8:8–19 'No effect without a cause, as the case of the wicked shows'. Bildad appeals to tradition (as Eliphaz does in 5:27) because his own experience cannot handle the theological problem of Job's suffering. In two scenes (11–13, 14–19), each concluding with its own inbuilt summary, he depicts the fate of the godless with an image from the world of nature, meaning to say that where there is punishment there must also have been guilt. In the first, the papyrus plant that dries up from lack of water proves the point, and it is also at the same time a metaphor for the fate of the wicked. In the second, there is the image of the spider's web as a symbol of the impermanence and unreliability of the confidence of the wicked (14–15), and that of the uprooting of a plant as a metaphor for the destruction of the godless person.

8:20–22 'There is still hope for you'. Bildad ends on a hopeful note: 'God does not reject a blameless man' (20). And he obviously believes that Job may yet prove to be such a man. But Bildad's wisdom is too shallow for Job's situation. And there is a cruel irony here too. For if Job does what Bildad recommends and 'pleads with the Almighty' (5) and uses his piety to get himself out of his suffering, will he not unwittingly have proved the Satan right, that Job does not fear God without thought of reward?

9:1–10:22 Job's third speech, in which he acknowledges he cannot compel God to be just

In these chapters we reach a deeper level of intensity. In them we hear the strongest statement Job has made so far of his feeling of powerlessness (e.g. 9:3–4, 14–20, 30–31) and his sense of being trapped (9:15, 20, 27–31). Above all we see his belief that all God's apparent concern for him throughout his life has not really been for his benefit but in order to fasten guilt upon him: 'this is what you concealed in your heart ... [that] If I sinned, you would be watching me' (10:13–14). Not surprisingly, Job concludes this speech by repeating his wish that he had never been born (10:18–19; cf. 3:3–13) and by calling upon God to leave him alone in the few days that remain before his death (10:20–22; cf. 17:16).

Yet this speech is no mere repetition. For here Job also begins to open up the question of how he is to be vindicated, i.e. shown publicly to be in the right after all. He admits it is a quite hopeless task to make God declare him innocent (9:2), and the hopelessness of it throws him, by the end of the speech, into black despair (10:15–16). But it has become an ambition that he will not now reject, and its attraction for him only grows stronger as the book progresses (cf. 13:13–23; 16:18–21; 19:23–27; 23:2–14).

Job does not mean that God is unjust, though some lines could be read that way (9:16, 20, 22, 24, 30–31; 10:15). Rather he means that it is hopeless to compel God to do anything—even to give him the vindication that he is owed. His present suffering is a silent proof to his neighbours that he must be a terrible sinner; for they, like the friends, believe in the doctrine of retribution, that suffering is due to guilt. So the vindication that Job needs, and desires, is not some verbal proclamation that he is innocent after all, but a public restoration of his place in society, healing from his illness and the return of his possessions.

9:2–13 ‘I cannot compel God to vindicate me’. In asking, ‘how can a mortal be righteous before God?’ Job is not speaking as Paul would, of how a sinner might be ‘justified’ or declared righteous before God but of how a righteous person can be ‘justified’ or publicly vindicated by God. That is because God is God and not a human; he has limitless wisdom and power (4), as is shown by his control of the universe. Job focuses upon the more negative aspects of God’s power—he moves mountains, shakes the earth, seals off the light of the stars (5–7)—not in order to picture him as a God of chaos but to emphasize his freedom to act, whether for good or ill. The freedom of God makes him incomprehensible (his wonders cannot be fathomed; 10), unaccountable (‘Who can say to him, “What are you doing?”’; 12) and uncontrollable (he does not restrain his anger, if that is his decision; 13). 3 The picture here is of the lawcourt, where the plaintiff lays charges and the defendant counters with questions. If Job were to bring God to court, metaphorically speaking, he fears he would not be able to stand up to God’s counter-questions and arguments.

9 The four star-groups here cannot be identified with certainty, but they are obviously among the most splendid of the stars. 13 Rahab is a name (like Leviathan) for the legendary sea-monster of chaos with whom (according to some Hebrew folklore not found in the Bible) God did battle at creation (see also 26:12; Ps. 89:10; Is. 51:9).

9:14–24 ‘Even in court, God would not vindicate me’. Job imagines bringing God to court in order to force him to deliver a public verdict of ‘Not guilty’ upon Job. But that is really an impossibility; for how could a mere mortal choose words or ‘arguments’ against God? And how, if one did manage to enter into legal argument with God, could one be sure that God was really listening, since he is at this moment crushing Job with a tempest (16–17)? Even though he is innocent, Job feels sure that he would in some way speak improperly, and so his own mouth would condemn him (20).

9:25–35 ‘Does it have to come to a trial of law?’. Now the monologue becomes an address to God. Beginning with a reflection on the misery of his days (25–26), Job recognizes that his sufferings are a constant reminder that God regards him as guilty (27–28) and will go on doing so, regardless of what Job does to prove his innocence (29–31). So what can he do? He can try to banish the sense of suffering from his mind (27), or he can try to clear himself of his supposed guilt by taking an oath of innocence (28–31). But neither of these moves offers much hope of success, and he is driven back to the idea of the legal dispute with God (32–35).

32–35 The problem with a legal confrontation with God is that the two parties cannot be on the same level (32). What Job needs is an arbitrator who can mediate between the two, who would lay his hand upon both parties as a gesture of reconciliation (or perhaps, as a symbol of his power over them both). But of course there is no such arbitrator. ‘Very well,’ says Job, ‘I shall have to conduct my lawsuit myself. But I do not have the courage to begin such a dispute with God unless he promises not to terrify me with his superior strength’ (34–35). In ch. 10 Job speaks the words he would use (or rather, the words he does use) in the dispute he imagines here.

10:1–22 ‘I will speak in the bitterness of my grief’. Like so many of Job’s speeches, this one ends with a passionate appeal directly to God. Job is not content to talk about God in the third person, but knows that since his dealings are with God himself, it is to God that he must direct himself. There are four parts to the speech: its intention (1–2); the review of God’s motivations for his treatment of Job (3–7); the contradiction between God’s real and apparent purposes in creating Job and keeping him alive (8–17); and an appeal for release from God’s oppressive presence (18–22).

1–2 Job intends to make this a legal controversy with God. Like the defendant in a court case, he asks for an account of the charges against him (2).

3–7 In three questions, Job speculates about the motives that lie behind God’s behaviour towards him. Has it been in any way to God’s profit (3)? Surely God has had nothing to gain from his ill-treatment of Job. Is God’s vision only that of a mortal, that he acts so short-sightedly in his treatment of Job (4)? Has God so little time left to live that he must act with such urgency against Job (5–6)?

8–17 Here we have a beautiful description of God’s creation of Job and preservation of him (8–12): he has been moulded like clay, curdled like milk being made into cheese, knit ... together like the work of a weaver and granted life. Yet all the time, it appears, God has had a quite different and totally sinister purpose (13): to fasten guilt upon Job. Job is not admitting that he is guilty; he means that whether he is wicked or innocent (15), God’s ‘care’ for him has been to make him a target for his attack (cf. 7:20).

18–22 Was it for this that Job was born? He is doubly hopeless now; he cannot find out how to approach God to win vindication from him (9:11), and he feels he is in the grip of an angry God who will make him suffer whether he is innocent or not (10:7). Not surprisingly, then, Job lapses into his mood of despair we first heard in ch. 3, mingled with the appeal for the absence of God that we met with in 7:16, 19.

Zophar is the least sympathetic of the three friends. His message to Job is simple: you are suffering because God knows that you are a secret sinner (6), therefore repent (13–14)!

11:1–6 ‘God knows that you are a secret sinner’. Zophar is a man of principle, who agrees with Job that the real issue is the question of sin. It is not obvious that Job is a sinner; so he must be a secret sinner, whom God has found out. Job claims that his beliefs are flawless and that he is pure before God (4), but God knows otherwise—and somehow Zophar too has been let in on the knowledge—that Job is really an evildoer. Probably, his sin is so great that even with all this punishment God has forgotten or overlooked some of your sin (6). It may well be that Job is getting off lightly!

11:13–20 ‘Therefore you must repent!’ Zophar now tries to persuade Job of the blessings of repentance. Where Eliphaz was tentative, Zophar is peremptory. And he makes clear that restoration depends entirely on Job’s complete repentance: it is only if Job follows his advice that he can have anything to hope for. Job must devote his heart to God, direct his mind to God with full concentration and not rest content with outward symbols of repentance, and he must pray (13) and renounce his present evil behaviour.

The result will be a clear conscience (you will lift up your face) and a sense of security (you will stand firm; 15). But the reader notes the irony in all this; for everything Zophar recommends to Job has been Job’s constant practice all his life (1:1).

12:1–14:22 Job’s fourth speech: the friends’ ‘wisdom’ and God’s justice

This important speech of Job stands at the end of the first cycle of the speeches, after each of the friends has addressed him. There are two main sections: in the first, Job addresses his friends

(12:2–13:18), and in the second, God (13:19–14:22). The movement of thought, even within the first section, is constantly away from the friends and towards God. The essence of the whole speech is: I want nothing to do with you worthless physicians (13:4); I desire to speak to the Almighty (13:3).

12:2–13:19 The friends' wisdom compared with God's. Job here addresses all the friends, not just Zophar, who has spoken last. He denies that his friends are any wiser than himself (2–12), and contrasts their wisdom with God's (13–25). For the first time he is contemptuous of them. 'No doubt', he begins sarcastically, 'you are the people with whose death wisdom will cease, but I am not inferior to you' (3). That really means he thinks he is superior, and that is because he has by his experience gained a higher wisdom than theirs. He knows something they do not know: that it is possible for a righteous man to be afflicted and, equally, that the deeds of the wicked can go unpunished (4–6).

7–12 Here we do not have Job addressing the friends but Job ironically imagining what they might say to him. He says they have a very simplistic view of God's ways of working; they think everything about sin and punishment is so straightforward that even the animals know it. It is the friends who speak the bland and obvious words of vs 10–11, and it is they who assert that wisdom is found among the aged (12).

13–25 This hymn to the destructive power of the Almighty presents Job's new wisdom (3). The God he has now experienced is no calm governor of a well-ordered universe, but an eccentric deity; he cannot be comprehended and he cannot be tamed. What is most characteristic of this God is his reversal of stable order. In other hymns (such as Eliphaz's in 5:9–16) the purpose of such reversals is to bring salvation and to correct injustice. But here there is no moral or beneficial purpose in these upheavals performed by God.

13:1–3 What Job desires above all is to argue with God; he uses the language of the lawcourt. But his aim is not so much to win a case against God but rather to settle a disagreement. He does not propose a lawsuit in which he will accuse God of injustice in withholding vindication from him; rather, he invites God to accuse him, so that he may hear what it is that God has against him (13:23).

4–12 But still he has something to say to the friends. The way they have been behaving, he says, still using the legal language, is as false witnesses on behalf of God. And though Job has many doubts about God's justice, he does not doubt that God will punish the friends for their partiality towards himself (13:10) and their lack of objectivity. They would do better to listen to him (6), not so much to the words he will direct to them personally (7–12) but to the words of his dispute with God (13:13–14:22). But before he begins that dispute in earnest, he wants to let them know that God would not be pleased to find out (9) that in trying to justify his ways to Job they have turned to lies about sin and punishment. Any theology that does not have room for Job's experience, that of a righteous man who is suffering, is a lie, and it is shocking that lies should be spoken about God. In a series of rhetorical questions (7–9, 11) Job expresses his amazement that anyone will use lies in the service of the truth.

13–19 Finally, Job wants to explain to the friends the meaning of his new speech to God (13:20–14:22). In ch. 7 he had asked God to stop paying attention to him, and likewise in chs. 9–10. But here he sets out on a riskier path and deliberately calls God into disputation with him (22). It is dangerous (14), suicidal, in fact (15); but Job is sure that right is with him (18).

13:20–14:22 What is it God has against Job? There are two thrusts in Job's address to God here. The first (13:19–27) is a demand that God will bring out into the open what he has against Job; the second (13:28–14:22) is, quite paradoxically, that he will leave Job alone to die in peace. These two pleas have been heard before from Job.

19–27 Job first summons God to enter into a lawsuit with him with the purpose of pronouncing a verdict of ‘innocent’ upon Job (19). He sets two conditions for fairness (20): first God must withdraw his hand from him, and secondly, he must stop frightening him with his terrors (21). Only then may God begin the proceedings, or if he prefers, Job will do so (22). In the language of the lawcourt, Job asks for a list of charges against him (23). He is, of course, not admitting to any crime but means ‘what you claim are my sins’. It seems to Job that God is making much ado about nothing (25), punishing him for childhood errors (26) and, as we have heard before (e.g. 3:23), constricting and confining him (27).

14:1–22 The focus changes here from Job himself (as in 13:20–28) to humankind generally. Job is, of course, still speaking of himself but, as he has done before, projects his own feelings and experiences onto all humanity (cf. 3:20; 7:1–10). The point of this chapter is that human beings are too insignificant to deserve the kind of divine scrutiny Job himself is experiencing. Since humans are so short-lived, God could reasonably overlook their sins; they can hardly challenge the world order (4).

7–12 The contrast between the hope of a tree and the hope of humankind for a life beyond death underlines the thought of v 5. Human life has a fixed end and cannot be extended. A tree can hope for new life (7); for humans there is none till the heavens are no more (12), which is never, as far as Job knows. Job’s thought trembles on the edge of a hope for resurrection: if only Sheol could be not a final resting place from which there is no exit but a hiding place from God’s scrutiny and anger (13), a place of hard service which would one day come to an end (14)! If only it could be a place from which God would gladly bring human beings back, having stopped searching for any sins they might have committed, and having sealed up their offences in a bag (16–17). But the hope is an empty one, says Job, and he asks, ‘If a man dies, will he live again?’ (14). No! As mountains are worn down and the soil is washed away, even the firmest hope of humans is eroded by the bitter reality of death (18–19). Humans have no hope but to be ‘overpowered’ finally by God (20) and brought to Sheol in loneliness, not even knowing what goes on above the ground, even if their children come into honour (21). In their isolation they feel only the pain of their own body (22). The Christian hope of the resurrection, in its own way, fulfils Job’s trembling wish. Even though Job would have been prepared to wait an eternity for his vindication, in his story it is what happens in this life that matters.

Something dramatic has happened in this speech. After all Job’s demands to be put out of his misery as soon as possible, and after all his assertion that it is hopeless to dispute with God, he finds himself doing the dangerous and the impossible thing. Job now formally obliges God to give an account of the crimes for which he is being punished. And that demand, now that it has been made, cannot be taken back. Job has not gone to court to plead for his life or to beg for mercy, but to clear his name. He has no faith in the goodness of God and little faith in God’s justice, but he believes so strongly in his own innocence that he is convinced that sooner or later he will be vindicated.

All this language of lawsuits is metaphor, of course. But that does not mean it is just decorative language. It is the language of feeling, of the feeling of what it is like to be out of harmony with God. After a lifetime of godly living, Job has found his life shattered, and he has to learn a new and more bitter language to give voice to the discord in his universe. Now it must be the language of compulsion and division, of contest and defeat.

15:1–35 Eliphaz’s second speech: ‘Beware the fate of the wicked’

In the first part of this speech (2–16), Eliphaz addresses Job directly; in the second (17–35), he speaks more indirectly of the fate of the wicked. In this second section Eliphaz means to imply that Job is not such a man and so has no reason for fear. The whole speech is, therefore, meant as an encouragement to Job, and Eliphaz's position is the same as in his first speech (chs. 4–5).

In Eliphaz's view, Job has two faults: an intellectual and a moral one. The intellectual mistake is not to see that even the most perfect human is tainted in God's sight (14–16). Job does wrong in thinking himself above the ordinary (9) and in undermining the traditional theology in favour of his own experience (4). The moral fault is not to bear his suffering with bravery and patience. Whatever fault it was that earned him his suffering in the first place, it was minor compared with the wrong he is now doing in behaving as he does. It is a sin against himself (6) and against God (13) to speak so one-sidedly and bitterly about God. The very passion of Job's speech is proof that he is in the wrong (12–13); the truly wise person is calm in speech. Eliphaz does not reject Job as a person, but he cannot see that Job is not a man to be reasoned with. Job is a hurt and angry person; to invite him to patience is to demand him to be dishonest. If Job were to suffer in silence, he would be accepting God's judgment against him, and he can only do that if he abandons his integrity.

15:2–16 Job's folly and sinful speech. Job is not behaving like a wise man with his multitude of empty notions (2). What is more, in demanding vindication from God and in speaking of God's destructive power as he has (perhaps Eliphaz is thinking of 12:13–25), Job is being irreligious (you even undermine piety; 4). It is this error (your sin; 5), rather than true theology, that determines what Job is saying.

7–16 Eliphaz says again that Job is not behaving wisely but is letting his tongue lead him into sin. For all his claim to knowledge (eg. 12:3; 13:1), he is not wise like the first man, Adam (for references to the wise first man on the holy mountain of God see Ezk. 28:12–14). Nor has Job been a listener in the heavenly council of God (8) like the prophets who know God's secret plans (Je. 23:18, 22); nor does he have the wisdom that the friends have because they are older than him (10). It is no shame to be a little imperfect; not even the angels (holy ones) are perfect (15); but because he cannot be absolutely perfect, Job must expect a certain amount of suffering. 16 Eliphaz is not insulting Job personally when he speaks of humans as vile and corrupt; it is simply a generalization, however extreme, about the human race compared with God's purity.

15:17–35 The miserable life and the fearsome fate of the wicked. In this picture of the life history of the wicked man, the first section (20–26) concerns his anxiety as he lives in fear of death, and the second section (27–35) deals with his final destiny, that he will die before his time (31–33). All along, Eliphaz has been maintaining that Job is not one of the truly wicked, and so this description is precisely what does not apply to him. Job has not suffered torment all his days (20), and he is not, like them, hatching trouble, evil and deceit (35). He ought to recognize, then, that he does not belong to the company of the godless (34) and take care that he does not join them by his hostility toward God (25). There is, of course, a good deal of wishful thinking about both main themes in this picture.

16:1–17:16 Job's fifth speech: 'Shall I die without vindication?'

This is the most disjointed of Job's speeches so far. His previous speeches had built to a climax in chs. 12–14, and from that point onwards he has nothing really novel to say. In this speech we hear again several themes we have already met with: he addresses the friends with criticism of their speeches (16:2–6); he then speaks in soliloquy, lamenting the attacks of God (16:7–17); he imagines his possible vindication (16:18–22); he makes a lament about the friends (17:1–10); and laments that he will probably die without being vindicated (17:11–16). Unlike chs. 12–14, the subject here is always Job himself, and not humanity in general.

16:2–6 The leading theme here is ‘words’ and their lack of power. There was a similar opening in ch. 12, but the mood is now less aggressive, and it is mainly the feeling of disappointment at the friends’ words that comes to the surface.

7–17 The mood changes from a mere sense of grievance to a feeling of oppression, as Job recounts the hostile acts of God against him. He thinks of God’s assaults as if they were the attacks of various kinds of opponents: a wild animal (9–10), a traitor (11), a wrestler (12), an archer (12c–13a), and a swordsman (13b–14). It is like a rapid succession of still photographs in a film, one scene merging into the next.

18–22 God has, of course, not answered Job’s demand that he tell him the charges that he holds against him (13:23). Job is still waiting, but in the meantime he tries a second line of argument. He has been wrongfully attacked by God, and he will probably die from the attack. So he appeals to the earth to take blood revenge for him once he is dead—upon God! The cry, ‘O earth, do not cover my blood’ (18), is the same kind of cry as Abel’s who was unlawfully killed (Gn. 4:10). The earth can respond only after Job is dead, of course; but even now, while he is still alive, he has a witness, an advocate, and intercessor in heaven (19–20). This can hardly be a reference to God, for Job believes God has been nothing but his enemy (7–14). What stands in heaven on Job’s behalf is his protest that he is innocent, together with his demand that God should give an account of the reasons why he is assaulting him (13:18–19, 22–23). Even though he does not expect to be answered during his lifetime, the truth about his innocence has been placed on record in the heavenly court. His murder by God, when it happens, will be the final piece of evidence that he has been the victim of a miscarriage of justice.

17:1–16 Job is confident that he is in the right, but he does not expect he will live to see his innocence vindicated. As in his previous speeches, he moves here finally to consider his death; for that is the one certainty in his future, and he feels that it is approaching nearer. The whole of this chapter revolves about the contrast between ‘hope’ and ‘death’. But there is also mixed in with these expressions of hopelessness some biting criticisms of the friends.

1 Job is not literally at death’s door (cf. 16:22), but psychologically he is already in the grip of death; it feels as if his grave is already dug. 2 It is because of the mockery surrounding him that he is in depression. The mockery is very specifically the charge that he deserves what he suffers. 3 Since no-one will guarantee his innocence, he must ask God to accept his own person as his guarantee (pledge, security). 5 This obscure sentence seems to picture God as a boaster who summons his friends to a banquet while his children (Job in this case) are starving.

8–10 The point of view here is the friends’. Upright men as they are, they are appalled at Job’s present condition, and are roused to denounce the ungodly (Job).

11–16 Job falls again into despair, but it is not a despair that robs him of his belief in his own innocence; it is despair that he can ever be shown to be innocent. What has he to look forward to? He has lost his family and can expect only to join the family of worms in the under-world (14). If that is his expectation, it can hardly be called hope, can it? It is not because he is suffering a fatal illness that he is so depressed, but because there is no sign of the vindication he demands.

18:1–21 Bildad’s second speech: more on the dreadful fate of the wicked

After an opening address to Job, this speech contains nothing but a description of the fate of the wicked. This could be read as Bildad’s prediction of Job’s future; but it is more likely that we should read Bildad's second speech in the light of his first and see him as describing the kind of person that Job is not. He continues to assert the familiar teaching, but his description is so extreme, so black and white, that we can only be meant to find it and his doctrine unconvincing. Bildad wants the world to be predictable and tidy. He can see in Job, who is fighting a battle between doctrine and experience, only someone who is tearing himself to pieces. And he finds Job's demand for a new theology deeply disturbing: 'must the rocks be moved from their place?' (4).

Eliphaz, in his description of the fate of the wicked (15:20–35), had focused on how the wicked person experiences terror and insecurity all through his life. Here Bildad concentrates on the final days of the wicked, describing how he is trapped by death (8–10), torn from his dwelling, and brought before the lord of the under-world (14). 13–14 Death was represented in ancient mythology as a king ruling over the underworld. Death's firstborn will be one of his offspring, such as disease, and the terrors are his agents who drag people from life down into his kingdom.

Throughout Bildad's picture of the wicked man there are several parallels to the experience of Job (e.g. 13, 15, 19, 20). Though these parallels are in bad taste, their purpose is not to stress that Job is a sinner, but rather to warn him of what will happen if he does not change his behaviour (as Bildad had advised him in 8:5–7). Job can choose whether this description of the fate of the wicked will be true of him or not.

19:1–29 Job's sixth speech, in which he reacts in anger

In this speech there is an address to the friends at beginning, middle and end (2–6, 21–22, 28–29). Between these addresses there is a complaint (7–20) and an expression of wish, knowledge and desire (23–27).

19:1–6 'What you need to know, my friends, my enemies'. Job speaks here less in sorrow than in anger. He does not mean that he does in fact feel 'crushed' by the friends (2), but that he begins to recognize them as his enemies, who are trying to crush him with their arguments. They have been trying to humiliate him (rather than the NIV's have reproached me), but without success (3). He does not admit to any sin, but protests that, if he had sinned, it would not have been a sin against them; so it is unfair of them to attack him (4). If they intend to treat him as an enemy by arguing that his humiliation by suffering is proof of his sin (5), they should know that it is not he who is in the wrong, but God who has wronged him (6).

19:7–20 'The wrong that God has done me'. 7–12 Job depicts the wrong God has done him with an astonishing range of images of assault: the townsman who has been robbed but finds no one to help even when he shouts out (7); the traveller who finds his path blocked and nightfall overtaking him (8); the prince who is humiliated by a foreign ruler (9); the plant that is pulled down or pulled out of the ground (10); the person who finds his friend has become his enemy (11); and the king or city besieged by enemies (12).

13–20 In vs 7–12 there was nothing but images of physical violence; here no-one raises a hand or even a voice. This is the literal truth of what Job is experiencing; vs 7–12 are his expression of what that literal truth feels like. Job looks around at those who know him; his vision moves inward, from his kinspeople and acquaintances (13–14) to his household servants (15–16) and his wife and brothers (17), and outward again to the children of the neighbourhood (18) and all those who know him (19). Wherever he looks he finds himself isolated and alienated. And it is God who has caused this, not directly but through making him suffer. For Job's suffering means to everyone who knows him that, despite everything they thought they knew about him, Job has been a dreadful sinner. It is dangerous to associate with such a wicked person. The result of all God's attacks on him is that 'my bones hang from my skin and my flesh' (rather than the NIV's 'I am nothing but skin and bones', 20). Normally the bones are the framework of the human body, and the flesh and skin 'hang' on them; but Job is so weakened emotionally that he is in a state of collapse, as if his bones had no more strength left in them.

19:21–22 'Pity me, my friends!'. It seems strange that Job should now ask the friends for pity, after so often attacking them previously (e.g. 6:15–17; 12:2–3; 13:2). It makes more sense if we realize that he is not asking them for sympathy in general, but simply to stop persecuting him with their speeches.

19:23–27 Job's wish, knowledge and desire. The main emphasis in these famous words of Job is on his desire that while he is still alive (in my flesh: 26) he may see God face to face, as his legal opponent in some court of law, so that his claim for vindication of his good name may be heard.

Job does not believe that God will accept his plea to come to court, so his wish is that his claim to innocence could be recorded in some permanent form that would last beyond his death, and might perhaps be settled some day. But it is a hopeless wish, that his words, his legal claims, could be written 'in an inscription' (rather than the NIV's on a scroll) with an iron tool (24); for the only permanent record of his claims is his oath of innocence that he has uttered in the ears of heaven (cf. 16:19–20).

What Job knows is that God is his enemy (cf. 6:4; 10:8–14; 13:24; 16:7–14; 19:7–12), that he will never again see good (7:7), that he will soon be dead (7:21; 10:20; 16:22), that he will be murdered by God (12:15; 16:18) and so on. But what he desires is to enter into dispute with God (13:3, 22) in the hope of winning vindication before his death. It is for this that his heart yearns within him (27). He has never before believed that he will in the end be vindicated; but now he says that I know (25), even though the vindication will only come after his death.

25–27 These key verses should probably be translated: 'But I know that my champion lives and that he will rise last to speak for me on earth, even after my skin has thus been stripped from me. Yet, to behold God while still in my flesh—that is my desire, to see him for myself, to see him with my own eyes, not as a stranger.' Job's 'champion' can hardly be God, who has only been his enemy; it must be his own assertion of his innocence that testifies for him in heaven (16:17). As in an earthly lawcourt, where the last person to speak is the victor in the dispute, he believes that his own oath will have the last, decisive word. But that, of course, is only likely to happen after my skin has been destroyed (26), i.e. after his death. That is what Job expects. But what he desires is to see his name cleared while he is still alive.

19:28–29 'Why you, my friends, should be afraid'. There is a note of exasperation here, not unlike his impatience in 25–27. Job has not drifted off into some peaceful haven of trust in God but has been vigorously asserting his belief, yet again, in the rightness of his cause. It is not surprising that he should speak severely against all those who doubt him. The friends continue to 'persecute' (NIV, hound) him, which must mean, accuse him of wrongdoing, saying that the root of the trouble lies in him, i.e. he is the author of his own misfortunes. These are lies, so the friends should fear the sword themselves; Job has done nothing worthy of punishment, but the friends have! They have accused him unjustly, and that is a crime; they are in danger of discovering for themselves that there is a judgment.

20:1–29 Zophar's second speech: 'You must repent or be destroyed'

Like the second speech of Bildad, Zophar's second speech is mostly devoted to the theme of the doom of the wicked (4–28). But unlike Eliphaz (for whom the fate of the wicked is a picture of what Job is not), or for Bildad (for whom it is a picture of what Job may become), for Zophar it is a picture of what Job will not avoid unless he changes radically.

20:1–3 A response to Job's claims. Zophar claims to be troubled by Job; and even if his language is only conventional, his claim rings true. For if Job is right, everything that Zophar stands for is wrong.

20:4–11 'How thorough is the destruction the wicked faces!' Job argued that the friends were trying to humiliate him (19:3), and now Zophar declares himself humiliated or 'dishonoured' (3) by what he calls Job's 'instruction' of him (NIV, rebuke). He responds with an appeal to 'reason' (NIV, understanding), but in fact his argument is only an appeal to tradition, as his very next words show (4).

The basic image here is of 'absence' or 'disappearance' (especially in vs 7–9). The wicked man ceases to exist, like fuel for the fire (7a), like a dream that can never be found (8), or like someone who disappears from the sight of family and friends (7b, 9). It does not matter how prominent or visible the wicked man has been, even if he has been as high as heaven (6). The wicked in this chapter is someone who does wrong to others in the community, not especially someone who is not religious or moral in himself.

20:12–23 'There is no lasting profit from wrongdoing'. The key image here is that of 'eating'. Mouth, tongue, palate, stomach, innards and belly are referred to; there is savouring, swallowing, vomiting, sucking and eating, and also there is food, sweetness, oil, honey and cream. But all of the objects that the wrongdoer takes into himself bring him no lasting benefit. The food he eats leads not to his nourishment but to his death. One image is of food that is pleasant to taste but that sours the stomach and is vomited up (12–15). Another is of food that turns out to be deadly poison (16–19). In a third image, the wrongdoer is so greedy that he consumes all the food that is available and then starves to death (20–22).

20:24–29 'The final doom of the wicked is inescapable'. Here several images crowd together, as in a nightmare, to illustrate how impossible it is for the wicked man to escape his final doom. There is a military image (if he escapes one weapon, he will fall to another, more fatal one; 24–25b), and a legal one (he is sentenced to death by the combined testimony of heaven and earth; 27). He is consumed by God's anger (26); and a flood carries him and his household away (28).

Does Zophar still have Job in mind by the end of his speech or has he allowed his rhetoric to carry him away? He certainly has an eye for the dramatic picture, but does he think he is terrifying Job with all these images? Job has been living through a nightmare just as horrifying as the scenes described by Zophar, and he does not need to be told that this is the conventional fate that righteous people expect from the wicked. He does not need to be told either, though Zophar does, that the picture here is not very true to real life.

21:1–34 Job's seventh speech: 'The wicked prosper and the righteous suffer'

All three speeches of the friends in the second cycle concentrated on the theme of the fate of the wicked, and Zophar, in the last speech, even claimed that the wicked enjoy the fruits of their sin for only a brief period. 'No', says Job, 'the wicked spend their years in prosperity, and go down to the grave in peace' (13). Job's position is equally extreme, but it seems closer to real life.

21:2–6 ‘Hear me, my friends’. Job must make himself heard on this subject; for the friends have all been in agreement against him. To be listened to for once will be better consolation for Job than any amount of speeches (2). No doubt they will mock on (3); for his complaint is not to man but against God, and he can expect no sympathy from the upright when that is the case. If they will really hear what he has to say (look at me; 5), they will be so shocked at what he will tell them about the way the universe is being run that they will clap their hand over their mouth in a gesture of amazed silence. It is awful enough for Job himself to contemplate this truth that in God’s world the wicked are allowed to prosper (6).

21:7–16 ‘The wicked prosper; why so?’. Job denies all that the friends have said. The wicked live to old age (7), they see their children established (8), their animals suffer no accident (10), and they even blaspheme God (14–15) and survive. Job cruelly parodies Eliphaz’s picture of the prosperity of the righteous (5:17–27). Within three verses Job contradicts Zophar (7; cf. 20:11), Bildad (8; cf. 18:19) and Eliphaz (9; cf. 5:24). Job does not want the wicked’s kind of prosperity (16), and with every sentence he speaks about it he means to say: ‘Why is this allowed to happen?’ (7).

21:17–21 ‘How often do the godless suffer?’. ‘It is only rarely that the wicked suffer’, says Job (7), contradicting Zophar (20:5). He imagines the friends replying, ‘Well, if the wicked themselves do not suffer, their children do.’ But Job answers, ‘If there is going to be a principle of retribution, it ought to strike the people who deserve to be struck!’

21:22–26 ‘Being good or bad makes no difference’. Perhaps v 22 is (like v 19) another unmarked quotation from the friends, who are implying that Job is criticizing the wisdom and justice of God. Job replies that in fact it seems to make no difference whether a person is good or bad; the same fate happens to all. He does not appear to be contrasting here the prosperity of the wicked (23–24) with the bitterness of soul of the righteous (25). Rather, he seems to be saying that just as in death no moral differences between humans explain their common fate, neither in life are such differences significant.

21:27–34 Human experience proves Job right. Job knows what his friends have been thinking (27) while they have been describing the fate of the wicked: the wicked suffer—Job is suffering—therefore Job belongs with the wicked. Yet the friends’ belief is proved false by common human experience. Job says that if you ask any traveller, you will hear of the wicked being spared from the day of calamity (30). No-one denounces his conduct to his face (31), no-one repays him for his deeds. In death, as in life, he is honoured by thousands, and his tomb is even guarded against grave robbers.

22:1–30 Eliphaz’s third speech: Job’s great wickedness

In the first cycle of speeches, the friends had their individual points of view; in the second, they all concentrated on the fate of the wicked; now in the third cycle (22:1–31:40), it is harder to see any logic in the speeches. Eliphaz apparently contradicts his original position, Bildad delivers only the preface to a speech (25:1–6) and Zophar makes no speech at all. Perhaps something has been lost from the original text, but as it stands now it seems that the friends have little that is new to say.

22:2–11 ‘Is not your wickedness great?’ In one respect Eliphaz’s message here is the same as in his first speech (chs. 4–5): he believes that Job will be delivered through the cleanness of his hands (30). His advice is for him to submit to God (21). But in another matter, Eliphaz seems greatly at variance with his former position: he apparently accuses Job of untold wickedness (5), mainly social injustice (8–9). These are the most specific, most harsh, and most unjust words spoken against Job in the whole book, and it is strange to find them on the lips of Eliphaz, out of all the friends. Now Eliphaz cannot have spoken chs. 4–5 if he believed that Job had really demand[ed] security [pledges] for no reason, stripped men of their clothing (6), withheld water and food from the weary and hungry (7), rejected the pleas of widows and the fatherless (9). What Eliphaz must mean is that, since Job is suffering for some cause, and since the cause cannot be found in any wrong that Job has done, his sin must lie in what he has failed to do. It is not that Job has stripped the poor of their clothing, but that he must have failed to offer clothing to some needy person; and so on. It is not for Job's righteousness (which Eliphaz does not doubt) that God rebukes Job (4), but for leaving undone those things that ought to have been done.

22:12–20 'God can see your secret sin'. It was Zophar originally who accused Job of being a secret sinner (11:5–6), but now we find Eliphaz warning Job that God must know of his sins of omission Eliphaz has just referred to. Job cannot hope to escape the penetrating insight of God (13). Evil men have not found it possible to escape God's judgment; even though temporarily their houses were filled ... with good things (18), they have been carried off before their time (16), to the pleasure of the righteous (19–20). Their sins were detected by God; so too are Job's.

22:21–30 'How you can be delivered'. Eliphaz speaks again as in chs. 4–5. He is basically on Job's side and hopeful that Job can be at peace with God. Borrowing a theme from Bildad's first speech (cf. 8:5–6), Eliphaz calls Job to return to the Almighty (23), i.e. repent, find delight in the Almighty (26), pray and fulfil his vows (27). Then everything Job does will prosper (28), and he will even bring blessing to others, as he did in the past (4:3–4). Unlike the recent speeches of the friends, this speech ends on an uplifting note—to which Job responds with even deeper despair.

23:1–24:25 Job's eighth speech: 'God should be available regularly'

There are two main themes in this speech. The first is Job's repeated appeal to God for vindication, together with his renewed sense of how hopeless it is to gain access to God (ch. 23). The second is the plight of the innocent poor compared with the prosperity of the rich, a situation that God seems to do nothing about (ch. 24). All in all, though Job believes that if he could gain access to God he would be vindicated, he despairs of ever receiving such vindication, since God plainly does not hold regular times for judgment when wrongs are righted.

23:2–17 'Oh, that I knew where I might find him'. If only he could gain access to God, the problem of his vindication would be solved, Job believes. God would not be violent with him but would listen to his protestations of innocence (6) and would acquit him (7). But God is inaccessible: he is neither forward nor backward, neither on the left hand nor on the right hand (8–9). And yet, if Job cannot find God, he knows that God can find him (he knows the way that I take; 10) and that if God chooses to put him to the test he will come forth as gold, vindicated as innocent (10–11). But God is not acting fairly or legally; he does whatever he pleases (13), and that is only for Job's suffering. He is fighting in the dark against an unassailable and an inaccessible opponent, but he will go on fighting (17).

24:1–25 'Why are times for judgment not kept by God?' Job sees that he is not the only troubled person on earth. Looking beyond himself to people in general, both innocent and guilty, he wonders why God does not hold regular assize days (times for judgment; 1), at which the injustices in the way the world is governed could be cleared up.

First, why is the injustice of the suffering of the innocent poor allowed to go on for so long? The poor have their landmarks removed (2; cf. Dt. 19:14), and their flocks seized (2b–3); they are insulted (4), reduced to gleaning the corners of the field (6), to sleeping without enough covering (7–8), to working for less than a living wage (11). It is a moving picture; but it does not move God, apparently, for he pays no attention to the cries of the poor (12c).

Secondly, why is the injustice of the successful evildoer allowed to continue (13–17)? Murderers and adulterers who love darkness rather than light are allowed to live, even though their friends are only the terrors of darkness (17) and they should by rights be with them in the underworld. In these questions, Job is thinking not simply of himself but of the way the world as a whole is governed by God.

18–25 Some of this section is so unlike Job's argument that we have to assume that it must really be the friends who are speaking here. It is the friends who say that the guilty are nothing but foam on the surface of the water (18), that the underworld soon snatches them away (19), that they are not remembered long (20), that however important they seem, they are soon cut off like ears of corn (24). Perhaps these verses were originally the missing end of Bildad's speech (ch. 25), or perhaps Job is here quoting his friends (cf. the RSV, which adds 'You say' at the beginning of v 18 and takes vs 18–25 as the friends' words).

25:1–6 Bildad's third speech: 'How can a man be righteous before God?'

Something seems wrong with the text at this point. Bildad's speech begins without the usual address and is only five verses long. There is no speech from Zophar at all, and there are three speeches of Job in a row (chs. 26, 27–28, 29) without any words from the friends. Some of the passages in Job's speeches here do not sound like him at all. Perhaps Bildad's speech was originally 25:2–6 plus 26:5–14. As Bildad's speech now stands, it is rather like some of the thoughts of Eliphaz, especially the idea that as compared with God there is nothing in the world that is perfectly clean (4–6; cf. 4:17–19). The gulf that separates humans from God is highlighted by Bildad's opening words about the power of God, whose armies are without number (2–3). The same theme of God's all-powerful rule is continued in 26:5–14, if these verses also are really Bildad's.

26:1–14 Job's ninth speech: 'Your advice has been useless'

We seem to have in ch. 26 only the opening fragment of a speech by Job, a taunt against Bildad that says he has been of no help. Job's reply is all the more appropriate if Bildad's previous speech had included 26:5–14, stressing the power of God. It is all very well, Job would then mean, to tell me about the majesty of God, but of what use is that to one like myself who is powerless (2)? And how can your praise for the wisdom of God (7, 12) possibly help someone like myself who is supposed to be without wisdom (3)? Perhaps Job's speech continues in ch. 27.

5–14 These verses are perhaps really part of Bildad's third speech. They reflect on the wisdom and power of God. God is the one who could create the universe by hanging the earth upon nothing (7). Various aspects of the creation are mentioned, many of them not in Genesis, e.g. building the pillars of heaven (11) and marking out the horizon in a circle (10). There are references too to other creation stories, in which creation was spoken of as a victory by God over the monsters of chaos (Rahab, 12; the gliding serpent, Leviathan, 13). God's creative power continues even now, of course. He wraps up the waters in his clouds (8), the waterskins of the sky, and covers the face of the moon (9) during its different phases. But the main point is that these proofs of God's greatness that are visible and known to humans are but the outer fringe of his works, and convey only a faint whisper of the thunder of his power (14). Humans cannot hope to comprehend the real God, but can catch only a glimpse of him.

27:1–28:28 Job's tenth speech: the wisdom of God

Again we face the problem of who is really speaking in these chapters. There is no doubt that in 27:2–12 we have the genuine voice of Job, but perhaps the rest of chs. 27 and 28 are not from his lips. He surely is not repeating the same stale ideas on the fate of the wicked that the friends have uttered (27:13–23). Perhaps 27:13–28:28 was originally the third speech of Zophar; for the themes we find here, the fate of the wicked (27:13–23), the secret wisdom of God (28:1–27) and the duty of humans to do righteousness and avoid evil (28:28), have previously been made by Zophar in 11:7–20.

27:2–12 'I will never abandon my integrity'. God has denied Job justice (2), and though his friends continue to judge him to be in the wrong (5), Job intends to maintain that he is righteous (6). Anyone who attacks Job's innocence lies under Job's curse and will suffer the fate of the wicked (7–10). Job now knows so much about the hidden ways of the Almighty that he can teach anyone what he has learned from experience. Yet the friends themselves ought already to have learned from listening to Job all that he has to teach them (12). Considering what they have heard so far, the surprising thing is that their speeches have been so meaningless (12).

27:13–23 The fate of a wicked man. After Job's passionate self-defence, this section reads rather dully. It contains only the traditional ideas we have met before about the fate of the wicked. This fact suggests that it is no longer Job's speech but perhaps Zophar's. The fate of a wicked man is here pictured as what happens to his family, his wealth and his own person. His children are destined to be killed by the sword or plague (14–15), his wealth is left to other more righteous people than him (16–19), while he himself is carried off as if by flood, whirlwind or devastating east wind (20–23). Obviously, much of the fate of the wicked man has already happened to Job. This fits with Zophar's attitude throughout the book: 'God has even forgotten some of your sin' (11:6).

28:1–28 'Where may wisdom be found?' The theme of this majestic poem is that 'wisdom' is unattainable by humans. That is not the practical kind of wisdom taught by the book of Proverbs but rather full understanding of the world and the order according to which it runs. This use of 'wisdom' would make sense to the author of Ecclesiastes, who stresses that humans 'cannot fathom what God has done from beginning to end' (Ec. 3:11; cf. 8:17). This poem sounds somewhat strange coming from Job, since it is only after God has spoken to him at length (chs. 38–41) that he comes to accept its ideas (cf. 42:3). This is another reason for thinking that it was originally part of Zophar's speech.

There is a great gulf between human and divine wisdom, but we do not need to belittle human wisdom in order to magnify the wisdom of God. The poem begins as a hymn of praise to the ingenuity of humankind (1–11) and only then goes on to say that even so true wisdom is beyond their grasp and is known only to God (12–27). What is given to humans is not 'wisdom', but the knowledge of God's law: what is wisdom for humans is to live in the fear of the Lord (28).

1–11 Just one example of the wisdom of humans is chosen: their ability to mine metals hidden beneath the surface of the earth. Four mined metals are noted (1–2). Lamps are used underground (3). It is a dangerous and isolated job the miner does: he dangles and sways (4) as he descends the shaft. There is a paradox in mining: on the surface peaceful farming goes on, while underneath there may be a violent over-turning of obstacles to get at the metal (5, 9). Through their wisdom, humans have created beneath the earth paths unknown to birds and beasts (7–8) and have made themselves masters of the earth (11).

12–28 Plainly the ‘wisdom’ that cannot be found by searching is something different from human technological wisdom. The poet does not tell us immediately what he means but allows a suspenseful climax to build up which increasingly shows the impossibility of obtaining this wisdom. Its place is unknown (12), and so too the way to it (13); it cannot be valued in gold or silver or precious stones (15–19). The world itself does not know where it is to be found (14). Even the supernatural powers of Destruction (the underworld) and Death know no more of it than a rumour (22). But God knows all about it (23); for it is his own wisdom, which he used in establishing the creation (24–27). This supernatural knowledge of the universe and its purpose and the laws that govern it is inaccessible to humans. What has been given to humans, however, is another kind of wisdom, one which is more manageable and practicable. It is a wisdom that consists in doing: to fear the LORD, i.e. true religion, and to shun evil (28) is what constitutes wisdom for humans. Assuming that this chapter is Zophar’s final address to Job, its meaning is to deny Job’s claim to understand the ‘ways of the Almighty’ (27:11) and to recommend to Job not a search for wisdom but a quest for righteousness.

29:1–31:40 Job’s eleventh speech, in which he reflects upon his woes

Job’s powerful concluding speech has three sections. In the first he surveys, in nostalgic mood, his former happy life before the hand of God fell upon him (ch. 29). In the second he portrays, in pathetic mood, his present isolation and degradation (ch. 30). In the third he utters, in defiant mood, a series of self-curses that come to a climax with a desperate appeal to be heard and vindicated (ch. 31). The presence of the friends is ignored completely, and God is not addressed. Job is speaking entirely about himself, and it is his concentration upon this one theme that makes this one of the most impressive and moving parts of the book.

29:2–25 ‘How I long for the months gone by!’. This nostalgic glance to the past fills in some details about Job’s life we did not learn from the prologue. It also conveys the atmosphere of the life that is now over, a life of warm and dignified relationships. They were the days when God watched over him (2), the days when he was in his prime (4), when his flocks were so plentiful that his steps were drenched with cream, his olive trees so fruitful that the presses in the rock poured out ... streams of olive oil (6). In those days, he was respected as the chief man, or sheikh, of his village, whose opinion carried most weight at the meeting of elders in the public square (lit. ‘the gate’) (7–10). In those days he could help the underprivileged, the poor and the fatherless (12), the dying (13), the widow (13b), the blind and the lame (15), the stranger who needed a legal protector (16b). The same two themes of his own security and of his prominent and positive role in society are then repeated in vs 18–20 and 21–25. We notice that for Job the blessings of his former life did not include only material prosperity and social honour but, equally importantly, the possibility of doing good to those in need (contrast Eliphaz in 22:6–9). No doubt, there is no-one who could be called righteous compared with God (Rom. 3:10), but it is wrong to pretend that people are as bad as they can possibly be or that they can never be described as innocent and righteous.

30:1–31 ‘But now they mock me’. When Job compares his present lot with his past life, the contrast could hardly be more extreme. His former life consisted of a network of harmonious relationships (with God, his fellows and the underprivileged) but now all those relationships have been destroyed. People now treat him with contempt (1–15, 24–31) and God has cast him off

(16–23). In a way, however, these are one and the same experience; for it is God’s doing that he suffers the contempt of humans.

1–8 Three times we read But now, and now (1, 9, 16); for the contrast in Job’s life is extreme. Job’s attitude to those who despise him seems at first rather patronizing: they are a base and nameless brood (8), the poor of the land who live on leaves and roots. Are these not the very people that Job would in former days have taken care of? Yes, and it is just for that reason that he is so scornful of their contempt now. Even those whom he previously treated with generosity have turned on him and have regarded him as beneath themselves. It is their ingratitude that makes him angry.

9–15 Job is now the object of the scorn of those whom he had once helped and they attack him (12, 14). It is not a physical assault, but the treatment he receives makes him feel like a besieged city (14).

16–23 In addition to the disgrace he now endures is the sheer physical suffering that has tormented him from the beginning. Day and night it grips him as if it were a wild animal (16–17). All of this is God’s doing (19), yet appeals to him fall on deaf ears (20); for God too, like the humans, has turned cruel to him (21) and will unfailingly bring him to death (23).

24–31 Though he is convinced no good will come of it, Job must cry out for help (24). He deserves help, since he has given it so freely (25), but when he hoped for good, evil came (26). This part of his speech ends with a repetition of his disgrace in human eyes, the theme with which it began. He is rejected by the assembly of his townspeople (28) and left to the company of wild animals (29). His skin becomes black from his disease (28, 30), and the music of his former life has turned to mourning (31).

31:1–40 ‘Oh, that I had my opponent’s charges!’. This final section of Job’s speech is in the form of a ‘negative confession’, in which he denies any crime that may be laid to his charge. He can utter these self-curses only if he is completely convinced of his own innocence; and not surprisingly the chapter comes to a climax (35–37) with Job’s bold appeal for God to hear him and punish him for anything he deserves. He asks for God to at least let him know the charges that he holds against him as he would be proud to carry about with him a list of accusations to which he could give such convincing answers. In every case except one (that of idolatry; 26–28) the crimes Job imagines are sins against his neighbour, yet they are also sins against God.

1–4 Though the sin of adultery is mentioned below (9–12), here Job says he has not sinned by desiring a virgin, a wellknown habit of owners of many servants such as Job was. He has made a covenant with his eyes; sin lies in the inward intentions of the heart, and not just in the outward act.

5–8 Again, sin is something that first occurs in the heart (7). The reference to the scales (6) and to the failure of his crops as the punishment for dishonesty (8) suggests that Job is thinking primarily of falsehood and deceit (5) in business transactions.

9–12 Adultery was judged in patriarchal societies to be a serious crime (shameful, a sin to be judged), since it disregarded a man’s property rights and could create problems over inheritance. The text shows its age in regarding male adultery as due to being enticed by a woman (and so in some way the woman’s fault) and in making the degradation of the wife somehow a punishment of the adulterer. We ourselves would rather emphasize the values of loyalty and demand that only the offender be punished.

13–15 Job claims that he has gone beyond the customs of his time and has treated his servants as having rights like fellow human beings when contemporary society would have allowed him to treat them as possessions.

16–23 Job has already pictured his sympathy for the poor, the widow, the fatherless and the stranger, i.e. the typical underprivileged persons of ancient society (29:12–16). Here he says he has even taken orphans into his own household (18) and asks that if he has ever raised his hand against orphans, thinking he could get away with injustice to them, may retribution fall upon the hand lifted in injustice and may his arm be broken from its socket (22).

24–28 Job now turns to further inward sins (cf. vs 1–4): the secret love of riches (24–25), the worship of the sun and moon (26–27), pleasure at the downfall of his enemies (29–30), any deliberate overlooking of the needs of others (31–32) or any other hypocrisy (33–34). He means a curse upon himself if he has failed on any of these points. Although he has been exceedingly rich, he claims that his wealth never became an idol in the place of God.

26–27 Idolatry is the only religious sin in Job’s catalogue of crimes. It was normal in the ancient world to worship the heavenly bodies, but to Job such worship would have been to serve the creature rather than the creator.

29–30 It was not unethical at Job’s time to rejoice at my enemy’s misfortune. The psalmists sometimes are glad at the punishment of the wicked (e.g. Ps. 54:7; 118:7; 137:8–9), but Job has followed the spirit of the law that recommended giving help to one’s enemy (Ex. 23:4–5; cf. Pr. 20:22; 24:17–18; 25:21–22).

31–32 Job seems to be thinking here of occasions when he might have pretended not to know of cases of need. He has been generous to the needy not only in cases of obvious need (16–21) but also in cases when he has been the only one to know the need.

33–34 Job is not admitting to any sins of hypocrisy. He means, ‘If I have ever sinned and then tried to hide it’ (as Adam did) (see the NIV mg.).

35–37 Job ends this very formal oath of innocence by saying, I sign now, as if it were a written document. He longs to have the list of charges that God has against him, to match his own declaration of innocence. He would not be humiliated by the indictment of his accuser; he is so sure that it would prove his innocence that he would put it on like a crown (36). He would approach God not as a criminal but as an innocent man who could give an account of anything that might be laid to his charge (37).

38–40 Job’s final self-curse comes, a little strangely, after the summary and climax of his speech in vs 35–37. In it he calls down punishment if he has acquired his land through oppression of its rightful owners (39).

32:1–37:24 Elihu’s speeches

32:1–33:33 Elihu’s first speech: ‘Suffering is a warning from God’

Most scholars think that the four speeches of Elihu are a later addition to the book of Job. It is strange that Elihu is not mentioned in the prologue, but the author may possibly have intended to introduce him later unexpectedly. But it is even more strange that he is not mentioned in the epilogue either (42:7–17), though the other friends are. Furthermore, the Elihu speeches also delay God’s reply to Job, which we might have expected immediately after ch. 31, where ‘The words of Job are ended’ (31:40). When God does reply (chs.38–41) he speaks as if nothing had intervened. So it is often thought that Elihu is the creation of a later pious author who was unhappy with the failure of Job's friends to answer his arguments and unhappy also with the way the divine speeches come to no definite conclusion.

Perhaps Elihu's speeches can be understood as offering a middle way between the position of Job and his friends. The friends have argued that God is just and that Job's suffering proves he has sinned and that God is punishing him for it. Job denies both arguments, insisting that his suffering is not the result of sin, and that therefore God is unjust. Elihu says he is against both Job and the friends (32:10–12; 33:1–12; cf. 32:2–3), and he argues that suffering is discipline. That means that suffering need not be the penalty for sin already committed but may be a warning, given in advance, to keep a person back from sin.

32:1–5 Elihu introduces himself. The young Elihu is obviously very angry (the word is repeated four times in vs 2, 3, 5; one of the occurrences in v 2 is omitted by the NIV). He is angry at Job because he had 'made himself out to be more righteous than God' (2; NEB). This is a much more serious criticism than appears in the NIV, which has him justifying himself rather than God. Elihu means that the logic of Job's claim, that he is in the right in his dispute with God, is that God must be in the wrong. Job had never said exactly that, but it is a reasonable conclusion. Elihu is also angry at the three friends because they found no way to refute Job (3), i.e. they had been unable to convince Job that God was not in the wrong.

32:6–22 Elihu's right to speak. The whole of this section is only Elihu's wordy introduction of himself and explanation of why he has joined in the conversation. Elihu confesses he is young and he voices his respect for the wisdom of age (6–7), but he has taken courage from his belief that all are created with an equal capacity for wisdom (8). Therefore it is not only the old that are wise (9). So he is not afraid to declare what I know (10). He has also been encouraged to enter the conversation by the feebleness of the friends' speeches (11–12). It seems to Elihu that they are rather overwhelmed by Job's arguments and are starting to think that only God can refute him (13). He turns to Job (15) and says he is ready to speak (16–17) as he is full of words (18) and his mind is ready to burst with its multitude of thoughts (19) and needs relief from its frustration (20). Finally, he promises he will not treat anyone—and it is Job who has most to suffer from his tongue—with special respect (21); he does not even know how to flatter, so Job had better be prepared for some straight talking (22).

33:1–33 'Why God brings suffering'. 1–7 Elihu's wordy introduction of himself continues. He claims no special wisdom apart from what can be acquired by every living person, those with the breath of the Almighty (4; cf. 32:8). He invites Job to answer him (5). It will not be too difficult, since he, Elihu, will use none of God's strong-arm tactics; he too is a mere human, formed from a piece of clay (6). He is not being patronizing to Job when he says no fear of me should alarm you (7) but is contrasting his own weakness with the power of God from which Job has been suffering.

8–13 Job has been saying that God has denied him justice; he has refused to accept his innocence, and he has behaved as an enemy (10–11) rather than an impartial judge. Elihu intends to show that Job is not right (12), not by arguing—as the friends have—that Job is a sinner, but by showing that God sends suffering for other purposes, notably to warn humans from committing sins in the future. In this way, Elihu thinks he can maintain both God's justice and Job's innocence (cf. 12, 32).

14–18 Elihu illustrates his interpretation of suffering by using the example of nightmares. They are one way God has of speaking to people, even though they do not always recognize it (14). God uses dreams to terrify people with warnings against future wrongdoing and pride (17); they are a form of suffering used by God to prevent greater suffering and death (18).

19–28 Physical suffering (21–22) is also used by God for the same purpose: to ‘chasten’ or warn a person against sin (19). It needs only a word on the sufferer’s behalf by one of the many intercessory angels (23–24) and the person is healed and offers public thanksgiving for restoration to health (cf. Ps. 22:22–25). That person then makes a confession of sin (27), even though it may have been only a sin that was planned not a sin that was actually committed.

29–33 Elihu invites Job to reply (32) or else continue listening (31, 33). His purpose, he says again, is not to accuse Job of being a sinner but to justify him (32b) by explaining his suffering as God’s discipline.

34:1–37 Elihu’s second speech: ‘Job is wrong to accuse God of injustice’

Elihu no longer speaks to Job directly; he now appeals to the wise men (2), who could be the friends (in which case Elihu is being ironical) or a larger group of bystanders. His main point in this speech is that since God is just (10), any criticism by Job of what God does or fails to do is unjust. Elihu has now ignored Job’s particular situation and is trading in generalities.

1–9 Elihu takes up Job’s claim, ‘I am innocent’ (5a; cf. 27:6) and ‘God denies me justice’ (5b; cf. 27:2). He asks the audience to say if they have ever met a man like Job who drinks up the scorn of his friends like water (7) and who, by claiming that God is denying him justice, puts himself in the company with evildoers who also charge God with injustice. According to Job, Elihu says very unfairly, ‘It profits a man nothing, when he tries to please God’ (9). Job has said that the wicked can escape judgment (21:7–34) and that trouble falls on good and bad alike (9:22–24), but he himself has held fast to virtue even when it has brought him no profit.

10–15 Here Elihu is saying that God will not be unjust (10–12) and so Job is wrong to charge God with any form of injustice. God’s justice is, for Elihu, an automatic consequence of his being the almighty Creator (13–14). But that is a dangerous position, for it amounts to saying that ‘might is right’.

16–30 Elihu continues arguing that the governor of the universe cannot be unrighteous. God is righteous and mighty (17). He has the power to judge kings and nobles (18), to shatter them without need of investigation (24) since he already knows their steps (21). He can overturn them in the night (25). His works of might are in strict accord with his justice. He shows no favouritism to princes or the rich (19), he rewards people according to their deeds (25) and strikes wrongdoers down for their wickedness (26) because they have disobeyed his laws (27) and oppressed the poor (28). So if ever God is silent and does not offer a vindication when it is called for, who can condemn him and say that what he does is unjust? (29)

31–37 Job’s constant demand for vindication adds rebellion to sin (37), for it puts God in the wrong. Elihu now imagines someone who has been punished for his sin and then repents of it (31–32). According to Elihu, Job’s theology does not allow God to forgive such a repentant sinner, for Job expects anyone who has suffered at God’s hand to demand vindication and reject forgiveness (33). But this is unfair to Job, since Job does not claim that all suffering is innocent.

35:1–16 Elihu’s third speech: ‘Job should not have complained but called to God’

1–8 Elihu here seems to be taking up again the claim he put in Job’s mouth in 34:9, that it ‘profits a man nothing, when he tries to please God’. That is not Job’s view, nor is it Job who asks, ‘What profit is it to me, and what do I gain by not sinning?’ (3). Elihu only imagines this to be Job’s question. But he answers it for him by saying it is wrong to expect to gain from being righteous (7). Since God is so great, what happens on earth is of little concern to him (5), even if it is wickedness that happens (6, 8).

9–16 Since Job's complaint has been that God has taken away his right (27:2), Elihu asks why Job has not been delivered from his affliction. He takes the case of oppressed people who cry out because of their load of oppression (9). They are not always delivered. Why not? Because something is lacking in their cry. It has been an involuntary cry and they have not addressed it to God their Maker, who can reverse fortunes by giving songs in the night (10) and who can give greater wisdom to humans than to the beasts and birds (11). They are not answered because they have neglected to cry to him (12); such cries are empty, and disregarded by God (13). The same is true of Job, says Elihu. He has been merely complaining of his suffering and not addressing himself to God (14–16). Once again Elihu misses the mark; for Job has often been addressing God directly!

36:1–37:24 Elihu's fourth speech: in praise of the power and wisdom of God

There are two sections here. In the first Elihu repeats that suffering is discipline; and in the second, he praises the power and wisdom of God in creation, which is why God is entitled to be moral governor of the universe.

36:2–25 Elihu still wants to speak on God's behalf (2) and to ascribe righteousness to his Maker (3), i.e. to prove that there has been no miscarriage of justice in Job's case. Since God is so far above humanity, Elihu must fetch his knowledge from afar (3). Somehow this seems to enable him to claim that he is perfect in knowledge, i.e. absolutely correct, not omniscient!

5–16 Elihu begins by stating the usual doctrine of retribution (6). His own contribution comes when he considers the righteous who fall into suffering, a theme very close to Job's own situation. In such cases, the righteous (8) are being reprov'd for their transgression and commanded to return from iniquity (10). So suffering is divine discipline (as he has said in 33:15–30). If the righteous respond to such warnings, well and good (11), but if they do not, they suffer the fate of evildoers and die without knowledge, i.e. without having learned anything from the divine disciplining. The ungodly, when afflicted, are simply angry and do not cry to God for help (13); they die young and in shame (14). The godly, on the other hand, whose ears are opened to what God is teaching them by their adversity, are delivered (15–16).

17–25 Elihu hopes that Job is among the righteous but fears rather that he is among those who do not learn from their suffering and so is laden with the judgment due to the wicked (17). A mere cry of distress (rather than wealth, as the NIV has in v 19) will not bring Job deliverance (cf. 35:9, 12); it needs to be directed to God, and Job must remember to extol God's work while he is praying for deliverance.

36:26–37:24 This fine hymn to the creative power and wisdom of God makes sense here only because Elihu believes that it is God's creative power that gives him the right to be moral judge of the world (cf. 34:10–15).

27–33 The wonders of rain and lightning are that they are one of God's means of judging between peoples (31a); for the same rain can be both beneficent (31b) and destructive (33b).

37:1–5 Thunder also is not just a natural phenomenon but the voice of God, mysterious, unpredictable and terrifying.

6–13 The winter storms, which stop people working and keep wild animals in their dens (7–8), do not reveal only God's might in controlling (12) these forces that tame both humans and beasts but also show his wisdom in using the forces of nature for various purposes, whether for correction or blessing (13).

14–24 The power and wisdom of God are also displayed in the phenomena of summer: in the lightning of summer storms (15), the clouds so delicately balanced (16), the hot south wind (17), the blazing sky as hard as bronze (18) and the blinding light of the summer sun (21). God's wisdom is so much greater than Job's that Job cannot even understand how these phenomena work (15–16, 18), let alone control them. So great is the terrible majesty (22) of God, that he is effectively unapproachable. Elihu asks Job, ironically, to teach us what we shall say to God (19) but denies in the same breath that it is possible to do so, 'for all is dark, and we cannot marshal our thoughts' (NEB). This is a position that Job has denied all along by repeatedly demanding that God should personally answer his complaints. And it is effectively refuted by the personal appearance made by God in the very next chapter.

38:1–42:6 The Lord's speeches

These divine speeches are important, not just for their contents but because they happened at all. The point is that Job, who has determinedly called upon God (even out of anger and frustration), finds himself eventually in a conversation with God that leads to the resolution of his tension. But the speeches are remarkable also both for what they omit and what they include. First, it is surprising, but also significant, that God makes no reference to any faults on Job's part. Clearly, then, God holds nothing against Job; not even his 'impetuous' words (6:3) are a matter for reproof. But, secondly, these divine speeches are also striking for what they contain. Far from justifying the ways of God to humans, they deal wholly with the natural order, the world of creation. In speaking of the cosmic order and the animal creation, God's purpose is not to give Job lessons about nature and certainly not to dazzle him with signs of his power and intelligence (which Job has never for a minute doubted). It is rather to reconsider the mystery and complexity of the world that God has created. Job is meant to realize that the natural order is parallel to the moral order of the universe. Much of it is beyond human understanding, some of it seems hideous, futile, or fearsome, but all of it is the work of a wise God who has made the world the way it is for his own purposes.

38:1–40:2 The Lord's first speech: 'Consider the mystery of creation'

God's long series of questions to Job is not intended to humiliate him but to challenge him to reconsider what he already knows about the world that God has made and to ponder its mystery afresh. God points Job to ten features of the natural order (38:4–38) as examples of its mystery and to nine species of animals (38:39–39:30) to illustrate the mystery of created life. The final note (40:2) reminds us that the dialogue between God and Job is cast in the form of a legal case (cf. also 38:3), since that is what Job has demanded (e.g. 31:35). The purpose of the dialogue is, however, not to establish guilt or innocence but to enquire after the truth about life as a creature of God's.

38:1–3 Introduction. Job at last receives the reply he has so desired (cf. 31:35). Job had, of course, imagined the comparatively peaceful setting of a legal trial, but it is out of the whirlwind that God speaks. The whirlwind is an old symbol of divine revelation (cf. e.g. Ps. 18:7–15; Na. 1:3; Zc. 9:14), and although it is terrifying it means for Job that God does not intend to ignore his demands any longer. God does not belittle Job's intelligence, saying he has no understanding of the divine plan (my counsel; 2) for governing the universe. Neither does God pour scorn upon Job, but he encourages him to brace himself like a man (it being supposed that men are stronger than women!) and use all his mental strength to understand God's intentions, which will be expressed in this speech only indirectly.

38:4–38 Phenomena of earth and heaven. 4–7 Here the world is portrayed as a building with a foundation and a cornerstone, built to plan with a measuring line to the accompaniment of the music of the morning stars, the angels.

8–11 The sea is pictured as born from the womb of its mother (8) and wrapped by God in clouds (9). But it is also a threatening force that must be kept in its place, shut in with doors and bars (10).

12–15 Even the coming of the dawn is beyond Job's understanding (12). The NEB is probably correct in removing from these verses the inappropriate references to the wicked (13, 15) and in finding allusions to various heavenly bodies like the 'stars of the Navigator's Line' that 'go out one by one' (15) as the dawn breaks.

16–18 Beneath the earth is a whole realm of creation unknown to humans: the springs of the sea, the fountains of the great deep (Gn. 7:11) which feed the waters of the sea, and the land of death, pictured as a city with gates and 'door-keepers' (17; NEB), the 'janitors of Shadowland' (JB), the underworld (rather than earth) with its vast expanses (18).

19–21 Light and darkness are here viewed as beings who have their own dwellings, to which they return at the due times. Job does not know how to 'escort' each 'on its homeward path' (20; NEB).

22–23 Also beyond Job's knowledge are the storehouses of the snow and hail (22), reserved for the day of battle (23; cf. Ex. 9:22–26; Jos. 10:11; Is. 30:30).

24–27 The channel for the torrents of rain from the heavenly storehouse (25) reminds us of the 'windows' of heaven that were opened at the time of the flood (Gn. 7:11). A new point, which will be developed further in ch. 39, is introduced in vs 26–27: much of what goes on in the created order does not happen for humans' sake but for the sake of other parts of God's creation, or simply because God wills it. Here it is the rain that falls on uninhabited land (26).

28–30 Rain, dew and ice must have an origin, but Job doesn't know it.

31–33 How do the seven stars of the Pleiades come to be bound together? Why do the stars of Orion, a hunter with belt (cords) and sword, stay fastened together? (31). Whatever may be the influence of the stars, Job has no influence over them, nor even any comprehension of the laws of nature that determine their movements (33).

34–38 Job cannot influence the coming of the lightning or of rain, when God tilts the water jars of the heavens (37).

38:39–39:30 The animal creation. The focus here is not on animals well-known and useful to humans (like sheep, ass and camel) but to those that are, rather, useless, mysterious or hostile. These too are part of God's creation. It is the same with suffering: sometimes indeed it may have a recognizable purpose, but sometimes it may be just as enigmatic and hurtful to humans as the wild animals can be. Nevertheless, it is part of God's order for the world, and he knows what he is doing in creating it.

39–41 The point is not that Job cannot satisfy the appetite of the young lions (39), or even that it is God who provides the raven's prey (41), but that there is a whole realm of God's creation that exists utterly independently of humans.

39:1–4 Goats and does are untouched by human interference. They give birth and their young grow up without human assistance or knowledge.

5–8 The wild ass, exempted by God from human service (5), leads a free though hard life and is totally useless to humans. This is unlike its domesticated cousin, the tame ass, which is driven through the noisy city streets (7).

9–12 An even greater gulf separates the domesticated ox from the wild ox (or aurochs), the most powerful of hoofed animals (extinct since the seventeenth century AD). It is ludicrous to think of it as useful to humans.

13–18 Some animals are wild and free and untameable; others, like the ostrich, are simply ridiculous. It is the popular view of the ostrich as a cruel and careless parent that is used here. In fact, it is only during the day that its eggs are abandoned; at night both cock and hen take turns at keeping the nest warm. God has even created animals whose behaviour makes no sense—not by human standards, at any rate.

19–25 The war horse is not completely useless to humans, but it has a strength and courage that clothe it with mystery. Even a creature so close to humans can be basically incomprehensible to them. Who can say what gives the horse its strength (19), how it can laugh at fear (22) and be eager to rush into battle (25)?

26–30 The hawk and the eagle are creatures that dart into human awareness occasionally (30) but who mostly live in places humans cannot reach (27–28). They are useless, predatory and unclean, yet they are created by God and their natural instincts (wisdom; 26) are implanted by him. If Job can accept that, he can accept also the fact that at least some cases of human suffering arise simply from the unfathomable wisdom of God.

40:1–2 Conclusion. The Lord is never contemptuous of Job, nor does he seek to argue him into submission (cf. 38:3). He concludes his first speech by simply inviting Job, as his opponent in the lawsuit, to respond to him.

40:3–5 Job’s first reply: he has nothing to say

Job does not express submission, humiliation or defeat. He agrees that he is unworthy, since he realizes the limitations of his understanding that the Lord’s speech has highlighted. But as yet he has nothing to answer, his case still stands. The Lord has called upon him to reply, and Job in effect invites the Lord to continue his speech. Job puts his hand over his mouth (4), for he has nothing yet to add.

40:6–41:34 The Lord’s second speech: ‘Consider the power of creation’

40:6–14 Introduction. The Lord cannot be browbeating Job with his superior power; for Job has always agreed that God is stronger than him (e.g. 9:15–19), and the point is God’s justice, not his power. The Lord means that Job cannot of himself win vindication. Only one with power (arm; 9) like God and in physical control of the universe can have the authority to make judgments in the moral sphere also. Vindication of a human being is a divine task, and Job has been trying to do God’s task by demanding vindication.

40:15–24 The behemoth. The theme is continued from ch. 39, but instead of brief snapshots of the animal creation, here are presented two loving descriptions of the behemoth, the fiercest of the land animals, and the leviathan, the most dreadful of the sea creatures. Previously, the focus was more on the mystery of the animal creation; now the theme is the terror, and yet the splendour, of two of God’s creatures. The behemoth (‘the great beast’) has been identified as the crocodile, the wild buffalo, the hippopotamus or a mythical creature. The description of the behemoth and the leviathan has much poetic exaggeration, but it seems that real creatures are intended. They are also symbolic of chaos, and the fact God has created them shows he controls any chaotic powers that may threaten his universe.

The behemoth was first among the works of God (19), a reference to Gn. 1:21, where the ‘great sea creatures’ are the first animals mentioned. His main diet is grass (15); his habitat the reeds and marshes by the river (21). It is a little strange that the mountains yield food for him (20), though hippopotami are known to scramble up steep slopes in search of food. His strength is legendary (16–18), and he cannot be conquered by humans (only his Maker can approach him with his sword; 19) or be caught with a rope attached to him by his nose (24). A river in flood holds no terrors for him, and ‘a Jordan could pour down his throat without his caring’ (23; JB). Even his tail, though short and small, has the strength of a cedar (17).

41:1–34 The leviathan. The leviathan has been thought to be a dolphin, a tunny fish or a whale, but the general view is that it is a crocodile. Figured in Canaanite mythology as Lotan, a seven-headed monster of the deep, allusions to that mythological being are made in the OT (e.g. Ps. 74:13–14; Is. 27:1). So the leviathan here, like the behemoth, is a symbol of chaos.

1–11 The leviathan has no practical usefulness for human beings. He cannot be caught (1) or tamed (2) or made docile and domesticated (3); he cannot be used in human service (4) or as a pet to entertain the children (5). He cannot serve as food (6), for he cannot even be caught (7). Anyone so reckless as to lay hands on him would not do so a second time (8)! The mere sight of him is enough to turn away hopeful hunters (9). Verses 10–11 may suggest that if a courageous person is frightened away by the sight of a crocodile, only a fool would be reckless enough to approach God himself. But it is probably better to take these sentences as referring to the leviathan: ‘No one can face him in a fight. Who can attack him with impunity? No one beneath all heaven’ (JB).

12–34 The language here is highly poetical and fanciful, and we should not look for exact descriptions. The outer coat is his hard scales (13); his underparts, especially of the tail, are like jagged potsherds (30), and his motion in the water does indeed make the sea churn like a boiling cauldron (31). But perhaps his breathing out fire (18–21) is meant less literally. The main point in this poem in honour of the king of all proud animals (34) is the awesomeness and grandeur of this creature that is so repulsive and hostile to humans. This is the climax of the Lord’s speeches to Job, and Job does not miss the point: suffering is a crocodile, a hippopotamus, terrifying and mysterious, yet part of God’s creation and with its own splendour.

42:1–6 Job’s second reply: his demands turn to worship

Unlike his first reply (40:2–5), which was really a refusal to reply, this speech resolves Job’s dispute with God. For Job recognizes God’s right to do what he does—even, though Job does not say so, to the extent of bringing suffering upon an innocent person. So what is new about Job’s knowledge that you can do all things (2) is not that God is almighty, but that God has an inescapable purpose in whatever he does. Job’s suffering makes sense to God, even though God has in no way explained or justified it to him. Job’s mistake has been to demand an answer to the problem of suffering, which is to intrude into an area beyond human comprehension: ‘I spoke of things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know’ (3).

Job receives his vindication from God in vs 10–17, but more important to Job is the fact that through his cries for a confrontation with God he has in reality met with God face to face. That God should actually have broken through the silence and have addressed Job is better than any vindication. The personal experience of God (now my eyes have seen you; 5) transcends the suffering, the isolation and the sense of injustice as much as it transcends mere theory about God (My ears had heard of you; 5).

Does Job despise himself (6)? Myself is not in the Hebrew, and it is more probable that Job despises the words of abuse he has hurled at God. And what does he repent of (6)? It cannot be some sin, because we have known from the beginning that Job is no sinner, he can repent only of the extreme language he has used or of his ignorance. But perhaps it is better still to take the word translated despise as ‘melt’, i.e. ‘I melt into nothingness’, the feeling of a creature before his Creator, and to take the word for repent as ‘comfort’, i.e. ‘I am comforted, though still sitting upon dust and ashes’ (cf. 2:8). Job is still suffering, still upon the ash-heap, but his bitterness is relieved and his tension is resolved by his encounter with God.

42:7–17 Epilogue

Why is the story of Job not over now? It is because Job has been asking for vindication, i.e. for a public demonstration by God that Job is righteous and undeserving of his punishment. Some readers think the happy ending spoils the book of Job, for it seems to support the old doctrine of guilt and suffering. Is not the theology of the friends, that the righteous prosper, proved by this epilogue to the book? No, for the friends insist that the righteous always prosper and the wicked always perish. The case of Job shows there is no ‘always’. What the epilogue shows is God’s delight in showering blessings upon one who serves him faithfully. This is by way of a bonus, it is God’s act of grace and not something he is compelled to do.

42:7–9 Vindication before the friends

In this charmingly ironic scene Yahweh stresses to the friends that it is Job, and not they, who have truly been my servant (repeated four times!) and that it is Job, and not they, who has spoken of me what is right (7). It is an almost comic reversal of roles when punishment for the friends’ folly is only turned aside by the prayer of the righteous and still suffering Job (8–9). Those who had felt so superior to Job are the ones who stand in need of forgiveness themselves; and Job is not only vindicated before them but becomes their champion. How can the friends’ respectful talk about God be called folly? It can only be that the friends spoke of God entirely in the third person, as an object, whereas Job insisted on addressing God personally. In a time of suffering, talk merely about God is folly.

42:10–17 Vindication publicly

Job is already vindicated in the eyes of the friends, but in the eyes of his relatives and fellow-citizens the sign of his vindication by God must be the restoration of his fortunes. They are restored in double measure (12); perhaps that implies compensation for the undeserved loss Job had suffered (cf. Ex. 22:4). The comfort Job has received from his encounter with God (see on v 6 above) is enriched by the comfort he receives from his relatives (11). The gifts of money and a ring of gold (11) are signs of esteem rather than gifts to restore his wealth, for he is already prosperous again (10). So wealthy does he become that there is enough inheritance for even his daughters to have a share (daughters usually inherited only when there were no male heirs; Nu. 27). The epilogue concludes on a note typical of the patriarchal narratives of Genesis: death at a ripe old age, full of years, is the final blessing of God. With this scene we are returned to the idyllic pastoral mood with which the book opened. Within that stylized world, so far removed from our own, there has gone on beneath the surface a human drama that belongs to every age.

THE PSALMS

Introduction

The window into the Old Testament

What was it like to be a member of the OT church? What did they believe? What was their experience of God, personally and corporately? Did their religion make them happy or was it a burden? Were they aliens in another age or our brothers and sisters of long ago? As we look through the window of the Psalms we discover that here indeed is the same God, now disclosed to us in Christ, and here are people of the same nature as ourselves facing the same kind of life as we and finding that their God enhances their joys and bears their burdens.

Their commitment, prayerfulness, zeal, knowledge and delight rebuke our hesitations, unwillingness to pray, and cool responses. But they are our brothers and sisters. Their songs show us that just as in the NT God's grace prompts obedience to God's law, so in the OT obedience to God's law rests on his work of grace. But what a people of song they were! Great leaders like Moses (Ex. 15), Deborah and Barak (Jdg. 5), David (2 Sa. 1) and Hezekiah (Is. 38), ordinary folk like Hannah (1 Sa. 2) and prophets like Habakkuk (Hab. 3) marked their significant moments in song. The Psalms themselves reveal a religion overflowing in song. No wonder that from such people and such a religion this great anthology of psalmody should have emerged!

The Psalms as a book

It may be more appropriate to think of the psalms as a collection of books.

(i) It seems certain that within the Psalter as we have it smaller, once separate, collections have been preserved (e.g. 93–100 [Jerusalem Praise]; 113–118 [A Salvation Cantata]; 120–136 [Pilgrim Praise]; and 146–150 [The Endless Hallelujah]).

(ii) There is evidence too of an earlier anthology which has been absorbed into the Psalter in a more diffuse fashion. Many psalms are inscribed 'For the director of music' (e.g. 31, 47, 51–62). Was there then a 'Master of Temple Music' who at some point compiled his own hymnbook? If so he was careful of copyright for, apart from Pss. 66, 67, his inscription is always coupled with a personal ascription, 'To David'/'To Asaph', etc. For example, on taking Ps. 88 into his anthology he indicated that ‘This psalm was included in the Korahite Collection and was composed by Heman the Ezrahite.’

(iii) Korah and Asaph were leaders of choirs (1 Ch. 6:31–33, 39ff; 15:16ff; 16:4–7). The ‘Korahite’ collection, with its delight in Mt. Zion, is represented in Pss. 42–49, 84, 87, and the ‘Asaph’ collection, emphasizing both divine judgment and shepherding care, is represented in Pss. 50, 73–83.

(iv) Other individuals appear more sparsely: Jeduthun (39, 62, 77), Ethan (89), Heman (88), cf. 1 Ki. 4:31, and Moses (90). But the majority of the Psalms are ascribed to David (3–32, 34–41, 51–65, 68–70, 101, 103, 108–110, 122, 131, 133, 138, 139, 140–145).

(v) Specialist opinion has usually been sceptical about the value of the psalm-titles. In the days when it was fashionable to date as many psalms as possible in the Maccabean period (1st century BC) the headings were dismissed as an editorial fancy. More recently there is a greater willingness to allow pre-exilic dating, though opinions differ as to which and how many psalms may belong to the Kings period. It is agreed that the ascription ‘To David’ implies authorship but few follow M. G. Goulder (The Prayers of David: Psalms 51–72, Studies in the Psalter II, [JSOTS 102, Sheffield, 1990]) in taking Davidic authorship seriously. Yet there is no serious reason for not doing so. Certainly the headings have been added editorially to the Psalms (as their use of a third-person form indicates) but already by the time of the LXX (second or third century BC) many of the terms used were no longer understood, and how far back this editorial work goes no one knows for certain. They come to us as part of the Massoretic Hebrew Text (where they are included as verse 1 of the psalm in question) and in the NT, the Lord Jesus, Peter and Paul argue on the basis of their veracity. Against taking the headings seriously, it is urged that the historical notes which link some psalms to the life of David (3, 7, 18, etc.) are editorial guesses inasmuch as there is little or nothing to link the psalm and the occasion. Leaving aside the fact that an ancient editor is unlikely to have acted with crass ineptness, this charge overlooks the nature of the psalms themselves as meditations, not descriptions. In each instance a satisfying case can be made out that either within the incident mentioned or in subsequent reflection David could well have voiced these sentiments.

(vi) Further evidence of editorial hands at work in the Psalms is afforded by what is called ‘the Elohistic Psalter’. In Psalms 42–83, ‘Elohim’ (‘God’) occurs far more frequently than ‘Yahweh’ (‘The LORD’) and it looks as if the noun Elohim has been deliberately substituted for God’s Name. (Cf. Pss. 14 and 53; 40:13–17 and 70.) Presumably this was done before the collection as a whole was assembled. But to us it is one of the many unexplained steps by which the psalmody of the centuries gradually became the Psalter of the Bible.

(vii) The Psalter is sometimes called ‘The Hymnbook of the Second Temple’, referring to the House built by the returned community in 520 BC (cf. Ezr. 5:1, 2; 6:15; Hag. 1:14, 15). Without a doubt such an event could have motivated the creation of a new hymnbook and, agreeing with Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel (George Allen and Unwin, 1961), p. 311 that ‘there is no psalm whose plain sense ... requires a dating later than the exilic Psalm 137’ all our present psalms would have been available for selection. The collection was probably then given its present division into five ‘books’ by adding doxologies at 41:13; 72:18–20; 89:52 and 106:48. But again we face an unsolved puzzle: was the fivefold division adopted in order to match the five books of the Law with five books of song? It is not certain.

The Psalms in worship

The father of modern specialist psalm-study is Hermann Gunkel, Die Psalmen (Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1926) who set out to relate each psalm to the life-situation from which it emerged. He distinguished certain main categories: (a) Hymns, poems like 8, 19, 29 which dwell on the greatness and attributes of God. Sub-groups here included Enthronement Psalms, celebrating the Lord as King (e.g. 47, 96, 98) and Zion Psalms (e.g. 46, 87); (b) Communal Laments such as 74, 79, 80; (c) Royal Psalms, centring on the king, (e.g. 2, 45, 110); (d) Individual Laments, by far the largest category, (e.g. 3–7, 140–143); a sub-group here were Psalms of Confidence in which assurance was expressed of coming divine deliverance (11, 16, 23); (e) Individual Psalms of Thanksgiving (e.g. 30, 32, 116) following deliverance. In addition to these main groups, smaller categories were discerned: Communal Thanksgiving (e.g. 124), Wisdom (49), Pilgrimage (120–134), and Liturgies (15, 24).

Gunkel's work was unsatisfactory in that it offered no consistent basis on which one category might be distinguished from another. Sometimes he emphasized form or structure, sometimes content, but at least he rescued psalm-study from arid discussions of date and introduced a living appreciation of what the psalms were attempting to be and do. Where he led others have followed, building on and developing his category-approach but in particular agreeing with him that the chief setting in which the psalms are to be understood is the cult, Israel's round of temple-worship.

Cultic setting and terms

The Psalms themselves delight in the Lord's House (84); they see the 'holy hill', the 'tabernacle' and the 'altar' (43) as affording entrance to his presence; they are full of the inward piety that accompanied and gave meaning to outward acts (116:13–19), insisting that the ritual of sacrifice only becomes a 'sacrifice of righteousness' (4:5) when it springs from a right attitude.

Much of the material in the headings, mysterious though it remains to us, bore on the way in which a psalm was to be used in public worship. The word 'psalm' (4, 55, etc.) indicates musical accompaniment, though it is not clear how this differs from 'song'. Some difference must have been intended as the use of the two words together (e.g. 30) indicates. 'Prayer' (e.g. 17) 'Praise' (145) and 'For teaching' (60) suggest the function a psalm might serve, rather like subject-divisions in modern hymnbooks.

There are musical directions regarding strings (4), flutes (5), 'sheminith' (an eight-string instrument, or an eight part arrangement, 6); notes of tunes to be used: 'The Death of a Son' (9); 'The Doe of the Morning' (22); 'Lilies' (45); 'A dove on distant oaks' (56) etc. 'Gittith' (8, 81, 84) means 'wine-press' and may be a known joyful melody.

There are also words which now defy understanding but which, with varying certainty, can be said to bear on the cultic use of the psalms: 'shiggaion' (7, cf. Hab. 3:1); 'miktam' (16, 56–60); 'maskil' (32, etc.); and 'selah' (3:2, 4, 8; etc.) 'Miktam' may be related to the verb 'to cover' and since enemies figure in the psalms where it occurs, it could recommend the use of these psalms when protection is needed. 'Maskil' may mean 'didactic' but why these psalms in particular merit this note is not clear. 'Selah' occurs internally in the psalms and may have indicated some division of the material, a meditative/musical interlude when the psalm was sung in worship. But both its meaning as a word and its significance as a directive are now unknown.

Since the work of S. Mowinckel (cf. The Psalms in Israel's Worship, [Blackwell, 1962]) many have believed the Feast of Tabernacles included an annual celebration of the Lord's kingship. The expression 'The Lord reigns' (93:1; 97:1; 99:1; etc.) then should be 'The Lord has become King', a cultic cry acclaiming the ritual reassertion of divine kingship over all the earth, ensuring the welfare of his people for the coming year. Certainly at a later date (Zc. 14:16ff) Tabernacles was linked with kingship and prosperity, but for pre-exilic days the evidence is less clear.

When Jeroboam needed to detach his newly separated kingdom from the Lord's house and the Davidic king, we read that he appointed a feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month 'like the feast that was in Judah'. No feast in the eighth month is known but Tabernacles was on the fifteenth of the seventh month. Was it on this that Jeroboam modelled his feast? If so then Tabernacles too was a festival of kingship. It has to be recognized that the 'enthronement psalms' (47, 93, 96–99) are an amalgam of matching themes, not least Kingship and Creation and the Lord's sovereignty over spiritual forces of disorder, and it makes sense to think of an annual celebration with an 'Ascension Day' theme and focus.

On the other hand, the attempt by A. R. Johnson, Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel (University of Wales Press, 1967) and J. H. Eaton, Kingship and the Psalms (SCM, 1976) to derive from some psalms (e.g. 2, 18, 89, 101, 110, 118) a ritual of the annual renewal of earthly/Davidic kingship has not met with widespread acceptance. At its widest this theory identifies many, if not all, psalms of Individual Lament with the king, humbled by his (worldwide) foes and cast on the Lord for deliverance. More specifically psalms like 22 are set within this ritual of humiliation and its denouement in dramatic divine intervention to reinstate the king. Appeal is made to verses like 46:8 ('Come, see ...!') and 48:9 (translated 'we have portrayed/dramatized your love within your temple') to justify thinking in terms of a cultic ritual drama.

Equally, A. Weiser's theory of an annual ceremony of Covenant Renewal, The Psalms (SCM, 1962) has not found wide support. He contended that the dominant theme at Tabernacles was not the Lord's enthronement but national renewal of the Covenant. While Weiser found psalm after psalm speaking to this point, it is generally agreed that he allowed enthusiasm to replace realism and that while psalms like 50 and 81 need a ritual setting with a focus on the Commandments and the Sinai events, this is far from establishing the existence of a major annual festival. The seven-year law-reading of Deuteronomy 31:9ff is a sufficient background.

The Psalms as Scripture

As we consider the continuing vitality of the Psalms in today's church we can but touch on a few topics of importance.

(i) The Lord. One of the remarkable features of the Psalms is that though personal testimony abounds, the clearest impression left is not of people but of God. In this respect the Psalms are the OT in miniature: the Lord is the Creator (8, 104). But this is no abstract concept of how the world began; it is the ground of his present sovereign rule over all things as King (29, 96–99). The righteousness of his rule is predominant (11, 75) but in the great rhapsody of divine Kingship (145) righteousness is only one strand in a threefold cord along with greatness and grace. The goodness of God (34) is inseparable from his holiness (103) and finds its counterpart in his wrath (38). He is universal in his rule (67) and particular in his choice of Israel (87), two aspects of truth which find their unity in the messianic David, king of Israel and of the world (2, 72, 110). Both to his people as a whole (80) and to the individual (23), the Lord is Shepherd, the basis of confidence in looking to him for deliverance (16, 25, 31), recognizing his attentiveness to his people's needs (e.g. 3, 27). At the same time there is the problem of divine providence, the frequent adversities of God's people, individual (e.g. 10, 12) and collective (44, 74). It is this frank admission that suffering is ever part of the experience of the Lord's people that provides a proper perspective for understanding the link between righteousness and prosperity (e.g. 1). This is not a description of experience but a statement of faith (as when we affirm belief in 'God the Father, Almighty' in a world which challenges both his fatherliness and his almightiness). Since God is good and there is no other God, the outcome for his people is guaranteed.

(ii) The King. In the portrait of the King in the Psalms we have either the most blatant, unrealistic flattery of the successive kings of David's line, or else the expression of a great ideal, a mirror of the truth held up before each king in turn, awaiting the One in whom all will be fulfilled. The King meets world-opposition (2:1–3; 110:1) but, as Victor (45:3–5; 89:22f) and by the Lord's activity (2:6, 8; 18:46–50; 21:1–13; 110:1f), he establishes world-rule (2:8–12; 18:43–45; 45:17; 72:8–11; 89:25; 110:5ff), based on Zion (2:6) and marked by morality (45:4, 6; 72:2–4, 7; 101). His rule is everlasting (21:4; 45:6; 72:5); prosperous (72:7, 16) and undeviating in reverence for the Lord (72:18–19). Pre-eminent in gifts, graces and dignity (45:2–7), he is also friend of the poor and enemy of oppression (72:2, 4, 12–14); under him the righteous flourish (72:7). He is remembered for ever (45:17); possesses an everlasting name (72:17), and is the object of unending thanks (72:15). In relation to the Lord he is recipient of everlasting blessing (45:2). He is heir of David's covenant (89:28–37, 132:11f), and of Melchizedek's priesthood (110:4). He belongs to the Lord (89:18) and is devoted to him (21:7; 63:1–8, 11). He is his son (2:7; 89:27), seated at his right hand (110:1) and is himself divine (45:6).

The commentary should be consulted on the references listed above, but the exalted dimensions of the picture are clear. While much of the portrait can be traced in principle to Nathan's foundational oracle in 2 Sa. 7, the steps by which those hopes became the expectation of a perfect, righteous, human, divine, everlasting and universal king cannot be traced. The older view is needless that it was only when the monarchy ceased with the Babylonian exile and showed no signs of recovery that such hopes developed. The failure of monarchy goes back to David himself! The bright hopes implied in Jdg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25 had not been fulfilled; the historian in Kings might swing his spotlight on the constitutional, dynastic, covenant monarchy of Judah or on the charismatic 'do-it-yourself' monarchy of Israel, but the longed-for king was not to be found. This failure was the seedbed of one of the OT's greatest expectations.

(iii) Imprecations. The vigour with which enemies were denounced within the Psalms has ever been a source of difficulty. Has the desire for the sudden destruction of foes (35:8), their death (55:15), the breaking of their teeth (58:6), the destitution (109:10) and massacre of their children (137:9) anything in common with the mind of Christ? There are about 25 psalms which contain such passages and commentators have been quick to dismiss them as 'Old Testament morality', condemned and outmoded by the revelation of God in Christ. There are three reasons why this is unsatisfactory: (i) Similar sentiments are expressed in the NT (Gal. 1:8, 9; Rev. 6:10; 18:20; 19:1–3) and by the Lord Jesus (Mt. 11:20–23; 23:13–36). If there is a problem, it is biblical not OT; (ii) The OT like the NT urges love (Lv. 19:17–18), God's hatred of violence (Ps. 5:6), the duty of returning good for evil (Pss. 7:3–5; 35:12–14) and the rejection of vengeance (Dt. 32:35; Pr. 20:22); (iii) In almost every case the imprecation which we find objectionable sits alongside a spirituality we would envy, e.g. Psalm 139. One commentator who classes the imprecations in general as 'the very opposite of the spirit of the Gospel' finds, in 139:19–22, 'the duty of keeping alive in the human heart ... burning indignation against ... evil' (Kirkpatrick, The Psalms

More positively, we note that they are all prayers (except 137:9, see Commentary). There is no suggestion that the psalmists planned vengeful action, nor even that they entertained vengeful thoughts. Their reaction to hurt was to commit the matter to the Lord and leave it there. As J. R. W. Stott remarks (The Canticles and Selected Psalms [Hodder & Stoughton, 1966], pp. 11ff.), ‘I do not find it hard to imagine situations in which holy men of God do and should ... cry to God for vengeance ... and that without any feelings of personal animosity.’ Living as we do in a savage age when personal vengeance is an assumed right, and communal problems, real and fancied, ‘justify’ violence, terror, bombing and torture, we ought at least to be prepared to say that even if we deplore their prayers their approach was preferable to ours. But there is no need so to judge: their prayers shock us because of their realism. We would find ourselves at home with 143:11 but hesitate over its realistic corollary (12) just as we pray with a glad heart for the second coming of the Lord Jesus (2 Thes. 1:7), but would hesitate to frame our prayer in terms of the scriptural realities of that event, by asking for flaming fire to consume those who do not obey the gospel (2 Thes. 1:8). If we were holier—and certainly if we were less comfortable and knew more of the persecutor’s power—we would more readily identify than condemn.

The following commentary has attempted to major on the structure of each Psalm as the key to its meaning. It is seriously suggested to every psalm-student (indeed to every Bible student) that ‘the medium is the message’ and that the first objective in study should be to discover and clarify structure. See the article, Poetry in the Bible.

Psalm 1. The decisive contrast

Psalm 1 introduces the whole book of Psalms. First, it is a psalm of faith (3d). This promise of prosperity is not a pledge of good fortune in return for good behaviour—the Psalms know life too well for that! (see 42, 73). Rather, just as we continue to say ‘I believe in God the Father Almighty’ yet find that life often seems to deny both his fatherliness and his almightiness, so also v 3 professes a ‘creed’: this world is God’s world and those who side with him will surely and ultimately enjoy blessing (6). Secondly, it is a psalm of commitment: to a distinct lifestyle

(1) and to the word of God (2). Indeed ‘distinctiveness’ is the theme around which the poem is structured.

- A¹ (v 1) The way of blessedness
- B¹ (v 2) Continuance in the Lord’s law
- C¹ (v 3) The enduring fruit tree
- C² (v 4) The impermanent chaff
- B² (v 5) No standing in the Lord’s judgment
- A² (v 6) The way of perishing

1 The way of blessedness: present life. Depending on context Blessed can mean under God’s blessing, happy or fulfilled, or intrinsically right. All three meanings suit here. But the blessing and happiness are by-products of commitment to the life that is right. Walk ... stand ... sit. Our distinctiveness must show in our lifestyle.

2 Continuance in the Lord’s law. Law, ‘teaching’, such as a caring parent offers to a loved child (Pr. 3:1). Delight ... meditates. Behind the active obedience of v 1 lies the inward godliness of emotions and mind exercised day and night in the word of God.

3 The enduring, fruitful tree. Planted (lit.) ‘transplanted’, i.e. a new position into which one has been brought (80:8; cf. Col. 1:13).

4 The impermanent chaff.

5 No standing in the Lord’s judgment. Judgment ... assembly. At the final divine assessment those who are right with God (righteous) contrast with those who followed their own counsel and, by implication, did not bring their lives within the parameters of divine revelation.

6 The way of perishing: ultimate destiny. Watches over (lit.) ‘knows’, enters into an intimate and loving care of. Perish, the last word, compare this with the initial blessed (1)—a decisive contrast indeed!

Psalm 2. The world’s king

The theme is developed in four balancing sections: the kings who oppose the LORD and his Anointed One (1–3) are invited to take refuge, serving the LORD and paying homage to the Son (10–12). In between two voices are heard: the Lord speaks of the appointment of his Son to reign (4–6), and the Son speaks of the divine promise of world rule (7–9). The psalm is rooted in 2 Samuel 7, the promise to David of a supreme name, a relationship of sonship to the Lord, and an enduring line. Possibly the psalm was used to greet each succeeding Davidic king on his accession as a reminder of the ideal, but its fulfilment came in ‘great David’s greater Son’ (Lk. 1:31–33), just as the ever-pervasive refusal of the world to have ‘this man reign over them’ (Lk. 19:14) reached its climax at Calvary (Acts 4:25–26; 1 Cor. 2:8). The age in which we live, however bland and accommodating it may at times appear, essentially hates, opposes and rebels against God in Christ. Historically, the Davidic king was always under threat from the surrounding world; essentially, this reflects the world’s rebellion against God; prophetically, the psalm speaks of the rejection of Jesus.

1–3 Plot in vain (lit.) ‘murmur’. The picture here may not be so much of rebellion as of restlessness. What deprives the world of peace? V 2 replies: there can be no peace while the Lord and his anointed are rejected. Enmity against God is at the heart of the fallen nature (Col. 1:21).

Anointed (cf. 1 Sa. 16:13; 24:6; Is. 11:1–9). Chains ... fetters. It is Satan's delusion (Gn. 3:1–5) to represent divine conditions of blessing as hostile restrictions holding mankind back from proper freedom. 4–6 The Lord neither negotiates with rebels, nor adjusts himself to suit their demands, but simply reaffirms his royal plan: His king is installed and that is the end of the matter—just as in Genesis 3 the great rebellion did not alter divine sovereignty one iota! Anger ... wrath, respectively the snort of anger (anger felt) and burning force of wrath (anger expressed). Zion, literally the site of the Davidic monarchy; prophetically the centre of God's new creation in Christ (Heb. 12:22–24). 7–9 A relationship of sonship, a promise of inheritance and an endowment with power. My Son. God figuratively adopted the kings of David's line. Today, their accession day, the beginning of the relationship. When used of Jesus at his resurrection (Acts 13:32–37) the meaning rather is that God has made publicly plain what had always been the case. Ask of me. In distinction from the rebellious king, the Son lives by submissive reliance on the Father. At this point he was tempted (Mt. 4:8–10) and prevailed (Mt. 26:39). Iron sceptre ... like pottery, the contrast of absolute power with total helplessness. 10–12 Serve ... kiss. There can be no service to the Lord without submission to the Son! Fear ... rejoice ... trembling. There is a distinction between confidence and presumptuousness. Those who kiss the Son remain ever aware of the fear rightly due to him and the wrath that is inseparable from his holiness. Blessed (see 1:1). Take refuge. 'There is no refuge from him: only in him' (Kidner).

Psalm 3. Prayer and confidence: a psalm for a new day

Here is a psalm with a clear focal point i.e. that prayer brings confidence to face life (4–6). The movement in this psalm is first towards and then out from these verses.

A¹ (vs 1–2) Need: no deliverance
 B¹ (v 3) Affirmation: divine protection
 C (vs 4–6) Prayer brings confidence
 B² (v 7) Appear for divine deliverance
 A² (v 8) Solution

This psalm is set in 2 Samuel 15:13–17:24. The initial flight from Absalom covered two nights, the first of which could understandably have found David despondent (1, 2). But the antidote to despondency is, first, to assert divine truth (3), and secondly to seek divine aid (4). The consequence is the blessing of a night's sleep (5) and fresh confidence for the new day (6). Just as one day ended in prayer (4) so the new day begins in calling on God to deliver (7), for he has ever been the foe of David's foes: thus, confident prayer draws on past experiences of grace and begets assurance for the future (8).

1, 2 Need: no deliverance. God will not deliver. This is the killing blow: an attitude (foes) has become action (rise up) and reflects public opinion—not even God can help David now!

3 Affirmation: divine protection. But you, is emphatic. The breakthrough from the gloom of vs 1, 2 is to grasp afresh what God is. My Glorious One, (lit.) 'my glory': David has been stripped of all earthly pomp but cannot be deprived of God. My head (cf. 2 Sa. 15:30).

7 Appeal for divine deliverance. Arise, O Lord. (cf. Nu. 10:35). By using Moses' great cry David expresses confidence that even in apparent defeat he and his fleeing company are in fact under divine guidance. Jaw ... teeth. Striking the cheek is an act of rebuke (1 Ki. 22:24); breaking the teeth is to render harmless.

8 Solution. ‘To the Lord belongs deliverance’.

Psalm 4. Praying, knowing, trusting, resting

This is a night-time psalm (8), probably belonging to the time of David’s flight from Absalom (see Ps. 3), as he faces a second night sleeping rough and under threat. Like Ps. 3, this is a psalm of prayer and we note that to come into the place of prayer (1) is to find oneself in the place of peace (8)—even though the pressures remain the same ((2) those who denigrate; (6) those who despair). But the centrepiece of this psalm is not prayer but knowing (3) and trusting (4, 5). The former is what David imaginatively addresses to the denigrators in Absalom’s court, the latter, to the despondent in his own camp as they prepare for bed.

1 True prayer is urgent (1a), resting on the righteousness of God (1b), specific (1c) and dependent on divine mercy (1d). 2 An imaginative appeal to those gathered to Absalom to stop denigrating his glory as king, to abandon their delusions of power and their ‘falsehood’ (not false gods). 3 Godly, a complex word meaning those whom God loves with an unchanging love and who love him back (cf. 2 Tim. 2:19a). 4, 5 A word to the discouraged in David’s camp. In your anger, rather ‘Tremble and’. There is no point in denying fear, but the right response is to use the night hours for quiet prayer (4c, not search but ‘speak in’), approaching God (5a) in the spirit of the sacrifices in consecration, (burnt-offering), confession (sin-offering), fellowship (peace-offering), and in trust (5b). 6 Counter despondency with appropriate prayer. 7, 8 David’s testimony: prayer brings greater joy than the world affords, through the peace and safety the Lord alone provides.

Psalm 5. The moral context of prevailing prayer

Possibly this psalm meditates on the second morning of David’s flight from Absalom (see Ps. 3). There is no historical title to guide us but the psalm is concerned with prayer morning by morning (3) and alternating paragraphs dealing with those who seek God in righteousness and the wicked whom he rejects could well reflect the morally ‘black and white’ situation in which Absalom placed David.

- A¹ (vs 1–3) Confidence in the Lord
- B¹ (vs 4–6) The Lord’s rejection of the wicked
- C (vs 7–8) Commitment to the Lord’s righteous way
- B² (vs 9–10) The Lord’s banishment of rebels
- A² (vs 11–12) Joy in the Lord

The psalm centres on holy, reverential worship and prayer for a righteous life (7, 8). David thus adopts a position contrasting with those who do wrong (4, 5) and speak wrong (9), and displays the commitment of one who expects prayer to be answered (1–3) and divine protection (11, 12).

1–3 Confidence in the Lord who hears prayer. Prayer (a) is putting the problem (sighing) into words (1) (b) carries with it a guarantee of being heard. Note the sequence (2) Listen ... for (because) ... I pray. (c) comes first in the day: morning by morning (v 3ab) is simply ‘in the morning’. The thought is not so much regularity (cf. Is. 50:4), as priority in the day (d) is watchful for an answer (3c).

4–6, 9, 10 The Lord’s rejection of the wicked and banishment of rebels. Each of these sections begins with ‘For’ (omitted by NIV), i.e. David (1–3) can expect prayer to be answered ‘because’ he is not like the wicked (4–6) and prays for a righteous pathway (8) ‘because’ he wishes to be distinct from the rebels whom the Lord will banish (9, 10). This is the moral commitment of the praying person, covering character (4, 5a), conduct (5b), speech (6a), relationships (6b), truthfulness (9a), integrity (9b), and speech again (9cd). 10 Is such a request as this proper? Like most of the imprecations (see Introduction) it asks God to do what he has asserted he will in any case do—expose and punish sin and sinners (10a, c); do to false accusers what they would have done to the object of their spite (10b; cf. Dt. 19:16–19); leaves action to God, not proposing to take personal vengeance (Pr. 20:22; Rom. 12:19); and is motivated by the hurt done to God (10d), not personal animosity. 7 How can David speak of a house when the temple was not yet built? Because (1 Sa. 1:9, 24) these were the common designations of the place where the Lord dwelt even though it were but his tent (1 Sa. 2:22; 2 Sa. 7:2). Note how great mercy brings us with reverence into the place of holiness.

11, 12 Joy in the Lord who protects. Righteous, those who are right with God.

Psalm 6. Great need, great reassurance

The reference to human enemies (7, 8, 10) suggests that the setting of this psalm could be the same as Ps. 3: considering the toil of the journey, the threat of attack and responsibility for the mixed company (2 Sa. 15:16, 18, 22) who fled with him, it is no wonder that David experienced times of exhaustion (2 Sa. 16:14; 17:29). (On the other hand, v 2 more readily points to an actual time of illness.) In a low ebb of physical, mental and emotional energies David sounded the depths here recorded. Human enmity has breached his defences (6, 7) but, at a deeper level, there is the anger of the LORD bringing weakness (faint, 2), terror (agony, 2, lit. ‘are terrified’) and anguish (3), lit. ‘terrified’ as (2). For in his depression perhaps David recalled that if he had not sinned with Bathsheba (2 Sa. 11, 12) he would not have been powerless when his eldest son raped Absalom’s sister (2 Sa. 13). If he had not mishandled Absalom’s case, leaving his turbulent spirit to fester (2 Sa. 14, 15), the rebellion might never have occurred. Well might David feel that the Lord had turned away from him in anger (4)! But the greatest of all perils yields to the simplest of all remedies: the cry be merciful (2) brings assurance, the LORD has heard my cry for mercy (9). If the greatest need is dispelled by prayer, then will not lesser needs be met in the same way (10)? Through prayer David’s terror (1–3) becomes his enemies’ terror (10) dismayed, lit. ‘terrified’, as (2, 3); the return of the Lord in answer to prayer (4, 5) is the signal for the enemies to go (8, 9); when he was weak (6, 7) David found that he was strong.

Notes. 4 Turn, ‘turn back’. 5 is often quoted as indicating that the OT lacked hope after death (see 49, 73), but David is here speaking of death from the point of view of one who feels himself to be astray from God, the object of divine wrath. On this matter, the NT goes far beyond anything the OT was able to reveal (Mt. 10:28).

Psalm 7. The blessing of a good conscience

We do not know who Cush was but we do know that Saul, the Benjamite king (1 Sa. 9:1), surrounded himself with Benjamites (1 Sa. 22:7); also that he was incited against David by slandering tongues (1 Sa. 24:9; 26:19). A situation like 1 Samuel 18:10–24 would have given plenty of scope for the ‘Cushes’ of this world to inflame Saul’s paranoiac dread of David. But David knew that no accusation of disloyalty against Saul was true; even before God’s judgment seat (6, 7, 10–13), his conscience was clear (8b, 9) and these verses are the heart of the psalm and a summons to preserve in all things ‘a conscience as the noonday clear’ (Acts 24:16; Heb. 13:18; 1 Pet. 3:16).

- A¹ (vs 1–2) Present shelter and prayer
- B¹ (vs 3–5) Sin and its reward
- C¹ (vs 6–8a) The God of Justice
- D (vs 8b–9) A clear conscience
- C² (vs 10–13) The God of Justice
- B² (vs 14–16) Sin and its reward
- A² (v 17) Envisaged thanks and praise

The overall movement of the psalm is the familiar theme that prayer resolves crises and issues in praise for their solution. Vs 3–5 and 14–16 recognize that sin and reward belong together and in the present instance David is willing to expose himself to the full rigour of justice. This is the way sin ‘works’ (14–16): it has a boomerang quality as if it were a living agent in its own right. But if sin appears to return on the head of the perpetrator it is because there is a just (6–8a), wrathful (10–13) God before whom all will one day stand, but who is the same every day with resources at the ready for the punishment of the unrepentant. In the light of such a view of sin, and before such a God, David asserts his innocence: such is the nature and blessing of a clear conscience.

1, 2 Present shelter and prayer. Take refuge. Deliverance is still in the future (17) but protection is a present reality. All (1) becomes a singular (2), (lit.) ‘or he will’, i.e. David has many foes but one in particular, as the title indicates.

3–5 Sin and its reward: David’s testimony. At peace (4), bound by a treaty of friendship. Or without cause (4) may be ‘... actually I have delivered him who without cause is my adversary’. Far from repaying evil, David has a record of returning good for evil (cf. Mt. 5:43–48; Rom. 12:17–21). Long after Saul had tried to kill David, David still ministered to the demented king by his music and gave him other devoted service (1 Sa. 18:10–13; 19:9; 1 Sa. 20:1; 24:10f, 17; 26:18, 23f). Make me sleep (5), (lit.) ‘make my glory dwell’, ruin my reputation publicly.

6–8a The God of Justice: the final judgment. The reference to the assembled peoples indicates that David is referring to the last judgment. The Lord mercifully may overlook sins now, but not then. But so confident is David of innocence that he asks for the last judgment now!

8b–9 A clear conscience before God. Righteousness (8), not sinless perfection, but equivalent to a plea of ‘not guilty’ in relation to a specific charge. Integrity (8), i.e. his righteousness is no mere conformism but a state of the whole man, Cf. minds and hearts (9)—which refers to thoughts, imagination, feelings and reactions.

10–13 The God of Justice: Saviour and Judge. (Lit.) ‘My shield is upon God’—he is my shield-bearer/defender. Relent (12), ‘repent’. Even before such a God (9, 11) penitence averts judgment.

14–16 Sin and its reward: an inevitability. V 14 opens with ‘Behold!’—‘Look, it’s like this!’, the nexus between sin and reward.

17 Envisaged thanks and praise. A clear conscience makes David confident of a different future.

Note. Title, Shiggaion, see Introduction.

Psalm 8. The God of the insignificant

If vs 1c–2 were removed from the psalm, what would remain is a balanced poem with a coherent theme. The opening and closing acclamations of the majestic name bracket two stanzas of equal length dealing with the Lord’s condescending recognition and honouring of humankind (3–5) and the ruling place he has given them over all creation (6–8). In this the NT sees the Lord Jesus Christ in his present reign (Eph. 1:22; Heb. 2:5–9) and coming triumph (1 Cor. 15:27), to be shared with his purchased people (Rev. 5:9, 10).

But what prompted this line of thought about God’s condescension, and man’s dominion in the world? The answer is found by restoring the first stanza to its place. The transcendent God (1c, d) sovereign power in his hand, chooses to use the lips of children and infants (2). Are we to take this literally—a foe silenced by a child? Or does David use ‘infant’ figuratively of what is tiny, weak and powerless? There is no way of knowing, but it is plain that he experienced some notable instance of powerlessness over-mastering power. When, at night (3), he pondered this he saw it as typical of the Lord’s ways. Humankind, dwarfed by the immensity of the universe, is yet taken up by the Lord, given glory and made its master—a principle perfectly realized in the Lord Jesus Christ and yet still to be realized in redeemed humankind (Heb. 2:5–9). This principle is truly expressed in the wonder of the divine choice (1 Cor. 1:26–28) and at hand to be experienced by every believer (2 Cor. 12:9, 10).

Notes. 1a Our Lord, (lit.) ‘our Sovereign One’; also in v 9. 1c, 1d, 2 *Ordained praise should be ‘founded strength’, set your strength on a sure foundation. Avenger can mean one taking reprisals for wrong suffered (Je. 5:9) but can also simply mean, as here, one acting for his own advantage (see 44:16).

Psalms 9, 10. Wrestling faith

Psalms 9 and 10 form a broken alphabetical acrostic (see Poetry in the Bible). Four letters are missing, two are transposed and one appears in the second word of its stanza. Attempts have been made to restore a perfect acrostic but the broken acrostic falls into three sections of six letters each: 9:1–12; 9:13–10:6; 10:7–18. The theme is the opposition of the wicked (9:6, 17, 18; 10:2, 3, 4, 13, 15). Section 1 (9:1–12), beginning and ending with praise (1–2, 11) is a calm statement: the wicked are about but God is on the throne. But in section 2, (9:13–10:6) the actuality of life is turbulent, giving rise to a cry for divine mercy (9:13) and counteraction (9:19). The Lord is distant (10:1), the wicked rampant (10:2–6). The end is sure (9:15, 16) but this does not necessarily bring the comfort needed here-and-now. Yet in section 3, (10:7–18) prayer is the sufficient resource. Wickedness (7–10) assumes that God does not care while prayer seeks divine action, for God is not as they say but will destroy and judge finally and universally (11–16). Prayer will be heard; the helpless will get their rights; and oppressors will cease (17–18).

9:1–12 Confident faith

A¹ (vs 1–2) Praise
B¹ (vs 3–4) The just king
C (vs 5–6) The final judgment
B² (vs 7–10) The just king
A² (vs 11–12) Praise

The ultimate overthrow of the wicked and the end of their opposition is not our only comfort but it is where we start (5–6). ‘God is still on the throne’. David first imaginatively takes his stand in the day of judgment (3, 4) and, using past tenses, records the rout of his enemies and his own vindication, whereas in the matching verses (7–10) he looks forward to the work of the same reigning Lord.

1, 2 Praise ‘give thanks to’; wonders, acts which require a cause beyond humankind. You. Joy moves from the deed (wonders) to the doer. Name, all that the Lord has revealed himself to be. Even though life is troubled and the final settlement of all things has not yet come, there is still matter for praise in what the Lord is and what he has done.

3, 4 The just king, overthrowing and vindicating. Before you. The presence of the Lord is sufficient (Rev. 6:16).

5, 6 The final judgment. The judgment of the Lord deals with character (their name), achievement (their cities) and place in history (memory).

7–10 The just king, judging and sheltering. Repeating the themes of throne, righteousness and judgment, found in the matching vs 3, 4, these verses elaborate the Lord’s vindication of his own (4) into a rich statement of their security. In other words, what will be supremely true in the day of Judgment (because God is on the throne) is in due measure true now (because he is always on the throne). 9, 10 what the Lord is and what we may do. He is a refuge and stronghold. The same word, stressing (inaccessible) height, ‘top-security’. Have never forsaken, perfect tense to express the fixity of divine character, i.e., ‘never do and never will’.

11, 12 Praise. The Lord is enthroned. The final judgment will make the Lord’s kingship all too clear (4, 7), but he is king now, reigning among his people. The nations need to be told. Has done, his works of creation, redemption, preservation.

9:13–10:6 Buffeted faith

The cry for mercy (9:13) and the question why? (10:1) announce the theme of the second section of the psalm. Faith has not ceased to be confident. It is not based on fluctuating earthly fortunes but on the God who is still on the throne. Earthly buffetings, however, are also real and often the world we live in seems to belong to the godless and the hostile.

A¹ (vs 13–14) Present need: trouble is near
B (vs 15–20) Future certainties
A² (10:1–6) Present need: God seems far away

13–14 Present need: trouble is near. And lift me, ‘You who lift ... ’; as much a description of character as of action. The confident I will tell, ‘recount’ (1) modulates into that I may declare, ‘recount’ (14). Present adversity muffles the voice of praise. Certainty remains that God will act—but a bit of action now would help! How realistic this psalm is!

15–16 Sin will be rewarded. Have fallen ... caught (15) The perfect tense of certainty, ‘are sure to’. By divine providence, sin is a boomerang. Are (16), present tense, the wicked are already (unknowingly!) self-ensnared.

17 The wicked removed. Return, future tense, ‘will return’. Grave, Heb. ‘Sheol’, the place where the dead live on.

18–20 God does not forget. Future certainties of doom (15–17) and deliverance (18) are no answer to present adversities. Consequently, the need of prayer (13).

10:1–6 God seems far away. The question (1) expresses not theological reality (see 9:10) but personal feeling. We often may feel bereft of God’s presence but the proper reaction is not gloom but to bring the problem to the Lord. 2–6 Here is the heart of the tension between faith and experience. Faith says that the wicked are sure to be caught in their net (9:15). But all too often in life (2) it is the weak who are caught while the wicked go on, with impunity, with false values (3), practical atheism (4), prosperity without morality (5ab) and blissful self-assurance (5c–6).

10:7–18 Praying faith

7–11 The Problem: the wicked person is hostile in speech (7), murderous in intent (8, 9), pitiless in strength (10), a practical atheist (11).

12–16 The Resource: Prayer for divine intervention to defend the weak and the truth (12–13); based on divine knowledge, intent and commitment to the needy (14); and requesting the end of the power of the wicked, his trial (15), and the final judgment (16).

17, 18 The Assurance: prayer is heard (17), deliverance is total (18).

Such vigour of prayer is striking Arise (9:19; 10:12), as though accusing the Lord of ‘lying down on the job’; do not forget (12)—as if he had done so. Equally striking is that nothing is done except through prayer. Deadly though the threat is (9:13; 10:8), mighty though the opponent (10:9), prayer is enough, because the Lord is king (9:4, 7), he knows our needs (10:14), and he is pledged to shelter (9:9, 10), uplift (9:13) and help (10:14).

Psalm 11. Faith and truth

A background such as 1 Samuel 18:8–19:7 illuminates this psalm. David’s life was daily in danger. The psalm is in three parts.

1–3 The Lord’s protection. The advice to flee is well founded: because of actual danger (2); and because the sheer instability of society makes it impossible to steer a safe course. David, however, asserts the way of trust as against the case for flight; Foundations (3), the ‘ground rules’ on which society operates. In such a situation as Saul’s dementia the rules are changed from moment to moment and it would be impossible for David to know how to avoid offending. But the case for trust is well argued too: the words in the Lord (1) are emphatic. Since he is trustworthy, trust is a logical way of life.

4–6 The Lord’s providence: from his throne he observes and examines (4). Trust does not guarantee a life of ease. Rather it brings testing to the righteous, those who are ‘right with God’ (5a), but the wicked experience his opposition (5b–6).

7 The Lord’s favour. To see his face is to experience the Lord ‘lifting up his face’, i.e. accepting one with favour into his presence. Thus faith is three-faceted: the faith that flies for security (1); the faith that accepts the testings of life as the Lord’s purpose (5a); and the faith that awaits a blessed outcome. For the righteous, God's testings are the way forward into his immediate presence (7).

Psalm 12. The war of words

This psalm balances two 'words': all around David heard falsehood, flattery and duplicity (2); but by contrast there is a word that is total in its purity (flawless, 6a), its value (silver 6b) and its freedom from any imperfection (seven times 6c). This is the choice which always confronts the believer: to be distracted and disorientated by the word of man or to rest upon the word of God. For society can at any moment seem as in vs 1, 2: without spirituality, reliability and veracity and we need a sure standing ground (6).

The response to the collapse of values in society (2) is prayer (1, 3) for personal deliverance (1, help, 'save') and for divine judgment upon rampant untruth (3–4). It is correct to pray for just such divine action to purge society (3), indeed the Lord validates such a prayer by commitment to act (5).

The response to the word of the Lord is trust. Because his word is flawlessly pure, he will stand by it, pledging action in response to need and against wrong (5). In return we affirm confidence (7) even though the problem is still as virulent as ever (8).

Notes. 1 Godly, see 4:3. 2 Sins of speech (cf. Is. 6:5; Ps. 34:12–13; Rom. 3:13–14; Jas. 3:2–6.) Deception, 'with heart and heart', we would say 'two-faced'. 5–8 Since what the Lord promises (5) is part of his flawless word (6), trust him (7) even while the problem remains (8). 5 weak ... needy, respectively, the underdog and the exploitable. 6 Flawless, specifically such purity as God can accept. 7 For ever, or 'O you who are for ever'.

Psalm 13. New dimensions for old: transformation by prayer

This is the same scenario as Psalms 9–12: David is surrounded by foes, but here a single foe is in mind (2, 3). That David does not pray for his destruction fits either the Saul (1 Sa. 26:9ff.) or Absalom (2 Sa. 18:5) situations. The three stanzas of this poem are respectively 5, 4 and 3 lines long: the dimensions of distress (1, 2) merge into urgent prayer (3, 4) and come to quiet rest in transformed experience (5, 6). Agitation is brought into the place of intercession and emerges in exultation.

1, 2 The dimensions of distress are spiritual (Has the Lord forgotten?), personal (inward wrestling and sorrow) and circumstantial (dominant enemy). 3, 4 Identical dimensions of prayer: spiritual (Look, restored divine favour, no longer the hidden face) (1), personal (light, renewal), circumstantial (enemy ... foes). True prayer takes every side of need to the Lord. 5, 6 Dimensions of transformation: spiritual, the hidden face (1) is replaced by unfailing love; personal, heart-sorrow has become heart-joy; circumstantial, the rampant foe is replaced by divine sufficiency: good to me 'has made full provision for me', better understood as 'perfect of certainty', '... has determined to make ...'.

Prayer thus brings a full-orbed solution to the problem fully shared with the Lord.

Psalm 14. Voices: atheism and experience

The emphatic There (5 lit. ‘There, they were truly afraid’) recalls the occasion which gave rise to this psalm—some situation where atheism came face to face with the reality of the presence of God among his people. What this occasion was we have no means of knowing. Was the psalmist meditating on Ex. 14:10–28? The atheism in question is more practical than theoretical, not so much denying God’s existence as his relevance.

1 Fool, a person without any sense of moral values or social obligations (Is. 32:6; cf. 1 Sa. 25, esp. v 25), in character corrupt, spiritually vile (‘abhorrent [to God]’), in conduct careless of good. 2 since such do not seek God, the consequence follows that, 3, deliberately (turned aside) they have become corrupt, ‘gone to the bad’, treat the Lord’s people as prey and themselves feel no need of God (do not call). It is equally clear that the answer to such people is not argument but the unmistakable reality of God’s presence among his people (5b) and their experience of finding him a sufficient refuge in every need (6b). The reply to unspirituality is true spirituality.

The psalm records three voices, each followed by a comment: The fool (1a, b), comment (1c, d); the Lord (2–4), comment (5); Israel (7a, b), comment (7c). The concluding prayer asks that what happened once (5, 6) should become a permanent reality (salvation) but its accompanying comment is realism itself: the task of the people of God is to rejoice in him here and now.

Psalm 15. The Lord’s guest: May I come and stay?

This is often called an ‘entrance liturgy’ with a would-be worshipper asking the conditions of entering and a priest replying. The point of the psalm is residence ((1), dwell ... live): how may one dwell in his (not sanctuary but ‘tent’), enjoying hospitality as a guest in his home. Here is the holiness without which no one sees God (Heb. 12:14), covering conduct, conversation and relationships (2–3), values, integrity and financial contentment (4–5).

Notes. 1 Dwell, ‘stay as a guest’. 2 Walk, lifestyle; blameless, ‘perfect’/all of a piece; righteous, right with God. 5 ‘Contentment’ expresses the fact that this person is not motivated by money: giving without thought of making (Lk. 6:35), refusing tainted money. 6 Shaken, i.e. out of his place in the Lord’s tent.

Psalm 16. Eternal security

It is not certain what prompted David to cry out for preservation (1), but the focus on the grave (9–11) suggests that some close brush with death, through illness or danger, drove him to probe the question of personal security, its nature and extent. In any case this is the theme of the psalm whose structure proclaims its message:

- A¹ (v 1) Security in God: a plea
- B (vs 2–4, 5, 8) The evidences of security
 - a¹ (v 2) The Lord my total good
 - a² (v 5) The Lord my portion
 - b¹ (v 3) Delight in the people
 - b² (v 6) Delight in the inheritance
 - c¹ (v 4) Commitment: negative
 - c² (vs 7–8) Commitment: positive
- A² (vs 9–11) Eternal security in God: a possession

1 Security in God, a plea. Security begins when we ask for it and seek it in God (1). 2–8 There are three evidences of possessing security: First, delight in the Lord: (2) apart from you, ‘my good/wellbeing is not beyond you/does not lie outside you’, ‘you are all the good I need’—‘Thou, O Christ’ art all I want’; (5) lit. ‘The Lord is my share of the portion’; cup, translated lot (11:6), personal fortune, good or ill, in life. To say The Lord is ... my cup is to affirm that in sorrow or joy he is the overriding reality (73:25–26). Secondly, delight in the Lord’s people and kingdom: (3) saints, ‘holy ones’, those whom the Lord has ‘set apart’ for himself; (6) delightful, synonymous with delight (3), here the object is the inheritance which the Lord has allotted. Thirdly, delight in the Lord’s truth. Refusing devotion to other gods (4c) or what they claim to be (4d, names), David delights in the Lord’s teaching ((7) counsels ... instructs) and, in its light, makes the Lord his constant goal in life ((8) set ... before) and experiences his presence (8b, c).

9–11 Eternal security in God, a possession. Security has an eternal dimension: the whole person, inwardly (heart) and outwardly (flesh), can rest secure, even in the face of death (grave/‘Sheol’, where the dead live on); beyond Sheol there is a path to life leading to (lit.) ‘satiation of joys’ in your presence (See Introduction, ‘Hope’).

Even when David wrote this psalm he was going beyond his own personal experience: he did not, for example, always set the Lord before him, nor was he always unshaken. Both he and his contemporaries would recognize the psalm as an unrealized ideal. Rightly, therefore, the NT finds here a foreshadowing of the Lord Jesus Christ in whom its ideals and hopes were fulfilled (Acts 2:24–32) and through whom the identical hope awaits us (Rom. 8:11).

Psalm 17. Appeal to the supreme court

1 Samuel 23:25ff. provides a suitable background to this psalm. The narrative matches the psalm where the psalmist is surrounded by enemies among whom one is notably hostile (v 12 is singular). There are links with Psalm 16 and maybe the danger reflected here is the brush with death on which that psalm is based.

The psalm consists of three appeals: Hear (1), Give (6), Rise (13). The first (1–5) pleads the righteousness of the psalmist; the second (6b–12) is against ruthless foes; and the third (13, 14) asks for divine action. The first and third are followed by personal affirmations (6, 15) (each begins with an emphatic first person pronoun, ‘As for me ...’) respectively confident of a present hearing and a future vision of God (cf. 16:1, 9–11).

1–5 Appeal based on righteousness. David is not, of course, claiming sinlessness in general, but that in this particular situation he has maintained righteousness, as the narrative of his relationship with Saul bears out. He comes to God with a clear conscience, (cf. Ne. 6:8–9; Acts 24:16) my righteous plea (1), ‘Hear righteousness’, (cf. Dt. 1:16, (lit.) ‘and judge righteousness’, in passing judgment bring the full weight of righteousness to bear). So here, ‘hear in the full light of (your) righteousness’. At night (3) at a time when thoughts readily wander and false courses are entertained (see 16:7; cf. 36:4). My mouth, biblical emphasis on the importance of speech (4). In relation to Saul, the divine word which pronounced the king the Lord’s anointed proved to be David’s safeguard when others counselled a different course (1 Sa. 24:3–7; 26:8ff.). David’s clear conscience arose from following God’s revealed way, his paths, without deviation (not slipped) (5).

6 The motive for dealing with a crisis by prayer is that God will (always) answer. God, ēl, the most transcendent of the God-words. Prayer brings our needs right to ‘The Deity’ himself. We must remember that there are other grounds for prayer than a clear conscience. We appeal with equal certainty on the basis of our needy state (86:1), of divine forgiveness (86:4, 5), and of the name of Jesus (Jn. 16:23).

6b–12 David makes his needs known to God. Though our Father knows our needs we still must pray (Mt. 6:6–13). Jesus, who knew the need, asked, ‘What do you want me to do?’ (Mk. 10:51). 7 (lit.) ‘Make your love wonderful’: the adjective alludes to God’s supernatural power, the noun to the unchanging love he pledges to us. 8 Apple, ‘pupil’. Just as we instinctively move to protect our eyes, so David expects an immediate instinctive divine reaction protecting him. Wings (61:4; cf. Ruth 2:12) 9 mortal, ‘life-threatening’. 11 me ... me, / ‘us ... us’. Kidner, ‘David’s companions are never far from his thoughts.’ 12 (lit.) singular, either ‘Each is like’ or ‘he is like’. (See Introduction above).

13, 14. The third appeal: for divine action. David looks solely to the Lord’s sword (punitive power) and hand (personal action). 14 This world ... this life, i.e. people solely governed by worldly values etc., therefore from whom no tenderness can be expected. 14c, d may be as NIV but the switch from the Lord’s foes (14a, b) to his protected ones destroys the contrast with v 15. Probably, ‘And what you have stored away, oh fill their belly with it! May their sons have more than enough! May they leave their surplus for their children!’ What the Lord has ‘stored away’ is the punishment they deserve and which, according to the biblical family principle (Ex. 20:5), passes on to their descendants. David does not pray vengefully: he disclaims sins of speech, (1). Rather he identifies himself, righteously, with the righteous anger of the Lord in all its revealed aspects.

15. The emphatic opening I, ‘As for me’ contrasts with what has preceded. The future of his foes is in God’s hand. They ‘will be satisfied/sated’ ((14) have plenty) with stored up punishment; he will be satisfied with the visible presence (likeness) of God (cf. 11:7). Awake, used here of resurrection (cf. Is. 26:19; Dan. 12:2; see also 49:15; 73:23–24; 139:18).

Psalm 18. God in the shadows: God in control

Reading from the title into the psalm we say, but it wasn’t like that at all! When, in David’s story, did the Lord come swooping to his aid, riding on a cherub (10)? Storms (12) were sent to deliver (Jos. 10:11) but not in David’s story; the Lord’s wind (15) carved a path through the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21; 15:10), but no such incident is recorded for David. David was delivered by different means: a Philistine raid (1 Sa. 23:26f), the wildness of the terrain (1 Sa. 24:1–3), Saul’s impressionable conscience (1 Sa. 24, 26), even by flight (1 Sa. 27:1).

But this seeming contrast between the terms of the psalm and the terms of the story is in fact the whole point. When David looked back from the vantage point of deliverance (Title), he knew that it could only have been done by the Lord of Sinai (7–8; cf. Ex. 19:18), of the judgments on Egypt (9–12; cf. Ex. 9:13ff; 10:21ff), and of the Red Sea (15), respectively, the Lord acting in holiness, judgment and deliverance. This is the meaning of the vivid imagery: behind all his circumstances lies the supernatural working of God. David took refuge in the cave of Adullam (1 Sa. 22:1) and the rocks of the wild goats (1 Sa. 24:2), but by hindsight he saw that it was always the Lord who was his rock and refuge (2, 46), concealing his glory, to be sure, behind the dark veil of circumstances, but reigning from his throne in the interests of his servant.

Yet that is not the whole story. There was a link between his desperate need and the Lord’s delivering power: 3, I call ... I am saved; 6 (lit.) ‘I kept calling ... kept crying ... my cry for help kept coming before him’ 16. He reached down ... prayer made all the difference. Did David ever stop to think that this almighty Lord could just as easily have kept him safe had he stayed in the eye of the storm in Saul's palace (1 Sa. 19:9–10), and avoided all those bleak wilderness years?

The purpose of vs 1–19 is that we might catch the vision of sovereign power waiting to be 'triggered' by prayer. In vs 20–45 David sets out to state plainly the lessons of this past experience, for the Bible teaches us by hindsight in order that we may live with foresight. These verses divide themselves into four sections, marked out by differences in wording: 'the Lord and me' (20–24, 30–34) and 'You and me' (25–29, 35–45). Broadly the former tell how the Lord works and the latter how this working applied to David. The principle is stated that the Lord rewards righteousness (20–24), and David found that in a situation where he could rightly claim righteousness the Lord turned his darkness into light (25–29). We must not, therefore, simply assume that the Lord will bless us, but actively set ourselves in the pathway of righteousness so as to inherit his blessing (Acts 5:32). In vs 30–34 we learn that the Lord whose way is perfect (30) purposes to make my way perfect (32). David shares how this worked out for him in empowering and victory in the midst of travail (35–45). But in all things the Lord is working to make us like him (cf. Rom 8:28; Heb. 12:7–11). The psalm ends (46–50) as it began (1–3) with an ascription of praise to the divine Rock and Saviour.

This psalm is virtually the same as 2 Samuel 22. The psalm includes, in the Title, the significant words the servant of the Lord, suggesting that the psalm is later than the form in 2 Samuel and that the words were added, editorially, in devotion to David (or his memory).

1, 2 (A¹) Summary: Personal devotion to the saving God. 1 Love, passionate love (cf. 1 Ki. 3:26 filled with compassion), often used of God's surging love for his people (e.g. 103:13, compassion), only here of human love for God. 2 Rock, 'cliff, crag', rock ... stronghold, 'top-security' (9:9), all alike suggest being placed high, out of reach of enemies. Horn, symbol of conquering strength, contrasting with shield, defensive strength. Kidner, 'In this rush of metaphors and David relives his escapes and victories ... probes into their meaning.' Take refuge. There is no point in having a fortress if we do not run there for safety.

3–19 (B¹) The hidden ways of God. In every circumstance (see Introduction above) the mightiness of God was at work on David's behalf, even though the divine glory was concealed. Even when life seems most humdrum, the supernatural presence of God is there. 3–6 The unfailing effectiveness of prayer: I call ... I am saved (3). The 'timeless present tense' expresses an unchanging principle. 4, 5 The deadly crisis; 6 The particular effectiveness of prayer in dealing with the crisis because it is made to the Covenant God (LORD), intimately known (my God), who makes himself accessible (temple) and listens personally (ears). 7–15 Prayer summons the awesome God to our side, who responds in anger (7, 8), in person (9–12), and in power (13–15). See introduction above for the use of the motifs of Egyptian plague, Sinai and the Red Sea. 16–19 All this because one individual was precious and important to him—note how me/my occurs twice in each verse.

20–45 (B²) The revealed ways of God. 20–29 The key-words (20, 24) according to my righteousness ... according to my righteousness 'bracket' the first stanza in the section. This is then generalized (to the faithful ... faithful ... blameless ... blameless, 25) and particularized (my lamp ... my darkness, 28) in the second stanza. In other words we are taught to recognize the moral rectitude of our God and deliberately to put ourselves in the way of blessing by doing that which pleases him. This is not salvation by works, for David is already the Lord's, but blessing through obedience, which is still the position of the redeemed. 20 Dealt with, 'dealt fully with/completely met my need/brought me a full reward.' 21–23 The reward has not come without a consistent and determined commitment to holiness, positively (kept ... before me ... blameless) and negatively (not done ... not turned ... kept from). 25 Blameless, ‘perfect’. Sin ‘my iniquity’, some sin which was a special snare to David. 27 Humble. Often, as here, the Lord’s people who are made the underdogs by oppressive arrogance. 28, 29 The Lord guaranteeing personal continuance (lamp), transformed circumstances (darkness ... light), power over people (troop) and things (wall). 30–45 turn to another truth about the Lord’s revealed ways. He who acted righteously (20–29) also acts purposefully: Perfect in his ways (30). He aims to make my way perfect (32).

The psalm now alternates between what the Lord does (30–31, 35, 39, 43) and what David does as empowered by the Lord (32–34, 36–38, 40–42). In other words, in order to enter into the perfection the Lord purposes, it is necessary to live responsively to his work for us, (cf. Phil. 2:12–13). This explains the reference to the pure word of the Lord with which the section starts (30). As the Lord reveals his will, so we are called to obey. 37–45 run beyond the Saul episode, for in that situation David did no pursuing, fighting back, etc. Most likely the perfect tenses throughout are ‘perfects of certainty’, looking forward from the inception of his kingship after his deliverance from Saul to its victorious course and culmination.

46–50 (A²) Summary: Personal devotion to the saving God. David’s great assurances of victorious kingship were not fulfilled either in him or in his line, nor will they be completely fulfilled until ‘Great David’s greater Son’ returns in universal triumph (Phil. 2:9–11).

Psalm 19. Three voices in counterpoint

1–6 The voice of creation: paradox. Throughout space (1), time (2) and earth (4) the created order ‘recounts’ ((1) declare) how glorious is the God whose handiwork (1b) they are. 4, Line (mg. NIV) means ‘allotted dominion’/‘sway’. This dominion is exercised (Gn. 1:16) by the sun (5–6), rising in fresh fulfilment each day, traversing the skies in huge strength, penetrating everywhere. But, paradoxically, though they pour forth speech (2) there is no speech (3). The created order both tells and does not tell: it speaks to our intuitions, that there is a glorious God who created such marvels, but its message is limited—it cannot tell about him—and confusing, for the beauty of the hills tells one truth and the storm and volcano another.

7–10 The voice of the word: perfection. The Lord has not left us to the uncertainties of natural religion; he has spoken his word which has here six titles: law (7), ‘instruction’; statutes/‘testimony’, what the Lord bears witness to as valid; precepts (8), applicable to the small details of life; commands, intended for obedience; fear (9), worthy of reverence; ordinances, authoritative decisions.

It has nine qualities: perfect in every part and in its wholeness trustworthy (7), reliable; right (8), upright, of moral rectitude; radiant, ‘pure’, free from contaminant; pure (9), (see 12:6), of purity acceptable to God; enduring, changeless; sure ... righteous, ‘true ... right’, corresponding to the objective norms of truth; precious (10), ‘rightly desirable’, full of intrinsic value; sweeter, full of true enjoyment.

It has four results: reviving (7), (35:17; cf. Ru. 4:15; La. 1:16), restoring true life whether threatened by danger or diminished by sorrow; simple has the bad meaning of ‘gullible/credulous’ (Pr. 7:7; 14:15; 22:3), lacking guiding moral principles, and the good meaning of ‘teachable’ (116:6; 119:30; Pr. 1:4), giving joy (8), educating the emotions (heart); the eyes are the organs of desire, what is wanted out of life. The word of God instils true objectives, worthy values.

11–14 The voice of the sinner: praying. Here is one who has come under the influence of the divine word. He finds himself warned, ‘enlightened’ and enriched (great reward) through obedience (11); convicted of sin and ready to seek forgiveness (12), given new aspirations and longing to be blameless (13), ‘perfect’, in every part and integrated as a whole—just like the word itself (7) and in particular (14) acceptable to God in speech. If he is known by the word he speaks (7–10), should not we be also? The creation is silent but we must not be. How is such a life of obedience to be sustained? Only by resorting to the LORD himself in his Rock-strength and reliability and in his graciousness as the Redeemer, the next-of-kin who takes all our needs as his own (Ru. 3:13).

Notes. 3 Where is not in the Hebrew. The point is that the created order cannot vocalize (speech), verbalize (language, ‘words’) or communicate (not heard). The notion of a Creator is conveyed but there is not the verbal revelation we need. 11 should begin with ‘Indeed’, i.e. introducing an application to a specific case. 12, 13 sin as a lapse (errors), a hitherto unrecognised fault, a deliberate flouting of God’s word (wilful). Transgression, wilful rebellion against a superior. 14 Mouth ... heart, outwardly ... inwardly.

Psalm 20. Before battle: The victory of prayer and faith

This psalm suits the occasion of a service of prayer and sacrifice on the eve of battle (cf. 1 Sa. 7:7–9; 13:8, 9). Different voices speak: one prays to the LORD about you (masc. sing. 1–4, 5c) or the king (9a); the other voice affirms, speaking of I and we (5a, b, 6–8). It is possible to hear also a third voice of priest and people alternatively in prayer and response (1–4, 9). As the king prays silently, priest and people ask that his prayer may be heard (1, 2). As the sacrifice is offered, they pray for its acceptance (3), and then ask that the king’s plans may succeed (4). The king’s confidence on behalf of himself and his army (5a, b) is answered by priest and people (5c) asking that his prayer may be answered. To this the king responds with another affirmation of confidence that prayer (6) and faith (7, 8) are the way to victory. Priest and people end the service by praying respectively (9) for the king’s welfare and for God’s answer.

Notes. 1 The first line, (lit.) ‘the day of distress’ matches the last line, (lit.) ‘the day we call’. The way of assurance and victory is to meet distress with prayer. 2 Security is in the name of the Lord (1, 5, 7), all that he has revealed about himself. From Zion becomes from heaven (6): the Lord who lives among his people does so in all his heavenly glory, power, resources. 3 Prayer must happen in the context of the sacrifices God has authorized, i.e. for us, prayer resting on Calvary. 7 Victory comes not through earthly resources but through all that the Lord has revealed himself to be—his name. Trust in, ‘bring the Lord to remembrance by invoking his name’.

Psalm 21. After battle: The Lord’s victory, past and future

Psalm 20 affirmed that we will shout when you are victorious; now there is joy (1) and glory (5) through your victories. Thus earlier prayer and trust have been answered and the present psalm meditates on the experience. Its opening affirmation that the king rejoices in your strength (1) is matched by its concluding prayer, Be exalted, O Lord, in your strength (13). This past and future reference is reflected respectively in vs 2–7, looking back on victory, and vs 8–12 looking forward to victory. It is easiest to hear the king himself speaking throughout (using in vs 1–7 a third-person form). In 2–7, prayer has been answered in personal (3, 4) and national (5) blessing, and trust has been vindicated (7). Vs. 8–12 speak of a coming divine victory that is total, supernatural, final, and irresistible.

1 The victories ..., ‘in your salvation’, here, physical deliverance in whatever danger (Ps. 20 reflects). 2 Request, ‘longing’, cf. desire (previous line). The king’s prayer was heartfelt. Lips, longing was not left vague but was carried over into intercession. 3 Welcomed. The verb, ‘to get ahead of/get there first’, is used here of the Lord ‘anticipating’ our needs, awaiting us with prepared blessings where we expected trouble. A crown, (cf. 2 Sa. 12:30). 4 For life, the danger was deadly. For ever ..., in the usual metaphorical sense of ‘may the king live for ever’, but as so often in royal psalms an unconscious preview of the actual endless reign of the Lord Jesus. 6 Presence. Contrast the same word (‘face’, personal presence) in v 9 (appearing): what is life to the king is death to his foes. The presence of the Lord is both vitality and victory. 7 Unfailing love, pledged love. Shaken, i.e. from his kingly position. 8–12 Some understand that the voice which in vs 2–7 speaks about the king now addresses him regarding his future victories under God. The meaning is hardly affected but it is simpler to hear the king’s voice speaking here of the Lord’s coming triumphs just as he ascribed past triumphs (2–7) to the same divine source. But the world’s enmity is alike against the Lord and his Anointed (cf. Ps. 2). These sentiments are natural in the mouth of David who was promised universal kingship (cf. 2:7–9) and, for us, are one with NT expectations (2 Thes. 1:7–10; Rev. 19:11–21). But equally the truth of divine victorious power covers all our future, not just the events of the last day. The divine hand (personal action, 8), appearing (personal presence, 9, see 6) and wrath (anger personally felt, 9) are, moment by moment, on our side. 13 True rejoicing (1) issues in prayer that the LORD will be exalted but when he is exalted, then to sing and praise, ‘make music’, is the natural consequence.

Psalm 22. One forsaken, many rejoicing

‘No Christian can read this psalm without being vividly confronted with the crucifixion’ (Kidner)—indeed so, for this is not a description of illness but of execution. Acts 2:30 ascribes Psalm 16 to the prophetic stature of David and this is the best explanation also of Psalm 22. If, as may be the case, some personal experience of suffering prompted the psalm, David multiplies it by infinity in order to plumb something of the suffering awaiting his Greater Son. Yet, at the same time, what arose from suffering, and then prophetically explored a unique suffering, can now reach down to our often desperate trials. We too can learn to cry out to God (1–8, 11–18), to find comfort and assurance in what is true about us (9) and what we have learned of the truth (10), and to face the future with confidence (22–31) because he will prove himself faithful. The whole gamut of our experiences is here: desolation, hostility, pain, death—for he was tested in every way just as we are (Heb. 4:15).

1–10 Perplexity in suffering, falls into two parts: (a) Unanswered Prayer (1–5). Urgent prayer is met by unbroken silence (1, 2). This is contrary both to the nature of God (3) and to the experience of former generations (4, 5).

1 The Lord Jesus understood this cry as descriptive of himself (Mt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34) and so must we. He is our example in that, in the deepest distress, faith was maintained and the Lord is still my God. But the experience itself was unique to him. Rightly the psalmist said (37:25) that he had never seen the righteous forsaken but this wholly righteous One was forsaken, becoming a curse for us (Gal. 3:13). 3 (lit.) ‘You are holy, enthroned on the praises of Israel’. The thought is compressed: in himself he is holy (so how is it that he does not come to succour his suffering one?); his enthroned dignity is acknowledged as his people praise him for the mighty things he has done (so where are his mighty acts now?).

(b) Unrewarded trust (6–9). The reference to the fathers trusting as well as praying (4, 5) prompts the sufferer to note that he too trusted, but without result. Rather trust made him an object of mockery (6–8), yet it was lifelong, created by God himself (9, You made me trust) and receiving a ready response (10, my God).

8 He trusts (Mt. 27:43) 9, 10 What experience lies behind this? For some reason, from the earliest days he knew himself to be cast upon God. Does this reflect the early consciousness of the Lord Jesus (Lk. 2:49) that the Father’s house was his true home?

11–21, Plea for divine nearness. This section consists of two appeals for God’s nearness and aid (11a, 19–21a); the first is followed by a description of the straits into which the sufferer has come: trouble is near, help missing (11), enemies savage (12, 13), suffering intense (14, 15), evil in the ascendancy (16–18). The second appeal acknowledges the Lord’s strength (19) but death looms (sword, 20), bringing personal loss (my precious life, 20) and a cruel end (dogs ... lions ... oxen, 20, 21) Then, dramatically, everything changes (21b, see NIV mg.) in a sudden realization of divine response: prayer has been answered! When God seems absent—or even when, as in the present case, he has indeed, judgmentally, withdrawn his presence (1)—prayer still avails. The answer to Why have you forsaken me? (1) is Do not be far from me (11).

12–18 (i) Suffering pictured (12, 13): the ‘beast’ motifs tell of an assault lacking any constraints of humanity—only the irresistible strength of the bull and the pitiless savagery of the lion. (ii) Suffering experienced (14, 15): strength ebbing, a body literally racked apart (14), all vital force (heart), gone and replaced by incapacitating dread (cf. Jos. 2:11; Ezk. 21:7), gross dehydration and divine hostility (you, 15) bringing the finality (dust) of death. (iii) Suffering inflicted: evil unleashed, the body mutilated (16), gloating (17), dividing the spoils (18). 16c Both in general and in particular it is hard not to see the sufferings of Christ in this passage. John 19:23–24, 28 puts the matter beyond doubt. The translation they ... pierced is not beyond doubt but avoids extensive alteration to the Heb. text, is supported by LXX, and suits both context and fulfilment.

21 The sudden awareness of a divine response (lit. ‘You have answered me!’) is dramatic. The sufferer is framing the prayer ‘Save me from the lion’s mouth and from the oxen-horns rescue me’ but even as he prays a transformation comes: ‘... and from the oxen-horns You have answered me!!’ The petition has been heard; all is well.

22–31, The universal festival of praise. Suddenly it is festival time for Israel (22–26) and for the world (27–31): prayer has been answered (24), the poor are invited to the feast (25), all are invited (29) and the word will go out to future generations (30, 31). Hebrews 2:12 quotes v 22 as messianic and indeed what, other than the death of Jesus, could have such results as these?—Israel and the world summoned to the messianic banquet (Is 25:6–10a; Rev. 19:9), world-dominion (Mt. 28:18; Phil. 2:9–11) and a message of divine righteousness (31, Rom. 1:16–17). 25–28 From you. The Lord is the source and the subject of praise. Vows ... poor. The fulfilling of a vow was accompanied by a peace-offering with its accompanying feast, to which the poor came as guests (Lv. 7:11, 16; Dt. 16:10–12). 29 The general meaning is that all alike, summed up by the contrast between the rich and the resourceless (29), are welcome. The question remains whether dust is a metaphor for poverty (113:7; cf. 1 Sa. 2:8) or for death (30:9; cf. Jb. 7:21). The sequence of thought in the verse suggests the former; the reference to the dust of death (15) suggests the latter. 30–31 About the Lord ... he has done it. At the end of v 21 the

Lord validated all the suffering one had been doing. Hence the Lord was his theme of praise, (25). The message going out to posterity is therefore ‘the wonderful works of God’ (Acts 2:11).

Psalm 23. Shepherd, companion and host

The threefold testimony, I shall lack nothing (1), I will fear no evil (4) and I will dwell (6) encapsulates the psalm, dividing it into three parts: the sheep and the Shepherd (1–3), the traveller and the Companion (4) and the guest and the Host (5, 6), respectively teaching the providence of God, appointing life’s experiences, his protection over life’s pathway, and his provision now and always.

1–3 These verses major on experiences of plenty (green pastures), peace (waters, lit. ‘of every sort of rest’) and renewal (restores my soul, see 19:7). The principle behind our experiences is that he chooses paths of righteousness for us, paths that are ‘right with him’, making sense to him. In this he acts for his name’s sake, in accordance with his revealed character.

4 In contrast with the joyous experiences of the sheep (1–3), the pilgrim pathway traverses harsher terrain. Shadow of death is really ‘deepest darkness’ which includes, of course, the darkness of death. But in these experiences the he of vs 1–3 becomes the you, significant of closer personal touch, and the leader (2) comes alongside (with me). The darker the shadow, the closer the Lord! And he brings every strength, rod and staff. The duplication denotes completeness. Rod (Lv. 27:32) possibly signifies protection; staff, possibly, support (Ex. 21:19).

5, 6 A table ... in the presence of ... enemies, cf. 2 Samuel 17:27–29 when David could have discerned the hand of God in Barzillai’s care in the face of Absalom. By alluding to both hostile circumstances (4) and hostile people (5) the psalm affirms care in every emergency. The anointed head speaks of the Lord’s welcome; the overflowing cup his lavish provision. But this goodness and love will continue as long as life lasts (lit. ‘to length of days’) and beyond there lies the house of the Lord for ever. Dwell is a traditional adjustment of the Hebrew text and may be correct, but lit. ‘I will return to the house’, i.e. when earth’s paths (2, 3), valleys and threats (5) are over, there comes the real return home.

Psalm 24. Right of entrance

For background cf. 1 Samuel 5, 6; 2 Samuel 6, David’s restoration of the ark to Zion. More important is the theological unity of theme: by what right do we enter the Lord’s presence (3–5) and by what right does he come among us (7–10)? We can only come by right of holiness (4); he comes by right of sovereignty, glory, power and redemption (7–9).

1, 2 set the scene by affirming the Lord’s mastery of his world. Because he is what he is, no one dare intrude uninvited or propose their own conditions of entry. The LORD is emphatic, ‘It is to the LORD the earth belongs!’ The physical earth and the peopled world (1) are his by creation (founded) and maintenance (2, ‘continues to maintain’), for who but he could bring a stable earth out of turbulent seas or maintain it in the face of their tidal forces (waters)? (Gn. 1:9–10).

3–6 Ascend, go up where the Lord is (Ex. 19:3); stand, ‘rise’ to worship (Ex.33:10), to plead a cause (1:5), to hold one’s ground (Jos. 7:12) before such a God. The qualifications are comprehensive: personal, spiritual and social (4, lit. ‘swear with deceitful intent’, i.e. make knowingly false promises); they cover activity (hands) and character (heart), loyalty to the Lord alone (not lift ...), and relationships with others without a hidden agenda of personal advantage.

Such people receive blessing (5), acquittal before the Judge. But the God before whom we come is Saviour, i.e. the root of the matter lies not in us but in his will to save. 6 Generation, a group united by common characteristics.

7–10 Picture the procession of 2 Samuel 6:12–15. The demand for entrance is met by a request for credentials, eliciting the reply that it is the LORD, who redeems his people and overthrows his foes (Ex. 3:5–15; 6:6, 7; 20:2), the King in all his glory, the God of total effective power (8, strong ... mighty ... battle) and total intrinsic power (10, almighty ‘of hosts’, holding within himself every potentiality and power).

Psalm 25. An ABC for a day of trouble

In form, this psalm is a broken acrostic. Two letters are missing; one is established only by altering the punctuation of the Hebrew text as we have received it; and v 22, referring to Israel, lies outside the scheme altogether. This brokenness reflects the way troubles break the pattern of life itself. Yet a pattern remains.

A¹ (vs 1–5) Trusting, hoping, praying

B¹ (vs 6–7) Prayer for forgiveness

C¹ (vs 8–10) Guidance for sinners

B² (v 11) Prayer and forgiveness

C² (vs 12–14) Guidance for God-fearers

A² (vs 15–21) Trusting, hoping, praying

1–5 Trusting, hoping, praying. Surrounded by hostile, unscrupulous people (2c, 3d, cf. 19a), David’s reaction is to express trust by prayer (1, 2a), to make prayer specific (2bc), resting on what is true about God (3). But he prays as one committed to the Lord’s ways (4), desiring an informed mind (4, show, ‘make me know’; teach) and a conformed life (5, guide).

1 Lift up, (24:4) the Lord alone is seen as the solution of every need. 2 Shame, cf. v 3, to be disappointed of hope. 4, 5 Right conduct requires divine truth (‘Make me know’), readiness to learn (teach) and to obey (ways ... guide).

6, 7 Sin and forgiveness: the past. There can be no commitment to divine truth and life (4, 5) without penitence and reconciliation. When the Lord remembers what he is (6) he is prepared to remember not (7) what we have been. 6 Great mercy, ‘compassion’, love in the heart of God (18:1) whereas love, is love in the will of God, what he has obligated himself to do. Here it is a plural noun signifying pledged love in all its fulness. 7 Sins, specific shortcomings; rebellious, the deliberate wilfulness of sin. For you, ‘for the sake of your goodness’. The essential moral worthiness of the divine nature finds its satisfaction in cancelling the past.

8–10 The divine teacher. Further recollection of God brings assurance that prayer (4) will be answered and that God’s revealed way will prove to be full of his love. The divine condition of all this is the nature of God; the human condition is that *sinner*s become humble (9, those who bring themselves low before him) and covenant-keepers.

11 Sin and forgiveness: the present. Since God guides those who come low before him, David takes the lowest place. Sin is not just past (6, 7) but present. In vs 6, 7 he appealed to the compassion, love and goodness of the Lord; in v 8 to his moral rectitude; now, in summary, to his name, all that he has revealed of himself. His heart and will (6), his moral integrity (7) and uprightness (8) are all at one in the forgiveness of iniquity (the corrupt, fallen nature) however great.

12–14 The divine teacher. The blessings accruing to anyone (12, Who, then) who fears the Lord: instruction in God's way; personal fulfilment; family security; fellowship with the Lord and instruction in the meaning of the covenant-relationship.

15–21 Trusting, hoping, praying. 15, 16 are linked by the thought of the LORD as the sole solution: he only is kept in focus; there is no other with David. 17–19 elaborate the need in which he finds himself: inwardly, upwardly and outwardly. 20, 21 respectively affirm trust and commitment. Thus 'none but the Lord' (15, 16) is set beside 'all my need' (17–19) and an attitude of prayer, trust, moral determination and expectation is adopted.

22 The wider perspective. This verse lies outside the alphabetical scheme altogether. As king, David can never forget his wider responsibilities, however demanding his own troubles may be. But, as with his own cares, his care for his people is brought into the place of prayer. It is the first thing and the least people should expect from their leaders. Prayer is the comprehensive solution: all ... troubles. The Lord is able to find the solution: redeem translates the verb 'to ransom', i.e. to find the payment which will completely settle the debt, release the captive, terminate the threat.

Psalm 26. The appeal of a good conscience

A good conscience constitutes a ground of appeal to God, not because we can earn blessing by goodness, but because the Lord graciously delights in us as we walk in purity. Faced (9) by *sinner*s, determined upon his life (bloodthirsty), hatching plots and unscrupulous in their ways (10), David finds himself guiltless in the face of their charges or indeed of any cause for such a situation. It is reasonable to assume that the self-examination evident in the psalm reflects accusations brought against him: concerning his lifestyle (walk, 3b), the company he keeps (4) and the reality of his religion (6–8). But his conscience is clear personally (3), socially (4–5), and spiritually (6–8). The psalm begins and ends on the note of blamelessness (1, 11–12), invites divine examination (2) and divine action (9, 10), and centres on confessions of innocence, negatively regarding his life among people (4, 5), and positively, regarding his life with God (6–8). What David could sincerely claim in a specific set of circumstances should be our constant ambition.

1 I have led 'I have walked in my integrity'—a perfection touching every part and characterising the whole. A virtually identical claim concludes the psalm (11) saving that the Hebrew there has a different tense: probably v 1 looks back and v 11 looks forward ('I will lead ...'). One aspect of a good conscience is its aspiration for the future. 2 Test ... try ... examine. If any distinction is proper, the first is to test for purity (assay), the second to test in and by life's circumstances, and the third to test for impurity (refine). 6 Wash. Handwashing was a public declaration of innocence (Dt. 21:6). Innocence, not the medium but the spirit in which the handwashing is done. Altar. Priests washed before entering the sanctuary (Ex. 30:17–21). David accepts priestly standards for himself. 11 I lead (see 1) Redeem (see 25:22) Merciful, gracious, undeserved, freely-given divine favour. 12 My feet stand. This may be a confident statement of future security ('My feet are sure to stand') after the present turmoil is over, or a commitment to 'straightforward' living, a 'Here I stand' affirmation. Great assembly, the probable meaning of a word unused elsewhere, envisaging the day when the worshipping congregation gathers and the private spirituality of v 1c, d will find expression in a public testimony of praise.

Psalm 27. The essential ingredient: faith working by prayer

Evil men, enemies, foes (2), trouble (5), enemies (6), oppressors/'insidious watchers' (11), foes (12), as well as a continuing delight in the Lord's house (4; see 26:8), suggest that this psalm belongs to the same emergency as the last. The confidence which breathes throughout could be the aftermath of the self-examination which Psalm 26 reflects, but it is confidence in the Lord, not in self-righteousness.

A¹ (vs 1–3) Confidence in the Lord affirmed

B¹ (vs 4–6) First prayer for security in God

B² (vs 7–12) Second prayer for security in God

A² (vs 13–14) Confidence in God encouraged

1–3 Confidence in the Lord affirmed. 1 Light, metaphorically, in contrast to the 'darkness' of surrounding trouble (Is. 50:11; Jn. 8:12). Salvation, deliverance in and from trouble. Stronghold ..., the place where my life dwells in safety 2. David faces people bent on evil (evil men ('evil doers'), full of savagery (devour, like beasts of prey) and hostility (enemies, foes). It is in this situation that he finds faith (1) and prayer (4–5, 7–9) sufficient. They will, emphatic, 'It is they (not me!) who will stumble'. 3 enlarges the scope of faith-security. Will I be, 'I remain trustful/confident'. Faith is sufficient even when enemies become armies and enmity open warfare.

4–6 Seeking God for himself. It is not faith that keeps one secure, but the Lord in whom that faith is reposed. David's prayer (ask) and objective (seek) is to be where the Lord is (dwell in the house) and to see him as he is (gaze). Seek him (4), a word of disputed meaning; most probable is 'to come morning by morning', to frequent his presence, giving him the beginning of each day. His house is his tabernacle (5, 'tent', cf. 1 Sa. 1:7, 9, NIV mg.), the place where he lives among his people (Ex. 29:42–45). Flimsy though it may seem, it is a high ... rock, a place of inaccessible safety and personal triumph (head ... exalted).

7–12 Seeking God for his blessings. The prayer to be with the Lord (4) is now developed into a prayer for those blessings which the Lord alone can give. Prayer rests on a divine invitation. (8) (see NIV mg. lit. 'To you my heart has said, "Seek my face", Your face, Lord, I do seek'), i.e. David begins by reminding the Lord of his invitation to people to seek him. My heart, not just my mouth, because David treasures this divine invitation. Prayer begins with getting right with God: seeking his favour (9, face) and acceptance (not reject). Prayer seeks to know, in order to do, the will of God within the existing circumstances (11, Teach ... way ... oppressors) before asking for safety within circumstances (12; cf. Acts 4:29). Prayer is impregnated with confidence: my helper, my Saviour (9). Though my father. Even if the strongest human love should reach its limit, the Lord's love remains.

13–14 Confidence in God encouraged. I am still confident (lit.) an exclamation, 'Except I had believed!', i.e. Just think what would have happened without faith! 14 Personal assurance is the basis for strengthening faith in others.

Psalm 28. A plea for evenhanded justice

Links between this psalm and 26, 27 suggest that David is still in the same life-threatening situation, e.g. vs 3–5; see 26:9, 10; 27:2, 12. The Lord's house is prominent in all three: 26:6–8, the focus of David's religion and 27:4, 5, of his fellowship with the Lord; 28:2, the source of help. Each ends (26:12; 27:14; 28:9) with some reference to, or concern for, the wider company of God's people. For David, a time of trouble was a time for concentration on the Lord and care for people. But Psalm 28 throws its own light on David's situation: his plight will end in death unless the Lord acts (1), and his circumstances are such that his death at this time would identify him with the the wicked (3). His fear is not of death as such but 'of death with unmerited disgrace' (Kidner).

The beginning and end of the psalm are linked by my cry for mercy (2, 6). In vs 1, 2, prayer for a hearing (1) is followed by the cry (2); in vs 6–9, the heard cry prompts praise (6, 7) and leads to prayer for the Lord's people (8, 9). In the middle verses, David prays that he may be kept distinct from the fate of the wicked (3), that they may receive what they merit (4), affirming (5) that this expresses divine retributive justice.

1 The pit, death under the wrath of God (30:4; 88:4), with God's face hidden (143:7) (cf. Is. 14:15, 19; Ezk. 32:18, 23). So here, see v 3. 2 Place, 'shrine', the word which became customary, in Solomon's temple, for the Holy of Holies (1 Ki. 6:16, etc.). David appeals right into the very presence of the Lord, as is the privilege and power of prayer. 3–5 Just as David shunned the company of the wicked (26:4) and sought escape from their clutches (27:12), he desires separation from their disgrace. The Lord's justice is retributive and a pure conscience like David's (Ps. 26) naturally identifies with God's holiness and guiltlessly prays that justice may have its way. To find ourselves offended by this vigorous prayer is not a measure of our refined sensitivity but of our less than mature conscience. It is as right to pray for the overthrow of the wicked as it is to pray for the blessing of the church (9): it demands greater holiness if we are to do the former without sin.

Psalm 29. The God of holy glory

It is best simply to let the wonder and awesomeness of this psalm sweep and swirl around us until we are so possessed in spirit by the majesty of the Lord that we too cry Glory (9). But, like all true poetry, to achieve its desired effect, the psalm comes to us with shape and coherence.

- A¹ (vs 1–2) The Lord in heaven
- B (vs 3–9) The wonder of God in the storm
 - b¹ (vs 3–4) The storm at sea
 - b² (vs 5–7) Storm in the north
 - b³ (vs 8–9b) Storm in the south
 - b⁴ (v 9c) The cry of Glory
- A² (vs 10–11) The Lord on earth

1, 2 The Lord in heaven: the object of heavenly worship. Even beings so exalted and mighty that they are called (lit.) 'sons of God' (cf. Jb. 38:7) or 'sons of supreme power' must acknowledge the Lord's glory, because of all he has made himself known to be (name) and must (bow in) worship before his holiness. Thus they recognise in turn his position as God, his revealed nature and his holy character.

3–9 The wonder of God manifested in the storm. The storm at sea, power and majesty (3, 4); the storm comes ashore to the north (Lebanon) (5–7); the storm sweeps to the south (Kadesh) (8, 9ab); those who know the Lord cry of Glory (9c). 6 Sirion, Mount Hermon, in the anti-Lebanon range, at 9,000 ft (2,774 m) the highest in Palestine. Even the solid fabric of the world seems to rock under the impact of the storm. 8 Kadesh, in the extreme south of Judah (Dt. 1:19, 46). Thus the whole land, from end (5) to end (8) is dominated, not just by the storm but by what the storm symbolizes, the voice of the Lord. 9c To many a storm is a storm, but to those to whom the Lord has revealed himself, it is a display of one aspect of his glory. The sentimentalist says ‘One is nearer God’s heart in a garden’; more realistic, the Bible affirms we are also nearer his heart in a hurricane.

10, 11 The Lord on earth: the eternal king in holy judgment. The flood is ‘the Flood’ for the word is only used in Genesis 6–9. As the Lord is supreme in heaven in holiness (1, 2), so on earth he is sovereign (10) in holy judgment on sin. But this is not the whole story (any more than the storm tells all the truth about God; the garden also has its say!). He has his people (11) who, in a world deservedly under judgment, live by his strength and under his blessing of peace, i.e. peace with God, within a fellowship of peace, and in personal peace or wellbeing.

Psalm 30. Grace from first to last

The word temple in the title should be ‘house’. This could be a reference to David’s house (2 Sa. 5:11), the house of the Lord (2 Sa. 7:5; 1 Ki. 6:1) or to the use of the psalm at the temple-rededication after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes in 165 BC. At the time of David’s own house his sense of security (6) would have been enormous: Zion was captured and fortified (2 Sa. 5:6–7), power was increasing (2 Sa. 5:10), his army strong, his family increasing (2 Sa. 5:13ff.), possibly also the Philistines were defeated (2 Sa. 5:17–25) while the house was still in building. If, in this pride-inducing period, the Lord in grace humbled David by a sickness which dashed the cup from his hand before he had time to drink it, the terms of the psalm are most perfectly suited and David learned that, as grace had brought him safe thus far, only grace can lead him home. It was when he felt secure (6) that he needed to cry out for mercy (8).

1–5 Deadly danger: responsive praise for answered prayer. There would have been plenty of Saul-loyalists, resentful of what they would see as David’s usurpation of the throne. How they would gloat to see him disappointed of success! But he called and was healed and spared. 4, 5 David summons the saints (the Lord’s beloved who love him back) to praise, not for what he had experienced, but for what had been revealed of the Lord: within the holy nature of God (holy ... anger) there is that which quickly moves to enduring favour.

6, 7 Deadly arrogance and complacency. To feel secure (6) (on easy street) has its own peril, turning assurance into self-assurance, confidence into conceit (7). Divine favour had brought David prosperity, but it only needed the shadow of a cloud to cover the Lord’s face and David was dismayed, ‘terrified’.

8–12 Deadly danger: answered prayer and responsive praise. Called ... cried are continuous verbs, ‘kept calling ... crying’; mercy—‘grace’ (also 10). Since David felt that he was dying out of favour with God (9 cf. 5, 7) he entertained no eternal hope (cf. 73:24). But the only way to flee from God is to flee to him and prayer for grace issued in praise and transformation (11), inner joy and a true sense of a permanent standing with God (my God ... forever) (12).

Psalm 31. The day of stress, the place of prayer

Twice (1–8, 9–17b) David recalls how in a sharp trial he resorted to trustful prayer and commitment and how the Lord heard and acted on his behalf (21, 22), giving him cause to call others to a similar hope (23, 24). The psalm, therefore, not only instructs us to meet crises with prayer (1–18) but assures us of the effectiveness of doing so (19–24).

1–8 The fortress versus the trap. Enemies laid a trap (4) but the Lord is a fortress into which David has entered in trust, prayer and committed loyalty. Here in principle is the antidote to a crisis; prayerful and trustful, devoted seeking of God. 2, 3 Rock ... strong ... rock, ‘rock ... house of fortress ... cliff’, a strong place to stand, a secure place to enter and an inaccessible place to occupy. Name. The prayer rests on all the Lord has revealed about himself, which, as the God of truth (5) he can never deny. 5 Redeem, provide whatever my rescue requires (25:22, 26:11). 6 True trust and sole-loyalty to the Lord are inseparable. 7 Out of trust and prayer springs confidence: all will be well for from the start the Lord saw and knew (Ex. 2:25; 3:7). 8 Have, ‘have determined to’, perfect tense expressing assurance for the future.

9–18 ‘Your hands’ versus ‘their hands’. David now enters into the details of his plight: the crisis has drained him (9, 10), despised as he is by opponents and deserted by friends (11); he has become yesterday’s man (12) encircled by frightening conspiracy (13). But his reply, once more, is trust (14, 15) and prayer (16, 17). For the confidence that my times are in your hands enables him to pray (15, lit.) ‘deliver me from the hand of my enemies’. The hand of God is not the place where we are immune from life’s troubles; it is the place where they happen to us (Jn. 10:28–29); our security is not from trouble but in trouble. 10 Affliction, NIV mg., ‘guilt’. This was not a case where David could plead innocence. In some undeclared way, sin was a contributory factor, but he could still turn to the Lord in trust, prayer and commitment. We can cry to God not only because of what he is (3) and knows (7), but because of what we are (10–13); we can expect prayer to be answered simply because it has been voiced (17). Further-more, when the righteous, those who are ‘right with God’, the Lord’s people, are under threat, it is right to pray for the downfall of their adversaries (17–18). The psalms refuse vengeful action but affirm prayer for vengeance, the overthrow of ungodly persecutors by the just action of God. In such situations our action is governed by Lv. 19:18; 1 Sa. 26:10–11; Pr. 20:22; 25:21–22; Rom 12:18–21.

19–24 Alarm versus hope. David is now looking back on the crisis and drawing conclusions. The Lord shelters those who trust (19, 20), responds to those who call (21, 22), and is available to all his saints (his beloved who love him back), preserving and giving assurance of hope (23, 24).

Notes. 21 In a besieged city. Such a situation as 1 Sa. 23:7–29. The reference is not, however, to that time for David had no need then to allude to any iniquity of his own (10). The ‘besieged city’ is metaphorical (see 13), of being hemmed in on every side, not knowing which way to turn. 24. Hope in the Bible is confidence about what will happen coupled with ignorance about its timing.

Psalm 32. Groaning or praying?

If prayer is sufficient to deal with the most serious problem of all—the sin which could be counted against us before God (1–5)—will not prayer solve every problem of life (6)? Such is the theme of this psalm, presented through alternating statement (1–2, 6, 10) and testimony (3–5, 7–9) or appeal (11). It may belong to the time of David’s adultery with Bathsheba. If it does, vs 3, 4 reveal David burdened by a guilty conscience and v 5 corresponds to the remarkable 2 Sa. 12:13, ‘David said to Nathan, “I have sinned against the Lord.”’ Nathan replied, “The Lord has taken away your sin.” At the very least the incident illustrates what the psalm affirms: a prayer of confession brings instantaneous forgiveness.

1, 2 The blessedness of sin forgiven. Transgressions ... sins ... sin, respectively ‘rebellions’ (deliberate flouting of God’s known will), ‘sins’ (specific items of wrongdoing in thought, word, deed), ‘iniquity’ (the inner moral distortion of the fallen nature). The Lord ... whose spirit, the Lord has no residual charges; the sinner has concealed nothing.

3–5 Groaning replaced by confession and forgiveness. Note the same three words as in vs. 1, 2: acknowledgement of sin, the wrong I did; owning up to the wilfulness of my rebellion—and the Lord reached right into the well-spring of corruption and forgave ‘the iniquity’ of my sin.

6–9 Prayer is the answer for everyone. The ready response of the Lord is wider than the single person and than the sole problem of sin: everyone can pray in every emergency. 6 Therefore, i.e. even sin can be dealt with by prayer. Godly (saints, 31:23), ‘those whom he loves and who love him back.’ 8, 9 The context in which v 7 comes true: when the word of God is given conscious obedience. And watch ..., ‘and my eye (will be) on you’—not a threat, but a promise of watchful care. The Lord’s teaching is not an impersonal dictat but the loving word of a caring God. Just so, our response should not be the forced compliance of the uncomprehending beast but a correspondingly loving obedience.

10, 11 Unfailing love surrounds the trustful. There are three facets to the enjoyment of a protected status: the ongoing activity of trust, the basic relationship of being ‘right with God’ (righteous, 11), and the moral reality of an upright character. Such are not immune from woes (cf. the rising waters of v 6), but when they come they are encompassed by the love that never fails.

Psalm 33. Unfailing love in creation and election

This stylish poem begins and ends with six-line stanzas (1–3, 20–22) which enclose four eight-line stanzas (4–7, 8–11, 12–15, 16–19). The opening and closing stanzas respectively call for, and affirm joy in the Lord. The eight-line stanzas are in pairs: the first pair focuses on God’s work in creation, with unfailing love (5) as its all-pervading factor, and his sovereign rule over the nations (10) as its corollary; the second pair focuses on election (12) and the special place within divine providence of those who set their hope on his unfailing love (18). Suitably, it is with a prayer for this unfailing love that the psalm ends (22), for to live fulfillingly in God’s world and as God’s people we need to be at one with the Spirit which animates both.

1–3 The praising voice. Song and praise, thanksgiving (praise, ‘give thanks’), instrumental music, and loud acclamation (shout for joy, ‘with a loud shout’)—all make their contribution to a fitting response to the Lord from those who are right with him (righteous) in heart and upright before him in life. New song, not so much novel as fresh, prompted by a fresh awareness of who and what he is. True praise requires this fresh sense of God as much as it needs the fervour of joy and the skill of good musicianship.

4–11 God in creation. For explains the foregoing call to praise: (i) the character of the Lord’s word, of the Lord, and of the earth (4–5); (ii) the work of the Lord in creation (6, 7); (iii) the reverence due to the Creator (8, 9); (iv) The Lord’s sovereignty, overruling (10) and ordaining (11). The two stanzas of this section (4–7, 8–11) unite in the theme of the supreme ease with which the Creator dominates alike the physical and the personal creation. He is master of the waters (7) and the peoples (10): the waters do his bidding; the peoples are at his disposal.

4, 5 Before we can understand the world around we must meet its Creator. His word (the instrument of creation (6) is right and true, i.e. straightforward in expression and intent, perfect in moral worth and impeccable in truth. Faithful. Many aspects of the created order remain a puzzle to us: why earthquakes? Why ‘nature red in tooth and claw’? In everything, we are assured, the Creator is faithful to his own character and faithful to the welfare of his creation. Unfailing love, manifested in the order, beauty, lavish richness, stored up treasures, recurring seasons, etc., of the earth. 6 Word ... mouth. The heavens are the exact expression of his mind (word) and the direct product (mouth) of his will. Breath, ‘spirit’ or ‘Spirit’, what the Lord says is full of the Lord’s energy to bring it to effect (cf. 9; 104:7, 30; Gn. 1:3, 6). 7 The waters, as the unruly component of creation, are chosen to exemplify the ease of the Creator’s sovereignty (93:3, 4) 8, 10, 11 In OT thought the Creator is more than the initiator; he remains sovereign over his creation, worthy of the reverence of all its people and in directive management of all its affairs, restraining and dominant, purposive and irresistible.

12–19 God in election. Within his creation the Creator made choice of one people to be his inheritance, ‘possession’ (12), and, as he brings all who live on earth under review (13–15), he notes the uselessness of worldly provisions for security (16, 17): neither position (king) nor power (army), neither prowess (warrior), strength or equipment (horse) can save. But as compared with this pomp of state, armed force and material of war, how simple is the protection he extends to his own! His eyes and his love (18), are sufficient for and superior to eternal (death) and temporal (famine) threat (19), and are brought into our lives by reverential fear towards him and hope (confident expectation) that unfailing love will look after us (18).

20–22 The Trusting Heart. The testimony of the Lord’s people is one of (a) constancy of hope (confident expectation), not just of the final outcome—future and eternal hope—but the hope which assures us that in every circumstance he is our help and our shield (20); (b) joyfulness of trust. The rejoicing heart is the product of trust which rests on what the Lord has revealed about himself (name) and on his character (holy), whereby he can never deny himself (21); (c) dependency of prayer (22). Love is intrinsic to all he does (5) and the specific portion of his elect people (18). To pray that this love may rest upon us embraces all our needs in one petition.

Psalm 34. An ABC for a crisis

The title places the psalm in 1 Samuel 21:10–14. Fleeing from Saul, David sought refuge with the Philistine king of Gath, called by his personal name, Achish, but in this psalm by the royal name of the Philistine kings, Abimelech (Gn. 20:2; 21:22; 26:8). Soon, however, safety changed to detention (1 Sa. 21:13, ‘in their hands’) for they recognized David and realized what a valuable hostage they had. By pretending madness, David secured his release and escaped. Thus, if we only had the Samuel-account, we would say that the crisis was overcome by astuteness. But, on reflection, David saw that it was not at all so: the secret of his escape was I sought the LORD (4) ... This poor man called (6). Cleverness did not open the door, rather he delivered (4) ... he saved (6).

The psalm is a broken alphabetic acrostic (see Introduction): one letter is not used and another is used twice. Life’s troubles cannot be completely catalogued, we do not see the whole pattern. But in so far as the whole story can be told, here is an ABC for a crisis.

The psalm falls into two parts: vs 1–10, the lessons of experience, mainly David’s own testimony with conclusions drawn; vs 11–22, the teaching of the truth, how to manage life and face crises.

1, 2 Commitment to ceaseless praise. At all times—even in Abimelech’s clutches—the true response is (not astuteness but) to extol ‘bless’ the Lord, i.e. acknowledge the glories which make him who he is, to praise, boast / ‘engage in praise of’ the Lord. This is the message for the afflicted, those at the bottom of life’s heap.

3–6 Testimony shared to the glory of God. Prayer was answered with total deliverance (4)—and this is not peculiar to David, for those who look to him find an inner radiance (5); they never reap shame, i.e. are never disappointed as a result of looking to the Lord. Nor is this experience due to anything special about David, for it was as a poor man, himself ‘at the bottom of the heap’, that he called and was heard (6).

7–10 Lessons drawn. One person’s testimony is only valuable to others if it rests on a changeless truth about God. So why was David able to enjoy such experiences? Because the angel of the LORD is the ever-present, rescuing agent (7). Appearing to Hagar, the Angel of the Lord spoke about the Lord (Gn. 16:11) and yet was the Lord (Gn. 16:13; cf. Ex. 3:2, 4; 14:19, 24; 23:20–21; Jdg. 6:21, 22; 13:21, 22). The Angel is particularly associated with occasions when the Lord wishes to show himself to chosen people and is one of the OT indications of diversity within the unity of the Godhead. Thus David’s testimony can be anyone’s testimony because the Angel encamps (lives in a mobile home so as to move with the people of God in their earthly pilgrimage) with all who fear him. Hence, all are invited to taste and see, to take refuge (8), and find sufficiency (9–10).

11–14 The secret of the good life. I will teach sets the tone for the remainder of the psalm. Here are the lessons David wishes to share. First, the surprising clue to a good life: guard your tongue (13) and set and keep negative and positive moral objectives (14). At the court of Achish David had wangled his freedom by falsehood and compromise, but a life of reverential fear of the Lord respects his truth and honours his values.

15–18 The secret of facing trouble. The onset of trouble must be matched by the onset of prayer and the prayer of the righteous summons the God of deliverance to our aid (17). Since the righteous are here contrasted with those who do evil the description covers both a right relationship with God and commitment to righteousness of life, hence (a) in the context of righteousness, prayer is effective: (15, cry) specifically ‘cry for help’; cry out (17), in alarm, urgency; but (b) the Lord automatically identifies with those overwhelmed by life’s sorrows (18). Close, a ‘next-of-kin’ relationship, not just being near at hand but actively making our woes his own (Lv. 21:23; Ru. 2:20; 3:12).

19–22 The secret of deliverance. These verses may be taken as a commentary on the ‘next-of-kin’ relationship. Realistically there is acknowledgement that being righteous (right with God and committed to righteousness, 19) is no guarantee of a trouble-free life (many troubles)—but in his closeness to us the Lord delivers (19), safeguards (20), sides with us against our opponents (21), pays whatever price will meet our need (redeems, 22a; 31:5), and offers himself as an available refuge (22b).

Psalm 35. Responses to undeserved suffering

An outpouring rather than a coherent, organized poem, this psalm belongs to a time when enmity and suffering were seemingly endless. The long period of Saul’s paranoiac hatred is suitable, the sad figure of the king attracting round him, as he did, many who sycophantically identified with him and gratuitously aggravated David's sufferings. As in Psalm 34, prayer alone is seen as the solution, but in that crisis the answer came with the prayer: the poor man cried and the LORD heard him (34:6). Now, notwithstanding persistency in prayer, the agony is prolonged and the answer is deferred. Prayer submits our needs to the Lord's resources and also our timetable to his.

The three sections of the psalm are marked off by promises of responsive praise when the cloud is lifted (9–10, 18, 27–28). Within each section thought races here and there over the same topics: (a) calls for divine intervention (1–3, 17, 22–24a), (b) prayers for retribution (4–6, 8, 24b–26) and (c) reasons why retribution is merited (7, 11–16, 19–21); the keynote of each section is found in the latter verses: the suffering is without cause (7), a strange return for David's behaviour (13, 14), and full of personal animosity (19–21). As always in such psalms as this, we are surprised at the vigour of David's praying and its element of counter-attack against his opponents. We need to recall that there is such a thing as pure anger, evidenced in the Lord Jesus Christ (Mk. 3:5), in the saints of Rev. 6:9–10, and noted in Eph. 4:26. The whole psalm (as are all similar psalms) is a prayer without any suggestion that in either word or deed David expressed any animosity towards those who sinfully and guiltily plagued him. As in Psalm 34, the crisis, though here prolonged, is met by prayer, leaving all to the Lord.

1–10 Prayer in uncalled-for danger. A plea for divine intervention (1–3) is followed by a prayer for retribution (4–6) and the explanation that such behaviour is without cause (7). The retributive theme is repeated in v 8 followed by a promise of exultation in God for his saving power (9, 10). The reference to war and weapons (1, 2) points to the strength of the Lord, which is more than a match for all the strength of the enemy. 1 Contend. The word applies to law-suits. David's first appeal is that what is right should be done. The Lord cannot be asked to do what is unjust. Fight. Though in mortal danger, David does not propose to take up arms. This is the Lord's business. 2, 3 Shield ... buckler, synonyms, i.e. every necessary defensive weapon. Spear. The Lord is called to attack as well as defend. And to deal with the inner need of the soul for reassurance too. 4 Disgraced ... shame, reap shame, be publicly disappointed of their expectations. 5 Chaff, a picture of helplessness before divine judgment. The angel (better, 'Angel'), see 34:7. The Angel of the LORD appears in Psalms only in these two places, to rescue (34:7) and to scatter (35:5–6). 7, 8 Retributive prayers always follow the revealed will of God. He declared (Dt. 19:18–19) that wrongful accusers must themselves receive what they wrongly sought to inflict. In such a circumstance we blandly pray 'May your will be done'; the psalmists, with more realism, spelled out what that will is known to be! 10 Who is like you? Cf. Ex. 15:11; Mi. 7:18.

11–18 Prayer in undeserved danger. The long opening section (12–16) in which David laments that he is receiving evil in return for good is followed by a plea for divine intervention (17) and the promise of praise for deliverance (18). This is the sad heart of the psalm: to find that people who were considered friends are the source of false report, gloat over misfortune and seethe with hatred. In this section the Lord is addressed as the 'Sovereign One' (17) with the added question How long? Certainly he is stronger than any foe, but the praying saint must be prepared to submit to the Sovereign's timetable. 13 When my prayers ... 'And my prayer kept returning to my bosom', which may imply unanswered prayer but is an unusual way of expressing the idea. If 'bosom' is metaphorical for 'heart' (Ec. 7:9) then 'but my prayer kept coming back into mind', i.e. notwithstanding their treatment of him, he still found himself praying for them (Mt. 5:44). 16. Ungodly, profane in mind and conduct, abhorrent to God, religiously apostate: here, people acting as if no divine sanctions of conduct existed. They maliciously ... Probably (NIV mg.) ‘Like ungodly mockers, all around, they gnashed ...’ 17 Lord, ‘Sovereign One’. 18 The Lord delights to be thanked (Lk. 17:15–16). The promise of praise and thanks unites this psalm (9, 28).

19–28 Prayer in malicious danger. David’s foes are full of gloating and malice (19–21). Will the Lord remain silent (22–24)? If only he will hear the appeal for intervention (24–26) the day will come when David’s real friends with David will magnify the Lord (27–28). The new stress in this section is the righteousness of the Lord (24). Since he is a righteous God he must act for one so sorely tried. 19 Without cause (cf. Jn. 15:25). Wink. The mischievous innuendo. 22 You have seen. Note the connection with v 21, we have seen. Whatever they may claim, the Lord knows the rights of the matter. Lord, ‘Sovereign’. In v 17 the title pointed to his control of the timetable; here, his mastery of the foe. 27 David had enemies in plenty but did not forget that he had friends too—a great antidote to the loneliness created by false accusation. And the day will come when they will be foremost in praising God for David’s deliverance.

Psalm 36. One God, two attitudes

The structure of this psalm displays its message:

- A¹ (v 1) The wicked: his philosophy
- B¹ (vs 2–4) The wicked characterized
- C (vs 5–8) The Lord characterized
- B² (vs 9–11) Those who know the Lord
- A² (v 12) The wicked: their fate

In this psalm, there is a choice to be made which determines the sort of life we experience now and the destiny that awaits: the choice is how to react to the revelation of God. To reject it is to be condemned to listen to our own hearts and to a life without values; to embrace it is to enjoy life, light, provision and protection.

1 The philosophy of the wicked. Lit. ‘The word of rebellion to the wicked within my heart’. Oracle, authoritative word, is usually used of what the Lord speaks. Here the speaker is rebellion (sinfulness). Within my heart, either ‘I know it intuitively’ or ‘I know it personally’. The former underlines conviction of truth; the latter, which is more attractive, testifies that he is not immune from this inner voice himself. 1c, d The issue is not whether God exists but whether he matters; not his reality but his relevance. It is the position of many people all the time; it is the position of believers some of the time—not as a stated creed but in practice.

2–4 The wicked characterized. Inwardly, listening to himself and morally complacent (2); outwardly wicked in word and deed (3), in plans, objectives and values (4). 3, 4 Without reverence for God there are no objective standards for life. Wicked, a word ranging from mischievous to apostate. Wise, the wise conduct of life issuing in true success. Reject, ‘spurn’, mental as well as practical rejection.

5–8 The Lord characterized. 5 Love, the love which issues from a commitment of the will, ‘unchanging love’. Reaches to, ‘is in’, not remoteness but towering height, something far bigger and higher than anything on earth. Faithfulness, consistency of revealed character, reliability in his promises. 6 Righteousness ... justice, the expression of his holiness respectively in moral principles and just practices. 7–8 The universal benevolence of God in love (cf. 5) protection (7), lavishness and delight (8, like the rivers of Eden, Gn. 2:10).

9–11 Those who know the Lord characterized. Description (5–8) becomes testimony: life, in contrast to the decaying life of vs 2–4, true, divine life shared; light, all that makes life fulfilled and unanxious. See, experience and enjoy. 10 Know, enjoy intimate union with. Love ... righteousness, the attributes of God himself. Those who know him pray that he will share himself with them (2 Pet. 1:3, 4). 11, Foot ... hand, respectively symbols of conquest and personal power. We live in a world that wills to subdue and dominate. Drive ... away, make homeless, make life unsettled.

12 The fate of the wicked. See how, ‘There’. Does some instance of the downfall of evildoers lie behind the psalm? Or, as is more likely, is David pointing dramatically to the day of divine judgment?

Psalm 37. An ABC for personal spiritual conflict

An almost complete alphabetic acrostic (see Introduction), Psalm 37 can act as a commentary on the final verses of Psalm 36—the prayer against the hostile ‘foot and hand’ and the affirmation that wherever they assault they are doomed to fall. It opens up the often agonizing tension in the life of faith prompted by the contrasting fortunes on earth of the ‘righteous’—those who would live out their relationship of being ‘right with God’—and the ‘wicked’, the practical atheist for whom God may exist but only as an irrelevance. The psalm falls into four sections of comparable length, the second, third and fourth being marked off by parallel beginnings. The wicked plot (12), The wicked borrow (21), The wicked lie (32).

1–11 Prospering wickedness: responses. The scene is set by noting that there are different approaches to life (1 contrasted with 3), and that it seems to be the devious who succeed (7) whereas those who would do good are often vexed by life and tempted to envy (1), to get agitated about it (8) and to wonder if there is any substance in talk of the meek inheriting the earth (9, 11). The response is commanded of calmness and contentment (1, 7, 8), trust and moral commitment (3, 5), quiet patience (7), and confidence in the outcome (10, 11). The basis on which these commands rest is the transience of the wrongdoer (2), the sure blessing of God (4–6), the ultimate setting of all to rights (9–11). 3 Enjoy safe pasture, or ‘tend faithfulness’, cultivate being faithful (to God and his way) like a shepherd tends his flock. 4 Desires, ‘requests’, desires turned into prayers. 5 Do this, i.e. ‘take action’. 6 Your righteousness, the fact that you are in the right; your ... justice, the judgment of the divine court in your favour. 7 Be still ... wait patiently. The ‘stillness’ (in word and action) of a confident trust, coupled with (lit.) ‘writhing’, on tenterhooks with expectation. 9 Hope, the confident waiting of hope. 11 Meek. Those who are at the bottom of life’s heap but face their situation calmly because they know that they are under the sovereign hand of God.

12–20 Hostile wickedness: insights. The observation of vs 1–11 that life is unfair is now given another setting: the practical atheists in their success turn to oppose and assault the righteous (12, 14). In this situation of dire threat, however, things are not quite what they seem: the Lord is not an idle spectator; he has taken sides and has already fixed the doom of the wicked (13), guaranteeing that their hostilities will boomerang on themselves (15), for they are also his enemies and doomed to perish (20). On the other hand, even here and now the righteous is wealthier than the wicked (16) whose power will be broken but the Lord is the present strength of the righteous; they are in his intimate fellowship and care (18); no earthly calamity can destroy them for they have their own sources of satisfaction (19). The directive of this section is that we should practise living in the light of these insights rather than acquiesce in the outward appearances of life. 14 Poor ... needy, respectively the underdog and the exploitable. 17 Power, 'arms', personal abilities and strengths. 18 Blameless, the person whose life is an integrated whole, inwardly, outwardly, and in all its parts. Known (cf. 1:6), under his intimate surveillance and care.

21–31 Impoverished wickedness: commitment. One insight of the last section was the greater wealth of the righteous. This is now explored further. Generosity distinguishes the righteous from the wicked (21, 26). They can afford openhandedness because (22 begins with 'For') their future is secure, their pathway firm (23) and their present provided for (25, cf. 28, 29). Behind all this ease of mind in life's demands and threats lies the hidden factor of divine blessing, delight, upholding love and fidelity which they experience in the context of their commitment to the way they live (27), the character they cultivate (28) and the quality of their speech and heart (30–31). As contrasted with the grousing, envy and anger against which we are warned in vs 1–11, it is this commitment which should be our priority when life tests us by its inequalities. 22 Restore the initial 'for'. The righteous are liberated into generosity because their sure hope makes them unanxious for the future. 23, 24 Though his steps have been made firm he is not immune from stumbling. The pathway still contains trip-wires and pitfalls, but the securing hand never relaxes its grip. 25 This may very well have been the unbroken experience of the psalmist but more likely we must take it in the same sense as v 24, i.e. with the unspoken words 'in the long run'. 26. On the inclusion of children in the outflow of blessing, see Ex. 20:6; Pr. 20:7; Acts 2:39; 1 Cor. 7:14. 28 Faithful, related to love (36:5), those whom he loves and who respond by loving him. 31 Law, 'teaching'.

32–40 Impermanent wickedness: assurance. A principle is asserted that the Lord guarantees a blessed outcome for the righteous (those 'right with him'); be the threat never so deadly in the end it is the wicked who will perish (32–34). Consequently the simple trust which looks confidently to the outcome (wait), coupled with the obedience which keeps his way, is the road to secure possession of the land (34). A particular example from experience (35, 36) is seen as typical of what will ultimately be the case (37, 38). In the meantime the Lord gives salvation (deliverance), protection, help and rescue to those who take refuge in him (39, 40). 34 Inherit the land (cf. 9, 11, 22, 29, 34). The same verb is used throughout and the translation possess is preferable to inherit. The Lord gave his people a promised land but their tenure of it was frequently under threat, nationally from outside foes, individually from grasping and oppressive exploiters. To have a guaranteed security and enjoyment of tenure was something greatly desired. This is the first meaning of the psalm, but its larger meaning points to the messianic day and the new creation. 37 Blameless, the person of true integrity (see v 18). 38 Sinners, 'those rebelling', wilfully flouting the known will of God.

Psalm 38. Divine anger, divine salvation

The first and the last two verses summarize the theme and wonder of this psalm. When the LORD is offended, and his anger (exploding rage) and wrath (flaming anger) loom (1) and his arrows begin to fly (2), it is to the same Lord that we appeal, for his presence, nearness (21), help and salvation (22). Only the Lord's favour can deliver us from the Lord's disfavour. If ever a psalm was designed to warn us off sin by exposing its consequences, this is it. Sin offends the Lord and burdens the sinner, replaces wellbeing by wounds, induces lowspiritedness, with pain of body and disquiet of heart (1–8). It saddens and devitalizes, isolates us from friends, and excites enmity (9–12); it leaves us without excuse (13, 14). But it does not close the door of prayer, nor exclude us from the place of repentance (15–18).

1–12 The way down. David sinks lower and lower under the burden of sin. The Lord is his enemy (1, 2); David is without strength (5–10) and without friends (11). His enemies plot against him (12). 1–4 The symptoms of sickness (3, cf. 5–8, 10, 17) may be the way in which David describes his shattering feelings of guilt, but the details are so vivid and the sense of bodily pain so acute that it is best to understand that in this case he was visited with actual disease in punishment for sin. 1 Anger ... wrath, see above. 2 Divine messengers of wrath (arrows)—sickness, pain, abandonment (11), opposition (12)—and personal divine opposition (hand) alike ‘come down’ on David. Pierced / ‘drop themselves down’. 3 Wrath, ‘indignation’, the sense of outrage. Health, ‘wholeness’. Soundness, ‘peace/wellbeing’. Sin, specific items of wrong-doing. 4 Guilt, ‘iniquity’, the inner warp and corruption of nature. Overwhelmed, ‘gone over my head’, as of drowning.

5–8 This description of the tormented body is an elaboration of v 3. Not all sickness comes as punishment for sin, but some does. Every case of sickness is a time for self-examination. In this case, the connection was apparently undoubted. The description alternates between bodily and mental symptoms. 5 Fester ... loathsome, ‘stink ... septic’. Folly, ‘silliness’. The corresponding noun means ‘downright fool’. 6 Bowed, ‘convulsed (with pain)’. 8 Feeble, ‘numbed’. Groan, ‘roar’ (like an angry lion). Anguish, ‘disquiet/unease’.

9–12 1–4 concentrated on sickness evidencing divine hostility; the subject now is the human desertion and threat which the sickness has prompted. At the same time, though the prayer is inarticulate, there is a turning to the Lord. 9 LORD, ‘Sovereign One’, as in 15, 22. The Lord ‘declares his almighty power most chiefly in showing mercy and pity’ (Book of Common Prayer). 10 Further symptoms of illness: palpitation, ebbing vitality and loss of clear vision. 11 A vivid touch. Often the things which proclaim the need for sympathetic friendship make people back away. We do not know what to do or say and self-concern overcomes concern for the needy. But the troubled person does not need long speeches—just the pressure of a friendly hand, the company of an understanding heart. Friends, ‘my loving ones’, a closer relationship than companions, ‘peers’. Neighbours, ‘next-of-kin’ (cf. 34:18), those whose right it is to make their kinsman’s trouble their own. 12 There are, sadly, those who watch for opportunities for spite, anticipate the worst and plan with deceitful intent.

13–22 The way up. The same pattern is repeated as in vs 1–12 but the psalm is moving progressively into a new arena. The appeal against divine wrath (1, 2) became the inarticulate appeal of v 9. But now, though the situation is unchanged, a positive mood is taking over: one of trustful waiting for an answer (15), actual confession of (not just moaning about) sin (18) and a call for saving help (22).

13–16 To all the talk against him he makes no reply (12–14) but speaks only to God (15–16). He tells the LORD (15, ‘Yahweh’, the God of covenant love, saving and judging power) about his silences (13, 14) and about his confident hope (15); he knows that the Lord (‘Sovereign One’) who is my God, will answer (cf. La. 3:19–33). 14 Not can offer, but ‘does not offer’. The choice to remain silent has been freely made. 15 Replace ‘For’ at the beginning of this verse. Silence has been chosen (14) ‘because’ the way of trust, confidence and prayer has been adopted (15–16). Wait, i.e. with confident hope.

17–20 The prayer recorded in v 16 came with urgency ‘because I am sure to stumble ...’ (17). First, he is urgent because endurance cannot hold out much longer; and secondly, because of his ever present ‘pain/sorrow’ (17, the word combines both meanings). This, in turn (18 begins with ‘for’) is constantly his experience because he ‘keeps confessing’ and ‘being anxious about’ his iniquity (see 4) and sin (see 3). The very act of bringing all this to God keeps his sense of oppression alive. Besides, there is vigorous opposition, unjust hatred and unmerited slander (19). But at the same time there is not now the heavy self-preoccupation of vs 5–8; the air is clearer—surely because he has reached the place of confession.

21, 22 The name of the covenant Lord (21, cf. 1, 15), the personal God (21, cf. 15) and the Sovereign Lord (22, cf. 9, 15) cluster in this final appeal. The Lord who came to Egypt because he knew his people’s pain/sorrow (Ex. 3:7, same word as 17) has not changed; the God who has allowed himself to be personally known and owned will never be false to that relationship; the Sovereign Lord will save.

Psalm 39. The burning question

The situation matches Psalm 38: silence in the presence of onlookers (38:12, 13; 39:2), divine action against sin (38:1–3; 39:9–11), hope in the Lord alone (38:15, 21, 22; 39:7). But the focus is different. In Psalm 38 sickness has exposed sin, bringing need of forgiveness; in Psalm 39 sickness has exposed the brevity of life, bringing longing for a period of brightness (13) before life’s transience runs its course.

The brevity of life and the sadness of death run throughout the Bible and the full revelation of the immortal world does not remove them. This life is precious. Its joys and loves may be transcended but they cannot be replaced. To be bereaved is ‘sorrow upon sorrow’ (Phil. 2:27); our own leaving of this life cannot be contemplated with unmixed equanimity, even though heaven is sure. David lamented the death of his little boy though knowing they would meet again (2 Sa. 12:22–23) and here he laments the possible curtailment of his own earthly tenure.

1–3 A strained silence. Fear of saying the wrong thing in a time of stress. However the pressure may mount (2, 3) the matter of testimony before the wicked is important (cf. 73:15).

4–6 The burning question. Poetically v 4 asks ‘Am I going to die?’ This was the question he felt he should suppress before those who did not share his faith, for, with a heavenly prospect (49:15; 73:24) ahead why should he fear or resent dying? But the question will out and David faces the acknowledged brevity, insubstantiality and uncertain point of earthly life (5–6).

7–11 God is my hope. Look for and hope are synonyms. David has been asking anxiously, ‘Am I going to die?’ (4), but now he sees the future in proper perspective. Maybe he has a terminal illness (10, lit. ‘I am finished’) but he has exactly the same amount of earthly time as anyone else, namely what the Lord allocates. This is his confident expectation—short or long, life is what the Lord wills. 8 Save ... do not make. In his crisis David relied solely on prayer. If prayer goes ‘unanswered’, his critics will gloat (38:15, 16) and fools (people without moral and spiritual perception) will jibe. 9 Acceptive silence under the hand of God (cf. 2). 10, 11. Divine judgment on sin is one cause of the curtailment of the earthly span (cf. 90:5–9), hence David’s concern is not for healing but forgiveness (8).

12–13 Prayer for light. The end of earthly existence must come; meanwhile he longs to rejoice, ‘brighten up’. 12 Prayer brings our needs to God; cry, our helplessness; weeping, our urgency. Alien ... stranger The Lord made his people ‘aliens and tenants/strangers’ in his land (Lv. 25:23); alien, one who has sought asylum; stranger, ‘tenant’ is one without freehold. The Lord loves his ‘aliens’ (Dt. 10:19) and gives protection and tenure.

Psalm 40. Waiting past ... and waiting still

In Psalms 38, 39 David was prayerfully waiting (38:15; 39:7) in a crisis of sin (38:3; 39:8) and of public maliciousness (38:16; 39:8). The waiting is now over (1–3); trust has been vindicated (4–5) personal commitment to do God’s will follows (6–8); public testimony is pledged (9–10) but personal inadequacy and the need for speedy divine help remain (11–13). There is need too for some public act of God rebuking (14–15) and giving joy (16). Facing this future, David again takes up a waiting position: whatever the Lord has done in the past, there is an ongoing, urgent need for his concern and liberating action (17).

1–3 (A¹) Fruitful waiting. Simply waiting (in hope and confidence, 1) leads to personal deliverance, security, renewal and effective public impact (2–3). 1 Waited patiently, rather ‘I only waited.’ 2 Slimy, meaning uncertain, maybe ‘noisy’/‘desolate’. 3 New, ‘fresh’, responding to ‘new’ mercies. Many. How we react to life constitutes a potent testimony and nothing is more powerful than to maintain a simple attitude of waiting trust. It is noted (see), prompts reverence for the God who responds to faith (fear) and brings others to faith (trust).

4–5 (B¹) Past divine action recorded. Blessedness follows in the wake of trust because of the abundance of the Lord’s deeds and plans. 4 Proud ... false gods (lit. and better ‘falsehood’). Two impermissible responses: respectively to pretend to competence and to lie one’s way out of trouble. Wonders, things with the mark of the supernatural upon them, pointing to a divine agent. No-one can recount. Rather, ‘There is no comparison with you!’

6–13 (C) The all-important disposition. Three stanzas (6–8, 9–10, 11–13) are linked by references to the inner disposition: the obedient heart (8), the testifying heart (10), the failing heart (12). Such wonders of God (5) demand a response. No ritual will suffice (6), only serious commitment to God’s will (7, 8). This cannot be left as a matter of interior piety; it must be a public testimony (9, 10). But in undertaking this the thought comes unbidden, ‘Can I keep it up?’ for life will still threaten, sin is still a menace and resoluteness a diminishing quantity (12). But v 12 is bracketed by vs 11, 13: the place of prayer is still open.

6 Cf. 51:16–17. Not desire ... require. David was enabled to see that such a deliverance (1–3) can only be met by total personal response. Ears ... pierced cf. Is. 50:4 (different verb), the creation of; an ability to receive divine revelation. 7 Scroll. Some coronation decree (2:7; cf. Dt. 17:14–20) or oath (cf. 101) enacting the nature of the Davidic kingship. In a solemn reaffirmation David asserts his commitment to this ideal. In the ultimate, only the Messiah can make such a commitment and Hebrews 10:5–10 rightly sees both the setting aside of ritual sacrifices and the acceptance of the whole obligation of the law as fulfilled in the Lord Jesus. 9, 10 express determination for the future, following the affirmations of vs 6–8. Hence ‘am determined to proclaim ... will not seal ... determined not to hide ...’ etc. The blessings that come through trust (1–5) look forward to a holy life (6–8) and an opened mouth (9–10). But these require dependent prayer (11, 13) because personal weakness (12) can so readily spoil all our obligations and promises.

14–16 (B²) Future divine action sought. The Lord acted for David personally (4, 5); now he desires divine action to set the community to rights. Human opposition (14, 15) could mar all his bright intentions and the godly, who have, in measure, endured with David, need like him to enjoy fresh mercies. 14 Shame ... confusion ... disgrace, synonyms for disappointment and public discredit. It is as right to pray against (14) as to pray for (16). David offers us a model, but such praying demands purity of spirit.

17 (A²) Still waiting. Aware of lack of strength (poor, under life's burden, crushed) and of resoluteness (needy, easily swayed) David knows that, great as past mercies were, while earthly life continues we are ever in need of fresh mercies in heaven (cf. Heb. 7:25) and on earth.

Psalm 41. Blessedness in principle and in experience

The topics of sickness, sin, hostility and estrangement link this psalm with Psalms 38–40 and it probably recalls one facet maliciousness and betrayal—of the same prolonged trial. But in particular it tests out a principle (1–3) against experience (11, 12): is it in fact the case that a caring attitude towards the weak prompts a reciprocal divine care?

1–3 (A¹) Divine favour, in principle. Concern for the needy is inculcated in the OT (Ex. 22:21; 23:9; Lv. 19:10, 33; Dt. 10:18). Proverbs 14:21; 19:17 promise blessing in return (cf. Mt. 5:7; 18:33). Here the promise covers rescue in trouble (1), protection and restoration, temporal blessing, shelter, strength and comfort in sickness (2–3). 1 Weak. Mainly lack of worldly resources but also other aspects of disadvantage. 1 Samuel 30:13ff. exemplifies David's attitude in this matter but plainly he feels himself in a position to expect the blessing promised to one who cares. 3 And restore ..., 'And you will change all his bed in his illness', a lovely picture of divine care.

4 (B¹) Grace sought in respect of sin. Having asserted divine blessing resting upon the one who is concerned for the weak, David first asks for the blessing of healing in respect of sin. Mercy, 'favour/grace'. Heal me, 'my soul', my whole personality. Sin is like a disease in the sinner, but it is also offensive to God, against you.

5–9 (C) Hatred, falsehood, gossip, betrayal. In two stanzas (5–6, 7–9) the central problem to which this psalm is addressed is clarified: human opposition and, most of all, the treachery of a trusted friend. 'Do thy friends despise, forsake thee? Take it to the Lord in prayer.' 8 A vile disease, (lit.) 'a matter of Belial'. The word 'belial' is used of moral deviance, social misdemeanour, and spiritual apostasy. It must always be understood according to context. The sense best suited here is of some offensiveness to God occasioning divine wrath.

10 (B²) Grace sought in respect of opponents. The divine mercy that restores life will open an opportunity for vengeance. But the psalms insist that vengeance is the Lord's business and David is elsewhere careful to avoid it. While, therefore, he could fall into the sin of vengeance (1 Ki. 2:5–6) it is hard to believe that in a solemnly composed psalm he would blandly seek grace in order to pursue a forbidden thing. He could, however, as king ask God to give him renewed life in order to perform the royal duty of purging the land (101:8).

11–12 (A²) Divine favour, in experience. David has received the promised blessing (cf. 1–3). His enemy has not been allowed to have the last word; rather in response to his integrity he enjoys divine favour.

Notes. 11 Triumph, 'shout in triumph'. 12 Integrity, not sinless perfection but integrity on the point at issue, concern for the needy (1). 13 An editorial conclusion to the first book of Psalms (see 72:18f; 89:52; 106:48, and Introduction).

Psalms 42, 43. From faith to faith

These two psalms are certainly one and we cannot tell why they were divided. A balanced refrain unites three stanzas of similar length (42:6, 11; 43:5); there are links of wording, e.g. in the first two stanzas, ‘while they say’ etc. (3, 10); in the second and third, ‘mourning’ (42:9; 43:2); and there is unity and development of theme. (a) In 42:1–5 (‘faith longing’), past memories sharpen present pain. The metaphor of drought (1, 2) expresses a deep longing for God. (b) In 42:6–11 (‘faith reviving’), the metaphor of storm (7) expresses present distresses but faith sees the breakers as the Lord’s breakers, his love remains (8), he is still my Rock (9). (c) In 43:1–5 (‘faith responding’) the metaphor of a search party (3) expresses assurance for the future. The God who is even now a stronghold will bring him back home (3–4).

Many situations can be imagined for this psalm. The writer recalls temple services as things of the past (42:4); he is now in the far north of Palestine (42:6); only an act of God can bring him back (43:3); he is surrounded by triumphalist, taunting foes (42:3, 9–10). Any occasion when an enemy took and deported captives (e.g. 2 Ki. 14:14; 24:14), would be appropriate.

42:1–5 The lost past

With an intensity of longing that rebukes our feeble love (1, 2), the psalmist brings his sorrows to God, along with memories of better days (2–4). 2 Questions are not wrong: When? ... Why? (9, 43:2) ... Where (3, 10), expressing respectively a wish for the ordeal to end, puzzlement that it is there at all and inability to see God in it. But the question ‘Who?’ in Isaiah 42:24 points us in a more believing and reassuring direction. 5 (with 11; 43:5). He deals with suffering by talking to himself of the God who guarantees the future—for, as always in the Bible, hope expresses certainty of outcome. NIV follows many in making small adjustments to 42:5 so that the refrain (5, 11; 43:5) is the same in each case. Here, (lit.) ‘... I will praise him for the salvation of his face’. (‘My God’ begins v 6)—i.e. God has only to look up with favour for the whole distress to be transformed into deliverance.

6–11 The troubled present

Circumstances threaten (7) but faith is reviving: God is still My God (6), the storm is your waterfalls ... your waves (7); his love is still real; praise and prayer continue (8); the questions which seem to complain, which express our distress and which have no answer become occasions, not of self-pity, but of prayer (9–10). 6 Restore the opening words, ‘O my God’—personal faith maintained in the midst of depression by deliberate focusing of memory on God. 7 Sufferings are not the touch of an alien hand. They are your breakers. 9 Faith says ‘my Rock’, experience says ‘forgotten’. Everything depends on which voice is heeded. 11 (Lit.) ‘... praise him, (who is) the salvation of my face and my God’, lifting up the downcast face (also 43:5).

43:1–5 The expected future

Prayer continues, for rescue and restoration; realism continues, balancing the problems of the present with the prospect of the future. 1 Vindicate, pronounce judgment in my favour. 2 The fact of stronghold and feeling rejected: sure about God, battered by life, see v 9 above. 3, 4 Light and truth are figuratively seen as a search and rescue party. The reality is that to live in God’s light and cherish his truth is the true way through life’s difficulties to a blessed outcome. Note the progression of increasing closeness: mountain ... place ... altar ... God—a full homecoming, step by step.

Psalm 44. When life is unfair and God is asleep

As in Psalms 42–43, faith faces the calamities of life without any sense of an inward cause meriting the suffering (17–19). But whereas 42–43 is individual, 44 is national, possibly composed for a national day of prayer.

- A¹ (vs 1–3) The God of the past
- B¹ (vs 4–8) Testimony: true faith
- C (vs 9–16) Lament: the distressing present
- B² (vs 17–22) Testimony: correct conduct
- A² (vs 23–26) The God of the future

God's ways are a mystery. The afflictions of life are often inexplicable to the human eye, and contrary to what God has already proved himself to be. The only recourse is to fly to God in prayer.

The psalm can be arranged as an antiphonal, with voices answering each other or speaking together. Since the singular voice (e.g. 4, 15) speaks of my sword, it may be the king leading his gathered people in prayer.

1–3 The God of the past: a memory of blessings. The whole assembly speaks of the past with one voice: ancestral memory told of God in action, of nations routed, not by human enterprise but by the divine hand. 2 Hand. The symbol of personal action. At the start of the enterprise, the land in front of them was 'the land that the LORD ... is giving you' (Dt. 4:1); and at the end 'the LORD gave Israel all the land he had sworn to give their forefathers' (Jos. 21:43; cf. 80:8–11; Am. 2:9, 10). 3 To be sure they fought for the land, for what the Lord promises is enjoyed by obedience to what he commands. Yet they knew it was not ... their sword but his hand (personal action), arm (personal strength) and your face, the shining of divine favour towards his people. Loved, 'accepted with favour'.

4–8 True faith has been maintained. King (4, 6) and people (5, 7) alternate and join in common (8) in a testimony that they have not deviated from a true understanding of what the Lord is (4) and their dependence on him (5); their understanding of the uselessness of earthly power (6) and the efficacy of divine salvation (7). Consequently, it is of him they have boasted (8). 4 They do not rest on an ancestral faith but make it their own: personal allegiance (King), personal devotion (God). Who decrees, see NIV mg. 'Command', a direct appeal to the divine King. Victories, 'salvations', plural signifying 'every sort of deliverance'. 6, 7 Both begin with 'For'. The reliance on the divine King expressed in 4, 5 rises from a disavowal of personal ability (6) and an avowal of divine efficacy (7). Give us victory over, 'save us from'.

9–16 The distressing present. The antiphon continues: the voice of the king in 9, 11, 13, 15 and of the people in 10, 12, 14. All unite in a final lament (17). Divine rejection has led to human defeat; the attitude and acts of God (11, 12) are matched by those of hostile people (13, 14). Humiliation is complete (15, 16). It all seems purposeless (9–12), good repute is totally gone (13, 14), only embarrassment is left (15, 16). The second singular verbs in each verse, 9–14, stress that life comes direct from the hand of God. It is in this way we are to understand experiences, good or ill. Some find it helpful to distinguish between the 'directive' will of God and the ‘permissive’ will of God, but the OT does not encourage this. Since God directs all things, our course in life is to trust him when we do not understand and to run to him for help when we are overwhelmed. 12 Not only does there seem to be no human justification for the divine hostility they have endured, there seems to be no divine advantage gained through it. For a pittance ‘for no return’.

17–21 Correct conduct has been maintained. The confession of personal faith (4–8) is now balanced by a testimony of loyalty in heart and conduct (18)—yet only disaster has followed (19); true religion of hand and heart has been rewarded by a death sentence (20–22). The king speaks in 17, 20; the people in 18, 21; and all together in 19, 22. We are right to be troubled by the inequity and unfairness of life. Worth and reward by no means keep in step (73:2–14). Sadly human reaction all too often is to deny the existence of a good and loving God; the reaction of the king and his people was to come to God, here in testimony, voicing their disquiets, and soon in intercession (23–26). We should learn to make trouble and perplexity drive us to our God not away from him. 17 Covenant here, the obligations of obedience which the covenant relationship imposes on us. 19 Jackals inhabited ruins and scavenged amongst the dead on the field of battle. 22 For your sake, i.e. as a result of our loyalty to you.

23–26 The God of the future: a cry for help. All unite in an urgent cry for help. They pray against apparent divine idleness and forgetfulness (23–24); they plead the extremity of their need and call for action because they know that his love remains unchanged (25–26). 23 The boldness of prayer. 25 We are so personally precious to the Lord that we can come pleading our need. 26 Redeem, ‘pay the price’, i.e. provide out of your own resources whatever is required to meet our need. Unfailing love, love centred in the will, the love to which the Lord has obligated himself.

Psalm 45. The bridegroom king and his royal bride

A truly noble theme (1)—a king who is king indeed, and on his wedding day! The psalm is in seven sections:

- A¹ (v 1) The poet’s enthusiasm for the king
- B¹ (v 2) The king’s beauty
- C¹ (vs 3–5) The king’s progress
- D (vs 6–9) The king in all his glory
- B² (vs 10–11) The bride’s beauty
- C² (vs 12–15) The bride’s procession
- A² (vs 16–17) The poet’s wish for the king

Composed for an actual royal wedding and motivated by devotion to an earthly king, this psalm, like all royal psalms, runs beyond what any earthly king could be, to the longed-for Messiah in whom all the glories are true. Likewise it speaks tellingly to the Bride of Christ of her true position, beauty and dedication (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:27; Rev. 14:4; 19:7; 21:9).

1–2 The poet’s enthusiasm for the king. The king, or ‘a king!’, i.e. a king who is king indeed. 2 Excellent or ‘beautiful’—evidenced primarily in graciousness of speech (Lk. 4:22; Jn. 7:46). Since, ‘Therefore’, i.e. his speech demonstrates that he has been blessed by God.

3–5 The king’s progress: world dominion. Kings conquer by war, hence the military terms here, just as of the ‘prince of peace’ in Isaiah 9; 4, 5, 7, but in the ultimate reality (see 149)

the fall of the nations to the true David is by the sword of his mouth (Rev. 1:16; 19:11–16) and the weapon of the gospel (Eph. 6:15–17). Truth (Jn. 18:37). Humility and righteousness, in the Hebrew ‘humility-righteousness’, nouns in apposition, ‘righteousness in its essential humility’ (Zc. 9:9; Mt. 11:29; 2 Cor. 10:1; Phil. 2:7–8).

6–9 The king in all his glory. The seven glories of the king: (i) His divine nature (6). Many emendations have been suggested for the text here, not because there is textual uncertainty but to avoid the ascription of deity to the king. But the text is sound and the OT enigma of the Messiah who is God and who yet worships God (7) awaits its resolution in Jesus (Eph. 1:17; Heb. 1:8); (ii) His upright rule (6, 7): officially (sceptre) and personally (love ... hate) the king is holy, (Is. 11:3–5); (iii) His human superiority (7). Outwardly a man among men (your God ... companions), there is also the inner secret of his divine anointing (Lk. 4:18); (iv) His fragrant person (8, 2 Cor 2:14); (v) His rich situation (8) where everything outward speaks of royal wealth and everything within is for the delight of the king. (vi) His honoured attendants (9), the kings of the earth gladly providing for the staffing of his household. (vii) The seventh glory of the king is his bride (9). The list began with the king on his throne (6); it ends with the shared throne, the bride beside the king (9).

10–11 The bride’s beauty, devotion to the king. Gn. 2:24 requires that, from marriage onwards a son should become primarily a husband; great stress is laid here (Listen, consider ... give ear) on a daughter becoming a wife. King’s daughter though she is (13), now her whole devotion must be for the king, responding to his love (enthralled, ‘desires for himself’), sensitive to his dignity (honour) and acceptive of his status (lord).

12–15 The bride’s procession to the palace. Submissive to him (11), but what dignity is now hers! The subjects of the king (12, cf. 5) are her subjects, she enjoys glory and splendour (13) but, above all, she is united intimately with the king (14) and shares his palace (15). The homage of Tyre (12) is a messianic motif (see 87:4; cf. Is. 23). Tyre came to typify the world in its proud independence and self-sufficiency, its accumulation of wealth without scruple. But one day the kings of the earth will bring their wealth to the feet of the king (Rev. 21:24).

16–17 The poet’s wish for the king. However glorious the past may have been, the king is orientated to the future and to the children who will effect his rule over the whole earth.

Psalm 46. Faith and fact

Many link this psalm (and 47, 48) with the suggestion of an (annual) drama enacted in the temple, celebrating the Lord’s kingship over all the earth (like Ascension Day, cf. 47:5). Such a festival would be grounded in the Lord’s victory over the ‘world’ at the exodus and look forward to the final and climactic Day of the Lord (See Introduction.) Others point out that Come and see (8) sounds more like an invitation to survey an actual victory than to watch a drama (cf. walk ... count ... consider, 48:12–13). In this case an event like the Lord’s victory over Sennacherib (Is. 36, 37) provides an excellent setting: the combined nations of the Assyrian Empire came against Zion and met their match.

The psalm consists of a profession of faith (1–6) and the facts which vindicate faith (8–10).

1–6 (a) Faith in divine help (1, 2): even were the world to collapse, God is present to protect (refuge) and help. (b) Faith in divine purpose (3, 4): even earth-shaking catastrophes are a river, contained within bounds, designed for the joy of the city where the Lord dwells. (c) Faith in divine sovereignty (5, 6): as soon as the Lord speaks the storm of the nations is stilled. 1 The refuge to hide in, the strength to bear the trial, the help that stands at the ready. 3, 4 There is adds interpretatively to the Hebrew text. Rather understand v 4 as a comment on v 3: what are these surging, destructive waters but a river. Even a cosmic disaster is totally controlled and purposeful (5, 6). The same is true of human foes, the uproar of nations. It is enough for the Lord to speak, so total is his sovereign sway. 5 Break of day, ‘when morning comes’, cf. the references to ‘morning’ in Ex. 14:24; 2 Ki. 19:35. 7 With us ... fortress. The refrain (cf. 11) encapsulates the movement of the preceding stanza. Since he is our refuge (1) we run to him; as the God within (5), he comes to us. So we sing that he is with us and is also our fortress (an inaccessibly high place, a ‘top-security’) to which we run for safety.

8–10 The Lord has effectively disposed of the threat: the war is over and the means of making further war destroyed. The voice which rules all (cf. 6) now commands rest (10a) and offers reassurance (10bc) (see 48:12). Psalm 46 invites inspection of an enemy destroyed; Psalm 48 of a city intact. 9 shields, ‘wagons’, the supply wagons bringing the material of war or the circle of wagons (1 Sa. 17:20) encircling the enemy camp. 10 Be still, ‘relax’. I will be, better ‘I am’, is the present reality of a sovereign God that enables rest.

Psalm 47. One God, one king, one people

The Lord’s victory over the earth (46:8, 9) is not intended to end in international despondency but joy. Psalm 47 calls for universal acclaim of such a God (1). This summons is explained (2 begins with ‘For’) by the Lord’s worldwide status as King. The evidence for this is what he has done for Israel in power (3) and love (4). Consequently the truth of the exalted God can be reiterated (5). The same sequence is now repeated: invitation to praise (6, cf. 1), explanation, the universal King (7–8, cf. 2), the favoured people (9, cf. 3–4) and the exalted God (9, cf. 5).

But, second time round, the emphasis is different: Israel is exalted over the nations by providence (3) and election (4); in v 9 the nations, represented by their nobles, are incorporated as the people of the God of Abraham, the Abrahamic promise is fulfilled and all nations find blessedness (Gn. 12:1–3). If God has ascended, ‘gone up’. i.e. having ‘come down’ to gain the victory, suggests a background to the psalm, we may think of the exodus (Ex. 3:8) or maybe the divine victory over David’s foes (18:9) or (best of all) the Sennacherib incident (Is. 31:4). But in any event in this psalm the OT looks gloriously forward to the greater ‘coming down’ of God in Christ to gather into one the scattered children of God (Jn. 11:52: cf. Is. 19:23–25; 60:1–3; 66:20), and to a greater ascension to universal kingship, actual (Eph. 1:20–23) and ultimate (Phil. 2:9–11).

Psalm 48. This is our God

The theme of elation after a great deliverance is continued but with this difference, that while Psalm 46 focuses on the threat that was removed and Psalm 47 on the Lord’s purposes of grace for the enemies that were overthrown, Psalm 48 stresses how unscathed is the city that had been in such danger (12, 13).

- A¹ (vs 1–2) The great God and his joyful city
- B¹ (vs 3–7) Divine greatness in action
- B² (vs 8–10) Divine greatness in experience
- A² (vs 11–14) The joyful city and its great God

It is easy to see how this psalm could be presented dramatically within a temple festival (see 9), but it is impossible not to feel the freshness of close experience in the description of the rout of the kings (3–7), in the claim we have seen (8) and in the invitation to survey the intact city (12, 13). This is a psalm of danger past and full deliverance present, an experience not unknown to us who live in the present, true Zion (Heb. 12:22) as, time and again, we find that our approaching dreads meet their match in our ever-present God.

1, 2 The great God and his joyful city. Not, ‘How blessed we are to live in a well-fortified city on its mountain site!’ but ‘How great the Lord is in his city, on his mountain,’ a great king indeed! His holy mountain, ‘mountain of his holiness’, where he dwells in holiness. Whole earth, that which will bring joy to the whole earth, in the fulfilment of the Abrahamic promise (47:9). Like, should be omitted. Zaphon was the dwelling of Baal. To say that (lit.) ‘Mount Zion (is) the topmost peak of Zaphon’ neatly claims that the Lord overtops all gods and that Zion is the genuine place of divine dwelling.

3–7 Divine greatness in action. An affirmation of divine indwelling and protection followed (3) (4 begins not with when but ‘For, behold’) by a proof: the fact of the rout of the kings (4, 5) illustrated by travail (6) and storm (7). 3 Fortress, ‘top-security’ (46:7). 4 Kings (2:2), figurative of the ceaseless hostility of the world to the people of God but here typified in the advance of the multinational army of Sen-nacherib (Is. 10:8). 5 Astounded, here, ‘bewildered’ so that ‘they hurried off in terror’. 6, 7 an illustration of inner feeling followed by one of external force. Ships of Tarshish, capable of braving the ‘open sea’, man’s greatest maritime achievements, but as nothing before the winds of God.

8–10 Divine greatness in experience. Cf. they saw (5) with have we seen (8): same sight, different reactions! They saw what terrorized; we see our security in God. 9 We meditate. It is possible to translate ‘we portray’ (as in dramatic presentation) but the meaning ‘to form a mental picture/to meditate upon’ is well-exemplified (50:21; cf. Is. 10:7); 10 Hand symbolizes personal action. Righteousness, all that is right as God sees it.

11–14 The joyful city and its great God. A dramatic ending: the city joyful, and unscathed (11–13), but then nothing more about the city—a testimony to the God who is ever his people’s guide (14). 11 Judgments, what God ‘judged right to do’. 14 ‘For such is God—our God for ever and ever! He it is who will guide us even to death.’ The reference to ‘death’ is (as NIV) a strong expression of divine constancy: he will never leave us; but also it affirms that he who delivered us from the threat of death at the hand of foes will surely also deliver from death itself.

Psalm 49. Divine redemption and eternal hope

Psalm 49 may well owe its position here to the last words of Psalm 48. Is it true that when death itself threatens we may rely on the Lord to be our Guide? The triumphant answer comes that God will redeem my soul from the grave (15). Verses like 6:5; 30:9; 88:4–5 are frequently quoted to show that the OT entertained no hope after death, but the verses in question are all spoken by people who understood themselves (rightly or wrongly) to be dying under wrath, alienated from God. In such a death there is no hope, but in fact they were speaking not of all death, only of their particular experience.

Psalm 49 (cf. 73) puts the alternatives clearly: there is a death without hope (13, 14) and there is a death full of hope (15). Man can die like the beasts (12) or he can die with understanding (20). This is the solution to the universal riddle (1–4) which the psalmist sets out to solve. First (5–12) he faces the fact that death comes to all. The starting point of his thoughts was the oppressiveness of those whose wealth gives them power to threaten others (5, 6) and he began to comfort himself with the thought that wealth cannot buy everything (7–9): death marks the point at which human ransom-money ceases to have currency. All alike, wise or foolish, die (10) and then earthly wealth achieves no more than a lasting tomb (11). But, secondly, (13–19) death is not the end: there are destinies beyond the grave to be taken into account. Self-reliance, however much admired on earth, leads to death and decay, while those who are right with God can look forward to redemption and the presence of God (13–15). Consequently, do not be agitated by life's inequalities (16); death is the great leveller and in contrast to their earthly experience, there is no light for such beyond the grave (17–19).

2 Low and high, better 'all mankind alike'. 3 Understanding, 'discernment', the word to which the psalm returns in v 20—the discernment that there is another life in which earthly notions of power and influence do not operate; a life denied to the self-reliant (13) and enjoyed only by divine redemption (15). 4 Ear ... expound. Hearing before speaking. Such knowledge as can solve the riddle of life and death must come from hearing the word of God. 6 For the first time (see also 13) the key idea of trust is mentioned. Self-reliance is the foe of a blessed destiny after death. 7–9 Redeem ... ransom, the first word emphasizes finding the price, the second, covering the need. But no payment is sufficient to buy eternal life. Life of another. The Hebrew says 'even a brother', i.e. even in a case where love would hold nothing back. There is a case where payment can commute the death penalty (Ex. 21:30)—but Death itself cannot be bought off! 10 The foolish, one who acts lightheartedly towards life and its obligations, who is self-centred and never looks beyond short-term advantage. Senseless, insensitive to spiritual realities. 11 Their tombs. Hebrew 'Inwardly to them', 'their inner assumption is'. Their horizons are those of this world so that even—Oh the irony of it!—(lit.) 'They named lands after themselves!' 13 See v 6. 14 Grave ... grave 'Sheol', the place where the dead live on. Feed on 'shepherd'. The upright. Those who can die right with God (Nu. 23:10); whose life conforms to God's way (1 Ki. 15:5); acceptable to God (Jb 1:1); those whom the Lord saves (Ps. 7:10). Rule, heavenly reversal of the earthly relationships of v 5 (cf. Lk. 16:22–25). Morning (17:15), on awakening after death. 15 Redeem, God will find and pay the price impossible for man (7). Grave, 'from the hand of Sheol', the power of Sheol to receive and hold the unredeemed (14). Take as in Gn. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2:1; Ps. 73:24. 20 Throughout the psalm the wealthy have been a case in point but the truth applies to all: it is not wealth that disqualifies for a blessed eternity but lack of true discernment (see 3).

Psalm 50. Let off with a caution!

The scene is Judgment Day, with the whole earth (1) summoned before God. In particular the covenant people (4, 5) are called before the divine judge (6). They are arraigned in two companies: those who love religious rites (8) but neglect thankfulness, obedience and prayer (14, 15), and those who recite the law (16) but do not keep it (17–21). The psalm ends (22, 23) by calling these two groups to amendment. The central section (7–21) has the same 'shape' as the Covenant Service in Exodus 24:3–8 where the ritual of sacrifice and blood (vs 4–6) is followed by the recital of the law (vs 7, 8). The psalm is thus very suited to a festival of covenant renewal, providing as it does a framework for personal self-examination.

1–6 The court convened. When the Judge, the defendants and the place of session have been announced (1–2), three voices speak in turn: that God is coming to speak (in judgment 3); that he is coming as the holy God of Sinai in fire and storm (cf. Ex. 19:16–18) and that judgment is to begin at the house of God (4; cf. 1 Pet. 4:17). When the court is thus in session, the Judge summons his people (5, 6). 1 The Mighty One, God, the LORD This triple formula is only elsewhere used in Joshua 22:22 when the transjordanian tribes were accused of apostasy and used it in affirmation. As such it suits this psalm where reality of loyalty is in question. 3 Not silent. Judgment will not be by an unexplained act where people might or might not recognize it as the work of God. All will be openly stated. 4 Heavens ... earth. (cf. Dt. 4:26; 1 Ch. 16:31; Ps. 69:34f; Is. 1:2; Je. 2:12). Here, the created order comes as a witness for the prosecution, having silently observed all that has been done (see 6). 5 Consecrated. The word blends ‘beloved (by God)’ and ‘devoted (to God)’. Covenant ... sacrifice. (Ex. 24:3ff.) 6 If the heavens have witnessed human faults (4), they have also witnessed divine righteousness and can affirm the Lord’s fitness to be judge.

7–21 The charge. The summons (7) is followed by two arraignments (8–15, 16–21). 7 is full of Exodus-themes: My people recalls Ex. 7:16, the chosen people; Israel is the Lord’s ‘first-born’, the object of redemption (Ex. 4:22); God, your God, reflects Ex. 20:2, the title of the redeeming God.

8–15 Ritual formalism, those who revelled in the sacrifices (8) but mistook their purpose, thinking that by them they were somehow enriching God (9–13) and failing to live responsively to God in thanksgiving, obedience and reliant prayer (14, 15). 8 The Lord cannot rebuke what he commanded and as far as the material of sacrifice is concerned there is nothing to rebuke. The ritualist is always punctilious. 9–13 But they fell into two traps: that God needed what they had (9–11), and that God depended on what they gave (12, 13). They thought that religion is man reaching out to God, serving him and ministering to him, the deepest of all religious errors. 13 Pagan religions around Israel thought that their gods were nourished by the sacrifices that were offered. The same error is committed whenever the mere round of religious life becomes important in its own right. 14, 15 True religion, however, is responding, thankfully (for his grace, goodness, etc.), obediently (in fulfilment of the covenant vow to keep his word, Ex. 24:7), prayerfully (relying on him to prove sufficient for every trouble) and worshipfully (giving him the honour that is his due).

16–21 Credal formalism, people who are careful to say all the right things (16) but whose life contradicts their profession (17–21). They hate the word of God (17) and disobey his commandments (18a [eighth commandment], 18b [seventh], 19 [ninth]); they offend him by empty formalism in church, wilful disobedience in life, compromise in relationships, corruptness in speech and lovelessness in the home. And to crown it, they build their theology on the forbearing silence of God (21), holding the Lord to be as morally indifferent as they are themselves.

22, 23 The caution. Divine mercy forbears. The deserved sentence is still future and the door of salvation still open (21–23). 22 addresses those (16–21) whose lives belie their profession. Their problem is not that they disregard the law but that they forget God—as one present with them, aware of their offensive conduct, as the holy One, commanding his people to be like him (Lv. 19:2). 23 addresses those (8–15) whose religion is mere punctiliousness: they are reminded that true religion is responsive to what God has done (cf. 14), and thoughtful in lifestyle (23, ‘he who acts thoughtfully in [his] way [of life]’). Finally, the psalm which began with the Lord calling to judgment (1–6) ends with him offering salvation (23).

Psalm 51. The marvel of repentance

The psalm and its title belong together like hand and glove. The efficacy of repentance (1–4) is an exact commentary on 2 Samuel 12:13. The problem of v 16, which appears to deny that sacrifices are acceptable to God, is solved by recalling that David’s sins of adultery (2 Sa. 11:4) and murder (2 Sa. 11:14–17) were not covered by sacrificial provision. It is often urged that vs 18, 19 are later additions designed to make the psalm suitable for congregational use and to counter the rejection of sacrifice in vs 16, 17. But (apart from the fact that the psalm cannot be adapted by making it self-contradictory!) David, as king, could not sin simply as a private individual: his sin threatened the fabric of public life. Consequently, he would be as anxious for the building up of Jerusalem (18) as for his own restoration.

1–6 God and the individual: repentance and forgiveness. In God there is mercy, free, unmerited favour (Gn. 6:8); love, unchanging love based on solemn commitment; compassion, surging, passionate love (1). Sin is transgression, deliberate ‘rebellion’ against the known will of God (1); iniquity (2), the inner ‘warp’ of the fallen nature; sin (2), specific wrong. The sinner desires God to blot out his sin, ‘wipe clean’ the stain God can see; wash, reach into the fibres of his nature to purge ingrained filth; cleanse, remove sin as a barrier to fellowship with God. (2).

3–6 Repentance; its effect and necessity. The prayer for cleansing (1, 2) rests on the simple fact of acknowledgment (know) and awareness (before me, i.e. subjectively felt, 38:17) of sin (cf. 32:3, 4). 4 Against you. Whatever hurt sin brings to self or others the heart of sinfulness is that it offends God (2 Sa. 12:13). So that, ‘in order that’. Were the sinner to cry, ‘You are sovereign. Why did you not stop me?’ the Lord would reply, ‘In order to bring you to recognize your sinfulness and my righteousness. It is my purpose that you should know me as I am, the righteous God and the just judge. Only then will you fly to me for cleansing.’ 5 The inheritance of a sinful nature does not, biblically, excuse the sinner but sets him in the place of mounting guilt (Mt. 23:34–36). At birth ... conceived. This does not question the holiness of the processes of conception and birth, but rather affirms that from the moment of conception there existed a moral human person, the infant at birth, the foetus at conception. Thus repentance must take into account both actual sins (1–3) and this infection inseparable from human nature. 6 In all of human nature sin is without excuse because it is contrary to God’s desire, and contrary to the wisdom of God taught by the all-pervasive voice of conscience.

7–15 The dimensions of true repentance. 7 seeks divine dealing with sin; 8 with the sinner as crushed by divine wrath; 9 with the offence given to God by sin. Cleanse, ‘de-sin’. Hyssop, the sprinkling instrument effecting propitiation of divine wrath (Ex. 12:12, 22, 23), ending exclusion and alienation (Lv. 14:6), purifying from defilement (Nu. 19:16–19). David knows of no sacrifice that will suffice (16) but he is confident that the Lord does. Joy ... gladness, the restoration of the sinner to the joyful songs of the sanctuary (42:4); bones, restoration to personal wholeness. Hide, deal, within your own nature, with your holy abhorrence of my sin. Blot out, both from your memory and from my record (1).

10–12 The true penitent longs to be rid of sin through the creation of a new nature bringing the power of constancy, the continuing favour of God and the presence of his Holy Spirit (10–11), the joy of deliverance and the gift of a spirit/Spirit ready to do God’s will (12). Saul had lost the immediate benefits (1 Sa. 16:14) but not the ultimate reality (1 Sa. 28:19) of salvation and, doubtless with this example in his mind, David feared lest the same experience might be his—just as we too can grieve (Eph. 4:30) and quench (1 Thes. 5:19) the Holy Spirit, losing the joys but not the reality of his indwelling. 13–15 Teaching about God promotes repentance (13), but the teacher must take his own need of repentance seriously, exemplifying in himself what he desires to see in them. Only as a penitent can he sing of God’s righteousness (14)—that wondrous righteousness whereby he is both just and the justifier (Is. 45:21; Rom. 3:26). But testimony must rest, too, upon prayer that the Lord will grant the opening of the mouth.

16–19 God and the community: what pleases the Lord. The renewed community is composed of penitent individuals (16, 17), seeks its security in God's favour and delights him with its religious observances (18–19). These verses share the themes of the Lord's delight, his pleasure, and sacrifice and burnt offering. The sin offering is not mentioned but only sacrifices speaking of commitment to God (the burnt offering, Gn. 22:2, 12) and fellowship with God and his people (where sacrifice is used with burnt offering, it means 'peace offering'). David's own experience taught him that getting right with God was a matter of the heart (17). This is the message he wished to share with others (16 begins with 'For') and now to make a foundational reality in the new community. Build ... the walls is metaphorical, 'to make the community secure'. Then, i.e. when penitent sinners (16, 17) rest on God for their security (18), religion becomes delightful to the Lord: righteous sacrifices, sacrifices which are all that God meant them to be.

Psalm 52. The uprooted tree and the flourishing tree

The NIV enlarges and alters the Hebrew text of v 1, which simply reads: 'How you boast of evil, big man! The unfailing love of God is the same every day.' The self-made man, Doeg (1 Sa. 21–22), seized his opportunity, and by being 'economical with the truth' and ruthless in action could boast of his own success. But as compared with the self-sufficient Doeg, David asserts that nothing will ever make God anything but on his side. The correctness of restoring the Hebrew text in v 1 is proved by vs 8, 9 which recapitulate the same topics in reverse order: the boast of evil (1) is matched by the praise of the name that is good (9); the unfailing love which continues all day (1b, Hebrew) is elaborated into the unfailing love that lasts for ever (8). The message of the psalm is, then, that God's love is sufficient even against triumphant ruthlessness, constant through the day of pressure (1) and the same for ever (8).

- A¹ (v 1) Alternative securities
- B¹ (vs 2–4) The destructive tongue
- C (v 5) Divine action
- B² (vs 6–7) The triumphant tongue
- A² (vs 8–9) True security

1 (A¹) Alternative securities: human strength or divine love. Boast, self-satisfaction and self-confidence.

2 (B¹) The destructive tongue. Tongue, always a primary indicator of character. 3 The character behind the tongue: in respect of ethical values and standards of truth. 4 Deceitful (cf. 2), an intent to mislead. Doeg told the truth only up to the point where it could do most harm.

5 (C) Divine action. Surely, 'also', i.e. a parallel act of God, an exact requital directed at personal (you), domestic (tent) and earthly (land) sides of life.

6–7 (B²) The triumphant tongue. Laugh, not vindictively or maliciously (Jb. 31:29; Pr. 24:17) but a joyful response to the intervention of divine justice (6, fear) and the proof that apart from God there is no stronghold (7).

8–9 (A²) True security. The flourishing tree, in contrast to the uprooted tree (5), is settled in the presence of God, marked by trust, assured of divine unfailing love (8); characterized by a tongue of praise (9, contrast 1, 2), ever-expectant (hope) that God will be true to his name, and bearing testimony among God's saints, those whom he loves and who love him back (9).

Psalm 53. No need to be afraid

Though parallel to Psalm 14, Psalm 53 focuses the same truth on a different subject. The key variation comes in v 5. 14:5 remarks on the dread which seized the foes of the Lord's people when the realization dawned that the Lord was in the company of the righteous; 53:5 rebukes needless fear felt by God's people when faced by their foes (4), since God scattered their opponents. Together, therefore, the psalms exhibit contrasting facets of the same situation: when danger threatens, their enemies have everything to fear and God's people have nothing to fear. For some detailed comment, see Psalm 14.

5 Restore 'for' before God scattered. The past tense indicates that David is drawing a lesson from an incident that has taken place but it can express a 'settled characteristic', i.e. 'God scatters'. Fear is always groundless (nothing to dread) because he always takes counteraction.

Psalm 54. The saving Name

Ziph was in the remote south of Judah and it was surely a deeply hurtful thing to David to find his own people turned against him, right though their loyalty to Saul was. As is usual in psalms with historical headings, the topic raised by the heading is generalized. David does not mention the Ziphites here, any more than he mentions Doeg in Psalm 52 but, in both psalms, takes the opportunity to record how such situations should be faced: (i) by prayer (1, 2). By your name, by acting according to your revealed nature. Save ... vindicate, respectively the immediate threat, and the fundamental issue—that David was being wrongly regarded and treated as a treasonous person. (ii) By recollection of the truth (3–5). First, the character of his opponents (3), secondly, the character of his God (4), and finally, prayer for divine retributive action. Strangers actually were David's fellow-Judahites but they were acting like ruthless aliens, because where there is no regard for God there can be no reckoning on fidelity or humanity. Lord, 'Sovereign One'. Recoil ... destroy, the former refers to the 'boomerang' aspect of sin, a retribution built into the nature of things; the latter to direct divine moral providence. (iii) By commitment for the future (6, 7). This is not to be understood as bargaining with God (If you do this for me I promise to ...) but as a spiritual response to divine goodness. As he stands by his name (1), so we should praise his name (6). For he has delivered or 'It', the Lord's name in action. Looked, not gloating, but observing that he has been preserved in life to see his deadly foes routed.

Psalm 55. Solutions, deceptive and real

The sequence I said (6) ... I call (16) ... I trust (23) expresses the movement of this psalm. In dire straits (1–5), David would gladly flee from the whole situation (6–8) but chooses to counter ceaseless opposition (10) by ceaseless prayer (17) and so rests in trust (23).

A¹ (vs 1–3) Prayer because of the enemy

B (vs 4–21) Solutions

b¹ (vs 4–8) A solution in flight?
b² (vs 9–21) The solution in prayer
A² (vs 22–23) Trust in the face of the enemy

1–3 At the end of my tether there is a place called Prayer. Thoughts trouble, (2) ‘I am at my wits’ end’; distraught, demoralized. 3 Stares, better ‘pressure’; revile, ‘bear a grudge’: what they say (voice), their pressuring, the ‘trouble’ (suffering) which they bring down (‘make to slip [like an avalanche]’, cf. 22), the animosity they cherish (anger). Such may be the experience of the believer. The lesson David learned was to make the pressure of people press him to prayer.

4–8 Getting away from it all. 4, 5 outline the problem; 6–8 offer an attractive solution. 4 is in anguish, ‘writhes’. 5 Horror, ‘shuddering’. We do not know what situation David refers to but NIV’s five nouns and three verbs leave us in no doubt of its deadly, terrifying nature. 6–8 contain all the appeal of solving problems by flight—to enjoy rest, be undisturbed and find shelter while the storm rages elsewhere.

9–21 The sharpest blow, the surest solution—prayer. 9–11 Constant pressure: day and night. 12–14 The deepest grief, fellowship violated. 15–19 Constant prayer: evening, morning, noon. 20, 21 The deepest grief, covenant violated.

The answer is not fleeing from the situation, but calling God into the situation; not the natural solution of escapism but the spiritual solution of prayer. 9 David prayed a similar prayer in 2 Samuel 15:31, but the psalm did not originate there: for at that point David was in flight—though not into peace. Here the danger is right inside the city and David is our example in countering it by direct and vigorous prayer. 10 Malice ... abuse, ‘mischief ... trouble’. 12–14 Among the company opposing him (9, 10, 15, 19) one inflicts the saddest blow, a friend (13) and one-time spiritual confidant (14). David is walking in the shadow cast by a coming, greater betrayal (Mt. 26:47, 48; Mk. 14:43–45; Lk. 22:47, 48. Note how all the accounts say ‘one of the twelve’.)

15 We will be in a position to criticize the boldness of David’s prayer here when we have stood in a like danger—to ourselves (4, 5) and to others (9–11), (cf. 2 Ki. 2:24). The Lord Jesus, in his perfection, pronounced a woe upon Judas (Mt. 26:24). The prayer matches God’s law (Dt. 19:19) by requesting for them what they threatened to him (4); it also mirrors the action of God himself when, earlier, his appointed leader was threatened (Nu. 16:28–33). Yet note that the motive (15) for this dire prayer is not the threat they constitute to David, but the fact that they have opened themselves as a lodging-house for (plural of amplification) ‘every sort of evil’. The prayer is a product of moral conviction. 16–19 David’s prayer is a committed policy, I call (16), emphatic, ‘But I for my part ... ’; a sustained discipline, evening, morning, ... noon (17); and rests on what the Lord does—saves (16), hears (17), ransoms (finds the total and sufficient solution for my need, 18)—and on what the Lord is—enthroned (19).

22, 23 A counsel, a confidence, a truth and an example. In v 23, for but read ‘for’. The counsel to others to commit all to God in the confidence that he will sustain arises from what is true about the Lord in his opposition to the wicked. Thus the verses pinpoint what you should do, what the Lord does, for the righteous (those right with him, (22)); for the wicked (23); and what I do (23). 22 Cast, ‘Throw’, vigorous action. Cares, ‘allocation’, what is allotted to you. Sustain, the promise is not to remove the burden but to sustain the person. Fall, from the same verb as ‘cause to slip’ (3). However heavy the avalanche of trouble that slips down, the righteous will not be suffered to slip.

Psalm 56. Fear and faith

When I am afraid (3) ... I will not be afraid (4). This paradox expresses the heart of the psalm. The situation is recorded in 1 Samuel 21:10–15 and is commented on in Psalm 34 (a subsequent meditation: that it was not the cleverness of 1 Sa. 21:12, 13 but prayer that effected escape) as well as here—a contemporaneous meditation while David experienced house-arrest in Gath, presumably being held as a top-person hostage. The psalm consists of six balanced sections: David, the object of man's hostility (1, 2) is the object of God's care (9–11); the trust which counters fear (3, 4) is a trust which issues in prayer (7–8); and David under oppression by man (5, 6) becomes David under vow to God (12, 13).

1, 2 One brief cry to God amid a concentration on surrounding danger. Contrast 12, 13, one reference to danger amid a concentration on God! Such is the effect of trust (3, 4) working by prayer (9–11). When the eye is turned on Jesus 'the things of earth will grow strangely dim'. 3, 4 When, 'The day' i.e. 'at the very time'. Whose word. Trust is not a 'feeling' that all will work out for the best. It is a conviction arising from what God has himself said, a confidence in promises. In v 1 men is a word pin-pointing the frailty of humankind; here mortal man, 'flesh' implies a contrast with God (Is. 31:3; 2 Ch. 32:8), weakness contrasting with strength (cf. 11). Thus when faith turns to God as revealed in his word, perspective alters. 5, 6 How true to the double situation in which David found himself!—Saul's court twisting his words and plotting; the Philistines watching his steps (as surely they would when the killer of Goliath had the affrontery to appear in Gath!). 7, 8 balancing vs 1, 2: a plea for divine care. 7 should probably read 'On account of their iniquity, can there be escape for them?' The nations, here, rather, 'these people'. 8 Every sorrow we feel (tears), every occasion of grief (record) is stored in heaven for divine action. 9–11 When (9), 'The day': in v 3, it was the day of trust; here the day of prayer, for prayer is the first way in which true trust expresses itself and, in turn, leads to a more fully formed trust: cf. 10, 11 with 3, 4. Man (11), is man as created by God, therefore totally under his sovereign control. 12, 13 Plotting to harm (5) is (lit.) 'upon me, all their thoughts'; in v 12 under vows to you is 'upon me, your vows'. The more the world threatens, the greater our commitment—not by way of striking a bargain with God, but to show determination to advance spiritually as a result of experience endured and deliverance granted. Indeed, v 13 (that I may); this is the very purpose God had in mind in granting deliverance.

Psalm 57. 'Through the night of doubt and sorrow' in the care or under the wings?

This psalm asks the question, 'Where are you?' The title says David was in the cave (more probably 1 Sa. 21 than 1 Sa. 24) but David places himself in you, in the shadow of your wings (1). In flight from Saul, and about to spend a night (4, I lie, 'lie down') as a lone fugitive, the cave looms above him, but he sees it as the outspread wings of his God. Because of this, the opening cry of prayer (1) turns into a concluding cry of praise (9, 10); his confidence in prayer (2, 3, I cry ... he sends) turns into steadfastness in praise (7, 8); and his sense of the power of his enemies (4) becomes a conviction that they are doomed (6). Yet what is important to David is not that he should be delivered or his enemies trapped but that God should be exalted in glory (5, 11).

1 Mercy, unmerited grace. 2, 3 Confidence ('as I cry so he sends') arises from a sense of God: supremely exalted, God Most High; irresistible in purpose (fulfils ... purpose, cf. Phil. 1:6); and of 'changeless love' and faithfulness. 5 How true to life that the buoyant spirit of 2, 3 is at once challenged by the threats of life (4)! What a lesson in spirituality that, with equal immediacy, the threats are challenged by a cry to the exalted God! 6 With the recollection of God (5) comes the assurance that evil will be its own downfall. 7, 8 David has faced (4) and then, by seeking God's glory (5), has outfaced the foe. He now summons himself to praise. Soul, (lit.) 'glory', probably a metaphor for offering 'my very best' to God. Awaken. Having tried to settle to sleep amid danger (4), David now feels ready to face the new day with praise. 9–11 David takes seriously that wider purposes than his personal triumph will be fulfilled, including a world-wide role, for he was chosen to be king over a nation which had a special calling in relation to all the nations (Gn. 12:3). And he had so faced his difficulties that he now had a valid testimony to God's love and faithfulness.

Psalm 58. The only help, the great appeal

While doubt surrounds the translation of rulers (1), it is plain that those who administer justice (whether human judges or angelic beings charged with maintaining order on earth) are failing to do so (2). Consequently, appeal is made to God (6) to intervene, and the psalm ends with joy for the righteous (10) and public awareness of a just God (11). The intermediate sections (3–5, 7–9) deal respectively with the character and doom of the wicked. This psalm speaks profoundly in respect of injustice on earth and the failure and connivance of those in whom its administration is vested. We are being simply unrealistic if we shy away from the rigour of v 6 for instances abound where we rightly cry to God to stop the mouth of injustice in high places.

1, 2 Righteousness violated. Rulers, (lit.) 'silence', possibly 'Can it be that in silence you speak righteousness?', i.e. serve the cause of justice by keeping quiet. A small vowel-change offers 'mighty ones', whether earth's great ones or heavenly principalities and powers.

3–5 The character of the wicked. Deviancy (astray ... wayward) and falsehood (lies) are their birth-inheritance (cf. 51:5); they carry a poison within, and are incorrigible: (lit.) 'like a deaf cobra that stops its ears', both unable and unwilling to hear any call to be different (4; cf. Rom. 1:28–32; Tit. 3:3).

6 The great appeal. Since the accusation pinpointed speech (1), divine judgment is invited to stop the mouths of those who abuse their position and to destroy their power to hurt. This is holy realism—like asking God to bankrupt the firms of arms dealers, or to make terrorist bombs explode in the hands of those who make or set them. If people are irreversibly set in their ways and immune to appeal, nothing is left but to consign them to God the all-holy.

7–9 The doom of the wicked. Four pictures of 'coming to nothing': water running off the surface of the ground and vanishing (7); a discharged arrow which 'as it were withers'—falls to the ground like a dead leaf (7); a slug 'that goes away to melting', leaving only an empty shell (8); a pregnancy that issues in death and not life (8). 9 Before your pots ... is possibly a proverb of suddenness ('Before you can say Jack Robinson'). Dry thorns flare immediately but before the heat can reach the pot ...! Green or dry. The words (lit.) 'living' and 'heat' are not exemplified in this metaphorical meaning. Possibly a reference to the Lord: 'As the Living One, as Wrath itself, he will blow them away'.

10, 11 Righteousness vindicated. Bathe their feet, a metaphor for entering into victory (68:23). Men will say. Exactness in the execution of justice is a potent influence upon society, (Dt. 19:18–21).

Psalm 59. Top security

The psalm falls into two parts (1–10, 11–17). The first begins with a prayer for deliverance (1–2), extending into a prayer for worldwide judgment (5); the second, with a prayer for requital (11–13b) sought as providing worldwide revelation (13cd). Each prayer is followed by the ‘prowling dogs’ theme (6–7, 14–15) and this in turn leads to But you (8–10) and But I (16–17).

The background story in 1 Samuel 19:10–12 suggests a one night ambush at David’s house, but such a story is told only in its essentials and the whole period beginning at 1 Samuel 19:10 leaves plenty of time for the persistent threat of which the Psalm speaks (6, 14). At some point in his flight from Saul, David slipped through the watchers and home to Michal. Saul had to act with circumspection because of David’s popular repute but doubtless hoped at first to despatch David by unattributable murder. When David’s escape made this impossible, the ambush was set.

The recurring theme of the psalm is top-security in God: protect (1), ‘set me on high’; fortress (9, 16, 17), ‘high-refuge’—a height inaccessible to the foe. Note how David moves from the plea, ‘Be my top-security’ (1), to a climax of confidence, ‘You are my top security’ (17).

He started with prayer (1–5). He had a real trust in the sufficiency of prayer: aware of the forces against him (3) it was yet enough to say Deliver ... protect ... save ... arise to help. The appeal for God to bring in, even now, the final, worldwide judgment (5) is a measure of David’s sense of his own innocence (3, 4) of the charges levelled at him: even before that tribunal he would have nothing to fear. But his confidence is not in innocence but in prayer.

He continued with faith (6–10). The prowling dogs return at evening (6) but as David peeps through the lattice it is not in fear of them but watching for God (9), confident of his leading (10) and that he will survive the threat to ‘see the last of’ (not gloat over) his slanderers.

He maintained moral rigour and commitment (11–13). In v 11 David speaks of my people because in principle, though not yet in fact, he is their king. As such, he is not seeking any mere personal relief but wants God to act so that the nation will learn the lesson and the world take note of the moral providence of God at work on earth (13). Likewise, his concern was not ‘getting his own back’ but that sins ... pride ... curses ... lies (12) should be punished.

In the thick of the trouble, God brought a song to David. The dogs were still prowling (14, 15) But (16) ‘as for me, I sing ... (17) I make music’. How astonished the watchers must have been to hear David and Michal at morning and evening worship!

Psalm 60. Unfurling the banner

David was in trouble of his own making. According to 2 Samuel 8:3–7, he caught Hadadezer of Zobah with his back turned. Hadadezer was busy securing his frontier in the far north and David opportunistically invaded the south. But before he could savour his victory, news came that Edom had caught David with his back turned and invaded across the valley of the Dead Sea. With the king and the army miles away, it looked as if the infant kingdom of David would perish before it was well begun. The situation is expressed in brief in v 1: the real danger is not Edom but divine anger (expressed through Edom). Therefore only prayer (now restore us—to your favour) is the answer. The shaken land (2, cf. Ex. 19:18; 1 Sa. 14:15), the wine of staggering (3, cf. Is. 51:17) picture the divine presence and anger, but there is a banner that can be unfurled (4), the banner of prayer (5). For in essence, this is the situation: God has made promises regarding the land, the people and the present enemies (6–8). God alone is our hope (9, 10), therefore prayer is the only way (11). The message is wider than the occasion: in every crisis—even one of our own culpable making—the solution is to repeat the promises of God and to unfurl the banner of prayer. When we are unfaithful, he abides faithful: he cannot deny himself (2 Tim. 2:13).

1 It is characteristic of biblical thinking to trace the desperate times (3) directly to the hand of God. It is not impossible that Hadadezer encouraged Edom to open a second front. But the way to deal with situations is to go straight to the source. Whatever justification David might have had for attacking the Philistines (2 Sa. 8:1) he was not justified in conquering Moab and Ammon (2 Sa. 8:2, 12; cf. Dt. 2:9, 19). To attack Hadadezer was simply to ape the opportunistic policy of worldly powers. No wonder the Lord was angry! 4, 5 Cf. Ex. 17:8–16. Moses saw his uplifted hands as a banner against the enemy and also touching the throne of God in appeal. Doubtless David had this in mind: Edom's attack was like that of Amalek (Dt. 25:17–18). Against the bow or 'in the cause of truth'. 6–8 From his sanctuary, better 'in his holiness': he has pledged his holy word. Shechem ... Succoth, the central areas of Palestine and Transjordan; Gilead ... Manasseh, the northern areas straddling Jordan. These typify the land the Lord promised. Ephraim ... Judah, the two main components of the people to whom the promises had been made. Dignity (helmet ... sceptre) belongs to his people; menial status (washbasin ... sandal) and subordination (over Philistia) to others. 9–11 No longer ... with is transformed to with God by the submissiveness of suppliant prayer. The unfurled banner avails towards God as well as (4, 5) against the foe.

Psalm 61. Fainting heart ... rising prayer

Like many psalms, Psalm 61 opens with prayer and ends with praise. This is a biblical sequence, for prayer begets a confidence in God that expresses itself in praise and is answered by acts of God to which praise is the right response. The initial request is for a hearing (1) spelt out in prayer for security based on past experience of God's protective strength (2, 3), for unending fellowship based on an established relationship (4, 5, translate 'O let me dwell ...'), and for the endless reign of God's king (6, 7). Since the continuance of David's kingship was in question, his flight from Absalom is an acceptable setting for the psalm, but it beautifully speaks to us about a security that lifts us above the threat, a strength within which we are safe, a warmth of loving, protective welcome and a king who ever reigns.

Notes. 2 From the ends, from earth as remote from heaven. Higher than I, such as I could not, unaided, reach. 4 Tent, God's home, as the Tabernacle (Ex. 29:44–46). Wings (Ru. 2:12; Lk. 13:34). 5 The reason (For) behind seeking entrance to God's home: a human vow (of self-commitment, loyalty) and a divine gift of inheritance (Eph. 1:13, 14). 6 David prayed according to the conventional formula, 'May the king live for ever', but the Lord answered by setting on David's throne a truly eternal king (Lk. 1:31–33). Prayer is always answered more fully than we can ask (Eph. 3:20). 8 Praise ... fulfil. Praise without serious and sustained moral commitment is unreal.

Psalm 62. Power working by love

We have much to fear and nothing to rely on or trust in humankind. Consequently, under human pressure in all its reality, where is our resource? Only and perfectly in God! This truth is stated (1, 2), repeated as self-encouragement (5, 6), commended to others (7, 8) and grounded in a word of God (11, 12). This is no 'ivory-tower' doctrine but one proved in the hard school of experience: that people can be very menacing (3, 4) and that the world offers no solution either in its people (9) or its practices (10).

1 along with vs 2, 4, 5, 6, 9 begins with a particle (ignored by NIV) meaning 'But yet'. There are many pressures 'but yet' (1) rest in God; many alternative strengths proposed 'but yet' (2) he alone is my rock; many reasons why the foe cannot succeed 'but yet' (4) they fully intend; and, notwithstanding their intentions in all, their real threat 'but yet' (5) find rest. And should anyone say you need other strengths as well, reply 'but yet' (6) he alone; or if they point out what a help people could be reply 'but yet' (9) men are but a breath. Thus the great truth of the total strength of God to keep his people at rest in life's turmoil has been hammered out in experience, in the face of contrary facts and alternative advice. Finds rest, 'is stillness'. 2 Fortress, top-security (59:1, 9, 16, 17). Never ... shaken NIV omits an adverb, 'never seriously shaken'. This is realism: life has its shaking experiences but v 6 is also true, we cannot be shaken out of our top-security. 3, 4 How true of sinful mankind—to break down the weak (3), dishonour worth, resorting to lies and deceit! How unlike God (Is. 42:3), and his true servants (2 Cor. 4:2; 13:9)! 5 In times of stress it may be necessary to command ourselves to do what we know to be true. 6 Shaken (see v 2). 7 Honour, the reputation and position the enemies would destroy. 8 Pour out. Personal rest in God has to be wrought out in the place of prayer (Phil. 4:6, 7). 9, 10 The command to 'sole-trust' in the Lord is supported by a dissuasive regarding humankind (9), their ways and their resources (10). Low ... high, an idiom for 'all alike'. 11, 12 God has power (unlike man in his insubstantiality, 9) and unchanging love (unlike man's deceitfulness, 9). Not only so, but his loving power is an active force of moral providence (12) whereby he 'fully requites' (reward). Therefore we can trust him for our welfare and against the works of our enemies.

Psalm 63. Morning longings ... night thoughts

David experienced the desert of Judah (title) in his flight from Absalom (2 Sa. 15:23, 28; 16:2, 14; 17:16, 27–29). In that life-sapping heat his thirst was rather for God. Earnestly I seek (1) is rather 'early I seek': his dawn-thoughts cover his present state (1), a thirst for God gripping his whole being (soul ... body); his past experiences (2, 3) of God's power, glory and love enabling him to face the new day with praise; and future (4, 5) responsive praise: a soul ... satisfied and singing lips. But also on my bed there are night-time thoughts, of a past (6, 7) in which, (lit.) 'you have proved to be my help', prompting a song; of a present of mutual commitment (8, I ... to you, your right hand ... me) and consequent safety (9); and of a future bringing judgment, joy and triumph (10–11). This psalm reveals 'not the groping of a stranger, feeling his way towards God, but the eagerness of a friend, almost of a lover, to be in touch with the one he holds dear' (Kidner). David speaks of God's love for him (3) but it is his love for God that makes us pray, 'Oh for grace to love thee more!'

1 God is personally known (my God), given priority in time ('early'), and in desire (in a dry land ... no water). 2 Lit., 'So' I have seen, i.e. as the solution to such a longing as v 1 expresses. God had previously satisfied the longing soul and would surely do so now. 4 Again 'So' I will praise. Places change. David is no longer able to approach the sanctuary, but God does not change. He will still reveal his power, glory and love—even in the desert—and receive praise for it. 9–10 The spirituality of 1–8 is neither escapist nor other-worldly but the very essence of practical living. The situation was one of conflict, thrust upon the king, which must be resolved by victory and defeat. As they are intent on destroying David, it will be their own destruction they will bring about: will be destroyed, 'are bound for destruction'. This is the active moral providence of the love and power of God, which 62:11, 12 affirms. 11 Absalom threatened David as king (cf. 2 Sa. 15:4, 10). In speaking of himself here as king, David is asserting that ‘God’s gifts and his call are irrevocable’ (Rom. 11:29).

Psalm 64. The retributive God

Personal experience and public events often call in question the existence of a just God and an active moral providence. If a good God really ruled the world would there be such imbalance of fortune between plainly good and plainly bad people? Would wrong so often succeed unscathed? This psalm answers by asserting divine retribution. David’s evil-doing (wicked), trouble-making (evildoers) enemies (3) sharpen their sword-tongues and aim poisoned arrow-words, planning well hidden, sudden assault (4); confident in their planning, they act without fear and ask ‘Who will pay heed?’ (5)—scouting the existence of a holy God who observes and reacts. But the very weapons they use will be turned back on them—the arrow and the tongue—and with like suddenness (7–8)! For however cunning the mind of man (6), God knows where to aim and the moral providence they scorned will become a matter of public testimony (8, 9). But God’s just providence which works one way in retribution works also the other way in protection: the voice that prays in trouble for protection becomes the voice that, within the divine refuge, rejoices in praise (10).

- A² (vs 1–2) Praying for protection
- B¹ (vs 3–4) The attack
- C¹ (vs 5–6b) Denial of retribution
- B² (vs 6c–8b) The counterattack
- C² (vs 8c–9) Affirmation of retribution
- A² (v 10) Rejoicing in protection

1–2 Praying for protection. Complaint—not ‘complaining’ but sharing trouble. 2 Conspiracy, ‘clique’

3–4 The attack. Fear, fear of reprisal.

5–6b Denial of divine retribution. Who will see? i.e. ‘look at’ so as to take note and do something about it.

6c–8b The counterattack. Cunning, ‘deep’. Translate ‘Though the mind ... deep, yet God ...’ It is possible to conceal a plan from people but not from God. However deep the heart, his arrow is on target. 8ab is difficult to translate, but NIV establishes the essential point in vs 7, 8 that the wicked are punished with their own weapons (3, 4).

8c–9 Affirmation of divine retribution. Cf. Is. 26:9.

10 Rejoicing in protection. Joy comes before the solution. The acts of God are sudden (7), not necessarily immediate, but while they wait in his protection those who are ‘right with him’ have a joy independent of worldly fortune.

Psalm 65. The crowned year

Every year was ‘crowned’ with the Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles—the removal of sin (Lv. 16) and harvest-thanksgiving (Lv. 23:39; Dt. 16:13–15). But this psalm reflects a year that was markedly special. There had been a notable answer to prayer (2, 5); sin had been an overpowering reality (3); God had done awesome deeds (5), involving stilling the nations (7) and establishing a worldwide reputation (2, 5, 8); the harvest was particularly abundant (9–13).

There is one recorded year which provides an illustration: when Assyria threatened Zion and was overthrown by an act of God (Is. 36–37). Rebellion against Assyria had brought them into a situation of powerlessness (Is. 37:3) but prayer had been answered (Is. 37:4, 14–20, 21), the Lord had stilled the tumult of the nations (Is. 37:36–37), and the provision of harvest for two years, without human activity, was offered as a proof that it was no accident but the work of God (Is. 37:30). But within the experience of David the situation recorded in 2 Samuel 21:1–14 suggests an equally apt background to the psalm as the three-year famine was ended not by David's ill-judged and sinful expedients (2–9) but by answered prayer (1, 13). In three sections, the psalm unfolds it all.

1–4 Prayer, atonement, reconciliation. The people draw near to God in praise and dedication, addressing him as the one who answers prayer, experiencing the richness of being brought near to God by atonement. 1 Praise awaits, (lit.) 'Unto you silence/stillness is praise'. 'Stillness' may mean 'what is still there', i.e. 'Praise is ever yours'; or the expression may capture a moment of awed silence before the God who had wrought such a deliverance that no words were possible. Our vows (cf. 61:8), vowing to God was customary in crises. 2 The implication is that prayer was answered in such a way as to suggest that this God must one day be recognized by all people everywhere. Deuteronomy 4:6–8 links a praying people and an impressed world. 3 Overwhelmed, 'over-powered', gripped in the mastery of sin. Forgave, 'covered', 'made atonement for' (NIV mg.), not by hiding out of sight but by paying the price that 'covered' the debt. 4 Atonement brings blessedness, is apportioned by the elective choice of God, brings us near and makes us accepted in the holy place itself.

5–8 Deliverance, domination, revelation. The answer to prayer came in awesome deeds by which God showed himself to be our Saviour, worthy of worldwide trust. The power of the Creator was used to still the turbulent nations with the result that in every place people would be brought to fear him. It is typical of the psalms to generalize in this way, reaching out from some specific act of God to sketch the widest panorama of his sovereignty and power (cf. Ps. 67). 7–8 The awesome deeds of God over-mastered the nations, even to the extent that his wonders; 'signs' were reported far away and provoked fear (cf. Jos. 2:8–11).

9–13 Care, lavishness, provision. At the end of a year when Assyrian occupation of the land made agriculture impossible, there was still an abundance (cf. Is. 37:30). This was God's care (9), his lavish fertilization (10) whereby plenty crowned the year (11–13). 9 Streams of God. His heavenly rivers, holding water in store for the earth. The picture is fanciful but the reality is that earthly growth is always the product of heavenly forces, not human cleverness but divine productivity. 11 The year with, or 'the year of your goodness'. The year's end in bountiful harvest was but the crown on all the goodness that had preceded.

Psalm 66. His providence ... my prayer

The movement of this psalm from the earth (1) to me (20) via us (10) cannot for certain be explained. Did an individual preface his thank-offering (13–15) and testimony (16–20) with a hymn about the Lord's relationship to the world (1–7) and to his people (8–12)? Or did the people come in gratitude for deliverance (12) and an individual (?the king) express what was in their hearts (13–20)? The setting can only be conjectural but the message is plain.

What the Lord did, historically, for his people is the basis of an invitation to all the world (1–7). The world is summoned as it were to watch the Lord at the Red Sea, then to join his people in rejoicing in such a God and not to rebel against him (5–7). The salvation he wrought for some (Israel) is an invitation to all (cf. 2 Cor. 5:18–19) (N.B. ‘us ... the world’).

The Lord’s present dealings with his people are to be understood in the light of what he did in the past (8–12). Whatever testing (10) they had endured was like the Red Sea all over again: when they passed through the water it was in order to emerge into liberty (12).

We must live through our sufferings in such a way that they become an opportunity for testimony: the peoples are summoned to praise ... God for the preservation, testing, deep hurt and ultimate liberation of his people (8–12).

There is no such thing as the church apart from those who compose it, the individual responding spiritually in dedication (13–15), testimony (16–19) and praise (20).

God’s providential dealings with his people arise from his own will and deeds (10–12, six second person singular verbs), but the blessing arising does not come without prayer (17) and holiness (18). Indeed, the Lord performs his choicest, predetermined wonders through the prayers of his people (Mal. 3:1; Lk. 1:13).

1–12 World praise. The experience, past (1–7) and present (8–12) of the Lord’s people leads to an invitation to all to join in worship, acknowledging first what he has revealed himself to be (2, 4, name), then his acts and conquering power (3). 5–7 The Red Sea experience (6) was centuries old. The call, therefore, to come and see is deliberately imaginative. But having transported ourselves back to that great event we can then say (lit.) ‘There let us rejoice’ (6c), as if we were standing on the opposite shore, with the victorious power of the Lord and the fearful consequences (7, cf. Ex. 14:30, 31) of rebellion visibly before us. But God is still on the throne (8–12) and his people have an up-to-date experience to share: God is determined upon his people’s good (9), (lit.) ‘He has appointed us to life’; he imposes purposeful sufferings (10) in which they are tested for quality and refined for purity; he appoints all our experiences, however dreadful (11–12). When life hems us in (prison), when pressures mount (burdens), when people are atrociously cruel (ride roughshod), when one threatening circumstance follows hard on another (fire ... water)—it is all his personal act: we are never elsewhere than in our Father’s hand (Jn. 10:29; 1 Cor. 10:13), the God of ultimate abundance (12; 2 Cor. 4:16–5:1; Rev. 7:9–17).

13–20 Individual praise. Individual experience in dedication (13–15), prayer (17), holiness (18) and answered prayer (19) provides a testimony to the church (16). The time of trouble (14, cf. 10–12) was faced by vowing to the Lord, a vow now symbolically discharged in burnt offerings (13)—the offering that withholds nothing (Gn. 22:2, 12). But such a vow is not a bargain with God and the deliverance, when it came, was not God keeping his side of a bargain, but an answer to prayer. True prayer expresses our need verbally (17, with my mouth), is always ready to burst into praise (17, on my tongue, ‘on the tip of my tongue’), and requires the context of purity of heart (18)—determination not to ‘countenance sin in my heart’. In its turn, answered prayer flows out into praise (20) for it is living proof that his love has not (lit.) ‘turned aside’ from me.

Psalm 67. The harvest

It is exciting to listen to this psalm as an act of harvest thanksgiving: in vs 1–3, 5–7 possibly the worship-leader spoke (line 1) and the congregation responded (line 2). This correctly isolates the pivotal v 4 (spoken by all together?) with its prayer that all the world may come under the sway of Israel's God. The meaning is improved if we read, in v 4, 'will rule ... will guide', and in v 6, 'has yielded'.

1 Cf. Nu. 6:24–26. Israel was the uniquely blessed people. 2 But for God's people, their own blessedness is never an end in itself. They enjoy not only the Aaronic blessing (1) but also the Abrahamic blessing (Gn. 12:2–3) held in trust for the whole world. They are blessed 'in order to be a blessing worldwide. 3–5 Bracketed by repeated prayer, v 4 affirms that worldwide happiness can only come when God is king and shepherd of all nations. Rule, 'judge' (not 'pass judgment on' but) 'put everything to rights' as a true king would. Guide, (cf. 77:20), act as shepherd. 6–7 Harvest has once more come in. The praiseworthy goodness of God is seen not simply in outstanding deliverances (Pss.65, 66) but equally in the providence of ordinary, annual mercies. This blessing is seen first as an earnest of greater blessings to come (6b) and then (7), since harvest is a metaphor of world-gathering (Is. 27:12–13), an earnest too of a harvest embracing the ends of the earth (7; Rev. 7:9–10).

Psalm 68. Cavalcade: a march of memory and expectation

With the repetition (1) of Nu. 10:35, the psalm recollects the onward march of Israel from Sinai towards Canaan (1–3). The marchers are the prisoners (6) whom the Lord led from Egypt and to whom he is now father and defender on their desert journey (4–6). It is they whom he brings into the abundant showers of Canaan (7–10) where he scattered the kings (14), announcing the news of his victory for joyous companies to publish abroad (11–14). Within Canaan also (to the chagrin of more majestic mountains), he chose Mount Zion and ascended in triumph (15–18), as the God who saves his people and destroys his foes (19–23). Passing thus to his throne through ranks of girls playing tambourines (25) he is escorted by singers and instrumentalists and by representatives of his people in the presence of a great congregation offering praise (24–27). In prayer they seek from God the submission of the whole world to him (28–31) and in vision they summon the whole world to join in praise (32–35).

There is more here, however, than a march through memory. It is given visible, dramatic expression in an actual procession (24) which we may identify with the occasion when David brought the ark to Mount Zion (2 Sa. 6:12–16; 1 Ch. 15:1–28).

1 May God or 'God will' etc. the prayer of the past becoming an affirmation for the future. 2 Smoke ... wax. Respectively what is insubstantial and vulnerable. Such are the Lord's enemies before him, however invincible to us. Wicked. In his victories the Lord is always moved by moral considerations, acting out of his holiness, not out of favouritism to his people (cf. 21; Gn. 15:16). 4 Extol. Better, NIV mg. 'Build up a highway for him', (Is. 40:3). They are so to conduct their march that they are creating a road for the Lord to march among them. On the clouds emends the Heb. text in the light of 18:9–10 and pagan parallels, but, (lit.) 'through the deserts' suits this stanza better: the great Desert-Rider has come in gentle care of his wilderness-people (Dt. 2:8; 8:15). 5 Cf. 10:14; 146:9; Ex. 22:22–24; Dt. 10:18. 6 Prisoners, those he brought out of the 'house of bondage' (Ex. 20:2). Rebellious, Nu. 14:9, 22–23; 26:64–65; Dt. 2:14–16. Not only towards his enemies (2, 21) but also towards his people the Lord is the holy God, demanding obedience, imposing his disciplines. 7–8 Cf. Jdg. 5:4–5. Sinai was marked by natural manifestations reflecting the awesomeness of the Lord (Ex. 19:16–18) but the God of Sinai also uses his creation for the gentler providences of abundant showers (Dt. 11:10–12). Contrast the sun-scorched land (6) with the refreshed ... inheritance (9), the respective fates of the disobedient and the obedient (Acts 3:19; 5:32). 11 The Lord ... the word ... the company. Like a Commander-in-chief (2 Sa. 18:19ff.) the Lord announces his victory and, as in Ex. 15:20–21; 1 Sa. 18:6, (lit.) ‘great was the crowd of women telling the good news’.

12 Kings (Jos. 12:7–24). In the camps men or ‘she who stayed at home’, (cf. Jdg. 5:28–30).

13 Sleep among the campfires, those of the ‘home guard’ not on duty; alternatively ‘between the saddlebags’, like a donkey sinking beneath the weight—those overborne by the demands of the occasion; or ‘by the hearths’, the women ‘keeping the home-fires burning’. To such an extent is victory the work of the Lord that neither rest, nor exhaustion, nor nonparticipation by humankind makes any difference. My dove. By adding ‘my’ NIV creates a reference to the Lord’s people whose adorning with silver and gold the Lord secures with booty from his victory without effort on their part. Without ‘my’, 13 refers poetically to the rich spoil itself. 14 Snow ... Zalmon. Does this mean that the kings were scattered like snow before the wind? Or did the Lord use a snowstorm to secure victory? (cf. Jos. 10:11; Jdg. 5:21). Or did the rubbish from war lie thick, like snow, on the ground? Zalmon (see Jdg. 9:48). The expression may be a proverb whose significance is now uncertain. 15–17 The mountains of Bashan may look superior but they cannot match Zion’s greatness which consists of the Lord’s choice, presence and power (16–17). Sinai ... sanctuary. Sinai was the scene of a most awesome manifestation of the Lord (Ex. 19). When he comes to Zion then, (lit.) ‘Sinai is in the holy place’—all the values and realities of Sinai are now resident in Zion. (Cf. 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19; Eph. 2:19–22; 3:16–19).

18 Ascended ... gifts ... men. At the end of the long wilderness march and the toil of conquest, the victorious Lord comes triumphantly to Zion. He has (lit.) ‘taken captivity captive’ (cf. Jdg. 5:12), i.e. he has taken as his captives those who made his people their captives. Men, even ... the rebellious acknowledge the Lord’s victory by making tributary gifts. We could, however translate: ‘... gifts, namely, people—rebels to boot!—that the divine Lord might take up residence’, i.e. erstwhile rebels have been won by the Lord, who did this so that he might dwell among them (Ex. 29:46; 2 Cor. 6:16). 19–20 When Paul used v 18 in reference to the ascension of the Lord Jesus (Eph. 4:8) he incorporated what vs 19–20 say about God’s goodness to his people by adapting the quotation to ‘gave gifts’. Bears (Is. 46:1–3). From the ... Lord ... death, possibly ‘To the sovereign Lord belong the exits belonging to Death’. Death jealously guards the doors that keep its prisoners in, but even the doors belong to the Lord! 21–23 With typical realism the results of victory are described but note that when the Lord ‘crushes’ his foes and gives his people the fruits of conquest all is justified on moral grounds (21, 23). We who suffer from moral atrophy, who have little capacity for true moral indignation, and who are ever-ready for moral compromise, have no conception what sin really is, how it appears to and offends a holy God and how just is even the most apparently savage retribution. Bring ... bring. The reference is either to the inevitability with which the Lord’s foes, seeking escape, will be brought to book, or to the constancy with which he brings his people back even if their enemies would disinherit them. 24–27 Tambourines, (Ex. 15:20; Jdg. 11:34; 1 Sa. 18:6–7). Benjamin etc. Two tribes from the south and two from the north suggest poetically all the tribes of the Lord’s people. 28–31 As the procession marched toward and then ascended Zion’s hill it recapitulated for marchers and watchers alike the whole long cavalcade of Israel’s history and of the Lord’s grace and power. Now the great congregation turns to prayer that the Lord will prove himself to be the same by manifesting his power (26–28) and grace (temple, 29a), to bring the world into submission (29–31). Beast ... reeds, Egypt lying along the Nile. Bulls ... calves, respectively figurative of power and leadership and of subordination and following: kings and people alike. Delight in war. The infant kingdom of David was surrounded by nations at the ready to possess it, especially the Philistines. A reference to them here would bring together enemies great (Egypt) and small (Philistines), past and present. Cush, remotely beyond upper Egypt, representing earth's remotest bounds. 32–35 Prayer turns to praise, for the Lord will surely answer. Therefore all the earth can be called to extol his exalted sovereignty, his might, his dominion over Israel and over all (33–34), his awesome holiness and gracious indwelling (sanctuary,) his available power and his worthy praise (35).

Psalm 69. The cost, concern and realism of true devotion

David was experiencing life-threatening, prolonged hatred (1–4). It denigrated the godly in the land (6), estranged his family (8), made his religious profession the subject of mockery (10–12), left him dreading that the Lord had turned from him (17), heartbroken and friendless (20). The public story was that he was involved in (financial?) malpractice (4) but its secret cause was his devotion to the Lord (7) and to the Lord's house—indeed, the Lord himself was the real object of attack (9). The psalm was written with the crisis unresolved (29).

- A¹ (vs 1–4) Prayer describing the deadly crisis
- B¹ (vs 5–12) Those needing protection
- A² (vs 13–18) Prayer pleading the character of God
- B² (vs 19–29) Those meriting retribution
- A³ (vs 29–36) Prayer turning to praise

No recorded situation of David's life matches this but it is easier to insert it credibly into his history than to compose a scenario for another person at another time. David was heavily involved with plans (1 Ch. 28:11–21) and financial provision (29:2–5) for the temple. Wealth excites jealousy and there could have been those in the land who felt that the needs of the poor and other national interests were being impoverished by what seemed to them to be a royal obsession. Charges of misappropriation would have been easy to make and not always as easy to rebut, bringing with them the sort of character assassination the psalm suggests. This is the most frequently quoted of the psalms in the NT mostly by the Lord Jesus: 4 (Jn. 15:25), 9 (Jn. 2:17; Rom. 15:3), 21 (Jn. 19:28; cf. Mt. 27:34, 48), 22 (Rom. 11:9ff.), 25 (Acts 1:20). Other verses too (12, 20) are more than matched by the Lord's experience of savage hostility. (Mt. 27:27–31, 39–44; Mk. 14:50).

1–4 Prayer describing the deadly crisis. Metaphors of drowning, quicksands (cf. 40:3) and overpowering floodwater (2) describe the grim reality of the situation. Prayer has been so long unanswered that voice and eyes are exhausted (3) while unnumbered people and many ... enemies, without justification, are of sufficient influence to compel uncalled-for measures of restitution (4).

5–12 Those needing protection. Guilt refers specifically (Lv. 5) to situations where an offence was committed requiring restitution manward. Thus v 5 looks back to v 4. When the Lord examines David he will find folly ('silliness') in yielding to pressure and making restitution but he will not find guilt. 6–12 Because David had acted as if guilty, a potential for criticism was created against all who lived by trust and practised the presence of God (6). For the people of God are one body and when mud is thrown it sticks to more than its immediate target. As for

David himself, he had lost the love of his family (8)—easy to imagine in the scenario sketched above: did they think their now wealthy brother might be more generous to them? But also his genuine religious practice and personal repute were brought into open contempt—in the mind of the important members of society who sit at the gate (10–12; Dt. 21:19; Ru. 4:1) as well as in drunken songs. And it was all without justification, for he was motivated only by devotion (7a; cf. 2 Sa. 6:14–21 where David’s devotion also caused misunderstanding), and by his commitment to the Lord’s house (9a). But he knew also that he was being used to get back at God (9b).

13–18 Prayer pleading the character of God. Note how the same metaphors (water, quicksands, flood) reappear from vs 1–4, as do people who hate. But now the single cry of v 1 becomes a sustained appeal, beginning with divine favour (acceptance) love (committed, unchangeable) and sure salvation (13) and ending with the goodness of ... (unchanging) love and great mercy (the surging, passionate love of 1 Ki. 3:26). 18 Come near, (cf. of the ‘next-of-kin’, Lv. 21:2–3; 25:25; Ru. 2:20). Rescue, ‘redeem’, the action of the ‘next-of-kin’, taking upon himself, as his own, all the needs of his distressed relative (Lv. 25:25; Ruth 3:12; Is. 41:14; 43:14, cf. Ps. 19:14). Redeem, ‘ransom’, pay whatever price will meet the need (31:5; 55:18).

19–28 Those meriting retribution. See Introduction, Imprecatory Psalms. In vs 19–21 we learn the effect the enemies have had; in vs 23–28 the punishment they deserve. Like most imprecations, these rest on the principle enunciated in Dt. 19:19, that those who make false accusations must be judicially recompensed in kind. In the present prayer (for it is a prayer: all is committed to God without thought or purpose of personal vengeful action) they are brought for divine judgment. They acted in poisonous spite, figured in terms of food (21): their table will be a snare (22); they brought about bodily exhaustion (3): they too must suffer (23); they inflicted a sense of divine withdrawal (17): they will suffer its reality (24); his family was estranged (8): their homes will be destroyed (25); they made false accusations of guilt (4–5): they will be held irretrievably guilty (27); they set themselves against God (9): God will set himself eternally against them (28).

This is the awesome logic of divine judgment. Before we criticize a prayer like this we must be sure that we have ourselves been in a like place of suffering. We must also ask if our moral sense—particularly our sense of moral outrage—is sufficiently acute to make us sure what would be right and what wrong to pray. We must also ask if such a prayer accords with the mind of Christ, for much in the psalm has brought us face to face with his sufferings and his reaction was to pray that his tormenters might be forgiven. Surely this is now the only possible course. But there is more to be said: the Lord Jesus himself pronounced dire ‘woes’ (Mt. 23:13–36); he envisaged himself saying ‘Depart, you who are cursed’ (Mt. 25:41); the day will come when all will flee the wrath of the Lamb (Rev. 6:15–17); he will be there when the books are opened (Rev. 20:12)—and at that day there will be no prayer for forgiveness, only the logic of divine justice eternally applied. In a word, there is such a thing as pure anger and here, in one who longed for justice, the OT reflects that aspect of Christ’s character. 28 cf. Ex. 32:32; Dan. 12:1; Lk. 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 13:8; 21:27.

29–36 Prayer turning to praise. While the pain persists, praise will also persist, pleasing God, providing an encouraging testimony, based on the assurance that prayer will be answered and worthy to become the song of all creation, for, when the present distress is over, stability will return to the land (35) for those who love his name (36).

Notes. 31 Horns and hoofs. Horns would attest its age, hoofs (Lv. 11:3–4) its ‘cleanness’: i.e. more delightful to the Lord than an offering that fulfils all requirements is the thankful heart.

33 His captives, cf. 26. In every circumstance, we are the Lord's, even when people think we are totally at their mercy. Our bonds are his bands (Eph. 4:1; 6:20; Phil. 1:13).

Psalm 70. Help!

What Psalm 69 says at length, Psalm 70 expresses as a sharp, urgent cry. In both there is the same sense of personal threat (69:1–4; 70:1, 2, 5), the same prayer against assailants (69:22ff.; 70:2–3) and for God's people (69:6; 70:4), but now brevity rules; the prayers have a 'telegraphic' quality. The same is true, comparing Psalm 70 with the almost identical 40:13–17. Words there which 'round out' the petitions are lacking here as if urgency forbade more than the bare cry for help. It is usually suggested that Psalm 70 adapts the earlier psalm for public liturgical use but it is much more likely to be a crystallization for private use in a crisis. It is good to have such a written prayer available for times of pressure when our thoughts cannot focus and our extremity confuses our powers of expression.

Notes. 2–3 Shame ... confusion ... disgrace. Disappointed hopes, reaping (public) shame. 4 Not joy because of the opponent's shame; joy in the Lord throughout the crisis.

Psalm 71. Running with all my might

In 1836 Charles Simeon retired after fifty-four years of ministry at Holy Trinity, Cambridge. A friend, discovering that he was still rising at 4 a.m. to light his own fire and spend time alone with God, remonstrated, 'Mr. Simeon, do you not think that, now you are retired, you might take things more easily?' 'What?' replied the old man, 'Shall I not now run with all my might when the winning-post is in sight!' Here is another old man (9, 18) running with all his might: ripe in experience of God (5, 6, 17), still challenged and pressured (4, 13), deeply reliant on prayer (1–9, 12–13), uplifted in praise (8, 14, 22–24), leaving the future to God (19–21), avid to prolong his testimony (17–18)—a glorious example for the retired, a challenging portrait for all. The psalm quotes from other psalms (1–3, 31:1–3; 4–6, 22:9–10; 12, 22:11; 13, 35:26; etc.) but thematically and circumstantially it belongs with Psalms 69, 70 and fits perfectly with the picture of David under false accusation and fearsome assault while, in his last days, he made preparations for the beloved house that was to be built.

1–3 Prayer within a secure position. Refuge has been taken in God (1) but is also constantly renewed (3). From this position, prayer is made for vindication (1, shame, exposed as a fraud, brought to public disgrace) and rescue (2, 4). 2 Righteousness. Salvation/deliverance can never be accomplished through compromise within the divine nature (Is. 45:21; Rom. 3:21–26). 3 Refuge copies 31:2. The Hebrew here reads 'habitation/dwelling'—'a home in the rock'. Always, see vs 6, 14, respectively always sheltering, always praising, always expecting.

4–11 Lifelong divine care. Prayer for deliverance is nourished by an experience of God going back beyond the reach of memory, consciously enjoyed throughout youth (5–6) and now, in old age desired all the more as strength, but not opposition, diminishes (9–10). 5 Hope, the One on whom I waited with confident expectation. Confidence, the 'place' on which my trust rested. 6 Relied, 'been upheld'. 7 Portent. The charges levelled against him (see on Pss. 69, 70) make people look on him as a 'warning example'. But just as in the face of his direct assailants he reacts by recalling God (4–5), so when faced by public loss of reputation he reacts by finding again in God 'my refuge—and what a strong one!'. Thus what could have resulted in deep depression issues rather in praise (8). 10–11 69:3 reveals a long-standing period of trial in which

God has remained silent and even David wondered if his face had been turned away in rejection (69:17). His enemies are quick to capitalize on this, but ...

12–16. Prayer (12–13, for divine nearness and the end of opponents), resting in hope (14a) abounds in praise (14b–15) and issues in confidence. The times that we most need to seek God (10–11) are not always when inclination and energy make it easy to do so. Insistent, committed seeking God in the face of threat is a central feature of this psalm (4–5; 7–8; 9–12). 12 Quickly (70:1, 5). 13 Shame ... scorn ... disgrace. Synonyms for public loss of repute, disappointment of hopes, ‘reaping shame’. This boldness of prayer in the face of personal threat and danger to the cause of God (69:9) is something we need to recover. 15–16 Though under personal assault and calumny, David has nothing to say publicly about himself—by way of exculpation, justification etc. All his talk is of the Lord and him alone—his righteousness, (perfection of character, reliability of action, changelessness in purpose), salvation (power and willingness to deliver), mighty acts (conquering strength).

17–21 Lifelong human testimony and the desire for its prolongation. Matching vs 4–11 in the ‘youth ... old age’ theme, the lifelong goodness of God seen there is now matched by lifelong sharing, first of what you have taught (17), God’s revealed truth, next his deeds, his saving acts in the past (17), then (18, lit.) ‘your arm’, his personal power intervening in the lives of his people. 19–21 offer a summary of what he desires to share with the future: God’s character, past acts, incomparable being (19; Ex. 15:11; Mi. 7:18–20); strange providences, reliable purposes (20) and certain recompenses (21).

22–24 Responsive praise. The psalm opened with prayer (1–3); in 12–16 prayer merged into praise. Now only praise remains—for God’s faithfulness, holiness, redemption, righteous acts (lit. ‘righteousness’, see 2, 15) and answered prayer (22–24, cf. 13). To this exercise of praise David brings his fingers to play, his lips to sing, and his tongue to tell. 22 The Holy One of Israel, rarely used outside Isaiah (where it occurs about forty times), this title holds together two things: God’s holiness and his identification with his people. He comes to us in the full reality of the divine nature, deigns to call us his and to allow us to call him ours.

Psalm 72. ‘O the joy to see thee reigning!’

Apart from this psalm, only Psalm 127 has a title referring to Solomon. In each case it could be dedicatory, ‘For Solomon’—here a ‘prayer of David’ (20) for his son. But the wording is that of the standard ascription of authorship and Psalm 72 fits well with the time and mind of Solomon. More than any other in David’s subsequent line he could have prayed for himself as the royal son (1, lit. ‘the king’s son’); he had actual experience of the homage of kings (10; 1 Ki. 10:1–13) and of the wealth of the nations coming to Jerusalem (15; 1 Ki. 10:22). He was a king under whom peace and prosperity were the order of the day and he could well have been forgiven if he saw his empire as the first fruits of the world rule of the Messiah. His prayer at Gibeon (1 Ki. 3:6–9) and the psalm match each other in their kingly ideals. But at the same time the psalm runs beyond what even hyperbole could claim for any merely earthly and human king. It could remind Solomon of his high calling but only in the Messiah could that calling become sober reality. The psalm has a closely-knit structure in four stanzas

A¹ (vs 1–5) The caring king

B¹ (vs 6–8) The world ruler

A² (vs 11–14) The caring king

B² (vs 15–17) The world blessing

1–5 The blessing and its consequences: the royal mediator. In consequence of divine enduement the king's rule will be righteous and caring and creation itself will pour out its blessings. His reign will bring deliverance to his people and, responsively (5, lit.) 'They will reverence you ... through all generations'. 1 Justice ... righteousness, the exact application of righteous principles of rule. 2 Afflicted, downtrodden, humbled and humiliated. 3 Contrast Gn. 3:17–19 and cf. Am. 9:13. When the curse of sin has been dealt with and removed, creation itself will be renewed and rush to pour out its benefits. Prosperity, lit.) 'peace', total wellbeing—peace with God, in society and within human nature. 4 Needy, exploited.

6–10 Spreading influence: the king and the kings. His gently beneficent reign, in which righteousness and reward will match each other and 'peace' will abound (6–7), will magnetize the world (8–10, cf. Is. 2:2–4). 6 Rain ... mown field, a simile of fragrance (2 Cor. 2:14–16). 7 Righteous ... flourish. Society will be such that the life of righteousness is made easy (contrast Am. 5:13); and the proper sequence of righteousness and reward will be evident (contrast 73:12–13). 9, 10 cover in turn those fiercely resistant to rule (desert), the opposed (enemies) and the remote: all alike will submit. Tarshish ... shores involved long sea journeys; Sheba ... Seba, probably the remote south of Arabia, difficult land journeys. The contrast between sea and land is intended to embrace all the earth.

11–14 The magnetic reign. The fact of universal homage (11) is explained by (12, for) the nature of his rule. This deliverance, care for the helpless, pity, salvation and redemptive concern explain the simile of rain (6). 12 Needy ... afflicted, see 4 and 2. Cry out, cf. Ex. 2:24. 14 Rescue, 'redeem', the next-of-kin who makes their needs his own (see 69:18).

15–17 A prayer for the king. Following the foregoing descriptions of the king's rule and its benefits, this prayer for realisation follows naturally. The prayer spreads as it proceeds: from the king to his people, to the prospering creation and to the world. The tension between an actual and an expected king is evident here. The natural result of a king enthroned in the hearts of his people is that they pray for him (15); those who look forward in expectation pray, 'Amen, Come, Lord Jesus!' (Rev. 22:20).

Psalm 73. 'Not in vain, in the Lord'

We 'believe in God the Father Almighty' but often experience, our own and others', would call in question his almightiness, (for other forces seem to be in command); his fatherliness, (for life in this world contradicts the thought of a loving God) and, for many, his very existence: 'How can there be a God when ...?' The book of Psalms is notable for facing, not hiding from, life. Book 1 opened with a credal affirmation (1:3) of the prosperity of the godly; Book 2 opened (42:3, 5, 9–10) by recording that life does not offer a straightforward correlation between virtue and reward, nor is the experience of the godly uniformly comfortable; Book 3 opens with the blunt question: Is godliness worthwhile or just a waste of time (13)? Since others have all the enjoyments (4, 5) and we get all the kicks (14), why not give up and join the happy majority (10)? Asaph has given us a psalm notable for its realism regarding what life is like, practical in its recommendations for facing harsh problems, and uplifting in offering an alternative view. In effect Asaph replied to his own despairing Surely in vain (13) with Paul's great affirmation, 'Not in vain, in the Lord' (1 Cor. 15:58). The psalm is a rounded treatment of this theme.

A¹ (v 1) Truth stated: God is good

B¹ (vs 2–14) Poor me!

C (vs 15–20) New perspectives

B² (vs 21–26) Rich me!

A² (vs 27–28) Truth affirmed: yes it is good!

1–14 Truth in conflict. Verses beginning surely (1, 13) bracket the first section of the psalm and summarize its two parts. Truth (1) comes into conflict with experience (2–14). The truth is the goodness of God to his people; the conflict arises from their evident suffering (14) and the prospering of the wicked (3–5). The goodness of God in question is not his general benevolence (145:9) but the blessings of goodness pledged to his people, conditional upon trust and reverence (34:8, 9), prayer (86:5, 6; 107:6–9), and, here (1), purity of heart. Yet moral diligence, striving to maintain inward (13a) and outward (13b) purity has met only with plague and punishment (14). Not unreasonably, this provoked envy when the arrogant (3, people who live without thoughtfulness or concern) and the wicked enjoy prosperity, 'well-being'. He saw them die 'without distress' (4, NIV mg.) or terminal illness. They enjoy singularly trouble-free lives (5). Pride marks their character and aggressive exploitation (violence) of others their conduct (6). They show every evidence of 'self-indulgence' (NIV mg.) and forego nothing they fancy (7). Their tongues (ever, in the Bible, the yardstick of character) reveal their sense of self-worth—their assumed right to sit loose to moral values (8a, malice, 'evil'), to be 'top dog' (8b), to order all things in heaven and earth (9). They attract adherents, who willingly climb on to the bandwagon of their abundance (10), even if it involves subscribing also to their theology of an irrelevant God (11). Yet, devastating though this critique of the wicked is, observation shows that they enjoy a carefree life and increase in wealth (12).

15–20 New perspectives. In this perplexity over the moral inequity of life three principles of immense significance emerged. (i) In every situation practise loyalty to and safeguard the welfare of the people of God (15). (ii) Be found in the place of worship. Since Asaph could not share his problem without needlessly upsetting God's children (15), he had to wrestle alone but found the problem too weighty (16). Then, it seems, he realized that there is no need to be alone and betook himself to worship (17a)—the sanctuary, the place where the Lord promised to live and where he is always to be found. (iii) Consider eternity. Their final destiny is insecure (17–18); they will find themselves to have been victims of a 'total deception' (ruin, 18), not only destroyed, but terrified (19); and, disaster of disasters, without any reality in the estimation of God (20).

21–28 Truth triumphant. The two sections which conclude the psalm are unequal in length and have a clear bracket around them: one who knew himself to be senseless, ignorant, and a brute beast before you (21, 22) finds it good to be near God with the Sovereign Lord as his refuge (27, 28). In all his grief he was still a rich man: he had God: a secure present (23), future (24a) and eternity (24b), a heavenly and earthly wealth (25), a strength and an inheritance beyond the duration of earthly life (26), a goodness and refuge unavailable to those who are perishing under divine wrath (27–28), and, over against the silence of v 15, something to talk about (28). 21, 22 Paraphrase: ‘When my thoughts turned sour and emotionally I was cut up, why, for my part, I was reacting as though I was spiritually untaught and in the dark—like a mere animal before you!’ (cf. 49:12, 20). 23, 24 A fourfold wealth: peace with God (I ... with you); God’s grasp (‘you have gripped my right hand’); God’s plan for the future (‘will guide’); and afterwards ... glory. The sequence of thought in vs 23, 24a demands that 24b reaches into the afterwards beyond this life. But also this afterwards stands as a designed contrast to final destiny, (lit.) ‘their afterwards’ (17). It leads into vs 25, 26 which emphasise heaven and the portion that is still his when outwardly (flesh) and inwardly (heart) this life, (lit.) ‘comes to an end’. 26 Portion. Psalm 74. A voice in the darkness

As in a nightmare, this psalm relives the year 587 BC and the events of 2 Kings 24–25. The psalmist sees again the Jerusalem temple in ruins (3), hears again the full-throated roar of the enemy where once he had heard the word of God (4) and watches the swinging implements of destruction (5). There is something specially moving about (lit.) ‘and now the carved panels—altogether—with axe and crowbars they have smashed’ (6) as though the watcher had followed the destroyers, his heart silently pleading ‘Not the panels, please, not the panels!’ It seems ‘for ever’ (1, 10) since all this happened and yet there has been no sign of any lifting of divine anger (1), no word from God (9), no indication that God is going to act for his people, recall his promises or stand up for his name (19–21).

How very well the psalmist captures the ‘agelong minute when thou are silent and the wind is shrill’! For indeed ‘days of darkness still come o’er us’ and the psalm offers us the reassurance that this is no strange thing, but ever part of the experience of the Lord’s people—as of the Lord himself (Mk. 15:33–34); it also offers us a stake to which to tie our boat when this particular tide threatens to sweep us away. (i) The entire experience of darkness is enfolded in prayer that God will remember us in our protracted need (1, 2) and remember also (22, 23) that his own repute is threatened. (ii) The dreadful cause of the darkness is recalled in detail (3–11): the advice of the psalm is not ‘Try not to think about it’ but rather ‘Ask God to come into it with you’ (3), face the darkness with him. (iii) Plead the name of God (18–21): it is for his name’s sake that he chose us to begin with and while for sure we can plead our need (Remember the people, 2) we can go to the heart of the matter with the plea remember ... your name (18). (iv) Focus everything on the central reality of who and what God is (12–17). This is the focal point of the psalm.

- A¹ (vs 1–2) Prayer: your neglected people
- B¹ (vs 3–11) Prayer: the enemy destroying
- C (vs 12–17) King, Saviour, Conqueror, Creator
- B² (vs 18–21) Prayer: the enemy reviling
- A² (vs 22–23) Prayer: your neglected cause

The darkness is surrounded and filled with prayer and into the heart of the darkness is brought the light of the truth of God.

1–2 Prayer: your neglected people. These verses review the whole history of the people of God and put a question-mark beside each significant event: rejected challenges their fundamental position as the ‘elect’ in Abraham (Gn. 18:19); purchased ... redeemed recalls the exodus-redemption (2 Sa. 7:23); sheep points to their wilderness experience under his care

(77:20; cf. Is. 63:11); tribe ... Zion marks them as the people of the promised land among whom the Lord God came to dwell. But in the darkness all this seems to count for nothing!

3–11 The enemy destroying the house. 8 At the fall of Jerusalem there were no other places in the land where the Lord was worshipped. The reference here may be to the temple itself, with a plural used to express its magnificence: ‘... the whole great place ...’ But the word translated place points more to the fact of meeting with God than to the place where it happened, i.e. in burning the temple ‘they destroyed by fire every meeting with God (all possibility of festal gatherings) ...’ 9 (lit.) ‘We do not see our signs’—things like the round of temple services, the recurring festivals, significant people, etc. which spoke to them of God.

12–17 King, Saviour, Conqueror, Creator. Seven times the emphatic pronoun ‘You’ occurs (13, 14, 15, 16, 17). The first four affirm the Lord’s power over every opposing force; the last three affirm that it is he who imposes his order on the world. These are the very truths challenged by the psalmist’s experience, for the enemy seeks to be triumphant and it is worldly power that has imposed its dreadful disorder upon the world! Nevertheless the thing to do is to challenge experience with truth, to stand in the darkness and say the creed.

Pagan mythology saw the sea as the opponent of the creator god and made it the dwelling of anti-god powers, the monster and Leviathan. Marduk, the Babylonian creator-god, was supposed to have defeated these dark forces before the field was clear for him to create the world. But what Marduk did only by repute the Lord did historically when he split the Red Sea, and cleft open its streams to make a dry pathway for his people, leaving the Egyptians dead to the scavenging beasts (14, Ex. 14–15).

18–23 Prayer: do not forget. 20 Haunts, etc. The dark places could be the secret hiding places in which the people sought escape from the Babylonians and to which they were tracked and slaughtered; or else the dark places are the areas to which they were exiled from Jerusalem. 22, 23 God is reminded how his name has been reviled and his person mocked (18) and exhorted to defend his neglected cause.

Psalm 75. ‘Disposer supreme and judge of the earth’

In v 1 we meet the thankful community. By wonderful deeds God has shown that he is what his name declares him to be and that he is near (34:18), the next-of-kin assuming responsibility for his people’s needs. Then, maybe through a prophet (cf. 2 Ch. 20:13–17), the word of the Lord came to them, explaining to them the meaning of the experience through which they had passed.

2–5 the voice speaks from God: when everything seems unstable he remains the ground of stability (3), in particular addressing his word of rebuke to the wicked as they make their bid for power (4, 5). 6–8 the voice speaks of God: the decision who rules is not made on earth but in heaven by the God who appoints destinies and makes the wicked drink their appointed potion.

9–10 Finally another voice speaks. Similarity with the royal vow of Psalm 101 suggests that it is the king, committing himself to praise (9) and to the creation of a morally sound society (10).

What was the situation? Was it David’s restoration after Absalom’s rebellion (2 Sa. 15–19)? Was it Hezekiah and his marvelling people after the divine rout of Sennacherib (2 Ki. 18–19)? We cannot tell, but our understanding of a great truth does not depend on the incident which illustrated it: earthshaking events do not shake the almighty hand that holds the earth in place (3). ‘God is still on the throne’. No matter how dominant wicked people may appear, the voice of God speaks against them (4, 5) and their downfall is certain (8). They are not of God and they will come to nothing (Acts 5:38). The wonders of God should meet with thanksgiving (1) and with commitment to reproduce on earth (10) the values he enunciates (4, 5).

Notes. 2 You say, an interpretative NIV addition. Judge (also 7) in the fundamental sense of 'put things to rights'. 4 Horns, symbol of dominant strength. 5 Against heaven, 'on high'. Neck, with face assertively thrust forward. 6 (Lit.) 'Not from east ... west ... desert (i.e. south) comes uplifting' (Rom. 13:1). 8 Cup (see 60:3; cf. Is. 51:17; Jn. 18:11).

Psalm 76. 'The Lion has triumphed' (Rev. 5:5)

Psalm 76 explores the wonderful deeds of 75:1. Both psalms have close affinity with 2 Kings 18, 19. Even though it is not possible to prove that they arose from the Assyrian debacle it must have been some such divine victory. The 'Lion' theme is concealed by NIV tent (2) where the word, in every specific use, refers to a lion's den (10:9; Je. 25:38). Such a motif suits the drama of the psalm and mirrors its final fulfilment in the Lion-Lamb of Revelation 5.

1–3 The Lion's den. With a repeated emphasis on place (in Judah ... in Israel ... in Salem ... in Zion) we are told that the Lord is known (1, lit. 'self-revealed') in victory, notwithstanding the military prowess (3, arrows ... shields ... swords) of the foe. The Lord who dwells among his people in unspeakable condescension has awesome power over all the power of the enemy.

4–10 The Lion's triumph. The reference to mountains rich with game (lit.) 'mountains of prey') continues the lion theme. NIV more majestic than is possible, but better: 'You are resplendent, majestic (returning) from the mountains of prey'. The lion went out hunting and returned with majestic step, covered with glory, totally dominant. There are two sides to this victory: (i) 'Victory over' (5–7), (cf. 2 Ki. 19:35; Is. 30:31; 31:4). Human valour, trained ability and military resources yield to the mere voice of God (5–6). He needs no power outside himself for none can stand to face him (7). (ii) 'Victory for' (8–10). The land had been in turmoil, occupied by enemy forces, racked by the sound of war, but when God spoke all was quiet (8). This invincible intervention was designed to save all the afflicted (the downtrodden) (9). In this way (by his mere word) human wrath turns to his praise and whatever remains is gripped within his sovereign power (10).

11, 12 The Lion's just due. So what shall we render to the Lord who reduces to nothing (3, 5–6) all the power ranged against us? For the psalm ends by addressing (not all ... neighbouring lands, 11, but) 'all who are round about him'—his people, enjoying his presence, the beneficiaries of his triumph. Our response is to pledge loyalty and live it out, bringing tributary gifts to prove its reality, for he is the One to be feared (11, lit. 'The (real) Fear') and (12) 'the hearts of kings are in his rule and governance'. Our only safety in a threatening world is in him.

Psalm 77. The tonic of memory

This psalm records a time of intense but unspecified suffering. Prayer was sustained to the point of exhaustion but brought no comfort (1–3) until finally the trouble outweighed the capacity to pray (4). Sleepless nights (4a) prompted memories of better times past (5–6) but only resulted in uneasy questioning of God (7–9). But then a new approach suggested itself (10): to remember the past works of God, especially his self-revelation in holiness and greatness (11–13), exercising his power over peoples (14), identifying himself with his people (15), both dominating and using the 'forces' of nature (16–18), leading onward by his own unseen presence and by agents he raised up (19–20). With this the psalm ends abruptly—designedly so. It is as if the psalmist said to himself ‘That’s it! That’s the way forward—not prayer for circumstances to be changed (1–4), nor fretful recollection that things are not what they used to be (5–9), but remembering the works of God and the God who performed the works.’

1–4 Memory’s first failure. We are not told precisely what he prayed for but the implication is prayer for the adversity to cease, for circumstances to be changed for the better. In this sense he (3, lit.) ‘remembered God’: keeping God prayerfully in mind as the One who could intervene and perform the great transformation. In the light of the survey of the psalm above the lesson is clear: the believer’s first reaction to adverse circumstances is not to ask God to change them, but to make use of the given revelation of God (10–20) to live within them. Prayer, though vehemently verbalized (1, lit. ‘With my voice I shrieked to God, with my voice to God ...’) and untiringly pursued (2), was not the solution, because it expressed, in fact, a fretful refusal to accept God-given circumstances. Indeed God himself withheld the balm of sleep, bringing his child deeper into exhaustion till he could learn the precious lesson of resting upon revealed truth (4).

5–9 Memory’s second failure. In the sleepless hours the mind turned to the past and memory dwelt on times of happy song (5–6). But this brought no comfort, only a questioning of God and his ways (7–9). Interestingly the questions seem instinctively to be phrased so as to bring reassurance, especially by introducing the five changeless covenant realities of favour ... unfailing love ... promise ... merciful (grace) ... compassion (passionate love). But the point rather is that questions are comfortless things; they arise from an unsettled mind and settle nothing. Hankering after the past (6) is no remedy for the present and no recipe for the future.

10–20 The tonic of a true memory. Suddenly thought takes a fresh turn: not now remembering God as a solution to problems (3), nor remembering former spiritual experiences (6) but remembering the wonder of God’s past acts (11–12), the surpassing greatness of his holy character (13), and what he has done for his people in redemption (14–15), power (16–18) and providential care (19–20). 10 contains possibly insoluble problems of translation. The NIV offers a translation well suited to the context especially in offering a contrast between the years of long ago (5)—the memories that only teased—and the years of the right hand of the most high (10)—memories of the might of a favourable God. 13–20 Holy (13). At base the word points to all that makes God distinct, separate, unique and it is this sense (rather than the moral quality of his holiness) that is prominent here. He acts in mighty independence, free from outside constraint, doing what he will in heaven and earth. Comparison of v 13 with Exodus 15:8–11 shows that memory is concentrated on the great works of God from the exodus onwards. The progress of his people is traced from their redemption from Egypt (14, 15), through the Red Sea (16), to the awesome storms of Sinai (17, 18; Ex. 19) and onwards under the unseen leadership of the Lord (19) and the guiding hands of his shepherds (20). He is powerful against peoples (14), powerful for his people (15), powerful to deal with every adverse circumstance (16), powerful in using mighty forces for his own purposes (17–18), powerful to protect and provide in the inhospitable wilderness (19–20).

It is on this thought that the psalm abruptly ends. Circumstances they would never have chosen—the waters of the Red Sea, the ‘great and terrible wilderness’ (Dt. 8:15)—were his appointment. Indeed it was he who, unseen, led them into these very experiences (19) and provided for them in the thick of them (20). Here indeed is comfort. The holy God is totally free to do what he will and in his will is our peace. Wherever he leads he will also provide.

Psalm 78. The power of memory

The introduction (1–8) sets the scene for this long and wonderful psalm. It speaks of (i) a duty: each generation must pass on its sacred tradition to the next (3–4) according to the will of God (5–6); (ii) the content of the tradition is twofold: the deeds (4) and words (5) of the Lord; (iii) the objective being that the coming generations would trust in God (7, the word suggests a simplicity of faith), keep his deeds and commands in mind (7) and avoid the errors of the past—rebelliousness arising from lapsed commitment and inconstancy (8). But (iv) if all this is to happen there must be a true understanding of the past, a ‘teaching’ (law), expressed in common speech (words, 1), which explains (2) what has gone before: a parable is an instructive story or saying, here the use of incidents from the past (9–72) to illustrate truth; things hidden, ‘riddles’: by itself the record of the past is a tangle of events, an enigma or riddle needing interpretation.

This then is the purpose of the psalm: to clarify the riddle of the past so that it becomes a lesson for present and future. The psalmist sees a single principle in all the complexity of Israel’s history and offers it as a potent clue for living. He provides two reviews of history (12–39, 43–72), each introduced by a preface (9–11, 40–42). The prefaces are the essence of the psalm. The first states that the Lord’s people (Ephraim) were defeated because they forgot (11); the second traces their repeated rebellions against the Lord to the fact that they did not remember (42). If only they had not forgotten, the enemy would not have triumphed; if only they had remembered, they would have lived obediently. This is the power of memory—and this is why, as he left us, the Lord Jesus instituted a memorial feast (1 Cor. 11:23–25). The historical reviews specify the truths on which memory is to feed and thus to mediate power for victorious, obedient living.

In any and every situation, whether the external threat of enemies (9–11) or the internal pressure of a wayward nature (40–42), suppose they had said, ‘But he has redeemed and he will provide’; suppose they had lived in a proper fear of his anger and a due sense of his love! And it is the same for us. This is the power of an active, constantly refreshed memory, living with an immediate sense of redemption (12–14, 43–53. He has brought us out of bondage into liberty), provision (15–16, 54–55. In every situation he can and will provide), judgment (17–33, 56–64. Those who know him as Father should live in godly fear, 1 Pet. 1:17), and love (34–39, 65–72. He will never turn us away when we return to him for he knows our frailty, 32–39, and he is ever active for our welfare, 65–72).

9–11 Defeat because they forgot. 40–42 Rebellion because they did not remember.

See 1 Samuel 31. Saul the Benjamite (1 Sa. 9:1–2) was particularly associated with the ‘northern’ tribes, variously called Ephraim and Israel. His home was in Gibeah (1 Sa. 10:26) which 1 Samuel 9:4 suggests was in the hills of Ephraim. After Saul’s death it was in Ephraim that the rump monarchy of Ishbosheth established a kingdom (2 Sa. 2:8) and that the rebellious Absalom found it easy to rally the Israel tribes to his banner (2 Sa. 15:2, 6, 10, 13). The review of history thus begins with the downfall of the house of Saul and asks why it should have happened—for (9) the men of Ephraim were (lit.) ‘the best equipped bowmen’. For the Lord’s people victory does not proceed from resources but from loyalty and obedience (10) prompted by remembrance (11). 41 On putting God to the test, see 56 below.

12–14, 43–53 God’s redemption. These verses share the theme of coming out of Egypt (12, 43, 51), i.e. the great divine work of redemption (42). 12–14 stress the Red Sea crossing: the power of the Lord over every opposing circumstance; 43–53 concentrate on the plagues visited on Egypt: the power of the Lord to destroy the power of the enemy. Zoan (12, 43), an ancient capital city of Egypt. Each section ends with the thought of guidance and security (14, 52–53).

The power of the Lord is against opposing circumstances and opposing forces but always for his people.

15–16, 54–55 God’s provision. The first review of history moves from Egypt to the wilderness (15–16) as the scene of divine provision (provision for pilgrimage). The second review bypasses the wilderness to recall the provision of the promised land (provision for home-coming). Note how vs 54–55 begin with his holy land and end with their homes. This is the Lord’s way, to take what is his and make it ours.

17–33, 56–64 God’s judgment. The history of the people was marred by sin, rebellion and ‘testing’ God (17–18, 56–58). The emphasis in 17–18 is on testing his faithfulness—in Exodus 16, 17 they disbelieved his power to provide food and water, suspending belief until he proved himself; in 56–58 they tested his patience, disbelieving his holiness and judgment. Both were the occasions of divine wrath (21, 31, 59, 62). The tragedies of life (31, 33, 61–64), just as much as its kindly providences (15, 16, 54, 55) are the acts of God. 29–31 (cf. Ex. 16; Nu. 11; Ps. 106:15). What they asked was not food for their need sought in a spirit of faith, but satisfaction of greed clamoured for in a spirit of unbelief. God replied by granting in wrath what they asked, to their destruction. How often we complain when our desires are crossed, not stopping to think that the Lord is withholding what would harm. 32 refers to the wilderness generation (Nu. 14:28–33). No doubt, aware that they were living in divine displeasure, they sensed with terror the approach of death. 60–64 (1 Sa. 4).

34–39, 65–72 God’s love. The Lord knows his people’s hearts (34–39), deceitful, unreliable, but his passionate love (38, merciful) makes atonement, restrains his anger and remembers frailty (39); the Lord knows his peoples needs (65–72) and spontaneously rouses himself against their enemies (65–66), comes to dwell among them (68–69) and raises up over them the king of his choice (70–72). 35 Rock in itself is a picture of changeless stability but in the light of Exodus 17:5–6 it is also a picture of saving, life-giving action (cf. 95:1). Redeemer, the next-of-kin who makes his own the needs of his people. 38 Forgave. The verb has a basic meaning ‘to cover’ but in relation to sin it never means simply to put out of sight but always ‘to cover a debt by paying the sufficient price’. 65 Rather ‘like a warrior shouting aloud through wine’, a remarkable simile designed to underline the Lord’s excited commitment to the task of putting things to rights for his people.

67–72 The historical review began (see 9–11) with the defeat of Saul’s monarchy; it ends with the dominance of Judah and David’s accession, by divine choice (68, 70). The fact that the sanctuary has been built (69) suggests that the psalm belongs to the later reign of Solomon when the king’s defection from the Lord (1 Ki. 11:1–13) first began to be evident. This would account for the abrupt ending. Saul’s monarchy could not survive, notwithstanding military prowess (9); will David’s last? With great artistry the poem stops with the accession of David, leaving the ruling family to draw its own conclusions—leaving us, too, to draw ours. For now as then the secret of life is trust and obedience fostered by remembrance.

Psalm 79. Praying and hoping in a day of wrath

Not all the adversities of life are evidences of divine wrath, as Job came to understand. But the warning predictions of the prophets left people in no doubt that when Jerusalem fell, the Babylonians (2 Ki. 24–25) were agents of divine punishment. By the time this psalm was written the ensuing ruination had lasted some time (5), but the sense of eye-witness experience is strong and suggests that the psalmist is a devout Jerusalemite who remained in Judah (2 Ki. 25:12), lamenting the devastation, longing for better days (13). The psalm alternates between ‘they’-sections (1–3, 5–7, 10–11) and ‘we’-sections (4, 8–9, 12–13). What happened in the past to others (1–3) implicates those who remain (4); the sins which called forth wrath (5–7, 8) are our sins too (9). God will not forget his detractors (10) or his sufferers (11) and we your people will once more offer praise (13).

1–5 Enduring judgment. Foremost is the hurt done to the Lord himself. His holy temple has been defiled (1). But as the sack of the city proceeded those who devoted themselves to him (servants, 2) and to whom he was devoted (saints, ‘your beloved’, 2) fell in such numbers that no one was left to perform the last duties of love (3). The situation, remaining unremedied, keeps the people of God in ongoing contempt (4). It is indeed a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. 10:31).

5–9 Under condemnation. Surely something remarkable must have occasioned such a judgment! No, just sin: 8 sins, ‘iniquities’, the consequences of a fallen, wayward nature; 9 sins, ‘shortcomings’, specific items of wrong. And not just ‘their sins’ as though the generation that perished in the sack or were deported to Babylon bore the sole blame: our sins too (9)—and if we have not likewise perished it is due to the extraordinary mercy of a sin-hating God. 5–7 must not be understood to reflect a perplexed or resentful spirit complaining of unfairness. In all the adversities of life, whether occasioned by divine wrath or part of the inexplicable but sovereign workings of his providence, our first reaction must be to bow in acceptance, as 5 implies. But may we not also pray for the overthrow of those who savagely use us for their own profit and leave our treasured possessions in ruin (7)? Part of the positive side of ‘leaving vengeance to the Lord’ (Pr. 20:22; Rom. 12:19) is the prayer that seeks the overthrow of every power that continues to mistreat the Lord’s people. 8 Hold against us, ‘remember’ (Je. 31:34; Mi. 7:18–20). Fathers. In the Bible our sinful inheritance from earlier generations is never an excuse but always the occasion of greater guilt (Lk. 11:50). Mercy, ‘compassion/passionate love’. Come ... to meet (Lk. 15:20). 9 Forgive, ‘find and pay the price which fully covers our debt of sin’. Throughout vs 8–9 the appeal is only marginally to our need; it is fundamentally an appeal to the divine nature—note the emphasis on your name (9), i.e. what you have revealed yourself to be.

10–13 Entertaining hope. The hope in v 13 rests on two foundations: first, the Lord will always stand by his own reputation (10, 12) and, secondly, he will always stand by his threatened people (10–11) for even when labouring under the infliction of his wrath we are still your people, the sheep of your pasture (13). These two foundations are reflected in the contrasting uses of reproach in vs 5, 12.

Psalm 80. The smile and the frown

The plea for the light of divine favour runs through this psalm (1, 3, 7, 19). The contrast between the smile of God (3, make your face shine) and his frown (16, your rebuke, ‘the rebuke of your face’) says it all. Desperate though the situation is—the triumphant enemy (6), God’s wrath (4), and the apparent undoing of the work of grace (8, 12)—the sole needed remedy is that he should smile, so powerful is the favour of God and so disastrous his displeasure. The disaster has fallen on the tribes of the north, Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasseh, the ancient ‘camp of Ephraim’ (Nu. 2:18), tribes linked with Joseph. Parallels with Psalm 79 (the ‘shepherd/flock’ motif [1; 79:13], prolonged divine anger [4; 79:5], mocking foes [6, 79:4]) suggest that the lament of a Judahite survivor of the Babylonian victory in Psalm 79 finds here a companion-piece from a survivor of the old northern kingdom.

The psalm is marked by a recurring refrain (3, 7, 19) in which urgency mounts as the initial cry O God (3) becomes in v 7 (lit.) ‘O God, O Omnipotent One/O Omnipotence’ and in v 19 ‘O Yahweh, O God, O Omnipotence’. But though the urgency mounts, the reality remains the same: a change in the face of God has transforming power. For the problem was not that they had fallen into the hands of man—that was only the dreadful symptom—but that they had fallen out of the favour of God. So it is with all our defeats, and to be received back to a smiling, reconciled God is our remedy. It may be that v 14 should be understood as another refrain, further dividing the psalm into its stanzas. It certainly comes in the right place, but theologically it is of supreme importance. We cannot be restored to God (3, 7, 19) until first he return, reconciling himself to us (14). The great adjustment must be on his side. As regards this, we can only plead.

1–2 The shepherd and king. A very ancient theme linked with Joseph (Gn. 48:15; 49:22–24). Enthroned ... cherubim. The cherubim overshadowing the Ark were a pedestal for the invisible throne of the invisible God and also the meeting-place between the Lord and his people (Ex. 25:18–22). Shine forth or ‘blaze forth’ (50:2). No great outreaching of power is called for, only that the darkness of his disfavour be dispelled by his light. 3, 7, 19. Restore, ‘bring us back’ (to yourself). Shine. (upon us is added by NIV). The request is only for a change in God; that the frown become a smile.

4–6 The strange provider. 4 (lit.) ‘O Yahweh, O God, O Omnipotence’, i.e. he is the Redeemer (Ex. 3:14–17; 6:6), he is God and he is himself every potentiality and power. Smoulder, ‘smoke’, expressive of divine holiness (Ex. 19:18) anger (74:1), separation from sinners (Is. 6:4–5). 5 You (Is. 45:7; Am. 3:6). The Lord uses agents (6; 79:1–3; Is. 10:5–15) but never ceases to be The Agent. 6 Source of contention, possibly as they squabbled over the spoils of conquest.

8–13 The vine-dresser. Like sheep among domestic animals, the vine among plants needs the most persistent care. Under this motif of patient providence, the psalm depicts the work of redemption, inheritance (8–9) and prospering (10). The sphere of influence (11) from the Mediterranean Sea to the River Euphrates was achieved under David and Solomon, but thereafter history became chequered and sovereignty constricted until Samaria fell to Assyria in 722 BC and Jerusalem to Babylon in 586 BC. Isaiah 5:1–7 reveals the cause of this descent into an unprotected enclave where there is no fruitfulness for God there is no power against the enemy.

15–18 The right-hand man. Rachel, dying in childbirth (Gn. 35:18) called her little boy Ben-Oni, ‘son of my sorrow’ but his father renamed him Benjamin, ‘son of my right hand’. In this way the psalm comes full-circle: Benjamin (2) has sunk down in sorrow and loss but faith says that the Lord has a man at your right hand, the son of man (17) who is looked for as the solution, the one, therefore, in whom the face of God will again wear a smile of favour. In the neatest way v 15 allows the theme of the vine to develop, for (Gn. 49:22, another Joseph reference) ‘son’ (15) can mean a vine-tendril. Beyond what the psalmist may have known, the Lord did indeed watch over his vine-people until in the fullness of the time (Gal. 4:4) the expected son-tendril came to birth, the man at your right hand (17) in whom we have been given new life (18; Jn. 10:10) and an unprecedented access to God (Eph. 2:18) to invoke his name.

Psalm 81. Bidden to the feast

The mid-month feast (3) to which this psalm refers could be either Passover (Ex. 12:18) or Tabernacles (Lv. 23:39) both of which were essentially exodus-remembrances (Ex. 12:26–27; Lv. 23:42–43). It is more likely Tabernacles because of the references to the Law and listening to the Lord (8–10, 11, 13; cf. Dt. 31:9–13) and to harvest abundance (10, 16; cf. Dt. 16:13–15). The psalm begins with the ordinance of God which the people must keep (1–5), moves on to the acts of God in deed (6–7) and word (8–10), and ends with the requirement of God that his people should obey him (11–16), dwelling on the dire consequences of disobedience (11, 12) and on victory and rich abundance (14–16) consequent upon obedience (13). Thus the psalm deals with the great central issues of the Bible: redemption and response. The people who are brought out of Egypt (6; the redeemed of the Lord, Ex. 6:6, 7; 24:4, 5) become at once people under the word of God (8–10; Ex. 19:3–6; 20:2–19) which they are called to hear and obey (8, 13; Ex. 24:6, 7; Rom. 1:5; Heb. 3:7–19; 1 Pet. 1:1, 2).

1–3 A mounting tide of acclamation—congregation, songsters and instrumentalists, trumpeters (3)—a whole people of praise—greet the Feast.

4–5a Decree, an unchangeable rule; ordinance, an authoritative decision of the Lord; statute, a testimony to what he is (i.e. the God of exodus redemptive power and holy law).

5b Against Egypt dates the feast from the time of divine action against Egypt to deliver Israel but the same words (lit. ‘to go out over’) are used in Genesis 41:45 of Joseph taking up his position as Lord of Egypt. The exodus was the supreme example of the Sovereign God in action.

5, 10, 16 are three first person utterances (5c, lit. ‘A language/voice I did not know I began to hear’) each concluding its own section of the psalm. The latter two represent the voice of the Lord and the first, exceedingly difficult to interpret, is likely also to be the Lord speaking. If so it refers back to Ex. 2:24–25 (where was concerned about is, lit. ‘... and God knew’). Thus, everything begins for the Lord’s people when he looks on their needs and ‘knows’, enters into a relationship of care towards them (5). Those whom he redeems and to whom he reveals his word (6–10) are invited to enjoy full sufficiency (10); those who obey are promised rich and miraculous sustenance (16)—honey, when the best of the past was water (Ex. 17:6).

6–10 trace events from the exodus-deliverance (6) to the Red Sea (7; Ex. 14:10, 19, 24; Ps. 99:6, 7), then on into the wilderness (7; Ex. 17:1–7) and to Sinai (8–10). The Lord liberates his people (6), answers their prayers and determines their experiences (7) and reveals his word (8–10). 7 I tested you. But Exodus 17:2 says they tested the Lord! Life’s adversities (Ex. 17:1) are divine testings (Dt. 8:2) but if we come to them doubting his love, care and power to save, we ‘test’ him by suggesting that he must prove himself before we will trust him. 8–10 The foundation duty (8): obedience; the foundation truth (9): sole-loyalty; and the foundation itself (10): the Lord, the Redeemer. 11, 12 (Is. 5:5–7; Rom. 1:24, 26, 28). Because of disobedience, they were sent into the wilderness when they might have been enjoying Canaan (Dt. 1:32–2:1).

13 Cf. 8 (the Lord’s central requirement), 11 (their central fault), and now (13) the key factor determining loss or gain.

Psalm 82. Judgment in the high court: a vision and a prayer

Poets do not always explain themselves and we, their readers, trail behind, making the best we can of their allusions.

1 The court in session. Presides is translated ‘takes his place’ in an identical context in Isaiah 3:13. The Great Judge himself enters to give judgment among the ‘gods’—but who are ‘the gods’?

2 The accusation. The ‘gods’ have used their position to defend the unjust, ‘pervert justice’ and to favour wickedness.

3–4 The law. The prosecuting counsel opens by reminding his Lordship how the law stands: this is what the ‘gods’ should have done: to uphold the rights of the defenceless, Weak ... fatherless, those without earthly resources, of either wealth or people; poor, the downtrodden, those at the bottom of life’s heap; oppressed, the impoverished; needy, people who can be exploited by stronger, vested interests. Such are not to be favoured by the law but protected by the due operation of their legal rights and (4) they must be protected by law from the power (hand) of law-breakers.

5 The witnesses. Having stated the law (3–4), counsel now calls witnesses. The first (5a) accuses the ‘gods’ of lack of wisdom: they are ignorant rather than knowledgeable; they lack understanding/discernment in decision and action. The second (5b) testifies that under such government people are led astray, as though living in darkness, lacking direction and purpose. The third witness (5c) testifies to the breakdown of social structures and stabilities.

6–7 The sentence. ‘Gods’ or no ‘gods’, whatever be their status (6) they will suffer the death penalty like ordinary mortals (7).

8 Prayer. The vision of God giving judgment (1) is turned into a prayer that he will do so—worldwide because this is his right (8).

So what does it all mean? (i) The ‘gods’ may be the shadowy but real ‘principalities and powers’ working their own evil way in the affairs of earth (Is. 24:21; Dn. 10:12–13, 20; Eph. 6:12). The OT occasionally uses ‘gods’/‘sons of God’ for angelic beings (8:5; Jb. 1:6). (ii) The duties specified in vs 2–4 are, however, those of Israel’s judges (Ex. 22:22–24; 23:6–7; Dt. 1:16–17; 10:17–18; 16:18–20); their work is to exercise ‘the Lord’s judgment’ (Dt. 1:17). To bring a case ‘before God’ and ‘before the priests/judges’ are interchangeable terms (Ex. 21:6; 22:8, 9; Dt. 17:8–13; 19:17). Furthermore, the Lord Jesus understood ‘gods’ as humans ‘to whom the word of God came’ (Jn. 10:35).

The balance is thus tipped in favour of earthly rulers considered in their high dignity, the responsibility they hold to God and for which they will be answerable to him. (iii) When earthly rulers fail (5), being themselves directionless, leaving people comfortless, presiding over social disintegration, there is still a true God to whom they are answerable (1, 6–7) and to whom we can pray (8).

Psalm 83. Foes around but God above

It is helpful to read 2 Chronicles 20 as an illustration of this psalm, but the situation here exceeds any coalition Israel ever faced. Rather than trying to associate it with some historical incident we should see it as a picture of the people of God finding a resource in prayer (1) in the face of a hostile world (2–8), fashioning their prayer in the light of the revealed power of God (9–15) and desiring the blessed outcome when the one Most High is universally acknowledged (16–18). The psalm teaches how we are placed amid a world that hates us because we do not belong to it (Jn. 15:18–25); how we should react: there is no way out, only prayer; where we should rest: in the already-demonstrated power of God to overcome the world (9–12; Jn. 16:33; Rev. 1:17–18); what we should wish: not just personal relief from opposition, nor just the end of opposition, but the conversion of those who oppose (16, 18).

1–4 Your people. The psalm opens with the threat to the Lord’s people expressed in the foe’s determination to destroy them ‘from being a nation’ and to blot their name from memory (4), leaving them without a place on earth or a place in history. This is the deadly enmity of the world, evidenced in its reaction to and treatment of the Lord Jesus (Jn. 1:10; Acts 3:13–15). It offers no compromise and should be offered none (2 Cor. 6:14–7:1; Jas. 4:4). 3 Cherish, ‘hide’, hidden away in a secret, strong place as one would hide valuables. 4 Destroy, a strong word: ‘efface/eliminate’.

5–8 Yourself. Not only his people but more specifically the Lord himself is the target of the alliance (5). It is true that he will never forsake us (Is. 41:10; Heb. 13:5); it is more deeply true that he will stand by the glory of his name (Jos. 7:9; Is. 42:8; Ezk. 20:9, 14, 22, 44; 36:22). 6 A coalition of peoples to the east Hagrites, ‘Descendants of Hagar’ (1 Ch. 5:10; 11:38; 27:31). Presumably linked with Abraham and Hagar. 7 Gebal. Some suggest an otherwise unmentioned place in Transjordan. Gebal (a N. Palestinian [Phoenician] port) is mentioned in Jos. 13:5; 1 Ki. 5:18; Ezk. 27:9. If this is intended the list begins in the far north, moves east to Ammon, south to Amalek, round to Philistia in the west and back to Tyre in the north: a total encirclement of the Lord’s people. 8 Assyria may be the dark power behind the ‘front line’ coalition states, like ‘the god of this world’ (2 Cor. 4:3, 4) behind every overt hostility to the church, but possibly ‘Asshur’ here is an Arabian tribe of N. Sinai (cf. Gn. 25:3, 18; Nu. 24:22, 24). Lot (Gn. 19:36–38; Dt. 2:9, 19).

9–12 Your land. Canaan is called the pasture-lands of God (12) because there he shepherds his flock. All the earth is his but this land is his special treasure (Dt. 11:12), as is his people (Ex. 19:5). 9 A similar alliance (Jdg. 6:1, 2) would have prompted this memory of Midian and the mind would easily move to Sisera (Jdg. 4–5). Midian perished at the hands of a meagre 300 so that the excellency of the power might be God’s (Jdg. 7:1–7); Sisera fell by the hand of a lone woman (Jdg. 4:17–22; 5:24–27, 31). 11 (Jdg. 7:25; 8:18–21)

13–16 Your tempest. The Lord has all the forces of creation at his command and they often become, as here, symbols of his own power—to scatter, destroy, disorientate and disappoint (shame, disappointment of all they hoped) his foes. But his ways are ever full of purposeful mercy and in our prayers we should share that attitude. Sometimes people must be brought to nothing (13–15) so that they may be brought to God (16).

17–18 Your name. The note sounded at the end of the last section becomes a dominant theme. The prayer with which the psalm opens, be not quiet (1), becomes a prayer for a voice of divine revelation, let them know (18), addressing those who, left to themselves, plotted the elimination of the church (4). Whose name is (18) is rather ‘by’ or ‘because of your name’: i.e. ‘by’ telling them who and what he is, he will win them to himself; or because he is what he is he must move out towards them in revelation.

Psalm 84. ‘To be a pilgrim’

In its depth of longing and hunger for God himself (2), its sense of the efficacy of the sacrifice God has provided (3), its resoluteness of faith (5–7), its blissful contentment with God (10–11), this psalm rebukes our meagre spirituality.

1–4 Longing. The soul is the essential ego, heart and flesh the inward and outward aspects of personality: thus the whole person is caught up in a consuming longing for God’s house and for God himself. The thought of the security of the birds that nest on and around the Lord’s house leads to the thought of that which secures the safety of all who dwell there (4), the altar where sinners are reconciled to the Holy God and he to them. 3–4 The sequence is: ‘The birds are safe in their house; it is the place of God’s altar; we are safe in his house.’ The altar is the key to our security.

5–8 Journeying. Blessedness is not confined to the house. There is also a blessedness on pilgrimage, when pilgrims (i) live by God’s strength, (ii) keep their hearts resolute (5, Lk. 9:51–53, AV, RV, RSV), (iii) meet adversities with unshaken faith (6, see below) and so (iv) find ever increasing strength until (v) they are themselves accepted into God presence (7) and into a speaking relationship with him (8). 6 The valley of Baca, ‘balsam trees’, possibly an actual place (2 Sa. 5:22–25), here typifies every arid, uninviting aspect of pilgrimage. To make it a place of springs involves meeting its aridity with an assurance that, none the less, there will be water (contrast Ex. 17:1–3)—and, sure enough, God’s rains ... cover it, (lit.) ‘with blessings’.

9–12 Resting. The continuance of the house depended on the king and the stability of the kingdom under him. He was thus the guarantor of spiritual enjoyments. Consequently the pilgrim prays for the king (9). For us, Jesus, with his unchanged priestly-kingship, is the eternal guarantor of our security, acceptance and blessedness (cf. Heb. 4:14–16; 7:23–25; 1 Jn 2:1, 2). 9 Shield ... anointed. As ‘anointed’ he is appointed and endowed by God; as ‘shield’ he covers us. 10 begins with ‘For’, explaining the prayer in v 9. The pilgrim prays for the king ‘because’ he wants the benefits of the house made secure. 11 explains v 10: life with God is preferable to any other life because he is sun, the source of light (27:1) and life (56:13), shield, protector from every threat; by his favour, ‘grace’ he draws us to himself and then shares his glory with us (2 Pet. 1:3–4). But not unconditionally: the good he freely gives (11) is for those whose walk (both lifestyle and the motives which prompt it) is blameless (Mt. 5:48). At the same time it is not their achievements but (12) their trust which makes them blessed.

Psalm 85. Longing for revival

Life’s troubles do not always indicate God’s disapproval but our reaction should always include self-examination lest there is sin to be confessed and wrong to be righted. Such was the occasion of this psalm. God’s favour was only a memory (1–3); the present was full of his anger (4–7). The unknown writer who has left us this meditation adopted the same pose as Habakkuk: just as the prophet, puzzled by the present (1:1–17) stood and looked to see what he will say (2:1), so the psalmist, having reviewed the situation (1–7), set himself to listen to what God ... will say. The psalm is a prophetic meditation on the theme of revival/renewal (6).

1–3 Remembering: the foundation of God’s favour. When, earlier, God had favoured and restored (1), it was through forgiving their sin (2) and turning from his wrath (3). There was a change in them—the repentance that brings forgiveness; and a change in God—the abandonment of wrath that brings peace. There can be no renewal/revival until sin is forgiven and wrath propitiated. 2 Forgave, ‘bore away’ (Lv. 16:21, 22).

4–7 Pleading: the end of wrath and the gift of salvation. Salvation means deliverance—in this case deliverance from God’s displeasure (‘vexation’, 4), anger (as personally felt, 5). Only in this way can there be revival/renewal with its consequent joy in God (6); and it can only come about through his changeless love and free gift (7). In the matter of revival/renewal we are dependent on his sovereign will. 4 Restore us again, ‘Turn back to us’—the heart of the matter (3, 5) is that he should be reconciled to us.

8–9 Listening: the word of promise and its conditions. I will listen, ‘I resolve to listen’—a committed posture. Those who desire revival/renewal must wait upon God’s word. But this imposes demands: (i) to respond to his love: saints (8, ‘the objects of his committed love who are committed to love him back’); (ii) to forsake the follies of the past (8). (iii) to live in the fear of God (9, 1 Pet. 1:17–19). The consequence is that glory—God in all his glory—will come among his people.

10–13 Expecting: the harmony of heaven and earth. God's attributes are in harmony: he loves us without any adjustment of his 'truth' (10); he extends his peace to us without compromising his righteousness (10, Is. 45:21–25; Rom. 3:23–26). Heaven and earth are in harmony (11): earth produces the fruit of 'truth' (11, Is. 45:8; Eph. 5:8–9) under the untroubled gaze of righteousness itself from heaven (11). As God gives earth responds (12): the ultimate reality of salvation includes the restoration of Eden in the New Heavens and the New Earth (Is. 65:17–25; 2 Pet. 3:13). Into this situation, with his herald Righteousness preceding him, comes God himself (13, Rev. 21:3).

13 (Lit.) 'And O let him set his feet on the way'—the Psalm's equivalent of Rev. 22:20.

Psalm 86. The pillow of sovereignty

Seven times (3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 12, 15) David speaks of the Lord, using the word which expresses the sovereignty of God. In personal need (1), in the day of my trouble (7), when the arrogant and ruthless (14) were hot against him, he found a pillow on which to lay his head: the Sovereign God who would hear his prayers (3–4), deliver him (12–13) and put his foes to shame (17). In this psalm of protracted intercession, the need (14) is not specified until David has first explored his relationship with God (1–6) and renewed his commitment (11–12). At a deeper level we may say that his prayer is more occupied with 'telling God about God', dwelling meditatively on the divine nature, than with 'telling God about me'. In this it mirrors the way people pray in the Bible (Ne. 9:5–31, 32–37; Acts 4:24–28, 29–30) and is a model for us.

1–6 'To you, O Sovereign': he hears prayer. The section is 'enclosed' by an appeal to be heard (1, 6). The word for in 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (omitted, NIV) and what v 2 implies offer five grounds on which we pray: (i) Because of helplessness (1): poor and needy, downtrodden and the ineffectual pawn of others; (ii) Because of two-way love (2): devoted, better 'dear and devoted', loved and loving back; (iii) Because of committed trust (2), a personal relationship (my God) issuing in obedience (servant), founded on trust; (iv) Because of persistent (all day, 3) expectant intercession (3–4). To 'lift up the soul' (24:4) is to bring all our desires to God alone and to look to him alone for supply; (v) Because he is what he is (5), good 'kind', towards us in our need, forgiving our sins, abounding in the unchanging love to which he has committed himself.

7–13 'None like you, O Sovereign': he is the only God. David now comes closer to the situation: the 'brackets' of the section are v 7, confidence that in the day of trouble God will answer, and v 13, confidence that divine unfailing love 'will deliver' (the verb is future) even if his enemies bring him to the grave and in Sheol he faces the life beyond. His awareness of the greatness of God starts on the widest scale: (8–10), that the only God is sovereign over every power there may be in heaven (8), and awaits the submission of all the earth (9); it moves to the personal plane (11–12), that the only God is worthy of his total commitment, outwardly in the way he lives, inwardly in heart (11) and upwardly in praise (12). 11 does not mean 'teach me how to get out of this trouble' but 'teach me, while the trouble still rages, to live your way'. Undivided heart, 'unite/unify my heart', deliver me from being double-minded, two-faced with God; give me 'a single, steady aim, unmoved by threatening or reward, to you and your great name'.

14–17 ‘But you, O Sovereign’: he is sufficient. Now we learn the actual situation which has brought David into weakness (1) and trouble (7). The recurring reference to the love, forgiveness and mercy of God (3, 5, 6, 15, 16) suggests that he was fleeing from Absalom, a situation in which he was himself by no means innocent. 2 Samuel 16:5–7 reveals how some in the land felt about David, and 2 Samuel 17:1–4 shows that arrogant and ruthless (14) is not poetic licence. Yet the compassionate ... gracious (15; Ex. 34:5–6) God was sufficient both for David’s weakness (16) and against David’s foes (17). 17 Sign, as in Jdg. 6:36–40. When people are so stressed as to need a sign, God is compassionate enough to condescend to their weakness.

Psalm 87. Zion’s children

Three OT themes converge in this psalm and explain its often enigmatic lines: (i) The ‘city’ theme: (Is. 2:2–4; 26:1–4; 54–55; 60; Heb. 12:22–24). Man’s first attempt to organize the world without reference to God resulted in a city (Gn. 11:1–9) and the Bible pictures the consummation of the recreative work of God as his coming world-city (Rev. 21:1–2, 15–27). (ii) The ‘birth’ theme. When Nehemiah wished to populate his new Zion, its would-be citizens had to prove that they had a birthright to live there (Ne. 7:4ff., 64; cf. Ezr. 2:59, 62). This corresponds to the ‘new birth’ (Jn. 1:12–13; 3:3–8). (iii) The ‘book’ theme: (Ex. 32:32; Ps. 56:8; 69:28; Ezk. 13:9; Dan. 12:1; Lk. 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 3:5). Isaiah 4:3 is important as linking the ‘book’ theme to Zion. These three themes form the substance of Psalm 87. It is a Zion-psalm (1–3)—a ‘birth’-psalm (4–5), and a ‘book’-psalm (6). In essence it proclaims the coming world-city of God in which birthright will be extended to formerly hostile and pagan nations (4), on the basis of their inclusion by the Lord in his register (6).

- A¹ (v 1) His foundation
- B¹ (v 2) the Lord’s love
- C¹ (v 3) The City of God
- D (v 4) The world city
- C² (v 5) The City of the Most High
- B² (v 6) The Lord’s register
- A² (v 7) My fountains

The contrast between v 1 and v 7 reveals the movement of the psalm from what the Lord thinks of Zion (1–3) to the people who live there and enjoy its benefits (5–7) (cf. Ne. 7:4ff). V 4 is thus the pivot of the whole psalm: how the city embraces as its children the whole wide world. The Lord’s founding and esteem of the city (1–2) is expressed in the glorious things said about it (3). What are these? The reply is in v 4: its citizens are worldwide, they know the Lord and possess a birthright to the city. Zion is thus the consummation of the purposes of God. But this incoming of a worldwide citizenry, far from diminishing the speciality of Zion is in fact (5) the very way the Most High ... will establish her. Yet how can a worldwide company possess the requisite birthright? Because (6) the Lord himself has entered their birth on Zion’s register. Consequently there is no distinction and (7) singers and musicians—the whole rejoicing company—alike enjoy what Isaiah (12:3) called ‘fountains of salvation’ (cf. Joel 3:18).

Note. 4 Rahab, a nickname for Egypt (Is. 30:7). Egypt and Babylon, the two great oppressors; Philistia and Tyre, the contrasting warlike and commercial powers of the world; Cush, earth’s remotest bounds.

Psalm 88. The darkness of the soul: patient faith, faithful patience

The three sections of this psalm have three common features: each opens with a testimony of sustained prayer (1–2, 9, 13); each laments an experience of darkness (6, 12, 18); and each faces death (5, 10, 15). There in a nutshell is this ‘psalm without hope’. Someone who knows the Lord as (lit.) ‘the God of my salvation’ (1), has no hope in the face of death (9–12). Someone who is committed to prayer finds no remedial answers to suffering. The wrath of God (7), the alienation of friends and inescapable (8) debilitating grief (9) fills the whole of life; the upward look sees only wrath, the inward look, terror (16); the outward look, present threats and absent friends (17–18) and the forward look, unrelieved darkness (18).

Most pastors will have had to minister in such a situation, holding the hand of a dear fellow-believer sinking into seemingly comfortless sorrows and facing eternity without assurance. And most believers will have encountered—in lesser or greater degree—the dark valley which excludes sunlight and where Jesus and his love, the gospel and its assurances, heaven and its compensations all refer to someone else. The psalm tells us that unrelieved suffering may still be our lot. It reminds us that we are not in heaven yet but part of a groaning creation (Rom. 8:18–23). It sets before us a shining example of the faith that holds on and of resolute occupancy of the place of prayer. Here is one walking in darkness, without light, and trusting in the name of the Lord and leaning on his God (Is. 50:10).

1–9a Life without light. Are there dead who are cut off from the Lord’s care? Yes indeed: they occupy the lowest pit ... the darkest depths (6), pressed down by divine wrath (7). As the psalmist feels that his long drawn-out terminal condition (15) is near its earthly end (3) it is this that afflicts him: is he to die under wrath? It is this too that drives him to prayer (1–2; note for in v 3).

9b–12 Death without hope. Beyond death man’s destiny is sealed. To die with the issue of divine wrath unsettled, is to go where there can be no expectation of God’s wonders, his supernatural saving acts, nothing for which to praise him (10), no experience of his love to share, no reliance on his faithful care (11), no one who can speak of his saving marvels (12), nothing of (lit.) ‘your righteousness’, divine intervention to set everything to rights. Only Destruction (11), darkness and divine forgetfulness (12, cf. 5, remember no more, for the meaning of ‘remember’, Ex. 2:24), i.e. God leaving people to their own devices without any loving, caring, provident intervention from him. This is not (as some commentaries mistakenly insist) a general statement of OT belief about life after death awaiting NT correction. The Psalm describes only the death this psalmist dreads, death under divine wrath. When the NT takes up this theme, it is to make it infinitely more dreadful.

13–18 Question without answer. The cry for help (13) becomes a cry for explanation (14) and no answer is vouchsafed—just as to the end God offered Job no explanation and we, similarly, with understandable folly, ask the same question with the same result. Were an answer to be given, undoubtedly it would be as baffling as the situation it was meant to explain. For the circumstances of life are his appointments and his doing. In life’s storm we encounter his waves (7) and in our fears his terrors (16–17). That sovereignty which does not explain itself, which is brimful of infinite wisdom, love, power and justice, which is, therefore, far beyond our grasp and sight—that sovereignty is our pillow (Ps. 86) when all (18) is darkness.

Psalm 89. ‘Does he promise and not fulfil?’

The structure of this psalm tells its story. It consists of two identically shaped sections (1–14, 38–51) surrounding a ‘core’ (15–37). V 52 is an editorial conclusion to Book 3 of the Psalms.

1–14 God’s promises guaranteed by God’s nature. Three eight-line stanzas (as NIV, 1–4, 5–8, 9–12) with a four-line concluding summary (13–14). The psalmist sets himself to sing of divine love (1) as eternal (2) and, in particular, recalls the Lord’s promise to David (3) of an enduring line and a secure throne (4). Since the Lord is supreme in heaven (5–8) and sovereign on earth (9–12) these promises must stand. In summary, the Lord possesses power and supremacy (13); his royal dignity rests on his holiness expressed in principle (righteousness) and practice (justice); and everything he does is heralded (14) by love and faithfulness.

15–37 Focal points of promise. Six eight-line stanzas: (i) the favoured people (15–18); (ii) the favoured king: David anointed (19–21), promised universal sway (22–25), related to the Lord as son to father, supreme over earth’s kings, enjoying an eternal covenant of love and promised an enduring line (26–29); (iii) the favoured dynasty: disciplined but never rejected (30–33), established for ever within the inviolable Davidic covenant (34–37).

38–51 The failure of the promises: resort to prayer. Three eight-line stanzas (38–41, 42–45, 46–49) and a four-line concluding prayer (51–52), match the opening section in shape. But contrast with it in theme: the fourteen affirmations of divine sovereignty (9–14) are balanced by fourteen verbs of personal divine destructive action contradicting the promises (38–45). The covenant has been renounced and national defences have been shattered (38–41); enemies are in the ascendant and the throne lies on the ground (42–45); so where is all this former ... love that was pledged (46–49); Lord, remember your servants and your anointed (50, 51).

What is to be done when great promises become great disappointments? The promises to David were plain and pointed. A covenant was inaugurated (3), pledged in perpetuity (28, 34), and then renounced (39). Even more particular there is the love of God, by definition changeless: in vs 1, 2, 14, 24, 28, 33, 49 the word used expresses the love of commitment, love in the will and not just in the emotions, pledged love. The psalm is bracketed by this word used in the plural (1, 49). This is unusual enough in the OT to excite attention for the plural is only used ten times as compared with well over two hundred in the singular. In the psalm the plural, ‘commitments of changeless love’ (1, 49) calls attention to the two-sided promise, lovingly made to David: a world-dominating throne (22–25) pledged by love (24), and an enduring dynasty (26–29, 30–33) pledged by love (28, 33).

Yet it is precisely these covenantal, love-based promises that have failed. It is easiest to picture a psalmist after the fall of Jerusalem (597, 586 BC), and the exile of the last kings (2 Ki. 24:8–12; 25:6–7), pondering, in Babylon, the meaning of these events, candidly facing the reality of a throne dominated rather than dominant and of a dynasty that has run into the sand, and asking Balaam’s question: Does God promise and not fulfil? His answer is surpassingly wonderful. When God’s promises seem to have failed, then affirm them in joyful song (1, 2) and bring all the grief of the unfulfilled promises to God in prayer (46–49, 50–51). We must remember that the psalmist set himself to sing the promises (1–2) when he knew he was going to record their failure (38–45) and that he prayed his sorrowful prayer when as yet there was no sign of a remedy. But how right he was to do so for (in God’s timetable) soon a root would spring from the dry ground (Is. 53:2) and a divine Son of David (Is. 9:6–7) would reign in victory (Is. 9:4, 5) and righteousness (Is. 11:1–5; 32:1) for ever (Lk. 1:31–33).

In a word, the promises had not failed but human understanding of God’s time-scale and of the complexity of his world-rule was not sufficient to keep step with what he was doing. So it is for us: the promises never fail, though seeming delay makes some lapse into doubt (2 Pet. 3:4)— and it is not just the great promise of his coming, ‘for no matter how many promises God has made, they are “Yes” in Christ.’ The promises cannot fail, though our expectations may, at any moment, be blighted. At such a time, like the psalmist, we must turn the promises into song and the disappointments into prayer.

2 The NIV omits ‘For’ at the beginning of this verse. It should be restored for the song in v 1 arises from the affirmation of v 2. When faith declares that God’s word cannot fail, the mouth is filled with singing. Forever (see 2, 4, 16, 28, 29, 36, 37). In these verses, in a variety of expressions, the theme of perpetuity is stressed. This is the issue the psalmist faced and which he makes us face: God made everlasting commitments but they have not been kept. How is such a situation to be faced?

5–8, 9–12 The point of these two stanzas is that since there is no power in heaven or on earth to withstand the Lord, what can possibly prevent the fulfilment of his promises? 9, 10 The sea is often used typically of an unruly universe in which restless adversaries set themselves against the Lord. In pagan mythology this was ‘personalized’ into the battle waged by the creator god, Marduk, against the chaos monster, Rahab. This battle took place before creation in order to give Marduk a clear field to perform his work. In the Bible Rahab is a nickname for Egypt (Is. 30:7), for what Marduk did when there were no witnesses (and therefore requires an act of credulity to believe it), the Lord did historically, shattering Egypt and severing the Red Sea (Is. 51:9–11), when people were there to see and testify to the conquering might of the Lord (Dt. 1:30). History puts a rock-foundation under theology.

13–14 Strong ... righteousness ... love. If we could deny any one of these three, every problem of suffering would be logically explicable. We could say, God is strong and righteous in all he does, but he is not always loving; or, he is righteous and loving but not always strong enough to do what he wants; or, he is loving and strong but not always righteous. But since he is always all three together and every act of God is full of his almighty strength, holy righteousness and changeless love, we face life with faith rather than with explanations, with trust in him rather than reliance on our own logic.

18 Restore the initial ‘For’. The blessedness of God’s people (15–16) is explained (17) by the Lord as their strength; this in turn is explained (18) by their possession of the Lord’s king reigning over them. In this way, the loss of the reigning king meant the end of the blessedness—a blessedness that would not come back until the king comes back. 19 Strength on a warrior, or ‘help against a warrior’—David, divinely helped against Goliath (1 Sa. 17:37). 25 Sea ... rivers, i.e. universally, the two contrasting categories of water used to express totality. 26, 27 My Father ... firstborn (see on Ps. 2:7). 30–33 (Cf. 2 Sa. 7:1–16). The psalm reaches back to the foundational promises given to David. 37 Sky, ‘cloud’. Only rarely does this word appear in the singular. Elsewhere always plural, of ‘clouds’. The faithful witness may be the rainbow (Gn. 9:12–17) or, on the basis of v 6, the incomparable God himself.

38–45 Even though these verses do not specifically mention the fall of Jerusalem they describe something more than a passing defeat of the Davidic king. No mere setback could be described as a breach of covenant or a casting down of crown and throne to the ground. Nothing suits the verses as well as the events of 597 BC and 586 BC with the ensuing captivity and end of the monarchy. Likewise in v 46 the long duration of trouble speaks to the same point.

46–49, 50–51 These two prayers both call on the Lord to remember, not as if he had forgotten, but (as in Ex. 2:24–25) that he should allow his commitment and care of his people to flourish in fresh action. The first prayer calls for urgent action. The psalmist naturally wants to live to see the reversal of the overthrow and the re-establishment of Zion. The second prayer pleads on the basis of the distressed state of the Lord's people. The mockery of the nations who destroyed city and monarchy—and, if he is in Babylon, the daily mockery directed to one who professes faith in a sovereign God and is yet a captive exile—burdens the psalmist's heart. Not only so but (51) has he actually seen the Davidic king paraded as a captive through the streets with mockers deriding his every step? We can easily identify with these two prayers as the world scornfully dismisses the church of our Lord Jesus Christ and mocks his Name and we, for our part, long for revival and the honouring of the Name above every name.

Psalm 90. Preserving an endangered species

The Hebrew text of Psalms is clear that this is a prayer of Moses and commentators who resist it are notably short of impressive reasons for doing so. No situation suits the psalm so well as that of Moses during the wearisome years of divine alienation (Nu. 14:34). It is a beautiful, moving and realistic psalm, facing our insecurities and offering us a remedy and a hope.

1, 2 A fixed address in time and eternity. These verses begin with the time-reference in which human life is set, throughout all generations, 'generation after generation', and end with the eternal sweep of the life of God from everlasting to everlasting. Within this panorama of time and eternity we have a fixed address. He 'has proved himself to be our dwelling place'. United with him, we enjoy permanence. With what feeling Moses could and would have said this!

3–11 The endangered species. For forty years Moses watched sadly as time, like an ever-rolling stream, bore all its sons away (3–6, Nu. 14:23, 29; Dt. 2:14–16) and recognized behind what he saw the dread reality of the anger of God against sin (7–11). But the truth he expressed is true of all humankind: threatened by impermanence (3–6), and blighted by wrath (7–11). It is by the agency of God that we suffer the insecurity of transience. It is by his decree (Gn. 3:19) that we return to dust—an inescapable fate, for (4) even those whose life-span was near-millennial (Gn. 5) came to death like all others and for all alike the fresh grass of the morning is the dry vegetation of the evening (5–6). Why should this be? Why should a species destined to eat of the Tree of Life and live for ever (Gn. 2:16; 3:22) crumble to dust and sleep in death? Restoring 'For' to the beginning of v 7 gives the answer—divine anger ... indignation against iniquities ... secret sins (8), wrath (9)! Is it simply the product of an incurably melancholy spirit to say that life ends with a moan (9) and that prolonged days only mean prolonged sorrow (10)? Of course there are other sides to life but when we stand back the common denominator of people worldwide is a sad tale of lives blighted by sin, inescapably answerable to the sin-hating God.

12–15 Preserving the endangered species. The remainder of the psalm is a series of six prayers. It is by prayer that we counter the disintegrative power of sin, by prayer that we fly to the God whom we have offended, by prayer that we take up our dwelling place (1) in him. This was the way of Moses (e.g. Ex. 15:25; 17:4; 32:31–32; Nu. 13–19). To preserve the endangered species there are four aspects of prayer: recognize our limited time so as to use it with wisdom (12); cry for compassion from a reconciled God (13); counter the withering of life (the morning of 5–6) with a new morning filled with his love which does not change all our days (14); look to him to make life as full of gladness as otherwise it would have been of affliction (15). Here are the four strong walls of our eternal dwelling in God: he is our wisdom (12, 1 Cor. 1:30), our forgiveness (13, Is. 55:7), our stability throughout our days (14, 73:26), our renewal (15, Rom. 6:4–8).

16–17 Partakers of the divine nature. The psalm ends as it began by referring to the Lord, ‘the Sovereign’ (1, 17), and to the passing generations (1, 16). It began by affirming that we can enter into him for permanency (1); it ends by praying that he will come upon our children in his splendour (16) and upon us in his ‘loveliness’ (17, favour). He not only opens himself to us (1); he shares himself with us (16–17). We who are caught up in the passing of the generations, the transiency of life, the dark undercurrent of divine wrath, are made partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. 1:2–4) in all its glory and beauty.

Psalm 91. Divine wings and guardian angels

Some threats lie in wait for us (3), some sneak up insidiously (3, 6); some are our own dreads, real or imaginary, some reflect hostility (5); some, again, we meet on life’s pathway (12–13). Life is like that. But simple trust brings us into a place of strong defence (2), the personal warmth of divine care, pledged defence (4) and a host of heavenly guardians every step of the way (11). The form in which all this is stated itself serves to affirm our protected status.

- A¹ (v 1) Theme stated: sure protection
- B¹ (v 2) Personal testimony
- C¹ (vs 3–8) Affirmation
- B² (v 9a) Personal testimony
- C² (vs 9b–13) Affirmation
- A² (vs 14–16) Theme confirmed: divine protection

It is a psalm of personal testimony (2, 9) but the matter does not rest there. Testimony may be the product of imagination or of wishful thinking and, in any case, what is true of one person may not necessarily apply to others. But here human testimony is enfolded (1, 14–16) in divine testimony and affirmed by the word of God (3–8, 9–13). The whole is a highly artistic way of expressing a fundamentally important fact: that we are always totally secure. How such a psalm came to be written is a matter of conjecture. Did a troubled individual seek out a prophet who applied the word of God directly to his need and then was privileged to be the agent of the voice of the Lord, or is the whole just the record of individual pondering of a great truth in the light of experience and truth. Here is a psalm for every believer every day.

1 Sure protection. Most High (Gn. 14:18–22). How promptly Abram recognized that Melchizedek’s God must be his God—for he had proved his sovereign exaltation in victory! Almighty (Gn. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; 49:25). Consideration of these references shows that Shaddai (see NIV mg.) is the God whose power is sufficient in every human weakness.

3–8 Protection from life’s threats. The emphasis here is on things which come unasked upon us. We should isolate the psalm from the rest of of Scripture if we understood it to promise immunity. Here, as elsewhere (e.g. Rom. 8:28), the promise is not security from but security in. 3 Fowler, ‘trapper’. Deadly, ‘chance’. 4 Feathers (61:4; Lk.13:34). Shield ... rampart, two different sorts of protection summarizing every possible protection. 8 A plain implication that the simple trust which ensures protection also carries moral obligations.

9a Protection found. (Lit.) Indeed you, Lord, are my refuge! You have made the Most High your dwelling.

9b–13 Protection on life's path. These verses stress the dangers that we encounter in all your ways, out and about in life. When Satan used these verses against the Lord Jesus, the reply he received was that genuine trust does not demand that the Lord prove himself but simply rests in God's care (Mt. 4:5–7). 12–13 The lion and the snake represent respectively dangers in strength and insidiousness. The doubling of the names implies 'in whatever guise they come'.

14–16 Divine promises of protection. The Lord's eight promises: rescue (intervening action), security (protect, set on high out of reach of danger), answered prayer, companionship in need, deliverance (from threat), vindication (honour), personal fulfilment (satisfy) and the enjoyment of salvation. Note how these reach from initial saving action (rescue) right through to fully enjoyed salvation and cover all intervening needs. There are three conditions to be fulfilled: loves me (the yearning love which clings to the loved one), 'knows my name' (lives with the Lord in the light of what he has revealed about himself) and prayer (he will call).

Psalm 92. A day for taking sides

This whole psalm 'pivots' on v 8, a forceful statement of the supreme exaltation of the Lord which might even be translated 'You are exaltedness itself!' Moving out from this centre, in concentric circles, there is, first, his moral rule of the world (6–7, 9). There are those who are unaware of this—the spiritual dullards of v 6; but there are those who see (in 9 surely is on each occasion 'behold') the destruction (7) and perishing (9) that awaits the wicked. Secondly, there is the Lord's exalted people (4–5, 10–11). In v 10 exalted is a word directly related to exalted in v 8: the Lord shares with us what is true of him. We are glad (4–5) and triumphant (10–11) through what he has done. The final circle is the unflinching praise due to such a God (1–3, round-the-clock praise; 12–15 life-long praise). Both sections of this outer circle emphasize what he is (LORD, Most High, name, (unflinching) love, faithfulness ... LORD, Rock, upright, without wickedness, 'deviation'); likewise both sections affirm commitment to 'proclamation'; but whereas 1–3 are all about what the Lord is, 12–15 describe also the life that we enjoy when we are 'right' with him.

The title says that this is a song for the Sabbath day and its parallel with main themes from Isaiah 58 affirm this: a day of praise (1–3, 14–15) with a central focus on the exalted Lord (8); a day to recognize his holiness and to reaffirm our awareness of eternal distinctions between right and wrong (6–7, 9); a day to recall what he has done (4–5) and especially what he has done for us (10–11).

1 Good, intrinsically right and personally satisfying. Name, all he has revealed himself to be. 4–5 Note here and in the parallel 10–11 what personal true religion is like. This is a psalm of 'my' enjoyment of the Lord (while not forgetting, 12–15, the wider company). Glad ... sing, the emotion and its expression, heart and voice. Deeds ... works, covering creation, providence and salvation; plus thoughts, the mind of God lying behind them. 6 Senseless could be paraphrased 'unspiritual', the merely natural person (described also in 49:11; 73:22). The related verb means 'to be brutish', without a touch of God bringing spiritual life, lacking revealed truth (Pr. 30:2, 3). Fools, people who never penetrate deeper than the surface appearance of life. 7 Grass ... flourish, an appearance of vigour that belies its impermanence and its destiny. They will be, more forcibly 'are destined to be'. 9 With a true biblical emphasis the wicked (7) become your enemies. In the ultimate the adage that the Lord hates the sin but loves the sinner needs correction; those who set themselves against the Lord will find that he is personally set against them. 12 Righteous, those who are ‘right with God’. Palm ... cedar, contrast grass (7). The picture is of dignity, strength, durability. 13 Planted, (lit.) ‘transplanted’, brought into a new position by the design and work of the Gardener. House ... courts, accepted and given security of standing in his very presence. 15 Proclaiming, more forcibly ‘bent on proclaiming’: increasing years should bring increasing spiritual determination. Wickedness, deviation from the norm, the negative counterpart of upright, ‘straight’. Rock, a metaphor deriving from Exodus 17:1–7.

Psalms 93–100. ‘Jerusalem Praise’: The hymns of the Great King

This psalm-group underlines the theme of the Lord’s kingship. He reigns (93:1; 96:10; 97:1; 99:1); he is king (95:3; 98:6). In this respect Psalms 94 and 100 seem at first sight out of step but 94:2 (cf. 96:10–13; 98:9) uses the ‘king-equivalent’ word Judge and Psalm 100 holds its place in the series not only by its links with Psalm 99 but by its shared theme with Psalm 95 (cf. 95:6, 7; 100:1–3). It is interesting to think that we may have here (cf. on Pss. 120–134) a small collection of hymns for use, say, at the Feast of Tabernacles. Since Tabernacles marked the final ingathering each year (Ex. 23:16; Dt. 16:13) and also celebrated the Lord’s victory over Egypt and his care of his people in a hostile world (Lv. 23:39–43) it is an easy transition to a celebration of his kingship (Zc. 14:16). It is even possible (see Introduction) that it became an annual celebration specifically of the Great King. At all events these seven psalms belong together and, in pairs, share aspects of the theme of kingship: 93, 94, The King over all the earth; 95, 96, the King over all gods; 97, 98, the King in the hearts of his people; 99, 100, the King in his own character.

Psalms 93, 94. The place of faith and the place of prayer

The picture of the king with his effortless sovereignty (93:4) over pounding waves merges into the work of the Judge (94:2) administering the world where evildoers crush (‘pounding’ and ‘crush’ are matching words) his people (94:4–5), where sovereign rule is exercised in the ordinary ways of divine providential ordering of life (94:10, 12) and still awaits its final manifestation (94:15, 23). The spiritual reality of divine royal majesty (93:1) faces the earthly usurpation of the proud (a related word, 94:2) and of alien thrones (20). In calm, credal solemnity the Lord’s people acclaim his kingship (Ps. 93) and in the hurly-burly of life they experience how he rules the world (Ps. 94).

93:1–5 The King acclaimed. The affirmation of vs 1–2 moves into the picture of vs 3–4 and the solemn consequence for the Lord’s people (5); vs 1–2 work downwards from the securely enthroned Lord to the derivative security of the world he rules; vs 3–4 work upwards from the turbulence of earth’s ‘forces’ to the serene might of his exaltation. The earth is a safe place to live in because he reigns; and even when it is at its most turbulent he is still on the throne. 1 emphasizes the Lord’s clothing: robed ... robed ... armed, ‘has girded himself’. As a motif, ‘clothing’ indicates character and intent (e.g. Jos. 5:13–15; Is. 59:16–18). The Lord wears the garb of royalty because he is, and intends to act as, king. Why the world is firmly established we are not told, but the fact that this truth is sandwiched between the Lord’s reign (1) and his throne (2) speaks volumes. While he reigns earth remains stable. 3–4 use the restless seas to portray all the forces of destruction and hostility in the created order—whether violent storms themselves, or the turbulence of nations (Ps. 2) or even (as pagans thought) the ceaseless warfare of spiritual forces of chaos against the Creator. No matter what the turbulence, the LORD on high is mighty. 5 matches v 2 in the structure of the psalm. There, God who is by nature eternal occupies his eternal throne; here the God who lives in his house among his people has spoken his unchanging word and makes holiness his unchanging requirement.

94:1–23 The King experienced. ‘All admit’, says Calvin, ‘that God reigns but how few are those who oppose this shield to the hostile powers of the world.’ With these words we pass the bridge between Psalms 93 and 94. Our faith rests on his untroubled sovereignty (Ps. 93), but in life we find ourselves in the place of difficulty (4–7), opposed in word (4), deed (5–6) and by a philosophy of life (7) which does not necessarily deny God’s existence, but thinks of him as inactive, non-interventionist and irrelevant. Opposed we may be, but comfortless we are not: there is (i) God the Creator who is aware of everything (9), who has not abdicated his throne of moral government of the world (10) and to whom even the most hidden human realities are known (11). Only the senseless and fools (8, see 92:6) could be heedless of these truths. (ii) The God of providence (12–15): the hardships of life are morally purposeful (12–13), life rests on an underlying confidence in the divine faithfulness (14) and leads into a coming righteous society in which there will be freedom to live uprightly (15); (iii) The God of tender care (16–19): life may indeed be lonely, precarious and distracted but the Lord is on our side, his love is our support and his comfort is in our hearts. (iv) The God of certain triumph (20–23): for as Judge of the earth (2) he will not come to terms with corrupt, afflictive and morally perverted world-rulers. On the contrary, while proving to be a present refuge he will ultimately bring an exact, destructive and personally enforced judgment. Psalm 94 concludes (22) on the same note of resting in divine sovereign protection that was sounded in Psalm 93: the assurance that he is in charge, that we can take refuge in such a God, but the binding truth in Psalm 94 is the prayer that God will pay back (2) and the confidence that he will repay, ‘pay back’ (23). Faith rests in a sovereign God (Ps. 93) but it is ‘by prayer that we wrestle’ in the face of a hostile, buffeting world. Prayer is our first practical response to divine sovereignty: if he is indeed the Lord of Psalm 93, nothing has greater priority than to fly to him in the face of life’s turbulence (94:1–3).

Psalms 95, 96. Glad tidings of salvation

In Psalm 95 the church is singing and worshipping and in Psalm 96, singing and sharing. Psalm 95 is wholly within the fellowship where the Lord is known as rock, King and Creator, Maker and Shepherd and the one to whom obedience is owed. In Psalm 96 the church is still singing but immediately moves out in testimony to the only God, worthy of all praise and coming as universal judge. Psalms 95, 96 bring the Lord’s kingship into relationship with the ‘gods’ (95:3; 96:4, 5) and this is their distinctive mark. These psalms are, however, no more a decline from monotheism than is Paul’s assertion about lords and gods many in 1 Corinthians 8:5. Many spiritual forces are abroad in a fallen world—there is even a ‘god of this age’ (2 Cor. 4:4)—and since they exercise their delusive magnetism on the Lord’s people also, the reminder in these psalms that he is supreme king (95:3) and that the ‘gods’ are nonentities (96:4–5) remains relevant.

The only God and the gods. These psalms are typical in their appeal to creation as evidence for one, only God. Compared with the Creator, other ‘gods’ are (not ’lohim but) ’ilim (96:5) imitations of the real thing. The similarity of the Hebrew words is like the assonance of ‘idol’ and ‘idle’ in English. They are ‘no-gods’, nonentities. In contrast he is in sovereign management of the earth (95:4–5). In pagan thought, the depths were ruled by Molech, the mountain peaks by Baal, and the sea by Tiamat. But in the Bible all is in his hand, and is his by right of creation.

Psalm 95. The only God and his people

Psalm 95 consists of:

- A¹ (vs 1–2) A call to worship with joy
 - B¹ (v 3–5) Explanation of his greatness
- A² (v 6) A call to worship with reverence
 - B² (v 7a–c) Explanation of our privileges
- A³ (v 7d) A call to obey
 - B³ (vs 8–11) Explanation of its serious implications

To his people the Lord is (i) Saviour (1), on the model of the ‘saving Rock’ of Exodus 17:1–7, reliable and active, the living fount of life, saving from death. (ii) Shepherd (6–7). Maker here does not point to creation but to the way the Lord made his people for himself. They are secure in his commitment to them: our God, not because we have chosen him but because he has committed himself to us; provided for in his planning: pasture (see Nu. 10:33, 34); cared for by the touch of his hand. (iii) Lawgiver (7–11). It is to the saved that the Lord addresses his call for obedience (7) and he takes his law seriously and enforces its disciplines if his people disobey, for a whole generation (10) forfeited blessing by disobedience (Heb. 3:12–19). They would not listen to his word, bend their hearts to his will or learn his truth and consequently they forfeited his goodwill and his rest. The specific incident mentioned (8) occurred in Exodus 17:1–7 and is used as typical of a record of lack of trust. The people had more than enough evidence that the Lord can be trusted to provide in every situation (Ex. 12–16) but, faced with an apparently waterless valley, they turned from trust to doubt, much as the Pharisees of the NT closed their eyes to all that Jesus performed and refused belief pending another sign!

Psalm 96. The only God and his gospel

Psalm 96 consists of:

- A¹ (vs 1–2a) A call to the world to worship
 - B¹ (vs 2b–3) A command to the church
 - C¹ (vs 4–6) An explanation of the only God
- A² (vs 7–9) A call to the world to worship
 - B² (v 10) A command to the church
 - C² (vs 11–13) An explanation of the coming God

Those who rejoice in the God of salvation (95:1) must tell the good news of salvation, inviting the world to praise his name (2), i.e. respond to what the Lord has revealed about himself, to come into his very presence (the splendour of his holiness) through the offering he requires (7–9)—responding to his name (8, see on 2), entering his courts (8), safe in his holy presence (9), and worshipping with due awe. But the good news is also of expectation (11–13).

To judge means ‘to set all things to rights’—heaven, earth and sea, the natural and the human creation. No aspect of what he first created is forgotten in final salvation.

Psalms 97, 98. Visible righteousness, joyful salvation

The link between the Lord’s kingship and holiness or righteousness has been quietly established in these psalms (93:5; 94:15, 21, 23; 95:7; 96:9, 13). This now comes to a climax in a throne of righteousness (97:2), a proclamation of righteousness (97:6), a call to righteousness (97:10–12), a revelation of righteousness past (98:2) and to come (98:9). These psalms make no secret of the awesomeness of the Lord’s righteousness (97:2–5), the strictness of his demands (97:10), the fate of idolaters (97:7), yet their predominating note is of gladness (97:1, 8), singing and shouting (98:1, 4, 7). How can joy and judgment, human songs and divine righteousness blend together in this way? The answer is that salvation has been accomplished (98:1–3): the God of the holy name (97:12) who summons his people to holiness is the God of the holy arm (98:1) who brings them salvation.

Psalm 97. Joy in the face of the demands of holiness

The whole earth and Zion share an identical joy (glad ... rejoice ... rejoices ... are glad)—and this notwithstanding the awesome and destructive power of his righteousness (2–7) and the demands it makes (9–12): for the contrasts are stark between foes and lovers, destruction and preservation, the glory that all may see and the light which only the righteous enjoy, the fate of idolaters and the joy of the righteous. 2 Clouds, etc. The God of Sinai (Ex. 19:16–19). Righteousness and justice both express holiness (Is. 5:16): righteousness is holiness embodied in right principles; justice is holiness expressed in right decisions and actions. 3 Fire. Divine holiness in its destructive hostility to sin (Ex. 3:3–5; 19:16–18, 20; cf. Lv. 9:24). It was the fire of Sinai that ignited the first Aaronic burnt offering and it was this fire that burned perpetually on the altar: holiness satisfied by a substitute offering. 4 Trembles, not as creation before the Creator so much as sinful earth before the Holy One (Jdg. 6:22; 13:22; Is. 6:5). 7 Idols, the ‘no-gods’ of 96:5. 10 Faithful, related to the word which expresses the Lord’s ever-unchanging love, means ‘those who are loved by him and love him back’. 11 Shed upon. Heb. ‘is sown for’, i.e. planted in readiness for them to reap it as a crop. In every situation there is a righteousness waiting to be enjoyed. 12 His holy name, ‘the remembrance/reminder of his holiness’ (cf. Ex. 3:15).

Psalm 98. Joy resting on a finished work of salvation

The dilemma of Psalm 97 is explained. In the salvation accomplished for Israel all the earth sees its salvation (3). The psalm is in three sections marked by sing (1), shout (4) and let ... resound (7) and covers in turn salvation accomplished and the praise of the Saviour (1–3), worldwide joy in the world’s King (4–6), and the praise of the coming Lord who will consummate all his righteous purposes (7–9). His salvation has been worked, is known and seen; the whole earth lays voices and instruments under contribution to shout for joy to the LORD, the King. Sea and land, river and mountain—the whole created order—links with the world’s peoples to acclaim the coming God who will judge the earth (9), set the whole world to rights. 1 Marvellous, things emanating from the supernatural realm—like the name ‘Wonderful’ (Is. 9:6; cf. Gn. 18:14 [hard = wonderful]; Je. 32:17) Hand ... arm, direct personal action backed by sufficient personal strength. 2 Salvation ... righteousness. Just as the Lord is righteous when he judges (97:2–5, 6–

7) so he is righteous when he saves. His salvation accomplishes all that his holy righteousness requires. 3 The sequence is important: it is in the course of love to Israel that the world is saved. 7–9 Note the same environmental objective as in 96:11–13. The basic motivation of biblical environmentalism is that the Creator loves his creation (Gn. 1:31), not just the human aspect but the whole. And in the consummation, when the Lord Jesus returns, the new heavens and earth will be the eternal proof of this love (Eph. 1:3–10).

Psalms 99, 100. The Lord, holy and good

Psalm 99 issues a call to praise and worship; Psalm 100 responds to it as all the earth comes, enters and praises. Together the psalms focus on the Lord's character (see introduction to Psalms 93–100) as holy (99:3, 5, 9), good, loving and faithful (100:5). The privilege of the Exodus people (95:7) has now become the privilege of a worldwide people (100:3).

Psalm 99. A call to worship

1–3 The grace of the Holy One. Psalm 99 divides itself into three parts by the 'holiness' refrain (3, 5, 9). This first section is full of the greatness of the Holy King before whom nations tremble and earth shakes. Yet, great and awesome, 'worthy to be feared' though he is, he is in Zion, dwelling among his people, enthroned in the place of grace, for enthroned between the cherubim his feet rest on the 'mercy seat'—where he speaks to his people (Ex. 29:42–46) and makes atonement for their sins (Ex. 25:17–22; Lv. 16:15ff). His greatness is that of the God of grace.

4–5 The law of the Holy One. The King loves his law, establishes it (among his people), and has set an example by his own acts. In relation to his own nature, 4a says literally: 'The king's strength loves justice'—i.e. the almighty power of the divine king is wholly absorbed in what is right. We are unflatteringly called Jacob, the one who, though given a new name and new nature (Israel), still so often lived the old Jacob-life. The giving of the law is not tailored to our capacity but holds before our faltering steps the mirror of the perfect will of God. But those who thus face the obligation of the divine law also constantly live under grace, for it is 'Jacob' who is invited not simply to praise but to worship at his footstool, the mercy-seat.

6–9 The fellowship of the Holy One. Moses, Aaron and Samuel are not mentioned as being privileged but as typical of those among whom they served. The psalm uses them to typify the personal walk with God: (i) praying and receiving answer (6): the foremost mark of God's people is their praying relationship with him (Dt. 4:7; Ps. 65:2; 138:1–3). The verbs imply, 'their unvarying attitude was one of calling and he kept constantly replying'. (ii) Hearing and obeying (7). The Lord's people live by supernatural truth, the word of God. (iii) Forgiveness and chastening (8). Forgiving, '(sin-)bearing' looks back to Leviticus 16:22 and forward to Isaiah 53:12 and John 1:29. But there is also (exact) punishment of misdeeds because forgiveness without chastening would make us complacent, and chastisement without forgiveness would make us despair. Forgiveness without discipline would make us spoilt children; discipline without forgiveness would break our hearts. Together they guarantee that while we can treat forgiveness as certain, we can never treat sin as negligible.

Psalm 100. The people of God in the presence of God

A¹ (vs 1–2) Threefold invitation; shout, worship, come

B¹ (v 3) Threefold affirmation: God ... made us ... his

A² (v 4) Threefold invitation: enter ... give thanks ... praise

B² (v 5) Threefold affirmation of God's nature: Good ... love ... faithfulness

Three verbs of increasing nearness (1–2) bring us first to acclaim him (shout), then to come worshipfully into his precincts and finally to rest (come before) in his very presence. We do so with joy, gladness, and songs because we know that this divine Lord made us for himself, and we belong to him as sheep in a good shepherd's care.

Once more three verbs of increasing intimacy (4) bring us to him: the gates, the courts and the reality of a God known by name, with our thankful praise arising from what he is (5): in himself wholly, absolutely good, in his unchanging attitude to us, committed love, and in the ongoing experience of life totally faithful.

Psalm 101. The king: a mirror of the true

The speaker must be the king himself as he contemplates his high office, for who else could commit himself to the task of eliminating the wicked from the land (8)? The NIV accurately reflects the stanza structure: in the first three stanzas (1–2b, 2c–3b, 3c–4) the king affirms the personal standards to which he commits himself; in the next three (5, 6, 7) he states the standards which he will promote in his court officials; and in the final stanza (8) he turns to the public duties of his office as head of the judiciary.

1–4 Personal commitments. The three stanzas here cover, in turn, the king's life with the Lord, his life in the home and the life of personal holiness. 1 The NIV inserts an interpretative your and this seems correct. The Lord is characterized by love, unchanging loving fidelity and justice the true wisdom that can always make the right decision. The king sings of these divine attributes as one who delights in them. 2 Blameless life, a 'way'/lifestyle exhibiting total integrity. When will you come? An appeal for the Lord's companionable support for the king. In my house here refers to the domestic scene as the first place where he will display (walk) a heart of integrity (blameless heart). 3 Eyes. The organ of desire, what is wanted and aimed at. The king vows that at home his emotions and objectives will be above reproach. Vile, possibly combining 'worthless' and 'destructive', i.e. unworthy aims which, being achieved, destroy. Deeds of faithless men. Maybe more lit. 'activity involving declension'. The king aims at the highest standards of holiness. 4 Such standards are to apply also to heart (not men of perverse heart but 'a crooked heart'), and mind (have nothing to do, lit. 'know/give personal acknowledgement to').

5–7 Standards at Court. The scene is set by dwell with me, minister to me and stand in my presence. The house (7, cf. 2) is now the royal court where, under the king as chief executive, others perform his service. (i) Negatively (5, 7): the king rules out the selfishly ambitious person ready to destroy others by innuendo, the arrogant, the unreliable and the one who compromises with the truth. (ii) Positively (6) he wants the faithful, 'those who can be relied on' and the one who (like himself) 'walks in the way of integrity'.

8 Public jurisdiction. The scene is now the land and the city where the king, as Lord Chief Justice, is responsible for public standards, not least 'the punishment of evildoers'. He who would be personally the Lord's (1) vows to deal faithfully in public in the Lord's affairs. Every morning. It is his first priority, a veritable Moses (Ex. 18:13). Put to silence, including the silence of death. In this the ministers of the crown enjoy no immunities or concessionary liberties. One law rules both court and market-place.

We cannot ignore the lessons of this powerful psalm. It speaks to the often heard claim that provided a minister of state does his job properly his private life is his own business. But David thought differently: his royal duty began in his own person, home and standards of life. If he cannot be trusted privately, what guarantee is there for public integrity? But though David may have thought this, how far he actually fell away from the standards he professed! The home was the scene of his most tragic collapse and his eyes the cause of it (2 Sa. 11:2). The public administration of justice was the point where public discontent opened the door to the great rebellion (2 Sa. 15:1–6). Consequently, like all the psalms touching on the king, there is here an ideal which exposes David and his successors as inadequate and cries out for the perfect David-to-come.

Psalm 102. Request refused, prayer answered

There is no such thing as unanswered prayer. Sometimes the answer is ‘No’, pure and simple, when, in the light of perfect wisdom, our request is no more than a nonsense. Often the answer is ‘Not yet’, when our timetable and God’s are out of step. Had he known it, Elijah’s request to die (1 Ki. 19:4) was greeted in heaven with a smile and the words ‘Don’t be silly. You’re never going to die at all!’ Within these parameters lies this psalm. To the psalmist’s request that he might live on earth to see what he desired, the answer was ‘No’ (23–24); to his confidence that the time for answered prayer had arrived (13), the answer was ‘Not yet’; to what he actually asked for Zion the answer was ‘Don’t be silly! Just you wait and see!’

Who the author was and when he lived we do not know. Many commentators interpret stones and dust (14) as the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and place the psalm in the exile. But, as far as we know, the exiles in Babylon were not prisoners, nor under sentence of death (21)—in fact, conditions were very tolerable (Je. 29) and at the end only a minority were willing to leave (Ezr. 1). It is hard, therefore, to see the author as being himself among the exiles and easier to place him in some earlier crisis when the city suffered damage and he watched fellow-citizens carried off into the uncertainties of bondage. At all events, facing what he believed to be an untimely death (23–24), and longing to see Zion in full glory, restored, the centre of the whole earth (12–22), he made this mighty prayer. He is indeed the man of the title, afflicted (downtrodden, downcast, 6–8), faint as strength ebbs, but he knows a God to whom he can bring his lament (his ‘worries’).

His opening cry for a hearing (1–2) is followed by a self-contained poem whose bracket (my days, 3, 11) announces its topic. Note the ‘pivotal’ structure of this poem: vs 3, 11, fast-ebbing life; vs 4–5, 9–10 (linked by the reference to food) describe how he has no heart for life (4–5) and that this is due to divine anger (9–10); the ‘pivot’ (6–8) emphasizes loneliness, by night and day and isolation among enemies. He does not confess sin but rather implies himself to be caught up in an inexplicable great wrath of God, a change from former favour (taken up) to present humiliation (thrown me aside).

In the central poem of the psalm (12–22) he dwells on the greatness of the Lord and the glory of his purposes. This too is a ‘pivotal’ poem. It begins with the LORD enthroned for ever (12) and ends with the LORD worshipped by all peoples (22); vs 13, 21 focus on Zion, the city of the Lord’s favour and of his coming praise; vs 14, 20 share the theme of pity. His servants are operating with a narrow concern for Zion’s ruined state but the Lord’s pity embraces the earth’s needy; vs 15, 19 share the theme of the LORD and the earth: the whole earth will yet reverence him (15) but this will be the product of his concerned survey of its needs; vs 16, 18 affirm that the LORD will build Zion, be personally present in glory and that he will create a people for his praise; and the ‘pivot’ (17) puts all this glory down to answered prayer.

The Lord brings his choicest and infallible purposes to pass through the prayers of his people. The abrupt change from human need (3–11) to divine glory (12–22) is typical of the Psalms (e.g. 74:1–11, 12–17). Then, as now, the way to deal with life’s dominating pressures is to ‘turn your eyes upon Jesus’: to refresh ourselves in the vision of God (12, 22), his intentions (13–16, 18–21) and the power and place of prayer (17).

But the psalmist speaks for us in another way also: he senses curtailment of his envisaged span; his life is being untimely cut off, lit. ‘He humbled my strength in the way’ (23). I was still vigorously walking life’s way when divine action brought me to weakness. In this circumstance he resorted to prayer (24), (lit.) ‘Do not take me up’ (cf. 2 Ki. 2:1, 11). How very different is the life of God! Can God the eternal really sense how sharply life’s brevity bites into us when we feel, like Moses, (Dt. 3:23, 24) that we have but paddled in the shallows of the divine plan and long to be there when it is consummated?

Of course, he was confident that God would be faithful to his purposes and that when the consummation came (28) the children of your servants would be there, enjoying and established in his presence. The eternal God is eternally the same (27).

But what about me? At this point the Eternal smiled: ‘Don’t be silly! If only you knew!’ For the words his fainting servant addressed to him—though he did not know it—were the very words the Lord himself had addressed to his Son (Heb. 1:10–12) as together they planned a consummation far more wonderful than the psalmist longed for: that his own experience of weakness, suffering, enmity—and even of the wrath of God—would be recapitulated when the Son took our flesh and bore our sin and brought in the kingdom that cannot be shaken and the true, heavenly Zion (Heb. 2:9–18; 4:15; 5:7–8; 9:11–14; 12:22–24, 26–27). When the psalmist at length saw his experience and his words in the light of the Son of God, was he not glad that the Lord refused his request but heard his prayer?

Psalm 103. ‘Your God is King, your Father reigns’

The blend of changeless fatherly care and endless sovereign rule is the distinctive stress of this psalm. The central verses (6–18), bracketed by divine righteousness abound in the Lord’s attributes of grace, compassion, patience, forbearance, forgiveness and fatherhood, but, above all, love—the love that speaks of his commitment to us, his ever-unchanging loving fidelity. The psalm opens (1–5) on a personal note: how these attributes of grace have acted in my life; the matching conclusion (19–22) closes a bracket round the psalm on this personal note but its purpose is to raise us to the heights where we can review all reality, spiritual and physical, and worship the one Lord who is the eternal King.

1–5 The Lord’s personal blessings. 1, 2 Praise (cf. 20–22) is the distinctive word ‘Bless’. When the Lord ‘blesses’ us, he reviews our needs and responds to them; when we ‘bless’ the Lord, we review his excellencies and respond to them. Holy name. We ‘bless’ the Lord himself before we recount his blessings. All he does stems from who he is (name) and what he is (holy): he never acts outside what he has revealed and what he is. Benefits, better ‘sufficiencies’—the corresponding verb in v 10 (repay) means ‘to act fully’. 3 He forgives and heals, though, as Scripture carefully indicates, not in parallel ways: in 2 Samuel 12:13–23, forgiveness was instantaneous, healing was withheld; sin and sickness were alike laid on Jesus (Mt. 8:16, 17) but just as, in this present life, though forgiven we still suffer the plague of sin, so sickness is still our lot according to his sovereign appointment until, in heaven, every disability, like every moral infirmity, will be gone. 4 Redeems, acts as the next-of-kin who makes all our needs his own. Pit, not only metaphorical of deadly dangers in this life but also indicative of a dread possibility in the next (cf. 49:7–9, 13–15). Love and compassion. The former is love centred in the will, the love of commitment, unchanging; the latter is the love of the heart, surging and emotional. 5 Desires. Doubt surrounds this word which possibly should be read as ‘your continuance’/‘as long as you live’. Eagle, a picture of buoyant, tireless strength (Is. 40:30).

6–18 The Lord’s loving nature. This poem ‘pivots’ on v 11 with its affirmation of overshadowing, over-mastering, (great is translated flooded in Gn. 7:24), ‘ever-unchanging’ love. It moves towards this central truth in matching steps: (i) 6 and 17–18 affirm the Lord’s righteousness, i.e. his inflexible commitment to his own righteous nature and purposes: he never loves through any adjustment of his holiness or relaxation of his standards. His righteousness is the stamp of all his actions. To the human eye many wrongs go unrighted and oppressions unrelieved: v 6 says that the Lord sees to it that this is not so (Gn. 18:25); and motivated by his love, the Lord sees to it that right prevails for those who live obediently within his covenant (17–18); (ii) 7–8 and 14–16 balance what the Lord made known with what the Lord knows. We can be sure that v 6 is true because of the revelation of himself God granted to Moses, namely, (cf. Ex. 34:6) that he is emotionally moved towards us (compassionate), reaches out to us in spite of being undeserving (gracious), restrains his just wrath (slow) and has an abundant store of the love that never changes. He thus reveals himself because he knows us (14–16) in our frailty and transience. (iii) 9–10 and 12–13 are the negative and positive sides of divine dealing with our sin. 10 Sins, specific faults; iniquities, the perversion of our inner nature. 12 Transgressions, wilful rebellion against God’s known will. V 9 indicates that God the Judge (accuse is a law-court verb) is a passing mode of his relationship to us, whereas v 13 reveals that his fatherhood is permanent. This is the only verse that specifically uses father along with the verb ‘to have compassion’. (Cf. use of mother-love, Is. 49:15, and for its emotional intensity, 1 Ki. 3:26.)

19–22. The Lord’s eternal throne. What is the proper response to One who rules all? The answer of angelic, heavenly and cosmic reality is ‘We do what he wants’—his bidding and his will. So what about me? If I truly respond to the excellencies of the Lord as vs 1–5 indicate, will not I too obey his word?

Psalm 104. Creation rhapsody

The stateliness of ‘Praise to the Lord, the Almighty, the King of creation’, compared with the exuberance of ‘All creatures of our God and King’, catches pretty well the relationship of Genesis 1 to Psalm 104.

This psalm turns creation truth into song, environmental theory into wonder and praise. The sequence of the psalm accords with Genesis 1 and we can imagine a poet meditating on that great statement of the Creator and his work and giving free play to his imagination.

There is a broad structural parallel between the two passages. The psalm begins with a prologue, a summons to personal praise and adoration (1) and ends with an epilogue of adoration and personal praise (31–35). In between, the body of the psalm follows Genesis 1. With 2 cf. Gn. 1:3–5; with 3–4, Gn. 1:6–8; with 5–13, Gn. 1:9–10; with 14–18, Gn. 1:11–13; with 19–24, Gn. 1:14–19; with 25–26, Gn. 1:20–28; with 27–30, Gn. 1:29–31.

An interesting feature of the way this psalm presents its theme is the unexpected alternation between ‘you’-forms and ‘he’-forms: ‘you’, 1, 6–9, 13b (the NIV alters the Hebrew here (13a) from ‘your works’ to his work), 20, 24–30; ‘he’, 2–4, 10–13a, 14–19 (lit. ‘he made the moon for seasons’), 31–35. For the most part these changes occur at points where the psalm moves into another section but not with any observable regularity. It does not seem possible to see here evidence of antiphonal singing. The point rather is that the Creator is both ‘he’ and ‘you’, a God observed in his works and also personally known.

Another point of interest in the psalm (though one that cannot be easily expressed in translation) is that the verbs used are sometimes in the Hebrew ‘perfect’ tense (what is fixed, settled), or in the ‘imperfect’ (what is regular, repetitive), or the participle (a changeless state of affairs). The perfect tense expresses the permanent greatness and majesty of God; the historic finality of the work of creation and its fixed form and boundaries and the wisdom evident in it. Participles express changeless facts: creation witnesses to its Creator; he unchangingly provides and watches. Imperfects express the repeated works of God in satisfying earth’s needs, his recurring transformations, provisions, withdrawal of life, renewal and how from time to time he touches the earth, controlling its forces.

1–9 Creator and creation: transcendent, indwelling, dominant. 1 Praise (see 103:1). Very great etc. The Creator is transcendent in greatness. If splendour and majesty are to be distinguished, the former is his intrinsic ‘importance’, the latter his observable majesty. 2–4 Clothing is always a metaphor for character and commitment. If his garment is light, it is because God is light (1 Jn. 1:5) and the Giver of it (Gn. 1:3; 2 Cor. 4:6). But also, with the picture of the Creator wrapped in light the psalm moves from his transcendence to his immanence. He is not remote from his creation (deism); nor is he to be identified with it (pantheism); but he indwells the world he created. The heavens are his tent-curtains (2); what Genesis 1:7 calls ‘the waters above the expanse’ are but the foundation above which his upper chambers (3) soar, far beyond our sight. But he is also the Rider in the clouds above us and present all round us in the wind (3). Furthermore, the invisible forces of the created order fulfil his will, and so do visible forces, whether the kindly warmth of the fire or the destructive awesomeness of the fire-ball. 5–9 apply the foregoing images of the Creator in relation to creation: he engineered its security, determined its condition (Gn. 1:2), and, by his mere word, ordered it into its predetermined and lasting form.

10–23 Creator and creation: creation organized to sustain life. 10–13 (enclosed between two verbs, makes springs ... waters) teach that by the work of the Creator, creation furnishes water for its creatures. 13–18 growth sustains life, and growing things, as well as the very shape of the world, provide protection for life. Furthermore, alternating night and day enables the life of beasts and mankind to co-exist (19–23). Creation is a subtly adapted system for the maintenance and enjoyment of life—and this by the direct action of the Creator who makes springs, waters, makes grass grow and plants.

24–30 Creator and creation: the Creator is Lord of life, death and renewal. The creation veritably seethes with activity from the smallest marine entity to the unspeakably terrifying sea-monster, Leviathan itself (Jb. 41:1ff.) and the constant bustling of mankind. But (whether they know it or not) all depend on the Creator to provide, exist only by what he gives, are subject to his sovereign determination of the hour of their death, and life itself on earth only continues because he wills to renew it.

31–35 Creator and creation: the holy Creator and his joy in creation. The glory here is the Creator’s glory displayed in his created universe. Were he to withdraw this glory, the universe would disappear. He alone gives it being and stability. Solid as it may appear, it is of the utmost fragility in relation even to his eyes and fingers. Such a Creator is worthy of unceasing praise, but brashness is out of place and we can only pray that our poor song will be found pleasing, for he is the holy One and sinners have no final security in his creation (35). What then can my soul do but, having reviewed the excellencies of the Creator, turn to him in blessing and praise?

Psalm 105. ‘Not only with our lips but in our lives’

The Bible does not contain ‘narrative poetry’ in the usual sense of the term, telling a story in poetic form. Psalms like 78, 105, 106, 136 do not, indeed, seem to be interested in narration as such and are more a series of allusive reminders of well-known events designed to lead to a particular point. Psalm 105 sweeps through the history of the Lord’s dealings with his people in three stages: first, the patriarchal period (Gn. 12–50), alluding to the inauguration of the covenant (7–11), the period of nomadic wandering in Canaan (12–15), and the story of Joseph in Egypt (16–22); secondly, the time of the exodus (Ex. 1–12): Israel entering Egypt (23–25), Moses and the plagues (26–36), Israel leaving Egypt (37–38); thirdly, the journey in the wilderness (39–43, Ex. 13–19) and the entrance into Canaan (44, Joshua). The survey covers many years but paints one picture: a faithful, promise-making, promise-keeping God, mysterious in his ways but ever mindful of his people, ever planning ahead for their good, ever meeting their needs.

7–11 The Lord promising. As is usual, what the Lord does for his people is set against the backdrop of his universal sway. If he is to keep the promise to Abraham (Gn. 15:18–21) he must also be Lord over the Amorites. But he is even more, for all the earth is his to command. 8 anticipates the sweep of history the psalm covers. It looks back (lit. ‘he has remembered’) over the centuries and asserts, as did Joshua in respect of the same period, ‘Not one of the Lord’s good promises ... failed; every one was fulfilled’ (Jos. 21:45; 23:14). Covenant, a freely made commitment of God, not a bargain or quid pro quo, a sovereign, stated intention that he is God, to Abraham and his descendants, and that they are his people. Hence the covenant is defined further as the word he commanded ... the oath he swore (8–9). It is his promise and he will see to it. 9 made, (lit.) ‘cut’, the technical word for the official inauguration of a covenant (Gn. 15:18). With Abraham, therefore with us, the descendants of Abraham (Rom. 4:11, 12, 16, 23–25; Gal. 3:6–9; 4:28–31), whose story is our history, whose calling is our calling and to whose promises we are heirs. 10 Decree, an unchangeable commitment. 11 The covenant was expressed in multiple promises (Gn. 17:1–7) and of these one is chosen, the promise of the land, as a test case of the faithfulness of the Lord. It is on the triumphant note of its fulfilment that the psalm’s survey ends (44).

12–15 The Lord protecting. These verses cover the same period as Hebrews 11:8–10, 13. The land was theirs but they lived in it as strangers, ‘aliens’ (12). Their nomadic, stateless existence brought them from one king’s dominion to another (13) and the only land they ever owned was a tomb (Gn. 23). How mysterious are the providences of God with his people! To promise land and leave them landless! But never unprotected—not even when their own follies would seem to have forfeited his goodwill (Gn. 12:10–20; 20:1–18; 26:1–11), nor when they faced the massed powers of the world (Gn. 14). 15 Anointed, set apart for God in status and function. Prophets (cf. Gn. 20:7) where Abraham is the first in the Bible to be called a prophet.

16–22 The Lord anticipating. The Lord not only holds sway over all the earth (7) but executively ordains earth’s events (16). Again we face a mystery, for we cannot trace the paths and patterns of divine providence. But where we cannot understand why this or that experience has been called down, or why necessities of life have been withdrawn from us (16), we can be sure that he is still on the throne (He called ... destroyed) and that he has made a provision for our future (sent a man before them, 17). But even though we see that Joseph was an ‘anticipatory providence’ the element of mystery remains—indeed the public mystery of v 16 is re-enacted on the individual level: if Joseph was God’s man in God’s place for God’s time (Gn. 45:5–8; 50:20) why did he suffer so (18)? ‘It is not for you to know’ said the Lord Jesus of another matter (Acts 1:7) but his answer must suffice for this too. All we are allowed to know is that the Lord was working according to eternal wisdom to fulfil his word (19) and to have a ruler in Egypt to welcome and feed his needy people.

23–38 The Lord redeeming. Note how this long section is bracketed by Israel entering (23) and leaving (38) Egypt. It was not for any sin of theirs that they entered Egypt, but by divine command and under divine promise (Gn. 46:3–4); nor was it for any sin of theirs that they came under Egyptian hostility. Indeed (25) it was by the act of God! Once again we face the mystery of divine providence. His thoughts are not ours, nor our ways his (Is. 55:8). But how marvellous are his ways (Rom. 11:33–36)! He brought them into threat and duress (25) and then revealed the splendour of his redeeming power. He prepared a man (26), a sufficient power against all the power of the enemy (27–36) and a glorious deliverance (37–38).

Note the structure of vs 28–36. The account starts with the ninth plague and the outcome of the whole exercise (The NIV is mistaken in making 28b a question; it is a statement that at the end of the plague sequence the cowed Egyptians made no further rebellion). It then ‘back-tracks’ to recount the steps leading up to that outcome (29–35): the first (29, Ex. 7:14ff.), second (30, Ex. 8:1ff), fourth and third (31, Ex. 8:20ff., 16ff.), seventh (32, 33, Ex. 9:13ff.) and eighth (34, 35, Ex. 10:1ff.) plagues, thus coming again to the climax, this time in the grim tenth plague (36, Ex. 11, 12). 37 (Ex. 11:2, 3) 38 (Ex. 12:30–33).

39–42 The Lord providing. This section brings both the historical review and the psalm itself to a conclusion. The revelation of the Lord is completed as we see him in attendance on the daily needs of his pilgrims. He caters (39) for their guidance (Ex. 13:21, 22) and safety (Ex. 14:19) and answers prayer (even their grumbling) in the provision of food (40, Ex. 16:12–13, 14ff) and water (41, Ex. 17:1–7). But he did all this because he had given his word to Abraham (42, cf. 8, ‘he remembered’ ... word; 9)—a faithful, promise-keeping God!

How do we respond to such a God and such a display of promise-keeping, protection, anticipation of need, deliverance and provision? In the joyful response of thanksgiving, and song (1–2), glorying verbally in what the Lord has revealed of himself (name), committedly cultivating his presence (3–4, seek ... seek, not as searching for the lost but as coming again and again, assiduously, to where we know he is to be found), holding his great deeds in fresh remembrance (5) and sharing the news of actions worldwide (1): a programme for the tongue in praise and testimony, for the heart in ‘seeking’ the Lord, and for the mind in careful remembrance.

But there is more. Vs 43–44 form a conclusion matching the praiseful beginning to the psalm. Those who experienced at first hand what the Lord had done for them rejoiced and were glad. God had been good to them, crowning his record of promise-keeping with the gift of the land (44), just as he had pledged to Abraham four hundred years and more earlier (Gn. 15:7–16). But joy falls short of the response he designed: all he did was with a view to creating for himself a people who would obey his word (45). Without this, praise is only religious noise (Am. 5:23–24).

Psalm 106. ‘A song that is music to thee’

In the main Psalm 106 reviews Israel’s history from the Exodus (6–12, Ex. 14) into the wilderness (13–18, Nu. 11:4–34; 16), to Sinai (19–23, Ex. 32:1–6, 9–14), on to the borders of Canaan (24–27, Nu. 14), the episodes of Baal-Peor and Meribah (28–33, Nu. 25:1–15; 20:2–13) and the eventual entry into the Promised Land (34–38, Jdg. 1:21, 27–36; 3:3, 5; etc.).

It is a sad story of sin (6), heedlessness and forgetfulness (7, 21), short-lived response (12–13), self-indulgence (14), dissatisfaction with God’s provisions (16), idolatry (19), disobedience (24–25), failure to inherit (26), disloyalty (28), provocation (32), compromise (34–35) and religious corruption (37–39). But (with a greater emphasis) it is a story of divine salvation in power (8–11), readiness to be persuaded to mercy (23, 30), repeated countering of just judgment with unmerited mercies (40–43), compassionate listening to cries for help (44), and fidelity to covenant and love (45). This is the lesson of our history: our faithlessness, his faithfulness.

1–5 Praise and prayer. The psalm opens on the note of praise and prayer and closes on the notes of prayer (47) and praise (48). For history tells of a love that never fails (1) and of a God who is changelessly the same (48), exciting the praise of his people—even though they know that no mortal tongue can fully rise to the occasion. It assures us that prayer is worthwhile, for the individual is not forgotten in the Lord’s purposes for his people, and the people are not forgotten even though spread throughout the world. Interestingly the beginning and ending of the psalm also strike the note of blessedness (3, 48 lit. ‘Blessed be the Lord’), though using different Hebrew words. The way of obedience is the way of blessing (3), but if that were the whole story where would we stand with our record of ceaseless declension? There is, however, a God worthy to be blessed (see on 103:1): the ever-faithful, compassionate, loving, forgiving, prayer-hearing, delivering, saving God. To this all the people—we who have had our catalogue of failure read out to us in vs 6–39—delightedly say Amen! Praise the LORD (48).

6–12 Man’s forgetfulness. God’s salvation. ‘We have sinned along with our fathers’ (6). It is not just that we are like them in sin (as NIV) but one with them in a continuum of sinfulness. They and we together have ‘pervertedly done wrong’—a fault in our natures (perversion) and in our lives (wrong-doing): blind to the marvels the Lord does, forgetful of his kindnesses (7, lit. ‘the abundance of his acts of changeless love’) and full of faithless rebellion (Ex. 14:10–12)—unperceptive in mind, short in memory, transient in faith. But the Lord goes on (8–11) acting for his name’s sake, i.e. because it is his nature to do so, dealing with our circumstantial and human adversaries, working a full salvation (Ex. 14:13–14, 30–31) and prompting a sadly short-lived response of praise (cf. 13).

13–18 Self-indulgent, self-seeking discontent. They neither remembered the God of the past nor consulted the God of the future (13) and consequently they fell prey to their own unsanctified emotions: first by tiring of God’s provision for their sustenance (14, Nu. 11:4–6 cf. Jn. 6:35ff.); secondly, by resenting the authority he had set over the community (16, Nu. 16:3). In each case God’s favour was forfeited and judgment followed. There comes a point where prayer can become stubborn insistence on our own way and, as an act of just judgment God gives us what we insisted we must have (15). Likewise there comes a point where he insists that, contrary to what we might think, we must have what he wants. Moses and Aaron were his best will for his people and on this point he was immovable (16). 13 is the correct way to live with God in the light of his saving acts (cf. 8–12) and to face the future in the light of his word of counsel.

19–23 False religion: Moses as mediator. 19–20 (Rom. 1:21–25). All man-made religion involves thinking in terms of earthly models, trusting a do-it-yourself salvation, replacing the eternal God with what needs support to keep it going, and when we turn aside the basic cause is always forgetfulness of the saving power of the one true God. But even in such circumstances, the Lord accepts the interceding office of a mediator (Heb. 7:25).

24–27 The word and the voice. This is the pivot of the psalm.

A¹ (vs 1–5) Praise and prayer

B¹ (vs 6–12) Man's forgetfulness: God's salvation

C¹ (vs 13–18) Discontent with God's provisions

D¹ (vs 19–23) False religion: Moses

E (vs 24–27) The word and the voice

D² (vs 28–33) False religion: Phinehas

C² (vs 34–38) Discontent with the Lord

B² (vs 39–46) Man's rebellion: God's remembrance

A² (vs 47–48) Prayer and praise

The brevity of the central section makes it all the more dramatic, a truth that needs no elaboration: the central sin of the people of God is to refuse his word. 24 (lit.) 'they did not believe his word'; 25 (lit.) 'they did not listen to the voice of the Lord'. This is the privilege of possessing the word of God and the reason why it is our cardinal sin to ignore it: the word of God is the living voice of God.

28–33 False religion: Phinehas as mediator. Like Moses in v 23, Phinehas interposed and wrath was turned away. Moses, with his self-sacrificing prayer (Ex. 32:31–32) came nearest to the perfect Mediator they were unconsciously foreshadowing. Grace allowed him to turn wrath aside but he did so by becoming a curse on our behalf (Gal. 3:13), becoming sin in our place (2 Cor. 5:21). But if Moses foreshadowed the Lord Jesus by his prayer, Phinehas did so in the divine status of righteousness accorded to him as mediator, anticipating the One whom Isaiah calls 'that righteous One, my Servant' (53:11; Heb. 7:26).

The second incident (32–33) included in this stanza completes the first: they yoked themselves to ... Baal ... they angered the Lord. Notwithstanding that they had been in this very situation before (Ex. 17), lack of water (Nu. 20:3ff) provoked an outburst against Moses, a bitter regret at having left Egyptian slavery, a wish for death rather than the life God ordained for them. No wonder it was too much for Moses! The old Moses of Exodus 2:11–12 was still lurking within the man renowned for meekness (Nu. 12:3)! Moses paid dearly for his hotheaded disobedience (Nu. 20:12). Disobedience to the word of the Lord is the cardinal sin (see 24–27). 27 (Cf. Lv. 26:33; Dt. 28:64).

34–38 Discontent with the Lord. Once again, every evil thing stemmed from the basic sin of disobedience (34). Regarding the command to destroy, first (as Gn. 15:16 shows), the commanded destruction was a just judgment of God following four hundred years of probation. It was neither arbitrary nor hasty but a solemn judicial decision of the holy God. Secondly, at that stage of the history of God's people, it was the only way to secure a proper separation from the world. Refusing to become a separate people, they became a compromised people (35–39)—it is always so. 35 (Jdg. 3:5, 6). 36 (Jdg. 2:12ff). 37 (2 Ki. 16:3). 38 Since creation is itself a holy thing, it can be desecrated—indeed it is a moral force operating against defilers (Gn. 3:18; Lv. 18:25).

39–46 Human rebellion, God’s remembrance. These verses reflect the tension within the nature of God which the book of Judges records at length. In righteous anger, he reacts to his people’s defection by causing their enemies to dominate them. Yet it is not their return to righteousness that moves him but simply their misery and his own faithfulness to his pledged word.

47–48 Prayer and praise. Gather us from the nations may indicate that this psalm was written during the Babylonian captivity but the inclusion of these verses in the celebrations when David brought the Ark to Jerusalem (1 Ch. 15, 16) speaks against this. In the psalm the nations are a place of scattering, a snare and a dominating force. There was no time, from the first entry into Canaan, when this was not the case to a greater or less degree. The psalm is best simply heard as the song of the church in the world, subject to its enticements, overcome by its powers, losing its identity by compromise, but longing and praying for a better day and praising the God who, amid the fluctuations of his people, is the same from everlasting to everlasting.

Psalm 107. Everybody can pray

One of the enduring delights of this psalm is repetition—repeated descriptions of threatening situations (4–5, 10, 17–18, 23–26), repeated recourse to prayer (6, 13, 19, 28), repeated divine response (6–7, 13–14, 19–20, 28–29), repeated calls to thankfulness (8, 15, 21, 31). Who are these people? It is quite common to link the psalm with the return from exile in Babylon but this does not accord with the worldwide view the psalm takes of the gathered people (3). Others find a wider review of Israel’s history: from the wilderness to Canaan (4–9), from Egypt and Babylon into the promised land (10–16), from the ‘death’ (17–22) and ‘storm’ (23–32) of the exile into life and peace. But, again, the stance of the psalm is deliberately worldwide and we may allowably ask what about a gathering from the west? Indeed, the Hebrew of v 3 actually says (not and south but) ‘and from the sea’ (presumably meaning ‘and from overseas’).

Another point of translation is also important: some ... some ... some ... others (4, 10, 17, 23) is interpretative, assuming that four different groups are intended. The Hebrew rather suggests that the same people are being described from four different angles—the typical hazards out of which divine redemption (2) and love (1, 8, 15, 21, 31, 43) have brought us, the Lord’s people. This is how the psalm should be understood. The psalmist is meditating upon one of the great ‘pilgrim’ feasts of the pre-exilic church (Ex. 23:14–19). He sees people come together from scattered locations and remembers that the promises to Abraham (Gn. 12:1–3; 18:18; 22:18; 28:14; Ps. 47:9), now focused in the house of David (Ps. 72:8–11), pledged a gathering from the whole world. Though for him—as for us (Rev. 7:9–17)—the realization is still future, yet every individual and every generation of the people of God can enjoy the reality of belonging to the gathered people, adoring the love which redeemed (1–2) and rescues (8, 15, 21, 31) and must ever be the focus of our thoughts (43).

1–3 Redeeming love. Throughout the psalm the love referred to is the committed, unchanging, loving determination of the Lord who will never give up those whom he has chosen for himself. This love expressed itself in redemption (2)—the work of the ‘next-of-kin’ who took as his own all the needs of his threatened kinsfolk, himself bearing their burdens and rescuing them from their dangers.

4–32 The four pictures. The first picture of deliverance from danger by land (4–9) is balanced by the fourth, danger at sea (23–32). The contrast indicates deliverance in and from every problem in earthly life. The second (10–16) and third (17–22) pictures focus on spiritual problems—rebels against God (11, 17) bringing upon themselves bondage (10) and self-destruction (17), i.e. the fact that sin makes us enemies of God, deprives us of the liberty it promises and corrupts our natures. The four pictures taken together offer an assurance that redeeming, unchanging love can deal with every circumstance and every condition and that it is in answer to prayer that the loving Lord does so (6, 13, 19, 28). The Lord’s earthly people are ever under redemptive care, ever buffeted by circumstances, outside and within, and constantly need the resource of prayer.

4–9 Lost in a wide world: the love that brings us home. The redeemed often do not ‘know which way to turn’ (4) and long for the settled security of a true city. Like Abraham, experiencing the insecurity of tent-life, longing for ‘the city which has foundations whose builder and maker is God’ (Heb. 11:9–10). We also often come to the point where ‘we can’t take any more’ (5). But we can pray (6). Often on earth we find, in retrospect, that what we thought was a winding pathway became the straight road of divine direction (7) and certainly it will be so if, in heaven, we are allowed hind-sight. What seemed, as we lived through it, to be a veritable corkscrew-road or a maze will then be seen in truth as a direct, undeviating path from conversion to glory. This is the ‘super-natural’ (wonderful, 8) work of God who (even now—how much more then, Rev. 7:16–17) satisfies.

10–16 Hemmed in a narrow world: the love that makes us free. In the garden (Gn.3) it was the purpose of the serpent to make the word of God seem unnaturally restrictive, an unwarranted denial of human liberty. Too late the man and his wife discovered that it was only by binding themselves to obey God’s word that they enjoyed liberty (cf. Ps. 119:45). Rebelling against the word brought bondage. This explains our condition (10–11). With v 12, cf. Gn. 3:16–19. How often divine mercy protects us from the results of our own false choices we shall never know, but sometimes, with equal love, the barrier is allowed to fall and we experience the bitter bondage we have brought on ourselves. But even then we can pray (13) and find that—in measure now but in full reality then (Phil. 3:20–21)—grace responds to prayer in deliverance (14–16).

17–22 Damaged in a sinful world: the love that makes us whole. Within our own natures, sin is our all-time ‘own goal’, (lit.) bringing us low (17) and ‘right up to the gates of death’ (18)—the double disaster of self-destruction now and eternal loss ahead. In v 11, rebelled reflects the stubbornness of the rebel; in v 17, wilfulness. But even so we can pray (19). Through prayer comes the great antidote to sin’s poison, the healing word (20). Just as the source of our spiritual plight is rejection of the word (11), so the return to spiritual wholeness (20) is through the return of the word into our lives.

23–32 Beaten in a hostile world: the love that brings us peace. Seafaring is a perfect picture of our experience in this life: getting on with our lawful business (23) when, ‘out of a clear blue sky’, comes the storm that upsets all our calculations, destroys our cherished comforts, leaves us helpless in the grip of totally overmastering forces (25–27). Every storm is a summons to trust, for it is not a chance happening or a satanic ploy: it is his storm (25) and in due course the same hand that roused the storm will still it (29). Every storm is a call to prayer (28a) which will avail even against the mightiest opposing forces. The door of prayer will prove to be the entrance to peace (29–30). In vs 21–22 the response of thankfulness was Godward, in the offering of a sacrifice that both expresses our gratitude and reaffirms our dedication. In vs 31–32, thankfulness leads into participating membership of the worshipping community.

33–43 Providential, caring love. In these verses two contrasting pictures (33–34 and 35–36) are interpreted in reverse order as two contrasting experiences of life (37–38, 39–40). The psalm ends by noting that here is a truth that the upright see (42) and a thought on which the wise concentrate (43). The pictures are respectively of the fertile becoming infertile (33–34) and the infertile changed to support life and afford security (35–36). This is so often true: there is covetable prosperity when everything succeeds (37–38), but also times of recession when calamity follows trouble (39) and leaders can offer no solution (40); but then again, prosperity is recovered and the needy given security (41). What is it in all this that the upright (those who are right with God and committed to rightness of life) see? First, that every circumstance is directed by the Lord who is not a watcher from the sidelines but an executive director. It is he who works transformations in both directions. The most practical course in life is to be right with the One who directs all. Secondly, his providences are moral. If fruitful land becomes a waste, it is a judgment on sin (34); therefore the upright should determine on holiness. Thirdly, when prosperity comes it is not a reward for good behaviour but a sheer act of divine concern for the needy (41). For this reason, true wisdom (43) will always fill its gaze with the great love, (lit.) ‘the loves’ of the Lord—that changeless, ‘ever-unfailing’ love which is so many-faceted that within it (in answer to prayer) there lies the solution to every need.

Psalm 108. A recipe for an hour of need

Although it is composed of parts of two other psalms (1–5, Ps. 57:7–11; 6–13, Ps. 60:5–12), this is no (mere) anthology. Even if we knew nothing of Psalms 57 and 60 (which may be consulted for the details of this psalm), Psalm 108 would still stand by its own merits. The enmity of Edom was a constant backdrop to the life of Israel (cf. Am. 1:11) and we may assume that the Edomite crisis of Psalm 60 was not the last David heard from that restless quarter. In some such critical moment David drew on his earlier psalmody and fashioned it afresh for new needs. The poem falls into three stanzas held together by ‘domino’-linking: the first stanza (1–5) ends with prayer and the second (6–9) opens with prayer. The first hinges on the reality of the Lord’s unchanging love (4) and the second begins with those you love (a different word, ‘those dear to you’). The second stanza ends with a reference to Edom (9) and the third (10–13) begins with the problem of Edom.

Each stanza contains prayer: first, that God may be glorified (5), secondly, that his people may be delivered (6) and finally that the crisis may be met (12). This is a true order of biblical praying and arguably the foremost lesson of the psalm. But prayer derives its confidence from truth about God and each stanza brings a particular truth to the fore: (i) God’s love (4) is ‘ever-unchanging’—his faithfulness is comparable to the highest reality we observe, the skies, but his love is even higher, i.e. his loving commitment to us is the supreme reality of all. Hence we can face a crisis with a steadfast heart, with vocal and public praise and with prayer that in this situation he will prove himself to be what he really is (1–5). (ii) God’s promises cover the crisis (7–9). The Lord had committed himself beforehand to the subservience of Edom. Prayer, resting on promises, possesses certainty (6). (iii) His power alone is sufficient for the crisis (10, 13) and in answer to prayer he will return to favour his people and give the needed help (11–12).

Psalm 109. The hallowing of anger

Psalm 109, the most outspoken of the imprecatory psalms (see Introduction), has attracted a ‘bad press’. Commentators queue to pronounce it lacking in Christian ideals, the opposite of the spirit of the gospel, and some try to evade the rigour of the psalm by treating vs 6–19 as a quotation of what the psalmist’s enemies allege against him. The Psalms do not necessarily indicate where a new speaker begins but it is doubtful if this is the case here: (i) the change from plural enemies (2–5) to an individual (6–19) is paralleled in Psalm 55; (ii) to allocate 6–19 to the psalmist’s enemies brings no relief to the problem for in v 20 the psalmist repeats the sentiments himself and there is nothing in principle in 6–19 that cannot be paralleled elsewhere in the Bible. (iii) Furthermore, Acts 1:16–20 accords to this psalm the honour of full inspiration and sees v 8 as spoken against Judas. As in so many other psalms, David’s experience foreshadows that of Jesus, the ultimate, true and holy speaker of the words of cursing.

So does the psalm depart from the spirit and ideals of the NT? (i) The psalmist does not deny the duty of love: vs 4–5 begin and end with an affirmation of his love (friendship is too weak a translation) for his enemies and the present tenses indicate that this love continued throughout the experience of enmity. Maybe, instead of finding here a departure from the principle of love (Mt. 5:44), we should ask whether our understanding of love is correct. Will the Lord Jesus cease to love his enemies when he subjects them to ‘the wrath of the Lamb’ (Rev. 6:16)? (ii) The psalmist is not vengeful in act or spirit. He says in v 4, (lit.) ‘But I am prayer’, meaning ‘my whole being is identified with the exercise of prayer.’ Thus he will not retaliate. His response to hurt and malice is to bring it to God in the place of prayer and to leave it there—a perfect expression of Romans 12:19. Even if his prayers proved to be blameworthy in word or spirit, his way is preferable to that of the modern-day bomber, arsonist or cut-throat commercial operator. (iii) But are his prayers blameworthy? What we retreat from is not the fact that he prayed, but the realism in which he couched his prayers. When any measure of hostility disturbs our comfortable lives we rouse ourselves to say ‘Lord, help me to love my enemies as Jesus taught, and, please, will you deal with them for me.’ The psalmist was more realistic: how will God ‘deal with them’ except in ways which he has revealed in his word? False accusers must receive what they purposed to achieve (Dt. 19:16–19, cf. 2 with 6); those who disobey have no tenure on earth (Dt. 4:1, cf. 8); sinners bring disaster on their descendants (Ex. 34:7, cf. 9–12). If we retreat into unreality with a general petition where the psalmist ventured to express scriptural realism, we should at least be aware of what we are doing.

But our retreat is understandable and accords with Paul’s caution (Eph. 4:26) that allowable anger is near neighbour to sin. J. L. McKenzie (American Ecclesiastical Review, III, 1944, pp. 81–96) asks whether ‘the imprecatory psalms are not a model, not because of their lower degree of perfection but because they are too lofty for ... us to imitate without danger.’

1–5 Prayer for divine action. 1 The spirituality of the psalmist throughout this terrible time is remarkable: he maintains praise (1) and prayer (4), the demanding exercise of fasting (24) and his commitment to public worship (30). These are the things which our lesser spiritual quality allows to evaporate under pressure. Furthermore in the face of slander, lies, animosity and active assault (3, attack, ‘war against’), he maintains love of his foes (4–5), not allowing his reaction to them to be determined by their unequal treatment of him.

6–19 Prayer for divine justice. This section falls into two parts: (i) vs 6–15 are a balanced poem of five stanzas: the first (6–7) requests a verdict of guilt in a human court and the last (14–15), for unforgiven guilt before God; the second (8–9) and the fourth (12–13) unite in loss of tenure of life both for the individual and in his descendants; the middle stanza (10–11) is the most terrible: no one sins alone and our children are bound with us in the bundle of life, for good as for ill (Prov. 20:7). As noted above, these prayers give expression to scriptural inevitabilities: this is what life is like under the rule of an awesome and holy God. 6 Evil man, the same word as wicked (lit. ‘the mouth of a wicked man’) in v 2. Thus evil boomerangs on the perpetrator. 7 Prayers condemn, (lit.) ‘may his prayer become a sin’—even the way of prayer denied him as a solution. 14 In Scripture (cf. Mt. 23:29–35) our sinful inheritance never excuses us, but rather puts us under the heaped-up sin of the past. We are not fatalistically bound (Ezk. 18) but, unless we repent and disavow it, we are its inheritors.

(ii) Vs 16–19 turn specifically to the offender himself: why should he expect kindness (12) who never showed kindness; his heart, his will (pleasure), his practical life (garment ... cloak), were all alike stained by his malevolence and it will rebound—coming to him, seeping into the fibres of his being and binding him fast like a belt.

20–31 Prayer for divine help. For the believer, in every situation, another set of factors operates. However numerous and vicious foes may be, however trying and disastrous our circumstances, there is always But you, O Sovereign LORD, the One who never deviates from his revealed nature (name,) and his pledged love (21). 22 Poor ... needy often express our plight before stronger forces, respectively how we can be humiliated and pressured by them. They are also used as terms of godliness, humility before God and pliancy towards his will. 27 His desire is not simply for a solution but for such a solution as is unmistakably an act of God and a public vindication of spiritual reality (31).

Psalm 110. ‘He will be a priest on his throne’ (Zc. 6:13)

The very name, Melchizedek, breathes an air of mystery. He enters Scripture unheralded. Abram has just conquered the kings of earth (Gn. 14:14–15) but when ‘Melchizedek king of Salem’ came, Abram acknowledges his pre-eminence as priest, presenting him with a tithe of the spoil (14:20) and affirming Melchizedek’s ‘God Most High’ to be none other than the Lord himself (14:22). In Joshua 10:1 we meet Adoni-Zedek. His name is identical in form and meaning (‘king of righteousness’) with Melchizedek, suggesting the continuation through the years of a priestly-kingship in Jerusalem. If so, when David took Jerusalem (2 Sa. 5:6–9) he sat on Melchizedek’s throne, himself heir to the priestly-kingship validated by Abraham. This would account for Psalm 110.

As David meditated on his dignity as priest-king, it became a telescope turned on the Messiah and he looked forward to the perfect Priest-King, the full reality of what David was only the shadow cast beforehand. When Hebrews (6:20–7:28) uses Melchizedek in order to show that the Lord Jesus is a true priest though without Aaronic ancestry, it is the fulfilment of a line of truth reaching back through David to Abraham. Jesus is indeed the true Melchizedek of whom Abram met the prototype, David was the foreshadowing and of whom Zechariah spoke.

The psalm consists of two parallel movements: the king (1–3) and the priest (4–7). Each begins with a divine promise, declares the status of its subject as king and priest, pledges his dominion, from Zion, over earth’s kings. It contrasts the willing devotion of his people with the overthrow of the nations and shows the King-Priest himself as ever-fresh with youthful vigour and ever-refreshed by timely renewal.

Title and 1 (cf. Mk. 12:36–37) The Lord Jesus affirms David as author, accords divine inspiration, and finds his own messiahship revealed. King David speaks to one of higher kingship than himself (Heb. 1:3, 13). Says, ‘The very word of the Lord to my Sovereign’ (cf. Jos. 5:14). Enemies ... footstool. For an apt picture cf. Jos. 10:24; the reality (Heb. 10:12–13).

2 From Zion ... in the midst. Though even now reigning (Heb. 10:13) in Zion (Heb. 12:22–24), the king is still among his enemies. The consummation of their submission is still ahead. Thus the psalm speaks of his and our position today (cf. Phil. 2:9–11; Heb. 2:8–9). Rule, a very strong word, ‘dominate’.

3 (Lit.) ‘Your people will be free-will offerings’, i.e. ‘willingness itself’—the proper response to such a king. Arrayed. While it is possible that the phrase could point to the ‘holy array’ of the king’s people, it is more likely to point to himself clothed in his own holiness. (See 96:9; cf. 1 Ch. 16:29; 2 Ch. 20:21.)

The womb of the dawn. Possibly drawing on ancient mythology (Is. 14:12) to allude to the supernatural origin of the king; possibly a picturesque allusion to where the dew originates. Dew as life-giving (Is. 26:19; Ho. 14:5); as coming secretly (2 Sa. 17:12) is God’s fresh vitality preserving the king ‘in the power of an indestructible life’ (Heb. 7:16). 5 The position is reversed from v 1: the Lord is at his royal priest’s right hand to energize all his endeavours (cf. Is. 9:7; Jn. 14:10), taking up the position of protection (121:5) and patronage (Is. 45:1). Authority of position is thus matched by power of accomplishment issuing in world-dominion. 6 How does such a picture accord with the ‘Prince of peace’ (Is. 9:6) and the NT reality of Jesus? First, true to the kingly metaphor, the expanding kingdom is by conquest. At present this is the conquest of gospel truth bringing the nations into submission (Acts 15:13–18; 2 Cor. 4:6); but, secondly, there will be a day when One with the blood-stained garments of the priestly sacrifice will arrive as King of kings and the great victory will at last be consummated (Rev. 19:11–21). 7 The picture looks back to David at the brook Besor (1 Sa. 30:10), a pause in the pursuit of his foes. So the ultimate King will never relax or relent until every foe submits to him. Lift up ... head. Cf. the synonymous phrase in 83:2; Jdg. 8:28; Jb. 10:15; Zc. 1:21, means to act with bold confidence, to dominate every opposing force.

Psalms 111, 112. An ABC of family likeness

These psalms form a pair in style and theme. Each is an ‘alphabetical acrostic’ (see Introduction). The theme of Psalm 111:1b is the Lord, revealed in deed and word; the theme of Psalm 112 is the Lord’s people, viewed in a typical ‘man’, in character and conduct resembling the Lord himself. Time and again the matching lines express related ideas: the thankful heart and the reverent spirit (111 and 112:1b respectively); the upright people delighting in obedience (1c); the great LORD, the mighty people (2a); the majesty of the Lord, the richness of his people (3a); etc. In particular there are direct correspondences: both the Lord and his people possess enduring righteousness (3b); the same word describes the Lord’s steadfast (‘maintained’) precepts and his people’s secure heart (8a); the Lord provided redemption for his needy people, they display prodigal generosity (9a). Just as we say ‘like father like son’ so, biblically, those who look at us should see him. Throughout the two psalms ‘forever’/‘eternal’ chimes like a bell: the Lord’s righteousness, covenant, precepts and praise are eternal; so is the righteousness of his people and their security and perpetuity. Because he is eternal in righteousness they are set apart from the world’s relativisms, holding and practising the moral values they see revealed in him.

Psalm 111. The Lord in deed and word

V 1 with its notes of praise and moral commitment (upright) is matched by v 10, calling for fear, obedience and praise. Between these brackets vs 2–9 begin by affirming the greatness of the Lord’s works (2–3) and continue by exploring what he has done (4–9). The first (4) and last (9) work is the revelation of himself by name. 4 (lit. ‘A remembrance/memorial he has made in respect of his wonders’) (cf. Ex. 3:15). His name says all he wants his people to know about him. He delights in bestowing unmerited grace and is stirred by emotional affection (compassionate, cf. 1 Ki. 3:26) for them. He redeemed them (9)—redemption focuses attention on paying the ransom-price: he took upon himself the whole ‘cost’ of their deliverance—and brought them into covenant with himself. Because he remembers his covenant he fed them (in the wilderness), brought them into the land and gave them his trustworthy law to live by (5–7). Thus the unmerited grace and passionate love which flowed out first in redemption, brought the Lord’s people within the embrace of his covenant where they experience his providential care in daily needs, his power over all the power of their enemies, and his word by which they live.

Psalm 112. The Lord’s people in character and conduct

The psalm moves consecutively through clear topics, devoting four lines to the first four and six lines to the last: (i) 1–2 Individual and family: Each individual is moved inwardly by reverential fear, issuing outwardly in delighted obedience (1). To this character and conduct a particular blessedness is attached—children of recognized worth (2a, cf. Pr. 20:7) and a blessing that extends to succeeding generations (2b). (ii) 3–4 Fortune and misfortune. Righteousness is double-faceted: endlessly right with God, constantly committed to righteousness of life. Such a person is amply provided for (3a, cf. 1:3; 73:23–26) but is not immune from life’s darkness. When such comes they are faced in the faith that light is bound to dawn. But while the darkness lasts the duties remain of continuing upright in conduct, gracious and compassionate (cf. 111:4) in relationships and righteous in character. (iii) 5–6 Generosity and security. As surely as light will dawn in darkness, so good will come—but note how the emphasis still rests on maintained character—a generous spirit (5a, the same word that provided the word for gracious in 4b, 111:4b) practising liberality (lends freely) and a life lived with justice, i.e. applying principles of righteousness through right decisions. (iv) 7–8 Threat and trust. The life of the righteous is not a bed of roses. Bad news comes (not now the darkness of 4a, but human hostility, 8b) yet there is no loss of peace. The heart remains steadfast because the Lord is trusted. Furthermore, this is not a passing mood but a maintained attitude until the threat is over. Look in triumph, (lit.) ‘look upon/at his foes’, maybe an idiom for ‘see the last of’, certainly no sense of gloating is intended. (v) 9–10 character, conduct and destiny. Each verse expresses its own telling sequence: generosity in the context of a life that is right with God and right in conduct leads to honour (9, Rom. 2:10); wickedness with animosity is self-destructive (10) and ends in nothing, (lit.) ‘will perish’.

Psalms 113–118. The Egyptian Hallel: A Cantata of Salvation

Anything that relates to the Lord Jesus Christ is of supreme value and attractiveness for the Christian. Consequently, the strong likelihood that this group of psalms formed part of his Passover celebrations enhances their interest and importance. At the last Passover, the first Supper, he and his company would have sung Psalms 113–114 before the meal and 115–118 would be the ‘hymn’ they sang at the end (Mt. 26:30). No doubt each psalm in the group had its own literary history but together they are well called ‘the Egyptian Hallel/Act of Praise’, a commentary in song on Exodus 6:6–7.

Psalm 113 grounds the whole enterprise in the Lord—how it is intrinsic to his exalted dignity to exalt the poor and needy. 114 majestically records the exodus as the Creator manages his creation for his people’s welfare. 115, 116 balance each other as, respectively, the community and the individual rescued from spiritual (115) and physical (116) death. 117 extends exodus truth to its worldwide limits—what was done for Israel was done for all. Finally 118 enables us to join in the great procession through the gates and into the very presence of the Lord himself.

(a) Psalm 113. The Lord, exalted and exalting

The theme is the universal and transcendent, Lord, exalted above heaven and earth, embracing all time, filling all space, over the nations, raising the poor and transforming the frustrated. The movement of thought is from the sovereignty which rules all, to the goodness which touches each.

1–3 The worthy name. The Lord’s name (what he has revealed of himself, Ex. 3:15) excites the praise of his servants and is worthy of endless and universal acclaim. Name teaches that praise responds to revelation, and servants that praise is rooted in commitment of life.

4–6 The exalted Lord. The threefold reference to the name in 1–3 is matched by a threefold statement of exaltedness in 4–6: exalted ... heavens, enthroned, stoops ... heavens. He is exalted over every people and every place, incomparably exalted, so transcendent that he must stoop even to see the heavens. His glory is the highest of all realities, his person is above all dignities, his omniscience embraces all creation.

7–9 The shared exaltation. He is himself exalted (4); he lifts, ‘exalts’ the needy; he who sits enthroned (5) seats the needy (enthroned)—out of the dust, onto a throne, into personal fulfilment. He takes people in their helplessness (poor ... needy), countermands their unworthiness and reverses their hopelessness. How true all this is of the inner realities of the exodus—from the Lord’s control over earthly powers (Ex. 4:22–23; 14:30–31) to his awareness of his people’s needs (Ex. 2:24–25; 3:7) and to the despairing cries of forcibly bereaved mothers (Ex. 1:22)! But its revelation of the Lord is permanent: what he was then, he is now.

(b) Psalm 114. The Sovereign Lord: over all, in all, through all

The message of 113 is not wishful thinking for 114 displays the Lord supreme over nations (1) identified with the erstwhile outcast (2), sovereign over creation (3–7), providing for the needy (8). The facts of the exodus undergird the facts of revelation.

1–2 Redemption and indwelling. When the Lord redeems, he comes to stay; separating his people from the world, he separates them for himself. The psalm goes beyond the topographical fact that the Lord’s sanctuary (his ‘holy place’, where he dwells) was in Judah; rather, Judah, his people themselves, became the place where he lived (Eph. 2:19–22). For those whom he redeems he transforms: finding them as Jacob, living in them as Israel (Gn. 32:27–28).

3–4 Creation and completion. Natural marvels accompanied the exodus, at the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21ff), Jordan (Jos. 3:14ff) and Sinai (Ex. 19:16ff). The two ‘crossings’ mark respectively coming out of Egypt and coming into Canaan. Thus what the Lord begins, he completes—and the assurance that he can do so is his sovereign power as Creator whereby humanly unsurmountable barriers ‘flee’ before him.

5–8 Compassion and provision. Questions hurry us forward to the climax: the simple reality of the Lord's presence was sufficient to achieve his marvels of deliverance. In his mercy he identifies with one as weak, even despicable, as Jacob; and he who begins and completes his good work (see on 3–4, cf. Phil. 1:6) caters also for his people's pilgrim needs (Ex. 17:1–7).

(c) Psalm 115. The Lord, blessed and blessing

We can only guess at the setting for this psalm. Does v 2 imply that the people of God are in some disarray before the taunting world and ask the time-honoured question, 'What about your good name?' (1, cf. Jos. 7:9). More likely, but still only guesswork, a recent victory has been won, so credit might be given to the king or the army. The enemy, strong in its idols, may have taunted a people whose God is invisible. More likely still, the psalm is imaginative, dwelling on the occupation of Canaan: the battles were hard but the victory was the Lord's, pagans were exposed as the devotees of dead gods and the Lord revealed as faithful (1) and sovereign disposer of all (16). The structure of the psalm tells its story:

- A¹ (vs 1–3) Praise due only to the sovereign God of heaven
- B¹ (vs 4–8) Idols and those who trust them
- B² (vs 9–15) the Lord and those who trust him
- A² (vs 16–18) Praise due to the sovereign God of heaven

The psalm is an act of antiphonal worship (cf. Ezr. 3:10–11). Can we hear one choir singing 9a, 10a, 11a, and another responding in 9b, 10b, 11b? Is 12a a congregational affirmation, with 12b–13 the response of both choirs? Possibly around this 'core', 1–3, 16–18 were spoken by the whole assembly, and 4–8 and 14–15 are the voice of the worship-leader, declaiming against idols and pronouncing blessing on Israel. At all events the psalm is as 'alive' as an act of worship as it is in its theology.

4–8 are typical of the OT view of idols and idolaters. On the one hand there is no spiritual force or reality behind the idol; it did not represent an invisible 'god'; it had no more reality than its material craftsmanship (4–7, Is. 40:18–20; 41:5–7). Yet idols were potent to destroy their worshippers (8, Is. 44:6–20). In particular there was no spoken revelation (mouths), no moral oversight (cf. 53:2), no response to prayer (hear), no propitiation through sacrifice (smell, Gn. 8:21), no care (hands to touch, 95:7), no movement (walk) or thought (sound, the murmuring that indicates pondering). 11 Fear him. At a much later date 'God-fearers' became a technical word for loosely attached proselytes. Here it describes comprehensively the two categories of vs 9–10, people and priests alike. Trusting and reverencing, the simple intimacy of the former balanced by the respectful awe of the latter, mark the Lord's people. 17 Behind the psalm lies a crisis from which deliverance has been granted (1). Were it not for divine intervention and victory death would have come to all. Hence, 18, all the more reason to extol the Lord. To read into v 17 what the OT thought of the state of the dead and to refer to passages like 88:10–12 misunderstands both. Psalm 88 envisages death under the wrath of God and consequently entertains no hope. But here, v 18 expressly looks forward to an offering of praise for evermore, 'unto eternity'. Rather, therefore, what might have been but for the Lord (17) invigorates a praise that has no end (18).

(d) Psalm 116. Faith and freedom

The situation was one of deadly threat (3, 8, 15), brought about by human deceitfulness (11) and personal lack of discernment (6). But into this situation came prayer (1–4). The Lord listens (1–2), is gracious (bestows favour on the undeserving), righteous (never deviates in his commitment to his people and promises) compassionate (is emotionally moved by their plight) (5), and sensitive about the death of his beloved (15). So there came salvation (4–6), deliverance from death (8) and bondage (16), and full provision 7, 12). Consequently there are vows to be made and kept, of love (1) and prayer (2), of resting (7) and walking (9), of personal enjoyment of salvation (13) and public profession (14, 18). Above all, however, the crisis was met by faith, the key to making all things new (8–11), the pivot of the whole psalm.

- A¹ (vs 1–2) Calling on God in the day of trouble
- B¹ (vs 3–4) The situation met by prayer
- C¹ (vs 5–7) Full provision, resting
- D (vs 8–11) Faith; making all things new
- C² (vs 12–14) Full provision, responding
- B² (vs 15–16) The situation dealt with by the Lord
- A² (vs 17–19) Calling on God in the day of deliverance

Note how 1–2 and 17–19 are linked by I will call; 3–4 and 15–16 by death entangled ... death ... freed and O LORD; 5–7 and 12–14 by been good, ‘provided in full’ and his goodness, ‘his full provision’. All this focuses a bright spotlight on vs 8–11, the centrality of faith. The key-words I believed (10), stand at the mid-point between new life enjoyed (8–9) and old life endured (10–11). Just as, of old, it was a great cry for help (Ex. 2:23–24) that initiated the exodus acts of God so, faith working by prayer remains the greatest force available to God’s earthly people.

1 (Lit.) ‘I love (him)—for the Lord hears my voice!’ 3, 6, 11, 15 Death and the grave (‘Sheol’) are represented as aggressive, out to lasso victims (3). Other factors also menace: the troubles of life (3), personal deficiencies (6, where simplehearted might rather be translated ‘foolish/silly/undiscerning’), human unreliability (11). Yet, (15), there is no such thing as untimely death. For the Lord, death is too valuable a thing to be squandered. The death of his saints, ‘his beloved’, is like a precious jewel which he bestows—precious to him and to them because at death he receives them home. In this sense, death is the final and greatest earthly blessing of God on his people. 10 I believed. Used like this, the verb means ‘I had faith’. Therefore. To face the grimness of life with dismay and to say so is not a failure of faith but an evidence of it. A more likely translation, however, is ‘when’ (I maintained faith even when I was most despairing) or ‘though’ (I held on to faith even though every hope was gone). 13 The Lord’s goodness is first repaid by taking ever more and more of it. The cup is here his gift of ‘salvations’, i.e. full salvation. 16 Servant ... son ... freed. A threefold bond: personal bond-service (servant), inherited bond-servitude (Ex. 21:4) and the voluntary servitude of the freed slave who loves his master and will not go (Ex. 21:5–6). 17–19 A very strong description of ‘going public’ in testimony—all the more so in the light of the intensely personal nature of the experience recorded. Vows undertaken in time of trouble were not bargains with God, but evidence of serious intent to learn from experience and to emerge from it a better and more dedicated person.

(e) Psalm 117. One God, one world, one joy

This psalm is quoted in Romans 15:11 in support of Paul's contention that Jesus is the world's Messiah, and fulfilled in Revelation 7:9. Psalm 117 reaches into the heart of God's purposes and out to the remotest bounds of the world. From the start exodus-faith reflected the Abrahamic promise of blessing to the world by including regulations for receiving non-Israelites into the covenant community (Ex. 12:48–49). Likewise, Solomon's prayer passes with ease from a variety of home-concerns to envisage foreigners praying to Israel's God and finding him listening (1 Ki. 8:41–43). Similarly, the truth that divine saving acts, targeted upon Israel, were at the same time salvation for the whole world is plain in the Psalms (e.g. 96–98).

So here is a brief statement that there is one God for all people (the LORD ... all ... nations); that there is one worldwide people united in one God (the us in 2 embraces all nations as belonging with and in Israel); that there is only one divine heart towards all (his changeless, committed love, and his eternal faithfulness); and that true religion is a praiseful, joyous response to what this loving, faithful and only God is. 2 Great, 'mighty', 'overmastering'. Us. If this is exclusively Israel, then the psalm is a recognition that what is for Israel is automatically for the world. But it is more telling, as above, to see here a 'world-Israel', the whole family of the children of Abraham (Ps. 47:9; Rom. 4:11–12; Gal. 6:16).

(f) Psalm 118. The gates of righteousness

The Lord's exodus-purpose went beyond liberation to redemption and taking the former slaves to be 'my people'. It is this ultimate end that Psalm 118 enacts symbolically. Its overall movement is a procession up to the temple gates (19), then through the gates to the altar (27). But as the procession moves along there is an antiphon or 'dialogue' between a group and an Individual. The whole assembly speaks in 1 and 29; the group and its worship-leader speak in response to each other in 2–4. But for the rest of the psalm the group acts as a responsive echo to what the Individual says and the 'real' sequence of the psalm is the story of his experiences through suffering (5–7), international hostility (10–14), and divine chastening (17–18) up to the point where he asserts his right to enter the gates of righteousness (19), all the time bringing along with him a company of those who respond approvingly to his position of trust (6–7 with 8–9) and endorse his victory in the name of the Lord (10–14 with 15–16).

After v 19 the tone changes: speaking about the Lord becomes speaking to the Lord; and the voices also change: the (priestly) gate-keepers state the conditions of entry (20) and their colleagues of the sanctuary greet the incoming Individual as the stone (22), acclaim his arrival as the day the Lord has made (24), bless him as the one who comes in the name of the Lord (26) and invite the whole entering company to gather to the altar and keep the feast (27).

The 'feel' of the psalm suggests a real occasion, possibly an annual (Passover?) celebration within the temple. Or maybe a ceremony in which the king played the central role, expressing in an individual way the pilgrimage of the whole people from anguish (5) and worldly opposition (10), even threatened death (17) into light (27) and the divine presence. Yet there are elements in the psalm looking beyond God's remembered mercies, exceeding what the people or any king had endured, and demanding more than they or he could fulfil. When did all the nations surround and threaten and be beaten back? Who could come to the gates of righteousness and be welcomed as the stone and the one who comes in the name of the Lord (22, 26)?

The psalm is expectant as well as commemorative. It looks forward to a coming One about whom all its details would yet be true. Ultimately the NT supplies the answer, but it does so only because the OT raises the question, for the idea of the Messiah in the NT is not an (unnatural) graft on to the OT but a (natural) growth from it.

1–4 Summons and response. 1 Psalm 136 spells out the implications of this summons: it was a succinct reminder of all the great acts of God (cf. Je. 33:11). 2–4 See on 115:9–11.

5–7, 8–9 Anguish, prayer, confidence, trust. Without introduction an individual voice is heard (5–7). Anguish (cf. 116:3) is ‘enhanced’ here by a definite article suggesting ‘supreme anguish’. In itself the word suggests ‘pressure/constriction’ and contrasts with the freedom that came in answer to prayer. Free, ‘in a wide place’, unconfined. Such an experience begets confidence for the future—in relation to human opposition as such (6; 56:11; Heb. 13:6) and in relation to the outcome. 7 Look in triumph (see 112:8). 8–9 The accompanying group comments on the Individual’s testimony, affirming the effectiveness of the way of trustful faith.

10–14, 15–16 Surrounding foes, sufficient name, strong right hand. The Individual reveals more of his anguish (5): he was hemmed in by the united hostility of all ... nations but though the assault was as determined as that of hostile bees it was stamped out as quickly as fire among thorns (12), through the effectiveness of acting in and by the name of the Lord (10–12). Yet the danger was real and victory only came through divine intervention (13), donated strength and delivering salvation (14). 15–16 match 8–9; those who are right with God (righteous) experience joy, victory (‘salvation’, as in 14). Hand symbolizes personal strength in action and right hand pre-eminently so. In the victory of the Individual they see a supreme example of the Lord in action.

17–21 Divine chastening, righteousness, entrance. As the individual gives a third testimony (17–18) he also reaches the temple gate (19) and, although these are gates of righteousness (gates which can only be passed on the condition of righteousness), demands entrance. The gate-keepers reply (20), affirming the condition of entrance and as he passes through the gate (21) the Individual gives thanks for his experience of answered prayer and divine deliverance. 17 in its original setting matches 6–7: the speaker affirms that he and not his deadly foes will have the last word. But when we view the psalm through the spectrum of the Lord Jesus, the meaning is that death itself will not have the last word (Jn. 10:18). 18 (Is. 53:5, 6, 10). Behind human enmity, the Individual sees the hand of God (Acts 2:23). 19 Note the personal nature of the claim (Open for me) to have fulfilled the requirement of righteousness (Is. 53:11; Jn. 16:10; 1 Jn. 2:1).

22–23, 24–25, 26–29 The stone, the day and the Coming One. It adds vividness to our understanding of these verses if, once more, we hear antiphonal voices. The temple-priests hail the incoming Individual as the stone and those accompanying him respond (22–23); the priests acclaim the day of his arrival and the group pray to experience the blessings of the day (24–25); the priests pronounce blessing on the Individual and on the group (26, you plural) and the group responds; the priests invite them to the feast (27); the Individual (28) and the group (29) join in worship. The stone is a messianic symbol (cf. Is. 28:16; Zc. 3:9). In Mt. 21:42–44 Jesus links v 26 with Is. 8:14 (see also 1 Pet. 2:6–8; cf. Rom. 9:33). In its original setting in the psalm this may be a proverbial saying describing a notable reversal of human opinion: who would have thought that the slave people were the chosen people, the key to human history and destiny? Or if the psalm is some ritual portrayal of the defeat of the Davidic king before the nations and his subsequent ‘resurrection’ by the intervention of the Lord—who would have thought that one so humbled would turn out to be the acme of divine purposes? But how very far the reality in Jesus outshines all such preliminary fulfilments! Was any other ever so scornfully rejected by the great ones of church and state? Was any other so humiliated, so crushed under the weight of international opposition (Acts 4:27), any other actually brought down into the dust of death, any other given the ‘highest place that heaven affords’, ‘far above all principalities and powers and every name that is named'? And (23) who could have done this but the Lord himself (Is. 53:10; Acts 2:23; Phil. 2:9–11).

24 The day—the day when one prayed under supreme pressure and faced all odds confident in God (5–7); the day when he met and overcame the massed forces of the world (10–12); the day when he experienced the hostility of a single foe (13, lit. 'You [singular] pushed ...', Jn. 12:31) and came forth singing and victorious (13–14); the day when he came out alive from deadly threat and the Lord's chastening (17–18) and, in full personal righteousness, came through the gate into the presence of God (19–21); the day when the rejected Stone became the capstone (22)—a day of days in the creative hand of God!

V 27 is a very obscure piece of Hebrew. Join in the festal procession might, perhaps, be, 'Prepare the feast' but at all events (and not least with the last Passover and the first Supper in mind) the meaning is 'come and share in the feast that rests on a divine work of salvation'. 28, does this reflect what Jesus said when, in the full reality of his victorious, glorified humanity, he went to his Father and ours, his God and ours (Jn. 20:17)—and how more richly could we respond than with v 29?

Psalm 119. The golden ABC of the word of God

This, the greatest example of the art of the alphabetic ('acrostic') psalm (see Poetry in the Bible), has a subject worthy of its skill. We do not know when it was composed and therefore cannot tell how much written material was intended when it speaks of the word of the Lord, or his commands, precepts and promises. It is our privilege to sing these words in a day when the entire written Scripture is available; it was the psalmist's privilege to celebrate the fundamental reality that, however it came and in whatever form it existed, the word of God is central to the life of God's people. Our God is a God who speaks and it is the possession of that verbal revelation which marks his people off from all others on earth.

In referring to this 'word of God' (which it does in almost every one of its 176 verses) the Psalm uses nine main words. These can be listed in five groups: (i) The word originated in divine speech. Word(s) (Heb. dābār, 9, 16, 17, 25, 28, 42, 43, 49, 57, 65, 74, 81, 89, 101, 105, 107, 114, 130, 139, 147, 160, 161, 169) and word/promise(s) (Heb. 'imrāh, 11, 38, 41, 50, 58, 67, 76, 82, 103, 116, 123, 133, 140, 148, 154, 158, 162, 170, 172) are both rooted in verbs of speaking. The 'word' is what God himself has spoken—whether directly, as to Abraham (Gn. 17:1) or to and through Moses or one of the other prophets (e.g. Ex. 3:5; 19:9; Am. 1:1, 3).

(ii) Two words are used which affirm that this word expresses the mind of God: laws (Heb. mišpāt 7, 13, 20, 30, 39, 43, 52, 62, 75, 84, 91, 102, 106, 108, 120, 132, 137, 149, 156, 160, 164, 175) arises from the verb 'to give judgment', to make a decision what is right and what is wrong; statute(s) (Heb. 'ēdāh 2, 14, 22, 24, 31, 36, 46, 59, 79, 88); 'ēdut (95, 99, 111, 119, 125, 129, 138, 144, 152, 157, 167, 168) comes from the verb 'to bear witness': in his word God 'bears witness' to himself, his nature and his truth.

(iii) The enduring significance of God's word is expressed by decrees (Heb. hōq 5, 8, 12, 16, 23, 26, 33, 48, 54, 64, 68, 71, 80, 83, 112, 117, 118, 124, 135, 145, 155, 171). Deriving from the verb 'to engrave' it points to something 'graven in the rock' for perpetuity.

(iv) The authority of the word and the love which prompted it are blended in the description law (Heb. torāh, 1, 18, 29, 34, 44, 51, 53, 55, 61, 70, 72, 77, 85, 92, 97, 109, 113, 126, 136, 142, 150, 153, 163, 165, 174). While the word is used of authoritative imposition, at base it means 'teaching' and is specifically (Pr. 3:1) the instruction a careful father gives to a loved child.

(v) Finally, the word of God is designed for practical application to life. It is commands, commandments (Heb. miswāh, 6, 10, 19, 21, 32, 35, 47, 48, 60, 66, 73, 86, 96, 98, 115, 127, 131, 143, 151, 166, 172, 176). If any distinction is to be drawn practically between this word and the next, it is that command is the simple idea of ‘doing what you are told’ whereas precepts (Heb. piqqud, 4, 15, 27, 40, 45, 56, 63, 69, 78, 87, 93, 94, 100, 104, 110, 128, 134, 141, 159, 168, 173) suggests applying the word of God to the minutiae of life, and ways (Heb. derek 3, 15, 37—where NIV changes ‘ways’ to word) is what is now called ‘lifestyle’.

Across all these words there are certain sustained emphases, for example, the love of the word of God (16, 30, 54, 70, 127, 140, 159, 167), commitment to obey (17, 34, 60, 100, 106, 129), the word resolutely held to in times of difficulty (51, 61, 83, 87, 95, 109, 110, 143, 157, 161). Concern for the word is a ground for pleading for compassion (77) and deliverance (153); the Lord is always as good as his word (41, 59, 65, 76, 116, 154, 170). This psalm is an inexhaustible treasury. It is virtually entirely a psalm of prayer, for throughout it is addressed to the Lord and comes from a heart of true humanity in all its frailty and failure. However great our aspirations to obey, to keep the Lord’s word in the forefront of our minds and lives, we remain to the end like a lost sheep needing the Shepherd’s care (176).

Though occasionally writing a triplet (48, 176) the poet throughout devotes eight couplets to each letter of the alphabet in turn. But, as always in Hebrew poetry, form is subordinate to thought and each alphabetic section is a carefully composed statement.

1–8 Aleph. The great ‘if only’. Typically of the whole Psalm the opening section asserts that obedience to the word of God is the key to life. The great cry of v 5 is the pivot of the section. Doubly blessed are those who live by his word with constancy and commitment (1–3)—for it is his word and he intended it to be obeyed (4). Oh that I were like that (5)—for then there would be no disappointed hopes (6) but rather praise (7). With God’s help I will obey (8). 1–4 are objective: these are the facts. Blessed (1–2) under divine approval; blameless, a life fully ‘integrated’ round the Lord’s law, outwardly (walk), inwardly (heart); do nothing, ‘have determined to do nothing’. You (4), emphatic, ‘You yourself’. 5–8 are subjective: personal longing, expectation and resolve. Steadfast. This is the ideal of ‘being set in our ways’. Shame, finding life a disappointment. Your decrees (8) is emphatic, matching the you of v 4.

9–16 Beth. The absorbed heart. Aleph expressed longing (5) but the practical way forward is to focus that longing on God’s word and on to the Lord himself (10, 12). The case is posed of a young man, i.e. a situation where the life of purity is under constant pressure. The possibility of a pure life depends on the direction of the will (10), the contents of mind and memory (11), the pre-occupations of the mouth (13), and of the emotions (14, 16), the subjects of thought (15, 16). The outward life (way), arises from inner factors, all absorbed in the word but centralized on the Lord in praise and instruction (12). 9 How, a practical question, ‘By what means?’ The problem is outward (9), but the answer (10–16) is inward. 10 The deliberate direction (seek) of the heart (the whole inner being) Godward and the exercise of specific prayer. 11 The heart stored up with the word is the antidote to sin. 13 The verse opens with human lips and ends with the divine mouth: talking to oneself or to others, our conversation replete with what God has spoken. 15 Up to this point the main verbs have been ‘perfects of determination’ (‘I am determined to seek ... to hide ... to recount ... to rejoice’). Parallel thoughts are now taken up in prayer: ‘O please let me meditate ... consider’. Our commitments must be bathed in prayer. 16 A final quiet resolve centres on a proper use of the emotions and the memory (16).

17–24 Gimel. The Lord’s dependant. The verses belong together in pairs: 17–18 (acts of God enabling obedience) are matched by 21–22 (acts of God punishing disobedience and rewarding obedience); 19–20 (the psalmist as an alien on earth) are matched by 23–24 (the psalmist as an object of rebuke). Our passions do not make the life of holiness easy (9); neither, says Gimel, do our circumstances. The earth is an alien place (19); society contains those who desert the word (21), personal—even official—opposition is encountered.

How are we to live the life of God in the courts of earth? First (17–18), by requesting divine action. Do good, ‘make full provision for’. Open. In the ‘full provision’ sought, one thing is specified: the ability to understand the word in all its wonder. Secondly (19–20), by recognizing the realities of the situation and maintaining a true priority. Stranger, resident alien. Yet, notwithstanding the potential difficulties of such a life, it is not earthly comfort, provision, or even home-going that is sought, but a knowledge of God’s word as an all-consuming longing. Thirdly (21–22), the negative equivalent of the foregoing: longing for divine provision (17–20) matched by avoidance of divine displeasure through committed obedience. Fourthly (23–24), at whatever cost (even the disapproval of influential people), the Lord’s word dominates mind, emotions and the practical advice that directs life.

25–32 Daleth. Time of trouble, time of ...? The Gimel situation, an alien in a foreign environment, is real. Humiliation (25), weariness (28), temptation (29), potential disappointments (31) are all part of life. Things ‘get us down’ (25, ‘My soul cleaves to the dust’), life becomes too much (28, ‘My soul is sleepless with depression’). But, more than anything else, the time of trouble is to be a time of prayer.

These eight verses contain seven prayers. Prayer for renewal (preserve, 25), for progress in knowledge (26–27), for strength in need (28), for grace, divine favour to the meritless needy (29), for a favourable outcome (31). The time of trouble is also a time of special commitment, to fix the mind on his wonderful word (27), to choose and set the heart on his truth (30), to meet trouble with obedience (31, ‘I cleave to your statutes’), to make the effort, (‘I will run’). But the time of trouble is also a time of rest, for God will always be true to his word (25b, 28b, 29b, better ‘in accordance with your law’).

33–40 He. Inner renewal, the heart kept whole. The spirit of dependence continues with nine requests in eight verses. But the threat to running in the Lord’s way (32) is not here a hostile environment (Gimel) nor the difficulties of life (Daleth) but the wayward heart which wants to obey (34) but can so easily be drawn away to selfish ends (36) and follow the enticements of the eyes (37). There is thus a tension in the heart itself: heart-loyalty threatened by heart-disloyalty. The solution is prayer: only the Lord can keep the ‘way’ obedient (33, to follow, (lit.) ‘the way of your decrees’), the heart whole (34), direct us to true happiness (35), keep us from unworthy pursuits (36–37), save us from disappointment (39, disgrace) and renew the springs of life (40, preserve). The section is in three parts: 33–35, total commitment, keeping God’s word with the whole heart; 36–37, inner threats, the divided heart; 38–40, divine, faithful care and supply.

41–48 Waw. Steady progress. Each verse in this set begins with ‘and’ (omitted throughout by NIV and in v 42 translated then). This is not just a device to provide for the letter Waw (which, as a prefix, means ‘and’) but is the whole point of the section: there are things which follow in sequence. The preceding sections have wrestled with the problem of living the pure life (Beth) in an alien world (Gimel) full of pressures (Daleth), and with a divided heart (He). One ingredient is important above all others, the Lord’s promised unfailing love and salvation (41)—the love which knows, cares, provides and never fails and the salvation that steps in to deliver at every moment of need. Hence the significance of the ‘and’ with v 41, as if to say ‘and of course this too’. Then come the ‘things that accompany salvation’ (42–48). 42–43 share the theme of spoken testimony: those who know the Lord's love and salvation speak of it. His word can be trusted to provide the answer even to the hostile questioner (42), but (43) the word can only be used by divine consent and there must be sensitive dependence on divine goodwill at all times. 44–46 are linked by a form of verb which goes beyond I will to 'I promise I will'. Testimony requires the context of an obedient life (44), a life which demonstrates the true freedom which obedience brings (45). On this basis there is no embarrassment or fear of disappointment even in witness to kings (46). 47–48 are linked by love of the word, for the mouth that speaks the word (42, 43) and the life that exemplifies it (44–46) must arise from a heart that loves it.

49–56 Zayin. Trustee of the word. Many things prompt the reaction 'Why should I bother any more?'—trouble (50), scornful opposition (51) or because nobody else seems to bother (53). In such times, the psalmist still centred his life on the Lord's word, finding that divine promises brought renewal (50, preserves), that the time of opposition was the very time to hold firm to the Lord's teaching (51), that his laws ministered comfort (52), that life's darkness must be met with resolute 'keeping' (the servant's 'keeping', 55) and constant conservation (56, obey, lit. 'keep intact'), the Trustee's keeping. 49–50 The word of hope and comfort. Word ... promise, 'speech'. The word originates in the mouth of the Lord; consequently it conveys (sure) hope and is a quickening force (50, preserves, 'renews'). 51–52 The word held fast against scorers: unrestrained opposition met with undeviating commitment bringing comfort. 53–54 The word in sorrow and song. People observe different standards and the world is an alien place (lodge, 54, 'live as an alien', see v 19). These pressures do not mould him but revolt him and make the joys of the word the more precious. 55–56 The word to be kept, see above. The Zayin-section balances any impression the Waw-section created that life is an unbroken triumph. The freedom the word brings (45), the boldness (46) and the delight (47–48) must be safeguarded by the often grinding task of gripping resolutely to the word.

57–64 Heth. The ordering of life. The section opens and closes by addressing the LORD, his sufficiency for me and his faithful love as filling all life. How do we react to one who is all sufficient (57–60) and how do we live in relation to one whose love is to be found everywhere (61–64)? We are like the tribe of Levi (Jos. 13:14, 33; 18:7) who needed no other source of supply than the Lord. Our response to this is fourfold: pledged obedience (57), heart-felt seeking his favour and unmerited grace (58), thoughtful self-reformation (59) and prompt obedience (60). In a word, a life committed to his word, trusting his promises and conforming to his statutes. Outside there are opponents to face (61), a programme to organise (62), friends to cultivate (63) for in every situation and place—whether hostile, secret or corporate—his (unfailing) love is everywhere. Every situation must therefore be used to delight him—holding the word in adversity (61), ordering life to make time to delight in the word (62), making friends of those who follow the word (63).

65–72 Teth. Graduating in the Lord's school. In Heth we are called to a personal reordering of life in the light of what the Lord is; Teth dwells on the Lord's redirection of our lives. We are pupils in his school of affliction (67, 70), he is Principal of the school and the graduation award is the treasure of his word. 65–67 The surprising benefit of affliction. The Lord has kept his word by doing good to his servant (65, (lit.) 'You have done good ... '); this leads the servant to request more teaching (66), confident in what the Lord commands even though the school in which he received the benefit was that of affliction. 68–70 The benefit of a resolute and rejoicing heart. Come what may, because the Lord is good he can only do good. We can therefore be ready pupils in his school, committing ourselves to counter lies with wholehearted trusteeship of his word (cf. 56) and to develop true sensitivity of heart by delighting in his law (70). 71–72 Benefits in the school of affliction. It was in this school that he learned the Lord's decrees (i.e. his word as designed for our obedience) and learned too what a treasure his law is (i.e. his word as designed for our instruction). Note the prominence of the idea of 'good' in this section: what the Lord has done (65, see above), what he is (68) and what he bestows on us in his school (71–72).

73–80 Yodh. Making suffering a testimony. In affliction the psalmist himself reaped benefit (according to Teth), but now we find that he is concerned so to live in affliction that the benefit can touch others also. The same human agents of affliction reappear (78, cf. 69) but he prays to bear with their hostility in such a way that those who fear you may experience joy through his steadfastness of hope (74) and gather to him in fellowship (79). The section begins, centres and ends with prayer for personal good; it moves to prayer for others and the influence of good example; and it balances the two agents in affliction: the faithful Lord and hostile people. 73 Formed me is rather 'established me': hence 'you have made me what I am and put me where I am.' Made includes all the forces by which the Lord moulds our characters. Life's 'pressures' are the hands of the Potter. Understanding. The prayer is not for teaching but for 'discernment', an ability to see to the heart of his truth. This section majors on the inward appreciation of the word: discernment and learning (73), confidence for the future (74), knowledge (75), comfort (76), delight (77), meditation (78), and a blameless heart (80), i.e. an inward being in which every capacity is perfectly integrated around the word. This was his prayer, aim and commitment in a time of affliction (75) and undeserved hurt (78)!

81–88 Kaph. The end of the tether. Affliction continues. His opponents are the same (85, cf. 69, 78), the suffering is unmerited (86, cf. 69, 78) and he has reached the end of endurance. 81–84 express urgency and plead that the Lord will change the situation; 85–88 pray for help and renewal (88, preserve, 'renew') within the situation. The whole section is a prayer, alternating statements with pleas as he sets before the Lord the facts as well as the needs of life: and this is the primary lesson to learn, that at the end of our tether there is a place called 'Prayer'. Very often prayer is the first casualty of suffering, whereas it is in reality the surest remedy. Suffering is often long-drawn-out—faints (81), fail (82), how long (84)—but at the end of the tether there is also a place called 'Hope' (81–82) and another called 'Obedience' (83, 87). Suffering can bring extreme discomfort. It can arise from hostile people, and be undeserved but their breaking of the law of God (85) must be outdone by our obedience (88). The trustworthy word remains our rule for the present (83, 87, 88) and our hope for the future (81–82).

89–96 Lamedh. Word without end. The Hebrew word 'for ever', occurring as eternal (89) and as never (93), divides the section into two parts: the Lord's word and commitment to the word are alike 'for ever'. Thought moves from the word in heaven (89) to the word personally enjoyed (92), and then from the word personally enjoyed (93) to the word in its own boundless nature (96). Your word (89), expressing as it does the nature and the will of the Lord, is the fixed point of heaven. But the Lord is the same on earth (90). His faithfulness, unvarying consistency, remains, undergirding successive generations of people and giving stability to the earth they inhabit. Indeed, such is his enduring changelessness that he is the same today and such is his total sovereign sway that all things—good and bad alike—do his will (91). On the personal level it is the same. The enduring word gives durability to the one who delights in it. This naturally leads to commitment, for the word which guarded from perishing equally brought renewal (preserved, 93). Such commitment to the word marks those who are the Lord's (94). Still in the same period of hostility (95, cf. 69, 78, 85), it will be spent in pre-occupation with the Lord's statutes (his word declaring what he is and requires). This is the way to life for ‘In everything finite I see a limiting factor but your commands mean real freedom’ (96, cf. 45).

97–104 Mem. The delightful word. The substance of this section is bracketed by the two How exclamations: 97, how I love, subjective delight in the word; 103, How sweet, the objective delightfulness of the word. V 104 is a concluding summary. We are taught (97–100), that the delightful word informs the mind: as love of the word issues in protracted meditation on it, a wisdom is imparted that is superior to threat (98), greater than human wisdom (99), excelling tradition (100). Furthermore the delightful word directs the life (101–103): it teaches what to avoid, and what to do. It is the teaching voice of the Lord himself and is intrinsically delightful. In summary (104), this is the way to a sound mind (understanding, grasping and discerning the truth), to reliable emotions (hate) and to right living (path). Note the sequence: consistently sustained meditation (97, 98, 99) becomes obedience (100), the power of the word to change our lives. Obedience (101) arising out of recognition of the divine authority of the word (102) becomes delight (103).

105–112 Nun. The practical word. The harsh realities of life common to previous sections are present here as undefined suffering (107) and wicked snares (110). This is the context of what is said about the word. It is meant for real living in a real world. As with all the sections, this has a clearly defined structure:

A¹ (vs 105–106) the word as a guide for life and a solemn response: the light and the oath.

B¹ (vs 107–108) The word in the Lord’s hand amid life’s troubles, able to renew and to teach.

B² (vs 109–110) The word in human hands amid life’s troubles, remembered and obeyed.

A² (vs 111–112) A joyful response and the word as the guide for life: possession and direction.

105 Lamp ... light. Probably the lamp to illumine the next step, the light to illumine the path ahead. 106 Oath The idea of deliberate commitment is strong in this section. The verbs in 109, 110 express determination: ‘I am determined not to forget ... not to stray’. We must not expect to drift by accident into devotion to the word! 107 Preserve, ‘renew’. 108 Willing praise, ‘freewill offerings’, deliberate, self-imposed devotions. 109–110 combine risks necessarily undertaken in the course of life with risks encountered by the hostility of others. Thus every possible hazard is included: the whole precarious course of life is to be kept under and within the word. 111–112 The rejoicing heart must be linked with the ‘directed heart’ (112) lit. ‘I have inclined/directed my heart to do your decrees’. Joy without obedience is frivolity; obedience without joy is moralism.

113–120 Samekh. Singlemindedness, not compromise. The psalmist stands in contrast to the undecided, the evildoers, the wanderers and the wicked. The observable ground of distinction is the word, loved (113, 119), conserved (115, cf. 56), the place of refuge and the ground of hope (114), the focus of a steady regard (117, (lit.) ‘I will/O may I always keep my gaze fixed on ... ’). But the inner distinguishing reality is the Lord: for hoping in the word is sheltering in the Lord (114); the word is the commands of my God (115); fearing the word and fearing the Lord belong together (120).

To the contrary the compromisers and the wicked in rejecting the word are rejected by the Lord (118): Wrong with his word, they cannot be right with him. In this way Samekh develops the commitment-emphasis of Nun. Such commitment is not optional nor negotiable, but intrinsic to living with the Lord in fellowship and peace. The structure of the section clarifies its message.

- A¹ (vs 113–114) Love and shelter
 - B¹ (v 115) Decisive separation
 - C¹ (v 116) Prayer for upholding
 - C² (v 117) Prayer for upholding
 - B² (v 118) Divine rejection
- A² (vs 119–120) Love and fear

Thus this section seals with a distinctive person, inwardly (113), upwardly (114) and outwardly (115); a supported life, according to promise (116), bringing deliverance (117); and a discriminating God: the ground of rejection (118); a different reaction: love (119) a true fear (120).

121–128 Ayin. A plan for perilous times. The Lord’s servant sees that, notwithstanding his determination to be a light in the world, oppressive and arrogant people are becoming dominant—and how much longer he can hold out (123)? Divine truth is discounted and the ‘bottom line’ is that only divine action will suffice (126). Act (126) is the same verb as done (121), as if to say ‘all my endeavours are failures; you take over’. In this way 126 is the climax to which 121–125 lead, but it is also a ‘pivot’ between two verses of prayer (124–125) and two verses of allegiance (127–128). To say ‘I can do no more’ (121–123) and ‘You must act’ (126) is far from being and opt-out. The proper prayers of the servant for personal safety modulate into prayers to learn and understand divine truth (125). Furthermore, asserting the necessity for divine action carries with it a consequence (Because, 127a, 128a, should be ‘Therefore’): to love the Lord’s word as our chief treasure (127), to accept its complete correctness (128a, (lit.) ‘all your precepts in every matter’) and to abhor every alternative (128b). Do we learn here the context in which the Lord, should he so will, grants revival? Prayer, knowledge and love of his truth, hatred of false ways.

129–136 Pe. The double-filament light. In Ayin exhausted eyes could see only a gathering darkness. Now a door opens on to light—the light of the word (130) which, before the section ends, has become the light of the Lord (135). Yet the situation is the same: his own appreciation of the supernatural quality of the Lord’s word (129) bracketed with his grief over the flouted word (136). Between these brackets lies:

- A¹ (v 130) The light of the Lord’s word
 - B¹ (vs 131–132) Divine mercy, satisfying hunger for the word
 - B² (vs 133–134) Divine redemption, bringing freedom
- A² (vs 135) The light of the Lord’s favour

129 Wonderful, rather like our word ‘supernatural’. Obey, ‘safeguard/conserves/keep intact’, (cf. 56). What is unique requires guardianship. 130 Unfolding (lit.) ‘door, opening’. The meaning may be that when the word opens like a door, the light of the Lord floods through. This is part of the supernatural quality of the word. Simple. One who, left alone, would lack guiding principle. 131–132 Longing for the word and love for the Lord belong together. It is only by mercy (divine favour to the undeserving) that the word is fed to the hungry soul. 133 Rule, ‘have mastery’ so that freedom to obey the word would be restricted or destroyed. 134 Redeem, ‘pay the ransom price’, take upon yourself whatever cost is required.

137–144 Tsadhe. Righteous Lord, righteous word. How is it that when the word gives light the Lord gives light (130, 135)? Tsadhe replies: Because the Lord perfectly and eternally expresses and conveys himself in his word: He is righteous (137) and his word is right(eousness) (144), His statutes (138) are ‘commanded in righteousness’ and (142) his own righteousness is everlasting. The ‘match’ between the two is perfect. 137–138 The word expresses the Lord. Laws, the Lord’s decisions, revealing his mind; statutes what he ‘testifies’, revealing himself; laid down, ‘commanded’, revealing his will. Thus he who is righteous gives righteous commands. He and his word are one. 139–140 The word captivates the Lord’s servant. Faced with enemies his first concern is for the prestige of the word; faced with the word in all its refined purity (thoroughly tested, ‘exceedingly refined’) his heart goes out in love. 141–142 The word pre-occupies his mind. Status (lowly) and repute (despised) are unimportant compared with holding the word clearly in mind. The eternally righteous Lord has spoken and his word is ‘truth’ itself. What personal consideration could outweigh this? 143–144 The word brings life. Quality of life is threatened by trouble and distress (143, ‘adversity and pressure’) but a different quality of delight is imparted by the word. Consequently the target of prayer is understanding, ‘discernment’, because this is the way into the life that is life indeed.

145–152 Qoph. The felt presence. The two halves of the Qoph-section correspond to James 4:8, ‘Draw near to God’ (145–148) ‘and he will draw near to you’ (149–152). Vs 145–146 are linked by the common word I call; vs 147–148 begin with the same verb, (lit.) ‘I forestall ... my eyes forestall ...’ and together encompass a twenty-four hour session of prayer and Bible meditation. In v 149 prayer rests not on human pledges but on the Lord’s love; vs 150–151 contrast two ‘nearnesses’ and v 152 round off the section with the truth of the eternal word. 145–148 Near the Lord. Prayer is (i) inseparable from obedience. Without serious moral commitment, intercession is merely self-seeking; (ii) inseparable from self-denial: not that our urgency makes prayer effective but in real prayer there is an element of sacrificial commitment; (iii) inseparable from God’s word. Without his word we cannot know what we may allowably expect or ask. 149–152 The Lord near. The nearer life’s threats the nearer the Lord. Near (151) is a ‘next-of-kin’ word. The Lord has pledged himself to be our nearest relative who, in our helplessness, takes all our needs as his own. His nearness is thus linked with his unchanging love—pledged loving fidelity; and our assurance that he is our next-of-kin rests on his unchanging testimony (statutes) to what he is and does. But furthermore, because the Lord and his word are identified (see Pe, Tsadhe), the word is his life-renewing (149, preserve) agent.

153–160 Resh. Three reliable things. The reliable psalmist who does not forget the word (153), the reliable Lord (154, 156, 159) and the reliable word which never changes (160). But human reliability cannot be taken for granted. Life is marked by suffering and the eroding presence of wicked and faithless (‘treacherous’) people. Life needs constant renewal which depends on the Lord’s love, promise and decision. This reiterated prayer for renewal constitutes the heart of the section.

153–154 (A¹) See my need. Defend my cause. The psalmist is suffering accusation. Redeem (like near, 151) belongs to the next-of-kin vocabulary: the ‘redeemer’ identifies with his troubled kinsman, takes and discharges all his debts, undertakes all his needs. Within this troubled situation fidelity to the word continues. 155 (B¹) The wicked. Those who dissociate from the word can expect no divine saving intervention. 156–157 (C) Many compassions. Many foes. Compassion is the readily moved love of the Lord. Great is the same word as many. His love runs to meet us and is equal to every threat. 158 (B²) The treacherous. Unreliable with people, they have no commitment to the word. 159–160 (A²) See my love. Warned by the experience of those who ignore the word (158) and can expect no deliverance (155) the psalmist affirms his love for the word and the word's eternal truth.

161–168 Sin and Shin. Treasured word, constant life. If we follow the distribution of the initial letters Sin and Shin, this section falls into three parts: 161–163, 164–166, 167–168. They deal with, respectively, the constant heart (what it fears, what it treasures, what it loves), the constant life (praiseful, un stumbling, obedient), and the constant keeper (obeying 'keeping' that springs from love, obeying 'keeping' that aims to please). Love occurs in each section: the constant heart safeguards its love for the Lord's teaching (163) by a corresponding hatred of the false; the constant life enjoys peace (wholeness; peace with God, with people, and peace of mind; a rounded life) in consequence of loving the Lord's teaching (165); the constant keeper is motivated by love of what the Lord has testified of himself (167). The life that is determined to be constant—under pressure and in devotion—finds enrichment and peace; but it also encounters moral conflict, for there is no such thing as unchallenged constancy. The choice is between what to love and what to hate; the battle is for patient continuance until the Lord acts. But it is obedience that is the hallmark of love and it is by obedience we please the Lord (168).

169–176 Tau. Straying but obedient! 169–170, linked by before you, are both prayers for a hearing and ask the Lord to act according to his word, working inwardly (understanding, 'discernment') and outwardly (deliver). 171–172 linked by references to lips and tongue, are both prayers for responsiveness, for the word taught and recognized for what it is. 173–174 ask and long for divine action, basing the requests on the response (chosen ... delight) already made to the word. 175–176 focus on personal needs, the sense of ebbing vitality and the tendency to stray. The clue to vitality and to recovery is the sustaining and unforgotten word.

The first four verses (169–172, which could be entitled 'Lord, hear!') focus on the psalmist's voice, with the themes of prayer and praise centred on the word as that which God has spoken and which is received as teaching and command. The last four verses (173–176, which could be entitled 'Lord, act!') are the voice of testimony (I have chosen: long ... strayed ... not forgotten) arising from the will, the emotions, the life itself and the mind/memory concentrated on the word. Each set of four verses ends with the word as command (172, 176). A fitting concluding section indeed!

Psalms 120–136. Pilgrim praise

Possibly the loveliest single group of psalms in the whole psalter, 120–134 are self-described as 'Songs of Ascents', though without any added explanation as to how we are meant to understand this title. The word (correctly and literally) translated ascents is used of 'steps/stairs' (Ex.20:26; 1 Ki. 10:19f; cf. 2 Ki. 20:9f; Am. 9:6) also, on one occasion, of the journey 'up' from Babylon and of thoughts 'arising' (Ezk. 11:5). 'Steps' prompted Jewish tradition to make a rather fanciful link with levitical choirs singing on the steps leading from the Court of the Women into the Court of the Sons of Israel in Herod's Temple, but stopped short of saying that the choirs either exclusively or especially sang these songs. The reference to 'stairs' in Nehemiah 3:15; 12:37 has aided the more reasonable thought that these songs were sung on a processional way up to the temple at festivals. The pervasive Zion/Jerusalem/House of the Lord theme backs up such an explanation.

Broadening the picture, some commentators have linked the psalms with the homeward journey of the Babylonian exiles. The single relevant use of the word 'steps' in Ezra is too narrow a base from which to make it a technical term for coming home from Babylon but the theory has the right ‘feel’ in relation to the broad movement, as well as some details of the psalms.

The psalms, however, were probably first brought together to provide a hymn-book, ‘Pilgrim Praise’, for travelling companies on their way to Zion for the annual pilgrim feasts (Ex. 23:17; cf. 1 Sa. 1:3; Lk. 2:41). They are certainly suitable for such occasions. Each psalm, of course, had its own point of origin and use before it was edited into its present position in the ‘Songs of Ascents’. In most cases this cannot be traced and, even were it possible to do so, little or nothing would be gained. ‘Pilgrim Praise’ has been edited with consummate skill and it is the meaning of the psalm in its present setting that is all-important.

The ‘Songs of Ascents’ fall into five groups of three, plus Pss. 135 and 136. The first four of these groups (Pss. 120–131) share the following characteristics: the first psalm in each group exposes a situation of distress; the second emphasizes the Lord’s power to keep/deliver/build/give hope; and the third has the theme of security: in Zion (122, 125, 128); in the Lord (131). This Zionward ‘movement’ suits and supports the ‘Pilgrim Praise’ idea. The whole collection keeps the traveller’s eye on the goal. 132–134 are all psalms of arrival—the ark in Zion, fellowship in Zion, blessing in Zion. The pilgrim who begins far off in a harsh world (120), indeed in this world’s ‘darkness’ (Kedar, 120:5, means ‘black’) ends in a very different night (134:1), secure in the Lord’s house and under his blessing.

Psalms 120–122. The first triad. When trouble comes Uncongenial people (120) and hostile circumstances (121) alike threaten the pilgrim but there is peace within Jerusalem’s walls (122).

Psalm 120. Prayer amid hostile people

The order of words in v 1 is ‘To the Lord in my distress I call and he answers me’. This is the picture the psalm leaves with us: praying amid trouble, garrisoned within divine care. There is no reason to think that 3, 4 were actually spoken to the opponent. As Proverbs 20:22; Romans 12:19 command, the trouble is taken to the Lord and left there but in the certainty of what will happen: arrows (4) directed with a warrior’s skill must find their mark: the punishment will fall where it is deserved; but behind it lies burning fire, the retributive justice of a sin-hating God. But, leaving all such action to the Lord, the psalmist meanwhile lives in a world which cannot give peace (5–7). Meshech in the far north (Gn. 10:2) and Kedar (Je. 2:10) in the Syro-Arabian Desert are too far apart to be where the psalmist lives. Metaphorically they suggest being far from home, out in the wilds of this world. Even here he would live at peace (that is his nature: 7, (lit.) ‘I am peace’; cf. 109:4) and share the peace he knows, but the world is a venomous place.

Psalm 121. Unknown perils, known securities

The question where security can be found (1) could originally have been prompted by any number of situations, but in its present pilgrim context it pictures an anxious gaze at hills which could shelter marauders, or a longing gaze at the far-off hills of Zion: how shall I escape the dangers of the way and arrive within the hills (125:2) of home? But (2) the LORD is the Maker of heaven and earth: every threat arises and every journey is made in his world where he rules supreme. Consequently (3–8) six times the verb ‘to keep’ (watches over, keep) sounds out. The perils are unknown but the security is certain. 3–4 The Lord who redeemed (Ex. 6:6) his son

Israel (Ex. 4:22) will not now lose him on his way home! 5–6 The divine companion (at your right hand) stands between you and every threat, real (sun) or imaginary (moon). 7–8 He caters for all harm, guarantees personal security (your life), accompanies life's busyness (coming and going) for all time (now and forevermore). The Creator is also the Redeemer and the Companion.

Psalm 122. The family in the city

Picture the pilgrim at the end of the first day in the city: (2) lit. 'Our feet have actually been standing within your gates!' The wonder of home contrasts with the 'far country' (120:5); the company of brothers (8) with the sniping of foes (120:2, 7). Anticipation has been crowned by arrival (2), and the sight (3) and constitution (4–5) of the city. No wonder it all issues in responsive prayer for the Lord's people, their fellowship and the security of the city itself. Isaiah 26:1–4 teaches that amid life's threats we live already, by faith, within the 'strong city' (Heb. 12:22; cf. Eph. 2:6). In this sense the pilgrim of old, still on his hazardous journey, could sing of feet already planted on Jerusalem's pavements. The essence of this city is its unity (3–5): the very shape of the city tells that it is together. Those who enter come as separate tribes but they are all of the LORD, motivated by obedience (statute) and with the objective of praise, privileged by his revelation of himself (name). They come to a place where, in principle, under God's appointed king, everything is put to rights (5, judgment). They needed to pray because their Jerusalem was of this world. Ours is different (Heb. 11:10) but the call to joy, unity and prayer remains.

Psalms 123–125. The second triad. When resources fail

Human scorn (123) and hostility (124) find the Lord's people in total dependence on him but (125) those who trust are as secure as Zion itself. In 120 the plea was for the Lord to deal with foes: 123 asks him to cater for weaknesses; 121 envisaged circumstantial dangers: 124 pictures raging human powers; in 122 Zion symbolized peace: in 125 it symbolizes strength.

Psalm 123. The Lord in heaven

The earthly church is surrounded by contempt (3), ridicule and proud ('complacent'), arrogant ('superior') people (4). What do we do when we cannot 'take it' any more (3)? The eye symbolizes longing, need, expectancy. 'The upward glancing of an eye' tells it all to the Lord whose heavenly throne (1) speaks of his endless resources as well as his worldwide sovereignty. Slaves look to the uncertain resources of earthly masters. We look to the LORD, who revealed his name and worked his wonders for us when we were slaves in Egypt. But the threefold mercy (grace to the meritless, 2–3) will not fail. It is a matter of keeping our eyes on him, submitting our necessities to his timetable (till, 2).

Psalm 124. The Lord alongside

Four pictures of danger tell it all: earthquake (3b, Nu. 16:30) and flood (4a) are overwhelming threats from which deliverance is against all the odds—but the Lord can do it! The beast of prey (6) and the fowler (7) are threats in the animal and human realms. We have not only emerged unscathed but the threat itself has been destroyed (7c). Only a God of total, sovereign and worldwide command (8) could have done such things—and this God is the LORD committed to and unfailingly on the side of his people (1–2).

Psalm 125. The Lord encircling

This is a picture of a believing community, finding security in trust (1, 2); a threatened community, patiently waiting till the Lord remove the burden of wicked rule (3); a divided community in which the good and bad are mixed (4–5). 1–2 Trust makes us the living counterpart of the immovable Zion; the encircling mountains are a physical counterpart of the encircling Lord. 3 That trust includes faith in the Lord’s providential world-rule. The duration of oppressive or inadequate rule is adjusted to the patience of the Lord’s people in enduring it. It will not reach the point where they would fall into the evil (‘deviation’) of resistance, violating what the Lord has appointed (Rom. 13:1). 4–5 Such a situation, where trust is challenged by circumstances, calls for prayer. Prayer is not directed against the wicked (5)—they are left to the Lord—but to the enriching of those who follow the Lord from the heart (4), his Israel (5), the true people within the professing people.

Psalms 126–128. The third triad. When failure threatens

The Lord’s people are still in the world. Tears (126:5) are the order of the day. But 127 puts another side of the picture: within the toil of life the Lord gives sleep (1–2) and the tears with which 126 ends become the ‘happy’ (blessed) of 127:5. 128 rings with happiness (1, blessed; 2, blessings, ‘Happy you are’) given and guaranteed by the blessing of God (4–5). Thus the theme is subtly different from the ‘getting to Zion’ theme of the first two triads. Indeed in one sense this triad begins in Zion (126) as well as ending there. But it begins with blessing longed for, a harvest yet to come, and ends with blessing enjoyed. In a word, it is a pilgrimage of the heart rather than of the feet: a longing for greater blessing than we have yet enjoyed (126), greater security than we have yet experienced (127).

Psalm 126. The tension of experience

The early rapture of Ezra 1–6 and the erosion of enthusiasm by the harsh facts of life illustrate this psalm. It has always been the same: whether we think of the exodus, the return from Babylon or even the redemptive work of Christ—redemption is accomplished but still needed! Joy seems to lie in the past, tears occupy the present. If only the Lord would act now as completely and dramatically as he did then! So we pray for streams in the Negev (4) a sudden flash flood, transforming dried-up watercourses, making the scorched land into a garden! But no, in God’s providence, following on his mighty acts (1–3), the metaphor of the harvest takes over (5–6). There will be songs of joy but only when the toilsome task of sowing has been done and the crop has matured for harvest. That is where we find ourselves in God’s perfect plan of things (cf. Phil. 1:9–11; Jas. 5:7, 8; Rev. 14:14–16).

Psalm 127. At rest in toil

Does 126 say it all? Past laughter, future songs, present tears! 127 covers three areas of human activity and potential anxiety—the house, the city (1) and the family (3–5)—and affirms that without the Lord we can do nothing. Vs 1–2 seem to suggest ‘Leave it all to God; let go and let God’, and enjoy a restful life. But in the Bible, the opposite of rest is not work but restlessness, and 3–5 add a corrective. The Lord has ordained the human activities of begetting, conceiving and bearing. Yet, the Bible insists, it is not human but divine agency that ‘opens the womb’ or, indeed, ‘closes’ it (Gn. 29:31; 30:2). Children are not our achievement but his gift (3). So is a completed house and a guarded city (1–2). All life must be lived to the full, all its joys enjoyed and its duties performed in unworried reliance on him who is the doer of all. Joyful activity, toilsome activity—but full of untroubled rest. (2d)

Psalm 128. The transcending of failure

Blessed (1) combines here the ideas of ‘under God’s blessing’ and ‘finding personal fulfilment/happiness’. The psalm pledges this experience in two areas of life: (i) the personal and present (2–4): the prospering of work and marital and domestic joy; (ii) public and future (5–6): lifelong, communal, and familial. The secret of all this lies in the individual: v 1 all is singular, ‘everyone’; v 4 the man, the individual person. 1 a heart of reverence (fear) for the Lord and a lifestyle (walk) conformed to his ‘lifestyle’ (ways). 2 Eat the fruit, a picture not only of prosperity but also of security (cf. Je. 31:5). 3 Vine. Maritally a picture of attractiveness and sexual enjoyment (cf. Song 7:8). Vine ... Olive. Together symbolic of God’s richness in blessing (cf. Dt. 8:8). Psalm 126 cried out for blessing; 127 asserted that it comes not by toiling but by trusting; 128 fulfils the desires of 126 and confirms the assertions of 127: Blessed (1) ... blessings (2) ... blessed (4) ... bless (5)—two different words each used twice for confirmation.

Psalms 129–131. The fourth triad. When sin threatens

The fourth triad is unlike any of its predecessors in that the only reference to Zion comes in the first psalm of the three (129:5). Its similarity to the third triad is seen especially in the middle psalm, for while 121 and 124 dwelt on external opposition, circumstantial and human, 129 and 130 stress internal, personal threats, respectively anxiety and sin. Once more the pilgrimage is that of the heart. In Psalm 129, thanks to the righteous Lord, Israel has been saved (1–4) and ungodly foes may be left to him (5–8); but (130) is not the same righteousness a threat to Israel? For no sinner can stand before him (130:3). But he is a God of forgiveness (4) love and redemption (7). Hence, Psalm 131, there is rest of heart and hope in the Lord.

Psalm 129. Righteousness

The facts of the past (1–4) teach how to face the problems of present and future (5–8). This psalm could date from almost any point in Israel’s troubled history. But though the threats were manifold (1, greatly, ‘more than enough’, 123:3), the lesson of history is plain: not even savage oppression (3) has gained the upper hand because (4) the LORD is righteous, i.e. having revealed himself (Ex. 3:15; 6:6) as the redeemer of his people and the conqueror of his foes, he never deviates from that standard. Foes would impose bondage but the Lord gives freedom (4). And this is not a fictional reconstruction of history! Where is the imperial Egypt which enslaved Israel—or the Philistines, Assyrians or Babylonians? In 5–8 the verbs could as well be prophecy as prayer. If prayer, this is how to deal with life; if prophecy, this is how to face the future. Those who hate Zion will prove transient (6), unsuccessful (7), unbefriended and excluded from the community of blessing (8, cf. Ru. 2:4).

Psalm 130. Forgiveness

Righteousness sets this triad of psalms apart. True, if the righteous God sides with his people, then no foe can prosper (129); but if this God comes among his people so as to side with them, will not his righteous presence expose and condemn their sin? The key-words of Psalm 130 tell their own story: the psalm opens with a cry, rising out of the depths of distance and alienation, for mercy, the unmerited, undeserved grace of God (1–2). It moves to an affirmation that, (lit.) ‘with you (i.e. as an inseparable companion) is forgiveness that is forgiveness indeed!’ (3–4). This is followed by waiting (5–6). To be sure the verb contains the idea of waiting with confident expectation but waiting it is: there is nothing we can do: forgiveness when it comes is a sovereign decision and action of God. In 7–8 the individualism of the psalm gives way to a community-wide appeal: there is hope for all, sure, certain, confident hope; because the Lord has two other inseparable companions: pledged love and ‘abundant’ redemption—resources and readiness in God to pay whatever price will redeem, ‘ransom’ us from all ... sins(8).

Psalm 131. Rest

In 130 the exhortation to hope arose from what is true of the Lord; in 131:3 it arises from what the psalmist has found to be personally true. He has taken a lowly place (1); his inner being (2) is at rest—like a child grown past the instinctive demands and fretfulness of infancy and now content, as a toddler, simply to be with mother. What original journey out of self-competent pride into humility and rest first prompted this beautiful psalm? We do not know, but its call to hope in the Lord links it with 130 and makes it the testimony of a sinner forgiven: humbled by the mercy of God, at peace within because at peace above.

Psalms 132–134. The fifth triad. When the goal is reached

These psalms are all centred in Zion. The pilgrimage is past; home has been reached. Yet there is movement within the three: from the objective facts of city and monarchy as divinely chosen and established (132) to the heaven-sent fellowship of the Lord’s family (133) and to the actuality of standing in the very presence of the Lord himself (134). This is the end of the pilgrimage: the Lord with us (132), the church in perfect fellowship (133), the Lord’s servants in the Lord’s sanctuary (134).

Psalm 132 The Lord in Zion: divine choice

This beautifully constructed poem is a meditation on 2 Samuel 7. In that chapter David proposed to build the Lord a house only to find that the Lord was rather purposing to build David a house, so here David’s oath (2–5) is balanced by the Lord’s oath (10–11). Each of these two divisions has the same pattern: Prayer (1, 10), statement (2, 11), speech (of David, 3–5; of the Lord, 11–12), a further statement (6, 13) and a final speech (exhortation, 7–9; and promise, 14–18). Thus human purposes and desires (1–9) are balanced and matched by divine purposes and affirmations (10–18). David’s oath (1–5) is followed by human devotion to fulfilling it (6–9); the Lord’s oath (10–12) by his commitment to fulfilling it (13–18). We can imagine a pre-exilic congregation gathered at one of the annual feasts singing joyfully of David’s zeal to found the sanctuary and the Lord’s commitment to make it what it was meant to be.

1 Hardships. Bringing the Ark to Zion was not achieved without disappointment and suffering (2 Sa. 6:5–9), preparation, cost and loss (2 Sa. 6:12–23). The word, in its meaning ‘humiliations/deep humiliation’ could also refer to David being rejected as the temple-builder (2 Sa. 7:5, 13; 1 Ki. 5:3; 1 Ch. 22:8; 28:3). 2 No such oath is recorded in the histories. The psalm may be adding to our information or enlarging poetically on David's pure zeal for God's honour in making Zion his capital and planning for the House. The Mighty One (Gn. 49:24; Is. 49:26; 60:16; cf. Is. 1:24) emphasizes 'sheer power'. 3–5 The subordination of personal life, and comforts to the great priority. A dwelling, 'a fit/great dwelling', also in 7. 6 Ephrathah, of uncertain meaning, is specially linked with Bethlehem (Gn. 35:16; Ru. 4:11; Mi. 5:2). Jaar, an abbreviation for Kiriathjearim (1 Sa. 7:1–2), where the Ark was housed during its 'lost years'. 7 Dwelling ... footstool. The significance of the tabernacle/temple was that it actualized the dwelling of God among his people (Ex. 29:43ff.; 1 Ki. 8:10–11, 13, 27). Within the Tent/House the Ark, more specifically the 'mercy seat/atonement cover' (Ex. 25:17–22; Lv. 16:13–14) was the place where the Holy God touched earth.

8 Arise (Nu. 10:35) Your might. (Jos. 3:11; 1 Sa. 5). 9 Clothed. Clothing, cf. 16, symbolizes character, function, commitment, i.e. make them righteous. Saints, the recipients of the divine changeless love who also love him in return. 10–18 David is referred to by name three times (10, 11, 17) and by implication seven times. Everything the Lord ever did for Zion and the line of David arose from the original oath (11) and divine faithfulness to promise. Implicit in the oath is the choice of Zion (13; Heb. 12:22), the indwelling of the Lord in his city (14, Ezk. 48:35; Rev. 21:2–3), his blessing, materially (15) and spiritually (16), and the ultimate purpose, the coming of the Messiah and his triumph (17–18).

Psalm 133. The family in Zion: divine blessing

The psalm begins with a situation, proceeds to a double comparison (2, 3ab, lit. 'It is like ... it is like ...') and ends with a certain blessing (3cd). V 1. Unity is emphasized: '... dwell together—and in unity!' This is (objectively) good, (subjectively) pleasant. But it is much more: it prompts a heavenly response of unstinting abundance by which the Lord (cf. Ex. 29:7; 30:25; Lv. 8:12) consecrates his people to be his priests, fulfilling his own expressed desire for them (Ex. 19:6). Moreover it is a heavenly miracle eradicating divisions (1 Ki. 12:19) and bringing Hermon, the chief mountain of (northern) Israel and Zion, the mountain of (southern) Judah, together in divine life-giving dew (Ex. 16:13, 14; Is. 26:19; Ho. 14:5). Consequently there (emphatic), i.e. where v 1 is true, 'the Lord has commanded, for evermore, the blessing of life.'

Psalm 134. Worship in Zion: divine fellowship

The pilgrimage began in 'Kedar' (120:5); it ends in the Lord's house wherein the pilgrims 'bless the Lord' (2) and he blesses them (3). When he 'blesses' us he reviews our needs and meets them; when we bless him we review his excellencies and worship him. What joy as the pilgrims at last arrive and their feet are standing not only in Jerusalem but in the Lord's house! What joy when 'from earth's wide bounds, from ocean's farthest coast, through gates of pearl streams in the unnumbered host!'—and the Great High Priest himself summons them to 'bless the Lord' (1–2) and pronounces the Lord's blessing on them (3). 1 Minister, (lit.) 'stand', accepted and secure. Night, possibly priests and levites on night-duty in the House; or pilgrims devoutly keeping vigil by night; or (best of all) keeping the night festival of Passover (Ex. 12:42)—'the Lamb is all the glory in Immanuel's land'.

Psalms 135, 136. The Lord's chosen people

It is very fitting that these psalms should be numbered with 120–134 in ‘Pilgrim Praise’. Could anything be more suitable to the newly-arrived pilgrims than one song which traces the steps of the great, foundational pilgrimage from Egypt to Canaan, rejoicing in the benefits that the divine choice has brought (135:4); and another song (136) which, using much the same material in a great antiphon, traces the same attributes and powers of the Lord, and the same benefits granted to his people to one abiding reality within his nature, the love which endures for ever?

Psalm 135. The choice of Israel: its meaning for the people

The structure of this psalm is:

A¹ (vs 1–4) Praise to the electing God

B¹ (vs 5–7) The great Lord, sovereign in creation (seven facets of his greatness)

C (vs 8–14) The acts of the Lord;

C¹ (vs 8–9) Delivering

C² (vs 10–12) Bestowing

C³ (vs 13–14) Vindicating

B² (vs 15–18) Dead and death-dealing idols: (seven facets of idol-gods)

A¹ (vs 19–21) Praise to the indwelling God.

1–4 The references to servants ... who minister and the adjectives good ... pleasant, here applied to the Lord, link with 133:1; 134:2. The repeated call to praise and the seven drum-beats of the divine name arise from divine choice of Jacob ... Israel. Treasured possession (Ex. 19:5; Dt. 7:6; 14:2; 26:18; Mal. 3:17). For the meaning see also the ‘secular’ example, 1 Ch. 29:3.

5–7 Communal praise only has the value that each individual contributes to it. The pilgrims worship together but personal conviction is essential: (lit.) ‘I, for my part, know indeed ...’. Pagan thought permeated the whole universe with many gods, especially the seas and the depths (6). The psalms love to dwell on the fact of one sole Creator God whose writ runs everywhere without exception (6) and whose will governs even the detail of climatic change (7). All gods are mentioned not because they exist objectively but because they are worshipped and magnetize the devotion of deluded minds (Is. 44:6–20). (See on 95:3.)

8–14 The whole exodus-period is covered, from the moment of leaving Egypt (8) to the final victories under Moses (11, Nu. 21:21ff; Dt. 2:20ff; 3:1ff), then on to inheritance under Joshua (12) and, because the Lord does not change (13), out into the undated future in which he will always side with his people in action and in heart: Vindicate means ‘plead the cause of’ his people; have compassion, ‘feel sorry’.

15–18 (See 115:4–8.) Note the careful way in which this ‘quoted’ material plays its significant part in its new setting. As the outline above shows, the psalm contrasts the God who is active everywhere (5–7) with the man-made gods whose only ‘work’ is to spread the corruption of their deadness (18).

19–21 Except at the end of v 21 where the same verb is used as in 1–3, praise translates the verb ‘to bless’ (see on 134:2–3). On the categories of the Lord’s people, see 115:9–11; 118:2–4. The cause from which ‘blessing the Lord’ particularly arises is, ‘Blessed be/is the Lord ... who dwells in Jerusalem’ (21). The Lord chose his people because he so wanted them for himself (4) that he came to dwell among them (cf. Eph. 2:18–22; 2 Cor. 6:16).

Psalm 136. The choice of Israel: its root in the Lord

The supreme reality is not the Lord's status (1–3), nor his work in creation (4–9) and history (10–22), nor even his goodness to Israel (23–25) but what he is in himself, the one whose love endures forever. To this point of emphasis and reiteration everything returns. His status would by itself inspire awe; his creatorial works, marvel; his power evident in history, submission; his goodness, gratitude. But when we see that all these greatnesses spring from an unchanging love which delights to manifest power in mercy and provision, then the Lord is truly acknowledged with wonder, love and praise. What is it to us that he is good, supremely exalted, the Creator, the Lord of history, the benefactor of people in time past, if there is not also the unchanging love which brings us too into the warm embrace and keeping of such a God?

Therefore we, with our pilgrim brothers and sisters of the OT church, can retrace our foundational pilgrimage from Egypt to Canaan and sing with them at every step that his love endures for ever. No power can resist him (1–3; Rom. 8:31–39; 1 Cor. 8:5, 6; Eph. 1:19–22); we are safe because the world we live in is his world (4–9); we too experience redemption (10–15; Jn. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:18–21), enjoy provision irrespective of circumstance (16; Phil. 4:12–13, 19), enter into our inheritance through his victory (17–22; Col. 1:12–14), marvel at the condescension of his choice of us (23–24, 1 Cor. 1:26–31) and eat our daily bread, looking with gratitude to the hand that feeds us (25), the love that endures for ever.

Psalm 137. The Lord's strange song

Since the tenses in 1–3 are most naturally understood as past and the word 'there' occurs in v 1 (omitted by NIV) and 3, with an equivalent in 2, the psalmist is looking back in time and away in space. He belongs in the returned community and his psalm recalls the captivity.

1–4 The unsung song. To the grieving exiles (1), memories were bitter (cf. 7) and joy was consigned to the past (2). Deliberately so—for the captors demanded songs and joy (3). But the Lord's songs are statements of truth and acts of worship, not items in a concert. Furthermore, there is a proper time for weeping. Life is not ceaseless joy. Also, the invitation to sing was a veiled invitation to settle down—you're Babylonians now! But they could not forget or conform. They were in a foreign land (4).

5–6 Home is where the heart is. Things now become individual. Each had (and has) to decide where his citizenship lies and live accordingly—in thought (forget ... remember), in deed (hand) and in heart (joy). Babylon was his address, Jerusalem his home (Phil. 3:20).

7–9 The Lord's strange song. But there was a song they sang and, when they left an unscathed Babylon and returned to a shattered Jerusalem, they sang it again. (i) Edom left to the Lord. (7) (lit.) 'Remember for the Edomites' (cf. 132:1, 'Remember for David') is a legal formula setting a case before a judge. Gratuitously Edom participated and gloated when Jerusalem was razed (Ob. 10–14). Nothing is asked; no vengeance proposed or planned. All is set before the divine Judge. (ii) 8–9, Babylon left to justice, and seen in the light of Scripture (Je. 51:56 has three verbs in common with vs 8–9) is already doomed. The translation Happy (the word should be repeated at the beginning of 9) is strictly incorrect here. The word must always be contextualized: mostly it means 'blessed/under God's blessing' (32:1); often it means 'Happy/personally fulfilled' (1:1); sometimes, in line with its basic meaning of 'straight', it means 'Right/doing the right thing' (Pr. 14:21; Ps. 106:3).

The psalmist asks nothing about Babylon but notes (and who can contradict him?) that when Babylon is treated in the same manner as Babylon treated Jerusalem, it will be right. The Judge of all the earth (Gn. 18:25) will have acted (Rom. 2:5–6). 8 recognizes the justice of what Babylon did to Jerusalem (you have done, ‘you repaid’). The ruins they see evidence the justice with which the world is run by a Holy God; that justice will be Babylon’s portion. 9 records the savagery of Babylonian ‘justice’ (cf. 2 Ki. 8:12; Is. 13:16; etc) and as they did so it will be done to them. Does the Psalmist say he wants it to be so? No, only that it will be so. That is the sort of world we live in under God.

Psalm 138. New window, fresh eyes

It was one of those occasions when a single experience opened up a whole new vista—on the nature of the Lord (1–3), the future of the world (4–6) and personal security (7–8). Of the experience itself we only know that prayer was answered in a way that gave David new vitality so that he wanted to sing the Lord’s praise into the face of every so-called ‘god’. He felt he knew the Lord as never before (2). He knew that no trouble or foe (7) could ever beat him or prevent the realisation of the Lord’s purpose (8).

Maybe it all happened in 2 Samuel 5:17–21 when the Philistines challenged David’s infant kingdom, and in answer to enquiring of the Lord, a signal victory was won and the ‘gods’ of Philistia became the litter of battle. Maybe, but it all arose simply through prayer and answered prayer. The place of prayer is the place where the Lord’s revelation of himself takes on new dimensions (2), the place of renewal (3), world-vision (4) and confidence in God (7–8).

2 Temple, used in 1 Samuel 1:9 of the Tent at Shiloh. In David’s day the Tent was at Gibeon (2 Ch. 1:3) but probably the reference here (cf. 18:6) is to the heavenly temple. 3 More dramatic ‘In the day I called, you answered me’. 4–6 May does not express doubt but asks that the assured future may happen. The verbs could equally be futures: ‘All ... will’. The words declare the glory, defined as the Lord’s condescending identification with the lowly. This is the truth which, in answer to prayer, opened David’s eyes to the dimensions of the Lord’s name and transformed him inwardly. He is convinced it will win the world and by it he can face the future with assurance.

Psalm 139. No escape, no regrets, no compromise

Certainly this psalm teaches the Lord’s omniscience (1–6), omnipresence (7–12), creatorship (13–18) and holiness (19–24) but such abstractions are far from its heart. For to the psalmist omniscience is God’s complete knowledge of me; omnipresence, God with me in every place; creatorship, God’s sovereign ownership of every part of me; and holiness, God’s will that I be like him. The psalm is not written by one who would escape this God if only he could, or fly from him as a sinner, but one who knows he cannot escape and finds nothing to regret in such a truth.

The psalm is a unity. For, v 13, makes 13–18 an explanation of 1–6, 7–12 and identical wording in vs 1, 23 binds the whole together. This means that the tension between the psalmist and the wicked in 19–24 must be the setting from which the psalm sprang. Some situation of moral conflict, evil in its most culpable (19) and outrageous (20–21) forms, made David not only take sides (19–24) but also re-explore his shelter and security in God (1–18). Traces of Aramaic and other hints of later language in the psalm have suggested to some a date later than David.

But these hints are insufficient to support a later date. Its theology is undatable and perfectly at home in the mouth and experience of David.

1–6 God the all-knowing: from inner thoughts to outer ways. These verses are full of verbs of ‘knowing’. The general statement of v 1 is applied to life’s outward activities and inner thoughts (2), everyday acts and lifestyle (3, ways), and unexpressed thoughts (4). Personal life falls wholly within divine limits, behind, before and over, (5, ‘You cup your hand over me’—a picture which reveals that it is all for my protection and comfort Jn. 10:27–30).

7–12 God the all-present: from the everlasting to the temporal. The Spirit, the dynamic presence of God (7, lit. ‘face’), his personal presence. Where ... where? implies that the Lord is present and active in every place and this is explored in 8–12: the everlasting dimension, above and below, (8, NIV mg. Sheol); the spatial dimension (9–10)—‘If I could go so far east as to fly off with morning light as it wings its way over the land, and continue west beyond the bounds of the sea ... ’; the temporal dimension (11–12): v 11 raises the possibility of finding cover (the verb’s meaning is problematic) in a darkness so deep that (11) light becomes night. But even such a darkness would be no problem to the Lord (lit. ‘too dark for you’), rather (12) the darkness would ‘lighten up’ like the day; indeed ‘darkness and light are the same’—as far as he is concerned and as regards the possibility of my being bereft of the guiding and holding hand.

13–18 God the all-creating: from conception to resurrection. How is it that the Lord knows and surrounds me? Because from conception and gestation through the days of life and on to ‘awaking’ in eternity he is my creator-possessor. 13 Created. The verb means ‘to acquire a possession’—e.g. purchase (Gn. 25:10; Ex. 15:16); and, in the case of the Lord and the created order, ‘to enjoy creative possession’ (Gn. 14:19, 22). 14 Inmost being, ‘kidneys’, the seat of emotion, the sentient being. 15 Frame, the bony structure, the physical being. 16 Unformed body, ‘embryo’. Every embryo is a person, a creative possession of God with days planned ahead, a life ordained in heaven to be lived on earth. 17 Precious ... vast, i.e. the whole sweep of thought in vs 1–12 and in particular the awesomeness of the human creation (13–16). But that is not all: there is still eternity! Awake, cf. 17:15.

19–24 God the all-holy: From coming judgment to present testimony. The verses are in three pairs: 19–20 Identifying with the Lord. Since he will slay the wicked in his own time, I will separate from them now. 21–22 Siding with the Lord. They hate him; I hate them. 23–24 Pleasing the Lord. Come into my heart with full divine scrutiny; take control of my ways to eradicate and direct. To say that the cry for judgment is astray from the Jesus of Lk. 23:34 is to forget the Jesus of Mt. 7:23; 25:41, 46a; Rev. 6:15ff—the biblical dimension of the wrath of God. Maybe if we matched the spirituality of vs 1–18 we would be in a position to judge the morality of 19–24. Indeed if we shared his commitment to moral emotions (21) and his unreserved commitment (23–24) we would find no other words possible. If these verses shock, the fault is more likely in us. Were we under threat as David was, we would better appraise his words; but, deeper than we are in suffering, he was also higher in holiness. To side with God is to identify with the totality of his revealed character and ways.

Psalms 140–145. Praying through to praise

Psalms 140–145 form a linked Davidic group. 142 links itself with David’s bad experiences with Saul and the same period suits all the psalms until (as with Ps. 18) we come through into the sunshine of a great alphabet of praise in 145. Psalms 140–143 are all prayers: the first reaction to trouble in all its many forms (see the titles in the commentary) is to ‘take it to the Lord’.

Psalm 140. Slander

The psalm consists of two prayers (1–5, 8–11) each followed by an affirmation (6–7, 12–13). The first prayer is for protection, the second for disaster; the first affirmation acknowledges the God of salvation in personal, protective care, the second affirms the God of righteousness in public oversight of society. Each of the prayers makes special mention of violence (1, 4, 11), harm to the person, and of speech (3, 11). Likewise the psalm mingles the thought of a single hostile individual with that of a hostile group. All this was true of David in the days of Saul’s pathological dread of him. In vs 1–5 note how the mind prompts the tongue (3) which in turn moves the hands (4). Typically of the Bible, the tongue is seen as not only hurtful (sharp) but as deadly (serpent ... poison ... vipers). 7 Strong deliverer, ‘the strength of my salvation’. Shields, a perfect tense expressing fixed habit. David is turning into worship what past experience has taught him. 8–11 reintroduce what we see as the ‘problem’ of imprecation. But it is a revealed truth that sin boomerangs (8, 9, 11), that the characteristic judgments of God on the wicked are fire and flood (10). In committing all in prayer to the Lord—leaving all to him, resting in prayer, purposing no retaliation—David realistically verbalizes what the God to whom vengeance belongs has said he will do. 12 Poor ... needy, those crushed down and pushed around by strong and unscrupulous people.

Psalm 141. Provocation

The slanderous accusation in 140 contrasts with concern for guarded speech (3), only the voice of prayer (1–2) and, when once the trouble is past, sweet (not vindictive) words (6, see below). But the psalm is, in effect, a sustained prayer, the true use of the believing tongue.

1–4 Effective prayer. David desires God to find in his prayer all the power and acceptability of the divine ordinances of the daily offerings (Ex. 29:38–42; 30:8). But pure prayer Godward must be matched by controlled speech manward (3, Jas. 3:10–12). 4 The prayer for the mouth must be backed by a prayer for the heart. With men ... eat. A temptation to end the stress by compromise, by joining with the opposition. ‘Eating their delicacies’ may be taken literally, ‘join in table fellowship’, or metaphorically ‘delight in the things that delight them’.

5–6 Sustained prayer. In 1–4 the psalmist accepted the hostility of the ungodly without reply. His humble and resolute spirit went further, accepting rebukes (5) from people who might have been expected to understand. V 5 expresses a contrast; it would seem that the righteous were rebuking him possibly for his silent acquiescence and maybe urging reply or counteraction. But this is not to be: only the voice of prayer will be heard until (6, more lit.) ‘when their judges are thrown down the cliffs, they will hear my words, that they are sweet’. The distress of the times included corrupt courts (cf. 1 Sa. 8:1–3). The summary execution (cf. 2 Ch. 25:12) of such judges means the end of the oppression. On that day his self-imposed silence will end, not in self-congratulation or vindictiveness, but in ‘sweet ... words’.

7–10 Sheltering prayer. Omit They will say (7, an NIV insertion). David and his fellow sufferers feel broken and as good as dead and buried (7) but (8)—there is the ever-present but of (a) expectation (eyes), (b) a Sovereign Lord, (c) refuge, prayer for life (not ... death), safety (9), the merited downfall of the wicked and a safe passage through affliction (10).

Psalm 142. Loneliness

On the title, see Psalm 57. Surrounded by enemies (140:9) and misunderstood by friends (141:5) David, lamenting that he is man-forsaken (4), finds that he is not God-forsaken (5). The three sections of the psalm (1–3a, 3b–5, 6–7) contain the same themes: (i) Personal distress: fainting; friendless; at the end of my tether; (ii) Prayer: describing; affirming; asking; (iii) The Lord: understanding; protecting, providing; delivering.

1–3a Prayer from an overwhelmed spirit to a God of grace and care. Though the Lord knows our needs (Mt. 6:32) he commands us to ask (Mt. 7:7–8). (1, lit., ‘With my voice I cry ... with my voice I supplicate’) i.e. verbalizing the details, summoning our fainting spirits before the One who cares (know, see 1:6). 3b–5 Prayer out of danger and isolation to a God of safety and sufficiency. Refuge (4) a place to run to; refuge (5) available shelter. Portion, sufficiency for life (Jos. 18:7, cf. 19:9) in the land ..., here and now. 6–7 Prayer out of helplessness to a God who deals fully with our needs. Desperate need, ‘hang down’: ‘hangs my helpless soul on thee’. Because of your goodness, (lit.) ‘because you do a complete work for me’, defeating every foe, releasing every bondage, restoring to praise and fellowship.

Psalm 143. The end

A crescendo with eleven petitions marks 7–12. The deeper the need the more fervent the prayer. And the need has become deep indeed! Like a hunted beast he has been chased, grounded, caged (3, cf. 142 title) and is in despair (4). Power to endure has gone. Could it be that the Lord has rejected him and that this really is the end? The psalm ‘pivots’ on the urgency of v 7:

A¹ (vs 1–2) Relationship
 B¹ (vs 3–4) Danger
 C¹ (vs 5–6) Trust
 D (v 7) Urgency
 C² (v 8) Trust
 B² (vs 9–10) Danger
 A² (vs 11–12) Relationship

1–2 (Relationship) The attributes of the Lord; 3–4 (Danger) The failing of the human spirit; 5–6 (Trust) The Lord’s past works; 7 (Urgency) Only the Lord; 8 (Trust) The Lord’s present love; 9a–10 (Danger) The guiding divine Spirit; 11–12 (Relationship) The attributes of the Lord.

2 Throughout the whole Saul-episode David was guiltless but even so, as the oppression continued the thought was inevitable: Have I offended the Lord? Not all suffering is consequent upon sin, but every suffering should prompt self-examination with a proper dread of the Lord’s displeasure. 5–6 The cordial of memory. To recall our past is to promote sadness, very often, or self-pity; to recall the Lord’s past prompts confident prayer. Thirsts for you, better ‘I spread out my hands to you, my soul to you like ...’ Mute appeal: the mere need of his people is powerful before God. 7 The solution is in God. David prays not for the removal, destruction etc. of foes, but just the lifting up of the Lord’s face in favour. That is all that is needed—just one look! 8–10 The longing is for God himself rather than simply the end of trouble. Divine favour will make the life of obedience possible. Your good Spirit (Ne. 9:20). 11–12, a case in point regarding imprecatory prayers: we are at ease with v 11 and could and do pray such a prayer, but in reality the ‘bland’ terms of v 11 include the ‘harsh’ requests of v 12, for this is the way the Lord deals with unjust accusations (Dt. 19:16–19). There are circumstances (like David’s) where there is no deliverance without destruction and to pray for the one is to pray for the other.

Psalm 144. And there was morning

While 144, 145 join 146–150 in a paean of praise to conclude the Psalter, they are linked more especially with 140–143, firstly by their Davidic titles and secondly by the links between 144 and 18 (e.g. 1, 18:34; 2, 18:2, 47; 5, 18:9; 6, 18:14). Just as 18 jubilantly marked the end of Saul’s persecution, so after the deepening darkness of 140–143, 144 heralds the long-awaited morning.

1–4 Past salvation. David, at last on his throne (2, peoples, Heb., ‘my people’), ascribes all to the Lord and cannot but marvel at such goodness to a mere mortal. Rock (1), changelessness (Dt. 32:4; 2 Sa. 22:47–49), refuge (Ps. 31:2, 3), sustenance (Ex. 17:6; Ps. 95:1). Trains (1). The Lord governs much more than the outcome of the battle. He looks after details, down to hands and fingers, the agency and skill of the individual soldier. The battle is his—but not without the dedicated soldiering of his people (Dt. 7:1, 2; Eph. 6:10ff). My loving God, (lit.) ‘my Unchanging Love’, the divine attribute made into a title. Fortress ... stronghold ... shield, the first implies encircling strength, the second inaccessible security, the third, protection at the moment of attack. The positive truth (1–2) that God alone is Saviour is safeguarded by the negative truth (3–4) that man can never deserve or contribute to his salvation.

5–11 Present deliverance. 18:9–17 uses this imagery (5–6) to depict what the Lord had already done in delivering David from Saul. Here the pleas are for the present. There are still enemies, still a need for deliverance. Praise is pledged but prayer must continue as long as the danger continues. Past mercies do not breed a ‘leave it to the Lord’ complacency but a ‘take it to the Lord’ urgency. Part (5), as a tent curtain is parted to allow the occupant to emerge (Is. 40:22). Down ... smoke (Ex. 19:18). Mighty waters (7), figurative of overwhelming threats (124:4). Foreigners (7) such as threatened David after his accession (2 Sa. 5:17ff; 10:1ff.) Right hands (8) as used in oath-taking (106:26).

12–15 Future prosperity. How well the psalm suits the situation of the newly enthroned David, reflecting his praise for newly given victory (1–5), his continuing involvement in threat (6–11) and now his concern for the future! The keynote is one of confidence (15) as he seeks blessing in the family, the economy and the nation. Well-nurtured plants (12), soundly rooted, strong-growing. Pillars carved ... (12), combining the imagery of strength, security of position and beauty, and also themselves giving stability to the ‘building’ of which they are part: the position of woman, wife and mother in a well-ordered society. Draw heavy loads (14a), i.e. the harvest-wagons. 14 describes in turn defensive and offensive war and the mourning for the dead which accompanies each. Blessed indeed are the people of whom this is true!

Psalm 145. An ABC of the glory of the Lord

This psalm is an alphabetical acrostic. In the Hebrew text the line beginning with the letter nun (n) does not appear. It is usually supposed that it has been lost and most would applaud the NIV in supplying the nun-line from other sources (13b, see NIV mg.). It is neither certain nor obvious that this should be done. It is far easier to see why some versions should supply the line than to see how it could ever have been lost. The distinctive character of Hebrew poetry is to subordinate form to meaning and we should at least consider that the poet deliberately omitted one letter in order to indicate that, not even with the help of revelation, can the human mind fully grasp the glories of God. The psalm is bracketed (1–2, 21) by affirmations of a purpose to extol or proclaim the Lord's glories. It opens with ceaseless personal praise but by v 21 it is clear that nothing less than the praise of every creature, 'all flesh', will suffice for such a God. The body of the psalm expresses this praise in sections with matching opening words: Great is the LORD (3–7), 'Gracious is the Lord' (8–16), 'Righteous is the Lord' (17–20). If the nun-line is introduced at 13 a further section emerges, 'Faithful is the Lord' (13b–16). But within this sectioning, the attributes of the Lord weave in and out of each other, for God is One and there is no conflict within his nature: his greatness includes his goodness and righteousness (3, 7). His graciousness includes his greatness (8, 11–13), his righteousness includes his gracious love (17–19).

3–7 His greatness is explored as limitless; awe-inspiring; good and reliable. Note the intertwining of general and individual testimony—to what the Lord is and has done. His works are mighty, i.e. in power, wonderful, supernatural in quality, awesome, striking fear into the witness.

8–16 The Lord's gracious benevolence is reviewed in itself (8–9), how his nature expresses itself in kindness; and in the testimony of his people (10–16). His specific goodness to his covenant people (8, Ex. 34:6–7) is accompanied by a universal goodness (9). For this all but in particular his saints owe him thanks (10). To them too belongs testimony to his might (11) and to the glory of his kingly rule (12), his fidelity to his word (13), his grace in support (14) and supply (15–16). 9 Compassion (see 103:13). 10 saints, those who are the object of the Lord's pledged love, who then love him back (1 Jn. 4:19) and extend the same love to each other (1 Jn. 4:11).

17–20 In the Lord, justice lives alongside kindness. There is an intrinsic morality in all he does (17), and there are personal moral qualifications leading to his holy enrichments (18–20). Righteous though he is, he is also near, next-of-kin, to his praying people. At the same time his righteousness also looks for their sincerity (18), their reverence (19), and their love (20). His righteousness is indeed a righteousness of grace—loving, fulfilling desires, saving, watching over, but it is also the righteousness of holiness.

Psalms 146–150. The Endless Hallelujah

The Book of Psalms began (1:1) with 'Blessed is the man'; it ends with the sustained, five fold equivalent of 'Blessed be the Lord'. In these psalms there is no reference to personal need, no petition, little that could be called historical allusion; all is focused on God; all is praise. But there is step-by-step progression in this praise. It begins with the individual (146:1), involves the community (147:1, 12), extends to heaven and earth (148:1, 7). If, however, the whole world is to offer praise for what the Lord has done for Israel (148:13–14) there is need for the praise of a people committed to mission (149) until everything that has breath praises the Lord (150:6).

Psalm 146. Individual praise

The opening call, like the concluding, is plural but at once it becomes singular (2): the Lord is worthy of the praise of the whole person (soul) and the whole life. 3–4 guard this truth negatively: all human objects of trust, whether outstanding or ordinary lack ability, continuance and reliability. 5–10 But in contrast to this there is not just 'God' but a God proved as One able to save (of Jacob), known through his self-revelation as Saviour (the LORD, Ex. 6:6, 7), and grasped in personal faith (his God). He is a God of total power and changelessness (6), all-embracing pity, socially (7) and personally, a God of moral exactness (8, 9) who is moved by the plight of the needy—and a God who is always there! Praise him indeed!

Psalm 147. Communal praise

The structure of the psalm is marked by the calls to praise in 1, 7, 12. Each section refers to the Lord as Creator: 1–6 note his detailed knowledge of the universe and brackets this with his concern for needy individuals among his people and the moral discernment which underlies all his action. 7–11 observe his bounty in providing for earthly life but insist that in the case of people, he acts on a moral basis, looking for a response of reverence and expectancy. 12–20 teach that his word is the controlling factor in the created order and is also the distinguishing mark of his people.

1 How pleasant or ‘for he is delightful. Praise is a lovely thing’. 2 explains how delightful he is: in his concern for the stability and circumstances of his people as a whole and for the inner and outer (3) needs of individuals. Exiles, ‘scattered ones’, not necessarily those ‘exiled’ to Babylon but any ‘scattering’; maybe even as broad a meaning as ‘harassed’. 4 (cf. Is. 40:26). In the OT the Creator not only originates everything but also maintains, controls and guides everything to its appointed destiny. Also, 5 the created order reveals his power and understanding. 6 Humble, those at the bottom of life’s heap. 8–9 The Creator also operates the processes of climatic change, of growth and provision. These are not automatic or self-determining but are manifestations of the agency and life of God in the created order.

10–11 Strength is, typically, prowess, military strength. Horse and legs may hint at cavalry and infantry, the things nations applaud as giving strength and status. But the biggest of the ‘big battalions’ to have on our side is the Lord himself and (11) he looks for the spiritual qualities of reverence and hope—confident, trustful waiting for his changeless love to act. 12–20 Just as 7–11 built on 1–6 by clarifying the conditions of divine blessing (cf. 10–11 with 6), so 12–20 build on 7–11: the reverence and patient trust of 11 need the revealed word (19–20) as their basis. This is a secure basis for life because (15–18) the word of God is the effective agency by which he runs the world, whether in severity (16–17) or mildness (18). 15–18 is bracketed by 13–14 and 19–20 and leaves us to draw our own conclusion: the Lord is all the security and enrichment (13–14) his people need; their possession of the word (19) makes them the unique people (20; Dt. 4:5–8).

Psalm 148. Creation praise

Beyond the praise of the individual (146) and the community (147) there is a praise due to the Creator from the whole creation: heaven (1) and earth (7), introduced by identical commands. Each call to praise is grounded in an explanation (5–6, 13–14), again with identical introductions. Heavenly praise is grounded in the fact of God the Creator who originated, maintains and controls all (5–6). Earthly praise is grounded in this intrinsic glory of the Lord and the unique position of his people (13–14). The order of praise in 1–6 is downward from the heavenly beings (2) to the physical constituents of the heavens (3–4); the order of praise in 7–14 is upward from the depths (7) and the inanimate order (8–9) to the animal (10) and human kingdoms (11–12). Things that in themselves can become objects of reverence (angels, 2; stars, 3) and things that often seem to contradict a divine ordering hand (8)—all alike and in all their manifestations exist solely for his praise. Indeed, the storm can only do his bidding (8).

4 Waters above, the sphere of the rain-clouds. 7–10 How does a mute creation ‘praise’? By being what it is, his subjects, fulfilling their allotted function, just as (6) the ‘praise’ of the stars is their subservience to fixed divine ordinances. 13 Earth is summoned not simply to ‘praise God’, i.e. to respond to some sense of a super-natural being, but to praise the name, i.e. respond to what he has revealed himself to be. How can the whole earth praise that of which they have no knowledge? The problem is solved by implication in 14 (see 149) where the existence of a special people is an additional ground for earth’s praise: his people are the way whereby the world may come to know the Lord. Alone. The word all occurs ten times (2, 3, 7, 9, 10, 11, 14), covering every created entity. There is only one alone! 14 Horn, symbol of strength: the Lord has made his people a ‘fixture’ on earth; people ... saints ... close. Circles of increasing intimacy: he chose his people out of all peoples; made them the objects of his changeless love; took them as his next-of-kin.

Psalm 149. Kingdom praise

Responding to the implication of 148:13, 149 explains that the Lord’s purpose in Israel is to bring the whole world under his sway—therefore into the blessedness Israel enjoys. Within 146–150 only 149:2 describes the Lord as King to whom (8) the kings submit. Thus the psalm takes the metaphor of kingship seriously, including the extension of the kingdom by force of arms. But (cf. Is. 45:14–25; 60:1–22; Eph. 6:10–17; Rev. 1:16) it is metaphor, just as (Is. 9:4, 5, 7) militarism is metaphorical of the extension of the kingdom of peace and as in Acts 15:14–18, Amos’s picture of Gentile subservience to David is metaphorical of the spreading gospel. The prologue (1) leads to joy in a saving King (2–4); joy in world-dominion (the restfulness and conquests of a praising people) their objectives; and finally the epilogue (5–9).

1–2 Saints, security in the Lord’s love (cf. 5, 9); Israel, chosen (Is. 41:8) son (Ex. 4:22), redeemed (Ex. 6:6–7); Zion, constituted under David. 4 The ground of praise: divine delight, the Lord’s glad acceptance of his people; salvation, the people’s experience of the ‘opposite of adversity’, divine, human or circumstantial. Humble, downtrodden without resource to deliver themselves. 5–6 The contrast between bed and sword is intentional. The Davidic people were not called to military conquest. Bed may suggest a couch at the messianic banquet (Is. 25:6–10); and sword, a victory already in principle accomplished. But for them as for us the ‘conquests’ are spiritual (2 Cor. 10:5) and the victory that of Calvary (Rev. 12:11). 7 Vengeance, the dark side of the day of salvation (Is. 61:2; 63:4; Phil. 1:28; 2 Thes. 1:7–10; Rev. 14:14–19; 20:15). 8 (Cf. Is. 45:14–25). A vivid portrayal, within the metaphor of King/Kingdom, of the fact that to accept the message is to submit to the messenger (2 Cor. 8:5). 9 Sentence written, i.e. in God’s book, judgment in accordance with the record.

Psalm 150. All praise!

The sequence of psalms has brought the world (149:5–9) into submission (Is. 45:23; Phil. 2:11) and the anthem of the redeemed is about to commence (Rev. 5:8–14; 7:9–10).

1–2 Praise appropriate to God. From the height of his heavenly sanctuary down to the heavens (‘the expanse of/which displays his strength’), down to his acts of power (dominating strength) seen on earth, the Lord displays surpassing greatness, greatness exceeding that of any and every claimant. Sanctuary could be translated ‘his holiness’ but the meaning would be the same. The idea is defined by the earthly house the Lord commanded: the place where the Holy One dwells and where his people approach him through atoning sacrifice. This is the highest point of the greatness of the Lord. His acts of power are not defined but, since his mighty heavens instance the work and fact of creation, his acts will be what he has done, for his people, in redemption, providential care and discipline.

3–6 Praise proportionate to humanity. By every means (3–5), from every person (6), a great shout worthy to act as a climax to the joyousness of OT religion and to be a foretaste of that ‘Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit’ which will fill the courts of heaven and last to all eternity.

PROVERBS

Introduction

Proverbs offers theoretical and practical teaching about life, in two main forms. Chs. 1–9 are mostly encouragement to a moral life (see e.g. 1:8–19). These sermons are in verse, but poetic form matters less than getting the message across, and much of the verse is doggerel. The chapters have two main emphases, on applying oneself to the teaching of the wise and on avoiding adulterous relations with women. The two themes are related: sexual unfaithfulness is the supreme folly.

With ch. 10 the atmosphere changes. The form becomes mostly one-verse sayings, linked in one way or another, but each saying complete in itself. The themes broaden out and are quite varied. Among the recurrent topics, as well as wisdom and sexual relationships, are the nature of righteousness, the use of words, relationships in the community, work, wealth and kingship (17:1–5 is a good example).

The last third of the book (22:17–31:31) comprises five further collections of material, mixed in content and also mixed in form. These bring together many more one-verse sayings, some longer units, and one final poem of twenty-two verses.

Both sermons and sayings show the usual features of poetry in the Prophets or other books—indeed they tend to be more regular than poetry elsewhere in the OT. Generally, each verse comprises a unit of thought if not an actual sentence, and consists of two half-lines which complement, complete or contrast with each other. Often their meaning is interwoven and interdependent. Thus 10:1 implies that a wise son is a joy to both father and mother, a foolish son a grief to both. Commonly the balancing half-lines each have only three words, and thus three stresses; Hebrew frequently compounds words but the English reader can often perceive which are the important words in each line around which the little words cluster, and thus see where the three stresses are. 1:2–4 is an example of all these features.

The material in Proverbs may reflect three social backgrounds: the life of the family, the court college and the theological school. First, the teachers often speak as father and mother to the hearers as their children. While this way of speaking may be partly metaphorical, behind it is the implication that the home is the natural place for teaching and learning about life, wisdom and the way of righteousness (cf. 22:6). The first likely background of the material in Proverbs is the life of the family and the clan.

Secondly, in other Middle Eastern cultures wisdom teaching was collected under royal patronage, as resources for the training of the nobility for their work at court. The content of Proverbs does not point mainly in this direction; it relates to the life of people in general. But the references to Solomon and other kings in the headings to the collections, as well as the references to kingship and national affairs in some sayings, suggest that the court college where people were trained for the king's service may have been one context in which the material was used and collected.

Thirdly, the material at times reflects an interest in theological questions such as creation and revelation (see 3:19–20; 8:22–31; 30:2–6) as well as in more down-to-earth questions about practical life. The background of this material may have been discussions in schools where theologians or interpreters of the Scriptures or scribes were trained, the 'houses of instruction' to which Sirach invites people who wish to understand the ways of God (Ecclus. 51:23).

We know little regarding the authorship or actual date of the material in Proverbs. The oldest material is found among that which could naturally be used in family life as we saw above. This may have originated long before Solomon's day and before Israel existed in Palestine, though it would carry on developing and accumulating as family life continued. Teaching suggesting the life of the court presumably belongs in the centuries from David to the exile. (On Solomon's relationship to it, see the commentary on 1:1 below.) The more theologically reflective material may come from the Second Temple period; it provides the final literary background (chs. 1–9 and 30–31) for our reading of the bulk of the book with its mainly down-to-earth concerns.

Proverbs takes an experiential, almost scientific approach to life. It looks at life itself in order to discuss directly how to see life (big questions about its meaning and down-to-earth questions about our understanding of topics such as friendship, marriage and the family) and how to live life on the basis of that understanding. It understands wisdom as thinking and living in accordance with how things actually are. Folly is a way of thinking and living that ignores how things actually are.

Attempting to formulate and collect wisdom teaching assumes that we are not limited to learning from our own experience; we also learn from that of others. From their own and from other people's experience Israel's wise teachers offer us insights which may help us to make sense of experience we have had, and may help us to do the wise thing in the future.

Theologically considered, Proverbs starts from God's general revelation, available to people because they are made in God's image and live in God's world. Precisely because it knows that God is real, that people are made in God's image and that they live in God's world, it also assumes that morality and faith are part of life itself as people experience it.

Christians are continually allowing themselves to be influenced by human wisdom and experience. Proverbs encourages that. It also offers us some guidance on how and how not to go about it. It assumes that the real world includes matters of faith and moral conviction, and sets our experience in the narrow sense against the background of these; it puts learning, religion and morals together. It would insist that principles of education, counselling and business, for instance, are formed in conjunction with religious and moral considerations, not independently of them. It thus says both a 'yes' and a 'no', or a 'yes but', to what we learn from the world.

Commentary

1:1–7 Introduction

These verses are the book's own introduction to its nature and purpose. The contents of the book as a whole can be described as proverbs, which have the two main quite different forms noted in the introduction. This in itself shows that proverb is a word of broader and more varied application than the English word 'proverb'. To us a proverb is a means of comparison. The Bible, however, uses the word more broadly. In different passages it can refer to a prophetic oracle (Nu. 23:7), an object lesson (Dt. 28:37), a saying (1 Sa. 10:12), a poetic discourse (Jb. 27:1), and other forms of speech. It thus suggests something more intense, vigorous and provocative than a straightforward saying.

V 6 describes the book's contents as parables and as sayings and riddles of the wise (GNB 'the hidden meaning of proverbs and the problems that wise men raise'). That draws attention to two further features of the teaching of Proverbs. It is often cast in puzzling form rather than told straight; this makes the listener think. It also reflects the fact that the book often handles deep questions.

The heading The proverbs of Solomon introduces the whole book, but it does not indicate that Solomon was the author of all the material in it (see 24:23; 25:1; 30:1; 31:1). Rather, it makes a statement regarding the whole book's authority as a collection of truly Solomonic wisdom. For Solomon is the great biblical embodiment of wisdom (see 1 Ki. 3–4). What it contains is the kind of wisdom he taught and embodied. We do not know whether particular parts of the book were his work. We actually know nothing of when different parts of the book were written (beyond that it was between 2000 and 200 BC!) but their meaning does not rely on information of this kind. They concern everyday human questions, for all time.

In v 1 Solomon is described as son of David, king of Israel (cf. Ec. 1:1). Ecclesiastes goes on to make Solomon its model, for as king he would have been in a unique position to make the statements in Ec. 1:12–2:11. In a parallel way the sermons in Pr. 1–9 may have Solomon as their implicit model; they express the kind of principles a king such as Solomon should have been wise enough to live by. There is an irony there!

The introduction goes on to state the book's purpose, and in doing so it offers us a glossary of wisdom's technical terms.

In v 2, wisdom itself means first the practical know-how or cleverness which achieves things (see 30:24–28), though it comes to be a more abstract discipline concerned with deep theological questions (see 8:22–31). Discipline or 'instruction' (the same word in v 8) reminds us that wisdom is not acquired cheaply or painlessly; it involves submission (cf. 3:11; 6:23; 13:1, 24). Thus 'rebuke' or 'reproof' (1:23, 25, 30) often accompanies discipline or 'instruction' (see 3:11; 5:12; 6:23; 10:17). Understanding words of insight implies the ability to analyse, the discernment to see behind things or to read between the lines, and the discrimination to make decisions in the light of that (cf. v 6).

Wisdom's link with a prudent life (3) again shows its practical concern; the word suggests having good sense. Prudence in v 4 is a different word, meaning 'shrewdness' (REB), the capacity to get people to do what you want and not to be taken in yourself (see 22:3; also Gn. 3:1 in the bad sense). Knowledge can refer to knowing facts and knowing people, but it overlaps with acknowledgment and thus with commitment—it links theory and practice (see 1:22, 29; 3:6). 'Knowledge of God' (2:5) is thus more closely linked to obedience to God than to having a personal experience of God. Discretion suggests the resourcefulness of the practical person who knows how to get things done and is not put off by a problem; in the bad sense it denotes scheming (12:2).

In v 5, learning comes from the verb 'to take' and hints at the effort involved in grasping something and at the receptiveness required by wisdom. The same word is translated 'persuasive words' in a striking context in 7:21. Guidance comes from the word for ropes and suggests skill in steering your way through life with its storms (see 24:6).

The book's introduction also specifies its target audiences. The simple (4) are the uninstructed young who are in danger of being naive, gullible, easily led—and happy the way they are (see v 10—'entice' is a related verb, and suggests leading astray the gullible; also 1:22, 32; 14:15). But Proverbs' teaching is not something that the wise and discerning grow out of (5). The word for discerning is related to the expressions for understanding words of insight in v 2 (see comment on them). The wise and discerning know that most people usually have more need to act on old truths than to discover new ones.

In contrast, people become fools (7) when they are unwilling to learn or are complacent in their confidence that everything will turn out all right, or when they turn their back on the old basic truths (see 1:32; 12:15; 17:12; 27:3, 22).

A further related target appears in v 22: 'mockers'. The word suggests people who always have their mouth rather than their ears open; they know everything already and have no need to listen to anyone. They are arrogant, unteachable and unliked (cf. 9:7–8; 13:1; 15:12; 21:24).

Finally, the introduction reveals the company that wisdom keeps, making clear that learning and pragmatic decision-making do not operate on their own. First, they go together with morals (3b). What is right and just and fair is the characteristic concern of the prophets. All three come again in 2:9 and in 8:6, 20 (NIV right, righteousness, justice).

Secondly, they go together with faith (7; cf. 9:10 at the other end of the collection of sermons and 31:30 at the other end of the book). The fear of the LORD suggests reverence and awe which issue in obedience (cf. v 29, with the comment on knowledge above); it does not imply being afraid of God. The LORD is Yahweh, the God specially revealed to Israel. Proverbs does not refer to the specifics of Israelite faith but in using the distinctive Israelite name of God it implies that this is the faith it means. Its common-sense wisdom is common sense which takes this faith as its framework. The beginning of knowledge means its ‘foundation’ (REB), because you never cease to need it. Proverbs assumes that you cannot make sense of the world or live a full and successful life unless you see God behind it and involved in it, and seek understanding of it from God with reverence and humility.

1:8–9:18: Advice on wisdom

1:8–19 Warning to avoid becoming involved with gangs of thugs

This first piece of advice is typical. It begins with a challenge to attentiveness (8), which assumes that mother and father together lead the family in its relationship with life and with God (cf. 6:20; 10:1). The challenge has a promise attached to it (9), adding to the ones in vs 2–7 the promise that wisdom is not only beneficial but attractive. Instruction is a wisdom word (see on 1:1–7), but teaching is the word ‘torah’ (lit. ‘direction’), which suggests that the style and content of the Wisdom books and those of the Torah are coming together (cf. ‘commands’ next to ‘wisdom’ in 2:1–2). This is more clear in ch. 28.

It then goes on to its main challenge regarding a particular aspect of behaviour: v 10 summarizes what may happen and how one is to respond, vs 11–14 and 15 amplify the two parts of this. The enticement appeals to the young man’s instinct for thrills, violence, money, power and comradeship.

Vs 16–19 attach reasons to the advice. Reasoning is prominent in this section: it teaches in an authoritative but not in an authoritarian way. Thuggery is stupid. The thugs are after blood (11) but it is their own blood they are hastening to shed (18). Their stupidity is such that they cannot see disaster when it is staring them in the face (17). V 16 probably suggests the same idea. The word for sin is translated ‘harm’ in v 33 and elsewhere, which makes better sense here too: they are keen to cause harm—to themselves; swift to shed blood—their own. They have mocked their victims’ naivety; now the teacher mocks theirs.

Note. 12 The grave (Sheol) and the pit: cf. 27:20; 30:15–16; Ps. 49; Ec. 9: Is. 5:14. When people die, physically the family tomb swallows them whole; Sheol is a non-physical equivalent to the tomb, the destiny of the non-physical side of the person. But the image of Sheol with its greedy mouth also takes up the way the myths of Israel’s neighbours picture the god Death swallowing people up enthusiastically. The NIV renders ‘Sheol’ as ‘the grave’, ‘death’, or ‘Death’.

1:20–33 Wisdom calls the simple, the fools and the self-confident to pay attention if they are to avoid disaster

Vs 20–21 personify wisdom as a woman prophet preaching in the places where people gather in the city, in a way to which Israel would be accustomed. Vs 22–33 record what she was saying, taking further the image of a prophet preaching, being ignored (cf. Is. 65), then being unavailable when people want to consult her (see vs 23–24, 28). The image of the prophet helps to convey the urgency of wisdom’s challenge to people who are in a critical situation. She speaks as if it is too late, as prophets often do in order to jolt people into a response before it really is too late.

The beginning (22) and the end (32–33) summarize her lament, her warning and her promise. Love and hate (22) are here shown to be commitments of the will as well as emotions, as is regularly the case in Proverbs and elsewhere in Scripture.

Vs 23–25 then amplify the lament: people failed to respond and missed out on wisdom’s overflowing provision. They were unwilling to listen to rebuke and advice—the negative and the positive complement each other. Vs 26–28 in turn amplify the warning with which a prophet characteristically follows up her reproof: people are threatened by sudden terror and overwhelmed by distress. The verses exaggerate to make this point in an attempt to jolt people to their senses.

Vs 29–30 and 31 repeat the pattern of vs 23–25 and 26–28. They lament people’s deliberate refusal to commit themselves to what is right and to use their human freedom to bow down in obedience to God (29; cf. vs 22, 32 for the stress on responsibility and choice). They warn how such human decisions have their ‘natural’ outworking comparable to the sense of surfeit that overcomes us when we eat too much (31).

The image of wisdom as a prophet helps to make the point that wisdom speaks for God and from God (see further ch. 8). Her teaching is derived from experience but it is not mere human opinion. God is involved in the human activity whereby people seek to discern the truth which life itself can teach them. Wisdom herself teaches that the chief hindrance to growing in insight is a moral one, an unwillingness to learn uncomfortable truths. She also teaches that once you are morally open to living by wisdom’s insights, they will open the way to a successful and protected life. Real security lies here: contrast complacency with true safety and ease (32–33). Alternatively disaster will come, not merely because God sends it but because that is the ‘natural’ outworking of foolish deeds (31–32). These are the characteristic promises of Proverbs; the fact that they do not always work out is the starting point of Job and Ecclesiastes.

2:1–22 Promises concerning the moral benefits which attentiveness to wisdom brings

Following on from the parent-like exhortation of 1:8–19 and the prophet-like warning of 1:20–33, this section takes yet another form, that of observation and promise. It contains no actual imperatives: as 1:20–33 is a matter of prophetic warning, this is a matter of if-clauses and promises. Thus the many promises are themselves a veiled challenge. The image of the ‘path’ runs through the chapter.

The challenge to attentiveness in vs 1–4 takes a more subtle ‘if’ form than the direct challenge of 1:8. But it is still a matter of commands, as in the Torah (see on 1:8), and of an utterly serious quest, involving four forms of exertion. It involves training the memory (1). It involves stretching the mind (2; on heart see on 4:21). It requires strong motivation (3), a quest as serious as wisdom’s own (cf. 1:20–21). It requires energetic effort, as if you were digging for gold (4): the talk of treasure sought and kept safe (cf. v 1) already hints at the promise attached to the object of the search. Acquiring insight is in one sense a straightforward matter, but it requires much effort.

Like 1:9, vs 5–11 then expound the promise attached to attentiveness. The serious quest for insight reaches its goal when people find God and submit themselves to him as the one with the key to this treasure store. Gaining insight requires much effort (1–4), but when you find it you receive it as a gift! To find God is then to find the key to the protected life, because the key to the protected life is also insight. This is so because of the moral aspect to true insight; insight expresses itself in an upright life, and to find God is to find one whose insight is upright.

Vs 5–8 are further explained in the parallel verses 9–11: the Then and For of vs 9 and 10 take up the ones in vs 5 and 6, and the promise in v 11 parallels that of vs 7–8. The would-be wise pupils want to know how to live, and they are promised they will find it (9).

In vs 12–22, the promise of vs 5–11 is first applied to the way of uprightness in general—or rather to the straight way, for the image of wrongdoing as crookedness runs through vs 12–15. Wisdom is your protection from the liars of vs 12–15 (close relatives of the thugs of 1:10–19) who call black white and white black so audaciously that it becomes plausible.

Vs 16–19 spotlight unfaithful women as well as these wicked men. The verses may simply concern adultery in the straightforward sense; Proverbs certainly emphasizes marital faithfulness. But the adulteress or wayward wife is such a major concern of chs. 1–9 (see ch. 5; 6:20–7:27; also 22:14; 23:26–28; 29:3) that there seems likely to be more to it than that. Perhaps marital unfaithfulness is a parable of unfaithfulness to God, as is often the case in the OT; here, the concern will be faithfulness to God as expressed in faithfulness to wisdom. The words are not, however, the ordinary ones for immoral women; they mean ‘alien woman’ and ‘stranger’ (JB). This may suggest that the women are people committed to foreign gods and foreign wisdom. They will beguile those who get involved with them into acknowledging these themselves—lead them astray religiously as well as sexually. The urging to take wisdom seriously (which involves reverence for Yahweh) and to resist the temptations of other women (who will lead you into involvement with other gods) are then two sides of a coin. This interpretation makes good sense of some of the later ‘adulteress’ passages, though here v 17 most naturally suggests an Israelite woman who has abandoned the husband to whom she made her vows before the God of Israel.

Like 1:10–19 the passage describes wrongdoing in a way which makes its moral wrongness clear (12–17), but its actual warnings stress that the way of wrongdoing leads to personal calamity (18–22). Sexual sin is wrong, but here even more it is stupid. The pressures of our own world glamorize sexual self-expression in the name of love; it is commonly only afterwards that people discover that the pain and loss are hardly worth the pleasure. Proverbs sees adultery as leading to the same destiny as thuggery: cf. 1:16–19 and the description of Sheol in 1:12.

3:1–12 Recommendation regarding attitudes to God

Like 1:8–19 this section comprises a standard introduction urging attentiveness because of the benefits it brings (1–2); then a series of direct recommendations on a particular theme, with their own promises attached (3–12).

In contrast to 1:8 and 2:1 (see comment on 1:8 and 2:1), v 1 uses only the vocabulary of the Torah (teaching and commands). This prepares us for the fact that the specific advice of vs 3–12 is more directly religious than those of other sections; specific links with Deuteronomy are noted below. Indeed, vs 3–12 are concerned with warnings about wisdom rather than praise of it: interest in wisdom gets out of hand if it loses touch with God. But first, in v 2 the introduction makes its own promise regarding the value of its teaching. The prosperity it speaks of is shalom, the wide-ranging biblical concept of peace, happiness, wholeness and fulness in this life (cf. v 17).

Five specific attitudes are then urged on us. First, we are to be steadfast in our commitment (3–4; cf. Dt. 6:8; 11:18). Love and faithfulness are a key OT word pair suggesting the making and keeping of commitments. Such characteristics belong to God, and constitute aims for the human response to God and to other people (e.g. 14:22; 16:6; 20:28; Pss. 25:10; 40:10–11).

Secondly, we are to be dependent in our thinking (5–6). Trust and lean both suggest the physical experience of supporting yourself on something or someone in total and helpless reliance and commitment.

Thirdly, we are to be humble in our obedience (7–8). Wise in your own eyes denotes not merely proud of your own wisdom but self-sufficient in it and therefore not feeling the need to refer things to God (no doubt a besetting temptation for people committed to finding wisdom).

Fourthly, we are to be lavishly generous in our giving (9–10; cf. Dt. 26).

Fifthly, we are to be submissive in our experience of affliction (11–12; cf. Dt. 8:5).

We can be those things because they will bring us favour (4), direction (6), health (8), and prosperity (10), and because the one to whom we submit in these varying ways is our loving Father (12). On questions these promises may raise, see on 10:1–11:11.

3:13–20 The blessing of wisdom

Scripture is consistent in reminding us that God is involved with us in the blessings of a full life in the world. It also gets the message across to us in an adventurous variety of ways (cf. 1 Cor. 9:22). There are many ways to preach a sermon! Here (14–18) we are introduced to wisdom personified as a woman. She will reappear many times, often embodied in the charm of a girl or the maturity of a married woman. Her opposite number, folly, is similarly embodied in the silliness of an adolescent or the irresponsibility of a disillusioned married woman (see 4:1–9; 7:1–27; 8:1–36; 9:1–18). We will refer to them as Ms Wisdom and Ms Folly.

A tree of life (18; cf. 11:30; 13:12; 15:4) is in Proverbs a metaphor parallel to ‘fountain of life’ (e.g. 10:11; 13:14), to describe something life-giving. It does not have the theological overtones of Gn. 2–3. Earlier references to life and death seem to have the ordinary down-to-earth meaning (e.g. 1:18–19; 2:18–19), but by ‘life’ the OT often means fullness of life (vitality, health, blessing, prosperity, fulfilment) and by ‘death’ the absence of those. References in Proverbs have to be considered in their context to see whether these meanings are present (see e.g. 3:22; 4:4, 13, 22–23).

Vs 19–20 then add an unexpected saying of great significance. The ultimate reason for taking wisdom seriously is the fact that God did so when creating the world. (The LORD is in a very emphatic position at the beginning of the sentence.) Ch. 8 will develop both parts of this idea.

3:21–35 A call to sound judgment and neighbourliness

The elements in this section are less closely linked than those in others and they may be of independent origin, but as it stands the sermon does follow the familiar structure. It opens by urging very careful attentiveness to wisdom (21), to which a series of promises is attached: life (see on v 18), distinction, security, calmness, confidence, all based on divine protection (22–26).

There follows advice regarding specific aspects of behaviour, this time focusing on neighbourliness (27–31). Further promises of being in God’s confidence, experiencing God’s blessing on one’s home, being shown God’s grace, and finding honour in the eyes of the community, are attached to those (vs 32–35 are a series of notable opposites). The assumption is that being sensible and being neighbourly actually go together—it is not really shrewd (21) to be calculating at someone else's expense (27), because of the way God makes the world work (32–35).

4:1–9 A call to seek wisdom and promises regarding her gifts

This passage urging us to pay attention to wisdom is like 3:13–20 in seeing wisdom as a person, but it is like other passages in giving directions backed up by promises of wisdom's benefits. The reader is directed to attentiveness, application, responsiveness, commitment, consistency, sacrifice and enthusiasm (note the repeated get). The motivation promises life, protection and honour.

The stress on family-style teaching is developed here (1–4). Whereas the attitude of parents can swing between being too authoritarian and failure to give guidance at all, Proverbs urges a third way, which offers firm teaching but is always under God (though in that there is a danger of manipulating people!).

The attractive Ms Wisdom (8–9) provides a positive counterpart to the seductive Ms Folly embodied in the 'wayward woman' of e.g. 2:16–19. The shrewd woman who can use her femininity to achieve her aims can act as wise counsellor to her husband and protect him from folly. No price is too high to pay for the right woman, metaphorically as literally (7).

4:10–19 A call to avoid the way of the wicked

Again a call to pay attention leads into associated promises of life and stability (10–13). That introduces a warning to avoid the ways of people who eat, drink and sleep wickedness and violence (14–17), with its associated promise of light and warning of darkness (18–19).

4:20–27 A call to guard the mind and the life

Once more a call to close attentiveness leads into the promise of life and health (20–22). That introduces advice regarding the guarding of the whole person: mind, speech, look and walk (23–27). The inner person has to be right, because that is the source of all else; but outward behaviour is not just left to work itself out from that. We also have to pay attention to speaking straight, looking straight, and walking straight.

5:1–23 A call to marital faithfulness

The chapter's opening challenge to attentiveness with its usual promise is brisker than usual (1–2). The writer is following systematically one theme and presses quickly on to his real concern with the adulteress who is to be resisted and the wife who is to be rejoiced in (3–20) (see also on 2:16–19). It is summarized in vs 19–20, which set side-by-side alternative forms of captivity; as vs 15–18 lead towards v 19, vs 3–14 provide the grounds for v 20.

It closes with a reminder of the general moral principle of wisdom teaching, that God judges (21), but that judgment comes through events having their 'natural' outworking (22). The warning has a sting in the tail, obscured by the NIV. Led astray (23) is the verb translated captivated in vs 19 and 20: to be wrapped up in the love of another woman rather than in that of your wife is to be wrapped in the shroud of folly (REB).

Thus on the one hand, the love of another woman may be a very attractive proposition (3), but an affair is certain to end with terrible pain (4–5: the implication may be that her love does not last, but even if it does, there will be pain). You must allow for her refusing to face this fact

(6). It is therefore necessary to keep well away rather than taking risks in getting involved (7–8: see Mt. 5:28). Otherwise the consequences will be financial loss, hurt, regret, loneliness and shame (9–14).

There is an alternative: learn (as a recent book puts it) ‘how to make love to the same person for the whole of your life’. Make her the delight of your eyes, your body and your whole being (15–19).

The advice of Proverbs is breathtakingly applicable to a culture in which adultery is common among Christians, who reason themselves (as the teacher here envisages) into believing that in their case it is the best thing. The only problem the advice of Proverbs may seem to raise is that it is expressed solely from a man’s viewpoint. On the one hand, the woman who is being described here should not be totally to blame: perhaps she is desperately unhappy in her marriage and is understandably desperate to escape it. That is the more reason to be wary of her longings. On the other hand, men can also be desperately unhappy in their marriages and keen to escape them, and women have to be wary of the male equivalent to the female pressures being described here.

6:1–19 Two calls to action rather than delay, and two comments on the person who stirs up trouble

In vs 1–5 the person seems to have stood surety with a neighbour on behalf of another person who has then defaulted. The word for another, indeed, usually means a ‘stranger’ (5:10, 17; 20:16; 27:13 in a context like this; cf. RSV here), so it may be that the person has gone surety for a stranger who has then disappeared. Either way it is stupid just to hope the situation will somehow solve itself. You have to take urgent action to get out of the mess, even if it is humiliating, taking the initiative in casting yourself on your neighbour’s mercy. (See 11:15; 17:18; 22:26–27 on how not to get into this mess, and 20:16; 27:13 on how to take the initiative if you are the neighbour.) While one ought to be merciful to a member of one’s family or even of one’s local community in need, this is no excuse for being reckless and risking one’s own financial viability—and thus ultimately one’s personal freedom.

In vs 6–11 the idle person (see on 24:30–34) is scornfully, and perhaps not hopefully, urged to learn wisdom from the ant (see 30:24–28 for another lesson from the animal world).

The person who stirs up dissension is the concern of vs 12–15 and 16–19. The description in vs 12–14 comes to its climax with this phrase. In a numerical saying like vs 16–19 all seven items can be equally important, and all are of course seriously meant, but after vs 12–15 the real point in vs 16–19 must lie with the last one (cf. 30:18–19, 29–31). The two observations are that the person will pay for it (15) and that God especially loathes this behaviour (16). With the use of eyes, tongue, mind and feet here, contrast the advice in 4:23–27.

6:20–35 A call to avoid adultery because it costs so much

We return to the familiar form of the sermon, with its opening call to attentiveness (20–21) and associated promises (22–23). These pass imperceptibly into urging to avoid adultery, by being wary of enticing words and of attractive looks (24–25; see on 2:16–19; 5). There follows a long account of the reasons for that, which occupies the bulk of this section (26–35). It focuses on the financial cost and the public shame, not to say the wrath of the offended husband, all of which make an affair simply not worth it.

The point is made by means of three comparisons. First, you can compare having an affair with going to see a prostitute—rather an insult to someone with a romantic view of their affair

(26). It may be that the woman is being called a whore (though she is not literally that) or it may be that she is being unfavourably compared with a whore (!), since she costs much more; everything, in fact. Secondly, having an affair is like playing with fire; you will not escape getting burned (27–29). The verses play on the fact that in Hebrew fire and wife are very similar. Thirdly, having an affair is like theft (30–35): taking something that belongs to someone else because you are starving. With ordinary theft you pay the penalty; all the more with stealing someone's wife. The 'property' view of marriage is taken for granted here, because that was how people thought of the matter, though the strength of the husband's reaction perhaps implies the feeling that adultery involves more than interference with his property.

7:1–27 A call to resist any temptation to have an affair

The final section on sexual behaviour begins with the usual call to attentiveness (1–4), though the general reward for this is only mentioned in passing (2a). The sermon presses on to its particular topic, the possibility of protection from the wayward wife (5; see also on 2:16–19; 5; 6:20–35). The reason for avoiding her is also less prominent than usual (see vs 22–23, 26–27), though what it does say in warning of the consequences that will follow from ignoring the teacher makes a telling contrast to that brief promise of 'life' in v 2 (see on 3:10).

The author is not ashamed to advise the kind of rote learning which is now unfashionable. But this is not merely rote learning: it reaches the inner being, the mind. The fact that God has to write things on the mind (Je. 31:33) does not take away our responsibility to do this—indeed, it makes it possible for us to fulfil the responsibility (cf. also Ezk. 18:31). This inner attitude is expressed in another way in v 4: to call someone your sister is effectively to ask them to marry you (see e.g. Song 4:9–12), so we are being invited to give Ms Wisdom a position which is incompatible with the attitude the simple young man takes to the woman in the story.

The story focuses on her method of seduction, described in a vivid word-picture (6–21). The teacher's observation from behind lace curtains (6–7) illustrates how wisdom proceeds by learning lessons from observation and experience, other people's as well as one's own. There are several ways to read the story. Perhaps the woman is simply someone who engages in prostitution when she has opportunity through her husband being away, though vs 10–12 may only mean she is dressed in a provocative way and inclined to sexual adventure. Perhaps she is the devotee of an alien religion who needs a man to make love to as part of her religious obligation, as vs 14–18 might imply (for v 14 in particular, cf. Lv. 7:15–16). Or perhaps the two of them are already in love; she has been looking out for him in particular, and he has been walking her way in the hope that her husband may be away. The teacher will not mind which of these corresponds to the facts of the story. That is not the point. Whatever type of affair it is, it is stupid. What her charm makes the young man think is the way of love is the way of death. As we have noted before, the seduction scene also needs to be viewed from a woman's angle so that she may resist a married man's fatal charm.

8:1–36 Wisdom's offer of truth and life

Once more Ms Wisdom herself takes her stand in public (1–3). She draws attention to herself like the wayward woman, but makes a quite different offer. Her words are more like the encouraging invitation of Is. 55 than the standard confrontational rebuke of a pre-exilic prophet (cf. 1:20–33); the sermon takes yet another form in an effort to get the point over.

Ms Wisdom herself speaks in vs 4–36, urging attentiveness on three grounds. The first is the truth and justice of what she says (4–11). Here, the link between wisdom and morals stated in 1:1–7 is worked out more systematically: note the heaping up of terms for right and wrong alongside the words for sense and folly. It is that which makes the teaching so valuable (10–11). At the same time everything she says contrasts with the false promises of lying men and unfaithful women.

The second ground for attentiveness is the practical value of what she says (12–21). It is she who makes possible the exercise of power and the production of wealth. Here the other link in 1:1–7, between wisdom and religion, is also noted (13), though the focus remains on the connection between wisdom and right and wrong. It is assumed that power is exercised in a right way (see vs 13, 15) and that wealth is the gift of one who is concerned for righteousness and justice (18–21). Ms Wisdom is the king’s key adviser. Here more than anywhere we see what wisdom was supposed to be, and sometimes was, for a king like Solomon.

The third ground takes the argument onto a different plane: Ms Wisdom was involved with God in the very creation of the world (22–31). What more impressive argument for heeding her could be imagined? Ms Wisdom’s door is the one to wait at (32–36). It is not an over-solemn business, however (30–31).

So God had wisdom from the beginning, before creating the world (22–26). God used wisdom—mind, intelligence, common sense—in undertaking the creation (27–31). The more we know of creation, the more impressive we find wisdom to be.

The image of wisdom as a person may have been used literally in religions which featured many gods, whose terms Proverbs then uses in a ‘demythologized’ sense. Its language would also encourage Israelites not to worship a goddess alongside Yahweh (cf. Je. 44:17) : the real (but metaphorical) goddess to revere is wisdom. In Christian times, by taking the personification literally and thinking of wisdom as an actual person separate from God, people gained a way of understanding Christ’s relationship to God. It underlies Jn. 1:1–4 and Col. 1:15–17.

The word for possess (12) usually means ‘acquire’ in Proverbs (e.g. 1:5; 4:5, 7), and Ms Wisdom’s words here pick up that usage. Taking the personification of wisdom literally (see above) led people to prefer the translation brought forth in v 22 (see NIV mg.), which is more appropriate to Christ because he was brought forth as a person rather than acquired as an object. A word meaning ‘brought forth’ certainly comes in v 24. That contrasted with the Greek translation of the OT, which had taken it to mean ‘created’. In the controversies over the person of Christ, this played into the hands of the Arians who could use it as evidence for their view that Christ was a created being.

In v 30, the word translated craftsman comes only here in the OT. ‘Little child’ (RSV mg.) or ‘darling’ (NEB) fits the context of vs 30–31 better, where the emphasis is on the joyful play of creation rather than the hard work involved in it. If it is right, vs 22–36 may take Ms Wisdom from birth via the play of girlhood to the stature of adulthood.

9:1–18 The identical invitations of Ms Wisdom and Ms Folly

The final sermon has a nicely balanced structure: an invitation from Ms Wisdom, an invitation from Ms Folly which apes her words, and between them a collection of observations, all of which restate implications of the sermons as a whole.

Ms Wisdom’s final invitation (1–6) again recalls Is. 55. Here she abandons the role of prophet and takes up that of host, so that her servants, not she herself, do the calling. Proverbs’ portrait of wisdom has taken many forms: ‘she is as awesome as a goddess, as playful as a small child, as comfortable as a mother's arms, as challenging as a prophet, as satisfying as a table laden with food, as mysterious as a lover hidden among the lilies' (Camp).

It is no self-denying offer she makes: the food is rich, the wine is good (mixed with spices), and the setting splendid (1; the significance of the seven pillars is a matter of guesswork). But there is perhaps an irony in vs 4–6, that people who lack judgment are bound to spurn her invitation.

The interlude (7–12) therefore begins on a rather resigned note. Experience suggests that the teacher will get nowhere with many people, and it is advisable (wise!) to be realistic about this (7–8). But a teacher does have happier experiences (9). That comment recalls the introduction to the sermons (see 1:5, also 1:3 for the introduction of moral questions). It also leads into a restatement of the motto text (10, cf. 1:7), with Ms Wisdom's usual promise attached to it (11), and the familiar stress on personal responsibility (12).

The interlude gives Ms Folly time to prepare her feeble imitation of Ms Wisdom's supper. As Ms Wisdom is modelled on a prophet, Ms Folly is modelled on the wayward woman. Vs 13–18 are to be compared with 7:10–27, and stolen water also with 5:15–16: illicit sexual activity has often seemed more exciting than more conventional alternatives. But Ms Folly also takes people to the same destiny as the wilful woman (18). This section thus closes dramatically by setting a life and death choice before us.

10:1–22:16 Proverbs of Solomon

The second main section of the book comprises proverbs in a narrower sense nearer to that of the English word, one-verse sayings on a number of subjects. The sayings have been collected and arranged on at least three bases.

First, they may be divided into four general types:

- a. observations about how life is (e.g. 10:4, 12, 26)
- b. observations about wisdom (e.g. 10:1, 5, 8)
- c. observations about righteousness (e.g. 10:2, 6, 7)
- d. observations about God's involvement in people's lives (e.g. 10:3, 22, 27).

The groups overlap, as the examples listed illustrate, but the broad division is useful. The order in which we have listed the types has also been taken as a guide to their age—the first proverbs were observations about life (as English proverbs generally are) and their use was later extended to refer to wisdom, then morals, then theology. This may be so, but all four subjects are equally ancient topics for human reflection.

This fourfold division of the sayings is one basis for the way they have been grouped in Pr. 10–22. For instance, although chs. 10–11 carry examples of all four groups, they have an especially strong concentration of sayings about righteousness and wickedness.

Secondly, the proverbs can be categorized according to the topics they deal with: for instance, in 10:1–22 there are many proverbs on wealth and on the use of human speech. This division runs across the one we have just described. It provides another principle which has influenced the arrangement of the proverbs. Thus the sayings in 10:2–5 all deal with the topic of prosperity, but they illustrate all four types of saying noted above.

A third basis for connecting the sayings is purely verbal—sayings are put next to each other because they use the same key word or phrase even though it may have different senses in the two contexts. Chs. 10–11 again provide many examples: e.g. 10:6 and 7 both refer to the blessing(s) of the righteous; 10:6b and 11b are identical; 10:11 and 12 both use the verb 'cover'.

As the last example shows, these links are not always apparent in the NIV; the comments will draw attention to some of these examples.

The author may have used verbal links of this kind for several reasons. It may be an aid to memory. It may indicate a playful and aesthetic delight in such word-links. It may convey a sense that such links reflect an inner oneness in reality, deriving ultimately from the one God.

While the broad lines and many details of the arrangement of chs. 10–22 reflect these three bases, often individual sayings seem to have no links with their context. It may be that the chapters bring together earlier groups of sayings which were miscellaneous in content, and that some groups were located on the basis of the content of one or other of their members which then brought with it others on different topics. Or it may be that we have not yet spotted the ‘clue’ to the arrangement.

The divisions which follow are based on which types of saying or which topics are dominant at different points. Sometimes divisions are allowed to overlap where it helps to consider verses in more than one connection.

10:1–22 Sayings on wealth and on words

10:1–4 Introduction. The phrase The proverbs of Solomon has already appeared in 1:1 (see comment). Here it presumably indicates that this was once the beginning of a separate collection comprising 10:1–22:16, which now has chs. 1–11 placed before it.

The rest of 10:1 is then an introduction like the ones which come at the beginning of the sermon section (e.g. 1:8). Such introductions urge attention to the wisdom we find in the material which follows—though this one does so in an indirect way. Vs 2 and 3 introduce one of the dominant topics of the sayings, but do so by setting it in the context of righteousness and wickedness and of God’s involvement in these matters. V 4 offers a more straightforward comment about it, without overt reference to wisdom, morals, or religion.

Vs 1–4 contain all four of the main types of saying. They begin a sub-collection which runs through vs 1–22, and illustrate both how the sayings are by their very nature concerned with life itself and with a wise approach to life, and also how understanding life and seeking wisdom are never to be separated from morality and religion (cf. 1:1–7).

10:2–6, 15–17, 22 Wealth. The sayings expound the conviction that prosperity is a fruit of hard work (4), wisdom (5), righteousness (6, 16), and the involvement of God (22). Laziness will bring poverty and shame (4–5), but so will the resourcefulness which ignores right and wrong (2). Both inner necessity and God’s involvement make things work out this way (2–3, 22). At the same time there is a recognition of the facts about poverty and wealth and their inescapable results (15).

The teaching of Proverbs often raises two opposite questions for people. The first is that it seems to teach a this-worldly ‘prosperity gospel’ or an unbalanced ‘Protestant work ethic’. What Proverbs is actually promising is a good harvest which gives the righteous person nothing to worry about—a plentiful supply of life’s necessities, not an ostentatious supply of its luxuries (Cadillacs would be a different matter!). Jesus reaffirms the scriptural promise that putting God’s rule and God’s righteousness first leads to all one’s material needs being met (Mt. 6:33). Further, the call to hard work is set in the context of wisdom and piety, with the concern for the development of community life which also runs through Proverbs. This makes it possible for its thrust not to encourage self-centred workaholism.

The second question—whether it works—we will consider in the comments on 10:23–11:11.

Notes. 2 Ill-gotten treasures are ‘treasures gained by wickedness’ (RSV). Wickedness and righteousness are thus contrasted in vs 2, 3 and 6. 5 Wise is the word translated ‘prudent’ in 1:3 (see on 1:1–7). 16a The RSV’s ‘The wage of the righteous leads to life’ makes it clearer that the phrase to life links vs 16 and 17.

10:6–14, 18–21, 31–32 Words. One characteristic thrust of Proverbs’ sayings on words is ‘the fewer the better’ (19). Listening is a sign and a means of wisdom; chattering is the opposite (8, 10). The words the wise and righteous do speak, however, will be valuable and nourishing expressions of love, capable of dissolving the power of evil and of finding acceptance with people (11–12, 20–21, 32). The words of the loose-tongued or wicked bring trouble to themselves and to others (6, 11, 13–14, 21, 31), especially where they issue from ill-feeling and thus breed dissension and deceit (12, 18). Even beyond death, the words spoken about these two groups continue to contrast (7).

Notes. 6 Reference to the mouth suggests that the proverb warns especially against wickedness of speech (e.g. deception). 7 The form of the words will be a blessing implies not ‘will receive a blessing’ (as in V 6; cf. 11:26) but ‘will be an example of blessedness which comes to be used by people in their prayers for blessing’ (cf. REB; and Gn. 12:2). 8 chattering fool is not the same word, but the same person, as the ‘mocker’ (see on 1:1–7). 9 in theme belongs with 10:23–11:8, but in its poetic form it corresponds distinctively to vs 8 and 10. 11 The alternative translation (see NIV mg.) makes better sense here. With the NIV’s translation v 11a presumably means he brings life to himself. 12 Wickedness covers up violence (11), love covers up sins—the same verb is used in very different senses. 13 The discerning speak with wisdom and do well; the foolish do not.

10:23–11:31 Righteousness and wickedness, and more on words and wealth

10:23–27 Introduction. Vs 23–27 resemble vs 1–4: they begin with another implicit invitation to seek wisdom rather than folly, and follow it with instances of the other three main types of saying which appear in the collection as a whole. They thus again invite us to treasure wisdom (23) but stress its link with righteousness (24–25), the theme that runs through 10:23–11:11. V 26 adds an example of a third type of saying, a straightforward comment about life. V 27 sets all these concerns in the context of God’s involvement in human affairs. The opening of the section thus once more connects life, wisdom, morality, and piety.

10:28–11:11 Righteousness and wickedness. Righteous(ness) comes thirteen times in the section, wicked(ness) twelve times, a concentration unparalleled in the whole of Scripture. Each expression appears twenty-one times elsewhere in chs. 10–13, which takes further this section’s theme, the nature and the rewards of righteousness and wickedness.

The nature of righteousness is to be straight, correct, proper, orderly and fair. It is thus closely related to uprightness (e.g. 11:3, 6, 11), a word which more literally means ‘straightness’ (cf. 11:5). Both these are also closely related to integrity; the word literally means ‘wholeness’. It also appears in 11:3 and 5, though NIV translates blameless there; see further 10:9—and note the contrast with crookedness.

Righteousness expresses itself in honesty, justice, sympathy (even for animals) and truth (10:2; 12:5, 10; 13:5). It issues in speech that is wise, valuable, nourishing and life-giving (10:11, 20–21, 31). It brings blessing to the nation (11:11, 14:34). Different sayings promise that the righteous themselves will receive as rewards deliverance, blessing, satisfaction, fulfilment, prosperity, joy, security, direction, fullness of life and favour with God and with other people.

Wickedness, in contrast, by its very nature represents what is out of true and out of joint, askew and awry. It can constitute ‘crookedness’ (10:9; 11:20—NIV ‘perverse’). It can involve rebelliousness or offensiveness (10:12—NIV wrongs; 10:19—NIV sin; 12:13—NIV sinful). It can suggest failure to meet standards expected of us (13:6—NIV sinner). It can be pictured as going astray from the right road (10:17). It can be a matter of craftiness in devising evil (10:23; 12:2). It can suggest what brings trouble—to other people and to oneself (10: 29—NIV evil). It can denote a perverse turning of things upside-down (10:31–32; also the different word translated duplicity in 11:3). It can involve treachery or unfaithfulness (11:3, 6). It implies godlessness or profanity, the deliberate abandoning of the way of religion (11:9).

Concretely, it expresses itself in dishonesty, deceitfulness, bloodthirstiness, cruelty and rapacity (10:2; 12:5–6, 11–12). It results in shame and destruction for the community, and thus in joy at the wicked person’s death (11:11–12; 13:5). As its nature is the opposite of the nature of righteousness, so is its fruit: exposure, ruin, trouble, fall, entrapment, wrath, hunger, destruction, the frustrating of hopes, the spread of violence, the rotting of memory, the fulfilling of fears, the shortening of life, the loss of home and land and the illusoriness of its gain.

Modern readers are often puzzled by the confident assertions of Proverbs concerning the profitability of righteousness. It may not seem to be true that righteousness delivers from death (11:4). Several comments may be made on this difficulty. First, as much as any other aspect of Proverbs it was apparently based on experience (cf. Ps. 37:25); it was not mere theological dogma. Modern readers who are puzzled by it perhaps need to take more account of the evidence available in their personal experience that righteousness finds its reward.

Secondly, if it is the case that Proverbs’ assertions work out less in our world, that may reflect the wickedness of our world (e.g. in its unfair distribution of resources). Proverbs may be reflecting a society which paid more attention to seeing that business and community life worked in a moral way. It thus challenges us to combat injustice, not least because of the danger it shows us we are in by our wickedness.

Thirdly, Proverbs sometimes makes generalizations; there are exceptions. The book knows that life is more complicated than some individual sayings imply (cf. 13:23; 30:1–4). Other Wisdom books, notably Job and Ecclesiastes, focus more on the fact that these generalizations often do not work out. The general statements and the exceptions both need to be taken account of.

Fourthly, Proverbs’ focus on the generalizations has a theological concern. Theologically, it must in the end be the case that the universe works out in a just way. If it does not, the judge of all the earth has hardly arranged its affairs rightly.

Fifthly, other parts of Scripture solve the problem of the apparent injustice of life in this age by seeing justice worked out in the age to come. The difficult assertions of Proverbs need to be set in that context, but not robbed of their force by it. They form an important part of Scripture’s testimony to the conviction that God is Lord of this age. Biblical faith is not merely a matter of pie in the sky when you die.

Notes. 10:26 On the idler, see on 24:30–34; also cf. v 4. V 26a suggests he is an irritation. Although in content the verse does not fit the context, in form it corresponds to v 25 (‘When’ and ‘As’ are the same word in Hebrew). 11:1 takes up an expression from 10:32: ‘the lips of the righteous know what is fitting ... accurate weights are his delight.’ On what God abhors as opposed to his delight, see on 15:8. 2 in this context takes further the thought of 10:31–32 that wise or righteous speech also links with modesty; wicked or foolish speech with pride and disgrace. 4 The day of wrath is the day of calamity, when some terrible thing happens and when it seems as if someone's wrath has fallen. The phrase does not imply that the event actually stems from God's anger (cf. Jb. 21:30). Death is similarly sudden and premature. 7 Here too it makes best sense to take the saying to refer to sudden death which frustrates the person's expectations.

11:9–14 Words in the community. The power of words to give life or to destroy is reaffirmed (see on 10:9–14), but here especially words for the community: note allusions to neighbour, city and nation. In this context there is a particular reason for noisiness (10) and a new reason for affirming the capacity to keep one's mouth shut (13).

Notes. 9 Escape provides a link back with v 8; it is the same verb as that translated is rescued there. 9b suggests that the verse refers to perjury rather than gossip. 11 The blessing seems to be the one they utter rather than the one they receive (to judge from the parallel in v 11b).

11:15–31 Wealth. Proverbs is aware that one saying which looks simple or pragmatic needs to be accompanied by another which complements it and complicates the matter. Prosperity may seem to come from being ruthless rather than soft-hearted, which brings respect but no cash (16). Yet it also issues from generosity with what one has already (24–26), and if the wealth gained is to be the real thing it depends on righteousness (18–19, 21, 23, 27, 29, 30–31); God makes sure of that (20). The use of wealth requires good sense not to squander it on kind but risky causes such as going bail or guaranteeing a loan for a stranger (15). It also involves kindness, which in this context suggests generosity and which also benefits oneself (17), and the sense not to trust in wealth (28). There are situations in which one truth is relevant; other situations require another.

Notes. 16 But and only are NIV interpretations (cf. RSV); there is no contrast between respect ('honour') and wealth, which belong together (3:16; 8:18), and there is no separate word for men. The point may thus be 'there are two routes to wealth and honour, one via graciousness (which is characteristic of women), one via aggressiveness'. 20 Regarding what God detests and delights in, see on 15:8. 22 links with the discussion of wealth by virtue of the fact that it starts off from things of value. 25 A generous man is literally 'a person of blessing'; cf. v 26b. 29 In the context brings trouble suggests trying to gain wealth, by being miserly or negligent. 30 as a whole makes better sense if v 30b is understood the other way round, as 'the wise man wins souls'. The idea then is that the righteous have a life-giving influence on others, and the wise win others to wisdom.

12:1–28 More on words and work

12:1–4 Introduction. Vs 1–4 again resemble 10:1–4 and 10:23–27 in bringing together sayings of all four types as an introduction to a chapter. Once more they implicitly challenge the listener to wisdom rather than folly (1), affirm God's own involvement in affairs (2), declare that righteousness and wickedness get their reward (3) and make an observation about how life is (4). Play on words links husband's (4) with cannot (3) and links disgraceful with plans in v 5.

12:5–8, 13–23, 25–26 Words, true and false. The dominant theme in the rest of ch. 12 is again the use of words, in particular the contrasting effect of good and bad words. Righteous, upright, wise, prudent, truthful, peacemaking, kind words issue in justice, deliverance, praise, profit, healing, joy, discretion, encouragement and in God's delight. Wicked, twisted, foolish, lying, malevolent, thoughtless, unrestrained or plotting words issue in deceit, in hurt to other people, in discredit and trouble to oneself and in God's abhorrence. It is wise to listen to advice but to ignore insults rather than vice versa (15–16); but also to be cautious in relations with others (26).

Notes. 5 The word advice is the one translated ‘guidance’ in 1:5 (see comment). 6 suggests that it is unknowingly their own blood that the wicked lie in wait for (cf. 1:18).

12:9–12, 24, 26–28 Work and its rewards. Having enough to eat and having status in society come from expending some energy and living rightly, not from pretending (9), neglecting one’s animals (10), following worthless pursuits (11), emulating other people’s wicked schemes (12) or simply failing to do anything at all (24)—even to bother to cook what you have caught (27)! Cf. also v 14b.

13:1–25 Desire, wealth and wisdom

13:1 Introduction. V 1 is a similar opening to those of previous sections, implicitly urging the hearers to attend to the wisdom of this chapter (cf. 10:1). It does not go on, however, in the style of the earlier introductions. As we move through the chapters, righteousness and wickedness decrease in prominence and in this chapter God’s involvement quite disappears, though it becomes increasingly prominent in the chapters that follow. The focus here is thus on wisdom itself (see vs 13–20).

13:2–12, 18–25 Desire and wealth. Behind questions about wealth lie some mysteries of the human personality which mean that appearances cannot always be trusted (7) and that fulfilment or frustration of desire can have deep effects on the person (12, 19). There are also mysteries associated with the quest for wealth itself. It is actually an ambiguous achievement; it both solves problems and brings problems the poor do not encounter (8).

The sayings point to ways in which desires can be satisfied or frustrated. One key lies in whether one uses one’s words in a prudent way and is able to keep one’s mouth shut (2–3), another in whether one uses one’s energy (4). Vs 5–6, 9, 21–22 and 25 remind the hearers in general terms that moral considerations underlie these factors and v 11 makes the point more concrete. V 23 recognizes that the moral laws which in theory govern it do not always work out; they also contain an implicit challenge to see that injustice is not allowed to flout these laws.

Notes. 2 Violence is to themselves, ironically, in the context (cf. 1:18). 3 The word life means self or person (see v 8), but also appetite, and this last meaning seems to be the one which runs through the chapter: see vs 2 (craving), 4 (desires), 19 (soul, REB ‘taste’), 25 (heart, RSV ‘appetite’). 9 A person is likened to a house, where the presence of a light suggests the presence of life (cf. Jb. 18:5–6). 10 Pride is used in the sense of arrogant, unteachable talk (cf. 21:23–24).

13:13–20 Wisdom. In the midst of these sayings which have the quest for wealth as their most common theme, vs 13–20 remind us that wisdom also underlies this quest (see vs 10 and 24 and specifically v 18). Openness to advice and correction, and submission to the wisdom learnt in the company of the wise, is the key to prudent behaviour, gain, fulfilment, favour, honour and life—and vice versa.

Notes. 17 A reminder to choose your messenger carefully: a faithful one brings healing to situations; a bad one makes them worse. 19 Evil is more likely ‘trouble’ or ‘misfortune’ (the same word in vs 20–21). The idea is that they will not turn from the way which leads to trouble to the way which leads to fulfilment.

14:1–15:1 Wisdom, the inner person and life in society

14:1–4 Introduction. Once more the chapter opens with an implicit challenge to seek wisdom and avoid folly (1). In this context, then, the two figures are personifications of wisdom and folly, as in 9:1, 13 (cf. also 24:3–4), and the point of v 1b is that if we are not careful we allow folly to tear down the house that wisdom builds (cf. v 3). Again, an understanding of wisdom which leaves out God and morality is forbidden by a saying which draws attention to right and wrong and to attitudes to God (2). The four regular types of saying in these chapters are then completed by an observation about life in v 4: empty is more literally ‘clean’ (RV), suggesting that farmers have to put up with a little mess if they want to reap a harvest.

14:1–9, 15–18 Wisdom and folly. To put it negatively, folly is destructive (1), self-destructive (3), self-perpetuating (6, 18, 24), self-expressive (7), self-deceptive (8), stubborn (9), credulous (15), reckless (16), unpopular (17), quick-tempered (29) and ultimately self-imposed (33).

Notes. 9 Fools do not care about putting relationships right when they are in the wrong; the upright are concerned for mutual goodwill. 16 the LORD is an NIV addition, not part of the text (cf. RSV).

14:10–15 The inner person. Heart is the recurrent word here: see vs 10, 13–14 (where it is literally ‘the faithless of heart’), 30 and 33. These examples show how ‘heart’ in biblical speech is not merely the place of the emotions but the inner centre of the whole person, so that it connects with the mind and will (with thinking and decision-making) as much as with the feelings (which in the Bible are often associated with the stomach or kidneys, e.g. 23:16a). The heart is connected with understanding and wisdom (2:2, 10; 3:5), obedience (3:1), memory (4:4; 6:21; 7:3) and with plotting (6:14, 18). In 6:32; 7:7; 9:4, 16 it is translated ‘judgment’, in 7:10 ‘intent’, in 8:5 ‘understanding’. When translations use the term ‘heart’, it is usually wise mentally to replace it with ‘mind’. Thus in 4:21, 23 we are urged to fill our mind with the teaching of the wise and to look after our minds as the decisive mainspring of our whole personality (cf. Rom. 12:2; Eph. 4:23; Heb. 8:10; 1 Pet. 1:13; also Mt. 15:18–19).

Notes. 10 There is a sense in which everyone stands alone in their deepest feelings and experiences. 11 Cf. v 1. 13 It is because a person’s laughter often conceals hidden pain (or because there is pain of some kind in everyone’s heart—so most translations) that their joy never has the last word. 15 believes anything is literally ‘trusts in any word’—in any advice or promise about the future (cf. v 15b).

14:19–15:1 Life in society. The words king, prince, nation, people, neighbour and friend have made few if any appearances in the sayings so far; their appearance together here in vs 19–21, 28 and 34–35 gives a community context to the regular concerns of the sayings on subjects such as prosperity (23–24). The way to use such prosperity is for the sake of one’s neighbour in need (21), rather than to take the usual attitude towards the poor (20). Vs 19 and 32 make that a matter of both morals and self-interest. Going beyond that, v 31 similarly adds religious motivation to it, with vs 26–27 going further in that direction and promising that we need not fear any risks involved.

V 34 makes righteousness the key to a nation’s greatness, a recipe that has perhaps not yet been tried, though its converse (34b) has often been proven. For such a society, love and faithfulness would be an ideal foundation, and v 22 offers a prescription for planners in this connection (plot is the same word as plan—it has no sinister meaning here). Legal justice will also be of key importance to it (25).

Leaders are only as significant as their people; v 28 points to the pressures on leadership in society. That explains something of the high stakes involved in working for them and the need to know how to handle the relationship wisely (14:35–15:1—wrath picks up the concern of the previous verse, though it is a different Hebrew word; cf. REB). Kingship will be a major theme in ch. 16, though not before we have thought about God much more in between.

15:2–16:19 God in relation to wisdom, king and the inner person

15:2–7 Introduction. Once more a contrast between wisdom and folly with its implicit challenge to aim for the former (cf. vs 5, 7) opens the introduction to a new collection of sayings, adding an assertion of God's involvement in human life, along with observations about how life is and about the righteous and the wicked (3–4, 6). 15:2–16:19 as a whole contains many sayings which bring God into the equation of human life. The section comes at the centre of 10:1–22:16 and thus at the centre of the book as a whole, and thereby sets God at the heart of the book's teaching about wisdom.

15:7–19 The inner person and the eye of God. Four references to this involvement of God in vs 8, 9, 11 and 16 interweave with six allusions of the human heart in vs 7, 11, 13, 14 and 15; cf. also vs 21 (NIV judgment), 28, 30 and 32 (NIV understanding); 16:1, 5 and 9 (see on 14:10–15). The two come together in 15:11.

That statement in v 11 links with the section's references to what God detests or takes pleasure in (8, 9; cf. v 26; 16:5; also 11:1, 20; 12:22; 17:15; 20:10, 23). These are matters of human honesty or motivation, or of the linkage between what is said and what is meant. They remain concealed to the human eye—but not to God's, says Proverbs. God sees and detests them and this may put some constraint on people's hidden wrongdoing.

The sayings bring out other aspects of the links and differences between the inner person and the outward life. There is a link between folly in thinking and in speech (7). There must also be a link between the inward and outward aspects of our spirituality (8) and even between how we feel and how we look (13). But the richness of the inner person may compensate for pressures on the outward (15–16), while an open mouth and an open mind may be incompatible (14).

Notes. 11 Death and Destruction (Sheol and Abaddon—see on 1:12. Even Sheol is not beyond God's power (cf. Ps. 139:8). 16–17 These two verses balance each other, as 15:15–16 do. The peace which comes from revering God takes the edge off poverty; so does the reality of human love. 18–19 hint at a continuation of this conversation, v 18 amplifying v 17, v 19 then warning about becoming too laid back!

15:20–33 Wisdom and reverence for God. Vs 20–24 begin like an introduction to a new section or a discourse on wisdom (v 20 in fact repeats the introduction to ch. 10), with joy as a recurrent motif: the joy of perceiving wisdom (20), the joy of exercising it (23) and the false joy of avoiding it (21; delights is the same word, cf. RSV). But it soon gives way to that emphasis on God's involvement in the world which is the special feature of 15:2–16:15 as a whole. As v 11 brought together the two recurrent themes of vs 7–19, so v 33 brings together the two themes of vs 20–33 at the close of this section.

Human beings are concerned with wisdom and honour (33): as vs 20–24 express the concern with wisdom, vs 25–29 reflect the concern with honour, the former more positively than the latter. They affirm God's attitude and action in relation to the self-sufficient and the have-nots, which underlie the way the haves often get their come-uppance.

Vs 30–32 gradually prepare the way for v 33 to declare that the key to both wisdom and honour is reverence for God or humility. In this context humility is an attitude before God and not merely a human virtue. The sequence of vs 30–33 suggests that nice news helps to mature us as people, but so does criticism, and nothing matures us more than submitting to God's criticism.

The words for news (30), listens (31) and heeds (32) are related, so that vs 31–32 suggest that setting apparently negative statements along-side obviously good news can be equally life-giving and upbuilding. The point is underlined by the fact that understanding (32) is also the same word as heart (30). In turn discipline (32) reappears in v 33 (cf. RSV; literally ‘the fear of Yahweh is a discipline in wisdom’, so that v 33 explicitly relates God to the teaching of vs 30–33).

16:1–19 Divine and human sovereignty. As nowhere else in Proverbs, God appears nine times in vs 1–11; the king five times in vs 10–15.

The definition of a king’s position in a traditional monarchy (which may be applied to the various other forms of political leadership) is twofold. First, he has frighteningly ultimate power, in word and act (10, 14–15). Secondly, he is committed to justice and righteousness (10, 12–13). In Israel and elsewhere, the latter would be reckoned as essential to the idea of monarchy as the former, though it could also be seen as not merely a matter of morals but of self-interest (12). In the context of sayings on kingship, the comments on justice, wisdom, uprightness and humility in vs 8 and 16–19 will also apply to the king in particular.

This is especially so when the comments about the king are set in the context of God’s activity in the world. The interweaving of the two at vs 10–11 helps to prevent their being held apart, but so do the actual statements about God, for they also focus on sovereignty and justice. It is God’s involvement which determines how far plans are explained effectively (1), how actions are assessed (2), how far plans are successful (3) and how even apparently negative factors fit into a purpose (4). It also determines how far the arrogance of power gets away with things (5), trouble is avoided (6), diplomacy is effective (7), ideas work out in practice (9) and fair standards operate in business (11).

Humanly speaking, business standards were the king’s responsibility. V 11 thus makes especially clear how in this section as a whole the king’s position is being subordinated to God’s. This would bring an important message to Israel in the First Temple period, when they had kings who are here challenged to rule in a way which mirrors God’s rule—as are the governments of the modern world. It would also bring an important message to Israel in the Second Temple period, when they were ruled by foreign kings, who are also said to be ultimately under God’s rule—an encouragement in turn to peoples today controlled by alien powers.

Notes. 6 Evil here seems to denote disaster (the same word as in v 4); turning from wickedness to right ways and to God makes it possible to avoid the calamity resulting from one’s sin. 10 The RSV’s ‘does not’ is preferable to the NIV’s should not; the statement is parallel to those in vs 12–13. 12–15 What kings detest and what they take pleasure in or favour (the same word) is compared with the list of things God detests and takes pleasure in (see 15:8 where the same two words appear, and the comment there). 17 For evil in the sense of ‘trouble’ see v 6.

16:20–22:16 Life, righteousness, wisdom and God

In this second half of the collection ‘proverbs of Solomon’ which appear in 10:1–22:16, particular types of saying and topic again feature prominently in different sections, and many sayings have verbal links with others in the context. As a whole, however, they are not as clearly divided into sections as is the first half, and the reason behind their arrangement is often less clear than in the first half. There are three clusters of wisdom sayings, a collection of sayings on righteousness and wickedness near the end, and small groups of sayings which bring in God. Proverbs which make observations about life itself predominate.

16:20–30 The blessings of wisdom. Vs 20–23 explain some of the blessings of wisdom in such a way as to make the student want to pay attention to the rest of the book’s teaching. Vs

24–30 have verbal links back with vs 20–23 and with each other, so that vs 20–30 form a chain. Many of the links appear in the NIV; in addition, mouth is the same word as hunger (23, 26); lips as speech (23, 27, 30); while prosper (20) is literally ‘finds good’ (cf. v 29). Together, then, they promise that wisdom (linked with reverence for God) brings benefit, repute, influence, satisfaction, healing, guidance and a full life, and they warn about the foolish perversity that will mislead into division, chastisement, disaster and death. V 26 perhaps serves to add to the motivation: for pupils too their appetite should thus be their stimulus. In vs 21b and 23b, the idea is that winsome speech ‘increases learning’ (REB): see on 1:7.

16:31–18:1 The dynamics of relationships. The concrete observations in this section major on aspects of relationships within family and community. Two reflect on the special status and mutual pride of the three generations of the family, the grandparents who will be the senior members of the community, the adult parents and the children (16:31; 17:6). The affirmation of all three groups and the vision of their interrelationships has something to say to modern developed countries. V 17 reflects on the importance that brothers and sisters and friends have for each other in life in general but especially in times of crisis, even if v 18 hints that neighbourly concern, too, needs to be exercised with prudence. But wilful loners impose loss on everybody (18:1).

A number of sayings in ch. 17 relate to harmony and conflict within the family and elsewhere. V 1 affirms that family harmony matters more than anything else. V 2 warns therefore against strife, particularly over money (though v 8 recognizes the influence of money on people), and vs 21–22 and 25 note the pain to father and mother that such folly can bring.

V 4 points out that the things people say are often what cause the trouble (cf. 16:28; 17:27–28). V 9 urges us to encourage love and friendship by covering offences rather than talking about them, though this does not mean that we never say the hard things to people (10). Similarly vs 14 and 19 urge us to avoid starting or loving quarrels (cf. 16:32; 17:11–13), though vs 15 and 20 warn against this leading to compromise or deceitfulness.

‘Dissension’ is a recurrent theme of Proverbs. In churches and communities there are always stirrers, people who like causing trouble. The cause may be anger (15:18; 29:22), mockery (22:10), alcohol (23:29–35), gossip (26:20), greed (28:25) or just perversity (16:28). The result may be ongoing conflict (26:21), permanent breakdown of relationships (18:19) or overwhelming trouble (17:14). The best solution is either to withdraw from the quarrel (17:14) or let the matter be decided by the equivalent of the toss of a coin (18:18). In other words, a stubborn continuation of a dispute does more damage than making a minor wrong decision.

Sayings such as 17:16 and 24–28 speak of wisdom, but not only this-worldly wisdom. 16:33 and 17:3–5 explicitly add God to the equation. These verses affirm that God is the final arbiter of how family fate works out, undertakes the final test of family folly, and is the final object of people’s insults.

Notes. 7 Another comment on the things people say, following up v 4. 19 As well as the word loves, the word invites links v 19 with v 9, where it is the same word translated promotes (cf. RSV). In v 19b the image is unclear, but the action is some expression of pride. 18:1 Again pursues is the verb which has already come in 17:9 and 19 (cf. RSV), while an unfriendly man is related to the word for separates in 17:9.

17:24–18:8 The nature and the price of folly. Folly is prominent in this group of sayings. It is promiscuous in its interests (17:24), has difficulty in keeping its mouth shut (17:27–28; cf. 18:8), insisting on making decisions on its own (18:1) and prefers talking to listening (18:2). It thus brings trouble to the family (17:25), loss to other people affected by decisions

(18:1) and pain to the individual (18:6–7). On the other hand, there are contexts in which a person must speak up and provoke conflict if necessary (17:26; 18:5).

Notes. 18:4 While 18:4a and 20:5a might imply that human beings have their own inner resources of wisdom, that is not stated elsewhere in Proverbs. Hence the NIV's but assumes a contrast between human evasiveness and wisdom's sparkling clarity.

18:9–21 Matters of strength and power. This section speaks of the strength of a fortified city, and of two things which have parallel strength. One is wealth (11; v 16 notes another aspect of the power of wealth in relation to the great). But v 10 has already affirmed that God protects the righteous, qualifying the comment on the (presumed) impregnable strength of wealth. It also supports a different understanding of pride, honour, and humility (12). Vs 13 and 15 link with that assessment of pride, and v 9 hints at another form of strength exercised even by the inactive.

The human spirit can sustain itself but not for ever (14). God's protective strength provides an answer. The second thing which is as strong as a fortified city is the sense of personal injury that can sometimes come between brothers (19). V 18 offers one down-to-earth tip for solving such disputes between strong opponents. 16:33 is the only other reference to casting the lot in Proverbs so v 18 may also take for granted that God is sovereign when lots are cast.

18:22–19:10 Poverty. Poverty is clearly a bad thing; it means, for instance, that you are always begging for mercy (18:23). It make even your family push you away (19:7). It certainly reduces the number of people who seek your company (19:4, 6–7). In this context, 19:5 perhaps implies that it makes the courts disinclined to treat you with justice, but it promises that perjurers will be punished (cf. 19:9).

What else can be said to encourage the poor? They are given several facts to bear in mind. First, that the poor man who begs for mercy (18:23) is already the object of God's grace through God's gift of his wife (18:22). Secondly, that one close friend may be better than many acquaintances and more loyal than the closest member of your family (18:24). Thirdly, that it is better to be poor and honest than a devious or activist fool who blames God for his self-inflicted problems (19:1–3), and to whom poverty is actually appropriate (19:10). Fourthly, that in seeking wisdom you are being your own best friend (19:8). When the poor person receives human grace, God knows and will reward it (19:17). So people are encouraged to show such grace (the word 'grace' lies behind the NIV 'is kind to' in 19:17). A poor person is generally preferred to a liar, because 'faithful love is what people look for in a person' (19:22 NJB).

Notes. 24 Companions is the word translated friends in 19:4, 6–7. Friend in 18:24 is a stronger word formed from the word for 'love' (cf. 19:8). Brother is the word translated relatives in 19:7.

19:11–19; 20:2–3 Conflict. The section takes up themes from 16:31–18:1. The combination of power and anger is clearly a fearsome one (19:12; cf. 20:2). Strife at home may amuse the outsider but it also feels deathly (19:13) and real glory lies in being able to avoid strife (20:3). Wisdom thus lies in being able to 'lengthen your anger'—the literal meaning of patience (19:11); and the gift of God lies in not being involved in that kind of strife at home (19:14).

The hot-tempered person may be incorrigible and bound for disaster (19:19). But that is no reason to neglect the saying of hard things within the family, which is to leave someone on the road to death (19:18). Laziness may itself induce death-like sleep and starvation (19:15); ignoring wisdom risks death itself (19:16).

19:20–20:5 Wisdom. 19:20 comments on the benefits and risks of wisdom and folly (cf. vs 25, 27 with vs 26, 29). These are illustrated by several portraits of wisdom. It is incompatible with a liking for a drink (20:1); so much for the fondness for alcohol that often characterizes academic communities! It is illustrated by the inactivity of the idler, the object of some of Proverbs' choicest pen-portraits (see on 24:30–34). Wisdom enables one to plumb the hidden and possibly deceptive depths of the human heart (20:5; see on 18:4).

We are then reminded that God's involvement in human affairs means that mere human wisdom does not always have the last word, and that reverence for God is as important to a successful life as intellectual application (19:21, 23). Human relationships count too (19:22), as does justice (19:28, where the reference to mockery links with the comments on the fool as mocker in vs 25, 29).

Note. 17, 22 See on 18:22–19:10. 20:2–3 See on 19:11–19.

20:5–19 Appearances and truth. Righteousness may be defined as a life of personal integrity (7), but it is really difficult to find an example (6, 9). Openness is not common (5), as business life illustrates (14), and human evasiveness is difficult to penetrate (15).

V 5 points to wisdom as the key to penetrating this evasiveness. In more down-to-earth fashion v 8 points to authority exercised with one's eyes open. V 11 implies that actions ought to be taken as the clue to the real person. V 12 sees the open eyes as the gift of God, while v 10 adds the warning of God's loathing for deceit in trade.

Vs 16–19 link together as vs 16, 17 and 19 use the same verb in three different ways, to mean puts up security, tastes sweet, and 'mix with' (hence the NIV avoid); v 19 also functions as a qualification to v 18. The verses link the theme of this section through v 17 with its comment on deceit.

Note. 13 Stay awake is literally 'open your eyes', the verse's link with the context (see vs 8, 12).

20:20–21:4 God's sovereignty and human authority. The section includes further references to God. We are to trust God when wronged (20:22). In that situation we can be reassured of God's concern for honesty and justice (20:23; 21:3), of God's direction of the powerful (20:24 NJB: it is not the ordinary word for 'man' here), of God's understanding of how human beings 'work' (20:27), and of the finality of God's assessment (21:2). 20:25 picks up one example of when human beings may not even understand themselves.

The king has responsibility for 'winnowing out the wicked' (20:26) and his kind of punitive action has a role in purging the inner being of other people too (20:30). But the sovereignty of God in relation to the king (see 21:1) suggests a qualification on both these sayings: it is only God who can see into the inner being (20:27). Another comment on the first saying is that the king needs to focus on the positives, on what builds up the throne, not just on punitive action regarding things that have gone wrong (20:28).

Young and old have their own glories, physical strength and the authority of experience (20:29). The former must not despise or swindle the latter (20:20–21: curses and blessed are the first and last words of the two verses).

21:2–29 Righteousness and wickedness. Towards the end of Pr. 10–22 there appears another clutch of sayings on righteousness and wickedness, parallel to that near the beginning of these chapters. After the two comments from God's angle (2–3), wickedness has the focus. Wickedness makes pride its guiding light (4), expresses itself in violence and crookedness (7–8), is graceless and craves the ruin of others (10; evil is the word translated ruin in v 12), is proud and arrogant (24), religious but hypocritical (27), and bold-faced but unreflective (29).

Craving is a theme which appears elsewhere, especially as the desire to be rich, which can be pursued in ways that are right or wrong, wise or foolish (5–6, 13, 17, 20, 25–26), but about whose power we also have to be realistic (14).

Wickedness finds its natural fruition. The violent are dragged away violently (7). The Righteous One takes action against people whose character is opposite to his (12). The merciless find no mercy (13). Those who go astray get finally lost (16). When that happens, it is as if they take the place of the righteous who were in danger from them (18: a sharper version of the point made in 11:8). People who put their trust in a foolish place are exposed by the wise (22). The witness who threatens someone's life with his falsehood loses his own life (28).

There are several striking positive comments on righteousness. God is uniquely called the Righteous One (12), which sheds a new light on the word righteousness in Pr. 10–22 as a whole: all it says on this subject stems from the nature of God. There is the joy of justice (15), an example of the way in which the judgment of God—as this expression is commonly rendered—is good news in the OT. It marks the just reign of God (and contrast v 17, where pleasure is the word earlier translated joy). Righteousness, loyalty, life, and honour are brought together (21).

Note. 9, 19 See on 16:31–18:1.

21:30–22:16 Wisdom, wealth and God. The last sayings in Pr. 10:1–22:16 mix typical wisdom sayings with a striking number of sayings which bring God into the equation. They thus affirm the importance of human wisdom and effort (22:3, 6, 10, 15; typical wisdom sayings in 22:5, 8, 11, 13, 14) but also declare that these mean nothing independent of God's will (21:30–31) and even require God's involvement if their principles are to be fulfilled (22:12). They are realistic about wealth and poverty (22:7) but qualify that not only by human considerations (22:1, 9—blessed is here people's speaking well of him) but also by noting what rich and poor have in common in God (22:2) and by affirming that attitudes to God are of key significance to questions of wealth and poverty (22:4). Truly reverence for God is the foundation of wisdom.

22:17–31:31 Five further collections

The last third of Proverbs comprises five further separate collections of wisdom material of varying kinds: two collections of the sayings of the wise (22:17–24:22 and 24:23–34), a similar collection 'copied by the men of Hezekiah' (25–29), and the sayings of Agur (30) and of King Lemuel (31).

22:17–24:22 Thirty wise sayings

The teaching over these two chapters returns to the emphasis of ch. 1–9 in urging the reader to adopt or avoid certain types of behaviour. The sayings about life which are common in 10:1–22:16 no longer appear, and most units of thought last several verses rather than just one. The extended form of the teaching gives scope for comment on why the listener should obey. The NIV helpfully leaves a paragraph break after each of the 'thirty sayings' (22:20), so it is possible to see how they divide.

The thirty sayings are closely related to a thirty-chapter Egyptian work, the Teaching of Amenemope. This work seems to date from some time before Solomon, and it is usually reckoned that Proverbs depends on Amenemope rather than vice versa. The openness to learning from the wisdom of other peoples reflects the theological conviction that the God of Israel is God of all nations and of all of life. It is not therefore surprising when other peoples perceive truths about life which the people of God can also profit from. The thirty sayings encourage us to use our own common sense in our service of God. God's service does not always require 'a word from the Lord' in order for us to see what needs doing!

The Teaching of Amenemope was designed to offer advice to people involved in public service. The thirty sayings have much to say to such people too.

First, such people are to heed the insights of wisdom (22:17–21, where give sound answers to him who sent you reflects their work as go-betweens; 23:12, 13–16, 22–25; 24:3–7, 13–14). They need to avoid wasting time on fools who will take no notice of them (23:9). They need to note good examples (22:29) and avoid wrong influences—for instance, people who might set them an example of hot-headedness rather than coolness, an important concern of Egyptian wisdom (22:24–25), or people inclined to rebellion (24:21–22).

Secondly, like ordinary people learning from the insights of the wise, they are to remember God's involvement in their lives and work and expect to see results from it (22:19, 23; 23:11, 17; 24:12, 18, 21).

Thirdly, they are to remember the moral demands of their work and how easily power can be abused (22:22–23, 28; 23:10–11; 24:8–9, 15–16). But they also need to be wary of the opposite danger, being recklessly indulgent with people in financial difficulties (22:26–27). They can never say, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' (24:11–12), and their responsibility extends to their thoughts and not just their words and actions (24:17).

Fourthly, they are to remember the danger of self-indulgence. It can make them forget the real issues they are concerned with and their position, forget the transience of wealth, and take someone's friendship at its face value when they should be asking why the person is being so generous (23:1–9—the idea in v 9 is that the nice conversation will stick in their throat when the truth dawns). It can make them envy or fret at the transient success of wrongdoers (23:17–18; 24:1–2, 19–20). It can make them forget how much can be wasted in self-indulgence and how ill this can make them (23:19–21, which point to the relationship of self-indulgence and sloth, one of wisdom's favourite themes; 23:29–35, where mixed wine is wine mixed with substances such as honey, the equivalent of our cocktails). It can make them yield to the temptation of sex outside marriage (23:26–28). Facing pressure will reveal what they are actually made of (24:10).

24:23–34 Further wise sayings

These form a mixed collection added to the thirty sayings. They include two short comments on our appreciation of someone who will talk straight (the literal meaning of the word translated honest in v 26) and on the need to have enough to eat before indulging in 'building a house' (27). The latter may be meant quite literally, but the same phrase can refer to starting a family; the nature of a proverb like this is to be open to a number of applications.

Two longer sayings cover behaviour in court on the part of judges (not a profession but a task undertaken by senior members of a community) (23–25) and on the part of witnesses (28–29; these two verses seem to belong together and thus each helps us to see the meaning of the other).

The longest of the sayings is one of Proverbs' fine pen-pictures of one of its favourite (or rather least favourite) characters, the idler (30–34). He is unreliable (10:26; 18:9), unfulfilled (13:4; 21:25), beset by problems (15:19), hungry (19:15; 20:4), full of excuses (22:13; 26:13), never finishing anything (12:27; 19:24; 26:15), poverty-stricken (12:24) and incorrigible (26:14, 16). 6:6–11; 19:24 and 26:13–16 are further memorable word-pictures. Contrast the person who works hard (12:24, 27; 13:4; 16:26; 21:5). Hard work is a wisdom virtue, necessary to gaining wisdom and to success in life; thus laziness is the opposite.

25:1–29:27 Sayings transcribed at the court of Hezekiah

Chs. 25–29 parallels 10:1–22:16 in that much of it comprises one-line sayings, and some sections of it arrange the sayings on the basis of verbal links, particularly in ch. 25—e.g. the phrase the king's presence in vs 5 and 6; neighbour in vs 8 and 9 and hears and listening (the same Hebrew verb) in vs 10 and 12. In ch. 25 the sayings come in pairs (see the NIV paragraphing), while in ch. 26 they are gathered into larger groups. Sometimes the link lies in the form of the saying—e.g. 25:13 and 14 are both weather comparisons.

There is a great delight in vivid metaphor and simile in the first half of this collection. They are sharper than the translation implies, because the words ‘like’ and ‘is’, or ‘as’ and ‘so’, are not usually expressed (they appear in 25:13; 26:1, 2, 8, 18; 27:8, but not elsewhere). Thus 25:14 simply says ‘Clouds and wind without rain; a man who boasts of gifts he does not give’. The result is to require the hearers of the saying to work out its meaning; it is not handed to them on a plate.

25:1 Introduction. In the light of the Egyptian background of the thirty sayings, it is interesting that this next collection is said to have been edited in the time of King Hezekiah, the period during which Judah had closest contact with Egypt. Is. 30–31 warns Judah against the human wisdom of assuming that Egypt is its best ally, and failing to take God into account. In preserving the material in Pr. 25–29 the teachers of Hezekiah’s day encouraged people to take a positive view of human wisdom, but they too—like the compilers of earlier chapters—warn people not to leave God out of account.

25:2–7 Kingship. In the light of the courtly origin of this collection, it is to be expected that its first actual sayings—three pairs—concern matters to do with the king. The affairs of God involve mystery; ch. 30 will take this point further. This recognition is important, as often Proverbs seems to imply that theology is all very straightforward. Proverbs does not take this view. In contrast, the this-worldly affairs the king is concerned with are ones over which he shows complete mastery (2). On the other hand, the mind of the king itself is like God’s own (3). It needs to be, if it is to be up to the demands placed upon it, and the king is well advised to hide some of his feelings and policies if he is to maintain authority and respect.

Thus flattered, he is confronted by a challenge in the use of his authority (4–5), while his court are given some advice regarding their own conduct in relation to him (6–7—to which Lk. 14:7–11 appears to owe something).

25:8–28 Conflict. Like parts of ch. 10–22, the main theme of the sayings in this section is the nature of conflict and the way to avoid or resolve it. First, do not rush into public conflict, certain that right is on your side, nor if you make it a private matter, reveal all your sources; either way you may end up humiliated (8–10). Don’t lose your self-control, or you may find you have lost everything (28). Don’t be put off from speaking the truth in love and resisting evil (cf. v 26—but the verse comes here because of the image which contrasts with that in v 25) but be careful how you do it (11–12; v 11 has the same form as other comparisons, so that the NJB renders ‘Like apples of gold inlaid with silver is a word that is aptly spoken’—the NIV reverses it).

We now turn to relations with one’s superiors. If they are tired and potentially hostile, reliability will refresh them and thus be a favour to oneself (13; comparison with v 25 suggests the reference is to ice-cold water from springs fed by Mt Hermon snows even in summer, not to the actual fall of snow in summer). When one has to disagree with one’s superiors, care in the words one uses is of key importance. The right words can break the backbone of their resistance (15).

Even when it is not under pressure, neighbourly harmony needs to be protected. Don't outstay your welcome, therefore (16–17; the image from v 16a reappears in v 27), don't tell lies or betray confidences (18–19, 23), and don't (accidentally?) increase your neighbour's suffering by your insensitivity (20). One might connect with this the reminder not to promise people more than you can deliver (14).

Neighbours might be divided into friends and enemies, and one's enemy (21–22) is likely also to be one's neighbour. The command to love one's neighbour (Lv. 19:18) presumably has enemies as much as friends in mind; Jesus' command to love one's enemies thus only makes it clearer. This same principle is connected to the concern to win one's hostile neighbour to repentance (22a refers to signs of repentance, presumably figurative). In offering advice on restoring harmony to the community, however, the teachers here appeal to more selfish instincts. Their point is that loving our enemy/neighbour may be the best way of achieving our own desire to end the other person's hostility, as well as being a policy God approves. Paul affirms their approach (Rom. 12:20).

Conflict at home may be the most painful and the most intractable (24).

Note. 23 In Israel rain comes not from the north but from the Mediterranean, the west (cf. Lk. 12:54). Perhaps the proverb had its origin where rain did come from the north; it might be another indication of Egyptian influence on Proverbs.

26:1–12 The fool. There is little definition of folly here, but vivid illustration of it. Fools can in theory appreciate wisdom, can perhaps learn it by rote, but they do not know how to use it (7). They are like students who have accumulated knowledge but not acquired the ability to apply it: like someone who has a dangerous weapon but does not know how to use it (9—unless the point of this verse is that they have only acquired their knowledge by accident). Nor can they profit from their mistakes (11).

By definition, fools are not going to learn from these sayings. What are the wise to learn from them? They are to register that to honour fools is ridiculously out of place (1, 8—a stone is placed in a sling in order to be projected, not to be kept there). They are to use the method of training appropriate to fools (3). They are to avoid using fools if they want to get something achieved (6, 10; v 10 implies that something will be achieved, but there is no way of knowing what it will be). They are to avoid fancying themselves superior to fools, which may prove that they aren't (12, the sting in the tail of this section).

Vs 4–5 offer striking contrary advice regarding how one answers a fool's foolish questions. It depends on whether one takes the fool's question seriously, or dismisses it and thus behaves the way the fool does with issues. Life is complex and the same easy answer is not applicable to every situation. The wise person is one who can see which piece of wisdom applies in each circumstance.

Notes. 2 This verse comes here not because it continues the theme but because its form links it with v 1: both are comparisons from nature and in both the actual words 'like' and 'so' are present in the text, as is not usually the case in the comparisons in these chapters. Because words can be very powerful, particularly prayers or declarations of blessing and curse, one might fear that a curse will inevitably be fulfilled; this saying promises that this is not so.

26:13–16 Laziness. Four cartoons of lazy people with their implausible excuses, their rigidity (a hinge is meant to keep turning but never move, a man is not!), their sluggishness and their monumental self-deceit. (See on 24:30–34.)

26:17–27:22 Friendship. The subject of 26:17–22 is quarrels (see vs 17, 20–21). They may spring from a character defect, a quarrelsome disposition (21), but a particular cause is the stupidity which takes a joke too far (18–19). One way to stop them is to stop malicious talk (20), though that is easier said than done (22). It is best not to attempt to resolve someone else's quarrel (17).

The related topic of 26:23–28 is deceitfulness in personal relationships (see vs 24, 26, 28). This is a warning against the gap there may be between friendly words and the mind behind them. The wise always keep in the back of their mind the possibility that there is more than meets the ear to what someone says, and they learn to recognize the deceitful person (23–26a). The sayings promise that the deceiver will pay for it in public dishonour and personal pain (26b–28).

27:1–22 comprises individual sayings broadly relating to good relationships. At the beginning, vs 1–2 warn about two forms of boasting (praise is the same word as boast); in this context the stress is on the second with its implications for relationships (cf. also vs 21 and 18 for a practical comment on gaining a reputation). The sayings go on to warn about the vexation caused by folly (3; cf. vs 11–12, 22), about the power of jealousy which even exceeds that of furious anger (4), and later about the destructiveness of greed (20).

The sayings turn to friendship and begin negatively, but they affirm the positive value of an honest rebuke by a friend, over against a love which hides itself and does not say the hard thing (5) or an enmity which hides itself in apparent love (6). In the context of v 9, which speaks of the sweetness of friendship, v 7 speaks of how easily the friendless can let themselves be deceived by pretended friendship such as that described in v 6a. Friendship can be creatively uncomfortable (17, where another is literally 'one's neighbour'), and perhaps in v 19, where the idea may be that we discover ourselves through getting to know someone else (cf. the NJB). Vs 15–16 also belong in the context of v 9, for the perfume of v 9 is the oil of v 16. The expansion in v 16 of the familiar sentiment expressed in v 15 thus makes a poignant point: love is like perfume, and when love is lost the perfume cannot be recaptured.

More positively, the sweetness and joy of friendship lie in the positive advice it can bring, rescuing us from our own devices (9), and in the way that we rely on our friends during a crisis rather than having to go miles to get the support of members of our family (10)—though better not to have strayed away in the first place (8). Friendship therefore needs to be safeguarded (14); to make a show of it may be counterproductive!

Neighbourliness is a recurrent theme in Proverbs. It has great potential for the health of the community, especially when individuals are in need (14:21; 27:10)—though it can also do harm (see 16:29; 25:18; 29:5). One therefore needs to be wary of actions which may destroy neighbourliness: putting one's own interests first rather than doing good or paying dues (3:27, 28; cf. 14:20; 21:10), failing to take action in the event of a real financial mistake (6:1–5), betraying a neighbour's trust (3:29), picking a fight for short-term gain (3:30–31), dallying with a neighbour's wife (6:29), destroying one's neighbours with words (11:9), humiliating them in public (11:12), putting up security for them unwisely (17:18), lying about them in court (24:28), being too quick to go to law (25:8), telling them the gossip about them (25:9–10); or—more humorously—taking their welcome for granted (25:17), playing practical jokes on them (26:18–19) or being too cheerful with them too early in the morning (27:14).

Notes. 27:13 For the content, see on 6:1–5. But here the saying links with v 2 (where another and someone else are the words translated a stranger and wayward in v 13); it warns against being too gullible in relation to the people whose words (v 2) had encouraged us to trust.

27:23–27 Safeguarding long-term assets. There are assets which seem very attractive but may not last (24). It is thus important to safeguard more long-term assets such as flocks which can provide you with clothing, capital, and nourishment (26–27), by caring for their condition (23) and working out the right programme of cropping for their feed (25)—with the right timing a farmer can get two crops in one year.

28:1–18 Righteousness, wisdom and religion. We have noted that the earlier sections in chs. 25–27 contain vivid pen-pictures. They have made few references to righteousness and wickedness, or to God. In ch. 28–29 the balance is reversed, and questions of morality and theology return. There are many references to God (5), righteousness (8), wickedness (10), wrong/sin (5), justice (3), evil in the moral sense (2), integrity/blamelessness (2), perversity (2), uprightness (3) and other such matters.

These chapters thus repeat convictions about morality and wisdom which have appeared in earlier parts of Proverbs. Righteousness and wickedness receive their reward (28:1, 10, 18), and even when they are not doing so, the former is to be preferred to the latter (6). Wisdom is the key to the stability of the state (2), while conversely an oppressive ruler fails in his most basic task (3: rain is designed to encourage crops but can do the opposite). The tyrant is as great a danger to people as a raging wild animal (5), and in his lack of discernment is also a danger to himself (16–17). People thus recognize that it is good news when the righteous do well and bad news when the wicked prosper (12, cf. 28; 29:2).

These chapters also refer to torah (law). In general, torah means teaching or instruction; the teaching or instruction of the wise (e.g. 1:8; 13:14) or that of a prophet (e.g. Is. 8:16). But in Pr. 28:4, 7, 9; 29:18, in the context of those moral and theological sayings, Israelites would surely understand torah to refer to the teaching of Moses.

Generally in Proverbs, understanding or discernment are the everyday personal qualities and skills of common sense which the wise seek to teach (e.g. 10:13; 19:25). This would be the natural way to take the references to understanding and knowledge in 28:2, 11, 16, 22; 29:19). In 28:5, however, understanding or discernment is something which depends on seeking God as opposed to being an evil person, and in v 7 the discerning son is not merely the one who obeys his father but the one who keeps torah (cf. 29:7, where ‘have no such concern’ is literally ‘do not understand knowledge’).

The religious and moral understanding of knowledge and discernment in these verses also provides the hearer with a new context for understanding those words elsewhere. Even where they come in what looks at first sight their everyday sense (see 28:2, 11; 29:19) they have spiritual and moral overtones.

It is particularly noteworthy how torah, wickedness, evil, justice, and seeking God come together in 28:4–5 with its picture of the moral world getting turned topsy-turvy when people ignore torah and fail to seek God. Integrity/blamelessness, perverseness, torah, and discernment then come together in vs 6–7, where the specific theme is possessions: riches and poverty in v 6, squandering wealth in v 7 (cf. the REB) and the amassing of excessive profits in v 8. Torah, prayer, uprightness, and blamelessness come together similarly in vs 9–10, and sin, confession, mercy, awe and hardening the heart in vs 13–14 (though there is no actual reference to God there, the LORD in the NIV being an addition—cf. the NRSV).

Note. 17 Tormented comes from the same verb as tyrannical in v 16; it thus suggests that the tormentor is in due course tormented.

28:19–27 Prosperity. Hard work is the key to prosperity (19). But the quest for prosperity—or even survival—which operates selfishly and brooks no compromises is wrong, blind, and futile (20–24). As in vs 1–18, a comment from a religious perspective then throws this wise teaching in a new context (25): the quest for prosperity is also inclined to divide one from other people; and paying that price is doubly stupid because the key to whether one reaches prosperity is one's trust in God. People who trust in themselves instead are likewise doubly stupid (26). Paradoxically, giving is the key to having, in more than one sense (27). Wrong/sin, trust, God, folly, and wisdom thus strikingly come together once more in vs 24–26. Wisdom here has overtones again of the spiritual and moral. Wisdom and trust in God are set alongside each other, both being the opposite of trust in oneself.

28:28–29:27 Power and righteousness. Once more the nature and fruit of righteousness and wickedness are expounded, particularly their effect on community life and its leadership. It is in society's best interest for the righteous rather than the wicked to flourish and hold power in the community (28:28; 29:2); actually it is also in the interest of the wicked (1). For rulers to rule with justice is the means of the country's stability (4), and of the stability of their own rule (14). The influence of arrogant know-alls on the community is likely to be an increase in tension rather than in harmony (8–9), and once a ruler is known to place no premium on truth he will find that his subordinates are quite willing to operate his way (12). He needs to be aware that exaltation and lowliness can easily be reversed (23). Leaders in particular are thus to be concerned for the needy (7). Such righteousness is allied with wisdom and brings joy (3, 5, 15), knows the meaning of self-control (11), is prepared to discipline (17, 19, 21) and loathes wrongdoing (27).

Leaders will oppose the wickedness which cares nothing for the needy (7) and both detests and actively attacks the upright (10, 27), which gives full vent to thoughts and feelings (11, 20, 22), and which often masks itself in flattery (5) but pays its own price (6, 16, 24).

Like other aspects of wisdom and morality, the wisdom and morality of leadership and community life are also here set in the context of faith. The reminder that God is creator of both poor and oppressor is reassurance to the one and challenge to the other (13) and theologically underlies the promise to the king that fairness to the poor will contribute to the stability of his throne (14).

The stability of society itself depends on openness to revelation and responsiveness to torah (18). Revelation is a term for a prophet's teaching on God's will and purpose (cf. Is. 1:1). Presumably Where there is no revelation means 'where God's revelation is ignored' (the mere existence of revelation, of course, does not prevent the people casting off restraint, as the prophets' ministry shows). This saying, unique in the Wisdom books, brings together the Torah and the Prophets as the key to the blessing and order of the community (in v 18b it makes best sense to take the people as the subject of the verb as it is in v 18a—i.e. 'it is blessed when it keeps torah').

That comment encourages us to read the understanding of v 19 as a spiritual discernment (see on 28:1–18). The close of the verse indicates that this spiritual discernment is not actually there. (He will not respond is literally 'there is no response', so that the phrase closes off vs 18–19 in a way which balances there is no revelation.) The temptation is to make people such as rulers the object of our fear and trust and our resource for action for justice, but God is the true object of these attitudes and the final resource of this blessing (26–27).

Notes. 3 Brings joy is a form of the verb 'rejoice' which appeared in v 2—placed here, the saying suggests how wisdom, like righteousness, can be a cause of rejoicing to people. 24 The accomplice cannot come forward and testify, and therefore bears the guilt which attaches to the offence (cf. Lv. 5:1).

30:1–33 Sayings of Agur

30:1–9 Introduction. We know nothing of Agur, Jakeh, Ithiel, or Ucal (1), and they may well be of foreign origin (cf. 31:1 and comment). But this mystery sets the right tone for the mystery Agur wishes to confess (2–4). We have noted that often Proverbs can seem to be teaching rather over-confident generalizations about how life works and how God works, whereas both are more mysterious than the generalizations suggest. Here Proverbs knows that well. Vs 2–3 might seem to suggest that the problem lies in Agur’s lack of intelligence; v 4 makes clear the irony of his opening statement. He is simply the only one who openly acknowledges ignorance because of the inherent mystery of the things of God.

Yet there is a further irony; v 1 has already described his sayings as an oracle, a standard term for a prophetic word from God (cf. e.g. Is. 13:1; though the margin notes that the word oracle could be understood as the name of the Arabian country Massa mentioned in Gn. 25:14). The irony continues in vs 5–6. Although Agur has suggested that neither he nor anyone else has brought knowledge from heaven to earth, he also implies that there are words from God, which as such are refined and reliable, and demand acceptance without meddling.

The introduction concludes with Agur’s prayer to be kept from falsehood, but also more strikingly from extremes of wealth and poverty, because he sees the snag of both. He reminds us that when Proverbs speaks of the wealthy and the poor, as it often does, it is not referring to two groups which between them include everyone. Most people belong in between, and this is where Agur wishes to be. His solemn acknowledgment of the mystery of life and of God (note that he uses the Israelite name for God, Yahweh), is like that of Ecclesiastes (see Ec. 7:16–18).

30:10–17 Self-assertiveness. Three units relate to each other here. Cursing is the verbal link between the saying in v 10 and the longer unit vs 11–14. The former warns against interfering in other people’s affairs in a way that may rebound; he might be master or servant. Then in vs 11–14 each verse describes a group of people whose arrogant self-assertiveness is disapproved of. Such lists often come to a climax at the end, and v 14 is twice as long as the other verses. At its climax, then, the unit also links back to vs 7–9 with its theme of poverty—though its actual words for poor and needy are different from those in vs 7–9. V 15a follows on from that, in that the leech with its suckers seems to be a figure for a grasping instinct on the part of human beings, and vs 15b–16 continue that theme. V 17 takes us back to where we started in v 10.

30:18–33 Things that come in fours. The ‘three or four’ sayings in vs 15b–16 leads into several sayings of comparable form (see on 6:16–19) in vs 18–33. The climax of the first (18–19) again lies in the last item in its list: the way a man may get his way with a woman shares the mystery of the three things described in vs 18–19a. The saying in v 20 is an independent one, added to it quite appropriately in the light of its subject, as it puts the matter the other way round.

In the second and third numerical sayings (21–23; 24–28) there is no working to a climax. Four people are described; all enjoy unexpected success; all can be equally tiresome. There is some humour about this saying, as there is about some others in the chapter. V 23a probably refers to a woman who seemed to be ‘on the shelf’ but then catches a man; v 23b perhaps refers to a servant who has a baby when her mistress is infertile. Then four animals are described; all achieve great things despite their limitations, thus all show great wisdom. Human beings should learn from them.

The fourth saying does come to a climax. Its animal pictures, too, are there to illustrate a human reality, the stately power of the king, which becomes explicit at the end. There is perhaps some irony in comparing the king not only to a lion but to a cock and a he-goat; the king is being gently put in his place. But at least his status belongs to him; vs 32–33 follows as a warning against exalting ourselves to a stateliness which does not belong to us at all. Churning, twisting, and stirring up are all the same word in Hebrew.

31:1–31 Sayings of King Lemuel

31:1 Introduction. As with Agur, we know nothing of King Lemuel beyond his name, though if he is a king, he is not an Israelite one. Like Agur's, his words demand to be treated as a prophetic oracle.

31:2–9 Three exhortations. Lemuel's mother urges her son to avoid other women (2–3), though in a style quite different from ch. 1–9. Her vows were presumably promises made to God in connection with his birth (cf. 1 Sa. 1:11, 27–28). Lemuel is also to leave strong drink to people who need to drown their sorrows, because in his case it may make him neglect his royal obligation to the oppressed (4–7). That leads into a clear call to this royal responsibility (8–9).

31:10–31 The complete woman. Vs 10–31 are often treated as separate from the sayings of Lemuel. But every other independent unit in Proverbs has its own heading, and the absence of such a heading in v 10 suggests that this section should be seen as part of the sayings of Lemuel. The fact that Lemuel's sayings came from his mother (1) suggests that this last section of the book is a woman's description of a woman's role. It comprises an acrostic of twenty-two verses beginning with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, a poetic form which suggests a complete exploration of its subject. The sequence of the statements in the portrait is then formal rather than logical.

'The truly capable woman' (NJB) is a better rendering of the opening phrase. It portrays her exercising responsibility for the provision of food and clothing for the household, and also being involved in managing financial and business affairs outside the house itself. She also cares for the needy, and fulfils a wise teaching ministry. This element in the portrait suggests that, as an authoritative teacher at the end of Proverbs (like Lemuel's mother in v 1), she parallels Ms Wisdom in the opening chapters (cf. corresponding expressions in 3:13–18; 9:1–6). Woman's teaching role in the book alongside man's (e.g. 1:8; 6:20) fulfils part of the vision in Gn. 1–2 of man and woman together representing the image of God and called to exercise authority in the world on God's behalf, and invites men and women to seek to realize this vision in the world.

Lemuel's mother (who as the queen-mother might exercise very significant political power) encourages the complete woman to make the most of and to push the boundaries of what a woman's role might mean in a patriarchal society. Men generally need little encouragement to make their mark and achieve; women can be tempted to settle for the demure role in life, which has often been all that such society expects of them, and thus fail to realize their God-given potential for making their own mark. There are, of course, other aspects to Scripture's vision of womanhood (such as those in the Song of Songs), but this encouragement to womanhood to achieve is an important aspect of that vision as a whole.

The capable woman wins the respect and honour of her husband and children and those of the wider community, not least because her own commitment to God underlies this productive life of hers (30).

ECCLESIASTES

Introduction

Pessimism versus faith

Within the Wisdom Literature of the ancient Near East there was a style of writing which we may call 'pessimism literature'. In the Bible Ecclesiastes is its only example, but the tradition goes back at least to 2000 BC in both Egypt and Mesopotamia.

Yet Ecclesiastes is 'pessimism' with a difference. For other 'pessimist' writings were bleak, sensual and unrelieved by any note of hope. In the Dialogue of Pessimism (a Babylonian work of the fourteenth century BC) suicide is the only answer to the problem of life. In the Epic of Gilgamesh the god Shamash states bluntly 'The life you pursue you shall not find'. Although Ecclesiastes echoes ancient pessimism, it has another strand which is in marked contrast. For it also holds forth the possibility of joy, faith and assurance of God's goodness.

Ecclesiastes is an edited work. In 1:2, 7:27 and 12:8 the words 'says the Teacher' occur in the middle of proverbial sayings. In 12:9–14 a description is given; clearly one person is presenting the teaching of another. 'Teacher' represents the Hebrew word Qoheleth, which is an artificial name (although quite ordinary in its structure). It has a meaning, roughly 'Mr Teacher'. The verbal root means 'to assemble' and is used elsewhere of assembling a meeting to address it (see the NIV mg., which gives an alternative, 'leader of the assembly'). It has the 'feel' of the paraphrase 'Mr Teacher the king!'. Who then is this 'Mr Teacher'? 1:1 and the descriptions in chs. 1 and 2 clearly refer to Solomon (although 'son of David, king of Israel in Jerusalem' could refer to any king in the line of David). Yet the name 'Solomon' is avoided. There is no claim to Solomonic origin as there is in Song 1:1 and Pr. 1:1. The editor is presenting royal teaching in the tradition started by Solomon, yet he holds back from claiming that he is presenting the very words of Solomon. The tradition then is Solomonic, but the editorial work is later.

What is the date of the editorial work? Three lines of approach have been pursued in answering this question, two of them fruitlessly. The first looks for historical references within the book itself. Identifications of the events in 4:13–16 and 9:13–16 have been attempted but not satisfactorily. The second suggests that Ecclesiastes depends on Greek thought and, therefore, derives from the Greek epoch (i.e. third century BC or later). Nothing can be asserted along these lines. No explicit citations of Greek thought are found. Pessimism goes back to centuries before any possible date for Ecclesiastes. Greek scepticism itself may owe something to the Mesopotamian world. The third approach, and the one that holds out most hope for dating Ecclesiastes, is the study of its language. Yet even this is difficult. It is not written in precisely the same Hebrew as any other part of the OT. It uses two Persian words which suggests that our edition of Ecclesiastes dates from the time after the rise of Persian rule in Israel (sixth century BC). Yet it also has a few traits which could be early. Mention of the temple (5:1) excludes the period when there was no temple (586–516 BC). Tentatively we may suggest that Ecclesiastes dates from the fifth century BC, but more statistically thorough studies of the language may provide evidence of an earlier date. Or it could be that further study of the language will provide convincing evidence of both early and late features (and therefore suggest that it is an early work which was subsequently updated). Along these lines progress may be made but no consensus has yet been reached.

Purpose and abiding message

There are three features of Ecclesiastes that are worth mentioning: (i) It makes use of a division of reality into two realms, the heavenly and the earthly, referring to what is ‘under the sun’ or ‘under heaven’ and what is ‘on earth’, e.g. ‘God is in heaven and you are on earth’ (5:2). (ii) It distinguishes between observation and faith. The Teacher says ‘I have seen under the sun ...’ (1:14) but goes on to say ‘but I came to realise ...’ (2:14). When he uses the verb ‘see’ he points to life’s hardships. When he calls to joy it is not in connection with seeing but it is what he believes about God despite what he sees. (iii) It brings us to face the grimness of life and yet constantly urges us to faith and joy.

What then is the purpose and abiding message of Ecclesiastes?

It is a reply to the unrelieved pessimism of much ancient thought. Yet at the same time it does not envisage a superficial ‘faith’ which does not take adequate account of the fallenness of the world. It is thus both an evangelistic tract, calling secular people to face the implications of their secularism, and a call to realism, summoning faithful Israelites to take seriously the ‘futility’, the ‘enigma’ of life in this world. It forbids both secularism (living as though the existence of God has no practical usefulness for life in this world) and unrealistic optimism (expecting faith to cancel out life as it really is). Negatively, it warns us that ‘faith’ is always a contrast to ‘sight’ and does not provide us with a short cut fully to understand the ways of God. Positively, it calls us to a life of faith and joy. Summarizing Ecclesiastes, J. S. Wright (Ecclesiastes, The Expositor’s Bible Commentary, vol. 5 [Zondervan, 1992]) used to say ‘God holds the key to all unknown—but he will not give it to you. Since you do not have the key you must trust Him to open the doors’.

Place in the canon

From as far back as any one can trace, Ecclesiastes has been ‘canonical’ (i.e. authoritative in the community of believers). Although there was a dispute among the rabbis at Jamnia in AD 100 as to why it was authoritative, it was agreed that it was authoritative. The presence of Ecclesiastes manuscripts at Qumran shows it was viewed similarly even earlier.

Structure

A line of argument can be traced in chs. 1–3. In chs. 4–10 the sections are more loosely linked; groupings of proverbs can be found, but any more rigid logic or reason for the order of the sections cannot be traced. Chs. 11–12 are distinctive in that they carry a note of sustained exhortation.

Commentary

1:1–3:22 The quest

After the title (1:1) the problem of life is explored (1:2–2:23). This ends in a picture of failure and despair (2:23). Then comes a turning point. In 2:24–3:22 the facts of life are no different, but the writer brings the goodness of God into the picture. The result is a more contented (but not more problem-free) outlook.

1:1 Title

The Hebrew of Teacher is Qohelet, which is a Hebrew participle. It has a meaning (like the English name Baker). See the Introduction.

1:2–2:23 The pessimist's problems

1:2–11 Some basic facts. 2 Meaningless translates a word which includes ideas of brevity, unreliability, frailty and futility, lack of discernible purpose. 3 Real progress cannot be found. Gain is a term used in ancient commerce. It refers to substantial achievement, observable evidence that something worthwhile has been done. Labour and toil may refer to physical effort (see 2:4–8; Ps. 127:1) or to mental and emotional heaviness (see 2:23; Ps. 25:18). Mr Teacher refers to what he observes under the sun. In view of its frequency and the sharp distinction made in 5:2 the phrase must be significant. It is attested in various ancient cultures and refers to the earthly realm as opposed to 'heaven', where God supremely reveals himself. The phrases 'on earth', 'under heaven' and 'under the sun' are synonymous. See further in the Introduction. Mr Teacher explicitly confines his outlook for the moment to the limited resources of the world he surveys. 4 The succession of generations does not change humankind's basic situation. The problem of 'meaninglessness' is embodied in the entire world. Rom. 8:20 is making precisely this point and perhaps is an allusion to Ecclesiastes (Paul's Greek word is the word in the Greek version of Ec. 1:2). 5–7 Nature shows no progress. It is busy in sky (5) and land (6) and sea (7) but its busyness brings about no change in people's fundamental situation. 8 Wearisome carries the thought of 'exhausted'. It implies that nature's activity leaves it depleted or that human beings are exhausted by it. 9–10 We come to history. Circumstances (what has been) and human activity (what has been done) repeat themselves. 11 Remembrance may refer here to action arising from memory. Our present life does not arise from what we have learned from the past. People do not learn from previous generations.

1:12–18 The failure of wisdom. In the light of the problems presented in 1:2–11, is wisdom the solution to the lack of 'gain' (1:2) in life? 12 It is Solomon's traditional wisdom he is presenting. 13a Study and explore speak of thoroughness and extensiveness. Under heaven lets us know a limited area is being considered. 13b–15 Three conclusions follow. (i) The quest for purpose is a God-appointed matter. Burden has the sense of 'compulsory activity'. (ii) Frustration results. Chasing after the wind refers to striving for the unattainable. Human beings 'under the sun' cannot solve their problem. (iii) There are insoluble twists and gaps in life. What is twisted refers to both human life (see 1:3–4a) and environment (see 1:4b). The source of the twistedness is suggested in 7:13, 29 but is unmentioned here. Life and circumstances have 'gaps', leaps of logic or gaps in data which leave life an enigma. In 16–18 the phrase and also of madness and folly shows that the Teacher kept the alternative to wisdom in mind. This anticipates 2:1–11. His conclusion is that the attempt to solve the problem of life enlarges one's view of the problem but does not bring any solution. Further insight into a solution was to await the advent of Christ.

2:1–11 The failure of pleasure-seeking. Having shown the failure of wisdom, Mr Teacher shows the failure of its opposite. We see his resolve (1a), his conclusion (1b–2), his detailed account (3–10) and a repeated conclusion (11).

Laughter (2) tends to be used of superficial fun; pleasure (in its general usage) is more thoughtful. All kinds of pleasure fail to answer the Teacher's problem. Foolish is a word associated with loss of judgment. The unanswered question What does pleasure accomplish? lets us know that even lofty joys cannot solve life's enigma.

Vs 3–10 lists the Teacher's endeavours. Every kind of relaxation and pleasure was involved. Slaves, herds and flocks indicate great wealth. A difficult word in v 8 probably means 'concubine' (NIV, harem). V 9 tells us of his prestige and his retaining his objectivity (which is the point of the last phrase). Nothing outward (visible to eyes; 10) or inward (things in which the heart takes pleasure) was withheld. The result was a sense of achievement (10b) but nothing more.

His final conclusion (11) is no different from that of his exploration of wisdom (cf. 2:11 with 1:17–18). The pile-up of terms (meaningless, chasing the wind, nothing ... good) indicates his bitter disappointment.

2:12–23 A sure fate for all. After the problem of life (1:2–11) and two unsuccessful remedies (1:12–18; 2:1–11), a question is left: is there any preference between wisdom and pleasure-seeking? In one respect wisdom is better than pleasure-seeking. In another respect they are equal; neither can deal with the problem of death.

The second half of v 12 lit. 'What kind of person is it who will come after the king, in the matter of what has already been done?' (see M. A. Eaton, Ecclesiastes, TOTC (IVP, 1983), p. 68 for more details). The NIV gives roughly the same thought. The sense is, 'Will future kings be such men as are able to do better than I have done in my quest?'. Future kings will have to face the same problem Mr Teacher has faced; what advice can he give? Wisdom is the need of the king supremely (see 1 Ki. 3:5–28; Pr. 8:14–16). The fool is notorious for his ill-considered babbling and malice; he is one for whom wickedness is 'fun' (see e.g. Pr. 9:13–18).

Verses 13–14a answer the question. Wisdom is of value. Light is a metaphor for understanding, know-how, skill in living. Another angle is in vs 14b–16. The same fate is death, which confronts everyone, wise or foolish (14b). Its inevitability puts both the wise man and the foolish on the same level. Neither can defeat the 'last enemy' (15). The thought of v 16 is like that of 1:16 except that here the individual is in view. Memories are too short to make endeavour worthwhile (see also 9:15).

In vs 17–23 the Teacher considers life under the sun. Death brings wisdom to a halt, which in turn makes life itself seem pointless. 17 To me is a valid translation, but the phrase also means 'upon me' and sometimes expresses what is burdensome (see Is. 1:14). 18 Hatred of life is followed by hatred of toil, a term which sometimes refers to the total struggle for understanding (1:13) but here focuses more on daily activities. 19 Another aggravation is that a man may ruin the work of his predecessor (Rehoboam following Solomon is an example; 1 Ki. 11:41–12:24). 20 An abyss of despair is the end of the Teacher's reflections thus far. The Hebrew may be translated, 'he allowed his heart to despair'. 21 It was an injustice that another should profit from his predecessor's labours. Despite wisdom (practical know-how), knowledge (information) and skill (the success that comes from wisdom and knowledge), there is nothing that can sidestep death or guarantee permanence. Only the gospel gives an answer: 'your labour in the Lord is not in vain' (1 Cor. 15:58). 22 What do toil (work, endeavours) and anxious striving (emotional-intellectual struggles) achieve? The answer is in v 23. Pain and grief may refer to the mental or to the physical. Both aspects must be in view for at night refers to the sleeplessness that may come with the frustration.

2:24–3:22 The alternative to pessimism

God was scarcely involved in 1:2–2:23, being mentioned only in 1:13. Earlier argument referred to the earthly realm (1:3, 13–14; 2:3, 11, 17–20, 22) and only passingly mentioned God as the cause of frustration. But now God is controller of his world, creator of beauty, judge of injustices. Nihilism and despair turn to joy, beauty, God's generosity, security and purpose in life.

2:24–26 The generous God. 24a Human-kind is to enjoy God's good provisions. Eat and drink signify the provision and contentment that is God's will for all. 24b–25 The enjoyable life when we experience it comes from his hand. 26 Three blessings from God are wisdom (skill in living), knowledge (knowledge of facts, understanding, experience) and joy. The sinner is one who does not live to please God; the usage is different at 7:20. The judgment on the sinner is also God-given. Wealth is not explicit in the Hebrew; the Teacher refers to all-embracing acquisitiveness. But possessions only fall into the hand of the righteous. This is not something observed. That the 'sinner's wealth is stored up for the righteous' (Pr. 13:22) can be seen in Canaanites' cities falling into Israelite hands. The Christian's view of eternity makes it easier to understand (for the opposite seems to happen in this life) but for the Teacher it must have been sheer faith. Events like those of Ex. 12:35–36 may have given rise to his conviction.

3:1–8 God's control of time. The function of this section is to call us to a view of God's sovereignty which both reassures and yet sobers the reader. It reassures because of God's control; yet it sobers because God's control remains mysterious. 1 There is purposefulness in life because of God's oversight of its seasons (see Ps. 31:15 'My times are in your hands'). Time means an 'occasion' or 'season'; activity could be translated 'purpose' and pinpoints what one wishes to do. 2–8 God's control of time imposes itself upon us. V 2a deals with the beginning and end of life (and therefore everything in between). Three pairs (2b–3) deal with establishing or destroying activities (the verbs are widely used figuratively). Then come emotions (4), private (weep ... laugh) and public (mourn ... dance). To scatter stones and gather them probably refer to aggression by ruining fields, and to bringing land into cultivation (the reverse of 2 Ki. 3:25; in Is. 62:10 it refers to welcoming a conqueror). The phrases in v 5 refer to enmity and friendship, individual and corporate. Next (6–7a) is reflection on possessions or ambitions, getting or abandoning the quest for what one wants, keeping or getting rid of what one has. Vs. 7b–8 refer to talk (to be silent ... to speak) and relationships, personal (love ... hate) and national (war ... peace).

3:9–15 Contentment and satisfaction. Vs 9–11 are sobering. The question of v 9 reminds us that gain is what is desired but is hard to find. V 10 recalls the divinely imposed quest for meaningfulness. V 11 reminds us of the limit to our understanding. Vs 12–15 are more reassuring and divide into two sections (11–13, 14–15) beginning with I know.

In v 9 the question of 1:3 is again asked (but the phrase 'under the sun' is missing). Again (10, repeating 1:13b) the quest for meaningfulness is said to be laid on men (i.e. appointed). But now the viewpoint is different. 11 God's disposal of times is beautiful, a source of delight. Eternity in the hearts refers to the capacity for something larger and greater than the succession of times that are so uncontrollable. (Time and 'purpose'/activity in v 1 form a contrast to eternity here). Human beings have a capacity for ‘eternal’ things, something that transcends the immediate situation. This does not bring comprehension of God and his ways; one still cannot understand from beginning to end.

The God-given life is our privilege (12–13) and also God’s purpose, upheld by him or (on another view) judged by him. 12 The Teacher recommends contentment. Do good does not have its common meaning; it is to practise a happy life. ‘Enjoy good’ expresses the thought. 13 Provision and contentment are gifts of God. 14 Security is not to be found in the earthly realm itself, which is subject to vanity (1:2, 4). God’s action exhibits permanence and effectiveness. This leads to fear, awe-inspired regard for God and his ways (see 5:7; 12:13). The vocabulary of v 15 was used in 1:9–11, but now it reflects an optimistic outlook. The past is repeated; the present will be repeated. The picture is one of stability, but (unlike 1:2–11) what we have is not pessimism; God is present to ensure the continuity of the movement of the world. The NIV of v. 15b means that God is a judge who oversees the movement of the epochs of time, and will one day call the past to account. Another translation is that God ‘seeks what is hurrying along’, i.e. God cares for the world, which hurries round its circuits (see Eaton, Ecclesiastes, p. 83).

3:16–22 The judgment of God. If God is the controller that 3:1–15 suggests one is led naturally to think about the injustices of the world. We have an observation, two comments, and a conclusion (16, 17, 18–21, 22). V 16 states the problem: injustices. 17 Injustices are considered in the light of a future (will), divine (God will) event or period of judgment (will bring to judgment). All people will be involved (righteous and the wicked). The judgment assesses inner purpose (the AV’s ‘purpose’ catches the thought) and deeds. Vs 18–21 make a second observation. The main points are that God uses injustices to show that without him human beings are like animals (18); animals and humans are alike in the fact of their dying (19–20); few appreciate any difference between people and animals in what is after death (21). V 22 is the conclusion; the remedy to life’s enigma is to live on God’s goodness.

4:1–10:20 Facing reality

There is grouping in the proverbs of this section. We see life’s hardships and perplexities, the companionship it demands but the isolation it exhibits, poverty and wealth, human adversities, the limits of wisdom and the impact of foolishness. Each is problematic, yet the Teacher insists that God is present and that faith in him is supremely worthwhile. Life for the Christian is often problematic too and the words of the Teacher are of more than anti-quarian interest.

4:1–5:7 Life’s hardships and life’s companions

We have five units (4:1–3, 4–6, 7–8, 9–12, 13–16) each of which relates in some way to isolation, lack of companionship or lack of human assistance (no comforter, 1; rivalry destroying human relationships, 4; a man all alone, 8; two better than one, 9–12; kings who become isolated, 13–16). 5:1–7 itself seems somewhat isolated; it restates the reality of God.

4:1–3 Oppression without comfort. Oppression is a fact (I saw, 1), part of the grimness of this world (under the sun, 1), embittering in that oppressors have power. No solution is suggested (although 2:26 and 3:22 have given a hint). The implicit question is, how shall we face reality?

4:4–6 Envy and its alternatives. If oppression damages relationships (1–3), so more subtly does envy (4–6). Much effort is motivated by the desire to outclass others. V 5 is the opposite of v 4. If rivalry disgusts, the opposite danger is withdrawal from life altogether. But this is to destroy one's life. Contentment (6) is better than rivalry (4) or laziness (5). One handful expresses a limited amount, two handfuls more than can be easily handled. The first case leads to tranquillity; the second to failure and frustration (chasing the wind).

4:7–8 What does one live for? A man is without family or friends, yet is successful and rich. He raises the question of v 8, but no answer is given and the question is left hanging; it is part of life's frustration.

4:9–12 The need for companionship. V 9 makes the point; vs 10–12a give illustrations; v 12b restates the matter. Pits (10), cold nights (11) and bandits (12a) faced the ancient traveller, suggesting the need of companionship in times of accident (10), inadequacy (11) and adversity (12a). The increase of number from two (9, 12a) to three is significant: the more friends the better.

4:13–16 An isolated leader. Some ambiguous pronouns in v 14 mean that this passage can be read in several ways. The NIV is probably correct. The elderly king of v 13 was wise once (as no longer suggests) but lost his wisdom. The word for poor refers to humble origins. Youth ranges in age from teens to forties. In v 14 his refers to the king. A young man arises; he had everything against him but the king became isolated (implied in v 15). The isolation of the older man led to the success of the younger. The younger man was successful for a while (15). In v 16 before them means 'were their subjects'. For the younger man also popularity was not lasting. He repeated the cycle. Two main points that are true universally arise from the story: that isolation is part of the painfulness of human experience, and that the new generation did not solve the problem of the older generation (see 1:9–11).

5:1–7 The approach to God. If one is right in seeing the theme of companionship in 4:1–16, the matter is abruptly dropped with no real solution suggested. We are instead faced with God. 4:1–16 would raise the question in the mind of any reader, is not God the answer? But he must be approached in the right way.

House of God (1) is the temple, the structure of which pointed to God's holiness and inaccessibility except by sacrifice. The fool is unaware of his offensiveness to God in the way he approaches him. 2 Hastiness in prayer fails to see the greatness of the difference between God and human beings. Heaven is the location of God's glory; the worshipper must remember he does not approach God as an equal.

3 Responsibilities have side effects. As they produce disturbed sleep they may also lead to a flood of ill-considered words. 4–5 The vow (an accompaniment to petition or a spontaneous expression of gratitude) might consist of a promise of allegiance, a free-will offering, or the dedication of a child. To make a right vow but not keep it offends God. The messenger (6) would be a priest or someone sent by a priest. The dreaming (7) must mean something like day-dreaming, casualness, unreality in approaching God. This and the flood of careless words in prayer are both marks of the meaningless (frustrated, awry) world. Fear of God is the remedy (see 3:14; 12:13).

5:8–6:12 Poverty and wealth

We have here the poor (5:8), money (5:10), the increase of 'good things' (5:11), the rich man (5:12), 'riches' (5:13–14), 'riches and wealth' (5:19; 6:2) and the poor man (6:8).

5:8–9 The poor under oppressive bureaucracy. The Teacher considers the frustrations of oppressive bureaucracy with its delays and excuses. The poor cannot afford to wait, and justice is lost between the tiers of the hierarchy. No remedy is offered; this is what human nature is like.

8 The NIV's one official is eyed by a higher one could be taken as though one official was suspicious of another (see the verb in 1 Sa. 19:11). The GNB's 'Every official is protected by the one over him' fits the context better. The last phrase refers not to God or the king but to many tiers of authority.

V 9 has been interpreted in many ways. If the NIV is followed the thought is: despite bureaucratic hold-ups a stable land is worth having; even the king needs it. Another possible translation is: 'but an advantage to a land for everyone is: a king over cultivated land'. Bureaucratic oppression does not override the value of stability in society.

5:10–12 Money and its drawbacks. Limits to the value of money are: it cannot satisfy the covetous (10), it attracts a circle of dependants (11) and it disturbs one's peace (12). Money and wealth (10) are silver as a means of exchange and wealth in the form of goods; abundance (12) could refer to wealth or physique (NASV has full stomach).

5:13–17 Wealth—loved and lost. We pass to those who had wealth and lost it. We see wealth acquired (13) and lost (14a). The rich man could not pass anything on (14b) or take anything with him (15).

16–17 The ease with which wealth can slip through one's fingers is part of the frustration of life (16a); at the last a person takes quite exactly (the Hebrew is emphatic) what he brought—nothing.

5:18–20 Remedy recalled. When the Teacher's presentation of the grimness of life gets overwhelming, he reminds us of 1:2–3:22. He is concerned about having a confident outlook and a contented spirit, with which to face the grimness of life. Here he recalls that there is an approach to life, in which life is enjoyable in toil, not by dispensing with it. To eat and drink is expressive of companionship, joy and satisfaction, including spiritual joys (see Dt. 14:26). 19 Wealth may lead to misery (see v 14), but if it is part of the contented life, taken from God, it may be positively appreciated after all. V 20 is a striking contrast to the drudgery of 2:23, a proof that the Teacher is weighing two approaches to life. The Hebrew of keep him occupied is related to the term 'business' that we have had earlier. There is a 'business' that frustrates; but the 'business' of taking life from the hand of God is also preoccupying for those who view life that way.

6:1–6 Wealth and its insecurity. Wealth does not guarantee its own enjoyment (1–2). A man may live in his prime with a flourishing family but die unsatisfied and unmourned (3). Better never to have lived than to have lived a discontented life (4–6a). Death is inevitable (6).

6:7–9 Insatiable longing. A person's labour is not for sheer pleasure but to earn a living with the hope of finding satisfaction in life. But 'the longing is not satisfied' (better than appetite; the reference is to more than the physical). 8 Two questions expect a negative answer. Neither wisdom nor the poor person's ingratiating himself improve his lot. V 9 could be advisory, and be urging contentment. But in the light of 9b, the thought is probably that the poor, though there may be plenty to see, only experience a roving desire which adds to frustration.

6:10–12 An impasse. 'Name' speaks of character. The world (whatever exists), man and God (one who is stronger than he) all have settled characters. The problem stated in 1:2–3 will not go away. 12 What is needed is something that will be adequate for every day (the few ... days he passes) but which will be lifelong (a man in life), something which can cope with the enigma of life (meaningless days) and which gives experience and values that are worthwhile (what is good). The two questions imply that the generality of people do not discover such a remedy, and others cannot easily help. Few have an answer now; no practical certainty exists for the future. The section has reached an impasse. Only 5:18–20 has given any help.

7:1–8:1 Suffering and sin

In this section we first have the possible instructiveness of suffering (1–6), then its dangers (7–10). Wisdom is indispensable (11–12); life is under the hand of God (13–14). The second half moves from the crookedness of life (13) to the crookedness of humankind (29). Basic questions concerning the origin, universality, and perverseness of evil are posed in a mixture of factual statement and of encouragement to action.

7:1–6 Instructive suffering. Two comparisons are put alongside each other (1), and could be translated ‘As a good name is better ... so the day of death is better ...’. As inner character is more crucial than outer fragrance, so the lessons derived from a funeral are more instructive than the lessons of a birthday party. The funeral may bring us to think about life but the party probably will not. In this sense sorrow is good for the heart (3), i.e. enables our innermost thoughts to make true evaluations. V 4a means that the wise man learns something from the inevitability of death, but (4b) the fool is blind to spiritual issues and gets more preoccupied with festivity. 6. The fools’ laughter is a sudden flame, a display of sparks, but is soon spent and easily put out.

7:7–10 Four dangers. Four obstacles to wisdom are: corruption (7), impatience (8), bitterness (9) and nostalgia (10). End (8) has the sense of ‘outcome’ (as in Pr. 14:12). A time of testing has an end-product. Lap or ‘bosom’ (9) refers to what is innermost. If tolerated, resentment makes its home in the personality.

7:11–12 The need of wisdom. In Israel inheritance referred mainly to the land. Here the idea is spiritualized. Wisdom also, like the land, belongs to God but is given to his people. Like wealth, wisdom has protective power, but at a deeper level.

7:13–14 Life under God. V 13 echoes 1:15. The basic twistedness in our experience of life is not ‘fate’ but is God-ordained. 14 Both good times and bad times are purposeful. The one is to lead to joy; the other to a realization that life is ‘subject to vanity’ (Rom. 8:20). The fluctuating seasons of life keep us dependent on God. We are not in heaven yet.

7:15–18 Perils along the way. Meaningless life (15) is life dominated by the problems mentioned in 1:2–11. Naboth (1 Ki. 21:13) and Jezebel (1 Ki. 18–19, 21) illustrate the point of v 15. Faced with injustice, one tends to move to either self-righteousness (the point of v 16, which could be translated ‘play the righteous person’) or capitulation to sin (17). The final line of v 17 could be translated ‘shall escape them both’ and refer back to vs 15–16.

7:19–22 The need for wisdom. A call for wisdom is now appropriate. Wisdom may be greater than the collective opinions of experienced leaders (19). It is needed in the light of human sinfulness (20), which is seen especially in talk (21). One should not pay much attention to the vindictiveness of others. V 22 reminds us that our own experience ought to make us realize its frequent inaccuracy.

7:23–24 Wisdom’s inaccessibility. Wisdom might be needed (19–22), but it is hard to find. V 24 looks back to the question of 1:12–18. Who can discover? is a rhetorical question. The answer is, generally speaking, no-one.

7:25–29 The sinfulness of humankind. Realization of the limits of our grasp of wisdom drives us to consider further the character of humankind and of reality (25). The scheme of things (25, 27) is a mathematical phrase, ‘the sum total’. The Teacher has conclusions about women

(26, 28) and about men (29). One kind of woman he dreads (26). Her personality (heart) has the instincts of a hunter. She is forceful in her attentions (hands as chains). Escape is not given to all but is a gift of God (see 2:26). V 28 is not a generalized statement; it focuses only on the matter of wisdom (like 1 Tim 2:14; Tit. 2:2–6), and only on a certain kind of woman. The word upright is not in the Hebrew. One should compare 9:9 for another viewpoint. V 29 presents a conclusion about the entire human race, led—almost exclusively in the Teacher’s day—by men. This only lets us know there is a single point which is the source of the calamities of humankind. The race was created not neutral but upright. Despite an original righteousness, sin has come in. It is perverse (schemes speaks of a contrivance for overcoming what would be otherwise expected), deliberate and universal (men refers to all people).

8:1 Who is wise? This verse continues the theme of ch. 7. Where is anyone who will find the solution to the enigmas of life? The bright face refers to gracious demeanour (cf. Dt. 28:50; Dn. 8:23).

8:2–9:10 Authority and injustice

After the realities of authority (2–9), the injustices (10–15) and perplexities (16–17) of life, and the final monstrosity (9:1–6), the Teacher puts forward a platform on which to stand amidst perplexity (9:7–10).

8:2–9 Royal authority. The king’s subjects take an oath of loyalty; God witnessed and sanctioned it. 3–4 The Teacher warns against deserting one’s post. Haste to leave the king’s presence would indicate disaffection or disloyalty (see the phrase in Ho. 11:2). Stand up for could also mean ‘persist in’. The king’s power ought to be taken seriously. 5 Living under an autocratic regime involves watching for God-given opportunities (the wording recalls 3:1–8) and following proper procedure. Jonathan, Nathan and Esther are examples (1 Sa. 19:4–6; 2 Sa. 12:1–14; Est. 7:2–4). 6–7 Misery is the frustration and perplexity that is the theme of Ecclesiastes, intensified by people’s ignorance of the future. In v 8 four limitations to all authority are mentioned. First, no-one can imprison anyone’s spirit (the NIV mg. fits the context). Secondly, death is within God’s control. Thirdly, no-one is discharged in time of war would seem to speak of the extent of the king’s power. But the Hebrew could be translated ‘this war’ and follow from the second point. In the conflict of death no authority is able to rescue. War is a metaphor for the struggles of the approach of death. Fourthly, no measure, however ruthless, will deliver in this respect. The NIV links the third and fourth of these (As ... so), but the phrases could be taken distinctly. In situations where law and order and the constraint of governments appear to be breaking down this call to ‘obey the king’ is more than ever appropriate.

8:9–11 Life’s injustices. Again the Teacher claims observation (I saw), evaluation (I applied my mind), breadth of view (All this ... everything) but with one limit (under the sun). Burial was part of honourable treatment in Israel; honour coming to the wicked is anomalous. Their being at ease (come and go) and the praise that came to them seems unjust. Recent examples will spring easily to mind. 11 The delay of judgment is misunderstood. God’s inactivity seems to be indifference rather than longsuffering.

8:12–13 The answer of faith. The wicked person’s sin might be great (a hundred crimes) and his life long, but the viewpoint of faith says I know. (The I saw of v 9 puts forward what all can see; the I know of v 12 is a viewpoint not appreciated by everyone.) From one angle the wicked man lives a long time (12), yet the wicked person will not lengthen his days like a shadow. The contradiction hints that wickedness will not flourish beyond the grave, whereas the righteous will in some way flourish after death.

8:14 The problem restated; remedy recalled. Sometimes deed and retribution are totally inappropriate. If v 14 intensifies the problem, v 15 recalls 2:23–24 and 5:18–20, the Teacher’s remedy, which is to accept the gifts that God gives us and place ourselves in his hands.

8:16–9:1 The enigma of life. The enigma of life gives restless days and nights (16; see also 2:23). So (17) we must be content not to know everything. Hard work, diligence, accumulated wisdom, all fail to find the answer. The point of the last part of v 1 is that no-one knows ahead of time what kind of treatment he will receive. (The treatment referred to is at the hands of fellow human beings, not at the hand of God.)

9:2–3 The same treatment for all. The righteous are not necessarily favoured above the wicked, either in life or in the fact of dying. The words who are afraid to take could be translated ‘who avoid taking’ and refer to those who avoid the taking of oaths of allegiance to God. The usage elsewhere of the word madness suggests a lifestyle that is wild and unprincipled.

9:4–6 Where there’s life there’s hope. This life is crucial, and death introduces a decisive change. That the dead know nothing recalls similar statements in Jb. 14:21–22 and 2 Ki. 22:20. It is not asserting that the dead are asleep, but that the dead have no contact with this world. Also men and women of this world soon forget the departed. This life is the place where reward is reaped. V 6 mentions some earthly experiences that will cease.

9:7–10 The remedy of faith. What had before been advice (2:24–26; 3:12–13, 22; 5:18–20) is now a call to action. The basis of contentment is God’s favour. Humankind has to receive contentment as God’s gift (cf. 3:13); it is in such a context that God will approve of the person’s activity. Comfortable clothing (white in a hot climate), softened skin (relieved from irritation by oil), the companionship of a wife (9) are among its practical aspects. The marriage referred to is affectionate, life-long, monogamous. 10 Upon the basis of contentment (7), comfort (8), and companionship (9), we throw ourselves into the responsibilities of life. What one’s hand finds refers to what is available and within one’s ability. Life is to be active, energetic, practical. Death is the end of opportunity.

9:11–10:20 Wisdom and folly

In this section each unit connects in some way with the themes of wisdom and folly.

9:11–12 Time and chance. Five accomplishments are listed in v 11, but two factors limit success: time (recalling 3:1–8 and its point that the seasons of life are in the hands of God) and the unexpected event (chance to human viewpoint). The times of frustration or of death (evil times could refer to either) are unexpected but irresistible (as net and snare suggest).

9:13–16 Wisdom unrecognized. The Teacher recalls an incident in which there was a struggle between prestige (powerful king) and insignificance (small city), between strength (huge siegeworks) and weakness (small city). The precise incident is unknown but was similar to the events of Jdg. 9:50–55 and 2 Sa. 20:15–22. The last sentence of v 15 would mean that no-one remembered the poor man after his help was given. However the line could be translated, ‘he could have saved the city by his wisdom’. This fits v 16: the humble circumstances of the poor person count against him and his wisdom is unheeded. But this is not a call for us to abandon wisdom as useless but rather to persevere in its light and leave the outcome to God.

9:17–10:1 Wisdom thwarted. If the poor man is unheard (16), rulers make themselves heard easily (17). The shouts of the powerful may override wisdom. Also, wisdom is easily overthrown (17), for a small mistake makes the smell of folly greater than the fragrance of wisdom (10:1).

10:2–3 Foolishness. The rest of the section considers the invisible side of a person's life, contrasted with face (7:3), hands (7:26) or body (11:10). Since lefthandedness was linked with incompetence (see Jdg. 3:15; 20:16), to have one's heart inclined to the right is to be upright, skilful and resourceful in one's daily life. To have one's heart inclined to the left is to be fumbling and incompetent at the 'wellspring of life' (Pr. 4:23). Such incompetence will become visible (3).

10:4–7 Foolishness in high places. The anger of a ruler must not lead into desertion of one's post (either from panic or bitterness). The advice of v 4a is followed by the reasons that undergird it (4b–7). There may be folly in national leadership (5) and odd reversals of position and prestige that will thwart wisdom (6–7). People with resources (the rich) may lack opportunity; people with opportunity (princes) may lack resources.

10:8–11 Foolishness in action. Vindictiveness has its built-in penalties. The imagery of v 8 may suggest malice (see Je. 18:18–22). More constructive activities (quarrying stones, chopping logs) may also be done incompetently (9) or skill may be overwhelmed by the mishaps of 'time and chance' (9:11). V 10 tells us that thoughtfulness will bring success better than brute strength, but v 11 warns against its opposite: one who is capable of handling a difficult matter (the snake charmer) may fail for lack of promptitude. Slackness may nullify inherent skill.

10:12–15 The fool's word and work. Talk is the test of wisdom. Gracious words will be kindly, appropriate, helpful and attractive. The fool's words consume him, damaging his reputation (see v 3) and the possibility of his doing good. Beginning (13) could have the sense of 'source'. The origin of foolish words is the inherent foolishness of the heart (see v 2). Its end (including the idea of 'outcome', as in 7:8) is wicked madness, an irrationality that is morally perverse. V 14 points to the arrogance of such a person; despite the quantity of his words he has no control of the future. V 15 moves from word to work. Towns are conspicuous but the fool misses the way even to what is obvious. Refusal to accept the wholesome wisdom of God always leaves people without purpose or direction in life.

10:16–20 Folly in national life. The Teacher contrasts, at a national level, the way of disaster (Woe ...; 16) and the way of safety (Blessed ...; 17). The first need is for a mature leader. The was could be 'is'; servant is a word that refers to immaturity. In 1 Ki. 3:7 Solomon considered himself immature, needing God-given wisdom. Of noble birth (Heb. 'son of free men') is one whose position in society gives him the boldness to act without fear. Another need is self-control. Eating and drinking in the early hours of the day suggests self-centred indulgence. While the nation is still in mind (note v 20), v 18 focuses more on the individual in the nation. The sluggishness of the fool brings the judgment of steady decay (18). While laughter, wine and money were not despised by the Teacher, the point of v 19 is that the pleasures of life should not be its total outlook. The emphases of the Hebrew word-order here point to the failure of the slothful life: 'bread' ... wine ... money is the limit of its horizon. V 20 closes with a word of advice (picking up the theme of v 4) and challenges the reader to remain calm in days of national sloth, immaturity or indulgence. 'A little bird told me' (20) (i.e. I heard it rumoured) is a proverb which appears in a variety of cultures, from the ancient Hittites to the later Greeks and onwards.

Everything said about wisdom and folly points us again to 2:24–3:22 and the need to take life day by day from the hand of God.

11:1–12:8 The call to decision

More than other parts of Ecclesiastes, this section is characterized by sustained encouragement to action. The commands come to an impressive and sustained climax in 12:1–7, which is one long sentence. The before ... before ... before (12:1, 2, 6) repeatedly point to the fact of death and the need to act speedily.

11:1–6 The venture of faith

Everything in 11:1–6 could be summarized in the word ‘faith’. Ships might be long delayed, so any business venture that entailed sending one’s goods elsewhere involved considerable trust (1 Ki. 10:22). Bread has the sense of ‘goods, livelihood’ as in Dt. 8:3. 2 The Teacher commends grasping a variety of opportunities. The ascending numerals, seven ... eight, speak of trying every avenue there is and then adding one more. The background may be that of generosity, giving portions to the poor. Or it may continue that imagery of commerce and refer to the many ventures of the businessman. Despite our ignorance of the future, now is the time to act. 3 Neither an ominous outlook (clouds full of rain) nor the unexpected event (a tree falling) must hinder our enthusiasm for life. We cannot control events even when we can anticipate them (the clouds and the rain). Nor can we precisely determine how events will work out; the tree falls where it will. Next is a warning against procrastination (4), and a warning that we are not to be put off by ignorance (5). 6 Then the Teacher calls for vigorous sowing of seed. The proverbs concern not merely agriculture but the whole of life.

11:7–10 The life of joy

The goodness of life is light. To see the sun is to be alive. 8–9 Enjoyment is to be life-long. It involves joys both internal (the ways of your heart) and external (whatever your eyes see). But warnings are added: days of darkness refer apparently to days of calamity and trial; that everything ... is meaningless reminds us that the perplexities of life continue, and its joys only come with effort. There is a future assessment of all human works. The definite article is used (the judgment) referring to a specific future event. The pursuit of joy must keep this in mind. 10 As far as is possible the problems that beset heart and mind are to be resisted.

12:1–8 The urgency of decision

Humankind is to look not only to the life of joy but also to its Maker. V 1b leads into a single sentence (in Hebrew) containing a picturesque description of old age and death. The images have been variously interpreted but a likely approach is as follows. The lessening of light (2a) is the fading capacity for joy. The returning clouds (2b) refer to the succession of perplexities that come as old age approaches. The keepers of the house refer to the arms, the strong men to the legs, the grinders to the teeth, those looking through the windows to the eyes (3). V 4 refers successively to impaired hearing, lessened involvement with the outside world and erratic sleeping. V 5 (briefly leaving aside imagery) refers to fear of heights. The almond tree blossoms refers to the hair turning white. The grasshopper pictures ungainly walking. Desire no longer is stirred means the sexual appetite is weakened. Then death (the eternal home) and mourning follow. V 6 has two pictures of death. In one, a golden bowl is attached to a silver cord; death is the untying of the chain. In a second, a pitcher is lowered down a well. Death is when the wheel breaks, the pitcher crashes, and the waters of life are no longer renewed.

V 7 abandons imagery. Death is the returning of the body to the dust. The spirit (the principle of responsible, intelligent life) has a distinct destiny. The Teacher is pointing to life after death.

12:9–14 Epilogue

The contrast with the people suggests a respected Teacher. Pondered, searched out and set in order refer to thought, study and arrangement. Two characteristics of the Teacher's work (10) are his artistry (right words is more literally 'words of delight') and his integrity (words ... upright and true). Goads and nails refer to the way his teaching stimulates to action and yet is memorable. The Shepherd is God; Ecclesiastes contains a claim to inspiration (11). Two reasons for caution are wisdom that is not from God and over-ambitious projects (12). The Teacher summarizes the message, drawing attention to the awesomeness of God, the cruciality of his word (13) and the inevitability of his judgment (14). It is a judgment which will include every person, every deed, public or hidden, good or bad.

THE SONG OF SONGS

Introduction

Who was the author?

The book claims to be by Solomon and there is not sufficient reason to believe that this is not so. He is mentioned several times (1:1, 5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11–12), and the reference to 'a mare' in 1:9 is interesting as it was Solomon who introduced horses from Egypt. Some scholars, however, suggest alternative authorship on linguistic and personal grounds. They question whether Solomon, with the 1000 women in his life, would have written about exclusive love. God can, however, use the most unlikely people for his work. If Solomon did write the book, the date would be about 965 BC.

How many main characters are there?

The view in this commentary (and of the NIV) is that there are two major characters: Solomon and the Shulammitte girl. This seems to be more straightforward than the view that there are three: Solomon, the Shulammitte girl and her husband, to whom she remains faithful despite the approaches of the king.

What is the form of the book?

Some think that the book is made up of a random collection of love songs, originally independent and then strung together. This is unlikely, for there seems to be a genuine sequence in the book. It begins with the girl's first days in the palace of the king (1:1–14), then there is a delightful countryside scene (1:15–2:17). This is followed by the girl meditating on her fiancé (3:1–5), the wedding day (3:6–11) and the wedding night (4:1–5:1).

A lapse in the relationship follows (5:2–6:3), but the two eventually make up (6:4–13). A beautiful scene in the king's bedroom is then described (7:1–10) and further scenes in the countryside (7:11–8:14). To see it as a story with a sequence gives much more meaning than to see it as a set of isolated love songs. It is important to note that there is no sexual intercourse before the marriage; a significant fact in the light of modern behaviour.

What does the book teach?

1. The Song of Songs, as its title suggests (1:1), claims to be the best song on married love ever written. It is superior to all other love poetry, and so we must give full heed to it.

2. It describes love in poetic rather than prosaic terms. This stands in contrast to the emphasis today on the mechanics and techniques of love-making which so easily debases the relationship.

3. God is concerned about the physical. After all, he made us, and he made us to make love. As this is such an important part of peoples' lives he provided a whole book about it. But, to keep it in balance, this is only one book out of the sixty-six in the Bible.

4. It is not wrong to talk about the human body (see 4:1–5; 5:10–16; 6:5–7; 7:1–5). Today we will probably not use quite the same language as this book does, for it was written in a particular cultural setting. Also some of the descriptions may seem strange to us, but they refer as much to feel as to actual physical shape.

5. We must know God's timing in love-making. Love must not be aroused until it is ready (2:7; 3:5; 8:4). The world says, any time, any place. God says, my time, my place.

6. Family training is all important (8:8–10). The girl's brothers, especially, trained her to be a 'wall' to keep out unwanted intruders rather than a 'door' that would let anyone in and so do damage to her life. The training proved successful.

7. There is a danger in taking each other for granted (5:2–8). These verses constitute a timely warning to those who fail to respond to the loving approaches of their spouse and describe the regret that follows.

8. Married love is exclusive (4:12). In terms of physical love each partner must remain as a locked garden and a sealed fountain. Each life is a private vineyard for the other (8:12). Neither is on the open market.

9. The smallest things can spoil a healthy relationship (2:15). Both partners must watch out for 'the little foxes' that spoil the blossoms of those early days of marriage. True love is both unquenchable and without price (8:6–8). No-one is immune from those things that seek to quench the fires of love, but true love, because its source is in the heart of God, can never be put out. Likewise, no material things can ever buy love.

10. Used illustratively, the song says some beautiful things about the relation of Christ with his beloved church. We are reminded, among other things, of the strength of Christ's love (8:7); his delight to hear the prayers of the church (8:13); the sense of yearning for his presence (8:14); the invitation of Christ to share his company (2:13); the dangers of the failure to respond to his knocking (5:2–8; cf. Rev. 3:20).

We cannot do without this book, especially in an age of ‘free love’. Let it remind us that God is deeply concerned about our love relationships, not only to him but to each other.

Commentary

1:1–2:7 The king meets the Shulammitte in his palace

1:1 The title

The title says two things: one, that Solomon composed the book and two, that there is no love song like it in the world. It is important, then, that we love it, treasure it and live by it.

1:2–8 The daughters of Jerusalem and the Shulammitte

2–4 The physical side of love is immediately introduced. The girl just longs for the king's kisses. Kissing is a God-given expression of love. That's what lips are for, amongst other things. Wine gives physical pleasure but cannot be compared with those kisses which are the expression of the total commitment of the lover. Likewise, perfume can stir the feelings but there is no perfume quite like the name of your spouse. Perfume may also have associations; it can remind you of a particular person. The other girls in the palace liked the king too, for he had such a magnetic personality. (It is a good testimony when other people recognize the good qualities of your partner.) Take me away with you is another expression of true love. Her desire is to be alone with him. How can she enjoy him fully with all the other girls around? And look where she wants him to take her: to a very private place, that is, to his rooms. There they can make love without disturbance and enjoy each other to the full.

The ladies of the palace say We rejoice and delight in you, that is, the king. It is almost like a crowd of girls with a modern pop star. They are crazy about him, but not in the same way as the Shulammitte. She and her lover have a unique, exclusive relationship; it is just for themselves. No-one can kiss two persons at the same time, and so it should be with love between a man and his wife. Others may acknowledge it and admire it but they cannot, and must not, share it. So also true believers are drawn to Christ because of the beauty of his character and his sacrificial love.

5–8 How self-conscious the Shulammitte is of her sun-darkened skin compared with the ladies of the palace. It is like the black goat's hair tents of the nomads of Kedar (Kadai) or the dark curtains in the king's tent. Her dark skin stands out so much that she is the object of curiosity to the other girls, and she requests that they don't stare at her. But in fact, her dark skin is a sign of her good character. For she had worked hard under the hot rays of the sun day after day without protection. Bullied by her brothers (or step-brothers), she had slaved in the family vineyards to the neglect of the 'vineyard' of her own skin. She requests that they do not judge her by her skin, for beauty is more than skin-deep. She has a loveliness underneath all that sun-tanned skin which is an example to any modern girl.

7 Her thoughts turn from herself to her lover. There is one thing she desires above all else: to be with him. She describes him in simple, beautiful terms: you whom I love. Later she describes him in detail, but for now this is sufficient and says it all. It is a description of relationship. So the Christian may say of Christ: 'You are the one I love'. She asks, Why should I be like a veiled woman? A veiled woman was a loose girl, perhaps even a prostitute. So she is saying that she doesn't want to look like one of these women, wandering around looking for the next client. That's why she asks for a particular place and time (midday) for them to meet.

8 The palace women, in response to her question, appear to say that she must just go and hunt for him—follow the sheep and you will find the shepherd. The main thrust of the whole paragraph speaks of both character and desire. She is a totally lovely person in that she is not afraid of hard work even if it spoils her body. And her one desire is for her royal lover.

1:9–2:7 The king talks with the Shulammitte

1:9–11 The king speaks. 9 Solomon knew all about horses—he had enough of them (1 Ki. 4:26; 10:26)! While women of some cultures may not find being likened to a horse greatly flattering, it would have meant a lot to the Shulammitte. In all these comparisons, which spring from an eastern culture, we must realize that it is not always the physical appearance that is being compared, but the feeling and the spirit. Here the mare represents grace, beauty and nobility. In the team of horses pulling the chariot, the mare would stand out uniquely. The king also addresses the girl as my darling, which has the sense 'my lover friend'. It is a word which occurs frequently in the book (1:15; 2:2, 10, 13; 4:1, 7; 5:2; 6:4).

10 The king moves from considering the decorations on the mare to the ornaments on his lover. Having been a poor country girl, she is not only conscious of her sun-tanned skin but also of her lack of jewellery. But the king will rectify this. Out of his great wealth he will adorn her with jewellery fit for such a bride. Likewise Christ, the rich bridegroom of heaven, will adorn his bride the church with the jewels of grace and truth. He is even now preparing her for the great marriage supper of the Lamb.

1:12–14 The Shulammitte replies. The bride speaks again, this time of her attractive perfume. Scent can play a significant part in love-making, even in the animal world. It can stir physical senses other than those of smell, but the thought here goes beyond that. Fragrance is a symbol of the strong attraction the king has for her. As we love to smell a delicious aroma, so she breathes in his love and strength. He is irresistible. Christians are called to be the aroma of Christ (2 Cor. 2:14–16).

1:15 The king speaks. The king cannot help repeating how beautiful she is. In addition, the couple are now looking into each other's eyes, an important part of love-making. Close eye contact can bring entry into each other's lives. Dove suggests tenderness, purity and simplicity.

1:16–2:2 Rose of Sharon. 16–17 The bride responds to the king with further intimate words. She first uses his word 'beautiful' (handsome) and then adds 'pleasant' or 'lovely'. Moreover, they lie together on the grass in anticipation of the consummation of their marriage. They are at home amongst nature. Our bed is verdant means they use the grass as their couch.

2:1 The girl has now moved away from her earlier self-consciousness. The king's love for her causes her to have a new self-esteem. She sees herself as a beautiful flower. It is a very beautiful thing how being truly loved can bring about a transformation in the view you have of yourself. As believers we are the object of Christ's unfailing love, and we are beautiful in his eyes. 2 The king replies and adds to her thought. The others seem like thorns compared to her. This may seem a little hard on the maidens of the court, but it is his way of expressing her uniqueness.

2:3–7 The Shulammitte thinks about her incomparable lover. 3 If she is a lily of the valleys, then he is an apple tree, and as such he offers her shade and food, for she is in constant need of both security and strength. In her younger days she had sweated in the open sun (1:6), but now she enjoys protection and security with him. And in addition to security, he offers sweetness and enjoyment. Like the delicious crunch of a juicy apple in the heat of the day, so is her enjoyment of his protective love.

4 Banquet hall is literally 'house of wine', perhaps meaning 'house of love'. The mood becomes more intimate. She is moving into an experience of intense joy and gladness. A banner is a focusing point and conveys here that she does not mind the whole world knowing of their love for one another.

5–6 Faint with love is love sickness. She both pines for his love and has become faint with happiness and needs sustaining. She then imagines herself in his physical embrace. It is a kind of request. The picture is of them lying together, he with his hand under her head, supporting her, and doubtless gazing into her eyes. The unashamed physical frankness of the book is again obvious to the reader.

7 This verse provides one of the most basic principles of a true love relationship. It speaks of genuineness and reality and right timing. It is sin which causes physical love to be expressed at the wrong time and in the wrong place with the wrong person. There is a time for everything in God. The way of our sinful world is to arouse and waken love in false and evil ways. Likewise, in another sphere, the evangelist and the preacher can use fake and manipulative methods which only bring about untimely 'conversions' (see 2 Cor. 4:2).

2:8–3:5 The beloved's visit and the Shulammitte's night search

2:8–17 The beloved's visit

8–9 While it is true that love must never be wrongly stimulated, there is a compulsion about true love. When the time is right the lover comes leaping and bounding. He can't wait to see her again. She responds suitably, shouting to anyone who wants to hear that he is on his way with the speed of a gazelle. Then on his arrival he peers through the windows, longing to see her, longing to speak to her.

10–13 There cannot be a better time of year to express their love fully to one another. It is spring, spring in every sense of the word. He had certainly had the spring in his step as he bounded over the hills to meet her. She has the spring in her heart as she watches him approach and then peer through the window with his eager love-filled eyes. What a time for love. Flowers are bursting forth; birds sing their own love songs; the fruit trees show their fruit; and the smell of spring blossom makes the heart beat a little faster. It is not surprising that love has often been associated with spring. For spring is the time of new life and vitality. And should not Christians long for an eternal spring in their relationship with Christ? Out of the believer's inward being should flow rivers of living water. New fruit, new blossoms and pleasing scent should continuously be an expression of our life with the Lord.

It is all capped by the invitation to come away with her lover, just the two of them, to consummate their love to one another. The words of invitation are said twice for emphasis (10, 13).

14–15 The king speaks, and there is both a positive and a negative to what he says. Positively, he seeks for a complete openness on the part of the Shulammitte. It was characteristic of doves to hide in the clefts of the hills so that no-one could see or hear them. His request is that there be an absolute exposure of her whole person and character to him. So we should be completely open to Christ. Negatively, he requests that anything that would spoil their relationship (the little foxes) must be caught and dealt with, however small they may appear to be. Their love for each other must be pure and unadulterated. It is already blooming beautifully, how terrible if something came to spoil the blossom.

16–17 The climax is arriving. Understandably and beautifully, it begins with a statement of mutual ownership. They belong totally to one another and, as far as their marriage is concerned, not to anyone else. This is God's pattern for marriage, and there is security in that sense of belonging. He browses among the lilies may be a reference to the description she has given to herself as a 'lily of the valley'. He finds his pasture in the one he loves. Her final request in this paragraph is for them to be all night long in one another's embrace—until the day breaks and the rising sun causes the shadows to flee. Their total spiritual belonging has its physical expression.

3:1–5 The night search

1–3 This looks like a dream (or a nightmare?) in view of the opening statement—all night long on my bed. It is a kind of fear dream. She is so united to him that she cannot bear the thought of his not being there, and this fear comes out in a dream. However, it ends well. Some of the saints of past ages have made good use of this passage in describing what has been called 'the dark night of the soul', the cry of agony from the heart of one who senses he or she has lost the presence of God and so loses his or her sense of belonging and security (see Ps. 42). Four times in these opening verses she describes her lover as the one my heart loves. She feels she has lost part of herself, and in intensity of longing she searches for him. She does all she can to find him, going to every part of the city, all its streets and squares, asking anyone she meets if they have seen him. Only intense love does that, as when a parent has lost a little child.

4 Oh the joy of finding! Such joy is expressed in a hug that seems to go on for eternity. It is a way of saying, 'Please don't leave me again'. But why does she take him to her mother's house? Because it was her old home, the place of her security, where her own mother had showered love on her. After the strangeness of the night wandering she needed a place that was deeply familiar. Young brides still go home to their mothers from time to time.

3:6–5:1 The king’s procession and songs

3:6–11 A different kind of wedding procession

The clue that this is Solomon’s wedding procession is seen in v 11—on the day of his wedding. But what a procession! It is first seen in the far distance. The dust kicked up by the horses’ hooves seems like a column of smoke. Then it is identified; it is none other than Solomon, and the song expresses delightful surprise. Let everyone look. Today it is all eyes on the bride as she begins her walk down the aisle, but here it is all eyes on Solomon as he approaches in regal splendour to be wedded to his bride. The splendour and size of the procession fits the occasion. Solomon will not spare anything for such a day as this. One best man is not enough for him—he has sixty, and they are all magnificently dressed as noble warriors of the land. Perhaps, too, the king wishes to tell his bride that he will provide constant protection for her, for each warrior has his sword at his side. Vs 9–10 describe the wedding chariot. Again, it is nothing less than the best. It is custom-made and of the finest material. When the king arrives (11) all the ladies of the palace are summoned and requested to gaze at him wearing his special wedding crown. The crown (or wreath) was normally placed on the king’s head by his mother (see 1 Ki. 1:9–31; 2:13–25). How aptly it is that the day of his wedding is described as the day his heart rejoiced. Not every bridegroom can afford such magnificence and splendour, but every husband should provide the best for his wife and vice versa. True love brings out the best in other people. It improves character.

4:1–5:1 The king’s love song on the wedding night

4:1–7 The bride’s beautiful body. This delightful love song that Solomon sings to the Shulammitte is based on the wasf, a song style still used in Syrian weddings today. It reminds us that we are not only fearfully and wonderfully made but beautifully made too. The body is the handiwork of a marvellous Creator. For the lover, this mutual admiration is a final prelude to the actual act of love. The couple are now in the privacy of their own bedroom, completely and legitimately exposed to one another. The king cannot help but speak of what he sees, for love is total and loves both spirit and body. To speak of her body is an expression of his love. The Christian is not so other-worldly that he or she cannot admire the human body and even talk about it. It is lust, not physical and verbal love, that is condemned in Scripture.

1 After a general opening statement on the beauty of his bride’s body, the king begins to detail its various parts. The comparison of her eyes to doves is not in terms of shape but of brightness and gentleness. Her black hair cascades down from head to shoulders like a flock of black goats descending a mountain. 2 Her open mouth reveals teeth that are perfect in number and shape, completely even. They glisten too, like newly washed sheep. Twins signifies that the upper set perfectly corresponds with the lower with no gaps. 3 Her lips are brilliantly red. Ribbon (‘thread’) may either express the idea of thinness, which is unlikely, or indicate that her mouth is very clearly defined as by a fine thread. (Note how carefully some women put on their lipstick in order to avoid smudges and irregular lines.) Her temples (better ‘cheeks’) have the beautiful russet tan of the pomegranate, perhaps especially flushed with the excitement of the moment. 4 The tower of David suggest strength. This hardly means she has a bull neck; but rather that she has a royal bearing. The decoration of many shields adds to this concept of strength and fortitude. 5 The comparison of fawns and breasts is again not in terms of shape but of feel. Both are pleasant to caress.

6 The king declares his avowed intention of holding and caressing and making love to such a body until dawn, when the day breaks and the shadows flee; thus responding to her request of 2:17. At last the time is right. Love has been deliberately aroused and awakened (cf. 2:7). God's timing makes it all so right. 7 Finally, the king declares his bride perfect. This whole paragraph is not necessarily a model for lovers as it stands. Some would feel slightly embarrassed, to say the least, if such words were used in this kind of way. But it is saying that spoken love is not out of place; that God has ordained not only foreplay but forespeaking; that people, especially men, are not animals and should not rush in without deep consideration for their spouses; that wives are not sex objects; and with it all, that God makes all things beautiful in his time.

4:8–15 Invitation and response. The king now moves from admiration of his bride's physical form to a description of their relationship. It is an exquisitely beautiful song that sings of the promises and the delights of love and the intense joy of the consummation of their marriage (5:1). Much of the description is in terms of a beautiful garden. The garden is filled with a great variety of flowers, and the aroma that they shed abroad it is all so very inviting. The word bride is used for the first time.

8 The song begins with an invitation for his beloved to leave all thoughts of other places and other situations behind so that her mind will be totally devoted to him. You can't truly make love to another with your thoughts far away. Perhaps she has fears as well, not unknown for a bride on the first night of her honeymoon. But there are no 'lions' or 'leopards' here, only the security of his embrace. No wild barren country this, only a locked-in garden. 9 Moreover, he assures her that he is totally captured by her love. He no longer belongs to himself, nor does he wish to. He is content to have his heart stolen. (There is an echo of this in 1 Cor. 7:4.) She just has to look at him and he is felled. It is a delightful helplessness.

10–11 These verses speak of two forms of physical contact: caresses and kisses. The word translated love in the NIV can mean the physical expression of love, i.e. love-making. It is used in this way in Ezk. 16:8 and the context here suggests it. He responds with deep delight at her initiative in stroking his skin. It is better than any other physical sensation he knows. Their kisses too (11) are ravishing and intimate (under your tongue). Perhaps, too, there is a reference to a new land flowing with milk and honey, the 'land' of her body. Just as God provided the promised land for the whole nation, now he has provided this woman just for the king.

12–15 Here in these very beautiful verses is the comparison of the bride to a garden. 12 A garden locked up speaks of their exclusive relationship. He alone has access to that garden, for it is closed, rightly so, to all others. She herself has done the locking and put up a 'No trespassers' sign to the world outside. As well, she is like a fountain from which only the king may drink. To him she is like a spring that constantly provides an inner vitality of love. 13–14 Your plants are the varied expressions of her beautiful personality. The garden of her life is attractively laid out with a rich variety of fruit trees and sweet smelling herbs and shrubs. He wanders up and down the garden, pausing here and there to enjoy each facet of her magnetic personality. 15 The idea of the fountain expands to flowing water streaming down from Lebanon. While it is still exclusive to him, her love is increasingly large and expansive. He can hardly find pictures big enough to describe it.

16 As he invited her (8), so she now invites him to come into the garden of her life in the fullest possible way. It may be locked to others but it is certainly not locked to him. The phrase 'I could eat you' is not such a modern expression. Here she invites him to do that very thing. He can pick and eat whatever fruit he chooses; the lot if he wants it. The whole thing is an invitation to complete possession.

5:1 A whole night has elapsed, the first night of their married life together. He has accepted her loving and passionate invitation. This is a choice verse. After their night of love-making, they now lie contentedly in each others arms. The paragraph concludes with words of encouragement and endorsement from the court ladies.

5:2–6:3 Untaken opportunity

5:2–8 Taken for granted

This is more likely to be reality than dream, in contrast to 3:1–5. Either way, these verses are packed with drama and teach a very important lesson in the relationship between a husband and a wife. The man is late home from work and his hair is wet with dew. Doubtless he was greatly looking forward to both the comforts of home and the presence of his wife and thinking how nice it would be to cuddle up in bed. But it's a different story in the bedroom. His wife has had the equivalent of a late shower and is now undressed and in bed. She is delightfully drowsy when the knock comes at the door. He speaks with beautifully endearing words (perhaps he has rehearsed them on the way home) and addresses her by four names, each with the personal possessive pronoun: my sister, my darling, my dove, my flawless one. Each is intimate and personal, and they build to a climax. The scene is set for a beautiful homecoming, but it is not to be, at least not yet. Other things have taken over in the mind of the Shulammitte. Bodily comforts are more important to her than greeting her husband. She has painstakingly washed her feet, how could she get them dirty again? And she just can't be bothered to get dressed again.

After a short time she changes her mind but it is now too late; he's gone. She can't believe it. She is in despair and calls out in desperation, but there is silence. She goes running through the city streets to find him, only to be beaten by the watchmen. Finally, she pleads with the women of Jerusalem to tell her as soon as they find him and also to tell him the dreadful state of her heart.

Perhaps this all took place some time after their wedding night and is the first indication that she is taking him for granted. That initial delight in each other had waned slightly, even if only for a moment. Here is one of the 'little foxes' (2:15) that spoil the blossom of a new relationship. It is a warning to her, and in her favour she responds immediately. Underneath she really does still love him for she found her heart pounding for him (4). It is a lesson to all of us, both in our relationships with one another and with Christ, our heavenly bridegroom. How his heart must grieve when he comes to us offering his delights and we just can't be bothered. Bodily comforts or something similar have taken over our love for him.

There is a moving touch in v 4 which reflects the heart of the lover. There is no anger and no sulking on his part, only deep disappointment. But what he does do is to cover the door handle with myrrh, a sign of his continued and fragrant love for her. This she discovers to her delight as it drips down on her own hand.

5:9–6:3 The Shulammitte describes her lover to the women of Jerusalem

9 In this verse the friends of the Shulammitte speak. Theirs is a useful question for it makes her express her appreciation of her husband. Her earlier attitude had been an expression of ingratitude; now she is called upon to state how much he really does mean to her. And what a reply! It provides us with our next detailed and deliciously poetic description of the man she loves and admires so deeply.

10–16 In this section it is important to remember that the imagery used does not always relate to physical appearance and shape. It is as much the feel of what is being described and the impression given by it that the writer has in mind. V 10 provides the general opening statement. The Shulammitte sums her lover up by saying that he is unique and incomparable. Radiant is from the Hebrew ‘to glow, to shine’. The brightness of his character shines through his face. 11 Purest gold is either a reference to the nobility of his form and carriage or to his sun-tanned face, which is surrounded by long, jet-black wavy hair. 12 His strength is wedded to gentleness. As the dove is one of the gentlest of birds, so his eyes shine with a strong and passionate kindness. The whites of his eyes shine out brilliantly like a dove. 13 His cheeks (i.e. his beard) are beautifully perfumed. The deliciousness of his kisses is like breathing in the most irresistible of perfumes, dripping with liquid myrrh. 14 If we translate ‘hands’ (AV) here, rather than arms, this is a reference to his fingers, which are each like perfect golden cylinders, gorgeously decorated. The description of his abdomen is in terms of strength and beauty. There is no superfluous fat; he is fit and athletic. 15 Strength is again implied in the comparison of his legs to marble pillars. They wouldn’t easily buckle under stress but would always be there for her support. The bases of pure gold are his feet. His whole appearance is like the majestic mountain of Lebanon, or like the cedar, king among the trees. 16 He is altogether lovely (‘All of him is wonderful’) are the fitting words she uses as she attempts to sum him up and provide a suitable parallel to the opening words of v 10.

6:1–3 1 Where has your lover gone? is the second question asked of the Shulammitte in her distress, and it is just as significant as the first. It makes her think of the kind of response that he would make to her temporary rejection of him. Knowing his character as she does, what is the thing he is most likely to do? 2 She knows immediately. There will be no sulking, no anger; he will have gone to his work, for work is a blessing in such situations. But more than that, he is gathering flowers for her. As he has called her a ‘lily of the valley’ so he is gathering lilies as a love gift. He feels no offence, only deep disappointment. He is living out a Christian response to her rejection of him and meeting hurt with love (Rom. 12:17–21). 3 In addition to all this, she is secure in the knowledge that they still totally belong to one another. A temporary set-back would never lead to an inseparable break. They had made their vows to one another for life.

6:4–8:14 Increasing love

6:14–8:4 The end of the Shulammitte’s stay at court

6:4–10 Further compliments. These verses provide yet another description of the Shulammitte. Instead of the king greeting her with a rebuke for her behaviour, he showers her with compliments. It follows a similar pattern to previous descriptions and begins with a general statement. She is both beautiful and dignified, a majestic combination.

4 Tirzah, meaning ‘pleasantness’, was the capital of the northern kingdom from the time of Jeroboam to the reign of Omri (1 Ki. 16:23) and was a beautiful city. Majestic as troops with banners speaks of the imposing personality of the Shulammitte. 5a When she lifts her eyes to his, he finds it too overwhelming. Perhaps she is crying with deep sorrow for all she has done.

5b–7 These verses are more or less a repetition of 4:1–2. Women do not necessarily tire of hearing the same compliments. She doesn't say, 'Oh, you've said all that before', so again he speaks of her long flowing black hair, her regular white teeth and her rosy cheeks. Is it all a reminder of her wedding night when he used the same words? 8–9 New things are, however, added which are suited to the occasion. Let her be assured that there is still no-one like her: my perfect one is unique. What more can he say? There is total forgiveness; total assurance that his love for her has not changed one bit. 10 In a delightful touch, the court maidens echo the king's sentiments. Dawn, moon, sun and stars all speak of light and radiance and glory. Perhaps her whole personality has been lit up again because of his response of loving forgiveness and is in stark contrast to the blackness of the night in ch. 5.

6:11–13 The nut garden. These two verses are difficult to interpret, especially as the Hebrew of v 12 is not at all clear. Despite the NIV heading it is probably the girl who is speaking here. She wanders down to the nut garden, where she believes her beloved will be, and makes the delightful discovery that it is springtime again in their relationship. Then all of a sudden she is placed in the king's royal chariot, doubtless the first of his fleet, and she finds herself racing along at his side before all the people. It is a public display of total reconciliation. They are together again, and a new spring has begun. All is in blossom and no more 'little foxes' must spoil that blossom (2:15).

13 The women of the palace call after her as she flies by, wanting to see again the look on her face that speaks volumes about the joy of a restored relationship. In the second half of v 13 the king expresses his delight at the way the women of the palace are caught up in their entertainment. He says it is just like the excitement of watching a lively, exuberant dance.

7:1–9a A most intimate description. These verses provide the final list of beautiful compliments that the king gives to his beloved. It is the climax of the process of reconciliation and compares interestingly with the passage describing their wedding night (ch. 4). Several things may be noted. First, that sexual intimacy can be the Lord's provision for total reconciliation. Secondly, that this description is even more intimate than that of the wedding night. For the first time he speaks of her thighs and her stomach. Thirdly, perhaps he wishes to remind her of the first night they came together in intimate embrace and so is emphasizing that nothing has changed. The description is from the feet upwards. 'From the soles of your feet to the top of your head you are incomparable', he says.

1 Even feet can be beautiful in the eyes of the beholder, not least the feet of those who bear the gospel (Is. 52:7). Jewels made by a master craftsman speak of the perfection of her beauty. Her legs are exactly the right shape, and in their movement are full of grace. 2 Her whole stomach region is as tasty as a meal with delicious wine. He cannot wait to take his fill. It would seem that eastern men of this period didn't like their women on the thin side! 3 The comparison of breasts with fawns lies in the touch and the feel; both are delicate. 4 Her neck is as strong and stately as an ivory tower. This gives the impression of the right kind of self-confidence; she holds her head up high, there is no drooping with her. Doubtless the pools of Heshbon were both clear and peaceful, and so are her eyes. To gaze into them brings delightful refreshment. The tower of Lebanon looking towards Damascus indicates defensive strength. Syria, with its capital Damascus, was a constant enemy of Israel. Fashions in beauty vary from place to place and from time to time, and perhaps prominent noses were considered beautiful then.

5 Mount Carmel was known for its beauty and nobility. Her face provided the climax and crown of all her beauty. To be captured and captivated by a woman's hair is not uncommon in poetry, so the king is held captive by its tresses. 6 Every exquisite part of her body is called a ‘delight’, not only for itself but because it produces such delightful sensations to the king. (It is like tasting a box of chocolates one by one, only much more so.)

7–9 Her whole bearing gives the impression of a palm tree: tall, slender and graceful. Standing out on such a palm tree are its delicious fruits, her breasts. These, he says, he will gently caress and handle: I will take hold of its fruit. From her breasts he will move to her lips, adding the wine to the fruit. Mouth (lit. ‘palate’) suggests the most intimate of kisses. The Shulammitte interrupts him to invite him to do what he longs for. ‘Kiss me as much as you want’, she says. After consummation they fall asleep in each other’s arms. Lips and teeth may be ‘lips of sleepers’ (see the NIV mg.), indicating that they sleep the deep, contented sleep of true lovers.

7:9b–8:4 The beloved’s wholesome response. The Shulammitte picks up the picture of wine used by her husband and tells him that she wants to be all that he desires, not least in their passionate kissing. The phrase over lips and teeth shows just how passionate it is. 10 This verse summarizes their relationship once again (see 2:16 and 6:3). It is a statement of the utmost security that they find in each other. This time, however, she adds to it the phrase and his desire is for me. It is in his passionate desire for her that she finds such security. Similarly, it is in Christ’s undying love for us that we find our security. God himself promises ‘I will take you as my own people, and I will be your God’ (Ex. 6:7).

11 Now, for the first time, the Shulammitte takes the initiative in the relationship and suggests that they spend a further day and night in the country, for love-making. In such a secure relationship the wife is in no danger of the husband thinking she is forward. V 12 speaks of spring time, but it was spring before. Is it that their relationship is so wonderful that it is always spring? And is that not the ideal relationship of Christ and his church? Always there should be blossoms; always there should be the promise of new fruit (see Jn. 7:38; 15:1–11). 13 Mandrakes are plants that not only have a magnetic smell but possess (so it is claimed) qualities that encourage love-making. She is really saying, ‘Let’s find just the right situation for love-making.’ Not only that, however, for she has also given it much forethought by storing up both new and dried fruit. This brings before us two delightful thoughts about our love-relationships with Christ and with one another. First, that expressions of love both express old, familiar and well proven ways, and explore the, as yet, unknown. Secondly, true love always includes a considerate looking ahead. This reflects the heart of a God who has laid up in store such good things for those who love him (Jn. 14:3; 1 Pet. 1:4).

8:1–4 Here the wife sings to herself about her beloved. It just wasn’t done in ancient Israel for women to express their love in public, not even love between husband and wife. That’s why she wishes she were his sister so that she could kiss him every time she felt like it, even in the market-place, without being despised by the public. But she also knows the importance of self-control and of the ‘done thing’. She learnt this from her mother (she who has taught me). She has not forgotten her wise and wholesome upbringing and not surprisingly likes to take her husband back to her old home where she has her roots. Parents still have the obligation to train their children in courtship, even though they may not fully understand at the time. 3 Once again she thinks in joyful anticipation of their next time together, when they will embrace in intimate love, not standing but lying, for his left arm is under her head. This use of the imagination is a genuine part of love. It is very different from fantasizing in which the mind is allowed to think about and dwell on wrong physical relationships. V 4 repeats the refrain of 2:7 and 3:5.

8:5–14 The nature of true love

The introduction to this description of true love is in the form of a question. The couple are portrayed enjoying a delightful stroll in the countryside, where they so much belong, and the Shulammitte is seen leaning on her husband's strong body as they walk. 'Who is this man?', the writer asks. It is left to the wife to respond to the question. She takes us back, first of all, to the time when they made love to each other in the very place where he was born. As there had been that first birth, which in itself had arisen out of the love of his mother and father, now there is a second birth of his true love for the Shulammitte. The word roused must be linked with 'arouse' in v 4. She provides the genuine arousal. The time and circumstances are just right; there is no sexual transgression here. Such principles must still guide every sexual union.

6–7 True love is now further defined, and there are several important lessons. Seal is a sign of ownership that can be seen by anyone. She wants it to be obvious to all that she is totally owned by him and in no way belongs to any other (cf. 2 Tim. 2:19). The seal was to be in two places: on his heart (the seat of his affections) and on his arm (the symbol of his physical strength). He would totally own her, love her and protect her. Moreover, true love is as strong as death in that both are irresistible. So too, the love of Christ is all-conquering. Paul found that the love of Christ compelled him irresistibly (2 Cor. 5:14). True love has a jealousy about it which is a reflection of the jealousy of God (see Ex. 20:5; 2 Cor 11:2). A wife has every right to jealousy if her husband starts getting involved with another woman. Jealousy hurts and hurts badly and that is why it can be as unyielding as the grave. Further, true love is as unquenchable as a blazing fire (cf. Ex. 3:2). Like a mighty flame can read 'like the very flame of the LORD' (see the NIV mg.). True love has its source in God, for God is love. So such love has a supernatural power that no human efforts can extinguish. Humankind tried to quench such love at Calvary, but their efforts were futile. The waters of sin, death, Sheol, Satan and all the rebellion of humankind cannot put out the love of Christ for the world. Finally, true love cannot be bought. Love scorns purchase even though the price offered is extremely high. The invitation of the gospel is to come and buy without money (Is. 55:1).

8–10 This is a very significant paragraph on the theme of keeping the expression of physical love for the right time. It is not a new theme in the book but occurs now in a different kind of way. It tells of a loyal, caring family who protected their young sister from misuse of sex. From her early years, before she was physically developed (her breasts are not yet grown), her older brothers, in particular, disciplined her and encouraged her to keep her body only for the one she was to marry. The day she is spoken for is the time of marriageable age. Until that time she has two options: to be either a wall, resisting all the approaches of false love, or a door allowing any man to pass through her defences and so losing her virginity before God's time. This all ties in with the refrain 'do not arouse ... love until it so desires'. If she disciplines herself, her brothers will reward her with adornment. If she lets herself and her family down, they will be even stronger in their protection and enclose her with panels of cedar. V 10 indicates how positively she has responded to their training. She has now reached physical and mental maturity (my breasts are like towers) and she has remained a wall. Bringing contentment means she has found true wholeness in the exclusive relationship with her husband. The word contentment can be translated 'peace' or 'wholeness'. God knows that only as we obey his laws in this and all areas will we find our true health.

11–12 The writer continues the train of thought that love cannot be bought. These verses are a kind of parable. Solomon had owned a vineyard at Baal Hamon which he let out to tenants for a thousand shekels each, and they in turn made a profit of two hundred shekels. By contrast, the vineyard of the life and character of the Shulammitte is not on the market. No-one will invade her property, not for any price: My own vineyard is mine to give.

13–14 The unique song ends on a beautiful note. First, there is a request from the lover to hear his beloved's voice. Perhaps she is in conversation with her friends and there is a general hubbub. The king wants her voice singled out from all the rest (cf. 2:14). We may compare the words of the Father amidst all the hubbub of this world: 'This is my Son, whom I love. Listen to him' (Mk. 9:7). Secondly, there is a request from the Shulammitte to her beloved for him to once more make love to her (cf. 2:17). In such requests we hear the desire of Christ, the heavenly bridegroom, to hear the prayers of his bride; and the desire of the church to maintain close and intimate communion with her Lord: 'Amen. Come, Lord Jesus' (Rev. 22:20).

ISAIAH

Introduction

The historical context

Isaiah lived through a pivotal period of his nation's history, the second half of the eighth century BC, which saw the rise of written prophecy in the work of Amos, Hosea, Micah and himself, but also the downfall and disappearance of the greater part of Israel, the ten tribes of the northern kingdom. (See The Prophets in The Song of Songs)

In 740 BC the death of King Uzziah (6:1) marked the end of an 'Indian Summer' in which both Judah and Israel had enjoyed some fifty years' respite from large-scale aggression. This would soon be only a memory. The rest of the century was to be dominated by predatory Assyrian kings: Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727), Shalmaneser V (726–722), Sargon II (721–705) and Sennacherib (705–681). Their ambitions were for empire, not for plunder alone; and in pursuit of it they uprooted and transplanted whole populations, punishing any sign of rebellion with prompt and hideous reprisals.

In 735 Jerusalem felt the shock-wave of their approach, when the armies of Israel and Syria arrived to force King Ahaz into an anti-Assyrian coalition. Isaiah's confrontation of the king (ch. 7) brought to light the real issue of this period, the choice between quiet faith and desperate alliances. The king's decision to stake all, not on God but on Assyria itself, called forth an implied rejection of him and his kind, and the prophecy of a perfect king, Immanuel, to arise out of the felled stock of the Davidic dynasty.

Israel paid for her rebellion with the loss of her northern regions ('Galilee'; 9:1) in c. 734 and of her national existence in 722. For Judah, bordered now by a cosmopolitan Assyrian province (2 Ki. 17:24) in the territory where Israel had stood, there was every discouragement to patriotic gestures.

But it was a patriot who followed King Ahaz. Hezekiah (for whose chronology see on 2 Ki. 18:1) was a firebrand in whom faith and impatience took turns to kindle the flame. Much of Isaiah's energy was devoted to keeping him out of intrigues against Assyria (see on 14:28–32; 18:1–7; 20:1–6). In the end this struggle came to a head in a bitter conflict between the prophet and a pro-Egypt faction at court, implicit in chs. 28–31. The sequel was Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria (chs. 36, 37), which brought the might of Sennacherib down upon him in 701 BC and left the little kingdom of Judah almost prostrate in spite of the miraculous rescue of Jerusalem.

Isaiah's dealings with Hezekiah were never confined to questions of political prudence, nor to the immediate future; and his last encounter with the king pinpoints the difference between these two men of faith. In 39:5–7 Isaiah looks far ahead to the Babylonian captivity, the fruit of the king's disobedience, but the king's only reaction is relief: 'There will be peace and security in my lifetime.' It was an understandable horizon for a monarch; unthinkable for a prophet. So the prophecy goes on to completion in the final section.

The events implied in chs. 40–55 are identified beyond doubt by the name of Cyrus (44:28; 45:1), which carries us at once into the world of the sixth century. Cyrus, king of Anshan in southern Persia, had seized control of the Median Empire by 550 BC and most of Asia Minor by 547. This put him in a commanding position against the Babylonian Empire (where the Jews had been captive since before the fall of Jerusalem in 587). This empire was itself weak and divided by now, the king, Nabonidus, being absent from the capital (where his son Belshazzar deputized for him) and at odds with the priests. In 539 Cyrus defeated the Babylonian army in the field and his forces entered Babylon without a fight. True to God's prophecy in Is. 44:28, he repatriated the Jews (among other subject peoples) with instructions to rebuild their temple (Ezr. 1:2–4; 6:2–5). His own inscription on the 'Cyrus Cylinder' (now in the British Museum) reveals that this was his general policy, in order to enlist the good offices of the gods whom he restored to their sanctuaries (see on 41:25).

A considerable number of Jews returned, but soon fell foul of the 'people of the land' by rejecting their help in rebuilding the temple (Ezr. 4:3). The whole work came to a halt for nearly twenty years, until Haggai and Zechariah inspired a new attempt in 520, which was completed in 516. Many commentators see this situation, with its human tensions and its preoccupation with Jerusalem and the temple, as the background presupposed in chs. 56–66. In this commentary, however, the thread that binds the last chapters together is taken to be thematic rather than historical, a preoccupation no longer with Babylon but with the homeland and the mother-city, both as they were in their imperfection and as they pointed beyond themselves to the new heavens and earth, and to the 'Jerusalem above'.

Authorship

The traditional and New Testament view

Until modern times the book of Isaiah was universally regarded as a unity, the product of the eighth-century prophet of the same name. A single scroll was used for the whole of it, as we learn not only from Qumran but from Lk. 4:17 (where the chosen reading was from one of the latest chapters). The same assumption of unity is already evident in Ecclus. 48:22–25, written some 200 years before the NT period. The NT fully concurs: see e.g. Jn. 12:37–41; Rom. 9:27–29; 10:20–21.

Modern criticism

Apart from a tentative query by the medieval Jewish scholar Ibn Ezra (whose remarks elsewhere, however, endorse the traditional view), the idea of a multiple authorship of Isaiah has arisen only in the last two centuries. Its simplest, most persuasive form is the ascription of chs. 1–39 to Isaiah and 40–66 to an anonymous prophet living among the sixth-century exiles in Babylonia. It is suggested that as an appropriate sequel to Isaiah, this work came to be appended to Isaiah's, and being anonymous, eventually lost its separate identity.

The chief grounds of this view and of its main variants are, first, what has been called the 'analogy of prophecy', i.e. the fact that prophets usually address their contemporaries (and the people addressed in chs. 40–66 are predominantly the exiles); and second, the distinctive style, vocabulary and theological emphasis of chs. 40–66. These will be considered later.

But in fact no scholar holds the theory in this simple form, for by its own principles it demands to be carried much further. A typical analysis shows chs. 1–39 (Isaiah's portion of the book) subdivided into a basic collection of eighth-century oracles by the prophet, supplemented by material from later disciples of various periods (e.g. chs. 13, 14 from the Babylonian exile in the sixth century; chs. 24–27 from perhaps the end of the Persian regime, in the fourth century). This added material, including many shorter contributions, may amount to some 250 verses of chs. 1–39 (i.e. about one-third); and some of the longer insertions are themselves analysed as composite, with their own history of growth.

Chs. 40–66 are usually divided into two main parts: Deutero- (i.e. Second-) Isaiah (40–55; exilic; say c. 545 BC) and Trito- (Third-) Isaiah (56–66; post-exilic; say c. 520 BC). The former of these is generally considered a unity, the work of a ‘great unknown’ disciple of Isaiah; but the latter part (chs. 56–66) is most often thought to come from the second prophet’s own followers, of several schools of thought, who interpreted his message to the next generation. Commentators differ over the number of historical situations and of parties (e.g. moralist, institutionalist, patriotic, universalist) discoverable here, and consequently in their analysis of Trito-Isaiah; but at least four sources are commonly isolated in its eleven chapters.

It is important to realize that this suggested galaxy of authors and supplementers is not wholly arbitrary. Once the initial criteria for dividing the book are accepted, they cannot simply be discarded after the first cut; they must be used consistently (with the results we have seen) or not at all. So despite the attractive simplicity of a supposed two-volume work (by Isaiah and a successor), the only viable alternative to a single author is not two authors but something like a dozen.

It is only fair to add that the emphasis of critical scholars has recently been on the unity in this diversity. The supplementers are seen as a school of disciples, steeped in Isaiah’s thought and prophesying in his spirit to new generations. So his teaching, on this view, continued to put out offshoots of new growth for centuries after his death, and his name was appropriately attached to the family of writings fathered by his oracles.

An assessment of the arguments for multiple authorship

In face of the strong tradition of unity of authorship, the onus of proof is on those who divide the book. Their chief criteria are not invulnerable.

1. ‘The analogy of prophecy’. There is no denying that if chs. 40–66 are Isaiah’s own, the depth and length of his immersion in a distant age make his experience highly exceptional. But, in the first place, to disallow whatever transcends known analogies is to exalt analogy above reason, and incidentally to accord ill with the innovative God of these chapters (43:18). Secondly, it exaggerates in this instance what is a difference in degree rather than in kind between these chapters and the rest. Chs. 1–39 contain many excursions into a recognizable future which have been critically attributed, in most cases, to later editors rather than to Isaiah on this same ‘analogy of prophecy’ (which thus turns out to be based on texts trimmed to support it). Moreover, some of these prophecies speak (as do chs. 40–66.) as if from within the future they describe, e.g. in the perfect tenses of the well-known birth-oracle of 9:2–6, or in the vision of captivity and judgment in 5:13–16 (despite the NIV’s futures). At greater length Jeremiah celebrates Babylon’s doom as if from the standpoint of the final generation of captives, now urging them to escape (Je. 50:8; 51:45; cf. Is. 48:20)—whereas he had forbidden such thoughts to his literal contemporaries in their different time and role (Je. 29:4–14).

Still more to our point, 13:1–14:23 (a named oracle by ‘Isaiah son of Amoz’) sees Babylon, as chs. 40–66 see her, not as the unruly Assyrian province of Isaiah’s day, but as a world power whose impending fall will mean the end of Israel’s exile. To this oracle we must add the dreamlike vision of 21:1–10, where the reported fall of Babylon throws Isaiah into a state of shock.

In the light of all this, the intense involvement of chs. 40–66 with the Babylonian exile, its lessons and its aftermath, may transcend the reader's expectation, but hardly Isaiah's. For him it could well be the final flowering of his preoccupation with the interplay between those opposites, Babylon and Israel, in the long purposes of God, and represent the fulfilment of his ministry.

It may be worth adding that even the supreme anomaly, the naming of Cyrus a century-and-a-half before his time (44:28; 45:1), is not unparalleled (see the predicting of Josiah, at twice this interval, in 1 Ki. 13:2). Secondly, the power to predict is precisely the proof paraded here that Yahweh alone is God (cf. 41:21–23, 26–29; 44:7–8, 25–28; 46:10–11; 48:3–8. Note that 48:8 blames Israel's deafness, not God's silence, for her ignorance of the new things that were to happen at the end of the exile).

2. The distinctive style of chs. 40–66. This would only be a valid argument against Isaiah's authorship if these chapters were addressed to a comparable situation and audience to those of 1–39. But if they are indeed Isaiah's, they are the product of his old age, a message written, not preached, concerned to comfort rather than warn, and directed to a future generation with scarcely a glance at his own. These are immense differences. Such prophesying may seem an intrinsic improbability (see above), but one cannot have the objection both ways. For it would be still more extraordinary (granted that Isaiah was the author) if so radical a shift of situation, method and object were to produce no great change of thought and expression.

Certainly one might expect in chs. 1–39, if the whole book is Isaiah's, an occasional foretaste of 40–66, when the latter's themes were momentarily anticipated; and this is so. God's sovereignty in history (a major theme of 40–66) is expressed to Sennacherib in 37:26 (701 BC) in the very tone and terms of the later chapters: 'Have you not heard?' (cf. 40:28); 'Long ago I ordained it' (cf. 41:4; Heb.); 'In days of old' (cf. 45:21; 46:10); 'I planned it' (cf. 46:11); 'now I have brought it to pass' (cf. 48:3). There is similar language on this theme in 22:11. On the 'greater exodus', ch. 35 not only matches the finest eloquence of chs. 40–66 (with which it has to be grouped to save the theory of multiple authorship) but also, in almost every verse, uses the special idioms of 1–39. Again, in the visions of ultimate concord, the passages 11:6–9 and 65:25 can scarcely be told apart. These may be comparative rarities, but they are recognizable firstfruits of the total crop.

3. Vocabulary. Isaiah's early task of denunciation called for such terms as 'briers and thorns', the 'scourge', the 'storm', the 'remnant'; but the later work of reassurance and vocation emphasized God's initiative to 'create', 'choose' and 'redeem'. His 'purpose' is seen to embrace the distant 'islands', the 'ends of the earth' and 'all flesh'; this naturally calls forth the invitation to 'praise', 'rejoice' and 'break forth into singing'. Even the subsidiary parts of speech reflect the change of subject, for the later chapters abound in those that give warmth and emphasis to an utterance.

Alongside the variations, however, must be put the significant number of terms which are common to both parts of Isaiah but seldom or never encountered elsewhere in the OT. 'The Holy One of Israel' (twelve times in 1–39, thirteen in 40–66) is the best-known example, but several other expressions for God add their smaller testimony: e.g. the term for 'one who forms or designs' used with a possessive pronoun (22:11; 29:16; 44:2); 'the Mighty One of Jacob/Israel' (1:24; 49:26; 60:16). There are also rare or unique designations of Israel that occur in both parts such as 'blind' (29:18; 35:5; 42:16–18), 'deaf' (29:18; 35:5; 42:18; 43:8), 'forsakers of the LORD' (1:28; 65:11), 'ransomed of the LORD' (35:10; 51:11), 'the work of my hands' (29:23; 60:21). (These examples are taken from the fuller list of R. Margalioth, The Indivisible Isaiah, 1964.) It is this large stock of Isaianic expressions that has called forth the theory (for which there is very little supporting evidence) that a circle of disciples perpetuated Isaiah's thought-forms through the centuries. It is simpler to suppose a single mind.

4. Theology. It should now be clear that these two main parts of the book face different situations and give complementary teaching. But there is more than this. As J. A. Motyer has shown ('The "Servant Songs" in the Unity of Isaiah', TSF Bulletin, Spring 1957, pp. 3-7), the prophecies of 1-39 lead up to the prediction of a devastating historical punishment, which poses serious theological problems in view of the doctrines and promises set out elsewhere in those chapters. Chs. 40-66 are therefore more than a completion; they are a solution without which chs. 1-39 would end in unresolved discord. And 'if a prophet can be inspired to declare God's truth in the context of history ... it is no great demand that he should also be inspired to find the solutions to the theological problems raised by those revelations ...'

To sum up: the theory of multiple authorship (since dual authorship breaks down into this) creates at least as many difficulties as it appears to settle. (It also raises questions elsewhere in the OT, where pre-exilic prophets appear to use material from this book; but this cannot be pursued here.) It makes Isaiah the author of a torso; it admits a criterion of analysis which leaves few of the prophets the sole authors of their writings; it envisages centuries of creative activity by not only an 'Isaiah-school' but similar groups revering other prophets, whose freedom to expand or adjust their masters' work compares strangely with the care, at a not much later date, to transmit it unaltered, and whose very existence is no more than an inference. It also has to account for the unbroken early tradition of Isaiah's unity, and to come to terms with the NT's evident endorsement of that view.

Certainly it may be argued that the NT is not pronouncing on this question, but quoting without digressing; this is the opinion of many who wholeheartedly accept its authority. None the less it is a more direct exegesis, unless the objections are overwhelming, to take it that 'Isaiah' there does mean 'Isaiah'; and at every point this approach seems to offer a similar simplicity. The alternatives (of which there are more than we have mentioned) tend to grow more elaborate the more they are followed through; and this is not a reassuring symptom. When this happens, it is usually time to look for a different centre and a tighter, more integrated scheme.

Commentary

1:1–31 A situation of crisis

1:1 The prophet and his period

Isaiah means ‘Yahweh (is) salvation’, a name well suited to the ‘evangelical prophet’. The list of kings indicates that he prophesied for at least forty years, from about 740 BC, the last year of Uzziah (cf. 6:1), until some point after the Jerusalem siege of 701 in the time of Hezekiah, whose reign continued to 687/6.

1:2–4 The great accusation

The appeal to heavens and earth recalls the parting injunction of Moses (Dt. 30:19), to which the emphatic children adds a note of personal intensity. In the Lord’s direct utterance of vs 2b, 3 (I ... me ... my) with the confirming comment of v 4, we are already at the heart of the crisis: God’s family has broken with him. (V 3 is still more poignant in the terse original, without the but. In v 4a the sense may well be ‘[God’s] brood, evildoers!’—the same paradox as in v 2b.) The title the Holy One of Israel is almost peculiar to Isaiah, with twelve occurrences in chs. 1–39 and thirteen in 40–66. Elsewhere it is found only twice. It echoes the seraphim’s cry (6:3), yet mitigates the remoteness of ‘holy’ by the fact of God’s self-giving to Israel. Ho. 11:9 anticipates the thought.

1:5–9 The devastation of Judah

Whether this is one of Isaiah’s later oracles, placed here to open the book on a note of urgency, or whether it is a flash of pre-vision (the as and like of vs 7d, 8d, rather suggest this, for the prophet seems to be describing what only he can see), it highlights certain themes given him at his call. Cf. the closed minds of v 5a with 6:9–10; the devastation of v 7 with 6:11–12; the sparing of the few in v 9 with 6:13. Here is the first hint of the ‘remnant’ motif, to be prominent as the prophecy develops (see especially 10:20–22).

The picture in vs 5–6 is not of a sick man, but of someone flogged within an inch of his life, yet asking for more. V 5a makes this point, and the symptoms of 6b are those of inflicted injuries; cf. the welts with the ‘wounds’ (‘stripes’ AV) of 53:5. The literal reality comes out in vs 7–8: it is the land of Judah trampled under foreign hordes, with only Jerusalem (Zion) left standing. It is evidently the aftermath of Sennacherib’s invasion, which has its outline in 2 Ki. 18:13, its effects glimpsed in Is. 37:30–32, and its statistics recorded on the Taylor Prism where Sennacherib claims forty-six walled towns as captured, together with ‘innumerable villages’ and a fifth of a million people. The shelter is the field-worker’s or watchman’s shanty, a forlorn relic of the harvest. So much for glorious Zion—within an ace of being wiped out like Sodom (9).

1:10–20 Pious corruption and its cleansing

To be addressed as Sodom was virtually charge and sentence in one. As a disaster site, Sodom meant all that Pompeii or Hiroshima have come to signify to us; hence v 9. For ill repute it stood alone—until Isaiah spoke v 10. He was supported by Ezekiel (Ezk. 16:48) and by our Lord (Mt. 11:23), who measured (and still measures) guilt by opportunity. Of all prophetic outbursts at religious unreality (cf. 1 Sa. 15:22; Je. 7:21–23; Ho. 6:6; Am. 5:21–24; Mi. 6:6–8), this is the most powerful and sustained. Its vehemence is unsurpassed, even in Amos, and the form and content build up together. First, the offerings are rejected, then the offerers (11–12); but while God’s tone sharpens from distate to revulsion, his specific accusation is held back to the lurid end of v 15: Your hands are full of blood.

Now reproach gives way to command, in eight thunderous calls to have done with evil (16) and get busy with good (17). This is repentance at full stretch, unsparingly personal, ungrudgingly practical (cf. Dn. 4:27; Mt. 3:8; Lk. 19:8). But these searching demands prepare for the offer of unmerited salvation which immediately follows.

It is striking that the great offer is introduced (18), like the great accusation of vs 2–4, with an echo of the law courts: let us reason together, i.e. let us argue our case (cf. Jb. 23:7). God must have frank confrontation; but, given this, he can change the unchangeable and delete the indelible (the scarlet and crimson were not only glaring; they were fast colours); only so can the call, Wash ... yourselves (16) be anything but a mockery. Vs 19–20 remind us once more of the life-and-death alternatives in Dt. 30:15–20 (cf. on v 2, above), which could almost be called the text of the discourse.

1:21–31 God’s lament and resolve

1:21–23 Lost purity. As in a funeral dirge (‘How the mighty have fallen!’, 2 Sa. 1:25; cf. the ‘How—!’ of 14:12; La. 1:1, etc.) the theme is vanished glory; even the metaphors for it tail off from the tragic to the trivial (wife ... silver ... wine). Only the moral loss is lamented; not David’s empire or Solomon’s wealth, simply their justice. V 23 presents in miniature the same progression from spiritual revolt to social injustice which was traced between vs 2 and 17.

1:24–26 Refining fire. God takes up his own metaphor from v 22, to reveal the fiery aspect of love and the merciful aspect of judgment. It is love, the opposite of indifference, which counts your dross as my enemies (cf. 62:1; Rev. 3:19).

1:27–31 Destroying fire. God’s line between friend and foe, the redeemed and the broken, runs right through Zion; not between Jew and Gentile but between penitent ones (i.e. lit. those who ‘turn’) and rebels. For the latter, the fire is the end, not the beginning. The key to the metaphor of oaks and gardens (29–30) is in v 31; they stand here for human strength and organization, which one is tempted to trust, i.e. the mighty man and his work, impressive but precarious (cf. Am. 2:9). (It is unnecessary to see a reference to idols or fertility rites, e.g. the miniature ‘gardens of Adonis’ whose withering re-enacted the annual death of the god, although these may have suggested the unusual metaphor.) There is a modern ring to the warning that man’s very skill can be his undoing, the spark (31) that sets off the conflagration.

2:1–4:6 God’s Jerusalem and man’s

The new heading suggests that these prophecies may have circulated as a unit before their inclusion in the full collection. They alternate sharply between the final glory of Jerusalem and its sordid present.

2:2–5 The city of God

Here, as in the nearly identical Mi. 4:1–5, is seen the true eminence of Zion, that the Lord is in her (cf. Ps. 68:15–16, where higher peaks look on with envy); and this is the only glory of the church. Her role is to draw people (2c, 3a), not to dragoon them; but their need is of God’s uncompromising truth and rule (3b, 4a; cf. 42:4), the firm centre to any perfect circle. The idyllic close to the prophecy (4bc) cannot be torn away from the opening, or we are left with the bitter caricature of this scene in Joel 3:9–10. So, both here and in Micah, vision issues in appeal (5), not to dream of a world movement one day, but to respond in the present and on the spot.

Perhaps our Lord had this passage in mind when the first token of the Gentile inflow elicited his prophecy of being lifted up (the same verb, in a richer sense, as in the LXX of Is. 2:2b) to draw all men to himself (Jn. 12:32).

2:6–9 The city of mammon

The flood of superstition (6) alliances (6c), wealth (7a), armaments (7b) and idols (8), making cosmopolitan Judah anything but the light to the nations pictured just above, suggests the days of Jotham or Ahaz, early in Isaiah’s career, between the prosperity of Uzziah and the reforms of Hezekiah. Thronged though it is, the land is destitute; it has everything but God (6a).

On the reputation of the Philistines for soothsaying (6) cf. 1 Sa. 6:2–6; 2 Ki. 1:2–4. On the materialism shown in v 7 see Dt. 17:16–17. The word for idols is a favourite term in Isaiah, perhaps because it is identical with the adjective ‘worthless’ (cf. Jb. 13:4). Men and people (‘ādā m... ’iš, the generic and individual terms for ‘men’) are translated ‘low and high’ in Ps. 49:2 (very much as in AV, RV here; but this is to read rather too much into them). They recur, as a way of saying ‘everyone’ in vs 11 and 17.

2:10–22 The terror of the Lord

The ominous refrains (10b, 19b, 21b; 11 and 17) and the immensity of the scene make this a poem of extraordinary power. It consummates Isaiah’s opening vision of the Lord ‘high and exalted’ (6:1) and provides the final argument against reliance on earthly might, which is a constant theme of his prophecy. The fact that the LORD Almighty has a day (12) gives Isaiah’s preaching the same forward thrust as Paul’s (cf. Acts 17:31)—an element the church tends to lose—and in this passage the reference is clearly to the last day not some intermediate crisis. The apocalyptic chs. 24–27 will attend to this in closer detail.

The array of high things covers much of what we perennially find impressive in natural resources (13–14), constructed defences (15), technical and cultural achievements (16; see below), and above all, in man himself and man-made religion (17–18). But the end is more striking still, its scene of frantic haste (like that of Rev. 6:15–17.) throwing into relief the present patience of God, who could reduce us in a moment to ignominious flight and to flinging away what he has so long commanded us to put away (20).

Tarshish (16; see the NIV mg.) perhaps means a refinery, and ships so named would be those built to carry a cargo of ingots. Or it may stand for Tartessus in Spain, and for far-ranging vessels (cf. 23:6). The rare word for vessel (AV ‘pictures’, RV ‘imagery’) has, it seems, the sense of ‘ships’, stressing in this instance their beauty (stately), rather than their size. V 22 is absent from the LXX, but it has the same important function as v 5, to translate vision into action. The allusion to breath ... nostrils is to people’s slender hold on life; it makes an effective prelude to the next chapter.

3:1–15 Judgment by decay

Here all is as beggarly as in the previous scene it was cosmic and overpowering. It is a study in disintegration, through the pressure of scarcity on a people without ideals. The scarcity, which is desperate, is twofold; of material things (food and water, v 1; clothing, v 7) and of leadership (2–4). In parts of Judah the prophecy no doubt was beginning to come true by the time the Assyrians had done their pillaging and deporting (see on 1:5–9), but its real fulfilment waited a century to Nebuchadnezzar’s removal of the ablest citizens to Babylon (cf. 2 Ki. 24:14), leaving behind an utterly weak and irresponsible regime.

The list of leading men (2–3) provides a firsthand glimpse of the society of Isaiah’s day, whose respected figures included a liberal sprinkling of charlatans (soothsayer ... clever enchanter). But for all the misrule of this company, worse was to come; first in sheer incompetence and resultant anarchy (4–5) and finally in a ruin so complete that it would seem irretrievable (6–8). The boys and mere children of v 4 are a telling metaphor, like the youths and women of v 12; but the heap of ruins (6) may well be meant literally. In spite of the assurance that Jerusalem would not fall to Sennacherib (e.g. 37:33–35.), Isaiah saw as plainly as Micah that its final glory (cf. 2:2–4) would have to be preceded by destruction (e.g. 22:4–5; 32:14; 39:6; cf. Mi. 3:12; 4:1–8.). It was no part of his teaching (though this is often asserted) that God would unconditionally preserve his city.

Paradoxically, the utter defeatism which is predicted in vs 6 and 7 is traced back in the following verses to the present spirit of bravado. The fine show of free thinking and moral daring described in vs 8b and 9 not only affronts God himself, who is the only source of glory (as the striking close of v 8 makes plain), but leaves one ultimately nothing to believe in. After the sceptic has had his fling, he is left stranded in the wasteland he has helped to produce. So vs 13–15 pass sentence on Isaiah’s brutal and pitiless contemporaries, who have set the fatal process in motion. Ch. 5 will be more explicit; it will not be more damning.

3:16–4:1 Silk to sackcloth

Triviality has never been more mercilessly exposed, or more abruptly overtaken by tragedy. Even the opening parade is jarring as well as absurd, against the ugly background of v 15 which is its human cost. There is no need for caricature; the twenty-one items of finery (18–23) make a little kingdom of their own, enough to occupy the whole mind, but utterly vulnerable. The terrible transformation scene (3:24–4:1) has often been enacted; and in vs 25–26 the fate of the individuals becomes symbolic of that of the mother-city itself—an image to be used again both of Babylon and Jerusalem (cf. 47:1–3; 52:2).

Although these particular trivialities may seem remote, all generations—and both sexes—have their own solemn absurdities which can be all-absorbing. In the context of these chapters they present us with one more aspect of earthly glory, its emptiness, which must be put to shame before the glory of God. This splendour now breaks through in the following section.

4:2–6 The glory to come

The general tenor of the passage, in its context, is that salvation lies on the far side of judgment. Israel's glory must be that of new growth after destruction, of holiness after a fiery cleansing, and of God's 'Shekinah'—his manifested presence, as in the exodus days.

Branch (2) is a misleading term for the 'shoot of new growth' which is paralleled by the fruit of the land. The point is that Israel must be reborn; from her roots a new crop must spring up when judgment has removed all her present glory and all but a few survivors. It is the renewed community that is in mind at this point; later it will emerge that one man will be this new growth par excellence (cf. Je. 23:5; Zc. 3:8; 6:12; and similar expressions in Is. 11:1).

The NIV obscures the individualism of v 3 (lit. 'he who is left ..., who remains ..., every one written for life ...'). The new Israel will consist of the personally holy, whose names are in the book of life (cf. Ex. 32:32–33; Mal. 3:16; Rev. 20:12–15). But v 5 depicts the community of these, assembled in a very different spirit from that of 1:13, and overarched by God's glory. This glory will rest on the whole mount, not merely on the sanctuary as in the wilderness, since all are holy now. The hymn, 'Glorious things of thee are spoken', basing one of its verses on vs 5 and 6, rightly sees here God's presence 'for a glory and a covering' over and around his church. Cf. v 6 with 25:4–5.

5:1–30 The bitter vintage

A self-contained sequence, this chapter has much in common with its predecessors (for the vineyard metaphor, cf. 3:14; for the humbling of the lofty, cf. 2:9 with 5:15), and it castigates some of the social sins we have already met. It brings the book's long overture to a strong climax.

5:1–7 The parable

This is a little masterpiece. Its opening, as a love song, catches the ear and the imagination; the vineyard, like the walled garden and orchard in the Song of Solomon (e.g. Song 4:12–15), will surely speak of a bride and her beauty, guarded for the bridegroom. But the listeners are brought up short by the anticlimax and the appeal for their opinion (3–4)—only to find that like David before Nathan (2 Sa. 12:1–7) they have been assenting to their own impeachment (cf. also Mt. 21:40–43). Finally, in the original language, the charge is pressed home by an unforgettable last line, terse as an epigram (7). Its double word-play defies reproduction, but might be freely rendered: 'Did he find right? Nothing but riot! Did he find decency? Only despair.'

The parable brings home, as nothing else could, the sheer unreason and indefensibility of sin—we find ourselves searching for some cause of the vine's failure, and there is none. Only humans could be as capricious as that.

5:8–23 The six woes

Here ‘the wild grapes of Judah’ (G.A. Smith’s phrase) show themselves in the plainest of terms. The woes follow one another with increasing rapidity, to give a sense of mounting vehemence, as in the impassioned appeals at the climax of 1:12–17. They are a sample, not an inventory, related to Isaiah’s prevailing theme of human arrogance and its downfall; so they are predominantly the sins of the high and mighty.

The attack has all the bite of personal portraiture. Here are the great, for all to see; they emerge as extortioners (8–10), playboys (11–12; cf. 22–23) and scoffers, whose only predictable values are cash ones (18–23).

5:8–10 Extortioners. The property law which Naboth defended with his life (cf. Lv. 25:23; 1 Ki. 21:3) has become a dead letter, but the craving for empty acres will be ironically fulfilled. The bath was a liquid measure equal to the dry ephah, of about 8 gallons (36 litres); the homer (not to be confused with the omer of Ex. 16:36) was ten times as large (cf. Ezk. 45:11). So the harvest was to yield disastrously less than the sowing.

5:11–17 Playboys. Refusal to think, i.e. to face God’s facts (12b, 13a), is anathema to the prophets (Je. 8:7; Ho. 4:6; Am. 6:1–7), whether it takes the form of mindless religion (1:3, 10–17), sophistry (5:20–21), occultism (8:19–20) or the sodden escapism depicted here. The judgment of these sensualists, like that of the fashion-crazed women of 3:16–4:1, will be to lose the one thing they have lived for (13b) and to find themselves the object of a more insatiable appetite than their own (14). The grave is lit. Sheol (see on 14:9, 15; 38:10, 18).

5:18–23 Scoffers. Since Hebrew often uses the same word for a thing and its outcome, v 18 may mean ‘who draw punishment (on themselves) ... , who draw retribution (on themselves) ... ’. (cf. Heb. of Gn. 4:13; Zc. 14:19). The next verse tends to confirm this. Alternatively, the metaphor may be intentionally strange, since the scoffer in his perversity is not dragged into sin but tugs eagerly at it, makes sure of it. There are such ‘fearless thinkers’ in most generations, whether blasphemous (19), perverted (20) or calmly omniscient (21). They cut as fine a figure as the fearless drinkers of v 22, and the realists of v 23 who know the value of money, if of little else.

5:24–30 God’s scavengers

The repeated Therefore gives a doubly inevitable note to the judgment, in terms of logical outcome (24) and judicial wrath (25), both of which are always present when God punishes. The hand upraised to strike will be glimpsed again in 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4; so this isolated reference could be a scribal displacement, but is better seen as a shadow of the approaching storm, uniting this chapter of judgment to its successors. The army of terrifying precision and ferocity presented in the final verses, machine and wild beast in one, is Assyria’s to the life. But this power, the greatest of its day, is at the Lord’s beck and call (26)—small comfort to the rebel, for whom this group of chapters ends without a ray of hope.

6:1–13 The prophet’s call

Only now do we pause for the inaugural vision, so urgent was the opening call to repentance, and so necessary the detailed scene of these chapters to show what wrung Isaiah’s confession from him (5) and what was the context of the decree of hardening (9–10). In this vision, the major concerns of the book are discernible: God’s inescapable holiness and sole majesty; the glory he has decreed and the clearance it demands; the cleansing of the penitent and the resurgent life that will yet break forth from the stock of Israel.

King Uzziah died after, not before, Isaiah's call, as 1:1 makes clear. If his death has significance apart from its date, it is that he died a leper, for flouting God's holiness when 'his heart was lifted up' (2 Ch. 26:16, RV; cf. Is. 2:17). The themes of throne and temple (1) and King (5) suggest to some writers a festival of divine enthronement, but there is no hard evidence for it; their importance, in any case, lies in showing to whom all human authority must bow.

Seraphs means 'fiery ones', an epithet suited to the serpents of Nu. 21:6, 8 and Is. 14:29; 30:6. Here these winged creatures are man-like (his feet; and his hand in v 6), but the point of the description is to re-emphasize the holiness of God, in whose presence even the dazzling and the sinless are overwhelmed, fit neither to see him nor be seen, yet swift to serve (2) and tireless to praise him (3). The antiphon (3), for all its brevity, thunders out (cf. v 4) the nature, name and power of God in its first line (Almighty is lit. 'of hosts', i.e. of the armies, or resources, which he commands in heaven and earth), and in its second line the scope and character of his dominion. Glory is the shining-out of what he is, and therefore of his holiness; the whole earth, not merely Israel, was made by him and for this. The vast implications of it for judgment and salvation are seen in 11:9; 40:5; Nu. 14:21–23; Hab. 2:14. Notice the variants on the theme of fullness in vs 1, 3, 4.

The shaking of foundations, the darkness and the dismay awaken echoes of Sinai (Ex. 19:16–18) and premonitions of judgment. (See the NT's comment on all these in Heb. 12:18–29, and note the relevance of Mt. 5:8). It is integral to Isaiah's message that his words will be those of a forgiven man, himself as guilty as those to whom he will offer life or death. It is also characteristic that judgment is prominent in the cleansing. The fiery messenger and burning coal must have presaged at first anything but salvation (cf. 1:25–26; 4:4), yet they came from the place of sacrifice and spoke the language of atonement (forgiven is from the Heb. verb 'to atone'). The live coal symbolizes the total significance of the altar from which it came; that the penalty of sin was paid by a substitute offered in the sinner's place. The symbol, applied to Isaiah's lips (the point at which his need was most pressing), assures him of personal forgiveness.

Isaiah's 'Here am I! Send me!' is doubly remarkable. First, for its contrast to his previous despair (5) and to the diffidence of, say, Moses or Jeremiah. Secondly, for the fact that this human voice is accepted in the heavenly court. (See 1 Ki. 22:19–23 and Rev. 5:1–14 for comparison and contrast.) The decree of hardening, quoted in full or in part at least six times in the NT (e.g. Mt. 13:14–15; Acts 28:26–27.), should be read through to its conclusion in vs 11–13, where the judgment is seen to clear the ground for new growth. Isaiah fulfilled this commission to blind and deafen by proclaiming (not withholding) the truth. God here shares with the prophet the critical significance of his ministry. Sinful Israel has come to the point where one more rejection of the truth will finally confirm them for inevitable judgment. The dilemma of the prophet is that there is no way of saving the sinner but by the very truth whose rejection will condemn him utterly. The one sign of life (cf. 11:1; Jb. 14:7–9) is absent from the LXX, which omits v 13c; but the Isaiah Scroll from Qumran supports our text, and it is inconceivable that Isaiah's doctrine of the godly remnant (e.g. 10:20–23) should have contradicted his opening commission. So the vision ends with hope. Instead of the 'seed of evildoers' (1:4, AV, RV) there will survive the holy seed—an expression of infinite promise in the light both of v 3, concerning holiness, and of the recurrent pledges of the victorious 'seed' in Gn. 3:15; 22:18; Gal. 3:16.

7:1–12:6 Storm and sun: Assyria and Immanuel

These chapters have been called ‘The book of Immanuel’, after the promised child of 7:14; 8:8, whose nature and reign emerge in 9:1–7 and 11:1–10 against a background of local menace (7:1–9.) and world-wide dispersion (11:11–16.). The prophecies arise straight out of a contemporary crisis, but they extend to the last days (9:1) and the whole earth (11:9–10; 12:4–5).

7:1–17 Isaiah confronts King Ahaz

7:1–9 The call to faith. The date is c. 735 BC, and the situation a desperate bid by Israel and Syria to unite their neighbours against the all-conquering Assyria. On Judah’s refusal to cooperate, they have arrived in force to replace her king with their own man, the son of Tabeel (6).

Isaiah’s intervention, amid the general alarm, is impressive and significant. His son Shear-Jashub (‘A remnant will [re]turn’) was living portent of judgment and salvation (see on 1:27; cf. 8:18). The very meeting-place would prove, one day, how fatal was the course the king was set on (36:2). The injunction, keep calm and don’t be afraid, was the first of a lifelong series of appeals for trust instead of intrigue (cf. v 9b; 8:12–13; 28:16 and especially 30:15). The appeal was rational enough: Syria and Israel, the two smouldering stubs, or ‘fag-ends’ (Cheyne), would soon be snuffed out. Syria was crushed in 732, while Israel lost her northern territories as early as 734, her national existence in 722, and her racial identity through a series of re-peoplings which continued to at least the reign of Esarhaddon (cf. Ezr. 4:2). By the end of this (669 BC) she was indeed too shattered to be a people (8).

The force of vs 7b–9a seems to be that whereas by implication Judah is under the only God, her enemies are inevitably under men—and what men; to name them is enough! The call to faith (9b) is the pith of Isaiah’s preaching, with a slogan-like play on words, as elusive to the translator as that of 5:7. It might be paraphrased: ‘Hold God in doubt, you’ll not hold out!’, or ‘Unsure—insecure!’

7:10–17 The sign of Immanuel. To offer any proof that Ahaz cared to name made it clear that the call to faith was (and is) primarily a call to the will (cf. Jn. 7:17). To wave the offer aside was to reject God flatly, but Ahaz had already made up his mind. Faith played no part in his religion (2 Ki. 16:3–4, 10–20) or his politics. Behind the smooth scriptural talk (12; cf. Dt. 6:16) lay a plan to outwit his enemies by making friends with the biggest of them (cf. 2 Ki. 16:7–10). What kind of friend Assyria would prove, Isaiah made clear in v 17, reinforced by vs 18–25.

Meanwhile God had his own sign, for a wider audience than Ahaz (the you in vs 13–14 is plural, for David’s whole dynasty) and of richer meaning than a show of power. The attendant details partly reassure (15, 16), partly warn (17); the curds and honey are enigmatic, they are symbols of natural plenty (cf. 22; Ex. 3:8) yet also of a land depopulated (22b) and untilled (cf. 23–25). But the heart of the sign is Immanuel. Who he is remains unsaid; it will emerge in 9:6–7; 11:1–5. Enough, so far, that while the king calls in an army, God looks to the birth of a child (cf. Gn. 17:19).

How the sign fits the crisis is much debated. As a straight prophecy of Christ (cf. Mt. 1:22–23.) it may seem too remote to speak to Ahaz; yet the sign was for the threatened house of David (6, 13; see the paragraph above), and the very vision of a coming prince was itself a reassurance. Cf. 37:30; Ex. 3:12; Rom. 4:11 for signs to confirm faith rather than compel it. See also on 8:1–4, below. But God may have unveiled the distant scene by way of the near. Some suggest that the sign had immediate value in (a) the time it indicated (the few years from the conception of a child—any child—now, to his reaching the age of conscious choice; 16); or (b) the name (‘God [is] with us’) which a contemporary mother would be moved to give her son—the opposite of Ichabod (1 Sa. 4:21); or (c) the rank, if it announced a royal birth, which tends to be a harbinger of hope. (But on any reckoning, this child could not be Hezekiah, born some years before.) These possibilities are not necessarily in conflict with each other, nor with the long-term prediction of Christ.

The term virgin (14) is supported by the LXX as quoted in Mt. 1:23. The nearest English equivalent is ‘girl’. The Hebrew word describes a potential bride in Gn. 24:43, and the young Miriam in Ex. 2:8; it presumes rather than states virginity and is a term outgrown at marriage. Before its NT fulfilment its miraculous implications would pass unnoticed, over-shadowed by those mentioned above. (For a full discussion, see E. J. Young, Studies in Isaiah [IVP, 1954], pp. 143–198.) The tenses of will be with child and will give birth are indeterminate; the Hebrew participles do not distinguish between present and future.

When (15) should probably be ‘until’ or ‘in order that’.

7:18–8:22 The choice expounded

7:18–25 Invasion and its aftermath. The two metaphors in vs 18–20 make the swarms of looting soldiers not only an uncomfortably vivid prospect but clearly a divine scourge (a theme developed in 10:5–11). On the hired razor (20) cf. Ezk. 29:18–20. The irony was that Ahaz imagined he had hired it. The point of vs 21–25 is the sad spectacle of the promised land reverting to jungle for lack of Israelites, its abundance (22) a rebuke to their sparseness, and its wild state a proof of their decline. It is the kind of reproach that a failing church might receive from inherited glories and commitments which it can no longer sustain.

8:1–4 The sign of Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. The sign of Immanuel (7:14–17), although it concerned ultimate events, did imply a pledge for the immediate future, in that however soon Immanuel were born, the present threat would have passed before he could be even aware of it. But the time of his birth was undisclosed; hence the new sign is given, to deal only with the contemporary scene and with its darker aspect. This child would be of ordinary birth, and by his name, ‘Quick-pickings-Easy-prey’ (J.B. Phillips), he would be a standing witness (cf. 8:18) to God’s predictions both about the enemy at the gate (4; cf. 7:16) and about Assyria’s next victim, Judah itself (cf. 7:17). The careful attestation (2) would attract notice and also confirm that the name had preceded the event. (For a later placard see 30:7–8.)

8:5–8 God’s gentle flow, and Assyria’s torrent. Since Shiloah (cf. Jn. 9:7) is another word for ‘conduit’ (in this case an open aqueduct, not Hezekiah’s tunnel, which was still in the future), it was probably the encounter with the king (7:3) that suggested this figure for God’s quiet help. By calling in evil to fight evil, Judah would find herself in the path of the very flood she had unleashed; and the land she was jeopardizing was Immanuel’s. But there is hope as well as menace in the phrase up to the neck (8); for Immanuel’s sake there is a limit set (cf. 10:24–27.).

8:9–15 God our refuge or our ruin. These splendidly defiant verses are the prophet’s response to the meaning of Immanuel, God is with us (10c), and to the Lord’s insistence (his strong hand upon me; 11) that the people should reshape all their thinking, including their terms for things and their emotional attitudes (12), round God himself. (Cf. the call to a transformed outlook in Rom. 12:2.) Conspiracy may refer to the intimidating coalition of 7:2; alternatively, it may mean no more than ‘league’ or ‘alliance’ and be the term Ahaz was using for his siding with

Assyria. If the latter, Isaiah is saying ‘This is no alliance worth the name’, i.e. ‘Don’t trust Assyria or fear Syria; trust and fear God.’

Vs 12b–13a are quoted in 1 Pet. 3:14–15, which strikingly identifies Christ with the LORD Almighty, as indeed Jesus himself had already implied in his allusion to Is. 8:14–15 in Lk. 20:18a (cf. Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:7–8). See also on 28:16, below. It is as the most solid of all realities that God is presented here; either all-sufficient or insuperable.

8:16–22 The light withdrawn. The general tenor of the paragraph is that Israel is refusing the light (19–22) and thereby losing God’s teaching and blessing (16–17). All they will have is signs (18); all they can expect is darkness.

But vs 16–18 are a kernel of immense promise. With the expression my disciples, God introduces a new definition of his people and their relation to him (cf. Jn. 6:45). (These are the willing exceptions to 6:9–10.) Isaiah’s responsive faith (17) speaks for such, and the little group of v 18 is seen in Heb. 2:13 as typical of the church gathered round Christ—a model church indeed, teachable, faithful, expectant, conspicuous. On the function of Isaiah’s sons as signs and symbols see 7:3; 8:1–4. (The speakers in vs. 16 and 17–22 are evidently the Lord (16) and the prophet (17–22); the imperatives of v 16 are singular, and there is no individual whom the prophet could be naturally addressing. An attractive alternative to Isaiah as implied recipient of God’s message might be Immanuel (cf. v 8c; Heb. 2:13), but Isaiah’s sign-bearing sons seem to be in mind in v 18.

The contrast to this godly group is very marked in vs 19–22. With mediums instead of prophets, gibberish instead of teaching, and the dead as guides to the living, it is small wonder that they have no light of dawn. For the prohibition of such practices, see e.g. Dt. 18:9–12.

9:1–7 The Messianic dawn

The Hebrew Bible takes v 1 with the previous chapter, but Mt. 4:15–16 makes it the opening of our passage. Zebulun and Naphtali are highly topical here, for they fell to Assyria within months of Isaiah’s meeting with Ahaz (see on 7:1–9). So the first part of Israel to succumb would be the first to see the glory (1b)—a striking prophecy which went unheeded (cf. Jn. 1:46; 7:52). The mounting relief and joy in vs 1–5 as the trappings of war are abolished prepare us to meet the deliverer; but instead of some latter-day Gideon (cf. v 4), it is the child (6) already foretold as Immanuel in 7:14; 8:8.

Whereas 7:14 concentrates on his birth and 11:1–16 on his kingdom, vs 6–7 chiefly emphasize his person. Other scriptures confirm that the first three titles imply divinity; e.g. Wonderful regularly means ‘supernatural’ (cf. especially Jdg. 13:18), and it is Yahweh who is ‘wonderful in counsel’ in Is. 28:29. There have been attempts to reduce Mighty God to ‘god-like hero’ (cf. Ezk. 32:21, where, however, the term is plural), but 10:21 uses the identical term alongside ‘the LORD, the Holy One of Israel’ (10:20). Everlasting Father has no exact parallel but there is a paradox in so naming a child yet to be born. Father signifies the paternal benevolence of the perfect Ruler over a people whom he loves as his children. Peace in Hebrew implies prosperity as well as tranquillity, and v 7 takes up the Hebrew of Prince (in the word government) as well as peace, adding now the first explicit assurance that the prince will be Davidic (cf. 11:1). On the final phrase of v 7 see Ezk. 36:22; Zc. 8:2.

9:8–10:4 The shadow over Samaria

God's hand, poised to strike, was seen in 5:25; the same threat overhangs this passage, punctuating it at 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4. While the northern kingdom is principally in mind (9, 21), the final passage (10:1–4) might well include Judah, as did 5:24–25.

9:8–12 Judgment on bravado. To laugh off the facts (10) may put heart into an audience, but it is a refusal to face what the symptoms imply. Nothing can then avert judgment. Rezin's foes (11) would be principally the Assyrians (see on 7:1–9); the pressures of v 12 may have developed between the Assyrian conquest of Damascus in 732 and Samaria's fall in 722.

9:13–17 Judgment on laxity. Judgment begins with leaders (cf. Jas. 3:1) but does not excuse those who follow (17). Among the former, it is the prophets who earn God's contempt as well as his censure (15), compared, as Delitzsch puts it, to 'the tail of a fawning dog'.

9:18–21 Judgment on disunity. Sin, doubly destructive, first reduces society to a jungle, then spreads its fires through it—as our modern strifes still bear witness. But self-inflicted judgment is still God's judgment (vs 19a, 21b).

10:1–4 Judgment on injustice. Not the raw passions of the earlier paragraphs but the legalized wrongs of government (1) make the climax to the series. The haunting question of v 3 could undermine the exploits of a lifetime, all of them within the laws of the land.

10:5–34 God's axe over Judah

This is an important treatment of God's control of history, in the world at large and among his chosen people. Vs 9–11 seem to date the oracle after the fall of Samaria (722 BC); but Isaiah's complete prior certainty of this event (cf. 8:4) must not be overlooked.

10:5–19 Assyria, God's tool. The knowledge that the aggressor is wielded by God puts the question of wicked men's success in its proper context, by showing that it serves the ends of justice when it seems to defy them (6–7), and it is neither impressive in itself (15) nor ultimately unpunished (12). Its hollowness is self-confessed, incidentally, in the samples of Assyrian thinking: the complacency of vs 10–11, the pride of v 13a, and the thief's mentality of vs 13b, 14. The strong cities of v 9 (cf. 36:19) mark the enemy's inexorable approach, preserved in the Hebrew word order, from Carchemish on the Euphrates down to nearby Samaria. Cf. the more localized, whirlwind advance in vs 28–31.

Of the two metaphors, wasting disease and a forest fire, intertwined in vs 16–19 (Hebrew has no convention against mixed metaphors), the former has the extra bite, perhaps, of corresponding to the actual means God would use against the Assyrian army (see on 2 Ki. 19:35), while the latter reiterates Isaiah's dominant theme of bringing low what is lofty (cf. vs 33–34; 2:12–13).

10:20–23 A remnant converted. Both implications of both terms in the expression A remnant will return (Shear-Jashub, cf. 7:3) are brought out in this pregnant passage. On the one hand, no more than a sprinkling will survive the approaching judgment or come back from deportation (22–23; cf. 11:11); on the other hand, return to the Mighty God (21) implies conversion. God looks for people who repent; whose trust, unlike that of Ahaz in 2 Ki. 16:7, is in him rather than in man (20–21). Such is the true Israel; it is not the whole mass of Abraham's descendants (see the allusion in v 22a to Gn. 22:17; cf. Rom. 4:16; Gal. 3:7–9). Paul not only quotes this passage (Rom. 9:27–28) but argues extensively that the 'remnant, chosen by grace' (Rom. 11:5) is a key to God's dealings with Israel and the world.

On the Mighty God (21) see on 9:6. On the double mention of a decreed devastation (22–23) note the deliberation with which God acts throughout this chapter—see the poised hand of v 4

(with 9:12 etc.), the impartiality of vs 12, 25, the concern for simple justice in vs 2, 22b, and the positive outcome envisaged in vs 20–21.

10:24–34 The aggressor halted. This is a double appeal for faith. First, by recalling ‘His love in time past’ (24–27), secondly by depicting an Assyrian threat suddenly brought to nothing (28–34). This is pictured as a thrust from the north, covering the last 10 or 20 miles (16–32 km) to Jerusalem. Since the actual route of Sennacherib’s force was to be from Lachish (cf. 36:2), south-west of Jerusalem, the aim of the oracle is not, presumably, to inform but to inspire, first conjuring up the most vivid impression of a northern foe swooping on Jerusalem, then abruptly changing the scene to the toppling of forest giants (33–34)—the distinctive judgment metaphor of this prophecy (cf. 2:12–13; 6:13; 10:18–19). It gives dramatic reinforcement to Isaiah’s do not be afraid (24), his watchword throughout the crisis (cf. 7:4; 8:12–13).

11:1–12:6 The Messianic kingdom

We return to the theme of Immanuel, and while the fallen fortunes of the royal house (1) reveal the dark side of the sign given to Ahaz (7:13–25), the rest is bright.

11:1–5 The perfect king. The tree, felled but not finished, makes a telling contrast to the razed forest of Assyria (10:33–34). In 6:13 the tree-stump was Israel, living on in the remnant (see also on 4:2); here it is the house of David, and its growing-point is one man.

1–3a The Spirit (2), not royal birth alone, fits him for office, like the judges and early kings (cf. Jdg. 3:10; 6:34 etc.; 1 Sa. 10:10; 16:13), so that he is a Solomon, Gideon and David in one, yet not partially or fitfully endued, but abidingly (2a) and richly. The gifts are threefold rather than sevenfold: wisdom and understanding for government (cf. 1 Ki. 3:9–12), counsel and power for war (cf. 9:6; 28:6; 36:5), and knowledge and the fear of the LORD for spiritual leadership (cf. 2 Sa. 23:2). The delight of v 3a carries the implication that the fear of the LORD is fragrant to him.

Vs 3b–5 show these powers exercised in turn, making him the guide, guardian and example of his people. It is already emerging in v 4b that he is supernaturally endowed, and this is clear beyond doubt in the ensuing verses.

11:6–9 Paradise regained. In this idyllic scene the title ‘Prince of Peace’ (9:6) is perfectly unfolded. Significantly, peace is hard-won; it follows judgment (cf. v 4b) and springs from righteousness (cf. v 5), true to the sequence expounded in 32:17. Its heart, however, is the relationship expressed as the knowledge of the LORD (9; cf. Je. 31:34). As a picture this is unforgettable and expresses reconciliation, concord and trust with supreme effectiveness. The reign of Christ already produces this kind of transformation in the sphere of human character, and will ultimately change the whole creation (cf. Rom. 8:19–25.). Whether this will be realized literally as depicted here is another matter; it seems better to view this as an earthly expression of the ‘new heavens and ... new earth’ (65:17, 25) in which variety will not be enmity, and the weak will be the complement, no longer the prey, of the strong. With v 9b, cf. Hab. 2:14.

11:10–16 The great homecoming. V 10, echoed in v 12a, bursts the bounds of nationality, while emphasizing that salvation is in only one name under heaven (cf. Acts 4:12). This king is both root and offspring (cf. v 1) of the royal house (cf. Rev. 22:13, 16). Note the voluntary response of the nations in vs 10, 12a (cf. 2:3; 42:4; 51:5). At the same time, not all will flock to him, and it is as clear in this passage as elsewhere that those who choose enmity will find, logically enough, destruction (14: cf. v 4). The quenching of jealousy (cf. 9:20–21) is the human counterpart of vs 6–9., liberating the combativeness of God’s people for its proper use (14; cf. Jas. 4:1, 7).

The theme of a greater exodus (15–16) will be greatly developed in the later chapters (e.g. 35:1–10; 48:20–21.), and that of a highway ... from Assyria will acquire a richer meaning in 19:23–25.

12:1–6 The song of salvation. After the exodus allusion (11:16), there are appropriate echoes of the song of Moses (cf. v 2b with Ex. 15:2a and, less exactly, v 5a with Miriam's response, Ex. 15:21a).

The anger that overhung Israel in the refrain of 9:12, 17, etc. is at last turned away, and the song celebrates the end of estrangement (1), fear (2) and want (3). It is characteristic of Isaiah that quiet trust (2) finds an early place here, and that God's comfort is the sequel to captivity (1; cf. e.g. 40:1; 66:13). But God himself is the true centre of the psalm: God in relation to the singer (1–2); God known by his deeds (4–5) and his name, i.e. his self-proclamation (note the unusual combination The LORD, the LORD in v 2 emphasizing the personal name expounded in Ex. 3:14–15; also Isaiah's special term the Holy One of Israel in v 6); above all, God present in power, great ... among you (6).

13:1–23:18 Messages for the nations

For all their obscurity of detail, these chapters teach a primary and central truth: that God's kingdom is the world. This is easy to announce in general terms; to spell it out, as this section does, is to show that this sovereignty is nothing titular but actual and searching.

The oracles were given at various times (cf. 14:28; 20:1). Brought together, they form a prelude to the world visions of chs. 24–27, and an interlude between the prediction of the Assyrian crisis in chs. 1–12 and its onset in chs. 28–39.

13:1–14:23 Babylon

That Isaiah son of Amoz (13:1; cf. 1:1) should prophesy of Babylon as the great oppressor, anticipating her role of a century or two later, has important implications for the authorship of chs. 40–66 (see the Introduction).

Against this, S. Erlandsson (The Burden of Babylon [Lund, 1970]) argues that 'Babylon' here is merely the city as it was in Isaiah's day, before its rise to imperial power, and that its destruction is that of 689 BC by its overlord, the king of Assyria. This view, however, involves relating only six of the forty-five verses directly to Babylon; seeing Israel's return from exile in 14:1–2 as unrelated to the Babylonian captivity; and directing the taunt-song of 14:4–23 at Sennacherib of Assyria, under one of his secondary titles as king of Babylon. While details of this thesis are impressive, it is hard to see why the provincial Babylon of Isaiah's day should attract this world-shaking oracle if it had no reference to the role which Babylon would play in the captivity and second exodus of Israel. Above all, the dissection of ch. 13, by which Babylon becomes almost an afterthought (19–22), and the redirection of ch. 14 to Assyria, makes this interpretation appear forced rather than compelling.

13:1–16 The day of the Lord. The poem plunges straight into a battle scene, with the signals and shouts of an attack which turns out to be a wholesale divine judgment (4–5). My holy ones (3) are lit. 'my consecrated ones', whether they are serving God wittingly or unwittingly. The term is non-moral here, as v 16 makes plain.

While Babylon is the focal point of the chapter (1, 19), it stands for something much bigger than itself, since the ambiguous Hebrew word for country (5), land (9) or earth (13), gives place to another meaning world (11). This is a setting of cosmic upheaval such as the NT uses to depict the last days (cf. vs 10, 13 with Mt. 24:29).

13:17–22 The overthrow of Babylon. The Medes (17), as the major partner in Cyrus's Medo-Persian kingdom, were destined to conquer Babylon under Cyrus in 539 BC. Their military prowess (17–18), which overthrew the Babylonian Empire, was not needed against the city itself, taken without a struggle. This was, however the beginning of the end for Babylon. Vs 19–22 telescope a decline which became irreversible when Seleucus Nicator abandoned the city in the late fourth century BC to build his new capital Seleucia, 40 miles (64 km) away. Even so, its desertion was not total until the second century AD. The creatures of vs 21–22 (cf. 14:23; 34:11–15; but 35:7) are not all identifiable, but are evidently sinister and ceremonially unclean. Hence, 'satyrs' (a kind of demon; cf. Lv. 17:7) is a more likely translation in v 21 than wild goats, since goats were ritually clean. The contrast between the jewel of kingdoms (19) and this 'haunt for every evil spirit, ... every unclean and detestable bird' (Rev. 18:2) reappears in the final overthrow of the ungodly world in Rev. 18, pictured as Babylon—the world whose glory Satan offered to Jesus in Mt. 4:8–9.

14:1–2 The tables turned. Here is the germ of chs. 40–66 and particularly of chs. 56–66, in which the dominance of Israel is a major interest. The starting-point, as in ch. 40, is divine grace, described here in terms of emotion (contrast God's compassion [1] with the heartlessness of 13:18) and of volition (choose). In this short space two aspects of the Gentiles' future relation to Israel are sketched, showing them as converts or as servants. With the resident aliens of v 1, integrated into the community, cf. 56:3–8.

The degrees of service glimpsed in v 2, ranging from friendly help (2a) to bondage (2b), reappear in e.g. 66:18–21 and 60:10–16 (see comments on 66:18 and 60:10).

14:3–23 A taunt for the king of Babylon. God gives the last word on the great conquerors to be spoken by their victims, not their admirers (3–4a). As to the identity of the king of Babylon, it is clearly not the ineffective Nabonidus, the final king (for whom Belshazzar deputized), but the whole dynasty and the kingdom personified in it. See also on vs 12–21, below.

The two movements of the taunt-song (4b–11; 12–21), framed by their prologue and epilogue (3–4a; 22–23) announce their themes at once, in vs 4b and 12, with the characteristic cry of comparison, 'How ... !' (see on 1:21). Cf. ch. 47.

The broken oppressor is the first theme; his real epitaph is the unspeakable relief the world feels at his passing (7). God's name for such thrusters is not 'men of destiny' but 'he-goats' (the literal meaning of the Hebrew word translated leaders 9), a description almost as deflating as the pathetic state to which they are all seen to come. The royal coverlet of v 11 is the last brutal truth for the hedonist. The grave (lit. 'Sheol') is the general term for the realm of the dead; it is not the penal hell, for which the NT uses the term Gehenna. The word for spirits of the departed (9) is of uncertain derivation. The poetic description here and in 26:14 and Ps. 88:10 suggests a virtual suspension of existence; but the OT can look beyond this, on occasion to the resurrection of the body (see on 26:19; Dn. 12:2).

The fallen morning star is the second theme, i.e. the tyrant's fatal ambition rather than his oppression. This song is often thought to tell of the revolt of Satan (taken with Ezk. 28); but this is a precarious conjecture. The tale of pride and downfall is at most only similar to what is said of Satan in e.g. Lk. 10:18; 1 Tim. 3:6, and in any case, when Scripture speaks directly of his fall, it refers to the break-up of his régime, not his prior fall from grace (cf. Rev. 12:9–12).

Some suggest that an existing tale of the morning star, lording it over the rest and falling to earth, may lie beyond this poem (there are Canaanite verbal parallels to the personified morning star and dawn, to the title Most High and to the picture of a northern mount of assembly of the heavenly court); but such a tale, if it existed, has not come to light. The idea of storming heaven, however, was certainly connected with Babylon (i.e. Babel; Gn. 11). One of its ironies is the idea that to be like the Most High (14) is to be self-exalted, whereas it is to be self-giving (cf. Phil. 2:5–11.). The ugliness as well as the brevity of the false glory is powerfully shown in vs 16–21.

The expression the depths ('recesses') of the pit (15), matching the hoped-for utmost heights ('recesses') of the divine mount (13), gives an early glimpse of the distinctions within Sheol which become clearer in the NT (cf. Lk. 16:26).

14:24–27 Assyria

This briefly reaffirms 10:5–34, on the immediate threat hanging over Judah. God's assertion, As I have planned ... (24) picks up the very word used of Assyria's own plans in 10:7a ('intends'). That the enemy should be broken in his apparent moment of victory, in my land, is characteristic of divine strategy (cf. Acts 4:27–28.). On the hand stretched out (26–27) cf. 9:12; 10:24–27.

14:28–32 Philistia

Vs 28 and 32 bring this oracle to life. Ahaz the pro-Assyrian is dead; Assyria is in difficulties (29a); now a Philistine mission (32a) arrives in Zion to propose a rebellion—an idea always after Hezekiah's heart. If this took place in 727, when the Assyrian Tiglath-Pileser III died, v 29a would have added force; but 716/15 is the more likely date. It was as sharp a test of obedience for Hezekiah as was that of ch. 7 for Ahaz; and the Philistines were formidable people to offend (cf. 2 Ch. 28:18–19) at this time.

God's reply is threefold. First, there is worse yet to come from Assyria (29); secondly, Philistia is a doomed people (30b–31); thirdly, true welfare is only in the Lord (30a, 32). It is the constant message of Isaiah: trust, not intrigue.

15:1–16:14 Moab

Intimate knowledge and intense sympathy, ready to alleviate judgment but powerless to avert it, are the special marks of this oracle, which is quoted and expanded in Je. 48. Moab had family ties with Israel (cf. Gn. 19:36–37) and particularly with David (cf. Ru. 4:17; 1 Sa. 22:3–4.), yet it had nothing in common with Israel's faith and appears in the OT as an evil influence (cf. e.g. Nu. 25) and inveterate enemy (cf. 2 Ki. 3:4–27).

15:1–9 Defeat and flight. The site of Ar (1) is unknown; the consonants could be read as 'city', making it another term for Kir, i.e. Kir Hareseth (cf. 16:7, 11), Moab's chief stronghold (modern Kerak), situated in the south. With Kir fallen, all was lost, but the southward flight to Zoar (5) in Edom suggests that the invasion had swept down from the north, whose cities named here (mostly on the King's Highway; cf. Nu. 21:21–30) had looked to Kir for a stand. The anguish of v 5 comes through again in 16:7, 9, 11. Sensitivity to the miseries of war (cf. Je. 4:19–21.) and generosity towards an enemy (cf. e.g. Ex. 23:4–5; Pr. 25:21–22.) are not uncommon in the OT, but they are seldom combined as poignantly as here. The refugees clutching their treasures (7; cf. Lk. 12:21) are apparently crossing a frontier; the Ravine of the Poplars may be the Wadi el-Hesy between Moab and Edom. But despite God's compassion, the judgment is from him, and must increase (cf. Mt. 23:37–38).

16:1–5 Moab can look to Zion. Moab was advised to ‘dwell in the rock’ (Heb. Sela; cf. 2 Ki. 14:7; i.e. the Edomite fortress now known as Petra), like a nesting dove (cf. Je. 48:28). But here God has stirred the nest (2) to make her seek a better refuge as a vassal of Zion. Lambs were the customary tribute from this sheep-raising country (cf. 2 Ki. 3:4). The verb in v 1 may be either send, or ‘they have sent’ (RSV); the former seems preferable.

But the pathos of v 2 speaks more eloquently than any tribute money—whether vs 3–4a express the plea of the refugees or the Lord’s charge to Zion to welcome them. (Read v 3a with the RSV as ‘Give counsel, grant justice.’). The plea, or charge, can still dramatize to us the call to use our mind (counsel), conscience (‘justice’) and resources (shelter) for the losers in life (whom God seems to name here ‘my outcasts’ in the unamended text of 4a; cf. the RV). Then the prospect of Zion as a refuge and rallying point (cf. 14:32; 2:3–4) leads in vs 4b–5 to another of Isaiah’s visions of a perfect king to come. Among the four virtues of his regime (5) notice his speed in promoting the right, in contrast to the perversity of 59:7 and the paralysis of Hab. 1:4.

16:6–14 Moab’s pride and fall. Moab’s fatal ease is captured in the vintage metaphors of Je. 48:11: ‘at rest ... , like wine left on its dregs, not poured from one jar to another’. The vine, a mainstay of Moab’s prosperity, dominates this oracle as well, with its secondary products (7), exports (8b) and festivities (10), all of them highly vulnerable.

V 12 has a bitter word-play in the Hebrew of appears ... wears herself out, and its memorable final phrase shows the bankruptcy of all pagan religion, very much as our Lord does in Mt. 6:7. As a servant ... would count them (14) means ‘shorter rather than longer’, like the grudging timekeeping of an uninterested worker.

17:1–14 Damascus and northern Israel

This is evidently from Isaiah’s early days, when Syria and northern Israel were hand in glove (see ch. 7) and their kingdoms still intact. Damascus is briefly told its fate, but Israel has the brunt of the rebuke, as well as the indignity of being classed with the heathen, her oracle placed among theirs.

Vs 3b–4, perhaps worded so as to recall the departure of the glory in Eli’s day (cf. 1 Sa. 4:21), give an alarming picture of vanished beauty and, with v 5, methodical depredation. But God’s plan to glean a handful of converts, worshipping their Maker (7) instead of their manufactures, duly came to pass (see 2 Ch. 30:10–11). Their strong cities (9) are those left by the Canaanites and still standing in Isaiah’s day. If this was a tragically wasteful process, vs 10–11 show that it was of Israel’s choosing, in the double metaphor of the neglected stronghold (10a) and the spoilt vintage. The imported vines, so quickly promising, stood for Israel’s pact with pagan Damascus against Judah and Assyria, to her own ruin (see 7:5–8). Vs 12–14 generalize the assurances given in e.g. 7:8; 8:4; their most striking parallel is Ps. 46.

18:1–7 Ethiopia

The word for Ethiopia in v 1 is Cush, or in our terms the Sudan; but Isaiah includes the region beyond the rivers (i.e. presumably the Atbara and Blue Nile) which suggests the present Ethiopia. The term for whirring is not unlike the word ‘tsetse’, imitating the buzzing of insects. Everything emphasizes that the envoys of this chapter are from the ends of the earth; and the exotic appeal of this fact would be enhanced by their striking appearance (tall and smooth) and formidable reputation (2b)—for Cush had now gained control of Egypt. Yet this deputation, like the rest (see on 14:28–32), is dismissed with God’s Go. (The AV is misleading here. Its insertion of 'saying' in v 2a changes the speaker and the sense.) God has no need of intrigues; he will bide his time, working as silently as the seasons (4). The enemy will reach the very mountains of Judah (3; cf. 14:25), only to be cut down on the verge of victory, like a crop destroyed on the eve of harvest (5–6).

The final verse seems to look beyond the immediate crisis of Assyrian aggression which had brought the envoys to Jerusalem. Isaiah now sees the travellers in a new light, as the first of many who will come to Zion one day in homage (the Hebrew, lacking the word from in 7a, suggests that they will be themselves the homage gift). It is the prospect already seen in 2:3; 11:10 and will be further developed in chs. 60–62. It is expressed exultantly in Pss. 68:31–35; 87:4.

19:1–25 Egypt

This oracle is a strong expression of the truth that God smites in order to heal (see v 22). The initial breakdown is followed by a renewal which goes beyond anything promised to a Gentile nation in the OT. Perhaps Egypt is shown here in its two aspects: first, as the worldly power to which Israel was always looking (cf. 20:5) and secondly, as part of God's world, for which he cares, with a place in his kingdom in which present ranks and races will be quite superseded.

19:1–15 Egypt brought to its knees. The metaphor of God's swift cloud (1) indicates that poetic imagery will carry the truths of this passage, in which every asset of Egypt is seen to fail. Her spiritual resources are, significantly, the first to crumble: her beliefs, morale (1), unity (2) and worldly wisdom (3). Next will go her freedom (4). The fierce king could be one of her Ethiopian overlords, e.g. Tirhakah in Isaiah's lifetime, or one of her later conquerors, Persian or Greek; it could even be a native tyrant. It is the sequence, from decay to tyranny, that is important rather than an individual's identity. Then God touches her physical lifeline, the Nile, and one by one her industries wither. The final state is one of helpless anarchy (11–15), all the more mortifying to a nation which had prided itself for 2,000 years on the schooling of its officials. Cf. v 12 with 1 Ki. 4:30. Zoan and Memphis (13) were the current and the ancient capitals of Egypt. Zoan (probably Tanis, in the Delta) was remembered as the scene of the great oppression (cf. Ps. 78:43). Cf. v 15 with 9:14–15.

19:16–25 Egypt converted. The fivefold refrain, In that day ..., is a pointer (as elsewhere e.g. 2:11–12) to the day of the Lord. Isaiah foresees the conversion of the Gentiles, under the image of that of Israel's most ancient oppressor and seducer (cf. 30:2–5.). The process is traced from its beginnings in fear (16–17), leading to submission (18) and God-given access (19–22; altar and sacrifices), and right on to fellowship (23) and full acceptance (24–25).

If the five cities (18) are meant literally, we cannot now identify them. More probably the expression either means 'a few', or else alludes to the precedent in Jos. 10 where the conquest of five Canaanite cities led on to general victory. The City of the Sun (18b; mg.) would be On, later known as Heliopolis; but the Hebrew spells it here (perhaps punningly) 'City of Destruction'. The point, either way, is the spiritual capture of an outstanding stronghold of heathenism. In about 170 BC a temple was built at Leontopolis in Egypt by an ousted high priest, Onias IV, who appealed to v 19 in justification. But the intention of the verse is, it seems, rather to speak typically: there will be holy ground where all was once profane. With the monument cf. Jacob's at Bethel, staking its claim to be God's own territory (Gn. 28:13, 18).

Vs 23–25, reaching out with the other hand to embrace Assyria as well (so often coupled with Egypt in the worst of contexts; cf. Ho. 7:11; 9:3) give an unsurpassed vision of the Gentiles' full inclusion in the kingdom. Israel will have only an equal part (a third, 24; but not third place), and her distinctive titles will be shared out with her cruellest enemies. (On my people cf. Ho. 2:23; 1 Pet. 2:10; on my handiwork cf. Is. 29:23; on my inheritance cf. Dt. 32:9.

20:1–6 The Ashdod crisis

An inscription by Sargon fills out this picture. The Philistine city of Ashdod had revolted against Assyria, which promptly deposed its king. A new ringleader, Yamani, carried on the struggle with pledged support from Egypt and Ethiopia and had also approached Judah. Isaiah's powerful dissuasion turned out to be fully justified: Egypt failed to fight, Ashdod was subjugated, and Yamani, who had fled to Ethiopia, was handed over to the Assyrians' tender mercies.

The title supreme commander is turtanu in Assyrian (hence the AV and RV 'Tartan'). The year was 711; the revolt had broken out in 713, and Isaiah's slave garb (stripped would mean clad only in a loincloth) had been adopted then, unexplained, as v 3 shows. (V 2 is a parenthesis; see the RSV.) God now expounds it as the fate in store for Assyria's rebels.

Since Judah was left unpunished by Assyria, it seems that the warning was taken. G.A. Smith points out that this sign language (cf. 8:18) brought the message home to the nation, not merely to the court. Isaiah's discomfort and humiliation were the price of his people's safety.

21:1–10 Babylon, 'The Desert by the Sea'

This oracle, like the next, has a strongly visionary quality (in the 'lookout' metaphor) and a symbolic title. The subject emerges in v 9 as the fall of Babylon. The phrase Desert by the Sea (1) seems to combine two pictures of nature untamed and encroaching, which are more explicit in Je. 51:42–43. But the same consonants could yield simply 'deserts', or possibly 'destroyers'.

A disjointed, vivid picture (2–7) builds up of an attack by the Persians (Elam as a Persian satrapy) and Medes (2) which will catch the defenders of Babylon unprepared and feasting (5), just as Dn. 5 records of them. But Isaiah's involvement in the vision is its most striking feature. His great agitation in vs 3–4 is akin to Jeremiah's in Je. 4:19–26, even though the fall of this persecuting city, this place of groaning (2), is the thing he has longed for (4). But these opposite reactions throw incidental light on the writing of the later chapters, in that they are the very feelings of one to whom (as to the exiles) Babylon seemed both prison and home. If Isaiah was indeed to 'speak tenderly' ('to the heart'; 40:1) of a later generation, as if he were himself one of them, this deep involvement is clearly a prerequisite; it is the inner side of his prophesying. Note, too, his dual consciousness. He stands in some sense apart from his lookout self (6) and must report only what he sees and hears (cf. Hab. 2:1–3). This objectivity is greatly stressed (6, 7, 10).

In v 8a (charmingly inconsequent after v 7, in the standard text; see the AV) the NIV justifiably follows the Qumran MS. The prophet, just when his vigil appears endless, sees the promised cavalcade and knows that it spells the end of Babylon. Rev. 18:2 takes up the cry of 'Fallen, fallen' and treats Babylon as typical of the godless world. The final outburst, 'O my threshed and winnowed one' (RSV), captures not only the agony, but the purpose, of Israel's long ordeal.

21:11–12 Dumah

The place-names belong to Edom, but the title Dumah (cf. Gn. 25:14) may have been chosen for its ominous meaning, 'silence'. The point of the question is 'how long till morning?'—reflecting a time of suffering. The reply is not a platitude but a warning that any respite will be only temporary (cf. Pr. 4:18–19). The three Heb. imperatives, lit. 'ask, return, come' (12b), can be taken at their surface meaning or, more deeply, as the basic divine call: ‘Seek, repent, come’. But Edom’s answer can be gathered from e.g. 34:5–17 and from Obadiah.

21:13–17 Arabia

The early versions of v 13 read the second Arabia as ‘evening’, which has the same consonants. Possibly there is a double entendre (cf. v 11 and the symbolic titles in 21:1; 22:1). The special significance of this oracle lies in its warning to the freest and most inaccessible of tribes that Assyria’s long arm will reach even them, at God’s command. Those of the far south, Tema and Dedan, will have to succour their more exposed brother-tribe of Kedar. This could mean that the trading caravans will have blundered into war-ravaged parts and returned empty-handed and starving. Sargon’s recorded invasion of Arabia in 715 BC makes it more likely, however, that the fugitives will have been under direct attack. Cf. vs 16–17 with 16:14 and comment.

22:1–25 Jerusalem

22:1–14 ‘The Valley of Vision’. The symbolic title (cf. on 21:1, 11, 13) emphasizes that the prophet’s own base, from which he has surveyed the nations, is not exempt from judgment. Valley, borrowed from v 5, may refer to Jerusalem as surrounded by mountains (cf. Ps. 125:2), or to some more localized spot (cf. Joel 3:12, 14).

There is a clear contrast between the city’s gaiety (2a, 13) and its grim future. It is not so clear whether the revels are in progress as Isaiah speaks (perhaps after the retreat of Sennacherib; 37:37) or whether we should supply a past verb in v 2a: ‘you who were full ...’, as in the lament of 1:21. Either way, Isaiah alone sees where this escapism, which is summed up for all time in v 13b (cf. 1 Cor. 15:32), will end.

With characteristic long sight (cf. 21:1–10), he foretells the fall of Jerusalem a century away (586 BC), with its famine casualties (2b; cf. La. 4:9), its fugitive leaders (3; cf. 2 Ki. 25:4–5) and its houses torn down to strengthen the wall (10; cf. Je. 33:4). The part played in this by warriors from Elam and Kir (6) is not mentioned elsewhere; but Kir was in the Assyrian Empire (cf. 2 Ki. 16:9), and contingents or mercenaries from these outposts could well have been part of the Assyrian legacy to Nebuchadnezzar.

For the Palace of the Forest as an armoury (8) see 1 Ki. 10:17; for the water supply (9, 11) cf. the preparations by Ahaz and Hezekiah (7:3; 2 Ki. 20:20) in Isaiah’s own day. The two walls (11) were probably ‘the convergence of the walls round the south-eastern hill, with an extension to include both pools’ (J. Gray).

Note, in all this, that Jerusalem oscillated between activism (9–11) and escapism (12–14); the former was a denial of faith (11b), the latter a denial of repentance. The words of v 11b (and of 37:26) are a striking anticipation of chs. 40–66, where God is repeatedly named as (lit.) ‘making and forming’ (who made ... who planned) and as doing so from of old (cf. 43:7; 44:2, 24;). It is another hint of single authorship (see the Introduction).

22:15–25 ‘This steward, ... Shebna’. This high official appears again, with Eliakim (cf. v 20), in 36:3; 37:2. Possibly he was the leader of the pro-Egypt party (see chs. 30–31) which scoffed at Isaiah’s preaching; but his condemnation here is simply for arrogance and display. Every nuance in God’s message to him is scornful, from this steward (15) to you disgrace (18). It exposes the human craving for recognition and power and the worldly love of status symbols (grave and chariots) and the trappings of office, all of them mere husks. A large tomb-lintel of just such an official, describing him as ‘over the house’ (cf. v 15), has been found at Siloam and could be Shebna’s; but a mortice hole has destroyed the name.

Eliakim stands in strong contrast to Shebna, over whom he seems to have been promoted when they reappear in 36:3. Godward he is called my servant (20; cf. ‘this steward’, v 15); manward he will be a father to his community (21). Yet his downfall (24–25) will come from this very paternalism wrongly exercised, i.e. from his inability to say ‘no’ to any ‘hanger-on’ from his family who claims his patronage. However well intentioned, this is an abuse of his office, and God’s firmest pledges are never guarantees to cover this. With the sequence of vs 23 and 25 cf. 1 Sa. 2:30; Je. 22:24; Rev. 2:1, 5.

The key ... of David (22) comes in this context of accountability. A key was a substantial object, tucked in the girdle or slung over the shoulder; but the opening words of v 22 (with their echo of 9:6) emphasize the God-given responsibility that went with it, to be used in the king’s interests. The ‘shutting’ and ‘opening’ means the power to make decisions which no-one under the king could override. This is the background of the commission to Peter (cf. Mt. 16:19) and to the church (cf. Mt. 18:18)—with the warning against abuse implied above. Ultimate authority, however, is claimed, in these terms, for Christ himself (cf. Rev. 3:7–8).

23:1–18 Tyre

Tyre had a longer reach than even Babylon; her traders were known from the Indian Ocean (cf. 1 Ki. 10:22) to the English Channel. Rev. 17 and 18 combine the OT oracles on Tyre and Babylon (cf. Is. 14; Ezk. 27) for the composite picture of the world as seducer (cf. v 17) and oppressor, over against the city of God.

23:1–14 The repercussions and causes of Tyre’s fall. The news is pictured as reaching her ships at Cyprus, her nearest colony (1; see on 2:16 for Tarshish), leaving them homeless; as making the sea itself seem childless for lack of her merchantmen (4); as striking dismay into Egypt (5); and as scattering the people of Tyre itself (the island, 6) to distant Tarshish (6) or nearby Cyprus (12).

Tyre’s colonizing, a development of her trading, is the reference of v 8; and the obscure v 10 may picture a distant colony breaking out into anarchy at the parent city’s collapse. ‘Canaan’ (NIV mg.) is used in v 11 as the name of Tyre and Sidon’s home territory, a term which spread to embrace all Palestine; the word traders in v 8, closely related to it, shows how synonymous was the name of her realm with that of business.

The human cause of the overthrow seems in v 13 to be Babylon rather than Assyria, both of which powers subjugated Tyre in part. (Later, the Greeks, and later still the Saracens and the Crusaders, captured and recaptured it.) But the root cause is sought in v 8 and answered in v 9: Who planned this ... ? The LORD Almighty ... It is a particular instance of his judgment on pride (9) wherever it appears, which is one of the great themes of this book (see on 2:10–22).

23:15–18 Tyre’s old appeal renewed. As a fact of history, after each disaster (until the Middle Ages) Tyre recovered after an interval and resumed her trading. The seventy years seem to be a round figure to denote a lifetime, like the ‘seventy years’ of Jewish captivity. But the metaphor of the forgotten prostitute (15–17) makes the renewal at once pathetic and corrupting. We are shown the perennial seductiveness of things material, although the final verse claims them for their proper use. It is the twofold emphasis of Rev. 18:3 and 21:24.

24:1–27:13 God’s final victory

After the separate nations (chs. 13–23), now the world as a whole comes into view. These four chapters, often loosely known as the ‘Isaiah Apocalypse’, show the downfall of supernatural as well as earthly enemies (24:21–22; 27:1), and of death itself (25:8). They contain (26:19) one of the two clear promises in the OT of bodily resurrection. But this wider scene is still viewed from Isaiah’s own vantage-point of Jerusalem, with Judah, Moab (25:10–12) and the great powers of Egypt and Assyria (27:12–13) in the near and middle distance. Overwhelming as the judgments are, the dominant note is of joy, welling up in the songs which frequently break into the prophecy.

24:1–23 Earth and heaven judged

24:1–13 Humanity in chaos. The powerful word-painting is reinforced by repetitions, rhymes and word-plays. For ruin its face read ‘distort its surface’ (cf. the Jerusalem Bible’s vivid term ‘buckle’). The reason for the judgment emerges (notice the double Therefore of v 6) in people’s flouting of all laws and obligations. Whether the everlasting covenant is the divine promise to all living things in Gn. 9:9–11 is not certain beyond all doubt, since the expression in v 5 could mean simply ‘the most permanent of undertakings’ (but notice the reference to the flood in v 18b). 7ff. The emphasis on joylessness is a striking comment on what Heb. 11:25 calls ‘the fleeting pleasures of sin’ (RSV); and RSV’s term ‘the city of chaos’ (10; cf. Gn. 1:2) is a witness to sin’s regressive action, turning God’s order back to formlessness. The one ray of hope is the mention of gleanings (13), the leaving of a few (6), as in 17:6 and in the explicit ‘remnant’ passages, e.g. 10:20–23.

24:14–16 Ultimate praise but present privation. The singing seems to come from the scattered remnant (see on v 13), which in the light of the gospel can be seen to be God’s Gentile as well as Jewish people (cf. Jn. 11:52). The expression in the east (15) is lit. ‘in the lights’; the NIV’s translation is supported by the matching phrase from the west (14). But this is a foretaste; we are back in the straitened present in v 16 (cf. the same metaphors in 17:4–6).

24:17–23 Cosmic judgment. The first three nouns of v 17, strikingly alike in the original, hammer home the relentlessness of the judgment. With the unavailing flight of v18a cf. Am. 5:19. (For the background of v 18b see on v 5.) The powers in the heavens (lit. ‘army on high’) (21) would mean in some contexts merely ‘the stars’ (cf. 40:26); but here, as counterparts of the kings on earth, sentenced to be imprisoned and punished (cf. 2 Pet. 2:4), they are clearly ‘the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms’ (Eph. 6:12). The fullest OT reference to such beings is in Dn. 10:2–21; cf. perhaps Ps. 82. In the NT see further, e.g. Rom. 8:38–39; Col. 2:15; Rev. 12:7–12. But the end is sheer glory (23). If sun and moon are to lose their lustre, it is only as outshone by light itself, by the Lord reigning in full state. It is essentially the same vision as Rev. 21:22–27.

25:1–12 The great liberation

25:1–5 The end of tyranny. This song breaks out unannounced (unlike those of v 9; 26:1–21; 27:2–11.), and by its reiteration of the word ruthless (3, 4, 5) it voices the special suffering and corresponding gratitude of the weak and hard-pressed. It is an OT Magnificat. Two of the characteristics of God’s working (‘wonderful things’, ‘counsels’; AV, RV) have already appeared in the names of the promised king (9:6), and will recur in 28:29. On the long maturing of his plans (long ago), a favourite emphasis in Isaiah, see on 22:11. The song accordingly celebrates not only the victory to come (when the enemy’s defences will be down [2], his homage received

[3], and his clamour silenced [5]) but the refuge already to be found in God while evil does its worst (4)—its assault pictured in terms of nature’s extremes of driving rain (storm) and overpowering heat.

25:6–8 The end of darkness and death. The feast (6) introduces a positive note into what is otherwise chiefly an account of ills removed. It has the note of achievement (for a feast is a celebration), of plenty (6b) and of shared delight (note the fivefold all in vs 6–8). Our Lord relished this festive prospect even as he handed a very different cup to his disciples (cf. Mt. 26:29).

The shroud or sheet (better, ‘covering ... veil’) could be either the mourning (8b) or the blindness (cf. 2 Cor. 3:15) of fallen humanity; both are apposite. The translation for ever (8a) is the most straightforward (cf. e.g. 28:28), but the root does also contain the idea of ‘victory’ (cf. 1 Cor. 15:54) or pre-eminence, and is so used in 1 Sa. 15:29 and 1 Ch. 29:11, where it appears as ‘Glory’ and ‘majesty’ respectively. In either sense, the promise is one of the summits of the OT and the NT. In a single verse (cf. also Rev. 21:4) the last enemy is gone and the last tear shed.

25:9–12 The end of pride. V 9 belongs to the preceding paragraph as well as to this one; but perhaps the conjunction ‘for’ (10), which the NIV omits, unites these verses a little more closely. There is a hint of eager expectation in the verb used for trusted in (cf. 26:8; 33:2; 40:31; where NIV expresses it as ‘wait for’, ‘long for’, ‘hope in’).

Moab, startlingly local in so universal a scene (cf. Edom in 34:5), is introduced as the embodiment of pride (11b; cf. 16:6), perhaps especially the pride of little men. The manure, or dung pit, likewise expresses the indignity as well as the finality of judgment for the proud (cf. the sequence in 14:14–15, 19).

26:1–27:1 Triumph after travail

26:1–6 The enduring city. At last our own city comes into view, over against its rival. The latter has a new epithet, lofty (5), to add to those of 25:2 (‘fortified’) and 25:3 (‘cities of ruthless nations’). Our city is strong, not with brute force but with the saving activity (1b) of the living God, the Rock eternal. So our enjoyment of this personal, unseen protection must itself be personal, in truth (2) and trust (3–4). These verses are as logical as they are beautiful, rooted in God. Perfect peace (lit. ‘peace, peace’) is his gift of well-being and wholeness to a mind not merely steadfast but steadied (the word is passive, as in the old version, ‘stayed on thee’). The call to lifelong trust (4) is equally logical, basing our faith on God’s rock-like faithfulness and basing the ‘for ever’ of our commitment on the eternity of his being. Jesus would point out, further, the eternity of God’s commitment to his own (Mt. 22:31–32).

26:7–18 The long night of waiting. The ‘waiting’ in this passage is partly for the overthrow of evil by the correction (9–11) or destruction (11c, 13–15) of the wicked but is fundamentally a longing for God himself (for you ... for you, 8–9). The NIV’s level and make ... smooth (7) are misleading, for the context is anything but easygoing. The verse should run: ‘... is straight; you ponder the path ...’ (cf. Pr. 5:6). The proclamation of God’s name (8) could be a moving experience in public worship (cf. Ps. 34:3; 68:4). The last phrase of v 13 alludes to this and scorns the tyrants who have trampled on the crown rights of Yahweh. That these are earthly overlords, not false gods, is indicated by v 14a (see on 14:9 for the term departed spirits). It is a prediction so certain of fulfilment as to use the past tense (the ‘prophetic perfect’). Vs 16–18, with their confession of failure and frustration (all too applicable to the Christian church), give another ingredient of this general yearning for better things. There is a similar outburst in the second ‘Servant Song’, 49:4. Here, as there, God’s answer lifts the situation on to a new plane altogether, which is the subject of the next paragraph.

26:19–27:1 Resurrection and final judgment. After the prayer of vs 7–18, the Lord now gives his answer. V 19, though obscure in details, clearly promises bodily resurrection. Its companion statement, Dn. 12:2, adds two further prospects: the resurrection of the unjust and an eternity of life or shame. We should read (with the RV) ‘my dead bodies’—for God’s servants are still his in death, even to their bodies. For the final line there are various translations, but the NIV among others rightly preserves the contrast between the triumphant metaphor of birth in v 19b and the tragic birth-language of v 18b, the two linked by a distinctive Hebrew verb in common.

V 20 reproduces the same pattern of salvation within judgment as was seen when the Lord shut Noah in the ark and when Israel in Egypt was directed to take refuge from the destroying angel (Ex. 12:22). The judgment (21; 27:1) is as all-embracing as in 24:21, where ‘the powers in the heavens’ corresponds to Leviathan here (cf. ‘the dragon and his angels’ in Rev. 12:7–9). The unusual epithets, gliding, coiling (or ‘slippery’, ‘wriggling’), are exactly the terms used of Leviathan (Lotan) in the ancient Canaanite epic of Baal, who vanquished the monster of the sea. This Canaanite material is reshaped to the divine truth it now conveys—truth which demolishes its pagan structure. Both here and at 51:9–10 the context is judgment, not (as in paganism) a supposed struggle in which, before he could proceed to his desired task of creating an ordered world, the creator-god first disposed of the opposition of the gods of disorder.

27:2–13 A people for God

27:2–6 The fruitful vineyard. The loving care (2–4) and teeming fruitfulness (6) must both be seen against the setting of ch. 5, the vineyard that failed and was abandoned. Here is the end to which God has been working. Vs 4–5 are cryptic but may be understood to mean that God’s wrath is no longer against his vineyard, only against the briers and thorns (that is, his people’s enemies) which overran it in 5:6; and even these antagonists he would rather reconcile than destroy. The fruit (6) which will benefit the world is interpreted in 5:7 as justice and righteousness. Note the reminder, as in 37:31, that morally as well as physically, root is the precondition of fruit.

27:7–11 Fruitful hardship, fruitless power. This section brings out the contrast between the measured hardship which would be the making of Israel (7–9) and the utter disaster which would break the tyrant (10–11).

The opening Hebrew word of v 8 is obscure to us. Warfare (following the LXX) seems conjectural. Other suggestions are ‘measure by measure’, i.e. meted out ‘seah by seah’, gallon by gallon, or ‘driving away’ (if ‘sa-sa’ = our ‘shoo, shoo’) into the exile implied by the rest of the verse. The renouncing of idolatry (9) is shown as both the condition (by this) and the continuing consequence (the full fruitage) of enjoying God’s atonement (cf. Pr. 16:6). If exile is a step towards this, it will not be in vain. The fortified city (10–11) is clearly the oppressor’s (cf. 25:2). Here the description in vs 10b–11a is perhaps coloured by the contrasted picture of the well-tended vineyard of vs 2–3. With v 11b cf. 44:18–19; 45:6–7.

27:12–13 Harvest home. The harvest depicted could be that of the orchard or the field, since this verb for thresh (lit. ‘beat’) is used both for hand-threshing certain crops (28:27) and for dislodging olives from top branches (Dt. 24:20), so as to be gathered up one by one. The point is God’s perfect harvesting of his true people, so that ‘not one is missing’ (cf. 40:26–27). For Israel within the homeland (12) the emphasis is on the sifting of the minority from the mass (cf. 10:20–23). For those dispersed abroad it is on the trumpet call that will summon them home (13). The NT will show the gospel's call having already this double effect to sift and to save (1 Cor. 1:23–24), among Jew and Gentile alike. So the two verses show the Lord's final triumph, in terms not of conquest or new creation (as it can be pictured) but simply of persons gathered in and brought home. This is, after all, the heart of the matter (cf. Rev. 7:9ff.).

28:1–31:9 The Assyrian crisis: God's help or man's?

28:1–29 A challenge to scoffers

Ch. 28, a series of lightning flashes rather than a scene steadily illuminated, challenges the triflers who govern Jerusalem to face the realities of history, of morals and of divine action. Snatches of a fierce altercation seem to be preserved in vs 7–13 or beyond. The setting is the restless period of intrigue with Egypt which led to Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria and the reprisals of 701 BC described in chs. 36–37; but the prophecies frequently break out of these narrow confines.

28:1–6 The drunkards of Ephraim. This is clearly an early prophecy, before the fall of Samaria in 721. For its function in this context, see on vs 7–13. Vs 1–4 catch the outward beauty of that affluent city set on a hill, but see it as a garland on a drunkard's brow (1b)—a rich metaphor for glory that is incongruous and (4a) quickly fading. The second of these aspects is re-emphasized by the hailstorm threat of v 2 (a reference to Assyria), to be taken up in v 17, and by the 'ripe plum' metaphor (as we should put it) of v 4b. In a single paragraph Isaiah epitomizes the warnings of Amos to this pleasure-loving, drink-sodden city (cf. Am. 2:12; 4:1; 6:6). Characteristically, the clouds part for a moment to show the true crown (5) adorning the true Israel, the remnant (see on 10:20–23). Notice that the spirit of justice ... and strength (6; see on 11:2) is the LORD himself, present and active within his servants.

28:7–13 The drunkards in office. In the words these also, the relevance of the foregoing oracle to its present context becomes clear. The besotted Ephraim had come to grief; now Judah is just such another, from her spiritual leaders downwards. The reeling, vomiting priests and ... prophets are so vividly drawn that this section is thought to preserve an actual encounter between Isaiah and a group of them in conclave.

In that case vs 9–10 may be their taunt (he ... he being Isaiah), and v 13 his ominous rejoinder, flinging the same words back. The Hebrew of v 10 is a jingle, almost the equivalent of our derisive 'blah blah', but not quite as meaningless. (For rule, lit. 'line', cf. v 17a.) Cf. J.B. Phillips: 'Are we just weaned ... Do we have to learn that The-law-is-the-law-is-the-law, The rule-is-the-rule-is-the-rule ...? ... Yes, with stuttering lips and a foreign tongue will the Lord speak to this people.' In other words, make nonsense of God's sense and you will get your fill of it from Assyria (11) and your doom from the words that were to save you (12–13). The rejected message of v 12 finds classic expression in 30:15; cf. on 7:9b. Paul's quotation of v 11 in 1 Cor. 14:21 is thus a reminder, true to this context, that unknown tongues are not God's greeting to a believing congregation but his rebuke to an unbelieving one (cf. C. Hodge on 1 Corinthians).

28:14–22 The sure foundation and the refuge of lies. As in 8:11–15, but now in a setting of reckless confidence, covenant and cornerstone are in contrast. The covenant with death and with the grave (lit. Sheol) could perhaps allude to an invocation of gods of the underworld, e.g. in necromancy (cf. 8:19) or in a treaty with Egypt. It is, however, more probably to be understood like the boast in v 15b of a lie and falsehood, i.e. as God's estimate of their hope, put into their mouths. Their version would have been, no doubt, 'Nothing can touch us; our alliances are watertight.’ God knew their real enemy and their professed friends. The cornerstone promise, with that of 8:14, is quoted in Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:6; cf. Ps. 118:22. In 8:14 it explicitly signifies the Lord, but here the Lord lays the stone; the two statements meet in Christ, as the NT makes clear. Rom. 9:32–33 expounds the implications of the faith clause (cf. 7:9), the one who trusts will never be dismayed. The Heb. is lit. ‘will not be in haste’—since haste implies anxiety and confusion.

Among the profusion of metaphors, those of storm and flood have appeared in v 2, to signify the Assyrians; the measuring line and plumb-line (17) recall the finality of 30:13–14 and of Am. 7:7–8; the scanty bed and blanket (20) say the last word on resources that miserably fail. On Perazim and Gibeon (21) see 1 Ch. 14:11, 16. God who swept away David’s enemies will now sweep away David’s kingdom. On such strange reversals the next paragraph will have light to shed. Luther, incidentally, found much comfort in reflecting that while judgment is Christ’s strange work, salvation is his ‘proper work’.

28:23–29 The farmer’s craft: a parable. The farmer’s constant changes and his varieties of treatment, so capricious at first sight yet so expertly appropriate, give the clue to the complex ways of God, who is his teacher (26, 29). God’s strangest work (cf. v 21) is exactly suited, it is implied, to the varied times (24), types (25) and textures (27–28) that he handles. On beaten out with a rod (27) see on 27:12; and learn from this parable not to handle all situations with one favourite technique! Notice the linking of wonderful and counsel (29) as in the name of the divine prince of 9:6 and as in 25:1, where the NIV’s ‘marvellous’ and ‘planned’ miss this verbal echo.

29:1–8 A last-minute reprieve for ‘Ariel’

The end of v 8 identifies Ariel as Zion, and in Ezk. 43:15 its meaning is ‘altar hearth’; hence Moffatt renders it here (emphasizing Jerusalem’s high calling) ‘God’s own hearth and altar’. The cultic allusion in v 1b confirms this, but v 2b gives a grim turn to the metaphor by its hint of a holocaust, just as v 3a pricks the city’s pride in its past (cf. v 1a, ‘where David encamped’ [RSV]). The NIV’s settled loses this thrust in v 3a).

The promise of miraculous deliverance (5–8) had a partial fulfilment in the year 701 (see 37:33–37). But the gathering of nations (7–8), the siege works (3; cf. 37:33) and the spectacular signs of v 6 suggest a still greater struggle (cf. Zc. 14:1–21). The nations’ disappointment is vividly suggested in vs 7–8; there have been already innumerable minor occasions when the world has prematurely licked its lips over the demise of the church.

29:9–24 Israel’s inner darkness, deepened and dispelled

29:9–12 A people without vision. The pregnant phrase your eyes (the prophets) (10) shows that Israel is the subject of this oracle, which enlarges on the lessons of Pr. 29:18 and 1 Sa. 3:1–14. A glimpse of such a state, where God’s will has become a closed book, is given in Ps. 74:9. The reflexive verbs in v 9 suggest that the blindness is judicial: self-will has invited its own punishment. Cf. 6:9–10; 30:10–11.

29:13–14 Religion without reality. Jesus saw this v 13 as the very image of Pharisaism (Mk. 7:6–7.). V 14 is its proper outcome; for without depth, cleverness turns in on itself to obscure all that it touches. Cf. Rom. 1:22; 1 Cor. 1:19.

29:15–16 Contempt of the Creator. The mixture of furtiveness and bravado (cf. 30:1) would probably be expressed in unconscious ways, such as the suppression of unwelcome truths

(cf. 30:9–11.). Jeremiah (Je. 2:26) and Ezekiel (Ezk. 8:12) found the same mishandling of conscience in their day. The unanswerable potter illustration (16) is used again in 45:9 and, penitently, in 64:8; Paul takes it up in Rom. 9:20–21.

29:17–21 The great reversal. The absurdity of planning against God (15) will appear when his work is complete, when the best that we know will be transcended (17) and the disabilities and injustices of the present made good (18–21). The point is indicated in the verbs of v 17, i.e. the present Lebanon (uncultivated, like the wilderness of 32:15) will be turned into good land, while the present good land will seem like a mere wood in comparison with its new fertility.

29:22–24 A people for God’s praise. The individual Jacob is surely meant in 22b–23a, despite the NIV (the Hebrew uses the singular: ‘his face ... when he sees ... his children’), cf. 63:16. He will no longer (as we should say) turn in his grave at the behaviour of his descendants. The thought of God’s people expressing God’s holiness, which is a first concern of the Lord’s Prayer (‘hallowed ... ’), is developed in Ezk. 36:23 and context, and in Eph. 1:4, 6, etc., bringing future perfection to bear on us now.

30:1–31:9 Egypt and Assyria in perspective

30:1–5 The shadow of Egypt. The illusory refuge denounced in 28:14–22 is named at last. Ten years earlier, Isaiah had dissuaded Judah from playing Egypt’s game against Assyria (ch. 20); now the mood has hardened, and Judah’s envoys are on their way. The officials (4) seem to be Pharaoh’s, in which case Hanes seems implied to be near Zoan (which is Tanis, the nearest important town to the Israel border), rather than 50 miles (80 km) further up the Nile, as commonly identified. See the NBD article, ‘Hanes’, for a fuller discussion.

30:6–8 The stay-at-home ally. Isaiah sees the discomforts and dangers of the journey (6a) as typical of the whole enterprise, and the treasures of v 6b, so incongruous in the wild Negev, as a picture of misspent effort and resource. Rahab (7), differently spelt in Hebrew from the familiar name of Jos. 2, is a term for Egypt again in Ps. 87:4 (cf. Ps. 89:10). It appears to mean ‘arrogant’ or ‘turbulent’ and is associated with ‘the monster’ (crocodile?) in Is. 51:9, which is another of Egypt’s names in Ezk. 29:3. Moffatt brilliantly renders v 7c ‘Dragon Do-nothing’—a devastating nickname to placard (8) around Jerusalem; as pointed as an earlier slogan had been cryptic (cf. 8:1).

30:9–14 The ill-built structure. Truth and right (10) are shown to be as vital to a community as soundness and accuracy are to a building (13). This is one of the clearest statements of the logic of God’s judgments; cf. Ezk. 13:10–16 on (in our terms) papering over the cracks; Am. 7:7–8 on the plumb-line; and Hab. 2:9–11 on the creaking edifice of the tyrant.

30:15–17 The price of unbelief. V 15 could be singled out as the distinctive challenge of Isaiah (see on 7:1–9). Repentance is lit. ‘turning’ back to God (cf. 10:21); rest and quietness are the antithesis of the frantic activism of v 16 (cf. 28:16); trust colours each of these responses with love. The threat of v 17 sadly reverses the promise of Lv. 26:8; cf. Dt. 32:30.

30:18–26 The good things in store. Egypt and Assyria fade from sight as the glory dawns, depicted first in personal terms (18–22), then in material (23–26). Notice the relation between God’s waiting and man’s (longs [18a] is the intensive form of wait [18d]), and the boon of his exaltation as Judge (18b, c; cf. 5:15–16). The intimacy described in vs 20–21 is that of the new covenant (cf. Je. 31:33–34.) rather than the final glory, for it does not preclude adversity or the possibility of straying, limited though this will be (21). Teachers is a plural noun with a singular verb, i.e. a plural of God's fullness or majesty (as in the RSV), and the word relates to moral instruction or tôrâ ('law'). His voice, recalling us, comes from behind (21) only when we turn aside, not when we follow. Vs 23–26, in contrast with v 20a, express in terms of the familiar world the new creation which will utterly transcend it (cf. 60:19–22; 65:17–25).

30:27–33 The cleansing fire. While these verses survey the immediate situation, naming 'Assyria' (31), they further apply to the end time. One day the godless powers will find themselves caught (like Judah in 8:8) in a rising tide, and drawn by God's bridle (like Assyria in 37:29) towards their destruction. Yet for us this is liberation (29): every blow of judgment will deserve the sound of tambourines (32) like Miriam's (cf. Ex. 15:20); but the grave of the oppressors will no longer be the Red Sea, but Topheth, i.e. the fire pit of final destruction which the NT calls Gehenna, or hell. Je. 7:31–32 tells how this meaning was acquired. The allusion here to the king is probably to Molech (RSV mg.; cf. 2 Ki. 23:10), which is basically the same word as king.

31:1–5 Some trust in horses ... The relative power of flesh and spirit (3), as seen by Isaiah, quite contradicted his contemporaries' assessment (cf. 30:15–16)—and, for the most part, our own. It is the key to his thinking, and was to be dramatically vindicated (cf. the taunt of 36:8–9 with the outcome in 37:36–38.). In v 2, disaster rightly interprets the broad term 'evil' (cf. 45:7; Am. 3:6). The growling lion and the birds in flight both depict what is free of human interference; possibly also the formidable and the tender aspects of the Lord as protector (cf. Dt. 32:11).

31:6–9 The rout of Assyria. The supernatural smiting of the Assyrians is recorded in 37:36. But Isaiah is concerned with conversion (return) even more than deliverance; notice his penetrating estimate of the situation (greatly is lit. 'deeply'; cf. 29:15; Ho. 9:9). Cf. v 7 with 2:20; 30:22. With the Lord's fire ... in Zion (9) cf. its searching implications in 33:14.

32:1–35:10 Salvation and its dark prelude

32:1–8 A kingdom of true men

This fourth oracle on the coming king (cf. 7:14; 9:6–7; 11:1–5) shows his greatest triumph, in the flowering of his own qualities (given by the Spirit of the Lord, 11:2; cf. 32:15) in the character of his subjects, from his office-bearers downwards. (The passage can be translated 'If a king reigns in righteousness ... then ...', etc. But the familiar rendering is both a simpler construction and more relevant to Isaiah's teaching from 7:14 onwards.)

After the plural rulers, the right translation of (lit.) 'a man' (2a) is each, as in the NIV. Here are men in power, using power as God uses it (cf. v 2 with 25:4–5; 26:4). Here too are people using the faculties they have (v 3; contrast 30:10–11; 42:20) and finding new abilities (4). Above all, truth has ousted the fictions under which vice takes shelter. With v 5 cf. Lk. 22:25–27, for God recognizes no courtesy titles. Vs 6–8 are not a prediction but a comment on the terms used in v 5, rightly expressed in the NIV's present tenses.

32:9–20 No smooth path to peace

The pampered ladies of vs 9–13 (cf. 3:16–26) are only an extreme example of the predominantly escapist society of the time (cf. 22:13; 28:15). 10 If the NIV is right in 10a, this oracle dates from about the time of Hezekiah's revolt from Assyria, for which the invasion of 701 was the reprisal.

But 10a could equally mean ‘for a long period’. In any case, the disaster of v 14 and the glory of vs 15–20 transcend anything that happened in Isaiah’s time. The present age since Pentecost (cf. v 15) may be partly in mind in the picture of a people of God emancipated from the earthly Jerusalem (14, 19).

The basic principle expounded in this poem is that peace is not a thing God superimposes on a corrupt society: the ground must be cleared and re-sown with righteousness, of which peace is the fruit (16–17). For this, the promise of the Spirit (15) is indispensable: it is the secret of the shared gifts of the Messiah described in v 1–2 above. On v 15b, see on 29:17. Such pictures of a secure and well-watered land (e.g. v 20) express God’s ‘new things’ to come in terms of things already known.

33:1–24 The longing to be free

This chapter, Psalm-like in its many changes of moods and speakers, seems designed for public use in a national emergency (cf. the answering voice of God in vs 10–12 with that in Ps. 60:6–8 and the dialogue in vs 13–19 with Ps. 24:3–6).

33:1–9 The longing for redress. Denunciation (1), prayer (2–4), praise (5–6) and lamentation (7–9) break out in rapid succession. 1 The destroyer is left unnamed, perhaps to typify all whose successful villainy blinds them to the reprisals they are storing up. 2–4 But the recourse to God himself brings a richer vision than of man’s rough justice. With God there is not only the prospect of the final answer (3–4) but meanwhile his strong arm (2) sufficing for each day’s demands (cf. 50:4). 5–6 Further, in contrast to v 4, here are ‘solid joys and lasting treasure’, summed up in the fear of the LORD—that relationship between heavenly master and earthly servant which is the treasure, not merely the key to it (as in the NIV’s insertion). 7 Cf. 36:2–3, 22. 8 The deserted highways recall (but in different language) the hard times before Deborah (cf. Jdg. 5:6), whose victory transformed another desperate situation.

33:10–16 The answering challenge. God’s intervention will not be confined to the enemy (10–12) but will burn out the evil of Zion as well (13–16). 14 The consuming fire is not only his personal intolerance of sin; from another angle it is the sinner’s self-immolation (11–12), brought about by the conjunction of vain pursuits (11a) and aggressive attitudes (11b). On this theme of self-destruction see also 1:31 and, with another metaphor, 30:13.

The heart-searching dialogue in vs 14–16 recalls those of Pss. 15; 24:3–6. It has been suggested that these are based on ritual admission tests employed at sanctuaries (e.g. Ex. 19:14–15), given an ethical content. 15 Notice the ‘puritanism’: the vigorous renunciations recognize the potency of habits, words, thoughts and sense-impressions as the seeds of action. If this verse is negative, it is in order to clarify the meaning of ‘pure in heart’, in readiness for v 17.

33:17–24 The bliss of fulfilment. The unforgettable promise of v 17a, for which the last phrase of v 15 is indispensable (cf. Mt. 5:8; contrast the dismay of Is. 6:5), is the focal point of this passage. Other prospects radiate from it (the spacious countryside, v 17b, gladdening the eyes after the constriction of siege; and tranquil Zion the place of pilgrimage again, v 20), while memories of tyrants and indignities now past give added zest to the present (18–19); but the eye returns to the Lord himself as strength and sovereign (21–22). The authoritative titles, judge, lawgiver, king, which Judah, like us, was always reluctant to abide by, are the firm basis of this serenity.

The picture of a city flanked by better defences (21) than Nile or Tigris (cf. Na. 3:7–8)—for they will be waters which no hostile fleet can use—gives rise to a new metaphor in v 23 for the disarray of the lawless (whether they are Gentiles or ‘the sinners in Zion’; cf. v 14). But this is a parenthesis; the passage ends by reaffirming God's enriching, healing and pardoning grace (23b–24).

34:1–17 The universal judgment

Just as chs. 24–27 crowned the local oracles with the prospect of final judgment and salvation, so chs. 34 and 35 leave the Assyrian crisis far behind. A further similarity is that amidst these cosmic events, whose majestic description in v 4 is echoed in Rev. 6:13–14, Edom, like Moab in 25:10–12, is singled out over against Zion, whose year of release this is to be (cf. v 8 with 35:4), for a judgment which brings the whole scene suddenly to close quarters. 5–7 The thunderstorm, after encircling the entire horizon, arrives practically overhead in v 5, and there it remains, for Edom symbolizes in Scripture the ungodly (cf. Heb. 12:16) and the persecutor (cf. Ob. 10–14), the opposite and adversary of the church. The metaphor in vs 5–7 is a grim variant of the banquet scene (cf. 25:6), dwelling on the butchery behind the sacrificial feast and using current idiom to show that the whole people, from 'young bloods' and leading citizens (7a) to the least and lowest (6), is doomed (cf. 63:1–6).

8–17 The wasteland of these verses brings both Sodom and Babylon to mind with the burning sulphur of vs 9–10 and the haunted ruins of 11–15 (cf. 13:19–22). 11b Chaos and desolation are the 'without form' and 'void' of Gn. 1:2; they imply here and in Je. 4:23 an undoing of the very work of creation. The mention of measuring line and plumb-line gives this demolition a disquieting air of precision, matched only by the care (16–17) with which the ruins are furnished with appropriate monsters. 14 On the wild goats see on 13:21. Night creatures could be either some desert creatures or demons (see further under 'Lilith' in the NBD). It is worth noting that judgment is pictured, here and elsewhere, as something worse than extinction; the last state is a kind of parody, obscene and (17b) persistent, of the first.

35:1–10 The flowering wilderness

The glory of this chapter is enhanced, if this is possible, by its setting as an oasis between the visionary wasteland of ch. 34 and the history of war, sickness and folly in chs. 36–39.

The theme is the coming exodus, a greater than the first. 1–2 Why the desert should be carpeted with spring flowers (crocus, or perhaps 'narcissus', rightly replaces the traditional 'rose') and shaded with great trees (the glory of Lebanon) is a question answered with the news that the LORD is to pass this way (3–6), and his reason for coming emerges in v 4 (cf. v 10): it is to fetch his people home. Heb. 12:12 treats v 3 as still relevant to the Christian's hope; and while the healings in the gospels announce that the new age of vs 5 and 6 has dawned, the full promise of v 4b is yet to come (cf. 61:2; Lk. 4:19–21; 2 Thes. 1:7–10).

If God's coming was indirectly portrayed in the opening verses, reflected in the springing wilderness, the upsurge of hope and the miracles of healing (1–6a), his people's journey home is similarly presented in vs 6b–10. The desert produces brooks and meadows, the safe highway appears, and finally the pilgrims themselves come into view in the last verse, singing their way into Zion.

So the prophecy reaches a climax which already soars above Isaiah's own times and anticipates the style and thought of chs. 40–66 (cf. the quotation of v 10 in 51:11) in its lyrical portrayal of the new exodus, the coming of God himself, the re-peopling of Zion and the endless joy of the redeemed.

36:1–39:8 The supreme tests for Hezekiah

In these four chapters the political situation that has been developing throughout Isaiah's ministry comes to an immense climax, reinforced by two searching tests of the king's faith and integrity, which are to have far-reaching consequences.

Apart from Hezekiah's psalm, found only in 38:9–20, these chapters coincide almost word for word with 2 Ki. 18–20.

36:1–37:38 The Assyrian onslaught

For details, see on 2 Ki. 18:13–19:37. Isaiah omits 2 Ki. 18:14–16 and part of v 17a.

36:1–22 In ch. 36, in general, the technique of subversion is displayed for all time in the speeches of vs 4–10, 13–20. There we see the tempter's skilful use of truth, barbing his shafts with a few unanswerable facts (e.g. the perfidy of Egypt [6] and the failure of the gods [19]), his use of ridicule (8), threats (12b) and cajolery (16–17), and his perversion of theology—misrepresenting Hezekiah's reforms (7), selecting from Isaiah's preaching (10; cf. 10:6, 12) and drawing damaging conclusions from false religions (18–20). The king's instruction, Do not answer him (21), took due account of the fact that the speaker was seeking victory, not truth.

37:1–38 Ch. 37 (see more fully on 2 Ki. 19) is a model of response to intimidation. Hezekiah's steadfastness owed nothing to blind optimism; his sackcloth (1) was proof of that. His call for Isaiah's prayer (4) showed where his confidence lay, and his metaphor of birth (3) proved him a man of vision, whose longings were not for the old order but for the new (note too the evidence of 36:7 for his courageous reforms). His allusion to the remnant (4) further suggests attention to Isaiah's preaching (cf. 10:20–23). Upon Sennacherib's renewal of the war of nerves (9–13), Hezekiah was again too wise either to dismiss the threat or to succumb to it. His spreading out the letter before the Lord (14) epitomizes the act of prayer, and the candour of his words finely echoes the gesture. As in the Psalms, the situation clarified as he prayed (19), and his motive was raised to the highest level (20).

In Isaiah's successive replies (37:5–7, 21–35) note the absence of personal rancour against those whose policies were now in ruins (cf. 28:14–15; 30:1–5; on Eliakim and Shebna (2) see 22:15–25). In the vivid triumph song of vs 22–29, it was now time to answer Sennacherib's challenge 'On whom are you depending?' (36:5) with the question 'Who is it you have insulted?' (23), and to taunt him with not knowing the meaning of his own career (26; note the Isaianic stress on what God ordained long ago; see on 22:11).

The completed story shows that the very successes which feed human arrogance (in any age) proclaim, when all is known, the sure sovereignty of God.

38:1–22 Hezekiah's illness

For comment on 38:1–8, 21–22 see on 2 Ki. 20:1–11.

38:9–20 Hezekiah's lament. This is similar to the outcries of Job (cf. e.g. Jb. 7), and to various Psalms (cf. e.g. Ps. 88), particularly those that turn to praise. The final words, where the singular gives way to the plural, suggest a public use of the psalm (cf. e.g. Ps. 25:22; 51:18–19.).

10 Death (lit. Sheol; see also on v 18 and on 14:9) is pictured here poetically as a city or prison; as a community in v 18; and as a devouring monster in 5:14. 12 The finality of the weaver's action is the point here; in Jb. 7:6 it is the swiftness of his shuttle.

13–15a There is a Job-like bewilderment in these verses, where Hezekiah's instinctive resort to God is checked by the thought that his predicament itself is from him (15a). But if this sharpens the problem, it also begins to resolve it, since a single, perfect will is paramount. See below on vs 17–20.

15b–16 These verses are of uncertain meaning, as the different versions indicate. In v 15b perhaps the Hebrew verb, with its hint of a procession (cf. Ps. 42:4), contains the idea 'I will walk with awe'. The reference of such things in v 16 is not clear, and the awkwardness of the Hebrew here suggests a damaged text; but v 15 points to acceptance of God's will as this lifegiving discipline (cf. e.g. Ps. 119:50, 67, 71).

17–20 Here the fact of God's love dawns and clarifies, from the first assurance that it was for my benefit, on through the striking phrase (lit.) 'thou hast loved my soul from the pit', to the certainty of forgiveness in v 17c. The use of 'Sheol' (grave) as synonymous with death is the key to vs 18 and 19 and to OT usage in general, which concentrates within this set of terms all that is negative in death: people's severance from the praising congregation; their forfeiting of power and position; their fading into the past; their return to dust. At the same time, it is clear from v 17 that Hezekiah had envisaged himself as dying without assurance of the forgiveness of sins, and it is in this context that he views life after death as thankless and joyless—as indeed it would be. Meanwhile there are positive aspects expressed elsewhere in the OT in a distinct phraseology: e.g. being 'taken' by God (e.g. Gn. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2:9; Ps. 49:15), and being 'with' him (e.g. Ps. 73:23; cf. Pss. 139:18 and 17:15. Cf. in Is. 26:19, 'live ... rise ... awake'; and Dn. 12:2). But there is no synthesis as yet. Hezekiah can rejoice (19–20) in promises that are plenty to go on with (2 Ki. 20:4–6). The rest he will discover soon enough (1 Cor. 2:9).

39:1–8 The envoys from Babylon

For detailed comment see on 2 Ki. 20:12–19.

The faith of Hezekiah, proof against the heaviest blows, melts at the touch of flattery (notice his delighted account in vs 3–4), and the world claims another victim by its friendship. Enough is known of Merodach-Baladan to suggest that this enterprising rebel against Assyria had plots to hatch under cover of this visit. But the Bible is silent on this, and Hezekiah is condemned for glorying in wealth and human patronage.

The price of disloyalty is very heavy (5–7). To Hezekiah there was comfort in postponement (8); but not to Isaiah. Evidently he took this burden home with him, and so lived under its weight that when God spoke to him again it was to one who in spirit had already lived long years in Babylon (6–7) and could 'speak to the heart' (cf. 40:2) of a generation of exiles yet to be born.

40:1–48:22 Night far spent in Babylon

Whatever our view of the relation of chs. 40–48 to their great prelude in 1–39 (see the Introduction), we emerge in 40:1 in a different world from Hezekiah's, immersed in the situation foretold in 39:5–8, which he was so thankful to escape. Nothing is said of the intervening century and a half; we wake, so to speak, on the far side of the disaster, impatient for the end of captivity. In chs. 40–48 liberation is in the air; there is the persistent promise of a new exodus, with God at its head; there is the approach of a conqueror, eventually disclosed as Cyrus, to break Babylon open; there is also a new theme unfolding, to reveal the glory of the call to be a servant and a light to the nations. All this is expressed with a soaring, exultant eloquence, in a style heard only fitfully hitherto (cf. e.g. 35:1–10; 37:26–27), but now sustained so as to give its distinctive tone to the remaining chapters of the book.

40:1–11 The long-awaited Lord

40:1–2 The gentle voice. Comfort has its familiar meaning here, not its old English sense of ‘strengthen’. It is matched by the womanly gentleness of 66:13 and amplified by v 2, where speak tenderly is (lit.) ‘speak to the heart’, a phrase mostly found in contexts of reassurance or of winning a person back (cf. e.g. Gn. 50:21; Jdg. 19:3; 2 Sa. 19:7; Ho. 2:14). My people and Jerusalem are in evidence in these chapters, separated until the mother-city receives back her children (cf. ch. 54).

The expression double for all her sins can be taken either in the bountiful sense of e.g. 61:7; Zc. 9:12 (these use another word for ‘double’) or, with most commentators, in the punitive sense of e.g. Lv. 26:18, 43; Rev. 18:6. The former would well express the underlying grace of these chapters, but the latter need not be pressed to imply any earning of salvation, only a strong assurance that Jerusalem’s sentence is already more than served. It is not impossible, incidentally, that double might mean ‘counterpart’ or ‘equivalent’.

40:3–5 The herald’s call. The great processional way (to be lined by all humanity, 5) suitably dwarfs the ceremonial routes of heathen festivals. The wilderness is doubly significant, both as an example of the barriers that must all yield to the royal progress (4; see ch. 35) and as a reminder of the first exodus. Ho. 2:14 makes it, in its austerity, a place of repentance and renewal; John the Baptist, with prophetic symbolism, used the literal wilderness for this very work (cf. Mt. 3:1–3). But God’s coming (cf. Mt. 3:13–17) and the ‘exodus’ that he was to accomplish (cf. Lk. 9:31) were to take a wholly unexpected form.

40:6–8 The preacher’s word. 6 This introduces the prophet and his responsibility (the RSV reading, ‘and I said’, retains the Hebrew consonants and is well supported). All men (lit. ‘flesh’) echoes the impressive all mankind (‘flesh’) of v 5 but puts it in perspective in God’s overwhelming presence. 8 Without the great ending of v 8, the passage would have only the wistfulness of e.g. Jb. 14:1–12; but with it, it reaffirms Isaiah’s tireless preaching of faith (cf. e.g. 7:9; 31:3). Its full implications will emerge in 1 Pet. 1:23–25, where the word, in its final form as gospel, is no longer the mere contrast to our transience but the cure of it. Cf. 1 Jn. 2:17.

40:9–11 The crier’s news. 9 You who bring good tidings is a single Hebrew word, of which ‘evangelist’ is the Greek equivalent (not as a specialized term). It is feminine here, agreeing with Zion, and hence Zion is probably the messenger. In 41:27; 52:7 she is the hearer.

40:12–31 God the incomparable

This superb poem rebukes our small ideas and flagging faith, somewhat in the manner of the Lord’s challenge to Job (Jb. 38–41), by its presentation of God as Creator (12–20) and Disposer (21–26) of a universe dwarfed by his presence. The goal of the passage is v 31, where human imaginings (18) and doubts (27) give way to the humble expectancy that is urged on us throughout the book (cf. 26:8; see on 7:1–9).

40:12–20 The Creator. Matter (12), mind (13–14) and living creatures (15–17) are all put in their place before their great Originator, seen as he might see them. This is not to empty them of meaning but to derive their meaning from him alone (cf. Pr. 8:22–31; Rom. 11:34). Such a Creator hardly needs our impatient advice or shares our impotence! The view of us through God’s eyes makes the man’s-eye view of God (18–20) doubly absurd. The idolater’s pathetic efforts are studied at length in 44:9–20; 46:1–7; and the wilfulness that causes the blindness is exposed in Rom. 1:18–23.

40:21–26 The Disposer. The gigantic similes continue and should be taken as poetry, not science (with v 22b, where canopy [or rather, ‘veil’] suggests the thinness of gauze, cf. the similes of Pss. 102:26; 104:2). 23–24. These verses on the transience of potentates bring the general truth of vs 6–8 a step nearer to the particular situation of the captives; and v 26 draws the true lesson from the majestic progress of the stars: the precision, not the absence, of God’s control. The thought is taken further in the final section.

40:27–31 The ‘very present help’. 27 The wrong inference from God’s transcendence is that he is too great to care; the right one is that he is too great to fail (28); there is no point at which things ‘get on top of’ him. But vs 29–31 make the big transition from power exercised to power imparted, to be experienced through the faith expressed in the word hope (or ‘wait’; cf. on 25:9). So the final reminder of human frailty (30) is forward looking; it clears the way for trust and the transcending of natural resources. The phrase renew their strength (31) is (lit.) ‘change strength’, as one might change into fresh clothes or exchange an old thing for a new. It may be significant that the three final metaphors speak of overcoming one natural impossibility and two natural weaknesses, ending on the note of steady progress.

41:1–29 God and history

41:1–7 God’s challenge to the nations. 1 The call for silence opens the imaginary proceedings of a court, where God will face the heathen world with a test question. (The call to renew their strength looks like an accidental repetition of 40:31, but it may be a warning that the encounter will be formidable.)

2 The point at issue is the alarming progress of the one from the east, whom 44:28 will identify as Cyrus. He is summoned in righteousness, i.e. for God’s right purpose of judgment and deliverance. (In these chapters ‘righteousness’ tends to have this dynamic sense, often coupled with ‘salvation’, e.g. 45:8; 56:1). To his service is (lit.) ‘to his foot’, to follow at his heels (cf. Jdg. 4:10, RSV), for the true commander is the unacknowledged Yahweh (cf. 45:2, 4).

4–7 The lordly announcement of v 4 is the only clear voice in the prevailing panic at Cyrus’s approach. While statesmen try to build morale (5–6a) and craftsmen ‘a ... strong set of gods’, v 4 sets the whole scene within the age-long plan and act of Yahweh the Creator. It will be spelt out in 44:24–45:8.

41:8–20 God’s servant reassured. There is sudden warmth in the But you ... and the repeated personal names. The long chain of promises in the future verbs of vs 10b–20 is characteristically anchored in the facts of present and past: a pledged relationship (8, 10a) and an irrevocable choice and call (9). The word servant will stamp its own character on the coming chapters, with an increasing emphasis on its implication of self-giving, up to the climax of ch. 53. Here, however, it simply points to the Master’s protection, which is seen as a many-sided assurance of imparted strength (10), scattered enemies (11–13), triumph over obstacles (14–16; cf. Mt. 21:21) and inexhaustible provision (17–20). The divine titles, the Holy One of Israel (14, 16, 20; see on 1:2–4), your Redeemer (14, i.e. your protecting kinsman; cf. Lv. 25:25) and Jacob’s King (21) set their seal on it.

All this stands against a realistic background of an Israel cowed (e.g. vs 10–11) and puny (e.g. v 14), a fit starting-point for God’s grace. 15–16 A threshing-sledge, by contrast, was the most solid of objects, being made of heavy boards, flint-studded; it was dragged over the reaped corn to break open the ears, which were then winnowed by tossing them to allow the husks to be blown away (16). The huge scale of the metaphor must have seemed belied by the ‘day of small things’ that followed the return from Babylon, yet it does not exaggerate the impact of God’s people on the world, past and to come.

41:21–29 God’s challenge renewed. The tone of vs 1–7 returns, but now the gods themselves are addressed (cf. v 23). 22–24 The charge of v 22 is that they cannot even interpret events (the former things), let alone predict them (see on 26–27). When their incompetence is added to this (23b), the only conclusion is their unreality (24, 29)—and the word detestable (24) suddenly reveals the taunt as deadly serious. This word is usually reserved for heathen rites or idols (cf. e.g. 44:19); transferred to the worshipper it shows how corrupting is the choice of a lie for one’s ultimate allegiance. The point is followed through in Rom. 1:18–32.

Vs 25–29 cover the ground of vs 2–4 with some added details. 25 the north and east are now mentioned together (cf. v 2), defining more precisely Cyrus’s conquests, which overarched the Babylonian Empire from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian and Black Seas. The comment who calls on my name must be taken with 45:4; i.e. Cyrus would invoke the name of Yahweh (cf. Ezr. 1:2–3), yet not as a true convert. This is indirectly supported by his inscriptions, which diplomatically attribute his victories to the gods of the peoples he conquered (e.g. to Marduk at Babylon, but to Sin, the moon-god, at Ur).

26–29 With their emphasis on prediction, these verses would touch the heathen world on a sensitive spot, since divination was a major preoccupation (cf. 47:13); and Croesus of Lydia was to pay dearly for the Delphic oracle’s ambiguity over his prospects against Cyrus. (Told that he would destroy a great empire, he joined battle and destroyed his own.) On this challenge to predict events as Yahweh has done, and its bearing on the authorship of these chapters, see the Introduction.

42:1–17 Light for the nations

42:1–9 The first ‘Servant Song’. The sudden quietness after the overpowering themes of chs. 40 and 41 has been compared to the still, small voice of 1 Ki. 19:12. Four or five times such a solo passage quietly emerges in these chapters, to portray the Servant as ‘the man for others’, with an increasing emphasis on suffering in 49:1–13; 50:4–9; and 52:13–53:12, followed by the joyful 61:1–4 to enumerate the blessings he distributes.

At the far end of the series he is the one in the place of the many but in v 1 he is introduced as my servant and my chosen one and is closely associated with the ‘Israel’ of 41:8–10. The enduement with the Spirit and the bringing of justice (1, 3, 4), or true religion, however, are features of the Davidic king of 11:1–5 and 32:1–8 (cf. the blending of this passage with the kingly Ps. 2:7 at the baptism of Jesus, Mt. 3:17), so that already an individual begins to stand out from the mass of Israel. The close of the chapter (18–25) strongly reinforces this impression.

2–7 The Servant’s gentleness, both as unassertiveness (2) and as tenderness to the weak and inadequate (3), is unmarred by any weakness of his own: the words falter and discouraged (4) pointedly take up the Hebrew terms already used for smouldering and bruised (3). The portrait is identified in Mt. 12:17–21, and the glimpse of a waiting world (4c) confirms the character of his mission. A light for the Gentiles (6) was one of the earliest designations of Jesus (cf. Lk. 2:32) and one of the formative titles of his church (cf. Acts 13:47). But while the church was to share in this liberation of the blind and the captives (7; cf. ‘the lord’s servant’ portrayed in 2 Tim. 2:24–26), only its head could be described as God’s covenant, uniting the LORD and the people (6; cf. 49:8) in his own person (cf. Mt. 26:28).

8–9 These verses tie in this Servant motif with the themes of chs. 40 and 41 respectively, for Yahweh's jealousy for his true glory will chiefly express itself in spreading his light world-wide. This is the coming phase of his design, the new things declared now, which have been disclosed also in outline 'from the beginning' (41:26–27; cf. Gn. 12:1–3).

42:10–12 The world acclaim its Master. Outbursts of singing are a feature of these chapters (cf. 44:23; 49:13; 52:9 etc.), as they are of chs. 24–27, and are closely akin to Pss. 93; 95–100 in theme and language. 10 cf. v 10a with Pss. 96:1; 98:1; and v 10b with Ps. 107:23–24. Here not only nature but the nations break out into singing, for joy at the liberation just recounted. 11 Israel's bitter rivals, Kedar (cf. Ps. 120:5–7) and the Edomite Sela (last heard of in contexts of judgment; 21:16–17; 16:1), demonstrate the breadth of this grace. But see the next paragraph.

42:13–17 The Lord declares his zeal. The violent similes, like a warrior (13) and like a woman in childbirth (14), dispose of any idea of grace as a mere softening of God's mood. Rather, his fury (13) against evil and his pent-up zeal to redress it (14; cf. Lk. 12:50) supply as much of the motivation as do his tenderness (16a) and constancy (16b) towards its victims. Salvation will come only through judgment and will not be for the impenitent (17). Cf. 63:1–6, the fiery complement of ch. 53.

42:18–48:22 Inconstant servant and unchanging Lord

There is a restless interplay in these chapters between the grace of God and the wilfulness of his people, whose determination to destroy themselves is only outmatched by his tenacity, expressed in classic form in 43:21.

42:18–25 Blind leaders of the blind. This bitter anticlimax to the portrait of the true servant (1–9), of the waiting world (10–12) and of the eager Redeemer (13–17), is vividly apposite to the church's perennial failure to live up to its calling. In Isaiah's first vision, to see and hear without perception (cf. vs 18–20) was a danger signal (cf. 6:10–13); here it is a crippling disability. The futility of the incompetent messenger (cf. 2 Sa. 18:29) is Israel's futility, and it is wilful: he is an heir of the covenant (19b; see the note below); he has the capacity (20) and the data (21) for the knowledge of God's will; he is still invited to listen attentively (23). Even the plight he is now in is designed to teach, not destroy him (25b); but the lesson, so far, is lost on him.

Note. 19 Committed is probably better translated 'he that is at peace with me' (RV; cf. Ps. 7:4). The passive form here suggests 'he that has been brought into peace [friendly relations]'.

43:1–21 Grace abounding. The But now (1) is a feature of these chapters, as the love of God, continually rebuffed, continually returns with the initiative. The same Hebrew expression is found at 44:1; 49:5; 52:5; 64:8 (7, Heb.).

1–7 These verses give Israel in eloquent detail the assurance Christ gives to his church, that the gates of Hades will not prevail against it. Fire and water, peoples and distances, can take no toll; everyone (7) will safely arrive (cf. 40:26) whom God calls mine (1). Some of the many strands that bind them to him are enumerated, such as creation, redemption, call (1), love (4), adoption (6) and the honour of his name (7). The unique relationship is emphasized by the bold figure of a human ransom (3–4; cf. v 14), i.e. great nations have fallen and will fall to make way for Israel. Pr. 21:18 speaks in similar terms; the other side of the matter is that the nations will gain from Israel far more than they lose (cf. 42:1–9), and that her ultimate ransom must be a very different victim (cf. 53:5–6).

8–13 Here Israel is faced again with her sin against the light (8; cf. 42:18–20); yet she is held to her high calling as servant and chosen (10), as much for her own instruction (that you may know ... believe ... and understand) as that of the world. Her very history testified for Yahweh (10–12); one day the title my witnesses was to have its full force (cf. Acts 1:8), but for the present Israel appears as a passive and reluctant exhibit. The forensic setting is that of 41:1–4, 21–23; the point at issue is the non-existence of any God but Yahweh, in ages past, present or to come (10b, 11, 13).

14–21 The name Babylon appears for the first time since 39:7, and while the Hebrew of v 14 has its obscurities, the main thrust of the passage is a clear promise of a greater exodus, in which God's wonders in the desert (19–20) will outmatch even those of the Red Sea (16–18). The promise is once again rooted in the covenant (note the terms of relationship in vs 14–15 and of election in vs 20c–21).

For its real fulfilment we must look beyond the modest homecomings from Babylon of the sixth and fifth centuries BC, although these are certainly in view, to the exodus which the Son of God accomplished at Jerusalem (Lk. 9:31; cf. 1 Cor. 10:4, 11), which alone justifies the language of this and kindred passages. See also on ch. 35 and 40:3–5.

43:22–28 Grace despised. 22–26 Israel's devastating response to divine ardour is a yawn of apathy. No rebuff could be worse; yet it gives occasion for a penetrating comparison between religion as a burden (23b–24a) and as grateful homage (23a) to the burden-Bearer (24b–25; cf. 46:3–4), who once again offers to prove his case in open court (26; cf. 41:1).

27 Your first father is probably Jacob in this context, as the Israelites are being reminded that they have little to boast of, either in their ancestry or in their spiritual leaders (spokesmen). 28 The final thrust is deadly, for destruction is the Hebrew term her'em, reserved for such objects of judgment as Jericho or the Amalekites, with whom no compromise was to be endured. It is the strongest term in the language.

44:1–28 The living God and his great design. 1–5 An apparently closed question is reopened with a characteristic But now (see on 43:1), amazingly reaffirming the ungrateful Israel's calling as servant and chosen (1, repeated in v 2), together with the affectionate Jeshurun ('upright'; cf. Dt. 33:5, but see Dt. 32:15; cf. on Is. 42:19), and going on to promise greater things to come. The outpouring of the Spirit (3) is a glimpse of the new covenant, as in Je. 31:31–34; Ezk. 36:26–27; Joel 2:28–29; and the confessions of allegiance in v 5 are a rare foretaste of the Gentile conversions, like those of Ps. 87:4–6 (where however it is God who enrolls them). These new offspring (3) of Israel will mark the flow of God's living water, just as a line of trees marks the course of a river (3–4). The book of Acts traces part of this current of life through the thirsty land.

6–8 These verses give the very essence of these chapters, with their emphasis on God as Israel's champion (Redeemer, 6; cf. 41:14), their explicit monotheism (6b, 8b), their stress on prediction (7b) and their reassuring tone towards a diffident Israel (8).

9–20 Here the same message is preached from the other side, turning the visual appeal of idolatry into an embarrassment, sparing no aspect of it. It is a favourite theme of these chapters (cf. 40:18–20; 45:20; 46:1–7). All worship of things, given by God (9; cf. v 14) and shaped by man contains the same absurdity and blasphemy (cf. Rom. 1:25). Man's eventual inability to see this (which is as modern as it is ancient) comes of a prior refusal to face it (18–20; cf. Rom. 1:21).

21–28 We now return to the positive and joyous revelation of the true God. 21 The opening call to Remember refers probably to the matters to which Israel can already testify (cf. v 8), as well as to the heathen follies just described (there is a similar call in 46:8). But the Lord's repeated claim to control and predict the course of history is now dramatically renewed by the specific promises of vs 26–28. The veiled predictions of good news for Jerusalem and of a liberator in 41:2 and 25–29 are suddenly unveiled to reveal Cyrus and his edict of rebuilding; a prophecy which duly came to pass (cf. Ezr. 1:1–4). Such minuteness of detail is paralleled only in 1 Ki. 13:2, where Josiah is named 300 years before his time. 27 The reference to the deep is another allusion to the exodus, a reminder of God's ability to perform these new wonders. 28 The term my shepherd implies no more than God's employment of this ruler for his own ends (see 45:4 and on 41:25).

45:1–25 The God of all the earth. 1–8 These verses put the Lord's control of Cyrus in the setting of his total sovereignty (7), his world-wide self-revelation (6) and his will to vindicate the right (8).

1–3 The term anointed is the basis of the title Messiah; but its OT use is general, chiefly for God's anointed kings (e.g. Saul in 1 Sa. 24:6). Here it stresses that Cyrus is appointed and equipped for a supreme task to which all his victories will be the prelude. Every phrase of vs 1b–3a highlights these successes; e.g. the treasures of darkness are those that are the most carefully hidden, as being the most precious. (As conqueror of Croesus and of Babylon, Cyrus was to acquire incalculable wealth.) 4 But the act that was the point and climax of his career, the release of Israel (cf. v 13), was doubtless a minor episode to Cyrus, so faulty are human valuations (cf. 55:8). His acknowledgement of Yahweh (cf. Ezr. 1:2–4), as of other deities, seems to have been superficial (see on 41:25); a recognition of his existence and influence (3) without a corresponding personal knowledge (4).

7 Light and ... darkness ... prosperity and ... disaster are typically Hebraic expressions as pairs of opposites for 'all that is' (cf. Ps. 49:1–2). Disaster is (lit.) 'evil', but this Hebrew word is too general a term to suggest that Isaiah is making God the author of wickedness (see rather Jb. 2:10; Am. 3:6; Rom. 11:36). Some have seen here an attack on Zoroastrian dualism, with its rival gods of good and evil; but this verse is equally opposed to polytheism, the target of most of these chapters' invective. There is no clear evidence that Cyrus was a Zoroastrian as were some of his successors.

9–13 The focus turns from Cyrus to a rather querulous Israel (the plural subjects of the verbs of v 11 and the allusion to Cyrus in the third person in v 13 indicate this change), with a classic rebuke to the suspicion that God is fumbling his work (cf. 29:16). The NIV rightly takes v 11's imperatives as highly ironical, the equivalent of indignant questions. 12 The object-lesson from the starry skies has been similarly, if more gently, used in 40:26–31. 13 Cf. 44:28.

14–25 Foreseeing the great influx of the Gentiles, these verses leap far beyond the liberation. Chs. 60–62 will take up the theme more fully. Here it is expressed first in an address to Israel (14–19) and then in an appeal to mankind to acknowledge its Lord, as one day it must, and thereby find salvation in company with the nation it once despised (20–25).

14 Such names as Egypt etc. and the details of chains and homage depict God's triumph in terms of the contemporary scene, using the vivid colouring of human victories. In the fulfilment, these will be transcended, as vs 20–25 make plain. The Gentiles of this verse are those that were never yet within Israel's empire; their surrender will be as total as that of prisoners of war, yet in reality it will spring from conviction (14c–16) and issue in salvation (22, 24).

15 The expression a God who hides himself may perhaps be a continuation of the converts' confession, acknowledging the invisible God instead of their idols; more probably it is Israel's exclamation at God's inscrutable ways, 'past finding out'. Vs 18–19 reply that, for all this, he has worked to a great design and has unequivocally revealed himself. The word for both empty (18) and in vain (19) is as in Gn. 1:2 ('formless'); v 18b looks on to the end in view at the creation (cf. the phrase to be inhabited), the transforming of an initial formlessness into a habitable world. So too, a glorious end will be achieved with Israel.

22–25 The concluding verses are remarkable first for their picture of world-wide and heart-felt conversions, and secondly for the bold use the NT was to make of vs 23–24, applying them directly to Christ in Phil. 2:10–11 (and indirectly in Rom. 14:9, 11). Cf. the use made of 8:12b, 13a in 1 Pet. 3:14–15.

46:1–13 The helpless gods of Babylon. It is in keeping with the sharpening focus of the whole scene (cf. the explicit references to Cyrus [44:28; 45:1] and to Babylon and its overthrow [47:1–15]) that particular gods are now specified. 1 Bel ('lord'; cf. Baal) was a title transferred from the old god Enlil to Babylon's patron deity, Marduk, whose son Nebo (Nabu) was the god of learning. Their names appear in e.g. Belshazzar, Nebuchadnezzar. Both gods were commonly transported in processions, but in this scene they are monstrous refugees, weighing down their struggling pack-animals. The contrast between these burdens, with their demands on money and muscles (6–7), and the lifelong burden-bearer, Yahweh (3–4), brings the series of attacks on idolatry in these chapters to a telling climax. The theme of prediction, a constant ingredient of these passages (cf. e.g. 41:23), receives its classic statement in v 10a; and the twin realities of the conqueror's career—as both predatory and predestined—are set side by side in v 11a (cf. 41:2, 25; 44:28; 45:1–7).

12–13 Righteousness is a word with several layers of meaning. Basically it means what is right, i.e. as it should be, in its proper state. So it can include the ideas of rectitude, of justice and of righting what is wrong. In these chapters the last of these senses is predominant, even shading into that of victory (see on 41:2); but the ethical dimension is not lost (cf. e.g. 48:1; 53:11; 58:2), and here it takes precedence in v 12, leaving the secondary sense, deliverance, to emerge in v 13, parallel with salvation.

47:1–15 Babylon doomed. This is a dirge, or taunt-song, in the characteristic fall-away rhythm of such poems (it can be felt, in translation, in the succession of a longer and a shorter phrase within v 2a). Cf. 1:21–31; 14:4–23.

It is Babylon's proper fate: there can be no mercy, for she has shown none (6; cf. Jas. 2:13). Yet the description is not without pity. We are watching the triumph of justice, but equally the tragedy of the sinner. Dust and toil, nakedness and shame, silence and darkness (1–5)—these symbols of damnation have an added bitterness by the glimpse of the arrogant gaiety (8) which they quench for ever (7–11). We can enter into her sinking of heart as the trusted expedients fail (the magic spells, sorceries and horoscopes of vs 12–14), and the old associates drift prudently away, 'each in his own direction' (15, RSV), like the fair-weather friends that they are.

The records amply confirm, incidentally, Babylon's profusion of magical rites, alluded to in vs 9, 12–13; and Ezk. 21:21 vividly depicts a selection of them in use by Nebuchadnezzar.

48:1–22 'Love to the loveless shown'. 1–8 The shift of attention from Babylon back to Israel is far from flattering. Their glib talk of the LORD and the holy city (1–2) accords ill with their persistent idolatry (5); they emerge in fact as hardened hypocrites (1, 4, 8). It is a darker picture than that of the faithlessness of 40:27 and even the coldness of 43:22, although it was anticipated in the sin against the light implied in 42:18–20. The argument from prophecy, hitherto directed against the heathen (cf. e.g. 41:21–24), now has to be turned against God's own people, these determined sceptics (3–8). See the Introduction.

9–22 All this, however, serves only to reveal God’s patience for what it is: unmerited (9), constructive (10; see the note below) and resolute (11). After all his outspokenness he can still affirm both his call (12) and his love (see on v 14), and give the liberating command, Leave Babylon (20). It will re-echo through the coming chapters (cf. 49:9; 52:11; 55:12; 62:10). Yet this is no rhapsody; the high price of self-will is stated and re-stated as nothing less than a farewell to peace (18, 22), i.e. to all health of soul and society. The sad realism of v 22 will reappear at 57:21, and the book will end on the still harsher note of 66:24.

Notes. V 10 presents problems of translation. The NIV assumes a small miscopying in v 10a (the Heb. has ‘with’), which could also mean ‘at a cost of’ or ‘in the character of’; this is a single letter, easily confused with as). In v 10b, the Dead Sea Scroll of Isaiah supports the NIV’s tested, but ‘chosen’ is the normal meaning of the word found in the standard text. 14b For chosen ally ... read ‘The LORD loves him; he will ...’. 16 This verse ends with a startling change of speaker: no longer the Lord, as in vs 15–16a, but one sent by him, as the Spirit is also sent. It could be the prophet, but it is more meaningful if it anticipates the ‘me’ of 49:1; 50:4; 61:1; in other words, the Servant in whom Jesus was to see himself. It is a remarkable glimpse, from afar, of the Trinity.

49:1–55:13 The dawn of redemption

49: 1–13 The second ‘Servant Song’

The limits of this passage have been variously fixed, usually at vs 1–6. But each of vs 5–8 introduces part of God’s answering commission to his servant; and v 8, which echoes 42:6, cannot be shorn of its sequel.

After ch. 42, with its mutually incompatible portraits of ‘my servant’ (42:1–4, 18–21), the question of Israel’s unfitness has become more and more acute. The coming chapters will resolve the tension, not by this servant’s dismissal or improvement, but by the clear emergence of a true Servant whose mission will be first of all to Israel itself.

In this passage this is apparent at once from the Servant’s clear conscience. Here he shows no contrition for the sins deplored in 48:1–6, or the blindness of 42:18–20; only a sense of being trained for God’s moment (1–3; cf. 48:16). The unresponsiveness of Israel is something he has done battle with, not shared (4), and although he is addressed as ‘Israel’ (3), his mission field is itself ‘Israel’ (5) before it is the world (6).

This paradox of an Israel sent to Israel is part of the powerful thrust of the OT towards the NT, since not even the ‘remnant’ of true Israelites (Rom. 9:6, 27) can fulfil the boundless expectations of vs 1–13. We are driven to seek a more perfect embodiment of God’s light, salvation (6) and covenant (8) in Christ at the head of his church, ‘the Israel of God’ (Acts 13:47; Gal. 6:16). Also the theme of conquest through service, broached in 42:1–4, has begun to sound the note of suffering and rejection (4, 7), which will increase in sharpness and significance in the third and fourth ‘Songs’.

8 The first part of this verse is quoted by Paul in 2 Cor. 6:2 as a saying now fulfilled (cf. our Lord’s use of Is. 61:1–2 in Lk. 4:18–21). On the expression a covenant for the people see on 42:6. 9–13 The captives flocking home in vs 8–13 are visualized as the dispersed of Israel throughout the world, not merely at Babylon (cf. v 12 with v 22); but the allusion to v 10 in Rev. 7:17 shows that we may rightly see also the Gentiles leaving for their new homeland (cf. 44:5). 12 ‘Sinim’ (see the NIV mg.) was clearly a puzzle to ancient scribes and translators, who suggested e.g. Persia, the South, or Aswan. Some reputable scholars have argued for China (cf. our term ‘sinologist’ from the Greek for Chinese), but the most we can safely say is that v 12 foresees converts drawn from far distant lands, of which Sinim was evidently a notable example.

49:14–23 Comfort for Jerusalem

14 The deserted ruins of Zion are a feature of these chapters, personified as a woman bereft of husband and children. 15–16 God’s reply here is typical. First, she is not bereft, for he cannot forget her. Secondly, she has her best days before her, when her new family will overflow all her bounds (19–20). The NT applies such promises not to ‘the present Jerusalem’ but to ‘Jerusalem above’ (Gal. 4:25–27; cf. Is. 54:1), i.e. the universal church in heaven and earth. The ruins of the city were indeed rebuilt in the sixth and fifth centuries BC, but these prophecies transcend the modest scale of those events. 22–23 On the abject surrender pictured here see on 45:14. On those who hope in me see on 25:9.

49:24–50:3 Comfort for the captives

There is a double misgiving reflected here, over the power and the will of God to save. The former is answered by affirming God’s control of history (49:25–26) and of creation (50:2–3), and the latter by a comparison between his character and Israel’s (50:1)—for there is no fickleness in him as there is in her, and no pressure on him from outside (my creditors). Her sins alone account for the breach (cf. 59:1–2); the Lord’s attitude is, by implication, that of Ho. 3:1–3, where the erring wife is loved and brought home.

50:4–9 The third ‘Servant Song’

After the display of patient gentleness in the first ‘Song’ (42:1–9) and the acceptance of frustrating toil in the second (49:4, 7), here the Servant faces the active spite and fury of evil. It is only a step, the reader feels, to the cross. There is no hint now of even the momentary discouragement of 49:4; the Servant has set himself to learn (4) and to give (6), as one dedicated in mind and body. 4 The plural (lit.) ‘those being taught’ emphasizes that he is accepting the common course of training (cf. Heb. 5:8), and the element of reiteration in the phrase morning by morning suggests a lifelong attentiveness to God’s unfolding will, ‘the matter of a day in its day’ (cf. 1 Ki. 8:59). The consequent authority and aptness of his words are those of the prophet par excellence.

So his suffering, while still unexplained (until ch. 53), is already fruitful, as all suffering can be. 5 Godward, he makes it his offering of obedience; 6 Manward, a voluntary, costly gift, not a resented exaction (I offered ... ; I did not hide ...); 7–9 Inwardly, he uses his discredit and isolation to clarify his sole trust in God. In Rom. 8:31–39 Paul sings the Christian’s variant of this song, for whom Another’s righteousness silences the accuser, and for whom God’s help (7a, 9a) is now explicitly declared as love (Rom. 8:35, 37, 39).

50:10–11 An epilogue to the song

The two verses seize on the words of faith just uttered, to make them the pivot of life or death for the hearer. 10 Commitment to God is clearly allegiance at the same time to his Servant, whose words are binding and his faith normative (cf. vs 7–9). It is a pointer to his identity, as a single individual and a master of disciples. 11 This verse describes either the persecutors (cf. v 6 and Ps. 118:12) or, more probably, those who are self-sufficient, in contrast to v 10. Its last line may be a generalization on the sorrow which is always the end of sin, but it may anticipate the NT teaching on punishment after death.

51:1–8 More sustenance for faith

Faith, which ‘comes from hearing the message’ (Rom. 10:17), is nourished by the three messages introduced by Listen (1), Listen (4) and Hear (7). They confirm the call of 50:10 to an unflinching trust, by an appeal first to look back to Israel’s humble beginnings, to see what God can do with but one (1–2); then to look ahead to the promised consummation both in this world (4–5) and in the next (6); finally to look at present humiliations against such a background (7–8). The thought of man’s mortality, in the light of God’s eternity, is echoed from the Servant’s words in 50:9. 6 The translation like flies, as against the weaker expression ‘in like manner’ (AV, RV), plausibly postulates here a collective singular of the noun used in Ex. 8:16–17 (12–13, Heb.).

51:9–52:12 Mounting expectancy

Quick repetitions lend urgency to the whole section, which takes its tone from the opening, Awake, awake! Man’s appeal draws out an answering assurance and challenge, marked by God’s own reiterations: I, even I, am he (12), ‘Rouse yourself, rouse yourself’ (17; lit.), Awake, awake (52:1) and finally Depart, depart (from Babylon), 52:11.

51:9–11 The exodus surpassed. 9–10 Rahab and that monster and the sea, which would suggest to a non-Israelite the chaos powers confronting the gods at creation (cf. on 27:1), are symbols here of the exodus, as v 10 makes clear. Rahab has already been Egypt’s nickname in 30:7 (see note). On rather similar symbolism for the final judgment, see on 27:1. 11 But Isaiah’s plea for another exodus stirs his memory of a promise already made, and this verse quotes, almost to the letter, 35:10.

51:12–16 The oppressed comforted. 12–14 God himself (I, even I ...) is the ground of comfort, both as Maker, in contrast to the transience of mere creatures, and as God of the covenant (15–16) (your God ... my people), who counts his call of Israel the crowning glory, not the anticlimax, of the startling series, heavens ... earth ... Zion. Note that Zion is a term for the people themselves in the last phrase of v 16. V 16a recalls the charge to the Servant in 49:2; and in fact, it is as bearer of God’s words to the world that Israel has chiefly fulfilled her calling.

51:17–25 The tables turned. The you is not plural but feminine singular throughout this passage, which consistently personifies the mother-city (see on v 16). Of the various metaphors, that of the cup or ‘goblet of staggering’ destined to change hands (17, 22) conveys the main message, while the pathos and brutalities of defeat are made vivid by the groping and prostration in vs 18, 23 and by the simile of the trapped deer (20). The sight of every street (20) littered with the dying was to leave its mark deeply on Lamentations (cf. e.g. La. 2:11–12, 19, 21).

52:1–10 The good news of peace. 1–2 God’s call, Awake, awake, throws back at Israel her own prayer of 51:9 in a retort which is the best answer. Cf. a comparable rejoinder by our Lord in Mk. 9:22–23. 3–5 The main object of these verses is to rid the redemption metaphor of any notion of a commercial transaction. As 50:1 pointed out, Israel’s overlords have no claims on her, nor on God; they are his agents (and far from guiltless at that), not his creditors. While 1 Pet. 1:18–19 will give a fresh nuance to v 3b, the sovereign salvation of God, for the sake of my name ... my name (5–6; cf. Ezk. 36:21; Rom. 2:24), is here the sole concern.

7–10 These verses, movingly portraying the arrival of the news (cf. 2 Sa. 18:19–33), bring out the three component factors of every such experience. First, the messenger, whose lustre is that of his message (and this must be a despatch, as Paul points out in Rom. 10:15, nothing less); secondly the watchmen, those who are ‘looking for ... redemption’ (Lk. 2:38), otherwise the news will fall on deaf ears; thirdly, the event, which is here none other than the Lord in action (8b–10), seen not from afar, but close to (lit. ‘eye to eye’, i.e. face to face, as in Nu. 14:14 of seeing the Lord). Notice the Psalm-like outburst in vs 9–10 (cf. Ps. 98:3–4; see on 42:10–12).

52:11–12 The clean break with Babylon. The picture is of a priestly procession, not the unceremonious departure of Ex. 12:33. The homecomings in Ezr. 1:5–11 and 7:7–10 were to have something of this character, and Ezra himself took the promise of divine escort fully to heart (Ezr. 8:22) and was not disappointed. But behind the literal departure from Babylon, Rev. 18:4 sees a greater movement, the withdrawal of the church from the embrace and judgment of the world, ‘so that you will not share in her sins, so that you will not receive any of her plagues’.

52:13–53:12 The fourth ‘Servant Song’

From the great homecoming we turn to the solitary figure whose agony was the price of it. We are at the heart of the book, the centre of its whole pattern of sin and righteousness, grace and judgment.

The poem, unusually symmetrical, is in five paragraphs of three verses each. It begins and ends with the Servant’s exaltation (first and fifth stanzas); set within this is the story of his rejection in sections two and four, which in turn frame the centrepiece (4–6), where the atoning significance of the suffering is expounded. God and man reconciled, share the telling (see the ‘my’ and ‘I’ of the outer sections, and the ‘we’ and ‘our’ of 53:1–6).

52:13–15 The joy set before him. Here is heaven’s endorsement of the brave words of 50:7–9, applying to the Servant terms of exaltation that can characterize God himself (cf. ‘high and exalted’, 6:1; ‘high and lofty’, 57:15; cf. also 5:16; 55:9). The many ranged against him will give place to the many convicted and enlightened (14–15; note the return of this word, at a deeper level, in 53:11–12). 15 For sprinkle, the RSV’s ‘startle’ (supported by the LXX) makes a good opening to the sequence, startled—silenced—convinced. But sprinkle (AV, RV), which is grammatically suspect but not indefensible, suits the context well with its implications of sacrificial cleansing (cf. 1 Pet. 1:2) and perhaps of covenant making (cf. Ex. 24:6, 8; a different word).

53:1–3 The disdain of men. The gulf between God’s message and man’s opinion is very plain, in the contrast between what is revealed (cf. v 1 with Rom. 10:16–17, 21) and what is naturally attractive (2) or impressive (3). Cf. the reaction to the humiliated Jesus in e.g. Mt. 27:39–44 and to the preaching of the cross (1 Cor. 1:23). Sorrows and suffering (3), echoed back in v 4, are (lit.) ‘pains’ and ‘sickness’, which might suggest to the reader either a sick man or one sick at heart (as in Je. 15:18). But there is another category, that of the physician’s voluntary involvement; for he is also a man of pain and sickness in the sense that he gives himself to these things and their relief. This is the sense defined in Mt. 8:17, quoting Is. 53:4.

53:4–6 ‘O sweet exchange ...’. This is the central stanza, in every sense. Here the meaning of the Servant’s disgrace breaks through, with the inverted word-order of v 4a to stress the exchange of roles, and the emphatic pronouns he and we (4a–4b) to expose our misunderstanding: ‘Our ills he bore, and our pains he carried; yet we thought ...’

4–5 The meaning grows in clarity through these verses: the pain he is bearing is ours (4); it is the punishment of sin (5a); it is the price of salvation (5b). But it remains a paradox, one of

God's ways which are higher than ours (55:9), as we are reminded by the startling conjunction of his wounds (i.e. 'weals'; cf. 1:6) and our healing, as cause and effect. 6 This verse is perhaps the most penetrating of all descriptions of sin and atonement, uncovering the fecklessness which is second nature to us and the self-will which isolates us from God and man alike; but also the divine initiative which transferred our punishment to the one substitute. The metaphor whereby iniquity is laid on him is clarified by e.g. Gn. 4:13; Lv. 5:1, 17 (where one [lit.] bears one's iniquity, i.e. its penalty) and by e.g. Lv. 10:17; 16:22 (where the liability falls on another). Note the expressions, we all ... us all, which give the verse an identical beginning and end in the Hebrew; grace wholly answering sin.

53:7–9 Wicked hands, willing victim. The victim's silence (contrast the outcry of another 'gentle lamb', Je. 11:19; 12:3) springs from love and faith, as Jesus was to show (1 Pet. 2:23–24), not from weakness or prudence. Taking note of the NIV mg. on v 8, 'From arrest and judgment [sentence] he was taken [led] away', the whole stanza irresistibly evokes the trial of Jesus and its sequel (see on v 9).

8 The translation descendants agrees better with the LXX, quoted in Acts 8:33, than with the Hebrew text, whose word dôr points rather to one's contemporaries. It is best rendered 'as for his [own] generation, who gave it any thought?' Cf. 'Who has believed ...?' (1).

9 The NIV should restore the Hebrew's singular, 'a rich man'. It was an enigma until the event of Mt. 27:57, 60, and it still embarrasses those to whom detailed prediction is unacceptable. But the ancient versions and the Scrolls confirm the authenticity of rich, the latter source indeed correcting a plural found in the LXX, retaining the singular, as found in the standard text.

53:10–12 Crowned with glory and honour. In this stanza vindication is complete. The persecutors fade from view, to reveal the LORD (emphatic in v 10; cf. Acts 4:28) and the Servant (12; he poured out his life) as the ultimate doers of what has been done. Further, in each verse the Servant's resurrection and triumph are clearly implied, while even more facets of his atonement appear than in vs 4–6.

10 A guilt offering was the sacrifice which spoke of compensation or satisfaction. The Hebrew of this verse can make either 'his soul' (i.e. himself) or the Lord the offerer of the sacrifice; but v 12 leaves no doubt of the Servant's self-giving. 11–12 Other aspects of his saving work are shown in terms of justification, sin-bearing, identification (numbered with the transgressors; cf. Lk. 22:37) and intercession, i.e. intervention. He is presented as priest and sacrifice, patriarch (10b) and king. Finally, the many ... many in vs 11–12 (the same word is translated great in v 12) for whom the one suffered, reappear in fulfilment of the opening promise (cf. 52:14–15, 'many ... many').

54:1–17 The teeming mother-city

This chapter's exuberance, peace and security spring from the dereliction and death just described, which at 52:13 cut across the description of the great homecoming. In Christian terms, the Calvary of ch. 53 is followed by the growing church of ch. 54 and the gospel call of ch. 55.

54:1–10 Wife and mother. Paul linked this passage with the story of Sarah and Hagar (cf. Gal. 4:27) and saw here the true church, its members born from above (see also on 49:14–23). The promise of world-wide expansion (3; cf. 49:19) and the hint of coming strains upon the old structure (2) were to be vividly borne out in the age of the apostles. For the metaphor of the erring wife see 50:1; here however, with rare sympathy, not the guilt but the pain (6) of the estrangement is put to the fore, with a corresponding tenderness of reunion (7–8)—its permanence seen to be as unconditional and as undeserved (cf. compassion in v 10) as the promise of Gn. 9:11, and (we can now add) of Mt. 16:18.

54:11–17 Gem-built city. The narrow tent of v 2 and the shattered Jerusalem are equally outshone by this union of beauty and strength, a glowing picture of the church, to be elaborated in Rev. 21:10–27. But its meaning is translated into non-pictorial terms in vs 13–15, where the righteousness of v 14 and the impregnability of vs 15–17 are deep rooted in personal discipleship (13; cf. Je. 31:34), which is one of the marks of the new covenant. This is the true strength of God's city, which is promised not immunity from attack but the unanswerable weapon of truth (17; cf. Lk. 21:15).

55:1–13 Grace abounding

This call to the needy is unsurpassed for warmth of welcome even in the NT. The chapter builds up twice to a climax, first in vs 1–5, then, over a still greater range, in vs 6–13.

55:1–5 Poverty, abundance, mission. 1–3 The fourfold come is as wide as human need (note the stress on unsatisfied longing in vs 1–2, as in e.g. Ec. 1:3; Jn. 4:13) and as narrow as a single individual (note the intertwined singulars and plurals in v 1, more evident in AV, RV). The Bible closes with an echo of it (Rev. 22:17), and Jesus made the same identification of come ... and eat with 'come to me' in Jn. 6:35. The paradox of buy ... without money throws into relief the twin facts of sure possession and total dependence which are implied in grace (cf. the union of the undoubting and the undeserving in Heb. 4:16).

3–5 These verses raise the invitation to the fully personal plane, engaging mind and will and drawing the hearers into covenant, to share in the world mission of the Messiah. David is named only here in chs. 40–66, but this is enough to identify the kingly Messiah of 7:14 etc. with the Servant of 42:1 etc. for whom the nations wait. (The suggestion that the promise given to David in 2 Sa. 7:12–16 is here transferred from king to people, goes ill with the emphasis in v 3b on its permanence. Rather, David's vision in Ps. 18:43–45, 49, of nations subdued for a witness to the Lord, is enlarged by the prospect of nations converted: cf. v 5 with Zc. 8:20–23; 9:9–10).

55:6–13 Sin, pardon, glory. 6–9 If man is hungry and needs satisfying (1–5), he is also wicked and needs salvation. God's calling and seeking (1–5) must be matched by those of the sinner. V 7 is a classic statement of repentance, challenging the mind (cf. the NT word for 'repentance') and the will, the habits (way) and the plans (implied in the Hebrew for thoughts). It is both negative (forsake) and positive (turn), personal (to the LORD) and specific (for mercy); and its appeal is reinforced by the shortness of the time (6) and the sheer generosity of the promise (7).

10–11 The declaration of vs 8–9 not only looks back to v 7 but on to vs 10–13, to shame us out of our small expectations. God's thoughts are more far-reaching and more fertile, as well as higher, than ours. The comparison of his word with rain and ... snow suggests a slow and silent work, transforming the face of the earth in due time. The reference is to his decree (cf. e.g. 44:26; 45:23) rather than his invitation or instruction, which can be refused (48:18–19; cf. the similar imagery to that of v 10 in Heb. 6:4–8).

12–13 His decree is given in these verses, combining the joys of liberation (12a), of the Lord's own coming (cf. 12a with 52:12; 12b with Ps. 96:12–13) and of the healing of the old devastations (cf. 13a with 7:23–25 and perhaps Gn. 3:18). Notice his special renown as liberator (13b).

56:1–66:24 The glory and shame of Zion

Whereas chs. 40–55 surveyed the Babylonian exile, tracing the pattern of redemption largely in terms of the Israelite homecoming, the remaining part of the book fixes our attention on the homeland, which is seen partly in its too-familiar aspect as a place of corruption (56:9–59:15a) and devastation (63:7–64:12), but shown also as it will appear when God has come to the rescue, to make it ‘a crown of beauty’, the centre and magnet of the whole earth (chs. 60–62). The final chapters (65–66), like the prelude (56:1–8), show God’s welcome of the outsider and the heathen to his holy mountain and eternal kingdom, but press home the peril of an everlasting exclusion from these glories.

56:1–8 A welcome for the outcast

1–2 After the exhilarating climax to chs. 40–55, these verses present the sober obligations of integrity (1) and unworldliness (2) that are the plain fare of salvation. In v 1, righteousness displays two of its facets by being coupled with both justice (i.e. fair dealing) and salvation; for God’s righteousness is oriented towards putting things right, not merely towards condemning them as wrong (cf. Rom. 3:21–26; see also on 46:12–13).

3–8 These verses produce a similarly practical translation of the missionary vision of chs. 40–55 into modest terms, in the concern shown for the eunuch and the foreigner, outsiders in the midst of Israel. The former are shown that the law against them (Dt. 23:1) was given in love (to make this cruel mutilation abhorrent in Israel, if nowhere else); and this love now sensitively matched their handicap with something better (5), answering their physical exclusion with the word within, and their lack of a posterity with the word everlasting. The foreigners are likewise treated according to their attitude, not their birth—a principle already established by God’s acceptance, despite Dt. 23:3, of Ruth the convert. But the great words of v 7b were too big for the temple’s trustees (cf. Mk. 11:17; Acts 21:28). With the little-known v 8, cf. Jn. 10:16; it is one of several indications that our Lord knew these chapters intimately.

The importance of the Sabbath, reiterated in this passage (2, 4, 6), emerges most clearly in the two supporting phrases in v 4, making this day not an end in itself but a mark of love for God (cf. 58:13) and loyalty to the covenant (cf. Ex. 31:13).

56:9–59:15a The shame of Zion

56:9–12 Watchmen asleep. See, by contrast, 52:8; 62:6. Our own phrases, dumb dogs, sleeping dogs, greedy dogs, are all, substantially, in vs 10–11a, and they characterize the spiritual leaders (watchmen; cf. Ezk. 3:17), while shepherds is usually an OT term for rulers. The sequence is instructive: spiritually, to have no vision (10a; cf. 1 Sa. 3:1) is to have no message (10b) and to drift into escapism (10c) and self-pleasing (11a). Indeed the shepherds are behaving like their sheep, as they all turn to their own way (11b; cf. 53:6). Worse, they are predators and drunkards (11c–12), pushing greed and escapism to the limit.

57:1–13 Flagrant apostasy. The watchmen have relaxed (56:9–12), and evil has duly flooded in. The times could well be those of Manasseh, Hezekiah’s apostate son, whose persecution of the innocent (2 Ki. 21:16) would accord with v 1, and whose burning of his own son (2 Ki. 21:6) matches the revival of Molech worship here (5b, 9).

2 The thought of the verse is akin to Rev. 14:13. 5 The theme of lust refers to the sexual fertility rites of Canaanite religion, rampant also in Jeremiah’s early days (cf. Je. 2:20–25). (on 5b, see the first paragraph, above.) From speaking of literal whoredom it is a natural transition to the figure of Israel as the wife turned prostitute. In vs 6–13 (where you is consistently feminine singular) the metaphors such as bed, symbols (i.e. the prostitute's trade signs), perfumes etc. are intertwined with the actualities, such as sacrifice and idols in the religious realm, and ambassadors in the political realm. Whether v 9a refers to religion or politics is uncertain; the Hebrew text has 'the king', which could be either Molech (see the first paragraph, above) or an earthly ally (cf. e.g. 30:2–5).

There is loving perception in the picture of weary doggedness in v 10 and of infatuation and coming disillusion in vs 11–13. The whole passage is a fit companion to Ho. 1–3 and Lk. 13:34–35.

57:14–21 Abundant grace. Repetitions, such as Build up, build up and, later, Peace, peace (19), are highly characteristic of chs. 40–66 (cf. e.g. 40:1; 52:1; 65:1); so too is the theme of God as Saviour, vividly presented here. In v 14 he is the masterful liberator. In v 15 the conjunction of the lofty and the lowly prepares us for Mt. 11:28–30; Jn. 1:14. V 16 echoes Gn. 6:3 on God's forbearance, and vs 17–18 expound his frank resolve to reclaim the undeserving and unpromising, summed up in the memorable first line of v 18. 19 So the offer of grace is crystallized, to reappear in Eph. 2:17 as the germ of Paul's gospel to the Gentiles. 20–21 The plight of the wicked is consequently seen, more clearly than in 48:22, in terms of the salvation they have refused. Only their choice separates the Peace, peace of v 19 from the no peace of v 21.

58:1–14 Cant and reality. God's trumpet-call (1) to the formalists is related to the previous indictment (57:1–13) much as Rom. 2 is to Rom. 1, and its emphasis is largely that of the gospels and of James. Negatively (1–5), note the conjunction of meticulous religious observance (2, 5) and social ruthlessness (3b–4), which the pious of every generation seem to take in their (or our) stride (cf. Mt. 23; Jas. 4:1–3), but which God finds nauseating (cf. 1:15). Positively (6–14), the redefinition of fasting as social reform (6), loving care (7), and a forgoing of the luxury of 'pointing the finger' (9), is a foretaste of our Lord's constructive approach to the law.

9 The promise Then you will call ... looks back to the unanswered prayers of v 3 (cf. Jas. 4:3, 8–10), and its rich development in vs 9b–12 is an expression of the principle of Mt. 7:2: 'with the measure you use, it will be measured to you'. 11 The beautiful simile of the well-watered garden reappears in Je. 31:12. The whole series of metaphors in vs 10–12 repays study. 13–14 But lest it should seem that philanthropy is all, these verses describe the strictness and the gladness of the Sabbath-keeping God desires. If fasting is to be an opportunity to show love to our neighbour, the Sabbath should express, first of all, our love of God (though both the foregoing passage and the Sabbath practice of Jesus insist that it must overflow to man). It will mean self-forgetfulness (13a) and the self-discipline of rising above the trivial (13b). But to people of this spirit God can safely give great things (14).

59:1–15a Mutual alienation. This passage is largely the dark counterpart of ch. 58. There is the same problem of unanswered prayer and a similar reply (1–2). But whereas ch. 58 describes true righteousness and its blessings, ch. 59 depicts sin (3–8) and its obliteration of all values (9–15) (cf. v 10 of each chapter). The end is chaos, with human life (in Hobbes's phrase) 'solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short'.

2 This verse classically explains God's seeming inactivity as the effect of separation; not expounded here in terms of his revulsion (as at 1:15), but as the proper product of sin itself. 3–8 The spreading anarchy of these verses clinches the point; if this is sin, not even society survives it, let alone man's fellowship with God. 5–6 The eggs of vipers and spider's web speak tellingly of, first, the poisonous influence of evil people, propagated by the very attempts to stamp it out (5b; cf. e.g. the effects of banning obscene art), and secondly, the futility of relying on their policies or promises (6), flimsy as gossamer.

7–8 Paul drew on these verses in Rom. 3:15–17 in building up to his climax concerning our universal guilt. 9 With its So, this verse ushers in the progressive consequences of choosing evil. 10 The groping in broad daylight is the judgment that Jesus' contemporaries courted (cf. Jn. 3:19) and suffered (cf. Jn. 12:35–40). 14 The four personified figures, with truth (i.e. trustworthiness) lying prostrate (it is always 'the first casualty' in disordered times) may have contributed something to the imagery of Rev. 11:7–8. 15a Perhaps the most revealing touch is the victimizing of the decent man, the only one out of step. It is a worse breakdown than that of Am. 5:13, i.e. not only public justice has warped, but public opinion with it.

59:15b–21 The solitary Rescuer (cf. 63:1–6)

Divine action is the only possible bridge between the shame of Zion just described and the glories to follow (see the comment introducing the section 56:1–66:24).

16–17 The Lord's concern is even sharper than our versions suggest. Displeased should be 'appalled', as at 63:5. With this unshared indignation cf. Jesus' solitary grief and anger in Lk. 19:41, 45. The armour and clothing in v 17 reaffirm the point of v 16b; the Lord has no external aids in fighting evil, only his pure and intense rejection of it. Righteousness seems to have both its dynamic, crusading sense and its more static meaning of integrity (cf. on 46:12–13). So God's armour here illuminates Eph. 6:13–17; it is what he himself uses, not only what he gives.

This zeal is governed by strict justice. V 18 bristles with words of requital, repay ... retribution ... repay ... due (cf. Rom. 12:19), but it clears the way for a kingdom of converts.

19–21 No place of origin will disqualify (19) or qualify (20) a man for membership; the test is spiritual (19a, 20b; cf. Mt. 8:10–12), and the covenant is recognizably the new covenant, whose participants will not only 'all know' the Lord (Je. 31:34) but all speak for him as a nation of prophets (cf. Nu. 11:29; Joel 2:28).

60:1–62:12 The glory of Zion

These glowing, exultant chapters depict blessings that transcend the old order and even, in places, the Christian era itself; but the language is that of the OT ordinances and of the literal Jerusalem—it will need translating into terms of 'the Jerusalem above' (cf. Gal. 4:26). Also Rev. 21 draws freely on ch. 60 for its picture of the radiant city from heaven; and the interpretation of that vision (of which more than one view is possible) must affect that of the present prophecy. The view taken here is that the return of dispersed Israelites to Jerusalem is made the model of a far greater movement, the world-wide inflow of converts into the church, and that the vision repeatedly looks beyond this to the end, the state of ultimate glory.

60:1–9 Lodestar of the nations. The you and your of this chapter are feminine singulars, addressing the mother-city, Zion (see on 49:14–23; 51:17–23; 54:1–10), whose sons ... and ... daughters (4) are of every nationality, not only of the Israelite dispersion (cf. Ps. 87:3–6; Gal. 4:26). So the nations (3) and the islands (9) are more than mere carriers of this homeward traffic; they themselves furnish a large part of it as seekers who come to [Zion's] light (3) and look expectantly to the Lord (9), homing like doves to their loft (8; lit. 'their windows' or 'lattices'). But see also on vs 10–16. The gold and incense (6) remind the Christian reader of the harbingers of this migration in Mt. 2, whose homage then, however, was perilous and whose gifts included the enigmatic myrrh (cf. Mk. 15:23; Jn. 19:39)—pointers to the struggle that still lay ahead.

On the setting and symbolism of, especially, vs 6–9 (of which 7 is crucial to the understanding of the chapter), see the introductory remarks to the section 60:1–62:12. The priestly terms of v 7 preclude a purely literal interpretation of the prophecy, since the NT insists that there can be no return to a worship based on sacrificial rams ... altar and temple, which were ‘but a shadow of the good things to come’ (Heb. 10:1, RSV; cf. Heb. 13:10–16; Jn. 4:21–26). On Tarshish see on 2:16.

60:10–16 The sweets of conquest. The Gentiles of this passage are not converts but subjects, conquered rather than won. Scripture always envisages many such (cf. e.g. Lk. 19:27; Rev. 20:7–9). In metaphors of victory and its fruits—foreign labour (10), immunity from attack (11a; cf. Rev. 21:25–26), exotic tribute (11b), and the like—God promises the triumph of his kingdom and the endless (15) felicity of his people. The apparent imperialism of the passage only expresses the sober truth that to reject God’s sway is suicide (12), and that the meek will inherit the earth.

60:17–22 The full blaze of glory. Gold instead of bronze is a characteristic divine exchange (cf. 61:3, 7), in telling contrast to human decline and devaluations (cf. the makeshifts in 1 Ki. 14:26–28 and the pathos of La. 4:1–2). The passage is so packed with these new glories that it can only be portraying the final perfection, where, in a people all ... righteous, no overseers or taskmasters will be needed but the constraint of right and concord (17b), and no defence but the salvation which is inseparable from God (cf. 59:17), and the praise which is trust made perfect. The living centre of this glory, the immediate presence of God, is revealed in the two middle verses, 19–20. Rev. 21:23 and 22:5 confirm that this vision outruns not only the OT but the Christian era, expressing in earthly terms (cf. e.g. v 22) the new creation of which 65:17–25 will speak again.

61:1–4 The song of the Lord’s Anointed. Although the term ‘the Servant of the Lord’ is absent from this song (as indeed from 50:4–9), it seems artificial to make the ‘me’ of v 1 a new speaker. Our Lord saw his mission revealed as clearly in this song as in the others (cf. Lk. 4:17–21; 7:22); and we may notice, in this Spirit-endued (cf. 11:2; 42:1) and anointed one, a blending of terms that relate to the Servant and the Messianic King.

The joyful task here is a fit sequel to the travail of the earlier songs (see on 42:1), the fruit of which was glimpsed in 53:10–12. Our Lord could quote this passage at the outset of his career because he had already accepted, in his baptism and temptation, the role of Suffering Servant and with it the cross. These are the ‘benefits of his passion’; his miracles spoke the same language.

The setting continues to be the captivity, viewed in turn from Babylon (1b) and the ruined Jerusalem (3). To its first hearers the promise would be as literal as the earlier threat of exile (cf. 39:6); but as fulfilled by Jesus (cf. Lk. 4:21) it inaugurated the blessings proclaimed in the beatitudes and elsewhere to the downtrodden and particularly to those who mourn (cf. perhaps Am. 6:6). Freedom for the captives was to be spiritual, too, as John the Baptist had to learn (was his question of Lk. 7:19 provoked by the hopes he had pinned on the ‘manifesto’ of Lk. 4:18?). Notice the element of slow maturing and patient reconstruction implied in the metaphors of oaks and ruined cities.

But Jesus’ marked omission of the words the day of vengeance ... (cf. Lk. 4:19–20) points on tacitly to a final stage yet to be fulfilled (cf. Mt. 25:31–46; Acts 17:31; 2 Thes. 1:6–8). In its various contexts, then, the prophecy is seen in the bud, the flower and, by implication, the full fruit. See further on 63:4.

61:5–9 The ample compensation. This passage is sometimes thought to fall below the generous missionary spirit of e.g. 19:24–25; 45:22; 66:18–21, as though it relegated the Gentiles to perpetual servility. This is to mistake metaphor for fact. Under the figure of a priestly Israel served by foreigners (5–6) and enriched by its former plunderers (7–8), the reality is the people of God (whose status is not national; cf. 1 Pet. 2:10; Rev. 7:9), vindicated and enjoying their full inheritance as kings and priests (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9; Rev. 1:6), while the pride of man is humbled and his power harnessed. On the Gentiles seen as the vanquished, see on 60:10–16; on Gentile converts see on 19:16–24; 60:1–9. 7 With the promised double portion, cf. possibly 40:2.

61:10–11 The song of the justified. With this outburst of joy, cf. 12:1–6 and the songs in chs. 24–27. Note the two metaphors for righteousness: first as the robe, on which the perfect comment is ‘the best robe’ of Lk. 15:22, festive and wholly undeserved; secondly as shoots of plant life, products of what is sown, whose inherent vitality issues in growth and form. The former depicts righteousness as conferred from outside (cf. Rom. 3:22); the latter as springing from within (cf. Rom. 8:10); both make it the gift of God. On its shades of meaning cf. on 46:12–13.

62:1–5 The bridal beauty of Zion. This is another poem in the series (beginning at 49:14, ending with 66:7–16) that depicts Zion as a woman yearning for her husband and family. But here the stress is on God’s side of the reunion: the energy of his will (1a); the height (1b) and width (2) of his ambition for her; the pride he takes in perfecting her (3); his joy in bringing home the outcast (4a); and the central mystery—that this is not philanthropy but ardent love (4b, 5b).

4 Of the four names here, the last two have passed into (and out of) the Christian vocabulary as Hephzibah and Beulah (see the NIV mg.), and their occurrence together illustrates the contrast between the biblical faith and the Canaanite cults; for the metaphor of God as husband is one of fidelity (cf. on 50:1) and delight, whereas Baal as husband was little more than a source of fertility (cf. Ho. 2:12–13). 5 Zion’s sons may disrupt the metaphor to our ears, but are meant to enrich it by the reminder that the godly are as much wedded to as produced by their mother-city, whose restoration is their delight as well as God’s.

62:6–12 Hastening the great day. The great homecoming is viewed from both the centre and the circumference; from the waiting Jerusalem (6–9, 11b–12) and the far-flung exiles (10–11a). Each of these settings provides its picture of the human preparations appropriate to God’s decisive moment. 6–8 God first gives certain people a concern for Zion like his own (cf. vs 6–7 with v 1), summoning these watchmen (cf. 56:9–12.) and remembrancers (the word here for you who call; see on 63:7) to importunate prayer (cf. Lk. 11:8; 18:7), which he encourages with explicit promises (7–8). 10 Secondly, he calls on those who are in bondage to claim their liberty, and to give a lead to the distant nations from whom and with whom he would bring Zion’s citizens home. On their identity, see on 60:1–9. 12 Notice finally the fourfold name of this ransomed community (cf. the new name promised in v 2); a triumphant climax to this group of chapters and still a promise to God’s hard-pressed church.

63:1–6 The solitary Avenger

This is the companion piece to 59:15b–21 (cf. v 5 with 59:16). While both treat of judgment and consequent salvation, this poem with its dramatic dialogue (cf. Ps. 24:7–10) highlights the day of vengeance (4), a theme which was blended in 61:2 with that of restoration. The two activities are related causally, as victory (with its bloodshed) is to liberation (with its joy and peace); the NT endorses the sequence, developing this poem in Rev. 19:11–16, where Jesus is the warrior. But in both testaments God has first offered a refuge from his judgment (cf. 27:5).

1–2 Edom and its city Bozrah have already typified the impenitent world in 34:6. Now there is a play on the name Edom (red) and indirectly on Bozrah, a word similar to ‘grape-gatherer’. Speaking in righteousness (1) refers to God’s unfailing completion of what he announces (cf. 45:23; 55:11). Notice mighty to save; this is the dominant interest, even in this judgment passage. 3 The phrase I have trodden the winepress alone may remind the Christian of Calvary, but its meaning (cf. Rev. 19:15) is that God alone cares enough and has power enough to carry through the work of judgment.

63:7–64:12 The crying needs of Zion

The glories of chs. 60–62 and the vision of decisive action in 63:1–6 stir the prophet to one of the most eloquent intercessions of the Bible, as he surveys the past goodness of God and the present straits of his people.

63:7–14 God’s former mercies. 7 Isaiah is doing the work of a manward ‘remembrancer’ (cf. 62:6); his resolve I will tell is (lit.) ‘I will bring to remembrance’. 8 In the metaphor of a father’s hopes for his children, he picks up the opening theme of the book (1:2, 4), and in v 9 he draws freely on the book of Exodus (cf. in turn Ex. 3:7; 33:14; 19:4). 10–14 The terms are close to those of Ps. 78; e.g. rebelled and grieved (cf. Ps. 78:40) and the simile of leading animals to pasture in vs 13–14 (cf. Ps. 78:52–53). But he uses the terms with a new intensity (cf. v 9a) and with a new emphasis on the Holy Spirit as the Lord in the midst of his people (10–11, 14). In vs 10–14 the reference is to the post-wilderness rebellions of Israel, for which they were chastised (10) but not cast off. For the sake of his former mercies the Lord still led them on (cf. vs 13b–14 with Ps. 78:72, where David continues the work of Moses).

63:15–64:12 God’s forlorn family. The plea, three times over, you are our Father (63:16; 64:8), gives this prayer its special intensity, as the sense of estrangement struggles with that of acceptance.

The symptoms of estrangement are partly outward, with the enemy treading down all that was holy (63:18; 64:10–11); but far more serious are the inward symptoms: the spiritual hardness of 63:17, the ravages of sin described in 64:5b–6 (a brilliant portrayal of its power to habituate, defile and disintegrate) and a general listlessness (64:7), which makes the condition humanly incurable.

In all this there is seen the judgment of God, who has withheld his intervention (63:15), hardened their hearts (63:17; cf. 6:10) and made them waste away (Heb. ‘melt’) because of (or ‘by means of’) their sins (64:7). The last of these phrases makes it clear that God is not to blame for their spiritual plight; it stems from their own dalliance with evil.

On the other side there is a Father’s constancy to appeal to (see the opening comment, above); it is more tenacious than human faithfulness (cf. 63:16 with 49:15; Ps. 27:10) and of longer standing (of old; 63:16). Further, it is proved by his mighty interventions for those who wait for him (64:4; cf. 8:17; 30:18)—and why should these not be renewed (64:1–5a)? (The NT points out how unimaginably they would be transcended; cf. 1 Cor. 2:9–10.) Above all, the Father is appealed to as the potter (64:8) who knows all and controls all. This submissive trust is a very different spirit from that of 45:9–10; it makes the prayer, which resolutely began with praise (63:7), a model for all who must cry out of the depths.

But it ends with a question. God’s answer will reveal how much or little the prophet’s contrition has been echoed by his people.

65:1–66:24 The great divide

Far from ending in a general radiance, these chapters unsparingly sharpen the contrast of light and darkness and strip away all cover of privilege. It is an end as searching as that of Revelation and the parables of judgment, pursuing to the last the implications of Isaiah's inaugural vision (ch. 6).

65:1–16 The owned and the disowned. 1–2 The Hebrew as it stands supports Rom. 10:20–21 in referring v 1 to the Gentiles and v 2 to Israel. In the NIV the Hebrew phrase 'a nation ... not called by my name', (i.e. the Gentiles) has been adjusted to read a nation that did not call on my name (which could still be Israel). While this reading can claim ancient support, the unaltered Hebrew (as in the AV and RV) points quite clearly to the Gentiles, answering Israel's disdainful 63:19b, rather than merely echoing 64:7.

The Gentiles, then, are to be brought in, and apostate Judaism rejected (1–7); but vs 8–10 reaffirm the promise of a 'remnant' of godly Israelites (see on 10:20–23). God's dividing line clearly runs not between Jew and Gentile as such, but between 'seekers' and 'forsakers' (10c–11a), who are respectively blessed and cursed in vs 13–16.

3–7 With the forbidden rites cf. 57:3–10. The earlier deviations were predominantly licentious; the present ones are provocative, brushing aside God's altars (3b, 7b; cf. Dt. 12:2–7), dabbling in necromancy (4a; cf. Dt. 18:11), defiantly eating forbidden flesh (4b; cf. 66:17; Dt. 14:3, 8) and claiming a magical 'holiness' from these perversions, potent like a spell (5a is [lit.] 'for I am holy to you'). For the crowning insult see v 11.

8 The simile of the good grapes in a poor cluster relates the 'remnant' theme to that of the spoilt vineyard of ch. 5, using perhaps the opening of a vintage song to make the point, since Don't destroy it seems to be the name of a tune in the titles of Pss. 57–59. 10 On the Valley of Achor, with its troubled past and hopeful prospect, see Jos. 7:26; Ho. 2:15. 11–12 Fortune and Destiny, Gad and Meni, were worshipped in Syria and elsewhere. Note the word-play in v 12a: I will destine you ... With the table and bowls cf. 1 Cor. 10:21–22, where Paul's questions, 'Are we trying to arouse the Lord's jealousy?' (cf. our v 3) could indicate that he had this chapter in mind.

13–16 Here the opening rhythm is that of a dirge or taunt-song (cf. 14:3–23), and the sharp contrasts anticipate those of the gospels (cf. e.g. Mt. 25:31–46; Lk. 6:20–26; Jn. 3:36). The name, the God of truth (16) is (lit.) the God of 'Amen', i.e. what is sure and faithful; cf. our Lord's expression, 'Truly, truly,' ('Amen, amen'), and his title in Rev. 3:14 (see also 2 Cor. 1:18–20).

65:17–25 New heavens and earth. The new is portrayed wholly in terms of the old, only without the old sorrows; there is no attempt to describe any other kind of newness. Hence the familiar setting, Jerusalem, and the modest satisfactions, largely the chance to 'enjoy the work of [one's] hands'. This allows the most important things to be prominent in the passage: the healing of old ills (17b); joy (18–19); life (20; see below); security (21–23a); fellowship with God (23b–24) and concord among his creatures (25).

The point of a hundred years old (20) is that in this new setting a mere century is shamefully brief, so vast is the scale.

This leaves the question open whether the passage promises these blessings literally, or depicts the final state by means of earthly analogies. If the conditions are literal, they will be those of the millennium, as in a straight reading of Rev. 20, where the resurrected saints appear to coexist with people of the present order, before the final judgment. Against this, however, is the sequence whereby the new creation (17–18) precedes these blessings here, but follows them in Rev. 21:1. For this reason it seems that we should take this passage as an analogy, and its allusions to the sinner (20; see the NIV mg.) and the serpent (25) as promises of judgment and victory. The wicked will no longer flourish, nor the strong prey on the weak, nor the tempter escape his sentence (cf. v 25 with Gn. 3:14–15), in the perfect world to come. But all this is expressed freely, locally and pictorially, to kindle hope rather than feed curiosity. Notice finally the implication, by the allusion to 11:6–9, that this is brought to pass not by a bare creative fiat, but through the Messianic king.

66:1–5 Worshippers, welcome and unwelcome. This is no protest against rebuilding the temple, as some have suggested, for God commanded it (Hg. 1:2–11). Rather, it is a rebuke to ecclesiasticism—the spirit that would build human walls round God (1–2a; cf. 2 Sa. 7:6–7; Acts 7:48–50, 54). 2b Note the distinctly chastened attitude that God expects of us, as in Lk. 18:13, since man is not only small but sinful. See, however, 57:15.

Ecclesiasticism also breeds unreality (3) and intolerance (5). 3 The Hebrew runs (lit.) ‘slaughtering the ox, smiting a man’ etc. and could either mean (with most versions) that a merely correct ritual is like senseless slaughter and idolatry (cf. 1:13; Je. 7:21), or else that at present it is coexisting with brutality and sacrilege. The intolerance in v 5 was acted out, almost to the letter, in Jn. 9:24, 34. It is one of the earliest allusions to purely religious persecution and theological hatred, one of the darkest stains of the church.

66:6–17 The last intervention. Although the terms of this section and the next are still those of the OT, with its temple (6), chariots (20), New Moons and Sabbaths (23), they clearly concern the end time. Vs 7–9 stress the utter newness of the event, which mocks the slow processes of history: the nation ... brought forth in a moment is the equivalent of 1 Cor. 15:51–52: ‘we will all be changed ... in the twinkling of an eye’. V 9 gives the triumphant final answer to Hezekiah’s message to Isaiah in 37:3.

10–14 The exuberant family scene of these verses, concluding the poems on Zion as wife and mother (see on 49:14–23), is now centred on Zion’s children (cf. Gal. 4:26). Note that the mother-city is really the secondary, not the primary, source of their wealth and comfort; all is from the Lord, even love like a mother’s (13), although he uses the redeemed community to dispense his gifts. The last two lines of this verse give the ‘whence’ and ‘where’ of this help: I ... ‘In Jerusalem’ (cf. RSV) Direct fellowship with God, and full involvement in his church, are held together here. In Jn. 16:22 Jesus gave v 14a a strongly personal reference.

15–16 The fire and sword are the harsh aspect of every divine intervention (cf. Mt. 10:34), but this is the final one (cf. v 24; 2 Thes. 1:7–10). While it has reference to all men, the special objects of wrath are the apostates of v 17 (cf. 65:3–7; Lv. 11:7, 29), who have known the light and despised it. 17 The one in the midst was perhaps the leader in a magico-religious rite (cf. Jaazaniah ‘standing among them’ in Ezk. 8:11).

66:18–24 The nations gathered in. On a millennialist view, the Lord’s coming will be followed by the further evangelizing of the world, the full return of Israel, and the establishment of Jerusalem as the world’s capital and centre of pilgrimage. Alternatively, one may take this final section to be an epilogue that spans the first and second comings of Christ. V 18 will then state his purpose for the world, and vs 19–21 his means of carrying it out: the sign (Christ crucified and risen; Mt. 12:38–40?); the survivors, or saved remnant, sent to the nations (19); and the gathering of his people into his Jerusalem (20), Gentiles being admitted to full membership with Jews (21). Jerusalem on this view is not the literal city (cf. again Gal. 4:25–26). Vs. 22–24 would describe (still in OT terms) the states of final glory and perdition.

In v 19 the names represent the distant outposts of Israel's world. 20–21 From earth's remotest parts, then, the dispersed of Israel will be brought to Jerusalem like a homage offering by the Gentiles. There is a double meaning in this term, which stood for the grain offering in Lv. 2 etc. but also for a vassal's tribute to his overlord. But these Gentiles, too, will be acceptable; not only like clean vessels, fit to convey the Israelites, but as priests and Levites themselves. (Grammatically, some of them could refer to the returned Israelites, but the anti-climax is improbable.) Paul uses a striking variant of this symbolism in Rom. 15:15–16.

22 With the new heavens etc. cf. 65:17. 23 New Moon and Sabbath have ceased to be binding on the Christian (cf. Col. 2:16), and it is implausible to suggest that these 'shadows' will be reinstated. They stand here for their substance, the joyful dedicating of all life to the Creator.

23 Cf. Dn. 12:2; Mk. 9:48. In the synagogue, v 23 is read again after v 24 to soften the ending of the prophecy. But it is a true ending. 'It is plain' (to quote G. A. Smith) 'that nothing else can result, if the men on whose ears the great prophecy had fallen, with all its music and all its gospel, ... did yet continue to prefer their idols, their swine's flesh ... their sitting in graves, to so evident a God and to so great a grace.' Seek the LORD while he may be found (55:6).

JEREMIAH

Introduction

Author and background

Jeremiah prophesied to the kingdom of Judah during the reigns of kings Josiah (640–609 BC), Jehoahaz (609), Jehoiakim (609–597), Jehoiachin (597) and Zedekiah (597–587). The opening words of the book (1:2) tell us that his ministry began in 627 BC. His work, therefore, spanned forty years, a whole career, and coincided with the last years of the kingdom of Judah. Jeremiah may thus be regarded as one of the prophets of the exile, along with Ezekiel (see also The prophets in The Song of Songs).

With Ezekiel, then, Jeremiah was a successor to the great prophets of a century or so earlier (Isaiah, Hosea, Amos, Micah), who had preached in the days when there were still two kingdoms, Israel (the northern kingdom) and Judah (the southern). The former, however, had been dismantled in 722 BC by the mighty Assyrians ('the rod of my [God's] anger'; Is. 10:5), after the warnings of Amos and others had gone unheeded. Jeremiah's Judah, therefore, though it had survived the Assyrian onslaught (see 2 Ki. 18–20), was a tiny and exposed remnant of God's people. Could it survive for long? The answer would depend on whether the people would hear the word of God through Jeremiah.

When Jeremiah first heard God's word, Assyria was no longer the force it once had been. It was in its decline (the fate of all empires) that King Josiah was able to reassert the ancient Israelite claim to the territory of the northern kingdom, lost a hundred years earlier (2 Ki. 23:15–20). In 612 BC, Nineveh the capital of Assyria, fell to the new power in the region, Babylon, which now represented the new threat to God's people. Jeremiah pictures it as an army that would come 'from the land of the north' (6:22). As a century earlier, so now, God's plans for his people were bound up with historical and political events over which he had control. He himself would bring this foe against his unfaithful people (5:15).

The message

Prophets often addressed their words to kings, because these had a special responsibility for maintaining the religious life of the people. In this respect Jeremiah is interesting because his ministry began at the time when King Josiah was reforming the religion of Judah. 2 Ki. 22–23 describes at length the measures he took and relates them to the discovery in the temple of the 'Book of the Law' (probably Deuteronomy), possibly lost during the long and corrupt reign of King Manasseh (see on 2 Ki. 22:8). This was in 621 BC, five years after Jeremiah's call. The reform may have been going on since 628, however, as is implied by 2 Ch. 34:3–7. Surprisingly, therefore, Jeremiah's preaching—highly critical of Judah—began during the reign of a just and faithful king. This may suggest that he thought the reform could not of itself produce the deep change in people which God desired. His call would be for a complete change of heart (4:4).

Jeremiah, nevertheless, criticized all the leaders within Judah for their failure to give true teaching and leadership according to the standards of the covenant for which they were responsible. Kings (ch. 22), prophets (23:9–40) and priests (2:7) are uncompromisingly attacked. (An exception is made for Josiah; 22:15–16.) The condemnation is the more striking because Jeremiah himself was both prophet and priest (1:1). The covenant people, in fact, were false through and through (9:3–6). That is the basis of Jeremiah's whole message.

The message itself, however, which was delivered over a long period and against a dramatically changing background, seems to have passed through several distinct stages. First, Jeremiah called for the people to repent of their sins so that they might not suffer at the hands of Babylon (3:12). At a certain point, however, he announced that God would indeed punish Judah at that nation's hands. The time for repentance was past; God's chastisement was now inevitable (21:1–10). However, this second stage was closely linked with the third, which was an announcement that the chastisement was for the purposes of restoration. In God's mercy the Babylonian exile would be a way to life for those who would accept the punishment (21:9; 24:4–7). It is within this last stage that the promises which include the hope of the new covenant (31:31–34) are to be understood. In the end, therefore, the covenant, once despised by Israel, is re-established by God's mercy.

Jeremiah himself was deeply involved in, and affected by, his message. He suffered because of it in certain obvious, outward ways, having to forgo normal social and family life (15:17; 16:2), being the object of plots against his life (11:18–23; 18:18) and the victim of imprisonments and beatings (20:1–6; 37:15–16; 38:6). Inwardly he was affected too, for he felt keenly the agony which he knew the people must endure (4:19–21; 10:19–22). Yet he also felt the passion of God against the sin around him (8:21–9:3). He therefore experienced the judgment from both sides, which placed an almost unbearable burden on him.

The pain that thus arose out of his prophetic calling is most poignantly expressed in the poetic passages often known as 'the confessions' (11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–21; 17:12–18; 18:19–23; 20:7–18). In these he complains to God, almost bitterly. Yet out of them too come reassurances that God will finally save (15:19–21).

The message and the Christian reader

It is not a straightforward matter for the Christian reader to translate Jeremiah's message into something that is relevant for his or her life. What can God's judgment on his ancient people have to do with the life of the individual Christian? Indeed, how does Jeremiah's preaching of salvation to a nation, understood as restoration to a land, in the context of politics and war, relate to the Christian gospel?

A first answer is to point to the work of Christ. At the heart of Jeremiah's message is the truth that God punishes his people with a view to their salvation. This principle of salvation through judgment foreshadows above all the cross of Christ, in which he himself bore the judgment for human sin in order to save sinful humanity.

Jeremiah points to Christ also in the new covenant prophecies (chs. 30–33). These look first to a restoration of the ancient people of Judah to their land in faithfulness, but ultimately to Christ, who himself lives out the life of faithful 'Israel' and gives the Holy Spirit to those who are in him so that they too might participate in that faithful life.

However, if the book of Jeremiah chiefly points forward to the great things that Christ has done for his people, is there any way in which the book can be a guide for the living of the Christian life? The answer here also is that it can. In this connection it is important to understand that the Christian gospel does not concern individuals only, but the church as a body, and to suppose that there is a basic consistency in the way in which God deals with his people. This means, first, that the messages to Judah of both judgment and salvation may apply in a sense to the church as a body. Like God's people of old, it too needs to guard against complacency and should not think that it is above chastisement (cf. Rev. 2–3). It (or parts of it) may even undergo times of chastening, only to know God's renewal at last.

Secondly, Jeremiah highlights the need for responsible leadership and warns of how corruption in God's people can spread. He cautions against false trust among those who are religious, perhaps a false trust in religion itself. He shows how, when the church's life has become debased, its corrupt character can be transmitted from generation to generation (44:9). This perception may even apply to societies other than the church, national or traditional, and thus explain the transmission of hatreds and prejudices within societies over centuries. The prophecy also exposes the psychology of sin and the strength of the inclination that human beings have towards it (3:6–10). The portrait of King Zedekiah is a great evocation of the eternal hesitation of human beings between good and evil.

Finally, the book has some marvellous expressions of joy in salvation, mainly in chs. 30–33. The poetry of these is itself an inspiration, and in their context in a prophecy which has so much to say about sin and judgment, they focus in their own unique way on the love and compassion of the God whose deepest desire is to give life and blessing to his creatures.

Form, structure and composition of the book

The book of Jeremiah is long and contains a variety of material. Some of it consists of the words of Jeremiah, spoken in the form of poetic oracles, or sayings (e.g. chs. 2–6); some of it has a more sermonic style (e.g. 7:1–15), printed as prose in most translations (including the NIV); there are also passages written about Jeremiah, presumably by someone else (e.g. ch. 26). Most of the poetic oracles are in chs. 1–20. Generally, we are not given the dates or settings of individual sayings of this sort. We have more information about the time and place of individual sayings and events in the sermons and the narratives. However, the book is not a biography; it tells about Jeremiah only in order to help proclaim his message.

We know little about how the book was formed. It does not follow a consistent chronological pattern, and it can be difficult to read in a connected way. It was probably formed in stages. This is suggested by ch. 36, where we read that the first scroll of Jeremiah’s words was destroyed by King Jehoiakim and that Jeremiah then had another made, which contained more words than the first (36:32). It is also suggested by the fact that the Greek OT (the LXX) contains a shorter version of the book than that which appears in our Bibles. The prophet appears to have worked on the book’s production with Baruch, his assistant and scribe. Baruch may have had a hand, therefore, in the composition of the book as we now know it.

Commentary

1:1–19 Jeremiah

Jeremiah was the son of a priest, his birthplace Anathoth being a city specially set aside for priestly families (1; cf. Jos. 21:18). It was close to Jerusalem, and the priests would have made the short journey to the city as required in order to perform their duties. In the normal course of events, Jeremiah would have exercised the priestly office in due time.

This expectation was interrupted, however, by his call to be a prophet. The phrase The word of the LORD came to him (2) is a typical way of speaking about a prophet’s call in the OT (cf. Ho. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Ezk. 1:3; Mi. 1:1). It shows well how the prophetic mission was not sought by the person to whom it came. Rather, God chose the person for his purpose. His will, once revealed, required that Jeremiah yield himself wholly to it. His whole life would be affected by it deeply.

Jeremiah's first response to the call was most reluctant (6; cf. that of Moses, Ex. 4:10–13). He was only a young man (the word translated child might better be 'youth'; Jeremiah could have been around twenty). In a society which valued the wisdom of older people, he might well have felt unable to speak, i.e. a lack of any natural qualification to lead or to interpret events for the whole nation. The Lord, however, had anticipated his objection; he knew and appointed him before he was born (5). This is a remarkable statement of God's foreknowledge, and particularly of his calling of an individual. It puts all natural and acquired qualifications in the shade. It also puts other aspirations in the shade. When God called Jeremiah, he laid his hand on him in such a way that there could be no true choice but to hear and obey. He had been brought to this hour for this purpose. Yet, of course, he must choose, and must obey, and continue to do so throughout his ministry.

The word to Jeremiah not only reassured the prophet but also validated his ministry among the people. In this sense it comes to all (not just ministers or other church officials) who feel their inability to perform what they know God has called them to. It warns church people generally against being superficial in assessing the gifts and ministries of others.

God reassured Jeremiah that he would protect him from those who would oppose and hate him. As a bearer of God's word he shared, in a sense, in God's authority even over kingdoms (10). Jeremiah's message would indeed prove to be important for a number of nations, not just Judah and Babylon (see on chs. 46–51). God's words of both judgment and salvation would surely find their mark.

Jeremiah was given visions to confirm God's assurance to him that the call was authentic. The first vision, of an almond tree, depends for its meaning on the resemblance in Hebrew between the word for almond tree and the word for watching. The second, of a boiling pot, shows that the message would be one of judgment at the hands of a people from the north (14). Babylon was not yet specified. The plural (all the peoples ... their kings; 15–16) is vague. Jeremiah may not initially have known that Babylon would be the foe in question. The setting up of the thrones of foreign kings in the gates of Jerusalem (15) implies that they, and their gods, now ruled there. It looks as if the Lord himself had failed his people. But the prophet will show why their humiliation must be so.

The sin for which the people would be judged was the fundamental one of breaking the covenant with the Lord, by the rejection of him in favour of other gods (16). This was to attack the covenant at its roots, as the people had done at the time when it was first made, at Mount Sinai (Ex. 32). It will be a constant theme in the book. Finally, Jeremiah was told again to stand firm (17). As the nation would have enemies, so would he, among the people themselves, including the powerful among them (18). The Lord, however, is more powerful than they, and he will protect him (19). The promise will have to be repeated—and kept (see 11:18–23).

2:1–4:4 The Lord's accusation of his people

2:1–8 An abandoned love

Ch. 2 contains the essence of the prophet's accusation of Judah. In this opening passage the Lord recalls the earliest days of Israel's life, when he brought her out of slavery in Egypt and made her his people by a covenant at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19–24). The time in the desert (2) is remembered as one of faithfulness. In that unfruitful place it was essential to trust God for everything. And he had protected her from enemies (3b; see Ex. 17:8–13). (Israel had not always been faithful in the desert; note Ex. 32. Jeremiah, however, focuses on the desert as the place of true communion with God, as Hosea had also done; Ho. 2:14–15.)

The point of this picture of the faith of a past generation is to contrast it with the corruption of the people of Judah in Jeremiah's day. The Lord now calls them to account (4). The covenant involved a commitment on both sides. The Lord had promised land and blessing at the same time as requiring Israel's faithfulness. He now asks, rhetorically, whether some failure on his part had led to Israel's straying from him (5). The sin affected not the present generation only but their fathers.

The sin that had stolen the people's hearts was nothing less than idolatry. This was to reject the first and fundamental commandment (Ex. 20:3). In the land of Canaan, which God had given the people, they had worshipped Baal, the god commonly worshipped by the Canaanite peoples. (The term worthless idols in v 5, is a play on the name Baal in Hebrew; the point is that Baal was in fact powerless and empty). The people had thoroughly transferred their trust to Baal, the various leaders forsaking their specific responsibilities to the Lord and the people, and devoting themselves to this other god (8). This was bitter reward for the God who had led them through the dangers of the desert into a land of plenty (6–7; cf. Dt. 8:7–10). When he calls it his inheritance (7b), the point is not about how he got it, but that it belongs to him perpetually (cf. Lv. 25:23). His people, however, by their sin, have made it loathsome to him; they have corrupted themselves with those very practices he had once decisively removed from this land (Lv. 18:19–30).

2:9–28 The charge

In reality, it is Judah who has been the unfaithful covenant partner. Therefore the Lord now elaborates his accusation. The charge is of exchanging the true God for idols. Their Glory is a name for God (11), recalling his appearances to Israel in their desert wanderings (Ex. 40:34–35). The unnaturalness of turning from God is stressed in vs 10–12.

This turning from God to powerless idols, furthermore, is a delusion. Israel's and Judah's history itself shows this. Lions (15) seems to refer to Assyria, which had destroyed the northern kingdom in 722 BC (cf. v 18, and see the Introduction). That past defeat is matched by the more contemporary threat to Judah from Egypt. V 16 may be a reference to the death of King Josiah at the hands of Pharaoh Neco at Megiddo in 609 BC (2 Ki. 23:29). What hope, then, in attempted alliances with such empires (18)? This policy had been tried in the past, with Assyria (see 2 Ki. 16:7) and discredited (see on Is. 7). And some in Judah would seek refuge in Egypt from Babylon (24:8). All this would be in vain, and bring its own punishment (19).

The theme of falsity is also pursued in the images Jeremiah uses. Judah is a slave (14) where she should have been a servant of the Lord; she is a prostitute where she should have been his bride (20; cf. 3:1); she is a wild vine where she should have been a choice vine (21; cf. Is. 5:1–4). The false thing is so often an imitation and a mockery of the truth, promising all that the truth can bring. Nevertheless, there must be a reckoning when life is based on false ideas and false worship; and Judah's folly will be exposed, to her shame, as when a thief is caught in the act (26). In the moment of crisis, Judah may turn desperately to God again (27b); but this too is false, an attempt to use God, the genuine spirit of idolatry.

2:29–37 The sentence

The main theme is returned to. It is Judah, not the Lord, who has been untrue to the covenant (31–32). To the charge of religious sin (33) is added that of social injustice (34), a common prophetic theme (cf. Am. 5:10–15). The Lord, however, cannot be deceived; no bulwark will suffice against him (36b); he will indeed punish his wayward people (35b, 37).

3:1–4:4 Can Judah return to God?

This whole section concerns the need for Judah to turn back to the Lord in truth. There is a question, however, namely, whether the Lord can turn again in love to a people that has persistently broken the covenant. This is the point of 3:1–5.

In 3:1–5 a comparison is made between the separation of God and Israel and a divorce. The divorce law in Dt. 24:1–4 prohibited a woman who had been divorced and who had married another man from ever returning to her first husband. The Lord now pictures Judah as effectively divorced from him by her dalliance with other lovers, i.e. the gods of Canaan (1b). By analogy with the divorce law, therefore, she could never hope that the Lord would take her back. The strong accusation of prostitution is used here (1–5) for Judah's willingness to worship other gods. This had happened at many places (2a), and the land had been defiled as a result (see on 2:7b). If she seems to turn back to the Lord, there is hypocrisy in it (4–5).

The idea of a divorce is continued in vs 6–10. Here, the former northern kingdom of Israel is held out as an example of a severing of a part of the ancient people of God (2 Ki. 17). By Jeremiah's time, this was already an established fact of history. Israel's fate, therefore, is a warning for Judah (cf. 2 Ki. 17:18–19)—but she has so far failed to take it to heart.

The argument goes farther in vs 11–14. Judah is actually worse than Israel had been (11). Jeremiah now proclaims repentance to the northern kingdom (towards the north). This is a rhetorical device, since the northern kingdom no longer existed; he is making the point that the Lord always responds in mercy to true repentance. In v 14 that message, which went fatefully unheeded, is applied afresh to Judah. Yet this Judah is a faithless people; the word is related to that for return and means that the people 'turns' habitually away from instead of towards God. The call to return, or repent, comes to a people whose heart is fixed in resistance.

The scene changes abruptly in vs 15–18, where Jeremiah looks forward to a day of salvation in which God will redeem a people that will be faithful. It is a time in the future at which the Lord will bring his people back to Zion (meaning Jerusalem and Judah). This picture presupposes the new covenant, which will be presented more fully in Je. 30–33. The present passage shows that in the event Jeremiah's preaching of repentance to Judah came to nothing, and that their hope for the future depended on something else, namely a new act of God in salvation.

Shepherds after my own heart (15) are righteous leaders, instead of Judah's present corrupt leaders (cf. 23:1–4). The unlamented loss of the ark of the covenant is understandable within the new covenant, which will depend more on inward truth than on outward signs (cf. 31:33). It will eventually take the coming of Christ to transform and enable the people of God. He too will be the one who will fulfil for ever the covenant of God with Israel.

Back on the immediate horizon, the Lord bemoans the treachery of Judah, calling on different metaphors of relationship (for Israel as God's 'son' see Ex. 4:22–23; cf. Is. 1:2; Hosea also used both these metaphors, Ho. 2:2; 11:1–2). The Lord's lament is matched by Israel's, who seem to know the bankruptcy of their false way (21).

The last section of the chapter opens with another call to repent, anticipating the final cure in the new covenant (I will cure ...). The immediate response, however, is a mere form of repentance (22b–25), the pretence of v 10, as there is a renewed appeal in 4:1–4, which gives way to threats of judgment. Yet it echoes v 21, with its hint of an acknowledgment of the futility of idolatry.

The opening verses of ch. 4 belong with the present section because they round off this treatment of repentance, or return. First (1–2), Judah (addressed as Israel) is reminded of her mission to lead the nations to the Lord; this was the point of God’s call, or election, of Abraham long ago (Gn. 12:1–3). So much is at stake in their faithfulness. Secondly, the people are warned not to trust in outward observance, such as circumcision. Rather, they must be marked out as belonging to God by something that goes deeper, namely a devotion of the whole being, both individual and society, from the heart. The ploughing of unploughed ground has a similar reference to the enlivening of what lies dead.

The call to repentance and to inwardness is one that the church needs to go on hearing, and which it can also falsify in the subtlest of ways, except by the grace of God himself.

4:5–6:30 Images of judgment against Judah

4:5–31 The enemy approaches

The remainder of ch. 4 portrays the coming devastation of Judah with imagination and passion. The speaker throughout is Jeremiah; nevertheless, he is uttering the word of the Lord, and the speech is sometimes directly that of the Lord himself (e.g. v 6b). The NIV gives one attempt to divide the speech between the prophet and God, but it is hard to do this consistently. In any case, both are expressing the truth, so who speaks does not affect the meaning.

In vs 5–9 Jeremiah depicts the panic that the approach of the enemy will cause. The trumpet is a call to arms; the peasantry will flee to the cities for protection, where they will become a defending garrison; the signal raised towards Zion is probably a warning (5–6). The enemy, merciless like a lion (cf. 2:15), has already left on his destructive expedition. He is not yet identified as Babylon. The phrase from the north gives little away, since virtually any attacker (apart from Egypt and Judah’s immediate neighbours) would find the land most accessible from that direction. The appeal here is to the whole people (8); the inevitable exposure of the false leaders (9) does not diminish the responsibility of all.

Jeremiah is not indifferent to the message which he is called to preach. In v 10 a note is struck to which he will return in relation to himself (15:18). In his distress he accuses the Lord of having deceived the people, presumably by having allowed false prophets to convince them with a message of peace (cf. 6:13–14). The only reply is the Lord’s own confirmation that judgment is sure.

The vivid pictures of danger are resumed in vs 13–18, as if a watchman were actually observing the enemy armies approach (13). In vs 15–16 the message is relayed first from Dan, in Israel’s far north, then, as the enemy comes closer, from Ephraim, the central hill country, until the news hits Jerusalem. These words may have been uttered in order to bring Judah to repent (14) and thus avoid the disaster. Yet Jeremiah feels its inevitability and the pain of it (18).

Jeremiah now freely expresses his own grief (19–22). This is not a literal ‘heart attack’ (19) but an agony of spirit which he feels physically. In this passage, he identifies wholly with the people in their coming distress. The sound of the battle-cry fills him too with terror (19c). The homes of Judah are his homes (20b).

V 22 might be spoken by either Jeremiah or the Lord. It shows that Jeremiah identifies not only with the people but also with God; though the punishment be unbearable, yet it will be due. Vs 19–22 are thus very important for understanding Jeremiah. His suffering with both God and people makes him a kind of ‘mediator’ between them. It anticipates the suffering of Jesus Christ for the salvation of the world.

Judah’s covenant failure does indeed affect the whole world (cf. 4:2). Jeremiah now pictures nothing less than an undoing of the created order in the world, in words strikingly like those of Gn. 1 (23–26). If the covenant with God’s chosen people were to fail, there could be no final hope for the world. That is why Christ’s life must be seen as a fulfilling of that covenant, in order to be light to the Gentiles (cf. Is. 42:6).

The last section of the chapter pictures the enemy army wreaking havoc among the people, as they seek desperate refuge. The two final images make a shocking contrast. In the first (30) Jerusalem is a prostitute, hoping for gain from her lovers. The intended ‘lover’ here is Babylon, but the hope that Babylon can be seduced will be frustrated. There is no escape from death in this false love. The feminine image shifts to that of a mother giving birth amidst the murderer’s carnage (31). The delusion is shattered, and replaced by a ghastly reality; the act of giving life is encompassed by death. The chapter closes with a last gasp.

There is a hint, however, that this end is not a final end (27). This hope will be developed in later parts of the book. In Jeremiah’s experience there is hope in the face of death itself. This is possible only through God who makes himself known to us in Christ.

5:1–31 Punishment due for Judah’s falseness

The theme of this whole chapter is due punishment for a thoroughgoing falseness. Its opening, a search for even one person who seeks the truth (1), for whose sake the Lord might spare the people, recalls Abraham’s prayer for Sodom (Gn. 18:22–33). The point is, however, that there is none; the corruption of Judah is total. On the other hand, is not Jeremiah himself one person who deals honestly and seeks the truth? His mediatorial role has already been noted (4:19–22), and we shall see that he will indeed have a special role in saving the people in the end.

The idea of the people’s total corruption is now developed (3–6). Their refusal of the truth (3) applies equally to the people in general (4) and to the leaders in particular (5). The point of v 4 is not to excuse the ordinary people. Rather the two verses together show that no part of the people is exempt from guilt—though the guilt of the leaders is undoubtedly greater because of their special responsibilities. All together they must face the due punishment (6).

The Lord now justifies his plan to punish (7–13). There is a basic assumption of his right to do so. This belongs within the thinking of the covenant. It was understood as a kind of treaty, in which the stronger nation reserved the right to inflict punishments on a weaker, if the latter did not keep the treaty. In the covenant between God and Israel, God had the right—which required no basic justification—to inflict the ultimate punishment; the giver of life could take it away. Here, however, he explains why the sentence is just in this case (9). The metaphor of prostitution is used again (8), and the charge is one of falseness, implicating the prophets in particular (11–13). The falseness is profound, a lie about God himself, which supposed him indifferent to wickedness (12). The gravity of false teaching about God should not be under-estimated.

The next passage says more about the powerful enemy, though Babylon is still not named (14–19). The point is to show that God himself is sending this calamity as a fulfilment of his word (14), and that it will be a destruction of everything that is good. V 17 contains all that amounts to the blessings of God to Israel (cf. Dt. 7:13). Babylon’s coming is God’s suppression of this blessing, the putting into effect of the so-called curses of the covenant (see Dt. 28:15–68). The coming disaster is now shown to include a period of exile (19). This is the outcome of the punishment; it is also, however, another of those doors of hope which Jeremiah's preaching of judgment sometimes leaves ajar (18; cf. 4:27; 5:10).

The Lord now pursues the idea that it is he alone who is the source of everything that is good for Israel. The fear owed him by his people (22) is simply right worship, though that worship is necessarily fearful because it is worship of one who is all-powerful. Worship is due to God, first because he is the Creator (22), and secondly, because it is he who has given life and well-being to his own people; this is the point of vs 24–25, which relate closely to v 17.

Jeremiah turns his attention (as once before) to the oppression of the weak by the powerful in Judah (26–28; cf. 2:34). The rich have not only exploited the poor but they have even abused the law courts in order to do so (28; cf. Ex. 23:6–8). This contempt for justice is also 'falsehood'. This is so because 'truth' within a covenant with God is not just words but means rightly based relationships, not only with God himself but between the people in covenant with him. Truth is not confined to the realm of notions but is known in actions. The NT also expresses this point forcefully, in its teaching that 'faith without deeds is dead' (Jas. 2:26; cf. Rom. 12). The supreme expression of the truth is Jesus himself (Jn. 14:6); truth is indeed word, but word made flesh, in human relationship. There cannot be truth with selfishness.

The chapter ends by repeating the Lord's justification for punishing the people (29); a last reflection on falsehood condemns the prophets and priests for teaching it and the whole people for willingly having it so (30).

These dreadful words are read today by a church that has been finally accepted in Christ, and a people whom nothing can separate from the love of God (Rom. 8:38–39). Nevertheless, there is great loss in a hardening against God's word and a need for watchfulness.

6:1–30 'The refining goes on in vain'

The chapter returns to the scenes of panic seen in ch. 4. The locations named are not far from Jerusalem (Benjamin the land to the north, Tekoa lying to the south; Beth Hakkerem cannot be certainly identified). Jerusalem is depicted as a woman (Daughter of Zion), concerned for her beauty but about to be ravished by the attacker (this is implied by the terms in v 3a, the shepherds probably referring to Babylonian rulers). The image is thus similar to 4:30. The words in vs 4–5 are spoken by the attacking Babylonians.

The rest of the chapter is divided into oracles from the Lord. The first (6–8) picks up the theme of Judah's violent oppression of the weak (cf. 5:26–28) and calls her condition a sickness. A covenant-keeping people is sound in every respect; one that breaks the covenant is infected in every aspect of its life. This metaphor will recur frequently.

In the second oracle (7–15), the gleaning of a remnant does not seem to hit a hopeful note, as elsewhere (4:27; 5:10; cf. Is. 17:4–6 for gleaning as an act of judgment). The tone of the whole passage is in this direction (10–15). As the corruption of the people has been total, affecting every part of society (see 5:3–5), so will the punishment be; hence the horror of vs 11–12. In v 13 too, the whole people is blamed again, before attention is turned more particularly to the prophets and priests. V 14 is the centre of the accusation of the false leaders. They have completely inverted the truth, causing others to believe the lie that God is not against wickedness. It is this lie that has allowed the wound of the whole society—both its sin and the griefs that follow from it—to go untended. And they are unrepentant, indeed beyond repentance (15b).

The third oracle (16–20) begins with the Lord’s appeal to seek the ancient paths, namely the lifestyle commanded by God, known ever since he had revealed himself and his ways in the covenant at Sinai (Ex. 19–24). In them was life (Dt. 30:16). Here, however, the appeal merely serves to introduce the people’s intransigence. They would neither walk in the ancient paths, nor listen to the watchmen, i.e. the true prophets, who urged them to do so (16–17). God calls witnesses (in keeping with the idea of covenant as a treaty; cf. Dt. 30:19; 32:1) to observe that the fate that will befall the people is of their own making (19). Finally, he disowns the kind of worship which is all form and no heart. Here is another side of the falseness in Judah; not only is the worship of other gods a great evil but so is hypocritical worship of the Lord. The theme is common in the prophets (Is. 1; Am. 5:21–25; Mi. 6:6–8).

A short oracle (21) evokes again the thoroughness of the forthcoming disaster, affecting each person’s close friends and relations—even making a mockery of relationships.

The Lord then turns again to depict the ferocity and power of the approaching army. In v 24 words of anguished fear are put in the mouths of the people, recalling those of Jeremiah himself (4:19). The fear grips them as they realize that there is no escape from the trials ahead.

The final words of the chapter are addressed to Jeremiah. The image is based on the refining of silver, which involved the smelting of the ore, then the refining of the silver from the lead with which it was very often combined. The refining process could fail for a variety of reasons and no pure silver be produced. The result would be rejected silver. Israel too, despite all God’s care to help her be a true covenant people, must finally be rejected.

7:1–8:3 False worship and false trust

7:1–15 A sermon in the temple

The theme of the so-called ‘temple sermon’ is misguided reliance on external religion. It is central to Jeremiah’s message, and indeed a form of what is presumably the same sermon occurs at 26:1–6, where a date early in the reign of King Jehoiakim is put on it. Jeremiah was evidently still preaching repentance at this time.

The temple was the heart of the life of Judah. Jeremiah takes his stand at one of the gateways to the temple courtyard, through which large numbers of people were streaming (2), probably coming for one of the great feasts of the year (Ex. 23:14–17). The sermon is thus a highly visible challenge to the official religion and to the practices of the mass of the people. It was an act of great courage (as the account of it in ch. 26 shows).

The substance of the sermon is contained in vs 3–11. Jeremiah calls the people to repent, showing that they are in grave danger but that they can still avert it (3). He mocks the empty words of contemporary ritual (4) and shows that true religion consists in act as well as religious performance (5–6; cf. on 5:20–28). The basis for right action is the well-known laws of God, given in the covenant; a number of the Ten Commandments (Ex. 20:2–17) are alluded to in v 9, bringing together religious (following other gods) and social sins. Because of the lives which the people of Judah are living, their confidence as they stand before God has very poor foundations.

A large part of the problem is the false trust which the mere possession of the temple and its rituals inspires. Borrowing from Canaanite ideas, the people had persuaded themselves that this amounted to a kind of guarantee of God’s presence and protection. Jeremiah shows the folly of this by pointing to an uncomfortable precedent (12–15). The shrine at Shiloh, which had been the central sanctuary for all Israel long before Jerusalem, was now no more, the victim, we suppose, of the Philistine wars. If Shiloh could fall, why not Jerusalem? In our day too there is no bastion of church establishment which may consider itself sacrosanct; all are called to a living faithfulness.

7:16–29 Beyond redemption?

The temple sermon ends with a word to Jeremiah himself: he is not to pray for the people (16). This is ominous indeed, for it was one of the functions of the prophet to intercede (cf. Gn. 20:7; Ex. 32:9–14). The prohibition will come again to Jeremiah (11:14; 14:11; cf. 15:1). It is one of the ways in which the Lord indicates that the time of his patience with this people is at an end. (The point is made repeatedly that calls to repent went unheeded, and that this finally led to judgment.)

There follows a passage which gives some insight into the habitual practices of idolatry, here the bread and drink offerings for the Canaanite goddess Astarte. The cakes may have been in the shape of the goddess. The preparations involve the whole family, a sign of the thorough corruption of the people. The sin bears the seeds of its own punishment (19).

The Lord declares that his wrath will be turned against the people and recalls generations of stubborn resistance to him. This passage has in common with the temple sermon that it criticizes empty ritual (22). The Hebrew here implies that God was not pressed to speak by the offerings of his people, nor in speaking was he intent on receiving offerings. The passage ends with a sign of lamentation signifying the end of the people (29; cf. 16:6; Mi. 1:16).

7:30–8:3 Abominations to the Lord

The temple itself, it seems had been defiled by the setting up in it of the cult of a false god or gods. While an Assyrian cult of King Manasseh's (2 Ki. 21:7) had presumably been destroyed by King Josiah in his reform (see the Introduction), something similar had evidently reappeared, probably under Jehoiakim (31). Furthermore, the sacrifice of children was taking place in Topheth (lit. a 'place of fire'), in the valley of Hinnom, south and west of the city. This was forbidden in Israel, where the ancient offering of the firstborn was replaced by that of animals (Ex. 13:2). It was the gruesome result, however, of adopting the worship of other gods (cf. Dt. 12:31b).

Ironically, this slaughter of the innocents will give way to a slaughter that will be the judgment of God (32). Death without burial was a particular curse in the ancient world (33; cf. Dt. 28:26). And indeed, to that which occurs inevitably in war will be added the disgrace of the exposure of the bodies of those already buried, from kings to common people, to the stars they had worshipped (see 2 Ki. 21:3–5).

8:4–10:25 Weeping for apostate Zion

8:4–22 No true healing

The section opens with a short reflection (4–7) on the idea of 'turning', 'returning' or 'repenting' (these words in the English all translate the same Hebrew verb; cf. also ch. 3). Judah is blamed for consistently turning away (5b), the opposite of repenting towards God. The unnaturalness of this is illustrated by observations of order in nature and custom (4, 7; cf. Is. 1:3). Such observations are characteristic of the Wisdom Literature (see e.g. Ec. 3:1–8). According to nature itself, therefore, it is unthinkable that God’s people should not know his requirements.

Jeremiah continues the theme of wisdom by criticizing those who falsely think themselves wise (8), possibly because of their very possession of a written law and perhaps a responsibility for interpreting it. These may be the priests themselves (cf. v 10) rather than a special class of people like the later ‘scribes’ of the NT. Jeremiah’s point in vs 8–11, however, is that those who are responsible for right teaching in Judah have corrupted the teaching itself, while still claiming to interpret it. The teaching is the Torah, both the laws given in the Mosaic covenant and instruction in it. Heads of families had a general responsibility for this (see Ex. 13:14–16), and the priests a particular one (Dt. 31:9–13). The misinterpretation of the law was a case of wilful neglect, which happened to serve the interests of the teachers (10b). Those who teach God’s word bear a heavy responsibility and are never exempt from these moral dangers, or indeed the special judgment of God (cf. Lk. 17:2; 1 Tim. 1:7). (Vs 10–12 closely resemble 6:12–15; see the comments there). V 13 is a reminder that falsification of the truth cannot continue without disastrous results.

In the midst of the words of accusation stands another passage (14–17) picturing the approach of the enemy and the panic it will bring (cf. 4:5–6, 13–15). V 15 contains the words of those who have been deceived by the false prophets and teachers.

The last section of the chapter (18–22) is in the mouth of Jeremiah, but his words contain a kind of dialogue involving God and the people too. Jeremiah begins by expressing his grief to God (cf. 4:19), partly because of the pain of the people (18–19a). The words of v 19b are the people’s, dismayed at the prospect of defeat. God’s promise made to King David (2 Sa. 7:11b–16) had seemed to assure him of God’s presence and of the king’s permanent victory over enemies (Ps. 2). The people believed that they had an unconditional guarantee from God (see on 7:1–15). This belief explains their words here. The Lord responds with a familiar accusation in v 19b. V 20 records a further lament of the people, the background of which may be the beginning of a drought—the subject of ch. 14. The last two verses are words of Jeremiah, expressing again his grief for the people. Gilead (east of the Jordan) was well known for its aromatic plants, used for medicinal cures. But a more profound healing was needed for this affliction.

9:1–11 A people thoroughly false

The last words of v 3 show that these opening verses are in the mouth of the Lord. Yet the first impression is that they are Jeremiah’s (who would more appropriately seek a desert inn for refuge; v 2). We have seen more than once the pain that the prophet feels on behalf of his people. The present passage also shows that his suffering reveals a similar suffering on the part of God. It is another function of Jeremiah’s mediatorial role.

The reason for the pain which God and his prophet share is the falseness of the people. Their determination in untruth is introduced in vs 2 and 3 (falseness implying unfaithfulness, as in adultery). In vs 4–8 the portrayal of falseness is sustained. A wide range of vocabulary is used to convey falsehood (deceit, slander, lies). To lie has become a habit (5b), so that they are incapable of anything else; and there is no relationship, in spite even of natural ties, which can be characterized by honesty (4–5). The picture is the very opposite of a society that is built on the covenant. God’s purposes had been for a people that had integrity and who would be blessed in the integrity itself. The reality of this is understood by all who live even now in exceedingly corrupt societies. In Judah his purposes had been totally frustrated. Where the covenant does not exist in reality, there is no choice but to call a formal end to it (9). The ‘refining’ is likely to have little success (cf. 6:29).

The weeping in v 10 might again be either Jeremiah’s or the Lord’s, or both. Desolation will be in the mountains and the pasture lands, affecting bird and beast, and finally in Jerusalem and the cities. The disaster will be total.

9:12–26 Wailing for the people that must suffer

In an earlier saying (8:8–9), false wisdom, which relied on the mere possession of the law, was exposed. Jeremiah now puts a rhetorical question (12): Who is wise enough to understand why the land has been ruined? (The perspective of this saying may be a time after Nebuchadnezzar’s first attack on Jerusalem [2 Ki. 24:1, 10–11].) The question draws the Lord’s reply, that the people had all the wisdom they needed in his law, which they wilfully neglected. The result will be exile (16).

The end of Judah being determined, she has no choice but to lament her fate. The wailing women were professional mourners. There is no suggestion of artificiality in this mourning, however; it will be real enough, such that the wailing women will have plenty of cause to keep their art alive (20). The ghastly picture in v 21 personifies death, probably according to Canaanite mythology—ironic in view of the prophet’s criticism of the people’s allegiance to Canaanite gods. Between vs 21 and 22, death is pictured everywhere, indoors, outdoors, wherever one might look.

An apparently separate saying (23–24) insists that good—whether wisdom, strength or riches—does not lie within human beings’ natural compass but comes from God alone. The qualities named in v 24b are those which he himself exhibits in covenant. Kindness is fundamental, that loyal love which binds God to his people and commits him to their care. Justice and righteousness are his zeal, respectively, for the rights of those in covenant with him and for right standards between them. When the Lord says that he delights in these things (24), he means that the same qualities are to be shown by the covenant-partners.

The final passage makes the point that a number of nations will suffer in due course at the hands of Babylon (cf. 27:3; 46:2). The passage also shows that circumcision was a widespread practice in the ancient east. Judah’s failure to be ‘circumcised in heart’, i.e. to understand what circumcision meant for them as a covenant-sign (cf. Gn. 17:10), made them no different from other nations. The outward sign was nothing in itself (cf. also 4:4).

10:1–25 None like the Lord

The scathing attack on idol-worship in vs 1–16 may have been addressed to people already in exile, who were impressed by the great Babylonian temples and idols and were tempted to think that the Babylonian gods had proved themselves more powerful than the Lord. In truth, only the Lord has real power. The people should not be terrified of what has none (2, 5). The nonsense of bowing down to what merchants have imported and craftsmen have made is mercilessly teased (4–5, 8–9, 14). How foolish to worship artefacts, or even God’s own handiwork, (the signs in the sky, i.e. the stars; 2), instead of the living God himself. The wisdom of the nations too is bankrupt (7b). (The wise men here may be like the astrologers and magicians encountered in the book of Daniel.) However impressive foreign gods and the culture that goes with them may seem, they will be shown to be false and ineffective (11, 15). V 11 is an isolated verse in Aramaic, the official language of the Babylonian empire, as if to address the words directly to Babylonian leaders and gods—a piece of defiant rhetoric.

In contrast, when God speaks, who has created all things, the whole earth is affected (12–13). He is truly to be feared (7), though the fear of God, being true worship, is wholly different from the terror inspired by the gods of the nations. When God is portrayed as the Portion of Jacob, and the people conversely as his inheritance, the language conveys mutual belonging in a relationship of love and care. (The identical idea occurs in Dt. 4:20 and elsewhere in Deuteronomy, where it is an important part of the expression of the covenant relationship.) This is always the aim of God for his people. It is the folly of human beings to set store by other kinds of hope, which can deliver nothing but frustration and destruction.

Another grim saying points to exile at the hands of a victorious power (17–18). It is followed by a saying of Jeremiah (19–25), in which he expresses again his own pain at the coming calamity. He uses again the language of wound and sickness (cf. 4:19–21), already used of Judah (6:7; cf. 8:15, 22). And here too, Jeremiah's pain is at the same time Judah's. His sons (20) cannot be literally his, as he was destined to remain childless (16:2). His expression of pain, however, includes his anger at the failure of the leaders (the shepherds). In this sense his experience is a representation of what the people's might properly have been.

The prayer too (23–25) is a prayer of the people expressed by Jeremiah (notice its resemblance to Ps. 79:6–7, where the people pray for deliverance from the enemy, probably Babylon in that case also). It contains an acceptance of 'correction', or chastening—a hint that the punishment will eventually be seen to be just that, and that a life beyond the exile is promised (cf. 24:5–7). Jeremiah may also pray for himself when he seeks 'correction', aware no doubt, like all pious people, of his own shortcomings. In two cases, indeed, the Lord does rebuke him (12:5; 15:19).

11:1–13:27 The covenant broken

11:1–17 Jeremiah unveils the people's rebellion

The language of covenant is more explicit here than anywhere in Jeremiah. This covenant (2–3) is the covenant made between God and the people at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19–24) and regularly renewed by the reading of its laws (Dt. 31:9–13). These words may have been spoken on the occasion of a covenant renewal, whether Josiah's (2 Ki. 23:1–3), or a later one. The covenant involves first, God's salvation of his people in saving them from Egypt and giving them the land of Canaan (4a; cf. Dt. 4:20); secondly, a command (4a, cf. Dt. 11:1); and finally, an oath (5a; cf. Dt. 1:8). It promises both relationship with God (4c—a typical formula; cf. Lv. 26:12), and well-being (5b; cf. Ex. 3:8). And it is motivated by the certainty of either blessing or curse, hence vs 3b, 8b (cf. Dt. 27:15–26; 28:15–68; cf. 28:1–14 for the blessing). It will be clear from the above how much these words of Jeremiah are a preaching of a tradition that was well established. The aim of vs 1–5 is repentance; vs 6–8 contain the verdict that the covenant has been broken and therefore the curse must fall.

Vs 9–13 elaborate the reason why the axe has been laid at the root of Judah. The idea of a conspiracy means that there has been, as it were, an agreement in Judah and Jerusalem to abandon the Lord; this had been true for generations. Now that the end is near, far from turning to God they will only seek their idols all the more, but in vain. V 13 alludes to the polytheism of Canaan (cf. 2:28)—a kind of religious promiscuity. What folly to exchange ‘Glory’ (2:11) for shame (13b).

The irrevocable sentence is repeated (14–17; cf. 7:16), now in poetic terms. My beloved is Judah (cf. 12:7), but there is irony—the beloved has no right in God’s house; her sacrifices belie her false heart. The olive tree is a symbol of the well-being which should have been hers, but which will be consumed.

These words of Jeremiah both tell us much about the form of any relationship between God and people and serve as a warning against taking such a relationship for granted.

11:18–12:6 ‘Confessions’

Jeremiah utters a number of prayers, often called his ‘confessions’, which reveal his inner turmoil (see the Introduction). This passage contains the first of them, or better, the first two (11:18–23; 12:1–6). Their essence is Jeremiah’s complaint to God about his own suffering, occasioned by his call to be a prophet. Here, there has evidently been a plot against Jeremiah’s life, which had taken him by surprise (19; cf. Ps. 44:11) and which was especially horrible because it was hatched by the people of his own town (21). Priests might well have taken unkindly to criticism of the temple establishment (7:1–15) by one of their own (1:1). The prophet was indeed unwelcome in his own country (Lk. 4:24). Jeremiah’s prayer, for vindication more than vengeance (20b), is above all an impatience for truth and justice to prevail (cf. Ps. 7:9). The Lord reassures him (21–23) in terms recalling his promise in 1:17–19.

The second confession (12:1–4) brings together Jeremiah’s suffering and that of the innocent in general. Its opening is like that of Ps. 73, whose theme is the suffering of the innocent, while the wicked prosper. It has an element of accusation of God, who has not prevented, indeed has even brought about, this state of affairs (2a). Jeremiah here expresses the isolation he often feels in his prophetic work (cf. 15:17) and his frustration because the judgment of God, which he must ever proclaim, does not come. (Over forty years elapsed between his call in 627 BC and the final sack of Jerusalem in 586.) V 3 is similar to 11:20; as a prayer that the Lord should not allow himself to be considered unjust, it follows from v 1. The drought to which Jeremiah alludes at a number of points, is already a sign that the wickedness of the people is having its consequences (4a), though these still go unheeded, and the judgment of God is denied (4b)—an essential part of the ‘falseness’ that characterizes the people.

The Lord’s reply (5) apparently means that Jeremiah has faltered already but that he will have to bear greater things yet. This was always going to be a part of his calling, and he must go on believing God. The Lord goes on to warn him not to give up, least of all on account of the good opinion of those close to him (6). They will be treacherous yet. The one who would be faithful to God can often count on the faithfulness only of God himself.

12:7–13 God and his ‘house’

As Jeremiah’s family betrayed him, the Lord himself knows of a betrayal by those closest to him (7–13). His own house, Judah, has turned violently against him (8). He in turn has turned against her (7–8c). A number of metaphors speak of the close bond between him and the people: my house, my inheritance (cf. on 2:7), the one I love, my vineyard, my field. Surely one who uses this language of his people would go to any lengths to care for and protect them. But the reverse will be true. What was fruitful will become a barren waste; shepherds (i.e. foreign rulers; 10) will come to destroy. This, moreover, will be the Lord's own work (12b), and his curse will mean that the land will not even be capable of bearing fruit (13).

Trust in 'market forces' and the blind pursuit of economic prosperity are two of today's parallels to Judah's idolatry.

12:14–17 A plan for the nations

Jeremiah was called to be a prophet not just to Judah but to the nations (1:10), proclaiming both punishment and rebuilding. The present passage declares first that those nations which the Lord is bringing against Judah will in turn be judged themselves by being removed from their lands (uproot; cf. 1:10). Remarkably, however, as there have been glimpses of hope for Judah on the other side of the judgment of exile (3:14–18), so now hope is held out even to these. If other nations will accept the worship of the true God, they too will have all the benefits of being the people of God. This is an unusual note in Jeremiah, but a part of the OT's revelation that salvation is in the end for all nations (cf. Is. 19:23–25; 40:5).

13:1–27 Signs of judgment

Prophets were not only given words to speak, but sometimes signs to perform as well, designed to demonstrate the reality of the words. They are more than a 'visual aid', for like the words, they bear the authority of the Lord. (Cf. the two later signs at the potter's house; chs. 18, 19; also Is. 20:1–6). When the word of the Lord is expressed both verbally and visually the intention is to give it redoubled authority and effectiveness. The five signs in this chapter are of a belt, wineskins, a flock, a woman in labour and stubble—all signs of rejection.

The belt, or waistcloth, worn by Jeremiah is made to represent the intimate relationship between God and his people (11). When the belt is removed and ruined by being abandoned at a place called Perath, the meaning is the humiliation of the strength in which the people took pride but which was a delusion (7, 9). Perath was probably a place not far from Anathoth, the prophet's home (Parah; Jos. 18:23). The name Perath, however, also means the Euphrates, and the sign makes a connection, therefore, with the empires of Mesopotamia. The reference might be to Judah's acceptance of Assyrian religion, as much as to the threat of exile in Babylon. (Exile, in fact, would have a restoring, rather than ruinous, effect; 24:5–7). The many days of v 6 would then refer to the long period of Israel's and Judah's persistence in sin (cf. v 10). This sin was itself, inevitably, the cause of their ruin.

Jeremiah's odd saying (12) may be a ploy to attract attention by saying something so ordinary that it puzzles, or perhaps it is ominous because he knows that the plenty which the people have known is going to end. To the mocking response (12a) he interprets the saying of the drunkenness which will be brought on the people. The confusion of peoples under judgment is described as drunkenness elsewhere too (25:15–16). The leaders of the people will be affected above all, not just one king but several being subdued by foreign invasion (cf. 22:18–19, 24–27; 2 Ki. 24:1–4, 8–17; 25).

The remainder of the chapter is composed of three separate sayings. Vs 15–17 are addressed to Judah in general. This oracle uses the language of light and darkness, familiar metaphors for salvation and judgment (cf. Is. 9:1–2; Am. 5:18). Darkness was a powerful metaphor in the ancient world, since artificial light was limited, and spoke naturally of fear and death. These words may have been spoken when Jeremiah still hoped the people would repent. As with other such oracles, its setting now along with sayings which know the disaster is unavoidable simply serves to emphasize that it had not always been so. Jeremiah's weeping for the people in their devastation has been met before (cf. 9:1).

The second oracle is addressed to the king and his mother, who are to be identified as Jehoiachin and Nehushta (2 Ki. 24:8). The queen mother could have a highly influential role in ancient Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 2:19). The oracle sees them removed from their thrones and from their royal status, the land suffering devastation as far as the Negev, the area of Judah's southern borders and farthest from the reach of the Babylonian armies.

The final oracle (20–27) is addressed to Judah in the singular, and as if to a woman (places are often grammatically feminine in gender, a fact which lends itself to their personification as women in poetic speech). The saying seems at the same time to have the leaders in view (20b, 21a). There is irony in being overrun by those whom Judah had sought as allies (21a; cf. 4:30).

The feminine imagery is now developed in a number of ways. First, the distress of the invasion is likened to the pain of childbirth (21b). Secondly, the brutality of it will be like the ravishing of a woman (22b, 26–27), which would no doubt be a literal feature of it too. Thirdly, the metaphor of prostitution is used once more to portray the unfaithfulness of the people (27; cf. 2:20). This image too had its literal counterpart, as it would have been part of the rituals of Canaanite worship. It would be misguided to look for consistency or system in these feminine images; they are used with the freedom of the poet. The final image is of the ritual uncleanness (How long will you be unclean?) caused by Judah's religious sins. The question is rhetorical; the force of v 23 is that Judah is incapable of change.

14:1–15:21 Famine, sword and plague

14:1–10 Drought

The supply of water could never be taken for granted in ancient Israel. Huge cisterns (3), carved out of rock and lined (the 'broken cisterns' of 2:13 are those whose lining is damaged), would retain water from flash flooding in the rainy seasons and would provide relief for some time during a drought. The drought in this case, however, is obviously severe and well advanced. The distress which such a thing brings (4–6) is sadly well known in our times too.

Since water is so fundamental to life, its supply is a basic covenant blessing, and its withholding a great curse (Dt. 28:12, 24). Whereas droughts in general may be seen simply as natural disasters, within Judah's covenant relationship with God such a thing must be seen as his judgment on them. The exact date of this drought is not known; it may have been relatively close in time to the coming of the Babylonians, to judge by the pairing of famine with sword in v 12.

The picture of the drought is followed by a confession of sin and an appeal to the Lord for help. It is like some of the so-called 'laments' of the Psalms (e.g. Ps. 10:1). The Lord should act in order to show his power to do so (7); ever since the exodus from Egypt, he has been the true Saviour of Israel; he is, finally, known as the God of Israel (9b). The prayer may be in the mouth of Jeremiah on behalf of the people. The Lord's frosty response to this (10) is in line with his forbidding Jeremiah to pray. (See also the people's insincere confession in 3:22–25.) The phrase this people, as a retort to v 9b, strikingly avoids the covenantal 'my people' (9:7).

14:11–22 Too late for prayer

The prohibition of prayer (11; cf. 7:16; 11:14) in this context means that neither this present famine nor other signs of judgment will be removed. Rather, the picture in vs 11–16 is broadened to sword, famine and plague, a trio which is intended to cover the full range of human misery. The curses of Dt. 28:15–68 are basically variations on these themes.

There were evidently those prophets who hastened to assure the people that their suffering did not mean the curses of the covenant. Merely being an official prophet, however (cf. 1 Ki. 22:5–8), did not guarantee that one had the word of God (1 Ki. 22:24)! To claim to have the authority to prophesy when God had not given a message was particularly heinous. False prophets would bring the people down with them (15b–16).

Vs 17–18 represent again the pain of the Lord through the mouth, and the experience, of Jeremiah. The Lord is not indifferent to the grief of the people, even though he himself brings it upon them as judgment. His mourning corresponds to Judah's (2; cf. 9:1).

The prayer that follows (19–22) has elements known from certain Psalms (e.g. Pss. 74, 79)—the protest to God about his harsh treatment of the people, confession, appeal to him to act on the grounds of the covenant and for the honour of his name. It is not yet a prayer that can properly be attributed to the people. As a prayer of Jeremiah for the people it has already been rejected (14:11). As an utterance of Jeremiah, a faithful Israelite, it might yet have a promise of grace. (See below on 15:19–21.)

15:1–9 Too late for compassion

The prayer of Jeremiah in 14:19–22 is followed by yet another declaration that prayer is of no avail, now that God has resolved on punishment (1). Moses and Samuel, both prophets, are known for their prayers for the people (Ex. 32:11–13; 1 Sa. 12:23). The catalogue of disasters in v 2 is a slight variation on the trio met in 14:12; the afflictions here are not, of course, mutually exclusive. The culmination of all is captivity. The rhetorical portrayal of the horror of the invasion and conquest continues in v 3, where the whole creation seems to be called into God's purpose to cast the faithless people out of the land which had once been given to them.

The reference to King Manasseh recalls 2 Ki. 23:26. The guilt of Judah had been building up for generations. Nevertheless, Manasseh is singled out as the king who had committed the most atrocious idolatries against the Lord (see 2 Ki. 21).

In keeping with the prohibition of prayer for the people, the perspective of vs 5–9 is that of a decision that is now taken. The meaning of v 5 is in effect like that of v 6b—it is too late for compassion; Judah has definitively shown its character as unworthy of the covenant (6a, 7c). As a 'backsliding' people, it strains away from the Lord instead of towards him (cf. 3:11–14). The proliferation of death is a direct contradiction of the covenantal promise to Abraham of a numerous offspring (8a; cf. Gn. 22:17). The mother of seven (9) is regarded as particularly happy; her happiness is turned to an equally intense grief.

15:10–21 A confession—and God's loving response

Jeremiah again expresses his own grief that derives from the burden of his call. Vs 10–21 are structured as two appeals to the Lord on the prophet's own behalf (v 10 answered by v 11, and vs 15–18 answered by vs 19–21). His regret that he was ever born (10; cf. 20:14–18) effectively doubts God's personal assurance to him (1:17–19). The Lord therefore reiterates the substance of that promise, even going beyond it, when he says that Jeremiah's enemies will come to need him in their distress. This is fulfilled in Zedekiah's dependence on him in the last days of Judah (e.g. 37:3).

The next verses (12–14) continue the reassurance to Jeremiah that judgment on the people is determined (even if this is mixed news for him). The unbreakable iron from the north probably refers to the invincibility of Babylon, compared with Judah; it also recalls, however, the promise that Jeremiah himself will be made like an iron pillar against his enemies (1:18). The oracle addressed to Judah in vs 13–14 also serves, in this position, as an affirmation to Jeremiah that the Lord does mean to fulfil his words against the people.

Jeremiah now thinks again of his own enemies, however (15–18). His words have elements in common with words that are elsewhere applied to the people's desire for deliverance from Babylon. The idea of a wound that needs healing (18) applied to the people occurs at 8:22. Where the people were said to bear your name in 14:9, so now does Jeremiah (16). The accusation that God had deceived the people (by sending false prophets; 4:10) is now made by Jeremiah about himself (18). The prophet's whole experience of abandonment, therefore, parallels that of the people.

It follows that when the Lord reassures Jeremiah (19–21) it may amount to a reassurance for the people too. Indeed, v 19a closely resembles the prayer of 'Ephraim' (a name for the people) in 31:18b, which is answered in the ensuing verses. In the midst of sayings of doom, therefore, Jeremiah's own experience becomes a promise of ultimate salvation for the whole people.

This is the significance of his mediatorial, or representative role. In a sense, therefore, Jeremiah suffers on behalf of the people. In his self-giving to his prophetic vocation, indeed, he even resembles Christ. His prayerfulness and agony are essential (and perhaps neglected) marks of true spiritual leadership.

16:1–17:27 Images of exile and salvation

16:1–21 Exile foreshadowed

Jeremiah has already used a sign to reinforce his message (13:1–11); now his whole life becomes a sign (1–4). Being unmarried was unusual in ancient Israel, and so his singleness and childlessness stand out as noteworthy. In fact, they are intended by the Lord as a sign that all normal life in Judah will cease. The giving of life is mocked by the imminence of death (4; cf. 4:31). The family was a blessing because it gave a certain place in society, and carried on a man's name for future generations (Dt. 25:5–6; Pss. 127:3–5; 128:3–6). Now it is to become a curse.

Jeremiah is also forbidden to participate in normal funeral ceremonies, as a sign that death will be so widespread in Judah that such mourning ceremonies will become impossible (5–7). The language of v 5b is a clear cancellation of the covenant. Blessing, here, is shalom (lit.) 'peace', understood as complete well-being; love is hesed, the loyal-love that is typical of the covenant-relationship; pity, or compassion, is that quality in God which makes love deeper than covenantal commitment (e.g. Ps. 51:1; Is. 54:7). All are revoked; once again, this people is significantly not 'my people'.

The point of vs 8–9 is very like that of vs 1–4. Jeremiah might be said to harp on certain themes. The people's question (10), therefore, reveals their slowness to hear God's message. In his answer, Jeremiah again shows that the people have been consistent in sin for generations (cf. 11:7–10). However, the present generation's sins are even greater than those of their forefathers; it is for their own sins that the judgment will come upon them (12). No plea of disadvantage can be allowed.

The present chapter places oracles of judgment and of hope side by side. It should be said that the oracles were not necessarily first uttered in the order in which we have them. Jeremiah, late in life, may well have wanted to let these contrasting oracles stand together, to show a pattern of judgment followed by mercy. The oracle in vs 14–15 is an unexpected sequel to vs 1–13. The meaning is that, at the right time, God will be merciful again. The fact that he is now revoking his covenantal commitments does not mean that he has changed. Indeed a future salvation (from Babylon?) will be so wonderful that it will even replace the exodus from Egypt as the centre of Judah's confession of God as Saviour (cf. Is. 43:14–19).

A further judgment saying (16–18) warns, by its metaphors of hunters and fisherman, of the ruthlessness with which the dismemberment of Judah will be pursued. The double payment for their sins is reminiscent of Is. 40:2, where the double payment is said to have been made.

The final note, however, is of salvation, now applied to the nations in general. The picture of nations coming to Judah at some future point to seek the true God, is found also in Is. 2:2–4; Mi. 4:1–2; cf. Hab. 2:14. It is fulfilled in Christ's breaking down the division between Jew and Gentile (Gal. 3:28) and in the church's Gentile mission.

17:1–13 Trust in human resources—trust in the Lord

The first oracle (1–4) mocks Judah's false use of both the written law and religion. The inscribing of sin on their hearts, like laws on clay tablets, is a stinging satire of ingrained habit that denies the law (i.e. the Ten Commandments and other laws) which they claim as theirs. Their sacrifices too merely emphasize their sin. Their children, who should have been versed in the ways of the Lord (Dt. 6:7), have been trained in the ways of other gods (2; cf. the prohibitions in Dt. 12:2–3). The generation that has received from its own forefathers now passes its idolatries to its children. The need for schooling children in the ways of God could not be more acutely portrayed.

My mountain is Zion, the temple where God dwells (see on 8:19). Vs 3–4 substantially repeat 15:13–14. There follows a contrast (very like that of Ps. 1) between the person who depends for well-being on human strength and the person who trusts in God (5–8). The 'cursing' of the one and the 'blessing' of the other are covenantal (cf. Dt. 28). The covenant has a paradox which is abidingly true: the attempt to put one's life on a secure footing by a selfish reliance on one's own abilities brings undoing; trust in God, which implies obedience and may involve acting against one's own interests, is the way to life (cf. Mt. 10:39). This paradox is crucial to an understanding of the covenant. Despite Jeremiah's emphasis on 'this life' and prosperity, covenantal religion can never be calculating or self-seeking.

The contrast between the two kinds of trust leads to the idea of the Lord's testing the heart (10; cf. on 9:7). The heart is the very basis of character, including mind and will, in the OT. V 10b is not teaching salvation by works but stressing the point that the Lord truly knows a person's character. V 11 picturesquely illustrates the untruth of injustice, a form of self-deception (on truth as action see on 5:26–28). The exclamation in vs 12–13 is also suggested by the theme of self-deception. Not only individuals but also the whole people may deceive themselves in failing to see that the Lord is the true source of their well-being (12–13). The praise (12) is in the mouth of Jeremiah.

17:14–18 A confession

The fourth of Jeremiah's confessions draws from the themes of the chapter. True healing is the Lord's doing (14). Jeremiah here stands as one who trusts in the LORD (7). He has been faithful to the calling, in spite of mockery (15–16). His enemies, to all intents and purposes all in Judah, stand under God's curse (18, cf. v 5). An important theme in the book is thus taken up: is there one person in Judah 'who deals honestly and seeks the truth?' (see on 5:1). As that person, Jeremiah himself can rightly expect the salvation of the Lord. He may even be the bearer of it to his people (see on 15:19–21), whose punishment he has not desired (16). To stand alone in faithfulness to God can be very hard; yet the faithfulness of one person may have incalculable effects for good.

17:19–27 Keeping the Sabbath

The Sabbath commandment (Ex. 20:8–11; cf. Am. 8:5) prohibited gainful work on one day in seven for the worship of God and as a sign of trust in him for well-being. Laying down the means of earning for a day was an act of faith. In today's terms it means systematically allowing time in one's life for worship and rest, even at the cost of personal advancement. The passage portrays busy commercial activity on the Sabbath, no doubt especially noticeable at the city gates, and possibly involving the king as well as ordinary people (19). Sabbath-keeping could be a barometer of Judah's spiritual state; hence the solemn warning about the need to observe this commandment. The promise of a renewed Davidic dynasty will be taken up elsewhere (23:5–6).

18:1–19:13 Two broken pots and a confession

18:1–18 A broken pot remade

The two signs involving a broken pot (here and in 19:1–14) are significantly different from each other. In this incident, Jeremiah goes to the potter's house and observes him at work. The potter, displeased with the pot he is making makes another out of the same clay. The Lord then declares that, like the potter, he is free to revise his intentions for Judah (6). The principle is developed in vs 7–10 and applied to any nation. The crucial point, however (11), is that, even though the Lord has formed a plan to judge his people, there is still time for them to repent and avert the disaster. Late repentance will still be honoured by God; the principle also appears in Jesus' life and ministry (Lk. 15:11–32; 23:40–43). The Lord's appeal to them to change is real, even though he knows that they will not respond (12). When they are judged it will be as a result of their own choosing. This point is very clear throughout Jeremiah's preaching. Why does the Lord need to remake them? Because of the hardness of their hearts (13–18). The illustrations are of constancy in nature: the snow on the peaks of Lebanon, always issuing in cool streams. This constancy contrasts with Judah's unfaithfulness, and at the same time shows it to be unnatural (15; for the kind of argument, cf. 8:4–7). It is also the height of folly. The ancient paths (15; cf. 6:16) were safe; bypaths could be dangerous. The resultant ruin will make the people an object of scorn—the regular fate of a defeated nation (cf. 25:9; 51:37, the latter said of Babylon). These verses, following the call to repent in vs 5–12, suggest that the call has been in vain.

18:19–23 A confession

The occasion of Jeremiah's fifth confession, like that of the first (11:18–23), is a plot against him, apparently by leading figures in the land (18). The three classes named give a clue as to the roles of the chief figures in the establishment. (The wise, in this context, are those who counselled kings; like Ahithophel in 2 Sa. 16:23). The reason for the plot, obviously, is Jeremiah's criticism of such figures (2:8; 8:8–11). There is no explicit plan to kill him here; however, the accusation made might well have been that of treason (cf. 37:13), and this in itself could have endangered his life.

The confession itself is almost entirely a prayer for judgment on his enemies. The good which he has done them (20) is to have told the truth and prayed for them. The central part of the prayer (21–22) might be read as Jeremiah's resignation: this is what they have chosen; now it must come, awful though it be. If the motive in v 23 is blameworthy, the sentiment is still in line with God's declared purpose and with the prohibition of the prophet's prayer for the people.

19:1–13 A pot broken and not remade

Jeremiah is now told to return to the potter's house (1). It may have been near the Potsherd Gate, which seems to have opened on to the Valley of Ben Hinnom, on the south and west side of the city. It was probably so called because there the potters carried out their damaged and unsaleable goods. The pieces on the rubbish heaps could not be remade, a powerful picture of what Jeremiah had to say. The area of the gate was probably crowded with people about their business.

Unlike the first incident involving a pot, Jeremiah is no mere observer this time; rather he is to buy a clay jar in order to perform a sign with it. This sign is to be carefully prepared for, and witnessed by senior members of the community, both clergy and lay (1). Jeremiah must have had the respect of certain members of the establishment, in order to be able to arrange this (cf. 26:17–19, 24).

Before performing the sign Jeremiah declares that Judah will certainly be destroyed (3–9). The address to the kings of Judah, as well as the elders, shows the symbolic and solemn nature of this speech (3, cf. 17:20). The sin condemned is that of idolatry, involving particularly the worship of Baal and star deities (cf. 8:2; 2 Ki. 21:5). Such worship is detestable both in itself, because of its inhumanity (5; cf. 7:31; 2 Ki. 21:6) and also as a betrayal of the God who had given this people life and made a covenant with them (4–5b). The punishment will be not only severe but public (3; cf. 2 Ki. 21:12). The humiliation was due to a people whose mission, ironically, was to show God to the nations. (Vs 5–6 are substantially repeated from 7:31–32.) Vs 7–9 grimly evoke the siege and the aftermath of battle. Cannibalism apparently did occur during the siege of Jerusalem in 586 BC (see La. 2:20).

Jeremiah then performs the sign, smashing the jar, which, finished and hardened, can no longer be remade (10–11; cf. 18:4). The two signs together illustrate well the passage from the time of repentance to the time when it is too late; the Lord will not now turn back from his determination to chastise Judah. The sign, as in 13:1–11, reinforces the message. Topheth, the place where children had been sacrificed (7:31), had been defiled (that is, made unsuitable for sacrifice), by King Josiah in his reform (2 Ki. 23:10); this would now be the fate of the whole city.

19:14–20:18 Jeremiah curses his birth

19:14–20:6 Jeremiah in the temple

The performing of the sign in the Valley of Ben Hinnom no doubt had the purpose of using Topheth as a symbol of destruction. Jeremiah now ascends to the temple and issues the warning again there (14–15; cf. 7:1–15).

The immediate consequences (20:1–6) show how much stir the prophet was creating in the higher echelons of society. If certain of the leaders were prepared to be seen with him (see on 19:1), others were not. Pashhur, who seems to have been a kind of priestly policeman, responsible for good order in the temple area, may be typical, to judge by Jeremiah's own preaching. Here we have a first record of the prophet suffering physically, as he had been warned he would (1:19). The Lord had promised that he would not be overcome by his enemies—but not that he would not suffer. Similarly, the Christian is assured of final victory because of the resurrection of Christ—but not of immunity from suffering or opposition.

Released from the stocks, Jeremiah addresses to Pashhur the kind of oracle which he had previously uttered about the priesthood and leaders in general (4–6). Pashhur is renamed Magor-Missabib ('terror on every side') because his refusal to hear God's word is the very attitude which will ensure the terrible fate of Judah. Ironically, the one who thought he was guarding the institutions and traditions was doing just the reverse; the temple with its rituals and its wealth, which he was protecting from the disorderly, would soon be no more, and the priesthood an irrelevance in a foreign land. No institution, however good, can be an end in itself; it can be good only if it points forward to the kingdom of God.

20:7–18 A last confession

Suitably, the account of Jeremiah's mistreatment is followed by an expression of his anguish because of his prophetic ministry in general. The passage is actually in two parts, vs 7–13 and vs 14–18. The first (7–13) is like a Psalm of lament, in which a Psalmist makes a protest to the Lord, and receives an assurance or an answer (e.g. Ps. 13).

The protest is in strong terms. In spite of God's assurances of protection, Jeremiah still feels that he has been unfairly exposed to danger, perhaps even that he has been misled (7a), and that his great sacrifices in the cause of his prophetic ministry have been in vain. He also feels that he has been led along, powerless to do otherwise than proclaim doom, so that he has been necessarily isolated from others (7b–9). V 10 gives a pathetic picture of his rejection by others. Terror on every side is perhaps here a mocking name applied to him, using the words he had used of Pashhur (3). The term friends is ironic; they are waiting for him to make some slip which might be his downfall.

Such a sense of isolation can be a common experience in the Christian life. It is, however, in its own way a deception, because the more fundamental truth is that God intends good to his faithful servants (Rom. 8:28–30). Jeremiah comes back to a knowledge of this (11–12), seeing again the truth that God will be just and therefore will act with integrity towards him, but he has no hesitation in sharing his feelings with God. The cry in v 12 is like that in another confession (11:20). For the shout of praise cf. Pss. 146:1–2; 147:1.

It is odd that the recovery just observed is now followed by Jeremiah's deepest utterance of despair (14–18). The cursing of one's own birth (cf. Jb. 3:3–19) is a strong denial of God's good purposes, whether for oneself or for the world. The thought, introduced at 15:10, is pursued relentlessly here. Even the man who brought the normally glad news is cursed. The final note (18) questions whether any good can be brought out of the trouble which he himself is having to endure, and that which will fall upon the people.

Jeremiah's problem is one of faith itself. Even the greatest saints can be tormented by doubt. The issue, significantly, is not fought out silently in the mind but in the practical matter of continuing to live in costly obedience. Faith and doubt can jostle each other in a disorderly way, as illustrated by the putting together of vs 7–12 and vs 13–18.

In a sense v 18 brings the first part of the book to an end. Can there be any good outcome to Jeremiah's persistent preaching of judgment? He is tempted to think not. However, the Lord will show him otherwise in due course.

21:1–24:10 Salvation only through exile

21:1–14 No deliverance from Babylon

The prophecy has reached a crucial stage. Hitherto, we have had few indications of the date of particular incidents. Now we are transported to the reign of the last king of Judah, after the first attack of King Nebuchadnezzar on Judah (2 Ki. 24:15–20; Je. 37:1–2). The prophecy does not proceed according to strict chronology. It goes to the end of the period in question at this point, in order to show that the issue is no longer whether Judah will repent but how she will respond to God's judgment. There is no longer any question about who the enemy will be. In the time of Zedekiah it was painfully obvious that it was Babylon.

King Zedekiah regularly consulted Jeremiah in the last days of his reign, as the Babylonian threat grew greater. (The Pashhur here sent as messenger, incidentally, is different from the one who had beaten Jeremiah; 20:2.) He hopes that the prophet will bring a word of salvation (2), rather as Isaiah had done in the days of Assyrian domination, when Jerusalem had been miraculously delivered (2 Ki. 19:32–36).

Jeremiah will be consistent, however, in his declaration that it is not a time for deliverance but for punishment. The answer to the king's enquiry is terrible (4–6); not only the Babylonians but God himself will fight against Judah. This is to put into reverse God's ancient warring on behalf of his people, when he drove out the previous occupants of the land of Canaan; even the same language is used (cf. Dt. 1:29–30; 4:34; 5:15; 7:19). The promise of judgment now becomes dreadfully specific: Zedekiah himself will be the victim (see 52:8–11). Nebuchadnezzar is the instrument of God's judgment. The language used shows how much he is the agent of God's own wrath (7; cf. 13:14).

The decree is final—but there is still a choice (8–10). The people of Judah may accept God's judgment or try to resist and evade it. The way of life and the way of death originally meant the choice between keeping or rejecting the covenant (Dt. 30:15, 19). Now it is reapplied to the acceptance or refusal of punishment. Where God had once driven other nations out of the promised land to let Israel live there, he was now bringing them in and ousting Judah. They must accept this punishment as the only way of hope. There is always kindness on the other side of God's chastisement.

The final oracle (11–14) remembers what the responsibility of the royal house (the house of David) had been (12a), namely to administer justice (Zedekiah's name, ironically, meant 'The LORD is righteous'). The words are cited to show that the house—and specifically Zedekiah—had failed. They had taken the assurance of God's presence (2 Sa. 7:11b–16) as an occasion for pride in their own strength (13b). This perversion of God's love must result in an undoing of the covenant. The fate of Judah is a warning against all presumption upon the grace of God.

22:1–30 Unworthy kings

The preceding oracle now leads into a series of oracles against the kings in whose reigns Jeremiah had prophesied. The first passage expands 21:12a (2–3) and is applied to the kings in general (since no king is named, though the words were presumably said to one in particular). The underprivileged (3) are those who are especially to be protected by careful justice (see 2 Sa. 8:15 for King David acting justly; cf. Dt. 14:29). The promise of v 4 is a reaffirmation of 2 Sa. 7:11b–16 (cf. also Je. 17:25 for the terms used)—but the responsibility of the kings is highlighted.

Another oracle (6–7) comments on the richness of Judah and the king's house in particular. Gilead was a fertile place, a symbol of God's blessing (cf. 8:22). Lebanon was well watered too, famous for its great cedars, many of which had been used in the building of the temple (1 Ki. 5:6–10) and the king's house (1 Ki. 7:2). The wealth of Judah is now seen to be fragile, subject to the will of the God who had given it, and whose goodness they had ceased to recognize.

The public announcement of the reason for Judah's fall (8–9) is a theme of the prophecy (cf. 18:16). It was a way of proclaiming God's faithfulness, even if Judah had not been faithful.

Sayings concerning particular kings occupy vs 10–30 (for their dates see the Introduction). They were probably spoken at different times, in or just after the reigns of the kings in question. They are gathered together to pursue the theme of the failure of the kings. (These all predate Zedekiah, who was the subject of ch. 21.)

Vs 10–12 relate to Josiah (the dead) and to his son Jehoahaz (here Shallum), who reigned briefly and was exiled to Egypt (2 Ki. 23:30–34). His exile is perhaps a foreshadowing of Judah's—hence the weeping.

Jehoiakim is in view in vs 13–19. He is blamed for injustice and self-aggrandizement and contrasted unfavourably with his father Josiah (15b–16). Josiah here fits with the Davidic ideal. Jeremiah comes closest at this point to giving him credit for his reform (2 Ki. 22–23). However, the reform itself is not mentioned; it had not been enough to redeem the dynasty from its waywardness or its final fall. The succession of Jehoiakim to Josiah proves this. Jehoiakim is personally accused of all the evils which Jeremiah generally condemns (cf. 6:13; 7:6; 26:20–23). His own punishment will be that he will not receive the honour of a normal burial or mourning rites. (The words My brother ... my sister ... are probably addressed by mourners to each other.) Worse, he will have no proper burial. There is no record either of Jehoiakim's death or of his burial, though he was forcibly removed from the throne by the Babylonians (2 Ki. 24:2–6; cf. also Je. 16:5–6).

An oracle is now addressed to Jerusalem itself (in the second person singular; 20–23). The vain appeals to allies (Assyria and Egypt; cf. 2:36) are made from mountainous places in the north and south (20). Jerusalem's consistent faithlessness (21; cf. 7:25–26) now results in the removal of all its supports (22, where shepherds means her own leaders). The oracle is focused on the kings by v 23, where Lebanon means, symbolically, the kings' palace (1 Ki. 7:2).

The rogues' gallery is completed by Jehoiachin (Coniah in Hebrew and some English translations), who succeeded his father Jehoiakim after the latter had been deposed (2 Ki. 24:6). His mark of belonging to the Lord (the Davidic covenant, symbolized by the signet ring) will not prevent him being sent permanently into exile (24–27).

The final words tell the fate of the whole Davidic dynasty in an oracle against Jehoiachin. His expulsion stands for the expulsion of the whole people from the land that was once theirs. V 29 records the Lord's grief over the abuse of his land (cf. 2:7; 12:4). The last verse writes an end to a dynasty. Though Jehoiachin had children, none would reign over Judah (1 Ch. 3:17–18).

23:1–8 A new Davidic king

The first two verses repeat the verdict on the false shepherds (cf. v 22b). Jeremiah now looks beyond the exile, however (3–8). There will be a better future for God’s people. He himself will be their shepherd (3), his shepherding delegated to faithful leaders (4). Moreover, although the historical Davidic dynasty is at an end, a new Davidic king would arise, one who would be just like David. His name, The LORD Our Righteousness, is, in Hebrew, close to that of Zedekiah. This king, however, would bear the name in truth. Jeremiah here looks towards that Messianic son of David whose birth would be for the salvation of Israel (Mt. 1:1; Lk. 2:29–35). The immediate hope, however, is for the restoration of the people of Judah to their own land, as a new landmark in God’s dealings with his people (7–8; cf. 16:14–15). This will be a foreshadowing of the greater salvation to come.

23:9–40 On false prophets

As ch. 22 brought together the prophet’s preaching against the kings, so this passage is a sustained treatment of the prophets who had not heard God’s word and who had misled Judah (cf. 5:31; 6:13–14). Part of Jeremiah’s own grief is the abuse of God’s word by others (9). His accusation of the prophets applies to them in particular what he has said of the people in general. Their unfaithfulness is like adultery (cf. 5:7–8; 9:2) and may have issued in literal adultery (14), their lives belying any claim to be God’s messengers (see on 5:26–28). Prophet and priest are two of a kind. Wickedness is at the heart of the national life (11; cf. Ezk. 8:5–18), making Jerusalem indistinguishable from the proverbially evil Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn. 19:1–29). From these responsible leaders wickedness has spread like a cancer (15). Evil, however, bears its own reward (12; cf. Ps. 73:18).

The essence of the following accusation of the prophets as a class (16–24) is that they have not stood in the council of the LORD (18). Rather, their only authority is their own imagination (16b). Naturally, therefore, their message is misguided, proclaiming peace when there is none (17b). There had been a time, as with Isaiah, when it had been right for prophets to announce peace (2 Ki. 19:32–36). These false prophets, therefore, might have been mimicking Isaiah’s message. Jeremiah’s point is that this was no genuine message, because they had no special mandate from God. They had in fact misread his will. The falsity of the false prophets, furthermore, could not be hidden from God (23–24).

Jeremiah develops the idea of prophets who are deluded (25–32), contrasting the power of the genuine with the worthlessness of the counterfeit. He finishes with an attack on the cheapening of the Lord’s word, where it is everywhere sought but only to be tamed, and where everyone’s claim to have it makes it impossible to hear a true word when it comes. The word of the moment is judgment (33b). Whoever says otherwise will be singled out for punishment (v 34). In terms of declaring God’s word in the church of Christ and to an unbelieving world, the responsibility—as awesome as for the prophets of old—is to declare his ‘whole counsel’, never tailoring it for our own ends, or deliberately making it more palatable than it is.

24:1–10 Two baskets of figs

This section of the prophecy (chs. 21–24) began with a message to Zedekiah. It then looked back to the four kings who preceded him (ch. 22). Now it comes full circle to Zedekiah again, who became Nebuchadnezzar’s puppet king of Judah after the exile of Jehoiachin (597 BC; 2 Ki.

24:8–17). The perspective of these two visions may well be towards the end of Zedekiah's reign, when the Babylonian army was again at the door.

The vision is one means by which the Lord communicates to his prophets (cf. 1:11, 13; Am. 7:1). The good and bad figs have overtones of good and bad harvests, and therefore covenantal blessing or the lack of it. This vision is of crucial importance for Jeremiah's message.

As in ch. 21, the exile is now a certainty; the issue is only how people will respond to God's decision to punish. The good figs are those who accept the need to go through the Babylonian devastation of the land and the exile itself (5). To these, the Lord now promises life again, in the language of building and planting familiar in Jeremiah (1:10; 18:7–10). This life lies on the other side of judgment, the 'tearing down' and 'uprooting'. Judah's life thus parallels that of Jesus, who died to rise again—and that of the church, which dies in him, in order to rise again (Rom. 6:1–4). The pattern of judgment followed by salvation is thus deep in the biblical revelation of God's ways with the world.

The new life, furthermore, is of a new quality. The terms of v 7 include the well known covenantal formula (They will be my people, and I will be their God; Lv. 26:12). The new thing, however, is the Lord's giving them a heart to know him, so that at last they might obey the call which once they would not hear (4:4). This does not mean that the human will is overruled or extinguished. Somehow, it is to be brought into line with that of the Lord. In biblical understanding, this finally happens through the indwelling of Christ and the giving of the Holy Spirit. (Rom. 8:1–17 might be studied in this connection.) In Jeremiah, the language begins to unfold the teaching of the new covenant (cf. 31:31–34).

The poor figs are all who refuse the punishment of the Lord. This punishment cannot, of course, be literally avoided, but refused in spirit. Zedekiah typified those in Judah who looked to an alliance with Egypt to fend off the Babylonian menace. The flirtation with Egypt symbolized rebellion against God (cf. Dt. 17:16). It would persist right to the end of Jeremiah's story, a sign that some would not hear God, come what might.

25:1–38 God judges all the nations

25:1–14 Babylon's time

The fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and the twenty-third of Jeremiah's ministry (reckoned inclusively, see 1:2) was 605 BC. In that year Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, gained control of Syria and Palestine by defeating Egyptian forces at the battle of Carchemish on the Euphrates. Indeed, according to Dn. 1:1, some prisoners from Judah were taken in that year. Babylon was from this point clearly the force to fear.

Jeremiah uses the time for a retrospect. He has preached continuously and consistently a message in line with that of other prophets who warned of judgment (4). The message (summarized in vs 4–6) had called to repentance and offered the chance of continued life in covenant and in the land (cf. Jeremiah's sermon in the temple; 7:3–7). It is given here only to show that it had not been heard (3, 7; cf. 7:25–26).

The words of judgment too (8–11) have the character of a summary, echoing earlier words (9c, cf. 24:9; 10, cf. 16:9). The rise of Babylon, however, gives a new focus and ominousness to them. Not only Judah but other nations too will suffer at Babylon's hands (9, 11). A further new and dreadful note is sounded: Judah (and the nations) will be enslaved to Babylon for seventy years (12). The generation that goes into exile will never see their homeland again.

This bad news, however, has a silver lining, because there will be an end to Babylon's strength, and therefore to the exile. Nebuchadnezzar has been God's servant (9) only as an agent of his punishment, but he himself has acted selfishly and cruelly in doing so. Babylon will therefore suffer God's punishment in turn (12, 14). Jeremiah is here seen as the prophet of Babylon's downfall, and thus becomes indeed a 'prophet to the nations' (1:5).

Babylon was to fall to the Medo-Persian Empire under the emperor Cyrus in 539 BC (see 2 Ch. 36:20–23). The seventy years may be counted either from 605, the date of the present prophecy and the year in which Nebuchadnezzar first took exiles, to 539, or soon after, when exiles began to return; or from 586, the date of the destruction of the temple, to 516, when it was rebuilt.

25:15–38 The cup of God's wrath

Roughly at the mid-point of the book of Jeremiah, therefore, judgment is pronounced against the nations in general. Such oracles are found in other prophetic books too, telling of the Lord's sovereignty over all nations and warning of their responsibility to him (e.g. Is. 13–20; Am. 1:1–2:3). (Jeremiah's main section of oracles against the nations, chs. 46–51, is actually placed at this point in the ancient Greek version of the OT, possibly preserving the original order.)

The sign of the drinking of the cup of wrath was presumably performed in some symbolic way. For the idea of drunken staggering as God's judgment cf. 13:12–14. Judgments against these nations are given more fully in chs. 46–51. It is important to notice that Babylon (called by the coded name of Sheshach), having wrought its havoc, drinks last (26). Also important is the statement that Judah will not be punished alone (29). The nation's suffering, far from suggesting the Lord's weakness since she is the one who bears his Name (cf. 7:12), will prove his lordship over all the world. The last two oracles of judgment (30–31, 32–38), using terms familiar from Jeremiah's preaching, are also directed against the nations in general. The lion once identified as the enemy nation (2:15) is now the Lord (38; cf. Am. 3:8).

26:1–29:32 Jeremiah becomes a prophet of salvation

26:1–24 Jeremiah narrowly escapes death

The scene returns to the temple, early in Jehoiakim's reign. The sermon recorded in vs 2–6 is a shortened form of the temple sermon in 7:1–15, making the same point, namely that Judah must hear God's word and not trust thoughtlessly in the mere possession of an institution. It is repeated here in order to introduce a narrative about response to God's word through the prophet on the part of various sections of the people.

Jeremiah is arrested by a group led by priests and prophets (8), angry because of his criticism of the worship and institutions of the land and supported by all the people. The accusation is that he is a false prophet, a crime which carried the death penalty (Dt. 18:20). The difficulty, however, was in knowing a true prophet from a false one. One test, whether his words came true (Dt. 18:21–22), might not give a certain result for a very long time. (This was the case with Jeremiah). Could he then be convicted because of the message itself? The case might have been based on old prophecies that Jerusalem would be protected from destruction (Is. 31:4–5; 37:33–35).

A trial ensues in which the priests and prophets accuse Jeremiah to the officials of Judah (10–11). All the people now stand with the officials as those who must be persuaded of his guilt. This shifting picture well evokes the uncertainty of many in Judah about the prophet and the readiness of a crowd to be swayed. Jeremiah, in his defence, affirms that he really is a prophet of God and repeats his call to repent, with its implied threat to city and temple (12–15).

The officials and all the people decide for Jeremiah (16). Their decision is supported by certain elders of Judah, who recall that the prophet Micah had preached in a similar way against the sins of Jerusalem (Mi. 3:8–12). If Micah had been right to preach thus, then so might Jeremiah be; and if the people did not repent, as King Hezekiah had done, then the disaster might indeed come.

The tragic case of the prophet Uriah (20–23) shows that Jeremiah was not alone in his preaching. He was not fortunate, as Jeremiah was, to gain the favour of influential people (cf. v 24) and became the victim of King Jehoiakim and those loyal to him. Our narrative is not merely telling the story of Jeremiah, as a modern biography might do. Rather it is telling the story of the response in Judah to the word of God. Jehoiakim stands condemned as one who rejects it outright, and brutally (see also Je. 36).

The question how to know what God is saying is always complex. One indicator is the commitment of the teacher (Jeremiah and Uriah were willing to die), though this is hardly an infallible rule. Another is the consistency of the message with whatever is known about God. There is no substitute for study, accumulated experience and prayer for discernment. The temptation to go with the crowd (even in the church), rather than search rigorously for the truth, can be the main obstacle to finding it.

27:1–22 Serve Nebuchadnezzar!

The scene shifts back to the reign of Zedekiah, in the year 594/3 BC (cf. 28:1). Zedekiah is apparently discussing rebellion against Babylon with ambassadors of the nations mentioned (3), possibly in league with Egypt. This is precisely what Jeremiah has warned Zedekiah against (21:1–10; 24). The sign of the yoke (2) is well-chosen to denote servitude, both that which is required of these nations and the worse one which will follow if they do not obey the Lord.

Jeremiah again wields his authority as a prophet to the nations. In calling the nations to account, he uses the language of the Lord's strength (5; cf. Dt. 4:34) to show that he is Creator of all the earth and therefore has the right to subordinate rulers to him (4–7). The point will be finally proven in relation to Babylon itself (7; cf. 25:12; Dn. 4:25).

The need to submit to Babylon, imposed first upon Judah, is here laid upon all the nations, especially those in the conspiracy. The trio of sword, famine and plague (8; cf. 14:12) typifies the dreadful judgment which would come in the case of refusal of this word. Those nations too would have their false prophets, who would support the 'establishment' and say that all was well when it was not (9–10). It was not Judah only that was obliged to seek the truth, or that was subject to the word of the Lord. Nor today is it only those who call themselves Christians.

The message to Zedekiah (12–15) is now familiar (cf. 21:1–10). The immediate context, however, is one in which he is being supported strongly by certain prophets in his policy of resisting Babylon. Jeremiah's campaign against these therefore takes on a new urgency.

The final passage reveals the nature of the false prophets' message. The setting is one in which the exile has in a sense begun. King Jehoiachin has already been taken captive to Babylon, and some of the treasures of the temple, the rich provision of King Solomon, have been borne off, symbols of the claimed superiority of the Babylonians' gods. The false prophets have now to argue that these will soon be brought back. Their position increasingly goes against the evidence.

Yet they go on holding it. Even what remains of the temple treasures will soon be taken also (19; cf. 52:17; cf. 1 Ki. 7:15–37).

The importance of the loss of these treasures cannot be overestimated for the people of Judah. Their whole understanding of themselves was bound up with these things. The temple and its trappings had indeed been given to them by God. But if they had become themselves the object of their hope (cf. 7:4), then they would have to be taken from them. The exile, in an important sense, consists in the loss of the temple; it is also, however, the opportunity to seek God again in a real way. This is why it was God's chosen way to the renewal of the people. It is sometimes necessary for God's people to be shown that they have come to trust in outward things rather than in God himself.

28:1–17 Jeremiah's message vindicated

Jeremiah's general denunciations of false prophets now come to a head in a confrontation with one in particular. While Jeremiah is still wearing the yoke with which he had warned of coming servitude to Babylon (27:2), Hananiah deliberately opposes him (1b) and challenges his sign (2). Hananiah then utters just the kind of oracle which Jeremiah has been opposing (2–4; cf. 27:16), promising that Babylonian pressure will very soon be lifted. This was tantamount to denying that God was judging his people and, consequently, that there had been grounds for his anger.

The issue, introduced in ch. 26, is how to know the true prophet from the false. Hananiah is called a prophet (1) and uses prophetic language, claiming to speak in the name of the Lord (2a; had he spoken in the name of any other god he could have been immediately denounced; Dt. 13:1–5; 18:20). Jeremiah is initially powerless to demonstrate that he is right and Hananiah wrong. He can only say that he wishes Hananiah were right (6). However, he stands by the word which he knows God has given him and delivers his own challenge (9). That challenge is an appeal to one of the criteria by which a prophet may be known to be true, namely whether his words come to pass (Dt. 18:21–22). Hananiah, undeterred, breaks the yoke from Jeremiah's neck, thus claiming by the most potent kind of symbolism (see on 13:1) that he is the one who knows the will of God. With this he seems to have won the day, and Jeremiah retreats (11).

The Lord now gives Jeremiah his most dramatic vindication. He will show that Jeremiah speaks truly by passing a terrible sentence on Hananiah. Jeremiah, returning to the encounter, declares again his message that Judah must bow beneath the yoke of Babylon, now an iron one (12–14; cf. 27:6). And the message is reinforced by a prophecy that Hananiah will die that same year. If the final demonstration of the truth of Jeremiah's message of judgment would take a little longer, this would be an immediate and powerful proof of the matter.

Hananiah dies because he is a false prophet (Dt. 18:20) who has helped prevent the people from seeing their true danger. His death serves also to vindicate Jeremiah. There is now no excuse, if ever there had been one, for failing to heed his words.

The solemn story is a perpetual warning against lightly claiming that one has a special word from the Lord, and it calls all who would be teachers to be humble learners first, and always.

29:1–14 'Build houses in Babylon'

If people in Judah wanted to believe that the effects of the first Babylonian invasion would soon be undone, so too did those who had already been taken into exile there. Jeremiah now sends them a letter (showing, incidentally, that communication between the two locations remained possible; there was always traffic around the trade route that lay between them. The family of Shaphan again appears in Jeremiah's service in v 3; cf. 26:24). In Babylon too the various classes of society are represented (chiefly the upper and better off classes; 2 Ki. 24:14). And there too there is a battle for their mind; prophets are persuading them that they will soon be home (8–9).

The letter contains what seems like bad news, but also a great encouragement. The bad news is that the exile will not be short. Jeremiah repeats his message that it will last seventy years (10; cf. 25:11). However, in the 'death' of exile are the seeds of new life. The letter begins to reverse the hitherto bleak preaching of the prophet. Where once he had himself refrained from marrying as a sign that marrying and having children would cease in Judah (16:2), now the exiles may return to normal relationships (6). The people may again increase in number, whereas his previous message had seemed to promise only extinction (4:7).

Just when all planning seems futile, the Lord has plans again for his people (11). The act that had seemed to put an end to the covenant in fact gives life where there had been but the appearance of it. The story illustrates neatly the difference between the Lord's thinking and human plans (Pr. 16:9; Is. 55:8). What seems to be the end of hope is but the end of tawdry dreams; with God there is always a real future. In it, there is willing and joyful communion with him, no longer hidden by human self-seeking. Nor is this future in some unreal 'spiritual' realm. It exists within normal life; hence the marrying and the houses, and—in time—the returning to the ancient land (14). The phrase translated bring you back from captivity is richer than this suggests, implying the full restoration of life in all its dimensions. It will recur several times in the following chapters.

29:15–32 Prophets in Babylon

To the objection that the exiles had their own prophets (15), Jeremiah replies with a summary of his former message of judgment, recalling the vision of the bad figs which had condemned those who would refuse the exile (17; cf. 24:8–10). There was to be no false hope for the exiles in the fact that Zedekiah still sat on a throne in Jerusalem, or that the temple still stood.

The letter continues with words of judgment against particular prophets who, like Hananiah (ch. 28), are declaring Jeremiah's words invalid. Ahab and Zedekiah (not the king) have shown their falseness by their adulterous lives (20–23). In the light of the fulfilment of Jeremiah's words about Hananiah (28:17), his prophecy about them is ominous indeed (22). Shemaiah the Nehelamite opposes Jeremiah as directly as he can at such a distance, by refuting his letter in a reply to one of the priests. He too has dared too much, and will know the anger of God (24–32).

30:1–33:26 A new covenant is promised

30:1–24 Health restored

The next three chapters are taken up with promises of salvation for Judah, and indeed, Israel, after the punishment of the exile. The central subject will be the new covenant (31:31–34). The primary focus will be the exiles who return from Babylon. But this saving act of God is more profoundly a pointer to his creation of a new kind of people in the church of Christ. (See the additional note at the end of Commentary on ch. 31)

It is refreshing to move from judgment to salvation. It is also remarkable to hear Jeremiah now speak as a 'salvation-prophet' having given so much energy to opposing those who promised salvation too soon. The difference between Jeremiah and Hananiah (ch. 28), however, is that Jeremiah has insisted that the punishment must first run its course and itself be part of the restoration.

The command to write down prophecies already given (2) witnesses to an ongoing activity (see ch. 36). Here it signals a turning-point in the message. The theme of chs. 30–33 is set by 30:1–3, namely the full restoration of the people of God to their covenant relationship with him (3; cf. 29:14).

The method of ch. 30 is to quote prophecies of judgment and answer them with words of salvation. Thus vs 5–7 remind of earlier (and other) judgment-sayings (5; cf. 20:3, 10; 6, cf. 4:19, 31). The day of the Lord (7) had been used by Amos to speak of coming disaster (Am. 5:18).

In contrast to all the pain, there will be a day of deliverance (8). The time for yoke-breaking will come at last (contrast 28:10–14), and God's people will serve him truly under a true Davidic king (9; cf. 23:5–6). It is no less than Israel (or Jacob) that will be restored, though in a new guise. The promise of God's presence with his people is fundamental to the covenant (11; cf. Ex. 3:12) and grounds for not fearing (Is. 43:2). V 11b refers to the disciplining of the exile.

A new section begins again by recalling prophecies of judgment (12–15). Metaphors of wounding and illness dominate (cf. 8:11, 22). The allies are (lit.) 'lovers', recalling the metaphor of prostitution (2:33; cf. 22:20–22). The legal case against Judah (13a) had been brought by the Lord himself (2:9, 29).

There follow two 'answering' oracles of salvation (16–17, 18–24). The first begins with the word 'Therefore' (NIV But). This is surprising, following v 15b. It shows that the Lord's plan to save Israel/Judah is based entirely on his gracious decision to do so. The people's oppressors will be overthrown (cf. 25:12). And there will at last be true healing (17), not the counterfeit offered by the false prophets to no avail (cf. 8:11, 15).

The second oracle portrays a happy and prosperous people (19–20), in direct contrast to the dearth and misery of the time of punishment (4:29c; 16:9). This repopulation is now envisaged for the homeland, not just for the exilic community in Babylon, as in 29:6, hence the rebuilding of homes (18), cities and fortresses (the probable meaning of v 18c). They will once again be ruled by one of their own (21), a sign of freedom from oppression. All this amounts to a renewal of the covenant, indicated by the formula of v 22 (cf. Lv. 26:12).

The last two verses are repeated from 23:19–20. Their repetition here is deliberate and means that the time referred to in the former place has now come. The day when the people will understand God's plan is now close.

31:1–26 A remnant returns

This chapter contains a number of pictures of the restored people, headed by a variation of the covenant-formula (1; cf. 30:22) and a poetic statement about renewal that lies beyond judgment (2).

The Virgin image has only been used ironically before (18:13–15); here (4), it contrasts with the former 'prostitute' (2:20). In the new covenant, the former stains have been washed away. The new life, moreover, is one that can be portrayed in images that are homely and joyful. The idea of Israel as Virgin leads into the colourful picture of the young women of the land going out to dance, perhaps at a festival (cf. Jdg. 21:20–21). Farmers will harvest crops and celebrate in due course the bounty of God in worship in Jerusalem (6b). All this will be because the love of God does not come to an end in judgment; his love does not die. It is expressed in that special love (loving-kindness) which he has set upon his people (3).

A people returns from exile (7–9), a remnant (see 6:9), yet in great number, bringing their infirmities, yet weeping for joy, as the Lord, their father, picks out for them a level path. Israel is the foremost of the nations (7), no longer merely one of those whom God punished by Nebuchadnezzar (27:8); she is so simply because she has been chosen to know God's love (cf. Dt. 7:7–8).

A further oracle is addressed to the nations (10–14). A joyful people is tended by its shepherd (cf. 23:3), its blessings pictured in concrete terms: corn, wine and oil, the basic symbols of bounty (cf. Dt. 7:13); a garden and dancing (again, cf. v 4). The whole community is portrayed in the contrasts of male and female, young and old, priest and lay (13–14). All this is meant as a witness to the nations that God is faithful to his people and able to bless them as he promises. No nation can hold them when he decides to redeem them (11; cf. Rom. 8:31).

The strong feminine imagery continues (15–22) with Rachel weeping for her children. Rachel, the younger wife of Jacob, was the mother of Joseph (Gn. 35:24), the ancestor of the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. Her weeping stands for the grief of Israel, especially all its mothers, over its losses, the northern tribes into Assyrian exile, the southern to Babylon. That weeping is answered by this restoration (16–17). Ephraim (standing for all Israel) is portrayed as repenting in truth (contrast past false repentances; 3:22b–25). Their turning towards God is met by his turning towards them (18); in the past they had only turned away (3:22a). God himself has done all this; his compassion is finally more decisive than his judgment (20; cf. Ho. 11:8).

There follows an appeal (21–22), showing that even in this new order the Lord still calls his people to faithfulness. The last line (22b) is obscure, but may be an image of a mother protecting her male child, a happy echo of Rachel weeping for her children. This secure people is also a worshipping one (23–25).

The oracles to this point in the chapter seem to have been given to Jeremiah in a dream (26).

31:27–40 The new covenant

The preamble to the new covenant (27–30) answers a proverb of the time of the exile which complained that that generation was suffering for the sins of preceding ones (cf. Ezk. 18:2). Rather, the Lord would deal with each generation, and even each individual, separately and justly.

The idea of a new covenant has been contained in all the prophecies of chs. 30–31 so far. Now it is spelt out (31–34). It is made with both Israel and Judah. The renewal goes right back to Abraham and Moses, not just to the fall of Judah, and recreates the covenant; 'new' can mean 'renewed'.

This covenant, however, will be different from the one which previous generations had broken (32). It will be written on people's hearts, not just on stones, like the Ten Commandments (33; cf. Ex. 24:12). In other words, the covenant will be a warm delight to the people, not a cold prescription. This had always been the ideal (cf. Dt. 10:16; 30:6), but now it would be realized, because in some way the Lord would create the desire and ability in his people (I will write ...).

Two characteristics of the new covenant are now mentioned (34). First, people will not need to be encouraged to know God, because all will know him. Such knowledge means not only a knowledge of God's character and ways, but is personal, and implies a commitment of the will. It is a response to his knowledge of us, which is also a total commitment of himself. Secondly, God will forgive the sins of the people in a new and decisive way (cf. Heb. 10:1–17).

The following two passages affirm, first, that the new covenant will be everlasting (35–37), and secondly, that as a result of it the city of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (38–40).

Additional note on the interpretation of the new covenant. The plain sense of the prophecy in 31:31–34 relates it to the historical nations of Israel and Judah. It refers, in the first place, to the return of exiles from Babylon. This is clear from the reference to the rebuilding of the city in vs 38–40. The whole tendency of chs. 30–31 has been in this direction also. The new covenant prophecy, therefore, has a first fulfilment when God brings back the exiles in 539 BC and the following years.

However, the prophecy suggests more than this. The inclusion of ‘Israel’, which had ceased to exist as a nation by Jeremiah’s time, suggests that a deeper fulfilment is looked for than a mere physical return to the land. The ancient covenant is to be fulfilled at last in a new way, by a people that is capable of entering into it, by God’s help.

The NT teaches that the decisive fulfilment of the new covenant prophecy takes place in Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 11:25; Heb. 8:7–13; 9:15). This means that God’s covenant is finally achieved in the people who are ‘in Christ’. The new kind of forgiveness is possible because he has made a once-for-all sacrifice for sin that makes all other sacrifices obsolete (Heb. 10:15–18). It is a covenant that cannot end because it has been perfected by Christ. Even so, his new people are called to faithfulness and given the Holy Spirit in order to enable them.

There is, therefore, a parallel between how God acted towards ancient Judah in bringing them back from Babylon and how he acts to the whole world in Christ. Ancient Israel and Judah have their counterpart in the church, which is Christ’s body and calls all people to him.

32:1–15 Jeremiah buys a field

The scene returns to the reign of Zedekiah. Judah is besieged and Jeremiah is in prison. The prophecies of hope will continue against this background. Part of that background is Zedekiah’s refusal to hear God’s word to him. Here that word is repeated, actually in Zedekiah’s mouth—so familiar was he with it (3–5; cf. 21:3–7).

The message of judgment now becomes merely a prelude to a new word of hope, or rather a sign: namely, the buying of a field. The occasion of Hanamel’s desire to sell the field to Jeremiah is not known. Perhaps he was old and had no sons and was asking Jeremiah to keep the piece of land in the family (8). Whether Jeremiah paid over the odds cannot be said. The procedures described are presumably the normal ones of the day. Their public character takes on a new importance here because the sale is also going to be a sign (14–15).

The point of the transaction is that normal life will in due course be resumed in Judah (15). It is a potent sign, ownership of a field suggesting possession of the whole land. It is all the stronger against the background of the siege and likely loss of everything, not least the very field which Jeremiah has just bought. By it the prophecies which had insisted that all normal activities in Judah would come to a sudden end are effectively reversed (ch. 16).

32:16–44 Too hard for the Lord?

The oddness of buying a field in the midst of a siege prompts a prayer of Jeremiah. He begins with the affirmation, Nothing is too hard for you (17). He develops the idea by praising God’s power both in creation (17), in judgment (18–19), in saving Israel from Egypt and giving them the land (20–22; cf. Dt. 26:8) and finally in punishing them for their sins (23). The prayer, however, is really a question: Can this sign make sense?

The Lord, answering Jeremiah (26–44), takes up the question whether anything is too hard for him (27). He begins by repeating familiar words of judgment. The Babylonians will destroy the city (28–29) because of the persistent sin of Israel and Judah, centred on their idolatry (30–35; cf. 7:18, 30–32; 19:13). These words, however, merely introduce the word of salvation that follows. The point is that the really hard thing is to bring salvation out of destruction. That, however, is just what he plans to do.

The promise begins in v 36. The long-threatened sword, famine and plague (14:12) are at the door. Now, however, the word of judgment is turned into one of salvation. Though the people are being driven out, they will return, not only to their land but to a covenant (38), nothing less than the new covenant (31:31–34), in which they will be faithful and which will never end (39–41). The words I will inspire them to fear me take up the new covenant promise I will put my law in their minds, in the sense that the Lord himself promises to take a new initiative in bringing this about. This is the miracle that is ‘not too hard’ for the Lord.

The final verses (42–44) come back to Jeremiah’s field. Yes, fields will again be bought in Judah. Jeremiah’s apparently foolish purchase is not meaningless, but full of hope and promise.

33:1–13 The sounds of joy and gladness

The final chapter of the so-called Book of Consolation, like chs. 30 and 32, has words of judgment answered by words of salvation. The Lord’s word to Jeremiah of his power in creation (2; cf. 10:12) contrasts with the prophet’s position, still in prison (cf. 32:2) in a beleaguered city. The revealing of unsearchable things (3) takes up the idea of nothing being too hard for the Lord (32:17) and amounts to a promise of salvation (cf. Is. 48:6 for a similar idea). Words of judgment are then recalled (4–5) in order to lead, unexpectedly, into words of promise (6–9). The transition from the judgment to the promise is abrupt (there is no word Nevertheless in the Hebrew; v 6). The sequence itself shows how God acts; he brings salvation and blessing out of the blackest despair.

Similar patterns may be seen in vs 10–11, 12–13. There is an echo in v 10 of 4:23–26, but it is answered by a picture of life (v 11; contrast also 7:34; 16:9). Desolation will give way to peace and security throughout the land of Israel (the places mentioned in v 13 cover the length and breadth of Judah, and Benjamin, indeed, lies even beyond Judah’s borders to the north).

33:14–26 An unending covenant

The last part of the chapter develops the promise of a new Davidic kingdom made in 23:5–6, which is cited here (15–16). The language of this passage, and of the words that follow, recalls the first promise to David (2 Sa. 7:12–16; cf. 1 Ki. 2:4). That promise seemed to have failed, since David’s historical dynasty did come to an end, as Jeremiah had said it would (cf. 22:30). Now it is reaffirmed (17). So too is God’s promise to the priesthood (18). The priests had an indispensable role in the Mosaic covenant (Ex. 28–29), and indeed they had a covenant of their own with the Lord (Nu. 25:12–13; 1 Sa. 2:30, 35).

The remainder of the chapter affirms the permanence of the renewed covenant in the strongest possible terms (19–22; 23–26). In restoring his people God will be keeping his ancient promises, even the promise to Abraham that his descendants would be a nation (26; cf. Gn. 12:2). And he will do so to prove those wrong who say that he has rejected his people (24).

The promise of a permanent kingdom contrasts oddly with the sermon in 7:1–15, in which Jeremiah had made it plain that the people could not take institutions and nationhood for granted.

The difference is made possible by the new covenant. The kingdom foreseen in ch. 33 is none other than the new covenant, interpreted by the NT in the way which we have noted above. The terms, it is true, are taken from the ancient covenant, with its king and priests. This, however, must be seen merely as a vehicle for the essential assurance that God would, in the end, be utterly faithful to his promises. These had aimed originally at the salvation of the whole world (Gn. 12:3) and would finally be fulfilled in those terms.

34:1–36:32 Jeremiah's message is resisted

34:1–22 A pardon for slaves

The perspective returns to the time of the siege with another word of Jeremiah's to Zedekiah (1–5). The message is unchanged, in essentials, from 21:3–7; 32:3–5. An addition here (4–5) allows some hope of a mitigated sentence for the king, where the other saying had not been precise about his personal fate. The meaning is that he would not die in battle, and that he would be properly mourned (contrast 22:18 for the fate of Jehoiakim; but see also 52:11). The imminence of the fall of the city is indicated by vs 6–7, according to which only two other cities besides Jerusalem continued to hold out against the invaders. Most of Judah has already fallen.

The following incident, concerning released slaves, becomes an occasion for a further oracle against Zedekiah. The incident itself gives an interesting insight into the life of Judah in its death-throe. Slavery was an allowed institution in Israel, under clearly defined conditions. These conditions, alluded to in v 14, are contained in Ex. 21:2–11, Lv. 25:39–55 and Dt. 15:12–18. As envisaged, it was a humane institution, allowing those who had fallen on hard times, perhaps through crop failure and debt, to be restored to independence. This required unselfish interpretation on the part of the better off, and in reality, the institution had been generally abused.

In the heat of the siege, Zedekiah had proclaimed a slave-release, which had been accepted by those who had slaves (9–10). For the king, who showed signs of hesitation and weakness during the siege, it may have been an attempt to set some of his wrongs to right, before it was too late. Presumably, however, the decree caused anger, and the result was that the masters took their slaves back (11). The act was irrational in the light of a situation in which all was about to be lost. Yet it is a testimony, perhaps, to human blindness, and an extreme example of that refusal to accept the will, and then the punishment, of God, which Jeremiah had criticized (cf. 21:9).

The hard-hearted act becomes the occasion of a further promise of judgment. The idea of freedom (given to the slaves, then taken back) is used ironically of the freedom which God will give the people to be punished (17). This is in fact the nature of all unilaterally declared freedom from God, a delusion which leads only to ruin.

The ritual referred to in vs 18–20 involved the sacrifice of an animal as the solemn sign of a covenant. The walking between its parts may have meant a kind of self-curse, i.e. 'may such a thing (namely death) happen to me if I do not keep my covenant' (cf. Gn. 15:17; 1 Ki. 19:2). Such a ritual may have accompanied the covenant commanded by Zedekiah regarding the slaves. The Lord now simply says, so be it.

The chapter ends with a familiar scenario of death for the city and the land (21–22).

35:1–19 Faithful Recabites

The next two chapters go back in time to the reign of Jehoiakim. The development of the narrative here, therefore, is thematic, not chronological. The themes are the resistance to the covenant with the Lord and the imminent danger from the Babylonians. The danger referred to in v 11 is the Babylonian attack in 605 BC.

Jeremiah uses the Recabites as an example of faithfulness, by way of a contrast with the failure of Judah in general to be faithful. Most of what is known of the Recabites is contained in the present chapter. Their ancestor Jonadab had assisted King Jehu in his zeal, over two centuries earlier, to put an end to Baal worship in the northern kingdom of Israel (2 Ki. 10:15, 23). If the same Recab is meant in 1 Ch. 2:55, however, the family was a clan of Judah (cf. 1 Ch. 2:3), with links to the ancient nomadic Kenites, who had been friendly to Israel during their wilderness wanderings (1 Sa. 15:6). Jonadab apparently initiated a rule of life for his clan, which had elements of nomadism and entailed abstinence from all kinds of strong drink (6–7). Whether the Recabite family was composed strictly of descendants of Jonadab, or whether it was a more open community, perhaps even a guild, is unclear.

The origins and constitution of the Recabites are not the issue, however, but rather their faithfulness to their rule. The passage takes no position on whether or not the rule was good or bad in itself; the point is the Recabites' faithfulness to it. Jeremiah is told to make a prophetic sign of this, setting wine before them and inviting them to drink, knowing that they were committed to abstinence (2). The sign takes place in a side room of the temple and could presumably have been witnessed by important temple officials. Once again Jeremiah went to the heart of the nation's power.

The Recabites duly refuse (6), and Jeremiah declares the meaning of the sign (12–16). The reproach to Judah takes a familiar form (15; cf. 25:4–6) but gains fresh strength from the contrast between their record and that of the Recabites. The reproach is followed by a word of judgment (17; cf. 11:11). A final twist promises long survival to the Recabites (18–19), in terms which belong properly to the promise to the Davidic king (19b; cf. 1 Ki. 2:4). This directs the contrast pointedly at the king himself, with some irony, since that continuance of the dynasty is precisely what is now threatened by the failure of the kings.

36:1–32 Jehoiakim rejects Jeremiah's words

Jehoiakim's reign had seen a major conflict between Jeremiah and the authorities over his preaching in the temple (ch. 26). The present chapter is a kind of sequel to that incident and returns to the theme of the official rejection of the prophet's words. Jeremiah, indeed, is apparently barred from the temple area (5), no doubt a compromise between those forces who had wanted to execute him and those who had supported him. The ban was serious, as it kept Jeremiah from moving not only among officials but among the large crowds who would go to the temple on great occasions.

The Lord therefore commands Jeremiah to write all the words he has hitherto spoken on a scroll (2), so that they can be read out in Jeremiah's absence. (It seems that Jeremiah simply remembered all these words, to judge by the surprise of the officials [17–18] that they should come to be written, and Baruch's answer there.) Baruch's humble role as scribe to the prophet now involves him in standing in for the prophet himself, on a crowded fast day, in what must have seemed a repetition of the great challenge of Jeremiah in the temple sermon (6–10; 26:2–6; cf. 7:1–15). Baruch's secondary part, therefore, required the same commitment and courage as that of his master when the need arose. Once again the family of Shaphan is involved in gaining a hearing for Jeremiah's words (10; cf. 26:24).

The immediate consequences of the reading are remarkable indeed, for an impact is made on some of the leading officials, again through the initiative of a member of Shaphan's family. The writing itself may have added something to the effect, or perhaps merely the putting together of so many different words (15–18).

The officials, in consternation, give the scroll its third reading, now before the king himself. His reaction and that of his closest associates contrast markedly with that of the officials who brought it to him. His callous disregard for the prophet's words is emphasized, almost as a matter of wonder (24; cf. v 16). The burning of the scroll horrifies Elnathan, Gemariah and Delaiah, who see it for the blasphemy it is. For the king, it may indicate more than indifference and be a superstitious attempt to destroy the power of the words.

The king's action makes a further contrast, namely with that of his father, King Josiah, when the Book of the Law was discovered in the temple and read out to him (2 Ki. 22:8–13). The role of Shaphan himself, incidentally, is noted on that occasion too.

The attempt to destroy the words of God is futile. Jeremiah is simply commanded to make another scroll (28), and the special word of judgment which Jehoiakim has invited by his impiety follows. It is an express denial of the dynastic promise as passed to Solomon by David (30b; cf. 1 Ki. 2:4) and a repetition of the prophecy that he will have no proper burial (30c; cf. 22:19).

The new scroll contains other words, not in the first (32). This presumably reflects Jeremiah's ongoing ministry and is evidence of the beginning of the written collection of his sayings.

37:1–39:18 The last days of Judah

37:1–10 Relief from Egypt?

The action now proceeds quickly towards the final fall of Judah and Jerusalem to the Babylonians. The scene from now on is the latter part of Zedekiah's reign, the king who had himself been put in by the Babylonians (2 Ki. 24:17–18). The issue is whether the king will listen to Jeremiah's announcement that the city must fall and lessen the force of the disaster by surrendering; the message referred to in v 2 was first introduced in 21:1–10. Zedekiah must not imagine that there will be effective help from Egypt.

The king, though he consistently refuses to hear the full impact of Jeremiah's message, nevertheless actively seeks out the prophet, desperately hoping for reassurance. He urges Jeremiah to exercise his prophetic role of intercessor (3), which, of course, has been prohibited to the prophet (7:16), just because of the hardness of Judah's heart. Zedekiah's desire for the word of God is spurious, because it will only accept the outcome which it has itself prescribed.

At the time in question, the Babylonian siege of the city has been temporarily relieved by an advance of Egyptian forces, Egypt being intent on recovering some ground in the area from its old foe (4–5). It is a natural occasion for the false hopes in Egypt against which Jeremiah has warned. Zedekiah's hope, then, appears to have some basis. The fundamental situation has not changed, however (6–10). The only decisive factor in it is the Lord's intention to punish Judah. False hopes are easily encouraged by superficial appearances.

37:11–21 Jeremiah imprisoned

The imprisoning of Jeremiah is a last desperate attempt of his enemies to silence him, resisting his word to the last, even in the death-throe of the city. The prophet takes advantage of the respite afforded by the Babylonian withdrawal to go to his home town, Anathoth (12), possibly to join a family discussion about its property. Jeremiah's purchase of Hanamel's field (32:1–15) may have been an eventual outcome of the attempted journey described here.

He is arrested at the very gate of the city on the charge of deserting to the Babylonians (13). The pretext for the charge is his preaching of surrender as the only way of survival (21:9); but the charge of treachery is trumped up. His denial, That's not true! (14), uses the word (lit.) 'lie' with which he has described the whole condition of the people (cf. 5:2). His arrest, it is implied, is the result of the people's rejection of his message, not of any evidence of treachery on his part. But he is imprisoned nevertheless.

Even so, Zedekiah continues to seek a word of reassurance from him. In refusing it, the prophet pleads that the falseness of the opposing prophets must by now surely be evident (19). The king still will not hear. He does, however, ease Jeremiah's hard prison conditions (20–21).

38:1–13 Jeremiah thrown into a cistern

As Judah is in desperate danger from Babylon, so Jeremiah remains in danger from his personal enemies. Certain of the palace officials strongly oppose him, and he is vulnerable to the shifting allegiances and power-plays of influential people (see 21:1 for Pashhur son of Malkijah in a more neutral role). The officials cite the well-known substance of Jeremiah's preaching in the last days of Judah (2–3; cf. 21:7–10), and call for the death penalty (cf. 26:11). The charge is treason, as in the incident in ch. 37. Zedekiah seems powerless against his officials (5). His attempt to hold on to power, therefore, by refusing Jeremiah's message, has a pathetic irony about it, since he has no real power to wield.

Jeremiah was evidently meant to die in the muddy cistern. It took a foreigner in the king's service, the Ethiopian (Cushite) Ebed-Melech (lit. 'servant of the king') to rouse the king to action, by appealing to him while he sat in the city gate, no doubt hearing cases brought to him for judgment (7–10). The royal household is evidently divided; the king himself lacks resolution, but may be swayed. Jeremiah is returned to the relative safety of the courtyard of the guard (11–13). The reaction of his enemies is left to the imagination.

38:14–28 A last interview with Zedekiah

The last encounter of Zedekiah and Jeremiah breathes secrecy (the third entrance to the temple, v 14, is not otherwise mentioned and is presumably a quiet place, perhaps private to the king). It not only reflects the king's own insecurity in his palace, but also Jeremiah's understandable exasperation with one who constantly asked but would not accept the only true answer (15). The prophet is no doubt also suffering from his perpetual ill-treatment and uncertainty about his own life, as the king sees (16).

The word which Jeremiah gives on this occasion contains some comfort for Zedekiah, not by changing the accustomed message, but by assuring him of personal survival if he complies with the Babylonians, even protection from his Jewish enemies (17–20; v 19 reveals some of the complex tensions within the Jewish community of the period). The word of assurance has a personal element, affecting the king's family; so, however, does the alternative, for if he refuses then he and his family will suffer (21–23). The loss of a king's harem was a particular humiliation in war.

Zedekiah makes no response to the word itself, though his actions in these last days suggest great personal agony of mind. The sequel in ch. 39 shows how fatal his vacillation in the face of what he knew to be right proved to be.

Jeremiah fears a return to the house of Jonathan (cf. 37:15; a return to the cistern was hardly in question, since the king himself had prevented his murder there), but is allowed to go back to the courtyard of the guard, where he stays till the city falls (28).

39:1–18 The fall of Jerusalem

The disaster of which Jeremiah had so consistently spoken is now briefly told, though the campaign itself had lasted some time and had received at least one setback (1–2; cf. 37:5). The dates in question are January 588 BC and July 587 BC (see also 52:4; 2 Ki. 25:1). The sham power of Zedekiah and his court is brutally exposed when the Babylonians enter the city, occupying with deliberate symbolism a position representing royal authority in the city (3). The puppet-king flees in humiliation, but finds, inescapably, none of the mitigation of his punishment which Jeremiah had held out to him (5–7; cf. 38:17–23).

There is pathos in the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecies to Zedekiah. He would indeed 'see the king of Babylon with his own eyes' (32:4; 34:3), only to be cruelly deprived of his sight (7). His own death would not occur in this heat of war, but presumably afterwards in a time of peace, and with due obsequies (34:5). But there would scarcely be peace for his soul.

The shackling of the former king, together with the execution of his sons (potential heirs) and his officials, is part of the grim political necessity of affirming Babylonian rule. It is at the same time the end of the story of the petty hostilities which had passed for the exercise of power in Judah. There had indeed been a falseness at the heart of the covenant people which could never truly claim God's mandate to rule, nor in the end the enjoyment of his protection.

Jeremiah's preaching had all along been directed not just at the leadership but at the whole people. The ordinary people had not been exempted from blame for their own unfaithfulness to God, even if the leaders had borne a heavier responsibility. So in the punishment, the whole people is affected (8–9). We are left again to guess at the tensions which may have existed within the exiled community between those who had deserted at an early stage (respecting Jeremiah's words!) and those who had held out to the last (9). Though some of the poorest are left behind (10), Judah as a political entity no longer exists.

Nebuchadnezzar's special command regarding Jeremiah may occasion surprise (11–12). It is not necessary to think, however, that the prophet had had any communication with the Babylonian authorities prior to his capture. His message had never required collaboration; God's declared intention could scarcely require such a thing. Rather, the conquering power was prepared to be well disposed to any in Judah whom it regarded as having supported its cause. Jeremiah's advocacy of surrender may have been known to Nebuchadnezzar through Jews already in exile. His perception of what Jeremiah was doing (or indeed of what he was doing himself!) would not have been that of the prophet, of course. However, in God's providence, the kindness of the king to Jeremiah enabled him to remain among those who were left behind in Judah, and to continue his ministry among them (11–14).

A special word from the Lord is now included regarding Ebed-Melech, the official who had saved Jeremiah from death when he had been thrown into the cistern (15–18; cf. 38:7–13). He is to be spared in that dreadful day and moreover saved from his personal enemies, the same, no doubt, who had been Jeremiah's (or those of them who had survived).

The story of the last days of Jerusalem, and of its fall, testifies not only to God's anger with his sinful people, but also to the kindness of his providence. In the mass of confusing events, he preserves the life of his prophet and of other faithful servants. And even the severe punishment is meant for good in the end.

40:1–45:5 A remnant flees to Egypt

40:1–12 Gedaliah as governor

The present passage expands on the brief report in 39:13–14, in giving more details about the handing over of Jeremiah to Gedaliah. The Babylonian commander, Nebuzaradan, releases the prophet from the captivity which he shares with his compatriots (1), showing knowledge of his message and perhaps respecting his status as a prophet who had known the mind of his God (2–3). Jeremiah is given the choice of going to Babylon or staying in Judah. It may seem that consistency demands that he should go, since he had always preached submission to Babylon. However, since the Babylonian writ now runs in Judah, even those who stay are, in a sense 'in Babylon'. When Jeremiah goes to Gedaliah, the Jew appointed as governor by Nebuchadnezzar, he does so at the command of Nebuzaradan, and thus shows his submission to the Babylonian authority. Gedaliah himself is of the family of Shaphan, which had supported Jeremiah (26:24). Babylonian intelligence will have established that he too was likely to be sympathetic to the conqueror's cause.

The governorship of Gedaliah (significantly centred on Mizpah, a provincial city, and not rebellious Jerusalem) brings a brief revival in the fortunes of Judah. The issue for those who remain is clear: gathering to Gedaliah implies submission to Babylon, in accordance with the word of the Lord through Jeremiah (9–10). Obedience to God in this way will begin a return to normal fruitful life in the land (10). The news that the issue has been brought to a head in Judah travels fast, and it is realized by Jews in scattered places that the disaster has been the beginning of something new and wholesome. They too begin to return to the homeland, in strange anticipation of the final restoration of the people, foretold by Jeremiah (29:14). And the land bears its fruit, a sign of covenant blessing again (10–12). The remnant recalls 4:27 and 5:12. The Lord might yet work with this small community.

40:13–41:18 The murder of Gedaliah

The happy ending is not yet to be, however. Certain of Gedaliah's fighting men pick up the rumour that the Ammonite king seeks Gedaliah's life. Baalis's opposition to Gedaliah may have arisen from his hostility to Babylon (cf. 27:3), so that Gedaliah may yet become a victim of the tendency to resist Babylon, even after Nebuchadnezzar has visited Jerusalem. Baalis's Jewish agent, Ishmael, himself of royal blood (41:1), may have wished to foment further rebellion against Babylon. While certain of Gedaliah's fighting men are convinced of the plot against him, the governor himself rather naively chooses not to believe it (14). Johanan the son of Kareah, who has apparently established himself as a leading figure among the fighting men, wants to take more decisive action to preserve the community. This will in the end bring him into conflict with Jeremiah.

The treacherous murder of Gedaliah duly follows, another blow against the wise counsel of those who would wait for God to act in these trying times. The thoroughness of the crime, extending to the murder of Babylonian soldiers, suggests a determined attempt to frustrate the Babylonian policy in the area (2–3).

The immediate sequel to the murder (4–9) is interesting because it witnesses to the continuing use of the site of the temple for worship, indeed pilgrimage, even after the destruction of the temple itself. The seventh month (cf. v 1) was that in which the Feast of Tabernacles took place, and this would be the occasion of the pilgrimage. Evidently there were those in the territory of the former northern kingdom who remained loyal to the requirement of the law to appear before God at the great feasts (Ex. 23:14–17), perhaps since the reform of King Josiah (2 Ki. 22–23).

Ishmael adds to his crimes the murder of these pilgrims, by the most cynical trickery, presumably in order to try to keep his crime quiet. In sparing some for the quick benefit of provisions (8), he may have intended merely to postpone their deaths. His brutal deeds done, he flees with captives for Ammon (10).

The outcome of Ishmael's adventure is miserable and humiliating. He escapes with his life from Johanan, and little else, having to give up his human booty (11–15). Yet his interference in the life of the community which had begun to flourish under Gedaliah has a decisive and disastrous effect: Mizpah is abandoned, and with it the policy of submission to Babylon. This change of mind among the people has admittedly been occasioned by their exposure to terrible danger under what passed for Babylonian protection. In addition, reprisals from Babylon itself were feared (18). Nevertheless, in principle the same issue now confronts the people as had done before the fall of Jerusalem, namely the false promise of Egypt as refuge from Babylon. The people's thoughts, and steps, turn once again in that direction (16–18).

42:1–21 'Do not go to Egypt'

When Johanan and the people turn to Jeremiah for a word from the Lord in this new, uncharted situation (1–3), it is significant that they already stand on the road to Egypt. Jeremiah, however, takes their request at face value and promises to wait for the Lord on the matter. For him too the circumstances are new. He has been used to warning kings that the Babylonians would come. Their coming is now in the past; he needs a new word from the Lord about this residue of the people. His willingness to pray (4) suggests that the old prohibition (7:16) is now lifted. The people's declaration of their readiness to hear him is eloquent—but will it prove well based?

The word from the Lord does not come immediately; Jeremiah cannot command it (7). When it comes it is couched in familiar terms (10; cf. 1:10; 18:7–10) and represents an adaptation of the message Jeremiah has preached in the past. It still involves submission to Babylon and carries the assurance the people needed about reprisals (11; cf. 41:18). The word also testifies to the Lord's grief over the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem (10). This is not a new note in the prophecy (see on 9:1–3). However, it now looks back on the judgment, rather than forward to it. The Lord's intention for his people is now to bless, in accordance with his promises of chs. 30–33.

This prophecy is also like previous ones, however, in that it needs a response. The people must be willing to stay in the land and have faith that God can and will be as good as his word. If they do not, then there is, as ever, a dark side of the future, an alternative to the blessing which God would give. Trust in Egypt is just as much an offence to God now as it has ever been (24:8), for it represents unbelief. If the people choose to go there they will find, once again, that the way that seemed safe according to their own perception would in fact be the way of death (Pr. 16:25; Lk. 9:23–24). The irony of this is clear in v 16a; they are safe from the Babylonian sword when they stay, but will fall by the same sword should they flee from it. Egypt would prove an ineffective ally (cf. 22:20, 22). The judgment that fell on Judah would be extended right into its heart, a continuation of that same punishment (17–18; cf. 7:20; 14:12; 24:9; 25:18).

Jeremiah concludes his word from the Lord by addressing the remnant of Judah (19). The tone of his address warns that there will not, after all, be salvation through this remnant. Perceiving that their hearts were set on Egypt in spite of their protestations (41:5–6; NIV mg. ‘you erred in your hearts’ is preferable for v 20a), he proclaims that judgment will indeed come on them. It is important, however, that though Jeremiah foresees the choice they will make, the choice itself is real and the true cause of the judgment.

43:1–13 To Egypt

The truth of Jeremiah’s words to date could hardly have been more vividly demonstrated than by the recent destruction of the temple. Yet again, however, he meets the accusation that he has spoken falsely. The knowledge of the truth has never been easy for Judah, and the people had been misled before by those who claimed to know it but who spoke falsely on their own authority (23:16–18). Johanan and the others do not overtly refuse God’s will; instead they claim to know better what it is. There is, of course, self-deception in this, and no authority. The temptation to think that one’s own interpretation of God’s will is true, especially if it corresponds to what one desperately wants to believe, is real and modern. The faithful Baruch becomes the scapegoat of the new leadership (3).

The flight to Egypt ensues (4–7). This is presented as an undoing of that which God had graciously begun to do in restoring people and prosperity to the land (40:12). It is a willing and decisive abandonment of the land, involving the vestiges of the royal house (6; cf. 41:10) and even Jeremiah, a most reluctant migrant, who had spoken so often against seeking refuge in Egypt.

Even in Egypt, however, God has words for the people through Jeremiah. This in itself is a tribute to his grace and patience (and he will yet appeal to them for repentance; 44:7). The present word, however, is one of judgment. Even in Egypt, God’s punishment of his wayward people by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar will continue. In trying to save themselves from Babylon, they have put themselves instead right in the way of her battalions. Jeremiah’s prophetic sign here is meant to show the inevitability of a Babylonian victory over Egypt (which did in fact come in 568–567 BC; cf. Ezk. 29:17–20). The words of judgment on Egypt are like those uttered formerly against Judah (11; cf. 15:2). The victory of Nebuchadnezzar will be a demonstration of the feebleness of Egyptian religion (13).

44:1–14 A final appeal

The impression given in v 1 is of a settled and scattered Jewish community; the recent migrants may have joined already existing Jewish groups living there. They are addressed once more through Jeremiah, who first recalls the recent destruction of Judah as a result of long disobedience to God. The sin in question, as ever, is idolatry, the basic rejection of God, and the terms are familiar (3–6; cf. 1:16; 11:17). The memory is meant as an object lesson. The Lord is as good as his word.

The aim, however, is to turn the remnant in Egypt back to him (7–10). They continue, evidently, to worship other gods (8). The word to them, therefore, is based on their own present rebellion against God, not on the past behaviour of either themselves or their forefathers—though that was rebellious too (9). Idolatry continues, possibly now with Egyptian gods (8). The sin is the same, however, whether it persists in old practices or experiments with new ones. Punishment is sure to follow, with that element of shame which is entailed when the nations of the world look on at the fate of the people of the Lord (8b; cf. 24:9; 25:18). This, however, is the last thing God desires; he implores the people to avert the judgment (8a).

The word of judgment follows immediately, however (11–14). This reflects the determination of the people not to hear this new appeal of God. The point is not just that God knows the response beforehand, but rather that the judgment of God, when it comes, is always the consequence of wilful rejection of him, not something predetermined and irresistible. The people in Egypt continue to show that they are worthy of God's anger. The recurrence of the term remnant in these verses (7, 12, 14) is meant to insist that God's purpose to continue with his people in the future will not be fulfilled through the group in Egypt. This is consistent with Jeremiah's preaching in the days of Zedekiah (24:8–10). Yet it is remarkable that even these were given a chance to make amends and respond to God in truth at last.

44:15–30 'We will not listen'

The worship of the Queen of Heaven (Canaanite Astarte or Babylonian Ishtar) continues a practice that Jeremiah had condemned in the days of Jehoiakim (7:18). There as here whole families had been involved (15, 19). In their persistent failure to see the truth of their situation the people now use the false argument that the old days, when they had worshipped the Queen of Heaven, had been prosperous (17b–18). Jeremiah points out that it was just such worship that had brought those days to an end (20–23). There is a crooked wilfulness in the people's thinking that does not want to see this.

The last oracle of Jeremiah to the people in Egypt ironically consigns them to the fate that they have chosen for themselves. Their rejection of God will be met by what in reality they have desired—his abandonment of them (26). He will pursue his intention to punish them with the same resolve with which he will bless those who have endured the Babylonian captivity and who return to him with all their heart (27, contrast 24:6; cf. also 1:12). God's word must be fulfilled; no other has any authority (28).

The allusions to a tiny remainder of Jews who will return from Egypt (14, 28) are intended to show that it was not by these that God furthered his plans for the people. The whole Egyptian escapade was under his wrath because it was an attempt at self-salvation. It would be shown, terribly, for what it was (29–30).

45:1–5 A word for Baruch

The oracle given to Baruch comes in the year in which he helped Jeremiah prepare a scroll to be read before King Jehoiakim (36:1). It seems to come between the writing and the reading of the scroll (1) and relates to a protest of Baruch's about the burden of his task (3). We have heard nothing of this up to this point, and it falls, of course, out of chronological sequence. Baruch, however, must have shared in some of the grief and frustration of Jeremiah. God's word to him here has elements in common with his words to Jeremiah following certain of his 'confessions' (12:5–6; 15:19–21) and contains both rebuke and encouragement. The context of the word is the coming judgment of God upon the whole land of Judah (4; cf. 1:10). In such a great levelling, all human pretensions will be seen in their shabby worthlessness. Baruch is warned, therefore, to give up small ambitions, but consoled that, in the general devastation, he will live (5). A similar word of encouragement had been given to another faithful supporter of Jeremiah, Ebed-Melech (39:16–18).

46:1–51:64 Oracles against the nations

Jeremiah, as the prophet to the nations (1:5), addresses specific words to some of those which are Judah's neighbours. Oracles against other nations are a common feature in the prophetic books (cf. Is. 13–23; Am. 1–2; Ezk. 25–32). Jeremiah's oracles, in general, make the point that the coming of Babylon is God's judgment on all the nations—but that in the end Babylon too will be judged, and Judah saved from its oppression. The point was first made in 25:15–19, but now at greater length, and by way of a final word in the prophecy.

46:1–28 Against Egypt

It is natural that Egypt should have pride of place, since it has symbolized false hope and trust throughout the prophecy. The first oracle (3–12) evidently relates to the defeat of Egypt by Babylon at Carchemish on the Euphrates in 605 BC (2). It pictures the Egyptian army preparing for battle (3–4), marching proudly out of Egypt, thinking that its strength is overwhelming, like the Nile in flood (7–8). The tone is mocking, however, for the well prepared army is soon pictured in terror (5; cf. 6:25; the language once used against Judah is now turned against Egypt). The force from the Nile, swollen by mercenaries from Africa and Greece (9), is defeated on the Euphrates (6). In the clash of the Titans, the outcome is the Lord's doing, his day of vengeance, and Egypt's defeat is a kind of sacrifice (10). In her intention to conquer and grow great there will not even be healing for wounds in the natural resources of the foreign soil (11; cf. 8:22).

The second oracle (14–26) warns of the Babylonian attack on Egyptian territory itself (cf. 44:29–30; see 2:16 and 44:1 for the locations named here). In the confusion of defeat, the mercenaries decide to flee for home (16). The saying in v 17 is a play on the name of Pharaoh Hophra, and alludes to miscalculations in the Babylonian campaign. The fate of Egypt, including even exile, reminds us of the fate of Judah (19; cf. 2:15; 4:7; 9:12). Tabor and Carmel are symbols of outstanding height and fruitfulness respectively, applied here to the superiority of the Babylonian host (18). Her mercenaries gone, Egypt turns in ignominious flight, helpless before the onslaught, like a forest before locusts (21–24). The judgment is upon Egyptian gods and kings alike, and on those who rely on them—like the Jewish fugitives there (25).

The promise of restoration for Egypt is very remarkable (26b), but not unparalleled (cf. Is. 19:23–25). God is not the God of judgment only, but also of salvation, ultimately for the whole world.

The oracle against Egypt is followed by a word of comfort for the scattered people of Judah (27–28). In God's judgment of the nations there will be restoring for them. These words are repeated from 30:10–11, in the long section of prophecies of restoration for Judah.

47:1–7 Against the Philistines

The time of the Philistines' great strength was before the rise of the Davidic monarchy, several centuries before Jeremiah. The occasion in question here, however, is an attack on them by Egypt, possibly during the campaign in which Egypt fought the Babylonians at Carchemish (1). Gaza, on the coastal plain, would be on the army's north—south route. The great upheaval of nations in Jeremiah's time had dreadful consequences for many in the area. Egypt, though unable to overcome Babylon, could wreak havoc on little Philistia (2; cf. 46:7–8). The picture of suffering is extreme (3–7).

The disaster for Gaza, which has this very specific historical setting and cause, is put in the context of the Philistines' long history and seen as a punishment for all her wickedness. Its fate is God's judgment; her time has come (4a, 7). God thus asserts his sovereignty over the events of history, even when they seem to be explicable on the purely human and political level.

48:1–47 Against Moab

Moab, one of Israel's historic enemies (Jdg. 3:12–14; 2 Ki. 3:4–27), was one of the allies, with Zedekiah, against Nebuchadnezzar (27:3), but had actually supplied troops to Babylon against Jehoiakim (2 Ki. 24:2). The occasion of the present oracle is probably its own defeat by Nebuchadnezzar in 582 BC, following a rebellion.

The place-names, frequent in the chapter, are locations in Moab encompassing its whole length, east of the Dead Sea. Some of these places had been allocated by the Lord to the tribe of Reuben in the original conquest of the land of Canaan under Joshua (Nu. 32:3, 37–38; Jos. 13:15–19). This is not explicitly given as a reason for the judgment on Moab, yet a kind of completion of the holy war for Canaan may be implicit here.

The opening of the oracle (1–6) pictures the anguish of a people suffering invasion, just as Judah once suffered from Babylon (cf. 4:19–31). There follows an ironic portrayal of the fruits of false trust, namely the humiliation of exile and the triumphant removal of the image of the defeated nation's god, in Moab's case Chemosh, whom Solomon had once worshipped in his apostasy from the Lord (1 Ki. 11:7, 33). Such a demonstration of the defeated god's powerlessness was a commonplace of ancient warfare. The destroyer (8) is presumably Babylon. The curse of v 10 borrows the language of the holy war, which required root and branch destruction (cf. 1 Sa. 15:3, 11). Moab's destruction by Babylon is the Lord's own judgment on her.

Moab is depicted first as caught in its complacency (in the image of a maturing wine suddenly poured out, vs 11–12), then as brought low in her pride (14–17). Significantly, the Lord refers to himself here as the King (as also in 46:18), to stress that he alone disposes over human affairs and not the king of Moab, nor even Nebuchadnezzar, who is merely his servant (25:9). Further pictures of devastation follow (18; cf. 14:1–2, of Judah), again evoking geographically the whole land (19–25). Moab's pride is singled out as its special sin, manifested especially against Israel (26–30). The fall of the proud is great indeed (28). In her agony, the prophet himself wails for her, as he once did for his own people (31–32; cf. 9:10; cf. also v 33 with 16:9). Moab, like Judah in its turn, has become an object of scorn to all who see her (39; cf. 24:9).

The final oracle (40–47) repeats some of the main themes. The eagle is Nebuchadnezzar (40). The picture of inescapable judgment (44) reminds us of the way of arguing in Am. 5:19. The final ignominy is exile (46). The terms of vs 45–46 suggest that an ancient oracle, first recorded in the narrative of the conquest of King Sihon of Heshbon (Nu. 21:28–29), is about to be fulfilled.

After all the talk of judgment, the final note is one of salvation (47; cf. 46:26b). The language is that which is used repeatedly of the restoration of Judah in the Book of Consolation (29:14; 30:3 etc.). The God of judgment is also the Lord of grace. And his grace will not in the end apply to one people only, but even to those who have been his enemies.

49:1–39 Shorter oracles

49:1–6 Against Ammon. Ammon, like Moab an ancient enemy of Israel (Jdg. 11:4–33), had also supplied troops for Nebuchadnezzar (2 Ki. 24:2), but subsequently joined in the alliance against him (27:3). The sin of Ammon is bound up with its ancient enmity to Israel, which involves its possession, in the name of its god Molech (or Milcom), of Israelite territory (1–2). Such dispossession of Israel from its land was an offence to the God who had given it to his people and whose own name was attached to it.

Here again, the misery of a people attacked and exiled is portrayed, again with the humiliation of its god (3). (Heshbon, as a border town, may have belonged to Moab and Ammon at different times; v 3, cf. 48:2.) Typical themes of Jeremiah's are used, namely the false trust of Ammon in its own strength and wealth, and the terror which judgment brings (4–5). Ammon too, however, will enjoy restoration, like Egypt and Moab (46:26b; 48:47).

49:7–22 Against Edom. The bitterness caused by Edom's hostility to Israel, both formerly and in Jeremiah's time, was made worse by her ties of kinship, Edom being descended from Jacob's brother Esau (8; cf. Gn. 25:29–30). Edom's assistance of Babylon against Judah was the occasion of the oracle against her in Obadiah.

Edom, lying south of the Dead Sea, was evidently famous for its wisdom. (Job's 'comforter' Eliphaz was from Teman, a town in Edom; Jb. 4:1.) Its wisdom, however, cannot avert the coming disaster, which will be unsparing; nor can its mountainous caves provide safety (10). The weak among them they must leave to the mercy of the Lord (11). The cup (12) is the cup of wrath which all must drink (25:15), v 12 emphasizing rhetorically that Edom deserves to do so. Bozrah (13) was the capital of Edom in Jeremiah's day (a different place from Moabite Bozrah; 48:24).

There is no hiding place from judgment, in a land of hiding places (14–16; cf. Ob. 1–4). Some of the pictures of destruction have been used already of Judah (18–19; cf. 10:6; 23:14). The eagle is doubtless once more Nebuchadnezzar (cf. 48:40).

49:23–27 Against Damascus. Damascus stands for Syria, yet another ancient enemy of Israel; the smaller states of Hamath and Arpad, also to Israel's north, are included. Their downfall and terror are expressed in terms now familiar in Jeremiah's preaching. These kingdoms flourished well before Jeremiah's day, and he may be taking up an old oracle. The criticism of Ben-Hadad, a former king of Damascus, has become a fixed expression (cf. Am. 1:4).

49:28–33 Against Kedar and Hazor. This oracle concerns Arab nomadic tribes living to the east of Israel, akin to the ancient Midianites and Amalekites (Jdg. 6:3; cf. Gn. 25:13). Themes of terror and depopulation are struck in the oracle (cf. 6:25; 9:11). The nomads' vulnerability in their unwalled towns is picked up as a kind of illustration of false confidence.

49:35–39 Against Elam. Elam was an important power to the east of Babylon, but subject to it in Nebuchadnezzar's time. The reference to the four winds (36) is a way of speaking of the Lord's power in all the earth (Ezk. 37:9; Dn. 8:8; Zc. 6:1–8). Even Babylon's ascendancy over Elam, enabling it to do God's work of judgment on Judah and other nations, is under God's control. Elam, however, will be restored in days to come (39; cf. 48:47).

50:1–51:64 Against Babylon

The oracles against the nations finish with a lengthy series of oracles against Babylon, the 'destroyer' that has brooded over the entire book. Its giant significance in the book as the instrument of God's wrath against his faithless people is now matched by the sheer quantity of judgment sayings directed against it. It is essential to the logic of the prophecy that the destroyer should in the end be destroyed. Its mighty subjugation of other nations is not the Lord's final word in history. We know already that he will again bring salvation and blessing to his own people (chs. 30–33). In his justice, therefore, Babylon's own time must come (cf. also 25:11–12, 17–26).

50:2–17 A foe from the north. Marduk was the leading god of Babylon, the hero of her creation epic. Bel, also known from Is. 46:1, was originally separate but apparently became identified with him. The condemnation of Babylon begins appropriately with her gods. Though Judah has been exiled to the land of their pretended rule, they have not after all proved their superiority to the Lord; on the contrary, their weakness will now appear (cf. 48:7).

Babylon was once the enemy from the north as far as Judah was concerned (1:14; 6:1). Now the tables are turned (3, 9; see also 51:27–28). No power has absolute rights to rule in the earth; only the Lord has that.

As Babylon falls, so Judah is free to come again in penitence to her God, in a return which is in principle a restoration of historic Israel entire. They will seek Zion, not as the place of false trust which it had once been (7:1–15), but as the place where God had made himself known in truth (cf. Is. 2:2–4), and they will renew the ancient covenant there (5; cf. 31:31–34). The sin and punishment of Judah are now spoken of in the past tense (6–7; cf. Is. 40:1–2). The opportunity to leave the captivity has also the force of a command (8).

Chief among Babylon's sins is its scorn for God's people and his land (11). While the Lord grieved at the judgment he brought, Babylon rejoiced at the plunder. For this reason, the Lord's action against Babylon has the special character of vengeance (15). The turning of pride to shame, the bringing of desolation where there was wealth and busy life, the common topics of judgment now fall on the one who so unworthily brought them (12–15). Not only Judah, but other nations which suffered, may now return freely to their lands (16).

The first part of the oracle ends (17) with a reflection on the twin exiles of the peoples of Israel, first at the hands of Assyria, affecting the northern kingdom in 722 BC, then at those of Babylon. All has been under God, and the story has ended with the revival of his people.

50:18–32 Israel and Judah. The restoration is again pictured as that of the historic Israel in its entirety (20). The picture moves from the literal into the realm of the figurative, because northern Israel scarcely existed any more as a coherent people. This restoration of the exiles, though in itself a real salvation, is also a shadow of that which God will effect for all humankind on the soil of Judah through the Jew who would die for all on the cross.

The battle against Babylon is depicted vividly (21–24), and the war is the Lord's holy war, in which he himself prepares to fight, the destruction having something of the nature of a sacrifice about it (25–28). Once again the note of vengeance is struck, this time related directly to the temple (28). The razing of the temple was the supreme act of sacrilege and blasphemy, even though it was also God's own decree of judgment against his people. It was a challenge to the rule of God in the earth, an act of an arrogant nation (29–32). His judgment on Babylon arises, therefore, out of the need to show among the nations that he is after all the Lord of all. The victory will be symbolized in due course by the rebuilding of the temple.

50:33–46 'Their Redeemer is strong'. History has come full circle. Formerly, the Lord brought his case against his own people, Judah, convicting them of their sin; now he brings in the judgment in favour of his people (cause here is the same term as 'charges' in 2:9). In doing so he is cast as their Redeemer (34). This term is drawn from ancient Israel's customary law, according to which a widow or orphan might be adopted by another family member (see Ru. 4). In using the term of himself, the Lord emphasizes the natural bond which he has with his people. Redemption of this sort is personal and costly and draws the one redeemed into the closest possible relationship with the one who redeems. The idea is part of the OT's background to the redemption of the world from sin by Jesus Christ.

In judging finally for his people, the Lord is faithful to the promises of restoration made to them in chs. 30–33.

This implies the downfall of Babylon, whose description continues here. Many of the motifs which had formerly been applied to the judgment of Judah are now turned against Babylon, with some ironic force, e.g. the sword (35–37; cf. 14:12), drought (38; cf. 14:1), depopulation (39–40; cf. 4:29), an enemy from the north (41–43; cf. 6:22–24—a virtual repetition). The final verses (44–46) repeat 49:19–21 (against Edom), now putting Babylon in the role of the hunted. Its fall is part of God's plan for the whole world (46).

51:1–10 Zion vindicated. The Lord's turning against his former agent, Babylon, shows that he has not after all cast off his covenant people for ever; that he has not forsaken them (lit. 'left them like a widow'; 5) is the other side of his redemption (50:34). Babylon had made the earth suffer God's wrath (7; cf. 25:15); now she is beyond healing (9; contrast 30:17, of Israel/Judah). The Lord has judged for Zion (standing for both land and people, v 10; the words here are spoken by those who have now returned there). That is, he has saved his people and put them in the right; the language foreshadows what the apostle Paul would call 'justification by faith'—the salvation by God's grace of those who did not deserve it.

51:11–24 Vengeance on Babylon. Vengeance now becomes a dominant theme, brought again because of Babylon's insult to God in destroying the temple (11; cf. 50:28). The one who had a time of plenty and power now comes to its time for judgment (13; cf. 25:12). The Medes (11) were to be the new power in the ancient world, rising as the grandeur of Nebuchadnezzar's empire fell. Cyrus, whose coming is heralded by Isaiah (Is. 45:1), was the Median king who came to power in Persia, and prepared the way for the Persian Empire. The succession of apparently invincible empires in the biblical story is itself a testimony to the weakness of human strength, and the strength of God's 'weakness' (cf. Dn. 2:31–45; 1 Cor. 1:25).

Jeremiah's words against idolatrous religion, contrasting the true creative power of the Lord with the weakness of false gods (15–19), were formerly spoken against Judah (10:12–16); now they are turned on Babylon itself.

Finally in this section, the time of Babylon's might as the instrument in God's hand is recalled in commissioning words of God (20–23), only to be shown to be at an end by the addition of v 24.

51:25–32 The nations against Babylon. The onslaught of many nations upon Babylon is an ironic twist, for Babylon had in its time subdued many besides Judah, also at God's command (27:4–8). The Medes are now portrayed as leading a host of nations (28), just as Babylon had once commanded its own satellites (cf. 2 Ki. 24:2; cf. also the reversal in v 27 from 46:23). Babylon is pictured in its last desperate agony, exhausted and dispirited, its huge defences of both wall and water now useless against the enemy's strength and ruthless strategies (29–32).

51:33–44 Judah's triumph. The words of the people of Judah who have suffered under Babylon (34–35) recall Ps. 137, with its dreadful prayer against the oppressor. They are followed, however, by a word from the Lord, again promising the kingdom's fall, because he has taken up their cause (36; cf. on 50:34). Here as in the previous section reference is made to the city's abundant resources of water (36), because of its location on the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia, the 'land between the rivers'. Trust in natural resources and advantages could not protect against God's judgment.

Sheshach (41) is a coded name for Babylon (cf. 25:26). Bel (44) is one of the nation's gods (cf. Is. 46:1), which had not, despite former appearances, won a triumph over the Lord.

51:45–58 'Come out of her!' The last part of the oracle against Babylon is a command to the exiles to flee, now that their opportunity has come (45–46). The deliverance was in the end no irresistible act of God, but demanded an act of faith, obedience and courage from the people, who could be discouraged by frequent rumours of the fall of the city, raising hopes which were then soon dashed. (A similar plea is found in Is. 55:6.) The reassurance comes in answer to such fears (47–48).

Babylon's punishment is directly for its crimes against God's people (49). The pain of the latter is recalled, with a focus on the destruction of the temple (51), only to be answered by a promise that even the gods of Babylon will be brought low. All the misery which Babylon had meted out will be fully requited (56–57).

51:59–64 A prophetic sign. The oracles against Babylon close with a message and sign dated to the fourth year of King Zedekiah's reign, when the king visited Babylon, possibly to explain his part in the uprising (27:3). Seraiah, the brother of Baruch (cf. 32:12), went with the king on that occasion and bore a commission from Jeremiah to announce the demise of Babylon with a sign. The words on the scroll may have contained some or all of the oracles against Babylon in chs. 50–51, which are not dated.

Note. 'Babylon' in the NT. The significance of the Lord's judgment on Babylon is more far-reaching than the deliverance of ancient Judah. Rather, it stands here as a symbol of enmity to God's rule in the world. The language used of 'Babylon' in Rev. 17–18 owes much to the OT's oracles against her. 'Babylon' there is meant in the first place to evoke Rome's persecutions of the early church, but extends to apply to all hatred of God and his people. It is against 'Babylon', understood as every manifestation of wickedness and oppression, that Christian believers are exhorted to stand firm, with the assurance that God will, in his own time, overthrow all such defiance.

52:1–34 The fall of Jerusalem

The last chapter of the book is very similar to 2 Ki. 24:18–25:30, where the account more naturally belongs. Jeremiah, in fact, has already told of the fall of the city (in 39:18), and indeed of events thereafter in Judah (chs. 40–44). Those events are told briefly in Kings (2 Ki. 25:2–26) in a passage which is omitted in the present chapter since the information has already been given. The present account has probably been placed at the end of our book as a fitting conclusion to the oracles just recorded.

There are some minor differences from the Kings account. The note about the execution of the king's officials and his own life imprisonment (11–12) is found only here, not surprisingly in view of the interest in Zedekiah in the book. There is a difference regarding the date of Nebuzaradan's coming to Jerusalem (the tenth day according to v 12; cf. the seventh day in 2 Ki. 25:8), presumably due to a scribal error in one text or the other. Similar disagreements are found in vs 22 and 25 (cf. 2 Ki. 25:17, 19). The number of exiles in vs 28–30 is smaller than in 2 Ki. 24:14 and 16, possibly because the figure only includes adult males.

The final incident, the release of King Jehoiachin from prison, on the death of King Nebuchadnezzar, has sometimes been taken as a sign that the exile would soon come to an end. This is possible, but not in itself a firm indicator of hope.

The hope offered by the book of Jeremiah is more profound. It is a hope in the Lord of history, who brings sin under judgment, yet who promises salvation; who promises a new covenant (31:31–34), and who fulfils it in his own son, Jesus Christ (Heb. 10:11–18).

LAMENTATIONS

Introduction

Authorship and date

Since the time of the Greek Old Testament, or Septuagint (LXX; written in the century or so before Christ), the book of Lamentations has been attributed to Jeremiah. Our English versions follow the LXX and place the book together with that of the prophet. Jeremiah certainly composed laments, as we know from his prophetic book (e.g. Je. 11:18–20; 20:7–13). There are also some similarities of expression between the two books (cf. Je. 14:17 and La. 3:48–51). Furthermore we are told in 2 Ch. 35:25 that Jeremiah composed a lament for King Josiah.

Although this evidence is not conclusive, the two books do belong together in important ways. Jeremiah deals with events in Judah up to and after the fall of Jerusalem and the temple to the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BC; and the setting of Lamentations too seems to be in the period just following those dreadful events, because of its references to exile, loss of the kings and destruction of the temple (e.g. 1:3, 10; 2:2, 7).

Form and structure

The five chapters of the book are five separate poems. Their form is commonly known as a lament (some of the psalms are laments). These contain expressions of protest or complaint about misfortune, as well as confession and prayers for deliverance. Because the authors of the laments knew that God was faithful, they often expressed their belief that he would save them in the end. An example of a lament is Ps. 74, which (like Lamentations) was apparently occasioned by the exile. Lamentations has, in one place or another, all the characteristics just mentioned.

The book has certain stylistic features also. Its meter (that is, its poetic line-form), is the qinah, which is typical of the lament. Each poem (except ch. 5) is in the form of an acrostic. That is, each verse begins with a different letter in alphabetical order. Many OT acrostics have twenty-two verses or lines (e.g. La. 1, 2, 4; Ps. 34) as the Hebrew alphabet has twenty-two letters. Ch. 3 varies slightly from this, since each letter of the alphabet is represented by three consecutive verses, resulting in sixty-six verses in all.

The careful artistry of the acrostic form seems to contrast with the intense feeling that is expressed by the poems. However, all poetry is in some way artistic and need not stifle true emotion. Rather, the poet's care may be seen as an act of devotion to the Lord. It is a tribute to the restraint and discipline needed, no doubt, to approach such a theme at all. It has the further effect of suggesting a thorough, complete treatment of a theme (i.e. in its use of the whole alphabet).

Purpose

It is difficult to sum up the purpose of Lamentations. Theologically, there is acceptance that disaster is a justified judgment because of the people's sinfulness. This is based on the ancient covenant, which provided that the people's disobedience or unfaithfulness to God would result in 'curses' (Dt. 28:15–68). These were in contrast to the 'blessings' which would follow faithful obedience (Dt. 28:1–14). The prophets' preaching of judgment had had this basis also. In one sense, therefore, the book actually justifies God's action and shows that it was not because of his weakness compared to other gods that the exile had taken place. On the contrary, the triumph of Judah's enemies had actually been brought about by the Lord himself.

Nevertheless, the book also expresses the tremendous difficulty which the people had in coming to terms with the terrible suffering that followed the destruction of Jerusalem, the killing of many people and the exile of most of the rest. That suffering was scarcely easier to accept for the knowledge that it was just. Was the punishment not, after all, savage and excessive (2:20–22)? Could it be right for God to behave like an enemy to his own people (2:4–5)? The poems freely express agony and bewilderment, and it is this which gives them a force still, in any situation where people feel distressed and abandoned.

The most dramatic thing about the poems, however, is that in the midst of this most appalling suffering there can be an expression of hope in God (3:22–26), who is above all else a God of love and compassion. The position of these verses at the heart of the book seems to say that this is the most important thing which can be said about God. It is thus a very remarkable statement of faith, in the midst of great distress. Other passages too reflect the belief that an end to suffering will come (4:22).

Lamentations goes even further than this, for it speaks of a suffering that is borne by one on behalf of the many (see on 3:49–66). Most profoundly, then, the suffering of the Jews in the exile foreshadowed that of Jesus Christ in atonement for all people—the greatest demonstration both of God's judgment and of his saving love. This interpretation should make us wary of finding specific examples of God's judgment in the suffering of nations or individuals around us.

How to benefit from Lamentations today

Lamentations may seem a particularly difficult book for the modern Christian reader to use, whether because of the special events which occasioned it (events which occurred under the 'old covenant') or simply because it speaks so much of judgment. How may such a book speak to those who know the salvation of Jesus Christ?

There are several possible answers. First, the book can speak to any, including Christians, who feel alone or even abandoned by God. In this respect it is like those Psalms which we have called ‘laments’. It is good to give honest expression to such feelings and to know the reassurance of God’s grace in the midst of them.

Secondly, Lamentations can enable the reader to identify with those who are currently experiencing great adversity. In a world in which disasters, wars and famines are constantly brought before our eyes by the media, it is natural that we should ask where God is in these events. Perhaps we wonder all the more when our Christian brothers and sisters are caught up in terrible events. And we do not merely question why; we identify with their pain. The book of Lamentations enables us to express our grief, not only on our own behalf, but also on behalf of others.

The discipline which we have observed in the writing of the book can also help us. It implies that the use of the book should also be a disciplined act, a decision which we make in all seriousness, in order to face problems which are otherwise hard to face. The word of God can work in this way, not merely teaching our minds, but giving us the means of expressing that which is too deep for us, and tutoring mind and heart in the process.

The element of confession of sin is not easy to fit into this pattern. The people of Judah knew that their exile was due to their disobedience to the covenant made by their ancestors with God. We cannot treat all suffering in the same way. Nevertheless, here too we can identify with our ancestors in faith, by simply recognizing that human sin—in which each of us has a part—is the root cause of the world’s grief. The questioning and protest, therefore, can be at the same time confession. It can even be praise, because we address a God who is just. His justice does not finally issue only in judgment, but also, and decisively, in mercy. Our use of this book, therefore, must be in the light of our knowledge of Jesus Christ, who has revealed by his death and resurrection that God is redeeming his world and will one day wipe away every tear.

Commentary

1:1–22 Jerusalem's suffering

1:1–7 Jerusalem’s loss of greatness

The central thought in these verses is that Jerusalem, once favoured by the Lord, has lost all the marks of that favour. The city was a symbol of the special relationship between God and his people. In the context of the Mosaic covenant, God had made a special promise to King David that he and his descendants would reign in Jerusalem (2 Sa. 7:11–16; Ps. 2). David had made the city and nation great (the Hebrew word for ‘great’ actually appears twice in v 1, once translated full); and Solomon had graced it further with the splendid temple which he built (1 Ki. 5–8). Now the city lay in ruins. Where there had been victory over enemies, there was only defeat; where there had been prosperity, there was desolation. The fate of Jerusalem in 586 BC became a symbol for all time of the folly of human pride and complacency.

The city is frequently personified as a woman in Lamentations. The phrase Daughter of Zion (6) exemplifies this clearly. (Zion is another name for Jerusalem in Lamentations.) The feminine portrayal is exploited in the poetic contrast between widow and queen (1). The idea of her lovers (2) recalls the readiness of Judah to be unfaithful to the Lord by worshipping the gods of other nations and making political alliances with them (cf. Je. 3:1). The feminine personification shades over into pictures of feminine grief, which evoke acutely that of the people in general; hence maidenhood (4), motherhood (5b).

The theme of exile is first struck in these verses (3,5). The roads to Zion (4) are those of pilgrimage for the great annual feasts (cf. Ps. 84:5; RSV). There had been plenty of ‘religion’ in Judah, but having no true heart, it had become odious to God (cf. Is. 1:11–17). One effect of God’s judgment on the people had been to put an end to this false religion.

1:8–17 The Lord’s wrath against Jerusalem

That the suffering of Jerusalem was a result of her sin was first shown in v 5 and is now developed in these verses. ‘Uncleanness’ and filthiness (8–9) evoke the idea of ritual impurity, here extended to the sinfulness that had the effect of cutting the people off from God. The images here suggest the violence and the humiliation of the enemy invasion (8) and the desecration of the temple (10). The misery of siege and invasion was made worse by food shortage (11).

The voice in the poem has until now been that of the poet speaking about Jerusalem, though the personified city has twice spoken (9, 11). The city is now represented as speaking for herself (12–16). Her appeal to the Lord for mercy (9, 11) gives way to an appeal to those who witness her misery, because it was the Lord who had brought her grief upon her. The day of his fierce anger is elsewhere called ‘the day of the LORD’ (Am. 5:18). The idea in the background is that of the holy war fought by the Lord on Israel’s behalf against her enemies (see e.g. Dt. 2:24–25). The present passage expresses shock at the idea that he should have turned his anger against his own people. Yet even his people could not take him for granted by ignoring his covenant commands; although the temptation to do so is always present.

In all the misery there is none to comfort (16–17; cf. v 9). This is a profound picture of wretchedness, which reveals a longing for a ‘messiah’—one who would finally deliver God’s people from their sins and afflictions. The idea of ‘comfort’ after the exile is also present in Is. 40:1. It would find fulfilment in Jesus Christ, and then would be for all the world.

1:18–22 Appeal to the Lord

The last verses admit that the Lord was right in his judgment (18), yet turn quickly to an appeal to him because the city's wretchedness was so severe (20). There was disillusionment too with the falseness of other nations as friends and a source of help (19). There is terrible recognition of the truth of sin and punishment here and of the reality of the power of God alone. Again, there was no-one to comfort. Only God, and no mere ally, could do this—and it was not yet time for him to do so. The poem ends with a plea that Judah should not endure God's wrath alone, but that her enemies too should be brought to account in the day of his wrath (21; cf. v 12).

2:1–22 The Lord's anger

2:1–10 'Like an enemy'

Like the first poem, this one begins with a picture of Jerusalem's fall from grace. Daughter of Zion, splendour of Israel and his footstool are all ways of referring to the city (though the footstool was strictly speaking, the ark of the covenant; Ps. 132:7, but cf. Ps. 99:5). That he has not remembered his footstool is a way of saying that God had not kept his covenant promise (see on 1:1–7).

The Lord's anger against his people is portrayed in vs. 2–5. Not only had he 'forgotten' his covenant; he had turned actively against his own people, like an enemy (see above on 1:8–17). Not only had he withdrawn his right hand (3; cf. Ex. 6:6; Dt. 4:34), but he had actually strung his bow. These metaphorical pictures of the Lord's enmity are, of course, drawn from the terrible realities of warfare. The names of Jacob, Israel and Judah are used in this section to apply to the destruction wrought by Nebuchadnezzar in the whole land of Judah, the remnant of the former people of Israel.

From the perspective of the whole nation, the poet narrows his focus to the temple (his dwelling, his place of meeting; cf. Ex. 25:22) and the associated institutions of priesthood, sacrifices and annual feasts (6–7). The idea of making Zion forget her appointed feasts captures both Judah's own past neglect of true worship and the Lord's removal of the trappings of the false worship they performed. Neglect of true worship is neglect of God himself, nothing less than a breach of the first commandment (Ex. 20:3).

Finally, the poet turns to the city as a centre of power; king and princes had gone into exile; there was no longer a state (9). Prophets and priests had neglected their duties of teaching God's law and speaking his word. Their greater responsibility brought greater condemnation (cf. Lk. 12:48).

2:11–19 Tears like a river

The poet's own feelings now come to the forefront. His grief for his people because of their suffering reminds us of Jeremiah (cf. Je. 4:19), as do the vivid pictures of wretchedness (cf. Je. 4:31). In his own grief, he addresses the people and desperately wants to comfort them (cf. 1:2). His grief turns to anger as he recalls the failure of the responsible leaders to bring the people into the ways of obedience (14; cf. Je. 5:12–13; 23:9–40). The consequence had been the national disaster, with its humiliation. The nations around Judah were not slow to see the degradation of the once proud city (their mockery actually refers to Pss. 48:2; 50:2, with their extravagant descriptions of Jerusalem's splendour).

Yet in truth these events were the judgment of God, the covenant ‘curses’ (see the Introduction). The poet returns to the theme of weeping (18) and urges the people to turn their cries towards God.

2:20–22 Appeal to God

The final appeal (following from v 19) could be in the mouth either of the people (the I of v 22 being the city) or of the poet. (In the latter event the poet identifies strongly with the people in any case.) The appeal is a protest about the excessive severity of the punishment. Yet it is a pointer towards hope because, although there is as yet no word of reassurance, the prayer is a turning to God, as the only source of deliverance.

3:1–66 The compassions of God

The third poem is largely in the mouth of the poet himself. He speaks of his own afflictions at the hands of the Lord, in ways that remind us of Job (e.g. Jb. 19:21), the Psalms (Ps. 88:7, 15) and, perhaps most of all, Jeremiah (e.g. Je. 15:17–18). However, the individual clearly expresses the pain of the whole community, and the community’s plural voice sometimes comes to the fore (22, 40–47). The well-known passage concerning the compassions of God stands at the centre of the poem, which is intended as a place of prominence.

3:1–21 ‘He has walled me in’

The poem opens with various pictures of human distress. Darkness is a typical biblical picture for lostness (cf. Is. 9:2). Sickness is barely distinguishable from death (6), itself a shadowy non-life (cf. Jb. 3:11–19; Is. 14:18–20).

Physical pain leads to deep frustration, bordering on despair (7–9; cf. Ps. 88). The writers of the Psalms often experience God’s refusal to answer prayer too (e.g. Pss. 10:1; 13:1; 22:2). The pictures then become more violent, suggesting both the dangers that await the traveller on ancient roads and the perils of battle (10–12).

The Lord’s affliction of the poet now takes the form of his persecution by his own people (13–15). Jeremiah too drew extreme hostility from his fellow-countrymen (Je. 20:7; cf. 11:18–23). As with the prophet, so the poet’s suffering at the hands of his own people is meant to call to mind their suffering at the hands of their enemies. The poet’s hopelessness reaches its climax (16–18) when he says that he has lost his peace, or the sense of well-being that should have been the mark of a healthy relationship between God and his people.

When, however, the poet dwells on his condition, his thoughts turn to hope (just as those of the Psalmists; Pss. 42–43). As he gives rein to his memory, then his mind turns to God’s past goodness. Such use of memory is always vital in the spiritual life.

3:22–30 ‘His compassion never fails’

This central passage of the poem is one of the OT’s expressions of faith. The poet’s mind has already begun to turn from the present horrors (21), and now he thinks of the things that are always true about God. Love (22) is the term often translated ‘steadfast love’, the most typical quality of God. It is here in the plural (though not in the NIV), to emphasize that it is an enduring love that does not fail. Judgment cannot be God’s last word, for his compassion triumphs over it, albeit agonizingly. This agony is well expressed in Hos. 11:8, and has its most profound expression in Jesus' suffering on the cross—God's greatest judgment on sin and his final self-giving love for humanity.

Because love and compassion are the chief attributes of God, they are always fresh, ready to be proved and known again (23). For this reason, those who have been afflicted may always put their trust in him again, for their acceptance and restoration. God is 'faithful', or unchanging, in his love. Therefore the poet can be content that God should be his lot (portion; cf. Ps. 73:26), whatever the circumstances.

Since God is like this, it is good to seek him. To do so, however, may bring a cost, as implied by vs 27–30 (recalling again the life of Jeremiah). It may be that the goodness of God will be known only after suffering patiently endured.

3:31–39 'He does not willingly bring affliction'

The thought in the previous verses leads now to a fuller expression of the idea that affliction is not the Lord's last word. God's love and compassion will be known after grief, for he does not willingly afflict (33; cf. Ho. 6:1). For this reason, God is not one to tolerate unjust affliction—such as is sometimes brought upon human beings by their fellows (34–36; cf. Jb. 8:3). Yet when calamities come because of sin, this is no injustice (37–39). It is in this context that God can afflict—though he hates affliction.

Modern readers must take care in understanding thoughts like these. The point is that a relationship is established between judgment and salvation; the one lies beyond the other. This order is exemplified in the death then resurrection of Christ. The judgment prophecies of the OT should never lead to the conclusion that some particular affliction is a particular judgment on the sufferer.

3:40–48 'Let us return'

There is a sudden change in vs. 40–47 to a plural speaker and a confession which gives way to complaint. It is possible that the decision to return to the Lord (i.e. to repent; 40) was insincere (cf. Je. 3:22–25; 14:7–9). The Lord's forgiveness seems to have been expected as a right (42). The people went on to complain that the Lord would not hear their prayer and that, therefore, they were suffering (43–47). The implication is that he is unjust—a suggestion which the preceding verses have declared to be untrue. The final verse in this group returns to the voice of the poet, who mourns not only the suffering of the people, but perhaps their lack of understanding.

3:49–66 'You redeemed my life'

The remainder of the poem is the poet's response to the complaint of the people in the preceding verses. Here again, his own persecution stands in a sense for the people's suffering at the hands of enemies. There is in the lament, furthermore, a certain expectation that his cries would be heard (56–60, 64–66). If, then, the poet could expect deliverance from the Lord, it may be that the people could too.

The ideas of being cast into a pit (53; cf. Ps. 88:6), being overwhelmed by waters and calling on the Lord for help (54–55; cf. Ps. 18:3–6) are common enough in laments. However, the expressions here recall Jeremiah's experience in particular. He too was thrown into a pit (Je. 38:6); he knew plots against his life (60; cf. Je. 11:19; 18:18); and called on the Lord to act against his personal enemies (64–66; cf. Je. 11:20; 18:19–23).

It is no accident that the deliverance of the people, promised in vs. 22–30, involved the suffering of one who stood in their place. There is great poignancy in the fact that the suffering poet (or prophet) bore, as it were, the griefs of the people, even as he suffered at their hands. There are obvious similarities with the song about the Suffering Servant (Is. 52:13–53:12). And there is a foreshadowing of the insults and cruelty heaped on Jesus Christ by the people he came to save, even as he showed in himself the deep ‘compassions’ of God for them.

4:1–22 The horrors of siege

4:1–10 A dehumanized people

Just as gold and gems, once so prized by the people of Judah, have now been shown to be worthless (1), so the people, once God’s ‘treasured possession’ (Ex. 19:5), were now treated as if common and worthless (2). Worse, they had been brutalized by their suffering. Even motherhood, which often portrays humanity at its most compassionate, had become more heartless than the beasts (3–4; ostriches were apparently proverbial for their neglect of their young, cf. Jb. 39:13–18).

The luxury of refined living was at an end (5; cf. Am 4:1–3; 6:1), because the perversions of Judah’s life had borne their own fruits. (The word punishment in v 6 suggests both the wickedness and the natural or inevitable result of it.) To compare Jerusalem with Sodom (6) is particularly shocking, because of Sodom’s proverbial wickedness and just punishment (see Gn. 19:1–29).

The fate of the leaders is singled out for attention (6–7), because their wealth and fine appearance had belied the truth that they were unrighteous. The final picture of misery under siege dwells on the horror of lingering death by starvation and returns to the topic, more horrifically than before, of brutalized motherhood (9–10; cf. Dt. 28:53–57).

4:11–22 ‘Your punishment will end’

The focus now falls on the Lord’s wrath (11). Not only people in Judah but also other nations, we are told (12), had thought Jerusalem invincible—and one powerful enemy, Sennacherib, had dramatically failed to take it despite superior numbers (2 Ki. 18:13–19:37). All these, however, reckoned without the Lord’s determination to show his own justice, which was itself part of the covenant (13).

The theme that is now developed is that of false trust. The religious leaders had had a special responsibility for spreading this, and therefore must shoulder much of the blame. The poet’s criticism of them (which is in some ways like that of Jeremiah; cf. Je. 23:9–40) continues in the next verses. When the people were scattered among other nations in exile, even there the leaders would be specially ostracized (15) and deprived of the honour which they had taken as their right (16).

False trust was also placed in alliances with other nations (17), which implied a recognition of the gods of those nations and a failure to trust in the Lord alone. Trust in those nations quickly turned to savage attack at their hands (18–19). The danger of trusting in foreign powers had been well illustrated by the policy of King Ahaz of Judah, who had turned to Assyria for help in a former generation, only for his successor Hezekiah to find that Assyria was a false friend (2 Ki. 16:7–19; 18:13–16).

A final object of false trust was the king himself, the LORD's anointed (20), because of the people's supposition that the ancient promise to David meant an unconditional guarantee of protection from enemies.

An important part of God's intention in bringing the state of Judah to an end was to show that he himself was the only proper object of the people's trust. Lamentations stands as a witness against false trust in any institution, including a church, for salvation.

The last word in the chapter, however, is one of hope. Though Judah's enemies may briefly rejoice because of the fall of the people, the day of punishment would come for them too, for Edom as for other nations (cf. Je. 25:15, 20; 49:7–22; Obadiah). And Judah's punishment would end in a new day of grace (22; cf. Is. 40:2).

5:1–22 'Remember, O LORD'

The final poem differs from the others both in form (see the Introduction) and in perspective, apparently reflecting a period when the siege was well past. The consequences of defeat remained, however, in wretched conditions of life. The pictures of grinding hardship here are a pathetic inversion of what life in the covenant might have been.

The land, an inheritance from the Lord (2; cf. Dt. 4:21), was now controlled by foreigners—though once the Lord had driven other nations out of it in order to give it to Israel (the subject of the book of Joshua). Widows and orphans, the disadvantaged, were once commended to the people of Israel for special care (Dt. 14:28–29), now the whole people was disadvantaged like them, with neither the right to enjoy the blessings of the land, nor peace from enemies and persecutors (4–5; cf. Dt. 8:7–10; 12:9). The people could and should have been free and fulfilled, if only they had trusted and obeyed the Lord. The OT demand for trust in God is unrelenting and comes to its modern readers as to its ancient ones.

The people's reflection on their suffering because of the sins of former generations (7) recalls Ex. 20:5. It is best seen as an allusion to the people's consistency in sinning against the Lord, rather than suggesting that they were not themselves responsible for their present fate (see v 16; cf. Je. 31:29–30; Ezk. 18).

Pictures of desperate wretchedness follow (11–16): women defenceless against abuse (and perhaps made outcasts as a result); young men put to humiliating tasks; older men deprived of normal association, as well as their role in managing their community's affairs (14a); no joy, no romance (14b–15); lingering memories of atrocities against leaders (12; cf. Dt. 21:22–23 for the degradation of this fate). With Mt Zion desolate, this is a powerful portrayal of the wretchedness and potential chaos of life without God.

The poem ends (19–22) by affirming that God is indeed king. These verses themselves have the form of a lament, however, with its elements of praise together with protest and petition. The prayer in v 21 strikes a positive note, embracing both a plea to be restored not only to full relationship but also to possession of the land, and also a fresh commitment on the part of the people to return to the Lord (cf. Je. 31:18). The last verse ensures that the poem does not end on a complacent note. Nevertheless, the true nature of this poem, as of the whole collection, is one of petition. Hope can only be in a return to the Lord. The book of Lamentations shows this consistently in its exposure of the false trust of the people which had brought such dire judgment upon them. And it shows it, above all, in its moving celebration in 3:22–30 of God's love and compassion. These are the things that endure, and which remain the hope of Christians, who have seen them revealed in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Even in Christ, however, the church needs to know in its heart that its peace lies in trust and obedience.

EZEKIEL

Introduction

Historical background

The book of Ezekiel relates to one of the most critical periods in the history of Israel. The oracles in the book span a period of twenty-two years from 593 to 571 BC (see chart ‘The prophets’ in The Song of Songs). During this time the city of Jerusalem was besieged and destroyed. The temple was burnt and the monarchy brought to an end. The population of Judah suffered the deprivations of war. Many would go into exile.

From a human standpoint much of the strife of the period stemmed from the general political instability of the Middle East at that time. Palestine was a small region which was constantly affected by the changes in the balance of power in the whole region. Egypt was an ageing superpower. Assyria had begun to crumble, but Babylon was growing ever stronger. The northern kingdom of Israel had been destroyed by the Assyrians in 722/721 BC. The kingdom of Judah’s allegiances had swung between Egypt and Babylon. When king Jehoiakim attempted to rebel against Babylon, around 601–600 BC, Nebuchadnezzar responded by laying siege to Jerusalem and subduing it in 597 BC. About 10,000 of its inhabitants (2 Ki. 24:14) were carried off to exile. One of those exiles was a priest by the name of Ezekiel.

Ezekiel the prophet

All that we know about Ezekiel comes from his book of prophecies. Even there the information is scant. Ezekiel was a priest (1:3) as well as a prophet. His priestly background shows itself in his concern for ceremonial cleanness (4:14) and the emphasis on the temple (40–48). He was married but his wife died during the course of his ministry (24:15–18). Unlike his contemporary Jeremiah, Ezekiel spent his prophetic career in Babylon. Many of his earlier oracles deal with events in Jerusalem and Judah. This fact, and the details of the oracles themselves, have led some commentators to suggest that Ezekiel spent at least part of his prophetic career in Palestine. However, there is no direct statement in the book to support this view. As an exile, who prophesied to other exiles, Ezekiel undoubtedly would have been concerned about the catastrophes awaiting his homeland. His audience too would have been anxious to hear of the fate of their country. We must at least expect that events in Israel/Judah would occupy a substantial part of his prophetic work. To be able to perceive what was happening in lands distant from where he dwelt was a necessary ability for a prophet exiled in Babylon.

As a prophet Ezekiel was required to relate his insights to the people. Ezekiel sometimes used more than mere words. In several cases he acted out part of the prophecy. Visual aids are nothing new. These enacted prophecies included lying bound in ropes (4:1–8), shaving his head and striking some of the hair with a sword (5:1–2), covering his face and digging through a wall (12:3–7), trembling (12:18) and avoiding the full mourning rituals for his dead wife (24:16–24). It is no wonder that his sanity has been questioned. Yet the very strangeness of his actions, and sometimes his oracles too, served to draw attention to his message. It seems that he also suffered from a partial loss of speech for part of his prophetic career. His power of full speech returned when Jerusalem fell (33:21–22).

Despite his unusual actions Ezekiel was highly regarded as a prophet. Within eighteen months of his inaugural vision the elders of his people had begun to visit him for consultations (8:1; also 14:1; 20:1; 33:30–31). However, it seems that, while appreciated, he was not always heeded (33:30–33). It is easy to admire a moral or spiritual leader but not always so easy to put into practice the demands made. The supreme example is that of Jesus Christ (see Mt. 7:24–29).

Ezekiel was no slave to social conventions. He did not live a comfortable life in a comfortable society. He belonged to a minority group, forcibly resettled as a result of war in their home country. His religion was very much a minority one, struggling to survive in a pluralist, multi-cultural society. The powerful country where he was exiled had many gods and he had only one. Yet he firmly proclaimed the message that there was one God, who would ultimately save his people, regardless of what other nations might do.

The book of Ezekiel

Despite a reputation for obscurity and for textual difficulties, the book of Ezekiel has a very clearly defined structure. It is a collection of 52 oracles, divinely given messages or visions, described by the prophet Ezekiel. There is only the barest minimum of narrative supplied to give a context to each of the oracles. However, the beginning of each oracle is clearly indicated by one of two phrases—‘the word of the LORD came to me’ or ‘the hand of the LORD was upon me’.

These two expressions are not interchangeable. They give an indication of the type of prophecy that is to follow. The first expression is by far the most frequent. It indicates the onset of a verbal message from God which usually is to be relayed to the people of Israel. The second expression is used to indicate a more intense experience, where the prophet is affected physically. It is used in all the great visual oracles, where Ezekiel feels himself transported inside the vision itself.

The oracles are grouped according to subject-matter and are not always in strict chronological order. Each oracle is independent of its neighbours. Sometimes neighbouring oracles are separated from each other by a period of years. In general the construction of the book bears the mark of a clearly organized mind. This impression is reinforced by the repeated use of set phrases and the almost rhythmic nature of many parts of the text.

The nature of the subject-matter means that the first thirty-two chapters consist of warnings of disaster, and the last sixteen consist of promises of hope. The turning point in the book is the fall of Jerusalem, as given in 33:21–22. It laid the foundation for what has come to be called ‘Apocalyptic’ literature. Indeed its strongest influence is to be seen in the book of Revelation, where much of the symbolism is similar to that in Ezekiel (see article: Apocrypha and Apocalyptic).

The message of the book

As a whole the book of Ezekiel consists of initial warnings of calamity followed by promises of restoration. Just as the calamities that were forecast came to pass, so would the promises of restoration be fulfilled. The people of God, having endured so much in the past, would ultimately be saved from their misery. Israel would return to their God and to their promised land. They would be his people and he would be their God.

Several other themes appear throughout the oracles. The issue of human responsibility occurs in several forms. The destruction that would befall Israel came as a result of her own waywardness. It was because of her idolatry that she was punished. However, it was not the case that guilt was purely a communal issue. Individuals were not punished simply because of the sins of their ancestors (ch. 18). They were held guilty because of what each of them as an individual had done, but this issue is refined still further. Being accounted righteous was not a matter of storing up plus points to offset the minus ones (a view commonly held even today). There had to be a fundamental, enduring change of heart in the individual (18:30–32).

Another important theme is the relationship of God to his people. One phrase which occurs very frequently throughout the book is that the events forecast would occur ‘so that they would know’ that he was their Lord. The calamities were not merely punishment. They were also a means of bringing people to a knowledge of their God. This special relationship is emphasized throughout the book. He would gather and protect them just as a shepherd cares for his sheep. A Shepherd would come to tend them and to rule over them (34:1–31; 36:24–28).

Yet the close relationship between the Lord and the people of Israel did not mean that other nations and lands were outside the sphere of this authority and control. Ezekiel’s oracles to the foreign nations make it clear that God was not simply a parochial deity governing Jerusalem and its surrounding hills. In some ways a heathen nation could be God’s instrument, even to the point of punishing Israel.

The images in the book of Ezekiel can be disturbing. Ezekiel’s oracles relate to one of the darkest periods in Israel’s history. During his prophetic career his people would be dispersed and the city of Jerusalem and the temple destroyed. Yet the book ends in messages of hope. In the end-time the Shepherd would come to gather his sheep.

Ezekiel for today

The book of Ezekiel does have passages that are difficult to interpret and even more difficult to apply. It may be of comfort for the modern reader to know that even the ancient rabbis had to ponder long and hard over the book’s contents. There is also an unfortunate tendency to be attracted to the more obscure passages at the expense of the more straightforward ones. However, several points are of use when approaching the book. First, it is important to remember that the book is a collection of independent oracles. These are always identified by the expressions ‘the word of the LORD came to me’ or ‘the hand of the LORD was upon me [Ezekiel]’. The oracles are grouped thematically although not always in strict chronological order and may range in size from a few verses to several chapters. We know from those which are dated that sometimes a gap of several years can separate them, so it is best to select a single oracle, read it right through, and consider it on its own.

Secondly, Ezekiel tends to be written to a formula, almost poetic prose. There are themes and expressions which recur throughout the book. A phrase which can seem mysterious in one section may be clearer in another. It is helpful, therefore, to start with some of the less 'exciting' passages in order to get a sense of the language and thought of the book. For this reason it is better not to begin with the initial chapters. The larger oracles of 1:1–3:15; 8:1–11:25; 38:1–39:29 and 40:1–48:35 should be tackled last. A possible entry point might be the start of ch. 12.

Thirdly, it is also helpful to bear in mind the general themes linking the oracles. Chs. 4–24 contain warnings about the impending destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Chs. 25–32 contain warnings to Israel's neighbours about their attitude to Israel in her time of need, and chs. 33–48 contain messages of hope for the people of Israel after the fall of Jerusalem.

The political situation of the people of Israel at that time was obviously quite different from that of today. Yet behind the political specifics we see a complicated society burdened with familiar, messy issues: uncertainty about the future; international upheavals; religious pluralism; institutional corruption; faith in turmoil. Modern society has its own idols, false prophets, corrupted sanctuaries, decadent institutions and national bigotries. They have different names, but the words of Ezekiel can still apply to them.

There is a danger in applying to today too precisely what happened two and a half millennia ago, especially when similar place names occur (particularly Israel). Nevertheless the general outline of society's problems is so similar today that the principles can be easily applied. Society and God do not change.

Commentary

1:1–3:21 Ezekiel's commission

1:1–3:15 Ezekiel's call

The book of Ezekiel starts as it means to continue. After the briefest of narrative introductions we are presented with the first in the series of oracles that constitute the book. This initial oracle belongs to the group of highly visual prophecies that are prefaced by the expression 'the hand of the LORD was upon me'.

Although not explicitly stated, this oracle represents Ezekiel's commissioning as a prophet. The vision was intense: we are told that the prophet sat stunned for several days after it (3:15). In the vision he sees a radiant being seated on a sapphire throne below which dash four futuristic creatures. He hears a voice which tells him that he is to be sent to declare what the Lord says to the people of Israel in exile. He is warned about the stubbornness of the people, yet he must speak, whether they listen or not.

There is much in this vision which is not explained, especially in relation to the cherubim and their accompanying wheel-like guides. The general sense of the symbolism is to convey the all-encompassing majesty of God. The fearsome cherubim each displayed faces representing the highest forms of life—man, the lion (king of the beasts), the ox (foremost of the domestic animals) and the eagle (chief of the birds of the air). They travelled 'like flashes of lightning' accompanied by their all-seeing wheel-guides. Yet these magnificent creatures were but throne attendants. They stood beneath the throne of God. If the attendants were awesome how much more so was the King himself.

Ezekiel was told that he was to be sent to the people of Israel and his message would contain warnings and woes, but he would find them sweet (3:1–4). The whole experience changed Ezekiel's life. He would be empowered to deliver his message, despite his people's resistance to it. He needed such strengthening, for his task would not be easy.

It was not through reason, or cold logic, or contemplation of long-term benefits that Ezekiel sensed his prophetic calling. It was because he had glimpsed the awesomeness and majesty of God. The commands of God are easier to follow when we contemplate who has issued them.

1:1–3 Ezekiel, son of Buzi, experiences visions sent from God. 1:4–14 He sees a great, radiant cloud, the centre of which glows like molten metal. Four creatures can be seen in its fiery centre. They have a human form, but each has four faces and two sets of wings. The faces are like those of a man, lion, ox and eagle. The creatures dash back and forth like flashes of lightning. 1:15–21 Each of them is accompanied by something glittering and round like a wheel. The wheels go wherever the creatures go. The sound of the creatures' wings is like a great roar. 1:22–28 Above the cherubim lies what looks like a spread of glittering crystal. On top of this there seems to be a sapphire throne, which bears a glowing, radiant figure. The radiance is like a rainbow. It is the glory of the Lord. 2:1–8 Ezekiel is told by a voice that he will be sent to the Israelites, a stubborn people in constant rebellion against God. He is to prophesy to them, regardless of whether they listen or not. He is not to be afraid or to rebel. 2:9–3:3 Ezekiel is given a scroll containing words of lament and mourning. He is commanded to eat the scroll. Upon doing so he discovers that it tastes as sweet as honey. 3:4–11 He is warned that the Israelites will not want to listen to him. Accordingly he will be given the strength of will for the task. He is told to go immediately to his compatriots in exile and to relay God's message to them. 3:12–15 Transported back to be with the exiles, he sits stunned for seven days.

Notes. 1:1 'In the thirtieth year'—we are not told what this date refers to. One possibility is that it was the prophet's age. The 'Kebbar River' was a canal of the Euphrates which lay to the south-east of Babylon. 2 'Fifth year' of the exile—593 BC. 5 The 'four living creatures' are the throne attendants. They are called 'cherubim' in ch. 10. 15–21 'Wheels'—the ancient interpreters took the text to be describing a kind of chariot. The nature of its wheels enabled it to travel effortlessly in any direction. 16 'Chrysolite'—a type of rock. 22 'expanse'—the same word is used in Gn. 1:6–8. The idea here is of a firm platform which separates the cherubim from the throne. 28 'Appearance of the likeness'—Ezekiel is careful not to say that he saw God. 2:1 'Son of man'—this expression occurs over 90 times in Ezekiel. In this book it is a reference to the fact that Ezekiel is a mere human—'mortal'. 10 Scrolls were normally written on one side only. The fact that this scroll was written 'on both sides' may indicate the fullness or completeness of the message. 3:1 'Eat this scroll'—Ezekiel was to absorb the message he was to receive. He was not just a transmitter of divine signals. God's words were for him as well. 11 'In exile'—Ezekiel's immediate audience would be his fellow exiles in Babylon. 14 'Bitterness and ... anger'—these intense emotions were probably stirred by the sense of the obstinacy of Israel (cf. 3:5–8). 15 'Tel Abib'—a 'tel' is a hill or a mound. The name is identical to the modern Tel Aviv, though the two places are very far apart.

3:16–21 The accountability of the watchman

After spending several days recovering from the trauma of his initial vision, Ezekiel receives a second, brief message. This time his responsibilities are outlined, together with the penalties for shirking his duties (cf. 33:1–9). The privilege of being called to be a servant of God brings with it responsibilities. The faithful execution of these responsibilities is more important than whether they seem to succeed or not.

17 Ezekiel is made a watchman for Israel, to relay God's messages to them. 18, 20 If he does not convey God's warnings to someone, he will be held responsible for that person's fate. 19–21 By conveying the message he will have done his duty, even if the recipient of the message ignores it.

Note. 14 'Watchman'—the watchman's task was to keep a look-out for any danger which was threatening the city.

3:22–24:27 Warnings about the coming destruction of Jerusalem

3:22–5:17 Enacted messages: the siege of Jerusalem foretold

Ezekiel's first set of prophetic acts were as much visual as verbal. He had an uncomfortable message to bring to the people of Jerusalem: they were to come under siege. Furthermore, the siege would be so long that food would become scarce. A third of the people would die of starvation or disease. Another third would die in fighting around the city. Most of the remainder would be dispersed and only a few would remain.

In order to convey this grim message Ezekiel was to use a striking method. He was to symbolize the siege. It seems that he lost the power of normal speech at this stage, and would only be able to speak when he had an oracle to declare (3:26–27). This partial loss of speech continued until news of the fall of Jerusalem reached him (33:22; cf. 24:27). There would be other enacted messages too (12:1–16; 17–20; 24:15–27), but this first one must have established his reputation as one of the odder prophets of Israel.

We might find Ezekiel's method of conveying his message unorthodox, even amusing or embarrassing. However, it is more important to communicate the message than to preserve the popular image of the speaker.

3:22–23 Ezekiel is told to go out to the plain. When he does so, he sees the glory of the Lord, and collapses. 3:24–27 He is then instructed to go and restrict himself to his own house. He is also informed that he will become incapable of speech—except when he is delivering a message from God. 4:1–8 He is told to make a small model which would represent Jerusalem under siege. He is to lie, bound up, on his left side for 390 days. During this time he is to bear the sins of Israel. He then has to lie on his right side for 40 days, bearing the sins of Judah. Each day represents a year. 4:9–17 During the 390 days he is to subsist on meagre rations, thus indicating the food scarcity which would hit Jerusalem. He avoids having to defile the food, yet similar defilement would occur when the people of Israel were exiled to foreign nations. 5:1–4 He is told to shave his head and face. When he has finished depicting the siege, he is to burn a third of his hair inside the city. Another third is to be struck by the sword all around the city. The remaining third is to be scattered to the wind. A few strands are to be tucked away in his cloak; a few others are to be burnt. 5:5–17 Jerusalem has rebelled against God's laws. Therefore his proclamation is: 'I am against you, Jerusalem, and will punish you. Because of your idolatry and detestable practices, a third of your people will die of plague or famine inside you. Another third will die by the sword outside your walls. The last third will be dispersed and harried. Then my anger shall cease and they will know that I am the Lord. You will be a warning to other nations when your punishment arrives.'

Notes. 3:23 'The glory of the LORD'—as Ezekiel had seen in 1:28. 25 'You will be bound'—cf. 4:8. Ezekiel was tied with ropes during the time he enacted this prophecy. 4:1 'Clay tablets' or later 'a brick', soft clay tablets were used as writing 'paper'. 3 'Iron pan'—it could represent the strong grip of the siege. 5 '390 days'—attempts have been made to explain them in terms of the length of the exiles: Judah's for a generation (about 40 years) 586–536 BC, Israel's for about 150 years 734–580 BC (the LXX reads 190 years, which is taken as the total for both exiles). This is not a satisfying explanation. Perhaps it is better to see the years as representing depth rather than length: Israel's unfaithfulness is about ten times worse than Judah's. 10–11 Ezekiel's rations came to about 200 grams (8 oz) of cereals and 0.6 litres (1 pint) of water. These were meagre amounts, symbolizing the scarcity of food (v 17). 5:1 Shaving the head was a sign of mourning. 17 The four scourges mentioned here—plague, famine, wild beasts and bloodshed (war)—recur several times throughout the book.

6:1–14 Prophecy against idolatry in Israel

Although this prophecy is directed against the mountains of Israel the real targets for condemnation are the sanctuaries or ‘high places’ which were to be found in the mountains. A high place was an open-worship site of Canaanite origin. Some of the people used these sites to worship the Lord, but many of the pagan idolatrous practices were retained. The warning is that the impending doom that awaited the city would also hit the surrounding regions. The practitioners of high place worship would not be saved by their idols. Yet the coming events were not just a form of punishment. The expression ‘they will know that I am the LORD’ is repeated throughout the oracle (vs 7, 10, 13, 14). The worshippers at the high places would come to know which gods were false and which one was real.

Idol worship at the high places was a perennial problem for Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 12:28–33; 2 Ki. 17:9–11). Although Ezekiel would later attack the ‘newer’ sins acquired by Israel from their neighbours, some of the oracles deal with these older problems. Wrongful practices, even if institutionalized by centuries of tradition in a society, still remain wrong.

1–7 Proclaim to the mountains of Israel: ‘I am about to bring a sword against you. Your high places and other places of worship will be wrecked. Your inhabitants will be slain before their idols. You will then know that I am the LORD.’ 8–10 ‘But some will be spared. In the nations to which they are dispersed, they will remember me and despise themselves for what they have done. They will know that I am the LORD.’ 11–14 ‘Bemoan and lament the wicked practices of Israel, for sword, famine and plague shall overtake them. When the people lie fallen around their idols and shrines, and their land lies waste, then they will know that I am the LORD.’

Notes. 11 ‘Alas!’—many commentators suggest that there are overtones of scorn or taunting here. 14 ‘From the desert to Diblah’—i.e. throughout the whole of the land.

7:1–27 Warning of imminent disaster for Israel

The sense of urgency in this prophecy is acute. The calamity that was forecast for the land of Israel is about to take place. There is no longer any time to change one’s mind. War is imminent; Jerusalem will be besieged and its land laid waste.

1–9 Proclaim to the land of Israel: ‘The end is now upon you! There will be no pity. When you have been repaid for your practices you will then know I am the Lord.’ 10–14 ‘The time has come.’ 15–22 ‘Sword, plague and famine await you. Those who survive will be filled with shame and despair. Their wealth will be of no use to them—it will be plundered.’ 23–27 ‘The most evil of nations will seize their property. There will be no respite. Even the king will mourn. They will be judged according to their own standards. Then they will know that I am the Lord.’

Notes. 10 ‘The rod has budded, arrogance has blossomed’—violence and pride will now bring their own reward. 12 ‘Let not the buyer rejoice’—the oncoming crisis will render it foolish to conduct normal business activity. 15 ‘Outside is the sword, inside are plague and famine’—those who are left outside the city will be cut down by the enemy troops. Those inside the city will suffer a siege. Starvation and disease will ensue. 19 ‘Silver and gold’—as the siege intensifies money will be of no help in getting food. 23 ‘Prepare chains’—chains of captivity.

8:1–11:25 Jerusalem’s idolatry and its punishment

In this great vision Ezekiel finds himself transported in a trance to the temple in Jerusalem. There he is shown the dire state of Israelite religion. The very temple grounds themselves are used for pagan practices. Retribution follows, and Ezekiel then becomes aware of the majestic throne and awesome creatures which he had seen in his initial vision—the glory of God. There will be retribution for those plotting social injustice in the city. Yet the prophecy concludes with a promise that the exiles will return to their land.

Syncretism—the mixing of elements from several religions—is one of the easiest paths to follow. Would-be believers can hedge their bets and keep all the gods happy. Yet the God of Israel is a jealous God. There can be no other contenders for a person's worship and devotion. In our multi-faith, pluralistic societies this emphasis needs to be made and is often misunderstood. Yet our compromising is no less abhorrent to God than the pagan practices here described.

8:1–4 Ezekiel has a vision in which he is transported to the temple in Jerusalem. There he sees the glory of the Lord—just as he had done on the plain. Then he is shown various examples of the idolatry being practised. He sees: an idol erected at an entrance to the altar (8:5–6); seventy elders of Israel worshipping animal motifs inscribed on the walls (8:7–13); women in mourning for the god Tammuz (8:14–15); twenty-five men worshipping the sun (8:16–18).

9:1–6a A man is commanded to place a mark on the foreheads of all those in Jerusalem who deeply regret such practices. The man begins to execute the command. Six other men are then told to kill anyone in Jerusalem who does not have the mark. 9:6b–7 They start with the elders in the temple. 9:8–10 Ezekiel's pleas for leniency are rejected on account of the great violence and injustice in Israel and Judah. 9:11 The man who had to mark the people's foreheads completes his task. 10:1–6 He is then instructed to take burning coals from beside the cherubim and to scatter them over Jerusalem. 10:7–8 One of the cherubim hands the fiery coals to him. 10:9–22 The four cherubim are each accompanied by something like wheels. These cherubim and wheels are the same as Ezekiel has seen before.

11:1–7 Ezekiel is taken to the east gate of the temple. The Lord shows him a group of twenty-five men, who are plotting evil and giving wicked advice. Ezekiel is commanded to prophesy to them. 11:7–12 God knows their thoughts. They have killed many in the city, but will be driven from it and punished by attacking foreigners. They did not keep God's laws. 11:13–15 In the course of the prophecy, one of the group, Pelatiah son of Benaiah, dies. Ezekiel asks the Lord in alarm whether the remnant of Israel is to be wiped out entirely. He is told that those now dwelling in Jerusalem think that the exiles are no longer fit to inherit the land of Israel. He is commanded to tell them: 'Although you are exiled, I have still been with you. I will gather you back to the land of Israel. Those who return will remove its idols. They will have a new heart and follow my laws. They will be my people, and I will be their God. Those devoted to the idols will reap their reward' (11:18–21).

11:22–25 The glory of God moves to a mountain east of Jerusalem. Ezekiel is then transported back in his vision to the exiles in Babylon. He tells them all that he has seen.

Notes. 8:1 'Sixth year'—592 BC. 'Elders'—only 14 months after his counselling vision Ezekiel has reached the stage where even the elders of Israel visit him for a consultation (cf. 14:1; 20:1). 2 'Like that of a man'—in this and subsequent verses Ezekiel is noticeably vague in his descriptions of the human-like being he saw. He is careful to emphasize that what he saw was how it appeared to him, and not what actually were the physical attributes of the divine messenger. 3 'North gate'—in his vision Ezekiel is transported to the temple in Jerusalem. 'Idol that provokes to jealousy'—possibly an image of Asherah, a fertility goddess. Unlike the idols mentioned later in this chapter, this image was in public view. It was a provocation; it was there to cause passers-by to follow its ways; it would incite resentment among the faithful Israelites; but ultimately it invoked the jealous displeasure of God. 4 ‘Glory of God’—it was still there despite what was going on in the temple. 7–12 Ezekiel is now shown idolatry of a more secretive nature. 10 ‘Portrayed’—i.e. inscribed, carved. 11 ‘Seventy elders’—i.e. a substantial proportion of the elders of Israel. 14 ‘Tammuz’—(also called Dumuzi) was a Babylonian god whose worship included laments for his descent into the underworld. 16 The added insult here is that the sun-worship took place right in front of the temple altar. 17 ‘Putting the branch to their nose’—possibly another ceremonial gesture connected with the sun-worship. 9:1–11 This passage is strongly reminiscent of other apocalyptic passages of final judgment. 9:3 The glory of the Lord begins to leave the temple. The message is clear. God’s patience with his people is long-lasting but it is not everlasting. If we persist in our idolatrous ways he must depart and finally leave us to it. 9:4 ‘Put a mark’—the mark was the letter taw, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, which would have looked like an x. The mark served to differentiate those who had been faithful from those who had not. 10:1 ‘Throne of sapphire’—this corresponds with Ezekiel’s initial vision (cf. 1:26). 10:2 ‘Cherubim’—the majestic creatures of ch. 1 are now identified as cherubim. These mythological beings are described as standing under, or perhaps even supporting, the throne of God. Their role here as attendants to the Lord would fit with their depiction on the lid of the ark of the covenant (Ex. 25:18–22) and with other OT references which portray the Lord as ‘enthroned upon the cherubim’ (1 Sa. 4:4; 2 Sa. 6:2; 2 Ki. 19:15; 1 Ch. 13:6; Ps. 80:1; cf. Ps. 18:10). They could vary somewhat in appearance; in Ezk. 41:18–20 a two-headed variety is described. 10:14 ‘Cherub’—one of the four faces is described as that of a cherub and not as ox as in 1:10. The difference may be due to a scribal slip (cf. 10:22). 11:3 ‘Will it not soon be time to build houses?’—the exact translation of the first half of this verse is uncertain, but the general thrust of the verse is that the conspirators were trying to read the signs of the times and had come to the conclusion that they would be the elite among Jerusalem’s society. They would be prime cuts, not the offal (cf. vs 7, 11). 11:13 ‘As I was prophesying’—i.e. in the course of the vision. 11:19 ‘Heart of stone’—‘flesh’—a theme which would be repeated later (cf. 36:26). 11:23 The glory of the Lord finally leaves the city.

12:1–16 An acted message: exile foretold

In this oracle and its successor Ezekiel is to act out part of the message he has to convey. Although his prophecy is about the coming fall of Jerusalem, it is intended primarily for his fellow-exiles in Babylon. The message has two elements. The people of Jerusalem would suffer exile. The prince (Zedekiah) would attempt to flee the city but would be caught (cf. 2 Ki. 25:4; Je. 39:4). The passage also hints at Zedekiah’s fate: Ezekiel is to cover his own eyes (12:6, 12, 13). Zedekiah would be caught and blinded (2 Ki. 25:7).

Ezekiel had to resort to acting the grim message of both this oracle and the next one. It was a means of conveying information to some who would otherwise not listen. Many people will hear only what they like to hear. Sometimes they have to be surprised into new knowledge. For Christians this must be seen as a challenge to examine our means of communicating the Good News. Fresh approaches may be more enlightening than traditional ones.

1–6 To Ezekiel God says: ‘Your people are rebellious. They only see and hear what they want to (2). Therefore perform these actions before them—they may understand: During the day pack what is needed for a journey into exile. Then set out on that journey from where you are and go to another place (3–4). In the evening make a hole in a wall, and go through it, carrying your pack on your shoulder. Wear a blindfold. Through this I have made you to be a sign to Israel' (5–6).

7–14 Ezekiel does as he is commanded. The next day he receives the second part of the message, which he is to relay to Israel when they ask him what he is doing (7–10). He is to explain that he is a sign to them (11). To the people he is to proclaim that these actions concern the prince of Jerusalem and the whole of Israel. They will go into exile and captivity. The prince will shoulder his pack at dark and leave through a hole in the wall. He will be caught and brought to Babylon, where he will die (11–13). His followers will be dispersed to foreign lands. Some will survive to recount their evil acts. Then they will know that I am the LORD (14–16).

Notes. 5 'Dig through the wall'—the word for 'wall' here indicates a wall of a house, not the city wall. The mud-brick walls of the house could be dug through. This action would indicate the desperate nature of the flight into exile. 16 'sword, famine and plague'—a common trio in the book of Ezekiel. The destruction of war engendered starvation and disease.

12:17–20 An acted message: Israel to tremble

The trauma of the coming attack on Jerusalem and its surrounding territory is to be acted out by Ezekiel's trembling. He is told to tremble as he takes his food and drink. He is to proclaim that those living in Jerusalem and in Israel would eat in anxiety and fear on account of the widespread violence. Town and country would be laid waste. Then they will know that God was their Lord.

Note. 19 'Eat ... in anxiety'—cf. 4:16 where the emphasis of the acted message (cf. 4:9–17) is more on the scarcity of food.

12:21–25 Prophecy will be fulfilled ...

Ezekiel was not the only one claiming to offer messages from God (cf. 13:1–23). The people could, with some justification, come to the conclusion that all these prophecies would never come to pass. Many had proved false before. Ezekiel warns that this time it would be different.

There are many 'stock comforts' that people use when confronted with uncomfortable truths. Here we meet one of them: 'It will never happen'. A second one is to be found in the following oracle: 'It may happen, but not for a long time'. Ezekiel is to proclaim to Israel: 'The days when there are prophecies which do not come true are coming to an end. Soon every vision will be fulfilled. What I declare will not be delayed—it will be done in your lifetime'.

Note. 22 'Proverb'—the seeming failure of prophetic forecasts had become proverbial.

12:26–28 ... and fulfilled soon

It was perhaps as a result of the preceding oracle that some people revised their opinion of Ezekiel's prophecies. They accepted that Ezekiel's warnings could be right, but would only be fulfilled in the distant future. As with today, it was easier to pass a problem on to the next generation than to face it squarely. 'After our time will come the deluge.'

26–28 To Ezekiel the word of the Lord is: 'Israel thinks your prophecies are about the distant future' (27). But he is to proclaim: 'None of my words will be delayed any longer. What I declare will be fulfilled' (28).

Note. 27 'Vision'—cf. 7:26; 12:22.

13:1–23 Condemnation of false prophets and prophetesses

This oracle condemns two types of false prophets. The first grouping was would-be prophets who thought they really could divine the future. They expected their pronouncements to be fulfilled. Their messages were the sort people would like to hear (10). Yet despite their sincerity and their comforting messages they were wrong. The falsehood of their utterances would be exposed. It is not enough to be sincere. You can be sincerely wrong.

The second grouping of false prophets had darker elements. For a start the prophetesses of this type operated for gain (19). Practising religion purely for economic reward is condemned in the Bible. Furthermore, they spiced up their act with some magic, possibly using a voodoo-like control over people (18, 20, 21). Their actions had led to injustice, even death (19). Surprisingly, the condemnation of these witches is less severe than that of the first type of prophet. They would lose their power over the people and no longer practise their false prophecies. Perhaps their profession had resulted from economic necessity rather than malicious desire.

1–15 Ezekiel is to proclaim to the false prophets: ‘Woe to you! You have not helped Israel in her time of need. Your visions are false yet you foolishly expect them to come true (1–7). I the Lord am against you because of your false visions (8). You will not belong to the council of the people, or be listed in the book of the house of Israel, nor will you enter the land of Israel (9). You have given my people false comfort and a false sense of security (10–12). That security will be destroyed. With its demise will come yours too. Then you will know that I am the Lord’ (13–15).

16–21 To the false prophetesses Ezekiel must proclaim: ‘You practised magic for gain. Your lies have led to acts of injustice being done (18, 19). I am against your magical devices and will rip them from you. I will break your hold on the people. Then you will know that I am the Lord’ (20, 21).

22–23 ‘You discouraged the upright and encouraged the unjust. Your practices will be stopped, then you will know that I am the Lord’ (22, 23).

Notes. 4 ‘Jackals among ruins’—instead of trying to pick up the pieces and help people rebuild their lives, these prophets, like scavengers, were feeding off the remnants of the community. 9 Their punishment is threefold, resulting in ostracism from the Israelite society. They would be banned from the council i.e. lose any status as a leading citizen; they would be struck off the main community records, thus losing their rights as Israelite males; and they would be prevented from returning to Israel. 10 ‘Whitewash’—the image might look good, but the reality underneath was weak and insubstantial. 18 ‘Magic charms ... veils’—the exact ways these women practised their magic is unclear. The purpose of their magic was to ensnare and control their victims. 19 ‘Barley ... bread’—this was their meagre fee.

14:1–11 Condemnation of idolatry

As a prophet Ezekiel would have been consulted by the exiles for a message from God. It seems that his status was such that even the elders of Israel came to him to ‘enquire’ of the Lord i.e. to hear an oracle (cf. 20:1–3).

On this occasion it was revealed to Ezekiel that the elders had divided loyalties. They worshipped other gods in addition to the Lord. The message Ezekiel delivered was direct: they were to repent and turn from their idolatry. Anyone attempting both to worship idols and to consult a prophet of God would be punished. If such a prophet yielded to their requests he would be punished too. (See 20:1–44 for a similar topic.)

There is no indication that the elders did not have a belief in the God of Israel. Their problem was that they also had other gods. No-one can serve two (or more) masters (Mt. 6:24). There can be only one. Against the background of today's pluralism it may seem attractive to keep our options open and acknowledge many gods. The truth faces us when we become more deeply involved in one religion and find that it is incompatible with the rest. For instance, if Christ is the true way to God (John 14:6–7) other 'ways' cannot be contemplated.

1–11 God speaks to Ezekiel concerning the elders: 'These men worship idols—should I let them consult me?' (2–3) He is to proclaim to them: 'Repent and turn from your idolatry. If an Israelite—or a foreigner living in Israel—practises idolatry, and then seeks to consult me through a prophet, he will get a direct response: he will be made an example of and will be cut off from the people. Then you will know that I am the Lord (4–8). If that prophet utters a prophecy, I enticed him to do so. He will be cut off from Israel. He is as guilty as the other one who consults him. Then Israel will no longer stray. They will be my people, and I will be their God' (9–11).

Notes. 7 'Alien'—the prohibition is applied to non-Israelite too. 9 'Enticed'—if the prophet were worthy of his calling, it would be revealed to him (as in Ezekiel's case) that he should not give a prophecy at a consultation. If the prophet were not worthy, God would let him be seduced into uttering a prophecy, and that prophet would suffer the consequences.

14:12–23 Judgment on Israel will not be averted by the righteous few

Several of Ezekiel's oracles deal with the issues of guilt and responsibility (3:16–21; 18:1–32; 33:1–20). This oracle makes the point that a community cannot expect to escape punishment for its guilt by relying on the righteousness of a few of its members. A corrupt society cannot expect to be exonerated on the grounds that it has a few saints in its midst. Nor can having a godly ancestor atone for the faults of a corrupt family (16, 18, 20). Ezekiel warns Jerusalem not to make such a mistake. Its retribution was coming, though some would be saved.

The oracle depicts the 'four dreadful judgments' which will afflict the land; famine (13–14), wild beasts (15–16), the sword (17–18) and plague (19–20). Such disasters were not unrelated. A debilitating war would bring with it famine, sickness and predators. There has been much debate whether modern disasters, have any direct connection with God's judgment. Ezekiel's grim message is that some natural disasters are divine punishments. Yet note that Ezekiel's task is not to exult, but to warn, so that people may turn from their ways.

12–23 To Ezekiel the Lord says: 'If I punish a country for its unfaithfulness by sending famine upon it, even those with exemplary characters would only be able to save themselves (13, 14). If wild beasts were sent to stalk the land, or if war were declared against the country, or if a plague were to spread across the country, those with blameless characters would only be able to save themselves. Not even their sons and daughters would be saved (15–20). Thus will it be for Jerusalem, though some will be saved' (21–22).

Notes. 14 'Noah, Daniel and Job'—these three are singled out because of their outstanding righteousness. The name 'Daniel' is spelled differently from usual (cf. also 28:3) and may refer to a hero from Ugaritic literature. Most commentators believe that the Daniel of the OT would not yet have established his reputation. 21 'Four ... judgments'—the same four are used in Rev. 6:8.

15:1–8 Jerusalem the useless vine

Usually the vine is seen as a productive and valuable plant in OT imagery and as a picture of Israel, God's chosen people (cf. Is. 5). In this oracle it is pointed out that the wood of the vine is of practically no value. It is of even less value after the fire has scorched it. The people in Jerusalem had been like that vine. Little good had come from them before the siege (in 597), and there was no improvement afterwards.

Punishment does not necessarily bring penitence. Changing the heart is the only true way to changing the actions.

1–8 God asks Ezekiel what use is the wood of a vine? And when it gets burnt, what use are the charred remains (2–5)? The word of the Lord is that the people in Jerusalem will be treated like that vine. They have already gone through the fire, but they will go through it again (6–7). They will know that I am the LORD who will desolate the land because of their unfaithfulness (8).

Note. 7 'The fire will yet consume them'—another siege was to occur.

16:1–63 Jerusalem the unfaithful and promiscuous wife

Israel is depicted as a wildly adulterous wife, engaging in prostitution with the Egyptians, Assyrians and Babylonians. Her retribution would come at the hands of the very lovers she had pursued.

The imagery may seem strong for modern tastes, but the choice of metaphor was quite appropriate. In her international dealings Israel had readily absorbed other religions, beliefs and practices. Her social intercourse had exposed her to many pagan ideas. Some of these included child sacrifice and idol worship (20, 21), but another important strand included cultic sex practices. Sexual activity was not included in worship rituals purely for the gratification of the participants but was linked to fertility, and fertility, when applied to the land, meant food and survival. Nevertheless, lust and promiscuity must still have had a presence in the cult activities.

The practices condemned in this chapter include sex acts with idols (17) and cultic prostitution (16, 24, 25, 31). It seems that the cultic prostitution which had been part of the ritual 'in the high places', i.e. the mountain shrines (16) came to be practised openly in the streets of Jerusalem itself (24, 25).

An interesting twist to the sexual theme of the chapter is that Sodom and Samaria are cited as sisters in sin to Jerusalem (46–47). Yet the sin of Sodom that is emphasized is her arrogance and lack of social concern for the poor and helpless (49–50). Jerusalem is cited as being more committed to iniquity than her sisters. Furthermore, both Sodom and Samaria would be restored, compounding Jerusalem's shame (53–55). Yet there is hope. After Jerusalem's downfall and punishment the same suitor who rescued her at birth (4–7), took her in marriage (8), and clothed her in finery, would still remember his promise to her (59–62).

The love of God towards his people is often likened to the love of a husband for his wife, but where a mortal husband might reject, despise, even hate a promiscuous unfaithful wife, God is patient and just and will remember his promises to his people even when they stray.

The demand for fertility appears today in the 'developed' world's headlong quest for economic prosperity as the chief aim of life. The worship of material possessions and market forces have taken the place of Baal but are no less idolatrous.

1–34 Ezekiel is instructed to confront Jerusalem and proclaim to her: 'When you were born you were despised (2–5). I took pity on you and kept you alive. When you reached maturity I took you as my wife and showered you with jewellery and clothes (6–14). You were famed for your beauty. Yet you used that beauty to engage in prostitution. You indulged in pagan sexual rites and other idolatrous practices. You forgot what I had done for you (15–22). Woe to you! Your promiscuity increased. You consorted publicly with foreigners from all around you, even bribing them to come to you (23–34).’

35–42 Because of your promiscuity and heathen rites I will humiliate and punish you in front of your lovers. They in turn will strip and stone you. You will stop your prostitution and my anger will then subside.

44–58 Your behaviour runs in the family. Your sisters, Samaria and Sodom, were like you, but you are more depraved than they. I will restore the fortunes of Samaria and Sodom thus increasing your own shame. Even now you are scorned by your neighbours.

59–63 Although you broke my covenant with you, I will remember that covenant and establish an everlasting covenant with you. You will then remember what you have done with shame.

Notes. 3 ‘Amorite ... Hittite’—Jerusalem had existed long before it became an Israelite city. 4 ‘Rubbed with salt’—a practice which probably had an antiseptic effect. The point of the verse is that the newborn baby was ignored at birth. 5–6 The baby was left abandoned in the open, still kicking in the blood of childbirth. This practice was not uncommon in ancient societies. 8 ‘Spread the corner of my garment over you’—this act represented the claiming of the maiden in marriage (cf. Ru. 3:9). 9 ‘Washed the blood’—these verses convey the total change in Jerusalem’s condition. When born she was unwanted, unwashed, unclothed and lying in blood. Now she has become claimed in marriage, the water and blood are washed from her; and she is clothed with the finest dresses. 15–19 The very clothes and ornaments the bride received as presents are put to use in her prostitution. 27 ‘Reduced your territory’—one instance where the allegory states bald fact: in 701 BC Sennacherib gave some of Jerusalem’s territory to the Philistines. 35–42 Jerusalem’s punishment would be like that of a prostitute—humiliation and destruction. 60–63 There is still the promise of the everlasting covenant, though Jerusalem will still be ashamed of her past.

17:1–24 Eagles, cedars and a vine—a political parable

The chapter falls into three sections: 3–10 contain the allegory of the eagles and the vine; 11–21 contain the explanation of the allegory; and 22–24 contain a further allegorical promise.

The allegory relates to the political events of the time. The first eagle is Nebuchadnezzar and the second is Pharaoh. The cedar in Lebanon represents the royal family in Jerusalem, the topmost shoot being the nobility. The ‘seed of the land’ was a member of the royal family, namely Zedekiah, who was placed in Jerusalem to rule. He was no longer a cedar, but a ‘low, spreading vine’, i.e. his powers were limited. However, Zedekiah sought to rebel against Nebuchadnezzar by the help of Egypt. This exercise ended in failure.

The parable illustrates the point that the political arena is not outside the law of God. Zedekiah had sworn a treaty with Nebuchadnezzar in the name of God. Nebuchadnezzar may have been a cruel pagan king, but Zedekiah still had a moral obligation to honour his oath.

1–8 Ezekiel must tell this parable to Israel: ‘A splendid eagle took the topmost shoot from a cedar in Lebanon and planted it in a city noted for its commercial activity (2–4). He also took some seed and planted it in a fertile spot. The seed sprouted and grew into a leafy vine. At first, the vine’s branches grew in the direction of the eagle (5–6). When a second eagle appeared, the vine directed its branches towards it instead (7–8).’

9–21 ‘The Lord God asks: “Will the vine survive? Will it not be uprooted and then wither?”’ (9–10). Do you not know what this means? The king of Babylon carried off Jerusalem’s king and nobles to Babylon (11–12). He made one of Jerusalem's royal family swear a treaty with him and deported the chief men in the land, thus rendering it weak enough to be kept under his control (13, 14). However, the king rebelled by requesting military aid from Egypt. Will he succeed? No, he will die in Babylon. Egypt will be of no help. He will be punished for breaking his oath (15–21).

22–24 'I the Lord will plant a cedar shoot on the mountains of Israel. It will become a splendid cedar. The others will know that I can do this' (22–24).

Notes. 11–14 The Babylonians had executed a classic strategy for turning Israel into a puppet state. They deported the royal family, but left one of the weaker members in charge. This individual i.e. Zedekiah, was forced to sign a treaty with the Babylonians, ensuring Israel's 'allegiance'. Anyone who was deemed to be significant in running the country was deported. This action ensured that it would be difficult to organize (and administer) resistance. 16 'Die in Babylon'—2 Ki. 25:1–7 relates the siege of Jerusalem and eventual capture of Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar. Zedekiah was blinded and led off in shackles to Babylon. 22–24 Another message of hope: a new king will arrive some day and a kingdom will begin.

18:1–32 The accountability of the individual

This oracle is aimed directly at destroying the belief that people are bound by the guilt or merit of their parents. This belief took expression in the form of a proverb which is cited in v 2. Such a view could work in two ways. The oracle goes on to expound an example of each: (a) an evil son will not escape punishment because of the righteousness of his father (5–13), and (b) a righteous son will not be punished for the evil done by his father (14–18). The principle is declared in v 4: 'The soul who sins is the one who will die.' Ezekiel also counters the idea that salvation is solely a matter of storing up merit throughout the lifetime of an individual, and using that store to balance out iniquities. This notion is firmly rejected. If an evil man turns from his ways, he will live. If a righteous man turns to evil, he will be punished (21–28). This set of pronouncements was apparently thought to be unfair (29).

2–4 The word of the Lord runs contrary to popular saying, for the person that commits sin will also be the one to be punished for it. 5–9 If a righteous man does what is just and right he will live. 10–13 If he has a son who is violent, unclean and oppressive, that son shall die because of his own sin. 14–18 If that man in turn has a son who avoids his father's iniquity and acts righteously, that son will not be punished for his father's sins. He will live. 19–20 The son will not share the guilt of the father, nor the father that of his son. 21–22 However if an evil man turns away from his sin, and starts to do what is just and right, he shall live. 24 If a righteous man turns away from his upright ways, and starts to do iniquity, he shall die.

25–29 In spite of what Israel says, this teaching is not unjust. 30–31 Each will be judged according to what he/she has done. So repent—get a new heart and spirit. The Lord takes no pleasure in the death of anyone (23, 32).

Notes. 2 (cf. Je. 31:29)—Jeremiah too had prophesied that this proverb would come to an end. The thrust of the saying is that people may suffer for the sins of their ancestors. 6–9 A selective list of sins is given here. This list is paralleled by those in vs 11–13 and 15–17. 19 This issue seems to have been one where the prophet's pronouncement was questioned. The great significance of inheritance and community in middle-eastern cultures would have made such views harder to accept than in today's individualist societies. Today we blame 'society', rather than our ancestors, for our woes. In either case we are attempting to shift the blame from ourselves.

19:1–14 Lament for the princes of Israel

This chapter is a lament depicting in allegorical fashion the downfall of David's dynasty. A lioness (Israel) gives birth to several cubs (kings) who grow up to be strong lions. However, one of the kings is captured and led off to Egypt. Another is caught and caged and taken to Babylon (in 597 BC cf. 2 Ki. 25:1–7).

In v 10 the imagery changes and Israel is likened to a vine which, although once strong, is uprooted and transplanted to the desert (i.e. Babylon). Fire spreads from one of its branches, consuming its fruit. No strong branch is left. The reference is to Nebuchadnezzar's deportation of the princes of Israel to Babylon. The rebellion by Zedekiah (the fire from one of the vine's branches) caused the Babylonians to effect so severe a retribution that David's line was brought to an end.

The lament underlines the fact that past glories are no guarantee for the future. Western civilization has been living on its Christian heritage but the true faith has departed. The heritage is fast running out.

1–9 Ezekiel is to take up this lament for the princes of Israel: 'Your royal line once produced a lion who became strong and was a man-eater. The nations heard about him, captured him, and dragged him off with hooks to Egypt (2–4). A second lion became strong. He was a man-eater. He threatened towns and terrified the inhabitants of the land. The nations came and trapped him and took him to the king of Babylon and imprisoned him (5–9).

10–14 'Your royal line was once like a luxuriant vine with many branches. It was then uprooted. The east wind shrivelled it up and its branches withered and burnt. It has now been transplanted into the desert. Fire has devoured its branches and fruit. It no longer has a branch fit for a royal sceptre'.

Note. 12 'The east wind'—i.e. the Babylonians.

20:1–44 Israel's persistent rebelliousness

As in 14:1–11 some elders of Israel visit Ezekiel for a consultation. Ezekiel again is warned of the divided loyalties of his visitors. He delivers a lengthy oracle recounting various instances from Israel's history where they lapsed into idolatry.

The fact that they had come to consult Ezekiel shows that the elders had not entirely abandoned their worship of God in favour of other gods. Yet the pressure was there. The exiles were a small minority in a larger, multi-cultural society. Babylonian religion had a multitude of gods. No doubt the Babylonians' material wealth and power—even their impressive buildings—seemed to be proof to some of the exiles that Babylonian gods were worth following. Assimilation to the Babylonian way would have been easy. (For a commentary on this see Daniel ch. 1.)

Appropriately Ezekiel's oracle starts with references to the time when the Israelites were forced to dwell in the land of another super-power—Egypt. The cycle of warning, rebellion and restoration is repeated several times. Even when it hurts them, the Israelites wish to follow the religions of the other nations (24, 32). Ultimately, both promise and warning are combined. Israel will be gathered from the countries where they are scattered, but will loathe themselves for what they have done.

This oracle illustrates the enduring patience of God in dealing with his people over the centuries. He remains faithful despite their stubborn rebelliousness.

1–17 Some of the elders of Israel visit Ezekiel for a consultation. He is told to proclaim to them: ‘I am not going to let you consult me (2, 3). When I chose Israel and revealed myself to them in Egypt, I swore that I would bring them out of Egypt to a bountiful land (5, 6). They were told to abandon Egyptian idolatry, but they did not. Instead of punishing them, I acted for the honour of my name, and brought them out of Egypt (7–10). I also revealed my law to them in the desert (11, 12). Even in the desert they rebelled, but were not destroyed—despite warnings (13–17).

18–26 ‘Their children were similarly entreated and warned (18–20) but were not destroyed in spite of their disobedience (21–22). I swore to them in the desert that they would be dispersed throughout the lands because of their disobedience (23, 24). I handed them over to unjust statutes and intolerable laws (25). I let them defile themselves with such practices as the sacrifice of every first-born child. This I did so that in their horror they would come to know that I am the LORD (26).

27–38 ‘Your forefathers also insulted me by using every high spot or leafy tree as a shrine (27–28). Are you going to defile yourselves like them (30)? I will not be consulted by you (31). You may wish to be like other nations and serve wood and stone, but that will never happen (32). I will rule over you and judge you. You will be purged of those who rebel against me. Then you will know that I am the Lord (33–38).

39–44 ‘Serve your idols, Israel, but you will turn to me later. The whole house of Israel will worship me on my holy mountain (39–41). You will know that I am the Lord when I bring you into the land of Israel (42). You will loathe yourselves when you remember your past conduct. You will know that I am the Lord when I deal with you for the honour of my name’ (43–44).

Notes. 1 ‘Seventh year’—i.e. 591 BC. ‘Enquire’ cf. 8:1; 14:1. 9 ‘For the sake of my name’—the name of the Lord identifies the whole personality of God, not just his reputation. 25 ‘Gave them over’—God permitted them to go their own way, even when it led to unjust practices (such as child sacrifice). 29 ‘Bamah’—a light form of word-play is being used here. The word bāmā, meaning high place begins like the word bā’im, meaning corners. 37 ‘Pass under my rod’—(cf. Lv. 27:32; Je. 33:13). The image is of sheep passing under the discerning eye of the shepherd.

20:45–49 Judgment by fire

This oracle is the first in a group of four prophecies warning of the impending calamity which would befall the land of Israel. Each prophecy gets more specific than its predecessor.

As with some of the other oracles (e.g. 12:26–28), Ezekiel’s message is countered by wilful disbelief. His utterances are seen as parables—harsh symbols for what they hoped was a less harsh reality. We are always keen to know what the future brings, but only if it meets our wants. If it does not, we are adept at explaining away even the most obvious of signs.

46–49 Ezekiel must proclaim to the south and to the southern forest (46): ‘The Lord says that he is about to set fire to you. The blaze will be unquenchable. Everyone’s face will be scorched. They shall see that the Lord has started it’ (47–48). Ezekiel’s listeners declare that he is speaking in riddles (49).

Notes. 46 The ‘south’ here refers to Jerusalem and Judah. 47 ‘From south to north’—in effect, the prophecy warns of a calamity which will consume the whole of the land of Israel. 49 It seems that Ezekiel sometimes met with a credibility gap. His prophecies of doom were considered ‘symbolic’.

21:1–7 Judgment by the sword

In this second prophecy the imagery gets more precise. The reference to the sword—symbol of war—gives a clear indication of the military nature of the disaster. Ezekiel is known for his emphasis on individual responsibility and reward (cf. 3:16–21; 33:1–20), so it is noteworthy that he states that the oncoming disasters will afflict both the righteous and the wicked. Being righteous does not guarantee immunity against affliction. Those who claim the Lord’s exclusive protection may be exercising great faith but are also ignoring many of Scripture’s warnings.

To Jerusalem Ezekiel must proclaim: ‘The Lord is against you. He will draw a sword to strike down both good and bad’ (2–4).

To Ezekiel God says: ‘Groan and grieve! When people ask you why we are doing this, tell them that it is because of the terrifying news to come (6–7). And come it will.’

Notes. 3 ‘Sword’—the sword imagery is also used in the next two oracles. 6 ‘Groan’—Ezekiel’s proclamation was to be accompanied by another symbolic act (the seventh).

21:8–17 The sword is sharpened

In the third oracle of this group the language becomes poetic—almost as if it were a pre-war chant. The theme of the ready sword and its task permeate the passage.

The theme of war as punishment sent by God was probably even less popular when Ezekiel told his people than it is today. The ray of hope was that God’s wrath would eventually subside.

9–11 A sharp sword is ready. 12 It is meant for the people and princes of Israel. 14–16 It will strike again and again. 17 Then God’s anger will abate. The Lord has spoken.

Notes. 10, 12, 13 ‘Sceptre ... princes’—one element not mentioned in the previous two oracles is the targeting of the leaders of Jerusalem for punishment. The next oracle will elaborate on this topic.

21:18–32 The sword of the king of Babylon

In the last of the four oracles the text becomes more explicit about what is to take place. The king of Babylon (Nebuchadnezzar) will start out on a military campaign against the lands to the west of Babylon. At some point on the journey he will stop and seek omens as to which town to attack: Jerusalem or Rabbah. The omens will point to Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar will then lay siege against Jerusalem. The ruler of Israel will be deposed and taken captive.

The Ammonites will not escape either, for their day of judgment will come too. People will forget they even existed.

The passage falls into three sections: 18–23 Nebuchadnezzar’s actions; 24–27 the message to Israel; 28–32 the message to Ammon.

This prophecy should make us wary of making quick judgments as to who should be punished by whom and why. It might seem that the evil Nebuchadnezzar would be better suited to receive divine punishment, whereas Israel could be reprieved. Yet Ezekiel, under inspiration, depicts Nebuchadnezzar as God’s instrument for punishing the iniquity in Israel.

19–20 Ezekiel is instructed to draw a map showing the road along which the king of Babylon will come. At a fork in the road he is to make a signpost which points to Rabbah in one direction and to Jerusalem in the other. 21–23 The king of Babylon will stop at the fork and consult his oracles. They will indicate Jerusalem, which he will then besiege.

24–27 The word of the Lord to the ruler of Israel is: ‘Your people will be taken captive because of your open iniquity (24). And you, you evil prince of Israel, will be toppled from power’ (25–27).

28–32 About the people of Ammon, Ezekiel must proclaim: ‘Your time has come. Despite false prophecies of peace, you will be handed over for destruction in your land of origin (28–31). It will be your oblivion. I the Lord have spoken’ (32).

Notes. 20 Rabbah (modern Amman)—capital of Ammon. Ammon was the subject of a later prophecy too (cf. 25:1–7). 21 ‘Examine the liver’—the Babylonians practised ‘hepatoscopy’, a method of predicting the future by examining the livers of slain animals and noting any significant marks. 23 ‘Sworn allegiance’—the leaders in Jerusalem had already been forced into an ‘allegiance’ with Babylon, but had rebelled (cf. 17:11–13). 26 ‘Remove the crown’—the fall of the monarchy. 28, 29 The Ammonites thought they had avoided calamity. Apparently they even had received false prophecies to reinforce the illusion of safety.

22:1–16 The sins of Jerusalem

This oracle focuses on the sins of Jerusalem, making the point that her iniquity has hastened her end. The list of misdoings ranges from the social to the sacral: bloodshed (3, 9), idolatry (3, 4), misuse of power (6), ill-treatment of various social groups (7), desecration of Sabbaths (8), paganism (9), sexual misconduct and incest (10–11), bribery and extortion (12), and simply ignoring God (12). The punishment due would involve the dispersal of the people throughout the lands.

1–16 Ezekiel must confront Jerusalem with all her detestable crimes (2), and proclaim to her: ‘You are a city which has made itself guilty through bloodshed and unclean through idolatry. You have hastened your end by doing so. You will be an object of derision among the nations (3–5). Many strands of corruption are within you, but I will put an end to it (6–13). You will be dispersed among the nations. Then you will come to know that I am the Lord’ (14–16).

Notes. 2 ‘Detestable practices’—the expression occurs frequently in Ezekiel, often to denote actions which rendered one ritually unclean (see v 10). 9 ‘Eat at the mountain shrines’—i.e. eating meat which had been sacrificed to idols in the ‘high places’ (cf. 18:6; 6:3). 10 ‘Unclean’—as a priest Ezekiel was clearly concerned about ceremonial cleanliness and defilement. Many of the sins listed in these verses were specifically mentioned in the law (cf. Lv. 18, 20). 16 ‘Defiled’—Israel’s punishment is itself called defilement.

22:17–22 The smelting of Israel

Israel’s punishment is likened to the fire of a blast furnace: the dross would be removed.

Modern ideas of war or punishment usually includes concepts like retribution and/or rehabilitation. Here we find the concept of purification. The corruption was too deep-rooted for minor societal modifications. Everything had to go so that a new start could be made.

17–22 Ezekiel is told that Israel has come to be like the impurities found in unrefined silver (18), and is to proclaim: ‘I will therefore gather you into Jerusalem just as men gather silver with its impurities into a furnace. The fierce heat of my anger will melt you just as in the smelting process. You will know that I have poured my anger on you’ (19–22).

Note. 19 ‘Gather you into Jerusalem’—here and in v 20 there is the indication of the coming siege of the city.

22:23–31 Injustice in the land: corruption at every level

The corruption in Israelite society transcended class and social status. It also had many and varied expressions.

Corruption of a society can go beyond the level of the individual. It can become part of the institutions of that society, whether civil or religious. It can be easy to accept practices simply because they are the ‘done thing’ or supported by the hierarchies, but that does not justify such practices. Sometimes bribery is part of the way everyday business is carried out. Unfair treatment of the weakest in society is also widespread. The individual feels helpless in the face of such corruption.

23–31 Ezekiel must say to the land: ‘You are arid (24); your rulers oppress the people (25); your priests profane my law (26); your officials kill to make money (27); your prophets give false oracles (28); your people extort, rob and oppress (29). I looked for someone to stand firm on behalf of the land but could find no-one. So I will pour out my anger on its inhabitants’ (30–31).

Note. 30 ‘Build up the wall’—there was no-one who was worthy enough to intercede with God on behalf of the people.

23:1–49 Oholah and Oholibah—adulterous sisters

This chapter has a theme very similar to that of ch. 16: Jerusalem and her sister Samaria had prostituted themselves with the practices of the surrounding heathen nations, in particular, Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia. They must bear the consequences of their actions. The differences between the chapters are primarily ones of emphasis. The military and political nature of Israel’s association with Assyria and Babylonia is highlighted by the description of her Assyrian and Babylonian lovers as warriors in full uniform (5, 14, 15). They would enact retribution on her. This retribution is also described in terms of military attack and plunder (24–26; 46–47).

Israel’s political alliances are not in themselves condemned here. They formed the basis for a social and religious penetration of Israel’s culture by pagan beliefs, which the people of Israel readily welcomed.

The sins of the people of Israel were not viewed by God in a neutral, dispassionate manner. Rather, just as a husband considers his wife’s infidelity with both sorrow and anger, so God views his people’s sin (cf. ch. 16).

1–10 The Lord says to Ezekiel: ‘There once were two sisters, Oholah i.e. Samaria, and Oholibah i.e. Jerusalem. In their youth, while they were in Egypt, they indulged in prostitution (3, 4). They were my wives, but Oholah lusted after the Assyrians, and prostituted herself with them (5–8). In the end I handed her over to these Assyrians, who stripped and killed her (9–10).

11–21 Oholibah was worse than her sister. She too had lusted for the Assyrians, then developed a craving for the Babylonians. After the latter had defiled her, she turned away from them in disgust. Similarly, I turned away from her (as I had turned away from her sister), when her prostitution became more flagrant. She then longed for the times she had had in Egypt with her well-endowed Egyptian studs’ (11–21).

22–35 Ezekiel must proclaim to Oholibah: ‘I will stir up your past lovers against you. The Babylonians and Assyrians will besiege you and punish you. I will vent my anger against you and put a stop to your debauchery (22–27). I will hand you over to your ex-lovers, whom you now detest (28). They will humiliate you (29–30). Just like your sister Samaria, you will drink the cup of desolation (31–34). Since you have turned your back on me, you must bear the weight of your iniquity’ (35).

36–49 Ezekiel must confront Oholah and Oholibah about their misdeeds: adultery, bloodshed, pagan sex rites, child sacrifice, and desecration of God’s sanctuary and Sabbath (36–39). Their seduction of foreigners (40–42) descended into adulterous prostitution and bloodshed (43–45). He must proclaim: ‘Let them be put to death and so end the debauchery in the land (46–49). Then you will know that I am the Lord.’

Notes. 4 The names Oholah and Oholibah both seem connected to the Hebrew for ‘tent’. Although many commentators suggest that this implies a cultic connection (e.g. as in a tent-shrine), it might simply indicate the nomadic origins of the people. ‘Mine’—although the text does not explicitly state that the daughters were brides to the Lord, this verse and v 5 imply the relationship (cf. 16:8, 9). Israel’s prostitution is thus adultery as well. 5–10 Samaria’s infatuation with Assyria led to her downfall. Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722–721 BC. 14 ‘Chaldeans’—although the term later came to be synonymous with ‘Babylonians’, the Chaldeans were a separate race from S. Babylonia (cf. 23). 23 ‘Pekod’—a region in eastern Babylonia. The identification of Shoa and Koa is uncertain. 24 ‘Throng’—in Ezekiel this term (cf. 46–47—‘mob’) is frequently used to describe a large group of people with destructive intent. 36–39 Some of the heathen practices which Israel had adopted are listed here. 42 ‘Sabeans’—the term might also be rendered ‘drunkards’. The general sense is of a carefree crowd from no particular place casually taking advantage of the sisters.

24:1–14 The parable of the pot: Jerusalem besieged

This oracle represents a turning-point in the book. Up to now Ezekiel’s prophecies had mainly been warnings about the disaster to come. But now the fulfilment of the prophecies had begun. There could be no turning back. The siege of Jerusalem had started. The date of the oracle is precise: 15th January 588 BC. It was the day that Nebuchadnezzar began his siege of the city. After 18 months the Babylonians would capture Jerusalem and set fire to her. The city would be destroyed. This siege was the second for Jerusalem in twelve years. Ezekiel himself had been deported after the previous one.

The message of the oracle is in the form of a parable. Jerusalem is likened to a pot and its people are the contents of the pot. After fire is applied to it a stain remains on the pot i.e. even after the first siege Israel’s impurity remained. A second, hotter fire (the second siege) will be needed to burn off the impurity, i.e. punish the iniquity of the people. Again punishment is portrayed as purification (cf. 22:17–22).

1–14 Ezekiel is told: ‘Record this date because today Nebuchadnezzar has laid siege to Jerusalem’ (2). He is to proclaim: ‘Fill a pot with water and joints of meat. Boil them on the fire. The deposit on the pot will not go away. The stain is like the impurity of Jerusalem (3–7, 13). Heat the pot even more, burning the bones. Let the pot glow red so that its stain may be burnt off (9–12). Your judgment will not be averted now, Jerusalem’ (13–14).

Notes. 6 ‘Encrusted’—as the liquid reduced a stain would be left on the inside of the pot. ‘Without casting lots’—if this sentence is rendered correctly, the underlying thought might be that the contents of the pot, i.e. the people, would be scattered randomly. 12 The verse as it is in the NIV could imply that the deposit on the pot will not go away even after the second heating. It would be more consistent to see the verse as summarizing the past attempt: ‘it had frustrated all (earlier) efforts (until now)’.

24:15–27 The death of Ezekiel’s wife and the significance of his grief

The revelation that his wife would be taken from him must have been heart-breaking for Ezekiel. Yet even this was to be used as a means of conveying the grim message about the fate of Jerusalem and the temple. Even in moments of personal grief, Ezekiel was still a prophet of God.

How a believer acts during personal crises can sometimes speak louder than many words, though refusal to make proper provision for mourning can be very damaging to the bereaved person. This command was specifically addressed to Ezekiel and not meant to be applied generally.

15–24 Ezekiel is told that his wife is going to die, and he is not to effect the usual mourning rituals (16–17). When people ask him what his actions mean for them, he tells them the word of the Lord to Israel: ‘I am about to desecrate my city. Those relations you left behind will fall by the sword. Yet you will not follow the usual mourning customs, just as Ezekiel has done. You will then know that I am the Lord’ (20–24).

25–27 Furthermore God says to Ezekiel: ‘When the city falls, a fugitive will come and take you. On that day you will regain your full power of speech. You will be a sign to the people, and they shall know that I am the Lord’.

Notes. 17 There was quite a range of mourning rituals (cf. 27:30–32). 27 ‘You will speak’—Ezekiel’s partial loss of speech would be lifted when he heard the news of the fall of the city. This recovery is related in 33:21–22. Even that event would be a sign to the people.

25:1–17 Prophecies against neighbouring nations

This section begins a series of oracles against the foreign nations surrounding Israel (chs. 25–32). Egypt and Tyre receive most attention, but this oracle concentrates on Judah’s immediate neighbours: Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Philistia. These nations had apparently regarded the downfall of the people of Israel with delight (Ammon) and derision (Moab). They had even taken the opportunity to execute revenge on Judah (Edom and Philistia). Ezekiel’s oracle warns that retribution will come.

The oracle begins with Ammon, which lay to the east of Israel, and then moves in a clockwise direction to Moab, Edom and Philistia.

It is easy to condemn these neighbours of Israel for their attitudes to her. Yet these attitudes can be ours too when trouble befalls one of our neighbours. Meanwhile God is the God of the whole earth and is ultimately in control of the fate of nations, as of individuals.

Ammon. Because the Ammonites gloated over the destruction of Israel and Judah, they will be taken over and plundered by the peoples from the East (1–5). Because they rejoiced maliciously over Israel, they will be ruined (6–7).

Moab. Because Moab viewed Judah with contempt, they will be taken over by the people from the East (8–11).

Edom. Because Edom took revenge on Judah, they will suffer devastation at the hands of Israel.

Philistia. Because the Philistines took revenge on Judah, the Kerethites and the rest of the coastal peoples will be destroyed.

Notes. 4 ‘People of the East’—nomadic desert tribes. 5 ‘Rabbah’—Capital of Ammon (cf. 21:20). 8 ‘Seir’—Another name for Edom. 16 ‘Kerethites’—A people closely linked with the Philistines.

26:1–28:19 Prophecies against Tyre

In geographical terms, Tyre was minute. In economic terms, however, she was highly significant, and was thus an important force in the politics of the ancient Middle East.

The ancient city of Tyre was an important seaport for the area which is now southern Lebanon. (Its site lies approximately midway between Beirut to the north and Haifa to the south.) The city had two harbours, one of which was on an island which lay just off the coast. In Ezekiel there are several references to Tyre's close links with the sea. Both her prowess and her predicted downfall are described using marine allusions. A substantial part of Tyre's strength lay in her seafaring ability.

Tyre's wealth stemmed from her trading. Her merchants travelled extensively throughout the ancient world and dealt in a very extensive range of goods. Her people were famous for their business skills. These skills in turn had led to prosperity.

Tyre has a long and significant history. The city is mentioned in Egyptian Execration Texts of around 1850 BC. According to Herodotus, alphabetic writing was introduced to Greece by the Phoenicians who came with Cadmus, king of Tyre. The city-state also founded the colony of Carthage around 825–815 BC.

Tyre's relations with Israel often had some economic factor. Hiram I supplied David with materials for building the palace of Jerusalem (2 Sa. 5:11; 1 Ch. 14:1). He also supplied Solomon with materials for the temple and concluded a treaty with him. Just over a century later, king Ahab arranged to marry Jezebel, a daughter of the king of Tyre (1 Ki. 16:31). Through Jezebel the worship of the Tyrian god—Baal Melqart—was introduced into Israel.

Prior to the time of Ezekiel, Tyre had enjoyed a period of prosperity. However, Ezekiel, Jeremiah (25:22; 27:1–11) and Zechariah (9:2–7) all prophesied Tyre's suppression by the Babylonians. Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Tyre (from c. 587–c. 574 BC) was apparently a hard campaign (Ezk. 29:18). The city eventually acknowledged Babylonian domination.

The oracles against Tyre and Egypt are instructive guides as to the nature of national pride. Most people maintain some element of pride in and support for the advance of their nation. In the case of Tyre we see the arrogant confidence of self-made economic success. The wealth that she had acquired was to her the sign that she was superior. She was prepared to support corrupt business practices in order to maintain that superiority. Israel's demise was simply seen as a business opportunity.

Tyre was condemned for these attitudes, which are still prevalent in society today. We must not let the material success of our nation become its sole criterion of achievement.

26:1–21 Self-satisfaction denounced

In this oracle Tyre is rebuked for seeing the fall of Jerusalem as merely an event which will enhance her own prosperity. The Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar would lay siege against her and bring about her downfall. Delight at the downfall of others is an emotion that Christians, and others, need to deal with as it is very pervasive, but not readily acknowledged.

1–21 The word of God to Ezekiel is: 'Tyre has said that the ruin of Jerusalem will ensure her own prosperity' (1–2). Therefore he is to proclaim: 'Many nations will pillage you and your settlements, Tyre. Then they will know that I am the Lord (3–6). Nebuchadnezzar will ravage your mainland and lay siege against you. You will never be rebuilt (7–14). The coastal tribes will be appalled at your downfall and will lament your collapse (15–18). You will be dragged down to the pit. You will not return' (19–21).

Notes. 1 ‘The eleventh year’—i.e. 587/6 BC. 2 Tyre saw the fall of Jerusalem as merely a business opportunity. On account of its geographical location the land of Palestine was the hub of numerous trade-routes that linked Africa with Eurasia. 3–5 Many of the images relating to Tyre refer to her maritime situation. 6 ‘Her settlements on the mainland’—Tyre had extended her control to areas far beyond the island and the mainland harbour. 7–14 Nebuchadnezzar is now mentioned by name for the first time in Ezekiel. His siege of Tyre is reported to have lasted thirteen years. This campaign apparently proved to be a difficult one even for the Babylonians (see 29:18). The city-state acquiesced and recognized Babylonian control. 15 ‘The coastlands’—other Mediterranean city-states who probably were trading-partners of Tyre. 19 The picture here is of the island sinking beneath the waves. 20 ‘I will bring you down ... to the pit’. The ‘pit’ and the earth below refer to the grave or to Sheol i.e. the domain of death.

27:1–36 A lament

This oracle is given as a lament. Here Tyre is likened to a marvellously-wrought merchant ship. The suppliers of her timbers and her merchandise are her trading-partners. The extensive list of countries and products gives us a clear picture of why Tyre was famous for trading. Her links spread throughout most of the Mediterranean, North Africa, Asia Minor, and the Middle East. She was able to employ foreigners in both industry and defence. Yet this ship of state was to be sunk i.e. Tyre was to be overthrown.

When an old-established, major manufacturer goes bankrupt and closes its doors not only its own employees are made redundant but often thousands more in satellite industries, local suppliers and services. Recession and economic collapse are some of the modern punishments a state may endure.

1–36 Ezekiel is instructed to proclaim to Tyre: ‘You gloried in your beauty (3–4). You were constructed from the finest materials (5–7). You employed many nations to build, operate, and defend you (8–11). You had many important trading partners, near and far, and your merchandise was of the highest quality and widest range (12–25). But you will lose it all on the day of your shipwreck (26–27). Your neighbours and trading partners will be appalled (28–36). You will be no more’ (36).

Notes. 3 ‘I am perfect in beauty’—Tyre’s great wealth had brought her much adornment, in which she had great pride (cf. 28:12). 5–6 The timbers used were among the finest. ‘Senir’—the Amorite term for Hermon (cf. Dt. 3:9). 7 ‘Elishah’—probably refers to Cyprus. 8 ‘Sidon and Arvad’—these two cities lay to the north of Tyre. 9 ‘Gebal’—the seaport of Byblos, an important Phoenician port. The movement of labour to Tyre was another sign of her economic strength. 10 ‘Put’—Libya. The three nations mentioned here are widely separated. They are listed to show how Tyre could draw mercenaries from all over the ancient world—whether Libya (Put) in the west, Lydia in the north or Persia in the east. 11 Arvad also supplied draftsmen (8). ‘Helech ... Gammad’—both are of uncertain geographical origin. Helech may be in the region of Cilicia, and Gammad may lie in Cappadocia. (Both areas are in eastern Asia Minor.) 12 The list of Tyre’s trading-partners in approximate geographical order, running from Tarshish in the western Mediterranean to the Arabian desert and Mesopotamia. 16 ‘Aram’—it may be better to read ‘Edom’ here. 23 ‘Eden’—not the garden of Eden; the two forms of ‘Eden’ are spelled differently in Hebrew. The Eden mentioned here lies in Mesopotamia. 26 The ‘east wind’ may refer not just to a sea storm (cf. Ps. 48:7) but also to where the threat to Tyre lay: Babylon was east of Tyre. 30–31 Seven traditional signs of mourning are listed here: loud lamentation, putting earth on the head, rolling in ashes or dust, shaving the head, putting on sackcloth, intense weeping and chanting a lament.

28:1–10 Against arrogance

The achievement of economic wealth had brought with it a sense of pride. The process is summed up in v 5—great skill in trading had led to great wealth, and great wealth had led to pride. The king of Tyre is depicted as believing he is as wise as a god. The prophecy warns that the penalty for such arrogance would be both humiliating and final. Other examples of such pride and subsequent fall are easy to find throughout history and today.

1–10 Ezekiel must proclaim to the king of Tyre: ‘You think you are a god, but you are not (1–2). Your shrewdness and business acumen have brought you great economic reward (3–5a), which in turn has made you conceited (5b). Because of your conceit, you will die a humiliating death at the hands of foreigners. When they confront you, you will just be a mortal, not a god’ (7–10).

Notes. 2 ‘In the heart of the seas’—part of Tyre consisted of an island (see above). 3 ‘Daniel’—see note on 14:14, 20. 7 ‘Foreigners ... the most ruthless of nations’—a reference to the Babylonians. 10 The Tyrians practised circumcision and hence to die ‘the death of the uncircumcised’ would have been considered a humiliation.

28:11–19 Expulsion from ‘paradise’

This lament depicts the rise and fall of the king of Tyre, and hence the rise and fall of the city-state itself. The imagery is strongly reminiscent of the Garden of Eden narrative. However there is no attempt to parallel the Genesis account closely. As is often the case in Ezekiel, metaphors are freely mixed, altered and adapted to suit the language of the prophecy. The poetic language serves to highlight the extent of the fall that Tyre experienced; it was like an expulsion from paradise.

11–19 The lament to the king of Tyre is: ‘You were once the exemplar of wisdom and beauty (12), dwelling in a paradise, adorned with splendid jewels (13–14) and exhibiting blameless behaviour (15). Yet your widespread commercial activities led to oppression. Your splendour made you conceited and corrupted your thinking. Your many dishonest trading practices led to desecration of the sanctuaries. Thus you have been expelled from your paradise and laid low (16–18). Onlookers are appalled by you’ (19).

Notes. 13 The precious stones listed here have been taken to allude to the high priest’s robe (Ex. 28:17–20), but pagan deities were sometimes clothed in jewel-covered garments too. The emphasis here is simply on the richness of the king (and of Tyre). 14–16 The exact significance of the cherub is unclear and dependent on which textual reading is followed. Either (as NIV) the king of Tyre was elevated to the status of a cherub, or he had a cherub appointed as his guardian. Both renderings point to his elevated status. ‘the fiery stones’—lit. ‘stones of fire’; possibly a reference to the precious stones mentioned in v 13. Alternatively, it may be a description of some radiant or glowing feature found on the mountain of God. 15 ‘Blameless’—again an allusion to the Eden account. 18–19 Here the subject changes from the king to the city of Tyre.

28:20–26 Prophecy against Sidon: ‘Know the Lord’

Sidon was a neighbour of Tyre. It would suffer due punishment as well. One notable feature of this short oracle is the frequency of the phrase then they will know that I am the LORD. Furthermore the prophecy holds the promise of restoration for the people of God (25–26), a theme which would receive greater emphasis later.

20–26 Ezekiel is to proclaim to Sidon: ‘I am against you Sidon—but I will be glorified through you. When I execute judgment on you they will know that I am the Lord (22). When I afflict you they will know that I am the Lord (23). When Israel no longer has malicious neighbours they will know that I am the Lord (24). When I gather Israel from the peoples I shall show myself holy to the nations. Israel shall dwell in safety on the land, and they will know that I am the Lord their God’ (25–26).

Note. 25 ‘My servant Jacob’—cf. 37:25.

29:1–32:32 The Egyptian oracles

The book of Ezekiel contains a total of seven oracles against Egypt—more than any other country. The question arises as to why a Judaeen prophet resident in Babylonia should be bothered with a country several hundred kilometres away. The answer becomes clear when we look at the history of the period and the chronology of the oracles.

Egypt in Ezekiel’s time was a superpower in slow decline. At the height of power her sphere of influence had extended the whole way up the eastern Mediterranean, embracing Palestine and what is now Lebanon and western Syria. When the Babylonians replaced the Assyrians as the dominant force in Middle-Eastern military politics, Egypt allied herself with the Assyrians in order to stop the advance of the Babylonians. The result was a complex power-struggle, and the smaller states in the region—such as Jerusalem/Judah—had to choose their friends carefully.

The chronology of Egypt and Babylonia’s interactions up to and during Ezekiel’s oracles is as follows:

605—The Babylonians defeat the Egyptian forces at Carchemish (cf. Je. 46:2) and then press south (Carchemish was in NW Syria). Skirmishing ensues.

601—Babylonian and Egyptian forces clash again. There are heavy losses on both sides.

597—Nebuchadnezzar subdues Jerusalem. Egypt stays neutral. Zedekiah is placed on the throne as vassal king by Nebuchadnezzar.

589—Judah under Zedekiah is in open rebellion against the Babylonians.

588 (Jan.)—The Babylonians advance to besiege Jerusalem.

588—The siege is lifted temporarily as the Babylonians redirect their efforts against the Egyptian relief forces (Zedekiah had asked the Egyptians for help). However the Egyptians are soon repulsed, and the Babylonians return to besiege the city.

587 (Jul.)—Jerusalem’s walls are breached. The city and temple are burnt. The state of Judah comes to an end. The country is in ruins.

The Egyptian oracles in Ezekiel are unusual in that all but one of them are dated. Nearly half of the 13 dates given in the book are to be found in the Egyptian section. When arranged in chronological order, the oracles date as follows:

587 (Jan.)—29:1–16; 587 (Apr.)—30:20–26; 587 (Jun.)—31:1–18; 586/585—32:17–32; 585 (Mar.)—32:1–16; 571 (Apr.)—29:17–21. The oracle in 30:1–19 is undated but its content is similar to the others.

Like Tyre, Egypt had much national pride. If Tyre was ‘new money’, then Egypt was ‘old money’. Her pride lay in that which she had inherited and seemingly would keep for ever. She was a vast country with considerable resources (especially the Nile). She had a marvellous imperial history, a sizeable army, and widespread political influence throughout the Middle East. Yet her confidence in her glorious past was misplaced. Her fate was to be humbled. Likewise, in this age, we should not let memories of past national glories (actual or otherwise) distort our perception of a nation's true needs. It is easy to feel confident that problems and disasters which occur to others can never happen to us. This kind of complacency is never realistic.

29:1–16 Egypt: decline and fall

When we compare the dates of the oracles with the events of the time, we find that the oracles were delivered against a general backdrop of Judah's oscillation between Egyptian and Babylonian domination. The state of Judah had allied itself, willingly or otherwise, with one or other of those great military powers during the last twenty years before the cataclysmic events of 588–87 BC.

Ezekiel's series of oracles against Egypt begins during Jerusalem's darkest hour. Egypt's manoeuvres had failed to break the Babylonian siege. Ezekiel had already predicted the downfall of the city. He now had grim news for her would-be saviour. The overall thrust of his oracles was that Egypt would ultimately fall to the Babylonians and that it would cease to be the great nation it once was.

Jerusalem had already been under siege for a year. There had been a brief respite when the Babylonians were temporarily diverted by an unsuccessful Egyptian assault. Ezekiel's oracle reflects some of the bitterness that must have been felt in Jerusalem when it became clear that Egypt's rescue had failed: Egypt was a staff of reed (6); and would no longer be a source of confidence for the people of Israel (16). Trust placed in military or economic power is always, in the long run, trust misplaced.

The oracle means that Egypt would suffer defeat and destruction. The nation would recover but never get back to its former strength (14–15).

1–16 The word of the Lord to Pharaoh is: 'Because of your arrogance, Pharaoh, you will be laid low. Then all Egypt will know that I am the Lord (3–6). Because you proved an unreliable help to Israel, Egypt will be ravaged by war. Then they will know that I am the Lord (6–8). Because of your arrogance, Egypt will be desolated, and Egyptians dispersed (9–12). Yet after a while the Egyptians will return to Upper Egypt, but their kingdom will remain a minor one. Egypt will be a reminder to Israel. Then they will know that I am the Lord' (13–16).

Notes. 1 The date was January 587 BC. 3 'Great monster'—a crocodile or perhaps a creature like the 'Leviathan' (cf. Is. 27:1). 6–7 'Staff of reed'—cf. Is. 36:6. Just as a reed staff would break and hurt anyone who tried to lean on it for support, so Egypt's would-be support for Jerusalem had failed, adding to the despair of the city. 10 'From Migdol to Aswan'—an expression implying the whole of the land: (from north to south). 'Cush'—the country lying to the south of Egypt (Ethiopia).

29:17–21 Nebuchadnezzar's reward

The date of this oracle (April 571) makes it the latest of the Egyptian oracles. It links these oracles with those against Tyre.

17–20 The Lord tells Ezekiel: 'Nebuchadnezzar had a hard campaign against Tyre—with no reward' (18). Therefore he is to proclaim: 'Egypt will provide the rewards for Nebuchadnezzar. He will plunder it to pay his army. I have given him Egypt as a reward for what he has done.'

‘I will restore strength to Israel, and will open your (Ezekiel’s) mouth. Then they will know that I am the Lord’ (21).

Notes. 18 ‘Every head was rubbed bare’—the soldiers’ uniforms had chafed on their wearers (a common problem even today). 21 ‘A horn’—the symbol of strength. The people of Israel would regain strength. ‘open your mouth’—Ezekiel’s muteness would be removed (cf. 3:26; 33:22).

30:1–19 A dark day for Egypt

This oracle is undated, but its theme is similar to the other oracles from 587 BC: Egypt and her allies will fall at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar.

2–9 War will come to Egypt. She and her neighbours and allies will be laid desolate. 10–12 Egypt’s military might will be destroyed by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar. The land will be devastated. 13–19 The nation will be leaderless. Its idols will be destroyed, and its cities will be taken by storm.

Notes. 5 The countries and people mentioned here were all allies of Egypt. ‘Cush’—a region south of Egypt. ‘Put’—Libya; ‘people of the covenant land’—probably Jewish mercenaries who had settled in Egypt. 6 ‘Migdol to Aswan’—cf. 29:10. 15–18 The list of Egyptian cities and regions mentioned here emphasizes the widespread nature of the destruction.

30:20–26 Pharaoh’s broken arms

By the time of this oracle—(April 587)—the inhabitants of Jerusalem would have been besieged by the Babylonians for over a year. Any hopes that Egypt might rescue the city by a second strike against Nebuchadnezzar are finally countered in this oracle. The Egyptians had already been repulsed in 588 (I have broken the arm of Pharaoh v 21), and would suffer further defeats (I will break both his [Pharaoh’s] arms v 22).

20–26 Ezekiel is told: ‘Pharaoh’s power has already been reduced (21). It will be reduced further. Egyptians will suffer exile/dispersion. Nebuchadnezzar and the Babylonians will grow more powerful even as Egypt crumbles. Then they will know that I am the LORD (22–25). When the Egyptians are scattered, they will then know that I am the LORD’ (26).

Note. 26 ‘I will disperse the Egyptians among the nations’—this verse could be seen as depicting the scattering of the Egyptian expeditionary forces upon defeat, rather than a break-up of the nation.

31:1–18 The lesson of the felled cedar for Egypt

The glory of Egypt and the extent of her downfall is illustrated by the allegory of a majestic cedar which was chopped down.

1–18 Ezekiel is told to proclaim to Egypt: ‘Your greatness may be compared to that of a magnificent cedar (2–3). This cedar had an abundant source of water (3–4). It towered above its peers, and spread over a wide area (5). They relied on it for protection and shelter (6). It had great splendour (7). It had no equals (8). It was the envy of the rest (9). Because it stood out above the others and was proud of doing so, it was handed over to a ruler to be dealt with (10–11). It was cut down. Those who relied on it left it (12). No others will acquire its greatness (14). The day of its destruction was a black day for many (15–16). Those who sought its protection met a similar end (17). You and your military might will be felled likewise’ (18).

Notes. 3 ‘Consider Assyria’—a slight textual emendation would alter the reference to Assyria to that of a cypress, as in ‘Consider a cypress, a cedar in Lebanon’. The alteration makes the allegory more direct, though the general sense remains the same. 10 It was pride which led to the downfall for the cedar—and by implication Egypt. 12 ‘The most ruthless of nations’—a phrase used before (30:11) for the Babylonians. 18 ‘You will lie among the uncircumcised, with those killed by the sword’. As the Egyptians practised circumcision and laid great emphasis on proper burial rites, this prediction would have been doubly abhorrent to them.

32:1–16 Lament for Pharaoh

Egypt is again warned of her overthrow by the Babylonians.

1–16 The lament to Pharaoh is: ‘You are like a great sea beast who will be netted and left to rot on the land (2–4). Many will feed off your remains (4–6). There will be darkness over the land when this happens (7–8). Many nations will be appalled at the event (9–10). The Lord says: “The Babylonian war machine will overthrow you (11–12). Egypt will be desolated” ’ (13–15).

Note. 2 ‘A monster’—cf. 29:3–5 where similar imagery is used.

32:17–32 Egypt’s descent to the domain of death

This lament expands on two themes which had already been mentioned in the oracles: (1) Egypt will lie in its death alongside other nations ‘killed’ in battle, and (2) she will share her fate with the uncircumcised. (cf. 31:18).

Ezekiel uses poetic imagery in his description of Egypt in her state of death. She is depicted as lying in a land surrounded by the war-graves of other deceased nations. The imagery is not to be seen as a description of the after-life in theological terms. It was a useful way of conveying the degradation of Egypt’s condition.

17–32 Ezekiel is told to lament for Egypt as she descends to the domain of death. She will join the uncircumcised. Others are there already: Assyria (22–23); Elam (24–25); Meshech and Tubal (26–27); Edom (29); Princes of the North (30); Sidonians (30). Pharaoh and his hordes will join them (28, 32).

All this has a surprisingly ‘modern’ ring to it; many régimes, great and small, have foundered in the last century for instance. Yet a study of history shows that this is the normal flux in which nations rise and fall. The ‘flat field’ and secure existence that we hopefully regard as normal is an unfulfilled hope. There is eternal security in the Lord, but apart from that security is an illusion.

Notes. 24 ‘Elam’—a country to the east of Babylon. 26 ‘Meshech and Tubal’—countries from Asia Minor (cf. 27:13). 27 ‘Swords placed under their heads’—their burial lacked military honours. They had just a basic war-grave.

33:1–20 The scope of accountability

This oracle initially holds a similar theme to that in 3:16–21. Ezekiel is to act as a watchman for Israel. Along with the job come both responsibilities and penalties. (It may be noted that no reward is explicitly mentioned.) Ezekiel is to relay the nature of his task to Israel.

The oracle goes on to attack two notions about the nature of Israel’s sin. The first (10–11) was a kind of fatalism, where people maintained they were trapped in their own wrongdoing, that God even was glad to see them in such a state (and thus, if God wanted it that way, there was no point in even trying to change). This idea is rebuffed: God takes no pleasure in the death of even the wicked. It was up to them to change their ways.

The second notion was that people built up a store of merit (cf. 18:21–32). Thus a lot of good deeds could be used to offset a lot of bad ones. Such a view meant that there was no hope for the person whose life had been principally evil—that person would be unable to offset the evil done with enough good. Furthermore it meant that those who thought they had built up enough merit could indulge in whatever sins they liked provided they did not exceed their quota. This notion is also rejected. A sincere repentance can overcome any history of wrong-doing. Wilful evil cannot be offset by past charitable actions.

1–6 Ezekiel must proclaim to his countrymen: ‘Suppose a country is threatened by war, and that a certain individual is called to the job of giving advance warning of any attack (2). If that person sounds the alarm when attack is near, then any responsibility for casualties will rest with the citizens themselves (3–5). But if the alarm is not sounded when attack is near, that person will be held responsible for the death of any of the citizens’ (6).

7–9 Ezekiel has been given that job for the Israelites. He is to convey to them the warnings God sends (7). If he does not convey those warnings to anyone he will be held responsible for that person’s fate. But if he does, he will have saved himself (8–9).

10–20 Ezekiel is further to proclaim to Israel: ‘You say that you are burdened to death by your sins. I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked (10–11). If a righteous man turns from his former ways and starts to do evil, none of the righteous things he has done will count; he will die for his sins (12–13). If a wicked man turns from his ways and starts to do what is just and right, his previous misdeeds will be forgotten; he will live (14–16). Although you, Israel, say that my way is unjust, it is your way that is unjust. Each of you will be judged accordingly’ (17–20).

Note. 2 ‘Watchman’—see note on 3:16–21.

33:21–22 Ezekiel regains his speech

This incident is unique in the book of Ezekiel in that his prophetic experience (‘the hand of the LORD was upon me’) did not result in a vision or oracle. Instead, Ezekiel was given back the power of speech that had been taken from him at the start of his ministry (3:26–27).

The timing of this event was significant. On the next day the news arrived that Jerusalem had fallen. Ezekiel’s warnings had come true.

Note. 21 ‘Twelfth year’—Jerusalem fell in 587 BC. A number of versions and manuscripts read ‘eleventh year’. If this reading is correct, and the year refers to the reign of Zedekiah, then the time interval between the fall of the city and the fugitive’s visit to Ezekiel was about six months. Cf. Ezr. 7:9, where a straight journey from Babylon to Jerusalem took a full four months.

33:23–33 Israel’s illegal possessions

The siege was over. Jerusalem had fallen and the land had been laid waste. Many had been killed and others had been deported or forced to flee. Yet there were some survivors.

Calamity does not always bring out the best in people. After the first siege of 597 one group of survivors in the city gloated as they planned to rise to the top (11:2–12). After the second siege the land had been depopulated. Those who were left, far from turning to God, maintained their idolatry. Furthermore, they took it upon themselves to annex their neighbours’ possessions and land, even to abusing the wives that were left (24–26). Ezekiel’s oracle warns that further desolation of the land would ensue because of what was being done.

At the end of the oracle Ezekiel is warned of a problem which many preachers experience. The people liked to listen to him but did not put into practice what he said. A preacher may have entertainment value, but that does not mean he is heeded.

Deprivation, like calamity, does not always bring out the best in people either. Desperate circumstances sometimes evoke desperate actions, and we must have understanding in such cases. However, there are times, as with this oracle, when chaos and ruination are simply treated as moments of opportunity by greedy and ruthless people.

23–29 The word of the Lord to Ezekiel is: ‘The people inhabiting the ruins in the land of Israel think that they now are its owners (24–25). Proclaim to them: “You carry out pagan and violent practices—should the land fall into your possession? (25–26). Because of what you do, the land will be desolate. Then you will know that I am the Lord” ’ (27–29).

30–33 Again to Ezekiel: ‘You are a topic of conversation among your compatriots. They gather to hear you, but pay only lip-service to what you say. You are like an entertainer to them. However, when your proclamations come true, they will know that a prophet has been among them.’

Notes. 24 ‘Abraham was only one’—their reasoning was that if Abraham, a single individual, could take possession of the land, then it would be no problem for them, who were much more numerous, to do it. 33 The mark of a true prophet was that what he predicted indeed came true.

34:1–48:35 Prophecies of restoration

The prophecies in chs. 34–48 have an entirely different theme from the earlier ones. Whereas the oracles of chs. 1–33 consist primarily of warnings of disaster that would befall the people of Israel or their neighbours, the emphasis in 34–48 is on restoration and hope. Jerusalem and the temple had been destroyed. The people had been driven into exile. But yet there is hope.

Modern readers find these chapters difficult to interpret, partly because of the unfamiliar imagery and partly out of a tendency to look for a specific modern event which relates to what the prophecies describe. It is important to remember that these oracles are essentially similar in character to those in earlier parts of the book. Many of the features of the later chapters have counterparts in earlier ones e.g. the promise of a new covenant (16:60), the return to the land (28:25), the symbolic use of numbers (4:5–6; 14:21; 29:13) and identification of a nation by its ruler (29:1–6; 31:2–18). There are references which seem deliberately vague or symbolic, e.g. David and Gog, or which point to an end-time e.g. ‘David will be their prince for ever’ (37:25). Such references have led commentators to class Ezekiel as ‘proto-Apocalyptic’.

For us the images can be distant and hard to picture. Yet they must have had painful associations for the exiles. The detailed description of the temple (40–48) is difficult for us to follow, but it would have brought memories flooding back to those who had known the temple and worshipped there. The images of the valley of dry bones (37), of scattered sheep (34), of ruined buildings and wastes (35, 36), of a land strewn with fallen weapons (39), and of wild animals feasting on dead soldiers (39) are all images of war. They are pictures of a land so ravaged that the dead lay unburied, their corpses rotting and their weapons rusting. These images would have been painfully real to those who had witnessed Israel’s military destruction.

These prophecies were in the first place for the people of Ezekiel's day. Their content was expressed in terms that the people of then knew and understood. The resolution of the prophecies should not be seen as one-off events but as a process. Their purpose was to bring hope when all hope was gone and to bring guidance when the very reason for living was unclear. Their fulfilment started the day they were delivered. The people of God would never be abandoned no matter what calamity might confront them.

This is not to conclude that such prophecies have no meaning for us today. As we have seen, the fall of nations and the devastations of war are as familiar items of news on our TV screens as they were for Ezekiel's prophecies. Yet overall the same God holds out to us the same hope of future restoration.

34:1–31 Israel's shepherds denounced

The image of the people of God as a flock of sheep occurs several times throughout the Bible. In this oracle, the current shepherds—i.e. the rulers of Israel—are rebuked for their self-interest and lack of care for their subjects. Furthermore, some sheep had grown fat at the expense of others i.e. some people had acquired wealth and power by oppressing others who were poorer and weaker. Ezekiel warns that justice will be restored.

The warning turns into a promise for the future (21–24). Not only will the Lord save his sheep, he will also appoint his servant David to be shepherd over them, and make a covenant of peace with them. As in other oracles, the name is symbolic. The reference to David does not mean that the ancient king David will be literally resurrected and set up as ruler. Its primary force is that the coming ruler will have the exemplary attributes of David—someone in whom the Lord delighted and who triumphed over the foes of Israel. David is also referred to in 37:24–26, where his rule is described as lasting for ever. The same passage also refers to the everlasting covenant of peace which the Lord will make with his people, a theme almost identical to that in 34:25–30.

Both passages clearly are looking forward not just to Israel's immediate future but also to her long term future. God would make peace with the people, and he would appoint a shepherd to rule them.

The oracle brings a promise of hope. Even if God's people were scattered and oppressed they would one day receive justice. Readers of the NT will see that day as the time of the return of Jesus Christ, a promise sealed by his first coming, death and resurrection.

1–31 Ezekiel is to proclaim to the shepherds of Israel: 'Woe to you shepherds of Israel. You did not look after the flock. They have become scattered over the lands. You only took care of yourselves (2, 5–8). I am against the shepherds. They will be held responsible for the flock, but will be discharged from their jobs. They will no longer feed off my flock (10). I will rescue my scattered flock. I will gather them from the nations and bring them to good pasture in the land of Israel. I myself will tend to them and be a just shepherd (11–15). I will judge between one sheep and another. Some have grown fat at the expense of others. The flock will no longer be plundered (17–22). I will appoint my servant David to be their only shepherd. I will be their God, and David will be their prince (23–24). I will make a covenant of peace with them. They will dwell in safety in a fertile land. They will be rescued from enslavement. Then they shall know that I their God am with them and that they are my people' (25–31).

Notes. 13 'Bring them ... gather them'—the promise of restoration gets special emphasis in chs. 34–48. However, it occurs in earlier oracles too: 11:17; 16:60; 20:34, 42; 28:25. 25 'Covenant of peace'—the promised new covenant (cf. Je. 31:31–34).

35:1–36:15 Prophecies and mountains: warnings to Edom and encouragement for Israel

It is important to note that ch. 35 and ch. 36:1–15 form one single oracle. The imagery running throughout is that of mountains. The mountain of Edom, Mount Seir, will be laid waste (35:7, 14), whereas the mountains of Israel will become fruitful (36:8–9) and repopulated (36:10–12).

Edom was Israel's neighbour and ancient rival. The two nations were ethnically close, yet maintained ancient enmities. The land of Edom lay on Israel's eastern border, running south from the Dead Sea. The mountain associated with Edom—Mount Seir—would have overlooked Israel's eastern flank. The Edomites could monitor Israel's misery when it befell her.

Edom is condemned on several counts. First, she had apparently betrayed Israel in Israel's hour of need (35:5). Second the Edomites had gloated, even rejoiced at Israel's destruction (35:12, 15; 36:5). Third, they had taken the opportunity to plunder some of Israel's land during this time of turmoil (35:12; 36:2, 5). Long-standing feuds between neighbours are often difficult to erase. It is easy to take delight in or even take advantage of the misfortunes of a disliked neighbour. Yet our dealings should be just, even when we find them difficult.

Edom may be taken as a symbol of the ceaseless hostility between God's people and the 'world'. Whereas David was the king who conquered and held Edom (see Commentary on 34:21–24 and 2 Sa. 8:12–14), and David is symbolic of the triumph of Israel, so the downfall of Edom symbolizes the beginning of the new order. The return of 'David' will remind us of the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of the new order, the kingdom of heaven, which Jesus Christ came to proclaim.

35:1–15 Ezekiel must proclaim against Edom: 'I am against you Edom. When I make you desolate, you will know that I am the Lord (3–4). Your long-standing hostility led you to betray Israel in their final hour (5). Bloodshed shall therefore pursue you, and you shall become a wasteland. Then you will know that I am the Lord (6–9). You thought you would take possession of the territory of Israel and Judah when they were laid waste. You also boasted against me. Because you rejoiced when Israel became a desert, you will become a desert (10–15). Then you shall know that I am the Lord' (4, 9, 15).

36:1–15 But to the mountains of Israel Ezekiel is to proclaim: 'The enemy thought they would take possession of and plunder you (36:1–4). You have suffered the scorn of nations, but nations around you will suffer scorn too (36:5–7). Yet you will become fertile and prosperous, with many settlements. Then you will know that I am the Lord. My people will come to possess you as inheritance (36:8–12). No longer will the mountains of Israel rob the nation of its people' (36:12–15).

Notes. 35:10 'Two nations'—i.e. Israel and Judah. 36:2 'The ancient heights'—much of Israel and Judah lay in the mountainous region between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. 36:12–13 'You ... deprive them of their children'; 'you devour men'—here the mountains are portrayed as contributing to the destruction of the people. The expression may be purely poetic; no doubt many did perish in battle skirmishes in the mountain areas.

36:16–38 The restoration of Israel

This oracle forms the core of the book of Ezekiel. Its message is a summary of the book. Israel had offended God through bloodshed and idolatry (18). Her punishment meant dispersal among the nations—exile (19). Yet the Lord would not leave them there. They would return to their land (24). He would cleanse them and transform them and they would follow him (25–28). The land and its people would flourish again (29–38). The surrounding nations would know that the Lord had acted (36).

The reason why the Lord would bring his people out of their exile is clearly expressed. It had nothing to do with any innate goodness or desirability in the people themselves. Rather, it had to do with God's desire that his name should not be profaned. The very fact that Israel was in exile led others to think that the God of Israel was either incapable or unwilling to look after his own people. This situation was denigrating the character of God, and for this reason, God would restore his people (20–23).

This oracle brings hope to all of us. God acts to save, not on the basis of our worthiness, but out of the richness of his mercy.

16–38 To Ezekiel God says: 'When Israel dwelt in their own land, they defiled it with their iniquity. So I scattered them among other lands. Yet their dispersal profaned my name, which is of concern to me (16–21). Therefore, God's word to Israel is: "For the sake of my name I will show myself holy through you to the nations. Then they will know that I am the Lord (22–23). I will bring you back to your own land and cleanse you. Your heart of stone will be replaced with a heart of flesh. I will put my Spirit in you and make you follow my laws. The land will be plentiful [and] you will come to detest and be ashamed of your past conduct. It is not for your sake that I do this (24–32). When I cleanse you from all your sins, the towns will be rebuilt and the land recultivated. The nations left around will then know that I have restored it all (33–36). The people of Israel will become as numerous as sheep. Then they will know that I am the Lord" (37–38).

Notes. 25 'Sprinkle clean water'—a ceremonial act of cleansing. 26 'Heart of flesh'—the use of the term 'flesh' here should not be confused with its use in other parts of the Bible, where it often denotes frailty or corruption. In this passage 'heart of flesh' is contrasted with 'heart of stone', the implication being that the stony cold, hard-hearted nature of the people of Israel would be replaced with a warm, living spirituality.

37:1–14 The valley of dry bones

After the fall of Jerusalem the people would have been scattered and dispirited. The oracle had a simple message: that the dead nation of Israel would one day be revived and return to their own land. The dry bones became living warriors. An equally powerful transformation would one day be applied to Israel.

The force of this vision has brought hope to many down the centuries. The power of God can change even the most hopeless of lives and situations.

1–11 Ezekiel has a vision in which he is transported to the middle of a valley full of dry bones. The Lord tells him to prophesy to the bones and to tell them they would become covered with flesh and come to life. He does so, and while he is prophesying, the bones come together with a rattle. Flesh, sinews and skin cover them, but they are still dead (1–8). He is then told to command the wind to blow on the bodies. When he does so, breath enters them and they become alive—an immense army (9–10). The Lord explains to him: 'These bones represent Israel, who say that their hope has dried up' (11).

12–14 Ezekiel is to proclaim to all the people of Israel: 'I will bring you out of your graves to the land of Israel. Then you will know that I am the Lord (12–13), I will put my Spirit in you and settle you in your land. Then you will know that I am the Lord, I have said it and will do it' (14).

Notes. 1 ‘The hand of the Lord’—this expression indicates that Ezekiel was about to experience an intense vision rather than the usual more ‘verbal’ message. 5, 14 ‘Breath’—the Hebrew for this word can also mean ‘spirit’ or ‘Spirit’.

37:15–28 The reunion of Israel

The people of Israel had been separated into two kingdoms—Israel and Judah—since the end of Solomon’s reign almost three centuries earlier. Not only would they be restored, as promised in the preceding oracle, they would also become one nation again.

They would have one ruler, who is described here as ‘my servant David’. (See the comment to 34:1–31 where the term is also used.) By calling the new ruler ‘David’, the prophecy implies that the new ruler will have all the worthy attributes of king David and all his privileges of ancestry, right to the throne and standing before God in the light of his promises. Israel’s future is depicted as an idealised version of her past. Even the deepest wounds of history can be healed through the power of God.

15–23 Ezekiel is instructed to: ‘Take two sticks. Write on one: “Belonging to Judah and his associates”, and write on the other: “Belonging to Israel and his associates”. Join both sticks together in your hand so that they become one (16–17). When anyone asks you, explain the significance of this act, which is: “I the Lord will join Israel’s and Judah’s sticks together so that they become one” (18–19). Show them the sticks (20), and proclaim: “I will gather Israel from the nations back to their own land. They will have one king and will never again be divided into two kingdoms. They will no longer defile themselves—I will cleanse them. They will be my people, and I will be their God” ’ (21–23).

24–28 ‘My servant David will be king over them for ever. They will observe my statutes. They and their descendants shall dwell in their ancestral land for ever (24–25). I will make an everlasting covenant with them. Their number shall increase (26). My sanctuary will be placed among them for ever. I will be their God, and they will be my people. The nations shall then know that I the Lord make Israel holy, because my sanctuary will be ever with them’ (27–28).

Notes. 16 ‘Ephraim’s stick’—the name ‘Ephraim’ was less ambiguous than ‘Israel’. Ephraim clearly was of the northern kingdom, whereas the name ‘Israel’ could have applied to the people of both kingdoms. 26 ‘My sanctuary’—this promise concerning the sanctuary is expanded in chs. 40–48.

38:1–39:29 Prophecies against those who oppose Israel

We do not know for certain of a historical ruler called Gog. The lands that he ruled—Magog, Meshech and Tubal—are probably to be located in the region of Asia Minor and the Black Sea—see note to v 1. These lands would thus lie at the farthest reaches of the world of the Middle East. It may well be that Gog and his nations are symbolic of the people of the world who are arraigned against the people of God. (The book of Revelation refers to Gog and Magog in this sense in Rev. 20:8). Viewed in this way, the oracle becomes a warning that, even after their return from exile, the people of Israel would at the same time experience immense forces against them. Yet these forces would be routed, and their destruction would be great.

The intensity of the imagery in the oracle—the great armies and the huge numbers of fallen—has led some interpreters to see this oracle as predicting a specific final battle. However, if we compare this oracle with e.g. those against Egypt in 32:1–16 and Tyre in 28:11–19, we find a similar extravagance of symbolism.

The implication of the oracle is that in future days the people of God would experience the massed forces of evil ranged against them. The odds would seem insurmountable, but the power of God would protect his people. The enemy would be routed. This victory still lies in the future for us, but the crucial blow has been struck at the cross of Calvary.

38:1–23 The Lord tells Ezekiel to proclaim to Gog: ‘I am against you, Gog. You and your allies will suffer a rout (38:2–5). Get ready, for in years to come you and your hordes will invade the land of Israel (38:7–9). At that time you will scheme to plunder and pillage a rich, peaceful land (10–13). You and your numerous allies will advance from the far north. I will bring you so that nations may know me (14–16). I spoke of you in the past through my servants the prophets (17). When you attack Israel, there shall be a terrifying earthquake with accompanying violent storms. In afflicting you with these I shall make myself known to many nations. Then they shall know that I am the Lord’ (18–23).

39:1–16 ‘On the mountains of Israel I will knock your weapons from your hands. There you will fall and provide food for the birds and beasts of prey (39:1–5). I will make my holy name known to Israel. The nations will know that I am the Lord, holy in Israel. This shall surely happen (6–8). It will take the inhabitants of Israel seven years to use up the fallen weapons as fuel for their fires (8–10). The burial ground of Gog will be called the Valley of Hamon-Gog. It will take the people of Israel seven months to bury them all and cleanse the land’ (11–16).

39:17–29 Ezekiel is also to proclaim and call to all the birds and animals: ‘Prepare for the great sacrifice. You will eat flesh and drink the blood of these armies till you are gluttoned (17–20). Nations shall see what I have done. Israel will know that I am the Lord their God, and the nations will know that they (Israel) had gone into exile because of their sins (21–24). I will restore Israel from captivity and thus show myself holy. Then they will know that I am the Lord their God. I will pour out my Spirit upon them’ (25–29).

Notes. 38:1 Meshech and Tubal were probably situated in Asia Minor (cf. v 6). The name ‘Magog’ appears as one of the sons of Japheth in Gn. 10:2; 1 Ch. 1:5 and is thus the name of a people. The word ‘Magog’ may simply mean ‘land of Gog’. 38:5 ‘Cush’—Upper Egypt. ‘Put’—Libya. 38:6 ‘Gomer’—a land in Asia Minor. ‘Beth Togarmah’—Armenia. It can be noted that the sons of Japheth in Gn. 10:2 included Gomer, Magog, Tubal and Meshech. 38:12 ‘the centre of the land’—Jerusalem (cf. 5:5). 38:17 ‘Are you not the one I spoke of ...?’—This question could be taken as another indication that Gog is symbolic. The implication here is that Israel had already been warned of such an event. 39:9 ‘Seven years’—the number seven (also in 39:12—‘seven months’) symbolizes the completeness of the event. 39:12 ‘Burying them in order to cleanse the land’—anyone who touched a corpse was rendered ceremonially unclean (Nu. 19:11). 39:18 ‘Bashan’—a region east of Galilee renowned for the quality of its cattle and oak-trees. 39:25–29 This section does not denote yet another gathering of Israel. It can be seen as summing up God’s intentions for his people.

40:1–48:35 Visions of the new temple and the new land

This last oracle is the largest in the whole book. It belongs to that group of oracles which Ezekiel introduces with the expression ‘the hand of the LORD was upon me’ (40:1). It is thus one of those visions which Ezekiel experiences physically; he finds himself transported inside the vision to another place.

The date of the vision was around April 573 BC (40:1). Both Jerusalem and the temple had been devastated over twelve years previously. The people of Israel were scattered abroad or else living in poverty in their own ruined land. The royal line had vanished. There was little to indicate that their old way of life would return.

It is at this point that Ezekiel experiences his vision. It is a mixture of the ideal and the real. He is brought to and conducted around a new temple. He sees the glory of the Lord enter the temple and hears the Lord declare that he will stay there for ever. He sees the altar and is instructed about the regulations concerning the prince, the priests, special offerings and feast-days. He watches as a miraculous river gushes from under the temple, ever widening, refreshing the land and even reviving the Dead Sea. The borders and divisions of the land are then specified. The oracle ends on the triumphant note that the new name of the city will be 'THE LORD IS THERE' (48:35).

It is important to remember that these chapters represent a vision. This oracle was not purely a revelation of teaching that was new, nor was it a prediction of events that were to come (though some believe that this temple will one day be built). It was also a reminder of what Israel's religion had been and should be.

The vision itself shades from the descriptive to the prescriptive to the symbolic to the apocalyptic. In between the details about the dimensions of the temple and the regulations concerning its priests lies the account of the glory of the Lord returning to the temple. The stipulations concerning offerings and the rules governing the distribution of the land are separated by a passage describing an amazing river which flows from the temple threshold and revives even the Dead Sea.

This mixture of symbolism and practical detail must have drawn the Israelites to reflect on their past and to renew their determination to change the present. Only by abandoning the gods of their conquerors and returning to the faith of their fathers could Israel hope to grasp the promise of the new Jerusalem.

The new temple area described. 40:1–4 Ezekiel has a vision in which he is transported to a high mountain. A man carrying measuring tools instructs Ezekiel to relay to Israel all that he is about to see.

40:5–16 The man measured the wall surrounding the temple area. He then went to its east (i.e. front) entrance and measured all of its features. 40:17–27 He brought Ezekiel through the entrance into the outer court. There were two other entrances to the court, one on the north and one on the south side. They had the same dimensions as the east entrance.

40:28–37 Within the outer court lay an inner court, which also had entrances on the south, east and north sides. They were the same size as the outer ones. 40:38–43 Near these inner entrances lay rooms where the sacrifices were to be washed. There were also tables and implements for the slaughter of the sacrificed animals. 40:44–47 Two other rooms were assigned to the priests in charge of the temple and the altar.

40:48–41:4 Inside the inner court lay the temple building and the altar (the altar was in front of the temple). The man brought Ezekiel to the portico of the temple and measured its dimensions. He then led Ezekiel into the outer sanctuary and measured its entrance. He went further, entering the inner sanctuary and measuring it also. This sanctuary was the Most Holy Place. 41:5–26 He then measured both the wall of the temple and its adjacent features. The temple itself stood on a raised base and had a wooden floor. There were carvings of cherubim and palm trees on the walls and doors. A wooden altar stood in the outer sanctuary. 42:1–20 On either side of the temple, facing the temple courtyard, stood the priests' rooms. The priests were to consume the most holy offerings there. These rooms were holy.

43:1–11 The man took Ezekiel to the east gate. Ezekiel saw the glory of God approaching via the east and filling the temple. He was told: ‘This is the place for my throne. I shall dwell here with Israel for ever. They will not defile my holy name again. Let them turn from their sin and I shall live with them for ever. Describe the temple to Israel. If they feel shame for their sins, tell them the details of its design and the accompanying regulations. Record all this so that they may be fruitful in their implementation of it.’

Prescriptions for temple worship: the roles of priests and prince. 43:13–27 The measurements of the altar are given, then the manner of its dedication is described.

44:1–4 The east gate is to remain shut. Ezekiel is taken to the front of the temple. There he sees the glory of the Lord filling the temple. 44:5–9 No foreigner is to enter the sanctuary, unlike previous acts of desecration. 44:10–16 The Levites who had previously followed idolatry may still serve in the sanctuary, but only Zadokites may approach the Lord to offer sacrifices. 44:17–37 The regulations regarding the appearance and conduct of the priests are given.

45:1–9 The priests are to dwell on that portion of land which is allocated to the Lord. The prince will have allotted land too. He will no longer oppress Israel through dispossession of property.

45:10–46:15 Accurate scales are to be used. The portions for sacrifices are specified. The procedures for priests, prince and people on holy/feast days are laid down.

46:16–18 The prince may only bequeath his own property to his own descendants. 46:19–24 The priestly cooking area and kitchen are described.

The land beyond the temple. 47:1–12 Ezekiel is then shown a great river which flows out from the temple down to the Dead Sea. The water in the Dead Sea is turned fresh by the river, and it teems with fish. Fruit trees grow on the banks of the river, but the marshes remain salty.

47:13–23 Ezekiel is then given a description of the boundaries of the land which is divided up among the tribes of Israel. 48:1–29 In addition, areas are set aside for the Zadokites, the Levites, the city and its precincts. 48:30–34 The city is to have twelve gates, three on each side. The gates are to be named after the tribes of Israel. 48:35 The city will be named ‘THE LORD IS THERE’.

Notes. 40 ‘Visions of God’—an expression also used in other visual oracles (1:1; 8:3). 40:3 ‘Linen cord’—it was used for measuring (cf. 47:3). 40:6–43:17 Ezekiel is taken on a guided tour of the new temple, though stays outside the inner sanctuary. Only a high priest could enter the inner sanctuary (Lv. 16; cf. Heb. 9:7). 43:2 The glory of God returns to the temple in this vision. In a previous vision (11:22–23) the glory of God had left the temple. The implication here is that God was returning to his people. 43:10–11 The significance of chs. 40–48 is explained in these two verses. The people of Israel are to contemplate the plan of the temple. If they feel ashamed of their past actions, then they should be encouraged to follow the accompanying laws and regulations. It is not explicitly stated that they should rebuild a temple according to the plan given here. 43:19; 44:15 ‘Zadok’—he was priest in the time of David (2 Sa. 15:24–29). The non-Zadokite priests were to be punished for their past disobedience by being barred from the higher functions of the priesthood. 45:1–48:29 A new allocation of the land is envisaged. 47:10 ‘En Gedi’—a town on the west coast of the Dead Sea. ‘En Eglaim’ may lie to the north of En Gedi. 48:35 ‘The Lord is there’—the last words of the book represent both the name of the new Jerusalem and a shining hope for the people of God. The Lord will be not only in the temple, not only in Jerusalem but, by his Spirit, in the hearts of every true worshipper the world over and for all time and eternity.

DANIEL

Introduction

The book of Daniel tells the story of a young Israelite taken from Jerusalem in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (605–562 BC). Despite a life-long exile and much opposition he remained faithful to his God. Like Joseph before him (Gn. 37–50), he was gifted with the ability to understand dreams and visions (1:17); he rose to prominence in a foreign court and was privileged to receive insight into the future purposes of God in history.

While told largely in the third person, the entire second half of the book (7:2–12:13), containing a series of dramatic visions, is presented in an autobiographical fashion. Although in our English Bible the book is included among the Prophets, in the Hebrew Bible it is numbered among the Writings. In that context it illustrates the nature and blessings of a life lived in faithfulness to God's covenant under inhospitable conditions (chs. 1–6) and reveals the conflicts in which God's covenant people will be engaged and divinely kept (chs. 7–12).

Type of literature

It is immediately evident that Daniel is a different kind of literature from most OT history and prophecy. Unlike the former, it is dominated by visions; unlike the latter, its visions are frequently surrealistic, describing a world in which giant statues are demolished by mysterious stones and strange beasts arise to do battle with one another.

While elements of this are to be found in the prophets (e.g. Ezk. 1), it is clear that here we have a different type of literature. In a sense, the impressions created on the reader are as important as an understanding of the details. It is theoretically possible to understand the latter and yet fail to experience the impact which the book is intended to produce.

In view of this Daniel is usually classified as apocalyptic literature, like the book of Revelation (see Apocrypha and Apocalyptic). It is, however, probably wise not to define too rigidly what this implies for Daniel. Like the relatively modern literary form of the novel (which is normally dated from around the beginning of the eighteenth century), it did not arise overnight in a complete form with carefully defined features. What is characteristic of the apocalyptic writings, however, is that its message involves an 'unveiling' (Gk. apokalypsis) of the transcendent order and how this relates to history as it moves toward the consummation. As an unveiling, it carries the caption 'come and see' as well as 'hear and understand'.

Structure

Daniel divides into two sections and is written in two languages: Hebrew (1:1–2:4a; 8:1–12:13) and its related language Aramaic (2:4b–7:28). Chs. 1–6 are biographical; chs. 7–12 are apocalyptic. The texture of the work is, however, more subtle than this, indicated by the use of Aramaic in 2:4–7:28 (i.e. in parts of both sections). It has been suggested that these are chapters which would have had special significance for non-Hebrews (hence the use of the international language). Furthermore, rather than radically separating the two sections this has the effect of linking them, while hinting that chs. 2–7 contain the heart of the book. If this is the case, ch. 1 serves as an explanatory introduction, while chs. 8–12 expand on the pattern of world history already set forth earlier in the book. The way in which the use of Aramaic spans both the biographical and the visionary sections is also a major argument for the literary unity of the book.

Within the central section (chs. 2–7) a further pattern, common in OT narrative, can be detected. Chs. 2 and 7 present visions of four world kingdoms set over against the kingdom of God; chs. 3 and 6 are narratives of miraculous divine deliverances; chs. 4 and 5 describe God's judgment on world rulers. Thus, the motifs employed in chs. 2, 3 and 4 reappear in reverse order in chs. 5, 6 and 7. The effect is that of a narrative mirroring intended to heighten certain expectations in the reader who is familiar with the device, as well as to provide increased enjoyment.

Contemporary readers are generally accustomed to books which follow a straightforward chronological order. Even if set in the form of reminiscences related long after the events, themes tend to be developed in a time line. The book of Daniel does not follow this form. The experiences of chs. 1–6 do indeed follow a chronological sequence in their settings; but the revelations throughout the book have the form of progressive parallelism, covering the same time period. The literary structure is akin to that of a spiral staircase which moves round the same point time and again, but brings us to a higher vantage point from which we are able to gain a clearer and fuller view of things. Hence, the material covers the same ground on more than one occasion, but develops it more fully each time. The same pattern may be detected in Jesus' teaching in Mk. 13 and in the book of Revelation itself.

Message

The context in which the life of Daniel is set is summed up in the question asked by the exiles in Babylon, recorded in Ps. 137:4, 'How can we sing the song of the LORD while in a foreign land?' The entire book, biography and visions, teaches us that this world will always be a 'foreign land' to the people of God (cf. Jn. 17:16; Phil. 3:20a). God's people are 'strangers in the world' (1 Pet. 1:1, 17), surrounded by malignant and destructive enemies (1 Pet. 5:8–9). Yet, it is possible to live in a way which brings praise and honour to God, just as Daniel did. He is the embodiment of the teaching of Ps. 1.

Such a life of faith (cf. Heb 11:33–34) is nourished on the knowledge of God (11:32b), consecration to him (1:8; 3:17–18; 6:6–10), and fellowship with him in prayer (2:17–18; 6:10; 9:3; 10:2–3, 12). It draws its confidence from the knowledge that God is sovereign over all human affairs (2:19–20; 3:17; 4:34–35), and that he is building his own kingdom (2:44–45; 4:34; 6:26; 7:14). Our times are in his hands (1:2; 5:26), since the affairs of earth are not unconnected with those of heaven (10:12–14, 20). He is a God who makes himself and his purposes known, so that his people may know him and rely on his word (1:17b; 2:19, 28–30, 47). Such knowledge enables God's people to resist pressure knowing that they will share in the fulfilment of his kingdom (7:22, 26–27; 12:2–3).

Author and date

No explicit statement about authorship is made in the book of Daniel, although approximately half of it is in autobiographical form. Contemporary OT scholars widely (but by no means universally) adopt the view (first argued by Porphyry, the third century Neoplatonist opponent of the Christian faith) that the book was composed, not in the sixth century (its literary setting), but in the second century, in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes (see on 8:9–14, 23–27; 11:4–35).

According to this view, the stories in chs. 1–6 doubtless have their origins in the traditions of the Hebrew people. Daniel is presented as a hero figure, faithful to God's law in the face of all opposition. The visions are largely interpretations of the past rather than supernatural revelations of the future. Rather than providing a historical account, Daniel's autobiography and visions in various ways employ, expound and apply other Scriptures in order to bring strength and encouragement to second-century Jews. Thus, for example, his own experience is seen as modelled on that of Joseph (the exile who rose to power in a foreign nation yet remained faithful to God); his prayer in ch. 9 is seen as dependent on the prayers in Nehemiah; while parts of the visions are seen as subtle expositions of Scripture (11:33; 12:3 being viewed as an exposition of Is. 52:13–53:12). The author was composing his book in the 160s BC, when God's people were suffering the fierce persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes and desperately needed to know that there was meaning to life, that faithfulness to God was significant, that suffering was not permanent, that God reigned and his people would triumph. The question raised in 12:6 ('How long will it be?') thus echoes the cries of God's people. The cryptic prophecies contain the answer: It will not be for ever.

This view also suggests that the book of Daniel can be dated with greater precision than any other OT book. The author was aware of the profanation of the temple (which can be precisely dated in December 167 BC; cf. 11:31) and the heroic resistance led by Judas Maccabeus in 166 (11:33–35), but he apparently did not know of the death of Antiochus in 164 (11:40–45 is read as a genuine, but mistaken, attempt at prophecy). Critics suggest that, whatever earlier periods of composition and revision the book may have passed through, the final edition can be dated accurately around 165/164 BC. This, in turn, becomes a major argument for believing that the fourth kingdom in chs. 2 and 7 is Greece.

According to critical scholars, therefore, Daniel is a book of edifying legends and dramatic visions, a powerful piece of second-century BC resistance literature. Because it was written in such a way that none of its first readers would have mistaken it for a history of the past, or for prophecy of the future, they would have accepted it for what it was, would have been challenged by it and gained strength through its message—just as a reader today might be moved by reading Shakespeare's Hamlet or Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov.

In seeking to confirm this view, appeal has often been made to evidence in the book itself, e.g. the use of Greek terms for some of the musical instruments in 3:5; the lack of solid evidence for Nebuchadnezzar's madness or his decrees in ch. 4; the uncorroborated references to Darius the Mede in chs. 5 and 6 and the historical inadequacy of the description of the end of Antiochus Epiphanes. While discussed briefly in the commentary, more detailed consideration of these issues will be found in the commentaries of J. G. Baldwin (Daniel, An Introduction and Commentary [IVP, 1978]) and E. J. Young (Daniel [Eerdmans, 1949]).

This view, formerly held only by theologically liberal scholars, has more recently come to be shared by others from more conservative traditions. It is argued that the book itself indicates that the stories are not meant to be understood as literal history and that the visions are obviously interpretations of the past (not revelations of the future). A passage such as 11:4–12:3 is ‘quasi-prophecy’ and would not have been read as actual prediction by the audience for whom the book was originally intended. In undergirding this position theologically, it is said that while God could, if he so wished, save men from burning flames while others died, and give detailed predictions of future events, these are not the kind of things the God of Scripture actually does.

While this view has for the past century virtually overwhelmed the conservative view, it faces considerable difficulties, only some of which may be mentioned here.

1. Were the book so obviously fictional in character, we would expect to find the first hints of this in the tradition of interpretation, prior to and independent of Porphyry’s attack on Christianity, but these are absent. If the book is ‘obviously’ composed of legend, it is hard to understand the apparently unbroken tradition of interpreting it as theological and autobiographical history and vision.

2. The writers of the NT viewed the book of Daniel as historical. Jesus regarded Daniel as a prophet (Mt. 24:15) and, therefore, the contents of his book as genuinely prophetic of the future. The author of Hebrews refers to two events from the book in the context of other historical events and characters (Heb. 11:33–34). It is hard to resist the conclusion that Jesus and the NT writers regarded the book of Daniel as truly historical and prophetic. If so, both the knowledge and the authority of Christ as the Lord of Scripture are put in doubt by a late dating. So too is the NT writers’ ability to detect fiction two centuries after it was written—a remarkable failure, akin to someone today reading Emily Brontë’s Wuthering Heights as though it were history.

3. There is a theological and psychological flaw in the notion that a piece of known and obvious fiction is well suited to inspire readers to be faithful to death. According to the second-century dating theory this is not merely a possible effect but the actual function of the book. But this is asking people to trust in the power, knowledge and wisdom of God when in fact the evidence for these attributes was a figment of the writer’s imagination, not the actual revelation and activity of God. Despite protestations that God could work the miracles of Daniel and reveal the future in detail although he has not done so, we are left with no grounds for believing he can or will do such things. Here Paul’s logic in relation to another miracle is not inappropriate (see 1 Cor. 15:15–17).

4. A number of incidental features in the book point to a Babylonian origin and a knowledge of Babylonian life which could hardly be expected of a second-century BC Palestinian Hebrew. These include the use of the Babylonian dating system (1:1); familiarity with the Babylonian love for the number six and its multiples (3:1; NIV mg.); the implication that Belshazzar’s title ‘king’ implied his acting as regent (5:7); and the reference to the Persian custom of punishing the relatives of a guilty party (6:24). Even the reference to ‘the plaster of the wall’ (5:5) is striking since we know from archaeological discoveries that the walls of the palace at Babylon were covered with white plaster.

5. The second-century dating theory assumes that Daniel was written in 165/164 BC and was mistaken in its genuine attempt to prophesy Antiochus Epiphanes’s downfall. Given the authority of the canon of the OT it is inexplicable (on this view) why the book was not revised for accuracy or how the book was accepted as canonical in the full knowledge that it contained errors.

The approach adopted in this commentary follows the long-held view of the Christian church that the book of Daniel has its origin in the sixth century BC and in Babylon. This is not to say that there are no difficulties concerning the historical contents of the book, or in believing its prophecies and miracles. The former continues to require the research of scholars; the latter, however, is related to our view of God. Part of the message of the book of Daniel is that God can and does do what his creatures cannot do (2:10–11). No interpreter of this book can avoid the challenge it brings to trust in a God who quenches fire and shuts the mouths of lions (Heb. 11:33–34), or, for that matter, in a God who raises the dead (12:2; cf. Mk. 12:18–27). (See also the chart ‘The prophets’ in The Song of Songs.)

12:1–4	The last things

12:5–13God’s reign and his servant’s rest*Commentary

1:1–21 God’s reign and his servants’ faithfulness

1:1–2 Man proposes, God disposes

The story of Daniel is introduced by two statements which provide both the historical and theological context for the entire narrative. Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came to Jerusalem and besieged it. Nebuchadnezzar invaded Palestine on several occasions. The siege referred to here took place in 605 BC, the third year of Jehoiakim’s reign (by Babylonian reckoning. Je. 25:1, which refers to the same incident, uses Jewish reckoning, counting from the new year prior to a king’s accession.) Notice that this horizontal perspective on history is coupled with a vertical or theological one: the LORD delivered Jehoiakim. Immediately we are introduced to the underlying themes of the entire book:

1. Babylon versus Jerusalem, the city of this world against the city of God (Augustine), a conflict traced in Scripture to its climax in Revelation (see Rev. 14:8; 17:5; 18:2–24). Ultimately this conflict is rooted in the declaration of Gn. 3:15.

2. The sovereign reign of God, despite all appearances to the contrary. In the fall of Jerusalem prophecy was fulfilled (e.g. Is. 39:6–7; Je. 21:3–10; 25:1–11) and the judgments of God’s covenant (of which the prophets had warned) were inaugurated (i.e. Dt. 28:36–37, 47–49, 52, 58). The exile was a judgment on Jehoiakim’s reign (2 Ch. 36:5–7), but the rot had set in long before (2 Ki. 24:1–4). To outward appearances Nebuchadnezzar was triumphant, and God’s name shamed (the placing of the temple articles in the treasure-house of his god marking the triumph of the pagan deity Nabu over Yahweh). In reality, however, nothing is outside the divine rule (cf. Is. 45:7; Eph. 1:11b) as Nebuchadnezzar himself was eventually brought to recognize (4:35). In Daniel the experience of Joseph is repeated (Gn. 45:4–7; 50:20).

1:3–7 Re-programming in Babylon

In Babylon selected Israelites were given specialized education. Those chosen were the most likely to be natural leaders (from the royal family and the nobility), (3) and had already demonstrated intellectual prowess. They were to be re-educated intellectually and treated royally. Several aims were in view, e.g. religious reprogramming (language, literature and diet all carried religious as well as cultural meanings) and a ‘brain-drain’ which would simultaneously weaken the prospect of a capable future leadership among the Israelites and potentially strengthen Babylonian society when the process was completed (5b).

The education in view doubtless involved astrology, divination and other ‘arts’. The young men needed to depend on the promise of Is. 3:1–3 long before the events of ch. 3!

The re-programming was inaugurated by the giving of new names, each of which was religiously significant as the suffixes of the Hebrew names indicate—Daniel means ‘God is my judge’; Hananiah, ‘Yah has been gracious’; Mishael, ‘Who is what God is?’ and Azariah, ‘Yah has helped’. While the forms in which their Babylonian names appear may be deliberate corruptions (a signal to the reader of the untruth involved in them), the names of pagan gods (e.g. Bel, Nabu and possibly Aku) are enshrined in them. A change of identity (no longer God’s children) and of destiny (Babylon, not Jerusalem) was in view, both of which would be reinforced by constant use.

1:8–21 Passing the first test

Having carefully explained the obstacles to faithfulness, the narrative now recounts how God carried through his sovereign plan to sustain his faithful people against all odds. The one who is in control in the affairs of nations (1–2) also works in the lives of individuals. Cf. ‘the Lord delivered’ (1) with God caused the official to show favour (9) and God gave (17).

Daniel believed that by taking the royal food and wine he would defile himself (8; cf. Ezk. 4:9–14). The reason was probably more subtle than simple allegiance to the levitical dietary laws against eating ‘unclean’ food (since no prohibition was placed on wine) or that the food had been offered to idols (unless vegetables escaped such consecration). In view of this, his resolution may simply have been his determination not to allow himself to be assimilated to (and spiritually conditioned by) the Babylonian culture when it was possible for him actively to resist. Concerning his education and his new name there was little he could be expected to do. The narrative thus underlines Daniel’s wisdom in knowing at which point his resistance should be focused.

Daniel is presented here as a model of faithful witness in the attractiveness of his life, the graciousness of his resistance (he asked, 8; Please test, 12) and the way in which his deportment evoked the favour and sympathy of the official (9) and the agreement of the guard (14).

Through their vegetarian diet, Daniel and his companions flourished physically. By implication this was also God’s doing. Human resources provide meals, but only God provides physical nourishment. The ten day test (14) became a permanent menu (15–16).

In addition, Daniel and his companions were given special divine gifts (17–19). Intellectual development and true success can be achieved without spiritual compromise; the godly may master and employ the learning of the ungodly. God makes foolish the wisdom of the world and perfects his strength where his people seem weakest (1 Cor. 1:19–25; cf. Is. 44:24–26). Not only is Daniel’s life and character portrayed in a manner deliberately reminiscent of Joseph; it is also a reflection of that of the coming Messiah (Is. 11:2–3).

The concluding comment (21) is thought by critics to be contradicted by 10:1. But the point here is not to provide the date of Daniel’s death; it is theological, not simply chronological. The first year of Cyrus (538 BC) marks the beginning of the restoration era (2 Ch. 36:22–23). The point is that Daniel lived to see the actions of Nebuchadnezzar reversed. When the king of Babylon was long dead, God’s servant continued to live and his people were restored. Thus, we are prepared for the conflict narratives which follow and for the book’s visions of the final triumph of the kingdom of God.

2:1–49 God’s reign in subduing kingdoms

2:1–13 Nebuchadnezzar’s disturbing dreams

The events of the second chapter are set during the second year of Nebuchadnezzar’s reign (604 BC; cf. 1:1–2).

In the ancient Near East kings were believed particularly to receive messages from the gods. Nebuchadnezzar’s dreams were therefore especially interesting, set as they were in the context of his ambitious foreign policy. (His victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish and Hamath had secured control of Syria; further campaigns ensued in the following years.) The contents of his dreams left him a restless and troubled man (1). He thus summoned his various advisers whose titles are indicative of the nature of Babylonian science and religion (e.g. for sorcerers see Dt. 18:10–12; Mal. 3:5).

Uncertainty exists concerning how much of his dream Nebuchadnezzar could remember (3; cf. NIV mg.). Some statements imply that he had retained at least a general sense of it (e.g. v 9c). The dream had left such a disturbing impression that he demanded the assurance of an accurate interpretation under threat of death (5). Thus, only if his counsellors could tell him the content of a dream of which they were naturally ignorant would he be confident of their ability to interpret it. The counsellors' response was both reasonable (4, 7) and increasingly desperate (10–11)—an intentional indication on the part of the narrator of the perversity of the king and the bankruptcy of the wisdom of his court.

The words in Aramaic (4) signal the change of language from Hebrew to Aramaic which is sustained until 7:28 (see the Introduction).

Nebuchadnezzar's threat of excessive and capricious (but by no means unparalleled) punishment (5) and his suspicion of a conspiracy among his advisers (9) betray a deep sense of insecurity despite his accomplishments. The decree he passed (12) includes Daniel and his companions whose (unexplained) absence heightens the drama of the narrative.

2:14–23 Daniel receives illumination

The strength and grace of Daniel's character are manifested once more (cf. 1:8, 12) in the wisdom and tact with which he spoke to the commander of the death squad, as well as in his polite request to Nebuchadnezzar (16). There is a time for patient politeness as well as straightforward rebuke (cf. 5:17–28; Mk. 6:18).

No characteristic of Daniel's life stands out more clearly than his prayerfulness (18; cf. 6:10; 9:3–23; 10:12). Here he and his companions pray for mercy (18), since the future of the kingdom of God and its witness in Babylon appeared to depend on their preservation. Daniel believed he had access to realms which the Babylonian astrologers held to be barred (11). The character of God, the Revealed and the Revealer (22–23a), formed the basis for his petition. He is the Lord of wisdom and power (20), Ruler of all history (21a) who communicates with his people (22; cf. Acts 4:24–30). In a manner not wholly explained the mystery was revealed to Daniel in a vision (19).

2:24–49 The dream explained

Daniel returned to the king's presence, now in a position to speak at greater length and with an appropriate boldness, contrasting the impotence of the king's counsellors with the knowledge of Daniel's heavenly counsellor.

Nebuchadnezzar had seen a great statue, shaped like a human being and significantly made of metals of diminishing value (gold, silver, bronze, iron mixed with clay). In this dream appeared a quarried rock which struck and destroyed the statue (note the echo of Ps. 2:9b in vs 34b–35a). The rock had two noteworthy features: it was cut but not by human hands (34), i.e. its origin lay in the activity of God, and it became a huge mountain and filled the whole earth (35), i.e. its activity was universal.

The dream referred to what will happen in days to come (28). Since the head of gold was specifically identified as Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom (38), we may assume that the other parts of the statue also represented specific empires or dynasties. Their identity was not yet unveiled to Daniel and his contemporaries (but see 8:19–21). If they are to be identified in retrospect (and in the light of 8:19–21), the chest and arms of silver (32) represent the Medo-Persian Empire (which the book of Daniel views as a single entity embodied in the ascent of Cyrus in 539 BC; cf.

5:28; 8:20). The belly and thighs of bronze (32) would then symbolize the Greek Empire which would rule over the whole earth (39) followed in turn by the Roman Empire (although some conservative interpreters have taken the legs and feet to refer to the successors of Alexander the Great).

This interpretation has often led to the understanding of the rock as Christ and its growth as a reference to the advance of the kingdom of God. There may be allusions to this interpretation in Lk. 1:33 and 20:18. It should, however, also be noted that the stone shatters all of the kingdoms signified by the statue. In a more general sense, therefore, the message of the vision is that while the kingdoms people build give way to one another in a process of the survival of the fittest, it is the hand of God that ultimately destroys them as he builds his own kingdom, one that will endure.

Critical scholars, viewing the idea of a Medo-Persian Empire as unhistorical, generally see the kingdoms represented here as Babylon, Media, Persia and Greece and Daniel's interpretation as a 'prophecy after the event' (see the Introduction).

The effect of this revelation is described in what follows (46–49). Nebuchadnezzar honoured Daniel and made a profession of recognizing his God. The appointment of Daniel's companions (49) explains their presence at the event which follows in ch. 3, which, in turn, reveals that Nebuchadnezzar's profession was only superficial.

3:1–30 God's reign in fiery trials

3:1–18 Idolatry or death

The author of Daniel clearly intends us to see a close connection between Nebuchadnezzar's dream and the statue which he erected on the plain of Dura (1). It may have been a representation of the king himself (cf. 2:38, 'You are that head of gold'). In this case, the fact that by contrast with the dream-statue (2:31–33) it was made entirely of gold (i.e. probably covered in gold-plating) suggests Nebuchadnezzar's insanely self-centred reaction to Daniel's interpretation (2:44–45). Note the sevenfold emphasis that 'Nebuchadnezzar ... set up' the statue (1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 12, 14). Given 'dominion and power and might and glory' (2:37) by God, he misused it on himself. The key to interpreting the superficiality of his confession in 2:47 is now clear.

The unusual proportions of the statue (ninety feet high and nine feet wide) suggest that the height included a substantial base.

Two features in the narrative heighten the tension which surrounds its message. First, the repetition of lists of sights and sounds (vs 2–3 for sights; vs 5, 7, 10 for sounds. Lyre, harp and pipes appear to be of Greek origin, and may indicate the widespread character of Greek culture.) The reader is 'there'. Note that the event was surrounded by a religious aura and doubtless made a magnificent aesthetic impact. By contrast, the three Hebrews recognized that acceptable biblical worship involves the submission of the mind to truth (cf. Jn. 4:24; Rom. 12:1–2). Secondly, the blatant nature of the conflict between the city of this world and the city of God. The choice was idolatry or death (4–6). At stake was not only obedience to Ex. 20:4–6, but whether those made to be, and being recreated into, the image of God (Gn. 1:26–27; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; cf. Mt. 22:20–21) should bow before the image of man. In these circumstances the faith of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego shines brighter than the flames of the furnace (Heb. 11:34), as they powerfully illustrate faithfulness to God's word (2 Cor. 4:11, 13b, 18).

Nebuchadnezzar evidently believed that each person had his or her price; none would defy his command. Certainly this was an even more severe test for the Hebrews than those already experienced in chs. 1 and 2 (which now may be seen as preparatory to this). Their faithfulness and courage received a true, if maliciously exaggerated (they pay no attention to you) and intended, testimony from the astrologers. They did, however, grasp the issue at stake: They neither serve your gods nor worship the image of gold (12; cf. Ex. 20:3–4, 23).

The king, who had previously had contact with the three Hebrews (1:18–20; 2:49), already knew the answer to his question (14) and now challenged their God as well as their courage (15). He did not reckon with their two leading characteristics: their knowledge of the power of God (17) and their commitment to his revealed word (18). Their faith was suffused with expectation (17; cf. 1:12–13; 2:16) but displayed no presumption (18) and echoed Abraham's example (cf. Rom. 4:20) and Job's testimony (Jb. 13:15a).

3:19–30 'The flames will not set you ablaze'

The climax of the hostility of the king of Babylon to the citizens of Jerusalem is reached. Formerly 'furious with rage' (13; cf. v 19), now his attitude towards them changed (19) in the face of their calm resoluteness. He commanded the furnace to be heated to its full strength (the probable meaning of seven times hotter than usual) and the strongest soldiers to bind them (20) so that they were firmly tied (23). So hot was the furnace that the flames of the fire killed the soldiers (22). By these details the narrator underlines the human impossibility of the Hebrews' survival, but the description of their clothing serves as a signal of the unexpected triumph about to take place. While the king raged and the soldiers were burned to death, the three friends appeared in festal attire (note the colourful account of their robes, trousers, turbans and other clothes; 21); by contrast with the kingdoms of this world, the kingdom of God is 'righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit' (Rom. 14:17). This is underlined by the activity of the Hebrews in the furnace (walking around unbound; 25).

Apparently the furnace had both upper and lower level access, so that the execution by cremation might be viewed as a public spectacle. Nebuchadnezzar was forced to reverse his earlier dogmatism (26; cf. v 15c) when he saw the three confessors alive, joined by a fourth god-like figure (24–25). He now recognized that it was by the miraculous intervention of their God that the three Hebrews were saved. The event is a literal fulfilment of Is. 43:1–4: 'Fear not ... I will be with you ... When you walk through the fire, you will not be burned; the flames will not set you ablaze ...'. Early Christian commentators viewed the fourth figure as an appearance of the Son of God or as the angel of the Lord (cf. v 28) and have been frequently followed. The emphasis, however, is on the completeness of God's protection, shown by the fact that they emerged without even the smell of fire on them (27). Ps. 34:19–20, which was to find fulfilment in Christ (cf. Jn. 19:26), finds an earlier fulfilment here.

Ch. 3 begins with a decree from Nebuchadnezzar which threatened to destroy the kingdom of God; it ends with a further decree in which all other kingdoms (people of any nation or language; 29) were threatened with destruction should they offend the kingdom of God. While this registers a triumph for the kingdom of God, and (by contrast with 2:47) expresses the humiliation of the king (28b), the narrator provides us with hints that Nebuchadnezzar was by no means a man of genuine faith. He was impressed exclusively by the miraculous (cf. Acts 8:9–23); his response was to promote the Hebrews (30), not to share their trust (28). While in some respects his humiliation had changed his perceptions, it had not softened his heart (cf. v 29, and contrast Jonah's confession following his humiliation; Jon. 2:8).

4:1–37 God’s reign humbles Nebuchadnezzar

4:1–18 The dream of the cosmic tree

The narrative of the fourth chapter is set within the context of a somewhat poetic letter (1–18, 34–37, possibly composed with Daniel’s guidance). The centre-piece is the narrative of Nebuchadnezzar’s fall, told in the third person, thus emphasizing that, during the recorded events, the king was in no condition to assess his own experiences. The ascription of praise (3) prepares us for the work of God to be described.

Nebuchadnezzar is described at the height of his powers: at home, in my palace, contented, prosperous (4). Here, by contrast with vs 2–3, there is no hint of the goodness or greatness of God, thus heightening the reader’s expectation that a great reversal is about to take place (cf. Lk. 12:16–19).

Nebuchadnezzar had a terrifying dream. Despite the lessons of chs. 1–3, and the confessions of 2:47 and 3:28–29, it was to his magicians that he again turned (Pr. 26:11; 2 Pet. 2:22), only to find them bankrupt (7). The entrance of Daniel (8) brings light into a dark place (cf. Mt. 5:14; Phil. 2:14–16).

The central motif in the dream was a cosmic tree, clearly representing a world empire which reached to and provided for all (10–12; cf. 2:37–38). Over it a heavenly decree was pronounced; it was to be reduced to a stump (15a). But the empire was personalized (let him ... let him ... let him; 15b–16); an individual will be humbled, living like an animal, drenched with the dew of heaven (15b). It was, presumably, this element in the dream that filled Nebuchadnezzar with foreboding (5) and puzzled the royal society of magicians (7). Again it was Daniel, God’s ‘outsider’, who alone could help.

Note that Nebuchadnezzar instinctively interpreted the reality of Daniel’s spiritual life in terms of his own religious framework (spirit of the holy gods; 18b). His earlier confessions had not delivered him from polytheism. He is portrayed as having experienced religious convictions but not a biblical conversion (cf. v 8).

4:19–27 A warning of judgment

Daniel’s perplexity and terror (19) were related to the interpretation of the dream rather than to any inability to understand it. His sensitivity is noteworthy (e.g. his use of a courtly Near Eastern prologue to the interpretation; 19b). The revealed humiliation of the king did not give him pleasure, and in this he reflects the divine heart and the Messianic Spirit (Ezk. 18:23; Mt. 23:37). No doubt Nebuchadnezzar was a frequently repeated name in Daniel’s regular life of prayer (cf. 6:10).

The interpretation was then given (24–26). The heavenly decree was one of judgment. It was against Nebuchadnezzar (24), set in the context of God’s absolute sovereignty (25, 27). But it was both righteous and tinged with mercy: the awful judgment which would transform Nebuchadnezzar into an animal was not inappropriate for one who had behaved like a wild beast to the people of God (in addition to his attitude to the oppressed, 27; always a significant indicator of the heart in the OT, Is. 1:17, 58:6). Further, its function was to humble the king to a repentance encouraged by the hope that the God who puts down also raises up.

The judgments of God are never arbitrary; they are always morally righteous. This is underlined by Daniel’s (again, courtly) counsel to the king. Since judgment is God’s response to flagrant violation of his moral law, repentance, shown by obeying that law, may lead to mercy

(cf. Pr. 28:13; Is. 58:9b–10; Jon. 4:2). Even the merciless may find mercy; but the evidence that they desire it from God is that they will display it to others (cf. Mt. 6:12; 18:21–35).

4:28–37 Humbled and healed

God's decree was fulfilled. Following a year of opportunity for repentance (29), Nebuchadnezzar was found again in self-exaltation (30): I have built ... by my mighty power ... for the glory of my majesty (cf. Is. 13:19). His achievements were remarkable indeed, including a major renewal and reconstruction programme. He built the Hanging Gardens, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, to remind his Median wife Amytis of her homeland. But he had consciously pursued a policy of expansion, claiming he had been appointed to universal kingship by Marduk; he had not reckoned with Ps. 127:1.

The divine judgment (announced in vs 31–32) involved a complete humiliation of the king; his authority (31) and his sanity (34) were immediately (33) removed. His confession in v 33 that his sanity was restored lends credence to the view that the king's response to God's judgment evoked a psychotic condition (now known as lycanthropy). Such was the staggering impact of God's word on his mind (cf. Je. 25:15–16). Having portrayed himself as superhuman (3:1–6; 4:30), he became subhuman; having set up his own statue to be worshipped as the image of a god, he forfeited life as the image of God (Gn. 1:26–27) and the last remnants of true glory (cf. Rom 3:23). Having behaved in bestial fashion he now reaped the harvest of which he had sown the seeds (Gal. 6:7–8).

Earlier repentance by Nebuchadnezzar might have met with mercy (27). Even now God's humbling work was no longer than necessary; the divine until (32) held out the possibility of restoration. But his remission was not 'spontaneous'. It was set in the context of humble prayer (I, Nebuchadnezzar, raised my eyes towards heaven; 34) and led to worship and a confession that God alone has unlimited power (35). The king's words for the first time contain a recognition of God's covenantal activity (from generation to generation, 34; cf. Ex. 20:5–6; Ps. 103:17–18), as well as a recognition of his truthfulness and righteousness (37). He opposes the proud and gives grace to the humble (37; cf. 1 Pet. 5:5). In Nebuchadnezzar the words of Ps. 18:25–27 find rich illustration.

Christian commentators have frequently doubted the reality of Nebuchadnezzar's 'conversion'. If it were short-lived, it is not surprising that secular records of it are not extant.

A document entitled The Prayer of Nabonidus, recently discovered in the Qumran caves, has given strength to the critical view that this chapter originated in a story told of the illness of King Nabonidus (who reigned from 556 to 539 BC). The prayer records an illness lasting seven years brought on by divine judgment. In it Nabonidus tells how God gave him a Hebrew exile to explain his experience who also wrote a decree in relationship to the worship of the Most High God. While there are significant differences between Dn. 4 and this document, it is possible (as E. J. Young held) that its author has confused the tradition about Nebuchadnezzar with Nabonidus. It is strange that many critics tend automatically to assume that other documents are more likely to be historically accurate than those of the OT.

5:1–30 God's reign in removing Belshazzar

5:1–9 The writing on the wall

The book of Daniel, even the parts which may be viewed as historical, should not be thought of as merely a balanced and orderly account of affairs in Babylon. Rather, it portrays select moments of high tension in the ongoing conflict between the kingdoms of light and darkness. From the record of divine intervention in such dramatic events the reader is intended to gain encouragement for all contemporary spiritual struggles.

Strictly speaking, the last king of the neo-Babylonian dynasty was Nabonidus (556–539 BC), but for a decade he set up his royal residence in Teiman leaving his son Belsarusur (Belshazzar, ‘Bel protect the king’) as regent. Note that Belshazzar’s offering of the third highest place in the kingdom in vs 7, 16 and 29 assumes this. (Cf. Gn. 41:40 where Joseph was given second place.) Belshazzar was possibly the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar (‘father’ in vs 2, 11, 18 and ‘son’ in v 22 would have been readily understood as elastic terms by the original readers).

Again the author prepares us to anticipate activity of divine judgment in vs 1–4. At the banquet wine flowed freely from the cups held by the mixed company (3) and had the effect of deadening the king’s conscience and any sense of an innate fear of God: he gave orders to bring in the gold and silver goblets ... taken from the temple in Jerusalem (2). Blasphemy soon flowed equally freely (4), but God’s judgment signals interrupted the easy assumption that all was well (cf. Is. 47:10–11). All eyes were on Belshazzar (drank wine with [before?] them in v 1 may convey the idea of public display), preparing the reader for an illustration of the proverb ‘Before his downfall a man’s heart is proud’ (Pr. 18:12).

The divine intervention was as dramatic as it was terrifying for Belshazzar. Already presumably in a near-drunken stupor, the startling appearance of a hand writing on a wall had a sobering effect on him and transformed him from a proud reveller into a petrified and pathetic figure (6). In the fashion we have now become accustomed to he turned to the wisdom of this world, but found it impotent (cf. 2:2; 4:6). No explanation is given for the inability of the wise men to read the writing. Several are possible—indistinct formation of letters, the use of a code or uncertainty over the real meaning. In its wisdom the world neither knows God nor understands his revelation (1 Cor. 1:21; 2:14).

5:10–17 Daniel is remembered

In a manner reminiscent of Gn. 41:1–16, the name of Daniel surfaced once more in the royal family. The queen (probably to be understood as the queen mother here), in tones verging on open rebuke in the contrast she drew between Belshazzar and Nebuchadnezzar (now some twenty years deceased), referred Belshazzar to Daniel’s proven wisdom. Her apparent respect for him was underlined by the use of his Hebrew as well as his Babylonian name and in the reference to his outstanding gifts (12; cf. Is. 11:2–3). Apparently Daniel no longer played his former prominent role in Babylonian society. Belshazzar appears to have been guilty of the sin of Rehoboam (1 Ki. 12:7–8).

Belshazzar’s words (13–16) are most effectively read as those of a man still under the influence of alcohol. The allusions to Daniel’s origin and to his age (he must now have been around eighty years old) as one of the exiles my father [Nebuchadnezzar] ... brought from Jerusalem (13) is the self-assured and demeaning speech of a drunkard.

5:18–31 A king weighed on God’s scales

Daniel’s sharp response (17–24) contrasts with the style of his reaction to Nebuchadnezzar (2:16; 4:19; see also comments on 8:1–4 for further explanation) and is reminiscent of Peter’s words in Acts 8:18–20. His address resembles other OT examples of the lawsuit (cf. Ho. 12:2–6; Mi. 6:1–8). First of all, the historical background to Belshazzar’s sin was outlined (18–21). These details served as an indication of the revelation of God’s character and ways which Belshazzar should have known about and acted upon. On this basis the accusation followed (the pronouns ‘you’, ‘yourself’, ‘your’ occur fifteen times in vs 22–23). He knew God, but he did not glorify him or give thanks to him (Rom. 1:21).

The three words in the message (25) refer to weights and therefore worth or value (Mene = mina; Tekel = shekel; Parsin = parts). Daniel’s interpretation combined the basic idea of being weighed and valued with a suggestive linguistic word play. Mene is derived from the verb ‘to number’ or ‘appoint’; tekel in its verbal form means ‘weigh’ or ‘assess’ and parsin (peres is the singular) is ‘parts’ or ‘shares’. Belshazzar’s kingdom had been weighed and valued; it would be shared out between the Medes and Persians (a word play on parsin).

Belshazzar could afford to keep his promise. If Daniel’s words came true, his role as third highest ruler in the kingdom (29) would be short-lived. If not, his life probably would be. In any event, that very night saw the end of Belshazzar (30; cf. Pr. 29:1).

Daniel offered no further explanation (the fact of the divine judgment, not the details, was his concern here). Both Herodotus and Xenophon record that Babylon was taken during a nocturnal festival by means of a temporary diversion of the River Euphrates, the invaders entering the city by means of the now-dried river bed. Xenophon (who describes the expedition of Cyrus) also records that the Persians killed the young, irreligious Babylonian king.

A major difficulty arises here. Daniel records that Darius the Mede took over the kingdom (31). Elsewhere in Scripture, however, Cyrus the Persian is responsible for the liberation of God’s people from Babylon (2 Ch. 36:22–23; Ezr. 1:1–8). Critical scholars, therefore, regard the name of Darius the Mede either as deliberate fiction or as historical error, in which Darius I (King of Persia 522–486 BC) has been confused with Cyrus, who was in fact around sixty-two (31) at this time. Proposals of conservative commentators include the attractive suggestion that Darius the Mede was the Babylonian royal name for Cyrus the Persian (for an extended discussion, see J. Baldwin, Daniel, TOTC [IVP, 1978], pp. 23–28).

6:1–28 God’s reign over wild beasts

6:1–9 Darius deceived

The reign of Darius brought sweeping changes to the government of Babylon with a system of 120 local governors (satraps; 1), themselves subject to a small central administration directly responsible to the king. (The existence of further strata is suggested in v 8.)

The motivation for this arrangement (so that the king might not suffer loss; 2) speaks volumes about the temptations of political life and the fact that high office is no guarantee of high morals. Daniel (now in his eighties) again demonstrated the outstanding nature of his God-given wisdom, but his promotion aroused envy among his colleagues and subordinates (4).

The plot which followed is not the first or last time that the sacrifice of traditional hostilities, in this case between higher and lower levels of government, has been regarded as a price worth paying for concerted opposition against the Lord’s anointed (cf. Ps. 2:1–2; Mt. 16:1; Lk. 23:12; Acts 4:25–27).

Daniel’s colleagues were unable to find ground for complaint against him and therefore had no leverage to remove him as an administrator (4; cf. Jn. 14:30). While his colleagues had come to hate him they could not but recognize his integrity. They knew that their only hope lay in employing Daniel's well-known spiritual strength as a political weakness, knowing that he would obey God rather than men (5; note the further contact with Acts 4:19). This they did by turning the king's spiritual weakness into their own political strength (6–7). The irrevocability of the laws of the Medes and Persians (8; cf. Est. 1:19) was not unique in the ancient Near East, any more than the temptation to totalitarianism was to be limited to Darius (7). The significance in Persian law of the decree being put in writing is explained in Est. 8:8.

6:10–17 Obeying God rather than men

The plot was itself straightforward, but it contained a subtle testing of Daniel: all that was required was a brief period without vocal prayer (7). In addition he was now in his eighties, long past the age when heroics might be expected.

Characteristically, however, Daniel recognized that any gain made at the price of faithfulness to God's word proves ultimately to be loss (cf. Phil. 3:7–8).

While the critical issue in the narrative is the bare fact that Daniel prayed, in a marked spirit of reverence, it also provides several details of his praying, thus using him as an exemplar of a life of prayer (cf. 2:17–18; 9:3–19; 10:2–3, 12). It was his custom to worship in an attic (upstairs room; 10) where the windows opened towards Jerusalem. While knowing that God is everywhere and therefore hears prayer in Babylon, he prayed to the Lord who had made his presence known particularly in Jerusalem where the ark of his covenant was brought (note the covenant orientation of his praying in ch. 9). The regularity of Daniel's praying also elicits comment (10b) as does the note of thanksgiving which pervaded it, even in the context of grave personal danger, and the posture he adopted (he got down on his knees, 10), indicating the earnestness of his supplication (11).

In their subtlety the plotters caught both Daniel and Darius (11–12). The characteristic which made Daniel the only completely trustworthy member of the king's administration, namely his trust in a covenant God, received a radical reinterpretation at the hands of his foes. His reliability was now categorized as rebellion (13). Darius's folly was now clear to him, but he was powerless to reverse it (14), as, apparently was Daniel (17). Notice, however, the brilliantly drawn contrast which underlies the entire narrative: both the plotters and the king were feverishly active in scheming and planning (3–9, 14). By contrast, Daniel's life exuded regularity and spiritual integrity. Before v 21 he is portrayed as speaking to no-one but God.

6:18–28 Shielded by God's power through faith

Daniel was shielded by the power of God through faith (Heb. 11:33b; 1 Pet. 1:5), not from danger but in danger. To the king's astonishment and relief, angelic intervention preserved Daniel, God's witness (cf. v 22; Ps. 91:9–16). By faith (23) he had experienced the powers of the age to come (Heb. 6:5) in which lions are tamed (Is. 11:7). Like all OT miracles, this one is a foretaste of the great miracle of the resurrection of Christ (cf. v 17 with Mt. 27:60–66), which itself points to the final resurrection and restoration (1 Cor. 15:20–28; cf. Ps. 2:4–8). In an apparently 'closed universe' (17), God had demonstrated that he cannot be excluded; if believers make their bed in the depths, he is there (Ps. 139:8)! As a result, Daniel's protection and deliverance, like that of his three friends, was complete (23b; cf. 3:27 and, later, Jn. 19:31–36).

Contrary to a common assumption, there are very few dramatic miracles in the OT. Here, as in the only other concentrated periods of miracles in the OT (the days of the exodus and entry into Canaan and the time of Elijah and Elisha and the establishment of their prophetic ministry), the miraculous occurs at crisis points in the kingdom of God. The miracles in Daniel, as elsewhere, are not merely 'contrary to nature' or 'above nature'. They are primarily 'contrary to evil' and the powers of darkness. They are expressions of 'the powers of the coming age' when all evil will be vanquished.

A dark epilogue is recorded in v 24. It is probably not necessary to suppose (either here, or in v 4) that all the administrators were involved. According to Herodotus, the punishment of an entire family in this way was in keeping with Persian law. The narrative itself offers no moral comment (cf. Est. 8:1–10), but the underlying message is clear enough: to obstruct the progress of the kingdom of God is to risk all in the venture. Those who oppose God will ultimately be broken in pieces. Here again the narrative makes contact with the principles of Ps. 2 (cf. Ps. 2:9–12).

Daniel's deliverance was celebrated in the decree of the king (perhaps under Daniel's own direction), in the context of doxology to God as living (26, i.e. actively engaged in the affairs of the world), sovereign and saving. Daniel himself is a vivid illustration of the most basic principles of a godly life (cf. Ps. 1, especially vs 2–3). If Darius is indeed to be identified with Cyrus, 'and' (28) should be translated (as it quite properly may be) as 'that is' (NIV mg.).

7:1–28 God's reign over bestial kingdoms

7:1–14 Four beasts, one man

Ch. 7 both introduces the second half of the book and links its two sections together. While it introduces a new section containing Daniel's apocalyptic visions, it also takes us back to the reign of Belshazzar (cf. ch. 5) and concludes the Aramaic section of the book. The reader is thus advised to see important connections between history and apocalypse. In content the vision in this chapter is reminiscent of Nebuchadnezzar's dream in ch. 2. There, however, the focus was on the successive powerful kingdoms which stood against the kingdom of God but were ultimately overpowered by it; here it is on the depravity but short-lived character of those kingdoms (represented by bestial figures) by comparison with the everlasting kingdom of God.

As elsewhere in apocalyptic literature, the visual dominates (note the emphasis on seeing in vs 2, 4, 6, 7, 9, 11, 13). While it is important to try to interpret the historical significance of the vision, the fact that the revelation is given in visual form underlines the importance of its appeal to the senses as well as to the reason; it is intended to create impressions, not merely communicate propositions.

The vision took place during the first year of Belshazzar's reign (cf. comment on 5:1). Doubtless Daniel's intimate knowledge of the royal family would have filled him with foreboding for the immediate future (that he has little time for Belshazzar is clear from 5:17).

Now God filled his mind with a more cosmic vision of the great sea (possibly the Mediterranean, but more probably a general picture of the world in its frightening godlessness and instability). It is, however, churned up not by the beasts which emerge from it but by the four winds of heaven (2), an indication that behind even the most fearful of events lies the activity of God. This is further emphasized in the use of the passive in the descriptions of the beasts, which evidently represent empires: the lion-like creature whose wings were torn off was lifted from the ground and the heart of a man was given to it (4; possibly a picture of Nebuchadnezzar); the bear-like creature was told, 'Get up and eat your fill of flesh' (5); and the leopard-like creature was given authority to rule (6). Totalitarianism there may be, but there is never ultimate autonomy in human rule. Believers will always be able to look beyond what kings do to how God rules. The close connection between these creatures and the dream of Nebuchadnezzar suggests that they represent the same empires (Babylonian, Medo-Persian and Greek, according to the above interpretation). Interestingly, Nebuchadnezzar is elsewhere compared to both the lion (Je. 4:7; cf. 49:19; 50:44) and the eagle (Ezk. 17:3, 11–12). Cf. v 4 with 4:33–34. No better description could be found of the conquests of Alexander the Great than a leopard with wings which had developed four heads. (In fact a fourfold division of the Greek Empire followed his death.)

The fearful character of these creatures pales into insignificance before the description of the fourth beast and its brutality. Whereas the earlier creatures resemble a lion, an eagle, a bear and a leopard, this one has no likeness in the animal world. While Daniel was still puzzling over its ten horns (7–8), his attention was caught by a new horn; it apparently represented an individual, but one whose humanity was self-engrossed (8).

As Daniel watched, three scenes were brought quickly before his eyes. It may be wisest to think of them as parts of a tapestry which together convey one great impression.

The first scene (9–10) is a vision of the throne of God. In contrast to the previous scenes, it is marked by order, tranquillity and ultimate sovereignty. While no connection between this and the second scene (11–12) is explicitly stated, it is clearly implied that the judgment of God lies behind the destruction of the beast and the breaking of the power of the other beasts (10; the court was seated ... books were opened suggests that a judicial verdict was about to be issued). Before the Ancient of Days, the kingdoms of this world are short-lived. His presence as a holy and righteous judge is conveyed by an impression of burning brightness and perfect whiteness (9; cf. Ps. 50:3–4). The third scene returns to the throne-room of God where one like a son of man is presented to the Ancient of Days (13) and receives universal authority from him. This figure is True Man by contrast with the beasts. He is able to bear the holiness of God and remain in his presence. In this figure the rock of Nebuchadnezzar's dream (2:35, 44–45) becomes a man in whom the true image of God shines forth (Gn. 1:26–28), the Messianic Man who will be God's true regent (cf. Pss. 2:8; 8:4–8; 72:1–11, 17; Heb. 2:5–9; 12:28).

7:15–28 The horn that waged war

Daniel was given a series of clues to explain these scenes. The interpretation of the beasts as empires is in keeping with them. The vision was intended to assure him that the saints of the Most High will receive the kingdom (18). This should not be taken to suggest that the 'son of man' (13) and the saints of the Most High are identical, but that they are related in some way, ultimately made clear in the coming of Christ (e.g. Rev. 1:7). His coronation is the guarantee that his saints will share in his triumph (Rev. 20:6).

Although having thus been given an assurance of the triumph of God's kingdom, Daniel was especially troubled by the identity of the terrifying fourth beast, its horns and particularly the little one (19; cf. v 8). The interpretation he received illumines the vision but by no means makes it plain. It is not surprising that commentators have differed in their interpretation of the passage. Its difficulty should warn us not to be dogmatic in explaining it.

The little horn appears in the context of the last empire. How we identify it depends on our general scheme for interpreting the whole vision (and Nebuchadnezzar's dream in ch 2). Special note should be taken of the little horn's threefold character in v 25. It is guilty of blasphemy, persecution of God's people and some form of self-deification (since to change the set times, v 25, is the prerogative of God alone, 2:21).

Those who set the readership of Daniel in the second century BC usually identify the fourth kingdom as Greece, and view the little horn as Antiochus Epiphanes. It is not possible, however, to read this passage from a NT perspective without recognizing that the figure of the 'son of man' (13) is fulfilled in Christ (cf. Mk. 13:26; Acts 7:56; Rev. 1:13; 14:14).

This (retrospective) interpretation suggests that the figure of the fourth beast is fulfilled in Rome. It is probably best to regard the 'horns' (7, 8, 24) as a continuation of the 'spirit' of Roman dominion, in the context of which arises the little horn, the man of lawlessness, the final antichrist (20–21, 25; cf. 2 Thes. 2:4–12; 1 Jn. 4:3b), who fiercely oppresses the saints (25) for a time. His power will then be consolidated and intensified (for ... times), but will suddenly be broken (and half a time). The son of man, being granted universal dominion for himself and his people, will then reign for ever (14, 26–27).

Daniel was affected both physically and mentally by the vision. There is an important lesson for all who have unusual spiritual experiences in the fact that he kept the matter to himself (28).

8:1–27 God's reign endures for ever

In his visionary experiences Daniel was given a fuller understanding of the conflict in which he was personally involved. It was not limited to his own experience; rather, his experience was but one aspect of a cosmic struggle between the kingdoms of this world and the kingdom God is establishing.

Daniel's second vision reminded him of the first one (1), but this time he saw himself on the banks of the River Ulai in Susa, the capital of Persia. His vision consisted of two central visual images (1–4; 5–12) followed by two spoken revelations (vs 13–14 given by a holy one; vs 15–26, given by Gabriel; cf. 9:21 and Lk. 1:19, 26). Since the visual and the audible parts are correlated, the chapter is best examined in these segments.

8:1–4, 15–20 The two-horned ram

The two-horned ram in the first vision (3) represents the kings of the Medes and Persians (20), the longer horn doubtless representing Persia. Daniel saw it butting its way forward, expanding its territory in every direction. In fact the Persian Empire spread west to Babylonia, Syria and Asia Minor, north to Armenia and the Caspian Sea, and south into Africa. Daniel's knowledge of this (in the third year of Belshazzar's reign) is consistent with the boldness of his later address to the king in the year of his downfall (cf. 5:18–31). He had already seen 'the writing on the wall' for the Babylonian Empire. As a man of faith he was learning progressively that this was simply a pointer to the greater reality—that the writing is already on the wall for all empires except that of the Most High (cf. 2:44).

8:5–8, 21–22 The one-horned goat

As Daniel pondered the meaning of this first image, prior to receiving the interpretation of it, he caught sight of a goat with a prominent horn (5). Three things characterized it: its extraordinary speed; its apparently omnipotent ferocity in overwhelming the ram (6–7); and the dramatic breaking of its large horn and the emergence of four horns in its place (8), from one of which emerged a further horn (9).

The goat represents the Greek Empire (21). The imagery of the large horn was perfectly fulfilled in Alexander the Great who became a world conqueror between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-six, overwhelming the Persian forces in a series of decisive battles between 334 and 331 BC. He was, however, to die, a tragic figure, at the age of thirty-three (cf. v 8) and his empire was fragmented into four regions represented by the four horns (22). From one of these grows another horn (9) which is to form the climax of the entire vision.

8:9–14, 23–27 The small horn that grew

The descendant of one of the horns is now pictured engaging in a vigorous policy of expansion which reaches to Palestine (the Beautiful land, 9; cf. Dt. 8:7–9; Je. 3:19). In self-exultation (cf. Is. 8:12–15) this figure will deify himself and blasphemously forbid biblical worship (11–12). Daniel saw this continuing for 2,300 evenings and mornings (14), probably to be understood as days (cf. Gn. 1:5, 8, 13 etc.). The fact that this information was relayed to Daniel by the holy ones (13) is an indication that, despite the horror of the events, they are known to God and mysteriously within his purposes (cf. 1:2). So, too, is the little horn whose rise is not by his own power (24) and whose fall is not by human power (25).

Syria, one of the four divisions into which Alexander the Great's empire fragmented, was governed by Seleucus Nicator, head of the Seleucid dynasty from which Antiochus IV emerged in 175 BC. He took the title Theos Antiochus Epiphanes (Antiochus, the Illustrious God). Others referred to him as Epimanes ('the madman'). In his expansionist policy he overran Palestine (the Beautiful Land; 9) and sacked Jerusalem amid terrible bloodshed. He abolished the daily morning and evening sacrificial offerings (11; cf. Ex. 29:38–43) and committed the blasphemy of sacrificing a pig on the altar of burnt offering, later placing a statue of Zeus in the temple and making human sacrifices on the altar. He forbade circumcision and profaned the Sabbath (cf. vs 11–12).

The emphasis on Daniel understanding this vision is noteworthy (5a, 15–16). This illumination is not only a matter of foreknowledge of the events of history but also of insight into the nature and working of evil in its destruction of life, its opposition to godliness (24; with a focus on destroying the worship of the people of God, 11; cf. Acts 20:29–31), its falsehood and its pride (25). In the light of this Daniel learns vital lessons: that no-one should allow themselves to be lulled into a false sense of security (25, feel secure; cf. 1 Cor. 10:12; Gal. 6:1), and that God will ultimately destroy all opposition to himself (25; cf. Pss. 2:8–12; 46:8–10; Rev. 11:15–18).

The focus on the little horn, to which the roles of the greater empires of the ram and the goat are secondary, is a reminder of the distinct biblical perspective, which sees not the great empires but God's covenant people as the key to history. The ultimate significance of empires and their rulers is determined by their treatment of the people of God (9–12; cf. Mt. 25:31–46).

Two phrases point toward the fulfilment of Daniel's vision: these events will take place later in the time of wrath ... the appointed time of the end (19) and in the distant future (26). The 'end' in view here is best taken as the last part of the period of history under review (i.e. not the end of the ages).

As in 7:28, Daniel's reaction is instructive. The seriousness of the conflict in which God's people are to be involved overwhelmed and appalled him, but it did not paralyse him. Even in an ungodly environment he fulfilled his daily responsibilities (27; cf. 2 Pet. 3:11).

9:1–27 God's reign undergirding prophecy and prayer

9:1–3 Daniel searches the Scriptures

Gabriel then brought further revelation (21; cf. 8:16) which is given careful and significant chronological setting in the first year of Darius (1). Daniel was engaged in spiritual exercises. He had been meditating on Jeremiah's prophecy that the desolation of Jerusalem (2) would last for seventy years (cf. Je. 25:11–12; 29:10). The prayer which followed was deeply influenced by the spirit of Je. 25. As elsewhere in Scripture, the motivation for Daniel's earnest intercession is twofold: the need of the hour and God's covenanted word of promise. While abstract logic might lead us to ask why he needed to pray when God had already given his promise, Daniel himself understood that God employs prayer as the means by which he is pleased to fulfil his word. Genuine repentance and intercession affected Daniel outwardly as well as inwardly (3). This was presumably a part of Daniel's private devotions, but his actions were not in contradiction of the spirit of Mt. 6:16–18, which concerns our appearance in public and in any event has in view those who seek the reward of others' praises rather than God's approval.

9:4–19 Prayer, a covenant work

Daniel's praying was dominated by a sense of the character of God especially as that is revealed in his righteousness. The righteousness of God is his absolute integrity, his conformity to his own perfect glory. In his relationships with his people this takes the form of his faithfulness to his covenants with them. In that covenant relationship he has promised to be their God and to take them as his people; he has promised that they will enjoy blessing as they themselves respond to his covenant love in faithfulness, but judgment should they respond to him in unbelief, ingratitude and disobedience (cf. Dt. 27; 28). It is significant that the covenant name of God, Yahweh, used in the book only in this chapter, appears frequently printed in the NIV as LORD (v 2, 4, 10, 13, 14, 20; cf. Ex. 3:13–15).

These principles underlie all of God's dealings with his people in the OT and come to the surface in Daniel's prayer. In his longsuffering with his disobedient people God had sent prophets to summon them back to covenant faithfulness (5–6). Their exile was the result of their indifference to his warning and a fulfilment of the covenant curse (7; cf. Dt. 28:58, 63–64; Je. 18:15–17). In a true spirit of repentance, Daniel, the most faithful of all God's people, took to himself their guilt as though it were his own (we is repeated eight times in vs 5–10). In this respect his heart reflected the heart of God (cf. Is. 63:8a, 9a); they are his people (cf. v 20). The ultimate remedy awaited the time when God's Son would take his people's guilt as though it were his own (cf. Is. 53:4–6, 10–12; 2 Cor. 5:21). But the hope of forgiveness does not minimize the seriousness of their condition. Indeed Daniel ransacked the OT vocabulary as he described and confessed Judah's failure (sin, wrong, wickedness, rebellion, turning away, not listening, unfaithfulness, transgression, disobedience; 5–11) and its consequences (shame and scattering; v 7). Such judgment is the expression of God's covenant righteousness in response to the sin of his people. He has kept his promise (7, 11–14).

As he prayed over the plight of his people, Daniel did not ask God to abandon his righteousness. Paradoxically, it is the people's only hope. As in the first exodus, for his own glory God revealed his covenant righteousness in mercy to the oppressed as well as judgment on the wicked (cf. Ex. 3:7–10, 20; 6:6). Encouraged by the divine promises through Jeremiah, Daniel appealed to God to defend his glorious Name which he had bound to the people and the city of Jerusalem (16). The goal of his intercession is the glory of God's Name; its foundation is God's covenanted word of promise concerning the restoration; its motivation is the knowledge of the righteous mercy revealed in God's saving deeds in the past (15–19).

9:20–27 Another 'seventy'

The time of the revelation was about the time of the evening sacrifice (21; i.e. mid-afternoon)—a remarkable indication of Daniel's city-of-God-centred approach to life, since he had now been absent from Jerusalem for about seventy years (cf. 6:10). Gabriel appeared with dramatic swiftness in response to his prayer, bringing a further divine communication which extended Daniel's horizon beyond the seventy years of Jeremiah's prophecy to a period of seventy 'sevens' (24). There is a further peak in the mountain ranges of God's purposes on which he is now to focus.

The enigmatic revelation which follows first outlines the divine programme, including six things to be accomplished within the period of seventy 'sevens' ordained by God (24). The first sixty-nine 'sevens' lead to the coming of the Anointed One (25) and are divided into two unequal periods (seven 'sevens' and sixty-two 'sevens' = sixty-nine 'sevens'). This division is one of the most enigmatic features of the whole book. Possibly the first 'sevens' look towards the completion of the temple. Vs 26 and 27 may contain a miniature 'progressive parallelism': v 26 describing the final 'seven' in panoramic terms while v 27 describes it in specific detail.

Interpretations of this message vary enormously, and depend on the interpreter's wider view of the fulfilment of prophecy. Critical scholarship, setting the writing of Daniel in the context of the second century BC, sees the period in view as intended to stretch from the sixth century to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (the four hundred and ninety years being understood either in round terms, or literally and, perhaps, mistakenly). But from the perspective of the NT, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that the Anointed One (25) is fulfilled in Jesus Christ whose coming brings atonement and the end of guilt (24). Some conservative interpreters have, in addition, employed various chronologies to show that the figure of four hundred and ninety is a chronologically exact prediction of the death of Christ. No agreement has been reached either about this or about the detailed interpretation of the final 'seven'.

If the Christological analysis is generally correct, the sixty-nine 'sevens' may represent the period beyond the restoration until the coming of Christ and the kingdom he inaugurates. While difficult, v 26, the Anointed One will be cut off (the verb is one also used of confirming a covenant) and will have nothing (see NIV mg.) is reminiscent of Is. 53:8 and an indication of absolute desolation (cf. Mt. 26:31; 27:46). V 27 could then be taken to refer to the ruler who will come (26), finding its fulfilment in Titus Vespasian, the defilement of the temple and the destruction of Jerusalem in AD 70 (cf. Mt. 24:3–25). Alternatively, v 27a could refer to Christ confirming the covenant of God for one 'seven', i.e. for all future ages (cf. 1 Cor. 11:25–26); vs 27b and 27c to the desecration of Jerusalem.

For seventy years Daniel had longed for the restoration of the city and temple of God (16–19). Now that it was about to take place his attention was directed to a more distant and loftier peak in the history of redemption. Even a new temple in a rebuilt city made by human hands could be destroyed; Daniel's eyes were therefore to be fixed on a final temple (cf. Jn. 2:19), on one that would be beyond all desecration (Rev. 21:22–27).

10:1–12:4 God's reign over all history

10:1–3 In spiritual mourning

The narrative of Daniel's final vision extends from the beginning of ch. 10 to the end of the book. It is precisely dated in the third year of Cyrus (1) during the period of the Passover and Feast of Unleavened Bread and is set on the banks of the Tigris (4). On the anniversary of the exodus from Egypt a new exodus began in the first year of Cyrus (Ezr. 1), but it met with early discouragement (Ezr. 3:12–4:5). Eventually the work of rebuilding the temple came 'to a standstill' (Ezr. 4:24). Intimations of these early discouragements seem the most likely reason for Daniel's prolonged period of spiritual discipline (2). The opening verse summarizes the character of the vision which follows.

10:4–9 A glorious vision

Daniel's vision (7) had an overpowering effect on him (8). Although he alone saw the figure, it appears that his companions heard the voice which was like the sound of a multitude (6) and fled (7). While the figure was dressed in the linen of a priest (5; cf. Ex. 28:42; Lv. 6:10; 16:4), his whole being radiated such light and beauty that Daniel ransacked the vocabulary of precious metals, stones and even the elements to find adequate similes to describe him (5–7). No attempt is made to identify the man. The description of him surpasses that of other heavenly visitants in Daniel (8:15–16; 9:20–21) but clearly parallels other appearances of God and of Christ in Scripture (e.g. Ezk. 1:26–28; Rev. 1:12–15). This vision was given to emphasize God's covenant grace (priestly garment) and holy power and glory (the overwhelming brightness). In a special sense God himself is the source of the message and the guarantor of its truth (cf. v 1).

10:10–11:1 'Forces of evil in the heavenly realms'

The first part of Daniel's vision faded from view leaving him overwhelmed in a deep sleep. Then, apparently, a second figure addressed him (11), explaining that an answer to his prayers for insight (unstated, but implied in v 2) had been sent immediately he began to pray (12). The messenger had been resisted, however, by the prince of the Persian kingdom (evidently also a supernatural figure; 13) until Michael had come to his aid. The archangel Michael (cf. Jude 9) is the leading defender of God's people (your prince, 21; cf. 12:1) against the powers of darkness (cf. Rev. 12:7–9).

It is clear that behind the scenes of the conflicts of history lies a conflict 'in the heavenly realms' (Eph. 6:12), in which Daniel had become involved in his intercession. Spiritual powers tried to prevent his receiving revelation of the future (and therefore an understanding of the sure purposes of God). Implied in this is the recognition that the forthcoming revelation will strengthen Daniel and, indeed, all the people of God (14).

It is not clear whether the one who looked like a man (16) is a third figure or should be identified with the figure(s) in vs 5 or 10 (vs 20–21 seem to indicate the latter). This uncertainty is explained both by the nature of the visionary character of the revelation and by Daniel's mental condition (15–17). In either case, encouraged and strengthened by his touch, Daniel was able to receive the revelation (18–19). The heavenly messenger would soon return to his ongoing task (11:1) in spiritual warfare (20). Currently it was Persia, soon it would be Greece (20) that, humanly speaking, dominated the experiences of the people of God.

Part of the answer to the question Daniel was asked in v 20 is that he needs to know that there are heavenly powers defending the people of God (cf. 2 Ki. 6:15–23). But first he learns what is written in the Book of Truth (21), i.e. how the purposes of God will unfold.

11:2–45 The kings of the North and South

While the revelation which follows appears to modern readers to be a foretelling of future events it is so detailed that most scholars assume that the original readers would have instantly recognized it as a literary device used by a second-century author. According to this view, the close detail in the account of events in vs 21–35 indicates that the author had personal knowledge of them. Vs 40–45, on the other hand, describe events which were still future to the author, and his prophecy about them turned out to be mistaken. Scholars who hold this view, therefore, date the final writing of Daniel in 165 or 164 BC. (For the implications of this view see the Introduction.)

Throughout the chapter it is evident that what Daniel has previously learned in pictorial fashion is now set before him in the linear fashion of history. The viewpoint from which these events are seen is, however, the Beautiful Land (16) which God had covenanted to his people, and in relationship to which rulers in the south or north arise (e.g. vs 11–12). Contrary to other readings of history which marginalize the people of God (Palestine being seen as merely a land bridge between north and south), biblical revelation sees the kingdom to which they belong as the centre point and key to history.

11:2–4 The immediate future. The messenger sketches the immediate unravelling of history. The power of the Persian empire is viewed as growing until the appearance of a figure of immense power, who would have no dynasty, his empire being fragmented after his death (4).

The fourth Persian king (2) following Cyrus (cf. 10:1) was Xerxes (reigning from 486–465 BC). He is known to have gathered enormous resources through taxation and depleted them in his hostilities against Greece (2), by whom he was defeated at the battle of Salamis in 480 BC. The portrait of a mighty king whose empire would be fragmented (3–4) rather than passed on to heirs was fulfilled in Alexander the Great (Daniel already knew that the ascendancy would pass to Greece; 10:20), whose two sons were assassinated. He became a broken horn (8:22).

11:5–45 North versus South. There is widespread agreement on the interpretation of this section among commentators of quite different schools of thought, so closely does this vision coalesce with the following outline of history.

When Alexander's empire was divided into four (4), Ptolemy I became ruler of Egypt (the king of the South; 5) establishing the Macedonian dynasty from 304 BC (when he took the title of king) until 30 BC. Meanwhile Seleucus I (the king of the North) controlled Syria, establishing the Seleucid dynasty for approximately the same period. What follows is the story of the dynastic development and power struggles within these two kingdoms and the rivalry between them.

The initial attempt at alliance between the two powers is represented by the marriage (6) between Antiochus II (grandson of Seleucus I) and Berenice (daughter of Ptolemy II). The peace was only temporary and was followed by the invasion of the north by Ptolemy III (7–8) and the counter-attack by Seleucus II (9) and his sons Seleucus III and Antiochus III, who pushed as far south as Raphia in southern Palestine (10).

The struggle for domination continued under Ptolemy IV, a man of profligate lifestyle. The reference to him being filled with pride (12; cf. v 18) prepares the biblically sensitive reader for his downfall (2:21a). While he did inflict a massive defeat on Syria at Raphia, his ascendancy did not continue and eventually, when Ptolemy V had been enthroned at the age of four, Antiochus

III conquered (13–16). He too displayed the self-exaltation which merits divine judgment (16; cf. v 19). V 14 may refer to the unsuccessful activity of Jewish zealots who supported the Syrian forces against Egypt under whose domination they lived.

With a view to further expansion, a political marriage was planned between Antiochus III's daughter Cleopatra and the young Ptolemy V (17); but this also failed. When Antiochus sought further conquests in the west (Greece) he was defeated by the Romans and forced to return home. Retreating, he was to disappear from the stage of history, dying within two years (19).

Seleucus IV, who followed as king of Syria, inherited a large empire but one bankrupted by long years of military action. He sought to replenish the treasury by raising taxes (20), but was soon succeeded by the figure who now dominates the rest of the chapter, a contemptible person (21), his brother Antiochus IV (Epiphanes).

He came to the throne in 175 BC by means of two coups. By various means, including intrigue and deceit (21, 23) he promoted a policy of Hellenization, which brought him into direct conflict with Jews who were committed to orthodox piety. Again the danger of feeling secure is underlined (v 24; cf. 8:25), as is the time limit which God places on hostile human activities (only for a time; 24).

Antiochus prevented an Egyptian invasion of Palestine by himself invading Egypt, now ruled by Ptolemy VI, succeeding partly by intrigue (according to vs 24–25). But full success eluded him (27), and when disorder emerged in Palestine, he returned to Syria. Again, the divine limits feature in history (27), and the sinister nature of opposition to the people of God is emphasized (28).

Antiochus invaded Egypt again in 168 BC, when the Ptolemies agreed on a joint reign. This time he found himself faced with a humiliating Roman ultimatum to leave (cf. v 30), after which he vented his fury against God and his people (30), enlisting the help of Jews sympathetic to the Hellenization process (30–32). This culminated in the massacre of the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the ravaging of the city. The sanctuary was defiled, the daily offerings abolished, an altar to Zeus was set up, and pagan rites were celebrated on the altar of burnt offering (the abomination that causes desolation, 31; cf. Mt. 24:15).

In the midst of Jewish apostasy (described in vs 30, 32), others were faithful to death (33). It was in this context that the famous resistance of the Maccabees took place. As in all resistance movements, spiritual as well as political, the faithful received support which they could have done without (34).

Possibly the most difficult section in the book follows in vs 36–45. The description seems to exceed all that is known of even the blasphemous Antiochus (hence the conclusion of many commentators that this section is indeed predictive prophecy on the part of the author, which, because erroneous, enables us to date the final edition of the entire book). 12:1–3, however, suggests that the end of all history may now be in view. In this case, v 35 may be pointing forward to the experience of God's people, not merely during but beyond the time of Antiochus. Nevertheless, identifications of the king (36) vary (e.g. the Roman Empire [Calvin], the papacy and the antichrist).

Precise identification of the meaning of prophecy always depends on its historical fulfilment. In any event, we at least have here a portrayal of the spirit of antichrist (1 Jn. 2:18) in the radical autonomy of the king (cf. 3:15; 4:30; 8:25; 11:3, 12, 16), who exalts himself as divine (36–37; cf. 3:5) and the marriage of ungodliness and unrighteousness. The reference to the one desired by women (37) is difficult. Sometimes taken as a reference to Tammuz, the pagan deity mourned by the goddess Ishtar (cf. Ezekiel's alarm at this abomination in Ezk. 8:13–14), the words may also signify ‘the love of women’ and denote the king’s complete disregard for human affection (cf. 2 Tim. 3:2–4) or indeed for the creation ordinance of male-female relationships.

Vs 40–45 portray a final struggle. Some interpreters suggest this will be fulfilled in the precise geographical terms in which it is described, but the statements are best taken as a portrayal of future conflict in terms of a then contemporary political map. Edom, Moab and Ammon (41) represent the ancient enemies of God’s people. The traditional enemies of the king of the north with their allies will be mastered by him (43). Yet, his end will come unceremoniously (44–45).

If we have here a reference to the final scenes of history, it should be remembered that they are described in terms of the ancient world order. Prophecy does foretell the future, but also speaks to its contemporary world in terms drawn from its own time.

Even if the climax of godlessness is here portrayed, it would be a mistake to anticipate that history’s dénouement will involve chariots and cavalry (40). Nor should we forget that the function of this entire section is to emphasize that no matter how radically godless a ruler of the nations may be, yet he will come to his end, and no-one will help him (45).

12:1–4 The last things

The angelic messenger promises Daniel that the people of God will be protected against the ravages of the powers of darkness, as always, by Michael (cf. 10:13, 21). But like the testing of himself and his companions this will not mean that they will be shielded from the time of distress (1; cf. 2 Tim. 3:1–9) but delivered out of it. God’s purposes (cf. the book, v 1) will not fail; he keeps his people for ‘the salvation that is ready to be revealed in the last time’ (1 Pet. 1:5). V 2 points forward to this resurrection as the reversal of the curse of death (everlasting life, v 2, contrasts with sleep in the dust of death, cf. Gn. 2:7, 17; 3:19), or its confirmation (everlasting contempt). The wise (cf. 11:25) who have been faithful to God’s word, despite shame and suffering, will be glorified (3). This is the message of hope and comfort which will strengthen future believers. For this reason, Daniel is to seal the words of the scroll (4), not in the sense of keeping them secret, but in order to preserve them until they are needed, keeping them for those who seek a word from God by contrast with others who go here and there to increase knowledge (4; cf. Am. 8:12).

12:5–13 God’s reign and his servant’s rest

The exquisite conclusion focuses again on Daniel himself (cf. 10:2–18). He sees two others, possibly to be viewed as confirmatory witnesses (Dt. 19:15), standing one on each bank of the river. One of them asks the question which was certainly already in Daniel’s mind, and frequently asked by God’s distressed people, How long ... before these ... things are fulfilled? (cf. 8:13; Rev. 6:10). The divine figure (cf. 10:5–6) raises both hands indicating the solemnity and dependability of what he will say. As before a time, times and half a time (cf. 7:25) expresses both a general and extended period of time and a sense that these periods are known to and limited by God. Just when God’s people have no defences left God himself will intervene (7).

Daniel was understandably puzzled and sought further illumination on the outcome of these events (8). Significantly (for all later interpreters as well as for Daniel) he was informed that the unfolding of the meaning of the vision will await its historical fulfilment; then the division between the wise and the wicked will be made plain (10). The former, with Daniel’s book in hand, will understand the true significance of the events through which they are passing. The wicked will know only confusion and bewilderment.

The figure provides one final explanation (which builds on 11:31). From the time of the abomination that causes desolation (11) the time of distress (1) will last for approximately three and a half years, stretching out for a further month and a half (11–12). This may be intended as a microcosm of the final time, times and half a time (7) and relate to the suffering under Antiochus Epiphanes. It seems likely, however, that it also looks beyond to the final days, these three and a half years bringing to completion the seventy ‘sevens’, only sixty-nine and one half of which had been fulfilled in 9:24–27.

Fittingly the final words are of promise to the aged Daniel himself. He too must persevere to the end. Then he will enter into his rest. His works continue to follow him until his resurrection (v 13; cf. Rev. 14:13).

HOSEA

Introduction

Hosea was one of four ‘writing prophets’ (prophets whose prophecies were written down and preserved for us in the Bible) who lived in the eighth century BC. These four were (in roughly chronological as well as alphabetical order): Amos and Hosea, who prophesied in the northern kingdom, Israel; and Isaiah and Micah, who prophesied in the southern kingdom, Judah.

They lived in times of comparative affluence in Israel and Judah. This affluence, however, was not shared. The rich and powerful got richer and more powerful at the expense of the poor and vulnerable. All the prophets addressed this situation but they have different emphases. Whereas Amos concentrated on the social injustices of the people, Hosea stressed their unfaithfulness to God in their idolatry.

Hosea the prophet

Although we do not know much of the details of Hosea’s life (e.g. where he came from, or who his father Beerai was) his circumstances were of supreme importance for bringing home the significance of his message. For Hosea married Gomer, a woman who turned out to be like the people of Israel—unfaithful. She left him for someone else and in doing so, gave an accurate picture of the people of Israel who forsook God to ‘go after other gods’. Hosea, however, was commanded to go and take back his former wife, and so provide a powerful visual aid for the message that God had for his people: ‘You have sinned and must be punished, but I will take you back to myself and restore our relationship’ (see on chs. 1, 3 especially).

The prophet’s wife bore him three children and each of them was given a prophetic name: ‘Jezreel’, ‘Not-shown-compassion’ and ‘Not-my-people’ (see on 1:4–9). Together they speak of God’s judgment, but the judgment is also reversed (1:10–2:1, 21–23).

Hosea seems to have had a prophetic ministry of over thirty years, as we can see from the kings listed in 1:1, and from allusions to historical events in the book. He probably received his call to prophesy around 760 BC, towards the end of the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 793–753) and continued for about thirty years. In this year the so-called Syro-Ephraimite war took place. Syria and Israel (the northern kingdom, often referred to as Ephraim) tried to force Judah to join them in a rebellion against Assyria. Judah refused to join and appealed to Assyria, which then crushed Syria and Israel without trouble. Hosea may well have prophesied almost up to the time of the fall of Samaria in 722.

Hosea proclaimed his message verbally at the natural meeting-places. These would include sanctuaries (e.g. Bethel and Gilgal; 4:15) where people came to worship and offer sacrifice, and the city gates, where the elders gathered to settle legal disputes. He probably spent some time in the capital Samaria, which features in several prophecies (e.g. 7:1; 8:5–6).

In view of the references to Judah in the book (e.g. 1:1, 7, 11; 4:15; 5:10–14), it is possible that Hosea took refuge there at some point in his ministry. This would also explain how his prophecies came to be preserved when the northern kingdom was destroyed (see also the chart ‘The prophets’ in The Song of Songs).

Historical background

During the first part of the eighth century BC the great powers of the known world were less dominant than they had been: Assyria and Babylon were engaged elsewhere and Egypt was comparatively weak (see the time chart in Approaching the Bible). This allowed the smaller states of Palestine to expand and engage freely in trade. Jeroboam II was a bad king, according to 2 Ki. 14:23–29; he achieved military success but caused suffering to the people of Israel. He was the fourth and last but one in the dynasty of Jehu, who had been anointed king by a representative of the prophet Elisha (2 Ki. 9:1–10) to destroy the line of Ahab. Jehu then killed Joram (2 Ki. 9:24) who had been recovering from his wounds in Jezreel, and followed this up with a massacre of the rest of his family (2 Ki. 10:1–8), also in Jezreel. Having got the taste for blood he apparently went way beyond God’s commands. He killed Ahab’s ‘chief men’, ‘close friends’ and ‘priests’ (2 Ki. 10:11), and followed this up by killing a temple-full of Baal worshippers (2 Ki. 10:18–28). The commendation given in 2 Ki. 10:30 is severely modified by Hosea’s reference to the ‘blood of Jezreel’, as it is by the statement that ‘he did not turn away from the sins of Jeroboam son of Nebat, which he had caused Israel to commit’ (2 Ki. 10:29). Jehu was followed by his son Jehoahaz and his grandson Jehoash. The third king after Jehu was the above mentioned Jeroboam II, the son of Jehoash.

2 Ki. 15 tells how when Jeroboam died (753) there was a series of brief reigns and assassinations. Jeroboam’s son Zechariah (not the prophet of Judah) was killed by Shallum, who was killed by Menahem. Menahem’s son Pekahiah succeeded him, but after two years was killed by Pekah, who was killed by Hoshea. (This name is spelt the same in Hebrew as Hosea the prophet, but clearly they were not the same person.) Ho. 1:1 does not refer to these kings although they overlap with the kings of Judah mentioned. This is possibly because they were each so insignificant.

The kings of Judah were Azariah (also known as Uzziah; c. 791–740), Jotham (c. 750–732), Ahaz c. 744–716) and Hezekiah (c. 716–687). Note that the dates overlap. This is because they adopted a system of co-regency: the king's son was appointed co-ruler before the king died. This served to make the change-over smoother and less vulnerable to uprisings and attempted coups.

The religious context in which Hosea prophesied is reflected in many parts of the book. The Israelites under Joshua had conquered the land of Canaan but had failed to destroy the peoples already settled there. They and their descendants, and their religion, continued. The Canaanites worshipped many gods, the chief of which was called Baal. Baal was supposed to be the god who gave fertility to the land. According to a widespread myth he was killed by Moth, the god of summer and drought, but rose from the dead after the goddess Anath avenged his murder. This dying and rising reflected the annual cycle of the seasons. Canaanite religion was designed to give fertility to the land; it did not place a high value on morals. At the temples, men were able to 'worship' Baal and stimulate him to acts of fertility by having sexual intercourse with 'sacred' resident prostitutes.

Israel was supposed to worship one God, 'the LORD', who had no goddess consort. He could not be manipulated by ritual but required strict obedience instead. Clearly, the two religions were incompatible, but the Israelites tried to mix them (1 Ki. 18:21).

The text of Hosea

The text of the book of Hosea is one of the most obscure in the OT. It seems to have suffered in the process of being copied by one generation after another of scribes. Often, therefore, we cannot be sure of the detailed meaning of a particular passage. Nevertheless, the overall teaching is rarely in doubt; we must simply be satisfied with less precision than we might like.

The theology of Hosea

The basic message of Hosea is that God loves Israel. However, they have sinned so grievously that he is forced to punish them. Nevertheless, he has not given them up for good and will restore them to himself again. Hosea makes use of a number of powerful images in order to enable his hearers to realize what he is saying.

Hosea emphasizes as strongly as possible that there is only one God for Israel: 'the LORD'. There is no place at all for other gods. The Israelites had fallen into thinking that the Canaanites were right about Baal and the fertility of the land. 'The LORD' may well have done some things for the Israelites, like bringing them out of Egypt, but they thought that perhaps they needed to be on good terms with the god of the land as well (2:5). Hosea points out the seriousness of this error (2:8): because of it God will take away the blessing which he gave in the first place, and will bring Israel to realize the actual source of those blessings. She will have a time of deprivation (2:3, 6, 9) but will finally return to God and find restoration.

God's covenant with Israel forms the basis of Hosea's message. He chose Abraham and his descendants to be his people. They entered into an exclusive relationship with him which is expressed several times in the Bible in the words, 'They shall be my people and I will be their God' (e.g. Gn. 17:7–8; Je. 31:31–33; Zc. 8:8). In Hosea the word 'covenant' occurs only in 6:7 and 8:1 but there are many allusions to it. The name of Hosea's third child, 'Not-my-people' signifies the most serious judgment possible: the breaking of the covenant and a rejection of Israel as God's people. Hosea refers frequently to events in the nation's early history, when God brought Israel out of Egypt and made them into his people (e.g. 2:15; 9:10; 11:1–4). It is interesting that he does not refer to the bare facts of the deliverance (the exodus, crossing the Red Sea, etc.) but to the personal implications of these events.

This amounts to a forceful statement about the uniqueness of 'the LORD'. He alone is God, and has power to harm or to heal. He alone has entered into a covenant with Israel. Therefore, it is both wise and right for Israel to be committed to him alone. The consequences of turning away are dire, but there is a gracious invitation to return to the loving God who chose them in the first place. This is clearly the God of the New Testament as well as of the Old.

The prophet uses many metaphors and similes in order to bring home his message. God is portrayed as a husband (with Israel as the wife; 2:2–20); as a father (with Israel as a son; 11:1–11); as a healer (healing the sick Israel; 5:13; 6:1–2; 7:1; 14:4); and as a fowler (with Israel as the birds caught in his net; 7:12; 9:11). He is compared to a lion (5:14), a leopard and a bear (13:7–8); to dew (14:5), the winter and spring rains (6:3), a green pine tree (14:8) and even moth and rot (5:12)! Other imagery used of Israel is that of a heifer (4:16; 10:11), a vine and wine (10:1; 14:7), grapes and figs (9:10), a lily, and olive tree and a cedar of Lebanon (14:5–6), an unwise unborn son (13:13), a cake not turned over (7:8), a faulty bow (7:16), and morning mist, chaff and smoke (13:3).

Outline of contents

The book of Hosea is more like an anthology of his prophecies than a book with a continuous theme running through it. But the prophecies have been grouped together into two main parts. In chs. 1–13 we find biographical (and autobiographical) details concerning Hosea's marriage, together with prophecies relating to its significance for the LORD's bride, Israel.

In chs. 4–14 there is an alternating pattern of judgment and hope. We are given the very strong picture of God's struggle to restore his unfaithful people to himself. The book ends with a gracious invitation and promise to Israel, and a note to the reader to learn from what has been told (cf. Jesus' words in Mk. 4:9, 23; 7:16).

Commentary

1:1 Title

See the Introduction (Hosea the prophet). This verse stands as a heading over the whole book. It should not be taken too literally, for clearly it includes some narrative which sets the actual prophecies in their context (chs. 1, 3).

1:2–3:5 Hosea's marriage and its message

The view taken in this commentary is the traditional one: Hosea married a wife who proved to be unfaithful. She left him but Hosea took her back. See on 3:1–5 for the reasons for retaining this view.

1:2–3 Hosea marries according to God's instructions

There is great stress in these verses on one word which means 'harlotry' (i.e. prostitution) or 'fornication' (i.e. improper sexual intercourse). Literally, v 2 says: 'Take for yourself a wife of harlotry and children of harlotry, for the land does indeed commit harlotry in departing from the LORD'. The straightforward meaning would be 'marry a prostitute/fornicator ...', but it is unlikely that Hosea would be commanded to do something so much against the law (see e.g. Lv. 21:13–15; Dt. 22:13–21). Perhaps, therefore, it means 'marry someone who comes from a situation where prostitution is normal', or (more likely) 'marry someone who will turn out to be a prostitute'. In other words, Hosea, looking back on his broken marriage, sees it as God's will that he should have married such a person.

Children of unfaithfulness (prostitution/fornication) may simply describe the situation into which they were born (i.e. children who would grow up among prostitutes/fornicators etc.), or it may mean 'born to a woman who is a prostitute/fornicator'. Some feel that Hosea was not the father, but this is unlikely. At least we can be sure that the first child was Hosea's (v 3 says that Gomer bore him a son).

As with many passages where there is uncertainty, we can be sure of the basic facts: Hosea married someone who acted immorally at least after marriage. This is important for the analogy with Israel and God (3b), but the exact nature of the immorality is unimportant. Hosea's experience was to give him a deeper understanding of God's love for Israel, and a more effective way of communicating that to his fellow-Israelites than any words could have done on their own.

1:4–9 Three children with prophetic names

Hosea's wife Gomer bore three children: a son, a daughter and then another son. The first one was called Jezeel, the name of a valley plain between the mountains of Samaria and Galilee and a prominent battle arena in Israel. The name is a reminder of ‘the bloods of Jezreel’ (see the Introduction), an expression which often means bloodshed or bloodguilt. There was more than one massacre in this place. Although Jehu was authorized to wipe out the house of Ahab, he went beyond his brief. His motives were influenced by self-interest, and he failed ultimately to control Baal worship. It is salutary to note that the promise of 2 Ki. 10:30 did not prevent Jehu from incurring God’s wrath and judgment. To be an instrument of God’s judgment should inspire fear.

The judgment on Israel is that they will be defeated in the place where the sin was committed; the punishment fits the crime. Israel’s bow signifies the military might of the nation. Jezreel is an especially useful name because: it signifies a particular instance of Israel’s sin that stands for the whole of the nation’s sin; it means ‘God scatters’ or ‘God sows’, i.e. has a negative or a positive meaning (1:11; 2:22–23); and it sounds quite like ‘Israel’ in Hebrew, which satisfies Hebrew writers’ love of puns.

Lo-Ruhamah is the name of Gomer’s daughter (possibly not Hosea’s, since it does not say ‘bore him a daughter’, but we cannot be sure of this). Ruhamah is connected with the word ‘womb’, and indicates the sort of warm compassion that a mother has for her child. The OT often speaks of God in this way (e.g. 14:3; Pr. 28:13), but here it is announced that he will not deal with Israel like this any longer.

The name of the third child, Lo-Ammi (‘Not-my-people’) signifies the most devastating word of judgment. Israel is no longer the elect people of God. The events of her salvation-history—the exodus from Egypt (12:9, 13), the crossing of the Red Sea, the wilderness wanderings, the conquest of Canaan—all these are denied (cf. also those places where a ‘return to Egypt’ is spoken of e.g. 8:13; 9:3, 6; 11:5). It is still, of course, open to individuals to be faithful to the LORD and find acceptance (as many foreigners did throughout Israel’s history, including Ruth and Rahab). And the way back to God is still open, as we shall see (11:8–9; 14:1–7).

1:10–2:1 Promise to follow judgment: a glimpse of a brighter future

It seems premature, at first sight, to mention hope beyond judgment at this point in the prophecy. Hosea still has a lot more judgment to announce (2:1–13 and most of chs. 4–14!). However, the book is arranged so as to give an outline of the whole plan of God in chs. 1–3 in terms of the husband-wife imagery, before going on to more detailed prophecies. Moreover, the first three chapters are arranged as a double-decker sandwich: narrative (1:2–9)—hope (1:10–12:1)—judgment (2:2–13)—hope (2:14–23)—narrative (3:1–5).

This structure helps to achieve at least three things. First, it shows that God’s plan is unified; he is not an opportunist who just goes along looking to see how things will turn out. Secondly, it shows the movement of the action from start to finish chronologically, from harmony to disharmony, and back (via the turning point in 2:7b) to harmony between ‘the LORD’ and Israel. Thirdly, it shows how the events of Hosea’s marriage were bound up with his message about God and his people.

The Israelites will be like the sand on the seashore ... (10) recalls the promise to Abraham (Gn. 22:17; 32:12), and is, therefore, an indirect way of saying that the covenant will be restored. In the place where either refers to a location where names were publicly given, or simply means ‘instead of’.

The promise that Israel and Judah will be reunited occurs in several places in the OT (e.g. Is. 11:12–13; Je. 23:5–8; Ezk. 37:15–28). It is difficult to see how it was fulfilled historically, since the northern kingdom of Israel ceased to be a nation in 722 BC when the capital city Samaria fell to the Assyrians. People were deported, and populations were mixed up over vast areas of the Assyrian empire. It is possible, however, to see fulfilment in a number of ways:

a. The people from the north maintained their identity and remained worshippers of ‘the LORD’. Many came to join with Judah, and there are references in the later OT books to Judah as containing both Judah and Israel (e.g. 2 Ch. 34:21; 35:18; Je. 50:33; Zc. 8:13; 11:14).

b. When Jesus came as Messiah he was the king of Israel, the one leader of 1:11b, and all true people of God are intended to be united under his headship (e.g. Mk. 15:2, 26 and parallels; Jn. 1:49; Acts 17:7).

c. The church unites people of all nations, including people from Israel and Judah (see how Hosea is applied in Rom. 9:25–26 and 1 Pet. 2:10).

The day of Jezreel (11) means both ‘the day on which the punishment due to the sin at Jezreel is reversed’ and ‘the day of God-scatters’ (i.e. no longer scatters his people among the nations, but sows seed for the future).

2:1 reverses the other two names, and so rounds off the prophecy. My loved one is simply one word in Hebrew, ‘shown compassion’. The plurals brothers and sisters makes it clear that the whole people of Israel is meant, not just Hosea’s son and daughter.

2:2–13 Prophecy of judgment: chastening for Israel, the unfaithful wife

Vs 2–3 are addressed to Hosea’s children. The imperatives form an abrupt new start, and the content of the first sentence is intended to give the reader or hearer a shock. This is the first time we have come across a reference to the breach between Hosea and Gomer. It is clear, as the speech continues, that it is not so much Gomer who is in mind but the people of Israel, now rejected from being God’s wife. This bold image is quite striking when we remember the religion of Israel’s neighbours, for Baal was imagined to have a goddess consort, Anath. Hosea, in effect, says that God has a consort, the people of Israel. The marriage is, of course, metaphorical.

The word translated rebuke (2) is the one used for ‘strive’ in lawsuits. Much of Hosea’s imagery reflects the legal disputes which took place at the city gate.

Let her remove her adulterous look [lit. ‘harlotries’] ... and ... unfaithfulness [lit. ‘adulteries’] might well refer to specific forms of ornament associated with prostitutes (cf. v 13). The sense, then, is ‘Let her remove the signs of her unfaithfulness, lest I strip her of everything’ (2b–3a).

V 3b implies that Israel will go back to the desert, the time before God had fulfilled his promise to make them his own people in their own land. Her children (4) are the individual members of the people of Israel (see also on 1:2).

Israel has played the harlot (5; the NIV’s been unfaithful is weak). The implication is that she has had many lovers. This refers to Gomer’s prostitution with other men, and also to Israel’s attempts to gain the favour of other gods. In both cases she wrongly assumed that the good things she enjoyed came from them. God’s response to this is not to destroy Israel immediately, but to initiate a programme of education (6–7a). A series of pictures shows her experiencing barriers of various kinds (thorn-bushes; wall her in), chasing and not catching her lovers, looking but not finding them. This brings her to the turning point of the procedure (7b): she realizes that she was better off with her first husband ‘the LORD’, and she returns to him. Of course, tribulation comes to the righteous as well as the wicked (cf. Ps. 44:17–22; Jn. 16:32–33), but a nation or individual experiencing hardship and failure needs to ask whether God may be trying to tell them something (cf. Am. 4:6–11).

From this point on, we find a summary of material mentioned before. ‘She did not know’ that God was the one who supplied food and drink, and even the precious metals that were used to make images for Baal (8). So God will take these gifts away (cf. v 5) and expose her nakedness (cf. v 3), and no-one will be able to deliver her out of his hand (10). In other words, the other gods can neither provide for Israel nor prevent her from being punished by the LORD.

Vs 11–13 focus on Israel’s religious feasts and festivals which God will cause to cease. This could be done either by disruption due to war, or shortage of food and drink for sacrifice and celebration. Both are envisaged here (12). V 13 rounds off this judgment section with another reference to spiritual and physical harlotry (cf. vs 2b, 7–8).

2:14–23 Promise to follow judgment: wooing back the unfaithful wife

In the previous verses God acted in judgment upon his unfaithful people, in order to bring them to their senses that they might return to him. Here the figure is of a lover attracting his beloved back, speaking tenderly and giving gifts (14–15, 22), and protecting from attack by wild animals or humans (18). It is a new start: Israel and her husband in the desert again, with no distractions, betrothed for ever ... in righteousness and justice, in love and compassion. And Israel will acknowledge [‘know’] the LORD. This word often carries a sense of intimacy, and may include ‘acknowledgement’ (cf. 6:3, 6; see also on 4:6; 13:4–5).

I will respond (21) should be understood in the light of Israel’s response to God in v 15b where the same verb is used and should be translated, ‘There she will respond ...’ (not sing; see NIV mg.). In fact, vs 16–20 could be put in brackets and regarded as an expansion of Israel’s response to God. They are not easy to translate literally, but signify God’s responding graciously by speaking to the skies which have been shut up from sending rain on the earth. This sets up the chain: the skies send rain to the earth, which then brings forth grain, new wine and oil, which in turn satisfies Jezreel (Israel represented by the name ‘God sows’). The pun continues in v 23 ‘I will sow [NIV plant] her ...’. All the names of Hosea’s children are now recalled and given a positive meaning. The most serious judgment, ‘Not-my-people’ becomes You are my people, and the covenant promise is completed by Israel’s answering cry, You are my God.

3:1–5 Hosea takes ‘a woman’ to be his wife again

In ch. 3 Hosea himself tells the story of how he bought his wife back. Some scholars have regarded it as an account of the same events as those told in the third person in 1:2–3. The word again in v 1 rules this view out. Moreover the facts are quite different. So we must regard this as a later action. Since the narrative in ch. 1, Gomer has left Hosea and become enslaved in some way, for Hosea has to buy her back (2). This is a picture of God and his people of Israel (4–5).

V 1 is ambiguous. Literally it says either, ‘The LORD said to me again, “Go, love a woman ...”’, or ‘The LORD said to me, “Again go, love a woman ...”’. There is no real difference in meaning. But why does it say ‘a woman’ rather than your wife (as the NIV)? The answer may be found in 2:2; Gomer has no claim to be his wife any longer, and the people of Israel have no claim on God. They are ‘not his people’, which means, using the alternative imagery, they are not his wife. Loved by another (lit. ‘a friend’) may mean simply another man, or ‘a paramour’, the illicit partner of someone else’s wife. Adulteress means that she was married to one man but had sexual intercourse with another. It is possible that Gomer had actually remarried, but it is more likely that her legal husband (who had the right to divorce and disown her) is still Hosea.

In 1:2 it said ‘Go, take ...’, but here it says Go, love .... This emphasizes God’s love for the people of Israel, even though they turn to other gods and love—what do they love?—raisin cakes! These were probably used in Canaanite rituals. They show just how carnal and unworthy is Israel’s outlook.

Hosea buys back his ‘former’ (but probably not legally divorced) wife. She may perhaps have become a temple prostitute, who had to be bought out of the service. The price is puzzling, for it was not normal to pay by means of a combination of silver and grain. This may indicate that Hosea had difficulty in raising the money, which would be a picture of the cost of redemption for Israel. We do not know exactly how much a homer and a lethek was, but it could be about fifteen shekels of silver, making the total equivalent to thirty shekels, the price paid in compensation for the loss of a slave (Ex. 21:32), or the redemption price of a female ‘dedicated to the LORD’ (Lv. 27:4).

For a limited period (many days, v 3; afterwards v 5) Gomer is to undergo a period of discipline, which corresponds to a period when the Israelites will suffer deprivation (4). The sense of v 3 is somewhat obscure, but if we consider the meaning of the whole, we should understand that Gomer is to ‘live to Hosea’, i.e. belong to him alone; she is not to act as a prostitute. Nor is she to have intercourse with any man (lit. ‘not be to a man’)—including Hosea himself. Hosea will act in the same way towards her (lit. ‘And also I [will be] to you’). This temporary abstinence stands for a time when the Israelites will be deprived of various things, both good and bad. They will be without a proper leader, king or prince, and unable even to offer sacrifice. These things are all fine, and the deprivation must be temporary for the purpose of chastening Israel. Sacred stones or pillars were associated with Canaanite worship (even though Jacob had once set up a pillar as a remembrance of his dream vision; Gn. 28:18). They were a clear sign of idolatrous religion and would be removed. The same is true of the idol (lit. ‘teraphim’, or household gods). Apparently there were some of these in David’s household (1 Sa. 19:13, 16), but they are usually regarded as pagan (e.g. 2 Ki. 23:24). This leaves one item unaccounted for: the ephod. The word refers both to a linen garment worn by priests which was quite acceptable (Ex. 28:6–14) and to some sort of metal object which was not (Jdg. 8:27; 17:5).

The overall meaning of v 4 is that both good and bad will be swept away as Israel undergoes a time of purifying. But the result of it is given in v 5: the Israelites will return and seek the LORD ... and David their king and find blessing. The reference to David, meaning the line of David’s descendants, is surprising because Hosea prophesied to the northern kingdom of Israel, which had departed from following David’s descendants when Solomon had died nearly two hundred years earlier (1 Ki. 12). This is an indication of a far-reaching prophecy about the reuniting of the two kingdoms, which can only be seen to be fulfilled in Jesus Christ the king, the Son of David (see on 1:10–2:1).

4:1–14:9 Prophecies of judgment and promises of restoration

4:1–3 The LORD’s controversy with Israel

The language used here implies that God has entered into an argument or quarrel with Israel. Perhaps we should think of a lawsuit, such as was carried out at the gates of the city. We can imagine Hosea approaching the elders sitting for judgment, and announcing that God himself has a dispute to bring. Those who live in the land are accused of two things.

On the one hand, they lack the positive qualities that God requires of his people. Truth (which includes both telling the truth and acting in faithfulness), steadfast love (the quality which expresses above all God's way of acting towards his people in the covenant, and what he requires in return (see especially 6:6; Dt. 5:10; Dt. 7:9, 12) and knowledge of God (see on 13:4–5). On the other hand, they exhibit bad characteristics that God hates. Cursing (in the sense of seeking to harm others by speaking a curse against them; cf. Jdg. 17:2) or else swearing falsely (cf. 10:4, 'false oaths'), lying, murder, stealing and adultery. What the Ten Commandments require with respect to other people is being blatantly disregarded (Ex. 20:13–16).

V 3 speaks of the judgment of God, but is also partly a vivid poetical picture of a land under God's curse. When Israel is restored, the land and its living creatures will also be blessed (2:18, 21).

4:4–9 The law rejected: the priests are especially guilty

V 4 is extremely difficult to understand, but the thrust of the section is a condemnation of the priests, who should have observed and taught the law. Wolff renders it, 'No, not just anyone (should be accused), nor should just anyone (be reproved). But my lawsuit is with you O Priest', and although this is uncertain it is along the right lines.

The priests ignore the law of God entrusted to them, and consequently they do not walk securely in his ways, but stumble (5), as do the other religious leaders, the prophets. They have rejected their Glory (7), the law (6) which told them how to please God, in exchange for immoral and disgusting pagan rites. They now get their living from satisfying people's desire to worship other gods (8). Because the priests do not teach the law, the people do not know it and are destroyed from lack of knowledge (6a; the same word that is translated 'acknowledgement' in 4:1). The result is punishment for the nation (your mother, v 5) and for priest and people alike (9).

4:10–19 A spirit of prostitution in worship

V 10 continues from the preceding passage in outlining the punishment in more detail. The people will never have enough to eat, and their prostitution will bring them no increase. Children were always regarded as a blessing, and one of the promises to Abraham was to make his descendants a great multitude (e.g. Gn. 15:5). Intercourse with many prostitutes will not produce what God would do with one old couple (Rom. 4:18–21)! God continues with a description of their foolishness: they overindulge in drink (10) and lose their sense; they seek guidance from wooden objects (12). They are carried away by a wild enthusiasm for pagan worship, and engage in sacrifice and [whole] burnt offerings on the high places, those shrines which were not authorized by the law and at which all sorts of corrupt practices developed. They will sacrifice anywhere at all, under any tree providing only that the shade is good (13a)!

Consequently, the daughters of those who engage in these things go the same way. Physical prostitution or promiscuous sex, and adultery are in focus here. The women are innocent (14) when compared to the men, who should have been setting an example to their daughters, but instead are going with prostitutes—both secular and sacred. In Canaanite religion, sacred prostitution was thought to be a means of ensuring fertility for the land. It is likely that the idea of 'imitative magic' lies behind the practice: intercourse with a 'sacred prostitute' brought about some similar action between the gods of nature, and resulted in the land's bringing forth fruit.

Today there are no sacred prostitutes in any of the places I have been, but there are many who practise religion in such a way as to satisfy their own desires rather than to glorify God. It is quite a good idea to ask ourselves from time to time what things we really enjoy about the Christian faith. Do they include emotional experiences, power, pleasure in being right, security, respect, the company of physically attractive people? Ps. 139:23–24 is a useful prayer!

V 15 is an aside to Judah; a warning to them not to follow Israel's example. This would have been relevant to readers of Hosea's prophecies in Judah in the periods following his ministry.

Gilgal was one of the chief shrines of Israel. Beth Aven ('house of wickedness') is probably a deliberate corruption of the name of the main shrine Bethel meaning 'house of God'. The prophet urges the people not to go to these corrupt places of worship, and not to take careless oaths, using God's name (15b). A series of different pictures follow in swift succession. The Israelites are described as stubborn, refusing to respond to the LORD who would like to restore them (16); they are idolaters, i.e. prostitutes who hang on to their shameful practices even when it is clear that there is no benefit to be gained (18). The end result is that a whirlwind will sweep them away. Their sacrifices will not bring them the blessings they sought to obtain, but only shame.

5:1–7 Priests, Israelites and royalty condemned

The opening of this section suggests that it may have been delivered in the capital of Israel, where leaders and people would hear. The priests are still in focus (as in ch. 4) but Hosea also brings in the king and royal family, and the people generally. There are several places named Mizpah in the OT. This one was probably where Samuel went on his circuits to settle legal cases (1 Sa. 7:16) and where, in Hosea's time at least, there would probably have been a religious shrine. Tabor is a mountain in the north of Israel. It was there that Deborah and Barak won a great victory over Jabin and Sisera (Jdg. 4:6, 12–16). We do not know the nature of the sins at these places, but it must have been something that would trap the people in sinful habits, so that they cannot return to their God (4).

The Israelites, described by the strong word rebels, are deep in slaughter (2). This word is used of child sacrifice in Is. 57:5 and Ezk. 16:21, but it also refers to the bloodshed that follows self-seeking and greed. However, God knows all about their corruption and will take action. The same is true today (cf. Rev. 2–3, especially 2:2, 9, 13, 19; 3:1, 8, 15).

Again Hosea combines different metaphors to describe the people's situation: a spirit of prostitution (4: cf. 4:12) is within them; they do not acknowledge the LORD; Israel's pride or arrogance is like a witness against them in court; as they carry on in their daily walk they stumble. A note is added at this point about Judah (see the Introduction).

The result is that when they decide to take sacrifices to the LORD (6) he will not be there to meet them (cf. also v 15). They have been unfaithful to the LORD, and therefore their children, those younger members of Israel, born into a society already far from God, do not belong to him either. The corrupt New Moon festivals were no doubt intended to secure some sort of blessing for them and their fields, but instead they brought destruction to both.

5:8–12 Ephraim/Israel will be laid waste by an enemy

From this point in the book until the end of ch. 7, there are frequent references to Israel's foreign policy. Instead of doing right and trusting in God she tried all sorts of political manoeuvres, making alliances with the big powers, Egypt or Assyria (13; 7:8–16), or joining with Syria and other smaller nations in order to gain virtual independence within a coalition.

The calls to sound the trumpet (8) signify the beginning of the new section. An alarm is raised, for an enemy is coming who will lay waste the countryside. The places mentioned were major religious centres, and the judgment is basically against the false religion that is carried on in these places. All of them have a significant and often honourable, but at least respectable history. Gigbeah (Gibeon) was where Solomon sacrificed and received a dream from God (1 Ki. 3:4–5); Ramah was another of Samuel's regular places of judgment (1 Sa. 7:17); Beth Aven, Bethel (see on 4:15) was where God appeared to Jacob in a dream. But now all these places are under attack at God's command. Hosea again gives us some vivid metaphors of judgment. Moving boundary stones was forbidden by the law, and represents the people's disregard of God's guidelines. So God will flood them with his wrath, will cause them to be trampled on, will eat them away like a moth or dry rot.

5:13–15 Assyria cannot help Israel

Judah is included with Israel in the condemnation recorded here. Most probably the events referred to are described in 2 Ki. 15:8–31; 17:1–6. At least Menahem (2 Ki. 15:19) and Hoshea (2 Ki. 15:30; 17:3) submitted to Assyria and paid tribute. King Ahaz of Judah asked for Assyria's help against Syria and Israel (2 Ki. 16:7–9; cf. Is. 7).

So Israel and Judah both seek an answer to their sores and sickness in an alliance with Assyria. But the real problem is that God is against them, and the best doctors in the world cannot help. Worse is to come for God will attack them, tear them to pieces and carry them off like a lion, like a great lion (the words are used to reinforce one another, not to specify two types of lion). Then they will know for certain that there is no escape.

V 15 forms a transition between 5:13–14 and 6:1–6. It describes the result of God's frustrated attempts to get the people to respond to his chastening: he will withdraw from them. If God's presence is terrifying, his absence is worse. The words of 6:1–3 express just what he is waiting for: the people's determination to know him and to trust him.

6:1–6 Israel's fickle love and what God requires

There is no connecting word with the preceding verse, but this is clearly what God wants to hear. Israel acknowledges that he has torn them to pieces (as 5:14), and that only he can heal them. V 2 gives the only specific references in the OT to being raised up on the third day. Clearly this is not primarily a prophecy of an individual, the Messiah, but a metaphor of the coming to health of the nation. Nevertheless, there is a real similarity between the two situations: God works a totally impossible healing. What was done metaphorically for the nation of Israel, God's son (cf. 11:1), was done literally for Jesus Christ, God's Son. This passage, as well as the reference to Jonah in the fish's belly, may have been in Paul's mind when he spoke of Jesus as 'raised on the third day according to the Scriptures' (1 Cor. 15:4).

It is much more likely that v 3a should be translated, 'Let us know ... let us press on to know ...'. This is the normal primary meaning of the word rendered acknowledge by the NIV (see on 13:4–5). The people express a heartfelt desire for a personal relationship with God. This is a daring metaphor, for 'to know' one's wife would normally indicate sexual intercourse. Nevertheless, Hosea and other biblical writers do not shrink from using marriage as a picture of this close and exclusive relationship (Is. 62:5; Rev. 21:2).

God is as reliable as the sun, and brings blessing like the seasonal rains on which Israel depended for her very life. In Palestine most rain occurs between early December and early March. The winter rains come at the beginning of this period in the autumn, softening the ground for sowing. The spring rains (sometimes called ‘latter rains’) are showers from March to May which strengthen the crops. The summer is almost completely dry, and rain is eagerly sought and appreciated as a great blessing.

In vs 4–6 the mood changes. It is as if God says, ‘Even if you said such things, you wouldn’t stay faithful and committed to me for very long. Your “steadfast love” is like the morning mist and dew, which simply disappears early in the day’ (see on 2:21; cf. 4:1; 10:12; 12:7). It is for this reason that the prophets came with stern, cutting words, to bring the people’s sin to light and to call for repentance. When that was not forthcoming, a message of judgment had to be pronounced. When a prophet speaks ‘in the name of the LORD’, the judgment announced is certain (cf. Gn. 1:3; Ps. 33:4–9; Is. 55:10–11).

Mercy (6) is the same word as that translated love in v 4. It signifies the steadfast love shown by God in his covenant with Israel. He does not want sacrifice in place of steadfast love; he desires that Israel’s steadfast love should be the real thing. He does not want whole burnt offerings but a genuine, deep personal relationship. The importance of this verse is seen in its use in Mt. 9:13 and 12:7 (cf. Mk. 12:33).

6:7–11a Israel has been unfaithful to the covenant—and Judah also

These verses describe appalling behaviour from people who had made a covenant with God. It is possible that Adam refers to the first man and his disobedience to God’s direct command, but the word covenant is not found anywhere before Noah (Gn. 6:18) in the story of Adam and Eve and their descendants. Most commentators read ‘as at Adam’, a place mentioned in Jos. 3:16 where the waters of the Jordan were cut off, allowing the people of Israel to cross over into the promised land. If this reading is right, Adam, a town in Gilead on the way to Shechem, had become a place of violent robbers (8–9). We do not know of specific violent acts there, but the coup against Pekahiah was carried out by Pekah and fifty men from Gilead (2 Ki. 15:25). It is quite likely that priests were involved in this or in similar deeds (9: cf. 2 Ki. 11, where the priest Jehoiada played the major role in a useful coup). V 10 sums up the situation again in terms used before.

Again the prophet has a side swipe at Judah (11a). Those who hear of another’s condemnation approvingly need to examine themselves.

6:11b–7:2 God wants to heal but Israel’s sin prevents it

This is a graphic picture of God who is just looking for a way to restore the fortunes of Israel. But their sins are always there staring him in the face, exposed and revealed. They engulf them and there is no way through for God—and no way out for the people. In the middle of these descriptions Hosea refers to two specific sins which he has mentioned before: deceit and robbery (1b). V 2a observes a common human problem, that of thinking that what we see is all there is. They do not know that their sins engulf them, nor realise (‘say in their hearts’) that sins now past are remembered by God. Remember the fearful statement that Samson ‘did not know that the LORD had left him’ (Jdg. 16:20b; cf. 2 Ki. 6:17; Ps. 50:21a).

7:3–12 Israel’s sin described by various metaphors

Vs 3–7 form a double-decker sandwich such as we have seen before. The sequence is: king and princes (3)—oven (4)—king and princes (5)—oven (6–7a)—(rulers and) kings (7b). This suggests that this is a picture which should be considered as a whole.

The leaders, the king and the princes, do nothing to correct the climate of dishonesty and wickedness (3). They relish it, for it is the way to satisfying the personal lusts of those who are strong, and scruples do not interfere. But see v 7b for a nasty shock that is coming to them!

They are like an oven (4) that generates its own heat. Their passions, once aroused, continue at full heat. It seems that the baker is simply part of the picture, rather than representing a particular person. V 5 is quite obscure, but the NIV looks reasonable: the king and princes join in some sort of unsavoury revelries. Some feel that the mockers are those who plot against the king. He himself is unaware of this and joins hands with them, while the princes are unable, in their drunken state, to protect him.

The oven metaphor continues in vs 6–7. It looks as if it is simply expanding on what was said before: the oven carries on burning. In the morning it has not died down at all, but blazes up. But v 7 tells us of an unexpected result: there are plots to overthrow the leaders. There were several such plots at the end of the northern kingdom's history (e.g. 2 Ki. 15; 17; and see on 5:13–15). Those who take the law into their own hands should not be surprised when others do the same, and do it more efficiently and ruthlessly. The kings fall, but it does not occur to them to call upon God (7b).

In vs 8–12 Hosea gives us a string of metaphors, all describing something horrible. Ephraim (i.e. Israel) mixes with the nations, losing his purity and single-minded devotion to God (8a). Israel is a flat cake not turned over, raw on one side and overdone on the other (like a barbecue sausage!). Foreigners sap his strength but he does not realise it. They take a heavy tribute from him (giving nothing in return) and he seems unaware of what is happening. He does not notice that he is going grey; he thinks he is still in his prime, a sign of the arrogance mentioned in v 10. Despite all the misfortunes suffered, Israel does not return to the LORD his God or even search for him. Surely Hosea is justified in calling Ephraim a silly and senseless dove, that tries in turn to find a solution from Egypt or Assyria (11). What will happen to this silly bird? God will catch it in a net, and it will be unable to fly anywhere, completely at his mercy.

7:13–16 They refuse to turn back to the LORD

There is no strong break here, and the picture of Israel straying from God is clearly similar to vs 8 and 11. The motif of refusing to return to God occurs throughout ch. 7 (vs 1–2, 7b, 10). Woe is used as a cry of lament for oneself and for others. In the latter case it also implies a cry of judgment, and here this is shown in the parallel expression Destruction to them (13b).

Throughout these verses two things are clearly evident: God's love for Israel and the fact that the people have other priorities. He longs to redeem them, he wants them to turn to him but they speak lies against him. When they are in trouble they just wail upon their beds, ignoring the one source of effective help. When they gather together, their minds are on food and drink, not on God. He had trained them, but in return they plot evil against him (15).

The first part of v 16 is obscure (lit. 'They turn, not to/upon/against') and some corruption of the text must have taken place. The sense of the NIV must be roughly right. Perhaps we should read: 'They return, but not to me' (Wolff), or 'They turn to No-God' (cf. Dt. 32:17, 21). The faulty bow is probably one that is feeble: the arrows do not reach the target. The end of the section shows the leaders killed in battle, and the formerly arrogant people forced to flee to the land of Egypt (a sign of a return from salvation), where they are ridiculed or derided.

8:1–14 Sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind

In this chapter there is a series of judgments against Israel associated with different sins: their choice of kings (4–6), their foreign alliances (7–10) and their corrupt religious practices (11–14). Throughout we see an unhealthy self-reliance. They carry on as those who are worldly-wise but give no thought to whether their actions are acceptable to God.

8:1–3 Judgment by an enemy. As in 5:8 there is a sudden call to sound an alarm. The threat is described as an eagle ... over the house of the LORD. There is doubt as to whether the word means eagle (NIV) or vulture (RSV). Does this signify a vulture waiting to devour something already dead, or an eagle about to swoop on something small and slow, and defenceless before its great talons? The latter seems more likely, for it agrees better with v 3, an enemy will pursue him (cf. Job 9:26; Ps. 103:5; Hab. 1:8, where the NIV and RSV choices are reversed!).

In v 1 Hosea again draws attention to the people's unfaithfulness to God in rejecting the covenant, the basis on which they could claim to be God's people, and the law, which enabled them to please God and remain within his blessing.

8:4–6 Kings and idols to be judged. In these verses Hosea refers back to the start of northern Israel as an independent kingdom. Jeroboam I, the son of Nebat, broke away from Solomon's son Rehoboam, and set up rival sanctuaries to Jerusalem at Bethel and Dan. In each one he placed a golden calf (1 Ki. 12:26–30) and these, along with the shrines on the 'high places' (1 Ki. 12:31–33), became a source of idolatry and unauthorized practices. Jeroboam was actually encouraged to become king by a prophet named Ahijah (1 Ki. 11:29–40), but virtually all the kings of the northern kingdom are condemned in 1 and 2 Kings, and they were hardly ever chosen with reference to God. It is possible that one of the golden calves was transferred to Samaria, the capital city of Israel, but perhaps more likely that calf of Samaria indicates that this prophecy belongs after Dan had fallen into the hands of Assyria (2 Ki. 15:29) and only one calf remained for Samaria and its territory. God's opinion of the calf is clear: it arouses his anger; it is not God; it prevents the people from becoming pure; it leads only to their destruction. The beginning of v 6 is unclear. Literally it is simply 'For from Israel' and may refer to the calf.

8:7–10 Opportunist politics: sowing and reaping. V 7 is a powerful and evocative picture: they sow what is worthless and insubstantial, and what comes up is the same with interest, something worthless and destructive (cf. Gal. 6:8). The primary reference is to Israel's foreign policy, trying to make friends with each nation in turn, in the hope of backing the winner. But Israel has nothing much to offer, and the nations simply devour what she has (7–8). Even though Israel buys a place among the nations and is dispersed, God will gather them together again—but not to save them. V 10b is very difficult, but the NIV is as likely as anything here. Like a wild donkey is the description given to Ishmael, the child of Abraham and Hagar (Gn. 16:12), and definitely not the child through whom the promises were to be fulfilled.

8:11–14 Israel's religious substitutes. Here is evidence of great religious enthusiasm. They have built many altars for sin offerings. The word is actually 'sinning' as at the end of the verse, but the same Hebrew consonants will give the NIV's translation. If this is right, as seems likely, then there is a play on words: the altars intended to remove the results of sin and restore fellowship with God actually add to the sin. The people reject the many things written in the law of God, as if they were something foreign and peculiar. They offer their own sacrifices and eat the meat, i.e. take part in sacrificial meals intended to express fellowship with God, but the LORD is not pleased with them. Only by sticking strictly to what the LORD himself has specified can a worshipper find acceptance (cf. Lv. 10:1–11). The sacrifices do not remove sin from God's memory (Is. 64:9; Je. 31:34); they are still there, and that implies that he will act against them. They will return to Egypt, i.e. they will be returned to bondage (see also 2:15; 7:11, 16; 9:3, 6; 11:1, 5, 11; 12:1, 9, 13; 13:4).

V 14 returns to the theme of self-reliance in political matters, and Judah reappears here. Israel has forgotten his Maker and instead (and this is the heart of the problem: instead) has built palaces. Judah has fortified many towns. 2 Ki. 18:13 describes what happened to these towns at the hands of Tiglath-Pileser of Assyria. Only Jerusalem survived, and that was because of the direct intervention of God, in response to the challenge from Assyria and prayer (2 Ki. 19:5–7, 20–36). Fire describes judgment both literally and metaphorically.

9:1–6 Judgment: religious festivals will be cut off

Here the prophet focuses upon the judgment previously threatened, that Israel will return to Egypt (7:16; 8:13), and its effect upon Israel's festivals. Hosea tells the people, Do not rejoice like the nations (as you have been doing). Even if they get away with it for a while longer, you won't, because you have been unfaithful to your God, the God who revealed himself to you, brought you out of the land of Egypt, showed you how to live, etc. You have gone after other gods, acting as a prostitute, especially at threshing-floors, where certain religious celebrations took place.

The prophet then comments that their threshing-floors and their winepresses (which served a similar function) will not give them any cause for celebration. They won't even feed them; the new wine will fail, giving the promise of a lean and joyless year ahead.

In fact the LORD's covenant with them will be broken. He brought them out of the land of Egypt and made them his people, but they will return to bondage (in Egypt). God gave them his law and told them how to be clean in his sight (see especially Lv. 11:1–23; Dt. 14:3–21), but they will be taken to Assyria and there be forced to eat what is unclean. Both these judgments will be a sign of their separation from God.

Wine will be in such short supply that they will not pour out wine offerings, i.e. quantities of wine offered to the LORD along with other sacrifices by being poured out. (These are also called drink offerings, or libations.) Nor will their sacrifices please him for they are unclean and unable to offer in the right way. When they eat at a sacrifice it will be like eating at a funeral. The food will serve no religious purpose: it will simply satisfy hunger (4b).

So the prophet challenges them with a rhetorical question: what will you do on feast days? The answer is obvious: there is nothing worthwhile that they can do. Hosea then comments that even if they escape from destruction by fleeing to Egypt (Memphis is in northern Egypt), they will die there.

9:7–9 Ridicule for God's servants

After a brief repeat warning of judgment to come, Hosea moves on to a new theme. Israel is so deep into sin and hostile to the true God that those who faithfully speak his words are regarded as fools and maniacs (cf. 2 Ki. 9:11). But they are not only ridiculed people actively plot against them (cf. 1 Ki. 18:4; 19:10; Mt. 23:29–36). As in the days of Gibeah (see also 10:9) refers back to a dark age in Israel's history, and the story of the Levite's concubine and its aftermath (Jdg. 10–21). The verdict of the writer of Judges was, 'In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit (what was right in his own eyes)' (Jdg. 21:25). That would fit Hosea's time very well too. And many of the evils of the modern world could be put down to a similar attitude.

9:10–17 More lessons from history: the roots of Israel’s sin

Hosea describes Israel in its earliest period as a nation, in the desert, i.e. during their wanderings between crossing the Red Sea and their entering the promised land of Canaan. God was delighted with them, as one would be delighted at finding the first grapes and figs of the season. But very soon they grumbled and complained against him. An appropriate incident which Hosea selects as a particularly bad, but typical, example of their behaviour is their immorality at Baal Peor, where many of the people indulged in immoral behaviour with Moabite women and offered sacrifices to Baal (Nu. 25:1–5). Consecrated themselves to that shameful idol is lit. ‘consecrated ... to shame’; the word is often used as a substitute for ‘Baal’.

Ephraim’s glory here means primarily the numerous children promised by God to Abraham. Now there will be no birth, not even pregnancy, no, not even conception. And even if children are born they will die. This does not mean, of course, that there will be absolutely no births; it is a poetic and powerful way of saying that the nation will not grow. The second mention of the death of Ephraim’s children is a chilling picture: bringing out their own children to the slayer. Between these two references is the real cause: God has turned away from them (see on 5:15), and there can be no blessing where he is not present. V 14 is a variation on the same theme, couched as a cursing prayer of the prophet.

V 15 turns to another geographical and historical example of Israel’s sin. Gilgal was the place where Israel crossed the Jordan into the land of Canaan and reconsecrated themselves to the LORD by performing circumcision (Jos. 4:19–5:9). Samuel visited it regularly as judge (1 Sa. 7:16), and there Saul was confirmed as king of Israel (1 Sa. 11:14–15). There David was welcomed after surviving Absalom’s rebellion (2 Sa. 19:15). But in Amos and Hosea’s time Gilgal had become a centre of corrupt religion (4:15; Am. 4:4; 5:5). This is probably the reason why God hated them (cf. Is. 1:10–17; Am. 5:21–24). We know also that their false religion was coupled with injustice and oppression. Various typical themes are hinted at: no longer love them (cf. 1:6); blighted and they yield no fruit (cf. 2:3, 9–12; 9:2); slaying their cherished offspring (cf. vs 12–13; 2:4; 4:6). The chapter ends with another comment from the prophet, again reemphasizing former statements.

10:1–10 Agriculture, wrong religion and kings: judgment and a choice

This section is quite diverse, and the text is even more difficult than usual. It deals with agricultural matters (a vine, v 1; a ploughed field, v 4) religious practices (altars, vs 1b–2; idols, vs 5–6, 8), and political events (a king, v 3; defeat by Assyria, vs 6–7, 9b–10).

It starts with a reference to Israel as a vine (cf. Ps. 80:8–16; Is. 5:1–7; Je. 2:21; Ezk. 15:6; 17:1–6). As Israel prospered (the vine brought forth fruit) he built more altars and adorned his sacred stones (see on 3:4), i.e. practised more unauthorized, or downright idolatrous, religion. The people deceived themselves (2a) into thinking that this was acceptable to God, and the result is that the LORD will destroy these objects.

Hosea now turns to the subject of kings: the time is coming when Israel will no longer have a king (i.e. after the fall of Samaria in 722 BC), and they will recognize that their state is so hopeless that a king could not help them anyway. Kingship was always a tricky subject in Israel. In the book of Judges it seems that one of the reasons for the chaos in the land was the lack of a king (Jdg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). God regarded the request for a king in order to be like the nations as a rejection of himself and so did Samuel (1 Sa. 8:4–9). Yet God gave them a king and transformed their wrongly motivated request into a means of security and teaching, and hope for the future.

Hosea mentions a variety of sins in a variety of ways. Dishonesty (4) leads to lawsuits which are like poisonous weeds in a ploughed field, preventing and spoiling the expected crops. The people in Samaria are afraid on behalf of the calf of Bethel (again corrupted to Beth-Aven; see on 4:15). The word is actually ‘calves’ here, though it was singular in 8:6. It might be a plural of majesty meaning ‘the great calf of House-of-wickedness’, obviously intended ironically. This idol will be taken into exile, unable to save itself (as Isaiah points out concerning the idols of Babylon, 46:1–2). The people and the idolatrous priests, far from acknowledging its uselessness, will mourn over it, as it is carried to Assyria, as tribute for the great king. Literally this is ‘King Yareb’ which is probably related to the word for ‘strive’ or ‘quarrel’. George Adam Smith translated it ‘King Pick-Quarrel’! This seems likely to be right, for it certainly fits in with the character of the aggressive Assyrian kings. The picture then changes to the city of Samaria and its king floating away like a twig on the water, powerless to do anything about it.

In v 8 Hosea returns to the subject of altars, and the high places where they were set up. They will fall into disuse, and be covered by thorns and thistles. The people’s cry to the hills to hide them from the punishment, or to put them out of their misery, is also found in Lk. 23:30 and Rev. 6:16 (cf. Is. 2:10, 19–21).

V 9 returns to Gibeah (cf. 9:9). The evil of the men of Gibeah led to civil war, and to the tribe of Benjamin almost being wiped out. This time it will be foreign nations that carry out God’s judgment in battle.

The reference to double sin may well refer to the sins of idolatry and reliance upon foreign alliances rather than on God.

10:11–15 Ploughing, sowing and battle: metaphors of judgment

In vs 11–15 we have an extended agricultural picture which moves into the battle arena at the end of v 13. Ephraim is a trained heifer that loves to thresh, i.e. pull the threshing-sledge over the corn. It was a comparatively light job, and the beast would not be muzzled. The next picture is less pleasant: the yoke is put on for the heavier work of ploughing. This may be thought of as discipline rather than retribution. In any case it leads to an urgent invitation to engage in useful activity (sow ... righteousness, break up ... unploughed ground) and reap a good harvest of steadfast love (as in 6:4, 6). In the past they have sowed and reaped what is bad (13a; cf. 8:7).

The prophet moves into the interpretation of the agricultural metaphor. Israel has been self-reliant, trusting in physical might. Because of this they will suffer a terrible defeat, as Beth Arbel did at the hands of Shalman. Beth Arbel is thought to be either a site near the Lake of Galilee, or a town east of the Jordan. Shalman may be Shalmaneser III or V (858–824 and 726–722 BC respectively; 2 Ki. 17:3; 18:9) or a Moabite king, Salamanu (cf. Am. 1:3, 13). We do not know precisely what events are referred to, but we can deduce from the passage that they were particularly horrific. Bethel is mentioned probably because it was the chief shrine of Israel, and also to form a play on words with Beth Arbel. In 722 the king of Israel was destroyed, and his descendants were wiped out.

This has been a stern section, but the invitation and promise of v 12 remains.

11:1–11 Israel as God’s beloved child

There is no more passionate and moving expression of God's heart than this anywhere in the Bible. God speaks as the loving father of Israel, who called his son out of bondage in Egypt. At that time Israel was like a helpless child, a new nation facing the might of the Egyptian empire, wandering in the desert with no prospects of food or drink. God taught them to walk, either taking them by the arms or (as the RSV) taking them in his arms. He led them gently, guided them with cords of human kindness, with ties of love. If the metaphor of parent and child continues, then we should translate v 4b as: 'I became for them as those who lift a child to their cheeks. And I reached out to feed him'. This seems better than assuming that there is a change to animal imagery with God removing the yoke from the beast's neck (lit. but surprisingly, 'jaws') and bending down to feed it. Either way, the picture is of tender care bestowed on Israel. Israel, however, showed no response. In fact the more I called Israel, the more they went from me (2, 7). They did not realize that God was the one who healed them (3).

Because of this total lack of response God has no alternative but to punish them. The description has been used before: return to bondage in Egypt (7:16; 8:13), or loss of independence as a vassal in Assyria (9:3; 10:6). They won't return to God, so they will return to Egypt. Vs 6–7 describe the method of judgment—defeat at the hands of their enemies—and again emphasize Israel's stubbornness.

Matthew (2:15) uses 11:1 to describe the way that God acted in saving Jesus from the hand of Herod. Having escaped death he could in due time return from Egypt to fulfil his intended work. Hosea's statement is not primarily a prophecy about Jesus, but an interpretation of a historical event. But the parallels with Jesus are very striking: God preserved Israel (Jacob and his household) from famine by giving them a place in Egypt. From there he brought them out to fulfil his purposes.

All the signs are that Israel must be utterly destroyed, but God cries out in anguish. How can he make them like Admah and Zeboiim, cities which perished forever along with Sodom and Gomorrah (Dt. 29:23; cf. Gn. 14:2, 8)? To human reason it seems there is no alternative, but God is God, not man (cf. Mk. 10:25–27).

The last part of v 9 means either 'I will not come against a city' (see the NIV mg.), or 'I will not come in wrath' or 'burning'.

The end of this section is a promise of salvation which takes some previous metaphors and reverses their sense. The LORD will be like a lion, not to destroy (cf. 5:14) but to give a signal for his sons to come home from wherever they have been scattered. They have previously been described as a silly dove, fluttering to get help from Egypt or Assyria (7:11), and about to be snared in God's net. Here they are fearful, but not silly, and fly eagerly back to the LORD and to their homes (10a, 11b).

The prophecy is an amazing testimony to God's grace, perhaps only surpassed by the events of the gospel: 'God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son ...' (Jn. 3:16).

11:12–12:8 Israel's deceitfulness illustrated and condemned

It is difficult to decide where to divide the text into units, for the various small sections flow into each other, and are interrelated in several ways. Many of the sins condemned have been mentioned before, and the repetition serves to impress upon us the root causes of Israel's plight. In 11:12 we meet with lies and deceit (cf. 4:2; 7:1–3), and this continues in 12:1a. Particular examples of deceitfulness are given. One is from contemporary history: Israel tried to make an alliance with both Egypt and Assyria who were enemies of each other. The other is from Israel's more distant past: Jacob took the heel of his brother even before they were born, thus supplanting him and depriving him of what was naturally his. The name Jacob is connected with words meaning ‘follow at the heel’, or ‘supplant’ and means figuratively ‘to deceive’ (Gn. 25:26; 27:36). Although God gave a message to Rebekah before the birth of Esau and Jacob to say that ‘the older will serve the younger’ (Gn. 25:23), this did not give Jacob (or Rebekah) a licence to cheat (cf. 1 Sa. 16:6–13; 24:1–22). There was no sin attaching to baby Jacob’s taking his brother’s heel in the womb! Nevertheless Hosea uses the picture to illustrate how Jacob/Israel has been deceitful right from the beginning of his existence.

Hosea, however, moves on to recall how God made something of this twister. Jacob hung on in the wrestling match with ‘a man’, who was actually God’s representative, and received God’s blessing and his new name, ‘Israel’ (Gn. 32:24–29). God also found Jacob at Bethel (Gn. 28:10–22) and gave him a gracious and totally undeserved promise. So, says Hosea, you must follow Jacob’s example, and turn from your deceitful ways to your God (6). The fact that he says your signifies an offer to reverse the prophecy of judgment implied in the name of Hosea’s son Lo-Ammi, ‘Not-my-people’ (1:9). Note that your God also comes at the end of the verse. Hosea exhorts them to maintain love (i.e. the steadfast love mentioned in 6:4, 6) and justice, and to wait for their God. In other words they are to continue to trust in God even when it seems that his help is delayed.

We must ask what part Judah plays in 11:12–12:2. In v 2 they are definitely linked with Jacob in a prophecy of judgment; so the NIV seems to be justified in its understanding of 11:12, which is literally, ‘Judah wanders restlessly with God’.

Vs 7–8 give a rare picture from the world of business. Ephraim is like a crooked dealer who defrauds by giving short measure. In his wealth he feels self-satisfied and secure. He does not acknowledge any sin. The picture is left as it is. No word of explanation is needed to show how wrong and how dangerous this is.

12:9–14 Brought from Egypt and to be judged

There follows a word of judgment (9). Although the LORD has been their God from the land of Egypt, the people will be taken out of their ‘promised land’ and sent back to live in tents again. Every year they did this at the Feast of Tabernacles (or Booths), one of the appointed feasts (Lv. 23:42–44; Ne. 8:14–17).

God recalls how he spoke to them through the prophets by means of dreams and parables. Nathan’s parable is the best known in the OT (2 Sa. 12:1–10; cf. Jdg. 9:7–15; 2 Ki. 14:9–10; Is. 5:1–7; Ezk. 15–19; 23), but the word here probably covers a variety of communications from God through the prophets.

V 11 is difficult but it clearly prophesies judgment on Gilead (east of the Jordan, where the town of Adam was, 6:7–8), which is described as vanity or emptiness, and Gilgal. The original play on words used in naming Gilgal ‘rolled away [our reproach]’, is replaced by another pun: piles of stones (Heb. gallim, from the same root as Gilgal).

V 12 again refers, rather abruptly, to the story of Jacob. After supplanting his brother Esau and meeting with God at Bethel, he went to his mother’s brother, Laban, in Mesopotamia. There he served a total of fourteen years for two wives, Leah and Rachel (Gn. 27:41–29:30). Hosea draws attention to his service, he tended sheep (lit. ‘he kept’ and we understand ‘sheep’ is intended). V 13 seems unrelated—the LORD used Moses, to bring Israel out of Egypt and to care for (lit. ‘keep’) him. It is emphasized by repetition that this was by means of a prophet. The relation between the verses may be that as Jacob fled to a strange land and was reduced to keeping sheep in order to get a wife, the LORD brought him out of a strange land and provided his own servant (the prophet Moses) to keep him. It is an example again of God's care for Israel. But v 14 describes (again) Israel's ungrateful response, provoking God to anger. So he will not be relieved of the guilt of his bloodshed (though, as we have seen, God longed to persuade him to turn from it and be forgiven). He will be repaid for his contempt for God and his gracious invitation (cf. Heb. 10:29; 12:25).

13:1–16 Further pictures of judgment

Ephraim was the largest tribe of the twelve (or thirteen, since Joseph produced both Ephraim and Manasseh), and is often used as a way of referring to the whole of the northern kingdom, as we have seen. Here it must mean the tribe, since it is in Israel. In former times Ephraim had authority and respect. But this was lost through idolatry, and he died; he could be completely ignored. Far from learning from their mistakes they now sin more and more, putting a lot of money and talent into making images (2a).

V 2b is very obscure, but it may well mean that these people sacrifice human beings on the one hand, and kiss calves made of metal on the other—truly outrageous behaviour, showing a completely wrong sense of values, or appreciation of God's work in making humankind in his own image.

The result is that they will become nothingness, morning mist and early dew (like their 'steadfast love' in 6:4), chaff swirling from a threshing-floor, and smoke escaping through a window (3).

The LORD repeats the fact that he is their God from the time that they were in Egypt. V 4 is similar in content to the first commandment along with its introduction: 'I am the LORD your God who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me' (Ex. 20:2–3). On the other hand, the form and vocabulary are quite different. We should probably translate it: 'You know no God but me, there is no saviour except me'. In other words, it is a statement rather than a command. The word 'know' (NIV acknowledge) also occurs in v 5 where the NIV translates it cared for. It is better to keep to the primary meaning 'know', recognizing that there are various implications of 'knowing', sometimes including 'acknowledging'. One of Hosea's main concerns is the relationship between God and Israel: they should know each other intimately, as a husband and wife should.

V 6 describes the tragic results of disregarding the warning in Dt. 8:11–14 which are, unfortunately, seen throughout the world to this very day: affluence breeds pride and forgetfulness of God's grace, even after hearing the warnings of Jesus himself (Mk. 10:21–25). The judgment for this is expressed again in terms of wild animal attacks, this time the lions are joined by a leopard, a bear (unpredictable at the best of times) robbed of her cubs, and an unspecified wild animal (7–8).

Vs 9–12 emphasize themes mentioned earlier. Israel is destroyed because of his rebellion against the one who had helped him, the only one who could help him in his present plight (9). Where is your king?, God challenges Israel. Where are your rulers [lit. 'judges'] in all your towns ...? In Samuel's time the people had asked for a king like the nations (1 Sa. 8). This also implies a request for princes, since kings have sons (some had too many for comfort: Jdg. 9:1–2; 2 Ki. 10:1). God granted their request, but was angry at their attitude, which expressed a lack of trust in him and a desire to be like the nations around. He gave them kings, knowing that Israel would suffer through them; and he took their king away because of his anger at their blatant rejection of their true king.

Ephraim will not escape judgment, for his guilt and sins will not disappear. They are stored up ... kept on record (12). V 13 gives us a ludicrous picture of Ephraim as an unborn son: it's time to be born, but he does not come to the opening of the womb!

V 14 is famous because Paul quotes the second part of it in 1 Cor. 15:55 as a rhetorical question. Paul uses a different translation, but the same sense could be obtained from the text that we have in Hosea: 'Where are Sheol's plagues (i.e. the plagues that bring death, and send people to Sheol, the place of the dead)? Where is death's destruction?'—nowhere, they have been done away with in Christ's victory on the cross. But the context here is different. The whole of ch. 13 is a prophecy of judgment, so it would be strange indeed to find such an abrupt promise of salvation, especially one immediately followed by I will have no compassion. It is likely, therefore, that we should translate v 14a as two questions: 'Shall I ransom ... shall I redeem ...?' followed by a call to death to come and punish Israel with its plagues. An alternative understanding would be that v 14a expresses God's desire to save, which the Israelites spurn, and therefore cannot receive compassion but plagues and destruction. The words ransom and redeem are used of buying back from debt or slavery (e.g. Ex. 13:13–15; Nu. 18:15–17; Ru. 4:4–6).

The final part of this chapter, the last word of judgment in Hosea, uses first the picture of a hot desert wind that comes from the east, drying up all sources of water, even springs and wells. It will plunder his storehouse. A military picture is used to describe the wind: no food will grow and so those supplies that are stored up will vanish. V 16 gives a final picture of the horrifying effects of war: what happens when a nation deliberately removes itself from God's protection and refuses to return.

14:1–8 An appeal to repent and a promise of blessing

14:1–3 An appeal to Israel to return to acknowledge the LORD alone. Return O Israel, to the LORD your God looks like a normal appeal, but notice that the promise is already there in the word your. The cause of their downfall has been their iniquity. So now they are recommended to make a specific prayer and statement of their reliance upon God alone. This is similar to the confession of trust that God looked for in 6:1–3, but here there is a more explicit acknowledgment of their concrete sins. They throw themselves upon God's mercy, resolving to praise him (offer the fruit of our lips). They renounce their former trust in two wrong sources: Assyria (and military might) and idols. And they confess that in God alone is there compassion for the weak and vulnerable.

14:4–8 Israel restored: a gracious promise from the LORD. In 6:4–6 God expressed his distrust of Israel's resolve in seeking him. Here he responds with a far-reaching promise. The desert wind of 13:15 has gone, and the picture of Israel now is something like the garden of Eden. Food and drink will be there, together with certain luxury items: beautiful flowers, olive trees (and therefore olive oil), cedars (great trees, such as are found in Lebanon) giving shade from the hot sun and a fragrant smell. He will be strong and secure, and famous.

This is truly a wonderful promise, and a wonderful climax to the book. Israel failed to appropriate these blessings in the eighth century BC, but the promise remained and was fulfilled for many Israelites who joined themselves to Judah in Jerusalem, and to many who joined themselves to God through Jesus Christ.

14:9 A concluding wisdom saying

This independent saying is similar to those found in Proverbs and other Wisdom Literature. It is easy to imagine an (inspired) editor adding this to Hosea's prophecies as an invitation to read and learn. 'He who has ears to hear let him hear' (Mt. 11:15). The book is marked as relevant to whoever reads it including us. The only way to live is the Lord's way.

JOEL

Introduction

Dating

The heading in 1:1 gives no information about the prophet apart from his father's name. The divine message, rather than the messenger, is what matters. So background knowledge can be gleaned only from internal evidence. It is useful to discover as much as possible about the historical and social background to prophetic writings. Then we can enter intelligently into the message of the prophet for his own times, and this helps us to apply it to our own situation.

It used to be thought that the order of books in the minor prophets was significant for the dating of Joel. Certainly there is a loose historical sequence, but we must not be locked into an early date just for that reason. The placing of the book of Joel is an interesting topic, to which we shall return later (see also the chart 'The prophets' in The Song of Songs).

The clearest clue for dating Joel comes from the historical information supplied in the accusations of 3:2–3, 5–6. It is now generally accepted that they fit best the terrible events of the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC and its aftermath. The temple was destroyed at that time, but both it and its rituals are conspicuously present in the messages of Joel (1:9, 13–14, 16; 2:14, 17; cf. 3:18). Therefore a date not only after the Judeans came back from exile in Babylon but after the rebuilding of the temple in 515 BC is indicated. The Sabeans (3:8) were displaced by the Mineans as important Arabian traders by 400 BC. In line with this general time-frame is the impression that Joel cites a number of Scriptures and traditions as evidently written earlier and well known to his hearers.

Occasion

We know from other post-exilic books that this period was a very difficult time politically and economically for the Judean settlers. Haggai mentions a bad harvest that devastated the community when they had insufficient resources to tide them over (Hg. 1:6, 10–11; 2:19). It was an agricultural crisis that was the burden of Joel's ministry, one that threatened the survival of the struggling settlers. They experienced a severe locust plague that affected more than one year's harvest (1:4; 2:25). Locusts are still a serious threat, notably in African countries, although the spraying of pesticides, especially from the air, has decreased their harmfulness by killing them before they mature and breed. To this end in a single week in September 1986 four DC-7 aircraft sprayed nearly one million acres in Senegal with malathion. One swarm can contain up to ten billion individual locusts. As many as a thousand newly hatched hopping locusts can occupy one square foot. A single locust can travel 3,000 miles during its lifetime, stripping vegetation wherever it and its swarm land. A swarm can devour in one day what 40,000 people eat in one year. In a 1958 visitation Ethiopia lost 167,000 metric tons of grain, enough to feed more than a million people for a year. (Most of these facts are taken from World Vision, Dec. 1986–Jan. 1987.)

Such an infestation meant that a large question mark was placed against the survival of the Judean community. What could they do? Religion played an important role in ancient society, and Judah was no exception. Prophets were accepted figures in Judean religion. So it was Joel's function to interpret the locust plague in religious terms and guide the community to take suitable religious measures to cope with the problem. Joel seems to have been an official temple prophet. The crucial part played by such prophets at times of national crisis is illustrated by the narrative in 2 Ch. 20:1–20. There the prophet has authority to answer a national prayer of lament in the name of Yahweh, the God of Israel, and to promise deliverance from the crisis. That same power is claimed by Joel. The Psalms too provide evidence of these prophets' ministry of warning the people to mend their ways (Pss. 81:8–16; 95:7–11). This role is evident in the first half of the book of Joel.

Purpose

What religious significance did Joel find in the plague? He interpreted it as a warning from God to return to him, just as Amos did at an earlier period: '“Locusts devoured your fig and olive trees, yet you have not returned to me,” declares the LORD' (Am. 4:9). 'Return' refers to the covenant relationship between Yahweh and his people. This concept underlies the whole of Joel's prophetic ministry. It is evident in such phrases as 'your God' (2:13, 26–27; 3:17), 'my people' (2:27; 3:2–3) and 'his people' (2:18; 3:16). Moreover, while the political name of the community is Judah (3:1, etc.), Joel also uses its covenant name, Israel (2:27; 3:2, 16).

In the OT the covenant is a three-sided concept that includes the land. The triangle is clearly expressed at 2:18: 'Then the LORD will be jealous for his land and take pity on his people.' It is also revealed in the description of the Judeans as 'all who live in the land' (1:2, 14; 2:1; cf. Ho. 4:3). God's gift of the land was a sensitive instrument that registered the spiritual state of the people. It was fertile in times of fellowship and obedience, but barren and lifeless in times of disloyalty. Indeed, locust plagues feature as one of the covenant curses in Dt. 28:38, 42, while agricultural prosperity is credited to Yahweh's blessing (Dt. 28:4, 8, 11, 12).

This close dependence of material fortunes upon doing God's will underlies Joel's messages. Other parts of the OT, notably the book of Job, qualify it and the NT does not often appeal to it (see Mt. 6:33; 2 Cor. 9:6–11; Phil. 4:15–19). Yet there remains a basic kinship between humanity and the rest of creation that we ignore at our peril. The environment is a human and therefore Christian concern.

The covenant system, with its delicate balance of blessing and curse, was conditional (cf. Je. 14:21). In fact God had the right to annul it, if his people refused to play their proper part, although it was up to him whether he exercised that right. There were obviously degrees of cursing, the intent of which was both to punish and to warn, as in Am. 4:6–11. The ultimate judgment is expressed in Am. 4:12, to ‘meet your God’ in a sinister confrontation that would transcend earlier providential punishments (but see on Am. 4:12).

The confrontation is further described in Am. 5:18–20 as ‘the day of the LORD’ which ironically would bring ‘darkness, not light’. This concept, which Amos related historically to the permanent destruction of the northern kingdom of Israel in 721 BC, had a strong influence on later prophets. Joel made great use of it; but whereas for Amos God was to employ human forces to wage war on his people, for Joel a natural force was to be his instrument. He strikingly interpreted the locust plague in terms of ‘the day of the LORD’, as the first stage in the annihilation of the covenant people (1:15; 2:1, 11). He had precedents in Ezekiel and Obadiah, who understood the destruction of the state of Judah, together with its monarchy and temple, in 586 BC in terms of the ‘day of the LORD’ (Ezk. 7; 34:12; Ob. 8–14; cf. La. 2:21–22). However, Joel held out a chance of reprieve for post-exilic Judah, if the God-honouring rites of a public service of mourning, sincere repentance and prayer were performed (1:14; 2:16–17). Evidently these steps were taken, and through Joel a favourable response from God was delivered. It promised an end to the locust plague and also promised agricultural blessings (2:18–27).

There the book might have ended, but it does not. In the post-exilic period there was a keen expectation of a coming age of ultimate blessing. The divine judgment of the exile was regarded as a turning point in the people’s relationship with God. Restoration to the land was to spell restoration to divine favour and the coming of a golden age promised by Jeremiah and Ezekiel and in Is. 40–55. A major task of the post-exilic prophets was to explain why these hopes had not yet materialized. The concept of the day of the Lord was woven into these hopes, which included vindication and so political advancement for Judah at the expense of the national neighbours at whose hands it had suffered. La. 1:21 and Ob. 15–21 are expressions of this development, which Joel inherited. So the day of the Lord covered both judgment and salvation for God’s people, and the latter spelled judgment for other nations (cf. Ezk. 30:2–4). In its most complex form it also included salvation for other nations (Zp. 3:9; cf. Zp. 1:14–18; 3:8), but, as in Joel’s case, it was not always pastorally wise to think or say so.

Quite logically, then, once the theme of the day of the Lord had been applied to the locusts, it snowballed in 2:28–3:21 to include other aspects closely associated with it.

Position in the canon

In the Psalms there are sometimes pairs with related subject matter, such as Pss. 105 and 106, and 111 and 112. Among the minor prophets, which in the Jewish canon represent a single book, Joel and Amos appear to have been placed together for literary reasons. Links between the two books are the shared themes of Joel 3:16 and Am. 1:2, and of Joel 3:18 and Am. 9:13. An earthquake, mentioned in Joel 2:10 and 3:16, reappears in Am. 1:1; 8:8; 9:5. The locusts of Am. 4:9 recall Joel 1–2, while the day of the Lord theme in Am. 5:18–20 connects with the whole of Joel. Placing the books together served to shed light upon each, though more than 300 years of history separate them.

Meaning

We need to overhear the message Joel brought to his contemporaries before we can hear it for ourselves. That involves appreciating the book's own spirituality. Joel was given an insight into human experience, which enabled him to relate it to the purposes of God. God's displeasure does not always lie behind human misfortune, as within the OT the book of Job clearly shows. But the NT sometimes sees Joel as relating believers' misfortunes to divine judgment (1 Cor. 11:30–32; Heb. 12:5–11). The warning passages in Hebrews (e.g. Heb. 10:26–31) and the letters to the churches in Revelation, especially to Laodicea (Rev. 2:5; 3:3, 14–22) sound like Joel, as they speak in strong terms of the perils of spiritual treason. Yet, if Joel had to speak harshly to hardened sinners, he knew too when to speak coaxingly of the tender love of God (2:13), rather like Heb. 6:9–12 (cf. 2 Pet. 3:9).

Joel functioned as a teacher, quoting Scripture and religious traditions and applying them to his own time. For instance, in 2:13 he quoted the beautiful description of God found in Israelite worship (cf. Ex. 34:6; Ps. 86:15) and used it as an incentive to repent. Also he was careful to pave the way for divine oracles, as when he issued his challenges to different groups of people (1:2–18) and offered a sample prayer (1:19–20) before God's summons for the people to assemble in repentant worship at Jerusalem (2:1). Moreover, he explained oracles, once they were given: in 2:13 ('Return to the LORD ... ') the divine call of 2:12 is reinforced with reasons for obeying it, and in 2:32 the significance of God's intention for his people (vs 30–31) is clarified.

Joel's prophetic ministry included the role of pastor. In God's name he was sensitive to the frustrations and heartaches of an ethnic minority. He replaced despair with hope, and a poor self-image with confidence in God's positive purposes. God would recognize and reverse the suffering of his people at the hands of the nations (3:2–3, 5–6, 19) by vindicating and blessing them. Whenever the church feels insecure and threatened by a hostile world, it can turn to Joel for support.

The Christian interpreter of Joel must ask whether the NT made direct use of the book. As we shall see in the course of the commentary, there was a twofold use of the material which looks forward to the end times. First, in a straightforward fashion the coming of the day of the Lord was related to the second coming of Christ, when God would mount a final attack on the forces of evil. Secondly, the promise of the outpouring of the Spirit in 2:28–29 and the day of the Lord language in 2:30–32 were given a sophisticated interpretation in Peter's speech at Pentecost in Acts 2:16–21, 33 and 38–40. The dual usage reflects a conviction that for the church the last days have already begun, but are not yet completed, while for the world they still lie in the future.

Some consider that the national and material blessing for Judah in 3:17–21 will one day be enjoyed by the Jewish people. However, there is very little support in the NT for this claim (see Lk. 21:24). The general tenor of its teaching claims for the church, composed of Jews and Gentiles, a spiritualized version of OT promises. Yet there are clues that a renewed earth is part of God's ultimate purposes (Rom. 8:21; 2 Pet. 3:13).

Commentary

1:1 Heading

The heading to a prophetic book can be a mine of historical information, as it is in the case of Hosea (Ho. 1:1). Here a bare minimum is provided, which focuses on the fact of prophetic revelation and points beyond the human agent to God himself. Joel means ‘Yahweh is God’: it represents his parents’ affirmation of faith in the God of Israel. The fact that his father’s name is supplied rather than his place of residence (cf. Mi. 1:1) suggests that he was a native of Jerusalem, like Isaiah (Is. 1:1). The expression the word of the LORD [Yahweh] came to is a formula that primarily introduces an individual message from God to a prophet, as in Je. 1:4. Here it refers to a collection of oracles given through Joel, as in Ho. 1:1.

1:2–2:17 Summonses to prayer

The first half of the book is a series of attempts on the prophet’s part to encourage the people of God to turn to him in prayerful repentance, in reaction to the dire event of a locust plague. The procedure for such an emergency is supplied in Solomon’s prayer at 1 Ki. 8:37–38: for the people to come to the temple as the house of prayer and to stand in its courts spreading their hands in supplication towards it and so towards the God enshrined there. It is such a spiritual reaction that Joel endeavoured to arouse. The prophet prepared his hearers in 1:2–2:11 for the short oracle from God in 2:12. Then he backed up the oracle with a further appeal in 2:13–17. As the heading in 1:1 has implied, whether the prophet speaks or Yahweh speaks through him, the whole consists of divine communication. The prophet was expressing the mind of God.

1:2–4 The seriousness of the situation

Joel begins with a general call to the elders, the political representatives of the people, and to the rest of the Judeans. He challenges them to admit the uniqueness of their experience. It stood out as unprecedented; a historical land-mark for future generations. For those with ears to hear, the prophet uses the language of religious education: cf. Ex. 10:2; Pss. 48:13; 78:4, 6. It was a clue that God was somehow at work in the human situation and that they needed to relate it to him. The situation is described in v 4 as a severe locust plague, a series of croppings until vegetation was totally destroyed. Various terms for locusts are piled up, rather than presenting their biological development; a different order is given in 2:25. The second term (great locusts) represents the general Hebrew word for locusts and is better translated ‘locust swarm’. The first and fourth terms relate to their destructive power. The third term (young locusts) means ‘hoppers’.

1:5–12 Challenges to different groups

The comprehensive call of vs 2–4 is now broken into a series of calls to various sectors of society. Joel urges each in turn to interpret the plague spiritually, by focusing upon their particular point of need. He means to summon them to a service of public lamentation, as v 14 will make clear.

1:5–7 Drunkards. Ordinarily the drunk are the last people to be aware of what is going on around them. Joel ironically warns them of a consequence of the plague that would shake even them: their wine supply has been cut off. In vs 6–7 he seems to speak passionately of his own hurt in order to stimulate his audience to feel that they too were personally involved. The locusts were virtually an invading army: Joel will develop this idea theologically in 2:1–11. Their quantity had given them the power of large beasts of prey. They had attacked the grape vines, among other fruit trees, and even stripped off their bark, guaranteeing the death of the plants. No wonder the drunkards should weep and wail.

1:8–10 Jerusalem. The feminine singular verbs in the Hebrew, the mention of temple priests and the singling out of the ‘people of Zion’ at 2:23 in the complementary list of invoked groups suggest that Jerusalem, a feminine entity in Hebrew, is in view. In the exhortation to mourn, either its citizens are meant or a religious gathering of the people at the capital. The simile of poignant bereavement conveys the highly emotional form which the mourning should take as a reflection of the crisis. The alternative translation ‘betrothed’ (8) is more probable. In ancient Israel betrothal was legally binding, like the modern signing of a contract before the completion of a business deal. The unexpected death of a partner before the culminating marriage ceremony and consummation would have caused a frenzy of disappointment and despair. Such shock should now be felt in Jerusalem. The reason given is that the temple which lay at its heart had been deprived of the daily cereal offerings and libations of wine that accompanied animal sacrifices (cf. Ex. 29:38–40; Nu. 28:3–8). The clock of perennial worship had suddenly stopped ticking. The cycle of divine blessing upon the crops and human offering of worship (cf. 2:14) had been broken. As in vs 6–7 the prophet pointed to his own sorrow, so now he refers for confirmation to the anguish of the priests who worked in the temple. Their awareness that a crisis had occurred had driven them to engage in mourning rites. The cause of the crisis was the destruction of the raw materials of worship. Oil was used to mix with the flour for the cereal offerings.

1:11–12 Farmers. Not unnaturally after v 10, farmers and fruit-growers are the next group to be challenged. They of all people had reason for lamentation. The cereal crops had been destroyed; so had the grape vines and fruit trees, now desolate and withered. The Hebrew term for dried up has associations with mourning, as the footnote to v 10 observes. It was as if the plants in their sorry state gave a cue for human mourning. Again the prophet is supporting his call with a motivating example. Just as the prophet in v 6–7 spoke of his own hurt to encourage others to consider theirs, so here he supports his call to lament by pointing to the ‘mourning’ of the plants as an example. This year there would be no harvest festivals, which were bywords for communal joy and merrymaking (cf. Ps. 4:7; Is. 16:10).

Joel has marshalled a series of arguments to persuade the people, with their different viewpoints, to unite in a common religious venture. The function of each sector of the people had been undermined. Their worries should be turned into prayers: only God could meet their needs. Joel has worked to communicate such truths to each group in turn and to show them that human experience has a spiritual meaning. Every preacher can learn from his efforts.

1:13–20 A call for public prayer

Instead of a harvest festival it was the time for a grim service. Joel encourages the priests to continue in their mourning rites of v 9, but he advocates that the tragedy of the interruption to the regular offerings needs further measures. First, the mourning should be intensified with appropriate dress and an all-night vigil. Sack-cloth was worn in times of grief (cf. Am. 8:10).

There is careful distinction in the references to your and my God. The priests had their role of serving God, a role that in its usual expression was under threat. Joel claims his own prophetic role as authorization for directing them to a different aspect of their role, to engage in ardent prayer expressing their sense of loss.

Secondly, he urges that they should extend their efforts by organizing a service of lamentation for the nation. They were to declare a public holiday for that purpose (sacred assembly is literally ‘stoppage of work’) and proclaim the rite of fasting that accompanied prayer and proved its sincerity (cf. Jdg. 20:26; Je. 14:1–2, 12). With the authority vested in them as priests, they are exhorted to summon to prayer both elders and those they represented. The reference to elders and all who live in the land recalls v 2 and reveals Joel’s purpose in vs 2–13 to pave the way for this demand for a period of national prayer.

15–20 Joel provides a model prayer, as the people’s leader in spirituality. His constant concern is to point the people beyond themselves by giving them an example to follow. In vs 6–7 he had referred to his own feeling of loss, and in v 9 to the priests’ mourning, while in v 12 he had alluded to the mourning of the plants. The prayer corresponds to the national lament found in the Psalms where, however, it is usually a response to military invasion (e.g. Pss. 44; 74; 80). V 15 begins with a quotation from Is. 13:6, a cry of distress that features the day of the LORD. This is the first mention of a phrase that dominates the book. It refers to the dynamic intervention of Yahweh in human affairs. It had appeared for the first time in Am. 5:18–20, where its popular associations of national salvation and blessing were replaced with judgment for Israel. The prophets also used it of divine judgment upon foreign nations, and it has this sense in Is. 13:6. Joel strikingly reapplied it to the people of God as victims of his judgment. The citation was in itself a powerful statement because of its wordplay, šōd (ruin) and šadday (Almighty). The Israelite ear was extremely well tuned to wordplay; it was a means of arousing emotion that the prophets often exploited. Already Joel had spoken of ruin (10, ruined, destroyed: Heb. šuddad). Now he shockingly traces it back to God as its source, interpreting the locust plague as the very work of God. [That day is literally ‘the day’ (NRSV); ‘comes’ (NRSV) or ‘is coming’, as in 2:1, suits the context better than will come.] Implicitly it was the outworking of a covenant curse (cf. Dt. 28:38). The plague was the beginning of the end for the covenant people.

16–18 It was customary in a prayer of lament to give a factual description of the crisis, to move God to intervene on the victim’s side. This is now supplied, although the first sentence of v 17 is of uncertain meaning. Starvation stared the helpless people in the face. Now that the cereal crops had failed they were no longer able to discharge their sacred trust of presenting regular offerings to God in joyful worship. The flimsy storage buildings, not needed and so left in disrepair, were blatant monuments to that failure. The pastureless herds and flocks were further evidence of the crisis.

19–20 There is a turning to direct prayer as God himself is now addressed. It was permissible for the prayer leader in a national lament to interject a personal note (cf. Pss. 44:4, 6, 15–16; 74:12). If God was the cause, he was also the cure. A lament typically worked with a double image of God, as providential judge and potential saviour (cf. Ps. 22:11, 15). The prophet laid before God the tragedy of the stricken land. If it meant much to Joel (6–7), it must surely touch God’s heart. The reference to fire implies drought conditions. Locust plague and drought do not coincide: evidently the drought followed the destruction caused by the locusts and aggravated it. Pant should probably be ‘cry’ (AV, NRSV). The piteous noises of parched beasts are strikingly interpreted in terms of prayer to their creator (cf. Jb. 38:41; Ps. 104:21; Rom. 8:22). Surely he heard them as such and would be compassionate to their suffering (cf. Jon. 4:11).

2:1–11 Preaching for a verdict

The emotional pressure is increased in preparation for the divine appeal of v 12. Again there is a national call, as in 1:2 and 14. The people's only hope is to turn to God in a service of lamentation. To encourage them to do so Joel sensationally sounds a military alarm and then describes the locusts as a national enemy. Sinister hints that had been dropped in the earlier message, in referring to an invading 'nation' and to the 'day of the LORD', are now developed, as Joel engages in a nightmarish, hell-fire type of preaching. Sometimes appeals to reason are not enough and only gut fear of terrible consequences can give a sense of the reality of God (cf. Heb. 10:26–31).

Some commentators interpret the passage in terms of a literal army, but this is less natural. The use of military similes in vs 4, 5 and 7 implies that the accompanying martial statements are meant as metaphors. Moreover, the clear references to locusts and the harm done by them in vs 19–26 suggest the development of a consistent theme throughout 2:1–27. The prophet interprets the locust plague with language well known to his audience from religious teaching: he adds to it dread imagery associated with the day of the LORD. Thematic references to it in vs 1 and 11 and related quotations from Is. 13:6 and 10 in vs 1 and 10 provide the framework and key thought of the passage.

1–2 The warning cry in the first sentence of v 1 evidently came from God himself (my holy hill). The sounding of an alarm warned that an enemy force was invading (cf. Ezk. 33:2–4). In fact the trumpet was also blown to announce temple services (cf. Nu. 10:1–10), and there is a play on ideas here, which v 15 will eventually clarify. God was really calling for the manning of the temple, not the ramparts. Joel explains the danger in terms of the day of the LORD, first quoting Is. 13:6 once more. Different aspects of God's intervention are then presented in terms of the locusts. The black mass of millions of insects covering the mountains is described in the frightening language of another scripture from the prophets, Zp. 1:15. For dawn it is better to read 'blackness', revocalizing the Hebrew šahar as š^ehôr with the NRSV, GNB and REB, since the evident intent is to justify the application of traditional prophetic language to the locusts. Dawn in the NIV presumably refers to the reflection of the sun on the locusts' wings. Here was the judgment day for the people of God. Joel picks up from 1:6 the imagery of a gigantic army before developing it later in this passage. Then, in an intensification of 1:2, he draws upon the language of Ex. 10:14, which described the locusts in the plagues of Egypt. Now, however, God's people were the victims.

3–5 V 3 contains a skilful allusion to Ps. 97:3, which describes a theophany, a dramatic appearing of the mighty God on earth, enveloped in fiery glory. The locusts were God's representatives, and the devouring fire was the barrenness they caused to the landscape. With their 'scorched earth policy' they turned green beauty (cf. Ezk. 36:35) into a gaunt desert. Joel exploits the uncanny resemblance of a locust's head to that of a horse. They were God's cavalry charging to attack. The noise they made while feeding, which modern observers have described as 'the crackling of a bush on fire', is described with military and destructive analogies. The locusts were a veritable army waging a campaign of terror. Metaphor and simile are used to open up a new horizon of understanding, to reveal the underlying significance of the plague as the very work of God.

6–9 The imagery of the attacking army (v 5) is now developed. But first another allusion to a theophany of judgment is supplied. The Hebrew for the expressions At the sight of them and are in anguish correspond to 'tremble before him' in Ps. 96:9. The locusts represented the very power of God at work against his people. The plural nations heightens their terrifying impact.

The prophets often described the national enemies of Israel as the providential agents of God through whose attacks he punished a sinful people (e.g. Is. 10:5–6; Am. 2:13–16). Joel applies the concept to the locusts. They marched invincibly on, infiltrating even Jerusalem and its houses, unchecked.

10–11 This is the climax. If in v 6 ‘nations’ intensified Joel’s description of the locusts, now cosmic references do so even more. Again the prophet speaks in terms of theophany. In the OT an earthquake is a standard reaction of the world to a visitation from God (cf. Pss. 18:7; 77:18). Cosmic references were features of the day of the LORD, as Is. 13:10 and 13 attest, scriptures to which Joel’s hearers doubtless caught a reference. As waves of locusts crawled over the ground, it seemed to be shaking to the rhythm of their undulating motion. As countless myriads took to flight for fresh pastures, they blotted out the sun by day and the moon and stars by night.

To Joel’s eyes, however, these natural phenomena were eclipsed by their supernatural meaning. With prophetic insight he presents Yahweh himself as commander of the locusts, whose legions marched at his orders. It was Is. 13:4 all over again, yet now God’s enemies were not foreigners but his own people. The final question is meant to evoke helpless despair. Through the crisis Israel was brought face to face with its divine judge.

Joel was deliberately straining the feelings of his hearers to breaking point. He created a sense of utter foreboding and intolerable tension. In tone and in intention vs 1–11 might be compared to the bad news of Rom. 1:18–3:20 before the good news of 3:21–26.

2:12–17 The only chance

Joel has depicted Yahweh in the uniform of an enemy general. However, when he brings from this terrifying figure the message for Judah to surrender to him, it seems to be their former ally who is speaking. As the prophet explains, when once Yahweh’s lordship is acknowledged, he can reveal himself as a God of love. But first in v 12 the prophet transmits a divine oracle that is a summons to repentance (cf. Je. 3:22; 7:3; 18:11; Am. 5:4–5). It is the culmination to which Joel’s own appeals in ch. 1 have been leading. Return evokes the covenant relationship, as Joel comments in v 13 (your God; cf. 2:26–27; 3:17). God’s people were prodigal sons and daughters who needed to come home to their heavenly father. They were to do it now: this was the psychological moment to act. The note of immediacy belongs to the OT’s calls to repentance (Jos. 24:14; Je. 26:13; cf. Acts 17:30; 2 Cor. 6:2) and has passed into evangelistic preaching and hymns. Every salesman or saleswoman knows its necessity if a deal is to be clinched.

Spirituality always has its outward religious forms. In this case total commitment of will (heart), a quality that comes to the fore in Deuteronomy (e.g. Dt. 10:16), was to be expressed by the standard ritual of a public service of lamentation. The prophet’s challenges to weep, mourn and fast in 1:5, 13 and 14 are here gathered up in the divine call.

13–17 Joel provides an interpretive commentary on God’s message. There is a parallel in Ps. 85:8–13, where a one-word oracle of ‘peace’ (šālôm) is interpreted at length by the temple prophet in response to a national lament. First, Joel underlines the need for sincere repentance, calling for consistency between the inner and outer forms of spirituality. Ancient Israel tended to wear its heart on its sleeve and thereby doubtless gained a psychological release harder to achieve in less extrovert cultures. There was a danger, however, that outward emotions could be a cover for wills relatively unmoved. The custom of tearing one’s clothes was part of the cultural reaction to crisis (cf. 2 Ki. 19:1), which still survives in the Jewish practice of tearing the jacket lapel at a funeral. Hearts too had to be torn, or broken: Israel’s response had to be more than skin deep. Not is idiomatically used in the sense of ‘not only’, as in Ho. 6:6 and 1 Jn. 3:18. Joel did not pause to analyse the people's sin. 'In the heat of the emergency cure and not diagnosis is his concern' (Hubbard). The onus was on them to 'examine and test' their ways, as part of the process of returning to Yahweh (La. 3:40).

Secondly, Joel comments on return and notes its associations with the covenant. He goes on to cite the covenant loyalty of God (gracious, love) as motivation for the call to repentance and as incentive for Judah to respond. He uses well-known credal language (he is gracious ... love [13]; cf. Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8). It went unforgettably back to God's gracious renewal of the covenant with the exodus generation, after they had broken it in the wilderness. (Ex. 34:6). So this statement of faith is associated with another chance that God is ready to give his sinning people.

Sometimes God has to chastise his people as part of his fatherly role (cf. Heb. 12:5–11), but his ultimate purpose is to renew fellowship. Therefore, argues Joel, although calamity might be his first and fair response to their sin, his deeper longing was to relent. It was for this reason that the prophet could switch from the portrayal of Yahweh as enemy of Israel to the proclamation of Yahweh's appeal for repentance. The term rendered relents (also in v 14: read 'relent' for have pity) is often used of human repentance, but in God's case it does not imply sorrow for having done wrong. The OT denied the possibility of God's relenting when there was a likelihood that his warnings would not be taken seriously (e.g. 1 Sa. 15:29). But otherwise it can mean that God will be flexible in order to achieve a higher purpose (cf. Je. 18:5–11).

Yet Joel backed away from an outright promise that Yahweh had to be gracious. He could offer no guarantees. God's response was not automatic (Who knows? in v 14). Whether he demonstrated his loving nature in a particular instance was for God alone to decide. His personal freedom is thereby safeguarded: in his sovereign mystery he cannot be manipulated by humans. Prayer is surrender to his will, not insistence on our own will. There is no magic spell, only a humble asking and waiting. Joel's warning serves to underline God's call for a change of heart and habits, as elsewhere in the prophets (Am. 5:15; Zp. 2:3; cf. Acts 8:22; 2 Tim. 2:25).

A positive response from God would mean his turning from a campaign of judgment. The prophet traces an organic link between human and divine turning: return in v 12 and turn in v 14 represent the same Hebrew verb. So pivotal was the relationship between God and his people their turning was the signal for which he looked; it would trigger his own turning (cf. Zc. 1:3; Mal. 3:7). In practical terms it meant that he would leave undestroyed a few traces of plant life in the vineyards and corn fields, as tokens of blessing (contrast v 3). In grateful response, Joel suggests, when this remnant grew to maturity, part of it should be made the basis of offerings, so that Israel would fulfil its obligation of worship once more.

Before this could happen there were ritual acts of a different nature to be undertaken. Joel alludes to the religious vocabulary of v 12—fasting and weeping and mourning—and translates them into a renewed call to the priests to organize a public service of lamentation (15, cf. 1:14). Such a service features in the narrative of 2 Ch. 20:1–13. As there, a response from the whole people is sought: breadth, as well as depth, was a necessary feature of their reaction. The normal leave of absence from public duties granted to the newly wed husband to permit conception (16, cf. Dt. 24:5) had to be withdrawn temporarily, so serious was the situation. All had to be summoned to the temple courts to raise their voices in prayer. Even crying babies could add to the volume of supplication.

17 The priests had to take up their traditional position by the steps to the temple building (cf. Ezk. 8:16; Mt. 23:35) and recite on the people's behalf a typical national lament. They were to appeal to Yahweh as God of the covenant to come to his people's rescue for his own name's sake

(cf. Ps. 79:1–4, 8–10). The phrase your people complements ‘your God’ in vs 13 and 14. The combination expresses the two-sided nature of the covenant (cf. Ex. 6:7). Inheritance, meaning people, refers to those who belonged to God. Repentance meant restoration to covenant harmony: if the people were alert to their covenant responsibilities, they could request the lifting of the covenant curse of the locusts. Loss of face, which was keenly felt in Israelite culture, here finds a double reference. Judah had suffered it before foreign neighbours as a result of the locusts’ devastation. So too had Yahweh as their divine patron. His very honour was at stake. Israel at prayer did not scruple to persuade God by argument to give his aid.

2:18–3:21 Answers to prayer

God gives a double response. The first is in 2:18–27 and the second, longer one in 2:28–3:21. Both culminate in formulas that promise assurance of Yahweh’s protective presence with his people as their God (Then you will know in 2:27; 3:17). The formulas serve to cancel out with glorious certainty the cautious ‘Who knows?’ of 2:14. The first response deals with the immediate situation of the locust plague. The second branches out in time (see 2:28; 3:1) and topic to further demonstrations of God’s deliverance and blessing.

2:18–27 Victory over the locusts

The verbs of v 18 and the introductory verb of v 19 should be in the past tense, as in the footnotes: this is a short piece of narrative introduction. If vs 15–17 found a parallel in the narrative of 2 Ch. 20:1–13, now there is correspondence to 2 Ch. 20:14–17. A time-lag occurs between vs 17 and 18. It is implied that the priests and people took Joel seriously, duly held a service of lamentation and reached in reality the hypothetical stage of v 17. At that point Joel could switch his role from diagnosis of judgment to proclamation of salvation. In Yahweh’s name he is empowered to deliver an oracle of salvation. God might have said ‘no’ in answer to the prayer; in fact he replies with a glorious ‘yes’. Jealousy as a divine attribute denotes passionate concern and zealous love when the object of that loving concern is threatened (cf. Ezk. 36:5–6). The verb take pity is the same as ‘spare’ in v 17. It echoes the petition as a specific answer to prayer. So v 18 presents the following oracle as an example of God’s faithfulness. What human repentance made possible, divine grace was to accomplish.

19–20 The initial message is full of pastoral concern. It is sensitive to the physical and psychological needs of God’s people. Yahweh promises to restore the staple food destroyed by the locusts (cf. 1:10), to a level far beyond bare subsistence, and so to remove the ridicule of pagan foreigners (19, cf. v 17). The issue of saving face is so crucial that it begins and ends the first answer to prayer (19, 26–27). Yahweh now presents himself as his people’s ally in a war against the locusts. They would be driven right away from Judean territory and destroyed, doubtless by means of strong winds (cf. Ex.10:19). In echo of the military language of 1:6 and 2:1–11, the locusts are described as ‘the northerner’ (NIV the northern army). The term recalls Jeremiah’s theme of the ‘foe from the north’, with which he described the enemy army providentially launched against Israel by God (e.g. Je. 6:1). At the end of v 20 ‘it’ should be preferred to he, as in the footnote and the clause taken with what precedes. The army of locusts had acted too savagely, and this was the warrant for their judgment. There is reminiscence of Isaiah’s oracle about Assyria’s double role, first the instrument of God’s judgment against his people and then its victim, for overstepping God’s limits (Is. 10:5–12). Mention of the stench of their decaying remains serves to seal the promise of destruction.

21–24 A series of calls rhetorically addressed to the land, wild animals and the people of Zion are presented in vs 21–23. The people of Zion are the congregation of Israel met together in the temple courts at Jerusalem. The calls are a happy counterpart to the series of grim challenges in ch. 1. There are links in vocabulary between the two passages. The correspondence expresses the reversal of judgment and teaches that God satisfies his people's needs. The assurance that there is no need to be afraid is typical in a divine promise that follows a cry of lament (cf. 2 Ch. 20:15, 17; La. 3:57). Also typical in such a promise is the use of six Hebrew past tenses, two of which the NIV has rendered literally (has done, has given). The past tense are employed for future action, as if to say that God's promise is already as good as kept. The calls function as a prophetic hymn of praise that invites the people of God to trust in what he will do and to rejoice even now (cf. Rom. 5:2). As in Ps. 35:26–27 those who (literally) 'say great things against' God meet their match in the great God, so here in vs 20–21 the negative power of the locusts loses out to Yahweh's positive might. The people of God could look forward (23) to his gift of the healing rains of late autumn and spring and so to the greening of the barren landscape. Eventually they would enjoy a harvest of figs and grapes, in marked contrast to 1:7, 12. There is a revelling in the prospect of rain, which only those who live in hot climates can appreciate.

The footnote 'the teacher of righteousness' (v 23) testifies to an old misunderstanding current in early Judaism, from which the Qumran sect derived the title of their founder, the 'Teacher of Righteousness' or 'true teacher', by association with Ho. 10:12. In the fourth century AD Jerome learned it from his rabbinic teachers and incorporated it into the Latin Vulgate as a messianic promise. But both the context and the underlying appeal to the covenant blessings of Lv. 26:4 and Dt. 11:14 with reference to rain, favour the usual interpretation. Righteousness here refers to covenant harmony: the rain would signify a right relationship between God and his people. V 24 harks back to v 19 and spells out the consequence of this blessing, a welcome excess of grain, wine and oil.

25–27 An oracle of blessing comes directly from God. As gracious compensation for the bad years of harvest after the locusts' ravages, God would give crops that made up for the loss. There is a glancing back to the negative vocabulary of 1:4 and 2:11, at the beginning and end of Joel's appeals, but only as an assurance that the nightmare was over. Cries of lament would be replaced by hallelujahs, in response to the writing of a new chapter of God's power at work in Israel (cf. Ex. 15:11; Mi. 6:15). In closing, the healing of psychological hurt broached in v 19 is twice repeated. Never again or 'no longer' functions in the prophetic literature as a pastoral term that soothes deep-seated anxieties (cf. Ezk. 34:28–29; 26:30). Comfort also comes from the protective title my people, to which the prophet proudly referred in his introduction at v 18. God would prove himself a very present help, the champion of his covenant people. Then they would be able to give a positive answer to the sneering question of v 17, 'Where is their God?' They would also be convinced of his exclusive claims to their allegiance, for privilege never comes without responsibility. The references to the ending of shame triumphantly reflect the same Hebrew verb used repeatedly in 1:10–12 ('is dried up', 'despair', and 'is withered away') and so bring the locust problem to a satisfying conclusion.

God's answer is linked to the land-based theology of the OT, whereby the land is the barometer of Israel's relationship with Yahweh. The catalogue of land-related covenant blessings serves to underline the lesson that the locust plague was the outworking of a covenant curse upon a rebellious people.

2:28–32 Renewal and protection for God's people

Joel has used the motif of the day of the Lord to interpret the locust plague as a doom-laden visitation from God. Traditionally it had to do with a climactic judgment upon a sinful world, from which his own sinful people could not escape (Zp. 1:2–3, 18; cf. Is. 2:6–21). For Joel the plague had set this period in motion, as for Obadiah it had been inaugurated by the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC (Ob. 10–21).

V 32 seems to be Joel's commentary on a further divine oracle cited in vs 28–31, especially in its latter half, vs 30–31. (In v 31 the day of the LORD appears to be a stereotyped expression on Yahweh's lips: the expression 'my day' in this sense never occurs in the OT.) Joel evidently takes a cue from the promise of survival in Zion at Ob. 17 (as the Lord has said) and links it with the message in vs 28–31 given to the people gathered at the Jerusalem temple (cf. Zp. 2:1–3). He associates the message with the unfolding of the day of the Lord in the rest of its phases, on the lines prophesied by Obadiah. God's people had already experienced their version of the day and so would be exempt from its judgment.

28–29 The oracle speaks of a new era of perfect relationship between God and his people. Jeremiah had described this era in terms of the law written on their hearts (Je. 31:31–34; cf. Ps. 40:8) and Ezekiel in terms of the gift of new hearts (Ezk. 36:26–27), in order to convey the notion of a people perfectly obedient to God's will. The language of prophetic inspiration is used to the same end: the Spirit is here a medium of prophecy (cf. Nu. 12:6; 2 Ch. 20:14). The promise takes up Moses' wish in Nu. 11:29, 'that all the LORD's people were prophets and that the LORD would put his Spirit on them!' Earlier in the ministry of Joel the whole nation had been out of step with Yahweh. Only one person, the prophet Joel, had seen the situation through God's eyes; with God's voice he had spoken of both judgment and hope. Now a whole nation of Joels is envisaged. Every sector of its society, young and old, male and female, slave and free (cf. Gal. 3:28), would share a prophet's understanding of God (cf. 1 Cor. 13:9–12).

All people, lit. 'all flesh', here means 'every one in Israel', as the explanation in terms of members of the community shows (cf. 3:1; for the relative use of 'all flesh' cf. Je. 12:12 AV; compare the relative use of 'everybody' in English and 'tout le monde' in French). The message Joel brought to his contemporaries is that, as Calvin said, 'the whole people would prophesy, or that the gift of prophecy would be common and prevail everywhere among the Jews.' In v 29 my should be omitted (cf. NRSV): it is an attempt to harmonize with the quotation in Acts 2:18, which quotes the ancient Greek version rather than the Hebrew text.

30–32 Against Israel's fortune is dramatically set the fate of the other nations. As v 32 will explain, God's people would be safe in the eye of a raging storm. In response to Yahweh's call through Joel they had called on his name in prayer (cf. 1:19; 2:17). So they would be saved or escape the danger of coming catastrophe. That would be reserved for others, as 3:2 will make clear. Israel had barely survived the destruction of the day of the LORD, but that destruction had still to materialize in the world outside. The signs of its coming in sky and earth are explained in reverse. First, blood, fire and smoke are grim tokens of the destructive war that Yahweh would wage on his enemies. Details of this display of judgment will be supplied in 3:1–14. Secondly, the language that Joel applied metaphorically to the locusts in v 10 concerning Israel's experience of the great and dreadful day of the LORD (cf. v 11) is now reused in relation to the nations. It has its traditional sense of cosmic convulsions heralding a theophany of judgment (cf. Is. 13:9–13). These heavenly signs will be reaffirmed in 3:15.

The NT has an intense interest in this passage, in the light of the unfolding purposes of God in Christ. First of all it links the passage with the return of Christ (Mk. 13:24; Lk. 21:25; Rev. 6:12, 17; 9:2). But NT eschatology (teaching on the end times) is complex. Apart from the standard view inherited from the OT and Judaism, it holds that the last days have already begun in the first coming of Christ and in the establishment of the church, while the old age is still rolling on (cf. 2 Cor. 5:17). So, secondly, Joel 2:28–32 is interpreted in this light, especially in Peter’s speech at Pentecost (Acts 2:16–21, 33, 38–40). Peter was claiming that God’s final work had begun in the filling of the disciples with the Holy Spirit and in the opportunity of salvation for the penitent. Detailed explanation is not supplied in the abbreviated text of the speech, but the earthly and heavenly signs and wonders are linked with the miracles done by Jesus and evidently with the darkness at the crucifixion (Lk. 23:44–45). The relation of ‘all flesh’ to Israel is retained: ‘men of Israel’ are addressed, including Gentile converts to Judaism (Acts 2:11, 22).

Later, Paul argued in Rom. 10:12–13 that for Christian purposes ‘all flesh’ should be interpreted as both wider and narrower than the Jewish nation (cf. Acts 10:45). To this end he cross-referenced Joel 2:32 with Is. 28:16 and associated it with the doctrine of justification for all believers established in Rom. 4. Now the chosen people of God no longer takes the form of a nation, but of an international church, whose boundaries are drawn by faith and not by race (cf. Eph. 2:11–22). ‘All flesh’ is still Israel but a greater Israel. Both Jews and Gentiles who do not believe in Jesus stand outside the present people of God. One should think not of a new universalism imposed on the passage but of its particularism being defined in a new way.

3:1–17 Tribulation for the nations and safety for Israel

Judah had experienced and survived their version of the day of the Lord and would experience great blessing, a change of fortunes indeed. However, as 2:31 intimated, the day was to be a catastrophe suffered by the other nations. This next passage unfolds its character: the Hebrew begins with ‘For’ (cf. AV, NRSV) and 2:30–32 are virtually headlines for this section.

The teaching about the end times in the Bible serves not to give information to the curious but to bring pastoral assurance to the suffering people of God. So it does here, as v 2 makes clear with its reference to Yahweh’s covenant care. The passage throbs with a sense of grievance and injustice that mirrors Judah’s own feelings. Its NT counterpart is 2 Thes. 1:5–10, which likewise mingles pastoral assurance, punishment for the persecutors of God’s people and the day of the Lord. The meting out of judgment is an adjusting of the balances of justice, to vindicate victims of oppression and violence, as in the parable of the persistent widow in Lk. 18:1–8. There is the same note of divine championship in vs 2–3 (my inheritance, my people) as there was in 2:17, 26–27.

1–3 An oracle of judgment for all nations is delivered. The Valley of Jehoshaphat (2, 12) is not identified: only its purpose is given, in its name that means ‘Yahweh judges’, and also in its other description in v 14, ‘valley of decision’. Valley here denotes a broad plain between mountains, a suitable gathering place for large crowds. It is clear from vs 2–3 (cf. vs 5–6, 17) that all nations are those who were involved in the invasion and destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BC, especially local vassal contingents of the Babylonian army and its collaborators. A divine version of the Nuremberg trials is promised in judgment on those who inflicted suffering in war. The military campaign resulted in deportation, confiscation of land and the selling into slavery of the next generation of Judeans. God takes upon his own shoulders their sense of grievance and promises as Lord of the covenant to use his power to secure justice for them.

4–8 The form changes to an oracle against particular foreign nations, which is meant as an assurance to God’s own people. The Phoenicians (Tyre, Sidon) and the Philistines, divided into five city-states or regions, are singled out in a rhetorical address intended for Judean ears (cf. Ezk. 25:15–17; 28:20–24). Similarly in the book of Obadiah Edom was the particular object of attack. The oracle begins with an angry challenge that warns that they would have to answer to Yahweh. He would see that the tables were turned for their crimes against him as well as against Judah (cf. Mt. 25:41–45). They are charged (5–6) with looting the temple treasury for trophies to devote to their own gods and also with involvement in the dehumanizing slave trade of prisoners of war, which was mentioned in general terms in v 3. Yahweh promises the return of Judean slaves and a boomerang of enslavement for the slave traders. The Judeans are ironically cast in the role of middlemen. While their own citizens were sold to the Greeks in the far west (cf. Ezk. 27:13), their oppressors were to vanish into the commercial pipeline to the far east, controlled by the Sabeans in Arabia. So the punishment would fit the crime. The oracular formula, The LORD has spoken, functions like a closing signature to a document, endorsing the authority and certainty of the message.

9–13 A divine oracle in vs 9–11 begins with a rhetorical call to the nations to rally to the battlefield where justice would be done. In v 10 there appears to be a deliberate reversal of the promise of peace in Is. 2:4 and Mi. 4:3, where peace for the nations evidently follows the war to end all wars (cf. Pss. 46:8–10; 76:3; Zp. 3:8–10). Joel reverted to an earlier stage in the divine calendar. There were still scores to be settled, unfinished business of a sinister kind for God to transact. The final call in v 11 appeals to Yahweh to bring his heavenly hosts (cf. Zc. 14:5), anticipating v 13. However, it interrupts the divine oracle, as the NIV acknowledges by printing it separately. The ancient Greek version, reflecting mainly the same Hebrew consonants, has ‘Let the timid man become a hero’, which aligns with the end of v 10. V 12 recapitulates Yahweh’s call for the rallying of the nations and identifies the battlefield as Yahweh’s seat of judgment, in explanation of its name in v 2 (cf. Je. 1:15–16). In v 13 Yahweh issues a command to his own troops. The agricultural metaphors refer to a blood bath: they are echoed in the warfare of Rev. 14:14–20 and 19:15, so that the present passage is pointing forward to the time, still future, when God winds up world history. The victims of the carnage are described as ripe for judgment. Yahweh could wait no longer to punish their wickedness, a term that summarizes the charges of vs 2–3.

14–17 The prophet reverts by way of summary to the themes of 2:30–32. First, in vs 14–16a Joel links the scene of war and judgment with the motifs of the day of the Lord mentioned in 2:30–31. The valley of decision or ‘verdict’ is an explanatory name for the ‘Valley of Jehoshaphat’ mentioned in the divine oracle at v 2. Secondly, in the meantime God’s own people would be safe, as 2:32 had affirmed. The prophetic assurance of v 16b, which is an eschatological version of Ps. 46:1, is backed by a divine promise in v 17. Jerusalem would live up to its role as the seat of God’s holy presence, his holy hill (cf. 2:1). It would be put out of bounds to foreign infidels, who had neither political claim nor spiritual desire to be there. This promise is set in a concluding formula that matches the one in 2:27. The covenant relationship was backed by Yahweh’s presence in the Jerusalem temple (cf. Ex. 29:45; Rev. 21:3), which shed an aura of holiness over the whole city. His presence as Lord of the covenant would be openly manifested in the security of the holy city. His people would know from visible evidence, not just by faith. Rev. 21:1–8 transposes Joel’s vision to a new Jerusalem where God dwells but strangers to his will have no place.

3:18–21 Blessings for God’s people

This supplementary oracle of blessing is typically introduced by In that day. It spells out for the land and people the implications of God’s presence in Zion (21b). While 2:28–29 forecast the spiritual blessings to be enjoyed by Israel, now accompanying material blessings are promised.

In the OT the spiritual and the material are the double evidence of blessing. Yahweh's presence would bring fertility to the land via a miraculous water supply from the temple (cf. Ezk. 47:1–12; Rev. 22:1–2). It would water even dry places where acacias grow. The promise of new wine nicely recapitulates an element of the previous answer to prayer (2:24). The agricultural blessings belong to the land-based theology of the OT as tokens of covenant fellowship between God and his people. The promise goes on to include the healing of their emotional wounds, by decreeing barrenness for Egypt and Edom as punishment for crimes committed on Judean soil (cf. 2 Ki. 23:29–34; Ob. 10). As two nations were singled out in vs 1–8, so are two others here. These two nations function as typical, long-standing enemies of God's people. His dealing with them carries an assurance of the total vindication of his people. Their destruction serves as a negative foil for Judah's blessing in vs 18 and 20–21. The union between God and Judah is sealed with a pledge of perpetual occupation. The first half of v 21 is difficult. It seems to echo the innocent blood of v 19. A likely rendering, which underlies NIV, is 'I will show to be innocent the blood (which) I have not (hitherto) shown to be innocent' (cf. REB). It promises redress to the hurting people on lines paralleled in Revelation 6:10 (cf. Ps. 9:11–12).

AMOS

Introduction

The times of Amos

The date of the earthquake (1:1) cannot now be settled and therefore we do not know exactly when Amos prophesied. Uzziah of Judah reigned from 767–740 BC and Jeroboam II of Israel from 782–753 BC and, within these limits, a date around 760 BC is suitable for Amos. See the chart 'The prophets' in The Song of Songs.

Jeroboam was an energetic king, ready to take every opportunity for his country's expansion. The time favoured him: in 805 BC Adad-nirari of Assyria had conquered Syria, thus disposing of a long-standing enemy of Israel. Assyria itself then entered into a period of decline and so the way was open for Jeroboam to restore his kingdom to the boundaries it had enjoyed under Solomon. This in turn gave him control of trade routes and therefore commercial prosperity which was reflected in a dominant wealthy class living in great luxury. As often happens this went hand-in-hand with exploitation of the poor (5:11; 6:6). Amos's prophecy against the excesses of Israel, the northern kingdom, were even more unwelcome in that he came from Judah in the south (7:10–17).

While, therefore, the land had known its troubles within living memory (4:6–11) the prospects seemed good. It was possible to defer anxiety to the remote future (5:18; 6:3) and to forget that while Assyria might be asleep it was not dead.

The teaching of Amos

God

While Amos stresses the unique privilege of Israel (2:9–11; 3:2) he never speaks of the LORD as ‘the God of Israel’; neither, indeed, does he use the word ‘covenant’. He seems to avoid anything that might foster Israelite complacency or false security. His favoured divine titles are ‘the Sovereign LORD’ (e.g. 1:8; 8:1, 3, 9, 11; 9:8) and ‘the LORD God Almighty’, i.e. the God who is in himself every potentiality and power (4:13; 5:14–16, 27; 6:8, 14). Amos does, of course, use the divine name ‘Yahweh’ (‘The LORD’) more than any other name, but throughout his prophecy he stresses the features of God’s character which underlie universal rule and government. He sees the LORD as Creator (4:13; 5:8; 9:5, 6), the agent in all history (3:6; 4:6–11; 9:7) and the moral governor or judge of all the nations (1:3–2:16). He acknowledges one only God but recognizes that there are other objects of worship (5:26f; cf. 1 Cor. 8:5f.) to which people can be drawn away.

Judgment

The only God is the judge of all the earth. Over the whole wide world, crimes against humanity, wherever, whenever and however committed, whether recorded by man or noted only by God, are abhorrent to him and will receive an appropriate recompense. To be brought near to such a God through the privilege of being his chosen people carries the consequence of weightier and more certain judgment (3:2), for the sins of God’s people are not just offences against conscience (as in the case of the nations) but specific rebellions against the light of revelation (2:4ff.). Both affronts to God and offences against mankind are offensive to God and his judgment will fall.

Society

The assumption that crimes (social offences) are sins (offences against God) lies at the heart of Amos’s sociology. In every aspect of society it is with the LORD that we have to deal, whether conduct pleases him and comes under his blessing, or offends and merits wrath. Society does not rest on independent, mechanical principles—market forces, money supply, Gross National Product—for its prosperity. Prosperity comes with divine blessing and no matter how efficient the economy it cannot prosper if it is under his curse.

The LORD is concerned with how war is waged (1:3, 13), how commerce is carried on (1:6; 8:5–7) and whether obligations solemnly undertaken are fulfilled (1:9). He is offended by the acquisitiveness which allows the end to justify the means (4:1–3), when ruling classes become self-important and callous (4:1; 6:1), and when wealth is only a means to luxury for some to the neglect of those less well supplied (3:12–15; 4:1; 6:4–6). The perversion of justice in the courts rouses his animosity (2:6, 7; 5:7, 10, 12, 15) as does commercial dishonesty—the petty fraud of the shopkeeper who tampers with his scales (8:5–7) and the inhumanity of ‘big business’ when it treats people as commodities (1:6). On all these grounds, Amos’s people came under judgment and by extension our modern industrialized, post-biblical world falls under God’s judgment too.

These aspects of commercial and materialistic society, which makes a god out of prosperity, have an ominously familiar ring.

Hope

For Israel, as for the world, will judgment spell an utter end? Amos is a prophet of Yahweh, and this alone should have been sufficient to preserve him from the charge that he lacked a message of hope (possibly more unhesitatingly made twenty years ago than today) and that passages like 9:11–15 are later contributions by other writers. ‘Yahweh’ revealed the meaning of his name (Ex. 3:15; 6:6–8) in a single exodus-event which both saved his people and overthrew his foes. Preaching about such a God cannot exclude hope because it is of the essence of his nature. This becomes clear in 7:1–6 where Amos is made to face the full consequence of Israel’s sin in great judgments which would leave no survivor. When he prays against such eventualities he is assured that ‘this will not happen’. The commentary will show that the negative statements of 7:3, 6, denying total destruction, develop into the positive hope of 9:11–15: a restored ‘David’, a restored creation and a restored people.

Prophecy

Ch. 7:14 is a key verse. In Hebrew the omission of the verb ‘to be’ (lit. ‘I not a prophet’) usually implies a present tense (RSV, ‘I am no prophet’). Those who follow this interpretation (e.g. Wolfe, Joel and Amos, Fortress Press [1977], pp. 306, 312f.) suggest that Amos is denying that an office or official position has anything to do with the case, for what matters is the proclamation of the divine word. Wolfe must deny that 2:11 and 3:7, which are positive about the prophetic office, come from Amos himself, and then assert that Amos says ‘I am not a prophet’ (7:14) immediately before he says that ‘the LORD sent me to be a prophet’ (7:15).

As far as the Hebrew is concerned, while possibly the majority of cases where the verb ‘to be’ is left unstated needs a present tense, each case must be decided by its own needs. Thus, in the present context, in reply to the challenge from the priest, Amos looks back to a time when he was a prophet neither in fact nor prospect, until divine appointment and commissioning gave him prophetic status and work, as the NIV correctly implies. He also stands within the tradition of classical OT prophecy as one endowed with the divine word. Like all the prophets who speak on this point (cf. Je. 1:9; Ezk. 2:7–3:4) Amos asserts the exact identity between his words and the LORD’s words (1:1, 3).

This is the unique fact of verbal inspiration: that the LORD did not just share with the prophets the ‘drift’ of what he wanted them to say but that they were people so worked upon by God that the words which were naturally theirs, bearing the imprint of their times, personalities and studies, were the very words in which the LORD intended his truth to be perfectly enshrined.

Religion

Israel in Amos’s day was extremely religious but it was a religion astray from the law of God (2:7–8), devoid of spiritual benefit (4:4–5), incapable of protecting its devotees (3:14; 5:5–6) and lacking moral and social justice (5:21–25). Did Amos then swing to the opposite extreme, looking for a religion of ethical behaviour without cultic, sacrificial expression? His question in 5:25 seems to suggest this and, indeed, has often been so understood (C. F. Whitley, The Prophetic Achievement, Blackwell [1963] p.73). But for a preacher to ask a question makes him dependent on the answer his hearers will give, and there can be no doubt that Amos’s congregation would have replied heartily that indeed they were obeying divine law that reached back to the days of Moses. On any view of the dating of the Pentateuch, but particularly if the Pentateuch stems from Moses, sacrifices were a fundamental part of the Israelites' religion as received from God. This leads us to the view taken in the commentary (cf. H. H. Rowley, The Unity of the Bible, Carcy Kingsgate [1953] p.42) that Amos's question is not whether sacrifices were right but what place they were intended to have. The LORD's priority was that his people should obey him (Ex. 19:4–5; 20:2–3ff.), and the sacrificial code was a provision for their lapses in obedience. Then, as now, the divine call was to holiness, but if people sinned they had an advocate and a propitiation for their sins (1 Jn. 2:1–2). Ritualized religion, then and now, is a reversal of this priority. (See further on 5:24ff.)

The book of Amos

The book of Amos has come to us as a carefully edited piece of literature and there is no reason to doubt that Amos was his own editor. In fact, when we consider his conviction that his words were God's words it is unlikely that he would have left them to the risk of oral tradition or to unpredictable later editors (cf. Is. 8:16–20; Je. 36). But the question must be asked, nonetheless, whether there are parts of the book as we have it that might more reasonably be seen as the work of others.

(i) The oracles against Tyre, Edom and Judah (1:9–12; 2:4–5). These are often treated as additions because they are briefer than the oracles against Damascus (1:3–5), Gaza (1:6–8), Ammon (1:13–15) and Moab (2:1–3). But when the evidence is added up there are, after all, three oracles in the short form and four in the longer form and, as Hubbard says (TOTC, p. 97), 'variety may be as strong an evidence for authenticity as similarity is'. Furthermore, as a Judahite (1:1) the condemnation of Judah is the one thing Amos dare not leave out unless he wishes to discredit his message by partiality.

(ii) The hymn-like fragments (4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6). Hyatt ('Amos', Peake's Commentary (1963), p. 617) urges that the doctrine of God the Creator evident in these passages requires a later date than the time of Amos (cf. H. W. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, OUP (1946), p. 22). But archaeology has shown that the concept of the gods as creators is as old as religion. It would be remarkable indeed if the OT was laggard in ascribing this glory to the LORD! Furthermore, as the Commentary shows, the passages are carefully embedded in their respective contexts. So perhaps Amos was quoting well-known hymns on the topic of God the Creator, but doing so with an eye to the needs of his message at each point.

(iii) The words of 9:11–15 are much disputed because they have such a golden message of hope as compared with the solemnity of the rest of the book. It used to be held that, in any case, such a doctrine of hope required a post-exilic date. The language of the passage fits well with the rest of the book, however. Besides this, there is an inherent absurdity in thinking that it was a later editor who added the note of hope, presumably when the full-blown message of doom did not eventuate and an Israelite people continuing to exist after the exile. For if Amos is only a prophet of doom, foreseeing only the end of the covenant and of the covenant people, hope could only be added at the expense of making him a false prophet! On the other hand, if Amos really believed his own message about fire on Judah and Jerusalem (2:5) it is reasonable to expect that he would look to the LORD for some word about the future beyond the fire and then express it in symbols and motifs familiar in his own day.

Outline of contents

The three main sections of Amos are marked out by what is known as ‘inclusio’, which means that each begins and ends on the same note: the roaring lion (1:2; 3:8), the surrounding foe (3:9–11; 6:14) and (by contrast) the judgment that will not happen (7:1–6) and the hope that will (9:11–15). Each section has a symmetrical pattern: the first (1:2–3:8) takes the form ABBA; the second (3:9–6:14) the form ABCCBA and the third (7:1–9:15) the form ABCDCBA.

Commentary

1:1 Title

As the book proceeds we learn that the words of Amos are in fact the words of the LORD (e.g. 1:3, 6; 3:1, 11; 5:1, 4; 9:11–15). But Amos clearly did not lose his personality through becoming the vehicle of the LORD’s words. This is the miracle of inspiration. Shepherds is a word only used elsewhere of ‘sheep-breeder’ (2 Ki. 3:4). The LORD chooses whom he will, making the very ordinary his agent for unique purposes. Only the work of God—not human training or even personal choice—could have made Amos what he became. Tekoa, 12 miles (19 km) south of Jerusalem. Saw is often used, as here, to describe the spiritual ‘perception’ granted to the prophets (Is. 1:1; Hab. 1:1), not necessarily visionary experience but the ability to ‘see what is true'. It blends revelation and inspiration, for it implies both an objective truth 'seen' and the subjective faculty to 'see' it. God gave both the truth and the ability to grasp and express it (NBD, 'Prophecy, Prophets'). Uzziah ... Jeroboam ... earthquake, see Introduction.

1:2–3:8 The Lion's roar: universal judgment and its grounds

1:2 The Lion's roar: the Lord's voice

Like a good open-air preacher, Amos gathers hearers by telling them what would arouse their enthusiasm—the judgment about to fall on hated foes. Imperceptibly, however, he moves their attention from pagan nations (e.g. Damascus in 1:3) to 'cousin' nations (e.g. Edom in 1:11; cf. Gn. 36:1), then to the 'sister' nation Judah (2:4), and finally the crowd finds itself listening to its own condemnation (2:6). Though judgment is pronounced throughout in parallel terms (sending 'fire'), the ground of judgment changes. The nations around are brought to trial for 'crimes against humanity' (1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1), things conscience should have warned them not to do; but Judah (2:4) and Israel (2:11–12) are judged for abandoning revealed truth. The cardinal sin of the LORD's people is to depart from the LORD's word. Their cardinal virtue is obedience to revelation.

The great Lion's roar heralds the judgment to follow (1:3–3:2) by underlining three general aspects. (i) It is imminent. Roars is the 'pouncing roar' intended to terrify the prey into submission (Jdg. 14:5). Both verbs, roars and thunders, express repeated action; i.e. in the following series of condemnations we hear roar after roar. (ii) It is comprehensive. The whole land from the lush, low-lying pastures of the shepherds to the heights of the top of Carmel, is blighted. (iii) It is divine. The words the LORD ... from Zion ... from Jerusalem are emphasized, the holy LORD in his earthly dwelling place. The roar is the expressed anger of the Holy One but, even in wrath, his name, Yahweh, and his chosen residence in a house where sacrifices for sin are provided prompts the question whether wrath is the whole story. In this God there is always the blessed ingredient of grace; in wrath, he remembers mercy (Hab. 3:2). The triumph of grace begins to emerge in the final section of Amos (7:1ff., see outline above), but until then the roar predominates.

1:3–2:3 Against the pagan peoples

The grounds of judgment. Everything written in the Old Testament is a contemporary word of God (Rom. 15:4). We must listen to the 'roar after roar' of this section and learn what angers the LORD, as he accuses first the surrounding pagan nations (1:3–10), next the related pagans (1:11–2:3) and finally the people of God themselves (2:4–16). In 1:3–2:3 we learn that, for Amos, the law written on the human conscience (for these nations knew no special revelation of God; see Rom. 2:14–16) is spelt out in terms of human relationships. The first two condemnations (3ff., 6ff.) are linked simply by the thought of gross cruelty (3, 6); the second pair (9f., 11f.) by unbrotherly action (9, 11); and the third pair (1:13ff., 2:1ff.) by the contrasting ideas of destroying the future (13) and desecrating the past (2:1) and by condemnation of what instinctively commands respect, the pregnant mother and the human corpse.

3–5 Damascus. Hazael of Syria (842–806 BC) pursued an expansionist policy, extending his kingdom into Israelite territory with vicious cruelty (2 Ki. 8:12). But Damascus fell to Assyria in 732 BC. God is not mocked. 3 The numerical idiom, three ... four, here and throughout this series of oracles (cf. Ps. 62:11; Pr. 30:15, etc.) basically suggests that three transgressions would have been sufficient for divine judgment to fall, but the fourth transgression puts the matter beyond doubt. It suggests the patience of a God who waits beyond the point where action is merited, who longs for repentance and leaves space for it (Gn. 15:16; 2 Pet. 3:8f), who never acts without evidence (Gn. 18:21) but in whose eyes there are the ‘fourth sins’ which are truly intolerable to him so that, when they are committed he will not turn back his wrath (lit. ‘turn it back’, cf. Nu. 23:20; Is. 14:27).

The ‘fourth sin’ was in this case barbarity in war: sledges having iron teeth (heavy wooden platforms, weighted above and studded with sharp metal underneath) were made for chopping the crop prior to winnowing, but here were used on people, treating them as things, a mere crop for personal profit. 4 Benhadad (2 Ki. 8:7ff.; 13:3), the dynasty of Hazael. Vengeance comes upon persons, the family of the perpetrator of the crime. 4–5 Vengeance falls on things, such as palaces (signifying wealth and pomp), the gate (lit. ‘bar’; i.e. the security they made for themselves) and home territory (Aven ... Eden was probably north-east of Damascus). The wrath of God, spreading from the instigator of the sin to his family and land finally brings all to total ruin. From the unknown Kir the Aramaeans came (9:7) and into the unknown they disappeared, with Tiglath Pileser of Assyria (2 Ki. 16:9) having been the agent of God.

6–8 Gaza. Representing the LORD’s judgment on Philistia, Gaza fell to Assyria in 734 BC (the other Philistine cities followed: Ashdod, 711 BC; Ashkelon and Ekron in 701 BC). They were involved in the same sin as Damascus, treating people as a commercial crop with Edom acting as their middleman. They were so obsessed with the profit motive that no other consideration mattered—no plea of age or sex, of child for parent or parent for child. The saleable were sold; market forces alone mattered, to the exclusion of humanity. No word could be more timely than this of Amos for our present generation. ‘The Sovereign Yahweh’, is a term used only here in the list of condemnations, as if to suggest that nothing calls for the omnipotence of God in punitive action like using people merely as commodities.

9–10 Tyre. Renowned for commerce, the Tyrians are revealed as handling the business side of the slave trade, but the particular accusation is not the same as in vs 6–8—though doubtless the sin under this heading was every bit as serious—but breach of covenant. Solemn undertakings must be kept, for such infidelity is a ‘fourth sin’. Treaty of brotherhood (1 Ki. 5:1, 12; 9:13 note references to friendship, treaty and brotherliness). Amos is looking back 250 years, but the passing of time does not absolve anyone from their obligation to keep their word. Tyre became tributary to Assyria, surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar (585–573 BC) and fell to Alexander (332 BC).

11–12 Edom. Edom’s ‘fourth transgression’ was a ceaseless animosity which pursued (i.e. sought every opportunity to express itself) in those hostile actions in which neighbouring states could easily vent their spleen without ever declaring war. Historically, the bitterness between Esau and Jacob reached back to the original brothers (Gn. 27:41). In Nu. 20:14ff. hostility became open and a pattern for the future was established. Saul found it necessary to go to war (1 Sa. 14:47); David conquered and annexed Edom—the only king to do so (2 Sa. 8:14). Solomon faced rebellion from Edom (1 Ki. 11:14ff., 25) as did Jehoram a century later (2 Ki. 8:20). Fifty years on, Amaziah was fighting Edom (2 Ki. 14:7, 10). The accusation of anger that raged continually is proved, but not justified, before God. It was contrary to nature (brother), a denial of the emotion of compassion (the spontaneous overflow of pity or love; e.g. 1 Ki. 3:26), and constantly maintained at fever pitch (continually ... unchecked). Such rage, whatever its origin and supposed justification, is inadmissible. It lives in the heart but it is seen on high. 12 Teman was Edom (Ob. 9); Bozrah was its chief city.

13–15 Ammon. The Ammonite–Gileadite war is not otherwise known, but it was recorded in heaven. Its motive was acquisition (extend his borders) and in the interests of territorial increase they were ready to destroy human increase (pregnant woman). Once more the material is prized above the human: if there is a single thread uniting Amos’s list of ‘fourth transgressions’ this is it. Here they ministered inhuman savagery to those who, more than any other, merit tenderness—the expectant mother and the unborn child. No amount of national aspiration (maybe even appeals to ‘national security’) can excuse such behaviour before the automatic wrath of God. Compare the elaborate detail of v 14 with the parallel vs 5, 7, 8, 10 and 12. Fire is the motif of divine holiness (Ex. 3:2, 5; 19:18). Violent winds ... stormy day or ‘day of whirlwind’ indicate how the ‘forces of nature’ can be a picture of personal divine intervention (Ps. 18:9–14).

2:1–3 Moab. A pagan people and violence to a corpse—all this lies within the concern of the holy God. Wherever crimes against humanity are committed in violation of conscience, for whatever reason, the LORD is the criminal’s implacable foe. 2 Ki. 3:26 hints at particular animosity between Moab and Edom. The same nationalistic enmity probably fuelled the outrage described here, revealing a vengeful spirit. What could not be settled while the parties were alive followed the king into his tomb. Could anything more clearly expose the senseless irrationality of nourished hatred than to see a venerable corpse dragged out to suffer purposeless indignities? Hatred is like that: poisoning the heart of the doer, inviting the anger of God. 2 That fire should recompense the cremation fire described in v 1 exemplifies the law of exact equality between crime and punishment that undergirds divine law and is held up as a standard for human courts (Ex. 21:23; Lv. 24:19f; Dt. 19:21).

2:4–3:2 Against the chosen people

4–5 Judah. The roll-call of condemnation now takes a significant turn. Judah, one section of the LORD’s people, is summoned to the bar, no less under divine scrutiny and sentence than the surrounding heathen, as the identical formula, three ... four, implies. But what is Judah’s fourth transgression? They have rejected the law of the LORD. (i) Law means ‘teaching’ (e.g. Pr. 3:1), such as a loving parent imparts to a dear child. The people of Judah have spurned the LORD’s personal, fatherly word. (ii) Decrees are something engraved in rock for perpetuity: they have changed the unchangeable. (iii) They have replaced truth not with false gods but ‘falsehoods’ (2 Tim. 4:4). (iv) Their ancestors or ‘fathers’: their guilt is deeply ingrained, for the Bible never uses the moral inheritance from past generations as an excuse. The present generation is accountable for an accumulated guilt (Ps. 51:3–5; Mt. 23:31–36). False gods ... gods narrows the accusation too much. Such gods would be included by implication but the words of Amos are stronger: ‘their falsehoods have led them astray, after which their fathers walked’. Outside revealed truth there is only human error. 5 Fire ... consume, see 2 Ki. 24–25.

Note. The oracle recorded in 2:6–3:2 has a symmetrical shape common in the prophets:

- (a¹)2:6a, b Threat stated
- (b¹)2:6c–8 Sin exposed
- (c) 2:9–12 The goodness of God
- (b²)2:13–16 Punishment announced
- (a²)3:1–2 Threat renewed and justified

Central are the good acts of God which made Israel special and to which they failed to respond: in particular, the gift of the land (9), redemption from Egypt and care in the wilderness (10), and the revelation of the LORD’s requirements (Nazirites) and of his word (prophets).

6–8 Israel’s sins. Amos reviews Israel’s sins socially (6–7) and religiously (7–8). Their lawlessness against the righteous, callousness against the poor and rapacity towards those who can be oppressed is first described. 6 Righteous, innocent before the law. Judges were open to bribery (silver), verdicts were sold for as little as a pair of sandals or cases were brought over as small a matter as shoes—such was the covetousness of the time. The word needy implies those who cannot resist or who have to bend to superior will and strength, those who socially have no means of redress.

7 Trample arises from a slightly altered text which reads lit. ‘pant after the dust’—they had such covetousness for land that they grudged the poor (those lacking money and influence) even the earth they daubed on their faces as a sign of mourning (Jos. 7:6)! Oppressed, down-trodden, those at the bottom of life’s heap.

7–8 Sins against the revelation of God begin here. The LORD has revealed his holy name, letting them into the secret of his inner nature, but they openly defied his prohibition of adultery (Ex. 20:14) and of fornication in the name of religion (Dt. 23:17f.) Canaanite religion used human procreative acts as reminders and stimuli to the god Baal to perform his function of making humans, animals and land fertile. In Amos’s day, the holy LORD was being worshipped as a Canaanite Baal. But he will only be worshipped as he dictates (Mt. 15:9), not by our notions of exciting religion. The same girl, lit. simply ‘the girl’. The condemnation is not of father and son using the same girl—as if it were a charge of aggravated immorality—but of the whole male community, ‘father and son alike’, being involved in orgiastic Baalism. 8 Divine grace was flouted by their religion. In the very place of atonement, beside every altar (Lv. 17:11), they indulged their lusts and made the house of God, potentially the place for enjoying the LORD’s fellowship, the scene of revelry. Lie down, in the very act of fornication. Garments ... pledge, see Ex. 22:26ff., where garments taken as security against a loan were always to be loaned back for the night. Taken as fines, the material of their revelry was acquired by the illegal processes described in v. 6.

9–12 Israel’s privileges. At every point where they sinned, divine grace had made a very different way open to them. The LORD has given them a land (9) in which to develop a different society, based on his law (contrast vs 6–7), in bringing them out of Egypt (10) he had revealed his name (Ex. 3:14f; 6:6–7; 20:2) which they had profaned, and in order to save them from a sinful lifestyle and unacceptable worship (8) the LORD had given them special agents of revelation (11). They had reversed his whole work of grace. 9 I is emphatic, meaning ‘As for me, it was I who’. Amorites, general name for the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan. Notwithstanding their humanly unconquerable might (Nu. 13:28), divine power destroyed them totally (fruit ... root). 10 See outline above: the central truth of the whole oracle like the central OT act of the LORD—the exodus—is at once liberation, redemption and settlement (Ex. 6:6–8). 11 Prophets prolonged in Israel the foundational revelation through Moses. Nazirites (Nu. 6:1ff.) typified the consecrated life the LORD desired of his people (Lv. 19:2). 12 The people neither wanted to see the example nor hear the word.

2:13–3:2 Inevitable divine judgment. 13–16 Amos announces divine action against which neither natural ability, equipment nor courage will avail. 13 Israel under Jeroboam was flourishing (see Introduction) but there are other aspects of harvest-time. The loaded harvest wagon presses down on the helpless ground beneath it. So Israel was heaping up a weight of divine wrath which would press it to destruction. The Hebrew can be translated ‘as the purposely filled cart presses the sheaves’ (a method of threshing), but the picture is the same. 3:1–2 address the whole family I brought up, and thus form a conclusion not only to 2:6–16 but also to 2:4–16.

After the call to hear there is reference to the acts of God and the exodus-redemption which made them his people. V 2 begins with the unique position which they occupy and ends with its inevitable consequence: punishment for sin belongs in the very constitution of the people of God. Therefore, there is an automatic sequence involved: much will be required of those to whom much has been given (Lk. 12:48). This is the heart of Amos's message. Privilege is wonderful but it is not a shelter; it is a responsibility and a treasure for which we shall have to give account.

3:3–8 The Lion's roar: the prophetic word

3–6 The Lion roars again: the message authenticated. Amos rounds off the first cycle of his prophecies (see Introduction) with a series of sayings about cause and effect. He builds up to the double climax; first that calamity does not come without divine agency (6), and secondly that no true prophet speaks without divine revelation (7–8). In summary, nothing short of divine compulsion would make Amos preach such a message to his people, but the LORD has spoken to him and he has no option. 3 Walk together expresses habitual companionship such as can only arise from the LORD and Israel being 'in agreement'. They are together in covenant but can their fellowship continue if they are at odds? The law of cause and effect would operate to separate them. 4 Two illustrations from the angle of a predator: the lion does not roar to attack (1:2; Judg. 14:5) unless prey is sighted, nor growl (contentedly) in his den if he has no prey to eat. 5 Two illustrations from the angle of the prey: a bird does not venture into a trap unless there is a snare, i.e. 'bait', nor does a trap snap shut unless the bait has been taken and there is something to catch. 6 The application: the prey hears the warning of the predator's coming and trembles. It is the great 'divine predator' who stands behind every disaster. The thrust of Amos's argument is to invite people to explain disasters past and future. Do they accept the Bible view of history that the LORD is the agent in history, that just as behind every event there is a cause so behind history there is the LORD? If so, then their only reasonable action is to make sure they stand in a right relation and fellowship with him.

7–8 A true understanding of the function of a prophet confirms the interpretation that God is in control. First (7), the prophet has been let into the secret of the LORD's plans. Revealing his plan or 'opening his fellowship' (Je. 23:18): the essential experience of the prophet was to be brought near to God. This explains how they could both speak God's words and also be completely themselves, for the nearer a person comes to God the more he or she becomes a person. But the OT prophets also expected to be aware beforehand of what the LORD would do (cf. Elisha's surprise when this was not so, 2 Ki. 4:17). If this is so, then in Amos's message, the lion has roared ... the Sovereign LORD has spoken.

3:9–6:14 An enemy around the land: The Lord's anger

The bracketing verses of 3:11 (lit. 'an enemy all around the land') and 6:14 (I will stir up a nation ... from Lebo Hamath to ... the Arabah) state the theme of this section. Within the brackets the onset of the foe is explained by the self-indulgence and social carelessness of the ruling classes (4:1–3; 6:1–7) and, centrally, by religious failure (4:4–5:27). These are the age-old faults of failure to love one's neighbour, arising from failure to love the LORD our God.

3:9–15 The shattered kingdom

With telling drama Amos calls pagan nations to see what is afoot in Samaria (9) and then, themselves, to announce divine judgment (13). It is as if even the heathens have sufficient moral awareness to judge the LORD's people! The evidence is of unrest and oppression (9); failure in character and conduct (10). Here is a religion (14) and an affluent society (15) meriting divine wrath. The agent of overthrow is both the surrounding foe (11) and the avenging LORD (13–15). The plan of the passage is:

- (a¹) v 9 Nations called to observe
- (b¹) v 10 Report on character and conduct
- (b²) v 11 Punishment by overthrow
- (b³) v 12 Illustration: nothing to survive
- (a²) vs 13–15 Nations called to testify

9 The sins of Israel are so blatant that even the most despised heathen, the ancestral enemies of Ashdod, the Philistines (Jdg. 14:3; 1 Sa. 17:36), and Egypt have sufficient moral superiority to discern that Samaria was under divine judgment. Fortresses or 'palaces', the appeal is to the ruling classes to act as examiners of ruling classes (cf. fortresses, v 10; mansions, v 15), a fair trial by their peers. Unrest means uneasiness, instability in society. Oppression is extortion and persecution. 10 Know not to do right (omit how; 'right-doing' as such is beyond them), devotion to wrong-doing blunts moral perception and their sole concern is what they have stored up in the fortresses or 'palaces'. They are unaware that illgotten gains are like so many barrels of unstable explosive: they are actually storing up for themselves lit. 'violence' (plunder) and 'destruction' (loot). What they at present hand out to others will, at the end, be their own portion.

12 Cf. Ex. 22:10–13. If a shepherd could bring back the tattered remnants of a sheep, he absolved himself of the charge of negligence: he had tried to save the beast and failed. But what he rescued was only evidence of a total loss! So for Samaria: what is left will speak only of total overthrow, but just as leg bones and ears were evidence of a destroyed animal, the typical remains of Samaria would be beds and couches, evidence of an indolent, luxury-loving, effete society.

14 Amos passes easily from speaking of the historical agent in Samaria's overthrow (11) to speaking of the LORD as the destructive agent. In this direct way the LORD is behind all history (cf. 9:7). Sins ('rebellions') are the wilful flouting of the LORD's law. The social crimes described in vs 9–10 are sins against the LORD. In his punitive action the LORD starts with false religion and moves to false society (14–15). Just as true religion is the root of true society so false religion is the root of social corruption. Horns. In pagan, though not in Israelite practice (1 Ki. 1:51), holding the horns of the altar afforded sanctuary. In the day of judgment, false religion offers no sanctuary; its altars have no horns! 15 The main blow falls on the affluent, the 'two-home' element in society with its winter and summer residences and its ostentatious luxury (ivory). Like the rest of the Bible, Amos has no complaint against wealth as such. The questions are always how it was gained (Je. 17:11) and how it is used and, especially for Amos, how people used the power wealth bestowed. But like their false religion, their gain by oppression leaves them defenceless in the day of visitation.

4:1–3 The leading women

From general accusation (3:9–15), Amos comes to particular issues. 1 The indolent women of Samaria, who oppress the poor (those financially poor and vulnerable in life), who dominate their husbands in their insistence on gratification, what are they but prime beasts from that great cattle country, Bashan (Dt. 32:14; Ps. 22:12), living a purely animal existence, fattened for slaughter? 2 In 3:9 we read of social offences; in 3:14 rebellions against God, but here affronts to his holiness are recorded. Crime is crime and sin is sin because the holy God is holy and his holiness erupts against all that offends him. Captive to indulgence, the criminals and sinners of Israel become captives in fact (2–3). Hooks ... fishhooks, the doublet stresses the impossibility of escape. Captives were in fact led away by cords attached to hooks in their lips. 3 Breaks, caused by the enemy described in 3:11. Harmon is an unknown location; nor is there any satisfactory suggested identification or emendation.

4:4–13 Religion without repentance

Amos now comes to the heart of the matter. In the long run the serious thing is not their crimes (3:9–10), rebellions (3:14) or offence to God's holiness (4:2) but that, given the chance to repent they did not do so. The heart of the passage (6–11) teaches that in all the varied circumstances of life the LORD is the cause and that his purpose in every act of affliction is to bring his people right back to himself. The initial, ironical command Go (4), introducing an exposure of a religion that failed (4–5), is balanced by a final call to be ready to meet the LORD (a religion that will not fail) in vs 12–13. In between these calls there are seven acts of God aimed at bringing his people back to himself (6–11). In Israel's case the specific aim of the divine acts was repentance, but the principle is that in every experience of life the LORD is directly at work to bring us close to himself.

4–5 Bethel (Gn. 28:10–22) and Gilgal (Jos. 4:19) commemorated new beginnings with God but the worshippers' use of the shrines involved no new start but simply confirmed them in sin. (i) It was mere religion. The religious act was everything. Every morning and 'on the third day' (NIV mg.) may point simply to punctiliousness: the sacrifice had to be offered on day one and the tithe on day three. It may, however, be evidence of acts repeated beyond the law of God: sacrifices not once a year (1 Sa. 1:3) but once a day; tithes not every three years (Dt. 14:28) but every third day—for if the act is everything, the more the merrier! (ii) Its basis was self-pleasing and self-praise: what you love to do, even if it contravenes God's law (see Lv. 2:11, where to burn leavened bread brings together what God forbade). Even personal acts of devotion (freewill offerings) were turned to the praise of self (brag ... boast). But true religion 'must be conformed to the will of God as its unerring standard' (Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, SCM [1961] p. 49) (Mk. 7:6). Outside that revealed will, religion is simply another form of rebellion (4).

6–11 Seven divine acts: famine (6), drought (selective rainfall) (7–8), blight (9), locusts (9), plagues (10), military defeat (10) and natural disaster (11). Things which are ordinarily attributed to chance, natural causes or human folly are all the direct acts of God aiming to produce what he wishes to see in his people. He wants a personal nearness to himself couched in whatever terms are appropriate to the circumstances; repentance if sin has been involved, fleeing to him for comfort, etc. Without relationship there is no religion. In Amos's day, while they were being religious, the LORD was working for and looking for repentance.

12–13 Is v 12 a message of hope (there is still time to prepare to meet him in peace) or a dire warning (the LORD is drawing near in unspecified judgmental action and your last chance has gone)? V 13 can suggest 'yes' to both these possibilities, for the LORD is fully in command of his whole world—things visible (mountains), invisible (wind), and the human mind (lit. 'declares to man what is his [inmost] thought'). He is the LORD of all change, turning dawn to darkness (i.e. bringing the judgment that may be implied in v 12, darkening every human hope) or, a rather more likely translation, turning 'darkness to dawn' (i.e. bringing hope where there seemed to be none). Furthermore, he dominates the earth (treads the high places) and can therefore do what he pleases for he is the LORD God Almighty. Like Moses (Dt. 30:19f.) Amos sets before his people life and death: the choice is theirs; they have come to the moment of decision. The idea of ‘meeting God’ (12) looks back to Ex. 19:17, where both grace and law were combined in one revelation. It was for Amos’s people and it is ever the portion of the people of God to live in the place of choice (Dt. 27:4–6). This is what Amos sets before them in v 12. It is as if he said, they can choose in what character the LORD will come to them: repentance will summon the LORD of sovereign grace to turn their darkness to dawn; religion without repentance will expose them to the Sovereign LORD with all the terrors of his law and the fading of light in the darkness of judgment.

5:1–27 Religion without reformation

This passage is built around three appeals: (i) for spiritual reformation, Seek me ... seek the LORD (4–6); (ii) for personal and social reformation, Seek good ... maintain justice (14f.); (iii) for religious reformation, Let justice roll ... did you bring me sacrifices ... ? (24f.) But the appeals are bracketed by affirmations of disaster (1–3, 26–27) and interspersed with diagnoses of how things are (7, 10–13, 16–20). The therefore of v 16 gives us a clue how the chapter is to be understood: how can an appeal (14–15) have as its consequence (therefore, v 16) a forecast of unconsolable sorrow? Only if Amos is recalling appeals made and refused! The chapter, therefore, is a record of an opportunity lost and of the grim consequences now inevitable. Once more, God is not mocked.

1–3 A funeral lament: death and its cause. Though the death described is still in the future (3) it is so certain that the dirge may be composed and sung already (2). 2 Fallen in death, the dead girl has no inherent power of recovery (never to rise) nor any external aid (deserted ... no-one to lift). 3 The immediate cause of this helplessness and hopelessness in death is military overthrow in which national forces have suffered a 90% casualty rate. But what is the ultimate cause? The remainder of the chapter declares that this is what death due to sin is like.

4–13 The LORD could have given life but they chose the way of death. It is better to restore the original ‘For’ at the start of v 4. The great disaster (1–3) is traced to a root cause. The Israelites were invited to seek the LORD and live (4, 6), warned of the way of death (5, 11), reminded that the LORD can give light but also darkness (8). They were put in the place of choice and chose wrongly.

4–5 The LORD is loving in his invitations and faithful in his warnings. He offers himself as the remedy they need; seek me is an invitation to closeness, fellowship and newness of life. On the other hand, however, Bethel and Gilgal are honoured by time and tradition (cf. 4:4). Gilgal, the place of entrance upon the promised land (Jos. 4:20), will prove to be the place of exile; while Bethel, ‘the house of God’ (Gn. 28:17, 19) will become nothing (‘Aven’, NIV mg.), as useless as an idol.

6–7 Loving in his invitations, God is faithful in his denunciations. Once more he is himself all that his people need (Seek the Lord and live), but outside of him there is no life. Bethel may claim tradition and veneration, but it is useless against the fire (the symbol of energized holiness) that will rage against perverted justice and humiliated righteousness. Where these two words are used together (see Is. 5:16), ‘righteousness’ is a summary word for the principles inherent in divine holiness, and ‘justice’ is the practical application of those principles personally and socially.

8–9 It is better to remove the NIV's brackets. The verses are meant to be abrupt in context. Angrily Amos switches attention from people who have wrought a bitter transformation on earth (7) to the great Transformer himself. On the one hand, human perversion cannot win against God: he has the power to make the threatened fire (6) flash out in destruction (9). On the other hand, should they seek him, as invited, they will exchange death for the promised life (6) because he can just as easily turn blackness into dawn (8).

Pleiades and Orion were seasonal markers; the rising and setting of the Pleiades marked, for sailors, the season of navigation and marked the seasons on nomad calendars. Blackness ... dawn ... day ... night, the regular transformations every twenty-four hours. Turns (8) is the same verb used in v 7: do their 'turnings' cause transformations? How inexpressibly greater are his in comparison! Waters ... pours, the LORD is not bound by his own general rules, holding the waters in their place (Ps. 104:8–9). He can bring about occasional transformations also when he commands floods to engulf the land. The rulers of Amos's day had wrought transformations (7) and silenced all opposition (13), but the one who controls the seasonal, daily and occasional transformations is well able also to overthrow what man has made strong and fortified against attack (9). What a vision for a day, like Amos's, when ungodliness is rampant, values are reversed (7) and the godly person is chiefly aware of impotence (13)!

10–13 A neatly balanced statement:

(a¹)v 10 Hated of those who speak truth

(b¹)v 11 Oppression of the poor

(c) v 11 Judgment by dispossession

(b²)v 12 Oppression of the poor (different word)

(a²)v 13 Silenced opposition

10 The just judge (who reproves) and the honest witness (who tells the truth) are equally detested. 11 Poor (2:7; 4:1), financially poor and socially defenceless. Force him, 'take exactions from'. Amos does not specify which powerful interest is doing all this: the landlord who trampled by exorbitant rent and still found ways of making further 'exactions'? The moneylender? The LORD is not concerned with 'who' but with 'whom'—the sufferer. Therefore indicates a heavenly agent is at work. The LORD runs his world on moral lines whereby those who gain unjustly will not enjoy perpetually. There is a principle of frustration built into the nature of things (Is. 5:8–10; 14–17). As the outline above shows, this is the central truth of the passage. Humanly speaking the people have built to last (stone mansions), planted to produce (lush vineyards) but it will not be so.

12 Offences ... sins, 'rebellions' (against God) ... 'missing the mark' (of his requirements). Social misdemeanours are spiritual sins; hence, a mere reformation will not do: there must be a return to God. Righteous, those 'in the right' in a court case. Bribes, the use of wealth to gain a verdict. Deprive ('turn aside'), of a judge refusing to hear a case—particularly dismissing that of the 'unimportant' person, the poor (not the word in v 11), the uninfluential who can be easily overridden. 13 The 'hatred' mentioned in v 10 easily ushers in the era of the 'heavy mob', the reign of terror in which people are no longer free to speak out.

14–20 Moral reformation: understanding the day of the LORD. The negative threat of dispossession (11) now becomes the positive threat of a coming 'day' of unrelieved weeping (16f.) and darkness (18). The 'day of the LORD' was apparently part of current popular expectation, with the assumption that it would bring 'light', i.e. every glad experience, to the LORD's people. Hence, they looked forward to it with confident hope. (i) Amos ironically uses the language of hope to preach doom (e.g. pass through in v 17 is Passover terminology; Ex.

12:12). The people have forgotten the character of their God. Passover night was a night of judgment for the unready. (ii) Spiritual blessings rest on moral conditions (14–15). God’s favourable presence is a reality for those whose objectives (to seek) and hearts (which hate evil, love good) match his own and who apply these personally cherished values to the society they live in (maintain justice). (iii) Perhaps (15) indicates that God opposes arrogance. This is not to question that mercy is mercy, but to rebuke the presumption that assumes it must be so in my case.

14–15 (i) Seeking goes along with shunning evil. (ii) Holiness of action (seek good) must be accompanied by holiness of emotion (hate evil, love good). (iii) The deed must not wait for the feeling: seek good is placed before love good. If we wait for emotion to prompt action we might often wait in vain. We must learn to exalt duty over inclination and to discover how the loving act will presently create the loving heart. (iv) The repetition of the exalted title the LORD God Almighty imparts seriousness to our moral endeavour: this is the God we seek to please. We are at his disposal; it is for him to dictate. 15 Joseph is used as a comprehensive name for the northern kingdom because its tribes were mostly descended from his sons (Gn. 48).

16–17 On therefore, see introduction to ch. 5 above. The Lord, the LORD God Almighty, note how the message of doom is reinforced by an even more extended title: Lord (lower case) means ‘Sovereign’; LORD (upper case) means ‘Yahweh’, the exodus God who saves his people and destroys his foes; Almighty means ‘of hosts’, the One who is, in himself, every potentiality and power. The lamentation will be open (in all the streets ... in every public square), heartfelt and without exception, involving not only the (professional) mourners but also farmers. Traditional places of joy, vineyards, will be places of grief; all because the Lord ‘passes through’. It needs no exceptional action, just his holy presence, to reduce all to mourning.

18–20 Popular optimism is countered by stressing the darkness of the day. Just as we expect the imminent return of our Lord Jesus Christ, so the OT church looked for the day of the Lord: the day of his personal coming. As we read the OT we find that what is described in advance (as here) as ‘the day’ turns out (27) to be an interim divine intervention and not the ultimate day of the Lord. The illustration in v 19 (instead of the second as though, read ‘and’) tells the story of inescapable fate. Looking back over vs 4–20, for whom is the day ‘darkness’? Those who professed to be the LORD’s but did not ‘seek him’ (4), did not please him in their behaviour to the needy and helpless (7ff.), did not do good and shun evil (14) nor love what he loves (15). People of profession without reality, of religion without the evidence of spiritual and moral transformation are moving in precisely the wrong direction, away from God.

21–27 Religious reformation, returning to the old values. The LORD rejects current religious practice (21–22). At first sight vs 23–24 appear to be an ‘either/or’—stressing that God desires not a religion of ‘services’, but a religion of ‘service’. V 25, however, redresses the balance, calling for a return to original priorities (see Introduction on Society). Failure to respond to the message of v 24 is implied in v 26; continuance in a self-chosen, man-made religion, which will result in exile (27).

21–24 Religion without morality attracts divine hatred, (Is. 1:11–15ff.; Je. 7:9–11). 24 Justice ... righteousness, practice and principle, (cf. v 7). 25 But Amos does not call for morality without religion, service without services. The emphasis in his question is, ‘Was it sacrifices (only) that you brought me in the wilderness?’ The religion of Sinai was firstly one of moral, ethical response to the redeeming God (Ex. 19:4–5; 20:2ff.). The sacrifices were introduced as a logical consequence. When the people committed themselves to obedience they were brought ‘under the shed blood’ (Ex. 24:7–8). For them, as for us, these things were said to them that they might not sin (1 Jn. 2:1) but in the inevitable event of sin, they had a propitiation (1 Jn. 2:2). This is what Amos recalls in his question. They had isolated the ritual of sacrifice and marginalized obedience, whereas it is commitment to obedience that makes the sacrifices necessary and meaningful. See further on 7:7–8.

26 Their self-pleasing religion (4:4–5) opened the door to a self-made religion. Without the control of the word of God it is not that people will believe nothing but that they will believe anything. Shrine ... pedestal (Heb. 'sikkut ... kiyyun'), are words known from Mesopotamia to be Sakkuth and Kaiwanu, names of the planet Saturn, a star god worshipped as king and god (see Hubbard, p. 185). The love of ritual often manifests itself in processions. 27 This procession ends in an exile whose destination Amos hides in the vague beyond Damascus. But they go, not as the victims of a conqueror or of chance, but because I will send you, the Sovereign LORD bringing on his people the consequences of their folly and obduracy.

6:1–7 Leading men

The women described in 4:1–3 are balanced by the men described in 6:1–7, i.e. all without exception are implicated. Here is the lordly pride which can find no fault with itself. The women were like 'cows', thoughtlessly indulging their desires; the men are animated by conscious pride: they consider themselves notable in 'the first of the nations' (1) and indulge themselves with 'the first' (same word) of lotions (6). They will be the first (different form of the same word) (7) to go captive! The proprieties will be observed! Complacent, indulgent, socially uncaring, exiled! It is hard for those whose position centralizes them in other people's minds to avoid centralizing themselves in their own minds, until self-concern finally obliterates concern for others. This is the particular temptation of those 'at the top'.

1 Zion, prophets operated in one of the kingdoms (Amos was in the north) but always kept both kingdoms in their sights. Isaiah (28:1–4) and Micah (1:5), both southern prophets, also concerned themselves with the north (see also Ho. 5:13; 6:11). It would strengthen Amos's ministry to the north for him to show impartiality in this way: pride is pride wherever it rears its head. 2 There are no verbs in the questions. Probably a present tense is intended in each. Different interpretations are suggested. (i) Amos invites his hearers to observe by comparison how great their prosperity is—and therefore how certain their judgment if they fail to be grateful to the LORD. However, the whole section implies that they would not need such proof but were already convinced of their superiority. (ii) Gath etc. are examples of fallen prosperity and constitute a warning of what will happen to Samaria. It is, however, doubtful if these cities were in ruins in Amos's day. (iii) Amos is quoting a propaganda 'handout' from the rulers, drawing advantageous comparisons with distant and inferior places. This has the 'ring of truth'; it is the way rulers behave and it matches the arrogance depicted in v 1. It also leads into v 3 as a deliberate concealing of the dangers which the rulers knew were on the horizon.

3 Samaria was enjoying a 'never had it so good' prosperity. The rulers knew that it could not last but they put off the evil day in an 'enjoy it while you can' spree. Following the boom years of Jeroboam (see Introduction) the nation did fall into disarray. Of the remaining six kings of Israel, only one passed the throne to his son; the rest were assassinated (2 Ki. 15, 17). The description reign of terror undoubtedly became all too apt. 4 But even if they were to die tomorrow, why not enjoy the good life today (see Is. 22:12–13)? 5 Lesser men try to justify their frivolities by comparison with greater men. After all, David was a musician and composer! 6 Bowlful (Ex. 38:3; Nu. 7:13), very large bowls indeed; we would say 'They drink wine by the bucketful'. Do not grieve, 'have not made themselves sick'. Their revelry may have given them a bilious attack (Is. 28:7–8) but the ruin, the ‘broken-down state’ of Joseph (see on 5:6) does not ‘sicken them’.

6:8–14 The shattered kingdom

The concluding condemnation, matching 3:9–15, renews the divine assault on pride (8), moral indifference (12) and self-conceit (13), and dwells dreadfully on the awesome end to which these things lead (9f., 11, 14). The passage is balanced as follows:

(a¹) v 8 Divine hatred

(b¹) vs 8–10 Overthrow of state: total loss illustrated

(a²) v 11 Divine judgment

(b²) vs 12–13 Reversal of values: absurdity illustrated

(a³) v 14 Divine management of history for moral ends

8 By himself, ‘by his soul’, i.e. an oath involving the divine person ‘heart and soul’. Abhor requires a small alteration to the Hebrew text (which reads ‘I desire’). An even smaller alteration yields ‘Truly I am the foe of’. 9–10 In siege conditions famine and plague take their toll and the ‘death-carts’ become a familiar sight. The sole survivor of a family acknowledges that there is no-one else, but before such news can be greeted with any sort of response (exasperation or pity) involving the name of God, his mouth is stopped: the sense of alienation from God is too great; he has departed from his people. 11 It is by divine command that this has happened: v 11 tells what God commands; vs 12–13 tell why he commands; and v 14 explains how he will fulfil his command. Great ... small, the idiom of comprehensiveness by means of opposites, meaning ‘every house whatsoever’.

12 The illustrations are of what is contrary to the nature of things. This sums up the life of the nation: justice was intended to heal (Dt. 19:16–20), not poison society, and (as we might say) talk about righteousness in public life had become a sour (bitterness) joke. The judgment of God is provoked by the state of society, not just by private sins. To fail to maintain true principles (righteousness) and sound practices (justice) is to promote social and national ruination. The ‘righteous LORD loves righteousness’ (Ps. 11:7). 13 Lo Debar and Karnaim, places in Transjordan (Gn. 14:5; 2 Sa. 9:4); may be scenes of Jeroboam’s victories when he restored Israelite territory to its Solomonic extent (2 Ki. 14:25). However, the Israelites’ glory was to be short-lived, for 14, the very same boundaries would mark the range of enemy success, from Lebo Hamath in the far north to the valley of the Arabah, by the Dead Sea. The LORD is the enemy of vainglorious boasting of military prowess: he has his agent to hand.

7:1–9:15 The Lord God: judgment and hope

The judgment that will not be (7:1–6) and the hope that will be (9:11–15) bracket the final section of Amos. Within these brackets, a judgment of fearful proportions (8:1–9:6) will fall but it will be a discriminating judgment (7:8f.; 9:7–10), not a total destruction. The title ‘the Sovereign Yahweh’ which was used nine times in chs. 1–6 occurs eleven times in chs. 7–9. The LORD is never so gloriously sovereign than when he keeps his gracious promises.

7:1–6 The devastation that will not be

Intercession was part of a prophet’s task (Gn. 20:7; Je. 7:16). Amos does not pray against judgment but against the particular form he sees judgment taking. (i) Vs 1–3, a locust plague so timed that survival is out of the question. (ii) Vs 4–6, a fire capable of devouring even sea and land. Amos pleaded against the utter destruction of Jacob and his plea was heard. The repetition of the matter underlines its certainty (Gn. 41:32); the contrast between a natural plague (locusts) and a supernatural visitation (fire) embraces every sort of plague. Totality is expressed by contrast (see introduction to 6:1–7). However, the total destruction of the LORD's people is ruled out. Hope is established.

1 He was preparing, the hand of God was directly behind the event. After the king's share ..., presumably a royal tax. The second crop was that on which the farmer would depend. Without this, destitution would follow. 3 Relented may mean 'repented', but does a truly 'sovereign God' change his mind? According to 1 Sa. 15:29 he 'does not lie or repent (change his mind)', but according to 1 Sa. 15:35 'the Lord repented that he had made Saul king' (not as NIV). The former verse states the 'absolute' truth about God; the latter indicates that his unalterable will has in fact taken into account all the variableness of human experience and response. Consequently, it necessarily appears to us that God changes course and this is what the Bible calls his 'repenting': the will of God, though inflexible, is not unfeeling but takes loving regard of our weaknesses and foolishnesses in his perfect and sovereign ordering of his world. 4 dried up ... devoured, the same verb is used twice (lit. 'devoured ... began to devour'). Such a fire inevitably points to the judgmental aspect of divine holiness. Only God's fire could 'eat up' his total creation (2 Pet. 3:10, 12).

7:7–9 Discriminating judgment

Against the third vision described in this chapter Amos offers no prayer. The LORD comes as a master-builder to inspect the finished wall. The Hebrew does not say that the wall had been built true to plumb (7) but simply that it had been built 'with a plumb-line'. In other words, the standards applied at the end had been there at and from the beginning. The Lord's people were 'constructed' according to the double specification of law and grace: as his redeemed they were to obey his law (Ex. 20:2ff.), but equally as his redeemed they were 'under the blood' (Ex. 24:8) and were given the whole sacrificial code so that, even as failures in the task of obedience, they could still live in the presence of the Holy One. It is the holding of these two in balance (see 5:25) that constitutes the true life of the people of God and marks them out from legalists (obeying the law is everything) on the one hand and ritualists (offering the sacrifices is everything) on the other. This is why Amos here makes no plea: the plumb-line, the twin standards of law and grace, are the very essence of the redeemed people; they can only evade this test by ceasing to be what they are.

8 I will spare ('pass over'), on Passover night they sheltered under the blood (Ex. 12:7), eating the lamb, dressed for pilgrimage (Ex. 12:11)—alive by grace, alive to walk in the LORD's way. But Amos's people were not true to the double standard of their constitution and could not receive 'passover' blessings. 9 The LORD goes on to specify what will perish in his judgment, for judgment using a plumb-line is discriminating. There is always a true people within a professing people, a believing company within a formal grouping, a Church within a church. The plumb-line will spare such (cf. 9:8–10), but it will devastate the high places ... and the sanctuaries which were festering points of delusion and the house of Jeroboam who 'did what was evil in the sight of the LORD ... and made Israel to sin' (2 Ki. 14:24). High places are man-made centres of false (Baal) religion where the LORD was worshipped with Baal-rites as if he was a Canaanite god. Isaac is used only here as a synonym for Israel. He was linked with Beersheba (Gn. 26:33; 28:10). Maybe in Amos's day they attempted to legitimize the rites at Beersheba (5:5) by urging the patronage of Isaac.

7:10–17 The inescapable word

The heart of this section is that Amaziah the priest sought to rid the land of Amos's message (12) but could escape it, neither for himself nor the land (17): You say, 'Do not prophesy ... Therefore this is what the LORD says' (16–17). The word is inescapable. The sequence of the passage (10–12), suggests that Amaziah did not persuade Jeroboam to act and therefore took up the cudgels himself. As priest of Bethel he was a man of significance and it cannot have been easy for Amos to outface his authority, but he did so by reiterating his call: i.e. by asserting the authority of the LORD as opposed to the human authority defying him (see Acts 5:29). 10 Bethel had figured in an unfavourable light in Amos's preaching (4:4; 5:5). No wonder Amaziah was stung! Conspiracy, authorities customarily use the 'scare' of 'national security' to get their own way! Amos had to bear the burden of misrepresentation. The land, here we glimpse the sort of influence Amos was wielding.

12 Seer is not sarcastic or derogatory (Is. 29:10) but the advice to go and earn a living in Judah suggests that Amos is in the job for the money—and that a word against Israel would pay well there. 14 (see Introduction on Prophecy) The NIV correctly uses past tenses in a perfect rebuttal of the charge of prophesying to earn a living. In this regard Amos was well placed with an income from his flocks and crops. For him, (i) it was not a matter of personal capacity or inclination (I was not a prophet); nor (ii) of enrolment by or the attractiveness of a prophetic figure. Prophet's son (cf. 2 Ki. 2:3, 5; 6:1ff.; 9:1ff.), 'schools' of 'prophet's sons' were drawn to prophetic men, to receive instruction and share their work, but not so Amos. (iii) It was not his choice to be a prophet: he was settled as a shepherd farmer. 15 It was (iv) sovereign divine choice (the LORD took me), and this (v) brought him into the divine fellowship (the Lord ... said to me), within which (vi) he was commissioned as a prophet to Israel.

All the prophets who have left an account of their call agree with Amos on the essentials of divine initiative (Is. 6:1; Je. 1:5; Ezk. 1), fellowship (Is. 6:6–8; Je. 1:6–16; Ezk. 2:1f.) and appointment (Is. 6:9; Je. 1:5b, 10, 17–19; Ezk. 2:3ff.). 16–17 Amos was no mere preacher, as Amaziah would have him. His word was the word of the LORD (See Introduction on Prophecy and commentary on 1:1) and could not be dismissed. When such evasion occurs the word that could have saved becomes a word of judgment (17). In Amaziah's case the judgment brought suffering and degradation (your wife will become a prostitute), bitter bereavement (by the sword) and personal loss—a priest (10) in a pagan ('unclean') country. Amaziah was a case in point of religion without repentance before the word of God.

8:1–14 'In that day'

This is the central section of the third cycle of prophecies (see Outline of contents). It consists of an initial symbolic vision (1–2) developed by four messages beginning In that day (3, 9, 13) and The days are coming (11).

1–2 Ripe fruit: the end. As a crop comes to harvest as a result of its own inner development, so divine judgment coincides with the ripening fitness of people to be judged. 2 The time is ripe, or better 'The end has come'. Amos says he has seen ripe fruit (Heb. 'qayis') and the LORD responds that 'the end' (Heb. qēs) has come.

3–8 The first message. The end explained. 3 Their religion will not save them: its songs will become part of the general ‘howlings’. In four savagely sharp lines Amos catches the utter horror of the end day: ‘Many a corpse ... everywhere ... flung down ... silence!’ But why should such a grim thing happen? 4 The general cause is stated: the oppression of those who have no means of protection or redress. On needy see 2:6b; on poor see 2:7c (NIV oppressed). Trample (‘pant after’), implies covetous intent. 5–6 The details of v 4 are spelled out: the triumph of the profit motive (i) over religious devotion (5); their punctiliousness (4:4) made them observe New Moon, the feast of the first of the month (Nu. 28:11), and the Sabbath but their hearts were in their money-making; (ii) over commercial honesty (5), selling less (measure) but for more money (price), tampering with weights and measures; (iii) over humanity—maybe silver (6) is a loan made to the poor (as in 2:7a) and sandals the purchase he has made on credit, while privately the trader has in mind to take the poor into slavery for defaulting on the debt (2 Ki. 4:1). Sweepings, selling worthless and reject goods. 7–8 The effect of this bowing to ‘market forces’ will be nationwide disruption and disaster figured as a earthquake, as dramatic, overwhelming and all-embracing as the Nile inundations (8). 7 Pride, used sarcastically. An oath requires an unalterable base on which to rest. Nothing is more stable than national pride! The LORD will never forget the land which allows economic forces to have the last word.

9–10 The second message. Enveloping darkness, bitter sorrow. Factually this darkness has been associated with an eclipse of the sun, along with an earthquake, recorded in June 763 BC, but this is marginal to the intended meaning: darkness once figured in judgment on Egypt (Ex. 10:21ff.) but now it is evidence of the LORD’s anger with his own rebellious people. Once Egypt mourned its firstborn (Ex. 12:30), but now Israel laments with equal bitterness (10). Sackcloth implies a mourning directed towards God. But there is a time when even penitence is too late.

11–12 The third message. Spiritual famine. The day of trouble reveals how strong (or weak) inner resources are. A life nourished only on the sweets of this world is soon stripped to the bone when they are gone. Then comes hunger for an authoritative word. But the LORD’s just recompense is grim: the neglected word becomes the absent word. Like the place of penitence (10), the place of the word (12) cannot be found. Without the revealed word mankind flits here and there, from sea to sea, the Dead Sea in the south and the Mediterranean Sea in the west, then north and east, boxing the compass. But they will not find it, first because they ignored it for so long, but secondly because the northern Israelites will go anywhere except back to Jerusalem where the LORD was still in residence (1:2). Even in despair, pride can be expressed!

13–14 The fourth message. The final fall. The hope of the future, the young, is held in mortgage for the sins of the past. When the word of God is not believed, people will believe anything and the cults will grab the young, taking them by the hand in order to take them by the throat, till they fall and cannot rise again. 14 Shame (see NIV mg.), 2 Ki. 17:30 records the worship of Ashimah, but the name as a word means ‘guilt’ and the double meaning would not have been lost on Amos: ‘the guilt-laden worship of Ashimah’. For ‘guilt’ is one need that the cults can never meet: nothing but the divinely provided shed blood can do that, in the OT and NT alike. God of Beersheba (‘the way of or to Beersheba’), perhaps spiritual merit was attached to making the journey to Beersheba.

9:1–6 The inescapable judgment

(See Outline of contents.) The LORD himself superintends the destruction of the shrine: all the fabric from the top down; all the people (1). There will be no escape (1) in the supernatural realms (2), in the physical creation (3), or throughout the earth (4). Such cosmic rule belongs to the LORD (5–6): he can do what he has threatened. 2 The depths of the grave ('to Sheol'), the place-name for the abode of the dead. 3 The serpent was a mythological sea-monster of contemporary paganism, appearing in stormy opposition to the Creator God and his purpose for a stable world. Amos makes use of this in two ways. (i) Imaginatively: just as, for the sake of argument, Amos allows the possibility of climbing into heaven (2) so he allows the existence of such a monster, waiting to devour and to cut off an avenue of escape. More importantly, Amos uses this imagery (ii) theologically: what in pagan thought was the implacable enemy of the Creator is totally at the bidding of the LORD (I will command)—there for his divine purposes! Amos compels mythology to serve truth: the omnipresence and omnipotence of the only God.

God's power is effective in three ways. (i) Horizontally (5): the whole earth is subject to his touch; it offers no resistance but melts; all its peoples mourn; it loses stability, rising and falling like the Nile. (ii) Vertically (6): the heavens, for all their lofty inaccessibility, are his 'stairway' (better than palace, though not certain) where he moves in sovereign freedom; or, from another view, the heavens are his vaulted 'chamber', overarching and 'binding' (a possible reference of the word translated foundation) the earth together. (iii) Dynamically: 'forces' like the waters of the sea (6) do what he makes them do.

9:7–10 Discriminating judgment

(Cf. the parallel in 7:7–9 and see Outline of contents.) This is how the judgment of the plumb-line will work out: there is no privileged position before God (7) such as guarantees an automatic immunity from divine moral scrutiny (8). Wherever there is sin there must be judgment. Yet it is all with discrimination so that the house of Jacob will not be destroyed out of hand but will be sieved (8–10) and specified impurity will be gathered out. The pattern of these verses is:

- (a¹) v 7 The groundlessness of complacency
- (b¹) v 8a–d The inevitability of judgment on sin
- (b²) vs 8e–9 The discriminating nature of judgment
- (a²) v 10 The fate of the complacent

7 At first sight this is a typical Amos-type statement of monotheism: there is only one God and every movement and migration on earth is equally his work. Israel came from Egypt, the Philistines from Caphtor, the Arameans from Kir, and (Amos would allow us to add) every movement of peoples, voluntarily or under compulsion, that happened before that or has happened since is under the LORD's command. The LORD is indeed LORD of history. This is true but it is not the central thrust of the verse. All Amos's hearers would have agreed so far but would have been horrified by the assertion which he is using this truth to enforce that the Israelites are the same to me as the Cushites! It is not that Amos is denying Israel's special position—which he affirmed in 3:2, and will affirm in vs 8–9. What he is teaching is this: Israel is associating 'speciality'—the privilege of being the LORD's people—with a date and fact in the past, the exodus. But considered merely as a date and historical fact, the exodus is no different from the migratory experiences of Philistines and Arameans.

A popular song of the 1950s, still wheeled out for an airing at Christmas says 'Man shall live for evermore because of Christmas Day'—as if the mere occurrence and passing of a date was the key to eternal life. Certainly, without Christmas day there would be no salvation, but the date does not save. Everything depends on what happens next, and in particular whether there is a personal response to the Saviour who was born and whether that response is validated by the moral commitment of ensuing life. In the same way there was nothing special about the people of the exodus, any more than the Cushites, unless they respond to the grace of divine salvation by commitment to the holiness of obedience. It is not past dates which the LORD looks upon, but the validation of the past by holiness and abhorrence of sin in the present.

The Cushites occupied land from Aswan south to Khartoum, typical in the OT of earth's remotest bounds. The Philistines came from Caphtor (Crete), moving from the Aegean area to settle on the coast of Palestine. Kir, see ch. 1:5. 8 Surely ('Behold' or 'Look at it this way'), what the LORD sees is not a date in history but the moral quality of those who claim to be his people, and where there is merely complacent reliance on a past date, devoid of present concern to flee sin and follow holiness, there can only be a fearful expectation of judgment (Heb. 10:26ff.). 8–9 Yet, a very strong word ('But always safeguarding this fact that ...'). Kemel (lit. 'pebble'), the word is only used elsewhere in 2 Sa. 17:13, and the NIV's suggestion that 'pebble' might mean the 'kernel' of good, sound grain, is without parallel. But in any case such a translation would contradict the ordinary significance of a sieve, which selects out the worthless and lets the good filter through. The picture here is rather of sieving soil to remove stones. Amos, consistently with his vision of the plumb-line (7:7–9) insists on a principle of discrimination within divine judgment. Nothing will be allowed to remain in the LORD's people that does not belong and at the same time, no soil will be removed with the pebbles.

10 But who are these 'pebbles', destined for removal? Not just the sinners among my people but a particular class of sinner: those who are complacent in the face of divine judgment, those who are sinners and who assert that sin is a permitted way of life by discounting the reality of coming judgment. Overtake or meet, i.e. neither catch up with us out of the past nor face us in the future, as if they were saying, 'There is nothing in our past to merit judgment, nor will there be in the future.' This is not the voice of those (the people who pass the plumb-line test in 7:7–9) who are building their lives on the level of grace with the straight edge of law, but of complacent, uncaring sinners in a world of make-believe. Neither for Amos nor for us is this a word intended to put our salvation at peril. But it reminds us that there is a double seal on the foundation of the LORD's house: 'the LORD knows those who are his' (2 Tim. 2:19) (hence our security in the unchanging will of the God who chose and took us for himself), and 'Let everyone who names the name of Christ depart from iniquity' (see 2 Pet. 1:5–11) (the moral determination which is evidence of elect status).

9:11–15 The hope that will be

Amos brings the third cycle of his messages full circle (see Outline of contents). It began with a drawing back from the utter destruction of the people (7:1–6) and now ends with an affirmation of glorious promises for the future. They fall into three sections: royal (11–12), creational (13) and personal (14–15) promises.

11–12 Royal promises. In one sense David's tent fell when the northern tribes withdrew (1 Ki. 12), and Amos may be looking back to that and forward to the restoration of the full unity of the people of God under the coming 'David' (Ezk. 34:23; Ho. 3:4–5; Lk. 1:32). Or, knowing as he did that Jerusalem was doomed (2:5), Amos may be envisioning the end of even the remaining tatters of David's tent as if it had already happened. Or, since fallen can be translated 'falling' or 'about to fall', he may have in mind the deterioration which he foresees in Judah and its ultimate collapse. In any case, the vision is of Messianic fulfilment. The originally intended glories will be realized (as it used to be; cf. Is. 1:26–27) and the promised world-empire of David (Pss. 2:7f.; 72:8–11; 110:5–7; Is. 9:7; 11:4–10) will come into being.

12 Edom was accused (1:11) of ceaseless enmity and this matches the biblical record of the relationship between Edom and the LORD's people, from Gn. 27:41 and Nu. 20:14 onwards. This leads in turn to the use of 'Edom' as a symbol of world-enmity to the LORD and his people at the end of history. Also, David was the only king to conquer and hold Edom in subjection (2 Sa. 8:14) and because of this 'Edom' came to symbolize the defeat of all enmity by the coming messianic 'David' and his dominion over the whole world (Is. 34; 63:1–6; Ezk. 35; etc.). Also Amos singles out Edom in order to affirm that the coming Davidic rule will bring all enmity to an end and introduce a new oneness on earth.

That bear my name, 'over whom my name is proclaimed'. The words suggest both royal dominion (2 Sa. 12:28) and also the oneness of marriage (Is. 4:1). Certainly the coming King will assert his sovereign rule and erstwhile Gentiles will acknowledge it, but after that their status is not of second class citizens and their role is not one of subservience: they become part of the 'bride' of the Christ. Rightly, James (Acts 15:15) sees this prediction as fulfilled in missionary and evangelistic terms, the outreach of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ bringing in the formerly separated Gentiles, for within the OT the kingdom of Messiah is one of spreading peace (Is. 9:7) not spreading war! Naturally, since the metaphor used for the Messiah is a kingly one, he does kingly things and extends his kingdom by force of arms (Is. 11; 14; etc.). However, this is metaphorical: it is the high truths about their God which constitute the two-edged sword the Lord's people carry and by which they subdue nations (Ps. 149:6–8).

13 Creational promises. Amos envisages an agricultural economy so prosperous that one year's harvest is still being reaped when the ploughman turns out to prepare for the next year; one year's vintage is still being trodden when next year's seed is waiting to be planted. The clue to understanding this description follows: when man fell into sin there was a sad consequence in the physical creation. Instead of the Garden of Eden showering bounty on the man and his wife, now only grudgingly, under pressure, and through hard labour would a living be extracted from the soil (Gn. 3:17–19). The reward of labour and the spontaneous bounty of the Messianic day, therefore, indicates that the curse has ended and is gone. Adam was king in Eden (Gn. 1:28), heir and monarch of the abundance implied in the permission to eat of every tree in the Garden save one (Gn. 2:16–17). But when sin came, liberality dried to a hard-won trickle. When, however, its rightful king returns to Eden (Is. 11:6–9) all the energies, pent up while sin abounded and death reigned, will explode in an endless burgeoning as creation itself hastens to lay its tribute at the feet of him whose right it is to reign.

14–15 Personal promises. Bring back my exiled, a possible translation but one that suggests that the prediction is of the return from Babylon. To avoid this we should translate the phrase 'bring back from captivity' (in the same general sense as in Ps. 126, where everything that binds, limits and oppresses the LORD's people is removed). However, 'restore the fortunes' (NIV mg.) is equally possible and more suited to this place in Amos. The LORD will gather his people (Mk:13:27; Rev. 14:14–16) and just as the 'royal' metaphor was extended to picture the extending kingdom in military terms, so the gathering of the people is seen here in territorial terms of re-occupying and re-building, in a threefold picture. (i) Recovery: everything that was lost, ruined or marred in the past will be recovered and restored—nothing of the damage sin has done will be left. (ii) Enjoyment and fulfilment: to plant and not to eat is a symbol of the frustration and the lack of fulfilment that sin brings into life (Dt. 28:30; Zp. 1:13). (iii) Eternal security: the final words of Amos set a divine seal on the promises: says the LORD your God. The LORD, the God of the exodus whose unchanging nature (Ex. 3:15) it is to save his people. Your, singular, covering the LORD's people as a whole and in their individuality. It means not 'by your choice' but, 'who has pledged himself to you' (Dt. 7:7f; Ezk. 20:5ff.; Jn. 15:16; Eph. 1:4, 11). Says, lit. (a perfect tense) 'has said'. All the Messianic promises—the rightful king, the new creation and the perfected people—are brought under an umbrella of certainty: 'on these things the LORD your God has made up his mind.'

OBADIAH

Introduction

Places and people

Geography and history play important roles in this prophecy, with sharp hostilities evident between Israel and its neighbour to the south-east, Edom. This ill-feeling had deep roots. Esau, Isaac's eldest son and the grandson of Abraham, saw himself as cheated by his younger brother Jacob, losing the privileges which were his due as eldest son (Gn. 25:27–34; 27:1–29, see v 41), though according to the writer of Hebrews, Esau himself was in the wrong (Heb. 12:16). While not exonerating Jacob, the episode shows that a sinful person can still receive God's blessing (cf. Heb. 11:9, 21). During their lives, both brothers received other names; Esau was also known as 'Edom' (Gn. 36:1, 9) and Jacob as 'Israel' (Gn. 32:22–32). These names were adopted by the nations of which the two men were the ancestors. The animosity beginning with these two brothers continued between the two nations as well.

After the exodus from Egypt, the Edomites would not let the Israelites pass through their territory in Transjordan (Nu. 20:14–21; Jdg. 11:17–18). Their own conquest was prophesied by Balaam (Nu. 24:18). King Saul fought against Edom (1 Sa. 14:47), and David conquered it (2 Sa. 8:13–14, but see the NRSV and NIV mg.; 1 Ki. 11:15–16). Solomon had the run of Edom (1 Ki. 9:26–28), though not with Edom's approval (11:14–22). During the reign of Jehoshaphat (ninth century BC), Edom, in a military alliance, raided Judah (2 Ch. 20:1–2). They rebelled against Jehoram (Joram), freeing themselves from the Judean yoke for some forty years, until late that century (2 Ki. 8:20–22; 2 Ch. 21:8–10). (See map in Joshua.)

Early the next century, Amaziah of Judah recaptured Edom with much bloodshed (2 Ki. 14:7; 2 Ch. 25:11–12), moving into its territory as far as Sela, the capital. Tables were turned later that century when Edom raided Judah when Ahaz was king (2 Ch. 28:17), taking prisoners of war and permanently freeing itself from Judah's domination.

Edom became an Assyrian vassal, and later came under Babylonian domination, though it did periodically consider rebellion (Je. 27). Biblical and extra-biblical sources are relatively quiet regarding Edom's activities at the time of Judah's destruction by the Babylonians in 587 BC, but

1 Esdras 4:45 places the blame for burning the temple upon Edom's shoulders. This is not confirmed elsewhere (cf. La. 4:21–22).

In the sixth century BC, Edom itself was waning, as is revealed by archaeological sources. Towns were abandoned and populations shifted (cf. 1 Macc. 5:65). Arabs gained control of this geographical area between the sixth and fourth centuries BC (cf. Ne. 2:19; 4:7; 6:1). The Nabateans, in particular, displaced the Edomites, forcing some of them into southern Judah, which became known by the Hellenized name Idumea (1 Macc. 4:29), based on the Hebrew 'Edom'.

This prolonged antagonism between Judah and Edom is in evidence in Obadiah, serving as the prophecy's framework.

Geography also plays a role in the prophecy. Edom's location east of the Jordan was among the rocky crags towering above the Dead Sea. The famous rock city of Petra, built by the Nabateans, is a model of the natural defences upon which Edom was able to rely. Their inaccessibility to attack led to arrogance and self-centred assurance in their own invulnerability, and this ultimately led to their downfall.

Obadiah and his book

Obadiah is not only the shortest OT book, it also has one of the shortest titles, providing little information about its author. No genealogy, birthplace or residence are indicated. We are told only that this is a 'vision of Obadiah'. Even the prophet's name could be simply a title, since its meaning, 'servant of Yahweh', is often used to describe OT prophets (e.g. 1 Ki. 14:18). The proper name 'Obadiah' is not rare in Hebrew, however, so there is no compelling reason to deny it to the author of this short prophecy.

Since we have no further information explicitly supplied about the author's identity, it is difficult to provide an accurate date for the prophecies. Any suggestion must be based on evidence in the book itself (and see the chart 'The prophets' in The Song of Songs).

It would seem that the background to the prophecy is an attack upon Israel by Edom (10–14), but as the brief overview of the history of the relations between the two nations shows, this could have been at any of a number of times in Israel's national life. The most likely reference of these verses in Obadiah is to the fall and destruction of Jerusalem in 587 BC. This is the clearest event in which Israel was defeated and looted (2 Ki. 25; 2 Ch. 36:17–21) and for which there is at least some evidence of Edomite involvement (1 Esdras 4:45). If this reconstruction is correct, the prophecy would be a cry of judgment upon Edom for their misdeeds against God and his people, and also a message of hope to God's own that their enemies would not go unpunished.

Though the shortest of the prophetic books, with only twenty-one verses, Obadiah is divided into two interrelated sections. The first oracle is directed specifically against Edom and itself is made up of three smaller oracles: the perils of pride (2–4), treacherous behaviour (5–7), approaching judgment (8–9), and a list of reasons for Edom's punishment (10–15). The second major oracle in the book describes the tables being turned against the nations who opposed Judah (15–18), and the final restoration of her kingdom (19–21).

The two oracles are unified by sharing such key terms as 'day' (8, 11–15), Yahweh as speaker and actor (1, 4, 8, 15, 18, 21) and the concept of the mountain, that of God (Zion, vs 17, 21) ultimately gaining superiority over those in which the Edomites placed such confidence (8, 9, 19, 21). The theological concept of 'tit-for-tat' also unites the brief book, occurring at least five times: the proud will be humbled (2, 3); passive observers of pillage will suffer that fate themselves (5–9, 11–14); because survivors of attack were molested, Edom will have no survivors of her own (14, 18); and dispossession will face those who dispossessed others (7, 14, 19). The concept is spelled out explicitly in the transitional v 15.

Commentary

1a Heading

The type of literature and its human writer is identified at the outset. Revelation comes through Obadiah in a vision. This shows a wider use of the word than simply literal visual revelation (see Is. 29:7; Ezk. 12:27), since here it concerns spoken communication (see Is. 1:1; Na. 1:1). ‘Vision’ does not involve the ordinary word for seeing, so an extraordinary perception is granted here to the one whose name means ‘servant of Yahweh’, already hinting at the ultimate source of the message.

1b–15 Edom—prototype of God’s enemies

1b–9 Impending doom

1b Introduction. The author of Obadiah’s message, and the one giving it authority, is the Sovereign LORD, who is introduced in a typical report formula (cf. Ezk. 2:4; the title is used 432 times of God). The Lord is sovereign not only over Israel but also over all nations, including Edom. God’s personal, covenant name ‘Yahweh’ (LORD) reminds God’s people of his covenant promises to them, including that of the land in which they would dwell (Gn. 12:1; 15:7). They especially needed this reminder at this time of exile, having just undergone serious national loss (10–14; cf. 19–21).

The subject of this particular oracle is Israel’s old enemy Edom (see the Introduction). Situated on Israel’s south-east flank, Edom was not a stranger to Israelite prophecy (see Is. 34; 63:1–6; Je. 49:7–22; Ezk. 25:12–14; 35; Am. 1:11–12; Mal. 1:2–5).

Rather than the expected oracle from Yahweh immediately following the report formula, additional information is given. This concerns either a previous message about Edom which is also appropriate for the current situation, or another message which is being delivered at the same time as Obadiah’s oracle, only this one is to the nations. The former suggestion is supported by the numerous similarities in content, if not in structural ordering, between these verses and another message concerning Edom in Je. 49:7–16. Obadiah could have been referring to this message by Jeremiah of which he was aware, either having heard it himself as it was preached in Jerusalem, or by reputation. This cannot be proven, however, because of the difficulty in accurately dating Obadiah’s ministry, and so not being able to establish the relative dates of the two prophets.

The message apparently concerns an envoy or messenger who had been sent by Yahweh to instruct all of the surrounding peoples to join in confronting Edom in battle. As will be seen, Israel, Yahweh and the neighbouring nations all take part in her defeat.

2–4 The perils of pride. Yahweh’s oracle now begins. Though directed towards Edom as you, it is unlikely that the Edomites were ever actually confronted by Yahweh’s prophet. In most prophecies against foreign nations, the prophet was speaking to God’s people for their encouragement, since their foes would be defeated, or warning, since they themselves could expect the same fate if they did not truly follow their covenant Lord.

Edom, especially proud of its seemingly impregnable geographical setting among the rocks and crags of Transjordan, will be brought low. Though the Edomites vaunted themselves in their own pride-filled hearts, they will be demeaned and despised; their hearts having deceived them just as Eve was deceived, and ultimately judged, in the Garden of Eden (Gn. 3:13). The rocks can be simply read as ‘Sela’ (see the NIV mg.), the Edomite capital (see the Introduction).

Its self-vaunting pride made Edom consider its security even as that of the soaring eagles or as the distant stars. The Edomites had forgotten that there were other things to fear besides military assault from ground forces. They will be confronted, and ultimately defeated, by God himself, the maker of both heaven and earth, against whom no rocky fortress was proof. From their heights he will bring them low, and of that they can be assured since Yahweh himself is declaring it.

Arrogance is a fault in God’s people just as it was in Edom. They had forgotten their vulnerability to his searching gaze in their arrogance at their ‘safety’ in the hills. The church also must not only live in awareness of the scornful and constantly watching world, but also in awareness that even their most secret vices and squabbles cannot be hidden from God.

Edom learned a lesson we all need to keep in mind, whether individuals or nations. It is much more beneficial for us and for God’s kingdom to assist someone when they are down rather than mocking or attacking them in their infirmity. Such scorn is contrary to God’s desire that we care for the downtrodden. It is also contrary to good sense, since those who are down may yet arise and have the last word, as did Judah, who triumphed under the rule of her God.

5–7 Treacherous behaviour. 5–6 The author brings his hearers back to their everyday experience, after the imagery of the last verses. They were only too aware of thieves and robbers surreptitiously coming to plunder and destroy. These criminals who were only able to steal what they could carry away with them, are likened to grape pickers who were required by law (Dt. 24:21) to leave some of the crop for the poor. The pillage and plunder of Edom will be even more devastating by comparison. Esau, the father of the Edomites (Gn. 36:1, 9), whose name is at times used to identify the people, will have even his hidden treasures, taken; nothing will be left.

7 Edom, emphatically addressed as you seven times in this verse, will find itself betrayed even by its allies and friends, called ‘men of peace’ in Hebrew. Another parallel group of former cronies are identified in Hebrew only as ‘your bread’, probably to be understood as [those who eat] your bread (see Ps. 41:9, where this phrase occurs in parallel to ‘men of peace’). Since eating together after ratifying a covenant relationship was customary in Israel (Gn. 31:54; Ex. 24:11; cf. 1 Cor. 11:23–26), these were apparently covenant partners who have reneged on their relationship.

This trap laid by its erstwhile friends will so surprise Edom that it will not even detect it.

8–9 Approaching judgment. Edom will lose what human support it had: its wise men, who were well known (Job’s counsellor Eliphaz was from Teman, Jb. 2:11; Je. 49:7; cf. 1 Ki. 4:30), as well as her army. These supposedly intrepid forces will be terrified, and all will face slaughter. This climaxes the progression of loss, from material goods (5–6), through counsel and understanding (7–8), to military capability (9). All the structures of society will fall.

10–15 Edom’s misdeeds

With a relatively regular structural form, and an ever increasing violence and brutal involvement in doing harm to Israel, Edom is condemned with great emotional vehemence.

10–11 The unexpected placing of brother with violence highlights the shocking treachery of Edom against Israel, here called Jacob (cf. Nu. 20:14; Dt. 23:7; Am. 1:11). This is a reminder of Esau's earlier conflict with his blood brother (Gn. 25:19–34; 27:1–28:9; 33), a conflict carried on by their descendants. This shameful violence is detailed in the next verses.

The first stage was passively observing enemies looting. Even though Edom could say, 'We didn't do this. It was rather your enemies, strangers ... and foreigners', since they were not helping, they were acting like one of them.

12–14 The opposition to Israel became more hurtful and increasingly direct. From passive observation, Edom progressed to 'gloating' (NRSV) or rejoicing over Judah's problems, entering into the very gates (cf. La. 4:12–13) to see more closely, and then even looting their abandoned possessions. Finally, they stooped to attacking the refugees from Judah (2 Ki. 25:4–5), handing the already hard-pressed survivors over to their oppressors. As they cut down the helpless, they will suffer the same fate (9–10), being left themselves without survivors (18).

15 This verse bridges the halves of the book, uniting the more particular oracle against Edom (2–15) with the more general one concerning Israel and the nations (16–21; see Introduction).

The day of the LORD is the ultimate goal towards which history is heading. In it, God will punish those who oppose him and bring relief to his own people. Israel understood herself as included in the latter category, but found that she was rather in the former, due to rebellion and breach of covenant (Joel 1:15; 3:14; Am. 5:18–24). She will be among the punished nations (Dt. 32:35–36; Zc. 14:1–3), here exemplified by Edom. Edom will be punished in ways related to her own wrong doings, an example of 'tit-for-tat' or, more technically, of lex talionis (cf. Lv. 24:19; Je. 50:15, 29). God's justice is being vindicated in not letting the guilty go unpunished.

15–21 Israel and the nations—judgment and deliverance

15–18 The tables are turned on Israel's enemies

15–16 Edom, still addressed as you (cf. v 7), is a prime example of all of the nations who will also be judged. Instead of rejoicing at Israel's downfall through drunken revelry in Jerusalem, God's holy hill, they will now drink totally the cup of God's wrath (cf. Is. 51:17; Je. 25; Hab. 2:15–16; Mk. 14:36). Their complete ruin will leave them as if they had never been.

17 But, in contrast not only to Edom (1–15) but also to the nations (16), on Mount Zion, God's 'holy hill' (16), will be deliverance instead of refugees (14). (This is a play on words as the Hebrew root is the same for both words.) God's ultimate grace to his people is shown by their final restoration to their covenant inheritance, the promised land, a promise which was held in suspension due to their sin (cf. Dt. 30). This clause of deliverance, the very word of God, is quoted in Joel 2:32, which suggests that Obadiah preceded Joel. Here, two aspects of the Davidic covenant, God's presence in his holy place, and the people's presence in the person of a remnant in the promised land, are revived.

18 Edom, identified as the house of Esau, had set out to destroy Israel, or at least benefit from her downfall (10–14). It will be destroyed by the fire of God's wrath (cf. Ps. 18:8; Am. 5:6) through his people, identified as the house of Jacob (either the entire nation of Israel [cf. Ps. 22:23], or only Judah in the south) and the house of Joseph (the ten tribe coalition; cf. 1 Ki. 11:28; Am. 5:6). Thus, the entire nation of twelve tribes will ultimately be restored, to the detriment of those who persecuted her (cf. Ezk. 37:15–28). The nation which betrayed Israel's refugees (14; cf. v 17) will itself be without survivors (cf. La. 2:22). Whereas the few remaining Israelites, the remnant, will re-emerge as a nation, for Edom the destruction will be total.

The guarantee of these words is shown by it being the LORD who has spoken.

19–21 The restoration of Israel

These next three verses are prose—not poetry like the preceding oracles. Some have suggested, on the basis of this switch, that these verses were added later by someone else. The argument for this is not convincing, however, since all writers, ancient or contemporary, are capable of writing in more than one style. Alternation between literary forms does not prove multiple authorship. The Hebrew in this section is obscure at several points, but the general message is discernible.

19 This and the next verse concern territorial occupation. Israel now can possess its ‘inheritance’ (17). The Negev, the wilderness south of Beersheba, is the location of people who appear to be dispossessing the Edomites. This could have involved some of its residents moving into the Edomites’ Transjordanian home-land (the mountains of Esau), but we have little evidence of this. More likely this verse refers to Israelites moving back into the area of Judah usurped by Edom when they lost their territory to the Nabatean Arabs in the sixth to fourth centuries BC (see the Introduction). The foothills or lowlands (the Shephelah, NRSV) between the sea coast and the highlands are identified by its most famous inhabitants, the Philistines, who also will lose their land. Israel gained control of this area under the Maccabees (1 Macc. 10:84–89; 11:60–62), as it did of Samaria, the former capital of the northern kingdom of Israel (cf. 1 Ki. 16:24; 21:1), under John Hyrcanus in 106 BC (Ant. 13.5.2–3). The area surrounding Samaria (called after the main northern tribe, Ephraim) was controlled by Judah as early as 153 BC (1 Macc. 10:38). More unclear is the meaning of Benjamin, a small southern tribe, possessing Gilead, located directly to its east in Transjordan. This area also fell to the Maccabees, in 164 BC (1 Macc. 5:9–54).

20 It is difficult to understand this verse because of the obscure Hebrew. The situation is helped, however, by the parallelism of the two halves of the verse. It seems to involve two groups of Israelite exiles. The second group, from Jerusalem, are those taken to Babylon in 587 BC. They are currently in Sepharad, but will return to retake their southern land. The site of their exile is unclear, with suggestions ranging from Spain to Asia Minor. A site in Media, Saparda, mentioned in an inscription of the Assyrian king Sargon II (late eighth century BC) well fits the historical situation of the exile. The other company of exiles is likely to belong to the northern nation of Israel which fell to Assyria in 722 BC. Rather than ‘company’, the NRSV suggests reading ‘Halah’, a change in the Hebrew involving a reordering of only one letter. This place in Assyria was home to some northern exiles (cf. 2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11; 1 Ch. 5:26). They will return to their original territory and beyond, as far as Zarephat, a coastal town north of Israel between Tyre and Sidon (cf. 1 Ki. 17:9). In the final day of the Lord the entire nation of Israel, from far south to far north, will be restored, even surpassing the territory held during the monarchy.

21 Deliverers, ones who bring salvation (Ne. 9:27), will come to Jerusalem (Mount Zion), from whence they will rule over the other mountains of this prophecy, those of Esau (i.e. Edom). This will be an indicator to the world who the true and universal king is. He is none other than the LORD, Yahweh, who is ‘King of Kings and Lord of Lords’ who has reigned, does reign and ‘will reign forever and ever’ (Rev. 11:15; cf. Ps. 22:28; 47:7–9).

The significance and authority of God is shown by his name being used to bracket the book (1, 21), and being indeed sovereign not only over Edom and Israel, but over all the nations of the earth.

JONAH

Introduction

The book of Jonah is a story about a prophet who bitterly resented the fact that God loves and cares for evil people. The book does not teach that God loves evil people because they are evil, but rather because they are human, of intrinsic worth to him in spite of their behaviour and their disregard for the true God. Much is made in the book of how Jonah attempted to resist the assignment that God gave him, which was to preach a warning to the people of Nineveh, a great city in ancient Assyria. Jonah knew that this warning might prompt the people of Nineveh to repent and be forgiven.

This is precisely the outcome that he opposed, since the ancient superpower Assyria was a cruel enemy of the Israelites, among many other nations, and Jonah, a nationalistic Israelite, wanted the Assyrians to be harmed, not helped. Nevertheless, the Lord forced Jonah to carry out his prophetic assignment, and in the process taught Jonah—and the readers of the book—that he is a God who has concern for peoples and nations beyond his own special chosen people.

The book does not suggest universalism, that all peoples or nations are chosen, but does teach that non-believing peoples may still benefit in some ways from God's compassion. In this regard the book teaches the biblical doctrine of common grace (i.e. that some of God's blessings in this life are given to all people in general, not just believers). The book also represents one of several OT foreshadowings of the new covenant enlargement of the kingdom of God to include believers from the Gentiles as well as from the Israelites. And most especially, it is an early version of Jesus' radical teaching that his followers must love their enemies.

There is no hint in the book that Jonah thought of himself as trying to introduce the people of Nineveh to the one true God that they, in their mistaken polytheism and pagan worship, had nevertheless been dealing with all along (as Paul does for the Athenians in Acts 17). Nor does the book give any indication that the Ninevites thought of themselves as converting to faith in Yahweh in any way whatever by their repentance described in ch. 3. Thus the book does not attribute to the Ninevites what is commonly called 'special grace', the benefits of actually knowing and obeying the one true God revealed in the Bible.

The person of Jonah and the book's authorship

Outside the book of Jonah itself, Jonah is mentioned at only one place in the OT (2Ki. 14:25) where he is identified as a northern Israelite prophet who rightly predicted during the days of King Jeroboam II that Israel would recapture territory from Syria that was traditionally part of the promised land. Both Jonah and Jesus were prophets from Galilee. Jonah was from Gath-Hepher (1:1), a city in the district of Zebulun, just three miles north east of Nazareth. It is not surprising therefore, that Jesus, who grew up in Nazareth, should take the story of this well-known local prophet to symbolize his own resurrection, and to use Jonah's warning to the people of Nineveh to repent as a symbol of his own call for repentance (Mt. 12:38–41; Lk. 11:29–32).

Jonah's name means 'dove' in Hebrew, but there is no symbolism to his name. Many Israelites bore similar animal names (cf. Peter's father Jonah, Mt. 16:17). His father's name was Amittai (1:1) but otherwise nothing can be known of his family or personal background. It is usual for prophetic books to give few family details about their authors or subjects. Like virtually all ancient prophets, Jonah was a poet, so that his composition or recitation of a poem, even from inside a great fish or whale (ch. 2) is hardly surprising. He appears in the book as an ardent nationalist, pro-Israelite and anti-foreign. Presumably, whatever advanced Israel and contributed to the decline or defeat of its enemies, he would have favoured. His strong nationalism led him to sin by resenting God's compassion towards an enemy people, and resisting God's command. His theology was also imperfect in regard to God's sovereignty. His attempted flight indicates that Jonah may have thought, as many ancient peoples did, that a god or goddess had greatest power in those regions where he or she was known and worshipped, and that geographical distance from Yahweh's land meant at least some degree of freedom from Yahweh's control. Alternatively, he may have believed that he could best resist the call of God by heading in the opposite direction to Nineveh (which was to the east), sailing as far west as possible (out to sea on the Mediterranean) hoping that God would then choose some other prophet to preach to Nineveh and leave him alone. Getting away from Israel meant getting away from the Lord's assignment in this view. Jonah quickly learned better, of course, but the book honestly portrays him as one whom God spared and used in spite of his follies and failures, as is the case with all human beings whom God uses. Jonah, in other words, is hardly a model for us to follow. Some of his behaviour and some of his beliefs were absolutely reprehensible, but he was a genuine, inspired Israelite prophet.

The author of the book is not identified. All the information in the book could have come to the author's attention from as few as two human sources: Jonah himself, who knew the details of most of the story, and the sailors mentioned in ch. 1, who knew that they had brought sacrifices to the Lord after their sudden deliverance at sea from the storm (1:16). The fact that the book is so often critical of Jonah does not mean that he could not have been its author. Comparably, the NT gospels are frequently critical of the disciples, among whom are their authors. The book shows no evidence of composite authorship or of insertions or deletions from the original text (See the chart 'The prophet' in The Song of Songs.)

Date and setting

Virtually no evidence exists to tell us when the book itself was composed. We cannot be sure of the precise date, since its language does not betray any features known to be either especially late or early in the development of Hebrew. Attempts to discern supposed 'Aramaisms' (Hebrew word forms derived from Aramaic after about 600 BC) or dependence of statements in Jonah on other prophets, such as Jeremiah, have been unsuccessful. The psalm in ch. 2 does employ some early terminology (e.g. Hebrew nephesh in the sense of 'throat'; v 5 is [lit] 'water enveloped me to my throat') but such is characteristic of Hebrew poetry so often as to be insignificant. Assyria was widely hated after 745 BC, when Tiglath-pileser III revived and institutionalized its imperialism and began threatening Syria and Palestine, so that one of the book's central emphases (that God loves even the Assyrians) would certainly have been greatly needed in Israel any time after that date. The book could have been composed in advance of 745 in anticipation of that need, or thereafter in response to it. The message of the book is virtually timeless at any rate, and the language simple and direct—standard, classical Hebrew.

The seventh century BC setting for the book of Jonah

As to the events described, these are easier to pin down. 2 Ki. 14:25 links Jonah to the period of the long reign of Jeroboam II in Israel (793–753 BC). 1:1 refers to Nineveh's 'trouble' (or hardship, calamity, misery; NIV 'wickedness' is a less likely translation, especially since throughout the book God's attitude towards Nineveh is not denunciatory but merciful, in sharp contrast to Jonah's). This suggests a date in the decades prior to Tiglath-pileser III, during which Assyria experienced a period of political turmoil and economic decline (i.e. 'trouble') under a succession of weak kings. Any date between about 800 and about 750 would fit. But it may be possible to be even more precise. Assyria's weakest point during that half-century came during the reign of Ashurdan III (772–756) under whose leadership Assyria suffered both major military losses and economic reversals. Anti-government riots forced Ashurdan to flee his royal residence at least once, and a total solar eclipse on June 15, 763 BC (considered an omen of severe divine displeasure by the highly superstitious Assyrians) may well have provided the occasion for the sort of popular repentance rituals described in 3:5–9. There was probably good reason for a weak king to join and support officially the popular outpouring of repentance at Jonah's preaching on the part of a war-weary, famine-stricken population frightened by a solar eclipse. A date for Jonah's mission in the late 760s BC cannot be too far afield.

Message and purpose

The book of Jonah presents a contrast between Jonah's self-centred hatred of his enemies and God's compassion for them. It is clearly intended to teach readers of the book that they ought not to reflect Jonah's attitude and practice. Twice in ch. 4 God asks Jonah what right he has to be angry—first, about God's sparing Nineveh (v 4) and then about the loss of the leafy gourd (NIV, vine) that had shaded Jonah's hut from the blazing sun (v 9). This latter God made an object lesson for the prophet. If Jonah cared about a plant, not wanting to see it die, should not God care about a whole city of people, not wanting to see them die (v 11)? Are not people (or animals, for that matter, v 11) much more valuable than plants? Don't they have intrinsic worth? Even if they are our enemies, that should not mean that we think that they deserve no compassion from God.

The contrasting of the relative values of plant and people in ch. 4 is only one of the two major object lessons in the book, however. The other is the contrast between Jonah's gratitude for being rescued from a fate he well deserved, and his resentment at the Ninevites' rescue from a fate they well deserved. In ch. 1 he confesses to the sailors that the divinely sent storm that threatens their lives is his fault and that his drowning will spare them. About to drown, he is suddenly swallowed, and thus rescued from death, by a large fish or whale (1:17). Ch. 2 records Jonah's eloquent prayer of thanksgiving for his own rescue, thus setting up a contrast with his hypocritical dissatisfaction at the rescue of the people of Nineveh in ch. 4.

Form and style

The form of the book is biographical narrative, a sub-category of Hebrew historical narrative, similar to that found in biographical portions of the prophetic books (most notably Jeremiah) and the stories of Elijah and Elisha in 1 and 2 Kings. The sentence constructions, transitions, scene descriptions and prominent use of dialogue are all standard characteristics of OT Hebrew historical narrative. So also is the presence of a poem (ch. 2) in the midst of what is otherwise prose. The occasional inclusion of poetry in the course of historical narrative is the norm, not the exception, in OT historical books. Throughout the Pentateuch and Former Prophets one finds dozens of examples. The fact that the book is a teaching narrative is also not exceptional; all OT narratives are, to some degree.

Those inclined to regard the book as fictional usually classify it as either an allegory, a parable or a fable. It bears the form of none of these, however. OT allegories are characterized by groups of obviously stylized characters fitted to a simple contrived plot, together symbolizing known historical developments (e.g. Ps. 80:8–19; Ezk. 19). Parables are very short stories (normally a few sentences) told in a spare style, as a way of illustrating a single point or principle (e.g. Isa. 5:1–7; Ezk. 17:22–24). Fables are stories involving talking plants or animals to highlight symbolically some facet of history, culture, or personal experience (e.g. Jdg. 9:7–15). Jonah is too long, too complex, too historically detailed and too straightforwardly biographical and narrative to be any of these.

The book's style is simple and normal for Hebrew narrative. It reads easily in the original, and contains no humour or lurid descriptions. Those who find the book somehow humorous or lurid are interpreting parts of the story according to their own expectations, not analysing the style of the book itself. The language is not exaggerated, the events not silly, and Jonah's own demeanour is anything but humorous. While the book contains irony (e.g. Jonah's resentment at the sparing of Nineveh after his own willingness to be spared personally, or his valuing the life of a single plant above many human lives) it is, like much biblical irony, not humorous but tragic. Jonah is not a hapless oaf or bungler at whom (or with whom) we should laugh—even ruefully. He is deadly serious about his hatred of the enemies of his people, and distraught to the point of death that God should be willing to spare rather than to crush Nineveh. To laugh at Jonah would be to fail to take seriously the sober purpose of the book—which is to keep us from viewing our enemies as Jonah did his. Those who speak in the book—God, the sailors, Jonah and the king—do so naturally, according to the norms of Hebrew narrative dialogue. The poem in ch. 2 is a typical example of a thanksgiving psalm, of which there are several in the Psalter.

Unity and integrity

The story of Jonah is complete and self-contained and shows no evidence of having lost any content by reason of textual corruption or deliberate manipulation. The text, in fact, is remarkably well preserved. Some scholars have argued that the psalm in ch. 2 is out of place, added by a later editor, since the story still supposedly reads nicely if the psalm and the words of introduction to it are omitted. However, virtually all poetic sections of OT historical narratives are similar in this regard. Moreover, an important element of the original story would be lost if the psalm were left out: the hypocrisy of Jonah's eloquent gratitude at his own undeserved rescue from death (which the psalm clearly reflects) over against his petulant resentment at the undeserved rescue of Nineveh from death (ch. 4). On the close interconnection of the psalm to the rest of the book see also G. Landes, 'The Kerygma of the book of Jonah', Interpretation 21 (1967) 3–31.

Historicity

Did the events described in the book really happen? Aren't parts of the story so unusual as to be obviously fictional? Did a man live for three days in a large fish, and a great city repent en masse at the preaching of an obscure foreign prophet? Did a large plant grow next to Jonah's hut and then die suddenly in order to teach Jonah a lesson? Did God really manipulate nature—from a mighty storm to a small grub—for the sake of one rebellious prophet?

The book claims that all these things did happen. Of course, if one believes that miracles can't happen, that God never intervenes decisively in human affairs, then the book of Jonah as well as all other accounts that speak of supernatural matters must be false. Such a rigid refusal to consider the supernatural a part of reality is, of course, unprovable, and the mere denial that certain sorts of events can occur is hardly a worthy means of argumentation. Could and would a supernatural Creator manipulate nature to his ends, sometimes so intensely as even to threaten or take human life? The Bible in general and the book of Jonah in particular certainly portray God in exactly this manner.

In any case careful examination of the events described in the book reveals that none is especially outlandish if one is willing to grant the possibility of supernatural events in a world still controlled by its divine Creator. For example, the storm in ch. 1 is by no means unusual for the eastern Mediterranean; its interception of Jonah and the ship he was on being more a matter of timing than of quantity or quality. It is well documented that several people (mostly whalers) have survived long periods of time inside sea creatures. The ability of the body to concentrate oxygen in critical tissues, including the brain, in the presence of cold water is so well established medically as to be commonplace. The conditions necessary for the highly superstitious Assyrians to respond to Jonah's preaching with wide-scale repentance, however ritualized, were in fact present during the early decades of the eighth century BC in and around Nineveh. Numerous examples of short-lived regional and national periods of repentance such as that described in the book are in fact chronicled in Assyrian historical records. As to the plant that died quickly in broiling heat when its roots were consumed, timing and placement are the primary requisites. There is nothing otherwise about its growth or death that is especially unusual.

The circumstances surrounding these super-natural events are addressed in further detail in the commentary, below.

Commentary

1:1–3 Jonah’s rebellion at God’s assignment to give Nineveh an opportunity to repent

1 Jonah is identified as the northern Israelite prophet of the early eighth century BC (known from 2 Ki. 14:25).

2 The NIV translation, preach against it, because its wickedness has come up before me is less likely than ‘preach to it because its trouble is of concern to me.’ The Hebrew word rā’āh, sometimes meaning ‘evil’ or ‘wickedness’, often rather means ‘trouble’, ‘calamity’ or ‘disaster’. The LXX has ‘preach in it’ which may be more original than ‘preach to it’. What Jonah heard was an assignment born from God’s compassion on Nineveh, not an assignment that would necessarily result in judgment on the city.

3 Tarshish, sometimes a place name, means ‘open sea’. Jonah hoped to run away from the LORD by taking a sea-going ship from the Philistine port of Joppa out into the Mediterranean to a distant site. He probably didn’t care which. OT prophets could be used by God even if their theological understanding was not perfect in every area, and Jonah’s theology apparently included, incorrectly, the virtually uniform ancient idea that a god had power only in those places where he was actively worshipped. Away from Israel, Jonah hoped to be away from God’s power to make him do what he didn’t want to do—preach to Israel’s hated enemy, Assyria.

1:4–16 A storm from God preventing Jonah from fleeing from the assignment

4–6 Jonah’s deep sleep, perhaps reflecting either exhaustion after his rushed travel from the Israelite hill country down to the coast or depression at the prospect of a self-enforced exile, shocked the captain. He, like his polytheistic crew, assumed that some god was angry with them and that that god (or some other) might stop the storm if prayed to.

7–9 Using lots (small stones thrown from a container that ‘come up’ certain ways indicating yes and no answers) in typical process-of-elimination fashion, the sailors rightly concluded that Jonah’s relationship with his god was the problem. The true God was clearly behind their results (cf. Acts 1:26). It should be noted that Pr. 16:33 (the lot’s ‘every decision is from the LORD’) is a way of saying that God—not our divination techniques—controls the events of life, and is not a promise that the use of lots always tells God’s will. Nevertheless, should he choose to do so, God can in any given instance use lots, or any other means of prediction, to reveal his truth, even if the lots are in the hands of pagans. Jonah identified himself as a Hebrew would do to strangers, and showed in his words that he was already accepting the fact that the Lord, as Creator of all, was hardly limited in his influence to any geographical region.

10 All OT narratives are terse and condensed in style, and throughout the book of Jonah we must remember that many words and actions are left unmentioned, as actually explained here. Likewise unmentioned is the full extent of Jonah’s preaching, summarized in 3:4 by just a few key words. Here, ‘What have you done?’ is rhetorical, meaning essentially ‘Think what a terrible thing you have done!’ It indicates the sailor’s recognition that the sin deserved a severe penalty.

11–13 Jonah proposed his own death, an end for his sadness at having left his home and livelihood to try an escape that had now failed, as well as a solution to the ship’s danger. The sailors, following a coastal route as virtually all ancient shipping did, hoped in vain to row to shore because the alternative, killing Jonah, was so odious to them.

14–16 With no other option, they obtained the desired results by throwing Jonah to his death. As syncretists (believers that all people’s gods really did exist and should be feared as needed) they had no trouble praying to Israel’s god, the Lord, and later, after reaching shore, going to one of the Israelite Yahweh shrines to offer thanksgiving and appeasement sacrifices to him, even though they were Philistines, not Israelites. (Joppa was then a Philistine city.) In this era, unfortunately, many Israelite priests would have happily accepted offerings from non-orthodox foreigners. The fact that they were not ethnic Israelites would not be an issue. 1 Ki. 8:41–43, in Solomon’s prayer at the dedication of the Jerusalem temple, reflects the hope that foreigners might worship there who will ‘know your name and fear you as do your own people Israel.’ However, the text does not say that they converted, nor that they worshipped at Jerusalem. Because Joppa adjoined (northern) Israelite, not Judean territory, it is highly likely that the sailors worshipped at one of the northern shrines that existed contrary to biblical law (Dt. 12; cf.

1 Ki. 12:25–33). Worship by unconverted aliens was improper even in Jerusalem (Ex. 12:43–49; Lev. 22:25) though worship by converted aliens was welcome on the very same basis as was worship by Israelites (cf. Num. 9:14; 15:14).

1:17–2:10 Jonah’s gratitude at God’s grace for rescuing him from death

17 Death by drowning was what Jonah expected. The words the LORD prepared a great fish indicate to the reader that Jonah would not die, but be rescued. Several reliable accounts exist of people’s survival at sea after being swallowed by whales (see D. K. Stuart, Hosea-Jonah [Word Books, 1987]). Those were natural survivals, due to the body’s remarkable ability to live on small amounts of oxygen (though normally unconsciously) in cold water, something medically well established. Also a factor is a whale’s frequent surfacing for air. Jonah’s rescue was by divine arrangement, however, and thus supernatural in considerable measure. Great fish in Hebrew nomenclature could designate either a whale or one of the larger sharks. Three days and three nights is a special phrase used in the ancient world with the meaning ‘long enough to be definitely dead’. It derives originally from the ancient pagan notion that the soul’s trip to the after-world took three days and nights. Jesus’ use of the same phrase for the duration of his death before his resurrection (Mt. 12:40) carries a similar force: it is a way of saying that he would really die, not that he would be literally dead for exactly seventy-two hours.

2:1 Whether or not he remained conscious at all times, Jonah was sufficiently alert some time during his days in the fish or whale to realize that he had not drowned but was being kept alive, and to utter the thanksgiving psalm that follows in vs 2–9. The form and structure of the psalm indicate that Jonah well understood that he had been given life instead of the death he deserved. A thanksgiving psalm was a musical poem prayed in gratitude after deliverance from some sort of threat or misery. Twelve psalms in the Psalter are exclusively or partially individual thanksgiving psalms (Pss. 18, 21, 30, 32, 34, 40, 66, 92, 103, 108, 116, 118). Six are exclusively or partly corporate (community) thanksgiving psalms (Pss. 65, 67, 75, 107, 124, 126). Such psalms are also found outside the Psalter (e.g. 1 Sa. 2:1–10; Is. 38:9–20). Thanksgiving psalms have usually five elements: (i) an introductory statement of appreciation for rescue; (ii) a description of the misery rescued from; (iii) a description of the appeal for rescue; (iv) an indication of the rescue itself; and (v) a testimonial or vow to continue to show gratitude via future worship. The psalm of Jonah includes all five elements, in the order listed above. There is no way to tell whether Jonah composed this psalm himself (as a prophet he was a musical poet by training) or whether he simply used a psalm he already knew to express his gratitude. At any rate, the psalm is an eloquent statement and may well have been polished before the event.

2 This verse is the psalm’s introduction, summarizing Jonah’s rescue.

3–6a These verses recount the misery Jonah was in. Several psalms use the metaphor of drowning as a kind of all-purpose statement of misery, so Jonah’s psalm should not be viewed as unique to his personal situation. Psalms tend to describe a few severe trials (mainly enmity, illness, entrapment, drowning and death) as typical hardships for which the reader may mentally substitute his or her own misery. In v 4 yet I will look again ... is better rendered ‘How can I look again ...’ on the basis of ancient Gk. manuscript readings.

6b This verse constitutes the brief description of the rescue.

7 Here Jonah includes words of appeal for rescue, typical of psalms of this type.

8–9 These verses are the concluding testimonial/vow section of the psalm. Worthless idols in v 8 is in Hebrew (lit.) empty nothings. Idolatry is dangerous for many reasons, one of the most prominent being that idols cannot save. Only the Lord, Israel's God, can save. The last words of the psalm, Salvation comes from the LORD (lit. 'Salvation is the Lord's') can also have the sense that he saves whom he will—he is in charge of the whole business of salvation. This, from Jonah's own mouth, foreshadowed the possibility that the Lord would choose to rescue the Ninevites from their troubles.

10 Again we are reminded that the actions of the fish or whale were controlled by God. The sailors had failed to get Jonah to shore (1:13). God did it, however, via the fish, preserving Jonah from death. Notions that Jonah's skin would now be stained by stomach acid, etc. are all purely speculative.

This type of psalm at this point in the book sends a clear message. Ancient Israelites who heard or read the story of Jonah could not miss the implication. A thanksgiving psalm is a song of gratitude. It is not an all-purpose prayer suitable for any occasion. People prayed thanksgiving psalms because they had been rescued from danger or hardship, as a way of thanking God for showing mercy to them. Jonah was stating, in the common manner of worshipping Israelites of his day (i.e. via a psalm), that he was grateful for the mercy God had shown him. He was alive even though he did not deserve to be. He had not drowned, even though death was the punishment he had merited (1:12). Jonah had experienced the grace of God, and he knew it and said so eloquently and at length. God had not treated him as his sins deserved. That is the message of the psalm prayed from the inside of the great fish.

3:1–3a A second beginning on the assignment to preach at Nineveh

The word of the Lord came to Jonah a second time. Since 1:2 Jonah had been experiencing God's control of the events in his life, but he had not heard God speaking directly to him. Now he again heard a direct, verbal divine assignment. The second assignment was essentially the same as the first. The wording in v 2, proclaim to it the message I give you, is a common sort of divine command, indicating that God would inspire Jonah with the appropriate words once he arrived on the scene in Nineveh. V 3a indicates that Jonah obeyed, and was now prepared to say whatever God would tell him to say at Nineveh. He no longer would resist telling a positive message to his nation's enemies.

Jonah got a second chance. And so, in God's mercy, may we. But this cannot be interpreted as a moral to the story. There is no principle enunciated here that God always works this way with those who rebel against his will. Jonah is by no means a typical figure and his situation is by no means typical of all believers. His wrong attitude towards his enemies is definitely a warning to believers, and its error is overtly dealt with in ch. 4 for our benefit. But not all parts of his life function as examples for ours. Accordingly, we must not assume that God would ever go to such lengths to correct our own rebellion against him. And we must not forget that Jonah continued to hate his divine assignment even though he now submitted to it, and later suffered yet more. So this story does not teach us that God will never debar us from his service even though we missed the road the first time around (cf. Lk. 9:57–62).

3:3b–10 Repentance resulting from Jonah's preaching at Nineveh

3b Nineveh was not technically the capital of Assyria at this time (even though 'capital' is a more modern notion), but was emerging as its most important city, a place where formal diplomatic visits required three days according to Assyrian diplomatic convention. The NIV translation of v 3b (Now Nineveh was a very important city—a visit required three days) is correct in contrast to some other major English versions which obscure or misinterpret the meaning of the Hebrew (e.g. the RSV, ‘... an exceedingly large city, a three days journey in breadth’; the NRSV ‘an exceedingly large city, a three days’ walk across’; or the NEB ‘a vast city, three days journey across’). The point is not that Nineveh had a certain circumference, but that three days were needed for a proper visit by a foreigner. On the first day a state visitor (ambassador, visiting royalty, etc.) would arrive, get settled, locate the appropriate government officials and present credentials to them. On the second day the visitor would be received by the official(s) in charge and the desired business would be conducted. On the third day an official send-off would be provided, with any responses to the government of the visiting state handed over to the emissaries at that time.

4 Jonah was only at the first day’s part of the schedule—just making contact in the manner of an ambassador. Prophets in the ancient world were often viewed as having an office akin to that of ambassador, since they represented a god. Thus they enjoyed a kind of diplomatic immunity and court status, which we observe, e.g. in the story of 1 Ki. 22 or the close association of Isaiah with the kings of Judah. The message God inspired him to give provided forty days of warning, thus implying that repentance could prevent punishment. ‘Forty’ is a word used sometimes in the OT to imply an indefinitely large amount, much like the English word ‘dozens’. The people of Nineveh recognized this common way of giving a warning. They knew that if no chance for repentance were present, no time period, definite or indefinite, would have been specified.

5–9 Repentance broke out on the first day—even before the official second day reception. The king (presumably Ashurdan III, who was either in town or reached by messenger elsewhere) capitalized on the wave of public sentiment and made it official, perhaps issuing his official proclamation (7–9) on the second or third day. Records of similar general proclamations calling for fasting and the donning of sackcloth (prickly fabric worn as a means of self-denial), even by animals, have survived from the ancient neo-Assyrian empire.

The term king of Nineveh (6) is a standard way of referring to a king who ruled over a given city as part of his empire, and does not mean that he was king only over Nineveh (cf. 1 Ki. 21:1 where Ahab, elsewhere called ‘king of Israel’ is called ‘king of Samaria’).

What would have led a large population of Assyrians to react so favourably and penitently to the preaching of an obscure foreign prophet? From Assyrian omen texts, we know of four circumstances that could move a people, and its king, to fasting and mourning: invasion by an enemy; a total solar eclipse; famine and a major outbreak of disease; and a major flood. We know that enemy nations, such as Urartu, had beaten the Assyrians in a number of military encounters in the time of Ashurdan III and that a major earthquake occurred in the reign of one of the kings with the name Ashurdan—but not for certain Ashurdan III. Moreover, on June 15, 763 BC in the tenth year of Ashurdan III, there was a total solar eclipse over Assyria! Above and beyond all this, the sovereign Lord purposed that they should repent. Little wonder then that a nervous, superstitious population would have responded so readily to what must have seemed to them the answer to their problems. A foreign god was warning them by these events, and now here in their midst was his prophet giving them a verbal warning of their need for repentance! The wording of the decree recognized the possibility, but not certainty, that repentance might produce rescue (9). Jonah also did not know what the outcome would be. Would God regard the fasting and mourning of the Ninevites as heartfelt and sufficient for forgiveness? Jonah, as we soon see, hoped not. The Ninevites, on the other hand, hoped that it would.

10 The Ninevites' repentance was genuine, although temporary. The language of his verse does not imply a permanent repentance, nor a conversion to worshipping Israel's God. The people had acted according to their own religious traditions, on what little they knew, and their actions were graciously accepted by God. Later he caused Nineveh's destruction (in 612 BC in fulfilment of the preaching of Habakkuk and others). Now, however, he spared them, just the opposite of what Jonah wanted.

4:1–4 Jonah's ingratitude at God's grace in rescuing Nineveh from death

Jonah's hatred for his enemies was so great that he even resented the very nature of God! He protested it via prayer! He said, in effect, 'This is just what I was afraid would happen because it is just like you, Lord, to do this sort of thing.' His confession about God's character (gracious and compassionate ...) used a common wording found often in the OT (Ex. 34:6; Ps. 86:15). His request to die (3) was the despondent plea of one who has seen things important to him go in just the opposite direction from what he hoped. He had lost his purpose for living, which was so wrapped up in the expectation of the defeat of his nation's enemies. God's question in reply, Have you any right to be angry? was posed for the benefit of the reader as well. Can we, or any among us, ever resent God's compassion on anyone, including our enemies?

4:5–11 Flashback: an object lesson when Jonah was still hoping for Nineveh's destruction

The events in 4:5–11 occurred during the 'forty' days between the first day of Jonah's visit and Jonah's recognition at the end of that period that Nineveh had been spared (1–4). V 5 is thus better translated, 'Jonah had gone out and ...'. Thus the book ends with a part of the story that is specially chosen to illustrate the deficiency of Jonah's attitude, rather than to tell the reader whether or not Nineveh was destroyed, which is already known. The wrongness of Jonah's attitude, and by implication the wrongness of any similar attitude, is indeed the most important lesson of the book.

5–8 Jonah went out of the city probably on the third day of his visit, as expected by protocol, and on the barren, open plains to the east constructed a shelter. He probably hoped to see a great show of fire and brimstone. Because Mesopotamia is largely treeless, he would have made his shelter of stone, without a roof. Here again, God used his control of nature to affect Jonah. He caused a leafy gourd (NIV vine) to grow next to and over Jonah's shelter, so that he had shade—in effect, a roof. Then God caused the plant to die, through a worm or grub, and then again used nature to affect Jonah, this time by means of a withering Near Eastern heat-wind and bright sun. Jonah, in effect out in the midday sun, was eventually in such misery that death would be a relief to him. With his plant gone, he was suffering. How he missed that plant!

9–11 Jonah (and the reader) must learn about the relative value of human life. Jonah, in his heat prostration, was furious at the death of his plant. Not stupid, Jonah surely had realized that God was behind these events. But he still protested in his anger that he wanted to die. The prophet who had recently eloquently thanked God for rescuing him from death now wanted to die! And it was over nothing more than a plant that had lived only briefly!

If Jonah could care so deeply about a vine, and desire so strongly that it should not die, could not God care all the more about people—or even animals? Since all cultures value animals above plants and people above animals, God's point to Jonah is clear. Jonah had wanted a plant to be spared, but not people. His values were completely amiss.

Implicitly the readers are asked: Are we like Jonah? Are our values also distorted? Do we hate our enemies and wish—or pray—ill for them while accepting forgiveness and grace for ourselves? Jesus taught that his followers must love their enemies (Mt. 5:44). It is a teaching often hard to bear, but a teaching that cannot be disobeyed.

MICAH

Introduction

The man Micah

Unlike Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, Micah does not describe his initial call to ministry (cf. Is. 6; Je. 1; Ezk. 2). The book's heading (1:1), however, claims that 'the word of the LORD' came to him in a 'vision' (i.e. supernatural sight and/or supernatural hearing), making him the Lord's messenger (cf. Is. 21:10). In his book the invisible God becomes audible.

Micah came from Moresheth Gath (1:1, 14), modern Tell el-Judeidah, a rather imposing mound about 400 m (1,240 ft) above sea level in the foothills of south-western Judah. It overlooked the undulating coastal plain to the west, dotted with fortified cities. About 35 km (22 miles) south-west of Jerusalem it was connected with a network of 'hedgehog' fortifications along the eastern edge of the foothills. These fortifications protected Jerusalem (on the spine of Judah's central ridge) from attacks mounted by invaders from the coastal highway connecting Egypt and Mesopotamia.

His name means 'who is like Yah[weh]'. By this name his parents celebrated the incomparability of Israel's God. Micah added to God's lustre by associating this name with his incomparable forgiveness and fidelity (7:18–20), the theme of Micah's book.

His message

The book's jerkiness of style is due to the binding together of formerly independent oracles into this coherent whole. These originally isolated prophecies vary in form, but broadly they can be classified as oracles of doom and of hope. Micah arranged them into three series (chs. 1–2, 3–5, 6–7), each beginning with the command rendered either 'Hear' (1:2) or 'Listen' (3:1; 6:1) and moving from doom to hope. The hope oracles, all of which refer in part to the remnant (cf. 2:12–13; 4:6–7; 5:6–7; 7:18), match the topics of doom and so resolve the crises. Micah's austere messages of judgment rest on the lofty ethical laws of God's covenant handed down at Sinai (6:1–8); his consoling messages of hope rest on God's unchanging covenant with Israel's ancestors (7:20).

In the first series, Israel is sent into exile and their holy land dislocated on account of their sin (1:2–2:11). The Lord, however, promises to gather his elect remnant into Jerusalem to survive the Assyrian siege and to become their king (2:12–13). In the second series, after dismantling Jerusalem for its failed leadership (3:1–12), the Lord will exalt Jerusalem high above the nations (4:1–5) and there reassemble the afflicted remnant, who will restore God's dominion over the earth (4:6–8). That prophecy finds fulfilment today in Jesus Christ who rules human hearts from heavenly Mt Zion (Acts 2:32–36; Heb. 12:22). Moreover, in Micah's time Israel was afflicted by invading nations and could not save itself (4:9–5:1), but God promised the birth and reign of the Messiah who would regather the purged remnant and lead them to victory (5:2–15). This too is fulfilled in Christ's church (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14–16). In the third series, from the spiritually depraved (6:1–16) and disintegrating nation (7:1–7), an elect remnant of the chosen people will be forgiven and saved by God (7:8–20). That remnant now constitutes a part of Christ's church (Rom. 11). No matter how stained and tattered the world becomes, God's purposes to triumph over Satan and his minions through his elect people will prevail (Rom. 16:20).

In his doom oracles Micah did not flinch from delivering his ever unpopular message that the wages of sin is death. He felt fiercely for Judah's middle-class who were oppressed by Jerusalem's rich upper-class (2:1–5, 8–9). The rich landowners were defended by corrupt magistrates (3:1–4) and encouraged by self-serving prophets (2:6–11; 3:5–8) and priests (3:11). Micah, however, full of the Spirit for justice, could not be bought (3:8). He was no moralizing poet, but a dynamic reformer calling the nation back to its spiritual heritage (3:8; cf. Je. 26:18).

Historical background

Many commentators attribute most of chs. 1–3 to Micah and the rest to anonymous successors spanning the exilic and post-exilic periods. The inspired heading (1:1), however, identifies Micah as the author of all the book's prophecies. The editorial comment at 3:1 suggests that Micah himself edited the book. No linguistic or historical data refutes the Bible's own assertion.

Micah prophesied from the time of Jotham (740–732 BC) to that of Hezekiah (715–686), a period when the Neo-Assyrian empire was rising to power (see the chart 'The prophets' in Song of Songs). The determined Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III (744–727) launched Assyria on an ambitious policy of imperial expansion. He assaulted Israel's coastal plain in 734 and annexed northern Israel in 733 (2 Ki. 16; 2 Ch. 28; Is. 7–8). Shalmaneser V (726–722) attacked Samaria from 725 to 722, and it fell to Sargon II (721–705; 1:2–7; cf. 2 Ki. 17). Periodic rebellions by the nations in Syria-Palestine against the tributes imperial Assyria exacted from them kept them in a constant dread of Assyria's reprisals. The invincible and cruel Assyrians invaded the area in 721–720 and from 714 to 701. The last proved most devastating to Judah. Sennacherib (704–681) captured all of Judah's foothill fortifications. Only Jerusalem miraculously survived (1:8–16; 2:12–13; 2 Ki. 18–20; 2 Ch. 32; Is. 36–39) because Hezekiah repented in response to Micah's preaching (Je. 26:18).

Micah's language, though drawn from this historical background, is poetic and abstract so that God's people under similar circumstances can identify themselves with his messages.

1:2–2:13 First series of prophecies: God gathers the elect remnant into Jerusalem

1:2–16 God punishes Samaria and Judah

Two oracles of doom, against Samaria (2–7) and Judah (8–16), have been joined here. Note Because of this in v 8—the fall of the former points to the fall of the latter. The wages of sin is death, and the reward of righteousness is life (Rom. 6:23; Gal. 6:7–10).

1:2–7 God descends from heaven and earth to level Samaria. The oracle consists of four parts: an address to the nations to hear God's testimony against them (2); the Lord descends from his heavenly palace (3) to convulse the earth (4); Samaria and Judah are accused of breaking God's covenant (5); and God sentences Samaria to annihilation (6–7).

2 Micah delivered this oracle against Samaria and Jerusalem before 722 BC, when Samaria fell. He summons the peoples of the land, all of them to a trial as defendants (the Lord witnesses against you).

3–4 Micah sees behind the Assyrian troops the coming of the LORD from his heavenly dwelling-place. Under the heat of his glowing wrath and his heavy tread the land's enduring mountains melt and flow like hot wax. Israel's mountains were critical for the defence of the land. Whoever controlled those heights controlled the land. Its fertile valleys give way and split apart like water rushing down a slope of a mountain ravine. The punishing descent of God (4) is linked with the levelling of Samaria (6–7) by the same Hebrew word translated rushing down in v 4 and pour in v 6, and by fire (4, 7). 5 This visitation is because of Jacob's (i.e. the northern kingdom's) transgression and the sins of the house of Israel (i.e. the southern kingdom). The southern kingdom is called 'the house of Israel' because Jerusalem, not Samaria, embodied the nation. The leaders in the two capitals of Samaria and Jerusalem are principally responsible for this breach of covenant.

6–7 Therefore shows that the sentence, handed down by God himself, fits the accusation. He will make Samaria a heap of rubble; he will pour her magnificently hewn stones down the slopes of the capital's acropolis (see v 4). Her idols on which she trusted will in fact bring her destruction. The silver and gold of these images, collected from the wages of [temple] prostitutes, will again be used by the Assyrian conquerors to hire temple prostitutes in their capital, Nineveh. This deplorable behaviour of depraved people demands the purifying fire of God.

1:8–16 Micah laments Judah's exile. 8–9 Because of this links the judgment of Samaria with that of Judah; both have sinned (5), and so both must be punished. Micah introduces his judgment oracle against Judah by sorrowfully dramatizing exiles who weep and wail and go ... barefoot and naked into captivity (cf. Is. 20:2–4). Behind the incurable wound afflicted by the Assyrians, Micah again sees the hand of God. It [or He] has reached the very gate of ... Jerusalem, but the capital itself is spared.

10–15 Micah predicts the fall of Judah's towns by a word play on their names which become an omen of their destruction. All the identifiable towns lie within a 14 km (9 mile) radius of Micah's hometown and were visible from there, but many of them cannot be identified today. Micah makes elaborate use of puns on each of the names mentioned. The meaning of each is explained in the NIV mg. For instance, Beth Ophrah (10), which means 'house of dust', is summoned to roll in the dust, symbolizing its abject and humiliating defeat (cf. Gn. 3:14; Ps. 44:25; Je. 6:26; Ezk. 27:30). The puns and literary symmetry of the chapter correspond to God's moral order for all time. Within that order sin brings punishment, just as surely as neglect leads to loss. A nation that lives for pleasure will die through venereal diseases and drugs, and a nation that worships money will find itself bankrupt.

2:1–11 Woe to the oppressors

The reproach oracles against Jerusalem's greedy landowners who loved money (1–5) and its equally greedy false prophets (6–11) are linked by accusing them of greed and of plundering the middle-class (2, 8–9).

2:1–5 Woe to the greedy landowners. The rich had wrested fields from Judah's ordinary people (1–2), therefore, the LORD will send a hostile army to wrest the promised land from them (3–5). The accused, who plot [plan] evil, are linked to the accuser who is planning disaster and by the repetition of the word fields (2, 4).

1 Micah introduces this doom oracle with prophetic thunder, Woe to. On their beds at night they plan their black deeds, at morning's light (the time when court met) these legal sharks carry it out, probably by perverting the courts (cf. 7:3) and then forcing their victims off their lands. Ironically, at the time when the oppressed middle-class (see 2:8–9) expected justice, they found fraud and foreclosures from the officials and military elite who had the power to do it. 2 These powerful men covet fields. 'You shall not covet' is the only command repeated twice in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:17) and is at the root of the other wrongs against one's neighbour. The law carefully safeguarded a man's fields, his permanent inheritance, for in a farming society a man's freedom and life depend on them.

3–4 As the powerful elite plotted evil against their victim's fields (2a) and home (2b), so the LORD is planning disaster against this people (3) and their fields (4). 3 As a master enslaves an animal with a yoke, so God, through the Assyrian captors, will overpower the greedy upper-classes so that they cannot save themselves. 4 Their punishment is phrased as a satirical dirge put in the mouth of their enemies: 'We (i.e. wicked landowners) are utterly ruined'. As they ravaged others by taking their fields, so others, using the same ethic that might makes right, take theirs (cf. Mt 26:52). They hypocritically refer to the land as my (i.e. God's) people's possession. As they had redistributed plundered fields among themselves, so now their fields are divided up by the enemy (cf. Am. 7:17). V 4b would be better translated 'How they [the enemies] take away [what] belongs to me [the wealthy landowner]. They assign our fields to rebels [Assyrians].' God gave the Israelites the land as a trust (Lv. 25:23) to be enjoyed as long as they used it according to the covenant's designs, but he retained the right to take it away from them if they failed to keep the covenant and give it to their enemies (Lv. 26:33; Dt. 28:49–68).

5 Therefore links the landowners' immediate loss of land (4) with their future and eternal loss of land, the severest judgment of all. When God returns the remnant to the land (4:7), these greedy traitors will have no-one in the assembly of the LORD to represent them when he again divides the land by the sacred lot as he did in the beginning through priests (Nu. 26:55).

2:6–11 False prophets support the greedy landowners. 6 Do not prophesy is plural. The false prophets, the liberal theologians of Micah's day, address him and other true prophets, telling them not to predict these things, i.e. the judgment foretold in vs 3–5. 7 The LORD rebukes the house of Jacob by quoting their doubly false theology that 'the LORD never grows impatient' (NIV, angry) and never does such things (i.e. bring judgment). On the contrary, God's words do good only to those who are upright.

8–9 God elaborates upon Micah's accusation in v 2. Israel's free farmers should have felt as secure as men returning from battle. Instead, these defenceless farmers, says the Lord, find my people (an ironic reference to the powerful, as the rest of the verse shows) have risen up like an enemy against them. You, presumably referring to the wealthy landowners supported by the false prophets, destroy Israel's formerly prosperous families, men, women and children. You strip off the rich robe from the unsuspecting men (8), drive the women ... from their pleasant homes and take away God's rich blessing from their children (9). The Lord's wealth, once spread across the breadth of the nation, is now concentrated in the hands of the rich predators.

10 God now hands down the sentence against the rich landowners, probably using the very words they used to drive the innocent off their lands: Get up, go away! They must leave their resting place, the place of their physical and spiritual well-being. The reason is now given. By their idolatry and immorality the land is defiled and so it spits them out (cf. Lv. 18:25), it has become a sickening ruin beyond all remedy. 11 In response to the Lord's sentence, Micah scathingly and sarcastically taunts the land-owners. They are willing to accept as a prophet anyone who joins them in their greed. Such a false prophet is not merely deluded, he is a liar and deceiver. Wine and beer were favourite themes of these carnal rulers, who indulge their swollen appetites with a greed condemned by true prophets (Is. 5:11–12; 28:7–8; cf. Am. 4:1) and warned against by the wise (Pr. 20:1; 23:20–21; 31:4–7). A false prophet who preaches a ‘wealth and prosperity’ gospel, not holiness, is just the prophet for this people. The very prophet they deserve!

2:12–13 God preserves a remnant in Zion

The book’s first section ends with an oracle of hope consisting of two parts: God’s promise (12) and Micah’s prophecy (13). 12 Israel’s Shepherd-King will gather ... bring together the remnant of Israel who survived the Assyrian invasion (see 1:8–16) in a pen (a picture of the security of Zion). The reality behind the figure is Sennacherib’s blockade of Jerusalem in 701 BC. The difficult Hebrew text behind the second half of the verse should be rendered, ‘Like a flock in its pasture they [the remnant] shall be thrown into confusion with no man [i.e. the king] to protect them’.

13 Micah unfolds the three subsequent stages of the remnant’s salvation. First, the one who breaks open the way (a title for Israel’s Shepherd-King) will go up to battle before them. Secondly, they will break through the blockaded gate of Jerusalem (see 1:9, 12). Thirdly, their king (better, ‘King’) will pass through before them, assuming his rightful position at their head. The first two stages were fulfilled in the Lord’s miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem from the invading Assyrians (see the Introduction). The third stage, as will become clearer both within the book (see, e.g. 5:1–6) and in the unfolding revelation of the NT (see, e.g. Col. 1:18–20), finds its fulfilment in Christ and his church.

3:1–5:15 Second series of prophecies: God restores Jerusalem’s former dominion to the purified remnant

3:1–12 Old Jerusalem and its corrupt leaders fall

Old Jerusalem and its corrupt leaders fall (justice; see vs 1, 8, 9), common length (four verses) and a common form consisting of naming those addressed (1, 5, 9–10). Each is followed by an accusation introduced by who (2–3, 5, 9, 11) and a sentence introduced by then (4) or therefore (6–7, 12). The first two oracles move to the climax of the third. Those addressed move from the unjust magistrates (1), to the unjust prophets (5), to these two plus unjust priests (11). The judicial sentences develop from God’s silence (4), to his silence plus darkness (6–7), to his absence when the temple is destroyed (12). Jerusalem falls because its leaders failed.

3:1–4 Shepherds turned cannibals. 1 With an emphatic Listen, Micah brings first into the dock the leaders and rulers (both terms signify judges) of Jacob and Israel (meaning the nation). These judges had the responsibility to know justice both in their heads and hearts. This was based on the case laws collected in the Mosaic law (Ex. 21:1–23:19; cf. Dt. 17:8–11) and, in their light, the judges were to formulate new laws and decide cases fairly (cf. 1 Ki. 3:28; 7:7). 2 Without regenerate hearts, however, the depraved judges in fact hate good and love evil (cf. Is. 1:17, 21–23, 26; 5:7; and see Pss. 1:2; 19:7–11). In a grotesque and sustained picture Micah portrays the magistrates as cannibals. By reducing their subjects (my [Micah’s] people) to grinding poverty and living off their fields and labours (see 2:1–2, 8–9), they were sending them as skeletons to an early grave. 3 By repeating the gruesome picture, God underscores its truth.

4 As the heartless rulers refused to relent when their subjects cried out to them for mercy, so also at the time of judgment (see 2:3–5) they will cry out to the LORD, but he will not answer them; rather he will hide his face from them, the sign of no mercy. The worst form of judgment is not affliction but the absence of God in it (cf. Heb. 12:15–17).

3:5–8 Greedy prophets. Instead of ‘barking’ against the greedy and grasping overlords, the prophets (who should have been the moral watchdogs of God’s nation) ‘wagged their tails’ and joined the cannibals to gratify their own swollen appetites (cf. Je. 2:26; Ezk. 22:25–29; Zp. 3:3–4). ‘Eating’ indicates the love of money by both parties.

5 This is what the LORD says: Micah’s authority lies in God, not in himself (cf. v 8). The professional clergy lead the people astray from God’s covenant by rewarding the evil and punishing the good (cf. Dt. 13:1–5), turning the moral order on its head. If one feeds them represents the Hebrew ‘those who bite like a snake with their teeth’. Like evil serpents they kill their victims to feed themselves. To those who satisfy their appetites they solemnly proclaim ‘peace’ (cf. 2:11). If he does not (lit. ‘whoever does not give what they demand’), they prepare (lit. ‘they consecrate’) to wage war against him. Rulers looked for divine guidance from prophets, whether to keep the peace or to wage war (1 Ki. 22:1–29). Money talked louder than God to these false prophets.

6 Therefore God will take away their clairvoyancy, the source of their illicit gain. They will experience night and darkness instead of visions (revelations) and divination (forbidden omens of the occult; cf. Dt. 18:10; Ezk 21:21–22). The sun setting and the day going dark is a picture of the loss of the prophets’ gift of visions. 7 Deprived of divine revelations they will be ashamed and disgraced and regarded as unclean (cf. La. 4:13–15). Like unclean lepers they will all cover their faces (lit. ‘moustaches’ = mouths) (cf. Lv. 13:45; Ezk. 24:17–22), the very area of their misused talents. Micah speaks here of God, not ‘the LORD’, so as not to associate their unholy activity with the sacred name.

8 In contrast to his deflated opponents, Micah says of himself: I am filled (i.e. endowed) with power (i.e. dynamism from the Spirit of the LORD; cf. Ezk 2:2; 3:12, 14, 24) and might (i.e. triumphant valour), making him equal to his adversaries who also wage war against him (cf. 2:6) as he involves himself in the cause of justice.

3:9–12 Jerusalem to be levelled. 9 Micah again summons the depraved leaders and rulers (see 3:1) and accuses them that they despise (i.e. regard as detestable) justice and distort all that is right in legal matters. 10 They build the monumental edifices of Zion with bloodshed (i.e. through their corrupt courts that took away the life of their defenceless victims). 11 In an aside Micah elaborates upon his accusation. Leaders (civil magistrates who were to execute the law), priests (who were supposed to teach it; Dt. 17:8–10; 33:10; Ho. 4:6) and prophets (who were to apply it through revelation) were Israel’s safety nets against injustice, but they broke under the strain of the love of money (cf. 1 Tim. 6:3–10) and the false theology that because they blasphemously profess to lean upon the LORD they are secure (cf. 2:7). God’s covenant, however, is based on ethics and truth.

12 Therefore: God’s sentence will match the crime (cf. Je. 26:18). On account of you (the magistrates; cf. vs 9–10), their proud and profaned buildings will become a heap of rubble and the [no longer the LORD’s] temple hill, will become a mound in thickets where unclean animals roam.

4:1–8 New Jerusalem exalted over the nations

The next four oracles refer to renewed Zion (cf. vs 2, 7, 8, 10–11). As old Jerusalem fell because of corrupt leaders, the new Jerusalem will triumph because it will be ruled by the Messiah over the saved remnant.

4:1–5 Jerusalem exalted over the converted nations. (Cf. Is. 2:2–4). 1 The promises in chs. 4–5 will be fulfilled in the last days (better ‘in days to come’) commencing with the restoration of the remnant from Babylon (6–7), fulfilled in the church today (Acts 2:17; Heb. 1:2), and consummated in the new heavens and earth at the end of time (2 Pet. 3:12; Rev. 21–22). In a breathtaking shift, Micah moves from the destruction of ‘the temple hill’ (Heb. hār) (3:12) to the exaltation of the mountain (Heb. hār) of the LORD’s temple, the earthly replica of heaven itself (cf. Ex. 25:9; Heb. 9:23–24) as chief (the same Hebrew word as ‘leaders’ in 3:1, 9) among the mountains (the pagan, political and religious centres). Restricted to the language and society of his own age, Micah exaggerates the OT imagery to predict the glorious future when all nations will worship Israel’s God in heavenly Jerusalem through Jesus Christ (cf. Heb. 12:22). Whereas peoples used to stream along the Euphrates to worship Bel in Babylon (cf. Je. 51:44), now they will stream to heavenly Jerusalem. 2 Whereas formerly only Israelites went to worship at Jerusalem, in this glorious Messianic kingdom, many (or ‘great’) nations will go up to heavenly Jerusalem to worship in spirit and truth (Jn. 4:21–24). They will go so that God through true ‘priests’ might teach them his ways (cf. Mt. 5:17; 28:18–20; 1 Pet. 2:9). When the law and the prophetic word of the LORD will go forth from heavenly Jerusalem, the benefits of vs 3–4 will follow.

3 God will judge (see 3:11) through gifted individuals ministering his word and so settle disputes among many (better, ‘great’) and strong peoples. 4 With no need for instruments of war, the pacified peoples will beat their swords into ploughshares (better, ‘hoes’). 4 No longer filled with covetousness (see 2:2) nor living by the sword (cf. Mt. 26:52), the converted person (cf. Je. 31:31–34) will live without fear of reprisal and will be content to sit under his own vine. The concluding formula, for the LORD Almighty has spoken, guarantees that the vision will be fulfilled. Today the church consists of true believers from all nations, who know it is more blessed to give than to receive (Acts 20:35), have the law written on their hearts and experience the promised grace and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

5 Waiting upon God to fulfil this promise, the faithful remnant pledge to walk in the name of the LORD (i.e. in conformity to his covenant) for ever and ever (cf. Is. 40:31). They are the heralds of the future peace.

4:6–7 The lame remnant becomes strong. 6 In that day refers to ‘the last days’ of v 1. Declares the LORD guarantees the divine inspiration of this prophecy, and so its authority and truth. The Shepherd-King will again gather the lame and assemble the exiles (better, ‘scattered’), looking forward to the afflicted Judahites restored from Babylon.

7 After restoring them to Jerusalem God will make (better, ‘transform’) them into a remnant, which now becomes the goal of sacred history. Other nations of Micah’s world did not survive the upheavals of history because God did not preserve a remnant from them (cf. Am. 1:8; Rom. 11). Those driven away on account of their sin, now restored and purified, will become a strong nation (1 Pet. 2:9). Micah then reflects upon this figurative oracle. When the LORD sets up his rule over the restored remnant through the Messiah from his heavenly throne on Mount Zion (cf. 5:2–4; Acts 2:32–36), their kingdom will endure from that day and forever (cf. Is. 9:6–7).

4:8 Jerusalem's dominion restored. God addresses his third prophecy about Zion directly to her. He calls the restored capital a watchtower (i.e. a fortified tower in a vineyard from which shepherds kept an eye out for beasts and poachers) of ('for the sake of') the flock (the subjects of his kingdom; cf. vs 6–7). The old rulers plundered them (ch. 3), but in the new era God will protect them through the Messiah (see 5:1–6). He addresses her also as stronghold ('hill'; 2 Ki. 5:24), the strongly defended eastern hill of Jerusalem (originally called 'Ophel'). This old title, associated with David's greatness, gives the remnant a vision of its future glory when its former dominion will be restored, 'a kingdom belonging to the Daughter of Jerusalem'.

4:9–13 Zion's present pangs will give birth to a new era

The prophet continues on the trail of Zion's restoration. The oracle develops in two stages (9–10, 11–13) with a similar form pointing to a coherent meaning. Both move from now (i.e. the present distress of Micah's situation; 9, 11) to the glorious future by means of a vocative, O Daughter of Zion (i.e. Jerusalem and its citizens), with commands, writhes in agony (10) and rise and thresh (13), followed by for and a description of the future.

9 The rhetorical questions Why do you now cry aloud? rebukes Zion for her unbelief as the remnant (on whom God banks the future of history) goes into the Babylonian exile. The second question, have you no king? (better, 'King'), explains the first. The 'King' is God, as the parallels in v 12 and Je. 8:19 suggest. Their counsellor (better, 'Counsellor') who is sending them into exile has a secret strategy behind their birth pangs: through pain they will give birth to the new era. 10 To bring Zion's history to fulfilment the remnant that survives Jerusalem's fall is commanded to writhes in agony ... like a woman in labour. The birth pangs now indicate that the remnant must leave the city (cf. 2 Ki. 25:2–7; Je. 52:7), camp in the open field (Je. 6:25; 14:18), and go to Babylon, the supreme example of spiritual darkness. But there (repeated twice for emphasis) the LORD will redeem them from the hand of their enemies; the first glimmer of the dawning of the new era (see 4:1). In 705 BC Isaiah predicted the Babylonian captivity in connection with the visit by the embassy from Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon (2 Ki. 20:12–19 = Is. 39:1–8). The prophecy that the preserved remnant would return to Jerusalem was fulfilled under Zerubbabel and Joshua in 538 BC.

11 Whereas the now of vs 9–10 refers to the Babylonian exile, the now of v 11 refers to the Assyrian blockade of Jerusalem (see the Introduction). The Assyrian imperial army consisted of mercenaries from many nations (Is. 29:7), hired from the hated tribute collected from her subjugated peoples. In pride the defiant armies (each under its own flag) are gathered against Zion with the result that the holy city will be defiled by them tearing down the walls protecting its sacred precincts, especially the Most Holy Place. They will also gloat over the city that claimed to be the true representation of heaven on earth and so condemned them. 12 But they do not know God's battle plan; namely, he gathers them about Zion's walls like sheaves to the threshing floor (a common picture of judgment; Is. 21:10; Je. 51:33; Ho. 13:3). They are the unwitting tools of their own defeat, just as God outwitted Satan in the cross of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 2:7–8). 13 So Micah commands the remnant gathered with him within Jerusalem's blockaded walls to go out (cf. 2:13), Rise and thresh, for God has given them invincible horns of iron to gore their enemies and hoofs of bronze to break to pieces (like husks and chaff) these many nations. The remnant will take the Assyrians' ill-gotten gains (the plunder of Judah that had not already been sent back to Assyria) and will devote them to the LORD in his protected temple (cf. the fate of Samaria in 1:6–7). The secret strategy, which began to be fulfilled in 701 BC (2 Ki. 19), continues to be fulfilled in sacred history (Je. 51:33; 1 Cor. 2:7–8).

5:1–6 The birth and exaltation of the Messiah

The focus now shifts from renewed Zion to the renewed house of David. The oracle is framed by a reference to Micah and the remnant with him in the first person plural ('we' and 'us') as they endure the Assyrian invasions.

1 'Now' (unfortunately omitted by the NIV) links this oracle with the preceding (9, 11); all of them begin with the present distress (1) and move to salvation (2–6). To fortify spiritually the blockaded city Micah commands: Marshal your troops, O city of troops. The siege ... laid against us is Sennacherib's blockade in 701 BC (cf. 1:9, 12; 2:12–13; 4:11). They [the Assyrian horde] strike Israel's ruler [Hezekiah] on the cheek with a rod ('sceptre'), showing that he has no defences of his own, even as God's enemies later struck the greater Son of David to humiliate him (Mt. 26:67; 27:26, 30).

2 The word But shifts the scene from besieged Jerusalem to Bethlehem, Israel's future hope. Like the personification in 4:8, God addresses Bethlehem directly. The names, Bethlehem Ephrathah and Judah, recall the days of Jesse, David's father (cf. 1 Sa. 17:12). God is about to start all over again. David's decadent line will be cut down like a dead tree but, as Isaiah expressed it, 'a shoot [the Messiah] will come up from the stump of Jesse' (Is. 11:1). Though ancient Bethlehem was small ('least'; cf. Jdg. 6:15; 1 Sa. 9:21) among the clans of Judah (and even omitted from the extensive lists of Judah's towns in Jos. 15:33–60) today it has achieved universal acclaim through Christ's birth, which was itself as inauspicious as Bethlehem was before his birth (cf. 1 Sa. 16:1–13). Matthew (2:6) interprets the verse to emphasize Jesus Christ as ruler, not as one of Jesse's descendants. He omits 'Ephrathah', changes 'clans' to 'rulers' thereby forming a better contrast with 'ruler over Israel', rightly explains the text's intention by adding 'by no means least', and replaces the end of the verse with 2 Sa. 5:2.

In contrast to Israel's self-serving rulers (cf. 3:1–4), the Messiah will come for me (i.e. for God's advantage, not his own). The veiled reference to the Messiah's historical roots, through the allusions to Jesse by the names at the beginning of the verse, is unveiled at the end of the verse: his origins are from of old, from ancient times, referring to the times of Jesse. The Hebrew behind from ancient means from 'the remotest times', 'from time immemorial' ('long ago' in Jos. 24:2; Je. 2:20) when used with reference to some historical event; when it is used of God, who existed before creation, 'everlasting' is an appropriate translation (e.g. Ps. 90:2). The addition of times (lit. 'days') shows this to be a historical reference. The full phrase is rendered 'as in days long ago' in 7:14, 20.

3 From the promise that Zion's new age will be inaugurated with the birth of the Messiah in Bethlehem, Micah concludes that Israel will be abandoned without a human king until she who is in labour gives birth (see 4:9–10) to the Messiah. The prophecy found fulfilment about 700 years later through the faithful Zechariah and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, Joseph and, above all, Mary (Lk. 1:5–2:40; cf. Is. 7:14). The nucleus of Zion's new kingdom centring on the Messiah consists of the rest of his brothers, who are related to him not only by blood and history but also in spirit. They return (a word that signifies conversion) from their captivity to sin and judgment to join the true Israelites (a term that has a religious meaning). Having gathered the elect remnant, Christ inaugurated his kingdom from heavenly Zion when he sent the Holy Spirit on the brothers gathered in the upper room, and they turned the world upsidedown (Lk. 3:16; Acts 2).

4 The reigning Messiah will stand (i.e. endure forever; cf. Ps. 33:11; Is. 14:24) and shepherd his flock, providing for their every need, including spiritual food, and protecting them (Jn. 10; Heb. 13:20; 1 Pet. 5:4). Through faith he will rule in the strength of the LORD, not through human engineering and manipulation (cf. 5:10–15). His subjects will live securely for, conquering Satan (Mt. 12:22–29; Rom. 16:20), he will extend his kingdom to the ends of the earth (4:3–4; Mt. 28:18–20; Jn 17:2). Christ gives his elect people eternal life and no-one can snatch them from his hands (Jn 10:28).

5–6 The theme that Christ’s universal rule secures the peace of his kingdom is now elaborated. Micah uses we, our and us (see above) to identify himself and the faithful with him as part of that triumphant kingdom (see 5:1). He surrounds this conclusion with the promises that the Messiah will be their peace (5a) and he will deliver us (6b). The Messiah will both defend his kingdom from enemy attack (5b) and rule over his enemies (6a).

5 Micah refers to future attacks against the Messiah’s kingdom as being carried out by the Assyrians, who were destroyed in 612 BC, centuries before Christ’s advent. Prophets did not see the centuries that separated them from the fulfilment of their predictions but saw future happenings as imminent events on a flat tableau. Moreover, they described the future in terms drawn from their own experience (see 4:1; Is. 25:10; Am. 9:12). Under the Messiah’s rule the faithful community will raise up seven (the perfect number) shepherds (an image for protectors), even eight (i.e. more than enough) leaders (a rare word found in Sargon’s annals for his commanders). 6 They, the Messiah’s under-shepherds (cf. 1 Pet. 5:1–4), will rule the land of Assyria, which represents all the enemies of the kingdom of God especially the spiritual forces arrayed against it under its arch-enemy, Satan (Eph. 4:7–12; 6:10–18). The land of Nimrod is Babylon (Gn. 10:8–12), the Rome and Mecca of Micah’s pagan world. The mention of Babylon after Assyria supports the date in the book’s heading (1:1). In Micah’s time Babylon was subordinate to Assyria. The later Neo- Babylonian empire destroyed Assyria in 612 BC and was itself destroyed in 539. In the light of the NT the sword symbolizes God’s word ministered in the Holy Spirit.

5:7–9 The remnant rules the nations

7–8 Will be (lit. ‘and it will be’) introduces another prophecy in the sequence of prophecies about the last days (cf. 4:1) and indicates its time of fulfilment after the coming of the Messiah. The remnant (see 4:7) of Jacob, Micah’s term for all Israel (see 1:5), has now become a strong nation in the midst of many (better, ‘mighty’; see 4:2–3) nations, bringing life to believers and death to unbelievers. The similar construction of vs 7 and 8 contrasts the effect among the nations. 7 On the one hand, the remnant is like pervasive and penetrating dew and showers (always signs of life and blessing) which originate mysteriously in the initiative from the LORD in heaven, and do not wait for (better, ‘look expectantly to’) man or linger for (better, ‘or depend on’) mankind to send their refreshment to the earth. 8 On the other hand, the remnant among the nations is like a lion among the beasts of the forest (i.e. surpassing all in pride, prowess and ferocity). It is like a young lion in search of prey among flocks of sheep (i.e. it mauls and mangles and no-one can rescue). This prophecy is fulfilled in the church. Among those being saved God’s people are the fragrance of life, but among those perishing, they are a savour of death (2 Cor. 2:14–16). 9 Micah and/or the remnant respond to the vision with a prayer: ‘Let’ your (singular) hand be lifted up in triumph over ... all your foes (cf. Is. 26:11). None will be exempt when his rule is established over all his creation (cf. 5:4).

5:10–15 God protects his purified kingdom

The great seventh prophecy of hope in chs. 4–5 also refers to that day (see 4:1, 6), the day the remnant under the Messiah conquers the nations. The addition, declares the LORD (see 4:6), guarantees its fulfilment. It refers to the protection of Israel in two ways: the purification of Israel within (10–14) and the punishment of the disobedient nations without (15).

10–14 The prophecy, I will destroy (10–13), is God’s answer to the prayer of v 9. The Hebrew verb behind ‘destroy’ frequently refers to the removal of persons that have violated Israel’s holiness (e.g. ‘cut-off’ in Lv. 17:10; 20:3–6), a measure to preserve Israel in the face of God’s wrath against the unholy. The objects, the works of their own hands, consigned for annihilation from among them (10, 13, 14) threaten Israel’s faith in God: military might (10–11; cf. Dt. 17:16–17), sorcery (12; cf. Dt. 18:9–13) and idolatry (13–14; cf. Dt. 7:5). Isaiah (2:6–8) accuses Israel of placing their confidence in these very things. The military hardware includes the offensive horse-drawn chariots (10) and the defensive cities, all the strongholds (11). 12 The NIV omits after witchcraft ‘from your hand’, a phrase that stresses they are human fabrications. 13 The same point is made with carved images and sacred stones, the stylized representations of the male deity, Baal.

15 Vengeance in the Bible is a legal term signifying that a ruler secures his kingdom by protecting his subjects and punishing their persecutors. The disrespect of the unbelieving nations for his holy kingdom incurs his anger and wrath. Throughout history God has protected his rule against the nations that have not obeyed him, but he will finally execute his protective power at Christ’s second coming (Lk. 18:7–8; 21:22; 2 Thes. 1:8; Rev. 6:10).

6:1–7:20 Third series of prophecies: God forgives the remnant of his sinful people

Listen (plural), addressed to the book’s audience, introduces the third section of the book. What the LORD says invests the section with heavenly authority. For the coherence of this section in the light of the book as a whole see the Introduction.

6:1–8 Israel accused of breaking covenant

This oracle against Israel develops as a complex legal suit. God, the plaintiff, summons Micah, his messenger, to call the mountains as witnesses to the trial (1), and Micah obeys (2a). The rest of the lawsuit unfolds dramatically in the form of a dialogue by use of the keyword what (cf. vs 3, 6, 8).

1–2 The command stand up (singular), gives Micah authority and stresses the urgency of the message. The Hebrew word behind plead case means ‘to make accusation’. Since it is God’s case, not Micah’s (see v 2b), we should read ‘my’ in v 1, not your. As Jacob and Laban erected a stone pillar to serve as a witness to their covenant (Gn. 31:43–47), and the eastern tribes erected a stone altar as witness to their covenant with God (Jos. 22:21–28), so God summoned ‘the heavens and earth’ as a cosmic forum of witnesses to his covenant with Israel (cf. Dt. 4:26). Now, about 700 years later, he summons the mountains (1–2) and the everlasting foundations of the earth (2) as a forum of witnesses to the truthfulness of his case and charge against his people, Israel. Incidentally, the appeal to these silent witnesses could have carried conviction only if the parties assumed that the treaty had been handed down unchanged from generation to generation.

3–5 The plaintiff seizes the initiative. 3 He has not burdened his people, as they implicitly complain, but had dealt so graciously with them at their founding that their only reasonable response should have been a heartfelt commitment to him. After they fall silent to his invitation to answer him (cf. Rom. 3:19), he develops his own accusation in two parts, each introduced wittingly by my people (3–5). 4 The first presents his saving acts at the beginning of their history, namely, God brought [them] up out of Egypt and redeemed (‘liberated’) them from the land of slavery. He also gave them supernatural, godly leadership in the persons of Moses, the founder, Aaron, the high priest, and Miriam, a prophetess and poet (Ex. 15:20–21). Israel’s later lack of leadership is not due to God’s lack of grace and power but Israel’s stubborn heart. 5 The second part presents God’s mighty acts at the end of their formative period, namely, their protection from the demonic political and religious leaders, Balak king of Moab and Balaam son of Beor respectively, and their miraculous journey from Shittim in Transjordan through the swollen Jordan to Gilgal, their first camp in the promised land. These opposites signify all of God’s initial righteous (‘saving’) acts. If God miraculously saved Israel from the affliction of Egypt and Moab, can he not unshackle their descendants from the tyranny of Satan in whatever guise he takes? And can he not do similar deeds for his servants down the ages?

6–7 Perhaps one of Israel’s kings, to judge from the magnificence of his gifts, responded in such a way as to condemn himself. Instead of repenting of his ingratitude and unfaithfulness he tried to gain access to God’s exalted presence through his own good works and ritual, transforming the spiritual covenant (cf. Dt. 6:4–5) into a commercial contract. 6 He hoped to come before the LORD through costly gifts. This unbelieving approach to God’s grace can never satisfy the conscience, and so he escalated the quality and/or quantity of the gift ever higher: burnt offerings, calves a year old (representing the best), thousands of rams (cf. 1 Ki. 3:4; 8:63), ten thousand rivers of [olive] oil, which is otherwise measured in fractions of a litre. He even offered to sacrifice my firstborn, an obscene pagan custom (Lv. 18:21). 8 What God requires is faithfulness to the covenant, which is based on faith in him and expresses itself fundamentally in right living and only secondarily in ritual (see Ex. 20–24; 1 Sa. 15:22; Mt. 5:24). The king’s ignorance of what pleases God is inexcusable, for in the covenant God has shown humankind what is good, a term that summarizes the law’s requirements: to act justly (see ch. 3) and to love mercy (i.e. from the heart, to protect the weak), and to walk humbly (or ‘to walk thoughtfully’ in the light of the covenant’s requirements) with your God.

6:9–16 The covenant curses fulfilled on Jerusalem

This doom oracle consists of an address (9), accusation (10–12) and sentence (13–15). V 16 repeats the accusation (16a) and sentence (16b).

9 The address has two parts. First, Micah commands Listen! [or ‘Hark!’] The LORD is calling to the city (Jerusalem). In an aside to God, Micah adds, to fear your name is wisdom (‘sound judgment’). Secondly, God addresses the people. V 9b may well read: ‘Hear, O tribe and the assembly of the city.’

10–12 The accusation of commercial dishonesty also unfolds in two stages: God, using the first person, directly accuses its citizens of using false measures (10) and weights (11), and then, speaking of the city’s elite in the third person, accuses them of false speech in the courts (12). 10 The first part of the verse says in fact, ‘Shall I forgive the unjust bath’. This was the liquid measure, paralleled here with the ephah (the dry measure), each being a tenth of a homer or 22 litres (half a bushel). If God were to acquit the liars and cheats, he would be an accomplice with them. He upholds righteous weights and measures (Lv. 19:35–36; Dt. 25:13–16; Ezk. 45:10) and considers the short [or scanty] ephah accursed (i.e. it will bring God’s judgment, not blessing).

11 Neither will he acquit a man with dishonest scales and false weights. The unrighteousness on the part of Israel's elite (2:1–2; 3:1–4) had worked its way through the whole nation so that God had to deal with the whole community. 12 Her rich men are violent and are liars (i.e. they abuse the powerless in the courts by false accusations and unjust judgments; see 2:1–2; cf. Pss. 27:12; 55:11; 58:1–2).

13–15 God therefore passes the sentence that matches the crime. 13 The text actually reads, 'As for me, I am going to make you [singular, i.e. the individual sinner] sick', not I have begun. Ruin means 'to devastate physically'. 14 God now specifies the ruining sicknesses: You will eat but not be satisfied; 'you will be stricken with dysentery. You shall come to labour but not bring forth, and even if you bear a child I will give it to the sword.' The disasters threatened in the covenant curses are now being executed (cf. Lv. 26:26; Dt. 28:15, 18). 15 In addition, they will lose their crops, also in accordance with the covenant curses (Lv. 26:16; Dt. 28:40, 51). The repeated curses function as a code to enable Israel to interpret these horrors as coming from God, who had warned them beforehand of the consequences of their abandonment of the covenant.

16 In a summary, God accuses Jerusalem of following the sins of the infamous Omri (1 Ki. 16:25) and his son Ahab who was legendary for his swindling and extortions (1 Ki. 21). Therefore God hands them over to ruin and derision (cf. Dt. 28:25).

7:1–7 Jerusalem's social structures break apart

1 Micah commences his lament with the tell-tale sign of sorrow, What misery is mine! The reason reads as an accusation: there are no up-right officials (1b–4). In an allegory the prophet, who represents God, enters his vineyard in summer (i.e. June) looking for the first ripe cluster of grapes and the early figs from the trees that grow among the vines, but finds none for vandals have stripped it clean. 2 The vineyard is the house of Israel (cf. Is. 5:1–7; Ps. 80:8–16) and the fruit is godly men (i.e. men who keep the covenant). The allegory (1) and its interpretation (2) are linked by none and not one, both rendering the same Hebrew word. Micah now specifies the crimes of all men (i.e. the decadent judges of v 3 who oppress their innocent victims). He likens them to hunters who lie in wait (use underhand practices) and hunt ... with a net (are effectively deadly; cf. 2:1–2; 3:1–3, 9–11). 3 He elaborates the hunting theme. Both hands (the judges and the king) are skilled in doing evil (i.e. in making the deadly net). The ruler and the judge probably mean the magistrates and the powerful (lit. 'the great one'), the corrupt king over them. They not only fail to turn a blind eye to the bribe (Ex. 23:8; Dt. 10:17), but they all conspire together to wring it out of their brothers. 4a The best of them is like a brier ... worse than a thorn hedge. By obstructing justice these stubbornly complacent and indifferent magistrates frustrate and hurt those seeking justice. What irony to call them upright!

4b The lament now abruptly shifts from accusation to judgment. Your watchmen (i.e. look-outs posted on a city's wall to warn of approaching danger; Is. 21:6) are Israel's true prophets who announced a day of judgment (2:6; 3:8; Am. 5:18–20). Because the nation paid no heed to these faithful sentinels (2:6–11; 3:5–6; Is. 30:10; Ho. 9:7–8; Am. 2:12), the day God visits them in judgment has now come (Is. 10:3; Ho. 9:7). The Assyrian invasion will throw the nation into panic and confusion (cf. Is. 22:5). 5–6 Specific illustrations of the confusion, the social anarchy, in the besieged city are now given (cf. Is. 3:4–7). 5 The strongest ties of social solidarity—neighbour and friend (5a), loving wife in your embrace (5b)—will break apart under the strain of the siege. A person must not confide to his most intimate companion how he hopes to cope with the crisis, otherwise the companion will abuse it for his own survival. 6 Indeed, the closest members of his own household will disdainfully rise up as enemies against one another to save their own skins. The coming of Jesus Christ brought the same divisions (Mt. 10:35–39; Lk. 12:53).

7 The prophet swings his song from black lament to bright confidence by But as for me ... Whereas before he watched for judgment (4), now he will watch in hope for the LORD to save him and the righteous remnant. Basing himself squarely on the covenantal promises to Abraham (20; Gn. 17:7, 19; cf. Dt. 30:1–10), Micah will confidently wait for God his Saviour who will hear him.

7:8–20 Victory song: Who is like the remnant's pardoning God?

The hymn which concludes the third series of prophecies and the book falls into four relatively equal stanzas: Zion's faithful confession (8–10); Micah's promise that all nations will find salvation in rebuilt Zion (11–12) followed by world-wide desolation (13); his request that God will again shepherd his people (14), followed by God's answer (15) and Micah's reflection upon the ensuing universal salvation (16–17); and the people's hymn celebrating God's incomparable grace and fidelity to them (18–20).

8 Personified Jerusalem commands her enemy (probably Nineveh; see v 12) to not gloat (i.e. rejoice in a victory). She explains that, though I sit in darkness (the gloomy imprisonment of captivity; Is. 42:6–7; 49:9), the LORD, who has committed himself forever to Israel (see vs 7, 20), will be my light (i.e. deliver her from the dungeon-like captivity). 9 Because her fall is due to her sin, not to God's impotence or her enemy's potency, she is ready to bear the LORD's wrath because it is just and only for a limited time. After it has been paid in full (cf. Is. 40:2), God will plead her case as an advocate, not as a prosecutor (6:1), for she had done no wrong against her enemy. Then Zion will see (or 'gaze on') God's righteousness in fulfilling his covenantal obligations to her. 10 Zion prays, 'Let my enemy see your righteousness, and let her be covered with shame.' Zion's eyes will see (or 'feast on'—the Hebrew is the same as in v 9) her [Nineveh's] downfall.

11–13. The day, repeated three times to signify the same period, is as much a state as a time chosen by God in the near future. It is a day for Zion to rebuild her walls (those of a sheep-pen, not ramparts; cf. 5:11). It is also the day for extending her boundaries so that there will be ample space for all nations to come (13) under the protection of her Shepherd-King. 12 In that day people will come from all over the earth, even from Zion's ancient enemies, Assyria in the north and Egypt in the south (cf. Ps. 87; Heb. 12:22). 13 And then the earth will become desolate. After the elect (composed of Jews and Gentiles) find salvation within Zion, then desolation will come on the earth and its inhabitants as the result of their sinful deeds. The prophecy finds its consummation in the final judgment (2 Thes. 1:6–9; 2 Pet. 3:12; Rev. 20:11–15).

14 So Micah petitions God to shepherd your people, both Jews and Gentiles (Acts 15:16–18; Eph. 1:3–4). That picture is extended in the remainder of the verse: secure protection (staff) and ample provision (feed). Inheritance refers to the ancient and permanent land providing the family with livelihood (see 2:2; cf. Nu. 26:56). Today God gives his elect a permanent source of life in Christ (Jn. 10:28). The elect lives forever by itself in freedom. The compound in a forest, in fertile pasture-lands signifies a 'garden-like forest'. Bashan and Gilead were the first lands conquered by Moses with mighty wonders (Nu. 21:33). Bashan was well known for its stately trees (Is. 2:13; Zc. 11:2) and its well-fed domesticated animals (Dt. 32:14); Gilead was famous for its good pasture-land (Nu 32:1, 26). Micah is petitioning God to restore Israel's original blessings. 15 God promises to answer this prayer according to his will.

16–17 As Micah reflects upon the preceding promises, he realizes that all nations will see God's wonders (15) and be ashamed for risking their honour on powerless false gods. To lay their hands upon their mouths means 'they will shut up', and their ears will become deaf means 'they will turn a deaf ear'. When God performs these wonders, the nations will stop taunting Israel and turn a deaf ear to the vain boasts of others and their empty arguments. 17 The nations will also renounce their power. The vanquished kings will lick dust as they grovel before the LORD. Confronted with his power, they will come trembling out of their old strongholds to worship him.

18 Micah artfully weaves his name, 'Who is like Yah', into the beginning of the people's hymn, Who is a God like you ...? None compares to him who pardons sin [guilt] and forgives ... transgression (see 1:5). Israel's breach of covenant was so great that none, apart from God, would have forgiven it (cf. 1 Tim. 1:15–17). Yet without that forgiveness Micah's ministry would have been pointless. He would have had the satisfaction of venting his spleen, but the people would have been hardened in their sin (cf. Ps. 130:3–4). He now piles up God's benevolent qualities, do not stay angry, show mercy (twice), have compassion and be true. God showed these same qualities when Israel sinned in making the golden calf and Moses asked him to show his glory (Ex. 34:6). 19 On account of his mercy, God will hurl all of his people's iniquities into the depths of the sea so that they no longer threaten Israel's existence, even as he had hurled Pharaoh's army into the sea. 20 These qualities also guarantee that he will be true to keep his covenant he pledged on oath to their fathers in days long ago. All of this is possible because of Jesus Christ, who paid the penalty for his people's sins and is God's 'Amen' to his covenant promises.

NAHUM

Introduction

Nahum the prophet

All we know about Nahum comes from the book itself. He came from Elkosh, but we do not know where this was. At least four different locations have been suggested, from Judah to Assyria! Most commentators assume that he delivered his prophecies in Jerusalem (or at least Judah), but he could perhaps have been one of the people previously deported from Israel to Assyria or scattered among the nations (Je. 23:1–3; Ezk. 11:16; Joel 3:2).

Nahum means ‘consolation, comfort’. The root has a meaning ‘be relieved by taking vengeance’ (Is. 1:24; 57:6), and this would be especially fitting for Nahum. Comfort and relief is brought to God’s people when he takes vengeance on their enemies!

Nahum probably lived shortly before the destruction of the Assyrian Empire which was assured by the fall of Nineveh in 612 BC and which is the event upon which he focuses. He probably prophesied after the sack of Thebes on the Nile in 663 as this seems to be referred to in 3:8. (See the chart ‘The prophets’ in Song of Songs.)

The historical situation

Nineveh was the capital city of Assyria, the most cruel and ruthless nation of the ancient world. The Assyrians terrified their intended victims because not only did they destroy and burn the cities they conquered, they also subjected the inhabitants to various kinds of suffering and humiliation.

One king, Ashurbanipal, boasted in the following terms about some plotters that he had foiled: ‘As for those common men who had spoken derogatory things against my god Asher and had plotted against me, the prince who reveres him, I tore out their tongues and abased them. As a posthumous offering I smashed the rest of the people alive by the very figures of the protective deities between which they had smashed Sennacherib my grandfather. Their cut up flesh I fed to the dogs, swine, jackals, birds, vultures, to the birds of the sky, and to the fishes of the deep pools’.

The Assyrians were the ones who had destroyed Samaria and with it the northern kingdom. In 2 Ki. 17:5 it says, ‘The king of Assyria ... laid siege to it [Samaria] for three years’. We can imagine the people getting hungrier, more desperate and more hopeless, as they looked out on the Assyrian army, an invincible multitude. They also knew that these soldiers were completely ruthless. They would flay people alive—strip the skin off them and drag them off with hooks in their flesh. And if the people didn’t already know what their enemies were capable of, the Assyrians would have reminded them every day (cf. the speech of the Assyrian field commander to Hezekiah in Is. 26:4–10). In the British Museum there are stone carvings taken from Nineveh which show how the Assyrians dealt with conquered cities. One shows a great heap of heads. The picture of the siege of Lachish shows three men impaled on wooden stakes outside the city, a grisly visual aid to those who were still shut up inside. Captives were often mutilated by cutting off hands, feet, noses, ears or tongues. A relief from Khorsabad shows Assyrian chariots driving over mutilated bodies. Infants were often dashed in pieces (Na. 3:10; cf. Ps. 137:9). Women might be taken as spoil and pregnant women were usually disembowelled.

Having conquered a city, the Assyrians would take steps to see that they did not have any more trouble there in future. So, when Samaria fell in 721 BC 27,000 were exiled and a comparable number of deportees from other places was brought in. This destroyed the unity and even identity of the nation and made it very difficult to organize resistance in future.

We can see why people were (and still are) worried about the idea that God would allow Assyrians to carry out judgment on his behalf. Nevertheless, the Bible says in several places that the Assyrians were his instruments of judgment.

Nahum comes long after the fall of Samaria. The city of Nineveh fell in 612 BC, and Nahum is to be placed shortly before this. Ninety years is a long time to wait for the judgment of an evil nation. Incidentally, Jonah carried out his ministry to Nineveh quite some time before 721. He is mentioned in 2 Ki. 14:25 (which refers to the reign of Jeroboam II, 782–753) as having prophesied previously.

Though God's judgment may be delayed, it is never forgotten; he cares passionately about right and wrong. The book of Nahum makes that abundantly clear.

The message of Nahum

Nahum is a passionate little book with one main message: the LORD brings punishment upon Assyria because of their gross sin. The way that Nahum expresses his message has caused distress to some sensitive commentators! The tone is set at the outset (1:2) where it says literally, 'The LORD is jealous and avenging, avenging and a lord of wrath, taking vengeance on his adversaries, keeping [it] with respect to his enemies'.

The word translated 'jealous' comes from a root meaning 'ardour, zeal, jealousy'. It can indicate jealousy in a wrong sense or envy (Gn. 26:14; 30:1; 37:11; Ps. 73:3), but most often it means to be justifiably jealous (e.g. Nu. 5:14, 30) or to have a right zeal (e.g. Nu. 11:29; 25:11). The words translated 'avenging, takes vengeance' come from a root which can be used in a bad sense i.e. to entertain vengeful feelings against a neighbour. This is forbidden in Lv. 19:18 and contrasted with love, 'Do not seek revenge or bear a grudge against one of your people, but love your neighbour as yourself.' Usually, however, as here, it is used of vengeance that is right and just (Nu. 31:2–3; Dt. 32:43). 'Filled with wrath' indicates heat, rage, burning anger and fury (Gn. 27:44–45; Dn. 8:6).

So, the book of Nahum is a passionate book. The God of the Bible is not cool, remote and imperturbable like the Greek philosophical ideal. He looks down upon humankind, sees their wickedness and says in effect, 'How dare you behave in my world like this? I made you, and you have no life, no right of existence without me, no future unless you are in harmony with me. Whatever is wrong in the world has got to be put right—and I'll see that it is.'

This sort of idea does not go down well with the average educated person today, and the book of Nahum provides a powerful reminder to us that God cares about his world, and will judge sin. Of course, we need to remind ourselves that God's passion is not like our passion, his anger is not like our anger. It is righteous and pure; 1:3 provides the corrective we need, 'The LORD is slow to anger and great in power'. The prophet then returns, however, to his original emphasis: 'The LORD will not leave the guilty unpunished'.

Commentary

1:1 The title

V 1 describes the whole book as an oracle or ‘burden’. See the note on Zc. 9:1. The book of the vision implies at least that the prophet saw things which were not apparent to the natural physical eye. On Nineveh and Elkosh see the Introduction above.

1:2–8 A hymn to the Lord

2–3a These verses tell us that God is a God who takes vengeance, but only in accordance with what is right. He is patient and punishes unwillingly, but he will not let iniquity go by the board. It has to be dealt with (see on the book's message above). God is jealous for his name. The truth of these things is confirmed in the NT also (e.g. Mt. 7:21–27; Mk. 11:15–17; Rom. 1:18–32; Rev. 2–3).

3b–6 These verses show God's power over all the earth. They could easily be included in the Psalter as a psalm of praise to the Lord. They still have Nahum's main concern strongly to the fore. We know from Isaiah that the Assyrians attributed their success over the nations to their own power and might and to their own gods (Is. 10:12–18; cf. Zp. 2:13–15). Nahum describes God in relation to various impressive and frightening natural phenomena. Compared to this the Assyrians and their gods are completely insignificant.

V 6 contains four words for anger (fierce anger is lit. '[burning-]anger of his anger'!). So this repetition marks strong emphasis, as in vs 2–3a.

The people of Nahum's day (unless they were quite rich and important) built their houses out of sun-dried mud bricks, with a roof made of wooden beams and twigs, covered with a layer of clay and whitewash. In a storm they would be aware of their smallness in the face of nature's power. And yet, says Nahum, the Lord's way is in the whirlwind and storm; he is quite at home there, that's where he walks about. The clouds which seem so vast to us, are the dust of his feet. The Israelites were not a sea-going people, and the sea was something that inspired awe. With all our knowledge and technology, ships are still lost at sea. But God rebukes the sea and dries it up.

There are at least two allusions which we should note here. There is a reference back to the dividing of the Red Sea to allow the Israelites to escape (and to drown the Egyptians who tried to stop them) and also to the crossing of the River Jordan when Joshua led the people of Israel over into Canaan. In both cases the water was held back by God to allow the people to cross. When Jesus stilled the waves on Lake Galilee (which was and is famous for its fierce and unpredictable storms) he was indirectly showing his deity (Mk. 4:35–41). The disciples responded, 'Who is this? Even the wind and the waves obey him!'. Who could it be but the LORD, Yahweh himself?

Bashan and Carmel (4), together with Lebanon, were the most luxuriantly wooded areas of Palestine. Lebanon was famous for its mighty, invincible trees. But before the Lord its bloom fades. The solid enduring mountains quake before him (5). This suggests the idea of trembling in fear as well as vibrating (cf. Ezk. 12:18). The earth is laid waste before him, the world and all who live in it. Nahum was probably thinking of the results of some of the storms, and possibly floods, that he had seen or heard of.

7–8 Here we have something similar to v 3a: a balancing statement about God's goodness, and a quick return to the main theme. The LORD is good, a refuge in times of trouble. He cares for [lit. 'knows'] those who trust in him. Quite often in the OT the word 'know' signifies not just head knowledge, but a concern to take care of something (e.g. Ex. 33:12; Ps. 103:13–14). The NIV introduces Nineveh into the verse (as also in 1:11, 14; 2:1). The prophet himself does not mention the name until 2:8, possibly to produce questioning and tension in his hearers, and a greater impact when the name is finally revealed.

1:9–15 Announcement of judgment for Assyria and salvation for Judah

1:9–11 Judgment for plotters

9 Here we have a new beginning. Having made the point at some length that it's good to be on God's side and not against him, Nahum turns to address the enemies (as the NIV mg.): 'What do you foes plot against the Lord? He will make a full end; trouble will not arise a second time.' Note that it would not have been easy for first-time hearers to work out who Nahum was referring to. Nineveh has not been mentioned yet (not until 2:8) and Judah is not referred to directly until v 15.

10 This verse is very difficult to translate. If the NIV is right, we have three different pictures of distress: entangled among thorns and unable to move; staggering from too much wine and unable to control or defend oneself, and with a hangover still to come (cf. Ps. 107:27; Pr. 23:29–35; Is. 29:9); and consumed ['burnt up'] in a moment. An alternative possibility is: 'For though they be like tangled thorns, and be drenched as it were in their drink, they shall be devoured utterly as dry stubble.' In other words, although they seem to be drenched and unburnable, in the Lord's fire they will certainly burn up. 11 This is thought to be a reference to Sennacherib, the Assyrian king who set himself up against the Lord when he destroyed 46 cities of Judah and besieged Jerusalem in 701 BC.

1:12–14 Contrasting futures for Judah and Assyria

12–13 Here we find the first direct address to Judah (the NIV adds O Judah to make the point clear). There are frequent changes in the person addressed in Hebrew prophecy. The LORD says that, however strong the Assyrians may be, they will be cut off and pass away ... and I will afflict you [Judah] no more. Judah's yoke (the mark of servitude) and shackles (the sign of captivity) will be broken. 14 The prophet again turns to Nineveh/Assyria saying, The LORD has given a command concerning you. This emphasizes the fact that this is a firm decision. You will have no descendants to bear your name is lit. 'No more of your name will be sown'. It was regarded as a great curse for a line to be cut off (cf. Ps. 37:22; 28–38; Is. 48:19). The Lord will cut off both wooden (carved) and metal (cast) images from the Assyrians' temple, and they will know that their gods are nothing. Vile means here, 'trifling, of no account'.

It is worth asking about today's equivalent of the Assyrians' gods who were supposed to give them desirable things like power, security, riches and luxury. For some it might be their business corporation which gives great reward to those who give unquestioning obedience and remain useful, but ruin to those who step out of line. Whatever apparently powerful false gods we face, it is good to know that their power is transient and illusory, and that the Lord alone is God over all.

1:15 The herald brings good news

This verse forms a transition from a general announcement of God's purposes to a description of the fate of Nineveh. It is similar to the better known verse in Is. 52:7 (Is. 40:9 also has some similarities). The NT alludes to it in Acts 10:36 and Rom. 10:15. It expresses in poetic form the fact that victory has been achieved. The feet belong to the herald who brings good news: the battle is won, oppression is ended and peace can now be established. Celebrate your festivals, O Judah means enjoy the victory celebrations at which thank offerings would have been sacrificed and the worshippers would have eaten the meat. Fulfil your vows refers to those that were common before going to battle. Probably the best known, and certainly the stupidest, was Jephthah's vow (Jdg. 11:30–31).

2:1–3:19 The fall of Nineveh: description and interpretation

2:1–12 gives a vivid but chaotic description of the Ninevites desperately fighting to survive an attack and failing. They suffer anguish and their hearts fail as the enemy plunders their city. V 13 picks up two of the items mentioned in the preceding verses: the ‘chariots’ which have dashed about trying to save the city wall be burnt (4) and the ‘young lions’ who have received the prey previously in their den will be cut off by the sword and their supply of food removed (11–12).

The reason for this outcome is stated at the beginning of v 13: ‘Behold, I am against you ...’. The same pattern of description-plus-oracle occurs again in the following verses. 3:1–4 describes the bloody city and in 3:5 the Lord says again, ‘Behold, I am against you ...’. Direct address to Nineveh continues to the end of the chapter (and the book). This sort of repeating pattern is often found in Hebrew literature. Many scholars appreciate it as an effective way of bringing out some emphasis.

2:1–13 The death throes of Nineveh

Here we find not a chronological sequence of events, but a series of little cameos which conjure up the picture of Nineveh in its last days.

Nineveh is addressed directly (the NIV supplies the name from the context; see v 8). An attacker (lit. ‘the scatterer’) advances against you refers to Babylon, which was conquered by Assyria. Assyria, which had scattered so many other nations, is now to be scattered itself. Guard the fortress is lit. ‘Guard the ramparts or siege-works’. The rampart was the huge pile of earth built up outside the city wall in order to get the besieging troops over the wall. So we should expect the besieging troops to be manning it. It is possible, however, that it refers to the ramp inside the wall. As the ramp outside the wall got bigger, the people inside the city built up the inside. The besiegers would eventually win because they had more material and more space to build up a higher wall. In any case, this is a way of depicting furious activity on both sides. The attackers building higher and higher outside, watching that no-one escaped over the top, preparing for the final push to victory that they now smelt. And the defenders, weak through lack of food and water, desperately summoning their last reserves of strength to try and delay the final defeat, humiliation and torture.

2 This verse is in brackets. It gives the reason why all this is happening: because the LORD will restore the splendour of Jacob like the splendour of Israel and therefore its oppressor must be judged. It is possible that this should be translated: ‘the LORD is turning away the pride of Israel’, which could mean that there is no longer any need for punishment and Nineveh may be dispensed with.

3–5 The prophet now returns to the description of the siege. There are two ways of understanding this. The first is to take vs 3–4 as referring to the Babylonians who are a terrifying sight. They are either inside Nineveh already, or else dash about in the streets and squares of the suburbs outside the walls. In v 5b they go to the wall under the cover of their movable shelter (protective shield) in order to undermine the foundations. V 5a may be a rather abrupt reference to the action of the Assyrian commander inside Nineveh, or else stumble on their way simply indicates the haste of the attackers to reach the wall and finish the job. Alternatively, vs 3–5 may be a description of the confusion of the Ninevites inside the walls, rushing to the place of greatest danger. The chariots described in vs 3–4 look impressive, but they are all in confusion.

6 The river gates would naturally refer to the points at which the various canals around Nineveh entered the city. This may refer in some way to the role of the river in the city’s downfall. The river, which formed a mighty protection for the city, became an enemy. Collapses is lit. 'melts' and could mean 'is dismayed'. 7 The Hebrew is obscure but the overall meaning of vs 7–12 is clear: the people of the city are carried away into exile; even the slave girls moan their fate; Nineveh's riches are plundered; and people are terrified at what may happen to them at the hands of the Babylonians.

11–12 Nineveh is presented as a lions' den into which the lion (Assyria) brought the results of his rampaging among the nations. The lion family had dwelt safely and eaten well in their lair, but what now? The reason for Nineveh's downfall can be stated very simply: 'I am against you,' declares the LORD Almighty. The verse then recaps on the two main images of the preceding description: defeat in battle and destruction of the lions. The messengers would be those sent out to demand surrender and/or tribute from the nations (cf. 2 Ki 18:19–35; 19:8–14). This verse would still make us tremble. 'If God is for us, who can be against us?' (Rom. 8:31). But if God is against us, what then? What use is any ally?

3:1–4 Woe to Nineveh

1 Woe was a cry that the prophets often proclaimed against those whom the Lord was to judge. Its primary use was probably as a lament for the dead, and it always indicates a serious calamity of some kind. The city of blood is obviously Nineveh, which was responsible for much shed blood. We can understand the reference to plunder and victims which are connected also with battle and killing. Why are lies mentioned? Probably because lying is one of the characteristics of those who oppose the Lord, the God of truth. Idols are regarded as false, deceitful and lying. This is a reminder and a warning to the reader that lying is much more serious than our modern society would acknowledge.

2–4 The prophet continues with a vivid but ambiguous description of a battle (2–3). It could be a description of Assyria attacking other nations because of its wanton lust (4). Alternatively, it could be a description of Assyria under attack as a judgment for its wanton lust. Either way, v 5 continues to give the judgment due to it. The term wanton lust or 'whoredoms' is used many times of Israel, indicating infidelity to Yahweh. When applied to political alliances it signified both trusting in other powers and (hence) distrusting God. Such foreign policy led to corruption of the worship of the Lord under the influence of these other nations, who seemed to the people to have powerful gods and attractive customs. The reference to sorceries signifies possibly literal witchcraft or sorcery, or possibly the art of 'statecraft and diplomacy' which acts on the nations like a spell.

3:5–19 'I am against you,' declares the LORD Almighty

We noted this spine-chilling statement in 2:13. Here it introduces an extended address to Nineveh, mixing together description of judgment and reasons for the judgment.

6–7 I will lift your skirts over your face ... show the nations your nakedness indicates disgrace and an appropriate punishment for pride. As the harlot 'uncovers her nakedness' (a phrase meaning sexual intercourse in places like Lv. 18:6–23) in plying her trade, so the punishment involves uncovering the 'nakedness' of Nineveh. The reference may be to the practice of exposing a harlot or adulteress (Ezk. 16:37–41; cf. also Is. 20:2–4; Je. 13:22, 26). I will pelt you with filth ... treat you with contempt ... make you a spectacle (6) all emphasizes that as Nineveh showed no pity, no-one will pity her. The rhetorical questions in v 7 imply that there will be no-one to mourn for or comfort Nineveh.

8–9 These verses describe the glory of Thebes (lit. ‘No-of-Amon’) a city that was formerly great but perished. Amon was the name of the god worshipped in Thebes, to whom the city was reckoned to belong. Are you better? means ‘Is there any reason why you should fare any better?’ Thebes was the most famous city in Egypt from 1580–1205 BC. It was adorned with magnificent monuments and even today its ruins are a wonder. On the eastern part of the Nile was the city of the living; over on the west was a huge necropolis, or city of tombs and monuments to the dead. There was also a large artificial harbour. The Nile apparently divides into four channels at low water at this point, which would explain the literal meaning of the next part of the verse: ‘Thebes that sat among the streams/channels, water round about her’. Thebes had been the centre of a great empire stretching from N. Syria to Nubia, but it perished (10); so will Nineveh (11).

10–11 Her infants were dashed to pieces. This barbarous practice is referred to in 2 Ki. 8:12; Is. 13:16 and Ho. 13:16. Children were taken hold of and their heads dashed against a wall or on stones. The object was to exterminate the whole population, and this was also the reason for ripping open pregnant women (cf. Am. 1:13). You too will become drunk (11). The drunken man staggers around in a bewildered state, helplessly and defencelessly. Unable to fight, the people of Nineveh will try to hide and find refuge somewhere.

12–18 Several pictures follow in these verses. The fortresses are like figtrees laden with ripe fruit (12). A shake of the tree will make the figs fall off—right into the mouth of the eater. The people of Nineveh are just as vulnerable. The soldiers are like women (13). Not like women in the modern armies of the world, physically strong and trained to fight, but like the women of the time who had never been expected to be involved in battle and would be untrained and defenceless. The gates ... are wide open—they no longer offer any protection from foes.

Nineveh is compared to a well-defended city under siege (14–15a). They have water, their defences are strong, their breaches are repaired. But then fire burns them up and the sword cuts them down. The Assyrian guards and officials are said to be like locusts (15b–17). They seem to be everywhere and then suddenly they are gone. There is a similarity to the promise to Abraham (Gn. 15:5; 22:17). Although the Assyrians seem to be as successful as the descendants of Abraham, it is only God’s covenant that guarantees continuing success. The shepherds are said to be asleep (i.e. leaders are dead) and they are therefore unable to gather the scattered sheep of the Assyrians.

19 The final word is that there will be no lessening of the hurt, no sympathy for Assyria. Rather, there will be rejoicing on the part of all who hear of Nineveh’s downfall, because everyone has experienced her unceasing evil. (See Ezk. 25:6 for the expression ‘clap the hands’ as a malevolent gesture associated with rejoicing over suffering.) There will be no sorrow when evil is finally destroyed. God’s judgment is seen to be absolutely right. There is no element of regret or failure. This is quite a difficult thing for us to take in. How could it be that many people will end up in hell and there be no sorrow about it? Of course there will be sorrow—as is portrayed in the picture of weeping for Babylon in Rev. 18 (which is replaced by rejoicing in Rev. 19). All the effects of evil will eventually vanish.

So the book of Nahum tells us in very straight terms that evil will be punished. It warns us about our own sin, and it encourages us when we are oppressed by great evils by reminding us that God will have the last word. We need this message bringing home to us at times when our persecutors ‘increase like the locust’, or on the other hand, at times when we think we are getting away with behaviour which is not strictly honouring to God. The book may have a limited scope, but its message is a vital one.

HABAKKUK

Introduction

Who was Habakkuk?

Habakkuk is a shadowy figure, with neither parentage nor time indicated in the prophecy. Only his role as prophet, an intermediary between Yahweh and Israel, is given. His name is apparently Hebrew but reflects the influence of the Mesopotamians, who ruled over Israel from the ninth to the sixth century BC. In their Akkadian language his name means a plant or fruit tree.

In later Jewish tradition of the apocryphal ‘Daniel, Bel and the Snake’, Habakkuk brings Daniel food in the lions’ den. The musical notation and the form of the psalm in Hab. 3 have suggested he was a Levite, which was a tribe associated with music (Ezr. 3:10; Ne. 12:27). This is supported by one manuscript which identifies his father as Jesus, a Levite. Others suggest he was an official court or temple prophet. All suggestions are speculative, with no compelling evidence for any of them.

While Habakkuk’s identity is in doubt, his character is clear. A sincere, devoted follower of Yahweh, he not only submitted himself to his Lord’s will, but also confronted that same Lord when he felt God was ignoring his own promises. Like Job, Habakkuk does not hesitate to question God, in a form of literature called a ‘theodicy’. He questions God for different reasons, however. Where Job maintains his innocence, asking why, in the light of it, he is punished, Habakkuk has the opposite question—since the wicked are clearly not innocent, why are they not punished, even though they are unjustly treating the righteous? Not praying for relief from suffering (cf. Pss. 10; 12 etc.), he asks why judgment does not fall.

Habakkuk’s questioning does not lessen his faith in God, with whom he enjoys a personal bond (1:12). He is aware of the awesome power of the King and Creator of the universe (3:16), but he also knows this one’s care for him (3:17–18). Habakkuk the prophet teaches us that questioning God is acceptable; it is refusing to trust God that causes our downfall.

The historical setting

No date for these prophecies is given, though the events referred to can be dated. Some have suggested a composition as late as the second century BC, but the necessity of rewriting the text of 1:6 to support this proposal tells strongly against it. As it now stands, 1:6 anticipates the impending invasion of the Babylonians. The nation previously ruling over Israel was Assyria, whose capital Nineveh fell to the Babylonians in 612 BC. They consolidated their hold, establishing the Neo-Babylonian Empire by defeating an alliance headed by Egypt at Carchemish in Syria in 609 BC (Je. 46:2). The Babylonians finally attacked Jerusalem, sacking it and destroying the temple in 587 BC. Since the prophet anticipates this event in the text, it was apparently written, or the message given, before then. Babylon’s own downfall at the hand of Cyrus, the Persian king, in 539 BC is also anticipated. (See the chart ‘The prophets’ in Song of Songs.)

The book and its message

The prophecy divides into two sections: a dialogue with God (chs. 1–2) and a hymn of praise (ch. 3). The dialogue comprises two queries by Habakkuk to God, each with his response. The first concerns God’s slowness in punishing the wicked among his chosen people (1:2–4). Does he allow sin? God responds that the Babylonians are soon to bring judgment on the wrongdoers (1:5–11), an apparent reference to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 587 BC. This answer does not allay Habakkuk’s perplexity, however, since the cure seems to be too extreme for the disease. While the wicked of Israel are bad, the ferociously cruel and inhumane Babylonians are even worse. Surely there is disproportion between Israel’s wrongdoings and God’s punishment (1:12–17). God shows that this is not the end, however. His people deserve punishment, but Babylon is not without blame, since its barbarity will also come under God’s judgment (2:2–20), a reference to the Persian conquest of the area in 539 BC.

A sharp contrast is drawn between the arrogant, misguided Babylonians and those within Israel who act justly (2:4). This verse, especially its second half, is undoubtedly the most familiar in the book. This is not due to familiarity with Habakkuk, but rather to its quotation in various forms in Hebrews (10:38) and by Paul (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11). Grappling with the interpretation of this verse led Martin Luther to question the prevailing doctrine of justification, ultimately precipitating the Protestant Reformation.

Seeing God as just, contrary to what might at first glance be the case, in ch. 3 Habakkuk praises him for his provision, knowing that he can put his trust in him (3:17–18). The place of the third chapter within the book has posed a problem. It has its own psalm-like heading and conclusion (3:1, 19), possibly indicating that at one time it had an independent existence. The commentary on Habakkuk from Qumran discusses the first two chapters, but not the third, suggesting its later inclusion. The argument is not compelling, however, since the chapter is included in the LXX and other early texts. Whether the prophet composed the hymn himself or adapted it from some earlier source, it functions beautifully in its canonical context to express Habakkuk’s relationship to his God, and the book can only be read and fully appreciated if it is left intact.

In some ways, Habakkuk’s role and message is the opposite of that normally found among prophets. Instead of chiding Israel on God’s behalf, he confronts God himself, demanding an account of his actions, or lack of them. The covenant at Mt. Sinai was between two parties, God and Israel, and neither can ignore his obligations. Habakkuk reminds God of the promised curses should Israel renege on her duties (Dt. 28:15–68), curses which seem a long time coming. He is confident that God will hear his prayers and act mightily towards Israel and Babylon. He is so aware of the justice of God that, even with no response, even if God did not bless his people in general, or Habakkuk in particular, he is still worthy of praise.

Habakkuk for today

Many view questioning God as sinful, but Habakkuk and Job show this is not so. Rough passages in life can produce honest doubt and perplexity, and God condemns neither Job nor Habakkuk for expressing these doubts. Only in open dialogue are misunderstandings resolved and differences righted. Even today it is better to express vexation than to let it fester, erupting into bitterness. While an answer might not come immediately (2:1), or might itself cause consternation (1:12–17), God does not ban honest questioning.

God already knows the beginning from the end (Is. 46:10). He does not act in secrecy, but reveals himself to inquiring believers (Am. 3:7). It is important to address the great and awesome God with the respect due him (Hab. 3:16), but one may still address him. Comfort awaits the doubter, questioner or sufferer because part of what God is about involves salvation and help for his own (3:19). We also, like Habakkuk, expect his response to our questions and needs, not only because he met with Habakkuk in the first millennium before Christ (3:3–15), but also because he has already met us in our own personal past approaching the third millenium after Christ, and will do so again. Whether the problem arises from the acts of national entities, as Habakkuk’s did, or because of individual wrongdoing, God is there.

Commentary

1:1 Title

In one of the shortest prophetic introductions, Habakkuk, known in the Bible only here, is a prophet, a spokesman from God. God is not specifically mentioned (cf. Jon. 1:1; Mi. 1:1; Zp. 1:1; Mal. 1:1), but an oracle in this context indicates a prophetic message from God (cf. e.g. Ezk. 12:10; Na. 1:1). Not necessarily an oral message, this is rather a more general revelation, received by the prophet in a vision (cf. Mi. 1:1).

1:2–2:20 Dialogue with God

Unlike other prophets who brought God’s messages to the people, Habakkuk addresses God himself in the form of two questions, to which God responds.

1:2–4 Problem: why is wickedness unpunished?

In a traditional lament form, the prophet asks God how long he must plead his cause before he answers (cf. Ps. 13:1–2). Is God able or willing to save him from oppressive violence? Habakkuk, like Job, is not hesitant to question God if his theological understanding of him and his ways does not correspond with experienced reality.

Misfortune severely befalls God’s servant in a string of unpleasant synonyms. What is particularly vexing to the writer is not the misfortune, but its source. Usually external foes, personal or national enemies, are the source of the woe, but here the source is internal, the wicked, unrepentant element within Israel itself. While some propose the Assyrians as the wicked, fitting the prophecy’s historical context, an alternative explains the paralysis of the law which is rampant. This regulating influence came to God’s own people to order society (Ex. 18:16, 20; Is. 2:3), and Assyria was not subject to its guidance. Now in Israel justice, rather than being a hallmark of godly living (Am. 5:24), is noticeably absent or, even more serious, is perverted.

In Habbakkuk’s day, as also today, great problems of injustice can be found among God’s people. Rather than condoning sin, or asking that it be ignored, the prophet calls for punishment as required by God's own covenant. While the evil of pagan neighbours needs to be confronted, God's people today, as in Habakkuk's time, are too tolerant of things among themselves which are explicitly contrary to God's will as revealed in Scripture and creation. While seeking to restore the sinner, too often we condone the sin, or at least seek to reduce the severity of its negative consequences. A lack of confrontation, rather than restoring the wrongdoer, tacitly gives permission to continue in the sin (cf. 1 Cor. 5). A child of God is called to withstand public wrongdoing, whether corporate, social or political, but the confrontation is hollow if evil is unchecked within the believing community. There is even now a need for prophets who do not espouse 'safe sin', but insist rather that sin be eradicated.

1:5–11 Response: coming judgment on the wicked

Habakkuk's plea for justice will be answered soon, even in his own days, and the response will be astounding. It will take place among the nations. The LXX, by altering one Hebrew letter, has here 'scorners; traitors'. The incredulity of the writer arises from the identity of God's instrument of punishment as the Babylonians. Known for their impulsive ferocity, they will completely dispossess everyone.

Habakkuk's problem with the Babylonians is twofold. They are an arrogant people, not taking guidance from others or fearing military opposition. They seek their own honour, following their own law. Wielding mighty offensive forces, their cavalry compares to beasts and birds known for ferocity, voracity and speed. These two elements, pride and ferocity, are integral to the self-identity of these people, since they worship their own power.

1:12–17 Problem: isn't the medicine worse than the disease?

Rather than rejoicing in God's response to his psalm of lament, Habakkuk takes up another such psalm. He asks how, in the light of his character of holiness and justice, God can tolerate a punishment which itself seems unjust.

Habakkuk starts from the foundational belief that God is not only holy and eternal, but also covenantally related to his people Israel. This is apparent from the use of his personal, covenantal name Yahweh (Ex. 6:2–8), the LORD. The appellation my God shows not only that he is personally close to the writer, but also an objective deity who exists apart from his people. This is in stark contrast to the Babylonians, whose object of veneration does not exist beyond themselves, but is rather their own military power (11). God is the unshakeable Rock (cf. Dt. 32:18) to Habakkuk. Even though questioning the choice of this wicked nation to punish and to judge God's own people, he does not question that God has a reason. He is ready to discuss the issue, confident that God does ultimately seek to preserve his covenant people for himself.

The theological problem facing Habakkuk is how a holy God, one who is pure in all things and completely separate from sin, can tolerate wrong and treachery as practised by the Babylonian instruments of his punishment (13). While the sinful in Israel are wicked (4), in comparison they are eclipsed by the even greater perversity of Babylon. Beside Babylon, sinful Israel can be called righteous, here a relative rather than an absolute term. They are so far removed from the standards expected of God that the prophet can only express wonder that he can even look at them.

Habakkuk is bold enough not only to confront God regarding his actions, but to blame him for dehumanizing humanity (14–17). God originally created people in his own image (Gn. 1:26; 5:1) and they were the pinnacle of his creation. Now he metaphorically degrades them into lesser creatures, fish and pre-human crawling things (cf. Gn. 1:26–28). If God deprives Israel of humanity, Babylon cannot be condemned for now treating them as objects of sport, fish for the net and hook. They even worship the tools of their destructive craft since they bring their succulent repast—the flesh of their captives. Can this blasphemy and cruelty continue unchecked?

It is still a perversion when people are dehumanized for either self-gratification or economic advantage. Worship of the ‘bottom-line’, of increasing revenue no matter what the cost in terms of human dignity, can be even more invidious today than the overt Babylonian barbarity.

2:1 Awaiting a response

Habakkuk is concerned that Yahweh should speedily respond to his queries, so he will take up a position at watch like a soldier (cf. Is. 21:8; Ezk. 33:7). His expected vigilance, one role of a prophet, is in two directions, towards God (cf. 1:2) and also towards himself. He is immediately concerned with God’s response, but he also needs to know how he himself will react to God’s new revelation. Rather than fearing God’s anger towards an impudent doubter, Habakkuk waits patiently for a response which he knows will come.

2:2–20 Response: coming judgment on the wicked

God does not leave his prophet in despair; in his justice, he also holds Babylon responsible for their excesses. He reveals them in five taunt songs against Babylon.

2:2–5 A vision written. Habakkuk’s faith in God is justified when God responds to his perplexity. This shows that God considers honest questions. The revelation is not just for Habakkuk’s comfort, however, but for all who ultimately suffer at the hand of Babylon. The good news of final deliverance is to be placarded in such a way as to be plainly visible to passersby. The phrase translated herald is obscure, either referring to anyone passing being able to read the notice even if they are hurrying (NRSV) and then passing the news on by word of mouth, or to a professional runner or herald whose role is to broadcast such a report. In either case, the news will spread, even if the announced judgment may not be immediately forthcoming. In fact, God will move in his own appointed time. All history is in God’s hands, moving inexorably towards the climactic day of the Lord. Faith in God compels one not to chafe at apparent delays, because they are illusory. God’s promises will most certainly come (2 Pet. 3:3–9) at his own time. God will deliver his people, ultimately through a personal deliverer, who could be referred to in one possible reading of the text (cf. the NIV mg.), though a more general, unspecified deliverance, with the revelation coming true, is the most common understanding of the passage.

Habakkuk is told to record his message on tablets, the ordinary medium of writing in Babylonia. They were made of clay (which when baked became like stone), ivory or wood. These tablets would be enduring reminders that God’s word would ultimately be realized.

The part of Habakkuk’s prophecy which comprises the message of hope is not indicated, but possibly it is this whole book in some form. Alternatively, it could simply refer to the message of the next two verses, to which the prophet emphatically draws attention.

In the best known passage in Habakkuk, the prophet draws a multifaceted contrast between the just and the wicked (4–5). The latter are unnamed, simply referred to as he. The reference to capture and other evils suggest that Babylon is meant. The contrast highlights the actions and the end of the two parties. The arrogant Babylonians are puffed up with pride. Drunk on the spoils of conquest (cf. 1 Sa. 30:16) and rapacious, insatiable greed, they have abandoned common norms of decency and moral integrity. The habitual nature of this intoxication is shown by the Hebrew verb form used in v 5.

In contrast to the perverse and the falsely proud is the righteous (cf. 1:4, 13), one who is upright. His deeds conform to God's revealed will, and they are a credit to him and a model to the world. The Hebrew word has a breadth of meaning, including the status of being justified, vindicated before God himself (cf. Is. 53:11). The righteous in Judah will not only act uprightly, their righteousness will be acknowledged by God.

Life for the upright is directed by his faith, a stark contrast to the greed controlling the wicked. This word also has a breadth of usage, from trusting belief in human beings (Ex. 19:9) or God and his promises (Gn. 15:6) to a trust which motivates one to obedience, being trustworthy or faithful in conduct (2 Ki. 12:15), even to showing perseverance in times of testing. The latter two uses, the most common for our word, are better translated 'faithfulness' (see the NIV mg.), or even 'integrity'. Both of these show a close correspondence between a commitment and actually carrying it out in action.

The end of each party is also contrasted. Faithfulness will bring life to the righteous. This is not simply physical existence, in contrast to the Babylonians who soon will fall. Special blessing is associated with the word in Dt. 30:19, where the life promised to Israel is associated with the land, which is now threatened by Babylon. Israel's life and land will endure, while those of her mighty enemy will perish.

This text became well-known due to its citation in theologically significant NT passages (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38). The concept found here regarding faith as the means of justification, pricked Martin Luther to the quick, thus launching the Protestant Reformation.

The NT's shades of meaning have been influenced by their use of the LXX rather than the Hebrew text. Paul in Rom. 1:17 expresses the result of faith, with the Greek emphasis on intellectual commitment, which leads to righteousness. This is the first step into God's kingdom—justification in God's eyes through belief in the gospel of his Son (cf. Rom. 3:22; 5:1). Gal. 3:11 contrasts obedience to God as a legalistic requirement which cannot justify anyone to a faithful commitment to him resulting in the unearned gift of life. Heb. 10:38 brings out the force of the call to persevere, living in faithful obedience to God's will in times of personal trial. It adopts a possible Messianic reading of the LXX ('my righteous one'). Another LXX reading speaks of God's faithfulness, which could also be the reading of the Habakkuk passage. God's people are urged to endure faithfully through the Babylonian oppression, for life will come, and God himself will be faithful to bring his message of deliverance and hope (2:2–3) to fruition. Some suggest that the prophet himself provides a commentary on faithful trust in ch. 3, especially in vs 16–19.

2:6–20 Five taunts against Babylon. 6–8 Woe sayings often characterize funeral dirges (cf. 1 Ki. 13:30), but here the form is used ironically, since an Israelite prophet would not be terribly concerned about the impending downfall of an enemy oppressing his people. Habakkuk's faith in God is evident in his belief that God will prevail. The exact object of the oracles is unclear. The Babylonians would fit the immediate literary context, and the Assyrians would fit the historical context of the time of writing the prophecies. Either of these were, in their heyday, a seemingly invincible world power. Assyria was soundly defeated by Babylonia in 605 BC, while Babylon itself came to an end in 539 BC, defeated by the Persians. The prophet is not alone in taking up these taunts, but is joined in them by all those whom the aggressors had exploited in the past (cf. v 5).

In a parody of a funeral dirge (cf. Je. 22:18), Habakkuk mocks the Mesopotamians for their ill-gotten gains. As for an individual who takes goods through theft, misappropriates the pledges securing debts or draws blood (either literally or metaphorically in exploitation), suffering will rebound upon the head of the oppressor. In a tit-for-tat response, the plunderer will himself be plundered by his erstwhile victim. Misappropriation of funds is still common among those in positions of trust. Their exposure and condemnation by court and press shows that this sort of behaviour is not only unacceptable to the holy God, but even to the sensibilities of fallen humanity.

9–11 This woe is directed towards national gain through injustice and perversity. Gain itself is morally neutral, so is not condemned. These acquire it through treachery, however, seeking security from others' greed by placing themselves high above others' threats. They will suffer a shameful death. Even inanimate building material from the captured cities will cry out against evil exploiters. National policy, as well as individual behaviour, must constantly be subjected to the demands of God's word.

12–14 Habitual cruelty, bloodshed and crime which were intended to secure permanent territorial holdings will not reach their intended goal. There will be no lasting benefits because they will go up in smoke. Those who still engage in nationalistic self-aggrandizement and 'ethnic cleansing' must be reminded of God's unchanging abhorrence of this behaviour (cf. Am. 1:13). Seeking additional territory or resources such as oil or other strategic minerals without care for human life or territorial rights will ultimately prove futile when divine justice rights nationalistic wrongs.

Habakkuk's contemporary, Jeremiah, uses the same words of prophetic doom (Je. 51:58), though it is not clear which of the two prophets originally used them. Their ultimate author, as well as the author of the punishing judgment, is Yahweh himself, the LORD Almighty who, as the Divine Warrior, takes up the cause of his people (3:8–15).

In the midst of the darkness of woe comes a verse of light and hope for those who trust in God rather than their own perverse acquisitions. Rather than a time-bound prophecy of defeat for a historical nation, this free adaptation from Is. 11:9 places the future hope in the context of the end times. Knowledge of God, an intimate, experiential relationship with him, will bathe the entire earth. The outward manifestation of God's awesome power, his glory (Ex. 40:34; Is. 6:3), will be perceptible not only to the oppressing Assyrians and Babylonians, but to all of creation.

15–17 The wicked not only engage in perversion but lead others into doing the same, providing their neighbours intoxicants in order to exploit their inebriated lack of decency. One thinks today of purveyors of pornography, gambling and drugs. They do not seek personal gratification but to exploit others by ensnaring them. The pervasive power of perversion continues to cross national and international boundaries, threatening not only individuals but also governments through its corruption. It seems that divine judgment might be the only means of breaking these ever-tightening chains.

The punishment meted out again matches the wrong committed. In this case, the intoxicator will become intoxicated and licentious. This time the cup is a metaphor of the wrath of God's judgment (cf. Ps. 75:8; Ezk. 23:33; Lk. 22:42). The violence of the wicked is seen as going beyond the borders of Israel to neighbouring Lebanon, possibly referring to the battle at Carchemish in 605 BC. This turmoil harms not only people, but results in the slaughter of dumb animals, which is also condemned. This is a needed corrective to the misunderstanding that humanity is the Creator's sole interest. Rather, all creation suffers because of sin, and awaits restoration (Rom. 8:20–22; cf. Gn. 6:5–7).

18–20 Babylon’s pagan worship practices alluded to earlier (1:16), are now spelled out in greater detail in this oracle. The pointlessness of seeking advice from a dumb creation of human hands is stated in this passage, in which the typical woe statement is in a different location from the previous examples. Some have suggested its misplacement from the beginning of 2:18, but there is no manuscript evidence for this, nor is there sufficient evidence that a biblical author was slavishly bound by the patterns of his chosen literary forms.

In contrast to the silent idol, true revelation can come only from Yahweh himself, in whose presence all must bow in silence. This silence is not of inanimate objects but of awe-filled worshippers faced with the true, living God (cf. Ps. 46:10; Is. 41:1) rather than with false, dead and death-bringing idols. Not only Israel, but all of creation will be struck dumb in the presence of this One.

This verse serves as a transition from the sinful deeds of Israel’s oppressors to the mighty acts of God.

3:1–19 Psalm of petition and praise

The final chapter is a concluding prayer. It is in the form of a psalm in which the psalmist brings glory to God for his person (2, 3b, 4) and his actions (3a, 5–15). He remembers the mighty acts of God in the exodus, law-giving at Sinai and conquest of the land. His awesome power before mighty armies causes the psalmist to quake in awe, but he knows that this mighty God is love and will care for him. His terror can thus be safely replaced by a joyful calm.

Questions have been raised concerning the psalm’s inclusion, as to whether it is a secondary addition (see the Introduction), but in its current canonical location it provides a moving conclusion to this pious prophet’s discussion of crises in his faith with his faithful God.

3:1–2 Request for God’s continued active presence

The technical notes opening and concluding the psalm have their counterpart in the book of Psalms. The type of psalm, a prayer, heads other psalms of request or lament (e.g. Pss. 17:1; 86:1). It is said to be On shigionoth, an obscure term (cf. Ps. 7:1) which apparently gives some musical information. The piece is played on ‘stringed instruments’ (19; cf. Pss. 4:1; 6:1), under the auspices of a professional musician of some kind, who appears in fifty-five other psalm headings. Another unclear musical notation, Selah, is scattered through the psalm (3, 9, 13).

The knowledge of God’s deeds in Israel’s past leads the prophet to a two-pronged response. He personally experiences an awe-filled respect at the power of God, the one who sustains and provides for his creation. He also uses this knowledge of God’s previous acts to request that they be repeated in Israel’s present. In the very wrath which Habakkuk has prayed befall the sinners of his day, he requests that God allow his tempering mercy (cf. Ex. 34:6; Lk. 1:54).

Both wrath and mercy are part of the multifaceted nature of God. Even when he is wilfully ignored or blatantly disobeyed, the love of God for his people draws him inexorably to them in spite of their actions towards him (cf. Ho. 11:8–11). This is not an expectation of universalism, that God will ultimately forgive all wrongs and restore everyone to a relationship with himself. It is a prayer that if and when the sinners return in true penitence to their Creator, he would forgive and restore them to himself. This prayer for grace is not unique in the OT, since the foundation for it is laid in the constitutional covenant document for the people of Israel (Dt. 30:1–10). Here, forgiveness is provided in anticipation of its being needed by sinful Israel. This verse in Habakkuk thus encapsulates the message not only of the book, but of the very gospel itself.

3:3–15 God's hand in history

God's arrival and presence is described. Extraordinary natural events take place (cf. Ex. 3:1–5; 1 Ki. 19:11–12).

3–7 The description of God's coming uses terms reminiscent of his appearance at Mt Sinai. An old poetic form for God is associated with him as the Holy One, a term elsewhere relating to the exodus tradition (Lv. 11:44–45). He comes from Teman and Mount Paran. These are two sites in Transjordanian Edom which are associated with God's appearance at Mt Sinai. He comes in splendour of light, with twin lightning rays (or 'horns', themselves symbolizing power). This is possibly a word-play on the two meanings of the one Hebrew word. Plague and pestilence, also associated with the exodus and Sinai (Ex. 5:3; 9:3, 15), accompany him. They are presented in terms reminiscent of the personal attendants of ancient Near Eastern dignitaries (cf. 1 Sa. 17:7; 2 Sa. 15:1). These feared phenomena are under God's jurisdiction, serving him and showing his awesome power.

Power is also evident in the convulsion of nature, as it was at Sinai (Ex. 19:16–19). The far-spread nations will feel God's presence, as will the ancient hills and mountains. Their seeming eternity and permanence are illusory in the presence of God, who is truly eternal. God's approach is magnified beyond the experience which Israel had at Sinai to his coming at the end, which will have universal and not just national significance (cf. Ps. 97:4–5; Joel 3:16; Rev. 16:18).

The section concludes with reference to two southern nomadic tribes who also will be struck with awe and terror at the power of the coming God.

8–15 Drawing on some of the same references as the last passage, God is now described as the powerful Divine Warrior who stands in opposition to those oppressing his chosen ones (cf. Ex. 15:1–18). He faces rivers and seas (8), as at the parting of the Red Sea and the Jordan (Ex. 13:17–14:31; Jos. 3:13–17) and at creation (Jb. 26:12–13; Ps. 29). The image looks forward too, showing God's continued sovereignty over creation (cf. Is. 11:15; Mt. 14:22–33; Rev. 21:1).

God's armoury includes bow and arrows (9), though the adjective describing the latter is not clear. It probably refers to sevenfold volleys that are echoed in Canaanite texts. Here they are used as instruments of judgment by Yahweh (cf. v 11; Dt. 32:23; Ps. 7:13).

The presence of the mighty Warrior also affects nature, water dividing the surface of the earth (9; cf. Ps. 74:15), as it was itself split at the Red Sea (Ex. 14:16, 21). The mighty mountains and even the sun and moon are affected, moving or standing in contrast to their customary patterns (cf. Jos. 10:12–14; 2 Ki. 20:9–11).

The presence of God is relative in its impact, depending on the relationship which those to whom he comes share with him. Those who oppose him and his people will experience the Warrior in wrath (12) as he moves throughout the earth. They will be surprised at their defeat when they went forth expecting victory. Those who are in God's will know this same Warrior as the gracious Saviour and Deliverer. This knowledge is the real answer to Habakkuk's queries (1:12–17).

The opening metaphor (8) is resumed in v 15, with the sea trampled as it was in the exodus (cf. Ex. 14:21–29).

3:16–19 Trembling yet trusting

Now the speaker is the prophet reflecting on his own experiences and his reactions to the revelation which he has received. In the light of God's responses to him, Habakkuk is able powerfully to express his faith in him.

Habakkuk's physical reactions (16) reflect the awful fear he experienced upon realizing the power of the Creator-Warrior God. He does not remain cowering, however, but waits in calm certainty, knowing that God will meet him as he had done before (2:1). This time he will bring the promised judgment on Israel's enemies. The long-awaited day and time (2:3) will come.

In the final verses the writer comes to realize that his faith can ultimately and finally be left in the God who keeps his covenant for ever. Israel received a large portion of its livelihood from agriculture, but the psalmist now realizes that his ultimate source of succour is Yahweh alone, and that he is still God whether he continues to provide these things for his people or not. Habakkuk's assurance does not rest in visible yet temporal blessings, but rather in an unshakeable relationship with his covenant God (cf. Jos. 1:5; Rom. 8:38–39). In the midst of all of this questioning and dialogue, the writer can still call God his own. All this explains in practical terms the meaning of the faith espoused in 2:4.

As a result of this faith, the powerful Lord will strengthen the psalmist to endure, but also to leap joyfully in the exhilaration of life like a deer (cf. 2 Sa. 22:34; Ps. 18:33[34]). This strength is still available to those who find that they can yet have this faith in the God of Israel and of the church.

ZEPHANIAH

Introduction

The author and his times

Zephaniah, the prophecy's author, was of godly stock, as is shown by his name, which means 'Yahweh has hidden or protected'. While not unique in the OT (cf. Je. 21:1; Zc. 6:10), it shows his parents' assurance of the providence of Israel's God even at their son's birth. He was apparently descended from the fourteenth king of Judah, Hezekiah (716–687 BC), as described in his genealogy (1:1), the longest found in any prophetic book. The same verse dates the prophecies during the reign of Josiah, the sixteenth king of Judah (640–609 BC), himself a descendant of Hezekiah. (See the chart 'The prophets' in Song of Songs.)

The period between the godly kings Hezekiah and Josiah was marked by religious decay. True worship was perverted by the evil Manasseh (2 Ki. 21:1–18) and his son Amon (2 Ki. 21:19–26), Josiah's grandfather and father respectively. Perhaps God's preservation of a righteous family and their son during this turbulent period led to his parents giving Zephaniah his name.

When during Josiah's reign Zephaniah's prophecies were spoken is debated. Some suggest a date before Josiah restored Yahwism, the correct response of Israel to Yahweh, the God to whom she had sworn allegiance at Mount Sinai (Ex. 19–24). The entire life of the people, political, social and religious, was to be directed by God's will as revealed at Sinai in the law as recorded in the Pentateuch, but they repeatedly chose to ignore it, living by their own devices. It was only under Josiah that a vision for Yahwism was recaptured (2 Ki. 22:1–23:30; 2 Ch. 34:1–35:27). A date prior to Josiah is suggested, since pagan practices still existed (1:4–9). This dates the book before 621 BC, the beginning of his reforms. The argument is not convincing, however, since national religious reform instituted by a king was not universally followed by the people, or even future rulers.

While officially banned by Josiah, pagan practices undoubtedly continued among the people, thus not ruling out a date any time during his reign. Zephaniah's contemporary, Jeremiah, condemned some of the same practices (1:4–5; cf. Je. 2:8; 8:2; 19:5, 13; 32:35), and the need that arose at about the same period for other prophets, Nahum and Habakkuk, also suggests that Josiah's reforms were not complete and permanent.

The striking parallels between Zephaniah and Deuteronomy (see on 1:5, 13, 18; 3:5) support a date after the beginning of Josiah's reform which was prompted by the discovery of the 'Book of the Law' in the temple (2 Ki. 22:8). It is generally accepted that the document which was discovered was a form of Deuteronomy, which served as the basis for re-establishing Yahwism. The apparent references by Zephaniah to Deuteronomy leads one to suggest that he prophesied after the book's rediscovery.

Several nations are mentioned in chs. 2–3, and the reference to Assyria (2:13–15) in particular helps determine the book's date. Zephaniah foretold the destruction of Assyria's capital, Nineveh (2:13). Assyria, since its defeat and deportation of Israel in 722 BC (2 Ki. 17:4–41; 18:9–12), was the major threat looming over Judah. Though appearing invincible to Judah, under God's hand using the might of the neighbouring Babylonians, Assyria's days were numbered. By the end of the sixth century it was rapidly fading. In 612 BC Nineveh fell to Babylon and the whole empire was taken by 605, so Zephaniah's prophecy must precede 612 BC.

Other nations mentioned include the Philistines (2:4–7), Moab and Ammon (2:8–11) and Cush (2:12). The Philistines had been antagonists of Israel since their return from Egypt after the exodus, and were eventually subdued, though not eradicated, by David. Their five city-state league, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron and Gath, was on the Mediterranean, west of the Dead Sea. Gath had apparently declined by the time of Zephaniah's prophecy, since it is not included in his judgment oracle, which was not unique in its warnings concerning these people (cf. Is. 14:28–32; Je. 47; Am. 1:6–8; Zc. 9:5–7).

The two Transjordanian nations, Ammon and Moab, were related through their ancestors, the sons of Lot by his daughters (Gn. 19:36–38), and so (through Lot's kinship with Abraham; Gn. 12:5) were also related to Israel. This kinship was not close, however, since there was frequent opposition between Israel and her 'cousins' across the Jordan (cf. Jdg. 3:12–30; 1 Sa. 11:1–11; 2 Ki. 3:4–27).

Cush, or Ethiopia, had been defeated by the Babylonians in 663 BC when they invaded Egypt, over which Cush had seized control during the twenty-fifth dynasty (c. 716–663 BC). 2:12 could be a memory of this destruction, or, more likely, Cush is being used as an alternative designation for all of Egypt (see Is. 20:4 and Ezk. 30:4–9). God's judgment would thus not only fall on Judah's smaller neighbours, but also on the major world powers, Egypt and Assyria, which were further away.

The book and its message

Some have questioned whether portions of the book are original, especially 3:14–20. This is on the questionable grounds that the erring nation, facing judgment and being warned to repent, would not have been given a message of hope, as is found in these verses. It is claimed that judgment was the rule before the exile, with hope only entering into the prophets' messages after that event. This apparently logical reconstruction falls foul of the OT as a whole, which time after time places together two aspects of God's character, holy justice and compassionate love, which are not mutually exclusive (see the mixture in Is. 1–2; Ho. 2; Am. 9). This mixture of hope and judgment should not be a surprise if one considers the nature of the covenant between God and his people. Integral to it were both blessing for obedience (e.g. Dt. 28:1–14) and cursing for disobedience (Dt. 28:15–68). Even the event of the exodus, so central to the faith of God's people, is a combination of both: hope for those who obeyed God (Ex. 12:21–28) and punishment for his opponents (12:29–30; 14:26–28).

A theological theme which unites the book is judgment. Preaching on this theme (1:2–6) leads the prophet to the ultimate judgment, the day of Yahweh (1:7–3:20), which will be precipitated in the 'last days' by human actions. While Zephaniah is not unique in discussing the day (cf. Is. 2; Je. 46–51; Ezk. 7; Joel 2), nowhere else does it serve as a book's uniting theological theme, as it does here.

Zephaniah shows the dual nature of this day as a time of both punishing judgment as well as blessed hope. The punishment will fall upon Judah for her failure to follow the covenant. Specific pagan practices are listed for condemnation (1:4–6), as are Judah's leaders (3:3–4). Her apathy (1:12–13) and pride (2:3) are particularly condemned.

The nations are not free from judgment either (ch. 2); their corruption is like that cited in Gn. 6:5–7. Pride precipitates their downfall (2:10, 15).

Hope is offered if Israel humbles herself, reversing her foolish pride (3:12). There is immediate hope for Israel (2:3) as well as promises of future blessing for her (3:13–17) and the nations (3:9). National, social and individual hope can only flourish in the context of humility. Pride and hope cannot exist together.

Commentary

1:1 Heading

The LORD, Yahweh, Israel's covenant God (Ex. 6:2–6), is the ultimate source of this prophecy, which is described very generally as his word. The person proclaiming God's message is Zephaniah. He has the longest of any of the prophetic genealogies (cf. Je. 36:14), going back to Hezekiah, the fourteenth king of Judah (716–687 BC; see the Introduction). This unusually long genealogy was possibly included to avoid concern that Zephaniah's father was from Ethiopia (a Cushi in Hebrew), itself the subject of one of the oracles (2:12). Egyptians and Ethiopians were not allowed entrance into the Israelite community until the third generation (Dt. 23:7–8).

A more likely explanation, however, was the desire to link the prophet with his righteous royal ancestor. This was especially important following the erring predecessors of the present king Josiah, who was, like Hezekiah, a committed Yahwist (see the Introduction).

1:2–6 Judgment

Immediately, with no further introduction, Yahweh delivers a terrifying message of dire judgment, not only generally to the whole world (2–3), but also more specifically to Judah and its capital Jerusalem (4–6). Not acting from a distance, Yahweh personally takes a hand in this devastation.

2–3 Yahweh warns that he will sweep away all his original creation from the face of the earth. The list of beings facing destruction, men, animals, birds and fish, shows that he proposes an act of ‘un-creation’. These are listed in exactly the opposite order of their appearance in the original creation account (Gn. 1:20–28). This destruction will exceed even that of the flood (Gn. 6–9), since here fish will also feel the brunt of God’s wrath. All creation will suffer as a result of the sin of humankind (cf. Rom. 8:20–21). Humanity is especially singled out by a double mention, being the wicked sinners who precipitated God’s response. They will be cut off or annihilated (4; cf. 1 Ki. 9:7), a term indicating carrying out the death penalty on lawbreakers (Ex. 31:14) which is very appropriate in this context.

The hearer can be sure that these severe words are true since they are a declaration of Yahweh, the LORD, himself (see also 1:10; 2:9; 3:8, 20). He not only speaks, he will act, as seen by the six occurrences of I in vs 2–4.

4–6 Though all creation will suffer, Judah and her capital city Jerusalem are singled out. They, God’s covenant people, having willingly pledged themselves to him, have a greater degree of responsibility. Similarly God’s people are chief among many in Am. 1:3–2:16. Jesus made this into a principle which applies universally: ‘from the one who has been entrusted with much, much, more will be asked’ (Lk. 12:48.) God will stretch out his hand, not to help Israel as he had previously done (e.g. Dt. 4:34), but to punish, much as Aaron’s outstretched rod initiated the Egyptian plagues (Ex. 7:19).

Those who will face removal from this place (either Jerusalem itself or else the temple, which is indeed ‘the Place’, Dt. 12:5), are identified by their misdeeds. Some still worshipped Baal, a title meaning ‘lord, owner, master’ which was not only used of pagan deities, but also of Yahweh himself (the name Bealiah means ‘Yahweh is Baal’; 1 Ch. 12:5). God is here either denouncing the worship of the Canaanite fertility god Hadad (cf. Jdg. 6:25; 1 Ki. 16:31, 32; 18) or else the Assyrian god Bel (Baal). Though some suggest that Josiah’s religious reform, initiated in 621 BC, completely stopped pagan practices, the fact that a remnant was still worshipping Baal could indicate that the newly initiated reforms were taking effect, though not yet complete (see Introduction). The pagan and the idolatrous priests (2 Ki. 23:5) will also be wiped out, even as far as obliterating their names. The object of their worship, the starry host, are the star-gods (cf. Dt. 4:19; 2 Ki. 21:3–5; Je. 8:2) which Israel knows were created by Yahweh himself (Gn. 1:14–17).

Syncretism, or mixing religious systems, was another problem. The Hebrew of v 5, which says the people ‘swear by their king [Malcam]’, may indicate that they worshipped not only Yahweh (using his name in oaths) but also did the same to his human representative. Though there is no evidence for this practice in Israel itself, it was common elsewhere in the Ancient Near East. This verse could also refer to Milcom (Molech), (NRSV; LXX and other versions), a pagan Ammonite god (1 Ki. 11:5, 33). There might even be a combination of the two possible interpretations, that, even though feigning loyalty, to Yahweh as King, they were in reality living under the authority of a usurper, the pagan Milcom. In any case, the people mixed worship of the one true God with that which was not worthy of worship (Ex. 20:3). As in Jeremiah (2:12–13), Yahweh is shocked at Judah turning from the truth to follow lies.

1:7–3:8 The day as judgment

The warnings of doom lead to those of the final judgment day, the day of the Lord, which is the theme of the rest of the book (see the Introduction). This day appears in its dual nature, as not only a day of painful judgment (1:7–3:8) but also one of blessed hope (3:9–20). It will affect both the nations (1:14–18; 2:4–15) and Judah (1:8–13; 2:1–3; 3:1–7), both in looming historical events (2:4–15) and also in the great happenings of the end times (1:14–18; 3:8–13). It is the ‘Lord’s day’ because in it he alone will act, not only in holy power and justice but also in loving grace.

1:7–13 Judah

7 We are told to ‘Hush’ (be silent), before the Sovereign LORD (lit. ‘Lord Yahweh’; cf. Hab. 2:20). One can quiet oneself as in the caring arms of a mother (Ps. 131:2), but this has a different flavour since it refers to a silence which falls in the awesome presence of the creator, sustainer and judge of the universe. This is the respect demanded by the court official when he commands ‘All rise’ at the approach of the judge. The Lord is now approaching because his day, the day of Yahweh, is near (cf. v 14; Is. 13:6; Ezk. 30:3; Joel 1:15; Ob. 15).

In anticipation of his day, Yahweh has already personally made preparation, as shown by his acts in this verse and also the uses of I in vs 8, 9, 12, 17 and 18. Like a priest, he has made ready a sacrifice or sacrificial feast (cf. Je. 46:10). He has also consecrated or set apart his guests for a special function (cf. Lv. 21:8; 2 Sa. 8:11). In a macabre play on words, one can understand the invited guests either being made ready to partake of the sacrificial feast or to be themselves the sacrifice. Those who oppose Yahweh will be offered up to his judgment.

8 On this same day of ... sacrifice, the first punishment is directed towards both the nation’s leaders, the royal house and those who are following foreign influences, possibly indicating pagan religious practices (cf. 2 Ki. 10:22). Josiah himself is not mentioned, perhaps because this is from a period early in his reign when the actual reins of power were held by other officials (2 Ki. 22:1), i.e. those alluded to here.

9 Yet another apparently religious perversion involves those who ‘leap’ (RSV) over the threshold (a term used in the OT only in association with a temple; 1 Sa. 5:4–5; Ezk. 9:3). This most probably means the pagan Philistine practice of not stepping on the threshold of the temple of Dagon (1 Sa. 5:4–5), another intrusion into Israelite Yahwism. Another possibility is that the second half of this verse is an explanation of the obscure first half. What then is involved is not a religious but an economic or social wrong. Leaders who should protect their charges through just and righteous rule are instead filling their royal residences with violence (cf. Hab. 1:2–3) and deceit. Whatever interpretation is adopted, the final clause of the verse indicates that Yahweh does not view the wrongs being committed as minor errors but rather as of the same magnitude as those which led to the first ‘uncreation’ at the time of the flood (cf. 1:3; Gn. 6:11).

10–11 The author presents the geographical development of God’s judgment on the day of Yahweh. The north provides easier access to Jerusalem due to hills in other directions. This is thus not only the most natural route for merchants and traders, but also for attacking armies. The location of the first two mentioned areas are known, the Fish Gate was probably a main gate to the north of the city (2 Ch. 33:14; Ne. 3:3). The New or ‘Second’ Quarter lay north of the temple and was, according to its name, a more recent addition (2 Ki. 22:14; Ne. 11:9). The hills is a more general reference, but could well point to a specific feature in north Jerusalem. The inner market district or business quarter, called ‘the Mortar’ (see the NIV mg.), was apparently located in a depression, possibly a quarry hollowed out into a mortar shape (cf. Jdg. 15:19; Pr. 27:22).

A serious calamity befalls the inhabitants of these places, and they respond with a distressed cry and wailing. The crashing destruction is also translated as cries of anguish elsewhere (e.g. Is. 15:5; Je. 48:5), fitting well into the present context. Part of the calamity will involve economic collapse. This is a further reference to unwanted foreign influence, since merchants is lit. ‘people of Canaan’ whose trading skill under their later name ‘Phoenicians’ was well known.

12 Acting like the police on a raid searching for contraband, Yahweh will perform a lamp-lit search. His goal is not to look for an honest person (cf. Je. 5:1) but to catch those who have displeased him in order to punish them. Their sin is not in the clear and public commission of evil (4–11), but in their secret and more private omission of any good, a complete complacency. They are compared to part of the fermentation process of wine which, when undisturbed, collects the heavier particles at the bottom of the cask. This residue, the dregs, can cause coagulation making the wine undrinkable. These people deny God’s activity, and are condemned for their apathy, much as Martin Luther King chided our generation by saying, ‘We shall have to repent in this generation, not so much for the evil deeds of the wicked people, but for the appalling silence of the good people.’

13 God will show the apathetic rich how misguided they have been. They have perverted the very theological foundation of Israel’s understanding of history, that God actively intervenes in the world, bringing blessing or judgment. A misdirected theology is at least as serious as misdirected deeds. As punishment, the means of power and position by which the sinners attained their stature will be removed (cf. Dt. 28:30–42; Am. 5:11; Mi. 6:13–15).

From the NT perspective of God’s love as shown in Christ, it is too easy to forget that God’s character also includes holiness and justice. As in the OT God’s grace overflowed towards his people and those who followed his revealed will, so in the NT his holy wrath will not be withheld from those who turn their back on his revelation as did the apathetic people of Judah. Even identification as his people is not proof against his wrath if there is no corresponding application of his will in life and in relationships.

1:14–2:3 The day of the Lord

Zephaniah now describes the cataclysmic day of Yahweh in the form of a hymn. This day will not only affect his own people but the whole world. A naive understanding of the day was that God would bless Israel, his people, while those who opposed him and his people he would judge and condemn (see Am. 5:18–20). Israel forgot that election brings responsibility (Am. 3:2), and that a right relationship with God is not based on birth but on obedience. They suffer if God is not honoured, as do all nations, but blessing is also available to all righteous people, whatever their ethnic heritage. This two-sided nature of the day, as well as its universality, will culminate in Christ’s second coming. This ultimate day of the Lord (2 Thes. 2:2) will also be universal and two-sided (Mt. 24:3–33; Rev. 19–22).

1:14–18 General threats. 14–16 The day is imminent, near and coming quickly, a theme important to the prophet (see v 7). His warning is not for some distant day, but for now; and it is not something to anticipate with joy. Bitter cry and warrior’s shout (either in blood-lust or in terror) will increase the tumult.

The terrible day is described in a staccato catalogue of horror, arranged in a six-part counterpart to the six days of the original creation. From the point of view of Yahweh, it is filled with his wrath (cf. Ezk. 7:19; Ho. 5:10; Hab. 3:8), while its impact on humanity is described in five pairs of synonyms. The emotions are assaulted with distress and anguish, accompanied by physical suffering through trouble/'destruction' (NEB) and ruin. Adding to the emotional trauma are darkness and gloom. For Amos, this characterized God's judgment (Am. 5:18–20; cf. Is. 8:22; Joel 2:2) and also calls to mind the pre-creation chaos (Gn. 1:2) into which the light of God's power had not yet shone. These horrors, accompanied by the clash of trumpet and battle cry, are typical of 'theophanies', where God, the almighty creator and judge of the universe confronts his creation (cf. Ex. 20:18; Dt. 4:11). Even strongholds are not proof against the Lord's advances.

17–18 In graphic terms intended to shock his hearers, Yahweh himself describes the results of his judgment upon humankind. The people who received the covenant for guidance will stagger as if they were blind, a curse promised by that very covenant which they had ignored (Dt. 28:28–29). Humanity's very blood of life (Lv. 17:11) will be considered as worthless as cheap and plentiful dust (cf. 2 Ki. 13:7; Zc. 9:3). Humankind cannot buy its way out of God's judgment with their silver and gold, referring either to their accumulated and misused wealth (11, 13) or, more likely, to their powerless idols which were often covered with these metals (cf. Is. 30:22; Ezk. 7:19–20). God's jealousy, his strong desire to protect his unique position as Israel's creator, redeemer and covenant ruler, is stirred up at the pagan interests of his people. As a result, the fire of his wrath (cf. Dt. 4:24) will consume not only her, but the whole world (cf. vs 2–3; 3:8; 2 Pet. 3:10–12). No further warning should be expected, since the end will come suddenly as well as quickly. This dire promise was only too quickly realized for Judah, with the devastating destruction of Jerusalem and her temple taking place in 587 BC, during the prophet's own lifetime.

2:1–3 What to do? After describing the day of the Lord affecting the whole earth, Zephaniah again singles out Judah (see 1:4–13). God's wrath, while still approaching (2), may be tempered if the people respond correctly to Yahweh's claims on their lives (3). In the midst of awful and deserved judgment, there is still the very real possibility of grace.

1–2 The day of the LORD's wrath is still coming, so this oracle continues the previous one. God expresses his displeasure not only in his anger, but also by the titles which are used to address his people. They are called a nation (gôy), a term generally reserved for pagan peoples. It could be here equating God's elect with the pagans in their unacceptable behaviour and attitude towards God. This nation has become shameful to God, or 'not desired' (AV) by him. They must gather themselves together like so much worthless straw (Ex. 5:7, 12), awaiting the wrath of the God who had originally gathered them to himself as his beloved at Sinai.

3 The humble among God's people, those poor in spirit (cf. 3:12; Mt. 5:3) who are known by obedience, have another opportunity to fulfil the covenant's demands. Rather than relying on syncretistic religion and wealth or power, they should seek three things. The first is Yahweh himself, the covenant-giving God whom many had abandoned (1:6). They are also to seek righteousness, right living as directed by God, and a life-style of self-effacing humility (cf. Nu. 12:3; Pr. 15:33).

Only this complete abandonment of themselves and their agendas to God's will could possibly lead to salvation, shelter from his destructive wrath. This cannot be blithely presumed upon by God's people, however, as evidenced by the theologically pregnant word perhaps (cf. Ex. 32:30; Am. 5:15). Zephaniah seems unconvinced that the people will respond en masse to his call for repentance (3:7), so the outcome does not seem to lie with the people, but rather with God. His justice and holiness demand the recognition and punishment of sin, but he has other characteristics as well, including mercy, grace and love which allow forgiveness of sin when repentance is real (cf. Ex. 34:6–7; Dt. 30:1–10). The ‘perhaps’ here guards God’s sovereignty, and not our licence to sin. We cannot assume God’s forgiveness as a kind of ‘cheap grace’ allowing sin with impunity (Rom. 6:1). God, on the other hand, cannot but forgive in the presence of true repentance. In the light of its sinful nature humanity is called to do its part, repent and obey. In the light of the gracious nature of God, the appropriate response on his part can safely be left with him.

2:4–3:8 Individual nations

The prophet uses judgment oracles against Judah and her neighbours as an incentive for Judah’s response to God’s call for obedience (1–3). In the Hebrew ‘for’ at the start of v 4 links these verses with vs 1–3, but the impact is lost in the NIV where it is omitted. The oracles are structured in a pattern straddling Judah on different sides (2:4–15), until finally her own capital, Jerusalem, is addressed (3:1–8; cf. Am. 1:3–2:16 for the same pattern).

2:4–7 Philistia. Philistia comprised five city states, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron and Gath. The first four, presented geographically from south to north, are warned of destruction and desolation. The exclusion of Gath could indicate that it had already been destroyed (see the Introduction). Depopulation will follow a violent assault at midday, indicating either a surprise attack during the stifling heat (cf. 2 Sa. 4:5; Je. 6:4), or one so invincible that the battle will be decided in half a day.

5 The Philistines were part of the ‘Sea Peoples’ who migrated from the Aegean, with a subgroup from Crete (hence Kerethites in 1 Sa. 30:14 and Ezk. 25:16). Unable to settle in Egypt, they moved northwards along the Mediterranean coast in the thirteenth century BC, and were a thorn in Israel’s side for many years. In a designation unique in the OT, they are here called Canaan, residing in territory elsewhere reckoned as Canaanite (Jos. 13:3). God addresses them directly in this oracle of woe (cf. Am. 5:18; 6:1). With the word of the creator of the Universe against them they have reason to fear, especially as he promises them annihilation.

6–7 The population centres of Philistia will be emptied, with scattered shepherds grazing their flocks. These will be among the remnant from Judah. The theologically important concept of the remnant has more than one meaning. At times it alludes to God’s destructive judgment which is so complete that only a few survivors will remain (cf. Gn. 7:23; Is. 17:6). On the other hand, hope is also implicit in the concept, since the destruction, while devastating, is not complete. There will still remain at least a few survivors. The concept is not rare in the prophets (Je. 23:3; Mi. 5:7–8), and indicates both God’s holy justice and his loving grace.

This prophecy shows the relativity of God’s working in blessing and in punishment. Here, punishment for Judah’s opponents results in good for Judah who will receive again what was originally taken from her (see 3:20). This restoration of fortune, at times referring to return from exile (Je. 29:14), points in this context to the restoration on the day of the Lord, the final inauguration of the reign of God to which all previous restorations pointed.

Note. 6 The Kerethites (cf. v 5) are apparently mentioned here too (see the NIV mg.). A vowel change in the Hebrew would result in a reference to pastures, which also fits the context.

2:8–11 Moab and Ammon. Situated in Transjordan, these nations were ethnically related to Israel through Abraham’s nephew Lot (Gn. 19:36–38) and were often in conflict with Israel. For example, they resisted the passage of the wandering Israelites trying to move to their promised homeland (Nu. 22–25). Each are the subject of separate oracles elsewhere (e.g. Is. 15–16; Je. 48:1–49:6; Am. 1:13–2:3) and this is the only time when they are both addressed in one oracle.

8 These two nations verbally attacked Judah, showering it with insults and taunts (cf. Ezk. 5:15; 16:57). They also threatened, a term used elsewhere of boasting (cf. Ezk. 35:13). All this was to demoralize Judah (see this strategy used against it in Ne. 4:1–3).

9 The sureness and severity of their punishment is highlighted by God's solemn oath using his powerful and awe-inspiring names. He is the LORD Almighty or 'Yahweh of Hosts', the Divine Warrior, commander-in-chief of the heavenly hosts or armies (cf. Hab. 3:8–15). He is not only powerful but personal, having a direct and intimate relationship with Judah, since he is their God. This very fact should in itself give Moab and Ammon pause. In verbally assaulting his people, they are in effect assaulting God himself.

The punishment will be like that of the proverbial Sodom and Gomorrah, the two cities located near the Dead Sea which were destroyed for their misdeeds (cf. Gn. 19:24–26; Dt. 29:23; Is. 1:9). Destruction will be so complete that even useful vegetation will perish, the salt in the soil letting only useless weeds flourish. Not only will they lose the produce of the land, the Transjordanians will lose the land itself to those whom they had originally mocked, the survivors, the small remnant of God's people, whose blessing will be that mentioned already in v 7. The ultimate blessing for God's people, Israel and more broadly the church, still lies in the future, when all of creation will enjoy the bliss experienced before the fall (Rom. 8:18–23).

10–11 In a summary of the two preceding verses, God shows the underlying sin as pride (cf. v 15; Is. 13:11). As a just response to the nations mocking the true and powerful God, he will vindicate his people. He will demonstrate his real power by destroying their ineffectual and powerless gods. As a result, recognition and worship of the true God will spread through all of the pagan nations. Yahweh will show himself not geographically bound but universal in power and in place.

2:12 Ethiopia. On Judah's southwest flank, Egypt was for a period during the late eighth and early seventh centuries BC ruled by the Ethiopian (or Cushite) twenty-fifth Dynasty. This title of the mighty Egypt, implying their own ignominious subjugation in the past, could well emphasize a similar fate which awaits them at the hands of the even more powerful God of Israel. He personally, as the Divine Warrior (9), will wield his own sword bringing about their destruction and death.

2:13–15 Assyria. Turning northwards, Yahweh confronts Judah's most indomitable foe, Assyria with its capital city Nineveh (see the book of Nahum). This cruel and mighty nation, which had held the Middle East in its grip for decades, will itself be destroyed by the hand or power (see on 1:4) of Israel's God. Their bustling capital will be an empty and arid desert.

14–15 The completeness of the destruction is pictured by indicating some of the animals and birds which will inhabit the rubble, in contrast to the throngs of people who had previously lived there. This metropolis had claimed to be unique, a characteristic of God himself (cf. Is. 45:5–6, 18, 21). Their security is illusory, since now the passers-by will look at the ruins of this once proud city in amazement and scorn (cf. Je. 19:8).

3:1–7 Jerusalem. Almost like an artillery man using test shots to bracket his target, the prophet has finally found his range when he fires at Jerusalem. This is a powerful rhetorical device in which the audience has been drawn into the message because they agree wholeheartedly that their pagan neighbours and long-time foes should be punished. It is only after they are well into the spirit of condemnation that God presents the most hardened evildoers, the audience themselves, with their sin (1–4), shamelessness (5) and refusal to repent (6–7).

The rhetorical power is increased by not identifying the city which is being condemned. Following immediately upon an oracle against Nineveh, the hearers will assume that she is still the subject. It is only when the specific sins against Yahweh, the national God of Israel, are mentioned in v 2 that they realize that they themselves are the culprits.

The two-edged sword of God's punishment is evident here. While those who unjustly oppose God's people will suffer, their very punishment will bring release and healing to those whom they had oppressed. It is important to maintain a correct relationship with God rather than assuming it actually exists, as Judah herself is reminded in the next verses.

1 Jerusalem, the capital of the covenant nation of God which had been singled out as a model of godly holiness and faithfulness in a pagan world, is instead acting worse than her neighbours. She rebels against the covenant (cf. Je. 4:17; 5:23) and herself oppresses others instead of nurturing them. Rather than being a holy, pure people, they have become defiled as one whose hands are soiled through violently shedding blood (cf. Is. 59:3; La 4:14).

2 Jerusalem's rebellion (1) is against her own God. The people do not listen when the prophets speak (Is. 30:8–12; Am. 2:12). They do not learn when he corrects or disciplines them by his mighty acts in the history of their nation (Is. 1:5–9; Je. 5:3). Rather than seeking the help offered by the giver of the covenant, they turned their back on him, refusing to trust the promise-keeping God.

3–4 Jerusalem's oppression and defilement are brought upon her by her leaders, both civil (3) and religious (4). The former devour those in their care like ravening beasts of prey. The latter completely pervert their calling. Rather than speaking God's truth in his name, the prophets seek glory for themselves by their own lying treachery. Rather than maintaining the sanctity of the temple and teaching obedience to the law, the priests pollute the former and pervert the latter (cf. Ezk. 22:26).

5 There is a contrast between Jerusalem and her leaders on the one hand and the righteous God who is in no way involved in any wrongdoing (cf. v 13) on the other. This should inspire repentance, but it does not come. In contrast to the unfailing justice, the continual equitable judgment of God, the wicked unrighteous act without shame, not even acknowledging their actions as wrong.

6–7 God is grieved when he must punish, and he provides for his people examples of nations who have met his wrath, and as a result have been destroyed (cf. 1:3–4, 13; 2:4, 9, 13, 15; 3:7) and completely depopulated. Jerusalem, however, does not listen. God is not capricious, striking without warning or reason. In fact, he is long-suffering, willingly withholding anger if repentance might be forthcoming (Ex. 34:6–7; Nu. 14:18–19; Am. 4:6–11; Rom. 9:22–24). He wants people to live under his covenant, fearing him and accepting his instruction. This involves not only right attitudes towards him, but also right actions in the light of his covenant instruction. His heart cry is that his people be spared from the horrible punishments that have befallen their neighbours and which await them; but to no avail. They not only continue their corruption but eagerly pursue it. They spurn God's grace.

8 Therefore, i.e. in the light of all of the wrongs of the nations and of Jerusalem itself (1:14–3:7), God will initiate a covenant lawsuit against the whole earth. As prosecuting counsel, he will gather all peoples and nations. He will serve as witness, testifying (cf. Je. 29:23; Mi. 1:2) of their wrongdoing. As judge, he will decide the case, and as executioner he will perform the sentence, consuming the entire world by the fire of his wrath and anger.

3:9–20 The day as hope

God is bound by his righteous and just holiness to punish sin in his people and in all the earth (8). He is also, however, a loving and compassionate God, so the earth will not be entirely obliterated. Punishment will function as a purifying agent for all nations (9–10), but most specifically for his own people (11–13). This grace, totally unmerited and a free gift of God alone (18–20), is a matter for rejoicing (14–17).

This change of tone and outlook is not the result of another author from a later period having his optimistic piety added to an otherwise depressing book, as some have suggested. Rather, it is a portrait of God in several of the multi-hued aspects of his character. He is not only judge before the exile and only saviour after it, but, like a parent (cf. Ho. 11:1–4), loves even while in the act of meting out discipline. The pain caused by the punishment is not an end in itself, but the means for restoring a right relationship.

3:9–10 The nations. Then, on the day of the Lord, God will restore those who have fallen by purifying the polluted. Their lips are singled out for renewal (cf. Is. 6:5–7) to be used now to call on the name of the LORD in worship and service. This service will be characterized by unity (shoulder to shoulder; cf. Je. 32:39) and universality, since all can respond. The original unity of speech lost at Babel (Gn. 11:1–9) will ultimately be restored so that all of creation may worship God.

One among the distant peoples responding will be those beyond Ethiopia (Cush) on the Upper Nile. There is some textual difficulty in the latter half of the verse, but whether it means some of God's exiled peoples (so the NIV) or new converts to Yahweh (cf. 2:11), the recipients of God's grace will worship him by bringing offerings (cf. Ps. 72:10). Whoever they are, these people are now acknowledged by God himself as being his own.

3:11–13 Jerusalem. Speaking directly to this city, Jerusalem with her temple perched on God's holy hill, God offers hope. Punishment and shame will be averted from the city through God's direct intervention. Pride and haughtiness, the arrogance of self-determination without God, will be eradicated. In contrast to those expelled will be those of low estate, those remaining in the city who are the remnant of 1:4 and 2:7. They are those who rely on God for provision rather than upon their own devices. Those downtrodden by circumstances (2:3; cf. Mt. 5:3) and the impoverished will find their refuge in Yahweh and his powerful name (9).

These survivors are described negatively, in contrast to the evildoers of the preceding verses. They are those practising no wrong (5), no lies, and no deceit. Their very mouths will be purified by God (9). While wrongdoers sought their security in their own wiles and did not find it, these poor will find it, along with rest (cf. 2:7, 14; Ps. 23:2) and freedom from fear.

3:14–17 Rejoicing. Visualizing the blessing from God's hand as already accomplished, the prophet calls his people to rejoice. This self-contained little psalm of salvation (cf. Ps. 98; Is. 12:1–6; 52:7–10) could have been delivered by Zephaniah or it might have been adopted from the existing liturgy. It continues to praise God for his presence in Zion as promised in his covenant with David (2 Sa. 7; cf. Pss. 2; 89).

14–15 The call to the remnant of Judah is to sing for joy, repeated threefold. Jubilation does not arise from their own actions, but rather because of the presence of their God. Their punishment (8) is over, and the foreign enemy, the instrument of God's wrath, has been removed. Now, in the benevolent presence of their loving LORD and King, Yahweh, they have no more reason to fear (cf. 1 Jn. 4:18).

16–17 That day, the day of Yahweh, before seen in its more sobering aspect (see 2:7, 14), is now shown in its positive aspect. Fear, and its physical manifestation, powerlessness (limp hands; cf. Is. 13:7; Je. 6:24), are things of the past because of the very presence of Israel's God who is also her King (15). In his might as the Divine Warrior (2:9) he is powerful enough to save them. As he acted on the behalf of his people in the past (Dt. 4:34) so he will again, then and today (Ps. 24:8; 2 Cor. 10:4). Power and gentleness are combined in the same figure (cf. Is. 40:10–11). The Warrior is also like a parent, delighting in the return of a lost child and quieting her fears. The cry of battle (1:14) will be replaced by the gentle crooning of a mother for her infant.

3:18–20 Further promises. Though the people already have reason to rejoice, the depths of God's blessings are not plumbed. While v 18 is textually obscure, it is apparently a blessing imparted by God, allowing those who sorrow, possibly at the earlier lack of pious worship of God (appointed feasts), to approach him with joyful desire rather than religious obligation.

Previous oppression, from external threat and internal corruption (3:3–4), will be removed and those physically maimed (cf. Mi. 4:6–7) and geographically or socially outcast (scattered; cf. Dt. 30:4) will be rescued (17) and gathered (8, 20). Even honour will be restored to those once a people of shame (cf. 2:1; 3:5).

Yahweh is actively and personally present in blessing as he was in judging (see 1:3). He speaks directly (I) eight times in these last three verses. He also directly addresses Israel as you. In spite of the strain they brought upon their relationship by their sin, Israel is still God's people and he is still their God (Ex. 6:7). They still address each other in intimate terms.

God summarizes by reiterating his plan to restore his people. This not only benefits them, but also causes all the peoples of the earth, those who felt his hand of punishment (1:2; 3:7–8), to acknowledge his care for his people who have turned from byword to object of praise.

The whole prophecy is sure, ending as it began, in the name of the LORD, Yahweh. God's ultimate desire is not to inflict punishment, even upon those who disobey. Rather, it is to restore everyone to a right relationship with himself. Whether nationally, as with his people Israel, or individually, in each of our own lives, he longs to be able to restore our fortunes.

HAGGAI

Introduction

The text

It has been said that the best commentary on Scripture is Scripture. This is particularly the case with the book of Haggai. The events of the book took place during the second year of King Darius (1:1), which is also the occasion of the early chapters of Zechariah, and part of Ezra (Zc. 1:1, 7; Ezr. 4:24–6:15). To gain a fuller picture, therefore, we can read these three passages alongside each other. In addition, it will help to read about God's attitude to the disobedience of his people in Dt. 28 and Am. 4.

It is not known who committed the book of Haggai to writing. It could have been Haggai himself. Interest in authorship is a modern concern; OT books seldom mention who wrote the text. In contrast, the name of any person who gave prophecies is almost always recorded. All the prophecies in this book are attributed to Haggai (1:1, 13, 2:1, 10, 20).

The text of the book is in good repair. Some have proposed that the repeated phrase 'the twenty-fourth day' (1:15, 2:10) is a sign of the text being corrupt, but there is no need to create difficulties. The text makes good sense as it is.

The events

The background to Haggai can be read in Ezr. 1–4. The returning exiles had begun to rebuild the temple in 536 BC (Ezr. 3:8), but had stopped work as a result of local opposition (Ezr. 4:1–5, 24). In the second year of King Darius (520 BC) they started building again, prompted by the word of the Lord through Haggai (1:14–15). The building was finished in 516 (Ezr. 6:15), about 70 years after the earlier temple had been destroyed in the fall of Jerusalem in 587 (see Je. 25:11; 29:10; Dn. 9:2). (See also the chart 'The prophets' in Song of Songs and the map of Jerusalem in Nehemiah.)

The future is also in mind. God promises that environmental and political upheaval will cause his temple to be filled, and that his leader will be kept safe in the coming turmoil (2:6–7, 22–23).

The people mentioned in the book

Haggai is simply referred to as 'the prophet'. No family history is given, and his name does not occur in any lists of returning exiles. Given this silence, it seems unhelpful to guess about his origins. The idea that he was ignorant of priestly affairs because of his questions to the priests in 2:11–13 is not convincing. From the fact that his word was acted on promptly, we may take it that he had already been accepted as a true prophet.

Darius (1:1) is known to be Darius I, son of Hystaspes, who ruled Babylonia from 522–486 BC. He followed Cambyses (530–522), who had followed his father Cyrus (539–530; see Ezr. 1).

Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah, was a member of the royal line. He was descended from Jehoiachin, who was taken into exile in 597 BC (2 Ki. 24:15; cf. Mt. 1:11–13). He was the son of Shealtiel according to 1:1. This is not easy to relate to 1 Ch. 3:18–19, where he is said to be the son of Pedaiah. Perhaps there was an adoption, or even a Levirate marriage, that has not been recorded (Dt. 25:5–6). Maybe the crown did not pass in direct descent, as happened in the UK in the eighteenth century.

Joshua the high priest (also called 'Jeshua' in Ezra and Nehemiah) was the son of the Jehozadak who had been taken into exile in 587 (1 Ch. 6:15). He was a leading priest, if not already the high priest, from 537 onwards (Ezr. 2:2, 36, 40; 3:2). God had special words for him in Zc. 3 and 6:11–13. His name suggests 'God saves', and is the Hebrew form behind the Greek 'Jesus'.

Those described in the book as 'the people' were the remnant of those who had gone into exile in Babylon, and had now returned to Judah (1:14; Ezr. 4:1). Their first attempt to rebuild the temple had been opposed by the local people then living in Samaria (Ezr. 4:17–24).

While there is no explicit reference to the coming Messiah, it has long been felt that the promises made to Zerubbabel (2:23) and Joshua (Zc. 6:11–13) were such that they would find their ultimate fulfilment in the promised Messiah. See also comment on 2:7.

We may note that apart from the brief ‘yes’ and ‘no’ of the priests, nobody other than Haggai speaks in the book. They simply act in response to the word of God through Haggai. This highlights the fact that the word of God achieves its purpose (cf. Is. 55:10–11).

The prophecies

There were five prophecies, on three days during four months in 520 BC. All of them came through Haggai, and were addressed to specific people in each case. In these words of prophecy, God desired to open the eyes of the people, encouraged them to repent and obey, and promised that blessing would result.

One feature of the word of God is its recurring relevance in successive generations. The fulfilment of prophecy is not necessarily limited to a single application. It can be compared to the art of sending a flat stone skimming across a lake. Rather than sinking when it first hits the water (as the law of gravity would suggest) the stone rises up and touches the lake in a number of places because of the spinning energy it carries (cf. 1 Sa. 3:19–20).

An example of this in Scripture is the recurring theme of deliverance through water. Noah was saved in the ark (Gn. 7:1); later Moses was preserved in his ark (the same word in Hebrew; Ex. 2:3); later the people were delivered at the Red Sea (Ex. 14:21–29). This theme recurs in a number of later passages, and became part of the symbolism of Christian baptism (e.g. Jdg. 5:21; Is. 43:2; 51:10; 1 Cor. 10:1–2).

So, in the book of Haggai we can expect the words from God to have more than one level of application. As well as anticipating fulfilment of the prophecies within a few months or years, it is helpful to look ahead to later periods as well, especially the life of Jesus and the church, in fact to our own day too.

This leads us to the phrase ‘in a little while’ (2:6). Although this may give us the impression of a short period of time, when seen from a human viewpoint, it may instead be a short time from God’s viewpoint, to whom a thousand years are like one day (2 Pet. 3:8). If this is the case, then discerning further fulfilments of Haggai’s words hundreds of years later would not be a difficulty.

This brings us finally to the possible application of Haggai’s words to our own day. Some would find hope for peace on the Temple Mount in Jerusalem, and protection for modern Israel, in Haggai’s words (2:9, 21–23). Others would see a spiritual application of these promises in the church, arguing that Jesus’ kingdom is not of this world (Jn. 18:36; see 1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19; Rev. 21:22). Others again would anticipate fulfilment in both arenas. We do well to be cautious; few people expected Jesus to fulfil prophecy in the way that he did. It is easier to recognize the fulfilment of prophecy after the event than before.

The curse

While the word ‘curse’ does not appear in the book of Haggai, the description of what was happening to the people corresponds closely to the ‘curses’ of the Pentateuch, to what God had promised to do to his people if they did not obey him or heed his voice (Dt. 28). The people had been under God's curse in the exile (Zc. 8:13) and evidently they still were, despite the fact that they had come home (1:6, 11).

Such language may sound strange to us, but we need to hold in mind that in Scripture, God not only blesses, he also curses. This did not lapse with the coming of Jesus who cursed the fig-tree. This story comes either side of a visit to the temple (Mk. 11:12–21) and Jesus' action can be seen as a comment on what would happen later to the temple community of God's people. The temple, which had been rebuilt since Haggai's day (Jn. 2:20), was destroyed in AD 70, and the people were scattered to the nations (Mk. 13:1–2; Lk. 21:24).

God's curse still operates today, since it will only be removed at the very end, in the era of the new heavens and the new earth (Rev. 22:3). Believers do well to grasp the damaging and continuing effect sin has on our lives. We can be set free from any curse now by true and full repentance from whatever has allowed the curse to operate, asking God to apply the effects of the cross to our lives (Pr. 26:2; Gal. 3:12–14).

Repetition

The use of repetition in OT texts is often worth noting. In the book of Haggai, the words that God says tend to be repeated. The people are told to give careful thought to their ways four times (1:5, 7; 2:15, 18); the state of God's house and their houses is compared twice (1:4, 9); they are told 'I am with you' twice (1:13; 2:4); and the instruction to 'be strong' comes three times (2:4). Lists of disasters that have hit the country are repeated (1:6, 10–11; 2:16–17, 19). Similarly, the prophecy that the nations will be shaken is repeated (2:6, 21–22).

In view of the amount of repetition in so few verses, we may ask what its purpose might be. Perhaps it was for added emphasis; the people needed to hear things more than once, so that the message would sink in (2 Pet. 1:12–13). Another possibility is suggested by Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams. The dreams came twice in order to show that God was firmly decided, and would 'soon' do what he intended (Gn. 41:32). On how long 'soon' might be, see under 'The prophecies' above.

Structure and theme

The contents of the first half of the book are repeated in miniature in the second half, as is shown in this diagram.

One theme which emerges from this is that where God's people repent and turn to God, and adopt his requirements, God will not only respond by blessing his people, but there will be turbulent effects in society and further afield.

Commentary

1:1–11 God’s message to the leaders of Judah: ‘My house and your lives are in ruins’

1:1–4 Whose house comes first? The book opens by setting the date (520 BC), the people to whom God’s word came, and through whom it came. (For the details, see the Introduction.) Although it affected the whole community, the word was to be given only to the two leaders at this stage.

The people were against building the temple. Previously, there had been attempts by their neighbours to discourage and frighten them (Ezr. 4:4–5). However, there is no hint that this was still the case. By now, the people were living in panelled houses. This phrase implies prosperity and comfort, and that the building of their homes was complete.

The Lord’s reply picks up the people’s own words time and house. Why was it time to work on their houses but not on God’s house? In building for themselves but not for him, the people apparently didn’t mind whether the Lord lived among them or not. Their priorities are revealed by their attitude.

The words ruin and drought (11) are very similar in Hebrew. Rain was thought of as a blessing in Israel (see Ps. 65:9–10) and the lack of rain matched the lack of attention paid to God’s house.

1:5–11 Open your eyes. The people were under a curse (Dt. 28:15–68). One effect of being under a curse is to come into confusion, and so fail to recognize what is happening (Dt. 28:28). This was the case here. The curse affected their food, drink, clothing and money. This experience of failing to see God’s hand in our troubles is common among believers today; we do not realize the effects of the sin that we tolerate in our lives (Am. 4). This is not to say that all disaster is because of sin, but rather that sin has consequences (Ho. 8:7).

The people’s problem with money was not a lack of it, since they had panelled houses and earned wages (4, 6). Rather, it was that their money quickly lost its value. The damaging effect of inflation is seen here as having a spiritual origin, a fact which is often ignored today when attempts are made to deal with inflation without investigating its underlying cause.

The drought even extended to the dew (see Dt. 11:10–17; 28:23). The marked effects of the curse are further emphasized (cf. Dt. 28:18, 38–40). The disobedience of the people had made the kind of life as described in Ps. 104:10–23 seem like a distant dream.

God’s words suggest that his house was to be rebuilt on the same site and layout as before (see on 2:20–23). The purpose was so that God might take pleasure in it, and receive honour from it. This continues to be his desire today for his people, who function as a spiritual building (1 Cor. 3:9–17).

1:12–15 The response of the people: the rebuilding starts

The leaders and people accepted Haggai’s message and acted upon it. We have been told that the people were against building the temple, but we do not know whether that also applied to Joshua and Zerubbabel. If they had shared the people’s view, then their change of heart is remarkable, since their forefathers had opposed the prophets ever since following Moses through the desert. Haggai must have known how to speak to the people as well as to God. It seems easiest to see the leaders as godly men, able to accept God’s word and also able to take the people with them. No wonder God thought so highly of Zerubbabel and Joshua (2:23; Zc. 6:11–13).

Once they obeyed, a short message came from God to the people through Haggai. In view of the curse, they might have expected ‘I am against you’; instead, they heard God say I am with you. God’s curse is not a sign that God has rejected his people; rather, it shows his love for them. He wants to draw them back to him, and uses disaster to wake them up (Am. 4:6–11; cf. Am. 3:2; Is. 7:13–25, where Immanuel means ‘God with us’).

As they humbly obeyed God’s word and started work, God helped them. We have a role in bringing about the blessing of God by choosing to act in submission to God’s will (2 Tim. 1:6–7). In Hebrew, the words messenger and work are similar. Their use close together here reminds us that a prophecy is not a ‘blessing’ to be pleased about, but an instruction that should lead to action.

Some think that the repetition of ‘on the twenty-fourth day’ (15) in 2:10 is an indication that the text is corrupt but there is no reason to doubt its authenticity.

2:1–9 God’s message about the new temple: ‘I will transform your lives’

2:1–5 God’s present purposes. Once again God spoke through Haggai; this time the word came to leaders and people together. God responded to the thoughts of the older people who remembered the first temple and were disappointed with its replacement. These feelings may have been vocalized, as they had been earlier (cf. Ezr. 3:12). They could, however, have been secret thoughts. If this was so, then God would have been speaking directly to people's minds in a way which was beyond the prophet's natural knowledge (cf. Lk. 7:39–40). This would arrest their attention.

The instruction be strong was given to Moses' successor Joshua on the first entry into the promised land (Jos. 1:6–7, 9, 18). We may note that on both the first entry to the promised land and the re-entry in Haggai's time, there was a leader named Joshua. This may be a matter of chance, or we may choose to compare the latter era with the former. Both Joshuas acted on the word of the LORD to be strong, and so inherited God's promises. In both situations, although God strengthened the people (1:14), it was up to them to apply their effort as he directed. The same partnership is required today in God's service.

The repeated I am with you (5; see on 1:13 and the Introduction) may be linked to the next clause, which says that the covenant remains in force. Some of the people may have thought that the exile was a sign that the covenant was finished, or that the continued curse indicated God's rejection, but this was not so. God's gifts and call are irrevocable (cf. Rom. 11:29).

Similarly, God's Spirit is not driven off by his people's sin, or at least not for long (see 1 Sa. 4:22; 6). In Ezekiel's visions, the glory of God finally left Jerusalem due to wickedness in the temple, but only to go to the exiles in Babylon. (Cf. Ezk. 10:18–22; 11:22–23 with Ezk. 1:1; 11:16.) Now the people are reassured that God's Spirit has returned from Babylon with them, to stay. This reassurance is for all who earnestly seek God's presence and obey his commands (Jas. 4:8).

The people were told not to fear, but to press boldly on. This instruction shows that God's people should not allow themselves to be prevented from obeying God by fear (1 Jn. 4:4, 18).

2:6–9 God's future purposes. These verses are quoted in Heb. 12:26–27. This would suggest that any fulfilment during Zerubbabel's lifetime (see 2:22–23) is best seen as partial rather than complete (see the Introduction). The writer to the Hebrews saw the description of God shaking the earth as a reference to Sinai (Ex. 19:18). This implies that God's voice will be heard in the shaking that is to come, and that is why the desired of all nations will come to God's house.

When God comes on the scene, his creation shakes (cf. Jdg. 5:4–5). At Sinai, the shaking was limited to one mountain, but this time it will involve the whole environment. The idea may be figurative, along the lines of our phrase 'earth-shaking events'. It may, however, suggest turbulent weather conditions and pollution. (For the idea of God being the author of violent cosmic events, see Rev. 6:12–14; for God causing pollution in a disobedient world, see Rev. 8:3–12.) Such things will happen before the great and glorious day of the Lord (cf. Acts 2:19–20, quoting Joel 2:30–31). This suggests that if a Messianic reference is to be seen in this passage and 2:23, then the second coming may be primarily in mind rather than the first.

The phrase the desired of all nations will come has, in the Hebrew, a singular subject and a plural verb. It might be literally translated 'What is desired by the nations, they will come ...'. The phrase can be taken several ways. We can either try to make sense of the text as it stands, or change the Hebrew to be either singular or plural throughout.

Before we hasten to amend the text, we may notice that in Daniel, there is a similar use of both singular and plural in a prophecy about God's chosen leadership. The Son of Man receives the kingdom (Dn. 7:13–14), then the saints also receive the kingdom, and the text switches abruptly from 'they' to 'he' (7:26–27). We may, therefore, want to try to keep hold of the singular and plural nature of our phrase. This has been achieved to some extent by the NIV with the desired of all nations will come.

Some translators (including Luther and the AV) have followed the Latin Vulgate of the fifth century AD by making the whole phrase singular: ‘the desired one of the nations shall come’. This would allow us to see a reference to the Messiah here, which fits the context (2:23 seems to have a Messianic flavour). There are, however, problems in making the Hebrew singular.

It is easier to change the Hebrew to be plural throughout (as the Greek translation the Septuagint does): ‘the treasures of the nations will come’. This might refer to God’s intention to include all the nations of the world in his plan of redemption (Is. 49:6–7; 60:10; Zc. 6:15). It might also mean that the day will come when what the world regards as the finest and best will come into the temple, rather than what is poor and despised (cf. Zc. 8:20–23; 1 Cor. 1:26–29; Rev. 21:24). It might even mean that there will be no shortage of earthly riches and finance, looking forward to v 8.

While the first option may be most attractive, if one had to choose between the other two, the latter seems preferable. This emphasizes the breadth of God’s plans for the world coming to pass, suggesting that world leaders will one day turn to God for direction and vision in a way that they have not done up to now (see Is. 2:1–5).

We are twice told that God’s house will be filled with glory. This word may simply suggest wealth here, because of the reference to silver and gold between the two statements. However, the word for glory, which also suggests ‘weight’ in other contexts, has a rich OT usage, including the description of the awesome presence of God which causes worship (Ex. 33:18–20; 34:8). When the former temple, and the tabernacle before it, had been completed, they had been so filled with the glory of God (in the form of a cloud) that no-one could enter (Ex. 40:34–35; 1 Ki. 8:10–11).

God’s silver and gold are inflation-proof, in contrast to the earnings of believers under a curse (1:6; cf. Mt. 6:19–20). God promised that peace was to come; this would replace their fear (5). It would have its first fulfilment shortly (Ezr. 6:14–16).

2:10–19 God’s word on the curse: ‘I will replace it with a blessing’

2:10–14 A priestly ruling. The next word that came to Haggai involved asking the priests to give a ruling. They explained that holiness was not communicated by touch, but defilement was. For example, anyone who touched a dead body became unclean for a week, and anything he touched became unclean (Nu. 19:11, 22). God said that this teaching could be applied to the people. Their indifference to God’s presence spoiled not only their offerings but also everything else they did. So today, believers need to be ruthless with careless attitudes, which are not merely neutral but positively defiling, and ask God for cleansing (Mt. 5:29–30; 2 Tim. 2:20–21; cf. Zp. 1:7). Failures in this area will blight a church and society.

2:15–19 From curse to blessing. Haggai now seems to be talking to the people. Although they have started work, there is little progress. Perhaps the three months have been spent mainly preparing the site. During that time, the effects of the curse have still been present. Blight, mildew and lack of fruit are all aspects of God’s curses (Dt. 28:22, 38–42; Am. 4:9).

God was at pains to show that it was the laying of the foundation stone which brought about a sudden, marked change. This calls for an explanation. It seems likely that at the ceremony the people would have gathered together. In the days of the former temple, the greatest spiritual advances were made when the people assembled together (1 Ki. 8:14; 65–66; 2 Ki. 23:1–2, 21–23). This gathering at Haggai’s prompting was in contrast to their earlier actions, when they worked separately on their own houses (1:4, 9). We might say that the one main achievement in our text was that the people began to act together and so became united.

The significance of a nation-wide act of obedience on a particular day can also be noted during the first entry into the promised land (Jos. 5:9). Here too we might have expected that the 'reproach of Egypt' would have been removed long before, but it seems there was a delay which was only ended by the whole nation obeying the instruction about circumcision. This was because circumcision and the ownership of the land were connected in the covenant made with Abraham (Gn. 17:1–14).

If we understand the laying of the foundation stone of the temple as a significant occasion in this sense, then this day would have been a turning point ('the end of the beginning', to quote Winston Churchill's phrase). God seems to have been noting the commitment of the people, and rewarding it. We may learn then that God rewards decisive action taken by his people acting together. For the shape that the Lord's blessing would take, see Zc. 8:9–13.

2:20–23 God's word to Zerubbabel: 'I will keep my leader safe'

Once again, God says he will shake the heavens and the earth (see on 2:6–7). The emphasis this time is on political upheaval, the defeat of powerful armies, and civil strife. Israel's history taught them that even the most powerful enemy is shaken when God acts (e.g. Jdg. 4:15; 7:22; 1 Sa. 14:20). This theme emerges strongly in the prophecies about war against Israel in Ezk. 38–39 (especially 38:19–22). Although war involving Israel is not mentioned here, the promise to Zerubbabel that he will be kept safe makes most sense in a context of the danger of attack.

The similarity between the passages in Ezekiel and Haggai is such that it is worth asking why the pattern of the new temple in Ezk. 40–46 was ignored in Haggai's day. There is no obvious answer to this. Perhaps they did not interpret the vision as a detailed scheme to be put into practice; seeing its primary purpose rather as an encouragement that God was with them despite the exile (see on 2:1–5 above). Maybe the Lord's words in 1:8–9 were taken as an instruction to rebuild on Solomon's original site with his original plan. In any event, Ezekiel's temple has never been built and, with the ending of animal sacrifices at Calvary, it is hard to imagine what precise function it might now have (see Ezk. 43:13–27).

Zerubbabel and Joshua had obeyed the word of the LORD promptly and exactly. Joshua was rewarded with a crown in Zc. 6:11. God speaks of his approval of Zerubbabel here by calling him my signet ring. This seems to be a reversal of the judgment on Jehoiachin, king at the time of exile (Je. 22:24). Jehoiachin had been rejected; his descendant is now affirmed.

Such a ring was a costly item and may have been worn on the finger or round the neck on a chain; either way, it was always attached closely to its owner, and would never be lost or abandoned. This speaks of Zerubbabel's value to God. It seems that such rings were used to stamp the royal seal on a document; this suggests that God entrusted Zerubbabel with authority to carry out his will.

In addition to any fulfilment of God's promise to Zerubbabel which may have taken place in his lifetime, it has been felt that Joshua and Zerubbabel together foreshadow the Messiah, God's chosen leader who receives his authority (Dn. 7:13–14). God delights in those who obey him, and loves to be close to them, but he withdraws his blessing from the disobedient (1 Sa. 15:22–23; Mk. 1:11; Jn. 4:34).

ZECHARIAH

Introduction

The book

The book of Zechariah falls naturally into two parts: chs. 1–8 and 9–14. The first eight chapters clearly come from Zechariah the son of Berekiah, son of Iddo, and are dated between the eighth month of the second year of Darius (520 BC) and the fourth day of the ninth month of the fourth year of his reign (518 BC).

Chs. 9–14 are very different in style from the first part of the book. They fall into two parts, 9–11 and 12–14, each introduced by the heading ‘An Oracle’ (or ‘Burden’; see commentary). The book of Malachi begins with the same word.

The prophet

Zechariah’s grandfather was probably the ‘Iddo’ listed in Ne. 12:4 among the leaders of the priests and Levites who returned from exile to Jerusalem. He seems to have been an important man from the way he is referred to in Ezr. 5:1 and 6:14, ‘Zechariah ... a descendant [son] of Iddo’. Zechariah’s father is omitted from this list but his grandfather is included. If this connection is right, then Zechariah himself was both a priest and a prophet.

Matthew refers to ‘Zechariah son of Berakiah’ who was ‘murdered between the temple and the altar’ (23:35). If this was our prophet, then it may throw light on the meaning of Zc. 12:10 and 13:7 (see Commentary below).

The name Zechariah means ‘Yah remembers’ (‘Yah’ is an abbreviated form of ‘Yahweh’ meaning ‘the LORD’). The name was a common one; probably about thirty different individuals were called by it in the OT. It was, however, an appropriate name for the prophet, for he called on the people to remember the past and to change their behaviour accordingly (1:2–6; 7:5–14; 8:14–17).

Zechariah probably returned from Babylon to Jerusalem in 538 BC. He prophesied from 520, along with Haggai, urging the people to rebuild the temple, and so to show that they had put God first in their thinking (cf. Hg. 1:9). To leave the temple as an unusable ruin was to show that they did not really care whether God dwelt in the midst of them or not.

There is nothing biographical in chs. 9–14 concerning the writer. See below (under ‘The compilation’) for a discussion of the authorship of these chapters.

Historical background

In 538 BC King Cyrus conquered Babylon and published a decree allowing exiles from many countries, including Judah, to return home. The Jews had permission to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem (Ezr. 1:1–4) and came back full of joy and hope, under the leadership of Zerubbabel (who may also have been called Sheshbazzar; cf. Ezr. 3:8; 5:14–16). They managed to lay the foundations of the temple, but were hindered in their work by the neighbouring peoples throughout the reign of Cyrus (538–522 BC; Ezr. 4:4–5).

Zechariah and Haggai urged the people to take heart and take up the rebuilding again; Tattenai, governor of the province of Trans-Euphrates, and Shethar-Bozenai and their associates objected to this work and demanded to know their authority to carry it out (Ezr. 5:3). The authorities searched the royal archives in Babylon and discovered Cyrus's decree (Ezr. 6:1–5), which not only allowed the Jews to return to Jerusalem but specified that financial help should be given from the royal treasury (v 4) and that the temple gold and silver should be returned (v 5). So it was that Darius himself encouraged the Jews, complying with the earlier decree, paying for the rebuilding, providing animals for sacrifice (vs 8–10), and discouraging others from hindering their work (v 11).

Zechariah puts great stress on the completion of the temple under Zerubbabel's direction (4:9–10; 6:12). It will be a sign that God has returned to dwell in the midst of his people (2:10; 8:8; cf. 1:17; 2:12). There was, therefore, great rejoicing when, in 516 BC, the temple was actually completed (Ezr. 6:14–16). The people renewed their dedication to God and looked forward to a time of blessing. Unfortunately, their expectations were not satisfied. They assumed that life would be wonderful, but it turned out to be very hard. No golden age dawned, and many began to ask whether God was really with them after all.

Our knowledge of the history of the post-exilic period is patchy. Some of the few sources of knowledge that we have cannot be dated accurately. Nevertheless, we can be sure that right through the period when Judah was part of the Medo-Persian Empire they remained an outwardly insignificant and powerless people, facing opposition from their neighbours (e.g. Ezr. 4:6–24). This continued when the Greek Empire was established through Philip of Macedon and his son, Alexander the Great.

Add to this uncertainty the fact that we cannot be sure of the date of chs. 9–14, and it is clear that we cannot specify very precisely the historical background for these later chapters. We must be satisfied with rather general knowledge of the whole period, and remember that there may have been many variations in the situation, and many events of which we have no record.

The outline of events may be set out as follows:

538–536	Cyrus's decree Many exiles return to Jerusalem. They start to rebuild but are forced to discontinue, and become discouraged.
522	Darius comes to the throne
520	Haggai and Zechariah urge the people to rebuild the temple
516	Temple building completed
486–465	Reign of Xerxes Opposition mentioned in Ezr. 4:6
465–424	Reign of Artaxerxes

	Opposition mentioned in Ezr. 4:7–23
445	Nehemiah comes to Jerusalem to rebuild the walls of the city
333	Beginning of the Greek Empire

Text and canon

The text of chs. 1–8 is generally clear and free from the mistakes which often result from the copying out of manuscripts over several centuries. The grammatical sense is almost always clear, though the prophet’s precise meaning is sometimes obscure (e.g. 2:8–9; 3:8–9; 4:10b; 5:6). Chs. 9–14 are much more obscure (e.g. 11:13; 12:10) and many have suggested ‘corrections’ to the text. Some scholars have also proposed a rearrangement of sections of the book to make it more logical. For example some would remove the section in ch. 4 that begins with ‘This is the word of the LORD ...’ (v 6) and ends with ‘... the hand of Zerubbabel’ (v 10). This would have the effect of restoring a connection between ‘So he said to me ...’ (v 6) and the second part of v 10. In view of the careful arrangement of the text by the author and/or editor, this would not seem to be a wise course of action (see the Commentary). Further changes are suggested in chs. 9–14, and 13:7–9 is sometimes moved to the end of ch. 11 so as to keep the ‘shepherd passages’ together.

Ecclus. 49:10 (c. 180 BC) refers to ‘the twelve prophets’, and this would suggest that the prophetic canon was already fixed by the beginning of the second century BC. The order of the so-called ‘minor’ prophets varies between different manuscripts, but chs. 1–14 of Zechariah are always found together.

The compilation

The bulk of chs. 1–6 consists of a series of eight visions (1:7–6:8) to which have been added additional oracles (2:6–13; 6:9–15; cf. 4:6–10a).

Chs. 7–8 consist of a question about fasting put to the prophet by some men from Bethel. Zechariah gives an extended rebuke, command and promise, before finally answering the question.

There is no doubt that the basic material of chs. 1–8 comes from Zechariah himself. There may well be passages which come from an editor or editors (e.g. 1:1; 1:6b; 2:6–13; 4:6–10 [see above]; 6:9–15; and parts of Zc. 7), although the most likely explanation for the additions to the visions is that they came from the prophet himself at a later time.

The last six chapters have been more hotly disputed. Conservative scholars have generally held that they came from the author of chs. 1–8, Zechariah the prophet. Liberal scholars have universally denied it and often argued that this section of the book is a patchwork of prophecies which are often unrelated to each other; and come from a wide historical period much later than 520 BC.

A change in climate came with the work of P. Lamarche who argued that the whole of Zc. 9–14 forms an intricate structure in which the ‘Messianic’ passages occur at points which correspond to each other and may be taken together to give a picture of the Messiah. This study received a fairly warm reception generally, and was particularly appreciated by conservative scholars.

While there are reasons why this cannot be accepted in detail (see the Introduction above) there is, nevertheless, a unity to these chapters. They deal with recurring themes, notably judgment and blessing through military action, and the leadership of God’s people (under the figures of ‘humble king’, ‘shepherd and flock’ and ‘pierced one’). There are several passages which are referred to by Jesus in the NT. (See also ‘Contents and structure’ below and the Commentary.)

The theology of Zechariah

Throughout the book of Zechariah there is an emphasis on God’s power over the whole world. He has allowed the nations to visit judgment on his people, Judah, but there are strict limits to what they may do. Judah has been and remains God’s elect and his judgment is for the purpose of restoring them to a pure relationship with himself. Those nations that have overstepped the mark will now be judged. Within this plan there is an important role for certain individuals. The historical characters Zerubbabel (the governor) and Joshua (the high priest) are mentioned as restoring the temple and its worship. But they have a more far-reaching significance than this. They represent the ‘anointed ones’ who stand before ‘the Lord of all the earth’ (4:14), and Zerubbabel is identified in some sense with ‘the Branch’ (3:8; 6:12), which is a word used to describe the Messiah in Je. 23:5 and 33:15 (cf. Is. 4:2).

Chs. 1–8 form a very clear unity with certain important recurring themes:

- a. God’s anger with ‘the fathers’ and the judgment that followed (1:2–6; 7:7–14).
- b. God’s anger transferred to the nations (although they started out in accordance with his intentions), and his compassion for Judah and Jerusalem (1:12–17, 21; 8:1–2, 15; cf. 3:2).
- c. God’s intention, therefore, to dwell in the midst of his people in Jerusalem again, and to be their God (2:10–12; 8:3, 8).
- d. The concern that people should know that God has sent a messenger to them (2:8–9, 11; 4:9; 6:15).
- e. The provision of harmonious civil and religious leadership authorized by God (3:7–9; 4:6–10; 6:11–14).
- f. The purifying of God’s people, and their future obedience (3:3–5; 5:3–4, 5–11; 6:15b; 8:16–17).
- g. The eventual blessing of peoples outside Judah, who will join themselves to God/come to entreat his favour (8:20–23).

In chs. 9–14 we see similar concerns, though they are expressed differently:

- a. God’s ‘impatience’ with ‘the flock’ and his judgment, partly expressed in the attack by the nations and partly somehow related to his provision of bad leaders (11:4–14; 14:2).
- b. God’s giving victory to Judah and Jerusalem (and David) over the nations, although they succeed at first (9:1–8; 12:1–9; 14:1–4, 12–15).
- c. His promise to be their God (13:9; cf. 10:6; 12:5), worshipped in Jerusalem (14:16, 20–21).

- d. The implicit concern that the people should recognize God's word (11:11; cf. the staffs and the pieces of silver? 12:5; cf. 10:1–2).
- e. The provision of a humble and righteous king/shepherd (9:9–10; 10:2–4; 11:4–17; 13:7–9).
- f. The purifying of the people from all uncleanness, somehow related to the cursing/piercing of an individual, who belongs to, but is treated with hostility by, God. He achieves God's purposes by being judged; also the purifying of the temple (12:10–13:9; 14:21).
- g. The eventual (only ch. 14) blessing of nations (including Egypt) outside Judah, who will come to worship God in Jerusalem (14:16–21).

The connections are not strong enough to establish that one editor put the whole book together as a unity.

Structure

As mentioned above, our understanding of the book of Zechariah has been enhanced by an appreciation of the sometimes intricate structure that the author/editor has woven into his material.

Very often we can discern what scholars call a 'chiasmus' (or 'chiastic structure'). The word is derived from the Greek letter chi (χ, which has the form of a cross). This implies that the first part of the passage is reversed (or crossed over) in the second part. So ABCD becomes DCBA. At the centre of a chiasmus we generally find the most important emphasis or point of the passage—sometimes a turning point in a narrative. Quite often the final part is similar to the first, but the situation has also been transformed. Progress has been made, and the structure of the whole brings this fact home to the reader or hearer.

An analysis of each of the main sections of the book is given at the appropriate point in the body of the Commentary. (For more detail on this see, M. Butterworth, Structure of the Book of Zechariah [Sheffield Academic Press, 1992].)

Commentary

1:1–6 The prologue to chapters 1–8

This small section gives us the important features of the situation in which Zechariah prophesied: his hearers are descended from people who were disobedient to God's express warnings and therefore were judged.

The events took place in the second year of King Darius I (i.e. October–November 520 BC), eighteen years after the exiles' return from Babylon. This prophecy belongs between those of Hg. 2:1–9 and 2:10–23.

V 2 has only five words in Hebrew but it has a very powerful effect. Literally it is: 'Angry was the LORD with your forefathers with anger'. The emphasis on 'anger' is unmistakable. This is picked up in v 15 where there is a similar emphasis on anger (lit. 'And [with] great anger I am angry'), but this time the anger is turned away from Judah to the nations. The Bible often speaks of God's anger; it is not bad temper, but righteous anger at sin. Remember Jesus in the temple (Mk. 11:15–17; cf. Mk. 3:5).

God's words spoken in the past will not be contradicted; they have outlasted the disobedient forefathers (ancestors) and even the prophets who spoke the words (5). The judgment prophesied came upon God's people (6a). V 6b may be the continuation of the report of what happened in the past (so the NIV), or we could end the quotation marks after v 6a. We should then understand that Zechariah's hearers repented and acknowledged that God's judgment had been just.

Note how the prophet uses repetition in order to emphasize various aspects of the message: LORD Almighty ('of hosts' or 'armies'; i.e. the Lord who conquers all opponents) occurs three times in v 3 alone; return occurs three times in vs 2–3 and repented in v 6 represents the same Hebrew word). Zechariah is a great artist whose language repays careful study.

Note. The NIV translates 'Yahweh of hosts [armies]' by the expression the LORD Almighty. It also uses 'Almighty' to translate the Hebrew word Shaddai. Throughout the article 'the LORD of hosts' is used since it is more accurate and unambiguous. It is especially appropriate for the book of Zechariah, where armies play a large part in the prophecies. The title signifies that God has unlimited resources at his disposal.

1:7–6:15 Series of night visions with attached oracles

Three months after his initial prophecy (early in 519 BC) Zechariah receives a series of eight visions, apparently in one night. Many scholars have noted the difference between the fourth one and the others and have denied that it came from the prophet himself. It is different, but we see no reason to believe that Zechariah could not have received this also. In any case, it is part of the series of eight visions in our canonical text. The visions are different from most earlier ones in that the prophet is actually 'in the vision', able to question the angel he sees.

Before we examine each of the eight visions individually it will be helpful to look at them as a whole in order to appreciate their arrangement and significance. As was mentioned in the Introduction, structure was very important to the author/editor of Zechariah and is the key to understanding the message of the book.

The eight visions form the following chiasmic (ABCD/DCBA) structure (see Introduction):

1	Horses patrol the earth; the nations are at ease (1:7–17) A
2	Horns that scattered Jerusalem to be punished B
3	Jerusalem inhabited without walls C
4	Joshua the high priest reclothed ('Branch' mentioned) D
5	Two anointed: (Joshua) and Zerubbabel D ¹
6	Scroll/curse going forth against thief etc. C ¹
7	Basket and woman: wickedness removed far away B ¹
8	Horses and chariots patrol the earth: God's Spirit is at rest (6:1–8)A ¹

Visions 1 and 8 are obviously similar, but the situation changes from God being angry with the nations to his being content. We assume from the contrast and from the content of the intervening material that the nations have been dealt with, and Judah and Jerusalem are cleansed and protected.

The two pairs of visions 2–3 and 6–7 match each other. Note that each of them (and vision 8 also) is introduced by the phrase then I looked up. Visions 2 and 3 are linked together in that their form is similar and both focus on Jerusalem. The oracle 2:6–13 further emphasizes their unity and ties them to vision 1 with the phrase again choose Jerusalem. It also introduces new elements which become important over the whole of chs. 1–8: ‘You will know that the LORD Almighty [of hosts] has sent me ...’ (cf. 4:9; 6:15); many nations will join themselves to God (8:20–23; cf. 6:15a); and God will dwell in the midst of his people and be their God (8:3, 8).

There are grounds for linking together visions 2 and 7. Their internal structure is similar, in that both have two parts: horns and craftsmen/women in a basket and winged women. They both also have a lot of vocabulary in common. This is a very obvious link in the original Hebrew but has been obscured in the English translation. These two visions also include a direct prophetic oracle (2:4–5; 5:3–4). Visions 3 and 7 also share certain words.

Visions 4 and 5 occupy the central position and, in their present form at least, present a divinely authorized dual leadership of Joshua the high priest, and Zerubbabel (the ‘Branch’) who rebuilds the temple and, according to 6:13, bears royal honour. They stand before the Lord of the whole earth.

Visions 6 and 7 belong together: both speak of ‘going forth’, and deal with the removal of evil from the land. ‘Going forth’ also forms a link with the last vision.

Vision 8 rounds off the whole, forming its own climax to the series as it describes the accomplishment of God’s purposes: the Lord of the whole earth.

6:9–15 is an account of a prophetic word and action, which picks up some of the most important themes mentioned previously: the two leaders, the temple and re-gathering of people to rebuild it, and ‘you shall know that the LORD Almighty [of hosts] has sent me to you’. V 15b refers back to 1:2–6 (especially v 4).

1:7–17 The first vision: horses patrol the earth

There are three descriptions of individuals in the vision: a man riding ... (8, 10), the angel [messenger] who was talking with me (9, 13–14) and the angel of the LORD (11–12). Probably the first and third of these are the same (see especially v 11). The expression the angel who was talking with me occurs in most of the visions.
