able to say in advance: ‘Here it is.’ The second part of his statement is not easy. The NIV and some other translations say that the kingdom of God is within you. This translation is improbable not simply because the kingdom was not within the Pharisees who asked the question but rather because Jesus nowhere else spoke of the kingdom as an inward, spiritual experience. ‘Among you’ (NIV mg.) is a better translation; the phrase might then mean ‘within your grasp’. Although Jesus says is (present tense), some have suggested that he was really speaking about the future. This is also unlikely, since elsewhere Jesus spoke about the kingdom as being present (11:20) as well as future. The kingdom of God was already at work in the midst of Jesus’ hearers; it was there for them to grasp.

Jesus then looks to the future, and talks about the way in which God will suddenly intervene in history—again without any warning signs. People will long to see the time of the coming of the Son of Man and the new era, no doubt partly because of the distress that they undergo in this world. In this situation they could be misled by false signs. When the Son of Man does come, his glorious arrival will be sufficiently clear for everybody to recognize what is happening—in marked contrast to the suffering and humiliation which he must first undergo as a necessary stage on the path to his glorious triumph. This will come as a surprise—and an unpleasant one—to the world at large, and therefore people ought to prepare themselves for it. Just as flood once overtook the world and fire devoured Sodom by surprise, despite the witness of Noah and Lot (2 Pet. 2:5–8), so will it be when the Son of Man comes in judgment. It will be too late to escape then; people must therefore beware of attachment to earthly things, remembering the terrible experience of Lot’s wife. Only people who have given up living for themselves will escape. There will be separation even between members of the same family and within groups of fellow-workers. When Jesus is asked where it will happen, he makes no concessions to those who want a map as well as a timetable; when the time comes, it will be quite obvious where the Son of Man is, just as the location of a corpse in the desert is evident from the flock of circling vultures above it.

Notes. 20 Jesus’ warning against looking for signs has often been thought to be out of harmony with 21:5–36. This, however, rests on a misunderstanding of the latter passage (and of its parallels in Mt. 24 and Mk. 13). Jesus consistently taught that there are no certain signs and people must be continually watchful. 22 The days of the Son of Man probably refers to the period immediately before his coming. 36 This verse is omitted in the best MSS; it was added by scribes who were familiar with Mt. 24:40.

18:1–8 The unjust judge. This parable is really the closing part of the teaching about the future in 17:20–37. Like the very similar parable in 11:5–8, it makes its point not by comparing God to the unjust judge but by drawing the contrast. Probably the woman was bringing a financial case to the judge and he refused to listen because he was waiting for a bribe; she was too poor to pay, and persistence was her only weapon. If even a judge who does not honour the laws of God and man can be induced to act by the incessant appeals of a widow, how much more will God act to uphold his people when they cry to him.

In v 7 God's chosen ones are the people who have heard his call and have responded to it. Here they are in a situation of persecution and long for God to show that they are in the right. They pray: 'May your kingdom come.' Will he keep putting them off? suggests that God may appear to be intractable and not answering their prayers, but in fact he will certainly answer their prayers without the need to be pressed. He will uphold his people quickly. The really vital question is not whether God will respond to prayer, but whether there will be faithful people who have persisted in prayer and not lost hope when the Son of Man comes. The parable is essentially an encouragement to continue in prayer without losing heart right through the difficult times of waiting before the Son of Man comes. For an interesting parallel see Eccles. 35:14–19.

18:9–19:10 The scope of salvation

The common theme in this section of the gospel is the offer of salvation to people who would normally be regarded as excluded from it.

18:9–14 The Pharisee and the tax collector. Like the preceding parable this one too is about prayer, but it really deals with a wider topic. The two prayers reflect two types of character. The Pharisee was a pious man, living an honest and upright life. He did more than the law required. He fasted twice a week—on Mondays and Thursdays—although the law required people to fast only once a year on the Day of Atonement. He gave tithes of all his income and not just of the required parts. But he stood up in a prominent place to pray, he commended himself for his piety (his prayer is all about 'I'), he despised his neighbours and he suggested to God that there was nothing he needed. By contrast, the tax collector stood far away from the holy place in the temple. He did not dare lift up his eyes, still less his hands, to God in prayer, but simply poured out a confession of his sinfulness and appealed for God's mercy. Jesus' verdict was that he went home justified, i.e. accepted by God, but the Pharisee was not accepted at all. Rather than the other (14) is too weak: 'and not the other' is correct. The parable is thus another demonstration of concern for the 'outcasts'. God is always ready to receive the unrighteous when they call to him, but he closes his ears to those whose pride in their religious practices and good works makes them feel self-sufficient.

There were undoubtedly many good, well-meaning Pharisees, and therefore it is wrong to lump them all together and condemn them. But it is also true that there were people like the Pharisee pictured here, and prayers very similar to this one have been handed down in Jewish sources.

18:15–17 Jesus and children (see Mt. 19:13–15; Mk. 10:13–16). Luke alone refers to the children as babies. Touch implies that Jesus would place his hands on them and pray to God to bless them. In Mark the main point of the story is that the kingdom of God belongs to such as them, and this is emphasized by Jesus taking the children in his arms. Luke omitted this feature, not because he felt that it was an improper thing to record, but more probably because he wanted to concentrate attention on the lesson that the kingdom of God is only for those who are prepared to receive it like a little child in a humble and receptive frame of mind (cf. 18:14).

Notes. 15 After a long section (9:51–18:14) which had no parallels in Mark, Luke again keeps in step with the earlier gospel. 16 The kingdom is both for children and for the childlike.

18:18–34 The rich ruler (see Mt. 19:16–30; 20:17–19; Mk. 10:17–34). The same theme of the attitudes that God accepts continues. To inherit, i.e. gain, eternal life is the same as to enter the kingdom of God (24) or to be saved (26). Jesus asked if the man really knew what he meant by addressing him as good. This word should be reserved for God only. Jesus was not denying his own position as the Son of God, which would not have been obvious to the man; he was trying to avoid empty flattery. He answered the man's question in the traditional Jewish way by talking about the need to keep the commandments, especially those in the second part of the Ten Commandments which could be tested (more or less) by a person's outward behaviour. When the man claimed to have kept them, Jesus began to probe more deeply. Let the young man turn his assets into cash, give to the poor and become a disciple. The man's refusal to do so showed that he did not truly love his neighbour as himself, and that he put himself and his wealth, rather than God, at the centre of his affections (cf. 10:27). Although he kept the law outwardly, his heart was not right with God. Here was clear proof that it is extremely hard for people whose hearts are set on riches to enter the kingdom. In fact, it is about as easy for a camel to go literally through the eye of a needle! Indeed, it is impossible for any people to save themselves.

But although people cannot overcome their own sinful hearts by themselves, God can intervene to save those who will respond to his call. Peter then suggested that the Twelve had made this response and given up everything for Jesus. Jesus promised that those who were prepared for the sacrifices involved in being disciples would receive far greater blessings both now, in the fellowship of God's people, and in the world to come.

Persecution (see Mk. 10:30) is not mentioned here but is surely implied in the prophecy that Jesus goes on to cite about the shameful treatment which he, as the Son of Man, would receive from the Gentiles. But the Twelve could not take this in (cf. 9:45).

Notes. 20 The commandments are listed in a peculiar order which is also found in the Greek translation of the OT. The command against covetousness is omitted—either because this sin is not so obvious outwardly as the others or because this commandment was in fact the one that the young man could not say that he had kept. 25 A similar Jewish proverb spoke of an elephant. 31 See Is. 49:7; 50:5–6; 52:13–53:12; and also Pss. 22; 69. Some of these passages may be not so much direct prophecies as rather statements about what happens to righteous people in general who trust in God and suffer for so doing.

18:35–43 The healing of a blind man (see Mt. 20:29–34; Mk. 10:46–52). The final two stories in this section are about people who responded to the call of God given by Jesus. Son of David was a designation for the Messiah (see Is. 11:1–10; Je. 23:5–6; Ezk. 34:23–24; Lk. 20:41–44). The blind man showed persistence (cf. 18:1) in calling out for help despite the people who tried to silence him, and Jesus responded to his faith.

19:1–10 Zacchaeus the tax collector. Not all rich people departed sadly from Jesus. Zacchaeus is an example of what is possible with God (18:27). The Romans sold the task of collecting the taxes in any particular area to the highest bidder. The person appointed did not receive any salary for his work; he simply collected as much money as he could, and he kept for himself what was left over after he had paid the agreed sum to the Romans. Zacchaeus's attempt to see Jesus, who was popularly known as the friend of tax collectors (7:34) shows his interest in him and the lengths to which he was prepared to go. Whether or not Zacchaeus hoped to be hidden from view, Jesus called to him with a request for lodging. Zacchaeus showed both repentance and joy as he welcomed Jesus. Jesus justified his choice of company: he had brought salvation to a man who was as much entitled to hear the gospel as any other Jew. Here the purpose of the coming of Jesus is fully and finally summed up: as a shepherd goes and looks for lost sheep to rescue from danger (cf. 15:3–7; Ezk. 34:16—applied to God himself and his servant, the Messiah), so Jesus as the Son of Man seeks and saves lost people.

Notes. 8 By inserting here and now the NIV shows that it interprets the verbs I give and I will repay (both present tense in Greek) as referring to what Zacchaeus resolved to do immediately, not as references to his past practice. The resolve corresponds to the penitence of the tax collector in 18:13. 9 The saying does not imply that Jesus was not concerned about the Gentiles, but stresses simply that one Jew is no more and no less valuable than any other in God's sight.

19:11–21:38 The teaching of Jesus in Jerusalem

19:11–27 The parable of the ten minas

As the work of Jesus came to what the disciples hoped would be a climax in Jerusalem, they thought that a successful worldly type of revolution was about to take place and lead to the establishment of the kingdom of God. They bickered about the places which they would occupy in the new order (22:24–30; Mk. 10:35–45). The present parable was intended to correct this attitude by warning that the Messiah was going to be rejected and that there would be a period during which he would be 'absent' and his followers must engage in faithful service until his return.

As an 'earthly' story the parable sounds like the stories of various members of the Herodian family who went to Rome to petition for, or to seek confirmation of, royal power over their realms. Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great, went to Rome in 4 BC to have his father's will confirmed, by which he was to be his successor. But an embassy of Jews followed close on his heels with a protest to the emperor: 'We don't want this man to be our king'; as a result Augustus severely limited his powers. Jesus was probably using this incident as a basis for the parable. The fate of the disobedient subjects simply reflects ancient despotic ways. There is no record that Archelaus himself actually behaved like this, and there is no indication that Jesus himself approved of such cruelty.

The centre of interest in the parable, however, is not the rebellious subjects but the ten servants (probably a round number) each of whom was given a mina with which to trade and make a profit. The first two servants, having successfully managed their money, received the privilege of high office. A third, however, had not managed his money well, not even to the extent of loaning it out at interest. He even criticized his master for being a harsh man who unjustly took the proceeds of other people's work. Perhaps he was afraid of making a loss and getting into trouble. (cf. the stockbroker's warning: 'the value of your investment can go down as well as up!') The prospect of reward and loss is put before the disciples.

Notes. This parable has similarities to the parable of the talents in Mt. 25:14–30. It also contains some curious points. In v 20 another servant is actually 'the other servant', as if there were originally only three servants, as in Matthew. It is curious that an extra mina is given as an additional reward to a person who has just received ten cities and that this should lead to a protest. Finally, the part of the story about the ruler and his rebellious subjects is not in the parable of the talents and is perhaps slightly odd in a story about trade and commerce. Many scholars think, therefore, that two separate stories told by Jesus have been joined together into one, and that some of the details have been slightly changed in the telling of the stories. Something similar may have happened in the story in Mt. 22:1–14 which also looks like a combination of two parables (but see note there). Naturally these points do not affect the basic truths taught in the stories. 13 Offering modern equivalents for ancient coins, especially in a period of inflation, is almost impossible. The NIV suggests that the mina was equivalent to about three months' wages for a farm labourer. This gives a rough idea of its purchasing value. 21 The description of the master as harsh and the story of his conduct in v 27 are not meant to be taken as a picture of what God is like, although the fact of divine judgment is certainly something to be taken seriously.

19:28–40 Jesus approaches Jerusalem (see Mt. 21:1–9; Mk. 11:1–10; Jn. 12:12–19)

The disciples had by now been warned against wrong expectations of what would happen to Jesus in Jerusalem. Nevertheless, he prepared to enter the city in an unusual way. He mounted a colt and rode from Bethphage and Bethany, which were two villages east of the Mount of Olives, down the slope of the hill and towards the city. Spreading clothes on the road was a sign of greeting to a ruler (cf. 2 Ki. 9:13). The people who had come with him from Galilee burst into praise to God for the mighty works which they had already seen and hailed Jesus as the coming king who would have God's authority to rule. Luke alone tells how some of the Pharisees, who were possibly friendly towards Jesus and fearful for the consequences, warned him to quieten his enthusiastic followers. But Jesus was not prepared to do so. In a deeper sense than the people who were shouting realized their words were true: the king had come. The crowds, therefore, could not help welcoming him.

Notes. 31 It is not clear whether the Lord refers to Jesus himself or to the colt's owner. In the latter case, the owners in v 33 would be the owner's servants, and Jesus would have made a previous arrangement for the loan with the owner. In the former case, Jesus very unusually refers to himself as 'the Lord'. 38 In Mk. 11:9–10 it is the kingdom rather than the king which is welcomed, but the difference is not important. Luke's wording assumes that people realized that the setting up of a kingdom involved the installation of a king, and the important thing is that they were prepared to recognize a human being, Jesus, as the king. The crowds may have been expecting some kind of coup by Jesus, despite all that he had said to the contrary to his followers. Peace in heaven ... is Luke's paraphrase of 'Hosanna ...' in Mark for Gentile readers. Perhaps it suggests that peace is not possible on earth for Jerusalem (cf. 2:14; 19:42).

19:41–48 The fate of Jerusalem (see Mt. 21:12–13; Mk. 11:15–18)

There is a sudden change of mood as Jesus utters a sorrowful prophecy over the city spread before him. He longed that it might repent and seek what would be for its own good. How little did the city of peace (Heb. 7:2) live up to its name. The time would come when it would be besieged in the typical manner of ancient warfare: a barricade would be built round it to prevent anybody coming or going in order to starve the inhabitants into submission. Then the enemy would force their way in and capture it with tremendous cruelty and loss of life. All this would happen because the people had failed to recognize that God was coming to it and longing to save it.

Then Jesus entered the temple and made a demonstration of driving out the people who carried on their trades within it. They provided for the needs of worshippers and pilgrims, like a modern souvenir shop selling picture postcards of a cathedral. But the trade seems to have been less than honest and had grown to vast proportions. The area of the temple appointed for the Gentiles to worship God had become a den of thieves rather than a place where prayer was possible. Jesus then put the temple to its proper use, teaching daily amid increasing opposition from the authorities and strong sympathy from the crowds.

The passage implies that this was not Jesus' first visit to Jerusalem (13:34); otherwise it is difficult to understand why he seems to condemn the city almost before he has given it any chance to respond to his message.

20:1–21:4 Teaching in the temple

The story of Jesus' last visit to Jerusalem is filled with a series of incidents in which the points of difference between him and the Jewish leaders become ever more clear, and they were stirred to take action against him.

20:1–8 The authority of Jesus (see Mt. 21:23–27; Mk. 11:27–33). The Sanhedrin, which was in effect the Jewish 'parliament', was composed of representatives from each of the three groups named here, the chief priests, teachers of the law and elders, totalling seventy-one members under the chairmanship of the high priest. The chief priests were members of the leading high-priestly families and holders of various offices (e.g. the ruler of the temple, the leaders of the weekly and daily groups of priests, the captains and the treasurers); the elders were the lay representatives of the people.

They wanted to know what authority Jesus claimed for setting himself up as a teacher. Did he claim to be a prophet with divine authority? Jesus replied with a counter-question. Let them first tell him whether John the Baptist had received his authority from heaven, i.e. from God (15:18), or from men. If the group had replied 'From heaven' Jesus could have asked them why they did not accept him (Mt. 21:32); it would also have implied that he himself also had divine authority. But if they denied the authority of John, they would have landed themselves in trouble with the people who had certainly regarded John as a prophet. Their answer, We don't know, was pitifully weak, and Jesus in effect won the argument. Yet the story is not about Jesus outwitting people in argument. Rather it shows how the questioners were unwilling to admit divine authority when they saw it and could not make up their minds what to do in the situation.

20:9–19 The parable of the wicked tenants (see Mt. 21:33–46; Mk. 12:1–12). Jesus now moved into the attack with a transparent parable. Jews who knew their Scriptures would be reminded of the opening words of Is. 5:1–7, where a vineyard represented Israel. In the owner's absence, the tenants decided first to withhold the fruits from him and then to ensure that they would take over the vineyard. In certain conditions the property of a Gentile or a proselyte who died without making a will would pass to the first person who gained possession of it. The tenants may have been relying on some such custom, or simply hoping that the landlord would not follow up on their action. So they killed the heir and sat tight on the property. The story reflects the situation of the time when large estates in Galilee were owned by distant landlords. It also portrays allegorically the history of Israel and its leaders who had continually rejected the messengers of God. For Christians the owner's son clearly represents Jesus, but whether the first hearers would have recognized this is not certain. They might have seen in the word son a way of referring to the Messiah, or they might have known that on occasion Jesus claimed that God was his Father in a special way. But, although Jesus himself was aware of his own identity and fate, he did not speak openly about them to the crowds or his opponents.

It was obvious what a landlord would do with such tenants, and everybody would have accepted that he was in the right to do so. Yet the hearers said May this never be. This shows that they must have recognized that Jesus was applying the story to 'the vineyard of the Lord', and they were appalled at the thought of others taking possession of it. Jesus, however, claimed scriptural support for what he said. What else, he asked, could be the meaning of the metaphor of the stone rejected by the builders but given the chief place in the building? Did it not mean that the person whose authority they had refused (20:1–7) was the person of God’s choice? Anybody who rejected him, therefore, would suffer judgment (see Is. 8:14–15; Dn. 2:34–35).

20:20–26 Tribute to Caesar (see Mt. 22:15–22; Mk. 12:13–17). The authorities would have arrested Jesus on the spot, but the time was not ripe in view of his immense popularity. So they contented themselves with collecting further evidence against him. In order to make him lose favour with the people or incur the suspicion of the Romans they raised a question about the poll-tax imposed on the Jews by the Romans. It had been introduced amid fierce resentment and opposition (see on 2:2), and it continued to be unpopular. Would Jesus oppose it—and perhaps be arrested as a rebel? Or would he uphold it—and perhaps lose the support of the people? Jesus asked his questioners for a coin, not because he did not possess one, but so as to demonstrate that they themselves used Caesar’s money. The silver denarius, which bore Caesar’s head on one side and on the other the goddess of peace, was inscribed: ‘Tiberius Caesar Augustus, son of the divine Augustus, chief priest.’ If the people used Caesar’s coinage, they were under obligation to pay back what was owing to him. But then Jesus went beyond the original question. People also have a parallel debt to God. Perhaps there is the thought that people are God’s coinage, for they bear God’s image.

The respective spheres of authority of God and Caesar are not defined here. Jesus’ point was simply that people who benefit from Caesar must pay him for it.

20:27–40 The problem of the resurrection (see Mt. 22:23–33; Mk. 12:18–27). The Sadducees were a Jewish group, chiefly drawn from the priesthood and the wealthy aristocracy, who were perfectly happy with the existing situation under Roman rule. They had a traditional, conservative type of religion which was based on the five books of Moses, but it was empty and formal. Unlike the Pharisees, they accepted only the material world and denied the resurrection, angels and spirits (Acts 23:8). Their story was designed to show the absurdity of the resurrection in the light of ‘levirate marriage’. This was based on the principle that if a husband died, his brother should marry the widow in order to raise up a male heir for him (see Gn. 38:8; Dt. 25:5–6). Theoretically a woman might have several husbands in turn; so did not this make the idea of resurrection a nonsense?

First, Jesus stated that conditions in the resurrection are not like those on earth. Since there is no death and hence no need to replenish the race, there is no need for procreation. This could be taken to mean that earthly relationships like marriage will come to an end in heaven. More probably all human relationships are lifted up to such a high level in heaven that the exclusiveness of marriage will not be a factor in heaven as it is on earth. The continuation of earthly relationships is implied in 1 Thes. 4:17–18.

Secondly, Jesus gave an argument for the resurrection based on the law of Moses. At the burning bush God had said: ‘I—the God of Abraham’ (Ex. 3:6). In a Hebrew sentence of this kind, there was no verb expressed, and Jesus was implying that the present form of the verb ‘I am’ must be supplied (as in the Greek translation of the OT), showing that God still said that he was the God of Abraham centuries after his death—with the implication that Abraham was still alive and able to worship him. The God who was Abraham’s God during his lifetime would not let death interrupt the relationship but would resurrect him.

Note. 35 On the resurrection see 14:14 note.

20:41–44 The person of the Messiah (see Mt. 22:41–46; 23:6; Mk. 12:35–40).

Finally, Jesus took the initiative in criticizing inadequate views of the Christ or Messiah. The Jews awaited the coming of an earthly deliverer who would be a king descended from David (see on 18:38). But in Ps. 110 David was reported as saying ‘The Lord [i.e. God] said to my Lord [i.e. The Messiah] ...’. If however, the Messiah was David’s son, how could David refer to his own son as his Lord? (For a father is superior to his son.) The implication could be either that the Messiah is not a descendant from David or that in some way the Messiah is more than an earthly descendant of David. Jesus, however, was recognized as descended from David, so the first option is ruled out. The second option is the right one, but the proof that Jesus was superior to David did not emerge until the resurrection. For the moment Jesus left his hearers with a riddle.

Note. 42 Although the two words translated ‘lord’ are the same in Greek, they are different in the Hebrew version of the Psalm.

20:46–47 The hypocrisy of the teachers of the law. Then Jesus turned to expose the inadequacies of the religion of the teachers of the law. Some of them had become proud of their robes and they loved the respect of the people. They were hypocrites who cheated the poor and made an empty show of their religion. Of all people they should have known God’s will most clearly; for that reason they were doubly guilty. Yet there were individual exceptions to this strong verdict: see Mk. 12:28–34.

21:1–4 The widow’s offering (see Mk. 12:41–44). In sharpest contrast to the false religion of the scribes is placed this story of a poor widow who gave two of the tiniest coins in circulation as her offering to the temple alongside the gifts of the rich. In God’s sight her offering was the greatest because God measures not so much the size of the gift as of what remains to the owner after it has been given. She had in effect given all her income.

21:5–38 The destruction of the temple and the last things

21:5–7 The fate of the temple (see Mt. 24:1–3; Mk. 13:1–4). Jesus did not share the enthusiasm of the disciples for the magnificent architecture of Herod’s new temple, and he proceeded to prophesy that it would be completely destroyed. The disciples asked when this would happen, and whether there would be any warning signs to show that it was about to happen. The way they put their question, and certainly the way in which Jesus answered it, shows that they thought that the destruction of the temple would be one of the events associated with the end of the age.

Jesus’ lengthy answer is also recorded in Mk. 13 with some differences in wording. Scholars debate whether Luke reworded the discourse, as he read it in Mark, in order to make some of its lessons clearer for his readers, or whether he had access to some different traditions of what Jesus said. There may well be truth in both theories. Like the Sermon on the Mount, this chapter doubtless contains things that Jesus said on more than one occasion.

21:8–11 Signs of the end (see Mt. 24:4–7; Mk. 13:5–8). The first words of Jesus give the general thrust of the discourse as a whole. The disciples are not to expect the end immediately, and they are not to think that the coming of the end can be predicted. Even the destruction of the temple does not mean that the end is at hand. So the disciples should not be misled by people who falsely claim to be the Messiah and imitate the teaching of Jesus that the time is near (cf. Mk. 1:15). Nor were they to be tempted to despair amid the terrible human conflict and cosmic disasters which would precede the end.

21:12–19 Persecution of the disciples (cf. Mt. 10:17–22; 24:9–14; Mk. 13:9–13).

The lack of chronological order in Jesus' statements helps to discourage any attempts to work out in advance a timetable of events. Even before the events in vs 10–11 the disciples would be persecuted by both the Jews and the Romans. But this apparent disaster would give them an opportunity for witness. They would not need to be worried about preparing speeches beforehand; in the hour of crisis Jesus himself will inspire them for bold and incontrovertible witness. This saying plainly applies to Christians being suddenly arrested and brought to court, and doesn't apply to preachers going peacefully to their pulpits with plenty of time to prepare their messages. Here Jesus promises his own aid to his witnesses. If elsewhere the Spirit is said to be the teacher of the disciples (12:11–12), it must be remembered that the Spirit is sent by Jesus (Jn. 16:7). Persecution will come even from family and friends and lead to martyrdom and universal hatred. But, whatever happens, the disciples are under the hand of God, and those who endure faithfully will gain eternal life. Vs. 18–19 cannot mean that the disciples will avoid physical harm and martyrdom (16); rather there is a promise of God's control over what happens to them and therefore a call to remain faithful.

21:20–24 The fall of Jerusalem (cf. Mt. 24:15–22; Mk. 13:14–20). Two distinct stages in the coming of the end are now described. The first is that Jerusalem will be besieged, depopulated and handed over to Gentile rule for a fixed period. People who value their lives will flee before it is too late, for it will be the time of God's judgment upon the city. At the thought of the inevitable suffering, especially for women, Jesus again broke out in sorrow (13:34–35; 19:41–44; 23:27–31).

Although the language describes a siege much more clearly than the corresponding section in Mark, this does not necessarily mean that Luke was writing after the event. The wording he uses is familiar from OT prophecy, especially from passages foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylon. But whether Jesus spoke word-for-word as in Mark's version or Luke's (or both), or Luke has brought out the meaning of his words more clearly, as their fulfilment became clearer, is hard to determine.

The times of the Gentiles is the period of Gentile domination of Jerusalem. It is not clear whether this is the period of conversion of the Gentiles (Rom. 11:25). Jesus says nothing about what would happen to Jerusalem at the end of the period.

21:25–28 The coming of the Son of Man (see Mt. 24:29–31; Mk. 13:24–27). The second stage in the coming of the end is the cosmic disorder (cf. v 11) prophesied in the OT. Some scholars hold that this is a metaphorical description of the overthrow of the Gentile powers. Then the Son of Man will come, fulfilling the prophecy in Dn. 7:13–14, where his coming is associated with the day of judgment and the final, visible establishment of God's rule. Because the disasters ahead are the prelude to this divine act of release, the disciples should be filled with hope, in contrast to the fear which will characterize everybody else.

21:29–33 The certainty of the end (see Mt. 24:32–35; Mk. 13:28–31). In Palestine the fig-tree is the first to show its leaves and indicate that summer is approaching; in other countries all the trees join it in announcing that summer is at hand. So the dreadful events prophesied by Jesus are in reality a sign of hope that the coming of the kingdom is near.

All these things which would happen during this generation signifies 'all the warning signs' including the fall of Jerusalem in AD 70 rather than including the coming of the Son of Man (cf. v 36 for this distinction). The fulfilment of these signs will be a sign that his coming is near. But how can this be true after so many centuries have gone by? It must be remembered that Jesus confessed his own ignorance of when the Son of Man would come (Mk.13:32; cf. Acts 1:7). The first coming of Jesus and the judgment upon Jerusalem have brought the coming of the kingdom nearer than before. There is also a sense in which the end is always near (just as a person walking along the edge of the cliff may fall over it at any point, as distinct from somebody who is approaching the edge of a cliff from a distance). Further God's prophecies are conditional in their fulfilment, and the church's fulfilment (or lack of fulfilment) of the command to evangelize the whole world may have some connection with it.

21:34–36 Preparation for the end. In any case, the vital thing is not to indulge in speculation or to give way to despair. Since the judgment day will mean disaster for people who have yielded to temptation and sin, the disciples must pray for strength to remain faithful to the end.

21:37–38 Summary of Jesus' activity in Jerusalem. Jesus had to lodge outside Jerusalem, like many other visitors to Jerusalem at Passover time who found that the city was overcrowded. The Passover meal, however, could be celebrated only within Jerusalem itself.

22:1–24:53 The death and resurrection of Jesus

22:1–38 The Last Supper

22:1–6 The treachery of Judas (see Mt. 26:1–5, 14–16; Mk. 14:1–2, 10–11; cf. Jn. 11:45–53). Once the Jewish leaders had decided to do away with Jesus (see 23:2 for their pretexts), their main problem was to do so without creating an uprising by his supporters. Jesus had many supporters among the common people (cf. chs. 19–20), and it was feared that many of them would be ready to fight on his behalf. What Judas did was to provide an opportunity for Jesus to be arrested quietly. Since there could be around 100,000 people in and around Jerusalem at the Passover season, the chances of tracking down an individual who wished to remain hidden were slight without inside information.

The Feasts of Unleavened Bread and the Passover were originally separate festivals, but were regarded as one in practice. The Passover was celebrated on the 14th and 15th of the month Nisan (roughly March–April). During the afternoon of the 14th, the Passover lambs were slaughtered at the temple. Since the new Jewish day began at sunset, the evening of that same day (by our reckoning) was the beginning of the 15th, and the actual meal was held then. The days of Unleavened Bread lasted from the 15th to the 21st of the month. In 22:7 the 14th is described as the day of Unleavened Bread possibly because the feasts were closely linked, or possibly for readers who used a calendar with the day starting at midnight.

Luke agrees with Mark that Jesus held the Passover at the appointed time. For the chronology in John, which appears to put everything one day earlier, see on Mt. 26:17 and Jn. 13:1.

22:7–13 Preparation for the supper (see Mt. 26:17–19; Mk. 14:12–16). To prepare for the Passover meal the disciples needed to secure a suitably furnished room within the city itself, and also the food—a lamb, bread, bitter herbs and wine being the essential requirements. The instructions suggest that Jesus had already made a secret arrangement with a friend in Jerusalem whereby he could avoid being disturbed. The room may have been that mentioned in Acts 1:13, possibly in the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark (Acts 12:12). The sight of a man carrying a jar of water would have been rather unusual; it looks like a prearranged means of identification.

22:14–23 The significance of the meal (see Mt. 26:20, 26–29, 23–24; Mk. 14:17, 22–25, 20–21; cf. Jn. 13:21–30). The normal procedure at the Passover meal was to have an opening prayer which was followed by the first of four cups of wine and a dish of herbs and sauce. Then the story of the institution of the Passover was recited, Ps. 113 was sung and the second cup of wine was drunk. After a grace the main course of roast lamb with unleavened bread and bitter herbs was eaten, and after a further prayer the third cup of wine was drunk. Pss. 114–118 were then sung, and the fourth cup of wine was drunk.

Jesus began the meal by saying that he would shortly suffer and desired to eat this last meal undisturbed. It would be the last supper, for the next occasion for him would be the fulfilment of the meal in the kingdom of God. The reference is probably to the Messianic banquet rather than to the church's observance of the Lord's Supper.

Then Jesus took a cup of wine (the first or the second in the series) and reaffirmed that this would be the last occasion on which he would drink before the coming of the kingdom; in this way he clearly linked his death to the coming of the kingdom. This is my body manifestly means 'This represents my body'. Jesus indicated that his body was about to be given for his disciples in a death on their behalf, and he bade them to repeat the ceremony in remembrance of him. The third cup of wine symbolized his blood by which the new covenant was inaugurated with a sacrifice (Ex. 24:8; Je. 31:31–34). Finally he spoke of his imminent betrayal, bringing together in one difficult saying the facts of the divinely ordained course which he had to follow and the free responsibility and consequent guilt of the person who betrayed him.

Notes. 15–18 Luke has put the prophecy of betrayal, which Mark records before the meal, after it; he has brought forward Jesus' vow. He apparently had access to other traditions of the meal beside the story in Mark. The words of Jesus seem to imply that he did not take part in the meal or at least in the fourth cup of wine. 19–20 The second half of v 19 and v 20 are omitted by one Greek MS (Codex Bezae [D]) and a number of Latin and Syriac MSS, followed by some modern versions. If the omission is correct, Luke has given us an account of a meal in which the cup preceded the bread, and which had no sacrificial significance. But there is no evidence that such a sequence ever existed in the church, and the textual evidence for the omission (one erratic Greek MS out of 3,000) is weak. The longer text, translated in the NIV, is to be preferred; it has links to the tradition known to Paul (1 Cor. 11:23–26). The shorter text may be due to misunderstanding, possibly to a desire to 'correct' an account which referred to two cups rather than one.

22:24–38 Sayings of Jesus at table (cf. Mt. 26:31–35; Mk. 14:27–31; Jn. 13:36–38). Luke gives a fuller set of sayings by Jesus after the supper than we have in Matthew and Mark.

24–27 First, disputes concerning status should not arise in the kingdom of God, no matter what may happen in the world. In human society, the person who is served at the table is generally reckoned the greater, but the example of Jesus, who served his disciples (cf. Jn. 13) shows that this is not so in the kingdom. (Cf. Mk. 10:35–45, which Luke omits.)

28–30 The second saying of Jesus does allow some honour to the Twelve. They were supporting Jesus in his trials and therefore they would share in the Messianic feast and act as judges over the tribes of Israel in the kingdom of Jesus. It is curious that this saying takes no account of the fact that Judas had cut himself off from a place in the Twelve, that it says nothing about the Gentiles and that it allots places of honour just after Jesus had rebuked self-seeking (cf. Mk. 10:28–31). What is probably another version of the same saying occurs in Mt. 19:28, and this may be in the original context. It probably is a way of expressing that the disciples will share in the rule of Jesus in his kingdom whereas the unbelieving people of Israel will be excluded from it.

31–34 In the third section Jesus tells how Satan had sought to have the disciples (you in v 31 is in the plural form) in order to sift them (cf. Jb. 1–2; Dn. 10:13) and lead them to fall away from Jesus. Jesus had allowed this to happen, but he had also prayed for Peter so that he would not fail in his faith and thus be able to strengthen the others. Although Peter himself would deny his master, nevertheless, he would not fall away completely.

35–38 Finally, Jesus spoke of the new situation. V 36 is heavily ironical. Jesus knew that from now on he and his followers would face opposition and even death. The disciples misunderstood him and produced weapons. That is enough, said Jesus, to end a conversation which they had failed to understand. The way of Jesus, as they should have known, was not the way of the sword but the way of love.

22:39–53 The prayer and the arrest of Jesus (see Mt. 26:36–56; Mk. 14:32–50; Jn. 18:1–11)

The garden of Gethsemane was at the foot of the Mount of Olives. Conscious of the temptations surrounding them all, Jesus urged his disciples to pray. Then he withdrew by himself and prayed that, if possible, the cup of suffering and wrath (cf. Is. 51:22; Mk. 10:38) which lay ahead of him might be averted. Nevertheless, as an obedient Son, he put himself freely at his Father's disposal. After intense strain he rose to find his disciples asleep, and again he urged them to pray. Only the one who had prayed remained strong during the next few hours. As he was speaking the betrayer—contemptuously designated as the man who was called Judas—arrived with the officials appointed to keep peace in the temple and gave his traitorous greeting. The disciples realized what was about to happen; one of the two swords (38) was promptly produced and used. Jesus, however, restrained his disciples and then turned to the mob: Was this the way to arrest a peaceable teacher? Truly the hour of evil's sway had come!

Notes. 40 Since the place was one that Jesus was visiting as usual (39), Judas would know where to find him. 43–44 These verses are omitted by some of the best MSS, which would normally be ample reason for thinking that they were an addition to the text; but their language is Lucan, and they may well be genuine. Jesus' sweat was like blood in the size of the drops rather than in colour.

22:54–71 The Jewish trial (see Mt. 26:57–75; Mk. 14:53–72; cf. Jn. 18:12–27)

Jesus was taken first to the high priest's residence which was used for official business. There would be rooms grouped round a central courtyard, as in other wealthy homes in the Roman world. The fact that Peter came from Galilee, as his accent showed (Mt. 26:73), was taken as evidence of his being an associate of Jesus. In justifiable fear for his life Peter yielded to temptation. Luke alone records how Jesus gave him a searching glance, and Peter, full of remorse, broke down completely.

Meanwhile, Jesus had his own load to bear. He was reputed to be a prophet, and prophets were popularly supposed to have second sight and similar powers. Very well then, let him prove it in a grim game of blind man's buff for the amusement of the guards.

At daybreak the Sanhedrin was hastily brought together and Jesus was led before it. The preliminary questioning was passed over, and Luke comes straight to the decisive question: Did Jesus claim to be the Messiah? At first he hesitated to reply, for his hearers would not have believed what he himself said, and they would not answer if he was to ask them what they thought. Yet he did declare that from now onwards the Son of Man would be seated at God's right hand. This made them ask whether he was in effect claiming to be the Son of God. ‘That is your way of putting it’, said Jesus. This was taken as his assent, and it was judged to be blasphemy.

Mark describes a lengthy trial by night in the high priest’s house. At this substantially the same dialogue as is recorded in Luke took place, and it was then followed by a brief meeting of the Sanhedrin in the morning. Luke says nothing about the trial at night but sticks to what happened in the morning. Two things are clear—that there was an unofficial session at night in the high priest’s house (which Luke omits altogether), and that an official meeting of the Sanhedrin (which Mark passes over hurriedly) took place in the morning, at which the earlier decisions were confirmed. It is not certain whether the reported dialogue actually took place only at night, or was repeated briefly in the morning. (Since both evangelists are telescoping the narrative, they recorded the conversation in the most convenient place.) This explains why Peter’s denial and the mockery by the servants are recorded before the morning trial in Luke and after the night trial in Mark.

Notes. 60 A literal cock-crowing is meant, not the Roman bugle call at 3 a.m. (which was known as gallicinium, ‘cock-crowing’). 69–70 Mark has one question to Jesus and one answer; Luke has two of each, thus separating the titles of Christ, Son of Man and Son of God. In Mark Jesus says that his judges will see the Son of Man sitting at God’s right hand and coming as the judge, but in Luke he speaks of the present enthronement of the Son of Man. The two accounts are, however, complementary. The sitting of the Son of Man at God’s right hand as judge implies that he has been previously exalted to that position, which is stressed more by Luke. Note how Jesus substitutes ‘Son of Man’ for the title of ‘Christ’ (9:20–22). 71 The charge made against Jesus was thus that he claimed to be the Messiah or the Son of God. Probably the latter was regarded as a title for the Messiah, or else something that Jesus had said privately to his disciples about being God’s Son had leaked out (via Judas?). To claim to sit at God’s right hand was blasphemy (Mk. 14:64).

23:1–25 The Roman trial

23:1–5 Jesus before Pilate (see Mt. 27:1–2, 11–14; Mk. 15:1–5; cf. Jn. 18:28–38). Since the Jews had in general no power to carry out a death sentence (Jn. 18:31), it was necessary to take the case before the Roman authorities. A Roman governor would not listen to ‘questions about words and names and your own [Jewish] law’ (Acts 18:14–15), and therefore the charge against Jesus had to be rephrased as one of sedition against Rome. Of the two specific charges made, the first was false (cf. 20:25), but the second was true, although not in the sense in which the Jews meant it (cf. Jn. 18:36–37). So, when Pilate asked Jesus if he claimed to be a king, he answered in a non-committal way. Pilate would have questioned Jesus more closely before reaching his verdict that there were no grounds for a political charge against him.

Notes. Although Pilate normally resided in the administrative capital of Caesarea (cf. Acts 23:33; not to be confused with Caesarea Philippi, Mk. 8:27), he visited Jerusalem at the Passover season—as also did Herod. 2 King explains the meaning of Christ for Romans.

23:6–12 Jesus before Herod. Pilate was trying to avoid settling a difficult case. The mention of Galilee (5) gave him his opportunity. He knew well enough that Jesus had committed no crime, and he seems to have deliberately played with the Jews as he tried to frustrate their intention. But when the situation showed signs of getting out of control, he was prepared to sacrifice an innocent person in order to keep the peace. For the moment, however, he could buy time, and possibly support, by sending Jesus across to the ruler of Galilee, Herod Antipas. Herod is presented as a frivolous person, hoping to see some amusing tricks performed by one whom he probably regarded as some kind of magician. To such a person Jesus had nothing to say.

Notes. 6–7 Pilate was not necessarily trying to get the case officially transferred to Herod. He may simply have been seeking backing for his own opinion. Some scholars hold that the incident has been fabricated from Acts. 4:25–26, but this is unlikely. See also on 9:9. 10 Some of the Jewish leaders must have gone across to Herod's residence to ensure that he heard their side of the case. 11 The mockery is similar to that carried out by Pilate's soldiers (Mk. 15:16–20), but one set of troops could easily have copied the other's example. Similar stories are related of mockery of other prisoners in the ancient world.

23:13–25 The sentence of death (see Mt. 27:15–26; Mk. 15:6–15; Jn. 18:38–19:16). Pilate perhaps hoped that the people (13) would side with him in resisting the Jewish leaders when he delivered his verdict. No doubt the prisoner had been something of a public nuisance, but a scourging would be a sufficient punishment for this. The crowd, however, had been swayed by the priests, and they shouted for Barabbas, a well-known revolutionary, to be released instead of Jesus. Pilate was naturally not willing to release a dangerous man (as well as to condemn an innocent one). But he thought it wiser to yield to the intensity of the demonstration. A later Jewish ruler is said to have characterized Pilate as 'inflexible, merciless and obstinate'. This is borne out by his behaviour here; for the common view that he showed vacillation and weakness is an understatement. At the end of the day Pilate showed no mercy, let alone justice, to an innocent man.

Notes. 16 Punish means 'scourge'. Scourging was a penalty in itself or the preliminary to crucifixion (Mk. 15:15). 18 Luke does not explain what led the people to ask for Barabbas. The other gospels explain the custom of releasing a prisoner at Passover, and this explanation has been added here by later scribes in v 17 (which the NIV rightly omits from the text).

23:26–49 The crucifixion of Jesus (see Mt. 27:32–56; Mk. 15:21–41; Jn. 19:17–30)

Usually the condemned man himself carried the crossbar of the gallows to the place of execution (cf. Jn. 19:17). Behind Jesus (26) may be a deliberate echo of 9:23; 14:27. A crowd always attended executions out of curiosity or compassion. The women among them raised a death-wail for Jesus, but he raised, as it were, a death-wail in pity for Jerusalem and its people. Let them mourn rather for themselves, for a day would come when they would regret having borne children who were to endure terrible suffering, and they would long for some catastrophe in nature to put an end to their sufferings (cf. Ho. 10:8; Rev. 6:16). For if this was how the Romans treated an innocent person, Jesus, how much worse would be the fate of guilty Jerusalem.

After being crucified between two criminals (cf. Is. 53:9, 12), Jesus' first recorded words in this gospel were a prayer for forgiveness for his executioners. The division of the dead man's clothes among the executioners was a recognized custom; it may have been specially recorded because Christians saw a correspondence to Ps. 22:18. Meanwhile the rulers sneered at Jesus with unconscious irony; the Christian reader knows that it was in fact his death which decisively showed that Jesus was the Christ and the Saviour. The soldiers also joined in the mockery, making use of the words in the titulus or charge-sheet, nailed on the cross. Even one of the criminals repeated the same taunt. Only Luke tells how the other criminal, perhaps after taunting Jesus at first, uttered a confession of his own sin and of Jesus' innocence. His last-minute faith was accepted and he was promised a place in Paradise with the justified instead of in Sheol with the condemned.

From noon (the sixth hour, v 44, by Roman and Jewish reckoning) there was darkness for three hours. The Greek word used need not mean an eclipse of the sun, and cannot in fact mean one here, since it was the Passover season and therefore full moon (eclipses occur only at new moon). The cause of the darkness was perhaps a dust-laden wind (known as a sirocco), which might have been strong enough to split the curtain of the temple. This seems to have had a symbolic meaning, but the evangelists do not state what it was. It may have been seen as a prophecy of the forthcoming destruction of the temple or as an indication that the way into God's presence was now open for all people (Heb. 9:8–14; 10:19–20).

At the ninth hour (3 p.m.) Jesus committed himself into God's hands with the words of Ps. 31:5. The way in which he died led the centurion to praise God. His words reflected his belief that Jesus was innocent, and possibly suggested that Jesus was enduring the frequent fate of righteous people—undeserved suffering (cf. Wisdom 2:12–20). But why did he praise God? Was it because God had sustained Jesus to die nobly after living nobly? The final comment emphasizes that Jesus' friends saw him really die.

Notes. 33 The place called the Skull (Aramaic Golgotha) was probably near the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the north of the city. The skull-shaped hill known as Gordon's Calvary has no real evidence in its favour. 34a This verse is omitted by a significant number of early MSS, but it should be retained either as a genuine part of what Luke wrote (cf. Acts 7:60) or as a reliable piece of tradition that found its way into some MSS. It would have been omitted by scribes who felt that the prayer was unseemly or was not answered. 36 This action seems to be distinct from the kind act in Mk. 15:36. Wine vinegar was a cheap drink used by soldiers. 39–40 Here, as elsewhere, Luke had access to traditions not recorded in Mark. It is unnecessary to suppose that the criminal's words were sarcastic, still less that the whole incident is legendary. 42 When you come in your kingdom means 'when you return as king'. 43 Paradise is the resting place of the redeemed before the final judgment, and is opened to those who trust in Jesus. 47 For a righteous man Mark has 'the Son of God'. Luke's paraphrase may be due to a wish to avoid giving the impression that the centurion thought of Jesus in pagan terms as some kind of demi-god.

23:50–56 The burial of Jesus (see Mt. 27:57–61; Mk. 15:42–47; Jn. 19:38–42)

The bodies of the crucified criminals were usually left hanging and then cast into a common grave, but an archaeological find in 1957 showed the remains of a person who had been crucified and then buried in a private grave. Joseph wrapped the body, according to Jewish custom, in a shroud and placed it in a new grave. Jewish graves were caves, natural or man-made, in the sides of hills, large enough for a person to enter to tend the dead bodies, and closed by a sliding stone across the entrance. Joseph, however, did not embalm the body, and the women from Galilee decided to repair this omission as soon as possible after the Sabbath which they observed in the normal manner.

Notes. 51 Arimathea was about 20 miles (32 km) north-west of Jerusalem on the border between Judea and Samaria. 51 Since all Jews were waiting for the kingdom of God, the phrase here must mean that Joseph held the particular form of expectation taught by Jesus and lived in accordance with it. 52 Death by crucifixion was normally slow and drawn-out; Luke does not mention Pilate's surprise at the rapid death of Jesus. 54 Preparation Day for the weekly Sabbath extended from sunset on Thursday to sunset on Friday. Was about to begin (lit. ‘was dawning’) usually refers to sunrise, but here seems to refer to sunset or the time when the lamps were lit.

24:1–53 The resurrection of Jesus

24:1–12 The empty tomb (cf. Mt. 28:1–10; Mk. 16:1–8; Jn. 20:1–10). The two men, clothed in the shining garments associated with heavenly beings (cf. 9:29), gently criticized the women for expecting to find in the tomb one who had prophesied his resurrection from the dead (9:22; 18:33). The naming of the women (10) is perhaps meant to identify them as credible witnesses.

Not surprisingly the historicity of the story has often been questioned. It has been suggested, for example, that in fact the women went to the wrong tomb, but it is incredible that both they and the later visitors could have been mistaken on this point. Or it is argued that, although the stories of ‘resurrection appearances’ may be broadly historical, the story of the empty tomb developed later and is legendary. But the tradition of the empty tomb is probably implied in so early an account as 1 Cor. 15:3–7, and the NT understanding of the resurrection is of a bodily resurrection. To hold that the bones of Jesus remain buried in Palestine is to hold a different understanding of the resurrection from that in the NT and rests on sheer supposition.

Yet, even if the basic story of the empty tomb and the appearances is accepted, it is still difficult to harmonize the various accounts with one another, just as would be the case with some modern, shattering, event which had been seen by different witnesses. This absolves the witnesses from any charge of collusion with one another, but it does leave some loose ends untied. (For an attempt to deal with the problem, see J. Wenham, Easter Enigma [Paternoster Press, 1984].)

Notes. 1 The mention of several women stands in contrast to the visit of Mary Magdalene by herself to the tomb in Jn. 20:1–10. Two or more separate stories may have been telescoped in Luke’s account. 3 Here and in a number of places in this chapter (5, 12, 36, 40, 51, 52) a number of phrases are omitted by some MSS and hence in some English versions. The NIV rightly includes them, as the evidence for omission is slender. 4 Mark mentions only one young man, and his words are rather different. In particular, Luke does not have the command to the disciples to go to Galilee (Mk. 16:7; cf. Mk. 14:28). He has probably omitted it because he does not describe any appearances in Galilee. 9 The statement in Mk. 16:8 that the women said nothing to anybody out of fear does not contradict what is said here. Mark probably meant that they said nothing immediately to anybody except the Eleven. 12 See Jn. 20:1–10.

24:13–35 The walk to Emmaus (cf. Mk. 16:12–13). V 16 means that God prevented the two disciples from recognizing Jesus, not that he had a different form (though see Mk. 16:12). By pretending to be ignorant he learned what had saddened them and that his tomb was rumoured to be empty. They were sure that Jesus had been a prophet (the most that Jesus can be to those who do not believe in his resurrection). They had expected him to be the redeemer of Israel, but they could not understand how he had been rejected by the rulers. They remembered that there had been a prophecy of his resurrection on the third day, but they had not heard of anybody seeing him. Jesus replied that suffering was a necessary prelude to the Messiah’s entry into kingly glory, and he pointed them to the scriptures which prophesied this (see on 18:31). The language used to describe how he took the bread, gave thanks to God, broke it and shared it with them is inescapably reminiscent—at least to Luke’s readers—of that describing the actions of Jesus at the feeding miracles and the Last Supper (9:16; 22:19; Mk. 8:6). Whether or not the two disciples were reminded of these events (were they present at any of them?), it was as though a veil fell from their eyes and they recognized Jesus. They realized that even earlier, while Jesus was speaking to them on the road, they had felt a strange elation. Immediately they rose to go all the way back to Jerusalem to tell the others. The brief summary in Mk. 16:12f. (which is not a genuine part of the text of the gospel) says that the disciples did not believe them, but this refers to their incredulity and disbelief later in the story (vs 37, 41).

Notes. 13 Emmaus is often identified with el-Qubeibeh, some 7 miles (11 km) north-west of Jerusalem, but Amwas (modern Nicopolis), some 18 miles (31 km) north-west is perhaps more likely. (If so, we should follow those MSS of Luke which give the distance as 160 stadia.) 18 Cleopas may be the Clopas of Jn. 19:25. His unnamed companion could have been his wife, but we have no means of telling. 21 The disciples knew that Jesus had spoken about something important happening on the third day, and that his tomb was supposed to be empty. But this was not adequate evidence for his resurrection: that could be provided only by the appearance of the Lord himself. 27 The Jewish Scriptures consisted of three parts: the Law of Moses (Genesis–Deuteronomy); the Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel–2 Kings, and the prophets [except for Daniel]); and the Writings (all the other books in the OT). The omission of the third group here (contrast v 44) is not significant; the OT writings are here being described in terms of their prophetic content rather than listed. 34 For the appearance to Simon see 1 Cor. 15:5.

24:36–53 Jesus appears again to the disciples (cf. Mt. 28:16–20; Mk. 16:14–20; Jn. 20:19–23). The disciples needed to be convinced that they were seeing a real person and that it really was Jesus, and to have their fears at this supernatural manifestation calmed. Jesus therefore showed them his physical body of flesh and bones, and his hands and feet with the nail-prints in them. To give further proof of the reality of his presence he ate some food while he was with them.

There is a repetition of the instruction given to the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, so as to enable all the disciples to understand the OT prophecies of the coming of Jesus. Two new factors are introduced. The command to preach repentance and forgiveness to all the nations was issued—and shown to be based on OT prophecy. Those who had been witnesses of his resurrection appearances (a larger group than the Eleven) were promised that God's power would enable them to testify to Jesus.

Finally, Jesus led them out of Jerusalem to Bethany where he gave them a parting blessing and was then carried away from them into heaven. They returned to Jerusalem and waited there in joyful expectation of the fulfilment of his promise.

Notes. 36–53 The story bears resemblances not only to that in Jn. 20:19–23 but also to that in Mt. 28:16–20 where Jesus appears to the disciples in Galilee and gives them his last instructions. There is no great problem about Jesus appearing to his disciples both in Jerusalem (as in Luke, Acts and Jn 20) and in Galilee (as in Mt. and Jn. 21). The final appearance in Mt. 28 is not the ascension, and it is possible that Jesus repeated his commands more than once to the disciples.

The narrative could be taken to imply that the resurrection and ascension both happened on the same day, Easter Sunday. But this would contradict Luke's further account in Acts 1. It follows that what is here described briefly and compactly must have taken place over a longer period. 43 The description of the risen Jesus in strongly physical terms embarrasses some readers, but if the incarnation involved the Son of God taking on real flesh and bones, it is hard to see why his resurrection body should not incorporate this quality. 47 For prophecy of the preaching to the Gentiles see Is. 2:3; 42:6; 49:6; 51:4–5; Rom. 15:9–12. 50 Bethany lay at the foot of the Mount of Olives (cf. Acts 1:12). 53 Continually should not be taken too literally (cf. 2:37), as Acts 1:13–14 shows.

I. Howard Marshall

JOHN

Introduction

Authorship

There has been much discussion about who wrote this gospel. There is space here for only a brief outline of the main issues.

a. There is a very strong tradition, supported by early evidence from patristic sources, that the author was the apostle John. There are no specific references to the identity of the author in the gospel itself. So how dependable is the tradition? At least as early as Irenaeus (c. AD 130–200) there was belief in the apostolic authorship. Irenaeus may have had access to authentic tradition through his earlier acquaintance with Polycarp (c. mid-second century), who knew the apostle. The fact that Polycarp did not refer to the fourth gospel when writing his letter to the Philippians need not lead to the conclusion that he was ignorant of it. The sole opposition to the apostolic authorship came from a group known as the Alogoi, who appear to have been a small splinter group in Rome. Their view was opposed by Hyppolytus who wrote a defence of the gospel. The history of the book before Irenaeus is not easy to determine, but it must have been regarded as authoritative for some considerable time to have been placed indisputably on a level with the other three as part of the fourfold gospel.

b. Some internal considerations point to the reliability of the tradition (e.g. 1:14; 19:35; 21:24). Although all of these references have been otherwise understood by some scholars, it is most natural to see them as evidence of the author's own claim to have been an eyewitness.

John, the son of Zebedee, is nowhere mentioned by name in the gospel, while John the Baptist is named simply as John without further description. This would certainly be more intelligible if the author were himself the other John.

A further consideration is the anonymous mention of the 'disciple whom Jesus loved', which may well be a reference to John the apostle. Some have disputed that John would have described himself in this way and have concluded from this that John the apostle was not the author. It is impossible to be sure who 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' was, but his close association with Peter would support the view that he was John. His very close association with Jesus in the upper room points to the same conclusion.

c. The author appears to possess detailed knowledge of Palestine and of Jewish customs. This would be most intelligible if he were a Palestinian Jew.

d. Many incidental details also suggest that an eyewitness account lies behind the gospel, e.g. the number of waterjars at Cana and the number of the fish caught in the Sea of Galilee. Such details are not essential to the narrative but add a certain vividness to the account.

e. The Hellenistic (Greek) aspects of this gospel are, nevertheless, said to militate against the correctness of the early tradition, since John the apostle was not a Hellenistic Jew. Moreover, parallels with the non-Christian philosophical tractates known as the Hermetica are said to support this contention. There are certainly parallels in terminology with both Philo of Alexandria and Hermes, but this factor does not conclusively show that the author was a Hellenist. Some similar parallels in thought are found also in the Jewish literature at Qumran, and this evidence has tended to lessen the strength of the Hellenistic argument.

f. The close acquaintance of the author with rabbinical methods of argument is another reason why some have rejected apostolic authorship, since John was a Galilean fisherman. But due allowance must be made for the fact that the rabbinical arguments are found in the teaching of Jesus, not in the author's own comments. It is admittedly difficult, however, in this gospel, always to differentiate between the author's style and the words of Jesus.

g. The evangelist appears to adopt an almost hostile attitude towards some of Jesus' contemporaries, as if they were a race apart from himself, referring to them as 'the Jews'. This may be evidence of the deep feeling of a Jewish Christian over the bitter hostility of his own people towards Jesus.

h. Alternative theories regarding authorship generally attempt to retain some connection of John the apostle with the gospel by regarding him as the witness, while proposing someone else as author. The most widely held theory is that the author was another John, known as John the elder. If there were two Johns so closely associated in the production of the gospel, it is not impossible that confusion may have arisen between them in the early tradition. But the existence of John the elder depends on a somewhat ambiguous statement of Papias, who makes no mention in any case of a gospel being written by him.

i. Some deny all connection of John the apostle with the gospel and suppose that it was attributed to him to gain authority for the work.

In face of all these various opinions it is difficult to be dogmatic, but it is reasonable to suppose that the internal and external evidence points to John the apostle as author.

Purpose

We cannot do better than examine the author's own statement of purpose in 20:31, which was specifically evangelistic. The gospel was aimed to produce faith in Jesus as Christ and Son of God. The record of the various signs was intended to produce this result, and with this in mind the many references throughout the gospel to believing and non-believing become significant. Both the historical narratives and the teaching discourses were chosen because of their power to focus attention on the specific claims of Jesus. John has no thought, therefore, of producing a biographical or psychological study. An evangelistic purpose does not, of course, weaken the historical truth. To be effective the theological motive needs an authentic historical basis. John may have regarded some of his material as possessing symbolic significance, but again, this does not mean that it is unhistorical or untrue.

There may have been some subsidiary aims, such as the presentation of the true relationship between Jesus and John the Baptist, or a refutation of Docetic views about Christ (i.e. theories which drew a distinction between the heavenly Christ and the human Jesus).

Many believe the gospel to be a presentation of Christianity in a Hellenised form. The prologue (1:1–18) may seem to lend support to this theory. But the crucial factor is the extent to which the prologue determines the purpose of the gospel as a whole. It is better to suppose that the body of the gospel supplies the key to the understanding of the prologue, rather than vice versa. The teaching of Jesus was sufficiently comprehensive to be understood by Greek as well as Jew.

The relation to the synoptic gospels

A comparison with the other gospels shows a marked difference in John in the substance and in the method of presentation. A large amount of material included in the others is lacking in John, whereas a considerable amount of the Johannine material is absent from the synoptics. In fact, there is little material common to all four gospels, apart from the passion narrative. A major difference is that whereas the synoptics concentrate on the Galilean ministry, John fixes his attention on the Jerusalem ministry. This could perhaps account for the differences in the style in Jesus' teaching, the emphasis on parables in the synoptics giving way to the dialogue and discourse style of John. Certain historical differences have also been noted, such as the setting of the cleansing of the temple, the events which led to the arrest of Jesus, the duration of the ministry and the date of the Last Supper. So some have concluded that John aims to correct and supersede the synoptics. This is difficult to maintain, for on many occasions he assumes knowledge of the synoptic traditions as a basis for his own. It is better to regard John as complementary to the synoptics. The most difficult difference between them then is the chronology of the passion events. The solution may lie in the use of different calendars by John and the synoptics, but we do not know enough to arrive at a completely satisfying answer.

It may at first seem that John's presentation of Jesus differs so completely from that of the synoptics that both portraits cannot be of the same person. But this would be a wrong inference. When we consider the different purposes of the gospels, and the different types of people to whom Jesus spoke, the contrast is more intelligible. It is likely that John was himself drawn to the more reflective style of the discourses.

Date and place of writing

It is not clear whether traces of John's gospel can be found in writers before the time of Irenaeus (c. AD 130–200). But there is good ground for supposing that Justin (c. AD 150) knew and used the gospel and a possibility that Ignatius (c. AD 115) also knew it. Apart from references in the early fathers there are two early second-century papyrus MSS which show the existence and circulation of this gospel. One contains a scrap of John's gospel and the other echoes the language of this and the other gospels. It is impossible, therefore, to date John beyond the end of the first century. If the apostle was the author, a date a few years before the end of the century would almost certainly be required as the latest possible date. Since this gospel must have come after the synoptic gospels, a date fairly late in the first century is generally preferred (c. AD 90), although some have suggested an earlier date. It is impossible to be anything more than tentative.

As for the place of origin, tradition has it that John lived in Ephesus, and there seems to be no real grounds for disputing this. Some suggest not only that this Ephesus tradition is unreliable, but also that John did not live to old age. The evidence which is claimed to support this view consists of scanty and none-too-reliable clues that John died a martyr's death much earlier than the gospel could have been written. But the tradition of his long life and of his writing the gospel is much stronger.

Theology

The most significant feature of John's theology is his presentation of Christ. It has already been pointed out that his major purpose was theological, and indeed Christological. The focus of attention is on Jesus' Messiahship and Sonship. The Messianic status of Jesus more than once formed the topic of discussion among the Jews (7:26–27; 10:24). Moreover, three times in this gospel there are recorded confessions of the Messiahship of Jesus (1:41; 4:29; 11:27). To the author Jesus was the fulfilment of all the Messianic hopes of the Jewish people. In full harmony with this is the frequent appeal to the OT testimony.

Jesus as Son of God is far more characteristic of this gospel. Many times does Jesus bring out his own filial relationship with the Father. Whereas this aspect is not absent from the synoptics, it is specially noteworthy in John because of the frequent occurrence of the term 'Son' without further description. The plan of salvation was effected by the Father through the Son. It was through love for the world that God sent his Son (3:16). The Son is the agent through whom the Father reveals himself (1:18). The claim of Jesus to be the Son of God was the basis of the charge before Pilate that according to Jewish law he ought to die (19:7).

The most characteristic feature of the synoptic gospels is Jesus as Son of Man. Although this is not quite so prominent in John, it is still basic to his presentation. It is the Son of Man who not only reveals the Father but who will be lifted up (3:13–14). This process of lifting up will result in the glorification of the Son of Man (12:23). Moreover, there are many indications of the perfect humanity of Jesus in this gospel. He experienced human emotion, hunger, thirst and tiredness. The exalted Christology is never allowed to detract from the perfect humanity of Jesus.

In the prologue the pre-existence and deity of Christ are explicitly expressed. The Word (Gk. logos) was not only with God in the beginning, but was God (1:1), and it was this Word who became flesh and is identified with Christ. Whatever the origins of the idea of the Word for the author, his own Christology is clear. His subject is not a mere man but the pre-existent Son who shared with the Father the creation of the world (1:3).

A further feature of the Johannine Christology is the number of statements of Jesus introduced by the significant 'I am'. In this manner he described himself as 'the Way', 'the Truth', 'the Life', 'the Resurrection', 'the Bread', 'the Shepherd', 'the Door', 'the Vine'. All of these titles explain different aspects of what Jesus came to be and to do for humankind.

There are many figures of speech used to describe the nature of the work of Christ. The sacrificial lamb (1:29), the temple of his body (2:21), the serpent in the wilderness (3:14), the shepherd giving his life for his sheep (10:11), the grain of wheat (12:24). The death of Jesus was even recognized as expedient by the high priest, but John sees a deeper meaning in it than Caiaphas (11:51). There is throughout the gospel a sense of the inevitable as Jesus' 'hour' draws gradually nearer.

A further important factor in Johannine theology is the frequent mention of the Holy Spirit. His work in regeneration (3:5–8), his promised outpouring following the glorification of Jesus

(7:37–39), and the five sayings about him in the farewell discourses (chs. 14–16) are all found only in John’s gospel. He is described as Counsellor, as dwelling in the believer, as the teacher, as a witness to Christ, as convictor of the world and as guide into all truth for Christ’s people. Of all the gospels John shows most clearly that the continuation of the ministry of Jesus would be through the agency of the Spirit.

In addition, we may note several other features which occur in John’s thought. There is a strong OT background. There is no specific reference to the Lord’s Supper, but there is teaching which bears upon it (ch. 6). There is also a mixture of stress on God’s action in choosing and human responsibility in responding. This a gospel which richly contributes to the theology of the NT as a whole. Although its language is often simple, its thought is profound. In its use of powerful symbolism and in its reflectiveness, John’s gospel appeals to many modern Christians.

See also the article Reading the gospels.

Further reading

B. Milne, The Message of John, BST (IVP, 1993).

F. F. Bruce, The Gospel of John (Pickering and Inglis/Eerdmans, 1983).

D. A. Carson, The Gospel according to John (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1991).

L. Morris, The Gospel according to John, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1971).

Outline of contents

1:1–18

The prologue

1:1–5	The pre-existent Word
1:6–8	The witness of John the Baptist
1:9–13	The light coming to the world
1:14–18	The incarnation of the Word

1:19–2:11

Introductory events

1:19–34	The witness of John the Baptist to Jesus
1:35–51	The calling of the first disciples
2:1–11	Revelation through a sign

2:12–4:54Early encounters in Jerusalem, Samaria and Galilee

2:12–25	The cleansing of the temple
3:1–21	The new birth
3:22–4:3	Jesus and John the Baptist
4:4–42	Jesus in Samaria
4:43–54	A second miracle in Galilee

5:1–47Healing and discourse in Jerusalem

5:1–18	The healing of a lame man
5:19–47	Revelations of the Father and the Son

6:1–71Further signs and discourses in Galilee

6:1–15	The feeding of the crowds
6:16–24	Jesus walks on the water
6:25–59	Discussions about the bread of life
6:60–71	The disciples' reactions to Jesus' teaching and work

7:1–8:59Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles

7:1–9	Jesus moves from Galilee to Jerusalem
-------	---------------------------------------

7:10–52	The teaching of Jesus at the Feast
7:53–8:11	The woman caught in adultery
8:12–59	Jesus as the light of the world

9:1–10:42

Further healing and teaching

9:1–41	Jesus heals a man born blind
10:1–18	Jesus as the shepherd
10:19–21	The effects of this teaching
10:22–42	Dialogue at the Feast of Dedication

11:1–57

The death and raising of Lazarus

11:1–44	Jesus the overcomer of death
11:45–57	The results of the miracle

12:1–50

Close of the public ministry in Jerusalem

12:1–8	The devotion of Mary
12:9–11	Reactions to Jesus' presence at Bethany
12:12–19	The entry into Jerusalem
12:20–26	The quest of the Greeks
12:27–36	Attestation and withdrawal
12:37–50	Continuing unbelief

13:1–17:26

Jesus with his disciples

13:1–38	Jesus' symbolic action of feet-washing and its sequel
14:1–31	Assurances and commands to the disciples
15:1–17	The vine allegory
15:18–16:33	Further teaching for the disciples
17:1–26	The prayer of Jesus

18:1–21:25

Passion and resurrection narratives

18:1–11	The betrayal
18:12–19:16	The trial
19:17–37	The crucifixion
19:38–42	The burial
20:1–29	The resurrection
20:30–21:25	The epilogue

Commentary

1:1–18 The prologue

This gospel, unlike the others, does not begin with the historical Jesus. Instead, the reader is introduced at once to the Word (Gk. logos), who is not identified with Jesus until the end of the prologue. It is of great importance to consider the meaning of the Word as a key to an understanding of the whole gospel. The term was widely used in Greek literature, and many scholars have supposed that its significance for John can be understood only against such a background. It was used among the Stoics to describe the principle of divine reason which caused the natural creation to grow. This idea was much more fully developed in the writings of Philo of Alexandria, who used it of the instrument through which the world was created. Although there may appear to be some parallels with John's use of the term, there are crucial differences. Philo never thought of the Word as a person, nor did he maintain its pre-existence to the world. But the most striking and significant difference between Philo and John is that the former denied the incarnation of the Word, whereas John specifically maintained that the Word became flesh. Some scholars have found parallels between John's use and the syncretistic philosophical literature current in the early centuries of the Christian era known as the Hermetica, but the essential thought is quite different. Greek thought may have supplied some of the terminology that John uses, but for the basic ideas we must look elsewhere.

There is much more to be said for the similarity of thought between John's use and that of certain ideas in the OT. Jewish thought contributed a major dimension to the Word idea. In the Wisdom Literature we find an emphasis on the creative activity of God through his Word of Wisdom (cf. Pr. 8). Closely linked to this is the rabbinic practice of attributing to the Torah (Law) some agency in creation. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls led to a more sympathetic appreciation of the contribution of Jewish thought for an understanding of John's gospel.

The prologue, nevertheless, must be considered on its own merits. It is essentially Christian, designed to prepare the way for the record of the activities of a unique person. The gospel itself must furnish the key for the understanding of the Prologue, not vice versa. A careful analysis of the gospel will show how integral the prologue is with the recurrent themes of the gospel.

1:1–5 The pre-existent Word

The opening words of this gospel bear a striking parallel with the opening words of Genesis. John's own particular contribution is to show that the Word existed before creation. This is implicit in the opening words In the beginning was the Word. Although the verb is used in the past tense, the idea is of continuity. The Word that now is was in existence before the world began. This at once introduces a profound theme, made more profound by the subsequent two statements. The Greek preposition translated with suggests the idea of communion. The thought is lit. 'towards God', which requires some distinctiveness between God and the Word. But the next phrase adds a further aspect, since it affirms that the Word was God. This cannot be understood in an adjectival sense (the Word was divine), which would weaken the statement. Since the Greek has no article before God, the term must be taken setting out a characteristic of the Word. Since God is a noun, John must be affirming the Godhead of the Word. It involves not only divinity but deity.

John at once proceeds to declare the creative activity of the Word. The Greek focuses attention on the agency of the Word. This idea is further underlined by excluding all possibility of creation apart from the Word. The close association between God and the Word in v 1 is also seen in their part in creation. The part taken by Christ in creation is a theme which recurs many times in the NT. Such an emphasis would exclude gnostic ideas of intermediaries within creation which were designed to protect God from contamination with an essentially evil world. John's further assertion that the Word was life is a logical sequence from his creative activity. This idea is basic to this gospel and is highlighted in the statement of purpose in 20:31, that the readers might have life in him.

The close connection between life and light is not unexpected. In the physical world life is dependent on light, and this idea is here transferred to the spiritual world. The statement in v 5 must be interpreted by the mention of light in v 4. There it is an illumination which comes to everyone generally and would seem to refer to the light of conscience and reason. In v 5, however, the focus falls on the environment which is described as darkness. The light, which is closely linked with the Word, must be regarded as personal. It must mean the spiritual enlightenment which humankind has received exclusively through the coming of the Word. The following statement, but the darkness has not understood it, could be translated as ‘has not overcome it’. Both interpretations express a truth, and both are illustrated in the body of the gospel. But the former fits the context better, especially in the light of vs 10–11.

1:6–8 The witness of John the Baptist

The thought now moves nearer to the historical events which surrounded the coming of the light by mentioning the ministry of John the Baptist. We are at once assured that this ministry was divinely appointed (6). The verb sent is characteristic of this gospel in describing the ministry of Jesus. It is fitting that it should also be applied to the herald. It may be that some of the original readers of this gospel were putting too much emphasis on the importance of John the Baptist (cf. Acts 19:3–4) and that John was aiming to rectify any misunderstandings at the outset (cf. also vs 15, 26–27). Not only is it expressly denied that John himself was the light, but his function as witness to the light is twice affirmed (7–8). The purpose, so that through him all men might believe, expresses the function of all true Christian witness, from that day to this.

1:9–13 The light coming to the world

The author switches from the witness to the subject of the witness as being the most important. The true light (9) is the Word, which has not yet been identified as Jesus. The coming refers to the incarnation. This is more intelligible than the alternative rendering, which connects the coming to every person (as the NIV mg.), which would give the impression that everyone receives this light at the time of birth. Before Christ’s coming light certainly existed but this was derived light. Christ is the central source of light as he himself claimed (cf. 8:12).

It should be noted that when John uses the word world he is meaning more than the created world. The term is widely used of people as created beings who are opposed to God. In fact in this gospel there is a distinction between those who believe and the world that does not believe. The statement that the world did not recognise him (10) shows that in John’s mind there is no question of dualism here. The moral responsibility rests with those who reject the light.

The translation of v 11 has led to various ideas. One is that the Word came into what rightly belonged to him. Another is that the Word came to his own home, i.e. his own people, Israel. Both are true, but in view of the fact that the words are masculine it is most probable that the second translation is to be preferred. For the author believing and receiving are identical.

Vs 12–13 are to be seen as modifying the previous verses. There were some who received the Word, and John now focuses on these. Believers receive the power to become children of God in the sense of God’s covenant people. John is not talking of natural descent (13). There is here an allusion to the new birth, which recurs more explicitly in ch. 3. Since spiritual birth is different from physical birth, John excludes sexual means (human decision, a husband’s will).

1:14–18 The incarnation of the Word

This concluding part of the prologue leads into the account of the historical life of Jesus, hence the Word is said to have become flesh. The most significant thing about this statement is the emphasis on the word flesh, which is used as a symbol of humanity. The statement, however, is more striking than if John had written ‘the Word took on the form of humanity’. Flesh draws attention to the entry of the Word into the full flow of human affairs. The divine Word had become the human Jesus. The phrase made his dwelling among us uses a word which means ‘tabernacled’ and carries with it reminiscences of God dwelling among his people in the tabernacle in the wilderness. The dwelling is clearly seen as temporary. But John is anxious to make clear that the stupendous coming of the Word into human life was fully witnessed. John had been an eyewitness of the glory of the earthly life of Jesus (14b). This is more likely than to suppose that the we refers to Christians generally, and that the glory is the glory of Jesus after the resurrection. The context requires that there were some who actually saw the glory of the incarnated Word. An allusion to the transfiguration may be intended, but it is more likely that the glory refers to the whole ministry of Jesus. The distinctiveness of the glory is seen in the description of the the One and Only, who received the kind of glory which could be bestowed only by a loving Father on a beloved Son. The uniqueness of Jesus is thus seen at the outset of the gospel. But it is not merely his coming from the Father but the fact that he is the source of grace and truth which is most significant. John intends us to see in the ministry of Jesus an expression of God’s grace and a revelation of his truth.

Although v 16 follows naturally after v 14, the intervening verse is clearly to be regarded as an intentional parenthesis. The words about John the Baptist add greater strength to his witness to Jesus. There is an indirect allusion here to the pre-existence of Jesus, which has already been affirmed in v 1. V 16 shows clearly the relevance of the grace which Christians (we ... all) have received. Again the thought of firsthand experience is stressed. The NIV has aptly brought out the meaning of the cryptic phrase ‘grace upon grace’ with the rendering one blessing after another. The fulness does not come to us all at once but in a progression of gracious experiences. There may be a contrast between Moses and Jesus Christ in the different method of approach to God, in that legal observances are inferior to the acceptance of a gracious gift. But the text does not require a contrast. It is better to see a comparison between God’s sending the law through Moses and grace through Jesus.

The culmination of this prologue in v 18 is intended to remind the reader of v 1. There was no other possibility of our knowing God except through Jesus Christ, the Word. The statement No-one has ever seen God is a reflection from the OT. Even Moses was not allowed to see him. In this, therefore, the revelation of Jesus is infinitely superior since he is the one who has made God known. The NIV follows what is certainly the more strongly attested reading in translating God the One and Only, an affirmation of the deity of Jesus. Yet in view of the subsequent words who is at the Father’s side, the alternative ‘but the only Son’ fits in better with the context.

1:19–2:11 Introductory events

1:19–34 The witness of John the Baptist to Jesus

The references to John the Baptist in the prologue are intended to lead into the historical record of John’s relation to Jesus. The subject is introduced by an enquiry from the Jews of Jerusalem. The term ‘the Jews’ occurs frequently in this gospel but not always in the same way. Sometimes it is used of the inhabitants of Judea as distinguished from Galilee; sometimes it refers to Jews as unbelievers in Jesus; most often it denotes the Jewish leaders in their opposition to Jesus. Here these leaders are represented by the priests and Levites. The main point of this passage is to distinguish the herald from the person announced. The writer records the questions about the identity of John the Baptist because this clearly has a bearing on the validity of his testimony. The question about Elijah is an allusion to Mal. 4:5. Some see here a correction of the synoptic tradition in which Jesus identified the expected Elijah with John the Baptist (cf. Mt. 11:14; 17:12). But John himself did not make this claim. The question about the Prophet refers back to Dt. 18:15–18, which was generally supposed to allude to an end-time figure. This general title does not appear to have been Messianic (cf. 7:40–41). John's own claim was to be the voice referred to in Is. 40:3 (23). In the synoptics these words are applied to John the Baptist but are not claimed by him. He was content to be the voice which heralded the Christ.

In view of John the Baptist's denials, the question of the reason for his baptisms naturally arose (24–28), and this gave him a further opportunity to distinguish between his own ministry and that of Christ. The form of the question suggests that the rite was being understood in the sense of an official sign of authority. John did not answer the question but pointed to Christ in a way which will be illustrated in the following passage. John's water baptism is contrasted with Christ's Spirit baptism in v 33, which shows the superiority of the latter. But here John's humility in relation to Jesus is in sharp focus. The location of John's baptism is carefully distinguished from another Bethany mentioned in 11:1.

Note that in v 29 the author introduces a sequence of six days, which may be compared with the conclusion of the ministry of Jesus, where another six days is recorded. John the Baptist's first introduction of Jesus as the Lamb of God is startling. To the original hearers the idea of a lamb must at once have suggested the sacrificial lamb. The offering of the temple sacrifices was so familiar to Jewish minds that it would be difficult to think of the concept Lamb of God apart from this. But the real difficulty occurs in the transference of the lamb imagery to a person. It is doubtful whether the hearers would have connected the idea with Is. 53, but it is not impossible that John the Baptist himself may have done so. On the other hand, he may not have understood the further statement who takes away the sin of the world in a context of sacrifice, but in the context of judgment. There is no reason why Jesus should not have understood it in the sense of Ex. 29:38–46 and Is. 53:4–12, even if John the Baptist did not grasp its full significance. Certainly, the evangelist would have understood the statement in a fuller sacrificial sense. There is some debate about the significance of the verb translated takes away. If we are to interpret this in the light of Is. 53, the idea of vicarious suffering is inescapable. It has been objected that the notion of bearing away sin cannot here be present because the Passover lamb was not sacrificed as a sin offering. Yet John's statement need not be rigidly interpreted in Passover terms. As far as the author is concerned Jesus as the lamb forms an important key to his ministry, since in this gospel that ministry begins at this point. The baptism of Jesus, which John does not record, had already taken place (cf. v 32). John the Baptist's words convey something of the universal scope of Jesus' ministry.

Some scholars have found difficulty in believing that John the Baptist spoke the words in v 29, particularly because at a later stage he expressed doubts about the Messiahship of Jesus. It is suggested that the view of Jesus as the Lamb of God is the opinion of the writer of the gospel which has been read back into the life of Jesus. But there is much in this gospel which points to the work of Christ on behalf of others. As to John the Baptist's later hesitation over the identity of Jesus, there is no need to suppose that John's grasp at this early stage was clear. The lamb imagery does not demand this.

V 30 is a repetition of v 15 and ties this section into the prologue and re-emphasizes the superiority of Jesus over the Baptist. When John said he did not know Jesus he must have meant that he did not know him as 'the coming one'. In this gospel there is a distinction between the use of 'Jews' and the use of Israel, the latter never being used in an adverse sense. In the Greek the verb translated saw (32) carries the idea of a settled conviction. The reference to the descent of the Spirit on Jesus in this gospel differs from the account in the synoptics. Here John himself saw the bodily form of a dove, whereas in the synoptics it was Jesus who saw it. The dove may symbolize gentleness of character or be used as an emblem of flight to show the reality of the Spirit's descent. The contrast between this and the visible display at Pentecost is striking (cf. Acts 2:2–3). Clearly, both descents were intended to be exceptional witnesses to the mission of Jesus. John received some special revelation (33) which enabled him to identify Jesus as the one who would baptize with the Holy Spirit. Spirit-baptism is vividly contrasted with water-baptism and is superior to it. We have another echo from the prologue in the statement that Jesus is the Son of God, and this also ties up with the purpose of the gospel stated in 20:31.

1:35–51 The calling of the first disciples

The repeated Lamb of God statement (36) is intended to imply that the two disciples who followed Jesus had caught something of the significance of the one to whom John had pointed. There is nothing in the narrative to suggest that John the Baptist expected any of his disciples to desert him; rather the implication is that he saw this as part of his own mission in heralding Jesus. The name of only one of the disciples is given, and the other may have been the author John. The idea of following in v 37 is no doubt neutral and only later became a fuller commitment to discipleship. Their response to the question of Jesus and their addressing him as Rabbi shows their serious intentions in following him. The title 'Rabbi' was one of respect and did not refer (as it came to do later) to one who had been trained in the rabbinical schools. It may be wondered why in v 39 the tenth hour is mentioned. If John was using the normal Jewish method of reckoning, the hour would have been late afternoon and a stay until the end of the day is implied.

The way Andrew is said to have found his brother Simon Peter as the first thing he did suggests that he had grasped at once the great significance of the encounter with Jesus. John gives two other flashes of insight into the character of Andrew in this gospel (cf. 6:8; 12:22). The term Messiah (41) is translated by John for the benefit of his non-Jewish readers. Both the Hebrew Messiah and the Greek Christ are derived from a root meaning 'Anointed One'. Although in the OT the idea of anointing was mainly in the setting apart of kings, in the NT the concept is applied to Jesus in a widened sense to include the idea of an anointed prophet, priest and king. A contradiction has been supposed between this announcement and the synoptic records, which suggest that Jesus was not recognized as Messiah until Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi. But there is no need to suppose that here the disciples had anything but a very general idea of what Messiahship really meant. In v 42 there is a marked emphasis on personal relationships involving Andrew, Simon and Jesus. Again there is a difference between John and the synoptics in the time at which the name Peter was given to Simon. Here it is given at the beginning of the ministry, whereas in Mt. 16:18 it is confirmed after Peter's confession. It is worth noting that Jesus here uses the future tense which would point to the Mt. 16:18 occasion. Both Peter and Cephas mean 'rock', suggesting that Jesus was thinking of the rocklike character which he proposed to make of Simon.

So far at least three disciples are said to have followed Jesus. But John mentions two others before commencing his account of the ministry of Jesus in ch. 2. In the case of Philip Jesus took the initiative in telling him to follow. Philip is mentioned again several times in this gospel (6:5; 12:21; 14:8). He appears to have been a man with a practical frame of mind. Although Philip, Andrew and Peter are said to be from Bethsaida they had come to live in Capernaum (Mk. 1:21, 29). A further piece of personal witness which led another to Jesus is mentioned here when Philip contacted Nathanael. Since the theme of witness is so important in the gospel, the method by which Peter and Nathanael were brought to Jesus is significant. Personal testimony has always been one of the most fruitful means of leading people to become disciples of Jesus. There is a difference in the way Philip introduced Jesus compared with Andrew for he did not point to 'the Messiah', but to the one whom Moses and the prophets wrote about. It is the same thing. The reference to Jesus of Nazareth sparked off a sceptical remark by Nathanael (46). Evidently Nazareth had something of an unsavoury reputation, and the way it rejected Jesus (Lk. 4:14–30) is in line with that reputation.

The encounter between Jesus and Nathanael is most instructive. First, we note the high opinion that Jesus expressed of him (47). The thought of an Israelite in whom there is nothing false may have been prompted by the story of Jacob, who is clearly in mind in v 51. Secondly, we note his inquiring mind—How do you know me? There is here an element of surprise which suggests that Nathanael had not previously met Jesus. Thirdly, we note the foreknowledge of Jesus, which must have greatly impressed Nathanael. There is no certain way of knowing what Nathanael was doing under the fig-tree, but the main point here is the more than ordinary insight of Jesus, which was clearly recognized by Nathanael. His response was far-reaching. Not only did he recognize Jesus as Rabbi, but also as Son of God and King of Israel. Again, even at this early stage, there was an understanding of Jesus as Son of God, however rudimentary. John has brought out the initial references to the divine Sonship of Jesus in the prologue to the very core of the emerging ministry of Jesus. The greater things of v 50 are explained by v 51, which speaks of the development of spiritual vision. The idea of seeing angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man seems to be an echo from the story of Jacob (Gn. 28:12). The meaning of the statement is that heaven is now opened for continuous communication with people, the representative of whom is Christ himself under the title Son of Man. It is remarkable that this title is substituted for Nathanael's Son of God, for this shows that the human aspect of Jesus is as important as the divine.

2:1–11 Revelation through a sign

In this gospel there are a number of signs, and the turning of water into wine is the first. Most of the signs mentioned by John lead into a discourse on a related theme. These signs are clearly an integral part of the structure of the gospel. As a result of the first, John specially mentions that the glory of Christ was seen, and this points the way for an understanding of the rest. It is worth noting that both this sign and the next (4:54) were performed in Cana in Galilee. This was about three days' journey from where John was baptizing. The reference in v 1 to the third day is significant because in conjunction with the other references to days in ch. 1 it is possible to see the miracle at Cana as happening at the conclusion of a seven day period. John is perhaps thinking of the events in the first week of Jesus' ministry.

In the discussion between Jesus and his mother (3–4) it must be remembered that Mary saw the running out of the wine supply as an acute embarrassment to the hosts, whereas Jesus concentrated on his main mission, indicated here by the word time (Gk. 'hour'). The theme of Jesus' 'hour' runs through the whole gospel, culminating in the passion story (cf. 7:30; 8:20; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1). The way in which Jesus spoke to his mother (softened somewhat in the NIV) may seem strange, but his intention clearly was to correct any misunderstanding that he might take orders from anyone other than the Father (cf. 5:30; 8:29). The connection between Mary's remark and Jesus' comment is probably to be found in the view that Jesus was looking beyond the present wedding to the coming Messianic feast. Jesus also distinguished between the human view of time and God's. The words suggest an awareness of impending crisis and climax. It is intended that the readers should, at an early stage, get a glimpse of this, although they must wait until later to realize the full significance.

The description of the six stone jars in v 6 as used for ceremonial washing suggests that some symbolic meaning is intended. Some see the whole account as symbolic rather than factual to demonstrate the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, in which case the water represents the Torah and the wine the gospel. But it is better to see the incident as a domestic wedding theme with overtones of symbolic meaning. There may be some allusion to the fact that Jesus will provide lavishly in the Messianic feast, whereas he did not fail to meet the immediate needs of the bridegroom. The capacity of the jars was more than 100 gallons (450 litres). It is not stated whether all the water was changed into wine, or only the water which had been drawn off for the feast. The master of the banquet may have been one of the guests who was appointed to act as master of ceremonies, but it would have been the responsibility of the bridegroom to provide the wine and food. This may explain why he did not know the source of the supply of wine (9). It was the usual custom to serve the best wine first. The text suggests that this custom was because some of the guests would have become somewhat inebriated and would not have recognized the inferior wine. But in this narrative the main point seems to be the superiority of the wine which Jesus provided, a precursor of his provision for the Messianic feast. The incident is brought to a close by stressing the fact that this was the first of the miraculous signs (11). Note that John uses the word signs, whereas the synoptic gospels prefer to speak of wonders and mighty works. A sign always points to some deeper truth beyond itself. The comment that through this sign Jesus revealed his glory suggests that the followers of Jesus saw more in the signs than the general onlookers, and Christians have not been slow to see the contrast between the insipid water of the old life and the richness of new life in Christ. It needed faith to discern the glory.

2:12–4:54 Early encounters in Jerusalem, Samaria and Galilee

2:12–25 The cleansing of the temple

2:12–17 Jesus drives out the temple traders. V 12 is a connecting link between this incident and the last. Capernaum was where Jesus chose to live during his Galilean ministry. The fact that he stayed there only a few days shows how near the Passover was. Some see in the mention of the Jewish Passover (13) a distinction from the Christian feast. But it is more likely that the expression is used to indicate where the Passover was held, i.e. in Judea, for the benefit of readers who did not know why Jesus went up to Jerusalem. The driving out of the animals from the temple area (the outer court) serves as a symbolic act. The implication is that the animals should not have been in the temple at all, and it is in this sense that the denunciation of the market atmosphere must be understood. The whip (15) was necessary to control the animals rather than to inflict any punishment upon them. The money changers were there to exchange over currencies into the Tyrian coinage required for the temple tax which all Jews were obliged to pay. The practice was not wrong in itself but was abused when exorbitant exchange rates were charged.

There has been much debate about whether there were one or two cleansings, since the synoptic gospels place the event at the end of Jesus' ministry. It is generally supposed that John has brought it forward for symbolic purposes. But it is not impossible that there may have been another cleansing after some two or three years. The specific time references here would be in support of that. But John seems more concerned with deeper meanings in the events of Jesus' ministry and arranges his material to highlight them; in this case Jesus' mission to cleanse out the abuses of Judaism. V 17 shows that only later did the disciples see the relevance of the OT text of Ps. 69:9 to this incident.

2:18–22 A new kind of temple. The sign requested (18) is a different kind from the one mentioned in v 11. The Jews were wanting some spectacular miracle. It is not surprising that they misunderstood the statement in v 19, since v 22 suggests that only later did the disciples themselves understand. Clearly Jesus was speaking of himself as the temple, a new kind of temple. Although the present temple had already been forty-six years in building, it was not completed until thirty-six years later. The contrast between that period and three days should have alerted the Jews to the fact that Jesus' words were not intended to be taken literally.

The reference to Jesus' body is an allusion to his resurrection, if body is here understood as the physical body. This would make sense in that Jesus was raised three days after his death. Some interpreters see the body as the church, but this makes it more difficult to see the significance of the three days, and in any case the church was not destroyed before being raised. A distortion of this statement was used at the trial of Jesus (cf. Mk. 14:58). John admits (22) that it was only later that the disciples recalled what Jesus had said and then believed. It is significant that here the word of Jesus is placed on a level with Scripture. No specific passage seems to be in mind, but rather several allusions.

2:23–25 The insight of Jesus. In the concluding section of this chapter the emphasis falls on the close connection between signs and faith. In his statement of purpose in 20:30–31, John links the signs with faith. Here the faith was inadequate. Jesus saw through it and would not trust it. V 25 draws attention to Jesus' supernatural knowledge. John inserts this comment here as a prelude to the Nicodemus incident, which illustrates it.

3:1–21 The new birth

The importance of the interview between Jesus and Nicodemus is increased because the latter was a member of the Jewish Sanhedrin. Such a man would have been well acquainted with Jewish teaching and would have understood the allusions that Jesus made. Although John often mentions Pharisees slightlying, here he concentrates on a Pharisee with a serious purpose in seeking Jesus. It is not certain why he came to Jesus at night. It may have been to avoid publicity. On the other hand, the comment may be an incidental note of time without further significance or it may be symbolical, relating to Nicodemus's spiritual state. The first is the simplest explanation. Nicodemus's opening words in v 2 connect with the comment in 2:23–25. Here was a man who had seen the signs and was ready to ask further questions. However it is clear that Nicodemus's view of Jesus did not go further than seeing him as a teacher with the stamp of God upon him. At least that was a start, but far short of a full understanding. Jesus' comment in v 3 goes beyond Nicodemus's implied question. The necessity of the new birth challenged Nicodemus's right to make an assessment of Jesus on a purely human level. The words unless he is born again could be understood in the sense of being born from above, or of drawing attention to the birth's spiritual character. Nicodemus clearly understood them in the first sense and rejected the possibility of a second birth. But Jesus meant them in the second sense, i.e. a totally different kind of birth. Many of the early fathers understood the statement to refer to baptism in the light of v 5, but the most natural understanding is of spiritual regeneration.

The kingdom of God is an expression found more in the synoptics than in John. It relates primarily to the sovereignty which God exercises. Here 'seeing the kingdom' seems to be equivalent to the more familiar expression in John of eternal life. It is called 'entering the kingdom' in v 5. Nicodemus's question in v 4 is surprising since it took Jesus' words so literally. Nicodemus's rejection of the idea of entering the womb a second time reflects his confusion. He could not grasp that the kingdom required an act of regeneration. There was an element of incredulity about his comment. The repetition of the need for rebirth in v 5 is strengthened by the contrast between water birth and Spirit birth. There has been much discussion over the meaning of this verse. Some take the reference to water to point to baptism and think Nicodemus would have understood it as an allusion to the baptism of repentance practised by John the Baptist. But there is no hint of this in the passage. Others have supposed a reference to Christian baptism, in which case there was no possibility of Nicodemus understanding it and John must have imposed the idea on the story for his own contemporaries when writing. If, however, the words of Jesus made any sense to Nicodemus we must take water and spirit together and relate this to one birth as in v 3. OT usage would infuse water and spirit with the meaning that God would act for the cleansing of his people (see e.g. Ezk. 36:25–27). In this case, Nicodemus was being told that some spiritual experience of regeneration was needed for a proper appreciation of the kingdom of God. There is dispute over whether spirit should have a capital 'S' (as in the NIV) or whether it should primarily be understood to point to a spiritual experience as contrasted with ritual cleansing. As far as Nicodemus was concerned the latter is most probable, but in the light of further references to the Spirit in this gospel John possibly intended his readers to understand the Holy Spirit. Indeed in v 6 the contrast between flesh and Spirit makes better sense if the Holy Spirit is in mind. Flesh is here pointing to human nature, which can reproduce only humankind not the children of God. Being born of the spirit requires a radical change, a new beginning. The gist of Jesus' statement is that the character of those born is determined by the source that gives them birth.

It is a pity that 'born-again' has been debased in common speech; as a scornful description of an extreme sect or even referring to old ideas renewed or new versions of motor cars! It would be very unfortunate to allow ridicule to deprive us of a concept so vital and central to the Christian faith.

V 7 stresses the imperative character of the new birth. There is nothing optional about it. The illustration of the wind (8) becomes more intelligible when it is realized that in Greek the same word can be translated wind or spirit. What Jesus was saying here was that although there is lack of knowledge about the origins of both wind and Spirit, the effects of both are observable. Our knowledge of wind movements has vastly increased in modern times, but in those times the wind was unpredictable. What comes over is the sovereign operation of the Spirit of God. It ties up with the statement in 1:13.

Clearly, Jesus expected a man like Nicodemus to understand his illustration, and he was rebuked for not doing so. His question was tinged with incredulity, and this was recognized by Jesus (as v 11 shows). Nicodemus had still failed to grasp the significance of what Jesus was saying. The we (11) in Jesus' answer has been variously interpreted. Was Jesus including the disciples? At this stage they knew very little. Was he including the Father and the Spirit? This is possible, although it is doubtful whether Nicodemus would have recognized this. Or was he echoing the we used by Nicodemus in v 2? It is clear that the we is contrasted with you people, which seems to refer to the Jews generally who failed to believe in the message of Jesus.

The earthly things in v 12 must refer to what had already been said and, therefore, must include the new birth. This takes place on earth, whereas the heavenly things relates to revelations of the future when the kingdom would reach its fulfilment. V 13 probably refers to the state from which Jesus descended and to which he returned at the ascension. Because heaven was his home he was in a position to speak authoritatively of heavenly things. At first there does not appear to be any clear connection between v 14 and the previous verse. Moses lifting up the snake in the desert was a well-known symbol of God's provision of life for his people, but a more profound connection is the symbolism of the lifting up on the cross, the focus of the work of the Son of Man on earth. The words must be lifted up show the unavoidable nature of the cross if eternal life is to be shared with believers, a point strongly brought out in v 15.

Generally in this gospel the author distinguishes between Jesus' words and his own, but in this case he has omitted to do so. Vs 31–36 are apparently a comment of John. The statement in v 16 concisely expresses three truths—the universal character of God's love, its sacrificial nature and its eternal purpose. It is no wonder it has been described as 'the gospel in a nutshell'. Since the verb used (have) is in the present tense this shows that eternal life is intended to be a present possession. This statement would have been challenging for Jewish hearers who were used to thinking of God as loving only Israel, but it is in line with the idea of universal love found elsewhere in the NT. The word world is used with the usual meaning in this gospel of a place in need of God's saving grace. This explains why Jesus came to save, not to condemn (17). The fact is that the world was already in a state of condemnation, although this became accentuated by the lack of faith in God's Son. V 18 makes clear that Jesus as God's Son is the ultimate touchstone which divides the world into two groups, believers and unbelievers. The reference here to faith in God's Son links up with the statement of the author's purpose in writing the gospel in 20:30–31.

Vs 19–21 contain an echo from the prologue (1:5) in the contrast between light and darkness. Those in darkness are there because their deeds were evil. This implies a deliberate decision to do acts which in God's sight were evil. This explains why such people hate the light, because it means that the true nature of their deeds will be seen (20). There is a strong contrast with those who live by the light, described here as living by the truth. Their purpose is entirely different, for they want their actions to be plainly seen so that God's work in them may be evident. V 21 can be understood in two ways: either as expressing the content of what is seen; or the reason why anyone comes to the light. The former is better in the context. The purpose of this section is to encourage faith in Jesus.

3:22–4:3 Jesus and John the Baptist

This section may be divided into three parts. The testimony of John the Baptist to Jesus (3:22–30); the author's comment on the ministry of Jesus (3:31–36); and the report about the Pharisees' and Jesus' decision to leave Judea (4:1–3).

John here switches to the historical connection between John the Baptist's ministry and that of Jesus. He gives no precise mention of the interval separating this section from the last, but there is a note about the location. Although Jesus was already in Judea, he went from Jerusalem into the surrounding country. The significant circumstance was that both Jesus and John the Baptist were baptizing in the same district (23). The dispute between John the Baptist's disciples and a certain Jew provided the occasion for a dialogue between John and his disciples. The unnamed Jew was concerned about ritual matters, and this called for a distinction between John's baptism and Jewish ceremonial rites (25–26). The essential factor in John's baptism was the prior requirement of repentance, and the synoptics show that Jesus continued the same theme. Both were, therefore, apart from Jewish ceremonial. But what confused John's disciples? It would seem that they were envious at the greater success of the ministry of Jesus.

This brings out John's reply in vs 27–30. He first stated a principle—that people can only receive, not manufacture the truth. He then applied the principle to himself by appealing to his former denial that he himself was the Christ. That was not the role that heaven (i.e. God) had assigned to him. He was content with a lesser role. The bridegroom illustration underlines this (29). The friend corresponds to the best man, who organized the details of a Judean wedding. The bridal imagery is found in Jesus' own teaching (cf. Mt. 22:1–14; 25:1–13). It was used later in apostolic teaching (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:22–24; Rev. 21:2, 9; 22:17). John the Baptist repeated the superiority of Jesus, as he had already done in ch. 1. It was not only John who must decrease, but the old order which he represented. This last section of ch. 3 provides a summary of what is meant by Jesus becoming greater. There are many pointers to his superiority:

a. He is from above and above all (31). He is to be distinguished from those whose origin is earthly. He cannot be assessed by earthly methods. He is therefore different from John the Baptist.

b. He spoke from personal experience (32).

c. Although his testimony was rejected by some, when accepted it witnessed that God is truthful (33).

d. The validity of the divine messenger is possession of the Spirit (34). Whereas this is a general principle it applies pre-eminently to the Son, particularly as the words without limit show. The OT prophets received the Spirit according to the measure of their assignment, but in Jesus' case there was no limit.

e. The hallmark of Jesus' mission was that the Father loves him and has complete trust in him (35). As evidence of what the Father has entrusted to the Son cf. 5:22, 27; 12:49; 17:2, 24. In v 36 John sums up the teaching of the whole chapter. The crucial test is faith, which is here contrasted with rejection. God's wrath is not to be regarded as impersonal but as an active principle of God's holiness. The only means of avoiding that wrath is by the path of faith. The idea of 'seeing life' is an idiom for experiencing life. The result of God's wrath is a lack of true life.

The opening verses (1–3) of ch. 4 form a link passage with the following discourse. The previous reference to John the Baptist leads the author to note the Pharisees' reactions to the parallel baptizing work of John and Jesus. They had tolerated John's baptism, but if Jesus was baptizing more people, they were presumably getting alarmed. Jesus' decision to move on was the occasion for the transferring of his ministry from Judea to Galilee. The parenthesis that Jesus himself did not baptize is added to correct the report that the Pharisees had heard.

4:4–42 Jesus in Samaria

4:4–26 Jesus and the Samaritan woman. There were two possible routes from Judea to Galilee. The longer was through Gentile country on the east side of the Jordan; the shorter was through Samaria and was most used in spite of the animosity between the Jews and the Samaritans. V 4 suggests this latter route was chosen of necessity. Perhaps John is implying that there was divine reason as far as Jesus was concerned. It is generally supposed that Sychar is the modern Askar, near to the ancient Shechem. There still exists a deep well, which according to tradition is the original well. That Jacob was of special significance to the Samaritans is seen from v 12. Jesus was tired (6); this seems an intentional note to stress the true humanity of Jesus and also provides a setting for the opening of the conversation. The sixth hour would be noon, the hottest part of the day.

It was unusual for a woman to visit the well alone. She may have been considered something of a social outcast. John adds a note that the disciples were absent (8) to highlight the dialogue between the woman and Jesus. Jesus' action overcame two Jewish prejudices—conversation with a Samaritan and conversation with a woman. The racial prejudice is heightened by the woman's remark (9). Jesus must have anticipated her perplexity for he used it to deepen the conversation. The idea of drink for physical needs led naturally into the comment about the gift of God (10), which turned it into a spiritual issue. The woman was thinking of Jesus as a typical Jew, but Jesus took her up on this. If she had known his identity she would have asked for living water. This expression had a double meaning, either running water, i.e. spring water, or spiritual water, i.e. connected with the Spirit. The Rabbis thought of the Torah as living water, which shows its metaphorical use. It is, however, not surprising that as yet the woman thought only on the human level, as v 11 shows. It seemed foolish to her to think of water from a deep well without any means of drawing it. Her vision stretched no further than a bucket. Comparison with Jacob, who dug the well, suggests to her that Jesus was inferior. On two counts, therefore, she made an erroneous judgment. She could not conceive that anyone could be greater than the venerated Jacob (cf. the similar inability of the Jews to conceive anyone greater than Abraham; 8:53). The real superiority of Jesus was in the living quality of the water provided. Jacob's well could only temporarily quench the thirst (13). There are many OT passages which link God's promises with the water illustration (cf. Is 12:3; Ezk. 36:25–27). The connection between water and the Spirit is also an OT idea (cf. Is 44:3). The reference to eternal life (14) is clearly connected with the activity of the Spirit, as is seen from 6:63.

There are similarities between this narrative and the Nicodemus incident, in that in both accounts misunderstandings lead to further explanations. The woman in v 15 was still thinking on literal lines. She imagined a constant water supply would eliminate her visits to the well. She had not yet grasped the spiritual dimension. There is more significance than seems apparent in Jesus' answer to the woman (16). There was, in fact, a moral blockage. She had not grasped the nature of her own need. The woman was forced to face reality in admitting she had no husband, although she hid the fact that she was living with a man. Jesus was displaying that greater insight which John had noted in 2:25, and which the woman herself began to recognize (19). Jewish teaching disapproved of a woman having had more than three husbands, and the idea of a common-law husband had no religious support. The woman was therefore in great moral and spiritual need. We note the gentle way in which Jesus both commended her and yet criticized her (17–18).

When she acknowledged that Jesus was a prophet (19), she probably thought of an inspired person. This is at least some advance on her earlier view of him. Although the woman's introduction of the issue of the place of worship may seem a diversion to avoid an unpleasant subject, it is more likely that her realizing that Jesus was some kind of Jewish prophet prompted her to show her acquaintance with Jewish-Samaritan differences over the main place of worship (20). Worship was closely linked to a sacred place. In the past there had been a temple built on Mt Gerizim to rival the temple at Jerusalem. Even after the Gerizim temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, the Samaritans continued worshipping on the mountain. It is not clear how concerned the woman was about these differences, but she seized on it as a matter worthy of discussion. Jesus used her reply to make a profound statement that transcended the argument about location. Jesus first turned the discussion away from the place to the object of worship (22). Although neither Jerusalem nor Mt Gerizim were relevant in this matter, the Jews were nevertheless superior in their understanding of God. Since the Samaritans were restricted to the Pentateuch, they lacked the theological richness of the revelation of God in the rest of the OT. When Jesus says salvation is from the Jews (22) he is not saying all Jews will be saved, but that through the Jews came the knowledge of that salvation in the Scriptures. Since the neuter what is used in both cases, this draws attention more to the essence of worship than to the person worshipped. The reference to a time is coming (23), modified by has now come, shows clearly that it is the ministry of Jesus which would radically transform worship. The mode of worship is now to be in spirit and truth, which transcends all racial and local considerations.

The main emphasis here is on spirit as v 24 shows. God is spirit may be compared to ‘God is light’ and ‘God is love’. These are ways in which he can be known. The spirituality of God was not an idea alien to the Jews, but they had not recognized the need for any correspondence between the one worshipped and the worshippers. Jesus taught that the worshippers must share something of the nature of the person worshipped. The linking of spirit and truth here points to the necessity of genuine worship. God desires worshippers who are in tune with him (23). All this probably left the woman somewhat out of her depth. She sensed some Messianic connections, although it is not clear what she meant by Messiah (25). The Samaritans did not use the word, as far as we know. The woman may have used it because she was talking to a Jew. Certainly the Samaritans were looking for the Prophet (Dt. 18:15–19) who would reveal the truth, and this throws light on the woman’s words. It gave Jesus the cue to declare himself as the expected Messiah. He was prepared to do this to a Samaritan but not to the Jews whose Messianic hopes did not fit in with Jesus’ mission.

4:27–38 The disciples rejoin Jesus. As a result of the disciples’ return from their errand to buy food, the woman departed to the town (28). John comments on the disciples’ surprise that Jesus was talking with a woman, which reflects the general Jewish prejudice (27). Jewish rabbis were not permitted to speak to women in the street and considered any conversation with women to be a hindrance to the study of the Torah. The reluctance of the disciples to ask questions show how embarrassed they were over Jesus’ actions. The woman, on the other hand, seems to have lost her inhibitions in her haste to tell others about Jesus. Her grasp was limited and tentative. Could this be the Christ? (29) suggests she had not fully accepted Jesus’ declaration in v 26, for it could be understood in the sense ‘Surely this cannot be the Christ?’ Yet she did arouse considerable interest, particularly because of Jesus’ penetrating insight into her past.

Vs 31–34 preserve a classic case of misunderstanding of spiritual truth by those who can think only in literal terms. The disciples were concerned with material food, but Jesus turned the conversation to spiritual account. Their conclusion was that someone else must have provided food if Jesus was not interested in eating (33). The gist of Jesus’ reply in v 34 is that doing God’s will takes precedence over physical food. But these words cannot mean that Jesus was advocating a neglect of physical food. Rather Jesus was here, as so often in John’s gospel, concentrating on this main task, i.e. finishing the work the Father had sent him to do. The harvest illustration is intended to link immediately with the fulfilment of the mission (34–35). But what is the point of the reference to four months? It is possible that in alluding to the natural harvest, still four months away, Jesus intended a contrast with the spiritual harvest which was immediate. When he urged the disciples to look, he may have been thinking of the citizens making their way towards him as a result of the seed sown in the mind of the woman. The spiritual harvest is concerned with eternal life, a favourite theme in John's gospel (36). Although no gap is implied in v 35, in vs 36–37 a distinction is introduced between sowing and reaping. In the spiritual harvest the gap between the sowing and reaping is indeterminate (cf. the metaphor used in Am. 9:13). The principle involved is summed up in v 38. What the disciples had already reaped was due to the work of others before them. No single individual can claim credit for the success of any spiritual mission. The harvest belongs to the sower as much as to the reaper. It is possible that the others refer to the long line of prophets who had prepared the way, of whom John the Baptist was the last.

The conclusion to Jesus' mission in Samaria is seen in a specific example of spiritual harvesting. This took place in two stages. Many believed because of what the woman had said, but more believed through the testimony of Jesus himself. We must assume that the faith of the former was necessarily limited by the experience of the woman. Her testimony concerned the remarkable insight of Jesus, but personal contact with Jesus himself must have deepened their faith, hence the force of v 42. The fact that the Samaritans wanted Jesus to stay with them was extraordinary since he was a Jew, but showed their awakening conviction that he was a Saviour, not simply of the Jews but of the world. It is impossible to know what content to put to this concept. It would have fallen short of later Christian reflection on salvation, but Jesus had presumably shared with them something of the saving purposes of his mission. The full title used here occurs again in the NT only in 1 Jn. 4:14. It was, however, used in the contemporary world of various gods including Zeus and even of the Roman emperor Hadrian. But John understood the term here in its inter-racial sense.

4:43–54 A second miracle in Galilee

Most of John's record centres on Jerusalem, but the few narratives he includes that are located in Galilee are significant. The first two signs happened in Galilee, as did the multiplication of the loaves in ch. 6. But most of John's signs happened in Judea. John notes that Jesus had himself recognized that a prophet was without honour in his own country (44). There is dispute over what own country here means. In the synoptics the saying refers to Nazareth; but here it is most likely that John understands it of the Jewish homeland as distinct from Samaria. There is particular point here in comparing the ready reception the Samaritans gave to Jesus for who he was and the welcome of the Galileans for the miracles he did. On the other hand, the homeland may be considered to refer to Jerusalem, where in this gospel Jesus was not well received. In this case, the reception in Galilee would be by way of contrast.

The former suggestion is the more likely. The Galileans were clearly greatly impressed by the reports of signs performed in Jerusalem at the Passover (cf. 2:23).

Yet the second significant sign that Jesus did was performed in Galilee, in Cana, the same place that saw the first sign. The official mentioned in v 46 was no doubt an officer in Herod Antipas' service. Herod had the title Tetrarch, and although he was never actually a king, he was popularly regarded as such. There are similarities here with the account of the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt. 8:5–10; Lk. 7:2–10), but there are sufficient differences to make any identification of the two incidents difficult. The most significant of the differences are the different status of the father and the different rank of the person healed (son instead of servant). V 47 shows the extent of despair in the father's mind over his son. But Jesus' response is unexpected. The words of v 48 were addressed to the Galileans as a whole. Their welcome to Jesus was on the basis of signs, but did not point to faith. It was probably not until Jesus assured him that his son would live (50) that the man believed. Up till then it was perhaps no more than a kind of magical belief. When faith came it acted rapidly. The conclusion to this narrative is significant because John mentions the precise timing of the healing as the time of Jesus' pronouncement (52). This led to a deeper faith, not only for the man but also for his household. A comparison may be made with the mention in Acts of similar household conversions (cf. Acts 10:2; 11:14; 16:15, 31; 18:8). The seventh hour mentioned in v 52 would have been 1 p.m.

5:1–47 Healing and discourse in Jerusalem

5:1–18 The healing of a lame man

The feast of the Jews in v 1 is unnamed. If it was the Passover, this could indicate that the total period of the ministry exceeded three years. It seems that the reason why a feast is mentioned is to account for Jesus' presence in Jerusalem, although John stresses several feasts in the ministry of Jesus. There have been excavations of a double pool in the north-east quarter of the city which is thought to be the pool described here as being near the Sheep Gate. There are variations of the name, but Bethesda is the best attested. The most important detail is the number of the five colonnades, whose existence archaeology has confirmed. These areas would hold a great number of people waiting to take advantage of the medicinal waters. The additional text which appeared in vs 3–4 is not well attested and is rightly omitted from the NIV (see mg.). Nevertheless, v 7 confirms that there was some movement of the waters, possibly due to springs. The fact that John mentions that the lame man had been there for thirty-eight years suggests that this was common knowledge. He was probably notorious for the time he had been begging there. The word learned (6) implies that Jesus had been informed by the bystanders. The question Do you want to get well? may have been intended to jolt the man out of his apathy, but the answer does not reveal any faith on the man's part. Clearly he thought in rather magical terms, as v 7 shows, for he believed the commonly held view that only the first to get into the water had any chance of healing. He seems to have thought Jesus' question not worth the answering. It must be conceded, however, that his immediate response to Jesus' command to walk was surprisingly prompt.

The problem for the Jews at first was not the healing, but the fact that it had happened on the Sabbath. The carrying of the mat was considered an act of work. According to the Mishnah, a couch could be carried only if it had a man on it. At this point it was the man who was held to be at fault, but in vs 16–18 it was Jesus. The discussion between the healed man and the Jews sheds light on the ignorance of the man, who had no idea of the identity of his healer (13), and the obstinacy of the authorities, whose chief concern was the ignoring of their rules. There is an implied contrast here between the compassion of Jesus for the poor man and the lack of interest in the man on the part of the Jews. Jesus' withdrawal (13) followed his consistent policy in this gospel of avoiding popular acclaim.

Do the words of Jesus (14) suggest that the man's illness was the result of a specific sin? Even if the answer is 'Yes', this would not imply that all physical illness has a specific moral cause. However, it may be that Jesus was warning about a moral lameness which would be worse than the physical lameness from which the man had just been delivered. The imperative is in the present tense with the sense, 'Do not continue to sin'. Why did the man at once go and inform the Jews, knowing their hostility? It showed little appreciation of the benefit Jesus had brought him but reflects rather a slavish sense of duty.

The incident led into a statement by Jesus of his relationship to the Father. The Jews' attitude sharpened into persecution (16). But Jesus used the circumstances to testify to the Father's work.

The connection of thought seems to be that the healing was a divine act and was not, therefore, subject to human rules. In this gospel there is the closest relationship between the works of Jesus and the works of God. V 17 concisely sums up the mission of Jesus. To the Jewish mind the idea of anyone making himself equal with God would have been a more serious offence than breaking the Sabbath law (18), for it would have challenged the basic belief in monotheism.

Popular debate today tends to focus on the evidence, or otherwise, for physical healing, rather than on its source. Thus the Jews of Jesus' time and the media of today avoid the central question by being taken up with details of secondary importance.

5:19–47 Revelations of the Father and the Son

V 19–23 give Jesus' answer to the Jewish claim that he was making himself equal with God. The words I tell you the truth point to the special importance of the following words (as also in v 24). The way in which Jesus used the title Son follows from his custom of calling God his Father. It shows a particularly intimate relationship. Jesus gives four reasons in support of his claim: the Son acts precisely like the Father (19); the Father shows the Son his plans (20); the Son, like the Father, has power to give life (21); the Son has been given authority for judgment by the Father (23). This sequence of supporting reasons for the Son's position have two main purposes. First, that the hearers may be astonished (20) and secondly, that they might honour the Son as they honour the Father. The first on its own would lead only to honouring a wonder-worker, but the second corrects this and points to the true status of the Son. Of the four reasons given above, that which focuses on the Father's love for the Son (20) is most significant. It gives the basis for the Father's revealing everything through the Son.

The conviction that the Father raises the dead (21) is supported by both OT and rabbinical literature. While the primary reference may be to the final physical resurrection, there must also be the idea of spiritual resurrection. V 25 suggests that the dead who hear the Son of God are those who respond spiritually today, although vs 28–29 refer to the end time. The real point here is that the Son has the power to give life in the same way as the Father has. There is no clash between v 22 and 3:17. The words in 3:17 exclude judgment as the main reason for Jesus' mission, whereas the statement here points to the Son's authority to judge when that is appropriate.

The second important statement contained in vs 24–29 is introduced by a comment that links hearing and believing. The linking is essential for the receiving of eternal life. There is also a close connection between what Jesus taught and what God had sent him to do. Eternal life is here defined as a transfer from death to life. The idea of life here is in a different sphere from that in which death operates. It is just possible that v 25 may include those raised physically from death to life in the ministry of Jesus, but the words and has now come seem to be against that interpretation. It is worth noting that when speaking of resurrection (25), Jesus used the title Son of God, but when speaking of judgment (27) he spoke as the Son of Man. The second title, unlike the first, has no article in the Greek and must be interpreted generally of his character as true man. Judgment will be delivered by one who really knows humankind. The time mentioned in v 28 is different from that mentioned in v 25, for here the final resurrection is in mind. The contrast between the rising of the good and the rising of the evil means that although believers have been judged already they can look forward to the completeness of physical resurrection; whereas those who have done evil (and presumably are unbelievers) have nothing but condemnation to look forward to. In v 30 Jesus affirmed the justice of his judgment on the grounds that it was in harmony with the one who sent him. Although judgment is given to the Son, it is wholly in line with the Father's will. The next section (31–47) is concerned with witnesses to Jesus.

Jesus had no need to witness to himself since his will was identical with that of the Father (31–32). In his case self-witness would be false witness because it would imply that he needed to distinguish between himself and the Father. This does not conflict with 8:14, where Jesus was not considering the impossible hypothesis of his witness conflicting with the Father's. Here the another who testifies is the Father whose testimony is always true.

John the Baptist's witness was valuable but inadequate (33–35). John's witness certainly led some to Christ, but it was unthinkable that Jesus should need to rely on that witness. John's own witness is compared to a lamp, but he himself was not the light, although he pointed to the light. The purpose of all witness is said to be that people might be saved, which is possible only through faith in Jesus (24).

Jesus next appeals to the testimony of his works (the word is plural). These are of a special nature because the Father had commissioned them. It is for this reason that the witness of Jesus' works is greater than the witness of John's words. Yet the testimony had fallen on unproductive soil. Although the Father had witnessed to Jesus, the hearers had not heard his voice or recognized his presence (37). The plain fact was that through unbelief God's word (primarily the Scriptures) did not dwell in them, and this consideration leads into the next section.

Those who did not believe in Jesus did not neglect the Scriptures. Indeed v 39 points to the well-known diligence among the Jews in the study of the Torah. The trouble was in their belief that this in itself sufficed for salvation. But they gave the game away when they declined to accept the witness of Scripture to Jesus, which is its main purpose. V 40 expresses the matter strongly—it was a deliberate rejection of Jesus who is the source of life. This was tantamount to saying that they were spiritually dead. Jesus accepted neither human witness nor human praise (41). He did not have official sanction for his mission. The Jewish hearers entirely missed the sanction of God himself in the mission of Jesus (43).

The reference in v 42 to the love of God could mean people's love for God or God's love for people, or perhaps both. It is most likely that their lack of love for God is in mind in view of the context. They were more concerned with human praise than with the praise of God (44). They were in contrast to the true Jews to whom Paul refers in Rom. 2:29. When Jesus appealed to Moses he was touching a sore point with these Torah-loving Jews. At the last great judgment Moses himself would condemn them. Although there are few specific references in the Torah to the Messiah, the general drift of it was to prepare the way for the coming deliverer (46). In all their study of Scripture they had missed this essential point. Jesus was direct in telling them (47) that they did not believe what Moses wrote. With all their devotion to the study of Scripture they did not really believe what it said. It would have been difficult for devout Jews to grasp this distinction, but without it they stood no chance of believing the truth of what Jesus was saying.

6:1–71 Further signs and discourses in Galilee

6:1–15 The feeding of the crowds

This miracle is the only one which is recorded in all four gospels. For this reason only the special features of John's account will be mentioned here. John refers here to the Sea of Tiberias (1), a name which was probably not used to describe the Sea of Galilee as early as the time of Jesus but was familiar at the time of writing. The crowds responded to the evidence of the signs, here specified as healings (2). John calls them signs because they led people to seek for Jesus. Since Jesus had crossed to the east side of the lake, the mountainside mentioned (3) would have been what is now called the Golan Heights. John notes that the Passover was near because he linked the following discussion about the heavenly bread with this feast (cf. v 51, which becomes more intelligible against a Passover background). A comparison with the synoptic accounts shows that whereas they portray the disciples taking the initiative, John shifts the initiative to Jesus himself (5). John also names Philip and Andrew, compared with the more general ‘disciples’ of the synoptists. In v 6 John adds a comment which is designed to remove any doubt in the readers’ minds that Jesus did not know what he would do. Philip’s response to Jesus’ request shows a natural but purely human sense of the occasion. He was intensely practical in his calculations (7). Andrew was little better in informing Jesus of the hopelessly inadequate supplies available. He also took a literalistic approach. But none of the disciples was to know what was in the mind of Jesus.

All the records relate that Jesus gave thanks before distributing the food (11). The verb John uses here is the same as the synoptics use in the narrative of the Lord’s Supper. This is noteworthy in view of the fact that John does not include the Last Supper in his gospel. John stresses that the people were all satisfied (12), which means it was a full meal and not a merely symbolic act. It is doubtful whether the twelve baskets of fragments were intended in a symbolic way to refer to God’s provision for the tribes of Israel. It is more in harmony with the context to see it as a proof of God’s unstinting bounty. John describes the miracle as a sign (14) and links it with the people’s reference to the Prophet, an allusion to the prediction of Dt. 18:15. This passage was sometimes interpreted Messianically. In the light of v 15 it would seem that the people in this incident so interpreted it. It is only in this gospel that the plan to make Jesus king is mentioned. This would explain why in Matthew and Mark Jesus urged his disciples to get into the boat. It is likely that the crowd’s main purpose was to secure through Jesus a constant supply of free food, rather than any careful summing up of his Messianic potential.

6:16–24 Jesus walks on the water

John does not describe this miracle as a sign. We may wonder why he includes the incident here since he does not comment on its effects. Since in both Mark and Matthew it is linked with the feeding of the crowds, it would not be unreasonable to suppose that it was so linked in Christian tradition. But John may have intended to use it to demonstrate the disciples’ dependence on Jesus. The discussion which followed the miracle of the bread is set in Capernaum (24), which explains the boat journey of the disciples from the east to the west bank. The mention of the distance in v 19 suggests an eyewitness report. There can be no doubt that John intends his readers to understand a miracle when Jesus walked on the water. The suggestion that the disciples actually saw Jesus walking on the shore and thought he was on the water must be rejected, because it would give no reason for them to be terrified. The words It is I. Don’t be afraid (20) are not to be invested with the aura which other great ‘I am’ sayings in John convey. The message here is that fear was banished in the presence of Jesus. The most reasonable explanation of v 21 is that the boat was much nearer the shore than the disciples imagined. Vs 23–24 explain how many of those who witnessed the feeding of the crowds were present at Capernaum to hear the discussions. John intends his readers to connect these discussions with the miracle of the feeding.

6:25–59 Discussions about the bread of life

The people were baffled how Jesus had reached the other side of the lake (25), and their question shows the purely human level on which they were thinking. Jesus' answer to their question goes deeper. He pointed out their failure to realize the significance of the signs; they saw only food, not the real meaning of Jesus' act. They were convinced of their ability to meet what was required, but Jesus had to remind them that eternal life is a gift. The seal is God's mark of authentication. Whoever holds the seal acts on God's behalf. Hence the importance of Jesus as God's agent, who is here called the Son of Man, a title which draws attention to his humanity. The statement in v 27 must have seemed strange, for the people were seeking to avoid labour, but in these words Jesus was graciously declining their quest for merely physical food. Clearly v 28 implies that they thought in terms of working to earn merit, but Jesus at once reminded them of the need for faith, not works.

The question in v 30 reveals the shallowness of their thought, for what further sign did they expect than the feeding of a multitude from negligible supplies? The reference to the manna in the desert (31) provides the clue to the working of their minds. They were probably thinking this provision was superior to that which Jesus had provided because of the sheer quantity of it. Their concept of sign seems to have been limited to a reproduction of the desert experience of the Israelites. This was tantamount to expecting that the Messiah must outdo Moses to impress them. The reference to bread from heaven is most likely a quote from Ps. 78:24, although there are other parallels. Jesus took up the theme (32), first denying that Moses provided the heavenly bread and then identifying the bread with himself. As compared with the manna, which was limited to the Israelites and for a prescribed time, Jesus as the bread continually gives life to the world (33). But v 34 shows that the hearers could not rise above the level of material provision. In the next section Jesus affirmed his claim to be the true bread.

V 35 records the first of the great 'I am' sayings of Jesus, and the following verses (35–51) are an expanded commentary on it. It is a direct response to the people's demand for bread, for it was necessary for them to understand that Jesus was speaking of spiritual not physical food. The meaning of the phrase bread of life is bread which gives life, but such bread is available only to those who believe in Jesus, a condition which the hearers had not fulfilled (36). If Jesus' mission depended on the faith of the people, does this suggest a failure? V 37 gives the answer. The final result is in the Father's hands. Whoever comes shows an emphasis on the individual response. The emphatic negative statement I will never drive away is to be understood as an assurance that Jesus will preserve them. There is no possibility of any disagreement between the Father and the Son, as vs 38–39 show. What the Father gives the Son will receive—I shall lose none. Note that the all in v 39 is neuter (as in v 37) and sums up everything given by the Father to the Son. The two references to the last day (40) show that Jesus was thinking ahead to the end of the age, when all will be consummated.

At this point in the discussion Jewish objections came to the fore. The sticking point was the bread that came down from heaven (41). They could not reconcile this with their knowledge of Jesus' humble origins (42). Jesus rebuked their grumbling rather than answered their objection (43), although when he pointed out the necessity for the Father to take the initiative, he was virtually telling them that they were out of step with the Father (44). They needed a spiritual revelation to understand Jesus' words. This was further underlined by an appeal to the prophets (45). The passage quoted is Is. 54:13, which describes the triumph of the Servant in his kingdom. It endorses the view that the initiative is with God. Yet God's revelation comes only through Jesus, since he alone has seen God (46). The need for faith is again stressed. V 47 echoes the language of 3:15.

The theme of the bread is again introduced, and Jesus' own claim is repeated (48). The superiority of the heavenly bread over the manna is that the former leads to life whereas the latter could not prevent death (49–50). In the important statement of Jesus in v 51, he claimed to be the living bread, which although synonymous with bread of life brings out more vividly the contrast with the manna. But there is a further extension of thought in the identifying of the bread with the flesh. There is also a difference from the earlier statement in that it is now Jesus himself who gives, whereas before it was the Father. The word flesh refers to the human life of Jesus. It was totally misunderstood by the Jews (52). It differs from the word used at the Lord's Supper ('body' instead of 'flesh'), which shows that this statement is not to be read in the light of the Supper but vice-versa. The word world in v 51 should be understood as the world of people.

It was because the Jews put a literal interpretation on the words of Jesus that he gave a further explanation in vs 53–58. It is difficult to believe that the Jews could not see through to some metaphorical meaning. Their objection appears to be little more than ridicule. It is not so surprising that the Jews did not penetrate to the spiritual meaning of Jesus' words, for understanding was possible only through faith, which it has already been noted they did not possess. The eating and drinking of the flesh and blood of Jesus is clearly an act of faith (53). The metaphorical language can be understood only in the light of the coming sacrifice of Jesus. Dependence on what Jesus has done is, therefore, vividly described in terms of eating and drinking. The result of such dependence is seen in vs 56–57, in a mutual indwelling. Jesus' dwelling in believers means that he identifies himself with them, but their dwelling in him means that they continue to depend on him. This whole discussion closes with another comparison between the manna and the heavenly bread. V 58 is in fact an echo of v 49. John leaves until the end of the discussion any reference to where it took place. Since the discussion arose out of the miracle of the feeding, it is not possible to say what part of it preceded the entry into the synagogue. John does not consider it relevant to explain, but it is not impossible that the whole discourse took place inside. Some synagogue services would have allowed for this.

6:60–71 The disciples' reactions to Jesus' teaching and work

The grumbling of many of the disciples (60–61) shows that the word 'disciple' is used here in a loose sense for those fringe followers of Jesus. They were not true believers for they found it hard to accept his teaching (60). They could not even imagine anyone accepting it. Jesus knew their real position and proceeded to advise. He knew that the flesh saying had baffled them. The statement in v 62 about the Son of Man ascending implied that there would be a greater cause for stumbling in the manner in which the Son of Man would ascend to heaven, because it would be preceded by his suffering and death. The further statement that the flesh counts for nothing aims to draw their thoughts away from the physical to the spiritual. The statement here is relative. John has already declared that the Word was made flesh (1:14). Jesus was not underestimating the importance of his earthly life but was pointing out the need to catch at the spiritual meaning of his teaching. V 64 is another example in John where Jesus displayed his knowledge of people's thoughts. He knew that faith was missing in some of them. And once again the initiative of the Father is stressed in v 65.

The contrast between the reaction of the Twelve and of those who turned away is brought out in vs 66–71. The former, with Simon Peter as their spokesman, affirmed a deepening faith. The frequent mention of eternal life in the teaching of Jesus had led them to describe his teaching in this way (68). Their belief was centred in a conviction that Jesus was someone special, here described as the Holy One of God. There are some alternative textual readings, but the one followed here is to be preferred because of its unusual character. In Mk. 1:24 and Lk. 4:34 the phrase is used by demons in addressing Jesus. This confession of Peter does not go so far as his confession in Mt. 16:16. It is clear that the 'we' of Peter's confession needed qualifying in view of the reference to the betrayer in v 64. Nothing is said of the disturbing effect of this news that one of their number was a devil (70). John in writing of it later merely identifies him as Judas.

7:1–8:59 Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles

7:1–9 Jesus moves from Galilee to Jerusalem

This section is an explanation of Jesus' relationships with his family and with the Jews in general at this point in the ministry. Jesus was aware of hostility and plotting against him (1), and John mentions this to account for his delay in going to the feast. The Feast of Tabernacles was a popular feast and anyone wanting to contact as many people as possible could not do better than show himself in Jerusalem at this time. Such was the reasoning of Jesus' brothers (3). It may be that they had heard that many of Jesus' disciples had recently deserted him (6:66). But v 4 shows that they had failed to grasp the character of Jesus' mission. His purpose was not to be in the public eye. For him there was no likelihood of the world believing in him, any more than his brothers. The answer Jesus gave in v 6 shows his awareness that his movements were governed by a timetable which others found hard to understand. For his brothers any time is right. The word for time here stands for opportune time and must be distinguished from, although closely linked to, the 'hour' already mentioned in 2:4. Jesus appears to have been commenting on his brothers' use of the word world (7), for they had not grasped that it was antagonistic to Jesus (in the sense in which it is used in this gospel). It is here specifically used with a moral meaning (what it does is evil). Some texts in v 8 have 'not', others have not yet. The second reading may have been an attempt to avoid a difficulty since Jesus did go up to Jerusalem. However, the former is the more likely reading. In that case, Jesus was not denying that he was going to the Feast, but was denying that he was acting on the public demonstration proposal of the brothers. This is supported by the statement in v 10.

7:10–52 The teaching of Jesus at the Feast

7:10–25 The authority behind Jesus' teaching. When Jesus decided to go to the Feast, he went in an atmosphere of Jewish speculation (10–11). This led to some debate among the people as to his whereabouts (11) and character (12). Goodness and deception are mutually exclusive, which shows the arbitrary nature of popular assessment. At this stage neither Jesus nor the general populace could be open (10, 13) although their reasons were very different. Jesus was following his Father's plan, but the people were acting out of fear. This explains why Jesus did not hesitate to go to the temple halfway through the Feast (14). He clearly went with a specific purpose. What baffled the Jews was the authoritative nature of Jesus' teaching without formal training (15). In answer Jesus pointed out the true nature of his teaching. It is not his own, but God's (16); it could be verified by anyone who desired to do God's will (17); it was not based on self-seeking (18); it was based on seeking God's honour and was therefore true (18). The conclusion to Jesus' answer is abrupt. He appealed to Moses and the law (19). When he said that none of them kept the law, the meaning must be that they did not grasp the true purpose of the law, for they certainly did not neglect the law. It was central to their current religious thought. Jesus clearly saw beyond their profession to honour the law and challenged them on the grounds of their plotting to kill him, whereas the law condemns murder (Ex. 20:13). In self-defence the Jews charged Jesus with demon-possession (20). They had not recognized their own murderous intentions towards Jesus. In answer Jesus pointed out their inconsistency in interpreting the law by allowing circumcision on the Sabbath but not healing (21–23). The connection of thought in v 23 is that Jewish interpretation allowed circumcising on the Sabbath, in spite of the law against work, because it perfected the child, and Jesus claimed that to make a person whole had the same aim. In v 24 Jesus criticized the criteria being used. True faith had no part in their assessment.

7:25–36 The identity of Jesus. The discussion about the Christ which followed arose directly out of the previous comments. Some of the people were perplexed because the authorities were taking no action. Consequently they queried whether the authorities were concluding that Jesus was the Christ (26). But this raised another difficulty, for it was commonly supposed that the Messiah's coming would be secret. Jesus's answer was to cry out in the temple in the most public way. He challenged their assumption that they knew his true origin. What they knew about him was only partial. The most important part—that he had been sent—had totally escaped them. Jesus asserted that they did not know the one who sent him (28). They had not connected the mission of Jesus with God. John impresses on his narrative the impotence of any agency to thwart the timing of God's purposes; he notes the time had not yet come. Vs 30–31 bring out the division between those who were antagonistic and those who believed. The question asked in v 31 need not suppose that those who believed had necessarily grasped the deeper significance of the miraculous signs. Although signs were not generally associated with the expected Messiah, popular opinion seems here to have thought so.

The action of the Pharisees and chief priests gives a more official stamp on the desire to arrest Jesus than that seen in v 30. John's comment in v 32 suggests that an informal meeting of the Sanhedrin had been held. But he delays until v 45 to tell us the outcome of attempts by the temple guards to arrest Jesus. He concentrates rather on the enigmatic response of Jesus to this situation (33–34). Jesus' mind was on the cross and his divine mission. He looked beyond this to his glory, an experience through which his hearers could not pursue him. As so often in this gospel, the words of Jesus were misunderstood through being taken too literally. The perplexity of the Jews is understandable (35–36), but shows their incapacity to think in spiritual terms. Their minds went to the dispersion, that is Jews scattered among the Greeks. The irony of the situation is that John records later (12:20–22) that some Greeks sought out Jesus, and his readers would have known how the gospel had spread through the Gentile world.

7:37–44 The promise of the Spirit. On the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles there was a water ritual, and this clearly formed the background to the saying of Jesus about the Spirit. The ritual was connected with the need for rain during the following year. When Jesus said If anyone is thirsty (37), he may have been thinking of Is. 55:1, but it is more likely he was offering a better alternative to the water ritual. The idea of thirst is given a spiritual sense, as so often in his teaching. V 38 makes clear that this spiritual water is available only to believers. There is a problem in the reference to Scripture here since no specific passage fits the context, although it could be a general reference to such passages as Is. 58:11, Ezk. 47:1; Zc. 14:8.

The words from within him are lit. 'from within his belly', and the question arises whether this is a reference to either Christ or the believer. Since the living water is identified with the Spirit, in what sense can it be said that a believer communicates the Spirit? This can hardly be the meaning, and it is best to understand it to mean that Christ communicates the Spirit, a thought underlined by the latter part of v 39. A parallel to the idea of water flowing from a person may be found in the metaphorical rock (i.e. Christ) in 1 Cor. 10:4. V 39 links the coming of the Spirit to the period subsequent to the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus (described by John as a glorification). Whatever the water sacrifice would have conveyed to the discerning mind, there was no way the hearers could know the significance of Jesus' words until the Spirit brought his own enlightenment.

The immediate result of these sayings of Jesus was further discussion about his identity. There were three views—a prophet, the Christ, not the Christ. The latter view was claimed to be supported by Scripture, but the Jews appear to have been ignorant of Jesus' birth in Bethlehem (cf. Mi. 5:2). For the third time there is recorded in this chapter a desire to arrest Jesus which ended in failure.

7:45–52 The Jewish leaders' unbelief. At this point John records the return of the temple guards. The finally in v 45 does not capture the real force of the Greek, which merely points to a sequence to the preceding verse. A search warrant was already in existence. The guards were trained Levites and this would explain their reaction to Jesus' teaching. They were clearly thoughtful men. The guards' words in v 46 may have been a cover-up to their fear that an arrest would have led to a popular uprising. On the other hand it is not impossible that it was the teaching itself which created so deep an impression. Vs 47–49 reveal the Pharisees' contempt, not only for the crowds but also for their own temple guards. Nicodemus's protest shows that the earlier interview (ch. 3) had not been in vain (50–51). He ventured to point out the inconsistency of his colleagues' approach to the law. Their attitude was out of harmony with the true spirit of the law. The gibe about Galilee flung at Nicodemus reveals the contempt of the Jerusalem authorities for the provincials (52).

7:53–8:11 The woman caught in adultery

Most scholars agree that this section does not belong at this point in John. Most early MSS either omit it or mark it with asterisks to indicate doubt. A few MSS place it at the end of the gospel, and a few others after Lk. 21:38. At the same time it has ancient attestation, and there is no reason to suppose that it does not represent genuine tradition.

The incident took place as Jesus was teaching in the temple (2). The teachers of the law and Pharisees sought out Jesus at a time when he was surrounded by a crowd of people. Their intention was to set a trap for him which would cause him to fall foul of the authorities (6). The real crux was Jesus' attitude towards the Mosaic law. The religious leaders lost no time in drawing attention to the command of Moses in the case of a flagrant case of adultery. Would Jesus condemn the woman and uphold the Mosaic law? If he did, the teachers of the law and Pharisees knew that the civil authorities would not permit the sentence to be executed. Or would he evade the issue and by doing so condone the woman's sin? He did neither (7) but turned the challenge towards his accusers. In inviting those without sin to cast the first stone, Jesus left the matter to their own consciences. He transformed a legal quibble into a moral issue. The withdrawal of the accusers (9) from the eldest downwards heightens the point of the story. There is no need to debate what Jesus wrote with his finger on the ground. His presence was sufficient to make all his accusers uneasy, until at length only Jesus and the woman were left.

The final words of Jesus to the woman (11) show his compassion linked with a strong command. It is clear from Jesus' attitude to the woman that he was not condoning adultery. This combination of thoroughgoing justice and deep compassion is not easy to achieve, but is a fine example of how the church ought to deal with people.

8:12–59 Jesus as the light of the world

8:12–30 Challenges to the testimony of Jesus. This section is a continuation of ch. 7; hence v 12 follows on directly from 7:52, and the light metaphor must be seen as derived from the Feast of Tabernacles imagery. Note that light is here linked with life as in the prologue (cf. 1:4–5, 9–10). Here is one of the well-known ‘I am’ sayings, which points out the personal character of the true light. The immediate occasion was possibly the lighting of the candelabra in the Court of the women to signify the pillar of fire. The imagery is reinforced by reference to a dark path along which people are walking with the help of a bright light. Anyone wandering from the light finds himself in darkness. This figurative use of walking is particularly characteristic of John’s writings.

The Pharisees objected to the tone of authority in the words of Jesus (13), but Jesus pointed out that self-testimony is not necessarily untrue. Jesus had previously affirmed the validity of his witness (cf. ch. 5) and he now reiterated the same theme. All testimony must be judged according to its basis, and here Jesus claimed a knowledge of his mission of which his hearers were ignorant (14). The implication is that their judgment was superficial (15). When Jesus says, I pass judgment on no-one, this may mean that the purpose of his mission was not judgment, or that he did not judge in the manner of his critics. The latter fits this context better, as v 16 shows. The judgment of Jesus is not isolated judgment, but a process within his whole life purpose and is therefore valid. The law recognized the greater strength of two witnesses over one (17). When Jesus referred to your law he was not distancing himself from his Jewish opponents in relation to the law. Rather he was appealing to a principle which his critics would accept. Jesus’ appeal to the supporting witness of the Father shows again the close connection between the one sent and the sender. The question in v 19 clearly introduces a misunderstanding by confusing Jesus’ reference to divine fatherhood with natural fatherhood. They had no perception of the divine mission of Jesus, and it is not surprising, therefore, that they were unconvinced by Jesus’ claim that his witness was corroborated by the Father. In their eyes an absent witness would have been invalid.

The form of their question is Where? rather than ‘Who?’ but it was the latter which Jesus answered. In that answer the words If you knew me show that the critics had totally failed to understand Jesus. They also lacked a true understanding of God himself. In no clearer way could Jesus have shown that he himself was the means for attaining a true knowledge of God.

V 20 explains the setting for this part of the dialogue. The place where the offerings were put (the treasury) was probably in the Court of the Women, a place of public assembly. But John’s main interest is the theological reason why Jesus was not arrested—his time had not yet come. Many times John points out that human forces were thwarted in their attempts to stop the ministry of Jesus because their plans did not conform to the divine programme for him (cf. 7:44). Jesus had already spoken of going away (7:34), and once again he mystified his hearers. The words you will die in your sin (21) may seem to have little connection with the previous statement, but if we give full weight to the singular sin, this would refer to the sin of rejecting the Messiah. Because of this they would not benefit from his redeeming work. If this is the right understanding of the passage, the seeking must be understood in a spiritual sense. Hence Jesus’ statement that they could not go where he was going. There is a similar saying in 13:33, but in that case with a different meaning because it was addressed to the disciples. Here all the Jewish hearers could think of was suicide (22). The chasm between them and Jesus is highlighted in vs 23–24. It was a difference between an earthly and heavenly view of things.

The words if you do not believe that I am the one I claim to be show the importance of faith in the full revelation of Jesus. The Greek text has simply ‘I am’, a form similar to the great ‘I am’ assertions of the OT (cf. Ex. 3:14). This implies the self-existence of the Messiah, and shows Jesus' demand for a comprehensive view of his person (it becomes even more clear in v 58). It is not surprising that the 'I am' saying was beyond the grasp of the hearers, as is seen by their further question Who are you? An understanding of the person of Christ is a crucial component of Christian faith. Jesus' answer to their question is enigmatic (25). The NIV has rendered the Greek Just what I have been claiming all along, whereas the RSV has 'from the beginning'. Another interpretation is to understand the words to mean 'Why do I talk to you at all?' (RSV mg.), but this is inconsistent with the context. Yet a further possibility is to take the words to mean, 'Primarily I am what I am telling you', which fits the context and adds emphasis to the 'I am' saying.

Jesus left their question unanswered to return to the theme of judgment (26). He had twice reminded them that they would die in their sins, he has yet more to say. He again asserted the truth of his testimony on the grounds that he who sent him was true. Whatever he declared to the world was what he had heard from the Father. V 27 again gives an example of pathetic misunderstanding. Jesus' answer to their perplexity is surprising. When you have lifted up the Son of Man (28) would appear to refer to the cross, but how does this relate to the context? In all probability Jesus had in mind the revelation of the Father which would come through the cross, which in this gospel is seen as a process of glorification (cf. 12:23). As a result, those who had eyes to see would recognize that the mission of Jesus was stamped with the Father's authority. Knowledge of the person of Jesus comes as a result of the resurrection, which although not mentioned here, must be understood. Once again Jesus brought out the close relationship between the Father and the Son. The present statement may be contrasted with the cry of abandonment (Mt. 27:46; Mk 15:34). It does not conflict, for here the emphasis is on an abiding relationship, but there on a temporary experience. In saying that he always pleased the Father (29), Jesus was again showing the measure of oneness between himself and the Father. In noting the faith of many in response to the teaching of Jesus, John is giving an illustration of what he hopes will be the outcome of his gospel (cf. 20:31).

8:31–41 The nature of freedom. Those who had believed needed to advance to a full commitment to the teaching of Jesus in order to arrive at the truth (31–32). It is likely that the 'believers' had reached the stage of professing faith, but the following discourse shows they had not yet developed into full believers. The connection between truth and freedom here is important. Truth never leads to bondage. The whole idea was perplexing to the Pharisees because they were not convinced of their need of freedom (33). Others were burdened through their teaching, but they themselves never recognized that submission to their complex system of regulations led to bondage. In appealing to their descent from Abraham (33) these people showed that their idea of being Abraham's children lacked moral content. In his answer Jesus made an important statement (I tell you the truth), in which he pointed out the true nature of moral slavery in order to stress the true nature of freedom (34). Since no-one is exempt from sinning, everyone must be a slave to sin. This applies to those of Abrahamic descent. There is an obvious contrast between a slave and a son in the rights that each possesses (35), and this serves to underline the chasm between bondage and freedom. The words you will be free indeed (36) show that true freedom can come only through the Son. Jesus then went back to the Abraham claim and pointed out the strangeness that those claiming to be Abraham's descendants should seek to kill the one who spoke the word of God (37). The thrust of this passage is that physical descent, which meant so much to the Jews, is no guide to true moral and spiritual affinity. The saying you have no room for my word shows that the minds of his hearers were closed. The implication is that the true descendants of Abraham would receive the word of Jesus. The contrast between the Father and your father becomes clearer in the light of v 44.

The Jews could not get away from the importance of calling Abraham their father (39). It reflects the widespread belief that the great merits of Abraham were available for his descendants. Jesus' reply corrected the basis for this belief. True descent was on moral grounds, not on grounds of racial descent. Abraham's true sons must act in harmony with what Abraham did, which would exclude the Jews' desire to kill Jesus (40). The second reference to your own father (41) was intended to challenge them further and draw out from them an indignant protest. Because their descent from Abraham had been called in question, they resorted to claiming God himself as their father. Some have thought that the words We are not illegitimate children may have been an indirect reference to slanders about the birth of Jesus. But the more probable implication is that they were objecting to Jesus' refusal to allow their claim to be Abraham's descendants, which would make them spiritual bastards.

8:42–47 The children of the devil. Jesus next pointed to a further result from true spiritual descent from Abraham—you would love me (42). True children of God could not fail to love the Son of God. Jesus again asserted that his mission was from God. He would not allow his hearers to forget this. Their minds were so prejudiced they were unable to hear (43). This idea of moral impossibility is further underlined in the charge that the devil was their father. The implications of this were far-reaching. There are three stages in the thought here: the devil is a murderer; you are seeking to kill me; therefore you are his children. The devil's most characteristic feature stressed here is his hatred of the truth. Note the expressions not holding to the truth, no truth in him, he is a liar and the father of lies (44). The latter expression could mean 'he is the father of a liar', thus making it more personal. The sequence in v 45 suggests that the hearers' rejection of the truth showed their leaning towards falsehood. Jesus made their attitude towards him the crucial test—why don't you believe me? Since he spoke the truth, everything contrary to him must be false. His opponents' attitude of unbelief implied not only that he did not speak the truth but was guilty of sin (46). The sequence of thought in v 47 is as follows: whoever hears God's words is of God; you do not hear the words of God; therefore you are not of God. It is the second step in this argument which the hearers challenged, for Jesus' estimate of their spiritual condition was different from their own.

8:48–59 Jesus' claims about himself. The last paragraph in this chapter focuses on Jesus' claims about himself and the strength of opposition to those claims. The double charge in v 48 that Jesus was both a Samaritan and demon-possessed revealed strong contempt on the part of his accusers. The former charge was probably expressing their hatred of Jesus in the same way as they regarded the Samaritans. The latter charge was more serious and arose from Jesus' words in v 44. In answer Jesus pointed out the absurdity of a demon-possessed person doing anything in the Father's honour, and he further pointed out that it was God who was the judge of the matter (50). This removed the discussion from the sphere of their opinion against that of Jesus. Jesus' view was backed up by God.

The words in v 51, he will never see death, should be understood in the sense of not experiencing the terrors of death. This links it with the promise of Jesus to give believers eternal life. Once again, the opponents of Jesus misunderstood his words, taking the reference to death literally (52). The fact that Abraham and the prophets died made nonsense of Jesus' statement in their view. It is significant that they changed Jesus' word see to taste, which shows they understood Jesus to mean physical death. The direct question, Are you greater than our father Abraham? (53), implies that the Jews regarded this as impossible. They were willing to give greater honour to the prophets than to Jesus. The following question—Who do you think you are? is more literally ‘Whom do you make yourself to be?’ The answer to this is that Jesus did not glorify himself (54); it was the work of the Father. Once again Jesus claimed a special relationship to, and knowledge of, the Father (55) in contrast with his hearers.

In v 56 we have the remarkable statement Your father Abraham rejoiced at the thought of seeing my day, which raises the question when this could have taken place. Some sort of vision must be in mind. A Jewish tradition held that Abraham saw the secrets of the age to come. Some see the reference to Abraham rejoicing over the birth of Isaac (Gn. 17:17). This is possible, particularly if the birth of Isaac is seen as the promise of blessing to all nations (cf. Paul’s interpretation of the promise in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3). This was supremely fulfilled in Christ. He saw it and was glad seems to point to Abraham’s foresight, which resulted from his faith, although some have linked it to the binding of Isaac. The Jews distorted the words of Jesus by asking You are not yet fifty years old and you have seen Abraham! (57), but Jesus made an emphatic declaration in response. The words before Abraham was born, I am must point to pre-existence. The I am here must be understood as a divine claim and was taken in this way by the Jews (59). In no more dramatic way could Jesus have claimed superiority over Abraham. The Jews could think of no other treatment but stoning for anyone so indisputably claiming pre-existence to Abraham. The fact that Jesus hid himself (John does not tell us how) goes to underline the constant theme in this gospel that his times were in God’s hands.

9:1–10:42 Further healing and teaching

9:1–41 Jesus heals a man born blind

9:1–12 The encounter with the blind man. There is a clear connection between this chapter and ch. 8, because both in 8:12 and 9:5 Jesus declared himself to be the light of the world. John now gives a specific instance in which Jesus was seen as light, giving sight to a blind man. The other gospels record instances of Jesus healing blind people, but in John what is characteristic is the discussion the healing provoked which centred on the person of Jesus himself.

It is not clear from the text when this incident happened, but it was some time between the Feast of Tabernacles and the Feast of Dedication (cf. 10:22). The man had never seen (1). The fact that he was born in this condition heightened the theological discussion which followed. There is less difficulty in seeing some connection between sin and suffering as a general principle than in applying it to particular cases (2). The disciples’ assumption that either the man himself or his parents must have been at fault was in line with contemporary theories. Some of the rabbis taught that it was possible to sin before birth. But Jesus refused to answer the question, who sinned? and chose rather to focus attention on God’s glory. That suffering could be used for God’s glory was a concept difficult to believe, although it is inherent in the Christian approach to the problem. It can show the illuminating power of Christ, not only in the physical but also in the spiritual sphere. In v 4 Jesus was including his disciples in the working out of his own mission, although they were not involved in the immediate miracle of healing. The contrast between day and night appears to be symbolic, if the reference is to the mission of Jesus, in which case the night would represent the close of that mission. The increasing hostility and unbelief of the Jews might be represented by the darkness of night, but the former view seems preferable.

Jesus' remark in v 5 shows that he was thinking of his earthly life. The use of saliva in curing blindness finds some parallels in Mk. 7:33; 8:23, although in these cases the saliva was applied direct, whereas here it is mixed with soil. There was a current belief that saliva was beneficial for diseased eye. But whereas Jesus used currently understood means, he did not attach any superstitious value to them. In fact the healing happened only when the man washed in the pool of Siloam as instructed by Jesus. It is not clear why John gives the interpretation of the name Siloam as Sent, but perhaps he sees some connection with Jesus as the sent one. It may, of course, be no more than a help for Greek readers, as in other instances with Hebrew names (cf. 1:42). V 7 implies some delay in the healing, perhaps to test the man's faith. The subsequent account of the conversation between the man and his neighbours is told with exceptional vividness (8–12). The argument about the man's identity, the vagueness of his own knowledge of Jesus and the certainty of the cure are all clearly brought out.

9:13–34 The Pharisees' view of the healing. It is not clear in v 13 who brought the man to the Pharisees. It may have been the neighbours of v 8 or others who were hostile to Jesus. John's comment about it being the Sabbath on which the healing took place supplies the clue to the action. The objectors were obviously those who were sticklers for the Jewish law. The making of clay on the Sabbath would have been enough to raise their hackles, in spite of its being done in an act of mercy. The Pharisees' interest in the method of healing (15) was no doubt because they saw some opportunity to criticize Jesus over it. But in fact the Pharisees show a similar division of opinion as the neighbours (16). The dispute in their case was between the strict legalists, whose main concern was the Sabbath regulations, and others, who were so impressed with the signs that they could not imagine a sinner performing them and therefore were concluding that the legalists were judging wrongly. The blind man's statement that Jesus was a prophet (17) was an advance on v 11 when he referred to the man they call Jesus.

The next section (18–23) demonstrates the sheer obstinacy of unbelief. The Jews disbelieved the man's own words and would not accept that he had been born blind. The demand that the man's parents should be required to substantiate his testimony does not appear to have been made from an impartial desire to sift the evidence. Their prejudice against the idea that a man born blind could receive his sight is apparent. Only the parents could confirm that the man had been born blind, but they themselves were hardly in a position to supply an explanation of the miracle. The narrative brings out that their response was inhibited by their fear of the Pharisees. Threat of excommunication was a powerful weapon. At the same time it was justifiable for the parents to pass the question back to the son. There is some debate over v 22 since some scholars think it improbable that during the lifetime of Jesus the synagogue would have introduced a ban about Jesus being called the Christ. But it would have been quite natural for reports to circulate claiming that Jesus was the looked-for Messiah, although it was much later that the full truth of this dawned on the Christians.

The words of v 24, Give glory to God, cannot mean that Jesus' opponents were urging the man to praise God for the healing. It was a common Jewish oath which called on the man to speak the truth. The Jews were convinced that Jesus was a sinner because he broke the Sabbath. The man's own knowledge of Jesus was based on personal experience (25). He had no comment to make on the technical matter, but was very firm in acknowledging his restored sight. The opponents were baffled by the fact of the healing and switched to the method used (26). Facts can be stubborn, but technical matters can be more malleable. There was both irritation and irony in the man's response (27). He suggested their eagerness to hear a repetition of the evidence could derive only from a desire to become disciples of Jesus. In answer to his irony, the opponents resorted to scorn. His mention of discipleship prompted them to claim to be disciples of Moses. This was apparently a rarely used description, but it highlights the superior place given to Moses in their thoughts than they gave to Jesus. The contrast sums up the long-running conflict between Judaism and Christianity. There is a refusal here to consider the true origin of Jesus. Not only so, they were refusing to give credence to the testimony of anyone whose origins they did not know (29). For them no personal experience, however remarkable, was of any consequence.

There is obviously food for thought here concerning all debates about supernatural healing. The Pharisees of Jesus' time used arguments strikingly similar to those employed by some medical authorities today.

It is no wonder that the man became more and more cutting in his remarks (30–33). The debate over the origins of Jesus found no place in his matter-of-fact approach to experience. Nevertheless, the man argued the matter in a series of steps: his sight had been restored; he suggested that God hears only those who do his will, not sinners; hence, since he was convinced the healing was from God, the healer could not be a sinner; there was no precedent for a mere man opening the eyes of a man blind from birth; therefore, the healer must have been from God. The theologically minded Jews at last saw that they could make no headway with a man who could argue in such a manner; so they ejected him (34), possibly by excommunication, but not before a parting snipe at him. They charged him with being born in sin, a tacit admission of his blindness from birth which they had earlier questioned. They were more concerned to show contempt for his former condition than pleasure for his present restoration.

9:35–41 Jesus' comments on spiritual blindness. This concluding section of the narrative depicts the man's discussion with Jesus and reaches its climax with his declaration of faith. Jesus took the initiative in seeking out the man. He at once issued a challenge to faith, a connection with miracles as signs found elsewhere in John's gospel. But the most significant thing about the question is the use of the title Son of Man. Elsewhere in this gospel the idea of faith in the Son of Man occurs (3:14–15). Whatever John meant by the title, the man's lack of understanding is clear. His question (36) was probably because he had not seen Jesus before. As soon as Jesus explained that he was the Son of Man the healed man at once believed, which suggested he had already had the seeds of faith in him. In fact, the whole narrative shows a progressive development of understanding leading to faith. The words, Lord, I believe, may not reach as far as a full recognition of the lordship of Christ. The word Lord could be simply a polite form of address, but when linked with faith more probably points to a deepening appreciation of the character of Jesus. This is especially evident in his act of worship. At first sight v 39 stands in contradiction with 3:17. Yet since 3:18 speaks of judgment, it must be understood rather as the inevitable effect of the coming of Jesus, but not its main purpose. The mission of Jesus brought people to the point of crisis. The healed man's crisis had been faced in his excommunication, which was further sealed by his act of worship of Jesus.

The antitheses—non-seeing and seeing, seeing and becoming blind—are one of the characteristic features of John's gospel. The notion of sight is used in different ways. The blind man had received both physical and spiritual sight. The Pharisees possessed natural sight and thought they possessed spiritual sight, but their reaction to Jesus showed they were really blind. It was in this sense that his coming had brought judgment. John notes the total lack of understanding among the Pharisees (40–41). The question Are we also blind? underlined their incredulity. Jesus' reply, If you were blind, can be understood in two ways. It could mean, 'If you were really conscious of your blindness', i.e. in a spiritual sense, for if they were, they would desire illumination which they clearly did not. In this sense the following words, you would not be guilty of sin, would mean they would then have been open to the redemptive mission of Jesus. This is more likely than to suppose that Jesus meant 'If you were really blind you would be guiltless because you would be unable to see'. Jesus was claiming that wilful blindness carried with it guilt; in this case the guilt of rejection of God's messenger. John sees this as an important challenge applicable to his readers, including, of course, ourselves.

10:1–18 Jesus as the shepherd

The illustration of the shepherd in this section is in the form of an allegory in which various aspects are applied in a spiritual manner. It is akin to the synoptic parables but in a more developed form. It is important not to press the details.

1–6 The main point of this section is the means by which true and false shepherds are to be distinguished. The imagery of the shepherd is a familiar one in the OT (cf. Je. 23; Ezk. 34; Zc. 9). In this section the thought is most strongly influenced by Ezk. 34, where the shepherds of Israel are criticized. There is probably intended a close connection between the theme of ch. 9 and the shepherd illustration, and this is stressed by the words I tell you the truth (the double 'truly') of v 1. The contrast is between the bad shepherding of the Pharisees (as seen in their attitude towards the blind man) and the good shepherd. Eastern sheepfolds had only one door, which was either guarded by the shepherd himself when only one flock was there, or by a gatekeeper when several flocks were enclosed. In the latter case the gatekeeper would know the shepherds. Thieves would be forced to enter by other means. It is probable that no difference is intended between a thief and a robber. There is no need to attach any particular interpretation to the gatekeeper (watchman; 3). He is merely a detail of the illustration to ensure entry for the shepherd. What is important is the relationship between the sheep and the shepherd. The characteristic of a true shepherd is that he not only recognizes his sheep but calls them by name and leads them out to pasture (4). Clearly no such personal relationship could exist between strangers and the sheep (5). The hearers were unable to understand the truth behind the figure of speech.

7–10 The imagery now changes, with Jesus himself seen as the gate. He claimed exclusive right to grant entry. V 8 has presented difficulties if it is supposed that none who came before Jesus were anything other than thieves and robbers, which clearly would make nonsense of the OT. Some MSS omit the words before me, but it is most likely that they are original. The most probable meaning is that any who came before Jesus and claimed to be the only way in were false; a reference to the many false Messiahs with whom the history of the period abounded. Indeed the previous chapter shows how disastrous were the claims of the Pharisees. In v 9 Jesus' own claim is repeated in a more extended form. He now promises both salvation and sustenance.

These two benefits are then summed up as fulness of life (10). The contrast between the false and the true is here particularly striking. Jesus brings life; the false shepherds bring death. The abundance of the life which Jesus gives is a characteristic theme of John.

11–18 Another contrast is now introduced between the good shepherd and the hired hand. The first quality of the shepherd is willingness to sacrifice himself for the sheep. Having just promised abundant life to others, Jesus spoke of the giving up of his own. On the face of it this would seem to put the sheep immediately at risk, but Jesus went beyond the metaphor to point to a deep spiritual truth. He drew attention to a voluntary act of sacrifice which would benefit the sheep (11). The death of the shepherd is seen as an act on behalf of others. The contrast between this and the act of the hired shepherd who runs away (12) brings out vividly the nature of the sacrifice of Jesus. The lack of care is particularly noted (13). Vs 14–18 form a kind of commentary on the statement of v 11. It begins with an emphasis on the mutual knowledge of the shepherd and the sheep, a knowledge like the mutual knowledge of the Father and the Son (14–15). There can be no closer intimacy than this. It puts the hired hand entirely out of the picture. Such intimacy between the shepherd and the sheep has already been hinted at in vs 3–5.

V 16 introduces another line of thought, this time based on the idea of different folds (sheep pen). The other sheep to which Jesus here refers must be Gentiles. But although there are different folds there is only one flock, as there is only one shepherd. This statement witnesses to the variety within the community of God's people, yet its essential unity in Christ himself. The reason (17) could refer to the preceding verse with the meaning, 'The Father loves me because I am the good shepherd', or with the following verse (as in the NIV) in which case the Father's love is based on the Son's sacrifice. But it cannot be supposed that the Father's love was dependent on the Son's action, but rather that it was demonstrated through it. The concluding clause in v 17 shows that the sacrifice was not regarded as an end in itself. The resurrection was in mind as the triumphant outcome. The totally voluntary character of the self-offering and the authority vested in Jesus is stressed.

10:19–21 The effects of this teaching

It is most likely that the word Jews here is general, including both the crowds and the leaders. Examples of similar divided reactions are to be found in 7:43 and 9:16. Again we find a demon-possession charge, similar to those in 7:20 and 8:48. It was assumed that there was a close connection between demon-possession and madness. For some the healing of the blind man in ch. 9, as well as the wisdom of Jesus' teaching, ruled out such a theory.

10:22–42 Dialogue at the Feast of Dedication

John links events with feasts where appropriate. This feast was first instituted by Judas Maccabeus to mark the rededication of the temple after its defilement by Antiochus Epiphanes in 164 BC. The mention in v 22 that it was winter accounts for the fact that Jesus was walking in Solomon's Colonnade. The question in v 24, translated How long will you keep us in suspense?, suggests that the Jews here were not entirely hostile, although they were clearly perplexed. Jesus said he had already told them the answer in the sense of the general witness of his words and deeds. It was their lack of belief even in his miracles that he particularly criticized here. Jesus referred again to the shepherd imagery to remind the Jews that they would have heard his voice had they been his true sheep. He then threw special light on his relationship to those sheep (28). The force of the words show that they have already entered into eternal life (the present tense is used). Jesus also made an unmistakable promise concerning their security. Those familiar with the various enemies of an eastern flock of sheep would appreciate the absolute character of that security. It is reinforced by the action of the Father (29). This leads into the important statement in v 30, I and the Father are one. So closely are the Father and Son identified in the mission of Jesus that some idea of unity of essence is involved, although with separateness of identity. Such an understanding of these words is in complete agreement with the statement in 1:1.

The opponents decided to avoid further words with a more tangible approach (i.e. stoning; 31). Jesus, however, continued with further questions about their motives (32–33) and they replied with charges of blasphemy. But their definition of blasphemy was based on the assumption that Jesus was a mere man. But his actions showed that he was more than a mere man and the fallacy of their charge is apparent. A similar charge was made by Jesus' opponents in 5:18. The levitical law (Lv. 24:16) prescribed death by stoning as the punishment for blasphemy. When Jesus appealed to the law in v 34 he was using the term to include all three parts of the Jewish Scriptures, since the quotation is from Ps. 82:6. There are various views about whom God is addressing in this psalm: Israel's judges who had failed in their duties; angels who abused their authority over the nations; or Israel as a whole at the giving of the law. Whichever is the right interpretation, the implication here is that those called 'gods' are inferior to the one the Father has sent, the Son of God. How could Jesus the Son be charged with blasphemy? When Jesus declared that the Scripture cannot be broken (35), the word is in the singular and refers primarily to the particular passage being cited, but the principle holds for Scripture as a whole. The words set apart in v 36 are frequently used in the OT for the setting apart of a person for a special office (cf. a similar use in Jn. 17:19).

The discussion concludes with a statement about works and faith (37–38). The doings of Jesus were so closely linked with the works of the Father that he could invite faith on this account. The works of Jesus are the means by which people may come to understand the relationship between Jesus and the Father. Faith based on works is inferior to faith based on what Jesus has said. The works (or signs) are for a theological purpose—to bring understanding of the relationship between Jesus and the Father. Any who have come to understand this intimate relationship will not stumble over the statement of v 30, as Jesus' hearers clearly did. Jesus was affirming that it is impossible to differentiate between the Son and the Father in the performance of the works.

The return of Jesus to the scene of John's baptism may be symbolic. His public ministry was nearing its end. Vs 41–42 repeat the witness of John to Jesus and the superiority of the latter's ministry. A strong contrast is seen between the lack of response in Jerusalem and the many who believed beyond the Jordan.

11:1–57 The death and raising of Lazarus

11:1–44 Jesus the overcomer of death

This account of the raising of Lazarus has been objected to on two grounds: its extraordinary character and the silence of the other gospels. Its extraordinary character is an objection only if it is supposed that miracles do not happen. Moreover, in face of the reality of the resurrection of Jesus Christ it cannot be said that the resurrection of Lazarus is incredible. Although the synoptic gospels do not record this miracle, Luke contains the story of the raising of the widow's son (Lk. 11:25). Some have suggested that this account is a development from Luke's story of the rich man and Lazarus, but there are few parallels apart from the similar name. There is no sound reason to dispute the historical character of this account.

John makes clear the identity of Lazarus and especially his relation to Mary who anointed Jesus, although he does not relate this incident until later in the gospel (ch. 12). John either assumes that the readers will be familiar with it, or else that they will read the gospel more than once. When John records the sisters' request he uses the word phileō for love, but in v 5 the rather stronger word agapaō is used. Some scholars have deduced from this and similar evidence that Lazarus was the 'beloved disciple' who wrote the gospel. This would imply that Lazarus was in the upper room with the apostles, but this is highly unlikely. Jesus' words This sickness will not end in death (4) mean that the purpose of the sickness was not death but in the glorification of the Son of God. This may be compared with other signs in this gospel (cf. 2:11; 9:3). The glory of God is more significant than the sickness.

The report sent to Jesus and the consequent discussion between Jesus and his disciples raises an important theological problem. V 6 states that Jesus delayed for two days. Why? In the context there is a definite connection between that delay and Jesus' love for the Bethany family. The delay cannot, therefore, be considered as a lack of care. The sequel provides the answer, for Jesus intended that the experience of Lazarus should be glorifying to God (4) and a means for leading the disciples to faith (15). The disciples are seen first as fearful for the safety of Jesus if he returned to Judea (7–8). V 8 links with 10:31, showing the close connection between chs 10 and 11. In the light of 10:39 the disciples' apprehensions are understandable. The district where they were at that time was less hostile than Judea. No doubt the disciples were relieved when Jesus delayed his journey and were hoping that he would abandon it altogether. Jesus' reference to the twelve hours of the day does not at first sight seem to answer the objection of v 8. But the connection of thought is that the hours of the day are not affected by external circumstances. They are there to be used. Jesus' hour had not yet come (i.e. the twelfth hour) and until God willed that it should come, the only course to adopt was to go about one's mission.

Both the Jews and the Romans divided the hours of daylight into twelve. These hours were, therefore, not all sixty minutes long but varied in length according to the time of the year. The metaphors of light and darkness and the ideas of walking and stumbling were intended to contrast the unerring progress of Jesus with the fumbling efforts of the Jews to stop it (9–10).

At v 11 we meet another instance, so familiar in this gospel, of misunderstanding through taking a metaphorical statement too literally. The idea of death as sleep (12–13) is paralleled in Hellenistic sources and in the OT. That the disciples took the words of Jesus literally is not surprising in view of the fact that the message about Lazarus concerned his illness, not his death. Sleep would have been a hopeful sign in any illness. When Jesus announced he would recover there would not have seemed any necessity in their minds for a raising from death. Following John's explanation how the confusion had arisen (13), Jesus made the clear statement that Lazarus was dead, and the tense of the verb underlines the apparent finality of it. At first sight the statement that Jesus was glad he was not there (14) must have mystified the disciples. But Jesus had a reason to be glad other than the restoration of Lazarus. In line with the purpose of the gospel, John points to the possibility of the development of faith in the disciples. It is almost as if Jesus was concentrating more specifically on the training of the Twelve than on the needs of the two sisters of Lazarus. His mission was bound up with the bringing of the disciples to faith. It must be supposed that Jesus was intending belief of a much fuller kind than the disciples had as yet shown. Although later on attention is drawn to Thomas's doubt, his reaction here did not arise from doubt, but resignation (16).

Vs 17–27 focus on a conversation between Jesus and Martha and are the most theological of the whole narrative. Evidently Jesus was met on the outskirts of Bethany (cf. v 30) and was informed that Lazarus had died four days previously (17). The statement here does not contradict the fact that Jesus already knew of Lazarus's death (as v 14 shows). The nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem is mentioned here to account for the presence of so many Jews who had come to comfort the sisters (18–19). Martha's action in going out to meet Jesus agrees with the portrait of her as a person of action in Lk. 10:38–42. Mary sitting at home is the same reflective rather inactive person found in Luke's account. Martha's words in v 21 are identical with those of Mary in v 32, which suggests that the sisters had arrived at this conclusion after discussing the possibilities. There was clearly a strong faith in the power of Jesus to heal. But Martha's faith went further than that as v 22 shows. Martha appears to have been reaching out for a ray of hope in affirming her belief that God would answer any request of Jesus. Your brother will rise again (23) has a double meaning. Martha took it as a conventional assurance of the resurrection at the last day, but Jesus had a further intention. It is hardly surprising that Martha missed the implication of an immediate rising from the dead.

The highlight of the narrative is the 'I am' saying in v 25. Jesus identified himself with both resurrection and life, which are complementary aspects of the same thing. Nevertheless, it was the purpose of the mission of the resurrected Christ to bring life in the fullest sense. Resurrection comes before life because new life is the product of resurrection. The way to that life is by means of faith, and Jesus challenged Martha on this ground. Jesus was not asking for a confession of faith in himself but in his statement; the emphasis here falls on the content of faith. Martha's response (27) bears a striking similarity to John's statement of purpose (20:31), as if her confession forms the pattern which the whole gospel is intended to support. It is impossible to say how much Martha understood of the Messiahship or Sonship of Jesus. But there is no doubt that to John the content of her statement was of utmost importance. Faith that fell short of so exalted a concept of Christ was inadequate.

Vs 28–37 portray first the reaction of Mary and then that of the Jews who had come to mourn with the sisters. Mary's part in the story can be summarized as follows: Jesus sent Martha for her (28); she immediately responded (29); she fell down at Jesus' feet and repeated the same statement that Martha had made; her tears brought distress to Jesus, who also wept (33–35). Mary is seen here as more emotional than Martha. Even the Jewish mourners add pathos to the scene. They are shown as consoling Mary and following her to the tomb (31); as being touched by the sight of Jesus' tears (36); and as speculating on why Jesus had not prevented this sad happening. The climax is reached in the words he was deeply moved in spirit and troubled (33). The meaning of the word translated deeply moved implies anger and indignation, even outrage. A problem arises over the cause of this outburst. Some have suggested moral indignation at sin which causes death and at the sorrow which follows from it. But such indignation must have continually been in the mind of Jesus, whereas here there seems to be a specific occasion for such expression. Was this caused by the sympathy of Jesus for the sisters? The force of the verb seems to be too strong for that. Was it because of the unreality of the Jewish expression of grief? This is at least a possibility since any show of hypocrisy may well have aroused his anger. It may well be that something of the pathos of human suffering was bearing on Jesus as he knew that his own cup of suffering was so close. The troubling of his spirit proceeded from within. Perhaps it was his knowledge of the strength of unbelief of some of them, who would oppose him even after witnessing the raising of Lazarus. The question in v 37 links this present sign with that of the blind man in ch. 9. They granted the possibility of keeping a man from dying, but they could not conceive of a raising from the dead.

The account of the miracle is relatively brief and is marked by reserve, but all the details have about them the ring of truth. The words Did I not tell you? (40) relate to what Jesus had told the disciples, not Martha. But his words to Martha implied the same intention. Or else the words may be taken as addressing the disciples rather than as a response to Martha. The prayer of Jesus (41–42) is significant because of its emphasis on faith in his mission. The reserve in the account is particularly seen in the simple description of Lazarus coming out of the tomb.

11:45–57 The results of the miracle

John brings out several different reactions to the sign. Some believed (45); some reported the incident to the authorities (46); the Pharisees discussed the matter in the Sanhedrin and decided to plot Jesus' death (47–53); while Jesus himself withdrew towards the wilderness. Even a sign as remarkable as this will not convince those who are determined not to believe. The Sanhedrin's discussion centred on the miraculous signs. They were not questioning that Jesus was performing signs; their fear was that everyone (i.e. except themselves) would believe in Jesus. The question What are we accomplishing? (47) was a rhetorical question to which the answer was 'nothing'. But the deeper fear was of the Romans (48). Their concept of people believing in Jesus was dominated by political considerations. The place was either the temple or the city, and the nation was added to refer to the administration, some of which was still in Jewish hands. John attaches great importance to the fact that Caiaphas was high priest that year since he mentions it twice (49, 51). This was because of the significance of the statement he made in v 50. That it was better for one man to die than for the whole nation to perish may seem a counsel of prudence, but John sees it as establishing a principle that one man might substitute for the people, so fundamental to the NT doctrine of atonement. It is all the more noteworthy because it was uttered by the religious representative who helped to put it into effect. John's comment (51) shows that he understands the statement as having implications far beyond Caiaphas's limited understanding, for the principle was to have universal consequences. John sees the unifying purpose of the death of Christ in gathering together the children of God, a term here used for all who would come to believe in Jesus (52).

The setting for the plotting of the Jews was the pre-Passover activity, which consisted of purification rites. Reports had been passed round about Jesus' signs and the Pharisees' plot. Inevitably speculation followed about Jesus' movements. John mentions the official plot to kill Jesus to set the scene for the anointing and for the entry into Jerusalem.

12:1–50 Close of the public ministry in Jerusalem

12:1–8 The devotion of Mary

The incident of the anointing at Bethany is important because of its connection with the miracle of the raising of Lazarus. The specific time reference (six days before the Passover; 1) is significant for John and may be compared with the six days recorded at the commencement of the ministry. The pint of pure nard would have been a very expensive amount of ointment, as is clear from Judas's estimate that it amounted to a year's wages. It is probable the ointment was a liquid perfume. Although it was the normal procedure to anoint the head (as recorded in Mt 26:7; Mk. 14:3) it may be significant that John records the anointing of the feet, in view of the foot-washing incident narrated in the next chapter. In the parallel case of anointing in Lk. 7:38, it was also the feet that were anointed. However, in spite of some similarities between the two narratives, there are sufficient differences to make it unlikely that the two incidents are the same. In Luke's record the woman is described as a sinful woman who is deeply penitent, whereas Mary of Bethany is seen as a woman deeply devoted to Jesus, and John's picture of her agrees completely with Luke's portrait of the same person. In both instances the woman wiped the feet of Jesus with her hair. It would have been against Jewish convention for a woman to appear in the presence of men with her hair untied, but in Mary's case love was stronger than convention. John's mention of the odour filling the house is a vivid eyewitness detail.

The complaint of Judas against this expensive waste (5) is fully in character with the synoptic account of him. He was stricken not only with the deadly sins of greed and covetousness, but also with dishonesty. John gives here an advance hint of the betrayal to back up his point. The expression a year's wages (5) is lit. 300 denarii (days' pay). Jesus' answer, Leave her alone, it was intended that she should save this perfume for the day of my burial (7) does not mean that Mary had some of the perfume left, but that what she had done was regarded by Jesus as for his burial. Judas was concerned, not about the perfume remaining but the perfume used. The claim that you will not always have me (8) could have been made only by a person who was unique without sounding arrogant.

12:9–11 Reactions to Jesus' presence at Bethany

The curiosity shown by the crowd was in marked contrast to the hostility of the official party. To the former, Lazarus was a draw; to the latter he was a threat. It was the turning of many to faith, the content of which is not mentioned, that determined the chief priests to kill Lazarus as well as Jesus (11).

12:12–19 The entry into Jerusalem

At this period Passover crowds could be immense. The desire of the crowd to greet Jesus was again in marked contrast to the official line. The use of palm branches originated at the Feast of Tabernacles, but it had become associated with other feasts by this time (13). The waving of them was a sign of honour for a victorious person. The chant of Hosanna comes from Ps. 118:25–26 which was one of the psalms chanted at the ascent towards Jerusalem. The title King of Israel shows clearly the Messianic significance of the chant. In vs 14–15 John cites Zc. 9:9 in support of Jesus' entry into Jerusalem on a young donkey rather than on a war horse. Once again John mentions a case of lack of understanding on the part of the disciples. It was only after the resurrection, here referred to as the glorification of Jesus, that any of them understood.

There appear to be two different crowds mentioned in vs 17–18. One group had seen the miracle of Lazarus's restoration, and the other group had only heard of it. The events caused despair on the part of the Pharisees because they would not so easily be able to carry out their plan. There is despairing exaggeration on their part in claiming the whole world has gone after him (see vs 42–43). For a parallel instance of exaggeration cf. 11:48.

12:20–26 The quest of the Greeks

These Greeks may have been Greek proselytes; if so they would have been able to join the Jews in the temple worship. But it is not certain that they were so committed. At least they were religious seekers since they had come to worship. Many Gentiles were attracted to Judaism's ideas because of its higher moral emphasis compared with paganism. These men had probably come from the Decapolis and may even have known Philip who came from nearby Bethsaida. It may be assumed that their quest to see Jesus was prompted by a desire to learn from him rather than mere curiosity. Maybe John sees them as examples of the 'world' going after Jesus.

It is difficult to imagine how they would have understood the opening words of Jesus. They would hardly have been so well informed as John's readers about the significance of the hour (23). The Greeks may have thought in terms of the triumphal entry. But from the context it can be seen that for Jesus his 'hour' was his approaching passion. This is clear from the glorification theme and from the grain of wheat illustration. The formula I tell you the truth (24) points out the importance of the announcement. The principle in nature that death is essential for further life was applied by Jesus to himself by inference. Wheat reproduces its own kind, and Jesus regarded his passion in the same light. His death would produce life for many. The contrast between loving and hating (25) brings out in sharp relief the choice and consequence involved in personal reaction to Jesus. Loving and hating are here relative terms, standing in opposition to each other.

12:27–36 Attestation and withdrawal

It is at this point that John records Jesus' awareness of the arrival of the hour to which his gospel has been leading. There is a clear connection between the soul-trouble of Jesus here (27) and the agony in the Garden of Gethsemane as recorded in the synoptic gospels (Mt. 26:38; Mk. 14:34). In answer to the question What shall I say? two possibilities are given—a prayer to be saved from the hour, which is natural but unthinkable in the light of the total mission of Jesus, or a prayer that the Father's name would be glorified. The emphasis on the latter is wholly in line with John's use of the glorification theme to describe the triumphant outcome of the mission of Jesus on the cross. So crucial is this that it is underlined by a heavenly voice. The content of the divine message is both past and present—glorification is set out as the essence of the divine programme for Jesus (28). There were three reactions to the heavenly voice. Some merely heard a noise like thunder (29). These were in no position to receive any kind of revelation. Others distinguished some kind of supernatural communication but got no higher than an angelic voice. It was Jesus alone who recognized that the voice was for the sake of others. But because they had not heard the message, Jesus explained for their benefit the meaning of it (31–32).

The now in v 31 points more precisely to the commencement of the 'hour'. It is immediately identified as a time for judgment. It would seem that the judgment in mind was a general condemnation of the present world order through the cross. For those who come to faith through the cross, judgment has already taken place at the cross through which they will gain deliverance. The double result is seen clearly in the driving out of the prince of this world and in the magnetic power of Jesus to draw people to himself. The instrument by which Satan designed the defeat of Jesus became the means for the overthrow of his own power. Note that the word But (32) tends to distinguish the uplifting from the driving out, although the two results follow from the same action. We need to ask in what sense the 'drawing' is here intended? The same word occurs in 6:44 of the drawing by the Father of people to Christ. But here it is the Christ to be crucified who acts as a magnet. The statement leaves open the result of the drawing. Some implication of drawing to judgment may be in mind but the predominant feature is a drawing to Christ himself in the more intimate sense of faith.

The reaction of the crowd (34) showed that what they understood by the uplifting was incompatible with the eternal character of the Messiah. The question Who is this 'Son of Man'? exercised the minds not only of the hearers in Jesus' day, but of the readers in John's day and has been a matter of debate ever since. Jesus in answer used the same imagery as was used of him in the prologue, i.e. that he was the light (35, 36). Once again, we have the characteristic contrast between light and darkness. The darkness represents the world without God. Walking in the light means following the light. Jesus spoke of his followers becoming sons of light, but this comes only through trust. Such trust will be necessary after the cross as well as before it. That Jesus left and hid himself from them (36) suggests that he was light not so much in his presence as in his teaching.

12:37–50 Continuing unbelief

The next paragraph gives John's summary of the effects of the ministry of Jesus upon the people. The signs which he had performed had not led generally to faith, and an OT prophecy from Is. 53:1 is cited in support. Jesus was experiencing the same kind of rejection as Isaiah predicted. The emphasis is on the divine initiative, although in the LXX text the statement has the form 'they closed their own eyes'. John understands the words of Isaiah in the sense that neither the message of God nor the acts of God (the arm of the Lord) resulted in faith on the part of the people. Following this quotation from Is. 53, John refers to Is. 6:10, when Isaiah saw the vision of glory in the temple. The perplexing result of unbelief in the prophet's message (40) becomes most vivid in the fulfilment of that prophecy in the ministry of Jesus, although the words of Isaiah are not here specifically applied to Jesus.

John's comment in v 41 raises difficulties. In what sense did he mean that Isaiah saw Jesus' glory, or God's glory? In view of the because in this verse it would seem that John saw a direct connection between Isaiah's message and the mission of Christ. John probably has in mind the Suffering Servant of Isaiah as pointing to Christ himself. What he saw was the glory of the one who was to come. If, on the other hand, Isaiah actually foresaw the glory of God in Jesus, it would presuppose that Jesus had an active role in the messages of the OT prophets. But the former explanation is to be preferred.

John sets over against the statement of v 37 about Jewish unbelief some instances of faith, even among the leaders. Yet he admits that motives of self-interest were an inhibiting factor in their faith. All too often faith has been cramped by fear of people's reaction to it. Being put out of the synagogue (42) meant excommunication. In John's day there may have been those who were attempting to follow Jesus in a secret way. These words would rebuke them.

Vs 44–50 contain a statement by Jesus of the importance of personal response to his mission. It is as if Jesus, having withdrawn (36), returned to make one last public announcement before devoting himself specifically to his disciples (chs. 13–17). Alternatively, it is possible to regard the words Jesus cried out (44) as containing a general summary of his teaching at the conclusion of his ministry. There are familiar themes here. The need for faith, the close connection between Jesus and the one who sent him (repeated three times here), the idea of Jesus as light, and the contrast between light and darkness (44–46). The second main theme is judgment (47–48). Although judgment is determined by the word of Jesus, yet his mission was not primarily for this purpose. Its objective was salvation; judgment was but the consequence. The agent of judgment is said to be that very word which I spoke (48), which ties up with John's opening identification of Jesus as the Word (1:1). Clearly the basis of authority is of great importance in the matter of judgment, and here that is vested in the perfect agreement of both Father and Son. The theme of eternal life mentioned in v 50 repeats what has already been said earlier in the gospel. John concludes the public ministry of Jesus with a statement which stresses the importance of his teaching. This serves as a link with the next section, which concentrates on teaching to the disciples.

13:1–17:26 Jesus with his disciples

13:1–38 Jesus' symbolic action of feet-washing and its sequel

The opening words do not necessarily mean that the incident recorded took place on the day before the Passover Feast, although this is generally supposed to be the case. There is much discussion about the relationship between John's account and that of the synoptics with regard to the date of the Last Supper. It would seem that John dates the Passover meal a day earlier than the synoptics. This difference might be due to the use of two different calendars, but this proposal contains many difficulties. It is best to suppose that the Passover took place on Nisan 15 and to maintain that John's account can be interpreted in line with this.

The opening section prepares the way for the understanding of the true significance of the feet-washing. Note the deep awareness on Jesus' part of the arrival of the hour (1); the extent of his love for his own people; the activity of the devil against him through Judas (2) and Jesus' certainty of the divine origin and destiny of his work. This is a concise summary of the thrust of the mission. Throughout the ministry there had been antagonism between Jesus and the devil, and it was about to reach its climax. There is here a strong contrast between the Father's love and the devil's evil designs. John comments (3) that Jesus knew that the hour of sorrow was in his Father's hands, in harmony with Jesus' recurrent claim that he was doing the Father's will. The washing that followed was prompted by this realization (4–5). It was clearly intended to be a symbolic act, symbolic both of cleansing and of humble service. The meaning of the totally unexpected act of humility is given in vs 12–17. The removal of the outer garment and the wrapping of a towel round the waist was the dress of menial service and would have been despised by both Jew and Greek alike.

There is no need to suppose that Jesus started with Simon Peter (6). Peter's reactions here are fully in accord with our knowledge of him from other NT accounts. His question, his emphatic refusal and his impetuous and extravagant reversal of attitude are all characteristic of him. Running through the narrative is the disciples' bewilderment which was dispelled only later (7). This is all of a piece with earlier instances of misunderstandings. Jesus' answer in v 8 makes no sense unless the act was symbolic. Unless Jesus cleanses people they have no possibility of cleansing. At least Peter grasped this (9).

The words of v 10 suggest that the feet-washing was more than an example. It was a means by which the disciples could participate in the Lord's humiliation. The first application of the foot-washing to spiritual cleansing is now linked to an example of humble service. The act of atoning was not an act which would need repeating. V 11 shows that although Jesus had included Judas in the ceremonial washing, the latter's betrayal of Jesus would leave him unclean.

In the next paragraph (12–17) Jesus challenged the disciples on the basis of what he had just done. He knew the limitations of their understanding. In answering his own question, Jesus appealed first to his own relationship to them (Teacher, Lord) and then to his example (you also should wash one another's feet). The authoritative nature of his approach is unmistakable, but the command becomes all the more striking when it is remembered that humility was despised in the ancient world as a sign of weakness. Jesus' command was therefore revolutionary in the sphere of human relationships. Some Christians have performed feet-washing as a ritual act, but it is more likely that Jesus' command was specifically conditioned by the context. If feet washing need not be repeated, there is no let out for the accompanying humility. Jesus regarded lowly service to others as an honourable act. The word servant in v 16 translates the Greek word for slave, who had no rights in his master's house. Since the word messenger is the Greek word for 'apostle', it is a reminder of the obligations resting on those apostles whom Jesus chose to proclaim his message. These words, with their context of the need for humility, must later have removed any thought of privilege from the office of apostle.

Knowing without doing (17) finds no sanction anywhere in the teaching of Jesus.

Jesus returned to the theme of the betrayal (cf. v 11). Judas seems to have been quoted as an example of one who did not do what he knew to be true. Although the betrayal has yet to be narrated, John shows that Jesus was fully aware that the betrayer's heel would be raised against him; it was predicted in Scripture (Ps. 41:9). If the disciples could grasp this they would come to faith in the person of Jesus. The I am he of v 19 could well be an allusion to the great name for God in Ex. 3:14. The saying with which this section closes also occurs in Mt. 10:40 at the sending out of the Twelve. It implies here that too much should not be made of the action of one man who did not receive him. Rather the need is emphasized for a positive attitude towards Jesus by the rest of the disciples.

21–30 Yet again the strain of the betrayal comes to the fore. The fact that Jesus was troubled in spirit (21) echoed his reaction in 11:33; 12:27, where the same expression of strong distress is mentioned. These reflect the mounting tension at the approach of the passion. The reference to the betrayal in v 21 is more specific than in the earlier hints (one of you is going to betray me). The effect on the disciples was more dramatic. It is told even more vividly in the synoptics (cf. Mt. 26:22; Mk. 14:19; Lk. 22:23). The various details—the disciples looking at one another, the beloved disciple lying close to Jesus, the beckoning action of Peter, the whispered conversation and Jesus' deliberate and symbolic response—are so vividly told that the account must come first-hand from an eyewitness.

Who was the disciple whom Jesus loved (23)? Because of the vivid details, it is likely that the author is here referring to himself. He was deeply conscious of the love which Jesus showed to his disciples. There is no need to think that he is implying that Jesus loved him more than anyone else. It has been thought more likely by some that the writer must be distinguished from John, or that on the basis of 11:3, 5 the expression describes Lazarus. But this seems unlikely.

The dipping of the piece of bread and the offering of it to Judas (26), a gesture of honour, must be regarded as a final appeal to the betrayer. John's comment that as soon as Judas took the bread Satan entered into him (27) must have been the result of considerable subsequent reflection. Anyone who could act like Judas must have been under satanic influence. Once again John relates an occasion when the disciples' understanding failed them. They could think only in terms of buying food or almsgiving, as an explanation of Jesus' words to Judas (29), for he was the treasurer. John sees a symbolic significance in the fact that it was night when Judas departed. There was spiritual darkness in the man's soul.

Vs 31–38 are the prelude to what has become known as the farewell discourses (chs. 14–16). It contains two themes—Jesus' relationship to the disciples and his specific prediction about Peter. Once again Jesus speaks of his coming glorification (31–32). It is as if the glory is seen against the darkness surrounding Judas's departure. These verses show the triumphal way in which Jesus faced the passion. He had no doubt that the hand of God was in it. There is a backward look about v 33. It recalls the words of Jesus to the Jews in 7:33. Jesus clarified his words for the benefit of the disciples. Glorification would involve separation. The new commandment in v 34 is repeated in the teaching of 15:12. Commands to love were already known in the sense of the highest devotion to God, but Jesus' command that the disciples should love one another was new both in its scope and its motivation, which sprang from the love Jesus had for them.

14:1–31 Assurances and commands to the disciples

The words of Jesus in v 14 were uttered against the background of foreboding which had gripped the disciples following the revelation of the betrayal. The comforting words had a particular value in this context, but they have nevertheless provided comfort in many quite different situations. There is some question about how the verbs in the second half of the verse should be understood: ‘Trust in God, trust also in me’ (both imperative); ‘You trust in God’ (indicative), ‘trust also in me’ (imperative); ‘You trust in God; you trust also in me’ (both indicative). The first fits best into the present context. The reference to many rooms in the Father’s house (2) is clearly intended to bring encouragement. This is a vivid way of saying there is ample provision in heaven for the disciples of Jesus.

The preparing of the place is through the passion and resurrection of Jesus. I will come back (3) seems to be a clear reference to the second coming, although some have interpreted it of Pentecost or even of the visitation of Jesus at the believer’s death. Although the disciples’ subsequent questionings would not give the impression of much spiritual understanding, nevertheless Jesus’ words in v 4 show that they ought to have known the way to the Father. Thomas was too literal in his questioning (5). He did not expect the way to be identified with Jesus. Jesus is the way because he is also the truth and the life. That is to say the second and third words throw light on the first. The way, as personalized in Jesus, was a way of suffering and of triumph through humiliation.

The NIV’s If you really knew me (7) suggests that the disciples did not know Jesus. It is better to take the words to mean ‘You know me; you will know my Father also’. There is profound truth here—knowledge of Jesus leads to knowledge of the Father. Philip’s lack of understanding is easy to imagine. He wanted a direct revelation of God as the only satisfactory way (8), but this earned a rebuke from Jesus. None of the disciples had grasped the profound truth that God had made himself known in Jesus. There are two grounds on which Jesus appealed to Philip; on the basis of what he said and on the basis of what he did. At least the disciples should have realized that the miracles of Jesus showed that they could only be the works of God (10–11).

The statement of Jesus in v 12 is surprising. The believer would do greater things than these. Jesus had made clear that the believer would continue what he had been doing. But greater than that can be understood only in the light of the post-resurrection period during which the gospel would be proclaimed. It is clear that the greater things can be done only because Jesus is going to the Father. The book of Acts is evidence of the fulfilment of this prediction, and the worldwide spread of Christianity today a further sign of these ‘greater things’. The close link between the promise and the attitude of prayer needed for its fulfilment is seen in vs 13–14.

The connection between love and obedience is twice stressed in this section (15, 21). The obedience is, therefore, no slavish attitude but a willing conformity. It is in fact a revolutionary advance over the Jewish approach to the Mosaic law. Jesus knew that they would need help to fulfil their task, and the promise of the Counsellor must be seen in this context. The word in the Greek is paraklete which literally means one called alongside to help, and was used of a legal advocate. The title contains the idea of strong encouragement. The fact that another Counsellor is promised suggests that the Spirit would do what Jesus himself had done during his ministry, by bringing the words of Jesus to their minds (cf. v 26).

The identification of the Paraclete as the Spirit of Truth follows from Jesus’ own declaration to be the truth (6). The contrast between the world and the disciples is summarized in v 17 and further developed in the next paragraph. The disciples were assured of Jesus’ presence even when the world could no longer see him (18–19). The word orphans suggests those with no caring support. Again, as in v 3, there is some ambiguity about the coming (I will come to you). Although it is possible to see this as a reference to Pentecost (the Spirit is mentioned), it is more natural to understand the coming as the coming of the resurrected Lord. Since the Spirit was given when Jesus was glorified, it is clear that there is a close relation between the two interpretations. This is supported by the reference to life in v 19. A further consequence is the mutual indwelling mentioned in v 20, which can come about only through the work of the Spirit. For the connection between love and obedience, cf. v 15. The revelation of the Father is channelled through Christ's love for us (21).

At this point Judas (not Iscariot) saw a problem. Why was Jesus' love not extended to the world? In answer Jesus again drew attention to the love motive (23–24), as if declining to be deflected by Judas's question. But it was nevertheless a true answer, for wherever there are believers, the Father and Son dwell with them, whereas this does not happen with those who refuse to obey the teaching (24). The next statement about the Holy Spirit (26) explains how the disciples would later recall that teaching. They had heard the teaching while Jesus had been with them; they would be aided in remembering that teaching when Jesus had departed from them. This saying is important for the preservation of the tradition of the teaching of Jesus. Any view of gospel origins which does not take into account the promised aid of the Holy Spirit in preserving and bringing to the mind of the writer what he, the Spirit, willed to be recorded must be considered unsatisfactory. The promise of peace (27) is in line with the opening verse of Jn. 14, but must here be considered as a farewell greeting which would acquire new meaning subsequent to the resurrection (cf. Jn 20:19, 21, 26). There is a strong possessive aspect in this context—Jesus spoke of 'the peace that is mine' (27). It is a peace which has been put to the test. It is fundamentally different from the peace offered by the world. Paul echoes this concept when he refers to 'the peace of God which transcends all understanding' (Phil. 4:7).

The concluding paragraph (28–31) contains a mild rebuke. If the disciples really loved Jesus they would rejoice that his mission was on the point of being accomplished. The words because I go to my Father supply the key. Had they realized this they would not have been troubled, for the return to the Father meant the completion of the mission. But why in this context did Jesus say the Father is greater than I? It must not be isolated from its context, but seen in the light of Jesus' return to the Father. His present position on earth was less than the Father's glorified position in heaven. It was part of the mission of Jesus to accept an inferior position. But the words must also be understood in the light of the repeated assertions by Jesus that he did the Father's will. This verse should be compared with 10:30. V 29 is closely paralleled in 13:19, where once again the end in view was to encourage the disciples to faith.

The prince of the world (30) is seen as the active agent in the coming passion (although cf. 12:31 for his predicted defeat). Jesus was deeply conscious of the powerful forces arrayed against him. Yet he knew the devil had no hold on him; he could not alter the Father's plans. Part of the aim of the mission of Jesus was to teach the world of his love for the Father (31). It was difficult for the disciples to grasp that this could be accomplished through the cross. The concluding verse (31) is somewhat enigmatic, for it seems to be the end of the discourse in the upper room. It is possible to regard the remainder of the discourse as taking place in the open air, although in 18:1 Jesus is said to have 'left' with his disciples, and it would be necessary to suppose that chs. 15–17 were uttered on the way to the Kidron Valley. Some have supposed that ch. 14 should follow ch. 17, but there is no evidence for such rearrangement. The only other alternative is to suppose that 14:31 implied an intention which was fulfilled some time later. On the whole the first suggestion is fraught with the least difficulties.

15:1–17 The vine allegory

It is not clear from the narrative where Jesus was when he gave this teaching. If 14:31 marks the point of departure from the upper room, it is possible that Jesus and his disciples were passing by a vine which was then used as a spiritual illustration. I am the vine (1) is the last of the great 'I am' sayings in John's gospel. Its significance can be appreciated against the background of the OT idea of Israel as a vine or vineyard (Ps. 80:8–16; Is. 5:1–7; Ezk. 15:1–6; 19:10–14). Jesus was the true vine in the sense of being genuine as compared with Israel which had not acted in harmony with its calling. Jesus was the reality of which Israel was but the type. The gardener, identified as the Father, would be responsible for the caring for the vine. The figure shows how close is the relationship between Jesus and the Father. Since the purpose of the vine is to produce fruit, the focus of attention falls on the branches and what needs to be done to ensure a good crop (2). Pruning is the most important operation for maintaining the fruitfulness of the vine. A completely fruitless branch is not worthy of its place in the vine and has to be removed, whereas weak branches can be strengthened by being pruned. Among the disciples Judas was removed while the others had to undergo 'pruning' experiences before producing fruit after Pentecost. Since Jesus spoke of his word as the means of pruning, he could speak as if the disciples were already pruned (3), although the process was clearly far from complete.

Since branches unattached to the vine have no chance of bearing fruit, it is imperative for the disciples to remain in me (4). The main purpose of the vine allegory is to stress the importance of their dependence on him. V 5 underlines the disciples' helplessness apart from Jesus. The 'casting out' of v 6 is the complement of the pruning action in v 2. There is no need here to regard the fire as anything more than a vivid detail of the parable. These branches which need to be lopped are destined for the bonfire. But the application of the illustration is found in v 7, where remaining in the vine is closely linked with prayer. Those close enough to the vine will not wish to ask anything not in line with the vine himself. This paragraph ends (8) with a further emphasis on the need for fruitfulness; it is not an end in itself but is meant to bring glory to the Father.

The second paragraph of this section develops some of the themes of the first, especially the close relationship between Jesus and his disciples. First, the Father's love for the Son is the pattern for the Son's love for his disciples (9). Secondly, the Son's obedience to the Father is the pattern for the disciples' obedience to the Son (10). Thirdly, the need to remain in my love is repeated three times in vs 9–10. Fourthly, the Son's joy is the basis for the disciples' joy (11). There is a particular poignancy here in view of the approaching passion (but cf. Heb. 12:2).

Jesus next focused on the power of love. This must be mutual (12)—again the pattern is Jesus' love for his disciples. That Jesus himself was thinking of his coming passion is seen from the greater love saying of vs 13–14, for he was about to lay down his life for his friends, an act of sacrifice which they were not yet capable of appreciating. The change of relationship from servants to friends is significant. The difference does not lie in a change of attitude—both are expected to obey (14)—but in communication. Whereas servants blindly obey, friends are taken into confidence (15). Although the statement everything that I learned from my Father I have made known to you appears as a completed act, the revelation was not fully understood until after the death and resurrection of Jesus (cf. 16:12). The Spirit was to be the interpreter. Lest the disciples should think they had earned special favour, Jesus reminded them that he chose them, not vice versa. But the purpose of the choosing was fruit-bearing, possibly in this context the bringing of others to Christ. The then (16) is misleading. The promise that the Father will answer prayer is a result of the choosing and not the consequence of the fruit-bearing. V 17 underlines v 12. It may seem strange to think of love as a command, but this idea is prominent in this passage.

15:18–16:33 Further teaching for the disciples

15:18–16:3 The hostility of the world. In the previous section Jesus spoke of the power of love. Then he turned his thought to the power of hate, warning his disciples about coming opposition from the world. The world is here, as throughout this gospel, the moral order apart from God. There is a deep chasm between the world's love of its own and its hatred of all that Jesus stood for (18–19). The principle at work here is that like attracts like and repels opposites. Jesus pointed out a spiritual reason for the world's hate. Because he had chosen his disciples, they had become suspect in the eyes of the world. In v 20 Jesus reminded the disciples of a statement he had made earlier (cf. 13:16). Servants cannot expect better treatment than their master. Previously it related to the need for humility; here it concerns the way the world will treat them. The second 'if' clause (if they obeyed my teaching) introduces an unfulfilled condition; therefore the disciples cannot expect the world to obey their teaching. Yet if the meaning is that as some obeyed the teaching of Jesus, so some would respond to the disciples, it would avoid the conclusion that it is impossible for any in the world to respond.

Persecution springs from ignorance (21), a failure to recognize that Jesus was doing the work of the Father. Yet there was no excuse (22). The coming of Jesus had thrown on his hearers a moral responsibility. Of course, sin existed before Jesus came, but the sin of failing to recognize the Father's purpose in the Son's mission resulted in guilt. People refused to recognize the fullest revelation of God. V 24 returns to the hate theme and then points out the sin of ignoring the uniqueness of the miracles of Jesus. In fact Jesus strongly expressed their rejection in terms of hate (24). Scripture (cf. Pss. 25:19; 69:4) is cited in support of this interpretation.

There is a close connection between the further reference to the Holy Spirit and the previous context. Jesus wished to reassure the disciples that the Spirit would testify to them as they would testify to Jesus (26–27). The most important aspect of this statement is that the Spirit goes out from the Father. This must be understood in the context of the mission of Jesus rather than as an external 'procession' as understood by the Greek fathers. In the light of v 27 it is clear that this promised function of the Spirit was first and foremost for the disciples. They had been with Jesus and had the responsibility of being eyewitnesses to the historic events. But the promise has a wider application wherever Christian witness is spread.

The coming persecution (16:1–4) is here referred to more specifically. The warning was given in order to prepare the disciples for the coming events. The verb translated go astray (1) literally means 'faced with an obstacle', i.e. Jewish opposition. Putting out of the synagogue (2) refers to excommunication, something that every devout Jew would dread because it meant being cut off from the cherished heritage. This was a threat that all the early Jewish Christians had to come to terms with. The conviction that persecution of Christians would be regarded as service to God is vividly illustrated in the case of Paul (Acts 9:1–2; 26:9–11). The inconsistency of such an attitude is basically ignorance of both the Father and the Son (3). There was in fact a serious flaw in their thinking; they were deluding themselves. The distinction in v 4 between the earlier and later revelation of Jesus about approaching persecution was tied up with the coming of the Spirit. That was the time mentioned here.

16:5–15 The work of the Holy Spirit. There appears to be a contradiction between v 5 and 13:36; 14:5, since in the latter cases Peter and Thomas did ask where Jesus was going. But consider the different contexts. Here Jesus was concerned with the completion of his whole mission. The disciples had insufficient insight to enquire about this. Neither Peter nor Thomas had earlier grasped the full significance of their question. The disciples were now plunged into even more perplexity by Jesus' further revelations. Jesus commented that they were filled with grief (6). In order to alleviate that grief Jesus assured them that his going away would be beneficial to them. Once again the answer lies in the promised coming of the Spirit: this is the fourth Paraclete saying. There is a close relationship here between Jesus and the Spirit (7). The allusion is primarily to the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost which was subsequent to the passion and resurrection of Jesus. The action of the Spirit will be to convict. Since the Greek word is followed by a preposition, meaning ‘in regard to’ followed by three different subjects, the act of convicting relates to all three (8). The first, sin, is less difficult than the other two. The meaning must be that the Spirit convicts the world of its sin, righteousness and judgment. The world has no true understanding of the nature of sin, but the Spirit will show people that they are sinners because of their unbelief in Christ (9). The Spirit also convicts of righteousness (10), an unexpected idea until it is recognized that the world’s idea of righteousness is very different from God’s. Only when the world is convicted of the hollowness of its own righteousness will it appreciate the righteousness of Christ, which has been vindicated by his exaltation. The third activity of the Spirit is to convict of judgment (11). Again, the world’s judgment is wrong, based on the principles of the prince of this world, but since the latter is condemned this exposes the world’s method of judging. The world is equally condemned with its prince.

The fifth Paraclete saying, which directly follows the fourth, focuses on the Spirit’s work in revelation. The all truth of v 13 is the total revelation which comes through Jesus Christ. The Spirit guides only in harmony with his own nature, i.e. truth. The masculine pronoun is here used which points to the personality of the Spirit as guide. Moreover he speaks not on his own authority but only what he hears, a clear allusion to the close relation between the Spirit and the one who sends him. What are the things that are yet to come? It is unlikely that distant future events are in mind. It is preferable to see here an allusion to the fuller revelation which would follow the outpouring of the Spirit. The Spirit’s work is to glorify Christ (14), an important understanding of his work which excludes any glorification of the Spirit. This is underlined in v 15 and is abundantly illustrated in this gospel.

16:16–24 Grief transformed to joy. The statement in v 16 carries further the hint already given in 13:33 that there is a little while which will have a radical outcome. Since there is a double little while here, it is best to think in terms of the death and resurrection of Jesus. The perplexity of the disciples in vs 17–18 is understandable, although it is not clear why no direct question was put to Jesus. When Jesus answered their unspoken confusion (19) he again repeated the little while. John’s comment about the disciples’ lack of understanding reflects close knowledge of their thoughts at this time. In his reply to their perplexity Jesus reminded them again of coming sorrow (20), but this was in order to add the promise of the joy that was to follow. There is a vivid contrast between the world’s joy and the disciples’ joy. The transformation of grief into joy is illustrated by the metaphor of childbirth. It is a universal law that labour pains are forgotten once the joy of new birth is realized (21). The same principle of sorrow being turned into joy was applied to the disciples (22). The main characteristic of that joy would be its security. The joy would be so lasting that no amount of opposition would be able to destroy it. In that day (23) refers to the time when the full implications of the resurrection have dawned upon them, in which case questions such as the meaning of Jesus’ enigmatic statements regarding his departure would be unnecessary. There would also be a change in procedure—they would be put to the Father (23). The importance of this reference to prayer is seen by the use of the formula I tell you the truth. Prayer becomes more vital after the departure of Jesus. It is seen as the means of ensuring a constant fullness of joy (24). The suggestion is that until now the disciples had not addressed the Father in Jesus’ name as they would learn to do after the resurrection.

16:25–33 Confusion transformed to faith. The word translated speaking figuratively in v 25 has already been used in 10:6 to describe the illustration of the sheepfold. There is a parallel rather than contradiction between Jesus' speaking in parables to the Galilean crowds and in plain language to the disciples (Mk. 4:33–34) and his using obscure language before the passion and resurrection and the clearer revelation which would follow. Language has to be tempered according to the capacity of the hearers. The time coming refers to Pentecost, after which the Spirit would speak plainly to the disciples. The words in vs 26–27 suggest that Jesus wanted the disciples to know that prayer in his name would be responded to because of the Father's love for them. With such love they would have direct access to the Father. It is remarkable that the disciples' love for Jesus is said to be the basis of the Father's love. The fact is their love for Christ and their faith in him is a striking evidence of God's love for them. The statement here complements the passage in 15:9–16. The mission of Jesus and its consummation is concisely expressed in v 28.

The concluding section in this chapter reveals a further case of inadequate understanding on the part of the disciples. They thought they understood (29), but Jesus again made them aware of their coming failure to support him. Their faith was based on the fact that they thought Jesus was speaking plainly and needed no-one to ask him questions. The basis was quite inadequate, but they reached a right conclusion, i.e. that Jesus came from God (30). The words of Jesus in v 31 You believe at last! would be better understood as 'now you believe' but a testing time is coming. V 32 must have been a shock after their confident assertion of faith: they were going to desert Jesus. Yet the Father would not desert him. In this way Jesus gently challenged their confession of faith. Yet he looked beyond their desertion to their restoration, to a time when they would gain peace in a hostile world through Christ's victory over it (33).

17:1–26 The prayer of Jesus

17:1–5 Jesus' prayer for himself. The opening words of v 1 make clear that there is a close connection between the prayer and the preceding discourse. The main theme of this part of the prayer is glory. The time is the time of the passion and resurrection, which is the pathway to glory. The process of glorification is assumed and not stated. Many times in this gospel the cross is linked with glory. But here the chief thrust is the mutual glorification of Father and Son. Earlier in the gospel the authority vested in the Son by the Father is mentioned, and it is repeated here (2). The purpose is said to be the bestowing of eternal life to those given to him. There is a sense here that the outcome of the mission cannot fail because it is in the Father's hands. The implication of eternal life is that God and Christ may be known (3). The title the only true God is not found elsewhere in John and is here intended to contrast with the many contemporary false gods. This is the only occasion when Jesus is recorded to have used the title Jesus Christ. Vs 4–5 resume the glory theme. When Jesus said I have brought you glory the question arises whether in his mind he was including the glory which would come through the cross, even though this had not yet happened. Since the appropriate time was very much in his mind, all that that involved must have been included in the present statement. The work was completed only after the passion had occurred. The words the glory which I had with you before the world began (5) must point to the pre-existence of the Son and to the reality of the incarnation. Jesus was returning to the Father where he belonged.

17:6–19 Jesus' prayer for his disciples. The first theme of this part of the prayer is Jesus' revelation to the disciples. The words I have revealed sum up the whole of Jesus' ministry. The subject of the revelation in the Greek is 'your name', which has been summarized by the NIV as you. In view of the repetition of the ‘name’ in v 12, it is better to retain the notion of name, although recognizing that the name involves the nature. It is most probable that here the name in mind is that of the Father. V 6 suggests that the disciples already belonged to the Father before Jesus chose them. Note the stress on obedience here as a characteristic of those chosen. V 7 is strangely worded (everything you have given me comes from you), but it underlines the sovereign purpose of God. A further development is found in v 8, where knowledge leads to faith. Of course, that faith was as yet in its infancy but Jesus looked ahead to its development. When Jesus stated I am not praying for the world (9), he based this on the fact that the Father had not given the world to him. This antithesis between his own people and the world is a dominant theme in this gospel. The idea of gift and possession is further stressed in v 10, as is the glory theme carried forward from the opening section of the prayer. It must be admitted that Jesus had received very little glory from the disciples as yet, but again he seems to have been projecting his thought into the future.

Next follows a specific prayer for the protection of the disciples (11–12). Jesus’ address to God as Holy Father is unique to this context. The prayer for protection by the power of your name is an attempt to express the force of the Greek which reads ‘in [en] your name’. Although the rendering is legitimate, the more natural understanding of en here is ‘in’, in the sense of the disciples being ‘in you’, i.e. in accordance with the character of God.

The prayer for unity sets a high standard, no less than the unity between God and Jesus. It is important to note that true unity is possible only in the name, i.e. in alignment with the purpose of God in Christ. Having prayed to the Father to protect the disciples, Jesus declared that he had protected them (12). It is as if he was handing back the task to God. The exception was Judas, here called the one doomed to destruction (lit. ‘the son of perdition’). The expression occurs again in 2 Thes. 2:3 of the ‘man of lawlessness’. In the Greek there is a play on words between ‘lost’ (apōleto) and ‘perdition’ (apōleias), bringing out the contrast between Judas and the other disciples. The reference to Scripture in v 12 is possibly an allusion to Ps. 41:9.

In the expression the full measure of my joy, the possessive ‘my’ is emphatic. No greater prospect could be conceived. In these verses (13–18) there is another strong contrast between the disciples and the world. There is a further contrast between being not of the world (14, 16) and the words out of the world (15). The burden of the prayer is for protection from the evil one. Twice Jesus mentions your word (14, 17) as a powerful agency. First, as the means of stirring up the hatred of the world; secondly, as the means of sanctification. The word here sums up the whole message of God in the teaching of Jesus, which the disciples were to proclaim to the world. V 19 speaks of Jesus’ dedication to his task in order to attain the sanctification of the disciples. They would derive strength through his example.

17:20–26 Jesus’ prayer for the church. So far Jesus had concentrated on those whom he had taught, but he then switched to those who would believe through the disciples’ testimony (20). He made no distinction between those who had heard him personally and those who had heard through others. For both the prayer is for unity. Again the pattern for unity is the relationship between the Father and the Son (21), the basis is abiding in the Father and the Son, and the purpose is evangelistic (21, 23). The cycle here is faith leading to unity which leads others to faith. Another aspect of the unity theme is glory, a theme which is echoed from the opening words of this prayer. The suggestion is that the glory of Christ engenders unity. Not only must the unity be complete, but it must be shown to the world. If we pause to reflect on the church’s record of disunity, we can easily see how far we have fallen short of Jesus’ requirements.

Jesus developed the glory theme (24), linking it with the Father's love towards him before the creation of the world, an echo of the pre-existence theme already met with in v 5. The concluding verses (24–26) follow on from v 24 but also form a fitting climax to the whole prayer. The address to God as Righteous Father emphasizes the justness of his view of the world. Again we meet with the strong contrast between the world and the disciples. That the love you have for me may be in them means that they may reflect the Father's love by their love for Jesus and for others. The prayer thus ends with the request for the indwelling Christ in believers.

18:1–21:25 Passion and resurrection narratives

18:1–11 The betrayal

Although there are certain points of contact between John's account and the synoptics, this record of the betrayal is mainly peculiar to John. John alone mentions the name of the valley where the garden was situated, whereas the synoptics tell us the garden was called Gethsemane. Although John does not mention the agony in the garden, he knew about it (cf. v 11). His comment that Judas knew the garden because the disciples had often met Jesus there, looks like an eyewitness observation. The aim of the detachment of soldiers (3) would have been to maintain order, to augment the temple police. Jesus did not wait for Judas to single him out, but stepped forward and addressed the soldiers and police (4). The 'I am' in v 5 does not appear to carry the same implications as the earlier sayings, although the fact that the questioners fell back (6) suggests that they were overawed by more than a mere assest of identity. Their staggering was, however, only temporary. There was no ongoing recognition of the extraordinary character of Jesus. The request of Jesus that the disciples should be allowed to go (8) is found only in John. V 9 is seen as a fulfilment of the statement of Jesus in 17:12. It is surprising that Peter was carrying a sword (10). It is possible that it was some kind of dagger. The act of striking the servant's ear was clearly one of desperation, courageous but pointless. John alone mentions the servant's name. The reference to the cup (11) seems to be a clear allusion to the experience in Gethsemane recorded by the synoptics (cf. Mt. 26:39–40). Peter had not grasped Jesus' determination to follow through his mission.

18:12–19:16 The trial

18:12–27 The Jewish trial. The chief interest in this account of the arrest lies in the reference to Caiaphas as high priest that year (13) and John's reminder of the earlier incident involving Caiaphas (11:49–51). Annas, Caiaphas's father-in-law, had previously held the office of high priest and still exercised considerable influence. The reaction of only two of the disciples is mentioned, i.e. Simon Peter and another disciple (15). The latter may well have been John, although his acquaintance with the high priest is difficult to explain. It was through this disciple that Peter gained access to the courtyard. In John's account the threefold denial of Peter is punctuated by the high priest's questioning of Jesus (19–24). Besides the reference here to the fire, it is mentioned elsewhere only in Luke (Lk. 22:56). Only John notes the cold (18).

The reply of Jesus (20) to the questioning suggests that the high priest was probing for some secret teaching which Jesus had given to his disciples. V 20 would be in emphatic contrast to such a suggestion. If the high priest wanted evidence, there was ample opportunity for him to seek it from witnesses. This would have been the normal procedure at a properly conducted trial. Indeed, the defence witnesses should have been called first. It may be that Annas did not consider his examination official and thus not bound by legal rules. The blow from the officer's hand was another irregularity. Jesus' comment in v 23 was calmly demanding a fair hearing. But already the intrigues of his opponents were working against that. Some see a difficulty in the reference to the high priest (Annas) in v 22 and the further reference in v 24 (Caiaphas). It is likely that Annas retained the title although not the office.

The third person to challenge Peter (25–27) was a relative of the man whose ear he had cut off. The synoptics do not mention this. On the other hand, John omits the oaths and cursings, followed by the bitter tears.

18:28–40 The trial before Pilate. John's account of Jesus before Pilate is more detailed than the account in the synoptic gospels. He brings out the irony of the contrast between the scrupulousness of the Jews over Sabbath keeping and their lack of scrupulousness in manipulating the system to achieve their own purposes. The first episode took place outside the praetorium (the governor's residence). Pilate examined both the accused and the accusers. By remaining outside in the colonnade the Jews avoided ritual uncleanness (28). But they were already defiled in their hearts through their plot to kill Jesus. Pilate's request to know the charges was perfectly reasonable (29), but the accusers' answer was not only evasive but insolent (30). Although the Sanhedrin had power to condemn a man to death, they were required to obtain the governor's sanction (31). John's comment in v 32 implies that since Jesus had predicted death by crucifixion, events were overruled in the fulfilment.

The second incident in this trial, a conversation between Pilate and Jesus, took place inside the palace (praetorium). Pilate's question in v 33 should be understood to mean, 'Do you claim to be the king of the Jews?' The notion of kingship was probably in the Sanhedrin's charge in order to implicate the governor. But Jesus made clear that his concept of kingship differed from Pilate's. If his kingdom were really a threat to the empire, surely Jesus would have organized a revolt. The words translated from another place (36) mean lit. 'not from here'. The sense is clear; Jesus' kingship was of a different order from this world's kingdoms. A spiritual kingdom does not need to be supported by physical force.

There was an element of scorn in Pilate's question (37), but he was not prepared for Jesus' answer, introducing the concept of truth. Here is the only direct reference to the birth of Jesus in this gospel. Since the royalty of this world is not generally linked to the idea of truth, Pilate's question What is truth? is understandable, although it is clear that he did not ask out of any real desire to know the answer. Nevertheless, he recognized no basis for the serious charge brought against Jesus by his accusers. Pilate's weakness of character is seen from the conflict between his judgment about the innocence of Jesus and his proposition to the Jews in v 39. In the question Do you want me to release 'the king of the Jews,' Pilate purposely used the title king, no doubt to show his contempt for the Jews. The word used to describe Barabbas is lit. 'robber', but it had come to include political terrorists, hence the NIV's reference to rebellion. A violent man was preferred to the king of truth.

19:1–16 Pilate sentences Jesus. Pilate gave in to the accusers and permitted the flogging and the mockery (1–3). Although he may have thought that the scourging of Jesus would shame the accusers to desist from further demands, the action was totally unjustified. But since he again affirmed the innocence of Jesus after the scourging (4), it would seem that he regarded this as an alternative to crucifixion. The imperfect tense of the verbs in v 3 suggests a succession of mock acts of homage. The belated attempt of Pilate to appeal to the people's pity (5) is another pathetic evidence of his inconsistency and weakness. There is no knowing what significance he himself attached to his statement 'Here is the man!' (5), but the words were more meaningful than he knew, for in his humiliation Jesus was the representative man, standing in the place of other people. In all the records the cry ‘Crucify’ (6) follows Pilate’s proposal to release Jesus. His words offering Jesus for them to crucify were ironical, for he knew the Jews had no power to do this. The accusers then introduced a religious charge based on an appeal to their law. Pilate was worried by the reference to law, for the Romans’ policy was to maintain local customs and laws. Nonetheless, the mysterious claim to be the Son of God must have further unsettled him and led him to ask Where do you come from? (9), a question which Jesus met with silence. The question was irrelevant to the charge. But Jesus’ refusal to answer stung Pilate into reminding him of his authority (10). Jesus, however, corrected Pilate’s idea of authority. Pilate may have possessed imperial authority, but this did not reach to ultimate destinies (11). Jesus knew that the whole work of redemption did not rest on the despotic action of the Roman governor. The greater guilt lay with Caiaphas.

Pilate’s further attempt to release Jesus and his capitulation under the threat of being disloyal to Caesar bring the account of the trial to an end. The reference to Caesar concluded the matter for Pilate. His record was such that he could not afford to risk any report of this kind reaching the emperor (cf. Lk.13:1). He was more concerned for his own position than he was for justice. The Stone Pavement (13) was a paved area in front of the praetorium. That Jesus’ condemnation was official is seen from the reference to the judge’s seat. John mentions in v 14 the day of Preparation of Passover Week and the time (the sixth hour), since for him the relation of the death of Jesus to the Jewish Passover was significant. Jesus was later seen to be the true Passover lamb. Pilate’s question, Shall I crucify your king? (15), was intentionally provocative. It drew from the chief priests a confession of loyalty to Caesar which Pilate could not ignore. There is deep irony here—they were claiming more loyalty than the governor himself. But their claim represented the final surrender to Rome of the official representatives of Israel, which acknowledged no overlord but God himself.

19:17–37 The crucifixion

The fact that Jesus was made to bear his own cross shows that he was crucified as a common criminal (17). John does not mention Simon’s help in bearing the cross (cf. Mt. 27:32; Mk. 15:21; Lk. 23:26), but the transfer must have happened on the way to Golgotha. Although John mentions two others crucified with Jesus (19), he gives no details of the charges against them. On the other hand, John alone relates that it was Pilate who was responsible for the notice affixed to the cross. There are slight variations in the different records of the wording on the notice, but all agree that the inscription contained the words THE KING OF THE JEWS. This statement caused resentful protests among the chief priests, which brought out the obstinacy of Pilate (21–22). When John refers to the chief priests of the Jews, the form of words contrasts strongly with the title used for Jesus.

The garments of the condemned men belonged to the soldiers on duty, hence the action in v 23. John sees a fulfilment of Ps. 22:18, but the synoptic gospels do not mention this. There is some question whether there were three or four women near the cross (25). It seems most reasonable to suppose that there were four and that his mother’s sister was Salome. A comparison with Mk.15:40 suggests that the mother of James and Joses mentioned there was the wife of Cleopas mentioned here. Jesus’ address to his mother and his committing of her to the beloved disciple (26–27) shows his tender consideration for her at the hour of his greatest trial.

The concluding moments of Jesus’ earthly life were marked by two further cries, one relating to his own human need (I am thirsty; 28), the other to the completing of his task (It is finished;

30). Again John notes here a fulfilment of Scripture, possibly an allusion to Ps. 69:21. There has been discussion on the improbability of a hyssop stalk being capable of holding a sponge soaked in vinegar (29). One suggestion is that the original word may have been hyssop ('javelin'), but this is unlikely; there is no textual evidence and the soldiers around the cross would have been unlikely to have had javelins. Mk. 15:36 refers to a 'reed' which would have been more capable of supporting the sponge. The vinegar would have given some strength for the concluding cry.

The desire of the Jews to fulfil their ritual requirements (31) was doubly important to them because it was a Sabbath which fell within the Passover festival. The brutal procedure of the leg-breaking was not part of the punishment of crucifixion but was used to hasten death (32–33). Without it death could be delayed for some time, even days. The piercing of Jesus' side and the flowing out of blood and water (34) had great significance for John (35). Various explanations have been offered regarding the blood and water, but John's intention here is to affirm the physical reality of Jesus' death, in contrast to the views held by the Docetists, who claimed that he had only appeared to die. The words the man who saw it (35) have been interpreted either as a reference to the author himself or to a third party. It would not be unnatural for an author, who had carefully concealed his identity, to use the third person pronoun when referring to his personal knowledge of the event. His desire to stress the truth of the matter was to lead others to faith. The adjective used here for true is the same as is used of the vine in 15:1. The two passages which John cites here to demonstrate the fulfilment of Scripture are most likely from Ex. 12:46 and Zc. 12:10, although some have found traces of Nu. 9:12 and Ps. 34:20 in reference to the first passage.

19:38–42 The burial

John's account of the burial is important mainly for its mention of the part played by Nicodemus. Both he and Joseph of Arimathea were most probably members of the Sanhedrin. As such, Joseph was able to use his rank to gain access to the governor. John notes that Joseph was a secret disciple, but what he did was anything but secret. He became bold enough to request from Pilate the body of Jesus. Normally those condemned for sedition would have been cast into a common grave, but since Pilate granted the request this may suggest that he did not really accept the sedition charge. John, in mentioning Nicodemus (39) for the second time, recalls the earlier interview between this man and Jesus (3:1–15; cf. 7:50). In this reference John notes that it was at night, as if to draw attention to the fact that Nicodemus had now emerged from the 'night' in his relationship to Jesus. The amount of spices brought was very considerable and speaks highly of Nicodemus's devotion to Jesus. The mention not only of the new tomb but also of the garden reflects the wealth of Joseph. The significance of the statement, in which no-one had ever been laid, is to demonstrate that the body of Jesus did not come into contact with corruption (in possible fulfilment of Ps. 16:10?).

20:1–29 The resurrection

20:1–10 The empty tomb. John is clearly selective over the resurrection incidents he relates. He intends to illustrate some of the spiritual lessons to be learnt from the event. It is not easy to combine the various happenings related by the four evangelists, for John relates that Mary Magdalene was at the tomb alone (1), whereas Matthew and Mark include others. All are however agreed that Mary Magdalene was there. It may be that the others had left Mary at the tomb. What John is concerned with is her encounter with Peter and the beloved disciple and their conclusions over the empty tomb. This then prepares the way for the appearance of Jesus to Mary. By using the plural (2), Mary was including the other women who had gone with her. They had all come to the same conclusion: that someone had stolen the body. Alternatively, she may have been voicing what she assumed would be the opinion of Peter and John. The writer gives a vivid touch to the story as he recalls how the other disciple outran Peter but did not enter the tomb (3–5). If that disciple was John, we have here an eyewitness detail. Presumably John outran Peter because he was younger. Both disciples ‘saw’ the strips of linen, but different verbs are used in the Greek in each case. The stronger verb, implying intentness of gaze, is attributed to Peter; although only in the case of John is faith said to have followed (8).

John specially notes the precise position of the clothes in the tomb. The isolated burial cloth used for the head suggests that Jesus left the clothes without disturbing them. John may have had in mind the contrast with the emerging of Lazarus with the grave clothes still wrapped round him. The statement that the other disciple saw and believed (8) must be interpreted against the background of the greater faith that followed the appearance of Jesus to his disciples. It was the dawning of a faith that was to grow. The comment in v 9 is characteristic of this gospel. The reference may be to the whole OT or to a particular passage (Ps. 16:10 or Hos. 6:2 have been suggested). It was only later that the early Christians appreciated the importance of the fulfilment of Scripture in the mission of Jesus.

20:11–18 Jesus appears to Mary. For Mary, faith had not as yet even begun to dawn. She was still convinced that the body had been stolen (13). The angels offered her no words of comfort, only of gentle reproof. She should not have been weeping faced with the empty tomb, but she had not advanced beyond the grave-robber theory. In her mind she first thought of the gardener as the culprit (15). It is easy to see how she mistook Jesus for the gardener in view of her tears. When Jesus posed the same question as the angels she blurted out her quest for the body of Jesus. At this point she was looking away from Jesus, but turned towards him immediately she recognized his voice. The use of her name by Jesus shows a tender touch. The word Rabboni (16), which John translates for his Gentile readers, is not the highest confession, but it demonstrates a restored relationship.

It is most likely that the verb translated hold (17) is to be understood in the sense ‘do not continue to grasp hold of me’. This would not be in contradiction with the invitation to Thomas in v 27. Jesus implied that a different relationship would follow the ascension, but was not implying that after that event touching would be permitted, for clearly that would not be intelligible. The fact is that ‘touching’ is not the basis of ongoing faith. In Thomas’s case he was doubting the reality of the resurrection reports. Jesus told Mary to announce ‘I am ascending’ (rather than returning) in the sense of a continuing process which had not yet reached its climax. The distinction between my and your in this verse is significant because it sets the sonship of Jesus on a different level from the sonship of the disciples. When Mary announced her experience (18) she was more concerned with her meeting with the Lord than with the message about the ascension.

20:19–31 Jesus appears to the disciples. In this section there is a rapid switch of emotion from fear (19) to joy (20). The reason was the declaration of peace from the risen Lord. The words Peace be with you are in the form of an ordinary greeting, but on the lips of Jesus they convey the bestowal of his own peace to his disciples as previously promised (14:27; 16:33). There is significance in the showing of the hands and side to the disciples because there could then have been no doubt about the identity of Jesus. Even his risen body carried such proofs. The repetition of the gift of peace gives added emphasis to its importance, especially as it is linked with a specific commission (21). The implication of these words is that the sending was to fulfil nothing less than the commission which Jesus had received from the Father.

What is the relationship between v 22 and the later descent of the Spirit at Pentecost? Some see two distinct givings of the Spirit. But that is unlikely. It is best to regard the present statement as an anticipation of Pentecost, although some preliminary bestowal is implied in the context (the verb used is the ordinary word for 'breathed'). Clearly the disciples did not at this point receive the full endowment, for they were still lacking in the power which came at Pentecost. The giving of the Spirit here was linked with the forgiving of sins (23). The promise was given here to the whole group of disciples (the verb is plural). Although it is not in human power to forgive sins, the preaching of the gospel proclaims such forgiveness. The verbs are in the passive which suggests that it is God who is acting. Those who do not respond to the preaching of the gospel are left in their sins (Gk. 'are retained', which the NIV translates as not forgiven). With this promise cf. Mt.16:18–19; 18:18–19.

20:24–29 Jesus appears to Thomas. John here mentions both the Aramaic and Greek names of Thomas, although he has referred to this disciple previously. This incident marks the climax, for it records Thomas's unbelief and coming to faith in a way that illuminates the main purpose of the gospel (see vs 30–31). No reason is given for Thomas's absence (24). His emphatic disbelief of the testimony of the other disciples intensified his subsequent perception of the true nature of Jesus (25). He wanted physical evidence which would convince him that the risen Christ was the very Jesus he had known. A week later (26) represents the Greek for eight days which brings the chronology to the Sunday after Easter. The locked doors show the disciples' continued fear and Jesus' second assurance of Peace is again seen as an antidote.

The precise repetition of Thomas's words must have made a deep impression on the man. The risen Lord was showing sympathy with Thomas's misgivings, but there is no indication that Thomas actually touched the wounds (27). The confession My Lord and my God (28) is remarkable for its theological grasp. Whether or not Thomas fully understood his own words, this unmistakably high conception of the divine nature provides a fitting conclusion to John's record of the path of faith. Nevertheless, the weakness of Thomas's confession was that it depended on sight. Jesus needed to make a correction here by mentioning the greater blessedness of those who believe without sight, which applies to all Christian believers ever since the time of Jesus. We depend upon secure evidence (Scripture, the witness of the church through the ages, our own experiences) but not on actually seeing Jesus.

20:30–21:25 The epilogue

20:30–31 A statement of purpose. It is clear that the record in the gospel is selective and will lead to a specific kind of faith in Jesus. The combination of Messiahship and divine sonship sums up the view of Jesus presented in this gospel. The linking of faith with life is a succinct summary of the application of the gospel.

21:1–14 Jesus appears to his disciples by the sea. Some scholars have supposed that this chapter is by another author, but there is no MS evidence of the circulation of the gospel without it. Although it appears to be something in the nature of an afterthought, it may have been intended to correspond to the prologue. It is unlikely that another author wrote this section since there are several points of contact in it with the style and language of the previous chapters.

The disciples had left Jerusalem and arrived in Galilee. Only in John is the lake called the Sea of Tiberias. We need not look for any symbolic significance in the fact that seven disciples are mentioned in v 2. It is noticeable that the sons of Zebedee are not named, which accords with the belief that one of them, John, was the writer. There are some interesting parallels between this fishing episode and that of Lk. 5:1–11. Here John's observation that they had spent a fruitless night may have some symbolic suggestion (it was still night in a spiritual sense), but it is more likely this is another eyewitness reminiscence. There is, however, a spiritual principle in evidence, for the situation was transformed by the presence of Jesus.

The failure of the disciples to recognize Jesus until after obeying his command to cast the net on the right side of the boat is surprising (4–6). If they had no knowledge of his identity, why did they respond to his command? They were probably desperate after a fruitless night and were willing to try anything. But the haul was considerable. It was the beloved disciple who first recognized Jesus but did nothing other than tell Peter, who as usual impulsively acted in rushing towards Jesus.

There are vivid eyewitness touches in this account, especially the largeness of the haul of fish, the distance from the shore (8), the charcoal fire with its fish and the command of Jesus to bring more fish (9–10). The precise number of fish (11) is best accounted for by the same reason, that someone was there when they were counted. Nevertheless, many scholars have looked for a subtler reason for the insertion. A mathematical suggestion has been made since $153 = 1+2+3 \dots 17$, or some symbolic meaning has been found connecting the incident with the feeding of the 5,000 (five loaves plus twelve baskets totals seventeen). But such solutions are far less convincing than the simple acceptance of a precise number of fish. That the meal was an ordinary meal is supported by the call of Jesus to the disciples to join him at breakfast (12). The third time (14) relates to the collective appearance to a group of disciples, the other times being related in ch.20.

21:15–25 Jesus communicates with Peter and John. The threefold challenge to Peter looks as if it were designed to parallel his threefold denial (15–19). There are differences in the wording of the three questions. In the third question the verb used for love (phileō) is the same as that used in all Peter's answers, but it differs from the word used in the first two questions (agapaō). However, in the NT these two verbs are often used interchangeably, and it seems, therefore, that no special significance can be attached to the different words used. There are also differences in the three charges to Peter. The first and third use the word feed, whereas the second uses the word for tend (take care), which involves all the responsibilities of shepherding the sheep. The first is directed towards the lambs, whereas the second and third are directed towards the sheep. These differences carry no theological significance. Peter's third response (17) was stronger than the first two, no doubt called out by his grief in being asked three times.

The fact that Peter was clearly forgiven by Jesus and given new responsibilities, amounting to apostleship, despite his total denial of his Lord, can give genuine hope to Christians today who feel that they have denied Jesus and that this is unforgivable. He calls only for our repentance and our love.

The prediction of v 18 was claimed in tradition to have been fulfilled by Peter being crucified upside down. But the tradition itself is not strongly attested and may be an inference from this passage. In saying Peter would glorify God in his death, John sees him as following the example of Jesus (19). Some think that Peter followed Jesus along the shore, but the 'following' implies something more radical than this, nothing short of commitment to his service. Peter's concern for John and the answer of Jesus, virtually telling him to mind his own business, seems to be related to correct a misunderstanding which was circulating at the time of the publication of the gospel. If John, after a long life, was still alive when the gospel was written (on the assumption of his being the author), it was necessary for the rumour that he was not going to die (23) to be rectified.

The additional note in v 24 should be taken as a continuation of the previous verses. It is most natural to take this verse as implying that John was the writer. In this case, the words We know that his testimony is true point to the fact that others were prepared to vouch for the identity of the beloved disciple. The concluding verse is intended to emphasize the selective character of the whole gospel, but also to point out that Jesus is much greater than all that has been said of him in his book.

Donald Guthrie

ACTS

Introduction

The book of Acts is in the style of the gospels, a book that primarily narrates events, although teaching is recorded in it as well. On the other hand, the subject is the life and growth of the earliest church, which links it more closely with the letters rather than the gospels. Its location in modern bibles between the gospels and letters is therefore appropriate.

Acts is the next instalment

The first few verses of the book of Acts make reference to the author's 'former book', which is the gospel of Luke. Ancient works were divided into 'books' as well as into 'chapters', and in all likelihood, the two parts were meant to comprise a single work in two parts. We cannot look at general questions about the book of Acts without also considering the gospel of Luke and especially the first four verses of that book, which are probably meant as a 'Preface' for the whole two-volume work.

Concerning the authorship of the work, see the Introduction to Luke's gospel. As indicated there, Paul's travelling companion, Luke (Col. 4:14), seems to be the author. In the later chapters of Acts, the story is occasionally related in the first person plural: 'Finding the disciples there, we stayed with them seven days' (21:4; see 16:10-17; 20:5-21:18; 27:1-28:16). The most natural explanation of this is that the book was written by someone who took part in some of the events himself. Objections have been raised to this theory, but they primarily concern questions about the author's historical accuracy. If the author can be shown to present a false picture of Paul, for instance, it may be judged less likely that he actually was a travelling companion of that apostle. In fact, these objections will not stand up to scrutiny.

The date of writing is more difficult to place. Again, as indicated in the Introduction to Luke, there are two major theories: that it was written in the 60s, while Paul was in prison in Rome, or in the 80s, after Paul's death. Several features in the final chapters of Acts suggest the earlier date. For one thing, the book ends with Paul (and the readers) left waiting for the result of the trial in Rome. After the lengthy description of the appeal to Caesar and the journey to that trial, it seems odd that the writer should leave off there, unless he was in fact bringing the reader 'up to date'. There is also a 'vividness' or 'immediacy' in the final chapters of the book which suggests that the author was relying on fresh memories. While these details suggest the earlier date, they can easily be explained in other ways as well, and we are forced to conclude that either date is possible.

The description of the book as 'history', and the author therefore as an 'historian', seemed self-evident for centuries until modern students of the Bible recognized that in many senses Acts and all four gospels can just as correctly be classified as 'theology'. Rather than being primarily concerned with an unbiased and simple statement of the facts and events, the authors clearly had a purpose that involved sharing the good news and convincing or teaching their readers. Recently, increased attention has been paid to the skill these authors display in the way that they 'tell the story', and students of the NT have been trying to focus on Acts as a well crafted piece of literature rather than as 'objective and dry history' on the one hand or 'theology' on the other. All these approaches should be affirmed, but in such a way that they support each other rather than cancel each other out. In Luke-Acts, and in the other books that make up the Bible, the theology is based upon the historical truth.

Acts is history

The historical accuracy of the book of Acts has frequently been questioned in modern times, largely on the basis of misinterpretations of the book. At one point in the twentieth century it was commonly believed among scholars that Acts was written much later in the history of the church and that it was a propaganda-like attempt to cover up and smooth over the divisions that had existed between the Petrine Jewish church and the Pauline pro-Gentile church. This, it was argued, was an unpleasant memory that had to be whitewashed over. While there were some problems caused by the inclusion of Gentiles in what began as a movement within Judaism, it is now recognized that Acts deals with these problems in a more straightforward way and that the author was not shy about reporting divisions and difficulties in the church (see e.g. 15:36-41).

Another misreading concerns the portrait of Paul found in Acts. We cannot expect the book of Acts to reproduce every aspect of Paul's thinking as we find it in the letters; an incomplete picture of Paul is only to be expected. But is the picture Luke presents different from the real Paul? The speech in Athens (ch. 17) is commonly used in an attempt to demonstrate how different Luke's picture is from 'reality'. Paul, who in 1 Corinthians writes about his lack of eloquence, is, it is claimed, portrayed as a splendid orator and philosopher in Athens, the city of culture and learning. Furthermore, it is claimed, the speech excuses and almost endorses pagan idol worship, something which the real Paul would never have done. Neither of these points stands up under closer scrutiny. Far from being an ideal and convincing speaker, Paul was ridiculed by the Athenians who heard his message, and Luke records that only a handful of people were convinced—hardly the way to compose a story intended to impress the readers of Acts. In another passage, Paul is pictured as having spoken at such length that even a listener who was in agreement with him fell asleep (20:7-12)! As for the 'sympathetic' attitude towards idol worship in Athens, this aspect of the speech is actually a veiled attack on all idol worship, rather than true agreement. It is consistent with Paul's attitude on arriving in the city (see 17:16 and the commentary on 17:16–35) as well as his attitude as expressed in the letters.

What we might call the 'broad strokes' of Luke's work tend to confirm rather than deny the belief that Acts contains genuine history. So, too, do the fine points. There are many historical details in the book, unnecessary to the main thrusts of the work, the inclusion of which strongly suggests a reliable source of information. For example, geographical details and the use of the appropriate personal names and titles in Acts have come increasingly to light as archaeologists and historians discover and publish more of the ancient evidence. An extensive listing may be found in C. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (Mohr, 1989), chs. 4 and 5. Acts is not totally without historical puzzles (see the commentary below on 5:33–39 and the difficulties surrounding ch. 15 and Galatians), but on the whole it comes to us as a reliable source for the times and events it covers.

Acts is theology

Luke may not, however, be an historian in the modern sense of the term. He clearly had strong feelings about his subject, and although this is not unexpected in the ancient idea of what writing history entailed, Luke may properly be called a theologian as well as an historian. His theology is seen through the sweep of the whole of his two volumes. Theological themes that seem especially important in a study of Acts are the work of the church and the universal spread of the offer of salvation. The Holy Spirit plays a particularly important role in Acts, and the author was at pains to show that the church's expansion to the Samaritans and to the Gentiles did not happen at the initiative of the Christians themselves, but was initiated, and then dramatically authorized and approved, by the Holy Spirit.

It is important, however, to recognize that Luke was not writing a book about the Holy Spirit. He was writing a book about the spread of the gospel, and he describes the Holy Spirit's central role in that work. So, for example, he might have told us a great deal more about what actually happened to the disciples at Pentecost. We would dearly love to have had some statement about the Holy Spirit's indwelling, whether it was permanent, what changes it makes in the lives of believers and so on. But he makes no such statements because this was not the kind of book he was writing. His focus was not primarily upon how the Holy Spirit's coming affects believers but on how the Jewish pilgrims in Jerusalem for the festival were reached that day.

Luke knew and expressed theological truths about the Holy Spirit, the role of Jesus, the fulfilment of OT prophecies and the acceptability of the Gentile believers apart from the law. But although he was a theologian, we must not assume that his book is a systematic theology, and we must try to temper our disappointment if he leaves our twentieth-century curiosity unsatisfied. The presence of theological ideas and interests does not mean we cannot trust the history that is present. (For a further discussion of this see I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian [Paternoster Press, 1988].)

Acts is a literary work

The literary nature of Luke-Acts can be seen from its form. While it would be difficult to find two commentators who agree completely about the outline of the book of Acts, all will agree it is effectively, even artistically, structured. Throughout both volumes, the city of Jerusalem functions as a ‘touchstone’ to which the narrative keeps returning. There is also a clear movement of the whole narrative from the backwaters of the Roman Empire in Galilee to Judea and the provincial capital Caesarea, and from there through Samaria and step by step through the rest of the Roman world until, at the end of Acts, the word has spread all the way to the imperial capital itself, Rome. The progression is an historical one, but Luke has chosen stories, even shifted focus from one set of characters to another, in order to emphasize this movement.

Luke portrays Paul as having preached to Jews and to Gentiles as well as having encouraged many Christian communities. There is recorded, however, only one major speech in a synagogue (13:14–43), one before a Gentile assembly (17:16–34; the one in 14:14–17, which while similar, does not really compare in scale) and one before a gathering of Christians (20:17–38). There is thus in the book a representative speech before each type of audience.

Such deliberate selection and arrangement forces us to ask the question: what was the author’s purpose in writing? Given the shape and complexity of the book, it is unlikely to be as simple as ‘he wanted to record what happened’. Luke and Acts are not mere chronological accounts and certainly not complete ones. Too much is left out for such to be Luke’s purpose.

Instead, Acts may be seen to be answering a complex question about Christianity. What is Christianity? If it is a Jewish sect, then why are all the Jews apparently against it and so many Gentiles in it? If Christianity is a religious rather than a political matter, why is Jesus called a ‘king’ and his movement a ‘kingdom’—and why does it seem to cause riots and trouble?

Perhaps these questions came about as a direct result of Paul’s trial in Rome, which features so prominently in the last third of Acts. The book is probably too long and too much of it only tangentially related for it to be considered as part of the defence’s case, but it may have been written to answer questions that arose because of the trial.

This kind of purpose for Luke–Acts makes sense of many features of Acts: the sweep from the church’s Jerusalem beginnings to the mission in Rome, the focus on various apostles and the spread of the word as well as the opposition it encountered. It also makes sense of the statement by Luke in the first chapter of the gospel—that he was writing in order to clarify and explain the things that Theophilus had already heard concerning Jesus Christ and the movement that he had caused to come into being.

Acts is for today

Luke was writing with a particular contemporary purpose and that might make us pessimistic about finding anything in Acts that is relevant for our own modern situations. A moderate amount of caution is a good thing. Acts is no more a blueprint for how to do missions or how to set up a church than it is for how to act when you are threatened with shipwreck. Acts is relevant for people in all situations and cultures insofar as it provides godly examples and the assurance that however things look, God is at work behind the scenes, as he has been with his people in the past. We may learn a great deal from Acts about how to live our own lives in a Christian way, but we should do so by taking the book and its author’s intentions seriously—and learning to appreciate the story it tells for its own sake in the first instance.

Acts does not mean to teach us that every Christian should expect to do the things that the heroes of the book do. Even Paul, whose power to heal within the scope of Acts seems so great and unstoppable (see 19:11–12), had to learn that such ‘power’ was not something that he ‘had’ or could direct or control at all (see 2 Cor. 12:1–10). But Acts does tell us not to despise such power. God can use and has used believers to accomplish amazing things.

Acts also shows us not to think that because we are Christians we can escape such human limitations as disagreements within our fellowship (see e.g. 15:2 and the conference that followed, or the disagreement between Barnabas and Paul over John Mark in 15:37–41). Nor are we completely immune from outright sin and hypocrisy (see Ananias and Sapphira; Acts 5:1–11) and the very real threat of judgment.

Acts teaches us about ourselves and our situations by examples of other people in other situations. It is not a book that only focuses on the ideal lives and communities; it is very ‘realistic’ in that sense. But the type of realism that it encourages us to is a reality in which so-called supernatural events are, while not everyday events, not at all unlikely either, especially where God’s people are on the frontiers of the work to which they are called.

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Acts, BST (IVP, 1990).

D. Gooding, True to the Faith, A Fresh Approach to the Acts of the Apostles (Hodder and Stoughton, 1990).

I. H. Marshall, The Acts of the Apostles, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1980).

F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1988).

Outline of contents

1:1–11

Introduction

1:1–3	Prologue
1:4–5	The gift of the Holy Spirit
1:6–11	The ascension and the work to be done on earth

1:12–8:3

Jerusalem and temple

1:12–26	Completion of the Twelve in Jerusalem
2:1–47	The Feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem
3:1–4:31	The incident at the temple gate
4:32–5:11	Hypocrisy in the early church

5:12–42 Before the Sanhedrin again:
Gamaliel’s ruling

6:1–8:3 Stephen before the Sanhedrin: the end of an era

8:4–12:25

Extra-Jewish ministry supervised from Jerusalem

8:4–25 Philip in Samaria

8:26–40 Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch

9:1–31 Saul of Tarsus on the Damascus road

9:32–43 Peter in Lydda and Joppa

10:1–11:18 Peter, Cornelius and the Gentile question

11:19–30 Barnabas, Saul and the first Gentile church

12:1–25 Herod Agrippa and the church: the end of an era

13:1–20:38

Deliberate Gentile ministry

13:1–14:28 The first missionary journey

15:1–16:5 Jerusalem Council and the Gentile question settled

16:6–18:22 The second journey becomes a missionary journey

18:23–20:12 The third journey and the decision to go to Jerusalem

20:13–38

Paul's farewell in Miletus:
the end of an era

21:1–28:31

Jerusalem and Rome: Paul on trial

21:1–23:11

Before the Jews: Jerusalem

23:12–26:32

Before the Romans: Caesarea

27:1–28:31

To Rome itself

Commentary

1:1–11 Introduction

The book we know as the Acts of the Apostles is actually the second volume of a larger work which we might call 'Luke–Acts'. In this preface to the second scroll, the author briefly re-tells the stories of the ascension and the events leading up to it as found in the former book, including some fresh details in this retelling.

1:1–3 Prologue

1 By my former book the author undoubtedly means the gospel of Luke. For details about Theophilus see the commentary on Lk. 1:3. If volume 1 is about all that Jesus began to do and teach, the implication is that in this book we will learn about what he continued to do and teach, through the work of his church and the Holy Spirit.

2 Luke almost always reserves the term apostles for the Twelve, and that is probably the use here, perhaps reflected in the speech of the angels to what appears to be the same group of people in 1:11. 3 Although the verse speaks only about a period after his suffering, it is clear later in the sentence, which speaks about proof that he was alive, that the author means suffering and death. The period of forty days is not specifically mentioned in the account in Luke, but it is certainly consistent with the events portrayed there. Jesus spoke about the kingdom of God, even though his disciples still seemed to be thinking in terms of the kingdom of Israel (v 6; cf. Lk. 24:21).

1:4–5 The gift of the Holy Spirit

4 One of the 'convincing proofs' mentioned in v 3 may have been the very fact that Jesus was eating. Even in Luke's time, there appear to have been some who denied that Jesus physically rose from the dead (in some 'spiritual sense' he 'lived on'). Eyewitnesses could answer the dispute: hallucinations, visions and even disembodied spirits do not eat (cf. Lk. 24:42–43; Acts 10:41). The stress in this particular passage is, however, on the closeness of fellowship, eating with them, more than on the physical process of eating.

The gift my Father promised is, as the following verse makes clear, the Holy Spirit. The disciples would have heard Jesus speak of the Spirit throughout his ministry, but the teaching recorded in Jn. 15:26–16:16 was especially relevant to their situation. The command is recorded with different words in Lk. 24:49.

5 The comparison with John’s water baptism is not meant to indicate two separate events in the lives of believers: water-baptism then spirit-baptism. The disciples were told to wait (a few days) because the Holy Spirit was to come only after Jesus went away. Their need to wait is no more binding on later Christians than the command to receive the Spirit in Jerusalem. Rather, the reason for this contrast is to compare a ‘sign’ with ‘power’. John’s baptism with water was only a sign (as John himself understood; Lk. 3:16) of ‘power’, the baptism with the Holy Spirit, which was to come. Exactly how this ‘power’ should be used is the subject of the disciples’ misunderstanding in the next incident Luke records.

1:6–11 The ascension and the work to be done on earth

6 The disciples expected Jesus to restore the kingdom to Israel because prophecy predicted it. Some Christians today are still expecting such an event. 7 Jesus’ reply, that it is not for you to know the times or dates might imply that such an expectation is correct, even if the timing is not for us to know. Discipleship is not about knowing the times and dates, but it is about being ready. In Acts, this means receiving the Holy Spirit’s power and being witnesses (8). To some extent, the phrase in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and the ends of the earth well represents the events chronicled in the rest of the book.

9 Just as the phrase ends of the earth is picture-language (since the globe does not really have ‘ends’), so the description of Jesus moving in an upward direction is merely an attempt to fit into earthly words a type of motion that is outside the limits of human experience and language. He was leaving the earth and the only way to leave the earth is upwards! After all, we do not really imagine that heaven is ‘up’, just outside the atmosphere, as if we could get there in a spaceship. We should not imagine that the cloud that hid him from their sight was an ordinary cloud in the sky either. This is the same sort of cloud that we find at the transfiguration (Lk. 9:34–35; cf. Ex. 16:10; Ps. 104:3), the cloud that is the revelation of the divine glory.

Acts tells us there was a visible event, however, and looking up was a natural reaction to this event since they were looking intently up into the sky as he was going (10). Presumably, if Jesus had simply vanished, the disciples would have been left ‘looking around’ rather than up. The two men dressed in white are without a doubt angels (see the similar description in Lk. 24:4, 23). 11 Their message is in line with that of Jesus in vs 7–8: discipleship is not about looking ... into the sky. The return of Jesus, just like the restoration of the kingdom, is certain, as the repeated same is probably meant to emphasize. The return was not theirs to worry about. They had other things to do, as Jesus had already outlined. John Stott writes: ‘There was something fundamentally anomalous about their gazing up into the sky when they had been commissioned to go to the ends of the earth ... Their calling was to be witnesses not stargazers’ (The Message of Acts [IVP, 1990], p. 51).

1:12–8:3 Jerusalem and temple

1:12–26 Completion of the Twelve in Jerusalem

12 The phrase a Sabbath day's walk is an expression of distance rather than specifying the day on which the event took place. Jews, of course, wanted to be careful not to do any work on the Sabbath, and walking a long distance was work. The expression thus means 'a short distance on foot' and probably amounted to less than a mile.

13 The list of disciples is identical to the one in Lk. 6:13–16, with the obvious omission of Judas Iscariot. 14 The presence of the women and the Lord's family are important to Luke. The Eleven and the women had been followers in the gospel accounts, but Jesus' family had been less enthusiastic (Mk. 3:21–35; Lk. 8:1–21; see also Lk. 23:49; 24:10). Jesus' brothers included James, who, according to Paul, had seen the risen Jesus (1 Cor. 15:7) and who would become an important figure in the church during the period covered by Acts.

15 The number a hundred and twenty here is more than just a round number. This is the smallest number in Jewish tradition for a population that could have its own 'council'. There was a tradition that each judge should rule or represent at least ten members. It may be, therefore, that Luke is suggesting the young church was already a community in its own right and that a twelfth 'leader' was required.

18–19 The NIV, along with many other translations, puts these verses in brackets to indicate that they should probably not be thought of as part of Peter's speech but rather as an explanatory comment by Luke. The story given agrees in the main with the only gospel record of the matter (Mt. 27:3–5). The details that seem at variance can be reconciled if we read the two accounts together thus: after refusing the money the priests bought the field in Judas' name and on his behalf, and it was there that he hanged himself. His body was no longer hanging by the time it was discovered, but had fallen from its suspended position to the ground where it had split open.

20–22 The speech itself continues with two quotations from Ps. 69:25 and 109:8. The use of the Scriptures, however, was only one of the reasons for replacing Judas. Even apart from the speculation about v 15 above, the reason for having Twelve in the first place almost certainly was because there were twelve tribes of Israel (see for instance Lk. 22:30), and the witness to all Israel is a very important theme in these early chapters of Acts.

The qualification here given of accompanying the disciples the whole time the Lord Jesus went in and out among us makes sense if the task was that of being a witness. Paul himself regarded his own witness as being in some respects inferior because he had joined the movement relatively late (1 Cor. 15:5–8). It is interesting that Peter here reckons the whole time as beginning with John's baptism since it wasn't until after that time that Jesus began to call the disciples to himself (on John the Baptist see also Acts 10:37; 13:16–25; 18:24–19:10).

26 The use of 'chance' to make such a major decision strikes us as odd, but there are two important things to be kept in mind. First, this is before the giving of the Holy Spirit, and for these Jewish people Pr. 16:33 would seem to endorse such a way of prayerfully submitting the decision-making process to God's will. Secondly, the casting of lots came only after the disciples had done their best to specify the qualifications and identify the most suitable candidates. In other words, the lot was not used to decide between the 120 but between two 'short-listed' candidates with equal qualifications. The church also made some very important decisions by calling together the parties concerned and having a meeting (see ch. 15). Matthias is never heard of again.

2:1–47 The Feast of Pentecost in Jerusalem

1 The day of Pentecost was a major festival in the Jewish religion, also known as the Feast of Weeks. The holiday celebrated the wheat harvest, and in some Jewish tradition was also associated with the giving of the law and the renewal of the covenant. Jerusalem was crowded with Jewish visitors from abroad (see 2:5). Some of these were about to celebrate a new kind of harvest and covenant renewal!

2 The words for wind and ‘spirit’ are the same in Greek (as they are in Hebrew), the two concepts are so closely identified (cf. Jn. 3:8). 3 On Mt Sinai (Ex. 19:18), the fire on the mountain represented the presence of God there, perhaps the tongues of fire here are similarly representing that presence for the disciples were filled with the Holy Spirit.

4–13 The other tongues in which the disciples spoke as the Spirit enabled them were probably human languages as the natural reading of vs 6, 8 and 11 suggests. It is amazing how in a crowded room buzzing with conversation in foreign languages one can pick out and lock in on someone speaking in one’s own language. Although 1 Corinthians seems to deal primarily with a church whose members spoke in non-human language (chs. 12 and 14), Paul knew both kinds (1 Cor. 13:1). Even when the gift is expressed in human languages, what is said is praise rather than evangelism (declaring the wonders of God; 11). Peter switched to ordinary speech for his evangelistic message. 14:8–20 relates a story in which the evangelists had to overcome a barrier of human language without divine intervention.

It is frequently said that this passage is a reversal of the story of Babel, but it is even more remarkable than that. Judaism already constituted a reversal of Babel. The fact that God-fearing people from every corner of the earth were gathered together in one place to worship during the festival was already a reversal of that scattering and confusion. What was new, however, about the Christian reversal was that people did not need to come back to some centre, but rather the word would go out to every corner of the earth. Even more significant than the languages, of course, is the gift of the Holy Spirit. At its core, Pentecost, like the incarnation itself, is about God coming to us in our fallen condition more than it is about us finally getting to God. Babel and Eden are not ‘undone’ as much as they are redeemed and their negative effects nullified.

14 This is the first of many great speeches in Acts. These are unlikely to be word-for-word records of what was said at the time, however. They are clearly too short for the occasions, and, as far as we can tell, the words used and the patterns of writing are usually those of the author himself. Rather, these should be regarded as Luke’s own summaries of what was said. In this regard, Luke’s practice may not have been too different from the secular historians of his era, for whom speeches formed an important part of their work. Their aim seems to have been to provide a summary that preserved the characteristics of the occasion and of the speaker. Luke seems to have followed this pattern in this speech, which arguably preserves features of what Peter said on just such an occasion, and in the other speeches that he records. (For further discussion see I. H. Marshall, Acts [IVP, 1980], pp. 39–42).

15–21 Even though the languages spoken in the Spirit were understood by the crowd, Peter did not regard this as an evangelistic tool, but rather as a sign that needed to be explained (cf. 1 Cor. 14:22–23). Peter’s citation of the prophet Joel is from Joel 2:28–32. The period described is of the last days (plural), beginning with the pouring out of the Spirit (i.e. at Pentecost) and stretching for an indeterminate length of time until the day of the Lord (singular), which we might call judgment day. Vs 17 and 18 are a unit, as is shown by the ‘bookend’ phrases I will pour out my Spirit, the mention of last/those days and the phrase will prophesy. The wonders in the heavens above and signs in the earth below thus belong, in this speech, to the day of the Lord still to come. Peter lived, as we should also live, as if that day and judgment were just about to happen.

22–24 Peter then turned to the recent past, to the events of Jesus' life, death and resurrection. By the term God, Peter and his audience meant the person whom we call 'the Father'. Although the disciples knew Jesus was to be worshipped, and applied OT words for the deity to Jesus (as probably in v 21 above; cf. 2:36, 38–39), the doctrine of the Trinity had not yet been put into words. Thus when Peter said that Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God he did not mean to deny that he was more than a mere mortal. Rather Peter was showing an understanding of his audience, intending to show them that Jesus was rather more than an ordinary human being. He began, however, with facts that his audience would have been unable to deny: the miracles, wonders and signs which you yourselves know were credited not to Jesus' own power, but to God through him.

The objection to this interpretation of Jesus' actions is obvious: 'Jesus could not have been God's agent, because he failed and God's plans cannot fail.' Peter's answer was that it was God's plan to put Jesus at the people's disposal. God's verdict is not seen in the cross, but in the resurrection. Vs 23–24 have the form, 'you killed, but God raised'; God's verdict was to vindicate Jesus.

The phrase you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death would seem to imply that the ordinary Jews of Jerusalem were involved but not wicked the way that some others were. It is not clear whether wicked men refers to the Jewish leaders or the Romans, but the Jewish audience would have probably understood it to mean the Romans.

Peter did not mean that Jesus didn't feel pain during the crucifixion by saying that God freed him from the agony of death. Instead, Jews commonly thought that the state of being dead, separation into a ghost and a corpse, was itself an agony. We see a reflection of this in 2 Corinthians, where Paul argues against the interpretation of death as being 'unclothed' (2 Cor. 5:1–8).

25–31 Peter illustrated his understanding of Jesus' resurrection with an argument based on a passage from Ps. 16:8–11. The crucial part of the quotation is v 27, you will not abandon me to the grave, nor will you let your Holy One see decay. The question that Peter asked was, 'Who is this Holy One?' The audience's answer was likely to be, 'David himself', to which Peter's objection is without answer: David died and was buried, and his tomb is here to this day. Rather, Peter argued, David, who was a prophet, was speaking about the Messiah who would not remain in a tomb but would be resurrected.

32–35 In this section of the speech, Peter returned to the present phenomenon which had drawn the crowd in the first place. It was not a crowd of drunks, but a crowd of witnesses to the fact that God had raised this Jesus to life. Jesus, therefore, was the Messiah predicted by David. A further quotation from the Psalms (110:1) clarifies the current exalted and ascended state of the Messiah.

36 The speech so far is summarized with this verse. The emphasis in the passage is probably that despite appearances or despite their actions, God's view of the matter was very different. To them, Jesus was a criminal, but he was the same person whom God had made Lord and Christ, just as the angels had announced in Lk. 2:11.

37–40 The final part of the speech responding to the reaction of the crowd, spelt out how the audience was meant to apply what they had heard. V 38 deliberately echoes v 21: everyone who calls upon/the name of the Lord/will be saved. The 'name of the Lord', however, is now the name of Jesus Christ. The 'call upon' has been expanded into two parts: repent and be baptised, and similarly 'will be saved' now becomes for the forgiveness of sins and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.

41–43 The result of the preaching was truly amazing. The church grew from 120 to over 3,000. The apostles continued their teaching and also did many wonders and miraculous signs. The new converts didn't merely add Christianity to their already busy lives, but devoted themselves to their Christian experience. V 42 is a compact description of Christian discipleship.

44–47 These verses describe the Christian community in the days after the Pentecost speech. The believers displayed a generous attitude toward possessions (see also on 4:32–5:11 below). But there was no blind rush to 'rid themselves of all their possessions', as if personal property was in itself evil, instead they gave as there was the need. The believers' financial problems were not automatically and miraculously solved by virtue of becoming Christians. Even in this 'golden age' of the church, there were needy people (although because of the sharing they didn't generally remain needy; 4:34; 6:1).

The believers continued every day to meet together in the temple courts, as well as in their homes, where they shared table fellowship. This was a short-lived period of peace, when they could apparently meet in the temple without fear and even enjoyed the favour of all the people. This was about to change for ever. In the next three chapters, Luke presents both outside opposition and internal disharmony.

3:1–4:31 The incident at the temple gate

The church began to find itself opposed by the leaders of Jerusalem, just as their Lord had been. In this unusually long narrative, one thing seems inevitably to lead to another. A happy and innocent beginning of a healing understandably attracted a crowd to whom Peter felt obliged to explain the event, and he did so evangelistically. This teaching happened in the temple and went against the views of the temple leaders, not only on the subject of Jesus but on matters such as resurrection. So the authorities took a dim view of the proceedings and had Peter and John brought before some very intimidating judges, who found themselves, for the time being, uncertain how to act. Even though the apostles were released, it is clear from the prayer for courage that closes the episode that the whole church took this opposition most seriously.

1 The Christians continued to go to the temple and one day Peter and John came across a cripple at his regular begging-station at the temple gate called Beautiful. This was a clever place to beg, since people on their way to worship were less likely to ignore him. Even so, in such a busy place, the request for money must have become something of an empty repetition. 4–5 This is perhaps why the narrator records that Peter and John looked straight at him. There was a real meeting that took place. Marshall writes: 'What could have been simply the occasion of mechanical charity is turned into a personal encounter' (Acts [IVP, 1980], p. 88). As a result the expectations of the crippled man were raised, but not high enough.

6 Having just read (2:44–47) about how the Christians sold their possessions to support any among them who had need, the readers' expectations, too, are raised. But instead of illustrating how generous the Christians were with their money, here Luke shows us the reason why material goods were regarded so casually. The Christians had something even better to share. What Peter had (and gave) was the wholeness that comes through faith in the name, or authority, of Jesus Christ. 7 Continuing with the theme of personal interaction, Luke tells us that Peter took the man by the right hand and helped him up, and in that action instantly the man's feet and ankles became strong.

8 The picture of this man, who earlier had had to be carried into position, now not only walking but also jumping in his praise of God is all the more striking for the undignified spectacle this must have been in the temple courts. 9–10 One can well imagine people's surprise and amazement as they began to recognize him.

11 Solomon's Colonnade was a portico that stretched along the east side of the temple's outer court. John's gospel tells us that Jesus himself taught there (Jn. 10:23), and it seems to have been a favourite meeting place for the Christians (cf. Acts 5:12). The beggar held on to Peter and John, and all the people came running to them, as if the disciples themselves were 'holy men' or healers.

12–16 On Luke's use of speeches in general, see the remarks on 2:14. Peter began his address to the people by deliberately turning their attention away from himself, denying any special power or godliness. Instead he focused their attention on the God that they worshipped already and God's approval and resurrection of Jesus. In v 16 Peter seems to imply that human beings cannot even rightfully claim faith as their own. Rather he is speaking of Jesus' name and the faith that comes through him

As in the Pentecost speech above, much is made in vs 13–15 of the people's well-known rejection of Jesus, in stark contrast to God's vindication of him, of which the disciples are witnesses, just as the people present are witnesses of the power in the healing. Again, the emphasis in a sentence like you killed the author of life, but God raised him from the dead is on the phrase but God, indicating God's acceptance of the rejected one (see esp. 4:11 below).

17–21 Peter did not say what terrible people they were for rejecting Jesus, but rather I know that you acted in ignorance. The call in v 19 to repent, then, and turn to God is for their sins in general. Their ignorance did not place them beyond the need of repentance, but neither did their direct involvement in Jesus' condemnation place them beyond redemption's reach.

Many modern Jews look forward to the coming of the Messiah as a time of peace and prosperity for the whole earth. If, as seems likely, many first-century Jews thought similarly, then it would have been important for Peter to clarify that although the Jewish Messiah had come, the Messianic age in its fullness was still to come when he returns (20). His audience's participation in these times of refreshing (19) when the time comes for God to restore everything (21) hinged upon their attitude towards Jesus.

22–26 Peter spoke throughout this speech of 'the fathers' (13) and 'the prophets' (18, 21, 24, 25). He next quoted from Moses (Dt. 18:15, 18–19) to make clear the danger of continuing to reject God's chosen one (23).

The speech ends with Peter making it clear that he regarded the Jews as in a unique position. He told them that they were heirs of the prophets and of the covenant, that Jesus was sent first to you to bless you, and that it is through them that all peoples on earth will be blessed (see Gn. 12:3; 18:18; 22:18).

4:1–4 Acts is the story of the triumphant spread of the good news from the Jews to the rest of the world, but we must not forget that it begins with the Jews, whom God prepared through their history and through the Scriptures. Although the gospel reaches some interesting places and people later in the book, we never again see the mass positive response to the message that we see in 2:41 and here in 4:4, when the numbers grew to about five thousand.

The response, however, was not uniformly positive. Some of the people in positions of authority in the temple were provoked not by the fact that these were former disciples of Jesus but by the fact that the apostles were teaching the people and proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection of the dead. Imagine how you might feel if the members of some sect began to use your church building to preach their own doctrines. The fact that these Galileans were teaching at all might have been tolerated, but the Sadducean temple authorities would have been unhappy about anyone proclaiming resurrection, which they did not believe the Scriptures taught (cf. Lk. 20:27).

5–12 After having spent the night in prison, Peter and John were brought before the national Jewish leaders. The question that they faced, By what power or what name did you do this? could well be paraphrased, ‘On whose authority did you do this?’ and amounts essentially to ‘Who do you think you are?’ The authorities’ reaction in v 13 below indicates that it was not a question to which they expected a substantial answer; in terms of the temple and Jewish religion, there was no higher earthly authority than the high priest, who was present.

The question asked probably referred to the teaching and proclaiming that formed the problem in 4:2 above. The vagueness of the wording, however, allowed Peter to backtrack to the act of kindness, the healing. The whole episode, after all, came about only because Peter explained the healing to the enthusiastic crowd.

In vs 10–11 we have once again the reversal theme found in 2:23–24 and 3:15. As in those passages, the emphasis is not upon the wickedness of people’s actions but rather on the fact that the negative decision was overruled and reversed by the ultimate authority, God.

The answer to the question comes in v 12—Peter claimed a higher authority than that of the high priest: there is no other name under heaven given to men by which we must be saved.

13–17 The courage of Peter and John in such circumstances is astonishing. It is perhaps the more so for us who know, as the council did not, that when some of these same men accused Jesus a few weeks before this, Peter timidly cowered outside. Far from facing up to the high priest then, he had made frightened alibis to servants (Lk. 22:54–62).

In the Sanhedrin’s conference together, the question of the truth of the apostles’ claims was not discussed, only how they might stop this thing from spreading.

18–22 Ordered not to speak or teach at all in the name of Jesus, Peter and John bravely replied Judge for yourselves whether it is right in God’s sight to obey you rather than God. To claim to know God’s will better than the high priest and ruling council was no small claim. What is stressed here, as throughout the story, is the inevitability: We cannot help speaking about what we have seen and heard.

That the man who was miraculously healed was over forty years old emphasizes the radical nature of the cure (since he had been crippled from birth; 3:2) and also clarifies how well and widely known he must have been.

23–31 When the two returned to their people and reported what had occurred, the first reaction of the church was to raise their voices together in prayer to God. But it was not primarily a prayer of triumph, celebrating the release of the disciples, but a prayer for courage and strength against expected, prophetically foretold, opposition. The quotation is once again from Psalms (2:1–2). When the believers prayed about the Jewish king Herod meeting with the Roman ruler Pilate, and the Gentiles conspiring with Israel (27), it is clear that they felt that everyone was against them as everyone had been against Jesus. Oddly, however, they didn’t pray for the defeat of the evil forces, or for their own safety, but rather for boldness and for the hand of God to heal and perform signs and wonders. Their answer came with the awesome shaking of their meeting place and the granting of their request to speak boldly.

4:32–5:11 Hypocrisy in the early church

Having described how the church began to come under fire from outside, Luke now tells that all was not perfect inside the community either. This section begins with a brief summary very like 2:43–47, but this time leading into a less savoury incident inside the Christian community, the story of Ananias and Sapphira.

32 As in ch. 2, what is important here is not to whom the possessions actually belonged, but rather the believers' attitude toward them. Once again it is clear that the selling of goods had to do with need and was not a formal condition of membership (34).

36–37 A particular example of this attitude was displayed by Barnabas from Cyprus, who will become a very important character later in the book.

5:1 The unfortunate second example of selling possessions was shown by the husband and wife Ananias and Sapphira. 4 That their sin was not the keeping of money, but the lie, is clear from Peter's questions. 8 It also seems from Sapphira's behaviour that the lie was something that they had planned out together ahead of time.

11 The severity of the couple's judgment is as disturbing to us as it was to their contemporaries (5). The judgment does not appear to have been Peter's or the church's doing in the first instance, but is rather God's judgment (When Peter pronounced a judgment later, the offer of repentance was held out; see 8:20–22.) It is crucial to note that the point is not that God demands our financial accounts be in order, but rather that God hates hypocrisy of any kind, how much more that which is deliberate and designed to test the Spirit of the Lord (9).

Luke does not present pure propaganda about an ideal church. There were needs in the church (2:44–45) and although those needs were met through the sharing of the community (4:34), even this sharing was not without problems (6:1).

5:12–42 Before the Sanhedrin again: Gamaliel's ruling

12 The apostles' prayer of 4:29–30 was answered. They performed many miraculous signs and wonders and continued to meet and speak in Solomon's Colonnade in the temple. 13 No one dared publicly listen unless they were willing to take the bigger step and actually join the believers. 15 People brought the sick hoping that Peter's shadow might fall upon them so that they might be healed. Peter was obviously held in high esteem, but whether the shadow actually healed or that was just the people's expectation before meeting Peter is not clear (see note below). 16 Other people from nearby towns also brought their sick and possessed and all of them were healed.

Note. Magic and miracle. Mk. 6:56 and Acts 19:12 contain similar accounts of healings which seem to us to have a 'magical' quality about them. It is clear from other passages, however, that the NT authors distinguished the Christian movement from contemporary magic and sorcery (see e.g. the encounter with Simon the Sorcerer in 8:9–25). What seems most likely is that God is willing to 'speak the language' that people require. He is willing to meet their expectations in order to take them further. In that regard, people with superstitious expectations about God's power, such as the woman who touched Jesus' cloak in Lk. 8:43–48, receive what they honestly desire and more. Those who concern themselves to control supernatural power rather than place themselves at God's disposal, however, are less successful (see 8:9–25; 19:13–16).

17 It was the popularity of the Christians that filled the Jewish leaders with jealousy and prompted them to action, rather than the mere fact of the connection with Jesus. They were not, at this stage, persecuted because they were Christians but because they were successful.

18 As in 4:3, the apostles were arrested and put in prison to be questioned the next day. 19 This time, however, God intervened and during the night an angel of the Lord opened the doors of the jail. Presumably he locked them again, for the next morning the temple officers found the jail securely locked, with the guards standing at the doors but with no-one inside.

Because the apostles followed the angel's orders, however, they were easy enough to find. 28 We gave you strict orders refers back to the previous encounter in 4:18. The perception of the teaching of the Christians as an attempt to show the Jewish leaders as guilty of this man's blood misses the point of such passages as 3:14–17 or 5:30–32 below. The Christians were not trying to incite the crowd, as the Sanhedrin thought.

29 The Sanhedrin having repeated their ruling, Peter repeated his answer of 4:19–20. 30–32 Peter also repeated the message which had been incompletely understood by the leaders. The emphasis again is not on condemning those behind the crucifixion, but rather on proclaiming that God reversed the human judgment in Jesus' case.

That the crucifixion was described as hanging ... on a tree was not to the advantage of the Christian message, since it brought Jesus' death into closer association with Dt. 21:22–23. Perhaps it was originally a phrase used of Jesus' crucifixion by the opponents of the gospel. In any case, it sets the actions of God on Jesus' behalf in a sharp contrast.

33 Most of the Sanhedrin could see only the implication that they were being accused by unlearned people claiming to have divine authority, and thus they were furious and wanted to put them to death. 34 Gamaliel is a name known to us from Jewish as well as Christian sources as a teacher of the law, who was honoured by all the people. It is perhaps significant that he was a Pharisee, whereas at this stage in the church's history it seems it was the Sadducees who were the more determined opponents (5:17; see also 4:1). Gamaliel was a student of one of the greatest rabbis of all times, Hillel, and he was Paul's tutor (22:3). This great man does seem to have taken the point of the apostles' 'reversal' statements, and he advocated taking the apostles at their word and allowing similar principles to settle the current dispute: these Christians have argued that God's ruling in the case of Jesus overturned the human judgment. Then let God decide in this case as well. Gamaliel was, of course, confident that God was not on the side of the Christians and that, therefore, nothing would come of their movement, just as nothing had come of the two rebellions that he mentioned.

Note. The puzzle of Gamaliel's speech. We do know of rebel leaders bearing the names Gamaliel mentions from non-Christian sources, notably the Jewish historian Josephus. It is the chronology, however, that is odd. V 37 seems to state that Judas the Galilean came after Theudas, whereas Josephus dates them the other way around. More difficult still is the fact that Josephus links Theudas' revolt with the rule of the Roman procurator Fadus, which wasn't until ten years after these events took place. The most likely solution is that Gamaliel's Theudas was different from and prior to the Theudas of whom Josephus wrote. The latter, in fact, may have taken over the earlier Theudas' name and mantle. (For further discussion see C. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History [Mohr, 1989], pp. 162–163, 223–224.)

40 The fact that the apostles were flogged and ordered not to speak in the name of Jesus suggests that the Sanhedrin may have been taking an easy road and avoiding the risk of upsetting the crowds. 41 Miraculously freed from prison, only to find themselves flogged the next day anyway, the apostles must have been at least tempted to be confused. Yet they rejoiced because they had been counted worthy of suffering disgrace for the Name. 42 They took no more notice of this order not to preach the gospel than they had of the others, and they continued to meet both in the temple courts and from house to house, where they never stopped teaching and proclaiming the good news.

6:1–8:3 Stephen before the Sanhedrin: the end of an era

It generally surprises people to learn that the longest speech of the many found in Acts is not by Paul, or even Peter, but Stephen. These chapters are a real hinge in the story of the early church. Up to this point, although there had been opposition to the spread of the gospel, it was motivated by jealousy and a sense of public order. Judaism and Christianity were not thought of as separate religions, but as the same religion—the Christians still went to the temple and never preached that people had to leave their Judaism behind, but rather that they had to accept Jesus as the fulfilment of all that the law and prophets pointed towards.

With the story of Stephen this state of affairs changes drastically. False witnesses claimed that the message of Stephen attacked the temple and the law of Moses. Stephen's speech shows that these charges were both true and false. The long, and at first glance irrelevant, account of the early history of Israel was intended to show that God had a long-standing and living relationship with his people before and apart from the law of Moses and the temple. People like Joseph and Moses, with whom God took the relationship further, were met with jealousy and rejection by their own people. The law and the tabernacle/temple were expressions of this relationship, rather than its core. If Judaism is thought of in this way, as the ongoing relationship of God with his people, then Christianity stands in continuity with it. But if Judaism is thought of only in terms of temple and law, then Christianity is in conflict with it, since Christianity claims that through the Messiah God has taken the relationship further.

When the story begins, the believers were thought of as Jews, and large numbers of people in Jerusalem, even priests, were becoming believers (6:7). At the end of the story, Christians were being opposed by Jews not merely when they were successful or causing a disturbance, but because they were Christians (8:1–3). Equally, however, it must be said that when Stephen talked about the rejection of Jesus he was not, as Peter was (2:23–24; 3:14–15; 4:10–11; 5:30–31) primarily doing so to focus on God's reversal of the human judgment about Jesus. Stephen was blaming the Jewish leadership in a more direct way. This sad episode marks the end of an era.

1 The Grecian Jews and the Hebraic Jews appear to be two cultural groups within Christian (and Jewish) society. We may assume that the disciples and other native Palestinian Jews spoke Aramaic (a language related to Hebrew) as their first language, whereas many of those converted from the visitors at the Pentecost festival, for instance, could be called Grecian or Hellenistic Jews, and their main language was Greek. Both groups were Jewish.

A dispute arose about the daily distribution of food. Although Luke has mentioned before the way that the Christians shared among themselves (2:44–47 and 4:32–35), it is only here that we get a glimpse of the scale and regularity of this ministry.

2–4 The contrast between prayer and the ministry of the word on the one hand and to wait on tables on the other should not be read as meaning that one task is inferior to the other. In many modern cultures, the phrase 'waiting on tables' brings to mind servants or hired help at restaurants. This image is wrong in several ways. For one thing, it is the job of the head of the household to distribute the food (thus Jesus' actions at the Last Supper of taking, blessing, breaking and distributing; Lk. 22:19; cf. 9:16 and 24:30). Furthermore, the word used here for 'table' has two special meanings: the dining table and also a money-changer's table (Mk. 11:15; the same word is used in the sense of 'bank' in Lk. 19:23). Thus it may be that 'to sit at managers' desks' is as valid a paraphrase of the text as 'to wait on tables'. Although the passage mentions food, the distribution may well have been in form of money for food, and certainly in 4:35–37 it was money which the apostles received towards this aid. Such an interpretation would also fit better with the gifts required of the Seven: as well as being full of the Spirit, they would need wisdom in their management roles.

It is, of course, not the case that the Twelve thereafter avoided anything to do with management or physical needs, nor did the Seven stay away from praying or the ministry of the word. In fact, the stories that Luke gives us about Stephen and Philip concern neither food nor finance, but their ministry of the word!

8–10 Stephen, one of the Seven, provoked opposition among non-believing 'Grecian Jews' in the Synagogue of the Freedmen by doing signs and wonders. Cilicia is mentioned as one of the provinces from which this synagogue drew its members. Tarsus, Paul's hometown, was in Cilicia and it may be that he had something to do with the synagogue and the antagonism. Their opposition was fruitless until they secretly persuaded some people to bear false witness against Stephen, exaggerating, no doubt, aspects of what Stephen really said to the point where it could be considered blasphemy against Moses and against God. 13–14 The testimony of the false witnesses is similar to that in the trial of Jesus (Mk. 14:58). The charges concerned the temple and the law.

7:1 On Luke's use of speeches in general, see on 2:14. Stephen's reply to the question Are these charges true? is not a simple yes or no. The question of the relationship of Christianity to the law and to the temple was a complex one, and Stephen wisely answered it from the OT history. His answer was, essentially, that Judaism as the relationship between God and his people predated the temple, the law and even the land of Israel; all of these were expressions of Judaism rather than its core. Paul used the same strategy of going back to Abraham when writing to those who were facing teachers in Galatia who preached the centrality of the law of Moses (Gal. 3:15–19). Was a seed planted in the mind of Saul as he stood there, not yet convinced (8:1)?

2–19 The first main section of the speech concerns Jewish history prior to Moses, chiefly Abraham and Joseph. The important point with the former is that the Jewish religion is built upon the foundation of God's calling and promises. These began to be worked out in the life of Joseph, although his family did not recognize it, were jealous of him and worked against him by handing him over to foreigners (as Stephen's contemporaries treated Jesus).

20–43 The accusation against Stephen included the charge that the customs that Moses handed down would be changed (6:14). Here and in the next section, Stephen was, among other things, reminding his audience that the features of Judaism they were so concerned to protect were themselves at one point changes in the traditions. Thus when Stephen told the Moses story, he focused again upon the people's rejection of him and his message despite the approval of God.

44–50 The third part of the speech concerns the temple proper. If he was charged with speaking against the temple and the customs of Moses, as if those were two permanent features of Judaism, Stephen reminded his audience that precisely those two features were at variance with each other. The temple itself was a change to the customs handed down by Moses (6:14), which concerned a tabernacle built at God's direction. This was a change tolerated, but not initiated, by God. Stephen was no more against Judaism than the Jewish Scripture itself, as expressed through the prophet Isaiah, whom he quoted (Is. 66).

51–53 It was rather Stephen's audience who were against the prophets, the Holy Spirit who spoke through them and the Messiah whose coming they predicted. Stephen closed with this fierce attack: it was his audience who should be on trial for violating the spirit of Judaism, not him.

54 Stephen probably intended to say more, but he was interrupted by the fury of his audience, who gnashed their teeth at him, almost snarling in their anger and frustration. 55–56 Stephen was granted a vision which, like the opening of heaven and voice of God at Jesus' baptism and transfiguration, was not only meant to give him courage for the task ahead, but was also God's endorsement of the crucial change that was taking place. At Jesus' transfiguration the voice was endorsing Jesus' determination to go to Jerusalem and die, not because God preferred it, but because it must be. So also here, the estrangement of God's new community from the traditional people of God is acknowledged. It is probably still too strong a statement to say that now Christianity was completely divorced from Judaism; Paul's defence strategy in the trial scenes at the end of the book revolves around the idea that the charges he faced in the secular courts boiled down to internal Jewish matters. Christianity, from Stephen's stoning, did become an estranged and distinct group within Judaism, or perhaps a rival vision of what Judaism should now be, rather than a movement made up of all parties.

7:57–8:1a They covered their ears and yelled out so as not to hear any more of the supposed blasphemy. The mob was unable to wait for the niceties of a trial, and without officially pronouncing a verdict or sentence they dragged him out of the city and began to stone him.

By the fact that the witnesses laid their clothes at the feet of a young man named Saul, the reader learns not only that Saul was present, but also that he was not one of the witnesses against Stephen. Similarly, in 8:1, the fact that the text explicitly mentions his approval probably means that he did not actively participate in the stoning. Interestingly, it also numbers Saul as among those about whom Stephen prays do not hold this sin against them, echoing the words of Jesus in Lk. 23:34, 46.

1b The great persecution (this episode is the first time that Acts uses the word) and scattering throughout Judea and Samaria that it caused is the backdrop for the chapters that follow. 3 Saul's actions in this persecution are confirmed from his own letters (1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13, 23; Phil. 3:6; 1 Tim. 1:13). Saul went house to house looking for Christians, which suggests that they no longer met openly in the temple (5:42).

8:4–12:25 Extra-Jewish ministry supervised from Jerusalem

8:4–25 Philip in Samaria

4 Persecution, rather than deliberate policy, was the reason for the first real missionary thrust in the church: those who had been scattered preached the word wherever they went. 5 Philip preached in Samaria, because that was where he happened to go. As John's gospel tells us parenthetically, Jews had no dealings with Samaritans (Jn. 4:9). Regarded by Judeans and Galileans alike as heretical half-Jews, the occupants of this area to the north of Judea believed in the books of Moses, but none of the rest of the Jewish Scriptures, and they believed that God should be worshipped on Mt Gerizim rather than in Jerusalem.

6–13 Philip is introduced to the readers by mention of the miraculous signs he did, including exorcisms of evil spirits and healings. As a result of these works, the people paid close attention to what he had to say. In this regard he was similar to Simon, a man who practised sorcery, and who all the people, both high and low, esteemed because of his magic.

We are not told how Philip's works and message were superior to Simon's, but the difference must have been significant, for the people, including Simon, believed and were baptised. This 'miracle-worker' was astonished by the great signs and miracles he saw Philip working. (See 5:12–16 above.)

14 Perhaps because mission work among the Samaritans had not been planned beforehand, the news of it seemed to take the apostles in Jerusalem by surprise, and they sent out Peter and John to investigate. Similarly, Barnabas was sent to investigate Gentile converts in Antioch (11:22) and, immediately prior to that, Peter was interviewed about the conversion of the Gentile Cornelius (11:1–18). 15–17 It is probably that latter passage that helps to explain why the gift of the Holy Spirit came so long after the Samaritans' baptism. In the light of 2:38, 10:48 and 19:5, it is highly unlikely that baptism in the name of Jesus was regarded as inferior to baptism in the full three names of the Trinity. Nor is it likely that the laying on of hands by the apostles was a necessity for the reception of the Holy Spirit (see e.g. 10:44–48; 16:30–34; and 13:3, where it was the congregation that laid hands on the apostles in expression of the unity that the Holy Spirit brings).

In 11:15–17, however, Peter understood the giving of the Holy Spirit to Cornelius and his people as God's sign that the Gentiles were to be accepted as full members of the Christian community (see on 11:1–18). Similarly, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon these first Samaritans converts was proof of their equality with the Jerusalem believers; proof, we might add, to the Jerusalem apostles as well as to the Samaritans. It is, of course, delightful that John, who once wanted to call down the fire of judgment on a Samaritan village (Lk. 9:54), was one of those who was now calling down the Holy Spirit!

18–19 Simon thought Christianity was essentially the same as his magic, even if more powerful. 20–23 Peter's reply implies some discernment of Simon's attitude. The apostle's sharp condemnation was tempered by the appeal to repent that the Lord might forgive him. 24 Despite the apparently genuine request to Peter to pray that this wouldn't happen, Simon became known in later Christian tradition as the archetypal heretic and enemy of Christianity.

8:26–40 Philip and the Ethiopian eunuch

The contrast between the two stories about Philip is remarkable. The first takes place in Samaria to the north, this one to the south. The first concerns a mass conversion that comes about because of the scattering, this one is a single conversion because of direct messages from God. The first happens among a people who have only the Jewish books of Moses, the second involves someone reading from the prophets. The stories are linked, however, not only by the presence of Philip, but also because they concern outsiders to Judaism.

27–28 The ancient kingdom of Ethiopia was probably in the area now called the Sudan, but this is less important to Luke than the impression of 'foreignness'. A more exotic person could hardly be imagined! Not only from one of the most remote regions of the world, he was also an important official there and a eunuch as well. Candace was not a personal name, but a title for the mother of the reigning monarch. The Ethiopian was on his way home from Jerusalem, where he had been worshipping and was reading the book of Isaiah the prophet.

30–31 In NT times, reading aloud was the norm, even when reading to oneself. Philip's interruption of this important official was received with notable humility and grace. Travelling was typically a dirty business, and Philip was not the social equal of such a man, yet he invited him to come up and sit with him in order to explain what he was reading.

32–35 The eunuch was puzzled about who the verses from Is. 53 were describing, but Philip had little trouble using that very passage of Scripture as a springboard to tell the whole good news about Jesus.

36 Since the eunuch initiated the conversation about his own baptism, we can assume that Philip followed the story of Jesus with an appeal similar to that of Peter in 2:37–39. The eunuch’s question, Why shouldn’t I be baptised? suggests he expected some objection to be raised. Perhaps he had previously been refused Jewish proselyte baptism (a normal step in the full conversion to Judaism) because of his ‘mutilated’ condition (see the note below on ‘The first Gentile convert?’).

On the other hand, similar wording is found in other accounts of baptisms (Acts 10:47; Mt. 3:13), so it has been argued that this is the reflection of an early baptismal ritual question and response. In the light of Mk. 9:39 and 10:14, however, it would be better to say that the wording is found in accounts having something to do with acceptance into the community, in cases where equality in fellowship might be questionable for some reason.

38 V 37 is not found in the oldest and most reliable copies of Acts, and the NIV, along with most modern translations, includes it only in the mg. Philip’s response to the question was not with words, but with actions; they went down to the water and the eunuch was baptized on the spot.

39–40 The remark that the Spirit of the Lord suddenly took Philip away and how he later appeared at Azotus (which is north of Gaza, and not on the Jerusalem to Gaza road) is suggestive of more than spiritual leading. The emphasis is not on the manner of transportation, however, but the suddenness and completeness of the departure. From the previous episode in Samaria (8:14), the Cornelius episode in chs. 10–11, and the account of the start of the Antioch church in 11:20–22 we can be sure that the Jerusalem church would have wanted to look into this conversion as well, had they heard about it at the time. But the eunuch was out of the hands of Philip and also of the Jerusalem church. We next meet Philip, much later (21:8–9), in Caesarea.

The eunuch however, continued on his way rejoicing. One cannot help wondering if he also continued reading Isaiah where he left off. If so, it would not have been long before he came upon this passage: ‘Let no foreigner who has bound himself to the LORD say, “The LORD will surely exclude me from his people.” And let not the eunuch complain, “I am only a dry tree.” For this is what the LORD says: “ ... I will give them an everlasting name that will not be cut off ... ’ (Is. 56:3–5).

Note. The first Gentile convert? Although the term translated eunuch came to mean merely ‘an official’, it is likely that Luke here intends the more literal meaning, else the phrase which follows, an important official, would be redundant. In the light of the scriptural regulations (see Dt. 23:1), it is unlikely that this man could have been a full convert to Judaism. But as the purpose of his trip was to worship, and as he apparently owned an actual copy of at least part of the Scripture, it is likely that he had some long-standing or deep connection with Judaism. If he was a Gentile ‘God-fearer’ (see 10:2 for the use of this term for a specific class of people), then it was this eunuch and not the centurion Cornelius who was the first non-Jewish convert to Christianity of whom we know. Thus it was Philip, and not Peter or Paul, who became the father of the Gentile mission, with clear divine leading.

9:1–31 Saul of Tarsus on the Damascus road

Although we have seen little of him up to this point in the book, it is Paul (or Saul) who is arguably the most important human character in the book of Acts. From the middle of ch. 12 till the end of the book at ch. 28 the narrator focuses on Paul and his travels almost exclusively. The story of how this man came to join the Christians is told to us in some detail no less than three times (chs 9, 22 and 26). In this chapter, it is told by the narrator. In the later chapters it is related to the reader by Paul himself in the context of speeches, even though the narrator could easily have said ‘and then Paul told them about his experiences on the Damascus road’ rather than going through it all over again. The story was probably repeated because of the importance that Luke attached to the event. Each retelling, however, adds a bit more of the complete picture.

It is sometimes argued that ‘conversion’ implies rejecting one whole system of beliefs and embracing another. Saul had not been called so much to leave Judaism behind as to accept Jesus as the fulfilment of all he believed. And it must be said that the story has much in common with ‘the call’ of a prophet to a specific mission. Used in a non-technical sense, there can be no real objection to the term ‘conversion’ for such a fundamental and radical change of mind, heart and action as this man underwent. But we do well to remember the positive sense of ‘call’ in this important incident in the life of Paul.

1 Saul (the Hebrew name for Paul, 13:9) and his attitude towards Christians have been mentioned previously in 7:58–8:3. 2 The letters to the synagogues in Damascus were probably letters of introduction and what we might call ‘extradition’ (see the parallels in 22:5; 26:12). A letter with a similar purpose has been preserved in the Apocrypha: ‘If any scoundrels have fled to you from their country, hand them over to the high priest Simon, so that he may punish them according to their law’ (1 Macc. 15:21). Many Jewish congregations would not have felt quite as negatively about the Christians, and these letters from the high priest may have outlined the Jewish objections to Christianity as well as giving Paul authority to make prisoners of these ‘criminals’. (See 28:21–22, where the Jewish leaders in Rome knew they were supposed to dislike the Christians but had no ‘letters from Judea’ telling them why.) It was only after the Stephen episode that the Jewish leaders took action against Christians simply because they were Christians. The Way was an early name for the Christian community.

3–9 Paul experienced an intense light from heaven and heard a voice. The NT authors have no objection to recording dreams or visions that only an individual sees, but Luke intended his readers to understand this as an observable event. It was aimed somewhat exclusively at Paul, but Paul’s companions heard the sound even if they did not see anyone. The retelling of the story in 26:12–14 implies that Paul’s companions also were able to see the light flashing. Only Paul was blinded, however, and the condition was more than a temporary dazzling from an ordinary bright light, since he was blind for three days, and we are told in v 18 that at his healing something like ‘scales’ fell from his eyes (see also 22:11–13).

10–16 Only the telling of the conversion story in this chapter mentions the understandable initial reluctance of Ananias, although he is also mentioned in 22:12–16. Right from the start of Paul’s commissioning, his task before the Gentiles is made clear to him and to Ananias in a number of ways (see also 22:21; 26:17), as is how much he must suffer for my name.

17–19 Ananias’s placing of his hands on Saul was a gesture expressing recognition and confirmation of God’s acceptance and Christian unity, as was the greeting, Brother Saul. In Saul’s case the laying on of hands and God’s acceptance were tied up with his healing, his reception of the Holy Spirit and baptism and even with the breaking of his fast. All these things happened together. Perhaps it is also significant that they happened independently of the Jerusalem apostles (see on 9:26–27).

20–25 It is interesting that despite the order Gentiles ... kings and ... people of Israel in v 15 above, Paul first of all began to preach in the synagogues. This was to be the pattern throughout his missionary career: to the Jew first and then the Gentile (see 13:46). Although Paul's preaching grew more and more powerful over time, it baffled the Jews rather than convinced them and after many days they conspired to kill him. His escape in a basket seems to be something that he remembered as more disgraceful and cowardly than as a thrilling and glamorous adventure (2 Cor. 11:30–33).

26–30 Although by the time Paul came to Jerusalem he had been a Christian for some time, the apostles, like Ananias before them, found it difficult to believe. It was not until Barnabas ('the Son of Encouragement'), whom we first met in 4:36, took responsibility for him that the disciples were prepared to accept this former persecutor of the church. Paul then moved about freely for about fifteen days (see Gal. 1:18–19). Although he stayed with Peter, he did not meet many of the other disciples, but did spend a considerable amount of time with the Grecian Jews (see on 6:1 above), with whom Barnabas of Cyprus may also have worked, and perhaps the same Synagogue of Freeman mentioned in connection with Stephen (6:9). As happened in Damascus, Paul's opponents soon tried to kill him, and for his own protection the brothers sent him away to his own country, from which place Barnabas would fetch him again in 11:25.

31 With this pause in the persecution, Luke also pauses to end this story with a general summary. It is, of course, as a result of all he has described thus far that the company of believers had grown from a small group in an upper room to the church throughout Judea, Galilee and Samaria.

9:32–43 Peter in Lydda and Joppa

These two brief stories bring the apostle Peter back to the fore and set the stage for the important story of Cornelius in ch. 10.

32–35 Lydda was north-west of Jerusalem. That Peter went to visit the saints means that there was a Christian community there. Probably these people had been evangelized during the period of scattering following Stephen's stoning, but we are not told who evangelized either Lydda or Joppa, where there were also already Christians (9:38). When Aeneas was healed Peter attributed it to Jesus Christ, with himself as no more than the channel (cf. 3:12, 16). All those who lived in Lydda does not mean everyone, but rather that the healing was not done in secret, but in public, and a large number of people from outside the Christian circle saw and believed.

36–43 There was not only a Christian community already in Joppa before Peter's arrival, but they knew of his presence in Lydda, a dozen miles inland. With many of these incidents of healing or conversion, the author feels it important to tell the readers about the role of the person in the community, whether they are those who receive charity (3:2, 10) or those who give it (10:2). Tabitha was a person who was always doing good and helping the poor and who appears to have done so by making robes and other fine clothing for such people as widows, who are generally mentioned as examples of needy people (see 6:1).

The body of the dead woman was washed in line with rituals pertaining to the purification of the dead. Just why the people should be sent out of the room before the praying is not clear, but it is something that Jesus also did when raising Jairus' daughter (Mk. 5:40). F.F. Bruce points out that where Jesus said, in Aramaic, Talitha qum, 'Little girl, get up', what Peter said differed in only one letter if he also used that language, Tabitha qum (Book of Acts [Eerdmans, 1988], p. 199).

That Peter stayed with a person who was a tanner by occupation is perhaps significant because he would have been regarded as ritually unclean for much of the time, working as he did with skins of dead animals.

10:1–11:18 Peter, Cornelius and the Gentile question

This story was clearly important to Luke. As with the story of Paul's conversion, it is told in detail and repeated (within chs. 10 and 11) and also referred to in ch. 15. The episode represents another turning point in the direction and focus of the church. Although it is likely that the Ethiopian eunuch was the first non-Jewish convert to Christianity (8:25–40), it was the conversion of Cornelius that sparked the controversy about Gentile converts among the Jewish Christians who probably had not heard about Philip and the eunuch. The account here suggests that the Christian community in general, and Peter in particular, were not prepared for the direct acceptance of Gentile converts and had to be convinced. Luke means us to see the acceptance of the situation by the church in ch. 11 as forming the background for the later decision in ch. 15.

The whole story can easily be divided into scenes: 10:1–8, Cornelius in Caesarea; 9–23a, Peter in Joppa; 23b–48, the meeting of Peter and Cornelius in Caesarea; 11:1–18, the aftermath: the church leaders dealing with the Gentile question.

1–8 The first scene in this complex story begins with an introduction of Cornelius, a centurion. This was a position of some limited authority. He served in the Italian Regiment of which we know little. A regiment or 'cohort' of 600 soldiers was divided into six 'centuries', with a centurion as the head of each.

Although he was a Roman soldier, he and all his family were devout and God-fearing. The term 'God-fearers' appears to have been frequently used for a class of people who believed, and to some extent followed, the Jewish religion without being full converts to Judaism (see 13:16, 26; 17:4, 17 for this sense; the phrase 'worshipper of God' is probably referring to the same phenomenon; 16:14, 18:7). 'Fearing God' could also be used to describe someone as merely religious (so 2:5), but would seem redundant in this sentence if that was all it meant here. In short, this man and his family were not Jews nor Jewish converts, but were also no longer pagans worshipping other gods.

As with Tabitha in the previous chapter, the good deeds of Cornelius are mentioned. They were evidence of his faith as well as 'good deeds': he gave generously ... and prayed ... regularly. It was his devout and active faith, not mere words but prayers and gifts, that were commended by the angelic visitor. It is interesting that the angel told Cornelius to send men to Joppa to bring back a man named Simon who is called Peter rather than having given him the good news about Jesus then and there. God had something in mind for Peter and the church as well as for Cornelius and his family.

9–23a Meanwhile in Joppa, Peter went up on the roof to pray. The roof would have been flat and a good place to be alone for prayer. Luke tells us that he fell into a trance in order to make it clear that unlike the light and sound Paul experienced earlier, this was a 'vision' that another person next to Peter on the roof would not have seen.

The vision itself was a strange one. A bundle was let down containing all kinds of living creatures: four-footed animals ... reptiles of the earth and birds of the air make up the three classifications of the whole animal kingdom (see the Noah story; Gn. 6:20). There were, therefore, animals there that a Jew could not eat, by the food laws (see Lv. 11; 20:25). Thus the command that came, Kill and eat, caused Peter to protest his innocence (cf. Ezk. 4:14). The voice replied Do not call anything impure that God has made clean. The whole interchange was repeated twice more—Peter was no stranger to triple repetition (Jn. 13:38; 21:15–17).

Peter wondered about the meaning of the vision. Although Mk. 7:19 says Jesus 'declared all foods "clean",' the NIV, in common with other translations, puts this comment in brackets. That meaning of Jesus' saying was not at the fore in the original context, and it is only with the benefit of hindsight that the disciples were able to see that implication in what Jesus said at that time; hence Peter's protests in this story, years later.

It was while Peter was thinking about the vision that the messengers from Cornelius arrived. The Spirit gave Peter clear instructions that he should not hesitate to go with them. By the immediate linking of Cornelius with the vision we see that God had more to teach Peter than a lesson about foods (important as that was). Gentile-Jewish relations were profoundly affected by the change in what Jewish Christians could consider clean foods. 'It would be a short step from recognizing that Gentile food was clean to realizing that Gentiles themselves were clean also' (I. H. Marshall, Acts [IVP, 1980], p. 186; see 10:28). The Lord did not cover this in Peter's vision, because he intended a much more dramatic and wonderful sign in 10:44 below.

23b–43 That Cornelius fell at his feet in reverence does not mean that Cornelius was attempting to 'worship' Peter (unlike the situation in which Paul and Barnabas found themselves when among pagans in 14:11–15) but was merely showing respect. This makes Peter's insistence on being treated as an equal all the stronger (see 3:12). Peter (and Simon the tanner) had offered hospitality to Cornelius' men in Joppa and that was not unusual or prohibited by Jewish law. For a Jew to accept hospitality from a Gentile, however, was another matter altogether. But Peter had already made the connection and told the gathering in Cornelius' house that God has shown me that I should not call any man impure or unclean (28). This thought was echoed by Peter after Cornelius repeated the story of the visit that led to him sending for him (I now realise how true it is that God does not show favouritism) and again later in the speech (Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all). How new this was for Peter and for the other Jewish Christians can be gauged by the lengths to which God went to convey the point and the seriousness of the discussion that ensues in ch. 11. Jesus had told his disciples that they would 'make disciples of all nations' (Mt. 28:19), but they must have thought that it included making them Jews first.

When Peter said, You know the message God sent to the people of Israel, telling the good news of peace through Jesus Christ, it need not imply a detailed knowledge or familiarity (36; cf. 2:22). The you know in 10:36 and 37 should be read as 'you have heard of', and these words are meant to contrast with the fact that Peter was there: we are witnesses of everything he did (39). In fact, more details about Jesus' life and ministry are presented in this speech than in any other speech in Acts.

What is being emphasized in the expression they killed him is not the guilt of the Jews, but rather God's reversal of the human judgment on Jesus: they killed him ... but God raised him (as also in 2:23–24). The crucifixion is once again described as hanging ... on a tree (see on 5:30). That Jesus ate and drank ... after he rose from the dead was seen as proof that he really did rise again (and was not just a spirit). As in 1:4, however, it also indicates the closeness of table fellowship. Now Peter was accepting once taboo table fellowship with Gentiles. Certainly we should read He commanded us to preach to the people and everyone who believes in him (42) with the Gentile situation in mind. (On Luke's use of speeches in general, see on 2:14.)

44–48 Peter had not even finished speaking when the Gentiles' response was confirmed by the giving of the Holy Spirit, evidenced by their speaking in tongues and praising God. This was taken by the circumcised believers present, as well as, later, those in Jerusalem (11:15–18), as a sign that these people should be accepted into the body of Christ—and apparently such a strong sign was needed, for the believers present were astonished that the Holy Spirit could come even on the Gentiles. As in the story of the eunuch (8:36), there is a curiously negative question about their baptism, Can anyone keep these people from being baptised with water? This indicates that there might have seemed to some a possible objection: that the people to be baptized were not yet full Jews (see 11:18: ‘no further objections’).

11:1–18 The final scene in this story took place later, in Jerusalem. Having heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God ... the circumcised believers criticised Peter for visiting and eating with non-Jews. Peter’s defence and their response make clear that they were also unsure about whether Gentiles could become Christians without also becoming Jews. Peter told them everything that had happened; and the fact that Luke records this in full when it is a repetition of 10:9–48 is a measure of its importance in his eyes.

Peter saw the gift of the Holy Spirit upon Cornelius as the same gift as he gave the apostles at Pentecost (17). The reasoning was that if God had baptized these people with the gift of the Holy Spirit, thus showing divine acceptance in the company of the redeemed, who could possibly withhold baptism with water and deny them earthly fellowship (8:36; 10:45)? To do so would have been to oppose God. With such words the circumcised believers were convinced, and had no further objections. Once again the phrase even the Gentiles occurs—it was still a surprise to them. Who would have thought that God would grant even the Gentiles repentance unto life?

11:19–30 Barnabas, Saul and the first Gentile church

19–21 This paragraph refers back to the events of ch. 8, the persecution in connection with Stephen, which was at least indirectly responsible for the gospel being preached to the Samaritans in that chapter. At first, those who were scattered told the message only to Jews. Others, however, began to speak to Greeks, and to do so with success. Greeks in this context probably means Gentiles who were not even ‘God-fearers’.

22–24 In any case, as with the Samaritans (8:14), the church at Jerusalem, hearing of this turn of events, sent someone to the scene. This time it was Barnabas rather than one of the Twelve. When Barnabas arrived, he found evidence of the grace of God. Judging from the ease of acceptance, if the converts in question were Gentiles, this episode must have taken place after the church’s decision about the Cornelius affair.

25–26 Tarsus was a few days away from Antioch by foot. Why Barnabas went to Tarsus to look for Saul and ... brought him back to Antioch is uncertain. Nor do we know what work Paul was doing in Tarsus (Gal. 1:21 is not much help). Possibly Barnabas went for Paul precisely because the Antioch church contained Gentiles and that was part of Paul’s call (26:12–19), as Barnabas would probably have known (9:27). Their partnership in Antioch seems to have been a great success and they taught great numbers of people. Luke adds the interesting detail that it was in Antioch that the believers were first called ‘Christians’, probably first as a form of mockery by the Gentile non-believers. Jewish non-believers did not believe Jesus was the Christ, and the believers are never pictured as using the term of themselves, preferring ‘disciples’ or ‘saints’ or ‘brothers’ (26:28; 1 Pet. 4:16 are the other NT uses of the term). In a non-Jewish context ‘Christos’ would not have implied ‘the anointed one’ but probably ‘the oily one’!

27–30 The role of prophets in Scripture is frequently thought to have been that of prediction, but their main role was to prepare people for action. Frequently in the OT the prophets worked towards social justice, and here the important part of Agabus’ work was not so much that he successfully foretold the future, as that he encouraged and enabled the believers to help each other. (Agabus appears again in 21:10–11, and the work of other Christian prophets is described in 15:32. See also 1 Corinthians.) The reign of Claudius was from 41–54, and the Roman historian Suetonius confirms that there were droughts during this period. The gift sent via Barnabas and Saul was probably delivered during the visit spoken of in Gal. 2. The gift is not there mentioned explicitly, but Paul does say in response to Peter and John's request to remember the poor that that was the very thing he was already concerned about. See further the note on chronology in connection with ch. 15.

12:1–25 Herod Agrippa and the church: the end of an era

1–3 The King Herod spoken of is Herod Agrippa I, the grandson of Herod the Great. Once again, we see Luke's realistic attitude towards the early period of the Christian church. He tells us not only about the miraculous releases from prison but also about the setbacks and martyrdoms, such as James, who was put to death with the sword. This would have pleased the Jews in Jerusalem who, after the speech given by Stephen, were no longer neutral.

4–11 Four squads of four soldiers each were appointed as guards—one squad for each of the four watches of the night, so four men were on duty at any given time. Peter was sleeping between two soldiers and two more sentries stood guard at the entrance. Careful precautions had been taken, perhaps because the authorities had trouble containing Peter in the past (5:22–24).

The angel of the Lord appeared and a light shone in the cell, but this was insufficient to wake the sleeping apostle and so the angel struck Peter, which finally did the trick. Despite the blow, the removal of the chains and the donning of clothes, however, Peter had no idea that these things were really happening; he thought he was seeing a vision. Only when the angel left him and he found himself free in the streets of Jerusalem did he realize that he really was awake.

12–17 But even when Peter believed it, he had trouble convincing anyone else! He went to the house of Mary, who is identified by reference to her son probably because of his importance later in the story and in the early church (see also 12:25; 13:5, 13; 15:36–40; he was Barnabas' cousin, Col. 4:10). This is the same John Mark who is usually thought to be the author of the gospel according to Mark. Rhoda, the servant who answered the door, recognised Peter's voice, but was so overjoyed she ran back without opening the door. The irony of the scene is simply delicious. Many people had gathered and were praying, and it is quite probable that Peter's plight was one of the things that they were praying about (5), yet he was kept out in the street while the gathering told Rhoda that she was either out of her mind or had seen Peter's spirit or guardian angel. (There was a belief that a person's spirit or guardian angel could roam around on its own and be mistaken for the person; see Mt. 14:26 for another case where the presence of a spirit was assumed when a person was seen in an unlikely situation; see Mt. 18:10 and Heb. 1:14 regarding the idea of 'guardian angels'.)

When they finally did let Peter in he asked them to tell James and the brothers about this. James the brother of Jesus was in a position of authority in the church (15:13; see also 21:18). What is meant by he left for another place may be simply that Peter went into hiding. Peter did not, at this stage, go back to speaking boldly as he did after the miraculous release in 5:21. There was no instruction to do so in this case, and the situation in Jerusalem was very different.

18–19a It would not have been considered excessively cruel for Herod to have cross-examined the guards and ordered that they be executed. It was not at all unusual for guards who lost their prisoners to be subjected to the punishment that was due to their former charges (see 16:27; 27:42), and Herod would not have been at all pleased to lose a chance to boost his popularity (12:3–4).

19b–23 The story of Herod Agrippa's death seems only indirectly related to the author's main interest, the spread and growth of the church. The contrasts between Herod's actions and attitudes and those of the apostles are striking. Herod is described at a moment of particular triumph: those who had been quarrelling with him had asked for peace, and he appeared wearing his royal robes and seated on his throne and delivered a public address to the people which was enthusiastically received. Their acclamation, This is the voice of a god, not a man, contrasts with the apostles', who were always quick to assert that they were mere men (3:12; 10:26; 14:15), speaking the word of God.

The details of Herod's death are recorded slightly differently by Josephus, but the accounts are complementary. The fact that Luke mentions an angel of the Lord does not mean that it was necessarily a quick and obviously supernatural death, but rather that God was ultimately responsible for what may have looked like a natural death. Luke's description of Herod as being eaten by worms is probably directly related to the abdominal pains referred to in Josephus' account.

24–25 In contrast to Herod, acclaimed by the people as having the 'voice of a god', the true word of God continued to increase. Barnabas, Saul and John Mark (see on 12:12–17) returned to Antioch from Jerusalem.

13:1–20:38 Deliberate Gentile ministry

13:1–14:28 The first missionary journey

13:1–3 The commissioning. Up to this point in the book, whenever the church has sent someone out on a mission, that mission seems to have been not to evangelize, but to check up on evangelism (8:14; 11:22). The evangelism itself seems to have taken place spontaneously, usually in the local synagogue, or else in specific circumstances under the leading of the Holy Spirit (through the 'scattering' as in 8:4–5, or directly from a divine messenger as in 8:26). 1 Even now, it was not so much a case of the church with an over-abundance of prophets and teachers sending some of them out to do mission work. Rather the church, called by the Holy Spirit, recognized and endorsed God's previous claim on Barnabas and Saul: Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them. It was not by their own initiative, but by God's. 3 Here the recognition of Christian unity of fellowship and purpose in the Holy Spirit was expressed by the congregation placing their hands on the apostles.

Paul's missions to Galatia and Greece.

13:4–12 Barnabas and Saul on Cyprus. 4 The island of Cyprus is in the north-eastern 'corner' of the Mediterranean Sea and had already been evangelized (11:19–20). This part of the journey may, therefore, have been intended as a follow-up visit (see 8:14; 11:22; and also 15:36 and 18:23). 5 Proclaiming the word of God in the Jewish synagogues is probably best understood, at this stage in the book, as evangelistic work among Jews who were not yet believers. Paul's missionary pattern involved starting with the Jews, but moving to the Gentiles in each community (see on 13:46). Barnabas was from Cyprus originally (4:36), and John Mark, who was his cousin (see on 12:12–17), accompanied them.

Salamis was the port city on the east where the party landed, and the tour of the island seems to have passed without notable incident until they came to the other end, Paphos. The name Bar-Jesus ('son of Jesus or Joshua') had no connection with Jesus of Nazareth; Jesus was a common name at the time. The phrase Jewish sorcerer (6) seems like a contradiction in terms, given the Jewish laws against sorcery and magic, but Bar-Jesus was not a law-abiding Jew but a false prophet, a self-styled revealer, perhaps along the lines of Sceva. Both seemed to use the title 'chief priest' without any real credentials to authenticate their alleged control over magical and spiritual entities (see on 19:13–14; see also Philip and Peter's encounter with the Samaritan magician Simon Magus, 8:9–24). 7 Like the Ethiopian eunuch (ch. 8) and the centurion Cornelius (ch. 10), it would seem that the Gentile proconsul Sergius Paulus had some respect for and connection with some form of Judaism, since he had a Jew (albeit a Jewish heretic) as one of his advisers, and showed interest in Barnabas and Saul. A proconsul was a governor, appointed by Rome, of a senatorial province such as Cyprus.

8 Bar-Jesus also used the semitic name Elymas for himself, and Luke tells us that this word meant sorcerer. As Sergius Paulus listened to the word of God, Elymas used his influence against it and tried to turn the proconsul from the faith. 9 (From this point in the book, the name 'Paul' is introduced, and 'Saul' is not used again, except for the re-tellings of the earlier Road to Damascus incident in chs. 22 and 26. This change to the Greek name from the Hebraic probably reflects the fact that Paul's sphere of work was more specifically among Gentiles and in Gentile territories. In the argument before Sergius Paulus, God intervened, and the Holy Spirit inspired Paul to announce, rather than to 'call down', God's judgment: the hand of the Lord is against you. You are going to be blind ... for a time. The form this judgment took, of course, is strikingly similar to Paul's own experience when he too needed to be led away by the hand. What Jesus did to Paul he will now continue to do through Paul. 12 The proconsul had his interest in the teaching about the Lord turn to belief as a result of observing the judgment.

13:13–52 Paul and Barnabas in Pisidian Antioch. This section of the chapter contains the first recorded sermon or speech by the apostle Paul (see on 2:14 regarding Luke's use of speeches in Acts). It was not, however, the first sermon that Paul gave. The reason that the author gives us a summary of the contents of this one, rather than the simple statement as in 9:20–21 points to the pattern for so much of the later missionary experience of Paul. On entering a community, the Christians spoke first in the synagogue, and only after trouble arose there did they begin work among the Gentiles (see e.g. 14:1–6; 18:4–17; 19:8–9) until opposition (usually, but not exclusively, from the Jews) forced them to leave entirely.

13 The narrator here refers to the party as Paul and his companions, whereas prior to this, even in the message to the Antioch church from the Holy Spirit (13:2), Barnabas seems to have been reckoned as the leader and Paul as the companion. The fact that John left them, recorded here very simply, was to cause some disagreement later (15:36–41). That the parties became reconciled again is clear from Col. 4:10–11 and 2 Tim. 4:11, both written after the events here recorded.

14 One of the many ancient cities with the name Antioch, Pisidian Antioch was so called because it is nearer Pisidia than the Antioch in Galatia. 15 It was perfectly natural for the synagogue ruler to invite a visiting rabbi to give the homily. One almost feels sorry, however, for these particular synagogue rulers, who had no idea what would come of their unsuspecting offer.

The speech itself can be thought of as revolving around the themes of displacement of people and choice. It is often thought that this sermon was preached from the text 2 Sa. 7:6–16, although the context does not demand it.

16–25 This speech was addressed not only to Jews but also to Gentiles who worship God, who were apparently also present in the synagogue service (see on 10:1–8 for a discussion of 'God-fearers'). The first and longest section of the speech is a rehearsal of the events leading up to the coming of the Messiah. The first paragraph concerns God's choice of Israel and the displacement of the nations of Canaan in favour of God's chosen people (even though they did not earn it by their behaviour which God merely endured). The second section is the displacement of Saul with David, the king of God's choice. A third, contemporary, theme is John the Baptist, introduced with reference to Jesus. The modern reader may miss the revolutionary fact that John preached repentance and baptism to all the people of Israel. Repentance was one thing, but Jews of his day would have seen baptism as part of converting to Judaism—the speech implied that those who thought of themselves as Jews already also stood in need of ‘conversion’. Thus the ‘chosen people’ now had themselves to choose or perhaps be displaced. John was revered by Jews, and his fame had spread widely (see Lk. 20:5–7, in which the Pharisees are not afraid to oppose Jesus, but shied away from making any statement against John; and Acts 19:1–7 where Paul ran across disciples of John in Ephesus, far from Palestine). For this reason, John's own statements about being ‘displaced’ by someone greater bore great significance. It is very possible that Paul's hearers would have known more about John than about Jesus.

26–31 Having gone over some history, Paul emphasized that it is to us that the message had been sent. Jesus' apparent failure in Jerusalem is faced squarely, and the reversal that features in Peter's speeches (see e.g. 2:23–24; 3:15; 4:10–11) comes in here as well. Yes, Paul said, the human decision about Jesus was one thing, but God's was quite different: his enemies had him executed, but God raised him from the dead.

32–37 This was good news, and it was related to the promises given to David. As in Peter's speech in 2:25–32, the argument here revolves around the promise in Ps. 16:10 that God would not let his Holy One see decay. David did in fact ‘see decay’, which must mean that he was speaking in the Psalm of someone else who could not be defeated by death. But although Peter used a similar argument (which may have been widely used by early evangelists), the difference in style of the arguments is striking. Paul here showed his rabbinic training by using strings of citations, and also by the variety throughout the speech. Once again, the theme is displacement: the promises of David were not fulfilled until Jesus.

38–41 All this could be good news for the hearers (thus Paul says to his audience: I want you to know that through Jesus the forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you), but it was also an occasion for a stern warning: Take care that what the prophets have said does not happen to you. The themes of choice and displacement thus lead to the clear demand for the hearers to make a choice about Jesus in order to avoid being displaced as God's people. This was more easily seen as good news by the ‘Gentiles who worship God’ and who were looking for a way in to God's promises and community, than it was for those who were born Jews and now found themselves being threatened with exclusion from something they always regarded as theirs by gift and right. The quotation of warning is from the Greek version of Hab. 1:5, where the word ‘scoffers’ replaces the phrase from the Hebrew text ‘among the nations’. Whichever translation one uses, it is probably no coincidence that the context of the prophecy concerns not only the judgment of God's chosen people Israel but also the way that God can and will work through the Gentiles.

42 Despite the harshness of Paul's tone at the end of the message, the reaction was extremely favourable: the people invited them to speak further and many of the Jews and devout converts to Judaism followed Paul and Barnabas. The apostles urged them to continue.

If this was the reaction of the people, however, the reaction of their leaders was less warm. 45 As in Jerusalem, the Jews (by which Luke must mean the more influential people in the Jewish community, judging by v 43 above) were filled with jealousy by the sight of the crowds that Paul and Barnabas were attracting.

Their abusive talk and opposition was answered (46–48) along the lines that the speech suggested: the choice these people made led to their displacement as God's people: Since you reject it ... we turn now to the Gentiles, who were glad to receive it. This ‘turning’ had to do with this particular community rather than to the Jews as a race. In 14:1 (as in every town after) Paul went first to the Jews in that community if it had a synagogue (see 9:20–25; 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:1–2, 10; 17:17; 18:4, 19; 19:8). Luke’s phrase all who were appointed for eternal life believed is to redress a balance. For it is never merely a person’s own choice that saves them, it is always God’s love and mercy. As with all the passages dealing with the conversion of Gentiles, Luke is at pains to show that what happened was at God’s initiative and had God’s approval. The acceptance of the Jewish Messiah by the Gentiles was sometimes a surprise and sometimes an offence to the early Christians, but none of it took God by surprise; he had always planned it just this way, as the quotation in v 47 shows.

49 That the word of the Lord spread through the whole region should probably also be seen as part of Paul’s missionary strategy. He seems to have done his work mainly in urban areas and allowed the local people to take the message to the surrounding towns and villages (perhaps because of the location of local synagogues, perhaps partly because of language constraints; see 14:11, 18). 50 Again, despite the fact that so many Jews had followed the apostles, the opponents are simply called the Jews, suggesting that these were influential people who in some sense ‘spoke for the community’. These people used all their influence in high places to stir up persecution against the brothers and eventually had them expelled. A later example of a woman of high standing was Drusilla, the Jewish wife of the Roman governor Felix (24:24). 51 Shaking the dust from their feet was an insult of sorts. In its strongest sense it implied that the people that they were leaving behind were ‘contaminated’ in some way, but was probably no stronger than the modern ‘Good riddance!’ 52 This rejection affected neither their spirit nor the Spirit; they remained filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit.

14:1–7 Paul and Barnabas in Iconium. The pattern that manifested itself in Pisidian Antioch above was repeated in Iconium, and Luke recounts it only in summary form (see also 17:1–11; 18:4–17; 19:8–10; 28:17–30). 1 Despite the simplest reading of 13:46, it is clear that Paul and Barnabas did not turn their backs on all the Jews to go directly to Gentiles but allowed each local congregation of Jews to make a decision before going to the Gentiles there. Thus the apostles went as usual to the Jewish synagogue. Paul and Barnabas told the good news, and with great effect, but their address is not recorded. 3 Again, those Jews who did not believe stirred up opposition (see 13:50). Miraculous signs and wonders confirmed their message to the people in Iconium, but the inhabitants remained divided about the apostles (here and v 14 are the only places that Luke explicitly uses the term ‘apostle’ for Paul or Barnabas), and eventually Paul and Barnabas were forced to flee to Lystra and Derbe.

14:8–20a Paul and Barnabas in Lystra. This remarkable story is one of two that show how the apostles dealt with pagan Gentile audiences (here simple village folk, and in 17:16–34 sophisticated Athenians), and it is perhaps significant that in both cases the gospel was initially misunderstood. We may guess from vs 8–11 that Paul’s initial preaching (which is not recorded in detail) took place in the open air, perhaps near the city gates (13). From this and the fact that Jewish opposition was from Antioch and Iconium rather than from locals, we may further guess that there was no synagogue for the apostles to begin at.

8–10 In Lystra lived a man who had been lame from birth. The seriousness of his affliction, the fact that the apostle is said to have looked directly at him and the way in which the man jumped up is probably intended to remind the reader of the way that Peter and John healed a lame man in Jerusalem (3:4–8). In this story, however, we are told that when the apostle looked directly at the man, he was able to tell that he had the faith to be healed.

11–13 The preaching, and especially the healing, impressed the crowd, but they had the wrong idea and mistook the apostles for gods. There is an ancient story about these same two gods visiting a town in the area. They were not recognized and received only a cool reception. In anger they destroyed the town that had been so inhospitable. With such a folk-tale circulating in this region, it is hardly any wonder that the crowd reacted in the way that they did, bringing forth a bull and wreathes and wanting to offer sacrifices to Paul and Barnabas after a simple healing. The legend also helps to explain why they assumed the visitors were those particular gods rather than a god of healing, as might have been expected from the events themselves. The crowd, when excited, spoke in their native Lycaonian language. The language barrier may in part explain why the people so easily misunderstood the apostles' message and why the apostles had so much trouble discouraging the sacrifice (18).

14 Language difficulties may also be why Barnabas and Paul were so slow to understand what was going on. Once they did they tore their clothes, which throughout the ancient world was understood as a gesture of deep sorrow or self-humiliation. 15 Their cry of protest was We too are only men, human like you (cf. 3:12). That the living God was the one who made heaven and earth and sea and everything is also the way that Paul described and argued for God in more detail at Athens (17:16–34), where the fact that he let all nations go their own way is described as 'the times of ignorance'.

19–20a A group of Jews from Antioch and Iconium swayed the crowds against Paul and Barnabas. It is not hard to imagine the disillusioned crowd being embarrassed at their foolishness and turning against the innocent apostles. That they thought Paul was dead does not of course mean that he was dead. If this were a resurrection, we would expect Luke to have made more of it (see 9:40–43; also 20:9–12).

14:20b–28 Paul and Barnabas reach Derbe and make the return voyage to Antioch. 20b–21 The mission work in Derbe is told with even more brevity than the Iconium account, even though Paul and Barnabas won a large number of disciples. That they were able to make brief return visits to places from which they had specifically been expelled is not impossible, but this opposition was undoubtedly part of their thinking in saying We must go through many hardships to enter the kingdom of God (Paul gives similar warnings in his letters; see 2 Thes. 1:5). In each of the churches that they revisited, Paul and Barnabas appointed elders (see 1 Tim. 3:1–13 and Titus 1:5–9 for the qualifications they looked for) and committed them to the task with prayer and fasting, just as they themselves had been set aside for their task by the church in Antioch (13:1–3).

28–28 Having returned to Syrian Antioch, there is a real sense of fulfilment provided by recalling their sending out and by pronouncing the work completed. They gathered the church together to share with them all that God had done through them, including especially how God had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles.

15:1–16:5 Jerusalem Council and the Gentile question settled

This important episode once again shows Luke's willingness to recount not only the church's successes but also its struggles and conflicts. It was, in fact, the very success of the Gentile mission that led up to the crisis here discussed. 1 The people that came down from Judea to Antioch and the sharp dispute and debate may well have been the same as that mentioned in Gal. 2:12 (see the Note below).

2–6 The modern reader can only appreciate with difficulty how compelling the argument unless you are circumcised according to the custom taught by Moses, you cannot be saved would have been to the early Jewish Christians. Centuries of reading the NT writers' solutions have blunted the sharpness of this question for us. These were people who believed that the God of the Scriptures (there was of course no 'New Testament' yet) was the same God who sent Jesus. Jesus was the Jewish Messiah, the answer to Jewish questions, the fulfilment of the Jewish law and prophets, sent by the same God who sent those laws and prophets. How could a person claim to accept Jesus and the Father who sent him, while refusing to listen to the other things that God had said and asked? It must have appeared, even to those Jewish Christians who were prepared to see 'even the Gentiles' (10:45; 11:18) become part of the chosen people, that they should do so completely and become Jews before thinking they could become fulfilled, believing Jews. Even Paul writing to the Romans some while after this controversy writes about the Gentiles as 'honorary Jews', grafted into Judaism (Rom. 11:17–21). Yet, the tide was clearly changing, for when Paul and Barnabas told people on their travels how the Gentiles had been converted, this news made all the brothers very glad, which seems a healthier attitude than Peter faced in 11:1–3.

7 There was much discussion over this issue and Peter addressed the apostles and elders, reminding them of his experiences with Cornelius. He may have been emphasizing that what Paul and Barnabas were doing was no real innovation compared with what God had done through Peter then: God made a choice among you that the Gentiles might hear from my lips the message of the gospel and believe. 8–9 As in chs. 10 and 11, it is clear that at least part of the reason for the unusually dramatic giving of the Spirit to Cornelius and his people was so that the other believers might have been in no doubt that God regarded them as equals: he made no distinction between us and them and gave them the Holy Spirit just as he did to us. 10–11 Similarly, Peter says we are saved, just as they are by grace rather than by accepting the yoke of obedience to the law. This part of Peter's argument sounds so similar to things that Paul wrote in his letters that we have grounds for wondering whether this was a reflection of a rebuke received and accepted (Gal. 2:11–21).

12 Only after Peter had spoken did the missionaries from Antioch themselves relate their experiences among the Gentiles. Once again Barnabas' name is mentioned first. It was he who had first introduced Paul to the believers in Jerusalem (9:26–27).

13–21 James's reply seems to suggest that he was in a position of authority, although Luke gives no details (see 12:17 and 21:18). It is interesting that on a matter of such importance the church proceeded by holding a meeting and making a decision rather than trying to discern God's will by casting lots (as in ch. 1) or by making direct use of prophets who were presumably present and obviously respected (15:22, 32). The words of the prophets are phrases and ideas from Jer. 12:15, Am. 9:11–12 and Is. 45:21. James's decision was that they should not make it difficult for the Gentiles. It is by grace that they are saved, and no further restrictions are imposed by God. Nonetheless, there were some practical steps that James did want the Gentiles to follow. The reason James gives for this advice is that the Jewish code of behaviour was so well known that Jewish (and perhaps even God fearing Gentile) believers would have expected some concessions to what they believed to be God's preferences on these matters.

22–29 The letter was delivered to Antioch first, as the objections to Paul and Barnabas's practices arose there. It was not delivered only by the missionaries concerned, but also by Judas and Silas, the latter of whom became a missionary companion of Paul (40; see also 1 Thes. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1). These were sent to confirm by word of mouth, since the written word, though more 'permanent', was still often regarded as inferior to a 'living word of testimony'. These witnesses would have been especially useful in Antioch if the objectors of 15:1 were identical with those in

Gal. 2 and claimed to have James's authority (see the Note below on the relationship of this episode with Galatians). The letter makes clear that the original objectors had gone out without our authorisation.

We have seen from the early chapters of Acts that when Jews became Christians, they nonetheless remained Jews and were called Jewish believers. The question here had been whether Gentiles needed to be circumcised and thus also become 'Jewish believers' (15:1). The answer of the council is a clear no. Thus there is no mention in James's speech, or in the letter, that circumcision was necessary. But that first question was easily tied in with another: if serving the true God had certain ethical implications (as everyone of the time would have known; 15:21) then could these safely be ignored by the new Gentile Christians? The answer given by the council is thus twofold: Gentile Christians need not become Jews, but neither may they continue to act like typical Gentiles.

For modern readers, the riddle of James's list is not only why some things are included but also why other important ethical imperatives are omitted. For surely Gentile believers would have been expected not to steal, for example. It is the perceived 'typical Gentile behaviour' that explains the contents of the list—all believers should act more like servants of the true God than like ordinary Gentiles of the day.

Things which are cultural requirements for Jews were not necessary for the salvation of Gentiles, but their observance would have made it much easier for all types of believers to associate, worship and eat with each other. In addition, it would have also served as a witness to non-believers that this person had changed and was now following the living God. James and the council repeatedly spoke in terms of a burden placed upon the Gentile believers (15:19, 24, 28) but it is a light burden. The letter concludes, You will do well to avoid these things. Paul expands on this in 1 Corinthians, where his explanation is that while everything is 'permissible', not everything is 'beneficial' (1 Cor. 10:23).

31 The decision was well received in Antioch, as were Judas and Silas themselves. 35 After a time in Antioch, Paul and Barnabas decided to go back and visit the places they had been to originally to see how they were doing. 37–41 Unfortunately, this led to a disagreement between the old friends Barnabas and Paul, such a sharp disagreement that they split up over it. It concerned John, also called Mark, whom Paul regarded as a deserter (see 13:13 and above on 13:5). Luke did not shrink from recording this incident and said nothing about the reconciliation that we know from Paul's letters took place later; Col. 4:10; 2 Tim. 4:11; Phm. 24; all three letters also mention Luke within a few verses! Silas (15:27; 1 Thes. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1), who was sometimes called Silvanus, set off with Paul.

16:1–5 Another helper of Paul's who joined the work at this time was Timothy. Of mixed race, he was for some reason not circumcised as an infant. But the Jews reckon Jewishness through the mother's line rather than the father's, so Timothy became circumcised in order not to seem a Jew who had rejected God's covenant. If his parentage had been reversed, Timothy would not have been regarded as a Jew and things might well have been different. Circumcision itself was a matter of indifference to Paul, as long as Gentiles were not being told that their salvation depended upon it (see Gal. 5:6; 6:15). The agreement reached in Jerusalem was not an easy one, and a dispute could easily have arisen again. Saying that Gentiles did not need to become Jews was one thing, but if Paul was seen to be teaching that Jews shouldn't act like Jews either, there would have been trouble (see below on 21:20–25, where it is clear that despite such precautions, many Jews believed that Paul was against the law, even for Jews). As it was, the churches were strengthened in the faith and grew daily in numbers.

Note. The Council of Jerusalem and the letter to the Galatians. Working out a chronology of Paul's life from the letters and Acts is not as simple as one would think. It has been compounded by nineteenth and twentieth century scholars who have come to doubt Luke's reliability, and who therefore try to construct a framework purely from the letters (which of course were never intended to provide a Pauline biography). Information from Acts is then fitted into that preconstructed frame. Thus, Acts 15 has frequently been thought to be Luke's fanciful elaboration of Gal. 2:1–10, the rather significant differences between the reports being explained by a combination of Luke's ignorance of the real events and his desire to portray the church as united on the matter.

The most satisfactory solution is to identify Gal. 2:1–10 with the visit mentioned in Acts 11:30, and the incident in Gal. 2:11–14 as being part of the reason for the meeting recorded in Acts 15. This meeting, had, of course, not yet taken place when Paul wrote Galatians (and therefore he could not solve that church's problem by referring them to the letter and decision). This solution is not without its own difficulties, but these can be more readily explained without resorting to accusing either Paul or Luke of falsehoods. For a more detailed discussion see I. H. Marshall, Acts, pp. 244–247, and C. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (Mohr, 1989), chs. 6 and 7.

16:6–18:22 The second journey becomes a missionary journey

16:6–10 Divine steering. Somewhere along the way, the trip to strengthen the churches became a missionary venture, but one with a few false starts. 6 They travelled through the region of Phrygia and Galatia or 'the Phrygian region of the province of Galatia' (see also 18:23). They had intended to preach in the province of Asia (roughly modern Turkey) but were kept from doing so by the Holy Spirit. 7 Again, when they tried to enter Bithynia, the Spirit of Jesus would not allow them to, so they went down to Troas. The unique phrase the Spirit of Jesus may imply a vision of the Lord. On the other hand, Paul was travelling with Silas, a man known as a prophet (15:32), and the directions may have come through him. 9 It is Paul himself who received more positive leading in Troas, when during the night he had a vision of man of Macedonia asking for help. 10 Having come to the conclusion that this was no mere dream, the party prepared to leave. The author himself appears to have joined the group in Troas, as indicated by the use of the pronoun we for the first time in the book. The so-called 'we-passages' are 16:10–17; 20:5–21:18; 27:1–28:16.

16:11–40 Paul and Silas in Philippi. 11–12 The detailed log of the journey is typical of the latter part of Acts. Philippi, though not the capital of that district of Macedonia, was a Roman colony and its occupants enjoyed the same privileges as the citizens of Rome itself.

13 The phrase we expected to find a place of prayer would normally refer to a synagogue, but it is often suggested that without the mandatory ten men, a proper congregation could not be established. Paul and his companions nevertheless kept to their custom and spoke first to the Jewish and God-fearing women who had gathered there for prayer to the living God (see also 16:16). 14–15 One of the women was named Lydia, a dealer in purple cloth from the city of Thyatira. Her name indicates a servant or slave background, but the fact that she had a household and could invite people to her house suggests that she was a single freed-woman of means. A worshipper of God probably means that she was a Gentile who had already been attracted to the Jewish God (see on 10:2). On this journey Paul had the influential God-fearing women on his side, unlike some incidents on the previous missionary journey (13:50; see also 17:4, 12, 34).

Luke's phrase the Lord opened her heart to respond to Paul's message (see also Lk. 24:45) is a lovely way of giving credit to the Lord for successful preaching. Paul was no 'irresistible orator' any more than Peter was a 'spiritual healer'. That the Lord was responsible for the successes does not detract from Paul's (or our) responsibility to speak, much less the hearers' responsibility to repent and turn to the true God. Although Luke only mentions that Lydia's heart was opened, he goes on to tell us that she and the members of her household were baptised. These 'household' texts are often seen as indicating infant baptism but there is no mention of children here. The validity of infant baptism is best discussed on the basis of other passages of Scripture (see on 16:31–34). The force-fulness of Lydia's invitation may have been due to strong taboos against Jews accepting hospitality from Gentiles. Here they would be going to the house of a single woman as well! That the party were persuaded shows that Paul was willing to practise what he preached: 'There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus' (Gal. 3:28). The church may have continued to meet in her house (16:40).

16 Even though they now had a base at Lydia's house, the Christians continued going to the place of prayer, i.e. where the Philippian Jews met for worship (16:13). The slave girl whom they met on the way there one day had a spirit by which she predicted the future. 17 As happened frequently in the gospels, the evil spirit correctly identified the spiritual forces behind the Lord's work (cf. Lk. 4:34, 41; 8:28). In the ancient world generally, one was thought to have power over something if one knew its real name, thus it is often argued that the evil spirits tried to gain this type of control over Jesus and the disciples. Here, as elsewhere, however, it seems that their remarks were directed at the public and should be seen, therefore, as either attempts to 'blow the cover' on what they assume is God's undercover work, or as an almost involuntary acknowledgment of the authority of Jesus over them (on this whole matter see the curious episode in 19:15). Some have argued that the wording of v 17 was capable of misinterpretation by pagans, but that was also true of virtually any short summary of the Christian message, even the missionaries' own statements and actions (14:11; 17:18b). 18 Over the course of days Paul would have had a chance to see that what might have been taken for a profession of faith was not followed by real evidence of conversion. Paul then addressed the spirit directly, commanding it, in the name of Jesus Christ ... to come out of her.

19 How perplexed and angry the owners of the slave girl must have been! After all, they hadn't done anything to Paul and Silas. If anything, the girl's words might have been construed as helping. But they found their hope of making money left with the spirit! (Luke has probably used the same verb in vs 18 and 19 on purpose.) Several free, significant people were making a living through the exploitation of one so insignificant slave. But in Paul's mind, even free publicity for the gospel from a popularly acclaimed source was not sufficient compensation for spiritual domination, even of someone so insignificant to that society as a slave girl.

20–24 The accusation that the slave's owners made in front of the magistrates omitted specific mention of their financial inconvenience, however, and capitalized instead on anti-Jewish sentiment with general charges of 'un-Roman' activities and causing an uproar. When the crowd joined in the attack, it was perhaps inevitable that the decision should go against the foreigners, who were stripped ... severely flogged and thrown into prison, where they were securely locked up and bound.

25 The picture of Paul and Silas praying and singing hymns while clamped in stocks in their damp, dark cell is an enduring one. Little wonder the other prisoners were listening to them: whether they were regarded as holy men or just lunatics, no-one could accuse them of being dull!

26 It is unlikely that Paul and Barnabas were praying for their release, since they didn't make use of it when offered (see v 28 and especially v 37 below), but the other prisoners could hardly fail to have regarded the violent earthquake that threw all the prison doors open and loosened everybody's chains as a supernatural answer to Paul and Silas' midnight session. 27 That the jailer drew his sword and was about to kill himself at the thought of the escape of all his prisoners is not surprising (see 12:18–19; 27:42). 28 Paul may have taken some deliberate control over the rest of the prisoners (as he seems to have taken up the leader's role as a prisoner on board ship in ch. 27), or they may just have been too frightened to leave when he and Silas were staying. Either way, Paul was able to prevent the suicide and announced that all the prisoners were still present.

29–34 The account of the salvation of the jailer is full of irony: that he should receive wholeness at the hands of his prisoners; that he should get water and wash their wounds and they in turn use the water to baptize him; and of course the picture of a jailer inviting two prisoners into his house to set a meal before them is simply amazing. It should be noted that here the other members of the family, or household, are said to have heard the message and to have come to believe in God (34; see also 11:14; 18:8; 1 Cor. 1:16). Because of this and because of the lack of specific mention of young children, these texts are not decisive in the debate about infant baptism.

35–36 It is not clear whether the magistrates ordered the release of Paul and Silas because they felt that the beating and night in prison were sufficient punishment or whether they too had been impressed by the earthquake of the previous evening. 37 In any case, much to everyone's surprise, Paul who, having been freed by God through an earthquake stayed in the jail, now, having been freed by his judges, again refused to depart! 38–39 The magistrates, however, did not see the humour in the situation. The revelation that Paul and Silas were Roman citizens caused them to become alarmed because they had broken Roman laws in that they had flogged and imprisoned Romans, and with a trial so cursory that they hadn't a chance to find out about the citizenship. Irony is again in evidence: it was not Paul or Silas but the Philippians themselves who acted in an 'un-Roman way' towards Roman citizens (see 16:21). Paul's citizenship will become a turning point again in 25:1–12. 40 After revisiting Lydia and the rest of the young church in her house, Paul and Silas agreed to the magistrates' request and left the city.

17:1–9 Paul and Silas in Thessalonica. 1 Travelling along the great Roman highway in this area, the Via Egnatia, Paul and Silas passed through several other important Macedonian cities and arrived at the capital of the province, where, unlike Philippi, there was a Jewish synagogue. 2–3 As his custom was, Paul went into the synagogue first of all, despite his earlier rejections in synagogues in other communities (see e.g. 13:33–48). Luke's claim that he reasoned with them rather than merely 'preaching at them' is upheld by the two-step argument: first, that according to the Scriptures, the Messiah (or 'Christ' in Gk.) would have to suffer and rise from the dead, and secondly, that Jesus of Nazareth was in fact the Christ. 4 Some Jews were won over, as were some God-fearers (see on 10:2) and some of the prominent women, but the more influential members of the Jewish community (the Jews in contrast to some of the Jews in the previous verse; see 13:43, 45) became jealous of their success. Their plan was secretly to begin a small riot with some bad characters they rounded up for the purpose, so that they could accuse the Christians, including Jason, with whom Paul and Silas were staying, of causing civil unrest. The opponents' knowledge of the story so far, which they twisted slightly in their presentation (6–7), probably came out of their conversations with Paul and Silas in the synagogue. 9 The result of the meeting was less agreeable than it may look to a modern reader.

By putting Jason and the others on bail is probably meant that these local Christians were forced to give security and pledge Paul and Silas' departure or be subject to severe penalties. It is probably this decision that he refers to as the work of Satan in 1 Thes. 2:17–18, 'But, brothers, when we were torn away from you ... we made every effort to see you ... we wanted to come to you ... but Satan stopped us.'

17:10–15 Paul and Silas in Berea. The pattern of 17:1–7 repeats in Berea, except that the Bereans were of more noble character than the Thessalonians, not because they all agreed with Paul and Silas, but because those who did not agree did not act out of jealousy, but examined the Scriptures ... to see if what Paul said was true. And as before, the word planted bore fruit. 13 The opposition of the Thessalonians reached into Berea, however, and their agitating the crowds led the Christians to send the 'chief trouble-maker', Paul, away. Silas and Timothy stayed for a time in Berea.

17:16–35 Paul in Athens. This episode, especially the great address on Mars Hill (or the Areopagus), is often pointed out as a brilliant example of missionary strategy. Paul, who used the OT so masterfully in speeches to the Jews (see 13:16–41; 17:2), now quoted from pagan poetry to prove some of his points (28). Some, indeed, fear that he appeared to be arguing that the living God was identical to one of the gods worshipped in Athens and commemorated with a statue (23). It has even been argued that Luke meant to show that this attempt by Paul to use worldly strategies and worldly wisdom was a failure, and that Paul changed his style in the next city he visited, Corinth. This would put a very particular emphasis on the freshness of the decision mentioned in 1 Cor. 2:2, 'For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified.' But far from endorsing paganism, this speech is actually a very strong and very Jewish attack on the smug complacency of the Athenians. Paul used his knowledge of Athens and its culture not in order to agree with them, but to point out their failings all the more clearly.

16–17 Paul broke his usual pattern of going first to the synagogue (9:20–25; 13:5, 14, 46; 14:1; 17:1–2, 10; 18:4, 19; 19:8) because he was greatly distressed that the city was full of idols. Thus he pursued a parallel course: reasoning in the synagogue as well as in the market-place (the natural gathering place for those who would discuss such matters as philosophy or listen to the debates). 18 And so it was that Paul found himself in a dispute with Epicurean and Stoic philosophers. These had very different practical approaches to life. Epicureans taught that one should pursue fulfilment and actively avoid displeasure. The role of the gods in a person's life was seen as strictly marginal. The Stoics thought that one attained fulfilment by accepting the course of events, including pain and suffering. These should be endured quietly, almost gratefully, since they are part of nature and are controlled by an impersonal divine necessity or 'fate'. Neither school was bound up with the many gods and idols, and monotheism (though not full-blown Judaism) would not have been regarded as unlikely in theory by either philosophy.

The debates in the market-place led to more misunderstanding than enlightenment. At best, Paul was regarded as a babbling, or more literally, 'someone who collects scraps', since they would have found echoes of bits and pieces of their systems in his beliefs. At worst, Paul was accused of a serious crime: advocating foreign gods (see, however, on v 21). This was the very crime of which the great philosopher Socrates had been accused, also in Athens, some 450 years earlier, and which led to his death. The Athenians in the market-place misunderstood Paul's message fundamentally: they thought that 'Jesus' and 'resurrection' referred to two gods, perhaps interpreting these terms as 'Healing' and 'Restoration'. 19–20 They took him is a good translation of the original, which carries the hint of force—the polite phrasing of the question that follows is belied by the fact that his appearance at the meeting was not in the nature of an invitation but a command. The Areopagus is Greek for ‘Mars Hill’. It is a place-name in the first instance, but was also the term for the council which met there. Thus we speak of ‘Washington’s’ response to some crisis, using a place-name for the institutions it houses. Paul probably did not appear before the council meeting in its formal and official capacity, since the public (including women) seem to have been present (33–34). 21 Despite the seriousness of the charge of ‘preaching foreign gods’ (18), the Athenians were more interested in being titillated by this exotic teaching than in preventing its spread. It is they who were ‘collectors of scraps’ (cf. v 18).

22–23 Paul’s speech is best regarded as a reply to the charge of ‘preaching foreign gods’ (18) rather than as an initial presentation of the gospel (which had already happened; 17–18). Such a defence would normally have begun with a positive statement, intended to put the listeners in a friendly frame of mind (see e.g. the opening of Tertullus, a professional speaker, 24:2–4), but Paul used very guarded and ambiguous phrases, and on reflection even his introduction becomes a veiled attack. The observation in every way you are very religious was in itself a neutral one, and could bear either the meaning of ‘religious’ in a positive sense, or more negatively, along the lines of ‘superstitious’.

The altar with the inscription TO AN UNKNOWN GOD and the legend behind its establishment provided the backdrop for the entire speech. Once, legend had it, there was a terrible plague in the city of Athens, and attempts to appease the gods and stop the plague had no effect. One of the wise men of the day brought a flock of sheep to the top of Mars Hill and released them. Wherever these sheep stopped, an altar was set up to an ‘anonymous god’ and the animal was sacrificed. This course of action was allegedly effective and the city returned to health.

When Luke records that Paul said that what you worship as something unknown I am going to proclaim to you, it appears to some readers he was saying that these pagans were doing well—that, in their ignorance, they were worshipping the right God all along and didn’t know it. This is, however, far from the intent, and three points should be borne in mind. First, this forms Paul’s first line of defence to the charge against him, for how can he be accused of preaching a foreign god contrary to their religions, if their religion itself incorporates worship to gods they do not know? Secondly, the translation is misleading. The emphasis in the sentence is not on the identity of the ‘unknown god’ but on the ignorance of the worship. Paul, in the city of ‘the lovers of wisdom’, focused on the ignorance they admitted about the identity of God. Thirdly, although this first paragraph of the speech seems to have a positive thrust, it must be taken in the context of the rest of the speech; Paul was in effect saying, ‘Yes, but ...’.

24–29 The second part of the speech shifted more obviously to the attack on idol-worship, using arguments which find their parallels in Jewish thought and writing on the matter. Paul moved on from their admitted ignorance about the true God’s identity, to arguing that they were also ignorant about where God dwells (24), they were wrong about what kind of worship God wanted from them (25–27), and they were wrong about how God can be thought of or represented (28–29). In short, everything about their ‘religiousness’ was in error except for their admission of ignorance.

Paul’s statement that God’s intention is that people would seek him and perhaps reach out for him and find him, though he is not far from each one of us again might look as though the pagan has only to reach out and touch God. In fact, the language is that of tragedy. The grammar reinforces that this is God’s wish, rather than what happens. The word used for the ‘seeking’ is a very graphic one, often translated ‘groping’ in the sense of ‘blindly feeling about for’. The negative result is clearly seen in the final clause: ‘though he is not far’ rather than ‘since he is not far’. The point being made is not ‘he is close, so people can find him’ but rather, ‘people cannot find him, but that isn’t because he is far away’. A more literal translation of this passage might thus be: ‘they should seek after God, as if perhaps they might grope around to find him, even though he is not far from each of us.’

Although the NIV sets it in inverted commas, the phrase ‘in him we live and move and have our being’ may be more of a pagan stock phrase than an exact quotation, since words to this effect are found in several pagan writers. The phrase we are his offspring seems most likely to be from a poem to Zeus by the astronomer Aratus, although it is possible that Paul came by this quotation in the work of a Jewish apologist. Paul’s point is not that the pagan poets knew a lot about what was right, but rather that pagan thought and practice were inconsistent and self-contradictory.

30–31 The final part of the speech can only be seen correctly in the context of the whole dispute. It is not intended primarily as a theological outworking of the difficult question of the status of those who had never heard the gospel. The speech purports to concern primarily the altar to the ‘unknown god’ (see on vs 22–23). This altar was used as a sort of precautionary worship; service was offered to this unknown god in order that the city might be spared from catastrophe. Faced with a man who argued that all these precautions were in error and therefore presumably ineffective, any good pagan would have demanded, ‘If we are so wrong, then why is there no catastrophe, no plague?’ It is this question to which the speech responds. That there was no catastrophe was not due, as they thought, to the effectiveness of their idol-worship, but rather to God’s mercy in overlooking their ignorance (note the return to the theme of their ignorance). God now wants all people everywhere to repent; the catastrophe will not be held back for ever: he has set a day when he will judge. The somewhat limited description of Jesus as a man he has appointed is probably an attempt to avoid the impression that Jesus was just another god (see on v 18). Thus, too, rather than using the abstract noun, resurrection, Paul clearly spelled out what he meant by it—all too clearly, it seems.

32 Once the Athenians understood what Paul really meant by ‘resurrection’, hecklers brought his address to an abrupt halt. The immortality of the divine soul was one thing, but that anyone could believe in the resuscitation of corpses would have seemed to most Greeks simply naïve and absurd; thus, some of them sneered. We will hear you again on this subject may have been genuine or sarcastic, but there was another famous incident in which the Areopagus council avoided making a decision in a murder case by temporarily adjourning the trial—for 100 years!

34 A few people did respond positively, however, among them a member of the council, Dionysius.

18:1–17 Paul in Corinth. 1–3 In Corinth, Paul met some people who were to become lifelong friends, Aquila and Priscilla (see Rom. 16:3 and 2 Tim. 4:19, where, as in 18:18–19 below, Priscilla is given the more prominent position). They had much in common with Paul: they were visitors in Corinth; Jews by background; tentmakers by trade; and they were probably Christians already when Paul met them. 4–8 As was his custom (see on 13:46), Paul preached first to the people in the synagogue, both Jews and interested Greeks. Although some Jews did believe (in this case Crispus, the synagogue ruler and his entire household), when the congregation as a whole had rejected the message Paul shook out his clothes (similar to ‘shaking his feet’; see on 13:51) and turned from them with the words From now on I will go to the Gentiles (but see 18:19). Titius Justus was probably one of those Greeks who were interested in the Jewish religion and encountered Paul in the synagogue. (see on 10:2).

9–11 Despite the presence of friends in the city, the stay in Corinth was to be a very testing time for Paul, and the Lord spoke to him in a vision giving him words of encouragement. 12 When the attack did come, it was before the court of Gallio. As the Lord had promised, however, Paul came to no harm as a result. 13–15 The accusation and the decision indicate the precarious state that the Christians found themselves in with regard to Roman law. Judaism was an allowable religion, and if Christianity was a sect of Judaism as Gallio seems to imply, then it was allowed and even protected under Roman law. If, however, it was a separate religion altogether, it could be in for closer scrutiny and its members would receive no such religious freedoms. Although the incident came to nothing in itself, it provided a precedent which was very favourable for Paul and the Christians: they had nothing to fear from fair hearings before Roman courts. 17 Groundless prosecution was a serious problem in the Roman world at this time, and during Paul's lifetime laws were being passed to discourage the practice of accusing enemies in order to have them locked up for a time when one had no real case against them.

18:18–22 Paul visits Ephesus and returns to Antioch. A brief visit to Ephesus, which was to become an important mission centre on Paul's next journey (19:1–41), ended Paul's second missionary travels. 18 That Paul had his hair cut off as part of a vow he had taken probably relates to a form of the Nazirite vow (see Nu. 6:1–21), since it is known to have been practised by the early Christians (Acts 21:23–26). It was offered in gratefulness for deliverance from danger (9–10) and specifically involved shaving the head. It was probably Paul's expression of his gratitude to God in a way that was culturally appropriate for him.

Paul's Aegean ministry.

19 Typically, upon arriving in Ephesus, Paul went into the synagogue and reasoned with the Jews (despite 18:6). On Paul's missionary pattern see 13:5 and 46. 20 On this occasion, however, Paul did not spend enough time there to arouse much interest. 21 His promise to come back if it is God's will is fulfilled in the next chapter. 22 Thus Paul arrived back in Antioch and concluded his second set of missionary visits.

18:23–20:12 The third journey and the decision to go to Jerusalem

18:23–28 Priscilla, Aquila and Apollos. The account of the third journey of Paul begins with a brief aside about Priscilla and Aquila, who had remained in Ephesus when Paul returned to Antioch (19–22). 23 In a way similar to the second voyage, this journey began with a trip through the region of Galatia and Phrygia (not identical to the phrase in 16:6). And, as before, the purpose of the trip at the outset was pastoral rather than evangelistic: Paul was strengthening all the disciples.

24 Alexandria in Egypt was among the most important cities in the Roman Empire. The large Jewish population there had a reputation for scholarly pursuits, producing both the influential Greek translation of the OT called the Septuagint and the great philosopher Philo. Apollos, a learned man with a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, may have seen himself in this tradition. 25 Apollos spoke with great fervour (lit. 'fervent in spirit') and taught about Jesus accurately, but although he had been instructed in the way of the Lord, somehow he knew only of the baptism of John. The 'disciples' Paul encountered later in Ephesus (19:1–7) similarly had received only the baptism of John. Apollos, however, knew and taught about Jesus, whereas the impression one gets from 19:4–5 is that those disciples had never heard of the fulfilment of John’s hope for the one who would come after him. 26 Like Paul, Apollos seems to have gone first to the synagogues. That Priscilla and Aquila, on hearing Apollos, explained to him the way of God more accurately implies that though his teaching was accurate (25), it was based on incomplete knowledge. 27–28 Letters of recommendation were commonly used at this time to secure acceptance (see, e.g. Rom. 16:1–2). Apollos proved very popular with the Corinthian Christians, both Jews and Gentiles (see 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:4–5, 22; 16:12).

19:1–22 Paul’s ministry in Ephesus. The first episode in Paul’s long stay (almost three years) in Ephesus was an encounter with some followers of John the Baptist. John’s fame had evidently spread far beyond Palestine (on his importance see 1:21–22; 13:16–25; 18:23–28 and Lk. 20:5–7). The term some disciples usually refers to Christians, but since these people had not received the Holy Spirit, it is more likely that they are to be regarded as disciples of John the Baptist, on ‘the Way’ but not very far along. 2 Since the Holy Spirit formed an important part of John’s own teaching, the reply of these men that they had not even heard that there is a Holy Spirit probably means that they had heard a version of John’s message rather than John himself, and the reports that they had heard concentrated on his ethical teaching rather than his role as preparing the way (for an example of his teaching see Lk. 3:7–14). 3 These people had received a baptism of repentance, which was in itself a good thing, but unlike Apollos (18–25), they did not seem to know anything about Jesus. We are not told that Apollos needed to be rebaptized (Priscilla and Aquila certainly would have been able to baptize him, if Ananias could baptize Paul, Acts 9:17–19). The probable difference was that Apollos knew about and trusted in the Messiah (having accurate, if incomplete knowledge about him, 18:25–26) and saw his baptism in connection with that faith, whereas for these disciples, the baptism was merely a pledge of good behaviour. They still needed to be baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus.

6 As a sign to all concerned of their acceptance, there came a very public display of the reception of the Holy Spirit (see 8:15–17; 10:44–46), and they spoke in tongues and prophesied. Whether such manifestations should be regarded as typical or normal is not an easy question to answer. Luke certainly does not mention such gifts at all the conversions that he records, but then again, neither does he ever say that ‘such and such a person did not manifest any gifts’. Whatever we may believe about the ‘normal’ conversion, Luke seems to have emphasized mention of these gifts and the reception of the Holy Spirit in his account primarily where he felt that the church or his readers needed to be assured that the group to which the converts belonged were really acceptable to the Lord, e.g. the Samaritans (ch. 8), the Gentiles (ch. 10) and these disciples of John. As mentioned in the Commentary on those other passages, the way that Luke records these events suggests that for him they functioned as much as a sign to the missionaries as to the converts themselves.

8–10 Paul’s usual missionary pattern (see on 13:46) was also followed in Ephesus: to the synagogue first, then to the Gentiles. In Ephesus, he had daily use of the lecture hall of Tyrannus, probably in the hours it was not required for the usual lectures. After three months of meeting in the synagogue, the believers probably would have had their own place for worship, but the lecture hall would have been used, as was the synagogue, for evangelism.

11–12 The next few stories describe the confrontation of the power of the living God with a city that was deeply interested in magic and the occult. It is in this setting that Luke records what he calls extraordinary miracles, and one can readily forgive him the implication that, by comparison, other miracles are ‘ordinary’. That God healed through Paul does not surprise us, that God can heal at a distance does not surprise us, what surprises us is that he used such ‘props’ as handkerchiefs and aprons that Paul touched. But these props were probably employed for the sake of the expectations of the people, rather than being a necessary or effective part of the healing. In the same way, Jesus allowed a woman to be healed by touching cloth that was in contact with his body (Lk. 8:43–48). The incarnation has always been about God limiting himself in dramatic, nearly absurd, ways in order to communicate to a fallen and absurd people. See also 5:12–16 on the healing effect of Peter’s shadow and the note there.

13–16 As if in contrast to the previous story, which could be construed as ‘magic’, Luke presents this attempt by non-Christian Jews to harness the power of God (see also Lk. 11:19, 24–26) through the use of the name of Jesus (see Acts 8:18). Sceva may have been of a high priestly family, but may have used the title chief priest as a form of self-advertisement. Things associated with the ancient ‘exotic’ Jewish religion held a certain appeal to many Gentiles, and Hebrew names and words are found on pagan magical scrolls. The formula in the name of Jesus, whom Paul preaches, may have been an attempt to make clear to the evil spirit just which Jesus they were invoking since the name was a common one among Jews. This particular evil spirit did not, however, need such information; he had heard of both Jesus and Paul, but not of the seven sons of Sceva! And, proving that they had no power over him, he gave them such a beating that they ran. Aside from the comical overtones of the story, there is, for Luke, a crucial point to make here: contrary to common belief at the time (which is perhaps unconsciously reflected even in Christian phrasing about exorcism) it is not the name of Jesus that works in a mechanical way over the powers. The name is not a ‘key’ of some sort. If we are channels of his power, it is not because we know of his name (this the demons know and tremble) but because we know him and, more importantly, are known by him (see also the note on 5:12–16).

17–20 With such events going on at Ephesus, it is little wonder that the people were in awe and the name of the Lord Jesus was held in high honour. The burning of magical scrolls and public confession of sorcerers is the Gentile equivalent of the ‘many priests in Jerusalem’ who believed (6:7). Fifty thousand drachmas was an outrageous total, showing clearly the Ephesians’ fascination with such things. The drachma was a silver coin representing the average wage for a day, thus this total represents over 135 years’ wages.

21–22 The success of the church coupled with Paul’s desire to accompany the gifts of the Gentile churches (see 24:17; 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9) helped him to begin preparations for a trip to Jerusalem, which he intended to follow with a trip to Rome. The Greek of v 21 has the word ‘spirit’, but it is not clear whether Paul’s own spirit is meant, or the Holy Spirit. In the light of 20:22, however, it is likely that the phrase translated simply Paul decided should really be something like ‘Paul decided in the Spirit’.

19:23–45 The riot in Ephesus. The amount of money involved in the scroll-burning (19) must have in itself caused a stir among the people. Those who depended upon the sale of religious objects for their livelihood would have cause to think through the implications of a successful growing Christian church. If Luke portrays the Jewish leaders as becoming opponents of Christianity for petty reasons like personal jealousy, he also clearly portrays pagan opponents in matching colours. Similar financial reasons behind the treatment of Christians are found in 16:19 and also 24:26, where it is implied that only a bribe stood between Paul and freedom.

23–27 The disturbance arose through the speech of Demetrius. His motivation clearly had financial roots: we receive a good income from this business. Paul must have preached in Ephesus along the anti-idolatry lines found in the Athens speech (see on 17:16–35): he says that man-made gods are no gods at all (see also 1 Cor. 8:4–6). The most effective part of Demetrius’s speech, however, was his tactic of rationalizing and turning what really worried him, the financial threat, into more socially acceptable ‘nobler’ concerns like the pride of the trade, and even civic pride and religious loyalty (which should perhaps have been the first consideration).

28–34 The realism of Luke’s account is striking. Were he merely making up propaganda for Christianity there is no way he would have missed this opportunity for his hero Paul to score an oratorical victory here as in Athens. Instead, Gaius and Aristarchus were seized, and Paul was not permitted to go. The description of some of the officials of the province as friends of Paul is intriguing. From the way Luke wrote, it seems unlikely that these were Christians, but they may have been interested parties, as Sergius Paulus was at first (13:6–8). The description of mob behaviour in v 32 is perfect. Perhaps the Jews pushed forward Alexander ... to make a defence (33) in order to distance themselves from the Christians. The pagan crowd may not otherwise have been able to distinguish between these two groups of ‘atheists’, as Jews and Christians, who both denied the existence of the gods, were called.

35–41 Very like Gamaliel in 5:33–40, the city clerk was not ‘on the side of the Christians’, yet in both cases their faith in what they did believe had a calming effect on the opponents. Both argued, in essence, that events would take care of themselves. Where the troublemaker Demetrius had rendered selfish considerations noble, the clerk in his speech showed the crowd that their unnecessary acts were rash and dangerous. He cleverly first addressed and agreed with their civic and religious pride and implied that those who did not accept the undeniable ‘facts’ about Artemis were merely ignorant rather than likely to be dangerous, unless they had specifically robbed temples or blasphemed. (There are cases where temples in the ancient world housed an image, which fell from heaven, or what we today would call a meteorite.) The clerk then cut through the veneer of civic and religious pride and directly addressed Demetrius’s real concern, the financial grievances. He did not deny that this was a legitimate concern but pointed out that the courts are open if he or anyone else wished to press charges. With all the problems addressed, the clerk went on to point out to the crowd that their meeting, which no longer could serve any use, put them (still including and aligning himself with them) in danger of being charged with rioting. His speech was as successful as it was brilliant, and he was thus able to end the incident and dismiss the assembly.

20:1–6 Paul travels through Macedonia and Greece. It is only after this uproar that Paul set out for Macedonia and Greece. His travels were marked by words of encouragement and opposition. The narrator himself seems to have joined the party at Philippi, as indicated by the use of we in v 6 (see 16:10–17; 20:5–21:18; 27:1–28:16). Many of the names in the list of travelling companions can be found in the ‘greetings’ in Paul’s own letters (see e.g. Rom. 16:21–23).

20:7–12 Paul and the Eutychus incident at Troas. This is one of the occasional glimpses of early church life that Luke gives us. 7 This is the first time we hear that the Christians met on the first day of the week for the purpose of breaking bread together (see 2:42). Because Paul intended to leave the next day his talk went on until midnight. 8–9 Mention of the many lamps suggests that the fumes may have contributed to Eutychus’s drowsiness. There is no doubt about the main reason for his nodding off, however, as Paul talked on and on. As a result of his long fall, Eutychus was picked up dead. The language is not ambiguous (as it is in 14:19–20, where people left Paul for dead), and it is unlikely that Luke meant anything other than that a miraculous raising from the dead (along the lines of 9:36–43) took place. 10 The resuscitation took a rather dramatic form, in line with the miracles of Elijah and Elisha (1 Ki. 17:21; 2 Ki. 4:32–33), and when the healing was accomplished Paul announced gladly, He’s alive! 11

Undaunted, they now broke the bread, i.e. had communion, and Paul picked up where he'd left off, talking until daylight. After all that had happened, one would imagine, everyone stayed awake!

20:13–38 Paul's farewell in Miletus: the end of an era

This is the one record we have in Acts of Paul's speech to people who were already Christians. But it is unusual in being a 'farewell address' in a fairly stereotyped form, complete with the expected, though unnecessary, statements of self-defence which seem to have been expected. (For a parallel see 1 Sa. 12:2–5; Samuel was unlikely to have ever been accused of stealing a donkey!) On the speeches in general, see on 2:14.

13–17 The stages of the journey from Troas to Miletus are outlined in another of the 'we' passages (see the Introduction and Commentary on 16:10), containing typically detailed information of routes and stops. There is an apparent contradiction between Paul's decision to sail past Ephesus because he was in a hurry and his having then taken the time to send word to Ephesus to the elders of the church. This probably had something to do either with the scheduled sailings or with a desire to avoid some anticipated trouble in Ephesus or Asia which might have delayed him further.

18–21 The speech amounts to a summary of the nearly three years Paul spent in Ephesus. He never hesitated to preach anything that would be helpful, and did so both publicly and from house to house ... to both Jews and Greeks.

22–27 Either the decision to go to Jerusalem (19:21) was not merely Paul's own, or the Holy Spirit had confirmed the decision to Paul in some way, for to the elders he used strong language: compelled by the Spirit, I am going to Jerusalem, although the Holy Spirit had warned him of prison and hardships, perhaps through prophets in every city (see 21:4, 11). These warnings have some ambiguity about them, for although Paul said he knew that none of his audience would ever see him again, he also said that he would be going to Jerusalem not knowing what would happen to him there. Divine guidance was not a crystal clear matter even for the apostle Paul. Whatever was in store for him, it did not include further work in this area of the world (Rom. 15:23, 31–32). This section of the speech closes with more of the self-defence language typical of the farewell speech: I am innocent of the blood of all men.

28–31 From his own history and future, Paul turned to discussing the role of the leaders of the church, although he continued to use his own behaviour as an example. First, he dealt with the matter of false teachers. If the church was a flock and the leaders were like shepherds, then the false teachers would be like savage wolves. Paul warned that these false teachers would come in to the church, but some would also arise from your own number. Although Paul said that he knew this would happen after his departure, it also had happened during his lifetime, and perhaps even at Ephesus. Thus for three years (counting the partial third year there) he warned them with tears.

The word overseers (sometimes translated 'bishops') should probably not be taken as a technical term yet, since elsewhere these people are called 'elders'. At the time that the speech was delivered the terms were probably interchangeable.

32–35 The Lord had made clear that his witnesses were permitted to receive an income (Lk. 10:7; see also 1 Cor. 9:4–14). Nonetheless, Paul did not usually avail himself of this 'right', not wanting to be a burden to the churches. Mixed in with the typical farewell speech protests of innocence (I have not coveted anyone's silver) is the clear implication that he would like the Ephesian elders to take the same attitude about financial support, perhaps because the other members of the church were not well off: with this kind of hard work we must help the weak.

These particular words of the Lord Jesus are not recorded in the gospels themselves, but as one of the gospel writers pointed out, all the books in the world could not have held accounts of everything that Jesus said and did (Jn. 21:25). It does not, of course, mean that there is anything wrong with receiving gifts or even receiving charity—just that if gifts are a blessing, as they can be, the act of giving is itself a blessing.

36–38 The account of the elders' visit closes with a very emotional scene, prayers together were followed by tears, embraces and kisses. Even with the prospect of eternity together, there is no doubt that farewells on earth are difficult.

21:1–28:31 Jerusalem and Rome: Paul on trial

21:1–23:11 Before the Jews: Jerusalem

21:1–16 Warnings on the way to Jerusalem. These final weeks of the trip to Judea are full of meetings with old friends and new, but also full of warnings to dissuade Paul from visiting Jerusalem. The whole section is told in the first person plural, indicating that Luke was there. 4 The disciples encountered in Tyre probably had connections with those believers who had spread into Phoenicia following the Stephen incident (11:19). It is interesting that here, as in Caesarea (10–12), believers received through the Holy Spirit some indication about what was about to happen to Paul. In both cases, however, the human interpretation of this divinely granted insight, while understandable, was wrong: they urged Paul not to go on to Jerusalem. Paul correctly relied upon the insight granted to him, and the other believers had to reinterpret their own prophetic insights to fit with that. When the Holy Spirit warns that something is going to go wrong, it is not necessarily the case that he is saying the attempt should not be made. 5–6 As at the close of the previous chapter, in Miletus, the Christians knelt to pray together before saying goodbye.

8–9 Philip is a familiar figure from chs. 6 and 8. After the episode of the Ethiopian eunuch, he began his journey to Caesarea (8:40), but we do not know whether he was in the city when Peter was making his historic visit to the house of Cornelius (10:24–48). Since Luke claims (through the use of we) to have been among those who stayed at Philip's house, it is likely that it was during this very visit that Philip related to him the information behind ch. 8 of Acts. To remark that some twenty years had gone by does not have nearly the impact of finding a whole family with children of marriageable age! Mention that Philip's four unmarried daughters were prophetesses may have been included by Luke primarily to convey how long it was since those early days of the scattering (8:1). But it also tells us about the inclusion of even 'low-status' people (not just females, but unmarried ones!) in positions of prominence in the church.

10–11 The prophet Agabus, whom we know from earlier in the book (11:27–28), reappears rather abruptly. In the manner of some of the OT prophets, his message was an enacted one, illustrating the way that the Jews of Jerusalem would bind Paul. The phrase and will hand him over to the Gentiles was used by Jesus to predict his own fate (Lk. 18:32). 12 Although the message of the prophet ended with the prediction, all the people (incorrectly; cf. v 4) interpreted the Spirit's warning about what would happen as if it meant that Paul should not go, and they pleaded with Paul not to go. This should be a warning that even if we are shown that a 'door will close', it does not necessarily mean that we should not attempt to go through it. 13–14 Some must have thought that Paul was being disobedient to the clear leading of the Spirit, but Paul had the courage to stand firm and would not be dissuaded. In the end, everyone could agree on the formula The Lord's will be done, and thus they parted.

15–16 The location of Mnason's house is unclear from the text; it was either in Jerusalem, or between Caesarea and Jerusalem. Like Mnason, many of the early disciples seem to have come from Cyprus, among them Barnabas and probably his cousin John Mark. Paul had spent an early part of his first mission journey there (4:36–37; 11:19–21; 13:4–13).

21:17–26 Paul's arrival in Jerusalem. Although Paul was later arrested for causing a disturbance in the temple, he went to great lengths not to upset the Jews or the Jewish Christians. 17–18 After an informal welcome from the brothers, the party went to visit the church leaders, with James again appearing as the head (see on 12:12–17 and 15:13–21).

19–20 Although Paul's reports about the work among the Gentiles were greeted with praise for God, the leadership did foresee some problems among the many thousands of believing Jews, who were still zealous for the law. In light of the population of Jerusalem, it is likely that many of these thousands, like many of those converted on the day of Pentecost (ch. 2), were not resident in Jerusalem. 21 Somehow, many Jews, even Jewish believers, had heard and believed greatly exaggerated reports of Paul's message: namely that he was telling Jews that they should turn away from Moses. This, of course, was not the case. Paul was teaching Gentiles that they need not become Jews, a very different matter from teaching Jews that they must not remain Jews (see 21:28–29 and on 16:1–5).

22–24 James recommended that Paul should openly endorse and support something very Jewish, the Nazarite vows of several men. Paul had taken a similar vow himself (see on 18:18 and Nu. 6:1–21), so he would not be supporting something merely for political reasons. James hoped that by such participation, everyone would know there is no truth in these reports about Paul. 25 But James still supported the agreement made in ch. 15 limiting the 'burden' the Gentile believers were asked to shoulder regarding certain behaviour which Jews regarded as 'typically Gentile' and offensive. 26 Paul went along with James's suggestion. The fact that everywhere the Holy Spirit had warned him about opposition and even imprisonment in Jerusalem (see 20:22–23; 21:11–12) did not stop him from taking this sort of action. Although the main thrust and intent of his actions regarding the vows are clear, the circumstances of how his involvement would have worked out in practice remain unclear.

21:27–36 Paul arrested at the temple. As it turned out, however, there was no time for the plan to run its full course. 27 The trouble came not from the Jewish Christians but from some Jews from the province of Asia who had probably come on a pilgrimage. On the way to Jerusalem, Paul deliberately avoided the province of Asia, perhaps because he expected such problems from the people there (see on 20:16–17). 28–29 As James and the church leaders had feared, these Jews falsely announced in the temple that Paul taught all men everywhere against our people and our law and this place. To illustrate this last point, they mistakenly accused Paul of having brought Trophimus the Ephesian beyond the place in the temple to which a Gentile was permitted access, a very serious offence. 30 The accusations caused a stir among the population of the city, where Christianity probably had had a bad name since the aftermath of the Stephen incident (8:1). The gates were shut to keep the violence out of the inner courts of the temple, the mob tried to kill Paul. Such an uproar attracted the notice of the Roman authorities, who were wary about the Jews at festival times in any case. The rule of Felix, currently procurator of Judea (23:24, 26), is known for its strict suppression of insurgents (see 37–38). 33 Although the commander attempted to find out Paul's identity, he either did not ask Paul himself or could not hear his answers, since v 37 below shows the commander's surprise that Paul spoke Greek. 34 The mindless shouting of this Jewish crowd is reminiscent of the similar pagan crowd in Ephesus, where too some ... shouted one thing and some another (see 19:32). But whereas that mob violence had been motivated by personal greed, this public outrage seems to have been a genuine, if misguided, zeal for the Jewish religion.

21:37–22:22 Paul before the crowd. This speech is the first of what are sometimes referred to as 'the defence speeches'. Paul's justification for his actions was simple: he was a good Jew and as such when confronted with visions and words from the Lord he could do nothing but obey them.

37–38 The commander was surprised at Paul's ability to speak Greek and guessed that Paul was the leader of a revolt, an Egyptian whose following was crushed under Felix and about whom we also have information from the Jewish historian Josephus. There was no shortage of Jewish would-be rebels at this time (cf. e.g. the two cited by Gamaliel in 5:36–37). 39 Paul, however, corrected him and identified himself as a citizen of Tarsus, no ordinary city. This was a different matter from the claim to Roman citizenship, which would come into play shortly (22:25).

40 That the unruly crowd should have become silent at the motioning of Paul seems to some unlikely, and the whole historicity of the speech has been questioned on the grounds that a man who had been rescued from a beating by a murderous mob was unlikely to have been in good enough condition to address a crowd. But it may in fact be that the crowd were waiting to hear if this battered heretic (as they would have seen him) was now going to recant.

22:2 When Paul spoke to them in Aramaic, they continued listening quietly. At this time, Hebrew and Aramaic were not known by all the Jews of the dispersion and so if the Asian trouble-makers (21:27) had spoken Greek when they accused Paul of being anti-Jewish, Paul's reply to them in the Aramaic or Hebrew tongue would have been in itself the beginning of a refutation. 3–4 The speech continued with Paul's credentials, showing himself as, if anything, more Jewish and with closer Jerusalem connections than the Asian pilgrims. The style of the argument is, of course, reminiscent of the way Paul argues in his letters (see esp. Phil. 3:4–6). That Paul was brought up in this city implies that he came to Jerusalem from Tarsus at an early age [for a reasonable reconstruction of the early part of Paul's life see Martin Hengel, The Pre-Christian Paul (SCM, 1991)]. Gamaliel was a leading Jewish rabbi of the time, in the liberal 'Hillel' school of Pharisaism (see on 5:34). 5 Paul's record of persecution, which caused him some difficulties with Christians (see on 9:26) and some embarrassment even in his letters (see 1 Cor. 15:9), provided a perfect backdrop for this defence. He explained how he became a Christian against his will and argued that any Jew who had received the messages from God that he had could not fail to have done the same.

6–13 The account of Paul's encounter on the Damascus road differs only slightly from the description in 9:1–31. 14–16 Ananias's part in the story is told most fully in this report of the events (cf. 9:17).

17–21 This part of Paul's story is known only from this version. In response to God's statement in the vision that the Jews in Jerusalem would not accept Paul's testimony, he seems to have argued with God that because the Jews knew his record of zeal against the Christians, he would be an effective witness to the Jews. Instead God replied, 'Go; I will send you far away to the Gentiles'. 22 At this juncture the crowd could stand no more and interrupted angrily before Paul could actually deny the specific charge regarding Trophimus and the temple.

22:23–29 Paul the Roman citizen. 23 The commander could not have been very glad that he had consented to let Paul speak, the crowd were in a frenzy again, shouting and throwing off their cloaks and flinging dust into the air. 24–26 They would have questioned Paul by flogging him, but it was not legal to subject a Roman citizen to this sort of torture. When Paul pointed this out to his guards, their response was a very gratifying one, and the commander was fetched again. 27–29 The further exchange between the commander and the apostle left the former more impressed than before. In an era when Roman citizenship had been debased to the point where it could be purchased with money, Paul was a Roman citizen by birth (unlike the commander himself). 29 As in the previous case when Paul mentioned his Roman citizenship, the authorities became uneasy (cf. 16:37–40).

22:30–23:11 Paul before the Sanhedrin. 30 The mere fact that Paul was a Roman citizen was not sufficient to have him freed; the centurion still wanted to determine what the trouble had all been about. Thus the Sanhedrin was assembled and Paul was made to answer to them. Although we do not know if a Roman commander had the legal right to order the Sanhedrin to meet, in this case it was in their interest, since they wanted to sentence Paul and needed Roman approval.

23:1–2 It is odd that Paul protested his innocence before any charges were made. Perhaps Luke has merely omitted the charges, if they were the same as those given in 21:28 (see also 24:5–6). Paul's protestation of innocence was met with a slap in the face, perhaps because of the reference to God. 3 His response to this was swift and angry. The phrase whitewashed wall is reminiscent of Jesus' condemnation of hypocrisy in Mt. 23:27, but is even closer to the image in Ezk. 13:10–12. Paul's reply seems clearly to go against the injunction to 'turn the other cheek' (Mk. 5:39) and the apostle's own description of his actions in the face of persecution in 1 Cor. 4:12. 4–5 The exchange that followed has been taken as an apology or at least excuse, by Paul. Did Paul really not know that Ananias was the high priest? Perhaps the high priest was not dressed in splendid robes, but the deference shown to him would have been sufficient clue to his identity, even in an informal gathering. On the other hand, suggestions that the sentence should be interpreted as sarcasm, 'It didn't occur to me that someone who acts this way could be a high priest', have no strong textual base and do not fit well with the phrasing of the quotation from Ex. 22:28. It is probably best to take the text as it is and accept the puzzle of Paul's apparent ignorance.

5–8 The remarkable turn of events that followed is easily misunderstood. Paul well knew that some of them were Sadducees and the others Pharisees and appears to make good use of a sort of loophole by referring them all to the resurrection of the dead, a doctrine which he knew they disagreed about. But Paul was at once more clever and more honest than he is usually given credit for. 'More clever' because this was more than just a delaying tactic to distract them while he slipped out of the door. He discredited their charges before the Roman commander. No Roman could cheerfully ally himself with the decisions of a body such as the Sanhedrin proved itself to be in the ensuing argument. And 'more honest' because the issue of resurrection was more than just a convenient Christian doctrine to bring up at this stage (see 4:1–2, where it was precisely what the temple officials objected to). The appearance of the resurrected Jesus to Paul on the road to Damascus was the main prop in Paul's self-defence: only the divine vindication of the risen Jesus could have turned Paul from his former zeal. If God had raised Jesus, then Paul had to do what he was doing. If God had not raised Jesus, then Paul was mistaken. It was that simple (see 1 Cor. 15:12–15).

9 In the uproar at least some of the Pharisees were willing to admit that what had happened to Paul on the Damascus road might have had some basis in fact. 10 The Roman commander once again needed to rescue Paul from a violent dispute. He must have become convinced of two things. First, that the Jews would not be able to reach a rational decision on the matter; and secondly, that the dispute was, at its core, a religious one. But one who could cause so much trouble could not easily be released. 11 The following night the Lord appeared, as he had before (e.g. 18:9–10) to encourage Paul and confirm his purpose. Even in these seemingly fruitless encounters, Paul was to continue to testify about the Lord.

23:12–26:32 Before the Romans: Caesarea

23:12–35 Transfer because of a plot. There is irony in the Holy Spirit's message through Agabus in 21:10–11, 'the Jews of Jerusalem will bind the owner of this belt and will hand him over to the Gentiles'. It was in fact the Gentiles who saved Paul from two violent incidents and went on to thwart those Jews who wanted to kill him. 12–14 There were more than forty men directly involved in the plot and the fact that they took such an oath shows how seriously they took themselves. 15 Several, though not all, of the members of the Sanhedrin were in the conspiracy. The rest were to be deceived along with the Roman commander on the pretext of wanting more accurate information. Sentence would be passed and executed while Paul was en route to the hearing.

16–22 It is somewhat surprising that Luke gives us such scant information about Paul; we do not even know his full three-part Roman name! We learn only here that he had relatives in Jerusalem. Speculation about how the nephew got his information is unlikely to be productive.

23–24 The description of Paul's escort seems a trifle excessive, amounting to nearly half the Jerusalem garrison, by some estimates. The size of the military guard was probably determined by the very real threat of open mass revolt, clearly on the authorities' minds from the outset (see on 21:30–32, 37–38). The commander's concern was primarily peace in Jerusalem; the bulk of the force returned there quickly (31–32).

25–30 Neither Luke nor Paul would have had access to the governor's mail, and the introduction he wrote a letter as follows perhaps means that Luke is giving us the gist of what he guessed to have been in the letter. On the other hand, it is possible that the letter would later have become part of the paperwork connected with Paul's trial and perhaps even read out in court. The letter as we have it is in just the sort of tones that we might expect in the situation, complete with all the subtle political undertones emphasizing the commander's own initiative and responsible actions, including the slight 'streamlining' of the truth: I came with my troops and rescued him, for I had learned that he is a Roman citizen (cf. 21:33; 22:29).

31–35 The detail that Paul was from Cilicia was solicited by Felix in an attempt to determine under whose jurisdiction the case would come. In the event, Felix agreed to take responsibility.

24:1–26 Paul before Felix. This was the first of three hearings before important officials, all of which, though inconclusive in verdict, leave the reader with little doubt that only bias and technicalities kept Paul a prisoner. 1–9 This trial was unusual in being the only one in Acts in which the accusers employed a lawyer. It has often been thought that Tertullus was a 'second-rate' orator and guilty of flattery in his weak speech, but it was accepted practice for the speech to begin with an acknowledgment of the judge's authority on the matter, phrased to win favour and good will, and Luke's brief outline of the contents of the actual speech contains some clever points. When Tertullus claimed, for example, that we have enjoyed a long period of peace under you (2), this might be taken as nonsense, since there had been disturbances and attempted revolts, which the procurator had dealt with harshly (see 21:31, 37–38; 23:23–24). This was, however, Tertullus' attempt to remind Felix that stability had been purchased through his severe action against troublemakers, of which, he goes on to argue, Paul was one, causing riots in all the world (5). This is a clever charge, perhaps drawing upon knowledge supplied by the Asian Jews (21:27–28) regarding the riot in Ephesus (19:23–41), which Paul could qualify, but not deny.

10 After some rather plain opening remarks, which would have been considered the bare minimum politeness required, Paul extremely effectively refuted the charges made by Tertullus. Luke has, of course, recorded only summaries of the speeches (see on 2:14) and seems to have deliberately edited these two in such a way as to emphasize that Tertullus' speech had correct, perhaps even exemplary, form but little substance; whereas Paul, who could not really compete rhetorically, was obviously in the right (see the more acceptable opening before Agrippa in 26:2–3). 11–13 Paul began the defence proper by denying the charge that he deliberately tried to cause trouble in Jerusalem. Charges of intent to make trouble could not be borne out by the evidence. 14–16 He did admit to being a Christian, a follower of the Way, which they call a sect (see v 5). This perhaps should be translated 'which they admit is a sect', since the same word would have been used in phrases like 'the sect of the Pharisees'. The thrust of this comment was that the beliefs of the Christian group of Jews need to be no less Jewish than the differing groups of Pharisees and Sadducees: I have the same hope in God as these men. 17–18 Having stated that he did not deliberately make trouble, Paul then clarified that neither did he unintentionally defile the temple: he was presenting gifts to the poor and offerings and was even ceremonially clean at the time.

19 There was a change of tactics in the final section of the speech. Paul mentioned that the Jews from the province of Asia should have been the ones bringing charges. This line of argument was a potential bombshell, for there were two immediate implications. First, there was strong feeling against the practice of accusing someone without appearing in court to prosecute (see on 17:17). Secondly, any infractions or accusations that primarily concerned the province of Asia (as it would now appear Tertullus had meant by 'all over the world' in v 5 above) would place the affair out of Felix's jurisdiction. 20 Those present could only speak about the events in Jerusalem, and referring the court to the shambles of a meeting conducted by the Sanhedrin (22:30–23:10) revealed that there were no charges made and that the matter concerned differences between the beliefs of sects, rather than Paul's personal conduct (cf. 14–16).

22–25 Perhaps Felix was acquainted with the Way through the interest of his Jewish wife Drusilla, who accompanied him as he listened to Paul talking about faith in Christ Jesus. The contrast between the practical urgent teaching that Paul gave on righteousness, self-control and the judgment to come and the cool attitude with which it was received is emphasized in Felix's words, 'When I find it convenient, I will send for you.'

Felix had allegedly adjourned the proceedings until the Roman commander Lysias could come to testify, but in fact he was hoping that Paul or his friends would offer him a bribe. That he had no real interest in Paul or his case for its own merits was confirmed when he was succeeded by Porcius Festus, at which point he left Paul in jail merely to grant a favour to the Jews. The Jews of Caesarea disliked Felix strongly enough to send a deputation to Rome to speak against his 'misdeeds'.

25:1–12 Paul before Festus. The second of the three hearings before officials in Caesarea is presented even more briefly, focusing only on the Jews' desire to get Paul to Jerusalem and his appeal to Rome. This act determined the rest of the events recorded in Acts.

1–5 In Jerusalem, the Jewish leaders' grievances against Paul were insufficient to have him transferred there, which was just as well, since they were preparing an ambush again. The Jews had flexed their muscles by having made a deputation against Felix (even though it was not completely successful), and they may have hoped that Festus would do them a favour to keep in their good graces. Festus was agreeable (9) and willing to reopen the case, but on his terms, not theirs (see his account of the matter in 25:15–17).

6–8 Luke reports merely that the serious charges could not be substantiated and that Paul had a clear conscience (but see 25:17–19). 9 Festus was still willing to grant the Jews concessions and unwilling to make a decision on a matter that touched upon their own religious beliefs (see 25:20). He was also probably unwilling to declare Paul innocent at this sensitive point in his own political career. 10–11 His offer to reconvene the trial in Jerusalem, however, was not acceptable to Paul, who protested that no-one has the right to hand me over to the Jews. (Paul's citizenship also figured in his treatment in 16:37–39 and 22:25–29.) This is ironic in the light of the prophecy of Agabus that the Jews will deliver Paul into the hands of the Gentiles (21:11), for repeatedly it was the Jews who tried to prise Paul out of those hands! 12 Apparently, every Roman citizen possessed the right of appeal to Caesar in certain circumstances, but the details of the precise rules in the first century are the subject of some controversy. Festus was probably greatly relieved to avoid final responsibility in the matter.

25:13–26:32 Paul Before Festus and Agrippa. The final hearing in Caesarea was little more than a whim on the part of Herod Agrippa. It took place without the accusers and without any decision-making power, but not without some ceremony. 13 The king and his wife Bernice had come for a state visit to the newly appointed Festus. 14–22 It is natural that this affair which seemed important in Festus's relationship with the Jews should come up in conversation with King Agrippa, who was familiar with Judaism and, by virtue of his office, had the power to appoint the Jewish high priest (see below 26:3). Festus would have been especially interested in Agrippa's opinion on the matter because he had to write a report about the prisoner, and he admitted I was at a loss how to investigate such matters (26). Given the strength of Jewish feeling against Paul (24), Festus had expected Paul to have done something truly dreadful. His description of the point of the actual dispute is almost humorous because of his bewilderment: [the argument was] about a dead man named Jesus whom Paul claimed was alive.

23 The ceremony of the occasion was notable. With all the high-ranking officers and the leading men of the city present as well as the king and queen, this provided the new governor with what today would be considered a 'photo opportunity'. 24–27 Festus's introductory speech adds little to the account in the previous chapter, but explicitly confirms the emotional nature of the Jewish leaders' complaint against Paul (shouting that he ought not to live any longer) and Festus's own impression of Paul's innocence. However, he needed to write a report to Rome about Paul (as Lysias had written to his predecessor Felix; 23:26–30) and hoped to gain some insight from Agrippa's expertise.

26:1–3 As in both sides' speeches before Felix (24:2–4, 10), this speech began with an introductory statement acknowledging (and praising) the authority of the judge.

4–8 The speech continued along the lines of the defence in ch. 22. As in his defence before the Sanhedrin, Paul maintained that it was because of his hope in what God has promised our fathers that he was on trial that day, namely the hope and belief that God raises the dead.

9–14 The first part of the account of Paul's experience on his way to Damascus is in harmony with the other versions in chs. 9 and 22 (see esp. on 9:1–9), except that this telling of the story reveals that the Lord also said to Paul 'It is hard for you to kick against the goads'. The picture is of an ox or beast of burden moving against the sharp stick used to guide it, and this was a common proverbial phrase in secular and even Jewish writings. It is an accurate picture of Paul's experience; his actions before his experience on the Damascus road showed that he had indeed always felt Jesus to be an irritant, and then God showed him just what kind of irritant. 15–18 Either Luke or Paul himself has abbreviated the rest of the account. The emphasis in this version of the story is on the word of the Lord and Paul's desire to obey. 19–21 It was the obedience to the vision of Jesus, raised by God from the dead, that was the reason why the Jews seized me in the temple courts and tried to kill me. 22–23 The relationship of the gospel to the prophets and Moses may also have been drastically abbreviated (see on 2:14). If Paul's original speech contained quotations from the Scriptures (see e.g. the speech in 13:16–41, esp. vs 33–41; 17:3) and used some of the rabbinic techniques of interpretation that we know Paul could handle (see e.g. Gal. 4:21–31), then Festus's interjection your great learning is driving you insane (24) makes all the more sense, as does Paul's reply that the king would be familiar with these things and his rhetorical question do you believe the prophets? I know you do (25–27).

28–29 Agrippa's question was an attempt to sidestep Paul's to him. The king neatly avoided either denying his belief in the prophets or accepting Paul's interpretation of them. Paul replied that whether it took a short time or long, he did indeed hope to make everyone as he was, except for these chains. Far from begging to be free like everyone else there, he wished everyone else could be like him! Those in attendance could not have failed to have been impressed with the bravery and wit of Paul in engaging a king in such lively conversation! 30–32 Indeed, after the interview the people of importance were clear in their own minds of Paul's essential innocence. Ironically, it was only Paul's appeal to Caesar that kept him in his chains, since to free him now would have been to usurp the emperor's right to judge the case. Paul had wanted to go to Rome in any case and Festus was glad not to be responsible in the eyes of the Jewish leaders for releasing him.

27:1–28:31 To Rome itself

27:1–12 Paul sails for Rome. On the whole matter of sea voyages in the ancient world and on the terminology and place-names in this chapter in particular, see C. Hemer, The Book of Acts in the Setting of Hellenistic History (Mohr, 1989), pp. 132–152. 1–2 The narrator once again uses we (see on 16:10; 21:8), to indicate his own presence on the voyage. The other notable characters in the story include a centurion named Julius, some other prisoners who were also in his charge and the Christian Aristarchus. About the latter, however, Acts does not tell any more (but see Col. 4:10 and Phm. 24, perhaps written during Paul's captivity in Rome).

3–8 From the very beginning of the sea part of the voyage, the winds were against the boat and it made slow headway and moved along the coast with difficulty. The voyage was still underway at the end of summer (the Fast is a reference to the Day of Atonement in September/October). It was about this time that sailing stopped until the spring and ships would 'winter' in a safe harbour somewhere. 10–12 From his letters we know that Paul had had some previous experience of sailing and even shipwrecks (see 2 Cor. 11:25). Even so, it is hard to be surprised, as Luke appears to be, that the centurion chose to follow the advice of the pilot and owner of the ship rather than one of his prisoners. Thus it was that the decision was taken to sail on another approximately 40 miles for a port with the proper facing for shelter from the winter winds.

Paul's journey to Rome.

27:13–44 Storm and shipwreck. The events of this final voyage to Rome might itself be considered a trial scene: trial by nature. There are various tales in the ancient world of people who commit crimes and though they escape from their human prosecutors, the gods, notably Poseidon the sea god, find them and punish them. That the sea 'spared' Paul through the shipwreck would not, of course, make the same supernatural point for Luke and for Christians, but the escape from the sea would have been charged with significance for most Gentiles of Luke's time (see 28:4 below).

The knowledge of the events does seem to be firsthand, and the language used by Luke is consistent with someone without detailed nautical knowledge reporting accurately what the sailors in a crisis situation were doing.

13–20 A gentle south wind (13) quickly turned to a wind of hurricane force (14) once the ship was underway. This forced the crew to abandon control of their own boat. The various precautions taken, such as using cables to reinforce the ship's hull, lowering the sea anchor, throwing some of the cargo overboard, and later even jettisoning part of the ship's tackle were the correct procedures, and they are given in the probable order of occurrence as the situation became more and more desperate until the point where we finally gave up all hope of being saved (20).

21–26 Paul's speech appears at first to have a touch of 'I told you so' about it, but in fact his previous advice is highlighted in order that the ship's crew might have more cause to believe this latest 'forecast', which came to Paul from God, through an angel. Not that everything was going to come out fine, there was to be danger and loss, but everyone would survive. The main thrust of Paul's address is found twice in the space of five verses: Keep up your courage, men.

The speech also tells us something about the nature of accidents and tragedies. It is clear that the storm and shipwreck were not interpreted by Paul as divine judgment upon his captors but rather as the result of circumstances. It was not that God was tracking them down with storms and they could not hide. It was not that they could have avoided the storm if they had had a different attitude towards the Christians. The only way they could have avoided all of this was by not making the foolish decision to sail to Phoenix in the first place. Those critics who argue that Luke has made up this whole episode to add excitement to his story and to stress Paul's mastery over the situation are themselves shipwrecked on the notable lack of superstition in the speech. Surely any admirer of Paul's who would not stop short of creating such a story out of thin air would certainly have used the opportunity to portray his hero, who on occasion healed as his master did, also calming storms as his master did (Lk. 8:22–25).

27–29 Two weeks after leaving Fair Havens on what should have been a one-day journey, the sailors sensed they were approaching land (27), and the depth soundings that they took confirmed this. No longer afraid of running aground, they let down more anchors and prayed for daylight (29), hoping that in the light they would be able to steer the boat towards a beach rather than run aground on rocks further out. 30–32 If it had been daylight, and if the ship was holding together reasonably well, it would almost certainly have been safer to stay on board than to venture out in stormy conditions in a smaller lifeboat. The attempt of some of the sailors to escape in this way is an indication of their desperation and perhaps also of how damaged the ship was already. Without a full complement of crew to steer the ship the safety of the rest was obviously in jeopardy, and the Roman soldiers assured themselves of the crew's cooperation by cutting the lifeboat loose.

33–38 Paul’s advice to the people to eat makes sense in the light of the strenuous ordeal that they knew would be facing them with the arrival of dawn. Although there is a marked similarity in the wording used of this meal and Jesus’ own actions in hosting the Lord’s Supper (took ... , gave thanks ... , broke ... and gave ...; see Lk. 9:16; 22:19; 24:30), there is no other indication that ‘communion’ was being celebrated here, and the mixed party of Christians and non-Christians tells against it.

Although some of the cargo had already been abandoned (18), the grain appears to have been retained as ballast. Now that the objective was to be beaching the ship, the higher it could be made to ride in the water, the better. It may have been the decision to throw the grain overboard that occasioned Paul’s call for the people to eat first.

39–40 At first light they could see the land. With a sandy beach in sight, there was an obvious target for a place to run the ship aground. 41 The ship never reached the beach, however, but instead struck a sand-bar and broke up.

42 The soldiers’ plan to kill the prisoners rather than run the risk of them escaping reflects the attitude also shown in 12:18–19 and 16:27 that the guards would be liable for the punishment due to the prisoners that they had allowed to escape. 43 The centurion stopped this. As a result of his travels with Paul thus far, he had understandably developed some respect for him. As Paul had been told beforehand, everyone reached the land in safety.

28:1–10 Paul on Malta. 1–2 It was only upon reaching shore that the party learned where they were (see 27:39–40). The word Luke used of the islanders is lit. ‘barbarians’ (used for all people who did not speak Greek, without any implication about the level of their culture or civilization). 3–6 The incident of the snake should probably not be regarded as a tale about Paul’s immunity to poisonous snakes, but rather another instance (cf. 14:8–13) of Christians being mistaken for gods by superstitious Gentiles. There is a snake found on Malta even today that may well have been classed as a viper (3) in ancient times because of its close physical resemblance. This snake, though not poisonous, clings to its victim as the snake which attacked Paul did. The picture Luke presents of Paul having shaken the snake off into the fire (5) is not the portrayal of someone displaying a supernatural mastery over a dangerous beast. It was only after waiting a long time that it became obvious that Paul was not in danger, and only then that the local people stopped thinking of Paul as a murderer, relentlessly pursued by some avenging god of justice, and instead regarded him as a god himself.

7–10 Eventually the party made contact with the Roman governor of the island, Publius. The sickness suffered by his father and cured by Paul is often thought to have been a local affliction caused by contamination of goat’s milk (known widely as ‘Malta fever’). Healing came about through prayer and the laying on of hands, and the prominence of the person healed led to much publicity. We may assume that Paul and the other Christians in the party preached the good news and had at least some success, even though the text is curiously silent about the matter, saying only that the natives honoured us in many ways. The islanders’ good will stood the whole party in good stead and when we were ready to sail, they furnished us with the supplies we needed (10).

28:11–31 Paul in Rome. In marked contrast to the previous voyage, the final leg of the journey went smoothly and was without incident, except for the pleasant welcome from the brothers (15) from Rome who travelled more than 30 miles to meet Paul and his companions. 16 Upon arrival in Rome proper, the freedoms enjoyed by Paul were relative. Luke is stressing only that he was not formally imprisoned (see also 28:30–31). He would still have been hand-cuffed to the soldier who was there to guard him (see v 20, ... bound with this chain).

17–20 Another limit to Paul’s freedom is perhaps seen by the way that the Jewish leaders visited him rather than his visiting the synagogue. The claim made by Paul that the Romans wanted to release him (18) was a bit of a simplification, although it is true that except for hopes of a bribe (24:25) and a desire to please the Jerusalem Jewish leaders (24:26), Paul probably would have been freed. Agrippa, too, felt that Paul could have been freed had he not appealed to Rome (see 26:32). Paul’s desire to speak to the Jews in Rome concerns this certainty on his part that Jesus was the hope of Israel. Despite the fact that in city after city, preaching to the Jewish communities led to some conversions from the people but also much opposition, Paul was aware that his was a Jewish message in the first instance, and each new Jewish community was given a fresh opportunity to respond.

21 Some are surprised that the Roman Jews would not have heard from Jerusalem regarding this trouble-maker. But the Jerusalem Jews may have decided not to press their case in Rome. The case against Paul might have been strong in Palestine before officials who felt they had to pacify the Jews, but in Rome the religious accusations of a bunch of provincials against a cosmopolitan Roman citizen were almost certain to fail. 22 It is even more difficult, however, to understand the Jews’ protestations of ignorance about Paul’s views. The implication is that, despite the presence of a Christian community at Rome (as evidenced by Paul’s letter and 28:14–15), these people had only heard rumours. But the Jewish community had been expelled from Rome for a time by Claudius (see 18:2). In the interim, the church would have become predominantly Gentile in make-up, and the recently returned Jewish community may have had no contact with them in this big city.

23–24 Paul and the Jewish leaders arranged a time to get together, at which Paul’s attempts to evangelize them met with only mixed success. 25–27 Paul expressed his frustration and disappointment by quoting from Is. 6:9–10 (cf. Mk. 4:12 and parallels), part of which he had previously referred to in his letter to the Roman Christians (Rom. 11:8). 28 His conclusion—I want you to know that God’s salvation has been sent to the Gentiles, and they will listen!—is, due to its placement so near to the end of the book, easily misread as closing the possibility of further mission to the Jews. But this passage must be read in the same spirit as the similar declaration in 13:46. Throughout Acts, Paul may turn his back on specific Jewish congregations, but not on the whole Jewish race (see also Rom. 11:25–32).

30–31 The situation remained as in 28:16, with Paul under ‘house arrest’ but free to witness to anyone who came within earshot. The phrase for two whole years prompts the reader to wonder what might have happened after that. It is likely that Paul was eventually executed by the Romans, but probably not at this point. What seems most likely is that the present case against Paul failed, he was released and travelled and wrote some more letters (1 and 2 Timothy and Titus) before being rearrested and executed in AD 64. Why then did Luke end the account here? We may never know the answer to this, but the simplest answer remains a strong possibility. Luke finished the way that he did because he had brought the reader up to date. He was writing the book during Paul’s imprisonment and did not write about his trial or further adventures because they had not happened yet. The long road over Luke’s two books had brought the Christian story from its very beginnings, in the mysterious eastern capital Jerusalem, right up to what were to him and his readers ‘modern times’ and the centre of the world empire, Rome.

Conrad Gempf

ROMANS

Introduction

Paul's letter to the Christian community in Rome is one of the most important theological documents ever written. Its influence on the church has been enormous: Romans has decisively shaped the teaching of Augustine, Calvin, Luther and Wesley, to mention only a few. Yet Romans is not a systematic theology but a letter written in specific historical circumstances. We will understand it better if we understand those circumstances (see also the general article, Reading the letters).

General circumstances

1. Paul

Paul provides us in 15:14–29 with some details about his own circumstances. He is on his way to Jerusalem, where he plans to hand over to the Jewish church the money that he has collected from the Gentile mission churches. From Jerusalem, Paul intends to travel to Spain in order to begin a new evangelistic work there. On his way to Spain, Paul plans to stop in Rome. Comparing these plans with Luke's narrative in Acts, we can conclude that Paul wrote Romans at the end of the third missionary journey, probably during his three-month stay in Greece (Acts 20:3–6). Paul undoubtedly spent most of this time in Corinth (see 2 Cor. 13:1, 10), and indirect confirmation of this as the place where Romans was written comes from Paul's commendation of Phoebe, who was from Cenchrea, the seaport adjacent to Corinth (16:1–2). This stay in Corinth probably occurred in AD 57, although it could have been a year earlier or later.

A factor of some importance in our understanding of Romans is Paul's indication in these verses that he had reached a crucial turning point in his missionary career. Paul had decided to preach in Spain because 'there is no more place for me to work in these regions,' that is, in the eastern Mediterranean (15:23). With the establishment of vigorous churches 'from Jerusalem all the way around to Ilyricum' (15:19), Paul believed that the work God had given him to do—to plant strategic churches through which the gospel could be proclaimed—was finished in that area. Just as early American pioneers felt crowded and moved on whenever they could see the smoke from someone else's cabin, so Paul felt 'crowded' by the number of Christians where he was ministering and wanted to move on to what we might today call 'unreached peoples'.

2. The church in Rome

Some early traditions make Peter the founder of the Roman church, but this is unlikely. Probably Jewish pilgrims from Rome, converted through the preaching of Peter on the Day of Pentecost, planted the gospel among the large Jewish population in the capital city (Luke notes in Acts 2:10 that Jews from Rome were present on that day). As in so many other cities, the Jews of Rome did not all embrace this new Messianic teaching. The historian Suetonius noted that the Roman Emperor Claudius expelled all Jews from Rome 'because they were constantly rioting at the instigation of Chrestus' (Life of Claudius, 25.2). He was almost certainly referring to violent debates within the Jewish community over the claims of Christians that Jesus was the 'Christ' (Gk. Christos), corrupted here into 'Chrestus'. This expulsion of Jews, then, would have included Jewish Christians, as Luke himself implies when he mentions that it was because of this edict of Claudius that Priscilla and Aquila had come to Corinth (Acts 18:2). The expulsion (which is probably to be dated in AD 49) would have had a significant effect on the make-up of the Christian community in Rome: Gentiles, who had up to this point comprised a minority of the believers, were now left as the only Christians in the city. Therefore, although Jews had been allowed to move back to Rome by the time Paul wrote to the Romans—Priscilla and Aquila, for instance, had returned (Rom. 16:3–4)—Gentiles were in the majority in the church, and had come to dominate both its leadership and theological tone.

Literary history

Textual variants in chs. 14–16 raise questions about the original form and literary history of Romans. The doxology (16:25–27) at the end of the letter is placed at the end of ch. 14 in some manuscripts, at both the end of chs. 14 and 16 in other, and at the end of ch. 15 in one early text. Some Latin manuscripts not only have the doxology at the end of ch. 14 but also omit all of ch. 15 and the rest of ch. 16. These data raise the possibility that the sixteen-chapter form of the letter we now have many have been preceded by a fourteen or fifteen-chapter form. Perhaps the most popular of the reconstructions holds that Paul had first written chs. 1–15, with the doxology, to the church at Rome and had subsequently sent this letter, with the addition of 16:1–23, to the church at Ephesus. Not only would this explain why the doxology appears at the end of both chs. 15 and 16, but it would also account for the number of people whom Paul greets in 16:3–16. Acquaintance with so many believers in Rome, a church that Paul had never visited, seems unlikely, but makes perfectly good sense if these verses were written to the church at Ephesus, with which Paul had a long and close relationship. (The best-known advocate of this theory is T.W. Manson, 'St. Paul's Letter to the Romans—and Others', The Romans Debate, ed. K. Donfried [Augsburg, 1977], pp. 1–16.)

This theory and others similar to it must, however, be rejected. For one thing, the textual evidence on which it is based is very slim. To be sure, one manuscript does put the doxology at the end of ch. 15; but the same manuscript includes 16:1–23. We possess no manuscript that contains the fifteen-chapter form of text posited by Manson. There is evidence for a fourteen-chapter form of the text, but it is most improbable that Paul wrote such a text, since it cuts him off in the middle of his argument about the 'strong' and the 'weak' (14:1–15:13). Early Christians must have been responsible for omitting the last two chapters of the letter, perhaps to give it a more universal appeal (Harry Gamble, Jr, The Textual History of the Letter to the Romans [Eerdmans, 1977]). More likely, however, as Origen suggests, it was Marcion (a second-century theologian who disliked the OT and Jewish elements within Christianity) who removed these chapters.

We have good reason, then, for thinking that the letter printed in our Bibles is substantially identical to the letter that Paul wrote to the Roman church. How do we explain, then, the number of greetings? First, Paul could have met a number of these people—like Priscilla and Aquila—during their exile from Rome in the course of his ministry in the east. The famous Roman roads, well-built and well-maintained, afforded excellent opportunities for travel in the first-century Mediterranean world. Secondly, Paul may have taken the opportunity afforded him by his unfamiliarity with the Roman church to greet every Christian he knew in the city.

Audience

Paul seems to send mixed signals on the issue of the particular audience that he had in view as he wrote to the Roman church. On the one hand, several elements of the letter point to a mainly, if not exclusively, Jewish audience: he greets Jewish Christians in 16:3, 7, 11; he addresses ‘the Jew’ in 2:17 and implies that his readers are closely related to the Mosaic law (cf. 6:14; 7:1, 4); he calls Abraham ‘our forefather’ (4:1); and he devotes considerable attention to ‘Jewish’ issues e.g. the sin and failure of Jews (2:17–3:8), the place of the law in salvation-history (ch. 7) and the past and future of Israel (chs. 9–11). Indications of a Gentile readership are, however, equally clear: the address of the letter associates the Romans with the Gentiles among whom Paul had specially been called to minister (1:5–6; cf. 1:13 and 15:14–21); Paul directly addresses Gentiles (11:11–24) and his plea for unity and tolerance seems to be directed especially to Gentiles (15:7–9). W. G. Kümmel succinctly summarizes the ambiguity of this evidence: ‘Romans manifests a double character: it is essentially a debate between the Pauline gospel and Judaism, so that the conclusion seems obvious that the readers were Jewish Christians. Yet the letter contains statements which indicate specifically that the community was Gentile-Christian’ (Introduction to the New Testament [SCM, 1975], p.309).

Faced with this conflicting evidence, some scholars have concluded that Paul had a distinctly Jewish audience in mind, others that he was writing to a wholly Gentile audience and still others that he was addressing Jews at some points and Gentiles at others. The evidence is, however, better explained by the supposition that the audience Paul addressed was one made up of both Jewish and Gentile Christians. Nevertheless, the way in which Paul associates the church with his ministry to Gentiles in 1:5–6 suggests that Gentiles were in such a majority that the church had taken on a Gentile flavour and identity.

Class of literature

Ancient letters ranged from brief, intimate notes to family members to elaborate treatises designed for a wide audience. Among the letters of Paul, Romans is clearly the one that is closest to the latter type. Thus, while Romans has the typical opening (1:1–15) and closing (15:14–16:27) of a letter, its most striking feature is its sustained theological/pastoral argument in 1:16–11:36. At no point in this lengthy section does Paul directly address the Roman Christians per se or suggest that the issues he is talking about have been raised by them. And this is true even in the more ‘practically’ oriented 12:1–15:13 (although it is likely that the appeals to the ‘strong’ and the ‘weak’ in 14:1–15:13 reflect an actual problem in Rome). The movement of the letter is dictated by the internal logic of the gospel rather than by local issues. This does not mean that Paul wrote the letter in a vacuum: Romans is not a timeless theological treatise, but a letter, written to a specific church in a specific situation. Romans, like all Paul’s letters, is an occasional document. We must not forget the audience he had in view as he wrote. The character of the letter makes clear, at the same time, that the occasion for its writing must have resided in the need to address certain theological issues of relevance to early Christians generally—and to every Christian since.

Scholars have occasionally attempted a more precise identification of the nature of Romans, comparing it to specific kinds of letters of other literary works in the ancient world. While these attempts have often shed light on certain specific features of Romans, none of them can be judged to be an acceptable identification of the letter as a whole. As James Dunn concludes, ‘the distinctiveness of the letter far outweighs the significance of its conformity with current literary or rhetorical custom’ (Romans 1–8 [Word Books, 1988]).

Purpose

The ‘treatise’ style of Romans raises a critical question about the letter: why did Paul write this particular letter to this particular church? He says little about his purpose in writing, so our answer to this question must be based on our analysis of the contents of the letter against the general circumstances in which it was written (see above). The most likely answers can be grouped into two major categories: those that focus on Paul’s own situation and those that focus on the situation of the Roman Christians.

1. A focus on Paul’s circumstances

Three possibilities should be mentioned. First, Paul may have been writing to introduce himself to the Romans and explain what it is he believes with the purpose of gaining support from them for his mission to Spain. Secondly, Paul, knowing that he would be visiting Rome soon, may have taken this opportunity to put down in writing his own doctrinal conclusions. After all, the apostle had just emerged from a difficult theological and pastoral struggle with the Corinthian church, and had reached a critical turning point in his own ministry. What better time to reflect on, and solidify in writing, his own theological convictions? A third possibility is that Paul took the opportunity in this letter to the Romans to rehearse the speech he was going to give when he arrived in Jerusalem with the collection. Certainly this visit to Jerusalem was very much in Paul’s mind (see 15:25–33), and the tensions between Jewish and Gentile Christians that he hoped to heal by means of that collection could well explain why Romans focuses so much on issues relating to Israel and the law.

Probably each of these factors played some role in Paul’s purposes in writing. But only the first explains why the letter was sent specifically to Rome, and it should therefore be given special attention. But before drawing further conclusions, we must note another approach to the question of purpose.

2. A focus on problems in the Roman church

The nineteenth-century biblical critic F. C. Baur pioneered a new approach to Romans by emphasizing that it, like Paul’s other letters, was written to deal with specific problems within the community addressed. Many contemporary scholars agree, finding particularly in Paul’s admonitions to the ‘strong’ and the ‘weak’ (14:1–15:13) the overarching purpose of the letter. On this view of the matter, Paul wrote in order to heal a division within the church at Rome. The division was specifically one between Gentile Christians (the ‘strong’) and Jewish Christians (the ‘weak’), and this explains why Paul spends so much time in the letter carefully setting forth his theology as it relates to these two groups.

A desire to heal this division within the Roman church was probably one of Paul’s purposes in writing, but not the primary purpose. Would Paul have delayed mentioning anything about his main purpose in writing until the letter was almost finished? Would we not expect him to be drawing applications to this problem from his theological discussion throughout the letter if it loomed so large in his thinking?

So it appears that Paul wrote Romans with a number of purposes in mind. Probably the overriding purpose was his desire to introduce himself to the church at Rome by setting forth the gospel he preached. This was especially important because false rumours about what Paul preached had reached the Romans (see 3:8). He had apparently earned the reputation in the early church of being anti-law and anti-Jewish. Paul sought to show that this was not the case (see particularly 1:16; 7:7–12; chs. 9–11) at the same time as he spelt out in detail in what sense he was critical of the Jews and the Mosaic law (see particularly 2:17–3:20; ch. 7). These same themes would have been debated in Jerusalem and were central to some of the debates within the Roman church. In other words, we have in Romans a series of purposes, all converging on the issue that predominates throughout the letter: what is the nature of the continuity between God's old covenant arrangement and his new covenant arrangement? What is the relationship between the law and the gospel, Jewish believer and Gentile believer, Israel and the church? It is Paul's desire to address this central and enduring theological issue that gives to Romans its special universal character.

Theme

In the light of what we have said in the last paragraph, it is no wonder that many scholars think that the continuity of salvation-history is the central theme of the letter. They often single out chs. 9–11 as the heart of the letter. Many of the Protestant reformers, on the other hand, focused their attention on chs. 1–5 and concluded that the theme of justification by faith is the main theme of the letter. Somewhat similar to their approach is that of Ernst Käsemann, who sees 'the righteousness of God' (which he takes to mean God's intervention to reclaim his rebellious creation) as the theme of Romans. However, neither of these concepts is broad enough to encompass the contents of the letter as a whole. While justification by faith is a critical doctrine in Romans, and it becomes the theme of 3:21–4:25, it does not figure prominently in other parts of the letter. If, then, we are to identify a single theme for the letter, it must be 'the gospel'. The word is prominent in the introduction (1:1–2, 9, 15) and conclusion (15:16, 19) of the letter, and has pride of place in what is usually identified as the statement of the letter's theme: 'I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes' (1:16).

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Romans, BST (IVP, forthcoming).

F. F. Bruce, Romans, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, rev. edn. 1985).

L. Morris, The Epistle to the Romans (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1988).

C. E. B. Cranfield, Romans: A Shorter Commentary (T and T. Clark/Eerdmans, 1985).

J. Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. NICNT (Eerdmans, 1959, 1965).

J. D. G. Dunn, Romans, 2 vols., WBC (Word, 1988).

Outline of contents

1:1–17

The letter opening

1:1–7	Prescript
1:8–15	Thanksgiving and occasion
1:16–17	The theme of the letter

1:18–4:25

The gospel and the righteousness of God by faith

1:18–32	God's wrath on the Gentiles
2:1–3:8	God's wrath on the Jews
3:9–20	The guilt of all humankind
3:21–26	The righteousness of God
3:27–4:25	'By faith alone'

5:1–8:39

The gospel and the power of God for salvation

5:1–11	The hope of glory
5:12–21	The reign of grace and life
6:1–23	Freedom from bondage to sin
7:1–25	Freedom from bondage to the law
8:1–30	Assurance of eternal life in the Spirit
8:31–39	Celebration of the believer's security

9:1–11:36The gospel and Israel

9:1–6a	The issue: Paul’s anguish over Israel
9:6b–29	Israel’s past: God’s sovereign election
9:30–10:21	Israel’s present: disobedience
11:1–10	Israel’s present: ‘a remnant by grace’
11:11–32	Israel’s future: salvation
11:33–36	The awesome purpose and plan of God

12:1–15:13The gospel and the transformation of life

12:1–2	The heart of the matter: a renewed mind
12:3–8	Humility and gifts
12:9–21	Love
13:1–7	The Christian’s responsibility to government
13:8–10	Love and the law
13:11–14	Recognizing the times
14:1–15:13	Appeals for unity

15:14–16:27The letter closing

15:14–33	Paul’s ministry and plans
----------	---------------------------

16:1–16	Commendation and greetings
16:17–20	Warning about false teachers
16:21–27	Final greetings and doxology

Commentary

1:1–17 The letter opening

The opening has elements common to Paul's other letter openings: a prescript, or address (1:1–7), a thanksgiving (1:8–15) and a transition between the opening and the body of the letter (1:16–17). A key word in all these sections is the 'gospel', introducing the theme of the letter as a whole.

1:1–7 Prescript

Ancient letters usually began with an identification of the writer and the recipients, and Paul usually began his letters in the same way. The prescript of Romans is, however, remarkable for its length and theological detail. Not content with simply identifying himself, Paul describes who he is in terms of his divine call to be an apostle (1), the gospel he preaches (2–4) and the special ministry that God has given him (5–6). Only then does he finally complete his prescript by naming the recipients of the letter (7). Paul goes into such detail because he needs to establish his 'credentials' before a church that he has never visited before.

These credentials reside especially in his divine call. Paul is a servant of Christ Jesus, and a special servant at that; for he has been called to be an apostle and set apart for the gospel of God. These words refer to the experience on the Damascus road when the risen Christ appeared to Saul, persecutor of Christians, and called him to play a central role in God's plan to bring the gospel to Gentiles. The term 'apostle' is used in most of the NT of someone who has seen Christ and been specially commissioned by him to function as part of the 'foundation' of the church (Eph. 2:20; see Acts 1:12–26). Paul, then, owed his authority as an apostle not to any human appointment or abilities, but to the risen Lord's call and gifts (see Gal. 1:1). The same is true of the message that Paul proclaimed, the gospel (Gal. 1:11–12). Paul takes this word from the OT, where it sometimes denotes the 'good news' about God's final victory in history (see Is. 40:9; 52:7; 61:1; Joel 2:32). Paul was very fond of the word, using it to denote both the actual events of Jesus' death and resurrection that constitute the good news, and the communicating of that good news to others ('preaching'). Here, gospel includes both ideas.

Having introduced himself in v1, Paul now briefly characterizes this gospel in vs 2–4. First, it has its roots in the OT: promised beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures. Paul touches here on a theme that will become central to Romans: the continuity between God's plan in the OT and its culmination in the New. Secondly, the gospel has at its heart a person: God's Son (3), Jesus Christ our Lord (4). In a carefully balanced statement that may reflect general early Christian teaching about Jesus, Paul compares his earthly and heavenly states. v 3 looks at Jesus' earthly existence as the promised Messiah from the line of David (see 2 Sa. 7:12–16; Is. 11:1, 10; Ezk. 34:23–24). The phrase as to his human nature (Gk. kata sarka, lit. 'according to the flesh') is better paraphrased 'from the standpoint of a simply human perspective' (cf. RSV, NASB). This phrase is then to be contrasted with through (Gk. kata, 'according to') the Spirit of Holiness in v 4. The contrast between vs 3 and 4, then, is not between Christ's human and divine nature but between his earthly state and his heavenly state as the risen and exalted one. What happened at Christ's resurrection, then, is not simply a powerful declaration that Jesus is Son of God (as the NIV suggests), but the appointment of Jesus to a new status as 'Son-of-God-in-power'. Pre-existing eternally as the Son of God, Jesus, through his resurrection from the dead, gained new power and glory, power now exercised for the 'salvation of everyone who believes' (1:16; see also Phil. 2:9–11; Heb. 7:25).

It is through this powerful Son of God, Jesus Christ our Lord (4) and for his name's sake that Paul received the special grace of being an apostle (5). Paul's apostleship, as the NT repeatedly emphasizes, was focused especially on the Gentiles (see Acts 9:15; 22:21; 26:17–18; Gal. 1:16; 2:1–11; Eph. 3:1, 6, 8; 1Thes. 2:16). Paul here indicates that his specific purpose was to call Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith. This translation suggests that Paul is focusing in his preaching on the need for Christians to live godly lives after their initial conversion. But we should perhaps give as much weight to the word 'faith' as to the word 'obedience' and understand Paul to be stating his comprehensive purpose to call Gentiles both to initial acceptance of the gospel and to continuing obedience to the demands of the gospel (the Greek is simply hypakōn pisteōs, 'obedience of faith'). Believing and obeying are two different activities, but for Paul they were always inseparable: people cannot truly obey God without first bowing the knee to the Lord Jesus in faith; and people cannot truly believe in that Lord Jesus without obeying all that he has commanded us (Mt. 28:20).

Since Paul's commission was to go especially to the Gentiles, the Roman church, a largely Gentile church at this time (see the Introduction), was within the sphere of Paul's apostolic authority (6). Hence Paul addresses himself to all the Christians in Rome, loved by God and called to be saints (7). Such language, picking up standard OT terminology to describe Israel, reminds the readers that they are God's people. Paul concludes with his customary greeting, adapted from a popular Greek formula but given new theological content: Grace and peace to you from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

1:8–15 Thanksgiving and occasion

In this paragraph Paul briefly expresses his thanks for the widespread reputation of the Roman Christians' faith (8) and then speaks of his longing to visit and minister to the church at Rome (9–15). The strength of Paul's assertions about his desire to visit the church suggests that some of the Roman Christians may have felt slighted that the great 'apostle to the Gentiles' had not yet come to the capital of the Gentile world. Paul assures them that his absence has not been from lack of desire but from lack of opportunity: he has been prevented from visiting them (13), the hindrance probably being his obligations to the churches in the eastern Mediterranean (cf. 15:19–23). Paul also expresses his purpose for wanting to visit the Roman church. First, he wants to impart to them some spiritual gift (11). This translation suggests that it is Paul's hope to confer a special spiritual gift (charisma) on the Christians in Rome. We should, however, probably translate his words, 'share with you a certain spiritual gift', the reference being to a gift of Paul's own that he is planning to use to strengthen the church. Secondly, Paul expresses his desire to have a harvest among you (13), a harvest that he apparently intends to gather by ‘preaching the gospel’ among them (15). Perhaps we should interpret the first, more general, purpose by the second, more specific one and conclude that Paul wants to come to Rome to use his gift of evangelism to gain converts for the church and so strengthen it. Such a desire is fully in keeping with Paul’s overwhelming sense of being bound [under obligation] both to Greeks and non-Greeks, both to the wise and the foolish (14). Paul’s wish to minister in Rome stems not from any selfish desire, but from the knowledge that God has called him and equipped him for a purpose (see 1 Cor. 9:16b: ‘Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!’).

1:16–17 The theme of the letter

Paul’s eagerness to preach the gospel in Rome (15) leads directly into his description of this gospel in vs 16–17. These verses express the central theme of Romans and form the transition between the letter opening (1:1–15) and the body of the letter (1:18–15:13). The keyword in this statement of theme, and the central motif of the letter, is the gospel (see on v 1 for the meaning of this word). In saying that he is not ashamed of this gospel, Paul may mean simply that he is ‘very proud’ of it. But the fact that false rumours about Paul were known to the Roman Christians (3:8) may suggest that he is truly defending himself against accusations that he should be ‘ashamed’ of what he preaches. In either case, we should note Paul’s fierce and defiant pride in that which is a ‘stumbling-block’ to Jews and ‘foolishness’ to Greeks (1 Cor. 1:23).

Why this pride in the gospel? Because Paul knows, and knows from experience, that the gospel is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes. ‘Salvation’ is a word that denotes deliverance from a broad range of evils and was used in the OT to describe God’s ultimate deliverance of his people. See, particularly, Is. 52:7, which uses two of the keywords in this part of Romans: ‘How beautiful on the mountains are the feet of those who bring good news, who proclaim peace, who bring good tidings, who proclaim salvation, who say to Zion, “Your God reigns!”’ In v 16, as always in Paul, salvation refers to God’s act in rescuing the sinner from the penalty of sin. Paul’s insistence that this salvation is for everyone who believes sounds a note that will reverberate throughout Romans. Equally characteristic is the addition first for the Jew, then for the Gentile. The universally available power of the gospel does not cancel Jewish priority. As the recipients of God’s OT word and covenant, the Jewish people still stand as the first addressees of God’s good news about the completion of his OT plan and promises (3:1–2; 11:1–2, 29).

The gospel is the source of God’s power to save because in it a righteousness from God is revealed. We would do better to make this phrase definite—‘the righteousness of God’—because Paul is referring to a specific concept, rooted once again in OT promises. The ‘last days’, when God would intervene to save his people, were characterized by prophets like Isaiah as a time when he would reveal his ‘righteousness’ (e.g. Is. 46:13; 51:5–6, 8). This ‘righteousness of God’ is a central motif in Romans (cf. 3:5, 21–22, 25–26; 10:3; outside Romans Paul uses the phrase only in 2 Cor. 5:21). This righteousness is taken by some scholars to mean the gift of ‘right standing’ that God gives to those who believe, and by others to mean the activity by which God saves his people. But it is not necessary to choose between these alternatives. In both the OT and in Paul, ‘the righteousness of God’ is a broad concept, embracing both the act of giving (on God’s part) and the status of those who receive the gift (on our part). God’s righteousness is revealed, then, as the gospel is preached and people respond to the message in faith. For in that moment, God acts to bring the sinner into a new ‘right’ relationship with himself. Note also that the phrase refers to a new relationship, not to a new moral ability. Paul (and the OT) take the language from the realm of the law court, and it pictures the act by which the judge declares a person ‘innocent’ before him.

One of the distinguishing features of Paul’s discussion of God’s righteousness is his insistence on its connection with faith. This connection is underscored in the last part of v 17. By faith from first to last is a fair paraphrase of the Greek ek pisteōs eis pistin, ‘by faith unto faith’. The phrase emphasizes that God’s righteousness is experienced by faith and nothing but faith. The quotation from Hab. 2:4 reinforces the connection between ‘righteousness’ and ‘faith’. Indeed, it may be that Paul wants to connect these terms even more closely than is suggested by the NIV rendering, for we could also translate the phrase as, ‘the one who is righteous by faith will live’ (see the AV and RSV). ‘Will live’ refers, in the context of Romans, to eternal, spiritual life.

Note. 17 In Hab. 2:4 God is reminding the prophet that the person who is part of God’s covenant people (‘righteous’) will experience God’s blessing and understand his ways only through faithfulness to God and his covenant. In Paul’s use of the verse (cf. also Gal. 3:11), each of the key terms—‘righteous’, ‘live’, ‘faith’—is given a deeper significance in light of the coming of Christ, but the general sense of the original is maintained. Habakkuk and Paul both affirm that life before God demands the wholehearted commitment of the individual.

1:18–4:25 The gospel and the righteousness of God by faith

The Hab. 2:4 quotation in v 17 introduces the theme of the first major section of the body of Romans: the revelation of God’s long-promised saving righteousness in Jesus Christ, and faith as the only means by which human beings can experience that righteousness. It is particularly this latter theme that is central to Paul’s argument in 1:18–4:25. (It may be noted that ‘righteousness’ and the related words ‘justify’ and ‘righteous’ occur twenty-four times in this section; the words ‘faith’ and ‘believe’ twenty-seven times.) God’s justifying activity, based on the cross of Christ and revealed in the preaching of the gospel, is entirely free—a matter of ‘grace’ (3:24; 4:4–5, 16)—and can thus be experienced only by faith. For faith is no ‘work’, but an act of grateful acceptance and surrender (4:4–8). God’s grace as the means of revelation, and human faith as the means of acceptance point to another truth that Paul is concerned to emphasize throughout this section: that God’s righteousness is for anyone who believes, whether Gentile or Jew. Both, Paul asserts, are alike ‘under sin’ (3:9); both can be justified only by faith (3:28–30). Paul develops the first of these assertions in 1:18–3:20 and the second in 3:21–4:25.

Paul prepares for his exposition of ‘the righteousness of God by faith’ (3:21–4:25) by first demonstrating the depth and breadth of the ‘sin problem’ (1:18–3:20). He seeks to answer two specific questions. Why did God need to reveal his saving righteousness in Christ? Why can people experience it only by faith? The answers to both questions are found in Paul’s contention that ‘all are under sin’ (3:9)—helpless captives to the deadly rule of sin. As Paul develops the argument that leads to this conclusion, it becomes clear that his particular purpose is to show that Jews, just as much as Gentiles, are subject to sin’s rule and in need of the gospel of God’s righteousness. Thus, after exposing the sin and need of the Gentiles in 1:18–32, Paul spends considerable time showing that the Jews are in no better state (2:1–3:8).

3:21–26 is the central paragraph in this section, a paragraph Luther said was ‘the chief point, and the very central place of the Epistle, and of the whole Bible’ (margin of the Luther Bible, on 3:23–26). The rest of the section (3:27–4:25) elaborates one major element from this paragraph:

faith as the only means of justification before God. Paul develops his basic points about faith in vs 27–31 and then elaborates these in turn in ch. 4 with reference to Abraham.

1:18–32 God's wrath on the Gentiles

Vs 18–19 act as the 'heading' for all of 1:18–3:20: God's wrath falls on all human beings who do not follow the truth as God has revealed it to them. Some theologians have trouble reconciling the idea of wrath with the God of the Bible. But in fact the Bible constantly portrays God as a God who acts to judge sin. The OT mentions several occasions when God's wrath came upon people for their sin (e.g. Ex. 15:7; 32:10–12; Nu. 11:1), and the NT predicts a time when the final expression of God's wrath will fall on rebellious humanity (e.g. Rom. 2:5; 5:9; Eph. 5:6; Col. 3:6; 1 Thes. 1:10; 5:9). The wrath of God is not, of course, an emotional rage but a steadfast and absolute opposition to all that is evil. It is essential to the character of God: 'As long as God is God, He cannot behold with indifference that His creation is destroyed and His holy will trodden underfoot. Therefore He meets sin with His mighty and annihilating reaction' [A. Nygren, Commentary on Romans (Fortress, 1949)].

Paul shows first how God's wrath has come deservedly on Gentiles (20–32). This whole section has many parallels to Jewish texts in which the Gentiles are criticized for their sins (see especially Wisdom of Solomon 13–15). Also evident are allusions to the story of creation and the fall of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (cf. v 23 with Gn. 1:20, 24). Some scholars think that Paul is here describing that original fall of humanity (20–23) and the consequences for subsequent human history (24–32). But this is not likely, since Paul makes clear that the same people who turned from God are also those who are guilty of the sins he depicts in these verses. We should view this section, then, as Paul's picture of the situation of Gentiles generally, drawn against the background of the fall of the original human beings into sin. Paul pictures each person as his or her 'own Adam', repeating the same basic sin committed by our original human parents. Vs 20–23 describe the basic decision made by Gentiles and vs 24–32 God's reaction to that decision.

Though Gentiles do not have 'special revelation', as the Jews do in the Scriptures, they nevertheless have been given knowledge of the truth about God in the creation around them. God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen (20). Paul makes clear that Gentiles in his day, and people who have never heard the gospel or read the Bible in ours, have genuinely 'seen' something of God and who he is. But some people who receive that truth do not respond appropriately to it: rather than glorifying God or giving him thanks, they turn from the truth to embrace idolatry (21–23).

This passage is one of the most important in the Bible for the concept of 'natural revelation': the idea that, in addition to revealing himself in Christ and in the Scriptures, God has also revealed himself to everybody through nature and history. As Paul will hint at later (see 1:32; 2:14–16), all human beings have the capacity to receive such revelation because they continue to bear the divine image. This text not only affirms this concept but also, and most importantly, teaches what is the ultimate result of natural revelation unaccompanied by any other means of grace: a rejection of God. No-one, Paul makes clear here, can ever be saved on the basis of the truth revealed in nature by itself. Thus, Paul concludes, because all people have been given access to genuine knowledge about God, they are, when they turn from it, without excuse (20).

This text provides one of the most important theological bases for the missionary enterprise: the lost state of all those who have never had the chance of responding to the gospel of God's grace. For this text makes clear that there can be no salvation apart from response to the gospel of Christ. Those who have never heard that gospel are therefore bound in their sin and without hope. To be sure, God is sovereign in the communication of his grace as well as in its application, and he may at times choose to bring to people a knowledge of the gospel in ways quite unforeseen and even unknowable to us. But the Scriptures make plain that God has chosen to make known the good news of Jesus Christ through the witness of his own people (Mt. 28:16–20; Rom. 10:14–15). This was one of the main reasons why Paul and other early Christian missionaries were so passionately committed to the spread of the gospel.

Human rejection of God leads to God's punishment of humans. Three times in this paragraph Paul tells us that Gentiles have made an 'exchange': turning from the truth of God and his moral requirements to their own gods and sinful ways (23, 25, 27). Three times also Paul indicates God's reaction to this 'exchange' with the statement God gave them over (24, 26, 28). Faced with human sin and rebellion, God turns people over to the sin they have chosen and its consequences. The language Paul uses (Gk. paradidōmi, 'hand over') refers to more than a passive withholding of divine grace on God's part. Paul thinks, apparently, of a judicial act in which God confirms people in the decision they have made and turns them over to the consequences of it. Prominent among the sins to which God has handed over people are idolatry (25; cf. v 23) and sexual sins, especially the sin of homosexuality (24, 26–27). Paul here agrees with the Jewish tradition—and the OT—in seizing on homosexual practice as a particularly evident example of the Gentiles' rejection of God. Unnatural, applied to homosexual practice in v 26, in this context denotes the practice as one that is against the natural law, given by God to regulate all people.

Vs 29–31 show how human failure to give God his due has brought on the human race destructive evils of all kinds, ranging from gossip to murder. It may be that Paul implies a sequence in these sins, the basic sin of idolatry—putting something in God's place—leading to all other kinds of sin. V 32 suggests that peoples' knowledge of divine things is not completely effaced by their 'fall' into sin. Although the minds of human beings can no longer function as they should (28), people are still able to understand that the things they do are deserving of God's penalty of death. Yet they not only do them, but also approve of those who practise them. What Paul means by this is not that approving the sin of others is, in an absolute sense, worse than doing the sin ourselves, but that encouraging others in sin reveals the extent to which people have become outright rebels against God's righteous rule.

2:1–3:8 God's wrath on the Jews

In 1:18–32 Paul has described the sin and judgment of the Gentiles using the third person: 'they' turned from God, God gave 'them' over. Through most of ch. 2, however, Paul uses the second person singular, as in v 1: 'You, therefore, have no excuse'. This shift in person does not mean that Paul is now addressing his readers in Rome directly. Paul is using a literary device, popular in the ancient world, in which an author addresses an imaginary opponent or discussion partner as a vivid means of getting their points across to their audience. (This style was named the diatribe.) Who is Paul's 'opponent' or debating partner in these verses? V 17 makes clear that in vs 17–29, at least, Paul is speaking to a Jew. Many scholars (e.g. Barrett) think that in vs 1–16 Paul is speaking more generally to any self-proclaimed 'moral' person. But it is more likely that even here Paul's real 'target' is the Jew. He omits any specific identification at first so that he can engage the Jew in his argument before the force of his accusation becomes clear. Paul's technique here probably reflects his preaching style. We can imagine Jews in Paul's audience expressing their agreement with Paul's indictment of Gentile sinners in ch. 1, only to find themselves indicted for doing the same things (3).

Throughout 2:1–3:8, then, Paul focuses on Jews. He demonstrates that their status before God in the judgment is no different from that of the Gentiles (2:1–16), despite the fact that they possess genuine gifts of God such as the law and circumcision (2:17–29). In 3:1–8 Paul takes a brief detour from this main line of argument to deal with some issues raised by what he has said in ch. 2.

2:1–16 God's impartial judgment Paul's purpose in this section is to place the Jew in the same category as the Gentile sinner in ch. 1. He proceeds in the three stages. Vs 1–5 contain the heart of Paul's indictment: the Jew (the 'hidden target' behind the 'you' Paul addresses) does the 'same things' that the Gentiles do and is therefore liable to the same judgment. Paul follows this with two paragraphs in which he departs from his 'accusation' style to explain and elaborate the charge he has made in vs 1–5. Paul defends his accusation of the Jew by showing that God's impartiality, taught in the OT and in Judaism, demands that he should have no favourites but treat every person, whether Jew or Gentile, in the same way (6–11). Nor does the Jewish people's possession of the Mosaic law make the situation of the Jew significantly different from that of the Gentile; for it is not having the law, but doing the law that matters before God and, in any case, the Gentiles also have God's law in a certain sense (12–16).

The therefore in v 1 is, at first sight, difficult to understand. How can Paul's condemnation of Gentiles (1:18–32) lead to the conclusion that Jews are under condemnation also? Some suggest that the word is a simple transition word, without logical force; others (e.g. Cranfield) that 1:18–32 is not really about Gentiles but about all people. A modification of this latter suggestion would seem most likely. While Paul's language in vs 20–32 indicates that he is thinking only of Gentiles, vs 18–19 include all people. As was pointed out above, these verses stand as the heading for all of 1:18–3:20, and it is to these verses that Paul now returns in 2:1. Because God's wrath is revealed from heaven against all people who suppress God's truth, you, therefore, have no excuse. For whoever it is who judges the Gentile sinners Paul has described in 1:20–32 is also judging himself or herself. This is because the one standing in judgment is doing the same things. While not every person is involved in rank idolatry and sexual promiscuity, no person is guiltless with respect to the sins enumerated in vs. 29–31: e.g. greed, hatred of God, arrogance. And perhaps, in the larger sense, even the Jew who puts the law, or his circumcision, or his piety above devotion to God is guilty of idolatry. Since God's judgment is based on truth, i.e. it is always exactly in keeping with the facts (2), he cannot simply overlook such sin (3). Paul's argument in these first three verses may then be summarized in three propositions: God's judgment falls on those who do 'such things'; even the self-righteous judge of others does 'such things'; therefore, even the self-righteous judge stands under God's judgment.

The rhetorical question in v 4 exposes the false assumptions with which this self-righteous judge of others is operating. That Paul is speaking to a Jew, and reflecting a real situation, is clear from the fact that the sentiment and even much of the wording of this question is drawn from the Jewish inter-testamental book the Wisdom of Solomon. After rebuking the Gentiles for their idolatry and sin in chs. 13–14 (a text that Paul parallels in 1:18–32), the author of this book says in 15:1–2: 'But thou, our God, art kind [chrēstos] and true, patient [makrothymos], and ruling all things in mercy. For even if we sin we are thine, knowing thy power.' It is clear that it is just this assumption of automatic exclusion from God's judgment that Paul is contesting. The Jew who fails to repent sincerely will not go free in the judgment simply because he or she is a part of God's covenant people. Such a person is, in fact, simply storing up wrath for the day of God's righteous judgment (5).

V 6 is tied closely to v 5 (and hence the paragraph division in the NIV), but actually introduces a new section. The theme of this section is expressed in both its opening and closing verses: God does not show favouritism (11); he will give to each person according to what he has done (6). Paul uses this same technique (sometimes called chiasm) to detail the two possible outcomes of God's impartial judgment: eternal life for those who do good (vs 7 and 10) and wrath for those who sin (vs 8 and 9). The following outline displays this structure:

- A God's equitable judgment (v 6)
 - B Life for those who do good (v 7)
 - C Wrath for those who do evil (v 8)
 - C Wrath for those who do evil (v 9)
 - B Glory for those who do good (v 10)
- A God's impartiality (v 11)

Paul applies this teaching about God's impartial judgment explicitly to Jew and Gentile (9–10), revealing his overall purpose of showing that God's standard of judging Jews will not differ at all from the standard he uses to evaluate Gentiles. For both, it is doing that will be decisive. That doing evil will incur God's wrath is no surprise and represents consistent biblical teaching. But what does Paul mean when he asserts that people who do good will gain eternal life (7; cf. v 10)? Since Paul elsewhere makes clear that people can achieve eternal life only through faith (1:17; 3:20, 21–22), he cannot mean that people can actually be saved simply by doing good works. Some scholars (e.g. Cranfield) think that Paul is describing Christians, whose good works demonstrate the reality of their new life. But Paul says that it is the doing of good itself that brings life. It is better, then, to view these statements as general assertions of principle: if someone were to do good persistently (see v 7), that person would gain eternal life. But what Paul will make clear elsewhere is that no person, since the fall of Adam, can, in fact, do that good persistently (see 3:9–18, 23). Paul's purpose at this point is not to show how people can be saved but to set forth the standards of God's evaluation apart from the gospel. These standards are the same for everyone—whether they be Jews or Gentiles, black or white.

A Jew listening to Paul's argument to this point would surely have offered a crucial objection: does not the fact that the Jews are God's chosen people and have been given his law as a sign of his covenant, put them in a very different position before God's judgment from the Gentiles? Paul anticipates this objection and provides a preliminary answer in vs 12–16. As in 6–11, Paul's purpose is to iron out any distinction between Jew and Gentile with respect to the ultimate judgment of God. He does so by making two points. First, it is not simple possession of the law that will excuse the Jew from judgment; only if it is actually obeyed will it do the Jew any good (12–13). Those who sin apart from the law and those who sin under the law (12) are clearly Gentiles and Jews, respectively. This makes clear that Paul uses the word 'law' here (Gk. nomos), as he usually does, to refer to the law of Moses. Both Jews and Gentiles will be condemned by the law (12) because it is only the one who obeys the law who will be righteous in God's sight (13). The logic of these verses assumes that there is no person who is able to obey God's law sufficiently so as to become righteous before him.

The second point Paul makes here is that Gentiles themselves possess God's law, and so there is not really as much difference between the Jew and the Gentile as the Jew might think (14–15). Gentiles do not have the law of Moses, but in doing by nature things required by the law, i.e. by following some of the standards of God’s law—refraining from murder, theft, adultery; honouring parents—they reveal that they are a law for themselves. What Paul means by this is spelled out in v 15: the requirements of the law are written on their hearts. By their occasional conformity to the demands of God’s law, these Gentiles show that they have access to God’s moral demands. While not possessing the written law, they have some knowledge of God’s requirements from within, so that their consciences can, to some extent, accurately monitor their conformity to God’s will (15b). Here Paul supplements his ‘natural revelation’ teaching of ch. 1 by reminding us that every person has some knowledge of God’s moral will. As with natural revelation generally, however, this knowledge cannot lead to salvation; v 15b means not that some Gentiles might actually be saved at the judgment, but that each Gentile will have some thoughts that ‘accuse’ him and some that ‘excuse’ him.

The parentheses that the NIV places around vs 14–15 suggest that we should see v 16 as the continuation of v 13: God’s declaration of righteous status will take place on the day when God will judge men’s secret thoughts through Jesus Christ. But vs 14–15 are integral to Paul’s argument. V 16, then, is probably to be connected to v 15b: the conflicting ‘thoughts’ of people will be revealed and used as evidence at the judgment day by the God who has perfect knowledge of our hearts (see 1 Sa. 16:7; Ps. 139:1–2; Je. 17:10).

Note. 14 Some scholars think that Paul is describing Gentile Christians in vs 14–15, but this is unlikely. Gentile Christians do not do the things of the law by nature; and Paul’s whole argument bears many similarities to a popular Greek teaching about the ‘natural law’ that all people possess.

2:17–29 The law and circumcision. Paul returns to the diatribe style of 2:1–5 in these verses, as he again uses the second person singular to address his ‘dialogue partner’. For the first time this dialogue partner is explicitly identified as a Jew (17). What Paul argues in this section is that the Jew cannot rely on either the law or circumcision to protect him or her from the judgment of God. Jews viewed these as signs of their special covenantal status before God and believed that this status would guarantee salvation for all Jews who did not deliberately reject it: Paul does not deny either the value of the law and circumcision or the special status of the Jews; but he does deny that this special relationship gives Jews automatic immunity from the righteous judgment of God. God’s word given to Israel and his covenant with the people are great privileges; but they do not, in themselves, justify or save. As he has done repeatedly throughout 2:1–16, Paul asserts again that the law and circumcision can shield the Jew from judgment only if the law is truly obeyed. And, as Paul suggests in vs 17–24 and asserts plainly in 3:9–18, the Jews are not able truly to obey the law.

The first paragraph, vs 17–24, is made up of a long conditional sentence (17–23) and a concluding scriptural citation (24). In a series of ‘if’ clauses, Paul enumerates privileges that Jews claim for themselves (17–20). They claim the name Jew, the honorific title inherited from their ancestor Judah who became the nucleus of God’s chosen people. They rely on the law, what Paul calls in v 20 the embodiment of knowledge and truth. Gentiles have access to certain limited knowledge about God through ‘natural revelation’ (1:18–19, 25, 28, 32); but the Jews have a far more clear and complete revelation in the Mosaic law. Because they are instructed by this law, Jews know his will and can approve of what is superior (18). And, for the same reason, Jews can legitimately claim the right to instruct other nations which have not been blessed with so clear a revelation of the divine will (19–20). Israel’s ‘teaching’ role with respect to the rest of the world is asserted in the OT—the nation, the ‘servant of the Lord’, was to be a ‘light for the Gentiles’, and ‘to open eyes that are blind’ (Is. 42:6–7; 49:6). (This task, in which the nation itself failed, was ultimately fulfilled in the servant of the Lord, Jesus Christ.)

In the ‘then’ clause of his conditional sentence, Paul uses a series of questions to remind the Jews of their failure in this respect (21–23). What is surprising is that Paul selects such blatant sins—stealing, adultery and robbing temples (probably referring to the use of metals from idolatrous articles; cf. Dt. 7:26)—as examples of Jewish failure to keep the law. For would not most Jews have responded that they had not, in fact, disobeyed these commandments? Perhaps the answer is that Paul is assuming Jesus’ radical extension of the law: ‘When theft, adultery, and sacrilege are strictly and radically understood, there is no man who is not guilty of all three’ [C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (Harper) Row, 1957)]. But there is nothing in this context to suggest that Paul is assuming such a perspective. Perhaps, rather, Paul has selected these particular sins because of their prominence within the Mosaic law (taking robbing temples as a form of idolatry). Paul is not here trying to prove that all Jews commit these sins, but that they are particularly clear indications of the contrast between claim and practice that does pervade Judaism. Paul sharply expresses this contrast in the last of his rhetorical questions (23): You who brag about the law, do you dishonour God by breaking the law? The consequences of this contrast between claim and reality are highlighted in the quotation of Is. 52:5 in v 24. Perhaps there is irony here in the fact that Paul transfers the responsibility for God’s name being blasphemed from the Gentiles (as in the OT context) to the people of Israel themselves.

Circumcision, like the law of Moses, was a particularly prominent sign of the Jews’ special status (some rabbis claimed that ‘no person who is circumcised will go down to Gehenna’). Paul, however, asserts that circumcision will be of value only if the Jew observes the law. Conversely, the Jew who breaks the law will lose the value of his circumcision. Simply belonging to Israel, symbolized in circumcision, cannot save a person from God’s just judgment. For God’s judgment on a person is ‘according to what he has done’ (2:6), and it is only by ‘observing the law’ that circumcision will have any value. It is not clear whether Paul means by this that circumcision will have saving benefit if it is accompanied by a heart-felt, faith-motivated doing of the law (see, e.g. Murray, Cranfield), or that circumcision can never have saving power because no one is able to fulfil the condition of observing the law (e.g. Calvin, Bruce). But the latter seems preferable, since Paul’s purpose in this part of the letter seems to be to deny any saving benefit to circumcision and to the law.

If Jews who fail to do the law lose the value of their circumcision, could not Gentiles be regarded as though they were circumcised when they keep the law’s requirements? (26) This follows logically from v 25. Paul goes further in v 27: such an uncircumcised person who obeys the law will condemn you who, even though you have the written code and circumcision, are a law-breaker. The written code translates the Greek word gramma, ‘letter’, which Paul uses elsewhere to denote the law of Moses (see v 29 and Rom. 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:6–7). The law demands of its recipients an obedience that in itself it cannot secure. These verses are occasionally interpreted to mean that people who have never heard the gospel can be saved if they follow the dictates of their consciences. But this is plainly contrary to what Paul affirms elsewhere (3:20). More popular is the view that these uncircumcised people who keep the law are Gentile Christians (Murray, Cranfield, Godet). But would Paul have ever made law-keeping a means to salvation? Probably, then, as in 2:7 and 10, Paul advances this corollary only as a theoretical possibility: should a Gentile truly keep the law’s requirements (which Paul elsewhere denies), he or she would be saved (cf. Calvin, Käsemann, Wilckens).

Vs 28–29 explain why circumcision does not guarantee salvation and why its lack does not exclude from salvation. For the circumcision that ultimately counts before God is the circumcision of the heart, accomplished by the Spirit. What Paul says here is, of course, not new; the OT used this language to demand internal transformation (e.g. Dt. 10:16; Je. 4:4) and, like Paul, stressed that it was ultimately only God’s Spirit who could effect such a transformation (Je. 31:31–34; Ezk. 36:26–27). But what was a matter of expectation in the OT prophets has become a reality in the new covenant inaugurated in Jesus Christ. Paul’s language here, then, brings ch. 2 to a climax by hinting at the truth that becoming a member of God’s family is not a matter of Jewish covenant status or of doing the law but of creation anew through the Spirit of God.

3:1–8 God’s faithfulness and the Jews. In his attack on Jewish pretension in ch. 2, Paul wrote as if there were now no more difference at all between Jew and Gentile (see e.g. vs 9–10, 26–29). But this would be to misunderstand his argument. Paul’s purpose was to show that Jews have no advantage with respect to Gentiles in the judgment of God simply because they are Jews. Paul, experienced preacher that he was, knew that his argument could be misunderstood, so he added a detailed discussion on to the end of his exposure of Jewish sin in which he both affirms Jewish privileges and delineates the nature and limitations of those privileges. This issue would, of course, be of particular concern to Jews and Jewish Christians; but in that it raises questions of God’s own consistency and reliability—for circumcision and the law, it must be remembered, were given by God to the people of Israel—the matter would be of interest to Gentile Christians as well.

C. H. Dodd claimed that the logical answer to the question Paul asks in v 1 is ‘No’; there is no more advantage in being a Jew or in circumcision. He thought that Paul’s opposite answer—Much in every way!—stems from his emotional commitment to his ‘kinsmen according to the flesh’. But this is to misunderstand Paul’s carefully balanced theology of Israel. The Jews do not possess a saving relationship with God as a birthright; but they do have undeniable advantages, the greatest of which is the fact that they have been entrusted with the very words of God. The First of all at the beginning of v 2 suggests that Paul was going to continue to enumerate other privileges, but became sidetracked and so never finished the list (cf. however, Rom. 9:3–5). Israel’s greatest gift is the Scriptures, the very words of God (Gk. ta logia, ‘the oracles’, used twenty-four times in Ps. 119 of the word of God). True, some Jews have not proved faithful to this word: they have neither obeyed the law nor embraced Jesus in faith. But human unfaithfulness can never detract from the faithfulness of God (3). Even when a person is a liar, God is still true (4a). Most scholars see in these verses a positive affirmation of God’s continuing faithfulness to his people Israel who, as Paul makes clear in Rom. 11, have not been rejected by God (11:1–2) and who will one day be saved (11:25–26). However, while the positive aspect of God’s faithfulness is certainly present, v 4b suggests that there is a negative side to this faithfulness as well. Paul here quotes David’s affirmation from Ps. 51:4 that God is just in his punishment of him, for he has indeed sinned (in his relationship with Bathsheba). The point is that God is just when he judges. In the light of this, we should understand Paul to be affirming in vs 3–4 God’s faithfulness to all aspects of his word to Israel. And that word both promises blessing for obedience and threatens judgment for disobedience (see, Dt. 28; 30:11–20). God’s faithfulness, then, to his word does not preclude judgment of the Jewish people for their sin (see, for similar emphases, Ne. 9:32–33; La. 1:18; Psalms of Solomon 2:18; 3:5; 4:8; 8:7).

But this assertion raises a further question: if God’s righteousness becomes even more evident through human unrighteousness, how is it fair for God to judge that unrighteousness (5)? Some (e.g. Murray) think that Paul is raising this as a question about God’s dealings with human beings generally. But the context of Jewish argumentation makes it likely that he is still thinking of Jewish unrighteousness specifically. God's righteousness cannot mean here what it did in 1:17—God's saving righteousness—but must refer, as the parallel words faithfulness (3), true (4) and truthfulness (7) suggest, to his faithfulness. The OT frequently uses the word 'righteousness' (Heb. šēdeq or š' dāqâ; translated in the LXX with the same Greek word Paul uses here, dikaiosynē) to refer to God's faithfulness (e.g. Pss. 31:1; 36:5–6; Is. 38:19; 63:7). Scholars often claim that this faithfulness refers to God's commitment to carry out his positive covenant obligations to Israel. But many texts suggest a more basic concept, in which God's faithfulness is to his own person and word; and in some of these contexts God's 'righteousness' is displayed in his fair and just judgment of his people's sins (e.g. Pss. 67:4; 94:15; Is. 5:16; 10:22). Since v 4 has proclaimed God to be 'right' (dikaiōthēs) in his punishment of sin, this more basic idea of God's righteousness must be present in v 5. The Jews' failure to obey God's word has brought upon them judgment, and so highlighted God's faithfulness to his word of threatened judgment for sin. But, whatever the positive result of sin might be, God is never unjust to punish it. He will judge the world, and do so in strict justice (see Gn. 18:25; Jb. 8:3; 32:10–12). Vs 7–8 repeat the objection of v 5 in other terms, but v 8 sheds new light on the nature of this issue for Paul. As he here suggests, he himself has been accused of preaching a doctrine that leads to a 'Let us do evil that good may result' conclusion. Paul's assertion that God is 'righteous' even when he judges Jewish sin is taken by some Jews to mean that sin is therefore justified. Paul engages in no logical defence of his position here, but simply pronounces a condemnation on those who suggest so blasphemous a conclusion (8b).

3:9–20 The guilt of all humankind

Although the brief questions opening v 9 connect it with vs 1–8, it is clear that Paul begins here a summary and application of the argument he began in 1:18. He has demonstrated that God's wrath justly falls on both Gentiles (1:18–32) and Jews (2:1–3:8). Thus, Paul concludes, all people are 'under sin'. Paul bolsters this conclusion with an OT proof (10–18) and then applies the principle to Jews (19–20).

Paul's assertion of continuing Jewish privilege in 3:1–8 (especially vs 1–3) stimulates his question Are we [Jews] any better? His answer, Not at all!, is not intended to retract what he has said in vs 1–3, but to guard against the conclusion that God's gifts to the Jews give to them any advantage in God's judgment. Paul makes this point by reminding his readers that he has already made the charge that Jews and Gentiles alike are all under sin. To be 'under sin' means not only 'to be a sinner'; it means to be a helpless slave to the power of sin (cf. 6:15–23).

Paul underlines his conclusion about universal sinfulness with a series of OT quotations. Such collections of thematically connected quotations were popular with the rabbis, and some have thought that Paul may here be quoting a pre-existing Christian collection. The purpose of this series is especially to illustrate the 'all' of v 9: note the repeated there is no-one (vs 10, 11, 12) and the return of the all-embracing theme in vs 19–20: every mouth, the whole world, no-one. The texts appear to be arranged haphazardly at first sight, but there is evidence of some attention to structure and sequence. The first line, There is no-one righteous, not even one, is the heading, with the there is in v18 harking back to it to round off the series. Vs 11–12 develop the first line with five generally synonymous repetitions of the theme 'there is no-one righteous'. These quotations are all from Ps. 143:1–3. Paul continues to mine the Psalms (5:9, 140:4; 10:7) in the next four lines (13–14), each of which features sins of speech. Vs 15–17, on the other hand, use quotations from Is. 59:7–8 to depict sins of violence against others. Significantly, while some of the OT passages Paul quotes describe the enemies of Israel, others (e.g. Is. 59:7–8) refer to sins of the people of Israel. Paul thus subtly again makes the point that Jews must also be counted in the category of ‘the wicked’.

Paul’s application of the teaching of vs 9–18 (and indirectly of 1:18–3:18 as a whole) in vs 19–20 reveals again his preoccupation with the status of the Jews. He reminds his readers that his quotations have been taken from the law (nomos), the word here referring to the Scriptures as a whole (cf. also 1 Cor. 9:8–9; 14:21, 34; Gal. 4:21b). But this law is directed especially to those who are under the law, that is, the Jews (see 2:12; 3:2). From this Paul concludes that every mouth is now silenced—no-one has any defence to offer before God (see Jb. 5:16; Pss. 63:11; 107:42)—and the whole world is accountable to God, awaiting the sentence of condemnation. Paul can validly draw such a universal conclusion from the scriptural proof of Jewish sinfulness because, in demonstrating the sinfulness of God’s own covenant people, he has proven the most difficult part of his case. If even the Jews are condemned, then no person can escape the same sentence.

This means, in turn, that no one will be declared righteous in his sight by observing the law (20a). The fact that all people are ‘under sin’s power’ (3:9) means that no person can ever obey God’s law sufficiently as to merit a right standing before him. In putting it in terms of obedience to the law, Paul is again thinking particularly of the situation of the Jew. But Jewish obedience to the law is one instance of human obedience to God’s moral rules. In dismissing Jewish ‘works of the law’ as insufficient to attain salvation, Paul implicitly condemns all human ‘works’ as similarly inadequate. The power of sin holds all people in its inexorable grasp, and nothing that we do can ever release us from it. What, then, is the purpose of the law of Moses? It functions to make people conscious of sin. By setting forth God’s will in great detail, the Mosaic law makes absolutely clear that it is the living God whom we offend when we sin. It thus gives to humanity a clear understanding of its ‘accountability’ (see v 19) before God.

Note. 20 The NIV observing the law translates ergōv nomou, ‘works of the law’ (see also Rom. 3:28; Gal. 2:16; 3:2, 5, 10). Traditionally, this phrase has been understood to mean anything that a person does in obedience to God’s law. This is the interpretation adopted in the commentary above, and we think there are sound reasons for accepting it. While the phrase appears nowhere else in Greek, a parallel Hebrew phrase occurs in the Dead Sea Scrolls, and it is reminiscent also of the frequent rabbinic references to ‘works’ and ‘the commandments’—all of which refer to doing what the law demands generally. But scholars have suggested several other interpretations in recent years. James Dunn’s is probably the most popular and significant. He thinks that ‘works of the law’ refers to those areas of the Jews’ life that marked them out as God’s people, especially circumcision, dietary laws and observances of feasts. Paul, then, in v 20, would be denying that the Jewish covenant identification is able to justify. While Paul does indeed teach this, it seems as though this verse is saying more than that. Throughout 1:18–3:20, Paul’s focus has been on ‘works’ in a general sense (see, with reference to the Jews, 2:2–3, 6–10, 21–23, 25–27) and there is no good reason, then, either in the general use of the phrase or in the context, to restrict its meaning to certain works, or to works done in a certain attitude.

3:21–26 The righteousness of God

God’s ‘righteousness’ (dikaioσynē) stands at the heart of this great text. It is mentioned four times (21, 22, 25, 26), while the occurrence of two cognate words, ‘justify’ (dikaioō; 24, 26) and ‘just’ (dikaioσ; 26) reinforces its centrality. Paul develops his exposition of God’s righteousness in four steps.

First, he announces ‘the righteousness of God’ (21). The NIV righteousness from God is a possible but surely incorrect rendering, because Paul is referring to an activity of God (as in 1:17) not to a gift or status from God. Paul’s wording deliberately echoes 1:17, as he returns, after the necessary backdrop of 1:18–3:20, to the theme of 1:18–4:25. Here, however, Paul’s focus is less on the way that God’s activity of ‘making right’ or justifying is revealed in the preaching of the gospel than on the historical foundation for that justifying in the cross of Christ (the perfect tense of has been made known suggests this). Further, in positive confirmation of what he said in 3:20, Paul makes clear that this righteousness of God has been made known apart from law. The NIV rendering suggests that this phrase could modify what comes before it: ‘an apart-from-the-law righteousness of God’, but the phrase probably modifies the verb. Paul’s point is that a new era in God’s plan has arrived now and that his way of bringing people into relationship with himself takes place outside the confines of that old era, of which the Mosaic law was a central component. But Paul is careful at the same time to emphasize the continuity in God’s plan. God’s righteousness may not take place within the old era, or covenant; but the law and the prophets of that covenant testify to it.

In the second step of his exposition, Paul highlights the universal character of God’s righteousness. Experiencing God’s justifying activity is possible only through faith in Jesus Christ, and is for all who believe; for all are alike in needing God’s righteousness, since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God (22–23). The NIV translation through faith in Jesus Christ presumes that the genitive Iēsou Christou is objective, but many scholars are convinced it is a subjective genitive and translate the phrase ‘faith [or faithfulness] of Jesus Christ’. Paul would then be saying two separate things in v 22b: that God’s righteousness is based on Christ’s faithfulness and that it is available for everyone who believes. This is certainly a possible interpretation, but it is probably best to stick with the NIV rendering at this point. The idea of Christ’s ‘faithfulness’ (expressed with the word pistis) is not clearly attested elsewhere in Paul, while this whole section of Romans focuses again and again on the centrality of human faith in Christ for justification (see especially v 26 at the end of this paragraph). Paul, then, repeats the notion of human faith in v 22 because he wants to say both that God’s righteousness comes only by faith in Christ and that it comes to everybody who has such faith. V 23 is a succinct summary of 1:18–3:20.

The third part of the paragraph (24–25a) draws attention to the source of God’s righteousness. Are justified at the beginning of v 24 harks back to God’s righteousness in vs 21–22. (The connection is not clear in English because we have to use words from two different roots—‘justify’ and ‘righteousness’—to translate Greek words that come from the same root.) God’s act of putting people into a new and right relationship with himself is an act of sheer grace: he acts without compulsion and apart from any ‘reasons’ outside his own will (see also 4:4–5, 13–16; 11:6). This is why faith, an act of acceptance and surrender, is necessary to experience this righteousness. Our justification, furthermore, has its source in the redemption that came by Christ Jesus. Redemption (apolytrōseōs) is another of the important theological terms in this paragraph. It denotes an act of ‘buying out of slavery’ and suggests that God provided in Jesus Christ a full ‘payment’ for our sin that we might be released from its bondage (see 3:9) to serve a new master.

V 25 continues this thought by describing in more detail the nature of Christ’s work on the cross for us. The key word is hilastērion, translated ‘sacrifice of atonement’ in the NIV. Many think, in light of the use of this word in secular Greek, that it means here ‘propitiation,’ that is, an act in which the wrath of God is turned away. Others (e.g. Dodd) insist that the word means ‘expiation’ (see the RSV), an act in which sins are forgiven and ‘wiped away’. But the evidence of the word’s use in the LXX points in a slightly different, and broader, direction. The word there usually refers to the ‘mercy seat’ a component of the altar in the tabernacle. The word is particularly prominent in Lv. 16, where the ritual of the Day of Atonement is prescribed. It is on this ‘mercy seat’ that the blood of the sacrifice is sprinkled, in order ‘to make atonement’ for the people. Since in its only other NT occurrence (Heb. 9:5) hilastērion refers to this mercy seat, it seems likely that Paul uses the word with this meaning. His point, then, would be that Jesus Christ is the NT counterpart to the OT ‘mercy seat’. As this ‘mercy seat’ was the place where God took care of his people’s sin, so now Jesus Christ has been presented (publicly displayed for all to see) as the ‘place’ where God now deals, finally and forever, with his people’s sin. Atonement now takes place in him and this atonement, as in the OT, includes both the forgiving of sins—expiation—and the turning away of God’s wrath—propitiation. This propitiation is, of course, a far cry from the sort of ‘bribery’ of capricious and self-serving gods featured in some ancient religions. The propitiation that takes place at the cross is the gift of God himself and involves the satisfaction of his own righteous and holy anger at sin.

The fourth step in Paul’s exposition of God’s righteousness asserts that God’s way of justifying sinners maintains his justice and holiness (25b–26). The key to understanding these verses is to realize that ‘righteousness of God’ has a different meaning here than it has in vs 21–22. As in 3:5 (see the notes there), it refers to God’s faithfulness to his own person and word in a general sense. Hence the NIV translates the dikaiosynē as ‘justice’ in both its occurrences in these verses. God has, in the past, ‘passed over’, failed to punish with full severity (parensis) the sins of his people. He has justified people like Abraham and David without extracting the full penalty for their sins. That penalty has now been paid by Christ on the cross, revealing God to be just both in his passing over of those sins committed beforehand (25b) and in his justification of sinners at the present time (26a). Thus, in a sentence that summarizes the whole paragraph, God is now seen to be the one who is both just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus (26b). James Denney provides his own beautiful summary of this paragraph: ‘There can be no gospel unless there is such a thing as a righteousness of God for the ungodly. But just as little can there be any gospel unless the integrity of God’s character be maintained. The problem of the sinful world, the problem of all religion, the problem of God in dealing with a sinful race, is how to unite these two things. The Christian answer to the problem is given by Paul in the words: “Jesus Christ whom God set forth a propitiation (or, in propitiatory power) in His blood” ’ (J. Denney, The Death of Christ [Tyndale, 1951], p. 98).

3:27–4:25 ‘By faith alone’

This passage elaborates one key element in the great theological summary of 3:21–26: faith as the only means of justification. Paul develops this thesis in two stages, the first being a general statement (3:27–31) and the second 4:1–25) an elaboration with respect to a specific instance—Abraham. The two sections not only focus on the same theme, but they develop it in the same manner:

3:27a

Boasting is excluded Abraham cannot boast

4:1–2

3:27b–28	because one is justified by faith, not works of the law	because Abraham was justified by faith, not works	4:3–8
3:29–30	Circumcised and uncircumcised are united under the one God through faith	Circumcised and uncircumcised are united as children of Abraham through faith	4:9–17

3:27–31 ‘By faith alone’: initial statement. In the discussion style he so favours in Romans, Paul moves his argument along with another question: ‘Where, then, is boasting?’ Paul probably asks this question with Jews particularly in mind. As Paul notes elsewhere, Jews had a tendency to rely upon their works as the basis for their relationship with God (9:30–10:3; cf. Phil. 3:2–9). The provision of God’s righteousness ‘apart from the law’ and through faith in Jesus Christ (21–22) reveals the foolishness of such pride in accomplishment. It is excluded, Paul claims, through the principle ... of faith. The word principle translates the Greek nomos, and many scholars think that nomos refers here, as it usually does in Paul, to the Mosaic law. Paul’s point would then be that boasting is excluded when one sees in the Mosaic law not just a demand for works (observing the law) but its underlying call for faith as well. But the fact that v 28, which appears to be Paul’s elaboration of v 27, contrasts ‘works of the law’ and ‘faith’ makes this interpretation unlikely. Translating nomos as ‘principle’ is possible, and makes better sense of the context: the Jews’ boasting is the product of their preoccupation with the Mosaic law with its demand for works, and it will be seen to be excluded when the truth that a man is justified by faith apart from observing the law (28) is recognized (observing the law again translates ergōn nomou, ‘works of the law’; see the comments on 3:20).

In vs 29–30 Paul cites the central Jewish teaching of the oneness of God (Dt. 6:4) as another argument in favour of the exclusivity of faith. For if God is truly to be the God of all people, then all people must have equal access to him, and by the same means. No longer can the law of Moses, the Torah, stand as a ‘dividing wall’ between Jew and Gentile (Eph. 2:11–22). God justifies both the circumcised (the Jew) and the uncircumcised (the Gentile) by faith. (The Greek text speaks of God justifying the Jew ‘out of’ [ek] faith and the Gentile ‘through’ [dia] faith, but there is probably no difference in meaning.)

The last verse in this paragraph (31) reveals again Paul’s desire to prevent his readers from drawing too extreme a conclusion from his argument against the law. Paul’s blunt rejection of the law from any role in justification in favour of faith. (20–21, 27–28) does not mean that he thereby seeks to nullify the law. On the contrary, Paul insists, we uphold the law. Unfortunately, Paul does not here explain how it is that his preaching upholds (or ‘establishes’, Gk. histēmi) the law. He may mean that his doctrine of justification by faith is fully in accord with the teaching of the Pentateuch ('the law'), as he makes clear in ch. 4. More likely, however, since his focus in vs 27–28 has been on the demands of the law, he is teaching that faith itself provides for the complete fulfilment of its demands. As Paul will put it in 8:4, 'the righteous requirements of the law' are 'fully met' in the Spirit-filled believer.

4:1–25 'By faith alone': the faith of Abraham. Paul now elaborates the points he has briefly made in 3:27–31 by referring to the history of Abraham. It was important for Paul to cite Abraham at this juncture for two reasons. First, Judaism made much of Abraham but tended to view him as a great pioneer of 'torah piety', a man who pleased God above all by his obedience to the law. Secondly Abraham, the recipient of God's promise and ancestor of the Jewish people, occupies a crucial place in OT salvation-history. Particularly was this so in Paul's understanding, for he saw that one of the central errors of his Jewish contemporaries was to emphasize the Mosaic covenant at the expense of God's prior arrangement with Abraham (see Gal. 3:15–18). Paul thus needs to cite Abraham to show that his emphasis on justification by faith is no new, revolutionary, doctrine, but the teaching of Scripture from the beginning. And, further, Paul uses Abraham to make absolutely clear just what faith is. He does so in a series of contrasts that anticipate the great Reformation principle of sola fide ('by faith alone').

1–8 In this section Paul discusses faith versus works. The question that opens this chapter parallels the question that begins 3:27–31: What then shall we say that Abraham, our forefather, discovered in this matter—that is, in the matter of boasting and justification? For if Abraham was justified by works—as some Jews believed—then he had, indeed, good basis for boasting, and Paul's conclusion that boasting is excluded (3:27) is jeopardized. But not before God (2b) is Paul's response to this supposition. This may mean that Abraham had a basis for boasting before other people, 'but not before God'; or, more likely, that the condition Paul has stated—if ... Abraham was justified by works—must be rejected when we place the matter 'before' God's own verdict. This verdict is given in Scripture itself: Abraham believed God, and it was credited to him as righteousness (Gn. 15:6). This text becomes the basis for the rest of Paul's exposition. He shows that this 'crediting as righteousness', precisely because it is based on faith, excludes 'works' (4–8), circumcision (9–12) and the law (13–17). He details the strength and nature of this faith of Abraham's that led to his righteousness (18–21) before citing his text once again (22) and then making clear its applicability to his readers (23–25).

Paul's purpose in vs 4–5 is to contrast faith and works. Works, on the one hand, imply a situation of obligation. A person who 'works' receives wages that an employer is obliged to pay. Faith, on the other hand, implies a situation of free giving. As an act of humble acceptance, faith makes no demands on the giver; nor is the giver 'obliged' to respond. These contrasts show clearly that justification must rest on faith. This is because God is, by definition, a God of grace, a God who justifies the wicked (5). People are not accepted into relationship with God because, by their righteousness, they have earned it. It is the 'wicked person', the person who has no righteousness of his own to plead his case, whom God accepts. Here Paul reminds us of one of the great truths of Scripture: that people can make no claim on God's attention. Establishing a relationship with him is a matter of his free gift, to be accepted in humble faith.

To underline the point that Paul has been making from the Pentateuch (Gn. 15:6), he adds, in good Jewish fashion, a confirmatory text from the 'Writings'. In Ps. 32:1–2, David also makes clear that God justifies people apart from works. Blessing, David makes clear, is a matter not of a person's achievements but of a person's being forgiven by God. Paul makes clear that the phrase 'credited as righteousness' in Gn. 15:6 means that God considers a person to have a status of 'righteousness', in which that person's sins are not 'counted' against him.

9–12 This blessedness of a righteous status is not based on circumcision. For God’s pronouncing of Abraham as righteous (Gn. 15) took place well before he was circumcised (Gn. 18; according to the rabbis, twenty-nine years separated the two incidents). Circumcision, then, was not the basis for Abraham’s righteousness, but a sign or seal of the righteousness that Abraham already possessed by virtue of his faith. In this way Abraham is qualified to be the father of all who believe. For, like Gentile Christians, Abraham was justified without being circumcised (11b) and, like Jewish Christians, he was both circumcised and justified by faith. Paul’s reading of Genesis, in the light of the fulfilment of God’s plan in Christ, allows him to see Abraham as more than just the father of the Jewish nation (1, ‘our forefather according to the flesh’), but as the father of all Christians.

Note 12 The word order in this verse makes it possible to think that Paul has two distinct groups in mind: Jews—‘the circumcised’—and Jewish Christians—‘who are not only circumcised but who also walk in the footsteps of the faith that our father Abraham had ...’ But the interpretation presumed in the NIV translation is preferable. There, only one group—Jewish Christians—is mentioned.

13–17 In Gal. 3, Paul argues that the Mosaic law could have had nothing to do with Abraham’s status before God because the law only came into the picture centuries after Abraham. Here in ch. 4 Paul prefers to argue less ‘from history’ and more ‘from principle’. To show that obedience to the law had nothing to do with Abraham’s being ‘credited as righteous’ (13), Paul cites the weakness of the law itself (14–15), the grace (16) and creative power of God (17b) and the universal ‘fatherhood’ of Abraham (16b–17a).

Faith has no value and the promise is worthless if inheriting Abraham’s blessing depends on doing the law. This is because, as Paul has pointed out earlier (3:9–20), no-one can obey the law well enough to merit righteousness before God. The law, then, brings not blessing, but wrath (15). By spelling out the demand of God in great detail, the law increases the responsibility of the sinner before God. When, inevitably, the law is then broken, the guilt of the sinner is even greater than it would have been without the law to condemn him. This is the point Paul implies in v 15b when he claims that where there is no law there is no transgression. He does not mean that there is no ‘sin’ apart from the law, but that the definite form of sin called ‘transgression’ (Gk. parabasis) can exist only in the face of definite, clear, commandments of God for which one is responsible. (This is the sense the word parabasis always has in Paul; Rom. 2:23; 5:14; Gal. 3:19; 1 Tim 2:14.)

Paul touches briefly on a second reason why righteousness cannot come by the law: to base righteousness on the law would mean that it would be based on ‘works’ and thus nullify God’s grace (cf. 4:4–5). This point is related to the one Paul makes at the end of v 17, that the God in whom Abraham believed is no less than the one who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were. This looks ahead to the description of Abraham’s own faith in vs 18–21, but it also reinforces the idea of God’s freedom and creative power. It is parallel, in that sense, to Paul’s earlier designation of God as the one who ‘justifies the wicked’ (5). A third reason why righteousness cannot be based on the law reminds us of the argument Paul has used in 3:29–30. God’s intention was to open up the inheritance he had promised to Abraham to all people, as the OT itself indicates: ‘I have made you a father of many nations’ (Gn. 17:5). This could only be done when the inheritance was no longer based on an institution—the Mosaic law—peculiar to Israel.

18–21 In this brief paragraph, Paul pauses to characterize briefly the nature of Abraham’s faith before bringing his exposition to a close. Abraham, Paul shows, had a faith that was strong and consistent in the face of much evidence that what God had promised could not come to pass. He squarely faced the fact that his age and the barrenness of Sarah made it humanly impossible for the promise that he would have many children to be fulfilled. Yet Against all hope—the kind based on ordinary human potentialities—Abraham believed in hope—the kind that sees beyond the circumstances to rest on the promises and ability of God. Note Calvin’s encouraging application of this paragraph: ‘Let us also remember, that the condition of us all is the same with that of Abraham. All things around us are in opposition to the promises of God: He promises immortality; we are surrounded with mortality and corruption: He declares that he counts us just; we are covered with sins: He testifies that he is propitious and kind to us; outward judgments threaten his wrath. What then is to be done? We must with closed eyes pass by ourselves and all things connected with us, that nothing may hinder or prevent us from believing that God is true.’

Note. 20 Paul’s insistence that Abraham did not waver through unbelief may seem inconsistent with Abraham’s disbelieving and scornful laughter at God’s promise in Gn. 17:17. Paul’s point, however, is not that Abraham was a perfect person, or never had any doubts at all, but that his heart attitude was consistently one of faith and hope in the promise of God.

22–25 Paul rounds off his exposition of Abraham’s faith by citing again his key text—Gn. 15:6—and making clear what has been implicit throughout, that the verse and its meaning have direct application to Christians. Like Abraham, we too believe in the God who gives life to the dead; specifically, in the God who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead.

V 25 describes the work of Jesus the Lord in two parallel statements (it may be that Paul is quoting an early Christian confession). The first statement alludes to the LXX of Is. 53:12, where the servant of the Lord is said to have been ‘handed over because of their sins’. The for (Gk. dia) in this first line probably means ‘because of’: Jesus was handed over to death because it was necessary to provide for our sin problem. In the second line, however, the for probably has the meaning ‘for the sake of, with the purpose of’: Jesus was raised from the dead for the purpose of providing for our justification. While Paul usually connects our justification with Christ’s death, this verse shows that Christ’s resurrection also plays a role in our being made right with God.

5:1–8:39 The gospel and the power of God for salvation

If ‘a righteousness that is by faith from first to last’ summarizes the theme of 1:18–4:25, ‘the power of God for salvation’ captures the central thrust of 5:1–8:39. The gospel, in unveiling this power, secures not only the sinner’s initial acceptance by God but his or her final deliverance on the day of judgment. ‘If justified, then certain of final salvation’ is Paul’s overall theme, a theme that comes to expression especially at the beginning (ch. 5) and end (ch. 8) of the section. Between these chapters, Paul deals with two of the ‘powers’ that might threaten this eventual deliverance of the justified believer, viz. sin (ch. 6) and the law (ch. 7), showing in each case that the Christian has been delivered from bondage to these powers. The structure of chs. 5–8, then, is what some call a ‘ring composition’, and others a ‘chiasm’, in which there is a certain correspondence between the first and last components, the second and second to the last and so on:

5:1–11 Assurance of future glory

5:12–21 Basis for this assurance in the work of Christ

6:1–23 Delivered from the power of sin

7:1–25 Delivered from the power of the law

8:1–17 Basis for assurance in the work of Christ, mediated by the Spirit
8:18–39 Assurance of future glory

5:1–11 The hope of glory

Paul begins a new section of his letter at 5:1 (rather than at, for instance, 6:1). This is shown by the transitional ‘since we have been justified through faith’ in v 1; a shift, at this point, from an emphasis on ‘faith’ (thirty-three occurrences in 1:18–4:25 versus only three in chs. 5–8) to an emphasis on ‘life’ (twenty-four times in chs. 5–8 versus only two in 1:18–4:25); and by the clarity of the theme and structure outlined above.

Echoing throughout chs. 5–8 is a question created by the tension between Paul’s teaching that a person is justified before God the minute that person believes and the biblical truth that a day of divine judgment must yet be faced. How do these two truths relate to one another? Can I be sure that my justification now will do any good on the day of judgment? To this question, Paul answers in this paragraph with an emphatic ‘Yes!’: We rejoice in the hope of the glory of God (2b) and hope does not disappoint us (5a). In these assurances we find the heart of this paragraph.

Vs 1–2a lead up to these assurances with a reminder of what Christians who have been justified by faith now enjoy: peace with God, a relationship in which we are no longer threatened by God’s wrath, and access ... into this grace in which we now stand, continual participation in the blessings secured by God’s grace in Christ. Paul is, however, aware of the struggles that Christians still face in this world. But these struggles, far from threatening our peace and assurance, actually give us greater assurance of them (3b–4). For sufferings are used by God to produce in us perseverance, the ability to endure. Perseverance produces character (dokimē), the strength that comes only from severe testing, and character, in turn, produces hope. Because God so works in our lives, and because we should want so desperately this kind of character and hope, we should rejoice in our sufferings (3a). Paul here reflects a common early Christian perspective on the far greater value of divine virtues in comparison with earthly troubles (see also 8:18; Jas. 1:2–4; 1 Pet. 1:6–7)—a perspective that too many Christians today have lost.

Vs 5b–8 set Christian hope (5a) on the unshakable foundation of God’s love for us in Christ. The Holy Spirit enables the believer to sense from within that God has effusively poured out [ekcheō] his love into our hearts. Added to this inward appreciation is the objective, historical demonstration of that love of God for us in the cross of Christ. On Calvary was shown to the world a love that far transcends the love typical among humans, a love according to which only for a good man would one conceivably die (7). It is just the nature of God’s love that he sacrificed his own son for the ungodly (6) and *sinner*s (8)—for those very people who had refused to honour and worship him (cf. 1:21–22). It is this idea that is conveyed in the phrase at just the right time (6a): at the very time when we were still powerless, Christ died for us. God has not waited for us to take the first step back to him but has intervened in an act of pure grace to provide a way for us to come back.

Vs 9–10 gather together the main pieces of vs 1–8 repeating the certainty of Christian hope (2, 5a). They are obviously parallel. Paul asserts the unbreakable connection between the believer’s present status before God (justified by his blood, reconciled to him), and his or her future status (saved from God’s wrath, saved). His argument moves from ‘the greater’ to ‘the lesser’. God has done ‘the greater thing’ in bringing us into relationship with him through the terrible cost of his Son’s blood and when we were God’s enemies. We were in a state of mutual hostility in which God's wrath rested on us (1:18) and we were 'God-haters' (1:30). Surely, then, God will do what in the terms of this argument is the 'easier' thing: deliver us whom he has already accepted from the pouring out of his wrath on the day of judgment. V 11 wraps up the paragraph with a final rehearsal of some of its key ideas: 'rejoicing' (2–3); the present enjoyment of reconciliation with God (1b, 10); and, most of all, the fact that this rejoicing and reconciliation come only through our Lord Jesus Christ.

Note. 1 A strongly attested variant reads, instead of the indicative verb 'we have' (echomen), the subjunctive verb 'let us have' (echōmen). This has the effect of making v 1 an appeal to enjoy peace with God rather than a statement that we now are enjoying it. However, despite the strength of its manuscript support (the two most important copies of Paul's letters read the subjunctive) and its acceptance by many scholars (e.g. Sanday-Headlam, Murray), the indicative reading makes better sense in the context and is widely and strongly attested.

5:12–21 The reign of grace and life

The power of Christ's obedience to overcome Adam's act of disobedience is the great theme of this paragraph. Paul presents both Adam and Christ as 'representative figures' whose acts determine the destiny of all who belong to them. Just as Adam has sinned, and through his sin, brought sin and death to all who belong to him (12a, 18a, 19a), so also Christ has obeyed, and through his obedience brought righteousness and life to all who belong to him (18b, 19b). The emphasis lies on the 'so also' part of the comparison. Paul assumes the truth of Adam's sin and the reign of death that it introduced, a doctrine found elsewhere with varying emphases in Jewish literature. What Paul wants to teach us here is that Christ's giving of himself on the cross has similarly established a reign—but a reign of life rather than death, of grace (see vs 15–17, 21) rather than of just deserts. Believers can be certain of living eternally because we have been transferred into this new realm in which grace and life reign (21). This teaching of the certainty of life in Christ supports what Paul has taught in 5:1–11. We can be sure of final salvation (9–10) because our relationship to Christ guarantees that we will 'reign in life' (17).

Paul begins to state his key point about the parallel between Adam and Christ in v 12, but interrupts himself before he finishes. We have, therefore, a just as with no corresponding 'so also' (most English translations signal the break in thought with a dash at the end of the verse). Only in vs 18–19 does Paul come back to state the full comparison. This just as clause presents the universal effects of the sin of the one man, Adam: it has brought death into the world and in this way (e.g. through sinning) caused death to spread to all people. Many scholars think that the 'death' Paul refers to here is physical death only (Sanday-Headlam, Godet, Murray); a few, that it denotes 'spiritual' death only. But it probably includes both, separation from fellowship with God and physical mortality as the judgment of God on sin.

The last clause of the verse explains why death spread to all men, because all sinned. (As is almost universally recognized, the Greek ep̄ hō must be translated 'because'.) This may mean simply that every person dies because every person, in his or her own body, sins. But Paul's stress on the way in which one trespass, the disobedience of the one man, led to sin and condemnation for all people (this idea is repeated in vs 10a and 19a) suggests that in v 12 also he is thinking of a sinning of all people that takes place in relationship to Adam. What he may intend is that all people sin (12) because they inherit a corrupted 'sin nature' from Adam (18–19). But vs 18–19 suggest a closer relationship between Adam's sin and ours than this. It is therefore better to think that the sinning of all people in v 12 is a sinning that actually takes place 'in' Adam. Paul may think of this in a 'biological' sense: all human beings sinned in Adam because we were all seminally ‘present’ in him (see, for a possible parallel to this idea, Heb. 7:10). Or he may think of this solidarity in a ‘forensic’ sense: as our God-appointed representative, Adam’s sin is accounted by God to be the sin of all people at the same time, and it is by reason of this sin that all people die. In any case, the important point for Paul, and for us, is that all people, by virtue of their relationship to Adam, are sinners under sentence of death.

Paul breaks off the comparison he began in v 12 to insert two digressions, vs 13–14 and vs 15–17. The first guards Paul’s teaching in v 12 about the universality of death from the possible objection that people could not be held responsible for their sins if they did not ‘transgress’ the law of Moses (cf. 3:20 and 4:15). Paul responds simply by asserting the reality of universal death throughout the time before the giving of the law through Moses. The second digression (15–17) highlights two points of contrast between Adam and Christ. There is, first, a contrast in the effect of their actions: Adam’s trespass brought condemnation (16) and death (17); Christ has brought justification (16) and righteousness (17). Secondly, there is a contrast in the power of these acts. Adam’s act has certainly been powerful enough, bringing as it has, sin, death and misery on all the world. But, Paul asserts, how much more powerful is Christ’s act and its effects (15, 17). This is because the grace of God is at work through Christ, and God’s grace has power to more than conquer any act of Adam’s.

In vs 18–19 Paul finally states the full comparison between Adam and Christ. The verses are parallel, each of them comparing the way in which Adam’s trespass/disobedience has brought condemnation and sinfulness to the way in which Christ’s one act of righteousness/obedience has brought justification and righteousness. But does the parallel between them extend to the universal effects of these results? This might seem to be the case, since Paul asserts in v 18 that the effects of both Adam’s act and Christ’s extends to all men. Yet Paul elsewhere plainly repudiates the idea that all people will be saved (e.g. Rom. 2:12; 2 Thes. 1:8–9), and v 17 also makes clear that it is only those who receive God’s abundant provision of grace and the gift of righteousness who will reign in life. Therefore, we must understand the universalism of v 18 in terms of the representative significance of each individual: the effects of Christ’s action extend to all who belong to him, just as the effects of Adam’s action extend to all who belong to him. All people, without exception, belong to Adam (12); but only those who come to faith, who ‘receive the gift’, belong to Christ (see also 1 Cor. 15:22–23).

The paragraph concludes with a further remark about the law (20) and a final summing up. The fact that Paul again mentions the law (cf. also vs 13–14) reveals how much Paul is preoccupied with ‘Jewish’ issues in Romans. His point here is that the law of Moses has done nothing to change the situation of sin and death introduced into the world by Adam. Indeed, the law has made things worse, increasing the trespass by turning sin against God into a more serious rebellion against his explicit commands (see the comments on 4:15). Yet even where sin thus ‘increased’, God’s grace increased all the more. As a result, Paul concludes, the reign of death has been replaced by the reign of grace for those who are in Christ, bringing to us a new status of righteousness (cf. 3:21–4:25) and leading inevitably to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Note. 12 Therefore in the NIV translates dia touto, ‘because of this’. In this context, the word dia probably has a ‘final’ meaning—‘for the sake of, with the purpose of’—and touto is probably retrospective, referring back to the certainty of salvation theme in vs 9–10. The whole phrase, then, has the sense ‘with the purpose of securing this final salvation’.

6:1–23 Freedom from bondage to sin

Paul's insistence that Christians who are justified will infallibly be saved from God's wrath (5:9–10) because of their transfer in union with Christ into the realm of grace and life (5:12–21) raises the question of sin in the life of the Christian. Does not sin have the power to interrupt this process, to prevent the justified believer from attaining final salvation and glory? In ch. 6 Paul deals with this question, answering it by asserting that believers are not only delivered in Christ from the penalty of sin—justified—but from the power of sin as well—sanctified. Without minimizing the continuing threat that sin poses to Christian living, Paul insists that the Christian has been put into a decisively new relationship to sin, a relationship in which sin no longer has the power to 'master' us, to hold us in bondage (see vs 6, 14, 18, 22). Throughout the chapter (and, as we will see, into the next), Paul pictures Christian experience in terms of a transfer from one 'regime' or 'realm' to another. To become a Christian, Paul asserts, means to be released from the old regime, dominated by Adam (5:12–21), sin (ch. 6), the law (ch. 7) and death (ch. 8) and to be introduced into the new regime, dominated by Christ (5:12–21; 7:1–6), righteousness (ch. 6), the Spirit (7:6; 8), grace (6:14–15) and life (5:12–21; 6:4; 8:1–13).

6:1–14 'Dead to sin' through union with Christ. The immediate occasion for Paul's discussion of the Christian and sin is his assertion in 5:20b: 'But where sin increased, grace increased all the more.' Paul himself poses the question that he had undoubtedly had to answer many times as a result of his insistence on the power of God's grace: Shall we [Christians] go on sinning, so that grace may increase? (1) Paul emphatically rejects any such inference—By no means!—explaining why he does so with the key idea of the chapter: We died to sin (2). What Paul means by this becomes clear as he unfolds the concept in the rest of the chapter: we are no longer slaves to sin (6, 17–18, 22); sin is no longer our master (14a). To be 'dead to sin', thus, does not mean to be insensible to its enticements, for Paul makes clear that sin remains for the Christian an attraction to be battled with every day (see v 13). Rather it means to be delivered from the absolute tyranny of sin, from the state in which sin holds unchallenged sway, the state in which we all lived before conversion (see 3:9). As a result of this death to sin, we can no longer live in it (2b)—for habitual sinning reveals sin's tyranny, a tyranny from which the believer has been freed.

Vs 3–5 reveal the means by which we have 'died to sin': through union with Jesus Christ in his death. The Christian rite of initiation, water baptism, puts us into relationship with Jesus Christ and, specifically, with the death of Christ (3). This 'union' with Christ is no mystical merging of our own persons with that of Christ, but a 'forensic' relationship, in which God views us in association with his Son and thereby applies to us the benefits won by his Son. It can be said, thus, that we were buried with him through baptism into [his] death. What Paul means by this is not that our baptism simply symbolizes, in submergence under the water, Christ's death and burial, for Paul makes clear that we were buried 'with' him, not just 'like' him. He is saying, rather, that our faith, symbolized by baptism, puts us into relationship with Christ's own burial. Why this reference to Christ's burial? Paul elsewhere includes Christ's burial as a key element in the gospel he preaches: 'I passed on to you as of first importance: that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day according to the Scriptures' (1 Cor. 15:3–4; cf. also Col. 2:12). Here in ch. 6, Paul asserts that believers have been joined with Christ in such a way that they experience each of these events themselves: we have 'died with Christ' (8; cf. vs 3–6); we have been 'buried with Christ' (4); we shall 'live with him' (8; cf. vs 4–5). It is this actual union with these key redemptive events that gives to the Christian a new relationship to sin's power. The basic thrust of Paul's argument is clear: since Christ's death itself was a 'death to sin' (10), our participation in his death (3–6) means that we, too, have 'died to sin' (3).

Baptism, as v 4 makes clear, is the means (the Greek word is dia) by which we are put into relationship with these events. Some interpreters think that Paul may be referring to 'spirit' baptism, but this is unlikely. It is better to understand Paul to be using water baptism as 'shorthand' for the Christian's initial conversion experience. The NT consistently portrays water baptism as a fundamental component of conversion (see, e.g. Acts 2:38; 1 Pet. 3:21). This does not mean that baptism in and of itself has the power to convert or to bring us into relationship with Christ. It is only as it is joined with genuine faith that it possesses any meaning, and what Paul has written in chs. 1–5 makes clear that it is ultimately this faith that is the crucial element in the process. (On baptism in the NT and in this passage, see especially G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament [Eerdmans, 1962].)

Our union with Christ in death and burial means that we may live a new life (4b). Not only have we been delivered from sin's tyranny, but we have also been given new power of obedience through our participation in the power of Christ's resurrection. This is the point that Paul makes in v 5: participation in Christ's death means also participation in his resurrection. Some think that, as in Eph. 2:6 and Col. 2:12, 3:1, Paul here presents our resurrection with Christ as a past experience. But the future tenses both in v 5 (will ... be united) and in v 8 (we will ... live) render it more likely that Paul speaks here of our actual resurrection with Christ as future, while it is presently the power of Christ's resurrection that is working within us (cf. v 11: alive to God).

Vs 6–7 and 8–10 elaborate, respectively, the 'death' and 'life' aspects of our union with Christ. Our old self (6) picks up the imagery of corporate identity from ch. 5. It alludes to our identification with 'the old man', Adam, and denotes 'not a part of me called my old nature, but the whole of me as I was before I was converted' (John Stott, Men Made New (IVP, 1966), p. 45). As a result of our crucifixion with Christ, this body of sin, the whole person dominated by sin's power, has been 'rendered powerless' (the NIV marginal rendering is preferable to the done away with in the text). As a result, we need no longer be slaves to sin. As further support for this conclusion, Paul cites a popular rabbinic maxim to the effect that death severs the hold of sin on a person. Vs 8–10 reinforce the connection between dying with Christ and living with him asserted in v 5 and provide a crucial link in Paul's argument by describing Christ's death as a death 'to sin'. Though sinless himself, Christ nevertheless was subject to sin's power by virtue of his incarnation, and his death removed him for ever from that power.

The paragraph concludes with a summary and application. Our identification with Christ in his death must be seized and acted upon if it is to become effective in subduing the power of sin in our lives. Thus Paul exhorts us to recognize who we now are in Christ (11) and to put that new identity into effect by dethroning sin in our daily behaviour (12–13). This victory over sin is possible, Paul reminds us in a summary of vs 1–10, because sin shall not be your master (the future tense is used to stress that at no time will sin ever have domination over us again). For we are no longer under law—that is, under the regime of the Mosaic law in which sin 'increased' (5:20) and brought wrath (4:15)—but under grace—the new regime inaugurated by Christ in which 'grace reigns through righteousness to bring eternal life' (see Jn. 1:17 for a similar contrast between 'law' and 'grace').

6:15–23 Freed from sin's power to serve righteousness. As was the case in 6:1–14, this paragraph is prompted by a question relating to something Paul has just said. His assertion that the Christian is not 'under law, but under grace' (14b) could imply that there are no more rules the Christian needs to obey and no more penalty for any sins that he or she does commit.

Paul's response is similar to his teaching in vs 3–10: habitual sinning would manifest a state of slavery to sin (16), a state from which every Christian has been released (17–18). Paul is sure that the Roman Christians have themselves experienced this new freedom from sin, for they wholeheartedly obeyed the form of teaching to which [they] were entrusted (17b). By wording the matter in this way, Paul hints at the same time that Christians, freed from the Mosaic law, are nevertheless bound by an authoritative code, a 'form of teaching' in some ways similar to that of the Mosaic law (see 2:20). Christians have a new obligation. Vs 17–23 explain it as a development from what Paul has said earlier in the chapter. Freedom from sin, Paul asserts, means not that Christians are autonomous, living with no master or any obligations. It means rather a new slavery: but to righteousness (18–19) and to God (22). Like Jesus, Paul insists that true 'freedom' is to be found only in a relationship to the God who created us (Jn. 8:31–36). Only by bowing the knee to God can a person become what God originally intended that person to be: 'righteous' (conforming to God's standards of behaviour), and 'holy' (living in a way that is God-centred and world-renouncing). And the outcome of these is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord (23; cf. v 22).

7:1–25 Freedom from bondage to the law

The main point of this chapter is very similar to the central thrust of the previous one. Just as in ch. 6 Christians, through union with Christ, 'die to sin' and become 'slaves of God', reaping holiness as a benefit, so also in ch. 7 Christians, through the body of Christ, die to the law and become related to Jesus Christ so that they can bear fruit to God (4). Paul suggests that the Mosaic law, like sin, is in some way, a 'power' of the old regime of salvation-history from which Christians must be freed if they are to enjoy life in the new regime of righteousness and life inaugurated by Jesus Christ. The apostle has already hinted at this idea in 6:14–15. These verses provide the immediate occasion for his discussion in ch. 7.

The first paragraph (1–6) conveys the central thrust of the chapter. But Paul's negative perspective on the Mosaic law in those verses leads him to add an important digression, in which he affirms the divine origin and goodness of the law and elaborates on the way in which the law has come to have so negative a result in the history of salvation (7–25).

7:1–6 Released from the law; joined to Christ. The believer's transfer from the domain of the law to the domain of Christ is the central point of this paragraph (4). Paul leads up to this point with a reminder about the nature of the law: that it has power over people only as long as they live. The 'law' to which Paul refers here could be the Roman law (Käsemann) or law in general (Sanday-Headlam) but is probably the Mosaic law (most scholars). Vs 2–3 illustrate the truth of this principle with a marriage analogy. While various detailed comparisons with Christian experience are sometimes found in this illustration, Paul intends simply to make two points: death severs one's relationship to the law, and release from the law enables a person to be joined to another.

These are the points that Paul now applies theologically in v 4. Through our relationship to Christ in his death on the cross—through the body of Christ—we believers have died to the law, i.e. we have been set free from its bondage (see 6:2). The Mosaic law ruled over Jews, and, by extension, all people (cf. 2:14), in the old regime of salvation-history. It regulated the covenant relationship between God and his people and, because it demanded obedience without giving the power to obey, had the effect of locking up people under the power of sin and death (see 4:15; 5:20; 6:14–15; Gal. 3:21–25). It is only by being freed from the regime of the law that we can be freed also from sin and be joined to Christ in the new regime where we can bear fruit to God.

The connection between sin and the law is elaborated in v 5. The NIV when we were controlled by the sinful nature is better translated, more literally, ‘when we were in the flesh’ (en tē sarki; see the NIV marginal rendering). In texts like this, Paul uses the word ‘flesh’ to denote not a sinful propensity within a person (as the NIV suggests) but the ‘power sphere’ in which a person lives. Since its root theological idea is that which is typical of this world in distinction from the spiritual realm, ‘flesh’ can be used as shorthand for the old regime. ‘When we were in the flesh’ means basically, ‘when we were living in the old, non-Christian, regime’. In this regime the law was instrumental in arousing sinful passions; for it stimulated our innate rebelliousness against God. Now, however, we have died to that law and can serve in the new way of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code. As in 2:29, the contrast between ‘written code’ (gramma) and ‘Spirit’ is the contrast between the Mosaic law as a determining power of the old age and the Spirit, the ruling agent of the new.

7:7–25 The history and experience of Jews under the law. Paul has said some negative things about the law in 7:1–6: he has associated it with sin as a ‘power’ of the old regime of death and claimed that it actually arouses sin (v 5), but these verses only climax a series of negative statements about the law in Romans. Paul has shown that it is incapable of justifying (3:20a), makes sin known (3:20b) and, indeed, stimulates sin (5:20) and brings wrath (4:15). We can, then, well imagine someone thinking that Paul views the law as evil. Paul has had enough experience to know that such a misunderstanding of his theology of the law was an ever-present possibility. He therefore introduces a digression on the Mosaic law in which he guards against this false interpretation. He defends the goodness of the law by demonstrating that the negative effects the law produces are due not to the law itself but to the power of sin and to human weakness. Paul succinctly summarizes the central thrust of 7:7–25 in 8:3a: ‘what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature’. Paul makes these points in the context of a sketch of the effect that the law has had on the Jewish people.

7–12 This paragraph about the coming of the law accomplishes two purposes: to maintain, against a possible misunderstanding (7a), that the law of Moses is holy, righteous and good (12) and to explain the relationship between sin and the law (7b–11). In making the latter point, Paul asserts that the law had been the means by which he came to ‘know’ sin (7b). What Paul means by this is not simply that the law told Paul what sin was but that the law, with its explicit spelling out of the commandments of God, gave sin the opportunity to stimulate rebellion against God and made absolutely clear his sinfulness and death (8–11). Such is our sinfulness that the very labelling of an action as transgression against God’s holy law leads us to violate it; and it is in this way that the law ‘stimulates sinning’ (5:20; 7:5) and brings wrath (4:15).

Paul’s use of a first person singular (‘I’) narrative to make this point raises the question about what experience he is describing here. Many think that he is reflecting on his coming of age as a Jewish young man, when sin first sprang to life in his experience and made clear to him that he was a sinner (I died). Others think Paul is describing the time when, just before his conversion, the Spirit began to convict him of his sin. But the fact that this experience took place when the commandment came suggests another possibility. As the context makes clear, the commandment must refer to the Mosaic law (see vs 7, 12); and the Mosaic law ‘came’ when God gave it to the people of Israel at Mt Sinai. First-century Jews were taught to think of themselves as having taken part in the historical experiences of Israel (as in the Passover ritual). Paul may, then, be describing in these verses not his own personal experience but the experience of the Jewish people corporately. What Paul would then be saying is that the giving of the law of Moses to Israel meant for them not life (as some rabbis taught) but death; for the law of Moses, by stimulating sin, ‘brought wrath’, making more clear than ever the Jews’ distance from God.

13–25 This second part of Paul’s digression on the Mosaic law provides a ‘missing link’ in his argument in 7:7–12: the weakness of human beings as the reason why sin could use the law to bring death. The law, though spiritual, cannot deliver people from their bondage to sin and death (21–25) because they are unspiritual (14), unable to obey the law that they confess to be good (16). It is the law of Moses, then, on which Paul focuses in these verses.

Paul’s teaching about the law comes within a lengthy ‘personal confession’. Whose experience is Paul describing here? Many, noting that Paul now writes in the present tense (in contrast to the past tense in vs 7–11) and claims to delight in God’s law, argue that he must be describing his present situation as a mature believer. The passage would then make clear that the law cannot provide victory over the power of sin within the Christian, who, though regenerate and free from sin’s condemning power, cannot escape sin’s clutches (cf. 14, 23, 25). While this interpretation of the passage can muster very strong support (e.g. Augustine, Luther, Calvin) and deserves great respect, there is an alternative approach. Most of us can identify, as Christians, with the struggle depicted in vs 15–20, but Paul’s objective treatment of the situation he is talking about makes it difficult to think that a Christian is being described. Paul claims that he is sold as a slave to sin (14b; cf. v 25) and is a prisoner of the law of sin (23). The former description seems to be diametrically opposed to the description of the Christian in ch. 6—‘set free from sin’ (v 22)—and the latter conflicts with Paul’s assertion in 8:2 that the Christian has been set free ‘from the law of sin and death’. It seems then, that Paul in these verses is describing his experience as an unregenerate Jew, finding his love for God’s law and desire to obey it constantly frustrated by his failure to obey it. To be sure, we cannot be certain about the extent to which Paul was actually conscious of this struggle in his pre-Christian days. (His claim in Phil. 3:6 that he was ‘faultless’ with respect to ‘legalistic righteousness’ refers to his legal standing according to Pharisaic standards and not to his actual situation.) Certainly it would only have been in the light of his knowledge of Christ that Paul would have recognized the depths of the sinfulness he depicts here. In vs 7–11, then, Paul describes the effect of the giving of the law on himself and all other Jews, while in vs 13–25 he describes the continuing existence of a Jew, such as he once was, under the law. The present tense, which he begins to use in v 14, is much better suited to this depiction of a regular state of affairs.

V 13 is transitional, summing up the argument of vs 7–12—the law is good, but has been used by sin to produce death and thus reveals sin in its ‘true colours’ (utterly sinful)—as the starting point for vs 14–25. The fact that the law is spiritual but that ‘I’ am unspiritual (sarkinos, ‘fleshly, carnal’) sets the stage for the struggle depicted in vs 15–20. Acknowledgement of the goodness of God’s law and desire to obey it is met by the inability actually to do the law in practice. ‘Willing’ (used here in an untechnical way) and ‘doing’ are in opposition to one another. This reveals, Paul concludes, that nothing good lives in me, that is, in my sinful nature [or ‘flesh’] (18) and that sin living in me must be responsible for my actions (17, 20). Those who advocate the ‘mature Christian’ interpretation of the passage think that Paul is referring to the continuing power of sin and the flesh in the life of the believer. It seems, however, that the reference is to the way in which the non-Christian is prevented from obeying God’s law because of the ruling power of sin.

In v 21 Paul summarizes the law (better translated here ‘principle’; cf. the RSV) that he finds at work in the struggle he has described in vs 15–20: the desire to do good is matched, and over-matched, by the tendency to do evil. Delight in God’s law—such as was typical of the Jewish people—is met by the force of another law. While some take this ‘other law’ to be another function of the Mosaic law itself, the word ‘another’ (heteros) suggests that Paul has in mind a ‘law’ distinct from the Mosaic law. This ‘law’ is the ‘force’ or ‘power’ of sin, which Paul sets in contrast to the law of God (see also 3:27; 8:2). Paul confesses himself to be a prisoner of this law of sin, a strong indication that he is describing his past experience as a Jew under the law (contrast 8:2).

Paul’s response to this imprisonment is to cry, What a wretched man I am! Who will rescue me from this body of death? The emotion of this cry may suggest that Paul is actually in this ‘wretched’ condition as he writes and that his plea is for deliverance, as a Christian, from physical mortality. But Paul the Christian does not need to ask who his deliverer is, and ‘death’ in this passage generally refers to death in all its aspects as the penalty of God on sin (see vs 5, 9–11, 13). It is, therefore, better to attribute this cry to the sincere and pious Jew, frustrated by his or her inability to obey God’s law and longing for deliverance from sin and death. Paul can write so realistically and so passionately because this was a state that he himself had experienced, and because it was a condition which still tragically characterized most of his ‘brothers, those of my own race’ (see 9:1–3). In the beginning of v 25 Paul the Christian interrupts his description of Jewish life under the law to announce the one in whom deliverance from death is to be found: Jesus Christ our Lord. In the end of the verse, then, Paul returns to summarize the situation of the Jew under the law: a slave to God’s law in the mind—admitting that God’s law is good and seeking to do it—but a slave to the law of sin in the ‘flesh’—prevented by the flesh from doing it.

8:1–30 Assurance of eternal life in the Spirit

Rom. 8 is famous for its focus on the Holy Spirit. The word ‘spirit’ (Gk. pneuma) occurs twenty-one times in the chapter, and all but two (cf. vs 15a and 16b) denote the Holy Spirit. However, while the Spirit is therefore extremely prominent, it is not the real topic of the chapter. It is not the Spirit himself, but the assurance of eternal life that the Spirit helps to secure, that is Paul’s topic. From ‘no condemnation’ at the beginning to ‘no separation’ at the end, the chapter passes in review those acts and gifts of God that together give to every Christian the certainty that his or her relationship with God is secure and settled. Paul shows how the Spirit confers on the believer life (1–13), adoption into God’s family (14–17) and the certain hope for glory (18–30).

8:1–13 The Spirit of life. This chapter has one main connection and two subordinate ones with the earlier part of the letter. The Therefore with which Paul begins suggests that he is drawing a conclusion from something he has previously said. Both the vocabulary and the content of v 1 point back to the end of ch. 5 as the basis for this conclusion. Paul’s argument there was that Christians are set free from the condemnation (katakrima; vs 16 and 18) produced by Adam because they have been joined to Jesus Christ. It is this point that Paul, after his digression in chs. 6–7, now reiterates: there is now no condemnation [katakrima] for those who are in Christ Jesus. But two other points of contact can be discerned in the deliberate contrast Paul creates between the situation ‘under the law’ in 7:7–25 and the state ‘under the Spirit’ (cf. 8:2–4, 7), and in the elaboration in ch. 8 of the brief mention of the ‘new way of the Spirit’ in 7:6b.

The Christian’s deliverance from condemnation—the penalty of death because of sin under which all people live—takes place by virtue of our union with Christ (5:12–21). Vs 2–4 explain further that this deliverance has been accomplished by the triune God: the Father sending the Son as a sin offering for us (3), on the basis of which the Spirit liberates us from the power of sin and death (2) and secures complete fulfilment of the law on our behalf (4). The contrasting ‘laws’ in v 2 may refer to two distinct operations of the Mosaic law, which functions to imprison people when it is viewed narrowly as a demand for works, but which operates to liberate people when they understand it correctly as a demand for ‘faithful obedience’. But it would be unprecedented for Paul to attribute to the law, however understood, the power to liberate from sin and death, and the law of the Spirit must therefore mean ‘the power (or authority) exercised by the Spirit’. Correspondingly, then, the law of sin and death (2) will also denote, not the Mosaic law, but ‘the power (or authority) of sin and death’ (see also 7:23).

Through Christ Jesus the Spirit of God sets us free from the situation of bondage to sin and death alluded to in 5:12–21 and 6:1–23 and described in 7:7–25. The Spirit must so act because the great power of the ‘old regime’, the Mosaic law, was quite incapable, because of human weakness, of breaking sin’s bondage (3a; cf. 7:14–25). What the law could not do, God did: he broke sin’s power—condemned sin—by sending his Son to identify with us and to give himself as a sin offering (so the NIV properly renders peri hamartias, in accordance with the use of the phrase in the LXX). This sending of the Son enables the true fulfilment of the law by those who live according to the Spirit. Paul does not mean that Christians are enabled to obey the law (however true this might be) but that Christians are considered by God to have fully met the law’s demand because of Christ’s obedience on our behalf (see Calvin). This is suggested by the singular dikaiōma (‘righteous requirement’; the NIV inexplicably translates it with the plural requirements) and the passive sense of the phrase be fully met in us (4). As believers ‘in Christ’, we are free from condemnation because Jesus Christ has completely fulfilled the law on our behalf. He became what we are—weak, human and subject to sin’s power—that we might become what he is—righteous and holy.

The contrast between ‘flesh’ (NIV, sinful nature; see 7:5) and Spirit in v 4b leads to the series of contrasts between these two ‘powers’ in vs 5–8. Through these contrasts Paul explains why it is that the Spirit, and not the flesh, brings life. People ‘in the flesh’—that is, those who live in the ‘old regime’ where sin and death reign—have mind-sets dominated by ungodly impulses (5); they cannot submit to God’s law (7) or please God (8) but are under sentence of death (6). On the other hand, Christians, ‘in the Spirit’, who have been transferred into the new regime where grace and righteousness reign and who have therefore been given a new mind-set focused on the Spirit, enjoy life and peace (6). V 9 makes clear that every person who belongs to Christ has been transferred into this new domain in which the Spirit rather than the flesh rules. Then, in vs 10–11, Paul shows how the present possession of ‘spiritual’ life will lead to the enjoyment of ‘physical’ life through the resurrection of the body. And this will also be accomplished through the power of the Spirit, who now indwells us.

Vs 12–13 conclude this first section of ch. 8 with a practical reminder: the Spirit’s work in assuring us of life does not mean that we can be passive about our obligation to manifest the life of the Spirit in our daily lives. Only as we submit to the Spirit’s control and direction, turning away from the ‘fleshly’ lifestyle, will we be able to live (13). Paul is clearly referring to spiritual, eternal, life and thus makes the enjoyment of that life in some sense dependent on Christian obedience. Here we are called by faithfulness to the Scriptures to hold in tension two clear truths: that the indwelling of the Spirit as the result of faith in Christ infallibly secures eternal life, and that a lifestyle patterned after God’s Spirit is necessary to inherit eternal life. The tension can be softened somewhat by remembering that the Spirit given to us at conversion is himself active to produce obedience. But it does not remove the tension, for we are still called upon to submit ourselves to this work of the Spirit.

8:14–17 The Spirit of adoption. As ‘life’ is the ruling idea in vs 1–13, so is sonship in vs 14–17. This brief paragraph, in addition to making its own contribution to the theme of the chapter by recounting the wonderful and comforting truth that Christians have been adopted into God’s own family, provides a transition between vs 1–13 and 18–30. Being a child of God explains both why God’s Spirit confers life on us (13–14) and why it can be said that we are heirs with a glorious prospect for the future (17–18).

To be led by the Spirit of God (14) means not to be guided by the Spirit in decision-making, but to be under the dominating influence of the Spirit (Gal. 5:18). The clause sums up the various descriptions of life in the Spirit in vs 5–9. Paul can claim that those so led by the Spirit are sons of God and so destined for life (13) because sons of God is a biblical title for the people of God (see, e.g. Dt. 14:1; Is. 43:6; cf. Rom. 9:26). But we must also recognize in the title an allusion to the sonship of Jesus himself (see vs 3 and 29); as v 15 confirms, ‘Abba’ was Jesus’ own address to God (see Mk. 14:36), one that showed especial intimacy. This same address is now one that Christians spontaneously ‘cry out’ in their own approach to God. It is the Spirit, again, who implants in us that sense of intimacy (16) and abolishes, thereby, all bondage (to ‘the law of sin and death’, v 2) and all reason to fear (15a). The Spirit, thus, is the Spirit of sonship. Paul takes the word ‘sonship’ (which could also be translated ‘adoption’—hyiothesia) from the Greco-Roman world, where it denoted the legal institution whereby one could adopt a child and confer on that child all the rights and privileges that would accrue to a natural child. But the conception is rooted in the biblical picture of God as one who graciously chooses a people to be his very own (see 8:23; 9:4; Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:5).

Our adoption into God’s family, however amazing and comforting, is not the end of the story. For to be children is also to be heirs: to be still waiting for the full bestowment of all the rights and privileges conferred on us as God’s children (17; see especially Gal. 4:1–7, with an argument quite similar to that in 8:1–17). As the Son of God had to suffer before entering into his glory (1 Pet. 1:11), so we sons of God by adoption must also suffer ‘with him’ before sharing in his glory (see also Phil. 1:29; 3:20; 2 Cor. 1:5). Because we are joined to Christ, the servant of the Lord ‘despised and rejected by men’ (Is. 53:3), we can expect the path to our glorious inheritance to be strewn with difficulties and dangers.

8:18–30 The Spirit of glory. In this paragraph, Paul elaborates his reference to suffering and glory in v 17, further develops his overall theme of Christian assurance and brings us back full circle to the beginning of this major section of the letter (5:1–11; see the notes on 5:1). The Christian’s hope of glory frames the paragraph, occurring at its beginning (18) and end (30), and is its overarching theme. Believers, facing the necessity of ‘suffering with Christ’ in this world can nevertheless be confident and secure, knowing that God has determined to bring us through to our inheritance (18–22, 29–30), that he is providentially working on our behalf (28) and that he has given us his Spirit as the guarantee of our final redemption (23).

Paul never minimizes the fact or severity of Christian suffering in this world. But it is still to be seen as insignificant in comparison with the glory that will be revealed in us (18). In the OT, ‘glory’ denotes the ‘weight’ and majesty of God’s presence. Paul applies the term to the final state of the believer, when we have been transformed into the image of God’s son (29). For Christ has already entered into this state of glory (Phil. 3:21; Col. 3:4), and the transformation of our bodies will bring to light in the last day our share in that glory.

Vs 19–25, whose key words are wait eagerly (19, 23 and 25) and hope (20, 24–25), show that Christians, along with the entire creation, have to wait for God’s work to be completed. Paul follows OT precedent (Ps. 65:12–13; Is. 24:4; Je. 4:28; 12:4) in personifying the entire sub-human creation: it groans in frustration (20, 22) and anticipates eagerly the day when our status as God's children will be finalized and made public (19, 21). What makes it clear that Paul does not include angels and human beings in his purview is the fact that the frustration now experienced by the creation did not come about by its own choice (20). It came, rather, by the will of the one who subjected it (20), i.e. God, who decreed a curse on the earth as a result of Adam's sin (Gn. 3:17–18; cf. 1 Cor. 15:27). But the decree of subjection was always accompanied by hope that God would one day make his creation what he originally intended it to be, a place where 'the wolf will live with the lamb' (Is. 11:6). We Christians share creation's groaning and hope (23), for we possess the Spirit as the firstfruits, the downpayment and pledge of our final redemption, and this causes us all the more to long for the finishing of God's work in us. What is often called the NT 'already—not—yet' tension between what God has already done for the believer and what he has yet to do is very evident when we compare v 23 with vs 14–17. For the 'sonship' we are there said to possess is here tied to the redemption of our bodies and made the object of hope and expectation. Such hope is the very essence of our salvation. We must, therefore, wait patiently for what God has promised (24–25).

In vs 26–30 Paul gives three reasons why we can wait with patience and confidence for the culmination of our hope. First, the Spirit assists our ignorance about what to pray for (26–27). In this life we are necessarily uncertain about what we ought to pray for. But the Spirit himself intercedes for us with God, praying on our behalf that prayer which is always in perfect accordance with God's will (27). Paul is not here describing the gift of speaking in tongues; it is not even clear that he denotes an audible process at all, since the Spirit's groans may be metaphorical (see v 22). Rather, he is probably describing an intercessory ministry of the Spirit in the heart of the believer that occurs without even our knowledge.

A second basis for the believer's confident expectation of the future is God's constant working in all things for the good of those who love him (28). Nothing that can touch us lies outside the scope of our Father's providential care: here, indeed, is cause for joy and a rock-solid foundation for hope. We must, however, define the good that God is working to produce for us in his terms and not in ours. God knows that our greatest good is to know him and to enjoy his presence forever. He may, then, in pursuit of this final 'good', allow difficulties such as poverty, grief and ill health to afflict us. Our joy will come not from knowing that we will never face such difficulties—for we certainly will (17)—but that whatever the difficulty, our loving Father is at work to make us stronger Christians.

Paul describes those for whom God so works from the human point of view (those who love him) and the divine (who have been called according to his purpose, 28). God's 'call' is not simply his invitation to people to embrace the gospel, but his effectual summoning of people into a relationship with himself (see e.g. 4:17; 9:12, 24). This calling takes place in accordance with God's purpose, that purpose being ultimately to conform us to the likeness of his Son (29). God brings each of us to that goal through a series of acts on our behalf. First, he 'foreknows' us. Some scholars think that proginōskō ('foreknow') here means what it often does in Greek literature—'know something ahead of time'. But Paul says that it is we Christians whom God knows, and this suggests the more personal idea of 'knowing' that is sometimes found in the OT: election into personal relationship (e.g. Gn. 18:19; Je. 1:5; Am. 3:2). This is almost certainly also the sense that 'foreknow' has in its other NT occurrences (11:2; Acts 2:23; 1 Pet. 1:2, 20). God's 'foreknowing', his selection of us to be saved from 'before the creation of the world' (Eph. 1:4), leads to his 'predestining us', his appointing us to a specific destiny. This destiny is that we become like Christ, a final event that God accomplishes by 'calling' us (see v 28b), 'justifying' us (see 3:21–4:25) and ‘glorifying’ us. It is significant that this last verb is, like the others in v 30, in the past tense, suggesting that, though the attaining of glory may be future, God’s determining that we shall attain it is already accomplished.

8:31–39 Celebration of the believer’s security

We may view this beautiful, hymn-like celebration of our security in Christ as a response to what Paul has just said (28–30, or 18–30 or even 1–30), but it is better to see it as a concluding reflection of chs. 5–8 as a whole. It falls into two parts. In the first (31–34) Paul reminds us that God is for us: in giving his Son, he has at the same time secured for us all that we need to get through this life and attain final salvation. No-one, then, is able successfully to bring any charge against us, to cause us to be condemned in the judgment. For it is God who has chosen us and justified us and his own Son who answers any indictment brought against us. The second part of the hymn (35–39) celebrates the love of God in Christ for us. It is as impossible to separate us from that love as it is to bring a charge against us. No earthly peril or disaster can do so (35b–36). Though such suffering can be expected, as Paul reminds us with his quotation of Ps. 44:22, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. Nor can any spiritual power separate us from God’s love (angels, demons and powers in v 38). Indeed, there is nothing in all creation that can remove us from the new regime in which God’s love in Christ reigns over us.

9:1–11:36 The gospel and Israel

Interpreters have often considered these three chapters to have little connection with the real theme of Romans. This section has been understood as an aside motivated by Paul’s personal concern for his people, or as a digression on the theme of God’s election. But the theme of these chapters is the place of Israel in God’s plan of salvation, and this is a theme that is much involved with Paul’s concerns in Romans. From the beginning of the letter (1:2; cf. also 3:21, 31; ch. 4) Paul has been concerned to demonstrate that the gospel stands in continuity with the OT. He wants to make it clear that the coming of Jesus Christ and the new regime of salvation-history that he has inaugurated is no innovation in God’s plan for history, but its intended culmination. However, the unbelief of the majority of Jews in Paul’s day presents a potential problem for Paul’s attempt to establish such continuity. Was not God’s promise of salvation given to the people of Israel? How can he remain true to that promise if it is now fulfilled in the church instead of in Israel?

These are the questions Paul answers in chs. 9–11, as he defends the thesis that It is not as though God’s word had failed (9:6a). Jewish unbelief at the present time does not mean, Paul asserts, that God’s promises to his people have failed because (i) God had never promised to save every single Jew (9:6b–29); (ii) the Jews are themselves responsible for failing to believe (9:30–10:21); (iii) God’s promises to Israel are even now being fulfilled in a remnant, of Jewish Christians (11:1–10); and (iv) God will yet save all Israel (11:12–32). Throughout, Paul is concerned to show that God’s promises to his people Israel—when correctly understood—remain fully intact. This ‘theology of Israel’, in addition to establishing the coherence of the gospel, is also of practical importance. For, as the appeals in 11:12–32 reveal, Paul was aware that the Gentiles in the Roman church were neglecting their indispensable OT ‘roots’ and looking down on Jews and Jewish Christians.

9:1–6a The issue: Paul’s anguish over Israel

The lack of a word or phrase to connect ch. 8 with ch. 9 suggests that there is a pause in Paul’s argument at this point. With the celebration of God’s unchangeable love for Christians (8:31–39) the climax of his argument to this point has been reached. But it is just this assertion of the certain fulfilment of God’s promises to Christians that leads Paul now to raise the question of God’s promises to Israel. Vs 1–3 show that this question was an intensely emotional one for him. For Paul never lost his sense of identification with his fellow-Jews. He therefore experiences great sorrow and unceasing anguish over those who are from the standpoint of the flesh (kata sarka) his ‘kinsmen’ and brothers (2–3). Although Paul does not tell us why he feels so badly about his fellow-Jews, the parallel in 10:1 makes clear that it is because the great majority of Jews are not saved; for they have refused to believe in Jesus Christ (cf. 9:30–10:21). So strongly does Paul feel this, like Moses before him (Ex. 32:31–34), he is willing to sacrifice his own salvation for the sake of the salvation of his fellow-Jews. The strength of Paul’s assertion (cf. also v 1) suggests that he may have been aware of some Jews who doubted his concern for his ‘kinsmen according to the flesh’.

Paul’s emotion over Jewish unbelief has, however, another—and perhaps deeper—basis: the incongruity between the Jews’ present status and their marvellous privileges (4–5). Simply being the people of Israel can be numbered among these, for ‘Israel’ (which Paul prefers to use throughout chs. 9–11) suggests the covenant status granted to the descendants of Jacob (‘Israel’). Equally significant is the Jews’ adoption as sons, a designation Paul elsewhere uses of Christians (8:15, 23; Gal. 4:5; Eph. 1:5). In just what sense the Jews can be said to possess this status Paul will explain in 9:6b–13 and 11:1–32. The climax to the Jews’ privileges is the fact that Christ, the promised Messiah, comes from them. But this tells the story from the human side; from the divine side, this same Christ is ‘God’ himself. This, at least, is the interpretation suggested by the NIV (cf. also the NASB), which places a comma between Christ and who is God over all. Other versions, however, place a full point after Christ, and understand the last part of the verse to be an independent ascription of praise to God (the Father) (see the NIV mg. and the RSV). The interpretation adopted in the NIV text is, however, probably correct and if so this verse is one of the few places in the NT where Jesus Christ is explicitly called ‘God’.

The privileges that Paul has enumerated all stem from God himself and could be taken to guarantee—indeed, were taken by many Jews to guarantee—the salvation of Jews generally. It is this salvation that the gospel specifically calls into question (see e.g. ch. 2), and, by doing so, raises the issue that is central to these chapters: has God abandoned his promises to Israel (6a)?

9:6b–29 Israel’s past: God’s sovereign election

Paul’s first response is to argue that God’s word has all along promised salvation only to those whom God sovereignly chose. Paul cites extensively from Israel’s history to make this argument, showing that belonging to God’s people depends not on birth or on anything a person does, but on God’s call (this word is key to the section; cf. vs 7 (NIV ‘reckoned’), 12, 24–26). As God selected only some from among Abraham’s descendants to be his people (6b–13), so also he is now selecting Gentiles (24–26) and only a remnant of Jews (27–29) to be his people at the present time. The burden of Paul’s argument, then, comes in vs 6b–13 and 24–29, with vs 14–23 being a separate response to questions raised by Paul’s stress on the sovereignty of God.

9:6b–13 The Israel within Israel. The thesis of the paragraph is stated in v 6b: not all who are descended from Israel are Israel. There is, Paul suggests, in keeping with the OT

‘remnant’ theology, a spiritual Israel within a larger ethnic Israel. Paul may elsewhere use ‘Israel’ to denote the entire people of God, both Jew and Gentile (Gal. 6:16). Here, however, as the sequel makes clear, he is thinking only of Jews. Paul proves his point about the Israel within Israel in two roughly parallel arguments drawn from OT history (7–10, 11–13). In the first, Paul shows that physical descent from Abraham was not enough to guarantee a place within the people of God. Ishmael and Isaac were both Abraham’s children; yet it was through Isaac alone that God ‘reckoned’ Abraham’s spiritual descendants (Gn. 21:12). Spiritual descent from Abraham, then, is based not on birth but on God’s promise. Isaac, not Ishmael, was the recipient of that promise (10, quoting Gn. 18:10 and 14).

As if the point were not clear enough, Paul now makes it even more emphatically by choosing an illustration from the next generation of Israel (10–13). For one could object to Paul’s first illustration that a significant difference in natural descent distinguished Isaac and Ishmael: the former was born to Sarah, ‘the free woman’, and the latter to Hagar, ‘the slave woman’ (cf. Gal. 4:21–31). But no such difference existed between Jacob and Esau. As twins, they were not only born to the same mother, Rebekah, but they were even conceived at the same moment (the Greek koitēn probably refers to sexual intercourse). Yet even before their birth Rebekah was told that ‘The older shall serve the younger’ (Gn. 25:23). This priority of Jacob is confirmed by a second OT text quoted by Paul, Mal. 1:2–3, ‘Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated’. From these OT testimonies to Jacob’s priority Paul draws the conclusion, in a parenthetical note (11b–12a), that the blessing enjoyed by Jacob was based on nothing that he had done but on God’s free, sovereign call.

What is this blessing? Since the OT contexts from which Paul draws his illustration are speaking mainly about the historical roles of Jacob and Esau, or the nations they represent (Israel and Edom), the plan of God, (cf. Mal. 1:2–3), Paul may mean nothing more than that Jacob enjoyed the privilege of being a positive instrument in that plan. But the language that Paul uses throughout this paragraph—reckoned (7; cf. 4:2–21); election (11; cf. 11:5, 7, 28; Acts 9:15; 1 Thes. 1:4; 2 Pet. 1:10); purpose (11; cf. 8:28; Eph. 1:11); works (12; cf. 4:4–8); calls (12; cf. 8:29)—generally refers to the issue of eternal salvation. And it is this issue, the fact that so many Jews have not become saved through the gospel, that has sparked this whole discussion. We conclude, therefore, that Paul is using these OT texts to illustrate the principle of God’s sovereignty in salvation: being a child of God (cf. vs 7–9) depends ultimately on God’s calling. God’s ‘love’ of Jacob and ‘hate’ of Esau are ways of describing in sharply contrasting terms God’s election to salvation and his exclusion from salvation, respectively.

9:14–23 Objections: The freedom of God. Paul’s emphasis on the sovereignty of God in salvation raises certain objections, as he well knew from many years of preaching. Paul deals with two of these in this section. Is not God unfair to choose some and reject others (14)? And how can people be blamed for rejecting God if he himself determines that rejection (19)? Such questions are our natural response to the biblical teaching about God’s sovereignty. It is significant that Paul here offers no ‘logical’ explanation for the compatibility of God’s sovereignty with the equally biblical teaching that God is scrupulously fair and that human beings are justifiably blameworthy for their actions. We would do well to follow his approach: to affirm the truth of these great biblical doctrines without eliminating or weakening one or the other through an insistence on an exhaustive explanation. This is a point at which, with Paul (cf. 11:33–36), we should be prepared to recognize a mystery beyond our comprehension.

In the diatribe style that he had adopted frequently in Romans, Paul himself asks the question that he knows will be raised by his insistence on the sovereignty of God in election: is God unjust? This inference Paul emphatically rejects and again cites the OT to support his viewpoint (15). But the text Paul cites—Ex. 33:19—appears simply to reiterate God’s free and sovereign activity rather than to explain why that activity is just. But perhaps this is Paul’s point: that God’s actions can be ‘judged’ by nothing beyond his own nature as revealed in Scripture. Paul again states that what follows from God’s freedom is that it (i.e. God’s election to salvation; cf. vs 11–12) does not depend on man’s desire or effort.

Vs 17–18 provide further support for this denial that God’s acts are based on human decisions and actions, but now from the ‘negative’ side (cf. ‘Esau I hated’ in v 13b). Pharaoh’s role in the history of salvation was a matter of God’s determination. It was God who brought Pharaoh on to the stage of history (‘I raised you up’; cf. Ex. 9:16) and caused his heart to be hardened. What is said in the OT about Pharaoh applies, of course, to his role in the history of salvation and not to his personal destiny. But, as in vs 10–13, Paul suggests in v 18 that God’s working in Pharaoh illustrates the way in which God works in people generally: as he has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy (15–16; cf. ‘Jacob I loved’ in v 13a) so he hardens whom he wants to harden (17; cf. ‘Esau I hated’ in v 13b). Neither the bestowal of God’s mercy nor his hardening are based on human actions (although it should be remembered that God acts on people who are already lost in sin and that his exclusion of some from salvation is in some sense simply a confirmation of the choice they have already made). It should also be remembered that God’s decisions on these matters are not disclosed to us and that they are not meant in any way to cause despair. The Scriptures make plain that God will never refuse to accept, or cast away, those who diligently seek him.

The very question Paul now poses is exactly the one that we are tempted to raise at this point also: how can God blame people for rejecting him if he himself, by choosing some and ‘passing over’ others, in some sense causes that very rejection? Paul’s response reveals that he himself has no logically satisfactory answer to this question. He has earlier in the letter made it plain that people are fully responsible for their rejection of the truth of God (1:20–2:11), and he will make the point again with respect to Israel (9:30–10:21). But Paul does not mention this as a way of avoiding the issue that he now raises. He thereby implies that God’s sovereignty in rejection and man’s responsibility for that rejection are to be maintained as two complementary truths, truths that must not be used to detract from one another. Here Paul simply contests anyone’s right to stand in judgment over the ways of God. He is the potter, who has full right over the vessels that he creates (see Je. 18; Wisdom of Solomon 12:3–22; 15:7). In vs 22–23, Paul relates this freedom of God to his willingness to bear patiently with those objects of his wrath which are prepared for destruction. The ‘objects’ Paul here has in mind are probably unbelieving Jews, who are now playing a role in salvation-history something like that played by Pharaoh at the time of the exodus (see 11:12–15). As in Pharaoh’s case, the stress lies on their historical role at the present time (although their destiny is nevertheless clear: wrath and destruction). But God’s ultimate purpose is not wrath but mercy and glory. For the main point of vs 22–23 is how God expresses his concern with the objects of his mercy, whom he prepared in advance for glory.

9:24–29 God’s calling of a new people. While v 24 is grammatically tied to vs 22–23, it returns to the theme with which Paul started this section: God’s calling. In vs 7–13 Paul has shown how God called from within ethnic Israel a smaller number of Jews who formed a ‘spiritual’ Israel. Now he shows that this sovereign call of God has in the present time created a new people, composed of both Gentiles (25–26) and a Jewish remnant (27–29). In vs 25–26 Paul applies Ho. 2:23 and 1:10, which in their original context applied to Israel, to the calling of Gentiles to become his people, sons of the living God (cf. ‘God’s children’ in v 8). Paul quotes

Isaiah to illustrate the situation of the Jews and, in doing so, makes three points that serve to summarize this whole section and prepare for ch. 11: (i) the unbelief of many of Paul's fellow-Jews is not surprising, since Scripture itself predicted that 'only the remnant will be saved' (Is. 10:22); (ii) Jews are being saved and are becoming part of the new people of God: a 'remnant will be saved' (cf. 11:3–7); and (iii) God is the one who brings about the salvation of his people: 'unless the Lord Almighty had left us descendants ...' (Is. 1:9).

9:30–10:21 Israel's present: disobedience

Paul's second argument in defence of the proposition that God's word of promise to Israel has not failed (9:6a) is that Israel itself, by its failure to respond rightly to God's word, is at fault for its exclusion from God's new people. In 9:30–10:13, Paul faults Israel for seeking a right standing with God based on doing the law rather than on faith in Christ. Then, in 10:14–21, he demonstrates that Israel cannot plead ignorance for its failure, for God has made his plan and purpose clear to Israel in the Scriptures. The unbelief of the majority of Paul's fellow-Jews is due both to God's sovereign election (9:6b–29) and to their culpable refusal to believe. Unconditional divine election and human responsibility stand side by side, and neither should be allowed to cancel or mitigate the other.

9:30–10:13 The righteousness of God and the righteousness of the law. A contrast between two kinds of righteousness rules this section: God's righteousness (10:3), a righteousness available only through faith (9:30; 10:4, 6, 10), and one's own 'righteousness' (10:3), a righteousness that is bound up with the law (9:31; 10:5) and with works (9:32). Paul develops this contrast in three somewhat parallel paragraphs (9:30–33; 10:1–4; 10:5–13). In each he accuses Israel as a whole of missing God's righteousness in Christ, the only righteousness that can save (see 10:1, 9–10), because of its preoccupation with works and the law of Moses. An approach to the law informed by right knowledge would have led them to Christ and true righteousness, for the law itself points forward to Christ (10:4).

Paul's question What then shall we say? (30) introduces the new stage in his argument. It suggests that he will be dealing with an issue raised by his previous discussion. This issue is the unexpected development in salvation-history that he has just mentioned (24–29): Jews, God's 'chosen people', are left as only a remnant, while Gentiles, once far from God, are now being called 'sons of the living God'. Paul provides a first explanation in vs 30b–33 as to why this has taken place. He uses racecourse imagery to contrast Gentiles with Israel. The former, though not even 'in the race' (who did not pursue righteousness) have, nevertheless, reached the 'finishing line': they have obtained a right standing with God. And they have obtained it, Paul makes clear, because of their faith. Israel, on the other hand, though actively engaged in the race, has not reached the goal of that race. At this point, however, Paul's careful contrast appears to break down, for the goal that Israel pursued but did not obtain is not righteousness, but a law of righteousness. Some scholars suggest that Paul means by this simply the 'principle of righteousness' or that we can reverse the terms and translate it 'righteousness of the law' (cf. 10:5). But the law is almost certainly the Mosaic law, and we should respect the word order that Paul has chosen. Paul uses this phrase to stress that Israel's pursuit of a right standing with God was completely bound up with the law: they were pursuing 'a law that held out the promise of righteousness' (cf. 2:13).

This goal they did not obtain, nor could they ever attain it. For the law, as Paul has made clear earlier, can never bring righteousness (3:20, 28; 4:13–15; 8:3). Paul, therefore, disrupts the parallelism between Gentiles and Israel to bring out the fact that Israel are to be faulted both for what they were pursuing (a law of righteousness) and for the manner in which they were pursuing it (not by faith but as if it [i.e. righteousness] were by works). So narrowly were their eyes focused on the law that, rather than embracing Jesus Christ, the true goal of the ‘race’ (see 10:4), they have stumbled over him. Paul borrows this imagery from Is. 8:14, which he quotes along with Is. 28:16 in v 33.

In 10:1–4, Paul elaborates on this ‘stumbling’ of the Jews over Jesus Christ. After reasserting his deep longing for the salvation of his Jewish brothers and sisters (see 9:1–3), Paul faults the Jews for not having a knowledge of God’s ways and purposes that matches their undoubted zeal. To use the race imagery of 9:30–33, Israel were running strenuously, but they were not heading towards the true finishing line of the race. That finishing line is the righteousness that comes from God (3). This phrase is better translated ‘the righteousness of God’ (Gk. tēn tou theou dikaiosynēn) and, as in 1:17 and 3:21–22, refers to God’s act of making people right before him. Focused on the pursuit of their own righteousness, the righteousness that comes by works (9:32) and the law (10:5), the Jews have not submitted to, have not been willing to accept in faith, God’s way of putting people in relationship with himself.

The Jews’ preoccupation with the law is again the underlying problem, as Paul implies in v 4. For they have failed to understand that Christ is himself the ‘culmination’ of the law. Paul uses the word telos, which some translate ‘end’ (NIV; RSV) and others ‘goal’. In keeping with the race imagery of the passage, however, the word probably contains elements of both these translations. Christ, Paul is saying, has all along been the goal to which the law has been pointing; and, since that goal has now been attained—Christ has come—the pursuit of the law should now be at an end. This verse stands along with Mt. 5:17, as a key expression of a dominant NT theme: the culmination or ‘fulfilment’ of the old covenant law and all its institutions in Jesus the Messiah. With that culmination comes also God’s intention to offer righteousness to anyone who believes, Gentile as well as Jew (see 9:30; 10:12–13).

Paul’s third statement of the contrast between the two ways of righteousness (10:5–13) has two main purposes. It uses the OT itself to reassert that the key difference between them is the difference between ‘doing’ (the law) and ‘believing’ (the gospel) (5–10) and reinforces the ‘universalistic’ dimension of the righteousness of God by faith (11–13; cf. 10:4b: for everyone who believes). Paul’s quoting of the OT apparently ‘against itself’ in vs 5–8 has been the topic of considerable controversy and discussion. We cannot avoid the problem by eliminating the contrast between vs 5 and 6 (Cranfield, for instance, would translate ‘and’ at the beginning of v 6) or by denying that Paul is truly quoting the OT in v 6–8). Rather, we should understand Paul to be teasing out a fuller meaning of the passages he quotes in the light of Christ’s coming. Lv. 18:5 may stand as a valid expression of the righteousness that is by the law because it focuses on what was characteristic of the Mosaic legal system: doing. Only by obedience, Moses repeatedly emphasized, could a Jew live, i.e. enjoy God’s covenant blessings. Taken on its own terms, severed from the undergirding promise of God, the Mosaic law offers the possibility of righteousness and life only if it is truly done. By focusing so narrowly on the Mosaic law the Jews had put themselves in the position of being able to find life and salvation only by ‘doing’ it—an impossible task, as Paul has made clear (cf. 3:9–20).

It is precisely the ready availability of the righteousness that is by faith, in contrast to the impossibility of achieving the righteousness that is by the law, that is the point of Paul’s selective quotations from Dt. 30:12–14 in vs 6–8. The Deuteronomy passage encourages obedience to the law of God by reminding the Israelites that the word of God’s law is near, and that there is no need to ascend to heaven or into the deep (Paul may here have mixed an allusion to Ps. 107:26 with his quotation) to find it. Paul can apply the text to Christ's death and resurrection (6–7) and to the word of faith, the gospel (8), because he sees in Christ the culmination of the law (4). What the OT attributed to the law Paul now understands to be 'fulfilled' in Christ and the gospel message: the ready availability of the means of righteousness. To continue to strive to fulfil the Mosaic law as a means of righteousness—as the Jews were doing—is to miss the fact that God has now brought near his word to people in the message of the gospel of Christ's death and resurrection.

Vs 9–13 elaborate two implications of the nearness of God's word in the gospel. First, because God has already 'done' what is needed to secure righteousness, all that people are required to do is to believe. Secondly, the gospel is 'near' for everybody, not just for the Jews. The mention of both mouth and heart in Dt. 30:14 leads Paul to develop each of these in vs 9–10. (Since this is the origin for the imagery, we should not place undue emphasis on oral confession, as if Paul is elevating it to a necessary component of salvation.) Acknowledging that Jesus is Lord is a component of what Paul clearly wants to highlight: believing in the heart (see 2:28–29). Faith, not doing the law, brings salvation, and brings it for anyone, whether Jew or Gentile. Paul proves these points by quoting from Is. 28:16 (11; note that Paul has used this text earlier in 9:33) and Joel 2:32 (13). Indicative of Paul's very high view of Jesus Christ is the fact that he applies texts that speak of the LORD God to the Lord Jesus.

Note. 33 The fact that Peter also quotes Is. 28:16 and 8:14 together (1 Pet. 2:6, 8) may indicate that they were part of an early Christian collection of Messianic 'proof texts', focused on Christ as the 'stone'.

10:14–21 Israel's lack of excuse. In 9:30–10:13, Paul has shown that Israel's failure to attain salvation must be attributed to its failure to believe and not to the failure of God's word (9:6a). Paul now removes any possible excuse that Israel might have for its failure to believe by asserting that the gospel has indeed been brought 'near' to Israel (cf. v 8). The conditions for believing in the gospel and finding salvation have been met (14–15, 17–18). The fault, then, is Israel's for refusing to be obedient to the gospel (16) and for failing to understand the OT itself, which prophesied what God has now done in the gospel (19–21).

In vs 14–15a, Paul uses a series of questions to set forth the series of conditions that must be met if people are 'to call on the name of the Lord' (13): messengers must be sent, the message must be preached, people must hear the message and hearing must be met by faith. Paul then quotes Is. 52:7—How beautiful are the feet of those who bring good news—to emphasize the importance of the sending of the preachers and also to move into an explicit focus on the gospel. For in v 16 Paul makes clear that the condition in this chain that has gone unfulfilled is the responsibility of those who hear the preachers of the good news to respond in obedience and faith. As the NIV translation makes explicit (the Greek has only ou pantas, 'not all'), Paul is now thinking specifically of the Israelites. Paul again quotes Isaiah (53:1) for prophetic confirmation of Israel's failure to respond to the message (cf. also Jn. 12:38).

V 17 begins a new paragraph. Taking his vocabulary from the Is. 53:1 quotation, Paul reiterates the connection between faith and the hearing of the message (see v 14) and identifies this message with the word of Christ, i.e. 'the word that proclaims Christ', the gospel (cf. vs 15–16). Paul's point in vs 18–20 is to show that Israel has, indeed, both 'heard' the word of Christ and 'known' about God's plan of salvation as it has now been unfolded through the preaching of the gospel. Paul probably quotes Ps. 19:4 (v 18b) not as a prophecy of the preaching of the gospel, but simply in order to use its language to assert the widespread proclamation of the gospel to Jews throughout the Mediterranean world. It is perhaps the reference to 'the ends of the earth' in this quotation that leads Paul in vs 19–20 to reflect on what was for the Jews of his day a key 'stumbling block' in the way of accepting the gospel: the inclusion of Gentiles in the church. Paul shows from both Moses (Dt. 32:21) and Isaiah (65:1) that God had planned all along to include the Gentiles in his ultimate plan of salvation and to make them his people (cf. 9:24–26). Continuing his quotation from Isaiah (65:2), Paul concludes this section of his argument by reminding his readers of two key facts: God has constantly been extending the word of his grace, the gospel, to the Jews; but they, for their part, have been largely disobedient and obstinate.

11:1–10 Israel's present: 'a remnant by grace'

As Paul has described it in 9:30–10:21, Israel's present status appears to be one of unrelieved resistance to the revelation of God's righteousness in the gospel. As the concluding verse puts it, Israel is 'disobedient and obstinate'. This is, however, not the case, as Paul now reminds us. Already in 9:24, 27–29 he stressed that there is a remnant of Jews who remain a part of God's people. He now returns to this theme, making clear that, while a significant part of Israel has been 'hardened' (7–10; cf. 9:30–10:21), there still exists a remnant chosen by grace (5), Jews who have believed in Christ.

Paul again demonstrates his sensitivity to the way in which his teaching could be misunderstood by raising the question, Did God reject his people? (2) That God has rejected Israel as 'his people' could well be the conclusion drawn from Paul's argument that belonging to God's people depends entirely on God's sovereign 'call' and not on physical descent from Abraham (9:6–29) and from his charge, that Israel has failed to submit to the righteousness of God (9:30–10:21; cf. 10:3). But, as Paul now makes clear, this is not the conclusion that he wants us to draw. God did not reject his people, whom he foreknew (2a; cf. Ps. 94:14). Paul is not only affirming the election to salvation of the remnant (cf. 9:6–9; 11:3–6; so Calvin) but is also affirming a continuing 'election' of Israel as a whole (see 11:28–29). This assertion, then, stands as the heading for the whole chapter, as Paul describes how God's election of Israel works out in the present through the salvation of the remnant (3–10) and in the future through the salvation of 'all Israel' (11–27).

The situation in his own day, Paul suggests, could be compared to that in Elijah's. For the prophet's discouragement at the widespread defection of Israel from true worship of the LORD was met by the LORD's assurance to him that there still existed a solid core of 7,000 'true believers' (see 1 Ki. 19:10–18). In the same way, despite the prevalence of unbelief among the Jews of Paul's day, the yet remains a remnant chosen by grace. A significant number of Jews—like Paul himself (cf. v 1b)—have been obedient to the gospel of Jesus Christ and been saved. But the remnant exists only as the product of God's grace, and cannot therefore be entered into by works (6). It is this preoccupation with works that has proved the downfall of so many of Paul's fellow-Jews and has resulted in their not obtaining the righteousness that they so diligently sought (7; cf. 9:31–32; 10:2–3). But, as it is God's intervention that brings salvation to the elect (cf. grace in v 6), so it is by God's act that The others failed to reach it; they were hardened. That God is the cause of this hardening is made clear by the quotation of a blend of Dt. 29:4 and Is. 29:10 in v 8, and by the parallel text in 9:18 [although a different Greek word (sklērynō) is used there, the concept is the same]. While Israel remains fully responsible for its lack of response to the gospel, Paul makes it clear that, in some mysterious way, God is behind this failure to respond.

11:11–32 Israel’s future: salvation

God’s faithfulness to his word of promise to Israel as a nation (9:6a) is inviolate: he will not reject the people whom he has foreknown (1–2). The unbelief of the majority of Paul’s fellow-Jews must not blind us to the fact that Israel’s ‘hardening’ is neither total (‘at the present time there is a remnant chosen by grace’; 5) nor final (all Israel will be saved; 26). The prediction of Israel’s future salvation is the focus of this section and the climax to Paul’s discussion of Israel and the gospel. Paul leads up to it by showing how God is using Israel’s current unbelief to accomplish his plan for the salvation of the world (11–24). His scolding of Gentile Christians for inappropriate ‘boasting’ over Jewish unbelievers shows that the theology Paul develops in this section has a very specific practical application.

11:11–24 Jew and Gentile in God’s plan. Paul again uses a question to introduce the next stage of his argument. Did they stumble so as to fall beyond recovery? And his quick and emphatic response, Not at all!, shows again that the question betrays a misunderstanding of what Paul has been saying. Yes, Israel, taken as a whole, has ‘stumbled’: it has failed to have faith in Christ, God’s appointed means of providing righteousness (see 9:33; 10:2–4). But Israel’s stumble has not led to irretrievable ruin. For the Jews’ transgression has inaugurated a process by which they will be made envious and be brought ultimately to salvation (11b; cf. 11:26). This happens via an intermediate stage: the salvation of the Gentiles. Jewish refusal to respond to the gospel, Paul implies, has opened the way for preaching to the Gentiles—a circumstance Paul had witnessed repeatedly in his own missionary work (e.g. Acts 13:45–47; 18:6; 19:8–10; 28:24–28). At the same time, we must emphasize that the turn from Jews to Gentiles was much more than a historical circumstance: as the NT makes clear here and elsewhere, it was part of God’s sovereign plan of salvation (see the quotations of Is. 49:6 in Acts 13:47 and of Am. 9:11–12 in Acts 15:16–18). Then, as Jews see Gentiles enjoying God’s blessing, they in turn are made envious—as Dt. 32:21, which Paul quotes in 10:19, predicts.

In this paragraph Paul sets Jewish unbelief in the context of an unfolding plan of God for the salvation of all his people. That plan involves an oscillation between Jews and Gentiles in three stages: (i) Jewish transgression opens the way for (ii) Gentile salvation, which leads in the end to (iii) Jewish salvation. The importance of this point to Paul’s argument is revealed by the fact that he restates it no less than six times in this section (cf. vs 12, 15, 16, 17–24, 25–26, 30–31). In v 12 and again in v 15 the final inclusion of the Jews—their fullness/their acceptance—leads to a fourth stage: greater riches/life from the dead. Since Paul presents this inclusion of the Jews as an event of the end-times (11:26), it is likely that these phrases refer to the ultimate establishment of God’s kingdom through the coming of Christ, bringing with it extraordinary blessing and the resurrection of the dead.

In addition to explaining how it is that Israel’s present transgression will be reversed, this scheme accomplishes two other purposes. First, Paul appeals to it to explain how his being the apostle to the Gentiles involves no departure from his deep desire to save as many of his fellow-Jews as possible (13–14). For, by converting Gentiles, Paul is at the same time fostering greater envy among the Jews and perhaps bringing closer that day when ‘the full number of the Gentiles has come in’ (25).

Secondly, Paul finds in this process reason to scold the Gentile Christians in Rome for their boastful attitude towards the Jews (17–24). Paul makes clear in v 13 that he is writing to these Gentile Christians as responsible individuals in vs 17–24 (the ‘you’ throughout these verses is singular). These verses feature Paul’s famous metaphor of the olive tree. Paul compares the root of the tree to the patriarchs of Israel (see v 28), the natural branches to the Jews, the wild olive shoots to the Gentiles and the olive tree itself to the people of God. Scholars have debated whether Paul's imagery follows actual horticultural practices of his day. The debate is, however, misguided, since Paul could well be adapting the natural process to suit his theological application. The boasting of the Gentile Christians about which Paul is here concerned seems to be occasioned by the fact that natural branches, Jews, have been broken off so that wild olive shoots, Gentiles, might be grafted in (17, 19). Paul does not dispute this—and, indeed, he has just asserted something very like this himself (11–12, 15)—but disputes the Gentile Christians' right to any bragging about the fact. They are not to forget that the root of the olive tree into which they have been grafted is itself Jewish, for God's people are built on his promises to, and dealings with, the patriarchs (cf. also 4:11–12, 16–17; Gal. 3:15–29). The church to which the Gentile Christians in Rome belong is nothing less than the continuation of the one people of God from the OT.

Paul gives a second reason why the Gentiles should not boast: it is dangerous to one's spiritual status. For boasting is the very opposite of faith, our humble acceptance of God's gift of salvation (20–22). Jews have forfeited their place within the people of God through unbelief, and the Gentile Christians at Rome need to recognize the danger they put themselves in if they succumb to the same sin.

At the end of this section (23–24), Paul returns to the point at which he began (12–13), using the olive tree imagery to give hope for eventual Jewish salvation. Though presently broken off (17, 20), these natural branches continue to partake of the holiness of the root from which they have come (16b). Far more readily than Gentiles, who are grafted in contrary to nature, Jews can be grafted back into God's olive tree once again. But this can only happen if the Jews do not persist in unbelief. While Israel's ultimate salvation is certainly the work of God, it cannot take place without that response of faith that God has always made the prerequisite for the enjoyment of his blessings.

11:25–32 'All Israel will be saved'. The hope for a future restoration of Israel that Paul has hinted at throughout vs 11–24 (cf. vs 12, 15, 23–24) is now asserted in the form of the revelation of a mystery. Paul's use of this term is based on the OT (Dn. 2:27–30, 47; 4:9) and Jewish apocalyptic conception according to which God's plan for history is fully determined but hidden and awaiting its revelation at the proper moment (see especially 1 Cor. 2:7; Eph. 3:9; Col. 1:26–27). A primary component of this now-revealed mystery for Paul is the way in which God is now working with the Gentiles (see Eph. 3:1–10 especially). Thus it is not surprising that Paul labels the oscillation between Jews and Gentiles in God's plan for salvation a 'mystery'. V 25a summarily restates the process that Paul has sketched several times in vs 11–24: Israel has experienced a hardening in part until the full number of Gentiles has come in. God's hardening of Jews, as Paul has shown in vs 3–10 is partial, for some Jews are coming to Christ and being saved. And he has more than once hinted at the temporal limitation of this hardening, which he now makes explicit: it will last only until the divinely determined number of Gentiles has come into the kingdom of God (cf. also Lk. 21:24).

This clear temporal stress in v 25 makes it likely that the salvation of all Israel (26a) is to take place after the full number of the Gentiles has come in. To be sure, the word that introduces this verse (houtos) focuses not on the time of this salvation, but on its manner—so, or 'in this manner'. But, as Paul has repeatedly shown, the manner in which God will bring Israel to salvation is as the last stage in a historical process. Therefore, it is unlikely that Paul is speaking in this verse of the salvation of Jews throughout church history. Equally improbable is the view, held by the Reformers, that Paul is referring to the salvation of the entire church, ‘the Israel of God’ (cf. Gal. 6:16). Israel throughout chs. 9–11 denotes the race rather than a spiritual entity, and the contrast with the Gentiles in v 25 renders this meaning all the more likely here. Paul is describing an event that will take place at the end of history, when Christ returns in glory; when, as Is. 59:20–21 puts it, ‘The deliverer will come from Zion’ and Israel’s sins are taken away (26b–27). All Israel has a corporate sense: what is meant is not every single Israelite in the last generation, but, in contrast to the present meagre numbers, a number large enough to represent the race as a whole [cf. the rabbinic maxim ‘All Israelites have a share in the world to come,’ which is followed by a list of exceptions (m. Sanh. 10:1)]. Some scholars argue that God will save Israel in a ‘special way’, apart from conscious faith in Jesus, but this is not correct. The salvation of all Israel will take place only as individual Israelites of that day place their faith in Christ (see v 23: ‘if they do not persist in unbelief’). Faith in Christ is the only means of salvation, for Jew as well as Gentile (1:16–17; 10:11–13).

Paul follows his climactic prediction of salvation for ‘all Israel’ with its basis: God’s irrevocable election of his people Israel (28–29) and his determination to have mercy on ‘all’ (30–32). Both points rehearse essential components of Paul’s argument in these chapters. As Paul has made clear, Jews as a whole are at the present time, through rejection of the gospel, enemies of God (see 9:30–10:21). At the same time he has also made clear that God’s election of Israel remains valid (11:1–2). But we must not forget what Paul has argued in 9:6b–29: Israel’s election is based on God’s free and sovereign call and not on racial descent. Thus the continuing validity of Israel’s election, as far as salvation is concerned, must be limited to those circumstances Paul has described: the coming to Christ of Jews throughout the church age (the remnant; cf. 9:27–29; 11:3–7) and the dramatic turn to their Messiah of large numbers of Jews at the time of Christ’s return (11:25–27). Vs 30–31 restate one last time the process of Jewish disobedience/Gentile salvation/Jewish salvation that is central to this part of Paul’s argument. It is in terms of this oscillation between Jews and Gentiles that v 32 must be interpreted. Paul is not here teaching an individual universalism—that every single human being will experience God’s mercy, and so be saved (as, for instance, Dodd and Cranfield suggest). Rather he is teaching a national universalism: God’s mercy comes to both the Gentiles and to Israel.

11:33–36 The awesome purpose and plan of God

Paul concludes his review of Israel’s past, present and future with a hymn of praise to the God whose ways are beyond our understanding and criticism. God’s wisdom and knowledge (33) refer particularly to the revelation of his purposes in Christ (Eph. 3:5, 10; Col. 2:3). These purposes, as Paul has shown in chs. 9–11, are being worked out in the context of a historical process involving both Jews and Gentiles. We may not understand every detail of that plan, and we may even be tempted to quarrel with some parts of it, but, as Paul reminds us with the OT quotations in vs 34–35 (Is. 40:13 and Jb. 41:11a), any criticism from us, who are mere mortals, is completely out of place. For God is the source (from him), sustainer (through him) and goal (to him) of everything. Confronted with this sovereign and wise God, our response can only be Paul’s: To him be the glory for ever!

12:1–15:13 The gospel and the transformation of life

Paul has shown that the gospel he preaches has the power to transfer Christians from the realm of sin and death into the realm of righteousness and life. But this transfer, as Paul has noted (6:11– 23; 8:12–13), does not absolve the Christian from the responsibility to live out the righteousness so graciously granted in the gospel. God is working to transform us into the image of his Son (8:29), but we are to take part in this process as we work to make this transformation real in our daily lives. Hence 12:1–15:13 belongs naturally with Paul’s presentation of the gospel; indeed, his presentation would be incomplete without it. A new way of living is not the consequence of the gospel, but part of that gospel whose purpose is to bring about ‘the obedience of faith’ (1:5).

Paul’s initial appeal captures the heart of what it means to live as a Christian (12:1–2). There follow specific appeals relating to unity and gifts (12:3–8), love of both fellow-believers and unbelievers (12:9–21), attitudes to government (13:1–7); and, again, love (13:8–10). In 13:11–14 Paul returns to where he began in 12:1–2 with another reminder of the nature of the times in which Christians now live. Paul ends this section of the letter with a lengthy rebuke to the strong and the weak in the church at Rome (14:1–15:13). Clearly in this last section Paul is writing with the specific situation of the Roman Christians in mind. The earlier appeals (chs. 12–13) are not so clearly directed to the situation in Rome. Even here, however, while Paul is undoubtedly summarizing in a general way some of the basics of Christian living, there is some allusion to needs and problems in the Roman church.

12:1–2 The heart of the matter: a renewed mind

Paul’s summons to transform our lives does not come in a vacuum. It is only in view of God’s mercy that his appeal becomes relevant and that our obedience of it is possible. As we recognize all (the word ‘mercy’ is plural in the Greek) that God has done for us in his Son, as Paul has surveyed it in chs. 1–11, we realize that offering ourselves to God as living sacrifices is, indeed, a ‘reasonable’ (logikēn) act of worship (see the NIV mg. for this translation). The word living reminds us of what God has made us: we are people who are now ‘alive to God in Christ Jesus’ (6:11). Paul encourages us to look at our entire Christian lives as acts of worship. It is not just what is done on Sunday in a church building that ‘ascribes worth’ to God, but what God and the world see in us every day and every moment of the week.

V 2, while grammatically parallel to v 1, really explains in more detail how this giving of ourselves as sacrifices is to be carried out. What is required is nothing less than a total transformation in world-view. No longer are we to look at life in terms of this world, the realm of sin and death from which we have been transferred by God’s power (see 5:12–21), but in terms of the new realm to which we belong, the realm ruled by righteousness, life and the Spirit. Living in the world, we are nevertheless no longer ‘of the world’ (Jn. 17:15–16). The essence of successful Christian living is the renewing of our minds so that we might be able to approve what God’s will is—that is, to recognize and put into practice God’s will for every situation we face. God has not given to Christians a set of detailed commandments to guide us. He has given us his Spirit, who is working to change our hearts and minds from within, so that our obedience to God might be natural and spontaneous (see 7:6; 8:5–9; Je. 31:31–34; 2 Cor. 3:6–7; Eph. 4:22–24).

12:3–8 Humility and gifts

Paul’s purpose in this paragraph is to foster unity among Christians by encouraging an attitude of humility and respect towards one another, particularly in the possession and use of spiritual gifts. Paul urges us not to think too highly of ourselves, but to look at ourselves honestly and objectively. We are to measure ourselves, not by each other, but by the measure of faith (metron pisteōs). Some take this phrase to designate the differing amounts of faith that God has given each of us (cf. the NIV and RSV). The context, however, suggests that Paul is speaking here of our common Christian faith, against which each of us is to measure himself or herself (JB: ‘the standard of faith’). When we do this, comparison of ourselves with other believers becomes relatively unimportant—particularly since God has given different gifts to the members of the church. Christ’s body (4–5). What is needed is a recognition of the beautiful God-given and Spiritled diversity and complementarity within the church (see 1 Cor. 12:4–31 for a similar emphasis).

While Paul does not here explicitly mention the role of the Spirit, his involvement is implied by the reference to gifts (charismata; cf. 1:11; 1 Cor. 12:7–11). Paul mentions specific gifts in two other places (1 Cor. 12:7–11, 28; Eph. 4:11), and a comparison of these texts reveals that he is not seeking in any of them to give a comprehensive list. Rather, in each place Paul selects examples that will be relevant to his purpose. Paul’s goal at this point is to encourage each Christian to use his or her gifts energetically and properly and not to worry about the gifts others may have, or the way in which they may be using them. Prophesying (6b) is the gift of conveying to other Christians truth that has been made known to the prophet from God (see 1 Cor. 14:1–32). The prophet must exercise his or her gift in proportion to his [or her] faith, a phrase that has the same sense as ‘measure of faith’ in v 3 (perhaps as playing his or her part in the whole work of the church). Serving (7a) may denote a specific ministry of teaching or leading worship but is probably a general designation of various ministries (see 1 Cor. 12:5). Teaching (7b) involves the transmission of Christian doctrine (see 2 Tim. 2:2); encouraging (8) includes a broader range of speaking ministries. We are reminded of the varied ways in which God leads people to serve him and the community by the inclusion of the gift of contributing to the needs of others (8b).

12:9–21 Love

These verses do not all pursue a single topic, as Paul touches on various components of that ‘good, pleasing and perfect will’ of God that Christians with renewed minds are to approve (2b). But they have a central theme: the demand for love of others, announced in v 9, and standing therefore as a heading for the entire section. While no rigid demarcation is possible, we may divide this paragraph into two main sections, vs 9–16 and vs 17–21. The former focuses more on the responsibilities of Christians to other Christians, while the latter (anticipated in v 14) concentrates on relationships with those outside the church. The number of close parallels to the teaching of Jesus (compare especially v 14 with Mt. 5:44 and v 21 with Mt. 5:39) suggests that Paul may here be reflecting a common early Christian set of ethical guidelines.

A sincere love is a love that is genuine and without pretence (see also 2 Cor. 6:6; 1 Tim. 1:5; 1 Pet. 1:22), the sort that should stem from a renewed heart and mind. Hate what is evil and cling to what is good (9) may explain what a sincere love is but they are probably independent commands. Beginning in v 10, Paul encourages Christians to pursue sincere love and to do good in their relationships with other believers. Honour one another above yourselves could also be translated ‘in honour prefer one another’—that is, as Paul puts it in Phil. 2:3b, ‘consider others better than yourselves’. The similarity between this appeal and v 3 suggests that Paul already has his eye on the problems of disunity in the Roman church (see 14:1–15:13). Zeal (v 11) for God and the things of God should always characterize Christians, as it did our Lord (see Jn. 2:17). The means to keep this zeal strong is given in the next command, which is best translated ‘allow oneself to be set on fire by the Holy Spirit’ (Cranfield; the NIV differs, not taking pneuma to be the Holy Spirit). Such zeal, fired by the Spirit himself, will lead to a true servicing of the Lord. Paul has spoken earlier in Romans about hope (5:2–10; 8:18–30), tribulation (5:3–4) and prayer (8:26–27); he now reminds Christians briefly (12) of the correct attitude towards each. Sincere love also leads to practical steps to help fellow believers who are in need (13; see also 1 Jn. 3:17–18).

V 14 interrupts the call to Christians to love and to do good to one another and anticipates vs 17–21. The relationship between Paul’s command to Bless those who persecute you and Jesus’ teaching in the Sermon on the Mount (5:4) is clear. Jesus’ command probably became a staple of early Christian instruction (see also 1 Pet. 3:9). With v 15, Paul turns back to inter-Christian relationships. Sympathetic involvement with the joys and sorrows of fellow-believers is a hallmark of sincere love for the brothers and sisters (10). The problem is that Christians think too much of themselves. Paul again warns the Roman Christians about this (cf. also vs 3, 10b), and encourages them to extend their sympathetic concern even to people of low position. The word Paul uses here (tapeinos) refers to those many first-century Christians who could boast of little in the way of worldly goods or social position (see Lk. 1:52; Jas. 1:10).

In the last section of this paragraph (17–21), Paul calls believers to demonstrate sincere love (9) towards those who oppose them. Echoing again the teaching of Jesus (Mt. 5:38–42; cf. 1 Thes. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9), Paul forbids retaliation (17a; cf. v 19a). In its place, he urges a positive response: Be careful to do what is right (lit. ‘good things’; cf. 12:2b) in the eyes of everybody. Specifically, the Christian should seek to maintain peaceful relationships with everybody, Christians and non-Christians alike (cf. Pr. 3:4; 2 Cor. 8:21). Nevertheless, Paul recognizes that our freedom to do so will be limited by the attitudes of others and by our need not to compromise our Christian integrity. Peace with others should never be purchased at the price of our Christian convictions and witness. Thus he adds the qualification as far as it depends on you.

Paul adds to his second prohibition (19a) an explanation of why such retaliation is unnecessary. We are to remember that we serve a sovereign and just God, a God who has promised to avenge the wrongs of those who are ill-treated in this world (Dt. 32:35). We should, therefore, not feel it necessary to take on ourselves the role of avenger, but rather leave room for God’s wrath. (The Greek does not make clear that the wrath is God’s, but this is certainly Paul’s meaning.) Paul quotes Pr. 25:21–22 to reinforce his plea not to take vengeance. Again, as in v 17, the point is that Christians should substitute for vengeance the doing of good to our enemies. Through such kindness to our enemy, we will heap burning coals on his head. This could be a reference to future divine punishment: if the enemy is not moved to repentance by our good deeds, our kindly actions will render God’s wrath all the worse. But the fact that it is we, by our good deeds, who bring the burning coals on the enemy suggests rather that Paul is holding out to us the hope that our kindness will stimulate shame and repentance in the enemy. V 21—Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good—is a fitting conclusion to this section (17–21) and, indirectly, to all of vs 3–20.

Notes. The commands in vs 9–13 and 16–19 represent Greek participles, a form of verb that does not usually indicate a command. Paul’s usage here may reflect the tendency of many rabbis to use the Hebrew participle to give a command. 11 Instead of servicing the Lord (kuriō), some mss have the wording ‘serving the time’ (kairō). The latter is certainly a more difficult reading which is often an indication of authenticity, but lacks sufficient external support. 20 The use of burning coals to symbolize shame and repentance in Pr. 25:22 may derive from an Egyptian ritual in which a person could purge his or her sin by carrying on the head a dish containing burning charcoal.

13:1–7 The Christian’s responsibility to government

Paul does not explicitly connect this paragraph with what comes before it, and this has led some scholars to think that it is a later, perhaps post-Pauline, addition to the text of Romans. But there is no textual evidence for so drastic an interpretation. The passage fits in the context perfectly well: submission to government is part of that ‘good, pleasing and perfect will’ (12:2b) that Paul has been outlining and is also a specific example of doing ‘what is right in the eyes of everybody’ (12:17b). Paul may have been aware that the Roman Christians were in particular need of such advice, since there is evidence that various groups in the capital, including Jews, were agitating against the paying of taxes at about this time. (Tacitus, Ann. 15.50ff.). Paul, therefore, counsels that the Roman Christians pay their taxes (6–7) as part of their general obligation to submit to the authorities of the state (1a, 5a). Such submission is called for, Paul argues, because governmental authorities are established by God to serve his purposes of rewarding good and punishing evil (1b–4, 5b).

The authorities (Gk. exousiai) clearly denote persons in positions of authority in secular government; in Paul’s day of course, Roman imperial and provincial officials especially. To submit to these authorities means to recognize their place ‘over’ the believer in the ‘order’ that exists in the world. This ‘order’ includes both secular institutions that lack God’s sanction (e.g. slavery, Tit. 2:9; 1 Pet. 2:18) and institutions ordained by God for the good of his people (e.g. marriage, Eph. 5:22; Col. 3:18; Tit. 2:5; 1 Pet. 3:1, 5; the family, Lk. 2:51; church leadership, 1 Cor. 16:16; 1 Pet. 5:5; Eph. 5:21 probably includes marriage, family and slavery). Human government, Paul makes clear in vs 1b–4, falls clearly into this latter category. Echoing consistent OT (Pr. 8:15–16; Is. 40:15, 23–24; Dn. 2:21; 4:17, 25, 32; 5:21) and Jewish teaching, (Wisdom of Solomon 6:3; Ecclus. 10:4, 17:17) Paul reminds us that every ruler is established (tetagmenai) by God and is therefore God’s servant, however indirectly or unconsciously (4, 6). Rulers serve God by commending those who do good (3b–4a) and punishing wrong-doers (3a, 4b). Therefore, Christians, like everyone else (cf. v 1), are to do what the governing authorities tell us to do; and not just because we fear punishment, but also because we recognize that God stands behind government and we want to avoid doing that which would violate our consciences (5b).

Paul’s teaching in this paragraph appears to be quite straightforward and is, indeed, paralleled in other NT books (see especially 1 Pet. 2:13–17). Nevertheless, the apparently absolute command to do what rulers tell us to do creates problems for most Christians. These problems are created not only by our experience—many believers must live under dictatorial and rabidly anti-Christian governments—but by the NT itself, which elsewhere holds up disobedience to rulers in some situations as commendable (Acts 4:19–20; Revelation). The problem thus created by 13:1–7 has been solved in several ways. Some argue that Paul is commanding obedience to government only when it is fulfilling its God-given functions of rewarding good and punishing evil. While there may be some truth to this, Paul does not make Christian obedience contingent on governmental behaviour. Others think that Paul may be restricting himself only to an immediate situation in the Roman community; but the universal language of the text (everyone, no authority in v 1) makes this unlikely. A more attractive alternative is that Paul’s demand that Christians submit to government means simply that they recognize government’s rightful place within the hierarchy of relationships established by God, a hierarchy at whose pinnacle is God. When, therefore, government usurps its place, and commands us to do something contrary to our ultimate Lord, we are free—indeed obliged—to disobey. This view may, however, unduly weaken the meaning of ‘submit’. Perhaps the best solution, then, is to view 13:1–7 as a general statement about how the Christian should relate to government, with exceptions to this advice assumed but not spelled out here.

13:8–10 Love and the law

The first part of v 8 is transitional. Let no debt remain outstanding repeats an important implication drawn from the need for Christians to submit to secular rulers (cf. v 7a) and is the basis for Paul’s reminder that Christians owe one debt that they can never repay: the continuing debt to love one another. Paul returns to the theme of love (see 12:9–21), highlighting its importance by presenting it as the fulfilment (8b and 10), or summary (9), of the Mosaic law. The centrality of Lv. 19:18, the ‘love command’, was stressed by Jesus himself (Mt. 5:43; 19:19; 22:39; Mk. 12:31; cf. Jn. 13:34–35), and is echoed throughout the NT (cf. Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8; 4:11–12; 1 Jn. 4:11, passim). What Paul means when he insists that obedience to this commandment ‘fulfils’ or ‘sums up’ all the other commandments is not the idea that all we need to do to please God is to ‘love’—with the implication that as long as we have a ‘loving’ feeling, we can do anything else we please. Nor does Paul mean that loving others is simply the most important commandment in the law, or the spirit in which all the others are to be obeyed. Rather, he is saying that Christians now fulfil all the demands of the Mosaic law (at least those that relate to our obligations to other people) by loving. For love is at the heart of the ‘law of Christ’ (Gal. 6:2 cf. 1 Cor. 9:20–21), the law that Jesus made regulative of life in the new realm in which we live. And this law itself ‘fulfils’ the Mosaic law (see Mt. 5:17).

13:11–14 Recognizing the times

As Paul began this section on general Christian ethics with a reminder of the new situation in which believers now live—no longer ‘of this world’ (12:2)—so he concludes it. Believers must understand the present time: a time in which we expect imminently the dawning of the day (12), that ‘day of the Lord Jesus’ that will bring our final salvation. As Paul has made clear (5:9–10), salvation is a process that is completed only when we are delivered from the outpouring of God’s wrath on the last day (see also Phil. 1:19; 2:12; 1 Thes. 5:9). This day comes progressively nearer as the present age runs its course, and casts its light back into the time in which we now live. Hence his appeal to act as those who live in the daytime (12b–13) and to refrain from those actions that are characteristic of the darkness, that world system in opposition to God. V 14 makes the same point in different language: we are to surround ourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ in such a way that all we do is done through him and for him, and we are not even to give thought to any of those sinful desires that stem from this fallen and sinful world (Gk. sarx, ‘flesh’, sinful nature; see the note on 7:5).

14:1–15:13 Appeals for unity

In 12:3–13:14, Paul has mentioned several quite general components of God’s ‘good, pleasing and perfect will’ that should characterize Christians whose minds are being renewed through the power of the gospel (cf. 12:1–2). Now Paul addresses a specific issue within the Roman church: a division between those whom he calls the weak [in faith] (14:1–2; 15:1) and the strong (15:1). These two groups are quarrelling over whether Christians should, eat meat (14:2, 6, 21); observe special religious days (14:5–6); and, possibly, drink wine (14:21; cf. v 17—it is not completely clear whether this was a real issue in the church or whether Paul simply cites it as an example).

We cannot with certainty identify these two groups. Certain parallels with Paul's discussion in 1 Cor. 8–10 lead some scholars to think that Paul is addressing here the problem of whether Christians should eat meat sacrificed to idols. Others think that the debate is over the propriety of certain ascetic practices that have been adapted from pagan religions. But Paul's stress in 15:8–13 on the importance of unity between Jews and Gentiles—a persistent theme throughout the letter—suggests rather that the division had its roots in a Jewish Christian insistence on maintaining some of their traditional 'taboos'. Like other pious Jews in a Gentile environment (Dn. 1:8–16; Judith 12:1–4), many Jewish Christians in Rome had apparently decided to abstain from meat (and perhaps wine) for fear of contact with idolatry. (This decision may have been necessitated by their being cut off from the larger Jewish community, where 'kosher' food would have been more easily obtained.)

We should, then, assume a situation in which Jewish Christians are priding themselves on their strict piety and 'condemning' (14:3) those who do not adopt the same standard, while many Gentile Christians, finding no value in such practices, are flaunting their 'freedom' on such matters (15–22) and 'judging' (14:1) and 'looking down on' (14:3) those whom they consider to be foolishly 'weak' about asserting their freedom in Christ. Paul's own view on these matters is clear: he numbers himself among 'the strong' (15:1) and asserts that no food is unclean in itself (14:14). Significantly, Paul does not try to convince the weak that they are wrong. Rather, he urges that the strong accept their weaker brothers and sisters (14:1; 15:7) and, indeed, curtail the exercise of their freedom on these contentious matters in order to foster unity and avoid hurting the faith of the weak (14:13–22). The weak, also, are to stop condemning the strong and accept them as fellow-believers (14:3, 13; 15:7). Paul clearly feels that the issues dividing the Christians in Rome belong in the category of the adiaphora, 'things indifferent' (cf. v 1, disputable matters)—matters that are not essential to the faith and on which committed and sincere Christians may disagree. His purpose is to foster unity in the church by urging tolerance of one another on such issues. While the issues have changed, the modern church has frequently been tragically divided in the same way over non-essential matters. Without compromising on those doctrines that are essential to the gospel, we need to heed Paul's call to accept all those whom God accepts (cf. 15:1 and 14:3b).

14:1–12 Rebuke of judgmental attitudes. Paul rebukes both the strong and the weak for their judgmental attitudes (1–3), reminding them that they have no right to stand in judgment over those whom God has accepted (4–12).

The person described in this context whose faith is weak (1–2) is not necessarily one who is immature or lacking in faith in Christ in an absolute sense. Rather he is one who does not believe that his Christian faith allows him to engage in some specific practice; one who is excessively scrupulous, or 'delicate'. Nevertheless, 'weak' is somewhat pejorative, and it is obvious that this must have been the label given to this group by the strong. Coupled with the fact that Paul initially addresses the 'strong', this suggests that the 'strong' are the majority party, and the group that Paul has most in mind as he writes (cf. also 15:1). These believers are convinced that their faith allows them to eat everything, whereas the one whose faith is weak eats only vegetables (2). As v 6 indicates, the weak avoided eating meat, probably because, as Jewish Christians, they had fears about its contact with idolatry. Each group is to stop criticizing the other, recognizing that they are all fellow-servants of the same master, who alone has the right to judge them (4). It is 'before' his own master (tō idiō kyriō is probably a dative of reference), the Lord, that each believer stands or falls—i.e. perseveres or fails in faith (cf. 11:20, 22). And Paul is convinced that those whom God has accepted (3) will persevere, because it is the Lord himself who makes them stand (4).

Another issue dividing the weak from the strong was the observance of special religious days (5). Because of their Jewish background the weak were apparently continuing to observe Jewish feast days, including, probably, the Sabbath. The strong, on the other hand, saw no basis for treating one day differently from another. For Paul this is clearly another ‘disputable matter’ (1), and he therefore counsels toleration. Each believer should make up his or her own mind on these disputable matters and, whether participating or abstaining, do so ‘for the sake of the Lord’ (NIV, to the Lord; tō kuriō is a dative of advantage; cf. also vs 7–8) and with thanks to God (6). For, as Paul reminds both groups, Christians are not autonomous: their liberty must be worked out in terms of service to the Lord who has died and returned to life for them (7–9). God—not other Christians—is the one to whom all Christians are responsible and before whom we will have to answer for our behaviour. It is therefore wrong for us to stand in judgment over fellow-believers whose practices on disputable matters may disagree with ours (10–12).

Note. 11 Paul also quotes Is. 45:23 in Phil. 2:10–11. There, however, it is before the Lord Jesus that every knee bows, while here the ‘Lord’ before whom one bows is probably God.

14:13–23 The limits of liberty. After a further appeal to both groups to stop passing judgment on one another, Paul turns to the strong in faith, urging them not to put any stumbling-block or obstacle (13) in the way of the weaker brother. This is the central point of the section, with vs 14–21 elaborating and explaining this command. Vs 22–23 then deal more generally with both groups again.

The strong are creating for the weak a situation for sin [stumbling-block and obstacle; cf. 9:33 (Is. 8:16)] by continuing to eat food that the weak consider ‘unclean’. Paul himself forcefully asserts his conviction that no food is unclean in itself, thereby aligning himself with the teaching of Jesus (Mk. 7:17–19; cf. also Acts 10:9–15). Unclean (koinos) denotes ritual impurity (Heb. ṭāmē; e.g. Lv. 11:4–8). Paul understands, and wishes that all the Christians in Rome would understand, that Christ’s coming has meant that the Jewish laws about ritual purity no longer apply. But he recognizes that Jewish Christians may have difficulty in discarding a lifetime of teaching and habit, and so he reminds the strong that if anyone regards something as unclean, then for him it is unclean (14). Although Paul does not here use the word, he is clearly concerned that the ‘conscience’ of the weak believers will be violated (1 Cor. 8:7, 10) if they give in to pressure to eat food that they believe to be ‘unclean’.

This ‘eating against the conscience’ is what Paul must mean by the ‘distress’ of the weak Christian in v 15. Addressing now an individual strong believer to bring his point home (you in v 15 is singular), Paul reminds him that his eating without concern for its effect on the weaker believers is a violation of the cardinal Christian principle of love (12:9–10; 13:8–10). Moreover, by tacitly encouraging the weaker believer to eat against his or her conscience, the strong believer may destroy one for whom Christ died. The word destroy (apollymi) is a strong one, usually denoting eternal damnation (2:12; 1 Cor. 1:18; 15:18; 2 Cor. 2:15; 2 Thes. 2:10). This may be the meaning here, although, if so, Paul may not think of this eventuality literally. Or it may be that ‘destroy’ is used in a weaker sense here: ‘cause spiritual damage to’.

A second reason for the strong to refrain from flaunting their freedom is that such behaviour, by causing distress and disunity within the community, brings the gospel into disrepute before outsiders (16–18). Unbelievers, seeing in the church disputes about eating and drinking rather than righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit (17), will not view the gospel as a good thing. The strong should therefore serve Christ by pursuing righteousness, peace and joy (in this way in v 18), avoiding behaviour that would decrease those qualities within the church. In doing so, they will be both pleasing to God and approved by men (18).

Vs 19–21 recapitulate points that Paul has made earlier in this paragraph. The strong (whom Paul is probably still addressing) are to pursue peace and mutual edification (see v 17; 1 Cor. 10:23). They are to recognize that their insistence on eating what others consider to be ‘unclean’ can lead to the destruction of the work of God, by which Paul probably means the weak brother (see vs 15, 21b) rather than the community. Those who pride themselves on the ‘strength’ of their consciences and their liberty in Christ should be the first to give up practices that might bring harm to a fellow-believer. Christian freedom is real and valuable, and nobody insisted on it more strongly than Paul (Gal. 5:1; Col. 2:16–23). But the exercise of Christian freedom, as Paul also stressed (Gal. 5:13; 1 Cor. 6:12), must always be subordinated to the needs of others. As Luther’s famous dictum has it, ‘A Christian man is a most free lord of all, subject to none. A Christian man is a most dutiful servant of all, subject to all.’

Paul rounds off his appeal to the strong by recommending that they keep to themselves what they believe about food, special days and drink. There is no need for them either to eat meat in front of those who might be spiritually damaged by them doing so or to refrain from eating with an arrogant insistence that there is nothing wrong with what they are doing. The strong believer should be content with recognizing that it is a real blessing to know that what he approves on these matters is not something for which he need condemn himself. Nevertheless, there are those who are not able to approve of the exercise of liberty on these matters. It would be sin for them to do what their consciences are telling them not to do. While the eating of meat may not be sin in God’s eyes (14), doing something that does not come from faith (23) is.

15:1–13 Final call to unity. The conclusion to Paul’s plea for tolerance in the Roman church falls into four parts: a final call to the strong (1–4); a prayer for unity among all the Christians in Rome (5–6); a last plea (with scriptural backing) to both weak and strong (7–12); and a concluding prayer (13).

Vs 1–4 are closely related to 14:13–23, as Paul, using the word for the first time, urges the strong (dynatoi) to bear with the failings of the weak. The use of the first person plural (we) shows that Paul numbers himself among the strong (see 14:14). The language of ‘bearing with’ (bastazein) suggests that the strong are to do more than simply tolerate the weak—they should help them in an attitude of love (see Gal. 6:2). This is confirmed by vs 2–3, which develop Paul’s warning not to please ourselves at the end of v 1. The encouragement to please the neighbour reminds us of the love command (13:9; Lv. 19:18), and the allusion to Christ of sacrificial giving to benefit others. The quotation in v 3b comes from a Psalm (69) that NT writers frequently apply to Jesus’ sufferings (see Mk. 15:23, 36 and parallels; Jn. 2:17; 15:25; 19:28–29; Acts 1:20). Paul’s reminder in v 4 about the continuing relevance of what was written in the past has the immediate purpose of justifying the quotation in v 3 but is also true as a general principle.

What Paul is calling the Christians to do, he asks God to supply—a typical instance of the divine—human interplay involved in Christian living. Paul prays to the God who gives the endurance and encouragement (5) he has just mentioned as the purpose of the teaching of Scripture. It is not clear whether the spirit of unity (5) (lit. ‘thinking the same thing among one another’) means agreement between the strong and the weak on the matters that divide them or, more likely, a mutual acceptance and respect in the midst of diverse viewpoints. The NIV takes kata Christon Iēsoun (‘according to Christ Jesus’) to mean the Christian imitation of Christ’s example; but the phrase could also signify ‘according to the will of Christ Jesus’ (see 2 Cor. 11:17). The purpose of this unity, in any case, is clear: that all the Christians in Rome might be able to join their hearts and voices in fervent worship of God. Disunity among Christians not only damages our own walk with God and our reputation with outsiders: it also damages our ability to give God the glory he deserves.

V 7 is the climax of 14:1–15:13. Here we find Paul’s basic plea to the Roman church (accept one another), the most important basis for that plea (Christ accepted you), and the highest purpose of that plea (in order to bring praise to God). Paul now adds a further reason for this mutual acceptance: Christ’s ministry as one that incorporates both Jews (8) and Gentiles (9–12). Jesus’ serving of (lit.) ‘the circumcision’ (the NIV legitimately translates Jews) is, Paul implies, a ministry that is rooted in the past but by no means ended (suggested by the perfect tense of the verb gegenēsthai). Thus Paul reminds the Gentiles that Christ continues to be concerned about and reach out to Jews (see 11:1–2, 28–29). Christ’s ministry to Jews, however, has a larger purpose: it is for the sake of God’s faithfulness to his promises (NIV, on behalf of God’s truth; alētheia here means ‘faithfulness’ [see also 3:4 and 7]). These promises, made to the patriarchs, included the blessing of ‘all the nations’ (4:16–17). Therefore, when those promises are confirmed, the result (9) is that Gentiles are able to join with Jews in glorifying God for his mercy. This being the case, the Jewish Christians must recognize that the incorporation of Gentiles into the people of God is part of God’s plan and try to get along with their fellow Gentile Christians.

The quotations in vs 9b–12 emphasize Paul’s inclusion of the Gentiles in God’s people. The words of Ps 18:49 (quoted from 2 Sa. 22:50), quoted in v 9b, are probably understood by Paul as the words of the Messiah: it is foretold that Gentiles will surround the Messiah as he brings praise to God. The presence of Gentiles in the Messianic community is also predicted by Scripture when it speaks of them rejoicing in God along with Israel (10; Dt. 32:43), singing praise to the Lord (11; Ps. 117:1), and putting their hope in the Messiah, the Root of Jesse (12; Is. 11:10).

V 13 seems almost isolated from the preceding context, but Paul’s prayer-wish, as such third-person prayers may be called, that the believers in Rome might be characterized by joy and peace is most relevant after what he has just been saying (see 14:17, 19). Likewise, the emphasis on hope (see also v 4) makes sense as the conclusion to a discussion that has called into question the present state of the church and urged its members to take difficult steps to improve that state.

15:14–16:27 The letter closing

Romans concludes with those features typical of the closing sections of Paul’s letters: a sketch of travel plans (15:22–29); a prayer request (15:30–32); a peace wish (15:33); commendations and greetings (16:1–15, 16b); the holy kiss (16:16a); final greetings from co-workers and concluding grace and benediction (16:20–27). What distinguishes the closing section of Romans from those of Paul’s other letters is the much longer space devoted to many of these matters and the addition of a section in which Paul explains his reasons for writing (15:14–21). Both differences are the result of Paul’s lack of prior involvement with the church at Rome. Though having a legitimate claim to exercise a certain authority over the church at Rome by virtue of his calling to be an apostle to the Gentiles (1:1, 5–7; 15:16), Paul wants to guard against being perceived as a heavy-handed interloper.

15:14–33 Paul’s ministry and plans

This section may be divided into four parts: an explanation of the letter's purposes and circumstances (14–21); a sketch of Paul's immediate travel plans (22–29); a request for prayer concerning the collection for the Jerusalem Christians (30–32); and a wish for peace (33). There are many similarities to 1:8–15, demonstrating that Paul is consciously rounding off his letter by ending where he began.

In keeping with his desire to establish good relations with the Christians in Rome, Paul makes clear that he has written not because he finds some grievous problem in the church there. He commends the Roman believers for their goodness and their knowledge (14) (e.g. understanding of the Christian faith), noting that they themselves have the ability to instruct [or 'admonish'] one another (14) (cf. 1:8b). Paul almost apologizes for writing as he has (quite boldly) and stresses that what he has said has been no more than a reminder. This commendation is not simple flattery; Paul would not have said what he has in these verses unless he believed that the Roman church was basically solid and stable. Nevertheless, Paul knows that even the most mature church needs reminders of the truth of the gospel. And the pleas of 12:1–15:13 (and especially 11:12–27; 14:1–15:13) demonstrate that the church had its problems. While wanting to avoid any hint of condescension or authoritarianism, Paul is nevertheless insistent that his authority as a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles (16) extends to the Romans (see 1:5–6). Paul describes his ministry with the help of cultic language. Minister translates a word that often refers to a priest (leitourgos; cf. Ne. 10:39; Is. 61:6; Heb. 8:2), and its priestly significance here is confirmed by what follows, in which Paul describes his proclamation of the gospel as a priestly duty and his Gentile converts as an offering. As do other NT authors (see especially 1 Pet. 2:4–10), Paul hints that the OT cult, with its priests, sacrifices and tabernacle or temple, finds its fulfilment in the ministry of the gospel (and note 12:1).

It is right, then, for Paul to glory (or 'boast') in this ministry, for it originates in God's grace (15b) and is a matter of Christ working through the apostle (18). This working of Christ in Paul has the purpose of bringing Gentiles to obey God (cf. 1:5) and what Paul says and does is accompanied by power: the power of miraculous signs ('signs and wonders'; cf. Acts 2:22, 43; 5:12; 15:12; 2 Cor. 12:12; Heb. 2:4) and the power of the Spirit himself (see 1:16a). The end of v 19 states the result of Paul's powerful, priestly and apostolic ministry: from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ. Illyricum was a Roman province that occupied the area covered roughly by what was Yugoslavia and Albania. Jerusalem was the point of departure for the Christian mission, while Illyricum was the farthest extent of Paul's preaching to date. A line drawn from one to another forms an arc, and hence Paul's language all the way around (lit. 'in a circle'). Paul is saying that he has planted strong, centrally located churches throughout this north-eastern part of the Mediterranean basin. He has therefore 'fulfilled' (plēroō; NIV 'fully proclaimed') his gospel commission in those areas, for his task was to preach the gospel where Christ was not known (20). The OT quotation that Paul uses to confirm this mission (21) is from the servant songs of Isaiah (52:15), but it is unlikely that Paul saw himself in the role of the servant.

Paul turns from the past to the present and the future. His obligation to fulfil his mission in the east has hindered him from coming to Rome before now (22). But that mission being completed, Paul can now fulfil a long-standing desire to visit Rome (cf. 1:10–15). Yet Rome will be only a stopover on a journey to Spain (24, 28). Paul has evidently decided that the well-populated Iberian peninsula offers the perfect location to continue his pioneer evangelism. One of the reasons that Paul is stopping in Rome is to secure help from the Roman Christians for this visit. The NIV assist me on my journey (24b) translates a verb that becomes in the NT almost a ‘technical term for the Christian mission’ (Cranfield; cf. Acts 15:3; 20:38; 21:5; 1 Cor. 16:6, 11; 2 Cor. 1:16; Tit. 3:13; 3 Jn. 6). It denotes the provision of material and logistical support for Christian missionaries. One of Paul’s major reasons for writing this letter to Rome was to pave the way for this support.

Before Paul can carry out this plan, however, he has a more immediate task: to minister (diakonōn; NIV in the service of) to Christians in Jerusalem (25). This ministry, as vs 26–27 reveal, is the delivery to the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem of a gift of money collected from many of the mainly Gentile Christian churches planted by Paul. General economic conditions, made worse no doubt by the isolation from fellow-Jews caused by their Christian profession, had impoverished many of the Jewish believers in and around Jerusalem. Paul felt it to be only right for Gentile Christians to repay with material blessings the spiritual blessings (27) that they have inherited from the Jews (see 11:17–18). Collecting the money for this relief effort was a major concern on Paul’s third missionary journey (see 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 8–9). Some scholars think that Paul was particularly interested in this collection because he viewed it as the fulfilment of the OT prediction that the wealth of Gentiles would flow into Jerusalem just before the day of the Lord. But there is little evidence that this was the case. However, Paul undoubtedly saw the relief effort as a practical means of cementing closer relationships between Gentile and Jewish Christians.

It is perhaps in the light of this purpose that Paul requests the Roman Christians’ prayers for the success of the collection (30–32). Paul suggests the need for earnest and fervent prayer on this matter by asking them to ‘strive together with me in your prayers’ (RSV). (Viewing the ‘striving together’ [synagōnizomai, used only here in the Greek Bible] as taking place ‘in prayer’ is preferable to the separation between the two suggested by the NIV.) Paul asks them to pray specifically for two things: that he might be rescued from the unbelievers in Judea and that the collection might be acceptable to the saints there. Paul knows of the Jewish hostility towards his bold and public stand in favour of admitting Gentiles into the people of God without imposing on them circumcision or the law of Moses. Many of the more radical Jews in his day (and they were growing in number at this time) would have considered such a stand as nothing less than treason. That Paul’s fears on this score were warranted is proved by the fact that this trip to Jerusalem resulted in his being imprisoned by the Roman authorities at the instigation of the Jews (Acts 21:27–36).

We have no certain knowledge about the fulfilment of Paul’s second prayer request. Certainly, Paul also had valid reason to fear that some of the Jewish Christians might still be so suspicious of him and so concerned to maintain relations with their fellow-Jews that they would spurn his efforts by refusing to accept the money from him and the Gentile Christians. Paul asks the Roman Christians to join with him in praying that this should not happen, so that he might be able to continue on to Rome with joy and a sense of positive accomplishment (32).

Paul’s prayer that the God of peace be with the Roman Christians (33) parallels similar requests in many of his other letters (2 Cor. 13:11; Phil. 4:9; 1 Thes. 5:23; 2 Thes. 3:16; cf. also 16:20).

Notes 19 Whether Paul means that he had preached ‘up to and into’ Illyricum or ‘up to’ Illyricum is not clear. While Acts never mentions a preaching trip of Paul into this province, some scholars think that he may have preached there just before going to Corinth at the end of the third missionary journey (where Paul is writing Romans; cf. Acts 20:2). 24 We do not know whether Paul ever achieved his goal of preaching in Spain or not. 1 Clement, a late first-century document written in Rome, claims that Paul ‘reached the limit [terma] of the west’ (5:1–7). Whether this refers to Spain or to Rome is unclear.

16:1–16 Commendation and greetings

The commendation of a fellow-Christian and greetings are typical components of Paul’s letter closings. What is untypical about this text is the unparalleled number of people whom Paul greets: twenty-seven individuals are mentioned. This, coming in a letter to a church that Paul has not visited, has led many scholars to think that this chapter was not part of Paul’s original letter to the Romans, but a separate commendatory letter, or an addition to the letter when it was sent to Ephesus. But this is unlikely (see the Introduction). Precisely because Paul has not founded the church at Rome, he is able to name perhaps all the Christians in the church that he knows, like Priscilla and Aquila (3) whom he had met in the course of his travels in the eastern Mediterranean.

In calling Phoebe a diakonos of the church in Cenchrea (a town five miles east of Corinth), Paul may mean simply that she is a Christian, called, like all Christians, to be a servant (1) of Christ and of the church (see 1 Pet. 4:10). But with the official-sounding addition of the church of Cenchrea it is more likely that Paul is identifying Phoebe as holding the office of ‘deacon’ (see Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 12; many understand 1 Tim. 3:11 as a reference to female deacons). We have no solid first-century evidence about the nature of this ministry, but, as it did at a later date, it probably focused especially on the care for poorer and weaker members of the church. Perhaps Phoebe’s secular status had something to do with her appointment to this ministry, for Paul calls her in v 2b a prostatis, a word that often denoted wealthy people who became ‘patrons’ and sponsors of people and movements (NIV paraphrases this with she has been a great help). Paul mentions Phoebe because she is going to Rome, probably carrying Paul’s letter to the church with her (2a).

Paul’s greetings do not follow an obvious sequence, but there is perhaps a movement from those whom Paul knows best and with whom he has personally worked (3–7) to those he knows less well (8–15). Priscilla and Aquila certainly belong in the former category. Paul first met them in Corinth, whence they had come because they had been forced by the edict of the Emperor Claudius to leave their home in Rome (Acts 18:2). They became fellow-workers with Paul, spending considerable time in the church at Ephesus (Acts 18:18, 26). It was perhaps here, maybe during the riot in that city (Acts 19:23–41), that they risked their lives for Paul (4). Now living in Rome again, they are continuing to minister, with one of the Roman ‘house churches’ meeting in their home (5a) Epenetus (5b), the first Christian in the Roman province of Asia (western Asia Minor), is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT; nor do we know anything of Mary (6).

Junias in v 7 should probably be rendered ‘Junia’ (ASV; NRSV). The Greek name Iounian could be a shortened form of the masculine name Junianis, but the form is poorly attested. It is more likely, then, to be a form of the feminine name Junia, which is quite common. Presumably, she was the wife of Andronicus (cf. v 3). The couple, who were Jewish [syngeneis probably means ‘fellow-Jews’ (as in 9:3) rather than ‘relatives’], came to Christ before Paul and had been in prison with him—probably because of their shared ministry of being apostles. Since we know nothing of them elsewhere, Andronicus and Junia were probably not ‘apostles’ in exactly the same way that, for instance, Paul and Peter were—divinely chosen representatives of the risen Christ with a unique authority (see, e.g. Acts 1:12–26; Eph. 2:20; 1 Cor. 15:7–9). Apostle here, rather, will have the sense ‘missionary’ or ‘accredited messenger’ (see 2 Cor. 8:23; Phil 2:25).

Ampliatius (8) is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT but may be the person whose tomb has been found in the catacomb of Domitilla, a woman of wealthy and imperial family who was, apparently, a Christian. Urbanus, Stachys (9) and Apelles (10a) are otherwise unknown. Aristobulus, however, who had Christians among his household (10b) may be the brother of Agrippa I, king of Judea from AD 41–33 (see Acts 12). Paul’s fellow-Jew (syngeneus; cf. on v 7) Herodion is probably a slave or freedman of the family of Herod, hereditary rulers of Judea. The Narcissus whose household Paul greets in v 11b may be the same Narcissus who gained fame (and notoriety) as a servant of the Emperor Claudius. Tryphena, Tryphosa and Persis, three women who laboured in the cause of Christ, are otherwise unknown. Paul greets nine women in this passage, six of whom are described as fellow-workers or as those who have worked very hard in the Lord (12). Nothing in the words Paul uses enables us to pinpoint the nature of their ministries, but we should give due recognition to the important role played by women in the varied ministries of the early church—and in ministries today also. Since the Gospel of Mark was probably written in Rome, and perhaps at about the same time as Romans, it is tempting to identify the Rufus of v 13 with the Rufus whose father carried Jesus’ cross to Golgotha (Mk. 15:21). None of the names that occur in vs 14–15 is known from elsewhere in the NT or early Christian history.

The kiss (16a) as a form of greeting, salutation or parting was widespread in the ancient world, and was adapted by the early church (1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12, 1 Thes. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14). It was to be a holy kiss, however, entirely distinct from any erotic or pagan connotations.

16:17–20 Warning about false teachers

So abrupt is Paul’s sudden warning about false teachers that some scholars think the passage does not belong here at all. But while warnings of this sort are not standard in Paul’s closing sections, they are certainly not unknown either (see 1 Cor. 16:22; Gal. 6:12–13; Phil. 3:2–21).

It is unclear whom Paul is warning the Roman Christians about. He describes them as being divisive and as putting obstacles (skandala; cf. 9:33; 11:9; 14:13) in the way of believers (17). They are ‘smooth-talkers’ and use flattery to try to deceive those who might be naive and unsuspecting (18). They have a preoccupation with their own appetites (lit. ‘their own bellies’), but even this more specific indication helps us little in pinning down who these people were. Some think it refers to a Jewish insistence on the observance of food laws (Paul ironically scolding them for putting too much stress on what goes in their bellies), others to a sensual concern with one’s own pleasures. We must be content to leave these false teachers unidentified.

Whoever they are, Paul urges the Roman Christians to watch out for them and to keep away from them (17). The latter probably does not mean that the church is to excommunicate them (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–5) but that they are to avoid their society generally. Paul reaffirms his confidence in the Roman Christians (19a; cf. 15:14–15; 1:8) but does not want them to be naive about the dangers to their faith (18b). In imitation of the advice of Jesus to the Twelve, Paul encourages the believers to be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil (19b; cf. Mt. 10:16). In doing so, they can be sure that God himself will take action against those who are seeking to deceive them: the God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet (20; this verse should be closely connected with vs 17–19, see the RSV). It may be that Paul is hinting at a quick ‘crushing’ of these false teachers, perceived as minions of Satan. But it is more likely that he is thinking of the great climax of the end times when, in fulfilment of Gn. 3:15, God will win the climactic victory over Satan. The peace (20) that God will ultimately create is the result both of deliverance of his people and of judgment of his enemies.

16:21–27 Final greetings and doxology

Paul's letter concludes with greetings from three of Paul's co-workers (21–23) and a doxology (25–27).

Timothy (21) had been a regular companion of Paul's since the beginning of the second missionary journey (Acts 16:3) and is now with Paul in Corinth. Lucius has occasionally been identified with Luke, 'the beloved physician', or with Lucius of Cyrene (Acts 13:1), but neither is likely. Jason, however, could well be the Jason who hosted Paul on his initial visit to Thessalonica (Acts 17:5–9—perhaps he has had to flee to Corinth because of persecution), while Sosipater is probably the same as the Sopater of Acts 20:4. Relatives again translates syngeneis, which refers to Paul's fellow-Jews, not to his blood relatives. Tertius (22), mentioned nowhere else in the NT, is Paul's amanuensis, or the scribe who wrote down the words Paul dictated to him. Gaius (23), in whose house one of the Corinthian Christian fellowships met, is almost certainly the Gaius mentioned in 1 Cor. 1:4, and perhaps is to be identified also with Titius Justus (Acts 18:7). Paul identifies Erastus as the city's director of public works (Gk. oikonomos tēs poleōs, raising the question whether he might be the same Erastus mentioned as an 'aedile', or 'commissioner for public works' on an inscription from first-century Corinth. But the word Paul uses is not a natural equivalent to the Latin 'aedile,' so the identification is not certain. Neither is it clear that the Erastus here is the same as the one mentioned in Acts 19:22 and 2 Tim. 4:20, since the name was a common one.

Paul's doxology, in addition to concluding the letter on a high note of ascription of glory to God, also effectively sums up some of the key themes of the letter. Paul's defence and explanation of the gospel that he preaches is, we have suggested, the central theme of the letter. Paul now reminds us that it is by means of that gospel that God 'establishes' us in our faith (25). This gospel, which proclaims Jesus Christ (the proclamation of Jesus Christ is probably an explanation of the content of the gospel), is a mystery that has only recently been revealed (25b–26a). We are reminded of Paul's emphasis on the way in which God's saving righteousness has been revealed in the cross and in the preaching of the gospel (1:17; 3:21). Made known through the prophetic writings (26) is probably parallel to 'revealed' rather than subordinate to it (as the NIV takes it): it adds a second description to the gospel in v 25, which also picks up a key theme from the letter (1:2; 3:21; ch. 4; 10:14–21). The revelation and making known of the gospel has been at the command of God himself and has the purpose that all nations (the NIV rightly takes ethnē here to mean 'nations' rather than 'Gentiles' (cf. Mt. 28:19) might believe and obey him (lit. 'obedience of faith'; cf. 1:5 and the comments on the phrase there). As we continue to pursue the accomplishment of this purpose by our preaching of the gospel, we are reminded that it is ultimately for the glory of the only wise God.

Note 24 English versions do not print a v 24, because its content is almost certainly a later addition to the text of Romans. 25–27 Most modern commentators regard the doxology in vs 25–27 as a later addition to the letter. But there is nothing un-Pauline in its vocabulary and ideas, it has solid external support in the early manuscripts and its varied placement (at the end of ch. 14 or ch. 15) could have arisen from the movement of the original Pauline conclusion when the letter was shortened.

Douglas J. Moo

1 CORINTHIANS

Introduction

Background

By the time Paul reached Corinth, in the autumn of AD 50, it had been a Roman colony for over a century. It had formerly been a Greek city with a proud history but had been destroyed by Mummius in 146 BC after conflict with Rome, and lay in ruins for 100 years. Its town plan was laid on the traditional Roman grid pattern in 44 BC after the decision of Julius Caesar to make it a Roman colony. It became the seat of the Roman governor of the province of Achaëa and soon had a population larger than that of Athens. Although founded as a 'soldier settlement', supplemented with some freedmen coming from Italy, it quickly established itself as an important centre of culture and trade. Some of the wealthy families of Greece had been attracted to Corinth and settled in the desirable residential suburb on the slopes of the enormous 1,800 foot (545 m.) outcrop known as Acrocorinth. They were among its leading civic benefactors. Inscriptions give evidence of many among the class of the wise, the well-born, and the powerful. By the beginning of the Christian era the Isthmian games had resumed under its auspices. The ports which served the colony were Lechaion and Cenchrae. The archaeological remains of the latter indicate its prosperity not only as a port but also as a satellite city, and at the time when Paul wrote his letter to the Roman Christians there was a church in existence (Rom. 16:1).

It was a city of rich culture and its citizens, as in Athens, worshipped many gods. Among them, Aphrodite is the best known. When Corinth was a Greek city this goddess was associated with love and especially temple prostitution. She had been thoroughly rehabilitated in the Roman period. She was claimed to be the mother of the imperial family; hence her presence in Roman Corinth as a venerated figure associated, as she was elsewhere, with the imperial cult. It is a gross exaggeration to say that the Corinthians' leanings towards immorality were a result of her patronage, and wrong to imply that the sexual sins of the Corinthian Christians could be explained because of her. Immorality, whether fornication, adultery or incest, was not confined to Corinth.

Paul founded the church circa AD 50, after his visit to Athens (Acts 18:1–7). It had its origins in the sermons Paul preached in the Jewish synagogue whose leader was among the early converts (Acts 18:8). Inevitably the church and synagogue clashed. The Jews attempted to institute criminal proceedings against the Christians. This failed when Gallio ruled that Christianity sat under the umbrella of Judaism (Acts 18:12–17), giving Christians the same favoured status as Jews. This was a decision with far-reaching consequences, especially for Christians who were Roman citizens with obligations to the imperial cult.

Paul underwent a period of discouragement in ministry which required the direct intervention of the Lord (Acts 18:9–11). After 18 months' work—his second longest stay in any city—he left Corinth. The work was continued by Apollos (1 Cor. 3:6), an able Jewish orator from Alexandria and more recently from Ephesus where his ministry had been greatly enhanced by Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:24–28). They had been with Paul in Corinth from the founding of the church and followed the same profession as tent-makers (Acts 18:2–3). It would seem that Peter was also in Corinth (1 Cor. 1:12).

Before writing 1 Corinthians Paul appears to have written a letter about associating with immoral people which was misunderstood by the Corinthians (1 Cor. 5:9). He himself had by this time moved to Ephesus when some from the household of Chloe brought reports of dissension in the church (1 Cor. 1:11). Others also came, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1 Cor. 16:17), bearing a letter which the Corinthians had written seeking Paul's ruling on a number of complex pastoral matters affecting the church—marriage, food offered to idols, spiritual gifts, the collection for the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem, and the request for the return of Apollos (1 Cor. 7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1; 16:1, 12).

Verbal reports also disclosed problems of divisiveness, incest, civil litigation, immorality, women prophesying unveiled in church, abuse of the Lord's supper, and the denial of the resurrection of the body (Chs. 1–4; 5; 6; 12; 15).

For a more detailed discussion of the Corinthian correspondence and a reconstruction of Paul's several visits see the Introduction to 2 Corinthians. See also Reading the letters.

1 Corinthians is the longest pastoral document in the NT and gives important clues as to how difficult pastoral issues should be handled. It also provides crucial answers to critical problems which one way or another still haunt the church today.

Further reading

- D. Prior, The Message of 1 Corinthians, BST (IVP, 1985).
- D. A. Carson, Showing the Spirit: A Theological Exposition of 1 Corinthians 12–14 (Baker Book House, 1987).
- D. A. Carson, The Cross and Christian Ministry: An Exposition of Passages from 1 Corinthians (IVP/UK/Baker Book House, 1993).
- L. Morris, The First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1985).
- G. D. Fee, The First Epistle to the Corinthians, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1987)

Outline of contents

1:1–3

Authors and recipients

1:4–4:21

Christian approach to ministry in the church

1:4–9

Thanksgiving for Christ's total sufficiency

1:10–17a

The divisiveness of idolizing Christian teachers

1:17b–2:5	Boasting in the Lord and not in the educated elite
2:6–16	Wisdom revealed by the Spirit
3:1–23	The Corinthians' ongoing problem
4:1–5	Ministry and criticism
4:6–13	Ministry and status
4:14–17	Paul the apostle as their father
4:18–21	The options facing the Corinthians

5:1–6:20

Moral issues

5:1–8	Immorality and the church's legitimate sphere of discipline
5:9–13	The church's sphere of judgment
6:1–8	Lawsuits among members
6:9–20	Against Christian libertarianism

7:1–40

Marriage problems

7:1–6	To the married
7:6–7	The gift of singleness and marriage
7:8–9	Those without marriage partners

7:10–11	To the married
7:12–16	The options with an unbelieving partner
7:17–24	God's personal calling
7:25–38	To marry now or to wait
7:39–40	The widow

8:1–11:1

Gospel obligations in a pluralistic world

8:1–13	Meat sacrificed to idols
9:1–14	Rights and ministry
9:15–23	Paul's free gospel
9:24–10:13	Running and not falling
10:14–11:1	Idol feasts and the Lord's Supper

11:2–14:40

Orderly church life

11:2–16	Covering the head in worship
11:17–34	The problems in the Lord's Supper
12:1–13	There is only one Holy Spirit
12:14–31	There is only one body of believers
13:1–13	Gifts exercised in the context of committed relationships
14:1–19	Prophecies, tongues and the church

14:20–25	Prophecies, tongues and unbelievers
14:26–36	In a fitting and orderly way
14:37–40	Warnings and conclusions

15:1–58

The resurrection of the Christian’s body

15:1–11	The gospel and the certainty of Christ’s resurrection
15:12–34	Christ’s resurrection and our resurrection
15:35–44	Analogies of seeds and bodies
15:45–49	Analogy of Adam and Christ
15:50–57	Assurance of victory
15:58	Concluding instructions

16:1–24

Other business

16:1–4	Arranging the collection
16:5–9	Paul’s travel arrangements
16:10–11	Timothy’s proposed visit
16:12–14	The return of Apollos
16:15–18	The godly example of the household of Stephanas
16:19–22	Final greetings

Commentary

1:1–3 Authors and recipients

Letter-writers in Paul's day began by mentioning first the author and then those to whom they were writing. Paul refers to himself and his qualifications for writing—he is not a self-styled teacher nor self-appointed Christian worker, but one who has been commissioned for God's purposes to be Christ's missionary and mouthpiece. The letter is 'co-authored' by Sosthenes (1) who is described as 'our brother'. The inclusion of Sosthenes demonstrates Paul's concept of joint partnership in apostolic ministry. Paul was no 'prima donna' and never calls those who share in his work 'followers' or 'disciples' but rather colleagues—'fellow workers'. Nor is the church 'his' although he was the founding apostle—it is God's gathering, it belongs to him (2).

Its status is determined by the work of Christ who made its members holy. As a result they are a particular class of people, 'saints'. The term 'class' is used to describe them. It was also the term used to describe the secular classes in class-conscious Corinth (the verb 'to be' is not in the Greek text). Their status as 'holy ones' or 'saints' is given not because of their holy deeds—in fact, some have engaged in unholy ones (5:1; 6:1, 16; 8:10; 10:8, etc). It is acquired solely because of what Christ has done, (cf. 1:30). Paul does not simply stress their status—secular Corinthians were arrogant and considered themselves superior because they lived in the capital of Achaea—but rather their common spiritual origin with every person in the world who calls upon the name of 'our Lord Jesus' for salvation (Rom. 10:13). Christ is both 'their Lord and ours'. 3 To the normal secular greeting of peace or 'health', Paul adds grace which is something given as a gift and not earned (Rom. 6:23). These blessings are real indeed, for they proceed from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. 8:6).

1:4–4:21 Christian approach to ministry in the church

1:4–9 Thanksgiving for Christ's total sufficiency

In the thanksgiving sections, Paul often signals the issues he needs to deal with later in his letters. He can always give thanks because God's sufficiency is able to resolve all our needs in the person of his Son.

Here he alludes to the problem of inferiority felt in this Roman colony by the non-elite. Many Christians belonged to that group. He mentions specifically the highly-polished art of speaking, i.e. rhetoric (logos), and the possession of knowledge. These were the tools used by the educated public speaker and teacher, but were they crucial for bearing Christian witness and for being teachers and preachers in Christian gatherings? The Corinthians' traditional love of oratory ('even amongst women and children', Dio Chrysostom Or. 37) also explains one reason why some in the church had asked for the return of Apollos in preference to Paul. The former clearly used his training in rhetoric for preaching (1 Cor. 16:12; Acts 18:24–28). This is one of the major issues in the letter. In each of these verses Paul mentions Jesus Christ. The people of God are significant because everything they are and will be is a result of what God has done for them in the person of his Son (cf. 1:30), and not as a result of secular status, privileges or achievements.

4 His reason for thanking God constantly is to acknowledge the grace which God has given the Corinthians in Christ Jesus. 5 This has resulted in the enrichment of every aspect of their lives. Paul singles out an area crucial to Christian evangelism, preaching and teaching: in all your speaking and in all your knowledge. These were gifts bequeathed to them by Christ. 7 As a result they are not deficient in any of the gifts necessary for the ministry they perform, as they wait, not for the ending of their lives by an inevitable event, but for the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ. This expectation of the second coming represents a radical change in their world view which previously saw the history of mankind continuing for ever in an indestructible world. 8 In a society where the non-elite were judged to be socially and politically insignificant, Paul gives emphasis to the truth that Christ will keep them strong so that they will be blameless on the day of our Lord—an OT expression referring to the day of judgment. 9 Of themselves this is impossible, but the God who has called them into the fellowship of his Son is absolutely trustworthy, for he cannot fail to keep his promises. Therefore none of God's children should be paralysed in Christian service because of an inward feeling of inferiority or inadequacy, but should look to Christ who is all-sufficient for their needs.

1:10–17a The divisiveness of idolizing Christian teachers

The pupils or 'disciples' of a secular teacher had to give exclusive loyalty to him. Traditionally they engaged in quarrels with rival pupils over the merits of their mentors who were also by tradition jealous of each other. Corinthians who were converted and baptized through the ministry of Paul, Apollos and Peter also perceived themselves in this secular way as their exclusive followers and likewise engaged in quarrels over the merits of Christian teachers. Paul declares such loyalty as idolatrous. He wants them to follow the Messiah and not his servants. Idolizing teachers or 'charismatic' speakers who seek the loyalty of 'their' members has always been divisive and disastrous for the Christian community.

Paul's appeal for unity over against their perception of the role of Christian teachers—he never uses the secular term 'leaders' which always implied a superiority of status—is based on the name of our Lord Jesus whom they invoked for salvation (1:2). It is not an appeal which seeks unity on the lowest common denominator, but an urgent call that all of you agree with one another (10). The prohibitions against divisions and the demand for Christians to be perfectly united in mind and thought urge them to understand God's mind on this issue. Paul carefully argues this in 1:10–4:21.

12 Paul makes the charge absolutely clear, What I mean is this, that lit. 'each one is saying'—'I am of ...', i.e. 'I belong to ...'. After some declared their loyalty to prominent teachers in the church, others appear to have set themselves up as Christ's party. 13 Christ can never be the exclusive property of one group in a church (cf. 1:2), hence Is Christ divided? The church, since it is Christ's body, cannot be divided. Such expressions of loyalty to Paul and others are seen by him as usurping the place of Christ. Just as religious objects found in Corinth were inscribed, 'I belong to Aphrodite', 'I belong to Demeter', so these misguided expressions of exclusive loyalty are idolatrous—they imply that Paul was the mediator of their salvation. Their entry into God's kingdom, expressed in baptism, was not in the name of the evangelist who preached to them. Their expressions of loyalty to teachers replaced the commitment and loyalty Christians must give to Christ alone. It could not be said that Christian baptism established membership in the 'Paul party' or indicated any special relationship with him for he had baptized very few of them (14–16). 17a He explains that his apostolic calling was not to baptize but to preach and then proceeds to give reasons in the following section why he renounced the use of the methods of professional public speakers.

1:17b–2:5 Boasting in the Lord and not in the educated elite

A first-century orator or public speaker was expected to produce carefully crafted speeches which drew attention to his skilful use of rhetorical conventions. Oratory was called ‘magic’ because it was seen to bewitch the hearers. The content of the speech was immaterial, only the performance mattered. They spoke to gain the adulation of their audiences. 17b Paul used none of the orator’s tricks of the trade, for he did not preach with words of human wisdom, lit. ‘by means of the wisdom of rhetoric’. To have adopted the secular convention would have promoted the speaker on whose performance the audience sat in judgment. This would have diverted their attention away from the cross to Paul himself, thus robbing the hearers of the opportunity to hear about the amazing event by which God rescues people. This authoritative message is called the gospel and has as its content the cross of Christ. Christ sent him to preach the gospel and not to secure a personal following.

18 In a possible play on words, Paul calls the gospel the message, lit. ‘the oratory’ (logos) of the cross. He argues that the response to its preaching is twofold. It is regarded as absurd by some (cf. Acts 26:24), but for others it was the powerful means by which they became the people of God. In vs 18–31 scriptural quotations begin and end his argument (Is. 29:14 and Je. 9:24). The first (19), promises that God will overthrow and bring to nothing the admired wisdom and intelligence of the wise; the second (31), renounces the boasting of the educated, wealthy and powerful elite and demands that those who boast must boast only in the Lord.

Paul states that the admired rhetoric and theological reflection of his day failed because it could not bring people to know God, (20–25). 20 Neither the wise man, i.e. the philosopher, nor the [Jewish] scholar or ‘scribe’, nor lit. ‘the debator of this age’, i.e. the orator, all of whom in their day epitomized education, taught the wisdom of God. In contrast their wisdom was foolishness. 21 In spite of the highly sophisticated discussion of natural theology by the Stoics and Epicureans on ‘the nature of the gods’, that intellectual world did not know God. God’s purpose was achieved through what was regarded as foolish, i.e. what Paul preached, so as to save those who put their trust in that message. 23 A crucified Messiah defied all Jewish expectations, and was dismissed as absurd by the Gentile world. 24 Both God’s wisdom and his power are located in Christ. 25 While this may be designated as a foolish and weak way by men, God is wiser and stronger than they are.

26–31 Paul calls on the Corinthians to reflect upon the secular status or class of those whom God has chosen to demonstrate the nature of God’s wisdom. The elite of the first century were described as wise, influential in the political sphere and well-born. Of these, not many were called by God (26). God chose the foolish in contrast to the wise, the weak in preference to the powerful, and those whom secular society regarded as ‘nobodies’ as opposed to those who were courted as important (27–28). God’s purpose in doing this is to prevent any boasting in secular status (29–30). It is all a matter of divine favour (because of him) for all that is needed is to be found in Christ Jesus, as Paul has stressed in his thanksgiving (1:4–7). For Paul and for all Christians, wisdom, righteousness, holiness and redemption are located in Christ. Thus the injunction of Je. 9:24 which spoke against the elite of his day is appropriately cited since neither the wise, the powerful nor the well-born can boast of anything except in the Lord (31).

1–5 Paul’s early ministry. Now comes an illustration of the insufficiency of secular rhetoric and wisdom. ‘And I’, in the original text links this passage with the last statement about boasting only in the Lord (1:31). Vs 1–2 and 3–4 both begin with ‘and I’ and describe Paul’s activities, in this case, his original entry to Corinth. Orators followed certain well-established conventions when they entered a city. They were expected to give flowery speeches in praise of the city and their own personal achievements. They did this in order to establish their reputation and reap financial rewards as political orators and teachers of the rich. Paul makes it clear in vs 1–2 that he rejected the entry conventions which displayed classical eloquence or wisdom as he proclaimed the testimony about God which was to Jesus Christ and him crucified. He had resolved what the content of his message would be before arriving. 3–4 He describes in negative terms what the orators called ‘presence’. He cut no charismatic figure for he was there in weakness and fear and with much trembling and his message (better ‘oratory’) and preaching were not undertaken by means of the persuasive techniques of orators by acting out a part, playing on the audience’s feelings and with classical demonstrations recommended in the handbooks on rhetoric. Instead of using one of the demonstration techniques recommended by Aristotle, his message was accompanied by the Spirit’s power. 5 This was because he wanted the Corinthians’ faith to rest in the power of God and not the eloquence of the speaker. Paul was no silver-tongued orator who persuaded the Corinthians to become Christians. He differed from the ‘media’ orators in that he did not adapt the content of his message to fit the methods of persuasion so prevalent in Corinth, for God had rejected the debaters of this age (1:20).

2:6–16 Wisdom revealed by the Spirit

Divine wisdom is contrasted with the admired wisdom of the ruling class. God has been pleased to reveal his wisdom through his Spirit to the apostles, to us, (10). The we referred to in vs 6, 7, 13, and 16 does not refer to the Corinthian Christians whose behaviour, as recorded in this letter, shows that they are not those who have the mind of Christ (16, cf. 5:1, 6:1, 11:1). Nor does it refer to Christians in general but rather to the unique ministry of the apostles.

6–8 Paul states that he speaks not only the gospel but also the wisdom of God. It is being spoken among the mature. The much-admired virtuoso orators of Paul’s day used this term of themselves and claimed to make their pupils the same. They were to be the future rulers of cities and states. Paul may well have this in mind, when he says what his wisdom is not—it is not the wisdom of this age, nor of the rulers of a world that is passing away. He then defines what it is (7). It is God’s secret wisdom which was formerly hidden but has now been revealed, and which was destined for our glory before time began. In spite of their sophisticated education, the rulers of this age never understood it, otherwise they would not have been party to the crucifixion of Jesus who is here called the Lord of glory (cf. Acts 13:27).

9 Is. 64:4 is cited because it draws attention to the totally unexpected grace God bestows on those who love him. 10a The Isaiah verse is not a reference to what we will discover in the future by way of God’s individual purposes for his people, nor to unanticipated gifts, because Paul uses the past tense when he states but God has revealed it to us, the apostles, through the activity of the Holy Spirit (cf. 1 Pet. 1:12). 10b–11 Just as each person alone knows what he actually thinks, so too only God’s Spirit knows the thoughts of God. 12 The apostles do not think in secular ways, for they have received this selfsame Spirit in order that they may understand what God has so generously bestowed upon us in his Son. 13 The apostles do not use secular wisdom to convey their truth, but rather words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words. They did not resort to the rhetorical techniques used by the orators.

14–15 The person without the Spirit, lit. the ‘natural person’, rejects what the Spirit teaches because it requires spiritual examination. On the other hand the spiritual man interrogates all things, i.e. what the Spirit teaches. If the reference here is to the apostles, then it is clear why Paul says that the spiritual person is examined by no-one. If it refers to the spiritually-minded Christian then it could mean that he neither stands nor falls by the judgment of men but only as he is examined by the word of God. 16 Paul cites Isaiah 40:13 which asks whether anyone understands the Lord's mind that he can give instruction to him. He affirms that the apostles have the mind of Christ who is the Lord. Does this mean that Paul is dismissive of those Corinthians who would examine and pass judgment on him (cf. 4:3)?

The passage has dealt with the fact that God is a 'speaking' God (cf. Dt. 4:33–36) who has chosen to disclose his heart and mind through his servants, the apostles. Attributing the words of the apostles 'we do speak' and 'we speak' (both in the present tense, vs 6, 13) to the wisdom of God which has been revealed, points to the fact that the apostles spoke the word of God—which is why the church historically has held the view that what the apostles said is what God says.

3:1–23 The Corinthians' ongoing problem

Just as Paul illustrated his discussion of 1:10–31 about boasting in the Lord by referring to his own coming to Corinth, so too in 3:1–23. He discusses the original and continuing problems of the Corinthian Christians in relation to divisiveness (1–9), the role of the founding apostle and the present care needed to build the church because of future judgment (10–17), concluding with a correction of their misunderstanding of the relationship of teachers to the people of God, (18–23).

1 As in 2:1 and 2:3 Paul begins with another 'and I' in order to discuss further his experiences in Corinth. When he first arrived he could not address them as spiritual but only as worldly and 'infant believers'. 2 Their condition was determined by their diet then, as it still is. 3 That they are still worldly is clear from the presence of jealousy and quarrelling over teachers. Are you not acting like mere men? is lit. 'walking according to man' i.e. guided by secular norms. 4 When they cling exclusively to leaders, be they Paul or Apollos, he again asks, Are you not mere men? Worldliness in this instance proceeds from secular thinking about Christian ministry. 5 The citizens of Corinth reflected their secular world in evaluating people in terms of their privileges, status and wealth—Paul asks if this is not also what the Christians were doing. He uses low status terms to describe Apollos and himself as servants, through whom you came to believe. They could not claim personal credit because the Lord had assigned to each his task. 6 In an elitist Roman colony that despised manual labourers, Paul designates both Apollos and himself as gardeners with different duties. 8 The planter and the waterer have a single purpose, they are not in competition, and each will be rewarded on the basis of his own work. 9 They are God's fellow workers, just as the Corinthians are God's field, and God's building. In the same way that Corinth's magnificent buildings had the benefactor's name inscribed on them, the Corinthians are God's edifice. There is no such thing as 'my converts' and neither do Christians 'belong' to a particular Christian teacher or evangelist.

10 By God's grace Paul is the founding apostle or architect of the church. Subsequent teachers continue to erect the edifice and need to do so with great care. 11–12 Jesus Christ is the only foundation. Building materials can either be of a temporary or lasting kind (though gold, silver and precious stones are not normally used except to adorn the building). 13 Dishonest builders existed in the first century, but there will be the Day of judgment when the facts come to light and the fire tests the materials which have been used. 15 The dishonest builders will see all their work go up in flames, and they themselves will emerge singed. Their salvation is not in question, but their God-given role in the church has been thoroughly discredited by their own activities. 16 In addition to the analogy Paul has used in v 9, he describes the people of God as his sanctuary in which the Spirit dwells.

18 The Corinthians have been self-deceived about wisdom. Paul invites those who are the acknowledged 'wise' or 'educated elite' among the Christians to recognize their ignorance so that they may become wise. 19–20 The reason for this is given and backed up by citations from Jb. 5:13 and Ps. 94:11. 21 So then draws out the implications for the Corinthians of his discussion up to this point: one should not boast about men. All things belong to them, if Christ has enriched them in every way (cf. 1:4–7). 22 The Christian community does not belong to individual teachers, but the teachers belong to the community. They were each saying, ‘I belong to ...’, but Paul says, ‘Paul and Apollos and Peter all belong to you.’ Everything in life belongs to them, including the present and future. 23 They belong not to the teachers, but to the Messiah who belongs to God. Paul never says this is ‘my church’ even though he is the founding apostle.

4:1–5 Ministry and criticism

1 Paul uses two highly appropriate terms to describe the role of teachers in the church—servants, lit. ‘employees’, and those entrusted, lit. ‘stewards’. The first carries with it the sense of personal answerability to Christ in whose service the person is engaged. The second refers to the lynch-pin activity of the crucial servant in a household whose task it was to transfer the resources of the owner to the members of his household according to their needs. What Paul has been entrusted with are the secret things of God, i.e. the wisdom of God referred to in the previous chapter. He is a transferer of truth. 2 Certain qualities were sought in secular stewards. In the Christian context it is trustworthiness that is demanded—the record of untrustworthiness in the secular world is well documented. 3a Paul cares little for the judgment of others, be they from the Christian community or from any human court (cf. 2:1–5 and Acts 17:19–34, where judgments were passed on public speakers). 3b–5 Although he knows of no inappropriate conduct in his Christian ministry, Paul is emphatic that it is the Lord who is his judge, and concludes with the command that they are to judge nothing before the time, i.e. the Day of the Lord. It is Christ who will expose attempts to cover up misdeeds and will judge not merely actions but motivation. It is at that time that each will receive his praise, i.e. his commendation, from God. As 2 Cor. 10:10–13 shows, the Corinthians were slow to learn that lesson; the church subsequently has not done any better.

4:6–13 Ministry and status

The connection with 4:1–5 is clear. The congregation’s comparisons of Paul and Apollos (a judgment made prematurely) have a direct bearing on the future of the ministries of both men in Corinth (see the discussion on 16:12 which shows that the congregation had written asking specifically for the return of Apollos to Corinth). 6a I have applied these things refers to the literary device called a ‘covert allusion’ which was used to refer to a person or situation indirectly and was a form of irony. Paul employs that device here, using irony to great effect, although as the discussion unfolds there is in fact nothing covert about his intentions. He uses this device so that the congregation should learn the meaning of the saying Do not go beyond what is written. This refers to the OT Scriptures, to which Paul often refers in chs. 1–4. The conduct of the Christian church was bound by the Scriptures. Certainly that is the case in Paul’s indictment of the Corinthians, for Scripture has played a decisive role in Paul’s assessment of the Christians who idolized secular wisdom and oratory. Paul is about to redress their conduct by pricking their consciences into a change of thinking and conduct. 6b What they have been doing is now clearly spelt out, for each has been taking pride in one teacher at the expense of the other. 7 By asking three intimidating questions, he teaches them to avoid unscriptural conduct. The first relates to 1:30 where God’s work in Christ is what makes them who they are. The second relates to the thanksgiving section in 1:4–9, where they have been reminded that they have been enriched in every way in Christ, and especially with respect to the abundance of the gifts they have been given. The third explains why their boasting is totally inappropriate, for their gifts were not self-generated nor did they arise from privilege or status, even though their boasting would suggest that they did.

After these questions, which should effectively eliminate all boasting by Christians, comes Paul's use of irony in vs 8–13. Here Paul draws contrasts between the Corinthian Christians and the apostles. 8 Orators and those of the upper social strata boasted about their self-sufficiency secured through their wealth and their political power which enabled them to live as liberated people (see Philo, The Worse overcomes the Better 32–34). Paul declares ironically that the Christians are also behaving thus and that without us. He only wished they were kings so that he could be a king as well. 9 That is not the case for God has placed the apostles in a position of ignominy—like captured slaves who made up the end of the procession in Roman victory parades before they were slaughtered. Apostles were not only a spectacle before men but before the whole unseen world. 10 Paul now compares the 'social' status descriptions of the not many referred to in 1:26 with the Corinthian Christians, and the social status of the many whom God chose (1:27–28) with that of the apostles. 11 Even to this point they have been meted out the same treatment as prisoners of war. 12–13 While the social class boasted that they had never worked with their hands, Paul had (cf. 9:6). The apostles' response to the ignominy heaped upon them has been to endure it, and even to reply with blessing when abused.

4:14–17 Paul the apostle as their father

Just as the secular authorities of the Roman colony of Corinth recorded on inscriptions that Julius Caesar was its founding father, and recognized the jurisdiction of the present emperor by attributing the same title to him, so too Paul uses the image of the founding father of the Christian community to commend imitation of himself. 14 To be the recipient of criticism in such a culture was deeply shameful. Paul assures the Corinthians his aim is not to humiliate, but rather to warn them as my dear children. 15 Rich Corinthians had servants, guardians, who accompanied young sons to school and looked after them. Paul assures the Christians that they too have many such protectors, but it cannot be said they have many fathers. Paul declares that he himself has the relationship of a father to them because in Christ he had brought them into being through the gospel. 16 On this basis he encourages them to become imitators of him. This imitation should not be like that of the disciples of teachers, who imitated the way they dressed, walked and taught, but rather that of bearing ignominy on behalf of the message of the cross. 17 Timothy, Paul's faithful colleague and dear son, is coming to remind them of Paul's way of life in Christ Jesus which he teaches everywhere in every church. Paul did not merely teach the nature of true discipleship, but was able to put life and doctrine together and expected all Christians to imitate him.

4:18–21 The options facing the Corinthians

The kingdom of God is not an armchair philosophy, but is about power—power to change (cf. 6:9–11). The choice is theirs (21). Either they repent of their conduct which would enable Paul to come in a spirit of love and gentleness, or he will come like the secular governor did with his lictors who bore the rods as signs of their authority to inflict punishment.

In this long section, 1:4–4:21, Paul has dealt with the issue of the Christian’s right attitude to ministry. This must be perceived as gospel-oriented ministry and not some form of Christian leadership which simply replicated secular models and apparently commended itself to the culturally conscious Corinthian Christians. Paul does not use the term ‘leader’ because of its elitist and political connotations which were totally out of keeping with Christian ministry. He had no clients or followers like the secular patrons. The church had failed to perceive and benefit from the ministry Christ ordained for the church and the world, and as a result their corporate Christian life had deteriorated. It was first on his agenda for very good reasons. Much depended on their developing maturity in this matter but they were slow to do so. Throughout the history of the church these problems have frequently recurred.

5:1–6:20 Moral issues

5:1–8 Immorality and the church’s legitimate sphere of discipline

The first report was of divisions (1:11), the second relates to incest (5:1). It is sometimes thought that the immorality committed by this member of the church was endorsed by other Christians. That is only an assumption. The text does not say that the members were boasting because of his immorality. It would seem that the person who committed this sin was someone of high status and it was that which earned the applause of other Christians and not his gross immorality. Under Roman law this person was liable to banishment from this prestigious Roman colony for such conduct if he were brought to court. As no public prosecution service existed, a private prosecution would be required. Such legal proceedings could only be undertaken by a person of equal or higher status. Society and the church often turn a blind eye to the ‘indiscretions’ of socially powerful members but for the church this has always meant great spiritual loss.

1 The crime is incest with his father’s wife. The term has is a common euphemism for sexual intercourse (cf. 7:2 and discussion). It may or may not be his natural mother—it could be a stepmother. Roman law was intolerant of such conduct, as were other legal codes (cf. Dt. 22:30). 2 Instead of being proud of this man because of his social status, the congregation should have excluded him from their fellowship. 3 Paul, as the founding apostle, passes judgment on such conduct as if he were actually present—I am with you in spirit. 4 He invokes the strongest judgment, calling upon the church to assemble in the name of, (i.e. in the character and power of), the Lord Jesus, and to be conscious of Paul’s presence as judge. The power of the Lord Jesus, apparently invoked through prayer, will be present for the purpose of handing this man over to Satan (5), i.e. excluding him from the believing earthly community for the destruction of his sinful nature, lit. ‘the flesh’ (cf. Gal. 6:8; 11:30–32). This man is not regarded as a non-Christian. The purpose of the community’s action is the salvation of his soul at the judgment. 6 The boasting of the Corinthians with respect to this person is condemned as it has been elsewhere (cf. chs. 1–4). 7 The reason for excommunication is based in part on the OT’s festival of unleavened bread (cf. Ex. 12:15–20) when the yeast with its impregnating capacity in bread-making was not to be used in preparing the Passover bread. Instead the permeating yeast was thrown away, and by implication the offending person must be excluded from the sphere of the community. The reason for this is that Christ, our Passover Lamb, has been sacrificed. 8 The festival of rejoicing in the light of Christ’s death must now be celebrated not with the infiltrating influence of malice and wickedness, but with sincerity and truth.

5:9–13 The church’s sphere of judgment

9 Paul had written a previous letter which had been misunderstood (cf. 2 Cor. 6:14–7:1 which has also been wrongly used to demand Christian separation from secular society). It had ruled on associating with immoral people. 10 Paul corrects any misunderstanding that he had condemned contacts in secular society with immoral people, those greedy for gain, the swindlers or idolaters. If this were the case, then Christians would have to withdraw from the world in the manner of certain religious sects in Judaism e.g. the Therapeutae and the Essenes. 11 Paul now clarifies what had been previously misunderstood—they are to withdraw from any Christian who is sexually immoral, greedy for money (i.e. covetous), an idolater, a drunkard (ancient dinners were notorious for their drinking and immorality cf. the discussion on 10:7), or dishonest business person. Table fellowship was prohibited. 12 It is interesting that Paul did not see himself as a judge of secular society’s conduct. In a question which demanded an answer in the affirmative, Paul states that the Christian community is responsible for judging the insider, i.e. its own members. 13 It is for God to judge the inappropriate conduct of the outsider, while the community is to expel the immoral person from their midst, a point Paul emphasizes by citing Dt. 17:7. The ease with which the present day church often passes judgment on the ethical or structural misconduct of the outside community is at times matched only by its reluctance to take action to remedy the ethical conduct of its own members. We have reversed Paul’s order of things.

6:1–8 Lawsuits among members

Among the elite of first-century society it was quite acceptable to institute civil proceedings before a magistrate and jury on trivial matters in order to establish one’s social and political superiority over others. In weighing up their decision in such cases the jury had to take into account the status and power of the opposing parties, and the judge had to act likewise in imposing fines. Furthermore, certain persons were excluded from instituting legal proceedings against others; i.e. a son against his father, a slave against his master, a freedman against his patron, a citizen against the magistrate, and an inferior against his social superior. Judges and juries were regularly bribed by participants in a case. Mediation rather than litigation could be used in Jewish and Graeco-Roman courts. This was the preferred option of some because leading citizens feared the damaging effects of litigation on their social standing and public careers. Enmity was also engendered, for those who voted against the defendant automatically became his enemies. Civil litigation for the elite was simply seen as an extension of factions and discord in political life.

Characteristically Paul begins the discussion with a series of questions which operates both to interrogate and teach (cf. ch. 9 where he asks nineteen questions). 1 In the light of the way local courts operated it is little wonder that Paul is appalled that some Christians dare to take civil actions before annually elected magistrates and wealthy compatriots. They acted as either judge and jury with great partiality and could also be bribed. 2 If the saints are to judge the world (cf. Dn. 7:22) then they are surely competent to act as mediators in the civil actions which Paul calls trivial cases. The term used suggests that their civil litigation is vexatious rather than settling genuine matters. 3 Paul again uses a favourite argument form, Do you not know ... (cf. v 2), to indicate that if the angels are to be judged by the saints, surely the latter can resolve these disputes. 4 In the event of disagreement, Paul asks, ‘do you appoint as judges men of little account in the church?’ This alternative translation offered by NIV (mg.) is to be preferred. While secular judges were people of high status in the community, in the Christian gathering secular status had no place. Paul uses the same term here as he does in 1:28 of those whom secular society despises.

5 Some of those who were wise (cf. 3:18) might undertake the role of mediator which was an accepted way to resolve matters in secular courts. The third stage of education in the first century trained students in legal studies and therefore there would be some in the church who were legally competent to resolve matters equitably. 6 Paul indicates his revulsion at their actions by the words brother ... against another (brother) which signify the fellowship of believers—and this in front of unbelievers! 7 The fact that matters could not be resolved when a brother has a dispute against another Christian is a sign of defeat for the Christian community. 8 It is better to suffer wrong rather than go to court. Not only was dirty linen being washed in public but a fine was imposed on whoever lost the case—hence his accusation you ... cheat and do wrong—better ‘defraud.’

In Rom. 13:1–7 Paul discusses the God-ordained role of the state in criminal cases, but he has no place for the locally elected magistrates and juries who used the civil actions as a political arena. Christians who were legally trained and acting as mediators would resolve issues in a just way in a society where unjust conventions prevailed.

6:9–20 Against Christian libertarianism

In Rom. 1:18–32 Paul’s list of transgressions which invoke God’s judgment does not include only sexual sins, (see vs 29–31). Here too, those sins which excluded members from the OT believing community, also exclude them from God’s inheritance, (9b–10). Secular society had developed a sophisticated philosophical argument which endorsed the loose-living lifestyle of the elite. Their misdemeanours may have been beyond the arm of the secular law, but not of God’s assize. There was clearly a measure of self-deception on the part of Christians as there often is today. The sexually immoral, (pornoi, which includes fornicators i.e. unmarried Christians cohabiting), worshippers of idols, men who cheat on their wives however much their wives tolerate this, the participants in male homosexuality, thieves, the greedy, (lit. ‘the covetous’) who are dissatisfied with God’s goodness to them, those who are drunkards (normally those who went on drinking orgies at dinners), and people who are dishonest in business—all these have no inheritance in God’s kingdom. None of these sins ever strengthens relationships with God or with others; as in the Ten Commandments, they are prohibited because they are destructive and unhelpful to relationships, and inflict grief and anguish. 11 Such were the activities of the Corinthians. They were no more or no less immoral than the rest of the society. As then, so now. But the work of Christ has cleansed them from their past, made them saints, justified, i.e. acquitted them from just judgment in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and this by means of the activity of God’s Spirit. This good news of the gospel means that past sinful activity need not determine the ultimate destiny of men and women.

12 Paul quotes popular libertine slogans which he counters with similar succinct sayings. The elite argued that their success enabled them to do as they wished, for everything was lawful, but Paul requires ethics that enhance and do not exploit—not everything is beneficial i.e. ethics that bestow blessings on others. They argued that everything was permissible—there were no restraints. Paul insists that actions must never enslave. 13 They argued that food was made for eating and the stomach was made for food. The perusal of first-century cookbooks shows how sophisticated the sin of gluttony was. Immorality and gluttony went hand in hand at pagan feasts. Paul counters that neither food nor the appetite are indestructible. The body is not meant to engage in sex outside marriage, but in the case of the Christian, his body belongs not to himself to do as he wishes, for it was made for the Lord. 14 Paul rejects Plato's argument that the senses could be indulged now because they could not be indulged in death. However, God intends to resurrect bodies, not souls, for he raised the Lord from the dead. 15 No Christian could say 'my body', for it is not the spirit but the whole person who is joined to Christ at conversion. Christians who are called members of Christ can never unite in sex with a prostitute. 16 Such behaviour, although accepted as the norm for men in the Roman world, was always precluded in the church because of the unity any sexual act establishes between two people. Paul cites the sexual ordinance in Gn. 2:24—there is never any instance of special pleading for adultery in the Bible. 20 No Christian person can say 'my body' for he has been bought with a price i.e. ransomed by Christ's death. The clear implication is that his task is to honour, lit. 'glorify' God in his body, and this is done by relating to others both socially and sexually within the relational parameters laid down in the Bible.

7:1–40 Marriage problems

This is the longest discussion of sexuality and related matters in all of Paul's letters. It contains vital information on issues not touched upon elsewhere. Failure to understand the circumstances which gave rise to the problems written about in 7:1 and 7:25 has meant that valuable teaching on singleness and marriage has been ignored.

Concerning the circumstances: one clue rests in the letter itself, for Paul refers to the present crisis in 7:26 which gave rise to Christians rethinking the appropriateness of engaged couples getting married (7:25). There is firm archaeological and literary evidence which indicates that there had been food shortages in Corinth during this period. These were inevitably accompanied by panic buying and riots because of social unrest and uncertainty about the future. Eleven inscriptions to the same person who was three times in charge of the grain supply in Corinth have been uncovered from this period. This office was only filled in times of famine, so there is good reason for connecting the crisis with the threat of famine. Tacitus also records earthquakes and famines. Many believed that these were divine portents. We know that Christians believed that the signs of the tribulation would be famines and earthquakes, and a blessedness was pronounced on those who were not pregnant (Mt. 24:7, 19; Mk 13:17). Here Paul not only answers their immediate questions but also provides an important framework in which Christian marriage is to be seen.

7:1–6 To the married

1 The first sentence can be translated either as, 'It is good for a man not to marry,' as in NIV or, 'It is good for a man not to have sexual relations with a woman' (NIV mg.). One reason for uncertainty in translating this passage is that the Greek word for a woman and a wife is normally the same. It was also common in Greek not to use a pronoun when referring to one's spouse, so the sentence can be rendered literally—'It is good for a man not to touch [his]wife'. The preference for the second translation is the use of the verb in the sentence which means 'to touch'. It was a euphemism in Greek and Latin, as well as some contemporary languages, for sexual intercourse. 2 Because of the problem of sexual temptation each man should have (it is a command) his own wife and each woman [wife] must have her own husband. The verb 'have' is also a synonym for sexual relationships. 3 The husband has an obligation to engage in sexual relationships with his wife, and the wife has the same commitment.

4 The wife's body is not her personal 'property' and neither is the man's. Once he is married, he must not engage in sexual intercourse with another woman. It is not possible to find another reference in the literature of the ancient world which teaches that the husband surrenders his body exclusively to his wife on marriage. In fact, in the secular world, it was traditional on the wedding day to declare to the bride that when her husband committed adultery with a prostitute or a woman of easy virtue, it was not a sign that he did not love her, but simply a way of gratifying his passions. 5 Not to engage in sexual intercourse in marriage is to deprive the other person. Paul forbids such abstinence except by mutual consent and then only for a season of prayer, perhaps connected with 'the present crisis'. He warns that Satan is a voyeur who can sexually tempt a partner and for this reason they must come together (another verb for sexual intercourse) again because of the temptation to infidelity.

This one exception shows the biblical stress on the importance of sexual intercourse as part and parcel of the fabric of marriage. It was not given simply for the purpose of procreation, nor is it dishonourable (cf. Heb. 13:4). Was it that some Christian couples, reading the signs of the times with famines and earthquakes, decided to abstain from sexual intercourse? This would have been the only acceptable form of contraception. Blessedness was promised to the woman not pregnant at the time of the tribulation (Mark 13:17).

7:6–7 The gift of singleness and marriage

In the statement I say this as a concession and not as a command, this refers to vs 6–7 and not vs 1–5. In vs 2–3, and 5 he issues six commands—'should' in the NIV translates verbs of command. 7 He wishes that all men were as he is i.e. unmarried. But, which is the emphatic Greek form here, he recognizes that each person has his gift, charisma, from God, i.e. one is single and another married. Singleness in some societies is the subject of cruel innuendo. At times in the church it has been either over-valued or under-valued, in each case contrary to God's word. It, like other gifts, is a personal one to an individual from God.

7:8–9 Those without marriage partners

To the unmarried and the widowers I say: preferably they should remain in their present state. However, Paul concedes that this may not be possible and notes that in such cases a person should, i.e. must marry, for it is better to marry than to be filled with uncontrolled sexual desire. Such a person should accept that God's charisma for them is marriage.

7:10–11 To the married

Here Paul distinguishes between a known saying of Jesus, i.e. the Lord (10, 12) as distinct from his own. It must be remembered though that Paul gives clear commands in this section. The Christian wife is not free to separate from her husband. Paul accepts that there are occasions when that is necessary. However, in such circumstances she has only two options i.e. to remain unmarried (lit. separated) or else be reconciled to her husband. The husband is bound by the same strictures which Paul indicates by forbidding the option of divorce. It is presumed that unrepentant immorality is the exception (Mt. 19:9). Both partners being Christians does not ensure their happiness, but it does if they live together in mutual love and respect. All inconsiderate actions not repented of have lasting consequences.

7:12–16 The options with an unbelieving partner

Paul has in mind marriages contracted before one of the partners became a Christian. The requirement by implication that a Christian widow can only remarry a Christian suggests that Christians were not free to marry those who did not share the Christian faith (7:39). Furthermore, the apostles had wives who are called 'sisters' i.e. believers (9:5). 12 Having a partner who was not a Christian was not grounds for separation or divorce by the believing husband. There may have been pressure to do so among some Christians because of a misreading of the OT, which demanded that Jews who contracted relationships with non-Jews, knowing full well the prohibition of the OT, must put away that wife. If the non-Christian wished to stay, the husband must not divorce her. The marriage ordinance is God-given for all humankind (Gn. 2:21–24) and not simply designed for Christians. The same applies to the Christian wife (13).

14 There is nothing unholy in the relationship. On the contrary there is a sanctifying influence where the benefits of Christ's blessings flow over to the other person. If the relationship was an un sanctified one, then the children would be un sanctified too, but the fact is that they are 'holy'. This is one instance in the Bible where the status of children of one or both believing people is declared. Christians who come from societies where the primary emphasis is on corporateness, especially in the family, will tend to regard this as a declaration of the Christian status of their children. Others from the West will take a different view, based at times on denominational distinctions, and may reflect something of the unspoken beliefs of the particular era in which they were formulated.

15 If an unbelieving husband wished to leave his wife, then the wife had to release him. At times the ancient world worried about the judgment of the gods if a person renounced them in favour of some new religion. Women in the first century in Graeco-Roman areas in particular, could readily divorce their husbands. They simply demanded their dowry back. If it was not returned, then under Roman law, 18% interest on its value was charged until the husband complied. If the woman wished to leave because her husband was a Christian then no obstacle was to be placed in her way, e.g. withholding the dowry. God has called his people to live in peace and not perpetual dissension. Certainly withholding it, however well meaning it might be to seek to save the marriage, would ultimately result in the unhappiness of court proceedings. Christians were not bound in such circumstances, i.e. not bound to that marriage and therefore by implication free to remarry, but only 'in the Lord' (cf. v 39). Divorce is permitted where one partner deserts the marriage because of the Christian conversion of the other partner. 16 While the hope may have been that the non-Christian partner would believe and thus every endeavour made to hold on to the marriage, there was no absolute guarantee that this would be the case.

7:17–24 God's personal calling

Paul takes up the theme of God's calling from v 15 and provides a summary of the teaching he laid down in all the churches.

17 The place in life means lit. 'calling' or 'class'. The latter was how the term was used by secular writers. People were classified both racially and socially in the first century with privileges being given to particular groups. As a general principle Paul says that they were to retain the present place that the Lord assigned to each and as each was called. 18 Young Jews attempted to escape their Jewishness by undergoing a surgical operation to conceal their circumcision. They did this in order to progress in their education both in the gymnasium and as citizens. But Jewish Christians were prohibited from renouncing their Jewishness in order to climb the social ladder. This was a period of anti-semitism, as noted in Acts 18:1–2. The Gentile Christian was not free to undergo circumcision—the reasons for wanting to do this are outlined in the Galatian letter. 19 With respect to pleasing God neither circumcision nor uncircumcision was the central issue. It was obedience to God's commands that was crucial.

20 Paul repeats his teaching concerning the acceptance of the providential ordering of one's race and circumstances. 21 Household slaves, except those in the Imperial household, were eligible for release after 7 years. The Christian slave was not to be distressed by his status. Here Paul does not demand that he must stay in his calling even if he is eligible to be freed—lit. 'But and if he has the power or right to do so'. He could become a freedman. Freeing slaves is encouraged, although it was accompanied by binding obligations to one's master who was now one's patron. 22 Paul develops this theme by explaining that when called by the Lord to salvation, the slave undergoes a liberation and becomes the Lord's freedman. Paradoxically, the freeborn citizen who becomes a Christian, becomes Christ's slave. 23 Ransom money was paid for freeing certain slaves and Paul alludes to the cost of Christ's procuring their freedom. He commands freemen not to become slaves of men. While it may seem extraordinary, in the first century, Greek freeborn men did sell themselves into the household of Roman citizens, often holding the lucrative post of steward of a household. They could invest their owner's funds and run his business, legitimately accruing wealth. It was possible for them to buy their own way out of their voluntary slavery, and thereby gain Roman citizenship as freedmen, and for their offspring to secure Roman citizenship as freeborn children. It was not only wealth that counted in the Roman empire, especially in a Roman colony such as Corinth, but calling i.e. class or status. 24 Again Paul repeats that they remain in the situation in which God has placed them—lit. 'each in which he was called let him remain with God'. While the young sought to be upwardly mobile in order to gain wealth and status, those in the church needed to rejoice in the providential ordering of each Christian's life. The covetous, driven search for mobility was prohibited.

7:25–38 To marry now or to wait

In the first century, those who were betrothed to be married were committed to each other, with divorce the only means of renouncing it (cf. Mt. 1:1–9). The issue raised by some young men who were betrothed was whether or not to marry now, given the present distressing circumstances in Corinth. 25 Paul has no command from the Lord i.e. Jesus (cf. v 10), at least no word from Jesus' earthly ministry, on this matter which arose from unusual regional circumstances. In giving his response as one who by the Lord's mercy is trustworthy, he provides important pastoral and spiritual guidelines and does so within a wide theological framework on the nature of living in marriage. 26 Because of the present crisis in Corinth (see the introduction to ch. 7) it is a good thing for 'engaged couples' to remain betrothed and not proceed to marriage and its consummation, although should they decide to marry, no sin has been committed.

29–35 The theological setting. He explains that the time lit. 'has been shortened'. This has often been taken to mean that the end is imminent. The secular view of the indestructibility and the unchanging future of the world was the subject of first-century discussion. For the Christian the concept of time, kairos, had changed radically. Life now took a new perspective, so marriage, grief and making money must not be all-consuming. These all looked different with the new Christian clock, for the world in its present form was passing away, it was not indestructible. Within this theological framework, Paul expressed his concern that those who raised the issue should be free from life's burdens in the present distress. The task of every unmarried Christian man is to see how he can please the Lord—there was no concept of pleasing himself. 33 The task of the married man was to see how he could please his wife—Christian marriage has no place for self-centredness. 34 Clearly his time is divided between pleasing his wife and the Lord—marriage places additional obligations on him. The unmarried woman is no different in her calling, although it is expressed differently—she is to be devoted to the Lord in both body and spirit (cf. 6:19–20). The married woman has a similar obligation not to please herself but her husband. 35 Paul’s advice is motivated by his concern for their own welfare, not to restrict them, but in order for them to give undivided devotion to the Lord.

36–38 Factors influencing the decision. 36 The decision to proceed to the consummation of the marriage is governed by certain factors: (i) If anyone thinks he is acting improperly towards her. Possibly members of her family feel he should fulfil his promise and marry her; (ii) if their relationship has reached its full flowering—as now so then, young couples are more attracted physically to one another as the time of the marriage approaches. The translation of the clause by the NIV if she is getting on in years is unlikely for Roman law required a woman to marry up to the time of her fiftieth year. The term carries the idea of ‘full flowering’ of sexual feelings cf. also the next verse where he has control over his own will, i.e. sexual drives, and (iii) if he feels he ought to proceed, then he should. He is not acting improperly.

37 The decision not to proceed is also governed by certain factors: (i) he has settled the matter in his own mind, (ii) he is under no compulsion presumably from family or relatives, (iii) he has control over himself i.e. his sexual feelings, (iv) and has made up his mind not to marry, then this person also does the appropriate thing. 38 Even though there are the present difficulties in Corinth, the man who marries has done the right thing. Paul is not opposed to marriage (cf. v 7b). The man who does not marry has done better, given the present complexities. The decision to marry is rightly placed in the hands of young engaged men who have to judge for themselves and their situation. Paul lays down parameters for their decision-making.

7:39–40 The widow

Paul again repeats the binding character of Christian marriage. A woman is bound to her husband, with the special exceptions of vs 13, 15. She is free to remarry if she is widowed, but her husband must be a Christian. Roman law required a widow to remarry within 18 months of her husband’s death if she was not 60 years old. In Paul’s judgment, in view of the present difficulties she is happier if she remains as she is. Her father or her eldest son would be ‘lord’ of her dowry and provide for her needs. Paul is convinced that he has the Spirit of God as he writes this.

8:1–11:1 Gospel obligations in a pluralistic world

8:1–13 Meat sacrificed to idols

This is the next issue raised by the Corinthians. For those Christians who live in societies where food is still offered to idols, either in their non-Christian homes, at dinners or in temples, there is a certain immediacy in this discussion. In these chapters, however, there are gospel obligations which are binding on all Christians. The apostle concludes with the command that all should become imitators of him as he is of Christ.

The introductory words now about, show that, as in 7:1, this section begins with a quotation from the letter which the Corinthians had sent to Paul. The verse suggests that the Corinthians wrote, ‘We know we all possess knowledge’, that is, knowledge about sacrifices and idols. Paul repeats the phrase now about in v 4 with a connective so then, which explains this knowledge. We can therefore assume that the knowledge referred to in v 1 was we know that an idol is nothing at all in the world, and that there is no God but one, (4). It is possible that the whole of vs 4–6 could be the citation and that it reflects standard teaching by Paul about idols and gods and the true and living God to whom the Corinthians turned in order to become Christians (1 Thes. 1:9–10). Apparently some Christians were going into the temple which contained idols and eating the food offered there. By their example they were encouraging other Christians to do the same, or were at least in danger of doing so (10). Those who did this may well have argued the case on theological grounds: there is no problem in a Christian's participation in a feast since Paul himself taught that there is only one God and one Lord and that an idol is nothing. It would seem that some were defending their right to eat in an idol temple while others were uncertain, and the church sought clarification on this matter. Paul discusses how he dealt with his rights as a model of how other Christians should exercise theirs.

1 Paul tackles the problem by declaring the danger that knowledge will puff people up, whereas the Christian faith means relating to others in a loving way. Love builds people up, for it seeks to bestow some blessing on others. 2 He sends a warning to the Christians who think they know all about this issue and have resolved the matter to their satisfaction, (hence their decision to eat in the idol temple). They do not yet know as they ought, lit. 'as it is necessary to know'. 3 Some Greek manuscripts omit the two references to God in this passage. However, what is true of God's relationship with us is also true of the Christian's relationship with others. The man who loves is the one who really knows while the man who says he 'knows' does not necessarily act in a helpful way to others. This is the real issue because some Corinthians are not acting out of love but are simply exercising their rights.

4–6 is an important credal statement made in the context of religious pluralism and is as crucial to affirm now as it was then. There is only one true and living God and idols are nothing (cf. Dt. 6:4; Is. 40:25–26). 5 Yet Paul and others observed the great extent of the idolatry in Corinth where many gods were worshipped. Paul does not ascribe divinity to them as if they were legitimate expressions of God. On the contrary he says they are so-called. This phrase was used to describe something that was popularly, but erroneously, affirmed. The terms gods and lords were synonymous in pagan religious language. Paul uses them here to balance what he says in 6, 'but' (a strong negative statement) for us there is but one God, the Father, who is the Creator of all things and for whom the Christian exists. Our purpose in life is to serve him, and not simply to have him meet our needs so that we can pursue our own interests (cf. Acts 27:23). Christians are not simply theists. For them there is only one Lord, Jesus Christ, and he is the agent of all that is created (cf. Jn. 1:3) and the one through whom we live. 7 But not all Christians firmly believe that an idol has no power. First-century worshippers would say of an idol, 'That is Athena', believing that the goddess was actually there. Christians were called atheists because they had no statues. The sacrificing of food to an idol was not a harmless custom for the weak Christian who, if he ate, felt defiled—a view still held by some Christians in the East today.

8 The confident Christians in Corinth would agree with the stated principle concerning food. 9 However, they are warned that the exercise of their freedom, better 'right',—the word here is the same used in 9:4, 5, 12, 15—may be harmful to those weaker than they. This may well have been the right to participate in the feasts of the games, or on important civic occasions, one of the privileges granted to the elite. The former is more likely since the nearby Isthmian games were not held while Paul was in Corinth, and thus the problem had not presented itself to him while he was actually there. We know that all the important people of Corinth were invited to three feasts by the president of the games. 10 Paul's fear is that a Christian, seeing other Christians eating in the idol temple, will give way to the pressure to conform, and thereby stumble. 11 He is destroyed in that he slips back into paganism as a result of those Christians who want to eat in the idol temple in order to make a statement that an idol is nothing. 12 It is not an exercise of their rights, but rather a sin against their brother and hence against Christ. Given the close relationship between the Lord and his children which Paul discovered at his conversion, to harm Christians is to harm Christ (Acts 9:1–4). 13 Paul lays down the first requirement pertaining to the imitation both of himself and of Christ (11:1). If the exercise of a right causes a brother to fall into sin, then it must be avoided at all costs.

9:1–14 Rights and ministry

Paul proceeds to demonstrate again a truth from his own ministry (cf. 2:1, 3). It also provides him with an opportunity to defend his ministry to those who pass judgment on it by explaining the reasons why he did not claim his rights as an apostle (see 9:3). He conducts this part of his argument mainly with a series of questions all of which require the answer 'yes'.

The effectiveness of his apostolic ministry in Corinth is clear, even though some now question whether he should return for yet another period of ministry (cf. 16:12). He is an apostle i.e. one who has seen the Lord (cf. Acts 9:17). The very existence of the Corinthian church is proof of the divine recognition of his ministry i.e. his apostleship in the Lord (2). 3 As his ministry has come under scrutiny by some of his critics the defence of the validity of Paul's apostleship which he has stated in general terms in vs 1–2 is spelt out in detail with a series of questions.

4 Paul lays out the rights of an apostle—the right to sustenance; 5 the right to be married (note, to a Christian); and the right of the wife to accompany her husband (a principle broken by some missionary heroes of the last century, cf. 7:3–5) as do the wives of the other apostles and the Lord's brothers (These latter were once sceptical, Mk. 3:31; Jn. 7:2–3, but now believing, Acts 1:14, and clearly were important witnesses to Jesus); 6 the right to be fully supported or as Paul asks, Is it only I and Barnabas who must work for a living? 7 These rights are as obvious as the right of soldiers to be paid, the right of vineyard owners to the harvest, and the right of shepherds to the milk.

8–9 The rights mentioned in v 7 are not merely secular conventions but carry the endorsement of the OT, citing Dt. 25:4, where even the ox is not to be muzzled. Jewish interpreters saw the ox as the representative of all types of labourers, human and animal, and saw that the law was directed towards man to obey. That is why it is written for us, because of the rights of the planter and the harvester of crops. They worked in expectation of benefitting from the harvest. 11 The spiritual sower (cf. 3:6), in this case Paul in Corinth, also has the right to that harvest. 12 But he has not exercised his prerogative with them. On the contrary, he disadvantaged himself and put up with anything i.e. any dislocation occasioned by his working night and day (cf. Acts 20:35). He did this in order not to put a stumbling block in the way of his hearers as he presented the gospel. This is Paul's second principle, which expands his point in 8:13, increasing its scope to benefit the non-Christian.

Although orators came to cities promising to bestow civic and educational benefits, (cf. commentary on 2:1–5), those who heard them knew that the bottom line was the potential of rich financial pickings for the speaker. The audience was interested only in the speaker's prowess in demonstrating his silver-tongued oratory, and not the subject of the speech which they themselves often nominated from the floor. In comparison Paul's overwhelming concern was the content of his message with its good news. He sought therefore to distance himself from any possible identification with secular speakers in order to gain a good hearing for his unique message.

13 Having discussed the secular conventions which Paul renounced because of the danger that they would be misunderstood, he also cites the entitlements of the sacrificing priests of the OT, and 14 the decree of the Lord Jesus that gospel preachers were entitled to be supported, lit. 'out of the gospel' (cf. Mt. 10:10). That very entitlement commanded by the Lord was set aside, because in the non-Jewish context Paul saw that claiming his rights would raise a barrier with the very people for whom the gospel was meant.

9:15–23 Paul's free gospel

15 The discussion of money in the secular world was a signal that money was being asked for, so Paul makes it clear he is not asking for back pay. He would rather die than be robbed of his boast of a free gospel. 16 He hastens to clarify this by revealing the divine constraint under which he operates (2 Cor. 5:14) and even pronounces against himself should he fail to discharge his commission. 17 If he preaches the gospel because he wants to, he has a reward. If he preaches because he has to, he is simply discharging his role as a steward of the gospel (cf. 4:1). 18 What is Paul's reward for wanting to preach the gospel? Satisfaction that he can offer it free of charge. In a society where personal advantage, even with civic benefactions, was always accepted as the motivating factor, Paul's 'advantage' was seeing the unique gospel of the free grace of God being offered without cost to its hearers. His action demonstrated the very character of his message. He would not claim his rights.

19 Those who employed secular teachers felt they 'owned' them, especially if they operated as private tutors in households. Even though some of Paul's work was done within the framework of large households with their house churches, he witnesses to the fact that he was a free agent. Yet even though he has this liberty (cf. 9:1, his opening question) he does not use it. Like his Lord (Phil. 2:7–8), he chose to be a slave to all so that he might win some for Christ. Paul is the cross-cultural missionary par excellence and no slave to evangelistic conventions. His adaptability is seen in his sensitivity when preaching to the Jews, even though he is not under the law (20); to the non-Jews, making the necessary cultural adaptations in his missionary endeavours both in preaching (cf. Acts 17:22–31) and evangelistic contacts (21; see 10:30); and to the superstitious, like his Lord not quenching the smouldering wick (22).

Paul now sets out his third principle—sensitivity to the cultural context. I have become indicates that at a point in time he made this decision as a missionary strategist. He would be cross-cultural in his gospel presentation and lifestyle, and, by all ... means, innovative in his approach. 23 His actions were solely for the sake of the gospel, and his motivation was to share in its blessings. Paul was undoubtedly a free apostle. Those who habitually orientate their life to share the gospel are those who experience most its refreshing freedom as they see it liberating others.

9:24–10:13 Running and not falling

Paul now begins to deal with the issue of the dangers of the sexual misconduct that was such a feature of feasts in the temple. He does this by citing first the example of his own self-discipline and then contrasting that with what happens to God's people when they set their hearts on evil things. His aim is to prevent the Corinthians from doing the same (10:6). 24 Paul draws imagery from the athletic events of the famous Isthmian games held near Corinth. He encourages them to become runners eagerly stretching forward towards the finishing line. 25 He reminds them of the strict dietary and training discipline athletes underwent in order to gain a crown, which in his day, was made of celery. In contrast the Christian race is one that holds out an imperishable reward. 26 Paul compares his own ministry to that of a runner who knows where he is running. He is also like a boxer, but not a shadow one (orators who demonstrated their oratorical prowess before crowds, and not in actual debates were derided as shadow boxers). 27 The opponent was his own body and its appetites. That is what Paul subdues, unlike the orators who boasted that their income entitled them to indulge their senses with riotous living at feasts, and were criticized for teaching virtue but living in exactly the opposite way. Paul is deeply conscious of the need to subdue his appetites, lest having fulfilled his preaching ministry, he yield to sexual and other temptations. These were a constant problem then and are also a danger among evangelists and Christian leaders in today's church. Here Paul has been pointing out the danger of stumbling by not laying aside sinful conduct (cf. Heb. 12:1).

10:1–13 Warning from Israel's history. The traditional chapter division fixed here by later Christians is unhelpful. It begins with for, connecting the discussion of Paul's possible disqualification from his ministry with those who suffered God's judgment in the OT. 10:1–13 illustrates the truth that the God of the Lord Jesus judged Israel for its idolatrous conduct. God will do the same to the Corinthians who insist on exercising their right to eat in idol temples unless they flee from idolatry, 10:14–22.

1–4 lays out the impeccable spiritual credentials of the children of God in the wilderness. They had experienced the clear guiding hand of God and witnessed the miraculous deliverance through the sea (Ex. 13:21; 14:22). The children of Israel entered into the experience of Moses as the agent of Israel's deliverance, and in the same way Christians enter into the experience of Christ as their deliverer (2). They were nourished by the same spiritual food (Ex. 16:15, 35) and sustained by spiritual drink from the rock (Ps. 78:15), which was Christ meeting their needs in the same way he completely meets the needs of the Corinthians (1:4–7, 30). The One who was there at the beginning and was the agent of creation (Jn. 1:2–4), and who upholds all things (Col. 1:17), was actively involved in the life of God's people in OT times just as he is involved in the lives of Christians today. The second person of the Trinity did not suddenly appear for the first time at the incarnation. 5 Yet the Israelites' exclusion from the people of God resulted in their dying in the wilderness. They are a type or example to warn the Corinthians against repeating the same dreadful mistake.

Paul gives four prohibitions to the Corinthians which are derived from God's severe judgment of the children of God in the wilderness. (i) Idolatry is forbidden, and Paul cites Ex. 32:6, which would have appropriately described the riotous behaviour at dinner in an idol temple in Corinth (7). (ii) Sexual immorality (8), which was acceptable conduct at such dinners in the first century, is prohibited. The consequence of such behaviour for Israel was immediate exclusion from the believing community (Nu. 25:1–9). (iii) Testing or tempting God to act (9) also brought dire judgment (Nu. 21:5–6). There may have been some in Corinth who rationalized the exercise of their right to eat in the temple on the grounds that nothing had yet happened to them while they ate, and therefore nothing ever would. (iv) They were commanded not to grumble (10; Nu. 14:2). Some may have complained to the Lord because of the difficulty they experienced living in a society which endorsed religious pluralism; they were thereby led to deny the goodness of God and his providential ordering of their circumstances in the same way Israel did against the Lord and Moses.

11 The judgment which happened to them and which was recorded in the OT means that its warnings must be heeded by those who stand now at the fulfilment of the ages to come, i.e. the fulfilment of the promise to Abraham to bless all the nations and not simply Israel (Gn. 12:2–3).

12 Paul writes to those who think you are standing firm, having argued that because an idol was nothing (8:4), eating in an idol temple was perfectly acceptable (8:10). They are given a clear warning to take heed, because there is every possibility that they will fall, given the consistency of God as judge of Israel and the church. 13 These self-assured Christians are warned that all mankind faces the temptation to compromise and commit immorality—and they are not exempt.

10:14–11:1 Idol feasts and the Lord's Supper

14 Paul's beloved converts must avoid eating in the temple because of the danger of idolatry. 15 An appeal is made to them to think further on the issue, and Paul uses two analogies. The first relates to the Lord's Supper, and the second to the eating of OT sacrifices. 16 The cup of thanksgiving was the third cup in the Passover. Jesus, on the night prior to his death, reinterpreted the significance of this cup so that it pointed to the shedding of his blood on the cross and was the means of establishing a participation in the benefits of his death. He did the same with the bread which was broken to express the same participation. 17 In the same way, the fact that Christians partake of one loaf at the Lord's Supper points to the fact that they all belong to Christ, that they are one body in Christ. 18 The fellowship of priests with the altar in the OT is cited as the grounds for establishing the relationship in vs 19–20 (Lv. 3:3; 7:15). 19–21 Paul explains that pagan sacrifices are offered to demons (Dt. 32:17), and that it is not possible to drink from the Lord's cup and the demon's cup. It is interesting to note in this context that some vessels and cups found by archaeologists in Corinth have the names of particular gods on them. 22 The high point of the argument is that the Corinthians will rouse the Lord to jealousy. Are they stronger than he to survive such a confrontation?

Having exposed what is really taking place in the pagan sacrificial meals in which some Corinthians justified their participation, Paul uses their own argument to expose its unchristian character, (23–24). As in 6:12–13 the ethic that says that everything is permitted has been used as justification for the action of those who think they stand. 23 They argued 'Everything is permissible' but Christian actions are based on what is beneficial to the person concerned. On this basis the conclusions in 10:19–22 show that what they have done has aroused the Lord to jealousy and failed to bestow any blessing on themselves. If everything that is done ought to build up others, then they have failed, in that they have been in danger of destroying their weaker brother (cf. 8:10–12). The actions of a Christian are to be constructive with regard to others; this 'building' analogy is unique to Christianity and reflects its demand that the needs of others determine conduct. In the same way God's actions towards us in Christ are for the purpose of meeting our needs. 24 The much-admired civic and personal benefactions and the patronage system of secular Corinth did not have the primary aim of meeting the needs of others; personal advancement came first, and any benefits to others were merely secondary. The radical Christian ethic is spelled out in terms of the good of others and never personal advancement. The Corinthians who insisted on their own right to eat in the idol temple regardless of the needs of other Christians, had failed to love their neighbour by putting his or her needs first.

In vs 25–30 Paul explains how to function in the midst of religious pluralism. Food sold in the meat market of Corinth could be eaten by Christians (25). The fact that it had been offered in the temple before being sold was overridden by Ps. 24:1 which all pious Jews said before eating anything (26). If a non-Christian was extended an invitation to dinner and accepted, then the principle was to observe the etiquette of eating whatever was served by the host. No scruple is involved, for the same reason given in the preceding verse (27). The exception to this rule is where any person present draws attention to the fact that the meat has been purchased in the meat market. If the person believes it wrong for the Christian to eat, then one must desist from doing so, both for his sake and for conscience's sake (28). Paul makes it clear that he is speaking about the other person's conscience (24), and thereby emphasizes the point that the scruples and needs of the neighbour determine the Christian's actions.

The whole discussion is concluded in 10:31–11:1 giving the broad parameters within which Christians should operate in society. 31 First, whatever a Christian does, whether it is eating, drinking or any other action, it must be done to God's glory. 32 Secondly, neither Jews nor Greeks, i.e. those inside or outside the church, must be caused to stumble by the actions of any Christian. 33 Again Paul can draw attention to his own actions in support of this, for he seeks to please all, never looking for his own advancement, but the good of many, so that they may be saved. 11:1 He concludes with the command that the Corinthians must follow his example outlined in the discussion, which is an example drawn from Christ. The priority of others in terms of their need of the gospel and the concerns of the weaker brother must determine the actions of a Christian.

11:2–14:40 Orderly church life

11:2–16 Covering the head in worship

2 Paul commends the congregation for observing the traditions which he had delivered to them in days past. It is interesting that the issues raised are matters that Paul did not deal with while he was there. It is not a reflection on his competence, but rather on changes which developed after he departed. What Paul decrees is part of the apostolic tradition which is binding on the congregation (see v 16). 3 Paul wants the Corinthians to understand that Christ is the head of every man (more likely 'husband'), and the 'husband' is head of every woman (more likely 'wife', given the ambiguity of these words in Greek). It was the pagan custom for the priests of a cult who were drawn from the elite of society to distinguish themselves from other worshippers by praying and sacrificing with their heads covered. Is it that there were some among the minority of Christians from the social elite who wished to draw attention to their status by praying and prophesying with their head covered? He dishonours his head, i.e. Christ, who is his head, (cf. v 3). The dishonouring would be in drawing attention to his secular status when Christ is the one to whom attention should be directed when praying.

5 Every woman who prays or prophesies with head uncovered dishonours her head, i.e. her husband. It is as if she were shaved. The shaving of the head of the woman who disgraces her husband by committing adultery was prescribed by Roman law which applied in the Roman colony of Corinth. 6 If a wife does not cover her head, by implication she is regarded as someone who refuses to recognize her relationship with her husband i.e. her marital status. For the wife not to cover her head in public was a disgrace. 7 The man is precluded from covering his head since he is the image and glory of God (Gn. 1:27a). The wife stands as the glory of her husband (Pr. 12:4). 8 This was the order in which male and female were created according to Genesis. 9 In Gn. 2:20b–23 the wife was created for the husband, and not the husband for the wife. 10 It is for this reason and also because of the angels (cf. Mt. 18:10), the wife must have the sign of authority on her head. 11 In the Lord, Paul teaches mutuality as in 7:4. 12 Paul explains this in terms of a woman coming from man, and man from the woman. But Paul asserts that everything comes from God. 13 As in 10:15 Paul calls upon the congregation to judge for themselves. In this case is it right for a woman to pray with her head uncovered? 14 In the first century it was believed that nature determined matters of culture. No doubt Paul also argues this on the teaching of the OT where the polarity of sexes was insisted upon. A long-haired man was a disgrace. It has sometimes been argued that there are ancient statues of males with long hair, but this is how the gods and not men were portrayed. 15 The long hair of a woman was seen as her glory and ancient authors mention the attention given to a woman's hair as her prized glory. 16 Paul concludes that if any want to contend this apostolic tradition, they need to take note that neither Paul nor the churches of God have any other practice.

Note. It needs to be remembered that one particular problem was that the Christian meeting, the ekklēsia, had a secular counterpart in the governing body of the city. That meeting was normally held in the theatre. What would happen when a Christian meeting, ekklēsia, was held in a private home where a woman had authority, and in which she did not cover her head? While it is a point of contention among commentators, the issue here seems to be not about men and women per se but about husband and wife—this is a legitimate translation of both terms. It also makes sense of the statement of 'headship' (cf. Eph. 5:22–33 where the same words are used). It needs to be noted as well that it was not only men who prayed and prophesied in the apostolic church. Women did have a real role in worship. For a discussion of prophecies in the church see the section on ch. 14:1–25.

11:17–34 The problems in the Lord's Supper

17 If Paul has previously commended the Corinthians for observing apostolic traditions (v 2) he could not do so now as he gives commands to remedy abuses at the Lord's Supper (34). When they came together it seems it was not for the better but for the worse. Divisions among members (cf. 1:10–12) are also reflected in the meetings. In the secular ekklēsia i.e. the meeting of citizens for political purposes, they did not hide their divisions, and the Corinthian Christians behaved in a secular fashion on a number of matters when they met in their Christian ekklēsia. The enigmatic phrase and to some extent I believe it is how the NIV and other translators render it. It is surprising that Paul who is so well informed from Chloe's people should be only partly informed about a matter over which he sees judgment falling on some in the congregation. The clause can be rendered in Greek 'and I believe a certain report', which perhaps makes better sense. The word translated in other English versions as 'partly', which is an adverb, is also a noun in Greek meaning 'a report'. 19 It is not until divisions arise that those who have God's approval, i.e. who are genuine, lit. 'those who pass the test', can be known. (cf. 2 Cor. 2:9 where the genuine are those who have given heed to the apostolic instructions.) Divisions separated those faithful to God's word from the rest.

20 The second reason that Paul cannot endorse their conduct is that when they come together it is not the Lord's Supper they are eating. That undoubtedly came as a surprise to them, but Paul gives reasons why this is so. 21 Each one proceeds without any regard for others. Whether the behaviour in question was not waiting for others, or simply devouring one's own food during the dinner is uncertain. The word translated goes ahead can mean to do something before others or to devour one's own food during the meal. 22 Such actions result in the disgraceful situation of some being hungry and others drunk. Paul asks three questions which are meant to make them realize their guilt for this disgraceful conduct. The first is whether those who eat and drink so much have their own houses in which to feast. The second is whether they despise the church, lit., 'meeting' of none other than God for it is his church (cf. 1:2). The third question is whether it is their intention to humiliate those who have nothing, lit. the 'have-nots,' meaning those who do not have the protection of rich houses in times of crisis such as the present famine (cf. commentary on 7:26). Paul certainly cannot endorse or praise this inexcusable conduct. The reason they are guilty is spelled out.

23–25 Paul begins with a reminder that he is repeating the tradition received from the Lord which he had passed on to the Corinthians when he was with them. It recounts the actions and words of the Lord Jesus on the night he was betrayed. They were to break bread in remembrance of Jesus' death. They were also to drink the cup in remembrance of the new covenant which Jesus ratified in his blood (cf. the ratification of the old covenant with blood in Exodus and the promise of a new covenant in Je. 31:31, a covenant which was for the blessing of all the nations Gn. 12:3). 26 The Lord's Supper proclaims the Lord's death until his second coming. Paul repeats and alters the order of the words of Jesus to give emphasis to his actions. He does this in order to contrast Jesus' selfless giving of his life on their behalf with their self-centred actions which create divisiveness in his body, the church (cf. 10:17). He focuses on their failure to share their food at the supper to show how overwhelmingly generous Jesus' action on the cross had been toward them personally. They are behaving in this selfish way at the very remembrance feast which Jesus instituted on the night of his betrayal so that they might recall his death. Is not their behaviour at this remembrance a betrayal of him whose own supper they are celebrating?

27 In this particular context the unworthy eating of the bread and drinking of the cup has to do with their attitudes and actions towards each other, especially the needy who have suffered acute embarrassment. Attention is being drawn to their status and circumstances in the meal, in a community where these social divisions were meant to be abolished in Christ (cf. 1:30). They are therefore guilty of sinning against, or possibly on the grounds of, the body and blood of the Lord. 28 All must test or examine themselves before they participate. In this context, the examination has to do with attitudes of a party spirit and lack of compassion towards the 'have-nots'. 29 Failure to recognize the body of the Lord, i.e. the body of believers (cf. 10:16), can only invoke personal judgment. 30 Judgment has already occurred. Some are spiritually weak because of their actions, others are suffering illness and some have been removed by death. This points to the enormous importance which God attaches to his church and reflects the same activity in the OT on his part in judging and removing those who disregard their commitment to the unity and needs of the believing community. 31 Passing judgment on their own actions would deflect divine judgment. 32 Lest the Corinthians believe that God's judgment is as uncaring as that of the pagan gods, he reminds them that the Lord's discipline is always remedial in this life, so that his people will not be condemned along with the world.

33 The phrase, so then signals the essence of what the Corinthians are being called upon to do. When they gather together they are to wait for one another or to share their meal, for the verb can mean either. 34 Those whose hunger is such that they cannot wait, are enjoined to eat at home. This will mean that they will gather not for the worse but for the better (cf. v 17). This seems to be an interim measure because Paul promises to deal with the matter further when he comes.

This statement is sometimes taken to mean that Paul has suspended the meal permanently and implemented a service such as we celebrate today. It is more likely that his intention is to eradicate the problems and the underlying attitudes which gave rise to them. It must be remembered that the citizens were experiencing a period of famine (7:26) in which the 'have-nots' were faring worse. It is also worth reflecting on the fact that the Lord's Supper can only really be that when those who participate do so with an attitude and actions towards others consistent with the self-giving attitude and actions of Jesus (cf. 11:20).

12:1–13 There is only one Holy Spirit

Just as conduct at the Lord's Supper was out of hand, so too was the way in which ministry was conducted in church. While the Corinthians had written asking for Paul's apostolic ruling on the specific matter of spiritual gifts, there is no reason for separating the issues in ch. 11 from those in chs. 12–14. Seen together, we find the meetings of Christians in disarray. In whatever way the reader reconstructs the problems which gave rise to a request for clarification from Paul—and it is like piecing together a discussion while listening to the speaker at one end of the telephone—they need to be related to Paul's summary of his final instructions in 14:39–40. He uses this method elsewhere (cf. 11:33; 15:58). They must be eager to prophesy ... not forbid speaking in tongues, doing everything in the church in a fitting and orderly way. The problems appear to relate primarily to the priority of prophecy and exercising the gift of tongues in the Christian meetings. These were to be conducted in such a way as to reflect the character of the God whose meeting it was.

1 The Corinthians wrote concerning spiritual gifts—the Greek is ambiguous and can be rendered 'spiritual people'. The opening discussion would suggest that the Corinthians' question in v 1 related to the way in which those who possessed the Spirit exercised their ministry in the church meeting. Paul's first concern is to clear up their ignorance. 2 He reminds them how, when they were pagans, they were influenced and led astray to mute idols lit. 'were led astray as you were continually led'. Their rejection of the general revelation of God in their lives led them into idolatry and into the downward spiral of idolatrous practices (Rom. 1:21–23). Mute is used in the same way OT writers used it when pointing out to Israel the foolishness and futility of bowing down to handmade idols (Hab. 2:18–19). 3 Pagans believed that the gods were capable of influencing their objectives against others in areas of life such as athletic competitions, matters of the heart, business and politics. This was done in pagan worship through the use of curses against their opponents. Sometimes they were written on lead, deposited in the temple and wells and sworn in the name of a god. A curse tablet found in the temple of Demeter in Corinth read, 'Hermes of the underworld [grant] heavy curses'. Jesus be cursed can be translated 'Jesus [is] a curse' or 'Jesus [grant] a curse' for the two words are lit. 'anathema Jesus'. Cf. 16:22 'let him be anathema' where the verb is in the present tense. Were the Corinthian Christians using the name of Jesus as a curse against opponents in the same way pagans did with their gods? Is Paul saying that no person speaking by the Spirit of God curses others with 'anathema Jesus' in order to disadvantage them? Only those led by the Spirit will affirm that Jesus is Lord. Christians were meant to be using their gifts for the blessing and the welfare of others (cf. v 7).

Paul proceeds to discuss the fact that the many different gifts are from the one source, God, who has made them available for the common good (4–11). 4–6 From the same Spirit, Lord and God, comes a variety of gifts, services and activities—the church would do well to follow the example of Paul in using all three terms. 7 To each person is given the manifestation of the Spirit not for himself but for the common good. The 'welfare' of others in secular life was the object of benefactions, and Paul here uses the same word to stress that what each has been given is for others. In secular Corinth the elite paraded their gifts and abilities believing that it was these that gave them status and significance. This false notion appears, in some cases, still to exist after conversion and in ministry. 8–10 Paul outlines the different gifts, services and activities of the Spirit—wisdom, knowledge, faith, healing, miraculous powers, distinguishing spirits, and tongues or languages (both are possible cf. 13:1) and their interpretations. 11 All this is attributed to the Spirit, and their distribution to each person is declared to be the sovereign decision of the Spirit (cf. 4:7b).

12 Just as the gifts are diverse but are derived from the one Spirit (4–11), so it is with Christ i.e. the body of Christ (see v 27). 13 Baptism by the Spirit is into one body where racial origins or secular status make no difference. The source of their spiritual life is the Spirit (cf. the source of the people of God in the OT, 10:4).

12:14–31 There is only one body of believers

It is not possible to declare independence from the body of believers merely because individuals are unhappy with particular gifts given by the sovereign Spirit (15–20) or with the gifts of others, and therefore declare that they do not need particular ministries, (21–26). All Christians are part of one body and God has arranged this diversity.

15–21 Dissatisfaction with one's function cannot mean that one ceases to be part of the body. If the whole body consisted of one gift, how would it cope? God arranged all the parts of the body as he saw fit. If all were one part, there would be no body. The truth is that there are many parts, but one body. Those with gifts of perception and thought cannot be dismissive of those with more practical gifts. 22–24 Weak and unrepresentable parts are treated with special honour and modesty compared with other parts of the body which need no special attention. God has integrated the members of the body and has bestowed additional honour on the parts that lack it. 25 The crux of the issue is God's intention that there should be no division, but rather equal concern for all (cf. 1:10; 3:3; 11:18).

27 The Corinthians are the body of Christ and each one of them is part of it. Some felt superior and as a result others were made to feel inferior in their ministry. They were tempted to withdraw, or actually withdrew, from any active role in the Christian meeting. Just as some Corinthians failed to recognize the body in 11:29, so here they exercised their ministry in a way which had a negative effect on other members. They showed partiality in their response to others—something which clearly happened in secular society. 28–30 Both the allocation of gifts to Christians and the priority given to them is God's. Apostolic functions, the ministry of prophets, the tasks of teaching, miracles, healing, help to those in need, administrative gifts and the gift of tongues are set out (28), together with the interpretation of tongues (30). It is clear that not all have each one of these gifts. 31 The Corinthians must eagerly desire the greater gifts. Which are they? These would presumably be prophecy and teaching, as they are listed in that order of importance in v 27. This is substantiated by 14:1, 39.

Let the Corinthians seek gifts in the spirit of arrogance reflected in their attitudes in 12:1, Paul lays out the most excellent way for them in terms of their ministry together.

13:1–13 Gifts exercised in the context of committed relationships

1 The absence of love in the exercising of gifts ruins the person who speaks in tongues (or the languages) of men and angels. I am, lit. 'I have become', as hollow as the sound of a gong or cymbal. 2 The gift of prophecy whereby all revealed truth and knowledge are comprehended, and faith which moves mountainous problems, makes the minister of that gift nothing if love is absent. 3 If generosity overflows to the point of total self-giving and life also is surrendered to the flames, nothing is gained if love is absent. The absence of love in ministry means that I am changed for the worse—‘I have become hollow’, ‘I am nothing’ and ‘I gain nothing for all my effort’, sharpens the motivations for ministry. Love must not be absent.

4–7 The presence of love affirms others and overcomes destructive aspects of our character. Patience, kindness and truth matter. Just as avoiding those sins in the Ten Commandments which deal with other human beings nurtures relationships, so too does love. Envy, boastfulness, self-assertiveness, anger and evil are avoided. Love provides both the stability and consistency in which life thrives.

8–13 The future of love is guaranteed. 9 In this transient existence our imperfect knowledge is reflected in our prophecy. 10 When perfection comes in heaven, then the imperfect will fall away. 12 Imperfect reflections will be replaced by true perception—imperfect mirrors distorted a proper reflection of the face in the mirror. Partial knowledge will give way to full knowledge, just as we are fully known by God. 13 Permanence is only given to faith, hope—the future comes to us from the hands of a God who will not fail us—and love. Love has the top place, for reasons that are clear in vs 1–7.

14:1–19 Prophecies, tongues and the church

The pursuit of love must be the priority in the Christian gathering. Repeating the statement in 12:31 and resuming the instruction eagerly to desire the greater gifts, Paul reveals that he has in mind the gift of prophecy. 2 He indicates why this is so. Tongues are not directed to men but to God. 3 Prophecy on the other hand is directed to the people of God and meets three needs of the human heart—strength, encouragement and comfort. The Christian faith is unique in that it has used words which describe construction in its activity of seeking to fortify, encourage and comfort its members. 5 Paul’s wish is to have all speak in tongues, but, he adds, given the choice, he would rather have them prophesy. The prophet is greater than the tongue-speaker unless he interprets so that the church may be built up. He repeats the edifying intention of the Christian gathering.

6 Paul is arguing with those who apparently put such an emphasis on tongues by taking himself as the example. Unless he brings some revelation, knowledge, prophecy or teaching, what good will his ministry achieve? He provides two examples. 7 Intelligibility is crucial in music for the playing of the flute or harp—the first century acquired a great love for the latter and its exponents filled the theatres with their extensive repertoires. 8 The trumpet needed to give the correct signals in order to get the troops ready for battle. 9 Paul applies the illustration: so it is with you. None can discern the tune or recognize the signal if the language is unintelligible. 10–12 Since Babel, languages are without number, and unrecognizable languages make one a foreigner and the speaker also a foreigner. So it is with you, Paul repeats (12). He commends their eagerness to possess spiritual gifts, and encourages them to seek those which build up the church.

In vs 1–19 Paul has argued why prophecy is to be more eagerly sought than speaking in tongues. Edifying or strengthening, encouraging and comforting the church are crucial aspects of meeting together as the people of God, and this occurs through the gift of prophecy.

14:20–25 Prophecies, tongues and unbelievers

20–22 The Corinthians are commanded to stop thinking childishly (cf. 13:11). While it is appropriate that they should be innocent of evil, they should think like grownups. This involves understanding what is written in the Law (Is. 28:11–12; Dt. 28:49) where Paul deduces that tongues are a sign for the unbeliever (but a negative one; it will confirm his unbelief!) and prophecy is for Christians. 23 If the unbeliever or an inquirer comes into church and all are speaking in tongues, then he will conclude that the group is insane. 24 With everybody prophesying however, the unbeliever or an inquirer will be affected. There will be conviction and judgment by all, 25 and his heart will be exposed, he will fall down in worship, and acknowledge God's presence.

14:26–36 In a fitting and orderly way

26 Every person has a hymn, a message of instruction, a revelation, a tongue or an interpretation. All this must be done to edify the church. 32 It must be under control, for God is a God of peace.

33–36 deals with an aspect of the role of wives in the church. Some commentators get round the problem by stating that this section is a later addition and not by Paul. But every manuscript includes this passage. Three points need to be noted in seeking to understand the passage, (i) Wives prayed and prophesied in Christian gatherings (see 11:5). This was a common practice in all the apostolic churches (33b). The context is crucial viz. the evaluation of prophecy (v 35). (ii) The law requires the acknowledgement of the distinctive roles of men and women (34), a reference to Gn. 2:20–24 or 3:16. Paul has already cited the former in 11:8–9. (iii) The wife is to seek the elucidation of points at home, which could well mean that it is her husband who has given the prophecy (35). While there is no absolute certainty, the present writer takes the view that wives, in this public gathering, are not to engage in the public weighing of prophecy which involved the interrogation of its content.

14:37–40 Warnings and conclusions

37 The apostolic ruling which the Corinthians sought 'concerning spiritual people or gifts' concludes with a clear statement that anything Paul writes is of the Lord. The prophet and the spiritual person will know that 'what Paul says, Gods says' (Augustine). There are no grounds for relegating these chapters or any others to a situation in a peculiar place or time. 38 Those who ignore it, including prophets and those exercising spiritual gifts, must be or shall be ignored. 39 Prophecy is to be eagerly pursued because of its benefits to the church. Tongues are not to be forbidden but regulated as laid down in this chapter. 40 Paul's rulings are meant to achieve an orderly meeting. An aspect of the character of God is that he is a God of order (cf. v 33), and to reflect this, all things must be done in an appropriate and orderly fashion in his church. This injunction includes not only the matters touched on in these chapters but also those in ch. 11.

Note. Chs. 11–14 reflect the theological conviction that this is not 'my' or 'our' church but God's gathering, that Christ's action or self-giving is to be reflected in relationships and the meeting of needs; that there is to be the participation of men and women; and that the building up in an orderly way of those who gather is a primary concern. These chapters should not be read for the purpose of pointing out the failures or deficiencies of other church traditions. It is easy to read them and not see their personal challenge. Paul calls for a greater commitment to the physical and spiritual needs at weekly Christian gatherings than most modern church gatherings allow. They must be uplifting for those who come. In the apostolic church there was no such thing as a congregation closed to non-believers. The challenge remains that Christian services must be such that the outsider can come in and worship and know that God is really among his people.

15:1–58 The resurrection of the Christian’s body

This is not an issue the Corinthians wrote about. Paul heard that some were saying there was no resurrection of the dead (12). He anticipates that some will raise questions concerning the means by which the dead are raised and the nature of the Christian’s resurrected body (35). Clearly the matter is connected with their conduct, for he commands them not to be misled and to stop sinning (34). As in 11:33–4; 14:39–40 this chapter concludes with commands, v 58—stand firm. Let nothing move you. Always give yourselves fully to the work of the Lord, and the reason given, because you know that your labour in the Lord is not in vain.

What has the resurrection of the Christian’s body after death to do with the works performed in the Lord in this life? Why do they need to be assured that they are not in vain? It is not the resurrection of Christ that was being denied, but the resurrection of the Christian’s body over against the pagan doctrine of the immortality of the soul.

To the first-century mind the immortality of the soul was unquestionably true for most pagans. The resurrection of the body was absurd to them (cf. Acts 17:32). Some Christians appear to have seen eternal life in terms of the immortality of the soul. They also appear to have endorsed the implications which pagans had drawn. Popular paganism argued that the senses surrounding the immortal soul were given by Nature but could not be enjoyed beyond the grave. So if they had the money ‘eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die’ (32). How the Christian lived in this life was felt to be of little consequence, but having the assurance of immortality was seen to be the essence of the gospel and all that matters. This view of the Christian life still lives on and is not without its proponents both in the pulpit and pew. Paul strongly refutes this aberrant view of the Christian’s continuity apart from one’s body by showing that the resurrection of Christ was at the heart of the gospel and the resurrection of the Christian’s body was a logical consequence of it, and concludes with the ethical implications of this. He then proceeds to explain the nature of the resurrection body for the Christian (35–57).

15:1–11 The gospel and the certainty of Christ’s resurrection

1 Paul reminds them of the gospel he preached and they believed, (cf. v 11). 2 It rescued them and unless they hold on to that which Paul had preached to them their belief is vain, i.e. empty. 3 Paul had not invented it but had been the one who transferred to them what he had received (cf. 4:1). Of first importance was the death of Christ for our sins which was true because the OT had discussed the work of the Messiah (Is. 53). 4 The Messiah’s burial and resurrection on the third day was likewise the subject of the OT (Ps. 16:8–11 cited by Peter at Pentecost, Acts 2:24–28). 5–8 This OT passage was naturally substantiated by Christ’s resurrection, which a large number of people now living could confirm. Peter, then the twelve apostles, five hundred Christians to whom he appeared at one time, James the Lord’s brother, then all the apostles and finally Paul as a latecomer on the road to Damascus, all met him (Acts 9:3–5). 10 The intervention of God’s grace had made Paul an apostle and he claimed to have worked harder than any other apostle, or rather the grace of God had achieved this. 11 That however was immaterial, for this gospel which Paul has just outlined was what we (apostles) preach and this was what the Corinthians believed.

15:12–34 Christ’s resurrection and our resurrection

15:12–19 If Christ is not risen. With the use of six ‘ifs’ Paul explores the consequences of the belief of some of the Corinthian Christians who held that the body is not resurrected. 12 He begins by referring back to the fact of Christ’s resurrection. How could some assert that there is no such thing as resurrection? 13 If, as the founders of the Areopagus in Athens believed, the resurrection of the body was an impossibility per se, then Christ’s resurrection was impossible. 14 If Christ was not resurrected, the gospel is useless and their confidence misplaced. 15 Moreover, the apostles’ testimony that God raised Christ is fraudulent. But God could not do something which in fact does not take place i.e. the resurrection of the dead. 16 No resurrection means no risen Christ. 17 No risen Christ means their faith is misplaced and their sins are not forgiven (cf. v 3). 18 Furthermore, Christians now dead who had been persuaded to abandon their former religious convictions are lost—Paul however did believe that those who died without Christ were lost. 19 If the Christian faith is some mere panacea in this life, then given the cost of being a Christian in the pluralistic world of Corinth, Christians were the most pathetic people on earth. Paul has brought this false view to its logical conclusion. They should abandon their profession if there is no resurrection of the body.

15:20–28 If Christ has been raised. Paul now spells out the consequences of Christ’s resurrection. 20 He affirms that it is true and also that Christ’s resurrection is the guarantee of the resurrection of those who have died (cf. also 11:30 where death is now referred to as sleep and not the monstrous evil the pagan world perceived it to be). The firstfruits of any harvest indicates that there is more of the crop to come. 21 Man was responsible for death (Gn. 2:17), and the resurrection of the dead also came through a man. 23 The process is an orderly one. Christ is the first, then at his appearing, Christians follow. 24 Then comes the end, the last event in this cosmic history, when Christ delivers into the hands of the Father the kingdom, having subdued all. 25 He will reign as the sovereign Lord of heaven and earth until all is subject to him. 27 Paul explains by citing the messianic Ps. 8:6 which points to the subjugation of all. He expounds the passage by dwelling on the significance of everything. That naturally does not include God himself who puts everything under Christ’s feet. 28 When this is finally accomplished, Christ will bow the knee to God the Father so that God may be all in all. In so short a passage Paul has traced paradise lost and regained, and the recovery of the submission of all things to God as in the beginning of creation. And it is Christ’s resurrection that guarantees this.

15:29–34 Resurrection, Christian baptism and ministry. Paul mounts further arguments against those who deny the resurrection of the body and the present consequence for Christian activity. He concludes with a sharp rebuke against those who are living out their misplaced belief. If there is no bodily resurrection, then Paul sees that both their baptism and his ministry are useless. 29 This is a difficult verse. Some have seen it as supporting the idea that Corinthian Christians were undergoing baptism on behalf of those already dead, presumably deceased members of their families. They have further argued that while Paul does not condone it, he is simply citing what they have done as an argument against their belief. Paul was no pragmatist. That is rather out of keeping with him as the pastor, and his incisive critical comment on their conduct throughout this letter. It would be a practice in conflict with his gospel.

Paul teaches in Rom. 6:3–5 that Christians are buried with Christ in baptism and raised to walk in newness of life, and that they are united to him in his death and resurrection. That spiritual experience to which water baptism points is not simply a reference to ‘the soul’ but to the whole person, including his or her body. The early Greek Fathers concluded on this verse that Paul was asking what is the point of undergoing baptism at all, which was on behalf of bodies—the phrase for the dead lit. ‘on behalf of the dead [bodies]’ is repeated twice—if they will simply disappear.

30 Paul’s second argument is with respect to his own ministry. His own activities put him in constant danger (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23–28). 31 He sees himself as dying every day. To what is he dying? The pagans argued that the senses were to be indulged in this life. They also accused those who disagreed with them that they were denying themselves self-fulfilment and the pleasures of this life. Paul appears to be arguing in the light of that view that daily he consciously denies himself. 32 He speaks of having engaged in ministry even to the point of fighting the wild beasts in Ephesus—a possible allusion to the provincial imperial cult of the veneration of emperors with which Paul as a Roman citizen appears somehow to have become embroiled. The cult was always accompanied with wild beast shows. He refers in 2 Cor. 1:8–11 to the difficulties experienced in Ephesus. On the Corinthians’ premise, Paul suggests he was wasting his time. He should live like the pagans who argued that one should eat, drink and enjoy yourself in the body because those pleasurable pursuits will come to an end at death. He cites Is. 22:13.

33 He commands them not to be led astray and cites a popular saying drawn from Menander’s Thais that ‘Bad company corrupts good character’. What has this to do with the denial of the resurrection of the body? Those who taught the immortality of the soul and the corollary of indulging the senses said that their hedonistic lifestyle was the witness to their success. It was the ethic of the rich. They boasted of their licentious life. Paul is apparently concerned for the effect that such bad company may have on the Christian’s character. 34 When Paul commands some of the Corinthians to come back to their senses and stop sinning, it seems he has this self-indulgent life style in mind. It was endorsed by Christians and justified on the grounds that there was no resurrection of the body. Such a pleasure-centred life meant that they had no place for making known the knowledge of God to others which Paul sees as the obligation of all Christians (cf. 10:32–11:1). Paul believed that all would stand before the judgment seat of Christ and receive the rewards for acts done in the body whether good or bad (2 Cor. 5:10 cf. Rev. 14:13). That being the case he condemned the ethical misconduct of some in Corinth who denied the resurrection of their body to justify what they did. A slide in ethical conduct by a Christian amounts to a denial of the resurrection of his or her body and of accountability for what they have done.

15:35–44 Analogies of seeds and bodies

35 Paul responds by addressing those who ask these questions (e.g. ‘how are the dead raised?’) as ‘fools’. On reflection the answers are obvious as his analogies show. Wheat has two modes of existence, the second is only realized if it dies in the ground. It is God who has determined the future form of each kind of seed, i.e. he has given it a distinctive ‘body’. God has also created the animal order with different flesh. The same is also true of heavenly and earthly bodies. The glory of those bodies differs. The terrestrial bodies demonstrate this. The resurrection of the dead is no different. It is like seed sown in death and raised immortal. It undergoes a glorious transformation. Sown in dishonour and weakness it will be raised in glory and power. 44 Paul concludes that if there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body.

15:45–49 Analogy of Adam and Christ

45 The first man became a living being according to Gn. 2:7, and the last Adam, Christ, a life-giving spirit (cf. vs 22–23). 48 Adam’s descendants share his nature, while those who are of heaven share Christ's. 49 Just as Christians share the likeness of Adam, so they shall bear the likeness of Christ. For the Christian there is a guaranteed continuity of existence with the resurrection of his or her body and its transformation into the very likeness of Christ (cf. Phil. 3:21).

15:50–57 Assurance of victory

50 Transformation is a necessity because flesh and blood, i.e. the earthly body cannot inherit the kingdom, nor can the perishable inherit the imperishable. 51 Paul tells them a secret, a mystery, i.e. something that previously in human history had not been known, but has been revealed to God's servant (cf. 1 Cor. 4:1). Not all of God's people will sleep in death, i.e. die, but it is absolutely certain that all shall be transformed. 52 Christ's coming will occur in an instant, the end being heralded by the trumpet call (cf. Zc. 9:14). Then the dead will be raised and God's people will be transformed. 54 When this happens, that which the prophet predicted shall come to pass—the swamping of death in victory (Is. 25:8). 55 Again Paul can quote the OT prophecy of Ho. 13:14 which itself is preceded by the promise that the Lord will ransom his people from the grave. Of the two questions asked in v 55, the second question is answered in v 56 and the first in v 57. 56 Sin was the cause of death (Gn. 2:17). Through the law comes the realization of sin's overwhelming power (cf. Rom. 7:7–14 where Paul explains in detail the statement he makes briefly here). 57 Christ invaded death's domain and robbed it of its sting. This is the great victory for which God is to be thanked.

15:58 Concluding instructions

The consequence of all this discussion is the command to stand firm and not to move away from the rock of the bodily resurrection of God's people. What they must not do now in that body, which is to be resurrected, is to be led away into sin (33–34a). Rather, they are always to be given fully to the work of the Lord, which in part means helping those who are ignorant of God (34b). This is the lifetime call to the ordinary Christian. That work will not be worthless and will mean that they will receive the Lord's reward for the good done in the body at the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10). Those who die in the Lord are pronounced blessed indeed, for they cease from their work in the Lord and their good works follow on behind them (Rev. 14:13). In contemporary Christianity there is a danger of investing the term 'eternal life' with the Greek pagan notion of the immortality of the soul, and of regarding the present moments of the Christian life as providing opportunities for personal advancement and aggrandizement.

16:1–24 Other business

16:1–4 Arranging the collection

This is the fifth matter about which the Corinthians wrote (7:1, 25; 8:1; 12:1). Paul attached great importance to money being collected for the needy Christians in Jerusalem. It had not only a philanthropic motivation, but it represented a unique gesture of solidarity by Gentiles to Jews. Normally, the Jews of the Dispersion sent gifts to fellow Jews in Jerusalem, but the fact that the Gentile churches collected money for Jewish Christians showed the nature of the gospel which could break down the decisive racial barrier. 2 The giving was to be systematic, setting aside on the first day of the week a sum appropriate to their income lit. as 'the person has been prospered', by the Lord. Systematic giving was preferred as Paul did not want to have a collection taken up when he arrived. 3 Paul would then send the collection on to Jerusalem in the hands of people chosen by the Corinthians, having written letters of introduction for them. Accountability was demanded. Abuse of 'trust' funds had been so rife among the Jews that an escort was provided by the Roman authorities for the protection of funds being sent to Jerusalem. 4 Paul will travel with those who have the letters and money if he thinks it is appropriate. He speaks not of himself accompanying them, but of their accompanying him. He clearly sees himself as the apostle of the Gentiles going to the church in Jerusalem with the gifts of Christian Gentiles. The gift was finally taken (Rom. 15:26), although, as 2 Cor. 8–9 shows, the Corinthians appeared not to have followed his teaching about systematic giving in vs 1–4. How much time and energy might be saved in Christian work if God's people simply exercised the discipline of regularly counting God's goodness and setting aside resources for Christian sharing. Note also the care with which Paul handled money in order to avoid any allegations of impropriety, and his encouragement to Christians to do the same.

16:5–9 Paul's travel arrangements

5 Here he explains what was in his mind when he said he hoped to come very soon (4:19). 6 He is hoping to spend the winter with them in the expectation that they will help him on his way, i.e. provide them with the opportunity to be part of his future ministry. Elsewhere Paul speaks of support freely given by a church as partnership with him in the gospel (Phil. 1:5; 4:15). He desires to visit Rome and also to bring the collection to Jerusalem—hence the element of uncertainty. 7 That Paul was not returning immediately to Corinth resulted in some Corinthians becoming arrogant (4:18). It reflects their secular attitude, while he, for his part, as he thinks about the options, does so with the clear constraint if the Lord permits. 8–9 He is presently in Ephesus and will remain there until Pentecost, the Jewish festival celebrated some fifty days after Passover. The reason for remaining there is because of the great evangelistic opportunities which are accompanied by much opposition (cf. 15:32 and 2 Cor. 1:8–11). He was no faint hearted evangelist.

16:10–11 Timothy's proposed visit

10 Paul is also concerned that if Timothy, his tried and trusted fellow worker (Phil. 2:19–23) comes, he should be properly received. Given the hostility of some in the congregation towards Paul, he is concerned that some might resort to the secular conventions for expressing enmity, in retaliating against the apostle by mistreating his friend. 11 He calls for proper treatment. The sending of him on his way in peace may be a reference to the Jewish custom of shalom which involved a spiritual benediction as well as the provision of his needs as a traveller.

16:12–14 The return of Apollos

This is the final matter on which the Corinthians wrote. They had asked for Apollos's return. It is clear from 1:12; 3:4; 4:6, that in pressing for this the motives of some were clearly suspect—it was the alternative to having Paul return for an extended stay. In spite of all this Paul has urged Apollos to return to Corinth to minister. The response of Apollos says lit. 'and it was not at all the will that he now come'. He will come when he has the opportunity, lit. 'when the time is right'. This suggests that Apollos has judged that accepting the invitation at this time would not be in the interests of the congregation, given the tension between Paul and the church. It is interesting that Apollos was content for Paul to reply on his behalf. There is clearly no competitive spirit between Paul and Apollos and neither would the latter be flattered by the Corinthian church into going there, given their motives. Paul was to record later the attitude of Christian workers in Corinth who had succumbed to the secular competitive spirit (2 Cor. 10:12).

13–14 While these verses may not appear to be connected with the matter of Apollos, it makes sense to see the commands given here in the light of the Corinthians' wrong attitudes to gospel ministry. They are called upon to be on your guard. They clearly have succumbed to secular ways of thinking about Apollos and Paul (cf. 3:3–4). Standing firm in the faith of Christ crucified was as much the need of the Corinthians as it was of the messengers of the gospel (cf. 1:17b–2:5). The call to be people of courage and to be strong involves resisting pressure to mould ministry according to the secular categories of polished and slick oratory (cf. Paul's own example, 4:8–16). The call to do everything in love may well be a rebuke to their divisiveness and jealousy over former teachers and the motives behind issuing the invitation to Apollos to return (cf. 1:10; 3:3; 4:6).

16:15–18 The godly example of the household of Stephanas

The large household was a social institution in Paul's day. It had an enormous capacity to further Christian ministry. 15 Already mentioned in 1:16, the household of Stephanas, who were the earliest fruits of Paul's ministry, clearly used their resources for God's people, i.e. saints, (cf. 1:2). If, as has been suggested, the Corinthians were facing grain shortages (see discussion in ch. 7 and the meaning of 7:26), then here was a household which ministered on a day to day basis to those who had nothing (cf. 11:22). Their ministry would have included hospitality to Christian travellers.

16 Paul calls for submission to them and all who labour in Christian work. What the command to submit meant is uncertain, unless these were to be elders who ruled their own household and therefore had a proven track record of using their resources for others. 17 Certainly ministering to needs is the key, for Paul has experienced it in Ephesus at the hands of Stephanas as well as those of Fortunatus and Achaicus. Their arrival gladdened Paul's heart and they were able to fill the gap that Paul felt in his life, separated as he was from the Corinthian church. 18 He explains that they refreshed his spirit and they had done so also for the Corinthians. Ministry of this calibre must be acknowledged, lit. 'therefore recognize such'.

God's servants are to be no different from God, who sends times of refreshment to the hearts and minds of his people. The contemporary church needs such people who will service the needs of others with the gifts they have been given for this purpose. The congregation is not being asked to authorize such ministry but to acknowledge its existence.

16:19–22 Final greetings

19 Paul ends with greetings from churches in the province of Asia of which Ephesus is the capital—it implies his ministry has extended beyond that city. Former members of the congregation in Corinth (Acts 18:2–3), Aquila and Priscilla send their warmest greetings, lit. 'many'. They come with the greetings of those who were meeting in their house. 20 All the brothers may refer to a particular group, possibly Paul's co-workers whom he has supported financially by working (Acts 20:34). As the church in Asia has sent their greetings, he calls upon the Corinthians to greet each other as members of a holy brotherhood. 21 Up to this point a secretary has written this letter—shorthand was much in use in Paul's day, as were secretaries.

Now Paul takes the pen and sends his own personal greeting. 22 Of course such greetings were not sent to the person who does not love the Lord; there can be no excuse for not responding in love to the incredible love of Christ. The opposite to a greeting or blessing was a curse or anathema. He invokes a curse elsewhere on those who preach another gospel (Gal. 1:8–9) and can do no less to those who do not love the Lord to whom the gospel bears witness. The Aramaic cry, Come, O Lord, is a prayer for Christ's return, (cf. 15:51–54). 23 The letter began with the greeting of grace (1:3) and appropriately ends with it, as indeed do all encounters between the Lord Jesus and his people. Paul adds his love in Christ Jesus to the congregation—again a remarkable testimony to God's grace that in spite of attitudes towards him, Paul's love, like that of Christ, has not changed, for he sees them in Christ Jesus.

Bruce Winter

2 CORINTHIANS

Introduction

Paul's relationship with the Corinthians

To understand 2 Corinthians it is necessary to know something of the whole course of events in the relationship between Paul and his converts in Corinth. What occurred before the writing of 1 Corinthians is described in the Introduction to the commentary on that letter. In what follows, a reconstruction of the sequence of events from the time of the writing of 1 Corinthians onwards is offered. (This reconstruction assumes certain decisions regarding the literary and historical problems involved. Readers who are interested in pursuing these matters are referred to the Introduction in the TNTC on 2 Corinthians.)

The writing of 1 Corinthians

Paul wrote 1 Corinthians to clarify an earlier letter he had written (1 Cor. 5:9–11), to respond to news he had received from some of Chloe's household about Corinth (1 Cor. 1:10–12), to answer questions about his teaching in the letter the Corinthians had sent to him (1 Cor. 7:1), and to head-off some emerging criticisms of his own person and ministry (1 Cor. 4:1–18). He took the opportunity also to give instructions about 'the collection for God's people' (1 Cor. 16:1–4), to prepare the way for Timothy's visit to Corinth (1 Cor. 4:17; 16:10–11) and to advise the Corinthians that he himself planned to visit them on his way to Jerusalem after passing through Macedonia (1 Cor. 16:5–9).

Timothy's visit to Corinth

Not much is known about Timothy's visit to Corinth. However, by the time Paul began writing 2 Corinthians, Timothy had already returned (1:1), and the relationship between Paul and the Corinthians had passed through a very difficult period.

Paul's 'painful' visit

When Timothy arrived back in Ephesus he apparently brought disturbing news of the situation in Corinth. This made Paul change the travel plans he had outlined in 1 Cor. 16:5–9. Instead of journeying through Macedonia to Corinth and then on to Jerusalem, he sailed directly from Ephesus across to Corinth. It was his intention, after visiting the church there, to journey north into Macedonia and then return again to Corinth on his way to Jerusalem. By so doing he hoped the Corinthians would 'benefit twice' (1:15–16). However, when Paul arrived in Corinth he found himself the object of a hurtful attack (2:5; 7:12) made by a certain individual, and no attempt was made by the congregation as a whole to support Paul (2:3). It proved to be a very painful visit both for Paul and the Corinthians, and one which the apostle did not wish to repeat. So he changed his travel plans once again, and instead of returning to Corinth after the projected journey into Macedonia, he made his way straight back to Ephesus (1:23; 2:1).

Paul's 'severe' letter

Once back in Ephesus, Paul wrote his so-called 'severe' letter to the Corinthians. This letter is now lost. From references to it made by Paul in subsequent correspondence, it appears that it called upon the Corinthian church to take action against the one who had attacked him during the 'painful' visit, and so to demonstrate their innocence in the matter and their affection for him (2:3–4; 7:8, 12). It is not clear who carried the 'severe' letter to Corinth. It may have been Titus. In any case, it was from Titus, returning from a visit to Corinth, that Paul expected news of the Corinthians' response to this letter. Paul was fairly confident of a positive response. He expressed this confidence to Titus before the latter left for Corinth (7:14–16), and he may have even asked Titus to take up with the Corinthians the matter of the collection (8:6).

Paul meets Titus in Macedonia

Plans had been made for Paul and Titus to meet in Troas. When Paul arrived there he found a wide open door for evangelism, but because Titus had not yet come and because he was so anxious to meet him, he could not settle to his work. So he left Troas and crossed over into Macedonia hoping to intercept Titus on his way to Troas (2:12–13). When Paul reached Macedonia he found himself embroiled in the bitter persecution which the churches of Macedonia were experiencing (7:5; 8:1–2), and this only compounded his anxiety. When Titus finally arrived, Paul found great consolation (7:6–7), the more so when he heard of the Corinthians' zeal to demonstrate their affection and loyalty to him by punishing the one who had caused him such hurt.

Paul writes 2 Corinthians 1–9

Paul responded to the good news received from Titus by writing 2 Cor. 1–9. He said how glad he was that their response to the 'severe' letter and Titus's visit had justified his pride in them, especially seeing that he had boasted about them to Titus before sending him to Corinth (7:4, 14, 16). He also went to great lengths to explain the changes to his travel plans (1:15–2:1) and why, and in what frame of mind, he had written them the ‘severe’ letter (2:3–4; 7:8–12). Although Paul was overjoyed because the Corinthians had acted so vigorously to clear themselves and to punish the offender, nevertheless he urged them now to forgive and restore him ‘in order that Satan might not outwit us’ (2:11).

Apart from expressing his relief and joy, Paul dealt with two other subjects at some length. First, he explained his apostolic ministry both in Asia (Ephesus) and in Macedonia (1:3–11; 2:12–7:4). Secondly, he gave detailed instructions and encouragement about the collection for God’s people (chs. 8–9). The Corinthians had made a beginning ‘last year’ (8:10) when they wrote to Paul, and he had replied giving basic directions about this matter (cf. 1 Cor. 16:1–4). In fact, Paul had actually boasted to the Macedonians about the Corinthians’ readiness to contribute to the collection, and he was now becoming anxious lest they failed to vindicate his boasting (9:1–4).

Further bad news from Corinth

After writing 2 Cor. 1–9, Paul received distressing news about another turn of events in Corinth. Men whom Paul called ‘false apostles’ (11:13) were levelling all sorts of accusations against Paul and his messengers. Apparently the Corinthian church had been deeply influenced by these men, had accepted their gospel (11:1–4) and submitted to their overbearing demands (11:16–20). All this caused a major crisis in the relationship between Paul and the Corinthians.

Paul writes 2 Corinthians 10–13

It is not certain whether Paul received information about the new crisis in Corinth before or after he sent off 2 Cor. 1–9. In any case, it was in response to this new crisis that Paul wrote 2 Cor. 10–13. It was written to answer the accusations of the false apostles and to dispel the suspicions they had raised in the minds of the Corinthians. It reads like a last desperate attempt by the apostle to bring the church to its senses, to secure again their pure devotion to Christ and to revive once more their loyalty to their spiritual father, Paul. In it he warns them of his planned third visit, when he would demonstrate his authority, if need be, though clearly he hoped the Corinthians’ response to what he had written would make that unnecessary (12:14; 13:1–4, 10).

Paul’s third visit to Corinth

According to Acts 20:2–3, Paul did travel to Greece after the time in Macedonia and spent three months there. We may assume that at this time he made his promised third visit to Corinth. Apparently, either as a result of what he wrote in chs. 10–13, or because of his own coming to Corinth for the third time, the problems in the Corinthian church were settled for the time being. This can be inferred from Paul’s letter to the Romans which was written from Corinth during these three months. In that letter he wrote: ‘Now, however, I am on my way to Jerusalem in the service of the saints there. For Macedonia and Achaia were pleased to make a contribution for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem’ (15:25–26). If the Achaians (who must for the most part have consisted of the Corinthians) had now contributed to the collection, obviously their misgivings reflected in 11:7–11 and 12:13–18 had been overcome. And if Paul spent three months in Greece, in a frame of mind which allowed him to write Romans, then the situation in Corinth must have improved markedly.

It would be gratifying to be able to say that after all these things the Corinthian church went from strength to strength. Unfortunately, this was not the case. Evidence from the First Epistle of Clement (written circa AD 95) indicates that disharmony had become a problem once more.

The opponents of Paul in Corinth

In the reconstruction of the course of events in Paul's relationship with the church in Corinth offered above, the opposition to Paul in Corinth consisted of two phases. In the first phase (reflected in chs. 1–7) the opposition emanated primarily from an individual offender; while in the second phase (reflected in chs. 10–13) it emanated from a group of people whom Paul called false apostles.

The offender of chapters 1–7

Traditionally the offending individual to whom Paul referred in chs. 1–7 has been identified as the incestuous person referred to in 1 Cor. 5. However, this view has been abandoned by most twentieth-century commentators on two major counts. First, Paul, who in 1 Cor. 5 called so strongly for the excommunication of the incestuous person, could hardly have turned around and pleaded for his reinstatement in 2 Cor. 2. This is not a very compelling objection because it underestimates the effects of the gospel of forgiveness in the apostle's own life. Secondly, the offence Paul alludes to in 2 Cor. 2 is not immoral behaviour, but a personal attack upon himself and his apostolic authority. This is a far more weighty objection. However, the offender may have added to his earlier sin of immoral behaviour an additional offence, i.e. a personal attack against the apostle Paul and a rejection of his authority. The scenario could then have been as follows.

The Corinthians, when they received 1 Corinthians, did not straightaway carry out the disciplinary action against the incestuous person for which Paul called. So when Timothy came to Corinth he found the man undisciplined and unrepentant. When Paul heard this, he changed his travel plans and crossed over immediately to Corinth, intending to take the matter in hand. Once there he found himself the object of a bitter personal attack mounted by the offender, who was now guilty not only of the sin of incest, but also of attacking Paul and rejecting his apostolic authority. The church did not support Paul, so he was forced to retreat to Ephesus. From there he sent his 'severe' letter, demanding again that the Corinthians discipline the offender. This they finally did, and when Paul heard about it from Titus he wrote 2 Cor. 1–7, expressing his joy and relief and asking that the now presumably repentant offender be reinstated.

The false apostles of chapters 10–13

The second phase of the opposition involved a bitter personal attack upon Paul by those whom he called false apostles. The nature of the attack is reflected in Paul's spirited response to it in chs. 10–13. The crisis precipitated by these false apostles was far from resolution when 2 Cor. 10–13 was written.

The false apostles' criticisms of Paul. They accused him of being 'bold' while absent and at a safe distance, but of being 'timid' when present (10:1). He lived 'by the standards of the world' (10:2). While his letters were 'weighty and forceful', in person he was 'unimpressive' and his speaking amounted to nothing (10:9–10). They criticized Paul's claim to be an apostle, saying it was inferior to their own because he was not a trained speaker (11:5–6). They also attacked Paul's personal integrity in financial matters, insinuating that his refusal to accept financial support from the Corinthians (as they themselves obviously did) was both evidence that Paul did not really love his converts (11:7–11) and a smokescreen behind which he intended to extract an even greater amount from them for himself through the collection ploy (12:14–18).

The identity of the false apostles. From the various hints provided in chs. 10–13, it emerges that Paul's opponents were Jewish Christians who were proud both of their Jewish ancestry and that they were servants of Christ. If the demand for letters of recommendation to which Paul responded in 3:1–3 emanated originally from these men, it seems reasonable to conclude that they themselves bore such commendatory letters, most likely from Jerusalem. In that case, they would have had some affinity with the Cephas party which had already formed in Corinth and which would have favoured the Jewish form of Christianity associated with Peter.

Paul accused them of preaching another Jesus and a different gospel (11:4), a charge similar to that he levelled against the men who troubled the churches of Galatia (cf. Gal. 1:6–9). These were Jewish believers who sought to impose upon Gentile converts the obligations of the law and to make them submit to circumcision. However, there are no indications in 2 Corinthians that Paul's opponents in Corinth were trying to impose these things. There are other significant differences between Paul's opponents in Galatia and the false apostles in Corinth. The latter laid great stress upon oratory (11:5–6), not something which was expected of the Jerusalem Christians (Acts 4:13) nor presumably of those who represented them. In addition, the false apostles at Corinth seem to have stressed the importance of visionary experiences and revelations (12:1), displays of power to prove that Christ spoke through them (13:3) and the so-called marks of an apostle (12:11–13). These things also, as far as we know, did not feature as part of the Judaizers' approach. For all these reasons the false apostles should probably not be identified as Judaizers.

In the Greek world there was stress upon the importance of oratory and a fascination with wonder-workers who experienced visions and revelations (cf. Col. 2:18) and performed mighty works (cf. Acts 8:9–13). The false apostles in Corinth may have been influenced by the Greek world, or even accommodated their approach to the Corinthians who had been influenced by it. It is clear from 1 Corinthians that the believers in Corinth both prided themselves on such things and needed to be warned by Paul against placing too much importance upon them (1 Cor. 1:5; 4:8–10; 13:1–2). It seems then that Paul's opponents were either Jewish believers who had themselves been influenced by the Greek world and incorporated into their own understanding of apostleship certain Greek ideas, or they were Jewish believers from the church in Jerusalem who had accepted ideas prevalent among the Corinthians so as to influence them against Paul.

Theological differences between Paul and his opponents. If we bring together the scraps of information which Paul provides about the teaching of his opponents, two major areas of theological disagreement between them and Paul may be discerned. The first relates to the gospel itself, and we have seen that Paul regards the message they preached as a different gospel in which a different Jesus was presented and by which a different Spirit was received.

The second area of disagreement was about the criteria for deciding who had the right to call themselves apostles of Christ. Such criteria were necessary because the title 'apostle' was claimed by individuals other than the Twelve in the early church. Paul's opponents embraced what may be called a triumphalist viewpoint. They expected an apostle to be personally impressive, have a commanding presence and a good speaking ability (10:10) and be authoritative in his dealings with those under him (11:20–21). His claim to be an apostle would rest upon visions and revelations of God (12:1) and would be supported by the performance of signs and wonders (12:11–13). He would act as a spokesman of Christ and be known as such because of the manifestations of power in his ministry (13:3–4). And on the more formal side, the apostle of Christ would have proper Jewish ancestry (11:22) and bear letters of recommendation (3:1), most likely from the Jewish leadership of the church in Jerusalem.

For the sake of the Corinthian church Paul felt obliged to point out that his own ministry did not lack commendation (3:2–3), knowledge (11:6) or authority (13:10). He pointed out also that he had experienced visions and revelations of God (12:1–5), that he did perform signs and wonders (12:11–13) and that he could show evidence that Christ spoke through him (13:3–4). However, it is patently clear that Paul rejected this whole approach to evaluating claims to apostleship and the triumphalist criteria involved. For Paul the marks of true apostolic ministry were its fruit (3:2–3), the way in which it was carried out (i.e. in accordance with the meekness and gentleness of Christ; 10:1) and the sharing of Christ’s sufferings (4:8–12; 11:23–28). He who preaches the gospel of Christ crucified as Lord will exemplify in his ministry the weakness in which Christ was crucified as well as manifesting the power of the risen Lord (4:7–12; 12:9–10; 13:3–4).

We have here, then, two quite different ways of evaluating authentic ministry. The one is triumphalist and stresses only the manifestations of power and authority without any place for weakness and suffering. The other, while also affirming the importance of power and authority, insists that these do not belong to the apostle himself but depend wholly upon the activity of God who chooses to let his power rest upon his servants in their weakness and to manifest his power through the folly of gospel preaching (12:9–10; cf. 1 Cor. 1:17–2:5).

See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

P. Barnett, The Message of 2 Corinthians, BST (IVP, 1988).

C. G. Kruse, The Second Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1987).

D. A. Carson, From Triumphalism to Maturity: An Exposition of 2 Corinthians 10–13 (IVP/UK/Baker Book House, 1986).

P. E. Hughes, Paul’s Second Epistle to the Corinthians, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1961).

R. P. Martin, 2 Corinthians, WBC (Word, 1986).

Outline of contents

1:1–11

The preface

1:1–2

Greeting

1:3–11

Thanksgiving

1:12–7:15

Paul’s response to a crisis resolved

1:12–2:4	Paul defends his repeated changes of travel plans
2:5–11	Forgiveness for the offender
2:12–13	Waiting for Titus
2:14–17	Led in triumph
3:1–3	Letters of recommendation
3:4–6	Ministers of the new covenant
3:7–18	Two ministries contrasted
4:1–6	The conduct of Paul's ministry
4:7–12	Treasure in earthen vessels
4:13–15	The spirit of faith
4:16–5:10	Paul's ultimate hope
5:11–7:4	The ministry of reconciliation
7:5–16	Paul's joy after a crisis resolved

8:1–9:15

The matter of the collection

8:1–6	The example of the Macedonians
8:7–15	The Corinthians urged to excel
8:16–24	Commendation of those who will receive the collection
9:1–5	Be prepared and avoid humiliation

9:6–15

An appeal to be generous

10:1–13:14

Paul responds to a new crisis

10:1–6

An earnest entreaty

10:7–11

Paul responds to criticisms

10:12–18

Boasting within proper limits

11:1–6

The Corinthians' gullibility

11:7–15

Why Paul refuses support

11:16–12:13

The 'fool's speech'

12:14–18

Paul denies craftiness

12:19–21

The purpose of the 'fool's speech'

13:1–10

Paul threatens strong action

13:11–13

Final appeal and greeting

13:14

The benediction

Commentary

1:1–11 The preface

1:1–2 Greeting

1 In his opening greeting to a church in which his apostolic authority had been called into question, Paul describes himself as an apostle of Christ. For Paul, an apostle was one who had seen the risen Lord (1 Cor. 15:3–10; Gal. 1:15–16), had been entrusted with the gospel by him (Gal. 1:11–12; 2:7) and in whose gospel ministry the grace of God was evident (Rom. 1:5; 15:17–19; Gal. 2:8–9). It was on the Damascus road that Christ had commissioned Paul to be an apostle, and that commission was backed by the will of God. Those greeted are described as the church of God in Corinth, reflecting the fact that churches are not just assemblies of like-minded individuals with a religious bent, but communities which belong to God and enjoy a special relationship with him. Those greeted include all the saints throughout Achaia. Here saints carries none of the twentieth-century ideas of canonization, rather it reflects the fact that all believers are God's special possession. 2 Upon all these Paul invokes grace and peace. By grace he means God's care or help; help shown in the sending of his Son into the world for our salvation (cf. 8:9; Rom. 5:8) and in repeated acts of love, help and provision (cf. Rom. 8:32). Peace is primarily that objective peace which God won through Christ's death (cf. Eph. 2:13–18), the realization of which produces in us the awareness of well-being.

1:3–11 Thanksgiving

3 Following the custom of his time, Paul includes a thanksgiving after his opening greeting. Somewhat unusually, this thanksgiving is focused not upon some praiseworthy characteristic of the readers, but rather upon the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort who had comforted Paul in all his troubles (including physical hardships, danger, persecution and anxiety; cf. 1:8–10; 4:7–12; 11:23–29). The comfort he received was sometimes deliverance from his afflictions or anxiety and at other times encouragement in the midst of them. 4–7 Here Paul speaks of comfort as encouragement and strengthening grace in the midst of troubles. He says that we are comforted so that we can comfort those in any trouble with the comfort we ourselves have received from God. One human being cannot bring about divine deliverance from affliction for another, but it is possible to share with another the encouragement received in the midst of one's own troubles. (When Paul speaks of believers' troubles as the sufferings of Christ which flow over into our lives, he probably means suffering endured on behalf of Christ and experienced as part of what the Jews called the 'birth-pangs of the Messiah', i.e. the period of tribulation which was expected to usher in the Messianic age.) Paul encourages his readers by pointing out that while his ministry may have been attended by many troubles it made it possible for them to share in God's comfort. 8–11 Here Paul speaks of comfort as deliverance from troubles. During his ministry in Asia he had despaired even of life itself. God sometimes allows this to happen so that we might not rely on ourselves but on him. Reliance upon God rather than upon one's own native ability is of fundamental importance in the Christian life, yet such an attitude does not come naturally. Very often suffering is needed to make us rely upon God. Paul testifies that while God used suffering to teach him this lesson, on that occasion he was delivered from such a deadly peril.

1:12–7:15 Paul's response to a crisis resolved

Following the greeting and the thanksgiving sections, Paul moves straightaway to respond to the news brought to him by Titus. Before expressing his joy and relief at the news of the Corinthians' display of loyalty to and affection for him, he deals with certain criticisms which could have marred their relationship.

1:12–2:4 Paul defends his repeated changes of travel plans

12 Paul begins by defending his integrity in general. In all his contact with the Corinthians he had acted in holiness and sincerity, not according to worldly wisdom but according to God's grace. The sort of thing Paul contrasts here is expressed more fully in 2:17: Unlike so many, we do not peddle the word of God for profit. On the contrary, in Christ we speak before God with sincerity, like men sent from God. Worldly wisdom is that which resorts to cunning (cf. 4:2) or cleverness with words (cf. 1 Cor. 2:1) to impress the hearer. A ministry according to God's grace is one which relies upon the power of God (cf. 1 Cor. 2:2–5) for its effectiveness. 13 Paul's general integrity extends also to his letter-writing: For we do not write to you anything you cannot read or understand. He did not write one thing but intend another. 14 He concludes by expressing the hope that the Corinthians would come to recognize that he and his colleagues were people of integrity whom they could boast of just as we will boast of you in the day of the Lord Jesus. Paul looked forward to rejoicing on the last day in what God had done in the lives of his converts, and he hoped that in the present they might feel they could boast of what God was doing in him.

15–16 Having defended his integrity in general terms, Paul goes on to justify the changes he made in his travel plans. It was with a sense of confidence in the Corinthians' pride in him that he changed the plans announced in 1 Cor. 16:5–7. He had made the changes so that they might benefit twice—from visits on his way to and from Macedonia. 17 The confidence in the Corinthians with which Paul changed his plans was apparently misplaced. They criticized him because of the changes, so that he had to ask: Do I make my plans in a worldly manner so that in the same breath I say, 'Yes, yes' and 'No, no?' To make plans in a worldly manner implies a readiness to break commitments with little concern for other parties involved, changing 'Yes' to 'No' without any compunction. Paul's question is meant to evoke from his readers an emphatic denial that their apostle would act in such a way.

18–20 To defend his change of travel plans Paul draws his readers' attention to the nature of the message he preached to them: As surely as God is faithful, our message to you is not 'Yes' and 'No' adding that no matter how many promises God has made, they are 'Yes' in Christ. There is not arbitrary breaking of promises as far as God is concerned. And, Paul implies, just as God is faithful in fulfilling the promises of the gospel, so Paul, as a preacher of the gospel, may be trusted not to say one thing about his travel plans and then without real cause do another. 21–22 The reason for this is because it is God who makes both us and you stand firm in Christ. Since it is God who makes Paul stand firm, the Corinthians may know that Paul will act with integrity. Paul adds, He anointed us, set his seal of ownership on us, and put his Spirit in our hearts as a deposit. These are all ways of referring to God's endowing Paul with the Spirit, as both a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come (Paul's share in the coming glory of God) and the means by which God makes Paul stand firm as a person of integrity in the present. 23–24 Paul goes on to show that he had acted with integrity even when he failed to make the return visit he had promised. The reason for the change of plans was in order to spare you. Lest this allusion to disciplinary action be understood to mean that Paul exercised a spiritual tyranny over the Corinthians, he hastens to add, not that we lord it over your faith, but we work with you for your joy. Because of their faith they have their own standing before God and in this respect are subject to no-one else. 2:1–2 The first of Paul's two promised visits turned out to be very painful because of the way in which he came under attack. If he had made another visit it too would have been painful but for a different reason—he would have had to take disciplinary action against the Corinthians causing them grief, and there would have been none left to make him glad. 3–4 So instead of making the second promised visit, he wrote them a 'severe' letter, so that when I came I should not be distressed by those who ought to make me rejoice. It was written out of great distress and anguish of heart and with many tears and must have contained some sort of rebuke to the Corinthians (cf. 7:8–9). However, his purpose in writing it was not to grieve you but to let you know the depth of my love for you. It takes real love to confront a difficult situation, even if some pain is involved, rather than side-stepping it. Paul avoided commending himself but was prepared to take the risk of being charged with doing so in order to set the record straight. If we are to resolve conflict, we too need to be prepared to do this, while avoiding mere self-justification. Greater issues are involved in conflicts among the people of God than our own reputations. Unless such conflicts are handled properly, only Satan gains the advantage (cf. 2:11).

Note. The word conscience is found more often in Paul's letters than in the rest of the books of the NT put together. Unlike the Stoics, Paul did not regard conscience as the voice of God within, nor did he restrict its function to judging one's past acts (usually the bad ones) as was the case in the secular Greek world of his day. For Paul the conscience was a human faculty whereby a person judges his or her actions (whether already performed or only intended) and those of others. It judges human action by the light of the highest standard a person perceives. Seeing that all of human nature has been affected by sin, both a person's perception of the standard of action required and the function of the conscience itself (as a part of human nature) are also affected by sin. For this reason, conscience can never be the ultimate judge of one's behaviour. It is possible that the conscience may excuse one for that which God will not excuse; and conversely it is equally possible that conscience may condemn a person for that which God allows. The final judgment, therefore, belongs only to God (cf. 1 Cor. 4:2–5). Nevertheless, to reject the voice of conscience is to court spiritual disaster (cf. 1 Cor. 8; 1 Tim. 1:19), but we can modify the highest standard to which it relates by gaining for ourselves a greater understanding of the truth.

2:5–11 Forgiveness for the offender

5 Before calling upon the Corinthians to forgive and restore the person who had opposed him, Paul reminds them that the offence had not grieved only him but the whole church in Corinth. 6 Nevertheless, the punishment inflicted on him by the majority is sufficient for him. Here we learn that the church did finally carry out Paul's instructions and discipline the offender (cf. 7:11–12). 7–8 Paul was concerned for the offender himself, lest through the discipline inflicted he be overwhelmed by excessive sorrow. So he urged the Corinthians to reaffirm their love to the repentant offender. 9–10 He points out that he wrote not only to demand disciplinary action but also to test their obedience. They had proved to be obedient to his instructions and now he urges them to forgive the offender, assuring them that he also forgives him. 11 The forgiveness and restoration of the offender is essential in order that Satan might not outwit us, i.e. gain the advantage over the church by depriving it permanently of one of its members and by exploiting moral failure to cause the falling away of the guilty party. Paul's whole approach to the offender is a reminder to us that overt or 'notorious' sin on the part of church members should not be ignored or condoned. For the sake of the church itself, and for the honour of the name of God, disciplinary action must be taken. Paul's approach also reminds us that the purpose of such disciplinary action is the ultimate restoration of the guilty party. Those who preach reconciliation must also practise it. They must not content themselves with the disciplining of offenders but be ready to reaffirm their love to them once they have been brought to repentance.

2:12–13 Waiting for Titus

Some time after Paul's return to Ephesus following the 'painful' visit, and after he had sent the 'severe' letter, he made his way to Troas, where he expected to meet Titus and receive news from him concerning the situation in Corinth. When he arrived he found that the Lord had opened a door for him to preach the gospel. But because he did not find Titus there, he had no peace of mind, so he went on to Macedonia where he hoped to intercept him. The fact that Paul left behind an open door for preaching underlines the anxiety he felt as he awaited news from Titus. The relief Paul experienced when he finally met up with Titus in Macedonia is described in 7:5–16, but before he tells his readers about that he makes a long digression (2:14–7:4), in which he speaks about the nature of his ministry and how he was upheld during very distressing times.

2:14–17 Led in triumph

What Paul has been saying up to this point in the letter could be taken as a rather depressing account of his ministry. He has spoken of hardships suffered in Asia, criticisms of his integrity, pain experienced in Corinth and his inability to settle to preaching in Troas. As if to balance this somewhat depressing account, Paul goes on to strike a positive note, describing how God always and in every place enabled him to carry on an effective ministry.

14 Despite the difficulties, Paul was able to say, But thanks be to God, who always leads us in triumphal procession in Christ. The imagery is probably that of the Roman triumphal procession, and Paul pictures himself as a soldier led in triumph by God. In this context such imagery does not support a ‘triumphalist’ approach to ministry, because Paul has in mind victory through suffering. In the triumphal procession sweet-smelling incense was offered to the gods and Paul says that through us God spreads everywhere the fragrance of the knowledge of Christ. 15–16 Those who make the good news known are like a sweet-smelling aroma to God; to those who obey the gospel they are the fragrance of life but to those who disobey, the smell of death. Knowing that the preaching of the gospel has such serious implications for those who hear it and therefore knowing the heavy responsibility of those who preach it, Paul asks, Who is equal to such a task? (It is not until 3:5 that we find his answer: Not that we are competent in ourselves ... our competence comes from God.) 17 Paul felt this heavy burden of responsibility because unlike so many, we do not peddle the word of God for profit. He refused to tamper with God’s word (cf. 4:2) and remove its offence so that he could peddle it for personal gain. On the contrary, he spoke with sincerity, conscious of his accountability to God.

3:1–3 Letters of recommendation

Paul now answers criticism of his failure to produce letters of recommendation when he came to Corinth. The criticisms probably came from the false apostles and were voiced in the attack on Paul. 1–2 Paul responds by saying that it was absurd that letters of recommendation should have been required of him in Corinth, because you yourselves are our letter. The very existence of the church in Corinth was testimony to the validity of his ministry. 3 The church was a letter from Christ. Paul had been entrusted by Christ to write a ‘living letter’ upon the hearts of the Corinthian believers. For this ministry Paul had been entrusted with the ink of the Spirit. By the grace of God, the letter commended the very ministry by which it was produced. While there are some circumstances in which a faithful ministry is not rewarded by apparent results, such observations should not be used to excuse ineffective ministries in other circumstances. Normally, it is appropriate for our ministries to be judged by their results.

3:4–6 Ministers of the new covenant

4–5 Here Paul answers the question he asked in 2:16, by showing that his competence comes from God. This does not reflect an exaggerated humility, but rather a sober recognition of the fact that spiritual work can be accomplished only by the power which God supplies through his Spirit. 6 Paul's ministry under the new covenant was not of the letter but of the Spirit. The contrast here is between the law of Moses and the Holy Spirit, the primary features of the old and new covenants, respectively. The letter kills insofar as it pronounces judgment upon those who break the law. The Spirit gives life, because under the new covenant sins are forgiven and remembered no more, and people are enabled by the Spirit to live for God.

3:7–18 Two ministries contrasted

In this section Paul uses Ex. 34:29–32 (7–11) and 33–35 (12–18) to further contrast the ministries of the new and old covenants so as to demonstrate the superiority of the former. Paul's primary purpose is to highlight the glorious character of the ministry with which he has been entrusted and so explain why, despite so many difficulties, he does not lose heart (cf. 4:1).

7–11 Ex. 34:29–32 tells of the glory which attended the giving of the law, a glory reflected in the shining face of Moses, which struck fear into the hearts of the Israelites. Paul recognizes that the old covenant was accompanied by splendour, but he argues that the new covenant is accompanied by far greater splendour. The superiority of the new covenant is argued on three counts: the ministry of the Spirit is more splendid than the ministry that brought death (7–8); the ministry that brings righteousness is more splendid than the ministry that condemns (9); and the ministry which lasts is more splendid than that which was fading away (11). The ministry of the old covenant, in which the law condemned transgressors, faded away at the coming of Christ. The ministry of the new covenant is carried out in the power of the Spirit; it gives people a right standing before God, and it lasts because it will not be superseded by another.

12–18 Ex. 34:33–35 tells how Moses veiled his face after communicating God's law to the Israelites, so that they would not have to look upon its brightness. Paul interprets this as an attempt to conceal from the Israelites the fading nature of the splendour which accompanied the old covenant, and he contrasts Moses' lack of boldness with the boldness he himself has as a minister of the new covenant (12–13). He also sees in the veiling of Moses' face something analogous to the veil which lay over the minds of many of his Jewish contemporaries, who could not properly understand the law of Moses when it was read in their synagogues (14–15). Believers, those who have turned to the Lord, have the veil removed from their minds (16), and so with unveiled faces they reflect (or perhaps contemplate) the glory of the Lord, and in so doing are being transformed into his likeness (18).

Paul's primary purpose in highlighting the superior splendour of the ministry of the new covenant was to explain why he was very bold and did not lose heart (12; cf. 4:1). He may also have wanted to use this argument to counteract the teaching of his opponents at Corinth, who placed great stress on their Jewish ancestry (cf. 11:21b–22).

4:1–6 The conduct of Paul's ministry

1–2 Because he was entrusted with such a great ministry, Paul says, we do not lose heart. For that reason also he renounced secret and shameful ways. Negatively, this involved a refusal to use deception or to distort the word of God, (i.e. mingling it with alien ideas; cf. on 2:17). Positively, it involved setting forth the truth plainly. While we need to strive to make the truth of God's word plain to people in the situations in which they find themselves, we do not need, any more than Paul did, to manipulate it to make the word of God effective. Presented in a straightforward way, and in reliance upon the Spirit, the word of God will achieve the results for which God sends it forth (cf. Is. 55:10–11).

3–4 The reference to those to whom Paul's gospel is veiled was primarily to his Jewish contemporaries who did not understand that their own Scriptures pointed to Christ (cf. 3:14–15) and whose minds had been blinded by the god of this age. However, it is clear from other references in 2 Corinthians that Paul in no way saw the activity of the god of this age (Satan) as restricted to the Jews (cf. 2:11; 11:3, 14). Those whose minds have been blinded fail to see the light of the gospel, and the gospel is all about the glory of Christ, who is the image of God. When Paul speaks of Christ as the image of God he may be referring to his humanity (cf. Gn. 1:26: 'Let us make man in our image, in our likeness') or to his transcendence (wisdom was sometimes personified as the image of God; cf. Pr. 8:22–31; Col. 1:15–20). 5–6 If the gospel is about the glory of Christ, then Paul does not preach about himself (as others might do) but he preaches Jesus Christ as Lord and regards himself as a servant of those to whom he preaches. The basis of Paul's ministry is the privilege of having seen for himself the glory of God in the face of Christ (initially on the Damascus road). We can only preach to others the Christ we have met for ourselves.

4:7–12 Treasure in earthen vessels

7 Those who bear the glorious light of the gospel are compared to jars of clay, inexpensive and easily broken; and this serves to show that the power released through the preaching of the gospel is from God and not from us. 8–12 This principle is illustrated by a series of statements (hard pressed on every side, but not crushed ...) and used to show that the power of God not only sustains Paul but works through him to bring life to others (death is at work in us, but life is at work in you). The references to death and life here are not to be taken mystically, but quite concretely, i.e. in the course of his ministry Paul was continually exposed to death (cf. 1:8–10; Rom. 8:36) but at the same time he experienced the power of Christ's life at work in him and through him.

4:13–15 The spirit of faith

Like the psalmist who maintained his faith in the midst of suffering and said, 'I believed; therefore I have spoken' (Ps. 116:10) so Paul says, we also believe and therefore speak. It was his confidence in God who raises the dead that enabled Paul to keep on preaching, knowing that it would bring benefit to his hearers and thanksgiving to God.

4:16–5:10 Paul's ultimate hope

16–18 Though Paul was outwardly wasting away (cf. vs 7–12) he did not lose heart, because inwardly he was being renewed day by day. And in any case, the outward troubles were but light and momentary compared with the weight and eternal character of the glory he was to experience as a result. Paul endured afflictions in the present visible world by keeping before him the glories of the yet unseen world.

5:1–10 It is in this light that Paul proceeds to explain what he looks forward to when the earthly tent we live in is destroyed. 1 How this verse is interpreted determines to a large extent how one understands the whole of 5:1–10. In the overall context of 4:16–5:10, the destruction of the earthly tent we live in refers to the destruction of the body in death. Paul envisaged his afflictions may so intensify that they would result in his death. Aware that the earthly tent could be so easily destroyed, he reminds his readers that we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven. An important factor in determining Paul's meaning here is the parallelism in the verse. What is earthly and threatened with destruction (1a) is to be replaced by something corresponding to it which is eternal (1b). If the former denotes the earthly body of the believer, it seems that the latter refers to another body, i.e. the resurrection body of the believer (cf. Rom. 8:18–23). 2–5 Paul speaks of his longing to be relieved from the burdens he experiences in his earthly body. Not that he longs for a disembodied existence, as the gnostics did, but rather he looks forward to life in the resurrection body. This is what he means by saying, we do not wish to be unclothed but to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling. God has made us for this purpose and gives his Spirit to believers as a guarantee that his purpose will be achieved. 6–8 Up to this point Paul has spoken of the destruction of the earthly body being compensated by the provision of a resurrection body, but without any hint that the former might take place before the latter. Here, perhaps because of an increasing awareness that he personally might experience death before the general resurrection, he turns his attention to this matter. First, he affirms again his confidence in God which causes him not to lose heart (cf. 2:14; 3:4, 12; 4:1, 16), and then he acknowledges clearly that his present situation leaves something to be desired: as long as we are at home in the body we are away from the Lord. What this means can be discovered from v 7, where Paul adds, We live by faith, not by sight. This suggests that to be at home in the body means that God is not accessible to our sight (and in that sense we are away from the Lord), but is accessible to us only by faith. He goes on to say that he would prefer to be away from the body and at home with the Lord, for in such a state the Lord would be accessible to sight, and no longer only to faith. Thus Paul seems to recognize that he will have to experience a disembodied existence if he dies before the second coming of Christ. He provides no clues as to what he thought the disembodied state might be like. What he does in vs 9–10 is stress something which is more important than that.

9–10 Ultimately what matters is not speculation about our future state, but a determination to be pleasing to God in no matter what state we find ourselves. We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and then we will receive what is due to us for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad. In this context the things done while in the body can refer only to what a person does in this life. We are accountable to the Lord for our actions, and we will be rewarded or suffer loss accordingly.

5:11–7:4 The ministry of reconciliation

In this central section of the letter Paul appeals to the Corinthians to be reconciled to God and to open their hearts to himself, their apostle. He clears the ground for these appeals by first responding to criticisms of the style of his ministry (5:11–15) and then by stating the theological basis upon which reconciliation rests (5:16–21). He then makes his appeals (6:1–13; 7:2–4) and intersperses between them a call for holy living (6:14–7:1).

11 Paul claims to act with integrity in all his attempts to persuade people about the truth of the gospel. He is motivated by a healthy fear of the Lord, and what he is lies open before God. 12 Anticipating that his opponents might say that he is just beginning to commend himself again, he says his purpose in explaining his motives is to enable his readers to answer their criticisms. 13 Further, he asserts that if he does appear to be out of his mind, that is something between himself and God, but when he uses intelligible speech, that is for the benefit of his hearers. 14–15 He argues he could not do otherwise than serve Christ, striving to do so with the utmost integrity, for the very love of Christ compels him. He is convinced that Christ died in his stead, and now he wants to live for him. We see here two aspects of Paul's motivation for ministry, each of which ought to be reflected in our own motivation as we serve the Lord. On the one hand, Paul is aware of accountability and so has a healthy fear (11), and on the other, he knows of the great love of Christ and so could not do otherwise than live for the one who died and rose for him (14–15).

16–17 One result of Christ's death and resurrection is that Paul has a new outlook: From now on we regard no-one from a worldly point of view. Attributes and achievements which formerly he would have laid great store by, he now regards as unimportant (cf. Phil. 3:4–8). It also means that he regards Christ in a new way. In his pre-conversion days he judged Christ using worldly criteria and came to the wrong conclusion, but he does so no longer. Something of Christ's great significance is seen in the fact that if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation, so that it may be said, the old has gone, the new has come! To be in Christ is to be participating already in the new creation. It is true that for the time being the old still persists and the new has not yet fully come (cf. Rom. 8:18–25; Gal. 5:16–26). However, in the present passage it is the newness of life in Christ now which is being stressed, not the tension involved in participating in the new creation while still living as part of the old.

18–20 Of this new creation in which believers already participate, Paul says, all this is from God, because it was God who took the initiative in Christ to reconcile us to himself, not counting our sins against us. Having reconciled us, God committed to us the message of reconciliation, so that through us as his ambassadors he appeals to others to be reconciled to him. They need to respond to that appeal so that they too may actually experience the reconciliation. This is the language of evangelism, but surprisingly Paul addresses it to his converts (we implore you), something which becomes even clearer in 6:1–2, 11–13 and 7:2–4.

21 Before continuing his appeal to the Corinthians, Paul makes a highly compressed but extremely profound statement about the work of Christ: God made him who had no sin to be sin for us. Various interpretations of this have been suggested: that Christ was made a sinner; that he was made a sin-offering; that he was made to bear the consequences of our sins. The first suggestion is rightly rejected out of hand. The second can be supported by appeal to Paul's use of sacrificial terminology elsewhere (cf. Rom. 3:25; 1 Cor. 5:7) and to the fact that in the Greek version of Lv. 4:24 and 5:12 the word translated sin here is used to mean sin offering. The third interpretation is supported by appeal to Gal. 3:13, where Paul speaks of the death of Christ in terms of his bearing the consequences of our sins: 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming a curse for us, for it is written: "Cursed is everyone who is hung on a tree".' This interpretation is further supported by the fact that the statement God made him who had no sin to be sin is balanced by the opposite statement, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God. If becoming the righteousness of God means that God has pronounced judgment in our favour and put us in right relationship with himself, then to become sin, as the opposite of that, would mean that God had pronounced judgment against Christ (because he took upon himself the burden of our sins; cf. Is. 53:4–6, 12) with the result that his relationship with God was momentarily, but terribly beyond all human understanding, severed (cf. Mt. 27:46) for us. It is then no wonder that the love of Christ was such a strong motivating force in Paul's life; and once we grasp the significance of the love of Christ for us, it will also be a strong motivating force in our own lives as well.

6:1–2 Paul appeals to his readers not to receive God's grace in vain, i.e. not let their response to the gospel be marred by entertaining criticisms of that gospel or of the one who brought it to them. To underline the gravity of his appeal Paul reminds them that this is now the day of God's favour and implies that they should not receive this favour of God in vain.

3–10 Paul insists that the way he has conducted his own ministry does not constitute a stumbling-block which might hinder their proper reception of the grace of God. Rather, in every way he has sought to commend himself as a servant of God, by enduring hardships (4b–5) and by acting with integrity (6–7), no matter whether his own experiences in the ministry were pleasant or painful (8–10). In all the ups and downs of life and ministry as Christians we need to act with integrity. If we do not, our own lives might become stumbling-blocks for those with whom we seek to share the gospel.

6:14–7:1 Paul digresses in order to urge his readers to have nothing to do with pagan worship but to live holy lives out of reverence for God. The appeal to not be yoked together with unbelievers means here not participating in pagan worship with unbelievers. This is made clear by the series of five rhetorical questions which follow in vs 14b–16, especially the last one: What agreement is there between the temple of God and idols? (16b). Believers cannot participate in idolatrous worship because they are the temple of the living God, and God has said, ‘I will live with them and walk among them’. Because a person cannot both walk with God and participate in idolatrous worship, believers must separate themselves from idolatry. Paul stresses this by appealing to OT calls to have nothing to do with what is unclean and OT promises of God to welcome as a Father those who turn from idolatry (17–18). In the light of these promises Paul urges his readers to leave behind everything that contaminates and to concentrate on perfecting holiness out of reverence for God (7:1). This passage raises problems for the reader because its connection with what precedes and follows is not obvious, and it is difficult to understand why Paul inserted it at this point in the letter. It may be that Paul, deeply concerned to reestablish fellowship with the Corinthians, was reminding them that this could be achieved only if they ceased all involvement with pagan worship. Alternatively, he may have been warning his readers that if they were to join the opposition to him and his gospel, that would be tantamount to siding with Satan/Belial. It is of course possible that Paul had jumped from one subject to another, and that there is no logical connection. Most people who write letters do this occasionally, and we should allow that Paul might have done so here.

2–4 Following the digression of 6:14–7:1, Paul renews his appeal for full reconciliation between himself and the Corinthians, urging them to make room for us in your hearts. In doing so he stresses that nothing in his own behaviour towards them constitutes an obstacle to such reconciliation: We have wronged no-one, we have corrupted no-one, we have exploited no-one. Further, to support the appeal for full reconciliation, he assures them that he has a large place in his heart for them, that he has great confidence and pride in them (3–4a), and that having heard good news from Titus concerning their response to his ‘severe’ letter his joy knows no bounds. Here we see Paul practising in his relationship with the Corinthians the reconciliation he preached to others. Our credibility as messengers of reconciliation depends in part upon whether we are people of reconciliation in our relationships with others.

7:5–16 Paul’s joy after a crisis resolved

In this section Paul picks up again the threads dropped at 2:13. Having been unable to settle to evangelism in Troas without Titus, Paul had crossed over to Macedonia, hoping to meet up with his friend there. 5–7 In Macedonia Paul found himself harassed at every turn with conflicts on the outside and fears within. The conflicts were most likely heated disputations with either unbelievers (cf. Acts 17:5–14) or Christian opponents (cf. Phil. 3:2), while the fears were of either persecution (cf. Acts 18:9) or the spiritual losses that would be incurred if the Corinthians did not react positively to his previous letter. However, God gave Paul great comfort when Titus finally arrived. As well as the comfort of Titus's presence there was the good news he brought of the Corinthians' renewed expressions of longing and concern for Paul.

8–11 Paul tells of the regret he felt over the writing of the 'severe' letter, but that having learned of its effects he regrets it no longer (8). He is happy because the letter led to genuine repentance on the part of the Corinthians, producing much earnestness, great eagerness to clear themselves (of complicity with the offender's attack upon Paul), indignation (against the offender) and alarm (having realized what had happened), longing and concern (to restore their relationship with Paul; cf. v 7) and a readiness to see justice done (by carrying out disciplinary action against the offender). The result of this vigorous response was, Paul says, that at every point you have proved yourselves to be innocent in the matter.

12–13a In the light of this response Paul is able to say to his readers that his essential purpose in writing the 'severe' letter was not on account of the one who did the wrong (i.e. it was not simply to get them to take action against the offender) or of the injured party (i.e. it was not just so that he himself might be vindicated), but rather that ... you could see for yourself how devoted to us you are. Paul, therefore, concludes: By all this we are encouraged. This happy outcome underlines the importance of dealing with conflict situations in a godly way, rather than ignoring them and hoping that they might go away.

13b Paul further explains the reasons for his joy at meeting up with Titus. He was delighted to see how happy Titus was, how his spirit had been refreshed by the Corinthians. 14 Before sending Titus to Corinth, Paul had boasted to him of the Corinthians (probably about their real attitude as a congregation, despite their earlier failure to defend their apostle when he was maligned by the offender), and all Paul had claimed Titus had found to be true. 15–16 As a result Titus's own affection for the Corinthians had been enlarged, and Paul can say, I am glad I can have complete confidence in you.

8:1–9:15 The matter of the collection

Having spoken of his great joy and relief at the news Titus brought of the Corinthians' response to his letter, Paul proceeds to take up with them the matter of the collection which was being made among the Gentile churches to assist the poor Jewish believers of Judea. These had been hit hard by outbreaks of famine during the reign of the Emperor Claudius (AD 41–54), and the largely Gentile church at Antioch (Syria) had responded quickly by sending relief by Barnabas and Paul (Acts 11:27–30). In Gal. 2:10 Paul tells how the leaders of the Jerusalem church, having recognized his apostolate to the Gentiles, urged him to continue remembering the poor, which he was eager to do. By the time Paul wrote 1 Corinthians (c. AD 56) he had already begun canvassing aid from the churches of Galatia, and the Corinthians had heard about it and asked to be allowed to share in this ministry (1 Cor. 16:1–4). And by the time 2 Corinthians was written (c. AD 56) Paul had contacted the Macedonian churches and they had urgently pleaded with him for the privilege of sharing in the service to the saints, and they had been extremely generous in doing so (8:1–5).

8:1–6 The example of the Macedonians

1–2 Paul uses the example of the Macedonians' remarkably generous response to the collection appeal to motivate the Corinthians to complete what they had previously shown themselves ready to do (cf. 9:1–2). The Macedonians, despite the fact that they themselves were undergoing severe trial and experiencing extreme poverty, expressed their joy in rich generosity. 3–5 They not only gave as much as they were able, but even beyond their ability, and that not merely because of the urgency of the appeal, but they gave themselves first to the Lord. 6 In the light of the Macedonians' response, Paul sent Titus to raise again the matter of the collection with the Corinthians.

8:7–15 The Corinthians urged to excel

7–8 Acknowledging that the Corinthians excelled in other graces, Paul urges them to excel also in the grace of giving. However, this urging is not a command to obey—generosity cannot be elicited by command—rather he is using the opportunity which the collection appeal affords to test the genuineness of their love.

9 To support this appeal for love in action, Paul cites the example of the Lord Jesus Christ, who though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that you through his poverty might become rich. It is not economic poverty that Paul has in mind here (the extent of the incarnate Jesus' poverty can be exaggerated), but rather the cost to our Lord in playing his part in the whole drama of redemption. It did include the relatively poor economic circumstances of his incarnate life, but that was only the beginning. There were also rejection, ridicule, persecution, betrayal and suffering, all of which culminated in the agony of Gethsemane and the cross. These things together made up the full price of our salvation. Just as Jesus' poverty here is not to be understood in economic terms, the riches which he makes available to believers are not to be understood as material prosperity in the here and now. It is salvation from sin and the blessings of the new age that constitute the riches which Christ by his poverty enables believers to enjoy.

10–12 Paul advises his readers, in respect of the collection, to finish now what they not only began to do a year ago, but then eagerly desired to do. He explains that if the willingness is there and they give according to what they have, it will be acceptable to God; they do not have to give beyond their means. 13–15 Paul seeks to prevent any misunderstanding about the collection. The Corinthians are not to be burdened so that others may live in ease at their expense. The relative affluence of the Corinthians at the present time should provide the needs of the poor Judean believers. And if at some future time the positions should be reversed, then their plenty will supply what you need. He finds an illustration of the sort of equality he has in mind in the experience of the exodus community. When God provided manna from heaven, 'he who gathered much did not have too much, and he who gathered little did not have too little' (Ex. 16:18). The needs of all were met, no-one suffered want, no-one had an over-supply. The fact that Paul expected the relatively affluent Corinthians to supply the needs of the relatively poor believers in Jerusalem ought to caution us in the way we apply his teaching about giving today. We ought not to apply this passage equally to those who are well-off and to those who are not.

8:16–24 Commendation of those who will receive the collection

Paul here commends the three men who are to come to Corinth to administer the collection. 16–17 First, he commends Titus, highlighting his earnest care for the Corinthians and his willingness to accept the task. 18–19 Secondly, he commends the brother who is praised by all the churches for his service to the gospel and chosen by the churches as their representative to carry the collection to Jerusalem. 20–21 Before commending the third of the brothers, Paul digresses briefly to say why he is taking such pains over the collection. It is to avoid any criticism of the way we administer this liberal gift, so that everything that is done will not only be right in the eyes of the Lord but also in the eyes of men. 22 Finally, he commends our brother who has often proved to us in many ways that he is zealous. 23–24 The passage concludes with a summary commendation of all three and an appeal that the Corinthians give proof of their love (for Paul) and the truth of his boasting about them (to the Macedonians) when the three men arrive. It is worth noting how important earnestness (or zealousness) was to the apostle, both when commending Christian workers and when encouraging believers generally. We might place other qualities higher on our list of priorities, but for Paul earnestness was among the most important (cf. e.g. 7:11–12; 8:7–8, 16–17; Rom. 12:11; 2 Tim. 1:16–17).

9:1–5 Be prepared and avoid humiliation

1–2 Paul acknowledges that in one sense it is superfluous for him to be writing to the Corinthians about participating in the collection, for they themselves had raised the matter with him initially (he referred to their enquiry about it in 1 Cor. 16:1–4). More than that, he had boasted about their readiness to the Macedonians in order to spur them on to participate also. 3–5 But now the crisis precipitated by the offender had intervened and Paul is concerned that when he comes with the Macedonian delegation to receive the Corinthian contribution they might not have it ready. For this reason he writes, I am sending the brothers in order that our boasting about you in this matter should not prove hollow, adding that it would not be only him that would be ashamed if that were to happen; the Corinthians themselves would feel ashamed also. So he sends the brothers to finish the arrangements, so that their contribution will be ready as a generous gift, and not as one grudgingly given, as it would appear to be if it were hastily collected when Paul arrived.

9:6–15 An appeal to be generous

6 Paul encourages his readers to make the generous gift referred to in v 5, by reminding them of an agricultural truism: Whoever sows generously will also reap generously. The ‘sowing’ and ‘reaping’ in this context refer to the contribution the Corinthians are to make and the results of that contribution, respectively. (The hoped-for result is described in vs 12–14.) 7–11 They should not be reluctant in giving, remembering that God loves a cheerful giver, and that as the one who supplies seed to the sower he is able to increase their store of seed so that they might sow generously, i.e. so that they can be generous on every occasion. This was addressed to the relatively well-off Corinthians; it would not have been appropriate to say the same things to the poverty-stricken Judeans for whom the collection was being made. 12–14 Paul describes the results of the anticipated contribution of the Corinthians as supplying the needs of God’s people and expressions of thanks to God. Further, those who benefit will praise God for ... your generosity in sharing with them, and their hearts will go out to you. All this reflects the purposes of the collection: first, that praise and thanksgiving should overflow to God for the work of his grace among the Gentiles; and secondly, that the love and unity between the Jewish and Gentile sections of the church should be enhanced. 15 Paul concludes his treatment of the collection with thanks to God for his indescribable gift, which strikes the same note as that sounded in 8:9.

10:1–13:14 Paul responds to a new crisis

There is a marked change in tone when moving from chs. 1–9 to chs. 10–13. In the former, the tone is basically that of relief and comfort, of confidence in God and in the Corinthians, despite the fact Paul felt the need to explain his changed travel plans and stress the integrity of his ministry. The tone of the latter is marked by satire and irony, spirited personal defence, reproach directed towards the Corinthians and bitter attack levelled at opponents who have infiltrated the congregation (see the Introduction for a discussion of the identity of Paul's opponents). Following the disciplining and reinstatement of the offender, it appears, Paul's opponents, the false apostles, began directly to influence the congregation and poison its members' minds against him. Finding his authority usurped and his apostleship called into question, Paul was forced, against his better judgment, to provide a strong personal defence and to mount a vigorous attack against his opponents. The crisis Paul faced in this situation was the most crucial in all his relationships with the Corinthians, and this fact colours both the tone and content of chs. 10–13 in which Paul made his response.

10:1–6 An earnest entreaty

1–2 Paul begins his response by making an appeal as one who is 'timid' when face to face with you, but 'bold' when away. This is an allusion to the charge made by his opponents following his 'timid' departure at the end of the painful visit on the one hand, and his severe letter written 'boldly' from a distance on the other. He appeals to the Corinthians that they so act that he will not have to be 'bold' towards them as he expects to be towards some people (his opponents) when he makes his third visit. He rejects his opponents' charge that he lives by the standards of this world.

3–6 Paul responds to this charge with an extended use of a military metaphor, asserting that while he lives in the world (i.e. participates in normal human existence with all its limitations), he does not wage war as the world does (i.e. employing merely human and doubtful means). On the contrary, he says, the weapons we fight with ... have divine power to demolish strongholds. Strongholds is an allusion to the towers or raised ramparts used in ancient battles, but here it stands for arguments and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God. It was by the proclamation of the gospel (which involved reasoning and arguing in an effort to remove false barriers thrown up against the truth) that Paul sought to overcome people's resistance and so to take captive every thought to make it obedient to Christ. The imagery here is that of a stronghold breached and those sheltering behind its walls taken captive. Paul's purpose is not only to demolish false arguments but also to bring people's thoughts under the lordship of Christ. Finally, he says he will be ready to punish every act of disobedience (to the gospel on the part of the opponents) once your obedience is complete (i.e. once the Corinthians acknowledge again Paul's authority and the truth of his gospel). A passage such as this reminds us that Christian ministry involves a battle for the mind. False arguments need to be demolished, so that people might yield to the truth of the gospel and find life under the lordship of Christ.

10:7–11 Paul responds to criticisms

7 Referring to his opponents, Paul asserts that he himself is just as much a servant of Christ as they claim to be (later he denies what, for the sake of argument, he here concedes, i.e. that his opponents are true servants of Christ; cf. 11:13–15). 8–11 Paul answers those who said that he boasted somewhat freely about the authority the Lord gave him, and that this boasting was belied by his actual performance when present in person. They said he frightened people with weighty and forceful letters when he was absent and at a safe distance, but in person he was unimpressive and his speaking amounted to nothing. The allusions here are to his strongly worded letter on the one hand and his unimpressive performance when present in Corinth on the other. To those who make such criticisms Paul says, What we are in our letters when we are absent, we will be in our actions when we are present. This is not only defence but also a warning that on his next visit he will take strong action against his detractors (cf. 10:6; 13:1–4).

10:12–18 Boasting within proper limits

12–15a Paul satirizes his opponents as those who commend themselves by comparing themselves with one another! As for himself he says he will not boast beyond proper limits, i.e. on the strength of his commission as apostle to the Gentiles by God and the work he had done at Corinth. 15b–18 It is Paul's hope that as the Corinthians' faith continues to grow (especially as the present crisis is resolved) his own activity among them will greatly expand so that he will have a base for ministry in the regions beyond you. There too he hopes to continue his policy of working where Christ is not known (cf. Rom. 15:20) because he does not want to boast about work already done in another man's territory. Paul ends with a reminder that it matters little what one says by way of self-recommendation. All that matters in the end is the commendation which the Lord himself gives (cf. 1 Cor. 4:1–5). It was with this awareness that he conducted his ministry and, he seems to imply, his opponents did not. It is not for us to boast about our own work for Christ.

11:1–6 The Corinthians' gullibility

1–2a Foreshadowing his speech in 11:16–12:13, Paul says I hope you will put up with a little of my foolishness, explaining that it is the godly jealousy he feels for his readers that forces him to make it. 2b–3 Using the imagery of betrothal and marriage, he sees himself as the agent of God through whom his converts were betrothed to Christ, and he feels under obligation to ensure that they are presented as a pure virgin to him, i.e. to ensure that they remain truly devoted to Christ until he comes again. But Paul fears that just as Eve was deceived by the serpent's cunning, your minds may somehow be led astray from your sincere and pure devotion to Christ. The serpent's seduction of Eve was not sexual, as some rabbinic texts suggested, but rather a beguiling of the mind by denying the truth of what God had said. The story of Eve aptly depicts the sort of danger the Corinthians faced, i.e. that their minds might be led astray. 4 Paul spells out the exact nature of the seduction he fears: the easy acceptance by the Corinthians of a different Jesus, a different spirit and a different gospel from those they received through his preaching. Paul does not tell us in what way they differed. However, we know that Paul's opponents prized highly evidences of power and authority, so it may be that they had induced the Corinthians to accept a Jesus, a spirit and a gospel in which there was no place for weakness, humiliation, suffering and death. Paul preached Christ crucified as Lord, and such a gospel differed markedly from this. 5–6 Paul turns from concern about the Corinthians to personal defence, arguing that he is not inferior to those 'super-apostles' (an ironic reference to his opponents). Even if he, unlike them, is not a trained speaker, he does have knowledge (of the mystery of the gospel which his opponents have failed to understand properly), and this he sought to make perfectly clear to his readers (probably referring to his teaching ministry among them during his first visit to Corinth, as well as the instruction given in letters).

11:7–15 Why Paul refuses support

7–12 Paul responds to criticisms of his practice of working to support himself and having what he earned in this way supplemented by support from other churches. All this enabled him to serve the Corinthians without being a burden to you in any way. But it led to criticism on two counts. First, the Corinthians thought it was below the dignity of an apostle to do menial work; and secondly, they probably felt affronted because he had refused to accept assistance from them, especially when he accepted it from the Macedonian churches while working in Corinth. Paul's opponents could well have construed this as evidence that he did not love them. Paul calls God as his witness that he does love the Corinthians. Nevertheless, he will continue to keep himself from being a burden because he wishes to cut the ground from under those who want an opportunity to be considered equal with us. Paul's opponents wanted to consolidate their position in Corinth by saying that they carried out their mission on the same terms as Paul did. However, there was one crucial area in which their terms were different—they wanted a financial return. If they were bona fide apostles they need not have been concerned about this distinction, for most other apostles accepted remuneration (cf. 1 Cor. 9:7–14). It seems likely that Paul's opponents not only accepted remuneration but greedily extracted it (cf. 11:20), and this would have made them particularly sensitive to the odious comparisons which could be drawn between their behaviour and Paul's. If our ministries as Christians today are to have credibility, we too will need to act with integrity in financial matters. The gospel is brought into disrepute when its messengers are greedy for financial gain.

13–15 Paul now exposes the true character of his opponents as false apostles, deceitful workmen, masquerading as apostles of Christ. He adds their deceitfulness need not surprise, for if Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light, it is little wonder that his servants masquerade as servants of righteousness. Satan's attacks on the church are seldom direct. They are more often subversive, carried out by those within the church who misguidedly serve his ends. This is what Paul fears may happen in Corinth (cf. 11:3–4). Of those responsible Paul says, Their ends will be what their actions deserve (i.e. at the judgment of Christ they will receive what their deeds deserve; cf. 5:10).

11:16–12:13 The 'fool's speech'

Here Paul boasts of his Jewish ancestry, apostolic trials, visionary experiences and the mighty works he performed. He knows such worldly boasting is foolish, but in the circumstances where his converts have been swayed by the boastings of others, he feels compelled to boast a little himself.

16–19 At the outset, Paul asks his readers to receive him even as a fool, so that he may boast a little. In this self-confident boasting, he is fully aware that he is not talking as the Lord would, but as a fool; nevertheless he expects the Corinthians to indulge him in this foolishness, seeing that, Paul says ironically, You gladly put up with fools since you are so wise! (a reference both to the fact they have put up with the boasting of Paul's opponents, and to their pride in their own wisdom). 20 To emphasize the breadth of their own foolish tolerance as far as the false apostles are concerned, Paul adds, You even put up with anyone who enslaves you or exploits you or takes advantage of you or pushes himself forward or slaps you in the face. 21a Paul concludes this paragraph with another statement filled with scathing irony: To my shame I admit we were too weak for that! The Corinthians had criticized Paul for his supposed weakness (cf. 10:10; 11:21). Now he throws that back at them and informs them that he is too weak to make such a display of despicable overbearing authoritarianism as that displayed by the false apostles. 21b–22 Speaking as a fool, Paul asserts that his own Jewish ancestry is just as good as that of the false apostles. 23–29 He claims that he is a better servant of Christ than they are because he has suffered far more than they have. To support this claim, Paul provides a list of his apostolic trials which may be divided into four sections: imprisonments, beatings and being near death, including a detailed explanation of what these involved (23b–25); frequent journeys, with a description of the dangers of travel (26); toil and hardship, with an account of the privations involved in these (27); and anxiety for all the churches, with an example of what caused it (28–29).

30–33 As a final example of the things which show my weakness, Paul narrates the story of his flight from Damascus, his first taste of persecution, which seems to have left an indelible imprint upon him. Unlike the trials list of vs 23b–29, which could be construed as triumphalist (‘All these difficulties I have overcome in order to fulfil my commission’), the ignominious flight from Damascus contains little of which Paul felt he could be proud. By highlighting all these things which show his weakness and humiliation and not his strength Paul presents himself as a true servant of Christ. Jesus said that those who followed him would suffer persecution just as he did, and Paul shows that this was his experience as an apostle. By introducing this idea into the debate going on in Corinth about who were true apostles, Paul not only supports his own claim but also undermines the claims of his opponents.

12:1 Paul now goes on to boast about his visions and revelations from the Lord. He is conscious that there is nothing to be gained by doing so, but much to be lost if he does not. Evidently his opponents had criticized his claim to be an apostle saying that he had not experienced visions and revelations. Paul puts the record straight.

2–4 Of the many visions and revelations he had experienced (Acts 9:4–6; 16:9–10; 18:9–11; Gal. 1:15–16), Paul singles out one which occurred fourteen years ago, and therefore some years after his conversion. Paul felt himself caught up to the third heaven ... to paradise where he heard things that a man is not permitted to tell. He does not know whether this experience was in the body or apart from the body, and neither, therefore, can we. In the literature of both the Jewish and Gentile worlds there are parallels to the apostle’s experience of rapture, and from these parallels three things may be learned of Paul’s experience. First, the experience he spoke of was understandable to his contemporaries. Secondly, such an experience was believed to be awe-inspiring, and this explains in part Paul’s great reticence in describing it. Thirdly, having had such an experience would place him on a level with the great heroes of faith, and by claiming such an experience Paul could completely outflank his opponents.

5–6 It is remarkable that Paul did not make maximum capital out of his experience. Instead, he seeks to separate himself from the Paul who had had that experience fourteen years ago. Having disclosed the bare fact in order to meet the criticism of his opponents, he quickly directs attention away from it and to his weakness as the only safe ground of boasting. Though he adds, to silence criticism, that if he chose to boast he would be speaking the truth. But in fact he refrains because he wants people’s evaluation of him to be based upon what they see and hear of him now, not upon some experience he had fourteen years ago. 7 Instead of making capital out of his experience Paul immediately explains how he was kept from being too elated about it. It is important to recognize that in both the OT and the NT Satan has no power other than that allowed him by God, and that even his evil designs are made to serve God’s purposes. In this case, the messenger of Satan was used by God to keep me from becoming conceited, clearly not what Satan had in mind. There has been much speculation about the nature of Paul’s thorn in the flesh, but there is simply insufficient data to decide what affliction he suffered.

8–10 Paul pleaded with the Lord three times that the ‘thorn’ be taken away. His plea was not granted, but he was told, My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness. In other words, God promised Paul that in the midst of the weakness and frustration which this ‘thorn’ produced, he would find God’s power all the more present. Having heard such a word from God, Paul is able to boast about weaknesses, not because he enjoys them but because he knows that the power of Christ rests upon him in his weaknesses. He then goes on to apply this word of God to other areas of his life in which he confronts weakness and suffering, for when I am weak, then I am strong. Paul's purpose in speaking in this way was not just to help his readers understand more about human weakness and God's power. His opponents had criticized his claims to apostleship on the grounds of weakness (cf. 10:10; 11:21), and they probably regarded the many persecutions and insults that Paul had experienced as inconsistent with his claim to be an apostle. By setting out the divine principle of power manifested through weakness, Paul at once defended his own claim to apostleship and neutralized the criticisms of his opponents. 11–12 Paul is conscious that what he has just said has been an exercise in foolishness, but the Corinthians themselves drove him to it. He says, I ought to have been commended by you, and if that had been done then he would not have had to commend himself. People do not need to indulge in the unpleasant act of self-commendation when their friends, or those to whom they have ministered, take positive action to defend their integrity when it is called into question unfairly. Paul reminds his readers that he is not in the least inferior to the 'super-apostles' in respect of the things that mark an apostle, for signs, wonders, and miracles had been performed by him among the Corinthians. In this respect they were no less favoured than those of other churches that he had founded. 13 The only respect in which they could be said to be inferior was, Paul says ironically, that I never was a burden to you (i.e. he never accepted financial support from them). The significance of this fact had been twisted and used against the apostle as evidence that he did not love the Corinthian believers (cf. 11:7–11). Paul refuses to take such criticisms seriously and responding with great irony says, Forgive me this wrong! He implies that it is a strange thing indeed that they should object to being not burdened or exploited by him (cf. 11:20).

12:14–18 Paul denies craftiness

14–15 Foreshadowing his third visit to Corinth, Paul tells his readers that he will not be a burden to them, because what I want is not your possessions but you. Thinking of his ministry to them as that of a parent to small children he adds, After all, children should not have to save up for their parents, but parents for their children. For this reason he is willing not only to spend everything he has (his financial resources) but also to expend himself (to sacrifice his own life) for them. Following such a statement of his love and commitment to the Corinthians, he asks whether his abundant love for them is going to mean that he will be loved the less by them.

16–18 Paul here indicates why his love for the Corinthians may not be reciprocated. It is because his refusing to burden them financially had been horribly misconstrued by his opponents. So he confronts his readers with the charge levelled against him. Paul's opponents had suggested that he refused support only because he intended to use the occasion of the collection for the poor Judean Christians as an opportunity to benefit himself as well. So Paul asks the Corinthians whether he exploited them through any of the men he sent to arrange for the collection (cf. 8:16–24; 9:3–5), through Titus or the brothers sent with him. He concludes by asking, Did we not act in the same spirit and follow the same course? The question expects a positive answer. Both Paul and those he sent to Corinth acted in the same way, with complete integrity.

12:19–21 The purpose of the 'fool's speech'

19 Paul had felt forced to speak in this way because the Corinthians had been influenced by the boasting of his opponents, and he had to show that he was in no way inferior to those men. But his real purpose, he says, was for your strengthening; it is not to be mistakenly construed as mere self-defence. To strengthen their faith he must expose the false apostles and win back their allegiance to himself as their true apostle and to his gospel.

20–21 And he seeks their strengthening in the faith because he is afraid that otherwise, when he makes his third visit, neither he nor they will find in one another what they desire. He might find them still caught up in sins they had indulged in earlier and of which they remain unrepentant (especially impurity, sexual sin and debauchery). They might find him acting with bold authority against them because of their sins.

13:1–10 Paul threatens strong action

1 Paul warns the Corinthians that if, when he comes on his third visit, they intend to charge him with any misdemeanours, then every matter must be established by the testimony of two or three witnesses. The requirement that accusations must be supported by two or three witnesses is found in Dt. 19:15 and was incorporated by Jesus into his instructions to the disciples concerning church discipline (Mt. 18:16; see also Jn. 8:17; 1 Tim. 5:19; Heb. 10:28; 1 Jn. 5:8).

2–4 Paul also warns them that, since they are demanding proof that Christ is speaking through him, when he comes they will have their proof. It will not be the sort of proof they expect (visions and revelations, signs and wonders etc.); instead it will be the exercise of the power of Christ to discipline offenders. He reminds them that Christ was crucified in weakness, yet he lives by God's power, and in like fashion he himself, though weak, will deal with them by God's power.

5–6 The Corinthians may have in mind to bring charges against him, and to test his claims to be a true apostle, but here Paul tells them to examine themselves, to ensure that they are in the faith. He reminds them that Christ Jesus indwells them (with all the moral implications of that fact; cf. 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19–20), that is, unless they fail the test! Paul then says, I trust that you will discover that we have not failed the test. This is somewhat surprising, for the context leads us to expect that Paul's hope would be that the Corinthians would be the ones to pass the test. The explanation is that by testing themselves and reaching the conclusion that they do hold to the faith, the Corinthians will at the same time be acknowledging that Paul has not failed the test. If they hold the faith and Christ indwells them, that is so because of what they received through the ministry of Paul, and that in turn proves that he is a true apostle, one who has passed the test.

7–9 Paul's prayer for the Corinthians is that they will not do anything wrong. His concern is the Corinthians' well-being and not his own reputation. His assertion that he could not do anything against the truth, but only for the truth is best understood as meaning that he could never act in a way that is contrary to the gospel or its moral implications.

10 Paul sums up the purpose of his letter: I write these things when I am absent, that when I come I may not have to be harsh in my use of authority. In chs. 10–13 Paul repeatedly threatened a severe use of authority (10:5–6, 11; 12:20; 13:1–4); nevertheless, what he says here makes clear that he hoped all along that it would not come to that (cf. 10:2; 12:19–21). Thus, we may say that the purpose of chs. 10–13 was to recall the Corinthians to their allegiance to Paul and his gospel, and so forestall a severe use of authority against them by him.

13:11–13 Final appeal and greeting

Paul's concluding encouragement for his readers is that they should aim for perfection, listen to my appeal, be of one mind, live in peace. In context this means they should reject the different gospel brought by his opponents (11:4), recognize his rightful claims to be their apostle (10:13–18; 11:21–23; 12:11–13), make sure no immoral practices were allowed in their midst (12:19–21) and live in harmony with one another.

13:14 The benediction

The closing call for God's blessing is especially significant because it is the only place in the NT where God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are explicitly mentioned together in such a blessing. Paul highlights the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. 8:9), the love of God (supremely demonstrated in reconciling the world to himself in Christ; cf. 5:18–21) and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit (i.e. participation in the Holy Spirit through being his temple and participation in the fellowship of believers created by him).

Colin G. Kruse

GALATIANS

Introduction

The significance of the letter

The letter to the Galatians deals directly with the most basic theological question faced by the first Christian generation: How does the gospel of Jesus Christ affect the Jewish/Gentile division? The first Christians were Jewish, and at the beginning it was assumed by them that the special character of their nation, and thus the ceremonial observances related to it, would be continued. When Gentiles began to receive the gospel in significant numbers, those assumptions were challenged, and it took a prolonged period of reflection, adjustment and struggle to understand God's purposes for Jew and Gentile.

No document is more important to uncover those struggles than Paul's letter to the churches of Galatia. The Christians in that area had become the object of intense missionary zeal by certain 'Judaizers' who were convinced that the gospel did not set aside the Jewish ceremonies and that, therefore, the Gentile Christians must become Jews if they were to receive God's promise given to Abraham. (Originally the Greek word 'to Judaize' was used to describe the adoption of Jewish ways by Gentile converts to Judaism.) Moved by the Judaizing arguments, these Galatians, who had initially been evangelized by Paul, began to observe the Jewish ceremonies. The apostle realized that such a turn of events undermined the very essence of the gospel of grace. His letter to them reveals Paul's deepest convictions.

As he develops his arguments in response to the teaching of the Judaizers, the apostle touches on a variety of fundamental questions, such as the nature of apostolic authority, justification by faith, the Abrahamic promise, sonship, the role of the law of Moses, freedom, the work of the Holy Spirit and sanctification. It is not surprising that this letter has played a major role throughout the history of the church, most notably at the time of the Reformation in the sixteenth century, when Martin Luther leaned heavily on Galatians to attack the Roman Catholic doctrine of salvation. While the precise focus of controversy between Paul and his opponents—should the Gentiles be circumcised?—may appear to be a distant concern to most Christians after the first century, the central issue is nothing less than the basis of our relationship to God. The answer given by the Judaizers, on the surface, called attention to the Jewish ceremonies, but their deeper commitment—dependence on 'the flesh' rather than the Spirit—can find expression in many other ways.

It is claimed by some modern scholars that this so-called Protestant understanding of Galatians is invalid. However, although Martin Luther and the other Reformers may have missed certain nuances, they were not mistaken to see in this letter God's answer to the issues of that day. Whatever else Galatians teaches, it certainly tells us in clear and vigorous language that our right standing before God can only be an act of grace received through faith in Christ. No church rituals and no human efforts can establish our justification. On the contrary, 'The righteous will live by faith' (3:11).

The situation of Galatia.

Historical setting

With regard to certain historical questions surrounding Galatians, there is very little doubt. Few scholars seriously question, for example, that Paul was the author. Again, the text makes it quite clear that certain individuals were creating spiritual sedition in the Galatian community by preaching a false gospel that pressured the Gentile believers to observe Jewish ceremonies, particularly circumcision (1:7–9; 5:2–3, 7–12; 6:12–13). On the other hand, considerable debate exists regarding the date, the recipients, and the precise occasion for the writing of this important letter.

Many scholars today identify the recipients of this letter as the churches founded by Paul and Barnabas in Iconium, Lystra and Derbe (Acts 14:1–23). They were located in the southern part of the Roman province of Galatia, in the interior of Asia Minor (modern Turkey). The name of this province comes from a region to the north, where the race of Galatians (originally from Gaul) had settled, and a minority opinion holds that the churches in question were located in this area—an opinion that affects the dating of the letter. Appeal is made to Acts 16:6 in support of the view that Paul founded some churches there, but this text is at best ambiguous, and other evidence is not strong.

A more complicated but related question has to do with the dating of the letter. The basic point of the debate is whether Paul wrote Galatians before or after the so-called Apostolic Council in Jerusalem. This event, recorded in Acts 15, is dated by most scholars in AD 49 (certainly no earlier than 48). Paul apparently refers to this council in Gal. 2:1–10, but many have argued that his description conflicts with the Acts narrative, especially since he fails to mention the decree reported in Acts 15:22–29.

Some scholars avoid the problem by arguing that Galatians was written before the council. (This argument assumes that the letter was written to churches in the southern part of the province. The view that the churches in question were located to the north prohibits this dating, since Paul did not evangelize the northern region until after the council.) According to this early dating, Gal. 2 does not conflict with Acts for the simple reason that at the time of writing this letter the council had not yet taken place. Paul's comments, therefore, must refer to a different meeting (probably the one described in Acts 11:29–30). To other scholars this solution appears too easy, especially in view of the strong similarities between Acts 15 and Gal. 2. It is possible to argue that both passages refer to the same event and that the differences can be accounted for by recognizing the very different perspectives of the two authors. According to this view, Galatians must have been written after AD 49, and the preferred date is in the mid-fifties, while Paul was in Ephesus during his third missionary journey.

The controversy about the date of Galatians is not a mere scholarly game. Certain subtleties about the meaning of the letter—to say nothing about larger questions regarding the history of the early church—are indeed affected by one's view of its relationship to the Jerusalem council. The present commentary assumes Galatians was written in the mid-fifties. Nevertheless, since it is not possible to achieve certainty on the question, it would be unwise to interpret the letter in a way that depends heavily on how it is dated. In particular, an effort must be made not to give key explanations that would be rendered invalid by the adoption of an alternate historical setting. Fortunately, the primary thrust of Paul's argument is clear enough and does not revolve around our ability to identify the setting with precision.

Purpose and structure

What then is Paul's argument? The apostle is very explicit when he states that he was moved to write the letter because the Galatians were in the process of deserting the gospel (1:6–7). They had, in fact, returned to ritualistic practices reminiscent of their earlier pagan experience (4:9–10).

Because the individuals who were causing problems in Galatia appear to have undermined Paul's authority, the apostle devotes the first major section of the letter to defending the divine origin of his gospel (chs. 1–2; see especially 1:1, 11–12; 2:6–9). In the next two chapters, appealing to the OT itself, he demonstrates that God's promise to Abraham is received, not by the works of the law, but through faith (cf. 3:6–14). Finally, he finds it necessary, in chs. 5–6, to spell out the practical implications of this gospel of freedom (see especially 5:13–26). These three concerns, however, are subservient to his one great purpose: preventing the Galatians from abandoning the gospel of truth and becoming apostates.

The threefold structure just outlined reflects a common and traditional way of reading Galatians. Recent studies, without necessarily discarding this basic perspective, have attempted to define more precisely the literary character of the letter by examining rhetorical techniques in antiquity. Some scholars view Galatians as an 'apologetic' discourse (something like a judicial defence), while others view it as a 'deliberative' piece (intended to persuade an audience to do something). Another perspective, focusing more on the structure of letters rather than on speeches, sees Galatians as consisting of two main parts, a rebuke section (1:6–4:11) and a request section (4:12–6:10).

Additional suggestions have been proposed by specialists in this field, and the insights of sociological and anthropological research make further contributions to our understanding of the way Paul constructs his arguments. Since a consensus has not been reached on these matters, the present commentary uses a fairly traditional outline to indicate the structure of the apostle's logic. Whatever the precise literary pattern that may have influenced Paul's writing, it is of great importance to interpret each verse or passage in the context of that logic. (See also article Reading the letters).

Further reading

- J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Galatians, BST (IVP, 1968).
 G. W. Hansen, Galatians, IVPNTC (IVP, 1994).
 R. A. Cole, Galatians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1989).
 D. Guthrie, Galatians, NCB (Marshalls/Eerdmans, 1973).
 R. N. Longenecker, Galatians, WBC (Word, 1990).
 F. F. Bruce, Commentary on Galatians, NIGTC (Eerdmans, 1982).

Outline of contents

1:1–10

Introduction

- | | |
|--------|----------|
| 1:1–5 | Opening |
| 1:6–10 | Occasion |

1:11–2:21

Paul's apostleship

- | | |
|---------|-------------------------|
| 1:11–12 | Main proposition |
| 1:13–24 | Substantiating evidence |
| 2:1–21 | Two special cases |

3:1–4:31

Paul's gospel

- | | |
|---------|-----------------|
| 3:1–5 | Initial appeal |
| 3:6–4:7 | Basic arguments |
| 4:8–31 | Further appeals |

5:1–6:10Paul's commands

5:1–12	Regarding circumcision
5:13–26	Regarding love
6:1–10	Regarding burdens

6:11–18Epilogue

Commentary

1:1–10 Introduction

In all of his letters, the apostle begins with an introductory section, which normally includes an opening greeting and a prayer of thanksgiving. These introductions, to varying degrees, contain clues to Paul's concerns. That is certainly the case in Galatians, so special attention should be paid to its distinctives. See also article 'Reading the epistles'.

1:1–5 Opening

A superficial reading of these opening verses might suggest that we have here only one more example of Paul's standard greeting, though perhaps with some slight additions and variations. The basic format is familiar enough: it begins by naming the writer in v 1 (Paul, an apostle); then the recipients are identified in v 2 (To the churches in Galatia); finally, Paul's characteristic greeting is found in v 3 (Grace and peace ...).

A second look, however, makes clear that this opening is rather unusual and that it serves as an important clue to the distinctive character of Galatians. For one thing, the recipients are described in very bare terms; in the other letters, Paul addresses the readers as 'saints' or uses an equivalent expression. The significance of this subtle omission will become clear in v 6.

One should also note how substantial this opening is in comparison with the other letters. (Only in Romans, where Paul had to explain his message to a church that did not know him, do we find a longer introduction.) Especially significant is the theologically charged v 4. Here Paul stresses the self-sacrifice of Christ, a theme that anticipates several powerful passages (e.g. 2:20–21). He also rings the note of deliverance, which reflects his great concern with the contrast between slavery and freedom. This deliverance is given a strong 'eschatological' (i.e. to do with the end-times) colouring. By focusing on the present evil age, Paul reminds his readers that Christ's redemption brings in a new age as the fulfilment of God's promises. Finally, the apostle asserts that God's will is behind these events. The Galatians need to recognize that this message is not Paul's invention: for them to reject it is to reject the divine plan. In any case, the greatness of Christ's work leads to a doxology (an expression of praise) in v 5, something absent from the opening of every other letter.

The most important distinctive feature of the opening, however, is found in v 1, where Paul interrupts the flow of his greeting to make an emphatic denial: his apostleship does not have a human, but a divine, origin. Clearly, some individuals were challenging Paul's authority to speak as an apostle of Christ. The precise nature of those charges is a matter of some debate among scholars, but possibly he was being accused of preaching a peculiar message that contradicted the teaching of the church in Jerusalem. Paul will address this issue more directly beginning in v 11.

1:6–10 Occasion

Anyone familiar with Paul's letters to the churches would expect to see a thanksgiving immediately after the greeting (in the case of 2 Corinthians and Ephesians, 'Praise be to ... God'). Not only is such a thanksgiving missing here, Paul actually replaces it with a rebuke, I am astonished that you are so quickly deserting ... (6). This feature is a very important clue to appreciating the character of Galatians. The opening had already alerted us to something unusual about this letter, but now we realize just how serious and urgent was the situation Paul needed to address.

In describing the Galatians' lapse, the apostle uses the language of military desertion (6) and political strife, some people are throwing you into confusion (7; the same verb is used in Acts 15:24; 17:8, 13). His focus is very specific: the Galatians are in the process of abandoning the gospel's teaching of grace. He does not mean by that, however, a merely intellectual change. Their action is intensely personal: they are in fact abandoning the one who graciously called them to himself. This twofold idea of separation both from grace and from a person occurs explicitly in 5:4, 'You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace'. In view of these words, surely our own reading of Galatians must be more than a historical or intellectual exercise. All readers of this letter are confronted with matters that affect their eternal destiny.

What complicated matters for Paul, however, was that the error into which the Galatians were falling was not simply the result of a weakness among the believers. It had an external source. Certain Jewish Christians, unhappy with the way Paul freely invited Gentiles to come to God, had begun to visit the churches he had established. Their purpose was to 'Judaize' these Gentile believers; to persuade them that, after believing in Christ, they must take an additional step and become Jews through circumcision (see the Introduction).

The apostle considered these Judaizers not merely misguided Christians, but dangerous false teachers. Their message was not in any sense the gospel, but its opposite. Their mission was so destructive, in fact, that Paul was constrained to utter the harshest words found in any of his letters: placing an anathema on anyone who should preach a gospel other than what the Galatians had heard and received from him. The word anathema (used also in 1 Cor. 12:3; 16:22; and especially Rom. 9:3, which is reminiscent of Ex. 32:32) refers to God's own curse, and so the NIV properly translates it, let him be eternally condemned (8–9).

Such strong language would have shocked his readers, and so in v 10 Paul justifies his reaction by calling attention to his own motives. Apparently, the Judaizers had accused him of preaching circumcision when it suited him, so as to win human approval (see 5:11). Paul vehemently denies that he has any other motive than to please God; otherwise, he could no longer be regarded as Christ's servant. In any case, the very fact that he had placed a curse on the Judaizers should convince the Galatians that his actions are hardly driven by a desire not to offend people. Lightfoot paraphrases v 10 as follows, 'You charge me with a policy of conciliation. Yes; I conciliate God' (J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 10th edn. [Macmillan, 1898], p. 79).

1:11–2:21 Paul's apostleship

It has been remarked that in this letter Paul needs to defend himself before he defends his gospel. There is a measure of truth in that analysis. The attacks on his message of freedom for the Gentiles were inextricably tied to questions that had been raised about his apostolic authority. Why should the Galatians listen to him at all? On the other hand, it would be a mistake to view chs. 1–2 merely as a personal defence. The autobiographical remarks are always subordinate to his primary purpose of establishing 'the truth of the gospel' (2:5, 14).

1:11–12 Main proposition

Here, as in 1 Cor. 15:1 and 2 Cor. 8:1, Paul begins a new and important section by using the verb 'to make known' (gnōrizō), which lends a somewhat formal, almost solemn tone to his statement. Interestingly, the parallel in 1 Cor. 15 introduces the comment that he 'received' the basic truths of the gospel (v 3), whereas here in Galatians he makes the opposite point, which indicates that his focus is somewhat different. The expression the gospel I preached (11) may be significant; because of Paul's unique ministry among the Gentiles, his preaching had a certain distinctiveness (note 'my gospel' in Rom. 2:16) that drew a particularly strong opposition from Judaizers.

What follows is a triple negative, confirming—if there was any doubt about it—that Paul is responding to some sort of accusation about the character of his message. The first of these negatives reads, literally, 'is not according to man'. It is a general denial, clearly explained by the next two negatives: since no man either gave him or taught him this gospel, clearly it does not have a human origin. The point is further clarified by the contrasting clause, 'but by a revelation of Jesus Christ' (lit.), which may mean either that Christ was the source of the revelation (so the NIV, from Jesus Christ) or, more probably, that Christ himself was revealed to him (as in v 16).

1:13–24 Substantiating evidence

Paul now proceeds to prove his claim. The proof seems to consist of two major parts. In the first place, he needs to give evidence for the claim itself (1:13–24): he must show that during the formative years of his ministry he did not receive training from the apostles. In the second place, he must deal with two subsequent events that probably had been used by the Judaizers as evidence against him (2:1–21).

1:13–14 Before his conversion. Here the apostle points out that his pre-Christian experience was characterized by two features that are incompatible with his present ministry. In the first place, he was fully committed to the persecution of Christians and the extermination of the church (a point detailed for us in Acts 9). Secondly, he was totally devoted to Pharisaism. The expression the traditions of my fathers probably refers not only to the general teachings of Judaism but more specifically to what is otherwise known as the oral law, an extensive set of regulations that distinguished the Pharisees from other Jewish groups (cf. also Mk. 7:1–13; Phil. 3:4–6).

Why does Paul mention these things? A common answer is that they prove Paul did not get his gospel from Jewish teachers. But whoever would have claimed that this is what happened? Certainly not the Judaizers! In a way, this information supports Paul's claim to speak with some authority about the nature of Judaism. It seems likely, however, that these verses are intended less as an independent proof than as a preparation for what he is about to say. In other words, his previous life demonstrates the need he had for a drastic conversion. Only a divine, gracious intervention can explain the change that came over him.

1:15–16a The revelation. In this powerful description of how God worked in his life, Paul alludes to God's very words to Jeremiah: 'Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, before you were born I set you apart; I appointed you as a prophet to the nations' (Je. 1:5; cf. also Is. 49:1–6). There is little doubt that Paul saw his own ministry, not merely as comparable with Jeremiah's, but more than that, as integrally related to the work of the OT prophets, and in some sense even as its culmination. Now at last the message of salvation is breaking all national barriers. Light has fallen on the lands of the Gentiles, of whom the Galatians are part.

Especially significant, however, is the striking accumulation of terms in vs 15 and 16 that draw our attention to God's sovereign and gracious initiative: was pleased (first verb in the Greek); set me apart from birth; called; grace; to reveal. This strong emphasis on God's predestinating will is meant to leave no doubt whatever about the divine origin of the gospel Paul preached. In particular, it is not his own efforts but God's sole agency that is responsible for his apostolic office.

1:16b–24 After his conversion. The point of this paragraph is clear. Paul wants to establish that in the first years of his ministry, during which the distinctiveness of his preaching was being formed, he did not come under the prolonged influence of the other apostles. He tells us that immediately after his conversion, rather than consulting any man (lit. 'flesh and blood', a phrase that calls attention to the frailty of human beings), he spent three years in Arabia. The region in view, which was ruled by the Nabateans, may have included the city of Damascus at that time (cf. Acts 9:19–22). In any case, Paul's point is that he did not undergo a period of instruction under the Jerusalem apostles. When he did finally return to Jerusalem, his contact with Peter was very limited, and the only other important figure he met was James, the Lord's brother. How restricted his exposure to the early Christian church in Judea was is confirmed by the fact that hardly anyone knew him personally—though they were very much aware of his conversion, a cause for glorifying God.

It is important to note the gravity of Paul's argument. In v 20 he goes so far as to give an oath (before God) that his testimony is true. This is a clear indication that Paul was responding to some very specific accusations. No doubt, the Judaizers were spreading stories to the effect that he had sat under the drawn-out instruction of the Jerusalem apostles as a disciple would normally do under a rabbi. It is also important to note that with v 24 Paul has completed his argument. During the first fourteen (possibly seventeen) years of his ministry, when the character of his preaching was established, he did not have the opportunity to be trained by a human source.

2:1–21 Two special cases

Having established that his early contacts with the disciples could not account for his apostleship, Paul now addresses two specific issues that may have been raised by his opponents.

2:1–10 Conference in Jerusalem. Because this passage is of great importance for reconstructing the early history of the Christian church, NT scholars have paid much attention to it. Detailed and technical arguments have been developed, aimed especially at determining whether the occasion to which Paul refers is the visit recorded in Acts 11:29–30 or the so-called Apostolic Council of Acts 15 (see the Introduction).

In the midst of this debate, it is easy to lose sight of the main question: what is the point of the narrative? There is good reason to believe that Paul is responding to a charge from the Judaizers that may have gone something like this: ‘Paul at one point in his ministry was required to attend a meeting in Jerusalem, submit in private to the Three (James, Peter and John), and agree to obey their instructions, as is proven by his willingness to collect funds for the Christians in Judea.’ If so, Paul may be dealing with this incident, not because he feels some obligation to record every contact he had with the Jerusalem apostles (that aspect of his argument was completed at the end of ch. 1), but rather because his opponents had brought it up and misused it. In other words, Paul needs to set the record straight.

The first point to be noticed is Paul’s emphasis on the cause and purpose of his visit (2). The cause was a revelation: not obedience to a human command, but subjection to a divine instruction. The purpose was to inform the leaders about his ministry and thus make sure that his great apostolic efforts were not in vain. This is a remarkable comment (cf. also Phil. 2:16 and 1 Thes. 3:5, possibly alluding to Is. 49:4), and it tells us something about the tensions that must have been felt at the conference. At least from a human perspective, Paul seemed to think it was quite possible that the church in Jerusalem might make the wrong decision and destroy the ministry to the Gentiles. The apostle’s confidence in God’s will never became presumptuous. He understood the reality of sin and evil as well as the weight of his own responsibility. Though he was certain that God would fulfil his promises and perfect his work (Rom. 8:28; Phil. 1:6), that fact did not become an excuse for passively ‘letting God’ take care of the problem. Paul would continue to exert every effort in running his race (cf. Phil. 3:12–14), all the while depending on God’s working (Phil. 2:12–13).

Secondly, notice that the apostle is frank about the struggle that characterized the meeting (3–5). There was a ‘circumcision party’ in the church—people that the apostle regarded as false brothers, whose real motive was to undermine the spiritual freedom that the gospel provides. Apparently wanting to make the Gentile Titus a test case, they must have insisted that he be circumcised. Paul does not explicitly tell us what was the initial reaction from James, Peter and John, but there is good reason to think that these leaders, perhaps worried about the unity of the church, may have considered yielding to the circumcision party. Because of his special calling, however, Paul understood in a profound way the implications of what was being discussed. Emotions must have run high, as the broken Greek syntax of these verses suggest. The apostle, at any rate, refused to yield to the false brothers even for a moment, so that the truth of the gospel might remain with the Gentiles. In short, the leaders did not compel Titus to undergo circumcision.

Thirdly, Paul devotes half of his narrative concerning the Jerusalem conference to explaining the outcome of the conference, expressed both negatively (6, 10) and positively (7–9). In contrast to the claims of the Judaizers, the fact is that the Three did not impose changes on his ministry and message. True, these leaders wanted Paul to show concern for the poor in Judea, but that request was hardly at odds with his distinctive ministry, so he was all too happy to oblige. (There may well be some connection between this request and the collection that Paul discusses in Rom.

15:25–27 and 2 Cor. 8–9. It is worth noting, incidentally, that Paul saw no conflict between his preaching ministry and his efforts to meet the physical needs of the poor.)

More to the point, however, was the positive outcome. James, Peter and John showed him mutual respect and equality. Specifically, they recognised that God had given Paul a special apostolic gift to work among the Gentiles. There was some irony in this fact. Paul himself would not appeal to the Three as though he depended on their authority (that made no difference to the legitimacy of his ministry). The Judaizers, who had indeed appealed to that authority, however, turn out to be the ones violating the Jerusalem agreement by asking the Gentiles to be circumcised!

2:11–21 Conflict in Antioch. Just as the Judaizers may have appealed (wrongfully) to the Jerusalem conference in support of their charges, so it is possible that they sought to destroy Paul's reputation by exaggerating the dispute that arose in the Gentile city of Antioch. After all, if Paul had the audacity to rebuke publicly the great apostle Peter, did not that behaviour prove that Paul was out of line with the Jerusalem church? Was this not the clearest evidence that he was a disrespectful renegade who should not be trusted?

In response, Paul first gives a brief summary of the incident (11–14). He does not deny that he opposed Peter, but he also shows why that was the only right thing to do. The Jerusalem agreement had in effect recognized a distinction between the ministry to Jews, who could continue practising Judaism even after becoming Christians, and the ministry to Gentiles, who should not be forced to become Jews. But that agreement did not specify what to do if these two principles should conflict. (Note that the so-called decrees mentioned in Acts 15:23–29 also left this matter ambiguous. If that is the same meeting to which Paul refers in this passage in Galatians, the problem at Antioch could still easily be understood along the lines suggested here.)

Table fellowship stirred up precisely such a conflict. If the Christian Jew sat down to eat with the Gentiles, he would have been in danger of violating the ceremonial food laws. On the other hand, if he refused to eat with them, that behaviour would have undermined the principle that Gentiles should be fully accepted as Christians without becoming Jews. By not addressing this problem, the apostles had apparently left the matter to the conscience of the individual. Clearly, the Jewish Christians in Antioch did as a whole choose to commune with Gentiles, thus extending the significance of what the Jerusalem apostles had done. Peter, when he visited the city, was happy to fit into that arrangement, but the arrival of some individuals from James (12) posed a serious problem for him.

It is not at all clear just what was the relationship between these men and James: were they actually sent by him or was that only their claim? In any case, they were Judean Christians who did not have to deal with a strong Gentile presence day in and day out and so failed to understand the situation in Antioch. They would have naturally interpreted Peter's behaviour as a denial of Jewish identity and maybe even as some form of apostasy. Afraid of their judgment and its possible consequences, Peter began to keep his distance from the Gentiles. Naturally, the other Jewish Christians followed suit. If avoiding the Gentiles had been characteristic of Peter's behaviour all along as a matter of conscience, it is conceivable that Paul would not have objected. Peter, however, had earlier shown that he had no scruples about eating with Gentiles. His subsequent withdrawal suggested that the Gentiles could not be fully received as part of God's people. In a sense, he was forcing them to become Jews (14).

'A serious crisis had arisen. But God had not deserted His Church. The Church was saved through the instrumentality of Paul To Paul had been revealed the full implications of the gospel; to him the freedom of the Gentiles was a matter of principle, and when principle was at stake he never kept silent' (J. Gresham Machen, The Origin of Paul's Religion [Macmillan, 1921], p. 102). Accordingly, Paul took the extreme measures that were demanded by the situation. It was not that Peter and Paul had a doctrinal disagreement, as the Judaizers may have suggested (and as many modern scholars assert); it was that Peter's conduct was inconsistent with his principles, as Paul proceeds to explain in vs 15–21.

First, Paul points out that he and Peter, along with all other Jewish Christians, by placing their faith in Jesus Christ, had acknowledged that the Jewish law was unable to make them right with God (15–16). If that is so, it follows that Jews no less than Gentiles are sinners, with nothing in themselves to commend them to God. Because Peter fully recognized this fact, he no longer objected to relaxing the ceremonial laws and thus, one might say, he acted like a 'Gentile sinner' with regard to dietary rules and table fellowship (17a).

Secondly, Paul denies that this abandonment of Jewish observances makes the gospel of Christ an instrument of sin. Quite the contrary, it would be a serious transgression if Paul, having through the gospel set aside those observances, were to follow Peter's lead and reinstate them (17b–18).

Thirdly, in one of the most profound statements in his letters, Paul asserts that it is the law itself, paradoxically, that has led him to this course of action: For through the law I died to the law so that I might live for God (19). I am obeying the law, insists Paul, when I sever myself from it! It is the law itself that tells me to tear it down. How does the law do that? Perhaps the apostle has in mind the fact that Christ came under the curse of the law at the cross and that Christians have died with him (cf. v 20; 3:13; Rom. 6:1–4). More likely, he is anticipating the argument of 3:19–25. By its ministry of restriction and condemnation, the law leads us to faith in Christ, who in turn releases us from the curse and power of the law.

Fourthly, the apostle makes crystal-clear what has motivated him to speak so strongly (20–21). It is the value of the death of Christ, and therefore the principle of grace, that is at stake. If we live to God, it is only because we have been united with Christ crucified (see also 6:14). He gave himself for us, and he makes possible the life of faith. If the Judaizers were right—if we could receive righteousness by observing the law—there would be no need for grace, and Christ's self-giving would have been a waste.

3:1–4:31 Paul's gospel

There is some debate whether the last paragraph of the previous chapter (2:15–21) is a summary of Paul's words to Peter or whether the apostle has already shifted his focus and has begun to address the Galatians directly. It seems very likely that the section reflects, at least to some degree, Paul's speech in Antioch. But even if it is a near-verbatim quotation, Paul certainly has his mind on the Galatians' needs, and so the paragraph functions as a bridge to the central section of the letter. In chs. 3 and 4 the apostle must persuade them that it is righteousness through faith, not the observance of the law, that determines whether they are truly children of Abraham.

The doctrinal argumentation consists primarily of a long section that begins at 3:6 (or 3:7) and ends at 4:7. Both an introductory paragraph (3:1–5 or 3:1–6) and a subsequent section (4:8–20) seem to be appeals to the Galatians' own experience, although we should avoid too sharp a distinction between the intellectual and experiential aspects (e.g. 3:1–5 is not void of doctrinal content, while 3:26–29 focuses on what the Galatians have experienced in Christ). A concluding paragraph (4:21–31) appeals to the teaching of Scripture, though Paul’s argumentation here is quite different from the way he uses the OT in 3:6–14.

3:1–5 Initial appeal

The strongly personal character of the appeal in these verses is apparent from the words I would like to learn just one thing from you (2). Paul’s reflections on Christ’s death, and particularly on the fact that the Galatians’ conduct is a denial of the value of that death (2:21), make him break forth with a battery of questions formulated in highly emotional tones (1, 2, 3a, 3b, 4a, 5). Twice he calls the Galatians foolish; he suggests they have been hypnotized and are abandoning the Spirit. In short, their experience threatens to have been in vain in spite of the fact that through the proclamation of the gospel they saw Jesus crucified before their very eyes. (The verb translated suffered in v 4 may have the more general meaning of ‘experienced’ and thus be a reference to the powerful manifestations of the Spirit.)

It is of special interest to note the contrasts that Paul works with in this passage. In vs 2 and 5, he makes a distinction between observing the law (lit. ‘the works of the law’) and believing what you heard (lit. ‘the hearing of faith’). The latter expression can be translated in different ways, such as ‘the hearing that comes from faith’, ‘the hearing that is accompanied by faith’ or, preferably, ‘the message that produces [or calls for] faith’ (see the similar expression in Rom. 10:17). Although these renderings have somewhat different emphases, all of them communicate the central idea: there is a sharp contrast between a life of Jewish observance and the act of believing the message of the gospel.

The same basic contrast is expressed by Paul differently in v 3: beginning with the Spirit versus ‘finishing with the flesh’ (lit.). The NIV renders the second clause as follows: trying to attain your goal by human effort. This rendering captures accurately the thought but obscures the contrast between the words ‘flesh’ and ‘Spirit’, which is a recurring theme in the letter (see notes on 4:23, 29; 5:13, 16–26; 6:8, 12). The point to be noted here is that Paul is beginning to group a variety of terms that constitute two distinct, and even contradictory, systems. To the one belong works of the law, flesh, slavery, sin, death; to the other, faith, Spirit, inheritance and promise, freedom and sonship, righteousness and life. The first group characterizes the present evil world (1:4); the second reflects the coming of the new age, Jerusalem above (4:26).

By listening to the false gospel of the Judaizers, the Galatians were denying their own verifiable experience of having received the Spirit with all his power and wonders. They must understand that this move represents a backward step. Instead of living like children of the age to come, they have regressed to the elementary things of this world (cf. 4:8–10).

3:6–4:7 Basic arguments

The apostle now proceeds to give a carefully reasoned set of arguments that centre on the relationship between the Abrahamic promise and the giving of the law. V 6 could be viewed as the end of the introductory paragraph or as the beginning of a new one. In either case, it serves as a bridging comment that highlights the real issue before the Galatians, namely, how to become a child of Abraham. As Paul demonstrates that the answer cannot be through law observance but through faith (3:4–14), another inevitable question arises: What then is the function of the law (3:15–25)?

3:6–14 The Abrahamic promise. The quotation from Gn. 15:6 becomes a key factor for Paul, and he will use that text again in Rom. 4 where he expands on the significance of Abraham.

The point is simple: if God credited Abraham with righteousness because he believed, then surely the true children of Abraham are those who believe as he did (cf. Rom. 4:11–12). In addition, Paul quotes another statement from Genesis that focuses on the significance of Abraham’s life for the Gentiles: All nations will be blessed through you (Gn. 18:18; 22:18; cf. Gn. 12:3; 26:4; 28:14). It is as though Paul’s gospel of freedom was already being preached long before the coming of Christ.

Having identified the character of God’s relationship to Abraham (6–9), the apostle moves on to develop a negative proposition in vs. 10–14: righteousness must come through faith rather than law because the law cannot justify. The central argument is in vs 11–12, and it is supported by a double quotation, one from Habakkuk and the other from Leviticus. The reference to Hab. 2:4 is usually rendered (with the NIV) the righteous will live by faith. (Paul’s Greek, but not the corresponding OT Hebrew text, can also be translated ‘the righteous-by-faith will live’.) This passage is fundamental to Paul’s teaching. Indeed, that quotation serves as the very theme out of which the letter to the Romans is developed (Rom. 1:16–17).

Because the Hebrew text is most naturally translated ‘the righteous will live by his faithfulness’, some have argued that Paul is misusing the OT, which appears to be urging obedience to God’s law. However, Hab. 2:4 is itself a very clear allusion to Gn. 15:6 (both passages use the key Hebrew roots for righteousness and faith/faithfulness). The prophet may have had in view the whole of Abraham’s ‘faithful’ life, including the patriarch’s willingness to offer Isaac, but surely that life must be seen as an outworking of the initial act of faith. Though in ch. 3 Paul does not develop the ethical implications of faith, it is clear from 5:13–6:10 (and from Rom. 6–8) that he regarded an obedient life (faithfulness) as inseparable from the faith that justifies. The apostle is not using Hab. 2:4 for purposes that contradict the original. One could even argue that his theology of faith and righteousness grew out of Habakkuk’s dependence on the Abrahamic pattern.

Also problematic is the way that Paul seems to set Hab. 2:4 in opposition to Lv. 18:5, ‘The man who does these things will live by them’, with the inference that ‘the law is not based on faith’ (lit. ‘the law is not from faith’). Without question, the apostle recognizes a basic contrast between the Mosaic administration and the ministry of the gospel (cf. 2 Cor. 3:6–18). But does that mean that he views the law in itself as opposing the principle of faith? Certainly not, as the very context of ch. 3, particularly v 21, makes clear. The focus of this whole passage is the role of the law to obtain the Abrahamic inheritance, righteousness and life (see especially v 18). The law would indeed contradict the principle of faith if the purpose of the law were to justify. In other words, it was the Judaizers themselves (very possibly appealing to Lv. 18:5 for their position) who brought law and promise into opposition by telling the Gentiles that in order to receive the Abrahamic promise they must submit to the legal observances.

In any case, Paul uses the contrast between these two texts (Hab. 2:4 and Lv. 18:5) as proof that the law cannot provide righteousness. The argument is further refined, however, by two other quotations, one in v 10, the other one in v 13. The first one comes from Dt. 27:26, which places a curse on everyone who does not fully perform the works of the law (in other words, the law curses rather than justifies). The second one comes from Dt. 21:23, which Paul takes as an anticipation of the curse-bearing work of Christ. We need not despair about the law’s inability to justify and its power to curse. Christ, by his death, delivered (redeemed) us from that curse and thus brought to fruition the Abrahamic promise through the Spirit (14).

3:15–25 The place of the law. Having expressed himself rather negatively about the law, Paul may have sensed the need to expand on how that law fits into God’s purposes. Just what is the relationship between it and the promise to Abraham? His answer focuses on the fact that the law is both later than the giving of the promise (15–18) and earlier than the fulfilment of the promise (19–25).

First, then, the apostle points out that the law covenant was given by God more than four centuries after the Abrahamic covenant had been established. (The word translated covenant usually means ‘will’ or ‘testament’, but was used by the LXX to render the standard Hebrew term for ‘covenant’. Whether Paul intended a double meaning is difficult to tell.) His point is clear: it is not conceivable that the later covenant could undo the earlier one. But that is in fact what the law would do if it could offer the inheritance on a basis other than that of a gracious promise. The teaching of the Judaizers in effect creates an unbearable conflict between the two covenants (17). The inheritance comes either by grace or by the works of the law; and since it comes by the former, it cannot come by the latter (18; cf. Rom. 4:5). In the course of the argument, Paul reminds the Galatians of something that they (and probably even the Judaizers) accepted, namely, that the promise to Abraham’s seed finds its fulfilment in Christ (16). This point will become important in the argument that follows.

Secondly, Paul stresses that the law came earlier than, and in a sense prepared the way for, the fulfilment of the promise (19–25). The main point here is the temporary character of the Mosaic law. It was given for a period, until the coming of the seed, Christ (19). Once the reality of faith came in the person of Christ, the law’s supervisory function ceased (25). Rather than contradicting the promise, the law served God’s purposes by ‘imprisoning’ its sinful subjects, by guarding and restricting them much as in the Roman world, the paidagōgos (a slave charged with the supervision of children) corrected those under him. (The term paidagōgos occurs in vs 24 and 25, but is not translated literally in the NIV.) In other words, the Mosaic administration was subordinate to the Abrahamic covenant and in effect prepared its subjects for the manifestation of the gospel. This idea is further elaborated in 4:1–7.

The subordinate character of the law’s function is brought out in a variety of ways in v 19. First, it was added, i.e. it was not the original covenant. Secondly, it was given because of transgressions, which may mean that the law was intended to restrain sin or, more probably, to bring transgressions to light (Rom. 3:19–20; 4:13–15; 5:13) and even to augment them (in the sense of Rom. 5:20; 7:7–11). Thirdly, it was put into effect through angels by a mediator, which suggests some inferiority to the Abrahamic covenant (the precise significance of v 20 is unclear, even after much scholarly discussion and many interpretations). In short, the law cannot impart life, cannot justify. Far from annulling the gracious character of the promise, the law furthers God’s purposes and teaches us to die to that law (2:19) so that we may be justified by faith.

3:26–4:7 Conclusion: true sonship. The word ‘sons’ (Gk. huiōi) in v 26 is a key term that had first been introduced at the very beginning of this important section (v 7, translated ‘children’ in the NIV). This is an important clue to understanding the logic of Paul’s argument. We may think of vs 26–29 as a recapitulation of that argument. But just as a composer does not merely repeat a theme at the end of a symphonic movement, so here Paul is not content to speak of Abrahamic sonship. Instead, he takes the idea a step further: You are all sons of God (a concept he will expand in 4:1–7). Other prominent themes in the chapter are woven into this passage: the promise (14), inheritance (18) and faith in Jesus Christ (22). As an earlier commentator noted with reference to v 29: ‘The declaration of verse 7 is now at length substantiated and expanded by 22 verses of the deepest, most varied, and most comprehensive reasoning that exists in the whole compass of the great Apostle’s writings’ (C. J. Ellicott, A Critical and Grammatical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians [J.W. Parker and Son, 1854, p. 72]).

In addition, two other important points are brought up here for the first time. First, oneness in Christ. Of course, the notion that the gospel has undone the division between Jew and Gentile (cf. Eph. 2:11–18) lies behind everything that Paul is saying in this letter. In v 28, however, the apostle gives expression to that truth in powerful fashion, stressing that other divisions as well (slave/free, male/female) have no bearing on our standing before God. While this verse has been used and abused in the attempt to develop a Christian ethic, we cannot afford to ignore its great significance for the subject at hand. And especially in our day, when we have become very conscious of the destructive power of prejudice—whether based on ethnic identity, social standing, or gender—we should both rejoice in this gospel that countenances no spiritual preferences, and learn to conduct ourselves in a way that sets forth that truth before a confused world.

The second theme made explicit here is that of union with Christ. The idea is already suggested by Paul's emphasis on faith in Christ, but it is heightened by the reference to being baptized into and clothed with Christ (27; cf. Rom. 6:1–4; 13:14; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10), by the statement that we are one in Christ (28), and by the summary comment that we belong to Christ (29). It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of this doctrine for Paul's teaching; this is what gives coherence to everything he says about salvation. We begin to see more clearly why Paul spoke of Christ as the seed: we are Abraham's seed only insofar as we enjoy union and solidarity with the seed.

A superficial reading of 4:1–7 might suggest that here the apostle is beginning a new section. In fact, this is part of the conclusion to his doctrinal argument. It consists of an illustration that clarifies what was said earlier about the supervisory function of the law. What is more important, the passage serves to bring to a powerful climax the doctrine of sonship.

The figure of the paidagōgos (used in the Greek of 3:24–25) gives way to that of guardians and trustees in 4:2. Because they are the ones really in charge, the son of the household is not much different from a slave in an important respect—the possession of the inheritance. The child has to wait for the sovereign disposition of the father on the appointed day. The Israelites are still primarily in view here (those under law, v 5), but Paul introduces a new term, stoicheia (basic principles, v 3; see also v 9), that allows him to extend the reference to the Gentiles as well. The point seems to be that just as the pagans are subject to certain elementary principles of ceremonialism, so in some sense were the Jews. (Alternatively, some scholars believe the term may refer to angelic and demonic powers; cf. Col. 2:18, 20.)

In any case, this slave-like condition remained until the time of fulfilment, when the Son of God became man and subjected himself to the same law so that he might liberate us and make us sons (4–5). At this point the apostle reintroduces the theme of the Spirit, with which he had initially appealed to the Galatians (3:3; cf. also 3:14 and possibly the reference to baptism in 3:27). Only now the significance of the Spirit is tied directly to the doctrine of sonship. Since we have received the Spirit of God's Son, our hearts are conscious that God is our Father and that we are full heirs. Note carefully the expansion of these ideas in Rom. 8:14–17, 26–27.

4:8–31 Further appeals

Although, strictly speaking, Paul has now concluded the doctrinal argumentation, he wishes to reinforce his teaching by appealing both to the Galatians' experience (8–20) and to the testimony of the law itself (21–31).

4:8–20 An appeal to the Galatians’ experience. Vs 8–11 remind the Galatians of their life in paganism. This passage is something of a bridge to the next one (12–20), but it would be a mistake to view it as merely parenthetical and not to appreciate that it follows upon a strong statement (7). The point of this paragraph is the frightening fact that the Galatians, who in effect have tasted the coming age (4), were going back to slavery. The contrast is made most striking by the concept of ‘knowing God’: their earlier practices can be explained by virtue of the fact that they did not know God, but such conduct is inconceivable now that they know him. Paul then qualifies his words by pointing out that rather than saying that the Galatians know God it is more appropriate to say that they are known by God as he initiated and established the relationship. This brief paragraph ends with a statement full of pathos (11), which recalls 2:2 and 3:4 and which leads naturally to the more personal section that follows.

Vs 12–20 are not easy to understand. The passage is obscured by allusions to events with which the Galatians were quite familiar but about which we know nothing. Moreover, Paul’s language is emotional and abbreviated. V 16 seems to suggest that there had been some communication between Paul and the Galatians after the Judaizing threat had made itself felt. Further, the words You have done me no wrong (12) are most naturally understood as a response to something that may have been said by the Galatians. On the other hand, the explicit reference in vs 13–15 implies Paul also has in mind their initial evangelization: ‘At that time, even though I was not a Judaizer but had rather become like you, you, far from wronging me, received me very well’.

Even though it is difficult to sort out the details of this passage, its basic thrust is clear enough. The Galatians’ attitude to Paul had changed markedly. If they would but remember his early contacts with them—both his sickness and their kind attitude towards him—they would surely reconsider their present behaviour. That behaviour, in some way, is the result of some individuals who want the Galatians to pay exclusive attention to them and thus to shut out Paul’s influence (17). The Galatians should consider carefully the motives of these people (so v 18, a difficult statement that can be translated several ways).

Paul concludes this section with another poignant remark (19–20). His emotional distress in dealing with the Galatians can only be compared with labour pains. Then, with a deliberate mixing of metaphors, the apostle identifies their most basic need, namely, that Christ be formed in them. In other words, they must be transformed into the image of Christ (Rom. 8:29). Paul’s pastoral heart is revealed in these words and in his intense desire to visit them so that he could speak to them face to face.

4:21–31 An appeal to the testimony of the Torah itself. Treating this passage as another appeal—and thus not as part of the basic argument—might suggest that the paragraph is not too important. Indeed, some view the irony of v 21 as evidence that Paul does not really mean what he is saying. The truth is, however, that the Hagar—Sarah story plays a very important role in Paul’s effort to persuade the Galatians. Moreover, the specific distinction between Ishmael and Isaac will become crucial as the apostle elaborates his doctrine in the letter to the Romans (ch. 9, especially vs 6–12). Still, it is proper to recognize that this Genesis story is not the basis of his view of justification, a doctrine that was clearly explained in the previous chapter. It may even be the case that the story had been brought up by the Judaizers themselves and so Paul had to respond to it (this suggestion cannot be proven, however).

Much discussion has surrounded the meaning of v 24, These things may be taken figuratively. Paul uses the Greek term allēgoroumena, and so a more literal translation might be, ‘These things are written allegorically’, or ‘These things may be interpreted allegorically’. Paul certainly is not making use of the allegorical method made famous by Philo of Alexandria, which strongly downplayed (or even denied) the historical character of OT narrative and which served as the vehicle for formulating complex philosophical systems. In view of the somewhat specialized meaning that the term allegory has today in the minds of many (the corresponding Greek term could be used in several, more general, ways), it is probably misleading to use it in describing what Paul is doing in this passage.

On the other hand, there is no question that the apostle here sees something that is not part of what we usually call ‘the historical meaning’ of a passage. The author of the Genesis narrative, as far as anyone can tell, was not seeking to distinguish between two covenants, nor was he trying to depict the relationship between Judaizers and Gentiles. Is Paul then mishandling the OT?

It is important to keep in mind that throughout the history of redemption one can see clear patterns in the ways events unfold. Perhaps the most obvious is the pattern of ‘testing resulting in disobedience’, seen clearly in Adam, and the Israelites in the wilderness, then broken by Jesus in his temptation. Especially important is the distinction between natural and supernatural, i.e. what humans tend to do in their own strength versus what they depend on God’s power to accomplish. That principle is communicated many times in the biblical history, and the story of Ishmael and Isaac is a particularly powerful example. Surely God was teaching his people to depend on him for their salvation. What could be more appropriate than to bring out that principle and apply it to the Galatian controversy?

Some scholars prefer to use the term typology (rather than allegory) to describe Paul’s method here. The point is that history, far from being minimized in the interests of theology, is seen as embodying that theology and thus anticipating later events as fuller manifestations of the principle in view. Further, some suggest that even if the human author of Genesis did not have in mind what Paul does with the passage, the divine author did. This approach can easily be abused to justify all kinds of misinterpretations, but it is surely true that an omniscient God (to say nothing of his foreknowledge) clearly sees the implications of events in ways that contemporary humans cannot even imagine. For Paul, it could not be a coincidence that the Genesis story had such important points of correspondence with the Judaizing issue. These correspondences are presented in the form of contrasts, as follows: Hagar/Sarah; slave/free; Sinai covenant/(new) covenant; present Jerusalem/Jerusalem from above; Ishmael/Isaac; ordinary birth (flesh)/birth through promise/Spirit; persecutor/persecuted; cast away/heir.

Out of several interesting ideas implied by these contrasts, at least two require special attention. First, note the reference to the present Jerusalem over against the one from above (25–26). It is clear that Paul’s thought is strongly influenced by an ‘eschatological’ or ‘last-days’ view of biblical history, according to which the coming of Christ is said to bring in the age to come. The point surfaced in 1:4 and undergirds such ‘fulfilment’ passages as 3:23–25 and 4:4 (cf. also 1 Cor. 10:11).

Secondly, note the contrast between flesh and promise/Spirit in vs 23, 29 (The NIV’s rendering of the Greek ‘flesh’ as born in the ordinary way, expresses the idea correctly, but at the expense of the theological contrast.) That contrast was first brought up in 3:4 (see the comments there), so it is significant that this central section of the letter both begins and ends with such a reference. These terms are strongly related to the ‘last-days’ understanding of the gospel. The flesh—i.e. fallen human nature working in its own natural strength—is the distinguishing characteristic of the present age. The Holy Spirit, on the other hand, inaugurates the coming age, so that Christians may even be said to be sitting in heaven (Eph. 2:6; cf. Phil. 3:20; Col. 3:1–4). The ethical significance of this contrast is developed in 5:13–26.

5:1–6:10 Paul's commands

As is common in his letters, Paul follows up the doctrinal section with a set of calls to action. It is disputed whether this section begins at 5:1–2 or 5:13. Certainly, vs 1–12 include much doctrinal content, and the fact that the central issue in those verses is circumcision should not be ignored. There is, nevertheless, a noticeable shift of tone at v 2 (v 1 serves a bridging function and could easily be viewed as the conclusion of ch. 4). The matter is not of great importance.

More significant is the decision to describe this section as 'Paul's commands'. Such a title highlights one of the more interesting problems arising here. How does Paul reconcile all of his negative statements about the law with the many commands included in the letter? Is there a basic inconsistency in Paul's theology when he seems to encourage the Galatians to fulfil the law (5:14) or when he says we should do things against which there is no law (5:23)? This issue should be kept in mind when making an effort to understand Paul's teaching.

5:1–12 Regarding circumcision

The solemn statement of v 2 (cf. 2:21), combined with the frightening language of v 4 (cf. 1:6), indicates not merely that circumcision has no positive value but that for the Galatians it is actually harmful. From one perspective, it is a matter of indifference whether one is circumcised or not (note v 6 and the parallels in 6:15 and 1 Cor. 7:19). However, for a Gentile to submit to circumcision as a sign of submission to the law would be 'pernicious and fatal in itself' (Lightfoot).

Paul supports his strong statements in two ways. First, in v 3 he argues that the initial act of circumcision implies a commitment to do everything the law says (cf. Jas. 2:10–11). Anyone who places confidence on his or her own works needs to understand that God demands perfection (Mt. 5:48). The Judaism of Paul's day, generally speaking, did not fully understand this concept. Much of rabbinic interpretation consisted of attempts to relax the strict demands of the biblical commands, with the inevitable result that people thought they could indeed satisfy God's demands by their efforts.

Secondly, in vs 5–6 Paul claims that the true Christian experience is characterized by faith. This is a faith of solid expectation: it eagerly awaits God's final demonstration of righteousness, when his truth will be vindicated and his people will receive the final verdict of 'not guilty'. It is also a faith generated and sustained by the presence of the Spirit; once again, Paul emphasizes the crucial role played by the Holy Spirit in the Christian's life. Finally, this faith is very much at work through the ministry of love (the Greek verb in v 6, energeō, 'work', is rendered weakly by the NIV, expressing itself). 'For the disclosure of the apostle's fundamental idea of the nature of religion, there is no more important sentence in the whole epistle, if, indeed, in any of Paul's epistles' (E. de Witt Burton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians [T. & T. Clark, 1921], p. 279). One must not think that Paul's opposing faith to the works of the law means that faith is passive. On the contrary, faith makes possible genuine work. This principle prepares the way for the commands in vs 13–26.

Before moving to them, however, Paul must issue still another personal appeal. To a large extent vs 7–12 are an attack on the opposition. The Judaizers are making the Galatians stumble. Their teaching, which acts like leaven, is incompatible with the divine calling. Paul is confident that they will be judged and even utters a wish that they be mutilated (possibly an allusion to the mutilating practices of pagans in Asia Minor, but very likely also a reference to castration, which, incidentally, disqualified Jewish men from becoming priests). In v 11 he also defends himself from the apparent charge that he was inconsistent and that, when it suited him, he supported circumcision (perhaps an allusion to his having Timothy circumcised; Acts 16:1–3).

The ‘negativism’ of these verses should not obscure what Paul’s primary purpose is. He wishes to express his confidence in the Galatians. Their initial response to the gospel (You were running a good race, v 7; cf. 4:13–16) encourages him to believe that they will take no other view (10). The only reason they have faltered is the outside influence of the Judaizers, so the apostle takes comfort in the fact that there was good evidence for the genuineness of the Galatians’ faith. (Cf. also the encouragement of Heb. 6:9–12 after the strong words at the beginning of that chapter.)

5:13–26 Regarding love

The one who called the Galatians in grace (8; cf. 1:6) called them to exercise the rights and enjoy the blessings of freedom (13a). Paul knows, however, that freedom can be turned into licence, and so he must make crystal-clear what are the lofty obligations of those who have been freed. In this passage the apostle goes into some detail as he describes both the abuse of freedom and its right use.

Freedom is abused when it becomes an excuse to indulge the sinful nature (13b; lit. ‘a pretext for the flesh’). Paul is very specific about the type of conduct he has in mind. In vs 19–21 he even lists the acts of the sinful nature (lit. ‘the works of the flesh’). These acts seem to be viewed as falling into four groups: sexual impurity, idolatry, dissension and intemperance. Most of the sins listed by Paul belong in the third category, and that suggests that the Galatians were particularly susceptible to sins involving personal relationships. That suggestion is confirmed by the emphasis that the apostle gives to this problem. In v 15 he talks about the danger that they may destroy each other by their mutual biting and devouring. And at the end of the paragraph he adds one final warning against conceit and envy (26).

The implications of such conduct should have been well known to the Galatians: the apostle had warned them on an earlier occasion that those who live like this will not inherit the kingdom of God (21). It was truly ironic that these Christians, who were seduced by a message of law-keeping, should fall into behaviour that blatantly contradicted their faith. Their emphasis on the flesh—literally, through circumcision, but more importantly, through their dependence on their own effort—led them indeed to perform the works of the flesh in another sense. Our efforts to please God in our own strength result only in sinful behaviour. (See on 3:4.)

Paul also makes clear what is the right use of freedom: serve [lit. be slaves to] one another in love. The entire law is summed up in a single command: ‘Love your neighbour as yourself’ (13c–14). The principle of a working faith (6) is now developed. And as he had listed the works of the sinful nature, so he specifies the kind of conduct that flows from communion with the Holy Spirit (22–23). It is worth noting that the fruit of the Spirit here consists primarily of attitudes and actions that enhance personal relationships, precisely the great weakness of the Galatians. The qualities of joy and peace probably refer not to subjective feelings but to the way we deal with each other. Even the term faith could be understood as ‘faithfulness’, again in personal relationships. There is also emphasis on kindness and patience.

But how can we achieve these goals? As Christians, we often wish we had quick formulas that would take care of our spiritual problems. The biblical material resists that kind of attitude.

Yet if there is any passage that sounds like a formula for sanctification, it is Gal. 5:16, So I say, live by the Spirit, and you will not gratify the desires of the sinful nature. As Paul goes on to explain in the following verse, the Spirit and the sinful nature (flesh) are mutually exclusive. Thus, if we are occupied in pleasing the former, we will not please the latter.

Notice, moreover, that Paul's commands (the 'imperative') are rooted in the facts of our Christian experience (the 'indicative'). The reason we may be encouraged in our spiritual life is that when we placed our faith in Christ we gave a fatal blow to the power of the flesh (24; cf. Rom. 6:1–4). So, if our life proceeds from the Spirit, it is only appropriate—indeed, it is incumbent upon us—to conduct ourselves according to his lead.

Finally, notice how this passage helps us to understand a little better Paul's teaching about the law. Although he earlier spoke very strongly against the use of the law as a means of gaining the inheritance, he does not question the value of the law as a revelation of what God's will is for us. If our life is ruled by the Spirit, we are not subject to the condemnatory power of the law and thus we need not fear it. It is, therefore, right for us to 'fulfil' the law (14), to perform those acts that the law does not condemn (23). Here is freedom indeed.

6:1–10 Regarding burdens

Having presented a lofty picture of the Christian life, Paul now addresses the very real possibility of sin (1). Although the principle of living by the Spirit is no mere idealism, the apostle knew perfectly well that believers will falter, and he may have feared that the Galatians would respond harshly to one of their own if he or she failed to meet the high standards just described. Accordingly, he points out that if they are spiritual (that is, having and being led by the Holy Spirit), they ought to respond gently (lit. 'with a spirit of gentleness'), always conscious that each of us is susceptible to temptation.

In vs 2–3 Paul continues the thought but generalizes somewhat. Restoring a believer who has sinned is but an example of the broader obligation that we have to bear each other's burdens. Anyone who balks at this obligation, thinking that he is above such weaknesses, only deceives himself. In a striking and ironic allusion to the Galatians' concern with the Jewish laws, Paul describes burden-bearing as a fulfilment of the law of Christ. Most likely, this notion is to be related to 5:14, the love commandment. Clearly, the wonderful freedom for which Paul had fought during his ministry and especially in this letter does not entail an abandonment of moral obligations.

Paul's concern that the Galatians should be conscious of the burdens and weaknesses of others, however, could lead to a sense of superiority and thus to sinful boasting. So in vs 4–5 he calls to mind the need and propriety of looking only at oneself for evaluation, i.e. one should look at the weakness of others only for purposes of compassion, not of comparison (cf. 2 Cor. 10:12–18). In that sense, each must bear his or her own burden. We might paraphrase: 'If you are intent on boasting just look at yourself; don't be like the Pharisee who compares himself to the publican, but rather use God's standard, and then you will find that boasting can only be in God' (cf. v 14; 1 Cor. 1:26–31).

With v 6 the apostle moves to another topic (though perhaps it does bear some relation to burden-bearing): namely, the responsibility to meet the needs of Christian workers. While it is possible that Paul has in mind more than finances (all good things), the verb share (Gk. koinōneō) is used elsewhere by Paul to speak of financial contributions (see Rom. 12:13; 15:27; Phil. 4:15; the noun is used similarly in Rom. 15:26; 2 Cor 8:4; 9:13). Stinginess in our giving, financial or otherwise, is like mocking God. But in fact God cannot be mocked (7), and if we devote our resources to satisfy the sinful nature (lit. ‘sow to the flesh’) rather than the Spirit, we will receive what is due to us (8; cf. 2 Cor. 9:6).

The apostle ends this section of the letter with a summary of how he hopes the Galatians will act (9–10). At every opportunity, we must make the effort to do what is good, and we should be particularly alert to meeting the needs of the Christian community. While there may be many discouragements along the way, we must take courage with the assurance that God will vindicate his people. At the appropriate time, we will certainly reap the fulness of God’s own goodness.

6:11–18 Epilogue

This final paragraph conveys strong emotion, highlighted both at the beginning (11) and at the end (17). It was customary for Paul to add a note with his own hand (cf. 2 Thes. 3:17; possibly this was done as a safeguard against forgery, 2:2). However, pointing out the large size of his handwriting—a comment he makes nowhere else—adds considerable poignancy to the passage. It is unfruitful to speculate whether this remark tells us something about the state of his eyesight or about his social standing. Rather, it has an emotive purpose: ‘The boldness of the handwriting answers to the force of the Apostle’s convictions. The size of the characters will arrest the attention of his readers in spite of themselves’ (Lightfoot).

Similarly, Paul clearly addresses the emotions of the Galatians when he appeals to the marks of Jesus that he bears on his own body (17). Perhaps alluding once again to charges of insincerity (see 1:10; 5:11), he reminds his readers and opponents that his claims are not vain. The wounds he has suffered because of his faithfulness to Christ are the clearest evidence that the Galatians need not doubt his motives. As some interpreters have pointed out, the battle with the Judaizers is continued to the very end of the letter.

That battle takes on a new twist, however, in vs 12–14 for here Paul makes explicit what has been only under the surface up to this point (cf. especially 4:17–18). In short, the apostle goes to the heart of the matter by unmasking the Judaizers’ own motivation. The real reason they are intent on circumcising the Galatians is that, afraid of being persecuted, they want to make a good impression outwardly. The word outwardly is a translation of the literal phrase, ‘in the flesh’. Through a powerful play on words, Paul calls attention to the fact that the rite of circumcision is performed on the (physical) flesh, and that is a clear indication that the Judaizers live in the realm of the flesh (as that term was used in 3:3; 4:23, 29; 5:13, 16–26; 6:8; in other words, opposed to the Spirit). In spite of their claims, their obedience to the law is at best selective—their true purpose is to boast in the fact that they have placed a mark on the flesh of the Galatian Christians.

At this point the apostle introduces one of the most important recurring themes in his letters: boasting in Christ. The clearest sign of unbelief is to be found in the tendency to boast in ourselves, when the only legitimate grounds for boasting is God (see especially Rom. 5:11; 1 Cor. 1:29–31; 2 Cor. 10:17; Eph. 2:9; Phil. 3:3). Here, Paul is more specific. He will boast only in the cross, the instrument through which Paul and the world have been severed from each other. As suggested by Col. 2:20, the world refers to external ordinances (cf. 4:9–10), but of course includes sin (5:24) and the old self (2:20; cf. Rom 6:6). Those who by faith are united with Christ partake of his death on the cross and are thus removed from the power of sin.

This confession of v 14 leads in the following verse to a repetition of the principle of 5:6, but now the conclusion is startling. In both passages, circumcision and uncircumcision are said to be of no value. What is valuable, according to 5:6, is faith working through love; here in v 15 it is the new creation, an idea developed in 2 Cor. 5:17. Once again Paul reminds us of the eschatological (fulfilment) character of the message of the gospel (see on 4:25–26). Even more remarkably, the same principle is repeated in 1 Cor. 7:19, but there, instead of faith or new creation, the valuable element is said to be ‘keeping God’s commands’, a statement that helps us put in perspective Paul’s ‘negative’ remarks in Galatians about the law.

In any case, this principle of the new creation (or faith working through love) is the true rule by which we should walk (16). The verb translated follow is the same translated ‘keep in step’ in 5:25. Clearly, Paul wants us to understand that the rule we should follow is the Spirit-led conduct described earlier. And that is hardly surprising, since the Spirit is the clearest manifestation of the new creation.

Those who so walk receive a very special benediction of peace and mercy (16), to which Paul adds, even to the Israel of God. The word translated even is literally ‘and’. According to some, Paul is drawing attention not only to the church, but also to the ethnic nation of Israel as recipients of the benediction. But if that nation, composed of both believers and unbelievers, can truly enjoy peace and mercy, Paul would seem to be contradicting the heart of his message: the true descendants of Abraham are those who believe in Christ and have been delivered from the law. The NIV is, therefore, most probably right in translating the word, even (or ‘namely’; this meaning is not uncommon). If so, one can appreciate the power of this statement as an argument against the Judaizers: the true Israel lives by a different principle from that of submission to the Mosaic law.

The benediction of v 18 appears to be nothing but a variant of the usual letter closing. There is, however, a notable difference: the addition of the word brothers in an emphatic position, at the very end. This is quite unexpected and reveals the apostle’s intensely pastoral heart. In effect, this one word softens the severity of the whole letter by stressing Paul’s confidence that the Galatians are truly God’s people and that, therefore, they will respond to the truth as they should (cf. 3:4; 5:10).

May every reader of this letter acknowledge the grace of Christ, the freedom of the gospel and the power of the Spirit. And may all of us attend to the circumstances in which God has placed us, so that our faith will indeed work through love in the lives of those around us.

Moisés Silva

EPHESIANS

Introduction

Ephesians is breathtaking in its theological grasp of the scope of God’s purposes in Christ for the church. It is a pastorally warm letter and spiritually sensitive in its advice, peaceable in tone and readily overflowing into joyful worship. But it is also rather different from Paul's other letters. All except this one address some very specific situations in the churches to whom he wrote. Typically, they abound in local colour, they contain closely reasoned and rhetorically forceful teaching probing the theological dimensions of some central problem, and they combine this with carefully related application in the form of appeals to the readers. The apostle's sentences are usually short, often blunt.

In Ephesians, by contrast, what would normally be the 'teaching' part is largely taken up with the praise of God (1:3–14) and with a report of Paul's prayer for his readers (1:15–3:21 with important digressions at 2:11–22 and 3:2–13). This leads immediately into exhortation (chs. 4–6). Throughout the letter the sentences are usually very long and have a slightly liturgical sound. What is even more unusual is that the whole letter is so heavily dependent on Colossians: passage after passage can be explained as a rewriting of the key themes of Colossians, and about a third of its actual wording is taken over. How is all this to be explained?

Authorship

Although the early church uniformly supported the Pauline authorship of Ephesians, many modern scholars (including the most important commentaries by Schnackenburg and Lincoln) have disputed it. They have tried instead to explain the letter as the writing of a student and admirer of Paul's, bringing the apostle's gospel to his own later generation. The arguments hinge largely on the issues raised above, and on alleged subtle shifts away from a Pauline perspective to a later one. The issues are too complex to deal with at length here but are summarized in the commentaries by Caird (pp. 11–29) and Foulkes (pp. 19–49). Our own position is that Paul is indeed the author, and that alleged differences from the Paul of the other letters are either misunderstandings of Ephesians (some of the important ones will be raised in the Commentary), or are to be explained in terms of the special nature and circumstances of the writing of this letter.

The life-setting of the letter

While a prisoner in Rome (some time around AD 61–62), Paul had occasion to return a converted slave, Onesimus, to his Christian master Philemon living in (or near) Colosse. To cover the delicate situation Paul wrote to Philemon. He sent both this letter and the returning slave in the care of one of his co-workers Tychicus (Col. 4:7–9), and he used the occasion to write to the whole church at Colosse too, warning against false teaching on the horizon there. To get to Colosse, Tychicus and Onesimus would have naturally sailed to Ephesus, and then struck east for the Lycus valley along the main Roman road to the Euphrates. Paul had himself based his Asian mission (AD 52–55) in the great and thriving city of Ephesus (Acts 18:19–20:17; 1 Cor. 15:32; 16:8, 19; 2 Cor. 1:8–11), and so it would have been natural for him to write a letter to the church there and send that with Tychicus too (cf. Eph. 6:21–22 and Col. 4:7–9).

The letter we have bearing the name 'Ephesians' was, however, not written primarily to the 'saints in Ephesus' (1:1). Indeed, the words 'in Ephesus' are not found here in the earliest manuscripts, and 1:15 and 3:1–3 assume that Paul and the majority of his readers have heard reports of each other, but not necessarily more. The letter also ends without the customary personal greetings which we would expect in a letter addressed to Ephesus (cf. Rom. 16; Col. 4:10–17). These features have suggested to many that Ephesians was actually intended as a circular letter for the churches of the whole Roman province of Asia (including the seven mentioned in Rev. 1–3). Perhaps, more plausibly, it was written for the churches along or near the road Tychicus would have taken from Ephesus to Colosse, including Magnesia, Tralles, Hierapolis and Laodicea. (Ephesians may in that sense be the letter Col. 4:16 refers to as the ‘letter from Laodicea’.)

The nature and purpose of the letter

Most of the unusual features of this letter can best be explained in terms of our understanding of its life-setting. Its purpose is not to face some particular false teaching in a specific congregation, but to encourage all the (mainly Gentile) churches of the area Tychicus was passing through. What better way for Paul to do this than by celebrating the accomplishment in Christ of God’s great purposes (1:3–14), and including a report of how he was praying for the readers, interceding that they might joyfully grasp the central message of the gospel and the wonderful privilege to which they had been admitted (1:15–2:10; 3:1, 14–21). It is not quite realistic to argue that the letter is un-Pauline because it substitutes prayer where Paul normally has teaching; the truth is rather that the letter teaches the core content of Paul’s gospel in the form of a call to worship and prayer-report (and the digressions at 2:11–22 and 3:2–13 more fully explain the teaching implicit in these). The choice of a worship/prayer form for most of the first part of the letter itself dictates the more ‘elevated’ and liturgical style, which then not unnaturally extends throughout (and is similar to the style of Paul’s prayers elsewhere). And if Paul had just written the letter to the Colossians, and had it still to hand, is it really surprising that he should remodel it for the more general readership?

The central message of the letter

Ephesians makes dominant a theme which was already important in Colossians, namely cosmic reconciliation in Christ (cf. Eph. 1:9–10, 20–23; 2:10–22, and 3:6 with Col. 1:19–20). The OT maintained that the universe was the creation of God who was one, without peer or rival, and all was initially in harmony with him (cf. Dt. 6:4., recited daily by Jews, and Gn. 1). According to Jewish understanding, however, the willing subjection of all things to God dissolved into a rebellion of competing claims. People became progressively alienated from God and then from each other, symbolized in the exclusion from the Garden of Eden, the murder of Abel, and the fiasco of Babel. God was still the Lord of the universe (as all from Jos. 3:11 to Josephus Ant. 14:24 affirm), he still gave it unity, and that unity came to clearest expression in Israel’s obedience to the one God, following one law and worshipping in a single temple. ‘The nations’, however, were divided from God, and from Israel, by their worship of idols. And even Israel, called to express within herself the unity of creation, was marred by factions. She was divided within herself. At the root of all this, as far as Judaism was concerned, was the conflict between the Lord God, and the powers of Satan.

By contrast with what was going on at the time, the day of the Lord was seen as the day when God would subject all competing powers to himself and thus restore the universe to harmony. So, as Zc. 14:9 puts it, ‘And the LORD will become king over all the earth; on that day the LORD will be one and his name one’ (NRSV). The Messiah is thus a Prince of Peace (Is. 9:6) who even pacifies nature (Is. 11:1–9; 2 Baruch 73:1). When he comes all opposition will be torn down, Israel will be restored, all nations will come to revere the one God (Tobit 14:6; Sybylline Oracles 3:808), and they will worship him in the one temple in Jerusalem (Is. 2:2–4; 56:6–7; 60–62; Mi. 4:1–4; Zc. 8:20–23; 14:16–19; Jubilees 4:26).

All this could be called cosmic reconciliation. Ephesians teaches that this purpose has been begun in Christ and will be consummated in him. In him alienation has been destroyed and reunification begun: the old division of humanity into Jew and Gentile has been overcome (2:10–16); and the older alienation of humankind from God surmounted too (2:17–18). Christ has begun to ‘fill’ and unite the universe (4:10), bringing peace. But to say these things have begun in him is also to say they are experienced by those united with him, namely by believers. This leads to an awesome, majestic vision of the church. The universal church of Jews and Gentiles is the place Jesus fills (1:23); it is the place where the world and the powers are to see the cosmic reconciliation already under way (3:6–10). By union with Christ, the church is already the one heavenly temple (2:19–21), and it must above all strive to maintain that unity which witnesses to God’s purpose (4:1–6). Paul’s appeal in chs. 4–6 draws out how to live in a way that reflects God’s new creation of unity, harmony and peace.

This note of cosmic unity in Christ has sometimes been confused with universalism (i.e. that God will ultimately save all his creatures, including the hostile powers). That is not indicated: 5:6 still anticipates the wrath of God on the persistently disobedient, and 5:5 warns of sins that exclude from the kingdom of God. What is being affirmed is that all of the new creation will be united in Christ, but parts of the old creation will not participate in the new one.

Later writers like Ignatius and Irenaeus stressed the institutional unity of the catholic church on earth, under bishops, elders and deacons. By contrast the emphases here are the regular Pauline ones on a single universal church of Jews and Gentiles as the historical manifestation of the heavenly temple, and world-wide reunification (as we shall see in the Commentary). Paul was in prison precisely for trying to strengthen the unity between the Jewish and Gentile churches (see on 3:13).

Two related features of the letter are also especially significant: the focus on ‘the powers of this dark world’ (6:12), and the emphasis on present salvation. C. Arnold has shown how prevalent magical beliefs and the associated fear of spiritual powers was in Ephesus and the surrounding area. Colossians was written partly against such fears (Col. 1:13, 16; 2:8, 15, 18, 20) and so it is not surprising that Paul’s letter to the Ephesians should take up this theme afresh. Arnold has shown there are much stronger allusions to such fears in Ephesians than is usually supposed, and that a major part of the letter’s purpose is to counteract them by insisting on the greater power in Christ and in believers united with him (see on 1:19–23; 2:1–7; 3:9–10, 15–16, 20; 4:8; 6:10–17).

A number of scholars believe Ephesians distorts the genuinely Pauline tension between what we shall receive and be when the new age or new creation comes into being, and what we already experience of that in Christ. Ephesians, it is said, has too little about future salvation, seeming to assume that it is already virtually fully realized in Christ. The fact is, however, that Paul’s emphases differ according to context. To the over-confident Corinthians he stressed the ‘not yet’; to the Galatians, wondering whether they should embrace the law to ensure salvation, he stressed the ‘already’. Colossians and Ephesians both stress the ‘already’ to encourage believers who are prone to fear the spiritual powers of the universe. If they are already saved from those powers, it is in the limited sense that they have been united with the victorious Christ in the heavenly places, and so brought decisively under his influence (2:1–9). Believers are now free to fight back, and do so from a strong position. The battle, however, is not over (6:10–20) even if the outcome is assured by our union with Christ (cf. Col. 3:1–4). The present is the evil age (6:12–13, 16), and our real redemption lies in the future (4:30; cf. 1:14; 4:13); hence the stress on understanding our hope (1:18).

The main challenge of Ephesians

This letter challenges the pietistic individualism and corresponding weak doctrine of the church that we so often find in evangelicalism. ‘Don’t look at the church,’ we say, ‘Look at Christ!’ Paul, however, expects the outsider to see Christ and God’s unifying purpose for the world precisely in the church. The challenge for a fragmented and ever-dividing Protestantism today could barely be sharper: Ephesians calls us to build bridges not minefields. It is also a challenge for those who promote separate white and black churches, segregated rich, middle-class, and ‘worker’ churches etc. Such homogeneous groups may naturally get on better together, but how do they reflect the gospel of reconciliation? Ephesians challenges all of us to find better ways of making our local churches real communities of people whose lives and worship together as a church witness to the cosmic unity begun in Christ, and are deeply imbued with his presence.

See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Ephesians, BST (IVP, 1979).

F. Foulkes, Ephesians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1989).

R. P. Martin, Ephesians, BBC (Broadman, 1971).

G. B. Caird, Paul’s Letters from Prison (OUP, 1976).

A. Lincoln, Ephesians, WBC (Word, 1990).

Outline of contents

1:1–2

Address and salutation

1:3–3:21

Paul’s thanksgiving and prayer

1:3–14

Celebration of God’s eternal plan

1:15–2:10

Paul’s report of his thanksgiving and prayer for his readers begins

2:11–22

A digression: the church, cosmic reconciliation and unity: the new temple

	3:1	The prayer-report continued
	3:2–13	A digression: elaborating Paul’s apostolic ministry
	3:14–21	Paul’s prayer report completed and a doxology
4:1–6:20		Encouragement to live out the gospel of cosmic reconciliation and unity in Christ
	4:1–6	Opening appeal to a life that exposes new-creation harmony
	4:7–16	Christ’s victory gifts and growth towards Christ
	4:17–6:9	Appeals to abandon the life of the old humanity and live according to the new creation
	6:10–20	Final appeal: fight the spiritual battle together!
6:21–24		Postscript

Commentary

1:1–2 Address and salutation

This basically follows the form of greetings and address in other Pauline letters. The words in Ephesus do not appear in our earliest manuscripts, but the grammatical construction left suggests that even earlier manuscripts had two place-names. A. Van Roon suggests they read ‘to the saints in Hierapolis and Laodicea, who are faithful in Christ Jesus’, but Ephesus and Laodicea (the two ends of the journey Tychicus would have taken) would more easily account for how the letter came to be known as Ephesians. (See the Introduction).

1:3–3:21 Paul's thanksgiving and prayer

1:3–14 Celebration of God's eternal plan

Paul opens the body of the letter with a eulogy to God (as in 2 Cor. 1:3–4 cf. 1 Pet. 1:3–5). This paragraph of joyful celebration (which, in the Greek, consists of a single long sentence) has neither the regular metre of Greek hymns, nor the line-by-line parallelism of Jewish psalms, but it is a carefully structured composition of six sections. It is best understood as a stately prayer, or call to worship, designed to lift the readers' eyes away from themselves, and from their fears, to the majesty and love of God revealed in his unfolding plan, and to the privilege of participating in it. The content (as with Paul's introductory thanksgivings in other letters) is deliberately selected to introduce the main themes of the letter; this section is thus a key to understanding the letter as a whole.

As in similar Jewish prayers, this eulogy opens by pronouncing God worthy of blessing (3a), and a description follows which expands and justifies it. This description falls into six sections (3b–4; 5–6; 7–8; 9–10; 11–12; 13–14), but they are not of equal prominence. Paul's Greek highlights three particular clauses as more central to the composition. He says God has blessed us ... with every spiritual blessing (3b); predestined us to be adopted as his sons (5) and made known to us the mystery of his will (9).

The sections built around these clauses (3b–4; 5–6 and 9–10) actually provide the core of what Paul is saying. In each case the focus is on the Father's action (i.e. he is the subject of the verb), and the point is that God is to be seen as worthy of praise precisely because he has performed the actions concerned. In the other three sections, God is not the subject of the actions, rather the focus is on what 'we' (all Christians) have received in the Son (7–8; 11–12), or on what the readers have begun to experience through the Spirit (13–14; note the change to 'you'), as a consequence of God's action.

The concentration of past tenses has misled a number of interpreters into thinking that in Ephesians salvation is viewed as already complete. As we shall see, however, it would be truer to say that Paul celebrates the fact that future salvation has been inaugurated and assured in Christ.

3–4 The opening words are perhaps best rendered 'Blessworthy is ... God', rather than 'Blessed be ... God' (NRSV, NJB, REB) or Praise be to ... God, and what follows gives the grounds for pronouncing him 'blessworthy'. Paul, however, is not arguing; he is beginning to extol God and implicitly invites his readers to do so too, so the alternative translations convey the right sense. Paul next identifies God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for it is precisely in the Son (and the gospel of what the Father accomplished through him) that the readers have truly come to know God, and begun to recognize him as worthy of blessing.

The first reason for acclaiming God 'blessworthy' is that he has so richly blessed us (3b). Paul is, of course, aware that he and his readers have not yet themselves experienced every spiritual blessing, hence his qualifications. We have received this blessing only in the heavenly realms and in Christ. That is, the blessings of the age to come (cf. 1:21), or the kingdom of God, have been decisively bestowed on Christ who reigns at God's right hand ('in the heavenly realms', 1:20–21), and so are assured to us, his people, through him. Moreover, as we are united with him (cf. 2:6), we already begin to participate in some of those hoped for blessings (we shall see which, and how, as we proceed through the letter).

This essentially future blessing, which we have begun to experience in Christ, is further assured on the grounds of God's election (4). Even before creation God chose a people (in Christ) who would stand before him holy and blameless in love. Note that the thought here is not primarily of the election of individual people to the church (though that may be implicit), to be holy and blameless before him in the world (as at Phil 2:15). The primary thought is rather that God eternally chose a people in Christ (us, i.e. the church), to be holy and blameless before him at the final judgment (as at Col. 1:22, which is in Paul's mind here), and so enter into the full blessings of the Messianic age, and new creation.

5–6 This section explores further the thought of v 4. Centrally, it reminds us that God's elective pleasure and will for his people is our future full adoption as sons through Jesus Christ (5). Paul believed there was a sense in which believers already enjoy 'sonship' to God, loving filial obedience inspired by the Spirit (cf. Rom. 8:14–15; Gal. 4:6). He saw this, however, mainly as a first instalment or foretaste of a much fuller kind of adoption to sonship. Thus he says creation awaits the revelation of the sons of God (Rom. 8:19), and we still 'wait eagerly for our adoption as sons' (Rom. 8:23), which will be brought about through the resurrection and new creation. Taken with Eph. 1:4 and 12–14, it is probably this latter 'new-creation' sonship that is meant here. In other words, God has elected the church for that full and glorious sonship to him that will result from our resurrection-transformation into the likeness of Jesus (in this full sense through Jesus Christ; cf. 1 Cor. 15:42–49; Phil. 3:21; Col. 3:4).

Because this sonship is the result of God's gracious will, put into effect through Christ, it will redound to God's praise (6a). And because we are already united with Christ through the Spirit, that grace, including sonship, can be said to be already freely bestowed on us; providing this is qualified by the assertion, in the One he loves (i.e. Christ; cf. Mk. 1:11; 9:7; Col. 1:13).

7–8 This subordinate section develops v 6b. In our union with Christ we already participate in the benefits of the future redemption of the world from evil which God assured through Christ's atoning death. (Blood is a biblical metaphor for sacrificial atoning death [whether the death was through loss of blood or not; cf. Jon. 1:14] because originally it was the blood of the animal sacrifices that was actually offered). The particular benefit Paul singles out for special mention here (as Col. 1:14) is forgiveness of sins—not because this is the only part of the future blessing that we already experience now, but because it is at the root of the others. Until sins are dealt with, humankind is alienated from God and his benefits (see 2:1–3; 11–22; 4:17–19; 5:8–14). Indeed, Paul clarifies that the grace of forgiveness is also accompanied by those of spiritual wisdom and understanding which are at the heart of our walk with God as Father (and for the deepening of which he prays in 1:15–23; 3:14–19).

9–10 This section returns to the affirmation of what God has done, and so why he is 'blessworthy', and provides its climax. God has made known to us in both understanding and experience the mystery which has always been at the centre of his will. In Ephesians 'mystery' means something too magnificent to be fully grasped. The mystery God has made known to us is the central implication of what he 'set forth in Christ' (NRSV; against NIV) that is, in his ministry, death and resurrection-glorification. It is a mystery concerning 'the fulness of the times' which first and foremost denotes the times which follow the end of this age (the kingdom of God, and the new creation). But Paul believes 'the fulness of the times' is already anticipated where Christ is enthroned in the heavenly realms, and that believers share in that in him. The content of the mystery is God's intent 'that the universe, everything in heaven and on earth, might be brought into unity in Christ' (correctly REB; NIV's bring ... under one head, even Christ rests on poor etymology, though, in the light of vs 20–23, it well expresses how Paul thinks God will achieve that unity). For the theological significance of this unity, and for its central importance for the letter, see the Introduction. Essentially then, God's 'blessworthiness' is affirmed on the grounds that he has shown us in Christ and in the church the beginnings of his master-plan to restore the cosmos to himself, and to the harmony lost through rebellion and consequent alienation.

11–12 Like the next section, these verses cease to focus on God's activity and (like vs 7–8) explore our participation in it all in Christ. They partly repeat the assurance that by union with Christ we are predestined to become trophies of God's grace, that evoke creation's praise of God (cf. 6a). This emphasis on fore-ordination does not eclipse real human choice and responsibility, as the appeals of the rest of the letter make clear, but assures us of God's overarching sovereign power and directing purpose at work in the believer (see Carson). The emphasis would have been particularly appropriate for readers from the Ephesus area who were especially prone to fear the decisive influence of other powers (see Arnold).

Most translations (notably NJB) and commentators see v 12 as distinguishing we Jews or Jewish Christians, first to hope in Christ, from you (13) Gentile Christians who came to faith later. But the 'we' throughout vs 3–10 refers to all believers (not just Jewish ones), and it does here too (see Lincoln). We should rather translate v 12, 'in order that we who have first [i.e. now] hoped in Christ, may then [i.e. at the final tribunal] be to the praise of his glory'.

13–14 The final section highlights the readers' participation in all this (hence the switch to 'you'). In Christ, having believed the gospel, they too were marked out as God's people. (See e.g. Ezk. 9:4–6 and Rev. 7:1–8 for the idea of God putting his identifying mark on his people.) The seal used to mark them was nothing less than the promised gift of the Spirit. As at Acts 2, the promise in question is principally that of Joel 2:28–29, but understood in a distinctively Christian way. Through this gift they received wisdom and illumination to perceive the implications of the gospel (1:17–20; cf. 3:5); inner strengthening in the gospel (3:16; cf. 6:17); access to, and the indwelling presence of, God and of Christ (2:18, 22; 3:16–17); the beginnings of the promised cosmic unity (4:3–4); inspiration to godly living and thankful worship (4:30; 5:18–20) and help in prayer (6:18). All these activities are what marks believers as God's people and are indispensable to ongoing Christian existence. The seal of the Spirit is not some second blessing—the having believed (13b) means effectively 'when you believed', i.e. 'once you had put your trust in [the gospel]' (NJB). These activities of the Spirit foreshadow in type and quality what he will do more fully in the new creation, and so the Spirit with whom God marks us with his stamp of ownership is also appropriately called the 'pledge', 'guarantee', even 'first instalment' of our inheritance (cf. Rom. 8:23; 2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5). But the blessings we receive now are just a foreshadowing: according to Paul we still await our inheritance in the final and total redemption of the world by God at the end of time. 4:30 re-emphasizes this, reminding us that we are sealed with the Spirit 'for the day of redemption' to come. Then God's purpose, begun in Christ, will be brought to consummation, and seeing it from beginning to end will evoke the creation's praise of the Creator.

1:15–2:10 Paul's report of his thanksgiving and prayer for his readers begins

1:15–19a Report of thanksgiving. It was conventional for Greek letters to begin with a statement of thanks to the gods, and assurances of continuing intercession. Paul regularly used this form, though he developed it in a distinctively Christian way. The thanksgiving itself (15–16), which is specifically for what God is doing in the readers and has therefore a different focus from the more general concerns of a eulogy, is short compared with his other letters (though Galatians has none at all), and remarkably devoid of personal details (cf. Col. 1:3–4 and Phm. 4–5, on which it is otherwise modelled). The prayer-report which follows is, however, unusually long, and much more extensively interwoven with teaching than normal. It stretches at least as far as v 23 (vs 15–23 are actually one compound sentence in Greek), more probably to 2:10, and it is further resumed in 3:1, 14–21. These unusual features are probably to be explained by the general purpose of the letter, and the intention that it should be read to several unrelated congregations.

Paul's regular prayer for his readers is, so he reports, for spiritual illumination (17), to know God more deeply, and to understand the nature of the Christian hope (18) and the nature of God's power already at work in Christians (19a). This last he exemplifies in two different ways: it is said to be revealed in the resurrection and exaltation of Christ himself (19b–23), and it is disclosed in our being brought from spiritual 'death' to 'life' in union with Christ (2:1–10).

15–16 The opening For this reason looks back to 1:14, and through it to the whole of 1:3–14. Paul gives thanks for the readers of Roman Asia because God has brought them to participate in salvation. He briefly gives thanks too for what he has heard of their faith and love (as in Colossians and Philemon), indicating that he sees these as fruits of God's grace. These verses are clear evidence that Paul was not principally writing to Ephesus (where he stayed for up to three years); he shows more detailed knowledge of the Colossian congregations in the thanksgivings in the letters addressed to them (and he tells us he never himself visited them: Col. 2:1) than he evinces here.

17–19 These three verses concentrate on the content of Paul's prayer. The prayer in v 17 for a Spirit of wisdom and revelation represents a typically Jewish way of speech; it means Paul prays that the Spirit they have already received will be experienced granting these things. Note the purpose of the request is not for special information, but deeper perception and knowledge of God himself (as he is revealed in Christ). Wisdom, illumination and revelation were indeed the most typical gifts Jews expected from the Spirit. Power is mentioned much more rarely (cf. Ex. 31:3; Dt. 34:9; Is. 11:2; 1 Enoch 49:3; 1QS 4:3–5).

The prayer in v 18 is equally a prayer for spiritual understanding: the heart here is a partial synonym for mind, will and spirit, and means the centre of perception and decision. Although Paul above all NT writers sought to explain and argue his theology to the rational understanding, he clearly recognized that is but part of the task. The heart of a person needs not merely more refined theological concepts, but the work of the Spirit integrating these with their perception and so restructuring their will and life. Paul prays that his readers might be able to know (understand) the hope that lies ahead of them in this fuller sense. If it really dawns on them that God intends to make them with all the saints a wonderful inheritance for himself, that knowledge ('By his grace I'm to be a prince, not a frog') will transform them with joy and love. Israel is portrayed frequently as God's inheritance in the OT: see e.g. Dt. 4:20; Ps. 33:12; Is. 63:17; Je. 10:16. Here Paul applies it to the glorified church, and his prayer is that they understand the hope which dominates his opening eulogy (1:14, 5–6, 12).

The third part of Paul's prayer (19a) is that the readers should understand the nature and strength of the power of God already at work in them. If believers look merely to what they see God doing in their own lives now, they may easily underestimate God's power, not least because it is manifest in cruciform love. The Ephesian readers, coming as they did from a background of strong magical belief, might have found the power of Diana more imposing and fearful than that of God. (Ephesian Diana was regarded as queen over both the heavenly powers, including the potent zodiacal powers, and the gods of the underworld; see Arnold.) This could have eroded their confidence in God, and undermined their determination in the spiritual conflict in which they were engaged. Paul knew that the spectacular scale of God's power in his people will only be fully disclosed at the end of this creation (so 1:5–6, 9–10, 14), but he could show the readers where to look in the present to see it displayed (1:19b–2:10).

19b–23 The saving power of God revealed in the resurrection-exaltation of Christ. Because he is the truly representative Man, his resurrection and glorification are a picture of what God will accomplish in us (cf. 1 Cor. 15:45–49; Phil. 3:21). There is, of course, a difference: the authority invested in Jesus through his exaltation is unique, even though there is a sense in which we share in it (see 2:6). But this very difference leads Paul to another way of assuring the Ephesians of God’s power in them, for he finishes by saying that the Jesus who is given all power is given by God to the church, which he fills (22–23). That, of course, means that the full authority and power invested in Jesus is at work in the church.

The assertions of both Jesus’ resurrection and his exaltation to God’s right hand (20) were traditional in the church, and the latter is phrased in the language of Ps. 110:1 (cf. Acts 2:34–36; Rom. 8:34; Col. 3:1 and Heb. 1:3, 13). It speaks of Jesus’ enthronement as cosmic ruler who is given the place of honour in the heavenly circle (hence in the heavenly realms). Jesus has not been removed from earthly influence by ascension, precisely the opposite: he has been moved to the place of ultimate influence over matters on earth. Thus no other powers or potentates, in the world or in the heavens, whether good or evil, can compare; his authority, as the one at God’s right hand, is over all (21). The original readers would have seen the point: none of the powers they were prone to fear could compare with Jesus.

Whereas in Ps. 110:1 God bids the heavenly Lord sit at his right hand ‘until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet’, v 22a here insists God has placed all things under Jesus’ feet. This is not failure to be realistic about the continuation of evil, but a switch from the language of Ps. 110 to that of Ps. 8:6. (Paul does the same at 1 Cor. 15:25–27.) Jesus is hereby portrayed as a second Adam who is given the task of exercising dominion over the cosmos. As such he is head over everything (22b), that is, ruler or master, a sense of ‘head’ well attested in biblical Greek and beyond. The point of what follows in v 22b is then best rendered by the REB: God ‘gave him as head of all things to the church’. Paul could hardly have given a more dramatic portrayal of the power at work in the church but, to emphasize it further, he describes the church in two distinct ways.

First, he calls the church Christ’s body (23a). In 1 Corinthians the church as Christ’s ‘body’ includes its own ears, eyes and head (1 Cor. 12:16–21)—it is a whole body belonging to Jesus and intimately united with him (1 Cor. 6:15; 12:12). This is probably meant here too, not that the church is merely a headless torso, for which Jesus is himself the head; for v 22 describes Jesus as head of the cosmos, not the church, and uses ‘head’ in the sense of ‘ruler’, not anatomical part. But to describe the church as his ‘body’ so soon after describing Jesus as ‘head’ almost inevitably highlights at least the connotation of union between them (cf. 4:16; 5:23, 28 and the even more striking, ‘he is the head of the body, the church’ at Col. 1:18).

23 goes on to describe Jesus as the one who fills everything in every way (cf. 4:10). To ‘fill’ is a metaphor for ‘become present to, and active in respect of’ or ‘extend influence, or rule, over’. As ‘head’ over all things, Jesus ‘fills’ them; he thus begins to fulfil the mystery spoken of in vs 9–10, he begins the task of subjugating rebellion and drawing all things into unity and harmony in himself. But, says Paul, it is supremely the church which is his fulness (i.e the thing he fills)—and he will explain this more fully in 2:1–22.

In sum, Paul prays that his readers will understand that the power at work in the church is the presence of that same power which will bring about the new creation, a new universe in total harmony, united under Christ. In her union with Christ the church has already received a foretaste of that end.

2:1–10 The saving power of God revealed in the church’s salvation. It is unfortunate that a chapter division has been placed here, because there are good reasons to believe this section forms a single paragraph with 1:15–23. There Paul explained the power of God in the church as revealed in the resurrection of the representative Man Jesus, and God’s gift of him, as the exalted ruler of the cosmos, to the church. Here he wishes to draw attention to the same power of God, but now insofar as it is revealed in God’s bringing us out of death into life. He begins v 1 with the direct connective ‘and’ (dropped in most translations), and it would appear that he intended to write ‘and you, being dead in your transgressions and sins, he made alive with Christ ...’ (in parallel with Col. 2:12–13; 3:1–2). He was, however, diverted from this plain statement by the need to explain being dead in your transgressions. And having painted a bleak picture of his readers’ former position (2) he needed to make it clear in v 3 that it was not just you but we who were all in the plight from which God mercifully rescued us. At last in vs 5–6 Paul takes up where he began, but now in the first person plural, ‘And us, being dead in our transgressions, he made alive with Christ ...’. Here is the further disclosure of the nature of God’s power in the church that Paul prays his readers will comprehend, for it will assuredly give meaning to their lives, joy to their hearts, thankful worship to their lips, and strength to their fight.

1–3 You were dead in your transgressions is again a Jewish way of speech; its force is nicely illustrated by a midrash (Jewish commentary) on Ec. 9:5 which speaks of ‘the wicked who even in their lifetime are called dead’. Those bound in sin are doomed to death, and so already belong to its realm; the very thing they think of as ‘life’ is but a foretaste of death, because it is without God (cf. Jn. 5:24; 1 Jn. 3:14 and 1QH 11:10–14). While Paul elsewhere teaches that this state of affairs is the result of sin, that is not the point here; rather the state in your transgressions and sins is what characterized their former existence. These things were the corrupt fruit of their ‘death’. In v 2 Paul attributes this life marked by sins chiefly to two related factors—the influence of this world (i.e. the present fallen creation and the forces it generates in society, seen as standing in rebellion against God and in contrast to the ‘new age’ or ‘new creation’ awaited), and the influence of Satan, described here as the ruler of the kingdom of the air. The aer denoted the lower heavens, closest to the earth, and was often thought to be the abode of the evil spiritual beings. The idea of Satan being at work in those who are disobedient is found elsewhere in Jewish literature. For example in The Ascension of Isaiah he is said to have ‘rejoiced in Jerusalem because of Manasseh and strengthened him in his leading to apostasy and in the lawlessness which was spread abroad in Jerusalem’ (2:2–4; cf. 2 Ki. 21; 2 Ch. 33). This could all sound like a determinism to evil for which we are not responsible, but v 3 puts the blame equally fairly on our own rebellious nature with its corrupt desires and thinking. All this made us what Paul calls ‘children of wrath’ (NRSV correctly); that is, those condemned to suffer God’s holy anger directed against sin.

4–7 What God in his love and mercy has actually done for us, then, comes as a stark and breathtaking contrast to the doom v 3 envisages, and so dramatically reveals the nature of the power of God at work in us. V 5 portrays it as a resurrection power that transfers us from ‘death’ to ‘life’. This could be understood simply as a metaphor for a restored relationship (as Lk. 15:32), but probably means more than that. To say we have been made alive (the word commonly denotes resurrection) with Christ appears to be shorthand for saying, ‘we shall be resurrected with Christ to new-creation life, and we may speak of that as though it were an already-accomplished event because first, the decisive event of the resurrection of the representative Man Jesus lies in the past and secondly, we already begin to participate in aspects of that new-creation life in our present union with him’.

The same must be said for v 6, which speaks of our having been exalted and seated with Christ in the heavenly realms (i.e. with Christ, on his throne, at the right hand of God: v 6 is modelled on 1:20). While Paul teaches that believers will be involved in the judgment and rule of the new creation (see e.g. 1 Cor. 6:2; cf. Rev. 3:21) he equally firmly insists we do not yet (1 Cor. 4:8). These verses are really not saying something very different.

A number of commentators have urged that Ephesians here breaks away from the real Paul, teaching that salvation is complete, the battle is over, and that believers already reign in the heavenly places. The writer (usually assumed to be a Pauline disciple) is then accused of being triumphalistic. But this fails to take seriously the emphasis on hope in 1:3–23; and it plays down 4:20–5:15, 6:10–18 and especially 6:12, which certainly depict present Christian existence as being in conflict with the pattern of our old sinful humanity, and with the powers of this age. Vs 5–6 are best understood as looking forward: what they say is now only fully true of Christ, but it can be affirmed of us in the secondary sense that he is our representative, that he is determinative for our future, and that we are united with him now by the Spirit. Similarly, the perfect tense you have been saved in v 5 (and in v 8) does not mean the writer thinks our salvation is already completed, but that our complete salvation has already been assured and revealed in Christ, and it is under way in us: we have truly begun to experience transfer from the realm of death to that of resurrection and life. These verses should be understood as a fuller elucidation of the kind of assertion Paul makes in Col. 1:13; 3:1–4. V 7 (echoing 1:6–7, 18, 21) shows that it is the future that will disclose the salvation and grace now known only to faith.

8–10 This summary partly echoes the language of the debates in Galatians and Romans about justification by faith without commitment to the Mosaic law. The point Paul makes here, however, is a rather different, although complementary, one. He says that the salvation which we have already experienced, in our transfer from ‘death’ to ‘life’ in union with Jesus, is a dramatic disclosure of God’s gracious power, precisely because it derives totally from him. It is not the product of, nor the reward given to, our works; it is the gift of God to faith. (Paul’s Greek does not suggest he is saying that the faith too is purely God’s grace, though that may be implied by other considerations.) This, Paul hastily clarifies, does not mean works are unimportant. But our former life and works only contributed to the predicament from which we needed to be delivered. By contrast, v 10 elaborates our salvation in terms of God’s new creation of us in Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 3–5; 5:17; Gal. 6:15). We are thus, with Jesus, the firstfruits of the new creation and have been made so in order that we may indeed be able to do truly good works. This will be explained more fully in 4:17–6:20.

2:11–22 A digression: the church, cosmic reconciliation and unity: the new temple

Paul here breaks off the report of his prayer for his readers and therefore, in formal terms, vs 11–22 are a digression. In another sense, however, they are the theological heart of the letter; for the truths contained in them undergird and explain Paul’s eulogy and prayer, and reinforce their message. If Ephesians is the crown of Paul’s theological writing, 2:11–22 is perhaps the central jewel; but like a beautifully cut gem it has a depth and subtlety that is not easily summarized.

Structurally, the section is dominated throughout by a then-now contrast (which expands the earlier similar one in vs 1–7). It begins in vs 11–13 which stresses mainly the ‘then’ element (note the formerly of v 11, the at that time of v 12, and the contrasting now in Christ of v 13) and it is resumed in vs 19–22 which stresses mainly the ‘now’. Vs 14–16 (with vs 17–18 recapitulating) provides the centre-piece and transition, and so divides the whole of vs 11–22 into three parts.

Paul’s then-now contrast is spelled out principally in terms of the grand theme of past alienation (12, 19), exclusion (13), or hostility (16) and present reconciliation (16), unity (15–16), or peace (17). In brief, the passage tells us how God has begun the cosmic reconciliation which was his eternal plan (1:9–10). There are two important dimensions within this. Vs 11–15 focus primarily on how in Christ the great barrier between Jews and Gentiles was removed, and the Gentiles united with believing Israel. We might call this ‘horizontal reconciliation’. Vs 16–22, have a different emphasis, however; they explain rather how both Jew and Gentile are brought to God (16–17), given access to him (18), and made into the heavenly temple indwelt by him (19–22). We may call this ‘vertical reconciliation’. We shall have to note carefully how these are related (and how they are brought about) in the more detailed comments on the individual sections.

11–13 The first section calls the predominantly Gentile-Christian readers to remember their former status as those outside God’s people. They were then what many Jews would call ‘the uncircumcision’. Circumcision was the seal of the covenant with Israel, and so what distinguished Jews from the rest of the world. Judaism could thus refer to itself as the circumcision, meaning ‘the covenant people of God’, and dismiss the rest of the world, who stood outside the covenant, as ‘the uncircumcision’. The point was not that Jews alone practised the minor surgical operation (other Semites did too), but its significance as a rite of entry into the Mosaic covenant.

Paul begins his description of the Gentiles’ former position using the language any Jew might use to point to their ‘outside’ status. It is equally clear, however, that Paul is not actually happy with this way of putting things, and feels he needs to qualify it by clarifying that Jews are only those who call themselves ‘the circumcision.’ For Paul, theirs is a circumcision merely performed by men, because, for him, their circumcision is often no more than an external surgical act, and the relationship to God it is supposed to symbolize has not become an internal reality worked by God. For Paul it is the household of faith whose relationship to God actually fulfils what circumcision is about (see Rom. 2:28–29), and this is most deeply true of Christians (Phil. 3:3; Col. 2:11).

Paul returns to his main point in v 12. Formerly, as unbelieving Gentiles, the readers could have had no part in the Christ, for the Messiah is first and foremost the king of Israel (Rom. 9:5). They were alienated from the ‘commonwealth of Israel’—the people of God who receive his blessing. Paul’s choice of the term ‘commonwealth’ (with the NRSV against the NIV’s less probable citizenship) suggests he is not thinking here of national Israel, but more particularly of faithful Jews seen as living as a theocracy. The Gentiles’ exclusion from the community of God’s people meant they had no part in the covenants which promised the Messianic salvation. (The language here strongly echoes Rom. 9:4.) ‘Hopes’ and ‘gods’ they may have had in plenty, but these would have proved empty, for the Gentiles were without the true God and the hope he gave, and was now beginning to fulfil.

Now, in Christ (13), their situation has dramatically changed, and Paul chooses a common biblical metaphor to express the contrast. The imagery of the near and the far away originated in Is. 57:19, and it dominates Paul’s description as far as vs 17–18 (where he actually uses the Isaiah wording). In v 13, however, he uses the language in a way that more closely reflects a special use of it in contemporary Judaism. The verb ‘to make near’ had become a term for making a non-Jew a proselyte, and so joining him or her to the congregation of Israel. This made the person concerned ‘near’ in two senses, both of which are attested in Judaism. He or she becomes ‘close’ to the rest of the people of God and ‘close’ to the God to whom the people are ‘near’. They have access to the temple (the special place of divine presence) and to the God who was more generally present amongst his people. As we shall see, Paul is thinking of a transformed people of God and a heavenly temple, but otherwise his imagery in v 13 is similar.

14–18 take us to the very heart of Paul’s understanding of the gospel of reconciliation. He begins in vs 14–15 with the horizontal dimension. Jesus is first said to be our peace in the sense that he joined the two great divisions of humanity (the uncircumcision and the circumcision) into one. He (in principle!) destroyed the hostility between Jew and Gentile, by removing the great barrier that separated them, and which inevitably became an occasion of mutual suspicion and animosity. The barrier in question was the Mosaic law with its detailed holiness code, which made it all but impossible for faithful Jews to live in close proximity with Gentiles.

Concerning these regulations the Letter of Aristeas (c. 100 BC) maintains, ‘the legislator [Moses] surrounded us with unbroken palisades and iron walls to prevent our mixing with any of the other peoples in any matter, being thus kept pure in body and soul ... worshipping the one almighty God’ (139) or, again, ‘And therefore, so that we should be polluted by none nor be infected with perversions by associating with worthless persons, he has hedged us about on all sides with prescribed purifications in matters of food and drink and touch and hearing and sight’ (149). A literal barrier in the temple itself which prohibited Gentiles, on pain of death, from entering the inner courts where Israel worshipped, was merely the outward expression of the Mosaic requirements.

The enmity which the Mosaic law occasioned amongst sinful humanity, we are told, was destroyed in his flesh (15)—a reference to Christ’s death on the cross which Colossians portrays as the putting off of the whole ‘body of flesh’ (Col. 1:22; 2:11–12; see v 16). It was destroyed when the Mosaic law, as a unity and as an indivisible covenant with Israel; was transcended and replaced by the conditions of the new creation and corresponding covenant inaugurated in Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 3:3–18). That this does not mean Paul is against the law should be clear enough from the rest of the letter (and note the specific use of the Torah in 5:31–6:3). Rather the good purpose which the Mosaic law served, in preserving Israel from the ungodly influence of other nations, gave way to the even higher purpose stated in v 15 and reflecting God’s eternal plan (1:9–10). God wished to create one new humanity out of Jew and Gentile. For the centrality of this to Paul’s theology see e.g. 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:28 and Col. 3:11.

16 now turns attention to the vertical dimension. So far we could almost get the impression (reflected in Marcus Barth’s understanding of the whole passage) that the Christ-event leaves the status of Israel fundamentally unchanged: the Gentiles are merely added to her, and so blessed with her. That, however, is not Paul’s point, for he goes on to affirm that the one body so created out of Jews and Gentiles was reconciled to God at the cross. This presupposes Israel too suffered an alienation from God through sin (cf. 2:3) that needed to be overcome at the cross; and that she only experiences that reconciliation as she participates in the new humanity, the one body of Christ, the church made of believing Jews and Gentiles. Of course, Paul’s wording should not be pressed to mean that the universal church of Jew and Gentile was created first, and only then reconciled to God at the cross. His point is rather that Jesus at the cross stood as representative not only of the Jew but of Gentile humanity too, as the last Adam (Rom. 5:12–21; 1 Cor. 15:45; Phil. 2:5–11). In the first instance it was uniquely in himself (15) that he made one new man out of the two; and subsequently it is only by union with him in one body that cosmic reconciliation is experienced. This means the church really is, for Paul, a third entity—neither Jew nor Gentile, but new humanity.

Behind the language of creating one new humanity lies the Jewish hope that at the end God would recreate the world more wonderfully even than his first creation before the fall. As part of this God's people would be transformed and given resurrection bodies to match the world they came to live in, and so be a new sort of humanity living in total harmony with God and with each other. For Paul, exactly that is begun by Christ's resurrection, which is the pattern for ours, and is even beginning in us (see Rom. 8; 1 Cor. 15:45–49; 2 Cor. 3–5; Gal. 6:15; Phil. 3:21). But note that all this is true only in himself, in Christ; it is only the church in union with Christ that actually begins to experience this cosmic unity.

17–18 recapitulates the point in terms of a modified citation of Is. 57:19 and a further explanation. The words he came and preached peace refer neither to Jesus' incarnation and ministry nor to the ascended Christ through the apostolic preaching but are best understood as a summary of vs 14–16: they refer then specifically to the cross and resurrection. The words and preached peace echo Is. 52:7 but the rest approximately follows Is. 57:19. Originally this passage was applied to God's blessing of Jerusalem Jews (the near) and Diaspora Jews (the far away) but it is here understood to reach a new level of fulfilment in the Messianic 'peace' of reconciliation Christ brings between Jewish believers (the near) and Gentile believers (the far away), and between the new humanity thus created and God. V 18 takes this up in a metaphor taken from the temple legislation. In the OT, only the high priest, as Israel's representative, had immediate access to God in the sense that only he could enter the Holy of Holies, and then only on the Day of Atonement. Israel stood at a distance, and the Gentiles further beyond. But through Christ's death and resurrection, both now have immediate access to God through the gift of the Holy Spirit which brings the conscious presence of God to the individual.

In all this Paul does not explicitly state how the cross effects reconciliation between humankind and God. The very use of the word implies an estrangement or enmity on both sides which is healed. On humanity's side, hostility to God is occasioned by our rebellious reaction to his rightful and loving claim to our filial obedience. On God's side too one may speak of a certain element of estrangement from humankind; namely, his loving and holy wrath against our sin (2:3; 4:17–18; 5:3–6). It is the latter that Paul consistently, as here, believes is our most fundamental problem and to have been dealt with at the cross (i.e. before any of us believed and appropriated this reconciliation offered). This is why he consistently emphasizes the rich 'mercy' (4) and 'grace' (1:2, 6–7 etc.) of God. He does tell us how God accomplished this—he does not state that it is by substitutionary atonement (for which see the Commentary on Rom. 3:25; 5:9–11; 2 Cor. 5:19–21; Gal. 3:13). He seems rather to assume it (1:7; 5:2, 25–26) and in this letter appears more concerned to elaborate its consequences—restoration of relationship with God, and particularly the universal scope of the unity, harmony and peace God purposes in Christ.

19–22 A final image serves to underscore the glory of what God has accomplished in Christ for the former 'outsider' Gentile readers (picking up from v 13). They have been privileged to become fellow-citizens with 'the saints', that is, not with Jews or Jewish Christians, but with the rest of God's people and full members of God's heavenly city-temple household. Already in Gal. 4:26 Paul had upstaged the Judaizers by saying Christians belong not to the earthly Jerusalem, but to the heavenly one (cf. Phil. 3:20). The theological force of the assertion derives from the assumption that the age to come is already realized in heaven, and Jerusalem, as she shall be in the new creation, is waiting to 'descend' (see e.g. Rev. 21:1–4; and 21:10–22:5). To say we are already citizens of that temple-city is to say we now, in union with Christ, participate in that heavenly city radiant with the glory of God, and that it shall finally be revealed and displace all that we know of as reality in this age. For a similar view, namely that the church now participates in and manifests the worship of the end-time glorified congregation of the saints in the heavenly city, see Heb. 12:22–24. The idea of being members of the temple-city continues the theme of access to God introduced by v 18, because the heavenly city is filled with the radiant presence of God. Indeed, according to Rev. 22:5, he is its very light, displacing night and day.

In vs 20–22 we have essentially the same message but with a slight shift in the imagery. Believers are now portrayed as the very stones with which the heavenly temple itself is gradually being built. Much of Judaism expected a new temple in the Jerusalem of the age to come, and already certain parts of Judaism had come to think that God's people would constitute that holy dwelling-place of God (cf. Jesus' teaching in Jn. 2:19). This is the view expressed here, and it is said already to find fulfilment (as at 1 Cor. 3:16–17; 2 Cor. 6:16–17; 1 Pet. 2:4–10). Paul's readers are, he says, even now being built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets. The Greek syntax here, with one article governing both nouns (as at 3:5), suggests one foundational group, apostles functioning as prophets (i.e. bringing revelation), rather than two, though a separate group of prophets are also known at 4:11. Jesus himself is identified as the chief cornerstone, the one from which the rest of the foundation is built outwards along the line of the proposed walls. The point would then seem to be that the temple is built out and up from the revelation given in Christ, through the revelatory elaboration and implementation of the mystery through the prophetic-apostolic figures (see 3:4–11, esp. v 5). But all is built on Christ, supported by Christ, and the lie or shape of the continuing building is determined by Christ, the cornerstone. An alternative interpretation makes Christ the 'keystone' (the last to be added, the one that holds together the whole arching edifice); but this depends on a later sense of the word translated 'cornerstone', and it does not really fit the image of a temple being built, for it would imply Christ has no place in it yet.

The last verse of the chapter reminds the readers of the enormous privilege that they are part of this whole construction. They are incorporated in the building, the one universal church, which God makes his dwelling by the Spirit. And they are incorporated in it precisely by union with Christ, in whom all things are being brought into the cosmic harmony and peace enabled by reconciliation inaugurated at the cross.

3:1 The prayer-report continued

After Paul's important digression (2:11–22), v 1 takes up again the report of his prayer for the Gentile churches (1:15–2:10). However, having introduced himself as the subject of the sentence, Paul breaks off into a second digression even before he gets to the main verb! The GNB does not tolerate this abruptness and smoothes it out by supplying the predicate 'pray to God' to complete the sentence (similarly REB), but Paul himself does not complete it until he returns to it and repeats its opening in v 14. (This is evidence that the letter is a real one, written in some haste, not a carefully planned theological update of Paul written in a later generation.)

3:2–13 A digression: elaborating Paul's apostolic ministry

Paul makes this sharp break from what he was about to say, because, having briefly introduced himself in v 1, he now feels he must expand that introduction before he proceeds. He has claimed to be Christ Jesus' man imprisoned (that is what is meant by prisoner of Christ Jesus, not that Jesus is the jailer!) for the sake of you Gentiles—this last thought is what calls for elaboration. It is his apostleship to the Gentiles that dominates vs 2–13, and largely expands and reorganizes the content of Col. 1:23–29. The section consists of three Greek sentences. Vs 2–7 take up the theme of the revelation of the mystery of cosmic reunification in Christ introduced at 1:9–10 and 2:20—a revelation which spotlights Gentile inclusion (6). The second sentence, vs 8–12, concentrates more particularly on Paul’s own role as apostle to the Gentiles, and on the remarkable grace that makes him (although less than the least of all God’s people), the chosen bearer of a gospel of cosmic reconciliation. Finally, in v 13, Paul comes back to his sufferings on behalf of the gospel, the subject which sparked the digression.

2–7 The digression begins with Paul’s virtual certainty that his readers will have heard of the commission God has given him. That he could expect this is more than reasonable. He himself had taken the gospel of Gentile inclusion from Jerusalem all round the Mediterranean as far as Yugoslavia (the Illyricum of Rom. 15:19), and intended to go on to Rome and Spain (Rom. 15:14–24). Furthermore he had been based for three years, AD 52–55, in Ephesus (Acts 20:31) from where his workers had taken his gospel at least as far east as Colosse and Laodicea, and probably to the other centres of the area too. Nevertheless, the fact that he speaks in this way is further indication he was writing a general letter to churches who had not met him, rather than to the Ephesians alone, who had not merely ‘heard’ of his ministry.

If the general sense of vs 2–3 is clear, the more precise meaning is difficult to ascertain (compare the translations!). Much depends on the phrase translated the administration of God’s grace that was given to me for you. The NIV preserves some of the ambiguity of Paul’s Greek: but does this mean (a) ‘the way in which God entrusted me with the grace he gave me for your sake’, i.e. that it was by revelation that he made the mystery known (so NJB); (b) ‘the outworking of the grace he gave me’ (so Caird); (c) ‘the commission (or responsibility) of God’s grace given (so NRSV; cf. GNB), or (d) ‘the plan or arrangement of the grace God gave me’, i.e. the conceptual content of the mystery (so NIV). The arguments are finely divided, but syntax and the relationship with vs 3–4 perhaps weigh marginally in favour of the first. Paul then, in vs 2–4, appears to assert that God entrusted him with the grace of the gospel for the Gentiles by revealing the mystery to him concerning which he has already written a little (namely chs. 1–2!), and that the readers can begin to grasp the significance of the heart of the gospel from what he says.

5–6 then transfer attention to the new content of revelatory truth involved. Paul’s wording allows that there were hints of the gospel in the OT and Paul argues it roundly in e.g. Rom. 4; cf. Rom. 9:25–10:21. But that God should make the Gentiles co-heirs, co-body members (Paul coins a new word to make the point) of a new people of God, and co-sharers of the promise of new creation in Christ, was decisively new. The three terms Paul uses all begin with the same prefix, meaning ‘with’, as here. Passages like Is. 2:1–4 were more usually understood to say that Gentiles might flock admiringly to restored Israel, and become proselytes or Jews. The decisive revelation of the mystery of the full Gentile blessing had only now been made, and it was given to God’s apostles and prophets. In the commentary on 2:20 we noted a syntactical reason for thinking this may mean ‘apostles functioning as prophets’, though the syntax could allow the meaning ‘apostles and prophets functioning as a unity’. The strongest argument for the latter is 4:11, but it has to be said we know of no prophets in the earliest church (other than the apostles) who were credited with such important revelation, and the context is specifically Paul’s discussion of his apostolic commission. If we ask when the core of that revelation came to Paul, it was undoubtedly in the Damascus Road experience itself (cf. Acts 26:12–18; Gal. 1:11–12, 15–16) but the process by which it was revealed and established to a wider circle of apostles (5) took longer (cf. Acts 15; Gal. 2), and prophets may have been involved in that process. Some think Acts 15:28 suggests this.

6 finishes with the assertion that the Gentiles receive their blessing in Christ, through the gospel. 7 which is still part of the same Greek sentence which Paul started in v 2 and not a new paragraph as in the NIV and NRSV, now rounds off the paragraph by returning to the thought of God's grace and power given to Paul to be a servant of this gospel.

Note. The description of the apostles and prophets as holy has caused problems. Some have read it as a later early-Catholic restriction of the term 'the saints' which Paul regularly uses for all Christians. (The Greek word hagios can be an adjective meaning 'holy, separated to God for some particular use' or a noun meaning 'holy one', 'separated one' and hence 'saint'.) This, however, is not convincing, for Ephesians uses the broader sense throughout the letter (1:1, 4, 15, 18 etc.) Nor is it obvious that Paul here especially venerates the apostles compared with other believers, indeed in v 8 he describes himself as the least of all the saints! The explanation is probably to be found in the influence of Col. 1:26–27 where the wording is so very close, but where the mystery is said to be revealed to 'the saints'. When Paul, having reread the Colossian passage, changed its focus to speak of the revelation being made to the apostles, the word hagiois was simply retained, but here with different force—it now denotes the 'apostles and prophets' as 'separated to God' for their distinctive role as recipients of the central revelation.

8–12 take up and develop the theme of Paul's service of the gospel. His claim to be less than the least of all the saints goes beyond his earlier one to be least of the apostles because he had opposed the gospel and persecuted Jesus' followers (see 1 Cor. 15:9; but cf. 1 Tim. 1:15 where he is 'the worst of sinners'). Here it is deliberate exaggeration, to magnify the marvel of the grace of God that made him apostle to the Gentiles with a gospel concerning the unfathomable treasure of Christ, and with a significance of cosmic proportions. More specifically Paul has been given the task of bringing people to see the cosmic mystery at last revealed, and how God has chosen to work out his eternal purpose (9). The verb used means 'to enlighten' and assumes a fog of spiritual darkness to be dispelled. The language probably refers principally to conversion (cf. 5:8–14; Acts 26:17–18; 2 Cor. 4:4–6; 1 Thes. 5:4–5), but Paul envisages an ongoing sense realized in his own teaching ministry and intercessory prayer for his churches (see, e.g. 1:18; 3:18). The significance of this ongoing 'enlightening' is brought out in v 10, where God's whole purpose in Paul's preaching, teaching, and praying ministry is that the church should be built up to become the manifestation of God's richly variegated (the word used originally meant 'multi-coloured') wisdom to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms.

What does this involve? The rulers in question are probably the whole host of heavenly beings; not merely God's angels nor merely the evil powers of 6:12 but both. They are the assembled witnesses before whom God vindicates his wisdom. He does this through a church which brings his wisdom to expression. That wisdom is his eternal purpose in Christ (11), which quite clearly is none other than his intent to unify all things in Christ (1:9–10). It is brought to expression in a universal church where Jew and Gentile live and worship as one body, in harmony with God and with brothers and sisters in Christ (cf. 6; 2:11–22). Paul's teaching and prayer in Eph. 1–2 is thus dedicated to emphasizing and encouraging such unity, as is his exhortation in chs. 4–6. He believes it to be a central, if not the central, witness to the gospel. In this he follows Jesus whose whole final testamentary prayer in Jn. 17 focused on the request that God keep the church in a unity of love which matches and witnesses to the unity of love between the Father and the Son.

13 brings us back to the claim of v 1, that Paul's imprisonment is 'for the sake of you Gentiles'. His readers might be discouraged that God has allowed this apparent set-back, but Paul would rather have them see it as your glory. Why, after all, had he been arrested? It was because he stood for Gentile equality with Jewish believers in the one new-creation people of God, Christ's body. This infuriated Jews (and, alas, some Jewish believers), because it struck at their sense of spiritual privilege. And it was their violent antagonism that promoted the circumstances of Paul's arrest, imprisonment, and eventual martyrdom (see Acts 21–28). What is more, Paul had gone to Jerusalem fully aware of the dangers (Rom. 15:30–31), and bringing a collection from the Gentile churches to the Jerusalem church, as a token of their love and indebtedness to the mother church for the spiritual blessing of the gospel they had received (Rom. 15:26–27). Paul hoped this would help to seal the unity between the two churches, which had constantly been under attack. Jewish Christians had indeed harassed his churches throughout his ministry (see e.g. 2 Cor. 10–13; Gal. 1–2, 6; Phil. 3) and a lesser man might simply have washed his hands of them. Paul, however, went to Jerusalem as apostle of the gospel to the Gentiles and of the gospel of cosmic reconciliation. He, a Jew, had devoted his life to bringing the Gentiles that gospel, and thought it worth any risk to foster their unity with the Jewish church. That was why his bonds were their glory. And if one looks to the final outcome for Paul, then, indeed, 'It is no exaggeration to say that Paul died a martyr to the cause of Christian reunion' (Findlay, The Acts of the Apostles, p. 32). There is a deep challenge here for our Protestant churches today, who so easily split, and redivide again, over issues of 'the truth', often without realizing that in doing so we are compromising the central truth of the gospel of reconciliation and restoration of unity in Christ.

3:14–21 Paul's prayer-report completed and a doxology

Paul now takes up and completes the sentence broken off at v 1, and leads into the final part of his prayer-report which he began in 1:17. The theme here complements what has so far been said. In 1:17–23 the basic prayer was for the readers' deepened spiritual understanding of the central mystery of God's will; specifically that they may have a joyful grasp of the Christian hope, and a confident trust in God's saving, reconciling power in them, beginning to bring all things together into unity in Christ. Here the prayer is for the power to understand (and to know in reality) the fullness of the love of Christ. The more deeply that is known in the church, the more intensely will it reflect the unity, harmony, and vibrant Messianic peace that will finally be restored by God in the new creation.

This final part of Paul's prayer-report forms its climax. 14 Here we see Paul prostrating himself before God, on his knees with head bowed to the ground, as one making obeisance and bringing a matter of utmost urgency to a powerful king (the more usual position for prayer was standing). Paul certainly wanted to convey the impression of God's power. If he is called Father (see the comments on Mk. 14:36; Lk. 11:2; Rom. 8:14–17) we must remember this is not only a term of intimacy. In the east the father is the ruler over the family, the one to whom all questions of importance are related, and to whom the children (however old they may be) are expected to defer in obedience. When Jews spoke of God as a Father, they meant he ruled the world which owed him its obedience.

15 This sense of God's power is heightened by the addition 'from whom every family in heaven and on earth takes its name' (correctly NRSV, REB, GNB.) The NIV, by translating 'from whom his whole family in heaven and on earth', makes this a reference to the one family, the church (including past saints), but this would require a definite article in the Greek which is missing. ‘Every family’ rather than ‘the whole family’ is to be preferred, so v 15 is basically an affirmation of God as Creator of all groups of living beings (cf. 3:9; 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15–18), and as the one who sovereignly gives each its individual ‘shape’ and role. In Hebrew tradition, for God to give creatures their names is not merely to provide them with a label, but to determine what they are. The English reader may wonder why Paul uses the word ‘family’ here at all (Gk. patria; against NIV mg.; NJB and Bruce it cannot mean ‘fatherhood’), but its appropriateness would be evident to the Greek reader as a word-play on pater, ‘father’. The word means all those derived from a single ancestor, or (when applied to angelic beings) all of related kind.

16–19 Paul’s prayer is made up of two (or perhaps three) requests. The first, in vs 16–17, is for God’s mighty empowering by the Spirit in the inner being (the heart of v 17; see on 1:18 above). This is spelt out not in terms of charismata of one kind or another, but as Christ dwelling (more fully) in the readers, so that they will be rooted in and founded on love. By beginning v 17 with the words so that, NIV and NJB give the impression that Paul is saying the readers must first be strengthened by the Spirit so that then (subsequently) Christ may dwell in their hearts—but this is misleading. 17 rather explains the request: i.e. ‘that is, that Christ might dwell in your hearts’. This is not a prayer for mystical experience—far less that our human selves should be abolished so that we become ‘channels only’. Paul’s prayer is that Christ should dwell in us by or through faith; that is, that we should live our lives with fuller loving trust in him, being more and more deeply moulded by the Christ-event (as in Gal. 2:20; where the first part of the verse is explained in the second). It is this indwelling of Christ that strengthens the believer’s life, and keeps him or her on a firm foundation—especially in times of trial (cf. Col. 1:11; Phil 4:12, and supremely in 2 Cor. 11:21b–12:10).

The second request comes in vs 18–19a. It is a prayer for deep spiritual comprehension and a real knowledge of the love of Christ, which paradoxically is great beyond any human knowing. It is worth noting that the phrase together with all the saints is significant—Paul seeks not solo virtuoso knowledge of Christ’s love, but the love that is known corporately and unites. Strictly speaking too, the wording of Paul’s prayer in v 18 is not quite that we should grasp the four dimensions of Christ’s love (as in NIV, REB, GNB). That may ultimately be what he means, but it simplifies what he says namely, ‘to comprehend ... what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and [or ‘that is’] to know the love of Christ’ (so NRSV; cf. NJB). In v 18, he does not actually specify what the four dimensions are of. In Judaism, the dimensions could be used to speak of God’s unfathomable wisdom (see e.g. Job 11:5–9 for the four, and cf. Rom. 11:33–34, where it leads to a doxology as here; Col. 2:2–3), and that may be what Paul means here (cf. 3:10). But even if this is the case, the wisdom of God comes to focus in his uniting love in Christ, so the close connection with v 19a is assured. Alternatively (as NIV etc. assume) Paul may simply have missed out ‘of the love of Christ’ in v 18 because it would become explicit through the elaboration provided by v 19a.

19b either provides a third request, or (more probably) it provides the result of a full comprehension of Christ’s love. For the sense of ‘to fill’ here see on 1:23. Where Christ’s love is deeply known, there he is already exercising his rule, uniting the cosmos in himself in new-creation harmony with God.

The doxology formally closes and rounds off the first half of the letter with an invitation to thankful worship, just as it began (1:13–14). It provides a transition between Paul’s prayer and teaching section and his consequent direct exhortations (chs. 4–6; cf. Rom. 11:33–36 which has a similar function). This doxology serves once again to remind the readers of God’s immense and gracious power at work in them (cf. 1:19–2:6)—not to encourage selfish requests, but to promote confident hope in his new creation, and petitions that correspond with God's intent for the church in the present age. The doxology is strikingly unusual in bidding that glory be given to God through the church (21); but this is appropriate given the vision of the church in God's cosmic plan that Paul has given us. It is also an implicit invitation to the readers to ensure (insofar as in them lies) that the church will be of such character as to reflect God's glory.

4:1–6:20 Encouragement to live out the gospel of cosmic reconciliation and unity in Christ

The second part of the letter explores the application of the gospel of reconciliation and unity in the life of the church. Most of it comes in the form of a direct appeal, but this is built on the foundation of what has been said in the earlier chapters, and the content is regularly informed by what Paul has said in his opening thanksgiving, prayer-report and teaching. The recurrent theme of how to 'live' (Paul actually uses the Hebrew metaphor 'to walk') in the light of the gospel appears as a scarlet thread from 4:1 onwards (4:17; 5:2; 8, 15).

4:1–6 Opening appeal to a life that expresses new-creation harmony

Here Paul speaks of our calling as one to live together in a way that embodies the cosmic unity God has inaugurated. This passage thus sets the tone for the remainder of the letter, and provides the link with what has gone before. That link is made not only in the summarizing theme of unity in these verses but specifically in the 'therefore' (NIV then) of v 1 which (as at Rom. 12:1) grounds the appeal in the earlier teaching. (NIV has somewhat obscured this; but cf. the other major translations.) The passage consists of two parts: the appeal to unity (vs 1–3, partly expanding Col. 3:12–15) and a seven-fold confession emphasizing it (4–6).

1–3 By introducing himself here, again, as a prisoner for the Lord, Paul implicitly points to the level of commitment he expects of himself and of others. His readers will not have failed to note that he was a prisoner precisely because of his zeal for the sort of unity he now requests of them (see on 3:13). But first his appeal is the more general one to live in a way that is worthy of God's calling (see 1 Thes. 2:12; Rom. 12:1; Col. 1:10). The calling in question is to share in Christ's rule over the new creation (1:20–22; 2:6), and to be part of the heavenly temple (2:19–22). Such a calling carries its own responsibilities: Barth summarizes it thus—'Royal princes are treated by their educators not with the stick, but with an appeal to their rank and standing'. Perhaps he is right but the appeal here is not to the aristocratic qualities of imperious resolve, tenacity and authority. It is a call, rather, to the corporate humility, gentleness and patient, forgiving love that exemplifies reconciliation (2; cf. Col. 3:12–13). 3 (cf. Col. 3:14–15) then clarifies this as the appeal to a life that promotes unity.

The appeal is couched in urgent terms not easily translated into English: 'the imperative ... excludes passivity, quietism, a wait-and-see attitude Yours is the initiative! Do it now! Mean it! You are to do it! ...—such are the overtones in verse 3' (Barth). This is not a call for men and women to build God's kingdom; it is a warning to keep, stay within ('Maintain!') the unity God has already inaugurated in Christ (by the events of 2:11–22) and into which we are brought by the Spirit who brings us Christ and his benefits. The Spirit brings us the Messianic peace of God-given harmony as a uniting bond. It is a bond, however, that the author is well aware may be severed by the arrogance, falsehood, pride and selfish assertiveness he will address in 4:17–5:14.

4–6 reminds us of the centrality of the call to unity with a sevenfold repetition of the word 'one'. V 4 is reminiscent of Col. 3:15b, but spelled out in terms of the major themes of Eph.

2:14–17 (one body); 2:18–22 (one Spirit) and 1:11–14; 18–23 (one hope). This triad of unities seems to progress from the visible ‘body’ (the one church universal reconciling Jew and Gentile) to the invisible Spirit who gives it harmony and peace in Christ (3), and thence to the future hope of full cosmic harmony of which the Spirit is now received as but the first instalment (1:13–14). The second triad (5) could well be a traditional baptismal affirmation sparked by the last thought. (Faith in Jesus as the one Lord was regularly the focus of baptismal confession (e.g. Acts 2:34–39; 19:5), though there is no reason to assume it was confined to that occasion. For a Jew to confess Jesus as the one Lord was tantamount to confessing him as one with the Father, for Jews daily prayed the Shema (Dt. 6:4; cf. Rom. 10:9–12; 1 Cor. 8:4–6). V 6 naturally climaxes with the Judeo-Christian affirmation of the one God totally sovereign over and in creation. It is on this supposition that all hope for final cosmic unity is built (cf. Rom. 11:36; 1 Cor. 8:4b–6; Col. 1:15–20), and it points back to the God of 1:3–10.

It is worth noting that all this addresses unity both within the local congregation and, more especially, as a universal church. Many Christians have often been more keen to promote the loving harmony of a single congregation (even sometimes, alas, only of cliques within it!) than to deal with the divisions between churches.

4:7–16 Christ’s victory gifts and growth towards Christ

In this exquisite section the appeal is implicit rather than explicit. Essentially it makes three points. First, the universal church is called to grow as a unified body (15–16) from the union already given in Christ (2:11–22) towards the full union with Christ in cosmic harmony that will characterize the passing of this age, and the appearance of the new creation (13, 15). Secondly, each Christian has a vital part in this (7, 16b) in accordance with the grace given by the ascended and liberating Christ (8–10). Thirdly, Christ has given certain types of leader (fundamentally those with different kinds of teaching gifts) to promote and direct such growth, and to ensure cohesive unity (11–13; 16a). The flow of thought in vs 11–16 (a single Greek sentence) is especially delicate.

7–10 The language and thought here is akin to that of 1 Cor. 12 and Rom. 12:1–8 (v 7 is especially close to 1 Cor. 12:4–7 and Rom. 12:6). When Paul speaks of God’s grace given in a variety of expressions to each one of us (‘all believers’; as ‘we’ and ‘us’ elsewhere in the letter) he is not restricting the scope of what he says to the ministers of v 11. This leads him to a description of Christ as the giver of all such graces. He presents Jesus’ resurrection-exaltation as bringing a new and greater fulfilment of Ps. 68:18. Jesus has taken captive the very powers that bound us (cf. Col. 2:15) and now liberally bestows on us the victor’s gifts (rather than receiving gifts, as in the original).

9–10 could be taken in one of three ways. Either that the one who ascended on high also descended into Hades; or that the one who ascended is the one who earlier descended to incarnation and humiliation of the cross; or that the one who ascended also then redescended (in the Spirit) to bring his gifts to humankind. How do we decide?

The phrase ‘the lowest parts of the earth’ is probably rightly interpreted by the NIV and GNB, and especially the REB to mean ‘the lowest level (of the universe; as seen from heaven), down to the very earth’, and so we should exclude the first option. The third option is possible, but v 10 suggests that Christ ascends and fills the universe from heaven (see on 1:23 for this), rather than that he redescends from it to bring gifts. The second option is probably to be preferred; the point being that the one who ascended and now fills the world (and gives the different graces to us) is none other than the one who first descended in humility to incarnation and death for us (cf. 2:14– 17). His coming (2:17) at the cross and resurrection brought us the Messianic peace, blessings and graces we enjoy.

Note. 8 While Ps. 68:18 speaks of the ascending one receiving gifts, Paul has exchanged this for 'he gave gifts to men', and explanations why he did so vary. Did Paul know a textual tradition that read chalaq (share, divide) instead of laqach (receive)—a transposition of only one consonant in Hebrew? Did he read laqach with the (plausible) sense 'take to, or receive for a person', either on general grounds or because he believed Ps. 68:18 was a metaphorical reference to the Levites, received by God from the people (so Nu. 18:6, 19)? Or does Paul reflect the rabbinic and targumic interpretation of Ps. 68:18, which says Moses ascended on high (to heaven) to learn the words of the law which 'he gave as gifts to men'? Certainty eludes us, but evidently 'gave' was a traditional understanding of either the sense of the verse itself, or at least of the implications of the ascending one's 'receiving' which the verse describes—and the latter is all that is required, for we must remember that Paul's focus is not primarily on the historical reference of the Psalm, but on its typological fulfilment in Christ and his gifts to the church.

11–16 V 11 exemplifies Christ's victory gifts by pointing to certain types of leader in the church. Paul is not restricting the fulfilment of Ps. 68:18 to these gifts (as NRSV implies): the 'This is why' which opens the citation shows that Paul regards all the different graces of v 7 as Christ's victory gifts too. The apostle is, however, deliberately emphasizing them for the way they control and shape the church's unified growth (12, 16).

This selection of leaders highlights particularly those who reveal, declare and teach the gospel. The specific mention, first, that Christ gave apostles and prophets corresponds with the foundational revealing function of the 'apostles and prophets' in 2:20 and 3:5 (and cf. 1 Cor. 12:28, also with 'teachers' as here). Paul wishes his readers to understand that their revelation of the gospel of cosmic reconciliation is the one that should continue to shape and unify the church and its teaching. But we are not free to deduce that Ephesians teaches that apostles and prophets will always be given to the church (as the Restorationist churches maintain), nor that the writer regards them merely as figures of the past, with evangelists and pastors replacing them (as many modern commentators). The latter two are mentioned because they are the form of church workers the readers have encountered. It was mainly Paul's co-worker evangelists, not the apostle himself, through whom the gospel was revealed to the readers outside Ephesus. And by the end of Paul's ministry the term 'pastor' was being used alongside 'overseer/bishop' and 'elder' as rough equivalents for 'church leader' (cf. Acts 20:17, 28 where 'elders' are called 'overseers' who 'pastor' the flock). The 'pastors' and 'teachers' here share a single definite article in the Greek, and this may suggest they are one group ('pastors who are also teachers'); but in this longer listing of different ministries it is more likely that the two groups with overlapping (i.e. teaching) functions are in view (and 'teachers' were a distinct group; 1 Cor. 12:28–29; Gal. 6:6). Shortly after Paul's time church leadership crystallized into a threefold ministry of overseer/bishop, elders and deacons. The absence of these terms from Eph. 4:11 remains strong evidence that the letter was written in Paul's day, not later.

12 These leaders are said to have been given for three co-ordinate purposes. Christ gave them to equip or complete the saints; to serve the church's needs, and to build up the body of Christ. Traditional Protestant interpretation (now reflected in all the modern translations including the NJB) has limited the function of the leaders to the first of these, arguing it is the equipped saints who then minister to the church and build it up, not the leaders. To propose that the latter are the subject of all three phrases is taken to be 'Catholic' and 'clericalist' interpretation. But while any 'clericalist' interpretation is clearly excluded by vs 7 and 16 (where the saints definitely have a part in the building up of the church), it is more probably the leaders' functions which are still in view throughout v 12.

According to v 13, the leaders are given to accomplish the tasks outlined in v 12 'until we all attain to the unity inherent in our faith and in our knowledge of the Son of God' (so REB). Paul is not describing some future historical period when the church gradually reaches unity of beliefs and organization, and becomes a mature church, as the NIV could be taken as suggesting. He anticipates rather the coming of Christ which will consummate the cosmic unity inaugurated at the cross (2:11–22). By faith, and in our knowledge of the Son, we already participate in this unity (indeed it is given to us to 'maintain' [4:2]), but we yet wait to see it fully realized. At Christ's coming, and only then, shall we, the universal corporate church, 'form the Perfect Man, fully mature with the fullness of Christ himself' (NJB) or, perhaps better, attain 'the mature manhood, measured by nothing less than the full stature of Christ' (REB). The thought here is essentially that of Col. 3:4, but with added emphasis on the corporate existence of the universal church as a single body. The leaders are given to fulfil the functions of v 12 'until' Christ's coming brings his church to complete maturity. But that 'until' also has the implications of 'towards'. What Christ will accomplish fully at the end, is the goal towards which, by God's grace, the leaders are already given to work.

By making v 14 a new paragraph, and by starting it with the word then (replacing a Greek word which means 'so that'), the NIV again suggests a future golden era for the historical church. But vs 14–16 are still part of the same single sentence begun in v 11, and the line of thought is more subtle. It is that Christ gave the leaders in the meantime to provide the direction the gospel and our hope point in. He gave them 'so that' we may no longer be trapped in the immaturity of infancy (prey to every pressure) but begin to grow up towards the anticipated maturity, that is, into the very likeness of Christ. While the imagery so far could almost suggest that the church grows towards an independent manhood like Christ's, the switch of imagery at the end of v 15 reminds the reader that Jesus is Lord (head) of the whole process, and the church is intended to grow into more intimate union with him. Paul closes the paragraph with a revised form of Col. 2:19, which attempts to sum up everything said so far. The whole body's growth ultimately comes from Christ, but the body grows as each part does its apportioned building work in love (reaffirming v 7, and clarifying that it is not just leaders who build the church). All along, that upbuilding and growth is held in unity and cohesion by every supporting ligament (echoing the role of the teaching leaders). All this poses a challenge for today: are our leaders trying to promote this sort of united growth of the whole of God's church together and do we want to follow?

4:17–6:9 Appeals to abandon the life of the old humanity and live according to the new-creation humanity revealed in Jesus

The material which follows takes up the appeals of Col. 3:5–4:2. In Colossians Paul couched his description of Christian life mainly in terms of a contrast between seeking the things which are above, and putting to death the earthly nature (Col. 3:1–6: to redress a different and unhealthy interest in heavenly things). In Ephesians the dominating contrast is that of 2:1–22; namely the 'then—now' contrast of former alienation and present new-creation unity and harmony. Although the language used in the heading here is actually found only at 2:15 and 4:22–24, this provides a master metaphor appropriate to the whole section. But the subsections highlight different emphases within the theme of new-creation life: 4:25–5:2 deals primarily with sins such as anger and falsehood which could cause dissension and alienation in the church; 5:3–14 warns believers not to get caught up in the darkness of the surrounding world (particularly its sexual mores) that once enveloped them; 5:15–20 contrasts the folly of that world with the wisdom of the new God-orientated life, while 5:21–6:9 examines how husband-wife, parent-child, and slave-master relations can reflect the cosmic unity God has inaugurated in Christ.

4:17–24 Put off the old and clothe yourself with new humanity! After an initial insistence that the readers put behind them their former Gentile way of life (17), this is painted in dark colours (18–19; cf. Col. 1:21; 3:7) to provide a sharp contrast with what they have heard in the gospel about Christ (20–21). He is the pattern for the new-creation humanity, and Paul reminds his readers that the gospel therefore included teaching on the need to put off the old sinful humanity, and put on the new (22–24; cf. Col. 3:8–10).

17–19 Compare these verses with the very similar Rom. 1:18–32 (esp. 1:21, 24). You may observe that here, as befits an appeal, there is greater stress on the human responsibility in abandonment to sin (cf. Rom. 1:24, 26, 28, ‘God gave them over to ...’ with v 19 they have given themselves over to ...). As with Romans the problem is traced to idolatrous thinking (the word futility in v 17 would immediately suggest this to a Jewish writer), culpable ignorance of God, and ‘hardness of heart’. In Scripture this latter phrase means sheer rebelliousness, not emotional insensitivity (cf. the promise in Ezk. 36:26–27). This leads to further darkened understanding as God is displaced from the central position he should occupy. This in turn leads to failure of the human conscience and the downward spiral in sin (19). All is summed up in one of the key words of the letter: ‘alienated’ (18). (NIV separated; cf. 2:12 and Col. 1:21.)

20–24 contrast the readers’ former Gentile life with what they were taught concerning Christ both in the initial proclamation, and in subsequent teaching. Note how vs 20–21 mirror Col. 2:6–7 which provides the basic sense here. What they learned about Christ was that he embodies truth (i.e. divine reality, light, and life), in contrast to the ‘deception’ (absence of divine reality, darkness and futility) which characterized their former existence (21–22). Paul’s Greek is not easy here, and is literally ‘you were taught in him, as [the] truth is in Jesus, to put off the old man/humanity corresponding to your former manner of life ... and to put on the new man/humanity’. In other words, the readers were taught that Jesus embodies the truth, and that if they wished to live in it they needed to put off their former life and embrace one like his. According to Barth, the ‘old man’ to be put off is Adam and the ‘new man’, to be put on is Christ (as at Rom. 6:6; 13:14; cf. Gal. 3:27b). There is an important element of truth here, but both the Colossians parallel (3:1–4 and 8–10) and 4:24b–32 suggest a different nuance. Here Paul is not thinking of the representative heads of old and new creations as much as the different kind of human nature that characterizes each creation. Paul is encouraging the readers to be renewed in mind (contrast the futile mind and what it leads to in vs 17–19), and live according to the new-creation nature that God is already making in them. According to v 24, that ‘new nature’ is ‘created in God’s likeness’, something Paul would hardly say of Christ! It is characterized by a holy righteousness that springs from and mirrors ‘the truth’ (with REB against NIV and NRSV).

Paul’s original teaching was probably cast in the indicative—in union with Christ your old sinful humanity was crucified, and you were raised to new-creation life (cf. Rom. 6; 2 Cor 5:17; Col. 2:11–12, and most obviously Col. 3:9–10, the direct parallel); but such indicatives imply corresponding imperatives (as here; cf. Rom. 6): we are responsible to live out with all seriousness and energy what God is doing in us (cf. Phil. 2:12–13). Failure to do so would precisely be to live in the ‘deceit’ (22) of the old creation rather than in ‘the truth’ of the new (24; cf. 21).

4:25–5:2 Live in the truth patterned in Christ Jesus! If the new-creation humanity mirrors ‘the truth’ revealed in Jesus (21, 24) rather than the ‘deceit’ of the old, it inevitably requires Christians to speak the truth, not falsehood. But the truth revealed centres on cosmic reconciliation and unity, and so Paul adds that we should refrain from lies for we are all members of one body. That is, we are no longer alienated, independent beings, but people who now belong together in unity with others whom we must not rob of the truth according to which they will decide and act. The remaining teaching in the section focuses especially on the alienating sin of anger (26) and related sins (29–31). In place of these, believers are called to pattern themselves on the truth of God revealed in Jesus (4:32–5:2). The whole is substantially a rewriting of Col. 3:8–12.

26 introduces the main topic of the passage: anger. The NRSV’s ‘Be angry, but do not sin’ entirely misses the force of the original. It is not an encouragement to righteous anger (indeed all anger is condemned in 5:31); it is a warning, ‘If you become angry, beware! You are at sin’s door!’ If in the West anger is regarded as a sign of manliness, Jewish tradition was more aware of its divisive, satanic, and corrupting power (see the incisive criticism of anger and its dangers in Testament of Dan 1:18–5:2). Anger, and the related sins of vs 29 and 31, are the epitome of socially destructive and alienating sins, and so characteristic of the old creation. Theft (28) is another; for it is experienced not merely as the deprivation of property (akin to accidental loss) but as a defiling assault on one’s private sphere and a destroyer of trust within the community. These things and others of their kind grieve the Holy Spirit (a telling allusion to Is. 63:10) in the sense that they oppose the very direction of his reconciling, unifying, new-creation work in the believer. In place of these socially destructive activities, Paul advocates corresponding ones that are cohesive, upbuilding, and pattern the new-creation existence epitomized and brought into being in Christ: the erstwhile thief should turn philanthropist instead (28); speech should not be used to befoul and tear down, but for good (29); in place of anger, the believer should show the forgiving character of God (32; 5:1) and the self-sacrificial love of Christ who died to atone for us (5:2).

5:3–14 Live in the light that shines forth from Christ Jesus! This section falls into two parts: vs 3–7, warning believers to have nothing to do with the sexual levity, promiscuity and greed of the Gentile world; and vs 8–14, characterizing these as belonging to the readers’ former darkness, from which they have been converted, and which now, as light, they expose. The divine reality earlier referred to as ‘the truth’ in contrast to ‘deceit’ is thus now called ‘light’ in contrast to ‘darkness’ (cf. Ps. 27:1; Is. 9:2; 42:6; 60:1–3; 2 Cor. 6:14). A similar religious-ethical dualism was strongly developed at Qumran (and in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs). In Paul, ‘light’ normally stands specifically for salvation and new-creation realities inaugurated but yet to be fully revealed (see especially Rom. 13:11–14 and 1 Thes. 5:4–8 which are close parallels to this passage; also 2 Cor. 4:6; Col. 1:12).

3–7 The previous section warns mainly about sins that come to expression in speech, and the same applies here; talk about sexual sin is not to be entertained, ‘not even to be mentioned’ (correctly, NJB, REB, NRSV), far less joked about (4). This is not an invitation to prudishness, or to avoid genuine pastoral honesty, but is a warning against conversationally indulging a fascination which almost inevitably inflames to deeds. Perhaps no generation has suffered the ill-effects as strongly as western culture today. And Paul warns that these things belong to the old humanity under God’s wrath (6; cf. Col. 3:6) and are excluded from the new creation (5; cf. 1 Cor. 6:9).

8–14 Note the fluidity with which the symbolic language of ‘light’ and ‘darkness’ is used here: essentially it streams from Christ (14b) as transforming divine life—life which can be said to produce the fruit of truth and holiness (9; cf. Gal. 5:22–23). But the people transformed by it can also be called light (8), and their activities (when they truly correspond to the new-creation humanity) are also light in that they expose the Gentile standards as belonging to darkness (11, 13). V 14b appears to be a Christian baptismal hymn, drawing on Is. 26:19 and 60:1–2. It is added not to justify v 14a, but to sum up the whole call (2–14) to leave behind the realm of darkness and death.

5:15–6:9 Live in the wisdom the Spirit gives! To the call to leave deceit for the truth in Jesus (4:17–5:2), and to leave darkness for the light that streams from him (5:3–14), Paul now adds the call to abandon folly for the wisdom granted by the Spirit. That wisdom comes to expression especially in wise use of time, in heartfelt worship and thanksgiving, and in mutual respect and submission (15–21).

18–24 These verses are grammatically a single sentence (obscured by all translations). This means that the injunction to wives and husbands in vs 22–33 (along with the similar material which follows in 6:1–9) is presented as a typical example of the respectful, submissive wisdom that should characterize believers. Indeed, the verb ‘submit’ supplied in most translations at v 22 has no equivalent in Paul’s Greek, but is understood from its appearance in the dependent participle clause ‘submitting to one another’ in v 21.

Although 5:22–6:9 is forged into a tight unity with 5:15–21, it has an independence of form and origin. Luther referred to the material as ‘Household Rules’, and they clearly had wider circulation in the church (see Col. 3:18–4:1; 1 Pet. 2:18–3:7). Similar tables are to be found in Judaism and in the ethical discussions of the Greek philosophers. The wording and content of the simpler form (preserved in Colossians) suggests an origin in Greek-speaking Jewish Christianity. While Greek tables addressed only the free male in how he should rule the wife, child, and slave; these, in Jewish fashion, address and protect the weaker parties too. The specifically Christian content of the Colossian table emerges mainly in the repeated ‘in the Lord’ (Col. 3:18), ‘pleasing in the Lord’ (Col. 3:20), ‘of reverence for the Lord’ (Col 3:22) (see also Col. 3:23–24). It is more fully elaborated in the Ephesians section which is a recasting and amplification of the teaching of Col. 3:15–4:1. The most dramatic elaboration is of the advice to husbands and wives which Paul uses to exemplify the unity of Christ and the church. Here the 19 words of Col. 3:18–19 have been expanded to 200!

A number of commentators have argued that the ethics of the tables were socially revolutionary, and find evidence for this in the request for reciprocal mutual submission (21), which is taken by them to mean husbands are to submit to wives, parents to children, and masters to slaves, as well as the reverse. If anything, however, the tables were socially conservative, patriarchal, and, given to confirm that Christians were not to undermine the more wide-spread understanding of social order (see Lincoln). The Colossians table (written perhaps only days before Ephesians) demands exactly the same types of outward submission and obedience that could be found almost anywhere in the ancient world. V 21 should not be taken to override this, but as a call to mutual submission within each hierarchical level, and of children to parents and slaves; slaves to masters (and their wives?), and wives to husbands. Had Paul really meant a totally reciprocal submission (which would be entirely unexpected in the ancient world) he would have needed to clarify that by saying at least once, and explicitly, that e.g. parents should submit to children.

To affirm that these tables were more socially conformist than revolutionary would be misleading, however; within the hierarchical social order they uphold they were radical and profoundly liberating. The slave, the child and the wife are specifically addressed (unusual in the ancient world): they are given their own calling to live before the Lord which is as responsible, honourable and important as the calling to live as master, parent and husband. The latter may be different roles, carrying greater social authority and responsibilities, but they are not better roles. This is assured by the coming of the Son in full submission to the Father, and to serve the church in giving himself for it. Indeed, the very social hierarchies the tables support are also recognized as ephemeral, and of secondary significance before the God who is impartial (9), and under the Lord to whom everything is to be done, and to whom both master and slave are equally responsible. The tables thus also confirm Gal. 3:28 and Col. 3:11—and Ephesians brings a particularly radical new Christian understanding to marriage (see on 5:22–23).

15–21 The appeal to a life reflecting wisdom, not folly, is specified in three related ways. The first is well expressed in the NJB translation, ‘Make the best [use] of the present time, for it is a wicked age’ (16); and this is probably to be interpreted to mean that the powers of evil have a firm grip on humankind in this age, leading it into self-indulgent disobedience (so 2:1–3), but Christians are to order their lives and priorities to God’s glory. 17 then provides a second related specification: a life of folly is to be abandoned for one which seeks to discover and live by God’s will.

18 provides the third specification, contrasting a life of drunkenness, with one filled with the Spirit. The contrast here is not between two sorts of inebriation: drunkenness was simply a regular, indeed proverbial expression of folly in Jewish Wisdom Literature, and contrasted with the Spirit who (equally proverbially) was seen as the source of wisdom and understanding (as at 1:17; 3:16–18). Being filled with the Spirit is not to be understood here in a distinctively charismatic sense (though it may include that), but in the light of the ‘fill’, ‘fulness’ language elsewhere in the letter (1:23; 3:19b; 4:10) as an ongoing active presence of the Spirit mediating Christ and new-creation life. V 19 onwards is part of the same sentence as v 18 and spells out what being filled with the Spirit entails: it comes to expression in corporate worship (19a), adoring song (19b), thanksgiving to God (20; cf. 1:3–14; 15–16; 3:20–21) and mutual submission (21). Ecclesiasticus (an example of Wisdom Literature from the second century BC) offers a good parallel to Paul’s thought here, ‘If the ... Lord is willing he [the man who studies the law] will be filled with the Spirit of understanding; he will bring forth words of wisdom and give thanks to the Lord in prayer’ (Ecclus. 39:6).

22–24 The call for the wife to obey her husband (and that is roughly what the verb ‘submit’ means in this context; cf. 1 Pet. 3:5–6) was virtually a universal convention of Paul’s world. But Paul reinforces the convention with the claim that the husband is the woman’s head, which in 1 Cor. 11 is based in the Genesis story of Adam and Eve. ‘Head’ means master (see on 1:22); contrary to widespread claims, the word never meant ‘source’ in biblical Greek. The appeal is then further supported (and transcends convention) by the analogy Paul develops between marriage and the relationship between Christ and the church, with the woman being asked to submit to the husband in the way the church submits to her head, Christ (i.e. responding to his love, joyfully, and out of heartfelt desire, not grudgingly or under compulsion).

25–29 The charge to husbands to love their wives is also well reflected in the better conventions of the day, but Paul gives it radical new content through the Christ-church analogy. Christ gave himself for the church in love, and lovingly perfects the church (washing her clean with the word) for the day he will be more fully united with her. (The reference in v 26 is not to baptism.) Paul does not think the analogy carries through in every detail but as Christ sees the church as now having become his own body, by commitment to marriage union, and does everything lovingly and for her good, so should the husband for his wife (28). He should recognize that in loving her he is loving himself; for she is joined with him as one flesh (28–29; cf. 31).

30–33 Paul was perfectly aware of the literal meaning of Gn. 2:24, but he saw the mystery of cosmic unity in Christ, and especially the union between Christ and his body, as in a sense prefigured in the marriage bond. For him there is a typological relationship between creation in unity with God and redemption into unity with God. That original unity was nowhere better focused than in Adam's prefall union with Eve, and Paul holds that Christ's union with the church is its redemptive counterpart. The parallel was not accidental: as Lincoln observes, 'Christ had already been seen in Adamic terms in Eph. 1:22 ..., and so a text that refers to Adam's bodily union can now be claimed for Christ's union with the Church' (Lincoln, p. 382). But if Paul sees marriage as an illustration of the new-creation union, it must be noted that he also interprets marriage in the light of that Christ-church union—and thereby transforms the concept of the marriage relationship, and gives the world the highest ideal of marriage it knows.

6:1–4 The injunctions concerning parent-child relations follow quite clearly the wording of Col. 3:20–21. Paul only adds the commandment with a modified form of its attached promise (2; cf. Ex. 20:12) and the positive injunction that fathers (note the male responsibility) instruct and train their children in the Lord.

5–9 follows closely Col. 3:22–4:1 (see the Commentary there).

6:10–20 Final appeal: Fight the spiritual battle together!

It was common enough to end with an appeal that took up the central message of the letter, and pressed it to stir the readers' hearts and wills to support the writer. This is what Paul does here. The section must be read in the light of the whole of Ephesians, as a call to live out the gospel of cosmic reconciliation, not as an appendix for those with a special interest in demons and spiritual warfare. Note that Paul has chosen to recast his message in the form of a battle address: i.e. he addresses the whole church corporately as an army, not singular saints. Lone soldiers are easy to pick off! Note too that Paul has a particular sort of battle in mind: one to hold a strong position. His exhortation does not prepare soldiers to make a quick moving attack (and the Roman soldier's key attack weapons, the twin javelins, are missing), but to take a stand (11), to stand your ground (13) and to stand firm (14). They hold the crown of the hill, as it were, and the enemy must weary itself in constant uphill attack. The strong position Paul has in mind will be clear to the reader: it is our union with Christ (2:5–6), the head over all things (1:22–23), far above all principalities and powers (1:21), and the resurrection power of God at work in us (1:19–2:7). Even the armour and weapons turn out to be a mixture of God's very own (cf. Is. 59:17) with those of his Messiah (Is. 11:4–5). And yet Paul shows no triumphalism here. The decisive victory won by Christ lies in the past and the very fact that believers now fight on Christ's side is clear testimony to that (see 2:1–6); but complete victory still lies in the future. In the meantime it is the day of evil (13) that appears to dominate the scene.

The passage falls into three sections: the call to don God's armour for the battle (10–13); the detailing of the armour (14–17) and the need for watchfulness, prayer and intercession (18–20).

10–13 Be strong perhaps fails to bring out the force of the passive verb ('be strengthened'), and the REB does better with 'find your strength in the Lord'. Certainly the emphasis is on God's great power for this fight, and hence Paul had made his readers' understanding of this central point in his earlier prayer for them (1:19–2:10). In addition to divine strength they will need the full armour (defensive and offensive) God provides, but this armour will turn out to be of God in the further sense that it is the armour he wears when he sets out in judgment and salvation (Is.

59:17). Only this sort of armour will be of use given the nature of the opposition: the devil and his powers (11).

Writing to an area which had strong associations with magic (see the Introduction, and on 1:19a), and knew myriad names for the powers, it is noteworthy that Paul does not launch himself into a detailed and speculative demonology. Instead he uses three general terms, and one ('cosmocrats of this present darkness') which may originally have had a more specifically astrological meaning. The first two terms are deliberately drawn from 1:21–22, and so the reader is reassured that Christ has far greater authority and power.

The careful reader of the letter will have no problem in understanding the nature of the fight against these powers, or the content of the devil's schemes (11). He seeks to alienate humanity from God by disobedience (2:1–3; 4:18b–19) and by ignorance and corrupted thinking (4:17b–18). He tries to separate people from each other through the alienating sins of greed (4:22, 23), falsehood (4:25), anger (specifically related to the devil in 4:27) and related sins (4:25–31). By referring to the cosmocrats as 'of this [present] darkness', Paul points back to 5:7–14; and depicts the powers as the influence to sin that characterizes this age and this creation, in contrast to the 'light' of the new creation to come. It may strike us as strange that these powers are located in the heavenly realms, but that phrase signifies the whole spiritual dimension from what 2:2 calls 'the air' to God's throne (and Christ's) in the 'highest' heavens.

13 reiterates the need for divine armour if the Christian is to stand against these powers in the day of evil. The NIV's when the day of evil comes might suggest the final upsurge of evil and tribulation that Jewish apocalyptic writing expected just before the day of the Lord. That thought certainly colours the language here, but for Paul the days are already evil (5:16); the fight is already on; the armour is needed now if the believer is to stand. So in the day of evil probably includes the present, but particularly those periods which seem to us most to share the terrible quality of 'the [final] evil day'.

14–17 A repeated 'Stand firm [together]' introduces the portrayal of the armour itself. Gentile readers would no doubt have thought of the Roman soldier, but Paul (as at 1 Thes. 5:8) has cast his description mainly in terms of God's armour in Is. 59:17 (and the description of God in Wisdom of Solomon 5:17–20 is even closer). Here, however, the Messiah's belt of truth and breastplate of righteousness are added, along with his powerful word which strikes judgment (Is. 11:4–5). All this strengthens Paul's assertion that it is the Lord who gives the necessary armour; armour that is fashioned by his grace in us. Note that the metaphors are not rigid: in 1 Thes. 5:8 the 'breastplate' is faith and love, while here it is righteousness.

14 begins with two ethical items; 'truth as a belt round your loins, and righteousness as a breastplate'. To judge by the order in which the armour is donned, the former piece of equipment is probably a reference to the leather apron tied on first under the armour (to secure clothing) rather than the buckled armour or sword belt (against NIV). Truth and righteousness are often taken as references to the gospel and to its offer of righteousness-by-faith. But the terms here (as in Is. 11:5; 59:17) denote quality of character, and they stand alongside 'holiness' at 4:24–25 and 'goodness' at 5:8–9. Paul is saying that the church's basic equipment in the spiritual battle is integrity and righteous living, and they are effective because these qualities bear the stamp of Jesus and the new creation he brings (see on 4:17–24).

15 literally 'having fitted your feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace' (note the allusion to Is. 52:7), has been taken by the NRSV, NJB, and GNB to mean 'with the readiness to spread the good news of peace'. But Paul's point seems rather to be that the footwear provides preparation or readiness for battle. What soldiers need in a holding battle is the good grip provided by nails driven through the sole, so that the front lines are not sent reeling and slithering by an enemy charge. Paradoxically it is a deep spiritual understanding of the gospel of peace (see on 2:14, 17) that provides the church with this firm grip that is the ‘preparation’ or ‘readiness’ for the battle Paul has in mind. Hence the REB, ‘let the shoes on your feet be the gospel of peace, to give you firm footing’.

16 introduces the large door-shaped shield of wood and leather. In battle this could be locked together with others to form a wall in front, and a roof overhead. The leather was well soaked with water before battle, and that tended to put out the sizzling incendiary arrows that would flare up and burn purely wooden shields until the bearer dropped them in panic. The fiery darts Paul has in mind would include anything from direct occult attack to devilish persecution, but above all the steady rain of temptations to fear, bitterness, anger, and division that could break up the unity of the church. These darts are to be countered with faith. Faith in this letter is the radical openness to God that allows Christ’s full indwelling, and brings a deeper grasp of his unfathomable love (cf. 3:17). Take up the shield of faith thus suggests a deliberate and positive holding on to the God revealed in the gospel; firm and resolute dependence on the Lord which quenches the fiery attempts of the enemy to harm and to spread panic.

17 To put on the helmet of salvation (cf. Is. 59:17), in the context of this letter, is to assure our hearts of our union with Christ—that we are already seated with him and so secure in him (cf. 2:5–8). We hold the strong ground; we are only called to ‘stand’. The final piece of armour mentioned is the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. This too appears to be an allusion to Is. 11:4, where the powerful word of the Messiah effects judgment (and Wisdom of Solomon 5:20 [echoing Is. 16:4–5 and 59:17] talks of ‘stern wrath’ as the Lord’s ‘sword’). Here, then, the church is given a weapon not merely of defence, but one to strike back against the powers that attack. To strike back with truth when we are personally tempted to evil; to strike back with truth when the church is attacked by false teaching; to strike back with truth when the powers seek to pervade the world around us with alien philosophies and ethical teaching; and finally to strike vigorous blows for freedom with the fearless proclamation of Christian truth such as Paul encourages in vs 19–20. But one thing above all must be remembered about this ‘weapon of offence’: the word of wrath of Is. 11:4 has become the gospel of peace, and uniting love, in Christ. And we are fighting the spiritual powers not human enemies (12). Our use of the sword of the Spirit has to reflect this, else it will become a weapon of darkness, enmity and division instead.

18–20 Technically this is not a separate sentence, but a series of clauses built around the two participles ‘praying’ and ‘keeping alert’, together with their dependent clauses. The whole construction qualifies the Stand firm, then, of v 14. It should not be taken to mean either that prayer is a seventh piece of armour, nor specifically that prayer is the means of donning the six, but that prayer will be closely associated with them. Theological grasp of the gospel (14–17) that does not result in prayer, like Paul’s for the readers in 1:15–23 and 3:14–21, is a dead carcass. Prayer warriors with no real grasp of what the gospel is all about (the gospel of peace and cosmic restoration in Christ), may be spirited, but no more useful on the field than a soldier without weapons. Spiritual understanding of the gospel combined with an alert prayerfulness is the combination Paul seeks. Such prayer will be guided by the Spirit who gives access to God (cf. v 18 recalls 2:18), and the one who prays thus will pray not merely for himself or herself, but for the saints and for the bold progress of the gospel (19).

6:21–24 Postscript

21–22 are virtually word-for-word the same as Col. 4:7–8 (see the Commentary there). The final words are a prayer wish that refocus the main theme of the whole letter: for Messianic ‘peace’ that embraces the whole community, expressed in love and faith, and for deepening of this in grace.

Max Turner

PHILIPPIANS

Introduction

Paul, Philippi and the church there

The Philippi to which Paul went in the course of his missionary work was a significant place in a number of ways. Not only was it an important city in the Roman province of Macedonia, but it had the special status of being a Roman colony (Acts 16:12). This meant that it was like a little piece of Rome abroad. The Latin language was used; Roman law controlled local administration and taxes; many aspects of public life went on as in Rome itself and most of the officials had the same titles as in Rome.

The known history of Philippi, however, goes back a long way. Before 360 BC a small Thracian village stood on the site. The city itself was founded and its name given to it by Philip of Macedon, the father of Alexander the Great, as he realized the strategic nature of the site. Philippi came into the hands of the Romans in 168 BC after the battle of Pydna. In 42 BC Antony, after he and Octavian had defeated Brutus and Cassius, settled some of his disbanded veterans there, and thus made Philippi a Roman colony. Then in 30 BC, when Octavian had defeated Antony and Cleopatra at the famous battle of Actium, he sent further ‘colonists’ from Italy to Philippi, to make room nearer home for the settlement of his own war veterans. The strong consciousness of the privileges of Roman citizenship in Philippi is seen in Acts 16:20–21, 35–39 and is probably reflected in the letter in 1:27 and 3:20.

Paul’s preaching of the gospel in Philippi represents for us what was probably the first apostolic work of evangelization in Europe. For the apostle it would have meant working in a strategic centre of a Roman province which had not previously heard the gospel. According to the record of Acts 16:9–10, Paul went there (together with Silas and Timothy) in response to a vision in the night in which he saw ‘a man of Macedonia standing and begging him, “Come over to Macedonia and help us.”’ As the story of Acts 16 unfolds we read that in Philippi Paul found no synagogue, but on the Sabbath he discovered a ‘place of prayer’ by the riverside, where a group of women gathered. One of these women, Lydia, ‘a dealer in purple cloth from the city of Thyatira’, appears to have been the first convert, and she opened her home to Paul.

We see something of the pagan background in Philippi when we read of ‘a slave girl who had a spirit by which she predicted the future’ and who ‘earned a great deal of money for her owners by fortune-telling’. Paul and Silas were condemned to prison through the anger of the slave-owners when, with the evil spirit exorcized from the girl, they saw that ‘their hope of making money was gone’. The pretext for the condemnation of Paul and Silas was that they, as Jews, were throwing the city into an uproar and advocating customs which, their accusers piously said, were ‘unlawful for us Romans to accept or practise’.

The partnership in the gospel, the persecution and the largely Gentile background of the Philippian Christians (all of which are brought out in the letter) are thus seen in this record in Acts 16 of Paul’s first visit to Philippi.

Although we do not have many details, it is clear that from that first visit to Philippi Paul left behind a devoted group of Christians. On Paul’s third missionary journey recorded in Acts we read of his spending time again in Macedonia (Acts 20:1), and that most probably would have involved a visit to Philippi. Then after a time in Greece, he was back in Macedonia, and Acts 20:6 tells us specifically that Paul set sail from Philippi to return to Jerusalem.

The time and place of the writing of the letter

It is completely clear from reading 1:12–26 that Paul was in prison when he wrote. Philippians, together with Philemon, Colossians and Ephesians, have been called his ‘prison letters’. In 2 Cor. 11:23 he speaks of having been frequently in prison. From the record in Acts we know that he had sustained periods of imprisonment in Caesarea and in Rome, and on the basis of what we read in such passages as Acts 20:18–19; 1 Cor. 4:9–13; 15:31–32; 2 Cor. 1:8–10; 4:8–12; 6:4–10; 11:23–27, it is thought that he may well have been imprisoned in Ephesus also. Reasons have been put forward to support each of these places—Caesarea, Ephesus and Rome—as the likely place of Paul’s imprisonment when he wrote to the Christians at Philippi.

The most important arguments for Caesarea being the place where the letter was written are:

1. Acts 23:25 speaks of the imprisonment at Caesarea being in the praetorium of Herod (NIV, ‘Herod’s palace’), and the letter speaks of the fact that Paul was ‘in chains for Christ’ becoming clear through the whole praetorium (NIV, ‘palace guard’) as well as to others (1:13).
2. The two-year imprisonment in Caesarea (Acts 24:27) would have given time for the communications between Paul’s place of imprisonment and Philippi that the letter implies (see below).
3. In Phil. 1:7 Paul writes of a defence that he had made, but he was still in prison. It was certainly the case in Caesarea that he made a defence of himself before Felix, and then continued confined for those further two years.
4. In this letter Paul makes no mention of the collection for the poor in Judea which was so important at earlier stages in his work. When he was in Caesarea those gifts had already been delivered in Jerusalem, and so in Philippians he could write of ‘gifts’ without alluding to this collection.

There is some strength in these arguments. Over against them it must be said that in Caesarea Paul was not facing the immediate possibility of execution, but a journey to Rome to stand on trial before the emperor, because of his ‘appeal to Caesar’ (Acts 25:11). The alternatives of death and release of which he writes specifically in 1:20–24—and in the case of the latter the hope of a visit to Philippi (see 2:24)—were not really alternatives before him during this time in prison in Caesarea.

If we accept the probability of an imprisonment in Ephesus, we could recognize the strength of the following arguments for that being the place of the writing of Philippians:

1. The letter indicates at least four journeys between Philippi and the place of Paul's imprisonment: the first took news of his situation, then Epaphroditus came to Paul from Philippi, a message went back to Philippi to tell of Epaphroditus' illness, and subsequently news was received of the Philippians' concern for him (2:25–30). The journey from Philippi to Ephesus would have taken some seven to ten days, and so it would not have been difficult for all those journeys to have been made.

2. Acts 19:22 tells us that Timothy was sent from Ephesus to Macedonia, and this would fit in with Phil. 2:19–22.

3. From the passages mentioned above as arguing for Paul's imprisonment in Ephesus, it would seem that he did indeed face the threat of death there (cf. Phil. 1:20–23). It is, however, questionable whether Paul would have faced a long imprisonment in Ephesus, and imprisonment of the time needed for such situations to develop as are described in 1:12–18.

4. When Paul was in Ephesus he certainly contemplated, and indeed fulfilled, the hope of travelling to Macedonia and Greece. On the other hand, it is asked whether Paul could have written 2:24 from Rome, as it seems that at that time his eyes were turned westwards and he did not expect to come further east again (see Acts 20:25 and Rom. 15:18–29).

5. There are thought to be greater similarities between this letter and Paul's earlier letters rather than his later ones. In particular the problems of the Judaizers that he deals with in Galatians and Romans continued to concern him.

6. It is thought that such passages as 1:30 and 4:15–16 view the first preaching of the gospel in Philippi as much more recent than the eleven or twelve years that would have been involved if Paul was writing from Rome.

If the letter was written from Ephesus, its date of writing would have been about AD 54–55. If it was written from Caesarea, it would have been between 57 and 59. While there seem much greater strengths in the arguments for an Ephesian rather than a Caesarean origin of the letter there remain strong arguments to favour the traditional view that the letter was written from Rome:

1. In Rome, as long as Paul awaited trial before the emperor, there were the two possibilities that lay before him, acquittal and release, or being condemned to death. These are the two alternatives of which Paul writes in 1:19–26.

2. Although journeys between Rome and Philippi would have taken longer than between Rome and Ephesus, they need not have taken longer than seven or eight weeks each.

3. Although when Paul thought of going to Rome, he had in mind going further west to Spain (Rom. 15:23–28), there is evidence to suggest that while in Rome the apostle's thoughts were turned back to the lands east of him where he had laboured already, and where the churches that he had founded were in great need of help from him.

4. While there are similarities between Philippians and earlier letters of Paul, there are also conspicuous differences, and even in the time of the letters to Timothy and Titus the church was still in danger of the Judaizers' legalism.

5. Although explanation can be given to the 'praetorium' (1:13) and 'Caesar's household' (4:22) in relation to Ephesus (or even Caesarea), both expressions would more naturally be used in Rome.

6. The absence of any mention in Philippians of the collection for the Jerusalem Christians has been mentioned above as an argument for a Caesarean origin rather than an Ephesian one. It is also a strong argument for Rome, if Caesarea is ruled out, as the place of writing. From 2 Cor. 8:1–5 and 9:1–4 we see the involvement of Macedonian Christians in that whole undertaking, and so silence in relation to it would suggest it was a thing of the past.

If we settle for Rome as the most likely place for the letter to have been written, we should probably date it about AD 62, towards the end of the period of Paul's imprisonment of which Acts 28 speaks. For our understanding of the letter, however, the location is less important than the appreciation of the fact that it was a letter written out of the experience of sustained imprisonment.

The reasons for writing

As we read the letter to the Philippians we realize that there were a number of reasons that prompted Paul's writing:

1. He wanted to acknowledge the gifts that his friends in Philippi had sent to him (4:10, 14–18).

2. He wanted to give news of his own situation, and especially to give the assurance that his imprisonment had by no means involved a set-back for the gospel (1:12–26). He also wanted to tell them of his plan to send Timothy with further news (2:19–24), though he had the hope that he would be free to come himself.

3. He needed to explain why he was sending Epaphroditus back, when the Philippians had apparently intended that he should remain with Paul and help him in whatever way he could (2:25–30).

4. News had come to him that there was party spirit and potential disunity in the church at Philippi, and the apostle wanted to urge them to live and act and witness in the unity of the Spirit (1:27; 2:1–11; 4:2–3).

5. Paul also realized that there was a danger of the Philippians being influenced in the direction of Jewish legalism, and so he wanted to make it abundantly clear to them that this would be a basic contradiction of the gospel (3:1–11).

6. He seems also to have been aware of the dangers of a wrong idea about reaching perfection (3:12–16), and of the pressures of materialism on the Christians at Philippi (3:18–21).

7. His writing was also an opportunity to encourage Christians to suffer bravely, to live in single-mindedness and to trust their lives to their Lord in all things and under all circumstances (1:27–30; 2:12–18; 3:17–21; 4:4–9).

The theology and themes of the letter

Most of the letter deals with practical issues of Christian living rather than with Christian beliefs as such. As in all Paul's letters, however, what he says as instructions about discipleship is related to things at the heart of the Christian faith, such as the centrality of the cross (3:18), the work of the Spirit (1:19) and the Christian hope (1:6, 10; 3:20). There are sections of the letter, however, where strong and clear statements are made about the person of Christ and about the way of salvation in Christ. In 2:5–11 the facts of Jesus being of the very nature of God and yet becoming truly and fully human are unambiguously stated. Paul says that after Christ's stooping to our humanity and going even to death on the cross, 'God exalted him to the highest place' and uses words of that exaltation that are taken from an OT passage that speaks of every knee bowing before God and every tongue acknowledging him (Is. 45:23).

In 3:4–10, as Paul compares his pre-Christian ambitions and the life that he found in Christ, he makes clear that ‘righteousness’ (being in the right with God) is not possible by one’s own acts of obedience to the law or faithfulness in outward observances. It is possible only through Christ, by a ‘righteousness’ that is entirely God’s gift and grace, and made available by the suffering and death and resurrection of Christ.

In what is said about Christian living there are certain dominant notes in the letter:

1. Joy. The noun ‘joy’ or the verb ‘rejoice’ are used sixteen times in the letter. Paul speaks of joy in prayer (1:4), joy in the fruit of his work (4:1) and joy in suffering, even facing death (2:17). He rejoices where there is unity and fellowship (2:2), finds joy in the gifts of his friends (4:10) and has joy when he knows that others are preaching Christ (1:18). He encourages his readers to rejoice in their faith and in their relationship with the Lord (1:25; 3:1; 4:4), and in their receiving and welcoming a brother in Christ (2:28–29).

2. Fellowship and unity. Paul writes with gratitude for the Philippians’ partnership in the gospel from the beginning (1:5), as they shared in God’s grace enabling the defence and the confirmation of the gospel (1:7). It was a fellowship ‘of giving and receiving’ that he had known with the Philippian Christians (4:15). He encourages them to continue ‘standing firm in one spirit, striving side by side with one mind for the faith of the gospel’ (1:27, NRSV). It would make the apostle’s joy complete if they were ‘like-minded, having the same love, being one in spirit and purpose’ (2:2). He wanted to be sure that the church at Philippi was not allowing its fellowship to be marred by selfishness, pride or party spirit (2:1–4). Where there was disagreement between members, help needed to be given so that the unity and fellowship and witness of the body was not spoiled (4:2–3).

3. Paul’s spiritual ambition. No letter shows this more vividly. We see the completeness of Paul’s commitment to Jesus Christ, and his single-minded desire to know him and make him known. This is shown most clearly in 3:7–14, but alongside that passage we should set Paul’s hope and longing expressed in 1:20 that he would never be ashamed, but with courage make sure that Christ would be ‘exalted in [his] body, whether by life or by death’. In 4:11, 13 he can speak of his contentment in any circumstances, any deprivations, any difficulties, as long as Christ strengthened him to bear them and Christ was being glorified through them.

How the letter came to be written

Those who examine the NT documents closely ask questions that belong to literary and historical criticism: Is this the genuine work of the one whose name it bears? Was it all written as a letter as it purports to be? In the case of this letter these are fairly academic questions. No serious doubts are felt about Pauline authorship except by a tiny minority of scholars. There are three questions, however, that deserve brief attention.

1. Might 2:6–11 have been an early Christian hymn, taken up and quoted by the apostle as appropriate to his letter? These verses, with the humiliation and exaltation of Christ as their theme, are rhythmic in form, and scholars have arranged them in six stanzas of three lines each. We have highly poetic passages in some of Paul’s other letters (like 1 Cor. 13), but these verses read rather like a quotation, deeply relevant to the purpose of the section but not originally composed for it. We have other examples of hymns or credal fragments being used in NT letters (e.g. Eph. 4:4–6; 5:14; 1 Tim. 1:17; 3:16; 6:15–16; 2 Tim. 2:11–13). This appears to be a similar but longer example of such a quotation. There are words here not used elsewhere by Paul, some are not found anywhere else in the NT. If the hymn were composed by someone other than the apostle himself, this would also account for the incarnation and the work of Christ being described in a somewhat different way from that with which we are familiar from Paul's other writings. On the other hand, we cannot rule out the alternative that Paul himself was the author. We should certainly see 2:6–11 as a hymn in praise of Christ, perhaps by Paul, perhaps by someone else, but if so, taken by the apostle and made his own and appropriate to its context in this letter.

2. In the midst of 3:1 we have a sudden break in subject matter that some have suggested is best explained as an indication of a completely different letter being inserted into the one that we have been reading up to this point. There is certainly a break in the argument, but there are other examples of that kind of thing in Paul's letters. If this were part of another letter set into an earlier one, it is hard to see where the inter-polation ends. A more probable explanation would seem to be that whether fresh news came to hand from Philippi, or the apostle's mind was turned to this ever-pressing problem, he saw fit to warn his readers afresh of the menace of those who substituted law for grace as a means of acceptance with God. Having done this, he then moved to the final things that he wanted to say to the Philippians.

3. Some have asked whether 4:10–20 might belong to an earlier letter on the grounds that Paul would hardly have waited so long to acknowledge the gift brought from Philippi by Epaphroditus, and in any case he might have been expected to express this gratitude early on in his letter. There is some strength in this argument, but against it we can say that there may have been an acknowledgment of the gift in an earlier letter, of which we do not have a copy, and here Paul's gratitude is simply repeated. We should also be aware of the sensitivities involved in the way that Paul needed to express appreciation and at the same time to emphasize the fact that he was not dependent on their gifts (see the notes on 4:10–20). Because of these sensitivities we could understand why Paul left this delicate subject to the end of his letter. The probabilities would seem, therefore, to point against interpolation theories about the writing of Philippians.

We have in Philippians, as R. P. Martin puts it, 'a window into Paul's personal and pastoral character', and also 'a case-study of one early Christian congregation with whom Paul cherished fond and enduring relationships' (R. P. Martin, Philippians, NCB [Oliphants, 1976], p. ix).

While the letter to the Romans has gripped people's minds down the centuries and enabled them to see the wonder of the gospel of salvation in Christ, this letter to the Philippians has brought inspiration and courage to many facing hardship and persecution for the sake of the gospel, and so has made an incalculable impact on the lives of men and women.

Further reading

J. A. Motyer, The Message of Philippians, BST (IVP, 1984).

R. P. Martin, The Epistle to the Philippians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1987).

———, Philippians, NCB (Oliphants/Eerdmans, 1976).

G. B. Caird, Paul's Letters from Prison (OUP, 1976).

G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians, WBC (Word, 1983).

Outline of contents

1:1–11

Introduction

1:1–2	Greeting
1:3–7	Thanksgiving and confidence
1:8–11	Prayer

1:12–26

Paul's circumstances

1:12–14	The results of Paul's imprisonment
1:15–18	Different motives for preaching Christ
1:19–26	Christ exalted by life or death

1:27–2:18

Instructions concerning Christian living and fellowship

1:27–30	The call to live a life worthy of the gospel
2:1–4	Appeal for unity through personal humility
2:5–11	The example of Christ
2:12–18	The practical outworking of salvation

2:19–30

Future plans

2:19–24	Commendation of Timothy
2:25–30	Explanations about Epaphroditus

3:1–21Spiritual ambitions

3:1–3	Warning against the circumcision party
3:4–7	Paul's previous life and aims
3:8–14	The old renounced; Paul's new ambitions
3:15–17	An example to be followed
3:18–21	Call to a heavenly citizenship

4:1–23Instructions, thanks and greetings

4:1–3	Appeal to stand united
4:4–7	Call to joy and prayerfulness
4:8–9	Hold to the true and lovely
4:10–20	Paul's attitude to the gifts from Philippi
4:21–23	Concluding greetings

Commentary

1:1–11 Introduction

The pattern of letter-writing in NT times was to give the names of the writers and readers at the beginning, then there was a greeting, followed usually by a thanksgiving and a prayer (see the article Reading the letters). This was often done very conventionally, but for Paul what is said about the writers and readers and in greeting is lifted above the conventional by the thought of their life in Christ. Then thanksgiving and prayer come from the apostle's heart, praise for the working of God in people's lives, and prayer for those blessings that Christians then and now so deeply need.

1:1–2 Greeting

1 This is really Paul's letter and from v 3 the first person singular is used, but the apostle graciously links Timothy's name with his (as in 2 Corinthians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians and Philemon). Timothy had been with Paul when he first preached the gospel in Philippi, and he had continued to have a close association with the Philippian Christians (see on 2:19–23). Both are servants of Christ Jesus—the word is literally 'slaves', as they reckoned themselves to belong, body, mind and spirit, to Christ and wanted to be subject to him in everything. The recipients are called saints, which means those set apart for God and called to live in holiness (cf. Rom. 1:7), and that life was in Christ Jesus. This phrase, or its equivalent, appears many times in this letter, indicating that Christ is the very environment of the Christian's life. Believers live and move within the orbit of his will, his grace, his presence. We find life united by faith to him, and we cannot live as we should apart from him (cf. Jn. 15:1–11). Paul stresses that he is writing to all the Christians at Philippi, and this repeated emphasis (see 1:4, 7–8, 25; 2:17, 26; 4:21) suggests that there was the danger of factions among them (cf. 2:1–4). He mentions, in particular, their overseers and deacons, perhaps because they were in danger of being slighted (cf. 1 Thes. 5:12–13), or perhaps because they had organized the gifts for Paul (4:14–18). Overseers (or 'bishops') and 'elders' are names used sometimes in the NT for the same people (see Acts 20:17, 28 and Tit. 1:5–7); eldership was their place in the community, oversight their responsibility. Deacons are not often spoken of (see 1 Tim. 3:8, 12–13), although the term diakonos in the Greek is often used more generally for a 'minister' or 'servant'. Possibly the work of deacons is to be traced back to Acts 6:2, where the seven were appointed to 'serve' (Gk. diakonein) in a way like the later deacons.

2 The greeting is, as in several other letters (e.g. Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:3), a combination of the Greek and Hebrew traditional greetings, but with a depth of Christian meaning. Grace is undeserved favour that reconciles us to God through Christ (Eph. 2:4–9), supplies all our needs (2 Cor. 12:9) and gives us the privilege of service (Eph. 3:8). Peace in the Bible is more than the absence of conflict. It is complete wellbeing, involving reconciliation to God and to our fellows (Eph. 2:14–18) and the blessing of inner peace (4:7). Like grace, it comes from God our Father through the Lord Jesus Christ.

1:3–7 Thanksgiving and confidence

3–4 Paul joins praise and prayer, as he encourages others to do (cf. 4:6). He includes all the Philippian Christians and is joyful as he prays.

5 His great joy was because of their partnership in the gospel from the time when it was first preached among them, when Lydia opened her home to him and his colleagues (Acts 16:14–15). Partnership is the usual NT word for fellowship, but fellowship is not just the comfortable experience of Christians enjoying one another's company. It is fellowship in the task of making the gospel known to others (cf. Mk. 8:35), as it is also expressed in Christian giving (see 4:10, 14–18 and 2 Cor. 8:4; 9:13). It should be a characteristic of all of us who have come to know the good news of Christ that we are involved in partnership with those who are making it known to others.

6 Paul is confident as he prays, with a confidence not based on the Philippians' own abilities or past achievements, but on the power and love of God and because God can be relied upon to bring what he begins to completion. When we see that God has begun a good work in people's lives, we can be sure that it is his purpose to continue—that can always be our confidence in praying for our fellow-Christians. Notice how here also (as often in his letters) Paul saw his life and work in the light of the coming day of Christ Jesus. The time of that day is unknown to us, but what matters for us and all people is how our lives and our work will appear when we see our Lord face to face. Paul's constant concern was that he and his fellow-Christians might be presented before God mature and unashamed in that day (cf. 2 Cor. 1:14; 5:9–10; Eph. 5:27; Col. 1:28).

7 What has been said in v 5 about partnership in the gospel is spelled out a little more here. It was a matter of sharing God's grace in the work of the gospel, fellowship with Paul in chains for the gospel, and it involved both defending and confirming it. The task of defence involves the obligation of all Christians, to be 'prepared to give an answer to everyone who asks you to give the reason for the hope that you have' (1 Pet. 3:15), and also helping to make people more sure of the gospel's truth and power (cf. Lk. 1:4; 1 Cor. 1:6).

1:8–11 Prayer

A great deal can be learnt from Paul's prayers (cf. Eph. 1:17–23; 3:14–21; Col. 1:9–12). From the things he asks for, the Philippian Christians (and we no less) could learn the greatest gifts to ask for themselves. Here those gifts are love, discernment, purity of life and righteousness.

8 To place great emphasis on the truth of his words Paul says God can testify (cf. Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; 1 Thes. 2:5), and he speaks not of his own love but the affection of Christ Jesus in him.

9 They knew the love of God for them and in them, but Paul prays that their love may abound more and more (cf. 2 Cor. 9:8; 1 Thes. 3:12). Love, however, needs to be more than blind enthusiasm. It needs to be guided by knowledge and depth of insight (cf. Col. 1:9), 'the gift of true discrimination' (NEB), a sensitivity to the truth of God and the needs of others, and the understanding of one's situation.

10 The insight needed is to be able to discern what is best, or the words might be translated as 'testing things that differ'. In any case, discrimination is what matters, and real wisdom is not just a matter of the mind, but it has its consequences in life and character. The ideal and goal of our Christian living should be no lower standard than to be pure and blameless (cf. 2:15), and again the day of Christ is in view. The first of the two adjectives used suggests 'sincerity' or 'transparent character', while the second can either mean 'not stumbling' (cf. Acts 24:16) or 'not causing offence' (cf. 1 Cor. 10:32) or perhaps both.

11 The Christian life is intended to be fruitful not only in activity, but in character (cf. Gal. 5:22–23), and this verse reminds us that the means to this is the living Lord Jesus Christ and the goal is nothing other than the glory and praise of God (cf. Eph. 1:6, 12, 14).

1:12–26 Paul's circumstances

Paul knew the concern of the Philippian Christians for him, and so he sent news of himself. He was able to tell how his imprisonment had meant the advance of the gospel, how in the place of his imprisonment Christ was being proclaimed (if from a variety of motives), and how he viewed the possible issues of his confinement, release and further service or death. With reference to the past, the present and the possibilities of the future he could say I rejoice.

1:12–14 The results of Paul's imprisonment

12–13 Behind the words what has happened to me lies all that it meant for one who had been free to range far and wide preaching the gospel, to be confined and, as probably was the case, chained day and night to Roman soldiers. He does not dwell on his own sufferings, but rejoices in the progress of the gospel. The word ‘praetorium’, translated ‘palace guard’ or ‘palace’ (mg.) by the NIV, was originally the praetor’s tent in the camp. It then came to be used for the governor’s residence in a provincial centre (as in Jerusalem, Mt. 27:27). (There would also have been a praetorium in Ephesus and Caesarea [Acts 23:35], so this letter could have been written from either of them.) We can imagine the soldiers who guarded Paul returning to tell others that he was in chains for Christ, and being doubtless moved by the spirit with which he bore his imprisonment.

14 Paul’s example also inspired his fellow-Christians to speak the word of God more courageously and fearlessly.

1:15–18 Different motives for preaching Christ

15–17 After all he was able to say thankfully about the advancement of the gospel through his imprisonment, it is sad that Paul had to point out that there were those preaching Christ out of envy and rivalry, out of selfish ambition, even with the desire to make things more difficult for him in his imprisonment. We do not know the circumstances. It is clear that Paul did not challenge the content of the preaching, but its motivation. Perhaps these were leaders of the church in the place of Paul’s imprisonment before he came, and now they were jealous of his reputation because of his apostolic labours, and they were determined to outdo him and only too ready to cause him anguish.

18 Paul was determined not to be provoked or to allow the matter to become one of personalities—all that mattered to him was that Christ is preached.

1:19–26 Christ exalted by life or death

19 Paul faced imprisonment and the threat of death and, from fellow-Christians, animosity and provocation, and yet he was confident that all would turn out well (cf. Rom. 8:28). Humanly speaking he relied on the prayers of his friends, and in answer to them the unfailing help of the Holy Spirit. The Greek word translated help indicates both a generous provision and an undergirding strength. The assurance of deliverance is of the kind described in 2 Tim. 4:18, ‘The Lord will rescue me from every evil attack and will bring me safely to his heavenly kingdom.’ Jb. 13:16 (and its context) seems to be in his mind. ‘Paul has no confidence in his acquittal by an earthly court. Like Job he is sure of vindication when his case is presented in the heavenly court of appeal’ (G. B. Caird, Paul’s letters from Prison [OUP, 1976]).

20 The word translated eagerly expect means straining forward with outstretched head, and its prepositional prefix implies a turning aside from all other interests. Paul has one supreme ambition: that Christ might be exalted in his body, living or dying; that Christ might be seen by others more clearly and in his true greatness.

21–23 Paul can rejoice in either of the two alternatives he weighs up. Yet he says I am torn between the two—it was ‘like two equally strong external forces pressing in on him [vice-like] from both sides’ (G. F. Hawthorne, Philippians [Word Books, 1983]). To go on living in this world is constant enjoyment of Christ himself and further fruitful toil in his master’s service. To die is sheer gain, as for the believer there is nothing between death and the realization of the immediate presence of Christ. There is not necessarily any contradiction between thinking of death as ‘sleep’ (as in 1 Thes. 4:13–15) and as departing to be with Christ. It may be only our limitation of thinking in terms of space and time that makes it impossible for us to understand at all fully what lies beyond the gateway of death. The Greek word for depart is used for a ship weighing anchor or for striking camp; the corresponding noun is in 2 Tim. 4:6.

24–26 Paul contemplates the alternatives, and although he does not say he knows which God will grant, he begins to feel that he is being called to remain in the world for further service. For him it was more advantageous to go to be with his Lord; for others it was more advantageous (even more necessary) for him to continue in this life. Progress, growth in faith and overflowing joy, is what he sought for others (cf. 1 Tim. 4:15), just as he determined to press on himself in his great calling (cf. 3:12–14). Finally, Paul speaks here of wanting their joy in Christ Jesus (lit. their ‘boasting’) to overflow. For all of us as Christians our greatest joy and pride and boasting should be in Christ Jesus (cf. 1 Cor. 1:31).

1:27–2:18 Instructions concerning Christian living and fellowship

Paul has told of his own circumstances. Now he has important things to say that bear on the lives of the Philippian Christians. They are called to suffer and should count it as a privilege and so endure with courage. In their trials and in every aspect of their common life they must stand united. Pride hinders unity and fellowship, and the only remedy for selfishness and faction is to look long and often at Christ himself until his way of thinking and acting is theirs. He is their example and their Saviour, but his salvation must be worked out in lives of obedience, lives that will shine as lights in the world and that will be the apostle’s joy in the day of Christ.

1:27–30 The call to live a life worthy of the gospel

27 Paul may come back again to Philippi or he may not. What matters, he stresses, is that they live in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ. In all ages—and not least today—the greatest hindrance to the advance of the gospel has been the inconsistency of Christians. The gospel has its greatest influence when the lives of Christians commend it, and that gives us our special responsibility. The Greek word translated conduct yourselves is the one from which our word ‘politics’ comes and the word often conveys the idea of fulfilling one’s duty as citizen. In Philippi, as we have noted, Roman citizenship was prized, but the Philippian Christians had the responsibility to live individually and corporately as heavenly citizens (cf. 3:20). Paul often speaks of the need to stand firm in the face of opposition and difficulty (cf. 1 Cor. 16:13; Gal. 5:1; Eph. 6:11–14; 1 Thes. 3:8; 2 Thes. 2:15).

28 Reliance on the power of God is the way to avoid being frightened by those who oppose them. The word used here is used of startled horses; ‘never be scared’ is Moffatt’s translation. Their fearlessness, moreover, will show their enemies that Christians are not fortified by merely human courage, and so to oppose them is to fight against God (cf. Acts 5:39) and to take the path that leads to destruction (cf. 2 Thes. 1:4–8). Perhaps as he wrote, Paul recalled the voice of God in his own conscience indicating this when he persecuted the Christians (Acts 26:10–14). At the same time, the evident presence of God with them will assure the Philippians themselves that they are God’s and blessed with his salvation.

29 Behind the words it has been granted is the thought of a gift of grace, as for Christians it is a privilege to believe but also (by that strange contradiction of the world’s standards) to suffer for Christ (cf. Mt. 5:11–12; Acts 5:41).

30 The Greek word translated contending in v 27 is the word from which we have ‘athlete’; behind the word struggle here is the word that gives us ‘agony’ (cf. Rom. 15:30; Col. 1:29; 2:1; 1 Thes. 2:2). The calling of the Philippian Christians, and ours, is to accept that toil and struggle that marked the apostle’s life.

2:1–4 Appeal for unity through personal humility

These verses bring us the strongest possible appeal for Christian unity, the kind of appeal that many Christians seem prone not to take very seriously today. In v 1 Paul gives four reasons for such unity; in v 2 four ways to describe it; in v 3 two negatives to avoid and two positives to follow; and in v 4 a negative and a positive.

1 The word translated encouragement can mean ‘comfort’ (RV) or ‘appeal’, and so it may mean either that the comfort found in Christ should be shared with others, or that we have his appeal to unity (e.g. Jn. 15:1–11; 17:20–23). If we know the blessing of his love, we should show that to others without reserve or discrimination (cf. 1 Jn. 4:7–12). The next phrase can mean fellowship with the Spirit or the fellowship that the Spirit gives us—either is strong ground for living in unity. Then if we know in Christ tenderness and compassion, such should mark all our relationships with others.

2 There are no great differences between the four phrases here, but we should note that twice there is reference to the mind or to thinking, and this is an emphasis found elsewhere in the letter. The apostle knew well that thought and attitudes are the basis of speech and action and so direct the whole course of a person’s life (cf. 2:5; 3:15; 4:8). This perhaps needs underlining in an age when there is great emphasis on feelings and experience. In Rom. 12:2 Paul speaks of transformation of life taking place ‘by the renewing of your mind’.

3 Selfish ambition (the word, used also in 1:17, can mean ‘party spirit’) and vain conceit are inevitably enemies of fellowship and hindrances to unity. There are realistic ways of overcoming them. One way is by the practice of humility (cf. Eph. 4:1–3), considering others better than ourselves, which means seeing the strengths and gifts of others and our own weaknesses, failures and limitations (cf. Rom. 12:10).

4 It is also very practical to make a habit of thinking and speaking of the interests of others rather than boring people by constantly dwelling on our own interests (cf. Rom. 15:2–3; 1 Cor. 10:24, 33; Gal. 6:2).

As Christians we often justify or rationalize our divisions. Cranfield makes this wise comment on the kind of unity for which Paul was concerned, and the way to pursue it: ‘Such unity will only come when Christians are humble and bold enough to lay hold on the unity already given in Christ and to take it more seriously than their own self-importance ... and to make of those deep differences of doctrine, which originate in our imperfect understanding of the Gospel and which we dare not belittle, not an excuse for letting go of one another or staying apart, but rather an incentive for a more earnest seeking in fellowship together to hear and obey the voice of Christ.’ (C. E. B. Cranfield, The First Epistle of Peter [SCM, 1950], pp. 75–76).

2:5–11 The example of Christ

The best way that Paul can encourage his friends in Philippi to live in humility, and so to have true fellowship and unity, is by reminding them of the example of Christ. As he speaks of the humiliation that Jesus accepted and then his exaltation as Lord of all, perhaps using an early Christian hymn (see the Introduction), we have a very important statement of what was believed from the beginning of the life of the church about the true humanity and the deity of Christ. To take this in we need to pay very careful attention to the specific words that are used.

5 Your attitude could mean personal attitude or that which is expressed in relationships. ‘Have this mind among yourselves’ is the RSV translation, and the NEB has ‘Let your bearing towards one another arise out of your life in Christ Jesus’.

6 Powerful words are used here. The participle being comes from a stronger verb in the Greek than the normal verb ‘to be’; this is followed by a noun that is well translated by the NIV as in very nature. Jesus was truly God before he became a human person. Then, without ceasing to be God, he was willing to lay aside the glory of being equal with God. That was not something to be grasped (see note below on the precise meaning here). There is perhaps an intended contrast with Adam in Gn. 3 as the temptation to which he fell was wrongly to seize what he thought would make him ‘like God’.

7–8 So he made himself nothing. Literally it says ‘he emptied himself’, not of his deity but of his glory; ‘he made himself of no reputation’ (AV). Then when it says that he was made in human likeness and found in appearance as a man that does not merely mean similarity without the reality of our human nature. He was indeed truly human, as Paul says in Rom. 8:3 and Gal. 4:4, but the expression ‘leaves room for the thought that the human likeness is not the whole story’ (F. W. Beare, The Epistle to the Philippians [A. and C. Black, 1959]). He stooped lower still and became obedient to death. He lived a life of utter obedience (cf. Rom. 5:19; Heb. 5:8–9; 10:5–14), ‘even to the extent of dying’ (Phillips). That death, moreover, was death on a cross, a death of unimaginable pain and utter shame, a curse in the eyes of the Jews because of what the law said in Dt. 21:23 (see Gal. 3:13). What crucifixion meant to Romans is expressed in Cicero’s words, ‘Far be the very name of the cross, not only from the body, but even from the thought, the eyes, the ears of Roman citizens.’

9–11 In consequence of his humiliation and self-sacrifice, Jesus was given by the Father the name that is above every name. That does not mean a specific name or title as such, though ‘Jesus is Lord’ is the right and proper Christian profession (cf. Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3). It means that God exalted him to the highest place of honour, and it is most significant—especially when people would say that the Christ of the NT is less than God—to realize that in vs 10–11 the words that are used in Is. 45:23 of God are used of Jesus, to express his honour and rule and authority over all creation (cf. Eph. 1:20–22; 4:8–10; Rev. 5:13). Finally, however, we need to notice that this is to the glory of God the Father, i.e. the glory to which Christ has been raised is in no way independent of the Father (cf. 1 Cor. 15:28). All these tremendous statements, we should remind ourselves, have in their context the most practical purpose of persuading the Philippians to put aside disunity, discord and personal ambition.

Note. There are many ways in which the words of v 6 (he did not consider equality with God something to be grasped) have been understood. There are two main alternatives: either equality with God means the same as being in very nature God or it can be understood as speaking rather of the glory and honour of a position alongside God the Father, the title to lordship over the universe. Jesus ‘did not think to snatch at’ this (NEB). It would, in fact, finally be his by the Father’s appointment, but beyond a human cradle and a human grave and the resurrection, and because he submitted to go the Father’s chosen way by humiliation to exaltation. If equality with God is understood as essentially the same as being in very nature God, indicating that the divine nature was inalienably his, then we can understand the apostle as saying either ‘he did not cling to’ those ‘prerogatives as God’s equal’ (Phillips); or he did not have to seize hold of them—it was not a matter of their being grasped; or equality with God was not something to be taken advantage of. Perhaps the last of these is the most probable, both because of the meaning of the Greek words used and because it fits in with the teaching of the whole paragraph. The way appointed by the Father was giving not getting, sacrifice and humiliation not taking the advantage of one's position. This is the way Jesus went and the way we are called to follow him.

2:12–18 The practical outworking of salvation

12 The example of Christ is not only one of humility; it is also one of obedience (8). To such obedience, whether or not Paul is with them (cf. 1:27), the Philippians are called. Work out here has the sense of bringing to completion. It is not a matter of working for salvation. We could never do that. The very word salvation (which means 'rescue') signifies that we cannot save ourselves (cf. Jn. 15:4–5; 1 Cor. 15:10; Eph. 2:5, 8), but we can and must live lives that show God's saving power that we have made our own.

13 We have our part to do, but that is made possible by God's work in us (the Greek word used here, and often by Paul for God's power, is that from which we have our word 'energy'). He gives both the desire and the strength to do what is pleasing to him.

14 Moreover, it is not just what is done that matters, but the spirit in which we do it, 'free of murmuring and complaining' (NJB). This has a constant application to the Christian's life and work.

15 The highest standards must be set if Christians are to live out their faith within a society that is morally warped and spiritually perverted. This description is taken from Dt. 32:5 but is tragically apt for much of western society today. Each expression of Christian living here is worth pondering. Blameless means above criticism. Pure means thoroughly wholesome in character and single-minded. Believers are described as children of God, as it is not only their privilege (Jn. 1:12) but their responsibility so to live in the world as those who belong to God and show the family likeness. The expression without fault is used of the requirement of animal sacrifices in the OT. It is also used of the Lord himself in a moral and spiritual sense (Heb. 9:14; 1 Pet. 1:19), and it is the Christian's standard. Like stars (lit. 'light-bearers') indicates that Christ is the light (Jn. 1:8–9; 8:12) and we are to reflect that to others.

16 The word used here could mean 'hold on to' (NIV mg.) or hold out. We are to hold fast to the word, but above all to offer it as the word of life for a perishing world (Jn. 3:16; 6:68; Acts 5:20; 2 Cor. 2:15–16). Paul thinks of his life as running a race and as toiling to the point of weariness, but with his spiritual vision fixed on the Lord whom he looks forward to seeing face to face and having his approval.

17–18 The thought of death as the possible outcome of his imprisonment comes to the apostle again. That death would be an offering to God, but he thinks of it just like a drink offering poured out on the much more significant sacrifice—the Philippians' faith and the quality of their life and service produced by that faith. (For the first of these offerings cf. 2 Tim. 4:6 and for the second Rom. 12:1.) Paul had come to the point of rejoicing whatever the circumstances, whether life or death, and he wanted his friends in Philippi to take the same attitude.

2:19–30 Future plans

Paul turns now to speak of his two fellow-workers, Timothy and Epaphroditus, of his plans for them and of his hope of being able to come to Philippi again. In the process he speaks of these two men in deeply affectionate terms and gives glowing testimony to their devoted and selfless service.

2:19–24 Commendation of Timothy

We have seen that Timothy was with Paul when he wrote this letter (1:1) and that he had shared in the first preaching of the gospel in Philippi (Acts 16:1–11). Most of Paul's letters mention him, often because he has special responsibilities delegated by the apostle.

19 Paul says tactfully that his first desire with respect to Timothy's mission was that he might be cheered by news of the Philippian Christians. Doubtless, however, he had also in view a ministry that Timothy would have in Philippi, and in preparation he speaks of Timothy in terms of highest commendation. Notice also how Paul says I hope in the Lord Jesus and how frequently that phrase, or its equivalent 'in Christ', is used by Paul. Paul tried to submit all his hopes and plans for the future to the Lord to whom his life was united (cf. 1 Cor. 16:7; Jas. 4:13–15).

20–21 Paul says that he had no-one else quite like Timothy, with such a genuine interest and spiritual concern for the Philippian Christians, and sadly the apostle adds that when he thinks of others around him whom he might send, 'they are all bent on their own ends, not on the cause of Christ Jesus' (NEB). 2 Tim. 4:9–13 reflects a similar situation. It is always a challenge to us to consider whether we have that 'genuine interest' in other people or whether we want people to serve our own ends.

22 Timothy's worth had been proved in Philippi and the apostle himself, more than anyone else knew that worth, because as a son with his father he had served (lit. 'slaved',—cf. 1:1) in the furtherance of the gospel.

23–24 Paul wanted news from Philippi through Timothy. Timothy was also to take news of Paul to Philippi, and so it was necessary for him to wait until the outcome of Paul's trial was known, whether it was to be release or death (cf. 1:23–24). Paul appears to have had an increasing hope that it would be release, and so he would be able to come soon to Philippi.

2:25–30 Explanations about Epaphroditus

25 We have no knowledge of Epaphroditus except what is in this paragraph and in 4:18, where it is said that the Philippians sent their gifts to Paul through him. He was thus their messenger (it is the word apostolos that is used, but in a sense different from the foundation apostles of Christ; cf. 2 Cor. 8:23), but was also sent with the intention that he should stay with Paul and care for his needs. Notice the partnership involved in the words brother, fellow-worker and fellow-soldier. Many Christians are redoubtable workers and soldiers in the cause of Christ, but not all work well with their fellows.

26–28 Something had happened that made it wise for Paul to send Epaphroditus back to Philippi rather than keep him at his side. He had been critically ill, but by the mercy of God (mercy to Paul too as he saw it) he had recovered. The report of the seriousness of his illness had gone to Philippi and news had come back of the anxiety of his friends there. This caused distress (a very strong word in the Greek, used in the NT otherwise only of our Lord's anguish in Gethsemane in Mt. 26:37 and Mk. 14:33) to Epaphroditus and brought into his heart a longing for those at home. So Paul recognized that it was best for him to return.

29–30 Paul, however, was sensitive to the situation. There was a possibility of the Philippians misunderstanding the reason for their messenger's return. So he called on them to receive Epaphroditus with a warm-hearted Christian welcome, not just as one of their own fellowship returned from abroad but as one to be highly honoured for the faithfulness and costliness of the service he had given. We do not know how it was that he almost died for the work of Christ, risking his life. It may have been simply by identifying himself with Paul the prisoner. It may have been that ‘he fell ill on the road and nearly killed himself by completing the journey while he was unfit to travel’ (Caird Paul’s Letters from Prison). The word risking is literally ‘gambling’, and there may be an intentional play on the name of Epaphroditus (as there is on the name of Onesimus in Phm. 11). Aphrodite was the Greek goddess of gamblers, and a gambler hoping to win might call to her, epaphroditus (Hawthorne Philippians). This man gambled his life in serving Paul, but it was a risk for God’s sake, and he won.

3:1–21 Spiritual ambitions

It seems that Paul was about to close his letter here as he uses a word that might be translated ‘finally’. Then, whatever the reason (see the Introduction), he feels that he must give a warning about those who wanted all Gentile converts to become Jews. This leads him to speak of his reliance on Jesus Christ alone for acceptance with God and to speak of his greatest ambitions for his spiritual life and also for the lives of his Christian friends at Philippi.

3:1–3 Warning against the circumcision party

To understand what is being said here and in the next few verses we need to go back a little into the life of the early church. The first believers in Jesus were Jews, and as loyal Jews they saw the law as of vital importance and emphasized the covenant that Israel had with God, the sign of which was circumcision. These first believers were sent out with a world mission (Acts 1:8), but it was hard for them to reach out to non-Jews (note Acts 10) and it was some time before a true mission to Gentiles began (Acts 11:20). Paul, as apostle to the Gentiles, believed that if non-Jewish people turned to the Lord in repentance and faith they were to be accepted as members of God’s people, without the necessity of their becoming Jews and of males being circumcised. There were Jewish Christians, however, who in Antioch (Acts 15:1) and in Galatia insisted that these Gentile Christians should become Jews. So the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15 was called, and to deal with the same issue Paul wrote his letter to the Galatians. Years later this was still a problem, and so to write about it was a safeguard for the Philippians.

1–2 Paul was so incensed against those who pressed for Gentiles to become Jews that he called them dogs, the name that Jews gave to Gentiles. These people, however, were more deserving of the name than any Gentile because of the way that they liked to ‘prowl round the Christian congregations, seeking to win Gentile converts over to Judaism’ (Beare, Philippians), and so such converts needed to watch out for them. They were ‘evil workers’ (NRSV), turning people aside from truth and freedom (Mt. 23:15; 2 Cor. 11:13; Gal. 1:7–9). Because circumcision had no spiritual value they were just mutilators of the flesh.

3 When the spiritual value of circumcision is no longer there, the practice becomes only an external rite, a matter of confidence in the flesh. It is we who are the circumcision, says Paul. While some think that he may have been speaking just of Jewish Christians, the evidence is that Paul, and the NT writers generally, take up all the titles and privileges of the people of God from OT days and apply them to Christians, whether Jewish or Gentile (e.g. Eph. 2:11–22; 1 Pet. 2:4–10).

3:4–7 Paul’s previous life and aims

4 Paul argues now that he could have the same confidence, confidence in the flesh, as these people who wanted to make all Christians become Jews. He could list one by one the things that he formerly, as a devout Jew, thought gave him a credit account with God.

5–6 He lists seven things that he counted as gains in the deeply religious life that he had lived before he met with Jesus. (i) He was circumcised on the eighth day after his birth as the law required (Gn. 17:12). (ii) He was born and bred an Israelite, a member of the people of God. (iii) He could name his tribe, Benjamin, the tribe of Israel's first king, and one that had remained faithful when others did not. (iv) He was not only a true Jew, but a Hebrew, an Aramaic-speaker (cf. Acts 6:1; 22:2; 2 Cor. 11:22), son of Hebrew parents, not like so many who had lost the use of their native tongue. (v) Strict in observing the law, he was a devout Pharisee (Acts 23:6; 26:5; cf. Gal. 1:14). (vi) His zeal was shown in what he did to persecute the Christians (Acts 8:3; 9:1). (vii) He could say that as far as the external demands of the law were concerned, the Mosaic law by which he had tried to live, he was faultless. That, however, was a matter of legalistic righteousness, of trying to be right with God on the basis of obedience to the law.

7 Now he reckoned all these gains as one great loss. 'All such assets I have written off because of Christ' (NEB). He had come to see them as a false basis of confidence and even a hindrance to him. He goes on to describe the infinitely better way he had found.

3:8–14 The old renounced; Paul's new ambitions

Because of his meeting with the risen Christ on the Damascus road (Acts 9), and also because he came to realize that he had not really kept the law (Rom. 7), Paul had been led to a 'radical transvaluation of values' (Hawthorne, Philippians).

8 Because he had found the way of acceptance with God in Christ, Paul reckoned all those things on which he had relied before as loss; he decided that all was 'far outweighed' by the single 'gain of knowing Christ' (NEB). He had not only counted all those things as loss but he could say that for Christ's sake I have lost all things—his place in Judaism, among the Pharisees, probably his own home even. Yet he did not grieve, as everything else was 'useless rubbish compared with being able to win Christ' (Phillips).

9 Now his desire is to be accepted on the basis of the righteousness which is God's gift, offered on the simple condition of believing (cf. Rom. 3:21–4:25; Gal. 2:15–3:29; Eph. 2:4–9), laying aside that so-called righteousness of his own works on which he had relied before.

10 More than that, he wants to live in the knowledge of Christ, that is (as Christian baptism signifies, see Rom. 6:1–4) being identified with Christ crucified and risen. This means knowing the power of his resurrection in daily experience (cf. Rom. 8:10–11; 2 Cor. 4:10–11; Eph. 1:19–20) and sharing his sufferings by dying to the self-centred life that is natural to us and being willing to face difficulty and hardship that the gospel of salvation may go out to all people (cf. 2 Cor. 4:7–12; Gal. 6:17; Col. 1:24–25). These two realities must always belong together in any genuine Christian life.

11 In the light of his new great ambition and longing, Paul thus hopes somehow, to attain to the resurrection from the dead. These words come strangely to us after what we have read. Does not attaining to the resurrection depend on faith alone? Could the apostle be in doubt about his final salvation? He never lacked the assurance that he was a child of God, accepted by God (Rom. 8:15–17; Gal. 4:6–7), yet he was never complacent or presumptuous. Faith must endure to the end (Mk. 13:13; Heb. 3:14). We should read Paul's words here as an expression not so much of doubt, as of humility.

12–13 It seems that there were in Philippi those who thought that they had reached the goal of Christian perfection, that they had ‘arrived’. Paul recognized the call to Christians to aspire to the highest standards (cf. 2:15; Eph. 4:13–16), as Jesus himself said ‘Be perfect ... as your heavenly Father is perfect’ (Mt. 5:48), but he never claimed to have reached that perfection. Rather he will press on, and the word that he uses means literally ‘pursue’, the word by which he described his persecuting of the early church (6). He wanted to take hold of that great purpose for which Christ had taken hold of him when he confronted him on the Damascus road years before. There are ways in which Christians should remember the acts of God in the past, but Paul knew that he must not dwell on the past; its failures and sins have been forgiven, and its achievements in the service of Christ must not allow him to rest on his laurels. He wanted rather to be found straining towards what lay ahead, and to express this he uses another very strong word, applicable to an athletic context or a chariot race; every fibre of his being was set on the goal and purpose of his Christian life.

14 There was a prize to be won, though we cannot be sure whether Paul saw the prize as Christ himself (cf. v 8), ‘God’s call to the life above’ (NEB), or the ‘crown of life’ (Jas. 1:12; cf. 1 Cor. 9:25), the gift of God’s grace to those who faithfully persevere in their calling to the end.

3:15–17 An example to be followed

15 Being mature or ‘perfect’ (it is essentially the same word in the Greek original) is a matter of thinking in the way of which Paul has been speaking. He trusts that if his Philippian friends think differently, the Spirit of God will reveal the true way and they will be open to that.

16 What is vital always is that we should live by the truth that we have already recognized and accepted. What is translated here let us live up to has the sense not just of individually following on but of keeping in line with others. ‘In choosing this verb Paul once again stresses the importance of harmony and mutual cooperation in spite of whatever divergence of opinion may exist’ (Hawthorne, Philippians).

17 Here, as in other places in his letters (e.g. 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; 1 Thes. 1:6; 2:10; 2 Thes. 3:7, 9), Paul speaks of his own example as one to be followed. This might seem presumptuous, but we need to realize that before there was a NT for Christians to use, it was vital that there should be role models. It was as much necessary for Paul to live the kind of Christian life that others could follow as it was for him to preach a pure gospel for them to believe. J. B. Phillips paraphrases this verse, ‘let my example be the standard by which you tell who are the genuine Christians among those about you’. Our situation is not exactly the same today, as the NT is people’s basic guide to Christian lifestyle, but it is still the case (as Paul puts it in 2 Cor. 3:1–3) that the Christian is called to be like ‘a letter from Christ’, ‘known and read by everybody’, including many who would not turn to the Scriptures.

3:18–21 Call to a heavenly citizenship

From the thought of his own great ambitions fired by the love of Christ, and from the thought of those with a misguided concept of perfection, Paul turns to think of others within the community of the Christian church whose lives he can only contemplate with pain and grief.

18–19 In two ways the cross is at the very centre of Christianity. It is central because we believe that through the death of Christ on the cross we have the way of forgiveness and acceptance with God and thus of eternal life. The cross is also central for our understanding of discipleship. Jesus calls us to take up the cross and follow him (Mk. 8:34; Lk. 9:23), and Paul knew that he must accept ‘the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death’ (10). It seems clear that it was in this second way that these people of whom Paul writes were enemies of the cross of Christ. Instead of accepting a self-denying way of discipleship, they had made their physical desires their god, boasted in what was in fact shameful, and set their minds on earthly things. This meant that instead of finding in the cross both their salvation and way of life, they were on a path that could lead only to destruction.

20 The thought of those whose lives are dominated by the desire for earthly things leads the apostle to say that true Christians know that their life and citizenship is even now in heaven with Christ (cf. Eph. 1:3; 2:6; Col. 3:1–4). Philippians could be proud of their citizenship in a Roman colony (see the Introduction), just as we all have an earthly citizenship which has its privileges and its obligations. But they, and we, have to value above all the gift of a heavenly life and citizenship, and we live in hope of our future inheritance that we will receive in its fulness in the future. Thus we eagerly await the reappearing from heaven of our Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ.

21 Christ’s coming will mean the transformation of our lowly bodies to be like his glorious body (cf. 2 Cor. 4:16–5:4; 1 Jn. 3:2) by the power of God to whose working there can ultimately be no limitation or hindrance. The body that we have is not despised, but it is a sign of our present lowly condition (the same word is used in Mary’s song in Lk. 1:48). Now our bodies are subject to pain and suffering and weakness; then they will be raised to be immortal and imperishable (see 1 Cor. 15:35–54).

4:1–23 Instructions, thanks and greetings

Paul’s final paragraphs include appeals, personal messages and the acknowledgment of the Philippians’ gifts to him. His grateful remembrance of those gifts leads him to speak of his dependence on the Lord and of the spiritual blessings that come from generous giving. He goes on to say that he has learnt to live as contentedly with little as with much, enabled in all things by the Lord who will also surely supply fully all their needs.

4:1–3 Appeal to stand united

The word Therefore that begins this paragraph indicates that Paul’s appeal here is based on what has gone before—the danger from those who wanted to make all Christians become Jews and his disappointment with the worldly-minded.

1 The words here show the depth of Paul’s feeling as he wrote to his friends in Philippi. Twice in the verse he uses the word which literally means ‘beloved’. He rejoices in them. He sees them like a crown on his head (cf. 1 Thes. 2:19). He loves them and longs for them (cf. 1:8). More than anything else, he encourages them to stand firm in the Lord (cf. 1:27), like soldiers determined not to be made to retreat whatever the forces against them.

2–3 Having dealt earlier in general terms with divisions and party spirit in the church (2:1–5), Paul felt he must deal specifically with one quarrel that was marring their life. We know nothing otherwise of Euodia and Syntyche, but Paul speaks in warmest commendation of them as women who have contended at my side in the cause of the gospel, women who had had a ministry indeed. Yet he has to entreat them to agree with each other in the Lord and to ask one of his trusted colleagues (unnamed, unless we should read yoke-fellow as a proper name, Syzgyus, as the NIV mg.) to help them to be reconciled with each other. When Paul criticizes, he seeks also to affirm and commend. He mentions Clement specifically, but he is aware of all his fellow- workers, and the greatest thing that he can say of them all is that their names are in the book of life. For this ‘book of life’ compare Ex. 32:32; Ps. 69:28; Dn. 12:1 and Rev. 21:27, and remember the words of Jesus when he told his disciples to rejoice not so much in their achievements in his service but in God’s grace that their names were ‘written in heaven’ (Lk. 10:20).

4:4–7 Call to joy and prayerfulness

4 Yet again the theme of joy comes out in this letter as the apostle calls on his readers to rejoice ... always, and he says in the Lord, repeating that phrase yet again: ‘stand firm in the Lord’ (1), ‘agree ... in the Lord’ (2), now Rejoice in the Lord. The whole of Christian living is a matter of that relationship with the living Lord Jesus, in the atmosphere of his presence and all-enabling grace.

5 There is a quality of life which is to be evident to all in a Christian’s life and relationships. The NIV translates Paul’s word as gentleness, the NJB has ‘good sense’, Knox translates it ‘courtesy’ and the RSV ‘forbearance’. From these varying translations we can get the idea. The nearness of the Lord that motivates this quality could mean his nearness at all times to the believer, the nearness of his coming or both.

6 Anxiety is to have no place in the lives of Christians because in everything there can be prayer, prayer in its various forms and modes, petition, requests, but above all thanksgiving. This is because praise is always due to God and because faith is quickened when we remember in thankfulness what God has done for us in the past. There is an echo here of the teaching of Jesus (Mt. 6:25–34; 7:7–11). 1 Pet. 5:7 is similar as it says, ‘Cast all your anxiety on him because he cares for you’, and as J. A. Bengel (New Testament Word Studies, vol. 2 [Kregel Publications, 1978], p. 447) aptly puts it, ‘Anxiety and prayer are more opposed to each other than fire and water.’

7 When prayer replaces worry, the peace of God, which transcends all understanding comes in, and that peace acts as a sentry guarding the Christian’s mind and emotions from being overwhelmed by the sudden onrush of fear, anxiety or temptation. This reality Christians should prove in their daily lives.

4:8–9 Hold to the true and lovely

It is sometimes said that the qualities of character mentioned here are not distinctively Christian but such as have been honoured in many cultures and societies. That may be so, but the Christian has a special obligation to demonstrate them and has the enabling of the Spirit to do so.

8 Eight words are used for the things that should fill the Christian’s thought-life. As they are ‘taken into account’ (as the word translated think means), they will shape attitudes and direct words and actions. They are the things that are true and honest, worthy and noble, just and right, pure and holy, lovely and beautiful, admirable and pleasant to hear about. The word translated excellent was the best word that classical Greek ethics had for virtue, and lastly there is the thought of what is worthy of praise and commendation.

9 Putting this into practice, in other words, living by what they know and acknowledged, would result for the Philippians in the kind of life that Paul had sought to model (see on 3:17). Not only would the peace of God be found, but also his unfailing presence (cf. 2 Cor. 13:11; 2 Thes. 3:16).

4:10–20 Paul’s attitude to the gifts from Philippi

In this paragraph the apostle feels the need to do two things: to express appreciation for the gifts sent from Philippi, and yet at the same time, very sensitively, to emphasize the spiritual principle of dependence on the Lord rather than on human help. He does this so exquisitely that these verses have been called ‘one of the gems of literature’ (Beare, Philippians).

10 Paul rejoices in their gifts. They represented a fresh blossoming (NEB) of their earlier ministry of giving to him—for a long time they had had no opportunity to show their concern for him.

11–13 Their gifts had been a joy and encouragement to him, but he was not relying on them, nor, by writing like this, was he soliciting further gifts. He could honestly say that he had learnt the secret of contentment with outward circumstances, whether he had little or much. He knew that his Lord would not fail to give him what was necessary and to strengthen him to face every situation. In writing these things Paul uses two words that had significant religious and philosophical use in those days. The word translated content (Gk. autarkēs) means ‘self-sufficient’. It was regarded by the Stoics as high virtue to be detached from outward circumstances and to have resources in oneself to meet every situation. Paul uses the word in the sense of his being independent of circumstances, but his all-sufficient resources were, he said, through him who gives me strength, the living Lord Jesus. The other word, translated I have learned the secret, was used in the mystery cults for initiation into a secret. Paul’s secret of living was an open secret, available for all who would walk the way of Christ. It was the secret of contentment, since to know Christ and to be called to serve him was ‘unsearchable riches’ (Eph. 3:8). How far we know the secret of contentment and to what degree we are proving the sufficiency of Christ for all the demands of our lives are always challenging questions for us as Christians.

14–16 In spite of what he says about this basic spiritual principle of dependence on God, Paul wants to affirm that he appreciated the kindness of the Philippians. It supported him in his troubles. He speaks of that time of ‘the beginning of the gospel’, words which have been understood in a variety of ways but which the NIV rightly takes as the early days of your acquaintance with the gospel. Paul had set out from Macedonia, the province in which Philippi was situated, and gone to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1). While he was there, the Philippian Christians sent him aid again and again. Notice also how he speaks of the partnership that existed between them, a sharing in the matter of giving and receiving. Real fellowship is a two-way process.

17–18 Christian giving also brings blessing to those who give. The Philippians’ giving, Paul says, may be credited to their account. In saying this he uses a metaphor from business transactions. It was a matter of full payment. We can be sure that Paul, in using such language, would have repudiated the least thought of earning anything from God. Everything received is a gift of God’s grace. All we do for the Lord or for others is out of love and gratitude. What is done for others is accepted as done for the Lord (Mt. 25:40) and can be described as a sacrifice, pleasing to God, fragrant as incense (cf. Ex. 29:18; Ezk. 20:41; Jn. 12:3; 2 Cor. 2:16).

19 The Lord is no-one’s debtor. The measure of God’s giving is infinitely greater than that of any human giving. God’s promise is to supply all that he sees we need, and not only out of but according to [in the measure of] his glorious riches in Christ Jesus.

20 Praise and glory is due to our God and Father now and forever and ever (lit. ‘to the ages of the ages’), for all eternity.

4:21–23 Concluding greetings

21–22 Paul began his letter according to contemporary custom, but enhanced by the realization of what the writers and readers were because of their Christian calling, and he ends it in the same way. It is said again that the readers are saints (see on 1:1). They are in Christ Jesus, and because of that they are truly brothers and sisters. So greetings were sent, and included among those who sent them were those who belong to Caesar's household. Who precisely these people were depends to some extent on the place where the letter was written (see the Introduction on the time and place of writing). However, whether that was Rome or not, the probability is that they were not actually members of Caesar's family, but 'persons employed in the domestic and administrative establishment of the Emperor' (Beare, Philippians). Even so, it is significant that there were by this time loyal Christians in the imperial service.

23 The letter closes as it began with the prayer, which embraces every other petition, for the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, present, indwelling, always quickening the human spirit.

Francis Foulkes

COLOSSIANS

Introduction

The church at Colosse

Colosse was a small, relatively unimportant city in Roman times (a 'small town' according to the contemporary writer, Strabo) although it had a thriving wool industry in the fifth and fourth centuries BC. It was situated in the Lycus valley about 100 miles (160 km) east of Ephesus and, together with Laodicea and Hierapolis, belonged to the Roman province of Asia.

The Christian community at Colosse came into existence during a period of vigorous evangelism, linked with Paul's ministry at Ephesus (AD 52–55), recorded in Acts 19. Paul was helped by several co-workers who planted a number of churches in the province of Asia. Among these were the congregations of Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis, which were the fruit of Epaphras's evangelistic efforts (1:7; 4:12–13). Epaphras, a native of Colosse (4:12), who may have become a Christian during a visit to Ephesus, was 'a faithful minister of Christ' and as Paul's representative (1:7) he had taught the Colossians the truth of the gospel.

Paul often refers to the non-Christian past of the readers which suggests that most of them were Gentile converts. They had once been utterly out of harmony with God, enmeshed in idolatry and slavery to sin, being hostile to God in mind and godless in their actions (1:21; cf. vs 12, 27). They had been dead because of their sins and 'the uncircumcision of ... [their] flesh'—a statement which indicates they were both heathen and godless (2:13).

God, however, had effected a mighty change in their lives: he had reconciled them to himself in an earth-shattering event, namely, Christ's physical death on the cross (1:22). He had delivered them from a tyranny of darkness and transferred them into a kingdom ruled by his beloved Son (1:13). They now possessed redemption and the forgiveness of sins (1:14; 2:13; 3:13).

The Colossians had a hope so secure that it was stored up for them in heaven (1:5; cf. v 23) where Christ was seated and where their thoughts and hopes were to be focused (3:1–4; cf. 1:27). As Gentiles who had previously been without God and without hope they had been united to Christ in his death, burial and resurrection (2:11–12, 20; 3:1, 3). He was the same person praised as the exalted Lord of creation and reconciliation in the magnificent hymn of 1:15–20, and God's anointed one who was at the centre of the mystery (1:27). As members of his body they had his life within them and could look forward to the day when they would share in the fulness of his glory (3:4).

Because the congregation had received Christ Jesus the Lord (2:6) when they accepted the gospel at the hands of Epaphras, they were to conduct their lives as those who had been united to Christ in his death and resurrection. As they lived under his lordship they were to be full of thanksgiving, grateful to God because of his mighty actions on their behalf (2:7; 3:15–17; 4:2; cf. 1:3, 12).

The picture is therefore drawn of a Christian congregation obedient to the apostolic gospel and for which the apostle could give heartfelt thanks to God (1:4–6). He knew of their 'love in the Spirit' (1:8) and was delighted to learn of their orderly Christian lives and the stability of their faith in Christ (2:5).

Authorship

The letter makes clear that the apostle Paul is the writer, not only in the opening greeting (1:1), but also in the body of the letter (1:23) and at its conclusion (4:18). The character of Paul, as we know it from other letters, shines throughout this one. There was no dispute over the authenticity of Colossians in the early period. The letter is included in the earliest known canonical list of the NT books (early second century AD) compiled by Marcion, as well as in the Muratorian canon (late second or early third century). However, the Pauline authorship has been challenged on a number of occasions in the last 150 years. The arguments concern the language and style of the letter, and the supposed differences between Colossians and the theology of the main Pauline letters.

As to the language and style, many expressions are special to Paul while the differences can be explained by the particular situation which prompted the letter. Unusual terms, for example, appear as catchwords of the Colossian 'philosophy' or as part of the author's answers to their special problem.

The supposed theological differences between Colossians and the generally accepted Pauline letters are in the areas of Christology (the person and work of Christ), ecclesiology (the nature of the church), eschatology (teaching about the end times) and tradition. There are differences of emphasis: for example, the stress is upon realized rather than future eschatology (on the blessings already experienced through the Spirit rather than the end times—though the latter is present, e.g. at 3:4). These differences are best interpreted as being called forth by the circumstances at Colosse (see the comments on 2:11–12; 3:1–3). The so-called 'theological developments' are in line with the apostle's earlier teaching and are no reason for rejecting the apostolic authorship of the letter. The close connection between Colossians and Philemon, especially the number of people associated with Paul being mentioned in both letters (4:7–17; cf. Phm. 2:23–24) and the particular mention of Onesimus as ‘one of you’ (4:9), suggests both letters were written at the same time. There is no reason to doubt that the author of the letter was Paul.

Occasion

Epaphras had paid Paul a visit in Rome (see below) and informed him of the state of the churches in the Lycus valley. While much of the report was encouraging (1:8; 2:5), one disquieting feature was an attractive, but false, teaching that had recently been introduced into the congregation and which, if it went unchecked, would overturn the gospel and bring the Colossians into spiritual bondage. Paul’s letter was written as a response to this urgent need.

The threat to faith and the ‘Colossian heresy’

Nowhere in the letter does the apostle define the ‘heresy’; its chief features can be detected only by piecing together and interpreting his positive counter-arguments. Recently several scholars have questioned whether these counter-arguments point to the existence of a ‘Colossian heresy’ at all. They prefer to speak in terms of ‘tendencies’ rather than a clear-cut system with definite points, and suggest that the young converts were under external pressure to conform to the beliefs and practices of their Jewish and pagan neighbours. But in the light of 2:8–23, with its references to ‘fulness’, specific instructions about self-discipline (‘Do not handle!’ etc. v 21), regulations about food and holy days, unusual phrases which seem to be catchwords of Paul’s opponents and the strong emphasis on what Christ has already achieved by his death and resurrection, it seems appropriate to speak of a ‘heresy’ which had just begun to make some inroads into the congregation.

The teaching was set forth as ‘philosophy’ (2:8), based on ‘tradition’ (an expression that denotes its antiquity, dignity and revelation) which was supposed to impart true knowledge (2:18, 23). Paul seems to be quoting slogans of the opponents in his attack on the teaching at: 2:9, ‘all the fulness’; 2:18, delighting in ‘false humility and the worship of angels’; 2:21, ‘Don’t handle!’ etc.; and 2:23, ‘self-imposed worship’, ‘humility’ and ‘harsh treatment of the body’. Further, observation of these taboos in the ‘philosophy’ was related to obedient submission to ‘the basic principles of the world’ (RSV ‘elemental spirits’) (2:20). How are these unusual features to be understood?

Scholars do not agree completely about the nature of the teaching. Basically, the heresy seems to have been Jewish, because of the references to food regulations, the Sabbath and other rules of the Jewish calendar. Circumcision is mentioned (2:11) but did not appear as one of the legal requirements. But what kind of Judaism? It does not seem to have been the more straightforward kind against which the Galatian churches had to be warned, but was one in which self-discipline and mysticism featured and where angels, principalities and powers played a prominent role in creation and the giving of the law. They were regarded as controlling the lines of communication between God and humankind, and so needed to be placated by keeping strict legal observances.

A number of important suggestions have been made as to the nature of the Colossian ‘philosophy’. These include a pagan mystery cult (M. Dibelius) and a combination of pagan elements and a gnosticized form of Judaism, i.e. one based on special ‘inside knowledge’ (G. Bornkamm). (The ‘worship of angels’ [2:18] has been regarded as a pagan element in the false teaching, but should be understood as ‘the angelic worship [of God]’; see the Commentary.) Other theories include ‘Sectarian Judaism of a gnostic kind (Lightfoot) and a set of beliefs combining a number of Jewish features (S. Lyonnet). Recent scholarship, however, considers that the false teaching, which advanced beyond Epaphras’s elementary gospel, was connected with ascetic and mystical forms of Jewish piety (as found, e.g. at Qumran). It was for a spiritual elite who were being urged to press on in wisdom and knowledge so as to attain true ‘fulness’. ‘Humility’ (2:18, 23) was a term used by the opponents to denote self-denying practices that opened the believer to visions of heavenly mysteries and mystical experiences. The ‘mature’ were thus able to gain entrance into heaven and join in the ‘angelic worship of God’ as part of their present experience (2:18).

The situation of Colosse in the Lycus valley.

In a similar way today men and women sometimes believe that if they order their lives by a series of set rules and regulations, then God will be pleased with the service they render and proper claims may then be made upon him. These rules and ordinances may turn up in different areas of life—in the social, moral, political and religious spheres. A sense of achievement or even joy is felt when the rules are kept, while feelings of failure or shame are experienced if the required standards are not met. But the whole effort is self-centred, focusing on human merit. Even believers can lapse into legalism, thinking that it would be right to repay God, if only in a small way, for the gift of salvation he has provided in his Son. Alternatively, some may think it necessary to follow rules of a religious kind in order to grow as a Christian and to become holy. But the whole enterprise cuts at the very heart of Christ’s saving work, especially his death on the cross. The error is similar to those of the false teachers at Colosse.

Paul’s handling of the Colossian philosophy

Paul issues a strong warning to the Colossians to be on their guard lest the false teachers carry them off as spoil (lit. ‘kidnap’) from the truth into the slavery of error by their ‘philosophy and empty deceit’ (2:8). Although they had set forth their teaching as ‘tradition’, Paul rejects any suggestion of divine origin. It was a human invention (‘the tradition of men’) and in reply to it he sets it over against the tradition of Christ—not merely the tradition which stems from the teaching of Christ, but that which finds its embodiment in him (2:6). Jesus Christ is the ‘image of the invisible God’ (1:15), the one who incorporates the fulness of the divine being (2:9). In a magnificent passage in praise of Christ as the Lord in creation and reconciliation (1:15–20), he claims that Christ is the one through whom all things were created, including the principalities and powers which figured so prominently in the Colossian heresy. All things have been made in him. He is the agent of all creation and its ultimate goal (v 16).

Those who have been incorporated into Christ have come to fulness of life in the one who is master over every principality and power (2:10). Christ Jesus is the sole mediator between God and mankind. It would be foolish for the Colossians to be misled by the false teachers into thinking it was necessary to obey the angelic powers who controlled the lines of communication between God and man. That way was now controlled by Christ who by his death is revealed as conqueror of the principalities and powers (2:13–15).

In his reply to the false teaching Paul expounds the doctrine of the cosmic Christ more fully than in his earlier letters. Hints had previously appeared in Romans (8:19–22) and 1 Corinthians (1:24; 2:6–10; 8:6), but a more detailed exposition is given in Col. 1:15–20 and 2:13–15. The apostle's criticisms of the advocates of the philosophy with their wrong notions and odd behaviour are penetrating, even devastating (see the Commentary on 2:16–23).

Place and date of origin

The traditional view that Paul wrote Colossians during his imprisonment in Rome is more likely than that he penned the letter in Ephesus or Caesarea. No other imprisonment in Acts seems a real alternative (there are difficulties in assuming it was during the Caesarean imprisonment, Acts 24:27). The greetings from colleagues in ch. 4 suggest they had direct access to Paul, and this is consistent with the Roman imprisonment of Acts 28:30. Also the reference to Onesimus (which brings into account the letter to Philemon) is best understood in the context of the imperial capital even though some have argued that the distance between Colosse and Rome makes a Roman origin unlikely. Any supposed progression in Paul's thinking does not help us in dating Colossians.

If the Roman suggestion is accepted then the most likely dating is fairly early in Paul's (first) Roman imprisonment, i.e. circa AD 60–61. Those supporting an Ephesian alternative place the letter around 54–57, or even earlier, 52–55.

Further reading

R. C. Lucas, The Message of Colossians, BST (IVP, 1980).

N. T. Wright, Colossians and Philemon, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1986).

R. P. Martin, Colossians and Philemon, NCB (Eerdmans, 1981).

P. T. O'Brien, Colossians, WBC (Word, 1982).

———, Understanding the Basic Themes of Colossians, Philemon, QRBT (Word, 1991).

Outline of contents

1:1–2

Paul's greeting

1:3–8

Thanksgiving for faith, love, hope and the gospel

1:9–14

A prayer for knowledge and godly conduct

1:15–20	Jesus Christ, the Lord in creation and reconciliation
1:21–23	Reconciliation accomplished and applied
1:24–2:5	Paul’s mission and pastoral concern
2:6–15	The remedy for error: Christ in all his fullness
2:16–23	Freedom from legalism
3:1–4	Seek the things above
3:5–11	Put away the sins of the past
3:12–17	Put on the graces of Christ
3:18–4:1	Behaviour in the Christian household
4:2–6	Final words of encouragement
4:7–18	Personal greetings and instructions

Commentary

1:1–2 Paul's greeting

Paul begins his letter to the Colossians in the same way as many ancient letter writers did, with three details: the sender's name, that of the readers and a greeting. (See also the article Reading the letters). There are, however, important differences between Paul's letters and others in the ancient world. (See general article 'Reading the epistles'.) First, the apostle mentions his own name and his credentials in relation to the circumstances of each letter; secondly, he addresses the readers in Christian terms and, thirdly, the opening greeting is not a pious wish but an expression of his deep concern for them in relation to God's grace and peace.

As an apostle of Christ Jesus, Paul had been directly called and sent by the risen Lord Jesus to be his authorized agent to proclaim the gospel and to establish churches. He belongs to Christ Jesus and here mentions his apostleship, not because it was under attack in Colosse (as it had been in Galatia and Corinth; Gal. 1:1, 10–12; 1 Cor. 9:1–3; 2 Cor. 11:10–13), but in order to spell out his calling and ministry at the beginning and so draw attention to the official character of his letter to the community. An apostle had the authority to teach (cf. 1 Tim. 2:7) and to deal pastorally with the congregations in his care (2 Cor. 13:10). Both Paul's calling and ministry were by the will of God, an expression which stresses that they were due to God's grace alone and that Paul had a special responsibility within the divine purpose for Gentile congregations (cf. Eph. 3:1–13). Timothy is mentioned (cf. 2 Cor. 1:1; Phil. 1:1), not as a joint author of the letter, but because he had been in Paul's company for much of his Ephesian ministry and was with Paul now as he wrote. The Colossians are described in magnificent language: the holy and faithful brothers in Christ at Colosse. Like God's people Israel, who had been chosen by him and appointed to his service (Ex. 19:6), they are 'holy ones' because they have been set apart for God and his service. As a result their lives (and ours) should be marked by godly behaviour. They are faithful brothers and sisters for as believers they have been brought together into a living fellowship in Christ (on the theme of being 'in Christ' see 2:6–15). Brothers (which means 'brothers and sisters') speaks of the close relationships that exist between Christians as members of God's family. As those who have been adopted and as an outworking of Christ's love for them, the Colossians are to show brotherly and sisterly love to one another. The greeting grace and peace to you from God our Father indicates Paul's sincere concern for the Colossians that they may understand and appreciate more fully the grace of God in which they already stand and the relationship of peace that God has established with them (cf. Rom. 5:1–2).

1:3–8 Thanksgiving for faith, love, hope and the gospel

The apostle follows his usual custom by expressing his thanks to God for his readers. In this thanksgiving paragraph he uses a variation of a feature of the more personal Greek-style letters of the day. This passage sets the tone of his letter and introduces some of its main themes as Paul shows his pastoral and apostolic concern for these Christians. Unlike many thanksgivings which express gratitude for personal benefits received and may be self-centred, Paul's thanksgivings are to God for what he has done in the lives of others. He spells out his thanksgiving to God for the Colossians' Christian growth and follows this with a prayer for their progress in knowledge and godly behaviour (1:9–14). The mention of his prayers for them would no doubt have helped to strengthen the ties of fellowship between him and these Christians of the Lycus valley whom he had not met (2:1).

3 We always thank God ... when we pray for you. We is not a formal expression referring to Paul alone or even suggesting that he stood at a distance from the Colossians; rather, it includes Timothy and perhaps others (at 1:23 when Paul's own ministry is emphasized the singular 'I' occurs). It may also indicate a regular gathering together by the apostle and his colleagues to pray for these Christians. Always indicates how often they gave thanks. It does not mean every moment of the day but is explained by when we pray for you, i.e. 'regularly', perhaps morning, noon and evening (the customary three times of prayer) and whenever else they prayed. (Similar expressions such as 'continually', 'at all times' and 'day and night' mean the same.) 4 The ground for Paul's thanksgiving was the readers' faith and love, both of which Paul had heard about from Epaphras (8). Faith is mentioned first, for without it there would be no Christian life (cf. Rom. 10:9). Faith lives and acts in Christ Jesus, for Christians are in union with him, and it proves it is real by 'working through love' (Gal. 5:6). This love was being shown by the readers to Christians generally, especially those at Colosse and the other churches of the Lycus valley. It is through love that Christians serve one another and these believers knew something of this service.

5 Both faith and love are based on hope (these three graces are linked at Rom. 5:1–5; 1 Cor. 13:13; Gal. 5:5–6; 1 Thes. 1:3; 5:8) which here means 'the content of hope', 'the thing one hopes for'. It is fully secure, kept for them in heaven where no power, human or otherwise, can touch it. Though hidden from their view, this hope is centred on Christ (1:27) and will be revealed when he returns (3:4). That is why Christians are to direct their minds towards heaven and to let their thoughts about Christ rule their lives (3:1–4). Paul was telling the Colossians nothing new for they had already heard about this hope in the gospel when they were converted. As the word of truth the gospel is completely reliable. It is God's word and is like his character: it also stands opposed to the 'gospel' of the false teachers.

6 Paul goes out of his way to stress the powerful and almost personal character of the gospel: it has made its triumphal progress, coming to the Colossians and taking up a sure place in their lives. All over the world (which does not mean everywhere or to each person under heaven, but in the large cities and towns, e.g. Damascus, Tarsus, Antioch, Cornith and Ephesus, which served as centres of outreach), the gospel has been bearing fruit and growing. This phrase is used in the OT of human growth (Gn. 1:22, 28; 8:17; 9:1, 7) and of Israel's population increase (Je. 3:16; 23:3); in the NT it is used to describe the seed (i.e. the word) in the parable of the sower (Mk. 4). Like that seed the gospel 'bears fruit', producing a crop of good deeds (i.e. godly actions) in the lives of believers (cf. Phil. 1:11), and it 'grows' as the number of converts increases. The Colossians heard this message of God's grace in Christ and came to know its reality when they were converted.

7–8 Epaphras was the evangelist who had brought the gospel to the Colossians. He had carefully instructed them in it and they had committed themselves as disciples to its teaching (2:6–7). Paul writes warmly of Epaphras who had been chosen by God and set apart for his service. As Paul's dear fellow-servant he was the apostle's reliable associate who guaranteed to the church at Colosse that they had received the true apostolic gospel. He had acted as Paul's representative when preaching at Colosse (on our behalf, v 8). Minister ('servant'), a favourite term of Paul's, originally meant one who rendered service of a lowly kind. It is used of Christ himself (Rom. 15:8), Paul (2 Cor. 11:23; Eph. 3:7) and the apostle's associates in his missionary activity (1 Cor. 3:5; 1 Tim. 4:6), including Epaphras who is a faithful minister of Christ. He had recently visited Paul in Rome and told him how the churches in the Lycus valley were getting on. The community's life was filled with a love generated by the Holy Spirit, enabling it to come to the help of all the saints (Christian believers).

1:9–14 A prayer for knowledge and godly conduct

As Paul spells out the content of his prayer for the Colossians, he introduces many of the major issues of the letter. These verses tell the readers what he thinks is important and, by implication, they urge the Colossians to respond in a positive way. Put simply, Paul's prayer is that they might know God's will and have the power to do it. The close links between the thanksgiving of vs 3–8 and the intercessory paragraph of vs 9–14 show that Paul was a true pastor: he was grateful to God for the Colossians' progress, but he also wanted them to grow in their understanding and godly behaviour and to deal with the false teaching that was making inroads into the church. He may also have wanted his readers to use this prayer as a model for their own praying to God. It is certainly one of the finest in his letters (cf. Eph. 1:17–19; 3:14–19) and has served as a pattern for later generations of Christians.

9 From the day he learned of their progress as Christians the apostle not only offered constant thanksgiving to God the Father; he prayed for them as well. Knowing that the one whom he asked gave richly and abundantly (Phil. 4:19; cf. Rom. 15:13; Jas. 1:5), Paul and his colleagues consistently prayed that the Colossians might receive 'fulness' (a term apparently used by the false teachers) of blessing from God's gracious hand: asking God to fill you with the knowledge of his will. The apostle will be satisfied with nothing less than their full Christian maturity. The knowledge for which he prayed is distinguished from other knowledge, for it consists in wisdom and understanding of every sort, on the spiritual level. God's will, which is usually broader than his personal will for the individual Christian's life, sometimes describes his electing and saving plan (Eph. 1:5, 9). Here it has to do with the readers' full obedience which would be visible in their actions (cf. Rom. 12:1–2).

10 Although there is a heavy emphasis on knowledge and wisdom (which includes an intellectual element to enable the Colossians to oppose error), this knowledge for which Paul prayed was to lead to right behaviour: in order that you may live a life worthy of the Lord. Live literally means 'walk' and Paul often uses the term to describe the Christian life (Rom. 6:4; 8:4; Gal. 5:16; Eph. 4:1; Phil. 3:17). The Colossians are to live in a manner that is worthy of the one whom they confess as Lord. Adding to the point the apostle prays that they will please him in every way, an expression that describes not a frightened attitude in the presence of a superior, but behaviour that honours the Lord because it arises out of glad obedience to him. Elsewhere Paul mentions the need for Christians to please God (or, others as a result of their obedience to him) rather than pleasing themselves (Rom. 8:8; 15:1–3; 1 Cor. 7:32). Here it is to occur in every sphere; in all things. Paul then spells out more precisely what is involved in living a life worthy of the Lord (lit. 'walking worthily of the Lord'). Believers are to bear fruit in every good work. The gospel has borne fruit by producing godly actions in the Colossians' lives (6) and Paul now prays that they may be fruitful in everything that they do. Believers are also to grow in the knowledge of God. As they respond to that personal relationship with God which they already have, so the relationship will grow and their understanding of him will deepen. 11 Being strengthened with all power indicates how they are to live in a way that is worthy of the Lord. The standards set before the Colossians are high, far higher than those of the false teachers, and it might seem that they could not be achieved. But this is not the case. Paul heaps up terms for power and strength to stress that: nothing short of God's almighty power at work within them will enable them to live in a way that is pleasing to him; his glorious might is more than adequate for the Colossians' needs; and this strength will be given to them day by day as they confront varying situations (the present tense being strengthened suggests the ongoing strengthening by God). The outworking of his divine power is not in spectacular miracles but is for great endurance and patience, particularly in the face of opposition. By enduring patiently as they suffer, Christians show that they have their hope set on God.

12–14 Finally, Paul prays that the Colossians will joyfully give thanks to the Father for this also pleases him in every way. 'Thanksgiving' in Paul's letters refers to a thankful attitude of mind which is expressed outwardly and often publicly. By us mentioning what God has graciously done in his Son, other Christians are encouraged to praise him also; and as thanksgivings increase so God is glorified (2 Cor. 1:11; 4:15). Joyful thanksgiving is an activity Christians should regularly engage in. There are good grounds for doing so. In fact, the regular offering of thanks to the Father is a mark of a true Christian.

12 The Almighty One has acted on their behalf and already fitted them for an eternal inheritance. This language is full of OT echoes and recalls the promise first given to Abram (Gn. 13:14–17) which was later renewed to Israel (Nu. 26:52–56). The inheritance to which Paul refers belongs to a higher plane and a more lasting order than the land of Canaan, for it is in the kingdom of light, i.e. in the realm of the light of the age to come, in heaven itself. It belongs to a spiritual dimension, unable to be ravaged by war, famine or the like. This inheritance is the 'hope laid up in heaven' (1:5; cf. 3:1–4) and is none other than the Lord Jesus himself. 13–14 explain the meaning of v 12, emphasizing the remarkable change God had brought about at the time of the Colossians' conversion. Like others, they had been under the control of the evil one and belonged to his terrible rule, the dominion of darkness. Their circumstances are described in 1:21: they were separated from God, hostile to him and doing evil deeds. But God rescued us (us includes Paul and other believers too) from that tyranny of darkness. He freed those in slavery (as at the exodus) and transferred them into the kingdom where his beloved Son rules. This change of dominion is vividly described in terms of 'light' and 'darkness'; the Colossians are now 'children of light' (cf. 1 Thes. 5:5) and are to live accordingly. The kingdom of the Son he loves is a reference to the kingdom of God or God's rule in the present time before the second coming of the Lord Jesus. 14 In this kingdom where Jesus Christ is Lord there is redemption, that is, freedom for those in spiritual bondage (the price paid is the death of Jesus; Eph. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:18). This redemption, which is a present possession of the Colossians, is closely linked with the forgiveness of sins. 'Redemption releases from the power of sin and forgiveness from its guilt' (D. Guthrie).

1:15–20 Jesus Christ, the Lord in creation and reconciliation

At the end of v 14, with its reference to the forgiveness of sins, the language changes from that of prayer and thanksgiving into a magnificent passage (sometimes called a 'hymn') in praise of Christ as the Lord in creation and reconciliation. This paragraph is central: themes from it are taken up and applied throughout the rest of the letter (cf. 1:19 with 2:9, and 1:20 with 2:15). Although the passage praises Christ, surprisingly the names ‘Jesus’, ‘Christ’ and ‘Lord’ do not appear within it; it simply begins, ‘He is ...’. However, it is clear that the Lord Jesus Christ is the one to whom these words of praise refer. They can apply to no-one else. There has been considerable debate whether Paul here introduced an existing ‘hymn’ into his letter. This is possible but if he did so he has certainly woven the rest of the letter around it, and the focus on the supremacy of Christ is intended to strengthen the readers and correct the wrong views of the false teachers. Whoever wrote it, the passage perfectly suited the apostle’s purposes in writing to the Colossians.

1:15–17 Lord in creation. 15 The image of the invisible God indicates that the very nature and character of God have been perfectly revealed in Jesus Christ; in him the invisible has become visible. No-one has ever seen God, but God the only Son has made him known (Jn. 1:18). Humanity as the climax of creation was made in God’s image (Gn. 1:26–27). From all eternity Jesus, in his very nature, has been the image of God. The English word image may suggest a copy that is less than perfect; the Greek original, which is a term of revelation, does not imply this. Jesus, who is perfectly like the Father, reveals who he is in all his goodness (cf. Pr. 8:22). If a person wants to know what God is like then he or she should turn to the Scriptures and find out all about Jesus, for he shows us perfectly what the Father is like.

The firstborn over all creation. In the OT ‘firstborn’ occurs 130 times to describe one who is supreme or first in time. It also refers to one who had a special place in the father’s love: so ‘Israel is my firstborn son’ (Ex. 4:22). Although ‘firstborn’ can speak of one who is the first in a series (cf. v 18; Rom. 8:29), this cannot be its significance here; the context makes it plain that Jesus is not the first of all created beings for (‘because’) he is the one by whom the whole creation came into being (16). Unfortunately the English word ‘firstborn’ does not draw attention to this notion of supremacy or priority of rank. As the firstborn Christ is unique, being distinguished from all creation (cf. Heb. 1:6). He is both prior to and supreme over that creation since he is its Lord.

16 Christ’s unique position over creation is then explained: For by him all things were created. He clearly cannot be part of the creation itself since all things have been made by him. The passive were created indicates that God is Creator, while by him suggests that Christ is the instrument. (If it is read as ‘in him’ then he is the sphere in which creation takes place and it depends wholly on him.) Paul’s language comes from Gn. 1 and the OT Wisdom Literature where wisdom is called the ‘craftsman’ (Pr. 8:30). For Paul that ‘craftsman’ is not a figure of speech, but the personal, heavenly Christ who met him on the Damascus road. All things is expanded in a parallel sentence to things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible. Then, with special reference to the false teaching at Colosse, Paul stresses that even the spiritual powers and authorities, whether good or bad, are all subject to Christ as Creator. Four classes are listed, thrones, powers, rulers and authorities: from the highest to the lowest all were created in him, through him and for him. The teaching that Christ is the ultimate goal of all creation (all things were created for ... him) has no parallel in the Jewish Wisdom Literature or indeed any other Jewish source. And it needs to be remembered that the one who was crucified as a common criminal, that is Jesus Christ, is the very person to whom the whole of creation, and therefore history as well, moves.

17 Because Jesus exists before all things, one could not rightly say, as the second-century heretic Arius did: ‘There was once when he was not’. As the pre-existent one (Jn. 8:58) Jesus is Lord of the universe. The emphatic he corresponds to the solemn ‘I’ of the OT which refers to Yahweh, the LORD himself. In him all things hold together. The whole of creation is established permanently in him alone. He is the sustainer of the universe and the unifying principle of its life. Apart from his continuous sustaining activity (indicated by the tense of the Greek verb) all would fall apart (cf. Heb. 1:2–3). Although there are similarities with the language of Stoicism here, Paul’s statement is different from the all-embracing world-soul of the Stoics. All men and women, whether they recognize it or not, are totally indebted to the Lord Jesus as Creator and Sustainer. For not only has he made every person who enters the world; he also sustains their lives daily, giving life and breath to each one. Those who are ‘in Christ’, and therefore know him in a personal way, should express their gratitude to him as Creator and Sustainer by living godly lives. Those who have not honoured him or given him thanks (Rom. 1:21) are urged to repent and turn to him in faith.

1:18–20 Lord in reconciliation. The attention now shifts from the realm of creation to Christ’s relationship with the church and his lordship in reconciliation. Elsewhere in his letters Paul uses the picture of the church as a body to refer to the two-way relations and duties of church members (Rom. 12:4–5; 1 Cor. 12:12–27) where the ‘head’ of the body has no special mention or honour; it is counted as an ordinary member (1 Cor. 12:21). In Colossians and Ephesians, however, the relationship which the church, as the body of Christ, bears to him as the ‘head’ is emphasized. 18 With the words he is the head of the body, the church, the centrality of Christ in relation to his people is stressed. His headship points to a close personal and living relationship with them in which he rules over his people in the way that the head of a body exercises influence over its various parts. Head-ship also refers to their total dependence on him for life and power. Church is not some universal congregation, scattered throughout the world, to which all believers belong, but a heavenly assembly, gathered around Christ. Even as they go about their ordinary daily tasks, all Christians are members of this gathering in heaven, because of their fellowship with him. Christ is the beginning in the sense that he is the firstborn from among the dead, i.e. the founder of a new humanity. The resurrection age has burst forth and as the first who has risen from among the dead (here firstborn means first in a series) he is the ‘firstfruits’ who guarantees the future resurrection of others (1 Cor. 15:20, 23). The ‘hymn’ had previously spoken of Christ’s primacy in creation; it now mentions his primacy in resurrection. In both new creation and old the supremacy now belongs to him alone.

19 The reason for this primacy is spelled out: Jesus Christ is ‘the place’ in whom God in all his fullness was pleased to take up residence. All God’s qualities and activities—his Spirit, word, wisdom and glory—are perfectly displayed in Christ. Further, this indwelling in Christ ‘in bodily form’ (cf. 2:9) is not temporary but permanent. Since Christ is the one mediator between God and the world of humanity and has brought the Colossian Christians into a relationship with his Father, they need not fear those supernatural powers under whose control human beings were supposed to live. Neither need we be afraid of the same or similar powers in the present day.

20 The climax of the paragraph comes with the references to reconciliation and peacemaking through Christ’s death. The opening words of the paragraph had stated that all things had been created in, through and for Christ. He is their Lord in creation. What is not spelled out, however, is what has happened to all things since creation: the unity and harmony of the cosmos have suffered a serious breach, needing reconciliation (cf. Gn. 3). It was God’s good pleasure to reconcile all things through Christ (2 Cor. 5:19). Heaven and earth have been brought back to the order for which God made them. The universe is under its Lord, and cosmic peace has been restored. Reconciliation and making peace (which includes the idea of pacification, i.e. overthrowing evil) are used synonymously to describe the mighty work which Christ achieved in history through his death on the cross as a sacrifice (Rom. 3:25; 1 Cor. 11:25; Eph. 1:7). The peace which Christ has brought may be ‘freely accepted, or ... compulsorily imposed’ (F. F. Bruce). The principalities and powers over whom God has triumphed (2:15) did not gladly surrender to God’s grace. They were ‘pacified’. They continue to exist, opposed to men and women (cf. Rom. 8:38–39), but they cannot finally harm the person who is in Christ and their overthrow in the future is assured (1 Cor. 15:24–28; see on 2:15). Further, it cannot be assumed from this verse that all sinful men and women have freely accepted the peace achieved through Christ’s death. Although all things will finally unite to bow in the name of Jesus and to acknowledge him as Lord (Phil. 2:10–11), it is not to be supposed that this will be done gladly by all, and to suggest that v 20 points to a universal reconciliation in which every person will finally enjoy the blessings of salvation is unwarranted.

1:21–23 Reconciliation accomplished and applied

Speaking directly to the readers (you) Paul points out that Christ’s peace-making work, which involves the reconciliation of the universe, has particular reference to them. 21 Once you ... But now (22). A sharp contrast is drawn between their pre-Christian past and their present standing in Christ. The serious nature of their previous situation only serves to emphasize the wonder of God’s gracious, mighty action of reconciling them, i.e. of making them his friends. Prior to their conversion they were alienated, completely out of harmony with God, trapped in idolatry and slavery to sin. They had been opposed to God in their thinking, and this naturally found visible expression in their evil behaviour (lit. ‘doing evil deeds’).

22 But now sounds like a trumpet blast. God has acted mightily on their behalf: he has brought them into a new relationship with himself and made changes in their attitudes. All this was achieved by Christ’s physical body through death, a deliberate expression which shows plainly that Jesus truly became man (against a false teaching that he only seemed or appeared to be a man) and that he really died. It was at great cost that the death of the Son of God took place on the cross. God’s reconciliation of the Colossians had as its aim their preparation for the final day when they would stand before him: to present you holy in his sight, without blemish and free from accusation. As men and women who are forgiven and reconciled they are declared blameless (cf. Rom. 8:33–34), without fault or stain (cf. Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15) on that final day.

23 Their continuing in the faith shows how real that faith is; so the passage concludes with a condition. If it is true that the saints will persevere to the end, then it is equally true that the saints must persevere to the end. Like a building set on a sure foundation and erected with strong supports, the readers are to remain true to the gospel, and not to shift from the fixed ground of their Christian hope. The claim of Paul’s gospel (which focused on this hope) to be the true message of God is shown by its universal appeal. It has already been preached in representative towns and cities of the empire—Paul does not mean that every single individual has heard.

1:24–2:5 Paul’s mission and pastoral concern

Having mentioned that he is a servant of the gospel (23), Paul describes his God-given ministry to Gentiles, including the Colossians, by means of several pictures (24–29). Although he has not met most of the readers (2:1), he identifies with them by sharing in Christ’s afflictions on behalf of the church (24) and so he can write to them in the way that he does.

24 As an apostle, Paul rejoices in his sufferings on behalf of the Colossians, indeed, on behalf of Christ's body, the church as a whole. These sufferings are part and parcel of Christ's afflictions—not his death on the cross or redemptive sufferings which are 'finished'—but the afflictions of his people which he endures. The expression Christ's afflictions is to be understood against an OT and Jewish background with its notion of the afflictions of the end time. These were called the 'birth-pangs of the Messiah', those pains and woes which would occur before the arrival of God's anointed ruler, the Messiah. In the NT they occur between the first and second comings of Jesus. The exalted Christ is in heaven and before his return he suffers in his members, not least in the life of Paul himself (Acts 9:4). These afflictions have been limited by God; the quota will be complete when the end comes. All Christians take part in these sufferings; it is through them that we enter the kingdom of God (Acts 14:22; 1 Thes. 3:3, 7). Suffering with Christ is essential if we are to be glorified with him (Rom. 8:17). Through the sufferings he endures in his own flesh, Paul contributes to the sum total, to what is still lacking. The more he suffers the less the Colossians have to.

25–27 Paul's ministry is a commission given to him in accordance with the gospel-plan of God. He is a steward (1 Cor. 4:1) who has been entrusted with this commission (1 Cor. 9:17). He is not able to withdraw from this solemn responsibility, but must fulfil it obediently. As a steward of God's mysteries he is expected to be found trustworthy (1 Cor. 4:2). His special task was to make the word of God known. In all its fulness suggests 'bringing it to completion' for Paul's preaching, particularly as directed to Gentiles, was contributing to the ultimate fulfilment of God's saving purposes revealed in his word (cf. Is. 55:11). The message itself was none other than God's mystery, his 'open secret', previously hidden, but now, in the light of his decisive action in Christ, it has been revealed (Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:3). Glorious riches indicates the mystery is magnificent in every way: it partakes of God's own character (hence 'glory') and in it God has showered his blessings upon men and women, especially Gentiles. The content of the mystery is Christ in you Colossians. Christ had been preached by Epaphras to them as Gentiles. They received him as Lord and he now lives in them. As members of his body they have his life within them and with it a sure and certain hope (3:4).

28 In their missionary preaching Paul and his colleagues worked energetically to proclaim—an important word used of the gospel or some element in it (1 Cor. 9:14; Phil. 1:17–18)—Christ as Lord. Their evangelistic outreach was not carried out by some superficial preaching of the saving message of Christ to the world; instead, by regularly admonishing and teaching each person (these verbs along with proclaim are in the present tense) the apostolic band set out to make disciples of men and women, building them up in pastoral situations. Three times Paul writes everyone ('each one'), emphasizing that Christian teaching is for all (not some spiritual elite) and that apostolic work had to do with the individual care of souls (cf. 1 Thes. 2:11–12). Their responsibilities were not finished with the conversion of men and women, so they made it their aim to present everyone perfect in Christ on the final day when the quality of their ministry would be tested. Their concerns were for well-established and settled congregations whose members were strong in faith. Paul's evangelistic and pastoral goals provide models for those engaged in a truly apostolic ministry today. 29 To this end Paul expends all his energies in his ministry for the gospel. Labour denotes intense effort, while struggling, possibly a stronger word, was sometimes used of fights and athletic contests. Paul gladly acknowledges that the strength for this effort comes from above. God, who had shown his mighty power by raising Christ from the dead, is powerfully at work in him as he toils energetically.

2:1 I want you to know. Having spoken in general terms of his apostolic service (1:24–29), Paul addresses the Colossians directly. He aims to strengthen bonds with them and informs them that his struggle for the gospel had special reference to them and the other Christians in the area too, even though he had not met most of them previously. (The churches at Colosse, Laodicea and Hierapolis had been founded by his colleague, Epaphras; 1:7; cf. 4:12.)

2–3 The purpose of his apostolic activity was that their lives might be strengthened. United in love suggests that as love binds them all together so they would attain to full understanding and knowledge. But the verb could mean ‘instructed’ as in the LXX. Since the context emphasizes knowledge and wisdom, and Paul was less concerned about the need for the Colossians’ unity than their instruction in the faith over against false teaching, ‘taught’ or ‘instructed’ is better. Love, in all its breadth, then refers to the foundation of the Christian life. The full riches of complete understanding: the same word for ‘riches’ is used in 1:27 for spiritual wealth, but here the wealth consists of an informed conviction which results from insight, i.e. the ability to distinguish the true from the false. Thus they will come to a deeper personal knowledge of Christ. Probably with a side-glance at the false teaching Paul encourages the readers to look to Christ as the only ‘place’ where these treasures of wisdom are available. Hidden does not mean ‘concealed’ but ‘deposited’ or ‘stored up’ (cf. 1:26). To search for other sources of knowledge apart from Christ is useless.

4 Now for the first time the danger facing the church is expressly mentioned. No-one is used generally meaning ‘anyone’, rather than indicating a particular person who was the source of the false teaching, while the danger might come through arguments that seem to be true but are really false. 5 Paul is physically absent from the community; if he were present he would deal with this threatening situation in person. However, the Spirit of God has united both him and the Colossians to Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 5:3–5). Because both live with Christ, Paul is present ... in spirit with them. He encourages them with the good reports he has heard: the well-ordered Christian behaviour of the community, together with the firmness of their dynamic faith which was directed to Christ alone, were grounds for the apostle’s delight. These words of praise indicate that the congregation was basically sound and that the false teaching had not made significant progress.

2:6–15 The remedy for error: Christ in all his fullness

6–7 These verses occupy a central place in the letter, serving as a kind of hinge. They summarize what has already been written and provide the basis for the attack on the false teaching (8–23). Christ Jesus whom the Colossians had received as Lord when they were converted is Lord of creation and redemption (1:15–20), and at the centre of God’s mystery (1:27). Received is a technical term meaning to ‘receive a tradition’ and here indicates that they welcomed both the person and the authoritative teaching about him. The Christian life demands that they continue as they have begun, so the readers are urged to continue to live (lit. ‘walk’; cf. 1:10; Gal. 5:16) in him. Doctrine and behaviour, theology and ethics, go together. 7 To encourage them in their Christian growth they are reminded that God has firmly rooted them in Christ, and that he is continuing to build them up in him (cf. 1 Cor. 3:6–11) and strengthening them in the faith they were taught (note the passive verbs). God is even now mightily at work and so, as they live under Christ’s lordship, they are to be overflowing with thankfulness. Christ Jesus is more than sufficient to meet the dangers from the false doctrine. Let them see that their way of life and thought conform continually to his teaching.

8–15 Paul issues the first of several warnings (8) and then sets out a positive explanation of God's work in Christ and the Colossians' union with him in his death, burial and resurrection (9–15). 8 The Colossians are to be on their guard so that they are not carried away from the truth into the slavery of error. Takes you captive means 'kidnap', and the method these false teachers would use is their brand of philosophy (see the Introduction) which was seductive and misleading. As tradition it had the appearance of dignity, authority and revelation, but Paul rejects any suggestion of divine origin: it is simply human. The Greek word stoicheia (basic principles) may refer to the 'principalities and powers', those demonic, personal forces which oppress men and women. Worst of all, this teaching stood opposed to Christ. Today legalism, justification by works or any teaching that devalues Christ's saving work on the cross, can be used by the powers of darkness to hold men and women in spiritual slavery.

9–10 Two reasons are given as to why this philosophy is opposed to Christ. First, he is the one in whom the whole fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily, and the false teaching did not recognize this. Fulness was probably a slogan of the false teachers to describe the eternal God who could only be reached by mediators. In later gnostic thought (based on 'inside knowledge') Christ was seen as the last in the line of mediators. But Paul states that all the fulness of the divine being or Godhead dwells directly in Christ and that this indwelling is permanent. The expression in bodily form (which could mean 'actually' or 'in concrete reality', as opposed to mere appearance) is best understood as 'taking on a bodily form' and referring to the incarnation. Fulness is to be found only in Christ, not by cringing before the 'elements of the universe' or by observing their regulations. 10 Secondly, this false teaching is opposed to Christ because the readers have already been filled in him, i.e. in their union with Christ they have received fulness of salvation. So they do not need to stoop down before the spiritual powers of the universe or to observe their rules to attain this fulness, as the false teaching demanded. The one in whom these believers are complete is the Head, i.e. the ruler over every power and authority (cf. 1:18).

11 The theme of union in Christ continues as Paul describes how the readers are linked with the gospel events, i.e. Christ's death, burial and resurrection (11–13). The reasons for the introduction of circumcision here are not clear: it does not seem to have been demanded by the false teachers (as in the Galatian churches), for if it was we would have expected it to be criticized in vs 16–23. Perhaps the Colossians were confused about the issue. The circumcision done by Christ is a figurative way of referring to his crucifixion, while 'the putting off of the body of flesh' is best understood as describing his violent death (though some take it as a reference to putting off the Christian's old nature). The Colossians were also circumcised in him, that is, they died with Christ in his death. In contrast to Jewish circumcision, theirs was not ... done by the hands of men; it was a divine work in which God himself made the change from the old life to the new.

12 As the burial of Christ (1 Cor. 15:4) set the seal upon his death, so the Colossians' burial with him in baptism shows that they were truly involved in his death and laid in his grave. A real death has taken place; so the old life should be a thing of the past (Rom. 6:4). Christ's resurrection has already occurred; the Colossians too have been raised with him as a past event. The believer's share in the risen life of Christ finds clear expression in Colossians and Ephesians (cf. 3:1; Eph. 2:6), while the power of God is that same power which brought Christ back from the dead and which now energizes all the members of Christ's body.

13–14 The standpoint now changes: no longer are the Colossians viewed as having been joined with Christ in his death, burial and resurrection. Rather, Paul contrasts their pagan past with the present. Dead points to the state of separation from God as a present condition of those outside of Christ. This dreadful condition had been caused by their sins and the uncircumcision of their sinful nature. Sins are acts of rebellion against God, while sinful nature speaks of a permanent state of disobedience; the Colossians had been both heathen and godless. But now because of the death of Christ God has made them alive in him. He has graciously forgiven all ‘our’ trespasses (those of Jews and Gentiles alike) and therefore the cause of spiritual death has been done away. God has not only removed the debt; he has also destroyed the document on which the debt was recorded. (Cheirographon, the written code, means an ‘IOU’, a note that refers to a debt written in one’s own hand as proof of obligation.) The Jews had agreed to obey the law, and in their case the penalty for breaking the contract meant death (Dt. 27:14–26; 30:15–20). Paul also assumes that Gentiles were committed, through their consciences, to a similar obligation, to the moral law insofar as they understood it (cf. Rom. 2:14–15). The obligation had not been paid by either group so it stood opposed to us, because of its accompanying regulations. The debt was impossible to pay, but God dealt with it; he had blotted it out and cancelled the bond by nailing it to the cross. This is a vivid way of saying that because Christ was nailed to the cross, our debt has been completely forgiven.

15 The word of the cross was a message of hope for those who lived in fear of evil, supernatural powers. These principalities, who had possessed that written code, had kept us in their grip. Using the picture of a conqueror’s triumphal procession in which captives of war were displayed to magnify the victor’s glory, Paul states that God defeated and disarmed the evil powers of their authority. In making a public spectacle of them he (‘God’ rather than ‘Christ’) exposed to the universe their utter helplessness, leading them ‘in him’ (i.e. ‘Christ’, rather than ‘in it’, the cross; see the NIV mg.) in his triumphal procession so that all the world might see the greatness of his victory.

2:16–23 Freedom from legalism

In a paragraph that alludes to the teaching and catchwords of the philosophy, Paul sets out ‘a charter of Christian freedom’. Bad theology leads to bad practice! The mistaken ideas about ‘fulness’ and the work of Christ (which the apostle corrects in vs 8–15) have corresponding errors on the practical side. Paul’s criticisms of these wrong practices and the false teachers themselves are devastating.

16–17 In the false teaching it was believed that the Colossians would progress as Christians to ‘fulness’ by keeping certain Jewish food taboos and rigidly observing their special days. These severe regulations of a self-denying kind are, however, a shadow of the things that were to come. Christ and his new order are the perfect reality to which these earlier commandments looked. The reality has already come and the things of the shadow have no binding force; they are no longer a norm for judgment. Any demand today to abstain from certain foods or to keep religious festivals as a requirement for growing as a Christian brings down upon it the same severe criticism. 18 Against the false teachers who boasted in their special spiritual experiences, Paul’s criticisms are sharp. The rejection of the false teachers’ claims by the apostle are difficult to understand because of our partial knowledge of the practices. Do not let anyone ... disqualify [‘condemn’] you (cf. v 16): Paul quotes slogans of the false teaching which were the basis of the teachers’ position and proud manner. Humility here means ‘self-denial’ and describes fasting and other bodily disciplines which were self-denying practices in Jewish, mystical piety that were supposed to open the way for receiving visions of heavenly mysteries. The worship of angels refers not to worship directed to angels but ‘the worship [of God] which angels perform’. Goes into great detail about what he has seen (lit. ‘things which he beholds upon entering’) is the third slogan from the ‘philosophy’. The false teachers apparently claimed to have joined in this angelic worship of God as they entered into the heavenly realm and prepared to receive visions of divine mysteries. They were therefore asserting their spiritual superiority on the grounds of these heightened experiences. His unspiritual mind puffs him up with idle notions. Paul’s criticism is sharp: this attitude and outlook are dominated by the flesh. The teachers’ boast was that they were directed by the mind; Paul’s answer is ‘Yes, but it is a mind of flesh!’ To the suggestion that they were acquainted with divine ‘fulness’, the response is that all they are full of is their own pride! 19 The most devastating criticism is that by using their own private religious experiences as the basis of their authority they were in fact rejecting Christ as their Head. He is the source of life and nourishment by which his body lives and the source of unity through which it becomes an organic whole.

20–21 If the Colossians were to fall victims to the false teaching and voluntarily place themselves under rules and regulations, such as Do not handle! Do not taste! Do not touch! which were imposed by the principalities and powers, then this would be to go back into slavery again, a bondage to the very powers of the universe from which they had been freed when they died with Christ in his death. Not all Christians are free from superstition, which can exert more influence than their faith. 22 The matters covered by the taboos were perishable objects of the material world (like food and drink) which passed away when consumed. Further, these taboos, which had a Jewish flavour to them, were merely human inventions (lit. ‘according to the regulations and doctrines of men’; cf. Is. 29:13; Mk. 7:7) that frustrated the pure teaching of God with its liberating message. 23 Such regulations, like those mentioned in v 21, carry a reputation for wisdom in the spheres of voluntary worship, humility and severe treatment of the body. But they lack the reality and this wisdom is a facade for true wisdom which is found in Christ alone (2:3; cf. 1:15–20). The aims of these regulations, while appearing to be good and involving considerable self-discipline, were without any value whatsoever. The taboos left untouched the problems of sensual indulgence.

3:1–4 Seek the things above

This short paragraph occupies an important pivotal position in the letter (cf. 2:6–7). Containing both statements and encouragement, it concludes the section where Paul attacks the ‘philosophy’ of the false teachers and provides the true alternative to the false teaching. The passage draws together themes previously mentioned (2:11–13, 20) and provides the theological basis for the words of encouragement that follow.

1–2 As the positive counterpart to 2:20, this verse affirms that the Colossians have already been raised with Christ. They now share in his resurrection life, so their lives are to be different. Their interests are to be focused on Christ; their minds, aims, ambitions, in fact their whole outlook, are to be centred on that heavenly realm where he rules and where their lives truly belong. A continuous, ongoing effort is required (lit. ‘keep on setting your minds/hearts’) for such a focus does not come automatically. The godly man or woman will regularly assess whether their ambitions and life-style are consistent with the ultimate goal to which God has called them, i.e. heaven itself where he rules. This realm above is to be sought diligently (and in contrast to any false seeking of heavenly experiences by the promoters of the Colossian ‘philosophy’) for this is where Christ is, seated as king in the place of honour. (On Christ’s ascension to the right hand of God, see Acts 2:33–35; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:20.)

3 The grounds for Paul's appeal to set their minds on things above (2) are twofold. First, they died to that old order with its spiritual powers (2:20), its self-denying and enslaving regulations, visionary experiences and useless self-centred worship; and secondly, their new life is ... hidden with Christ in God. With Christ because they have been joined with him in his death and resurrection, and in God for Christ himself has his being 'in God' and those who belong to Christ have their being there too. Centred in God means that their hidden life is secure, unable to be touched by anyone. 4 Their new life in Christ is not visible to others and, in some measure, is hidden from themselves. It will be fully evident only when Christ, who is that life, appears at his second coming. Indeed, the day of the revelation of the Son of God will be the day of the revelation of the sons and daughters of God. That disclosure will take place in glory for it will involve the sharing of Christ's likeness and the receiving of the glorious resurrection body.

3:5–11 Put away the sins of the past

In urging them to be heavenly minded (1–2) Paul does not suggest that Christians are to be living in the clouds! Rather, setting their minds on the things above will result in a concrete obedience to the following: put to death, therefore (5), rid yourselves (8), do not lie (9) and clothe yourselves (12). In fact, the whole section from 3:5 to 4:6, a piece of early Christian instruction, flows out of 3:1–4. The believer who is truly heavenly minded will be of maximum earthly use! The warfare between flesh and Spirit still continues until the last day and we are urged by the apostle to press on in our Christian lives, as we all long for the final adoption, the redemption of our bodies.

5 Put to death recalls their union with Christ in his death (2:20; 3:3; cf. 2:11–12): they have died with him, therefore they are to deal a death blow to evil habits and thoughts. Two lists, each of five sins (cf. also v 8), similar to those found among pagan moralists and in the anti-pagan arguments of the Jews, are followed by five graces in v 12. The five sins which belonged to their pagan past are associated with their earthly nature (lit. 'the members which are upon earth'). Paul practically identifies these members with the sins committed by them as he describes first the outward expressions of sin (sexual immorality) and then the inward cravings of the heart ('ruthless greed'). The danger of greed is especially emphasized as a 'gross sin' for it is equated with idolatry. Such a person, instead of focusing his or her whole life on the things above, where Christ rules as King, is seeking the things below, and therefore worships and serves the creature rather than the Creator (Rom. 1:25). Paul knew the special deadliness of this sin (Rom. 7:7–8; cf. Mt. 6:24). Perhaps it is so dangerous because it may assume so many respectable forms. After all, are not those things we do not have but earnestly desire simply 'necessities'? We deceive ourselves into making idols of our own demands.

6 Here, as often elsewhere, the list of pagan sins is set within the context of God's judgment. The wrath of God (cf. Rom. 1:18–32) describes his holy anger against sin and the judgment that results. It has nothing to do with spiteful reaction or outburst of passion. Nor is it an unchangeable process of cause and effect. Rather, it is the outworking of God's holiness against all unrighteousness. Is coming indicates that God punishes sin in the present as well as on the final day.

7–8 Using a 'once–now' contrast, the readers are shown how their present behaviour is to be different from their pagan past. Formerly their lives were characterized by the very vices on account of which God's wrath is coming. (On the term walk to describe the Christian life, see on 1:10.) 8 They are to get rid of (lit. 'put off') their old, repulsive habits, including evil speech, like a set of worn-out clothes: anger and rage destroy harmony in human relationships. Malice is a general term describing an evil force that wrecks fellowship. Slander here means the insulting of human character but elsewhere can mean blasphemy against God (Rom. 2:24; 1 Tim. 6:1). Filthy language, as the last in the series, is emphasized: it ought to be stopped before it comes out of their mouths.

9 Two reasons are given for this abandonment of evil ways. First, they have taken off their old self with its practices. Your old self speaks of the whole personality of an individual when ruled by sin (cf. Rom. 6:6; Eph. 4:22); at the same time it points to that person's belonging to the old, sinful humanity in Adam. The practices include the two lists of vices in vs 5 and 8. Since these have been taken off in Christ's death, the Colossians are to have nothing to do with false speaking and the other repulsive habits mentioned.

10 The second reason is that the new self has been put on in place of the old. The new self means the new nature which each of the Colossians had put on when they were joined to Christ in his resurrection. The phrase means literally 'the new man' and signifies also a corporate figure referring to the new humanity in Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15). The image of the Creator serves as the model or pattern for the renewal of the new person—a renewal that has in view the readers' progressive increase in true knowledge, which includes their ability to recognize God's will and command (cf. 1:9). The image of its Creator (cf. Gn. 1:27), in the light of 1:15 where Christ is praised as 'the image of God', means that God's recreation of humanity is 'in the pattern of Christ, who is God's Likeness absolutely' (C. F. D. Moule). There is a similar idea in Rom. 8:29 (cf. 1 Cor. 15:49) where the Christian's change is 'into the image of Christ'. 11 Within this new humanity there is no inferiority of one class to another. Men and women of completely different origins are gathered together in unity in Christ, sharing a common allegiance to their Lord. Christ is all that matters; he lives in all members of his body, regardless of race, class or background, giving them life and power.

3:12–17 Put on the graces of Christ

With the imperative clothe yourselves (12) the positive appeal begins. The introductory Therefore shows that this section, which stands in contrast to vs 5–11, also follows on from 3:1–4. A fivefold list of virtues (12) contrasts with the two fivefold lists of vices (5, 8) of the preceding paragraph. Having spoken of the new nature in v 10, Paul indicates what he means by this.

12 As God's chosen people who have already put on the 'new person', the Colossians must clothe themselves with the graces which show them to be different. God's chosen people, holy and dearly loved are special titles which were used of Israel as God's own possession in the OT (e.g. Is. 43:20; 65:9) and of Christ in the NT ('Chosen One', Lk. 23:35; 'Holy One', Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34; 'My Son, whom I love', Mt. 3:17). Their use here underlines the point of the Christian's similarity to Christ. It is Jesus who is the chosen one. What a remarkable privilege it is, then, that we are addressed in the same way as Christ! This is a powerful motive to behave in a Christlike way.

The five graces, with which believers are to be clothed, are elsewhere seen as characteristics of God or Christ (e.g. Ps. 25:6; Je. 33:11; Mt. 9:36; 2 Cor. 1:3) and show how they, as God's elect, should behave in their dealings with others, particularly fellow-Christians. Three of these, kindness, gentleness and patience, are listed as the fruit of the Spirit in Gal. 5:22.

13 As a result of their being clothed with patience they are to show continual forbearance toward each other. When legitimate complaints within the community arise, the readers are urged to forgive ... one another. Paul employs a special verb for forgive ('cancelled the debts' in the parable of the two debtors, Lk. 7:42) which is used elsewhere of God's gracious giving or forgiving (Rom. 8:32; 1 Cor. 2:12; Eph. 4:32). The present tense makes it clear that this forgiveness is to be unceasing, even unwearied (note Jesus' teaching, Mt. 18:22). The ground and motive for this response are of the highest order: as the Lord forgave you. Christ's mighty work of reconciliation (1:22) is the basis on which that forgiveness of sins is provided, while the full impact of Christ's sacrifice on the cross is set forth as a pattern of the lifestyle to which the believer 'conforms'.

14 If each of the graces previously mentioned is seen to be characteristic of God or Christ, then this is especially so of love (cf. 1 Cor. 13:4 for the notion that love clearly reflects the character of Christ). Over all these virtues may convey the idea of 'on top of all the other "articles of clothing"' (C. F. D. Moule). In Gal. 5:6 'love' is the motive power of faith and in 1 Cor. 13:13 it is the supreme Christian grace. Which binds them all together in perfect unity (lit. 'Which is the bond of perfection') may suggest that love is the link which unites and binds together all the previously mentioned graces of v 12. The words 'of perfection' probably, however, denote purpose: love is the bond that leads to perfection. It binds together the members of the congregation (rather than the graces of v 12) into unity in the body of Christ so producing perfection. This interpretation accords well with Paul's concerns for the readers' corporate life.

15 This verse has been a favourite with Christians for it is claimed that Christ's peace will act as a kind of umpire within our hearts, giving us some private and inward peace of the soul when we need guidance or help in making a decision. But the peace of Christ does not refer to a private and inward peace of the soul. Instead, it is the peace he embodies and brings (cf. Jn. 14:27) and is equivalent to salvation. Further, it is not a question of Christ's peace 'acting as an umpire'. Rather the verb means to rule; Christ himself, who is the Lord of peace (cf. Eph. 2:14; 2 Thes. 3:16), is to be present and ruling in their midst. He is to control every area of their lives as they relate to one another. Since the Colossians are said to have been called into this peace (through the gospel), then it must also describe the realm or sphere in which they, as members of Christ's body, now live.

16 In a letter which emphasizes the person and work of Christ, Paul refers to the word of Christ, rather than 'the word of God' (1:25) or 'the Lord's own word' (1 Thes. 4:15). Of Christ could mean that Christ himself is the speaker when his word is proclaimed, but it probably refers to the message that centres on Christ, the word of truth, i.e. the gospel (1:5). That word is to have its gracious and glorious way in their lives, individually and as a community. The rich indwelling of Christ's word (cf. Rom. 8:11; 2 Cor. 6:16; 2 Tim. 1:5 for the indwelling of God himself, the Holy Spirit and faith) would occur when they came together, listened to this word as it was expounded to them and bowed to its authority. They are to teach and warn one another in a thoughtful and tactful way, activities that would take place in Spirit-inspired psalms, hymns and songs as the Colossians praised God with their whole being. Psalms, hymns and spiritual songs is a broad expression and includes OT psalms, liturgical hymns as well as spontaneous Christian songs.

17 The paragraph is summed up in a way that covers every aspect of life. Every activity is to be done in obedience to the Lord Jesus and is to be accompanied by the giving of thanks to God the Father through him (note the threefold reference to thanksgiving in vs 15–17). In word or deed does not refer to the liturgical practices of 'preaching' and 'the Lord's Supper' in a context of worship, but explains the comprehensive whatever. If the rich indwelling of the word of Christ in the readers' lives is to be shown in mutual teaching and warning, as the Colossians thankfully sing to God, then it should also show its powerful presence overall.

3:18–4:1 Behaviour in the Christian household

This paragraph deals with relationships within the Christian household. Similar advice is found in Eph. 5:22–6:9; 1 Tim. 2:8–15; Tit. 2:1–10; 1 Pet. 2:18–3:7. This 'house-table', as it has been called, may have formed part of a larger section of doctrinal and ethical teaching—an early Christian catechism, easily learned by heart and given to new converts. These verses regulate behaviour patterns within the Christian household and follow on from v 17. The paragraph contains many references to the Lord, indicating that the whole of life, both thought and conduct, is to be submitted to the Lord Jesus Christ. No area of life stands outside his control; so there is no final distinction between the sacred and the secular. A life ruled from above where Christ is reigning (3:1–4) is a life in marriage, parenthood and everyday work. Three pairs of instructions are addressed successively to wives and husbands (18–19), children and parents, especially fathers (20–21) and finally slaves and masters (3:22–4:1)—from the closest relationship to the most distant. In each case wife, child or slave is mentioned first and addressed as a responsible partner who is expected to do 'what is fitting in the Lord'.

18 The wives, as free and responsible agents, are asked voluntarily to submit themselves to their husbands since this is entirely proper (fitting has a Stoic ring to it but the motivation is entirely Christian). In the Lord means within the new fellowship of those who own Christ as Lord. Submission points to the wife's calling to honour and affirm her husband's leadership and to help him exercise his role within the family. It is not an absolute surrender of her will, for Christ is her absolute authority, not her husband. Nor is there any suggestion that the wife is naturally or spiritually inferior to her husband. 19 The parallel is the husband's duty to love his wife. He is commanded to love her and this is not simply a matter of his having affectionate feelings or being sexually attracted to her. Rather, it involves his unceasing care and loving service for her entire well-being. (Cf. Eph. 5:25–33 where Christ's love for the church is to be the model for the husband's love for his wife.) Christlike, sacrificial leadership by the husband will keep the ultimate good of his wife in view at all times. He, like godly leaders in other spheres, will seek to lead by serving. Accordingly, husbands are not to be embittered against their wives, whether in thought, word or deed.

20 Christian children are addressed as responsible members within the congregation (which is noteworthy) and urged to obey (which is a stronger word than submit in v 18) their parents in everything. This will be an expression of their obedience to Christ as the following words show: for this pleases the Lord. 21 At the same time, parents, especially fathers, are not to irritate or provoke their children lest they become discouraged or think that it is useless trying to please their parents within the life of the home. There should be firm, loving guidance, not slavery (cf. Eph. 6:4).

3:22–4:1 The longest set of instructions is to slaves (cf. Eph. 6:5–9), perhaps reflecting the social custom of the churches (on slavery in the first century see the letter to Philemon). Paul makes no social comment on this first-century custom but gives special encouragements to Christian slaves. The teaching in this section applies equally to work done today and shows that a worker's motivation and his standards of workmanship are to be the best possible, since they are done for the sake of Christ. 22 Christian slaves are to accept their position as slaves and obey

(cf. v 20 in relation to ‘children’) their earthly masters in everything. Their service is not to be superficial or performed so as to attract attention; instead, they are to serve with sincerity of heart, i.e. conscientiously and out of pure motives. 23–25 As they engage in earnest work for their masters so in that very action they are serving their heavenly Lord. They are to keep their final goal in view: a slave might normally expect punishment from an earthly master at the end of the day. This Master is different for he gives as his gracious reward an eternal inheritance of life in the age to come. At the same time they should realize that with this judge there is no favouritism; his judgment on disobedience is as sure as the reward for faithfulness. 4:1 A brief but solemn warning is addressed to masters. They are not commanded to free their slaves, but to treat them justly and fairly. The motivation for this is basically the same as the slave’s motive for obeying his master: both alike have a greater Master in heaven. Both owe obedience to that heavenly Lord. So their relationships with each other are to be understood in the light of this.

If Paul’s clear teaching about the privileges of, and demands upon, the Christian household were taken seriously by twentieth-century Christians, then personal relationships within families and households would truly be a foretaste of heaven. In the meantime others, seeing how these Christians love one another, may well be attracted to the one whom they own as Lord.

4:2–6 Final words of encouragement

This short paragraph, with its encouragement to prayer and thanksgiving (2–4) and its directions as to how the Colossians are to behave in their relationships with outsiders (5–6), concludes this section of the letter.

2–4 Paul often urges his readers to pray and intercede regularly (cf. Rom. 12:12; Eph. 6:18; Phil. 4:6) and he asks them to pray for him in his costly work of spreading the gospel (Rom. 15:30–32; 2 Cor. 1:11; Eph. 6:19; Phil. 1:19; 1 Thes. 5:25). He clearly attached great importance to the mutual prayers of himself and his converts. He has already assured his Colossian readers of his constant petitions for them (1:9–14); he now closes by urging them to pray regularly for him. 2 They are to devote themselves to prayer. Particularly is the cry Maranatha (‘Our Lord, come’) to be on their lips and in their hearts as they look forward expectantly to Christ’s glorious coming (3:4). Thanksgiving, the outward expression of gratitude to God the Father for having acted so graciously and decisively in his Son on their behalf (cf. 1:12–14), is to accompany this petition. 3–4 Paul requests them to bring him and his co-workers (us) before the throne of grace, praying that God would open a door for the gospel message (cf. 1 Cor. 16:9; 2 Cor. 2:12) and therefore for the messenger, which may well involve his release from prison. As apostle to the Gentiles Paul has the great privilege of making known the previously hidden divine purpose, the ‘open secret’ (1:26–27; 2:2–3). He now asks the Colossians to pray to the living God to enable him to set forth that divine mystery in a plain and clear manner.

5–6 Turning to general principles of Christian conduct, Paul urges his readers to behave wisely towards non-Christians. Here wisdom, which has to do with a knowledge of God’s will (1:9) and walking worthily of the Lord (1:10), is essentially practical and realistic. So, they are to be tactful yet bold in their Christian witness as they make the most of every opportunity. Make the most (lit. ‘buy up’) suggests an intensive activity, a buying which exhausts the possibilities available because they recognize that their time is limited. 6 As those who are to behave wisely towards outsiders, they are to let their words be both gracious and wise just as Paul desires for his own speech. They are receiving God’s grace: let that grace be evident in the words they speak. Seasoned with salt meant ‘witty’ in pagan usage but here suggests language that is not dull or flat but is interesting and well chosen (the rabbis sometimes used ‘salt’ to mean ‘wisdom’). Christians need to respond with the right word to those who ask questions, perhaps in connection with their beliefs and behaviour. The response should be appropriate (cf. 1 Pet. 3:15): ‘every one is to be treated as an end in himself and not subjected to a stock harangue’ (G. B. Caird).

4:7–18 Personal greetings and instructions

Paul ends his letter in the usual way with personal greetings and instructions. The paragraph includes a reference to the messengers who will carry his letter to Colosse (7–9) and a series of greetings from associates who are acquainted with the Colossian church (10–14), together with his own greeting, brief instructions and final salutation (15–18).

7 Tychicus will inform the congregation of the apostle’s personal situation (note the similar wording in Eph. 6:21–22). He is a specially dear brother and valued colleague to Paul who had rendered ‘reliable’ service to him, the Colossians or to Christ (cf. 1:7 of Epaphras). In the Lord could mean ‘in the Lord’s work’, or else be a reference to the fact that he performs his task as one ‘in the Lord’, i.e. as a Christian. 8 Paul is sending Tychicus for the express purpose of giving the Colossians all the apostle’s news and of impressing his teaching on the congregation in order to strengthen them (see on 2:2).

9 Onesimus, a native of Colosse, is the same person mentioned in the letter to Philemon. He too is given a warm commendation by Paul: our faithful and dear brother. Along with Tychicus, he will inform Paul’s friends of all that has happened. (For a description of Onesimus’s circumstances see the commentary on Philemon.)

10–11 Three Jewish Christians send their greetings. Aristarchus, a native of Thessalonica and Paul’s travelling companion (Acts 19:29), is his fellow-prisoner which probably means he was actually in prison with Paul rather than that he was a ‘prisoner of Christ’ in a figurative sense. Mark, the cousin of Barnabas whom Paul had refused to take on the second missionary journey (Acts 15:36–41) after his defection on the first journey (13:13), is clearly on friendly terms with Paul again (cf. 2 Tim. 4:11). The mention of Barnabas suggests he was well known at Colosse. We have no knowledge as to whether the instructions about Mark came from Paul or from someone else (such as Peter or Barnabas) nor whether Paul is confirming them. Jesus Justus is otherwise unknown to us. These first three are the only Jewish Christians who have remained faithful fellow-workers of Paul for the kingdom of God. Often in Paul’s letters the phrase kingdom of God has a future reference (e.g. 1 Cor. 6:9–10; 15:50), but Rom. 14:17 shows that it has a present side to it (cf. Col. 1:13) and this is its significance here.

12–14 Three others, who are Gentiles (cf. v 11), send their greetings. Epaphras is specially mentioned: Paul stresses the close relationship between his own ministry and that of Epaphras. As a native of Colosse he had been the evangelist in his home town (as well as at Laodicea and Hierapolis) and had been engaged in the same struggle for the gospel as Paul (2:1; cf. Phil. 1:30). This found particular expression in his urgent prayers for the Colossians that they might (lit.) ‘stand forth perfect [“perfect” touches on a key issue at Colosse] and be filled with everything that is God’s will’. This maturity, which is a perfection expected on the last day, is further defined by ‘filled with everything that is God’s will’. Epaphras wants them to make progress here and now and come to fullness in Christ on the final day. Only here do we learn that Luke was a doctor. It is mainly on the basis of this verse, which separates him from the Jewish Christians mentioned in v 11, that Luke is regarded as a Gentile Christian. In 2 Tim. 4:10 Demas is said to have left Paul for ‘this world’.

15–18 In this last section greetings are sent to various people. The Colossians are asked to convey Paul’s greetings to the brothers at Laodicea, i.e. the church there (cf. v 16). Perhaps Paul wished to cement relations between the two congregations. Nympha is probably a woman, so the NIV’s the church in her house would be correct. 16 This verse provides important evidence for the public reading of Paul’s letters in church and the exchange of letters between churches. If the so-called ‘heresy’ was threatening the whole area it would have been helpful for the Laodiceans to know Paul’s response sent to Colosse. The letter from Laodicea is now lost but was presumably written by Paul to that church. 17 Archippus was a member of Philemon’s household, perhaps Philemon and Apphia’s son, who devoted himself to the service of the gospel (see on Phm. 2). What the work he is to complete was unclear though some have claimed it was the ministry of preaching.

18 Having finished dictating, Paul takes up his pen and adds a personal greeting in his own handwriting. Remember my chains is an appeal for continued prayer that is touching in its brevity and simplicity. He then concludes with his usual greeting, Grace be with you.

Peter T. O’Brien

1 THESSALONIANS

Introduction

Thessalonica was one of the towns in Macedonia (the northern part of modern Greece) visited by Paul and his companions, Silas and Timothy, during his second missionary campaign (Acts 16–18). The town was the capital of the Roman province, a commercial centre situated on the major highway, the Via Egnatia, with a mixed population including Jews. After being forced to leave Philippi, Paul spent a brief time here, and he gained a number of converts from Jewish and Greek attenders at the synagogue and established a church. Opposition from Jews who did not respond to the message forced the missionaries to leave sooner than they would have wished (Acts 17:1–9). Paul went southwards into Achaia and stayed briefly in Athens and then for a longer period in Corinth. From Athens he sent Timothy back to visit the church (1 Thes. 3:1–6), and it was probably from Corinth that he wrote to them. 1 Thessalonians, therefore, was written within a matter of a few months or so from the time when the readers had first heard the gospel, and it should be read as a follow-up letter to new converts.

Nothing is known about the church during this brief period between its foundation and the composition of the letter apart from the allusions which it contains. The impression given is of a church which was free from groups preaching a different version of the gospel (contrast Galatia) and which was making good progress in developing in faith and love. Paul was concerned about whether the church could stand up to attacks from outside, but this was more because of its recent foundation than because of any basic weaknesses.

The major area in which Paul felt the need to give instruction was regarding the future advent (or parousia) of the Lord Jesus. It was not that there was any false teaching; rather the Thessalonian Christians had failed to appreciate properly the significance of Paul's teaching about the parousia and about the resurrection of the dead.

The problems and needs which lie behind the letter are thus those of a church in its infancy, facing opposition from outside and lacking in the detailed teaching that Paul would have given if he had been able to stay longer with them. The letter suggests that the future coming of the Lord had played a fairly prominent part in Paul's preaching, and he certainly refers to it with remarkable frequency in the letter (1:9–10; 2:19; 3:13; 4:13–5:11; 5:23). Otherwise, the letter reflects the typical characteristics of Paul's thought, including the distinctive use of the phrase 'in Christ' (and similar phrases) to describe the nature of the Christian life. Some of Paul's most characteristic ideas, notably the doctrine of justification by faith, are absent, but this may be simply because nothing in the situation required the use of teaching which is particularly associated with polemic against a Jewish emphasis on the works of the law.

The letter is universally accepted as genuine. It has been argued that it has a peculiar shape, and attempts have been made to explain it as a combination of two or more documents or as a document which has been subjected to interpolations, but these theories are undoubtedly more ingenious than convincing. The letter makes admirable sense in its present form.

1 Thessalonians has the usual pattern of Pauline letters in that it begins with a greeting (1:1) followed by a report of how Paul remembers the church in his prayers. He thanks God for the way in which the continuing Christian life and witness of the church testify to the reality of the positive response of its members to his initial preaching of the gospel (1:2–10). This report has the effect of confirming that the church is in good health and thus of providing the readers with encouragement to carry on in the way they are doing. Then Paul comments on the character of his missionary work in the town, claiming that he and his companions acted uprightly and lovingly in every way (2:1–12). This may suggest that the opponents of the church were engaged in slandering the missionaries. Despite this opposition, the church had given a warm response to the gospel (2:13–16). The continuation of hostility to the church since Paul's departure had worried him so much that he had wished to go back to see how things were; instead he had sent Timothy as his representative, and the latter had now returned full of enthusiasm for the healthy state of the church (2:17–3:13). Thus the first part of the letter is concerned with the good progress of the church despite opposition and helps to strengthen the ties between the absent writer and his readers.

In the remainder of the letter Paul gives the church the kind of teaching and practical advice which he would have liked to share with them in person. First, he encourages the readers to live holy lives—with special reference to the avoidance of sexual immorality—and to continue to grow in love (4:1–12). Secondly, he comforts those who were fearful about the fate of those of their number who had died by telling them that when the Lord returns, the resurrection of the dead will take place, so that those who 'fell asleep' in Christ will come with him and be reunited with those who are still alive. Believers need not worry about when this will take place; if they are truly 'awake' as Christians, they will not be taken by surprise like the unbelieving world (4:13–5:11). Finally, Paul encourages the communal life of the church by commending brotherly love and the use of spiritual gifts (5:12–24), and he closes the letter with personal greetings (5:25–28).

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Thessalonians, BST (IVP, 1991).

L. Morris, The Epistles of Paul to the Thessalonians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1977).

———, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1977).

F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, WBC (Word, 1982).

I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, NCB (Eerdmans, 1983).

Outline of contents

1:1	Opening greeting
1:2–10	Opening thanksgiving
2:1–16	The behaviour of the missionaries in Thessalonica
2:17–3:13	Paul’s continuing concern for the church
4:1–12	Encouragement to ethical progress
4:13–5:11	Instruction and encouragement about the second coming of Jesus
5:12–24	Instructions for life in the church
5:25–28	Closing requests and greetings

Commentary

1:1 Opening greeting

Paul names himself and the two friends who had shared with him in founding the church at Thessalonica and who were now with him. Silas, or 'Silvanus' (RSV, the longer form of the same name), was a Jewish member of the Jerusalem church and a Roman citizen (see Acts 15:22–31). Timothy had joined Paul and Silas when they passed through Lystra in Asia Minor early in their missionary work (Acts 16:1–5). Despite the use of the 'we' form throughout most of the letter (contrast 2:18; 3:5; 5:27), it is generally thought that Paul himself was the real author writing on behalf of the group of missionaries.

The church was a small group of believers who met in a home or perhaps in a handful of homes. Paul frequently says that Christians are 'in Christ' or 'in the Lord' or do certain things 'in him'. This expression means that they are in a close relationship with Jesus and that their conduct is determined by him as their crucified and risen Lord. Here Paul adds the name of God the Father (cf. 2 Thes. 1:1), indicating that Christians are also closely related to him and stand under his authority. The spontaneous way in which the Father and Jesus are named together shows how Paul saw Jesus as the Son who shared with the Father as the source of spiritual blessings.

Grace and peace come from the Father and Jesus (2 Thes. 1:2). (See also the article on Reading the letters.)

1:2–10 Opening thanksgiving

Paul begins most of his letters by telling how he expresses thanks to God for what he is doing in the lives of the readers. This prayer-report makes clear his own love and concern for his friends and also serves to encourage them in their Christian lives. Its theme is the stead-fastness and energy with which the readers have maintained their original faith and so become a witness to other people. The three foundational Christian qualities of faith, love and hope (cf. 5:8; 1 Cor. 13:13; Col. 1:4–5) had given rise to hard effort and endurance despite an adverse situation.

4–5 This evidence confirmed the fact that God had chosen the readers. This phrase indicates not only that God had called them through the preaching of the gospel (2:12) but also that they had responded to him with faith (2:13). The human words expressing the gospel would have been useless had they not been accompanied by the power of the Spirit and by a consequent sense of conviction and assurance on the part of the preachers. These factors had convinced the hearers of the truth of the gospel and enabled them to accept it and live it out, as their subsequent behaviour demonstrated.

6–8 The missionaries, like Jesus himself, had been strongly attacked, but they had stood up to the opposition without giving in. So too the readers had welcomed the message, despite adversity, with the sort of joy that could be due only to the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives

(cf. Rom. 5:5; 14:17; Gal. 5:22). This made them an example to other Christians in the two Roman provinces of Macedonia and Achaia that covered roughly the area of modern Greece. News of their conversion had spread right through this area, partly through evangelistic work by the readers themselves and partly by other people talking about them. Everywhere is a broad term for all the places where Christians were to be found. Paul obviously would tell in one place what was happening to believers in another (part of the confirmation of the truth of the good news (3:6) was to tell how God was changing the lives of people in many different places), but in this case he did not need to do so.

9–10 The response of the Thessalonians to the gospel is summed up in three phrases that doubtless reflect the language of the early preaching. First, they had abandoned idols. The appeal to do so was a necessary part of the message to Gentiles, as opposed to Jews (cf. Acts 14:15; 17:22–31). Secondly, they had turned to the living and true God to serve him. Because some people abandoned idolatry merely out of a belief that either there were no gods or they were not interested in mankind, the Christian message had to stress the positive alternative. Thirdly, they had pinned their hope on Jesus as the one and only deliverer from future judgment. Jesus, however, was no mere man to have such a role. He had been raised from the dead by the power of God, and by this act God was declaring him to be his Son (cf. Acts 17:31; Rom. 1:3–4). Jewish preaching to Gentiles (which the Christians naturally took over) covered the two previous points; this was the distinguishing feature of the Christian message.

2:1–16 The behaviour of the missionaries in Thessalonica

The main part of the letter begins by taking up the topic mentioned in 1:5–6. Missionaries, and indeed all Christian witnesses, are peculiarly vulnerable to criticism, and therefore must make all the more effort to live, and to be seen to live, in a way that is not open to criticism. Paul's conduct as a missionary in Thessalonica seems to have been criticized in his absence, apparently by people outside the congregation, and he now defends himself from various possible accusations.

So many wandering religious and philosophical teachers travelled around the Roman world making what they could out of their hearers, that it was necessary for the missionaries to stress that their motives and methods were quite different from those of the less scrupulous of their rivals. The criticisms and the response to them made here can be paralleled in the writings of some of the ancient philosophers who felt that they too were being unjustly accused. Basically the missionaries were charged with exploiting their followers and living at their expense. All their appeals to the new converts were regarded as ways of deceiving them into paying the missionaries high respect—and high fees or presents.

1–2 Paul appeals to the readers' own recollections of the missionaries' visit ('you know' or 'you remember' are key phrases: 1–2, 5, 9, 11). They could see for themselves that the missionary work had not been a failure (literally 'empty'), in the sense either that it had been hollow and lacking in content or that it had led to no profound results. Rather, it had been a courageous act in the face of opposition at Philippi (Acts 16:19–40) and in Thessalonica itself (cf. 1:6; 2:14–16; 3:3–4).

3–6 A further demonstration of the true nature of the evangelism lay in the fact that it was not based on error regarding the gospel. Nor did it arise from impure motives, such as ambition or greed (rather than, but not excluding, sexual immorality), or attempt to trick the hearers into acceptance of the message (cf. the dubious missionaries in 2 Cor. 11:13). Rather, the missionaries had been, as it were, tested by God before being approved for enrolment in his workforce, and their motives were continually under his scrutiny. They were, therefore, very conscious of the need to keep to God's standards and so they rejected dubious means of persuasion (e.g. altering the gospel to make it more acceptable).

Their aim was to please God and not their audience, not because they were indifferent to their audience and its needs, but rather because their criterion was not whether they succeeded on a human level. Therefore, they did not make use of flattery or put forward false motives to cover up a real motivation which was greed to get money from their converts. Another possible charge was that they were looking for praise from people inside and outside the church. It was true that the apostles or missionaries might have claimed certain privileges as a matter of right, such as the right to be obeyed by their converts and to be maintained, as regards their material needs, by the churches. Here probably the former of these entitlements is principally in mind. (For Paul's repudiation of the latter see 2 Thes. 3:9; 1 Cor. 9:4–14; 2 Cor. 11:7–12) The missionaries could have at least stood on their authority (although to have done so would have been contrary to the principle enunciated by Jesus, Lk. 22:24–27), but they had not done so.

7 In fact they had been gentle (Gk ēpioi; the better MSS have nēpioi, 'babes', but accidental duplication of the letter n from the end of the previous word probably led to the insertion of this less appropriate word). Missionaries or pastors must be like a father in their care for their converts (11), but here the image of the mother (Gk 'nurse', but a mother is in fact meant) brings out more strongly the element of tender care required in a parental attitude.

8 This attitude is described in terms of an affection which expresses itself in a desire to give gifts. The greatest gift from a Christian point of view is the gospel of God, but from a human point of view it is to share one's inmost being with somebody, as two lovers might wish to do.

9 The desire to show love rather than to burden the converts was to be seen in the hard work done by the missionaries. They had worked not only in the daytime but also at night (no doubt at tent-making or leather-work; Acts 18:3) in order to earn money for their keep while they were preaching. The help from Philippi (Phil. 4:16) was not enough on its own. Paul relates his policy of working with his hands (cf. 4:11; 2 Thes. 3:7–10; Acts 18:3; 20:34) here primarily to his desire not to be dependent on his converts or to make money out of them rather than to making opportunities to meet people in the workshop or to showing that he was not ashamed of honest toil (though see 2 Thes. 3:8).

10–12 Paul sums up his argument by appealing to the readers' own experience that the missionaries had lived uprightly and treated them in a fatherly manner. Their main concern had been to encourage a way of life that was fitting for people called by God into his kingdom and to the hope of sharing in his glory.

13 That the missionaries' visit was not a failure (1) was also to be seen in the way that the hearers received the message. Paul's message was frequently denounced as being simply his own, human ideas, and therefore he was grateful when people recognized that he was really teaching a message that came from God himself (cf. Gal. 1:11–12). This message had an inherent power to change the lives of those who heard it.

14–16 The proof of this was to be seen in the way in which the converts had shown the same spirit as that of the early Christians in Judea who had suffered violent attacks from their fellow-countrymen, the Jews. In just the same way the Thessalonians had suffered at the hands of their own fellow-countrymen, both Gentiles and Jews (Acts 17:5). Paul was a Jew himself, and therefore he felt a special bond to his own people, longing that they might turn from their blindness and accept Jesus as the Messiah. But he also knew all too well that the rejection of Jesus would lead to God's rejection of those who rejected him, and therefore he speaks here of the wrath of God coming fully and finally upon the Jews for the last and worst of their sins in a long history of rejecting the messengers of God. Note that Paul is writing here about a specific group of Jews, and does not contradict the hope expressed in Rom. 9–11 that the Jewish people will turn to God; response to the gospel saves people from the wrath of God.

2:17–3:13 Paul's continuing concern for the church

Having left Thessalonica earlier than he had wished, Paul wanted to return as soon as possible, but had been prevented by what he calls satanic opposition (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7). One possibility is that in view of the trouble there had been with the city rulers Paul himself was forbidden to return to the town, and nothing had happened to change that position. It seems that some unjustifiable criticism of Paul was abroad, and so he emphasizes the strength of his longing to revisit them and encourage them. He pictures himself as appearing before Christ on the day of judgment, bringing with him this church as the proof that he had been faithful in his calling as a missionary. The church would be like a crown symbolizing his effective missionary work, and therefore its continuing existence was vital. Equally, his converts were the source of his joy for their own sake—just as a teacher may take a genuine pleasure in the success of a pupil not merely because he or she has had a share in ensuring that success but above all because of what it means to the pupil.

3:1–2 Every effort to come himself having failed, Paul agreed to the proposal that he stay on himself in Athens (some 500 km or 300 miles from Thessalonica) and send one of his colleagues instead. (To be left alone probably implies that Silas also left him at this point.) So Timothy was sent in Paul's place—as he often was to other churches. Paul emphasizes—again perhaps in self-defence against any detractors—that Timothy was in every way his brother or colleague, a man of proven worth. The description of him as God's fellow-worker, i.e. a person who is a colleague of God in the work of the gospel (cf. 1 Cor. 3:9), caused problems for scribes, and some of them changed the text to 'God's servant' (so NIV mg.). Paul means that God himself is seen as cooperating with Christian workers in spreading the gospel of Christ, a phrase which includes both initial evangelism and the nurture of the church. Timothy's visit would have had the effect of strengthening the church so that they would resist temptation and hostile pressure more firmly. (Note how the same effect is ascribed to the Lord himself in v. 13.) Encourage conveys the senses both of stimulating people to action (the older Bible versions have 'exhorting') and of giving them comfort.

3–4 Knowing that some difficult circumstance lies ahead may help us to face it with greater fortitude. The readers knew that pressure from outside was to be their lot because Paul had already reiterated the point, no doubt by referring to his own experience and that of the churches in Judea (2:14).

5 Having sent Timothy to them, Paul was desperately concerned to know whether they were maintaining their faith. It was possible that Satan had tempted them to such an extent that the church had been destroyed, and all the labour that had been spent on it had been in vain. Although no temptation is so great as to be irresistible (1 Cor. 10:13), believers do not always resist it successfully. Belief in the power of God to preserve his people did not save Paul from concern and prayer for them.

6–8 Timothy's good news (a word used elsewhere of preaching the gospel) took away all of Paul's fears. He was so overjoyed that he wrote this letter as soon as possible after Timothy's return. The two fundamental Christian characteristics of faith and love were alive and well in Thessalonica (and continued to develop: 2 Thes. 1:3). The church was filled with a desire to see Paul. This showed that the readers had not turned aside from the gospel and did indeed belong to God's chosen people (1:4). They were standing firm in reliance on the Lord and so could face up to all opposition (cf. Eph. 6:10). Timothy's report had come when Paul himself was feeling oppressed by his own difficult circumstances and the pressures upon him and was therefore not fully 'alive'. The missionary whose task was to encourage others (2) was himself encouraged and revived by the news of the church.

9 Paul writes of the feelings of joy which he expressed in the presence of our God, just as when the Israelites celebrated their festivals in the presence of the Lord (Dt. 12:12, 18). Joy can be simply an expression of our own feelings of happiness; for Paul it was an occasion for giving thanks to God, who was its source.

10 Paul still prayed most earnestly (a particularly strong Greek expression) that he might be able to revisit the church. He had a very human desire simply to be with them, and he longed to help them to overcome any continuing weaknesses in their faith. Although they had stood firm, they were not perfect, either in Christian knowledge or in behaviour. This letter is Paul's attempt to supply in writing what he could not give them in person. Sending a letter, of course, dealt only with the second of Paul's reasons for wanting to visit the church. At the time of writing, therefore, he was still longing and praying for the possibility of a visit to the church. His prayer was eventually answered (Acts 20:1).

11–12 From telling his readers about his prayers, Paul turns to actually praying. Instead of addressing God directly in the second person, e.g. 'O God, clear the way for us to come to Thessalonica', Paul expresses his prayer in the third person, 'May God clear the way for us to come to you' (cf. Nu. 6:24–26; Ps. 20:1–5). The prayer links God as Father and the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. 1:1, and, in reverse order, 2 Thes. 2:16). The first petition voices Paul's desire to revisit the church, and the second expresses his longing for their growth in love and holiness—the theme developed in the instruction that directly follows the prayer (4:1–12). Their love must expand beyond the church to include everyone else (cf. Gal. 6:10 in reverse order). Paul cites himself as an example (cf. 1:6; 2 Thes. 3:7–9; Acts 20:35)—not to give information to the Lord, but because this prayer also functions as a means of instructing the readers as to how they should pray and how they should live.

13 Paul wants the readers to be blameless and holy to meet the Lord when he comes in judgment. He is not praying that they will grow and develop so as to be blameless at some future point when the Lord comes. Rather he believes that the Lord can come very soon (not immediately, to be sure, as 2 Thes. 2 indicates), and therefore he prays that God will make their hearts firm in these qualities now and that they will continue in this state right until the Lord's coming. At the judgment which will take place when Christ comes (2:19; cf. 1:10), they need not fear the wrath of God (1:10), but it will be nevertheless a time of assessment and reward or loss. The solemnity of the occasion is stressed by the description of Jesus coming with all his holy ones. These are either believers who have died and who come with living believers to meet the Lord (4:16–17) or the angels who accompany the final coming of God (Zc. 14:5) or of the Son of Man (Mk. 8:38) and add to his glory. (2 Thes. 1:7 supports this second interpretation.)

4:1–12 Encouragement to ethical progress

In the first of three sections of instruction Paul deals with ethical behaviour, in particular holiness (4:1–8) and brotherly love (4:9–12).

1–2 The motive for Christian living is to please God (cf. 2:4) by doing his will. The readers were already doing this, and so Paul's purpose here is simply to encourage them to do what they are already doing all the better. For In the Lord Jesus see 1:1 note. Instructions has a military flavour; there was a definite lifestyle associated with the gospel, and Christians were commanded to live by it.

3 To do God's will involves, among other things, being sanctified. This peculiarly Christian word refers to the ongoing process of becoming increasingly free from sin and filled with love. To be sanctified means to belong to God and to show the same character as God. Its opposite is impurity (7), conduct which is immoral and defiling.

One aspect of holiness (there are many others of equal importance) needed to be stressed, complete avoidance of sexual immorality. This phrase refers to all kinds of sexual intercourse other than that which takes place within the marriage relationship.

4–5 The NIV has interpreted v 4 in terms of sexual self-control. It takes the Greek word skeuos, literally a 'container', as a metaphor for a person's body, here in its sexual aspect (possibly as a euphemism for the sexual organ), and the verb ktasthai to mean 'to gain mastery over' (a rare but attested usage). Some other translations interpret the verb as 'to take' and the 'container' as a woman, so that the instruction is to 'learn to acquire a wife' (NIV mg.; similarly, RSV). Although 'container' is used for human beings (both male and female) in 1 Pet. 3:7, this is unlikely to be the force here, and in any case it comes near to regarding a woman as simply a sexual object. On either rendering, sexual life must be conducted honourably. Holiness does not exclude sexual activity but controls its character. The opposite way of living is characterized by lust, physical desire which does not take account of persons as persons and behaves as it pleases without self-control.

6 Sexual immorality is further seen to be wrong in that it can involve taking advantage of other people. To commit adultery is to attempt to break up an existing relationship and bond of love within a marriage, and can fairly be described as wronging a brother. Another, less likely, view of this verse is that Paul introduced the fresh topic of taking advantage of a brother in business (an alternative translation of 'in this matter'; cf. RSV mg.).

The heinousness of such conduct is brought out by Paul's reminder that judgment by the Lord (i.e. Jesus, fulfilling God's role in Ps. 94:1) faces sinners.

7–8 But judgment is not the only motive for upright living. God did not call us on the basis of uncleanness, as though this was a state to be maintained, but he called us in a way that involves his activity in making us holy. Therefore, to disregard this particular instruction is to disregard God himself who gives his Spirit to us to make us holy.

9–10 Now Paul turns to a positive instruction about the need to strengthen and increase their brotherly love (Gk philadelphia) for one another (cf. 3:12), as God had instructed and impelled them to do. Their love in fact already extended beyond their own church to Christians in other places, probably in giving hospitality and material help to others.

11–12 Some people in the church were taking advantage of this brotherly love to live off charity without doing any work themselves (cf. 2 Thes. 3:6–15). These idlers may have been influenced by their belief that the second coming of Jesus was near; if so, they reasoned, why bother working? Paul instructs them to make it a matter of honour to avoid being busybodies, to look after their own affairs in a responsible way, and to be prepared to do an honest day's work. This would prevent them losing the respect of other people.

4:13–5:11 Instruction and encouragement about the second coming of Jesus

The second coming of Jesus had formed an important part of Paul's teaching during his visit, but it had led to misunderstandings. Timothy brought two questions to Paul. The first concerned the fate of Christians who had already died when the Lord returned (4:13–18), and the second was about the danger of the living being taken unawares by the Lord and somehow not participating in the event (5:1–11).

4:13 Evidently the readers thought that people who fall asleep (i.e. those of their number who had already died and any others who might die) before the second coming would remain in their graves and not take part in the event. This would suggest that either they had not heard of the resurrection of the dead (which is not very likely, since the resurrection of Jesus was part of the primitive gospel), or they had not understood properly what they had been taught. Lacking full knowledge of the Christian hope, they were like non-Christians, 'without hope and without God' (Eph. 2:12).

14 The basic answer to the problem is the fundamental piece of Christian teaching that Jesus died and rose again. It follows that the God who raised Jesus will bring with him the people for whom he died, and who died believing in him. Paul says nothing as yet about the dead being raised to share in this event, but it is obvious that, if they are going to share in it, they must be resurrected in order to do so. In fact, so far from their being left out of the glorious events associated with the second coming of the Lord, they will have precedence over those still living. (Paul speaks of we who are still alive; this use of words indicates that he reckoned with the possibility that the Lord would come in his own lifetime, but did not necessarily regard this as a foregone conclusion.)

15–18 Confirmation of this statement is given by reference to the Lord's own word, which is best understood as teaching of Jesus akin to Mt. 24:30–31 rather than a revelation from the risen Lord to a prophet or to Paul himself. (Paul also refers to it in 1 Cor. 15:52.) The command, the angelic voice and the trumpet are interpreted as means of rousing those who are asleep in death and raising them to be with the Lord (Jn. 5:25–29). They rise first, i.e. before those Christians who are still living are caught up to be with the Lord and go to meet the Lord in the air. The picture is that of a group of citizens going out from a city to meet a visiting dignitary and accompany him back. This implies that the Lord returns with his people to the earth. (They certainly do not stay permanently on the clouds playing harps!) This language was probably never intended to be understood absolutely literally; it is describing things that go beyond words. The important thing is that believers, whether the dead or the living, are from then with the Lord for ever.

5:1–5 The other question about the second coming was one that arose out of the readers' worry that they might not be prepared for the event when it happened: might it not take them unawares? So was it possible for Paul to say something about when it and associated events would happen? Paul replied that he did not need to write any more to them than he had already taught them, namely that the day of the Lord (cf. the day of the Son of Man, Lk. 17:24, 30) would resemble the arrival of a burglar in that it would be unexpected and unwelcome, just as Jesus had said (Mt. 24:43; Lk. 12:39–40). People might think they are living in security with nothing to disturb their worldly existence, but then destruction will come on them suddenly (cf. Lk. 21:34). Here Paul is following what Jesus said by way of warning. But the particular point that he needed to make here was that this language of warning about a threatening event was for unbelievers, not for believers. The thought of the day of the Lord is associated not only with judgment but also with the dawning of light, which symbolizes divine revelation and righteousness. Believers are people who already live in the light; they are no longer in the darkness of sin and ignorance. Consequently, for them the day of the Lord will not come like a searchlight which reveals the sins committed under cover of darkness and which makes unbelievers want to hide or run away. On the contrary, they will welcome the fuller light of that day, and they will not be like people taken unawares because they will not be doing the kind of things that lead to judgment.

6–11 Nevertheless, it is possible that even believers may be tempted to live like unbelievers. What they need in that case is not information about when the day is coming (in the fond hope that they can quickly put their lives in order at the last minute) but strong commands to live as people who belong to the day. They must not do what other people do at night—whether carousing or sleeping—but must be alert and ready for the Lord. Let them in fact be like soldiers who are on watch, and let them (Paul follows up the comparison further) arm themselves with the three basic Christian characteristics (see 1:3). The most important of these in the present context is the hope of salvation, and it rests on the conviction that believers have not been destined by God for the wrath that faces sinners but to receive salvation, here understood primarily as the future experience of deliverance from wrath. This deliverance is possible because of the death of Jesus for them. Paul does not explain here how it produces this effect, but elsewhere it is clear that Jesus has borne their sins and endured judgment on their behalf (Rom. 3:24–26; 2 Cor. 5:19–21). Consequently, they will share his life—and this will be true both for faithful believers who are still alive when he comes and for those who died trusting in Christ. With this hope before them, the readers should help one another by offering mutual encouragement and doing whatever else would help to make their faith strong.

5:12–24 Instructions for life in the church

A third section of teaching gives what appear at first sight to be rather general instructions for the readers' life together in the church. Paul gave similar teaching to other congregations (see especially Rom. 12), but here it is directed particularly to the situation at Thessalonica. The teaching can be divided roughly into five sections (12–13, 14, 15, 16–18, 19–22) followed by a prayer (23–24).

12–13 The first section deals with the attitude of the church generally to its leaders. No specific title is used for them (later, words like elders, bishops and deacons became more common), and they are described in terms of the things that they did. They were involved in what was hard work (a term used for Christian work generally by Paul himself and missionaries but also by local leaders). They were over the congregation—a phrase that may refer to exercising authority or to showing concern and care (especially if they were wealthier people who gave of their resources to the congregation; cf. Rom. 16:1–2), and they warned people who needed direction. They thus exercised authority in the church, and it was necessary to remind those subject to their authority to recognize the leaders' position and to show them proper esteem coupled with love. Live in peace may suggest some danger of division between the leaders and the other believers.

14 This may be connected with the next point, the need for spiritual direction for some people in the church. It is noteworthy that Paul here urges the church in general (note the repetition of brothers in v 14) and not just the leaders to care for the rest of the congregation. Paul may especially have had in mind a group in the church who needed direction but were refusing to heed it. These were people who were idle (so NIV; the word usually means ‘disorderly’, but it can refer specifically to being idle and in the context this meaning is more likely; see 4:11; 2 Thes. 3:6–13). The timid or ‘fainthearted’ may be the sad and dispirited people in 4:13–5:11. The weak may be those who were assailed by hardship or temptation and found it difficult to resist; they needed people to stand alongside them and sustain them. Those who give such help may need to be patient to put up with people and their awkwardness and even their opposition to being helped.

15 That retaliation took place in the church is indicated by the next command, not to return evil for evil, but rather always to show kindness even when you have been treated unkindly. Note that this was not confined within the group of believers but it was to be shown to everyone else as well. This attitude went beyond the morality of the time and was characteristically Christian (Rom. 12:17, 19–21; 1 Pet. 3:9; cf. Mt. 5:38–42, 43–48).

16–18 A series of brief, staccato commands indicates the basis for Christian living. They are quite general and would apply to any group of believers. Christians have grounds for joy in both their experience of salvation and their hope of what God will do in the future, but they need to express that joy; there is a right and proper place for the expression of joyful emotion. Christians must also pray—here probably in the sense of making requests to God, since the next command is about the need to be thankful. Common to the three commands is the stress on fulfilling them all the time and in all circumstances; this does not mean, for example, that one prays uninterruptedly but that one prays regularly and frequently. Such a life is made possible, Paul adds, because God intends it to be so; he wants his people to be joyful, prayerful and thankful, and he makes it possible for them to be so.

19–22 Another brief set of statements is concerned principally with the Spirit and his gifts. What is set out in detail in 1 Cor. 12–14 is stated here summarily. The Spirit is powerful and active like fire in the congregation (cf. Rom. 12:11; 2 Tim. 1:6 for the metaphor). Gifts for ministry were being exercised, but some people were trying to suppress them (we don’t know just how), but it is wrong to do so. In particular, Paul stressed the need to value the utterances of prophets. Possibly the church had had a bad experience of them (cf. 1 Jn. 4:1–3), and instead of exercising discernment between true and false prophecies was clamping down on the whole activity. The church should rather test everything, i.e. assess the utterances of prophets (1 Cor. 12:10; 14:29). It should hold on to what was valuable and reject whatever was wrong in the prophetic teachings. (Vs 21–22 could be understood in a more general way, but they have a narrower application in this context.)

23–24 Finally, Paul expresses a prayer for the readers (cf. 3:11–13). God himself is personally concerned for them. He is the source of spiritual blessings, here summed up as peace, and therefore it is right to pray that he will enable those who are called ‘saints’ to become more and more saintly in their whole being. Paul is thinking of an ongoing process, and the ideal result will be that, at whatever time the Lord returns, he will find his people completely blameless so as to be whole. Spirit, soul and body is a way of saying ‘completely’ by reference to three aspects of a human being—life in relationship with God, the human personality and the body through which one acts and expresses oneself. Although the Christian life demands human effort, in the last analysis it depends on God himself who is faithful. Those who trust in him are trusting that he will preserve them right to the end—and they have every reason to believe that he is trustworthy.

5:25–28 Closing requests and greetings

A letter in ancient times naturally concluded with personal greetings and requests. Here they are very much concerned with the Christian life and witness of the writer and the recipients. Paul frequently asks his readers to pray for his colleagues and himself (2 Thes. 3:1–2); this was one way in which they shared in his mission, and the missionaries for their part depended upon such support. The readers were to greet one another with a Christian sign of affection. By giving this instruction, Paul was indicating that, despite his absence from them, he would be associated with them in their greeting. The kiss functioned as a sign of affection and respect and the word does not necessarily convey any sexual overtones.

27 At this point Paul himself probably took the pen from his secretary and stressed that the letter must be read by everybody in the congregation. It was presumably read (in place of a sermon?) when everybody was there, so as to substitute for Paul in his absence. Paul wanted to be sure that his message reached everybody for whom it was intended.

28 Paul always closed his letters with a benediction which was similar in wording to the opening greeting. The normal secular greeting (Acts 15:29) was replaced by a Christian wish which takes us to the heart of the gospel, to the person of Jesus as the Lord and as the source of divine favour.

I. Howard Marshall

2 THESSALONIANS

Introduction

The language and contents of the second letter are so close to those of 1 Thessalonians as to suggest that it was written not long afterwards. It follows the same general pattern. From chapter 1 it appears that the situation of opposition from outside must have worsened. The pungency of Paul's language may also suggest that he himself was the object of particular attack from people outside the church (cf. 3:2). This increase in opposition may have been part of the reason why a group developed in the church who believed that they were living in the very last days. They claimed support for this belief from some kind of statement which purported to come from Paul himself. Paul repudiated this statement (or, more probably, the questionable inferences drawn from it), and argued that various events had still to happen before the return of the Lord. In the final part of the letter we find evidence that some members of the church were taking advantage of the hospitality of others and living in idleness at their expense. Although no explicit connection is made, it is hard not to believe that the 'apocalyptic' excitement reflected in chapter 2 contributed to this situation. It called forth strong words of censure from Paul who firmly believed that, where possible, Christians should work for their living.

These points determine the structure of the letter. As in 1 Thessalonians, the opening greeting (1:1–2) is followed by a prayer-report which also functions as encouragement and teaching: the church was still suffering from opposition, but was bearing it steadfastly, and Paul assures the believers that God will judge those who oppose them and prepare the church to share his glory when Christ comes (1:3–12). The centre of the letter is teaching about the return of Christ, directed against the people who were asserting that the last days (in the sense of the final period of time) had begun. Paul teaches that a period of satanic opposition to God on an unparalleled scale will precede the return of Christ; meanwhile, the church, conscious that it was the object of God's gracious choice, and dependent on his strengthening, must hold firm to the end (2:1–17). Finally, there is exhortation. The church is asked to pray for Paul, and attention is drawn to those Christians who had abandoned their daily work and were living off their good-natured friends. Paul strongly condemns this idleness and the consequent nuisance-value of the idlers (3:1–16). There is a brief closing greeting (3:17–18).

These comments on 2 Thessalonians have been made in terms of the ostensible historical context of the document as a genuine letter from Paul to the church at Thessalonica. On this view of the situation we have to assume that in the period after the writing of 1 Thessalonians a kind of 'apocalyptic fervour', whose origins can perhaps be detected in 1 Thessalonians, developed further in the church. Paul does not deal with it in terms of castigating directly or indirectly a group of opponents, as in some other letters; rather he writes to believers who may have been misled by a misinterpretation of his teaching.

Such a situation appears to be quite plausible. Yet many commentators disagree. They detect a sharp contrast between the emphasis on the nearness of the second coming in 1 Thessalonians and the stress on the 'not yet' in 2 Thessalonians. This fact then alerts them to other peculiar features which they detect in the letter—the lack of personal, concrete allusions, the peculiar repetition of phrases from 1 Thessalonians, some differences in language and thought and so on. Numerous scholars think that these differences are incompatible with the traditional understanding of the letter as Pauline. They judge attempts to solve some of the problems by arguing that the letters were written in reverse chronological order, or that they are compositions of fragments originally written in a different order, to be inadequate. The only solution which will do justice to these peculiarities, so it is argued, is that the letter is a later composition by another writer who wished to use Paul's name to correct his teaching or false inferences from it, perhaps even to claim this letter alone was authentic (cf. 3:17) and that 1 Thessalonians was to be rejected. One major weakness of this view is that its supporters have not offered a convincing and plausible reconstruction of the circumstances in which such a letter could have been composed—and directed to Thessalonica in particular. Again, the language used to refute the claim that the day of the Lord had already arrived is so cryptic that it is hard to envisage a later writer expressing himself in this fashion if he wanted to persuade his readers. Although it must be granted that there are some oddities in the language, structure and thought of the letter, it is fair to say that the difficulties in regarding the letter as written by someone other than Paul are greater.

The message of the letters

Both letters contain ample teaching about the gospel and the character of a young church which can be developed to show how Christians should live and witness today. Nevertheless, some contemporary Christians who are conscious of a long—and lengthening—period of church history rather than of their days being numbered may feel that the framework of Paul's theology with its stress on the future coming of the Lord and above all on the sense of its nearness, with all the implications that this has for Christian living, is unrealistic. Yet Christians today may too easily assume the permanence and independence of their own collective existence in a secure universe and fail to realize that at every moment they depend upon the Lord's mercy and live in the light of his coming. If God shattered the time-space framework of the universe by coming into it in the person of his incarnate Son, surely he can and will bring human history to a consummation by a future intervention to establish his everlasting reign in justice, peace and love. Paul also makes it plain that Christians are not meant to spend their time doing nothing and waiting for the Lord to come. Rather, they must prepare for his coming by showing the qualities of Christian living, faith, love and hope.

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Thessalonians, BST (IVP, 1991).

L. Morris, The Epistles of Paul to the Thessalonians, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1977).

———, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1977).

F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, WBC (Word, 1982).

I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, NCB (Eerdmans, 1983).

Outline of Contents

1:1–2	Opening greeting
1:3–12	Opening thanksgiving
2:1–17	Instruction about the day of the Lord
3:1–16	Instructions for life in the church
3:17–18	Closing greeting

Commentary

1:1–2 Opening greeting

The greeting is, as might be expected, very similar to that in 1 Thessalonians, but here Paul speaks of God as our Father, and explicitly names the Father and the Lord Jesus as the source of grace and peace. (See also the article on Reading the letters.)

1:3–12 Opening thanksgiving

Paul begins a letter of encouragement to a church facing hostile pressure from people outside with a prayer-report. It begins with words reminiscent of 1 Thessalonians 1:2–3 and shows that the church was growing in basic Christian qualities, so that his thanksgiving was no empty formality. Rather, it gave him grounds to speak highly of them among other churches for their steadfastness in coping with persecution. Thus Paul used them to encourage other churches in a similar position.

5 Then Paul digresses further from his prayer-report to comment on the significance of the situation. God's righteous judgment in the present time is seen in the twofold outcome of persecution. The two results are intertwined in vs 5–10.

On the one hand, God's judgment is seen in the fate of those who persecute his people (vs 6, 8, 9). At the coming of the Lord Jesus they will be repaid with the treatment they gave to others. In this way God vindicates his own people against their oppressors and also makes it clear that those who do not obey the gospel come under judgment. It should be noted that God's people must not avenge themselves on those who attack them (Rom. 12:17–21), and that God's action is not one of taking vengeance but of upholding justice. God cannot be accused of acting unjustly or ungraciously towards them. Those who are judged are those who have rejected a gospel whose content is, 'When we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son' (Rom. 5:10); they have refused the loving offer of God. The traditional language of blazing fire (Ex. 3:2; Is. 66:15) expresses symbolically the coming of God in judgment against both Gentiles who (wilfully) do not know God and Jews who (also wilfully) do not obey the gospel. Everlasting destruction is linked with exclusion from the Lord's presence and from sharing in his glory (cf. Is. 2:10. Paul, as elsewhere, applies an OT text about Yahweh to Jesus).

On the other hand, there is vindication of God's people (5, 7, 10). If they stand up to persecution, he considers them worthy to enter his kingdom (in the future, as in 1 Thes. 2:12), and he regards it as only just to grant them relief from their sufferings, along with the persecuted missionaries (see 3:2), at the parousia of Jesus. God's blessings are thus associated with Jesus when he comes with his angels (cf. 1 Thes. 3:13). He will be surrounded by his holy people and glorified by them (later it is shown that they share in his glory; see v 12; 2:14). They will be filled with admiring wonder, sharing in the occasion precisely because they accepted and believed the witness to the gospel given by the missionaries.

11–12 The digression serves to indicate the motivation for Paul's petitions to God about the readers. Since steadfastness in the Christian life depends upon the continual gracious action of God and the faith of his people, Paul continually prays that God will enable his people to demonstrate the reality of their faith in action and so make them worthy of his calling. Such conduct will lead to praise being offered to Jesus, and his people will share in the glory and honour given to him. It is possible that Paul here describes Jesus as both God and Lord (but note that NIV relegates this interpretation to the mg.; cf. Rom. 9:5; Tit. 2:13; 2 Pet. 1:11).

2:1–17 Instruction about the day of the Lord

The major teaching section of the letter is difficult to understand for two reasons. First, it is Paul's reply to problems that had arisen in the church due to misunderstandings of his teaching, and, secondly, the language which he uses is cryptic for people who do not know what he said orally to the readers (5).

1–2 The problem was centred on the coming of the Lord Jesus, which figured so centrally in 1 Thessalonians. Paul had taught that it was near, possibly within his own lifetime, and that it would involve the gathering together of God's people from all over the world to remain with him from then onwards (cf. 1 Thes. 4:17; Mk. 13:27). Now some people were saying that the day of the Lord has already come. For them the 'day' was an extended period which would culminate in the coming of the Lord, and probably they saw their present persecution (1:4–5) as the last stages of opposition to the kingdom of God. Their teaching was unsettling to people, causing excitement as well as uncertainty, and no doubt distracting people from normal living. In support of their claim they said that Paul himself had taught it, though he was not certain whether they were citing a prophetic oracle, a piece of oral teaching or a letter. The words supposed to have come from us are often taken to suggest that a forged letter of Paul was around. It is, however, improbable that people produced letters in Paul's name at this time, and it is more likely that the phrase refers to any of Paul's utterances from which people might have drawn false inferences.

3–4 Paul's reply is essentially to repeat his oral teaching (v 5) that the day of the Lord cannot come before certain other events have taken place. Much of what he says echoes the teaching of Jesus in the discourse recorded in Mk. 13, and like Jesus he warns strictly against being misled by false teaching (Mk. 13:5). It may be that people were being misled about the time of the Lord's appearing or they were mistaking an impostor for the Lord (cf. Mk. 13:6, 21–22). Other things must happen first, especially the rebellion and the revealing of the man of lawlessness. These two probably belong together; what the man of lawlessness does constitutes the rebellion. Rebellion was used in Jewish literature especially for opposition to God (1 Macc. 2:15), and the thought of a great outbreak of evil against God in the world generally was a familiar theme. An apostate church is not the primary thought here. The man of lawlessness is a Hebrew form of expression for 'the lawless person' (v 8), and suggests, again, opposition to God. A man (possibly an 'incarnation' of Satan) is probably in mind, and he may be the same as the 'antichrist' (1 Jn. 2:18). To say that he is revealed suggests that his coming is an evil parody of the coming or revelation of the Lord. Already at this point Paul assures his readers that this man is doomed to destruction before describing what he will do. Basically he will oppose all religions and God himself, and make himself an object of worship (cf. Dn. 11:36 for the language; it is not necessarily a prophecy of the same person). That he will sit (or will attempt to sit) in God's temple is variously interpreted. It may mean he will sit in the Jewish temple (destroyed in AD 70) or in a future rebuilt temple. Alternatively the temple may be a metaphor for the church. More probably, however, the imagery, which is drawn from Ezk. 28:2 and reflects the stories of Antiochus and Pompey who both entered the Jewish temple, is to be taken metaphorically of the totalitarian claims of the rebel.

5–7 From Paul's previous teaching the readers should now be able to recollect why the rebel has not yet appeared. He will be revealed at the proper time but presently there is something (neuter in v 5, but masculine in v 7) holding him back (or possibly ‘holding sway’). At present, to be sure, rebellion against God is active, but in a hidden way, and this will last only until the restraining force is removed. Then, it is implied, the rebel will act openly—and the Lord will come to defeat him. But what is the restraining force? Some have taken it to mean the Roman emperor (or the forces of law and order typified by him). Others think that it refers to Satan or some other evil force which is presently in power, but will step aside when the rebel comes. Another interpretation is that it means that God himself, through some heavenly agency or the Christian gospel or the church, restrains the power of evil. (Jewish literature referred to the holding back of Satan and the evil powers by a heavenly being until the end of the world; cf. Rev. 7:1–3; 20:1–3.) Although no solution is free from difficulty the latter one causes the fewest problems. Till he is taken out of the way obviously does not refer to God being forced off the scene but to his withdrawal of whatever it is that restrains the power of evil until the moment for the final showdown.

8 When the Lord appears, the rebel will be destroyed. OT imagery is used to express the power of the Lord (Is. 11:4). Calvin suggested that the breath of his mouth was simply his word. In any case, a literal battle is not being described. Splendour (Gk epiphaneia) is a word used for the powerful coming of God in judgment (cf. 2 Sa. 7:23).

9–12 Paul’s last point, however, takes us back to the rebel and constitutes an important warning. His coming (Gk parousia) will be a satanic parody of the real thing with all kinds of impressive accompaniments (cf. Rev. 13:13) that imitate the power of Christ and his followers (cf. Rom. 15:18–19)—but they are false and deceptive. These happenings will lead astray people who are on the way to destruction, because they have closed their minds to the truth of the gospel which alone can save them and so they are open to receiving nonsense. The sad fate of the lost is thus ultimately their own responsibility. What God does is to confirm them in their evil ways by making them impervious to the truth which they have rejected and open to persuasion by lies. The end of it all is judgment, and again it is emphasized that this comes when people throw in their lot with evil and reject the truth. There can come a point when a person who has rejected the gospel is no longer able to turn away from a headlong course leading to destruction.

13–14 There is a warning here for Christian believers not to start out on the path that leads to disaster. It is, however, overshadowed by an eloquent statement of Paul’s conviction that this should not happen to the readers. Any uncertainty about their own salvation should be overcome by a recollection of their Christian status. Paul puts his remarks in the form of another prayer-report (vs 13–14). He thinks of his readers as people loved by the Lord, i.e. Jesus, the one who is to come in judgment on unbelievers. He is associated with the Father who chose you to be saved. From the beginning places this act in the distant past (cf. Eph. 1:4) and has the effect of suggesting that a plan made so long ago is not going to be lightly altered now. The plan is brought to pass by God’s action, here called sanctification (i.e. the setting aside of the readers as God’s people and his transformation of their lives by the power of his Spirit), and by the faith of the readers in the gospel (contrast v 12). In order that these two complementary processes might begin, God called the readers in and through the preaching of the gospel (cf. 1 Thes. 1:4–5; Gal. 1:6–7). The final purpose of the call is that believers may be given a share in the glory of Christ (cf. Rom. 8:17, 30).

15 On the basis of their Christian standing Paul encourages the readers to stand firm in their faith—not only in face of persecution (1 Thes. 3:8) but also in face of false teaching. They must hold fast to what they have been taught by Paul, both during his visit to Thessalonica and in his letters. Here Paul is probably drawing a contrast between the correct interpretation of his teaching and the false inferences which had been drawn from it (2:2). What Paul taught was literally ‘traditions’ (RSV), a word which brings out the fact that Paul’s teaching was based on what he himself had been taught, the common faith of the early Christians (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3).

16–17 The future of the Thessalonian Christians depended not only on the work of God and their own response but also on the prayers of their friends. Paul backs up his exhortation with a prayer, expressed in the third-person form (cf. 1 Thes. 3:11–13). It conveys incidentally that Jesus (named first) and the Father are the joint source of spiritual blessings. It reminds the readers that God loves them and so has given them encouragement and hope for the future—despite the fearful events mentioned earlier in the chapter. It asks that God will continue to encourage them in their hearts and make them resolute in acting and speaking in ways which demonstrate the reality of their faith.

Paul’s teaching in this chapter was meant to warn his readers that the end was not as near as they thought and to encourage them to stand fast despite the dreadful event that still lay ahead. Its message to Christians today is that they should not be concerned to identify ‘signs of the end’ but should be alert to the moral and spiritual issues which arise in times of persecution and temptation to abandon faith in the Lord and his coming.

3:1–16 Instructions for life in the church

A series of general instructions for the church in its mission and life follows. There are two main topics, prayer for Paul’s mission (vs 1–5) and the danger of idleness (vs 6–16).

1–5 Finally is not necessarily a sign that the letter is about to close immediately, but marks a transition to a new topic. Paul repeats his request for prayer (cf. 1 Thes. 5:25). Here it is motivated by the continuing need for the gospel to spread swiftly and victoriously like a runner racing in a stadium. This picture was already applied to God’s word in Ps. 147:15. The word is honoured when people receive it with faith and thanksgiving. A further matter for prayer is that Paul himself might be rescued from the opposition of perverse and evil people (cf. Rom. 15:31); he probably has Jewish opposition principally in mind (cf. 1 Thes. 2:16). The rather obvious comment for not everyone has faith, which indicates why there is opposition to the gospel, prepares the way for Paul’s statement that the readers themselves need, and will receive, the strength to cope with their own problems. Behind the various forms of opposition for the readers Paul sees the figure of Satan, the evil one. With this affirmation of God’s faithfulness to his people in mind, Paul can express his confidence that the readers will do what he commands. The things we command may be Paul’s instructions in general or perhaps his specific request to them to pray for him. Then follows yet another third-person prayer which is for the readers to show in their lives the same kind of love as God shows and the same steadfastness as Christ showed.

6–10 The second section moves to a topic which had arisen previously in 1 Thes. 4:11–12; 5:14. It makes clear that the problem of certain members of the church living in idleness off the generosity of others went back to the time when the church was founded (10). Evidently there were people who were living on the poverty line and relied on the gifts of the richer people. The belief that the day of the Lord had come may have encouraged their attitude. This way of life was giving the church a bad name, and therefore Paul speaks out strongly against it. V 6 begins with a sharp command (cf. 1 Thes. 4:11), backed up by the authority of the Lord, that the church members must avoid those whose conduct is unworthy. The latter are not to be deprived of their place in the church, but there is to be a certain distancing from them so that they recognize that their conduct is not acceptable or in accord with the established teaching of the church handed on by Paul (1 Thes. 4:1–2). That teaching was illustrated concretely in the way of life of Paul and his fellow-missionaries whose conduct is here put forward as an example to follow. The missionaries did not live in a disorderly or idle manner (cf. 5:14 note), and they had not therefore needed to receive gifts of food from people in the church. (NIV without paying for it suggests that they did pay for it. More likely Paul means that they did not ask for or receive free gifts of food from the church but went to the shops and bought what they needed.) It should be needless to say that this does not mean that the missionaries rigidly refused to accept hospitality when they were offered it. Rather, they had worked hard to avoid being a nuisance to other people (cf. 1 Thes. 2:9). This was despite the fact that Paul believed strongly and taught that churches had an obligation to provide for their teachers (1 Thes. 2:6b; 1 Cor. 9:4–6, 14; Gal. 6:6). For the sake of the situation in Thessalonica Paul gave up this privilege. There were thus more reasons than one why Paul worked with his hands while carrying on his missionary work. His example matched the instructions which he gave (the tense used suggests ‘repeatedly’). Although the command has the form of an instruction to the well-off not to give to the idle hungry people, it is primarily meant as a warning to the latter. It is worth repeating that the proverb-type saying applies to people who are unwilling to work, not to those who have no opportunity, and is therefore not an argument against welfare provision for the unemployed.

11–12 The curious form of v 11, We hear that ... is really a way of speaking directly to any people in this category without naming names. (Paul probably knew who the persons were.) The NIV brings out well the deliberate play on words not busy ... [but] busybodies. Instead of working themselves, they were keeping other people back from their work. They are very sharply commanded—again on the authority of the Lord—to avoid being nuisances to other people (NIV, settle down; cf. 1 Thes. 4:11), and to work hard so as to be able to buy what they need. It has been nicely summed up: ‘Stop fussing; stop idling; stop sponging’ (William Neil).

13 Then by contrast Paul addresses the rest of the church and, despite the danger of their being taken advantage of by the idlers, tells them not to tire of doing what is right (cf. Gal. 6:9). In this context it must mean that they are not to give up on caring for the needy even if sometimes people take advantage of them.

14–16 Nevertheless, despite Paul’s repeated instructions in this letter, it was possible that some people might continue in a way of life that was out of harmony with the gospel. In that case, discipline was to be used as a last resort. An offender was to be warned, a somewhat vague expression, which does not go so far as indicating that the person was to be struck off the church roll. (Perhaps it was more like the referee taking a player’s name at a football match.) There was to be no fellowship with such a person. In the light of 1 Cor. 5:9–11 this most probably refers to exclusion from the common meal which was an especially significant part of the church’s life. Such exclusion, however, was meant to be remedial, to make people feel a sense of shame and lead to their repentance. It is emphasized that the act of disciplining must not lead to the intrusion of any spiteful and hostile attitudes; the persons being disciplined are brothers (and sisters) and the aim must be to ‘admonish’ (rather than warn) them. The procedure is thus one to be carried out as far as possible in a spirit of love, for the good of the offender, but at the same time the church’s ethical life is not to be compromised.

It is striking that Paul concludes a section which deals with an incipient cause of tension in the church with a benediction or prayer for God to give his blessing to the readers. The language reminds us of 1 Thes. 5:23, but, here, as elsewhere in this letter, he replaces ‘God’ with the Lord (i.e. Jesus). Peace is an appropriate wish here; it includes, but is not confined to, the absence of strife and disorder.

3:17–18 Closing greeting

Following normal custom Paul takes the pen from his scribe to write this greeting. These words are in themselves the actual greeting: cf. GNB, ‘With my own hand I write this: Greetings from Paul’. The greeting in Paul’s own hand is a distinctive mark that the letter is his and therefore the teaching and instructions in it carry his authority (cf. 1 Thes. 5:27; 1 Cor. 16:21–23; Gal. 6:11 for similar comments). It is most unlikely that it is meant to distinguish this letter from forgeries, for who would forge Pauline letters at this early date?

18 The closing benediction is identical with 1 Thes. 5:28 with the addition of all: neither followers of mistaken teaching nor idlers are excluded from the grace of the Lord.

I. Howard Marshall

THE PASTORAL LETTERS

Introduction

The persons addressed

Although these letters are generally known as the Pastoral Epistles, this name has been used only since the eighteenth century. The description is rather a matter of convenience than of accuracy, since the letters are not manuals of pastoral care. Timothy and Titus were both close associates of Paul, and these letters addressed to them are the only such letters included in the NT. There is no knowing how many other such letters, if any, the apostle wrote. The one to Philemon is in a class of its own.

Timothy is mentioned not only in Acts but also in many of Paul’s other letters. It is probable that he was converted to the Christian faith during Paul’s first missionary journey. He was closely associated with the apostle on the second and third journeys. In Phil. 2:19–20 Paul speaks warmly of Timothy’s care and concern. It is small wonder, therefore, that two personal letters are preserved addressed to Paul’s well loved companion.

It is strange that Titus is not referred to at all in Acts, but he is mentioned in Gal. 2:1, 3, where we learn that he was a Greek, and in 2 Cor. 8:23, where Paul describes him as his partner and fellow-worker (cf. also 2 Cor. 12:18). Of Paul’s two companions, Titus appears to have been the stronger personality, for in 1 and 2 Timothy there are various allusions to Timothy’s rather timid nature.

Authorship

All three letters are said to have been written by the apostle Paul. There is no evidence from the early church to the contrary. But since the early nineteenth century many scholars have disputed that Paul wrote the letters as we now have them. There have been two main types of alternative theory, one treating the letters as fictional and the other claiming that some genuine Pauline material has been included. Both these theories necessarily regard the letters as pseudonymous, that is, ascribed to the apostle but written by someone else. It is generally held by those claiming non-Pauline authorship that this procedure was quite acceptable in those days and would not have incurred moral blame. But this is disputable. What then are the reasons which have led to theories of non-authenticity?

1. The historical references in the letters

These presuppose that Paul had recently visited Ephesus and Crete. The problem arises because it is difficult to fit these allusions into the Acts story. It is assumed by some that Paul was released from the imprisonment mentioned at the end of Acts, and that the events referred to in the Pastorals happened after that release. Paul must then have been rearrested at a later date and ultimately martyred. Many scholars, however, reject this view because there is no supporting evidence for it outside these letters. Attempts have been made, therefore, to fit the historical references into the Acts history, but this is by no means straightforward. Those who do not find either of these reconstructions convincing simply treat all the historical references as fictional and make no further effort to relate them to the Acts story.

2. The mention of church officials

It is claimed that the references in the letters to ‘overseers’ (sometimes translated ‘bishops’) and ‘elders’ reflects a period later than the apostolic age. Again there are wide divergencies in the various theories. It is difficult to be sure what these titles signified at different stages in the church’s early history, and the Pastorals do not make any real distinction between them. The argument, therefore, is inconclusive. But would the real Paul have needed to give instructions to his personal assistants about the qualities needed for church officials? If we regard these letters as semi-public, there is no difficulty in supposing that Paul wished to emphasize in writing what he must already have instructed his assistants to do.

3. The references to false teaching

Some suppose that these references belong to the period of developed heresies in the second century and cannot, therefore, relate to the time of Paul. But the evidence does not support such a theory, for there is no relationship between the myths and genealogies referred to in the Pastorals and the later gnostic heresies. Paul’s main concern was to warn his colleagues not to waste their time over these false teachings. If, as is supposed by some scholars, these letters were written to answer the second-century heresies, why are there not more direct references to the type of error then prevalent? A fair conclusion would be that the false teaching supplies no guide to the dating of the Pastorals.

4. The doctrinal position

The doctrinal position reflected in these letters is said not to conform with that of the apostle Paul. This conclusion is reached by comparing the theology of the other letters of Paul and the theology of the Pastorals. It is claimed that there is so much that is characteristic of the other letters which is absent from the Pastorals that to attribute them to Paul is out of the question. There is, however, a fundamental weakness in this argument. It takes no account of the difference in the people addressed or in the purpose of the various letters. Paul must not be expected to include the sum total of his theology in every letter he wrote. There is nothing in the Pastorals which conflicts with the theological position reflected in the other Pauline letters. The absence of such themes as the righteousness of God or the indwelling of the Holy Spirit must be considered against this background. What is less easy to explain is the occurrence of what appear to be stereotyped statements introduced by some such expression as 'This is a faithful saying', which occur nowhere else in Paul's letters. But does this rule out Pauline authorship? To do so it would need to be demonstrated that Paul would not have used such statements, and the evidence is simply not sufficient to prove this.

5. Language and style

Arguments based on language are generally thought to be conclusive against the authenticity of these letters. Yet even here there are different ways of weighing the evidence. Admittedly, many new words are used in these letters which occur nowhere else in Paul's writings and there are several which do not occur anywhere else in the NT. The important question is, however, whether Paul would or would not have used them. Since there are contemporary examples of the use of all but a handful of the words, there is no reason why Paul could not have used them. Arguments based on word usage are inconclusive.

Rather more stress has been placed on style, and again various methods have been used to determine this. Some have appealed to the use, or lack of use, of words such as prepositions, while others have resorted to word frequencies or sentence length. Generally speaking, any statistical calculations of style are seriously hampered by the smallness of the sample available in the pastoral letters. Some scholars who on other grounds are favourable to Pauline authorship incline towards some kind of 'secretary hypothesis' to account for the change of language.

Even if these lines of evidence are assumed to be sufficient to conclude for non-Pauline authorship, there is still the problem of what prompted anyone to write these letters in Paul's name and what led him to choose three. So far no satisfactory account has been given, and in its absence it would not seem unreasonable to adhere to the traditional view that Paul wrote these letters to his close associates for a specific historic purpose.

Date

The date of the Pastorals is inextricably bound up with their authorship. If Paul did not write them, then almost any date between the fifties of the first century and the beginning of the second century is possible. As we have seen, some scholars conclude that these letters were written so late that Paul could not have composed them. In their view, the date of these letters resolves the question of authorship. But if Paul was the author, perhaps using a secretary, then the most likely date for their composition is the mid-sixties (the exact years are disputed), when Paul was imprisoned in Rome. On this view, it is common to hold that Paul was released from the imprisonment mentioned at the end of Acts but was shortly rearrested and finally martyred, and that some of the events referred to in the Pastorals took place during this brief period of liberty. Certainly, 2 Timothy sounds as if it was written by someone who knew that his time was short.

Purpose

Of the three letters it is easiest to set out the purpose of 2 Timothy, for this letter was clearly written while Paul was awaiting the result of his trial. It is an urgent request to Timothy to try to reach him while there was still time. There are some personal requests in 2 Tim. 4 relating to a cloak, some books and parchments. The whole letter is an encouragement to Timothy to carry on his work of ministry.

In 1 Timothy the purpose seems to be to give some guidance on such matters as the choosing of church officers and the resisting of false teaching. Paul states his purpose in 1 Tim. 3:14–15. He clearly intended to provide Timothy with necessary guidance should he not meet him again soon. In Titus a similar situation is in view, for as Timothy was left with the responsibilities at Ephesus, so Titus had an even more demanding job in Crete. The letter would, therefore, have helped to strengthen Titus's hand in carrying out his difficult task.

Canonicity

There is strong evidence for the use of these pastoral letters in the early church. The parallels in the church writers are no more than allusions, but this is equally true of some of the other Pauline letters. Some parallels exist between these letters and 1 Clement, which would support their use before AD 95, although some scholars dispute this conclusion. Certainly, Polycarp seems to have quoted from two of them, and after his time there is strong support not only for their use but for their authority.

Two lines of evidence are, however, often cited to dispute the early canonicity of these letters. One is the fact that Marcion excluded them from his canon (mid-second century AD). Since Tertullian states that Marcion 'cut them out', it seems reasonable to maintain that he knew of them but disapproved of them. From Marcion's canon, it is clear that he was highly selective. The other line of evidence cites the fact that the pastoral letters do not appear in the Chester Beatty papyri. The evidence for the use and authority of these letters is so strong, however, that doubts raised from this kind of evidence are insufficient to outweigh the opinion that these letters were preserved and treasured at an early date as genuine letters of the apostle Paul.

Theology

Although some of the great Pauline themes are missing from these letters, there are many doctrinal passages which are wholly in line with Paul's theology. They have a high view of God, especially seen in the remarkable doxology in 1 Tim. 1:17. His Fatherhood is mentioned, as is his role as Saviour (1 Tim. 4:10; Tit. 1:3; 2:10, 13; 3:4) and as righteous Judge (2 Tim 4:8).

The references to Christ are equally in line with Paul's usual teaching: his humanity (1 Tim. 1:15), his patience (1 Tim. 1:16), his saving work (2 Tim. 1:10; Tit.2:13; 3:6), his mediatorship (1 Tim. 2:5–6) and his resurrection (2 Tim. 2:8).

There is less reference to the Holy Spirit than in most of Paul's letters, but his work is not passed over. The predictive work of the Spirit is mentioned in 1 Tim. 4:1, and he is said to have entrusted the truth to Timothy and to be dwelling within him (2 Tim. 1:14). He is responsible for the work of regeneration and renewal (Tit.3:5).

The Pastorals make clear that salvation is the result of the divine mercy mediated through faith (1 Tim. 1:16). There is in fact nothing in these letters which is contrary to Paul's teaching elsewhere.

See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

J. R. W. Stott, The Message of 1 Timothy and Titus BST (IVP, forthcoming).

———, The Message of 2 Timothy, BST (IVP, 1973).

D. Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1990).

G. D. Fee, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, NIBC (Hendrickson, 1988).

1 TIMOTHY

Outline of contents

1:1–20

Paul and Timothy

1:1–2	Personal greeting
1:3–11	The gospel and its counterfeits
1:12–17	Paul's personal experience of Christ
1:18–20	A charge and a warning to Timothy

2:1–15

Worship and women

2:1–8	Public worship
2:9–15	Advice to Christian women

3:1–13

Requirements for church officials

3:1–7 Qualifications of overseers

3:8–13 Qualifications of deacons

3:14–16

God’s household

4:1–16

Approaching threats

4:1–5 The nature of the threats

4:6–16 How Timothy is to deal with the threats

5:1–6:2

Instructions about various classes

5:1–2 Various age groups

5:3–16 Instructions about widows

5:17–20 Elders

5:21–25 Personal advice to Timothy

6:1–21

Miscellaneous instructions

6:1–2 About slaves and masters

6:3–5 About false teachers

6:6–10 About money

6:11–16 About seeking the right things

6:17–19 About wealth again

6:20–21 Concluding words to

Commentary

1:1–20 Paul and Timothy

1:1–2 Personal greeting

Paul begins, as in his other letters, with a reference to his apostleship. He establishes his authority by mentioning his special calling by God. Paul did not appoint himself and was not, therefore, writing on his own authority. He knew himself to be an apostle of Christ Jesus, using a form of wording which stresses that Jesus was Christ, i.e. Messiah. He expresses God's part in it in a strong manner, the command of God, showing Paul as a man under orders. Note how Paul refers to God as Saviour, a thought which appears elsewhere in these personal letters.

The description of Timothy as my true son in the faith points to the intimate relationship between the two men and suggests also that it was through Paul that Timothy became a Christian. The linking of grace and peace in the opening of Paul's letters is normal, but here he includes mercy as well (as in 2 Timothy). Paul speaks of God as Father (so familiar in his other letters) and of Jesus as Lord, which echoes the words of an early Christian confession (cf. Rom.10:9).

1:3–11 The gospel and its counterfeits

3–7 First, Paul reminds Timothy of the occasion when he left him at Ephesus with a particular task, which involved commanding others not to teach false doctrine. Wrong doctrines were already being circulated at this early stage in the church's life, and this is a reminder that in every age truth is challenged by counterfeits. There is much about false teachings in this letter and in the one to Titus. Whereas these were specific to the times, they throw light on certain principles which are still relevant today in dealing with some types of wrong teaching. Whatever is meant by myths and endless genealogies (4), it is clear that Paul regarded them as the very opposite of the serious content of the gospel. In view of the fact that in Tit. 1:14 Paul mentions 'Jewish myths', it is probable that he had in mind mythical histories, like the Jewish Book of Jubilees. Note the contrast between controversies and God's work. There was an unproductiveness about the false teaching which was the opposite of true faith. Paul draws attention to certain characteristics about the people who were promoting this teaching—their lack of meaning and their unsuitability to be teachers (6–7). What strikes us is the irrelevance of their teaching. Sandwiched in the centre of this passage (5), we find Paul's statement about the nature of Timothy's task (to produce love) and his advice on the nourishing of it (purity, a good conscience and faith). The test of a good discussion is not that we have enjoyed a verbal battle but that it has promoted mutual understanding and love; sincere, openhearted and based on faith.

8–11 In v 7 Paul mentions the desire of these false teachers to be teachers of the law and this leads him to discuss the nature and purpose of the law. Paul concedes here (as in Rom. 7:12) that the law is good, although elsewhere he makes clear that it cannot lead to salvation. The main function of the law is to condemn lawbreakers (9–11). The negative side of the law is most prominent. The various types of offenders mentioned are all those against whom the law can operate, as they have committed specific offences. Paul singles out extreme examples, but at least no-one could deny the point he makes—that all these offences are contrary to ... sound doctrine.

Although the law has been superseded by the gospel, Paul does not deny that it has a continuing function. He gives a positive definition of sound doctrine as that which conforms to the glorious gospel of the blessed God (11). This means either that the gospel consists of a glorious theme or that it is provided for by a glorious God. The emphasis here seems to fall on God rather than on the gospel, but the divine origin of the gospel is undeniable. This is fully in line with Paul's view of the gospel in his other letters.

1:12–17 Paul's personal experience of Christ

Paul wants Timothy to know how highly he regards his calling to the service of Christ. This would have been an encouragement to him. Paul's letters are full of sudden outbursts of praise to God. This thankfulness was spontaneous. Here is a realization of God's mercy against the background of the past. Once a blasphemer and a violent man, Paul rejoices that God has chosen him for his service (12–13). The book of Acts provides the commentary here, for it describes Paul's ruthless persecution of the Christians before his dramatic conversion (Acts 8–9). He never forgot the wonder of God's choice of him. The word used here for service is very general and covers the many aspects of the apostle's work. His recollection of what he had done through ignorance and unbelief served to heighten his awareness of the mercy and grace of God. What struck him was the abundance of that mercy. It reminds us that God does not hold our past against us when we are in Christ Jesus.

Some have found difficulty in Paul's appeal here to a trustworthy saying (15), since he does not use this phrase outside the pastoral letters. There is, however, nothing here which is at variance with Paul's teaching elsewhere. The fact that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners is at the heart of the gospel. But when Paul refers to himself as the worst of sinners (16), is he being over-dramatic? There is no need to think so in the light of the previous mention of his violent persecution of the church. His appreciation of the mercy of God was deepened by his own experience as a persecuter of God's people. Those who are most conscious of their previous opposition to God usually become the most vocal in their understanding of God's unlimited patience. Such people become exhibits of what God can do. The apostle could not have realized the full extent to which God's mercy to him would lead others to faith in Christ, but he shows some glimpse of it. The trustworthy saying still deserves full acceptance as a concise summary of the main thrust of the gospel.

The sudden doxology in v 17 is worth noting, for it has several significant features. Only here does Paul call God the King eternal (lit. 'King of the ages'). The phrase may have come from the Jewish idea of the two ages—the present age and the age to come. The other adjectives used, immortal and invisible, draw attention to the exalted nature of God, and the description only points to his uniqueness.

1:18–20 A charge and a warning to Timothy

Paul now addresses a personal word to Timothy described as this instruction. The word used conveys a sense of urgency and is in the context of a military metaphor. But what were the prophecies once made about Timothy? Probably the allusion is to predictions regarding him which preceded his call to the ministry, perhaps given at his commissioning. It is clear that Timothy's ministry had the support of other Christians apart from Paul himself. The fight the good fight metaphor is paralleled in other letters (cf. Eph.6:10–18), and finds another echo in 2 Tim. 4:7. Paul was aware that the Christian life is a spiritual conflict. For faith and a good conscience (19) cf. v 5.

The change of metaphor from a fight to a shipwreck is striking (19–20). The case of the two men mentioned is sad, for the shipwreck was caused by a definite rejection of faith. But what does Paul mean by handing them over to Satan? This is admittedly difficult, but the best solution seems to be to regard the church as God's domain and the unbelieving world as Satan's. Those who do not believe forfeit any right to remain in the Christian community. But Paul leaves the door open for them if they can be taught not to blaspheme. Some have seen this allusion as meaning the infliction of physical disaster, after the parallels in Acts 5:1–11 and 1 Cor. 11:30. But it is better here to think of moral and spiritual discipline. Paul addresses the same kind of question in 1 Cor. 15. Church discipline today is anything but uniform. Some church leaders may be too authoritarian; others seem to exercise no discipline at all. Paul's emphasis is on the church's responsibility for its erring members and also for the general good of the whole body.

2:1–15 Worship and women

2:1–8 Public worship

Paul is here concerned that the right approach should be made to public worship, especially to public prayer. He uses a number of words to denote prayer (1), but there is not a great deal of difference between them. Two important considerations which stand out are the inclusion of thanksgiving and the wide scope of the subject-matter. Not only is Paul anxious to include everyone, but draws special attention to those exercising authority (2). What is significant is that Paul makes no distinction between those rulers that are just and those that are not. He sees it as a Christian duty to pray for those whose actions affect every citizen. But the purpose of the prayer is that Christians may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness (2). There are many cases, however, where the environment has been anything but peaceful but where in spite of this much godliness has developed.

There is an unexpected interjection in vs 3–7 in which Paul makes a theological statement. The connection between universal prayer and the statement about God's desire that all men might be saved is not at first clear, but the link seems to be in the relation of the everyone in v 1 and the all men in v 4. But does this statement support universalism? It could be argued that what God wants must surely come to pass. But it is important to remember that both the OT and the NT speak of God's 'desire' or his 'will' in quite varied ways, determined by the context. Sometimes God's 'will' cannot be distinguished from his decree: what he wills to happen, happens. At other times God's 'will' is his command (e.g. 1 Thes. 4:3). At still others, it refers to his stance. The God who cries, 'I take no pleasure in the death of anyone ... Repent and live!' (Ezk. 18:32) is also the one of whom it is said that he wants all people to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth.

It is of course possible to array these statements in some sort of contradictory pattern. In fact, they are part of a consistent biblical picture in which God is presented as simultaneously utterly sovereign and distinctly personal. To set his sovereignty over against his personal interaction with us his image-bearers is to destroy the biblical portrayal of God. In the context of 1 Tim. 2, Paul is anxious to stress divine compassion towards all people irrespective of race, status or condition. Probably he is combatting a tendency towards elitism that tries to limit God's compassion inappropriately. Whatever Paul and other NT writers say about election, certainly it is integral to early Christian preaching that God desires all to come to a knowledge of the truth.

A second statement of a theological nature immediately follows (5–6). The first part emphasizes the unity of God in a way that would gain the support of both Jews and Christians. But the second statement is specifically Christian in drawing attention to the unique mediatorship of Jesus Christ. The mediator idea is not prominent in Paul, but it comes to the fore in the letter to the Hebrews. Here it is linked with the idea of Jesus giving himself as a ransom (6), reminiscent of the words of Jesus in Mk. 10:45. The ransom metaphor is drawn from the slave market, where a slave could obtain his freedom if someone paid the ransom price. Presumably, the proper time referred to here is the fullness of time mentioned in Gal.4:4. When Jesus came to bring salvation to humankind, it was the turning point of world history.

Paul's reference to his appointment as a herald (7) echoes his constant awareness of the special commission which he had received. The additional reference to his position as a teacher ... to the Gentiles points to a strong personal conviction of his special place in God's plans.

In the concluding sentence (8) Paul returns to the theme of public prayer, drawing attention to three important conditions. First, the lifting up of holy hands suggests a believing approach, true holiness being attainable only through the righteousness of Christ. Secondly, true prayer cannot exist side by side with anger. Thirdly, prayer and disputing do not go together. Our attitude to others does affect our approach to God.

2:9–15 Advice to Christian women

Since this section follows immediately after the section on public worship, it has been suggested that the discussion about women must be regarded in this light. It seems probable, however, that Paul is thinking of the behaviour of women in a wider context, but the connection with the previous section must not be overlooked.

Paul first considers the matter of dress and ornaments (9–10). It seems that some women were drawing too much attention to themselves by the way they dressed. Bearing in mind the greater freedom that women had as a result of the gospel, there was no doubt need for advice on the way they were to present themselves. Paul urges modesty, decency and propriety, which are all against extravagance. Advice is given about such practical details as hairstyles, jewellery and dress. Paul is not against any of these things, but urges the greater value of a godly life. In other words the good deeds are to be more eye-catching than the outward appearance.

The second matter with which Paul deals (11–15) has given rise to much debate, since some have claimed that he is anti-women. But a careful understanding of what he teaches does not support this. If we suppose that women, newly emancipated through faith in Christ, had begun to dominate men and were in danger of bringing the church into disrepute, Paul's advice becomes more intelligible. Women must first learn in quietness and full submission (11). Had Paul experienced unruly interruptions in public worship by women? The prohibition of women teaching men (12) seems to belong to the same context, although Paul here appeals more to what is appropriate and cites the Genesis story of creation.

Two facts are brought out—Adam’s priority and Eve’s weakness in being deceived. The first (13) points to God’s creative act in forming man before woman, although Paul does not here refer to the fact that Eve was intended as man’s helper and in no way inferior to him. According to Genesis it was Eve who was first tempted and fell (14), but Adam cannot be absolved of all responsibility. Indeed, in Rom. 5 Paul places the introduction of sin into the world firmly on Adam. Nevertheless, he here sees some significance in the part Eve played in the fall and implies that all women have somehow inherited this disadvantage.

It is v 15, however, which poses the most difficulty. Paul transfers his thought from Eve to women in general. But what does he mean by the words women will be saved through childbearing? If no more is meant than that in spite of Eve’s part in the fall, childbearing by women will not be adversely affected, this would fit in well with the Genesis account. But the addition of the words if they continue in faith are then perplexing, for it cannot be supposed that Christian women are promised any greater safety than others. Another possibility is that the childbearing refers to the special childbearing seen at the birth of Christ, in which case Paul is saying that through Christ will come salvation to women. The difficulty here is that women are in no different position from men as far as the basis of their salvation is concerned, although it may be that Paul only mentions women here because he is reflecting on Eve’s part in the fall.

The linking of faith, love and holiness with propriety is worth noting, since it provides a concise summary of Christian living. These qualities are certainly not confined to women. The application of these biblical truths to present-day church life causes much dispute. If we say that Paul was culturally conditioned, so that if he were writing today he would emphasize only the equality of the sexes, we make God’s revelation dependent on transitory fashion—changing from year to year. And who can tell what Paul would write were he here today? If, on the other hand, we insist on a precise application of each feature of first-century practice, we run the risk of being irrelevant to modern life and even ridiculous. Our task is carefully to discern the basic biblical principles which do not change and apply them sensitively to our present situation, bearing in mind that it is better, in the last resort, to appear ridiculous than to be disobedient to God’s loving purposes.

3:1–13 Requirements for church officials

3:1–7 Qualifications of overseers

The word overseer is not to be identified with ‘bishop’, although the later bishops exercised the role of oversight. The idea of an authoritative office such as seen in the role of bishop throughout Christian history does not belong to NT thought. Paul was writing of those whose job it was to supervise, but who did not possess an independent authority. There is no suggestion that there was only one bishop in each church and certainly no suggestion that an overseer, as happened in the case of the later bishops, would supervise several churches. But why does Paul cite a trustworthy saying (1)? Since this appears to be a commonly known saying, he was probably here using it to underline the importance of the overseer’s office for the benefit of those who were underestimating it. Paul sees the work as a noble task.

Such an office needs the right kind of people to fit it. It must be remembered that the early Christians came from numerous different backgrounds, and this accounts for the seemingly elementary character of some of the requirements, especially the negative ones in v 3. There are conditions about the personal life of prospective candidates. They must be temperate, self- controlled, respectable (2). They must be above reproach. All these qualities are to be expected in any serious Christian person but especially so in Christian leaders, for anyone whose moral and spiritual qualities do not commend them to their contemporaries are not going to have much influence as Christian ministers, and if they do, it is likely to be destructive.

In addition, the minister's domestic life is equally important—he must be the husband of one wife (2) and must manage his children well (4). The former requirement would exclude any bigamists, but it is best to interpret the words as a condition that the minister must set a high example in marital relationships. Paul is not here dealing with the problem of those who were polygamists before they became Christians. It must nevertheless be recognized that positions of responsibility within the Christian church require people whose example others can follow.

The second requirement about managing his own family is especially worth noting since Paul seems to see the home as in some way typifying the church (5). Unruly homes do not offer the right kind of training experience for ruling the church. This is a principle which has often been overlooked when choice of prospective ministers has been made.

Further requirements are mentioned in vs 6 and 7. A recent convert is excluded, because of lack of Christian experience. It is worth noting that in the similar list in Titus this requirement is omitted, presumably because the church was so recent that it would have been difficult to apply. Where possible it is clearly undesirable for new Christians to be given too much responsibility until they are established. Paul especially mentions the danger of conceit. The same judgment as the devil is probably the best way to take the words which literally mean 'the judgment of the devil', which could possibly be the judgment meted out by the devil. The NIV translation is to be preferred in view of the stress here on pride. A new convert in an exalted position may be tempted to fall into the same conceit as the devil did.

Another requirement is a good reputation with outsiders. Paul knows the danger of appointing officials whom their contemporaries will not respect. A great deal of damage has been done by those whose inconsistent living has been noticed and criticized by the non-Christian world. But what is meant by the devil's trap? It seems best to understand this as the trap that the devil sets for those who do not match up to their Christian commitment, rather than the trap into which the devil himself fell, i.e. pride.

3:8–13 Qualifications of deacons

Paul mentions deacons in conjunction with overseers in Phil.1:1, and it is clear that the two offices were closely connected. Indeed the list of desirable qualities stated here is akin to that for overseers. Again, worthiness of the respect of others is of utmost importance, as are sincerity and general moral standards. Since candidates for both offices must be those not indulging in much wine, this suggests that excessive wine drinking was a problem among the people of Ephesus. Of greater importance is that the deacons must be of sound faith (9), a point often overlooked in appointments to the lesser Christian offices. For Paul the theological position was crucial. The testing referred to in v 10 is presumably by the Christian assembly to ensure that the necessary qualities are evident.

V 11 looks like an interlude, and some have suggested that it points to an order of deaconesses. Although such an order is not impossible, the primary reference is probably to deacons' wives (as the NIV). These must be serious in mind and careful in speech lest they detract from their husband's work. The remaining requirements for deacons are closely paralleled in the section on overseers. Does the excellent standing (13) mean standing in the sight of the Christian community, or in the sight of outsiders, or in the sight of God? Of these the second seems most likely, not in the sense of providing for future promotion, but in exerting influence. This accords best with the reference to their assurance of faith.

3:14–16 God’s household

Here Paul breaks off his direct instructions to describe the nature of the church, putting his teaching into perspective. It is highly likely that Paul had already given the gist of these instructions to Timothy, but he wrote them down so as to give Timothy support during his absence. The use of the household metaphor to describe the church echoes v 5 and explains why Paul is concerned that an official should govern his family well. He now enlarges on the illustration by introducing a double metaphor—pillar and foundation (15).

Paul is not here laying more stress on the church than on the truth. If the meaning is that the church’s job is to bear witness to the truth as well as combating the false teachers, the word translated foundation must be understood in the sense of a ‘bulwark’ set to defend the truth.

The introduction here of what appears to be a hymn is unexpected. But it sums up what Paul describes as the mystery of godliness (16). He uses the word mystery in the sense of a secret which has now been revealed, but nowhere else does he link it with godliness. In view of his stress on service, he must have in mind the practical aspects of godliness. He assumes that the greatness of the mystery will be self-evident.

There is some question about the opening of the hymn since some texts read ‘God’ instead of He. The gist of the hymn is clearly related to Christ although he is not mentioned. It may be that he was referred to in an earlier part of the hymn, now lost. The first line points to the incarnation. There is also some dispute about the meaning of the second line (was vindicated by the Spirit). This could refer to the human spirit of Jesus (in which case the words should be translated ‘in the spirit’) and the statement would then point to his vindication by God at the resurrection. This would provide a good parallel with the first line. Less probably it could speak of the Holy Spirit as the agent in the vindication.

The third line is also difficult. It could be understood to refer to the glorification of Jesus, although this thought occurs in the sixth line. It could also refer to the triumphant Christ showing himself to the fallen angels, but this does not fit the context so well. It is not unlikely that a parallel was intended between lines 3 and 6, in which case the former interpretation is to be preferred. Certainly, lines 4 and 5 belong together, the preaching among the Gentiles and the believing in the world both refer to the apostolic ministry illustrated in Acts. It has been suggested that line 5 could be understood as ‘throughout the world’, but this is less likely. The concluding line was taken up in glory could refer to the ascension, but this would be strange after the reference to preaching. Perhaps all that is intended is to end with the glory of the Christ who is preached.

4:1–16 Approaching threats

4:1–5 The nature of the threats

There is here another prediction about false teachers, who are to come in later times (i.e. later than the apostle’s own time). We note first that the Spirit is the revealer of these (1). He brings to mind the teaching of Jesus (cf. Mk. 13:22). Paul himself had previously been led by the Spirit to expect false teachers (cf. 2 Thes. 2:1–12). There is a connection here with the hymn just quoted in that the false teaching will challenge its substance. Paul connects the opposing teaching with deceiving spirits and demons, and sets out in the clearest possible way the contrast between the Spirit mentioned in 3:16 and 4:1 and the Satanic activity described immediately afterwards.

What is said about the false teaching here is threefold (2–3). First, it comes through hypocritical agents. They are propagating falsehood instead of truth, although the suggestion is that they think they are advancing truth. Their consciences are so hardened that they have ceased to be able to distinguish between the two. The second feature is the prohibition of marriage, and the third is the insistence on certain food restrictions. These features were common among groups which stressed the value of abstinence as a means of salvation. Paul's answer to this gives a positive rebuke to those who refuse what God has intended. Marriage is an ordinance of God, and foods are provided by the Creator. Believers should receive it all with thanksgiving (4). This is in harmony with the Jewish requirement that before the eating of food there should be a benediction. Any teaching which involves a niggardly view of God is to be rejected. If the word of God and prayer in v 5 refer to the saying of grace before meals, the reference to the word would be to the use of Scripture in the grace. But the allusion may be to the creative word of God in Gn.1.

4:6–16 How Timothy is to deal with the threats

What Paul advises Timothy has relevance for all servants of God called on to deal with wrong teaching, although the advice here is of special value for dealing with errors similar to those Paul is countering. Timothy is to point out to the Christian brethren what Paul has just said about the approaching threat (6). In order to do this effectively Timothy must draw on his knowledge of the truth. (For an echo of this cf. 2 Tim. 3:15, where his early training is mentioned.) To this must be added the value of the tuition he has received from the apostle. Paul assumes that Timothy will know how to deal with the false teachers. He thinks it necessary to warn Timothy about wasting his time with myths and tales which have no basis in truth (7). Clearly, Timothy will require wisdom to distinguish between what he needs to point out and what he needs to avoid. Paul makes a comparison between physical and spiritual exercise as a comment on training in godliness (8). Although the value of the former is recognized (was Timothy inclined to neglect it or to make too much of it?), it is surpassed in value by godliness, which has a future as well as a present value.

A problem arises over the trustworthy saying in v 9, for it is not certain whether this relates to v 8 or v 10. V 10 contains the more theological statement and could well have formed a proverbial saying. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that the second half of v 8 has the nature of a proverbial statement and that v 10 is really a development of this. The two verbs labour and strive are both strong verbs and suggest that godliness deserves the utmost effort in its pursuit. When Paul says that God is the Saviour of all men and then singles out believers in a special way, he seems to be using the word Saviour in the sense of both preservation and spiritual salvation. In 2:3–4 Paul stresses the universal scope of salvation, but here he focuses on the need for faith for its realization. The theme of hope in God is a frequent one in Paul's writings. Here the basis of the hope is the living God, which is reassuring since there is no possibility of any change in him.

The remainder of this section is directly addressed to Timothy. Irrespective of his personality, there is to be a note of authority in his teaching (11). The apostle is clearly anxious for Timothy's teaching to convey the same kind of authority as his own. But he recognizes there may be a problem owing to Timothy's youth (12). But youth need be no hindrance provided the behaviour inspires confidence. Paul gives guidance here in five areas. Speech is important but must be linked with life, that is a combination of right words and right actions. Add to this combination of outward qualities, the inward qualities of love, faith and purity and this sums up the example of an acceptable Christian life.

V 13 recommends three public activities. The reading of Scripture is presumably public reading with a view to instruction of the hearers, few of whom would have been capable of reading for themselves. This practice carried on the procedure of the synagogue, where public reading of Scripture formed an important part in Jewish worship. The word translated preaching represents the Greek word for ‘exhortation’, while the word for teaching is in all probability related to the passing on of Christian doctrine. All three of these activities are of the greatest relevance to the Christian pastor.

Following these positive recommendations there comes a negative one—Do not neglect your gift (14). The gift (charisma) is connected with the endowment of Timothy by the Holy Spirit at his setting aside for service. While this took place at the laying on of hands, the most important aspect was the gift itself. There may be a suggestion here that Timothy was not making the fullest use of his spiritual gifts, but since the word is in the singular it is best to suppose that his gift of ministry is particularly in mind. The laying of hands on Saul and Barnabas at the commencement of their missionary labours (Acts 13:1–3) furnishes the background for the present statement, since it was also connected with prophecy and the Spirit. Timothy is reminded of the occasion when he was set aside for ministry and is urged to take courage from it (see also 2 Tim. 1:6).

In vs 15–16 Paul suggests ways by which Timothy can develop the gift mentioned in v 14. Paul puts emphasis here on wholeheartedness. The word translated be diligent could mean meditate, but the more usual meaning is ‘practice’, which draws attention to the value of persistence, an echo of the idea of athletic training alluded to in v 6. The Christian minister cannot avoid being in the public eye, and whatever progress or otherwise that he makes will be witnessed. Paul is expecting Timothy to make real progress.

The watching and persevering of v 16 reemphasize the same point. Paul is not urging self-examination but constant alertness, both in life and doctrine. The two things belong together. Right doctrine without a godly life is of no value; while a godly life without right doctrine is not possible. Paul was aware of the danger of neglecting his own salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 9:27). If the minister does not take care to persevere, others are unlikely to be influenced by him.

5:1–6:2 Instructions about various classes

5:1–2 Various age groups

A general principle is here set out which applies to people of different ages. Timothy is to treat other people as he would members of his own family. This principle excludes the idea of superiority and promotes a more natural approach. The verb rebuke used here is a strong one implying censure, and this is to be avoided with older men. Paul adds a caution about the younger women, where the maintenance of purity in relationships is essential.

5:3–16 Instructions about widows

5:3–8 Needy widows. Paul is concerned first about widows with no means of support. At a time when there was no welfare state the alleviation of poverty was a real problem and Paul recognized that the Christians had a responsibility in this. But if a widow had a family to support her it would clearly have been wrong for the church to intervene. Indeed, family support is pleasing to God. Social responsibility is seen as a religious requirement. The teaching here is in line with the fifth commandment, requiring the honouring of parents. In v 5 Paul is describing a needy widow of a particularly devout kind who is prepared to rely on God. This description is no doubt intended to contrast vividly with the pleasure-loving widow of v 6.

Paul was aware that there were widows who lived for pleasure. He certainly did not expect the church to provide for such a life-style, particularly if any element of immorality is implied by the words. The idea of being dead even while she lives is paradoxical, but the deadness is spiritual. Timothy is to give clear instructions in such matters so as to help such women to avoid blame. In this essentially practical issue Paul is not only concerned for the individual but also for the impact of a bad example on the believers as a whole (7–8). Failure of Christians to provide for their own families is seen to have disastrous consequences—a denial of the faith and an example worse than unbelievers. In no stronger terms could Paul have expressed the importance of social responsibilities within Christian families.

5:9–10 Widows in Christian work. It is not clear whether there was a distinct order of widows which performed specific duties, but the statement here about the enrolment of widows over sixty might suggest that. The age limit is somewhat perplexing, since Paul surely did not mean that no widows under that age were entitled to the church's help. The enrolment must have been for some kind of specific Christian work. The past experience required is of an essentially practical kind. It reflected on the vital social impact of Christian women in the early church.

5:11–16 Younger widows. The younger widows presented a different problem because of the possibility of remarriage. This excluded them from the official list mentioned in v 9. There is no suggestion here that any younger widow who was poverty-stricken would not qualify for some help. Paul seems to be thinking of those who offer for Christian work (as dedication to Christ suggests; v 11) but who would be placed in a difficult position if they wanted to marry. This is the understanding of their first pledge in v 12, that is their commitment to some kind of Christian work. If they forsook this to marry they would incur censure (judgment). The twin dangers of idleness and gossiping may be connected with their visiting programme (13). In other words, they could not be trusted with confidences, although why young widows are specially singled out for this warning is not clear.

The positive advice for younger widows to marry and to devote themselves to domestic responsibilities (14) may seem to contradict Paul's preference for the unmarried state (cf. 1 Cor. 7:8–9), but it should be remembered that these widows would have been classed among those who could not 'control themselves'. Again Paul's major concern is to avoid reproach on the church. The reference to the enemy (14) and to Satan (15) points clearly to the possible results of the younger widows acting in an unwise way. Satan is ever ready to seize opportunities to slander God's work.

Paul again states here what he has already said in vs 4 and 8 to the effect that relatives should help widows, rather than that the church should be burdened (14–16). The responsibility for helping widows in the family was not necessarily left to women (as v 16 might imply). Some of the ancient scribes realized the difficulty and emended the text to include the men.

5:17–20 Elders

This is the first mention of elders in this letter, but it is clear from the context that they are church officials and not simply men of advanced age. The term is sufficiently wide to include both overseers and deacons, already mentioned in 1:3. The double honour (17) is somewhat perplexing. It would seem that some kind of remuneration is in mind, and the double could stand for generous provision. On the other hand, the use of the word honour may suggest that more than remuneration is in mind, and that respect as well as salary is included. The quotations (18; one from Dt.25:4 and the other paralleled in Lk.10:7) are intended to support the idea of reward for work done, a principle which has not always been followed in the history of the Christian church. This linking of an OT quotation with a saying of Jesus is significant since it reflects the high regard in which the teaching of Jesus was held.

Yet Paul recognizes that more than financial support is needed. An adequate moral standard must also be maintained. But care must be taken over any accusations (19–20). The two or three witnesses are to ensure some kind of protection against false accusation from a single individual. This advice follows the normal Jewish practice. Where evidence for malpractice is forthcoming it must be presented publicly, i.e. before the whole church. Paul again shows his concern for the reputation of the church. Discipline is not only for the benefit of the individual but to provide a warning for others.

5:21–25 Personal advice to Timothy

The charge in v 21 is expressed in a surprisingly strong manner. Why the solemnity? Perhaps Timothy was not too strong at doing things without partiality or favouritism. Perhaps he was too weak to take the advice in vs 19–20. In the light of a similar strong charge in 2 Tim. 4:1 (but without reference to angels) we may wonder why angels are mentioned here. It is possibly an allusion to the belief that angels watched over human affairs (see e.g. Mt. 4:6, quoting Ps. 91:11–12; Mt. 18:10).

The warning against hasty laying on of hands (22) could refer to the ordination of elders or to the restoring of those who have had to be disciplined. The second part of the verse suggests that those who lay hands on unworthy people share the responsibility for their unworthiness. The personal advice to Timothy to keep himself pure reinforces this, for purity is required of those who lay the hands as well as those on whom the hands are laid.

The advice about purity is immediately followed by advice about drinking wine (23), and this may suggest that Paul may have been afraid that Timothy would get caught up in the ascetic practices of the false teachers. There may be, however, no connection between this verse and the preceding one. The reference to water-drinking is possibly because Timothy's ailments had been caused by contaminated water or perhaps because he was under tension. We do not know. Paul does not advise against drinking any water and suggests the supplementing of a little wine. Timothy's health was evidently not robust.

It would seem that vs 24–25 follow from v 22. Paul mentions two different aspects of sins. Some sins are easily recognizable, and no-one is surprised at the subsequent judgment on them. Others are described as those which trail behind them. These sins may not be at once apparent but will nonetheless be revealed later. The judgment here is most probably the judgment of God rather than the judgment of Timothy and others. The setting of good deeds in contrast to sins is intended to highlight the need for caution in assessing good deeds as well as sins.

6:1–21 Miscellaneous instructions

6:1–2 About slaves and masters

In the early history of the church there were many Christian slaves and some Christian slave owners in the communities, and it was essential that right relationships should be maintained where both slaves and masters were on equal terms within the Christian fellowship. On the one hand, some Christian slaves continued to serve under non-Christian masters, and these were required to treat those masters with full respect. As so often in this letter, the concern is to maintain both the honour of the name of God and of the Christian doctrine. In these early times any action or attitude which caused others to think less of what the church stood for was to be avoided.

It was perhaps even more difficult for Christian slaves with Christian masters to strike the right balance, since they were also Christian brothers and sisters. But Paul suggests that in such cases the slave should give better service because a brother in Christ was to benefit from it. On the other hand, it was possible that the slave himself would also benefit. This is not to deny that the system itself should have been challenged, but in those days it was not immediately practical to overturn it.

6:3–5 About false teachers

Paul cannot leave the subject of those who are leading others astray, and he comes back to the theme here. He assumes that there will be a clear dividing mark between what is false and what is sound. This is salutary in any age where there has been a blurring of understanding of Christian doctrine. Paul has no place for compromise. His description of the false teachers is specific—they are conceited, they lack understanding, they have an unhealthy interest in controversies, and they are thoroughly evil in their speech and attitudes (4). He could not have been more devastating. What he says illustrates a universal principle—that teachers without adequate understanding or moral calibre are not likely to maintain sound doctrine. Further, where godliness is seen as a means of financial gain, it will never lead to truth. But the matter of gain is a theme of its own and Paul comes to this next.

6:6–10 About money

The important element in v 6 is contentment. Godliness in itself brings great satisfaction. The Christian gospel provides an adequate basis for contentment. This translates the idea of gain into spiritual terms and provides a fitting introduction to the discussion of money. The reference to food and clothing (8) echoes the words of Jesus in Mt. 6:25–34 in a passage on worry, the antithesis of contentment. Material possessions are seen in their true light, only in view of their irrelevance either at entry to or departure from this world (7). There is a parallel here to Jb.1:21.

The quest for riches brings with it temptation, a trap and many harmful desires (9). Looked at in the light of death the whole process of seeking riches looks foolish. The consequence of ruin and destruction (i.e. irretrievable loss) shows the futility of the pursuit of wealth for its own sake. When Paul describes the love of money as a root of all kinds of evil (10), it is important to draw a distinction between money itself and the love of it. As a commodity there is nothing wrong with it, but when it becomes the object of overriding desire it leads to evil. There is no suggestion that love of money is the sole or even main cause of evil. Paul's concern here is to point out the spiritual risks involved in money-grabbing. This is what he means by wandering from the faith. Paul does want us to see, however, that wherever any kind of evil occurs, money easily gets mixed up with it. Illicit sex becomes the business of prostitution; the problem of drug abuse is as strongly empowered by money as it is by addiction; the love of power is inevitably tied to the deployment of wealth, and so on. It is significant that Paul speaks of those concerned as having pierced themselves with griefs. The results are seen as self-inflicted—the inevitable result of loving the wrong thing.

6:11–16 About seeking the right things

Here is Paul's solemn charge to Timothy himself. There is both a negative and a positive side (11). The fleeing from all this, although primarily referring to the seeking after wealth, probably includes all the previous advice about what to avoid. The positive side is expressed in spiritual terms. The six words of v 11 sum up the character of the Christian of which Timothy is to be an example. Paul adds to this another positive appeal—the Christian life involves a fight (12). When Paul urges Timothy to take hold of the eternal life to which you were called he is thinking more of the final enjoyment of that eternal life rather than of its initial acceptance.

It is perhaps surprising to find a reference to Pontius Pilate in v 13, but the historic event of the trial of Jesus provides the best example of the kind of good confession which Paul wants to see in Timothy. The fact that he gives a charge shows how seriously he regards the matter of Timothy's behaviour. This command has given rise to various suggestions. Some see it as referring to some kind of baptismal or ordination charge, but this does not fit the context. It may refer to the advice of vs 11–12 or to the whole of Paul's advice to Timothy in this letter. The reference here to the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ (14) gives a future aspect to the preceding statement. The idea of being without spot or blame at that appearing can be paralleled elsewhere in Paul's letters (cf. 1 Cor. 1:8; Phil. 2:15–16; 1 Thes. 3:13; 5:23).

The insertion of a doxology at this point (15–16) is typical of Paul. But there are features here which are unusual. The use of the word blessed is not found elsewhere in Paul's letters outside the Pastorals. Indeed the whole doxology has the appearance of a Christian hymn which Paul is quoting. The description of God as only Ruler is unexpected as the word Ruler usually refers to a prince rather than a king, but here it clearly carries a unique meaning as the word only shows. Since King of kings and Lord of lords occurs in Rev. 17:14 and 19:16, it may have been a well-known Christian expression. There are parallels in the OT (cf. Dt. 10:17, Ps. 136:3). The use of the word immortal for God has already appeared in 1:17. Is Paul implying that no-one else has immortality? He seems to mean that God alone is inherently immortal, whereas all other immortality is derived. The idea of God as living in unapproachable light is probably derived from Ps. 104:2, but Paul may have had in mind the vivid description of God's glory in Ex. 33:17–23, since Moses was informed that he could not see God. The combining of honour and might ('power') in a doxology is also found in Rev. 5:13.

6:17–19 About wealth again

The previous section concerned those desiring to be rich, but this concentrates on those who are already rich. Paul points out two dangers—arrogance and dependence on money. It is too easy for those who have material possessions to imagine that money will secure anything, and a true hope in God is ousted. There is no suggestion here that riches themselves corrupt or that people should not enjoy what God has given. But recognition that everything has come from God would deal with the dangers. The positive demands on wealthy people are clear—there must be goodness and generosity, qualities which normally accompany each other.

The statement in v 19 is reminiscent of the teaching of Jesus in Mt. 6:20. There is here a mixture of metaphors between treasure and a good foundation. But the contrast is clear between life propped up by material resources and true life which will continue in the age to come.

6:20–21 Concluding words to Timothy

Timothy has already been charged to guard what has been entrusted to him. Paul evidently feels it is of such importance that he must underline it. Again he warns against getting involved with the false teaching. The words falsely called knowledge may echo the claim of the teachers to special ‘knowledge’ in the same way as the later Gnostics. The words translated opposing ideas was used by the later heretic Marcion to describe his teaching. But it was no doubt similarly used at a much earlier date, and certainly the false teaching alluded to in Colossians shows that similar teaching was current in Paul’s lifetime. The fact that Paul describes the false teaching as a wandering from the faith shows it to be a false trail. It is noticeable that the concluding greeting Grace be with you is in the plural, which may suggest others besides Timothy were included. But it was not unknown for the plural to be used for an individual.

2 TIMOTHY

Outline of contents

1:1–18

Encouragement to be faithful

1:1–2	Greeting
1:3–5	Thanksgiving
1:6–10	Developing the gift
1:11–12	Paul’s personal testimony
1:13–14	A charge to Timothy
1:15–18	Paul and various associates

2:1–26

Special advice to Timothy

	2:1–13	An appeal to Timothy
	2:14–26	Becoming an approved workman
3:1–17		Predictions and charges
	3:1–9	Predictions concerning the last days
	3:10–17	Further charges to Timothy
4:1–22		Paul’s farewell to Timothy
	4:1–5	A concluding charge
	4:6–8	A personal testimony
	4:9–18	Personal remarks
	4:19–22	Final greetings

Commentary

1:1–18 Encouragement to be faithful

1:1–2 Greeting

There is a slight difference between the opening of this letter and that of 1 Timothy. Here Paul refers to his apostleship as by the will of God, a fact which he is never tired of repeating. When he adds according to the promise of life, the words have a double meaning, referring to a future hope as well as to a present reality. The description of Timothy as my dear son adds a note of particular intimacy.

1:3–5 Thanksgiving

Whereas it was normal in letters to include a thanksgiving, here alone in the Pastorals does Paul do so. His mention of his forefathers shows the importance he attaches to the Jewish heritage through which the Christian faith came. It is typical of the apostle to assure his readers of his constant prayers for them. It may seem somewhat exaggerated for him to claim to do this day and night, but see Acts 20:31 for a similar all-inclusive claim. There is no denying the importance that Paul attached to prayer. Included in his thanksgiving is remembrance of Timothy's tears and a recollection of his sincere faith. Those tears of Timothy speak of his strong attachment to the apostle, which is clearly returned by Paul himself. A reunion is highly desirable. Where emotions are strong, tears and joy can exist side by side.

Paul was evidently acquainted with Timothy's mother and grandmother, for he knew of their faith (5). Although it is not impossible that Jewish faith is meant, it makes better sense of the context if Christian faith is in mind. We may at least conclude from 3:14 that Timothy's home environment was not only devout but well governed by understanding of the Scriptures. Nevertheless, Paul is convinced that Timothy should not rely on parental faith but possess a faith of his own.

1:6–10 Developing the gift

Although Paul uses a metaphor drawn from the fanning of the embers of a waning fire to encourage Timothy to develop his gift, we may not infer from this that Timothy's faith was on the wane. Paul may have been thinking that he needed stimulating to put to the fullest use the gift received at his setting aside for the ministry. This gift was clearly connected with the Holy Spirit, as v 14 shows, and was therefore more than a natural gift. It is worth noting that even with the gift of the Spirit some human cooperation is needed if the flame is to be fanned. That Timothy was of a timid disposition seems clear from v 7, whereas the Spirit brings power, love and self-discipline. The Spirit does not turn a timid man into a powerful personality, but he provides the resources necessary for each situation.

The next section (8–10) shows something of the application of the last. Timidity is apt to foster shame and Paul warns against this. The appeal to Timothy to join him in suffering for the gospel is a poignant reminder that Paul was a prisoner when he wrote this letter. The mere mention of the gospel leads the apostle to reflect on God's power and salvation. He connects up several themes here—God's power, salvation, holy living, God's purpose and grace. The statement that it is not because of anything we have done is characteristic of Paul's awareness that salvation is all of grace. Timothy is reminded that suffering in the cause of such a truth is to be expected, but it will be by the power of God not in one's own strength.

Paul develops the idea of grace (9–10). It is centred in Christ Jesus; it is of ancient origin (before the beginning of time); it is revealed through the incarnate Christ who has destroyed death. Paul is clear that all this has come about, not by human efforts but by the free favour of God. His concept of the gospel is rooted in God's provision of life and immortality. These wonderful provisions of God have become clear through the gospel, which has thrown light upon them.

1:11–12 Paul's personal testimony

Why should Paul need to remind Timothy of his commission to preach the gospel? He has also mentioned this in 1 Tim. 2:7. It may be that the reminder is intended to encourage Timothy. If the great apostle, with his clear sense of mission, has nevertheless been called on to suffer, Timothy must not be surprised if the same happens to him. V 12 is a great affirmation which has proved an inspiration to many. Having urged Timothy in v 8 not to be ashamed, Paul now affirms that he himself is not ashamed of his suffering. He is buoyed up by the conviction that God is able to guard what Paul has entrusted to him. His assurance here is based on his personal knowledge of God. Paul leaves no room for lack of assurance. His conviction here amounts to a virtual certainty.

But what has Paul entrusted to God? The Greek speaks of ‘my deposit’. Some have seen it to relate to what God has entrusted to Paul, i.e. his commission or his doctrine, and this would be in agreement with the use of the same word in v 14. But the preceding passage would be better served by regarding Paul’s ‘deposit’ as something Paul is entrusting to God, i.e. himself and the success and continuation of his mission, everything in fact that is dear to him. The words for that day must refer to the day when Paul knows he must give account of his stewardship. He was living and working in the light of the final day of reckoning, but was sure that he could entrust the result to God. This was intended to bring real encouragement to Timothy.

1:13–14 A charge to Timothy

Paul is conscious still of the threat of the false teachers and is mindful of giving Timothy support to combat the threat. The most urgent thing is for Timothy to keep (lit. ‘hold’) as the pattern of sound teaching, defined as what you heard from me. Paul need not be implying here that this amounts simply to passing on his own teaching, for he makes clear elsewhere that teaching was passed on to him (cf. 1 Cor. 15:3). Timothy’s task is to guard the deposit in the sense of keeping it safe. Paul is acutely aware that this can be achieved only through the help of the Spirit, who is the true guardian of the truth.

1:15–18 Paul and various associates

His reliance on Timothy reminds the apostle of his experience with certain others, some of whom had not proved so dependable. He assumes Timothy will be aware that everyone in the province of Asia had deserted him. Such widespread desertion must have been traumatic for Paul. The special mention of Phygelus and Hermogenes (15) may suggest that these were the ringleaders.

Onesiphorus had been much more encouraging. Paul speaks of him in the past tense, and it is not clear whether he was still around, since the reference is to the household of Onesiphorus. But there is no need to separate Onesiphorus from his household. Paul mentions several ways in which this man helped him, and especially he mentions that he was not ashamed of Paul’s chains and had actually searched hard for him in Rome. Twice Paul prays for mercy for him (16, 18), the second time relating it to that day, which must refer to the judgment day of Christ. In view of the reference to Onesiphorus’s help at Ephesus, it would seem that he was a consistent helper of the apostle.

2:1–26 Special advice to Timothy

2:1–13 An appeal to Timothy

2:1–7 A call to be strong. In some ways Timothy is to contrast strongly with those who have deserted the apostle. The idea of being strong occurs in Eph.6:10. In view of the opposition to the gospel, a strong approach is always necessary. But the strength is in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, which means with the support of God's unmerited favour, not in reliance on natural ability. It is not clear what Paul has in mind when mentioning many witnesses. Some see a reference to the witnesses at Timothy's ordination, but the translation in the presence of is not the most natural understanding of the Greek preposition used here. It is more likely that the reference is to the many witnesses who could testify to the kind of teaching that Paul had given to Timothy. The instruction to entrust it to other teachers is important for our understanding of the development of the early church. Specially selected men who possessed the two qualities of faithfulness and ability to teach were to be set apart for the task of handing on the teaching. Paul intended that this important task should be properly regulated.

The three illustrations which follow (3–6) are designed to encourage Timothy to persevere even if the task is difficult. The military metaphor shows the duty of singleness of purpose; the athletic one the need for abiding by the rules; and the agricultural one the certainty of some reward for the hard work involved. All three metaphors, drawn from everyday life, complement each other. Paul urges such reflection on this because experience would throw further light on it, as the Lord gave insight (7). The following words suggest that Paul is here speaking from his own experience. The passage of nearly two thousand years has not blunted the sharpness of these everyday parallels.

2:8–10 Reflections on suffering for the gospel. In v 8 Paul gives a very brief summary of his gospel. It consists of three elements: Jesus was the Christ, God's anointed one, the Messiah; he was raised from the dead (a statement which naturally involves his death); he was descended from David. The only other place where Paul mentions this fact is Rom. 1:3. It may have been included here to draw attention to the fulfilment of God's promises. As an isolated statement it would be inadequate as a summary of the gospel, but Timothy would be well able to fill in the gaps.

Paul sees his own chains as contrasted with the unchained character of God's word (9). By this he must mean that in spite of his own chains, the gospel will nevertheless be preached by others. When in v 10, Paul states that the reason for his endurance is for the sake of the elect, he sees his own sufferings against the background of those who would come to faith in Christ as a result of the preaching of the gospel. Perhaps his reference to the salvation that is in Christ Jesus is intended to distinguish it from the kind of salvation offered by the false teachers. The words in Christ Jesus not only define the salvation as Christian, but also show it to be the possession of all those who are in Christ. Note that elsewhere Paul links salvation with glory (cf. 2 Thes. 2:13–14).

2:11–13 A trustworthy saying. It is clear that the saying here quoted consists of the following verses, since these verses are in rhythmic form. They look like part of a Christian hymn (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16 and 6:16–17). But what is the connection between this hymn and the preceding verses? Possibly it follows on from the thought of future glory. The four sections of the hymn speak of a future which will offset the present sufferings. The 'dying with him' is reminiscent of Rom. 6:8, which uses the expression of baptism. The linking of dying with living represents the Christian's identification with Christ's death and resurrection.

The second statement about endurance connects with v 10 and brings the assurance of future victory. The thought is exactly parallel to Rom. 8:17. The warning about disowning him and being disowned by him echoes the warning of Jesus in Mk. 10:33. The concluding statement, however, is reassuring. Christ's faithfulness is not dependent on our faithfulness, because he cannot act contrary to his own nature. This hymn therefore ends on an optimistic note, based on the character of Christ. If, as suggested above, this is part of a fuller hymn, we cannot guess what the missing parts contained. But Paul was content to quote that part which served his immediate purpose of reassuring Timothy.

2:14–26 Becoming an approved workman

The these things in v 14 must be more than the truth of the hymn in vs 11–13. It includes all the teaching that Paul has given Timothy in this letter. That Paul treats this injunction very seriously is seen in the words before God. The apostle is deeply conscious that quibbles about words are a waste of time and wished to warn Timothy against this. It is not always recognized that trivial debates are harmful, but Paul uses a strong word here (ruins), which emphasizes the disastrous effect on others. V 15 is a gem of positive advice to the person of God. The aim is to produce an approved workman (i.e. approved by God). This requires effort—yet no-one can do more than his or her best. There are two requirements—an unashamed approach and a right handling of the word of truth. The latter will reinforce the former. The Greek verb translated correctly handles really means cutting a straight road and suggests straightforward exegesis. This must be the aim of all true teachers of the word. ‘Reading into’ the text what is clearly not there is of help to nobody but is depressingly common.

The thought of a right understanding of the word leads Paul to reflect again on those who deviate from it (16–19). The threatening alternative teaching, described as godless chatter and compared to gangrene in its effects, must be avoided. The example of Hymenaeus and Philetus is cited and the gist of their error stated—that the resurrection had already taken place. It is noteworthy as an unusual instance in the Pastorals of specific false teaching being mentioned. In spite of the harmful effects of this kind of teaching, Paul stresses the positive truth that God’s solid foundation stands firm. A question arises about the identity of the foundation. Is it the church as a whole, the Ephesian church in particular, or the whole truth of God, including his saving work? The third possibility is to be preferred, although elsewhere Paul uses the metaphor in relation to the church. It would seem that the inscriptions referred to in v 19 are from Nu. 16:5, 26, although the second is not a precise quotation and could come from Is. 52:11. The ‘seal’ is used elsewhere by Paul as a sign that something is true (cf. Rom. 4:11; 1 Cor. 9:2).

The illustration in vs 20–21 continues the building metaphor in v 19. But Paul now concentrates on the utensils used in a great house. The various materials out of which they are made stand for different purposes, some noble, others ignoble. The application here is somewhat confused, for wooden vessels are as necessary as golden and in fact are more frequently used. But Paul thinks of Christian workers as precious in God’s sight. Yet what does Paul mean by cleansing from ignoble use? Perhaps the best explanation is that Paul is still thinking of Hymenaeus and Philetus (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7 for a parallel use of the verb meaning to purge or cleanse). Here Paul is looking at the situation positively. Note the descriptions, holy, useful and prepared, which show the characteristics of an instrument for noble purposes. Paul clearly has a high view of the ministry.

The last paragraph of this section (22–26) points out the general nature of the behaviour of the servant of God. Again the negative (flee evil desires, avoid foolish arguments) is linked with the positive (pursue righteousness and other virtues). Paul has already made a similar contrast in 1 Tim. 6:11. Here he expresses a corporate aspect along with those who call on the Lord out of a pure heart, i.e. all who profess to be Christians. Again Paul urges against quarrelling (24), and again adds positive advice which includes attitudes (kindness and lack of resentment) and ability (gift of teaching). A gentle approach is urged towards those who oppose, in order to bring about a positive result. Paul knows that gentleness cannot produce repentance but that God can grant this if a conciliatory attitude is adopted. He expresses the desired result in a positive form (to lead them to a knowledge of the truth) and also in a negative form (to escape from the trap of the devil).

The concluding statement (26) has led to much discussion. The Greek is not clear because two different pronouns are used meaning ‘him’ and ‘his’. If no distinction is intended, both would refer to the devil. But another interpretation is possible in that ‘his will’ may refer to the will of God, who is also seen to have taken captive those who escape from the devil. But this is difficult because it implies that those who escape one snare fall into another. A third possibility is to take the word in the sense of being taken captive by the devil to do God’s will, thus distinguishing the pronouns. But this seems a strange idea and the first interpretation is to be preferred.

3:1–17 Predictions and charges

3:1–9 Predictions concerning the last days

1–4 Paul not infrequently mentions the last days, by which he seems to mean the time immediately preceding the consummation of this age. But elsewhere in the NT the last days represent the beginning of the Christian era (see Acts 2:17–21; Heb. 1:1). There is clearly a close connection between the present and the future since although in this passage Paul speaks of the false teachers in the future, he has previously referred to them in the present. He is most concerned about the moral degeneracy which sets in as a consequence of wrong teaching. In the list which occurs in vs 2–4 there is a mixture of wrong actions and wrong attitudes. The contrast between the first and the last words in the list brings out vividly the difference between love of self and love of God. This list shows, in fact, the disastrous consequences of self-centredness. There are several words here which point to arrogance—boastful, proud, abusive ... brutal ... conceited. The worst feature is that these people claim some form of godliness, pretending to be religious but having no intention of putting their beliefs into practice. The mere form without the power is highly damaging. It is no wonder that Paul urges Timothy to have nothing to do with them (5). This shows that he is thinking of a problem which is imminent.

6–7 After the list Paul comments on other features which will need noting. The methods of these false teachers are insidious as the striking expression worm their way into homes shows. Moreover their selection of gullible people as recipients is characteristic of most false teachers. Here weak-willed women are singled out who are loaded down with sins. This suggests that the women concerned were so stricken in their consciences that they would turn to anyone for help, although clearly not motivated towards the good. These women seem to have had a desire for knowledge, but were incapable of arriving at the truth. It may be supposed that they were seeking sensational experiences. The false teachers are not themselves able to pass on knowledge of the truth, since they are deficient in their own understanding of it. The picture Paul paints here is relevant in any age in which false teachers are operating.

8–9 The reference to Jannes and Jambres (8) is interesting since they are referred to nowhere else in the Bible, although they do occur in the Targum of Jonathan on Ex. 7:11. (The targums were interpretations of the Hebrew Bible, written in Aramaic, though probably most were composed later than Paul’s letter to Timothy.) By Paul’s time it was presumably common knowledge that two of Pharaoh’s magicians bore these names. The similarity between these magicians and the current false teachers is that both opposed the truth and are consequently to be rejected. As in the case of all false teachers there is an assurance that their supposed progress is no more than illusion. Their ultimate folly will become clear to everyone, even if there may be an interval of time before this happens. Paul is convinced that error cannot triumph in the end.

3:10–17 Further charges to Timothy

In this section Paul's references to Timothy stand in strong contrast to the description of the false teachers in the preceding section. This is brought out by the emphatic pronoun You. Timothy is first given an historical reminder (10–12). He has had the advantage of observing Paul's teaching and his manner of life. The fact that Paul notes that Timothy knows all about his teaching should caution us against drawing any unwarranted assumptions from the absence of some of Paul's great themes from the Pastoral Letters, as if this could be an argument against his being the author. It is worth noting moreover that the reference to those spiritual qualities (faith, patience, love, endurance) which Paul had shown are the very qualities that he has already urged on Timothy himself (cf. 1 Tim. 6:11). As to his sufferings, Paul cites the incidents on his first missionary journey, presumably because it was at that time that he first made Timothy's acquaintance. Timothy would vividly remember what Paul had had to endure and it is not impossible that the experience had been a powerful factor in persuading Timothy to become involved in the work of the gospel. When Paul says Yet the Lord rescued me from them all, Timothy would know from personal observation how true that was.

From a reference to his own experience of persecution, Paul assures Timothy that anyone who sets out to live a godly life will be persecuted (12). In this he is doing no more than repeating the teaching of Jesus. Paul knows that impostors will continue in this age. It is of the nature of deceivers to go from bad to worse (13). Once the process has started it is difficult to stop. Those who deceive others end up deceiving themselves. This is true at all stages in the development of false teaching.

Again Paul draws a strong contrast between these imposters and Timothy, who is given encouragement to prevent him from being deceived. Basically he must continue in what he has learned and knows from personal conviction (14). Such advice is applicable to every Christian leader. Naturally the source of the imparted knowledge is important—Timothy had not only had the advantage of learning much about the Christian gospel from the apostles, but he had been taught the Scriptures since his earliest years. This emphasis on the Scriptures is important here because Paul himself based so much on the testimony of Scripture. He is not expecting that Timothy will rely simply on what he has learned from Paul, without backing it up from Scriptures. There is a reminder here that a good reliable background of instruction is indispensable for the minister of the gospel.

It should be noted that in v 15, Paul uses the expression the holy Scriptures, drawing special attention to its sacred character, presumably in contrast to the secular sources of the false teaching which he has just mentioned. An important aspect is the function of Scripture to make wise for salvation. This could be abundantly illustrated from the many times in which Paul in his letters appeals to Scripture in his expositions of God's work of salvation in Christ.

V 16 sets out a clear statement about the character of Scripture and its usefulness. But the precise meaning has been much disputed. Some have questioned whether the Greek word graphē necessarily refers to Scripture. It could mean any writings. But the use of the term in the NT to denote Scripture is well established. But does the term refer to the whole of Scripture or to only a part? The use of the word all is determinative. If all here means 'every' it would be possible to understand it of separate parts of Scripture. But parallel uses in the NT suggest that 'all' is the correct translation. That being so, Paul is assuming that Scripture in its entirety is God-breathed. But why does he need to inform Timothy of this? It would seem better to suppose that the main point of the passage is not so much the inspiration of Scripture as its profitableness. Timothy would know of its inspiration, and this would enhance its usefulness. The four functions of Scripture cover a wide range from imparting doctrine to challenging behaviour and training in righteousness. These functions are still the valid purpose of Scripture and are vital in equipping the man of God, a term which stands particularly for all Christian teachers, but is applicable to every Christian worker. Note the significant stress on thoroughness in preparation for the work of God.

4:1–22 Paul’s farewell to Timothy

4:1–5 A concluding charge

In view of the fact that he is facing the end of his life, Paul wants to express himself with the utmost solemnity. The charge is connected with three facts—the reality of the judgment of Christ, the certainty of his return and the establishment of his kingdom.

The content of the charge is set out in v 2 and consists of five commands, all of which are as applicable to ministers of the gospel today as they were to Timothy. Paul begins with preaching because he recognized that this is basic (cf. Rom.10:14). The need for being constantly prepared suggests that the man of God must always be on duty. The other three commands (correct, rebuke and encourage) are complementary to each other. There is a combination of severity and gentleness here. The whole work demands patience and care. Paul intends Timothy to have a clear picture of the demands of Christian service. The picture is completed in v 5, where four other charges are given. Timothy is to show presence of mind in all situations and a willingness to accept hardship. The Christian ministry is no bed of roses. The work of an evangelist is essentially to preach the gospel, while the concluding words call for dedication to all the various aspects of ministry.

Vs 3 and 4 are something of a digression in Paul’s thought. He fits in a final warning about the false teachers. He is aware that many will not want sound teaching, hearing only what they want to hear—hence the itching ears. Paul once again mentions the myths which these people will circulate.

4:6–8 A personal testimony

This section connects with the last as the word For shows. What Paul is about to say is intended to be an example to Timothy. He uses the same metaphor of the drink offering as he had already used in Phil. 2:17. It is a vivid image of the apostle about to pour out his life-blood for the sake of Christ. He senses that the end is near. He quickly changes the metaphor of sacrifice to those of conflict and the running track (7). In both cases he knows tasks are nearly finished. But there is a great confidence here. Paul is in no way ashamed of what he has done. The words I have kept the faith are in parallel with the other two affirmations, which suggests that the faith here is the deposit of Christian teaching which Paul had already entrusted to Timothy. He might also mean that he had been loyal to his trust.

V 8 has a triumphant ring about it. Paul has no doubt about the crown. He is probably thinking of the laurel wreath earned by those who competed in athletics races. The description of it as of righteousness, however, shows the spiritual nature of the prize he will be awarded. The righteousness is not achieved by Paul himself but is something given. Because God is a righteous Judge he cannot bestow anything that is not righteous. The day here is the final day of Christ's appearing. It points to what Paul elsewhere calls 'the judgment seat of Christ'. He sees this future day as applicable to all Christians, whom he assumes will long for that glorious event.

4:9–18 Personal remarks

In the next section (9–13) Paul infers the possibility of seeing Timothy again, in spite of being aware that his end is near. He is still hoping Timothy will manage to come to him. His desire to see Timothy is heightened by the movements of his other associates. Saddest of all is the brief comment about Demas having deserted him. This man was one of Paul's close associates when he wrote Col. 4:14. We must presume that the going was too hard for him and the pull of the world too strong. Of the others mentioned here, the reference to Luke is significant as he is now Paul's sole support. Both he and Mark, as well as Demas, are mentioned in Colossians. There is a poignancy about the request that Timothy should bring to him his cloak. Does this suggest that he was cold in his imprisonment? There is also particular interest in the scrolls and parchments. What these were it is impossible to say. They may have been OT texts, or perhaps Paul's personal papers, or some of each.

Vs 14–15 are a warning against Alexander the metalworker. This man may be identified with the Alexander mentioned in Acts 19:33–34 or in 1 Tim. 1:20. Paul refers here to the great harm he had done, which is further defined as opposition to Paul's message. The last part of v 14 echoes the words of Ps. 62:12.

The third section (16–18) is a reference to Paul's present position. The first defence must have been a preliminary examination. Since Paul gives no further information, it is impossible to pin-point this occasion. What concerns him most is the fact that no-one came to his support. There are some parallels here with Paul's imprisonment at Caesarea, but there is no mention in the Acts record of him having been forsaken then. It is better to suppose that an earlier trial in Rome is intended. If this implies that the Roman Christians did not come to his assistance, this may have been because they were not sufficiently aware of the position, or else were hesitant to get involved. Since the apostle speaks of being deserted, he evidently felt that he had been badly let down.

In contrast to the desertion of others, he was encouraged by the fact that the Lord stood by him. This reflects something of the spiritual resources which supported Paul in his trouble, and they can serve as an encouragement to all God's servants when suffering for his sake. In Paul's case he claims to have received courage to proclaim the gospel even at his trial. When he says so that ... all the Gentiles might hear it a difficulty arises. Clearly, if he is referring to his trial, all the Gentiles did not hear, if the words are taken literally. He may, however, mean the words metaphorically in the sense that with the preaching of the gospel at the centre of the empire all the Gentile world was 'within earshot'. The words translated that ... the message might be fully proclaimed literally mean 'that the proclamation of the message might be fulfilled'. Paul may have been thinking that when he preached at Rome, his own mission of preaching was accomplished.

Some have seen the lion from whom Paul was delivered as the emperor Nero, but this is a common metaphor for danger and probably no more is intended. Elsewhere in the NT the lion is symbolic of Satan (1 Pet. 5:8). Paul ends on a confident note which leads him into a spontaneous doxology. In view of what he has already written, the rescuing from every evil attack cannot be supposed to mean that he expects release, but must be taken in a spiritual sense. This would be in harmony with his reference to God's heavenly kingdom. There is here a strong contrast between Paul's present tribulations under an earthly kingdom and that more enduring and victorious heavenly kingdom to which he looks forward.

4:19–22 Final greetings

Paul mentions a number of his close friends. Priscilla and Aquila were especially dear to him for he had lodged with them in Ephesus (Acts 18). Onesiphorus has already been commended in 1:16. Erastus is mentioned as an associate with Timothy in Acts 19:22. Trophimus is twice mentioned in Acts—in 20:4 at Miletus and in 21:29 in Jerusalem. Since Trophimus was an Ephesian, it is probable that he intended to accompany Paul on his recent journeys but had been prevented from doing so through illness. It seems that Timothy was not aware of this and needed to be informed.

There is another urgent call to Timothy to hasten to Paul's side (21). It may be that the reference to the approaching winter is due to the fact that shipping would stop over the winter period. Nothing is known of the four people mentioned in v 21. In the final benediction (22) the first part is directed to Timothy in the singular, while the grace is to Christians generally in the plural.

TITUS

Outline of contents

1:1–4

Greetings

1:5–9

The appointment of church officers

1:10–16

How to deal with false teachers

2:1–10

Instructions for various groups

2:1–3

About older people

2:4–8 About younger people

2:9–10 About slaves

2:11–3:8

The doctrinal background for Christian living

2:11–15 Grace as a teacher

3:1–2 Christians in the community

3:3–8 The gospel contrasted with paganism

3:9–11

More warnings

3:12–15

Concluding remarks

Commentary

1:1–4 Greetings

This is a considerably longer greeting than in either 1 or 2 Timothy. It is in fact more theological. Only here does Paul specifically describe himself as servant of God, although he does elsewhere call himself ‘servant of Jesus Christ’. The more usual apostle of Jesus Christ is nevertheless added and then developed. Here Paul gives as the purpose of his apostleship a combination of faith and knowledge, in the sense of furthering both (2). His task was to proclaim the gospel and he recognized that both faith and understanding were the appropriate response. The knowledge needs further qualification, for only that which leads to a godly life is here in view. Further, both faith and knowledge have a future reference (hope of eternal life) as well as a present reality.

Why does Paul insert here the statement, who does not lie, in reference to God? Titus would surely have been in no doubt about this. His intention must be to underline the reliability of God’s promises. The further words before the beginning of time draw attention to the fact that those promises are grounded in God’s eternal purposes. Linked with this eternal view of God’s purposes is the appointed time of the bringing of his word to light, that is at the incarnation. The words here are reminiscent of the opening of John's gospel. Paul can never get away from the importance of preaching (3) in spreading the news of God's action, nor from the privilege he felt in being called to serve God in this way. The description of Titus as my true son in our common faith (4) suggests that he was a close associate of the apostle, although he is not mentioned in Acts. He is, however, mentioned in both 2 Corinthians and Galatians.

1:5–9 The appointment of church officers

The instructions given to Titus run parallel to those given to Timothy in 1 Tim. 3, but there are some significant variations, which arose from the different situation in which Titus was placed in Crete. His task was twofold—to straighten out what was left unfinished and to appoint elders (5). It is not clear what Paul had left incomplete, unless he means the appointment of elders. Paul gives no indication how many were to be appointed, but he had evidently already instructed Titus on this matter. He is more concerned about the qualifications required (6). What stands out is the need not only for moral blamelessness (mentioned twice) but for a stable home-life. Presumably if a person could not keep his own children in order, he would be regarded as inadequate for the leadership of the church. The word translated believe may carry the meaning of 'faithful' (AV). It is surely unlikely that Paul meant to disqualify church leaders whose children have yet to profess faith.

The switch from elders in v 5 to an overseer in v 7 is important since there seems to be no essential difference between the two offices. The elder exercises the function of oversight. There is a mixture of wrong attitudes and wrong actions which would make a person ineligible for office (8–9). It is noticeable that Titus is not advised against the appointment of new converts as Timothy is at Ephesus, possibly because the community in Crete was established more recently. If v 7 gives the negative side, the positive is found in vs 8 and 9. The qualities mentioned are those which should be evident in a committed Christian. The emphasis on hospitality is worth noting since so much depended on it in the early church. V 9 makes clear how important a grasp of sound doctrine is for those who exercise leadership over others in the church. It is only possible to refute false teachers if the true doctrine has been well understood. In Paul's view there should be no blurring of the issues.

1:10–16 How to deal with the false teachers

Again there are a few differences between this section and the passages in 1 and 2 Timothy dealing with the false teachers. There is here a clearer stress on the Jewishness of the teaching. The circumcision group and also Jewish myths are mentioned (14). Nevertheless, the most evident characteristics of the false teachers are the emptiness of their talk, the tendency to deceive, the ruinous results and the money motive (10–11). The position in Crete was aggravated by the character of the people, expressed in v 12 by one of their own poets, who is generally identified as Epimenides, a sixth-century BC philosopher.

In view of the difficult character of these people, Paul advises strong action. They must be silenced (11); they are to be rebuked sharply (13); and Titus is to pay no attention to them (14). Paul does not believe they are worth arguing with, but Titus should concentrate on rebuking them in order that they may become sound in the faith. This is a positive approach which is still of great value when dealing with those who deviate from the truth. V 15 furnishes a further comment to assist Titus, for those of corrupt minds will not recognize purity. Once the mind is corrupted the conscience swiftly follows suit. Paul realizes that false teachers are subtle in that they give every appearance of being religious (they claim to know God), but their actions give the lie to this (16). It may be thought that Paul speaks in a particularly derogatory way of them in the second part of v 16, but this shows his horror of those who lead others astray. The importance of a right understanding of Christian doctrine could not be more strongly stated.

2:1–10 Instructions for various groups

2:1–3 About older people

Here Paul again uses the figure of sound or healthy doctrine (cf. 1:9). This is in contrast to the ‘diseased’ teaching of the false teachers. The word translated in accord with draws attention to the fitness of the teaching, suggesting that the false teaching was out of line in this respect. Paul then proceeds to give examples of what he means by fitting teaching. It is essentially practical. Older men must show by their lives that their behaviour agrees with their doctrine (2). This involves behaviour which will earn the respect of others. But to this idea Paul adds the need for being sound in faith, love and endurance, a combination which occurs elsewhere in the Pastorals and in other Pauline letters (cf. 1 Thes. 1:3). In giving advice about older women Paul concentrates on the need for a serious attitude of mind (3).

The prohibition of slander and excess of wine reflects the contemporary situation in Crete. The fact that Paul uses a word (addicted to much wine) which suggests bondage to excess of wine suggests the problem was more acute among the women of Crete than in the corresponding situation in Ephesus (cf. 1 Tim. 3:8, 11), where a milder expression is used. On a positive note, older women are to be good teachers in the home.

2:4–8 About younger people

Paul sees it as the task of older women to instruct the younger women. This clearly needs tact to avoid the impression of interference. The instruction focuses on love to husbands and children. This cannot be taken for granted, especially in our modern age when the divorce rate is rapidly rising and when the care of children so often comes second to careers. The qualities required in younger women are those appropriate to the domestic scene, where self-control, purity and kindness are of such great value in a Christian home (5). As elsewhere Paul assumes that the Christian wife should be submissive to her husband. The whole subject is dominated by religious motive, to avoid any affront to the word of God. In a fuller discussion of the husband-wife relationship (Eph. 5:22–33, see commentary) Paul sets the wife’s submission in the context of the husband’s sacrificial love. Then, and now, the ideal relationship involves self-giving of each to the other. Where submission or sacrificial love are abandoned or compromised marriages suffer or collapse completely.

When dealing with young men, after urging self-control (a requirement for any age) Paul places most emphasis on the example of Titus (7). As a minister of the gospel, great responsibility rests on him to show integrity and seriousness, especially in the manner of speech. Again there is a strong religious motive, i.e. that others may not have cause to speak ill of Christians.

2:9–10 About slaves

Paul dealt with the subject of slavery in 1 Tim. 6, and what he says here is similar. The word translated to be subject to is stronger than the word 'obey' and reflects the social setup of the time. Christian slaves have an added responsibility, that is to try to please and not to be argumentative with their masters. The fact that the slaves are urged not to steal suggests that they were particularly open to this temptation. Paul sees the possibility for slaves to commend the gospel by their attitude, a possibility which is of course equally applicable to every Christian. The Greek word translated make attractive is used of the setting of jewellery to display it in the most attractive way.

2:11–3:8 The doctrinal background for Christian living

2:11–15 Grace as a teacher

It is characteristic of Paul to switch to a theological note when dealing with behaviour, since doctrinal considerations are never far away in his discussions. Here he uses the term the grace of God to sum up all God's actions on our behalf. In a concise statement Paul draws attention both to the incarnation and to the atonement and links them to the second coming. The appearing of salvation points to the first coming of Jesus, but in what sense must to all men be taken? Does Paul mean that everyone is saved? If the appearing is regarded as a historic fact, it is certainly true that the coming of Jesus has had a universal significance. The probable meaning is that God in his grace has made possible the offer of salvation to all people. But the scope of God's grace is not the main thrust, which is that Christian behaviour issues from the grace of God. Hence the force of v 12. The restraint of ungodliness is a major purpose of God's grace. Indeed it is impossible to live in a self-controlled manner apart from God's grace. Self-control cannot be achieved merely from self-effort. This at once distinguishes Christian ethics from Stoicism which exalted self-determination.

In this passage Paul connects the present with the past and future. The present task is seen in v 12—the demand for godly living in this age. But in v 13 the focus falls on the future. The blessed hope and the glorious appearing are clearly not yet, although they have a specific impact on the present. Paul shows a nice balance between Christians' glorious future expectations and their present responsibilities. The expectation of the return of Christ is basic to Paul's doctrine about the future. It is significant here that Paul speaks of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, for the linking of God and Jesus Christ in the same expression suggests that Paul is convinced of the deity of Jesus, a thought which is in harmony with the most probable understanding of Rom. 9:5. Some separate God from and Saviour, but this is not the obvious meaning of the Greek text. Another possibility is to take 'Jesus Christ' as an explanation of the 'glory', in which case God and Jesus would not be so clearly identified. But it is more natural to link 'Saviour' with Jesus in view of the subsequent statement.

In v 14 Paul looks to the past, to the historic act of redemption which forms the basis of the Christian position. He comes to this when reflecting on what Christ has already done for us. In 1 Tim. 2:6 Paul mentioned that Christ gave himself as a 'ransom', and here he follows up a similar idea, using the verb derived from the noun. Redemption is a favourite theme of the apostle. It conveys the idea of deliverance from slavery, in this case summed up as all wickedness. Paul sees the work of Christ as doing something for us which we could not do for ourselves. Deliverance is from sin in the fullest sense. But for Paul deliverance is double-sided; not only from sin but to a life of purity. The metaphor of cleansing is another favourite device of Paul for explaining the work of Christ. The Christian is a cleansed person (see Eph. 5:25–26). The idea of the people of God as a very special possession for Jesus Christ is vividly brought out here. For a similar expression cf. Ex.19:5. The Christian objective to do what is good is strongly motivated by the thought that it is essentially because we belong to Jesus Christ in a special way.

V 15 is a kind of conclusion to the practical instructions, although Paul has not yet finished with his theological reflections, for he comes back to them in ch. 3. Titus is reminded of the need to exercise authority in order to back up the teaching. The authority is based on the apostolic teaching and should enable Titus to resist attempts by others to despise him.

3:1–2 Christians in the community

Presumably Titus had already instructed the people about their responsibilities towards the state authorities, for he is instructed to remind them. But perhaps the Cretans had tended to forget that subjection to the authorities was expected from Christians. Paul recognizes that political disobedience, except on matters of conscience, would bring the gospel into disrepute. The thrust of v 2 is that behaviour should commend the gospel. The outsider should receive an impression of good law-abiding citizenship. Note especially the qualities of consideration and humility, which are not usually to the fore in social relationships.

3:3–8 The gospel contrasted with paganism

Frequently in Paul's letters he contrasts what Christians were before their conversion with their new potential in Christ. V 3 draws attention to the past. The list of vices which are here enumerated as typical of pre-Christian experience may seem somewhat exaggerated. But there is evidence of these weaknesses in the pre-conversion experience of all Christians and traces still remain thereafter. Foolishness points to a lack of spiritual understanding; disobedience and deception are seen in human beings' relationship to God, and the whole life-setting is summed up as slavery to passions and pleasures. It is important to recognize the naturalness of this pre-Christian lifestyle in order to see more vividly the change that Christianity brings. The climax is reached in the multiplication of hate, which serves as a foil against which the love of God is described.

In the theological statement in vs 4–7 Paul brings out what the kindness and love of God have done to counteract the increasing hatred of the natural world. The primary focus of God's love is on the coming and mission of Christ, but in this context the stress is on the Christian's experience of that love. In speaking of God as our Saviour, Paul may be contrasting God with the emperor, who in the contemporary world was sometimes given the title Saviour. But in the light of 2:11–14 it is more likely that his mind is throughout on Christian salvation. In v 5 Paul roots salvation in the mercy of God and not in human effort (righteousness here stands for that which is achieved through the works of the law), consistent with his teaching elsewhere (especially in Romans).

There is much debate about the expression through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit (5). This combination of terms presents the twofold aspect of Christian salvation. Regeneration is the entry into a new life and renewal is the effecting of the new life itself. The first can be understood as relating to conversion and the second to the bestowal of the Holy Spirit. There is much to be said for understanding rebirth here in the sense in which it is found in the teaching of Jesus (Jn.3:5). There has been a difference of opinion over the interpretation of the washing, since not all see this as a reference to conversion. It could refer solely to baptism, in which case both terms could refer to what is effected at baptism by the Holy Spirit. Or it could be taken as referring metaphorically to spiritual cleansing.

V 6 is clearly an allusion to the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. As Paul reflects on his own experience and that of his associates (note the words on us) he is struck by the generosity of the gift. The Spirit is never given in a stinting manner. This verse highlights the threefold activity of God, Jesus Christ our Saviour and the Holy Spirit.

Paul concludes this brief theological statement by a reference to justification. It is typical of Paul to stress that justification is through grace, for this is a favourite theme of his. This refers essentially to our new standing with God and points to our future. It is another of Paul's themes to draw attention to our inheritance, and here he concentrates on eternal life. He calls this a hope, in the sense of something which is certain.

This section ends with the formula about the trustworthy saying (8), which must relate to the theological statement just considered. But this is followed by a direct request to Titus to stress these things, which is best taken as referring to the whole of what Paul has written in the letter. He is most anxious to achieve a practical result—a careful devotion to doing what is good. The implication is that a sound theological basis is indispensable for right actions. There is some ambiguity about the meaning of these things at the end of v 8. If they are the same things as in the earlier part of the verse they would refer to the essential truths of the gospel. But if they are meant to contrast with the unprofitableness of the false teaching they may be the good deeds of the believers. Since the stress in v 9 is on foolish controversies, it would seem the former view is most likely.

3:9–11 More warnings

There is an echo here of the warning given in 1:10. Paul cannot close without a further warning. Since he stresses the unprofitableness and uselessness of the false teaching, it is likely that he sees it as a contrast to the positive teaching he has just given. He tells Titus, as he has told Timothy, to avoid wasting time on such useless arguments. But he draws a distinction between the teaching and the people involved. Every pastor must be concerned about people, especially those who are causing trouble in the community, and these must be warned. But Paul considers a double warning to be sufficient. Those intent on divisive activity are seldom likely to respond beyond this. Such a person, in Paul's view, is bound to have a warped mind.

3:12–15 Concluding remarks

Clearly Artemas or Tychicus was to replace Titus in Crete. Paul mentions his intention of wintering at Nicopolis, which is generally thought to be a city on the west coast of Greece. No reason is given for the choice of such an out of the way place. Zenas is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT. Apollos is known from Acts and 1 Corinthians as an associate of the apostle.

Evidently in some way Titus must have been in a position to give these two men some material assistance in their travelling. Paul then addresses the Cretan Christians generally and stresses again the value of good works. It is not clear whose daily necessities are in mind. It is possible that cases of need are meant, in which instance the call is to works of charity. This would make sense of the last part of the verse (not living unproductive lives). The concluding greetings are very general and the concluding grace unusually brief.

Donald Guthrie

PHILEMON

Introduction

The letter to Philemon is the shortest of Paul's letters and is more closely related to the ordinary private and personal letters of the time than others addressed by Paul either to communities or groups of communities. This does not mean, however, that it is simply a piece of private correspondence. Like the apostle's longer letters it is a means of early Christian missionary work and a substitute for Paul's personal presence.

Occasion

The letter is addressed to Philemon who is described as Paul's 'dear friend and fellow-worker' (1). Others mentioned in the greetings are Apphia, who was probably Philemon's wife, Archippus, Paul's 'fellow-soldier' (and possibly the son of Philemon and Apphia) and the church community (ekklēsia) that assembled in Philemon's house (2).

The occasion of the letter to Philemon can be worked out from its contents, though not all the details are clear. A slave named Onesimus had wronged his owner, Philemon, who was a Christian living at Colosse (vs 1–2; cf. Col. 4:9, 17). It is not certain how Onesimus had offended but it is usually assumed on the basis of v 18 that he had stolen his master's money and then run away. It is possible, however, that the words, 'if he has done you any wrong or owes you anything', simply indicate that Onesimus had been sent to fulfil some commission and had overstayed his leave.

In the Roman world of Paul's day slaves sometimes ran away. They joined groups of robbers, attempted to disappear in the subculture of large cities, tried to flee abroad and be absorbed into the work-force, or sought refuge in a temple. Onesimus came into contact with Paul, perhaps as a fellow-prisoner, who took an interest in him and this led to Onesimus's conversion (10). The apostle clearly grew to enjoy his company (cf. v 12) and benefited from his ministry (11, 13). He dearly wished to keep Onesimus with him so that he might take Philemon's place at his side in the service of the gospel. He had no right, however, to retain Onesimus. This would not only have been illegal according to Roman law, it would also have involved a breach of Christian fellowship between himself and Philemon.

So Paul sent Onesimus back to his master Philemon together with an accompanying letter. Using gentle language and carefully chosen words Paul requested that Philemon might welcome his slave just as he would receive Paul himself (17), that is, as a 'dear brother' (16). He did not want the reconciliation between master and slave to collapse because of any demand for compensation, so he asked that any outstanding debt arising from Onesimus's action might be charged to his own account. After all, did not Philemon owe his very self to Paul, since the latter was responsible for his conversion (19)? The decision was to be Philemon's entirely, so Paul refused to command or coerce him in any way (14). The apostle was confident that his friend would respond in a godly manner and believed that he 'will do even more than I ask' (21). These words are tantalizing but as we read between the lines we conclude that the 'more' of which Paul speaks is Philemon's willingness to return Onesimus to Paul for the service of the gospel (21).

An alternative interpretation is that of S. C. Winter (NTS, 33 (1987), pp. 1–15), who suggests that the letter was written to the church at Colosse, not to an individual, and that Onesimus was in prison with Paul because he had been sent there by Archippus on behalf of the congregation. Paul requested that Onesimus be ‘manumitted’ (his freedom purchased) and released from his obligations in Colosse so as to remain with Paul in the work of ministry (Winter). But there are considerable difficulties with this interpretation regarding the supposed public nature of the letter, the circumstances of its composition and the nature of Paul’s request (see the Commentary below).

Authorship, place and date

Paul’s authorship has rarely been questioned in the past. The letter obviously breathes the genuine apostle as he tenderly deals with a difficult, personal and social situation.

The letter was sent from the same place as that to Colossians and of the three possibilities—Rome, Caesarea or Ephesus—the balance of probability lies in favour of the first. The most likely placing of the two letters is fairly early in Paul’s (first) Roman imprisonment, i.e. AD 60–61.

The New Testament and slavery

No NT writer comments on the origins of slavery. Also, no theological support for slavery, or justification for human beings owning other human beings, is presented in the NT even though direct evidence is provided which shows that some early Christians were slaves and others were owners of slaves. Further, no revolutionary programme was suggested by Paul or others to deal with the evils of slavery or its total abolition. Instead, the focus is upon transforming personal relationships within the system.

In 1 Cor. 7:21–24 Paul mentions, not the wider issue of slavery, but the possibility of manumission of Christian slaves. Although many claim that the apostle was urging Christian slaves to take their freedom, it is more likely that he was encouraging them to live according to their new status in Christ (the ‘calling’) which is more fundamental than any social, legal or other change.

The letter to Philemon, like the rest of the NT, does not specifically address the broader question of slavery. Rather, in vs 16–17 Paul deals with the issue of brotherly love in the body of Christ. The relationship of slave to owner, within the existing structures, is to be conducted in the light of belonging to the same Lord. That relationship has now been transcended. Onesimus’s earthly freedom may be rightly desired and valued; but what is of ultimate significance is that he has accepted God’s call and followed him (cf. v 16 and 1 Cor. 7:21–24), whether he is a slave or not. The letter to Philemon is moving in the realm of personal relationships where the institution of slavery could only wilt and die.

See also the article on Reading the letters.

Further reading

N. T. Wright, Colossians and Philemon, TNTC (IVP, 1986).

R. P. Martin, Colossians and Philemon, NCB (Nelson, 1981).

P. T. O’Brien, Understanding the Basic Themes of Colossians, Philemon, QRBT (Word, 1991).

Outline of contents

1–3	Paul’s greeting
4–7	Thanksgiving and intercession for Philemon
8–20	Paul’s plea for Onesimus
21–25	Final remarks and greetings

Commentary

1–3 Paul’s greeting

1–2 Paul follows the pattern found elsewhere in his letters (see on Col. 1:1) with its mention of author (and his associate), recipient(s) and a greeting. A prisoner of Christ Jesus is a reference to Paul’s actual imprisonment from which he hopes soon to be released (22) rather than to a metaphorical bondage. So at the outset mention is made of the apostle’s situation: he is in prison for the gospel (13). Of Christ Jesus means ‘for Christ’s sake’. Paul associates Timothy with him in the address, not as a co-author, but because he had been in the apostle’s company for much of his Ephesian ministry and may have met Philemon there. The latter is described as our dear friend and fellow-worker, terms that indicate that he was a specially valued colleague of the apostle in the ministry of the gospel. The letter is addressed specifically to him. Although Apphia, Archippus and the church that meets in your home are included in Paul’s greeting (cf. v 25), this is due to his courtesy and the body of the letter (vs 4–22 are in the singular) is addressed to one person, Philemon. Apphia may have been Philemon’s wife. Archippus, as a fellow-soldier, had apparently played an important part in assisting Paul in his missionary labours and had faithfully stood at his side through persecution and trial—perhaps even imprisonment. He was a resident of Colosse, possibly a son of Philemon and Apphia (though we have no certain means of knowing), who was given a special encouragement to fulfil the ministry he had received in the Lord (Col. 4:17).

3 Paul's greeting indicates a prayerful concern for Philemon and his Christian friends that they may understand and appreciate more fully God's grace in which they stand and the peace he has established with them (cf. Rom. 5:1–2).

4–7 Thanksgiving and intercession for Philemon

Paul's thanksgiving paragraph (4–6) is the shortest in his letters and is more closely related to the ordinary private and personal letters of the time. Vs 4–7 are designed to prepare the way for the specific matter with which the letter is primarily concerned, namely, the request concerning Onesimus.

4 Giving thanks is uppermost in Paul's mind as he begins the passage. It is to the one true God that he offers his thanksgiving and, stressing the consciousness of a personal relation to him, he adds the pronoun my (cf. Rom. 1:8; Phil. 1:3). The one thanked for Philemon's progress is the God of the psalmists, known to Paul through Jesus Christ as 'Father' (3). Always suggests regular rather than unceasing thanksgiving and is explained by the following as I remember you in my prayers.

5 Paul has received good reports (I hear is a present tense) about Philemon's faith and love which cause him to give thanks to God. Information probably came from Epaphras (Col. 1:4, 7–8) and possibly from Onesimus. Faith (faithfulness) and love have been sometimes taken as directed towards both the Lord Jesus and all God's people. Alternatively love and faith have been intimately linked (and rendered as 'piety' or 'godliness') in an attitude which is shown to the Lord Jesus on the one hand and God's people on the other. It is better perhaps to see here a 'chiasmus' (a b b a pattern) in which Philemon's love is directed to all God's people and his faith is in the Lord Jesus. Paul normally places faith before love. But here, because of the situation which called forth the letter, his attention is focused on Philemon's love (cf. vs 7, 9). This leads on to his friend's faith (shown by one who is in the Lord Jesus) which in turn directs one's thoughts to the range and comprehensiveness of the love, that is, it has been shown in the past to all God's people.

6 Paul's thanksgiving leads directly on to his request—a petition concerning Philemon's generosity. It is as if Paul could not give thanks for his colleague without interceding for him. The verse is difficult to interpret, so the following suggestions are tentative. Sharing (Gk. koinōnia) is understood in an active, general sense meaning 'generosity' or 'liberality'. Your faith points to the source from which the kindness comes, while the word active is better rendered as 'effective'. His faith had already been active; Paul now wants it to be 'effective' in relation to Onesimus. Every good thing refers to every blessing which belongs to Philemon as a Christian, while a full understanding (lit. 'in a knowledge') here conveys both the ideas of understanding and experience. The final phrase, (lit. 'into Christ'), probably refers to being united with him and is therefore correctly rendered as in Christ. It was the apostle's great desire that Philemon might understand and experience the treasures that belonged to him as a believer. So his request is that Philemon's generosity might lead him effectively (that is, he wished that his colleague's liberality might result in some action in the case of Onesimus). This would, in turn, help Philemon into a deeper understanding and appreciation of all the blessings that belonged to him (and all others who are incorporated) in Christ.

7 Turning to the language of direct address Paul tells Philemon why he has been refreshed and comforted. The latter's love has been concretely shown to the Colossian Christians and Paul can identify with these fellow-believers (some of whom he had not met; cf. Col. 2:1) for he states that joy and encouragement given to them is also received by him. When Christians go out of their way to show love and concern to others, it has a profound effect creating warmth and gratitude.

8–20 Paul’s plea for Onesimus

In a carefully structured paragraph where he weighs his words, Paul makes his plea for Onesimus, Philemon’s runaway slave. He begins with a brief description of his situation (8–12).

8 Philemon’s fine Christian character, mentioned explicitly in the preceding verses (therefore shows the close links), meant that Paul could speak openly and affectionately. Their personal friendship probably began at the time of Philemon’s conversion when Paul was the instrument God used (19). His responsibility as apostle to the Gentiles also enabled him to speak boldly in Christ. What you ought to do (lit. ‘what is fitting’) points to what is proper for Philemon, as a Christian, to do in the circumstances concerning Onesimus. Paul does not spell out the content of this. He only indicates that he might have given a command in the matter.

9 Instead, he bases his appeal (Gk. parakalō) on other grounds, namely, Philemon’s love. Twice this term has been used in the previous paragraph to denote Philemon’s love shown concretely to the saints and it is most natural to take it in the same sense here, rather than of love as a principle or even Paul’s love. Precisely because he knows of Philemon’s generosity Paul is able to entreat rather than command and he looks forward to his friend’s love being shown once again, this time with reference to Onesimus. Behind the request stands one who is both an ‘ambassador’ (which appears more likely than an old man) and a prisoner of Christ Jesus, that is, one who shares in Christ’s sufferings right now. So it is a powerful plea.

10 Paul now mentions his request and therefore his specific purpose for writing the letter. Philemon, not the congregation, is the person addressed (you is singular) and the plea is for one converted through his ministry while in prison and who has become very dear to him—Onesimus. The imagery of spiritual parenthood is also used in relation to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 4:15), Timothy (1 Cor. 4:17) and Titus (Tit. 1:4) who were converted through the gospel.

11 As a Phrygian slave—and they were proverbial for being unreliable and unfaithful—Onesimus had previously been useless to Philemon. But a great change had occurred and Paul describes this by a once-now contrast. This mighty transformation took place in Onesimus’s conversion to Christ as Lord and he might now be called useful, a description that truly fits his name, for Onesimus means ‘profitable’ or ‘useful’.

12 Paul sends back to Philemon with the accompanying letter the one who had become very dear to him. Indeed, so attached to Onesimus was he that he speaks of him as my very heart. It is as though the apostle is performing an act of self-sacrifice in returning him to his master. Some have suggested that ‘send back’ means Paul is referring Onesimus back to Philemon for a ‘decision’ in the hope that he will be allowed to return to Paul.

13 He briefly describes what happened before he wrote his letter and sent Onesimus back. I would have liked expresses Paul’s desire or personal preference for retaining Onesimus with him. He had rendered faithful service to the apostle and it had been the latter’s wish for him to continue to give it in place of the absent Philemon. The expression take your place is one of delicate tact for Paul assumes that Philemon would have wished to perform this service for him (especially ministry in the gospel) had it been possible.

14 But however much Paul was inclined to keep Onesimus he would do nothing without Philemon’s consent. At the very least it would have involved a breach of Christian fellowship.

He did not wish to coerce his brother or intrude into his decision. Spontaneous refers to a decision freely reached, while not forced shows Paul refrained from applying any outward pressure that would force Philemon to act in a particular way. Paul's courtesy and tact is a lesson to all who have delicate relationships to manage. The decision is Philemon's.

15 An additional reason is given for Paul's decision not to detain Onesimus: he might have acted contrary to God's hidden purpose. The passive he was separated points to the hidden action of God as the person responsible for what was done. Philemon's attention is thus turned from individual wrongs Onesimus may have incurred to God's providence which has made these wrongs work for good (cf. Gn. 45:4–8). If (note perhaps) God's hidden purpose lay behind this incident, then the divine intention was that Philemon should receive Onesimus back in a new relationship (as a Christian brother) for good.

16 For the first time in the letter slave is used of Onesimus. But this is immediately qualified: no longer as a slave but as a dear brother. Paul has chosen his words carefully; he is not stating that Philemon is to receive Onesimus back as a freed man and no longer as a slave, or that he is to free him immediately on his return. But whether Onesimus remained a slave or not, he could no longer be regarded as a slave. A change had been effected in him independent of his possible freedom. He is a dear brother and is addressed in exactly the same way as Philemon (7, 20) for he too is a member of the body of Christ. The relationship of slave owner to slave should be conducted in the light of belonging to the same Lord.

Paul is not really dealing with the question of slavery as such or the resolution of a particular instance of slavery. Instead, he treats here the issue of brotherly love. Although Onesimus's earthly freedom may be of positive value, in the last analysis it is of no ultimate significance to him as a Christian as to whether he is slave or free. What matters is to have accepted God's call and to follow him (1 Cor. 7:21–24).

17 Although Paul mentioned the fact of his request of Philemon for Onesimus in v 10, only here does he spell out its content and come to the real point of the letter. He bases his appeal on the close tie that exists between himself and Philemon—as a partner. This refers neither to a partnership in business transactions nor to special ties of friendship. Rather, his and Philemon's 'fellowship' is with God's Son, Jesus Christ, into which both have been called (1 Cor. 1:9). This relationship has drawn them together in common activities so that partner may have the added nuance here of 'co-worker'. Paul not only intercedes on behalf of Onesimus; he also identifies himself with him: welcome him as you would welcome me.

18 The apostle now guards against any possible hindrances to Philemon's favourable reception of Onesimus. He does not want the reconciliation to collapse because of any demand for compensation. Philemon is asked to let any outstanding charges resulting from Onesimus's flight or absence be debited to the apostle's account. 'Put that on my bill!' he says. As a father for his son (cf. v 10) Paul declares he is prepared to stand good for any damages.

19 As a parenthesis he includes his own promissory note or IOU: I will pay it back. Then, picking up the thought of v 18, he reminds Philemon that it is he who is indebted to the apostle for it was through him that Philemon had been converted. The latter therefore owed his spiritual life to Paul and that was a far greater debt than Onesimus had incurred and for which Paul would be responsible. The message is plain. Philemon will understand that Onesimus experienced the same grace of God when he was converted. He should receive Onesimus as a brother in Christ and not be angry with him even though there may have been good grounds for it.

20 Paul concludes the body of his letter by strengthening his request and expressing the wish that Philemon may refresh his own heart in Christ.

21–25 Final remarks and greetings

In the final brief sentences of the letter Paul assures Philemon of his confidence that the latter will do what is right and then announces that he plans to visit him (21–22). A short list of greetings (23–24) and the benediction conclude the letter (25).

21 Paul is confident of Philemon's obedience, not to his own apostolic authority, supposedly hidden under his request or appeal to the latter, but to the will of God. He has already prayed (6) for Philemon's deeper understanding of God's will and the performance of it in love. There had been clear evidence of this obedience in the past, demonstrated so concretely in his continuous generosity when he refreshed the hearts of the saints (7). Paul now expects it to be shown once again. In fact, he believes that Philemon will do even more than I ask, a hint, but no more than this, that Onesimus may be returned to him for the service of the gospel.

22 The mention of the guest room suggests Paul regarded his imprisonment as temporary. He hopes to come in person and visit Philemon and if this occurs it will be because God has graciously answered the prayers of this house-church. The announcement of this hope gives a certain emphasis to his intercession for Onesimus as it will enable him to see for himself how things have gone.

23–24 Those who send greetings are also mentioned in Col. 4:10–17, while the conclusion (25) is the same as at the close of Galatians.

Peter T. O'Brien

HEBREWS

Introduction

At first glance, Hebrews appears to be one of the most difficult NT books to understand and relate to our modern world. Numerous OT quotations and allusions fill its pages and much detail about Israel's priesthood and sacrificial system dominates the argument. By the time some readers get to the comparison between Christ and Melchizedek in Heb. 7, they feel totally lost and wonder about the relevance of it all! Added to this, many feel unsettled by the warning passages (e.g. 2:1–4; 3:7–4:11; 6:4–8; 10:26–31; 12:14–17), which seem to undermine the certainties established by other passages and suggest that believers can 'fall away' from Christ.

The argument is complex, but Hebrews is a gold mine for those who want to dig deeply. There is much treasure here to enrich our understanding of God and his purposes. Every carefully structured section contributes to the development of a central theme, providing distinctive insights into the person and work of the Lord Jesus Christ and the nature of our salvation. Although many OT texts are employed, some sections of Hebrews are based on the exposition of a single text, with others being used in a supportive role. In this way we are shown how to interpret the OT in the light of its fulfilment and can understand how the two divisions of the Christian Bible link together. Since the writer regularly relates his insights to the needs of those first addressed, we can learn how to apply his argument to our contemporary lives. Hebrews demonstrates that effective warning and encouragement are grounded in good theology.

What kind of literature is this?

Is Hebrews really a ‘letter’ in style and format? It certainly ends like many NT letters (13:18–25), with specific encouragements and instructions for those addressed. Moreover, several of the passages of warning or appeal throughout the book show a personal knowledge of the situation of the original readers and an overwhelming concern for their welfare (e.g. 5:11–6:3; 6:9–12; 10:32–39; 12:4–13). Yet the book begins in a formal way (1:1–4), with no word as to who the author is or to whom he is writing, and with no hint of the relationship between them. The writer offers no prayers for his readers at this point and no expression of thanksgiving (cf. the introductions to most of Paul’s letters).

Hebrews is an orderly and systematic treatment of the person and work of Christ, based on the exposition of certain key passages from the OT. For example, Ps. 8:4–6 is central to the argument of 2:5–18, Ps. 95:7–11 is expounded at some length in 3:1–4:13, Ps. 110:4 is the key text in 4:14–7:28, and Je. 31:31–34 is foundational to the argument in 8:1–10:39. Each text is used to show how OT ideals and institutions find their fulfilment in Christ. So, is Hebrews more like a theological essay or treatise?

Considering its rhetorical style (particularly references to the writer as one ‘speaking’ to his audience, e.g. 2:5; 5:11; 6:9; 8:1; 9:5; 11:32) and the use of OT passages as a basis of the argument in most major divisions of the work, it appears to be more of a sermon or homily in written form, with some personal remarks at the end. This is consistent with the writer’s own description of his work as ‘a word of exhortation’ or ‘word of encouragement’ (13:22). The same expression is found in Acts 13:15 to denote a sermon following the Scripture readings in the Jewish synagogue at Pisidian Antioch. Hebrews was written by a preacher with great pastoral sensitivity, desiring to apply his scriptural insights to the needs of a particular group of Christians for whom he was concerned.

See also the article Reading the letters.

Who wrote it?

The earliest copies of the NT place this document amongst the letters of Paul, but Hebrews itself makes no claim to Pauline authorship. The second-century writers Clement of Alexandria and Origen confirm that Paul was widely regarded as the author in the eastern part of the Roman Empire. Yet they note how much Hebrews differs from Paul’s writings in content and style. They propose that Paul was somehow responsible for the work but that someone else actually composed it. Acceptance of Hebrews as Pauline was not widespread in the western church until the fifth century. After this, the tradition remained virtually unchallenged until the Reformation of the sixteenth century, when it was widely questioned again.

Present-day scholars generally agree that arguments against Pauline authorship are decisive. Apart from major differences of style, Hebrews develops a portrait of Jesus as high priest and his work as the fulfilment of OT sacrificial ritual that finds very little parallel in Paul’s writings. At the same time, many typically Pauline themes and arguments are lacking in Hebrews. Even when similar themes are discussed, they are treated differently. And Paul, who makes so much of his status as an apostle and eyewitness of the risen Christ (e.g. Gal. 1:11–16; 1 Cor. 15:8), could hardly have written that he received the message of Christ in a second-hand way, ‘from those who heard him’ (2:3).

In the western church, the second-century writer Tertullian suggested Barnabas as the author of Hebrews and this solution has often appealed to scholars. As a Levite from Cyprus, this ‘Son of Encouragement’ (Acts 4:36) may well have been responsible for this ‘word of encouragement’ (13:22) which deals so exhaustively with the theme of sacrifice, priesthood and worship. As a Jew from the dispersion, he quite possibly had intimate contact with the Hellenistic and philosophical teaching of Alexandrian Judaism with which the writer of Hebrews seems to have had some acquaintance.

Martin Luther was the first to propose Apollos as the author and this theory has also attracted some support. As a highly educated Alexandrian Jew, Apollos was eloquent, had ‘a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures’, and operated in the same missionary sphere as Paul (Acts 18:24–28). He could well have written a work such as Hebrews.

However, in the end it must be said that the evidence in favour of Barnabas or Apollos or any other candidate is not decisive. Indeed, we do not need to know the identity of the author to appreciate his work and accept its authority. Hebrews itself indicates that the human authorship of Scripture is of secondary importance. So, for example, acknowledging David as the writer of Ps. 95, Hebrews insists that the Holy Spirit was the primary author (4:7; 3:7). Again, the human authorship of Ps. 8 is not mentioned (2:6) and is not relevant to the understanding of it as divinely inspired, prophetic scripture. Similarly, we should be willing to accept that it matters little whom God used to write Hebrews.

When was it written?

When Hebrews was written, the readers had been Christians for some time (5:12) and had experienced a notable period of persecution (10:32–34). Some of their original leaders appear to have passed away (13:7) but Timothy was still alive (13:23). Perhaps several decades had elapsed since the beginning of the Christian movement. The first allusion to Hebrews in early Christian literature is found in the letter by Clement of Rome, which dates from around AD 96 or a little later. But there is reason to believe that Hebrews was written well before then.

The destruction of the temple in Jerusalem and the cessation of the sacrificial system took place in AD 70 but there is no reference to that state of affairs in Hebrews. Although most of the ritual details which figure in Hebrews are taken from the OT account of the tabernacle, the ritual of the temple was the ritual of the tabernacle and our author writes as if that ritual were still going on (e.g. 9:6–9; 10:1–4). Some allusion to the events of AD 70 would surely have strengthened his argument that the first covenant is now ‘obsolete and ageing’ (8:13). Consequently, it seems best to conclude that Hebrews was written some time in the decade before AD 70.

What was the situation of the first recipients and why was Hebrews written?

A survey of the passages of warning and encouragement reveals something of the situation of those addressed. At least some of their number were in danger of drifting from the gospel and the salvation it offers (2:1–4). More specifically, they were in danger of hardening their hearts in unbelief, turning away from the living God, and missing out on the heavenly ‘rest’ promised by God (3:7–4:11). Symptomatic of this spiritual disease was their unwillingness to progress to a deeper understanding of the Christian message and its implications, together with an unwillingness to share that understanding with others (5:11–14). Some were withdrawing from the regular gathering of the believers for mutual encouragement (10:24–25).

The problem, however, was not simply one of retarded spiritual growth. The writer speaks in glowing terms of the faith, hope and love they had expressed in former times, when they were publicly exposed to insult and persecution (10:32–34). He calls for a renewal of that zeal in every respect (6:11–12; 13:1–19). Those who were in danger of throwing away their confidence in God and shrinking back from such commitment were growing weary and needed every encouragement to persevere in faith and endure hardship, so that they might obtain what was promised (10:35–39; 12:1–13). Perhaps they were worn down by continued hostility from unbelievers and their hope was weakened by the delay in the return of Christ (10:35–39).

Turning to the passages which expound theological themes, we can discern something more about the needs of the readers, and the writer’s purpose in addressing them. Hebrews begins with an emphasis on the superiority and finality of the revelation that has come through the Son of God (1:1–14). The readers are urged not to drift from the message that surpasses even what was ‘spoken by angels’ (2:1–4). It is a message about eternal salvation, achieved by the Son of God in his suffering and heavenly exaltation (2:5–18). In a variety of ways, the writer is keen to point out that Christianity is the fulfilment of everything revealed by God to Israel in the Law and the Prophets.

As an encouragement to the readers to hold fast their faith, the writer then begins to develop the idea that Jesus is ‘a merciful and faithful high priest’ (2:17–18; 4:14–5:10). This portrayal of Jesus as high priest continues in ch. 7, where it is argued that ‘perfection’ could not be found in the method of approach to God associated with the traditional Jewish priesthood. Ch. 8 goes on to establish that Jesus’ superior priesthood inaugurates the new covenant promised in Je. 31:31–34. Jesus’ death and heavenly exaltation are presented as the fulfilment and replacement of all the sacrificial rituals of ‘the first covenant’, providing an eternally effective forgiveness for sins and the certainty of receiving ‘the promised eternal inheritance’ (9:1–10:18).

This central section of Hebrews is argued with such earnestness and is driven home with so many specific comparisons between the provisions of the Mosaic law and the achievement of Christ that it is likely that the readers were predominantly Jewish Christians. Although the title ‘To the Hebrews’ goes back to the second century, it was probably not part of the original text. However, most commentators argue that it points us in the right direction. At least some of the recipients of the letter were tempted to drift back into Judaism or were unwilling to sever the last ties with their ancestral religion. Perhaps there was pressure from Jewish sources to do this or perhaps it was simply the temptation to return to the comfortable security of the old ways that motivated them. From the writer’s perspective, to slip back into the religion of the OT is actually to turn away from the living God (3:12), since God’s Son has inaugurated the perfection of the new covenant (9:11–15) and achieved the realities which the OT only anticipated (10:1).

Having said this much, it is difficult to be certain about the exact location of the first readers or about the precise form of Judaism from which they turned to Christ. They seem to have been Jews of the dispersion, rather than Jews from Palestine. Their Scriptures were most probably the OT in Greek, rather than in Hebrew. The expression ‘Those from Italy send you their greetings’ (13:24) probably means that certain Italian believers were with the writer and wanted to send a message to those located somewhere in their homeland. More specifically, it is arguable that the recipients were a Jewish section of the Christian community in Rome.

As noted previously, the earliest known quotations from Hebrews occur in a letter written by Clement of Rome. Also, the reference to persecution in 10:32–34 (without bloodshed, 12:4) could be related to the trouble in Rome when Claudius became emperor. The Roman historian Suetonius records that the Jews were ‘constantly indulging in riots at the instigation of Chrestus’. It is commonly understood that these riots resulted from the introduction of the message about Christ (represented by Suetonius as ‘Chrestus’) into the Jewish colony in Rome. Acts 18:2 mentions two Jewish Christians, Priscilla and Aquila, who were amongst the Jews expelled from the capital by Claudius in AD 49. Hebrews could have been written some decades later to a group of such people in Rome, when anti-Christian persecution was on the increase again.

At one level, Hebrews continues to function as a warning about the consequences of withdrawing from Christian fellowship, disowning Jesus and abandoning hope in him. On the positive side, it functions as an encouragement to endure in faith, hope and love, whatever the struggles and difficulties we may face. The writer seeks to promote such perseverance by fixing the gaze of his readers upon Jesus (3:1; 12:2–3). As Son of God and high priest of the new covenant, he is the ultimate revelation of God and his purposes and the one who alone can bring us to share in his heavenly rule.

What is the structure of the argument?

Detailed study of the structure of Hebrews reveals a carefully balanced and intricately woven pattern of themes. Albert Vanhoye, who has made the most significant contribution to this area of research, observes that the writer regularly announces the theme of a new section as he draws the previous section to a conclusion. These ‘announcements of theme’ are found in 1:4; 2:17; 5:9–10; 10:36–39; 12:12–13. Certain ‘hook words’ link the beginning of the new section with the preceding one. In each main section of the argument there are ‘characteristic terms’ which may be largely confined to that portion of the book. Finally, there are specific indications of the end of each segment. The book can thus be divided broadly into sections as follows.

As the brief but profound introduction to Hebrews concludes (1:4), the writer indicates that the next main section will involve a comparison between the Son and the angels. ‘Angels’ is a characteristic term of the argument from 1:5 to 2:16 and only occurs elsewhere in the book at 13:2. ‘Angels’ is also the hook word linking 1:4 with 1:5 and the word that signifies the end of the whole section (2:16). In the middle of the section there is a call (2:1–4) to respond appropriately to the message brought by the one who is greater than the angels.

In 2:17 the writer announces that the theme of the next section (3:1–5:10) will be Jesus as a merciful and faithful high priest. ‘Faithful’ is the characteristic term of the first subdivision (3:1–4:14) and is also the hook word linking 2:17 with 3:2. ‘High priest’ is also a hook word, a term that begins and ends both subdivisions (3:1; 4:14; 4:15; 5:10), and is a characteristic of the whole section. After a brief comparison between the faithfulness of Jesus and the faithfulness of Moses (3:1–6), the writer provides a lengthy exhortation to the readers to maintain their faith in Jesus (3:7–4:14). The sympathy of Christ as a heavenly high priest enables him to be merciful towards the sins of his people and to provide them with help to endure in faithfulness (4:15–5:8). His sympathy (4:15) for their situation was acquired during his earthly period of suffering (5:8) and testing.

In 5:9–10 the theme of the third main section of Hebrews is announced: Jesus the perfected high priest in the order of Melchizedek and source of eternal salvation. Before the writer engages in an exposition of these great themes, he warns the readers about becoming sluggish and unwilling to grow into maturity in Christ (5:11–6:20). Clearly the intention is to motivate them to take note of the teaching that follows and to apply it to their own situation. This leads to an explanation of what it means to call Jesus high priest ‘in the order of Melchizedek’ (7:1–28). In broad terms, chs. 8–9 show how the ‘perfecting’ of Jesus as high priest, in his suffering, death and heavenly exaltation, leads to the perfection of the new covenant for believers. Then the writer develops the notion that Jesus is ‘the source of eternal salvation’ in 10:1–18. For the sake of simplicity, it is not appropriate to go into detail here about all the key words and subdivisions in these chapters. The central section of Hebrews concludes with a call (10:19–39) which draws out the implications of the preceding teaching.

Faith and endurance is the theme of the fourth main section (11:1–12:13) and this is announced in 10:36–39. Faith is the focus in the first subdivision of this section (11:1–40), with endurance being more the emphasis in the second (12:1–13). The fifth section of Hebrews (12:14–13:17) is not so easy to tie down in terms of the criteria used previously. However, its appeals clearly have to do with removing all obstacles to faith and endurance and pursuing a godly life. The announcement of theme in 12:12–13 suggests that it is a challenge to ‘make level paths for your feet’. More generally, we may give it the heading Appeals for a God-honouring life-style. Some personal requests and greetings form the conclusion to the work as a whole (13:18–25).

Further reading

R. Brown, The Message of Hebrews, BST (IVP, 1982).

D. Gooding, An Unshakeable Kingdom, The Letter of Hebrews for Today (IVP, 1989).

D. Guthrie, The Letter to the Hebrews, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1983).

F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1990).

P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Eerdmans, 1977).

W. L. Lane, Hebrews, 2 vols., WBC (Word, 1991).

Outline of contents

1:1–4

Introduction: God’s final word

1:5–2:18

The Son and the angels

1:5–14

The Son’s superiority to the angels

2:1–4 A call to hold fast to the Son and his message

2:5–18 The Son’s humiliation and exaltation

3:1–5:10

Jesus as a merciful and faithful high priest

3:1–6 The faithfulness of Christ

3:7–4:13 A call to faithfulness

4:14–5:10 The compassion of Christ

5:11–10:39

Jesus the perfected high priest in the order of Melchizedek and source of eternal salvation

5:11–6:20 A call to learn and progress

7:1–28 The eternal high priesthood of Christ

8:1–13 The mediator of the new covenant

9:1–10 The limitations of the old covenant

9:11–28 The achievement of Christ in his death and exaltation

10:1–18 The benefits of the new covenant

10:19–39 A call to hold fast to the benefits of the new covenant

11:1–12:13

Faith and endurance

11:1–40 A celebration of faith

12:1–13 A call to endurance

12:14–13:25

Appeals for a God-honouring life-style

12:14–17 A final warning against failure

12:18–29 Responding to the call of God

13:1–17 Worship and everyday life

13:18–25 Personal messages and final blessing

Commentary

1:1–4 Introduction: God's final word

We live in a world where many people doubt that God can be known and where there are many conflicting philosophies and religious viewpoints. Even amongst professing Christians there are sometimes claims of further revelation that contradict or claim to go beyond Scripture. However, Hebrews leaves us in no doubt about the fact that God spoke decisively to Israel through the prophets and that he has fully and finally revealed his character and will by his Son (1–2). The OT revelation came at many times throughout Israel's history and in various ways such as dreams, visions and angelic messages. But the ultimate revelation has come in these last days of human history, through Jesus Christ. The writer will go on to suggest that the OT was a preparation for, and the foundation of, this ultimate revelation (e.g. 8:5; 10:1). Indeed, God continues to speak through the OT Scriptures to Christians in a whole range of circumstances (e.g. 3:7–11; 12:5–6). However, to emphasize the finality of the revelation through Jesus Christ, the writer points to his surpassing greatness as the Son of God.

As the one who was with God from the beginning, he was the one through whom God made the universe (Gk. aiōnas, 'ages' or 'worlds', is similarly used for the whole universe of space and time in 11:3). Moreover, the Son has been appointed to possess and rule over all that he was originally instrumental in making: he is heir of all things (2, cf. Ps. 2:7–8). Though many deny his authority and continue to reject him, he must ultimately triumph. As the radiance of God's glory and the exact representation of his being, the Son reveals in his person, not merely in his words, what God is really like (3). He continues to sustain the creation and order the events of history by the same powerful word that brought everything into existence in the first place (3).

Since the object of divine revelation has always been fellowship between God and human beings, Hebrews soon makes it clear that the Son's role was to provide purification for sins (3). This anticipates the argument of 2:14–18 and later passages, which speak about the need for the Son to share fully in our humanity, to suffer and die, so that he might fulfil the high-priestly role of making atonement for our sins. In other words, God's final word to us is not simply the perfect revelation of his character in Jesus Christ but also his saving work, making it possible for us to enjoy everything promised by God for his people in these last days.

The sequel to his atoning work was his sitting down at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven (cf. Ps. 110:1). So significant is the heavenly enthronement of the Son of God that Hebrews here makes no mention of the resurrection and ascension which made it possible. Rather, as the introduction comes to a close, the writer indicates that he is about to draw out the implications of that enthronement. He will establish the absolute superiority of the Son over the angels, those supernatural beings thought by Israel to be closest to God (4).

1:5–2:18 The Son and the angels

It would help to read through this whole section of Hebrews, to see how the pieces fit together, before focusing on the details. Those to whom the letter was sent apparently had some difficulty in sorting out the relationship between Christ and the angels, but there is no way of being certain about the exact nature of their problem. From 2:5–9 it would seem that the Son's becoming 'a little lower than the angels' at the time of his birth needed some justification. How could he be greater than the angels and share fully in our humanity? Why did the one greater than the angels have to suffer and die, as the Christian gospel proclaims? The nature and purpose of what is technically called the 'incarnation' continues to be a much debated issue in our own time and Hebrews offers distinctive insights on the subject at this point.

From 2:1–4 it appears that the original readers held the popular Jewish belief that angels were involved in the giving of God's law to Moses (cf. Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19). They needed to be assured of the superior status and character of the one who was the agent of the new revelation. Likewise, many people today need to be convinced that Jesus Christ is more than a prophet or an angelic messenger. No greater revelation of God has been given or can be expected. Hence the danger of disregarding the message of salvation that has come from him.

In 2:5–18 we are shown that the Son's earthly work was to achieve salvation from sin and its consequences, enabling believers to share his glory and honour in 'the world to come'. The greatness of our need and the incredible grace of God in meeting that need are stressed. The idea of Christ's heavenly rule comes to the forefront again, to assure us that everything will finally be placed 'under his feet' (2:8) and that, despite the obstacles, true disciples will reign with him.

1:5–14 The Son's superiority to the angels

The scriptural texts cited in this section have the effect of reinforcing and expounding some of the important themes already raised in the introduction (1–4). In particular, reference to the heavenly enthronement of the Son (3) quite naturally leads to an explanation of his position with regard to the angel world. Ps. 110:1 provides the framework in which these various OT texts are to be understood. It is alluded to in v 3 (he 'sat down at the right hand' of the Majesty in heaven) and is quoted in full in v 13. Thus, the subject of Christ's enthronement and heavenly rule is the focus of this section. Jesus used Ps. 110:1 to point to the exalted, heavenly status of the Messiah or Christ in OT expectation (e.g. Mk. 12:35–37; 14:61–62), and it was then regularly employed by the earliest Christians to make such claims about the resurrected Jesus (e.g. 10:12–14; Acts 2:34–36; 1 Cor. 15:25). There are further allusions to this key text in 8:1 and 12:2.

5 Ps. 2:7 is quoted because it is a prophecy applicable to the Messiah as Son of David and Son of God. The theological basis of this extraordinary claim is God's special promise to David and his dynasty in 2 Sa. 7:14, which is also quoted. When the sons of David were enthroned as God's earthly representatives in Jerusalem, they enjoyed a special relationship of sonship with God. Jesus is the one who ultimately fulfils these scriptures because he is the eternal Son of God (as in 1:2–3), whose resurrection and ascension restored him to the place of all authority and power in the universe, at the Father's 'right hand' (cf. the use of Ps. 2:7 in Acts 13:33).

6 No such promises were ever made to the angels. Their task has always been to worship God (cf. Dt. 32:43; Ps. 96:7). Consequently, they must worship the Son who sits at his right hand. Sharing fully in our humanity, he became for a little while 'lower than the angels', but is now 'crowned with glory and honour' (2:9). The introduction of God's firstborn into the world (Gk. oikoumerē, as in 2:5) is best taken in the context as a reference to Christ's entrance into what for us is still 'the world to come' (2:5). This happened when he ascended to the 'heavenly' realm.

7–9 The Greek text of Ps. 104:4 suggests that the angels were created to carry out God's commands with the swiftness of winds and the strength of fire. They are part of the created order and must be subservient to the Son, for he shares with the Father in the divine rule (throne) that will last for ever and ever. Ps. 45:6–7, which celebrates a royal wedding, is used with reference to Christ, the king of Israel, who supremely fulfils the ideal of sharing in the righteousness and joy of God's eternal kingdom.

10–12 The eternity of Christ and his rule is again stressed in Ps. 102:25–27. This is contrasted with the perishable creation which he founded and will one day roll up like a robe. Hebrews takes the Greek text of both these psalms to mean that the Father addresses his Son as God and Lord. Ps. 110:1 may have inspired this interpretation, since the Lord there addresses someone else as 'my Lord' and invites him to sit at his right hand.

13–14 Returning to the text which appears to have been the starting point for his reflections, the writer uses Ps. 110:1 to insist that the angels do not exercise the authority and rule of the Son. As ministering spirits, they are meant to serve his purposes and execute his commands. Indeed, they serve God by serving those who will inherit salvation. Angels are higher than we are in the order of creation (Ps. 8:4–6), but they are commissioned to help us in ways beyond our understanding, so that we may reach our heavenly inheritance (cf. 13:2).

2:1–4 A call to hold fast to the Son and his message

This paragraph draws out directly the practical consequences of the previous chapter. It is the first of several warning passages, revealing the writer's concern about the situation of at least some of his readers. Positively, the encouragement is to pay more careful attention ... to what we have heard (1). Negatively, the warning is not to drift away, like people in a boat that has lost its moorings and is moving rapidly towards a waterfall. How people drift from Christ remains to be explored in later chapters. Here the point is simply to stress that drifting has disastrous consequences.

The message Hebrews has in mind is the gospel of salvation which was first announced by the Lord (i.e. Jesus) and was confirmed by those who heard him (3). The writer and his readers were not part of the first generation of Christians, but they certainly received the gospel from those who were. When the message was given to them by those who had received it from Jesus, God testified to its supernatural origin by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will (4).

The gospel is of greater significance than the message spoken by angels to Israel at Mt Sinai. It is the message delivered by the Son of God himself, concerning eternal salvation and how it is to be obtained. If every violation and disobedience received its just punishment under the terms of that earlier revelation, how can there be any escape for those who ignore or neglect the terms of God's ultimate revelation (2–3)? The judgment facing those who turn their backs on Christ must be greater than any punishment experienced by Israel in OT times. The writer says more about this in 10:26–31.

2:5–18 The Son's humiliation and exaltation

Having indicated that the message of the Son is about salvation, the writer proceeds in this section to explain how that salvation was accomplished and what it means for us. The theme of Christ's enthronement and heavenly rule is resumed and we are shown why the Son had to become for a little while lower than the angels before being crowned ... with glory and honour. Ps. 8:4–6 is the key text, with three other OT quotations being used in a supportive way (cf. 2:12–13). Jesus is the man who 'fulfils' Ps. 8, by suffering death and being exalted to God's right hand. Hebrews then explores the implications of this 'perfecting' of Christ for us (2:10–16). The Son had to share our humanity, to suffer and to die, so that we might share in his glory. In 2:17–18 this teaching is expressed again in terms of the Son's calling to be a merciful and faithful high priest.

5 The world to come recalls Israel's hope for a glorious 'age to come', involving the renewal of creation or the establishment of 'new heavens and a new earth' (e.g. Is. 65:17–25), sometimes associated specifically with the work of the Messiah (e.g. Is. 11:1–9). Elsewhere, Hebrews speaks about the promised 'rest' of God (4:1–11), the hope of a 'heavenly country' (11:16), or 'the city that is to come' (13:14). These different images are used to describe the new world-order, which will be subject to the Son of God, not to angels (cf. 1:13). However, Hebrews implies that the coming age has actually been set up by the enthronement of Christ at the right hand of God. Its benefits are being experienced in advance by believers (e.g. 2:4; 6:4–6; 12:22–24), as they await the return of Jesus to bring them into the full enjoyment of the salvation he has already won for them (e.g. 9:28; 10:36–39).

6–8 Ps. 8:4–6 is quoted to explain how the Son secured his Messianic rule. In their original context, these verses celebrate the exalted position of human beings in God's creation. However, the psalmist speaks in ideal terms, since sin, death and the devil prevent us from exercising dominion in this world as God intended (cf. Gn. 1:26–31 and 3:14–19). Complete dominion is promised to the Messiah in Ps. 110:1 and Hebrews takes that text as a clue to the ultimate meaning and application of Ps. 8:4–6. The Son's role is to fulfil the destiny of the human race. Yet at present we do not see everything subject to him. How can we be certain that the world to come will be subject to him?

9 The writer takes made a little lower than the angels as a reference to the humiliation of the Son of God, experienced when he came to share fully in our humanity (cf. 2:14–18). Note the introduction of the human name Jesus at this point in the argument. Crowned with glory and honour refers to the heavenly exaltation he experienced because he suffered death. The ascension of the crucified Messiah to God's right hand is the assurance that God will eventually put everything under his feet. Death was the pathway to such glory for him but, by the grace of God, it is also the means of salvation for us. The following verses go on to explain what is meant for him to taste [experience] death for everyone.

10 God's plan for humanity was fulfilled through the one man, Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 5:12–21). It was supremely fitting for God, as the one who created all things for his own purposes, to bring many sons to glory in this way. Jesus is the head of a great company of people, destined to share in his honour and glory. They are variously designated in this passage as sons (10), brothers (11–12), children (13) and Abraham's descendants (16). Jesus is the author (Gk. archēgon, as in 12:2) of their salvation, or perhaps more accurately 'the pioneer of their salvation'. He certainly accomplished something unique on behalf of others (9) and is rightly called 'the source of eternal salvation' in 5:9. But the writer also wishes to stress that Jesus is in some respects the leader who acted like a trail blazer, opening up the way for others to follow (cf. 6:20; 12:1–3). Three times we are told that he was made perfect (Gk. teleiōsai, cf. 5:9; 7:28). There is no sense in which he was morally imperfect, but by his suffering and temptation, his death and heavenly exaltation, he was 'qualified' or 'made completely adequate' as the saviour of his people. The implications of this profound teaching will become clearer as the argument progresses.

11–13 As the 'perfected' saviour, Jesus makes men holy or 'consecrates' a people to God (cf. 10:10, 14, 29; 13:12). Hebrews uses three OT texts to show how this happens. Ps. 22:22 speaks about the proclamation of God's deliverance by someone who had experienced terrible suffering and rejection. These words apply supremely to Jesus as the resurrected and ascended Lord, proclaiming the victory achieved through his death. In so doing, he gathers around him and sustains the congregation or church of his spiritual brothers and sisters (12). Is. 8:16–18 speaks about Isaiah and his disciples being united by their trust in God, thus becoming signs and symbols to unbelieving Israel. Hebrews takes a sentence from Is. 8:17 (I will put my trust in him) as a pointer to Jesus' faithful reliance on the Father in the carrying out of his earthly ministry (13). Is. 8:18 is then used to identify the church as the children given to Jesus by God. His persistence in faith, even to the point of death, makes it possible for them to have faith. Faith binds the family of Christ together.

14–16 To achieve the salvation of his children, and to draw them to himself as the community of faith, the Son had to share fully in their humanity (lit. 'blood and flesh'). The purpose of this 'incarnation' (becoming human) was that he might die and by his death he might destroy him who holds the power of death—that is, the devil. This recalls the teaching of Gn. 3 about Satan's role in the rebellion of humanity against God and the imposition of death as the divine penalty for sin. Hebrews indicates that the devil continues to hold people in slavery because of their fear of death (15). We can only be released from Satan's power and freed to serve God by the forgiveness or cleansing made possible by Jesus' death (cf. 9:14–15, 27–28; 10:19–22). He removes the threat of judgment and condemnation for those who trust in him and gives the assurance of life in the world to come. The writer brings his extended comparison between Christ and the angels to an end when he says surely it is not angels he helps, but Abraham's descendants (16). This last expression does not refer to humanity in general, nor to national Israel in particular, but to all who have 'fled to take hold of the hope offered to us' in Jesus, who are 'the heirs of what was promised' to Abraham (6:17–18).

17–18 The title high priest is given to Jesus for the first time, as the writer announces the theme of the next major division of his work (3:1–5:10). This first mention of Jesus' high priesthood is linked very closely with the teaching that he had to be made like his brothers in every way (17). Only because he shared our nature, experienced human frailty and suffered when he was tempted, is he able to provide the appropriate help to those who are being tempted (18). However, the climax of his earthly struggle was his death, by which he was able to make atonement for the sins of the people (17). This expression is the first indication that Jesus fulfilled the role of the high priest on the annual Day of Atonement (cf. Lv. 16), offering a sacrifice to cleanse his people from the defilement of sin, and placate the anger of God (cf. 7:27; 9:11–12, 24–26; 10:1–14).

3:1–5:10 Jesus as a merciful and faithful high priest

In this major segment of the argument the themes raised in 2:17–18 are expounded and applied to the situation of the original readers. The focus is firstly on the faithfulness of Jesus as 'the apostle and high priest whom we confess' (3:1–6). This is developed by contrasting Jesus with Moses, who was the key figure in the establishment of Israel as God's 'house' (household or family) at the time of the exodus. The writer's argument would have had special point for Jewish Christians tempted to drift back into Judaism, where Moses and the revelation he brought to Israel were held in such high regard. But the passage has a wider application because of the positive things that are said about Jesus.

The warning that follows (3:7–4:13) draws attention to the unbelief and rebellion of the Israelites who left Egypt under Moses and failed to enter the promised land. Christians are also on a journey towards an inheritance or 'rest' provided by God. Therefore, the writer encourages his readers to persevere in faith, 'so that no-one will fall' by following the example of the Israelites in the wilderness (4:11). Faith in the word of God is the key. Mutual exhortation is necessary to prevent the hardening of hearts in unbelief against that word. Only in this way can the promised 'rest' be entered and enjoyed. Supremely, we are assured of the 'mercy' and 'grace' that Jesus offers, as the 'great high priest who has gone through the heavens' (4:14–16). The comparison between OT priesthood and the priesthood of Christ that follows supports this claim (5:1–10). Once again, Hebrews demonstrates the surpassing greatness of the person and work of the Son of God.

3:1–6 The faithfulness of Christ

Holy brothers suggests a family relationship between true believers, men and women alike. They are pilgrims who share in the heavenly calling (1) to reign with Christ in 'the world to come' (2:5). The greatest encouragement to press on in the journey of faith is to fix your thoughts on Jesus. Thus the writer exposes very simply the central concern of his 'word of encouragement'. Christians are to focus on Jesus as the apostle, sent by God to be the ultimate revelation of his character and will, and as high priest, making possible an eternal relationship with God. Such teaching is designed to encourage the weary, to challenge the sluggish and the disobedient, and to reassure those who are doubting and drifting.

2–5 Jesus' faithfulness to God as the one who appointed him is compared with the faithfulness of Moses. Such faithfulness invites us to trust Jesus completely. The writer alludes to Nu. 12:7, where Moses' foundational role as the revealer of God's will to Israel is highlighted. However, Jesus is worthy of greater honour than Moses because, as the Son of God, he was actually the builder of the house or ‘household’ in which Moses served. It was through his Son that God ‘made the universe’ (1:2) and through his Son that he saved and established the community of faith (3–4). Moses’ role in God’s house was to act as a servant and as a witness (Gk. eis martyrion) to what should be said in the future. Even the system of worship Moses was told to inaugurate was a preparation for, and an anticipation of, the realities that would come with the Messiah (cf. 8:5; 10:1).

6 The Son now rules over God’s house. This comprises all true believers from the beginning of human history to the present—all who are saved or perfected by the work of the Son. However, a note of warning is sounded by the words if we hold on to our courage and the hope of which we boast. This forms a bridge to the passage that follows, where the possibility of turning away from Christ is discussed. ‘Confidence’ would be a better rendering of the Greek (parrēsia) than courage here. The sacrifice of Jesus gives us ‘confidence to enter the Most Holy Place’ (10:19; cf. 4:16). Right of access to God is his gift to us in Christ and is not to be discarded for any reason (10:35–36). We need to hold on to it and exercise it so that we may persevere in doing the will of God and obtain what he has promised. Similarly, there is an objective hope given to us in the gospel. This should continue to be our boast or basis of exultation.

3:7–4:13 A call to faithfulness

Ps. 95:7–11 offers a serious warning about refusing to listen to God’s voice, becoming hardened in unbelief and missing out on the rest which he has promised his people. The writer is quite passionate in his exposition of the psalm passage because he is clearly worried about certain tendencies in the group he is addressing. So the danger of ‘drifting’ from Christ, briefly mentioned in 2:1–4, is exposed more fully. Nevertheless, despite the seriousness of the warning, the power of Scripture to challenge and change believers is emphasized. God sustains his people through the words that he has spoken to them and through the ministry of encouragement they can have to one another.

The rest that Christ secured for his people is interpreted in terms of Gn. 2:2. It is the Sabbath-rest into which God entered after finishing the creation of the world. The land of Canaan, where Joshua established the Israelites in his time, was an anticipation of this ultimate rest for the people of God. With a further warning not to miss out on that rest, the writer makes a concluding statement about the power of the word of God to expose and judge the human heart.

7–11 The Holy Spirit is acknowledged as the one who spoke ‘through David’ in the writing of Ps. 95 (3:7; 4:7). The Spirit continues to speak to subsequent generations of Christians through this Scripture, warning them to make each day a fresh ‘Today’ in which to hear his voice and live. Those who left Egypt with Moses had God’s words of promise and warning ringing in their ears, but they hardened their hearts and would not respond with faith and obedience. Rebellion and testing are translations of the Hebrew names Meribah and Massah (Ex. 17:1–7; cf. Nu. 20:1–13). At the beginning and end of their desert wanderings, the Israelites showed themselves to be particularly unbelieving at these places. They tested and tried God in the sense that they went as far as they could in provoking him to judge them (9). The forty-year period in the wilderness was an expression of God’s anger with that generation, but it was also an opportunity for them to experience his gracious ways, again and again (10). Since they refused to repent and trust him, he declared on oath in his anger that such people could not enter his rest in the land that he had promised to their forefathers as an inheritance (11; cf. Nu. 14). That privilege would only be extended to their children.

12–13 The writer wants his fellow believers (brothers will include ‘sisters’) to have such a care for one another that none will be lost. A commitment to understand and help others in the local church is required. The greatest danger is that someone in the congregation might have a sinful, unbelieving heart that turns away from the living God. Like the Israelites mentioned in Ps. 95:7–11, professing Christians sometimes turn away from God in apostasy (Gk. apostēnai), that is, in deliberate and persistent rebellion. This may be provoked by suffering or persecution or by the pressure of temptation, but the root cause is always unbelief. Expressed another way, you may be hardened by sin’s deceitfulness. Sin is an active, aggressive power that must be resisted. If you harden your hearts against the word of God (8), sin will have its way and you may be hardened (13). For further comments on apostasy, see the notes on 6:4–6; 10:26–31; 12:15–17. The antidote is to encourage one another daily, as long as it is called Today. Such encouragement will be on the basis of Scripture, following the writer’s own example (Gk. parakaleite, ‘encourage’, recalls the description of the book of Hebrews as logos parakleuseous, ‘word of exhortation’, in 13:22). It may take place in the more formal context of Christian gatherings (cf. 10:24–25) or in the daily informal contacts that Christians have with one another. Either way, a word-based ministry to one another is the key to faithfulness and perseverance. It is not a responsibility of church leaders alone, but a duty of each Christian.

14–15 By God’s grace, believers have come to share in Christ and all that he offers. This is parallel to the statement that ‘we are his house’ (6): the blessing has already been conferred! However, as in v 6, the idea of a further condition or fact is introduced in v 14. We demonstrate that we truly belong to Christ if after all we hold firmly till the end the confidence we had at first. It is faith that provides the underlying foundation for such confidence. Persevering faith is a mark of true conversion (cf. Mk. 13:13). Faith is not a good work that saves us but the means by which we hold on to the promises of God and remain in the relationship he has made possible for us through his Son. Those who abandon their confidence in Christ and turn away from him show that they were never genuinely ‘sharers in Christ’. Consequently, the writer stresses again the need to heed God’s voice every day and not to be hardened in unbelief (15).

16–19 With a series of compelling questions, the implications of Ps. 95:7–11 are further drawn out. Those who heard and rebelled were the ones who experienced firsthand the goodness of God in bringing them out of Egypt. They had every encouragement to persevere in faith during their journey to the promised land. But they disqualified themselves from entering his rest because they persistently disobeyed him. That disobedience was because of their unbelief.

4:1–2 The promise of entering his rest has been conveyed to us in the gospel. Our situation is so like that of the Israelites in the wilderness that the writer can say we also have had the gospel preached to us, just as they did. They received the promise of entering the promised land (e.g. Ex. 3:7–10; 34:10–14) and were called to live by faith in that word of God. In that sense they had the gospel preached to them or were ‘evangelized’ (2; cf. Gal. 3:8–9). Therefore, as long as the promise remains, let us be careful (lit. ‘let us fear’) that none of you be found to have fallen short of it. There is always the possibility that some member of the group might fail to attain the promised rest for the same reason that the Israelites under Moses fell short of obtaining their inheritance: the message they heard was of no value to them, because those who heard did not combine it with faith. The NIV mg. presents an alternative reading that is well attested in some ancient manuscripts: because they did not share in the faith of those who obeyed. This probably refers to the fact that the majority did not share the faith of Joshua and Caleb when it came to the point of entering the land of Canaan (Num. 14). Both readings indicate that hearing the message with faith is essential for salvation (cf. Rom. 10:14).

3–5 We who have believed enter the rest of which Ps. 95:11 speaks. Since the Israelites were already established in Canaan when David wrote the psalm, its warning about missing out on God’s rest must refer to something beyond that material possession. Gn. 2:2, where the related verb ‘rested’ is found, is used as the key for unlocking the meaning. The rest promised in the psalm is a share in the ‘sabbath’ of God’s own rest, following his work in creation (see below on 4:9–11). In the argument of Hebrews, God’s rest is equivalent to the ‘heavenly country’ (11:16), the ‘heavenly Jerusalem’ (12:22), the ‘kingdom that cannot be shaken’ (12:28), and other such descriptions of the Christian’s inheritance. From one point of view, that rest already exists for us in the heavenlies and can be ‘entered’ now, by faith (3; 12:22). It has been in existence since the creation of the world. From another point of view, we are on a pilgrimage to ‘the city that is to come’ (13:14), and we wait to be ushered into ‘the world to come’ (2:5). Hebrews presents the same tension between ‘now’ and ‘not yet’ that is found elsewhere in the NT. Jesus has made it possible for us to enjoy certain blessings in the present, as an assurance that we will possess everything promised to us in the end (cf. Eph. 1:13–14).

6–8 The rest that the Israelites experienced in the time of Joshua was an earthly anticipation of the ultimate, heavenly rest. Hebrews goes on to argue that the way into that ultimate inheritance has been secured by the Lord Jesus Christ (e.g. 6:19–20; 9:15; 10:19–22). A long time after the conquest of Canaan, Ps. 95 designated another day as the day (Today) to hear his voice and enter God’s rest. This proves that David had in mind a rest beyond the enjoyment of life in the land of Israel. If Joshua had given the people their ultimate rest at the time of the conquest, God would not have spoken later about another day. The hope of God’s people is a heavenly rest, not the re-establishment of the Jews in the land of Israel. The fundamental promises of the old covenant are fulfilled in a transformed way by Christ.

9–11 God intends his people to share in his own Sabbath-rest. This involves resting from the work that is committed to us at present (cf. Rev. 14:13), just as God did from his. However, we are not to think of God’s rest as the rest of inactivity. Scripture makes it clear that he continues to uphold, direct and maintain his creation, having completed the work of establishing it (e.g. 1:3; Ps. 104; Jn. 5:17). The image is rather one of freedom from toil and struggle, to enjoy with God the satisfaction and perfection of his work in creating and redeeming us. Put another way, we will be liberated from all the trials and pressures of our present existence to serve God without hindrance and to live with him for ever (cf. Rev. 7:13–17). There is, therefore, need to make every effort to enter that rest. Since faith is the means by which we enter God’s rest (3), the writer is clearly restating the warning about hardening our hearts in unbelief. He is not saying that we secure our salvation by good works. On the other hand, if faith is genuine, it will be expressed in obedience. So our concern should be that no-one will fall by following the example of the disobedience of the Israelites, as highlighted in Ps. 95:7–11.

12–13 This segment ends with a reflection on the word of God (Gk. ho logos tou Theou) and what it can achieve. There is no ground in the context for identifying this with the personal Word of God mentioned in Jn. 1:1–14. Most obviously, the expression refers to the gospel, which is described in v 2 as ‘the message they heard’ (Gk. ho logos tēs akouēs). The gospel brings the promise of salvation as well as the warning of judgment (cf. 2:1–4). However, it is also clear that Ps. 95 can function as the voice of God, calling us to faith and warning us about hardening our hearts. This scripture is the particular word of God that the writer of Hebrews wants his readers to hear in chs. 3–4. So what is said in vs 12–13 can apply as much to the preached word as to the word of God written in Scripture. In language recalling Is. 55:11, the word of God is said to be living and active, implying that it achieves the purpose for which it is uttered by God. However,

Hebrews does not suggest that everyone who hears the message will automatically believe and enter God's rest. The metaphor of the double-edged sword is used to paint what initially appears to be a rather frightening picture. God's word penetrates to the deepest recesses of our being, opening us up and judging the thoughts and attitudes of the heart. It is the 'critic' (Gk. kritikos) by which all are judged. Indeed, confronted by the word of God, we are confronted by God himself, and nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. When the writer says Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of God, the image is that of an animal with its head thrown back and neck bare, ready to be sacrificed! Put simply, we cannot hide our faces from the one to whom we must give account. If the word of God has its dissecting and exposing effect in our lives now, we will not be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin and come utterly unprepared to face him on the day of reckoning. In the final analysis, then, this passage suggests that the negative or judging function of the word of God can be a help to us in pursuing the journey of faith.

4:14–5:10 The compassion of Christ

High priest is a hook word, linking the argument in 4:14 with the beginning of the previous section (3:1; cf. 2:17), and introducing a new segment. It is also a characteristic term in 4:14–5:10, where the focus is particularly on Christ as a merciful high priest. Jesus' exaltation and entrance into heaven is the basis for a call to hold firmly to the faith we profess (14). His human experience qualifies him to be sympathetic and merciful to those who approach the throne of grace through him (15–16). In 5:1 the writer gives a general definition of the role of the high priest in the OT. He then shows how important it was for a high priest to be able to deal gently with those who are ignorant and are going astray (2–3), and insists that one must be called by God to this office (4). Then, in reverse order, he applies the same criteria to Jesus, highlighting the similarities and differences in his high-priesthood. Jesus' calling by God was to be a priest for ever, in the order of Melchizedek (6). Learning to trust and obey God in the midst of suffering (8), he acquired an understanding of our situation and a compassion that makes him a perfect high priest (7–8; cf. 4:15–16). In general terms, then, Jesus is described as the high priest who became the source of eternal salvation for all who obey him (9).

Readers need to keep in mind that the doctrinal segment (1–10) is included to support and give strength to the exhortations that precede it (4:14–16). Furthermore, it is interesting to note that the large central section of Hebrews (7:1–10:18) concludes with similar exhortations (10:19–23). This proves that the writer's teaching on Jesus' high-priesthood is fundamentally designed to encourage endurance in the struggle against sin and unbelief. We are urged by these passages to take hold of all the spiritual resources available to us in Christ.

14 The great incentive to hold firmly to the faith we profess is the knowledge that Jesus is the Son of God and a great priest who has gone through the heavens. As the Son of God, he is the ultimate revelation of God and the one in whom God's purposes for the universe are completed. As the ultimate high priest, he was faithful to God in the face of suffering and temptation, enduring death to 'make atonement for the sins of the people' (2:17). In his ascension, he passed through the heavens and went into God's presence, 'to appear for us' as our representative (9:24). On the annual Day of Atonement (Lv. 16) the Jewish high priests offered sacrifices outside the tabernacle or temple and then entered the inner tent or sanctuary to intercede for the people on the basis of the offerings they had made. In many different passages, Hebrews suggests the fulfilment of this ritual in the death of Jesus, his ascension into heaven and his work of intercession at the right hand of God (cf. especially 7:25–28; 9:11–12).

15 The preceding verse might suggest the remoteness of Jesus from the struggles of his people on earth. But our heavenly high priest is able to sympathise with our weaknesses because he has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin. The Greek perfect tense (pepeirasmenon, ‘has been tempted’) implies that the exalted Christ carries with him his earthly experiences of resisting sin: he continues to know what it was like to be tested just as we are. But Jesus’ knowledge of our weaknesses does not come from having actually sinned (cf. 9:14; Jn. 8:46; 2 Cor. 5:21; 1 Jn. 3:5). He was made like us ‘in every way’ (2:17; Gk. kata panta) and has been tempted as we are in every way (Gk. kata panta) (4:15). However, to be tempted is not to sin. Jesus was like Adam before he rebelled against God: he had no history of sin and had the freedom not to sin. This did not make him any less human! Indeed, only he who resisted temptation to the end knows its full weight. As Jesus struggled to do the Father’s will in the face of every difficulty (5:7–8; 12:2–3), he proved himself to be a man with a difference and the only one who could possibly save us from the power and penalty of sin.

16 The challenge to approach the throne of grace with confidence is based particularly on the teaching that Jesus is able to sympathise with our weaknesses. He is enthroned with God as the heavenly ruler, whose throne or rule is characterized by grace. The idea of ‘approaching’ or ‘drawing near’ to God is quite prominent in Hebrews (7:19, 25; 10:1, 22; 11:6; 12:18, 22). The old covenant provided limited access to God through the sacrificial system at the tabernacle or the temple. But the high-priestly work of Jesus introduces ‘a better hope’ by which we ‘draw near to God’ (7:19). Coming to God through Jesus means receiving by faith the salvation he makes available to us (7:25; 12:22–24). Continually drawing near (the literal meaning of the present tense of proserchōmetha here and in 10:22), will mean expressing that new covenant relationship with God directly in prayer, seeking mercy for past failures and grace to help us in our time of need. This approach to God for help in running the Christian race is to be with confidence (Gk. meta parrēsia, cf. 3:6; 10:19), in spite of the frankest recognition of our sins.

5:1–4 Certain qualifications for high-priesthood under the old covenant are highlighted here as a basis for explaining more fully how Jesus can be the high priest of the new covenant. High priests were selected and appointed to act as mediators between the people of Israel and God. They were to represent them in matters related to God, specifically, but not exclusively, in offering gifts and sacrifices for sins. On the Day of Atonement, the high priest was to offer sacrifices for his own sins, as well as for the sins of the people (cf. Lv. 16:6; 11–14). This was an indication that the high priest was subject to weakness, like the rest of the community, and in need of cleansing from sin. Such a ritual should have encouraged him to deal gently with those who are ignorant and are going astray. The Greek verb translated ‘to deal gently’ means literally ‘to moderate anger’. The comparison and contrast with Christ is clear: Jewish high priests were at least to control their anger when dealing with those who sinned, but our high priest will actively sympathise with our weaknesses (4:15). From a statement about the general function of the high priest in the Israelite community and a comment about a necessary quality in his ministry, the writer turns to his calling. The honour of such an office is given by God alone: one must be called by God, just as Aaron was (cf. Ex. 28:1; Lv. 8:1; Nu. 16–18).

5–6 In reverse order, the qualifications for priesthood mentioned in vs 1–4 are now applied to Jesus. Christ also did not take upon himself the glory of becoming a high priest but was appointed by God to this role, as indicated in Ps. 110:4. However, before Hebrews quotes that verse, the words of Ps. 2:7 are cited. This recalls the argument of ch. 1, where Ps. 2:7 is taken to affirm the absolute supremacy of the Son of God over the whole creation, including the angels (1:5). Ps. 110:1–3 similarly asserts the triumphant rule of the Messianic king who sits at God’s right hand. However, Ps. 110:4 adds the unusual perspective that the Messiah will be a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek. Joining these psalm citations together, Hebrews again links the idea of Jesus as Son and high priest (cf. 4:14), but makes it quite clear that his priesthood belongs to a different order from that of Aaron and the levitical priests. Jesus fulfils the role and function of the Jewish priesthood as high priest in the order of Melchizedek. The application of Ps. 110:4 to Jesus is explored more fully in Hebrews 7.

7–8 These verses explain how our heavenly high priest is able to ‘sympathise with our weaknesses’ without ever having sinned (cf. 4:15). Although Jesus was severely tested in the course of his whole life on earth (lit. ‘in the days of his flesh’), his experience in the Garden of Gethsemane may be particularly in view here. Mention of his prayers and petitions with loud cries and tears to the one who could save him from death recalls the anguish of Jesus as he faced the cross and appealed to have ‘the cup’ of suffering taken away from him (cf. Mk. 14:34–36 and parallels). The terror of being forsaken by his Father in death (cf. Mk. 15:34) must have especially pressed upon him on that occasion. So Jesus prayed for deliverance from the approaching crisis, but then willingly submitted to the Father’s will so that he might become the source of eternal salvation for others (9). That second stage of Jesus’ experience in Gethsemane is probably reflected in the statement that he was heard because of his reverent submission (Gk. eulabeia can also be translated ‘godly fear’). The answer to his prayer of submission was strength to endure the bitter ordeal facing him and then the triumph and glory of his resurrection. Son of God though he was (8; cf. v 5), he experienced the temptation to swerve from doing the will of his Father because of the suffering involved. He needed to learn what obedience to God involved in practical terms, in the conditions of human life on earth, so that he could sympathize with those similarly tested and teach us by his own example how far God ought to be submitted to and obeyed (cf. 12:1–11; 13:13).

9–10 Learning obedience from what he suffered, Jesus was made perfect (‘perfected’) i.e. ‘qualified’ or ‘made completely adequate’ as the saviour of his people (cf. 2:10). More specifically, he was perfected as the source of eternal salvation. Every experience of testing prepared him for a final act of obedience to the Father in his sacrificial death (cf. 10:5–10). By this means he achieved a salvation from sin, death and the devil, enabling those who trust in him to share with him in the life of the world to come. The idea that Christ establishes a pattern of obedience for others to follow is suggested by the words for all who obey him. However, this expression does not indicate that salvation is to be earned by obedience. Salvation is God’s gift to us in Christ, but those who look to him as the unique source of eternal salvation will want to express their faith in ongoing obedience as he did (cf. 12:1–4). Faith in Christ commits us to share in his struggle against sin.

5:11–10:39 Jesus the perfected high priest in the order of Melchizedek and source of eternal salvation

As the heading suggests, this central section of Hebrews is really an exposition of the themes announced in 5:9–10. After calling attention to the need for progress in understanding and obedience (5:11–6:20), the writer demonstrates how Jesus fulfils the role of ‘high priest in the order of Melchizedek’ (7:1–28). Here Ps. 110:4 is the key text, with Gn. 14:18–20 being used in a supportive role. The perfecting of Christ as our heavenly high priest is mentioned in 7:26–28, as a bridge to the next two chapters, where the writer examines more fully what it meant for Christ to be ‘perfected’. Here Je. 31:31–34 comes into focus, and the implications for us are considered. The idea that Christ is ‘the source of eternal salvation’ is developed in 10:1–18, with Ps. 40:6–8 being used to explain how Christ fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah.

This section ends with another appeal (10:19–39), highlighting the practical consequences of the writer’s complex doctrinal arguments. It is interesting to note how this passage expresses again some of the warnings and encouragements of preceding passages (particularly 4:14–16 and 5:11–6:20). As you read through the section as a whole, and then examine more carefully the meaning of its various parts, keep in mind that the exhortations reveal the purpose of the theological teaching.

5:11–6:20 A call to learn and progress

Before launching into the argument of chs. 7–10, the writer offers both warnings (5:11–6:8) and encouragements (6:9–20). His teaching about Christ’s high-priestly work will not be grasped or applied by those who have become slow to learn and unwilling to work out the deeper implications of their faith. Anyone who continues to avoid such solid food can never be mature as a Christian (5:11–14). Indeed, resistance to spiritual growth may lead people to fall away or completely rebel against God, because they are hardening their hearts against God (6:1–8).

Despite the seriousness of the warning, the writer is persuaded about the reality of the commitment of those he addresses. But he wants each of them to show the same diligence that they did in the past, working out the implications of their Christian hope in everyday living, and persisting in faith and patience to the end (6:9–12). Having reached a certain level of maturity, some seemed to be unwilling to press on any further. To renew their confidence in God, the writer reminds them that God confirmed his promise to Abraham with an oath and that he has similarly guaranteed the high-priesthood of Jesus in Ps. 110:4. The hope that this offers us is like an anchor for the soul, firm and secure (6:13–20). Only unbelief will cause people to miss out on what has been achieved for us by our great high priest.

11–14 The readers have become slow to learn or more literally ‘dull with respect to what is heard’. Despite their initial enthusiasm as Christians, a certain sluggishness has crept in and the writer fears they may now be unwilling to work out the deeper implications of the gospel and respond with faith and obedience (cf. 2:1–4; 3:1–4:2, where the key issue is responding to what is heard). One sign of this developing slackness is their unwillingness or inability to be teachers. After a certain time, anyone instructed in the faith ought to be able to explain it to others (cf. 3:13; 10:24–25; 1 Thes. 5:11, 1 Pet. 3:15). If people want to be taught the elementary truths of God’s word all over again, when they should be communicating basic Christian teaching to others and desiring solid food for themselves, a serious case of arrested spiritual growth has developed. As in the physical realm, milk is the appropriate food for an infant but solid food is for the mature. The writer equates spiritual milk with what he describes as (lit.) ‘the first principles of the oracles of God’ (Gk. ta stoicheia tēs archēs tōn logiōn tou Theou). This could mean that the readers needed some guidelines for interpreting the OT (‘the oracles of God’) from a Christian point of view. More specifically, the expression may be a parallel to what 6:1 describes as the elementary teachings about Christ (Gk. ton tēs archēs tou Christou logon). Solid food will involve a deeper understanding of fundamental biblical truth (as in chs. 7–10). A spiritual infant is virtually defined as someone not acquainted with the teaching about righteousness, that is, teaching which can motivate them to righteousness (cf. 12:11). Furthermore, immature Christians have not trained themselves to distinguish good from evil by the constant practice of responding to God’s revelation.

6:1–3 Although the writer has accused the readers of immaturity and has insisted that solid food is for the mature (5:14), he intends to feed them solid food so that they might go on to maturity (lit. ‘be borne along to maturity’)! They need the insight and commitment that solid food can bring. When he says let us leave the elementary teachings about Christ, he does not mean ‘abandon completely the basic truths listed’. Progress is made by not laying again the foundation of elementary teaching but by building on this foundation. It is interesting to note that the elementary teachings mentioned here are not distinctively Christian. Practically every item could have been endorsed by orthodox Judaism. However, each item acquired a new significance in the light of Christian teaching about Jesus as Israel’s Messiah. So the impression is given that existing Jewish beliefs and practices were used as a foundation for expounding Christian truth. The solid food of Hebrews is a development of biblical themes such as repentance from acts that lead to death and faith in God, resurrection of the dead and eternal judgment, in the light of teaching about Jesus as Son of God and high priest of the new covenant. Instruction about baptisms (plural) may refer to Jewish ceremonial washings (cf. 9:10) and their fulfilment in Christ. The laying on of hands was a Jewish practice, associated with prayer, which was adapted in various ways by the earliest Christians (e.g. Acts 8:17; 9:17–18; 13:3). Under pressure of persecution, converts from Judaism must have been tempted ‘to give up more and more those features of faith and practice which were distinctive of Christianity, and yet to feel that they had not abandoned the basic principles of repentance and faith, the realities denoted by religious ablutions and the laying on of hands, the expectation of resurrection and the judgment of the age to come.’ (F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, [Eerdmans, 2, 1990], p. 143).

4–6 The stern warning of these verses (echoed in 10:26–31; 12:15–17) is for those who fall away or commit apostasy (cf. 3:12), because they cut themselves off from the only sacrifice for sins under the new covenant and the only hope of eternal life in Jesus Christ. Such people are crucifying the Son of God all over again, rejecting him as deliberately as his executioners did, and subjecting him to public disgrace, openly putting themselves in the position of his enemies. Nothing is impossible for God, but he offers us no hope of reclaiming those who take a continuous and hard-hearted stand against Christ. As noted in connection with 3:12–13, those who harden their hearts against God may reach a point where they are ‘hardened’ beyond recall. The writer does not accuse his readers of being in this position, but the fate of apostates is something they and we should not forget. In its context, this passage stands as a warning about where sluggishness could lead.

But can genuine Christians become apostate? Hebrews certainly suggest that those who fall away may have every appearance of being truly converted. They have once been enlightened, indicating a decisive entrance of the light of the gospel into their lives. They have tasted the heavenly gift, which may mean receiving Christ himself and all the spiritual blessings he offers. ‘Tasting’ implies experiencing something in a manner that is real and personal (not merely ‘sipping’). They have shared in the Holy Spirit (lit. ‘having become partakers of the Holy Spirit’), so that their rebellion involves insulting the Spirit of grace (10:29). Finally we are told that they have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age. This suggests a decisive experience of the benefits of the new covenant. However, those who have enjoyed such a relationship with God cannot presume on that relationship, believing themselves to be immune from the possibility of apostasy. Promises like Jn. 10:28–29 and Phil. 1:6 are a guarantee that God will keep his children faithful to the end. Hebrews has its own way of encouraging confidence in God’s ability to sustain us in our faith. But we all need to be challenged to make our 'calling and election sure' (2 Pet. 1:10), and this is the practical and pastoral significance of the warning passages in Hebrews.

We may wish to say that those who are truly regenerate will never fall away, but the genuineness of the new birth is proved by persistence in faith. The writer of Hebrews is clearly confident that a true work of God has taken place in the congregation he addresses (6:9; 10:39). 'But this does not exclude the possibility that some of their number are rebellious at heart and, unless there is a radical change, will find that they have reached the point of irremediable apostasy.' (P. E. Hughes, A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (Eerdmans, 1977), p. 212). It is possible to get caught up in the spiritual experience of a group without being genuinely converted. Sometimes people show all the signs of conversion but drift away from Christ after a time and demonstrate that they were never truly God's children. More specifically, the writer has in view those who see clearly where the truth lies, conform to it for a while, and then, for various reasons, renounce it. Continuance is the test of reality. Those who persevere are the true saints and a passage like this will be used by God to sustain them in faith.

7–8 Jesus used the parable of four 'soils' to explain different responses people have to the gospel (Mk. 4:1–20 and parallels). Hebrews only refers to two possibilities. The good soil that drinks in the rain often falling on it and that produces a crop useful to those for whom it is farmed receives the blessing of God. This refers to those who persist in hearing and obeying the word of God. By God's grace they are spiritually fruitful. The bad soil that produces thorns and thistles is worthless and is in danger of being cursed. It never responds to cultivation and in the end it will be burned. This describes the fate of those who harden their hearts in unbelief and turn away from God (cf. 10:26–31). The writer provides no middle ground for the sluggish and the slack. He wants his readers to be sure that they all fit into the first category!

9–10 Words of encouragement now follow the stark warnings of vs 4–8. The writer is confident of better things in the case of his dear friends. More particularly, he is suggesting that, as a group, they fit into the category of the good soil in v 7. Such people receive the blessings of God that accompany salvation. His confidence is partly based on the recollection of their past and present behaviour and partly on the justice of God. The work and the love they have shown him was done lit. 'for his name'. It involved ministering and continuing to minister to his people (Gk. tois hagiois; 'to the saints'). A remarkable example of this is recorded in 10:32–34. When the writer says God is not unjust; he will not forget such things, the focus is not simply on reward for services rendered. God knows the reality of their spiritual lives and if he so motivated expressions of genuine Christianity in the past he can be relied upon to do so again in the future. The motif of God's faithfulness is further developed in vs 13–20.

11–12 The writer's earnest desire that each one of his friends should persevere as a Christian comes out again. Their faithfulness to Christ and practical concern for one another in testing times were inspired by a compelling hope (10:34). Now, when their greatest enemy seems to be sluggishness, they need to show the same diligence (lit. 'zeal'), to keep hope fully alive to the very end. A lively hope is the basis for effective Christian living in every context. Those who have this motivation will not be overwhelmed by sluggishness (Gk. nōthroi is used here as in 5:11, but without qualification). In fact, they will become imitators of those who through faith and patience inherit what has been promised. Such language anticipates the argument of 11:1–12:13.

13–15 The basis of Christian hope is not wishful thinking about the future but the solemn promise of God. The foundation of God's saving activity in the world was the particular promise made to Abraham in Gn. 12:1–3 and repeated at various stages to the forefathers of Israel in different forms (e.g. Gn. 15:1–21; 26:2–4; 28:13–15; Ex. 3:6–10). God would multiply the descendants of Abraham, making them into a great nation, establishing them in their own land, and would bless them so that they might become a source of blessing to all nations. On one particular occasion, God confirmed the truthfulness of this promise with an oath (cf. Gn. 22:16, ‘I swear by myself, declares the LORD’). Hebrews notes that Abraham was encouraged by this to wait patiently for what was promised. God began to fulfil his promise in Abraham’s lifetime, but the ultimate blessing came in the person of Jesus the Messiah.

16–18 In human affairs, the oath confirms what is said and puts an end to all argument. So God used this particular form of speech to make the unchanging nature of his promise very clear to those who were the heirs of what was promised. He used two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie, namely his promise and his oath, to give the greatest possible encouragement to his people to put their trust in him. It is clear from what follows that we who have fled to take hold of the hope offered to us in Jesus are the ultimate heirs of what was promised to Abraham (cf. Gal. 3:26–29).

19–20 These verses must be read in the light of 7:20–22, where it is argued that God confirmed the high-priesthood of the Messiah in Ps. 110:4 with an oath similar to the one used in Gn. 22:16. Since Jesus is the promised high priest in the order of Melchizedek, he has become ‘the guarantee’ of the blessings of the new covenant (7:22). Those who rely on him can actually enter the inner sanctuary behind the curtain, where he has gone before us and has entered on our behalf. Jesus is literally our ‘forerunner’, opening the way for us to follow! The inner sanctuary of the tabernacle and later the temple represented the presence of God with his people on earth (cf. Ex. 26:31–34; 1 Ki. 8:6–11). Hebrews uses this language to refer to the heavenly sanctuary, where God is enthroned in all his glory. We can approach him with confidence right now because Jesus our heavenly high priest has offered the perfect sacrifice and sits at God’s right hand (cf. 4:14–16; 10:19–22). However, the imagery in 6:19–20 also conveys the idea that our destiny is to live for ever in God’s holy and glorious presence. We can literally go where Jesus has gone. Thus, the heavenly sanctuary is another way of describing ‘the world to come’ (2:5), the ‘Sabbath-rest for the people of God’ (4:9), and ‘the heavenly country’ or ‘city’ (11:16; 12:22–24; 13:14), which has been the ultimate hope of the people of God throughout the ages. This hoped-for goal has been achieved and opened up for us by our Saviour. Jesus as our hope has entered the sanctuary and remains there as an anchor for the soul, firm and secure.

So the antidote to spiritual apathy and apostasy is the renewal of hope. Hope is the motivation for faithfulness and love. The basis for our hope is the promise of God, confirmed with an oath. Since the saving promises of God have already been fulfilled for us in the death and heavenly exaltation of the Lord Jesus Christ, this gives us every encouragement to believe that those who trust in Jesus will share with him in the promised eternal inheritance.

7:1–28 The eternal high priesthood of Christ

Several indications have already been given that Jesus is ‘high priest for ever in the order of Melchizedek’ (cf. 5:6, 10; 6:20). That theme is now fully developed as the writer comes to the heart of his message and begins to feed his readers the ‘solid food’ that promotes spiritual maturity (cf. 5:11–14). The first part of this chapter deals with the encounter between Abraham and Melchizedek in Gn. 14, focusing on the significance of Melchizedek’s priesthood in that context (1–10). The second part of the chapter takes up the specific promise of Ps. 110:4, about the Messiah being a priest like Melchizedek, and applies it to the Lord Jesus (11–28). Perfection was not possible under the Levitical priesthood, but Jesus’ high-priestly ministry replaces the whole OT system of approaching God and ‘perfects’ believers in a relationship with him (11–19). The significance of the oath confirming the Messiah’s priesthood is explored (20–22) and then the implications of the promise that he will be priest for ever are outlined (23–25). The chapter concludes by showing how such a high priest, in contrast with the high priests of the old covenant, meets our need as sinners (26–28). Ch. 7 is the third stage in the development of the idea that Jesus is the high priest of the new covenant (cf. 2:17–18; 4:14–5:10).

1–3 Ps. 110:4 is the key text in this chapter. To indicate what the psalm meant by a priest for ever in the order of Melchizedek, Hebrews goes back to Gn. 14:18–20, highlighting only certain features of the Genesis narrative. Melchizedek’s name means king of righteousness and the fact that he was king of Salem (derived from Heb. šālôm, ‘peace’) means that he was king of peace. In name, at least, he anticipated the Messiah’s reign of righteousness and peace (e.g. Is. 9:6–7; Heb. 1:8–9). Most importantly, he is identified as priest of God Most High, who blessed Abraham and received a tithe (a tenth of everything) from Abraham, the great forefather or patriarch of Israel. Moreover, in the record of Scripture, Melchizedek is without father or mother, without genealogy, without beginning of days or end of life. He appears from nowhere and disappears without trace. He has no predecessors and no successors. Since the legitimacy of a man’s priesthood in the ancient world depended on such things, the silence of Scripture at this point is unusual. Melchizedek is like the Son of God in the sense that he foreshadows his unique and never-ending priesthood. In technical terms, he is a ‘type’ or pattern of Christ. Ps. 110 envisaged the appearance of another king of Jerusalem (‘city of Salem’), exercising a priesthood like Melchizedek’s, not apparently based on physical descent from any known priesthood, but nevertheless divinely appointed. Hebrews proclaims Jesus Christ as the promised priest-king, who reigns for ever to bless his people (cf. 5:4–6; 7:13–17).

4–10 Taking up the matter of the tithe paid by Abraham to Melchizedek, Hebrews notes that the law of Moses required the descendants of Levi who become priests to collect a tenth from the people (cf. Nu. 18:21–32). However, Melchizedek, who did not trace his descent from Levi, collected a tithe from Abraham, the forefather of Levi! Indeed, so great is Melchizedek that he blessed Abraham, the one to whom God had given the promises concerning his saving purposes (cf. Heb. 6:13–14). Since the lesser person is blessed by the greater (7), this puts Melchizedek in a very significant position. The tithes paid to the Levitical priesthood were collected by men who die, but Abraham paid a tithe to one who is declared to be living (8). That is, in the biblical record, Melchizedek is represented as one who had no end of life (3), and this suggests that his priesthood was superior. It could even be said that Levi, and therefore the Levitical priests, paid tithes to Melchizedek through Abraham. This prepares us for the argument in vs 11–19 that the priesthood of Jesus is superior to and supersedes the Levitical priesthood and its ministry.

11–12 When Ps. 110:4 spoke about the need for another priest to come—one in the order of Melchizedek, not in the order of Aaron, the inference was that there was something lacking in the existing priesthood. In fact, the priesthood descended from Aaron and exercised by some of the Levites was unable to provide perfection. For the first time, the language of perfection (applied to Christ in 2:10; 5:9; 7:28) is applied to the situation of believers. The law of Moses made nothing perfect, but in Jesus Christ a better hope is introduced, by which we draw near to God (19). This last reference suggests that the perfecting of believers involves ‘qualifying’ them to draw near to God or enabling them to enjoy the certainty of a new covenant relationship with God. More will be said about this important concept later. In simple terms, Christ’s sacrifice deals with the problem of sin in a way that the Levitical priesthood and the law of Moses could not. Indeed, the law and the priesthood were so connected that a change of the priesthood meant that there had to be a change of the law as well (12). Here it should be noted that the writer of Hebrews views the law essentially as a set of sacrificial and priestly regulations for the maintenance of Israel's relationship with God. The limitations of the system as a whole are outlined in chs. 9–10.

13–17 Only certain people were authorized to serve at the altar, according to the Mosaic law (e.g. Lv. 8–9; Nu. 1:47–54). Jesus our Lord belonged to the tribe of Judah, and in connection with that tribe Moses said nothing about priests. So, if Jesus is a priest, he must belong to another order. In dealing with this objection, the writer notes again the prediction of Ps. 110:4 that the Messianic priesthood would be in the order of Melchizedek. A descendant of Levi became a priest on the basis of a regulation as to his ancestry. Jesus became a priest for ever, in the order of Melchizedek, on the basis of the power of an indestructible life. This last expression is best understood as a reference to Jesus' resurrection and his heavenly exaltation. He clearly functioned as high priest of the new covenant on earth, when he offered himself as a perfect sacrifice for our sins. But he had to be brought to life again to function as a priest for ever, serving in the heavenly sanctuary, at the right hand of God (cf. 8:1–2).

18–19 The former regulation is the law establishing the OT priesthood on the basis of proper ancestry and physical purity. It was weak and useless because death prevented those priests from continuing in office (23) and their own weakness made it continually necessary for them to sacrifice for their own sins as well as for the sins of the people (27). Indeed, the law made nothing perfect (see note on 7:11–12), because it was only 'a shadow of the good things to come' (10:1). The regulation establishing the OT priesthood was set aside when God inaugurated a new priesthood and provided a sacrifice to end all sacrifices (cf. 10:5–10). A better hope is introduced with the high-priestly ministry of Jesus, by which we draw near to God. The certainty of a once-for-all cleansing from sin and of the possibility of continuing in an eternal relationship with God is at the heart of this better hope.

20–22 The promise establishing the priest-hood of the Messiah was confirmed with an oath: the Lord has sworn and will not change his mind (Ps. 110:4). An oath attached to a promise makes 'the unchanging nature of his purpose very clear' (6:17). So the eternity of Jesus' priesthood is established. Because of this oath it can also be affirmed that Jesus has become the guarantee of a better covenant. When the writer takes up the theme of this better covenant in later passages, he describes Jesus as the 'mediator' of a new covenant (8:6; 9:15; 12:24). This means that he inaugurates the covenant blessings predicted in Je. 31:31–34 (quoted in 8:8–12). The word guarantee (22) suggests even more: Jesus' priestly ministry continues to vouch for the fact that those blessings are readily available. The better covenant is the basis for the Christian's better hope.

23–25 The uniqueness and eternity of Christ's priesthood has really been the heart of the argument in this complicated chapter. There were many priests under the old covenant, because death prevented them from continuing in office. However, since the resurrected and ascended Jesus lives for ever, he has a permanent priesthood. He remains the same (cf. 1:8–12; 13:8) and his priestly office and work are absolute and unchangeable. The word therefore at the beginning of v 25 introduces the logical consequence to all this. Here is the practical application of the writer's teaching about Jesus as priest for ever in the order of Melchizedek. Jesus is able to save completely those who come to God through him. The idea of 'approaching', 'drawing near', or 'coming' to God is prominent in Hebrews (cf. 4:16; 7:19; 10:1, 22; 11:6; 12:18, 22). Fundamentally, it expresses the idea of a relationship with God. The OT priesthood and sacrificial system only imperfectly provided for such a relationship, but Jesus is able to save completely those who relate to God through him. The language of salvation here implies deliverance from the alternative, which is the judgment of God (cf. 2:1–4; 9:27–28; 10:26–31). In fact, Christians can look to Jesus for help at every stage in their earthly pilgrimage, because he always lives to intercede for them (cf. Rom. 8:34; 1 Jn 2:1–2). The image of the heavenly intercessor is used to emphasize Christ’s willingness and ability to go on applying to us the benefits of his once-for-all sacrifice (cf. 2:18; 4:14–16; 10:19–22). However, the image should not be pushed too far. Jesus sits at the right hand of God, claiming the fulfilment of the covenant promises for his children, not begging for their acceptance before the Father’s throne!

26–28 Jesus meets our need as high priest firstly because he is holy, blameless, pure. These three adjectives recall the teaching about his sinlessness (4:15) and explain why his sacrifice was so perfect, needing no repetition. He remained obedient to God through a lifetime of testing. As a faultless high priest, he sacrificed for the sins of God’s people once for all, when he offered himself (27; cf. 9:14). This is a new thought, explaining exactly how he made ‘purification’ (1:3) or ‘atonement for the sins of the people’ (2:17). Note the emphasis on the once for all nature of his sacrifice here and in 9:12, 26, 28; 10:10. Unlike the high priests of Judasim, he does not need to offer sacrifices day after day, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people. The perfection of his sacrifice is associated with the perfection of the victim. Jesus also meets our need as high priest because he is now set apart from sinners, exalted above the heavens. His heavenly exaltation means that he always lives to apply the benefits of his saving work to us (25). The law of Moses appointed men who are weak as high priests, but the oath of Ps. 110:4 appointed the Son to be high priest of a different order. He was qualified to fulfil this role or made perfect for ever (28; cf. notes on 2:10; 5:9) by means of his obedient life, his sacrificial death and his entrance into the heavenly presence of God (as vs 26–27 suggest).

8:1–13 The mediator of the new covenant

In chs. 8 and 9 the writer shows how the ‘perfecting’ of Jesus makes it possible for us to enjoy the benefits of the new covenant. Je. 31:31–34 is quoted in full here, and later in an abbreviated form (10:16–17), demonstrating the centrality of that text to the argument of the central section of Hebrews. Before the writer begins his reflection on Jeremiah’s prophecy, he notes that the sphere of Jesus’ present ministry is the true tabernacle set up by the Lord, not by man (1–2). This leads to a further comparison between Jesus’ priesthood and the priesthood of those who offer the gifts prescribed by the law and serve at a sanctuary that is only a copy and shadow of what is in heaven (3–5). The superiority of Jesus’ ministry is tied up with the fact that it is focused on the heavenly sanctuary. His ministry is also superior because it establishes the new covenant (6–12), making the first one obsolete (13). Christians need to understand how the prophecy of the new covenant is fulfilled because it is the basis of our relationship with God through the Lord Jesus Christ.

1–2 The writer’s main point is that we have the sort of high priest described in the last chapter, one who sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven. This last expression is a reverent and solemn way of describing God as the majestic ruler of all things. Christ shares in that heavenly rule but also serves in a priestly role (Gk. leitourgos means that he is lit. ‘a minister’ or ‘a servant’), as outlined in 7:25. The heavenly throne room can thus be pictured, as a sanctuary or ‘holy place’, which is the true tabernacle set up by the Lord, not by man. The true tabernacle is the heavenly reality upon which the tabernacle in Moses’ time was modelled (cf. v 5). Although God showed Moses the pattern to follow, the result was only a ‘man-made sanctuary’ (Gk. cheiropoiēta, lit. ‘made with hands’, 9:24). The tabernacle set up by the Lord is not man-made, and is ‘not a part of this creation’ (9:11). With this imagery the writer indicates that the purpose of Jesus’ entrance into heaven ‘was to appear for us in God’s presence’ (9:24). His ministry on earth equipped him for this heavenly service.

3–5 The general principle that every high priest is appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices (cf. 5:1) means that Jesus must have something to offer. It is clear from 7:27 that ‘he offered himself’, but the writer does not develop that theme until later. He merely insists again that Jesus’ priesthood is of a different order. In fact, If he were on earth he would not be a priest, since there are already those who offer the gifts prescribed by the law. Some readers with a Jewish background may have considered that there was something lacking in Christianity because it offered no elaborate ceremony in an earthly sanctuary. Hebrews makes the opposite point. Christ introduces the ultimate, spiritual realities to which the old covenant ritual pointed, fulfilling and replacing the whole system prescribed in the law of Moses. The levitical priests only operated in a sanctuary that was a copy and shadow of what is in heaven (5), whereas Christ serves in a true tabernacle (2). Ex. 25:40 is used to support the argument that the earthly tabernacle was to be the shadowy outline of a heavenly model.

6 The writer seems to change tack at this point, leaving aside the imagery of priesthood, sanctuary and sacrifice, and identifying Jesus as mediator of a better covenant. However, a connection between priesthood and law or covenant was established in 7:11–12, and the theme of Jesus’ high-priestly ministry is closely linked with the fulfilment of the promises of Je. 31:31–34 in chs. 9–10. Jesus inaugurates or mediates the benefits of the new covenant by means of his death and heavenly exaltation (cf. 7:22; 9:11–15; 10:12–18). This covenant is superior to the old one because it is founded on better promises. Those promises are recorded in the long quotation from Jeremiah that follows.

7–9 At the time of the Babylonian exile in the sixth century BC, Jeremiah’s words indicated that God found fault with the people. When he promised a new covenant, the implication was that there had been something wrong with that first covenant, established at the time of the exodus from Egypt. The essential problem was with the people—they did not remain faithful to my covenant (9)—and so the judgment of the exile followed. Hebrews goes on to show that part of the problem was the ritual, which was designed to help the people ‘until the time of the new order’ (9:10), but which was limited in its effect. It should be noted here that the new covenant is made with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah. Nothing is specifically mentioned about the way Gentiles come to share in its blessings (cf. Gal. 3–4; Rom. 9–11). However, it is quite clear that anyone who has confidence in Jesus Christ and what he achieved will share in the fulfilment of God’s promises to his ancient people (e.g. 3:14; 4:3; 5:9; 7:25).

10–12 God’s willingness to re-establish his special relationship with Israel is expressed in the key words I will be their God and they will be my people. However, in renewing the covenant he promises, I will put my laws in their minds and write them on their hearts, to give them the desire and the ability to please him (10). Hebrews views the fulfilment of this promise in Jesus’ cleansing of the hearts of his people from a guilty conscience, so that they may ‘serve the living God’ (9:14; cf. 10:19–25). God also promised through Jeremiah that every member of the new covenant community would know him directly and personally, from the least of them to the greatest (11). Hebrews implies that this promise is fulfilled in the direct approach to God ‘with confidence’ that Jesus makes possible (4:16; 7:25; 10:19–22; cf. 12:22–24). Finally, the word For in v 12 shows that the basis of these promises is the assurance of a decisive cleansing from sin: For I will forgive their wickedness, and will remember their sins no more. It is clear from

chs. 9–10 that Jesus' sacrifice achieves the fulfilment of that foundational promise (e.g. 9:14, 26, 28; 10:10, 14).

13 The need for the priesthood, sanctuary and sacrificial system of the old covenant is now removed. This makes it possible for believers of every race and culture to draw near to God through Jesus. Although God says nothing specifically about this in the prophecy of Jeremiah, by calling this covenant 'new', he has made the first one obsolete. So the ritual provisions of the old covenant are at the heart of what is obsolete and ageing and will soon disappear.

9:1–10 The limitations of the old covenant

This chapter develops the contrast between the old and the new, the earthly and the heavenly. In 9:1 the writer announces two aspects of the first covenant which he then treats in reverse order: its earthly sanctuary (2–5) and its regulations for worship (6–10). The earthly nature of the Mosaic sanctuary and its ritual limited its effectiveness as a means of relating to God. Indeed, the whole system was only a symbol of what the new covenant would bring. Its rituals could not clear the conscience of the worshipper, but concerned only fleshly externals, being in force until the time of the new order. Although this section may not at first appear to be relevant to the Christian reader, it provides a basis for the argument in the rest of the chapter, where wonderful perspectives on the person and the work of the Lord Jesus are unfolded.

1–5 The sanctuary of the first covenant was earthly or 'worldly' in the sense that it was made by human hands (cf. 8:2; 9:11, 24) and provided only a shadowy outline of the heavenly or spiritual realities now made available through the ministry of Jesus Christ (cf. 8:5–6; 9:11–12). The writer dwells on the features of the tabernacle constructed by Moses in the desert. But much that is said here could also apply to the later temple in Jerusalem, which was modelled on the tabernacle. Preparing for the argument of vs 6–10, the writer brings out as strongly as possible the distinction between the two divisions in the sanctuary, the Holy Place and the Most Holy Place. Each room contained furniture necessary for a variety of rituals, together with symbols of God's past dealings with Israel and of his continuing presence with them. The most important item in the inner sanctuary was the gold-covered ark of the covenant. The covering of the ark was called the atonement cover or 'mercy seat' and this was the focus of the annual Day of Atonement ritual. Here the blood of sacrificed animals was sprinkled by the high priest to make atonement for sins (cf. Lv. 16:14–17). The cherubim of the Glory, overshadowing the place of atonement, pointed to the invisible presence of God, who was thought to be 'enthroned between the cherubim' (1 Sa. 4:4; cf. Ex. 25:17–22).

6–7 The focus now shifts from the contents of the tabernacle to the services that took place there. The first covenant required that the people approach God through their representatives the priests. These men regularly entered the outer room or first tent to carry on their ministry. This included the daily trimming of the lamps (Ex. 27:21), the weekly replacement of the breads (Lv. 24:5) and the daily sacrifices (Ex. 29:38–46). The unique role of the high priest was to enter the inner room, and that only once a year, on the Day of Atonement. Entrance into the Most Holy Place was never without blood, which the high priest offered for himself and for the sins the people had committed in ignorance (cf. Lv. 16). This ritual made it perfectly clear that God could only be approached on his own terms.

8–10 The writer claims special insight from the Holy Spirit into the meaning and purpose of these OT provisions. As long as the first tabernacle was still standing, there was no decisive revelation of the way into the Most Holy Place, meaning the way into the true, heavenly sanctuary (cf. 9:12; 10:19–20). The first tabernacle normally describes the outer tent of Israel's earthly sanctuary. However, here the expression is apparently used to refer to the whole system of sacrifice and priestly ministry associated with the tabernacle and the temple. So the outer tent is an illustration (Gk. parabolē) for the present time. At a literal level, the outer tent obscured the way into the second tent. At a symbolic level, the tabernacle and all its ritual stood in the way of direct and permanent access to God. In certain respects the law foreshadowed and prepared for the ministry of Christ. But when the new covenant was inaugurated, the inadequacies of the old covenant cult became glaringly obvious. A particular weakness of the worship of that earthly sanctuary is then emphasized. Gifts and sacrifices were offered which were (lit.) ‘not able to perfect the worshipper with respect to conscience’ (‘to perfect’, as in 10:1; cf. 10:14; 11:40; 12:23). The rituals actually left the participants feeling guilty for their sins (10:2), because they were externally oriented regulations (10, lit. ‘fleshly ordinances’). They were imposed until the time of the new order, until ‘Christ came as high priest of the good things that are already here’ (11). The ability of Christ to cleanse the conscience is stressed in 9:14 and 10:22. With this removal of the burden of guilt, liberating us to serve God with confidence and gratitude (9:14; 12:28), Jeremiah’s prophecy of the new covenant is fulfilled.

9:11–28 The achievement of Christ in his death and exaltation

Following on from the first half of the chapter, it could be said that this section is about ‘the heavenly sanctuary’ and its ‘regulations for worship’. Jesus Christ is the high priest who ascended into the Most Holy Place in the heavenly realm (11). By the blood he shed on the cross, he obtained eternal redemption for those who rely on him. Right now, this means that our consciences can be cleansed from the defilement of sin and we can worship acceptably and serve the living God (12–14). Ultimately, Christ’s sacrifice makes it possible for those who are called to receive the promised eternal inheritance (15). So the shedding of his blood inaugurates the new covenant, with its promise of a once-for-all and decisive forgiveness of sins (16–23). He entered into heaven to appear for us in God’s presence (9:24–25), having dealt with the problem of sin by the sacrifice of himself (26). When he reappears from the heavenly sanctuary, he will bring the full experience of salvation to those who are waiting for him (27–28). Thus, with the application of several OT concepts and images, this passage has much to teach us about the benefits of Jesus’ saving work for us, now and in the future.

11–12 With the appearance of Christ as high priest of the good things that are already here, the things foreshadowed in the OT have become a reality! The writer explains this first by showing more precisely how Christ fulfilled the role of the high priest on the annual Day of Atonement (cf. 7:26–27; 9:7; Lv. 16:1–19). The high priests passed through the outer tent into the Most Holy Place. There they sprinkled on the place of atonement the blood of animals sacrificed outside the tabernacle and interceded for the people. Jesus, on the other hand, passed through the greater and more perfect tabernacle that is not man-made, that is to say, not a part of this creation. His priestly ministry opens the way into the heavenly sanctuary or heaven itself (24; cf. 8:1–2). After he had been crucified as a sacrifice for our sins, he ascended ‘through the heavens’ (4:14), to sit at God’s hand and ‘intercede’ for us (7:25). He did not enter the heavenly presence of God by means of the blood of goats and calves but by means of his own blood. And since his sacrifice was so perfect he entered the Most Holy Place once for all: his crucifixion and heavenly exaltation need not be repeated. Indeed, he has obtained eternal redemption. The word ‘redemption’ suggests liberation at the price of his life. A similar expression in 9:15 is translated a ransom to set them free and it is clear from the context that this liberation is from the judgment and guilt produced by sin. So eternal redemption is another way of speaking about the once-for-all and standing offer of forgiveness promised in Je. 31:34.

13–14 Outlining the practical consequences of Christ's death, the writer compares the effect of offering animal blood or sprinkling the ashes of a heifer (cf. Nu. 19). These rituals were for the benefit of those who were ceremonially unclean, to sanctify them by making them outwardly clean (lit. 'for the purification of the flesh'). Those who were defiled could be restored to fellowship with God in the sense that they were able to participate again in the worship of the community. The fundamental truth that blood 'purifies' and 'sanctifies', even if only at a ceremonial level, provides the basis for the How much more argument that follows. The blood of Christ is a way of speaking about his death as a sacrifice for sins. This was uniquely effective because he offered himself unblemished to God. Once again the writer alludes to Jesus' life of perfect obedience to the Father, culminating in the cross (cf. 5:7–9; 7:26–27; 10:10). Through the eternal Spirit most likely refers to the power of the Holy Spirit upholding and maintaining him (cf. Is. 42:1), though some would take it to mean his own spirit, highlighting the interior or spiritual quality of his sacrifice. The blood of Christ is powerful enough to cleans our consciences from acts that lead to death. God requires repentance from such acts (6:1, lit. 'dead works'), sins that defile the conscience and bring his judgment. But those who repent need to be cleansed from such defilement and only the death of Jesus can do this (cf. 9:9 with 9:14). The purpose of cleansing in the OT was that the people might be consecrated again to God's service. The new covenant promise of a renewed 'heart', based on a decisive forgiveness of sins (Je. 31:33–34), is echoed in v 14. Only the cleansing provided by Christ can set us free to serve the living God in the way that Jeremiah predicted. The nature of this 'service' or 'worship' (Gk. latreuein) will be discussed in connection with 12:28.

15 The link between Jesus' high-priestly work and the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy is further explored. By means of his death, Christ is the mediator of a new covenant (cf. 8:6; 12:24). First, he died as a ransom to set them free from the sins committed under the first covenant. As noted in connection with v 12, his death is the price of liberation from the judgment and guilt produced by sin (cf. Je. 31:34). The focus is on redeeming those who sinned under the first covenant, as promised in Je. 31:31–32. Indeed, Jesus' sacrifice is retrospective in its effect and is valid for all who trusted God for the forgiveness of their sins in ancient Israel (cf. 11:40). But we also know that, by the grace of God, he tasted death 'for everyone' (2:9) and he is able to save all who 'come to God through him' (7:25). Secondly, on the basis of his death, those who are called may receive the promised eternal inheritance. Just as the old covenant promised the land of Canaan as an inheritance for God's people, so the covenant inaugurated by Christ opens the way to an eternal inheritance. This is equivalent to 'the world to come' (2:5), the 'Sabbath-rest for the people of God' (4:9), 'the heavenly Jerusalem' (12:22) and other such descriptions of our destiny as Christians. Jesus has opened the way to his inheritance for us by dealing with the sin that keeps us from drawing near to God.

16–22 The idea of an inheritance leads the writer to a play on words. The Greek word diathēkē is first employed in the technical and legal sense of a will (16–17). In ordinary human affairs, for the benefits of a person's will to be operative, it is necessary to prove the death of the one who made it. The same word is then used to refer to the covenant which God made with Israel in Moses' time (18–20). There was no need for the covenant-maker to die in this case but the first covenant was not put into effect without blood. The writer draws attention to the ceremony mentioned in Ex. 24:1–8, when Moses sprinkled the altar and the people with sacrificial blood and called upon them to obey everything that God had commanded. Thus, the relationship with the Lord was sealed and confirmed with the blood of the covenant and the sanctified status of the nation was proclaimed. Hebrews adds other details from OT cleansing rituals to indicate the comprehensive way in which blood was used for purification under the first covenant (21). This leads to a concluding observation (the law requires that nearly everything be cleansed with blood) and a fundamental principle (without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness). Although blood was largely used for ceremonial cleansing (13), these rituals pointed to the more profound needs of God's people for release from the power and penalty of sin.

23–24 The copies of the heavenly things—the tabernacle and everything used in its ceremonies—had to be purified with sacrificial blood. Israel's sanctuary was man-made and only a copy of the true one, which is heaven itself (24; cf. 8:5). When the writer says the heavenly things themselves needed to be purified with better sacrifices than these, he can hardly mean that heaven is defiled by human sin, otherwise God would have to leave it! However, he may be suggesting that the sacrifice of Christ had cosmic significance, removing a barrier to fellowship with God that existed at the level of ultimate reality and not simply in human hearts. The simple message behind the writer's tabernacle and Day of Atonement imagery is that Jesus entered heaven itself, now to appear for us in God's presence (cf. 7:25). He makes it possible for us to have access to God now and in eternity.

25–28 The better sacrifices mentioned in v 23 are in fact the single and unique offering of Jesus Christ. His sacrifice does not need to be repeated again and again, after the fashion of the high priests in their yearly ritual. It is wrong to suggest that his sacrifice needs to be continually presented to the Father, either in heaven or on earth. Jesus did not have to suffer many times since the creation of the world: his self-offering is sufficient and final for all history—past, present and future. In vs 26 and 28 the writer uses the expression once for all or once (cf. 7:27; 9:12; 10:10) to stress the decisive and complete nature of Jesus' high-priestly work. In fact, his appearance signals the end of the ages, the time of fulfilment or the last days (cf. 1:2). The purpose of his coming was to do away with sin by the sacrifice of himself (26). Put another way, it was to take away the sins of many people (28, lit. 'to bear the sins of many'; cf. Is. 53:12). So there has been a final settlement of the problem of sin by the action of Jesus at one point in human history and this gives a solemn significance to the present. There is 'a fearful expectation of judgment' for those who spurn the Son of God and his sacrifice (10:26–31). But for those who trust in him and eagerly await his second coming, there is the prospect of salvation—rescue from judgment and the enjoyment of the promised eternal inheritance (15).

10:1–18 The benefits of the new covenant

As the central doctrinal section of Hebrews draws to a close, the writer continues to explain the benefits of the new covenant. Once again he forcefully outlines the limitations of the law and its provisions for approaching God (1–4). Ps. 40:6–8 is then used to establish that the whole sacrificial system is replaced by the perfectly obedient self-offering of Christ (5–10). In contrast with the priests of the old covenant, who stand daily at the altar to offer repeatedly the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins, Jesus sits at God's right hand, his sacrificial work completed (11–14). The result of this for believers is that we have been made holy and he has made perfect for ever those who are being made holy. These terms are used to describe the sort of relationship with God predicted in Je. 31:33–34. The writer quotes these verses in abbreviated form (15–18), to signal that the argument begun in ch. 8 has come to an end. Since Christ's sacrifice is so effective, there is no need for any other sacrifice for sin. The forgiveness promised by Jeremiah is available, making possible the renewal of heart and mind that is fundamental to the new covenant.

1–2 When the writer describes the law of Moses as only a shadow of good things that are coming, he means that it foreshadowed the blessings of the new covenant that Jesus would bring. The ritual of the law pointed to the need for the ultimate realities of Christ's high-priestly ministry. There is a sense in which we still wait to enjoy the complete salvation that has been achieved for us (9:28; cf. 13:14). Nevertheless, many of its benefits can be experienced in advance (e.g. 9:14; 10:19–25). The inadequacy of the OT ritual is highlighted by the fact that the same sacrifices were repeated endlessly year after year. As noted in 7:11, 19 and 9:9, the law could never make perfect those who draw near to God in that way. The perfecting of believers has to do with the cleansing of their consciences from the guilt of sin, so that they might be wholeheartedly consecrated to God and his service (see notes on 10:10 and 10:14). If the sacrifices of the first covenant had achieved this end, would they not have stopped being offered? However, the worshippers continued to have (lit.) 'a consciousness of sin' (NIV, they felt guilty for their sins; cf. 9:9). They were not cleansed once for all, as one may be through trusting in the effectiveness of Jesus' sacrifice (cf. 9:14; 10:17–18).

3–4 Although the Day of Atonement ritual assured Israel that the Lord could forgive sins, the ceremony had to be repeated year after year. The effect of this was to provide an annual reminder of sins—a reminder that sin is a hindrance to fellowship with God and brings his judgment. By contrast, God himself promises that under the new covenant, 'their sins and lawless acts I will remember no more' (Je. 31:34; cf. v 17). Sin was not dealt with decisively until Jesus died on the cross, because it is impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sins. God required animal sacrifices to teach Israel to look to him for cleansing and to show the need for a penalty to be paid for sin (cf. Lv. 17:11). But it was the destiny of the Messiah to pay that penalty by means of his death and so provide salvation, even for those who sinned in OT times (cf. 9:15).

5–10 The words of Ps. 40:6–8 are attributed to Christ when he came into the world because they find absolute fulfilment in his life. David the psalmist went further than many other OT writers in emphasizing the powerlessness of sacrifices in themselves to please God. The four technical terms that he uses—sacrifice, offering, burnt offerings and sin offerings—describe the different types of sacrifice commanded by the law. But the whole system was designed to encourage and make possible the willing self-offering of the people to God, as indicated by the words I have come to do your will, O God. In the body that was prepared for the Son of God, he lived a life of perfect obedience to the Father, culminating in his death as an unblemished sacrifice (cf. 9:14). He came to set aside the ancient sacrificial system and bring about the obedience to God which was always the intention behind the rituals. He found the Father's will expressed in Scripture (it is written about me in the scroll), and by that will, we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. His once-for-all sacrifice (10) brings the once-for-all cleansing from sin that the law could not provide (2). Such cleansing makes possible a definitive consecration or sanctification of believers to God, which is the meaning of the expression we have been made holy (Gk. hēgiasmenoi esmen; perfect tense). In this way the writer suggests the fulfilment of the promise that God would write his laws in their hearts and on their minds (16; Je. 31:33). Such dedication to God and his service is achieved for us by Jesus Christ, in whom heart-obedience was perfectly expressed.

11–14 Some of the ideas expressed in 9:25–28 and 10:1–4 are now restated. The priests of Judaism were involved in daily religious duties, involving the repeated offering of the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. However, Jesus offered one sacrifice for sins, which is effective for all time. This contrast is reinforced by the picture of the Levitical priest who stands at the altar, offering repeated sacrifices, and Jesus who sat down at the right hand of God, because his sacrificial work was completed. As in Ps. 110, the Messiah's kingly role is combined with his priestly function, and so his heavenly enthronement means that he also waits for his enemies to be made his footstool (cf. Ps. 110:1). This anticipates the teaching of vs 26–31, where it is revealed that the coming judgment will 'consume the enemies of God'. But the positive implication of Christ's enthronement is that by one sacrifice he has made perfect for ever those who are being made holy (14). As noted previously, the 'perfecting' of believers involves qualifying them to draw near to God or enabling them to enjoy the certainty of a new covenant relationship with God (cf. 7:11–12, 19; 9:9; 10:1; 11:40; 12:23). Fundamentally, this means the forgiveness of sins and the cleansing of consciences, making possible the consecration to God's service of those who are being made holy (see note on v 10), and finally their participation in 'the promised eternal inheritance' (cf. 9:15).

15–18 The Holy Spirit who inspired the prophets in the first place, continues to speak through their writings to believers in every generation (cf. 3:7). Through the prophecy of Je. 31:33–34 (quoted here in an abbreviated form), the Holy Spirit specifically testifies to us about the things mentioned in the preceding verses. Jeremiah's promise of a decisive forgiveness of sins indicates that a time would come when there would be no longer any sacrifice for sin. But closely attached to this is the promise of renewed hearts and minds, helping to define the perfection and sanctification about which the writer has been speaking (10, 14).

10:19–39 A call to hold fast to the benefits of the new covenant

This section concludes the major division of Hebrews which began with the appeal in 5:11–6:20. After several chapters of complex doctrinal argument, the writer draws out the practical implications, repeating some of the warnings and encouragements previously given. A close link between good theology and faithful Christian living is thus demonstrated. The basis of our confidence as Christians is the fact that we have access to the Most Holy Place because of the death of Jesus and the fact that he reigns as a great priest over the house of God. This should inspire us to draw near to God with the faith that takes the promises of the new covenant seriously, to hold unswervingly to the hope we profess, and to consider how best to spur one another on towards love and good deeds.

The warning that follows (26–31) parallels in many ways the teaching of 6:4–6 about the sin of apostasy. The how much more argument also recalls 2:1–5. If those who rejected the law of Moses experienced God's judgment, how much more severely must those who reject the Son of God and the blessings of the new covenant be punished? His unique sacrifice provides a single basis for forgiveness. To abandon that is to abandon all hope of salvation. However, as in ch. 6, warning is followed by encouragement to persevere (32–39). The readers are reminded of the suffering, insult and persecution they experienced not long after they became Christians. The confidence they displayed at that time and the care they showed for one another must be maintained. With a quotation combining Is. 26:20 and Hab. 2:2–3, the writer stresses the need for persevering faith, so that we may receive what God has promised. This prepares us for the development of the theme of faith and endurance in the next main section of the argument (11:1–12:13).

19–21 These verses summarize in very simple terms the doctrinal argument of chs. 7–10. There are two things that we have as Christian brothers and sisters, and on this basis the writer makes his threefold charge in 10:22–25. First we have confidence to enter the Most Holy Place by the blood of Jesus. The word translated confidence is found in four important contexts in Hebrews (3:6; 4:16; 10:19; 10:35). God gives this confidence to us through the gospel. Fundamentally, it is a confidence of free and open access to God (confidence to enter the Most Holy Place), based on the unique sacrifice of Jesus (by the blood of Jesus). There is an intimate connection between Christ's entrance into the heavenly sanctuary and our own (cf. 4:14–16; 6:19–20). He has opened a new and living way into God's presence for us, through the curtain, that is, his body (lit. 'his flesh'). The curtain in the earthly tabernacle was the means of access to the Most Holy Place for the high priest. Metaphorically speaking, Jesus' sacrificial death was the curtain or means of access to the heavenly sanctuary for him and for all who trust in him! The second thing that we have as Christian brothers and sisters is a great priest over the house of God. It is clear from 3:6 that 'the house of God' means the people of God. Our great priest makes it possible for us to draw near to God together and to share the hope of living for ever in his presence (cf. vs 22–23). But this allusion to our common experience as Christians means also that we have responsibilities to one another (cf. vs 24–25).

22–25 There are three exhortations in these verses, showing how we are to respond to the great doctrinal truths of the preceding chapters. They are in the present tense in Greek, indicating that we are continually to express faith (22), hope (23) and love (24–25). The call to draw near to God with a sincere heart in full assurance of faith specifically recalls 4:16 and the writer's teaching more generally about approaching God through Jesus (see note on 7:25). We are to enjoy the benefits of his sacrifice and heavenly rule by confidently praying for mercy and help in time of need. A sincere heart in full assurance of faith is a heart that demonstrates complete trust and devotion, fulfilling the promise of a new heart for God's people in Je. 31:33 and Ezk. 36:26–27. What makes this possible is having our hearts sprinkled to cleanse us from a guilty conscience. The inauguration of the old covenant was associated with the sprinkling of the Israelites with blood (9:18–20). Jesus' blood was shed to inaugurate the new covenant and it is applied to our hearts, to cleanse our consciences from guilt, when we believe the gospel and put our trust in his sacrifice for the atonement of our sins (cf. 9:13–14). Having our bodies washed with pure water is probably a reference to baptism as the outward sign of the 'sprinkling' of our hearts.

The call to hold unswervingly to the hope we profess (lit. 'let us hold fast the confession of hope without wavering') recalls 4:14. It is a reminder that our salvation is yet to be fully realized (cf. 4:1; 9:28; 10:37–39; 13:14) and that our lives are to be controlled by the hope we profess. The relationship between faith and hope will be explored in ch. 11. The basis for maintaining a confession of hope is that he who promised is faithful.

The third call in this paragraph is let us consider how we may spur one another on towards love and good deeds. Since we share in the benefits of Christ's high-priestly work as Christian brothers and sisters, we have a responsibility to minister to one another in love (cf. 3:12–13; 12:15–16). Two clauses in v 25 explain how we can provoke one another to godly living (these clauses are not separate as in the NIV). Negatively, we can care for one another by not giving up meeting together. The writer uses a term for their meeting (Gk. episynagōgē, 'assembly') that is parallel in sense to 'church' and suggests a formal gathering of some kind. A few of their number are in the habit of neglecting this responsibility. The warning about apostasy that follows (26–39) implies that people who deliberately and persistently abandon the fellowship of Christian believers are in danger of abandoning the Lord himself! Positively, we can provoke one another to love and good works by meeting together to encourage one another. As in 3:13, such encouragement is best understood as involving a form of exhortation based on Scripture, following the writer's own example in his 'word of exhortation' (13:22). The urgency of this is underlined by an allusion to the nearness of Christ's return and the final judgment (and all the more as you see the Day approaching).

26–28 These verses take up the allusion to God's judgment at the end of v 25 and develop the warning about rebelling against God found in earlier passages (cf. 2:1–4; 3:7–4:11; 6:4–8). The NIV translation if we deliberately keep on sinning rightly conveys the sense of the present participle 'sinning' in Greek. However, it would be a mistake to think that this merely referred to the sinful behaviour which is sadly evident in all of our lives. The context and the parallel with previous passages indicate that the writer has on view the specific sin of apostasy or continuing rejection of Christ. If, through the gospel, people have received the knowledge of the truth and then turn their backs on that truth, no sacrifice for sins is left. There is no alternative way of forgiveness and acceptance with God apart from the death of his Son. To abandon that once-for-all sacrifice for sins is to abandon all hope of salvation. All that remains for such people is a fearful expectation of judgment and of raging fire that will consume the enemies of God. Their fate is the same as those who never turned to Christ or who actively opposed the gospel! Even under the first covenant, anyone who rejected the law of Moses in deliberate rebellion died without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses (Dt. 17:2–7). How much more severely must someone be punished who renounces and opposes the provisions of the new covenant?

29–31 The awful nature of apostasy is described in three parallel clauses. The person who turns away from Christ has actually trampled the Son of God under foot, treading him with contempt by denying his true nature and identity. Such a person has also treated as an unholy thing the blood of the covenant that sanctified him. Christ's death inaugurates the blessings of the new covenant and brings us into a sanctified or holy relationship with God (cf. 10:10; 13:12). To abandon that relationship is to treat his blood as unholy (Gk. koinon, 'common, unclean') and not as the sacred means chosen by God to achieve our salvation. The person who turns away from Christ has also insulted the Spirit of grace. The Spirit of God brings us to trust in the grace of God, and to take hold of the benefits of Christ's work for ourselves (cf. 6:4–5). The Spirit also distributes God's gracious gifts, confirming the truth of the gospel (cf. 2:4). The inevitability of the punishment awaiting apostate Christians is then suggested by two quotations from the OT. It is God's role to avenge or repay sin of every kind (Dt. 32:35). But God has specifically revealed that he will judge his people (cf. Dt. 32:36), vindicating the true by removing the false. It is a dreadful thing to fall into God's hands when he is acting like that in judgment.

32–34 As in ch. 6, a severe warning is followed by words of encouragement and hope. Here we are given some helpful insights into the experience of the first readers, not long after their conversion (after you had received the light). They are called to remember what they 'endured' (you stood your ground, Gk. hypemeinate). Similar words are then used in v 36 and in 12:1, 2, 3 and 7 to emphasize the need for continuing endurance. Their experience of persecution is described with an athletic metaphor: it was a great contest in the face of suffering (cf. 12:1–3). They suffered themselves, being publicly exposed to insult and persecution, and shared in the suffering of others, standing side by side with those who were so treated. In the Introduction it was argued that this persecution, which involved no bloodshed (12:4), could be related to trouble in Rome when Claudius became emperor. Their sympathy with those in prison and their joyful acceptance of the seizure of their possessions was made possible by their certainty about God's promises. They knew that Jesus had made it possible for them to inherit better and lasting possessions (cf. 13:14) and this controlled their thinking about the present and its values.

35–36 This recollection of their faith, hope and love in earlier days becomes the basis for an appeal not to throw away your confidence. Confidence of free and open access to God, which is given by the blood of Jesus (19; cf. 4:16), must be held fast and openly expressed (3:6; cf. 4:14; 10:23). The confidence in God which the readers previously demonstrated must not be abandoned or lightly discarded, no matter what difficulties they might now be facing. It will be richly rewarded (cf. 6:10). Salvation does not depend on human effort, since it is totally the work of God. But, as long as salvation remains a promise, we need to persevere (lit. ‘you have need of endurance’) in faith, in order to do God’s will and receive what he has promised.

37–39 A special encouragement to persevere in faith is found in the assurance that Christ will return and not delay in fulfilling his saving plan. The writer quotes from Hab. 2:3–4 in a form that depends on the Greek translation of the OT (the LXX). That version makes the subject a person, rather than a vision or revelation as in the Hebrew text and the English versions. In Hebrews, the implication is that Jesus Christ is the one who is coming and who will not delay. The introductory words (For in just a very little while), which probably come from Is. 26:20, emphasize the point and suggest that the readers had a problem about the need to wait patiently for Christ’s return. This would have been especially the case if they could see more persecution and suffering on the horizon. The writer has also transposed the order of the sentences in Hab. 2:4 to make it clear that the person who lives by faith (my righteous one), rather than he who is coming, may be tempted to shrink back. God will not be pleased with those who shrink back in unbelief: they will be destroyed in the coming judgment. However, the writer ends the chapter on a positive note by suggesting that his readers are those who believe and are saved (lit. ‘who have faith which leads to the preservation of the soul’).

11:1–12:13 Faith and endurance

After the warning passage in 6:4–8, the writer encourages his readers to persevere (6:9–12), concluding by encouraging them to ‘imitate those who through faith and patience inherit what has been promised.’ The same pattern is found at the end of ch. 10. A warning about the consequence of rejecting Christ is followed by encouragements to maintain ‘confidence’ and ‘persevere’ in faith, in order to ‘receive what he has promised’ (10:26–39). Then, in ch. 11, various models of faith from the OT are given. Climaxing this honour roll of faith is the portrait of Jesus as ‘the author and perfecter of faith’ (12:2–3). Believers are to look to this ‘great cloud of witnesses,’ and particularly to Jesus, for encouragement to endure opposition and hardship of every sort (12:1–13).

Although 11:1–40 is a well-defined and carefully constructed unit, 12:1–13 is closely connected to it. The link between faith and endurance which is made in ch. 11 becomes the basis for the call to endurance in 12:1–13. As already noted, Jesus’ endurance of the cross and its shame is presented as the supreme example of faith. In this whole section, the writer emphasizes the similarity between the situation of believers in OT times and Christians waiting for the fulfilment of God’s purposes. Nevertheless, it is clear that the work of Christ offers a greater certainty to us of obtaining what God has promised.

11:1–40 A celebration of faith

Faith is first defined (1–2), not comprehensively but in a way that prepares for the argument of the section as a whole. The doctrine that the universe was formed at God’s command is shown to be foundational for the sort of faith the writer is encouraging (3). Moving systematically from Genesis to Joshua, he then highlights the role of faith in the lives of individuals who were central to the saving purposes of God (4–31). Particular attention is given to Abraham and Sarah (8–19) and Moses (23–28). Then follows a brief review of sacred history from the period of the judges to the Maccabean revolts of the second century BC (32–38), focusing on the trials endured by those who remained faithful to God. The final two verses compare the situation of OT believers with that of Christians (39–40), forming a bridge to the following chapter.

In a world where people dismiss faith as ‘wishful thinking’, or simply identify it with the beliefs and practices of a particular religion (e.g. ‘the Muslim faith’), it is good to have a comprehensive picture of the faith that actually pleases God. Hebrews shows the link between faith, hope, obedience and endurance, illustrating that it is more than intellectual assent to certain beliefs. God-honouring faith takes God at his word and lives expectantly and obediently in the present, waiting for him to fulfil his promises. Such faith brings suffering and persecution in various forms.

1–2 Here we discover the essential characteristics of faith from the writer’s point of view. Faith deals with things future (what we hope for) and things unseen (what we do not see). The NIV translation (being sure of what we hope for) puts the emphasis on faith as an expression of our confidence in God’s promises. However, it is also possible to translate, ‘faith is the substance [hypostasis] of things hoped for’ (AV), or ‘faith gives substance to our hopes’ (NEB). Such a rendering suggests that what we hope for becomes real and substantial by the exercise of faith. This does not mean that the gospel is true simply because we believe in it! Rather, the reality of what we hope for is confirmed for us in our experience when we live by faith in God’s promises. Again, faith is being certain of what we do not see. It is the means of ‘proving’ or ‘testing’ invisible realities such as the existence of God, his faithfulness to his word and his control over our world and its affairs. If this definition seems abstract, its meaning becomes more concrete in the illustrations that follow. For such faith the ancients were commended (2, Gk. emartyrēthēsan, cf. vs 4, 5, 39). In the record of Scripture, God testified to their faith, and so made them ‘witnesses’ (12:1; Gk. martyres) of true faith for us.

3 The writer begins where Genesis begins, because faith in God as the Creator of everything that exists is fundamental to the Bible’s view of reality. By faith we understand that the universe [Gk. aiōnas, as in 1:2] was formed at God’s command. If God is in control of nature and history, past and present, every generation of believers can trust his promises about the future, no matter what it may cost them. When the writer says what is seen was not made out of what was visible, he alludes to the definition of faith in v 1. Faith discerns that the universe of space and time has an invisible source and that it continues to be dependent on God’s command (lit. ‘God’s word’). Such faith is based on the revelation he has given us in Scripture.

4–6 Moving on through the pages of the OT, the writer notes that Abel’s faith was expressed when he offered God a better sacrifice than Cain did. The difference was not in the substance of the sacrifices (Gn. 4:3–4), but in the attitude of the two brothers (as implied in Gn. 4:4–7). Cain was told that his offering would be acceptable if he did what was right (cf. Pr. 15:8). But God testified to the righteousness of Abel and to the faith that motivated him when he spoke well of his offerings. Abel still speaks in the sense that he witnesses to the faith that pleases God. Enoch’s experience of being taken from this life, so that he did not experience death was the sign that he was commended as one who pleased God. Gn. 5:22 and 24 insists that he ‘walked with God’ and Hebrews takes this to mean that his life was characterized by faith. For, without faith it is impossible to please God (6). This generalization corresponds with the two elements in the definition of faith given in v 1. Anyone who comes to (lit. ‘draws near to’, as in 4:16; 7:25;

10:22; 12:22) God must believe that he exists (be certain of what is not seen) and believe that he rewards those who earnestly seek him (trust that his promises will be fulfilled).

7 When Noah was warned about things not yet seen, he was told about the approaching judgment of the flood (Gn. 6:13–22). He reacted to this word from God in holy fear or ‘reverent submission’ (the corresponding noun is used to describe Jesus in 5:9). Expressing his faith by the building of an ark, he saved his family and condemned the world. Noah became heir of the righteousness that comes by faith in the sense that his righteous behaviour (Gn. 6:9; 7:1) was clearly shown to be the outworking of his faith.

8–10 Abraham is really the centre of attention until v 19, partly because he is such an excellent model of faith and partly because of his significance in the outworking of God’s plan of salvation. The promise made to Abraham about a place he would later receive as his inheritance (Gn. 12:1) is first recalled. On the basis of this promise, he obeyed and went even though he did not know where he was going. Abraham’s faith was immediately expressed by obedience to God’s call. The motivation for that obedience was the hope of obtaining the promised land. So he lived like a stranger in a foreign country, dwelling in tents with those who were heirs with him of the same promise. When the writer describes Abraham as looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God, he portrays his ultimate goal as the heavenly country or heavenly city mentioned in 11:13–16; 12:22–24 and 13:14. Waiting for God to provide them with an earthly inheritance, the patriarchs came to realize that this life is not an end in itself but a pilgrimage towards a future that God alone can construct for his people.

11–16 God’s second promise to Abraham was that he would give him numerous descendants and make them into a great nation (Gn. 12:2; cf. 13:16; 15:5). Although Abraham was past age and as good as dead, and Sarah herself was barren, by faith he was enabled to become a father. The ground of his confidence was the word of God and he trusted that God would be faithful to his word (cf. 10:23). So the birth of Isaac was the beginning of the fulfilment of the promise about offspring (cf. 6:15). But Abraham, Isaac and Jacob all died without receiving the land of Canaan as an earthly inheritance. The things promised were only seen and welcomed from a distance (13). When they admitted to being aliens and strangers on earth (cf. Gn. 23:4; 47:4, 9), they made it clear that they were looking for a country of their own. If they had been yearning for Mesopotamia, their place of origin, they would have had time to return and make their home there. Instead, they were longing for a better country—a heavenly one. As in v 10, the writer draws a close connection between the faith of Israel’s forefathers and the faith of Christians. We are all pilgrims on a journey of faith, bound for the inheritance God has provided for us. Learning to trust God in their situation, the patriarchs looked to a reward that was beyond their earthly inheritance. They did not have the same clear promise of a heavenly homeland that we do but God delighted in their faith and, through Jesus Christ, he has prepared a city for them (the heavenly Jerusalem mentioned in 12:22–24).

17–19 Abraham’s faith was further tested when he was asked by God to sacrifice his one and only son (Gn. 22:1–8). Since God had specifically declared that his offspring would be reckoned through Isaac (Gn. 21:12), there seemed to be no hope if Isaac died. However, Abraham reasoned that God could raise the dead. He expected to return from the place of sacrifice with Isaac (Gn. 22:5) because he knew that the fulfilment of God’s purposes depended on Isaac’s survival. He trusted that God would resolve the problem. When Hebrews concludes that Abraham received Isaac back from death figuratively speaking (Gk. en parabolē; cf. 9:9), the meaning may be that this event prefigures the resurrection of God’s one and only Son.

20–22 Isaac's faith was particularly exhibited in his old age, when he blessed his two sons in regard to their future (Gn. 27:27–40). In God's providence, and contrary to Isaac's natural preference and intention, God's saving plan would be fulfilled through the line of Jacob, the younger son. Jacob's faith was similarly expressed when he was dying and worshipped as he leaned on the top of his staff (Gn. 47:31). Jacob blessed the two sons of Joseph, bestowing the greater blessing on the younger (Gn. 48:8–20). Again, when his end was near, Joseph spoke in faith about the fulfilment of God's promises in the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt and asked for his bones to be buried in the promised land (Gn. 50:24–25). In these three incidents, the patriarchs looked beyond their own deaths to the reward that God had promised his people.

23–28 In this section faith is portrayed as a force sustaining God's people in times of opposition and affliction, enabling them to overcome fear and temptation and to fulfil his purposes for them. The attitude of Moses' parents is highlighted first. They displayed no fear of Pharaoh's edict about the killing of Hebrew baby boys and hid Moses for three months after he was born (23; cf. Ex. 1:22–2:2). Faith in God is incompatible with fear of hostile forces.

When Moses grew up, he demonstrated his own faith by refusing to be known as the son of Pharaoh's daughter (24; cf. Ex. 2:5–12). Like Abraham, he rejected earthly comforts and security in order to serve the living and true God. He could have enjoyed the pleasures of sin for a short time (25), and all the treasures of Egypt (26), but his goals were different. In fact, when he refused to accept his status in the Egyptian court, he chose to be illtreated along with the people of God. For Moses there was a greater wealth to be experienced in suffering disgrace for the sake of Christ (lit. 'the reproach of the anointed'). Identifying with God's anointed people, Moses experienced the stigma and reproach supremely suffered by the Messiah (12:2–3; 13:13; cf. Ps. 89:50–51; 1 Pet. 4:12–16). Moses exemplifies faith as it is defined in v 1, because his secret was looking ahead to his reward (cf. v 6) and persevering because he saw him who is invisible (26–27). Moses feared God rather than the king of Egypt! Believing that a terrible judgment on the firstborn of Egypt would most certainly take place, Moses obeyed God's command and kept the Passover and the sprinkling of blood (28; cf. Ex. 11–12). The blood on the houses of the Israelites meant that the destroyer of the firstborn would not touch the firstborn of Israel. Moses' faith was an essential element in God's saving plan for his people.

29–31 The faith of the Israelites, as they passed through the Red Sea as on dry land, was inspired by the promises of God that Moses brought to them (e.g. Ex. 14:13–14). When the Egyptian forces followed, they were not motivated by faith and were overwhelmed by God's judgment. Two final instances of faith are then given from the period when the Israelites invaded the promised land. The walls of Jericho fell because the Israelites acted in response to God's strange command and marched around them for seven days (Jos. 6). The faith of the prostitute Rahab was expressed in her willingness to show hospitality to the Israelite spies (Jos. 2:8–11). She feared the God of Israel, rather than the king of Jericho, and was not killed when God's judgment fell on those who were disobedient in that city (Jos. 6:22–25). As a woman, a Gentile, and an open sinner she joined the company of those who were saved by faith.

32–38 In this summary passage the writer specifically mentions four judges (Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah), one king (David), with Samuel and the prophets, as examples of faith. He then describes what was accomplished by such faith in the political and military sphere (33–34), with a particular allusion to Daniel (who shut the mouths of lions; Dn. 6:22–23) and the three who were thrown into the Babylonian furnace (quenched the fury of the flames; Dn. 3:25–28). The supreme achievement of faith is victory over death in resurrection (35). Certain women received back their dead in this life (e.g. 1 Ki. 17:17–24; 2 Ki. 4:17–37). Others had to endure torture and refused to be released from imprisonment, so that they might obtain the better resurrection to eternal life. Some vivid examples of this occur in the Apocrypha, written after the period of history recorded in the OT (e.g. 2 Macc. 6:19, 28; 7:9, 11, 14). Images of persecution and imprisonment pile up to convince the first readers of Hebrews that their experience has been one with that of believers in former generations (36–38; cf. 10:32–34), to encourage them to persevere in faith.

39–40 A fitting conclusion to ch. 11 and a transition to the call of ch. 12 is provided by these verses. These were all commended for their faith in the sense that God testified to their faith and made them witnesses of true faith for others (cf. v 2; 12:1). Yet none of them received what had been promised (v 13). Although they saw the fulfilment of specific promises in this life (e.g. 6:15; 11:11, 33), none of them experienced the blessings of the Messianic era and of the new covenant. In his gracious providence, God had planned something better for us in the sense that their enjoyment of perfection through Jesus Christ would only be together with us. The writer's point is to stress the enormous privilege of living 'in these last days' (1:2). On the perfecting of believers, see notes on 10:14. The ultimate benefit of Christ's work for us is a share in the promised eternal inheritance.

12:1–13 A call to endurance

The theme of this passage is the need for perseverance or endurance through trials, as indicated by the use of similar terminology in vs 1, 2, 3 and 7 (cf. 10:32; 36). Developing the image of an athletic contest, the writer urges his readers to look to the great cloud of witnesses in ch. 11, for encouragement to run with perseverance the race of faith (1). As a climax to his presentation of the great heroes of faith, the writer recalls the endurance of Jesus in the face of extreme suffering, shame and opposition, and relates this to the situation of his readers (2–4). This leads to a meditation on the way God disciplines his children through hardship, based on Pr. 3:11–12 (5–11). The challenge is for us to recognize the meaning and purpose of God's discipline in our lives and to respond with trust and willing submission. A final appeal for endurance is made in language that stresses the need to strengthen those who are weak or exhausted and tempted to abandon the race (12–13).

1 The appeal to run with perseverance the race marked out for us suggests that the Christian life is more a marathon than a short sprint. We are not to picture the great cloud of witnesses in ch. 11 as spectators in an amphitheatre, cheering us on in the race of faith. It is 'what we see in them, not what they see in us, that is the writer's main point' (J. Moffatt, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews [Clark, 1924], p. 193). They are witnesses (Gk. martyres) of true faith for us because God 'witnessed' (Gk. emartyrēthēsan, 11:2, 4–5, 39) to their faith in the pages of the Bible. They demonstrate the nature and possibilities of faith for believers in every generation. As contestants in the race, we are to look to their example for encouragement. We are to throw off everything that hinders—any association or activity that handicaps us—and the sin that so easily entangles (the writer is concerned here with sin itself, rather than with particular 'besetting sins'). Otherwise, we may miss out on the prize, which is God's gracious gift of eternal life to all who complete the race.

2–4 The greatest encouragement comes when we fix our eyes on Jesus (cf. 3:1). The NIV describes him as the author and perfecter of our faith but the word 'our' does not occur in the original. Faith in an absolute or general sense is meant (he is 'the author and perfecter of faith'). Jesus is the perfect example of the faith we are to express. The word translated author (Gk. archēgon, as in 2:10) literally means that he is pioneer or leader in the race of faith. However, the context also suggests that he is the author or initiator of true faith since he opens the way to God and enables us to follow in his footsteps. When he endured the cross, scorning its shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God, he achieved faith's ultimate goal. He is faith's perfecter. As the one who has realized faith to the full from start to finish, he has fulfilled God's promises for all who believe, giving faith a perfect basis by his high-priestly work. Jesus endured because he looked beyond the shame and suffering of the cross to the joy set before him. We are to have the same perspective and to be encouraged by his endurance of opposition from sinful men not to grow weary and lose heart. In view of their past experience, this encouragement would have had special relevance for the first readers (cf. 10:32–34), though they had not yet been called upon to resist to the point of shedding your blood.

5–8 But why must God's people suffer insult, rejection and persecution at all? Surely these experiences are enough to make them doubt God's love and lose heart? The writer anticipates such questions when he charges the readers with having forgotten Pr. 3:11–12. That word of encouragement addresses believers in every age as sons or 'children' of God (cf. 2:10–13). It assures them that sonship and suffering go hand in hand, because the Lord disciplines those he loves. Christians are called to endure hardship as discipline, recognizing this as a practical proof of their special relationship with God (God is treating you as sons). Discipline (Gk. paideia) sometimes involves rebuke and punishment, as the text from Proverbs declares. But it also involves the positive teaching and training that loving parents will give to their children in a whole range of circumstances, to bring them to maturity. Indeed, in ordinary human experience and in relation to God, those who are not disciplined are illegitimate children and not true sons.

9–11 When disciplined appropriately by human fathers, we respected them for it. How much more should those who are disciplined by their spiritual father (the Father of our spirits) learn to submit to him and live! For God's discipline is necessary to keep us on track to eternal life. Parental discipline is limited to our childhood years (for a little while) and may not always have been wisely administered (as they thought best). But God, in his infinite love and wisdom, consistently throughout our lives disciplines us for our good, that we may share in his holiness. God's holiness is his distinctive life and character. He will share this ultimately and completely with everyone whom he brings into his kingdom. Meanwhile, he uses various trials to sustain faith and produce a harvest of righteousness and peace in those who have been trained or 'exercised' by his discipline. In other words, by his grace, we can begin to share God's holy life and character here and now.

12–13 The call to strengthen your feeble arms and weak knees recalls the image of an athletic contest. It is a challenge to abandon fear and despair and not become exhausted in the race of faith (cf. Is. 35:3–4). The quotation from Pr. 4:26 ('Make level paths for your feet') is a warning about following the way that God has provided, not swerving to the right or left. It is particularly important to help those who are spiritually lame to keep to the right pathway, so that they may not be tripped up and permanently disabled, but rather healed. In other words, Christians have a responsibility to care for one another and to encourage one another not to fall by the wayside. The practical implications of all this are revealed in the following section.

Appeals for a God-honouring lifestyle (12:14–13:25)

The conclusion to Hebrews offers a now familiar blend of warning and encouragement. However, the stress here is not simply on the need to persevere in faith and obtain what God has promised. God's plan for us to 'share in his holiness' (10) lays upon us the obligation to 'be holy' in the present (14). Thus, the moral implications of Christian faith are set out and explained by the writer. Negatively, the example of Esau is used to warn about the danger of missing out on the grace of God (15–17). Positively, the wonderful assurance that 'we are receiving a kingdom that cannot be shaken' becomes the basis for a call to gratitude and acceptable worship (18–29). This is to be expressed in the sort of obedient lifestyle outlined in 13:1–17.

Those to whom Hebrews was first sent are encouraged to remember their former leaders and 'imitate their faith' (13:7). This is later echoed by the call to obey current leaders and 'submit to their authority' (17). Between these appeals, the language of sacrifice is re-introduced (8–16), to highlight once more the uniqueness of Christ's suffering and its consequences. Instead of being 'carried away by strange teachings', they are to remain faithful to Jesus. As they take their stand with him, 'outside the camp' of Judaism, they must be willing to bear 'the disgrace he bore' and set their sights on 'the city that is to come'. Their religion is not to be tied to any earthly sanctuary or cult but will involve confessing Christ in the world and sharing what they have with others.

A personal request for prayer is followed by a prayer-wish for the readers, asking God to equip them 'with everything good for doing his will' (18–21). Then, with a challenge to bear with his 'word of exhortation' and the promise of a possible visit, the writer concludes his work with some brief greetings (22–25).

12:14–17 A final warning against failure

To live in peace with all men means, first and foremost, maintaining harmony in the Christian community (cf. 13:1–3, 7, 16–17). The related challenge is to be holy (lit. 'pursue holiness'). It is clear from v 10 that God must work in our lives to make it possible for us to 'share in his holiness' (cf. 13:20–21), but v 14 insists that we have a part to play. We must seek that practical holiness of life (Gk. hagiasmos, 'consecration, sanctification') which flows from a genuine dedication to his service and obedience to his will. Apart from such holiness no-one will see the Lord (i.e. experience eternal life). The implications of v 14 are drawn out in the following verses.

15 Christians are to be watchful about the spiritual welfare of others in the church, taking care that no-one misses the grace of God (lit. 'falls short of God's grace'). God's grace is always available 'to help us in our time of need' (4:16). Those who fail to depend on it and respond to it will not enter his heavenly kingdom (cf. 3:12–14). Indeed, they may become a bitter root that causes trouble for the whole congregation and defiles many. Such imagery recalls Dt. 29:18, where Moses warns about the bitterness that can be spread throughout the community of God's people by one rebellious member.

16–17 Esau is singled out as a dramatic example of someone who turned his back on the grace of God and for a single meal sold his inheritance rights as the oldest son (Gn. 25:29–34). There is no doubt that Esau was godless, but Genesis gives no hint that he was sexually immoral (Gk. pornos). This term could be used quite generally, without reference to Esau, as part of the writer's call to practical holiness (cf. 13:4). Alternatively, it could be used in a metaphorical way, to describe Esau's apostasy as a 'prostitution' of his relationship with God (cf. Dt. 31:16; Jdg. 2:17). After such a wholesale rejection of the grace of God, when Esau wanted to inherit the blessing of the firstborn son, he was rejected (Gn. 27:30–40). Hebrews mentions nothing about Jacob's deceit but implies that Esau could bring about no change of mind (lit. 'he found no opportunity for repentance') because of his earlier apostasy.

12:18–29 Responding to the call of God

Characteristically, the writer turns from warning to encouragement, reminding the readers of the privileges that are theirs by God's grace. Yet such privileges demand an ongoing response of faith and obedience. When Israel gathered at Mt Sinai, to hear the voice of God, it was a terrifying occasion (18–21; cf. Ex. 19), moving the people to beg that no further word be spoken to them. Christians, on the other hand, have come by faith to Mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, where God is in the midst of a joyful assembly of angels and the perfected saints of all generations (22–24). The emphasis here is on acceptance because of Jesus the mediator of a new covenant and his atoning death. So we have no reason to refuse him who speaks or to turn away from him who warns us from heaven (25–27). Certainty about sharing in God's unshakeable kingdom should motivate us to a life of gratitude and acceptable worship (28–29).

18–21 The Israelites approached God at Mt Sinai to hear the terms of his covenant and discover what it meant to serve him as a holy nation (Ex. 19:5–6). Hebrews highlights the physical terrors that were part of that event. But the central and most significant phenomenon was a voice speaking words (Ex. 19:16–24). So awesome was this encounter with God that those who heard him speak begged that no further word be spoken to them (Ex. 20:18–19). Even Moses the mediator trembled with fear (cf. Dt. 9:19).

22–24 Mount Zion, which could be understood as the ultimate goal of God's people when they left Egypt, is the point to which Christians already have come. However, the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the living God, rather than any earthly destination, is meant (cf. Gal. 4:26; Rev. 21:2). Men and women of faith in OT times looked forward to this city (cf. 11:10, 13–16), but those who have come to God through Jesus Christ (the same verb is used in 4:16; 7:25; 10:22; 11:6) are now part of that heavenly scene. This is a vivid way of saying that we have secured the promised eternal inheritance through faith in Jesus and his work. In that heavenly city are thousands upon thousands of angels in joyful assembly, united in celebration with the church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven. Here is a vision of the ultimate, completed company of the people of God, assembled around Christ in the heavenly places (cf. Eph. 2:6–7; Rev. 7). We may now enjoy membership of that church by faith. If our names are written on the roll of the heavenly city, we will one day enjoy the full rights of citizenship. God is there as the judge of all, suggesting that scrutiny or judgment must take place first (cf. 9:27). However, this heavenly church consists of the spirits of righteous men made perfect, indicating that they are those made perfect for ever by the one sacrifice of Jesus Christ (10:14). As mediator of a new covenant, his sprinkled blood provides complete cleansing from the defilement of sin (9:13–15; 10:22). Abel's blood cried out for vengeance (11:4), but Jesus' blood speaks a better word, assuring us of forgiveness and acceptance. All must face the judgment of God, but those who trust in the atoning power of Jesus' death can look forward to acquittal and life for ever in God's presence.

25–27 The note of warning here seems rather abrupt after the assurance of vs 22–24. But the writer's point is that the God who spoke at Sinai (who warned them on earth) continues to call us from the heavenly Jerusalem (who warns us from heaven). No artificial distinction is to be made between the God of the OT and the God of the NT! Since God graciously speaks to us of forgiveness and acceptance through the blood of his Son, we must not refuse him who speaks. If the Israelites did not escape God's condemnation when they turned away from him, how much less will we (cf. 2:1–4)? When God spoke from Sinai, the whole mountain trembled violently (Ex. 19:18). Hg. 2:6 promises that, when it is time for the final judgment and the end of this world-order, God will shake not only the earth but also the heavens (26). All that will remain is what cannot be shaken (27), namely the kingdom that Christ shares with those who continue to trust in him (28).

28–29 The proper response to God's gracious offer of a kingdom that cannot be shaken is to be thankful. Such gratitude is the basis and motivation for true and acceptable worship. The Greek verb here (latreuein) may also be translated 'to serve', as it is in 9:14. Christian worship cannot be restricted to prayer and praise in a congregational context. As ch. 13 illustrates, we are to worship, or serve, God by faithfulness and obedience in every aspect of our lives (note particularly 13:15–16; cf. Rom. 12:1). However, the writer also insists that acceptable worship is characterized by reverence and awe, and supports his challenge with a description of God as a consuming fire. This alludes to Dt. 4:24 (cf. Dt. 9:3; Is. 33:14), where the Israelites were warned not to indulge in idolatry, but to remain faithful to the Lord and to serve him exclusively, lest they provoke him to anger. The certainty of God's grace must never blind us to the truth that a terrible judgment awaits the apostate.

13:1–17 Worship and everyday life

The readers are challenged to persist with the sort of practical expressions of love and patient faith previously commended (e.g. 6:10–12; 10:32–36). Following on from 12:28–29, the passage suggests that an important dimension to our worship is serving others in the way that God directs (16). However, it is also true that we serve God by offering him praise through Jesus Christ, in every area of our lives (15). When the writer turns again to show how Christianity fulfils and replaces the way of worship associated with the tabernacle (10–14), it becomes clear that traditional ways of thinking about 'religion' must be radically transformed by the gospel.

1–8 We serve God by loving other believers as brothers, entertaining strangers (a ministry sometimes rewarded in surprising ways, as in Gn. 18–19), remembering those in prison or those illtreated as if sharing their experiences, upholding marriage and avoiding sexual immorality. God is also honoured by those who keep free from the love of money and are content with what they have. The secret of such contentment is learning to trust God for what is needed (as the quotations from Dt. 31:6 and Ps. 118:6–7 indicate). The readers are also encouraged to please God by remembering the lifestyle of those leaders who first brought them the gospel and by imitating their faith. Leaders come and go, but Jesus Christ, whom they trusted and followed, is the same today as he was yesterday. He will also remain the same for ever (cf. 1:8–12), the ultimate foundation for Christian faith and obedience.

9–10 A negative note is struck with the warning not to be carried away by all kinds of strange teachings. The writer only refers specifically to ceremonial foods which are of no value to those who eat them. Certain foods, and maybe some kind of ritual meal, were being presented to the readers as helpful for the nourishment of their spiritual lives. Yet, it is by God's grace, and not rules about food, that our hearts are to be strengthened (cf. Rom. 14:17; 1 Cor. 8:8; Col. 2:16, 20–23). Food laws are among the 'external regulations', now surpassed and outmoded by the work of Christ (9:10). With the insistence that we have an altar, the writer returns to the pattern of argument that dominated the central chapters of this book: the high-priesthood, sacrifices and sanctuary of the OT find their fulfilment in the person and work of Jesus Christ. Altar is another cultic term used in a shorthand and figurative way for the sacrifice of Christ. Those Jewish priests who minister at the tabernacle, and who are authorized to benefit from its sacrifices (e.g. Lv. 7:5–6; Nu. 18:9–10), have no right to eat from the altar of the new covenant. They, along with anyone else attached to that way of worship, are pursuing the 'shadow' instead of the reality (8:5; 10:1). The writer of Hebrews does not here draw the inference that Christians may, even metaphorically, 'eat' from their 'altar', or sacramentally benefit from Christ's once-for-all sacrifice. It is remarkable that there is no treatment of the Lord's Supper in this context, even at the level of correcting false views of the community meal.

11–14 A further reflection on the ritual of the Day of Atonement leads the writer to a significant observation: the bodies of sacrificial victims were burned outside the camp (Lv. 16:27). To leave the area where the Israelites were encamped in the desert, even for this sacred duty, rendered a person unclean and necessitated a rite of purification before the camp could be re-entered (Lv. 16:28). So when Jesus suffered outside the city gate of Jerusalem, his offering was unclean and unholy according to those traditions! Yet, paradoxically, it is his sacrifice that makes the people holy under the new covenant (12; cf. 10:10). The death of Jesus marks the end of a whole way of thinking about religion and worship. Christians who have been cleansed and consecrated to God by the sacrifice of Christ must no longer take refuge in holy places and ritual activities but must go to him outside the camp, bearing the disgrace he bore (13; cf. 12:2–4). For the first readers, this meant breaking decisively with Judaism and identifying with the one who was regarded as cursed because of the manner of his death (cf. Gal. 3:13). The place of Christian service or worship is the uncleanness of the world, where there is unbelief and persecution! Yet nowhere in this world will we find out hopes fulfilled because we are looking for the city that is to come (14; cf. notes on 4:3–5; 12:22–24).

15–17 The passage draws to a close with two further explanations of what worship means under the new covenant. Through Jesus, Christians are continually to offer to God a sacrifice of praise. In language borrowed from Ho. 14:2 (LXX) this sacrifice is described as the fruit of lips that confess his name. In other words, it is a sacrifice consisting of praise, publicly acknowledging the name or character of God. This might take place when Christians meet together to encourage one another (cf. 10:24–25), or when they confess Christ before unbelievers in the world. To do good and to share with others is also acceptable worship, for with such sacrifices God is pleased (cf. Jas. 1:26–27). Such sacrifices cannot be regarded as cultivating God's favour, since Christian worship is meant to be an expression of gratitude for the love that he first showed us (cf. 12:28). Although the writer is obviously concerned about practical expressions of fellowship amongst believers (cf. 10:32–34; 13:1–3), there are also many opportunities for serving the needs of those outside the Christian fellowship. Instead of reverting to Jewish ways of thinking or being influenced by strange teachings from other sources, the readers are urged to obey their current leaders and submit to their authority (17). They are to do this recognizing the special responsibility of Christian leaders and the need to encourage them in their God-given role.

13:18–25 Personal messages and final blessing

For the first time the writer speaks of himself in the first person singular, pointing to his own example as a leader and asking the readers to pray that he might be able to visit them again soon (18–19). The note of pleasing God is sounded once more in the closing benediction (20–21). The focus is first on what the God of peace has done in bringing back from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep (cf. 1 Pet. 2:25; 5:4). The exalted Lord Jesus is the one who remains for ever as the ultimate leader and guide of God's flock (cf. vs 7–8). Jesus' resurrection confirms that his blood was effective in establishing the eternal covenant by which we experience God's peace and share in his kingdom. So we can confidently ask God to equip us with everything good for doing his will and depend on him to work in us what is pleasing to him, through Jesus Christ. Acceptable worship in all its dimensions can only be offered through Christ, by God's enabling.

The writer has previously acknowledged that he has things to say that are 'hard to explain' (5:11) and he now urges his readers to bear with what he has written (22). Considering the vastness of his themes, he has only expressed himself briefly, and his work is essentially a word of exhortation for their encouragement. News of Timothy's release suggests that they might soon be able to visit the readers together (23). This verse indicates that the writer was probably linked in some way with Paul and his missionary team, although there is no real basis for the tradition identifying him with the apostle. The writer joins his final greetings with those from Italy, implying that he was in the company of Italian Christians, perhaps in some other country, wishing to encourage fellow-believers back home. Grace be with you is a conventional form of farewell in NT letters (e.g. Rom. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:13) but is particularly appropriate for Hebrews, with its continual stress on the grace of God shown to us in the Lord Jesus Christ.

David Peterson

JAMES

Introduction

The letter of James has not always been appreciated in the church. In fact, Martin Luther called it 'a right strawy epistle' (referring to 1 Cor. 3:12), because it did not sound like Paul nor mention Luther's chief concern, salvation by grace. However, the letter of James is extremely important to the church today.

The first point to note is that it was written to a church under pressure. Christians were not being martyred, but they were suffering economic persecution and oppression and the church was breaking under the pressure. There are two ways in which church members may respond to extreme pressure. They can either pull together and help each other or they can compromise with the world and split apart into bickering factions. James wanted his readers to do the former but it was the latter that was actually happening as people struggled to 'get ahead' in the world. These problems make the letter very relevant for the church today.

Secondly, the letter is filled with the teaching of Jesus. No other letter of the NT has as many references to the teaching of Jesus per page as this one does. It is not that James quotes Jesus directly, although he sometimes does (see in 5:12), but he normally simply uses phrases and ideas which come from Jesus. His readers would have memorized much of the Lord's teaching, so they would recognize the source. Most of these phrases come from the teaching of Jesus now in Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 5-7) or Luke's Sermon on the Plain (Lk. 6). There is no better example in the NT of a church leader taking the Lord's teaching and applying it to church problems. The letter of James, then, becomes a model for the modern church on how to apply the teaching of Jesus.

The letter claims to be written by 'James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ'. There are several Christian leaders to whom this could apply. James the son of Zebedee, however, was executed between AD 41 and 44 (Acts 12:2) and James the son of Alphaeus (Acts 1:13) is so unknown that if he was the author he would have surely identified himself more clearly. In truth there was but one James in the early church who was well enough recognized to be able to use such a simple greeting and that was James the son of Joseph, the brother of the Lord. This is the man who was personally visited by Jesus after the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:7), and it was probably at this time that he was converted. He was with the apostles at Pentecost (Acts 1:14), and soon rose to leadership in the church, being the major leader of the Jerusalem church by AD 50 (Acts 15:13–21; the fact that he spoke last indicates that he was viewed as the main leader) and continuing until after Paul's last visit (Acts 21:18). While James led the Jerusalem church, Acts portrays him as concerned for church unity, being willing to negotiate compromises among Christian groups (i.e. those for and against Paul). The reference in Gal. 2:12 does not contradict this picture, for it does not indicate that James knew anything about either Paul's activities or those of his messengers; it only shows why the messengers were seen as important. James was reportedly martyred after the death of Festus in AD 62, the high priest, Annas the Younger, taking advantage of the absence of a Roman governor to carry out the execution.

Many scholars do not believe that James the son of Joseph wrote this letter, either because it appears to address a church too settled for the mid-first century or because the quality of its Greek is too good. Furthermore, Jas. 2:14–26 appears to be contradicting Paul in Rom. 4 and Gal. 4. We can only respond briefly to these issues, but we note first of all that by AD 50 the church in Jerusalem was 20 years old, fully old enough for any of the problems noted in the letter of James. The problems themselves are not those of physical persecution and martyrdom, which happened more towards the end of the first century, but those of economic persecution and the oppression of the poor, which fits the period in Jerusalem before the war of AD 66–70. As for James and Paul, we will argue in the commentary that because they use terms differently the contradictions between them are more apparent than real. James may, however, be arguing against a distortion of Paul's teaching, which means that the letter must have been written before Galatians (c. AD 50) and Romans (c. AD 56) were circulating widely, or else James would probably have quoted Paul's own teaching against those misusing Paul's slogans.

The quality of the Greek in the letter of James presents a real problem. A Galilean peasant like James would certainly have known Greek, but it is unlikely that he would have been able to write the high quality Greek of this letter. Perhaps the clue is to be found in two facts. First, the letter is addressed to 'the twelve tribes scattered among the nations'. James was looking on the church as a whole as 'the Israel of God' (cf. Gal. 6:16), but an Israel scattered in the world. It is not to the Christians gathered in Jerusalem that the letter was written, but to those scattered outside. The form James used was that of a literary letter rather than an actual letter. Actual letters were written for a particular church or person and sent to them. A literary letter was published like a book or tract and intended for a much broader, general audience. Therefore, the letter of James reflects more the church in Jerusalem than the churches who would receive copies of the letter.

Secondly, there are several places in which different Greek words are used for the same idea (e.g. 'patience' in 1:3 and 5:7; 'desire' in 1:14 and 4:3). Also several parts of the letter appear to be carefully structured outlines for sermons like those preached in Jewish synagogues (e.g. 2:1–13; 2:14–26). In other places we find short sayings used to join parts together. It looks, then, as if sermons and sayings of James (and perhaps of Jesus as well) were edited together to form the letter. Unlike, for example, Galatians the letter of James does not look like a work dictated at one time.

The letter, then, is probably a collection of the sayings of James edited together into a unity. James himself may have requested someone with good Greek to put the letter together, perhaps to have something to share with the many Christians from the Greek-speaking world who were visiting Jerusalem, or else after his death the church had the letter written in order to preserve some of the central teaching of this major figure. The latter picture is the more likely. This must have been done soon after James's martyrdom, for the letter uses James's simple self-designation, not the fancier titles used for him later in church history.

Structural diagram of the letter of James.

The letter is basically in five parts. Part one is a two-part introduction which brings up three themes. The first is testing or trials and the reason why people fail when tested. The second is wisdom and the control of the tongue. The third is wealth and its use in acts of charity. As in 1 Jn. 1:1–4, James discusses each of these ideas and then goes over them a second time.

Part two takes up the theme of wealth and charity and presents two sermons, one discussing discrimination on the basis of wealth and the other pointing out that any faith that does not result in good works, especially charity, is not saving faith at all.

Part three discusses the use of the tongue, particularly in relation to teachers who seem to have been gathering groups around them and criticizing others. James attributes this to demonic influence, while pointing out that God's wisdom or Spirit produces peace and unity in the church.

Part four returns to the theme of testing. The wealthy in the church community are tested by their wealth. Will they use it just the way that the world does, or will they go to God and seek his direction? The wealthy outside the church are condemned to hell, not just for their persecution of the poor, including Christians, but also for their heaping up of treasure on earth and living in luxury while others are starving.

Finally, James has a concluding section to his letter. His summary calls his Christian readers to patience. He then takes up the topics which were thought to be necessary at the end of Greek letters: oaths and health (see the Introductions to the articles on Colossians and Philemon). Finally, he tells his readers why he has written: it was to turn Christians who have erred back to the truth. He does not want to criticize, but to cover sins by bringing people to repentance. This call to repentance characterizes the letter and unifies the church, for it was James's goal to speak to a church under pressure and call it to stand together against the force of the wagging tongue within and the pressures of the world without.

See also the article on Reading the letters.

Further reading

J. A. Motyer, The Message of James, BST (IVP, 1985).

D. J. Moo, James, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1985).

P. H. Davids, James, NIBC (Hendrickson, 1989).
———, The Epistle of James, NIGTC (Paternoster/Eerdmans, 1982).
J. A. Adamson, The Epistle of James, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1976).
R. P. Martin, James, WBC (Word, 1988).

Outline of contents

1:1	Greeting
1:2–27	Opening words
1:2–11	First part: testing, prayer and wealth
1:12–27	Second part: testing, gifts, and listening and doing
2:1–26	Testing through generosity
2:1–13	Partiality and love
2:14–26	Generosity and faith
3:1–4:12	Testing through the tongue
3:1–12	The evil in the tongue
3:13–18	The antidote for the tongue
4:1–10	The source of evil and its cure
4:11–12	Concluding appeal
4:13–5:6	Testing through wealth

4:13–17	The test of the wealthy
5:1–6	Testing by the wealthy

5:7–20

Conclusion

5:7–11	Summary on patient endurance
5:12	Oaths
5:13–18	Prayer for health
5:19–20	Purpose statement

Commentary

1:1 Greeting

James begins by identifying himself as the author and then addressing the readers. For himself he uses the simple designation a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is, of course, an honourable title in that Moses is repeatedly designated the ‘servant of the LORD’ in Joshua and Revelation, as is Joshua himself in Judges. But it is at the same time a simple title, one which any Christian could use. James goes beyond the OT usage in adding and of the Lord Jesus Christ to servant of God. This shows the movement in the early church to recognize the equality of Christ with God.

The readers are the twelve tribes scattered among the nations. The phrase the twelve tribes probably does not mean that the readers were all Jews, but that James thought of them as the people of God, the true Israel, whether they were Jews or Gentiles (so also Gal. 6:16; 1 Pet. 2:9). The readers are scattered just as the Jews were scattered during the exile, which probably indicates that the readers were not living in the Holy Land. There is, however, another use of ‘scattered’. 1 Pet. 1:1 uses the same term to indicate that since becoming Christians his Gentile readers were no longer at home in their native countries; their real home was heaven.

1:2–27 Opening words

Having addressed his readers, James introduces the themes of his letter. As in many Greek letters intended for publication, he doubles his opening, introducing his main themes first in 1:2–11 and then again (with an advance in development) in 1:12–27 (cf. 1 Jn. 1:1–4).

1:2–11 First part: testing, prayer and wealth

1:2–4 Testing. The Christians James was addressing were facing trials of many kinds. These trials were not severe persecution (and certainly not illness, for which different terms are used), but rather low-level persecution such as social rejection and economic boycotts. This was happening simply because they were Christians. Although the trials were painful, James calls the believers to rejoice, not because the pain is pleasant but because they should have a perspective which looks beyond the present life to eternal reward. The pure joy is not a present happiness, but joy in anticipation of God's future.

The reason they could rejoice is that this testing of their faith would produce perseverance or patience. Perseverance is an important Christian virtue, mentioned often by Jesus (Lk. 8:15; 21:19; cf. Mt. 10:22) and Paul (Rom. 5:3–4; 8:25; 2 Cor. 6:4; 12:12). For those readers who knew their Scripture, as James certainly did, the importance of this virtue is underlined by the fact that Abraham is the first person in Scripture to be tested (Gn. 22:1) and God rewarded his faithfulness. Furthermore, Job was also tested by Satan, and in the stories about Job circulating in first-century Judaism he was the supreme example of perseverance. Surely these Christians could expect a similar reward.

Perseverance itself, however, has an effect. It is like holding a fine steel sword blade in the fire until it is thoroughly tempered. In this case the sword is the believer, the fire is testing and the 'tempering' is that the believer becomes mature and complete, not lacking anything (4). The Greek term for 'mature' is also often translated as 'perfect'. This is the virtue that Noah exhibited in Gn. 6:9 (translated 'blameless' in the NIV). This is what Jesus intends when he calls his followers to be 'perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect' (Mt. 5:48). It indicates a character like God's. This type of maturity is produced by holding fast to the faith and Christian virtue while in the fire of persecution. The impurities in one's character will be burned off. The end result will be not just maturity, but completeness, which means that not a single part of a God-like character will be lacking. If this is the end result of the readers' trials, difficult as they may be, there is indeed something to rejoice about.

The structure of these verses is that of a 'chain saying' (a produces b which produces c etc.). It must have been a traditional saying in the church, for we find versions of it in Rom. 5:3–6 and 1 Pet. 1:6–7.

1:5–8 Prayer. But what is a person supposed to do if they are not 'mature and complete'? What if one fears failing the test? Paul's answer would have been that they should live, or be led, by the Spirit (e.g. Gal. 5:16–18, 25). James's answer is for them to ask God for wisdom, because divine wisdom is the power which James believes counteracts evil in human life. Such a prayer would not be useless, for God is a generous giver. Nor is his generosity hemmed in by a critical spirit: 'What? You again! What did you do with what I gave you last time?' Far from having that attitude, God simply gives to all who ask, time after time.

Yet there is one requirement if we are to receive wisdom: the asking must flow out of faith in, or rather commitment to, God. The 'doubting' James warns about is not that of a person who wonders whether or not God will answer this particular request, or that of an introspective doubter who struggles with faith. Instead it is that of a person who is double-minded, a phrase with a close equivalent in the Psalms (Ps. 12:1–2), and which is the opposite of trusting God from one's whole heart (Dt. 6:5; 8:3). In other words, this kind of a doubter is the person who is not wholly committed to God, but 'plays safe' by praying. Their real interest is in advancement in this world, but they also want to enjoy some of God's blessings now and go to heaven when they die. Such a person will not get wisdom, James says. In fact, such a person will not receive anything at all from God.

1:9–11 Wealth. Having spoken of single-minded devotion to God and rejoicing in testing, James turns to an example of such a person. The brother in humble circumstances is encouraged to see himself from God's perspective and take pride in his high position. The world views this person as poor (the term 'humble' has behind it a Hebrew concept of the humble or oppressed poor). God has, however, declared them rich. God's view is the truer one and so the person can rejoice in its reality even when their outward circumstances have not yet changed.

In contrast the rich person should take pride in his low position. This is probably a deliberately ironic statement. The term 'rich' (Gk. plousios) in James is used only for non-believers. James does know of some wealthy Christians (2:2; 4:13), but he speaks of them without calling them 'rich'. While the verse might mean that a rich man could properly take pride in having been humbled by God and brought to associate as an equal with poor Christians, it is more likely that James is saying that if the rich person looks at the same future as the 'humble' brother, the only thing he has to take pride in is his 'low position', or his passing away. In this age the wealthy man is indeed honoured and courted (as in Ps. 73), for he seems so exalted, but when viewed in the light of God's future, even if he should live to old age, the span of his life and all its apparent glory will be as short-lived as a flower blooming at dawn and withered by the sun before noon; there will be nothing left. (The picture is drawn from Is. 40:6–8.) James takes up the fall of the rich again in 5:1–6.

This 'reversal of fortunes' theme is often found in Jewish literature (e.g. 1 Sa. 2:1–10; Lk. 1:46–55). When God acts, the low are raised up and the high are brought down. Joseph goes from prison to prominence; Nebuchadnezzar goes from throne to field. God declares his values, and human values are negated. This is how it will be at the end of the age. James wants his readers to rejoice in this coming reality.

1:12–27 Second part: testing, gifts, and listening and doing

In the second part of the opening the three themes are again discussed in order, but James does not simply repeat himself. Instead he advances to a new aspect of each theme.

1:12–15 Testing. James returns to the theme of testing by giving a promise. Blessed or happy is the person who perseveres under trial. How can that person be counted happy? They cannot be from the world's perspective, but they can from God's. God has promised a crown of life, that is life itself (as in Rev. 2:10), for such a person has shown that they do indeed love God by standing the test. This is like Abraham, who persevered in the test and then received God's promise (Gn. 22:15–18), for God can say, 'Now I know that you fear God' (Gn. 22:12).

Not everyone will prove genuine when tested. Those who fail or who want to give in when tested may do so by blaming God: 'God is tempting me'. (The terms 'test', 'trial', and 'tempt' are all the same word in Greek.) This is precisely what Israel did in the wilderness; they complained that it was God's fault and blamed him (Ex. 17:2, 7). In fact, they did this ten times (Nu. 14:22). The believers James was writing to are not to do this, he says, because first, 'God ought not to be put to the test by sinful people!' (This is a better translation than God cannot be tempted by evil.) This is precisely what was taught to Israel in Dt. 6:16.

The second reason why the believers are not to blame God is because he does not tempt anyone. How could James have written that when Gn. 22:1 says 'God tested [or tempted, again the same word] Abraham'? The answer is that beginning in the OT and continuing in Judaism between the testaments such stories as those of Abraham were interpreted as having left out the real cause of the test, the devil. (E.g. 2 Sa. 24:1 says, '[God] incited David', while 1 Ch. 21:1 says, 'Satan ... incited David'.) Therefore in the inter-testamental book Jubilees the Gn. 22 account about Abraham is recast in a form similar to Job. Because of this interpretive tradition in his world, James, who in 2:21 cites Gn. 22 explicitly, could say that the real cause of testing is not God. The OT story is true, but it is a simplified form of reality.

Yet James does not want people to blame the devil either (although he mentions him in 4:7), but to take the responsibility squarely on their own shoulders. It is desire within one which makes the test a test. This desire is what the Jews called the 'evil impulse' in people, or what psychologists call 'drives' or what Paul in Rom. 7 calls 'sin'; it is quite simply the undifferentiated 'I want'. Like a prostitute it entices, and gives birth to sin, and sin ends the process with death. This desire–sin–death chain sets the stage for the next section.

1:16–18 Gifts. In contrast to the evil things brought about by desire, God will only give a good and perfect gift. One example of such a good gift is the wisdom mentioned in v 5, the parallel section. In v 17 God is pictured as the Father of the heavenly lights or the Creator of the universe. But unlike the moon and other heavenly lights which he created, God himself does not change. He is always the same. So if he gives good today, he will not give evil tomorrow. His goodness is seen in that he chose (it was not an accident) to give us birth, meaning new birth, by means of the gospel (the word of truth). His goal was to make us firstfruits of all he created. The firstfruits were viewed as the best of the harvest, so God is making redeemed human beings the apex of all creation. Here we see another chain: God—word of truth—birth. Desire and the devil lead to death. God, by way of contrast, produces life.

1:19–27 Listening and doing. What will be the result of this life or wisdom from God? It will be a controlled tongue. Human anger, whether called 'righteous anger' or not, does not produce God's type of righteousness. Therefore, the wise person will be slow to open his or her mouth and even slower to express anger. Indeed, James argues, a humble acceptance of the gospel (the word planted in you) will mean that one will get rid of all angry expression (as 3:9 and 4:1–2 show, it is the angry outburst, not the inward feeling, which is the issue) and all other types of evil, even if they are fully accepted by the world.

James, moving to his third topic, points out that it is not enough simply to know Scripture or godly teaching. Knowledge alone is useless. It is even worse than useless, for the person who thinks that knowing the Bible makes one godly is self-deceived. Instead, it is obeying the teaching that makes one godly. What is the source of teaching for James? The perfect law that gives freedom is what one should obey, and that is the OT as interpreted by Jesus along with Jesus' other teachings. As Jesus also said, it is not the hearing of his words but the obeying of them that brings a blessing (Mt. 7:24–27).

This means that one can tell truly godly people by their lifestyle. If people have uncontrolled tongues (and so are often exploding in anger or quarrelling), all of their religious practices are worthless. They really do not love God in their hearts. The type of piety which God looks for has two characteristics, which are the two sides of the same coin. First, it cares for the poor (the orphans and widows are two of the four major categories of the poor in the OT). Secondly, it is not polluted by the world, which means that it is not seeking security or advancement in terms of what is valued by people in the world. Because it does not love the world, there is no need to hold on to money. Therefore such people can be generous and give freely.

2:1–26 Testing through generosity

The previous verse made generosity an issue, and so has moved the reader into the first major topic of the letter, the call for generosity and how it tests the reality of faith. James handles this topic in two parts. Each is probably the summary of a single sermon, for they both follow the pattern of the types of sermons preached in the synagogue.

2:1–13 Partiality and love

The first sermon deals with generosity of behaviour. James argues that if a person's behaviour demonstrates partiality, then that person is living more like the persecutors of the church than like Jesus. After stating the principle he develops the theme through a theological argument and two biblical quotations before coming to his closing summary.

2:1 Principle. James begins his sermon by noting that Jesus is our glorious Lord. The claim of commitment to such a person ('faith in' him, as a more literal translation would put it) is incompatible with partiality. God himself is totally impartial (Dt. 10:17; Gal. 2:6). Commitment to the one who perfectly incarnated such a God and now is the glorious resurrected Lord is therefore incompatible with any type of favouritism.

2:2–4 An example. James goes on to give an example of what he means. By comparing James's picture of the differences in clothing and posture with Jewish sources we discover that the scene is that of a church court (as in 1 Cor. 6:1).

The picture is of two believers who have a dispute. One is wealthy. James does not call him 'rich', for he uses that term only for non-Christians, but he notes that he has a gold ring on his finger and is wearing fine clothes (lit. 'shining', meaning bleached white rather than off-white homespun). The other man is poor. He comes in wearing shabby clothes (lit. 'filthy'). They are all that he has to work and sleep in, and they are worn and heavily soiled. The wealthy man is offered a seat while the poor man is told to stand or else to sit on the floor.

Before the arguments are even begun everyone can see that it is not a fair trial. Jewish law demanded that both parties either sit at the same level or stand. It also demanded that if one were rich he either dress the poorer man as he dressed, or dress himself in shabby clothes like the poorer man. If the church accepted and responded to the economic differences between these two men they would be showing favouritism. What is more, they would have become judges with evil thoughts. The church that claims the glorious Jesus Christ as its Lord would have become an unjust, partial judge!

2:5–7 Theological argument. James begins his discussion of such favouritism towards the wealthy by referring to the words of Jesus. God has chosen the poor, he says, to inherit the kingdom. This comes from the Sermon on the Plain (Lk. 6:20). God shows a special interest in the poor in the OT (e.g. Dt. 15; Ps. 35:10; Pr. 19:17) and Jesus makes them the focus of his gospel proclamation (Lk. 4:18). James makes it clear that the poor he is talking about are the economically poor, for they are poor only in the eyes of the world. Before God they are rich in faith. Therefore not all poor people are included in the blessing, for not all are chosen for salvation (to inherit the kingdom) but only those who love him. The irony is that the church is judging as the world does, not as God does. It has failed to see that the man in shabby clothes is in fact rich in God's eyes, and it has by its actions insulted the poor, insulted the very ones God has chosen as his heirs.

By insulting the poor the church has favoured the wealthy. But it is the rich outside the church who are their oppressors. This picks up on an OT theme of the rich oppressing the poor (Je. 7:6; 22:3; Am. 4:1; 8:4), which is precisely what was going on in James' day. What is more, the rich dragged Christians into court, knowing that the secular courts would be favourable to them, for no-one liked Christians. To add insult to injury they were slandering the noble name which had been named over the believers at their baptism. Perhaps this is a reference to how in court they might have sneered that ‘this follower of that accursed Galilean’ could not be in the right. Such were the rich. Yet the Christians are becoming like them when they discriminate against the poor in their own gatherings. The Christians have become the persecutors.

2:8–11 Scriptural argument. The scriptural argument comes in two parts. First, James cites the royal law. The reference is to Lv. 19:18, ‘Love your neighbour as yourself’. But why is this the royal law? While some believe that it is because this law is the principle to sum up all duties to neighbours (Mk. 12:31), it is more likely that the title refers to its being Jesus’ summary of duties and therefore the law of the King. After all, the term ‘law’, not ‘commandment’ (which would fit better if a single summary commandment were the issue) is used, and the kingdom is mentioned in 2:6. It is, then, the King’s law (the OT as reinterpreted by Jesus) that is being kept or broken. One is indeed doing right not to break it.

Favouritism, however, is certainly not loving one’s neighbour as oneself. In fact, it is not loving one’s neighbour at all. Therefore to show favouritism or partiality is to break the law of the kingdom and to stand before Christ the King as a lawbreaker. This is a serious situation indeed.

‘But,’ the reader may respond, ‘partiality should hardly be seen as so serious a sin. Have I not kept so many other of Jesus’ commandments?’ James notes that it only takes the breaking of one law to constitute the person a criminal. As an example he takes a second scriptural passage, Ex. 20:13–14 (or Dt. 5:17–18), deliberately citing adultery first and murder second. Take a person who is perfectly faithful to his wife, but who murders. That man is a criminal, even though he only broke one commandment. The same God gave both commands. The choice of commandments is deliberate. By showing favouritism to the wealthy and denying justice to the poor the church may deprive the poor man of his living, thus in effect killing him. That may also be the way the rich kill the righteous poor in 5:4–6. The OT penalty for either murder or adultery was death. Execution is just as severe whether one is put to death for one crime or for many.

2:12–13 Concluding appeal. One should, then, speak and act as a person going to be judged according to the law that gives freedom. Speaking and acting cover all of a person’s behaviour. No aspect of life will be exempt from judgment. The standard will be the law of the kingdom, which is the OT as interpreted by Jesus, and Jesus’ own teaching. (In James’s day the NT had not yet been written.) This is not a burdensome standard, but a law that sets us free to serve God. Yet in his teaching Jesus makes it clear that freedom is not licence to do anything we wish. All will stand before him and answer for their obedience or lack of it (Mt. 7:15–23; Lk. 6:43–45).

Two proverbs, Judgment without mercy will be shown to anyone who has not been merciful and Mercy triumphs over judgment, perhaps coming from Jesus himself, close the section and make a bridge to the next. The OT clearly teaches that God is a God of mercy (Dt. 4:31) and that he commands his people to act in the same way (Mi. 6:8; Zc. 7:9). Jesus said, ‘Blessed are the merciful, for they will be shown mercy’ (Mt. 5:7). He also said, ‘In the same way as you judge others, you will be judged, and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you’ (Mt. 7:2). Therefore in not being merciful to the poor they are heaping up strict judgment for themselves. They are not showing mercy in the worldly sphere; they will not receive mercy in the eternal sphere. That mercy triumphs over judgment is also the teaching of Jesus (Mt. 6:14–15; 18:21–35). By showing mercy to others now (which means exhibiting the character of God) they will discover that their own judgment has been reduced. Their cause is not hopeless nor is there any need for them to pile up their own judgment.

2:14–26 Generosity and faith

The previous verse has bridged into this discussion, for the term for ‘mercy’ is related to that for giving to the needy. One form of mercy is charitable giving. Therefore, if one is not supposed to discriminate against the poor, the question arises as to how one should treat them? The answer is, with mercy, that is, with charitable giving. This idea introduces another sermon, a sermon on the relationship of works, mainly charitable deeds or generosity, to faith.

2:14 Principle. James states the principle very simply: What good is it ... if a man claims to have faith but has no deeds? In other words, if a person states that he or she believes all of the right doctrines, but their life does not show obedience to Christ, what good is this type of faith? The answer, which is implied in the question, is, ‘No good at all’.

In case we have missed the point, James adds, Can such faith save him? In Greek the way you state a question implies the expected answer. In this case the answer James expects is clearly, ‘No, it cannot save him’.

2:15–17 An example. James adds an example to make it very clear what he is talking about. He paints a picture of a Christian brother or sister in real need. It is not that they do not have nice clothes, but that they do not have enough clothing to keep warm and decent. It is not that they do not have any food for the rest of the week, but that they do not have anything to eat today. What does their fellow-Christian do? He or she says a prayer. The Go, I wish you well, is a blessing, ‘Go in peace’. The keep warm and well fed makes this blessing specific. It is pious. It is full of faith—God will provide. It is very religious. It is theologically correct. What it lacks is the going to their own wardrobe and pantry and getting out their own clothing and food and sharing it with their unfortunate brother or sister. Because of this James says that such a prayer is totally useless. And, he concludes, so are all forms of faith which are not accompanied by action. We may believe that Jesus is Lord, but if we do not obey him that belief is just empty words. We may believe that God loves the poor, but if we do not care for them our faith is dead.

2:18–19 Theological argument. Such a strong example as he has given calls for a defence. James now gives it. He brings in an imaginary person to argue with him. This opponent treats faith and deeds as if they were separate gifts of God. You have [the gift of] faith; I have [the gift of] deeds. James replies that faith which is not seen outwardly through a person’s deeds is no different from no faith. It cannot be seen or experienced. It is purely imaginary. Instead, says James, he will demonstrate his commitment to Christ, that is his faith, through his deeds.

The opponent is then imagined to protest, ‘I believe that God is one’. This is the basic creed of Judaism from Dt. 6:4–5, recited twice daily by every pious Jew. It is the faith that Abraham is said to have discovered. And it is the basis of Christianity as well (Mk. 12:28–34; Rom. 3:30; also implied in Paul’s speech in Acts 17:22–31). Surely such orthodox belief is enough. No it is not, replies James, for the demons themselves believe as much. Satan’s own troops are fully orthodox, fully believing the truth; in fact, in the gospels they give a far fuller confession of Christ than the apostles (e.g. Mk. 1:24; 5:7). And unlike the person who claims to believe without showing any outward deeds, they act consistently with their belief—they shudder. They shudder because they are in rebellion against God and know that they are going to hell. Perhaps, James implies, those who claim to have faith without deeds should be shuddering as well.

2:20–25 Scriptural argument. James now offers to give scriptural proof of what he has been arguing. He uses strong language like that of Jesus (Mt. 23:17) or Paul (Gal. 3:1), which was typical of the debates of his day. The evidence that he brings forward is that of Abraham and the story in Gn. 22:1–19. Abraham was considered righteous or ‘declared to be righteous’ in Gn. 22:12, when God says, ‘Now I know that you fear God’. This was on account of his deed in preparing to offer Isaac. In other words, Abraham’s decision to follow God and put his trust in him was so firm that when faced with the greatest of tests he followed through and resolutely obeyed, whatever the cost.

There is, however, more than this in the text. The phrase what he did in the NIV should be ‘from his works [or deeds]’. Notice that it is ‘works’ (plural) and not ‘work’. James is not thinking of the one deed of Abraham. In Jewish eyes the offering of Isaac was the end of a long string of obedience beginning in Gn. 12:1. Their question was, Why did God command the offering of Isaac and then not make Abraham actually do it? Their answer was that since Abraham had been obedient so many times before, including, according to their stories, being great in his care for the poor, God righteously rewarded his works in Gn. 22 by sparing Isaac. The release of Isaac comes, not after a single deed, but after a lifetime of obedience.

James now observes that faith and actions (or deeds or works) cannot be separated. Faith which is only in the mind is not yet complete. It becomes complete when it results in a decision of the will and is carried out in action. In this Paul and James agree. Paul is against ‘works’ in Rom. 4 and Gal. 3–4 but the works he is against are ‘works of the law’, which are those ritual actions such as circumcision, dietary rules and sabbath-keeping which marked out a Jew from a non-Jew. People did not have to become Jews to be counted right with God. Yet when it comes to righteous deeds, Paul does not believe that one will go to heaven without them, as he points out in 1 Cor. 6:9–10 and Gal. 5:19–21. That is because for Paul faith is not mere belief in orthodox doctrines, as it was for James’s imaginary opponent, but commitment to Christ. And commitment always does something—it obeys. And that is just what James is saying here, faith becomes true faith or complete when it is joined to obedience to Christ.

Now James quotes Gn. 15:6 and sees it fulfilled in Gn. 22. Paul, in Rom. 4:3 and Gal. 3:6, also quotes Gn. 15:6, but Paul is interested in pointing out that God made this statement before Abraham was circumcised. James wants us to know that Abraham’s later actions showed that God’s declaration that he was righteous was accurate. Abraham did indeed live his faith and was in fact righteous. To this James adds a paraphrase of either 2 Ch. 20:7 or Is. 41:8, Abraham was God’s friend. Friends must agree together, and by obeying God all his life, Abraham showed himself a true friend, one who lived in harmony with God.

A person, then, is justified by what he does and not by faith alone. Paul uses the term ‘justified’ to mean God’s declaration that a sinner has been acquitted. This was a new meaning for the term. James uses the word in its original sense (the one found in the Greek OT), that a person is declared to be just or righteous. This declaration, he argues, does not come about because of what is unseen in a person’s heart, but because of what is seen in a person’s deeds.

James now turns to a second scriptural passage, the story of Rahab in Jos. 2. This prostitute had heard about God’s deeds and believed in them in her heart. But that was not enough to save her. It may well be that many other people in Jericho believed the same things. Rahab, however, acted on what she believed by protecting the Hebrew spies. Because her faith translated into action, she was delivered. In Jewish eyes she was considered the mother of all who turned to Judaism from paganism, the first example of a convert.

2:26 Concluding appeal. James’s summary is short and clear. Faith without deeds (or works) is like a corpse, a body without the spirit or breath. Such a thing is dead, useless, fit only to be buried. Such a faith will not save a person. True saving faith is that which results in works or deeds of obedience to God.

3:1–4:12 Testing through the tongue

One of the ways by which a person's commitment to Christ is tested is in their use of their tongue. And one of the first problems that may happen in a church which is being persecuted is that the believers may begin to argue with each other.

3:1–12 The evil in the tongue

The first point that James needs to make is that the tongue is a powerful tool for evil. He does this through a long, careful argument.

The tongue is the chief tool of the teacher, so that is where James begins. Not many of you should presume to be teachers means more accurately 'not many should become teachers'. Many want to be teachers and leaders of the Christian community. That, James argues, is a dangerous impulse which can lead to conflict within the church. One reason is that even if the desire to become a teacher is motivated by the best of reasons, the teacher will be judged more strictly. James includes himself among the teachers here, and he reminds us of Jesus, who condemned Jewish teachers (Mt. 23:1–33; Mk. 12:40; Lk. 20:47) and said that even our casual words would be judged (Mt. 12:36). Furthermore, Jesus taught that people are responsible for what they know (Lk. 12:47–48). The teacher claims to know and set himself or herself up as an example for the church, since in NT times the teacher taught by life and example more than by word. How responsible must such people be on the day of judgment!

Everyone sins or stumbles, and the easiest place to stumble is in the use of the tongue. How easy it is to let a critical word slip out! If a person really has their tongue totally controlled so that they do not sin in that area, they are in fact so self-controlled as to be perfect, since the tongue is the last part of the body to get under control.

James gives a series of examples that illustrate this fact. A horse (one of the most powerful 'machines' of James's day) is controlled by a bit in its mouth. A ship, the largest moving vehicle of his day, is controlled by a rudder, which in those times was shaped like a tongue. The tongue is also powerful, as its boasting illustrates.

James shifts his direction of argument at this point and compares the tongue to a spark which can set a forest on fire. The source of such a spark is hell itself. James is not speaking of the tongue as the God-given source of language. He is thinking, rather, of the tongue as something corrupted by the fall. Many, if not all, sins begin with a word. It may be spoken outwardly or silently 'spoken' inwardly.

Unfortunately, powerful as it is, the tongue is hard to tame. James states the general truth about the ability of people to tame animals and compares it to their inability to tame the tongue. (He is not implying a scientific observation that all species of animals have been tamed.) Yet with all of this skill there is no human being who can control his or her own tongue. Even the most perfect saint experiences times when he or she wishes they could take back into their mouths words they have just spoken.

The tongue, then, is restless. Restlessness is a characteristic of the demonic world and evil, while peace is a characteristic of God and his good kingdom. The tongue is always wanting to say something; often poison that produces death. The murders committed on behalf of a tyrant come about when he issues orders. We experience something similar on the personal level when we speak evil and realize that it has brought death to us rather than life.

James adds some more examples. In church (and he is writing to believers) we use our tongues to praise God. But then we speak evil of ('curse' in his words—any speaking against a person can be in effect a curse) other people, and they are made in God's image (Gn. 1:26–27; 9:6). In James's day the king or emperor would set up his statue in the cities of his realm. If anyone insulted or cursed the statue, they were treated as if they had cursed the emperor to his face, for the statue was the image of the emperor. Therefore the insulting of a person, made in God's image, is like insulting God himself. This duality, two different and contradictory words coming out of the same mouth, is a type of hypocrisy.

James gives two examples to drive his point home. The first is drawn from the land of Israel where in the dry Jordan Valley one might see, in the distance, a stream flowing down the valley wall on the east side. One journeys to it hoping for water. Sometimes the water is fresh and good. Sometimes it is full of minerals (salt) and is undrinkable. But one thing is sure, the two types of water will not flow out of the same spring. Likewise one does not get a different type of fruit from a tree or vine than that which grows according to its nature. The implication of this argument is that if we are speaking insults or curses, that is our nature. Our praises of God are a coverup, a type of hypocrisy.

3:13–18 The antidote for the tongue

James has left us in a desperate place. Who can control his or her tongue? How will we get free from this terrible power and come to perfection? That is the same cry that we may have felt at the end of 1:4. James's answer is the same as it was there: we need not our own power, but God's divine wisdom.

James begins his discussion by showing the difference between a person who has divine wisdom and one who does not. The truly wise person is characterized by a good life, meaning a way of life that is good according to the teaching of Jesus. That person will also show the humility that comes from wisdom. A better translation here would be 'meekness'. One of the problems in the churches which James knew was that teachers were attacking one another and being aggressively defensive. Meekness is the opposite of this aggression. Moses is the chief example of a meek person (Nu. 12:3). In the story in which he is called 'meek' (or 'humble') he was being wrongly attacked by two other leaders. Instead of retaliating (after all, he had had visions and revelations from God beyond anything they had had), he humbly said nothing, not even defending himself. In the end God stepped in and defended him. That lack of a need for self-defence is James's example of a person full of wisdom.

Some of the teachers (and others) who were having arguments in the churches James knew, however, were quite different from this. They were characterized by bitter envy and selfish ambition. They probably called their envy 'zeal', as Phinehas was zealous (Nu. 25:10), but while zeal is good, this zeal was not really from God's spirit, for it was not characterized by meekness. This was disguised envy. What James describes as selfish ambition they may have called 'standing for the truth' or 'keeping our group pure'. The term James uses for it could also be translated 'party spirit', for they were forming groups or parties rather than standing for the unity of the whole church. To call these attitudes 'God's wisdom' and thus to boast about them is to deny reality, the truth of God. This was not how Jesus acted. This, states James, is certainly not God's good gift of wisdom. The spirit which inspires such behaviour is not from heaven, but earthly. It belongs to the world and this age. It is also unspiritual, a term which Jude uses about those who ‘do not have the Spirit’ (Jude 19). Nor is such a spirit of false wisdom simply of this world, but it is in fact of the devil or ‘demonic’. Claiming to be inspired by God these people in their envy and ambition are really inspired by the devil. James summarizes by pointing out that envy and ambition do not come alone, but they lead to disorder (a characteristic of demons we first saw in 3:8) and every evil practice, which a study of church history would demonstrate.

The only true protection against this false wisdom and the evil in the tongue is God’s wisdom. James gives a list of the characteristics of this true wisdom which is very similar to the one that Paul gives for the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22–23). It is pure, which means that the person is sincere in obeying God, not having any twisted motives in their desire for holiness. It is peace-loving (Pr. 3:17; Heb. 12:11), meaning that it produces peace in the church. It is considerate or ‘gentle’ (Phil. 4:5; 1 Tim. 3:3), which means that it is non-combative. It is submissive, which speaks of a person who is willing to learn, be corrected, or will otherwise gladly respond to godly leadership. It is full of mercy and good fruit, which refers to the charitable giving that is so important to James. God, of course, is always merciful and giving, so those filled with his wisdom will be that way as well. Finally, it is impartial and sincere, which means that the person has a heart which is set solely on following God, unlike the ‘double-minded’ person of 1:8. The term sincere means that there is no falseness or play-acting in the person’s actions. As the person is to one’s face, so they are when one’s back is turned.

James sums up this whole paragraph with a saying which sounds like a proverb. Some scholars believe he may have got this saying from Jesus. Peacemakers who sow in peace raise a harvest of righteousness. This is the solution to the problem noted in 1:20; human anger does not produce God’s righteousness, but peace-making does. This is what Jesus said as well, ‘Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God’ (Mt. 5:9). They are God’s sons because they are acting like their true Father, producing the type of righteousness of which God is proud. This is very different from the anger and struggle of merely human ways of producing what human beings call ‘right’. God’s way of doing things requires his wisdom, his Spirit.

4:1–10 The source of evil and its cure

The purpose of James’s discussion of the tongue and wisdom appears in this next section. There were struggles in the Christian community James was writing to. Each person wanted their own way and their own advantage. James makes it very clear that these struggles are not from God and calls on those involved to repent and be forgiven.

James paints a picture of the church as he saw it: fighting and quarrels, battle, kill and covet. The ‘kill’ probably refers to killing with words rather than literal murder, but the whole picture is familiar to anyone who knows the modern church. All of these fights and battles were certainly justified by those involved, perhaps as ‘striving for the truth’. But James writes of them just as they are in God’s eyes. He traces the origin of these conflicts, not to his readers’ love of God, but to your desires, the evil impulse that we have already learned about in 1:14–15.

All of their arguing is fruitless: they do not get what they want, because you do not ask God. ‘But we do pray!’ might be their response. ‘You pray, but it is not effective, for your motives are wrong.’ They are not seeking God’s will or God’s wisdom, but their will: ‘God bless my plans.’ Their motive is their desires or pleasures. God’s goal is not to give human beings what their own impulses demand; his goal is that human beings will learn to love what he loves. It is not that God does not want people to have pleasure, but that he wants to train them to take pleasure in what he knows is truly good. As with Christ, crucifixion comes before resurrection for God’s people (Gal. 5:24).

In claiming to trust in God and yet living according to their own desires these people are adulterous. The term is literally ‘adulteresses’, not that they were all women, but that the church is the bride of Christ (2 Cor. 11:2; Rev. 19, 21) as Israel was God’s bride (Is. 1:21; Je. 3; Ho. 1–3). To go after another lover is to be unfaithful to God, so friendship with the world is hatred towards God (cf. Mt. 6:24; 1 Jn. 3:15). It is not that it is hard or painful to serve both God and ‘desire’ or ‘the world’; it is impossible. The person who tries to become a friend of the world is actually God’s enemy. They may be an orthodox-believing and church-going enemy, but they are nonetheless an enemy.

At this point James cites Scripture, but there is no known occurrence of this saying. He must either be citing the general sense of Scripture, or else a book he knows about but which is now lost. The NIV says, the spirit he caused to live in us envies intensely which seems to refer to the human spirit and its tendency to envy. While this is true enough, it does not seem to fit the context. Better is the translation, ‘God jealously longs for the spirit he made to live in us’. That means that God gave to each person their spirit. He jealously longs for pure love in return (cf. Ex. 20:5–6). Scripture does not speak emptily about this jealousy of God, as Israel found out from painful experience when she tried to serve both God and Baal.

James’s argument might drive people to despair because of their sin. James claims, however, that God offers more grace rather than condemnation, to the believer who repents. To back this up James quotes Pr. 3:34, also quoted in 1 Pet. 5:5: God does give grace to the humble (i.e. the repentant).

James next shows us what such humility looks like. Submit yourselves, then, to God. The main part of repentance is to stop doing what one was doing and start obeying God. Resist the devil. The devil is the ultimate source of testing or temptation (Mt. 4:1–11; Mk. 8:28–34; Lk. 22:31; Jn. 13:2, 27), and to refuse the call of desire is to resist him. When resisted he flees; he may threaten disaster, but it is all a lie. It only has power if believed. Come near to God says James. This sound like Mal. 3:7 and Zc. 1:3. The picture is that of a person coming to offer sacrifice in the temple and coming near to God in the ceremony. Wash your hands. This is another OT picture (Ex. 30:19–21), illustrating the removal of sinful practices. Purify your hearts. Purification is mentioned in the OT (Ex. 19:10), but this is the making of the heart pure. The double-minded is the person who tries to serve both God and the world (see 1:8). To purify the heart is to be devoted to God alone. These actions should be accompanied by a mourning for one’s sinful state. Repentance consists of sorrow for sin plus a turning from sin and, where possible, making restitution for the damage caused by one’s sin. Finally, James include promises within his call to repentance. God will come near to you. He will lift you up. God will not leave a humble heart mourning. He will accept the repentance and respond with his love, raising the person up from their mourning into the warmth of his love.

4:11–12 Concluding appeal

Having called for repentance, James concludes his section on the tongue and community harmony with another appeal. Christians are not to slander one another. A better translation might be ‘speak evil about’ or ‘say bad things against’ because ‘slander’ often implies in English that the things said are untrue and the Greek word does not imply this. As far as James is concerned, whether the things said are true or not, critical words divide the community and are not in order. Paul would agree (2 Cor. 12:20) as would Peter (1 Pet. 2:12; 3:16).

James says such criticism is judging the law. How can this be? Lv. 19:18, cited by Jesus in Mk. 12:31 and expanded in Mt. 7:12, states that one is to love one’s neighbour as oneself. It is hardly loving to criticize another. Even more important for James, however, is the fact that in criticizing another the person is setting himself or herself up as a judge. The judge sits over the law, not under it. Furthermore, only God has the right to judge (Ps. 75:6–7; Jn. 5:22–23, 30), so the person who criticizes his or her fellow-Christian is in fact pushing God aside and taking the role of judge to which only God has the right. How can such a person not expect to receive God’s judgment in return?

4:13–5:6 Testing through wealth

Having finished the topic of the tongue, James shifts to his final issue: the testing which comes through wealth. Those who have wealth have a responsibility. They may believe that they are only making business decisions, but in fact they are being tested by God. Those who fail the test will receive the consequences. James presents this theme in two sections, each introduced by ‘Now listen’. The first deals with Christians, members of the church, who are failing the test. The second deals with the non-Christian wealthy people, whose failure is both more extreme and more serious.

4:13–17 The test of the wealthy

The first group addressed consists of wealthier Christians. As usual, James carefully avoids calling them rich, but it is obvious that they have some possessions, for they can engage in foreign trade. Their plans are normal plans: travel to a certain city, sell the goods they brought with them and perhaps purchase others, and make money. Is this not the way business is done?

James’s criticism is that they are in fact carrying on business just the way every other merchant does. As Christians they should be well aware of not only the uncertainties of the future, but also who controls it. While the picture of the brevity of life is drawn from the OT (e.g. Jb. 7:7, 9; Ps. 39:5–6), the idea of the foolishness of planning without taking God’s values into account is Jesus’ teaching in Lk. 12:16–21. James’s point is not simply that they ought to preface all of their plans with, If it is the Lord’s will. That would be a lip-service to God. Instead, he wants them to seek God’s plan and follow God’s will in their use of money. This appears in his comment that they boast and brag, or, better translated, ‘boast in their pride’. What type of pride is this? 1 Jn. 2:16 uses the same term for ‘the boasting of [or pride in] what [a person] has and does’. They are laying plans that God did not make, claiming an ability to control life which they do not have, and boasting about the good deals they will make. This is no more and no less than love of the world.

A one-line proverb drives the point home. These people are in the church and certainly each one knows the good he ought to do. Why not consult God and ask him what ought to be done with the money? Perhaps they do not do this out of fear that God would ask them to share it with others. They do not do that good, so they are sinning. There is no theft or immorality or other crime staining their hands. They are just honest businessmen, but they sin just as much in failing to do the good they could as if they actually committed evil acts. In either case God’s teaching is being ignored.

5:1–6 Testing by the wealthy

James now turns to the wealthy outside the church. These people are not only failing the test of having wealth, but they are also the source of some of the pressure on the church as they take advantage of poor Christians, either because they are poor or because they are Christians, or both. For them James does not have an appeal; he has condemnation. Like the OT prophets he announces their doom.

If the Christian should live in anticipated joy, rejoicing despite testing because of the reward that is coming (1:2), the rich should live in anticipated wailing, for their judgment is just as sure as the reward is for the Christians. James looks at their wealth from the perspective of the future and sees their great stores of possessions rotted or corroded. If he were writing today, he might have added something about inflation. He is simply applying Jesus' words of Mt. 6:19: worldly wealth is at best temporary.

But it is not just that they will not have their wealth in eternity. The 'corrosion' of their wealth is evidence that they did not need it. It will eat your flesh like fire in that, like the rich man in Jesus' parable in Lk. 16:19–31, they will be cast into the fire of hell because of their failure to obey God and share. They have stored up wealth for 'a rainy day', but these are the last days. The end of the age came in Jesus. Now the final judgment has been announced. It is time to put treasure in heaven, not store it on earth.

Far from giving, these people have done even worse in that they have failed to pay the workmen who harvested their fields. It may be that they wanted to wait until grain prices rose or that they did not feel the workmen had done a good enough job. The OT says that workmen are to be paid each evening (Lv. 19:13; Dt. 24:14–15), but even in the OT employers found ways to avoid this rule (Je. 22:13; Mal. 3:5). This was certainly being done according to the law of the land, so no human judge would hear the complaints of the workers. The workers, however, appealed to heaven, and the heavenly judge heard their cry. The term Lord Almighty reminds the readers of Is. 5:9 and the action that God took against the wealthy there. God does not hear and then do nothing; he hears and acts with awesome power.

Returning to the theme of Lk. 16:19–31, James comments on the luxury of the wealthy. For them, each day was like a day of slaughter (or feasting), for in places without refrigeration one eats one's fill of fresh meat whenever an animal is slaughtered, since the rest will have to be dried or salted to be preserved. Underneath the picture is James's dark implication that 'the day of slaughter' is their day of slaughter, God's day of slaughtering his enemies (Is. 30:33; 34:5–8).

Again James makes a final comment. These rich have condemned and murdered innocent men (or the righteous). He is not speaking of literal murder, for the Greek term translated 'condemned' indicates that the courts are involved. Nor does he mean that the righteous were executed. He is probably thinking of lawsuits in which the rich took away the wages or land of the poor. Left without adequate resources, the poor Christians starved or, weakened by poor food, died of diseases. James points out that the poor were not opposing the rich. There was no cause for this action by the rich. Another, and probably better, interpretation is 'and do they not oppose you?' These victims of the rich oppressors may be dead, but like the souls of the martyrs in Rev. 6:10, they are now in the very presence of God calling out for justice. That justice will not be long-delayed.

5:7–20 Conclusion

The body of the letter is now finished and James is ready to conclude. A Greek letter normally had several different parts in its conclusion. First, there would be a summary. Then came an oath, a health wish, and a statement about why the letter had been written. All of these appear in this conclusion, although in a Christianized form.

5:7–11 Summary on patient endurance

The Christians are being oppressed by the rich. What are they to do? They could act on God's behalf and bring his justice by force of arms if necessary but James has already said that human anger does not produce God's righteousness (1:20). The Christians are instead to be patient or 'endure patiently' until Christ returns. This is the same virtue which is called 'perseverance' in 1:2–3. Let that virtue mature in you, is what James is saying. Farmers, of course, have to have this virtue. In Israel they waited for the autumn rains before planting and then had to wait and hope that the spring rains would come and bring the grain to maturity before harvest.

Christian waiting is not waiting for something, but for someone. Twice James mentions the Lord's coming and once says the Judge is standing at the door. The NT frequently refers to Christ's return as 'near' (Rom. 13:12; Heb. 10:25; 1 Pet. 4:7). While most of the writers probably expected this to happen within their lifetime, it is a tension that is always 'in the air', for no-one knows when it will be, next second or next century (Mk. 13:32).

The theme of the tongue is picked up again and summarized. The real issue is that they are not to grumble against each other. If they do, ignoring the instructions in 4:11–12, they will receive what they give (2:13). Referring to Christ as the Judge is an ominous warning, especially if he is standing at the door.

The prophets who spoke in the name of the Lord, namely the OT prophets, also suffered at the hands of the wealthy and powerful. Yet now kings such as Ahab and Manasseh are forgotten or reviled, while prophets such as Elijah and Isaiah are honoured on earth (and even more so in heaven; cf. Mt. 5:11–12). There was in the case of the prophets something worth enduring for. The example of Job, not a prophet, but a righteous man, is tacked on to this. In the OT story Job is not very patient, for he complains a lot, but in the Jewish stories that were circulating in James's day, Job is represented as a perfect example of patient endurance. In fact, one of these stories The Testament of Job, uses perseverance as the theme for the whole book. James's readers would have recognized the story.

The point is that God has not forgotten the Christians James is writing to. He cites Pss. 103:8 or 111:4, noting God's compassion and mercy. God is not trying to make life hard for his believers, but is instead showing his mercy in assisting them to develop character and put their investments in heaven, where they will last forever.

5:12 Oaths

The summary is finished. In a Greek letter one would now expect an oath certifying that what had been said in the letter was true. Instead James quotes Jesus (Mt. 5:33–37) and argues that Christians ought not to take oaths. It is not that the oath is in itself wrong, but that it divides speech into two levels. Some statements are sworn to and thus must be true, while others are just normal speech and may not be. Jesus said that people would be judged for every word (Mt. 12:36). All words are to be true. Everything is to be open and honest. Since God hears all words, it should be for the Christian as if all statements were an oath sworn before God.

5:13–18 Prayer for health

The next topic in the conclusion of a Greek letter was normally to wish, by the gods, that the recipients would be in good health. James does something better. He reminds the Christians of the provision God has made for their healing. This is not new teaching to his readers, but a reminder of standard Christian practice.

Like all Christian teachers, James divides the evil a person may experience into two categories. The first includes the term 'suffer' and means those unpleasant experiences that come from outside, either the hardships experienced in spreading the gospel or persecution by evil people. These are what James has been discussing under the heading of 'tests' or 'trials' and has concluded in 5:7–11. Those suffering in this way should pray, not necessarily for deliverance, but for the ability to endure patiently. Those who are having a good life should also pray, but their prayer should be songs of praise. This leaves the second group of people experiencing evil, the sick.

The sick are to call the elders of the church. When a person is so ill that he or she cannot go to church, they want the people with the most faith in the church to come and pray. Normally, when the illness is not major, the rule is 'pray for each other'. The elders will act just like the disciples in Mk. 6:13 who must have learned it from Jesus, and anoint the sick person with oil as they pray, so their prayer is not only heard, but physically felt. The important fact is that the prayer is to the Lord and the anointing is done in the name of the Lord. It is the Lord, not the power of the prayer or the oil, who will raise him up. And that is just how James promises that the Lord will respond to the prayer offered in faith. This is not a 'hope so' or 'maybe' prayer, but a prayer which shows secure confidence that God will heal because the elders have first listened to God and have received this confidence in their hearts. It is close to Paul's gift of faith in 1 Cor. 12:9. Such prayers take time; they are not a quick ritual or routine.

James discusses the connection that sometimes exists between sickness and sin. All sickness does not have to do with sin (Jn. 9:3), but sin can cause sickness (1 Cor. 11:30). If sin is involved, then this root needs to be dealt with before moving on to the fruit of the root, the sickness itself. James assures his readers that such sins will be forgiven. God will not withhold forgiveness to prolong the sickness. In fact, James argues that it would be better to take care of sin before it causes severe illness. Confess your sins to each other. No elder is needed for this as each believer is a priest. There is value in confessing sin out loud and receiving from another believer the assurance that it is forgiven.

It may be that a reader of the letter will say, 'That is fine for elders, but I am just an ordinary Christian. How can I pray for anyone's healing? How can I hear their confessions?' Yet as believers we are righteous, so our prayers are powerful and effective. Elijah, James notes, was also an ordinary man but, like the believers here, he had an extraordinary God who heard and answered prayer. Elijah was an important figure, not only in the OT, but also in Jewish legends. In those legends he is often associated with prayer. That is why even though prayer for rain is not mentioned explicitly in 1 Ki. 17:1 or 18:16–46, James, along with the Jews of his day, assumes that it was involved.

5:19–20 Purpose statement

James closes by stating exactly why he has written this letter. The principle he states is the one he is following. Some of his readers had indeed wandered from the truth, as we have seen from the problems in the church. This phrase is used for serious departures from the faith (cf. Is. 9:16), not an occasional slip into sin. If it happens to a believer, someone should bring them back, as the 'spiritual' are supposed to do in Gal. 6:1. Rather than condemnation, restoration is the goal. And that is what James hopes will happen.

Such restoration has a wonderful result. It is not just that a sinner is turned from the error of his way and so there is less sin in the world, but that the person is also saved from death, meaning eternal death (1 Jn. 5:16–17; Jude 22–23), although physical death could, of course, also result (Acts 5:1–11). A multitude of sins are covered over. Pr. 10:12, quoted in 1 Pet. 4:8, says that ‘love covers over all wrongs’ or ‘love covers a multitude of sins’. By ‘cover’ these authors presumably mean ‘atone for’, since a frequent OT image is that of the blood of an offering ‘covering’ sin. The opposite of love is hatred which spreads rumours and stirs up strife. For James love acts through bringing the person as gently as possible back to repentance. That repentance will be accepted by God, who will forgive the sins. Then the forgiven person can continue on the right way, rejoicing in their tests, for they know that their reward is coming.

Peter H. Davids

1 PETER

Introduction

Who wrote 1 Peter?

The writer says he is ‘Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ’ (1:1), and was a ‘witness of Christ’s suffering’ (5:1). He is writing with the help of Silas (Silvanus) from a place he calls ‘Babylon’, where his ‘son’ Mark is with him (5:12–13). As well as this direct evidence that Peter the apostle was the author, the letter frequently alludes to the life and teaching of Jesus (see below). The verdict of F. H. Chase is that ‘No Epistle has caught so much of the spirit of Jesus’ (Dictionary of the Bible, ed. J. Hastings, vol. III, p. 780).

Many early authors referred to the letter and quoted from it, but in recent years five main reasons have been put forward for suggesting that the apostle Peter was not in fact the author.

First, Peter is described in Acts 4:13 as ‘unschooled’, and the style of Greek in which the letter is written is said to be too good for a Galilean fisherman to have used. Also, quotations are taken from the Septuagint (LXX), the Greek rather than the Hebrew version of the OT.

The style is, however, not so ‘educated’ as some would like to make out and in places it is much more the language of ordinary people. There is evidence that in Peter’s time Greek, as well as Aramaic, was spoken in Galilee, and as a fisherman living in Capernaum on one of the great trade routes he would have had to speak Greek regularly. The fact that his own brother’s name, Andrew, is a Greek one suggests that from boyhood Peter would have grown up with this language. Some thirty years’ work of evangelism and teaching in a church which contained an increasing proportion of Gentiles would have made him more fluent in Greek and prepared to quote the LXX as his ‘Authorized Version’. It is not certain, but Silvanus (5:12 may have acted as

Peter's amanuensis (i.e. composing the letter from thoughts Peter shared with him). If he did, then his background as a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37) of some breeding could well have affected the style and language.

Secondly, from the language of 4:14–16 some have built a case to suggest that the letter was written at a time when the very fact of being a Christian was a crime, and this is known not to have been the case until long after Peter's death.

Peter's argument in chs. 2–4 is, however, that Christians must take care to live an innocent life, so that, if they are falsely accused, such slanders will be without foundation. The book of Acts (e.g. 13:50; 14:5, 19; 16:19–24; 17:5, 13; 18:12–13; 19:23–29) shows that from the earliest days misunderstanding, personal prejudices and rejection of the gospel could lead to persecution 'because of the name of Christ'. 4:14–16 need have no further legal implications than similar phrases in Mt. 10:22 and Acts 5:41. In fact, what Peter says about the role of the state in 2:13–14 suggests that he did not expect persecution from that quarter. The relationship between the church and the authorities indicated in the letter is basically the same as in Acts.

Thirdly, some object because the letter contains ideas found in Paul's writings especially in his letter to the Ephesians.

This argument is only valid if the theory is accepted that the two apostles disagreed and were never finally reconciled. The basic teaching in the early church was fairly standard, and it would have been strange had there been no similarities. If we accept that Peter and Paul may have been together in Rome (see below on where the letter was written) just before the letter was written they would doubtless have talked over many of the issues considered in it (see also Gal. 1:18).

Fourthly, according to Gal. 2:9 Peter and Paul agreed to work in different spheres, and yet the destination of 1 Peter is thought to be an area evangelized by Paul.

The arrangement referred to in Galatians was made at least ten years before the letter was written and in the interval the distinction between Jewish and Gentile churches would have become less clear. 1:12 suggests that Peter had not brought the gospel to his readers, but Acts 16:6–7 suggests that Paul had not visited all of them either.

Finally, some say that this letter does not contain the sort of personal references to Jesus one would expect from a writer who knew him as well as Peter did.

See, however, e.g. 1:8, 13; 2:21–25; 3:14; 4:14; 5:1–2 and other references in the commentary below. Let the readers make up their own minds as they read the letter for themselves.

Taken all in all, none of these objections is conclusive. The majority of the evidence, both external and internal, would appear to support the traditional view that Peter the apostle wrote this letter.

Where and when was the letter written?

In 5:13 the writer sends greetings from 'she who is in Babylon, chosen together with you'. This seems like a reference to the local church in Babylon, but it is unlikely that Peter would have gone to the former capital of Nebuchadnezzar's empire. By Peter's time it was a sparsely inhabited ruin (fulfilling Is. 14:23). In Rev. 16:19 and 17:5 'Babylon' is used as a cryptic name for Rome, and Col. 4:10 and Phm. 24 (most likely written in Rome) show that Mark was there with Paul.

In 2 Tim. 4:11 Mark is in Asia Minor, and Paul sends for him to come, most probably to Rome. The fact that neither Peter nor Paul mentions the other in the list of those sending greetings from Rome merely suggests that they were not together at the time of writing their letters. All this points to the theory that Peter was writing from Rome, which is supported by the evidence of Tertullian (Against Heresies, 36) and Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History, 2.25.8; 2.15.2 and 3.1.2–3).

In view of what was said above about Christians being persecuted, a date in the reign of Nero (AD 54–68) would seem best. Since Peter makes no reference to Paul’s martyrdom, which is thought to have taken place during the out-burst of persecution in Rome in 64, the letter was probably written before then (see also 2:13). Links with other writings are thought to suggest a date after 60. So far as we can draw any conclusions from the evidence, the letter was probably written c. 63–64.

Suggested route taken by the bearer of Peter’s first letter from Amisus to Chalcedon.

To whom was the letter written?

Peter answers the question in 1:1. The region described was in the Roman provinces in Asia Minor (modern Turkey) north of the Taurus mountains. It is difficult to be precise as the place-names can refer to both ancient kingdoms and contemporary Roman provinces, and the two did not always have the same boundaries. The map illustrates the theory of Colin Hemer (ExpT 89 [1978], pp. 239–243, The Address of 1 Peter) about the most likely route to have been followed by a messenger taking this letter to the main churches in these areas, where it would have been copied for distribution to the smaller centres of Christian witness (see Col. 4:16).

The social status of the recipients probably reflected that of most of the churches of the day, as a cross-section of the community. There were husbands and wives (3:1, 7), slaves (2:18—but no reference to masters as in Eph. 6:5–9; Col. 3:22–4:1), younger men (5:5) and an eldership giving pastoral care (5:1–4). Some of the women appear to have been able to afford a comfortable lifestyle (3:3). The description of the readers’ pre-Christian manner of life (4:3–4) suggests that some of them might have been involved in the local pagan trade-guilds. Peter calls them ‘strangers in the world’ (1:1 cf. 1:17; 2:11) and this technical term has led John H. Elliott in A Home for the Homeless (SCM, 1982), to develop the theory that they were ‘resident aliens’. But the case is far from proven and the wording could be being used figuratively to reflect the way in which their Christian life-style had distanced them from their pagan neighbours. It also picks up the OT language of David and Solomon as they saw their life on this earth in the light of eternity (see Ps. 39:12 and 1 Ch. 29:15).

The religious background of the original readers appears to have been both Jewish and Gentile. We know from Acts 2:9 that there were Jewish visitors from Asia Minor in Jerusalem for Pentecost, and those among them who were converted at that time would have taken the gospel message back with them. Converts at Pisidian Antioch and Iconium came from the synagogue (Acts 13:43; 14:1), and Luke specifically mentions in the latter case that the church was formed both of Jews and Gentiles. So Peter’s writing reflects such a mixed gathering of believers. He uses the OT to prove his points (1:24–25; 2:6, 7–8, 22–24; 3:10–12; 4:18; 5:5) and makes other allusions that would be meaningful to Jewish readers (e.g. in 1:1 ‘scattered’ [Gk. diaspora] is the technical term for the Jewish community outside Israel; see also 2:4–10 and 3:20). Other comments he makes would be more relevant to Gentile readers (e.g. 1:18, ‘the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers’; 2:10, ‘Once you were not a people, but now you are the people of God'; 4:3, 'you have spent enough time in the past doing what pagans[Gentiles] choose to do').

Whether his readers were Jewish or Gentile Christians, Peter is keen to encourage them to believe that they are the 'new Israel'. In the Christian church they inherit all that God promised his chosen people in the OT (see 1:1; 2:5, 9–10).

Is the letter a unity?

Those who say the letter is not a unity follow three main lines of argument:

a Some say that 1:1 and 5:12–14 were added after the letter had been written. There is no MS evidence for this, and there is still the reference in 5:1.

b Others say the letter originally ended at 4:11 and that the remainder was added at a later date. They argue that the possibility of suffering is remote in 3:17 but already being experienced in 4:12. 1:6 points, however, to the same situation as 4:12. It seems more likely that Peter's mind was moving between the experience of the church as a corporate body and that of its individual members. It is unlikely that 3:17 would apply to each reader. All churches may well suffer persecution in the near future, so that all members will suffer with one another (1 Cor. 12:26), but few individuals are likely to be called on to suffer in each wave of persecution. The doxology of 4:11 is not necessarily a conclusion. Rom. 11:33–36; 15:33 and Eph. 3:20–21 are other examples where the writer was so thrilled by the truths he was expressing that he was carried away into an outpouring of praise.

c Others see the letter as a liturgy written for baptismal use, a collection of sermons, instructions for new converts or fragments of early hymns. Peter may well have quoted a variety of sources for his purpose (or they may have quoted him!), but there is no reason to dismiss his own statement in 5:12.

The letter reads as a unity written to encourage Christian people, especially those new to the faith, and to declare to them the truth and reality of the grace of God in which they can stand firm with every confidence.

Why was the letter written?

From what has been said in the last section it will be seen that theories abound concerning the purpose of the letter. Fuller details of these can be found in other commentaries on 1 Peter. For our purposes it is sufficient to take Peter's words in 5:12 at face value.

Peter sees Christians in danger of persecution (1:6) and not prepared for it (4:12). In the light of this he aimed to do two things: to encourage and to testify to the true grace of God (5:12) in which he urged his readers to stand. These two purposes are intertwined as Peter gives encouragement by declaring God's gracious acts in Christ, made known and mediated by his Spirit. We can list some of the encouragements as follows:

The scope and goal of God's purposes (1:3–9)

The excitement of the prophets and eagerness of the angels to grasp this wonderful plan (1:10–12)

The costliness of our redemption (1:18–21)

The enduring nature of God's promises (1:22–25)

The privilege of belonging to God's people (2:4–10)

The example of Jesus (2:22–25)

What Jesus has done for us (3:18–22)

The confidence we can have in our Creator and his faithfulness (4:17–19)

The certainty that God will triumph in the end, and that his own will share the victory (5:10–11; cf. 1:7).

Such encouragements, and such a statement of the grace of God, offer an equally firm foothold for Christian believers facing whatever the twenty-first century after Christ may bring.

Is 1 Peter like other NT writings?

The author comes across as someone who knew his OT well, and ready to back up his teaching by quoting it, especially Isaiah and the Psalms (see on 1:18–20, 24–25; 2:6–8, 22ff.; 3:10–12; 4:17–18). While he does not quote directly from the gospels, Peter frequently uses words and phrases which remind us of incidents and teachings they contain. We shall draw attention to these in the commentary.

There are also similarities with Peter's speeches in the Acts, e.g. Acts 2:23/1 Pet. 1:20; Acts 2:31/1 Pet. 1:11; Acts 2:34–35/1 Pet. 3:22; Acts 4:11/1 Pet. 2:7; Acts 4:12/1 Pet. 3:21; Acts 10:34/1 Pet. 1:17; Acts 10:39/1 Pet. 2:24. These are the main places where ideas overlap, and a detailed study of the passages will show many more words and phrases in common.

Peter also uses many key words which are also found in Romans and Hebrews. It could be said that the writers of all three 'breathed the same spiritual atmosphere'. By the time Peter was writing certain words and phrases would have become the accepted language of spiritual experience. There are also strong similarities of theme with Ephesians and James. These are interesting, and details will be found in a fuller commentary, but it is unwise to construct theories on them.

What theology does 1 Peter contain?

Peter wrote, as we have seen, with a practical purpose, and would no doubt have been surprised if asked about the letter's theological content. He did not write to set out a theology (as Paul did in Romans or Colossians) but, as a pastor, he based his ethical advice on his knowledge of the character of God. So the doctrines set out in the letter are those which provide a motive for Christian living.

Doctrine of God

In 1:1–2 Peter clearly sets out the practical relationship between the three persons of the Trinity. God is sovereign, and so can be trusted (4:19). He is holy, and so is to be copied (1:15–16). He is a Father, and so his children must live up to the family name (1:17), and the fact that he has redeemed his people is a ground for assurance (1:18–21).

Doctrine of Christ

Christ is sinless, obedient and prepared to suffer to the limit. This is an example for us (2:21–24). He died and rose again, so we must die to sin and live by his risen power (2:24; 4:1). His work is described in terms of redemption (1:18–19), reconciliation and being the sin offering and the substitute (3:18), and he was predestined for this very purpose by the Father's love (1:20–21). He is also the foundation of God's church, providing the ground of faith and hope, and inspiring to holiness and love (2:16; 1:21–22).

Doctrine of the Holy Spirit

The Holy Spirit is seen as the agent of sanctification (1:2), the author of Scripture (1:11), the enabler of Christian ministry (1:12) and the encourager of Christians undergoing persecution (4:14).

Doctrine of Scripture

The authority of Scripture is stressed by the way Peter appeals to the OT to support his teaching (e.g. 1:24–25; 2:6–8; 3:10–12; 4:18). Its source is seen to be in the guiding of the writers by the Holy Spirit (1:11; cf. 2 Pet. 1:21) and its enduring quality is underlined by a quotation from Is. 40:6–8 (1:23–25). Scripture is also pictured as a seed, by which the new birth is effected in human lives as people hear and respond to the preaching of the gospel (cf. 1:23 with 25), and as the means of Christian growth (if 2:2 is translated 'milk of the word').

Doctrine of the church

Peter has a high regard for the corporate nature of the people of God, entered into by the individual believer at his or her new birth (2:2–5; cf. 1:22–23). The church is God's building, on the foundation of Christ himself (2:4–8), and as such it is the inheritor of the blessings promised to Israel (2:9–10). Its twofold function is to offer worship to God and witness before people (2:5, 9). Already in Peter's day the church had a corporate eldership, seen as a responsible and sacred office (5:1–4), but also encouraged the development and use of spiritual gifts by each member (4:10–11).

Doctrine of the last days

Peter writes as one who looks forward to the great unveiling in the last days, and he uses the Greek root apocalyp—('revelation') to describe the return of Christ. So he reminds his readers that the unseen Christ is never far away, and points them to the glories they will share when Christ is revealed. Their salvation will be fully realized and they will enter into their full inheritance (1:5). Their faith will be finally honoured (1:7; 4:13), and the full extent of God's grace discovered (1:13). Christ's glory will be shared (5:1) and faithful service rewarded (5:4). The expectation of Christ's return is a most compelling argument for holy living and careful stewardship now (4:7–11, 17–18).

What does Peter say to his readers?

Those who originally received this letter were Christians who were in danger of losing their way. Their new-found faith had severed the ties which had bound them to their non-Christian relatives and neighbours and was itself being tested because they were facing suffering. This situation was probably not what they had expected when they had first heard the gospel, and it is an experience faced by every generation since then.

Peter met their needs by reassuring them of the gospel. Father, Son and Holy Spirit work together to bring us a new life (1:3–5; 2:2; 4:1–6) in which the past is forgiven (2:24; 3:18), the present is protected (1:5) and motivated (4:2), and the future assured (1:4, 7). This is a way of life to be lived out in practical terms (1:13–16) and in everyday relationships (2:16; 3:1, 7). It equips the followers of Jesus for living in the real world of the here and now (4:1–4) and for that world of eternal glory for which Jesus is even now preparing us (5:10).

So Peter's response to the question of suffering is that it is a part of the journey of faith. It tests the seriousness of our discipleship (1:7), joins us to our fellow-Christians (5:9), and will be vindicated on the day of judgment (4:16–19). Though believers are 'strangers' and 'scattered' in this world (1:1), they are part of the pilgrim people of God (2:5, 9), journeying to the Father's home (1:4). They look forward to the day when Jesus will return for his own (1:7; 2:12; 5:4). These are truths which can motivate today's Christians to live for God's glory, just as they encouraged Peter's original readers.

Peter writes as one whose heart has lost none of the fire of love stirred up by the Master at the Sea of Tiberias (cf. Jn. 21:1, 15–19 with 1 Pet. 1:8). In this letter there is all the vividness of the personal recollections of a follower of Jesus Christ.

See also the article on Reading the letters.

Further reading

- E. P. Clowney, The Message of 1 Peter, BST (IVP, 1988).
I. H. Marshall, 1 Peter IVPNTC (IVP, 1991).
W. Grudem, 1 Peter, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1988).
P. H. Davids, The First Epistle of Peter, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1990).
J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and Jude, BNTC (A. and C. Black, 1969).
J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter, WBC (Word, 1988).
C. E. B. Cranfield, 1 and 2 Peter and Jude, TBC (SCM, 1960).
E. M. B. Green, 2 Peter and Jude, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1968).
R. Bauckham, Jude and 2 Peter, WBC (Word, 1983).

Outline of contents

- | | |
|-----------------|---|
| 1:1–2 | The writer greets his readers |
| 1:3–9 | God's plan of salvation meets our every need |
| 1:10–12 | How our salvation was made known to us |
| 1:13–5:7 | What our salvation involves in everyday | living

1:13–21	Living like Jesus
1:22–25	Loving other Christians
2:1–3	Desiring to grow
2:4–10	Belonging to God’s people
2:11–3:12	Showing others the example of Jesus
3:13–4:6	Living for Christ in the face of opposition
4:7–11	Ministering to one another
4:12–19	Suffering for Christ’s sake
5:1–4	Exercising leadership
5:5–7	Being good followers

5:8–11

Such salvation attracts opposition, but faith guarantees the victory

5:12–14

Personal greetings

Commentary

1:1–2 The writer greets his readers

Peter begins his letter, as was the custom of his time, by saying who he is and with what authority he writes. He then names those to whom he is writing. These are Christians now scattered throughout the Roman provinces of Asia Minor. Their faith consists of a relationship with each person of the Trinity. The Father has chosen them and set them apart (sanctified) by the Spirit that they may live a life of obedience to Jesus Christ, having been made clean for that life through sprinkling by his blood. Such a privilege leads the writer to enlarge the normal greeting to a wish that they may experience God-given grace and peace in abundance. There is a play on words here. The usual Greek greeting (chairē—cheers!) is replaced by the profoundly Christian prayer for blessing by God's grace (charis). In addition, the customary Jewish greeting of shalom (peace) is added to show that in Christ we inherit the blessings promised under both old and new covenants.

Notes. 1 Apostle is Greek for 'one sent' (see the Introduction for details about the author and recipients). 2 Sprinkling by his blood has the idea of obtaining the benefits of Christ's death (Heb. 9:13–14), sharing in the blessings of the new covenant (cf. Ex. 24:3–8 with Mk. 14:24), and the regular daily cleansing we all need during our journey through life (see 1 Jn. 1:7–9). When God made the old covenant with Moses, the promise of obedience by God's people was sealed by the sprinkling of the blood of the covenant sacrifice on the altar and on the people (Ex. 24:1–11).

1:3–9 God's plan of salvation meets our every need

Once Peter has mentioned our position before God, he follows the pattern of some of Paul's letters and pours out thanksgiving to God for these blessings. They are so great that we can pass joyfully through times of testing holding by faith to a Christ we have not seen. Such faith is the road to a full and final salvation.

Peter gives eleven reasons for praising God: he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (3); he has given us new birth (what Jesus spoke of in Jn. 3:1–8); the motive for this is his great mercy (3); the result is a living hope—the new life is one of hope (3); the means to this hope is the resurrection of Jesus (3); the object of this hope is an inheritance (4); this inheritance cannot be destroyed by hostile elements, cannot be defiled by pollution from outside and cannot fade by wasting from within (4); it has been kept in heaven for us (4); we are being shielded (garrisoned!) for it by the very power of God (5); the means by which we are shielded is faith (cf. Eph. 6:16)—by which we hold on to the promises of God (5) and the final goal is a salvation which God will reveal in the last time, when Jesus is revealed (5, 7).

3–5 As Peter explains how rich a salvation believers enjoy he tells us that it comes from God's great mercy, consists of new birth to new life and hope, brings about the resurrection, is made possible by Jesus Christ, and will lead to an inheritance. Salvation is described with reference to the past (Christians have been given new birth by God's mercy), to the present (Christians are being shielded by God's power) and to the future (at the last time will come the final deliverance from evil).

6–7 These blessings from God can lead to rejoicing in the face of difficulties. The purpose of earthly trials is to sift out what is genuine in our faith. This in turn will bring praise, glory and honour, both to Jesus and the person who has suffered, on the day when Jesus is revealed.

8–9 This triumphant faith in the unseen Christ has two results. In the present the Christians can have an inexpressible joy even in the midst of difficulties, and for the future there is the prospect of enjoying that salvation to the full in the presence of Jesus. The language in v 8 is a strong reminder of Jesus' words in Jn. 20:29. Filled with an inexpressible ... joy picks up the word used by Matthew (5:12) to report Jesus' teaching on behaviour in the face of persecution.

Notes. 6 The Greek translated in this is the wrong gender to refer to salvation and so must either refer to God himself, or to the facts set out in the previous three verses. Greatly rejoice could be a command (omitting the you), but is probably better as a statement of fact. Though could equally well be translated ‘because’, which would then fulfil Mt. 5:11–12. Trials comes from the same root word as is used of Jesus being tempted and is in the Lord’s Prayer (Mt. 4:1; 6:13). All kinds of emphasizes the diversity of the trials, and the Greek word is used again in this letter to describe the grace of God which is equally versatile to meet these trials (4:10). Peter stresses that such trials will be relatively brief (for a little while), and that God allows them. This is implied by the Greek ‘if need be’ which the NIV brings out by may have had. Peter returns to the theme of suffering later in the letter (2:19–23; 3:14–17; 4:1–6, 12–19; 5:9–10).

1:10–12 How our salvation was made known to us

This is the work of the Holy Spirit (12), the Spirit of Christ (10). He led the prophets to foretell the grace that was to come to us (10), and even to foresee the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow (11; see, e.g. Ps. 22:7–8, 17–18; Is. 53; La. 1:12). But however hard they tried, the prophets could not find out when and how this would happen. The Spirit had also guided those who understood the good news concerning Jesus’ death and resurrection to explain to Peter’s readers how these things had been fulfilled for them.

The prophets most naturally refers to the writers of the OT and not to Christian prophets of the NT age. Their twofold theme was the grace that was destined for God’s people and the sufferings and glories that would follow which were destined for Christ. There is a vivid parallelism in the original. V 11 is an important statement about the inspiration of the OT writers (see also Mt. 5:17; Lk. 24:25–27, 44–47; Jn. 5:39, 45–47). These verses also underline the role of the second and third persons of the Trinity in God’s plan of salvation: the Son carries it out and the Spirit makes it known. The eagerness of the angels to look into it is brought out by the occurrence of the same verb used in Jn. 20:5 of John peering into the empty tomb.

1:13–5:7 What our salvation involves in everyday living

All that follows in this letter shows how these great truths of the Christian life are to be lived out by those who believe them. As Peter gives practical advice he constantly takes us back to the basics of the Christian gospel for the reason behind such behaviour. The salvation described so magnificently in the earlier section can and should result in men and women living as followers of Jesus no matter how difficult their circumstances may be.

1:13–21 Living like Jesus

Such salvation and such good news require Christians to exercise mental diligence and moral discipline. This is to be done by looking joyfully and confidently forward to the grace that will be given when Jesus Christ is revealed. (This phrase pictures not so much the return of one who is absent as the unveiling of one who has been with us all the time.)

Living in the light of Christ’s return calls for obedience of life (cf. Lk. 12:35–48). We should work out this obedience by modelling our behaviour on the holiness of the God who has called us to himself (cf. Mt. 5:48). Previously, spiritual ignorance had allowed Peter’s readers to give way to uncontrolled desires, but God’s pattern of behaviour for his people is based on his revealed character.

Holiness, Christlikeness, is urged upon God’s people for two reasons. It is our example (as his children we should reflect the family likeness) and it is our goal (when Jesus appears we shall be finally and fully like him; cf. 1 Jn. 3:2). Three reasons for this behaviour are given in vs 17–19: our Father God will judge his children as to how they have lived up to the family standards; we have been set free (redeemed) from the previous empty way of life; and entry into that family is such a privilege, for it was made possible at such a cost.

Speaking of Christ leads Peter at once to develop the theme of the greatness of his work and its results. God chose Christ before the creation of the world but has revealed him in these last times (20). The Christian has grounds for entire confidence in such a God as the object of faith in the present and hope for the future. This is because Christ has redeemed us with his blood and God has subsequently raised and glorified him (21).

Notes. 13 To be given (Gk. ‘being conferred’) indicates certainty. V 7 links with this to show that when Jesus Christ is revealed proven faith will receive its reward, and promised grace will be enjoyed. 14 Obedient children reflects a Hebrew phrase suggesting that obedience is a mother, whose characteristics the children should inherit. Conform is the same word as used in Rom. 12:2. 16 On be holy see Lv. 11:44–45; 19:2 and cf. Ex. 19:5–6. How to live like this was made plain in the life of Jesus (Jn. 1:18). 17 Impartially has the idea of not looking at anyone else’s face to see whether they approve or not. Peter uses the idea in Acts 10:34–35. 18–19 The language used here is reminiscent of Mk. 10:45 and Jn. 1:29. Without blemish refers to the moral and without defect to the physical perfection of the sacrificial victim (see Ex. 12:5; Lv. 22:17–25; Nu. 6:14; 19:2). 21 And so your faith and hope are in God states the result of Christ’s death and resurrection. Other translations make it the purpose, ‘so that your faith and hope might be in God’. The original Greek could mean either, and both are true.

1:22–25 Loving other Christians

In vs 2 and 14 Peter has already spoken of the place of obedience in the Christian life. As a response to the proclamation and hearing of the truth, it has a twofold effect: it purifies the soul from the sins of the past and it develops a genuine love for other believers which is not a piece of play-acting. The reality of this love should be seen in its intensity and depth. Such love is prompted by the fact that Christians share a new birth made available by the living and enduring word of God. This regenerating word is declared when the gospel is preached.

Notes. 22 Deeply is used here and in 4:8 of love, and in Lk. 22:44 and Acts 12:5 of prayer. It denotes supreme effort, lit. ‘with every muscle strained’. The NIV mg. shows that some early MSS add the word pure to heart. This is quite a possible reading; as the Greek words ‘pure’ and ‘heart’ both begin with the same two letters it would have been easy for copyists to have overlooked one. 23 The Greek is unclear whether it is God or his word that is living and enduring. In a sense both are true, as the word proceeds from God. 24–25 Quotation of Is. 40:6–8 stresses the enduring and dynamic quality of the word of God.

2:1–3 Desiring to grow

The new Christian needs to grow spiritually just as a newborn baby needs to grow physically. This involves being protected from all that could harm, and nourished by all that is good. This new life is given to enable us to reach the goal of full and final salvation.

Notes. 2 Spiritual is the Greek word logikon, which can equally mean ‘of the word’ (as the AV). Heb. 5:12 has the same idea and the OT is rich in allusions to the law or the word of God as spiritual sustenance. 3 Ps. 34:8 is quoted here either as a motive for the craving of v 2, or the craving may be evidence that one has tasted that the Lord is good.

2:4–10 Belonging to God’s people

Christians must grow together as well as individually, and Peter now raises this theme. He is so thrilled by the thought that he mixes his metaphors, but the argument is easy to follow. By constant communion with Christ, the living Stone, Christians will become like him, living stones. By itself a stone is of little use, but joined with others it becomes part of a building. A ‘living’ stone has a purpose to be part of the whole. Peter’s thought then switches from the structure (presumably the temple) to those who function in that building. Their responsibility as members of God’s spiritual household is two-fold: to worship, offering spiritual sacrifices (5) and to witness, declaring the praises (9).

In an aside Peter takes up the OT references to the living Stone, and shows how they have been fulfilled in Christ: the first one by believers, and the latter two by unbelievers. Whether people come in faith to the living Stone, or reject him, God’s purposes are supreme. In Mk. 12:10 Jesus applies this text to the Jewish authorities as the builders. Christ has become the head of the corner, the capstone of the building, and those who disobey the message can only stumble and fall against him, as God decreed they should.

In contrast with the unbelievers last referred to, Peter shows how the Christian church has inherited the privileges promised to the OT people of God. You are ... that you may underlines the biblical principle that privilege involves responsibility. Those who inherit Israel’s blessings have Israel’s work to do, and must declare the praises of the God who has done so much for them.

Two strands of prophecy are drawn together in vs 4 and 6–8: the precious foundation stone of Is. 28:16 (v 6 quotes the LXX, as Paul does in Rom. 9:33) and the rejected capstone of Ps. 118:22. Jesus applies the latter reference to himself in Mk. 12:10 and Peter quoted it of him before the Sanhedrin in Acts 4:11. Jesus is both the foundation cornerstone on which his church is built, and the capstone up to which it grows (see 1 Cor. 3:11; Eph. 2:19–22). The NIV mg. shows that the word can mean both. By bringing the two metaphors together Peter emphasizes that Christ is precious only to believers (as the original context showed), and that those who refuse to believe find him a stone which causes them to stumble. Here he adds a quotation of Is. 8:14.

Are being built (5) as a statement makes better sense of the Greek than the imperative ‘be built’ of some translations. The words which follow here and in v 9 (see below) were rich in meaning for God’s people in the OT. Their use shows the spiritual continuity between those who respond to God under the old covenant and Christian believers. The use of the word house and the emphasis in vs 9–10 on belonging to the people of God could have been a great encouragement to those who felt their position as ‘aliens and strangers’ (2:11). Peter may have had in mind here the destruction of the temple (foretold by Jesus in Mk. 13:2). Christians individually (1 Cor. 6:19) and the church corporately (1 Cor. 3:16) are seen as God’s new temple, a spiritual house (5) because it is indwelt by his Spirit. It is on the basis of this verse and v 9 below that Christians have stressed that since Jesus has made the once-for-all sacrifice for sin (see 2:24; 3:18) the only sacrifices now to be offered are spiritual ones (see Rom. 12:1–2 and Heb. 13:15–16). These are to be offered by all believers. The only ministry the NT sees as set apart in any way is that of the elder appointed to leadership, teaching and pastoral care (see on 5:1–4 below). Through Jesus Christ can be taken either to say how the sacrifices are offered, or why they are acceptable.

The word of God, either written (the Bible) or living (Jesus Christ) is the foundation on which to build. Those who disobey Christ will find that he is embarrassingly in their way and will sooner or later cause them to trip and fall (8). (For further discussion of the doctrine hinted at here see 'Predestination', IBD pp. 1262–1264.) V 9 claims for Christian believers the promises of Ex. 19:5–6 and Is. 43:20–21 for which Paul argues in Rom. 9. People implies physical descent and may refer to the relationship brought about by the new birth. The word from which priesthood is derived is never used in the NT to describe the Christian ministry, but rather the task of all Christian believers (cf. Rev. 1:6). Throughout the OT, kings and priests were separate individuals. Only Melchizedek and the Messiah combined both offices. Saul sinned when he tried to discharge both functions (1 Sa. 13:5–15). In Christ the Christian can be both. A holy nation is a people called to reflect the character of the God who has called them (1:16). A people belonging to God (i.e. special) uses the imagery of the eastern king, who kept a special treasure chamber apart from his government exchequer. This was for his own use, and the idea is first found in Ex. 19:5 and picked up in Tit. 2:14 by Paul. Praises is a difficult word to translate and the RV's 'excellencies' is probably the nearest to the original. The Christian will find it natural and spontaneous to respond in this way to God and other people once it is understood that all these blessings flow from the free grace and mercy of God (10). Peter quotes Ho. 1:8–2:1 and 2:23 to bring this point home.

2:11–3:12 Showing others the example of Jesus

Since Christians are in this very special way God's people, their true home is with him. So in passing through this world they must show by their conduct and in their relationships that they are citizens of a better country.

Significantly, the first three of the four sections which follow, giving examples of this behaviour, use the same word submission (13, 18, 3:1). The word has the literal meaning of stationing oneself beneath someone else, and so regarding the other person as superior to oneself (as in Phil. 2:3). Both Jesus (Jn. 18:22–23) and Paul (Acts 25:10–11) show us that this does not mean that Christians are to be doormats; they may stand up for their legal rights.

2:11–12 General principles for attitudes in the world of human relationships.

From 1:15 Peter has been looking at the positive side of holiness, living for God. Now he takes up briefly the negative side, abstinence, which he will resume at 4:1. Such behaviour silences the slanders which Christians were already having to face. Here are echoes of Jesus' instructions in Mt. 5:16.

Notes. 11 The picture of Aliens and strangers found in 1:1, 17 and Heb. 11:13, comes originally from Gn. 23:4. Sinful (lit. 'fleshly') desires are to be refused, as they destroy the immortal part of our being (see Gal. 5:19–21). 12 Pagans (lit. 'Gentiles') describes those who are outside the relationship to God enjoyed by the church as the true Israel (see on vs 9–10 above). The day he visits us, i.e. to judge.

2:13–17 Attitudes to state authorities. Good conduct is to be expressed in a submissive acceptance of the demands of every authority instituted among men. It is striking that Peter, probably writing in the age of Nero, still sees the state as appointed by God for the maintenance of moral values (see Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Tim. 2:1–2). The Christian's upright behaviour should raise him or her above the slanders or suspicions of the ignorant (15). Christians must give Caesar what is his due (Mt. 22:21) and Peter does not hint at any exceptions here, even though he knew how to refuse the authorities when they claimed for themselves what was God's (Acts 4:19–20; 5:29).

Surprisingly, Christian freedom is the liberty to live as the servants of God, fulfilling his will (16). It is not, therefore, the licence to please oneself, under the pretext of 'permissiveness'. Four brief commands sum up these practical requirements: everyone is to be shown respect, as those for whom Christ died and in whom the divine likeness can be restored; the brotherhood of believers is to be loved; God is to be approached with worship (i.e. reverent fear; see Heb. 12:28–29); and the king is to be treated with respect.

Notes. 13 For the Lord's sake reminds us of both the example and the teaching of Jesus. Supreme authority i.e. over human institutions. 17 Peter quotes Pr. 24:21, where the writer uses the same word to describe attitudes to God as well as the king. Peter does not do this.

2:18–25 Attitudes to employers. Peter gives detailed instruction for two groups of people (slaves and wives) whose position in the ancient world could make life, especially as a believer, very difficult for them. The lot of slaves would not be too bad under a good master, but they were often treated unjustly. While Peter addresses himself to their situation as employees, Paul shows that employers must also show respect and consideration for those who work for them (Eph. 6:5–9; Col. 3:22–4:1).

Patience while suffering a deserved punishment is no virtue, but the Christian is called to accept even the harsh treatment of an unkind master. This wins God's commendation. To persevere in doing good, and be patient under suffering, could even be said to be the Christian's calling, as it was part of Christ's sufferings (cf. Phil. 3:10). It is also the example left by Jesus. Peter recalls vividly how he behaved during his sufferings. He then reminds his readers of the benefits we enjoy as a result of that suffering.

Notes. 18 Slaves were the domestic servants regularly found in Greek and Roman households (see Philemon). 19 Conscious of God may indicate either the master's reason for inflicting the undeserved punishment (because he is aware of the slave's faith) or the slave's motive for accepting it (because he is aware that God knows and shares his sufferings; see Acts 9:4). Peter probably had in mind Jesus' words in Mt. 5:11–12, 46–47; Lk. 6:22–23, 32–35 and Jn. 15:18–21. 21 Example is used only here in the NT and describes an outline drawing or copy-book letters to be followed by a pupil. 22–23 Peter quotes Is. 53:9 and 7 (cf. Mk. 14:61, 65; 15:29; Jn. 19:1–9). 24–25 This description is so graphic that it could well be that of an eyewitness. Bore is lit. 'carried up' and the language is deliberately sacrificial (cf. Heb 7:27 where offer is the same Gk. verb). The reference to the purpose of Jesus' sufferings (quoting Is. 53:12 and 5) gives the motive for ours. Our response to the sin-bearing saviour must be to return to him as our shepherd in order to die to sins and live for righteousness. The imagery reflects Is. 53:6 and Jn. 10. Overseer is the word regularly used to describe the function of a shepherd, and so of a spiritual pastor. The English 'bishop' (AV/KJV) is derived from this root.

3:1–7 Attitudes to the family. Wives are now commanded to be submissive in the same way, for the ancient world classed women and slaves together as 'inferior beings'. Christianity gave dignity to the status of both, and Peter stresses the spiritual equality of man and wife as heirs together. Paul interestingly exhorts married couples to mutual submission, where the wife's submissiveness is to be matched by the husband's self-giving love (Eph. 5:21–28). Scripture teaches that men and women complement one another in the marriage relationship. Because men are in general physically stronger than women, they are to use this fact to cherish (treat ... with respect) their wives. In a world where the domestic economy depended on the husband earning a living for the family, it was natural that the wife should look to him to make decisions concerning where they should live etc. Sarah's readiness to go with Abraham in obedience to God's call is an example of this kind of relationship. Our task today is to interpret the principles laid down in Scripture for the times in which we live. Christian women were often married to unbelieving husbands, and Peter stresses the importance of Christlike behaviour to win them. Marriage is then lifted to its highest plane by the call to husbands to treat their wives with consideration and respect. This is because they have a shared faith and they are a praying partnership and no misunderstandings or wrong behaviour must hinder its effectiveness. This instruction applies of course to Christian couples, here graphically described as sharing the inheritance of God's gracious gift of eternal life.

Notes. 3 The reference to outward adornment does not mean that Christian women should not dress well or make use of beauty aids. The nouns which follow contrast sharply with the attitude of v 2 as they are all active and stress the time and energy spent on such personal adornment. God prefers to see beauty of character which will never fade. 4 A gentle and quiet spirit is one which puts up with the demands of others without causing any itself. There are good examples of such characters among the people of God—Sarah, Rebecca, Ruth, Hannah—and such women are the true daughters, by spiritual descent and likeness, of Sarah. 6 Called him her master may refer to Gn. 18:12 where the word 'husband' can also mean 'lord' or 'master'. 7 In the same way may refer back to 2:17 and the general instruction to 'show proper respect to everyone', or it may look to the wife's behaviour and urge husbands to respond with mutual love and understanding (Phillips translates be considerate as 'try to understand'). On weaker partner see Gn. 2:18; 3:16.

3:8–12 Attitudes to the fellowship. Peter now leaves the field of special relationships and concludes this section with a summary of the attitudes Christians should demonstrate to one another, in both their actions and reactions. This is contained in the one word blessing (9), the calling down of God's gracious power and love on all people, even on those who wish or do us harm. To behave like this is encouraged by knowing that Christians themselves will ultimately inherit God's blessing. This was promised in Ps. 34:12–16 which is quoted here. Christians are called to walk the way of blamelessness and uprightness, actively pursuing peace with all, just like the people of faith in the OT. They have the same motivation because God watches over and blesses such behaviour, but sets himself against evil-doers.

Notes. 8 Live in harmony is lit. 'be of the same mind'. This comes about when we share the mind of Christ (see Phil. 2:5; Col. 3:2). We can then enter into the feelings of others (sympathetic comes from a Greek word meaning 'feeling with') and share God's love for them. This quality of loving as brothers or sisters has been mentioned before in 1:22 and will be emphasized again in 4:8: it should be the hallmark of Christian fellowship. Compassionate brings a new Christian meaning to an old Greek word for 'courageous'. Humble (see also 5:5–6) shows that the secret of the character described here lies in a realistic estimate of oneself and a high concern for others. V 9 picks up the picture of 2:23 (see the references there to the example of Jesus, together with Lk. 6:27–28; 23:34). This could refer to the inheriting of a blessing, or to the life of repaying cursing with blessing. The words used here, reminding us of 2:21, as well as the quotation from Ps. 34, suggest that Peter is emphasizing his reasons for godly living in the face of opposition. Such Christian obedience will inherit the blessing God has prepared (cf. Rom. 8:17–18). This blessing will be enjoyed to the full in the life to come, but the OT writer obviously had in mind the blessings of a walk with God in this life. God's eyes are on his children to keep them safe and his ears are open to them to hear and answer their prayers. 10–12 The quotation of Ps. 34:12–16 is altered grammatically to fit the context. Life was probably intended by the psalmist to refer to temporal existence on earth. Peter may well be using the word (as in v 7) of eternal life, especially as he changes the original 'loves life and desires to see many good days' to (lit.) 'he who wishes to love life and to see good days'.

3:13–4:6 Living for Christ in the face of opposition

Since the widespread collapse of communism there are now fewer countries in the world where Christians are likely to be persecuted or imprisoned for their faith. Yet it only needs a totalitarian government (of right or left) to bring back attempts by states to suppress those who speak out in the name of Christ. In modern western society Christians are more likely to be persecuted for standing out against its false values and standards. (In Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan describes this happening to Christian and Faithful in the town of Vanity Fair.)

13–16 Peter's confidence in God's sovereignty as well as in his justice leads him to a rhetorical question, Who is going to harm you if you are eager to do good? The remark which follows suggests that zeal on the Christian's part for what is right is not likely to lead to persecution. This seems strangely inconsistent with the warnings of Jesus (e.g. Mt. 5:10–12), the teaching and experience of Paul (e.g. Acts 14:22) and Peter's own words in the next chapter (4:12–19), or even vs 16 and 17 here. In view of this it is probably right to lay the stress in this question on the verb to harm (13). Persecution may well come upon the Christian, but it cannot ultimately do injury. In fact the experience can lead to blessing (14; cf. 1:6–9) and the outcome can be left in God's hands (4:19) as he watches over his own and their persecutors (3:12). So believers are urged not to be frightened. The positive antidote to fear is to be found in giving Christ the special place that is his due at the centre of our lives. There he is to reign as Lord. Such true fear of the Lord, expressing itself both in upright behaviour and with a well-thought-out statement of faith, will drive out all lesser fears and eventually shame the detractors.

17–22 These verses contain the most complex train of thought in the whole letter. The key idea which links them together is that of suffering (see 3:17 and 4:1). Peter has been preparing his readers for future suffering, and anticipates that they may make the common human reaction to suffering—what a waste! So he points us to the suffering of Jesus and what it enabled him to achieve: he brings us to God; he is raised from the dead; he makes proclamation to the spirits in prison (see below); he makes possible the cleansing and salvation that baptism symbolizes; and he is raised to the pre-eminent position of power and glory.

Such suffering was obviously far from pointless and was in fact the will of God for Christ and could be God's will for his followers. This is not in the sense that they could die to bring others to God, but that the pattern of suffering leading to glory is one that Jesus called his followers to take (e.g. Mt. 16:24–26). Mention of this leads Peter to remind us how the God-ordained suffering of the innocent Christ had seven characteristics: it was done once for all (18); it was the way to deal with sin (for sins; see Rom. 8:3 and the NIV mg.); it was a righteous person acting on behalf of the unrighteous; it was to bring you to God (the Gk. verb here, prosaḡō, is a technical term for introducing someone into the presence of a superior); it was a physical death to gain spiritual life; it was an opportunity to go and preach to the spirits in prison (see below); it led to God's vindication of Jesus by raising and exalting him (22).

V 18 is one of the most succinct and yet profound statements in the NT on the doctrine of the atonement. Jesus is seen as dealing with the problem of humanity's broken relationship with God in three ways.

1. He made the perfect offering for sin (cf. Heb. 9:11–14; 10:1–10) and thereby fulfilled the requirements of the law.
2. He endured the death due to unrighteousness as the penalty imposed by the law on sinners (cf. Rom. 6:23; 2 Cor. 5:21).
3. He thereby removed the barrier caused by sin and opened the way back to God (Jn. 14:6).

Having stressed so much the value of Christ's sufferings as our example (e.g. 2:21), Peter redresses the balance by stating also how unique and efficacious they are. The righteous implies that his suffering was propitiatory (satisfying all God's own demands), while for (lit. 'on behalf of') shows that it was also vicarious. The one person whose perfect righteousness meant that he never deserved to die endured the pains of death on behalf of all who did deserve to die. In this way Jesus took our place and endured our punishment. The language reflects strongly that of Is. 53:6.

By the Spirit points to the work of the Spirit in restoring Jesus to life. He died physically on the cross in that his bodily functions (respiration and circulation of the blood etc.) ceased. He also died spiritually in that he underwent the separation from God consequent on bearing the sins of the world. This was expressed by the cry of dereliction (Mk. 15:34). But spiritual death is not annihilation, and once Jesus had undergone in full God's judgment on sin his spirit was released from the body. The Greek of Mk. 15:37 and parallels uses the common but vivid metaphor of 'breathing out' his spirit. On the third day that spirit returned to resume his body at the resurrection. The NIV mg. shows that we could alternatively understand alive in the spirit to refer to the activity of the spirit of Jesus during the period between this death and resurrection.

Reference to the spirits in prison (19) takes the writer to the days of Noah, whose experience of salvation is a striking parallel to baptism.

The faith which is the believer's response to God in baptism is made possible by the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Peter now links both strands of thought. He sees the glorification of Jesus not only as the divine sequel to his sacrificial death, but also as the compelling reason for humankind to respond to him in faith. (See further comments in the notes below.)

4:1–6 Suffering in the body is therefore to be accepted because: it follows the example of Jesus; it unites the believer with his attitude; and it enables the sufferer to live for the will of God. It is important to weigh passages like this against some of the contemporary teaching on 'health and wealth'. Nowhere in the Bible are we taught that the Christian will always be prosperous and avoid suffering; rather, Jesus suggests the opposite may often be true (see Lk. 6:20–26; Jn. 16:1–4).

Mention of baptism in 3:21 may have prompted Peter to follow the same sort of argument as Paul uses in Rom. 6. Baptism symbolizes the believer's entry into the benefits obtained by Christ's suffering and death. In undergoing it the person baptized is regarded as mystically sharing those sufferings and death. The consequence of such a death in Rom. 6:11 is to 'count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus'. This is what Peter is stating here, adding a note of urgency by contrasting time spent in the past on indulging oneself with the opportunity for serving God in the future.

Those whose behaviour and habits are so changed become the targets for persecution. However, the Christian must remember that it is to God that all must give account of their conduct. The comprehensiveness of this judgment (5) leads Peter to make an aside remark that the death of Christians proves the value of preaching the gospel to people while they are alive. Though now in death they have received in their bodies God's judgment on sin, their spirits are still alive with him. (For other interpretations of this verse see the Notes below.)

In this section, therefore, Peter encourages Christians who are facing suffering (and possibly even martyrdom) by showing them from the example of Jesus that God's plan can be worked out through such suffering and that it will ultimately lead to victory (see 1:11).

Notes. 3:14 The NIV mg. shows that the quotation from Is. 8:12–13 can be taken in either of two ways: 'do not fear what they fear', or 'do not fear what they threaten'. A third possibility is that the command here and in Isaiah is a warning against apostasy—'do not share their objects of religious reverence' (the Greek verb is used in this cultic sense in e.g. Lk. 1:50; 18:2, 4; Acts 13:16, 26). 17 The Greek for if it is God's will is 'if it should be'. This suggests that the possibility of having to suffer for doing good is rather remote, as in v 14. Peter may have said this to allay the fears of his readers.

19 This verse raises the two most difficult questions in the letter. When did Jesus preach to the spirits in prison, and who were they? Some take the verse to refer to the chronological sequel to Jesus' death, when his spirit passed into the realms of the departed. Then, with Acts 2:31 and Eph. 4:9, this verse establishes the clause in the Creeds about Jesus' descent to the dead. In that case he must have preached to all the dead in one of three ways: to offer them a second chance of salvation; to proclaim his victory over death and triumph over the power of evil and so confirm the sentence on unbelievers and announce deliverance for believers; to proclaim release from purgatory to those who had repented just before they perished in the flood (a popular interpretation among Roman Catholic writers).

Neither the first nor the last of these can be supported from Scripture, but the second has been held by many commentators as fitting in with the NT evidence above. E.G. Selwyn (The First Epistle of Peter [Macmillan, 1949]), and others see the spirits in prison as the fallen angels of Gn. 6:1–8 referred to in 2 Pet. 2:4–10 and Jude 6 as well as in the apocryphal 1 Enoch. Peter's aim in this context is to demonstrate that God's purpose is being worked out even in times of suffering. So it would seem best to understand the preaching as a declaration of Christ's triumph, in order to assert (22) that all angels, authorities and powers [are] in submission to him. Grudem (TNTC) in an appendix summarizes the views and claims that the spirits were Noah's contemporaries who rejected the preaching of the Spirit of Christ through Noah (see 2 Pet. 2:5) and are now in the prison of the abode of the dead. The interpretation of made alive by the Spirit (18) as a reference to the resurrection, and the spirits in prison as a reference to the fallen angels is cogently argued by R. T. France in New Testament Interpretation, ed. I. H. Marshall (Paternoster Press, 1979), pp. 264–281. He claims that NT and contemporary usage favour this understanding of the word spirits when used by itself, rather than applying it to men and women who had died before Jesus came to bring the gospel.

No view is free of problems, but the use of a verb implying steady and purposeful progression (went [19] and has gone [22] are both the same Gk. word poreutheis) suggests that Peter is recounting what Jesus accomplished between his death and exaltation.

20 Disobeyed long ago refers, on the preceding interpretations, either to the events of Gn. 6:1–4 or to a rejection of the preaching of Noah (see 2 Pet. 2:5). Reference to God's waiting patiently while the ark was being built (Gn. 6:13; and cf. 2 Pet. 3:5–9) also fits either of these possibilities. A few people is a biblical emphasis (cf. Mt. 7:14; Lk. 13:23–24). In the OT the equivalent idea is that of the 'remnant' (Is. 10:20–23; Je. 23:3; cf. Rom. 9:27–29). Even so, Paul also speaks of the 'many' who will be made righteous through the death of Jesus (Rom. 5:19), and this should be a motive for evangelism. Through water has two meanings. In terms of place, the ark brought Noah and his family safely through the water which brought God's judgment on others. The preposition through ('by', 'by means of') also suggests the instrument, i.e. water was both the means of destruction for their contemporaries and the means of deliverance into a fresh start for Noah and his family.

21 The Greek word symbolizes ('antitypon') originally described the impression left on a surface by a seal (typos) and so was used of the kind of correspondence a stamp has to its die. Peter sees the picture as a parallel to baptism, for here the water symbolizes God's judgment on sin, and deliverance into a new life. The only way to pass from a state of sinful rebellion against God to new life is through the waters of judgment. Noah and his family did that symbolically in the ark. Jesus spoke of his coming death as a baptism (Mk. 10:38–39) when on our behalf he endured the judgment of God’s wrath. In Rom. 6:3–4 Paul sees baptism as portraying the Christian’s entering into that experience of Christ’s death and resurrection. For Jesus, his death was the enduring of God’s judgment on sin and the prelude to resurrection; for the believer, Jesus’ death is the means of cleansing from sin and entry into new life. Peter rids his readers of any magical ideas about baptism by making it plain that the efficacy of baptism does not lie in the outward symbolism of the removal of dirt from the body but in the inner response of faith towards God. Pledge is a word used in the first-century world of the solemn commitment of any party undertaking a contract and so the AV translates it ‘answer’ (see the NIV mg.). The resurrection of Jesus Christ is the great fact which makes real and possible all that baptism symbolizes, and it is only by this means that we are saved (cf. 1:3 with 1 Cor. 15:1–2, 14). 22 Reference to this leads Peter to repeat poreutheis from v 19 (see above). This describes the triumphal procession of Jesus, which led to his being seated in heaven (thereby fulfilling Ps. 110:1) and the position of supreme power.

4:1 The same attitude (lit. ‘intention’) appears, from the context, to refer to Christ’s experience of suffering. His sufferings led to the death of his flesh and enabled his spirit to enter a new mode of existence. This should also be seen in the life of the believer. He who has suffered need not refer to those who undergo physical suffering, but includes all who, in the mystical union symbolized by baptism, share the sufferings of Christ. This union should be made effective by claiming deliverance from sin and a new life of service to God. 2 The plural desires suggests the diversity of interests pulling a person in different directions (v 3 gives a catalogue of some of these). By contrast the will of God in the singular shows that only in obedience to God can the human personality be truly and properly integrated. 3 What pagans choose to do is seen by some to point to a Gentile background to Peter’s readers which may have involved them in taking part in pagan religious rites or the activities of the trade-guilds. Debauchery and all the following nouns are plural and are used to describe a round of activities in which such behaviour was expressed. 5 This verse emphasizes the universality of judgment. Humankind must either face it after death, or else anticipate it here on earth by responding to Christ. 3:18–21 has already shown that in that response their sins are dealt with through their union with Christ. Death is then the gateway to the fuller and freer life of the spirit, and there will be no further judgment to bear (see Jesus’ words in Jn. 5:24). Some commentators interpret the dead as those who are spiritually dead. Others use this verse to deduce that a second chance of responding to the gospel will be given after death. They link this preaching with the proclamation of 3:19, but this does not suit the context, and is not supported elsewhere in Scripture. 6 The gospel was preached even to those who are now dead anticipates a possible objection to the gospel by the opponents of the Christians—‘If you speak of the return of Christ, and possessing eternal life here and now, why do your people die like the rest of us? Surely you are suffering exactly the same judgment as we are, for you say that death is the wages of sin.’ Peter’s answer is that those who are now dead have been judged according to men in regard to the body by suffering physical death but, because the gospel was preached to them (while alive, and they responded to it), they are now living according to God in regard to the spirit. According to men ... according to God could refer to judgment in the flesh as being the common lot of humanity, and life in the spirit as the distinctive characteristic of God. Alter-natively, the preposition according to may mean ‘in the sight of ...’. Either translation makes little difference to the meaning. Another possible translation is 'by men' but this is unlikely and does not fit easily with the parallel according to God.

4:7–11 Ministering to one another

The final judgment is no remote contingency. In every age Christians must be ready at all times for Christ's return to wind up this present order of things. So it is urgent for us to watch and pray (cf. Lk. 21:36), displaying self-control, mutual love and a diligent stewardship of the gifts God has given us. This is the life that will bring glory to God (see Mt. 5:16).

Notes. 7 The end (Gk. telos, which also means 'goal') of the present system is not only its climax but also the purpose towards which God has been and is working. Clear minded means 'of safe mind'. In the midst of fears and uncertainty the Christian must keep in touch with God. J. B. Phillips' translation is helpful here: 'be calm, self-controlled men of prayer'. 8 On deeply see on 1:22. Love covers over a multitude of sins could be a reference to Pr. 10:12. This verse has been used to argue that love can earn forgiveness of sins, not only for the one who displays it, but also for the one who receives it as well. This is not consistent with other biblical teaching. The most likely meaning is that true love will overlook its neighbour's faults (see Mt. 6:14–15; 1 Cor. 13:4–7; Jas. 5:20). It could also be taken to refer to God's love covering over our sins, which gives the motive for us to love one another. 9 Hospitality was important in the days of itinerant ministers and no church buildings (see Mt. 25:35; Rom. 12:13; 16:3–5a; 1 Tim. 3:2; Heb. 13:2). 10 Each implies that every Christian has some gift to exercise. Peter's remarks on stewardship are significant in view of the fact that Jesus spoke on this subject especially to Peter in Lk. 12:42–48. On in its various forms see on 1:6 where the same word is used. 11 Speaks and serves cover the two broad divisions of ministry within the Christian church: ministering the word of God and 'serving tables' in various ways (see Acts 6:1–6). Both ministries are equally God-given and can rely on God to provide what is necessary for their fulfilment. Very words (Gk. logia) was used in classical times of divine utterances, and in Rom. 3:2 and Heb. 5:12 is applied to Scripture. (For the significance of ascription To him ... here see the Introduction, under 'Is the letter a unity?'.)

4:12–19 Suffering for Christ's sake

Peter now returns to the theme of suffering and suggests seven further reasons to encourage the Christian not merely to endure, but actually rejoice in it. The experience of suffering is (i) a trial (12; cf. 1:6–7) to prove the reality of our faith, and we can expect God to work to strengthen this; (ii) nothing strange (12), rather a sharing in Christ's experience; (iii) a pathway to glory for us, as it was for Christ (13; see also Rom. 8:17 and Col. 1:24); (iv) an opportunity for blessing, in a further experience of the Holy Spirit (14); (v) an opportunity to glorify God (14); (vi) a challenge to prove the relevance of the gospel as judgment begins with the household of God (17); (vii) an opportunity to commit ourselves to God and prove his faithfulness (19). God's people can commit the issues of life in full confidence to the one who gave them life. By contrast, the unrepentant sinner has nothing to look forward to here or hereafter once God begins to act in judgment.

Notes. 12 Painful trial (Gk. 'exposure to fire with a view to testing') looks back to the argument of 1:6–7. Strange is the adjective from the root of the verb used earlier in the sentence for do not be surprised. It would therefore be better to have 'surprising' here or else translate 'strange' in both places as the AV and RV do. 14 Because of the name of Christ need not mean that it was already a criminal offence to be a Christian, for Jesus himself suggested the possibility of suffering for his name's sake (see Mt. 10:22; Jn. 15:21). For further details see the Introduction on authorship. In every age since Jesus Christians who have tried to live like him have become the target of slander or hatred from those who have been challenged or convicted by their behaviour. Some have taken the [spirit of] glory ('spirit of' is not in the original) to refer to the Shekinah, the visible brightness which symbolized God's presence among his people (Ex. 40:34–35). That may be so, but the context and sentence structure make it more likely to be best taken (as the NIV) to mean God's Spirit. This is the Spirit of glory as he reveals God's glory to his people by making Christ real to them and transforming them into his image (Jn. 16:14; 2 Cor. 3:18). The phrase may have been coined from the LXX of Is. 11:2; though neither glory nor power (an alternative reading) are mentioned there. 15 Meddler may seem out of place in this list of otherwise criminal activities, but this was often the effect the gospel seemed to have (as in Acts 16:18; 19:27).

16 Christian occurs on only two other occasions in the NT (Acts 11:26; 26:28). In both cases it is assumed to have been used by detractors as a term of contempt. However, people of the day used the Latin ending -ianus (anglicized as '-ian') in two ways which might shed light on this usage. Herod's followers were called 'Herodians' (Mk. 3:6) and so 'Christians' could have indicated 'supporters of Christ'. It was the Roman custom for a person adopted into a noble family to use as his own the family name with the -ianus ending. So a person adopted into the family of Domitius could call himself Domitianus. Antioch (where the custom began—Acts 11:26) was a Roman city, and so Christians there might well have used the name to show that they had been adopted into the family of Christ (Rom. 8:15–17).

17 For the idea of judgment beginning with the family of God see Je. 25:29; Ezk. 9:6; Mal. 3:1–3). 18 The quotation of Pr. 11:31 from the LXX underlines the argument of the previous verse, and is a reminder of Jesus' words in Lk. 23:31. 19 If such suffering is accepted in the light of vs 17–18, then far from giving up under it the Christian will persevere in doing good. We follow Christ's example, by committing the out-come into God's hands. Commit is the word used by Jesus in Lk. 23:46 (citing Ps. 31:5). Every faithful Jew used this as a final prayer at night and this may be the thought here. Paul used the noun derived from this root in 2 Tim. 1:12 to express his confidence in God's safe keeping. Creator is used here probably to remind the readers of God's power (cf. 1:5 and Paul's thought in Phil. 1:6).

5:1–4 Exercising leadership

People undergoing the experiences and faced with the challenges of ch. 4 will need wise and skilful pastoring. The NIV omits the emphatic Greek 'therefore' which links these verses with those which precede. With his unique position and experience Peter urges the local church leaders to discharge their duties in a ready, enthusiastic and exemplary manner. They should remember both to whom they are under-shepherds, and the reward he has promised for faithful service.

Three contrasting ways of tackling the task of a pastor are set out. First, not grudgingly as a duty but willingly as of free choice; secondly, not greedily thinking of the reward but with ready heart for the Lord and those they serve; and thirdly, not flaunting their position but using every opportunity to give the flock an example.

Notes. 1 Elders (Gk. presbyteroi) were appointed from earliest times to take spiritual charge of the infant churches which came into being with the spread of the gospel (Acts 14:23; 20:17). Acts 15:2 shows that the Jerusalem church had elders at an early date. The role probably derived from Jewish precedent (Nu. 11:16–25; see under ‘Elder’ in the NBD). Their task was primarily a pastoral one. In the early days of the church they were called elders, indicating their status, and also episkopoi (‘bishops, overseers’) to describe their function. This picture is picked up in v 2, and Acts 20:28 uses the two words interchangeably. Fellow-elder is not found elsewhere in the NT, but is not an unusual word in this context, where Peter is keen to emphasize his oneness with those he is encouraging. The author claims to have been a witness of Christ’s sufferings. The fact that the lists of those present at the crucifixion (Mt. 27:55–56; Mk. 15:40–41; Lk. 23:49; Jn. 19:25) mention only the women followers could suggest that Peter was not present. John is not mentioned either, but we know that he was present (Jn. 19:26, 27). Peter could also have been there without specific reference to him. In any case, he would already have seen much of Jesus’ sufferings (Lk. 22:28, 54–62; Jn. 18:15–27). On glory see on 4:13.

2 Be shepherds uses the word Jesus used when speaking to Peter after the resurrection (Jn. 21:16). It is also Paul’s charge to the elders at Ephesus (Acts 20:28; cf. Ps. 78:70–72). That is under your care could also mean ‘to the best of your ability’. Either translation suits the context. Serving as overseers is the same root as Overseer in 2:25. Not because you must suggests a false sense of unworthiness, a reluctance for responsibility, or a desire to do no more than is absolutely necessary. Any one of these attitudes can lead to an unwillingness to take on the task or discharge it adequately. As God wants you to be is a possible translation. The Greek could also mean ‘as God would do it’, recalling the attitude of the Shepherd of souls in 2:25; Ps. 23; and Jn. 10:11. Greedy for money does not imply that the elders were receiving a stipend, but that there were opportunities for the unscrupulous to make personal gain from ministry. This spirit could also apply to the love of reputation or position.

3 Lording it is often the attitude of the worldly superior (the same word is used in Mk. 10:42). Christian leaders, rather than domineering and manipulating others for their own ends, are to be an example, giving what they can contribute to them in the way of advice and character-building. Those entrusted to you (Gk. klēroi means ‘[your] appointed portions’): klēros, from which we get our ‘cleric’, was originally an allotment of land; then it referred to an office assigned by lot, and here refers to the flock assigned to a particular pastor. Examples is the word typoi, denoting a model or pattern to be copied (see 3:21 for the derived word antitypon). Peter has previously described the second advent in terms of an ‘unveiling’ or ‘revelation’ of Jesus Christ. Appears Gk. phaneroō brings out the consequence of that revelation, that Jesus will be visible in his glory to all (see Rev. 1:7). Of glory refers to the share in glory to be given to the wearer of the crown, as the ‘crown of life’ in Jas. 1:12 and Rev. 2:10 speaks of the eternal life enjoyed by the wearer. That will never fade away is amarantinon meaning ‘of amaranth’, a flower which took its name from the word amaranton (used in 1:4) because it was thought to be unfading. This contrasts with the fading crowns of laurel leaves awarded to victors in the games that are being alluded to here (cf. 1 Cor. 9:25; 2 Tim. 4:8; Rev. 3:11; 4:4).

5:5–7 Being good followers

The kind of eldership just described deserves the loyal support of the younger element in the fellowship. Their submission to godly direction should lead to an attitude of humble respect for one another throughout the fellowship—an attitude which Scripture enjoins. The theme of humility introduces some final general words of advice. Our humility in God’s hands enables him to use us in the way which will develop our full potential. This is the way to the truly carefree life, reassured of his concern for us.

Notes. 5 In the same way could indicate the conduct required of others in the light of the instructions of the preceding verses, or it could be picking up the thought of 2:13, 18; 3:1, 7. Those who are older is the same word as elders in v 1 and could be a reference to them. Clothe yourselves is lit. ‘fasten on with a knot’, ‘bind to yourselves’ and Peter may well have had the incident recorded in Jn. 13:4–5 and 15–16 in the mind. The quotation in this verse is from the LXX of Pr. 3:34 (also quoted in Jas. 4:6). Jesus speaks of this principle in Mt. 23:12. 6 God’s mighty hand is a familiar phrase in the LXX, usually connected in thought with the deliverance from Egypt (as in Ps. 98:1). Here it reminds us that God can intervene in human affairs and bring blessing out of acceptance of the lowly part of life, even of suffering rightly borne. 7 Cast is the vivid verb ‘hurl’. The reason for the absence of anxiety is the one Jesus gives, e.g. in Mt. 6:25–34; 10:28–33.

5:8–11 Such salvation attracts opposition, but faith guarantees the victory

A carefree life is not a careless one, and the Christian must be watchful as we are involved in a constant spiritual warfare. The facts of this are: there is an enemy, the devil (8); he seeks opportunities to destroy Christians (8); the way to overcome him is by resistance (9); such resistance is based on confidence in God (9); it is also backed by the knowledge that we are not alone in the struggle (9); the outcome lies with God, who, because of his ultimate destiny for us, will meet every need on the way (10); this God has the power for ever (11).

Notes. 8 On be self-controlled see 1:13 and 4:7. Alert is a striking reference to Jesus’ words to Peter (Mt. 26:41; Mk. 14:38). Enemy (Gk. antidikos) is a legal term, a translation of the Heb. šātān, used of the adversary of souls (e.g. Jb. 1:6). Here, as there, Satan can be seen as the one who stirs up suffering and persecution in order to test and, if possible, destroy the faith of God’s children. Peter was familiar with this behaviour (see Mt. 16:23; Lk. 22:31). Devil is a Greek word meaning ‘slanderer’. In his role of undermining faith the devil slanders God to men (Gn. 3:1, 4–5) and men to God (Jb. 1:9–11; 2:4–5). On prowls around see Jb. 1:7; 2:2. 9 Resist is the method recommended for dealing with the devil, as in Jas. 4:7 (cf. Eph. 6:11–17). It is the desires of the flesh that one has to flee (1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22). The word firm describes the solidity of material objects. No superficial faith will do here, as it is the enemy’s desire to make apostates through persecution. Rev. 12:11 gives further advice for victory in such trials. Throughout the world contrasts with the group of churches in Asia Minor (1:1) to whom this letter was addressed. 10 The call to perseverance is matched by the doctrine of preservation. Since God has called us to share his eternal glory in Christ, we can ultimately rely on him to bring us safely through to it (see Phil. 1:6; 1 Thes. 5:24; Jude 24). The NIV will restore, is a more likely reading than the AV ‘make you perfect’: this is a promise and not a prayer. Restore describes ships being repaired after a battle or storm. Strong (Lk. 22:32) is used primarily of physical objects and may denote fixity of position, firm denotes firmness of purpose, while steadfast has the idea of giving foundations. 11 Power (Gk. kratos, from which the adjective mighty in v 6 is formed) is not the usual word but means God’s overruling might which is guaranteed to bring the Christian through.

5:12–14 Personal greetings

Peter now sums up by stating his twofold purpose of encouraging and reassuring and pays tribute to his helper, Silas. The salvation he has been declaring is truly God's grace at work, and so there is not only every reason to stand fast in it, but every confidence that we shall be able to do so. Closing greetings bring the letter to an end with the characteristic Hebrew blessing of peace being sent to all the Christian readers or hearers.

Notes. 12 Silas (Gk. Silvanus, as NIV mg.) is probably the Silas of Acts 15:22–18:5 (cf. 2 Cor. 1:19; 1 Thes. 1:1; 2 Thes. 1:1). With the help of (lit. 'by means of') may mean that Silas helped in the writing of the letter, or that he delivered it, or both. A faithful brother is 'the' faithful brother in the original, which suggests that Silas was known to the readers. Otherwise, it may just stress his relationship to Peter. This could be taken as a reference to the promises of v 10, but more likely refers to the whole of the letter. In is the more graphic 'into' implying active application of oneself to the goal.

13 Babylon has been identified with either the ancient capital of Babylonia, a Roman garrison town in Egypt (now Cairo), or Rome. The last seems most likely—see the Introduction. She ... chosen together is usually taken to refer to the local church with the Greek feminine noun ekklēsia omitted. The reference following to my son has prompted the suggestion that 'she' was Peter's wife (cf. Mk. 1:30; 1 Cor. 9:5), but this is unlikely. Mark probably refers to the writer of the second gospel, to whose home Peter came on deliverance from prison (Acts 12:12). Mark accompanied Paul on missionary work (Acts 12:25–13:13), but later left him. This displeased the apostle, who took Silas as a companion instead (Acts 13:13; 15:36–40). However, Mark in time regained Paul's favour (2 Tim. 4:11) and was with him, probably at Rome, at the end of his life (Col. 4:10; Phm. 24). Eusebius the historian quotes Papias as saying that Mark compiled a written record of Peter's recollections of the deeds and sayings of the Lord, and from early times Mark's gospel was associated with the church at Rome. Son is used in the spiritual sense (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2).

14 The kiss of love, or 'holy kiss', is mentioned in the NT on several occasions (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12). It appears to have been regularly used when Christians met for fellowship. It may also have been a common practice among Jesus and his disciples (see Lk. 22:48), and could have been misrepresented by those who wanted to slander the Christian faith. Peace is the wish with which the letter ends, as it began (1:2). In between these two verses, however, the reader has been made aware how this peace has been made possible even in the midst of suffering, the difficult outworkings of personal relationships and the constant challenge of a pagan society. The source of such peace is to be found in Christ (see Jn. 14:27). Whatever the circumstances, the person who is in Christ (cf. Eph. 1:3–14) can always know the peace of God, for it is freely available to all of you who are in Christ.

David H. Wheaton

2 PETER

Introduction

Who wrote 2 Peter?

The writer leaves us in no doubt on the matter. He says he is ‘Simon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ’ (1:1). He was on the mount of Transfiguration with Jesus (1:16–18) where only Peter, James and John were with him (Mk. 9:2–12). He had written on a previous occasion to the recipients of this letter (3:1) and is on familiar terms with them (3:1, 8, 14, 17). Furthermore, he calls Paul ‘our dear brother’ (3:15), and at the time of writing he was expecting to die quite soon (1:14).

There is no evidence to suggest that any of these facts were later inserted into the letter to make people accept it. However, there is a popular modern theory that the letter is a ‘pseudepigraph’, i.e. a writing put out after the death of a great man, published under his name as containing the kind of things he would have said in that situation. Thus it would do him honour by being ascribed to him. Arguments to support this view are as follows.

First, it is claimed that the language and style are not similar to 1 Peter. In places we find complicated phrases in an exaggerated style. This is particularly true in ch. 2 where the writer gets carried along by his theme as he did in 1 Pet. 3:18–22. In any case, 1 Peter was written on different matters, and may have had some input from Silvanus (1 Pet. 5:12). In fact, there are strong resemblances between the letters. Some words and phrases occur only in these letters and nowhere else in the NT, e.g. ‘goodness’ used of God (2 Pet. 1:3; 1 Pet. 2:9 [tr. ‘praises’]); ‘putting aside’ (2 Pet. 1:14; 1 Pet. 3:21 [tr. ‘removal’]); ‘never stop sinning’ (2 Pet. 2:14; 1 Pet. 4:1 [tr. ‘is done with sin’]). Other words not common elsewhere are ‘brotherly kindness’ (2 Pet. 1:7; 1 Pet. 1:22), the root of ‘eye-witnesses’ (2 Pet. 1:16; 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:2) and ‘add’ (2 Pet. 1:5; 1 Pet. 4:11). There are also similarities in the statements about prophecy (2 Pet. 1:20–21; 1 Pet. 1:10–12), about Christian liberty (2 Pet. 2:19; 1 Pet. 2:16) and about the last things (2 Pet. 3:3, 10; 1 Pet. 1:5).

Comparison of this letter with Peter’s speeches in the Acts shows a similar use of language: ‘godliness’ (2 Pet. 1:6; Acts 3:12); ‘lawless’ (2 Pet. 2:8; Acts 2:23 [tr. ‘wicked’]); ‘received’ (2 Pet. 1:1; Acts 1:17 [tr. ‘shared’]). Identical phrases can be found in 2 Pet. 2:13, 15 (‘paid back with harm for the harm they have done’, ‘the wages of wickedness’) and Acts 1:18 (‘the reward he got for his wickedness’). Both 2 Pet. 3:10 and Acts 2:20 draw on OT imagery of the ‘day of the Lord’ (Joel 2:31). More recent research has shown that objections based on the language have nothing like the evidence to support them that was once supposed (for further details see E. M. B. Green, 2 Peter and Jude [IVP, rev. edn. 1987], pp. 16–19).

Secondly, Peter’s authorship of the letter is also held to be in doubt by some because the early church seemed hesitant to receive it into the NT canon. The fact remains that they finally did so, and this happened at a time when Gnostic writers were circulating definitely bogus writings claiming Peter’s authorship.

Thirdly, because 2 Peter contains most of Jude many have assumed that Jude must have been the earlier writing. Had Peter written first, then there would have been no need for Jude to write. But, they argue, such a leading apostle as Peter would not have used material from a writer who, if he was the Lord’s brother, did not believe until after the resurrection (see Mk. 6:3; Jn. 7:5). This argument is far from conclusive. Jude could well have made a digest of Peter’s letter to send to churches who had not received it, and there is no reason why Peter should not have used another source. Both he and Jude might have drawn on other material being put out to combat false teachers.

Fourthly, others argue that the teaching of 2 Peter bears the mark of a late date. In fact, the seeds of the false teaching attacked in this letter were present, as far as doctrine is concerned, in Colossae (Col. 2:18) and, as far as morals are concerned, at Corinth (1 Cor. 5; 6:12–20). On the other hand, the teaching in 2 Peter about Christ's return reflects (with 1 Peter) the hope of his coming held in the early days of the church. The godly are looking eagerly for it (3:12) and only the 'scoffers' are trying to dispose of it (3:4). This doctrine provides here the same motive for holy living as it does in the former letter (cf. 3:11–14 with 1 Pet. 1:7, 13, 17; 4:7, 13).

More recently, conservative scholars have drawn attention to the fact that the theory of pseudepigrapha raised a significant moral problem. False teachers in NT times had written under assumed names, and they had been denounced for doing so by Paul (2 Thes. 2:2; 3:17). Later generations in the church also condemned the practice. It is unbelievable that a sincere writer could have included the false personal references of 1:1, 16–18 and 3:1 in a letter which lays such stress on holiness and truth (1:3–4, 12; 3:11, 17). Such a deceit could not have been accepted in a church which called its members to such high standards in every respect.

When and where was the letter written?

According to 3:16 it seems that a number of Paul's letters had already been published by the time Peter came to write. Some conclude from 1:12–17 that the gospels were by this time also in wide circulation and 3:4 is sometimes taken to imply that the first generation of Christians had already died by the time the letter was written.

References to 2 Peter in other writings show that, at the latest, it must have been written early in the second century. The heresy attacked in ch. 2 was still at a primitive stage, and this would argue for setting the date in the latter part of the first century. If we are prepared to accept Peter's authorship, then a date shortly before the apostle's death (1:14), somewhere in the sixties, seems most likely.

The letter gives us no clues as to where it was written. If we accept that Peter wrote it, and that he wrote his first letter in Rome (see the Introduction to 1 Peter), then this letter could also have well been written there.

To whom was the letter written?

From 3:1 it could be concluded that the letter was written to the same groups of Christians as 1 Peter. Otherwise, 1:1 suggests it was written for a wider readership, which would have included those who received the first letter and to whom 3:1 would then refer.

Those addressed are obviously Christian churches beginning to be undermined by the Gnostic heresy, and we know that this spread early in Asia Minor (see Colossians). These churches would have contained both Jewish and Gentile believers (see the Introduction to 1 Peter). Arguments about the recipients based on odd phrases in the letter are as inconclusive here as in the earlier letter, e.g. if 1:1 suggests Gentile readers, 3:2 can be used to argue for Jewish ones.

Is the letter a unity?

Suggestions have recently been made that the letter originally consisted of chs. 1 and 3, with ch. 2 inserted later. Others argue that each chapter circulated separately at first, with ch. 1 being the earlier letter referred to in 3:1, ch. 3 the reminder promised in 1:13, and ch. 2, again, a later addition. Another approach has been to attempt to isolate sections of the letter which are thought to be genuinely by Peter, and claim that other material was added by a later editor.

There are two strong arguments against these theories: no MS evidence supports the idea of any part of the letter at any time circulating on its own and all three chapters display a marked unity of style.

Why was the letter written?

Three main thoughts dominate the letter. First, the writer has not long to live in this world, and has a pastoral concern that his Christian friends should keep on growing in their discipleship; secondly, false teaching is getting abroad which could prevent this growth, and so must be denounced; and thirdly, the return of the Lord Jesus is certain, and his people must be ready for that. Peter touched on the first and last of these themes in his earlier letter. The second seems to be a major reason for writing 2 Peter, but is best placed in the perspective of Christian growth and destiny.

Is 2 Peter like other NT writings?

It takes only a casual reading to discover that 2 Peter contains most of Jude 4–18. This fact has given rise to the following theories.

Some say that Jude was written first. This is because Peter adds so much to Jude. If 2 Peter had been written first, then Jude would have added only a few verses to what was already in circulation. Jude could, however, have shortened Peter's letter to meet the needs of churches to which it had not originally been sent. Others who support the priority of Jude suggest that Peter softened the harsh tones of Jude, tele-scoped his metaphors and cut out his references to the Apocrypha. These arguments could be turned in reverse to say that Jude felt he had to rewrite 2 Peter to make the language more harsh, develop an obscure metaphor, and back the arguments with apocryphal references.

Others say that 2 Peter was written first, and they cite the arguments above which can be turned either way. Some point out that a man of Peter's standing is unlikely to have quoted from an obscure person like Jude. It is also argued that dangers foreseen by Peter as in the future (2:1) have been present for some time in Jude (4). But Peter is not consistent in his use of tenses, and in 2:10b–19 he speaks of these dangerous teachers as having already begun their work.

Others suggest there was a common source behind both 2 Peter and Jude. This alternative has been offered because of the problems with both the above theories. While solving some of them, it still does not explain why Jude bothered to write if he was merely repeating so much of the original source. It is far more likely that he abridged 2 Peter to meet his own needs.

In all fairness it must be admitted that there is no final answer to this question of priority. 2 Peter also shows marked resemblances to other parts of the NT, and these are noted in the commentary below.

What does Peter say to his readers?

1 Peter was written to strengthen scattered groups of Christians being called on to face sporadic outbursts of suffering. 2 Peter was written to encourage Christians beset by two dangers: seducers (2:1) who were spreading false teaching, which would lead to immoral behaviour (2:2, 13–15; cf. Rev. 2:14–15, 20–24; Col. 2:8–3:17), and scoffers using the fact that Christ had not returned as an excuse for immorality (3:3).

Peter is firm to resist both groups by positive teaching. Just as the first letter emphasized the example of the Lord Jesus, this one underlines the facts of Jesus' life (1:16–18), the Christian faith as the way of truth (2:2) and the certainty of Jesus' return (3:10). In the light of this it is important for Christians to grow (1:5–8; 3:18) and to be preparing for his return (3:11–14). Evil desires are a snare (1:4; 2:10, 18; 3:5); by contrast the Christian is to be zealous for God's purposes (1:5, 10, 15; 3:14 all use variants of the root word for 'zeal'). We look for a new heaven and a new earth in which evil desires will be replaced by God's righteousness (3:13). In 3:1 Peter expresses his aim as being to stimulate wholesome thinking and he does this by summarizing the pattern of Christian growth in 1:5–8. His words in 1:10–11 give us the keynote of the letter. It is Christ-centred thinking, leading to God-directed living, which reassures us of our calling by God, and enables us to maintain an unbroken relationship with him. That spurs us towards the ultimate goal of the welcome into Christ's kingdom at his return.

These truths are just as important for the contemporary Christian, facing the pressures of a multi-faith society or the seductive teachings of the so-called New Age, as they were for those to whom Peter originally wrote.

See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

See Introduction to 1 Peter.

Outline of contents

1:1–2

The writer greets his readers

1:3–11

A call to spiritual growth

1:3–4

The means have been provided by God

1:5–9

The aim is to become fruitful disciples

1:10–11

The ultimate goal is full and final salvation

1:12–2:22

Reasons for emphasizing these things

1:12–15	Peter's personal appeal
1:16–18	The faith is founded on facts
1:19–21	These events confirm the words of the prophets
2:1–22	We must be on our guard against false prophets

3:1–16

A reminder of the coming of the Lord

3:1–2	A call to remember the promise
3:3–4	A warning to ignore scoffers
3:5–7	A reason not to ignore this word
3:8–9	Reasons why God is delaying
3:10–13	A reassertion of the fact and its consequences
3:14–16	A call to right behaviour, supported by an appeal to Paul's writings

3:17–18

A call to be steadfast and grow; Peter ascribes the glory to God

Commentary

1:1–2 The writer greets his readers

As in the previous letter, Peter begins by introducing himself and his credentials in the way followed by letter-writers of the day. He then states the identity of those to whom he is writing, and sends them his Christian greetings. This time he adds a reminder as to where true grace and peace are to be found—only in the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord.

1 Simon (Gk. Symeon) is a straight transliteration of the Hebrew name as used in Acts 15:14. Use of Simon and Peter together (as in e.g. Mt. 16:16) reminds us of the change grace had brought about in the apostle's life. He calls himself a servant and apostle (1 Peter uses the second title only, Jude uses the first) and this emphasizes his authority as one who is only a slave, yet fully commissioned by the Master for his work.

Received is a word meaning 'obtained by lot' and implies grace, and not merit, as the source of this gift. The faith referred to here is the God-given ability to respond to his grace by personal commitment and trust (cf. Eph. 2:8–9). As precious as ours translates a word used only here in the NT. Contemporary writers used it to mean 'of equal standing', referring to those who shared the rights and privileges of citizenship. In that case it could reflect Acts 10:34–35 and Peter's realization that Jews and Gentiles share in the purposes of God. It is unlikely that the letter was written to Gentiles only (see the Introduction to this article and to 1 Peter). This could be further humility on Peter's part, reminding us that, though an apostle, he is still a sinner in need of the righteousness ... of Jesus Christ, just as much as the newest converts among those to whom he is writing. However, the phrase through the righteousness may simply refer to the sheer fairness of God.

Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ appears to be a reference to Jesus alone, and so is important evidence for an early belief in the deity of Christ (cf. 1:11; 2:20; 3:18 and Tit. 2:13). Saviour as a title for Jesus appears mainly in the later writings of the NT, but was a regular emphasis in the early preaching of Peter (see Acts 4:12; 5:31). It is interesting that whereas in 1 Peter there are references to salvation (1:5, 9–10; 2:2) and being saved (3:20; 4:18), in this letter Peter concentrates on the Saviour.

2 Grace and peace be yours in abundance repeats 1 Pet. 1:2 (see the note there). Through the knowledge stresses here the means by which grace and peace can abound in the believer's life. In the early church there were false teachers who exalted knowledge as being superior to faith, so they were called Gnostics (from the Gk. gnōsis, 'knowledge'). In reply, orthodox writers stressed the importance for Christians to acquire epignōsis ('full knowledge'; the word used here) in order to combat this heresy. Such true knowledge is never mere speculation, as was the Gnostics'. It springs from a personal relationship with and experience of God in Jesus our Lord (see Jn. 17:3; Phil. 3:10).

1:3–11 A call to spiritual growth

Peter says the best answer to false teaching is for Christians to be making progress not only in their understanding of the faith but also in living it out. This is also important because God has provided believers with all the resources necessary to make such growth possible and such progress is a means of assuring Christians of their standing before God.

1:3–4 The means have been provided by God

Peter is so carried away with enthusiasm for his subject that the Greek is not at its most polished, but the sense is plain. Progress in the Christian life is made possible and practical by two factors: the power of God and the promises of God. God makes known his calling to the person who responds to Jesus Christ. In knowing him believers have freely at their disposal all the resources necessary to enable them to work out the process of sanctification—growing into the likeness of Jesus. These resources are assured to us by the very promises of God.

3 By his own glory and goodness refers to the divine character and high moral quality of the life and person of Jesus which drew Peter to follow him and formed the basis of preaching to those who had not seen Jesus in the flesh. Some translations read ‘to his own glory ...’ seeing this as the purpose for which we are called, but this is less likely. Peter may be thinking of the transfiguration when he speaks of the glory of Jesus, and of his own call (Lk. 5:1–11) when he mentions his goodness, but it is more likely that he has in mind the total impact of Jesus on anyone coming to faith (cf. Jn. 1:14). The same word is used in this sense in 1 Pet. 2:9 where it is translated ‘praises’.

4 Through these refers to Christ’s glory and goodness. Because of the quality of his or her life the believer can receive the promise of sharing the very nature of God. This teaching accords with Rom. 6, that by virtue of who Christ is, and through faith-union with him, the Christian enjoys the possibility of a life here and now free from sin and its defilement—a life constantly growing more like Jesus. Corruption is the steady process of dissolution to which all things mortal are subject. It came into the world as a direct result of the fall (Gn. 3), which in turn arose from humankind’s giving way to evil desires. The phrase may be understood in this way, or may refer to the inevitable consequences of sin in every generation. In either case, God’s way of escape lies in seizing hold of his promises (such as Jesus gave in Jn. 15:1–18 and Jn. 16, and Peter quoted in 1 Pet. 2:9) and thereby obtaining a share in his own nature. (Through them means as you apply them to life.) The thoughts behind this phrase can be traced in verses such as Jn. 1:12 and 1 Jn. 3:2–3.

Notes. 3 His would appear from v 2 to refer to Jesus. Granted (translated in the next verse as given) is an unusual word (used only here and in Mk. 15:45), emphasizing the freeness of the gift. Life is the abundance of eternal life which Jesus gives (Jn. 10:10). Godliness is the Christ-like character such life should produce.

1:5–9 The aim is to become fruitful disciples

Because Christians have these resources (the power and the promises) Peter urges the importance (make every effort) of the goal (growth to be like Jesus) and spells out the steps towards it:

love
brotherly kindness godliness perseverance self-control knowledge goodness
faith

Faith must express itself in action (goodness) and this experience deepens our knowledge of God. Knowing him will deepen our knowledge of ourselves and where we need to exercise self-control. This in turn calls for perseverance, which is developed by keeping in view the worthwhile goal of v 4—godliness. This attitude to God facilitates a new openness to our fellow-

Christians (brotherly kindness), and this in turn blossoms into unreserved and unrestricted love—the coping-stone of the whole edifice (cf. Col. 3:14). Christians thus face two staggering possibilities. On the one hand, we can work to develop these qualities in increasing measure in our lives, and thus find a deepening experience of the Lord leading to a fruitful Christian life. On the other, we can ignore this provision, but this response is short-sighted, even blind, as it overlooks the wonder of the fact of our salvation.

Notes. 5 Add has the idea of lavish provision, and is a verb used in classical times to describe rich citizens financing a theatrical performance or equipping a warship for the state they were proud to belong to. Sharing the life of God should lead to producing and being the finest and most attractive character for him. Goodness may point to the process of assimilation hinted at in v 3. The connection between practical Christian living and developing knowledge is referred to again in v 8 (see Jn. 7:17; Col. 1:10). 6 Perseverance is the ability to hold fast to one's goal in spite of opposition or even persecution (cf. the use of the same root in Heb. 12:1–3, where it is translated 'perseverance' and 'endured'). 7 Brotherly kindness is emphasized as a fruit of the new birth in 1 Pet. 1:22; 3:8 and is what Jesus required (Jn. 13:34–35). 9 Short-sighted and blind seems a strangely mixed metaphor. Peter may mean that such people are short-sighted because they cannot look back far enough to remember the sins from which they were delivered. They are also being blind to the glorious possibilities of spiritual development that exist in Christ.

1:10–11 The ultimate goal is full and final salvation

This leads Peter to urge his fellow-Christians to demonstrate the reality of their own standing with God (by following the first path outlined above). In this way they will be kept from failure in this life and be welcomed enthusiastically into the Lord's eternal kingdom (see Mt. 25:21–23). Peter is not here teaching that our salvation is to be earned by good works, nor that we can forfeit our relationship to Christ once we have genuinely responded to his call. Rather, he is reminding us that the development of a genuinely Christlike character is the only proof (to ourselves as well as to others) of our Christian status even though at times we sadly fail. This is consistent with the teaching of Jesus (Mt. 7:16–21), James (Jas. 3:2), John (1 Jn. 1:7–10; 3:10) and Paul (Gal. 5:16–25).

Notes. 10 Eager is the same root as make every effort in v 5 and may be a deliberate reference back. Make your calling and election sure is the tension which runs right through the first letter (see 1 Pet. 1:2, 17; cf. Phil. 2:12–13). Here too Peter stresses that we who have received a faith as precious (1:1) have yet to avoid being ineffective and unproductive in Christ's service. Further, he hints that one can even fall from grace (Jude 24 uses the verb in the same sense). It does not here refer to sinning (as in Jas. 3:2) so there is no teaching of sinless perfection here. 11 Instead of this gloomy prospect, the Christian should look forward to a welcome into Christ's eternal kingdom. The last phrase must refer to its full inauguration when Jesus returns. Receive a rich welcome translates the verb used for 'add' in v 5 above (see the note there). God's lavish reward is a spur to lavish living for him.

1:12–2:22 Reasons for emphasizing these things

Peter explains in detail why he finds it necessary to write in this vein. Believers need constant reminders of the importance of spiritual progress. Peter knows he has not long to live and, as an eyewitness, wishes to stress that the faith we share is founded on the facts of history. Furthermore, these events of Jesus' life are a fulfilment of what the prophets foretold. Mention of them leads to a long warning about the false prophets who will arise in the church just as they did among the OT people of God. The danger of their teaching and the error of their ways are then fully exposed.

1:12–15 Peter’s personal appeal

Peter was conscious of his lifelong commission to urge his friends to grow spiritually. By writing now he is ensuring that they will have a further reminder after his death. Although Christian people know the truth, it is the constant task of the preacher and teacher to be setting it before them.

Notes. 12 Established is the same verb as in 1 Pet. 5:10 (‘make ... strong’). 13 Tent of this body indicates the temporary nature of our time on earth (cf. 2 Cor. 5:1–8). 14 The word translated put it aside portrays taking off clothes, and again reflects 2 Cor. 5:1–8. Made clear to me may refer to Jn. 21:18–19, or to a more recent revelation. 15 Departure is the Greek exodos, used in Lk. 9:31 of Jesus’ impending death. Its use here shows that Peter may have had the transfiguration experience in mind. Death is the departure from this mode of existence, leading believers to the welcome (11) into Christ’s eternal kingdom. Always be able to remember may refer to this letter, or to Peter’s desire to supply Mark with the information on which he based his gospel.

1:16–18 The faith is founded on facts

Peter’s confidence about his own future, and his reason for encouraging his readers’ spiritual growth, rests on personal experience of the power and presence of the Lord Jesus, and not on tales dreamed up by human wisdom. Jesus was revealed in time and space, and Peter can testify to having heard the Father’s voice affirming Jesus at the transfiguration.

Notes. 16 Cleverly invented stories (Gk. ‘myths’) were a feature of the theological systems of false teachers (see 1 Tim. 4:7; 2 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:14). Power and coming are both words which could refer to Jesus’ life on earth. Because ‘coming’ is used in the NT to denote the second coming of Jesus (cf. 3:12; Mt. 24:3, 27; 1 Thes. 3:13) some suggest the whole phrase must point to his ‘coming in power’ (cf. Mk. 13:26; 14:62). But power could refer to the transfiguration and coming to his return (Mk. 9:1–13 has a similar connection of thought). Certainly, the transfiguration anticipates the unveiling of the full glory of the divine Christ at his return. Similar claims to be an ‘eyewitness’ are made in 1 Pet. 5:1; Lk. 1:2; Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1–3. Majesty is used in the NT only to describe divine glory (Lk. 9:43; Acts 19:27). 17 The voice from heaven, speaking both at Jesus’ baptism and transfiguration (Mk. 1:11; 9:7) combines the prophecies of Ps. 2:7 (the coronation of the Son of God) and Is. 42:1 (the ordination of the Suffering Servant). Peter omits the final clause, summoning all to listen to Jesus Christ. The mountain was sacred because it was the scene of a divine revelation (as in Ex. 3:5; 19:23). The wording need not suggest a tradition that developed at a later date.

1:19–21 These events confirm the words of the prophets

The events to which Peter has been referring were seen by the apostles as a remarkable fulfilment of the OT (e.g. Mt. 1:22; 2:5–6). Jesus himself had pointed this out to them (Lk. 22:37; 24:26–27, 44; Jn. 5:39) and Peter had emphasized it in his preaching (e.g. Acts 2:25–36; 3:22–24). Since so much prophecy has been fulfilled in the first coming of Jesus, Christians must pay all the more heed to what remains to be fulfilled at his second coming. This is especially so, as these prophecies were not the result of human speculative thinking (as the myths of v 16 were) but of God's revelation by his Spirit.

19 Interpretations of more certain vary. Some think that the argument is that the word of prophecy is more certain than the voice from heaven. Others take it as above, that the fulfilment of prophecies of the first coming make it easier to believe those yet to be fulfilled at the second coming. Light is a well-known picture of Scripture (Ps. 119:105, 130) and this world as a dark place without the true light present (Jn. 8:12). The day refers to the day of Christ's return (3:10; Rom. 13:12). Morning star (Gk. phōsphoros) is the star that brings the dawn as was used in antiquity to refer to the planet Venus. Its use here picks up the star symbolism used of Jesus (Nu. 24:17; Lk. 1:78; Rev. 22:16; cf. Mal. 4:2). In your hearts is a difficult phrase in view of the fact that Christ's coming will be objective and visible. The point is that Christ's return will bring light and joy to the hearts of his own. It is possible, but less likely, that this phrase goes with what follows: above all, you must understand ('in your hearts ...').

20–21 These two verses are of great importance for our understanding of how Scripture came to us. While God used men, with all their different backgrounds, interests and temperaments (see e.g. Je. 1:6–7; Am. 7:14–15; Lk. 1:1–4) to convey his word, at the same time he guided them in speaking and writing it to us (see, e.g. Je. 1:7; Am. 7:14–16; Mk. 12:36).

Above all, you must understand is picked up again in 3:3. Prophecy of Scripture is distinct from the false prophecies to be alluded to in 2:1. Interpretation is a noun not used elsewhere in the NT although the verb is used in Mk. 4:34 of the explanation of parables. The statement is sometimes taken to assert that prophecy can be understood by the individual only as he is guided by the Spirit (some would say Spirit-filled church) who guided the writers. This requires an unnatural meaning for the verb came about and it seems better to understand that the reference is to the origin rather than the understanding of Scripture. This is supported by the NIV: no prophecy of Scripture arises from the prophet's own interpretation of events past, present or future. Carried along like a ship borne by the wind is a graphic picture of the Spirit at work.

2:1–22 We must be on our guard against false prophets

Having stressed the importance of looking forward to the fulfilment of Spirit-given prophecy Peter gives a warning about the false prophecies that will be put forward. This was also a feature of Jesus' teaching (e.g. Mk. 13:22–23). This chapter should be compared carefully with Jude 4–18.

2:1–3 Their danger. False prophets are dangerous on three counts: their method is underhand, and leads to shameful ways, bringing the faith into disrepute, their teaching is a complete denial of the truth and their destiny is to bring destruction both on themselves and their followers.

1 The people seems, in context, to refer to the OT people of God. The activities of false prophets are mentioned in Dt. 13:1–5; 1 Ki. 13:18; 22:5–23; Je. 5:13, 31; 6:13. The falsity of the teachers may refer to the content of their teaching, or to their claim to be teachers. Probably both are implied. Secretly is an undertone of the verb, which suggests underhand dealing. Heresies translates the Greek haireseis, which means simply 'chosen beliefs'. In Christian usage it came to refer to a wrong belief deliberately chosen (rather than a right one revealed by God). Destructive is a Hebrew phrase highlighting the consequences both for the holder of such views and for any orthodox beliefs they might have. Sovereign Lord is applied to Christ only here and in Jude 4, but is used of God in Lk. 2:29; Acts 4:24 and Rev. 6:10. Bought refers to the ransom aspect of the work of Christ (cf. Mk. 10:45 and 1 Pet. 1:18).

2 Shameful ways reflects the Greek plural (see 1 Pet. 4:3 and the note there). These false teachers claimed that knowledge was superior to practice, so they argued that it did not matter how Christians behaved, as grace could forgive every sin, no matter how great. The NT writers unanimously denounce this view. The way was an early name for the Christian faith (Acts 9:2). In 1 Pet. 3:16 and 4:3–5 Peter faced the fact that orthodox Christians will be reproached for their good behaviour. Now he sorrows that the immorality of pseudo-Christian sects will bring the true faith into disrepute. 3 Exploit has commercial connotations. False (Gk. plastoi, hence plastic, fabricated) means made up to suit the ears of the hearer (1 Thes. 2:5). Not ... sleeping is a vivid metaphor (cf. the NEB ‘waits for them with unsleeping eyes’). Retribution for anyone leading another astray may not be swift, but it will be meted out.

2:4–10a Their condemnation. Peter develops the theme of v 3 more fully, drawing on early incidents in the history of God’s people to show how his purposes both of salvation and of condemnation are sure and will be completed. Noah and Lot are cited as examples of how God can deliver his own when their ungodly contemporaries are destroyed. The fate of the fallen angels points to the fact of a final judgment when human rebellion, culminating in the unbridled indulgence of self and rejection of God’s authority, will be duly punished. Together the three examples show God’s punishment of pride, disobedience and immorality.

Notes. 4 See Gn. 6:1–4 and Jude 6, where the writer draws attention to pride as the cause of the angels’ downfall. Hell (see the NIV mg.) in Greek mythology refers to Tartarus, the lowest and most terrible part of hell, reserved especially for those superhuman beings who rebelled against the supreme god. The MS readings of gloomy dungeons vary between a word meaning a ‘pit’ or ‘cave’, and another word (siros instead of seiros in Greek) meaning ‘rope’ or ‘chain’ (see the NIV mg.). The latter is in line with Jude 6. The imagery is drawn from apocryphal writings. 5 On Noah see Gn. 6:8–9:28 and 1 Pet. 3:20 where there is also mention of the eight being saved. A preacher (Gk. kēryx, ‘a herald’; see the note on 1 Pet. 3:19) suggests that Noah was commissioned to call his contemporaries to repentance. Another apocryphal work (the book of Jubilees) describes Noah’s preaching. 6 Jesus alludes to the example of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 18:16–19:28) in Mt. 10:15; 11:23–24; Lk. 17:29. 7 To be lawless is the consequence of having no fear of God and therefore feeling completely free to live without principles, indulging our sinful desires. 8 He was tormented (NEB ‘tortured’): originally meant to be tested for genuineness. Godly people living in an ungodly world must be prepared to prove the reality of their faith. 9 If this is so—the natural conclusion is that the Lord knows how to hold the unrighteous (which will include the false teachers of vs 1–3) for the day of judgment. Before making this point Peter picks out from these examples the positive aspect of God’s mercy, and his ability to deliver his own. This emphasis is absent from Jude. On rescue ... from trials see 1 Pet. 1:6–7; 5:10) 10 The corrupt desire of the sinful nature [flesh] is lit. ‘those who go after flesh with a desire for pollution’. A similar phrase in Jude 7 links this with the condemnation of sodomy. Authority is Greek kyriotēs (‘lordship’) and is most naturally taken as a reference to the Lordship of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 3:15). Alternatively, if it refers to the authority of the celestial beings mentioned later in v 10, then it may be the authority of an order of angels to which Jude 8; Eph. 1:21 and Col. 1:16 might also refer.

2:10b–22 Their character. The apostle now emphasizes the dangerous influence of these people by describing their true nature more fully. They are insolent (10–12), licentious (13), immoral (14) and greedy (14b–16). He then condemns them on three counts: what they offer may sound attractive, but it lacks any substance (17); their approach uses the lever of sensual pleasure to attract new Christians back to the ways of the world (18) and it is totally deceptive, because the ‘freedom’ it offers leads only to the bondage of sin (19). In this passage the language is complicated and unusual as the writer piles word upon word to heighten the enormity of their behaviour. In the contemporary world this kind of teaching is becoming familiar today under the umbrella title ‘New Age’.

Notes. 10b Bold (lit. ‘daring’) is the spirit that has no concern for the consequences for oneself or others. Arrogant (lit. ‘self-pleasing’) describes the attitude of being so obsessed with one’s own wishes that nothing else can be taken into consideration. Celestial beings may refer to angels (see the note above on v 10a), in which case the false prophets may be slandering them in the way in which the men of Sodom slandered the angels who came to the house of Lot (Gn. 19:1–26). Alternatively, it could be that they used the behaviour of the fallen angels in Gn. 6:1–4 as a justification for their own immorality, and slandered the unfallen angels by holding that such behaviour was typical of all angels. The translation ‘dignities’ in the AV and RV shows that the word could be used of church leaders. 11 Angels, by contrast, have the right to complain to God of the behaviour of these arrogant mortals, but refuse to do so. This may be a reference to the kind of incident described in Jude 9. 12 As such behaviour is irrational (the literal meaning of brute), like that of beasts, then the destiny of these men will resemble that of beasts, to be caught and destroyed (see Jude 10). Peter stresses the ignorance of those who criticize the Christian way of life. Will perish (lit. ‘will be destroyed in their destruction’) could be translated in this way, or it could describe the final consequences of the corruption they have allowed into their own lives (cf. J. B. Phillips, ‘will most certainly be destroyed in their own corruption’). 13 They will be paid back is a play on words. Green suggests the right metaphor with, ‘being defrauded of the wages of fraud’. Sin attracts with its offer of pleasure, but in the end those who indulge in it find no pleasure at all. Carousing in broad daylight is a feature of extreme dissipation. For the Christian the day is the time for work (cf. Jn. 9:4; Rom. 13:13; 1 Thes. 5:7–8). Blots i.e. ‘spots’ are something disfiguring and painful. This word and blemishes occur in the NT with a negative prefix to describe the character of Christ and what his church should be (see e.g. Eph. 5:27). Pleasures (Gk. apatais) is a word implying pleasures that deceive people into sin. Some MSS read agapais (love feasts; see the NIV mg.), which is used in Jude 12. 1 Cor. 11 tells us that the love feast had early become a subject of abuse.

14 Eyes full of adultery is a compressed phrase for ‘always looking for a woman with whom to commit adultery’. Phillips has ‘their eyes cannot look at a woman without lust’. Because they are not content with sinning themselves they must also seduce others i.e. lead them astray (cf. Rom. 1:32). Accursed brood (lit. ‘children of curse’) is a Hebrew phrase (cf. 1 Pet. 1:14). They have rejected Christ, who alone can redeem them from the curse. 15–16 Balaam is the classic example of the false teacher who leads people astray for personal gain. Nu. 22–24 shows how Balaam tried time and again to prophesy against Israel for Balak’s reward. In the end, after failing to destroy Israel verbally, he is shown as doing so morally (Nu. 31:16; cf. 25:1–9; Rev. 2:14). Balaam is the prototype of the false teacher who seeks rewards or popularity by persuading people that God’s standards can be lowered. Peter here expands one example cited in Jude 11. Balaam’s behaviour is called madness, because it is contrary to all good sense.

17 Springs without water do not give the satisfaction they appear to offer. Mists may refer to the false teachers’ instability: their teaching shifts with every gust of wind (cf. Eph. 4:14). The phrase could also suggest their failure to give the ‘refreshing rain’ they promise, or something which does no good, but only obscures the light. Blackest darkness is a word used from classical times to denote the darkness of the regions of hell (see v 4). 18 Boastful conveys the idea of something larger than it has any right to be. Entice is translated seduce in v 14 (see comments there). False teachers frequently make for the newly converted, those who are just escaping and who are not yet rooted in the faith. 19 These teachers offer freedom from the obligation to serve Christ and grow in him (cf. 1:3–11). In doing so they overlook the fact that this kind of licence is only the old bondage of sin all over again (cf. Rom. 6 and Jn. 8:31–36). 20 They could refer either to the teachers or their victims, possibly both. See the note on knowledge in 1:2. Worse off may refer to Jesus' words in Mt. 12:45 and Lk. 11:26, though others see a link with Lk. 12:47–48. 21 It would have been better ... because if they have rejected God's way in Christ there is no other way of salvation (cf. Heb. 6:4–8; 10:26–31). Way: see on v 2. Of righteousness stresses the moral consequences of following Christ. 22 The first proverb is found in Pr. 26:11, and the second appears to come from a source outside the Bible, the ancient History of Ahikar. Peter may also have in mind Mt. 7:6.

3:1–16 A reminder of the coming of the Lord

Peter began his letter by encouraging his readers to grow in godliness. At 2:1 he digressed because he was so concerned about the damage false teachers can do in preventing such growth. Now he returns to the theme of godly living, putting forward the second coming of Jesus as a further motive for it. Before doing so he stresses the certainty of that coming, and the reasons why God has delayed it.

3:1–2 A call to remember the promise

Peter points out the unity of this letter with the former one, and the consistency of his teaching with that of the prophets and apostles. Throughout, his aim is for his readers to cultivate a Christian mind (wholesome thinking). His heart warms as he turns from the false teachers to feed the flock of God, his Dear friends.

Notes. 1 My second letter could refer to 1 Peter or 2 Peter 1 and 2 (if written separately, see the Introduction to 1 Peter) or an earlier letter, now lost. In general terms, these verses could describe 1 Peter. Stimulate is the same word, translated refresh, as in 1:13. Wholesome thinking contrasts with the ideas described in ch. 2. The phrase has a moral sense ('pure') as well as meaning 'uncontaminated by prejudice'. 2 Peter also emphasizes the unity of the OT with apostolic writings in 1:19–21 and 1 Pet. 1:10–12. Command appears to refer to Jesus' teaching as a whole set out by the apostles (Jn. 14:26). Our Lord and Saviour is the final authority behind both prophets and apostles (cf. Eph. 2:20). Your apostles is taken by some as a reference to 'those who brought you the message'. It is more likely to emphasize their reliability than their function—'those you trust, who have taught you the orthodox faith' as opposed to the false teachers (cf. Jude 17).

3:3–4 A warning to ignore scoffers

Peter knows how quickly despondency can spread in a fellowship, so he warns his readers not to be put off by those who wrongly argue that God's seeming inactivity means that he is not going to act. Jude 18 attributes this warning to the apostles themselves.

Notes. 3 First of all, you must understand is the same phrase as 'above all ...' in 1:20. Scoffers, together with the reference to their evil desires, suggests that the false teachers of ch. 2 are still in mind. Those who give way to their own lusts always mock at any incentive to noble living. Our fathers could apply to early Christian leaders such as Stephen, James the son of Zebedee etc. or to the older members of the first generation of Christians who died between AD 30 and 60. Paul wrote about the same problem in 1 Thes. 4:13–18, so this is no argument for a late date of writing. The reference to the flood in vs 5–7 makes it more likely that the OT patriarchs are in mind.

3:5–7 A reason not to ignore this word

In actual fact, the scoffers' argument in v 4 is false. They have conveniently forgotten that God did intervene in judgment at the time of the flood. This proves that the stability of nature is no argument, that God will not interrupt its steady rhythm, and that he can again carry out his own promises in his own time.

Notes. 5 By God's word (cf. Gn. 1:3; Ps. 33:6; Jn. 1:3; Heb. 11:3). Water was one of the original created elements out of which God formed the earth (Gn. 1:2). It is one of the means by which he sustains it still. 6 By these waters obviously refers to the flood (Gn. 6–9). 7 The present heavens and earth contrast with the new heavens and earth of the future (Rev. 21:1). On kept see on 2:9.

3:8–9 Reasons why God is delaying

Since God's promise of another intervention in human affairs cannot be rejected, Peter gives two factors which explain why he is delaying such intervention as long as he likes: time is of no consequence to him and he is giving time for people to come to repentance.

Notes. 8 Do not forget contrasts with the wilful forgetfulness of the false teachers in vs 5–6. With the Lord quotes Ps. 90:4, pointing to the fact that God is outside time, and so is in no hurry to work (cf. Hab. 2:3). Quoted by some as an argument from universalism, this verse in fact teaches the opposite. It shows that after the second coming, ushering in God's judgment, there will be no further opportunity for repentance.

3:10–13 A reassertion of the fact and its consequences

The argument concerning the certainty of Christ's coming is rounded off with a further reminder of the fact and its suddenness. Peter then comments on the consequences this will have for the physical world as we know it and the consequences knowledge of this should produce in the life of the believer. Since the new heavens and new earth will be the home of righteousness, we ought to be 'making ourselves at home' here and now.

Notes. 10 Like a thief picks up Jesus' teaching in Mt. 24:42–43. The heavens will disappear is also mentioned by Jesus (Mk. 13:31). Elements could equally apply to the substances of which the world is composed, or to the other heavenly bodies. Everything, lit. 'the works', could refer to buildings and other material achievements, or to deeds in the moral sense; it depends on which of the readings of the verb is taken. Laid bare (lit. 'found out') is the most likely reading of the text, other possibilities being 'burned up' (see the NIV mg.) and 'disappear'. Then everything would be the deeds of humankind. 11 Jesus (e.g. Lk. 12:35–40), Paul (Rom. 13:11–14; 1 Thes. 5:3–11) and Peter (1 Pet. 1:13; 4:7–11) all use the last judgment as an incentive to godly living. 12 Speed its coming is preferable to 'as you wait eagerly' (NIV mg.) stressing the importance of human activity in evangelism, etc. (cf. Acts 3:19–21; 17:30–31) during the period of divine forbearance. 13 Examples of his promise are Is. 65:17–25 and 66:22–23.

3:14–16 A call to right behaviour, supported by an appeal to Paul’s writings

This leads to a renewed call to holiness, in expectation of the Lord’s return and in gratitude for his forbearance. These are themes about which Paul also wrote, and mention of him leads to a warning that certain people (it could be the false teachers of ch. 2) are ready to misunderstand his words.

Notes. 14 Make every effort picks up the advice of 1:10. To be found may refer to the being laid bare of v 10. Spotless and blameless contrasts with the teachers of 2:13 (see also Jude 24). Peace is the content of a heart right with God. 15 We should bear in mind God’s patience because he is giving time for unbelievers to be saved and for believers to be working out their salvation (cf. Phil. 2:12–13). Just as ... of these matters probably refers to general teaching about the second coming. It may, however, emphasize the last point about God’s delay being due to his forbearance and not negligence. Wisdom that God gave him is a good reminder of the supernatural origin of Paul’s letters (cf. 1 Cor. 2:13; 3:10). 16 All his letters need not suggest that the collection of Paul’s letters was already complete, but that by now Christian communities were beginning to gather them. Hard to understand could mean ‘ambiguous’, ‘obscure’ (NEB), or capable of misinterpretation. Paul had suffered misrepresentation at the hands of those who taught that Christians do not need to keep the law (Rom. 3:8). Since ignorant and unstable people behave in this way, it is all the more important for the Christian to grow in knowledge and in building a firm foundation for the Christian life (cf. 1:3–11). The phrase the other Scriptures can be used to argue that Paul’s writings were either included in, or excluded from, Scripture. Peter’s teaching (1 Pet. 1:10–12; 2 Pet. 1:19–21; 3:2) shows that Paul’s letters possessed the qualifications for acceptance as Scripture (the apostolic authority of the writer and the guidance of the Spirit as he wrote—see 1 Cor. 2:13; 4:17; 2 Cor. 13:3–10; 1 Thes. 2:13).

3:17–18 A call to be steadfast and grow; Peter ascribes the glory to God

Peter now draws the letter to a conclusion by reverting to the great theme on which he began (1:3–11). He appeals to his readers, negatively, to guard against the lawless people who will try to carry them away with them into error, and positively, to go on making spiritual progress. Christ alone has done everything to make this possible, so to him we give all the glory now, as we shall throughout eternity once he returns. So be it!

Notes. 17 You already know this could mean that this advice was given before the advent of the false teachers (cf. the future tense of 2:1), or more likely refers to the fact that Peter is alerting his readers before this teaching has actually reached them. The rejection of a moral code for Christians was certainly a live issue when Romans and 1 Corinthians were written. Secure position is from the same root as Peter uses in 1 Pet. 5:10 (cf. Lk. 22:32). 18 Grace and knowledge are both divinely bestowed gifts which enable growth along the moral and mental planes. This letter has shown that the Christian should be making parallel progress in both. Jesus Christ can help his followers to make this progress, since he is both Lord and Saviour. To him refers to Christ and is an unmistakable assertion of his deity. For ever is lit. ‘to the day of the age’ when Christ will come to usher in eternity. Amen is possibly a later addition to the text. ‘So be it’ is certainly the response of a believing heart after reading through this letter.

1 JOHN

Introduction

This writing is usually called an ‘epistle’ or letter, but it has neither address nor signature. Indeed, it lacks so many characteristics of a letter that some scholars take ‘epistle’ as no more than a courtesy title; they see it as a written sermon rather than a letter. Against this, however, now and then there appear passages which justify us in seeing it as a real letter (e.g. 2:1, 26), although a letter with some unusual features. Perhaps the explanation is that it was originally meant for more than one community.

Authorship

The traditional view is that the author was John the apostle and the marked tone of authority throughout the letter agrees with this. No other author was suggested in antiquity and perhaps only an apostolic figure could have sent out such a letter without putting his name to it. The writer was evidently an eyewitness of at least some of the things Jesus did (1:1–3; the views that ‘we’ means ‘all Christians’, or that it is simply a literary device seem untenable). The style and thought-forms resemble those of the fourth gospel, and all agree that there must be some connection. It has usually been thought that the one author wrote both, in which case everything hinges on the authorship of that gospel. Some critics, however, hold that the author of one of these writings was a disciple of the author of the other; it is not uncommon for people to think of a ‘school’ of Christians of a Johannine type, one of whom wrote this letter. Such critics hold that there are differences of style (e.g. fewer compound words in the letter) and of theology (e.g. a different view of the significance of the death of Jesus). While such differences should not be minimized, they do not seem great enough to demand diversity of authorship. They may be accounted for by the different purposes of the two writings and their different forms. ‘The similarity between Gospel and letter is considerably greater than that between the third Gospel and the Acts, which are known to have come from the same pen’ (J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John, TNTC [IVP 1988], p. 28). Raymond E. Brown, who thinks it probable that there were different authors, agrees that the evidence is such that the gospel and the letters may have been written at different times by the same man (The Epistles of John [Doubleday, 1982], pp. 14–30). No conclusive argument for different authors seems to have been produced.

Some critics see ‘John the elder’ (cf. 2 Jn. 1; 3 Jn. 1) as the author of the gospel or of the letter (or 2 and 3 John, or Revelation), some of both. This rather shadowy figure, however, is not a likely candidate. It cannot be demonstrated that a John the elder, as distinct from John the apostle, ever existed. And if he did, the reasons for connecting him with this writing are not convincing, not nearly as convincing as the ancient tradition which ascribes it to the apostle.

While, then, the letter makes no claim about its authorship, and while the case cannot be proved beyond doubt, the most reasonable hypothesis is that it came from the pen of the apostle John.

Occasion

It is clear from the letter that its readers were being confronted with a form of false teaching which denied the incarnation. This error was evidently held by people who had been in the church but who had now seceded, for John speaks of them as ‘going out’ (2:19; 4:1). In the second century there appeared systems of thought now called Gnosticism, systems which took over both Christian and pagan ideas. They emphasized knowledge (Gk. gnōsis), and taught a way of salvation known only to the initiates. This included release from the material prison of the body, and an upward rise to God. There is dispute about how early Gnosticism appeared. It is very probable that it was much later than the time when this letter was written, but it did not spring out of empty air. Many of the teachings later included in the fully developed Gnostic systems were in circulation in the first century.

John was opposing some such system, a system that included the idea that matter is inherently evil. God, being good, can have nothing to do with evil matter it was claimed. Therefore, he could not have been incarnate in Jesus Christ. Some held that Christ only seemed to live in the flesh (they were called ‘Docetists’ from the Gk. dokein, ‘to seem’). But it is probably too much to affirm that John is confronting Docetists, for there is nothing in this letter about a phantom body or the like. What he opposed seems to have been an early stage of the heresy that was to develop into Docetism. People were denying the incarnation and John took this as very serious. Its effect was to take the heart out of Christianity, for if Christ did not really become a man and did not really die for us, then no atonement has been made for our sins. So John emphasized the reality of the incarnation. He also stressed the importance of upright living, and it appears that in their emphasis on knowledge some of the heretics held that conduct did not matter much. John made it clear that conduct is very important.

It would be wrong, however, to think that this letter is no more than a refutation of heresy. There is a very positive aim, as John tells us himself. He writes ‘so that you also may have fellowship with us ... to make our joy complete’ (1:3–4). He makes this more specific when he says, ‘I write these things to you who believe in the name of the Son of God so that you may know that you have eternal life’ (5:13). We may contrast this with the aim of the gospel: ‘these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name’ (Jn. 20:31). Whereas the gospel has an evangelistic aim, the letter is thus directed rather at bringing believers assurance and a true knowledge of what the faith implies. ‘The Gospel contains “signs” to evoke faith (20:30–31), and the letter tests by which to judge it’ (J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John, TNTC [IVP, 1988], p. 26). John wrote to take away his readers’ anxieties as they came to realize what it meant to be a Christian. ‘In the first Epistle, John sets forth three marks of a true knowledge of God and of fellowship with God ... These marks are, first, righteousness of life, second, brotherly love, and third, faith in Jesus as God incarnate’ (Search the Scriptures, 1967, p. 289). These three themes recur constantly.

The letter is dominated by two great thoughts: God is light (1:5), and God is love (4:8, 16). God is the source of light to the minds and of warmth to the hearts of his children. These children should accordingly live up to the highest standard; there is constant emphasis on this (e.g. 2:1–6; 3:3, 6, 9; 5:1–3). But the letter contains no harsh admonition. Rather, the writer addressed his readers with fatherly care and tender concern: ‘little children’; ‘beloved’; ‘little children, let no one deceive you’; ‘little children, keep yourselves from idols’.

Date

There is very little by which to date the writing. The relation to the gospel is not definitive, for scholars differ as to whether it was written before or after the gospel. In any case the date of the gospel is uncertain. Many date 1 John towards the end of the first century, but J. A. T. Robinson argues for AD 60–65 (Redating the New Testament [SCM, 1976]). This may be right, but we cannot be sure.

See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

- D. Jackman, The Message of John's Letters, BST (IVP, 1988).
M. M. Thompson, 1–3 John, IVPNTC (IVP, 1992).
J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1988).
I. H. Marshall, The Epistles of John, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1978).
R. Law, The Tests of Life (Baker Book House, 1968).
S. S. Smalley, 1, 2, 3 John, WBC (Word, 1984).

Outline of contents

1:1–4	Prologue
1:5–2:6	Fellowship with God
2:7–17	The new commandment
2:18–27	The Christian and the antichrist
2:28–3:10	Children of God

3:11–18	Love one another
3:19–24	Confidence
4:1–6	The spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood
4:7–21	God is love
5:1–5	Faith’s victory
5:6–12	The witness to the Son
5:13–21	The knowledge of eternal life

Commentary

1:1–4 Prologue

These verses, one highly compressed and complicated sentence in the Greek, form a prologue to the whole. John outlines some of the ideas he will develop as the letter unfolds.

1 The opening Greek word, translated that which, is neuter. It thus appears to refer to the gospel message rather than to a person. But John goes on to speak of hearing, seeing and even touching, which makes it necessary for us to think of Jesus. This is the case also with the Word of life, for while this term might well mean the gospel message, we must bear in mind that Jesus is called both ‘the Word’ and ‘the life’ (Jn. 1:1; 14:6), it is said that ‘in him was life, and that life was the light of men' (Jn. 1:4). This unusual opening, then, reminds us both of the gospel and of him on whom the gospel centres.

From the beginning shows that the gospel is no afterthought. It was always in God's plan. John moves on to the factuality of it all, which is his main point. The gospel is concerned not with some mythical figure like the shadowy forms in the Greek mysteries, but with a genuine historical person. He had been heard and seen and touched (cf. Lk. 24:39; Jn. 20:20, 24–27). There is a steadily increasing emphasis on the reality of Jesus. John is referring not to visions, but to physical existence. So he refers to that which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked at and our hands have touched. We is used frequently in this letter (it appears in 51 of 105 verses according to Brown, Epistles of John p. 158). The change of subject from we to our hands may be no more than stylistic, but there may be an emphasis on the physical contact; it was what our hands did.

2 John has the habit of emphasizing an idea by the simplest of devices, repetition. Here he begins a little aside by taking up life, the last word of v 1, and repeating it three times in three lines. It is life that he is writing about, but not life in general terms. It is the life that appeared that is his interest; he is clearly referring to the coming of Jesus who could describe himself as 'the life' (Jn. 14:6). And not only did the life appear; the writer can say we have seen it. He has already spoken of seeing it (and will do so again in v 3; he loves to hammer in an idea). Further, he and those with him who saw it testify to it, and they proclaim it. He has already spoken of it as 'from the beginning'. Now he puts the same thought another way when he speaks of the eternal life. And he carries on with his repetitions when he says that the life appeared. In the gospel Jesus is called 'the life' (Jn. 14:6) and similarly here it is Jesus to whom witness is borne and who is proclaimed. This might be our conclusion also from the expression with the Father, where the construction is the same as that used of 'the Word' in Jn. 1:1. Father is, of course, the characteristic Christian designation of God. It is found twelve times in this letter.

3 Once again John speaks of what we have seen and heard. We should not overlook his emphasis on being an eyewitness nor the fact that this is linked with proclaim to you. It is impossible to make good sense of this if we think of we as meaning 'we Christians'. It must mean only those believers who actually saw Jesus in the flesh. These proclaim what they saw to the rest of the church. Something of John's aim follows: so that you also may have fellowship with us. He immediately goes on to speak of our fellowship as with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ. The basic idea in fellowship (Gk. koinōnia) is that of possessing something in common, i.e. of partnership or sharing. It is often used of business affairs (cf. Lk. 5:10). Christian fellowship means sharing the common life in Christ through the Holy Spirit. It binds believers to one another, but the important thing is that it binds them also to God. We should not miss the fact that the fellowship is ongoing. The apostles had fellowship with Christ and thus with God. Then they brought others to believe and thus brought them into the same fellowship (a process which carries on to this day). The fellowship in question is fellowship ... with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ. Thus, early in the letter Jesus Christ is linked closely with the Father. One of John's strong emphases is on the high place of Christ and he loses no time in bringing it forward.

4 There is some emphasis on both we and write. The message is in a precise and abiding form and it is written by those who had full authority to write. There is some MS support for reading 'your' joy, but our joy is probably correct. It is only as John brings his friends into the kind of fellowship of which he has just written that his own joy is full, and, of course, the same is true of them. ‘Your joy’ and ‘our joy’ go together. For both, true joy comes only from fellowship with God.

1:5–2:6 Fellowship with God

John has made it clear that his purpose is to bring his readers into fellowship with God and with other believers. He proceeds to deduce from the nature of God the conditions of fellowship.

1:5 God is light. This is the message marks what follows as important, indeed it sums up the Christian message. That message is derivative (we have heard from him), and is not due to original thinking on the part of the apostles or others. The meaning of him presents us with a problem and one that will recur throughout this letter. There is no obvious antecedent. The Father and the Son were both mentioned in v 3 and either could be in mind here. Perhaps it is a little more likely that the Son is meant, but we can scarcely say more; the two are certainly closely connected.

The content of the message is summed up in the words God is light (cf. Jn. 8:12; 9:5) to which is attached (in a manner reminiscent of the fourth gospel where the positive and the negative are often linked like this) in him there is no darkness at all (cf. Ps. 27:1; Jn. 1:4–9). Light occurs often in the gospel, but there it tends to be linked to the Son rather than, as here, to the Father. It is found six times in this letter (1:5, 7 twice; 2:8, 9, 10). To say that God is light is to draw attention to his uprightness, his righteousness. Light is a natural symbol for attractive righteousness, just as darkness is for the blackness of sin. There is an emphatic double negative with darkness; there is no darkness whatever in God; he is all light. There is probably also the thought that our lives are exposed to the illumination that streams for God. Nothing is hidden from him (cf. Ps. 90:8). Because he is light it is important that his people ‘walk in the light’ (7).

1:6–7 The first error. John is fond of bringing out his point by making a supposition and here he has a string of clauses beginning with if (6–10; again in 2:1). He deals with three obstacles to fellowship, the first of which centres on the claim that we have fellowship with God. John has already said that his purpose is that his readers may enjoy this fellowship (3). Now he makes it clear that words alone do not bring fellowship with God. 6 If anyone claims to have this fellowship but walks (‘continues to walk’) in the darkness, then, since God is light, he lies (cf. 2:21–22). More than a comfortable religious feeling is needed. We must test our feelings by the revelation God has given. The error John is denouncing is that of refusing to accept the light God has given in the revelation made through the prophets, apostles and others, preferring the darkness of one’s own way. This positive is driven home with the negative: ‘we do not do the truth’ (the NIV paraphrases the Greek with do not live by the truth). This unusual expression is also found in Jn. 3:21 (and in the Qumran scrolls). We speak of ‘telling the truth’ but truth can be a quality of action as well as of speech. The truth that God has made known must be lived out in the lives of his servants. 7 Now comes the contrary supposition, namely that we really walk in the light. Walking is a metaphor for the whole way of life. It brings out the truth that the Christian should make steady, if unspectacular, progress. To walk in the light is to live righteously day by day. Here it is reinforced in the strongest way possible: as he is in the light (cf. Mt. 5:48). It is just not good enough to live with our eyes firmly fixed on some decent but merely human standard; the Christian is the servant of God and thus his standards are God’s standards. The Christian lives in a God-like way. After the denial of fellowship with God for those who walk in darkness (6) we expect the thought that those who walk in the light really do enjoy fellowship with God. Instead we find that they have fellowship with one another. They will, of course, have fellowship with God (cf. v 3), but the way John puts it brings out the truth that the fellowship believers enjoy with one another is of great worth. To this John adds, the blood of Jesus, his Son, purifies us from all sin (or ‘every sin’, the Gk. could mean either). The word sin occurs in this short letter seventeen times (seventeen times also in John’s gospel; the only NT writings with more occurrences are Romans and Hebrews). The human name Jesus is coupled with his Son, which brings out the Saviour’s uniqueness; we should miss the significance of neither the name nor the title. Purifies is in a continuous tense; it conveys the thought of a purification that takes place day by day, not a once-for-all cleansing. John is not saying that believers attain sinless perfection (cf. vs 9–10), but that when they ‘walk in the light’ (i.e. live close to God) their sins are cleansed. Even the greatest of saints need cleansing. This cleansing comes from the atoning death of Jesus; the blood does not mean life released from the flesh as has sometimes been claimed, but life yielded up in death.

1:8–9 The second error. 8 John puts the second error simply: if we claim to be without sin. More literally this is ‘if we say that we have no sin’, an unusual expression (found elsewhere Jn. 9:41; 15:22, 24; 19:11; the NIV paraphrases). ‘To have sin’ means more than ‘to commit sin’; it refers to the inner principle of which sinful acts are the outward manifestation. Sin persists. Sin clings to the sinner. The positive statement is reinforced by a following negative, the truth is not in us (as also in the preceding and following statements). When we say that we have no sin we deceive ourselves (we certainly deceive no-one else!), and the truth is not in us. Truth is viewed dynamically; it can take up its abode in people who love truth. But to say such a false thing as that we have no sin makes it impossible for truth to dwell in us. Modern fallacies claim that sin is a disease or a weakness, something due to heredity or environment, necessity or the like; people come to regard sin as their fate, not their fault. Such people deceive themselves. 9 In contrast we may confess our sins. The plural is significant: we confess specific sins, not simply that we sin. And because God is faithful and just (cf. Dt. 32:4; Mi. 7:18–20; Rom. 3:25) he forgives. He can be thoroughly relied upon. Nothing is said as to the way in which he will purify us from all unrighteousness, but v 7 is still in mind. It is the blood of Jesus that cleanses. Nothing else can remove our stains.

1:10 The third error. The next supposition is that we have not sinned. All God’s dealings with people rest on the basis that they are sinners in need of salvation (cf. Rom. 3:23). To deny that we have sinned is to make him out to be a liar. Put negatively this means his word has no place in our lives. In many parts of the Bible the ‘word’ has a dynamic character. It effects God’s purpose (cf. Is. 55:11). Those who deny that they are sinners thus make out that God is a liar and they show by that fact that God’s effectual word is not in them.

2:1–2 The propitiation for sins. 1 John often calls his correspondents ‘children’; here he has the affectionate diminutive, ‘my little (NIV dear) children’ (Gk. teknia; the word occurs 7 times in 1 John and once, perhaps twice, in all the rest of the NT). He writes so that you will not sin. Earlier John told them that he and those with him proclaimed the message so that his readers may enjoy fellowship with them (1:3), and that he has written so that his joy may be complete (1:4). This third statement fits in with the others for sin disrupts fellowship and destroys joy. Sin and vital Christianity are incompatible (cf. 3:6, 9; 5:18). But, while Christians do not live in sin, they never in this life become completely sinless (1:8). The closer we come to God the more sensitive our consciences become and the more we realize that we are sinners. A paradoxical consequence of this is that we now come to appreciate the fact that in our sinful state we are unworthy to approach our great and holy God. We need help. And John assures us that we have the help we need. When we sin, we have one who speaks to the Father in our defence (Gk. paraklētos). The term has a legal ring; it often means the counsel for the defence; it is the friend at court. ‘The image is that of the royal court at which a suppliant needs someone greater than himself, one who has the ear of the king, to plead his cause’ (J. L. Houlden, A Commentary on the Johannine Epistles [Black, 1973], p. 64). Its use shows that sinners are in no good case; they are in the wrong with the Father and they need deliverance. Their deliverer is Jesus Christ, the Righteous One. We might have expected ‘the Merciful One’ or the like but it is consistent NT teaching that God forgives in a way that is just. Forgiveness does not avoid the moral law but establishes it.

2 Christ is also ‘the propitiation for our sins’ (AV/KJV). Most modern translations obscure the meaning by choosing terms that refer to the removal of guilt or punishment, whereas the word (Gk. hilasmos) means the removal of wrath (cf. the NIV mg.). There is a divine wrath against all sin (cf. Rom. 1:18) and forgiveness does not mean ignoring this. Propitiation, the turning away of anger, is not the whole story of Christ’s saving work, but it is a genuine and important part of it, a truth which much modern theology overlooks. And Christ made ample provision; his propitiation avails for the sins of the whole world.

Those who object to the idea of propitiation often do so on the grounds that this means pitting Jesus against the heavenly Father. This, of course, is not the case. The Father and the Son are at one in the way salvation is effected as in all else. There is a divine wrath against all evil and if sinners are to be forgiven something must be done about this. One aspect of God’s forgiveness concerns his anger against sin (Ps. 78:38), and one aspect of Christ’s atoning work concerns the divine wrath against evil. Both Father and Son see sin as serious, and in his atoning work Jesus was doing the will of the Father (cf. Heb. 10:7).

2:3–6 Obedience. 3 Now comes a test by which we can know whether, in spite of our failures, we are in right relationship with God, and this test is whether we obey his commands (again in v 4; 3:22, 24; 5:3; cf. 5:2). If we really know God, this will have a powerful effect on our daily lives. Knowledge is an important theme in this letter; the verb ‘to know’ (Gk. ginōskō) occurs twenty-five times (and oida, another verb meaning ‘to know’, fifteen times). The knowledge of God is not some mystic vision or intellectual insight; it is manifested when we obey his commandments. Obedience is not spectacular, but it is at the basis of all true Christian service. 4 Anyone who claims to have this knowledge but does not do what he commands, John says forthrightly, is a liar. He underlines this by adding, the truth is not in him.

5 By contrast, God’s love is truly made complete in the person who obeys his word. This does not mean that Christianity is a form of legalism. It means that God has revealed himself in Christ who is his Word (1:1; Jn. 1:1), and that the coming of Christ is a challenge to our whole way of life. We are challenged to abandon all self-seeking and to take up our cross; nothing less will do. We anticipate that John will say something about the obedient person’s having the truth of God in him. Instead we find that God’s love is in that person and not only in him but ‘truly made perfect’ (REB) in him. Love (Gk. agapē) is stressed throughout this letter. It occurs eighteen times, which is more than in any other book in the NT (next is 1 Corinthians, fourteen times). In such a short book this is very significant. Love is primarily seen in the divine self-giving of Christ (4:10), but the term can also signify the human response to what God has done; perhaps both are in mind here. Love is seen in obedience, for love delights to do God’s will.

At the end of the verse John introduces a new concept: knowing that we are in him (in God? in Christ? John probably does not put much difference between the two at this point). He has spoken of fellowship with him (1:3), of walking in the light (1:7) and of knowing him (2:3), but we should not see these as so many different and unrelated ideas. If we are in him we enjoy fellowship with him, we know him, and we walk in the light. 6 We can be sure of all this if we walk as Jesus did. The Greek means ‘he did’ but the NIV is probably right in saying Jesus did.

2:7–17 The new commandment

2:7–11 Loving and hating. 7–8 Dear friends (Gk. agapētoi, ‘beloved’), an expression that occurs six times in this letter, accords with the writer’s stress on love. He does not spell out what he means by the command, but there is no doubt that he refers to the command to love (cf. 4:21; Jn. 15:12). This is no novelty but the message you have heard. It is fundamental to the Christian way and thus was taught from the first. But there is always a freshness about it and thus it is a new command (cf. Jn. 13:34). The old commandment has a new urgency for those for whom Christ died.

The command was first fulfilled by Christ (its truth is seen in him), who puts a like love into the hearts of his followers (and you). Thus, our attitude to other people shows whether we are in the darkness that is passing away or in the true light that is already shining. To live in love is to walk in the light, to walk surefootedly, for love rids the heart of all that would make us stumble. Love and light go together. 9–11 If anyone hates his brother, he is on the wrong track (let him say what he will), a track that can lead only to ruin for hatred blinds the eyes. The repetition of the darkness is important; we must not miss the connection between hatred and darkness.

2:12–14 The family of faith. Two sequences, each with a threefold address, to children, fathers, and young men now follow. Considerable ingenuity has been expended on the way we should understand these terms and on the change of tense from ‘I write’ to ‘I wrote’ (in the Gk. of vs 13c, 14). It may be argued that knowledge accords with fathers (those old in the faith), and strength with young men. But as all the qualities ought to be found in all believers it is best to regard the division as a stylistic device, adding emphasis. ‘All Christians are (by grace, not nature) children in innocence and dependence on the heavenly Father, young men in strength, and fathers in experience’ (C. H. Dodd, The Johannine Epistles [Hodder, 1946], pp. 38–39). John’s readers have the forgiveness of sins, the knowledge of God, the word of God abiding in them, and victory over the evil one.

2:15–17 Love for the world. 15 John emphasizes world by using the word three times in this verse and another three times in the two succeeding verses. It is an important concept (in this letter he uses the term twenty-three times). Do not love the world, he says, and some see a contradiction here with ‘God so loved the world’ (Jn. 3:16). But that passage speaks of God’s love for all people, whereas this one is concerned with setting one’s heart on worldliness. John makes two points: first, love for the world in this sense is incompatible with love for the Father (cf. Jas. 4:4), and secondly, in any case the world and all that is in it are temporary.

16 The cravings of sinful man (lit. ‘the lust of the flesh’) points to the gratification of our fleshly desires. The lust of his eyes is the strong desire for what is seen, for the outward form of things; it is the lust after the superficial. The boasting of what he has and does (lit. ‘the boastfulness of life’) is the empty haughtiness of the worldly-minded. (With these three things compare the three things that led Eve to disobey God; Gn. 3:6.) None of these has its origin in God (not from the Father). They are all from the world, that world that is but a passing show on its way to ruin. Everything points to totality: evil is found throughout the world. 17 By contrast, whoever does the will of God lives for ever. Obedience is an important part of eternal life.

2:18–27 The Christian and the antichrist

2:18–19 Many antichrists. 18 There is no article with hour. John is saying ‘this is last hour’, by which he probably means ‘this is a last hour’. Human history proceeds by periods of slow unfolding until a crisis is reached, an age is ended, a new age begins, and we say, ‘It can never be the same again.’ John is affirming that such a last hour has come. He sees evidence in the appearance not simply of the antichrist, but of many antichrists. The early church clearly expected that a mighty figure of evil, the antichrist, would appear at the end of time (cf. ‘the man of lawlessness’, 2 Thes. 2:3). John uses the term four times (and once in 2 John) but he is not interested in the future evil individual. His concern is for his readers, and he stresses for them the fact that the spirit of antichrist is already abroad. The situation is the same today.

19 These many antichrists had been members of the church. They had belonged to the visible organization, but John is quick to say they did not really belong to us. Their membership had been purely outward. This surely implies the doctrine of ‘the church invisible’ though that terminology is centuries later.

2:20–21 Knowledge of the truth. 20 You have an anointing from the Holy One is another way of saying that all have received the gift of the Holy Spirit. The Holy One is an unusual expression but there can be no doubt but that it refers to the Holy Spirit. The result is that ‘all of you have knowledge’ (NRSV; the Gk. does not add ‘the truth’ as the NIV does; the mg. ‘you know all things’ has less support). The illumination given by the Spirit means that in Christianity there is no enlightened elite on whom all others depend. Every believer has knowledge. 21 John has this truth well in mind as he proceeds to the central teaching of the heresy he is opposing. While we do not know exactly what the false teachers taught, they clearly denied the reality of the incarnation. There were some false teachers in early days who held that there was a divine Christ who came down on the man Jesus at his baptism, but left him before the crucifixion. John was not perhaps opposed by people holding exactly this belief, but they held something like it.

2:22–23 The lie. 22 They denied that Jesus is the Christ and this is fundamental. The person who goes wrong here is not to be depended on anywhere; that person is the antichrist—he denies the Father and the Son. The evidence that in Jesus of Nazareth God and humanity are indissolubly united is so strong that anyone who will not accept it is fundamentally astray and is guilty of the radical lie. 23 Without a right view of the Son we cannot have a right view of the Father. If Jesus is not the very Son of God and one with the Father, then it is not the love of God that we see revealed in his life and death; in that case it would be only the love of a good man that is seen. It is only as we receive Christ that we become children of God (Jn. 1:12), so that if we reject him we are not members of the family of God. We then have no right to call God our Father.

2:24–27 Remaining in God. 24 What you have heard from the beginning points us back to the simple gospel message. If John’s readers let that remain (the Gk. verb occurs twenty-four times in this letter) in them then they will remain in the Son and in the Father. 25 In this way God’s promise of eternal life is fulfilled. 26 What the false teachers were saying would lead the new believers away from the truth. That is why John is writing; he will not allow the false teachers to wreck the lives of the new believers who mean so much to him. 27 John has already spoken of the anointing (20). It is owing to the enlightenment given by the Holy Spirit within them that believers have the knowledge that matters and that they remain in God.

2:28–3:10 Children of God

2:28–29 Confidence. John appeals to family relationship with ‘little children’ (Gk. teknia) and urges his readers to behave in the way that is appropriate at Christ’s second coming and which shows that they have been born [better, ‘begotten’] of him. Believers are not simply people who are trying to live a little better. They have been radically renewed, born all over again. The habitual practice of goodness is evidence of what God has done in them.

3:1–3 What we shall be. 1 The wonder of it all grips John. ‘Look!’ he says (the NIV paraphrases with How great), ‘Look at what love the Father has given us, that we should be called the children of God!’ And not only do we have the name; John goes on, ‘And we are!’ He leaves us with no doubt but that the divine call is an effectual call; we are what God calls us. This has a consequence: The world does not know us. The incompatibility of the world and the Christian way comes again and again in John’s writings (e.g. Jn. 15:18–16:4). The world’s failure to know Christ’s followers is not to be wondered at for it did not know him.

Grammatically him should refer to the Father, but clearly John is referring to Christ. 2 His recognition of our present sonship does not blind John to the fact that the best is yet to be. When he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. Grammatically he and him should refer back to God but it is more usual to speak of seeing Christ. Probably not too much should be made of this, however, for anyone who sees the Son sees also the Father (Jn. 12:45; 14:9).

3 To see God is to be transformed. Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself. This is the only place in John’s letters where the word hope occurs; his concern in this letter is mainly with the believer’s present situation rather than his future hope. But this passage shows that John is aware of the importance of hope. He speaks of the hope as being ‘on’ (rather than ‘in’) him; the believer’s hope has a secure base. Again it is not certain whether him means God or Christ; but perhaps here John is not making a firm distinction between them. They are at one in this matter. He is making the point firmly that the believer’s hope rests on a solid foundation and that this has consequences for Christian living. To know God does not bring spiritual complacency, but purity of life. It is the pure in heart who see God (Mt. 5:8).

3:4 The necessity for right conduct. The false teachers seem to have held that knowledge was all-important and that conduct was a minor matter. But John insists that sin is evidence of wrong relationship to God. Sin, he says, is lawlessness, where the Greek construction implies that the two words are inter-changeable. The law here is, of course, the law of God and the essence of sin is disregard for that law of God. It is the assertion of oneself against God’s revealed way, the preference for selfishness over the service of God. It is unlikely that John is referring to the law in the OT, the Torah, for he nowhere mentions this law and he appears to be writing to Gentiles, who would not easily pick up such a reference. He means rather a defiant violation of God’s moral law. Sin sets the sinner in opposition to God.

3:5–7 Christ and sin are incompatible. 5 Christ came to take away our sins. He is completely hostile to evil, and in him is no sin. 6 This has effects in the Christian for No-one who lives in him keeps on sinning. We must not water down statements like this; the Christian has no business with sin and must never be complacent about it, even about occasional sin. But we should also notice that the present tense in Greek often has a continuous force and this appears to be its significance here: ‘No-one who continually lives in him makes a habit of sinning’ and again, No-one who continues to sin has either seen him or known him. John is not writing about individual acts of sin, but about habitual attitudes. The life we live reveals the source from which we draw our life. 7 To hold otherwise is to be deceived. It is not a matter of right thinking or of wide knowledge or of holding that the body is unimportant so that it does not matter what the body does as long as the soul is pure. John firmly sweeps aside all such specious arguments. He who does what is right is righteous. And the standard is Christ: just as he is righteous.

3:8–10 Children of the devil. 8 The other side of this coin is that He who does what is sinful is of the devil. Both does and has been sinning point to the habitual practice. John is writing about the habitual trend of the life. He goes on to say that the reason for Christ's coming was to destroy the devil's work. Destroy is not specific; it tells us that Jesus came to do away with the devil, but does not say how. But clearly the believer must not do the works of the devil. The follower of Jesus must side with the destroyer of the devil.

9 Born of God points to divine action. There is something supernatural about the life of believers. They have been regenerated by nothing less than the power of God. Again we must give the present tenses their full force: No-one who is born of God will continue to sin. Indeed, he cannot go on sinning. John has already repudiated the doctrine of sinless perfection (1:8, 10) and we must not interpret these words in such a way as to contradict those. But we must see that sin and the Christian are radically opposed. 'John is arguing rather the incongruity than the impossibility of sin in the Christian' (J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John, TNTC [IVP, 1988], p. 131; see also his Additional Note, pp. 134–140). Should a Christian sin that would be an act completely out of character. On this occasion John gives a reason for the believer's inability to sin: God's seed remains in him. It is very unusual to have the metaphor pressed in this way (this is the one occurrence of seed in this letter, but it has the verb rendered born ten times). It emphasizes the fact that there is a divine power at work in the believer. Remains shows that this is not occasional. It is God's continuing gift to his people. It is possible to take God's seed in the sense of 'God's children' and in him as meaning 'in God' (as Moffatt, for example, does). But this view is less likely and it is rejected by Marshall, Stott and others. 10 John rounds off this section by contrasting the children of God and the children of the devil. The test is whether we do right and love our brother or not.

3:11–18 Love one another

3:11–15 The opposite of love. 11 Again John insists that love is the first command (from the beginning). It is at the very heart of the Christian message. 12 Look at what the lack of love does: Cain, who belonged to the evil one ... murdered his brother, the logical consequence of his refusal to love (cf. Mt. 5:21–22). John's answer to the question why did he murder him? is a penetrating critique of fallen human nature. It was no offence of Abel's but his righteous life in the face of Cain's bad life. (This is the last use of the 'righteousness' words in the letter; from this point the 'love' words abound.) Evil people do not love the highest when they see it. It accuses them and they crucify it. 13 Thus, John can go on: Do not be surprised ['stop marvelling' is the force of it], my brothers, if the world hates you. Christians usually find it difficult to understand this. When they act from the best of motives, with love in their hearts for their fellows, when they look for nothing for themselves, but offer the priceless gift of the gospel, the world does not respond with gratitude. It hates believers.

14 The love—hate contrast continues; life and love go together. We know, John says; the fact that all Christians have knowledge is important and he brings it out many times. We have passed from death to life (cf. Jn. 5:24) is expressive and unusual. Unbelievers live in a condition that can only be called death. Not so believers. Believers have passed clean out of death and they live the life that really is life. The test whereby we may know that this has happened is that we love our brothers. John keeps coming back to this thought. He reinforces it here with the corresponding negative: Anyone who does not love remains (the verb signifies a continuing state) in death. 15

This is spelled out with an emphatic declaration about hate: Anyone who hates his brother is a murderer. Jesus said that the lustful look is adultery and that the angry word breaks the command ‘Do not murder’ (Mt. 5:21–22). John follows this example and goes to the deep roots of our actions. Hatred is of the essence of murder, and no murderer has eternal life in him (‘to take life is to forfeit life’, J. R. W. Stott, The Letters of John, TNTC [IVP, 1988], p. 146). This does not mean that a murderer cannot repent and find forgiveness. It means that no-one in whom is the attitude that brings murder is the possessor of eternal life. The two are mutually exclusive.

3:16–18 Love is practical. 16 We can know what love (in the specifically Christian sense) is only because of what we see on Calvary, where Jesus Christ (John actually says ‘that one’ but the NIV correctly understands this to refer to Jesus) laid down his life for us. Since the Christ to whom Christians owe their inspiration died in this way for us, we in our turn ought to lay down our lives for our brothers. No less a quality of love is demanded of the Christian.

17 The actual laying down of life has been rarely called for (even in the first century most Christians were not called upon to die for their faith). But love has other outlets and it is constantly needed in daily life. The word translated material possessions (Gk. bion; only found here and in 2:16 in this letter) is not commonly used in this sense; it more usually means ‘life’. But the meaning here is plain. See (Gk. theōre) means more than a passing glance. The person sees his brother for long enough to be sure of the situation. But he has no pity on him, more literally ‘shuts up his entrails from him’. The Greeks held that this part of the body was the special location of the emotions so that the use of the term indicates that the person was emotionally involved. For the Greeks in general this meant that the person was angry (though sometimes other emotions were in mind). For the Christians, however, this same expression conveyed the idea of being moved with compassion. If anyone fails to show compassion this shows that the love of God (which might mean either God’s love for us or our love for God) is not in him. 18 Again we have the address Dear children, as John urges them to real love. Love is not simply a matter of the words we say. Actions and truth count for more than words or tongue.

3:19–24 Confidence

John reassures sensitive consciences. Believers should live before God not in trembling anxiety, but in calm confidence.

19 Another test: this is the way we know that we belong to the truth (Gk. ‘we are of the truth’), the only place in the letter where the expression is applied to people (though it is used of words in 2:21). It signifies complete and utter honesty, and points to the truth of the gospel. To know that we belong to the truth is to receive assurance. 20 If our hearts condemn us this is not the significant thing. It is God’s condemnation or approval that matters and he knows everything. He knows our motives and those deeds of love for which we may not dare to take any credit (cf. Mt. 25:37–40). He knows that we are his and it is this that is important, not our misgivings. (A less likely interpretation is that God, the Judge, knows all our misdeeds and will punish us.) 21 The promises of God are such that there is no reason for uncertainty. We can rely on God and have confidence before him. Since we are his we have nothing to fear. 22 Receiving answers to prayer does not at first sight follow on from the fact that our heart does not condemn us. But confidence is common to both, and answered prayer inevitably increases our confidence. Both obey and do are in continuous tenses. Power in prayer does not come from occasional bursts of obedience, but from lives of habitual obedience. Further, believers do what pleases him. This goes beyond the keeping of the commandments. Just as in the Sermon on the Mount there is a concern for the spirit of the commandments; it is not enough to keep the letter of the law.

23 His command is defined in terms of faith and love. The singular may indicate that ‘but one thing is needful’; there is no great list of burdensome requirements. Further, faith and love are included in the one command; they belong together. Faith is in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ, where the name stands for the whole person; it is faith in all that Jesus is and does. The second part of the commandment is that we love one another. Love and the reciprocal responsibility of believers are two of the great themes of this letter. As he commanded us reinforces his command and emphasizes the fact that God is not indifferent to the way we live. The tense of believe (the aorist) points to the decisive act of faith, while love is in the present tense, signifying the continuing attitude. 24 After the singular of v 23 we return to the plural, his commands. All who keep them live in him, and he in them. This mutual indwelling is another characteristic theme of this letter. How do we know that it has taken place? By the Spirit he gave us. The Spirit is given (not earned), and the Spirit gives assurance.

4:1–6 The spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood

How can believers tell those who are truly inspired from those who falsely claim that the Spirit is in them? The problem was not new, for there were false prophets in OT times, and again, Paul had had to give a ruling on when a person was speaking ‘by the Spirit of God’ (1 Cor. 12:3).

1 Many false prophets have gone out into the world (cf. Mt. 7:15; 24:11, 24; Acts 13:6). The religions of antiquity commonly claimed to have spirit-possessed men, but John warns that not everyone who claims to speak under inspiration is to be regarded as truly inspired. Believers must not accept every claim to inspiration, but test the spirits. That the false prophets had gone out may well mean that they had been church members but had left the church (2:9). 2 The test is the attitude to Jesus Christ. If the Spirit of God is in the claimant to inspiration he will affirm that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh. More exactly he ‘acknowledges Jesus as Christ come in the flesh’; the human Jesus is nothing less than the divine Christ. In the flesh underlines the reality of the incarnation; it is not simply that Jesus took human nature, but flesh (cf. Jn. 1:14; 2 Jn. 7). The spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ has so come is from God. This is not a human discovery but something God reveals. 3 But there is such a thing as a spirit that does not acknowledge Jesus, i.e. a spirit that does not acknowledge ‘that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh’ (2); to deny the incarnation is to deny Jesus. The spirit that refuses this confession is not from God. In fact it is the spirit of the antichrist. John has already said that there are many antichrists (2:18) and has given something of a definition: ‘he denies the Father and the Son’ (2:22). The thought here is similar: the essential point about the antichrist is his refusal to acknowledge that Jesus is the Christ, ‘come in the flesh’ (2). John’s readers appear to have understood the antichrist’s coming as future, but John sees it as a present reality; his even now, his already, and his in the world combine to emphasize the present.

4 But there is no need for Christians to be fearful. You is emphatic; believers are set in strong contrast to the antichrists. Believers are from God, and they have overcome. This short letter has the verb ‘to overcome’ six times, which is more than any other NT book other than Revelation (seventeen times); the note of victory is unusually prominent. Here the verb is in the perfect tense, which shows that the victory is more than a passing phase; it is decisive and continuing. It comes about because the one who is in you is greater than the one who is in the world. The first one could be any member of the Godhead; all that we can say is that it is a divine person. The second cannot be any other than the devil. John is saying that God is more powerful by far than the devil and that those in whom God dwells accordingly overcome evil. 5 Once again John repeats a word for emphasis; world is the last word in v 4 and it occurs three times in this verse.

It is with the world that his opponents are associated: they are from it, they speak from its viewpoint, and it forms their audience. 6 Christians should not be surprised if such people do not listen to them. They are of the wrong party. But Christians do have their hearers. We is emphatic and sets those who are from God in strong contrast with others. There is also a contrast in the hearers; those who are from God are set over against whoever is not from God. Since this is the way the Spirit of truth and the spirit of falsehood (Brown translates, ‘Spirit of Deceit’) are known it is a fair inference that these spirits live in the people previously indicated.

4:7–21 God is love

Love is very important for John and he puts emphasis on it throughout this letter. Here he does this by drawing attention to the fact that love is rooted in God, who is, in fact, love.

4:7–12 Love one another. 7 John reinforces let us love one another with the reminder that love comes from God. Love, as Christians understand it, is not a human achievement; it is divine in origin, a gift from God. If anyone loves in this sense it shows that that person has been born of God and knows God. 8 The negative underlines the point: Whoever does not love does not know God. The reason for this is one of the greatest statements in the whole Bible: God is love. This means more than ‘God is loving’ or that God sometimes loves. It means that he loves, not because he finds objects worthy of his love, but because it is his nature to love. His love for us depends not on what we are, but on what he is. He loves us because he is that kind of God, because he is love. 9 This kind of love is not found everywhere, or indeed anywhere as a human achievement. We know it only because God showed it when he sent his one and only Son into the world. His purpose in doing this was to give us life. Life in the full sense comes to us through him alone.

10 The real meaning of love and the real source of life are discerned only in the cross. It is not that we loved God. We will never find what this love is if we start from the human end (we is emphatic; not that we loved). We find it in that God loved us and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice (better as the NIV mg. ‘the one who would turn aside his wrath’). To see what love means we must see ourselves as sinners, and thus as the objects of God’s wrath, and yet as those for whom Christ died. ‘So far from finding any kind of contrast between love and propitiation, the apostle can convey no idea of love to anyone except by pointing to the propitiation’ (J. Denney, The Death of Christ [Hodder and Stoughton, 1905], p. 276). It is one of the NT’s resounding paradoxes that it is God’s love that averts God’s wrath from us, and indeed that it is precisely in this averting of wrath that we see what real love is. 11 This has consequences. When we see that God loves like this we (the word is emphatic) also ought to love one another. The mainspring of our love for other people is the divine love shown to us in Christ’s atoning work. Christians should love, not because all those they meet are attractive people, but because the love of God has transformed them and made them loving people. They should love now not because attractiveness in other people compels their love, but because, as Christians, it is their nature to love. 12 Love for other people is very important as is clear from the fact that it is this love and not love for God that shows that God lives in us. That no-one has ever seen God (cf. Jn. 1:18) does not deny the visions in the OT (e.g. Ex. 24:11). But such visions were partial and incomplete. It is in Christ that we see God. And when we love, God lives in us. Indeed, his love is made complete (i.e. reaches its aim) in us, a staggering statement.

4:13–16 Living in love. 13 John has already told us that it is ‘by the Spirit’ that we know that ‘he lives in us’ (3:24). He now adds the thought that we live in him. Both are important and both are emphasized in this letter. 14 As in 1:2 the writer appeals to what we have seen. The thought of testimony looms larger as we approach the end of the letter. The verb ‘to witness’ occurs in 1:2, here, and four times in ch. 5, while the noun ‘witness’ is found six times in ch. 5. The content of the testimony is that God has sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world (an expression found only here and in Jn. 4:42 in the NT). Saviour covers all aspects of Christ’s work for sinners, and world the totality of the race. It is a great salvation. 15 But not all are saved, Christ’s atoning act is adequate for the whole world, but it is necessary to confess that Jesus is the Son of God if one is to experience that salvation. Then there follows a mutual indwelling of God and the believer.

16 We do not read elsewhere of ‘knowing’ and ‘believing’ love (the NIV has translated the Gk. pepisteukamen with rely on, but the meaning is ‘we have believed’). We may fairly say that the thought of ‘knowing’ love is found, as in v 10, but to ‘believe the love God has for us’ is a most unusual expression. The love of God is never demonstrated in such a way that the worldly-minded have to see it. It is the people of faith and the people of faith only who see it. John repeats the great thought of v 8, God is love, and he draws the conclusion that to live in love is to live in God. To love sinners is never a human achievement and where this is found it shows that God is present.

4:17–21 The perfecting of love. 17 The presence of God in us is the way love is ‘perfected among us’ (NRSV). This is with a view to confidence on the day of judgment, and confidence on that day is the ultimate in confidence. In this world we are like him: we are children of the Father and Jesus is our model. The world did not welcome Christ and it does not welcome Christ’s people. But on the day of judgment the Judge will understand all.

18 The thought of confidence is developed with the repudiation of fear. This word occurs three times in this verse and the corresponding verb once, but neither is found elsewhere in the letter; there is emphasis here on fear. Believers need not be afraid, for perfect love throws fear out. Fear and love are incompatible, Fear, John proceeds, has to do with punishment, but God’s perfect love reassures us. His love ensures that we are saved, not punished. If we fear, that shows in itself that we have not been made perfect in love (the perfecting of love brings confidence even on the day of judgment; v 17).

19 We love, in the sense of specifically Christian love, the love of the unworthy which proceeds from the nature of the lover and not the worth of the loved one, only because he first loved us. Some MSS read ‘we love him [or God]’ but this, while true, is not the sense of the passage. John is telling how we come to love at all, not how we come to love God. 20 To say I love God, while having hatred for one’s brother (brother-Christian? brother-man?) is to show oneself for a liar. Love for God is shown by love for people; if the latter is lacking then so is the former. John goes so far as to say of anyone who does not love his brother that he cannot love God. He makes a distinction between the brother who is seen and God who is not. To affirm one’s love for the unseen while failing to love the seen is to enter the realm of fantasy.

21 John rounds off this section by reminding his readers of the command that he has given, where he might refer to either God or Christ. As often, John does not differentiate sharply. He has already spoken of the commandment to love (3:23) and now he reminds us again that love is not merely an option. It is a positive command.

5:1–5 Faith’s victory

The thought of love leads to that of relationship to God, and that in turn to victory. Love and faith are closely connected (cf. 4:16), and the believer overcomes the world.

1 Faith trusts Jesus as the Christ, a truth insisted upon throughout this letter, and the believer who so trusts is born of God. The confession that Jesus is the Christ is not the result of human insight, but of a divine work in the one who makes it (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3). And this divine work produces love for fellow-believers, for love for the father means love for his child as well. 2 John keeps insisting that love for God and love for other people are closely connected. Usually he speaks of love for God as shown in love for people, but here he reverses the process: we know that we love the children of God when we love God. Love for God and love for people go together and form a unity. John's practical turn of mind does not stop at the thought of love for God but goes on to include carrying out his commands. Real love is shown by a concern to do God's will. 3 Indeed John can say that love for God is to obey his commands. John is not a legalist, but he recognizes that love is busy; it finds its natural expression in doing the things that please the beloved, and where will we find these things better than in his commands? When John adds his commands are not burdensome (cf. Mt. 11:30), the thought is not that it is quite easy to discharge our obligations to God. Rather the thought is that God's commands are not an irksome burden. They may be difficult but they are a delight.

4 This leads on to victory. The neuter 'whatever' (NIV, everyone) makes the statement quite general (cf. 1:1). Our faith (the noun occurs only here in 1 John; it is not found in the gospel or 2 or 3 John) stands last with emphasis. Has overcome means that the decisive victory is in the past, when Jesus died to overcome evil, and in the case of the individual believer when that believer came to trust in him. 5 The rhetorical question leads to emphasis on the place of faith. Victory comes to the one who believes that Jesus is the Son of God. Once more there is emphasis on a right view of his person. We see here again John's habit of emphasis by repetition; in these two verses he has three references to overcoming the world. We cannot miss it. It is important.

5:6–12 The witness to the Son

Since a right view of Jesus matters so much it is important that it be attested. John cites some of the testimony that establishes who Jesus is.

6 That Jesus came by water surely refers to his baptism, and likewise blood to his death. At his baptism he heard the heavenly voice and he solemnly entered his life's work. Some heretics apparently held that the divine Christ came on Jesus when he was baptized, but left him before his death. John contests this with his emphasis on blood: not by water only, but by water and blood. It was (and is) this that is the heart of the gospel. There were apparently no doubts about the water but the blood seems to have been the stumbling block; heretics evidently found it impossible to hold that the divine Christ could die. John brings out the fact that the water did not stand alone. The water and the blood go together. Further, it is the Spirit who testifies (the present tense points to a continuing activity). He has an excellent qualification for this for the Spirit is the truth (as is Jesus; Jn. 14:6). 7 The KJV includes additional material which the NIV puts in the mg. The words are rarely found outside the later Latin MSS and they are clearly no part of the true text. 8 There are in fact three that testify. The Spirit is listed first, perhaps because he has just been mentioned, perhaps because he is a person and thus a more explicit witness than water or blood. But in any case the witness is harmonious. The inner witness of the Spirit, and all that is involved in Christ's baptism and his death are not three unrelated items. Together they point to one great act of God in Christ for our salvation.

9 John appeals to the well-known fact of human trust. We accept the testimony of other people and much more should we accept the testimony of which John has been speaking, for it is the testimony of God and God's testimony is greater. The testimony in question is testimony about his Son. Now the giving of testimony commits, so this means that God has committed himself in Christ; he has borne witness that this is what he himself is like. 10 Whoever trusts God's Son has this testimony in his heart, which seems to show that the witness of the Spirit (6–7) is a witness to the believer's own spirit. Anyone who believes in the Son of God and Anyone who does not believe God appear to be opposites, which means that John puts no great difference between believing in and believing, or between faith in the Son of God and faith in God. For him Jesus Christ was God incarnate, so that to believe in Christ is to believe in God. But to disbelieve is to make him out to be a liar (cf. 1:10). The perfect tense in has made him out views this as lasting. The unbeliever takes up the position of permanently having a wrong view of God. 11 The content of the testimony is perhaps a little unexpected for it is what God has done, not what he has said: he has given us eternal life. Eternal life is God's own deed and God's own gift. As we contemplate it we see a revelation of God. The addition, this life is in his Son, is important. We cannot think of eternal life apart from the Son nor can we think of the testimony apart from him (cf. v 9). Life eternal is life with Christ and in Christ. 12 This is emphasized in a crisp couplet. Life and the Son go together. It is impossible to have the one without the other.

5:13–21 The knowledge of eternal life

John's gospel was written so that its readers might believe and so have life (Jn. 20:31). By contrast this letter was written to readers who already believe in order to give them assurance, the certainty that they have eternal life. John brings this out as his letter draws to a close.

5:13–15 Confidence. 13 This letter is written to you who believe; it is not an evangelistic tract, but a letter to Christians. There has been a good deal about knowledge and now we find that the whole is written so that you may know that you have eternal life. Assurance of salvation is important, important enough to have caused this whole letter. This is the only place in the letter where the writer speaks of believing in the name of Jesus, i.e. in his full person, all that the name stands for (in the similar wording of 3:23 the Gk. means 'believe the name').

14 John moves to confidence in prayer. He sees prayer as having a wide scope for he speaks of asking anything, but he immediately qualifies this with according to his will. Prayer is not a device for inducing God to change his mind and do what we want. It must be offered in accordance with his will if it is to be effective. When it is offered in this way God hears us. Elsewhere we learn that prayer must be in faith (Mk. 11:24), in the name of Jesus (Jn. 14:14), offered by those who abide in Christ (Jn. 15:7), who have forgiven those who offend them (Mk. 11:25); it must be accompanied by obedience (1 Jn. 3:22), and it must not be for the gratification of one's passions (Jas. 4:3). All this is involved in praying according to the will of God. 15 From the thought that God hears us we move to the consequences, namely that he grants our requests.

5:16–17 Prayer for wrongdoers. 16 An abrupt change leads to the forgiveness of sin that can be brought about by intercessory prayer. John distinguishes between sin that leads to death and sin that does not (though he does not say what the difference is). He begins with the direction that when we see a brother sin a sin that does not lead to death we should pray for him. God will hear the prayer and give him life. If he was to be given life he was not up till then a Christian. He was not alive but dead 'in transgressions and sins' (Eph. 2:1) and in response to prayer God gives him life. We should regard sin that leads to death as a state rather than an act; in Scripture there is no one specific act people do which results in death, but there is a state of sin, of being in rebellion against God, which John elsewhere calls remaining in death (3:14). Jesus warned that anyone who blasphemes against the Spirit 'will not be forgiven' (Lk. 12:10), and it is this kind of thing that is in mind here. John adds that he is not saying that believers should pray about sin that leads to death (though he does not say explicitly that they should not pray about it). This does not mean that we should try to calculate when we may and when we may not pray for others. It is a stern warning that sin damns people. 17 All wrongdoing is sin. We must not take sin lightly. But the believer may sin a sin that does not remove him or her from the category of the saved.

5:18–21 The believer’s knowledge. 18 Now come three statements in succession introduced by we know. The first is, anyone born of God does not continue to sin. Again it is the habitual attitude. The reason is that anyone born of God is kept safe by the one who was born of God, i.e. Jesus Christ. Accordingly, the evil one does not touch him, does not make effective contact with him. 19 The second statement concerns the origin of believers; they are children of God. By contrast, the whole world is under the control of the evil one, lit. ‘lies in the evil one’. This is an unusual verb in such a connection and may point to the powerlessness of the world lying under Satan’s sway; perhaps, too, to its inertness, its refusal to assert itself against its master.

20 The third of the trilogy directs us to the incarnation: the Son of God has come. There is some emphasis on the actuality of the arrival (Gk. hēkei conveys ‘the idea of having come in the past and still being present’, R. E. Brown, The Epistles of John, [Doubleday, 1982], p. 623). The Son has given us understanding. The Christian faith is not a hindrance to intellectual activity but a stimulus to right thinking. The purpose of this is that we may know him who is true, and not only do we know him, but we are in him who is true, which is further explained as in his Son Jesus Christ. As often in this letter the Father and the Son are seen in the closest possible relationship. To be ‘in’ the Father is to be ‘in’ the Son. John goes on, He is the true God and eternal life. Once more it is not easy to see whether the Father or the Son is meant, but they are so close that there is little difference. For the people of the ancient world there were many gods. But John sees them all as false gods. There is but one true God and we have eternal life in him.

21 As he concludes, John uses again the affectionate diminutive, Dear (lit. ‘little’) children. In view of the whole preceding discussion it is unlikely that we should understand idols in the sense of images used in worship. The term means ‘false gods’. John’s readers have been given many gifts by God, including ‘understanding’ (20). Let them then keep themselves from every false god.

Leon Morris

2 AND 3 JOHN

Introduction

These short letters, the two shortest books in the NT, were not often quoted or referred to in the earliest times which makes it difficult to solve problems like date, authorship and the like. Both claim to have been written by 'the elder' but there is no further description. It is sometimes argued that there was an 'elder John' in antiquity, separate from the apostle, and that he wrote these two letters. But it has not been demonstrated that such an 'elder John' ever existed. Moreover, in antiquity, as far as our information goes, neither of these letters was ever said to have been written by anyone other than the apostle John. The language of both resembles that of the first letter and of the fourth gospel. In the present state of our knowledge it seems best to accept the traditional view and see the apostle John as the author.

2 John is addressed to 'the chosen lady and her children' and there is controversy as to whether this means an individual lady or whether it is a symbolic way of referring to a church. If the latter, the 'children' would be members of the congregation. The principal arguments for the former view are that it is the most natural way of taking the words, that its contents are rather slight for an address to a congregation, and that 'your house' (10) looks like a reference to the home of an individual family. In support of the view that the letter was destined for a church, it is urged that the subject matter is more appropriate for a church than for an individual, and that the letter lacks personal characteristics (in which it stands in contrast to 3 John). Most modern scholars see the letter as written to a church. The problem seems insoluble with the information at our command, though perhaps it is a little more likely that it is a letter to an individual; it does seem rather slight for a letter to a congregation.

This letter appears to reflect something of the same false teaching as lay behind 1 John. It would accordingly have been written to put its readers on their guard against it. Clearly there was some danger that the false teachers would be welcomed and that thus their doctrines would spread. The elder wrote to forestall this. Some writers link 3 John with the same situation. It is concerned with hospitality to visiting preachers, and the Diotrephes who was refusing to receive people the elder commended may have come from the false teachers behind 2 John. But this is somewhat speculative and we must bear in mind that, despite the views of some scholars, there is no indication that Diotrephes held anything other than orthodox teaching. It has been suggested that Diotrephes was orthodox and that the writer of this letter was not! This critic holds that that is why the two were at odds. Such contentions do not seem to be soundly based. We cannot be sure of anything more than that Gaius was being reassured in the face of the unfriendly gossip and the unfriendly actions of Diotrephes. The elder would take action against this man in due course. There is very little on which to estimate the dates of these writings (see the comment on the date of 1 John). Most agree that they come from about the same period and it is usual to see this as not very far from the time of 1 John.

See also the article Reading the letters.

For Further reading see under 1 John.

2 JOHN

Commentary

1–3 Salutation

This is the normal opening to a first-century letter. 1–2 The writer calls himself the elder, which may be an indication of age or possibly of an official position in the church. He writes to the chosen lady, which might also be understood as ‘an elect lady’. One or both of the Greek terms might be a proper name, which opens up several possibilities: ‘Electa the Lady’, ‘the elect Kyria’ or ‘Electa Kyria’. But the ‘elect lady’ is probably correct. Whether an individual or a church is meant is disputed (see the Introduction). The elder affirms that he (his I emphatic) loves the lady and her children in the truth. Both love and truth are very prominent in this opening (love, either noun or verb, occurs four times in the first six verses and truth five times in the first four verses). Notice the sequence whom I love in the truth ... because of the truth. Truth as John understands it leads to love. The truth can be known; it lives in believers and will be with them for ever. It is difficult to think that the truth described in this way can be separated from our Lord Jesus Christ who said, ‘I am ... the truth’ (Jn. 14:6). We should not miss the connection between Christian love and Christian truth. Someone has said that the community of love is as wide as the community of truth, which is a significant comment. 3 The addition of mercy to grace and peace in the greeting is unusual in the NT (found elsewhere only in 1, 2 Timothy). It strengthens the idea in grace which points to the freeness of God’s gift in Christ. It is also unusual for it to be said that these qualities will be with us; in a salutation one expects ‘with you’. This appears to be the only salutation in the NT that reads this way. It is an expression of solidarity linking writer and readers. All alike need grace, mercy and peace. Jesus is here called the Father’s Son (an expression found only here in the NT). He is not to be thought of in isolation from the Father.

4–6 The command to love

4 It gave the writer great joy to find some of the children of the elect lady walking in the truth, an expression that is very nearly equivalent to ‘living the Christian life’. That it is put this way shows the stress our writer places on the truth. To follow the truth is not simply an option selected by some people as desirable, but a response to the command of the Father. Following truth is certainly attractive, but it is not the attractiveness to which John is drawing attention. In three verses here we have ‘command’, either as the verb or the noun, four times. It is the repetition for emphasis that we have seen in 1 John and again already in this letter. 5 The elder does not enjoin but says I ask, which is the language of polite request. He is not writing a new command but one we have had from the beginning (cf. 1 Jn. 2:7). The command to love, which our writer immediately spells out, is an old command; from the very beginning of the Christian way its adherents were united in the bond of love. He does not speak of it as also new (as in 1 John). He is content to emphasize the obligation resting on Christians, namely that we love one another. This is the central thing and it is emphasized in all John’s writings. We tend to use ‘love’ for an emotion and that cannot be commanded. But for John, while love certainly is warmly emotional, it is basically a response to God’s great love for us. Love issues in action, in caring and unselfish service. 6 This is love introduces something of a definition: that we walk in obedience to his commands. In modern times obedience to commands is often seen as evidence of a legalistic spirit, the very opposite of what we see as love. But the contrast is a false one. True love delights to do the will of the beloved (cf. Jn. 15:10; 1 Jn. 5:3). Those who know what love in the Christian sense really is are always eager to obey God’s commands. John says again that he is not introducing a novelty, but repeating a command which had been heard from the beginning. We should not miss the idea of steady progress that is implied in the twofold walk.

7–11 Sound doctrine

7 ‘For’ (which the NIV omits) introduces the reason for what John has just said: Many deceivers (people who have wilfully taught erroneous views about the Christian way) have gone out. This implies that at one time they had been church members (cf. 1 Jn. 2:19). Their error was their failure now to acknowledge Jesus Christ as coming in the flesh (cf. 1 Jn. 4:2–3). As in 1 John the point at issue is the importance of the incarnation. Jesus was indeed the very Christ of God come in the flesh. To fail to see this is to fall into the most serious error and John calls anyone who does this the deceiver and the antichrist. He has elsewhere spoken of anyone who teaches this error as ‘antichrist’ (1 Jn. 4:3), but the title deceiver is new. Not only is such a teacher in error but he leads others astray.

8 The MSS are divided as to whether to read ‘you’ or ‘we’ before have worked for. Those who accept ‘we’ (as e.g. the NRSV, RFB) see the writer as warning that what the good teachers have worked for will be lost if believers fall away. Those who accept you (with the NIV) see the elder as warning the readers that if they follow the false teachers they will lose the heavenly reward that awaits the faithful servants of God. This, of course, is not salvation, which is God’s free gift. It is the reward for the labourer who has served faithfully and which John thinks may be lost if the false teachers are followed. The readers are warned.

9 The false teachers evidently thought of themselves as ‘advanced’ thinkers. John thinks of anyone who runs ahead in this way as having advanced right out of Christianity! The aim of the believer should not be to pride oneself on being ‘advanced’ but to hold fast to the truth that has been revealed, that is to continue in the teaching of Christ (this could be understood as ‘teaching about Christ’ as the REB, but more probably means the teaching Christ gave). It is necessary to be right about the Son if we are to be right about the Father (cf. 1 Jn. 2:23). 10 Believers must not countenance any other teaching. John is not, of course, saying that the believer should deny common courtesy to a doctrinal opponent. But at that time to receive a teacher into one’s home was to express one’s approval of his teachings. And since the exercise of hospitality was what enabled preachers to move about with their message it was also a help to them in spreading their teachings. So if anyone does not bring this teaching (i.e. the teaching that Jesus Christ is God incarnate) he is not to be received. 11 John spells out the reason: to welcome such a teacher is to share in his wicked work. The Christian is not to countenance evil of any sort.

12–13 Conclusion

12 The elder makes it clear that the reason for ending his letter at this point is not that he has run out of subject-matter. On the contrary he says, I have much to write to you. But he prefers talking to writing. So, having written what is most important, he lays down his pen and saves the rest of his news until he meets his friends. I do not want to use paper and ink is an unusual expression but the meaning is clear enough. Face to face is lit. ‘mouth to mouth’; the Greek is vivid. Our joy links the interests of writer and readers. 13 The letter ends with greetings in the normal manner. The reference to children is appropriate in a letter to a church; it would then mean ‘church members’. But it is not impossible that it signifies ‘members of a family’; after all, that is a normal way of using the word.

3 JOHN

Commentary

1 Salutation

As in 2 John, the writer calls himself simply the elder. The addressee is my dear friend Gaius (more literally, ‘Gaius the beloved’; Brown, Epistles of John p. 702, argues that ‘dear’ is too colourless for agapētos). The name was a common one and it occurs a number of times in the NT (e.g. Acts 19:29; Rom. 16:23). Nothing more is known of this Gaius, but it appears from the letter that he had a position of leadership in the local church. Four times in this letter John refers to him as ‘beloved’, and here he also says of him, whom I love in the truth. Clearly the elder had a deep affection for this man. An important note in this little letter is truth, which occurs six times. As in the other letters it is probably connected with the truth of the gospel, the truth that we see in Christ (cf. v 8).

2–4 Following the truth

2 It was customary in first-century letters to begin with a little prayer. Now John prays that Gaius’s health and his affairs may prosper in the same way as his soul does. 3 The source of his knowledge of his friend’s circumstances was a visit by some brothers who had told him about your faithfulness to the truth. More literally this means ‘testified to the truth of you’ which may signify that Gaius both knew and held fast to the truth. That Gaius was walking in the truth (cf. 2 Jn. 4) means that he was making progress in the truth and this gave the elder great joy. 4 Indeed he has no greater joy than to hear that his children are walking in the truth. My children means ‘my children in the faith’, ‘those converted through my ministry’. It can mean the congregation over which the user of the expression is pastor, but as he is writing to Gaius who was evidently at a distance that does not appear to be the meaning here. It is the greatest of joys to the elder to know that his converts are making progress in the faith.

5–8 Hospitality

5 The subject-matter of the letter (as opposed to the preliminaries) begins here. It affords a little glimpse into a custom of the early church whereby a Christian travelling in the interests of the gospel would look for hospitality from the local Christians in the community he was visiting. Few preachers would have been wealthy enough to stay at inns, and in any case inns often had a bad reputation. It must have meant a great deal for the spread of the faith that preachers could obtain ready lodgings as they travelled for the gospel. John commends Gaius for his hospitality. You are faithful may mean ‘you show a fine loyalty’ (REB), i.e. you are loyal to your fellow-believers; or the emphasis may be on faith, ‘your action accords well with the Christian faith’. What you are doing for the brothers is not specific, but the following verse shows that it is hospitality that is in mind. Even though they are strangers to you makes it clear that Gaius had provided for the needs of visiting believers who were neither friends nor relatives. It is a little glimpse of the early church at work.

6 Those who had received the hospitality have told the church about your love, so that Gaius's good deeds were widely known. John commends his practice and encourages him to continue: You will do well to send them on their way, which seems to indicate that hospitality included making some provision for the forward journey. The Didache, an early church manual, provides that such a preacher should be given food to enable him to reach his next night's lodging (it adds that if he asks for money 'he is a false prophet'; Didache, 11:3). It is some such practice that is in view here. In a manner worthy of God sets the highest of standards before Gaius; it is God who is the standard, not his servants (cf. Jn. 13:20). 7 It was for the sake of the Name that the wandering preachers went out. There is no need to say whose name is meant; clearly it is the name that is above all other names (Phil. 2:9). They went out receiving no help from the pagans. To do this might well have compromised their message and they would not do it. That made them all the more dependent on people like Gaius. This does not mean that a Christian may never accept help from a well-disposed unbeliever; Jesus himself on occasion dined with Pharisees who did not believe in him (e.g. Lk. 7:36). It means that we should not rely on it. Christian work must be financed by Christian people. 8 There is consequently an obligation (we ought is 'we owe it') resting on believers to show hospitality to such men. So that denotes purpose. The duty in question is not merely an exercise in hospitality, but is done in order to set forward the divine purpose that believers work together for the truth.

9–12 Diotrephes and Demetrius

9 Diotrephes was clearly a man with authority, and apparently ambitious for more, though exactly what his position was is not clear. He took the line opposite to that of Gaius and hindered both the elder and the preachers. John had written to the church (he says he had written 'something' but the NIV omits the word), but unfortunately we do not know what it was. Diotrephes had evidently prevented the church from getting the letter. Moreover he clearly had enmity towards the elder for he will have nothing to do with us (Gk. 'does not receive us'). 10 Diotrephes had slandered the elder, gossiping maliciously about us. He added deeds to his words, for he refuses to welcome (the tense denotes the continuing practice) the brothers. But he went further by refusing to allow others to welcome them. There are two counts: the first is that he stops those who want to do so and the second that he puts them out of the church. Clearly he held an important position to be able to do this, and equally clearly his opposition to the preachers was implacable. It is possible that, as a local leader of the church, he resented travelling preachers who owed no loyalty to the local church in which he held office.

11 John uses this bad example to impress a lesson on Gaius, whom he calls 'beloved' (NIV, Dear friend) for the fourth time in this short letter. He exhorts his friend not to imitate what is evil but what is good. Imitation is a natural part of life and we all do it, but it is important that we choose the right models. John insists that his friend should imitate what is good. Anyone who does good is from God, from whom, of course, all good originates. When anyone does evil (Diotrephes?) he has not seen God. 12 Demetrius is introduced without explanation, which suggests that he was well known. It has been conjectured that he was one of the travelling missionaries and that he was the bearer of this letter. Both are possible, but of course we do not know. Demetrius was also well spoken of by everyone so that he had a good reputation throughout the church. There is more of a problem with the addition by the truth itself. This unusual and difficult expression apparently means that this man's conduct squares with the gospel, so that the truth of the gospel is declared in his life. We also speak well of him may be the elder's way of saying that he himself declares his approval of the man. But it is also possible that he associates others with himself, though if so we have no way of knowing who they were. But there is no doubting that he expresses his warm approval of Demetrius and makes it clear that he has his strong support.

13–15 Conclusion

13 John closes this third letter as he did the second by saying he has much to write but prefers to wait until he sees his friend. He uses the past tense. ‘I had much to write’ (the NIV changes it to the present, I have much), and replaces the ‘paper and ink’ of the second letter with pen and ink. There seems no difference of meaning. 14 Similarly, his wish to see his friend and to talk face to face is the same as in the previous letter. 15 Peace was a common word of greeting both on meeting and leaving friends. It is particularly appropriate in a situation where Diotrephes was stirring up strife. It is a little prayer that God’s peace will surround them. Peace is not, as with us, a negative term meaning the absence of war and conflict, but rather a positive term invoking the blessing of God. John passes on greetings from the friends who were with him and asks Gaius to greet the friends, which was evidently precise enough for Gaius to know who were meant (the NIV tries to help us by inserting there). By name makes it personal. Though the elder does not list the names of all his friends who were with Gaius he wants each of them to know that the greeting is personal. Each is to be singled out by name.

Leon Morris

JUDE

Introduction

Who wrote the letter?

The letter opens with the bare facts about the writer. He is by name, Jude; by birth, brother of James; and by calling, a servant of Jesus Christ. Tradition has ascribed the letter to Jude, the brother of Jesus, mentioned in Mt. 13:55 and Mk. 6:3. This would have been a younger son of Mary, born to her and Joseph, together with James, Joseph and Simon. Some have argued that he was an older son of Joseph by a former marriage. Jesus’ brothers refused to believe in him during his lifetime (Jn. 7:5), but James was later converted, possibly through a post-resurrection appearance of Jesus (1 Cor. 15:7). Subsequently, he became a leader in the Jerusalem church (Acts 12:17). This James has also been traditionally regarded as the author of the NT letter of James and in view of his eminence it would be natural for Jude to refer to himself in this way as James’ brother. The two may be referred to together in 1 Cor. 9:5.

It has been suggested that the writer could have been Jude the apostle, the ‘Jude of James’ as the Greek of Lk. 6:16 and Acts 1:13 describes him (the Thaddaeus [Lebbaeus] of Mt. 10:4 and Mk. 3:18). Two difficulties with this view are that an apostle would hardly have written v 17 and normal Greek usage requires the word to be supplied in Lk. 6:16 to be ‘son’ rather than ‘brother’.

The theory that Jude is a pseudepigraph (see the Introduction to 2 Peter) has been put forward, but if that were the case one would have expected that the writer would have chosen a less obscure personage after whom to name the letter or, in claiming Jude, he would have used the relationship with Jesus to gain acceptance for his writing. The humility which avoided this description must be regarded as a mark of genuineness, matched by his more eminent brother (Jas. 1:1).

Where and when was the letter written?

Jude gives us no evidence, nor even clues, as to where he was at the time of writing. We know from 1 Cor. 9:5 that the Lord’s brothers traveled around in the service of the gospel, and so any suggestion can only be speculative.

Comparison of this letter with 2 Peter quickly reveals that much of it (vs 4–19) is paralleled in that letter (2:1–19). (See the Introduction to 2 Peter and comparisons in the Commentary.) It is interesting that Jude refers to apocryphal as well as biblical illustrations of those who wander from God’s way and oppose him (vs 5, 7, 9, 11, 14). Peter restricts his references to biblical incidents (2 Pet. 2:5, 6, 7, 15, 16).

Some who question the traditional authorship do so on the grounds that the letter itself bears the marks of having been written at a late date. Vs 17–18 speak of the apostles as if their generation had already died out, although the recipients of the letter would appear to have been instructed by them. V 3 suggests that the faith was already becoming a systematic body of doctrine.

Neither of these arguments is conclusive, and if we are prepared to accept Jude the younger brother of the Lord as the author then we can date the letter within his assumed lifetime. Eusebius relates a story from Hegesippus about Jude’s grandsons being brought before Domitian when the latter was Roman Emperor (AD 81–96). He also says that they were bishops in the time of Trajan (AD 98–117), and this would make it reasonable for their grandfather to have still been alive well into the latter part of the first century. Bearing in mind the arguments for the priority of 2 Peter (see the Introduction to that letter), it would have been perfectly possible for Jude to have written this letter in the late sixties of the first century. Some argue that the absence of a reference to the fall of Jerusalem in v 5, where it could have been relevant, points to a date before AD 70.

To whom was the letter written and what is it about?

Again, Jude gives no clues as to where his original readers lived, or who they were, apart from the fact that they were Christian people (1) and dear friends (3, 17, 20). V 3 suggests that he had intended to write a more formal statement on doctrine and Christian living (more like 1 Peter?). Instead, the appearance and spread of false teaching had led him to respond by writing a warning of the consequences of following those who propagate heretical ideas and a call to hold fast to the apostolic faith.

A feature of the letter is that it makes use of Jewish apocryphal literature, and is unique among the NT books in doing so. Some argue from this that Jude must have been writing for a Jewish readership, but the quotations would spring from the writer's background which need not be that of his readers. Jude's quotations from the Assumption of Moses and the Book of Enoch in vs 9 and 15, and possibly other apocryphal works in vs 6 and 8, brought this letter under suspicion when the church was drawing up its canon (or list of books to be included in the NT). A high doctrine of inspiration does not, however, preclude the biblical writers from quoting from sources outside the Bible. Paul himself does this in 1 Cor. 10:7; 2 Tim. 3:8 and Tit. 1:12 (cf. Acts 17:28). While some queried the letter before accepting it into the canon, quotations from early writers show that it was in use in the church at least from early in the second century. (See the article on Apocrypha and Apocalyptic.)

What is Jude's message to us?

Like us, Jude lived in an age which preferred toleration to truth, and regarded all religions as equally valid aspects of the quest for a supreme being. So he gives a call to stand up for a faith which is both unique and revealed (3–4). He does this in four ways:

1. He exposes the danger, the fruitlessness and the final destiny of false teachers (5–16).
2. He urges God's people to go on growing in their Christian faith and its expression (20–21).
3. He reassures them of God's sure purposes (24).
4. He calls them to lose no opportunity for evangelism (22–23).

These directions are as helpful for today's Christian as they were for Jude's original readers. See also the article Reading the letters.

Further reading

- J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and Jude, BNTC (A. and C. Black, 1969).
C. E. B. Cranfield, 1 and 2 Peter and Jude, TBC (SCM, 1960).
E. M. B. Green, 2 Peter and Jude, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1968).
R. Bauckham, Jude and 2 Peter, WBC (Word, 1983).

Outline of contents

1–2	Opening address and greeting
3–4	Challenge to hold firm to the faith
5–7	Reminders of God's punishment of past disobedience

8–13	Denunciation of false teachers
14–16	The relevance of Enoch’s prophecy
17–23	The Christian antidote
24–25	Closing commendation and ascription of praise

Commentary

1–2 Opening address and greeting

The writer introduces himself in traditional fashion, describes those to whom he is writing, and prays for their spiritual growth.

1 Servant (Gk. doulos) means ‘a bond-slave’ and Jude is, therefore, a true ‘brother’ of Jesus according to Mark (Mk. 3:35). James (Jas. 1:1) and Peter (2 Pet. 1:1) also use the title. Called ... loved ... kept introduces a feature of this letter: groups of three words together. This description emphasizes how much salvation is entirely of God. It is the result of his sovereignty, his love and his power, and its scope reaches from eternity, through time, back to eternity (see Rom. 8:30; 1 Pet. 1:3–5). Some versions read sanctified, which has less MS authority than loved. Kept by Jesus Christ could be translated for or in (see the NIV mg.) and each alternative gives a different slant (cf. 1 Pet. 1:5). 2 Mercy, peace and love is a unique benediction in the NT and more fulsome than in other letters. It could be a link with the triad of v 1 (God’s call brings mercy, his love surrounds his people and his keeping power brings peace). Or it could be read as a Trinitarian formula (God the Father brings mercy, the Son effects peace and the Spirit gives love). Yours in abundance is also the prayer in 1 Pet. 1:2 and 2 Pet. 1:2.

3–4 Challenge to hold firm to the faith

Jude gives his reasons for writing as enthusiasm to write about the salvation we share and concern that we should stand up for the uniqueness of the faith.

This is especially appropriate today for Christians in a multi-faith society, faced with the subtle infiltrations of so-called New Age teaching. Jude is alarmed at the two effects of false teachers: they have made the grace of God an excuse for ‘permissiveness’ and they have denied the uniqueness of Christ and his salvation.

3 Dear friends reflects Jude’s pastoral affection for his readers and the mention of the salvation we share puts him on the same footing as them before God (see the same word in Tit. 1:4). It also emphasizes that this salvation is open to all. Contend implies a strenuous effort. The word is used of participants in athletic contests. Mental effort is needed to understand and teach the word of God aright and moral effort is need to apply that understanding to everyday behaviour (1 Pet. 1:13–16; 2 Pet. 1:5–9). The faith here implies a recognized body of teaching, such as we know emerged from Peter’s early sermons and began to crystallize in such expressions as 1 Cor. 11:23–26; 15:3–8; 1 Tim. 1:15 and 3:16. Once for all underlines the finality of God’s revelation in Christ.

4 The allusion to the condemnation of certain men being written about (see the NIV mg.) could have the idea of their names being listed in heavenly books (Lk. 10:20; Rev. 20:12). This condemnation is what Jude goes on to describe. Long ago could mean ‘already’ (as in Mk. 15:44), in which case Jude could be referring to 2 Pet. 2:3. Alternatively, it could refer to the general denunciation of evildoers in the OT. Their teaching, which amounts to a licence for immorality, has the same end as that referred to in 2 Pet. 2; Paul answers the arguments they would have used in Rom. 6 and 7. To make a Christian profession and contradict or deny it by one’s behaviour shows no understanding of what it means to call Jesus Sovereign and Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 6:19–20). The translation could be ‘the only Master and our Lord Jesus Christ’ (as the RSV mg.), as the word for Master (Gk. despotēs) normally refers to the Father. An exception to this in 2 Pet. 2:1 (where it refers to the Son) may support a similar use here. If it refers to the Father, 1 Pet. 1:17 shows that belief in God the Father demands holiness of life.

5–7 Reminders of God’s punishment of past disobedience

Jude backs his argument with three examples which show that status by itself is no guarantee of salvation. First, Israel was delivered from Egypt, but unbelievers died in the wilderness. Secondly, angels have a special calling from God yet those who were disobedient met sure punishment. Thirdly, Sodom and Gomorrah (see 2 Pet. 2:6–8) were cities of the promised land, with God’s servants in them, and yet they were destroyed because of the pervading immorality there.

5 Though you already know all this presumably refers to catechetical instruction given prior to baptism. As the NIV mg. shows there are three variant readings of the Lord. One MS omits any noun as the subject, leaving us to supply one from the end of the previous verse. Most have ‘the Lord’ and this fits in best with OT usage. A few, however, including two ancient MSS, read Jesus which some suggest could refer to Joshua (Heb. form of Jesus). As the same person has to be the subject in v 6 it seems best to accept the reading ‘the Lord’. Later is lit. ‘the second time’. Ex. 6:9 has been suggested as the first occasion of unbelief. However, as the sense and order make this word go better with ‘destroyed’, it is preferable to take it as the NIV translation. Otherwise it could refer to the flood (mentioned in 2 Peter) as the first occasion of God’s punishment. 1 Cor. 10:1–11 is an instructive allusion to this incident.

6 Angels may be a reference to Gn. 6:1–4. This incident was described more elaborately in certain apocryphal books to which Jude refers (see the parallel in 2 Pet. 2:4). The angels’ home was in heaven except when despatched to earth on divine business. Sin led them to want to settle on earth (Gn. 6). For more on darkness and everlasting chains see on 2 Pet. 2:4. 7 Gave themselves up to sexual immorality and perversion is lit. ‘indulged in sexual immorality and went after strange flesh'. This may link with the reference in v 6 to Gn. 6 because the sin of the men of Sodom (Gn. 18:20) reached its peak when they sought intercourse with the two angels sent to Lot (Gn. 19:5). Punishment of eternal fire is what Jesus taught in Mt. 18:8; 25:41 and Mk. 9:48.

8–13 Denunciation of false teachers

Jude now turns from examples from the past to the false teachers of the present, and shows that they are following the same dangerous paths. The Israelites polluted their bodies, the angels rejected authority and the people of Sodom and Gomorrah slandered celestial beings. This last act is something even Michael did not do when he had justification. He preferred to leave God to deal with them. Such false teachers may mock the things they do not understand but they understand enough to be responsible for their own ruin. So Jude again pronounces their doom, for they follow three bad precedents: Cain, who showed no respect for his brother, who was made in God's image; Balaam, who led Israel astray for personal gain; and Korah, who rejected God's authority exercised through Moses.

So they are blamed for spoiling Christian fellowship by their brazen attendance, being false pastors concerned only for themselves, failing to produce what they promise—like rainless clouds or fruitless trees, being lawless as storm-tossed seas, producing only their own jetsam and being wandering stars, giving no clear guidance and so doomed to lose their function. Much of this denunciation reminds us of Peter's words in 2 Pet. 2:10–17.

8 In the very same way expresses the surprise that, in spite of God's clear punishment of such evildoers in the past, these men have still dared to follow their ungodly examples. Dreamers suggests that they may have claimed to receive some of their teachings through visions. Pollute, reject and slander set out the three basic charges against them (see above). Authority (Gk. kyriotēs) probably refers to God's authority (kyrios is 'Lord'). Celestial beings (as in 2 Pet. 2:10) is used for 'angels'. 9 Archangel is a word found only here and in 1 Thes. 4:16 in the NT. Michael is known from the book of Daniel (10:13, 21; 12:1) and Rev. 12:7 as the leader of the heavenly host. The apocryphal Assumption of Moses tells how Michael was sent to bury Moses. The devil opposed him, claiming that the body, as a material object, belonged to him. Even here Michael simply responded with the words of Zc. 3:2, and so his behaviour contrasts strongly with that of the false teachers. 10 Whatever they do not understand could refer to the celestial beings of v 8 or more widely to the spiritual dimension of life. By instinct means in a natural or physical way. Having no time for spiritual things, they limit their knowledge to the physical world. Thus they find their downfall, as they then allow the physical side to dominate them, just like animals.

11 Cain, Balaam and Korah (cf. Gn. 4:1–16; Nu. 16; 22–24) are classic examples of the disastrous effects of jealousy, greed and pride. The contemporary descendants of this trio are jealous of the Christian progress of others, and so seek to turn them aside to immorality (and so murder them spiritually). They are so keen to gain from teaching what people will pay to be told that they readily persuade them to immorality (cf. Nu. 25:1–9; 31:16 and 2 Pet. 2:15), and so great is their pride that they cannot bear to be told of any power (or knowledge) greater than their own.

12 Blemishes (see 2 Pet. 2:13) is perhaps better translated 'hidden rocks' (J. B. Phillips has 'menaces'). Love feasts were regularly held with the Lord's Supper in the early church, and 1 Cor. 11:20–22 shows that even in early times they could be occasions for behaviour inconsistent with Christian love. The hallmark of these false pastors (shepherds) is that they use their position to further their own selfish ends, and not to feed the flock (cf. Ezk. 34:2–10; Jn. 21:15–17; 1 Pet. 5:2). Trees which have no fruit at harvest time have failed to fulfil the function for which they exist (cf. Mt. 7:15–20; Mk. 11:12–14). Uprooted is a picture of judgment (cf. Ps. 52:5; Je. 1:10; Mt. 3:10). These men are twice dead because they have tasted spiritual life (as well as physical life) and rejected it (cf. Heb. 6:4–8; 10:26–31; 2 Pet. 2:20–22). 13 Wild waves suggests the restlessness of the tide, which, after all its noise and fuss, only leaves a deposit of scum and rubbish on the shore (cf. Is. 57:20). Wandering stars is another reference to the Book of Enoch, which describes stars which have transgressed as being bound together in prison. Some take this to refer to the planets (wandering is Gk. planētai), whose movements were misunderstood by Jude and his contemporaries; others to the shooting stars which appear briefly to give light and then fall out into darkness. The thought seems to be that of Lk. 6:39—those who claim to be guides are themselves off course. On blackest darkness see on 2 Pet. 2:4, 17.

14–16 The relevance of Enoch’s prophecy

Jude draws his denunciation to a climax by quoting the prophecy attributed to Enoch in order to confirm the impending and certain punishment of these men, and he rounds it off with further well-chosen words.

14 The description of Enoch as being the seventh from Adam (cf. Gn. 5:1–18) occurs in the Book of Enoch, as does the quotation which follows. This book was well known in NT days and so the reference is relevant (see the Introduction for a discussion on Jude’s use of apocryphal literature). The Lord is God himself, and the thousands upon thousands of his holy ones are the angels (cf. Dt. 33:2; Zc. 14:5). For the Christian the words refer to Christ’s second coming with his angels (Mt. 25:31; 2 Thes. 1:7). 15 Ungodly takes up and repeats (four times) the word used in v 4 to describe these people—it refers to them, their character and their behaviour, all of which stem from an insolent attitude which has no respect for God. 16 They are grumblers against God and his ways (cf. Ex. 16:2–12; 17:3; 1 Cor. 10:10). This behaviour was characteristic of Israel in the wilderness.

Fault-finders means lit. ‘those blaming their lot’. These people are dissatisfied with God’s ways of truth and justice because they want to fulfil their evil desires. They boast about themselves when they have no reason or right to do so (the same word is used in 2 Pet. 2:18) and they flatter others (lit. ‘admire appearances’) simply for what they can get in return. Such behaviour is different from God’s (Acts 10:34; Jas. 2:1–7).

17–23 The Christian antidote

By contrast, Christians are charged to keep in mind the apostolic warning, especially as these people bring in divisions. The positive way to avoid them and their effect is by Christian growth in the life of faith, prayer in the Spirit, abiding in God’s love, looking for the completion of God’s work in us and reaching out to others with evangelistic zeal.

17 But contrasts with the behaviour of the ungodly (see on v 15 above). Remember is also the theme of 2 Peter (1:12–14; 3:2) as well v 5 above. The presence of ‘scoffers’ (cf. 2 Pet. 3:3) was foretold in Acts 20:29–30; 1 Tim. 4:1–3; 2 Tim. 3:1–9 and cf. Mt. 24:23–25. 18 Said can refer to writings and need not imply that Jude’s readers had actually heard the apostles. The last times (cf. 1 Pet. 1:20) is the period between the ascension and the return of Christ. There may be an apostolic saying not elsewhere recorded behind both these verses. 2 Pet. 3:4 suggests the content of their mockery. 19 They divide the church by setting themselves up as superior to ordinary Christians, as the Gnostics did, dividing the church into 'spiritual' and 'worldly' members. This is a tendency not unheard of today. In actual fact, says Jude, they themselves are the worldly ones, since they do not possess the Spirit, as is evidenced by their lack of his fruit. On follow ... natural instincts (being worldly-minded) see 1 Cor. 2:14–16. 20 The opening words of v 17 are repeated for emphasis. Most holy faith refers, as in v 3, to the content of the Christian revelation. It is most holy as it is given by God and, rightly applied, leads to holy living. In the Holy Spirit refers to the experience of abiding in communion with God through Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit (see Rom. 8:9, 16, 26; Eph. 6:18).

21 Keep yourselves in God's love complements what was said of their position in v 1. Once people have realized that they are the unworthy objects of the love of God in Jesus Christ they are challenged to respond in love. That love must be shown in behaviour. Jn. 15:9–10 shows that such response is the way to remain in the consciousness of God's love. Not to do this will deaden the heart to God's love and will result finally in the loss of this consciousness. Wait for the mercy: error is best avoided by a keen sense of expectation of the Lord's return, when his mercy, already experienced initially (1) and daily (2; cf. La. 3:22–23) will be finally realized as the work of salvation is completed. Tit. 2:11–14; 1 Pet. 4:7 and 2 Pet. 3:11–12 lay similar stress on the advent hope as a motive for godly living.

22–23 In case the reader should think from the last two verses that true faith is simply quietism, nourishing one's own spiritual life, Jude here turns to our responsibility for others. The text here is in doubt, and there may be two or three groups of people in mind: (a) those who are in two minds about the false teaching (some readings suggest they are to be won by arguments); (b) those more deeply involved with heresy, whose position is so serious that they must be snatched as from a fire (see Zc. 3:2, already quoted in v 9, and Am. 4:11); and (c) those who can only be pitied in the spirit of the fear of God which acknowledges that 'there, but for the grace of God, go I'.

The NEB and J. B. Phillips understand there to be two groups while the RSV and NIV understand three. Clothing suggests the contaminating effect of their sin. Like the leper whose clothing was polluted by the disease (Lv. 13:34; 14:8), they are to be seen as a source of pollution and therefore shunned.

24–25 Closing commendation and ascription of praise

After these sad possibilities of error and apostasy, Jude ends on the positive note of pointing his readers to God and what he can do for us. His goal is to keep [us] from falling to the end of time and present us without fault with great joy into eternity. In view of this Jude ascribes all glory and might here and now to the God our Saviour whose praises his ransomed people will be singing through all eternity.

24 Keep: see 1 Pet. 1:5. From falling is the same root as the verb in 2 Pet. 1:10 where we are shown how this is to be achieved. Present is a formal word suggesting introduction to a dignitary. Without fault is used in 1 Pet. 1:19. The Christian, now completely sanctified, can be identified fully with the character of our glorious Saviour. Joy is an intensive word, the verbal form being especially dear to Peter (1 Pet. 1:6, 8; 4:13). 25 Only God may suggest that the false teachers were already portraying a hierarchy of gods and demi-gods, as the later Gnostics did, or it may be to emphasize that our salvation is the work of God alone. Of the four qualities ascribed to God, glory stresses his splendour, as the radiance of light (cf. the description of heaven in Rev. 21:23; 22:5), majesty, his position (cf. Heb. 1:3), power, his ability to carry out his sovereign will, and authority, the fact that he has the absolute right to do so. These qualities have always been his, and always will be, for they are the very qualities of eternity by which he created our world of space and time. Through Jesus Christ could refer back to God our Saviour (the words are closer in the Greek), reminding us that only through Jesus has God saved us (Acts 4:12), or that our praises are to be through Jesus (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5; 4:11). To such a vision of the Almighty God the believing soul can only breathe in response a humble yet fervent Amen—so be it!

David H. Wheaton

REVELATION

Introduction

The nature of the book

Discussion on Revelation has often been dominated by four traditional modes of approaching it. The so-called ‘Preterite’ method relates the book solely to the circumstances of the writer’s age and discounts applications to future developments of history. The ‘Futurist’ view, by contrast, relates the book solely to the last generation of history, when its prophecies will find fulfilment. The ‘Historical’ interpretation sees Revelation as an outline of the ages between the incarnation of Christ and his final coming. The ‘Symbolic’ or ‘Poetic’ view emphasizes the pictorial element in the book and declines to make specific application of the prophecies to any one era; it views the book as revealing the general principles of God’s work in history.

These modes of interpreting Revelation are all unsatisfactory. No-one would dream of applying them to the prophetic works of the OT. It is because Revelation has been interpreted in isolation from the rest of the biblical books, and from other works of a similar literary type outside the Bible, that it has been possible to treat it in this manner. The introduction to the book itself indicates that it belongs to three kinds of literary works, namely apocalypse, prophecy and letter (see the appropriate general articles in this commentary).

1. Apocalypse. The first word in the book is ‘revelation.’ The Greek term it translates has entered the English language as ‘apocalypse’. To modern readers that conveys a quite special meaning, even having menacing overtones. In the author’s day it simply meant the removal of a cover from something hidden, and so an unveiling of that which is concealed, as when a portrait is unveiled by pulling back a curtain (or even doing the same to reveal a stage on which a drama is about to be played). The term has become virtually a technical term for a class of writings, mainly Jewish, which appeared during the two centuries prior to the birth of Christ and continued through the first Christian century. Their chief concern was to reveal God’s purpose in history, notably in bringing judgment on the wicked of the earth and his kingdom for the righteous. There is little doubt that the model for these works was the book of Daniel. Its style was imitated in them, and they were usually issued in the name of a famous saint (e.g. the three books ascribed to Enoch, an Apocalypse of Abraham, the Assumption of Moses, Apocalypse of Elijah, Apocalypse of Ezra, etc.).

These books freely use symbols to set forth their messages, though none of them to the extent that the Revelation of John does. Some of the symbols became standard, like the monster of the ocean to denote oppressive political powers, which appears in various guises in Dn. 7 and in Rev. 11:7, and chs. 13 and 17. The closest modern parallel to these figures and their use is the representation of nations and their leaders in political cartoons. A further characteristic feature of apocalypses is their frequent employment of earlier prophecies, both from the OT and later works. This was due not to lack of originality but to the conviction that God's word had yet further fulfilment, and so the apocalyptic writers combined earlier prophetic oracles, rewrote them and applied them to situations in their own times. This is done by John frequently, both in fresh usage of OT prophecies and in applying in a wholly new way prophecies of his contemporaries (see e.g. chs. 7, 11, 12).

2. Prophecy. The second sentence of Revelation invokes a blessing on the one who reads and on those who hear and give heed to 'the words of this prophecy.' John thereby numbers himself with the prophets of the OT and also of the new covenant (cf. Eph. 2:20). It is generally recognized that the former addressed their contemporaries in relation to their own situation, i.e. they gave God's word for their own day. The uniqueness of their ministry lay in the way they set their people in the context of God's dealings with them in the past and in the light of God's purpose for them in the future. Prophecy in the NT can be described as the words of Spirit-guided preachers for the world, and the church through which God's revealed purpose for the world and his will for humankind are revealed. That would be an adequate description of Revelation. It conveys the assurance that the opposition of human beings and of all the powers of evil cannot frustrate God's purpose for the world that he has made, and in the light of this the call goes out for persistence in faith and obedience to the Lord on the part of his people.

3. Letter. The introductory paragraph of John's book is followed by a typical greeting such as we find in the letters of the NT: 'John, To the seven churches in the province of Asia: Grace and peace to you ...'. Strangely, it has not been commonly recognized that Revelation is fundamentally a 'letter' addressed to churches for which John was concerned and for which he had special responsibility. The implications of this fact are clear: the book was as truly directed to the situation and needs of the churches mentioned in its greeting as, for example, Paul's letter to the church in Colosse (which lay in the neighbourhood of the seven churches of Revelation), or the letter to the Galatian churches (which were not far east of them). All Christians agree that the letters to the Colossians, Galatians and Romans convey the word of God to Christ's people in all subsequent ages, but the messages of those letters reach us most effectively as we grasp their intention for the churches to which they were originally addressed. That holds good for the Revelation of John equally as for the rest of the NT letters. It is only as we relate its pictorial unveiling of God's word to the situation of the seven churches of Asia Minor that we can understand the revelation for the churches of all generations, including the last generation of history.

The setting of Revelation

It is likely that the tradition, current in the early church, is correct, that the book was written towards the close of the first century of our era, when the emperor Domitian was commencing his persecution of the church. It is unlikely that the persecution had been long under way, for current martyrdoms had as yet been few (2:13). But the fact that John had been exiled to a penal island reflects a beginning of active opposition to the Christian church on the part of the authorities. Domitian was more insistent on pressing his claims to divinity than any of his predecessors; his favourite title was Dominus et Deus noster ('our Lord and God'). Nowhere in the empire were there more enthusiastic supporters of such adulation of the emperor than the priests of the shrines devoted to his worship in Roman Asia. But no Christian who acknowledged Jesus as Lord and God could possibly assent to such an acknowledgment of the emperor. In this situation John was given to see the principles at work and their issue in an antichrist who would proclaim war on the only group in the world who would resist him to the death. The end, however, was to be the victory of the Christ of God over the satanic imitation, and the kingdom of the world becoming the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ (11:15). It is in this setting that the symbols and the parabolic visions yield their meaning and their message is grasped.

The purpose of Revelation

This is summed up in the saying of E. F. Scott, who called Revelation 'a trumpet call to faith' (The Book of Revelation [SCM, 1939], p. 174). The book was written to strengthen the faith and courage of John's fellow-believers in Christ, to nerve them for battle with antichristian forces in the world, and to help them bear witness to the one true Lord and Saviour of the world. This end was achieved by emphasizing the following themes:

1. The sovereignty of God in Christ, in that time as in all times. Just as Jesus made known the advent of the kingdom of God in his ministry, death, resurrection and coming again (Mk. 1:14–15; 8:31; 10:45; 14:62), so that theme is central to Revelation from beginning to end (1:8; 5:5–14; 12:10–12; 19:11–21:5). No wonder, for the book is none other than 'the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ' (1:2)!

2. The satanic nature of the contemporary adulation of the Roman emperor. In Rome itself the claim of the emperor to be 'Lord and God' was something of a joke—privately, of course! In the area of the churches to which Revelation was addressed it was taken with deadly seriousness. For Caesar to demand what belonged to God alone indicated that 'the secret power of lawlessness' was 'already at work' (2 Thes. 2:7), and it was to reach its climax in the manifestation of the final antichrist. Even so, God is never more sovereign than in the frantic reign of antichrist (13:5).

3. The inescapable judgments of the Lord upon those who submit to the pseudo-Christ rather than God's Christ. It is significant that the second and third series of the Messianic judgments of this book are reminiscent of the plagues on Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who resisted the word of God through Moses. Revelation bids us 'consider the kindness and sternness of God' (Rom. 11:22).

4. The sure issue of the conflict between the church and the oppressive powers in the world in the manifestation of Christ and the glory of his kingdom. The victory is 'sure', for the devil is a defeated foe already in the death and resurrection of Jesus (cf. Jn. 12:31–32 with Rev. 12:9–12), which anticipates the ultimate completion of God's purpose of good for the world he has made and redeemed (21:9–22:5).

Reading Revelation today

The four issues discussed above have characterized history from the first century of our era to the present, and doubtless will continue to do so till the Lord comes. It is significant, however, that the last two thirds of the twentieth century have been characterized by two contrasting phenomena. On the one hand, the most intense opposition to the gospel and the church since the writing of the book of Revelation and on the other, an unprecedented spread of the gospel and growth of the church. The former has been directed by antichristian secular powers, claiming as theirs what belongs to God alone and launching untold suffering on the world through oppression and wars; the latter advancing perpetually, often in spite of cruel opposition, suffering and poverty. The collapse of many political powers opposed to the gospel illustrates the reality of the sovereignty of God in the contemporary world. The changing patterns of opposition to the gospel and the confused political situation of old and new worlds, with increasing rather than diminishing suffering of multitudes, calls for Christian witness to the gospel of the order of Rev. 11:3–11; 12:11 and 14:2–7, and faith to believe in the song of Moses and the Lamb (15:3–4). Not for nothing has the book of Revelation been the favourite book of the Bible for Christians under oppression in our time. The ‘trumpet call to faith’ inspires endurance in the kingdom of God living in the spirit of Christ’s bearing his cross and the power of his resurrection, and in the light of the revelation of the kingdom of glory at his coming.

The authorship of Revelation

The author announces himself in the opening sentence of the book as ‘his [God’s] servant John’. He frequently refers to himself in the work, most commonly as a prophet (1:2–3, 9–11; 10:11; 19:10; 22:8–9) but never as an apostle. In this respect he differs markedly from Paul (cf. e.g. Rom. 1:1; 11:13; 1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 1:1; Gal. 1:1). From the latter part of the second century it was assumed that the fourth gospel, the letters of John and Revelation were written by one man, John the son of Zebedee. There are, however, difficulties in this assumption, which were recognized from early times. Dionysius, Bishop of Alexandria in the third century, was especially impressed by the differences in style and language between Revelation and the other works attributed to John. It has been suggested that these differences may be accounted for by the differences in subject matter and nature of Revelation and the fourth gospel; or by the possibility that Revelation was written a generation before the gospel (at the end of Nero’s reign), so giving time for the writer to have improved his style. More plausibly, John may have written the book in his own language (Aramaic), and someone else translated it into very literal Greek out of reverence for its content. If that were the case, the linguistic differences would fall to the ground. On the other hand, if, as some think, John the prophet thought in Aramaic and wrote in Greek, the differences would be insuperable, for that was not so with the author of the gospel and the letters.

Interestingly, the glimpses in the synoptic gospels of John the son of Zebedee are strikingly consistent with the kind of person who could have written Revelation: he and his brother were named by Jesus ‘Sons of Thunder’ (Mk. 3:17); he forbade one who was not a member of the apostolic group to do miracles (Lk. 9:49–50); he wanted to call down fire from heaven on hostile Samaritans (Lk. 9:52–54); he was a witness of the transfiguration of Jesus and his resurrection. The possible existence of a ‘school of John’, from which issued the various books later ascribed to the apostle, could be of help here, for this would explain the positive relationship between the books and also their differences. If we are unable to achieve certainty in this matter, it remains that in no other book in the Bible is the identity of the author of so little importance. The book is not ‘the revelation of John,’ but ‘the revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him [John]’ (1:1), and its content is further described as ‘the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ’ (1:2). The authenticity of that claim is settled not by the name of the person who wrote it, but by the nature of his work, which in the providence of God completes the Scriptures as its crown.

The structure of Revelation

The book opens with a prologue (1:1–8), stating its title and address, followed by a vision of the Son of Man, in which John is commissioned to write what he sees and to send the book to the seven churches of the Roman province of Asia (1:9–20). Letters to the seven churches then follow (chs. 2–3). A vision of God and the Lamb is recorded (chs. 4–5), which both provides the key to understanding Revelation and forms the fulcrum of its structure inasmuch as it indicates the process of events which lead to the final kingdom of God (chs. 6–19). Prominent among these are three series of judgments, presented under the figures of the opening of seven seals of God’s book of destiny (6:1–8:5), seven trumpets (8:6–11:19), and seven cups of wrath (chs. 15–16). It appears that these three series are not to be viewed as occurring successively, but as basically three presentations of one period of judgment, since the last member of each series leads to the end of history. The outcome of the Messianic judgments is the fall of the godless empire (‘Babylon’) and the advent of Christ (chs. 17–19). The book is brought to a climax in its vision of the triumphant kingdom of God (20:1–22:5), and an epilogue concludes it (22:6–21).

Further reading

- M. Wilcock, The Message of Revelation, BST (IVP, 1975).
L. Morris, The Revelation of St John, TNTC (IVP/UK/Eerdmans, 1969).
F. F. Bruce, The Revelation to John, in G. C. D. Howley, F. F. Bruce and H. L. Ellison (eds.) A Bible Commentary for Today (Pickering and Inglis, 1979).
G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, NCB (Eerdmans, 1974).
R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation, NICNT (Eerdmans, 1977).

Outline of contents

1:1–8

The prologue

1:9–20

The call of John to prophesy

2:1–3:22

The letters to the seven churches

2:1–7

The letter to the church in Ephesus

2:8–11	The letter to the church in Smyrna
2:12–17	The letter to the church in Pergamum
2:18–29	The letter to the church in Thyatira
3:1–6	The letter to the church in Sardis
3:7–13	The letter to the church in Philadelphia
3:14–22	The letter to the church in Laodicea

4:1–5:14

A vision of heaven

4:1–11	The throne in heaven
5:1–14	The scroll and the Lamb

6:1–8:5

The seven seals

6:1–2	The first seal
6:3–4	The second seal
6:5–6	The third seal
6:7–8	The fourth seal
6:9–11	The fifth seal
6:12–17	The sixth seal
7:1–17	An interlude between the sixth and seventh seals

8:1–5 The seventh seal

8:6–11:19

The seven trumpets

8:6–12 The first, second, third and fourth trumpets

8:13–9:21 The fifth trumpet

10:1–11:14 Interlude between the sixth and seventh trumpets

11:15–19 The seventh trumpet

12:1–14:20

The conflict between the church and the powers of evil

12:1–17 The woman, the dragon and the deliverer

13:1–18 The antichrist and his prophet

14:1–20 Oracles of kingdom and judgment

15:1–16:21

The seven cups of wrath

15:1–8 Introduction to the cup judgments

16:1–21 The cup judgments described

17:1–19:10

The reign and ruin of the city of the antichrist

17:1–6 A vision of Babylon in her glory

17:7–18	The vision interpreted: Babylon’s doom
18:1–24	A dirge upon Babylon
19:1–10	Thanksgiving for the judgment of Babylon

19:11–22:5

The revelation of the Christ and of the city of God

19:11–21	The rider on the white horse
20:1–3	The subjugation of the dragon
20:4–6	The millennium
20:7–10	The last insurrection of evil
20:11–15	The last judgment
21:1–8	The new creation
21:9–22:5	The city of God

22:6–21

The epilogue

Commentary

1:1–8 The prologue

Just as the prologue to the Gospel of John serves as a kind of overture to the book, announcing its chief themes and setting the reader in a position to understand the story of Jesus, so the prologue to Revelation serves a like purpose. It, too, declares its chief themes and provides a vantage point from which the reader may rightly interpret the vision that follows.

A revelation may relate to an act of uncovering, or an object uncovered; so here the revelation of Jesus Christ may denote the process of the Lord's revealing the issues of history, or the truth that is revealed. The latter will be primarily in mind, without excluding the former. The revelation has been given to Jesus from God, just as in the gospel the Son speaks only what the Father has given him (Jn 3:34; 8:26). The mediation of an angel is in keeping with the visions of prophets and apocalyptists (cf. Ezk. 8; Dn. 10). The announcement of Christ, God and angel as the source of the revelation entails an extraordinary authority for the teaching of the book. The thought is further emphasized in v 2: Revelation is John's witness to the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ, i.e. the message from God and witness borne by Christ.

The blessing of v 3 is the first of seven contained in the book (see 14:13; 16:15; 19:9; 20:6; 22:7, 14). It declares the 'happiness' of one who reads the Revelation to a congregation and of those who both hear it and take its message to heart. (The Hebrew behind blessed has the sense of 'Oh the happiness of!'.)

Revelation is addressed to the seven churches in the province of Asia (4). The nature of the book as a letter is underscored by the blessing invoked on the churches (4–5). It is a prayer for grace and peace; the former is the characteristic blessing of the new era, the latter of the old covenant; the two together comprise the salvation of the kingdom of God. The blessing is trinitarian, though, like much in Revelation, it has a complex background. The first element of it reflects the name of God revealed to Moses (Ex. 3:14), but as interpreted by contemporary Jews. The Jerusalem Targum on Dt. 32:29 expanded 'I am who I am' as 'I am he who is, and who was, and I am he who will be,' thereby setting forth God as the Lord of all time. Our text modifies that significantly: God is not only Lord of the ages, it is of his nature that he is to come and achieve his purpose. This he does, and will do, through Jesus (the hint of the coming of the Lord at the end of the age is unmistakable). In this context the seven spirits before his throne must denote the Holy Spirit; there is a reminiscence here of Zc. 4:6, 10 (cf. Rev. 5:6) and of the Holy Spirit as the Spirit of the seven churches and therefore of the whole church (cf. Rev. 2:7 etc.). The description of Jesus in v 5 is peculiarly apt for the believers to whom the book was first directed. Jesus was the supreme witness for God, and he died on account of his witness (cf. Mk. 14:62–63; 1 Tim. 6:13, and note that the Greek term for witness has come into English as 'martyr'); the firstborn from the dead indicates that by his resurrection Jesus assumed the first place in the kingdom of God (firstborn = heir) and opened it for all humanity; ruler of the kings of the earth points to his supremacy over the hostile rulers of this world, whose opposition cannot prevent the victory of his kingdom.

The doxology of vs 5–6 reflects a fundamental theme of Revelation, namely the concept of redemption as the second exodus. The first exodus brought about the deliverance of Israel from Egypt's slavery that they might become the covenant people of God at Sinai and the free people of God in the promised land. Their hope was summed up in the belief that the works of 'the first Redeemer' (Moses) would be repeated by 'the second Redeemer' (the Messiah). This hope God brought to pass through Jesus by his death and resurrection and will complete it through his future coming. The Redeemer loves us—eternally, freed us from our sins—once for all, and made us a kingdom and priests, i.e. kings and priests in the service of God, so bringing to fulfilment the calling of Israel at Sinai (see Ex. 19:6 and Rev. 5:10, 22:5). Jesus worshipped, loved, trusted and obeyed his God and Father, as all Christians should. Strikingly, however, God is never spoken of as the Father of believers in Revelation: the relationship of 'Father' is reserved for Jesus alone, thereby emphasizing his unique relation to God.

V 7 has been called the motto of Revelation. The first line of the sentence echoes Dn. 7:13, the rest draws on Zc. 12:10; the same connection is made in Mt. 24:30 (but not in Mk. 14:62). The Zechariah passage speaks specifically of the ‘tribes’ of Israel mourning (‘The land will mourn, each clan by itself’), and of their bitter grief as the mourning for a firstborn son, in consequence of which a fountain is opened to remove all sin and impurity (Zc. 12:10–13:1). That all the peoples (‘tribes’) of earth are to mourn because of him is natural, since all are implicated in the death of Christ through their sin. The question whether the mourning of all humankind for their sin against Christ means a repentance acceptable to God, or a remorse that is too late, is uncertain. 15:3–4 suggests that the former interpretation is possible.

The declaration that God is the Alpha and the Omega (8) is a pictorial way of affirming that God is the sovereign Lord of all ages. Alpha is the first letter of the Greek alphabet, Omega is the last; the equivalent in English would be ‘I am A and Z’. Jews were accustomed to use an equivalent mode of speech in their own language. The rabbis, for example, said that Adam transgressed the law ‘from A to Z’, whereas Abraham kept the law ‘from A to Z’. That suggests that I am the Alpha and the Omega means, ‘I am the beginning of history and the end of history and the Lord of all that lies between.’ Such is implied in the ‘translation’ of the following line: the Lord God, ... the Almighty maintains his control over the world from the beginning to the end of all times, even when the powers of this world resist his will, and he intends to come and complete his good purpose for it. (Note that the simile of A and Z is applied to Jesus in 22:13.)

1:9–20 The call of John to prophesy

The vision calls to mind experiences of OT prophets when they received their call to prophesy. It is doubtful, however, that this signifies the beginning of John’s prophetic ministry; he had been banished to Patmos because he preached the word of God and the testimony of Jesus! The vision rather was the occasion of his call to receive and write Revelation. His self-description as your brother and companion in the suffering and kingdom and patient endurance that are ours in Jesus (9) is significant; that was the common lot of most Christians in the first century AD (cf. Jn. 16:33), and John anticipated an intensification of the suffering and endurance required later (cf. chs. 11–13). Tribulation and kingdom are part of the Messiah’s pattern (Lk. 24:26); to be in Jesus, therefore, is to experience both now, with a view to sharing the kingdom’s glory in the future.

John was in the Spirit on the Lord’s Day (10), i.e. in a condition of ecstasy, not by being transported to view events of ‘the day of the Lord’, but to receive the vision on ‘the day that belongs to the Lord’ (as in the phrase ‘the Lord’s Supper’; 1 Cor. 11:20). The expression ‘the Lord’s Day’ was probably modelled on the comparable Sebaste, i.e. ‘Caesar’s Day’, which in turn imitated the action of the Egyptian Ptolemy Euergetes, who named the 25th day of each month ‘the king’s day’ in honour of his coronation on the 25th day of Dios. It is thought that Caesar’s day was observed weekly in certain areas. Evidently an unknown Christian claimed the title ‘the Lord’s Day’ to celebrate the day when Jesus, God’s own appointed Lord of this world, rose from death to share the throne of God.

The list of the seven churches (11) is in the order of their occurrence on the road which led from Ephesus northwards through Smyrna to Pergamum and then southwards through Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. C. Hemer suggested that this itinerary had existed since Paul’s day and agreed with Sir William Ramsay that the seven cities had acquired ‘special importance as organization and distributive centres for the church of the area’ (The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, JSNT Supp., 11 [1986], p. 15). The cities were both postal and administrative centres. It has been reckoned that at the time of John's writing this area had the greatest concentration of Christians in the world. In addressing these churches John could reach not only others in Asia Minor, but those scattered through the world.

The imagery of the seven golden lampstands (12) recalls the seven-branched lampstand in the Jerusalem temple (Ex 25:31; Zc. 4:2); but the one people of God is here represented as seven lampstands, in whose midst stands the risen Lord. The whole church, thus, is represented by each congregation, and each knows fellowship with the Redeemer.

The description of the risen Lord in vs. 13–16 echoes that of 'the Ancient of Days' in Dn. 7:9 and of the powerful angel in Dn. 10:5–6. The intention is to show that the Lord possesses the glory of heaven and shares the likeness of God. The expression one like a son of man goes directly back to Dn. 7:13 (rather than the gospels), where he is one to whom the kingdom of the world is given, the representative alike of God and his people. That he wears a robe reaching down to his feet could indicate his priestly character (Israel's high priest wore such a robe; Ex 28:4); but since a robe of this kind was also worn by men of high rank, the point may not be pressed. That his head and hair were white like wool is a deliberate reminiscence of Dn. 7:9, where God is so described. The application to Christ of the attributes of God is a constant phenomenon in Revelation. Eyes like blazing fire (cf. Dn. 10:6) penetrate the depths of the heart, and are suitable to one who judges the world. The voice like the sound of rushing waters in Ezk. 43:2 describes the awesome voice of God. That a sharp double-edged sword issued from his mouth again alludes to the role of the Lord as judge of humankind, the power of whose word is irresistible. It is such a Lord who held in his right hand ... seven stars, i.e. the churches; he has power not only to judge evil, but to sustain those who are his (cf. v 20).

John's reaction to the vision of the exalted Lord is similar to that of all who have had such experiences (cf. Is. 6:5; Ezk 1:28; Dn. 7:28). I am the First and the Last. I am the Living One is a virtual exposition of Alpha and Omega in v 8 (cf. also Is. 44:6; 48:12), but it is applied to the Christ in the light of his death and resurrection. The First and the Last become incarnate and died and rose, and as the Living One he has power over death and the realm of the dead, and so has opened the doors of the eternal kingdom for all humanity.

The command to write what you have seen, what is now and what will take place later (19) is commonly thought to indicate the divisions of Revelation. On that understanding what you have seen is the vision just given; what is now denotes the letters to the churches in chs. 2–3; what will take place later comprises the visions of chs. 4–22. That is possible, but it does not apply to chs. 4–5, which describe events present, past and future (as also does ch. 12). It is best to see v 19 as a command to write the entire Revelation, rather than as an analysis of the book itself.

The interpretation of the seven stars as the angels of the seven churches has occasioned difficulty. To understand angels in a literal sense raises the question why John was told to write to angels. In any case, the letters have in view the churches themselves and individual members. Are then the 'angels' the leaders of the churches, such as bishops or messengers ('angel' means 'messenger', whether heavenly or earthly)? That is possible, but it is exceptional in apocalyptic literature for angels to symbolize men, and again the letters have in view the churches, not their leaders. The most plausible view is to understand the angels of the churches as the churches in relation to their exalted Lord. Although they live on earth, their existence is determined by the fact that they are in Jesus (9), and so priests and kings with Christ. The angelic nature of the church recalls Christians to realize on earth their heavenly calling. To help them to do that is the purpose of the seven letters.

2:1–3:22 The letters to the seven churches

These letters are brief and very concentrated in their content. They remind us of the short prophetic oracles of the OT, above all those of Am. 1–2, which are also seven in number. The letters to the churches have an almost identical structure. They begin with a description of Christ, drawn from the opening vision, citing elements that have special relevance for the church address; praise for the commendable features of the church follows and then criticism of its faults. They conclude with a promise of rewards to be bestowed at the advent of Christ, usually relating to features in the vision of the city of God at the end of the book.

2:1–7 The letter to the church in Ephesus

Ephesus was one of the great cities of the ancient world and by far the largest in Asia Minor. It was proud of its title ‘Temple Warden’, which originally referred to the temple of Artemis (Diana) but later included two temples devoted to the worship of the Roman emperors. The temple of Artemis was a famous place of refuge for fugitives, but its vaunted ‘salvation’ was greatly abused, and the surrounding area gave the criminal a sanctuary beyond the reach of the law, becoming the headquarters of organized crime. The interest of the populace in magic and superstition is illustrated in Acts 19:13–20. Paul founded the church in Ephesus and made it the centre for evangelizing the province (Acts 19:1–10). According to later tradition the apostle John and Mary, the mother of Jesus, settled there. 1 The opening greeting cites 1:12, 20: the Lord holds the seven stars in his right hand. This indicates that he maintains the spiritual life of the churches; he walks among the seven golden lamp-stands, and so is present with all the churches. But the power that sustains is also capable of judicial removal; the title thus prepares the hearer for v 5.

2–3 I know your deeds heads each of the letters, sometimes imparting encouragement (e.g. 2:9, 13) and sometimes causing shame (e.g. 3:1, 15). Here it introduces a commendation. The deeds of the Ephesians are hard work and perseverance; the former shows itself in efforts to overcome false teachers, the latter in endurance in face of opposition, whether from false prophets or from other sources. The wicked men are those who claim to be apostles but are not. It is likely that these are the persons named in v 6 as Nicolaitans. Their wickedness relates not so much to their doctrine as to the moral evil to which the doctrine gave rise. (On the Nicolaitans, see on 2:14–15.)

4–5 The failure of the Ephesians was the perversion of their chief virtue: You have forsaken your first love. The call for repentance and to do the things you did at first suggests that the failure of these Christians was not primarily loss of love for God but loss of love for people. When hate for the practices of those who err (6) becomes hatred of those who err, Christians depart from the redeeming love of God in Christ (cf. Jn. 3:16) and pervert the faith. Hence the grave warning in v 5: I will come to you denotes a coming in judgment, even as the Lord will come to the world one day to sweep away its evil. The removal of the lampstand from its place can signify nothing less than the end of Christ’s recognition of the church as a church of his. It will become as devoid of Christ as the temple of Jerusalem became empty of God prior to its destruction (cf. Ezk. 11:22–23; Mt 23:38). So grave is the sin of lovelessness in a Christian church.

7 The injunction He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches appears in the promises to the overcomers in all seven letters. It is unlikely that the Spirit speaks only the promises; he speaks throughout the letters. It would appear that the risen Lord addresses the churches through the Holy Spirit. This is wholly in accordance with the teaching of Jesus in the upper room discourses of Jn. 14–16 (see especially Jn. 16:12–15). The believer who overcomes does so by virtue of Christ's conquest over all powers of evil; he shares in his Lord's victory (see 12:11; Jn. 12:31–32; 16:33). To the overcomer will be given the right to eat from the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God. The term paradise is a Persian loan word, denoting especially a park surrounded by a wall. The term was used in the LXX to translate the word 'garden' (Eden). In Jewish literature 'Garden of Eden' and 'paradise' were both used for the dwelling of the righteous in the future life. Jewish teachers therefore spoke of the paradise of Adam, the paradise of the blessed in heaven and the paradise of the righteous in the coming kingdom of God. It is the last of these meanings which is in mind in this promise. Adam and Eve lost access to the tree of life and were driven from the garden (Gn. 3:22–23); the believer who shares his Lord's victory is promised that both blessings will be restored (see 22:2). A frequent term for the cross of Jesus in the NT is 'tree' (especially on the lips of Peter; see Acts 5:30; 10:39; 1 Pet. 2:24). The temple of Artemis was built on a tree shrine, and a tree frequently symbolized Ephesus or its goddess. Whereas the Ephesian believers once viewed the tree of Artemis as the seat of divine life and the intermediary between that life and human nature, they now learn that life eternal in the paradise of God was theirs through the cross of him who died and rose.

2:8–11 The letter to the church in Smyrna

Smyrna was a seaport, and its prosperity on account of its position was well established before Christian times and continues (as Izmir) to this day. The first city on the site was destroyed in 600 BC, and it was rebuilt by the successor of Alexander the Great. The image of the phoenix, the legendary bird that rises from the ashes of its destruction, was applied to Smyrna. This is not the only instance of a church reflecting the history of the city in which it is set. For one theme dominates this short letter, that of suffering persecution. Hence the greeting from the Lord in the opening sentence: These are the words of him who is the First and the Last, who died and came to life again. The church is reminded that its Lord is the conqueror of death and has conquered it for their sakes. It so happens that one of the best known Christians in the early church was probably sitting in the congregation when this letter was read. This was Polycarp, who later became Smyrna's bishop and was martyred about 160 AD. When at his trial he was commanded to curse Christ, he stated that he had served the Lord for eighty-six years and had received only good from him, how could he forswear his king?

9 The afflictions and poverty of the Smyranean Christians are likely to have been due to the persecutions they had suffered. (For this see Heb. 10:32–34, and contrast what is said of the Laodiceans in 3:17). The slander of the Jews of Smyrna is characteristic of the Jewish bitterness against Christians in this city, and is referred to by other Christian writers. These Jews would have taken the opportunity of informing against the Christians. The church of Smyrna later cited the Jewish allegations that Polycarp resisted the state religion; they spoke of him as 'the teacher of Asia, the father of the Christians, the puller down of our gods, who teaches numbers not to sacrifice nor to worship'. Such Jews were no longer worthy of the name 'Jew', but had become a synagogue of Satan (cf. Nu. 16:3, which reads 'the synagogue of the Lord' in the LXX). The name Satan means an accuser, slanderer; this group of Jews had approximated to his nature. Naturally this is not an indication of John's view of Jews; he was a Jew himself! It reflects the depths of apostasy to which this congregation had sunk.

10 The devil through his instruments will put some of the Christians of Smyrna into prison, and their persecution will last ten days. Prison was not for punishment, but a place to await sentence, whether for forced labour in salt mines, or deportation, or death. The persecution will be short, but it could suffice for some to pay the ultimate sacrifice. If so, there remains the assurance of the crown of life from the Lord, i.e. the laurel wreath for the victor at the games which will consist (in its application) of life in the kingdom of God.

11 The overcomer's consolation is that he or she will not be hurt ... by the second death. That is a Jewish expression, which contrasts the death which all must suffer with the fate of those who are destined never to escape its power, either because they are unworthy of resurrection from death or because they suffer judgment at the end of the age (in 21:8 it means to be cast into the lake of fire). Such a doom is to die twice. The Smyrneans are reminded that to die through human wrath is small compared with suffering the judgment of God.

2:12–17 The letter to the church in Pergamum

For many years there was rivalry between Ephesus, Smyrna and Pergamum as to which was the first city of Asia. Of one thing there was no doubt: Pergamum was the centre of the religious life of the province. The city was dominated by a huge hill that rose to 1000 ft above sea level and had many temples. The most famous was the temple of Asclepius, the god of healing, closely associated with the snake, which gave Pergamum a reputation like Lourdes today. There was also a huge altar of Zeus, built to commemorate a notable victory. Most important of all, Pergamum had the first temple in the area dedicated to Augustus and Rome, hence it became the centre for the worship of the emperor in the province. As this was as much a political as a religious affiliation it created peculiar problems for Christians. The titles of Lord, Saviour and God were constantly applied to the emperor, which Christians could do no other than resist in the light of their sole rightful ascription to Jesus.

12 The title echoes 1:16 and anticipates 2:16.

13 The Lord acknowledges Pergamum as being where Satan has his throne. This most plausibly relates to the throne-like altar of Zeus, itself a symbol of the idolatry that held sway in Pergamum. Yet these Christians remained true to the name of Jesus, the only Lord, Saviour and God incarnate. Clearly a persecution had taken place, when one of their number had been executed, Antipas, my faithful witness. This could be the first occasion of witness (Gk 'martyr') being consciously used of one who laid down his life on account of witness to Christ.

14 But the church in this city had some who hold to the teaching of Balaam, with which was associated the teaching of the Nicolaitans. From early times the latter were reputed to have been followers of Nicolaus of Antioch, one of the Seven appointed to help the apostles in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5). The two names were popularly assumed to have a similarity of meaning. Nicolaus means 'he overcomes the people' and Balaam 'he has consumed the people'. The evil at stake was persuasion to sin by eating food sacrificed to idols and committing sexual immorality. After Balaam uttered his oracles of blessing instead of cursing on Israel (Nu. 22–24), the Israelites engaged in sexual immorality with the Moabite women and ate their sacrifices and worshipped their gods (Nu. 25:1–2). In Nu. 31:16 it is stated that the Moabite women acted by the counsel of Balaam. In Pergamum, as elsewhere, teachers had entered the churches and sought to persuade the members to act freely on the acknowledged truth that Christians were not under the Mosaic law. The concept of a permissive society is clearly not new! Likewise its evils.

16 The Lord calls for repentance (i.e. turning from such sin), otherwise he will soon come and exercise judgment on those who so teach and act (cf. 2:5).

17 The promise to the overcomer is twofold. I will give some of the hidden manna. This is in accord with the understanding of redemption as a second exodus. The Jews put it thus, ‘As the first Redeemer brought the manna down, so the second Redeemer will bring the manna down.’ For the Christian, of course, that is given a spiritual meaning, akin to the ‘water of life’ (cf. 22:17). The white stone is ambiguous, in that it had a variety of meanings and uses in ancient society. An individual on trial would be given by the jurors a stone, a black one indicating guilt, a white one acquittal. If this were in mind the promise would be related to that given to the Smyrneans (2:11). A custom existed when two persons wishing to seal friendship, broke a stone into two and each retained a half, thereby giving access to each other’s home. An extension of such a custom was the use of a stone for admission to a feast; when it applied to an association that regularly held feasts it could be expensive and restricted—much like an exclusive club today. There is evidence of donating to victors at the games a stone which served as a reward and was provided out of public funds. Much would depend, in interpreting possibilities of understanding, as to whose new name written on the stone is in mind. If it were the Christian’s, then the promise would indicate entrance into a distinctive relationship in the new life of the kingdom of God. If it were the name of God (cf. 3:12), or of Christ (cf. 19:12b), then it would denote a new and hidden relationship with the Lord, with perhaps an allusion to the power inherent in the name of God. The Christian participates in the power of the Lord and, in a unique manner shared by none, in the character of God.

2:18–29 The letter to the church in Thyatira

Thyatira was a city of craftsmen and merchants. We recall that the first convert in Macedonia was Lydia of Thyatira, a seller of purple cloth (Acts 16:14). The major problem for the church was posed by the many trade guilds in the city. This was unusual, in that Roman administration discouraged such; but it is thought that Thyatira was useful to the Romans as a supplier for their garrison in nearby Pergamum, so they could overlook the guilds. The Christians, however, could not. Guilds had a patron god; the local god of Thyatira, a representation of Apollo, probably served that purpose. The feasts of the guilds were held in a temple and were viewed as religious occasions; the meat was offered to the god, so that participators shared it with him, and the occasions not infrequently ended in debauchery. How could Christians participate in such meetings? That woman Jezebel had an answer (20).

V 18 echoes 1:14b and 15a. Eyes ... like blazing fire see all. Burnished bronze was a popular alloy and was produced in Thyatira, though strangely the technical term for it used here occurs nowhere else in Greek literature. Its association with the local representation of Apollo, and the finding of coins on which he is portrayed as holding the emperor’s hand, may be in mind in this introduction, where the Son of God is described as arrayed in armour flashing like the refined metal from the furnaces of the city! The deeds mentioned in v 19 are significant, not least for understanding what are acceptable to God, and for the interpretation of judgment according to works in 20:12–14. Here was a church that was growing in its service for Christ (you are now doing more than you did at first).

20 But the church allowed a prophetess to exercise a dangerous ministry in its midst. Jezebel is clearly a symbolic name, recalling King Ahab’s queen, who introduced idolatry into Israel and threatened the continued existence of true religion (see 1 Ki 16:29–32; 2 Ki 9:22). Some authorities have a curious variant in v 20 and read your wife Nezebel; it is unlikely to be correct, but it reflects a belief that the prophetess would have been the wife of the ‘angel’ of the church, namely its bishop. Jezebel would have been of the order of the Nicolaitans and encouraged the members of the church to have no scruples about participating in the meetings of their guilds and so freely engage in sexual immorality and the eating of foods sacrificed to idols. This is typical of the ‘beyond morality’ attitude of the libertarian gnostics.

21 Warning had already been given to Jezebel to cease her baleful influence, but to no avail. Accordingly, she and those responsive to her were to be punished. The language in vs 22–23 is clearly figurative, setting forth a punishment befitting the crime. Those who commit adultery with her are the same as her children—the entire group of her followers will be brought to an end, and all the churches will know by experience what they already know in theory, that the Lord searches hearts and minds and repays according to deeds.

24 Satan’s so-called deep secrets could refer ironically to the gnostics’ claims to know (in an exclusive manner) the deep secrets of God; the Lord’s response to such a claim would then be that their ‘deep secrets’ are inspired by Satan, not by God. Alternatively, the Nicolaitans may have taught that Christians should not hesitate to learn the ‘secrets of Satan’, but rather demonstrate their superiority over the sins of the flesh, since in any case these cannot affect the spirit within. Either interpretation demands a repudiation of such notions. I will not impose any other burden on you alludes to the two chief demands of the apostolic council in Acts 15:28, namely abstention from food sacrificed to idols and from immorality. The call to perseverance in v 25 occurs again in 3:11, but with a significant addition.

26–27 The overcomer is described as one who does my will to the end. Such a person is to receive a delegation of Christ’s authority over the nations and share in his triumph over rebellious peoples. The verbs in v 27, rule and dash ... to pieces, are in parallelism, and either term may be viewed as controlling the meaning of the other. While most opt for the latter (i.e. destroy) the former would be more in keeping with the context: the Christians in Thyatira, conscious of their helplessness, are promised power over their adversaries. (Note that the term here translated ‘rule’ means lit. ‘to shepherd’ and originally referred to the use of a shepherd’s staff, and so of a sceptre [Ps. 45:6] and also of an instrument of punishment [Is. 10:24].)

28 I will also give him the morning star is less to be interpreted in terms of 22:16, where Christ himself is the bright Morning Star, than by the fact that the morning star is Venus. For the Romans that star was a symbol of victory and sovereignty; Roman generals built temples in honour of Venus, and Caesar’s armies had its sign inscribed on their standards. If that be in view the promise strengthens the declarations in vs 26–27; the overcomer is doubly assured of his participation with Christ in his triumph and rule.

3:1–6 The letter to the church in Sardis

Sardis was a city with an illustrious past of which it was proud, but it had less to be proud of in John’s time. The capital of the ancient kingdom of Lydia, it reached the peak of its wealth about 700 BC under Gyges, known to the Assyrians as Gugu. The Jews called this king Gog, and he was thought of as symbolic of the evil powers to arise at the end of the age. He was slain in a surprise attack by the Cimmerians. The city sank into oblivion after the Persian conquest, but it recovered something of its prestige when, through the help of Tiberius, it was rebuilt following an earthquake in AD 17. The church in Sardis reflected the history of the city; once it had had a name for spiritual achievement, but now it was lifeless (1). Two other elements in the city’s life are echoed in the letter. Sardis was built on a mountain and had an acropolis which was viewed as impregnable. ‘To capture the acropolis of Sardis’ was proverbial in Greek to do the impossible. But no less than five times the acropolis was conquered, twice through lack of vigilance. The parallel with the church’s lack of wakefulness and its dire situation is striking (2– 3). Sardis was also a centre for woollen goods and claimed to be first in the business of dyeing wool; this, too, seems to be reflected in vs 4–5.

1 The title echoes 1:4 and 16. The risen Lord possesses the seven spirits of God; in view of the imagery of 1:4 this would appear to represent the Holy Spirit sent to the seven churches. The Spirit inspires prophecy and quickens the dead; this church needed to listen to the prophetic warning and seek the Spirit's quickening life. As in 2:1 the seven stars, the churches, are in Christ's hand, both to hold fast and to judge. I have not found your deeds complete in the sight of my God (2). But none are mentioned! The Sardis congregation needed those qualities which the church in Thyatira had: love, faith, service, perseverance. If they had any of those, or any like them, they were half-hearted in putting them into practice. Nothing they started ever came to completion. The church therefore is called on to awake (cf. Eph. 5:14); to strengthen what remains, i.e. whatever was of God in the church that had not died; to remember what you have received, i.e. of the apostolic gospel and teaching on the Christian life; to obey it and repent (3), i.e. turn to God as at their conversion. Otherwise, says the Lord, I will come like a thief. The parable of the thief is clearly echoed here (Mt. 24:43–44; cf. 1 Thes. 5:2–4), as it is in 16:15. In view of the use of this language in the letters to Ephesus and Pergamum (2:5, 16), however, it is likely that a coming of the Lord for judgment in the present is in view, rather than the possibility that the church will suffer judgment at the Lord's coming in power and glory.

4 The few people in Sardis who have not soiled their clothes are those who had resisted the temptation to accommodate their lives to the heathen customs of their neighbours. They, accordingly, will walk with the Lord, dressed in white. 5 The same promise is addressed to the overcomer (cf. 19:7–8). Holiness is always a gift of the Lord wrought in the life of the believer, the life of the Redeemer lived out in the redeemed. Note further that the wearing of white is associated with festivity (as in 19:7–8; cf. also Ec. 9:8) and victory. A complex of ideas attaches to the picture. For the concept of erasing a name from the book of life see Ex. 32:32, where the thought is of a register of citizens. In Dn. 12:1, Lk. 10:20, Phil. 4:3 and in this passage it symbolizes a register of the citizens of the kingdom of God. The Lord's confession of the overcomer echoes Mt. 10:32, 'I will also acknowledge him before my Father'.

3:7–13 The letter to the church in Philadelphia

Philadelphia, like the neighbouring town of Sardis, suffered grievously from earthquakes and, while not so badly affected as the latter in the catastrophic earthquake of AD 17, it experienced them more frequently. Of this aspect of the city's life Strabo wrote, 'The walls never cease being cracked, and different parts of the city are constantly suffering damage. That is why the actual town has few inhabitants, but the majority live as farmers in the countryside, as they have fertile land'. The insecurity of life in Philadelphia is contrasted in v 12 with the promise of a permanent place in the city of God, and they who live in it will not have to find a safer place outside its walls! The whole letter is dominated by the sure and certain prospect of life in the kingdom of God.⁷ The risen Lord is holy and true, like the Father (6:10), and so may be trusted to keep his word. He holds the key of David. In 1:18, as the resurrected one, Jesus has 'the keys of death and Hades', and so can unlock the gates of death and lead into eternal life; here the phrase recalls Is. 22:22, where it signifies authority over David's house and means the Messiah's undisputed authority over entrance into, or exclusion from, the kingdom of God.

8–9 The symbol of the open door is often interpreted in the light of Paul's usage in 1 Cor. 16:9 and 2 Cor. 2:12, namely the opening up of evangelistic opportunity. In this context, however, it almost certainly refers to the door of God's kingdom. As in Smyrna, the Jews of this city are called the synagogue of Satan; they would have not only opposed the Christians but asserted that the latter had no place in the kingdom of God, since it was for Jews alone. On the contrary, the Lord of the kingdom has already opened it to his followers, and in the day of its revelation he will make these apostate Jews do what they expected the Gentiles would do for them: they will fall down before the Christians they despised and will acknowledge that they are the beloved of the Messiah (see Is. 60:14).

10 The hour of trial that is going to come upon the whole world denotes not the clock time when the Messianic judgments come on the world, but the trials themselves. A comparable use of hour is seen in the prayer of Jesus in Gethsemane, where it represents the horrors of the crucifixion and all it signified for him (Mk. 14:35; Jn. 12:27). The tribulation is to test those who live on the earth. This phrase is regularly used in Revelation for the unbelievers of the world (see 6:10; 8:13; 11:10; 13:8, 14; 17:8). The preservation of the church from the effects of these judgments is set forth in various images in this book of the judgments of God (see 7:1–8; 11:1; 12:6) and has a close parallel in Jn. 17:15.

11 A note of urgency is now introduced, which appears again in 22:7, 12, 20.

12 The conqueror is to be a pillar in the temple of my God. 21:22 makes it clear that there is to be no temple other than God and the Lamb in the city of God. The promise here given is an assurance of inseparable unity with God in his coming kingdom. I will write on him the name of my God ... continues the metaphor of the pillar, hence the inscription is depicted as on the pillar, not on the forehead of the victor. 1 Macc. 14:25–27 relates how the deeds of Simon Maccabeus were inscribed on tablets of brass, which were fixed ‘in a conspicuous place in the precincts of the sanctuary’, so ensuring a permanent record of Simon’s greatness. The victor’s glory, however, is not to be in his deeds but in that he bears the name of my God, the name of the city of God and Christ’s new name, i.e. in the fact that he belongs to God and to the Son of God in his glory, and is a citizen of the new Jerusalem, the eternal kingdom of God (21:2).

3:14–22 The letter to the church in Laodicea

Laodicea was situated on the bank of the River Lycus. Its position at the junction of three imperial roads traversing Asia Minor favoured its development as a wealthy commercial and administrative centre. Three facts known throughout the Roman world about the city throw light on this letter: it was a banking centre, whose banks even Cicero recommended for exchanging money; it manufactured clothing and woollen carpets, made especially from the glossy black wool of sheep reared locally; and it had a medical school and produced medicines, notably an eye ointment made from a pulverized rock in the area. The stern characterization of the church’s spiritual life (17) and the call for its repentance (18) are both couched in terms of these three activities of the city.

14 As the Amen Jesus is the embodiment of the faithfulness and truthfulness of God (see Is. 65:16). The Christian use of ‘Amen’ adds the thought that he is also the gaurantor and executor of the purposes of God. Such a designation stands in vivid contrast to the faithlessness of the Laodiceans. The title the ruler of God’s creation is better rendered ‘the prime source of all God’s creation (NEB). It is like ‘Alpha’ in the title ‘Alpha and Omega’ (1:8), and here is perhaps intended to emphasize the Lord’s authority and powr to carry out that purpose of which he is gaurantor and faithful witness.

15–16 The terms cold, hot and lukewarm are likely to relate to waters around and in Loadicea. Nearby Hierapolis was famed for its hot springs; Colosse, also near at hand, was noted for a cold, clear stream of excellent drinking water. Since, however, the River Lycus dried up in summer, Laodicea had to use a long viaduct for its water, which was not only tepid but impure and sometimes foul, making people sick. The church of that city had that effect on Christ—a vivid and horrifying picture of judgment. (V 16 should not be taken as indicating that the Lord prefers an atheist or a fanatical religious zealot to a tepid Christian. The issue is the possession of genuine life in Christ by those who profess the Christian faith, not the way they hold it.)

17–18 In a single sentence with contrasting clauses (You say ... I counsel you ...) the irony of the Laodiceans' situation is brought home to them. In spite of their wealth they are wretched and pitiful; despite their physicians and medicaments for the eyes they are blind; and in spite of their abundance of cloth they are naked. Accordingly the Lord calls on them to buy from him what they lack (cf. 1 Cor. 2:6–16; 2 Cor. 4:1–6).

19 The nauseating condition of the Laodiceans has not quenched the love of Christ for them; his scathing judgments are the expression of an affection that wishes to lead them to repentance (cf. Heb. 12:4–11). The gracious invitation that follows in v 20 is given, not to the church as a whole, as though Christ was outside the church (which would require, 'If the church will hear my voice ... I will go in and eat with them, and they with me'), but to each individual within it, conveying the offer of the risen Lord to share with any who will open the door of fellowship in even the commonest activities of life.

21 Just as a high privilege is offered to these unworthy Christians so is a promise greater than all those previously uttered: just as believers invite Christ to make his home with them in this transitory life, so the Lord will invite anyone who endures to the end to share in the coming ages the throne that the Father has given to him. The fulfillment of the promise is portrayed in 20:4–6, the 'millennial' rule in history, and 22:5, the eternal reign in the new creation.

4:1–5:14 A vision of heaven

This section may be viewed as a turning point in the book of Revelation. It provides a fuller understanding of the Christ and his salvation that dominates the previous chapters and of the judgments and the kingdom which are the subject of the chapters that follow. A single motif binds together the twofold vision of chs. 4 and 5, namely that the God of creation is the God of redemption, who brings to pass his purpose through the crucified and risen Christ. Ch. 4 reads like one of the visions of God in the OT (cf. Is. 6; Ezk. 1), where God is presented as exalted in holiness, far above the storms of history and the efforts of evil forces to resist his will. In ch. 5 attention is concentrated on the Christ who has conquered all evil powers and thereby won the right to open God's scroll of destiny and carry out what is written in it. Through the combination of the two visions it is made clear that God's will in creation, celebrated in the closing hymn of ch. 4, is accomplished by the Lamb who was slain and raised to the throne of god; and so history ends in the acknowledgment and worship of God and the lamb by the living and the dead.

4:1–11 The throne in heaven

The scene of John's vision changes from earth to heaven and remains there until ch. 10, after which the point of view continually alternates. It is to be noted that the prophet alone, not the church, is called to go through the door; his elevation in vision is for the purpose of revelation, in order that he may communicate what he sees to those on earth.

2 The first object to catch John's eye is a throne in heaven with someone sitting on it. It is of first importance to know that the God who dwells in heaven possesses absolute authority over the universe. 3 No description is given of God; John simply tells of various colours emanating from precious stones flashing through a strange rainbow-cloud. There is some uncertainty about the names given to jewels in the ancient world: jasper was probably a diamond (cf. 21:11), carnelian was red, but we are unsure about the emerald. It may denote rock crystal, which acts as a prism, and in that case the rainbow after the flood is recalled, a reminder of God's covenant to restrain his wrath from humanity on earth (Gn. 9:13). Throne and rainbow, omnipotence and mercy, are significant symbols in a book whose overriding theme is the judgment and kingdom of God.

4 The twenty-four elders are reminiscent of Is. 24:23, where the 'elders' were viewed as Jewish leaders. These elders have often been interpreted as representatives of Israel and the church (twelve patriarchs and twelve apostles). In 1 Ch. 24:4, however, we read of twenty-four priestly orders, and in 1 Ch. 25:1 of twenty-four orders of Levites appointed to prophesy and praise with harps and cymbals. Since in 5:8 the elders present the prayers of God's people and in 4:6–11 are linked with the four living creatures, they are evidently to be understood as exalted angelic beings, worshipping and serving the Creator. 5 The flashes of lightning and pearls of thunder recall the theophany at Sinai (Ex. 19:16) and portray the awesomeness of God. For the seven spirits of God see 5:6. 6 It is not said that the sea of glass was a literal sea, but that it looked like one. It is an adaptation of the conception of waters above the firmament (Gn. 1:7), but is here introduced apparently to emphasize the greatness of God.

Four living creatures stand around the throne. Their description is drawn from Ezekiel's vision of the cherubim (Ezk. 1:5–21) but considerably modified. The chief differences are that in Ezekiel the cherubim each have four faces, but here each has only one. The former possess 'wheels' with rims 'full of eyes all around' (they bear the throne of God), but here the creatures themselves possess the eyes. 7–8 Their ceaseless worship rendered to God may well represent the subjection of all creation to God. The Jews came to understand Ezekiel's vision in this way, regarding the man as chief representative of creatures, the eagle of birds, the lion of beasts, and the ox of cattle. The ancient symbolizing of the four chief constellations of the zodiac by these four figures, if known to John, would but serve to strengthen this view. The song of the cherubim implies that the future triumph of God is rooted in his very nature; the Lord, who is holy and almighty, is to come. 9–10 The renunciation by the twenty-four elders of their crowns would appear to be the expression of adoration given on special occasions when God 'comes' and manifests his sovereign power to judge and to save (see 5:8, 14; 11:15–18; 19:4). 11 The elders recognize that one only is worthy to take pre-eminence in creation—the Creator. In their song that celebrates his worth read 'on account of' your will they were created (instead of by). This has a forward rather than backward look; God's will is the ultimate power in the universe and that will shall be done. That is the supreme lesson of the visions of Revelation.

5:1–14 The scroll and the Lamb

The focus of the vision dramatically changes. It is as though a television camera in heaven zooms in on the hand of God to show a scroll which no-one can open. The camera then focuses on one as yet not seen: he is standing in the centre of the throne, and by virtue of his 'triumph' he is able to take and open the scroll. When he does so, all heaven rings with his praise. It is likely that we have here a representation of the coronation of Jesus the Lord in terms of the ancient enthronement ceremonies of the Middle East. The steps of the ceremony are generally defined as exaltation, presentation, enthronement and acclamation. The equivalent of the exaltation is seen in v 5, the presentation in v 6, the bestowal of authority in v 7, and the acclamation in vs 8–14. So the Christ-Redeemer enters upon his reign in power.

1 There has been much speculation as to the nature of the scroll in the hand of God. Of the suggestions that have been advanced, two are especially noteworthy: one that it is a double inscribed contract deed, the other a testament or will. The former goes back to ancient time, when contracts were written on tablets, wrapped round with clay, on the outside of which the nature of the contract was briefly stated. When papyrus or parchment was introduced, fundamentally the same procedure was used, and the document was sealed with seven seals. A related procedure took place with the writing of a will, in that a will was sealed by seven witnesses, and after the death of the testator it was opened, when possible, in their presence. No description of the contents was written on the outside, but that feature in John's vision could be due to a conscious echo of Ezk. 2:8–10. In reality the two notions are closely related, in that a contract is an everyday form of covenant, and a testament is a special kind of covenant. On that understanding, the scroll in the hand of God represents his covenant promise of judgment and kingdom for humanity.

2–3 The angel must be mighty, since his voice has to carry throughout heaven, earth and the realm of the dead (under the earth is Hades; cf. Phil. 2:10). 5 The Lion of the tribe of Judah (cf. Gn. 49:9), the Root of David (Is. 11:1, 10) has triumphed through his death and resurrection, and so he is able to open the scroll and its seven seals. The redemption wrought by the Christ was the means by which God's kingdom of salvation was established. 6 The description of the Lamb combines varied uses of this figure in Hebrew thought. It looks as if it had been slain and yet is standing in the centre of the throne, alive and victorious! In Revelation, exodus is the fundamental picture of redemption; the slain Lamb then is the Passover lamb. We also recall the slaughtered lamb of Is. 53:7, the Servant of the Lord, suffering in innocence for all humankind. But the Lamb has seven horns, which signifies immense power (Ps. 75:4–7) and royal status (Zc. 1:18). This takes up the contemporary apocalyptic representation of the Messiah as the powerful leader (Ram!) of the flock of God, who delivers the sheep, conquering the wild beasts that seek to destroy them. In Zc. 4:10 it is God who has seven eyes, symbolizing omniscience; here they are identified with the seven spirits of God sent out into all the earth, in harmony with the teaching of Jn. 16:7–11. The Messiah of OT promise and apocalyptic hope thus stands revealed in terms of new covenant fulfilment.

8–10 The cherubim and the elders sing a new song, because Jesus has introduced the new era of the kingdom of God by his redemptive work (cf. Is. 42:9–10, which speaks of the new song in a similar context). The Lord has purchased men for God from all nations. The figure is that of setting people free at a price. In the ancient world slaves were sometimes set free through generous people paying the cost; in the modern world hostages have been similarly liberated. The pattern in view here, however, is that of the liberation of Israel in Egypt to become the free people of God in the land of promise. The greater emancipation, for life eternal in the kingdom of God, has been accomplished for all humankind at the cost of the Redeemer's blood. Hence the redeemed become a kingdom and priests to serve our God, so fulfilling the vocation to which the ancient people of God were called (Ex. 19:6). Their reign on the earth will be their 'service' (cf. 20:4–6; 22:3).

11–14 The angelic multitudes now take up the song of praise to the Lamb (cf. Dn. 7:10). The doxology has reference to the power and blessings of Christ at the commencement of his reign (11:17) and is closely similar to that sung to God in 7:12. All creation in heaven, earth, sea and the realm of the dead finally joins the host of angels and archangels (13). Whereas the praise of heaven in vs 8–12 celebrates the Lamb's initiating the kingdom of salvation, the universal worship of God and the Lamb awaits its consummation in the future. The like applies to the hymn of Phil. 2:6–11: the Lord has been given the name above every name at his exaltation to the throne of God; its acknowledgment awaits his manifestation in glory.

6:1–8:5 The seven seals

Many complex elements flow together to form the panorama which the prophet now describes. The conviction that judgments will precede the coming of the kingdom of God is rooted in the teaching of the OT prophets concerning the day of the Lord (see e.g. Is. 13, 34; Je. 4–7; Ezk. 7, 25; Am. 5:18–27; Zp. 1–3). John has elaborated and schematized them in a unique manner, but the division of the Messianic woes into several sets of sevens may well be inspired by the doom prophecy of Lv. 26, where it is stated four times, ‘I will punish you for your sins seven times over’ (18, 21, 24, 28). The discourse on the end times in the gospels (Mt. 24; Mk. 13, Lk. 21) contains the seven judgments enumerated in Rev. 6, but the form of the opening four judgments reflects the vision of four chariots and horses in Zechariah (cf. Zc. 1:7–17), adapted by John to convey his message. Note that while the opening of the seals brings judgments, these are but the precursors of the final kingdom of God. The scroll represents God’s covenant to give humanity the kingdom of salvation.

6:1–2 The first seal

The command ‘Come!’ is directed to the rider who appears at the opening of the seal (the same is true in vs 3, 5, 7). Many interpreters regard the conquering horseman as Christ and link the passage with the vision of the returning Lord in 19:11–12. The only element in common in the two pictures, however, is the white horse, a symbol of victory. Others hold that the rider represents the triumph of the gospel, and cite Mk. 13:10. (2 Thes. 2:7 is also interpreted in this light.) Nevertheless, in view of the evident similarity of the four horsemen, it seems more natural to interpret all four as symbolizing judgments. This rider appears to signify an overwhelmingly powerful military force.

6:3–4 The second seal

The rider on the fiery red horse also denotes a warring power. If it is to be asked how he differs from the first, the language suggests that the first rider represents an army invading other countries; the second a general confusion of strife, including hostilities between countries, and perhaps even civil war (... to make men slay each other). Note the double reference to war in Mk. 13:7–8 and parallels.

6:5–6 The third seal

The rider on a black horse denotes famine. The balance in his hand suggests scarcity of food, the prices quoted are prohibitive. The NIV rightly paraphrases the term denarius as ‘a day’s wages’ (cf. Mt. 20:1–2). A quart of wheat would suffice for a man’s daily ration, leaving nothing, however, for his family. Three quarts of barley would go further, but it would still remain a bare subsistence allowance. On the other hand, do not damage the oil and wine reflects a concern to give priority to such for those who could afford them. In AD 92, shortly before the writing of Revelation, an acute shortage of cereals, together with an abundance of wine in the empire, caused Domitian to order the restriction of wine cultivation and an increase of corn growing; the order created such a furore it had to be abandoned. The text may have such a situation in mind.

6:7–8 The fourth seal

The fourth rider is named Death, but it is likely that it represents a special kind of death, namely pestilence. Ezekiel tells of God's four sore acts of judgment: sword, famine, evil beasts and pestilence (Ezk. 14:21), and the Greek translation renders the last by the term death (possibly John does the same in 2:23, and certainly in 18:8). That Hades was following close behind is a reminder that death does not end life's story; judgment awaits sinners (cf. Heb. 9:27–28).

6:9–11 The fifth seal

The souls of the martyrs were under the altar because they had been, as it were, 'sacrificed' (cf. Phil. 2:17; 2 Tim. 4:6). The thought was beloved by the Jews. Rabbi Akiba taught: 'He who is buried in the land of Israel is as if he were buried beneath the altar, for the whole land of Israel is appropriated for the altar; he who is buried beneath the altar is as if he were buried beneath the throne of glory.' In the light of 12:17 the testimony the martyrs had maintained is the testimony of Jesus (see also 1:2 and 19:10).

10–11 The white robe given to them is likely to be a representation of their justification through Christ in face of their condemnation by the world, and so a sign and pledge of the glory which is to be theirs in the 'first resurrection' (20:4–6). This vision of the martyrs is viewed as an integral part of the judgments of the Lord, for the prayer for justice (10) is answered, and the end thereby hastened.

6:12–27 The sixth seal

The description of the cosmic signs at the end of the age is drawn from a number of OT passages that speak of the day of the Lord (for a great earthquake as a sign of the end, cf. Ezk. 38:19–20; for the sun turning black like sackcloth and the moon blood red see Is. 13:10; Ezk. 32:7–8; Joel 2:10; 3:15; for the falling stars and the rolling up of the sky like a scroll see Is. 34:4; for the hiding in the rocks see Is. 2:10; and for prayer to the mountains see Ho. 10:8). These 'signs' are indications not that the end is drawing near but that it has arrived (so v 17, the great day of their wrath has come). They originally were pictorial expressions of the terror of the universe before the majesty of the Creator as he steps forth in judgment and deliverance (see especially Hab. 3:6–11), and so served to magnify the awesomeness of the Lord in his theophany.

15–17 These verses give a sevenfold classification of humankind, ranging from the kings of the earth to every slave and every free man. Their cry in vs 16–17 is a counterpart to that of the martyrs beneath the altar. The last day reveals the identity of him who has ultimate authority over the universe and the irresistible judgment of the Lamb; but the end of their exercise of authority and judgment is the triumph of the kingdom of grace and glory (see 21:1–22:5).

7:1–17 An interlude between the sixth and seventh seals

The sixth seal heralded the end of history in the coming of God and the Lamb. One expects the seventh seal to be opened now and the kingdom of glory to be revealed. Instead John recounts two visions of God's people in the last days. The first relates to the period prior to the judgments described in ch. 6; the second reveals the redeemed in the glory that follows them. John's purpose is to assure his Christian readers (and hearers!; 1:3) that they have no need to dread the judgments of the last times since God will protect them.

It is often thought that the two halves of the chapter relate to two different companies of people, so that vs 1–8 show God’s care for Israel in the last times, or at least for Jewish Christians, whereas vs 9–17 depict the saved of the nations of the world. This is a doubtful interpretation. If the ‘sealing’ of the first vision portrays God’s protection from the destructive judgments coming on the earth, then all God’s people will need that, not a limited section of them (and that is done; see 9:4). Moreover, the expression the servants of our God, who are sealed (3) occurs elsewhere in Revelation, and regularly denotes the whole company of the redeemed (see 2:20; 11:18; 19:2, 5; 22:3, 6). It is likely that John was guided to employ a prophecy that originally was intended to assure Jews of the certainty of their inheritance in the kingdom of God. He applied it to the church as the new Israel, since its symbolism thereby comes to perfect realization (for the church as the new Israel see Rom. 2:28–29; Gal. 3:29; 6:16; Phil. 3:3; 1 Pet. 1:1; 2:9).

1 After this marks a new vision; it is not a note of time in relation to the events narrated in ch. 6 but introduces a fresh revelation given to John. The four angels ... holding back the four winds of the earth are an alternative symbol of the four horsemen of the previous chapter (so in Zc. 6:5). The destructive fury of the winds represents the whole manifestation of judgment symbolized by the seals, trumpets and cups of wrath. 2–3 The picture of the seal of the living God applied to the servants of God goes back to Ezekiel’s vision of the man with a writing kit, who is told to go through Jerusalem and put a mark on the foreheads of the righteous that they may be spared by the agents of destruction (Ezk. 9:1–6).

4–8 The enumeration of the tribes one by one serves to emphasize the completeness of the number of God’s saints for whom he cares during the coming trials. The list is unusual in several respects. Judah comes first, instead of Reuben, Jacob’s firstborn (Gn. 29:32; cf. Nu. 13:4–15; Dt. 33:6); this doubtless is due to the recognition that Judah is the tribe of the Messiah. Dan is omitted, but Manasseh appears, although the latter is included in Joseph. This is certainly deliberate. Jewish teachers persistently associated Dan with idolatry. In ‘The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs’ Dan is told, ‘Your prince is Satan’. From Irenaeus on it was maintained among Christians that Dan’s name was omitted because the antichrist was to come from his tribe. This was, of course, the view of Jews, but in reality the representations of the antichrist in Revelation are irreconcilable with it.

9 The vision of the 144,000 sealed against the effects of trial is replaced by that of a great multitude that no-one could count, standing before God and the Lamb in the glory of the kingdom. A. M. Farrer considered that this contrast gives expression to two complementary themes of the Scriptures: on the one hand that God knows the number of his elect, and on the other, that those who inherit the blessing of Abraham are numberless as the stars (The Revelation of St. John the Divine [Clarendon, 1964], p. 110). Their white robes signify purity and resurrection glory, the palm branches victory and joy after war.

10 Salvation belongs to our God ... and to the Lamb echoes Ps. 3:8 (see also Rev. 19:1). The victors ascribe their redemption to God and the Lamb. 12 The praise of the angelic orders reflects the praise of the redeemed multitude.

13–14 John’s answer to the elder’s question implies, ‘I also would like to know’. The great tribulation out of which the multitude has come is not a general designation of the trials which are the Christian’s normal lot, but the tribulation that occurs at the close of this age. The vision depicts the scene after the cessation of the judgments of the Lord within history and the sufferings of Christians at the hands of the opponents of God, and so has in view the last generation. Yet the elder’s statement in vs 14b–17 describes the blessedness of the whole church.

The difficulty is relieved if we remember that John prophesies of a day that to him is almost on the horizon; it was not given to him to see the period that intervened before the end. The last persecution may come at any time. Those who have gone before, having witnessed a good confession, are of course included in this throng, but it was superfluous to state that. The church of the present is the subject in view, and its situation fills John's canvas. For us, nearly two millennia later, the church is mainly in heaven, but we may know that all believers, including ourselves, will be among that throng.

They have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb is a symbolic expression of the forgiveness of sins through faith in the Christ who died for all. The phrase the blood of the Lamb is a shorthand expression for the death of Christ viewed as a sacrifice for sins, hence the imagery of v 14 depicts the effectiveness of the Lord's redemption in the lives of his people. It includes the overcoming of sin in life by virtue of the power of Christ's atonement and so covers the whole of life's pilgrimage, as well as the event of conversion. Vs 16–17 use language drawn from Is. 29:8 and 49:10: Christ assuages people's thirst by providing in himself the antidote to their restlessness, the complete counterpart to their unsatisfied desires. The springs of living water in the final vision of the city of God turn out to be a river of living water (22:1–2)—more than enough for the needs of all!

8:1–5 The seventh seal

1 A silence in heaven occurred. In the light of vs 3–4 it is likely that it was to enable the prayers of the saints to be heard. In the Talmud seven heavens are distinguished; in the fifth heaven 'there are companies of ministering angels, who utter songs by night, and are silent by day for the sake of Israel's glory', i.e. they are silent in order that the praises of Israel may come before God. We have read in chs. 4 and 5 of the exultant worship of the angelic companies; here heaven is silenced in order that the cries for deliverance from the suffering Christians on earth may be heard. 3–4 Incense offered with the prayers of all the saints serves to make them acceptable before God; they must be cleansed from all taint of selfishness and sin. 5 Their prayers are answered. The fire that burned the incense is thrown to earth and becomes a means of judgment. There follow the phenomena that indicate that the Lord comes and the kingdom of God is established in power (see 11:19, consequent on the seventh trumpet, and 16:18, following the seventh cup of wrath).

8:6–11:19 The seven trumpets

Trumpets have many associations in the OT. At the manifestation of God at Sinai a prolonged sounding of a trumpet took place, terrifying the people (Ex. 19:16–19). A trumpet blast heralded the accession of a king to his rule (1 Ki. 1:39–40), and the celebration of God's kingship was so marked (Ps. 47:5–9). Trumpets were blown to announce declaration of war (Jdg. 3:26–28; 7:19–20; Ne. 4:18), and the day of the Lord was so to be announced (Joel 2:1; Zp. 1:16). All the festivals of Israel were announced with trumpet blasts (Nu. 10:10); in these there was a strange mixture of joy and judgment. To the rabbis of Israel the Day of Atonement was the day of judgment. Caird pointed out that in the Mishnah it is stated that God judges the world at Passover in respect of produce, at Pentecost in respect of fruit, and at Tabernacles in respect of rain, but Tishri 1 (the beginning of the preparation for the Day of Atonement) is the day when he judges all mankind (The Revelation of St. John, [Black, 1985] 109–110). Some passages in the NT represent the coming of Christ in his kingdom as heralded by a trumpet (Mt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52;

1 Thes. 4:16). These multiple associations of trumpets would have been known to John, above all their connections with the day of the Lord and the kingdom of God. In his employment of them, the judgments announced by trumpets fall into two groups of four and three (as with the seven seals). The first four are reminiscent of the Egyptian plagues at the exodus; the fifth and sixth less clearly so. In 15:3 the coming of Christ is tacitly compared to the exodus (the redeemed sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb); it is comprehensible, therefore, that the final redemption, the second exodus, is heralded by similar plagues as at the first exodus.

8:6–12 The first, second, third and fourth trumpets

The first trumpet affects one third of the earth (cf. the plague of hail and fire in Ex. 9:24). All the green grass was burned up, i.e. in the third part of the earth which was affected; the locusts of 9:4 are forbidden to hurt the grass of the earth, which would not have existed if this were a universal judgment.

8 The second trumpet affects one third of the sea. As the Nile was turned into blood in the first Egyptian plague (Ex. 7:20–21) so is the third part of the sea here.

10–11 The third trumpet causes a third part of fresh waters to become poisonous and so continues the thought of the previous plague (cf. 16:3–7). Since the star that falls at the sounding of the fifth trumpet (9:1) is an angelic being, it is possible that Wormwood is also an angel. For the bitter waters cf. Je. 9:15.

12 The fourth trumpet darkens a third part of the heavens, so that a third of the day was without light, and also a third of the night. Again we are reminded of the Egyptian plague of darkness (Ex. 10:21–23), which is perhaps the reason why the striking of the heavenly bodies results in a reduction of their length of shining rather than of their intensity of light. Is it that John hints that people experience darkness in the day and intensified darkness in the night because of their sins, but the Lord gives them light enough by day and by night that they may forsake their moral darkness for life in the light of his presence?

8:13–9:21 The fifth trumpet

13 An eagle now announces in mid-air (that the whole world may hear his cry) a threefold Woe to those who dwell on the earth. The three woes correspond to the three trumpets yet to sound; they will be more drastic than the former trumpet judgments, since they are directed not to the elements but to the rebellious of humanity. Ch. 9 will describe the first two woes, but the third is not described, only its consequence in the revelation of the kingdom (11:15–19). That woe is reflected in 11:18, more explicitly stated in 16:17–20, depicted in greater detail in 17:12–18, celebrated in the dirge of ch. 18 and the hymns of 19:1–10, and finally portrayed in 19:11–21. The exodus typology is evident in the first woe, having a parallel in the Egyptian plague of locusts (Ex. 10:1–20), but less so in the second, which may be compared with the slaying of the firstborn in Egypt, the ultimate judgment of God on the nation.

9:1 On the sounding of the fifth trumpet a star that had fallen received the key to the shaft of the Abyss. The star is an angel; if fallen, he yet remains an instrument for doing God's will (the key to the Abyss was given by authority from God). The Abyss represents the chaos of waters; in the mythology of the ancient orient they were personified in a power of evil that opposed the powers of heaven, and so came to denote the abode of demonic agencies. In 20:1–3 it is the place into which Satan is thrown and imprisoned. So here the reference to the key indicates that all its inhabitants are firmly under God's control.

2–4 That clouds like the smoke from a gigantic furnace arose is intended to convey the impression of an advancing cloud of locusts. The comparison of these demon hosts to locusts echoes the vision of Joel 2:1–10, where it is said that the locust armies look like war horses running to battle, rattle like chariots, charge like mighty men, darken the heavens, and have fangs like lions. In addition to these features John declares that the locusts have power to inflict pain like scorpions (cf. 9:10). Locusts eat vegetation and do no harm to human beings, but these demonic locusts ignore vegetation and attack people, more precisely those who did not have the seal of God on their foreheads (they, on the contrary, have the mark of the beast; see 13:16). Five months is the normal length of a locust's life (spring and summer), but their visitation of any one place is naturally more limited in time.

7–9 The description of the locusts recalls Joel 1:6; 2:4–9, but it is common in Arab traditions. C. Niebuhr in 1772 reported an Arab's depiction of a locust: 'He compared the head of a locust with the head of a horse, its breast with the breast of a lion, its feet with the feet of a camel, its body with the body of a snake, its tail with the tail of a scorpion, its antennae with the hair of a maiden'. 11 Their king is named Abaddon in Hebrew but Apollyon in Greek. The former in the OT denotes the depths of Sheol and means 'destruction'. The latter is close to the Greek verb apollumi, 'to destroy', but may well be intended as a variant of Apollo, which Greek writers have derived from apollumi. The cult of Apollo used (among others) the symbol of the locust, and the emperors Caligula, Nero and Domitian claimed to be incarnations of Apollo. If this was in John's mind, the irony of the fifth trumpet is mind-blowing: the destructive host of hell had as its king the emperor of Rome! (This is factually paralleled in 17:16–18.)

13–14 When the sixth trumpet is sounded a voice comes from the golden altar that is before God. It is thus linked with the cries of the martyrs beneath the altar in heaven (6:9–10) and the prayers of the saints on earth for deliverance (8:4–5), though it is to be understood as that of God who answers the prayers of his people. The four angels who are bound at the great river Euphrates are to be released. This river and the Nile formed the ideal limits of the land promised to Israel (Gn. 15:18). It also formed the eastern limit of the Roman Empire, and beyond it lay the Parthian (or Persian) Empire, the only military power in the world which had decisively defeated Roman armies and which Rome had cause to fear. Jews looked to this area for armies from the north to invade Palestine (1 Enoch 56:5–8 appears to interpret the Gog prophecy of Ezk. 38–39 as fulfilled through the Parthians and Medes). The four angels, however, command no human army but a terrifying demonic force, invading not the promised land but the godless world. 15 Nothing in the programme of God is accidental. The precise moment of this invasion is fixed. 16 The number of the mounted troops is given as two hundred million. This and other computations like it are inspired by Ps. 68:17 (the number of the chariots of God as he came from Sinai) and Dn. 7:10 (the number of angels who come with God for judgment). The demonic army as truly serves the purpose of God as the angelic company.

17–19 The description of the horses and riders is horrifying, inconceivable and revolting. Strangely it is the horses which terrify and destroy; the riders and horses seem to melt into a unity, but their destructive power (from fire, smoke and sulphur) issues from the horses' mouths. These creatures are not of the earth; fire and sulphur belong to hell (19:20; 21:8), just as smoke is characteristic of the Abyss (9:2).

20–21 The plague fails to produce a salutary effect on the God-opposing world; people persist in idolatry, with its attendant evils, and find no place of repentance. How are we to interpret these extraordinary depictions of the first two 'woes'? G. B. Caird suggested that 'in them lies a most important theological affirmation: that the powers of evil have an immense reserve army, from which they can be steadily reinforced, so that no earthly order can find security from attacks from beyond the frontier, except in the final victory of God. In a world in which evil is virulent and tenacious, the programme of the gospel must not be expected to produce a steady whittling away of Satan's power, until he is reduced to impotence, but rather a steady hardening of resistance, leading inexorably to a last great battle' (Revelation, p. 123).

10:1–11:14 Interlude between the sixth and seventh trumpets

Just as John inserted a parenthesis between the sixth and seventh seals, so he does between the sixth and seventh trumpets. Whereas, however, the purpose of the earlier interlude was to convey assurance of the protecting hand of God over his people during the Messianic judgments, that motive is but briefly mentioned in the little oracle of 11:1–2. The primary purpose of this interruption in the story is quite different. First, a solemn declaration is made of the certainty and nearness of the end when the seventh trumpet is sounded (1–7); secondly, John's commission to prophesy is freshly affirmed and even extended (he is to prophesy again about many peoples, nations, languages and kings); and thirdly, the task of the church in the time of tribulation is made plain, namely to bear witness to Christ before the opponents of the gospel (11:3–13). Here for the first time the figure of the antichrist appears (11:7), and the dual nature of the last tribulation becomes apparent, namely judgments of God upon those who oppose him and war against the church by the followers of antichrist. No promise of escape from the latter is given, but the end of the story is the vindication of the church and conversion of many.

10:1–11 The proximity of the end. 1 The mighty angel is sometimes identified with Christ, but it is unlikely that John would speak of the Lord as an angel. The language of the vision is reminiscent of Dn. 10:5–6 and 12:7. 2 In view of v 11 the little scroll appears to include the rest of the visions of Revelation. 3 The seven thunders were not uttered by the angel, for they followed his cry. Presumably they came from God or Christ (as also the command of v 4). 4 John is forbidden to write down the message of the thunders. What the message was and why it was not to be revealed has intrigued exegetes through the years. Perhaps it is meant to indicate that God's will is far greater than that which prophecy is able to express.

5 The angel stands on the earth and sea because his message is of world-wide importance. 6–7 The burden of his declaration is that there will be no more delay. God's purpose for humankind, revealed to the prophets, is now to be accomplished; when the seventh angel sounds his trumpet the mystery of God will be accomplished. The mystery is not a 'mysterious' revelation but God's secret purpose hidden from the unbelieving world. Its content is revealed and celebrated in 11:15–18.

8–11 Having been denied the right to write down one message John is now given a fresh commission to proclaim other messages. This part of the vision recalls Ezk. 2:9–3:3. As in the case of Ezekiel, eating the scroll caused both sweetness and bitterness, illustrating (certainly in Revelation) the mixture of joy and pain in receiving and making known the revealed blessings and the judgments of God.

11:1–2 The security of the church. In this short oracle the temple at Jerusalem and its worshippers are measured off for protection in the period of trial (for the symbolism see Ezk. 40:3–4 and Am. 7:7–9); the outer court of the Gentiles and the city are abandoned to destruction by a heathen power. It is unlikely that John wished this 'prophecy' to be interpreted literally (the city and temple had been destroyed a generation earlier), or that he framed it as a kind of prophetic parable. Rather, as in ch. 7, he appears to have adapted an earlier Jewish prophecy; literally it has been unfulfilled, but spiritually it conveyed the truth of the security of the church in its endurance of suffering. The same procedure of adaptation is apparent in the prophecy of vs 3–13.

1 The temple of God and the altar and ... the worshippers convey one idea, the church (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16). 2 Similarly, the outer court and the holy city together represent the world outside the church. It is a bold transformation, but v 8 implies that the one-time holy city has now become one with sinful Sodom, Egypt the oppressor of God's people and the tyrannous empire that wars against the Messiah. The 42 months of v 2, '1,260 days' of 12:6, and 'a time, times and half a time' of 12:14 are equivalent expressions for the three and a half years of the antichrist's rule, and are all derived from Daniel's prophecies (see Dn. 7:25; 9:26–27; 12:7).

11:3–14 The prophecy of the two witnesses. This involves similar principles of interpretation as vs 1–2. The OT closes with a prophecy of Elijah returning to minister at the end of the age (Mal. 4:5–6). The great rabbinic teacher Johanan ben-Zakkai, a contemporary of John who wrote Revelation, declared that God said to Moses, 'If I send the prophet Elijah, you must both come together'. Such an identification suits the description of the witnesses depicted in vs 5–6. Did John, then, intend us to understand that Moses and Elijah are themselves to return and fulfil the ministry described in this passage? No, there are indications that, as in vs 1–2, the vision is to be interpreted symbolically. John in v 4 represents the witnessing prophets in terms of Zc. 4; there 'the two olive trees' represent Joshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the governor, and 'the lamp-stand' is Israel. The single lampstand becomes two to conform to the two trees, and they portray the church in its prophetic capacity. The lampstand had already become seven to represent the seven churches of Roman Asia (1:12; 2:1); it was a simple transition to make them become two to correspond to the two prophets. So also, when it is stated in v 7 that the beast attacks (better 'makes war on') the two witnesses and kills them, and that men from every people, tribe, language and nation will gaze on their bodies and celebrate by sending gifts to each other (9–10), it is evident that an original picture of two prophets martyred in Jerusalem has become a symbol of a world-wide endeavour to crush the church of God. The celebration, however, is premature (11–12)!

3 The witnesses are clothed in sackcloth, for their message is one of judgment, calling for repentance, and is therefore parallel to 14:6–7.

5–6 The extraordinary power of the witnessing church is set forth in terms reminiscent of Elijah and Moses. The destroying fire recalls 2 Ki. 1:10–11; the ability to prevent rain 1 Ki. 17:1; the turning of waters into blood and striking of earth with every kind of plague Ex. 7–12.

7 Here is the first mention in Revelation of the beast that comes up from the Abyss. He is spoken of as well known, but fuller descriptions of him occur in chs. 13 and 17. Observe the similarity of language in 13:7 to describe the warfare of the beast against the church. For Abyss see on 9:1. 8 The great city originally denoted Jerusalem (cf. vs 1–2 and the last clause of this sentence), but has now come to mean what John Bunyan called 'Vanity Fair' (M. Kiddle, The Revelation of St. John [Hodder and Stoughton, 1940], p. 185). Throughout the rest of the book the phrase is used of the harlot city Rome (16:19; 17:18; 18:10–24). In one remarkable stroke of the pen, John identifies Jerusalem with Sodom, Egypt, the city of the antichrist and the world that rejected and killed the Son of God.

9–10 Jew and Gentile combine in celebrating their apparent victory over the church. Refusal to allow a corpse to be buried signifies the greatest depth of shame to which a person can be subjected (see Ps. 79:3). 11 The church is crushed by its enemies for three and a half days, a deliberate play on the three and a half years of the tribulation, which, however, is also the period of the powerful ministry of the witnesses. In comparison with that the victory of the antichrist is no victory at all. The statement that a breath of life from God entered them, and they stood on their feet, cites Ezk. 37:10, which refers to the spiritual quickening of the nation Israel. This ‘resurrection’, therefore, could be taken as signifying a revival so great as to fill the world with awe; but in view of the apostolic instruction on the resurrection of the dead and transformation of the living (1 Cor. 15:51–52; 1 Thes. 4:14–18) it is more likely to signify the ‘first resurrection’ (20:5). With the severe earthquake of v 13 cf. 6:12 and 16:18, both implying the arrival of the end prior to the revelation of the kingdom. 13 The number seven thousand would suitably indicate a tenth of the population of Jerusalem in the first century AD. In making the city to represent the world city John had no need to alter the figure, for seven thousand could be interpreted to mean any large number. The fact that the survivors gave glory to the God of heaven indicates that these events evoked repentance from the hitherto unrepentant populace (cf. Jos. 7:19).

11:15–19 The seventh trumpet

The sounding of the seventh trumpet is intended to bring the third woe (14), but instead of a description of calamity, proclamation is made of the advent of the kingdom of God. The nature of the third woe is expounded in detail later (see note on 8:13).

15 The language of the proclamation echoes Ps. 2:2, but uniquely phrased, for that which has arrived is the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ—an indivisible sovereignty. He will reign for ever and ever. Who is He? Our Lord, or his Christ? We have here a close parallel to Jn. 10:30, ‘I and the Father are one’.

17 The customary attribute of God is significantly shortened; no longer is it said that he ‘is to come’ (cf. 1:4), for he has come! The reign has begun, in that God has put forth his great power to subdue the rebellion of humankind against his sovereign rule, which has existed through all ages. The kingdom of God is essentially deliverance from evil and the gift of life. Ch. 5 shows that it began in the death and resurrection of Jesus, and its victory is celebrated in the song of v 17. The song marks an ordered progression of thought which is expounded later in Revelation. God has begun to reign, as seen in the millennial kingdom (20:4–6); the nations were angry, rising in rebellion (20:8–9); your wrath has come, manifesting itself in judgment (20:9); the time has come for judging the dead (20:11–15), when the saints are to be rewarded in the city of God (21:9–22:5), and the destroyers of the earth cast into ‘the lake of fire’ (20:15; 21:8). 19 God’s temple in heaven is opened to reveal the ark of his covenant. Its manifestation at this point implies that the goal of the covenant, which is the promise of the kingdom, is now in the act of coming to pass. Flashes of lightning, peals of thunder, earthquake etc. testify that the consummation has arrived (cf. 8:5; 16:17–21).

12:1–14:20 The conflict between the church and the powers of evil

Since the seven trumpets followed on the seven seals, it would be natural to assume that the seven cups of wrath would immediately be poured out, so completing the story of the birth pangs of the kingdom of God. A lengthy parenthesis, however, intervenes. It is necessary to reveal the nature of the conflict which the Christ will bring to an end at his appearing. The struggle of the Christians against the contemporary exaltation of the emperor as Lord and Saviour of the world is set in the context of a yet more terrifying contest, in which the age-old adversary of God and people strives by all possible means to thwart the purpose of God. The ‘parenthesis’ thus lies at the heart of the book, in significance as well as in position. It covers the whole Messianic period from the birth of Christ to the consummation.

12:1–17 The woman, the dragon and the deliverer

It is not difficult to recognize the essence of the Christian story in vs 1–6, but of one thing we may be sure: no Christian would summarize the gospel of Christ in this manner, omitting all reference to Christ's life and death. Many similar accounts, however, existed in the ancient world of conflict between the powers of heaven and hell. The Ugaritic Baal cycle tells of the battle of Baal, the storm god, with Yam, the prince of the sea. The Babylonians told of Marduk slaying Tiamat, the seven headed monster of the deep. (Marduk's mother was depicted similarly as the woman in 12:1, and Tiamat in battling against heaven is said to have thrown down a third of the stars.) The Persians spoke of the son of Ahura fighting the evil dragon Azhi Dahaka. The Egyptians recounted how the goddess Hathor (Isis, wife of Osiris) fled from the red dragon Typhon to an island; the dragon was overcome by her son Horus and finally destroyed by fire. The Greeks had a similar story in the birth of Apollo from the goddess Leto, who was pursued by the great dragon Python, because he heard that her offspring would kill him. Leto was hidden beneath the sea, and the newly born Apollo immediately attained maturity and slew the dragon. Other variants and additions to the story were current in the Middle East, and some Jews saw in them striking parallels with the promise of the Messiah. An unknown apocalyptic writer took up the saga and adapted it to Jewish hope by adding in v 5 the reference to the male child who is to rule all nations (cf. Ps. 2:9) and the defeat of the dragon through Michael, the guardian angel and protector of Israel (cf. Dn. 12:1; there is a remarkable parallel to vs 1–6 in one of the Qumran Hymns of Thanksgiving). It would appear that John was led to set forth the fulfilment of these expressions of pagan belief and OT promise in the Christ of the gospel by the simple addition of vs 10–11, thereby transforming the story into a proclamation of the victory of the crucified and risen Lord over the powers of sin and death.

1–2 Religious people of the ancient world would have seen in the travailing woman a goddess crowned with the twelve stars of the zodiac; a Jew would have understood her as Mother Zion (see Is. 26:16–27:1; 49:14–25; 54:1–8; 66:7–9), but for John she represented the 'Mother' of the Messianic community, the believing people of God of old and new covenants. 3 The enormous red dragon is identified with Satan in v 9. He is the antichrist of the spiritual world, just as his agent, the 'beast' (13:1), is the antichrist of earth. 4 His tail swept a third of the stars out of the sky echoes a victory of the devil over angelic powers, but for John it will have been simply a pictorial allusion to the dragon's fearful power. 5 The statement of the child's destiny to rule all the nations (cf. Ps. 2:9) explains the dragon's desire to devour him—he regarded the nations as his legitimate prey. Whereas the snatching of the child to God and to his throne originally was for his safety, the scene is sufficiently similar to the victorious ascension of Jesus to apply it to him in this sense in the passage. 6 The people of God are safe from the devil's wiles during the period of the antichrist's reign; this accords with the teaching of 7:1–7 and 11:1–2.

7–9 The war in heaven originally may have signified an attempt to storm the refuge of the Child-Redeemer. The heavenly protagonist is Michael the archangel, leading the hosts of God to conquer the devil and his demonic army. But the significant addition of v 11 transforms the picture. The real means of the dragon's overthrow was the atoning work of Christ; his people share that victory as they confess their faith in the gospel and bear witness to it through their word and deeds. The angelic conquest becomes a figure for the victory of Christ and his followers.

The song of vs 10–11 expresses in different words the songs in ch. 5 that celebrate the victory of the Lamb through his sacrificial death and his resurrection. So also in the extraordinary parallel Jn. 12:31–32, the hurling down of Satan is the result of the ‘lifting up’ of Jesus on his cross, thence to the throne of God. The imagery of v 9, as v 10 explicitly states, indicates that Satan can no longer fulfil his function of falsely accusing the saints before God (see Jb. 1 and Zc. 3), since Christ has secured their acquittal and reconciled them to God through his redemption.

13 The dragon now turns his attention to the women (i.e. the church), having failed to overcome its Lord (cf. Jn. 15:20). 14–16 In the symbolism of the story the serpent-dragon is a sea monster, and so to be in the desert is to be out of his reach.

The parallel with Ex. 19:4 suggests the motif of the second exodus: as the Lord delivered Israel from the tyrant Pharaoh, cared for them in the wilderness and led them into the promised land, so he will do the like for all his people in the tribulation that leads to the final kingdom. 15–16 The serpent sends a flood of water after the woman, but the earth swallows it up, and he can do no more. The picture illustrates the spiritual security of believers in relation to all that Satan can do against them. 13:1 The dragon stood on the shore of the sea—to call up an ally from the Abyss, his own home.

13:1–18 The antichrist and his prophet

The dragon, in his determination to annihilate the church, calls to his aid not one helper but two. The first beast comes out of the sea (1) showing its character as a sea monster like the dragon himself, and therefore demonic. The second beast comes out of the earth (11). This difference corresponds to that between behemoth the land monster (Jb. 40:15–24) and leviathan the sea monster (Jb. 41); in the prophetic and apocalyptic literature these creatures typify God-opposing powers (see e.g. Is. 27:1; 51:9; Ezk. 32). Consonant with this, the dragon, the beast from the sea and the beast from the land form a kind of evil trinity (see 16:13). Satan claims to be God; the antichrist is the christ of Satan; and the beast from the earth performs the function of an unholy spirit. The antichrist persuades the world to worship the devil; he has a fatal wound but lives (3), in a monstrous imitation of the Christ of God. The second beast seeks to persuade the world to worship the antichrist by his witness in word and deed, as the Holy Spirit witnesses to God’s Christ; and through the mark of the beast (itself a parody of the seal of God) he creates a devilish imitation of the church of Christ. So John depicts the world as divided between followers of the Truth and followers of the Lie.

1–2 The details of the sea monster are drawn from Dn. 7, but there the characteristics of leopard, bear and lion were shared out among four empires and their rulers. Here they combine in one fearful unity of power and wickedness: the leopard signifying cruelty and cunning, the bear strength, the lion ferocity. 3 That one of the heads of the beast seemed to have had a fatal wound, but the fatal wound had been healed indicates that one of the emperors had died but come to life. Precisely that was being asserted of Nero at the time of writing Revelation; for though Nero committed suicide in AD 68, it was widely believed that he had come to life and would return to lead the eastern powers against Rome. (See further on 17:8, 11, and the note on the antichristian empire at the end of the exposition of ch. 18.)

4–7 The world worships both the devil and the pseudo-christ. The latter was given a mouth to utter proud words and blasphemies (already apparent in the claims of the Roman emperors to divinity) and to exercise his authority for forty-two months, i.e. the period of tribulation, (see 11:2–3; 12:14). Who gave him that authority, including power to make war against the saints and to conquer them (7)? In v 4 it is the dragon who gave the authority; but the limit of forty-two months was set by God. Accordingly, it is the divine permission that ultimately controls the actions of antichrist (cf. Dn. 8:9–14; 11:36). The sovereignty of God is never more apparent than when wickedness reaches its limit—as is evident in the crucifixion of Jesus. 8 The reference of the words from the creation of the world is uncertain; they can be linked with the slaying of the Lamb (as in the AV, RV and NIV) or with the writing of names in the book of life (as in the JB, NASB and NRSV). Both meanings are equally true; for the former cf. 1 Pet. 1:19–20; for the latter Eph. 1:4. The difficulty is settled for most by appeal to 17:8, where almost identical language is used, linking the phrase with the writing in the book. Nevertheless, the word order here does not favour this interpretation, and it is best to keep to the NIV.

10 The AV takes both parts of this couplet as referring to persecutors of the church ('He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity ...'), indicating that justice will be meted out to the oppressor. The NIV is better. The saying echoes Je. 15:2 and is a call for endurance and faithfulness to death in the spirit of Jesus (cf. Mk. 8:34–35).

11 The second beast had two horns like a lamb, simulating the character of Christ, but its words were devilish (cf. Mt. 7:15). That this beast made the earth and its inhabitants worship the first beast suggests that it represents the priesthood of the cult of the emperor and the political authorities who supported it. It is later called 'the false prophet' (16:13; 19:20; 20:10). It is possible that as the first beast signifies the antichristian empire embodied in a personal antichrist, so this heathen priesthood is represented in a supreme head that directs its demonic work. 13–15 Heathen priests had little compunction in resorting to tricks, such as the production of fire, allegedly from heaven, and making an idol talk through ventriloquism. Note, however, that it is a standard feature of Christian prophecy that antichristian deceptions will take place in the end time (e.g. Mk. 13:22; 2 Thes. 2:9).

16–18 The mark of the beast on non-Christians is a counterpart of the seal of God on Christians (7:1–8); both show the allegiance of an individual, whether to God or the devil. The immediate effect of demanding that all receive the mark of the beast is the social ostracism of those who refuse it, and it entails economic warfare by the state against the church, with death to those who do not comply.

The mark is described as the name of the beast or the number of his name. Many ancient languages did not have figures for numbers but used instead the letters of the alphabet (a = 1, b = 2, c = 3 and so on). This made it possible for a name to be represented by the number obtained through adding the numerical values of the letters of the name. For example, there is a piece of graffiti on a wall in Pompeii which reads, 'I love her whose name is 545'. Doubtless the young lady knew whose name that was! So also despite the many possibilities that the number 666 yields, it is virtually certain that the individual thereby indicated was known in all the churches addressed by John, and probably far wider. The name Nero Caesar transliterated into Hebrew from Greek yields the number 666. If it is put into Hebrew from Latin it gives the number 616, which is read in some early manuscripts of Revelation. The number would have been seized on in apocalyptic circles where Hebrew (the language of the OT) was known. For Christians, 666 was an eminently suitable figure for the antichrist; it represents a consistent falling short of the divine perfection suggested by 777, whereas the name Jesus in Greek totals 888! Therein lies one aspect of the difference between the devil's christ and the Christ of God: the pseudo-christ falls as far short of being the deliverer of the world as the Christ of God exceeds all the hopes of humankind for a Saviour.

14:1–20 Oracles of kingdom and judgment

The NIV with the NEB divides the chapter into seven short oracles: vs 1–5, a vision of faithful believers in the kingdom of Christ; vs 6–7, the preaching of the gospel in the period of tribulation; v 8, a declaration of ‘Babylon’s’ doom; vs 9–12, a warning concerning receiving the mark of the beast; v 13, a beatitude on those who die ‘in the Lord’; vs 14–20, two visions of judgment, one using the symbolism of grain harvest (14–16) and the other the figure of grape harvest (17–20).

14:1–5 The 144,000 on Mt Zion. The purpose of this vision is to encourage Christians in view of the account of antichrist’s reign in chs. 12–13.

1 The identity of the 144,000 is determined by 7:1–8 and 5:9–10. John would not represent two different groups by such an unusual symbolic number, especially when he states that in both cases they bear the mark of God on their foreheads (7:3–4). The multitude is defined as those who had been redeemed from the earth (3), an echo of the description of the church in 5:9. They stand on Mount Zion, i.e. in the heavenly Jerusalem (21:9–27). This too conforms to the song of thanksgiving in 5:9–10, but represents an advance on the previous picture of the 144,000 (7:1–8), where this multitude is still on earth, though afterwards viewed in heaven but not yet entered on their kingly privileges (7:9–17). The name written on their foreheads explains the nature of the ‘seal’ spoken of in 7:1–8; it is the name of the Lamb’s Father (contrast the name or number of the beast on the hand or forehead of his followers!). 3 The angelic hosts in 5:9 sang a new song, but only the 144,000 could learn this one; it deals with the experience of redemption, which only saved sinners could know. 4–5 This description of the saved multitude is as pictorial as their number. They are viewed as males who did not defile themselves with women, most plausibly because they were soldiers of the Lamb engaged on active service (cf. the OT regulations concerning holy war, which include abstention from sexual relations: Dt. 20:1–9; 23:9–14; 1 Sa. 21:4–5; 2 Sa. 11:6–13). The symbolism could include abstaining from ‘fornication’ with the harlot Babylon (cf. v 8).

14:6–20 The day of wrath. This succession of short oracles is unified by the use of six angels, who announce the judgment and carry it out. Like vs 1–5 it is intended to strengthen the Christian’s nerve, the former vision depicting a requital of good, the other a requital of evil works.

6–7 A last warning is given to the unbelieving of humanity. All the nations are summoned to repentance and the worship of God. The message is called the eternal gospel, since the eternal blessings of the good news still remain for those who will respond. Observe that the representation of an angel preaching the gospel is part of the symbolism of the prophecies; the term ‘angel’ means messenger, and the messengers are of flesh and blood.

8 The fall of Babylon is recounted at greater length in chs. 17–18. This name is applied to Rome in 1 Pet. 5:13 and in other, extra-biblical texts.

9–13 This warning forms a complement to the preaching of the eternal gospel in vs 6–7. Followers of the beast will drink the wine of God’s fury ... poured full strength. The Greek text describes the wine as ‘mixed unmixed’, i.e. mixed strong wine that has not been watered down (for the symbolism see Ps. 75:8; Is. 51:17–23). The symbolism of burning sulphur as a judgment goes back to the overthrow of Sodom in Gn. 19:24–25 (cf. Is. 34:8–10). 12 The call for patient endurance on the part of the saints finds an additional spur in the contemplation of the doom of the worshippers of the beast; just as the knowledge that many Christians will be called to suffer imprisonment and death (see 13:10).

13 The beatitude for the dead who die in the Lord serves a similar purpose. If from now on denotes a point of time it will be the ‘now’ of Christ’s redemption (cf. 12:10). An alternative translation is ‘assuredly’; in which case, the statement is simply emphatic—‘Blessed assuredly are the dead who die in the Lord’.

14–20 It is common to interpret vs 14–16 as portraying the gathering of the church by Christ at his coming and vs 18–20 as the gathering of the unbelieving world for judgment, especially in view of the appearance of one like a son of man in v 14 (cf. 1:13). Yet it seems strange that Christ should be commanded by an angel to appear in glory and perform his saving work. It is more likely that the ‘humanlike one’ is a heavenly figure sharing something of the glory of Christ, like the ‘mighty angel’ of 10:1. The reaping of the wheat and gathering of the grape harvest then represent one inclusive act of judgment, as in Joel 3:13, on which these two oracles are based. For the reaping of earth by angelic instrumentality cf. Mt. 13:41–42.

The sixth angel had charge of the fire and came from the altar; this links up with 6:9–11; 8:1–5; 9:13; 16:7. It exemplifies again the connection between the sacrifice and prayer of God’s saints and the advent of God’s kingdom. The image of divine judgment as a trampling of grapes goes back to Is. 63:1–6. It is as symbolic as the measurement of the flow of blood from the wine vat, and typical in its exaggeration, and blood flowed out of the press, rising as high as the horses bridles (20).

1 Enoch 100 tells of warfare in the last days when fathers and sons fight one another and brothers fight brothers ‘till the streams flow with their blood ... and the horse shall walk up to the breast in the blood of sinners, and the chariot shall be submerged to its height’. The Jews similarly described the slaughter by the Romans in Hadrian’s time: ‘They murdered people [of Bether] continually, till a horse sank to its nostrils in blood. And the blood poured into the sea to an extent of four miles. If you think, however, that Bether lay near the sea, do you not know that it was forty miles away?’ John’s prophecy is a characteristic apocalyptic representation of the judgment at the parousia of Christ and is to be interpreted in the light of the nature of apocalypse.

15:1–16:21 The seven cups of wrath

After finishing the lengthy parenthesis of chs. 12–14, John returns to the theme of the Messianic judgments of the end time. As with the seven seals and seven trumpets the number seven is retained, but the symbolism is perpetually spoiled through translators interpreting John as speaking about bowls of wrath (in 15:7 and throughout ch. 16). The Greek term in question is commonly used of domestic bowls (so probably in Rev. 5:8), but it can also be used of cups for drinking (so clearly in Pr. 23:31). The frequency of God’s ‘cup of wrath’ as an image of judgment in the OT should be determinative of its meaning here (of its many instances see e.g. Je. 25:15; 49:12; Ezk. 23:31–32; Hab. 2:15). Is. 51:17, 22 are of particular importance, with their references to the ‘cup’ and ‘goblet’ of wrath. (Most translations mistakenly render ‘goblet’ as ‘bowl’.) Since John himself uses the symbolism of drinking from the cup of God’s wrath in 14:10 and 16:19, it looks as if the same image controls the presentation of the judgments in chs. 15–16.

The cups are said to cause the seven last plagues (1). This is often linked with the fact that no description was given of the seventh trumpet judgment, although it brought the end (11:15); it is then suggested that the cup judgments follow the sounding of the last trumpet. This is conceivable, but unlikely. The contents of the seven cups are very similar to those of the seven trumpets; in most cases the difference lies in the amplification of the earlier plagues by the later. For example, the second and third cups reveal that the second and third trumpet plagues have increased in extent (8:8–11; 16:3–4); just as the earthquake following the seventh trumpet seems to be that of the seventh cup, only more fully described (11:19; 16:17–20). The parallels between the fourth trumpet and fourth cup are evident (8:12; 16:8), as also between the fifth and sixth trumpets and fifth and sixth cups (9:1–21, 16:10–16). The cup judgments, accordingly, appear to give a fuller revelation of what had already been shown under the trumpet judgments, along with certain new features.

The song of the conquerors by the sea of glass (3–4) celebrates the conversion of the nations on the completion of God's 'righteous acts' (4). The vision, therefore, exults in the effects of the last plagues rather than heralds their coming. It is looking forward and serves to underline the statement of v 1: with them God's wrath is completed.

One further feature of the cup judgments calls for mention: they bear a striking similarity to the plagues of the exodus. This was noticed in the first four trumpet judgments (8:7–12), but it is clearer in this series, in that all the cup judgments reflect the plagues of Egypt, and their issue is celebrated in 'the song of Moses ... and the song of the Lamb', sung beside a heavenly 'Red Sea' (15:3–4). Everything in this second exodus is greater than what took place at the first exodus, alike in its judgments and its blessings, but that is consonant with the mission of the Christ as bringing to fulfilment the promises of God under the old covenant.

15:1–8 Introduction to the cup judgments

2 The sea of glass, mentioned in 4:6, is mixed with fire, intimating the wrath about to be revealed from heaven (cf. 8:5). But those who had been victorious over the beast stand beside it on God's side, as the Israelites stood beside the Red Sea and sang their song of deliverance (Ex. 15:1–18).

3–4 The song of Moses ... and the song of the Lamb is one, since the pattern of redemption at the first exodus has been fulfilled and completed in the second exodus. Every line of the song is reminiscent of the prophets and psalmists. Great and marvellous are your deeds, cf. Ps. 98:1; 111:2; 139:14. Just and true are your ways, cf. Dt. 32:3; Ps. 145:17. Who will not fear you ..., cf. Je. 10:7. All nations will come ..., cf. Ps. 86:9. Your righteous acts have been revealed, cf. Ps. 98:2; Is. 26:9. The vision is remarkable in its context, and is a reminder that the success of the antichrist is less than the hyperbolic pictures of the Messianic judgments may suggest.

5 The tabernacle of the Testimony (or tent of witness) was the name given to the tabernacle in the wilderness (Nu. 9:15), because in it the chest ('ark') containing the stone tablets of the covenant was kept. Since the chest was later housed in the temple, the temple itself was sometimes called a tabernacle (Ps. 84:1–2). The expression the tabernacle of the Testimony here emphasizes that the judgments about to be executed are the expression of God's righteousness.

6–9 When the seven angels were given the seven golden cups filled with the wrath of God the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God ... (8); for similar occasions of this phenomenon see Ex. 40:35; 2 Ch. 7:2–3; Is. 6:4; Ezk. 10:4; 44:4). Such a manifestation denotes the presence of God, and in this context it indicates that God himself is to execute the judgments that will lead to his kingdom. The angels are but his instruments.

16:1–21 The cup judgments described

1 Since no-one could enter the temple till the cup judgments are finished (15:8) the loud voice from the temple must be that of God. 2 The judgment of the first cup repeats the Egyptian plague of boils which issued in sores (Ex. 9:10–11). 3–7 The turning of the sea and the fresh waters into blood, like the second and third trumpet judgments (8:8–11), divides into two the single Egyptian plague (Ex. 7:19–21). The angel's statement in vs 5–6 has the same thought as The Wisdom of Solomon 11:5–14, but applied to the antichrist and his agents for shedding the blood of the saints and prophets. The altar concurs in this judgment (cf. 6:10; 8:3–5). Note the absence of ‘who are to come’ in the second line of the song (as in 11:17); since God himself is active in the judgments which will issue in his kingdom, it is inappropriate to speak of his future coming.

8–11 Once more an Egyptian plague (that of darkness; Ex. 10:21) is distributed into two cup judgments. The angel’s pouring the fourth cup on the sun increased its heat without extinguishing its light, but the fifth cup was poured on the throne of the beast and so produced darkness. It is possible that the pain of this plague was due to the demonic locusts of the fifth trumpet, which caused torments to the adherents of the beast (9:1–6). This interpretation accords with the relation of the trumpet and cup judgments outlined in the introduction to chs. 15–16.

12–16 The sixth cup, like the sixth trumpet judgment, affects the great river Euphrates (cf. 9:13–16), but whereas the sixth trumpet brought forth demonic hosts the sixth cup prepares for the invasion of the empire by the kings from the east. These latter are further described in 17:12–13; they put themselves at the antichrist’s behest (17:17), ravage the harlot city (17:16) and make war against the Lamb (17:14). The impulse to do these things is through three evil spirits ... like frogs issuing from the mouths of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet. In ancient times frogs were viewed as foul creatures, sometimes even as agents of evil powers. Here their task, like that of the lying spirit in the story of Ahab (1 Ki. 22:19–23), is to persuade rulers of the world to join in a great final battle against God, in the place that in Hebrew is called Armageddon. The signification of the name is unknown. It is a transliteration into Greek of the Hebrew Har-Megiddo, ‘the mountain of Megiddo’, but the town is located in the plain of Esdraelon in Israel and has no mountain (the nearest one is Carmel in the north). Like the number 666 it had a history in the apocalyptic tradition, but we do not possess its secret. For John it designated not so much a place as an event, namely the last uprising of the wicked against God that issues in the establishment of his kingdom.

17–21 The seventh cup is poured into the air, suggesting something even more awesome than the havoc wrought by the previous judgments; it signifies the final blow against the forces of evil, hence a loud voice from the throne (the voice of God?) proclaims ‘It is done!’. We cannot but think of the cry of Jesus from the cross, ‘It is finished’ (Jn. 19:30) and the declaration when God’s purpose in the new creation is achieved, ‘It is done’ (21:6). The flashes of lightning, peals of thunder, etc. suggest, as in 8:5 and 11:19, the theophany which concludes judgment and introduces the kingdom of glory. But while earthquake is an integral element of the coming of God (e.g. Is. 13:13; Hg. 2:6–7; Zc. 14:4–5), this earthquake is separated out because it shatters the great city and the cities of the nations. The fleeing of every island and the mountains symbolizes the reaction of creation to the overwhelming glory of God in his appearing (cf. 6:12–14). The ultimate judgment is caused by huge hailstones (cf. the Egyptian plague, Ex. 9:24; the routing of armies pursued by Joshua, Jos. 10:11; and the doom of the hosts of Gog, Ezk. 38:22). All such descriptions are eclipsed by this event, but it does not lead people to repentance.

A fuller explanation of what is entailed in the last two cup judgments is given in chs. 17–19.

17:1–19:10 The reign and the ruin of the city of the antichrist

This section expands the vision of the judgment of the seventh cup, briefly described in 16:17–21. It is important to observe that it does not describe what takes place after that judgment, for in it the end comes (16:17). Rather, the passage tells how ‘Babylon’ is made to drain the cup appointed for her (16:19).

The imagery in ch. 17 fluctuates in a complicated fashion. In ch. 12 the dragon with seven heads and ten horns is said to represent the devil (v 9), and in ch. 13 he is an incarnation of the spirit of evil, the antichrist. In ch. 17 the beast supports a woman, seated on it; she is declared to be the city of antichrist (18), and the beast is clearly the empire that maintains her. This use of the symbolism is comprehensible, for in the Akkadian form of the battle of the monster of the sea and the gods of heaven the monster is feminine. The woman and the beast are alternative ways of representing a single power of evil. But further, in v 11 the beast is a king, in whom the nature of the empire is embodied. This accords with the frequent manner of identifying kings and their kingdoms in apocalyptic writings (see especially Dn. 2:38–44; 7:2–8, 15–26). The portrayal of the woman who represents the city of the Antichrist in this chapter is contrasted in extremist fashion with the description of the woman who represents the city of God in chs. 19 and 21–22. For example, the former is described as THE MOTHER OF PROSTITUTES (5); the latter as the pure ‘bride’, ‘the wife of the Lamb’ (19:7; 21:9). Babylon is drunk with the blood of the saints and by her wine brings death to the world (6; 19:2); the bride offers water of life to the world (22:17) and witnesses to the redemption of the eternal kingdom of God (21:6–22:5). Babylon ends in eternal destruction (19:3); the bride-city is the heart of the new creation (21:1–5). Revelation is well characterized as ‘The tale of two cities’!

17:1–6 A vision of Babylon in her glory

1–2 The angel’s words to John could form a fitting title to the whole of 17:1–19:10: The punishment (or ‘judgment’) of the great prostitute. The city of Tyre was called a harlot by Isaiah (Is. 23:15–17), and so was Jerusalem (Is. 1:21; Je. 3) and Nineveh (Na. 3:4–5). The latter part of v 2 alludes to Jeremiah’s address to Babylon, ‘You who live by many waters and are rich in treasures’ (Je. 51:13). The River Euphrates flowed through the city, which also had many canals, and maintained an irrigation system that brought wealth. From v 9 it is clear that the city of Rome is in mind—it has become the new ‘Babylon’, repressing the people of God and corrupting the whole earth. 3 In v 1 the ‘prostitute’ sits on many waters, but here she is seated on a beast in a desert; the contrary imagery is explained by the association of the desert with demonic beings (cf. Lk. 11:24). The beast is scarlet, sharing the likeness of the dragon, i.e. the devil (12:3). It was covered with blasphemous names, referring primarily to the claims of the Roman emperors to divinity. 4 The luxury and moral filth of the city are here vividly set forth, again with the aid of Jeremiah’s characterization of Babylon (Je. 51:7). 5 The statement of the name on the prostitute’s forehead alludes to the custom of Roman harlots having their names written on the headband which Roman women used to wear. The prefix mystery signifies that the name is symbolic (cf. 11:8). The title characterizes the tyrant city as of the same nature as that against which the prophets of old vehemently protested. 6 The woman was drunk with the blood of the saints, especially through the inexpressibly cruel persecution of Nero, but also in anticipation of the war of the antichrist against the church.

17:7–18 The vision interpreted: Babylon’s doom

For the explanation of the vision in vs 1–6, v 8 is crucial. The ‘beast’ on which the woman ‘rides’ is plainly the empire of the antichristian city, yet the language appears to relate to an individual who once was, now is not, and will come up out of the Abyss (cf. 11:17). In reality this expression applies to both empire and emperor. The ancient myth of the conquest of the primeval monster of the sea came to denote on the one hand the nature of the political powers that oppressed the people of God (therefore God opposing!) and on the other hand their certain defeat by God. In some versions the monster was slain, in others he was simply subdued. The former is in view in Is. 51:9–10 and is applied to the defeat of Egypt at the exodus; the latter appears in Is. 30:7 to indicate the powerlessness of Egypt to aid Israel. Applying this to the end times it may be said that the monster from the Abyss was, it was overcome and rendered helpless, and so is not, but it will yet come; and so the power of Satan will be seen in another political power headed by another evil ruler. In John's time a peculiar circumstance made this concept extraordinarily powerful. When Nero died the news seemed too good to be true. Rumours circulated that he was still alive and would return at the head of an army to attack Rome. As years passed it was realized that he had died, but the fear spread that he would rise from the dead. So in true apocalyptic symbolism John combined the two expectations to express the hideous reality of the godless city and its godless ruler, both hellish in their nature and both instruments of the devil. (On this theme, see further the note on the antichristian empire at the end of the exposition of ch. 18.)

9–11 The duality of application of this imagery is expressed in v 9, but with a specific identification: the seven heads of the beast are seven hills on which the woman sits, i.e. Rome, familiarly known as 'the city of the seven hills'. Rome was acting the part of the 'Mother of prostitutes'. But the seven heads also represent seven kings. Whatever the number seven meant to other writers, to John it was a symbol of completeness. Accordingly, five have fallen means that the majority have come and gone; one is relates to the present ruler; the other (i.e. the seventh) has not yet come, but when he does he must remain for a little while, naturally, because 'the time is near' (1:3). After his departure the beast will reveal itself in all its bestiality in an eighth king, who is not a newcomer, for he has already appeared as one of the seven, i.e. Nero; but he is not to be feared, for he is going to his destruction, as every God-opposing monster is doomed to go.

12–14 The ten horns, in line with Dn. 7:7, are interpreted as ten kings. In Daniel's vision they precede the anti-god power (some are overthrown by him; Dn. 7:24), but in John's vision they are confederate with the antichrist, rulers of satellite states or governors of provinces. But they have not yet received a kingdom, and when they do they will receive their authority along with the beast for one hour. So short is the time when they are allowed to go on rampage! Their war against the Lamb is useless, for he is Lord of lords and King of kings—including antichrist's kings; and his called, chosen and faithful followers will share his victory (cf. the promises to the 'overcomers' in chs. 2–3).

15–18 While the waters of Babylon were literally meant in Jeremiah's prophecy (Je. 51:13; see note on v 1), John regards them as aptly symbolizing the people over whom the antichristian city rules. The returning antichrist with his confederates will hate the prostitute and bring her to ruin (the language of v 16 is drawn from Ezekiel's description of the chastisement of Israel; Ezk. 23:25–29). No explanation is given why the antichristian ruler turns against the antichristian city. The popular Nero story expected the emperor to arise to overwhelm the empire, yet this chapter, and v 13 explicitly, assumes that he will rule over the empire and with its aid rage against the works of God. But God has put it into their hearts to accomplish his purpose. The agents of the devil execute the will of God. Evil is destroyed by evil and reaps its own harvest. The antichrist and his allies, like the devil they serve, are in the hands of God until God's words are fulfilled.

18 The woman is now identified, at least as clearly as apocalyptic writing allowed, and enough for John's readers to know of whom he speaks: she is the great city that rules over the kings of the earth, i.e. in John's day Rome, the mistress of the world. For the significance of this identification for modern Christians, see the note on the antichristian empire at the end of the exposition of ch. 18.

18:1–24 A dirge upon Babylon

This chapter is modelled on the doom songs of OT prophets over oppressive and arrogant nations of their times. So reminiscent is it of these that it may be said to summarize all prophetic oracles on the doom of unrighteous peoples. The prophecies against Babylon (Is. 13, 21, 47; Je. 50, 51) and against Tyre (Ezk. 26, 27) appear to have been especially in John's mind. The song about the ruin of Babylon is considerably longer than John's description of the event in 17:12–18, but it forms part of that story and supplies a powerful climax to it.

1 The glory of the angel coming down from heaven is described in words used by Ezekiel of the glory of God returning to the restored temple in the new age (Ezk. 43:1–2). 2 Fallen, fallen is Bablyon the Great! is a quotation from Is. 21:9. For the rest of the verse cf. Is. 13:21–22. Strictly speaking this picture is not consistent with that in 19:3, but they are different ways of portraying the judgment of God on a city. John has no hesitation in mixing his symbolism, and he expects his readers to interpret it in the light of the prophetic scriptures. 3 John lays to Rome's charge the responsibility for the corruption of the whole earth, therefore this new Babylon must be destroyed from the earth. 4 Cf. Is. 52:11; Je. 51:6, 45. 5 Cf. Je. 51:9. 6 See Is. 4:2; Je. 16:18; 50:29. The cry of v 6 could be thought of as addressed to the avenging armies of the antichrist and his allies. See 17:12, 13, 16. Rome's judgment is to be proportionate to her self-glorification, wantonness and pride; cf. Is. 47:7–9. 8 Of the plagues that overtake 'Babylon' death is likely to signify pestilence (see on 6:8), and mourning calamity, so making the three plagues 'pestilence and calamity and famine'. The destruction by fire is performed by the invading armies under the antichrist; cf. 17:16.

The lamentations over Babylon are uttered by the kings of the earth (9–10), merchants (11–17a) and sailors (17b–19). John is here particularly indebted to Ezekiel's doom song over Tyre (Ezk. 26–27). 9 The kings of the earth are those mentioned in 17:18, not those in alliance with the beast (17:16–17; cf. Ezk. 26:16–17). 10 The substance of each lamentation is the same: In one hour your doom has come (see vs 17, 19).

11–13 Cf. the list of merchant nations that traded with Tyre (Ezk. 27:12–24) and their astonishment and fear (Ezk. 27:35–36). Vs 12–13 furnish a list of goods sold by the merchants to Rome; cf. the imports of Tyre (Ezk. 27:12–24). Citron wood was a sweet scented hard wood from North Africa, especially used for making expensive tables. Ivory was popular among Romans both for decorating furniture and ornaments. The term for spice denoted a fragrant plant from India, used for making costly hair ointment. Chariots are of a special kind, having four wheels and often expensively decorated. Two words are used for slaves, bodies and human souls. The latter expression occurs in Ezk. 27:13, and while in ordinary speech both were synonymous the latter virtually signified human livestock. On this Swete commented: 'The world of St. John's day ministered in a thousand ways to the follies and vices of Babylon, but the climax was reached in the sacrifice of human life which recruited the huge familiae of the rich, filled the brothels, and ministered to the brutal pleasures of the amphi-theatre' (The Apocalypse of St. John, p. 235).

17–19 The concern of the seamen, as that of the merchants, is not for the city, nor for those who perished with it, but for their own loss of revenue. 20 The appeal to rejoice over the judgment of Babylon should be separated from the lament of the sailors. It is best viewed as the completion of the angel's statement beginning in v 4, and including the lamentations of the kings, merchants and seamen. Whether intentional or not, 19:1–7 forms a fitting response to the cry. 21 The symbolic action of the angel is suggested by a similar one performed over Babylon by Jeremiah (Je. 51:63–64). Vs 22–23 are reminiscent of Ezk. 26:13 and Je. 25:10 in their descriptions of the cessation of crafts, industry, the joys of marriage and all means of illumination. Your merchants were the world's great men was uttered by Isaiah concerning the merchants of Tyre (Is. 23:8). It is adduced as a reason for Rome's judgment because, to judge from v 3, its merchants fostered the wantonness of the city and so were themselves bound up with the luxurious vice of Rome. Isaiah had already commented on the sorceries of the original Babylon (47:12), and Nahum condemned those of Nineveh (Na. 3:4). The NIV renders the term 'sorcery' by magic spell; this harmonizes well with the view that it represents not so much literal witchcraft as 'the witchery of gay luxurious vice and its attendant idolatries, by which the world was fascinated and led astray' (Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, p. 240). 24 Cf. Mt. 23:35, where our Lord so accuses Jerusalem. John's statement is justified not only by the persecutions of the past and of the future tribulation, but also by his understanding of Rome as the incarnation of the spirit of evil that has ever assaulted God's people (see notes on 17:7–18).

Note on the antichristian empire. One urgent question arises from the reading of chs. 13, 17 and 18. In these descriptions of the doom of the city and empire of the antichrist there is little doubt that Rome was in John's mind. He all but names it in 17:9, 18, and through his use of the mystic name Babylon. His prophecies set forth the impending appearance of an antichrist who would embody its wickedness, but whose reign would last only a short time, concluding with the destruction of the city and the appearance and reign of Christ. It is the height of irony that Rome, instead of becoming the sphere of the antichrist's rule, capitulated to the Christ of God and came to be a world centre of Christianity. Many have concluded that John's prophecies therein received their true fulfilment; but the prophet, with his anticipation of the coming of Christ and the descent of the city of God from heaven, would hardly have acknowledged that interpretation.

Here it is necessary to recall that John's vision is fundamentally related to those of the OT prophets. All the prophets, in their representations of the overthrow of the oppressor nations of their day, looked for the establishment of the kingdom of God to follow on those judgments (e.g. Isaiah awaited the Messianic deliverance following on God's judgment of Assyria, Is. 10–11; Habakkuk looked towards the destruction of Babylon, Hab. 2:2–3; Jeremiah and Ezekiel expected it after the return of the Jews under Cyrus, Je. 29–31; Ezk. 26; and every vision of Daniel looks for it to follow the overthrow of the tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes; see especially Dn. 7–9, 11–12). In the NT the evangelists place our Lord's teaching on the second advent in proximity to his prophecies concerning the judgment on Jerusalem (Mt. 24; Mk. 13; Lk. 21), and that advent is awaited in the not distant future, though never dated (cf. Rom. 13:11–12; Heb. 10:37; Jas. 5:8; 1 Pet. 4:7; 1 Jn. 2:18). To this John was no exception. Two realities would have been before his mind: on the one hand, the Lord had achieved a redemption that brought the kingdom of God into the world, and he was to come soon for its consummation; on the other hand, the 'mystery of lawlessness' was most obviously at work in the world (2 Thes. 2:7), and Rome was already playing the part of the antichrist. The stage was thus set for the end, and John describes the drama as taught by the prophets, by Christ, and by his apostles. He applies that doctrine to the situation of his day. The time scale was too short, but the essence of his prophecy is not thereby invalidated. The 'many antichrists' (1 Jn. 2:18) since John's day have increasingly approximated to his portrait and will culminate in one who will perfectly fulfil it.

The symbolism used in this 'portrait' of the antichrist is as evident as that employed in the portrayal of Satan, the city and the empire, and its use in ch. 12. John adapts the contemporary expectation of Nero's resurrection from the dead to depict the coming antichrist as 'another Nero'. There is a parallel to this in his application of the prophecy that Elijah will come before the day of the Lord (Mi. 4:5). John would have known how Jesus applied this prophecy to the ministry of John the Baptist (Mk. 9:12–13); he himself puts it to an even wider use in relation to the ministry of the entire church (ch. 11). It was as natural for him to represent the antichrist as working 'in the spirit and power of Nero' (cf. Lk. 1:17), by employing the story of 'Nero redivivus' without further explanation, as it was for him to use the prophecy of 'Elijah redivivus' without explanation.

Just as we should not try to define Jesus' coming with outward calculations, but pay attention rather to what God's providential rule creates before our eyes, so we should allow God to fulfil John's prophecy in his own way and day.

19:1–10 Thanksgiving for the judgment of Babylon

The words of praise that thunder from heaven for the manifest justice of God in destroying the city of antichrist form a response to the cry of the angel in 18:20 to 'Rejoice' over what God has done. The praises of heaven are recorded in vs 1–4, and those of 'saints, apostles and prophets' in vs 6–8. The order of heaven's praises in ch. 5 is reversed; first the myriads of angels voice their exultant joy, then the twenty-four elders and four living creatures add their Amen. The call for praise from the servants of God, small and great (5) is answered in the roar of the redeemed in vs 6–8. The fourfold Hallelujah in this passage is unique in the NT; the term occurs nowhere else in its pages. We know it through its use in the Psalms, in particular the so-called Hallel, i.e. Pss. 113–118, sung at Israel's festivals and associated above all with the Passover.

1–2 The song expands 7:10 and is similar in meaning to 12:10. Salvation includes deliverance from anti-god powers and therefore judgment. The angels celebrate the latter, as is characteristic of Revelation (cf. 7:9, after the judgments of the seals; 11:16–18 after the trumpet judgments; 15:3–4 in anticipation of the outpouring of the cups of wrath). 3 The second Hallelujah celebrates the irreversibility of Babylon's destruction. Its language echoes Is. 34:9–10, the day of the Lord on Edom, which itself recalls the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. The description of the unquenched fire of burning pitch in Edom, however, is followed by one of the land being inhabited by wild birds and animals, entailing two symbolic pictures of judgment, strictly irreconcilable. So also v 3 has to be qualified by John's description of the new creation (21:1–5), wherein there will be no room for Babylon's fires.

5 The voice from the throne will be from one of the four living creatures, not from the glorified Christ, who would hardly call on God's people to Praise our God. 6–8 The praises of the church relate to the coming of God's reign and the wedding of the Lamb rather than the desolation of Babylon. The statement, our Lord God Almighty reigns should be, as in 11:16, 'our Lord God Almighty has begun his reign'—he has brought to perfection his kingdom of salvation with illimitable blessing for humankind. Now, therefore, is the time for he wedding of the Lamb, in a similar sense, for the church is already the bride of Christ, but not yet the 'radiant church, without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish' (Eph. 5:25–26). The explanatory comment Fine linen stands for the righteous acts of God (8) clearly comes from John and is no part of the song. But note the delicate balance of the grace of God and human response entailed in the statements, Fine linen, bright and clean, was given her to wear, for holiness is the gift of God, and the bride has made herself ready, engaging in righteous acts of the saints. This twofold reality continues through the entire Christian life (cf. Phil. 2:12–13).

9 The fourth beatitude of Revelation anticipates the climax of the relations of Christ and his people. Those who are invited to the wedding supper of the Lamb are believers, indicating that a double symbolism is here employed: the bride and the guests are one (cf. 21:9–10, where the bride is also the holy city). These are the true words of God; they include also those that tell of the judgment on Babylon and the blessedness of participation in the Lamb’s marriage, i.e. the visions of 17:1 up to this point. 10 The angel refuses John’s worship since he too is a fellow-servant who holds to the testimony of Jesus. God alone is to be worshipped, for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. That rendering could mean that Jesus’ witness is the ‘breath’ or principle of prophecy, but that is too impersonal. The statement is illuminated when it is realized that the favourite name of Jews for the Spirit of God was ‘the Spirit of prophecy’; hence it means, ‘The testimony borne by Jesus is the burden of the Spirit who inspires prophecy’, and he glorifies the Lord! That perfectly expresses the teaching on the Holy Spirit in the discourses of Jn. 14–16 (see especially Jn. 14:26; 16:12–15).

19:11–22:5 The revelation of the Christ and of the city of God

The judgment of Babylon has been the theme of 17:1–19:10, stated above all in the seventh cup judgment of 16:17–21. But we have not yet been told of the fate of the antichrist and his confederates, the subject of the sixth cup judgment (16:12–14). This prefaces the final visions of the triumph of Christ and his kingdom, which consist of a description of the coming of Christ and the subjugation of the evil powers (19:11–20:3); the kingdom of Christ in this world (20:4–10); the last judgment (20:11–15); and the new creation and the city of God (21:1–22:5).

19:11–21 The rider on the white horse

11–15 The portrayal of Christ’s coming is achieved through a series of symbolic pictures which highlight aspects of an event too great to comprehend in advance. When heaven is opened the first thing John sees is a white horse, with Faithful and True riding it. We do not commonly think of Jesus returning on a horse, accompanied by multitudes of angels on horses, nor should we do so. It is a representation of Jesus the almighty Conqueror, ‘Field Marshal’ of the armies of heaven, coming to subdue the rebellious of earth, which are led by the powers of hell. His blazing eyes relate to judgment; his many crowns to his position as ‘King of kings and Lord of lords’. He has a name ... that no-one knows but he himself, yet his names are given in vs 11, 13, 16; these testify as to who he is, but God alone can grasp the mystery of his person (cf. Mt. 11:27). His blood-dipped robe is that of God (see Is. 63:1–6), which the rabbis said God would wear on the day of his vengeance on Rome. The armies of heaven that follow the Christ are the ‘hosts of heaven’, i.e. the angels that surround him (cf. 1 Ki. 22:19; Ps. 103:20; Dn. 7:9–10, 13; Mk. 8:38; 13:26–27; 2 Thes. 2:5–6). The Lord will strike down the nations with the sword of his mouth and tread the winepress of the fury of the wrath of God Almighty—two complementary pictures wherein Jesus is revealed first as a soldier and then as a farmer securing his grape harvest.

16–18 The angel’s summons to the birds of prey to gather together for the great supper of God is drawn from Ezekiel’s vision of the overthrow of Gog and Magog (Ezk. 39:17–20), though the assault of Gog and Magog is set by John at the close of the earthly kingdom (20:7–9), in harmony with Ezekiel’s vision (Ezk. 38:7–9). This great supper of God for birds of prey is a gruesome counterpart to the feast that begins the kingdom of God (Is. 25:6), here described as the wedding supper of the Lamb.

19–21 The beast and his confederates gathered to make war against the rider on the horse and his army. They are gathered, that is, to Armageddon (16:16). But there is no battle! The armies of heaven watch while the beast and the false prophet are captured, the Christ wields the sword of his mouth, and the devil is thrown into the Abyss. This is a judgment scene by the power of the word of God. The whole description is pictorial, including the horse of Christ, the sword issuing out of his mouth and the vultures that gorge the flesh of the slain. We cannot be sure of the details of the picture, apart from one dominant reality: the victory of Christ over those who oppose him is total. The antichrist and the false prophet are thrown into the fiery lake of burning sulphur. This fiery lake is a variant picture of hell, which in Greek is Gehenna, a transliteration of the Hebrew Gehinnom, ‘the valley of Hinnom’, where the Jews in Jeremiah’s time offered by fire human sacrifices (see Je. 7:31). In apocalyptic literature, both terms are pictorial, the former a development of the concept of the Abyss, both representing the inescapable judgment of God on those who persist in rebellion.

20:1–3 The subjugation of the dragon

The description of the subjugation of the ‘dragon’ (Satan) continues without a break the account of the conquest of the evil trinity which had gathered ‘the kings of the whole world ... for the battle on the great day of God Almighty’ (16:14). The paragraphs should never have been separated. After the judgment on the antichrist and the false prophet and the multitudes they had deceived, the ultimate enemy is dealt with, namely the devil, who had inspired the rebellion against God. No great contest is necessary; an angel seized him, bound him with a chain, threw him into the Abyss, and locked and sealed it over him—a fourfold means of ensuring that he was removed from all contact with humanity on earth (for the symbolism see Is. 24:21–22). As the text states, this was to keep him from deceiving the nations any more—until a time decreed by God when he should be released for a short period, i.e. until the thousand years were ended. The release, as the imprisonment, are for the accomplishment of God’s inscrutable purpose.

Note. The thousand-year kingdom of Christ. The ‘binding’ of Satan for a thousand years coincides with the ‘reign of Christ’ for a thousand years (20:4). This thousand years’ reign has gained for itself the name ‘millennium’ (mille is Latin for 1,000), and the doctrine is called ‘chiliasm’ (chilias is Greek for 1,000). The limitation of the Messiah’s reign to a thousand years is not found in the OT, but the kingdom over which the Messiah rules is typically represented as a kingdom of this world, centred in Jerusalem. Is. 65:17–25 and 66:22–23 speak of the creation of new heavens and a new earth, but the description of the kingdom of God therein is wholly in terms of this world (a joyful Jerusalem, human longevity, stability in homes and farms, happy children, peaceable animals). Some apocalyptic writers emphasized this conception of new creation, so among the Jews it became common to distinguish between the reign of the Messiah in this world and the kingdom of God in the new world (though not without the Messiah). Great diversity about the length of the Messianic kingdom existed among the rabbis. Suggestions were that it would last forty years (corresponding to Israel’s years in the wilderness), or 400 years (Israel’s stay in Egypt), or 4,000 years (from creation to the present). Other views were that it would last 365 days (Is. 63:4 speaks of a ‘day’ of vengeance and a ‘year’ of redemption) or 365,000 years (Ps. 90:4 speaks of a day as a thousand years with the Lord). This latter scripture became conjoined with the idea of history as recapitulating the week of creation: as the six days of creation were followed by God’s Sabbath rest, so the six days of human history would yield to the Sabbath of history, the kingdom of the Messiah, which would be followed by an eighth day without end. This view is stated in ch. 15 of the Epistle of Barnabas, a Christian work roughly contemporary with Revelation. For John the ‘thousand years’ probably indicated the character of the kingdom of Christ rather than its length, i.e. it speaks of its nature as the Sabbath of human history, and so links with the teaching in Hebrews of the kingdom as the Sabbath-rest that awaits the people of God (Heb. 4). Doubtless John would have been confirmed in this interpretation by his reading of Ezk. 36–48, where Israel’s restoration to their land under the Messiah, the new David, (chs. 36–37) is followed by the rebellion of Gog (chs. 38–39) and the promise of a new Jerusalem with a new temple (chs. 40–48). The prayer Jesus taught his disciples would have been yet more important (‘your kingdom come, your will be done on earth as it is in heaven’; Mt. 6:10); and John would also have known the beatitudes (‘Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven ... Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth’; Mt. 5:3, 5).

Paul’s exposition of the kingdom of Christ in 1 Cor. 15:22–25 is closely related to John’s exposition and indicates the likelihood of its being an established tradition in the early church. Certainly it was so in the early centuries, but it was opposed by some significant Christian leaders in favour of more extravagant interpretations. Augustine’s interpretation, that the millennium is the period of the church between Christ’s first and second advents, became the official teaching of both the Catholic and Reformed churches. It is exemplified in Hendriksen’s commentary on Revelation (More than Conquerors, IVP, 1939); he identifies the binding of Satan (20:1–3) with his ejection from heaven (12:9), the thousand years of the church’s power (20:4–6) with its time of triumphant witness (11:2–6; 12:14–15), the onset of the armies of Gog and Magog (20:7–9) with the persecution of the church by the antichrist (11:7–10; 13:7–8), the ensuing destruction of those armies (20:9) with Armageddon (19:19–21), and the last judgment (20:11–15) with the Messianic judgment (14:14–20).

This is a plausible and interesting interpretation of the text, but seems to entail insuperable difficulties. In 12:9 Satan is cast out of heaven, where he may no longer accuse the saints before God, to earth, where his war against the church intensifies, because his time is short; in 20:1–3 he is taken from earth and imprisoned in the Abyss, that he may no longer corrupt humanity. The judgment of 14:14–20 is aligned with the Messianic judgments of the last times, above all that which happens at Christ’s coming (19:19–21); whereas the last judgment of 20:11–15 is of all generations of humankind. The conquest of the evil powers is described in the indivisible passage 19:19–21:3, and that takes place at Christ’s advent in glory, which is followed by his thousand years’ reign. Add to that the impossibility of reconciling the assumption of John, shared by the prophets generally, that the Lord may come soon (1:3; 22:20) with the notion that the thousand years’ kingdom will precede his coming, one has difficulty in attributing this scheme of interpretation to him. John well knows that the kingdom of God was established through Christ’s redemption (ch. 5; 12:10–12); the kingdom that the Lord will bring at his second coming will be the triumph of that which he brought through his incarnate ministry, hence the revelation of that which has been in the world from Easter onwards.

Why, then, does God permit the release of Satan at the end of the thousand years? John would have answered, ‘It is so written’. The prophecy of Gog’s attack upon Israel (Ezk. 38–39) is set after God’s restoration of the people to the kingdom. Gn. 1–3 supplies much of the symbolism of the city of God in Revelation; John’s meditation on those chapters could have suggested to him that as Satan was allowed to enter the Garden to expose the nature of human hearts, so he will be allowed to do the like in the final paradise, so that all hostility to God can be brought into the open and be annihilated before his reign is made absolute. Like other apocalypticists, John would have known that the fulness of God’s kingdom cannot be attained within the limitations of this world, not even in a restored paradise; the goal of creation can be reached only through resurrection like that of Christ.

20:4–6 The millennium

The description of Christ's kingdom is extraordinarily brief; no word is given of the conditions of life in the thousand years, only a bare statement of who will exercise rule in it. There is reason to believe, however, that the extended description of the city of God in 21:9–22:5 applies to the kingdom in the millennial age as well as in the coming eternal age. 19:6–7 celebrates the marriage of the bride at Christ's coming; 21:9 reveals the bride to be the holy city Jerusalem. The hosts of Gog surround the camp of God's people, the city he loves (20:9), which must be the city of God, the new Jerusalem in the world. The nations walk in the light of the city and bring their glory into it; but nothing unclean enters its gates (21:24–25), and the leaves of the tree of life heal the nations (22:2). Such statements are even more appropriate to the city in the world than in the new creation. There is not a line in 21:9–22:5 that could not apply to the kingdom in this world, which suggests that it means life in history as well as in eternity.

4 Who are those seated on thrones? Dn. 7:9–14, 27 give the answer: 'the saints, the people of the Most High', with which Rev. 5:9–14 and 19:7 agree. Of these 'saints' John makes special mention of the martyrs and confessors of Christ, for the encouragement of all who may be called to tread the path of martyrdom. 5 The rest of the dead did not come to life almost certainly relates to the dead without Christ; John would not deny the resurrection of the church at Christ's coming (see the comments on v 4; cf. on 11:11–12; 1 Cor. 15:51–52; 1 Thes. 4:16). 6 The fifth beatitude declares the blessedness of those who share in the first resurrection. The second death has no power over them (cf. v 14 and on 2:11), and they will be priests of God and of Christ as they reign with him. Their reign, therefore, is their service of God and humanity.

20:7–10 The last insurrection of evil

As mentioned above, John here follows Ezekiel's prophecy of the invasion of Israel's land by Gog and Magog after the Messianic kingdom has been established. Whereas in Ezk. 38 'Gog of the land of Magog' comes from the north to invade the holy land, in John's vision Gog and Magog stand for the nations in the four corners of the earth (8). They marched across the breadth of the earth and surrounded the city God loves—a city some 1,400 miles (2,200 km) long, wide and high (21:16)! The event is as symbolic as Armageddon and represents an attack on the manifestation of Christ's rule in the world. 9b–10 The would-be destroyers are themselves destroyed, and the devil is thrown into the fiery lake, never to trouble humanity again.

20:11–15 The last judgment

If the fleeing of heaven and earth from the face of God is to be viewed as the precursor of the new heavens and earth (cf. 2 Pet. 3:10–13), the spectacle of the great white throne as the one reality on which humankind can gaze is indeed an awesome sight. But the description is likely to be symbolic, to enhance the terrifying grandeur of the scene—the last overwhelming theophany from which creation wants to escape but cannot (cf. 6:12–17).

12 The dead, great and small, stand before the throne, i.e. all humankind is summoned to judgment. Is the church exempted from this? 20:4–6 suggests that it is, but in that case believers will have been judged earlier (cf. 3:5; 2 Cor. 5:10), but John gives no hint of this. The passage stands for the necessity of all to be judged, saints and sinners alike, and there's plenty of time for it to happen! The judgment proceeds according to two criteria: first, according to what they had done, and secondly, the testimony of the books. This latter feature is taken from Dn. 7:10, which reflects both ordinary court procedure and the habit of Persian kings to record every detail of events in their provinces. The important thing is that the joint testimony of the two criteria agrees, and the book of life will reveal it.

14–15 Death and Hades represent the fact of dying and the condition entered on after death. Both were thrown into the lake of fire, a circumstance that shows the sheer pictorial nature of the scene, including the lake of fire. Into that lake were thrown any whose name was not found written in the book of life. That lake has its origin in the Abyss, the home of the monster, the enemy of God, and traditionally the abode of evil spirits and the place where fallen angels were punished. It is the alternative to the city of God. Accordingly, John represents the same reality by the very different symbol of life outside the city (21:27) in contrast to life inside the city (21:24–26). Significantly it all begins in connection with the new creation, the work of God in Christ; we can be assured that grace and truth (Jn. 1:17) will be as truly united in the judgment as they were in the cross of Christ.

21:1–8 The new creation

The unfolding of God's dealings with humanity in Revelation reaches its climax in this passage: vs 1–4 describe a new creation in which God and people dwell together in fellowship; vs 5–8 declare the truth of that description and its implications for the readers. Its purpose is to strengthen the faith, hope and resolution of the church as it faces its ultimate trial.

1 The creation of a new heaven and new earth is taught in Is. 65:17 and 66:22 (cf. Mt. 5:18; Mk. 13:31; 2 Pet. 3:12). Jewish teachers interpreted Is. 65–66 variously; some held that God would renew creation for his kingdom, others that he would replace it by an entirely new one. John's vision is capable of either interpretation; the fact that 20:11 describes a theophany, i.e. a pictorial representation of creation's response to God's coming for judgment, may be held to favour the former view. In any case, there was no longer any sea is less concerned with water than wickedness: the devil, the antichrist and antichristian empire are all depicted as sea monsters; nothing of that order survives into the new. 2 The imagery used in the portrayal of the Holy City here and in 21:9–22:5 fluctuates between the bride-city, as the context of life in the kingdom of God, and the fellowship of the redeemed with God. 3 This latter feature appears as the first and greatest blessing of the eternal kingdom. The term for dwelling is lit. 'tent'; it harks back to the tabernacle in the wilderness, on which the pillar of fire and cloud rested, the sign of God's presence and manifest glory. The same association of language is used in Jn. 1:14; in the new creation all that Immanuel signifies is forever fulfilled. 4 Cf. 7:17; Is. 25:8. 5 I am making everything new refers to God's action in the new creation, but it was begun in Christ's resurrection and is experienced by all believers in the present (2 Cor. 5:17). It is done echoes the cry on the cross (Jn. 19:30) and the voice from the throne (16:17). God is the Alpha and the Omega; his character guarantees the truth of this revelation. The added promise recalls Is. 55:1 (cf. also 22:17; Jn. 7:37–38). 7 A final promise is given to the Christian who overcomes: the blessings of the Holy City will be his or her inheritance. 8 In contrast to the overcomer, who inherits the kingdom, are those who preclude themselves from it. The cowardly either deny or reject God's Christ and worship the antichrist. The remaining terms describe the unbelieving, whose lives demonstrate their opposition to God.

21:9–22:5 The city of God

For the suggestion that this section portrays the city of God alike in Christ's 'thousand years' reign and in the new creation, see the note on the millennium.

9 The revelation of the bride was anticipated in 19:7–9. Here the bridal metaphor gives way to that of a city; a similar transfer of imagery is made in Is. 54:4–8 and 11:12. 10 The language is so similar to Ezk. 40:2 that we must assume that John had it in mind; the city descends from heaven to the mountain whereon he stood. Heaven comes to earth in the kingdom of God! 11 The city's appearance is compared to that of a jasper, and so its glory is like that of the Creator (see 4:3). 12–13 The great, high wall serves the dual purpose of keeping out those who have no part in the city (21:27; 22:14–15) and of providing eternal security for those inside. Its twelve gates are inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, just as the wall's twelve foundations have on them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. Therein the unity of the people of the old and new covenants is seen; together they form 'the Israel of God', expanded to embrace all nations in Christ. 14 The twelve foundations of the city's wall are not to be thought to stand on one another but as forming a continuous chain round the city, divided up by its twelve gates. The twelve apostles correspond to the twelve tribes of v 12; like the latter they denote a collective whole rather than a list of individuals. There is no need, therefore, to ask whether Paul's name is included in the twelve, and if so whose name is omitted; the question does not arise.

16 The city was laid out like a square; but as its height is the same as its breadth and length, it is a cube. One structure in the OT is mentioned as a cube in shape, namely the Most Holy place in the temple (1 Ki. 6:20); here the cubic shape indicates that the entire city is a sanctuary and partakes of the holiness of the ancient inner shrine. 12,000 stadia represents approximately 100 miles, but to translate it into modern mileage is to rob the measurement of its clear symbolism—an infinite multiple of 12. John may be saying that the city of God reaches from earth to heaven, and so unites them into one. 17 The wall was 144 cubits (216 ft), probably 'high' rather than thick, again a perfect multiple of 12. In this context there is no need to stress the disparity between the measurements of the city and the wall; the latter is big enough to serve its purpose!

18–21 The language of symbolism continues in John's description of the materials of the city. He has already said that its sheen is like that of jasper, the appearance of God (11); he now declares that the wall is entirely built of jasper. The pure gold may recall the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, which was covered completely with gold (1 Ki. 6:20–22), or it could allude to the thought in 3:18. The list of jewels that decorate the foundations is startling. Despite some uncertainties of translation they appear to be identical with the jewels inscribed with the names of the twelve tribes on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:15–21). Philo and Josephus both draw attention to the fact that those jewels also represent the twelve signs of the zodiac. On the basis of an old correlation of the jewels and the zodiac signs it appears that John's list of jewels portrays the progress of the sun through the twelve signs of the zodiac, but in reverse order! Perhaps John wished to dissociate the Holy City from pagan speculations about the city of the gods in the heavens; or it may be that the reverse is true, and John was showing that the reality for which the pagans longed is found in the revelation of God in Christ (the foundation stones have on them the names of the apostles of the Lamb—his witnesses!).

22–27 In a city modelled on the holy of holies there is no need for a temple; all is holy, and God is everywhere adored (cf. Jn. 4:20–23). 23 Is. 60:19–20 is clearly in mind. It is not that the sun or the moon have ceased to exist but that their splendour has been surpassed by the glory of God himself. 24–26 These verses reproduce the substance of Is. 60:3–11, but with a difference: there the nations bring Jewish exiles to Jerusalem and their wealth to Jews; here they bring their splendour ... glory and honour to God and the Lamb, so fulfilling 15:4. The language of the whole paragraph is especially suitable to the kingdom of Christ in the millennial age, but it can also apply in a less direct sense to the kingdom of God in the new creation.

22:1–5 This conclusion of the vision of the city of God shows conscious links with the description of the paradise in Eden (Gn. 2–3).

1 The throne of God and of the Lamb is the source of the river of the water of life (cf. 7:17; 21:6; 22:17). The Garden of Eden had a river (Gn. 2:10). In Ezekiel's vision a river flowed from the temple (Ezk. 47:9; see the application of this passage to Jesus in Jn. 7:37–38). 2 The tree of life (unlike Gn. 2:9; 3:22, but as in Ezk. 47:7ff) is viewed collectively. Like the symbol of the water of life, the healing powers of the leaves are taken in a spiritual sense, possibly in the first instance for the healing of the wounds inflicted in the great distress. 3 No longer will there be any curse cites Zc. 14:11 and reverses the curse pronounced in the original paradise (Gn. 3:14–19). In the new Jerusalem the effects of that curse are completely overcome. 4 The goal of redeemed humanity is here stated: They will see his face. Such a vision will involve the transformation of the beholders into the same likeness (2 Cor. 3:18; 1 Jn. 3:2). For the name ... on their foreheads see on 3:12 and 19:12. 5 They will reign for ever and ever expands 20:4 and is the final fulfilment of 3:21 (note that in 11:15 'he will reign for ever and ever' includes the millennial reign and that in the new creation).

22:6–21 The epilogue

Three themes find prominent expression in this conclusion of Revelation: the authenticity of the visions narrated (6, 7, 16, 18, 19); the imminence of Christ's coming (6, 7, 10–12, 20); and the necessity for holiness in view of the impending consummation (10–15). It is difficult to be sure of the identity of the speakers in the various utterances. Vs 7, 12–13 and 20a appear to be utterances of Jesus; vs 6, 8, 14–15 the angel's; v 16 Jesus through the angel; vs 8–9, 17–19, 20b and 21 John's additions. A great deal of variation is possible, but in the last resort it matters little, for the speaker is ultimately Christ, whose messenger is the angel (9) and whose utterances John records as a prophet (10).

6–7 In the light of v 7, 19:9 and 21:5 the trustworthy and true words relate not only to the preceding context but the whole book. They concern events that must soon take place because the Lord is coming soon (cf. also v 20). 8–9 The inclusion of this passage by John does not necessarily mean that some of his readers engaged in angel worship, though the practice did have a place among the Jews, and apparently even among Christians (Col. 2:18). John's action is natural enough, and its narration needs no other explanation than its occurrence and its interest. It is not so much a polemic against angel worship as a correction of the over-exaltation of all instruments of revelation. Angels, prophets and other Christians are on one level before God.

10 The injunction is the reverse of that in Dn. 8:26; 12:4, 9 and of Jewish apocalypses generally. Whereas these prophesied of remote times, John's message was of immediate importance and was issued in his own name. 11 There is irony in this utterance. Daniel had said (Dn. 12:10) that in the last days many would be purified by their experience of trial, but the wicked would act wickedly; i.e. in the last crisis people will come out in their true colours and range themselves on God's side or against. That teaching is continually stressed in Revelation (7:1–8; 11:1–2; 12:1–14:5 etc.). Here it receives its final exposition. Since the time is near let the person who insists on clinging to evil continue therein; he will soon meet his judgment. Let the righteous and holy guard themselves, for their Lord will soon come for their deliverance. To make of this statement a doctrine of the fixity of character and destiny of people in the last times is contrary to the context and the general teaching of the book (e.g. 14:6–7; 15:4; 21:6–8; 22:17). 12 Cf. 11:18; Is. 40:10; Rom. 2:6. 13 See the note on 1:3. 14 The last of the seven beatitudes of Revelation. Those who wash their robes have had their guilt removed through the crucified and risen Saviour and so have the right to the tree of life and may enter into the city (cf. Gn. 3:22–24). 15 This verse almost repeats 21:8, but the fate of those concerned is very differently represented. The fundamental reality in common is their exclusion from the city of God. John's use of such different images to express judgment indicates the great flexibility of his symbolism.

16 Jesus as the Root and the Offspring of David fulfils Is. 11:1. As the bright Morning Star he fulfils the prophecy of Baalam in Nu. 24:17. 17 The Spirit, who is especially active in the prophets (19:10), joins the church in calling upon the Lord to Come, according to his promise (7, 12; cf. v 20). The individual hearer of the prophecy of this book, as it is read in the churches, is bidden to say Come. The repentant sinner is invited to come, and take the free gift of the water of life and so be ready to welcome the Lord when he comes.

18–19 John has been harshly judged for concluding his prophecy with these words. It was, however, customary for ancient writers to protect their works against mutilation and interpolation by adding such an anathema. John's concern was to prevent his message from being perverted through addition or removal. The same concern is seen in Dt. 4:2. The so-called canonization formula in the passage—'not add nor take away'—has been traced back to 2450 BC in Egypt. Instead of the usual curse, John warns of judgment and loss of the kingdom of God.

20 John's response to the last promise of Revelation corresponds to the Aramaic watch-word Maranatha: 'Come, O Lord' (see 1 Cor. 16:22). The promise is the culmination of all promises; and the response is the sum of all living hopes.

21 The benediction reminds us that Revelation is a letter, and that its lessons are to be personally appropriated. Only by the grace of the Lord Jesus can that victory be gained which will receive the recompense portrayed in this book. It behoves us to open our lives to it continually, and to add our own Amen.

George R. Beasley-Murray