(e) The Gospel of Basilides.—In Alexandria Basilides and his school maintained their apostolic succession along two lines. They claimed as their authority for doctrine Glaucias, the interpreter of Peter (Clem. Strom. vii. 17. 4), and they circulated an edition of the Gospel or Gospels which had been prepared in their own interests. This is the so-called 'Gospel of Basilides,' though the title (κατὰ Βασιλίδην) was of course due to his opponents.

There seems no reason to doubt the accuracy of Origen's reference to a Gospel of Basilides, which that distinguished Egyptian Gnostic must have composed before the middle of the 2nd cent.

* Besides an earlier study, Evangelii secundum Petrum et Petri Apocalypses quæ supersunt . . . cum latina versione et dissertatione critica, Paris, 1892.

† A smaller pamphlet by this writer (Das Petrus-evangelium. Synoptische Tabelle nebst Uebersetzung und kritischem Apparat, Berlin, 1893) was translated by J. Macpherson (The Gospel of St. Peter, Edinburgh, 1893).

(possibly under Hadrian, or even Trajan), but the only means of determining approximately its character is furnished by the quotations made by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 12) from the twenty-third, and by the Acta Archelai (lxvii., ed. C. H. Beeson) from the thirteenth, of the twenty-four books of Exegetica which Basilides himself composed as a commentary upon it. These quotations make it improbable that the Gospel was merely a collection of sayings of Jesus, like the so-called Q or second source of Matthew and Luke. The glimpses we can gain of it* rather point either (a) to a compilation or harmony based on the canonical Gospels (Zahn, Krüger, Bardenhewer), or (b) to a more independent Gospel of the Synoptic type. The similarities between the extant fragments (e.g. that from the 13th book relates to the Parable of Dives and Lazarus) and Luke's Gospel have led some critics (e.g. Lipsius, Windisch, and Waitz) to conjecture that Basilides simply prepared an edition of Luke for his own purposes. In this case, his Gospel would be, like that of Marcion, an altered form of our canonical Third Gospel. Origen more than once refers in his Homilies on Luke to the numerous heretics who had recourse to this Gospel, quoting it like the devil for anti-divine purposes of their own. As Basilides is grouped with Marcion in Origen's references, and as the extant fragments can almost without exception† be described as distinctively Lucan, it is not unlikely that his εὐαγγέλιον was an edition of Luke.

SPECIAL LITERATURE.—Hilgenfeld's Einleitung in das Neue Testament, p. 46 f.; Zahn's Geschichte des Kanons, i. 763-774; 'Basilides und die kirchliche Bibel'; and H. Windisch in ZNTW, 1906, pp. 236-246: 'Das Evangelium des Basilides.'

(f) The Gospel of Marcion.—Marcion's 'Gospel' was certainly an edition of Luke, prepared for the use of those who shared his antipathy to Judaism. This dogmatic purpose explains most of the omissions—e.g. of the first two chapters, of 11<sup>29-32</sup>, and of 20<sup>37-38</sup>. It is a further question whether his text does not occasionally reproduce a more original form than that of the canonical Luke. But in any case his 'Gospel,' though to a slight degree harmonistic (i.e. introducing material from other Gospels), is not in the strict sense of the term an independent uncanonical production. Its title was 'the Gospel of the Lord.' The best critical reconstruction is in Zahn's Gesch. des Kanons, i. 674 f., ii. 409 f., together with Sanday's Gospels in the Second Century (1876, ch. viii.). Hahn's earlier reconstruction (1823) was translated into English by J. Hamlyn Hill (Marcion's Gospel, 1891).

(g) The Gospel of Apelles.—Apelles, Marcion's disciple, is said by Epiphanius (xliv. 2) to have quoted the Logion, γίνεσθε δόκιμοι τραπεζίται, as occurring ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ. If so, he must have used other Gospels than that of his master, for the saying does not occur in Marcion's Luke. But it does not follow that he edited or composed a Gospel of his own. The Logion was evidently current in many quarters (cf. Resch, TU xxx. pp. 112-128), though it never occurs in any fragment of an uncanonical Gospel. Apelles simply used it to corroborate his principle of selecting from Scripture the salient passages (χωρὶς γὰρ, φησὶν, ἀπὸ πάσης γραφῆς ἀναλέγων τὰ χρήσιμα).

(h) The Gospel of the Naassenes.—In the Philosophoumena, Hippolytus quotes a number of Gospel-

* Jesus did not suffer on the Cross (Iren. i. 24. 4), but changed places with Simon of Cyrene, and stood mocking those who imagined they were crucifying Him. This Docetic representation of Irenæus differs from that of Hippolytus, according to whom the Jesus of Basilides really died and rose (cf. p. 501).

† The fragment (Strom. iv. 12) which Zahn connects with Jn 91<sup>3</sup> may be connected equally well with Lk 21<sup>12c</sup> or 23<sup>39c</sup>; and the other fragment, which seems to echo Mt 19<sup>12</sup> (Strom. iii. 1-2) probably was taken not from the Εὐαγγελικά of Basilides but from the Θεκά of Isidore his son (mentioned in the immediate context).

sayings from the usage of the Ophite Naassenes, but whether they came from a special Gospel composed by this Gnostic sect or whether they are simply citations from some treatise like the Gospel of Perfection or the Gospel of Eve, it is not possible to say. In the former case, it must have been a Gospel compiled from the uncanonical Gospels. One citation is: 'Why call me good? One is good, my Father who is in heaven, who makes his sun rise on the just and the unjust and sends rain on the holy and on sinners' (Lk 18<sup>19</sup>, Mt 5<sup>45</sup>). Another is: 'Unless you drink my blood and eat my flesh, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven—and even though you do drink the cup I drink, whither I go thither you cannot enter.' Two are distinctively Johannine; one runs thus: 'His voice we heard, but his form we have not seen'; and the other, 'I am the true Door.' The following are distinctively Matthean: 'You are whitened sepulchres, inwardly full of dead men's bones, since the living Man is not among you,' and 'The dead shall leap from the tombs.' The Gospel—if it was a Gospel—was a Gnostic compilation, but neither its date nor its scope can be determined from the few extant fragments. The general tenets of the sect, as recorded by Hippolytus, suggest that it had some affinities with the circle which used the Gospel of the Egyptians.

(i) Three Oxyrhynchite (Greek) fragments.—(i.) A small fragment of a Gospel in a papyrus roll is assigned by Grenfell-Hunt (Oxyrhynchus Papyri, iv. [1904], pp. 22–28) to a period not later than A.D. 250. The mutilated opening reads like a short paraphrase of Mt 6<sup>25</sup> = Lk 12<sup>22–23</sup>, Mt 6<sup>30</sup> = Lk 12<sup>27–28</sup>, Mt 6<sup>31–33</sup> = Lk 12<sup>25–29</sup>: 'from morning [till evening, nor] from even[ing till m]orning, neither [for your food] what you shall eat [nor] for [your clothing] what you shall put on. [You are] far better than the [lil]ies which grow but spin not. . . . Having one garment, what [do you lack]? . . . Who could add to your stature? He will give you your garment.' Then follows (cf. Jn 14<sup>19f.</sup>) a question put by the disciples, with the answer of Jesus. 'His disciples say to him, When wilt thou be manifest to us, and when shall we see thee? He says, When you are stripped and yet not ashamed. . . .'* Finally, a mutilated fragment at the end may be deciphered so as to yield a saying like that preserved in Lk 11<sup>62</sup>, but the restoration is too conjectural to be of any service in determining the original sense of the passage.

The editors think the Gospel of which this formed a fragment must have been composed in Egypt prior to A.D. 150, and that it was closely connected in some way with the Egyptian Gospel and the uncanonical source of 2 Clement. The fragment seems to be from some homily on the passage Mt 6<sup>25</sup>, in which the preacher dramatizes his teaching by putting it into the form of a dialogue. The edifying tendency corresponds to the primitive Christian instinct about marriage and the sexes which afterwards developed into Eneeratism, but which neither then nor afterwards has been incompatible with orthodox belief. The question and answer at the close form a mystic expansion of the preceding saying about the garment—an expansion which presupposes a verbal form of the Logion like that of the Gospel of the Egyptians as it appears in Clement's citation, not in that of 2 Clem. (see p. 495), although here the question is put by the disciples instead of by an individual (Salome?). Resch (TU new ser. xiii. [1904] 593 n.) holds that the whole fragment comes from the Egyptian Gospel; but there is not enough evidence as yet to show that the Oxyrhynchite Gospel was identical with this early document. Such ascetic tendencies were not confined to any one circle, and it is uncritical to assume that the varied expressions of them which survive in Gospel fragments belonged to the same document, or even to different recensions of the same document. The Oxyrhynchite Gospel may have been the source used in 2 Clement; the difference in the wording of the two passages is not conclusive against this conjecture as it is against the theory that the Oxyrhynchite Gospel or the Clementine source is identical with the Gospel according to the Hebrews.

(ii.) A second Oxyrhynchite fragment was published in 1907 by Grenfell and Hunt (op. cit. v. 840), from a vellum leaf of the 4th (5th?) century. It begins with the conclusion of an address by Jesus to the disciples and proceeds to a dialogue between Jesus and a high priest in the temple* at Jerusalem (cf. Mk 11<sup>27</sup>), the theme of which (cf. Mk 7<sup>11f.</sup>) is the contrast between inward and outward purity:

" . . . before doing wrong he makes all sophistical excuses (πάντα σοφίζεται). But take heed lest you suffer like them, for the evil-doers among men do not receive [their due] among the living simply, but await punishment and sore torture." And taking them [i.e. the disciples] he brought them into the sacred precinct (το ἀγίον) and walked within the temple. And a Pharisee, a high priest named Levi (?), came up to them and said to the Saviour, "Who allowed you to tread the precinct and look at these holy vessels when you have not washed, neither have your disciples bathed their feet? Nay, you are defiled and you have trodden this holy Place which is clean, which no one treads unless he has washed and changed his clothes, neither does he [venture to look at] the holy vessels." And . . . (with?) the disciples . . . [the Saviour said], "Then are you clean, you who are in the temple?" He says to him, "I am clean; for I have washed in the pool of David, and after descending by one stair I ascended by another, put on clean, white clothes, and then came and gazed on these holy vessels." The Saviour said to him in reply, "Woe to you, blind folk, who see not! You have washed in these running waters, in which dogs and swine have been flung night and day; and you have wiped clean the outside skin, which even harlots and flute-girls anoint and wash and wipe and adorn to excite the lust of men, while within they are [full?] of scorpions and [all vice?]. Now I and [my disciples?], who, you say, have not bathed, have bathed in the [living?] waters which issue from . . . But woe to . . ."

Like the four scraps recently discovered (op. cit. x. [1913] 1224), this extract cannot be assigned to any of the 2nd cent. uncanonical Gospels. That it belonged to this century is questioned by the editors, who point out that the ecclesiastical vogue of the canonical Gospels, which became strong towards the close of the 2nd cent., would make it difficult for any document covering the same ground to gain acceptance, and that 'after about A.D. 180 authors of apocryphal Gospels generally avoided competition with the uncanonical Gospels by placing their supposed revelations in the period of the Childhood or after the Resurrection.' If our fragment does not belong to the Gospel of the Egyptians, it at any rate betrays no dogmatic or heretical tendency. On the other hand, the author's acquaintance with the local customs of the Jewish temple in the 1st cent. seems defective (cf. J. Horst in SA, 1914, p. 451 f., and Preuschen in ZNTW, 1908, pp. 1–12), though more favourable verdicts have been passed occasionally on this feature of the fragment (cf. A. Büchler in JQR xx. [1907–08], 330 f.; Sulzbach in ZNTW, 1908, p. 175 f.; and L. Blau, ib. pp. 204–215).

(iii.) A tattered leaf of papyrus, 'copied probably in the earlier decades of the 4th cent.', containing fragments of a Gnostic Gospel, has been published by Hunt in The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, viii. [1911], p. 16 f. From what can be deciphered, it is clear that the contents must have come from some Valentinian or Marcosian source. Not only is the Lord called σωτήρ, as well as κύριος (cf. Iren. i. 1. 3),* but a distinction is drawn between πατήρ and προπάτωρ (id. i. 1. 1, 12. 3, etc.).†

* i.e. when the Eden-innocence (Gn 37) is restored, and sexual associations abolished. Cf. R. Reitzenstein's Hellenistische Wundererzählungen, Leipzig, 1906, pp. 67–68.

* This is one of the most remarkable features in the fragment. The uncanonical Gospels of the 2nd cent. very rarely furnish any material for the Jerusalem ministry of Jesus.

† This curious collocation occurs in another fragment of an uncanonical Gospel (cf. above, p. 492), probably NG; Waitz infers that our fragment came from the latter.

* 'Lord, how then can we find faith? The Saviour says to them, When you pass from things hidden [into the light of?] things visible, then the effluence (ἀπόρροια) of conception (ἐννοιας) will show to you how faith . . . He who has ears to hear, let him hear. The Lord (δεσπότης) of [all things?] is not the Father but the Fore-father; for the Father is the source of the things that are to come (ἀρχὴ ἐστὶν τῶν μελλόντων). . . . He who has an ear for what is beyond hearing [i.e. for the mystic or inner meaning]. But the text is uncertain, let him hear. I speak also to those who watch not. Again . . . he said, Everything born of corruption perishes, as the product of corruption; but what is born of incorruption (ἀφθαρσίας) does not perish, but remains incorruptible as the product of incorruption. Some men have been deceived, not knowing . . .

(j) Three Sahidic fragments.—It may be no more than a coincidence that Thomas should be mentioned in the second series of the Oxyrhynchite Logia,‡ and that he§ is also exceptionally important in the third of five Sahidic|| Gospel fragments published by Forbes Robinson (TS iv. 2 [1896], pp. 168–176). The fragment is long and remarkable. In the description of the feeding of the five thousand, Jesus bids Thomas go to the man (lad) who has the loaves and fishes. After the miracle, Thomas asks for a further proof of the Resurrection, in the raising of a man from the tomb, not merely in the raising of a dead, unburied person like the son of the widow of Nain. Then the dialogue of Jn 20<sup>27-29</sup> is used to introduce the raising of Lazarus. Jesus takes Thomas (Didymus) specially with him: 'Come with Me, O Didymus, that I may show thee the bones which have been dissolved in the tomb gathered together again.' The entire story (cf. Revillout, Les Apocryphes coptes, p. 132 f.) is retold with the special motive of re-assuring Thomas. It is Thomas who, at the bidding of Jesus, removes the stone from the tomb.

This Gospel must have been comprehensive. It included (fragm. 1) an account of the birth of John the Baptist and of Jesus, and also the Ministry, the Death, and the Resurrection. Thus the second Gospel fragment describes the wedding at Cana. The Johannine account is embroidered with some fresh details; Mary is the sister of the bridegroom's parents, and it is they who appeal to her for help when the wine fails, pleading that this lack will disgrace them as the hosts of Jesus, and that as the Saviour of the world He can do any miracle. The Johannine reply of Jesus to Mary (here = 'Woman, what wilt thou with me?') is softened by the observation that Jesus spoke 'in a kindly voice,' and by the repeated remark that Mary felt sure He would not grieve her in anything. The rest of the story is told by one of the servants who fill the waterpots. The fourth fragment¶ contains a conversation on the mount of Jn 6<sup>3-15</sup> between the disciples and Jesus, in which Jesus asserts that His kingdom is spiritual. Pilate and the Roman authorities, however, propose to make Him King of Judaea; such is their admiration for His miracles and character. Herod** opposes this.

* This would not of itself mean much; the same title occurs in the earlier Oxyrhynchite fragment (cf. p. 499).

† ἀγένητος also occurs in the lacuna.

‡ In the Oxyrhynchite Logia and the Apocryphal Gospels, 1893, C. Taylor connects the first series with the Gospel of Thomas; cf. Scott-Moncrieff, Paganism and Christianity in Egypt, 1913, p. 64 f.

§ Photius quotes (Bibliotheca, 232) a tradition that it was he, not Peter, who cut off the ear of the high priest's servant (Jn 18<sup>10</sup>).

|| The Egyptian colouring comes out in the cry of Lazarus, when he is raised: 'Blessed art thou, Jesus, at whose voice Amenti trembles.' The idea of Jn 11-15<sup>45</sup> is expressed by saying that the multitudes 'gathered together to Lazarus, like bees to a honeycomb, because of the wonder which was come to pass.'

¶ It corresponds to a Coptic fragment published by Revillout (Apocryphes coptes du nouveau Testament, Paris, 1876, p. 124 f.), and is assigned by that scholar to his 'Gospel of Gamaliel' (see below, p. 504).

** The anti-Herodian bias is even more marked than in the Gospel of Peter.

'And straightway there was enmity between Herod and Pilate because of Jesus from that day.' On coming down from the mount, the disciples and Jesus meet the devil in the guise of a fisherman, with many demons 'carrying many nets and dragnets and hooks, and casting nets and hooks on the mount': Jesus explains this vision in terms of Lk 22<sup>31-32</sup>. John, by permission of Jesus, challenges the devil to a fishing-contest. The devil catches 'every kind of foul fish which was in the waters—some taken by their eyes, some caught by their entrails, others taken by their lips.' The fragment then breaks off, before Satan's capture of sinners by their members is outdone by the apostolic capture of the elect.

The Coptic counterpart of this fragment published by Revillout is apparently followed (op. cit. 184) by a fragment corresponding to Jn 7<sup>11-54f.</sup> "' . . . the time is accomplished." When he said these things, he went into Galilee. When his brothers had gone up to Jerusalem for the feast, he went thither also, not openly but in secret. The Jews, however, sought for him, and said, "Where is he?" Now it was the house of Irmeel which was his place of residence owing to . . . the multitude. Then they said, "What are we to do?"

The fifth fragment describes the Resurrection (p. 179 f.). The anti-Jewish tendency* which emerged in the fourth fragment re-appears in the determination of the Jews to burn the very wood of the Cross—a plot thwarted by Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, who preserve the Cross, the nails, and the written title. A rich Jew called Cleopas, the cousin of the Virgin Mary, buries his son Rufus near the Saviour's tomb. The imperfect state of the text at this point leaves the course of events obscure, but evidently Rufus was raised from the dead by Jesus, in response to the prayer of Cleopas, who sat with his back to the stone at the tomb of Jesus. Cleopas 'saw with his eyes a figure of the Cross come forth from the tomb of Jesus. It rested upon him who was dead [i.e. Rufus]; and straightway he arose and sat.' Whereupon Cleopas, who had hitherto been unable to walk, owing to a disease of the feet, leapt up as if he had no disease at all. The description of the Cross recalls the Gospel of Peter.

The fragments are all late; they profess to quote from Josephus and Irenaeus, and in any case must be placed not earlier than the 3rd century. If there was some connexion between later forms of the Gospel of Thomas on the one hand and a Gospel of the Twelve (see above, p. 486) on the other, these fragments might be placed approximately in this quarter. But as the fragments are embedded in homiletical material, there is always the possibility that such stories were imaginative tales, not necessarily drawn from any written Gospel. They illustrate also the difficulty of assigning material like this to our second or to our third group; the later fragments tally in several respects with some Coptic fragments which fall to be noted in our third section.

III. GOSPELS OF THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION.—(a) The Gospel of Philip.—The existence of a Gospel of Philip is attested by the Pistis Sophia, but the only extant quotation occurs in Epiphanius (xxvi. 13): 'The Lord revealed to me what the soul must say when she mounts to heaven, and how she must answer each of the Powers above. "I have known myself," she says, "and gathered myself from all quarters, and have not borne children to the Archon, but have torn up his roots and gathered the scattered members. And I know who thou art. For I," she says, "belong to those above." So saying, she is released. But if it is found that she has borne a son, she is kept below until she is able to recover her children and attract them to herself.'

The fragment reflects the Gnostic idea (cf. Bousset's essay in Archiv für Religionswissenschaft, 1901, p. 155 f.) of the ascent of the soul through the heavens, and the magic pass-words required for the journey, but the characteristic feature is the antipathy to marriage, which agrees with the 2nd cent. conception of Philip the Apostle.

According to Epiphanius, this pseudo-Philip Gospel was used during the 4th cent. by an immoral sect of Egyptian Gnostics to justify sexual vice instead of marriage (οἱ δὲ Δεῦνται παρ αὐτοῖς καλούμενοι, οὐ μίσγονται γυναῖξιν, ἀλλὰ ἀλλήλοις μίσγονται). The Gospel of Philip, which, according to the 6th cent. Leontius of Byzantium (de Sectis, iii. 2, λέγουσι γὰρ Εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Θωμᾶν καὶ Φιλίππον, ἅπερ ἡμεῖς οὐκ ἴσμεν),* was used by the Manichæans, may have been a special edition of the original Philip Gospel.

The Pistis Sophia (69-70) proves that this Gospel circulated among Gnostic Christians in Egypt during the 3rd century. If it was the source of Clement's tradition that Jesus spoke the words of Lk 9<sup>60</sup> ('Let the dead bury their dead') to Philip (Strom. iii. 4. 25), then the date could be brought back to about the middle of the 2nd century. It is no argument against this conjecture to say that the Gospel of Philip did not contain Synoptic material but was a Gnostic speculative work set in the post-Resurrection period. We do not know all that the Gospel contained, and while it professed to have been written by Philip on the basis of revelations made to Thomas, Matthew, and himself by the risen Christ, what Philip wrote was not only the mysterious visions he was to see but 'all that Jesus said and all that he did'—which might (cf. Ac 1<sup>1</sup>) readily include an incident like that of Lk 9<sup>60</sup>. But the identification of the anonymous disciple with Philip (which re-appears in the later Acts of Philip) may have been derived from some other source in written or unwritten tradition; the anti-marriage view of Philip was probably older than the Gospel of Philip, and the latter cannot safely be put much earlier than the last quarter of the 2nd century. It is upon the whole better to place this writing among the Resurrection Gospels than in the second of our groups.

Philip appears in a curious little Coptic fragment of some Gospel (Revillout, Les Apocryphes coptes, 131-132), where he is accused by Herod of seditious conduct; Herod persuades Tiberius to allow him to confiscate all the Apostle's property. But it is one thing to put Philip into a Gospel—he would naturally appear in any later Gospel of the Twelve—it is another thing to make him the author of a Gospel.

(b) The Gospel of Matthias.—Neither Origen nor any writer after him quotes from the Gospel of Matthias. It is simply branded (e.g. by Eusebius, HE iii. 25. 6) along with the Gospels of Peter and Thomas. But Hippolytus (Philos. vii. 20) declares that Basilides and Isidore claimed to have received λόγοι ἀποκρυφοί from Matthias, who had been taught them privately by the Saviour. Hippolytus argues that the contents of these so-called apostolic λόγοι were really borrowed from the philosophy of Aristotle's Categories.† Again, Clement of Alexandria quotes twice from the Traditions (παράδοσις) of Matthias, once (Strom.

ii. 9. 45) in illustration of the principle that wonder is the beginning of knowledge ('as Plato says in the Theaetetus and as Matthias advises in the Traditions, "wonder at what is before you," laying this down as the first step to any further knowledge'), and once to prove the responsibility of a good example: 'If the neighbour of an elect person sins, the elect person sins; for, had he behaved as the word [ὁ λόγος] prescribes, his neighbour would have so esteemed his life that he would not have sinned' (Strom. vii. 13. 82). Elsewhere Clement observes that, according to some (λέγουσι γοῦν), 'Matthias taught that the flesh must be fought against and denied, no indulgence granted to its intemperate lust, and that the soul should grow by faith and knowledge' (Strom. iii. 4. 26).* Are the Traditions the same as the Gospel? It is not decisive against this, that Matthias is introduced as teaching, for both Peter and Philip are represented in their respective Gospels as giving instructions. On the other hand, παραδοσεις would be a strange and superfluous title for a writing which was known as a εὐαγγέλιον. Clement, like Hippolytus, ranks the Basilidians among the Gnostics who put themselves under the ægis of Matthias (Strom. vii. 17. 103, τὴν Μαθθίου αἰχῶσι προσάγεσθαι δόξαν); but this reference is not conclusive, for he adds: 'as the teaching which has come from all the apostles is one, so is their tradition.' He objects to one apostle's teaching being singled out for special purposes by any sect. But his own references to the teaching of Matthias are upon the whole respectful, and their tone does not suggest a Gospel identical with the λόγοι ἀποκρυφοί of the Basilidians. We might conjecture that the Gospel of the Basilidians (κατὰ Βασιλίδην) was the Gospel according to Matthias. But Origen's evidence is against this, and such data as we can gather for an estimate of the Gospel of Basilides point in another direction.† There is no reason why Traditions of Matthias should not have existed alongside of a Gospel of Matthias, and the λόγοι ἀποκρυφοί may refer to the former.

Since Matthias was elected an apostle after the Resurrection (Ac 1<sup>23-26</sup>), it would be natural to use his name and tradition as the vehicle of more or less secret revelations made by the Risen Lord to the disciples. Hence we may provisionally rank his Gospel in our third class.

In a Coptic fragment, assigned by Revillout to the Gospel of the Twelve (Les Apocryphes coptes, 157 f.), Matthias appears at the Last Supper. 'The Saviour set him with the twelve apostles, and the table was before them. When the Saviour stretched his hand towards the food, the table turned round, so that they stretched all their hands towards what the Saviour ate, and he blessed it. Matthias set down a platter on which was a cock. The salt was on the table. The Saviour stretched his hand to take the salt first, and as the table turned round all the apostles partook of it. Matthias said to Jesus, "Rabbi, you see this cock. When the Jews saw me killing it, they said, They will kill your Master like that cock." Jesus sighed. He said, "O Matthias, they shall accomplish the word they have spoken. This cock will give the signal before the light dawns. It is the type of John the Baptist who heralded me in advance. I, I am the true light which has no darkness in it.

* This is also quoted (from Clement?) as a word of Matthias, by Nicephorus Callistus, HE iii. 15.

† The one item of evidence that makes one hesitate is Clement's version of Lk 19<sup>14</sup> in Strom. iv. 6. 35, which begins, 'Zacchæus (some say, Matthias) . . . But even if this is any more than an instance of the frequent confusion between Matthias and Matthew, it might simply mean that, in the Gospel of Basilides or of Matthias, Matthias occupied the rôle of Zacchæus. Elsewhere he became confused not only with Matthew but with Simon the Zealot (cf. Schermann, TU 3rd ser. i. 3 [1907], pp. 283-285).

* These Gospels seem to have been Docetic; the Incarnation was κατὰ φαντασίαν; Jesus changed places with a man (Simon?), and therefore escaped suffering on the Cross; Jesus became invisible when transfigured, etc.

† As it happens, the saying about wonder as the gateway to knowledge occurs in Aristotle (Metaphys. i. 2. 15) as well as in Plato (Theaet. 155 D).

When this cock died, they said of me that I would die, I whom Mary conceived in her womb. I dwell there with the cherubim and seraphim. I have come forth from the heaven of heaven to earth. It was hard for the earth to bear my glory. I have become man for you. However, this cock will rise." Jesus touched the cock and said to it, "I bid you live, O cock, as you have done. Let your wings bear you up, and fly in the air, that you may give warning of the day on which I am betrayed." The cock rose up on the platter. It flew away. Jesus said to Matthias, "Behold the cock you sacrificed three hours ago is risen. They shall crucify me, and my blood will be the salvation of the nations (and I will rise on the third day) . . . ." This fragment witnesses to the prestige of Matthias in the tradition of the early Church; he is admitted to the fellowship of the Last Supper of Jesus, beside the twelve apostles, instead of being merely (Ac 1<sup>23-26</sup>) added to their company after the Resurrection. It was an easy step from this to make him the author of a Gospel or the vehicle of esoteric revelations.

(c) The Gospel of Mary.—In SBAW (1896, p. 839 f.) C. Schmidt describes three fragments from a still unedited Coptic MS of the 5th cent., and shows that the title of the first, 'Gospel of Mary,' covers them all. The alternative title, 'An Apocryphon of John,' belongs to the second fragment, but this is intelligible, for the Mary literature tends to be connected with apostolic apocalypses (cf. p. 503). The passage in Ac 1<sup>14</sup>, where Mary associates with the apostles, formed a suggestive point of departure for this kind of religious romance.

The Gnostic references in these fragments tally so exactly with some of the data supplied by Irenæus in his refutation of the Barbelo Gnostics (i. 29) that Schmidt and Harnack infer without hesitation that this Gospel of Mary must have been a document of the sect and known to Irenæus. Hitherto, we had only the assertion of Epiphanius (xxvi. 8) that certain Gnostic sects issued a number of works in the name of Mary. The present find ratifies this assertion.

'Now it came to pass on one of these days when John, the brother of James—who are the sons of Zebedee—had gone up to the temple [cf. Ac 3<sup>1</sup>], that a Pharisee named Ananias (?) drew near to him and said to him, "Where is your Master, that you are not following him?" He said to him, "He has gone (?) to the place whence he came." The Pharisee said to him, "By a deception has the Nazarene deceived you, for he has . . . and made you forsake the tradition of your fathers." When I heard this, I turned from the temple to the mountain, at a lonely spot, and was very sad in heart, and said, "How then was the Redeemer chosen, and why was he sent to the world by his Father who appointed him? And who is his Father? And how is that æon created, to which we are to come?" Suddenly heaven opens; the Lord appears, explains matters, and withdraws—the audience being not only John but the disciples. They are dismayed at the prospect of having to preach Jesus to the heathen. "How can we go to the heathen and preach the gospel of the kingdom of the Son of Man? If they refused to receive him, how will they receive us?" Then Mary* rose, embraced them all, and said to her brothers, "Weep not and sorrow not, neither doubt; for his grace will be with you all and will protect you. Rather let us praise his goodness, that he has prepared us and made us men." The discussion proceeds, Mary remonstrating with the incredulous disciples, and finally bursting into tears at a sharp rebuke from Peter. Levi stands up for her, however. But at this point our fragment unfortunately breaks off, and the next episode is an appearance of the risen Christ to John.

A fragment from 'the Wisdom of Jesus Christ' then begins. 'After his resurrection from the dead, his twelve disciples and seven women, his women-disciples, repaired to Galilee, to the mountain which . . . ' The Lord's appearance is described as 'not in his earlier form but in the invisible spirit; his form was that of a great angel of light.' The disciples question him on topics of Gnostic speculation, and receive answers.

The third fragment is an episode from the miraculous career of Peter. As he is healing the sick on the day after the Sabbath (i.e. the κυριακή or Lord's Day), a man taunts him with failing to cure his own daughter, who had been for long paralyzed. Peter then heals her. The story closes with an account of the conversion of a pagan, Ptolemæus.

The Gnostic work from which these fragments are preserved was, according to Schmidt, an Egyptian 'Gospel of Mary' (p. 842 f.), and its evident use by Irenæus proves its existence prior to A.D. 130.

(d) The Gospel of Bartholomew.—When Bartholomew evangelized India, according to the tradition preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 10. 3), he took with him Matthew's Gospel in Hebrew. This is not what Jerome and the Gelasian Decree mean by the Gospel of Bartholomew, which they rank among the apocrypha. The latter may now be recovered, in stray fragments from Latin, Greek, and even Coptic sources, although the same kind of problem emerges here as in the case of the Gospel of Peter, viz. how far it is possible to separate the extant fragments from a Gospel and from an Apocalypse, and to assign them to either.

The Latin fragments are preserved in a Vatican MS of the 9th cent. (Reg. lat. 1050), in which a compiler of the 7th or 8th cent. has written three episodes from that Gospel, containing conversations between Jesus and Bartholomew. Thus Bartholomew asks Jesus to tell him who the man was whom he saw carried in the hands of angels and sighing heavily when Jesus spoke to him. Jesus replies, 'He is Adam, on account of whom I came down from heaven. I said to him, "Adam, on account of thee, and on account of thy sons, I have been hung on the cross." Sighing, he said to me with tears, "Thus it pleased thee, O Lord, in heaven."' Bartholomew then asks why one angel refused to ascend with the other angels who preceded Adam, singing a hymn, and why, on being bidden ascend by Jesus, a flame shot from his hands as far as Jerusalem. Jesus explains that the flame struck the synagogue of the Jews, in token of the Crucifixion. 'Afterwards Jesus said, "Await me in yonder place, for to-day the sacrifice is offered in paradise." Bartholomew said, "What is the sacrifice* in paradise?" Jesus said, "The souls of the just enter the presence of the just to-day." Bartholomew said, "How many souls leave the body every day?" Jesus said, "Truly, I tell thee, 12,873 souls† leave the body daily." The second fragment describes Jesus reluctantly allowing Bartholomew and the other apostles, with Mary, to see the devil, or Antichrist. Jesus places them on Mount Olivet, and after a blast of Michael's trumpet and an earthquake, the Evil One appears, in chains of fire, under a guard of 6,064 angels. He is 600 cubits high and 300 broad. Jesus then encourages Bartholomew to strike Satan's neck with his feet, and to ask him about his ways and means of tempting men. Bartholomew kicks the devil, but returns in terror to ask Jesus for something to protect him during the conversation. Encouraged by Jesus, he makes the sign of the cross, kicks Satan again, and forces the furious creature to tell who he is. The third fragment runs: 'Then Bartholomew approached Satan, saying, "Go to thine own place with all like thee." And the devil said, "Wait till I tell thee how I was caught when God made man. I was then in the second heaven . . . "'

The extant Greek fragments, four in number, are much larger than the Latin, but their character-

* For munus the Greek has θυσία, and, in the reply of Jesus, 'Unless I am present, they do not enter paradise.'

† The editors Wilmart-Tisserant (IB, 1913, pp. 161 ff., 321 ff.) add M between XII and D, to approximate to the 30,000 of the Greek.

istics are the same. In the first, Bartholomew asks the Lord after the Resurrection to show him the mysteries of heaven. The apostle explains that when he followed Jesus to the Crucifixion, he saw the angels descend and worship Him, but that, when the darkness came, He (Jesus) had vanished from the Cross; all that Bartholomew could hear was a sound from the under world, loud wailing and gnashing of teeth. Jesus explains, 'Blessed art thou, my beloved Bartholomew, that thou didst see this mystery. And now I shall tell thee all thou hast asked me. When I vanished from the Cross, then I went down to Hades to bring up Adam, and all who are with him, thanks to (κατὰ τὴν παράκλησιν) the archangel Michael.' The sound was Hades calling to Beliar, 'God comes here, as I see.*' Beliar thinks it may be Elijah or Enoch or one of the prophets, and encourages Hades to bar the gates. Hades wails that he is being tortured; it must be God. 'Then,' says Jesus, 'I entered, scourged him and bound him with unbreakable chains, and took out all the patriarchs,† and so returned to the Cross.' A Greek replica of the first Latin fragment follows, after which Bartholomew asks, 'Lord, when thou wast teaching the word with us, didst thou receive the sacrifices in paradise?' Jesus replies, 'Truly, I tell thee, my beloved, when I was teaching the word with you, I was also sitting with my Father.' Bartholomew then seems to ask how many of the souls who leave the world daily are found just (the text is corrupt at this point); Jesus replies, 'Fifty.' And how many souls are born into the world every day? 'Just one more than those who leave the world.' Then the conversation ends. 'And when he said this, he gave them peace and vanished from them.'

The second Greek fragment introduces Mary. The apostles are in a place called Cheltura, when Bartholomew proposes to Peter, Andrew, and John that they ask Mary about the virgin-birth. None of them cares to put the question; Bartholomew reminds Peter that he is their leader, but Peter turns to John, as the beloved apostle and as the 'virgin' (παρθένος). Eventually Bartholomew himself approaches Mary. The text becomes broken at this point, but Mary evidently utters an elaborate prayer, at the close of which she invites the apostles to sit down beside her, Peter at her right with his left hand under her arm, and Andrew similarly supporting her on the left; John is to support her bosom, and Bartholomew to kneel at her back, in case she collapses under the strain of the revelation. She then tells them: 'When I was in the sanctuary of God, receiving food from the hand of an angel,‡ one day there appeared to me the shape of an angel, though his features could not be fixed (? τὸ δὲ πρόσωπον αὐτοῦ ἦν ἀχώρητον); he had not bread or a cup in his hand like the angel who formerly came to me. And suddenly the veil of the sanctuary was torn, and a great earthquake took place, and I fell on my face, unable to bear the sight of him. But he put out his hand and raised me, and I looked up to heaven; and a cloud of dew came . . . sprinkling me from head to foot. But he wiped me with his robe and said to me, "Hail, O highly favoured one, thou chosen vessel." And he put out his right hand, and there was a huge loaf; and he laid it on the altar of incense in the sanctuary; he ate of it first, and gave to me. Again, he put out his left hand, and there was an enormous cup, full of wine; he drank of it first, and gave to me. And I beheld and saw the cup full and the loaf. And he said to me, "Three years more, and I will send thee my word, and thou shalt conceive a son, and by him all creation shall be saved; and thou shalt be for the saving of the world. Peace to thee, my beloved; yea, peace shall be with thee evermore." And he vanished from me, and the sanctuary became as it had been before.' At this, fire issued from her mouth, and threatened to put an end to the world; whereupon the Lord bids her keep silence on the mystery. The apostles are terrified, in case the Lord is angry with them for their presumption in questioning her.

The third fragment is extremely brief and broken. Evidently, the apostles (through Bartholomew?) had asked for a revelation of the under world. 'Jesus said, "It is good for you not to see the abyss. But if you desire it, follow and look." So he brought them to a place called Chairoudek, the place of truth, and nodded to the western (δυτικούς) angels; and the earth was rolled up like a scroll, and the abyss was revealed, and the apostles saw it and fell on their face. But the Lord raised them, saying, "Did I not tell you, it is not good for you to see the abyss?"'

The long fourth fragment corresponds to the second and third Latin fragments. Jesus takes them to the Mount of Olives, accompanied by Mary. He is at first stern, when Bartholomew asks Him for a sight of the devil and his ways, but eventually leads them down and orders the angels over Tartarus to make Michael sound his trumpet; whereupon the fearful figure of Beliar appears, to the terror of the apostles. Bartholomew, as in the Latin fragment, is encouraged by Jesus to put his foot on the giant's neck and to question him about his names. The reply is, 'First I was called Satanael, which means angel of God; but when in ignorance I rebelled against God, my name was called Satan, which means angel over Tartarus.' He proceeds, against his will, to make further disclosures. 'When God made heaven and earth, he took a flame of fire, and fashioned me first, then Michael, thirdly Gabriel, fourthly Raphael, fifthly Uriel, sixthly Xathanael, and the other six thousand angels, whose names I cannot utter, for they are the bearers of God's rod (παβδουχοὶ τοῦ θεοῦ), and they beat me every day and seven times every night, and never let me alone, and waste my strength; the two angels of vengeance, these are they who stand close by the throne of God, these are they who were fashioned first. After them the multitude of angels were fashioned. In the first heaven there are a million, in the second heaven a million, in the third heaven a million, in the fourth heaven a million, in the fifth heaven a million, in the sixth heaven a million, in the seventh heaven a million. Outside the seven heavens. . . . After a few more details on the angels, the fragment then breaks off, in the MS (10th-11th cent.) from the library of the Orthodox Patriarch at Jerusalem. The Vienna MS shows the devil continuing the list of the angels of the elements.

The contents of these fragments correspond partly with what we know elsewhere* of the 'questions of Bartholomew' (for the Ethiopic and Coptic versions and recensions of this literature, cf. Lichtenhan in ZNTW, 1902, p. 234 f., and Haase, p. 22 f.). They also throw some light upon what lies behind the remark of Epiphanius in the 11th cent. (de Vita beatae Virginis, 25) that the holy apostle Bartholomew said, 'The holy Mother of God made a will.' There seems to be some connexion between the Gospel, whose fragments we have just cited, and the sources of the later Mary literature which is preserved in Sahidic and Coptic fragments (see below). The Coptic fragments glorify the primacy of Peter and the prestige of Mary, with Gnostic and Egyptian colouring (Revillout, Les Apocryphes coptes, 185 f.); they begin with an unsympathetic denunciation of Judas by Jesus, one of the first things the Lord does, apparently, being to reproach the traitor in Amenti and confirm his eternal doom. The Gospel from which they are taken was a Gospel of Bartholomew, for that Apostle speaks in the first person.

According to Wilmart and Tisserant, the Jerusalem MS approximates more than the others to the primitive text. The original Greek Gospel of Bartholomew, they conclude, appeared 'vers le IV<sup>e</sup> siècle, dans quelque secte chrétienne en marge de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie.' It was on the basis of this that the Coptic Bartholomew compositions, whether in the form of Gospel or of Apocalypse, developed the literature whose débris is now being recovered in still larger quantities.

(e) The Gospel of Nicodemus.—The Gospel of Nicodemus really belongs to the uncanonical Acts. The Acts of Pilate and its allied literature go back to the 4th or 5th cent.—possibly, in some primitive form, even to the beginning of the 2nd; but while Nicodemus is associated with the Acta (in one Greek edition of the text, they profess to be a translation of what Nicodemus wrote in Hebrew; in another Greek edition, Nicodemus is a Roman toparch who translates the Hebrew record of a Jew named Æneas; in the Latin version, Æneas is a Christian Jew who translates the Hebrew record of Nicodemus), they are never styled 'a Gospel of Nicodemus' till the 13th century. It has been conjectured that the title was due to the patriotism of the British, who claimed Nicodemus as their chief apostle ('quae coniectura inde aliquam probabilitatem habet quod antiquissima omnium recentiorum versionum est anglosaxonica: id quod documento est quanto honore opus istud iam pridem in Anglia habitum sit,' Tischendorf, i. p. lx, n. 3); but wherever and whenever it arose, it is quite adventitious.

Critical editions are promised by von Dobschütz (HDB iii. 545) and in the French series (cf. p. 479).

(f) The Gospel of Gamaliel.—In one of the Coptic Gospel fragments edited by Revillout (Patrologia Orient. ii. 172f.), the phrase occurs, 'I, Gamaliel, followed them (i.e. Pilate, etc.) in the midst of the crowd,' and it has been conjectured (e.g. by Ladeuze, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, vii. 252 f., Haase, 11 f., and Baumstark in RB, 1906, pp. 245–265) that if these fragments belonged originally to the Gospel of the Twelve, or if some other fragments of the later Pilate literature can be referred to such a source, there must have been a Gospel of Gamaliel in existence, perhaps as a special recension of the original Gospel of the Twelve. To this some critics (e.g. Ladeuze and Baumstark) further propose to relegate one or more of the Sahidic fragments which have been already referred to (cf. p. 500), placing the composition not earlier than the 5th cent., since it implies the Acta Pilati. The ramifications of the Pilate literature still await investigation, especially in the light of recent finds (cf. Haase, pp. 12 f., 67 f.). It would be curious if it could be proved that there was a tendency to use the Gamaliel of Ac 5<sup>34</sup> in favour of Christianity, as was the case with Pilate. But the period of this Gospel is very late and its reconstruction unusually hypothetical. 'Si l'Évangile de Gamaliel est un sermon composé au monastère de Senoudah, comme porte à le croire la provenance des manuscrits, il n'est pas étrange qu'on y ait voulu mettre en évidence, dans l'exposé de la vie du Christ, le rôle de Barthélémy dont on se flattait de posséder le corps au monastère, et qu'on s'y soit servi des apocryphes déjà existants sous le nom de cet apôtre' (Ladeuze, loc. cit. 265). The fragments which may be conjecturally assigned to this Gospel (?) tally with the Coptic Bartholomew fragments in several features, e.g. the description of Christ in Amenti, the appearance of Christ after the Resurrection to his mother Mary first of all (cf. p. 505), the narrative of the death of Mary, and the blessing pronounced on Peter as the archbishop of the whole world. Ladeuze's suggestion meets the main requirements of the case better than Revillout's conjecture (RB, 1904, pp. 167 ff., 321 ff.) that some primitive orthodox Gospel of the Twelve (see above) professes to have been edited by Gamaliel, the teacher of St. Paul, who had become a Christian (cf. Zahn's Gesch. des Kanons, ii. 673 f.). Even if the fragments are assigned to a 'Gospel,' they represent a late compilation, based primarily on the Johannine narrative, and expanded on the basis of legends drawn possibly from a special source. The tradition of Gamaliel's conversion is noted in Clem. Recogn. i. 65 and quoted by Photius (Bibliotheca, 171) from earlier written sources: 'Reperi quoque in eodem illo codice, Pauli in lege magistrum Gamalielum et credidisse, et baptizatum fuisse. Nicodemum item nocturnum (quondam) amicum, diurnum etiam redditum, martyrioque coronatum, quem et Gamalielis patrualem haec testatur historia. Baptizatum vero utrumque a Joanne et Petro, una cum Gamalielis filio, cui Abibo nomen.' Nicodemus became a martyr to Jewish fury, on this tradition; once the idea of his conversion and authorship of a Gospel was started, it was not unnatural that Gamaliel should also be brought inside the Christian circle.

(g) The Gospel of Perfection.—'Some of them,' says Epiphanius (xxvi. 2), speaking of the Nicolaitans or Ophite Gnostics, 'bring in a manufactured sort of adventitious work (ἀγγέλιον τι ποίημα) called The Gospel of Perfection,' which, he adds ironically, is the very perfection of diabolic mischief! This notice is probably derived from Hippolytus (Philaster, Hær. 33). If it was a Gnostic treatise in Gospel form, it may have resembled, or been related in some way to, the Gospel of Eve; but no details or quotations have been preserved, unless we may suppose that allusions to it occur in the Pistis Sophia, where uncanonical Gospel material is more than once employed.

(h) The Gospel of Eve.—'Others,' Epiphanius adds (xxvi. 2 f.), 'are not ashamed to speak of the Gospel of Eve,' who owed her gnosis to the serpent. One quotation from this Gospel is given: 'I stood on a high hill, and I saw a tall man and a short man (ἄλλον κολοβόν); and I heard as it were a voice of thunder and drew near to listen, and it spoke to me and said, "I am thou and thou art I, and wherever thou art there am I also, and I am sown in all (ἐν ἅπασιν εἰμι ἐσπαρμένος). And wherever thou gatherest me from, in gathering me thou gatherest thyself.'" Probably the quotation which follows, from the secret books of the Gnostics, was also derived from this 'Gospel': (ἐν ἀποκρύφους ἀναγινώσκοντες ὅτι) 'I saw a tree bearing twelve fruits a year, and he said to me, This is the tree of life.' Epiphanius (xxvi. 5) explains that this meant allegorically menstruation. But this so-called 'Gospel' may have been either of an apocalyptic character or simply, as Lipsius suggests, a doctrinal treatise in more or less historical form. In any case, its mysticism assumed a sexual form which readily lent itself to obscene interpretation.

(i) The Gospel of Judas.—The Gnostic Cainites, in the 2nd cent., composed 'a Gospel of Judas' (Iren. i. 31. 1; συνταγματίον τι, Epiphanius, xxxviii. 1) in the name of their hero, Judas, who was supposed to have alone penetrated the Divine secret, and consequently to have deliberately betrayed Jesus in order to accomplish it. Nothing has been preserved of this Gospel.

The fifth of Revillout's Coptic fragments (Les Apocryphes coptes, 156–157) contains a novel tradition about Judas. The disciples speak: 'We have found this man stealing from what is put into the purse every day, taking it to his wife, and defrauding the poor in his service. Whenever he returned home with sums of money in his hands, she would rejoice at what he had done. We have even seen him failing to take home to her enough for the malice of her eyes and insatiable greed. Whereupon she would turn him into ridicule. His wife then, like a Lady Macbeth, instigates him to the crime of selling Jesus. "Look how the Jews pursue your master. Up then and betray him to them. They will give you plenty of riches, and we will bestow them in our house, so as to live thereby." He got up, the unfortunate man, after listening to his wife, till he had consigned his soul to the hell of Amenti,* in the same manner as Adam listened to his wife, until he became a stranger to the glory of Paradise, so that death reigned over him and his race. Even so, Judas listened to his wife and thus set himself outside the things of heaven and the things of earth, to end in Amenti, the place of tears and moaning. He went to the Jews and agreed with them for thirty pieces of silver to betray his Lord. They gave them to him. Thus was fulfilled the word which was written: "They received the thirty pieces of silver for the price of him who is appraised." He rose up. He carried them to his wicked wife.

Here the motive of Judas is not personal greed; he is a thief, as in the Fourth Gospel, but it is owing to his wife's pressure. She is a temptress, and the misogyny of the author leads him to blame her more than her poor husband. But this is a catholic exculpatory estimate of Judas, in Egyptian circles, which is very different from the Gnostic glorification of him; he is not the author of a Gospel, but he is made out to be not so deliberately the author of Christ's betrayal as in the canonical traditions. We cannot tell whether the Gnostic Gospel made use of any such motive to explain his conduct. It is unlikely that this would be so, for his conduct, on the Gnostic theory, required no exculpation.

Another Coptic Gospel fragment, assigned doubtfully by Revillout (op. cit. 195-196) to the Gospel of Bartholomew, belongs to the same line of tradition. 'The apostle Judas, when the devil entered into him, went out and ran to the high priests. He said, "What will you give me for handing him over to you?" They gave him thirty pieces of silver. Now the wife of Judas had taken the child of Joseph of Arimathæa to bring him up. The day when the unfortunate Judas received the thirty pieces of silver and took them home, the little one (would not drink). Joseph went into the woman's chamber . . . Joseph was utterly distressed over his son. When the little child saw his father (he was seven months old), he cried, saying, "My father, come, take me from the hand of this woman, who is a savage beast. Since the ninth hour of this day, they have received the price (of the blood of the just)." When he heard this, his father took him. Judas also went out. He took . . . Then follows a broken passage belonging to the Acts of Pilate literature.

(j) Coptic fragments.—(i.) A Coptic Akhmim MS (4th-5th cent.) contains two fragments, which may have belonged to an uncanonical Gospel of the 2nd century. The second is a fragment of prophetic discourse by Jesus, predicting Ac 12<sup>34</sup> (?). The first opens with Mary, Martha, and Mary Magdalene going to the sepulchre to anoint the body, and weeping when they find the sepulchre empty. The Lord says to them, "Why do you weep? Cease weeping, I am he whom ye seek. But let one of you go to the brethren and say: Come, the Master has risen from the dead." Martha went away and told this to us. We said to her, "What hast thou to do with us, O woman? He who died is buried, and it is impossible that he lives." We did not believe her, that the Redeemer had risen from the dead. So she went to the Lord and said to him, "No one among them has believed me, that thou livest." He said, "Let another of you go and tell it to them again." Mary went and told us again, but we did not believe her. She went back to the Lord and told him. Then said the Lord to Mary and her other sisters, "Let us go to them." And he went and found us within and called us outside. But we thought it was a ghost, and we did not believe it was the Lord. So he said to us, "Come and . . . Thou, O Peter, who hast denied me thrice, dost thou still deny?" And we went up to him, doubting in our hearts whether it was he. So he said to us, "Why do you doubt still and disbelieve? I am he who told you, so that on account of my flesh and my death and my Resurrection you may know it is I. Peter, lay thy finger in the nail-marks on my hands; and thou, Thomas, lay thy finger in the lance-wounds on my side; and thou, Andrew, touch my feet and see that they . . . to those of earth. For it is written in the prophets: *phantoms of dreams . . . on earth." We answered him, "We have in truth recognized that . . . in the flesh." And we threw ourselves on our faces and confessed our sins, that we had been unbelieving.

This fragment professes to give the testimony to the Resurrection which the disciples bore, based on revelations received by them from the Lord. As in the appendix to Mark's Gospel, their unbelief is emphasized; they refuse to believe the story of the women, and it requires the direct appearance of Jesus to convince them. 'Therefore . . . we have written to you concerning . . . and we bear witness that the Lord is he who was crucified by Pontius Pilate.' The apologetic interest of this emphasis on the original incredulity of the apostles may be to heighten the importance of the Resurrection appearances, as against the denial of the bodily Resurrection by some Gnostics. Even the disciples, it is said, held it impossible once! But they were taught the truth! The fragment mentions 'Corinthus' (= Cerinthus) and 'Simon' (= Simon Magus), and the original Greek Gospel writing, of which it is a translation, was evidently a piece of apologetic fiction issued by some pious (Gnostic?) Christian in order to refute the heretical tendencies represented by these two great names. It professes to be written in the name of the Twelve, and probably appeared during the first half of the 2nd century. The data do not enable us to determine whether it belonged to a Gospel of the Twelve or, as Schmidt thinks, to the pseudo-Petrine literature.

SPECIAL LITERATURE.—The fragment was published first by C. Schmidt in SBZW, 1895, pp. 705-711, but a full edition is still awaited; Harnack's essay appeared in Theolog. Studien B. Weiss dargebracht, Göttingen, 1897, pp. 1-8; cf. Bardenhewer, 397-399, Haase, 36-37. Harnack dates it between A.D. 150 and 180, Schmidt somewhat earlier. The second fragment suggests that the Gospel (if it was a Gospel) was a Peter Gospel, but the extent and aim of its 'Gnosticism' cannot be determined in the present state of our knowledge.

(ii.) Some lines of another Coptic papyrus (4th-6th cent.) appear to contain debris of what was once an uncanonical Gospel. The fragments are extremely mutilated, and the translators and editors disagree upon their age and origin. The last runs thus—evidently the close of a Gospel narrative which described a post-Resurrection scene on the mountain, prior to the Ascension: '(that I) may manifest to you all my glory and show you all your power and the mystery of your apostleship

* Wis 18:7, in a description of the terrors that befell the Egyptians during the plagues. The scriptural authority of Wisdom in wide circles during the 2nd and 3rd centuries is well known, but probably Origen is the only writer who expressly calls this literature prophetic (Hom. in Levit. v. 2, in Exod. vi. 1).

... (on the) mountain. . . . Our eyes penetrated all places, we saw the glory of his divinity and all the glory (of his) dominion. He invested (us with) the power of (our) apostle(ship).’ The previous fragment, whose contents are only separated from the other by two or three lines, may be either a piece from the same setting or a fragment of some Gethsemane story. It runs thus: ‘(that) he be known for (his) hospitality . . . and praised on account of his fruit, since . . . Amen.* Grant me now thy power, O Father, that . . . Amen. I have received the diadem of the Kingdom, (even the) diadem of . . . I have become King (through thee), O Father. Thou shalt subject (all) to me . . . Through whom shall (the last) Enemy be destroyed? Through (Christ). Amen. Through whom shall the sting of death (be destroyed)? (Through the) Only Begotten. To whom does (the) dominion belong? (To the Son.) Amen. . . . When (Jesus had) finished all . . . he turned to us and said, “The hour has come when I shall be taken from you. The spirit (is) willing, but the flesh (is) weak . . . then and watch (with me).” But we apostles wept . . . said . . . (Son) of God. . . . He answered and said (to us), “Fear not destruction (of the body), but rather (fear) the power (of darkness). Remember all that I have said to you: (if) they have persecuted (me), they will also persecute you. . . . Rejoice, then, that I (have overcome) the world, and have . . .”’

The fragments are evidently based upon the Gospels of Matthew and John; so much is clear even from what can be deciphered. Possibly they belonged to some uncanonical Gospel current in Egypt during the 3rd or even the 2nd cent., but the internal data are too slender to support any hypothesis which would connect them with the Gospel of the Egyptians (Jacoby) or even with the Gospel of the Ebionites=the Gospel of the Twelve (Schmidt, Zahn, Revillout). The ‘Gnosticism’ of the fragments is mild.

SPECIAL LITERATURE.—A. Jacoby, Ein neues Evangelienfragment, Strassburg, 1900; C. Schmidt (GGA, 1900, pp. 481–506); Zahn (NAZ, 1900, 361f.); Revillout, Patr. Orient. 1907, pp. 159–161; Haase, 1–11 (where further literature is discussed).

(iii.) Another Coptic fragment from a narrative of the trial is edited by Revillout (Patr. Orient., 161f.): ‘. . . to Jesus who was in the praetorium. He said to him, “Whence do you come and what do you say of yourself? I am sore put to it in defending you, and I . . . save you. If you are king of the Jews, tell us definitely.” Jesus answered and said to Pilate, “Do you say this of yourself, or have other people told you about me?” Pilate said to him, “Am I a Jew?—I! Your own people have handed you over. What have you done?” Jesus replied, “My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, my servants would fight to prevent anyone handing me over to the Jews. However, my kingdom is not of this world.” Pilate said to him, “Then you are a king?” Jesus replied, “It is you who say so; I am a king.” Pilate said to him, “If you are a king, let me learn the truth from your own lips so that you may be relieved of these troubles and these revolutions.” Then he said to him, “Behold, you confess, you say with your own lips that I am a king. I was born and I have come into the world for this thing, to bear witness to the truth. He who belongs to me hears my voice.” Pilate said to him, “What is truth?” Jesus said to him, “Have you not seen—you!—that he who speaks to you is Truth? Do you not see in his face that he has been born of the Father? Do you not hear from his words that he does not come from this world? Know then, O Pilate, that he whom you judge, he it is who shall judge the world with justice. These hands which you seize, O Pilate, have formed you. This body you see and this flesh which they . . .”’

The fragment is also assigned by Revillout to his Gospel of the Twelve, but it may be no more than a paraphrase of Jn 18<sup>34</sup> from some early Egyptian homily. The rest of Revillout’s fragments (cf. above, p. 503) are plainly from an Egyptian treatise which belongs as much to the Mary literature as to the category of the uncanonical Gospels.

(k) An unidentified fragment.—In Augustine’s treatise contra Adversarium Legis et Prophetarum (ii. 14), he quotes a saying from some apocryphal scripture—evidently a Gospel, since he proceeds: ‘but in the Gospel of the Lord, which is not apocryphal’ (i.e. esoteric), he taught the disciples after the Resurrection about the prophets (Lk 24<sup>27</sup>). The quotation is as follows: ‘But when the apostles asked what view should be taken of the prophets of the Jews, who were thought to have sung something about his arrival in the past, our Lord, vexed that they still took such a view, replied, “You have sent away the living One who is before you, and you make up stories about the dead!”’ This may have come from some Marcionite or Ebionitic (cf. above, p. 493) Gospel. J. H. Ropes (TU xiv. 2 [1896], 119–120) suggests that it would fit in with the story of Mt 8<sup>22</sup>, but the context in Augustine points rather to a post-Resurrection dialogue between Jesus and the disciples.

(l) The Fayyûm fragment.—The Fayyûm fragment, first published by G. Bickell (cf. Zeitschrift für kath. Theologie, 1885, pp. 498–504, 1886, p. 208f.), is a 3rd cent. scrap of papyrus which has received more attention than it deserves; it is no more than a loose quotation of Mk 14<sup>5–7, 29–30</sup> (so Zahn, as against Bickell, Harnack [TU v. 4, 481–497], Resch [TU x. 2, 1894, pp. 28–34], P. Savi [RB, 1892, 321–344], and others), and cannot be assigned with any probability to the Gospel of the Egyptians or any other uncanonical Gospel. The fragment runs: ‘And in departing he spoke thus. “You will all be offended (σκανδαλισθήσεσθε) this night, as it is written: I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.” Peter said, “Though all [are offended], not I!” The Lord said, “The cock will crow twice, and thou shalt be the first to deny me three times.”’ Revillout (Les Apocryphes coptes, 158–159) places it as a sequel to the Matthias fragment quoted above (pp. 501–502), assigning it to his ‘Gospel of the Twelve.’ But it may have come from some Gospel of our third group, if it came from any Gospel at all.

GOVERNMENT, GOVERNOR.—(1) The term ‘government’ occurs twice in the AV of the NT, in neither case with reference to civil government. In the first passage, 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>, it occurs in the plural, being a translation of the Greek κυβερνήσεις, which, like the English ‘government,’ is a metaphor from steersmanship (see following article). In the second passage, 2 P 2<sup>10</sup> (cf. Jude<sup>8</sup>), the word appears to be abstract, but to have an implicit reference to the domination of angels (see art. DOMINION).

(2) The word ‘governor’ occurs many times in the NT. In nearly every passage it is a translation of ἡγεμών or some word connected with it. This word is the most general term in this connexion in the Greek language (=Lat. præses). This can be seen in two ways. In the first place, in Mk 13<sup>9</sup> (and parallels) and 1 P 2<sup>13</sup> the word is coupled with ‘kings’ (emperors), and the two words together include all the Gentile authorities before whom the followers of Jesus will have to appear. In the second place, the term, or its cognates, is used with reference to authorities of such diverse status as the Emperor Tiberius (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>), the legate P. Sulpicius Quirinius (Lk 2<sup>3</sup>, a special deputy of consular rank sent by the Emperor Augustus in an emergency to have temporary rule over the great province of Syria), and the successive procurators of the small and unimportant province of Judæa, Pontius Pilate and Felix; for 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup> see ETHNARCH. It was in accordance with Greek genius to avoid specific titles and to use general terms, and to the Oriental the king (emperor) dwarfed everyone else. The procurator (agent) was really a servant of the Emperor's household, never of higher rank than equestrian, and belonged to the lowest class of governor. He is never called by his own (Greek) name (ἐπίτροπος) except in a variant reading of Lk 3<sup>1</sup>. A. SOUTER.

GOVERNMENTS.—In each of the five lists of spiritual gifts or of gifted persons which St. Paul places in his Epistles (1 Co 12<sup>8-10, 28, 29-30</sup>, Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) there are at least two items which are not found in any other list. In 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup> we have 'helps' or 'helpings' (ἀντιλημψεις) and 'governments' or 'governings' (κυβερνήσεις). In 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> 'gifts of healings' are followed by 'helpings' and 'governings.' These two form a pair, and refer to management and direction in things external. 'Governings' is a word which comes from the idea of a κυβερνήτης, a shipmaster (Ac 27<sup>1</sup>, Rev 18<sup>17</sup>) or pilot (Ezk 27<sup>8, 27, 28</sup>), directing the course of a ship. The word occurs nowhere else in the NT, but in the LXX we have it in the sense of 'wise guidance' in peace or war (Pr 11<sup>14</sup> 24<sup>6</sup>). St. Paul probably uses it of those who superintended the externals of organization. It would therefore denote those who are over the rest, and rule them, the προϊστάμενοι of 1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>, Ro 12<sup>8</sup> and the ἡγούμενοι of He 13<sup>7, 17, 24</sup>, Ac 15<sup>22</sup>. The 'governors' are directors and organizers, not teachers; still less are they 'discerners of spirits,' as Stanley suggests. They are persons with a gift for management. It is possible that they afterwards developed into a class of officials as 'elders' or 'bishops,' but that stage had not been reached when 1 Cor. was written. See HELPS and CHURCH GOVERNMENT. A. PLUMMER.

GRACE.—1. General meaning and presuppositions.—(a) Divine prevenience and generosity.—Grace is a theistic idea. It emerges inevitably in the progress of religious thought and practice with the idea of God's separateness from man (cf. in India, Brahmanism; in Greece, Orphism). It deepens in character and content in the growing sense of separateness, with the concurrent conviction, ever deepening in intensity, of the Divine goodness in sustaining fellowship with man (cf. in Israel, Hebraism, Judaism). It attains perfect form in Christianity, whose Founder exhibits a personal life so dependent on and penetrated by God as to reach absolute maturity simply through the Divine power immanent within it—the ceaseless sense, possession, and operation of the Divine Spirit. Irresistibly the soul's interior experience of that fellowship postulates a realm of Divine prevenience and generosity. Generally the postulate embraces three features: the priority of God, His self-donation to man, His regard and care for man's salvation—all making emphatic the givenness of man's best life, the Divine action inviting his. Grace is thus a purely religious affirmation expressing the soul's assurance that God's goodness is the beginning, medium, and end of its life. Here God is not simply a great First Cause: first in time, foremost in space; He is rather the background and dynamic force of man's inner being, and, for its sake, of all created being; enfolding and comprehending it, giving it its origin, reason of existence, unity, completeness, final end; the envelope of the whole by which the parts do their best and issue in their most fruitful results, so that the soul is a harmony of linked forces,* Divine and human. Here, too, the soul's blessedness is not simply the gift of God. The soul's life is through Himself—'His very self and essence all-Divine.'† Its various stages, the growing process of His grace, do not depend, nay, disappear when made to depend, on merely mental reference to His acts, or on merely self-originating impulses. Such attachment of the human to the Divine is too superficial. The inadequacy of man's spirit to work out its own perfection is irremediable. Salvation is only secure in utter and entire dependence on the Divine Life, distinct from man's, the life which precedes and from which proceeds all his capacity for good: in which, truly, 'we live and move and have our being.'

(b) The Christian experience.—The apostolic doctrine of grace presupposes the distinctive Christian experience. The NT teaching falls into three groups: Synoptic, Pauline, Johannine. The first reproduces the most immediately and literally faithful picture of Christ's sayings; the second and third present the earliest impressive developments of His sayings in individual realization, and are rich in exposition and explanation of the subjective apprehension and appropriation of Divine grace. It is the process in man's activity that is detailed more than the analysis of the attribute in God. Between the two types we are conscious of marked contrasts, not only in their form but in the substance and mode. Along with a deep underlying unity of fundamental thought, it is true to say that the consciousness of the apostles is not identical with the consciousness of Christ. Christ is not repeated in them.‡ The teaching of both is the direct transcript of their spiritual history; but their spiritual constitution is so radically different that their teaching is bound to have radical differences. 'He spoke as the sinless Son of God; they wrote from the standpoint of regenerated men.'§ The principle of sin alters the whole position. The view-points for estimating grace increase. Thus it is that while Christ speaks little, if at all, of grace, it is a central conception of the apostles. Therefore also, while grace is in both, it is 'in Christ' in a vitally intimate way such as cannot be predicated of the apostles except 'through Christ.' It is 'the grace of Christ,' as 'of God'; not the grace of the apostles, whose it is only 'by his grace.'

Again we have to note in Christ's case no trace of that separateness of the human from the Divine Spirit in their communion and inter-operation in the relationship of grace, which is so clear in the case of the apostles, a distinction of which they are so confident that they claim a special illumination and infusion of supernatural light and energy in this experience. Christ's mediation of grace to them is basic. It differentiates their doctrine not only from Christ's, but from all ethnic and prophetic ideas. The apostles are neither mere seekers after God, nor simply seers or servants or interpreters of God: they are sons, the bearers of Himself;|| and the immensely richer experience is reflected in the ampler refinement of their idea of grace and its more commanding place in their system. Nor should we fail to observe that the term 'grace' denotes a new economy in human history. Primarily it signifies a fresh advance of the human spirit under the impetus of new Divine redemptive force. That fact implies a fresh outflow of energy from God and a fresh uplift of the world's life; man is 'a new creation,'* the world 'a new earth';† there is revealed a new stage in the fulfilment of the eternal purpose. Grace here has cosmic significance. Sin is over-ruled for good in the whole world-order as it is in the individual Christian heart. History, like the soul, is transformed through Christ. The initial and controlling causes of that whole vast change are discovered to the primitive Christian perception in a great surprise of God's forgiveness, pronounced and imparted by Christ, and made effective for regeneration by a force none other than, not inferior to, His Holy Spirit. Thereby a new era is inaugurated—the dispensation of 'the gospel of the grace of God.'‡ Grace, then, comprises three specific moments: a supernatural energy of God, a mystical and moral actuation of man, an immanent economy of Spirit.

(c) Essential characteristics.—Grace, accordingly, is erroneously regarded when defined as a substance or force or any sort of static and uniform quantum. It is 'spirit and life,' and as such its characteristics are personality, mutuality, individuality. The experience of grace is that of 'a gracious relationship'§ between two persons, in which the proper nature of either in its integrity and autonomy is never at all invaded. The mode is not impersonal or mechanical. The blessing is not an influx so much as response to an influence; a gift yet a task; a mysterious might overpowering, but not with power, rather with persuasion; the renewal of the entire disposition through implicit trust in God's goodness and by the diligent exercise of the powers of Spirit, ever latent and now let loose, with which He enables and quickens. It is not only an awakening of the moral self into more active freedom: it is first the conscious springing up and growth of a new life, sudden or gradual and wondrous, from immersion in the mystic bath,|| fed by the heavenly streams, whose cleansing power, if before unknown, is not alien, and invests the finite life with the sense of infinite worth and imperishable interest—a sense welcomed as native and as needful for the life's predestined end. The process is easily intelligible, yet readily liable to misunderstanding. The traditional doctrine, Catholic and Protestant, in its anxiety to safeguard both the mystical and moral constituents of the experience, has tended towards two grave defects—the separation of the two which in reality are one, and the confusion of the mystical with the magical.¶ Grace then becomes a material quantity, instead of spiritual quality. Psychologically a person is only inasmuch as he is living, growing. Man is, as he lives in God; and his capture** and surrender are achieved not in a thing but in a person, and not to a thing but to the One Person, whose right to claim him and renew his life consists precisely in this, that He is Himself absolutely, infinitely, and actually what man is derivatively, finitely, and potentially. Thus the act which binds man to God does so for growth and enhancement of life. All that comes from the living God is worked out by living souls, and is ever living and enlivening; it is as varied and individual as the variety of individuals concerned.

The apostles were Hebraic, and no true Hebrew could misinterpret this. To the Fathers it was so familiar. The covenant-relation was the central truth of their religion. Its very essence was this mutualness of religious communion. Vital godliness hinged on two realities—the Divine Being willing to be gracious, and the no less ready response man must make to Him. For God and man to come together, both must be individually active. To God's willingness to help, man comes with his willingness to be helped. To God's desire to forgive, man comes with a penitent mind. By mutual love, the love of God to man meeting the love of man to God, the two are reconciled. Complete surrender (religion) brings with it growing individuality and independence (morality). Herein, further, let us note, rests the explanation of two conspicuous facts in the life of grace—the fact, viz., that the inspiration of grace is neither infallible nor irresistible;* and the fact of the splendid outburst of fresh forms of goodness. The Church in her materialistic moods has been prone to forget both. The Apostolic Age is so rich spiritually just because so sensible of both. 'We have this treasure in earthen vessels' is the precise counterpart of the psalmist's 'the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord.' It is never forgotten that while the Divine Life is the milieu of the human, the human is the medium of the Divine, its assimilative capacity adequate only to the present need, not to the ultimate reality;† while its readiness to receive is never in vain in any event or circumstance or relation of life. The human spirit may appropriate only within limits; but the indefinite variety of limits alone bounds the operation of grace. Grace is all-sufficient; the 'fruits of the Spirit' correspond to its plenitude.

2. Specific redemptive content.—In seeking to analyze the contents of grace, we have no lack of material. What grace is to be seen in the spiritual personality it produces. The Apostolic Letters furnish a complete, typical description, of rare intensity and lucidity, of two such personalities of the loftiest order—St. Paul and St. John, and we possess abundant parallel records of Christian sanctity of every later age, to verify our conclusions. The letters are not so much doctrinal systems as a sort of journal intime of soaring, searching spirits: autobiographies of spirit, 'confessions' of what the writers saw and heard and knew of 'the mystery of Christ.'‡ As Christ 'witnessed' of Himself, the apostles 'witness' of Christ. Their witness is offered in two distinct types—the predominantly ethical and the predominantly contemplative—neither of which has ever failed to recur constantly in subsequent history. It may therefore be taken as comprehensive and normative. It is, moreover, offered with a minimum reference to the material through which it has operated—the psycho-physical organism and temperament in which the gracious working has developed itself.§ The scaffolding has been taken down, and the building is disclosed unencumbered with immaterial detail. From that fact we may trust in the apostles' balance of mind and credibility, since the very richness of their spiritual vision points to an unusually large subconscious life of 'the natural man' and its insurgent impulses, not easy to subdue, yet which, instead of dominating, is so exquisitely kept in place as to become a chief instrument and material of their life's worth and works. Regarding our data in this light, what do

‡ The recent extensive literature devoted to the study of the apostles' teaching has for main result to cast into bolder relief the splendid spiritual stature of, next to Christ, the two great figures, St. Paul and St. John.

we find?—At once a continuity of experience and an identity of essential fact.

(a) Supernatural principle of life.—To begin with, we find the life of grace to be constituted by the supernatural principle, and to be an indivisible entity. The life of the believer is by a new birth from above,* translating men into a new position before God and a new disposition to sustain it.† That is the consentient testimony of the apostles, as of the saints, of the first and of every age.‡ Grace is initially regeneration, the work of God's Spirit, 'whereby we are renewed in the whole man and are enabled more and more to die daily unto sin and to live unto righteousness.'§ Apostolic and saintly biography shows that this condition may have different levels and values in different natures, and even in the same nature at different times. It shows also that the maintenance of that condition means a constant and immense effort, a practically unbroken grace-getting and ever-growing purity in conflict with the insistent lower self. But the characteristic general fact of renewal remains, as something constant and inalienable—in its inferior planes as a fight against the devil; in its higher, a struggle with lower self, stimulated and impelled by God's illumination working in and upon the soul: constant and inalienable so long as the soul keeps turning towards the Light. For the grace of conversion|| is the concomitant of regeneration. Conversion is an act of the soul made possible by the Spirit, and should be as continuous as an act as regeneration is as a work.¶ This experience, which on one side is regeneration and on the other is conversion, is one which leaves the soul different for ever from what it was before; yet not in such wise as to prevent the soul itself living on, or as to raise the soul above its limitations and failings, so that it will not fall from grace, and will be kept from sin. But the endeavour to keep from fall and lapse is now on a larger and deeper scale, on a higher plane, on a new vantage-ground. It is always attended by the clear consciousness of the effort being 'in God,' 'in Christ,' and as wholly their work as the soul's.

This double consciousness of Divine and human action, nevertheless, does not divide the soul. On the contrary, the more deeply it proceeds, the more does the soul wake up and fuse itself into single vital volition to cast off what is inconsistent with its growing self and to mould what remains into better consistency. The soul as the subject of grace is not an automaton but a person, and the two actions are but two moments of one motion whose activities are not juxtaposed but interpenetrate in an organic unity.** Spirit and spirit can be each within the other ††—a favourite idea of the apostles.‡‡ In St. John the same thought is ever present under the categories of life, light, knowledge, love.§§ All here comes from, and leads to, a life lived within the conditions of our own existence in willed touch and deliberate union with God.

(b) Blessings of Christ's work and Person.—Next

we find the life of grace to be a progressive process of moral purification and mental enlightenment in mystical union with Christ. It is a growth in grace and in the knowledge of Christ,* in the 'grace and truth' that are come by Jesus Christ,† St. Paul dwells on this grace as 'righteousness,'‡ St. John dwells on it as 'truth' (light, knowledge);§ never, however, in either case on the one as exclusive or separate from the other. To St. Paul Christ is wisdom as well as righteousness; to St. John He is righteousness as well as truth, although in the former instance the point of emphasis is on righteousness, in the latter on light. For this reason, in the Pauline doctrine the description of the source, sphere, and effects of grace is mainly in juridical terms; in the Johannine, in abstract terms—true to the intellectual influences to which they were subject.|| The two accounts necessarily differ, and in important details. The fundamental conceptions are identical. A broad statement of their unity may well precede the elucidation of their divergences. To both types of idea: (1) Christ is not 'after the flesh,' but is Spirit or Life,¶ i.e. the Risen and Glorified Christ who had met St. Paul on the way to Damascus, converting him; whom St. John saw in the Vision of Patmos for his comfort; 'the second Adam,'*** 'the Man, the Lord †† from heaven'; 'the Lord of glory.'‡‡ (2) Righteousness and truth are objective realities as well as subjective qualities, powers of God and qualities in man: the righteousness of God and the sanctity of man—the first creative of the second through faith.§§ (3) Christ is the Mediator of righteousness and truth, both of which He is Himself;||| in virtue of which it is said that 'the grace of God' is the 'grace of Christ,' ¶¶ and the life of grace is 'life in him' or 'life in the Spirit.'*** (4) This Spirit creates or awakes Spirit (πνευμα) in man through the infusion of its supernatural principle in the gift of righteousness and knowledge (=Spirit), so that men are partakers of these as they are in God, in the measure of men.††† The Apostle finds the possibility, on man's side, of this infusion, in the nature of the human πνευμα,‡‡‡ which then becomes the temple of the indwelling Divine πνευμα, and from which as basis proceeds the sanctification of the whole nature. (5) The righteousness and truth (which are Spirit, and Christ), mediated to faith, are mediated by the human life and historic work of Christ: in the Pauline statement, with special relation to His Death and Resurrection; in the Johannine, with reference to the issues for character which His Coming reveals and makes acute. According to the former, the sacrifice of Christ is deliverance from the curse that rests on sin and the alienation from God. By His Resurrection Christ so completely takes possession of the believer's heart that he feels his life is not so much his own as that of Christ in him—the indwelling Spirit. According to the latter, the eternal life of the pre-existent Logos, manifested in Christ's historical Person, is in believing experience incorporated through the mystical fellowship* of believers with Christ, who are translated from darkness into light, from death to life, from sin and unrighteousness to love.† (6) In the Epistle to the Hebrews (of the Pauline type) the life of grace is seen at work in Christ's Personal Life, making it clear that the faith in Him that is receptive of grace is the faith of Him; so that what He did and won for men He did and won for Himself as a work of spiritual and moral power exerted in Him, and not simply upon Him. 'The grace-enabling faith and the faith enabled by grace to overcome sin and destroy death, the Divine and human conspiring to produce and constitute the new righteousness of God in man and man in God, were so met in Jesus that He Himself was the revelation because He was the thing revealed.'‡ (7) The appearance of this Life and its blessings of grace are traced to the spontaneous and unmerited beneficence and initiative of God,§ who in Christ deals with sinful mankind not on the ground of merit or after the mode of Law, as though they were servants or subjects, but solely from His own natural instinct of Holy Love, as a father towards his sons. Hence the gracious will of God is distinctive in the incomparable fullness and excellency of the motives which it comprehends.¶ (8) Divine grace consequently underlies every part of the redemptive process, in an imposing array of objective forces.¶ What are its parts? Here the schemes of saving grace in the two types widely diverge in their most conspicuous features. St. Paul conceives of the subject of grace thus—the sinner is a criminal whom the Righteous Judge will of His clemency save; and his thought moves in a circle of juristic terms. St. John's conception, on the other hand, is of the world (=human life) as marred by sin in opposition to God, and his notion moves in a series of antitheses reconciled finally by the manifestation of that pre-existent Logos who is the world's fundamental principle. Under these leading concepts let us classify the respective terms.

(a) The Pauline scheme.—'Justification' is the point of stress in the Pauline list, and with it go 'redemption' and 'righteousness'; 'adoption' and 'reconciliation' go together; sanctification is their result. The source of the whole is in the Divine predestination, and the goal is man's glorification. The briefest definitions must suffice. Predestination determines on God's part His purpose of grace. Election expresses the soul's experience and certainty of saving grace. Justification is the grace which acquits and accepts the sinner as righteous. By justification the redemption purchased by Christ is made effective. Adoption is the grace that removes the obstacles debaring the sinner from fellowship with God, and inspires him with filial trust, freedom, and inheritance. By adoption reconciliation with God is made effective. Sanctification is the issue of these already mentioned in the renewal of the whole man—spirit, soul, body—a renewal leading eventually to resurrection, life, glory. Though the parts may thus be separated in thought, it is to be remembered that they are inseparable in the actual process. The prescience and prevenience of God are not otiose; they are the active origin and basal ground of man's salvation. Justification in its attitude of faith implies the implicit energy of sanctification. Sanctification is but a 'continuous justification.'* Imputed righteousness is vital and is imparted. The 'peace with God' which these secure is, through a real remission of sins and rescue from God's wrath, fitted to partake in the ineffable nature of the Spirit of righteousness and truth, who effects salvation, and the bliss of the Eternal Life, of which it is the foretaste and first-fruit.†

St. Paul gives two 'sums' of grace, the one in 1 Co 1<sup>30</sup>, the other in Ro 8<sup>30</sup>, to which elsewhere are added 'adoption' and 'reconciliation' (Gal 4<sup>5-7</sup>, Ro 5<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). We may tabulate thus:

A. Predestination and Election.

Justification	Adoption	Sanctification
B. and	and	and
Redemption.	Reconciliation.	Righteousness.

C. Resurrection and Glory.

(8) The Johannine scheme.—Eternal Life is the point of stress in the Johannine scheme. It works itself out in a series of three antitheses subsumed under the general and inclusive one of God versus the world, viz. light v. darkness, life v. death, love v. sin = unrighteousness. God and Christ, working in the Pauline scheme as righteousness and wisdom, work here as light, life, love, driving away darkness, death, sin; restoring life to its full completion by this self-revelation of the Divine Life which is at the same time the principle of the world's real life (Logos). Resurrection here is just fullness of life, the perfection of personality, which we see in Christ (historic), who is the Resurrection and Life, and who communicates it to believers, with self-evidencing force, in the life of love. This new life is attained from the new birth in an experienced succession‡ of ever-deepening intuitions and acts of faith, in a rich immanence of Christ in the believing soul,§ and of such a soul in Christ, like that of the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father.¶ We may tabulate thus:

A. Pre-existent Logos and Life.

God	Light	Life	Love
v.	v.	v.	v.
World.	Darkness.	Death.	Sin.

C. Incarnate Logos, Principle of Resurrection and Life.

The broad result of both descriptions of the life of grace is notable. It vindicates the outstanding fact of the Synoptic presentation of Christ: the uniqueness of His self-estimate for salvation. That is the conspicuous fact likewise of apostolic experience: 'the mystery of Christ now revealed to his holy apostles.' Unique as His life was, it yet can be the very law of all life. And it is so, when a relation between men and Christ is established of such a nature as links them to Him, so that they abide in Him as in their element. That relation is not adequately expressed as simply ethical harmony. It is rather an interpenetration of essence, in which the soul, gathering up all its faculties in unitary interplay and under His infusion of His Spirit, enters on a progressive sanctification, the illumination of the mind, the cleansing of the Spirit, until the whole nature is filled with the rich gifts of grace. Man in all this is neither depersonalized nor self-deified. He is, indeed, a self-contained system of spiritual operations—a little cosmos. But he is this in order to take his rightful and ordained place in the larger cosmos; for the fundamental energy in his new life is the wider fundamental energy which is co-extensive with creation vitalizing all that lives. So large is God's gift.*

(c) The gift of the Holy Ghost.—We find the life of grace to be consummated under the pre-ordained Divine ideal by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit and the hope of glory. The life of grace is the eternal life in its earlier stage. The gift alone corresponding to the requisite grace is the Holy Spirit. It is a gift, the natural and necessary sequel to the process just described.† For the Spirit is the agent of the operations of grace. If God justifies, adopts, and sanctifies, regenerates and converts, it is but fitting that He take means to make known the fact to them who are subject to these acts of grace: hence in justification the Spirit 'sheds abroad in our hearts' the love of God;‡ in adoption 'the Spirit beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God.'§ St. John dwells on the importance of the sending of the Spirit.|| The Spirit is specially the gift of God; His mission the most important of the consequences of Christ's Exaltation. As Christ grew Himself in grace by the Spirit, so by the Spirit He did His work for man, does His work in man, and mystically abides in man. The Spirit comes not to supply the place of an absent Christ but to bring a spiritually present Christ. He dwells in the believer as that Divine personal influence that brings Christ into the heart and seats Him there. He joins us to Christ, and in Christ we are joined to God—hence the terms 'Spirit of Christ,' 'Spirit of the Son,' 'Spirit of Jesus Christ.' Again, the Spirit does His work not abstractly, but by producing conviction of sin, righteousness, judgment to come, in relation to Christ whom 'He glorifies.'¶ He makes the historic facts of the Life, Death, and Resurrection of Christ the vital points of connexion through which He acts; and because it is so, men experience in grace those energies which constitute the Spirit of the Son, the energies of God.

Hence His indwelling manifests itself in the particular dispositions and graces of character** which He calls into existence, called 'the fruits of the Spirit.' We need not trace the forms in which the spiritual principle unfolds or the spheres within which it operates.†† We point only to the infinite variety and individuality of grace in its exhibition here, and to its limitless prospect and horizon. God in Christ through His Spirit is the Maker, the Creator of this new spiritual character.‡‡ It is the production of the original and undervived conception of His mind, not an origination in man's nature nor within its limits. Hence its freshness, pregnancy, fruitfulness, and hopefulness. It is a life to be worked up to (a Divine ideal), not worked out from—and no man can fix the bounds of its splendour.

It finds exercise in the natural virtues, in the spiritual graces, in the service and worship of God, in the religious emotions, and in the realization of the blessings of salvation. It is 'unto good works,' with sublime inclusiveness. There is no fixed pattern. God has no set moulds for character to run in: nothing is fixed but the predestined path

* Ro 8.

† This is prominent in Romanist teaching of gratia, infusion of saving energy by the work of the Spirit, just as in Reformed doctrine 'grace' is the free favour of God, manifested in justification, which brings with it assurance. St. Paul's idea comprises both.

‡‡ Eph 2:10, 'we are His "poem" created.'

'that God has ordained that we should walk in.*' The same idea occurs in another fine setting in St. Peter.† The greatness of grace lies quite as much in what it is to be as in its present value; in grace there is an inherent, indefinitely prolonged, and enduring propagativeness, another aspect of grace's resources. In this regard the Spirit is 'an earnest.' An earnest implies two things—more to follow, and more of essentially the same kind. The presence of the Spirit in a man's life speaks to him with assurance of the future, and the blessedness awaiting; and, if it does not enable him to forecast the particulars of that life, yet it does enable him to foretaste its nobleness and bliss. What grace gives here‡ will be enjoyed there in perfect glory and perfected fullness. Only let us 'live in the Spirit' and 'walk in the Spirit,'§

3. Historical controversies.—The subject of grace bristles with controversy. Every fresh epoch, bringing larger thought and fresh foci of emphasis, sees the recurrence of perplexities. The Apostolic Age is no exception. Its apologetic protagonist, St. Paul, discusses at least four points—grace in relation to (a) nature, (b) merit, (c) freedom, (d) the Church and sacraments. A brief note on each may fitly close this exposition.

(a) Grace and nature.—The question is in reality part of the perennial problem of nature and the supernatural, and their relation. With the Apostle it offers two facets: (1) the extent to which unregenerate man may be said to be under grace; (2) the conversion of sinful nature by grace. As to the former, there have been in subsequent times two attitudes: (a) man's unregenerate nature is wholly outside grace, a massa perditionis (St. Augustine), a 'total depravity' (Calvin), 'in bondage' (Luther); and (β) it is only in part outside the operation of grace; grace includes natural virtue as well as supernatural gifts; in the working of reason and conscience we see the working of God's Spirit; the question is one of degree. As to the latter there have been also two attitudes: Is sin radical or superficial, imperfection or perversion? If it is a radical perversion, then the converting grace required is above nature, the free gift of God's mercy; if a superficial imperfection, moral influence by way of education will suffice to eradicate it.

These attitudes in varying guise have divided Christendom through the centuries. On which side may we range the apostles? The question is not easy to answer. They offer no systematic statement. Two considerations are relevant. First, they inherit the national attitude, the cardinal feature of which is the natural affinity of man for God and the easy access of God's Spirit to man. The Spirit operated specially but also generally; His grace lay in the ordinary as well as in the exceptional facts of moral and religious life. There is no sign that the apostles broke with this point of view (nor did the Patristic age).|| They make, however, a most significant addition, due to the vital effect of Christ's Personality in their experience, introducing an absolutely new strain, forming a new centre round which the problem gathers. The inherited theory is left unreconciled with the new focus; the new focus inevitably leads to the profoundest widening of the gulf between nature and grace; and pre-Christian moral and religious life is conceived of as, in its general disposition, evil, abandoned of God, even if, in its higher tendencies, especially in Israel under the Law, it was propædæutic and led to demands for revelation of grace. In both St. John and St. Paul the conception of sin is immeasurably deepened—its opposition, even enmity, to God and grace starkly expressed.

(b) Grace and merit.—The doctrine of merit in its full technical sense belongs to later days. It is fully developed in mediæval scholasticism, where it occupies a large place. It was seriously assaulted by the Reformers. It was prepared for by a long anterior development from small beginnings as early as the sub-apostolic teaching.* Many factors entered in the course of history to enhance its theological interest. From the sub-apostolic age there begins the emphasis on works. Again, increasingly, Christianity tends to become a new Law, the Christian life its submissive acceptance. Still more, as the Church-consciousness grew, there grew the ecclesiastical idea of redemption as a great system beginning in baptism and ending in resurrection; grace working not spiritually but mechanically in its mode.† The Latin Fathers gave a strong impetus to the idea of merit in the doctrine and discipline of penance. In the Pauline anthropology the idea is present and is opposed in its most rudimentary form. It has a natural basis, which the Apostle takes up, and, dissociating it from the popular view, makes serve as the foundation of his doctrine of faith as the human factor in the renewal of the believing heart. It is not quite true that in Pauline theology man 'can do nothing' and 'needs to do nothing.' Grace requires man's co-operation in faith, which is not simply an initial act, but a constant attitude. Faith, or the receptive heart, implicit, humble trust in God, may be all the sinner has to exercise—but it is a vast deal, and has a distinct moral worth.‡ Its worth, however, is not extended to the good qualities or good works of which it is the precursor; these are credited solely to the grace whose reception faith renders possible.§ The Pharisaic doctrine of merit is before the Apostle's mind; and his arguments emphasize the gospel of absolute grace in reaction from the conception of Law as conditional reward. He labours to prove that the Law by its very nature cannot unite the sinner to Christ or God, union with whom is the proper idea of grace. The true relation is reversed when character and conduct are made pre-conditions of our obtaining Divine grace instead of the joyous result of our having accepted it. Besides, even faith is the gift of God. The Spirit implants. For that express purpose Christ is exalted.|| These principles reappear in the Reformers' polemic against the Catholic dogma. 'Faith unites the soul to Christ.' That primary fact it is that outcasts all merit, and faith is 'the gift of God.'

(c) Grace and freedom.—In the life of grace as a human experience God of His own motion takes part. Another problem is: What is the part God takes, and what is man's? The problem is one of the most difficult. It is continually emerging in the course of human thought, and, like all of these grace problems, has continuously divided Christian loyalty. Two great answers have been given which in their extreme statement are directly contradictory of one another, but modifications of which are continually proposed. The first is known as Pelagianism, according to which the spiritual life of a man is the direct result of his own choice. The second is known as Augustinianism, according to which the spiritual life is necessitated by God's will. The best-known modification is Semi-pelagianism, which finds prevailing favour in the Roman Catholic teaching, as Augustinianism does in Reformation doctrine. It is a form of Synergism, according to which Divine grace is insufficient till human effort conjoins with it. The three may be thus defined—in the Pelagian view, grace precedes and assists the natural (unregenerate) will; in the Augustinian, grace prepares and assists the regenerate will; in the Semi-pelagian, grace is not operative at all till man's will (indifferent) brings it into play. The answer to the problem depends on the philosophy of personality adopted.* What is here relevant is the fact that the apostolic doctrine has nothing of all this in view, however much it may suggest it. These eternal values are carried up to the eternal purpose of God and at the same time the ethical basis of moral responsibility in human freedom is recognized. The Divine control of human life in the whole of its activities is one of the great conceptions of the OT. It is power animated by a gracious and righteous purpose and conditioned by the recognition of human freedom. The OT idea of providence culminates in the NT idea of salvation. The assertion of human freedom runs through both OT and NT, Divine control and human freedom accompanying each other, in harmonious intimacy, regarded in a purely practical manner. Whatever invasion of 'freedom' there is, is due to sin; but the evil tendency is never pressed into determinism. The apostles, as later the Fathers, think in this ancestral descent. Religious dependence has for necessary concomitant moral independence; the deeper the dependence (religious) the richer the independence (morality). It is this independence that St. Paul emphasizes in the blessing which he terms 'the glorious liberty of the sons of God,' 'the freedom wherewith Christ sets us free'†—a primary feature of the new life. Grace is the personal relation to our moral self by which that self attains emancipation. Modern moral theory approves.

(d) Grace and the Church and sacraments.—In apostolic thought the Church is a visible and Divine institution: the Body and Bride of Christ. It is the appropriate social environment for the sanctified soul, wherein at once the gifts of each are available for the profit of all and the spiritual atmosphere conduces to the uplift and sanctity of all. It is specially the 'fulness of him that filleth all in all,'‡ i.e. the complement of His purpose, the means by which He accomplishes His loving scheme for man's salvation. There are two strata of concepts concerning the Church, one lower than the other, which have given some justification for the belief that the apostles describe the Church in two aspects, visible and invisible, realistic and idealistic. Rather they find in the Church as men see it something evident only to spiritual insight. To them the Church's life and spirit are but the realization and extension of the Spirit of Christ Himself, and the Church possesses, in the midst of its variety of spiritual influence upon its members, a mysterious unity, which is not only the sum-total of all present variations, but something always beyond and far-reaching, inviting and calling and assisting the believing members upward and onward identically after the manner of Christ Himself with the soul living in Him. To magnify the Church is to magnify this Divine Spirit living and working in the Body of Christ.

The ordinances of the Church possess a particular character. They are not subordinate as mere means of influencing the soul: they are means of grace to the soul. They are of co-ordinate importance with the Incarnation, whose effects they continue, with the Atonement, which they commemorate, for they apply the graces of these. This efficacy hangs on the Living Presence of Christ, whose grace they convey; for the effect of sacraments depends on the action of Christ Himself. In them He communicates what He alone can bestow, for the use of which faith and spiritual affections are required, but which they cannot create.* Through His Spirit's operation they unite us with Him in the mystical union. The Church in this sense was purchased by Christ's blood† and is the object of justification.‡ Very early the rapidly growing Christian society seized upon this conception and began to relate the grace of Christ through His Spirit to the sacraments as feeders of the mystery of the inner life. The whole ancient Church, e.g., connects the gift of the Spirit with baptism. Yet there is no disposition to regard the rite as magical or mechanical: the spiritual efficacy of the ordinance is due to the Holy Spirit.§ Not the rite ex opere operato, not the minister, but the Spirit dispenses grace; the visible elements and the ministerial action derive their validity from the Spirit alone. Soon pagan and superstitious elements were to enter in, to alter this free spiritual idea of sacramental grace into 'another grace' altogether—a lapse from personal to sub-personal categories, in perfect consonance with the new and attractive idea of the Church in its visibility and authority as the exclusive custodian of grace. Externally as that idea was formulated, and false as its rapid development grew to be to the apostolic mind, its opponents too often forget that to the apostolic mind there is no idea so fundamental as the reality of a great spiritual society living by its own truth and life, having its own laws, and these exclusively spiritual. For the life of grace consists not simply in the new life of the soul. It is the new order of the world, a new permanent order of life, a real supernatural constitution unfolding itself in the world, in absolute rupture with the present world, deeper and more comprehensive than the life of believers, having objective substantiality in the Life of God as the Life of Christ itself, whose embodiment on earth it is—an idea whose present and practical realization the modern social necessities imperatively demand.

GRAFTING.—The Greek word used (ἐγκεντρίζω) has two distinct meanings: (1) 'goad' or 'spur on' (cf. Ac 26¹⁴, 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad [κέντρον]'), and (2) 'inoculate' or 'graft.' The English word 'graft' is derived from the Gr. γράφειν, 'to write,' and means a slip of a cultivated tree inserted into a wild one, so called because of its resemblance to a pencil. In the NT the word occurs only in Ro 11¹⁷-²⁴. St. Paul here follows the Prophets (cf. Jer 11¹⁶) in likening Israel to an olive tree (cf. art. OLIVE). Its roots are the Patriarchs, the original branches are the Jews, and the branches of the wild olive which have been grafted in are the Gentile Christians. Some of the original branches have been broken off owing to their lack of faith, and by a wholly unnatural process shoots from a wild olive have been grafted into the cultivated stock. But this is no ground for self-adulation: all the blessings which the Gentiles derive come from the original stock into which they have been grafted through no merit of their own; let them beware, therefore, lest through pride and want of faith they also are cut off, for it would, on the one hand, be a much less violent proceeding to cut off the wild branches, which have been grafted in, than it was to cut off the original branches; while, on the other hand, it would be far easier and far more natural to graft the original cultivated branches back into the stock on which they grew than it was to graft the Gentiles, who are merely a slip cut from a wild olive, in amongst the branches of the cultivated olive. The olive, like most fruit trees, requires a graft from a cultivated tree if the fruit is to be of any value. A graft from a wild tree inserted into a cultivated stock would of course be useless, and such a process is never performed; hence the point of St. Paul's comparison.

GRAVE, GRAVITY (σεμνός, σεμνότης, 1 Ti 2³ 3⁴. 8. 11, Tit 2². 7, Ph 4⁸).—The translation is, as a rule, 'grave,' 'gravity'; but in Ph 4⁸ the AV has 'honest,' 'venerable' (marg.) (RV 'honourable,' 'reverend' [marg.]), and in 1 Ti 2² 'honesty' ('gravity,' RV). The Vulgate has pudicus, except in 1 Ti 3⁴ (castitas) and in Tit 2² (gravitas). 'The idea lying at its root (σεβ) is that of reverential fear, profound respect, chiefly applied to the bearing of men towards the gods' (Cremer, *Lexicon*³, 1880, p. 522). It is akin to the Latin serius, severus, and the Gr. εὐρέβεια.

1. The word was used in a local sense of places haunted by supernatural powers—of caves,* of the boundary† of heaven and earth—as pointing to the Divine guardianship of the world. In the LXX the word is used in this sense of the Temple at Jerusalem, because it possessed a τινα θεοῦ δύναμιν which miraculously thwarted Heliodorus when he sacrilegiously tried to rob it (2 Mac 3). In an inscription of the 2nd cent. Berea is called σεμνοτάτη because it was a Temple-guardian (νεωκόρος).

2. Akin to this was the religious application of the word to Divine persons—a usage which is common in early Christian literature. In Hermas, Mand. iii. 4, it is used along with ἀληθείς of the Holy Spirit. It is used of the name of the Deity (2 Mac 8¹⁵), just as in classical Greek the word was applied to the gods, Ἐρινύες—αἱ σεμναὶ θεαί.

In the NT, while the word has not lost its religious meaning, it is used mainly in a moral sense. It occurs only once outside the Pastorals (Ph 4⁸), and probably was familiarized in common speech through the influence of popular Stoicism. The sophist claimed this title (Luc. Rhet. Præc. i.). In Hermas, Vis. iii. viii. 8, Σεμνοτης is one of the daughters of Πιστις, and thus has a place among the Christian virtues. The word is applied to persons or personal qualities in two senses—either subjectively, of a conscious moral attitude of gravity, or objectively, indicating the influence produced on others by such a grave, decorous behaviour. The best translation seems to be 'gravity.' Vergil (Æn. i. 151 ff.) speaks of a 'pietate gravem ac meritis virum.' At his approach a seditious mob stands still, waiting silently to hear him; and he rules their mind and calms their passions by his word.

This gravity of behaviour eminently becomes Church officials—bishops (Tit 2<sup>7</sup>), deacons (1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>), deaconesses (v. 11), and the aged in general (v. 4, Tit 2-). They are to act, in all their official duties, with a sense that they are dealing with holy things; they are to teach with grave impressiveness (Tit 2<sup>7</sup>). It is thus the opposite of light-hearted flippancy or frivolity. It implies dignity, and in this sense Aristotle uses it of the high-souled man (Eth. Nic. iv. iii. 26).

The home is a nursery for the training of gravity (cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>4</sup>). Hence it is not altogether right to say that 'gravity is hardly a grace of childhood' (see N. J. D. White in EGT, 1910, on 1 Ti 3<sup>4</sup>). It is the "'morum gravitas et castitas" which befits the chaste, the young, and the earnest, and is, as it were, the appropriate setting of higher graces and virtues' (C. J. Ellicott, The Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul<sup>3</sup>, 1864, p. 27). It befits all in the home—children and women as well as the heads of the household, and all Christians as well as Christian officials (1 Ti 2-). This aspect of gravity is referred to by Clement more than once in his First Epistle to the Corinthians (ch. i.). In an inscription it is found applied to a wife (see J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan in Expositor, 8th ser. i. [1911] 479). Regard for becoming conduct must be fostered in the home, and women and youths, as perhaps more open to frivolity and disobedience, must live σεμνῶς.

So, in the Church, gravity is the opposite of disorder, of shamelessness of behaviour. It is the opposite of ἀπόνοια (see Theophrastus, Char. xiii.). In 1 Ti 2-, the Apostle inculcates gravity as a Christian attitude towards the State, and for this end prayer is to be made for kings and all in authority. Christians are not to imitate the Jews, who brought on themselves Roman hostility by their religious contempt of authority (Jos. BJ II. xvii. 2). Because God wills all men's salvation, and Christ gave Himself a ransom for all, Christians are to respect sincerely all authority as such.

'Christian reverence . . . hallows to us everything in life. The Christian regards himself as a valued work of God. His body is a temple built through ages by the Almighty. His race is a divine offspring. He loves even in the unworthy the stamp of their Maker. Material nature, human history, daily industry, the common intercourse of life gleam for him with the veiled light and movement of the Omnipresent' (G. G. Findlay, Christian Doctrine and Morals, 1894, p. 19).

Thus in Ph 4<sup>8</sup> the word is very wide in meaning—whatever demands and commands respect as well as the 'noble seriousness' (M. Arnold, God and the Bible, 1884, p. xvi) which such objects produce. Christian gravity is not, however, 'that sham gravity which so often discredits the word; not . . . the gravity of self-importance, or narrowness, or gloom; but . . . a free and noble reverence for ourselves (since God has made us and dwells in us), and for all that is great and reverend around us—the grace of thought that guards us from mere stupid flippancy' (F. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, 1891, p. 74).

There was a tendency in Greece to oppose the σεμνός to the εὐπροσσηγός, the 'affable'; and thus grave persons got the reputation of being proud and unapproachable (Thuc. i. 130), of being indifferent to the public weal (παθνυλα), of being incapable of action, of looking superciliously on enjoyment, and of casting disdainful looks on those who did not philosophize (cf. Hadley's note [1896] on Eur. Alceste. 773 f.). The virtue of gravity easily passes into the vice of pomposity. Aristotle says of the high-souled man that he is dignified towards persons of allience but unassuming towards the middle class. A dignified demeanour towards the former is a mark of nobility, towards the latter it is vulgarity (Eth. Nic. iv. iii. 26). In modern times gravity has been looked on as a flower that withers in the knowledge of natural law and in the change of social and political conditions (see W. E. H. Lecky, History of European Morals<sup>12</sup>, 1897, i. 141 f.). St. Paul, however, adds προσφιλῇ to σεμνῶς. 'By this the apostle seems to advert to that in which religious persons are too often deficient, who by an austere and ascetic demeanour not a little prejudice the cause of religion' (S. T. Bloomfield, Gr. Test., 1832, 1855, on Ph 4<sup>8</sup>).

He also adds ἀληθῆ. 'Truth is the basis, as it is the object of reverence, not less than of every other virtue' (H. P. Liddon, Bampton Lectures for 1866<sup>8</sup>, 1878, p. 263).

For the difference between the form and the reality of reverence see Augustine on Seneca in Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, 1883, p. 248.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

GRECIANS, GREEKS.—These two terms correspond respectively to the Greek words Ἑλληνιστά and Ἕλληνες. The term Ἕλληνες is properly the name applied by the inhabitants of Greece to themselves, which the Romans rendered by the word Græci (Eng. 'Greeks'). In the NT the term is correctly used of those who are of Greek descent (Ac 16<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>), although we also find it used as a general designation for all who do not belong to the Jewish race. Thus the foreigners who came desiring to see Jesus at the Passover are referred to as Greeks (Jn 12-<sup>6</sup>); so the Apostle Paul divides mankind into two classes when he says (Ro 10<sup>12</sup>): 'There is no difference between the Jew and the Greek' (cf. Ro 1<sup>6</sup>, Gal 3-<sup>8</sup>). In these passages the term is practically equivalent to 'Gentile' (g.v.). See also art. GREECE.

The term 'Grecians' (Ἑλληνιστά), on the other hand (Ac 6<sup>9</sup> 9-<sup>2</sup>), is applied to Greek-speaking Jews as opposed to the Jews of Palestine, who spoke Aramaic and are designated Hebrews. From the days of Alexander the Great onwards, large numbers of Jewish emigrants were to be found all over the known world. In Alexandria in particular a great number had settled, but in all the cities of the West, in all the centres of trade, Jews found a home. Many of these Jewish settlers acquired great wealth, and adopted Greek speech, manners, and customs. They read the Greek poets, and many of them studied Greek philosophy, while at the same time they adhered to the Jewish hopes and regarded Jerusalem as the centre of their life and worship. They were free from the narrowness and provincialism of the native Jews of Palestine, and the message of the Christian missionaries found much more willing hearers among this class than among the prejudiced and exclusive Palestine Jews.

A question of considerable interest has been raised regarding the proper reading in Ac 11<sup>20</sup>. Are we to read here 'Grecians' or 'Greeks'? Were those to whom the men of Cyprus and Cyrene preached Jews or Gentiles, Grecians or Greeks? Internal evidence and the mass of MS authority seem to conflict. The reading Ἑλληνιστάς of TR is upheld by B D<sup>2</sup> L and indirectly by S*, and has the support of almost all the cursives. It is also retained by WH. On the other hand, internal evidence seems to demand the reading "Ἕλληνες of N<sup>o</sup> A D, which is accepted by Scrivener, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and the text of the RV. Why call attention to the fact that the men of Cyprus and Cyrene preached to Grecians when that had already been done? If the writer intends to refer to a new departure in missionary enterprise, the context seems to demand the reading 'Greeks' (cf. F. H. A. Scrivener, Introd. to Criticism of NT, 1894, ii. 370 f.; for the other point of view see Westcott-Hort, Introd. to Gr. NT, 1882, App. p. 93 f.).

GREECE (or Hellas; Lat. Græcia, Gr. "Ἑλλάς).—The southernmost part of what is now called the Balkan Peninsula was the cradle of a race whose ideas contained the germs of our present Western civilization. As the religious life of mankind divides itself into the time before and after the dawn of Christianity, so the rational and political life of mankind divides itself into the time before and after the expansion of Hellenism. The mental activity of the Greeks in the great classical period, culminating in the 5th and 4th centuries B.C., made not only the Hellas of later times but all the world their debtor. The language they spoke, the art and literature they created, the spirit of liberty they fostered, and the philosophical temper in which they faced the problems of life, form essential elements in the finest modern culture. If criticism is, as M. Arnold said, 'a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world' (Essays in Criticism, London, 1895, i. 38), the contribution of Greece can never be neglected.

Like Palestine, the other ancient home of great ideas, Hellas proper was a small country. The Hellenic part of the peninsula (to the south of Macedonia and Thrace), with the isles of Greece, was much the same in extent as the modern Greek kingdom—about 250 miles in greatest length and 180 in greatest breadth. In a large sense, however, Hellas was an ethnological rather than a geographical term, for it embraced every country inhabited by the sea-loving and enterprising Hellenes—all their settlements on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean, on the shores of the Hellespont, the Bosphorus, and the Euxine Sea. As the west coast of the homeland was mountainous and harbourless, while the east was full of gulfs, bays, and havens, Greece turned her back on Italy and her face to the Ægean and Asia Minor, so much so that in the 6th and the beginning of the 5th centuries B.C. the centre of gravity of Hellenic civilization is to be looked for in Ionia rather than in Attica, the most famous names in science, philosophy, and poetry being at that time associated with the Asiatic coast or the neighbouring Cyclades. But the Ionian Greeks, isolated by the estranging sea and weakened by internal jealousies, were unable to offer a successful resistance to the Persian advance, and the glory of saving European culture is due to the Athenians who fought at Marathon and Salamis.

In the classical period, Greece was an aggregate of self-governing city-States, of which Aristotle surveys no fewer than 158. These States combined for once, with brilliant results, in face of the Asiatic peril, but they never afterwards seemed to be capable of united action. Wasting their strength and resources in fratricidal wars which gave now Athens, now Sparta, now Thebes, a temporary hegemony, they proved in the day of reckoning too feeble to resist the military power either of the Macedonian monarchy or of the Roman republic. The career of Alexander, the pupil of Aristotle, closed the Hellenic and opened the Hellenistic period of history. It created a world-Empire and a world-culture, both of which borrowed their best features from a Greece which was 'living Greece no more.' While the new order reinforced the old Hellenic elements in Asia Minor, it brought into being a vast number of Greek cities—the conqueror himself is said to have founded seventy—in lands hitherto barbarian. It made Greek the language of literature and religion, of commerce and administration, throughout the Nearer East. And when the Romans became the sovereign people, it was Greek rather than Roman ideals that they sought to make effective throughout their Oriental dominions. 'The desire to become at least internally Hellenised, to become partakers of the manners and the culture, of the art and the science of Hellas, to be—in the footsteps of the great Macedonian—shield and sword of the Greeks of the East, and to be allowed further to civilise this East not after an Italian but after a Hellenic fashion—this desire pervades the later centuries of the Roman republic and the better times of the empire with a power and an ideality which are almost no less tragic than that political toil of the Hellenes failing to attain its goal' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Rom. Emp., 1909, i. 253).

Neither the Macedonians nor the Romans ever treated the conquered Greeks as ordinary subjects. The sacred land of art and poetry was not ruled like Egypt or Gaul. There was a province of Achaia, but never of Hellas. Such cities as Athens and Sparta were spared the humiliation of being placed under the fascēs of a Roman governor and having to pay tribute to Rome. New Corinth, Caesar's Roman colony, the least Hellenic of the cities of Greece, became the seat of government. Nevertheless, the free communities had little more than a simulacrum of their ancient power. The Roman governor could always make his voice heard in their councils, and a rescript from him brooked no delay in obedience. The right of bringing a proposal before the Ecclesia no longer belonged to every citizen, but was confined to definite officials, and the conduct of business was placed in the hands of a single στρατηγός. The citizens were always liable to be called to account for their proceedings (cf. Ac 19<sup>40</sup>), while the sovereign power could at any moment cancel the constitution of a free city, and take the offenders under its own direct administration. At the best, Hellenistic life was now sorely cramped by the limitation of its sphere; 'high ambition lacked a corresponding aim, and therefore the low and degrading ambition flourished luxuriantly' (Mommsen, op. cit. i. 283). Shadowy assemblies still convened, engaged in grave debate, passed solemn resolutions, made appointments, and distributed honours. But political life of a serious kind was a thing of the past. Hellenism as described by such a writer as Plutarch already suggests 'a gilded halo hovering round decay' (Byron, The Giaour). 'The general effect produced by the many pictures, allusions, references, illustrations which he takes from the Greek world of his times is that romantic adventures, great passions, monstrous crimes, were foreign to the small and shabby gentility of Roman Greece. The highest rewards he can set before the keenest ambitions are no better than if we should now fire our youths' imagination with the prospect of becoming parish beadles, vestrymen, or at most town councillors' (J. P. Mahaffy, The Silver Age of the Greek World, 1906, p. 349).

The twenty years' civil war, which ended in the transformation of the Roman Republic into an Empire, was calamitous to the Greeks, who seemed fated to be always on the losing side. They preferred Pompey to Caesar, Brutus to Antony, and they were compelled in the end to raise levies for Antony's campaign against Octavian. The three decisive battles of the war—Pharsalus, Philippi, and Actium—were fought on the soil or the coast of Greece, and the contending armies almost bled the poor country to death. Many of its cities fell into decay, vast tracts of arable land were turned into pasture or reverted to the state of Nature, and 'Greece remained desolate for all time to come' (Mommsen, op. cit. i. 268). The dawn of the Christian era saw the nadir of her fortunes, the hour in which she was most neglected and despised. Thinking that an improvement might be effected by a change of administration, the Greeks petitioned Tiberius in A.D. 15 to transfer Achaia from the senatorial proconsul to an Imperial legate. This arrangement was sanctioned, and lasted till A.D. 44, when Claudius restored the province to the senate; whence there was once more a proconsul (ἀνθύπατος) in Corinth (Ac 18<sup>12</sup>). Nero, who posed as a Philhellene, was accorded so flattering a reception during a progress through Greece that he bestowed freedom and exemption from tribute upon all the Greeks; but Vespasian found it necessary to restore the provincial government in order to avoid civil war. Greece received its greatest Imperial benefactions in the beginning of the 2nd century.

'As Hadrian created a new Athens, so he created also a new Hellas. Under him the representatives of all the autonomous and non-autonomous towns of the province of Achaia were allowed to constitute themselves in Athens as united Greece, as the Panhellenes. The national union, often dreamed of and never attained in better times, was thereby created, and what youth had wished for old age possessed in imperial fulness. It is true that the new Panhellenion did not obtain political prerogatives; but there was no lack of what imperial favour and imperial gold could give. There arose in Athens the temple of the new Zeus Panhellenios, and brilliant popular festivals and games were connected with this foundation, the carrying out of which pertained to the collegium of the Panhellenes, and primarily to the priest of Hadrian as the living god who founded them' (Mommsen, op. cit. i. 266).

Even in the period of greatest depression Hellas still maintained her old pre-eminence in education, though for a time the universities of Rhodes, Alexandria, and Tarsus rivalled that of Athens. The life of studious ease was to be enjoyed in the cities of Greece as nowhere else, and Plutarch cheerfully turned back from the vulgar splendour of Imperial Rome to the quiet refinement of his native Chæroneia. In all that pertained to good taste and humanity the Hellenes continued to bear the palm. Gladiatorial shows were never popular in Greece, except in the Roman colony of Corinth, and Dio Chrysostom (i. 335) expressed his disgust and horror when these barbarities began on occasion to be seen even in Athens.

In religious rites and ceremonies Greece was remarkably conservative. Pausanias (Description of Greece [ed. J. G. Frazer, 6 vols., London, 1898]) records (passim) that as he went through the country in the 2nd cent. of our era he found the primitive worship faithfully maintained in every city and village by the simple, unquestioning natives. And the great religious festivals—Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian—never failed to attract crowds. It is a familiar fact that religious beliefs which science has discredited may still have a long life before them. Ever since the days of Plato the traditional religion of Greece had been 'a bankrupt concern' (Gilbert Murray, Four Stages of Greek Religion, 1912, p. 107). And among those who not only doubted or denied the existence of the Olympian gods, but turned in weariness and disappointment from Stoic, Epicurean, and Academic systems alike, there was a thirst for some deeper satisfaction of the soul's wants. When Alexander's empire extended the bounds of knowledge, attention began to be directed to foreign faiths, and Oriental mysteries gradually came into vogue. Sacrifice and prayer to Hera or Athene were replaced by the orgiastic worship of Cybele or the mystic rites of Isis. The Eleusinian Mysteries—the cult of Demeter and Cora—constitute 'the one great attempt made by the Hellenic genius to construct for itself a religion that should keep pace with the growth of thought and civilization in Greece' (W. M. Ramsay, EBR<sup>9</sup> xvii. [1884] 126). The only native gods of Greece who could hold their own against foreign rivals were the mystery-deities, Dionysus and Hecate. The cult of Isis secured a foothold in the Ægean islands, spread to Attica in the 3rd cent. B.C., to Rome in the 1st, and ultimately established itself throughout the wide Roman Empire, as the adoration of the Madonna has done in the Catholic world. 'The great power of Isis "of myriad names" was that, transfigured by Greek influences, she appealed to many orders of intellect, and satisfied many religious needs or fancies' (S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, 1904, p. 569). Christianity was preached in some of the leading cities of Greece soon after the middle of the 1st cent. (see ATHENS and CORINTH), but made slow progress throughout the country, where paganism, in one form or another, maintained itself till about A.D. 600.

Ionia (Javan) was known to the later Hebrew prophets (Ezk 27<sup>13</sup>, Is 66<sup>19</sup>), and the Jews of the 2nd cent. B.C. came into touch with Greece proper. References to Athenians and Spartans occur in 1 Mac 12-14, 2 Mac 6<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>; a long list of Greek cities is found in 1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>; and, according to 1 Mac 12<sup>6</sup>, Jonathan the Hasmonæan greeted the Spartans as brethren and sought an alliance with them against Syria. During the Maccabæan conflict the term 'Greek' came to be used by strict Jews as synonymous with anti-Jewish or heathen (2 Mac 4<sup>10</sup> 15 6<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>24</sup>), and 'Hellenism' as identical with heathenism (4<sup>10</sup>). GRIEF (πένος, ὀδύνη, λύπη, πένθος, and cognate forms).—In addition to the common vexations of life (Ac 4<sup>2</sup>; cf. 16<sup>18</sup>) and the griefs arising from misfortune (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>) and human mutability (deaths and partings, Ac 20<sup>38</sup>), there are certain cases of mental distress recognized in the NT, which are significant of the life and thought of the early Church.

(1) To the sorrows of transgression the Church is naturally sensitive. Sin reaps grief among its sad harvest. Esau's carelessness is followed by unavailing tears (He 12<sup>17</sup>). Those lustful after riches pierce themselves with many sorrows (1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>). Proud Babylon despises God; a day of sorrow and mourning is at hand for her (Rev 18). The widespread pain caused by transgression is illustrated by the case of the incestuous member of the Corinthian Church (2 Co 21<sup>7</sup>). First, St. Paul, as a spiritual father of the Church, has been compelled to write with tears, in deep suffering and depression of spirits (2 Co 2<sup>4</sup>: θλίψις καὶ συνοχή καρδίας), to admonish the careless Church which has allowed the outrage to pass unrebuked (1 Co 5<sup>2</sup>); then the Church itself, realizing its shame, is plunged into sorrow (2 Co 2<sup>5</sup>; cf. 7<sup>8</sup> 11); and the actual offender is in danger of being driven to despair by his excess of grief (v. 7). Such distress has, however, a redeeming feature, inasmuch as it leads to repentance (7<sup>8</sup>). There is a worldly sorrow (τοῦ κόσμου λύπη) which, embittering and hardening instead of chastening (He 12<sup>5-11</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>8</sup>), worketh death (2 Co 7<sup>10</sup>).

(2) But the Christian life has its own set of mental distresses. The anguish of persecution at the hands of the world (Ro 8<sup>35</sup>; cf. 1 P 2<sup>19</sup>) is but one of the sorrows of the Christian's Via Dolorosa; his increasing moral sensitiveness enlarges the possibility of mental pain. The spiritual life is one of travail (Ro 8<sup>22-26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>2-4</sup>; see art. GROANING). The richer soul also bears the cross of a wide human sympathy (2 Co 11<sup>29</sup>, Ph 2<sup>25-28</sup>); and a conscientious ministry is one of suffering, anxiety, and tears (Ac 20<sup>19, 31</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>1-4</sup>, Ro 9-; cf. He 13<sup>17</sup>).

(3) For the Christian conquest over grief see art. COMFORT.

(4) The grief of God over human perversity is recognized in He 3<sup>10, 17</sup> (προσυχθίζω), and in Eph 4<sup>30</sup> the Christian is warned against grieving the Holy Spirit.

(5) The grief of Jesus is cited in He 5<sup>7-10</sup> as an indication that, so far from taking the priesthood to Himself, He shrank from the sacrificial function and 'accepted it only in filial submission to the will of God,' or 'that the offering of prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears corresponded to the high priest's offering for himself on the Day of Atonement (Hofmann, Gess). . . . An interesting parallel (also noted by Davidson) is Hosea's reference to Jacob's wrestling (12<sup>4</sup>), in which he speaks of him as weeping and making supplication to the angel, of which we read nothing in Genesis' (A. S. Peake, Hebrews [Century Bible, 1902], p. 134).

GROANING.—The verb στενάζω occurs three times in Ro 8 (vv. 22, 23, 26) and twice in 2 Co 5 (vv. 2<sup>-4</sup>), denoting the distress caused apparently not so much by physical suffering and material decay as by the conflict in the present order between matter and spirit. The whole creation is conceived as involved in this painful struggle—it 'groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now' (Ro 8<sup>-2</sup>).

St. Paul's figure may have been suggested by the Jewish tradition of the 'birth-pangs of the Messiah': חבלי המשיח (F. Weber, Allsyn. Theol., Leipzig, 1880, p. 350 f.; cf. Mt 24<sup>7-8</sup>: 'Nation shall rise up against nation, and there shall be famines and earthquakes in divers places. These things are the beginning of travail'), although the Apostle's thought is more psychological. For the sympathy of Nature with man's fall and restoration see Weber, pp. 222 f., 380 f., 398.

The larger life of the Spirit presses painfully against the limitations of the present material world. Not creation's physical sufferings under the bondage of corruption, but her 'earnest expectation' of deliverance from it, creates the sense of almost intolerable strain; the 'firstfruits of the Spirit' for the moment intensify the burden of the flesh; the deepest groanings of the saint arise from his sense of exile, from his 'longing to be clothed upon with his habitation from heaven' (2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). The soul in its holiest moods groans in its impotence. Its highest yearnings, though known to the Searcher of hearts, have no language but a painful cry.

'The groanings which cannot be uttered' with which 'the Spirit' maketh intercession for us (Ro 8<sup>26</sup>) seem to be those of the saint's spiritual nature. In St. Paul, man's higher faculties take highly personified forms—the indwelling Divine is the Spirit of Christ (cf. Philo's Logos, identified with the archangel, etc., or the Logoi, identified with Jewish angels and Greek daimons. See J. Drummond, Philo Judæus, 1888, ii. 235 f., for a discussion of 'the suppliant Logos,' τὸν ἱκέτην λόγον). The 'Spirit' of Ro 8 is distinguished from God; the 'heart' of man and the 'mind of the Spirit' seem synonymous, and the 'unutterable groanings' suit better a limited human soul than a heavenly power.

But the stirrings of the Spirit which make the soul conscious of earth's 'broken arcs' give the promise of heaven's 'perfect round'—of 'the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward' (cf. St. Augustine's Confessions, bk. xiii.; also Browning's Abt Vogler). H. BULCOCK.

GROWTH, INCREASE (Gr. αὔξω).—In most of the passages in which the idea of growth, growing, increase, occurs in the NT the words in use in the Greek are either parts or compounds of the verb αὐξάνω. The abstract noun 'increase' (αὔξησις) is found in only two passages—Eph 4<sup>16</sup>, Col 2<sup>19</sup>—but the root of the word and the idea underlying occur frequently all through the apostolic writings. We also find περισσεύω, 'abound,' προκόπτω, 'advance,' πλεονάζω and ἐνδυναμώω, 'strengthen,' translated by the word 'increase.' Originally and in classical Greek the word αὐξάνω signified 'increase by addition from the outside,' used e.g. of a State increasing by adding to its territory, but in the NT the word is mainly used of seminal growth from within, such as the growth of a plant, animal, or person. The Hebrew writers were fond of comparing things natural with things spiritual, and found frequent analogy between natural and spiritual processes. They had a great wealth of words to express the idea of growth, and most of them signify the organic growth of living objects. According to Hebrew ideas, the natural laws of physical growth are made to apply to the spiritual realm. God is supreme in the world of Nature and the world of spirit alike. In both there is growth, and that is represented as the gift and working of God. He causes grass to grow (Ps 104<sup>14</sup> 147<sup>8</sup>), while the growth of restored and penitent Israel (Hos 14<sup>5, 7</sup>) is regarded as the result of the gracious operations of the forgiving God who is 'as the dew unto Israel.'

These ideas are carried forward to the NT, and we have frequent references to the phenomena of growth, while the comparison between growth in the natural and in the spiritual world is fully developed. Four separate connexions in which the idea of growth is applied can be distinguished.

1. In Jn 3<sup>30</sup> the word αὐξάνω is applied to the growing power and authority of Jesus Himself as a religious teacher. 'He must increase.' The same idea is expressed in Ac 9<sup>22</sup> where the growing spiritual power of St. Paul as a preacher of the gospel is referred to. The word used, however, is ἐνδυναμώω, which emphasizes the aspect of power rather than the growth of it.

2. In the Acts of the Apostles the idea occurs in connexion with the progress of the Church as an external organization. The phrase in Ac 6<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>24</sup> 19<sup>20</sup>, 'The word of God increased' or 'grew,' which seems to be a formula used to close the various sections in the history, refers to the growth of the number of believers. Here the word used is αὐξάνω. The statement in Ac 16<sup>5</sup>, 'The churches increased in number daily,' which also closes the preceding section dealing with the second visit of St. Paul to Asia, varies slightly. The verb used is περισσεύω, but the idea is the same. As a result of apostolic labours the number of believers increased. In the same way we read in St. Stephen's speech that the people of Israel 'grew and multiplied in Egypt' (Ac 7<sup>17</sup>).

3. We find the word used in a theological connexion referring to the growth of individual believers in Christian character and graces. The apostolic preachers did not regard their work as finished when they had converted Jews or heathen to Christianity. The Christian life had to be lived, and Christian character had to be formed. Growth and increase must follow the new birth. This growth is, on the one hand, regarded as a natural development from the new seed implanted in the new birth. The new creature must grow in faith, in knowledge, in grace, in righteousness, in Christian liberality and brotherly love. Thus the Apostle Paul rejoices that the faith of the Thessalonians 'groweth exceedingly' (2 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). He prays that the Colossians may increase in the knowledge of God (Col 1<sup>10</sup>), and beseeches the Thessalonians that they increase (or lit. 'abound,' Gr. περισσεύω) more and more in brotherly love, by which he means Christian liberality (1 Th 4<sup>10</sup>). For the purpose of furthering this growth, God has given apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers (Eph 4<sup>10-15</sup>). In the same way St. Peter instructs his converts to desire the sincere milk of the word, that they 'may grow thereby' (1 P 2-), and directly exhorts them to 'grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour' (2 P 3<sup>18</sup>). On the other hand, this increase in grace or Christian character is at the same time the work of God. Thus St. Paul prays that the Lord may make the Thessalonians to increase and abound in love (1 Th 3<sup>1</sup>-). In writing to the Corinthian Church, he compares the work done by himself and Apollos, and declares, 'I planted, Apollos watered, God increased' (1 Co 3<sup>6</sup>). The object of all three verbs is the faith of the believers in Corinth, which St. Paul's preaching had kindled and Apollos had nourished; but the work of both would have been ineffective but for God's working, His making the seed to grow and increase (1 Co 3<sup>7</sup>). Likeness to Christ is regarded by the apostolic writers as the end of this growth (Eph 4<sup>15</sup>).

4. But not only is the idea of growth applied to the Church as an outward organization, the visible Church which grows in numbers, and to the Christian character of individual believers; it is also applied to the Church as a spiritual unity which the Apostle Paul describes as the 'body of Christ.' According to the Apostle, all believers are members of that body; but the growth of the individual members in Christian character and especially in love leads to the growth or increase of the body as a whole. The Church will finally reach consummation and completion by a long process of growth and development. The nature, law, or order of this growth of the Church as the body of Christ is described in Eph 4<sup>16</sup> as 'proceeding in accordance with an inward operation that adapts itself to the nature and function of each several part and gives to each its proper measure. It is a growth that is neither monstrous nor disproportioned, but normal, harmonious, careful of the capacity, and suited to the service of each individual member of Christ's body' (S. D. F. Salmond, 'Ephesians,' in EGT, p. 338). All the members are united to one another and to Christ the Head, and draw nourishment and inspiration from Him and from one another, and thus increase 'with the increase of God' (Col 2<sup>19</sup>), by which we may understand either the increase which God supplies, or, better, simply the increase such as God requires.

GUARD.—(1) In Ac 5<sup>23</sup>, 12<sup>19</sup> the AV renders φύλακες 'keepers,' which the RV retains in the former passage, where the watchmen are Jewish, but changes into 'guards' in the latter, where they are Roman. Arrested by the high priest Annas, and put 'in public ward' (Ac 5<sup>18</sup>: ἐν τηρησει δημοσίᾳ), Peter and John were not chained; their keepers merely shut the prison-house (δεσμωτηριον) and stood on guard outside. But when St. Peter was arrested by Herod Agrippa, and imprisoned in the fortress of Antonia or the adjoining barracks, he was chained to two soldiers, while other two kept watch at the door of the prison (φυλακή, Vulg. carcer). The station of the latter two was apparently 'the first ward' (φυλακή, Vulg. custodia), which the prisoner had to pass before he could effect his escape. The four soldiers together made a quaternion (τετράδιον), and four such bodies of armed men were told off to mount guard in succession during the four watches into which, in Roman fashion, the night was divided.

(2) The above-named Agrippa himself, having incurred the displeasure of Tiberius, once had the experience of being chained as a prisoner for six months to soldiers of the Imperial bodyguard in Rome. It was fortunate for him that the Emperor's sister-in-law Antonia, who used her influence with Macro, the præfectus prætorio, 'procured that the soldiers who kept him should be of a gentle nature, and that the centurion who was over them, and was to diet with him, should be of the same disposition' (Jos. Ant. XVIII. vi. 7). Tiberius' death restored him to liberty, and Caligula consoled him with the gift of a chain of gold, equal in weight to the one of iron which he had worn (ib. vi. 10).

(3) To another such iron chain, which coupled St. Paul to one soldier after another of the same Imperial guard, allusion is made in each of the Captivity Epistles. Thanks to the favourable report given by the centurion Junius on handing over his charge to the præfect of the Prætorians, St. Paul probably received better treatment than an ordinary prisoner; but the fact remained that in his own hired house he was the δέσμιος of Christ Jesus, always wearing galling 'bonds' (δεσμοί, Ph 1<sup>7</sup>, 13, 14, 16, Col 4<sup>18</sup>, Philem 10, 13, 2 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>), called also a 'chain' (ἀλυσίς, Eph 6<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>). Great good, however, resulted from his imprisonment; for through the frequent relief of the guard, and the Apostle's skill in changing an enforced fellowship with armed men into a spiritual communion, the real significance of his bonds—their relation to his faith in Christ—gradually became known among all 'the Prætorians,' the finest regiment of the Roman army (Ph 1<sup>12-13</sup>). The arguments for this interpretation of the word πραιτωριον are fully stated by Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 99 f. Other possible explanations will be found under PALACE.

In the Republican days the cohors prætoria, or cohortes prætorie, formed the bodyguard of the prætor or proprætor, who was governor of a province with military powers. Under the Empire the Prætorians came to be the Imperial bodyguard, which, as constituted by Augustus, was made up of nine cohorts, each of a thousand picked men. They were distinguished from other legions by shorter service and double pay, and on discharge they received a generous bounty or grant of land. Tiberius concentrated the force in a strongly fortified camp to the east of Rome, on a rectangle of 39 acres, where the modern Italian army also has barracks. One cohort, wearing civilian garb, was always stationed at the Emperor's house on the Palatine; others were often sent to foreign service. The Prætorians were under a præfectus prætorio, or more often two, sometimes even three præfecti. These were originally soldiers, but ultimately the office was mostly filled by lawyers, whose duty it was to relieve the Emperor in certain kinds of civil and criminal jurisdiction. One of Trajan's rescripts to Pliny (Ep. 57) indicates that the proper course to take with a certain Bithynian prisoner is to hand him over in chains 'ad prefectos prætorii mei,' and the case seems to be parallel to that of the Apostle, who made an appeal unto Cæsar (Ac 25<sup>11, 21</sup>).

GUILE.—Guile is the usual translation of δόλος (Lat. dolus), which meant first 'a bait for fish' (Od. xii. 252), and then, in the abstract, 'wile,' 'craft,' 'deceit.' Guile is traced to the workings of that 'abandoned mind' which is itself the punishment, natural and in a sense automatic, of those who reject God (Ro 1<sup>29</sup>). The guile which characterized Jacob the Jew as well as Ulysses the Greek was indeed often admired as a national trait by which duller races could be outwitted. But it is one of the unmistakable marks of a Christian convert that he puts away all guile, and, like a new-born babe, desires the milk that is without guile (δόλον γάλα, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>). Henceforth he refrains his lips that they speak no guile (3<sup>10</sup>). People who are themselves guileful find it difficult to believe that anybody can be disinterested, and St. Paul the Apostle (like many a modern missionary) was often supposed to be cunningly seeking some personal ends. 'Being crafty, I caught them with guile' (2 Co 12<sup>16</sup>), is a sentence in which he catches up some wiseacre's criticism of his actions, and gives it a new turn. His own conscience was clear; his 'guile' as a soul-winner was not only innocent but praiseworthy. His exhortation (παράκλησις, 'evangelical preaching') was not of error nor (in any bad sense) in guile (1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>); he was neither deceived nor deceiver, neither fool nor knave. But he had not infrequently encountered men of the latter type. Bar-Jesus the Magian, who tried to undermine his influence at the court of Sergius Paulus (Ac 13<sup>9</sup>), was actuated by a mad jealousy, realizing as he did that the position which he had skilfully won was fast becoming insecure. Driven to his wits' end, and seeing that exposure was imminent, he felt the ground shaking beneath his feet. His punishment had a Dantesque appropriateness. 'Full of all guile,' he was yet made a spectacle of pitiful impotence: 'there fell on him a mist and a darkness, and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand' (13<sup>10, 11</sup>). HADES.—Hades is a Lat. word adopted from the Gr. ᾍδης (ἔδης), which is used in the LXX to translate the Heb. Sheol and in NT Gr. to denote the same idea as was expressed by Sheol in the OT, viz. 'the abode of the dead.' The word has been consistently used in the RV of the NT to render ἔδης on each of the 10 occasions of its occurrence (Mt 11<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>, Lk 10<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>-3</sup>, Ac 2<sup>27, 31</sup> [in 1 Co 15<sup>55</sup> critical texts give θάνατος for ἔδης of TR], Rev 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>13, 14</sup>), in place of the misleading 'hell' of the AV.

In Mt 11<sup>23</sup> (Lk 10<sup>15</sup>) the word is employed in a purely figurative sense. Capernaum, 'exalted unto heaven,' is to 'go down unto Hades,' i.e. is to be utterly overthrown. Figurative also is the statement in Mt 16<sup>18</sup> that 'the gates of Hades shall not prevail against' the Church of Christ. As the strength of a walled city depended on the strength of its gates, 'the gates of Hades' is a metaphor for the power of death, and the promise amounts to an assurance of the indestructibility of the Church. In Lk 16<sup>23</sup> the rich man lifts up his eyes in Hades, being in torment, and sees Abraham afar off and Lazarus in his bosom. Hades is used here in its traditional sense of the under world of the dead, whether righteous or unrighteous. Not only Dives but Lazarus is there. But it is no longer conceived of in the negative fashion of the OT as a realm of undifferentiated existence in which there are neither rewards nor penalties. In keeping with the pre-Christian development of Jewish thought (cf. 2 Mac 12<sup>45</sup>, Eth. Enoch, 22), it is represented now as a scene of moral issues and contrasted experiences—the selfish rich man is 'tormented in this flame'; the humble beggar is 'comforted' in Abraham's bosom. The moral lesson that the recompense of character is sure and that it begins immediately after death is very clear; but it is going beyond our Lord's didactic intention in a parable to find here a detailed doctrine as to the circumstances and conditions of the intermediate state.

Ac 2<sup>27</sup> is a quotation from Ps 16<sup>10</sup> which in v. 2<sup>1</sup> is applied to Christ, of whom, as risen from the tomb, it is said that He was not 'left in Hades,' i.e. in the regions of the dead. In the same general and ordinary sense the word is used in Rev 1<sup>18</sup>: 'I have the keys of death and of Hades'; cf. the close association in the OT of death with Sheol (Ps 116<sup>3</sup>, Pr 5<sup>5</sup>).

In Rev 6<sup>8</sup> Hades is personified as a follower of Death upon his pale horse. In the author's vision of the Judgment (20<sup>11a</sup>) the sea and Death and Hades give up the dead which are in them (v. 13), and finally Death and Hades are themselves cast into the lake of fire (v. 14).

HAGAR (Ἁγάρ).—After the manner of the later Jewish interpreters of OT history, of whom Philo is the best representative, St. Paul treats the story of Hagar (Gn 16<sup>1-14</sup> 21<sup>8-21</sup>) as an allegory (ἀνὰ ἑστὶν ἀλληγορούμενα, Gal 4<sup>24</sup>).

'Allegory (ἄλλος, other, and ἀγορεύειν, to speak), a figurative representation conveying a meaning other than and in addition to the literal. . . . An allegory is distinguished from . . . an *analog*y by the fact that the one appeals to the imagination and the other to the reason' (EBR<sup>11</sup> i. 689b).

St. Paul neither affirms nor denies the historicity of the Hagar narrative, but his imagination reads into it esoteric meanings, which make it singularly effective as an illustration. Ishmael the elder brother, the son of Hagar the bondwoman, the seed of Abraham by nature, persecuted Isaac the younger brother, the son of the freewoman, the child of promise and heir of the birthright, and was therefore cast out and excluded from the inheritance of the blessing. This is interpreted as meaning that the Christian Church, the true Israel of God, endued with the freedom of the Spirit, is persecuted by the older Israel, which is under the bondage of the Law. Hagar, the mother of bondmen, answers to the present Jerusalem (τῇ νῦν Ἱερουσαλήμ), but the Jerusalem which is above (ἡ ἄνω Ἱερουσαλήμ) is the mother of Christian freedom.

Luther wisely says that 'if Paul had not proved the righteousness of faith against the righteousness of works by strong and witty arguments, he should have little prevailed by this allegory. . . . It is a seemingly thing sometimes to add an allegory when the foundation is well laid and the matter thoroughly proved. For as painting is an ornament to set forth and garnish a house already builded, so is an allegory the light of a matter which is already otherwise proved and confirmed' (Galatians, in loc.). So Paul: 'Nothing can be more preposterous than the endeavours of interpreters to vindicate the argument of the Apostle as one objectively true' (Paulus<sup>2</sup>, 1866, ii. 312, Eng. tr., 1875, ii. 284).

If the words 'Now this Hagar is mount Sinai in Arabia' are retained, they allude to the historical connexion of the Hagarenes (Ps 83<sup>6</sup>) or Hagarites (1 Ch 5<sup>10</sup>), the Ἀγάραιοι of Eratosthenes (ap. Strabo, XVI. iv. 2)—of whom Hagar was no doubt a personification—with Arabia. (In Bar 3<sup>23</sup> the Arabians are called the 'sons of Hagar.') But the Greek is extremely uncertain, and Bentley's conjecture, that we have here a gloss transferred to the text, has (as Lightfoot says [Gal.<sup>5</sup>, 1876, p. 193]), much to recommend it. The theory that 'Hagar' (Arab. hajar, 'a stone') was a name sometimes given to Mt. Sinai, and that St. Paul, becoming acquainted with this usage during his sojourn in Arabia, recalls it here (A. P. Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, new ed., 1877, p. 50, following Chrysostom, Luther, and others), is unsupported by real evidence. Such an etymological allusion would certainly have been thrown away upon St. Paul's Galatian readers.

To affirm that the Jews, who were wont to say that 'all Israel are the children of kings,' were the sons of Hagar the bondwoman, was to use language which could not but be regarded as insulting and offensive. But in fighting the battle of freedom St. Paul required to use plain speech and forcible illustrations. If he was convinced that men might be sons of Abraham and yet spiritual slaves, he was bound to say so (cf. the still stronger terms used on the same point in Jn 8<sup>44</sup>). St. Paul was far too good a patriot to jibe at his own race, and too good a Christian to wound any one wantonly. But he saw the unhappy condition of his countrymen in the light of his own experience. He had lived long under the shadow of Sinai in Arabia, the land of bondmen, before he became a free citizen of the ideal commonwealth—Hierusalem quæ sursum est—the mother of all Christians. Only an emancipated spirit could write the Epistle to the Galatians, or (as its sequel) Luther's Freedom of a Christian Man. JAMES STRAHAN.

HAIL (χάλαζα).—The invariable biblical conception of hail is correctly represented in Wis 5<sup>22</sup>: 'As from an engine of war shall be hurled hailstones full of wrath.' Typical instances of the use of hail as a weapon of Divine judgment and warfare are found in Ex 9<sup>18f.</sup>, Jos 10<sup>11</sup>. Like other destructive natural forces, it is a familiar category in apocalyptic prophecy. It is always regarded as a 'plague' (πληγή, Rev 16<sup>21</sup>). 'Hail and fire,' 'lightnings . . . and great hail,' occur together (8<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>19</sup>), as in Ex 9<sup>4</sup>: 'hail, and fire mingling with (flashing continually amidst) the hail.' Thunderstorms often arise 'under the conditions that are favourable to the formation of hail, i.e. great heat, a still atmosphere, the production of strong local convection currents in consequence, and the passage of a cold upper drift' (EBR<sup>11</sup> xii. 820). True hail, which is to be distinguished from so-called 'soft hail,' is formed of clear or granular ice. Impinging hailstones are often frozen together, and sometimes great ragged masses of ice fall with disastrous results to life and property. The seventh angel having poured his bowl upon the air, 'great hail, every stone about a talent in weight, cometh down out of heaven upon men' (Rev 16<sup>21</sup>). Diodorus Siculus (xix. 45) writes of storms in which 'the size of the hail was incredible, for the stones fell a mina in weight, sometimes even more, so that many houses fell under their weight and not a few men were killed.' The mina was about 2 lbs.—the sixtieth part of a talent. JAMES STRAHAN.

HAIR.—By primitive and ancient peoples in general, the hair (ὄφις, τρίχες) is regarded as a special centre of vitality, and to this belief the various forms of the hair-offering are ultimately due. The only examples of this practice in the literature under review are afforded by St. Paul's vow, according to which he cut off his hair at Cenchreæ (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>), and by the similar vows of the four men at Jerusalem, whose expenses St. Paul paid as an evidence of his Jewish piety (21<sup>24</sup>). These are to be explained from the Nazirite vow of the OT (Nu 6). Josephus writes of his own times that 'it is usual with those who had been afflicted either with a distemper, or with any other distresses, to make vows; and for thirty days before, they are to offer their sacrifices, to abstain from wine, and to shave the hair off their head' (BJ II. xv. 1). St. Paul would accordingly offer at Jerusalem the hair that had grown during the month since the vow began at Cenchreæ. The same belief in the peculiar vitality of the hair may underlie the proverbial reference to it: 'there shall not a hair perish from the head of any of you' (Ac 27<sup>34</sup>; cf. 1 S 14<sup>6</sup>, 2 S 14<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>52</sup>, Mt 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 21<sup>18</sup>), though the number and minuteness of the separate hairs are also implied.

The elaborate arrangement and adornment of the hair are found in primitive as well as in advanced civilizations (e.g. see the illustrations of male Fijians in Lubbock's Origin of Civilization<sup>6</sup>, 1902, pl. ii. p. 68). The art was highly developed amongst Greek and Roman women, as may be seen from coins, etc., belonging to this period (reproductions in Seyffert, Dict. of Classical Antiquities<sup>9</sup>, 1906, pp. 266, 267; J. E. Sandys, A Companion to Latin Studies, 1910, p. 198). Ovid, in his instructions to Roman ladies on the art of winning lovers, emphasizes the effect of an artistic and appropriate arrangement of the hair (de Art. Am. iii. 136 f.; cf. Bigg, St. Peter and St. Jude, 1901, p. 152). Judith 'braided the hair of her head' when she set out to fascinate Holofernes (Jth 10<sup>3</sup>), and there are Talmudic references to the art (Buxtorf's Lexicon, 1639, col. 389; Cheyne, EBi ii. col. 1941). Against such elaborate adornment and all that it might imply, the apostolic warnings (1 P 3<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>; see art. ADORNING) are directed.

The greater abundance of hair possessed by woman as compared with man is mentioned by St. Paul in an argument against the practice of unveiled women praying and prophesying (1 Co 11<sup>14-15</sup>, κόμη). Nature's covering, he says, shows that the veil should be employed; to be unveiled is no better than to be shorn (vv. 5-8). The same sexual difference is in view in the description of the Apocalyptic locusts: 'they had hair as the hair of women' (Rev 9<sup>8</sup>). In the Apocalyptic vision of Christ, His hair is said to be 'white as white wool, as snow' (Rev 1<sup>14</sup>), a detail of dignity borrowed from the OT picture of Jahweh, as 'ancient of days' (Dn 7<sup>9</sup>).

* The form 'Alleluia' comes from the LXX.

19<sup>1-4</sup>) it appears as a triumphant acclamation at the Wedding Feast of the Lamb. In later Christian use it was attached to the Paschal Feast as among the Jews to the Passover. If the Odes of Solomon may be ascribed to an early date (see art. HYMNS), we may quote the frequent use of 'Hallelujah' at the end of these hymns as a mark of the joyousness of early Christian worship. Tertullian (On Prayer, xxvii.) quotes its use with certain psalms, after the Jewish manner, said or sung by the whole congregation. A. E. BURN.

HAMOR.—See SHECHEM.

HAND.—Amongst the members of the body, the hand (χείρ) is named by St. Paul as being superior to the foot, and necessary to the eye (1 Co 12<sup>15, 21</sup>). The work of human hands has its definite limitations, whether the product be idols (Ac 7<sup>41</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>) or temples (17<sup>24</sup>; cf. Ep. Barn. xvi. 7); but, within its true sphere, manual labour belongs to man's dignity and duty (Eph 4<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>). St. Paul could display his toil-marked hands to the Ephesian elders, as evidence of his example of unselfish service (Ac 20<sup>34</sup>; cf. 1 Co 4<sup>12</sup>). To defend themselves from political suspicion as descendants of David, the grandchildren of Jude showed their horny hands of toil to the Emperor Domitian (Eus. HE iii. xx. 5).

The hand is employed in significant gestures both of ordinary life and of religion. It hangs down in despair (He 12<sup>12</sup>), is outstretched in oratory (Ac 26<sup>1</sup>) or appeal (of God, Ro 10<sup>21</sup>), is waved to gain silence (Ac 12<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>33</sup> 21<sup>40</sup>), is lifted in prayer (1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>; cf. Ps 134<sup>2</sup>) or in taking an oath (Rev 10<sup>5</sup>; cf. Gn 14<sup>22</sup>). The giving of the right hand (δεξιός) in token of fellowship (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. Pr 6<sup>1</sup>) is not a specially Jewish custom, and may be due to Persian influences (cf. Lightfoot, ad loc.). The Odes of Solomon show the early practice of prayer with arms extended in the manner of the cross: 'I stretched out my hands, and sanctified my Lord; for the extension of my hands is His sign' (xxvii. 1; cf. xxi. 1 and J. H. Bernard's notes in TS viii. 3 [1912] ad loc.). In a similar spirit of symbolism, continuing that of OT prophecy, Agabus (q.v.) binds his own hands and feet with St. Paul's girdle (Ac 21<sup>11</sup>; see art. FEET). Those who belong to the Apocalyptic Beast receive his mark on hand and forehead (Rev 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>). Deissmann has given evidence for connecting this mark with the Imperial seal placed on documents of this period (Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 241 f.). We may perhaps compare the three seals placed on the disciple of Mani, i.e. on mouth, hand, and bosom, as a converse dedication of the members to purity.

The term 'hand' is employed in a number of graphic or figurative phrases, relating either to man (Ac 2<sup>23</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>, He 8<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>, Ja 4<sup>3</sup>) or to God. The Hand of God appears in the activities of creation (Ac 7<sup>50</sup>, He 1<sup>10</sup>; Ep. Barn. v. 10, xv. 3; 1 Clem. xxvii. 7, xxxiii. 4), or of providence (Ac 4<sup>28</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>), or of judgment (Ac 13<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>31</sup>, 1 Clem. xxviii. 2).

The most striking and important references to the hand in apostolic Christianity occur in connexion with the 'laying on of hands.' This occurs for three purposes, which help to elucidate each other. By contact with apostolic hands is wrought healing of the sick (Ac 3<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>12</sup>, 41 14<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>8</sup>), transmission of the Spirit (Ac 8<sup>17</sup>, 19 19<sup>6</sup>), and ordination to 'office' or special work (Ac 6<sup>6</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>22</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>, He 6<sup>2</sup>). If these passages are approached, as they should be, from the general standpoint of the OT, and from the particular circle of ideas which constitutes primitive and ancient psychology, the imposition of hands will probably be seen to imply more than an outward sign (cf. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, p. 384). In each of the three applications, the conclusion reached by Volz in regard to the OT seems fundamental in regard to the NT also: 'the laying on of hands is the process by which the sacred substance is conducted from one body into another . . . the power passes not primarily through the spoken formula, but through the physical contact itself' (ZATW, 1901, pp. 93, 94; cf. P. Volz, Der Geist Gottes, 1910, p. 115).

HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN.—The word σουδάριον (= Lat. sudarium) is translated by 'handkerchiefs' (plur.) in Ac 19<sup>12</sup>, but elsewhere in the NT by 'napkin' (Lk 19<sup>20</sup>, Jn 11<sup>4</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>). See DCG, s.v. 'Napkin.' Its equivalent appears in Talmudic literature as an article of clothing (one of the overgarments), which might be worn round the neck (cf. Suet. Nero, 51) or carried upon the arm or over the shoulder. It was also in use as a head or face cloth, approximating in idea to 'veil' (cf. Suet. Nero, 48; Quintil. Instit. vi. iii. 60). The σουδάριον appears among the items of dowry in marriage contracts of the 2nd and 3rd cent. A.D. (A. Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, 1897, p. 50). According to the derivation of the word, it was a sweat-cloth, corresponding in use to our handkerchief. Catullus (Carm. xii. 14) speaks of the joke of abstracting a neighbour's napkin at meals. According to this passage the articles were of Spanish manufacture, and the material linen. The σουδάριον was employed for waving in public assemblies. It served humbler purposes as a strainer and as a wrapper. See especially S. Krauss, Talmudische Archäologie, i. [1910] 166 f. Cf. also art. 'The Aprons and Handkerchiefs of St. Paul,' by E. Nestle, in Expt xiii. [1901-02] 232, and see art. APRON.

Here one division, under Nahor, remained. Hence it is called 'the city of Nahor' (24<sup>10</sup>). It was a famous seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god. Abram left it to enter Canaan. J. W. DUNCAN.

HARDENING.—The discussion of this subject relates to a single striking case, which St. Paul and later theologians have taken as typical. The dramatic interest of the legend of the Exodus (Ex 5-14) centres in a conflict between the Divine and the human will. Pharaoh's successive promises and refusals to let the Israelites go into the wilderness are the outward signs of an inward vacillation under the alternate influences of insensate pride and abject fear. It is stated that his heart was hardened (7<sup>13</sup>, 14, 22 8<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>), that he hardened his heart (8<sup>15</sup>, 32 9<sup>34</sup>), and that Jahweh said He would harden (4<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>4</sup>), and did harden (9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>, 20, 27 11<sup>10</sup> 14<sup>8</sup>), his heart. In the NT the proposition that God hardens the heart occurs only in quotations from the OT (παρώ being used in Jn 12<sup>40</sup> and σκληρύνω in Ro 9<sup>18</sup>).

Critical exegesis makes no attempt to soften or evade the natural meaning of this language, which affirms, not that God merely permits (as Origen and Grotius thought), or that He foreknows, but that He effects, the hardening of the heart. If such a statement is not to be explained away, can it be explained in such a manner as to be credible? The difficulty of accepting it is a particular phase of the general difficulty of reconciling human freedom with Divine sovereignty. It has been truly said that 'the relation of man, as a free moral personality, to God is even more difficult to conceive than his relation to nature; theology has more perils for human freedom than cosmology. To think of God as all in all, and yet to retain our belief in human freedom or personality,—that is the real metaphysical difficulty' (J. Seth, Ethical Principles<sup>3</sup>, 1893, p. 395).

The assertion that God hardens a man's heart shocks our moral sense, because it seems to deny Divine love on the one hand and human freedom on the other. It is partly explained by the Semitic habit of recognizing the First Cause of all events and ignoring second causes. In Nature, history, and personal experience the controlling and directing hand of God was discerned by the Hebrews. Now, 'piety demands such an emphasizing of God's action as would logically take away man's freedom. Moral consciousness, on the other hand, demands a freedom which, looked at by itself, would exclude all divine co-operation and order' (H. Schultz, OT Theol., Eng. tr., 1892, ii. 196). The authors of the Exodus narrative, most of which is by J or E, are typical OT writers, in that they set the doctrines of sovereignty and freedom side by side without betraying any consciousness of a conflict between them and a need to harmonize them. Their teaching is not fatalistic, for fatalism is the assertion of a superhuman activity which leaves no room for moral freedom. They take for granted that responsibility which the conscience, unless corrupted by sophistry, regards as the prerogative of every human being. The tyrant whom they depict is anything but a puppet in the hands of an absolute and arbitrary will. The Divine sovereignty never excludes the possibility of initiative on his part. In every retrospect of his own conduct he feels that he could, and ought to, have chosen a different course. He knows that he has failed to 'lay to heart' the judgments of God (Ex 7<sup>23</sup>). He confesses again and again that he has sinned (9-7 10<sup>16</sup>), and he asks Moses to forgive his sin and pray for him (10<sup>17</sup>). He might at any moment humble himself before God, but he stubbornly refuses to do it (10<sup>3</sup>). His will is never coerced; it is by his own deeds that he merits the penalty which is ultimately inflicted upon him. He sins and suffers, not as the victim of a Divine good-pleasure which hardens whom it will, but as a tyrant who, 'being often reproved, hardeneth his neck,' and who is therefore 'suddenly broken, and that without remedy' (Pr 29<sup>1</sup>).

While the religious leaders of Israel assert the efficiency of God in unqualified terms, they lay no foundation for that high predestinarianism which maintains the Divine sovereignty and leaves only a semblance of freedom to man. The theology of the OT is not deterministic, as 'the accepted Muhammadan theology is undoubtedly deterministic' (H. P. Smith, The Bible and Islam, 1896, p. 137). All the prophets and prophetic writers, among whom J and E may be included, accentuate moral obligation; they regard virtuous and vicious acts as originating in the human will; their whole teaching is based on the conviction that men and nations deserve rewards or punishments, and are in a real sense the authors of their own destiny. The figure of the clay and the potter (Jer 18<sup>6</sup>, Is 64<sup>8</sup>, Ro 9<sup>21</sup>), which clearly recognizes 'a divinity that shapes our ends,' says nothing of the principles according to which these ends are shaped (A. B. Davidson, Theol. of OT, 1904, p. 131), and all apparently predestinarian language is meant to be moralized.

'Nor does any one doubt that it is an effect intended by God, when, at a certain stage in sin, His revelation makes the heart harder. God's word can never return unto Him void. Where it is hindered from blessing, it must curse. Light must make weak eyes weaker; nourishing food must aggravate the virulence of disease. That is a necessary moral ordinance—in other words, one willed by God from eternity' (H. Schultz, op. cit. ii. 207).

Moses' experience of the hardening effect of Divine truth in the case of Pharaoh was one which almost all prophets have shared with him. There is biting satire, but not predestinarian doctrine, in the command which Isaiah (6<sup>10</sup>) puts into the mouth of God: 'Make the heart of this people fat, and make their ears dull, and besmear their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and their heart understand, and they turn again and be healed.' This prophet's language is quoted with approval by our Lord in Mk 4<sup>11</sup>, Lk 8<sup>10</sup>; and with an important modification in Mt 13<sup>14, 15</sup>.

'It is conceivable that Jesus might use Isaiah's words in Isaiah's spirit, i.e., ironically, expressing the bitter feeling of one conscious that his best efforts to teach his countrymen would often end in failure, and in his bitterness representing himself as sent to stop ears and blind eyes. Such utterances are not to be taken as deliberate dogmatic teaching. If, as some allege, the evangelists so took them, they failed to understand the mind of the Master' (A. B. Bruce, EGT, 'The Synoptic Gospels,' 1897, p. 196).

The hardening of Pharaoh's (or of any other guilty man's) heart is a judicial, not an arbitrary, act of God, who never hardens a good man's heart. The process is, in Western language, natural and inevitable. 'By abuse of light, nature produces callousness; and what nature does God does' (M. Dods, EGT, 'The Gospel of St. John,' 1897, p. 812). If He gives men up to punishment, it is because they have deliberately given themselves up to sin (Ro 1<sup>24, 26, 28</sup>). The story of Pharaoh's overthrow has great and permanent value as a drama of freedom abused, and its moral effect would be ruined if we were to interpolate in it at any point the words of the Qur'an (x. 88):

'And Moses said, O our Lord, Thou hast given Pharaoh and his nobles pomp and riches in this world, to make them wander from Thy path; O our Lord, destroy their riches and harden their hearts, that they may not believe until they see exemplary punishment.'

St. Paul uses the case of Pharaoh, as well as the figure of the clay and the potter, to establish his doctrine of God's sovereign right and power of disposing of men's lives as He will. In the keenness of his dialectic the Apostle employs expressions which seem harsh: 'So then he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth' (δὲν δὲ θέλει σκληρύνει, Ro 9<sup>18</sup>). St. Paul 'has none of that caution and timorousness which often lead writers perpetually to trim and qualify for fear of being misunderstood. He lays full stress upon the argument in hand in its bearing upon the idea to be maintained, without concerning himself about its adjustment with other truths' (G. B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology, 1892, p. 120; cf. C. Gore, St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, ii. [1900] 37 f.).

He approaches the painful subject of the hardening of the Jews under the preaching of the gospel from two different sides. When his object is to humble their pride and pretension, he emphasizes (what no Jew would deny) the absoluteness of God; when his aim is to silence their excuses, he shows them that it is for their own sins that they are rejected.

'The hardening . . . against the gospel, which in Rom. ix. and xi. he considers as a divine destiny, he characterises in chap. x. as the self-hardening of Israel' (W. Beyschlag, NT Theol.<sup>2</sup>, Eng. tr., 1896, ii. 118).

There is, however, always a danger in the dialectical use of the language of absolutism. If the conversion of some and the hardening of others are ascribed to the mere will of God, it is clearly open to the hardened to say, 'Why doth he yet find fault?' (τί ἐτι μέμφεται, Ro 9<sup>19</sup>); and if an inspired prophet is then quoted, 'Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it (τὸ πλάσμα τῷ πλάσαντι), "Why didst thou make me thus?" the answer must be that 'a man is not a thing, and if the whole explanation of his destiny is to be sought in the bare will of God, he will say, Why didst thou make me thus? and not even the authority of Paul will silence him' (J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' 1900, p. 663). If the Potter is a God of infinite love, it is well with the clay, as Rabbi Ben Ezra sees; but if the Potter is a God who for His mere good pleasure makes 'vessels of wrath,' who would care to worship Him?

'We must affirm that freedom is the fixed point that must be held, because it is an inalienable certainty of experience, and that predestination can be only such as is consistent with it; else there is no rational and responsible life. . . . Predestination in other fields of existence need not trouble us; but perplexity and anguish unutterable enter if we admit the supposition, or even the genuine suspicion that God has so foreordained our actions as to take away our freedom. To this the history of Christian experience bears abundant witness' (W. N. Clarke, An Outline of Christian Theology, 1898, p. 146).

It is certain that in his general teaching St. Paul held fast both Divine sovereignty and human freedom (see Ph 2<sup>12</sup>). It is equally certain that he left the speculative question of the relation of the two where he found it—as an antinomy which he could not transcend. Nor have any later theologians or philosophers solved the enigma. Finite thought is unable to comprehend that Divine activity which works in a higher way than any other energy in the world. But 'even though the ultimate reconciliation of divine and human personality may be still beyond us' (J. Seth, op. cit. 396), it is practically enough if Christianity maintains that in relation to free beings the will of God is never an arbitrary will, enforcing itself without moral means.

'God shows respect for his creatures, and for himself as their creator, and upon the independence that he has given them he makes no attempt forcibly to intrude' (W. N. Clarke, op. cit. p. 138).

While the Qur'an (xiv. 4) teaches that 'God leads astray whom He will and leads aright whom He will; He is the Powerful, the wise,' the God revealed by Jesus Christ 'wishes not that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance' (2 P 3<sup>9</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

HARLOT (πόρνη, masc. πόρνος).—The RV has dropped the words whore and whoremonger which the AV used interchangeably with 'harlot' and 'fornicator' to translate the Gr. words πόρνη and πόρνος.

1. The word πόρνη is used in two passages (He 11<sup>31</sup>, Ja 2<sup>25</sup>) to describe Rahab. This Rahab is mentioned (Mt 1<sup>5</sup>) in the genealogy of Jesus; and although, as Calvin says (on He 11<sup>31</sup>), the term 'harlot' is applied only to her former life ('ad anteactam vitam referri certum est'), yet difficulty was early felt as to the propriety of giving her such an honoured position as she has in the NT.

Theophylact in the 12th cent. expressed doubt as to the correctness of identifying her with the Rahab of Jos 2<sup>1</sup> ('There are some who think that Rachab was that Rahab the harlot who received the spies of Joshua the son of Nave' [Enarratio in Mt 1<sup>5</sup>]). He has been followed in this by others, notably the Dutch professor, G. Outhov ('Dissertatio de Raab et Rachab,' in Bibl. hist.-phil.-theol. Bremensis, Bremen and Amsterdam, 1719-25, class iii. p. 438), C. T. Kuinoel (Nov. Test. lib. hist., Græce, London, 1835, i. 2), and H. Olshausen (Com. on Gospels and Acts<sup>2</sup>, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1852-54, in loc.). Valpy also contends that the two cannot be the same (Greek Testament, London, 1836, i. 4). There is no reason, however, for doubting that the two are identical. Jewish tradition makes the identification, although her entrance into the Israelitish community is variously related (see John Lightfoot, Horæ Hebraicæ, ed. Gandell, Oxford, 1859, ii. 11, for details).

Various reasons have been suggested for Rahab's inclusion among the Saviour's forbears (cf. also Tamar, Ruth, Bathsheba). Grotius suggests that it is a proludium of the gospel of Him who saved idolaters and criminals; Wetstein, that it might meet Jewish objections to Mary's position—and this seems most likely.

There have been attempts also to weaken the force of πόρνη as applied to her. Josephus (Ant. v. i. 2) speaks of her house as a καταγώγιον. She is described as an inn-keeper in the Targum on Jos 2<sup>1</sup>—פונקיתא (πανδοκεύτρια). In the NT also in some texts of Heb. (Ν<sup>1</sup>) she is so described, and in Clem. Rom. (Ep. ad Cor. i. 12) various readings show a tendency towards softening down πόρνη (see J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 'Clem. Rom.', ii. [1890] 46 ff.). The term, however, is really used in the ordinary sense, and has to be so understood.

In He 11<sup>31</sup> Rahab has a place in the catalogue of the heroes of faith; while in Ja 2<sup>25</sup> she is referred to, beside Abraham, as an example of good works. In the description given of her by Clem. Rom. she is praised for both faith and works: 'For her faith and hospitality Rahab the harlot was saved' (i. 12). The scarlet thread which she hung out from her house became typical, 'showing beforehand that through the blood of the Lord there shall be redemption unto all them that believe and hope on God.'

Zahn thus describes the reason why James adopted her case beside that of Abraham: 'The lesson from Abraham's example is developed to its completion and finally stated in Ja 2<sup>24</sup>; then follows the example of the heathen woman Rahab, which neither substantiates what has been said before nor develops a new phase of the truth, and appears to be dragged in without purpose. It does have point, however, if referring to a number of Gentiles who had been received into the Jewish Christian Churches, and if designed to say: the example of Rahab has the same lesson for them that the history of Abraham has for his descendants' (Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 91). J. B. Lightfoot (loc. cit.) thinks that Clement is trying by her example to reconcile the Judaistic and Gentile parties in Corinth. The truth is that Rahab's case was well known and might easily suggest itself to any one (along with Sarah, Abigail, and Esther, she was considered a historic beauty). To try to fix the date of James's Epistle from this incident is precarious.

The term is not applied to any other person in the NT unless, with some, we interpret He 12<sup>16</sup> in such a way as to make the πόρνος descriptive of Esau. Wetstein (in loc.) gives citations to show that later Jewish tradition regarded Esau as a fornicator. The text is not decisive (see Alford, ad loc.). It is probable, however, that Damaris ('heifer') belonged to the class of educated Hetairai (see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 252).

2. The attitude of the Christian Church in the Apostolic Age towards fornication is given in art. FORNICATION. In Hermas we find stress laid on the sinful thoughts, while from the few references to overt fornication it is thought that Christian morality had succeeded in showing in practice its victory over this sin. Hermas is concerned with the question of divorce, from the point of view of fornication; and his teaching is that the husband whose wife has been divorced for adultery should not re-marry, so as to give to the repentant wife an opportunity of returning, and vice versa (Mand. IV. i. 4-8); see K. Lake in Expositor, 7th ser. x. [1910] 416 ff., for an attempt to reconcile Hermas and the Gospels on divorce, and C. W. Emmet in reply (Expositor, 8th ser. i. [1911] 68 ff.).

In the Apocalypse (chs. 17-19) we have the description and the doom of 'the great harlot'—Babylon. There can be no reasonable doubt that this Babylon is Imperial Rome. That the term is allegorical is proved by 17<sup>5</sup>, 'On the forehead of the woman was written a mystery—Babylon the Great.' In the OT, Tyre and Nineveh have this title of 'harlot' (Is 23<sup>15-17</sup>, Nah 3<sup>1</sup>); and even Jerusalem is so called (Is 1<sup>-1</sup>). How and when the title was first applied to Rome we cannot say, but the OT would easily supply the analogy; and very likely this mysterious title would save the readers of the book from persecution, because the term would be intelligible only to the initiated (see A. Souter in Expositor, 7th ser. x. [1910] 373 ff.). The term is used in the Sibylline Oracles, bk. v. lines 137-143 and 158-160 (ed. Geffcken, Leipzig, 1902), the date of which is disputed.

The harlot of the Apocalypse has, like a high-born Roman dame, a band round her forehead. Her dress is royal purple—emblem of luxurious pride (Juv. Sat. iii. 283). Like the harlot, she has her name exhibited (see quotations in Wetstein, who refers to Juv. Sat. vi. 123 and Seneca, Controv. i. 2). She has a cup in her hand to intoxicate her paramours. J. Moffatt (in EGT, 'Revelation') quotes a parallel from Cebes' Tabula: 'Do you see a woman sitting there with an inviting look, and in her hand a cup? She is called Deceit; by her power she beguiles all who enter life and makes them drink. And what is the draught? Deceit and ignorance.' Her dress is luxurious, with gold and pearls (cf. Test. Jud. xiii. 5, where the harlot once more has pearls and gold). She rides on a wild beast, like a Bacchante; and kings are her paramours. But the harlot's doom awaits her (17<sup>16</sup>). The wild beast on which she rides has seven heads (the seven hills of Rome [see Wetstein, in loc.]) and ten horns. We cannot enter here on the vexed question of the seven kings, on which the date of the book depends. The harlot is doomed. Rome shall perish in the blood that she has spilt. Her fall will cause lamentation among her allies, but jubilation among saints on earth and angels in heaven.

The language in which the harlot's doom is described by the seer has been criticized as un-Christian. 'He that takes delight in such fancies is no whit better than he that first invented them' (P. Wernle, The Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., i. [1903] 370). But the downfall of ὕβρις in a State or individual eased the conscience in the ancient world, and here it vindicated the existence of a righteous God who avenged the slaughter of His saints. The language must not be interpreted apart from the situation.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

HAR-MAGEDON (RV; Armageddon AV).—According to Rev 16<sup>16</sup> this is the name in Heb. of the scene of 'the war of the great day of God, the Almighty' (v. 14), against whom the three unclean spirits (v. 18) have gathered together 'the kings of the whole world' (v. 14). There are variations in the form of the name in the Gr. texts and very different interpretations of its meaning, but if Ἀρμαγεδών is accepted as the correct form, the most satisfactory explanation is that which takes it to mean 'the mount of Megiddo' ('Αρ=Heb. הר 'a mountain'). By its geographical conformation and strategical situation the plain of Megiddo was better suited than any other place in the Holy Land to be the arena of a great battle, and the historical memories that gathered round it would fill the name with suggestion for the readers of the Apocalypse. The primary reference, no doubt, would be to Israel's victory 'by the waters of Megiddo' over the kings of Canaan (Jg 5<sup>19</sup>), which might be taken as typical of the triumph of God and His Kingdom over the hostile world-powers; but the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan at the eastern extremity of the plain (1 S 31<sup>1</sup>), the disastrous struggle of Josiah on the same field against Pharaoh-necho (2 K 23<sup>-9</sup>, 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup>), and Zechariah's reference to 'the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon' (Zec 12<sup>11</sup>), would heighten the suggestion of a great day of overthrow and destruction. The chief objections offered to this interpretation are that a mountain is an unsuitable battlefield, and that the historical battles are described as taking place 'by the waters of Megiddo' (Jg 5<sup>19</sup>) or 'in the valley of Megiddo' (2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup>). Against this, however, must be set the statements that Barak with his 10,000 men 'went down from mount Tabor' to meet Sisera (Jg 4<sup>14</sup>), that Zebulun and Naphtali 'jeopardied their lives unto the death in the high places of the field' (5<sup>18</sup>), and that Saul and Jonathan fell 'in mount Gilboa' (1 S 31<sup>1-8</sup>; cf. 2 S 1<sup>21</sup>). And the place given to 'the mountains of Israel' in Ezekiel's prophecy of the destruction of Gog and Magog (Ezk 38<sup>8, 21</sup> 39<sup>1-4, 17</sup>), to which the Apocalyptic subsequently refers in his description of the final overthrow of Satan and his hosts (Rev 20<sup>8</sup>), may have served to confirm the idea that a mountain would be the scene of 'the war of the great day of God, the Almighty.'

Of recent years considerable support has been given to the view, first propounded by Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 268), that 'Har-Magedon' preserves the name of the place where in the Babylonian creation-myth the dragon Tiamat was overthrown by Marduk, the passage Rev 16<sup>13-16</sup> being presumably a fragment from some Jewish apocalypse in which the Babylonian mythology had been adapted to an eschatological interest. This theory, however, rests upon grounds that are very speculative, and even its supporters admit that the author of the Apocalypse would be ignorant of the mythological origin of the name, and would probably understand it to mean 'the mountain of Megiddo.'

HARP (κithára, also κitharίζειν, 'to harp,' and κitharḗdōs [κithar + αἰδός] 'a harper').—The word and its two derivatives occur only in 1 Corinthians and Revelation. In 1 Co 14<sup>7</sup>: 'Even things without life, giving a voice, whether pipe or harp, if they give not a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped?' St. Paul by this musical illustration criticizes a prevalent and unedifying speaking with tongues, though, in the light of the phrase eandem cantilenam recinere, his figure of 'harping' has come in colloquial use to represent rather monotonous persistency. In Rev 5<sup>8</sup> the four living creatures and the four and twenty elders who abased themselves before the Lamb have each of them a harp; and the voice which was heard, as the Lamb and the hundred and forty and four thousand stood on Mount Zion, is described as that of 'harpers harping with their harps' (14<sup>-1</sup>). The victors over the beast, his image, and his mark, who stand by

'the glassy sea mingled with fire' and sing the song of Moses, have 'harps of God' to sing His praise (15-). In 18<sup>22</sup> the angel who doomed the great city of Babylon declared that it would hear no more the voice of harpers (cf. Is 23<sup>16</sup>).

When we attempt to describe exactly the design and manipulation of musical instruments in use throughout the Apostolic Age, we are met with almost insuperable difficulties. The apocalyptic character of the book, which, as we have seen, contains, with but one exception, the references to harps, turns one to Jewish music; but, though there is much relevant information in Chronicles and other OT writings, it is lacking in precision. It is easier to describe the instruments of ancient Egypt and Assyria, for we are helped by sculptures and pictures, the like of which have not been found in Palestine. We must rely, therefore, on analogy guided by our inexact OT descriptions.

'To accompany singing, or at all events sacred singing, stringed instruments only were used, and never wind instruments' (Appendix to Wellhausen's 'Psalms' [Haupt's PB, 1898]). It may be too much to say that they were the only accompanying instruments, but they were certainly the principal. In the OT there is mention of only two stringed instruments (if we except the curious list which appears in Daniel), and these are the נבל and קנ. The former is the older, and tradition points to Jubal as its inventor (Gn 4-1); while the second does not appear before 1 S 10<sup>5</sup>. These are translated in the EV as 'harp' and 'psaltery' respectively. From 1 K 10<sup>12</sup> we learn that their framework was made of almsgum or algum; from 2 Ch 20<sup>23</sup> that both were portable, and from many OT passages that they were much used at religious and festive gatherings. It is difficult to determine with exactness the difference between these stringed instruments; but, although later tradition confused them, they were certainly not identical, nor were their names used indifferently to denote the same instrument. There are several reasons, however, for the belief that the נבל resembled a lyre, and that the קנ was a form of harp (the question is discussed in HDB iii. 458 f.). Amongst these are (1) the fact that in the LXX κithára, or its equivalent κινύρα, is the almost invariable translation of נבל; (2) the evidence of Jewish coins pointing to a decided similarity of נבל and κithára (see F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews<sup>2</sup>, 1885, pp. 231, 243); and (3) the distinction emphasized by early Christian writers between instruments which had a resonance-frame beneath the strings and those which had it above (see St. Augustine on Ps 42). Josephus, who has a description of the frame-work and strings of these instruments in Ant. VIII. iii. 8, distinguished the κινύρα as ten-stringed and struck with a plectrum from the σαβλα as twelve-stringed and played with the hand.*

The κithára was the traditional instrument of psalmody, and the κithαρῳδός, along with the αὐλήτης, performed at the festive seasons of Hebrew life (cf. H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 1907, pp. 80, 239). Being lighter in weight than the נבל, the lyre was much played in processions, and, as we learn from Ps 137<sup>2</sup>, it could be hung on the poplar trees of Babylon when the Hebrew exiles were in no mood for songs of rejoicing. The κithára was of Asiatic origin, and was probably introduced into Egypt by Semites. The earliest representation of a stringed instrument is that excavated at Telloh in South Babylonia, which in size resembles a harp but is shaped like a lyre, i.e. it has a resonance-body on which are set two almost perpendicular posts between which are the strings, upright and fastened to a cross-bar. A picture which better illustrates the ordinary lyre is that of three Semitic captives guarded by an Assyrian warrior while they played; but perhaps the best illustration is that on the Jewish coins mentioned above.

ARCHIBALD MAIN.

HARVEST (θερισμός, θερίζω).—1. Use of the word in the NT.—The Gr. verb (θερίζειν) for 'to harvest' or 'to reap' properly means 'to do summer work' (from θέρος, 'summer'). In addition to the numerous allusions to sowing and reaping contained in the Gospels, there are several other references to harvest-time in the pages of the NT. Thus St. Paul, when finding it necessary to upbraid the Corinthian converts for their meanness in regard to this world's goods, sarcastically asks: 'If we to you did sow (i.e. when we planted the church in Corinth) spiritual things, is it a great matter if we of you should reap material things?' (1 Co 9<sup>11</sup>). The sower is entitled to expect a harvest of the particular crop which he sows—in this case a spiritual harvest; how much more is he entitled to a mere worldly harvest as the compensation for his toil, inadequate though the compensation be. In 2 Co 9<sup>6</sup> St. Paul reverts to the same metaphor and in the same connexion. Niggardliness would appear to have been a besetting sin of the Corinthians, as seemingly also of the Galatians (cf. Lightfoot, Galatians<sup>3</sup>, p. 219). The proposition here set forth is similar to that enunciated in Gal 6<sup>7</sup> though the application is somewhat different. 'He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully.' In Gal 6<sup>7</sup> this is compressed into the single sentence: 'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.' The Apostle then proceeds to apply the truth embodied in the proverb to the subject to which he is devoting his particular attention: 'For he that soweth unto his own flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap eternal life.' The proverb itself is a common one, and is found not only in the Bible but also in the classical writers (cf. Lightfoot, op. cit. p. 219), and the aptness of the simile is too obvious to require any comment. Without abandoning his metaphor, the Apostle next addresses those who, though faithful up to a point, are apt to be faint-hearted: 'in well-doing, let us not lose heart, for at its proper time (i.e. at harvest-time) we shall reap if we faint not.'

In Gal 6<sup>7</sup> the harvest is made to depend on the nature of the ground into which the seed is cast, but in 1 Co 9<sup>11</sup> the reference is rather to the particular kind and quality of the seed sown (cf. Job 4<sup>8</sup>), while in 2 Co 9<sup>6</sup> the amount sown is the point emphasized.

In Ja 5<sup>4</sup> we have another allusion to the agricultural operations incidental to harvest-time: 'Behold, the hire of the labourers who mowed your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud (i.e. comes too late from you), crieth out: and the cries of them that reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.' The same love of money evidently prevailed among those here addressed as in the Galatian and Corinthian churches. The particular manifestation of it which the writer singles out as the object of his special denunciation is the omission to pay the labourers their wages promptly. In the eyes of the law this was a heinous offence; thus in Lv 19<sup>13</sup> it is enacted that 'the wages of a hired servant shall not abide with thee all night until the morning' (cf. also Pr 3<sup>27-28</sup>, Jer 22<sup>13</sup>, Mal 3<sup>5</sup>).

In Rev 14<sup>15-16</sup> the Parousia is represented as ushering in the great harvest of the world's fruit (cf. Mt 13<sup>39</sup> 'the harvest is the end of the world'). In Mt 13<sup>39a</sup> the harvest consists in gathering up the tares as well as the wheat with a view to their subsequent separation; here, however, only the wheat is reaped, and the evil, which in the Parable appears as tares, is treated under another metaphor in Rev 14<sup>14</sup>. In the Parable again the angels are the reapers, but here the Son of Man Himself gathers the fruit. Of that hour, 'the hour to reap' (v. 15), 'knoweth no man, no not the angels which are in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father' (Mk 13<sup>32</sup>), who sends an angel to announce to the Divinely-commissioned reaper that 'the hour to reap is come; for the harvest of the earth is over-ripe' (better perhaps 'fully ripe,' though the word used [ἐξηράνθη] properly refers to the 'drying up' of the juices of the wheat).

After the gathering in of all the wheat, another angel comes forth from the Temple, 'he also having a sharp sickle,' and a second reaping follows the first. This second reaping follows the first just as the vintage, with which it is here associated, succeeded the wheat harvest (cf. Jl 3<sup>13</sup>). It will be observed that the Son of Man reaps the wheat, but the work of destruction is fittingly consigned to an angel. The 'children of the kingdom' are in this chapter identified with the wheat as elsewhere in the NT, but the wicked are identified with the clusters of the vine destined to be trodden in the winepress 'of the wrath of God' (cf. 'the vine of wrath' in Rev 14<sup>8, 10</sup>).

2. The harvest in Palestine.—Of the various harvests in Palestine, that of barley takes place first. Generally speaking, it begins about the middle of April, but in the Jordan valley in March, while in the coast districts, on the other hand, it commences about ten days later, and in the elevated regions sometimes as much as a month later. Hence the labourers from the hills are free to assist in reaping the harvest of the coast-dwellers, while the latter in turn can lend a hand in gathering in the harvest in the hill-country. The wheat harvest commences about a fortnight after the barley harvest; the gathering of fruit and vegetables takes place in summer, the gathering of olives in autumn, and the vintage from August onwards. The harvest of course depends on the rainfall, which, to render the best results, must neither be very large nor very small.

Barley is the universal food of asses and horses and is also the staple food of the poor, who, however, generally mix it with wheaten meal when they can afford to do so. Wheat thrives well in Palestine, thirty-fold being quite an average crop. It is reaped with a sickle, and gathered into bundles which are generally carried off at once on the backs of camels to the threshing-floor, where the heads are struck off the straw by the sickle. The threshing-floor is generally common to the whole village, and consists of a large open space on the side of a hill, the surface of the rock being levelled for the purpose, or, failing this, an artificial mortar floor is prepared. The grain is usually separated from the chaff by oxen treading it as they are driven round and round a circular heap of corn in the centre of the floor. The oxen as a rule are not muzzled (cf. Dt 25<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>). Sometimes, however, the wheat is threshed by means of a heavy wooden wheel or roller, or else by a kind of drag consisting of two or three boards fastened together, the under-surface of which is studded with pieces of iron, flint, or stone. It is drawn by a horse or an ass. This machine is seen more frequently in the northern parts of the country. After threshing comes the process of winnowing. As soon as the straw has been removed, the corn is thrown up into the air by shovels, when the wind blows away the chaff and the grain falls back. When there is no wind, a large fan is employed (cf. Mt 3<sup>12</sup>). The chopped straw, called tibn, is used as fodder for the cattle.

But, even after the winnowing, the grain is still mixed with small stones, pieces of clay, unbruised ears and tares, all of which must be removed before the corn is ready for use. Hence the necessity of the further process of sifting. This work is done by women. The sieve generally consists of a wooden hoop with a mesh made of camel-hair. The sifter is seated on the floor and shakes the sieve containing the grain until the chaff comes to the surface; she then blows it away, removes the stones and other bits of refuse, after which the grain is ready for the granary. In modern times it is always stored in underground chambers, generally about 8 feet deep; they are cemented on the inside to keep the damp out, the only opening being a circular mouth, about 15 inches in diameter, which is boarded over and, if concealment is desirable, covered with earth or grass. The grain thus stored will keep for years. See also SICKLE, VINE, VINTAGE.

HATRED.—In the time of Nero the Christians of Rome 'were accused, not so much on the charge of burning the city, as of hating the human race' ('haud proinde in crimine incendii quam odio humani generis convicti sunt' [Tac. Ann. xv. 44]). The indictment was the opposite of the truth. Christianity is amor generis humani. Christ's new commandment is 'that ye love one another' (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup>), and it is fulfilled when an outward categorical imperative (e.g. Lv 19<sup>18</sup>) is changed into an inward personal impulse, the dynamic of which is His own self-sacrificing, all-embracing love. 'We love, because he first loved us' (1 Jn 4<sup>19</sup>), and it would be as right to insert 'the human race' as 'him' (AV) after the first verb. By precept and example Christ constrains men to love one another as He has loved them. To be Christlike is to love impartially and immeasurably. Love is the sole and sufficient evidence that a man 'is in the light' (1 Jn 2<sup>10</sup>). There is a silencing finality in St. John's judgment of that profession of Christianity which is not attested by love: 'He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in the darkness even until now' (1 Jn 2<sup>9</sup>). The negative μη αγαπᾶν is displaced by the positive μισῆν, for there is no real via media, cool indifference to any man being quickly changed under stress of temptation into very decided dislike. ὁ μισῶν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ is guilty of an unnatural hatred, and though 'brother' refers in the first instance to those who are members of the body of Christ, it is impossible to evade the wider application. 'The brother for whom Christ died' (1 Co 8<sup>11</sup>) is every man. In the searching language of the Apostle of love, hatred is equivalent to murder (1 Jn 3<sup>15</sup>): the one concept lacks no hideous element that is present in the other; the animating ideas and passions of the hater and the murderer are the same. The Christians of the Apostolic Age could not but love the world which 'God so loved' (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), and for whose sins Christ is the propitiation (1 Jn 2<sup>2</sup>). Their 'world' hated them, and, in many instances, ended by murdering them; but persecution and bloodshed only constrained them to love the more, in accordance with the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>). The early Church extorted from that pagan world the beautiful tribute, 'See how these Christians love one another!' The Spirit of Christ moved His followers to 'put away all bitterness and wrath . . . with all malice,' to be 'kind one to another' (Eph 4<sup>31</sup>), and 'put on love as the bond of perfectness' (Col 3<sup>14</sup>). While they could recall the time when they were 'hateful, hating one another' (στυγνητοί, μισούντες ἀλλήλους, Tit 3<sup>3</sup>; Vulg. 'odibiles, odientes invicem'), the spirit of the new life was φιλαδελφία (love of the brethren), to which was added a world-wide ἀγάπη (2 P 17).

To orthodox Judaism, as well as to cultured Hellenism and the hard pagan Roman world, it seemed natural to love only one's friends. When the Rabbis quoted Lv 19<sup>18</sup>, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour,' they did not hesitate to add, on their own account, the rider, 'Thou shalt hate thine enemy' (Mt 5<sup>43</sup>). To Aristotle the only conceivable objects of love were the persons and things that were good, pleasant, or useful (Nic. Eth. viii. 2). Sulla, a typical Roman, wished it to be inscribed on his monument in the Campus Martius that 'none of his friends ever did him a kindness, and none of his enemies ever did him a wrong, without being fully repaid' (Plut. Sulla, xxxviii.). Into a world dominated by such ideas Christianity brought that enthusiasm of humanity which is the reflexion of Christ's own redeeming love. Associating the ideas of hatred and death, it opposed to them those of love and life. 'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not abideth in death' (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>).

Cicero defines hatred (odium) as 'ira inveterata' (Tusc. Disp. iv. 9), a phrase which Chaucer borrows in Persones Tale, 'Hate is old wrathe.' But ira is in itself a morally neutral instinct, which becomes either righteous or unrighteous according to the quality of the objects against which it is directed. The θυμὸς καὶ ὀργή which the Christian has to put away include all selfish kinds of hatred. But he soon discovers that in his new life he must still be a 'good hater' if he is to be a true lover. He must, with Dante, 'hate the sin which hinders loving.' 'What indignation' (ἀγανάκτησις) is wrought in him by a sorrow after a godly sort! (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>). The love which he feels as he comes nearer God is hot with wrath against every 'abominable thing which God hates.' The capacity for hatred is set down by Christ to the credit of the Church of Ephesus: 'Thou hatest the works of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate' (Rev 2<sup>9</sup>). To Christ Himself the words of Ps 45<sup>7</sup> are applied, 'Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity' (He 1<sup>9</sup>). The writer of Revelation does not conceal his loathing of pagan Rome, calling it 'a hold of unclean and hateful birds' (Rev 18-), and Jude (v. 23) bids evangelists who snatch brands from the burning 'have mercy with fear, hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.'

If hatred not merely of evil things but of wicked persons is anywhere ascribed to God, a difficulty is at once felt. It is probably a mistake to take ἐχθροί in Ro 5<sup>10</sup> (cf. Col 1<sup>21</sup>, Ja 4<sup>4</sup>) in a passive sense, though Calvin, Tholuck, Meyer, and others do so. The meaning is 'hostile to God,' not 'hateful to God' (Ritschl, Lightfoot, Sanday-Headlam). God, who hates the sin, loves the sinner, and it is only in the alienated mind of man that a καταλλαγή needs to be effected. But in Ro 9<sup>13</sup> the words are quoted which Malachi (1-4) attributes to Jahweh: 'Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated.' The saying may be interpreted in the light of Lk 14<sup>26</sup>, where 'hate' evidently means 'love less'; or it may be taken as an imperfect OT conception, which St. Paul uses in an argumentum ad hominem without giving it his own imprimatur.

HEAD.—The importance attributed to the head in ancient psychology must not be supposed to spring from scientific knowledge of the function of the brain and nervous system. 'The psychical importance of the head would be an early result of observation of the phenomena and source of the senses of sight, hearing, taste, and smell, and of such facts as the pulsation of the fontanel in infants and the fatal effect of wounds in this complex centre of the organism' (A. E. Crawley, The Idea of the Soul, 1909, p. 239). Plato assigned reason to the brain, 'the topographically higher region being correlated with the reason's higher worth' (Aristotle, Psychology, tr. W. A. Hammond, 1902, Introd. p. xxvi); but, to Aristotle, 'the brain is merely a regulator for the temperature of the heart' (ib. p. xxiv). By the time of Galen (2nd cent. A.D.), sensation was located in the brain, acting in conjunction with the nerves; but there is no evidence that such technical Greek knowledge is implied in the literature of apostolic Christianity.* We are there concerned in general with an extension of Hebrew psychology, for which the brain was of no psychical importance. In fact, there is no Hebrew word for 'brain,' and we must suppose that it would simply be called, as it actually is in Syriac, the 'marrow of the head.' Certain (Aramaic) references to 'the visions of the head' in the Book of Daniel (2-8 etc.) merely refer to the position of the organ of sight, and the phrase is actually contrasted with 'the thoughts of the heart' (4<sup>5</sup>; cf. 2<sup>30</sup>).

The head (κεφαλή) is named as a representative part of the whole personality in St. Paul's words to blaspheming Jews at Corinth: 'Your blood be upon your own heads' (Ac 18<sup>6</sup>; cf. Jos 2<sup>19</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>16</sup>, etc.), and in the proverb that kindness to an enemy heaps coals of fire on his head (Ro 12-<sup>9</sup>; cf. Pr 25<sup>22</sup>). The mourning custom of casting dust on the head (Rev 18<sup>19</sup>; cf. Ezk 27<sup>30</sup>) may spring from the desire to link the dead with the living, if the dust was originally taken from the grave itself, as W. R. Smith and Schwally have supposed. (As to cutting off the hair of the head, because of a vow, see art. HAIR.) St. Paul argues against the Corinthian practice of allowing women publicly to pray or prophesy with unveiled heads, on three grounds (1 Co 11<sup>34</sup>): (1) there is an upward gradation of rank to be observed—woman, man, Christ, God; (2) woman was created from and for man, and so she must show by her covered head that she is in the presence of her superior—man (cf. the covering of the bride in presence of her future husband, Gn 24<sup>65</sup>); † (3) the long hair of woman shows that the covering of the veil is natural to her. If she unveils her head, therefore, she dishonours it by making a false claim for the personality it represents, as well as by outraging decency, which should be the more carefully observed because of the presence of the angels in public worship. (No satisfactory explanation of the phrase 'authority [ἐξουσία] on her head' [1 Co 11<sup>10</sup>] seems yet to have been given, but the context seems to imply that the veil expresses the authority of man over woman, in accordance with which the RV inserts the words 'a sign of' before 'authority.' See art. AUTHORITY.) It should be noted that it is the whole head, and not simply the face, that is covered in the East: 'The women of Egypt deem it more incumbent upon them to cover the upper and back part of the head than the face, and more requisite to conceal the face than most other parts of the person' (Lane, Modern Egyptians, 1895, p. 67).

The custom of anointing the head is mentioned (figuratively) in 1 Clem. lvi. 5; Ign. Eph. xvii. 1;

* Even if it were, Galen's ascription of psychical attributes to organs other than the brain would show the wide gulf between ancient and modern psychology.

it is crowned in token of honour (Rev 4<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>12</sup> . cf. 10<sup>1</sup>). The frequent references in the Odes of Solomon to a crown on the Christian's head are best explained from the Eastern practice of placing a garland on the head of candidates for baptism (i. 1, ix. 8, xx. 7, 8, and J. H. Bernard's notes in TS viii. 3 [1912] ad loc.). The seven heads of the Apocalyptic red dragon (i.e. Satan [Rev 12<sup>3</sup>]) apparently denote the abundance of his power; the seven heads of his agent, the Beast (13<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>), are explicitly referred both to the seven hills of Rome and to seven Emperors. The head smitten to death, but healed (13<sup>3</sup>), appears to be Nero, who was widely believed not to have died in A.D. 68 (see Swete, ad loc.). The lion-heads and snake-headed tails of Rev 9<sup>17</sup> 19 merely heighten the horror of the scene.

The most remarkable use of the term 'head' in apostolic literature is its application to Christ, the 'body' being the Church. This analogy is more than illustration; it forms an argument, like the psychological analogies of Augustine in regard to the Trinity. Just as the lower level of primitive thought represented by symbolic magic often finds a real connexion in acts, because they are similar, so ancient theology (cf. the 'Recapitulation' doctrine of Irenæus) often finds positive argument in mere parallelism. In the Pauline use of the analogy between the human body and the Church, Christ is sometimes identified with the whole body, and sometimes with the head alone; this will occasion no difficulty to those who remember St. Paul's doctrine of the believer's mystical union with Christ, so that his life is Christ's. In the most detailed application of the analogy (1 Co 12<sup>12</sup> . cf. Ro 12<sup>4-5</sup>), the head is simply contrasted with the feet, without special reference to Christ, the whole Church-body being identified with Him. NT commentators,* whilst often crediting St. Paul with the knowledge of modern physiology, usually overlook the contribution of Hebrew psychology to the elucidation of this analogy. In the OT the body is regarded as a co-operative group of quasi-independent sense-organs, each possessed of psychical and ethical, as well as physical, life (see artt. EYE, EAR, HAND, and cf. Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup>). This gives new point to the comparison with the quasi-independent life of the members of the Church; in the social as in the individual body, health depends on the (voluntary) subordination of this quasi-independence to the common good. This unity of purpose St. Paul elsewhere traces to the Headship of Christ. The Apostle can identify the head with Christ, without at all thinking of the brain, because the head is the most dignified part of the psycho-physical personality. As a centre of life (cf. Mt 5<sup>36</sup>), not specially of thought or volition (which St. Paul located in the heart), the head dominates the body, the separate organs of which each contribute to the whole personality 'according to the working in due measure of each several part' (Eph 4<sup>16</sup> ; cf. Col 2<sup>19</sup>). Christ is 'the saviour of the body' (Eph 5<sup>3</sup>), as it is the head on which the safety of the whole body depends, because of the special sense-organs located in it. On the other hand, the body is necessary to the completion and fullness of the life of the head, as is the Church to Christ (Eph 1<sup>22-23</sup>). Elsewhere, this Headship of Christ over the body denotes simply His priority of rank (Col 1<sup>18</sup>), and this is extended to His dominion over the 'principalities and powers' of the unseen world (2<sup>10</sup>).

The bodily union of the members with Christ the Head is conceived in close relation with the initial * E.g. J. Armitage Robinson (Ephesians, 1903, p. 103), who bases the Pauline thought of Christ, as Head of the body on the fact that 'that is the seat of the brain which controls and unifies the organism, and goes on to speak of 'the complete system of nerves and muscles by which the limbs are knit together and are connected with the head' (p. 104).

act of baptism: 'in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body' (1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>). St. Paul's doctrine of the Spirit of God (or of Christ) as creating the spiritual unity and efficiency of the body through which it circulates from the head has an interesting parallel in the Pneuma doctrine of contemporary physiology. According to this, 'spirit' was conveyed by the arteries to the different sense-organs (H. Siebeck, Gesch. der Psychologie, 1884, ii. p. 130 f.; G. S. Brett, A History of Psychology, 1912, p. 286 f.). Something of this popular doctrine may, of course, have reached St. Paul through the physician Luke. It would certainly have appealed to him as an example of 'spiritual' law in the 'natural' world, confirming and enforcing his own moral and spiritual conception of the Hebrew doctrine of the Spirit.*

The Pauline analogy of 'body' and 'Church' is employed by Clement of Rome, though without explicit reference to the Headship of Christ, the head being named here simply as a higher member: 'The head without the feet is nothing; so likewise the feet without the head are nothing: even the smallest limbs of our body are necessary and useful for the whole body: but all the members conspire and unite in subjection, that the whole body may be saved' (1 Clem. xxxvii. 5). The same analogy re-appears in several of the Odes of Solomon. Thus Christ says, 'I sowed my fruit in hearts, and transformed them into myself; and they received my blessing and lived; and they were gathered to me, and were saved; because they were to me as my own members, and I was their Head' (xvii. 13, 14; cf. xxiii. 16). Similarly, Christ speaks of His descent into Hades, where He gathers His saints and delivers them: 'the feet and the head he [Death] let go, for they were not able to endure my face' (xlii. 18). These passages continue the mystic realism of Pauline and Johannine thought, and throw an interesting light on the earlier ideas of the relation of the believer to Christ, even though they belong to the 2nd century.

HEART (καρδία). — 1. Its physical sense. — 'Heart,' which in the OT is frequently employed to denote the central organ of the body, is not found in the NT in this primary sense, though we have an allusion to it in St. Paul's 'fleshy tables of the heart' (2 Co 3<sup>3</sup>). But the influence of the old Hebrew view that 'the life of the flesh is in the blood' (Lv 17<sup>11</sup>) still persists; and in Ac 14<sup>17</sup>, Ja 5<sup>5</sup> 'heart' is used to express the physical life that is nourished by food or surfeited with luxury. Owing, however, to the close connexion in the Hebrew mind between body and soul (see art. BODY), the transition was easy from the physical life to the spiritual; and in the NT it is a spiritual use of 'heart' with which we have almost wholly to do.

2. Its psychological sense. — (1) The word is frequently employed in a general way to designate the whole inward life of thought and feeling, desire and will, without any discrimination of separate faculties or activities (Ac 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>25</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>4</sup>, He 13<sup>9</sup>). (2) In some cases it applies especially to the intellectual powers (Ro 12<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>19</sup>), though elsewhere (He 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>16</sup>, Ph 4<sup>7</sup>) the heart and the mind are distinguished from each other. It is in this intellectual reference that the scriptural use of 'heart' differs from the ordinary usage of English speech; for though with us, as with the biblical writers, the word is employed with a wide variety of application as descriptive of the inner life and its various faculties, it is not used so as to include the rational and intellectual nature, from which, on the contrary, it is expressly distinguished, as in the common antithesis between the heart and the head. (3) In a few cases it denotes the will or faculty of determination (1 Co 7<sup>37</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>7</sup>). In 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup> βουλαὶ τῶν καρδιῶν, which EV renders 'the counsels of the hearts,' would be more exactly translated by 'the purposes (or resolutions) of the hearts.' (4) It stands for the seat of feelings and emotions, whether joyful (Ac 2<sup>26, 46</sup>) or sorrowful (Ro 9<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup>), and of desires, whether holy (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>) or impure (12<sup>4</sup>). Especially it is used of the affection of love, whether towards man (2 Co 7<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>22</sup>) or towards God (Ro 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup>).

3. Its ethical and religious significance.—(1) Occasionally 'heart' represents the moral faculty or conscience (Ac 2<sup>37</sup>, He 8<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>20</sup>). In He 10<sup>22</sup>, 'having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience,' the conscience, if not identified with the heart, is thought of as inhering in it. (2) As the centre of the personal life the heart stands for moral reality as distinguished from mere appearance (2 Co 5<sup>12</sup>). The 'hidden man of the heart' (1 P 3<sup>4</sup>) is the real man, the obedience that comes from the heart (Ro 6<sup>17</sup>) the true obedience. Hence 'heart' becomes equivalent to character as the good or evil resultant of moral activity and experience. Thus the heart may 'wax gross' (Ac 28-7) or may become 'unblameable in holiness' (1 Th 3<sup>13</sup>); it may be hardened (He 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>) and 'exercised with covetousness' (2 P 2<sup>14</sup>), or it may bear the stamp of simplicity (Eph 6<sup>5</sup>, Col 3<sup>22</sup>) and be purified by faith (Ac 15<sup>9</sup>). (3) But, as this mention of faith reminds us, the heart in the NT is especially the sphere of religious experience. It is there that the natural knowledge of God has its seat (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>), and there also that the light of the knowledge of His glory shines in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). There faith springs up and dwells and works (Ro 10<sup>9, 10</sup>, Ac 15<sup>9</sup>), and there unbelief draws men away from the living God (He 3<sup>12</sup>). It may become the haunt of unclean lusts, that make men blind to the truth of God (Ro 1<sup>24</sup>); but it is into the heart that God sends the Spirit of His Son (Gal 4<sup>6</sup>), and in the heart that Christ Himself takes up His abode (Eph 3<sup>17</sup>). This life of the heart is a hidden life (1 P 3<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>), but it lies clearly open to the eyes of God, who searches and tries it (Ro 8<sup>27</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>). And the prime necessity of religion is a heart that is 'right in the sight of God' (Ac 8<sup>21</sup>). Such a heart can be obtained only through faith (Ac 15<sup>9</sup>, Ro 10<sup>10</sup>, Eph 3<sup>17</sup>) and as a gift from God Himself (cf. the OT saying, 'A new heart also will I give you,' Ezk 36-6) in virtue of that new creation in Christ Jesus (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>) whereby a heart that is hard and impenitent (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>) is transformed into one in which the love of God has been shed abroad through the Holy Ghost (5<sup>5</sup>).

HEATHEN.—The word 'heathen' still finds a measure of favour with the OT Revisers, and in order to prevent it from being entirely excluded from the NT, it might well have been retained in at least one or two of the passages where it occurs in the AV (Mt 6<sup>17</sup> 18<sup>7</sup>, Ac 4<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>23</sup>, Gal 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>8</sup>). 'Gentiles' is substituted for it throughout in the text of the RV. It first appears in the Gothic Version of Ulfilas (A.D. 318-388) in Mk 7<sup>26</sup>, where Ἑλληνίς is rendered by haiþnō. The etymology is uncertain. It was long believed to have come from the Gothic haiþi, 'heath,' and to have denoted the 'dwellers on the heath,' who, on the introduction of Christianity, stood out longest in their adherence to the ancient deities (cf. Trench, Study of Words<sup>8</sup>, p. 77). Doubt has been cast, however, on this derivation by S. Bugge (Indoger. Forschungen, v. [1895] 178), who takes haiþnō as indicating a masc. haiþans, which he refers to Armenian heʿanos, 'heathen,' an adaptation of Gr. ἔθνος (cf. OED, vol. v., s.v. 'Heathen,' where Bugge's theory is not accepted).

A similar etymological uncertainty presents itself in the case of the synonym, 'pagan.' The application of this word to non-Christians was long thought to be due to the fact that 'the ancient idolatry lingered on in the rural villages and hamlets [pagi] after Christianity had been generally accepted in the towns and cities of the Roman Empire' (OED, vol. vii., s.v. 'Pagan'). But the application to non-Christians probably arose at an earlier date, and in a different way (EBR<sup>11</sup> xx. 449). In the course of the 1st cent., paganus came to mean in classical Latin, 'a civilian,' as opposed to a miles. The 'raw half-armed rustics who sometimes formed a rude militia in Roman wars' were not looked upon as a regular branch of the service, or as deserving the honourable appellation of milites, soldiers of the standing army. They were pagani (Tac. Hist. i. 63, ii. 14: 'paganorum manus . . . inter milites'; ii. 88, iii. 24, 43, 77, iv. 20: 'paganorum lixarumque'; Pliny, Ep. x. 18: 'et milites et pagani'). Christians, then, having taken the title of milites Dei or milites Christi for their own, which St. Paul had warranted them in doing (Eph 6<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>3</sup>), and for which they found a further warrant in the early application of the word sacramentum, 'the military oath,' to baptism, regarded as pagani ('outsiders,' not soldiers at all)* those who had not abandoned heathenism and committed themselves to Christ as their leader. This derivation seems to have been first suggested by Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ed. Bury, ii. 394 n., 176), and has been adopted by Zahn (NKZ x. [1899] 23 f.) and Harnack (Expansion of Christianity, i. 316, ii. 22).

Our Lord's three allusions to the heathen (οἱ ἔθνικοι, τὰ ἔθνη) in the Sermon on the Mount were designed to illustrate His teaching respecting the righteousness of the Kingdom of God, as a righteousness which demanded, in loving one's neighbour, much more than that reciprocity of courtesy which even heathens practised (Mt 5<sup>47</sup>); in prayer, a childlike trustfulness of asking, unlike the wordy clamour of heathen worship (6<sup>7</sup>); and in work, a loving dependence on God, which would exalt work, and make it quite a different thing from heathen drudgery (6<sup>32</sup>).

The closing words of Mt 18<sup>17</sup> (ἔστω σοι ὡς περ ὁ ἔθνικός καὶ ὁ τελώνης) must give us pause. Had they stood alone, we might have inferred that Jesus acquiesced in the judgment which put the heathen and the publican under the ban. But a publican had already been taken into the number of the Twelve (9<sup>9</sup>), and he is the very apostle who reports these words. St. Matthew has also recorded before this how Jesus had put forth His miraculous power in response to the 'great faith' of a heathen centurion and a distressed heathen mother (8<sup>10</sup> 15-8). That the words imply personal contempt or dislike for the heathen and the publican, or pronounce a sentence of exclusion upon them, is, accordingly, out of the question. This saying is to be regarded as an obiter dictum of our Lord's, spoken to His disciples from their present Jewish standpoint, and therefore of use to them at the moment in interpreting His meaning. Current Jewish opinion is made the medium of conveying moral and evangelical guidance.

The healing of the Syrophenician's daughter is another occasion on which our Lord appears to speak the language of His time. Here, however, the severity of the words, 'It is not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to the dogs' (Mk 7<sup>27</sup>), is intentionally mitigated by the use of the diminutive κυνάρια, which is just 'doggies' in our language—no word of scorn, but one of affection and tenderness. Nor should we forget that the saying which immediately precedes is, 'Let the children first be filled.' The Syrophœnician, with the quick penetration of faith, perceived that the two sayings were to be taken together, and knew that she was not really repelled (cf. Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, ii. 347).

* Cf. Fr. pēkin—a name originally given by the soldiers under Napoleon I. to any civilian (OED vii. 622).

The Third Epistle of St. John is 'a quite private note' (EBi ii. 1327), recommending to the kind attention of Gaius, a friend of his, some 'traveling missionaries,' described as men who 'for the sake of the Name went forth, taking nothing of the heathen' (v. 7: μηδεν λαμβάνοντες ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνικῶν). Seeing that these itinerant preachers of the gospel deem it most prudent not to accept hospitality from 'them that are without' (cf. 1 Co 5<sup>12</sup>, Col 4<sup>9</sup>)—a course which St. John approves—they are the more dependent on the φιλοξενία of the few fellow-Christians who come in their way (cf. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, iii. 374). The cutting question which St. Paul addressed to St. Peter in the presence of the congregation at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>14</sup>) was justly aimed against the moral inconsistency of his first eating with the Gentile converts (συ . . . ἐθνικῶς ἔσθης; cf. v. 1-) and then withdrawing from table-fellowship with them. This vacillation, had it been allowed to go on without remonstrance, would have arrested the progress of the work of Christ among the heathen. Few occurrences in Church history are more full of warning than this memorable crisis, which might have divided more than the Christians of Antioch into two opposing camps, and made the Lord's Supper itself a table of discord (cf. HDB iii. 765<sup>b</sup>).

Over against the dark picture of heathenism which he draws in Ro 1<sup>18-32</sup> St. Paul sets a very different presentment in 2<sup>14</sup>, where he depicts heathen human nature as bearing witness to a law written within, and being guided by it to well-doing. The Apostle also does justice to heathen ethics in Ph 4<sup>8</sup>—'an exhortation,' as Weizsacker says (Apostolic Age, ii. 354), 'whose charm to this day rests on the appeal to the common feeling of humanity,' and on the principle that 'that which was valid . . . among heathens was also truly Christian' (cf. art. 'St. Paul in Athens' by Ernst Curtius, in Expositor, 7th ser. iv. 441 f.).

JAMES DONALD.

HEAVEN.—Introductory.—The subject of heaven is difficult to treat fully without diverging into the discussion of kindred subjects and trespassing on the province of other articles. The reader is referred to the artt. ESCHATOLOGY, Hades, IMMORTALITY, PARADISE, PAROUSIA, and RESURRECTION, in this and other Dictionaries for discussion of various matters which are relevant to the treatment of the conception of heaven.

Two broad general lines of development in things eschatological were already at work at the beginning of the Christian era. Palestinian Judaism on the whole tended towards literalism and more material conceptions of the Last Things, while Alexandrian Judaism was moving towards a spiritualization of the principal elements in the future hope. Both these tendencies are discernible in the development of Christian eschatology during the 1st century. But the most important element is the influence of the primitive apostolic beliefs concerning the Resurrection of Christ and His state of existence after death. Special attention is directed in this article to the influence of these beliefs on the development of the Christian conception of heaven.

1. Jewish apocalyptic.—(a) Alexandrian.—The principal features of Alexandrian Jewish eschatology in relation to heaven are the view that the righteous enter at once into their perfected state of happiness after death, and the view that the resurrection of the righteous is of the spirit only. Hence the conception of heaven is wholly spiritualized, and the thought of it as an intermediate place of rest disappears. But it must not be supposed that a wholly consistent view can be found in the apocalyptic literature of the period, any more than in the NT writers. It was a time of change; new forces were at work modifying the older beliefs, and the above statement is simply a broad generalization of the trend of Alexandrian Judaism. When particular passages are examined the difficulty of constructing a homogeneous scheme of the Last Things becomes apparent at once. The principal difficulty is the recurrence of the idea of the earthly Messianic kingdom (cf. Wis 3<sup>7</sup> with 5<sup>7</sup>), which is incompatible with a purely spiritual conception of resurrection and of heaven. The chief passages are: Wis 3<sup>1-9</sup> 4<sup>7-14</sup> 5<sup>15-16</sup>, 2 En iii.-xxii. (account of the ten heavens in order; Paradise is in the third heaven, and also the place of punishment for the wicked), lv. 2, lxvii. 2, 4 Mac. xiii. 16, v. 37, xviii. 23 (note the phrase 'Abraham's bosom' used for the place of rest for the righteous after death).

(b) Palestinian.—The two important writings belonging to this period are Apoc. Baruch and 2 Esdras. For a full treatment of their critical analysis and eschatological system see Charles, Eschatology, ch. viii., also Box, The Ezra-Apocalypse, 1912, and the edition of both in Charles, Apoc. and Pseudepigraph. of the OT. The general view of heaven in Palestinian apocalyptic as illustrated by these two writings is as follows.

Heaven, also identified with Paradise, is the final abode of the righteous (Apoc. Bar. li., 2 Es. vii. 36, viii. 52). An intermediate place of rest for the righteous (Apoc. Bar. xxx. 2) is described as 'the treasures,' in which is preserved the number of the souls of the righteous' (cf. also 2 Es. iv. 41). Messiah comes from heaven to establish a temporary Messianic Kingdom, and returns to heaven at the close of it. The righteous in heaven are made like to the angels (Apoc. Bar. li. 10).

2. Pauline literature.—In dealing with any eschatological conception in the NT it is necessary to consider first of all how much is due to the Jewish background of thought; then, in the case of each writer, to see how far the conception belongs to the common stock of primitive Christian tradition, and how far it is peculiar to the writer under discussion. In dealing with St. Paul it is also necessary to examine the question of a possible development of thought. In general the orthodox Jewish view of heaven represented in the Synoptic Gospels forms the background and starting-point of all the NT writers. The principal points which call for examination in St. Paul's correspondence are the relation of the conception of heaven to Christ, and the conception of heaven as the future place of abode for believers.

(a) Heaven in relation to Christ.—Two main questions arise from St. Paul's treatment of this subject. First, the question of the pre-existent life of Christ; and second, the question of His present state of existence.

(1) For the first point the chief passages are 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>, Ro 10<sup>6</sup>, and possibly in this connexion

Ph 2<sup>6</sup> and Col 1<sup>15-17</sup>. In 1 Co 15<sup>47</sup>, reading 'the second man is from heaven,' it is quite possible to interpret the passage as referring to the Parousia rather than to the doctrine of a pre-existent Heavenly Man. Ro 10<sup>6</sup>, an application of Dt 30<sup>12-13</sup> to Christ, may be referred to the present place of Christ; i.e. it is unnecessary to bring Christ down again after His Resurrection and Ascension. Ph 2<sup>6</sup> is also capable of being interpreted as referring to Christ's moral likeness to God. Thus St. Paul's testimony to the pre-existent life of Christ as in heaven is not clear, though it may be upheld on the ground of the above passages.

(2) The second point is far more vital to St. Paul's thought, and has largely influenced his view of heaven in relation to the future condition of believers. The words 'ascended into heaven' clearly represent the consensus of primitive apostolic tradition. To the Jewish view of the transcendence of God, and of His dwelling in heaven as in contrast to earth, the primitive tradition added the doctrine of Christ's present existence there with God. It is evident that St. Paul held the common Jewish views of heaven (cf. 2 Co 12-: the third heaven, or Paradise, regarded as God's dwelling-place; Ph 2<sup>10</sup>: the division of the universe into things heavenly, earthly, and infernal; Gal 1<sup>8</sup>: an angel from heaven; Ro 1<sup>8</sup>: God's wrath revealed from heaven, etc.). But it is still more evident that he had also thought deeply on the question of Christ's Resurrection, its nature, His present state of existence, and the bearing of these questions on the future state of believers. This is not the place to discuss the possible conclusions at which St. Paul may have arrived. But we can see that his thinking on this point tends in the direction of a spiritualization of the whole conception of heaven. He conceives of Christ's present existence as spiritual; Christ and the Spirit are identified; Christ is for the present 'hid in God' (Col 3<sup>3</sup>); the dead believers are 'at home with the Lord' (2 Co 5<sup>8</sup>). It is generally conceded that Ephesians, even if not St. Paul's, is certainly Pauline. Hence we may use it here as evidence for the elaboration of the conception of a quasi-material, quasi-spiritual region, τα ἐπουράνια. Here Christ is seated at God's right hand; believers have here their proper home and their characteristic blessings; and here is being waged the age-long conflict between the spiritual powers of good and evil (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>).

Lastly, the link which connects this side of the subject with the more purely eschatological use of heaven as the future abode of believers is the passage in 2 Co 5<sup>1-2</sup>. Here we have the conception (possibly developed directly from St. Paul's view of our Lord's Resurrection, although the conception of a 'body of light' found in Jewish and Gnostic sources may have influenced his thought) of a spiritual body laid up in heaven for the believer. This body was evidently after the pattern of our Lord's Resurrection body or mode of existence (cf. Ph 3<sup>-9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>49</sup>). In thinking of it as laid up or reserved in heaven, St. Paul is no doubt using Rabbinical categories of thought. For example, the Rabbinical tradition could think of the Law, the Temple, and other central ideas of Judaism as laid up with God before the creation of the world.

(b) Heaven as the future abode of believers.—This conception is conspicuous by its absence from St. Paul's thought. The Parousia is always 'from heaven,' alike in the earliest (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>) and in the latest (Ph 3<sup>-9</sup>) of St. Paul's letters. But when he speaks of the future place of existence of the Christian it is always 'with the Lord,' 'with Christ,' and apparently he has been chiefly occupied with the fresh question of the mode of the Christian's future existence as determined by Christ's existence. Possibly, also, he so takes it for granted that believers will have their place in a Messianic earthly kingdom that he does not think it necessary to mention it. The grief of survivors in 1 Th 4<sup>13</sup> seems to imply this clearly, also the reference to the judgment executed by believers in 1 Co 6-. But what seems most evident is that St. Paul passed almost unconsciously from the traditional and more material view of the future state implied in 1 Th 4<sup>13</sup> to the simpler and more spiritual conception of future likeness to Christ, and a blessed existence with Him. This takes the place of all sensuous joys of heaven.

3. Petrine literature.—If the Lucan record of St. Peter's speeches may be taken as at least representing Petrine material, then we have one or two passages relating to Christ's present place in heaven. Ac 2<sup>34-35</sup> interprets Ps 110<sup>1</sup> of the Ascension of Christ, and 3<sup>-1</sup> adds that it was necessary for the Messiah to return to heaven because the ἀποκατάστασις had not yet arrived. Both passages show that the belief in the Messiah's present existence in heaven was an essential part of primitive apostolic tradition, and also that the early tradition was very little occupied with heaven as a place of abode in the future, but rather as the place whence God would intervene by sending the Messiah again to establish the kingdom on earth. The few passages in the First Epistle which speak of heaven add nothing to this position. 1 P 1<sup>4</sup> echoes Col 1<sup>3</sup>: heaven is the place where the inheritance incorruptible and undefiled is kept with care until the moment for the revelation of Messiah. 1 P 3<sup>22</sup> re-affirms the doctrine of Eph 1<sup>-9</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>, etc.: the Ascension of Christ to heaven and His Exaltation over all the spiritual powers in the heavenly sphere. Hence, as far as the literature attributed to St. Peter is concerned, we do not find anything peculiar to him, but only a confirmation of the two main elements of primitive Christian tradition—the present existence of Christ in heaven conceived of in a quasi-material way as a place or sphere contrasted with earth, and the revelation of Christ from heaven bringing the accomplishment of all hopes of blessing, all that is comprised in σωτηρία. The connexion of the Holy Spirit sent from heaven with the eschatological expectation of the early Church is also characteristic both of the speeches in Acts and of the Epistle (cf. Ac 2<sup>16-18</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>). The same thought is frequent also in St. Paul (Ro 8<sup>-3</sup>, where the Spirit is the ἀπαρχή, an anticipatory guarantee of the blessings yet to come; and Eph 1<sup>14</sup>, where the Spirit is the ἀρραβών).

4. Hebrews.—The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews contributes much of importance to our inquiry. Possibly he is the only one of the NT writers who shows clearly the influence of Alexandrian Judaism in his views on the Last Things. St. Peter represents the primitive Jewish Christian eschatology in its simplest form; even in the First Epistle, although Charles finds an advance on the eschatology of Acts, the hope is still rather for the kingdom on earth; the heavenly nature of the inheritance is not to be understood as referring to the place where it is enjoyed, but rather to the place from which it comes. Even in St. Paul's case, in spite of the clear advance towards a greater spiritualization of the eschatology, this advance seems to consist in the increasing emphasis laid on the spiritual assimilation of believers to Christ as the goal of hope, rather than in an abandonment of the hope of an earthly kingdom. The idea of the kingdom falls into the background, but its abandonment cannot be proved conclusively from St. Paul's writings. But the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews seems to have arrived at this stage of the development. There is no passage in his letter which points clearly to the belief that the righteous share with Christ the joys of a kingdom on or over the earth. The principal passages for consideration are :

(a) Those which confirm the primitive apostolic tradition of the present session of Christ in heaven (4<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>28</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>23</sup> 24). The writer lays stress on the fact that Christ is higher than the 'heaven'; he implies a contrast in the phrase 'heaven itself,' αὐτὸν τὸν οὐρανόν, the special dwelling-place of God, with the heaven of Jewish theology. Jesus has passed 'through the heavens.' Of course this thought is found in Eph 4<sup>10</sup> also. (b) The eschatological passages (3<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>22-24</sup>). Believers are partakers of a 'heavenly calling.' This might be understood as the source of the calling, but in the light of the subsequent passages it is more naturally understood as referring to the place and goal of the calling. In 11<sup>16</sup> the writer represents the believers of old as seeking a better and a heavenly country, and declares that God has prepared a city for them. In 12<sup>22-24</sup>, the climax of his appeal, he depicts the heavenly city, the home of the Christians whom he is addressing. 'Ye have come,' he says, implying that the city exists already, and that it contains the myriads of angels, the assembly of first-begotten ones whose names were enrolled in heaven (Lk 10<sup>20</sup>), the spirits of righteous men who have been 'perfected,' and finally Jesus Himself, the Leader and Completer of the faith. The sense of τετελειωμένοι is a difficulty, but its interpretation is clearly suggested by the author's use of the word with reference to Christ in 2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>23</sup>. The author implies that Christ's present existence in heaven in a perfect state is the result of His experience on earth. He is morally and spiritually perfected as Man, and hence fitted to be the Leader and Completer of the faith. His present state is the witness and the guarantee of the future state of those who follow His leadership. God will do for them what He has done for Christ. This order of things constitutes the heavenly kingdom, the 'unshakable kingdom' which will be manifest at the Parousia, when everything that can be shaken will be removed. The writer evidently regards the Parousia as the moment when the material heaven and earth will disappear, the wicked and apostates will receive the just judgment of God, and nothing will remain but the heavenly order of things already revealed to faith by the Resurrection and Attainment of Christ. Here we have St. Paul's line of thought carried to a clear and triumphant conclusion. Moral and spiritual progress and ultimate full conformity to the character of God are the true goal of hope. The old words σώτηρια, ἐλπίς, κληρονομία are being filled with a definitely spiritual content, and have practically lost their temporal and material significance.

The Pastorals, James and Jude add nothing of importance for the study of this particular conception.

5. Johannine literature.—The treatment of the Johannine literature as a whole is of course impossible. While it still remains a tenable position to regard the Apocalypse, the Epistles, and the Gospel as the work of the same author, representing three different stages of his spiritual development (Ramsay), the question is too complex to discuss here, and too undecided to assume any position as certain. It will be sufficient, therefore, to treat our subject as it appears in each of the three divisions of the Johannine literature separately. On the surface, the difference between the Apocalypse and the Epistles seems to represent the extreme movement of Christian thought from the most material form of Jewish apocalyptic to the most deeply spiritual form of the Christian hope.

(a) The Apocalypse.—The following is a summary of the chief points regarding heaven as the writer of the Apocalypse uses the conception. (1) There is the current division into heavenly, earthly, and infernal (5<sup>3,13</sup>). (2) The principal part of the vision implies a sharp contrast between heaven and earth as spheres of moral activity. In heaven is the throne of God; His will is done in heaven; Christ is there; the angels, and the OT symbols of the power and presence of God in Creation, are seen in heaven. The redeemed are seen there. Heaven is the source of every action directed against the power of evil. On the other hand, earth is the scene of conflict between good and evil. Those who maintain the cause of God and Christ are a suffering and persecuted minority. From the abyss comes the moving power of the enmity against God. In the writer's view, earth is ruled by the abyss rather than by heaven. Even heaven itself is invaded by the powers of evil, and we have the war in heaven (12<sup>7</sup>) and the victory of Michael and his hosts over the dragon and his hosts; the heavens and all those that dwell therein are summoned to rejoice over the victory and the final deliverance of heaven from the powers of evil (12<sup>12</sup>). (3) The heavenly city, the New Jerusalem, the dwelling of God, of Christ, and of the saved, comes down from heaven, after the earthly kingdom is over. It is only the new heaven and earth that the prophet's vision conceives of as fit for the coming of the holy city. Apparently during the millennial reign, the city, in so far as it is conceived of realistically, remains in heaven. We have, on the one hand, a description of the earthly blessing of the risen saints and martyrs during the millennial kingdom (20<sup>4-6</sup>); on the other hand, the vision itself supposes that those who have attained are already in heaven. The elders probably represent those who are 'perfected' in the sense of Hebrews. There are the multitudes of the redeemed (7<sup>9-17</sup>); the souls of the martyrs are seen under the altar in heaven; they are granted white robes, and rest until the appointed number of the martyrs is made up. Further, the description of the heavenly city supposes that there is built up of the apostles and saints a spiritual city whose place is heaven. The difficulty of distinguishing between symbol and the literal meaning of the vision makes it a hard task to sum up clearly the writer's position. He is obviously heir to all the visions of the prophets and the apocalyptists, and master of them all. The spiritual and the symbolic are so subtly blended that it is hard to think that the writer is the slave of his symbols. He seems rather to have brought all the symbols of the previous apocalyptic, from Babylon and Egypt in the remote past down to the almost contemporary visions of Ezra and Baruch, under the sway of the spiritual conception of the kingdom of God. If we may read him so, then his view of heaven must be so interpreted in terms of the ultimate and fundamental contrast between good and evil, progress and perfection, struggle and attainment.

(b) The Epistles.—These add practically nothing to our inquiry, although they are of importance for the study of the Parousia (q.v.). The only passage that calls for comment is 1 Jn 3<sup>3-5</sup>, where the ultimate hope of the believer consists in being like God (αὐτῷ really has θεοῦ in v. 2 as its antecedent, but it is characteristic of the writer's method of thought that he often passes from God to Christ without apparently being aware of a change of subject; in 2<sup>3</sup>, c.g., the Parousia is naturally interpreted as Christ's, but 'born of him' in v. 29 must refer to God; cf. also 3<sup>24</sup> with 4<sup>13</sup>). We have already noticed the tendency in St. Paul and Hebrews to represent the ultimate goal of the Christian as conformity to God or Christ.

(c) The Gospel.—In the Gospel we have: (1) the passages which unequivocally represent heaven as the dwelling-place of the pre-existent Christ—1<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> (which retains the implication, even if we omit ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ with NBL 33 and good Western support) 3<sup>31</sup> 6<sup>38</sup>, 6<sup>52</sup>. Unlike the Pauline passages, these examples are quite unequivocal evidence of the writer's belief on this point.

(2) The eschatological passages—14<sup>1-8</sup> 17<sup>22-24</sup>. Here it is worthy of note that the use of the term 'heaven' is avoided. The nearest approach to a suggestion of a place is the phrase 'in my Father's house are many abodes,' which may perhaps be taken as a spiritualizing of the Temple (cf. 'my Father's house' in 2<sup>6</sup>). Apart from this, the idea of a place of material joy or rest does not appear. We have instead the phrases 'where I am,' 'with me,' 'receive you unto myself.' The satisfaction of a personal relation is presented as the hope. The enjoyment of Divine love without hindrance is the ultimate goal, a spiritual union of character, will, and affections whose type is the union that exists between the Father and the Son. These things constitute heaven. But a resurrection state in the future is also implied by 6<sup>39</sup>, 6<sup>54</sup>. Nevertheless, the enjoyment of the spiritual blessings described in chs. 14 and 17 does not apparently depend on this at all. For the writer of the Fourth Gospel death is a mere incident that does not break the continuity of eternal life; and where such a position is reached, the precise conception of heaven has evidently become irrelevant.

6. The Apostolic Fathers.—(a) Clement of Rome.—In 1 Clement we have the following passages: v. 4: Peter 'went to his appointed place of glory'; v. 7: Paul 'departed from the world and went unto the holy place'; 1. 3: 'they that by God's grace were perfected in love dwell in the abode of the pious (ἐχονσιν χωρον εὐσεβου), who shall be manifested in the visitation of the kingdom of God.' In 2 Clement we have—v. 5: 'the rest of the kingdom that shall be'; vi. 9: 'with what confidence shall we . . . enter into the kingdom of God?' (τὸ βασιλεῖον should perhaps be rendered 'the palace of God'); xvii. 7: the righteous see the torments of the wicked; ix. 5: the righteous receive their reward 'in the flesh,' in the coming kingdom.

No striking or original thoughts as to the future place and state of believers are found here. We have the simple acceptance of the doctrine that the righteous enter after death into a place of rest and glory with Christ. The resurrection of the flesh is taught and apparently is referred to the Parousia, but the nature of the intermediate condition is not clearly stated.

(b) Ignatius.—In the Ignatian correspondence there is no explicit doctrine of heaven, but the implication of several passages seems to be that immediately after death the believer is perfected, 'attains to God.' His emphasis is laid principally on the resurrection, which is after the pattern of Christ's (Trall. ix. 2). He looks forward to receiving his inheritance; he will rise unto God (Rom. ii. 2); 'I shall rise free in Him' (iv. 3); 'when I am come thither then I shall be a man' (vi. 2). Death for him is new birth (ὁ τοκετος μοι ἐπικείται, vi. 1). It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Ignatius thought of the believer, or at least the martyr, as entering upon his perfect state and full reward immediately after death. His view of heaven would seem to coincide with the developed Johannine conception, though several phrases, 'attaining to resurrection,' and so forth, are Pauline.

(c) The Martyrdom of Polycarp contains one interesting passage describing the condition of Polycarp after martyrdom: 'Having by his endurance overcome the unrighteous ruler in the conflict and so received the crown of immortality, he rejoiceth in company with the Apostles and all righteous men, and glorifieth the Almighty God and Father, and blesseth our Lord Jesus Christ' (xix. 2).

The Shepherd of Hermas lies outside our period, and is more curious than valuable for information as to the teaching of the Church of the Apostolic Age. It is easy to see that we are no longer dealing with a creative period. The doctrine of heaven is becoming stereotyped. Such a man as Ignatius is probably hardly representative of the general thought of the Church. The passage from the Martyrdom of Polycarp probably gives the common view of the state of the believer in heaven after death.

Conclusion.—In conclusion, it may be said that for the Church in general during the 1st half of the 1st cent. the centre of interest was not heaven but the Parousia of Christ. Heaven occupied the attention of the NT writers principally as the place where Christ was and whence He would come. St. Paul and others, such as the author of Hebrews, were interested principally in the spiritual consequences of the Resurrection of Christ. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews presents the most striking and consistent picture of the future state of the believer.

As the century advances, the tendency appears in the literature of the period to regard the Parousia more as an article of the faith than as a fact of imminent importance. Side by side with this tendency we find the growth of firmly established ideas of future blessedness based on the imagery of the Apocalypse, crowns and harps, etc., and no searching analysis of the reality of such ideas. It remained for the fresh creative period of Clement of Alexandria and Origen to go over the stereotyped ideas of heaven and transform them.

HEBREWS.—The name 'Hebrew' (Lat. Hebraeus, Gr. Ἑβραῖος) is a transcription of the Aramaic ʿebṛāyā, the equivalent of the original word עֲבָרִי, the proper Gentile name of the people who were also described as 'Israelites' or 'Children of Israel.' The people themselves preferred as a rule the designation 'Israel.' The latter was the name of privilege and honour given to the race as the descendants of Jacob and the people of God's choice. Frequently, too, in the OT the term 'Hebrew' occurs where foreigners are introduced as speaking or spoken to (e.g. Ex 2<sup>6</sup> 7. 11 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 S 4<sup>6</sup> 9 13<sup>19</sup> 14<sup>11</sup> 29<sup>3</sup>, Gn 40<sup>15</sup>, etc.). These facts have led to the conjecture that the name 'Hebrews' was originally given to the race of Abraham by their Canaanite neighbours, and that this name continued to be the designation of the race by outsiders all through their history, just as the Magyars are known as 'Hungarians' by other nations of Europe. This conjecture, although it has much to commend it, does not meet all the facts of the case, for the name 'Israel' is often found in the OT in the mouth of foreigners, and it even occurs on the Moabite Stone, while Israelites are found describing themselves as 'Hebrews' (1 S 13<sup>8</sup>, Jer 34<sup>14</sup>). Robertson Smith points out that the whole usus loquendi is explained by the consideration that the regular Gentile name for a member of the race of Israel is 'Hebrew' and not 'Israelite,' the latter word being rare and apparently of late formation (EBr<sup>9</sup> xi. 594).

The derivation of the term does not render much help in discovering its original significance. The word presupposes a noun Eber as the name of the tribe, place, or common ancestor from which the Hebrews are designated. According to one passage in the OT (Nu 24<sup>1</sup>), Eber figures as a nation along with Asshur or Assyria, while in the genealogical lists of Gn 10f. Eber is represented as ancestor of the Hebrews and grandson of Shem. The names in the genealogical tables—Eber, Peleg, Reu, Serug, Nahor, etc.—cannot be regarded as names of persons. Some of them are names of places near the upper reaches of the Euphrates and the Tigris, and the whole genealogy may be regarded rather as a geographical account of the wanderings of the Hebrews than as a statement of racial affinities. Eber means 'the further bank of a river,' from a root עבר, 'to cross.' The LXX in Gn 14<sup>13</sup> translates the term as ὁ περὶ ὧν, 'the crosser.' Jewish tradition gives the more accurate form ὁ περὶ ὧν, 'the man from the other side,' i.e. of the Euphrates. This theory, which has generally been accepted by the Rabbis, carries with it the implication that the name was originally given by the original inhabitants of Canaan to the Hebrew immigrants. A modification of this etymology is found in the view which takes Eber in the Arabic sense of a 'river bank' and makes the Hebrews 'dwellers in a land of rivers.' Ewald (Gesch. Israels<sup>3</sup>, i. 407 ff.) discusses fully the meaning and etymology of the term, and rejects the view that the name was given by outsiders to the people on their entry into Canaan. It was, he holds, rather the name commonly in use among the people themselves from the earliest times up to the time of the kings, when it was displaced by 'Israel' as the name of national privilege, which again was in turn displaced in common use by the term 'Jews' from the time of the Exile. In the period immediately before Christ, an artificial interest in the past and a revival of ancient learning, coupled with the exaggerated reverence for Abraham 'the Hebrew,' led to a revival in the use of this term, and to the language of the race being designated thereby, although Philo calls the language of the OT, Chaldee (de Vita Mosis, ii. 5f.).

In the NT the word 'Hebrew' is seldom found applied to members of the ancient race of Israel, 'Jew' having become the usual designation of the period. In apostolic times the term became specialized, and was applied not to any member of the ancient race, but to Palestinian Jews of pronounced national sympathies who spoke the Aramaic dialect and retained the national customs, in contrast with the Hellenistic Jews (AV 'Grecians' [q.v.]), who were scattered over the world, spoke Greek, and were interested in the thought and life of Greece and Rome. In Ac 6<sup>1</sup> we read of a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews where this distinction obtains. In 2 Co 11<sup>22</sup> St. Paul, in contrasting himself with false teachers, calls himself a Hebrew, and in Ph 3<sup>5</sup> refers to himself as 'a Hebrew of Hebrews.' Probably in both cases the Apostle wishes to emphasize his true Hebrew descent rather than to distinguish between himself as a Hebrew-speaking Jew and the Greek-speaking members of the race. Eusebius at a later date does not adhere to the specialized use of the term as found in the Acts, but designates Philo (HE II. iv. 2) and Aristobolus (Præp. Evang. XIII. xi. 2) as 'Hebrews,' although both were Greek-speaking Jews with little knowledge of the Hebrew tongue.

The Hebrew language is on several occasions referred to in the NT. What is meant is not the ancient Hebrew of the OT but the Aramaic dialect of Palestine which was understood by the Jews of Jerusalem at the date of the apostles (Ac 21<sup>40</sup> 22<sup>1</sup> 26<sup>14</sup>).

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Form and object.—Of all the NT writings which bear the name 'Epistle,' that which is commonly called the Epistle to the Hebrews presents the nearest approximation to the form of an ordered treatise. The writer pays great attention to style. His well-balanced periods appeal to the ear as well as to the intellect, and his argument is arranged with extreme care. We do not find, as is sometimes the case in the Pauline letters, several distinct ideas all struggling for expression at the same time. Each fresh notion comes in its logical order, and the mind of the reader is first carefully prepared to expect it.

'The whole argument is in view from the beginning. Whether in the purely argumentative passages or in those which are in form hortatory, we are constantly meeting phrases which are to be taken up again and to have their full meaning given to them later on. The plan itself develops. While the figures to some extent change and take fresh colour, there is growing through all, in trait on trait, the picture which the writer designs to leave before his readers' minds' (E. C. Wickham, The Epistle to the Hebrews, p. xxi).

Yet, notwithstanding these general characteristics and the absence of any opening salutation, the Epistle is not to be regarded as a theological essay addressed to Christendom in general. It is a real letter, written to meet the needs of a definite and limited circle of readers. Such a circle is presupposed by the personal touches of 13<sup>19-23</sup> and by the repeated exhortations (21<sup>1-4</sup> 31<sup>1-14</sup> 41<sup>1-16</sup> 51<sup>1-6</sup> 10<sup>19-12</sup>), in which the writer displays too much personal feeling and too exact a knowledge of the spiritual condition of his readers to permit the supposition that he is speaking to the Church at large. But even if these passages could be struck out of the Epistle, the remaining doctrinal portions would still point to the same conclusion. The pains taken by the writer to prove that the sufferings and death of Christ were not only intelligible but also a necessary part of His human experience, or again that the Levitical order was a temporary, imperfect arrangement, imply that the readers were doubtful about these things. Such doubts may well have arisen in a small band of Christians, but they were never characteristic of the Church as a whole.

The readers for whom the Epistle was intended were Christians (23<sup>4</sup>), who at the first had shown whole-hearted devotion to the faith (10<sup>3-34</sup>). But their minds were dull. They seemed incapable of understanding anything beyond the merest rudiments of their profession (5<sup>11-12</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>). The earthly humiliation of Jesus, His sufferings and temptations, seemed to them unworthy of Messiah. To them, as to the Jews, the Cross was a stumbling-block, a suffering Christ no true Christ at all. Nor was that their only difficulty. They felt the novelty of Christianity. They found it hard to believe that the new religion could really supersede the ancient Divinely-given religion of the Jews. They were conscious also of its lack of outward aids to faith and worship. Christianity had, as it seemed to them, no visible priesthood or sacrifice. By these perplexities their faith in Christ was being gradually undermined. Their minds began to turn from their Christian inheritance, which contained so much that was new and strange, to the familiar splendours of the Temple and the teaching of Judaism. But it was impossible for them to remain in a state of hesitation. A crisis was rapidly approaching which must determine their course of action (9<sup>25</sup> 10<sup>25</sup>). The Epistle to the Hebrews was written as a 'word of exhortation' (13<sup>22</sup>) to nerve them to meet that crisis. The writer tries to explain their difficulties and to make them realize the meaning of the earthly life and death of Christ. He urges them to make the venture of faith and take their stand by the Master's side (13<sup>13</sup>), for there is no other place where 'eternal salvation' can be found (6<sup>4-8</sup>). His argument takes the form of a systematic contrast between Christianity and Leviticalism. Yet its logical conclusion is not simply that Christianity is the better of the two, but that Christianity is the best religion conceivable, the final, eternal revelation of God to men.

2. Summary of contents.—(1) The theme: the old dispensation and the new.—God has made two revelations to men—the first partial and incomplete, the second perfect and therefore final. The prophets at best could merely proclaim the will of God, and that only so far as human limitations allowed them to perceive it. In One who is Son the very essence of the Father is revealed. Levitical priests could only call attention to the sins of man; the Son has washed them away. In Him human nature is raised to the right hand of God (1<sup>1-4</sup>).

(2) The mediators of the old covenant (angels, Moses, Joshua, Aaron) inferior to the one Mediator of the new.—The Law was spoken through angels. The Son is greater than any angel, not only in His Divine glory, but also in the glory of His humiliation. For, as perfect man, He was the first to achieve the high destiny of mankind set forth in Genesis and in the Psalms (1<sup>5-2</sup> 8). Jesus is the Moses of the new dispensation, but greater than Moses, as a son is greater than a servant. He wrought a greater deliverance than that of Moses, and led the way to a more perfect rest than that which Joshua won for his people. To that rest He will bring us, if only we remain constant. The story of those who fell of old in the wilderness is a solemn warning of the fatal consequences of apostasy. Let us press on, remembering that the Leader who has suffered with us is also our High Priest who will bring us to the throne of grace (3<sup>1-4</sup> 16).

(3) The Son revealed as Priest after the eternal order of Melchizedek.—The essential conditions for all priesthood are two—perfect sympathy with sinful men, and a Divine call to the office of priest. These conditions are perfectly fulfilled in Christ. He is Priest not after the order of Aaron, but after the eternal order of Melchizedek (5<sup>1-10</sup>). Throw off your dullness and lay hold on the meaning of Christ's Priesthood, for therein lies the Christian hope. Christ is man and one with us. We can therefore follow Him into the inner sanctuary of God's own presence whither as Priest He has gone on our behalf (5<sup>11-6</sup> 6). The Psalmist declared that the Christ should be Priest after the order of Melchizedek. Notice that the promise of this new priesthood, spoken while the Aaronic priests were in possession, shows that the order of Melchizedek is better than that of Aaron. Its superiority is emphasized by the Divine oath with which the promise is introduced. The account of Melchizedek given in Genesis declares both by its statements and by what it leaves unsaid what are the marks of this priesthood. It is royal, righteous, peace-bringing, personal, dependent not on lineal descent, but on the inherent fitness of the priest; it is eternal. Abraham, and by implication Levi, did homage to this priesthood when they paid tithes and received a blessing, thereby acknowledging the presence of something greater than themselves. These marks of the eternal priesthood find their perfect fulfilment in Jesus. Perfect kingship is manifested in the royal condescension of His earthly humiliation, and righteousness in His sinless life as man; abiding peace is the result of His cleansing of man's sin. He was not born of the tribe of Levi. His Priesthood is inherent in Himself, working 'according to the power of an endless life' (7<sup>16</sup>). It can never be superseded because it has perfectly fulfilled the object for which all priesthood exists (7).

(4) The priestly ministrations of Aaron and of Christ: their sanctuaries, their basal covenants, their sacrifices.—We have, then, a High Priest who has entered upon His regal state of Priesthood in heaven, the true sanctuary. But priesthood implies sacrifice. He must therefore have something to offer; but what and where? Not in the earthly 'Holy of Holies'—that is already occupied. Besides, the Bible warns us that the earthly sanctuary is only a shadow of the heavenly reality. Christ's priestly ministry and sacrifice belong to the realm of realities, just as He is the Mediator of a new and better covenant than that of the Jews. For we must face the fact already realized by Jeremiah—the old covenant was imperfect and must pass away when the new and perfect covenant is established (8). The Levitical service of the old covenant was not lacking in outward splendour, but its magnificence served only to emphasize its ineffectiveness. The structure of its sanctuary was specially designed to illustrate its weakness. The entrance to the Holy of Holies was covered by a veil beyond which not even priests might pass. One man alone could ever enter there, and for him the way was beset with danger and open only once in the year. Even so his annual sacrifice was no real atonement. The material offerings—blood of bulls and goats—professed to deal only with ritual errors (ἀνομιμάτων, 9<sup>7</sup>). They could not cleanse the conscience or take away real sin. All these things—the inaccessible sanctuary, the sin-stained high priest, the annual ineffective sacrifices—clearly indicated that the true atonement was not yet found (9<sup>1-10</sup>). Christ our High Priest, on the other hand, has found for men eternal salvation. For He entered into no material sanctuary but into the very presence of God once for all. His sacrifice was no mere symbolical cleansing of ritual errors. It effected the actual taking away of the accumulated sins of men, and opened the way of free access to God. For it was not material but spiritual, not annual but offered once for all; it was the offering of His own life (9<sup>11-15</sup>).

Thus the new covenant rests on the death of its Mediator. Does this idea seem strange? The following analogies may help you to understand: (a) a testament is a covenant, but it has no value unless the testator die; (b) the old covenant was inaugurated with the offering of the life of bulls and goats; (c) in the Levitical Law every atonement is symbolized by the offering of the life of beasts. By such offerings the earthly sanctuary was cleansed. But nothing short of the most perfect conceivable offering is sufficient for the perfect heavenly sanctuary, and what offering could be more complete than the voluntary laying down of the High Priest's own life? Such a spiritual sacrifice has eternal validity. It can never be repeated because by the taking away of sins it has established for ever that perfect union with God which all sacrifice symbolizes. When Christ next appears it will be as Deliverer of those who are expecting Him (9<sup>15-28</sup>).

(5) Summing up of the argument: the shadow and the substance.—The Law was only an outline sketch of good things to come; its repeated sacrifices were symbols, calling attention to man's sins, but incapable of cleansing, for blood of bulls and goats could never take away sins. Christ long ago declared this by the mouth of the Psalmist, and added that the only valid offering in God's sight is the surrender of the will in complete obedience to Him. Such an offering Christ has now made. That is why, in contrast to the Levitical priest ever offering, never atoning, He sits enthroned at the right hand of God, 'waiting till his enemies become his footstool.' He has set up the perfect covenant (10<sup>1-18</sup>).

(6) Practical applications to present difficulties: appeal to the example of the Fathers: renewed exhortation and final greeting.—Jesus has rent the veil and opened for all the way to the heavenly sanctuary over which as Priest He presides. Where He is, we too may go. Let us then imitate His priestly consecration and press on in His footsteps, for our hope is certain. We must urge each other on and not isolate ourselves, for the crisis is very near (10<sup>19-25</sup>). Under the Law of Moses apostasy involved terrible consequences. How much worse to reject the perfect sacrifice, to wound the personal Saviour (10<sup>26-31</sup>)! Remember your former steadfastness under trial. Do not throw away your boldness. To receive the promises, all that is needed is patience. Think of the words in which Habakkuk speaks of the promise. They who shrink back forfeit God's favour. His 'righteous ones' live by faith (10<sup>32-39</sup>). The faith he means is unshaken confidence in the certainty of God's promises, even though their realization seems far off. It was such faith as this that inspired the long roll of Jewish heroes (11). Wherever we turn in the sacred records we meet these examples of faith in the unseen, and the chief of them all is Jesus. Let us fix our eyes on Him, and, stripping off everything that encumbers, run boldly the race He has run before us (12<sup>1-4</sup>). Be not discouraged at the prospect of suffering. Suffering sent by God is a means of discipline; it proves that we are really His sons (12<sup>5-13</sup>). Seek peace and sanctification; never give up your eternal birthright for mere present enjoyment (12<sup>14-17</sup>). As the glories of the heavenly Sion eclipse the terrors of Sinai, so is our responsibility greater than that of Israel of old. Sion too has its earthquake and its fire which shatter and consume all that is unreal (12<sup>18-29</sup>). Do not forget your mutual responsibilities as brethren. God's help is sufficient for all (13<sup>1-6</sup>). Follow the example of your old leaders now departed (13<sup>7</sup>). Be constant in your belief, for Jesus Christ is eternally the same. Break loose from the associations which would draw you away from Him. He suffered as our atoning sacrifice outside the city gate. We must be content to bear the same reproach and take our place by His side. The only 'abiding city' is where He is. Let us then offer to God through Him the spiritual sacrifices He loves (13<sup>8-16</sup>). Obey your rulers; pray for us that we may be restored to you, even as we pray for you that God may make you perfect in obedience and every good thing (13<sup>17-21</sup>). Have patience with my letter of exhortation. Timothy has been released. He and I may visit you together. Greet your rulers and all the saints. 'They of Italy' send their greeting to you. 'The Grace' be with you (13<sup>22-25</sup>).

3. Doctrine.—(1) CONCEPTION OF CHRISTIANITY.—The writer of the Epistle thinks of religion as a covenant. The religion of Jesus Christ is the new eternal covenant (13<sup>20</sup>) of which the prophet spoke (8<sup>8-13</sup>), for He alone has established a perfect covenant relation between God and man. He has opened for man the way of free and unrestricted access to God. He has removed the great obstacle—sin. The symbolism of the 'old covenant' pointed to this ideal. But what was there set forth symbolically as an unrealized hope, Christ has made actual. In Him God and man are perfectly united; His one sacrifice takes away sin, not in symbol but in deed; as High Priest He is not simply the representative of the people but their πρόδρομος (6<sup>20</sup>)—where He has entered they too may go; and the sanctuary to which He leads them is no material 'Holy of Holies' but the eternal presence of God (9<sup>24</sup>). A covenant of this kind leaves nothing to be added. It has eternal validity, and must therefore supersede all the imperfect religions which have gone before.

(2) CHRISTOLOGY.—The finality of the new covenant rests on the perfection of Him who is its Mediator (8<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>) and Surety (7<sup>22</sup>). It is natural therefore that the main theme of the Epistle should be the person and work of Christ.

(a) Christ the Eternal Son.—Christ's perfection may be expressed in one sentence—He is the Son of God (1<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>3</sup>. 28 10<sup>29</sup>). Others have been described in the Scriptures as sons of God (cf. 1<sup>5</sup>. 8. 13 2<sup>10</sup>), but His Sonship is different in kind from theirs. He is the Son of God, inseparable from the Father as the ray is inseparable from the light, revealing the essence of the Father as completely as the device engraved upon a seal is revealed by its impress on wax (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, 1<sup>3</sup>). As Son He is the Creator, the Sustainer, and the Heir of all things (1<sup>2</sup>. 3). His Sonship raises Him far above angels (1<sup>5-13</sup>), above Moses (3<sup>6</sup>), and above Aaron (7<sup>28</sup>). It gives Him the right, now that His earthly task is completed, to sit enthroned at the right hand of the Majesty on high (1<sup>3</sup>).

(b) The Incarnation.—Having once clearly stated at the outset the eternal Divinity of the Son, the Epistle dwells almost entirely on His life, work, and exaltation as man. The reason for this is to be found in the apologetic aim of the writer. His readers' perplexities centred round Christ's earthly life of suffering and temptation, which they regarded as unworthy of one who occupied His high position. The Epistle declares that such humiliation was not only in the highest degree worthy of Him who bore it and of God who sent Him (ἐμπειρεν, 2<sup>10</sup>; cf. 7<sup>26</sup>), it was a necessary part of the experience of one who fulfilled the office of universal High Priest. It was the ground of His subsequent exaltation (cf. διὰ τὸ πάθημα τοῦ θανάτου . . . ἐστεφανωμένον, 2<sup>9</sup>).

Nowhere in the NT is more emphasis laid on the reality of His human nature and human experience. He who bore the simple human name Jesus (2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>) was made like His human brethren in all things (2<sup>11</sup>. 17). He partook of flesh and blood as they do (2<sup>14</sup>); He could sympathize with their sufferings and temptations, for He too, as man, suffered and was tempted (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>); like them He had to conquer human weakness before He could learn the hard lesson of obedience to God's will (5<sup>7</sup>. 8). The only difference between their struggle and His lay in the issue. They sometimes fail, but He always conquered, for He was sinless (4<sup>15</sup>). By His participation in human weakness and suffering and temptation Christ was 'made perfect' (τελειωθείς, 5<sup>9</sup>; cf. 2<sup>10</sup>). By experiencing them in His own human life He gained the perfect sympathy with mankind which fits Him to be their High Priest. By overcoming them He realized in Himself as man the high destiny of the race. He became the first-born of many sons who shall be led to glory (2<sup>10</sup>).

(c) The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Christ.—(i.) The sufferings and death of Christ find their final explanation in the thought of His High-Priestly office. They are the necessary condition of His call to that office. Any priest who is called to be the representative of men must himself be man, capable of sympathy with human weakness and error (5<sup>2</sup>). The Levitical priests possessed sympathy with human weakness, but they were also tainted with human sin (5<sup>3</sup>). The ideal priest must combine perfect sympathy with the sinner with complete freedom from sin (4<sup>15</sup>). These qualifications were united in Christ. He was therefore called by God to be Priest, not after the order of Aaron, but after the eternal order of Melchizedek (5<sup>4-6</sup>). The Aaronic order was only the shadow, not the reality of priesthood. Only by way of contrast could it set forth the character of the eternal Priesthood. For the members of that order held office by virtue of mere physical descent (7<sup>16</sup>); their ministry could call sins to mind but could not cleanse them (10<sup>1-3</sup>); they could not unite the people to God—even into the earthly symbol of His presence the high priest himself could enter only once a year alone (9<sup>7</sup>); lastly, the Aaronic priests were mortal—their work was confined to one generation (7<sup>23</sup>).

By contrast with the Aaronic priesthood, it follows that the perfect priest must be really, not ritually, holy, his office resting on his own perfect fitness to perform it; he must be able to take away sin and to unite men to God; lastly, he must be eternal—placed beyond the reach of sin and death. The essential features of this perfect priesthood are set forth, as in a parable, in the biblical portrait of the priest-king Melchizedek. The name Melchizedek, which means 'king of righteousness,' indicates the personal, not merely official, holiness of the true priest; his connexion with Salem, which means 'peace,' points to the abiding union between God and man which he effects; the absence from the record of any mention of Melchizedek's parentage and of any references to his birth or his death suggests that the perfect priesthood is eternal and exercised by right of the personal qualification of the priest (7<sup>1-3</sup>). Abraham, the father of Levi, acknowledged the superiority of the eternal priesthood when he paid tithes to Melchizedek and received his blessing (7<sup>4-10</sup>). The eternal priesthood 'after the order of Melchizedek,' as the Psalm foretold, is perfectly realized in Christ. His office rests not on 'the law of a carnal commandment' (7<sup>16</sup>)—for according to the flesh He was not born of a priestly family (7<sup>13</sup>)—but on 'the power of an indissoluble life' (7<sup>16</sup>). He has perfect sympathy with human weakness and temptation, for He has felt them (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>), yet He is not tainted with human sin (4<sup>15</sup> 7<sup>27</sup>). He is really, not ritually, holy and without blemish, blameless in His relation to God and to man (7<sup>26</sup>). In His own Person He has inseparably united man with God, and opened a way of access into the Divine presence which can never again be closed (6<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>19-20</sup>). For His Priesthood is inviolable and eternal (7<sup>25</sup>). He has passed into the world of eternal realities, far beyond the reach of sin and death (1<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>24</sup>). There He ever liveth to make intercession for us (7<sup>25</sup>).

(ii.) The central function of priesthood is to offer sacrifice. If Christ be perfect Priest, what has He to offer (8<sup>3</sup>)?—The eternal Sacrifice which corresponds to the eternal Priesthood. Once more the idea is worked out by means of a contrast with Levitical institutions and the exposition of a verse from the P-salter. Levitical sacrifices were material and frequently repeated. Frequent repetition was necessary because they had no efficacy in the spiritual sphere; they could not take away sin or cleanse the conscience (9<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>1-4</sup>). Long ago the Psalmist recognized their futility and indicated the nature of valid sacrifice. True sacrifice, he declared, is spiritual; its essence consists in self-sacrifice—the complete surrender of the will in voluntary obedience to God (10<sup>5-10</sup>). Christ's oblation was a sacrifice of self, the complete surrender of a perfect self in willing obedience (7<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>14</sup>). 'The days of His flesh' were one long period of self-dedication, and in the culminating moment on the Cross His sacrifice was made complete (5<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>10</sup> 20). Self-sacrifice could be carried no further. Christ's perfect spiritual Sacrifice—the entire devotion of a perfect will—although its manifestation took place on earth, belongs in all its stages to the world of eternal realities (cf. διὰ πνεύματος αἰώνιου, 9<sup>14</sup>). It has the power 'to cleanse the conscience from dead works' (9<sup>14</sup>) and 'to make perfect for ever them that are sanctified' (10<sup>14</sup>). Because it possesses eternal validity it can never be repeated (7<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>24-25</sup>). The 'indissoluble life' (7<sup>16</sup>) of the Priest-Victim is made available for all men by the one offering. The new covenant-relation between God and man is established (9<sup>24</sup>). Henceforth Christ sits enthroned in the heavenly sanctuary in token that His task is done, waiting until His enemies become His footstool (10<sup>12-14</sup>).

(d) The Death of Christ.—The supposition that the death of Christ was a real stumbling-block to the first readers of the Epistle is justified by the evident pains taken by the writer to find reasons for that death. Firstly, Christ died 'by the grace of God' (2<sup>9</sup>); God willed that it should be so. Secondly, Christ died as true man. To die once and once only is part of the common lot of men (9<sup>27</sup>). Thirdly, Christ died as testator, that we might enter into the inheritance He has bequeathed to us (9<sup>16</sup>). Fourthly, the death of Christ was the necessary climax of the experience of human suffering which qualified Him to be 'captain of salvation' (2<sup>10</sup>). Fifthly, Christ died to free us from the fear of death. From the time of the Fall, death was terrible because it was regarded as the penalty of human sin. Jesus Christ, by dying though He was sinless, broke the connexion between death and sin, and so robbed death of its enslaving terrors (2<sup>14</sup> 15). Finally, Christ's death was the foundation of the new covenant, the priestly act of self-sacrifice by which 'he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (9<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>).

That the voluntary laying down of Christ's life was a sacrificial act is regarded as self-evident, and no direct answer is given to the question, 'How does His sacrifice make perfect His followers?' Yet the writer provides the material for an answer when he dwells on the principle of Christ's 'solidarity with sinners.' 'He that sanctifieth and they that are to be sanctified are all of one' (2<sup>11</sup>, sc. 'one piece, one whole'; cf. Davidson, Hebrews, p. 66, n. 2). Christ's High-Priestly acts were not the acts of an individual but of the representative man. It was human nature which in Him was perfected through obedience, entered the heavenly sanctuary, and sat down on the throne of majesty. What was actually effected in Him, was effected potentially in those who follow Him (cf. 10<sup>10</sup>). Christians 'are included in that purpose of love which Christ has realised' (Westcott, Ep. to the Hebrews<sup>3</sup>, p. 314). The High Priest is also the πρόδρομος (6<sup>20</sup>), one of many sons who are being brought to glory (2<sup>10</sup>), who becomes the cause of salvation to His human brethren because in Him the perfection of human nature has been realized (5<sup>9</sup>).

(e) The Parousia.—The Epistle speaks of 'the day which is approaching' (10<sup>25</sup>), when God 'will shake not the earth only but also the heavens' (12<sup>28</sup>), and the glorified Christ 'shall appear unto salvation for them that await him' (9<sup>8</sup>). 'The day' is unquestionably the prophetic 'Day of Jahweh,' but the idea of the day intended by the writer seems to be that of the older OT prophets (cf. Am 5<sup>18</sup>, Is 2<sup>12</sup>), rather than that of the later apocalypticists. It is 'a coming' rather than 'the Coming' of the Christ. About the final Coming the Epistle has nothing to say. But a crisis is at hand; the readers can already see its approach. To the writer it is a real coming of Christ.

'The Master had said that He might come at even or at midnight or at cock-crowing or in the morning (Mk 13<sup>35</sup>). To the writer of this letter the thought has occurred that those hours may be not merely alternative but successive. And now that the first of them has sounded warning, he bids his friends be ready' (Nairne, The Epistle of Priesthood, p. 210).

(3) THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.—The 'great salvation' (2<sup>3</sup>) wrought by Christ is variously described in the Epistle as the realization of man's lordship over creation (2<sup>8, 9</sup>), deliverance from the fear of death (2<sup>14, 15</sup>), entrance into the perfect Sabbath-rest of God (4<sup>9</sup>). But its essence consists in cleansing and consecration, the taking away of sin (9<sup>14</sup>), and the opening of a way of free access into the Divine presence (10<sup>-0</sup>), or, as it is expressed in one passage, 'the perfecting for ever of them that are sanctified by the one offering of Christ' (10<sup>14</sup>). In one sense this 'perfecting' is already accomplished (τετελειωκεν, 10<sup>14</sup>). From another point of view it is regarded as a hope yet to be realized. For there is nothing mechanical about its working. Each individual Christian must make it his own. If we are to be perfected, our will must be united with the will of Christ in perfect surrender to God (5<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>). Seen from this standpoint, the Christian life is a progressive sanctification (2<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>14</sup>), which may be figuratively represented as a race or a pilgrimage. Hence arises the need of solemn warnings. It is possible to drop out of the Christian race before the goal is reached, or to set out on the pilgrimage and yet never arrive at the heavenly city. The great danger which besets the Christian is faint-heartedness (ἀπιστία, 3<sup>1-</sup>), the loss of the vision of the land of eternal things, and want of confidence in Him who leads us to that land. The Christian safeguard is 'faith.' Faith is the power which helps us to grasp the abiding realities which lie behind the world of sense, and to test the existence and character of things which are for us as yet unrealized (11<sup>1</sup>). It is the faculty by which, for example, we recognize the eternal issues which were decided by the earthly life and humiliation of Christ, and the futility of all hopes that stand apart from Him. The practical result of such faith will be unswerving devotion and obedience to our Captain in the face of all trouble and difficulty (5<sup>9</sup>), for He Himself has run the race before us and stands waiting for us at the goal (12<sup>2</sup>). If our eyes are fixed on Him, and all things which might impede our progress are thrown aside, He will make perfect the faith which He has given (12<sup>2</sup>), He will grant us the 'full assurance of hope' (6<sup>11</sup>), which will bring us safely along the path which He has trodden to the end, where the fullness of His salvation is revealed in the eternal sanctuary, the very presence of God (cf. 6<sup>19, 20</sup>).

4. Date.—The first generation of Christians had passed away (2<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>); members of the Church had already suffered persecution, imprisonment, and loss of property (10<sup>3-4</sup>); the relation of Gentile and Jewish Christians was no longer a burning question of the day. The Epistle cannot therefore have been written long before A.D. 70. On the other hand, it cannot be placed much later than A.D. 90, for it was extensively used by Clement of Rome in his Epistle to the Corinthians, c. A.D. 95-96 (cf. ad Cor. 9, 12, 17, 36, 45).

Any more precise determination of the date must rest chiefly on the view taken of the crisis with which the first readers of the Epistle were confronted. If the approaching 'day' (10<sup>-0</sup>) be taken to mean the Final Coming of Christ, the exact date of the Epistle must be left uncertain. But if it be rightly interpreted as an allusion to the inevitable culmination of some national movement already active—a movement which forced upon the readers a final choice between Christianity and Judaism—it is most naturally regarded as referring to the outbreak of the Jewish war which led to the Destruction of Jerusalem. The date of the Epistle would then fall between A.D. 63 and 70.

No chronological argument can be based on the fact that the writer of the Epistle generally uses the present tense in speaking of Levitical institutions (7<sup>8, 20</sup> 8<sup>3, 5</sup> 9<sup>8, 9, 13</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>). The use of the present tense does not necessarily imply that the Temple was still standing when he wrote. Similar language is frequently employed in reference to the Temple service in writings much later than A.D. 70 (e.g. Clem. Rom. ad Cor. 40-41; Justin Martyr, Dial. 117; Epistle of Barnabas, passim). But what the writer to the Hebrews has in mind is not the service of the Temple but that of the Tabernacle. 'The references [of the Epistle] to the Mosaic ritual are purely ideal and theoretical, and based on the Law in the Pentateuch' (Davidson, op. cit. p. 15).

Some commentators have found a further indication of date in the writer's application of the words of Ps 95 to the circumstances of his own day (37<sup>-11</sup>). Special emphasis is laid on the fact that he departs from the construction of the original passage in connecting the words 'forty years' with the preceding clause 'they saw my works,' instead of with that which follows. It is suggested that the change was made intentionally, because the writer wished to point out that, as he wrote, another period of 'forty years of seeing God's works' was rapidly drawing to a close, namely, the forty years which followed the Crucifixion (c. A.D. 30-70). Yet, even if it be permissible to take the number forty literally, this argument has little value. The language of the Psalm might equally well be applied to the period A.D. 30-70 at a much later date by a writer who considered that the 'to-day' of unbelieving Israel's opportunity closed with the Destruction of Jerusalem. The passage has even been used to prove that the Epistle must have been written some years later than A.D. 70 (Zahn, Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., ii. 321 ff.). But it seems unlikely either in the original Psalm or in the quotation that 'forty years' means anything more definite than the lifetime of a generation.

5. The readers.—(1) Jews or Gentiles?—A unanimous tradition, reaching back to the 2nd cent. and embodied in the title invariably given to the Epistle, asserts that it was addressed πρὸς Ἑβραίους. It may be granted that the title does not go back to the original writer, and that it represents nothing more than an inference from the contents of the letter, but the inference is probably correct if not inevitable. The traditional view remained unquestioned until the 19th cent., but since then it has frequently been maintained that the Epistle was addressed to Gentiles, or at least to Christians generally, without regard to their origin. By isolating certain incidental statements contained in the Epistle, it is not difficult to present a plausible case for this opinion. It has been said, for example, that no Jewish convert would need to be taught the elementary doctrines enumerated in 6<sup>1, 2</sup>; that conversion from Judaism which the writer believed to be a Divinely-given religion, would never have been described by him as turning 'from dead works to serve a living God' (9<sup>14</sup>); that the faults against which the readers are warned (12<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>) are the faults of heathen rather than of Jews. It must be recognized, however, that the details on which the argument rests are capable of more than one interpretation, and that similar passages, equally dubious perhaps (e.g. the use of the terms 'seed of Abraham' [2<sup>16</sup>] and 'the nation' [2<sup>17</sup>], where the argument rather requires 'mankind'), may be quoted on the other side.

But the traditional opinion is most strongly supported by the general drift and tendency of the Epistle taken as a whole. The writer appeals to the OT as to an independent authority which may be quoted in support of the Christian faith. He assumes that his readers take the same view of the OT. This would be true of Jewish but not of Gentile converts. To the Gentile the OT had no meaning apart from Christianity. In the same way the main argument of the Epistle, while involving the conclusion that Christianity is the perfect and final religion, yet formally proves only that Christianity is superior to Judaism. This method of reasoning, unaccompanied by any reference to paganism in any form, is only intelligible if addressed to men who were either Jews by birth or who had adopted Jewish ways of thinking so completely as to be indistinguishable from born Jews.

(2) Place of residence.—The Epistle contains no opening salutation, and no direct information as to its destination. This lack of evidence makes it very difficult to locate the readers for whom it was intended. The ancient title πρὸς Ἑβραίους throws no light upon the question, for the term 'Hebrews' is national, not local. Many suggestions have been made of probable places where such a circle of readers as the Epistle presupposes may have existed. The claims most widely upheld are those of (a) Jerusalem or some other Palestinian or Syrian community, (b) Alexandria, (c) Rome or some other church in Italy.

(a) In favour of the first hypothesis, it is argued that Jerusalem, or at least some Palestinian city, would be the most likely place for a purely Jewish community, and that there too the practical problem with which the Epistle deals would be most keenly felt. But the language used in the Epistle (2<sup>3</sup>), which implies that the community addressed had had no opportunity of hearing the gospel from Christ's own lips, certainly does not favour the theory of any Palestinian destination, nor do the suggestions of the comparative wealth of the readers (6<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>) agree with the known poverty of the primitive church of Judea. Palestine again is not a place where Timothy might be expected to have much influence (13<sup>-3</sup>), and the absence of any distinct mention in the Epistle of the Temple as opposed to the Tabernacle would be, to say the least, remarkable if it were addressed to Judea.

(b) Alexandria has been suggested chiefly on account of the affinities of thought and language between the Epistle and Alexandrian Judaism as represented by the writings of Philo and the Book of Wisdom. Such affinities undoubtedly exist, and may perhaps contain a hint concerning the writer's own birth-place, but they supply no evidence as to the destination of the Epistle. It must be remembered also that the Alexandrian type of Judaism was by no means confined to Alexandria. The theory that the Epistle was written with particular reference to the worship of the Jewish Temple at Leontopolis falls to the ground when it is realized that the writer had in view not the worship of any particular Temple, but the Levitical service as it is described in the Pentateuch (K. Wieseler, Untersuchung über den Hebräerbrief, 1861).

(c) What little evidence the Epistle itself supplies, may be quoted in favour of Rome or some other Italian community. For the words 'They of Italy send greeting' are most naturally taken as implying that the letter was sent either to or from Italy, and some less vague expression than οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας (13<sup>24</sup>) might reasonably have been expected if the writer were actually in Italy at the time of writing. Corroborative evidence for regarding Rome as the destination of the Epistle may be found in the fact that the earliest known quotation of its language occurs in the letter of Clement of Rome.

But the question of the Epistle's destination must remain without a final answer. It seems clear that it was addressed not to a mixed community, but to Jews, and the general impression it gives is of a limited circle of readers rather than of a large and miscellaneous gathering (Zahn, op. cit. ii. 349 ff.). Whether that circle was 'the church in so-and-so's house,' or 'a group of scholarly men like the author' (Nairne, op. cit. p. 10), cannot be finally determined.

6. Author.—'But who wrote the Epistle God only knows certainly' (τίς δὲ ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν τὸ μὲν ἀληθὲς Θεὸς οἶδεν, Origen, ap. Euseb. HE vi. 25). These words were originally spoken with reference to the amanuensis or translator of the Epistle. Most modern scholars are content to extend their reference to the actual author. The writer keeps himself in the background, and later research has never finally discovered his identity. In this respect students of the 2nd cent. were as much in the dark as those of the present day. It is significant that the Roman Church, which was the first to make use of the Epistle, refused for more than three centuries to grant it a place amongst the NT Scriptures, on account of the uncertainty of its authorship (Euseb. HE iii. 3). If Eusebius is to be trusted, Roman opinion on the subject did not go beyond a denial of the authorship of St. Paul. The only positive statement made by any early Latin writer occurs in a work of Tertullian, who attributes the Epistle without question to Barnabas (de Pudicitia, xx.). This belief may perhaps represent a Montanist tradition generally current in North Africa. It is difficult to see why it vanished so completely from the other churches, if it had ever been more widely circulated.

It was in Alexandria, after the Epistle had already been accepted as canonical on its own merits, that the theory of Pauline authorship gradually arose. The writings of Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200), Origen (c. A.D. 220), and Eusebius (c. A.D. 320), display the theory in process of formation. Clement put forward the suggestion that St. Paul wrote the Epistle in Hebrew, and St. Luke afterwards translated it into Greek. The latter conjecture is based on the resemblance of style between the Greek of the Epistle and that of the Acts (Euseb. HE vi. 14). Origen expresses his own opinion thus: 'The thoughts are the thoughts of the Apostle, but the language and composition that of one who recalled from memory, and, as it were, made notes of what was said by the master' (ἀπομνημονεύσαντός τινος τα ἀποστολικά καὶ ὥσπερ ἐσχολογραφήσαντος τὰ εἰρημένα ὑπὸ τοῦ διδασκάλου, ap. Euseb. HE vi. 25). Eusebius himself, while admitting that the Roman Church did not accept the Epistle because it was not St. Paul's (HE iii. 3), yet declares that it is reasonable 'on the ground of its antiquity that it should be reckoned with the other writings of the Apostle' (iii. 37). Clearly, none of the three writers regarded the Epistle as being Pauline in the full sense, yet for the sake of convenience it was their practice to quote it as 'of Paul.' Later Alexandrian writers adopted this title as being literally true, and from Alexandria belief in the literal Pauline authorship of the Epistle spread throughout the Church. In this, as in other matters, the Western Church followed the lead of St. Hilary, St. Jerome, and St. Augustine.

It is easy to imagine how the Epistle became connected with St. Paul's name. When once an anonymous letter bearing the simple title πρὸς Ἑβραίους was appended to a collection of acknowledged Pauline Epistles, the addition to the heading of the words τοῦ Παύλου would only be a matter of time.

Nevertheless, as Origen already felt, internal evidence makes the theory of Pauline authorship untenable. It is incredible that St. Paul, who insisted so strongly that he received his gospel by direct revelation (Gal 1), could have written the confession of second-hand instruction contained in He 2<sup>3</sup>. Nothing, again, could be more unlike St. Paul's method of expression than the elegant and rhythmical style of the Epistle to the Hebrews; and behind the difference of style lies a real difference of mental attitude. The characteristic Pauline antitheses 'faith and works,' 'law and promise,' 'flesh and spirit,' are replaced by new contrasts—'earthly and heavenly,' 'shadow and substance,' 'type and antitype.' The difference of thought which separates the two writers becomes apparent when they meet on common ground. 'Faith' and 'righteousness' are key-words in St. Paul's theology. The Epistle to the Hebrews also speaks often of 'faith' and sometimes of 'righteousness' (1<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>1</sup> 33 12<sup>11</sup>), but the words have lost their special Pauline sense. 'Faith' no longer means intimate personal union with Christ, but expresses the more general idea of 'grasp on unseen reality.' 'Righteousness' is stripped of its forensic associations. It simply means 'ethical righteousness,' not 'right standing in the eyes of God.' The same contrast is visible in the different applications made by the two writers of the only two OT passages quoted by both (Dt 32<sup>35</sup>, quoted in Ro 12<sup>19</sup>, He 10<sup>30</sup>; Hab 2<sup>3</sup> quoted in Ro 1<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>37</sup> 38).

The theory of Pauline authorship being therefore necessarily abandoned, all attempts to discover the author's name are reduced to mere conjecture. Such conjectures have usually started from the assumption that his acquaintance with Timothy (13<sup>23</sup>) places the writer of the Epistle amongst the circle of St. Paul's friends. The early Church suggested, as having at least a share in the authorship, St. Luke (Clem. Alex. ap. Enseb. HE vi. 14), or Barnabas (Tertullian, de Pudicitia, xx.), or Clement of Rome ('some' known to Origen [ap. Enseb. HE vi. 25]). Luther (e.g. Enarr. in Gen. 48<sup>20</sup>, Op. Exeg. xi. 130) supported the claim of Apollos. More recent conjectures have been Silas (e.g. C. F. Boehme, Ep. ad Heb., 1825); Aquila (suggestion mentioned but not approved by Bleek, Der Brief an die Hebräer, i. 42); St. Peter (A. Welch, The Authorship of Hebrews, 1898); Prisca and Aquila in collaboration, Prisca taking the lion's share (Harnack, ZNTW, 1900); Aristion, the Elder known to Papias (J. Chapman, Revue Bénédictine, xxii. [1905], p. 50); and lastly, Philip the Deacon (Ramsay, Expositor, 5th ser. ix. 401–422). The evidence in favour of any of these conjectures is of the flimsiest description. The affinities of language and style between the Epistle and the Acts, or the resemblances of thought between the Epistle and 1 Peter, are quite insufficient to prove community of authorship. The quotation of long passages from the Epistle by Clement of Rome serves only to emphasize their difference from his own way of thinking and writing. Barnabas, Silas, Aquila, Philip, Aristion remain as possible authors chiefly because next to nothing is known about them. Apollos, the learned Alexandrian Jew, mighty in the Scriptures (Ac 18<sup>24</sup>), companion of St. Paul, is the sort of man who might have written the Epistle, but no shred of positive evidence exists which would justify the assertion that he actually did write it.

That a leaf has been accidentally lost from the beginning of the Epistle which would perhaps have told of its authorship and destination (Fritz Barth, Einleitung in das NT<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 114), is a hypothesis which cannot be verified. It is at least more probable than the suggestion that the author's name was intentionally removed by the prejudice of a later generation which demanded that all canonical Epistles should be of apostolic origin. But it is not necessary to assume that the Epistle ever had a formal address. It is clear from the contents that the readers knew who was addressing them and by what authority, and many reasons for the omission of any formal superscription can be easily imagined (cf. Jülicher, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., p. 153).

7. Affinities of thought and language.—(1) The OT.—The Epistle makes extensive use of the OT. Twenty-nine distinct quotations occur, twenty-one of which are not found elsewhere in the NT, and there are frequent allusions to passages of the OT which are not definitely cited. The writer shows no acquaintance with the Hebrew text, but follows the LXX even where it differs materially from the Hebrew (e.g. Ps 95<sup>10</sup>, Jer 31<sup>31a</sup>, Ps 40<sup>6-8</sup>, Hab 2<sup>3-4</sup>, Pr 3<sup>11</sup>, quoted in He 3<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>5-7</sup> 37-39 12<sup>5</sup> 6). Three of his OT quotations differ both from the LXX and from the Hebrew (Gn 22<sup>16a</sup>, Ex 24<sup>8</sup>, Dt 32<sup>35</sup>; cf. He 6<sup>13a</sup> 9<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>30</sup>). The last of these occurs in the same form in Ro 12<sup>19</sup>. Amongst the more general allusions to the language of the Greek Bible may be noticed the reference to stories contained in 1 and 2 Mac. (He 11<sup>34</sup> 35; cf. especially 2 Mac 6. 7), and the possible reminiscence in He 1<sup>3</sup> of the words of the Book of Wisdom in which Wisdom is described as ἀπαργασμα . . . φῶς ἀδίδου . . . καὶ ἐκκλῶν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ (sc. τοῦ θεοῦ, Wis 7<sup>25</sup>).

The mode of citation employed in the Epistle is worthy of note. The name of the individual writer is never mentioned, but in every case (except 2<sup>6a</sup>, where God is directly addressed), the words of the OT are ascribed to God, or to Christ (2<sup>11</sup> 13 10<sup>5a</sup>), or to the Holy Spirit (3<sup>7a</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>). In striking contrast to the allegorical method of Philo, and to St. Paul's custom of adopting OT phrases to express ideas different from those of the original writer (e.g. 'The just shall live by faith'), the author of the Epistle is true to the historical method of interpretation, and uses OT passages in the exact sense which the first writer himself put upon them. This is true even of the chapter dealing with Melchizedek (He 7), where the Epistle seems to approximate most closely to the Philonic method of exegesis. Melchizedek remains the priest-king of Salem. He is not a mere symbol, still less is he identical with Christ. Lastly, it may be observed that the Epistle lays stress on the continuity of revelation. The same God who spoke by means of the prophets speaks in the Son, and the principles which the prophets revealed in part are the same principles which He reveals in full perfection. Thus, it appears to the writer, Christhood is not a new thing. The eternal Son 'inherited' the name of 'Christ' from partial and imperfect Christs who went before Him (1<sup>4</sup>; cf. Nairne, op. cit. pp. 16 f., 153, 249 ff.). Words, therefore, which in the first place were spoken of God's anointed ones of past ages—the king (1<sup>5</sup> 6. 8. 9. 13), or the nation (2<sup>12</sup>), or the prophet (2<sup>13</sup>)—are unhesitatingly applied to 'the Christ' in whom that which they dimly shadowed is at last fully realized. (On the use of the OT in the Epistle, see Westcott, op. cit. pp. 471–497; Nairne, op. cit. pp. 248–289.)

(2) Philo.—Much has been written about the influence exercised on the writer of the Epistle by the Alexandrian school of pre-Christian Judaism, whose chief representative is Philo. The evidence bearing on the question may be arranged as follows.

(a) Resemblances.—(i.) Both use the LXX in a recension closely resembling Cod. A (Bleek, op. cit. i. 369 ff.). (ii.) The custom in the Epistle of quoting the OT as the direct utterance of God, without mentioning the writer's name, finds an exact parallel in the works of Philo. (iii.) Striking and unusual words and phrases used in the Epistle occur also in Philo's writings, e.g. ἀπαργασμα (He 1<sup>3</sup>;

de Mundi Op. 51), καρκτήρ (He 1<sup>2</sup>; de Plant. Noe, 5), θυμιατήριον in the sense of 'altar' (He 9<sup>1</sup>; Quis rer. div. hær. 46), παραπλήσιως (He 2<sup>14</sup>; cf. τὸ παραπλήσιον, Quis rer. div. hær. 30), μετριοπαθεῖν (He 5<sup>2</sup>; de Abrah. 44), τραχηλίζειν (He 4<sup>13</sup>; de Vita Mos. i. 53), δείσει τε καὶ ικετηρίας (He 5<sup>7</sup>; de Cherubim, 13), ἐμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἐπαθεν (He 5<sup>8</sup>; cf. δὲ παθὼν ἀκριβῶς ἐμαθεν, de Somn. ii. 15), ἐπρεπεν used of God (He 2<sup>10</sup>; de Leg. alleg. i. 15), λασσηριον applied to the lid of the Ark (He 9<sup>5</sup>; de Vita Mos. iii. 8). The Epistle describes Christ as πρωτότοκος and ἀρχιερεύς (He 1<sup>6</sup> 2<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>); Philo applies the terms πρεσβύτερος υἱός, πρωτόγονος (de Agricult. 12), ἀρχιερεύς (de Somn. i. 38) to the Divine Logos. (iv.) Both display the same habit of interweaving doctrinal and practical passages, the same unusual transposition of words (cf. πᾶλιν, He 1<sup>6</sup>; de Leg. alleg. iii. 9), the same use of δὴ ποῦ (He 2<sup>16</sup>; e.g. de Leg. alleg. i. 3) and ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν (He 7<sup>9</sup>; e.g. de Plant. Noe, 38). (v.) Both argue from the silences as well as from the statements of Scripture, attach importance to the meaning of OT names, and emphasize the same particular aspects of the lives of Abel, Noah, Abraham, and Moses. (vi.) Philo speaks of an eternal universe (ὁ κόσμος νοητός, de Mundi Op. 4-6), of which the visible universe (ὁ κόσμος αἰσθητός, ib.) is a transitory copy. The writer of the Epistle mentions the 'heavenly' Tabernacle, a copy of which Moses reproduced on earth (8<sup>2</sup>), and frequently alludes to earthly institutions as copies or shadows of heavenly realities (9<sup>23-24</sup>).

(b) Divergences.—(i.) While the Epistle resembles Philo in its mode of citation of the OT, it presents a radical difference in its method of interpretation. Men and institutions remain what they are said to be in the OT. They do not become mere symbols of transcendental ideas. (ii.) In the Epistle stray expressions may be applied to the Son which Philo applies to the Logos, but the personal 'Son' of Hebrews is essentially different from the abstract impersonal 'Logos' of Philo. (iii.) The writer of the Epistle uses language which recalls the Alexandrian notion of the real invisible world which corresponds with the unreal world of sense. But that idea is not the basis of his conception of Christianity.

'He does not identify Christian truth with an already existing system of thought: his Christian thought merely possesses itself of the outlines of a mode of conception existing, which it fills with its own contents' (Davidson, op. cit. p. 201).

It appears, then, that the Epistle does show some affinities with Philo and the Alexandrian school. It is at least probable that the writer was acquainted with their ideas and their philosophical terminology. But his message is all his own; he owes little to Alexandria beyond the outward expression. So far as he borrows thoughts, he borrows from the gospel tradition and the OT Scriptures (see G. Milligan, The Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews, pp. 203-211; Bruce in HDB ii. 335).

(3) The Synoptic tradition.—The author shows considerable acquaintance with the facts of our Lord's life on earth. He knows of His human birth (2<sup>14</sup>), of His descent from the tribe of Judah (7<sup>14</sup>), of His human development (5<sup>8</sup>), of His temptation (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>), of His fidelity (3<sup>2</sup>), of His sinlessness (4<sup>15</sup>), of His preaching (2<sup>3</sup>), of His gentle bearing towards sinners (2<sup>17</sup>), of the contradiction He endured at the mouth of ignorant men (12<sup>3</sup>), of His circle of disciples (23<sup>13</sup>), of His agony in the Garden (5<sup>7</sup>), of His Ascension (6<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>26</sup> 9<sup>24</sup>). Though the Resurrection occupies no large place in the writer's doctrinal teaching, it is not because he is ignorant of the fact (13<sup>20</sup>). These things are mentioned in the Epistle quite incidentally and because of their bearing on the general argument. It is not likely, therefore, that they represent the whole of the writer's information concerning the earthly ministry of Jesus. The additional fact that he takes it for granted that his readers need no explanation of his allusions indicates that an evangelic tradition, not unlike that of the Synoptic Gospels, was already in circulation, but whether it had yet taken the form of a written record cannot be ascertained (see Westcott, op. cit. p. 465; Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 63 f.).

(4) St. Paul.—Allusion has already been made to the differences between the Epistle and the writings of St. Paul. Attention must now be directed to their similarities. Definite reminiscences of the language of Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Philippians have been discovered in the following passages. He 1<sup>4</sup> || Ph 2<sup>6</sup>; 2<sup>3</sup> || Gal 3<sup>19</sup>; 2<sup>4</sup> || 1 Co 12<sup>11</sup>; 2<sup>14</sup> || 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>; 5<sup>12</sup> || 1 Co 3<sup>2</sup>; 5<sup>14</sup> || 1 Co 2<sup>6</sup>; 6<sup>10</sup> || 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup>; 10<sup>30</sup> || Ro 12<sup>19</sup>; 10<sup>28</sup> || 2 Co 13<sup>1</sup>; 10<sup>38</sup> || Ro 1<sup>7</sup>; 12<sup>14</sup> || Ro 14<sup>19</sup>; 12<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>15</sup> || Gal 4<sup>25</sup>; 13<sup>16</sup> || Ph 4<sup>15</sup>. 18; 13<sup>18</sup>. || 2 Co 1<sup>11</sup>. 12; 13<sup>20</sup> || Ro 15<sup>28</sup>; 13<sup>24</sup> || Ph 4<sup>21</sup>. 22 (Moffatt, LNT, p. 453). It may be doubted whether direct literary connexion can be proved in any of these cases. Even where such connexion seems most certain—when the two writers agree with each other, while differing both from the LXX and from the Hebrew, in the text of an OT passage (He 10<sup>30</sup>, Ro 12<sup>19</sup>)—it is possible that they are quoting independently an interpretation which is at least as old as the Targum of Onkelos. Yet in many ways the Epistle presupposes the work of St. Paul. Though they see things from a different point of view, the two are in fundamental agreement. Both display 'the same broad conception of the universality of the Gospel, the same grasp of the age-long purpose of God wrought out through Israel, the same trust in the atoning work of Christ, and in His present sovereignty' (Westcott, op. cit. p. lxxviii). That the writer to the Hebrews can take up an attitude of wide universalism without mentioning the question of circumcision or even naming the Gentiles at all, and can calmly put aside the Law almost as though its futility were self-evident, implies that the Pauline battle of Galatia and Rome has been fought and won.

(5) The Fourth Gospel.—In point of time the Epistle to the Hebrews stands midway between the Pauline Epistles and the Johannine writings. In the development of apostolic teaching it occupies precisely the same place. St. Paul had a hard struggle to establish the principle of the universal application of the gospel to Jew and Gentile alike. The Epistle to the Hebrews and the Fourth Gospel both take this for granted. St. Paul, though he does not dwell on the idea, occasionally speaks of Christ's death in terms of sacrifice (Eph 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Ro 3<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>3</sup> etc.). The Epistle to the Hebrews deals fully with the sacrificial aspect of Christ's death, and sets forth at length the corresponding conception of His Priesthood. The root-ideas contained in the doctrines of Christ's Priesthood and Sacrifice find their final expression in the seemingly simple and unstudied language of the Fourth Gospel, even though the terms 'priest' and 'sacrifice' are never used (cf. Jn 10<sup>1-21</sup> 12<sup>32</sup> 16<sup>7</sup> 17). Lastly, the description of the person and work of Christ given in the opening verses of the Epistle (He 1<sup>1-4</sup>) might almost be taken to be a first sketch of the completed picture of the 'Divine Word made flesh' contained in the prologue to the Fourth Gospel.

'The teaching which St. John has preserved offers the final form of the Truth. St. John's theory (if we may so speak) of the work of Christ is less developed in detail than that which is found in the Epistles of St. Paul and in the Epistle to the Hebrews; but his revelation of Christ's Person is more complete. He concentrates our attention, as it were, upon Him, Son of God and Son of man, and leaves us in the contemplation of facts which we can only understand in part' (Westcott, op. cit. p. lx f.).

8. Importance.—The Epistle to the Hebrews has an interest peculiarly its own. It is the earliest exposition of the Christian tradition by one who had all the instincts of a scholar and a philosopher.

Wherever the author may have been born, he may be regarded as the NT representative of the type of mind which afterwards appeared in the great teachers of the Christian school of Alexandria. At the same time he is altogether free from the particular limitations of that school. He agrees with the Alexandrians in his philosophical bent and his love of cultured and scholarly expression, but he is also of one mind with the school of Antioch in his appreciation of the importance of fact. His doctrine of the Person of Christ combines the two central truths, the isolation of one of which was the cause of disaster both to Alexandria and to Antioch. For while he insists, equally with the Alexandrians, on the cosmic work and pre-incarnate glory of the Son, he is not less emphatic than the Antiochenes in his statement of the completeness of His participation in human suffering and temptation and His exaltation in human nature to the right hand of power. The Epistle to the Hebrews rendered permanent service to the Church by showing that the way to understand something of the meaning of the Person of Christ is not to minimize either the Divine or the human nature, but to emphasize both.

In his interpretation of the OT, the writer of Hebrews seems to be in sympathy much more with Antioch than with Alexandria. His exegesis is based on principles which have never been forsaken without disastrous consequences. He recognizes the OT as a Divinely-given revelation, and yet a revelation which is partial and incomplete. He realizes the true method of historical interpretation: a passage of Scripture must be explained in the light of its context; its real meaning is that which the writer intended it to bear. These are the principles which lie at the root of all sound biblical criticism.

But the greatest service which the Epistle to the Hebrews has rendered to the Church is its interpretation of the Death of Christ in terms of Priesthood and Sacrifice. The ideas so familiar to us were new when the Epistle was written. The writer was 'not repeating but creating theology' (Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, p. 10). He offers no formal theory of the Atonement, but he reveals principles on which it rests, and states them in a way which appeals to the common instincts of mankind. Salvation of others can be wrought only through sacrifice of self. The priest must be also the victim. He must give his life to others as well as for others, and his life becomes available for others only through death—the death of self. The priest who offers the perfect sacrifice must himself be perfect—perfectly one with humanity in nature and in all human experiences; else the sacrifice would be impossible. He must be personally sinless; otherwise the offering would be incomplete and of partial efficacy. If his act of self-sacrifice is to be eternally valid, he must himself be eternal. Christ has fulfilled these conditions, and He will never change: 'Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever' (13<sup>9</sup>). The principles here set forth leave some things unexplained, but they are sufficient to strengthen faith to lay hold on what must always remain deeply mysterious—the inexpressible Divine love which made the Eternal Son lay down His life as man. To enkindle faith was the sole object of the writer. In one sense he may be called a visionary, but it is a practical vision that he sees—the vision of a few weak, halting Christians brought safely through an earthly crisis by the outstretched hand of the eternal High Priest who is enthroned in the heavenly sanctuary.

'Every student of the Epistle to the Hebrews must feel that it deals in a peculiar degree with the thoughts and trials of our own time. . . . The difficulties which come to us through physical facts and theories, through criticism, through wider views of human history, correspond with those which came to Jewish Christians at the close of the Apostolic age, and they will find their solution also in fuller views of the Person and Work of Christ' (Westcott, op. cit. Pref. p. v).

HEIFER (δῦμαλις=קֶרֶב, 'a cow').—The writer of Hebrews finds a parallel between 'the water (for the removal) of impurity' (ὕδαρ παντισμοῦ=קֶרֶב, 'water of exclusion') and the blood of Christ (He 9<sup>13a</sup>). The former element was a mixture of running (living) water with the ashes of a spotless heifer slain and burnt according to the ritual prescribed in Nu 19. As contact with a dead body, a bone, or a grave involved defilement, and entrance into the sanctuary in a state of uncleanness made the offender liable to excommunication, the use of this holy water was prescribed as a means of purification. Every detail in the ceremonial leads the student of origins back to the childhood of the Semites. 'Primarily, purification means the application to the person of some medium which removes a taboo, and enables the person purified to mingle freely in the ordinary life of his fellows' (W. R. Smith, RS<sup>2</sup>, 1894, p. 425). In those days there was probably a cult of the sacred cow, while juniper, cypress, and aromatic plants were supposed to have power to expel the evil spirits which brought death into the home. It is certain, however, that, when Israel began to put away childish things, the ancient consuetudinary laws in regard to defilement came to be viewed by the more enlightened minds as mere 'symbols of spiritual truths.' To the awakened conscience 'sin was death, and had wrought death, and the dead body as well as the spiritually dead soul were the evidence of its sway'; while cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet may ultimately have been regarded—though this is more doubtful—as 'the symbols of imperishable existence, freedom from corruption, and fulness of life' (A. Edersheim, The Temple, 1909, p. 305 f.). Discarding all magical ideas, the worshipper of Jahveh thus endeavoured to change the antique ritual into an object-lesson or sacramental means of grace. The writer to the Hebrews uses it as a stepping-stone to Christian truth. Rejecting the Philonic distinction between Levitical washings as directed to the purification of the body and sacrifices as intended to effect a purgation of the soul, he views the whole ritual of lustration and sin-offering alike as an opus operatum which can at the best purify only the body. Accepting this idea on the bare authority of Scripture, he makes it the premiss of an argument a minori ad majus. If (a particle which posits a fact, and scarcely insinuates a doubt) the blood of goats and bulls and the ashes of a heifer cleanse the flesh, defiled by contact with death, much more does the life-blood of the Messiah cleanse the conscience from dead works.

HEIR, HERITAGE, INHERITANCE.—1. Connotation of the terms used.—The words κληρονομία, κληρονομέω (derived from κλήρος, 'a portion') have, like the Heb. verbs יָרַשׁ, יָרָשׁ and their derivatives, which they render in the LXX, the idea of a possession rather than of a succession, i.e. of something obtained from another by gift (and not gained by oneself, κτήμα) rather than of something that one has become possessed of through the death of another (see Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, p. 168). This is especially the case when Israel is regarded as the 'heir' of the land of Canaan; succession to the Canaanites is not prominent in the idea of this inheritance, for Israel inherited from God, not from the people of the land. In this sense κληρονομία is nearly equivalent to 'the promise'; it is a free gift from God—a fact emphasized in Ac 7<sup>5</sup>, where Canaan is spoken of, and 20<sup>3</sup>, where the Christian promises are in question. We can trace in the OT (see Sanday-Headlam on Ro 8<sup>17</sup>) the transitions of meaning, from the simple possession of Canaan to the permanent and assured possession, then to the secure possession won by Messiah, and so to all Messianic blessings.

On the other hand, the Latin heres with its derivatives, used by the Vulgate, being a weak form of χρηστος, 'bereft,' has the idea of succession; it means literally 'an orphan,' and so hints at the death of the father. The English 'heir,' derived from heres, usually suggests that the father is alive, and that the son has not yet come into possession; while the verb 'to inherit' and its derivative 'inheritor' usually suggest that the father is dead and that the son has come into possession. In all these English words the idea of 'succession' is prominent. We must, therefore, be careful to bear in mind that they are not quite equivalent to the Gr. and Heb. words, and that their connotation is slightly different.

It may, however, be noticed that when κληρονομος, etc., are used in the most literal sense (see below, 3 (a)), the idea of succession is not altogether absent; it certainly is present when διαθήκη is used in the sense of 'a will,' as in He 9<sup>15</sup> (it is disputed whether in Gal 3<sup>15</sup>, etc., it means 'covenant' or 'will': for the latter meaning see W. M. Ramsay, Galatians, 1899, p. 340 ff.; also art. COVENANT). But it is obvious that where κληρονομος is used of Israel's inheritance in Canaan, or metaphorically of the Jewish and Christian promises of salvation (below, 3), the idea of succession must pass into the background, for the Heavenly Father does not die; and this fact causes the difficulty in the otherwise more natural interpretation of διαθήκη as a 'testament' or 'will.'

The word κληρος in Ac 26<sup>18</sup> and Col 1<sup>12</sup> is rendered 'inheritance' in the AV and the RV; and in 1 P 5<sup>3</sup> κλήροι is in the AV '[God's] heritage,' which is the same thing. In the latter passage the RV renders 'the charge allotted to you,' i.e. the persons who are allotted to your care. It is easy to see how κλήρος, 'a lot,' came to mean 'that which is obtained by lot' (Ac 1<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>21</sup>), and so 'an inheritance' with the connotation given above. In Col 1<sup>12</sup> the μερίς τοῦ κλήρου is equivalent to the μερίς τῆς κληρονομίας of Ps 16<sup>5</sup>. In Eph 1<sup>11</sup> ἐκκληρώθημεν, which in the AV is rendered 'we have obtained an inheritance' (this appears to have no good justification), is translated in the RV 'we were made a heritage,' i.e. 'we have been chosen as God's portion' (J. A. Robinson, Ephesians, 1903, p. 34; for the metaphor see below, 3 (b)).

2. Laws of inheritance.—(a) According to Jewish law each son had an equal share, except that the eldest son had double the portion of the others (Dt 21<sup>17</sup>). This law did not apply to a posthumous son, or in regard to the mother's property, or to gain that might have accrued since the father's death (A. Edersheim, LT<sup>4</sup>, 1887, ii. 243 f. note). Thus the Prodigal Son (Lk 15<sup>11</sup>), if he had only one brother, would have received on his father's death one third of the property. The father could not disinherit by will, but in his lifetime he could dispose of his property by gift as he liked, and so disinherit. Wills might be made in writing or orally (ib. p. 259). Daughters were excluded if there were sons; but if there were no sons, the daughter—or, presumably, daughters—inherited, failing whom brothers, failing whom father's brothers, failing whom the next of kin (Nu 27<sup>8-11</sup>). This is later legislation, for at first daughters could not inherit; when they were allowed to become heiresses in the absence of sons, they married in their own tribe, so as to keep the inheritance within it (Nu 36<sup>-13</sup>). In the ordinary case, however, where there were sons, the daughters would naturally marry into another family, and cease to belong to that of their father.

(b) The Roman and the Roman-Greek laws of inheritance considerably affected the NT language. St. Paul, writing to persons who would not be familiar with Jewish law, refers to customs and laws which they would at once understand. According to Roman law, sons must inherit, and a will leaving property away from sons was invalid (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 344). Sons and daughters inherited alike (Lightfoot on Gal 4<sup>7</sup>). Ramsay draws out the differences between strictly Roman law and the law in hellenized countries conquered by Rome, which was founded on Greek law: the Romans left much of the latter in force. According to Greek law, a son could be disinherited (Ramsay, p. 367). In Asia Minor and Athens a daughter could inherit, and an adopted son probably married the heiress (ib. pp. 340, 363). Daughters in Greek law had an indefeasible right to a dowry (ib. p. 367). A minor came of age at the time fixed by his father's will; if there was no will, the law fixed the period of nonage, but the Greek (Selencid) law differed from the Roman as to the period (ib. p. 392). See ROMAN LAW.

These facts help us to understand some passages in St. Paul which speak of the connexion between sonship and heirship. In Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>29</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> the latter is deduced from the former. We are God's children, and therefore His heirs. 'Thou art no longer a bondservant but a son; and if a son then an heir through God.' 'If ye are Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, heirs according to promise.' Or the sonship is deduced from the heirship; in Gal 3<sup>7</sup> 'they which be of faith'—who succeed as heirs to Abraham's faith [here the idea of succession may be faintly seen]—'the same are sons of Abraham.' In Col 3<sup>24</sup> bondservants are promised 'the recompense of the inheritance,' but this is because by becoming Christians they become the sons of God. Similarly in He 12<sup>8</sup>, though the idea of inheritance is not explicitly mentioned, the promise (11<sup>39</sup>) can be attained only by suffering (cf. below, 3 (f)); and if Christians refuse this, they are 'bastards and not sons.' Bastards cannot inherit the promise.

3. Usage in the NT.—(a) The words κληρονομος, κληρονομία, etc., are used literally, as in the Parable of the Vineyard (Mk 12<sup>7</sup>, Mt 21<sup>33</sup>, Lk 20<sup>41</sup>), where, however, there is a metaphorical interpretation (see (c)); so in Lk 12<sup>13</sup>, where Jesus is asked to divide the inheritance between two brothers, apparently to settle a dispute, and in Gal 4<sup>1</sup>, where the son, the heir, is as a servant during his nonage, though lord of all the property, the reference being to the Law and the Gospel. The words are also used literally in the NT of Canaan as the land of promise; cf. Ac 7<sup>5</sup>, where it is meant that Abraham did not actually enter into possession; and He 11<sup>36</sup>, where Isaac and Jacob are fellow-heirs (συγκληρο- ονόμοι) with Abraham; and He 12<sup>17</sup>, where Esau failed to inherit the blessing. So in Gal 4<sup>30</sup> (a quotation from Gn 21<sup>10</sup>) Ishmael, the son of the handmaid, may not inherit with Isaac, the son of the freewoman; this also is applied to the Law and the Gospel.

(b) From the literal sense the passage is easy to the metaphorical—the idea of the Messianic hope. Noah became ‘heir of the righteousness which is according to faith’ (He 11<sup>7</sup>). Abraham was promised that he should be ‘heir of the world’ (Ro 4<sup>13</sup>)—a passage which has given some difficulty to commentators, as there is no such promise explicitly made in the OT; the reference is probably to Gn 12<sup>3</sup> 22<sup>18</sup> and similar passages: in Abraham’s seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; cf. Gn 18<sup>18</sup>, and [of Isaac] 26<sup>4</sup>. This promise is quoted in Ac 3<sup>25</sup> by St. Peter, and in Gal 3<sup>8</sup> by St. Paul. The reference in Ro 4<sup>13</sup> can hardly be to the possession of Canaan, which would not be called ‘the world’ (see also (d) below). By a somewhat different figure Israel is said in the OT to be God’s inheritance or portion (Dt 9-6-29 32<sup>9</sup>); and in the LXX addition at the end of Est 4 the Jews are spoken of as ‘thy [God’s] original inheritance’ (τὴν ἐξ ἀρχῆς κληρονομίαν σου). Conversely, God is said to be the inheritance of the sons of Aaron or of the Levites (Nu 18<sup>20</sup>, Dt 10<sup>9</sup>, etc.). In the sense of the ‘Messianic hope’ (as in the more literal sense of the possession of Canaan) the words ‘inheritance’ and ‘promise’ become almost identical, as in Gal 3<sup>18</sup>, He 6<sup>17</sup>.

(c) The ‘promise’ is fulfilled by Jesus becoming incarnate. He describes Himself as the Heir in the Parable of the Vineyard. He is the Heir because He is the Son, the First-born, as opposed to the servants—i.e. the prophets. In He 1<sup>2</sup> Jesus is called the ‘heir of all things’ because He was the Instrument in creation through whom the Father made the worlds (τοὺς αἰῶνας). So in v. 4 He is said to have ‘inherited’ a more excellent name than the angels. The metaphor is doubtless based on Ps 2<sup>9</sup>: the nations are given to Messiah as His inheritance (see Westcott, op. cit. p. 8).

(d) In Jesus, Christians are Abraham’s heirs, whether of Jewish or Gentile stock (Ro 4<sup>9-11</sup>). They inherit Abraham’s faith, and are therefore his sons; the promise did not depend on Abraham’s circumcision, but was before it, though it was confirmed by it; nor was it dependent on the Law. Thus all nations are blessed in Abraham, and he is the heir of the world (see above (b)). In Eph 1<sup>14</sup> St. Paul uses in regard to Gentile Christians the very words which described Israel’s privilege: ‘promise,’ ‘inheritance,’ ‘emancipation,’ ‘possession’ (Robinson, op. cit. p. 36). By adoption we were made fellow-heirs with Christ (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>), and a heritage (Eph 1<sup>11</sup>). Gentiles are fellow-heirs with Jews (Eph 3<sup>6</sup>, Ac 26<sup>18</sup>); and Christians are fellow-heirs together of the grace of life (1 P 3<sup>7</sup>)—e.g. husbands and wives are fellow-heirs because they are Christians. See art. ADOPTION.

(f) One condition of inheriting is self-denial (Mt 19<sup>29</sup>, where ‘receive’ of Mk 10<sup>30</sup> and Lk 18<sup>30</sup> becomes ‘inherit’ when applied to ‘eternal life’). We are ‘joint-heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with [him]’ (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>). We must imitate those who ‘through faith and patience inherit the promises’ (He 6<sup>12</sup>); ‘he that overcometh shall inherit and become God’s son’ (Rev 21<sup>7</sup>—the only instance in Rev. of κληρονομεῖν). Other conditions are meekness and humility (1 P 3<sup>9</sup>, ‘not rendering evil for evil or reviling for reviling, but contrariwise blessing; for hereunto were ye called that ye should inherit a blessing’; cf. Mt 5<sup>5</sup>, Ps 37<sup>11</sup>) and sanctification (Ac 20<sup>31</sup>). The inheritance is forfeited by self-indulgence (1 Co 6<sup>9-10</sup>, Gal 5<sup>1</sup>), and is not reached by ‘flesh and blood’ or by ‘corruption’ (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>)—a spiritual regeneration is necessary for its attainment.

(g) In a real sense the inheritance is already entered upon.* In He 6<sup>12</sup> the present participle κληρονομοῦντων is used: ‘those who are inheriting’ (the Vulg. has the future hereditabunt, but some old Lat. MSS have the present potiuntur); so in 4<sup>9</sup> ‘we which have believed do enter—are now entering (εἰσερχομεθα)—into that rest,’ not as Vulg. ingrediemur, ‘shall enter’ (see Westcott, op. cit. p. 95). The kingdom has already begun (Mt 3<sup>2</sup>, and the parables of ch. 13). Yet the inheritance will not be fully attained till the Last Judgment (Mt 25<sup>34</sup>). In Eph 1<sup>14</sup> St. Paul speaks of the sealing ‘with the Holy Spirit of promise’ as ‘an earnest (ἀρραβών) of our inheritance,’ and in the same context (v. 18<sup>6</sup>) uses language which shows that in some sense it is entered upon already (cf. 2 Co 1-2 5<sup>5</sup>). The same thing is seen in Col 1<sup>12</sup>; while in 3<sup>24</sup> the promise to Christian bondservants that they should receive from the Lord the ‘recompense of the inheritance’ rather points forward to the world to come. So in 1 P 1<sup>4</sup> the reference seems to be to the future: ‘an inheritance . . . reserved in heaven for you’ (so Bigg; but this is denied by Hort and von Soden). In this connexion we must be careful not to confuse our thought by connecting ‘inheritance’ with our own death, or the ‘death’ of this age. There is no idea here of ‘succession’ (see above, 1). A. J. MACLEAN.

HELL.—1. Context.—The word most frequently so rendered in the EV is the Gr. ἄδης (see HADES). In the NT, outside the Gospels, ‘hell’ is also used in translating the two Gr. words γέεννα (‘Gehenna’) and the very rare verbal form ταπταῶ (‘send into Tartarus’).

The former occurs only once, viz. in Ja 3<sup>6</sup>, where it is obviously used metaphorically for the evil power which is revealed in all forms of unlicensed, careless, and corrupt speech. In the figurative phrase ‘set on fire of Gehenna,’ the author of the Epistle has clearly in mind the original idea of that name in the associations of the Valley of Hinnom, with its quenchless fire and its undying worm (2 Ch 28<sup>3</sup> 33<sup>6</sup> Jer 7<sup>31</sup>).

The name ‘Tartarus’ (2 P 2<sup>4</sup>) carries us out of the association of Hebrew into the realm of Greek thought. It is the appellation given by Homer (Il. viii. 13) to that region of dire punishment allotted to the elder gods, whose sway Zeus had usurped.

'I will take and cast him into misty Tartarus,' says Zeus, 'right far away, where is the deepest gulf beneath the earth; there are the gate of iron and threshold of bronze, as far beneath Hades as heaven is high above the earth.'

The Greek word passed into Hebrew literature, and is found in En. xx. 2, where Uriel is said to have sway over the world and over Tartarus (cf. Philo, de Eeaeer. § 6). The passage in 2 Peter shows evident traces of the effect upon it of the Book of Enoch, so it is not necessary to go further afield in order to discover the source of the word. In the Christian sections of the Sib. Or. the word is of frequent occurrence, and appears sometimes to be used as equivalent to Gehenna and at other times as the name for a special section of that region. Cf. i. 126-129:

'Down they went Into Tartarean chamber terrible,
Kept in firm chains to pay full penalty
In Gehenna of strong, furious, quenchless fire.'

With this passage should be carefully compared En. cviii. 3-6, where some exceptional features occur in the description of hell. The passage is in a fragment of the earlier Book of Noah, now incorporated in the larger work.

'Their names,' says the seer, 'shall be blotted out of the book of life, and out of the holy books, and their seed shall be destroyed for ever, and their spirits shall be slain, and they shall cry and make lamentation in a place that is a chaotic wilderness, and in the fire shall they burn; for there is no earth there. And I saw there something like an invisible cloud; for by reason of its depth I could not look over, and I saw a flame of fire blazing brightly, and things like shining mountains circling and sweeping to and fro. And I asked one of the holy angels who was with me, and said unto him: "What is this shining thing?" for it is not a heaven but only the flame of a blazing fire, and the voice of weeping and crying, and lamentation and strong pain.' And he said unto me: "This place which thou seest—here are cast the spirits of sinners and blasphemers, and of those who work wickedness, and of those who pervert everything that the Lord hath spoken through the mouth of the prophets."

As Charles points out in his notes on this passage, the writer has confused here Gehenna and the hell of the disobedient stars, conceptions which are kept quite distinct in the earlier sections of the book (cf. chs. xxi. and xxii.).

2. The idea in apostolic and sub-apostolic literature.—We have to pass beyond the strict use of the word 'hell' to discover the wider range of the conception in the literature of the NT that comes within the scope of our examination. There are two or three terms found in the Apocalypse, to which we must now turn.

(a) The Apocalypse of John.—(1) In Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 'the pit of the abyss' (see ABYSS) is regarded as the special prison-house of the devil and his attendant evil spirits. This conception is probably derivable from similar sources to those from which Tartarus comes, though there are peculiar and interesting features about it, details of which will be found in the special article devoted to its explanation. Closely connected with the idea of the abyss is its demonic ruler Abaddon (v.<sup>11</sup>, see ABADDON), whose name figures frequently in the Wisdom-literature, and is generally translated in the LXX by ἀπωλεία = 'destruction.' According to one Hebrew authority, Abaddon is itself a place-name, and designates the lowest deep of Gehenna, from which no soul can ever escape (see H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, in loco). In the Asc. Is. iv. 14 is a somewhat similar passage: 'The Lord will come with His angels and with the armies of the holy ones from the seventh heaven . . . and He will drag Beliar into Gehenna and also his armies.'

(2) 'The lake of fire' is an expression found several times in Rev. (cf. 19<sup>9</sup>, etc.). It is described as the appointed place of punishment for the Beast and the False Prophet, for Death and Hades themselves, for all not enrolled in the Book of Life, and finally for those guilty of the dark list of sins given in 21<sup>8</sup>. It is questionable whether the original imagery underlying the expression is derived from the story of the Cities of the Plain, or the Pyriphlegethon—the fiery-flamed river—one of the tributaries of the Acheron in the Homeric vision of the under world (cf. Od. x. 513). Probably elements from both enter into it. A passage in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch, x. 1-6—remarkable for the fact that hell is here set in the third heaven (see W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums, Berlin, 1903, p. 273 n.)—has close parallels with the passage in Rev 21<sup>8</sup>. The following extracts will show how close and suggestive the imagery is—and as it probably dates before A.D. 70, the actual connexion is not improbable.

'They showed me there a very terrible place . . . and all manner of tortures in that place . . . and there is no light there, but murky fire constantly flameth aloft, and there is a fiery river coming forth, and that whole place is everywhere fire . . . and those men said to me: This place is prepared for those who dishonour God, who on earth practise . . . magic-making, enchantments, and devilish witchcrafts, and who boast of their wicked deeds, stealing, lies, calumnies, envy, rancour, fornication, murder . . . for all these is prepared this place amongst these, for eternal inheritance' (cf. also Asc. Is. iv. 15).

In the Sib. Or. we have similar language, e.g. ii. 313:

'And then shall all pass through the burning stream
Of flame unquenchable.'

Again, in ii. 353 ff. we have:

'And deathless angels of the immortal God,
Who ever is, shall bind with lasting bonds
In chains of flaming fire, and from above
Punish them all by scourge most terribly;
And in Gehenna, in the gloom of night,
Shall they be cast 'neath many horrid beasts
Of Tartarus, where darkness is immense.'*

(3) In Rev 20<sup>14</sup> 'the lake of fire' is further defined as 'the second death'—a phrase which recurs in other passages of the book (e.g. 2<sup>11</sup>). The phrase seems traceable to Jewish sources, for it occurs frequently in the Targums (cf. Wetstein on Rev 2<sup>11</sup>). It seems likely that the Jews, in turn, derived it from the ideas of Egyptian religion, since we find Ani, seated on his judgment throne, saying, 'I am crowned king of the gods, I shall not die a second time in the underworld' (The Book of the Dead, ed. E. A. Wallis Budge, London, 1901, ch. xlv.; cf. Moffatt in EGT, 1910, on Rev 2<sup>11</sup>).

(b) St. Paul.—This idea of the 'second death' leads naturally to St. Paul's use of 'death' in such passages as Ro 6<sup>1</sup>. When the Apostle uses the word, he evidently intends by it 'something far deeper than the natural close of life. . . . For his death is one indivisible experience. It is the correlative of sin. . . . Death is regarded as separation from God. . . . So death, conceived as the final word on human destiny, becomes the synonym for hopeless doom' (Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, 1904, pp. 113-117).

(c) Other NT books.—This idea is also strongly and strikingly put in Ja 1<sup>15</sup>: 'Sin, when it is full-grown, bringeth forth death' (cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup>). In Jude 6<sup>13</sup> and 2 P 2<sup>17</sup> we have the expressions 'darkness' and 'the blackness of darkness' used as descriptive epithets of the place of punishment. Once more we are face to face with the peculiar imagery of apocalyptic, and we recall how the word is employed in the Gospels, especially in the phrase 'the outer darkness' (cf. Mt 8<sup>12</sup>). In En. x. 4 we read, 'Bind Azazel hand and foot, and cast him into the darkness,' and throughout that book the imagery frequently recurs. The figure is a natural one, and needs no elaboration to make its force felt.

(d) Apostolic Fathers.—In turning to the Christian literature of the 1st cent. that lies outside the NT, we do not find any very striking additions to the ideas contained in the pages of the canonical books. In Did. 16 we read, 'All created mankind shall come to the fire of testing, and many shall be offended and perish,' which is only a faint reflexion of the Synoptic statements. In the Epistle of Barnabas, xx., the way of sin is described as 'a way of eternal death with punishment,' and then follows a list of sins reminiscent of Rev 21<sup>8</sup>. In the 8th Similitude of the Shepherd of Hermas—that of the tower-builders—there are many references to judgment, but they are couched in such general terms as 'shall lose his life,' 'these lost their life finally,' or 'these perished altogether unto God.' In Sim. IX. xviii. 2 there is a striking passage differentiating between the punishment of the ignorant and those who sin knowingly: 'They that have not known God, and commit wickedness, are condemned to death; but they that have known God and seen His mighty works, and yet commit wickedness, shall receive a double punishment, and shall die eternally.' In IX. xxviii. 7 it is said: 'Confess that ye have the Lord, lest denying Him ye be delivered into prison (ἐς δεσμωτηριον).' There can be no doubt here that 'prison' is meant to signify the place of punishment beyond death. The imagery may be derived from the saying in Mt 5<sup>5-6</sup>, but we must remember that 'bonds and imprisonment' were frequently the terms in which the apocalyptic literature figured future punishment.

(e) First-century apocalypses.—The conception that meets us in the Parable of Dives and Lazarus, viz. that the places of bliss and torment are visible the one from the other, meets us in two or three apocalypses of the 1st century. In the section of 2 Esdras discovered in 1875, we have one of these passages (vii. 36-38):

'And the pit (Lat. "place") of torment shall appear, and over against it shall be the place of rest: and the furnace of hell (Lat. "Gehenna") shall be shewed, and over against it the paradise of delight. And there shall the Most High say to the nations that are raised from the dead, See ye and understand whom ye have denied, or whom ye have not served, or whose commandments ye have despised. Look on this side and on that: here is delight and rest, and there fire and torments.'

In Ass. Mos. x. 10 occurs the passage:

'And thou wilt look from on high and see thine enemies in Gehenna, and thou wilt recognize them and rejoice, and thou wilt give thanks and confess thy Creator.'

Very similar passages are found in the Book of the Secrets of Enoch, chs. x., xl., and xli.

This idea is even more clearly set forth in the Apocalypse of Peter, and forms the beginning of the famous passage in which is set forth the punishment of sinners, in the manner that to later ages is most familiar in the pages of Dante, where the forms of torment bear an appropriate relation to the sins committed. The passage begins at § 20, and follows immediately on the description of Heaven, with these words:

'And I saw another place over against that, very dark: and it was the place of punishment: and those who were punished there and the punishing angels had a dark raiment like the air of the place. And some were there hanging by the tongue: these were those who blasphemed the way of righteousness, and under them was fire burning and punishing them. And there was a great lake, full of flaming mire, in which were certain men who had perverted righteousness, and tormenting angels afflicted them.'

In these verses we trace the similarity to ideas and figures we have already discovered in the Apoc. of John and elsewhere, but the further descriptions of this Inferno borrow elements from Greek and other sources, and are considerably more extravagant than anything within the limits of the 1st century. It may, however, be only a development of the conceptions found in such 2nd cent. documents as Jude and 2 Peter.

(f) Josephus.—An interesting witness to contemporary Jewish thought in the 1st cent. is Josephus, who has two references to the belief of the Pharisees in the matter of future punishment. In Ant. XVIII. i. 3 we read:

'They also believe that souls have an immortal vigour in them, and ha under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but that the former shall have power to revive and live again.' Again in BJ II. viii. 14, quoting the doctrine of the Pharisees, he claims their view to be 'that the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment.'

(g) Testament of Abraham and Pistis Sophia.—Before our survey of the literature closes, note must be taken of two striking and somewhat fantastic conceptions contained in two works, which probably set forth, among their obviously later material, elements of an earlier tradition. The first is found in the Testament of Abraham, which may date in its origin from the 2nd cent. of our era, and doubtless some of its contents are from a much earlier period. In its present form it appears to issue from a Jewish-Christian source, and its place of origin seems to be Egypt. Elements of Egyptian thought enter into its literary form, among the most striking of which is the idea of the weighing of souls—a scene that often occurs on the Egyptian pagan monuments. The trial of souls is threefold—once before Abel, at a later time by the twelve tribes of Israel, and finally by the Lord Himself. Abraham is permitted to witness the procedure of judgment, and he finds two angels seated at a table. The one on the right hand records the good deeds, and the one on the left the evil deeds of the soul to be tested. In front of the table stands an angel with a balance on which the souls are weighed, while another has a trumpet having within it all-consuming fire whereby the souls are tried. These more elaborate and somewhat mechanical methods form a link with the imagery of mediævalism, but also prove the manner in which Christianity was proceeding along eclectic lines, and taking to itself ideas and figures from other religions.

In the curious work known as the Pistis Sophia, probably of Valentinian, and certainly of Gnostic origin, we have a bizarre conception of the place of punishment—described as 'the outer darkness.' It is presented in the form of a huge dragon with its tail in its mouth, the circle thus formed engirdling the whole earth. Within the monster are the regions of punishment—for there are in it twelve dungeons of horrible torment.' Each dungeon is governed by a monster-like ruler, and in these are punished the worst of sinners, e.g. sorcerers, blasphemers, murderers, the unclean, and those who remain in the doctrines of error. To express the awfulness of the torture, it is said that the fire of the under world is nine times hotter than that of earthly furnaces; the fire of the great chaos nine times hotter than that of the under world; the fire of the 'rulers' nine times hotter than that of the great chaos; but the fire of the dragon is seventy times more intense in its heat than that of the 'rulers'! In 3 Baruch, iv. and v. there is the mention of a dragon in close connexion with Hades, and in the latter chapter Hades is said to be his belly (cf. Hughes' notes on the passage in Charles' Apoc. and Pseudepigr.). We are at least reminded by such passages of the Jonah legend, and it may well be that behind all three is a common origin. The dragon is obviously an old Semitic myth, and this particular form of it probably gives fresh significance to the words in Rev 20: 'the dragon, the old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan.'

3. General considerations.—Several points of importance emerge from our study of these references in the literature of the 1st century.

(1) The surprisingly few passages in the NT in which the word 'hell' (or even the idea it conveys) occurs.—Outside the Gospels and the Apocalypse, there are practically no occasions on which we find it employed. Its absence from the writings of St. Paul, Hebrews, and the Epistles of John is most noteworthy. Our surprise is not lessened by the recollection of the fact that, according to the Rabbis, 'seven things were created before the world—Torah, Gehenna, the Garden of Eden, the Throne of Glory, the Sanctuary, Repentance, and the Name of Messiah.' In St. Paul at least, six of these are frequently in evidence, and this gives more significance to his silence about the seventh.

(2) The restrained sanity of the references that do occur.—When we compare even the lurid images of the Apocalypse with those we have cited (and even more with those that may be found elsewhere in the same books) from contemporary works of a similar character, we cannot but be impressed with the soberness of the language. There is nothing of the morbid curiosity and unpleasant lingering on horrors, to say nothing of the sense of gloating over vengeance and cruelty, that we find in so many kindred passages. Terrible imagery is sometimes employed, but it is clearly imbued with a high moral aim, and designed to convey a clearly spiritual purpose. The absence of such allegorizing methods as those of Philo is also noteworthy. Imagery is the method in which the truths are here conveyed, not allegory.

(3) The obvious dependence on the teaching of the Gospels for all that is said about hell.—It would be hard to point to any passage in the NT that conveyed any fresh or fuller ideas about the place of punishment, its nature and purpose, than are to be found in words attributed to Jesus in the Gospels. This is certainly noteworthy and significant, even if the Gospel teaching on Gehenna is an echo of current ideas. In form it probably is, but in ethical content it surely goes deeper, and we are made to feel that in the conception of the speaker this place also is founded by the Eternal Love—it too is part of the Father's Universe. Dante, the greatest apocalypticist of subsequent ages, had caught the true evangelical spirit of this most awful doctrine when he wrote:

'Justice incited my sublime Creator;
Created me divine Omnipotence,
The highest Wisdom and the primal Love'
(Inferno, iii. 4).

(4) The permanent spiritual lessons to be derived from the descriptions of future punishment.—(a) All evil powers—death, sin, and their forces—are to be finally destroyed in the fires of Divine judgment (Rev 20<sup>10</sup>, 13-15, 2 P 24, Jude 13). According to St. Paul, all powers that make against Christ and His Kingdom are to come to final ruin (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>8-10</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>24-26</sup>).

(b) Evil in the heart of men must entail punishment and, if persisted in, eternal loss and shame, and a death that is more than death (Ro 6<sup>10-23</sup>, Rev 21<sup>8</sup>). The terrible nature of moral evil, and of the heart's persistent rebellion against God, is the appalling reality that renders these pictures of judgment truly significant, and redeems them from being the mere pageantry of a heated imagination. Whatever we may say of their outward form, there is an inexpressible grandeur behind them that rests in a true conception and representation of the Divine Holiness. 'The fear of hell' in these pages is much more than 'the hangman's whip'; it is the cry of the soul in the presence of Him who is revealed as of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, but who is, nevertheless, the Redeemer of His Universe.

G. CURRIE MARTIN.

HELLENISM.—The word 'Hellenism,' which in Greek writers stands for Greek civilization, has now come to be used with a four-fold meaning. (1) Since Droysen, it describes a particular period of Greek history and civilization; (2) it is a name for the influence of this Greek civilization on the Oriental world; (3) it marks a certain stream in Judaism; and (4) it denotes a party in primitive Christianity. (1) and (2) are closely related to one another, and so are (3) and (4).

1. Hellenism as a period.—The reign of Alexander the Great marks a period in Greek history, not only by reason of the expansion of Greek influence but also owing to the rise of a new spirit which affected language, literature, art, philosophy, science, civilization in general, and religion.

See J. G. Droysen, Geschichte des Hellenismus, Gotha, 1877-78; J. Kaerst, Geschichte des hellenistischen Zeitalters, Leipzig, 1901-09; P. Corssen, 'Über Begriff und Wesen des Hellenismus,' ZNTW ix. (1908) 81-95.

(a) Language.—The Greek tribes, hitherto separated by rivalry and difference of dialect and customs, became mixed. A common language, the so-called 'Koine,' combining in its vocabulary and its grammatical forms elements from various dialects, took the place of the local dialects, and succeeded even in robbing the Attic of its dominating position in literature. Words never used by Attic writers but found in Ionic poets or in Doric inscriptions became current: as, e.g., γογγυζω, κλιβανος, and so did forms like λαός, ναός, ἡμην instead of ἦν, οἶδαμεν instead of ἴσμεν. The formation of compounds went on; as the prepositions had lost somewhat of their meaning, two prepositions were combined: ἐξαποστέλλω, ἐπιδιατάσσω, ἐπισυνάγω; and again nouns were formed from these compound verbs: ἐξαποστολή, ἐπιδιάταγμα, ἐπισυναγωγή. On the other hand, there was a tendency to use the simple where in former times a compound would have been used. The grammar lost certain moods and tenses: the dual and the optative became almost obsolete; the pluperfect was rare. The syntax tended to become more simple; the beautiful periods constructed by the Attic classics by means of participles and infinitives used as nouns disappeared; the infinitive was generally expressed by ἵνα or ὅπως used without a final sense.

Most of these changes can be explained from the point of view of the evolution of the Greek language itself. A language is always growing and changing, and the Koine marks only a step in a long process from the Greek of Homer's time to modern Greek. Of course this development did not always follow a straight line: there was a constant reaction, on the part of certain authors, against the popular current, in favour of cultured literary forms; besides the rich and flowery Asianism an artificial Atticism was cultivated by the writers of the Hellenistic period.

Moreover, it is evident that an admixture of Oriental elements also influenced the Greek language. The vocabulary of this period shows Persian words (παράδεισος, ἀγγαρεύειν), as well as Hebrew and Aramaic (πάσχα, σάββατον), Egyptian (πάπυρος, Φαραώ), and Roman (δηνάριον, κονσταντία). Many of the grammatical and syntactical phenomena may be explained more readily by reference to the parallels in these languages. One Hebraism is προσωπον τινος λαμβάνειν, whence come προσωπολήπτωρ and προσωπολήψια.

Thumb, Die griechische Sprache im Zeitalter des Hellenismus, Strassburg, 1901; J. H. Moulton, Prolegomena to the Grammar of the NT<sup>3</sup>, Edinburgh, 1908. See also next article.

(b) Literature.—The period of Hellenism marks a decrease in skilful composition, and at the same time exhibits much artificiality. The writing becomes more popular in form as well as in contents: romance and novel attain to a large circulation; there is a demand for biography, special history, travellers' guide-books, and the like; many subjects are treated in the form of letters. Pseudepigraphy, i.e. writing under an assumed name of some great authority of former times, is very common. By indulging in this practice, writers acknowledge their own lack of authority and originality. To imitate classical models well is the great aim of most of them, and this is what they are trained to do in the schools. As a matter of fact, they do their best work when writing in the ordinary style of popular talk; but they are not aware of this, and always aim at something more artistic, taking the artificial for the artistic. Many Hellenistic writers show a special interest in strange countries, peoples, languages, and customs.

See U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur<sup>2</sup> (Kultur der Gegenwart, i. 8, Leipzig, 1907); F. Susemihl, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur in der Alexandrinerzeit, do. 1891-92; W. Christ, Geschichte der griechischen Literatur<sup>3</sup>, ed. O. Stählin and W. Schmid, Munich, 1908-09.

(c) Art.—The same holds true of the fine arts. It is a period of decadence, a natural decrease of physical and mental energy following on a period of highest achievement. In this special case the movement was determined by Oriental influences. The idealism of classic Greek art gave place to realism and symbolism; natural brightness was turned into austere solemnity, beauty into magnificence, charm into sensuality.

See Springer-Michaëlis, Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte, i. (= Das Altertum<sup>9</sup>), Leipzig, 1911; L. von Sybel, Weltgeschichte der Kunst im Altertum<sup>2</sup>, Marburg, 1903; S. Reinach, The Story of Art throughout the Ages, London, 1904; J. Strzygowski, Orient oder Rom, Leipzig, 1901; E. A. Gardner, art. 'Art (Greek and Roman)' in EKE<sup>1</sup> i. 870.

(d) Philosophy.—The philosophers of Hellenism are mostly eclectics; the general tendency is towards the practical questions of life. Stoicism and Cynicism are the leading schools; their teaching is popular and, indeed, is very often a kind of preaching. Philosophy becomes a substitute for religion: it is moral education. Here again the lack of originality makes itself conspicuous by the fact that recent products appear either under old names or as commentaries on old books. There is a tendency to rely on the authority of the ancients. Homer and Plato are treated as the divine text-books from which one has to derive all doctrines by means of allegorical interpretation. Mythology is turned into metaphysics and physics, or psychology and morals. There is a particular interest in psychological analysis.

See Ed. Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen<sup>4</sup>, Leipzig, 1909, vol. iii.

(e) History and science.—The Hellenistic period is one of collecting: Aristotle's work is continued, but the power of pervading the materials collected with a real constructive spirit is absent. Therefore history becomes a collection of single tales of various kinds and often of very different value, not sifted critically, but put together without even an effort to connect them. Similarly science is nothing but a vast pile of collected materials, all kinds of real observations being mixed up with the most ridiculous superstitions. Great store is set by what is extraordinary, and only the miraculous is regarded as of any importance.

(f) Civilization in general.—Hellenism marks a period of the highest civilization, in the sense that all the comforts of life were highly developed. Travelling had become fairly easy, and whatever luxuries a refined life required were brought by tradesmen from the remotest parts of the world. Houses were furnished in the most costly way, marbles, metals, ivory-carvings, and mural paintings being frequently used in decoration. Even the cheap furniture in daily use by poor people was seldom without decoration.

The social differences were enormous: there were a few very rich people while the majority of men were poor. Production was carried on by slaves, who were imported in great numbers from the East; although there was also room for the work of free labourers. Politics did not occupy the citizen much, for power had passed from the democracy to the monarchy. The free citizen devoted his time mostly to athletics, and the games were always attended by a large crowd. These people were accustomed to be fed and entertained by the government or by rich politicians. To musical and theatrical performances were added competitions between orators. The cruel and sometimes vulgar amusements of the circus came more and more into vogue, and the people even wanted criminals to be executed in the arena. Hellenistic civilization made people unfeeling and at the same time weak and effeminate; in spite of the humane doctrines of the Stoa, many people were cruel to their slaves and employees. Human life was not valued, and suicide was frequent.

(g) Religion.—The old family-cults and State-cult were continued as a matter of course; but there was a notable reduction of local cults, the greater gods, so to speak, swallowing up the minor heroes. On the other hand, a tendency towards deification and hero-worship was always introducing new objects of worship. The most prominent was the worship of the kings, and, in the Roman period, of the Emperor.

As early as Plato the old Greek religion had changed from a more or less cheerful worship of Nature into a kind of gloomy mysticism. The influence of the Oriental cults strengthened this tendency. Man tried to get rid of his own mortal nature by entering into mystical union with the divine nature. Immortality, continuation of life, became the prominent notions, and this brought to the front the conceptions of the hereafter and of the judgment, of a life of bliss and of penalties in the other world. The feeling of guilt became stronger and stronger. Men tried by all means to get rid of sin, which, however, did not mean to them moral so much as physical evil. Thus the Oriental rites gained all the greater influence, because they promised to relieve men from sin and death by letting them share in the life of the deity. The means to this end were mostly sacramental, i.e. physical: communion with the god was effected by eating and drinking at certain sacred meals, with the use of certain sacred vessels, and certain sacred formula, by going through a number of symbolical performances and keeping many rules, the reason of which nobody could explain. The individual rite ventured to give full assurance of life, but the faithful usually resorted to a variety of rites, and the priests could not object to this; their religion was tolerated and must be tolerant: this is implied in the system of polytheism. The important feature is not the individual rite, but the whole attitude of mind produced by these Mysteries.

2. Hellenism as hellenization of the Orient.—Alexander had conquered the Orient, i.e. Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Persia, etc., and his successors founded there several kingdoms. But his idea was not only to subdue the Orient by force for political purposes, but to pervade it with the spirit of Greek civilization, and at the same time to make Oriental and Greek culture a unity. A marriage between East and West, symbolized by his own wedding with Roxane at Persepolis, was his aim. In fact, the Greek dynasties of the Attalids, Seleucids, Ptolemys, etc., succeeded in imposing on their respective dominions a veneer of Greek culture: the Greek language was used at the court, in the army, on the coinage, in inscriptions, and as the common language in many of the colonies and towns founded by these kings; Greek law was used—with local modifications; Greek cults were officially introduced beside the native ones; Greek artists constructed the palaces and public buildings, and decorated them in the Greek style with sculptures and pictures.

This Greek culture, however, was but a veneer; it was only on the surface, and had only a temporary existence. Underneath, the old Oriental civilization still persisted, and came to the surface after a short time—more especially in the 3rd cent. A.D. We find many of the artificial Greek names of localities disappear and the old place-names reappear; we find the vernacular, so far spoken only by illiterate country folk,* recapture the cities and create a national literature. The cosmopolitan feeling of the Hellenistic period was replaced by an outburst of nationalistic enthusiasm, which made it easy for Muhammadanism to over-run all these Eastern provinces and sweep away the last remainders of the Hellenistic civilization.

In the meantime, Hellenism had not only assimilated many Oriental notions and beliefs: it had opened the West itself to Oriental influence. This is in fact what is usually called Hellenism—that mixture of Greek and Oriental civilization which characterizes the culture of the last centuries B.C. and the first centuries A.D. We have already seen how it influenced Greek language, literature, art, science, etc. The most significant feature was religious syncretism. Not only were the Oriental gods called by Greek names (Ammon and Baal became Zeus; Melkart, Herakles; Astarte, Aphrodite; Thoth, Hermes, etc.)—what is usually called theocracy—but the Oriental gods themselves under their own names were introduced into the West and worshipped by Greeks and Romans with no less fervour than by their own countrymen. But it was not the plain Egyptian cult of Isis, or the Phœnician cult of Adonis, or the Phrygian cult of the Magna Mater and Attis, or the Persian cult of Mithra that made so many proselytes among the Greeks and Romans: on their way to the West these cults had been transformed into Greek Mysteries, and it was in this form that they proved so attractive. The Greek notion of a Mystery—i.e. the idea of a community of initiated believers who sought to enter into union with the god for the purpose of obtaining divine immortality—took hold of these Oriental cults, whose myths were excellently adapted for this purpose, and whose strange rites lent themselves to the sacramental methods of such a communion. Moreover, the Orient had produced a priestly wisdom which was easily transformed into a Greek gnosis: Hellenism identified the objects of this speculation with its philosophical notions, hellenizing even their strange names into psychological terms.

It is the special character of this Oriental Hellenism that one can scarcely distinguish its separate elements: they are borrowed from all parts of the Eastern world, and so mixed up with Greek elements that the whole mass appears as a homogeneous unity in substance and form. Many of its features may be explained as readily from the Greek as from the Oriental point of view.

3. Jewish Hellenism.—Into this melting-pot of Oriental and Greek civilization Judaism was thrown in different ways.

(a) Babylon, where the largest number of Jews was settled, felt the Greek influence, after the Persian period, but only for a comparatively short time. Thus some Greek elements, besides the Persian ones, may have been introduced even here.

(b) Palestine itself, the native soil of Judaism, came under the political and cultural influence of the Ptolemys of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, and this influence became so strong that we find the religious leaders of the Jewish people, the priestly aristocracy, calling their sons by Greek names (Menelaus [Menahem] or Jason [Joshua, Jesus]), and making them practise athletics according to the Greek usage. They came very near to a hellenizing of their religion as well, until the ill-timed attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C. to introduce Greek idol-worship in place of the Jewish cult caused a reaction, when the Maccabees revolted and succeeded in delivering their country from the political domination of the Seleucids. They were less successful, and probably less zealous, in their attempt at getting rid of Hellenistic civilization. To learn the Greek language, to be in touch with the Western culture, was still an aim of most cultured Jews. All the time, until the destruction of Jerusalem, two tendencies were at work side by side: the tendency to isolate Judaism by prohibiting all relations with Hellenistic surroundings, and the tendency to give Judaism more influence by encouraging Jewish boys to learn the Greek language and to assimilate Greek ideas. It is rather difficult to estimate the exact measure of the Hellenistic influence on this Palestinian Judaism; but that it was great there can be no doubt. We see it in the vocabulary of Rabbinical Aramaic which includes terms like διαθῆκη, κατήγωρ, etc.; we see it further in many notions of Jewish psychology and even eschatology: it is Hellenistic individualism which distinguishes later from earlier Jewish theories.

(c) The Greek Diaspora.—The real Jewish Hellenism, however, was to be found among the colonies of Jews scattered all over the Græco-Roman world, the so-called Diaspora.* These Jews, who in some places—as, e.g., Alexandria and the Cyrenaica—formed a third of the population and had a powerful organization, had opened their minds to the spirit of Greek civilization. They not only spoke

* When St. Paul arrived at Lystra, the people there spoke Λυκαονιστί (Ac 14<sup>11</sup>), but St. Paul preached in Greek and was understood.

* Besides the Jewish Diaspora there was a smaller Samaritan one, which developed the same Hellenistic tendencies—a Greek translation of the Bible, a poem on the history of Sichem, chronicles, etc. (Schürer, GG IV<sup>3</sup> iii. [Leipzig, 1909] 51, 481 ff.; P. Glaue and A. Rahlfs, Fragmente einer griech. Übersetzung des samaritan. Pentateuchs [AGG, 1911, 167 ff.]).

the Greek language in addition to their vernacular; it was their vernacular: they used it in Divine service, when they gathered in the synagogues to worship the God of Israel; they had the Holy Scriptures, the Law of their God, translated into Greek; they had writers among themselves who had as great a mastery of the Greek language as any Greek author; they produced poems on the history of the Jewish people in the style of Homer, and even dramatized the Scriptures after the model of Euripides. They made a real study of Greek philosophy, and themselves contributed to the development of philosophical thought. While the unknown author of the Book of Wisdom under the name of Solomon sets forth the Jewish wisdom as it was influenced by Greek ideas, Philo, the famous Jewish philosopher, finds in Greek philosophy the real meaning of the Jewish Scriptures. He is, of course, a Jew, and he remains so; his heart belongs to his people and to its religion, but his head is filled with Greek notions and speculations, and it is from the Greek philosophers that he derives what he sets forth as the teaching of the ideal law-giver, Moses.

This Jewish Hellenism of the Diaspora was in fact Judaism, akin to the true Palestinian Judaism in substance, but it was a special kind of Judaism. Its horizon was widened, and its strictness weakened. Starting from an earlier form of Judaism, it did not share in the specific Rabbinical development of later Palestinian Judaism; on the other hand, it developed in its own way. Many things were possible to these Hellenistic Jews which would have been intolerable to the Palestinian Rabbis; and many things were uncertain to the former regarding which there was no question among the latter.

Hellenistic Judaism, therefore, was regarded by pious Palestinians as a Judaism of lower rank, a semi-heretical second-class Judaism. Nevertheless, it was a very influential pioneer of Judaism among the Greeks and Romans. The broader views proved to be more attractive to the heathen. They took the moral injunctions from the Law without being compelled to take circumcision and other strange rites; they accepted these moral views, together with the great hope of the Jewish people, from the Greek Bible. They had thus the guarantee of an old revelation transmitted in a most venerable book, and yet it sounded quite modern when interpreted by men like Philo. The language of this book was, of course, Oriental, but was this not in itself a sign of something Divine or an evidence of venerable age? Thus many a heathen became an adherent of this broad Judaism, being admitted as a worshipper and supporting the Jewish congregation by means of his wealth, and lending it his influence. It was for the benefit of such faithful proselytes that the Jews composed a moral catechism in poetical form under the name of Phokylides, or wrote the Sibylline Oracles, embodying the hope of the Jewish people, or interpolated hints to Jewish believers into the works of the famous Greek authors. This Jewish propaganda succeeded in gathering around the synagogues of the Diaspora numbers of proselytes who approached Judaism in various degrees.

Comparatively few Jews were led by contact with Hellenism to apostasy, like Philo's nephew Tiberius Alexander. For the most part the Jew remained a Jew, faithful to his people and its religion even amidst Hellenistic surroundings; and the hatred which the average Greek population felt for this strange element in their midst caused the Jews to cling together even more. The ideal of many Jews of the Diaspora was to go to Jerusalem, not only for a short pilgrimage, but with the purpose of staying there and being buried there at their death. Thus a considerable colony of Hellenistic Jews from all parts of the world settled in Jerusalem: they had their own synagogues; they retained the habit of speaking Greek, and nourished their peculiar notions about the Law and the universalism of salvation. It is from these circles of Hellenistic Jews in Jerusalem that the name 'Hellenist' is derived (Ac 6<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>29</sup>).

4. Hellenism in primitive Christianity.—The gospel of Jesus was a Divine message to Israel; Jesus Himself had confined His ministry to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; it was only occasionally that He dealt with pagans such as the centurion of Capernaum or the Syrophenician woman; it is an exceptional case also when we read in Jn 12<sup>20</sup> that there were certain Greeks who wished to see Jesus. The primitive community which arose in Jerusalem after Jesus' Death and Resurrection was a purely Jewish one. But it is remarkable that very soon, if not from the very first, Hellenistic Jews joined this community of Galileans. The very tendency of the gospel, universalistic as it was, appealed to these broad-minded people, and they were ready to deduce the consequences.

(a) The Hellenists in Jerusalem.—The first time we hear of 'Hellenists' is on the occasion of a quarrel between the two sections of the Christian community in Jerusalem, the 'Hellenists' complaining against the 'Hebrews' that their widows were overlooked in the daily food-supply (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>). Here the term seems to point primarily to the difference of language, but we remark a feeling of solidarity, a certain party-spirit, among these Hellenists as opposed to the Hebrews. The leaders of the community deal with the matter, and, in order to satisfy the complaining party, elect seven prominent men from among the Hellenists to take care of the food-supply. The first officials of the Christian Church—except the apostles—were thus Hellenists.

It was the Hellenists that occasioned the first struggle of Christianity with the Jewish authorities; St. Stephen, one of the Seven, was accused of having spoken against the Temple and the Law, and by a sudden outbreak of popular hatred he was put to death (with no authorization on the part of the Romans). This was the signal for a general persecution of the Christians. Again, it was the Hellenists who spread the gospel, not only among the Samaritans (Philip the Deacon, Ac 8<sup>5-25</sup>) but also among the Greeks in Antioch (Ac 11<sup>20</sup>). This is the beginning of the Gentile mission: the nameless men from Cyprus and Cyrene who are mentioned here are the forerunners of St. Paul, in some sense the first apostles of the Gentiles, the founders of the Gentile Church. The beginnings were small, but the fact in itself is of great importance. Having seen the propaganda carried on by Jewish Hellenism among the Gentiles, we may readily understand the attitude of the Christian Hellenists. Their mission work was probably of rather an occasional kind, and they did not work systematically like St. Paul, but they were creative.

(b) St. Paul himself, the Apostle of the Gentiles, was not a Hellenist strictly speaking. Born in the Diaspora, at Tarsus in Cilicia, he was nevertheless

'a Hebrew of Hebrews' (Ph 3<sup>5</sup>); he had Pharisaic surroundings, and was brought up in the spirit of the Palestinian Rabbis: he even went to Jerusalem to complete his Rabbinical education. In spite of his writing Greek and using the Greek Bible, he thinks in the way of a trained Palestinian Rabbi. After a missionary period of about 25 years, he was able to address the people of Jerusalem in their own Hebrew (i.e. Aramaic) language (Ac 21<sup>40</sup> 22-). Whether Hellenism—apart from general culture—had any notable influence upon him is an open question. From time to time the Hellenism of St. Paul is spoken of as a prominent feature in early Christian history; then again his predominantly Rabbinical training is insisted upon by another generation of scholars. The facts are that Hellenism, as we have seen, was in itself a mixture, which, in addition to the Greek element, included much that was Oriental; the Rabbinical education also comprehended a good many Greek notions; and the reasoning of the Jewish teachers was often very similar to the Stoic philosophy, as the popular Greek language of the Hellenistic period had a Semitic tinge. Parallels to most of the Pauline expressions may be adduced both from Rabbinical and from Greek writers, as was shown long ago by J. J. Wetstein (1751). It is, therefore, very difficult to tell exactly how far the influence of Hellenism may be traced in St. Paul. The one thing which seems certain, however, is that he did not borrow consciously from the Mystery religions. He is afraid of the demoniac influences in these; he tries to keep his faithful readers from any contaminating participation in idol-worship: for this is the sphere where the demons exercise their influence (1 Co 10<sup>14</sup>). Whatever may be said about St. Paul's indebtedness to the Mysteries—and a good deal has recently been said by Percy Gardner, R. Reitzenstein, and others—this must always be borne in mind.

(c) St. Paul's companions.—There is, however, one point which has not hitherto received due attention. That is the fact that St. Paul's companions belonged more or less to the Hellenists, and that he may thus have been unconsciously subjected to the influence of Hellenistic notions. Barnabas the Levite came from Cyprus (Ac 4<sup>36</sup>). Silas (Silvanus) also was evidently a Hellenist. Timothy was the son of a pagan father and a Jewish mother; he had not been circumcised before St. Paul took him into his company (Ac 16<sup>12</sup>). Titus was a Greek (Gal 2<sup>3</sup>). Apollos was a Hellenistic Jew, born and trained at Alexandria (Ac 18<sup>4</sup>). Aquila and Priscilla were Jews from Rome, born in Pontus (Ac 18-). In none of these cases (except that of Apollos) can we make out exactly how far the Greek influence went; but it is probable that most of the people referred to were much more Hellenistic in their training than St. Paul himself, while Apollos was certainly an out-and-out Hellenist.

We see the difference when we turn from St. Paul's letters to the Epistle to the Hebrews and the so-called Catholic Epistles. Hebrews certainly came from the pen of a Hellenist like Apollos: its language and style, its interpretation of the OT, its definition of faith (11<sup>1</sup>), its psychology (cf. 2<sup>14</sup>, 18 5<sup>7</sup> 14) are sufficient evidence of this. The same is proved for 1 Peter by the metaphorical language in 1<sup>13</sup>, 2<sup>2</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>, and the terminology taken over from the Mystery-cults (2- [different from 1 Co 3-, He 5<sup>12</sup>, 13] 13. 23 3<sup>20</sup>, 21). The language of Jude 12<sup>16</sup> points in the same direction. In 2 P 2<sup>22</sup> a proverb is quoted which goes back to Heraclitus (P. Wendland, Sitzungsberichte der Berliner Akademie, 1898, pt. xlix.), and the eschatology is partly Stoic (this letter we should perhaps call Hellenistic in the wider sense). The Epistle of James also is Hellenistic in this broad sense, as may be seen in the psychological analysis of temptation (1<sup>14</sup>), in the description of God's unchangeableness (1<sup>17</sup>), in the notion of regeneration (1<sup>18</sup>), in the parables (1-4. 20 3<sup>3</sup>, 4); ἀποκτείνω (1<sup>15</sup>, 18) belongs to the terminology of the Hermetic literature; the 'wheel of nature' (3<sup>6</sup>) is a Stoic term, etc. 1 Clement uses the legend of the phoenix to demonstrate the Christian hope of resurrection.

The Johannine literature, on the other hand, originates in a Palestinian Judaism transplanted into the soil of Asia Minor. There are Hellenistic elements in it (e.g. the notion of the Logos), but they belong to the latest stratum in the development of the Johannine doctrine.

Christianity was thus influenced by Hellenism in various ways: after the Jewish Hellenists of Jerusalem had started it on its world-mission, the Hellenism of the Jewish Diaspora came to their aid, and the Hellenism of the Greek-Roman world received it gladly, after having prepared a way for it. In receiving it, however, Hellenism turned the gospel into a Mystery as it had done with the other Oriental cults. From this point of view Gnosticism and Catholicism are to be understood respectively as a rapid and a slow hellenization of Christianity.

HELLENISTIC AND BIBLICAL GREEK.—1.

Definition.—The term 'Biblical Greek' denotes the language of the Greek versions of the OT, and more especially the LXX, as also that of the NT, with which may be associated the Apocrypha and the works of the Apostolic Fathers. This group of writings, however, is separated from the world of Hellenic culture not so much by any peculiarity of language as by the ideas which find expression in them. In point of fact, Biblical Greek is a deposit of the widely-diffused Hellenistic language—the so-called Koine.

2. The term 'Koine.'—This term is used to signify the Gr. language in its development from the time of Alexander the Great to the close of the ancient period, excluding, of course, the older dialects so far as they survived at all, and excluding also the language of the Atticists (2nd–5th cent. A.D.), who sought to revive the Attic form of speech, but, as children of their age, were unable to free themselves wholly from the influence of the living, i.e. the spoken, tongue. In designating the common language of the Hellenistic period by the single word 'Koine,' we are but following the usage of the ancient grammarians, who employed the expression ἡ κοινὴ διάλεκτος to differentiate the language used by all from Attic, Ionic, Doric, and Æolic.* But as the words κοινὴ, κοινόν, κοινῶς were not employed by the ancients in a uniform way, we may venture to take the term 'Koine' as applying both to the spoken tongue and to its literary form. The literary Koine, of which Polybius may be called the most typical representative, is a compromise between the spoken Koine and the older literary language. This holds good of every text written in the Koine, such works differing among themselves only as regards the degree in which the two elements are intermingled. The so-called Atticists, i.e. the grammarians, such as * Cf. A. Maidhof, Zur Begriffsbestimmung der Koine, Würzburg, 1912, and the criticism of Thumb, in Monatsschrift für höhere Schulen, Berlin, 1913, p. 392 ff.

Moeris, who taught the rules of correct Attic, usually distinguished such words and forms of the Koine as they rejected, by the term Ἑλληνες, as contrasted with the Ἀττικοί, the linguistic forms they approved of; and hence ἑλληνίζειν means 'to speak the Hellenistic language,' and the ἑλληνιστά of Ac 6<sup>1</sup> 9-9 are 'Hellenistic-speaking Jews' (possibly applied also to other Orientals).

3. The geographical domain of the Koine.—The native soil of Biblical Greek, i.e. Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, forms but a part of the great Hellenistic domain, the furthest boundaries of which were nearly coincident with those of Alexander's Empire. The hellenization of those parts of this area which were originally non-Hellenic was, of course, not uniform. It was most complete in Asia Minor, which in the Middle Ages became the home of Byzantine-Greek culture. Even in the Roman Imperial period Asia Minor was almost entirely Greek, and dominated by Greek civilization; nor is this contravened by the fact that the old indigenous languages, such as Phrygian, Cappadocian, etc., were still spoken sporadically until the 5th and 6th centuries. Lycaonian is referred to as a spoken language not only in Ac 14<sup>11</sup>,* but, as late as the 6th cent., in the Legend of St. Martha, while the Celtic dialect of the Galatians was still a living vernacular in the time of Jerome. Holl† rather overestimates the importance of the evidences he gives of this fact, for the dialects in question occupied a position in Hellenic Asia Minor not very different from that of Albanian in Greece at the present day; and, in fact, the importance of these tongues is hardly to be compared with that of Welsh in England, the Phrygian dialect alone surviving in a few short texts (sepulchral inscriptions) dating from the Imperial period. The influence of the ancient languages of Asia Minor upon Greek (i.e. the Koine) was likewise of the slightest.‡ In Syria, as in Egypt, Greek was probably confined in the main to urban districts. In the numerous Hellenistic towns situated between the Phœnician coast and a line to the east of the Lake of Gennesaret and the Jordan—cities like Antioch, Acco, Damascus, and Gadara—the Greek language prevailed, as also did Greek administration, law, and culture. As regards Jewish Palestine, on the other hand, it can hardly be said that there was any real hellenization there at all. The Jews certainly learned Greek as the medium of intercourse and commerce and also for literary purposes, but they retained their Aramaic mother-tongue as well. Jesus and His apostles spoke Aramaic, and preached in Aramaic, though they may not have been ignorant of Greek; as a matter of fact, the ability to use more than one language is not uncommon in the East to-day, even among the lower classes.§ From the fact that Jesus and the apostles spoke Aramaic it is to be inferred that the λόγια Ἰησοῦ and the earliest records of His life were originally composed in Aramaic, and here too there emerges a special problem regarding the character of NT Greek (as also the Greek of the LXX)—a problem which will engage our attention below. But the general character of Biblical Greek can be understood only in relation to its basis in the Koine, and accordingly we must here deal first of all with the sources, the origin, and the character of the latter.

4. Sources for the Koine.—The Koine was a natural outgrowth of classical Greek, yet in its written form, as has been said, it exhibits a compromise between the traditional literary language and the vernacular of the time, and accordingly the extant texts of the Hellenistic period afford at most but indirect evidence as to the true character of the vulgar tongue. It is only what is new in these texts, i.e. what differs from Attic, that we can without hesitation claim for the living language, while, as regards the element in which the written Koine agrees with Attic, we are uncertain to what extent it is to be ascribed to tradition. Nor are the various texts and classes of texts all of the same value for our knowledge of the true forms of the vernacular.

(1) This holds good in a peculiar degree even of the literary productions of the Hellenistic period. The LXX, the NT, and the earliest Christian writings approximate very closely, in a linguistic respect, to the contemporary papyri and inscriptions, and may as a whole be regarded as the most faithful literary reflex of the spoken tongue, while the Atticism which prevailed about the same time took an entirely different direction, and sought to purge literature of all admixture with the vernacular. But even the Atticists, of whom Lucian of Samosata was the most brilliant representative, were unable, with regard to either vocabulary or syntax, to free themselves wholly from the influence of the speech of their day.* But they succeeded in arresting the movement that from the time of Xenophon and Aristotle had been tending to bring the literary language into line with the cosmopolitan development of Attic, that is to say, with the Koine, a development which had been followed even by the New Attic Comedy. The language of Polybius is closely akin to that of contemporary inscriptions; he does justice to the demands which the spoken tongue in its development laid upon literary diction. The philosopher Epicurus,† and Teles the Cynic,‡ as also Philo of Byzantium, the engineer (if he was a contemporary of Archimedes),§ may be regarded as the immediate forerunners of Polybius.

(2) Our best sources for the common tongue, however, are the papyri of Egypt and the inscriptions—more especially those of Asia Minor. A comparison of these two documentary groups shows that the Hellenistic Greek of Egypt differs in no essential respect from that of Asia Minor, and we may therefore safely use the copious discoveries of papyri as throwing light upon the general character of the Greek spoken in the age in which they were written (for details see below). Of papyri and inscriptions alike it may be said that, the less educated the writers, the more faithfully do they reflect the current speech, and accordingly we find great disparity between, e.g., the documents of the Pergamene State and the sepulchral inscriptions of the common people; or, again, between the records of the Egyptian government-offices and the letters written by simple folk. These differences have not yet been studied in detail.

An excellent survey of these sources, with copious references to the literature, is found in Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 6ff. (Eng. tr., 1911, p. 9 ff.). Detailed investigation of their language has made remarkable progress in recent years. (a) Inscriptions: E. Schwyzer (Schweizer), Grammatik der pergamenischen Inschriften, Berlin, 1898; E. Minor would be of great advantage in relation to the NT. (b) Papyri: E. Maysen, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Ptolemäerzeit, Leipzig, 1906; W. Cronert, Memoria graeca Hierulanensis, Leipzig, 1903. (c) From the mass of epigraphic material are to be distinguished, as a special class, the improcatory tablets, which are composed in a very low type of speech. They have been collected by R. Wünsch in the Appendix to the CIA, and by Audolent, Defixionum tabellae, Paris, 1904 (cf. Thumb, in Indogerm. Forsch. Anzeiger, xviii. [1905-06] 41 ff.); as yet only the Attic tablets have been studied philologically: cf. E. Schwyzler, 'Die Vulgarsprache der attischen Fluchtafeln,' in Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum, v. [1900] 244 ff.; Rabehl, De sermone defixionum attic., Berlin, 1906.

(3) Excellent witnesses to the nature of the vernacular are to be found also in the Græco-Latin conversation-books or colloquial guides (ἐμπνεύματα) and glossaries used for the purpose of learning either language, as e.g. the Colloquium Pseudo-Dositheanum* and the Hermeneumata Pseudo-Dositheana.† The abundant Greek material found in the Corpus glossariorum latinorum still awaits expert investigation; it yields much fresh information regarding the vocabulary of the colloquial language.

(4) The remaining sources for the Koine are of second-hand authority, but are not less important. Thus we have the references of the Atticizing grammarians of the Imperial period, as in the Λεξεις Ἀττικαί of Moeris, extracts from the grammarians Phrynichus, and the Ἀντιστικιστής. The object of these writings was to formulate rules for the correct use of classical Attic, and they contrast the latter with the 'common' language. What they reject belongs to the Hellenistic vernacular, as e.g. the forms ἡμην (for ἡν), κρυβω (= κρύπτω); γραῖα (γραῦς), σιχαίνομαι (instead of βδελύττομαι); what they defend and explain is alien to it, as e.g. ἦν, ἔστην, νέστος (instead of νόςτος).

(5) We have another source in the Greek elements which have found their way into Latin, Gothic, Ecclesiastical Slavonic, and Oriental languages. These elements exhibit the features of the language current at the time of their adoption. The Greek words in Gothic, and especially in Old Slavic,‡ reflect certain phonetic characteristics of the Greek current in the North, while those in Armenian, Rabbinical Hebrew, and Coptic exhibit features of the Greek spoken in Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt. These foreign sources have contributed much to the Hellenistic vocabulary, which is enriched not only by fresh meanings, but also by new words and new forms. The Greek elements preserved in the Oriental sources are, as we should expect, of special importance for the study of Biblical Greek; but so far Armenian alone has been thoroughly studied in its bearings on the history of the Greek language.§

(6) The two foregoing sources are surpassed in the value of their contributions by Modern Greek. For the student of the Koine, and therefore also for the investigator of Biblical Greek, a knowledge of Modern Greek is as necessary as a knowledge of the Romance languages for the investigator of vernacular Latin.* The more thorough the study of the modern tongue, the greater the gain for its earlier phase. For Modern Greek, with its dialects (exclusive, however, of the Tsaconic spoken in the Parnon Mts., a descendant of the Laconian dialect), is a natural development of the Koine, and its origins are to be sought therein. The knowledge of Modern Greek, accordingly, enables us to understand many features of the Koine, and to put a proper estimate upon its recorded forms. With the help of the modern language we may reconstruct its Hellenistic basis and thereby supplement in many points the knowledge derived from the contemporary Hellenistic texts. The character of the Koine as a whole is in fact to be inferred from the character of Modern Greek; for, since the dialects of the latter are to be traced, not to the various types of the ancient language, such as Doric, Æolic, and Ionic, but to the Koine, the Koine, the direct deposit of which we find in the inscriptions and the papyri, must have supplanted the ancient dialects, and must have been a common language in the proper sense, i.e. a language spoken by all, as is affirmed by the ancient grammarians. And what holds good of the language as a whole, holds good also of its elements in detail. Thus certain forms in Hellenistic documents—as e.g. ἔλεγον, and the like, in MSS of the LXX and other texts—are proved to have belonged to the spoken Koine by the fact that they survive in Modern Greek. This is true also of words like σιχαίνομαι (Mod. Gr. σιχαίνομαι), which is rejected by the Atticists, and of Lat. loan-words like καλανδαί (in inscriptions; Mod. Gr. τα καλάντα). Some Latin loan-words, as e.g. (δ)σπίτι (hospitium), 'house,' may of course be regarded as having been introduced into the Koine not later than the close of the ancient period. The Hellenistic substitution of να for the infinitive culminates in the Mod. Gr. loss of the infinitive, and it is therefore quite wrong to regard, e.g., every να in Biblical Greek as having the force of the classical final ἵνα—a fact which has a direct bearing upon biblical interpretation. Thus the study of Modern Greek may likewise be of considerable service to the biblical scholar, and may often enable him to decide a doubtful case. If, e.g., the form ἕως is attested as Hellenistic by the ancients, while the NT has ἕως, the Mod. Gr. γυαλί (pron. yali) shows that the NT form too belonged to the Koine.

Moreover, the text of the Bible will occasionally be elucidated by a knowledge of Modern Greek. Thus Wellhausen (Das Ev. Matthæi, Berlin, 1904) conjectures that the ἡ ὥρα παρήλθεν of Mt 14<sup>15</sup> means, not 'the time is past,' but 'the time is advanced'—an explanation which is supported by the Mod. Gr. use of παρά in παρπάνω, 'above'; while the Greek writer Pallis renders the βρώματα of Mk 7<sup>19</sup> not by 'meats,' but in the sense of the homonymous Mod. Gr. word, i.e. as 'stench,' 'filth'—an interpretation which at least merits the attention of exegetes. Modern Greek also throws light upon the question of the Semitisms in Biblical Greek (see below).† The projected thesaurus or idiotikon of Modern Greek, the compilation of which is being subsidized by the Greek Government, will accordingly prove of great service in the study of Biblical Greek, especially as regards the vocabulary.‡

the Koine is the natural development of Attic. As early as the time of the Delian Confederation, Attic had spread beyond the confines of its native region, and Ionic elements—an important feature of the Koine—had already begun to find their way into the Attic vernacular.* In the Attic spoken outside Attica—'Great Attic,' as we might call it—the process of rejuvenescence and fusion was much more rapid, and it was here that the foundations of the Koine were laid.† The resultant modification of Attic appears most clearly in the vocabulary. Similar features had already manifested themselves in the diction of Xenophon and the New Attic Comedy. This modified Attic was used at the Macedonian court before the time of Alexander the Great. But it was in reality the conquests of Alexander and the institution of kingdoms by his successors that diffused the new idiom throughout the Oriental world, and made it the universal language of Hellenism. It is nevertheless quite wrong to assert that this language was created by the Macedonians. The Macedonian contribution is barely discernible, and cannot in any case have been large; it perhaps included the suffix -ισσα in βασιλισσα. In this process of expansion the Attic, as might be expected, lost some of its characteristic features. Thus the σ found in most of the dialects, including Ionic, more and more superseded the Attic ττ (which is almost obsolete in Mod. Gr.), and non-Attic forms showing ρ intermingled with forms showing ρρ. Hence σρ prevails—in accordance with the papyri—in the LXX, which, however, still retains ἥττων and ἐλάττων; while we also find here ἄρσην and (rarely) ἄρην, θαρῶ, and (rarely) θαρῶ. In the NT likewise ττ occurs rarely, while e.g. θαρῶ and θαρῶ are both in use. That the use of ρρ was not due to the influence of the literary language is shown by Mod. Gr. θαρῶ alongside of σερνικός (= αρσενικός).

The Koine developed more rapidly in the hellenized lands outside Greece than upon its native soil, where the indigenous dialects offered some degree of resistance to its growth. But by the time when the uniform Ionic-Attic alphabet was adopted (400–350 B.C.), the Attic was asserting its power everywhere, and from the 4th cent. B.C. till about the 2nd cent. A.D. the dialects were gradually dispossessed, and at last swallowed up, by the Koine; in its foreign domains, however, the Koine had prevailed from the outset, and had thus gained a marked ascendancy alike as regards culture and as regards the numbers of those who spoke it. The absorption of the dialects did not proceed everywhere at the same pace. The Ionic succumbed most rapidly; the Doric resisted longest: in the Doric area, in fact, there emerged first of all a Doric Koine, which wedged itself also into the non-Doric Arcadia, between the ancient Arcadian dialect and the common Attic tongue. The various aspects of this whole process of development may be traced in the inscriptions. In many localities, as e.g. Crete and Rhodes, the gradual subsidence of dialectic forms which is traceable in the inscriptions reflects the changes in the living language. In other parts, as e.g. Boeotia, the inscriptions reveal a marked linguistic break, thus indicating either that the local dialect, though no longer spoken, was kept alive for a time as a literary language, or that the Koine had been introduced as a written language before the dialect had entirely disappeared.‡

The process of absorption, of course, could not but react upon the Koine itself. But it is quite wrong to suppose, with P. Kretschmer (Die Entstehung der Koine), that the Koine arose from a manifold intermingling of the various Gr. dialects. This hypothesis finds no real support either in the documents of the Koine or in Modern Greek. Thus, to take but a single instance, Kretschmer, in citing the Mod. Gr. accentuation in ἀνθρώποι (= ἀνθρωποι), ἐφάγαν (= ἐφαγον) as a survival of the ancient Doric accentuation, overlooks the fact that other Mod. Gr. accentual changes of the same kind, as in ἀνθρώπων, ἐφαγαμε, have nothing to do with Doric at all; so that, if the latter forms are due to the operation of analogy (in conformity with ἀνθρώπος, ἐφαγαν), the examples cited by Kretschmer must be explained in the same way, i.e. as due to accentual shifting on the analogy of ἀνθρώπους, ἐφάγαμεν. What took place in the districts of the ancient dialects was simply that the Koine was at first slightly coloured by the native idiom; and doubtless this local character showed itself still more plainly in the pronunciation, just as, e.g., the domicile of those who speak English—whether it be the north of England, the south of England, Scotland, or North America—can be inferred from their 'accent,' even though they use the forms of the literary language. But the recognizable provincialisms of these local Koine types left only the slightest traces in the process of development towards Modern Greek, the reason being that they had no source of support outside their native region. Thus, e.g., as early as the 3rd cent. B.C. the veterans in the Arsinoite Nome of Egypt—men drawn from the most diverse quarters of Greece—wrote the Koine without any admixture of dialectic forms. Taken all in all, the elements derived from the local dialects of the Koine—apart from the Ionic—are confined to certain forms, such as λαος, ναός, λατομία, the preposition ἐναντι, and a few special words, as e.g. βουνός (attested for Cyrene and Sicily by the ancients).

We cannot easily determine the influence of the vocabularies of the various dialects, as these vocabularies are much less known to us than that of Attic. It was the Ionic dialect alone that, from the period of the Attic naval league, made a distinct contribution to the development of the Koine. But even in the case of Ionic, the extent of its dialectical influence cannot always be defined with precision. Thus, while forms like σφυρής in the LXX and the NT, or δρουρής in early Christian literature, seem to bear a genuinely Ionic character, they may well be later variations formed on the analogy of δόξα, δόξης; θάλαττα, θαλάττης, and the like (cf. Moulton, Einleitung, p. 70 f.). On the other hand, words like βάθρακος, πάθηη, νοσός indicate clearly the phonetic form of Ionic, while, again, e.g. the aorist ἔρικον (in the papyri) instead of ἠμεγκον, and the preference for nouns in -μα are Ionic, or at all events not Attic, features. A specially characteristic indication of Ionic influence appears in the inflexion of nouns in -ας, -ᾶδος and -ους, -οῦδος. Such syntactical usages as the preference of ἵνα to ὅπως and the final infinitive (e.g. Mt 5<sup>17</sup>: οὐκ ἤλθον καταλυσαι, ἀλλὰ πληρῶσαι) may likewise be shown to be Ionic. Of most importance, however, are the Ionic elements of the vocabulary, as it is these that give the Koine a character different from that of Attic. Thus a calculation of Schlageter (Der Wortschatz, etc.) shows that the Attic inscriptions outside Attica (till 200 B.C.) contain 18% of Attic, 18% of new (Hellenistic), and a little over 6% of Ionic, but only 75% of distinctively Doric words. The proportion of Ionic words increases till about 250 B.C., and then decreases, so that the process of interfusion virtually ceased about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C.

This feature of the Koine appears, as we might expect, also in Biblical Greek. Words like ἀπαρτίζω (in ἀπαρτισμός), εκτρώμα, κοπάζω (of the wind), ολυνθος, σανδάλιον, σκορπίζω, etc., in the LXX or NT are of Ionic origin. The Ionic element includes, further, the so-called poetical words of the Koine, i.e. Hellenistic words which formerly were to be found only in the poets, but which from the fact of their occurrence in papyrus texts concerned with matters of everyday life, and partly also from the fact of their survival in Modern Greek, are now seen to have belonged to the colloquial language. They include, e.g., βαρέω, ἐντρέπομαι, θαμβέω, μεσονύκτιον, πειράζω, ράκος, ὠρύσμαι in the LXX and the NT, and ἀλέκτωρ, βαστάζω, ἐριφος, φαντάζω, φημίζω in the NT. Words of this class were imported, first, from the literary Ionic of the earlier period into the language of poetry, and then again from the vernacular Ionic of the later period into the Koine, and there was no direct link of connexion between the two processes.* In the literary criticism of the Hellenistic writers, and especially of the biblical books, the facts just indicated yield an important guiding principle, viz. that their use of Ionic words does not argue a knowledge of, or any dependence upon, the earlier Ionic literature. The fact, e.g., that St. Luke makes use of medical terms found in Hippocrates and other physicians in no way implies a study of medical writings ('Luke the physician'), but only some acquaintance with the ordinary terminology of his age; many such medical words, indeed, as e.g. ἐγκυος, στέιρα, or βελόνη ('the surgeon's needle') had passed into such general use in the vernacular that they prove nothing more than St. Luke's familiarity with the language of his time.

6. The influence of foreign languages.—The Koine may thus be defined as a development of Attic under the influence of Ionic. But as it spread to non-Hellenic lands, such as Asia Minor and Egypt, we must, finally, inquire as to the influence upon it of the languages of these countries, and as to foreign influence generally. Just as the Celts of Gaul exercised an influence upon the grammar and vocabulary of French (the vulgar Latin of Gaul), so, we might expect, would the Koine be affected by the native populations of Asia Minor and Egypt. The Greek spoken by these 'barbarians' shows traces of their own manner of speech in the confusion of i and e sounds, and of tenuēs, mediæ, and aspirates (r, δ, θ). Of such modification, however, very little found its way into the general development of Greek. Probably the pronunciation of πεντε as pende, and of λαμπρος as lambros, and the like, which make their first appearance in the dialect of Pamphylia, as also the development of υ into ι, arose in Asia Minor; the disregard of the distinction between long and short vowels (ω and ο, etc.) perhaps in Asia Minor and Egypt. It was once more the vocabulary that was appreciably affected by foreign languages—the natural result of intercourse. Yet, after all—apart from the local use of Egyptian words in Egyptian Greek—the Oriental languages contributed to the Greek vocabulary in Hellenistic times hardly any more than in the classical period; the converse influence, e.g. in Rabbinical Hebrew, was incomparably greater. In Biblical Greek likewise, Semitic elements are scarcely more prominent than elsewhere. We note, e.g., ἀγαπεύω and παράδεισος, which are of Persian origin; ἄραβων, θήβη, κάβος, νάβλα, σώρακος (Semi.), and βαῖον, στίμμι (Egypt.); but these words are also found in other documents of the Koine; while, of course, words like ἄββας, ἀμήν, γένενα, πάσχα, σάββατον (σάμβατον) found their way into the Greek world through the Jewish Christian sphere of ideas. It was from this sphere also that the names of the days of the week (ἡλίου ἡμέρα, σελήνης ἡμέρα, etc.), together with the week of seven days itself, came to the Greeks, and then spread to the rest of Europe.*

As contrasted with the Oriental, the Latin contribution forms a noticeable element in the Koine. Again, it is true, the grammatical influence was of the slightest. A number of suffixes, such as -ατος, -αρις, -ουρα, -ισιος (Lat. -atus, -arius, -ura, -ensis), were introduced into Greek through the medium of Lat. loan-words, and came to be used with Gr. stems. From the beginning of the Roman sway in Greece to the close of the ancient period, Roman politics and traffic imported a constantly increasing number of Latin words into Greek, and how effectively many of these became naturalized is shown by their survival in Modern Greek. In this respect likewise Biblical Greek reflects the conditions of the common Hellenistic language; in the NT we find, e.g., καῖσαρ, κεντυρίων, λεγεών, πραιτώριον, κῆνσος, κοδράντης, ονηρίον, μίλιον, λέντιον, σουδάριον, φραγέλλιον. That the influence of Latin on Palestinian Greek was by no means slight is attested indirectly by the number of Lat. words more or less naturalized in the Rabbinical literature, and, as appears from their form, introduced through the medium of Greek. Latinisms were occasionally formed by translation ('loan-renderings'), and just as the κεντυρίων is called a ἐκατόνταρχος in Lk 23<sup>47</sup>, so we may regard το ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν (Mk 15<sup>15</sup>) and ἐργασίαν οὐναί as translations of Lat. satisfacere and operam dare respectively. The extra-biblical literature of early Christianity likewise shows the influence of Latin, and is as yet free from puristic tendencies; thus, e.g., Ignatius does not hesitate to adopt δεσέρτωρ, δεπόσιτα ('pledge') from military usage, or ἐξεμπλῆριον ('legally valid copy') from the language of law.†

7. Local variations of the Koine.—In order to answer the question whether Biblical Greek shows a definite local character, we must first of all inquire whether local variations or even dialects existed in the colloquial Koine. We certainly cannot look for such differences in the written texts of a cosmopolitan language, as it lies in the very nature of a written language to tend towards uniformity. Our investigation must therefore carefully take account of all phenomena that could be regarded as pointing to local variation. In view of the wide expansion of the Koine, it is natural to suppose that local varieties would exist, i.e. that the common language would not be spoken in exactly the same way in Egypt, Asia Minor (Syria), and in the ancient Attic, Ionic, and Doric areas, since the ancient dialects themselves or the languages of the barbarians who had just learned to speak Greek would lend a certain colouring, in pronunciation at least, to the Koine of the various regions. And, as a matter of fact, we are able, partly with the help of Modern Greek, to determine the existence of a number of such local variations. Thus the Greek-speaking Egyptians and Asiatics could not keep the e and i sounds * distinct (a phenomenon which, however, had nothing to do with itacism), and confounded tenuēs, mediæ, and aspirates, probably substituting tenuēs, or unvoiced mediæ, for the last two groups. The η had a close and an open sound, the latter probably in the East, as may be inferred from the pronunciation of η as e in the modern dialect of Pontus; υ was pronounced as i, u and u (iu), though it is impossible to define the local limits of the variations. Similarly, the intrusion of an inter-vocalic γ (as in κλαίγω [= κλαίω]) found in a papyrus of the 2nd cent. B.C.) was merely local, as is shown by Modern Greek; while the sound-change of λ into ρ as in ἀδελφός = ἀδελφός, and the substitution of a single for a duplicated consonant, cannot have been universal in the Koine, since the λ is still retained in the East (Cappadocia and Pontus), and the double letter in the south-east (Cyprus, Rhodes, etc.) of the Modern Greek area. Finally, the retention and omission of final ν must each have had their own local distribution. As regards inflexions, we may draw attention to the Egyptian declension in -ας, -ᾶτος as compared with the Ionic -ας, -αδος (imparisyllabic nouns of this class are not found in the NT). Further, forms like γέγοναν on the one hand, and ἐπηλθασι on the other, as also ἤλθσαν and the like, indicate that, as in Modern Greek, different regions of the Koine levelled the personal endings in different ways. As yet, however, the clearest evidence that by the end of the ancient period the Koine had already split up into actual dialects, in which lay the germs of the dialects of to-day, is found in the imprecation-tablets of Cyprus (3rd. cent. A.D.), the language of which shows traces of both the ancient and the modern dialect of that island.†

But while recent investigation has thus succeeded in proving the existence of local varieties of the Koine, it must refuse to recognize the so-called varieties whose existence has been maintained from ancient times, viz. the Alexandrian and Macedonian dialects. What was regarded, alike in ancient and in modern times, as characteristic of these dialects is found to have belonged to no special region, but to the common Hellenistic language. Not even the stock example ἐραυνᾶω (= ἐρευνᾶω) can be claimed for the Alexandrian dialect—let alone Alexandrian Jewish-Greek—as that phonetic form has been traced, e.g., in the Koine of Thera.

8. Biblical Greek as a local variety of the Koine.—We now come to the question how Biblical Greek is related to these local idioms. It is not possible to describe the Greek Bible as the monument of a distinct dialect of the Koine, and still less as the monument of an Alexandrian or Palestinian Jewish-Greek, or of a special 'Christian Greek.' Of the existence of an Alexandrian Jewish-Greek there is no real evidence at all, as was first explicitly proved by Deissmann (see Lit.). Psichari (see Lit.), who has recently investigated the problem, could find no support for the theory that in particular the translators of the OT spoke a Jewish Greek, and so occasionally introduced Hebraisms into their version. The language of the LXX is in reality a 'translation-Greek,' and cannot therefore be adduced as proving the existence of a Jewish variety of the colloquial Koine; nor is all our wider knowledge of the Greek spoken in Palestine, whether derived from direct or indirect sources, sufficient to warrant us in speaking of it as a distinct type; at most it may be described as the Syrian Koine. Biblical Greek, moreover, is by no means identical with what we have been able to establish regarding the Greek of the Palestinian Jews, for the particular change of meaning which certain Greek words underwent in Rabbinical usage does not appear in those words as used in Biblical Greek; thus, e.g., λειτουργία in the Rabbinical literature means 'service rendered'; in the Bible (as in Greek generally), 'religious service.'

It is a controversy some centuries old whether the language of the Bible bears a 'Hebrew' colouring or not; the so-called 'Purists' sought to demonstrate the classical, the Hebraists the hebraizing, character of Biblical Greek. The theory of the 'specific quality' of NT Gr. acquired a certain theological importance in virtue of the pointed expression which it received at the hands of R. Rothe, viz. that the NT speaks in the language of the Holy Ghost, who 'framed for Himself a quite distinct religious idiom by transforming the linguistic elements which lay ready for Him, as also the already existent concepts, into a medium appropriate to Him.'* The research of the last fifteen years has shown more and more conclusively that the question in debate was wrongly put, since neither classical Greek nor a supposed Jewish Greek is to be regarded as the foundation of Biblical Greek. To Deissmann (see Lit.) is due the merit of having brought clear principles to bear upon the subject, inasmuch as he showed that Biblical Greek cannot be treated as an isolated phenomenon, and assigned it a place in the general process of a great natural development of language. First of all, as regards the so-called Hebraisms, or, more accurately, Semitisms, the examples usually adduced are either simply fallacious or else indecisive. Leaving out of account the pedantic and barbarous literalism in translations of certain parts of the OT (as e.g. the tr. of Aquila, who renders אֵל, the sign of the Heb. accusative, by συν), we must admit that the syntax of the LXX has not been modified by the original in any undue degree; thus even the construction προσθιέναι with the infinitive (Heb. לִי יִרְדּוּ with inf.) cannot be regarded as non-Greek.† Detailed investigation shows that the translators were quite able to keep themselves free from bondage to their original, and that they strove with success to represent the Hebrew form of expression by an excellent Greek diction (cf. Johannesson, in Lit.). In the NT, again, evidences of a Hebrew ground-colour have proved even less cogent, as is now increasingly recognized. The statement of B. Weiss that the Fourth Gospel has a 'hebraisierender Grundton' has been recently challenged by Wellhausen (Das Evangelium Johannis, Berlin, 1908). In point of fact, the more thoroughly we work through the papyri, the smaller grows the number of alleged Hebraisms; we need cite only the constructions ἐν μάχῃ and ἐν τῷ ὄνματι. That modes of expression which really occur in Greek, though but rarely, or only in special circumstances, should be found more frequently in Biblical Greek when they happen to coincide with Hebrew usage (as e.g. ἰοῦν) need occasion no surprise; it is natural enough in translations or reproductions from foreign languages.‡ Even the vocative ὁ θεός, the use of which in Biblical Greek is explained by Wackernagel§ as an imitation of Hebrew, may be brought under this general law, since ὁ θεός occurs as a vocative—though with a different shade of meaning—also in Greek; while the predicative εἰς, and such expressions as κρίτης

adikias, 'the unjust judge,' have likewise certain points of contact with Greek, and therefore cannot rightly be described as non-Greek Hebraisms or barbarisms.

In the NT, the phenomenon just explained, viz. that relatively rarer forms of expression occur more frequently in Biblical Greek, is one that may be expected with special frequency in those parts that rest on an Aramaic original. But the question whether certain parts of the NT go back to an Aramaic original is one in which the Hebraisms necessarily play a leading part, and which cannot be effectively solved until the full complement of the Hebraisms has been established beyond dispute. Thus, e.g., the monotonous sequence of narrative by means of καί clauses in no sense proves the presence of the Semitic genius of language—often as that assertion has been made. Exact statistical investigations, such as alone could avail us here, are still lacking. Probably the best foundation for such investigations would be the arrangement of words, and especially the position of the verb; and, as a matter of fact, the frequent occurrence of the verb at the beginning of clauses in the Gospel narrative seems to be at variance with ordinary Greek usage, and to have been influenced by the Hebrew diction, though at the same time it is not unknown in Greek.*

The influence of Hebrew upon the phraseology of Biblical Greek is clearly manifest only in the LXX, though there also every particular instance demands the most careful scrutiny.† In the NT the formation of new words to represent special Christian ideas is quite an unimportant element. Deissmann estimates the number of 'biblical words' in the NT as no more than one per cent. Christianity was able to formulate its distinctive conceptions (e.g. σωτηρ, ευαγγέλιον) in the spirit and with the linguistic resources of the Koine; as Deissmann rightly observes, it had not so much a word-forming as a word-transforming power. But such alteration in the meaning of existent words takes place in all cases where a profound change occurs in the civilization—including, of course, also the concepts and ideas—of a people. The discussion of such phenomena forms a chapter of ordinary semasiology, for Biblical Greek does not differ in this respect from Gr. in general. In many cases the NT merely carries forward in Christian concepts the religious signification which had already been fully developed in the extra-Christian Koine, as e.g. in σωτηρ, 'saviour';‡ for other examples see the works of Deissmann.

How the study of the Koine texts furthers our knowledge in this field is shown also by G. Thieme, Die Inschriften von Magnesia am Mäander und das NT, Göttingen, 1906, and J. Rouffiac, Recherches sur les caractères du grec dans le NT d'après les inscriptions de Priène, Paris, 1911.

Biblical Greek, then, corresponds to the Hellenistic Greek of the age in phonetics, morphology, syntax, and vocabulary. As, however, the LXX took form in Egypt and the NT on Asiatic soil, it is of course conceivable that the pronunciation and idiom of the Egyptian and Asiatic Greeks would now and again assert themselves, just as, e.g., the literary German of the Austrians can be distinguished from that of the Northern Germans. But, for one thing, the written text is too imperfect a representation of the actual pronunciation, and, for another, our knowledge of the finer provincial differences in the vocabulary and syntax of the Koine is too meagre, to enable us to trace abnormalities in the biblical Koine with certainty. In one respect, however, we may speak of a dialectal modification in biblical texts: the MS tradition of sounds and forms is not homogeneous. Each particular MS betrays the influence of the language, the period, and the country of the writer; while in certain phonetic features, such as the confusion of mediae, tenues, and aspirates, or the confusion of i (ει, ι) and υ, οι, and of ε and η, some of the older MSS of the NT (e.g. A and N) indicate their Egyptian or Asiatic origin. It should also be noted that in the LXX we find, e.g., the λεκανη of B appearing as λακανη in A; that accusatives like νυκταν and βασιλειαν are met with only in A and N, and that differences appear even in the selection of words, as where κανουν and ενεχεεν in A correspond to κοφινον and εβαλεν in B. To what extent the original text itself was affected by the local idiom of the writers (or translators) can be determined only by means of a detailed investigation of the MSS. Thus the accusative form νυκταν may quite possibly be due to the translators of the OT, or to some of them, but that they actually used it (as Psichari* believes) is meanwhile difficult to prove. In view of the fact that the linguistic form of the several MSS still awaits precise investigation, such apparent trifles as, e.g., the ν εφεκκυστικόν or the dropping of γ between vowels, and such variants as ελαβαν, ελαβασι, ελαβοσαν, must not be overlooked.

Possibly, however, we may be more successful with the question regarding the provincial idiom of the biblical writers, if we examine the syntactical features, as the MS tradition would be less likely to infringe upon the original text in that respect. A noteworthy fact, observed by Radermacher,† is that the use of the article as a relative—a usage authenticated in Attic inscriptions of the 4th cent. A.D. and here and there in Koine texts—seems to be foreign to the NT. Further, the final infinitive, which is a favourite construction in the Ionic of Homer, but is seldom used in Attic, appears with great frequency in the NT, though the substitution of iva for the infinitive in other constructions had developed in a marked degree. Now it is a remarkable fact that the final infinitive is found to depend upon verbs of the same class alike in the NT, in the early Byzantine author Malalas of Syria, and in the Pontic dialect of to-day (the only dialect that still retains the infinitive). This suggests the inference that there was an eastern Koine dialect marked inter alia by its retention of the infinitive, and that the language of the NT was more closely akin to that dialect than to the other branches of the Koine, which discarded the infinitive altogether, and in this respect paved the way for Modern Greek usage. Another and perhaps even more characteristic phenomenon is that the Fourth Gospel makes very frequent use of the adjectival pronoun ἐμός, and that similarly the Acta Johannis and Acta Philippi prefer the adjectival ός, while the rest of the NT writings, like Modern Greek, usually employ the genitives μου and σου. As the adjectival possessives are now retained only by the dialects of Pontus and Cappadocia, we may regard the authors of the Fourth Gospel and the other two works just named—in view of their preference for ἐμός and ός—as having belonged to Asia Minor.

It is therefore possible, with the aid of grammatical characteristics, to assign a particular book of the Bible to a definite portion of the Koine area. We thus at the same time trench upon, and, in principle at least, give an affirmative answer to, the question whether the various constituent parts of the Greek Bible may—not only as regards their style but also as regards their grammar—be distinguished from one another in such a way as to warrant us in associating their writers with different districts. Investigation of the local varieties of the Koine (see above) has not yet yielded such results as would enable us to deal with the problem on a comprehensive scale. So far as individuality of diction has as yet been noted in the various biblical writers, it would seem to involve nothing more than differences in culture and in stylistic tendencies: compare, e.g., the Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the Epistle to the Hebrews. J. H. Moulton has called attention to such differences,* while H. St. J. Thackeray† has successfully utilized the occurrence or non-occurrence of certain words as a means of breaking up the Greek version of the OT into groups which must have come from distinct hands. The next task of the investigator, however, will be to examine the syntax and vocabulary of the several parts of the Greek OT and NT with reference to the question whether they cannot be brought into relation also with local and chronological modifications of the Koine. A beginning has been made in the works of Thieme and Rouffiac already named.

9. The more important grammatical peculiarities of Biblical Greek.—The definition of Biblical Greek as a monument of the Koine is in no way affected by the discussions of the foregoing paragraph, and a grammatical study of the former gives us a good idea of the Koine in general as contrasted with Attic Greek.‡

(A) Phonetics.—(1) Itacism had become a fairly common feature of Greek pronunciation in Asia Minor and Egypt by the beginning of the 2nd century; ei was pronounced as i, ai as e (a), and oi as u (a sound resembling u, but incapable of being more precisely determined).§ The η was still an e sound, but in the countries named was sometimes confused with i (i, ei), as the latter had there a very open pronunciation. The itacistic development is reflected in such biblical modes of spelling as ἰδον (είδον), Δαυείδ, ἀνάπειρος=ἀνάπηρος, ῥάδῃ (also ῥέδῃ), ἀνύγω (also ἀνοίγω). Probably av and ev were still pronounced as true diphthongs, i.e. as au, eu. Of the consonants, φ, χ, β, and γ still retained their original values, viz. p+h, k+h, b and g; the native Egyptians and Asiatics made no distinction between these and the corresponding unvoiced explosives p and k (see above), though the Modern Greek aspirate pronunciation of β and γ had already found a footing: cf. ἀνοίει for ἀνοίγει in LXX; and for δ and θ, the English pronunciation of voiced and voiceless th would seem to have prevailed in NT times. ζ was like the English z (voiced s); cf. the MS form **Ζυμύνα*. (2) The distinction between long and short vowels was no longer maintained in colloquial speech; but in the LXX ο and ω are seldom confused. (3) Peculiarities in the usage of vowels: **τεσσαράκοντα* (for τεσσαράκοντα); **πιάζω* (= πιέζω), 'I seize'; **ταμείον*=ταμείον; **υγεία*=υγεία; **νοσός*=νοσός. (4) Consonantal peculiarities: **γίνομαι* and **γινώσκω*; καθ' ἑτος, **καθ' ἰδίαν*; ἐφέλπιδα (ἐφ' ἡλπίσω, LXX); **ἀφιδεύιν* (the spiritus asper is transferred from ἡμέρα, ἀφορώ). The relation of **ἄρκος* to ἄρκτος is obscure. Examples of οιθεῖς (ουθεῖς also used) are more frequent in the LXX than in the NT, and this corresponds to the usage of the Koine in their respective periods.

(B) Inflection.—(1) For the vocative δ θεός see † op. cit. i. 6 ff.

‡ In what follows, a star (*) placed before the word indicates that the form is found in both the LXX and the NT; forms not so distinguished are in the NT.

§ The occasional use of υ for ov in papyri (cf. δουλος for δούλος in LXX, 1 K 1421) shows that it was akin to u, but at an early period it had also the value of i in Asia and Egypt.

above, § 8. Observe τὸ (for ὁ) ἔλεος, and the like. νοός is declined νοός, νοί after the example of βοός, βοός. (2) For νόκταν, **χείραν*, βασιλέαν, etc., see above. (3) τὸ ἄλλας (for ὁ αλς); δρυξ for δρυς is perhaps a Dorism. (4) Verbs in -μι went gradually out of use, as is attested by the MS readings ιστάω (LXX), ιστάνω, **ἀφίω*, **συνίω*, δυνύω. In the inflexion of εἶμι we find an imp. mid. ἤμην. The earliest unmistakable use of ἐνι (= ἐνεστι), from which arose the Mod. Gr. εἶναι, 'he is,' instead of ἐστί is found in the NT; the imperative is ἦτω (for ἔστω). (5) στήκω (Mod. Gr. στέκω), the use of which is better attested in the NT than in the LXX, is an innovation formed from ἔστηκα, and on the analogy of ἦκω, which could be inflected like a perfect (LXX ἦκαμεν and ἦκατε). (6) Contracted verbs: **πεινᾶν* and **διψᾶν*, but **ζην*; the Hellenistic χρᾶσθαι is but meagrely attested in Biblical Greek. (7) The spelling χύννω (LXX χύνω) is of special interest, as presents with νν occur also in the Cyprian dialect of to-day, i.e. in Eastern Greek. (8) Personal endings: (a) the ending -σαν extends far beyond its original usage, but occurs more frequently in the LXX (ἤλθοσαν, ἐφ' ἔρσαν, ἐγεννώσαν, ὠμιλοῦσαν) than in the NT (εἰχόσαν, ἐθορυβοῦσαν): in Mod. Gr. it is confined to contracted verbs; (b) the terminations of the first and second aorists begin to coalesce, e.g. **εὐραμεν*, **εἰδαμεν*; as found in the imperfect (e.g. **ἔλεγον*), we cannot be so sure that they belong to the original text; (c) in 3rd plur. perf. we sometimes find -αν for -αι, as in **ἔώρακαν*, **ἔγέγοναν*.

(C) Syntax.—(1) Indications of the decreasing use of the dative are the occasional confusion between εἰς with acc., and ἐν with dat., the preference for the gen. and the acc. after prepositions taking three cases, and the growing use of the acc. after verbs like **χρᾶσθαι*, καταρᾶσθαι, ἐνεδρεῖναι. After certain verbs, moreover, the acc. tends to supersede the gen., as e.g. κρατεῖν, καταδικάζειν τινά. (2) A prepositional construction sometimes takes the place of simple noun with case, as e.g. ἐσθλὴν ἐκ τοῦ ἄρτου, ἀπέχεσθαι ἀπὸ. (3) The aorist, in comparison with the imp. indic., is more frequently used than in the classical period; the use of the aorist in a perfective sense is made distinct by prepositions, thus πραγματευσάσθαι (Lk 1913), 'trade with,' but διαπραγματευσάσθαι (v.16), 'gain by trading.' This force of the preposition explains also why a preposition is more frequently attached to the aorist than to the present stem; but presents with aoristic force could be formed in a similar way: cf. τὸν μισθὸν ἀπέχουσι (Mt 6-5.16), 'they have received their reward'; ἀπέχω is used in a like sense in receipts found among the papyri. A characteristic feature of the LXX and NT is that they always employ the aorist imperative in invocations of God—a usage to which we find an analogy in Homer. (4) The extent to which the perfect was used in Biblical Greek with the force of the aorist is disputed; the usage of Hellenistic Greek generally rather favours the aoristic function (as e.g. of **εἰληφα*, **ἔσχηκα*) in Biblical Greek as well. (5) The optative was obsolescent, alike in principal and in subordinate clauses; its disuse is more marked in the NT than in the LXX. (6) The infinitive shows no sign of decay in the LXX; but in the NT it is widely (as in Mod. Gr. always) superseded by ἵνα, hence e.g. ζητῶ ἵνα, παρακαλῶ ἵνα; to look for a purposive force in every ἵνα in Biblical Greek is a mistake. The infinitive with the article, however, is common also in the NT, and it may be remarked that a number of old infinitive forms survive in Mod. Gr. as nouns, e.g. τὸ φιλεῖν—τὸ φιλεῖν, 'the kiss.' (7) The present participle active shows a tendency to become rigid (the Mod. Gr. λέγοντας is indeclinable), as e.g. in Jn 157: μένον ἐν ἐμοὶ κάγω (μένω) ἐν αὐτῷ. A remarkable feature is the use of the participle without copula as a predicate.* As this usage is not only found in papyri, but is still very common in Malalas, it was probably a peculiarity of the Eastern Koine. (8) The wealth of particles characteristic of the classical language has been largely lost. The Gospels, like the popular tales of Modern Greek, generally exhibit a simple co-ordination of clauses, either without connectives or connected by καί, τότε, δέ, μετά τούτο, ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ. As already said, it is quite wrong to regard this feature—and in particular the frequent use of καί—as a Hebraism, the paratactic sequence of clauses being in reality a characteristic of simple popular narrative.† (9) In Biblical Greek the verb would seem to head the sentence more frequently than in Greek generally. Its initial position may well be due in part to Semitic influence (see above), but we must on this point await the results of a more searching and detailed investigation.

While the LXX and the NT belong to the same linguistic milieu, yet, as has been more than once noted in the foregoing grammatical sketch, they exhibit features indicative of their respective stages of development. In general, we may regard the contemporary papyri as providing the nearest parallels to each, though the LXX is occasionally more archaic than the papyri of its age; thus, while we find in it the forms ἡκαμεν, ἡκατε, ἡκασι, we do not find as yet ἡκέναι, ἡκότων. No comparison has yet been made between the LXX and the NT as to the relative frequency of the linguistic changes in each—an undertaking for which the MS tradition would have to provide the basis; such a comparison would be the most reliable means of measuring the interval between the two groups of texts.

10. Post-Biblical Greek.—In certain productions of early Christian literature outside the NT canon (the NT Apocrypha, the Apostolic Fathers) the neologisms of the Koine bulk more largely than in the biblical writings, so that these non-canonical works must be regarded as belonging to a later linguistic stratum; with regard to particular books, however, it is more difficult than in the case of the LXX and NT to determine what is to be set down to the MS tradition, i.e. to decide whether forms like λέγουσι (= λέγουσι) in the Acts of Pilate, or ἡγάπουσι (= ἐγάπων) in the Acts of Thomas, were not originally due to later copyists. Apart from this, the linguistic differences found in the several writings of this group themselves, and the linguistic differences between this group and the NT canon, are marked only by larger or smaller concessions to the literary language of the educated. It is no doubt true that, even in the NT, Luke is distinguished from the other Gospels by a certain inclination to Atticism, and that other early Christian productions likewise reflect the literary tendencies of the age. Nevertheless, there was at the outset a sharply marked contrast between Biblical Greek and the literary language of the period; the Atticism (see above) then coming into vogue aimed at the revival of the classical (Attic) diction, and the cultured heathen looked down scornfully upon the 'barbarous sailor-speech' of primitive Christianity (βαρβαρίζουσα κατὰ κρατος καὶ σολοικίζουσα and ὀνοματοποιαὶς ξένας συντεταγμένη).‡ But just as in the succeeding centuries the youthful and revolutionary spirit of Christianity allied itself more and more with Greek philosophy and culture, and came at length to be quite hellenized, so too the language of Christianity soon lost that charm of originality and naïve freshness which is characteristic of Biblical Greek. It is, in fact, only in the Lives of the Saints and similar productions that we still hear the speech of the simple people to whom the earliest preachers of the gospel appealed.* The great teachers of the Church turned aside from the unschooled language of the Gospels, and adopted the style of cultured heathenism; in other words, they followed the literary fashion of Atticism. Even the early apologist Tatian aspired to be an Atticist, though his success in that direction was but meagre;† while Chrysostom actually gave an Atticistic form to his quotations from Scripture.‡ The development in the language of Greek Christianity from the NT to the close of antiquity is a faithful reflexion of the process through which the Christian religion itself passed. In the course of a few centuries the faith of humble fisher-folk became the dominant religion of the Græco-Roman world, and, passing from its native lowliness to the highest places, it paid its tribute to the culture of its new sphere.

HELMET.—See ARMOUR.

HELPS.—'Help' (ἀντιληψις) is fairly common in the LXX, in the Psalms, and in 2 and 3 Maccabees. In Sir 11<sup>12</sup> 51<sup>7</sup> we have persons who are in need of ἀντιληψις. The plural ἀντιληψεις occurs in 1 Co 12<sup>8</sup>, coupled with 'governments,' and nowhere else in the NT. The verb from which it comes (ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι) is found in Lk 1<sup>64</sup> in a quotation from the LXX, where it is frequent; also in Ac 20<sup>35</sup> in a speech of St. Paul. The verb means 'to take firm hold of' some one in order to help (1 Ti 6<sup>1</sup> is different); and by 'helps' or 'helpings' St. Paul probably means the succouring of those in need, as poor, sick, and bereaved persons. Perhaps the helping of those in mental perplexity or spiritual distress, and all whom St. Paul calls 'the weak,' is also included. H. Cremer (Bibl.-Theol. Lex.<sup>3</sup>, 1880, p. 386) is mistaken in saying that this sense of 'helping' is 'unknown in classical Greek': it is frequent in papyri, in petitions to the Ptolemys (G. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 92). The Greek commentators are also mistaken in interpreting 'helpings' as meaning deacons, and 'governings' as meaning elders; such definite official distinctions had not yet arisen. St. Paul is speaking of personal gifts. He is not speaking of select persons whom he or the congregation had appointed to any office; and neither he nor they can confer the gifts; that is the work of the Spirit. He exhorts the whole congregation to 'continue to desire earnestly the greater gifts'; and individuals might receive more than one gift from the Spirit.

We have an instance of the gift of 'helping' in Stephanas and his household (1 Co 16<sup>15-18</sup>), and it is expressly stated that they 'appointed themselves to minister to the saints.' The Apostle did not nominate them to any office of 'helper,' nor did the congregation elect them to any such post. A person who believed that he possessed the gift tried to exercise it. If he was right in this belief, the people accepted his ministrations. There was no other appointment, and there was no class of officials into which he entered.

HERESY (αἵρεσις).—The primary meaning of αἵρεσις is 'taking,' used especially of 'taking a town' (Herod. iv. 1). Its secondary meaning is 'choice,' 'preference.' From this it passes to 'the thing chosen,' and so 'a plan,' 'a purpose.' In later classical usage it comes to mean a philosophic school of thought, and hence a sect.

In the passages in which the word occurs in the Acts, it has the meaning of a religious party, e.g. Ac 5<sup>17</sup>: ἡ αἵρεσις τῶν Σαδδουκαίων; 15<sup>5</sup> 26<sup>5</sup>: κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν τῆς ἡμετέρας θρησκείας ἔφησα Φαρισαῖος. Thus it is used of the Christians not by themselves but by others, e.g. 24<sup>5</sup>: πρωτοστάτην τε τῆς τῶν Ναζωραίων αἵρέσεως; and again, v. 14: κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἣν λέγουσιν αἵρεσιν (see also 28<sup>22</sup>). In the Epistles it is used of the evil principle of party spirit, division, and self-assertion. Thus in Gal 5<sup>20</sup> it is classed among the works of the flesh in company with ἐριθείαι and διχοστασίαι. In 1 Co 11<sup>18</sup> St. Paul uses αἵρέσεις as the natural outcome of σχίσματα: ἀκούω σχίσματα ἐν ὑμῖν ὑπάρχειν, καὶ μέρος τι πιστεῦω. δεῖ γὰρ καὶ αἵρέσεις ἐν ὑμῖν εἶναι, ἵνα οἱ δοκιμοὶ φανεροὶ γένωνται ἐν ὑμῖν. So that, bad though these things are, they may serve a providential purpose in testing men's characters and showing those that can stand the test.

These divisions destroyed the harmony of the Agape. The brotherly spirit which should have characterized the common meal was absent and the sacredness of the Communion was lost in general disorder. In this passage 'heresy' and 'schism' (q.v.) approach very nearly to becoming synonymous.

As St. Augustine says: 'Haeresis autem schisma inveteratum' (c. Crescon. Don. ii. 7). And Nevin quoted by Trench (NT Synonymis<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 359) says: 'Heresy and schism are not indeed the same, but yet they constitute merely the different manifestations of one and the same disease. Heresy is theoretic schism: schism is practical heresy. They continually run into one another, and mutually complete each other. Every heresy is in principle schismatic; every schism is in its innermost constitution heretical.'

So far we have found no trace of αἵρεσις being used in connexion with false doctrine but simply with divisions and factious party spirit. But in 2 P 2<sup>1</sup> a new meaning is introduced, and from the idea of a party or sect we pass to the principles and teaching which characterize the sect. αἵρέσεις ἀπωλείας must refer to doctrines which lead to destruction; indeed the following words, 'even denying the Lord that bought them,' point to a specimen of such false teaching, implying either a rejection of Christ as the Son of God, or a denial of His redemptive work. As this Epistle was written at a much later date than the Acts, it marks the gradual transformation that was going on in the meaning of 'heresy' as it passed from party or sect, first to schism and finally to erroneous teaching.

There is no trace in the NT of either αἵρεσις or σχίσμα denoting a party that had separated itself from the main body. Pharisees and Sadducees were sects in Judaism, not withdrawn from it. Such sects were, so to speak, recognized, not deprecated. Again, the parties in the Corinthian Church which called themselves after the names of Paul, Cephas, Apollos, and Christ were divisions in the Church, not separated from it. It was the harm done by strife and the absence of that spirit of unity and charity, which is the very essence of Christianity, that called for the Apostle's rebukes. By the time that we pass into the sub-apostolic period, αἵρεσις connotes theological error and false teaching, and the sense of a sect or party gradually recedes till it passes away entirely. Two passages from Ignatius may be quoted in support of this: οτι πάντες κατα ἀληθειαν ζήτε και οτι εν υμιν ουδεμία αίρεσις κατοικεί (ad Eph. vi.); and παρακαλῶ ουν υμᾶς . . . μόνη τῇ Χριστιανῇ τροφῇ χρῆσθε, ἀλλοτριὰς δὲ βοτάνης ἀπέχεσθε, ἥρις ἐστίν αίρεσις (ad Trall. vi.).

HERITAGE.—See HEIR.

HERMAS (Ἑρμᾶς, Ro 16<sup>14</sup>).—Hermas is a Greek name, a contracted form of several names such as Hermagoras, Hermeros, Hermodorus, Hermogenes, etc., common among members of the Imperial household (J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 176). It is the last of a group of five names (all Greek) of persons, and 'the brethren with them,' saluted by St. Paul. Nothing is known of any member of the group. It is conjectured that together they formed a separate ἐκκλησία or 'church,' the locality of which we shall suppose to have been Rome or Ephesus, according to our view of the destination of these salutations. Cf. vv.<sup>5, 15</sup> and perhaps v.<sup>11</sup>, and 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup> and perhaps Ac 20<sup>0</sup>. Possibly these five men were heads of five separate household churches, or leaders or office-bearers in the Church.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF.—This valuable and interesting relic of the life and thought of the early Roman Church may be described as a manual of personal religion, cast in an imaginative form. It has been compared in the latter respect with Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, with Dante's Divina Commedia, and with the visions of such mystics as St. Teresa and St. Catherine of Siena. Whether it be looked upon as a work of allegorical fiction, or, as G. Salmon strenuously maintains (Historical Introduction to the NT<sup>3</sup>, p. 529 ff.), a record of actual dream experience, or again, as may well be, a combination of both, its strong moral earnestness and its didactic purpose are equally apparent. It is primarily a call to repentance, addressed to Christians among whom the memory of persecution is still fresh (Vis. iii. 2, 5, Sim. ix. 28), and over whom now hangs the shadow of another great tribulation (Vis. ii. 2, iv. 2). From the first Vision, with its revelation of the sinfulness of sins of thought, and of neglect of responsibility for others, to the last Parable, where the greatness of the Shepherd, the supernatural Being 'to whom alone in the whole world hath authority over repentance been assigned' (Sim. x. 1), is ordered to be declared to men, the theme is repentance and amendment of life.

Indeed, the little book would almost seem to have been written partly as an attempt to break through the iron ring of despair resulting from a rigorous acceptance of those words in the Epistle to the Hebrews which speak of the impossibility of repentance for sin committed after baptism (6<sup>6</sup> and 12<sup>17</sup>). The subject is discussed in the Fourth Commandment (Mand. iv. 3) in a curiously simple manner. The authority of this teaching is admitted verbally, and then an exception is made, which covers the whole teaching of the book. 'I have heard, Sir,' says Hermas, 'from certain teachers, that there is no other repentance, save that which took place when we went down into the water and obtained remission of our former sins.' The Shepherd replies that this is so. They that have believed, or shall believe, have not repentance, but only remission of their former sins. He then, however, goes on to say that, if after this great and holy calling any one, being tempted of the devil, shall commit sin, he hath only one (opportunity of) repentance. This one opportunity, however, would seem to be embodied in the Shepherd himself, who was sent 'to be with you who repent with your whole heart, and to strengthen you in the faith' (xii. 6), and whose command to Hermas is, 'Go, and tell all men to repent, and they shall live unto God; for the Lord in His compassion sent me to give repentance to all, though some of them do not deserve it, for their deeds' (Sim. viii. 11).

1. Authorship.—There are a few references scattered through the work to the circumstances of its author. He had originally been a slave, and was sold to one Rhoda, in Rome (Vis. i. 1). After his freedom he had engaged in business and prospered (iii. 6), but he had been corrupted by the affairs of this world (i., iii.), practising deception in the course of his business (Mand. iii.). However, he had lost his riches, and become useful and profitable unto life (Vis. iii. 6). His worldly loss seems to have been connected with the misdeeds of his children (i., iii.), who had not been very strictly looked after by him. His wife is represented as a person who did not sufficiently restrain her tongue (ii. 2). Hermas depicts himself as slow of understanding, but insatiable in curiosity (Mand. xii. 4, Sim. v. 5), and at the same time as 'patient and good tempered and always smiling,' 'full of all simplicity and of great guilelessness' (Vis. i. 2).

The scene is laid partly in the house of Hermas in Rome, partly in the country where he abides (Vis. iii. 1), and once in Arcadia (Sim. ix. 1). Mention is made of the road to Cumæ, the Campanian Way, and the river Tiber, in which Hermas sees Rhoda bathing (Vis. i. 1).

To the question who Hermas was there are three possible answers. (1) He may, as Origen supposes in his Commentary on Romans (x. 31 [p. 683]), have been the Scriptural character mentioned by St. Paul as a member of the Roman Church c. A.D. 58 (Ro 16<sup>14</sup>). (2) According to the Muratorian fragment (c. A.D. 180), he was brother of Pope Pius I. during his Episcopate (c. A.D. 140-155). (3) He may have been an otherwise unknown person who was a contemporary of Pope Clement (c. A.D. 90-100). This theory involves the identification of the Church official mentioned in Vis. ii. 4 with the Bishop of Rome. 'Thou shalt therefore write two little books, and shalt send one to Clement. . . . So Clement shall send to the foreign cities, for this is his duty.' Of these views Lightfoot with some diffidence prefers the second, while G. Salmon, Zahn, and others accept the third (see J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 294; G. Salmon, Introduction to the NT<sup>3</sup>, 46, 534).

2. Date and use by the Church.—Whether the work was written in the beginning or in the middle of the 2nd cent., there is evidence of its wide circulation soon after the latter date. Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons in A.D. 177, accepted it and spoke of it as Scripture. 'Well did the Scripture speak, saying, etc.' (ap. Euseb. HE v. 8). Clem. Alex. quotes it several times (e.g. Strom. i. xxix. 181), while Origen in the passage above referred to speaks of it as a very useful, and, as he thinks, Divinely-inspired writing. Tertullian approved of it in his pre-Montanist days, but afterwards condemned it (de Pudic. 10). The author of the Muratorian Canon, while seeking to deprecate the public reading of the Shepherd in church, commends it for private use.

'But the "Shepherd" was written quite lately in our times by Hermas, while his brother Pius, the bishop, was sitting in the chair of the Church of the city of Rome; and therefore it ought indeed to be read, but it cannot to the end of time be publicly read in the Church to the people, either among the prophets, who are complete in number, or among the Apostles.'

3. Contents.—The book is divided up into five Visions, twelve Mandates or Commandments, and ten Similitudes or Parables. The Visions form the introduction to the rest, the Shepherd not appearing until the last of these. The following outline will give an idea of the purport of the work as a whole.

(1) Visions.—In the first Vision Hermas tells how, while journeying to Cumæ, he saw in the opened heavens Rhoda, his former owner, whom he had recently met again, and whom he had begun to esteem as a sister. She rebukes him for an unchaste thought towards herself, and leaves him aghast at the strictness of God's judgment. Then he sees a great white chair of snow-white wool upon which an aged lady in shining raiment seats herself. She tells Hermas that what God is really wroth about is his lack of strictness with his family whereby his children have become corrupt. She then reads from a book the glories of God, but Hermas can only remember the last words, for the rest is too terrible to bear. She rises, the chair is carried away towards the east by four young men, and two other men assist her to depart in the same direction. As she goes, she smiles and says, 'Play the man, Hermas.'

The second Vision takes place a year later, and in the same locality. The aged lady again appears, and gives him a little book that he may copy its contents and report them to the elect of God. He copies it letter for letter, for he cannot make out the syllables, and when he has finished, the book is snatched away by an unseen hand. After fifteen days the meaning is revealed to Hermas, who is directed to rebuke his children for their wickedness, and his wife for her faults of the tongue, as well as to exhort the rulers of the Church. A great tribulation is at hand, with danger of apostasy by Christians. One Maximus, in particular, is to be warned against a second denial. Then it is revealed that the aged woman is not, as Hermas supposes, the Sibyl, but the Church, created before all things. He is directed by her to write two copies of the book, after the revelation is finished, and send one to Clement that he may send it to the foreign cities, and one to Grapte that she may instruct the widows and the orphans. Hermas is to read it to the city along with the elders that preside over the Church.

The main part of the third Vision is the revelation by the lady of the Church under the image of a tower being built by angels upon the waters of baptism. The stones of various degrees of suitability (some of them castaway), are explained to mean different kinds of members of the Church, among whom are 'apostles and bishops and teachers and deacons,' and 'they that suffered for the name of the Lord.' The tower is supported by seven women, Faith, Continence, Simplicity, Knowledge, Guilelessness, Reverence, and Love. Hermas is next commissioned to rebuke the self-indulgence of the well-to-do and the ignorance and divisions of the rulers of the Church. He inquires why the lady was aged and weak in the first Vision, more youthful and joyous in the second, and still more so in the third, and learns that these appearances were the reflexion of his own changing spiritual state.

The fourth Vision occurs twenty days later, on the Campanian Way. Hermas sees a huge cloud of dust, which resolves itself into the form of a beast like a sea-monster, emitting fiery locusts from its mouth. Its length is about a hundred feet, and its head was as it were of pottery, coloured black, fire and blood-colour, gold and white. This is a type of the impending tribulation, but it does not harm Hermas, for the angel Segri has shut its mouth. The colours represent this world (black), the blood and fire in which it must perish, those that have escaped from the world (gold), and the coming age (white).

The fifth episode is called a revelation ('Ἀποκάλυψις, not 'Ὁρασις). The Shepherd, the angel of repentance, now appears for the first time, glorious in visage, with sheepskin wallet and staff. He has been sent by the most holy angel to dwell with Hermas for the rest of his life. Hermas at first fails to recognize him as the being to whom he was delivered, but on recognition proceeds to write down the Commandments and the Parables dictated by the Shepherd.

(2) Mandates.—The first Commandment is to believe in and to fear the One God, the Creator, the incomprehensible (ἀχώρητος), and to practise continence; the second to avoid slander, whether by hearing or by speaking it, and to be generous to the needy; the third to abstain from falsehood; the fourth to be pure in thought as well as in deed. An adulterous wife is to be divorced, if unrepentant, but her husband may not marry again, for that would be committing adultery. If she repents after divorce her husband sins if he does not receive her again (after baptism only one opportunity of repentance is given, over which the Shepherd has authority). If a husband or a wife die, the other may marry without sin, but to remain single is better. The fifth Commandment enjoins longsuffering, the opposite of ill-temper (δυσχολία), that most evil spirit which causes bitterness, wrath, anger, and spite. The next three Mandates expand the provisions of the first—faith, fear, and temperance. Contrasts are drawn between the two ways (and the two angels) of righteousness and wickedness, between the fear of God and the fear of the devil, and between temperance as to what is evil, and indulgence in what is good. The ninth Commandment extols faith in prayer, and condemns doubtful-mindedness, while the tenth exhorts Hermas to be clothed in cheerfulness and to put away sadness. In the eleventh striking descriptions are given of the false prophet, who absents himself from the Christian assembly, and is consulted as a soothsayer by men in corners, and of the true prophet upon whom the Divine afflatus comes in the course of the Church's worship. The last Commandment is to banish evil desire by the cultivation of desire which is good and holy.

(3) Similitudes.—The first Parable is a simple expansion of the theme that the Christian is a sojourner in a foreign city, and should act as a citizen of the city which is his true home. In the second the duty of the rich to give to the poor is illustrated by the figure of an elm and a vine. The former, though fruitless, supports the fruitful vine. So the intercessions of the poor man prevail on behalf of his wealthy benefactor. In the next two, a similitude is drawn between trees in winter, when all are leafless, and all seem equally withered, and in summer, when some are sprouting, while others remain withered. The winter represents the conditions of this world, the summer those of the world to come. The fifth Parable presents the story of a vineyard, a master, and a faithful servant, the exposition of which reveals an early belief in the doctrine of works of supererogation, and an Adoptianist conception of the personality of the Son of God (see below). In the next, two shepherds are shown, one of pleasant mien sporting with his sheep, the other of sour countenance lashing his flock with a whip and otherwise maltreating them. The former is the angel of self-indulgence and deceit, the latter the angel of punishment. A few days later Hermas is afflicted by this angel of punishment, and in the seventh Parable he is taught that this is because of the sins of his household. The next two are long and complicated. First Hermas sees a great willow tree (the Law of God, which is the Son of God preached unto the ends of the earth) under which stands a multitude of believers. A glorious angel (Michael) cuts rods from the tree and gives them to the people, who in due course return them in great variety of condition — withered, grub-eaten, cracked, green, some with shoots, and some with a kind of fruit. These last are those who have suffered for Christ. They are crowned and sent into the tower with some of the others. The remainder are left to the care of the Shepherd, who, as the angel of repentance, plants the rods in the earth, and deals with the owners according to the results. The ninth Parable is an amplification of the third Vision. Hermas, seated on a mountain in Arcadia, sees a great plain surrounded by twelve mountains, each of which has a different appearance. These are the tribes of the world, varying in understanding and conduct. In the midst of the plain is a great and ancient rock, with a recently-hewn gate in it. This is the Son of God, older than creation, and yet recently made manifest. Upon the rock a tower (the Church) is being built by angels, of stones that are brought through the gate. The first course is of ten stones, the second of twenty-five, the third of thirty-five, the fourth of forty. These are the first and the second generation of righteous men, the prophets and ministers, and the apostles and teachers. These stones come from the deep, and the rest come from the mountains. Some are suitable and others are rejected. The Shepherd, as in the former Parable, deals with the latter, to fit those that are capable for a place in the building. A curious feature is the introduction of the Son of God, already symbolized by the rock and the gate, as the glorious man who inspects the tower and rejects certain of the stones. The purport of the concluding Parable is an exhortation to Hermas to keep the Shepherd's commandments and to publish them to others.

4. References to organization and doctrine of the Church.—(a) Organization.—In the first respect, the allusions are too slight to give more than a general picture. We read of the rulers (προηγούμενοι) of the Church, whom Hermas is directed to exhort (Vis. ii. 2) and even to rebuke for their divisions and their ignorance (iii. 9). There are apostles, bishops, teachers, and deacons (iii. 5), also prophets and ministers (οἱ ἀκούοντες; Sim. ix. 15). There are deacons who plunder the livelihood of widows and orphans, and make gain from the performance of their office (ix. 26), and, on the other hand, bishops who exercise hospitality and are like trees sheltering sheep, receiving into their houses the servants of God at all times, and sheltering the needy and the widows in their visitation (ix. 27). Clement, whose duty is to communicate with foreign cities, may, as we have seen, have been the bishop of Rome, while Grapte, who instructs the widows and the orphans, may have been a deaconess (Vis. ii. 4). Hermas, who is told to read his book to the city along with the elders who preside over the Church (μετὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων τῶν προϊσταμένων τῆς ἐκκλησίας), may well have been one of the order of prophets. The office of a prophet is held in estimation by the Church. 'When then the man who hath the divine Spirit cometh into an assembly (συναγωγή) of righteous men, who have faith in a divine Spirit, and intercession is made to God by the gathering of those men, then the angel of the prophetic spirit who is attached to him, filleth the man, and the man, being filled with the Holy Spirit, speaketh to the multitude, according as the Lord willeth' (Mand. xi.). The false prophet, on the contrary, is dumb in the Church assembly, and plies a wizard's trade in corners. In view of the Roman character of the Shepherd, it is interesting to note that the tower which represents the Church is represented as founded, not on Peter, but, in the third Vision, upon the waters of baptism, and, in the ninth Parable, upon the rock of the Son of God.

(b) Doctrine.—The doctrinal references reveal, at least in the case of Hermas, a creed which is simple and yet has its own peculiarities. Perhaps the most striking of the latter is the conception of the Son of God. In the Parable of the vineyard (the fifth) the Son of God is represented as a slave placed in charge, with a promise of freedom if he fulfils his allotted duty. He does so much more than is expected of him that the Divine master of the vineyard resolves that he shall be made joint-heir with His Son, who is represented as the Holy Spirit. 'The Holy Pre-existent Spirit, which created the whole creation, God made to dwell in flesh that He desired. This flesh therefore, in which the Holy Spirit dwelt, was subject unto the Spirit. . . . When then it had lived honourably in chastity, and had laboured with the Spirit, and had co-operated with it in everything, behaving itself boldly and bravely, He chose it as a partner with the Holy Spirit' (Sim. v. 6). This Adoptionist conception, which illustrates early Roman speculation on the Person of Christ, finds frequent expression in phrases identifying the Spirit with the Son of God, e.g. 'For that Spirit is the Son of God' (ix. 1). In this same fifth Parable we have an early trace of the doctrine of works of supererogation, which, in mediæval times, was so prominent in the Church's system. 'If thou do any good thing outside the commandment of God, thou shalt win for thyself more exceeding glory, and shalt be more glorious in the sight of God than thou wouldest otherwise have been' (v. 3).

Hermas also teaches that the first apostles and teachers who had died, went like Christ, and preached unto the Spirits in prison (ix. 16). His eschatology is in one respect severe and narrow. Not only are unrepentant sinners to be burned, but also the Gentiles, because of their ignorance of God (iv.). In the fifth Vision there is an apparent reference to the belief in guardian angels. When the Shepherd at first appears, Hermas fails to recognize him, as apparently he should have done,* to be the being to whom he was 'delivered,' and only when the visitant changes his form does recognition come. It seems curious that while Baptism is plainly mentioned two or three times (Vis. iii. 3, Mand. iv. 3, Sim. ix. 16) the Lord's Supper does not appear to be alluded to. Fasting is often mentioned, and once we find Hermas keeping a 'station,' as the early fast-days were called (Sim. v. 1). In this case he is commanded, not to abstain entirely from food, but to take bread and water.

While Hermas shows fewer traces of the influence of St. Paul than of that of St. James, with whose Epistle he shows great familiarity, he need not be definitely classed as a Judaizer. His office is that of a prophet, and his mission is to recall Christians from the danger of too intimate contact with pagan social influence. He speaks of those 'who have never investigated concerning the truth, nor enquired concerning the deity, but have merely believed, and have been mixed up in business affairs and riches and heathen friendships, and many other affairs of this world' (Mand. x. 1), as specially without understanding and corrupt.

* Another explanation is that a previous Vision may have dropped out from the MSS which have come down to us.

Hence his standard of Christian duty is put in the most practical shape: 'faith, fear of the Lord, love, concord, words of righteousness, truth, patience, . . . to minister to widows, to visit the orphans and the needy, to ransom the servants of God from their afflictions, to be hospitable, . . . to resist no man, to be tranquil, to show yourself more submissive than all men,' etc. (viii.). The indwelling of the Spirit of God is a feature of Christian life prominently insisted on, and if intermediate beings like Faith, Continenence, Power, Longsuffering (Sim. ix. 15) seem to shape the Christian character, these are declared to be 'powers of the Son of God' (ix. 13). God is the Creator alike of the world and of the Church. 'Behold, the God of Hosts, who by His invisible and mighty power and by His great wisdom created the world, and by His glorious purpose clothed His creation with comeliness, and by His strong word fixed the heaven, and founded the earth upon the waters, and by His own wisdom and providence formed His holy Church, which also He blessed' (Vis. ii. 3).

Hermas, who was evidently acquainted with the contents of the Didache, does not directly cite Scripture by name, but he continually uses Scriptural words and ideas, handling them with a light touch, and working them into new combinations. C. Taylor (The Witness of Hermas to the Four Gospels) has investigated these allusions minutely, and considers Hermas to be a valuable witness to the Canon, especially in the case of the four Gospels. He finds in the four feet of the couch in the third Vision (13), with the associated cryptic utterance 'for the world too is upheld by means of four elements,' the source of the famous saying of Irenæus that there can be neither more nor fewer than four Gospels, because there are four regions of the world, and four catholic winds, etc. (see p. 13 ff.). There is a citation of the lost work Eldad and Medad (Vis. ii. 3), and Segri, the name of the angel who shuts the monster's mouth in Vis. iv. 2, is a word derived from the Hebrew verb in Dn 6<sup>22</sup> 'shut the lions' mouths' (The Johns Hopkins University Circular, April, 1884, iii. 75).

5. Text and Versions.—There is no complete Greek text of the Shepherd. About the first quarter of it is contained in the 4th cent. Sinaitic MS (N), while the Athos MS (A) written in the 14th cent. is the authority for the rest of the work, except the concluding portion, from Sim. ix. 30 to the end, which has to be supplied from the Latin versions. These are two in number, the so-called Old Latin Version (L<sub>1</sub>) found in about twenty MSS, and the Palatine Version (L<sub>2</sub>) existing in one MS of the 14th century. There is also an Ethiopic Version (E) published in 1860 with a Latin translation (see J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, p. 295).

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς, Ro 16<sup>14</sup>).—Hermes was a very common Greek name, being the name of the popular Greek god. Lightfoot remarks that, in the Imperial household inscriptions, not less than a score of persons might be counted who bore this name about the date of Romans (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 176). In the NT it is found as the third of a group of five names (all Greek) of Christians saluted by St. Paul (see HERMAS). It is significant that a Christian should have no scruple in retaining as his name the name of one of the gods. Another instance is Nereus (v.<sup>15</sup>).

HEROD.—1. Antipas, son of Herod the Great by the Samaritan Malthace. Made tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa after the death of his father in 4 B.C., he ruled over these regions till A.D. 39, when, through the intrigues of Herod Agrippa and his own ambition, he incurred the disfavour of Caligula, and was banished to Lugdunum in Gaul. Capable and successful as an administrator, he is held up to reproach in the Gospels for the scandal of his private life, and his treatment of John the Baptist and Jesus (Mt 14<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 13<sup>31a</sup>, 23<sup>7-12</sup>). Elsewhere in the NT there are only two references to him. The first (Ac 4<sup>27</sup>) occurs in the thanksgiving of the early disciples over the release of Peter and John from imprisonment, and indicates their view of Herod's relation to the tragedy of Calvary. The basis of the thanksgiving is a Messianic interpretation of the 2nd Psalm and a belief in its fulfilment in Jesus. Herod and Pontius Pilate are represented as the kings and rulers of the earth who conspired (Lk 23<sup>1</sup>) against the Lord's Anointed, and wreaked their will on Him, while all the time they were being used by God to further His purpose of redemption. The fact, however, that God over-ruled their evil intentions for good, and caused their wrath to praise Him, though it redounds to His own glory and augments the wonder of His working, is not regarded as any alleviation of their guilt. The sin of Herod, as of Pilate, in relation to Jesus, is clearly implied, and evidently seemed as heinous to the early believers as did his crime against John to the Baptist's followers, who saw in the disasters of his Arabian war (A.D. 36) a Divine retribution for his murder of their master (Jos. Ant. XVIII. v.). The other reference to Herod Antipas (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>) is unimportant, though of some interest for the sidelight it casts upon the age of Manaen (q.v.), one of the leaders in the Church at Antioch, who is said to have been his foster-brother or early companion.

2. Agrippa I., son of Aristobulus, Herod the Great's son by the Hasmonæan Mariamne. After his father's execution in 7 B.C. he was sent to Rome with his mother Bernice, and lived on terms of intimacy with the Imperial family. In A.D. 23 his intrigues and extravagances had brought him to such straits that he was forced to retire to the Idumæan stronghold of Malatha till he found an asylum with Antipas in Galilee. Evading his creditors, he returned to Rome in A.D. 36, and shortly afterwards was committed to prison for an incautious remark that had reached the ears of Tiberius. There he lay till the following year, when the death of the old Emperor and the accession of his friend Caius (Caligula) restored him to freedom and fortune. The new Emperor bestowed on him the eastern tetrarchy of his half-uncle Philip, which had been vacant for three years, with the title of king, and added to it Abilene, the former tetrarchy of Lysanias in north-eastern Palestine (Lk 3<sup>1</sup>); at the same time he commanded the Senate to decree him prætorian honours, and gave him a golden chain of the same weight and pattern as that which he had worn in his captivity. A few years later the tetrarchy of the exiled Antipas was also conferred on him; and in A.D. 41 Claudius, on his succession to the throne, still further enlarged his possessions with the gift of Samaria and Judea, and raised him to consular rank. In the splendour of his good fortune Agrippa did not forget his Jewish countrymen, but fitfully at least, and probably from motives of policy, exerted his influence at the Roman court to mitigate the wrongs and restrictions entailed on them by their religion. On assuming the government of his new dominions—greater than Jewish king ever possessed—he set himself to observe the laws of his country and the practices of the Jewish faith (Jos. Ant. XIX. vii.). During his three years of rule, he showed himself sagacious, liberal, and humane; though, in his desire to propitiate the Pharisaic element among his subjects, he raised his hand against the followers of Christ, killed James with the sword, and would have sacrificed Peter also, had he not miraculously escaped (Ac 12<sup>1-19</sup>). 'He saw it pleased the Jews' is the explanation given of this severity in Acts (12<sup>3</sup>), and there is no reason to doubt its substantial accuracy. The end came to Agrippa with tragic suddenness in A.D. 44, when his glory was at its height. Between the account of his death given in Acts (12<sup>0-3</sup>) and that of Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii.) there is no more inconsistency than might have been expected from the different circles in which they originated. The latter is more detailed, and yet omits to mention the deputation from Tyre and Sidon who sought reconciliation with King Agrippa through the good offices of his chamberlain. According to Josephus, the occasion of Agrippa's display at Cæsarea was a series of games in honour of Claudius; no angel of the Lord smote him, but an owl appeared as a portent before the fatal seizure; he was carried to his palace, and lingered in agony for five days. There is nothing about his having been 'eaten of worms,' which may have been only a descriptive phrase commonly used of the death of tyrants (2 Mac 9<sup>9</sup>). Both accounts, however, suggest the interposition of a higher, avenging hand in the sudden death of the king.

3. Agrippa II., son of Agrippa I. and Cypros, the daughter of Phasael, a son-in-law of Herod the Great. At the time of his father's death, he was resident in Rome, and only seventeen years of age. Disposed at first to grant him the succession to the Jewish kingdom, Claudius allowed himself to be dissuaded by his ministers, and re-transformed it into a Roman province. Detaining Agrippa in Rome, the Emperor compensated him six years afterwards for the loss of his paternal inheritance by giving him his uncle Herod's kingdom of Chalcis, as well as the rights, which Herod had possessed, of supervising the Temple and choosing the high priest. A year before his death, Claudius allowed Agrippa to exchange the meagre principality of Chalcis for those parts of his father's dominions, east and north-east of the Sea of Galilee, which had formerly been the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias (Batanaea, Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and Abila). In A.D. 56 Nero, who had meanwhile succeeded to the throne and expected his aid against the Parthians, added to his kingdom the regions of Tiberias and Taricheæ, with Julias, a city of Peræa, and fourteen villages in its vicinity. Agrippa showed his gratitude by changing the name of his capital from Cæsarea Philippi to Neronias, in honour of the Emperor, on whose birthday also he had Greek plays annually performed in a theatre which he erected at Berytus. Precluded by his position from independent political action, he contented himself with adorning his cities and conserving his possessions. A Roman at heart, and devoted by education and circumstances to the Roman influence, he endeavoured to bring the customs of his people into conformity with those of the Gentiles. At the same time, he evinced an occasional interest in the Jewish religion, and sought to win over the Pharisees to his projects. In the final struggle between the Jews and Rome, which he did his utmost to avert, he maintained his loyalty to the Imperial power, and at the close of the war was rewarded with an enlargement of his territories. We hear of him in Rome in A.D. 75, when he was raised to prætorian rank. Later on, he corresponded with Josephus about his History of the Jewish War. He died, without issue, about the end of the century. It was this king, Agrippa II., who was associated with Porcius Festus, the Roman procurator of Palestine (A.D. 60-62), in the trial of St. Paul recorded in Ac 25<sup>13-26<sup>3</sup></sup>. The remark imputed to him on that occasion ('almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian,' 26<sup>8</sup>) is interesting for the evidence it affords of the early currency of the name 'Christian.' The character of Agrippa has caused doubt to be thrown on its ordinary interpretation as an admission of the profound impression made on him by St. Paul's appeal. It has been taken to mean either 'you are persuading me somewhat to act the part of a Christian,' or 'on slight grounds you would make me a believer in your assertion that the Messiah has come' (EBi i. 754 n., ii. 2037).

LITERATURE.—The great authority for the lives of the Herods is Josephus. E. Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup>, Leipzig, 1901-11 (Eng. tr. of 2nd ed. = HJP, Edinburgh, 1885-90); A. HERODION (Ἡρώδιον, WH Ἡρωδίων, Ro 16<sup>11</sup>, a Greek name, suggesting connexion with the family of the Herods).—Herodion is saluted by St. Paul and is described as 'my kinsman' (τὸν συγγενῆ μου). Other 'kinsmen' saluted in Ro 16 are Andronicus and Junias (or Junia) (v. 7), while three 'kinsmen' send salutations in v. 21. That St. Paul means that these persons were relations of his is unlikely. It is this interpretation which has given rise to one of the difficulties felt in deciding the destination of the passage vv. 3-20. Almost certainly we should understand 'fellow-Jews' or 'fellow-members of my tribe' (see Ro 9<sup>3</sup>). Lightfoot connects Herodion with 'the household of Aristobulus' saluted in the preceding verse. He considers that Aristobulus was a member of the Herodian family, and that his 'household' would naturally include many Orientals and Jews, and therefore probably some Christians (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 175). Of the latter, Herodion may have been one. Others have conjectured that Herodion belonged to 'the household of Narcissus' saluted in the verse which follows. T. B. ALLWORTHY.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις).—Hierapolis was a city in the province of Asia, picturesquely situated on a broad terrace in the mountain range which skirts the N. side of the Lycus valley. On the S. side, 6 miles away, Laodicea was plainly visible, while Colossæ lay hidden from view 12 miles to the S.E. Differing widely in history and character, these three cities were evangelized together soon after the middle of the 1st century. Hierapolis was probably an old Lydian city, but in the Roman period it was always regarded as Phrygian. A change in the spelling of the name is significant. While the older form—Hieropolis, the city of the hieron—limits the sanctity to the shrine, the later form—Hierapolis, the sacred city—conveys the idea that the whole place was holy.

In such an environment Christianity had to contend not merely with a superficial Hellenic culture, but with a deep-rooted native superstition. Politically of little account, Hierapolis was important as the home of an ancient Anatolian nature-worship, the cult of Leto and her son Sabazios. The striking physical phenomena of the place were clear indications to the primitive mind of the dreaded presence of a numen which required to be propitiated. The numerous hot streams tumbling down the side of the hill on which the city stood are strongly impregnated with alum, and the snow-white incrustations which cover the rocky terraces present the appearance of 'an immense frozen cascade, the surface wavy, as of water in its headlong course suddenly petrified' (R. Chandler, Travels in Asia Minor<sup>3</sup>, 1817, p. 287). From a hole in the ground—probably filled up by Christians after A.D. 320—there issued fumes of mephitic vapour, which seemed to come from Hades, so that the awe-inspiring spot was called the Plutonium or Charonion (Strabo XIII. iv. 14). On account of its marvellous hot springs—regarded as a divine gift—the city was associated with the medicinal art of Æsculapius, and under the Empire it became a famous health resort. It was the birth-place of Epictetus the Stoic.

Hierapolis is mentioned once in the NT (Col 4<sup>13</sup>), as a city causing grave concern to Epaphras, who was apparently the founder and first pastor of its church. The cities of the Lycus valley no doubt received the gospel at the time of St. Paul's prolonged mission in Ephesus, the city from which the light radiated over the whole province of Asia (Ac 19<sup>10, 26</sup>). Having acted as St. Paul's delegate in the Lycus valley (Col 1<sup>7</sup> [RV]), Epaphras knew that the Apostle regarded its churches as in a manner his own, and after some years of strenuous labour the 'faithful minister of Christ' made a journey from Asia to Rome to seek counsel and help in dealing with errors of doctrine and practice which threatened to undo his work.

There is a trustworthy tradition which connects the name of Philip the Apostle with Hierapolis. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus towards the end of the 2nd cent.—as quoted by Eusebius (HE iii. 31)—states that Philip, 'one of the twelve,' was among 'the great lights of Asia,' and that he was 'buried at Hierapolis along with his two virgin daughters.' Theodoret (Commentary on Ps 116) says that 'the Apostle Philip controverted the error of the Phrygians.' St. John is also believed to have preached at Hierapolis, and the progress of Christianity there was represented as the victory over the Echidna or serpent of Æsculapius, which was identified with Satan. Hierapolis was made a metropolis by Justinian. The ruins of the city are extensive and well-preserved. The theatre is one of the finest in Asia Minor. The white terrace now bears the fanciful name of 'Cotton Castle' (Pambuk-Kalesi).

HOLINESS, PURITY.—This article is intended to include the conceptions of holiness and purity as we find them in the literature of the Apostolic Church. So far as the Gospels are concerned, these have already been dealt with in separate articles in the DCG, to which reference is now made. There is a certain advantage in dealing with both subjects in one article, as the two are fundamentally connected; and in the course of the article it will be found that the tie is very close. Both are primarily religious ideas, whose ethical significance diverges. In the NT holiness emphasizes rather the Divine side, and purity the human side of that comprehensive condition of peace with and access to God the Father, along with all the consequences for character which had been mediated through the gospel of Jesus Christ. There seems to be no fundamental difference in the use of the terms 'holiness' and 'purity' by the various NT writers. Hence the method followed in the article has been to use in illustration of the general conceptions certain leading NT passages.

I. HOLINESS.—1. The general conception.—The original idea is stated by A. B. Davidson (Ezekiel, Cambridge, 1892, p. xxxix) to be 'not now recoverable' (cf. Robertson Smith, RS<sup>2</sup>, London, 1894, p. 140). The most plausible suggestion is that it is connected with a root='separate.' Our idea of holiness is misleading for the interpretation of both OT and NT meaning. To us, holiness is exclusively an ethico-religious quality, attaching to persons, in so far as they are God-like in life and character; and applied (less accurately) to institutions (including sacraments) on account of their religious significance. In ancient Semitic religion, the 'holiness' of God or of men had nothing to do with morality and ethical purity of life. Even in Israel it came to be an appropriate epithet of, almost a synonym for, Deity (cf. Am 4<sup>2 68</sup>, where God is said to swear 'by his holiness,' and 'by himself,' without any real difference of meaning). In other words, 'holiness' is a relative term in ancient religion.

'The divine holiness was not so much an object of intellectual contemplation as a fact borne in upon the mind by the constant presence of things and persons that might not be touched, places that might not be entered, and times in which ordinary employments were suspended, because of their appropriation to the service or worship of God' (J. Skinner, HDB ii. 397a; cf. H. Schultz, OT Theology, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1892, p. 168 ff.).

Holiness is not to be confused with transcendence in its application to God. Jahweh, as holy, in Hebrew thought is not originally opposed to the universe, but rather is guarded or guards Himself, on the one hand against the arrogance and presumption of man (1 S 6<sup>9</sup>) and, on the other, against the false deity of the national gods (Jos 4<sup>19a</sup>). The Hebrews, in transferring the epithet to Jahweh, also took over the ancient idea involved in it, and persisting in the NT, that any thing or person that comes into any relation with Deity is ipso facto holy. Any part of God Himself may be holy (e.g. His arm, His spirit); or what constitutes His property is 'holy' (e.g. His sanctuary, land, people, offerings, or ministers). Angels are also called 'holy ones' (Job 5<sup>1</sup>).

The real antithesis to 'holy' in this original sense is, therefore, 'profane' or 'common' (hōl, βέβηλος, lit. 'that which is allowed to be trodden' [Lv 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 S 21<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>7 6-9</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>16</sup>]; used in the NT of men [1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>, He 12<sup>16</sup>]). The 'holy' was also accessible only under certain strict ceremonial regulations. And it is just at this point that the affinity of holiness and purity or cleanness becomes apparent (see further under II.).

2. The NT conception.—This idea of 'holiness' as essentially a relationship between God and man, in which God takes the initiative, persists all through the NT; and it is obvious that, as the idea of God developed, holiness would also tend to carry with it ever-increasing moral demands on character. We may therefore turn to the uses of the word in the NT.

There are two main groups of words translated 'holy' in the NT: (1) the āgios group (αγιάζω, ἀγιασμός, ἀγιότης, ἀγιωσύνη); (2) the ōsios group (οσιότης, οσιώς [1 Th 2<sup>17</sup>]). Iepos is also twice employed (e.g. 2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>13</sup>), but it need not be specially distinguished.

In the NT the terms 'holiness' and 'holy' are applied (1) to God; (2) to Jesus; (3) to the Spirit of God; (4) to things and places; (5) to men.

(1) The holiness of God.—That 'holiness' and 'holy' are comparatively infrequent in this connexion in the NT need occasion no surprise. The Apostolic Church in the name 'Father' found a term that included and transcended the holiness of God. Jesus' own description of God is the 'perfect' One (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>), the 'good' One (Mt 19<sup>17</sup>, Mk 10<sup>18</sup>).

As we shall see later, however, the judgment of Ritschl (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, Bonn, 1870-74, ii. 89, 101; Eng. tr. of vol. iii., Edinburgh, 1900, p. 274) that the Divine holiness, 'in its Old Testament sense, is for various reasons not valid in Christianity, while its use in the New Testament is obscure,' cannot be upheld. Rather there are whole tracts of the NT literature that would remain a sealed book were it not for the guidance of this OT conception. ἅγιος is applied to God, or to the 'name' of God (Lk 1<sup>49</sup>, Rev 4<sup>8</sup>). In both these usages the significance is the same, and recalls the original meaning. The conception of the majesty of God is most prominent. In Rev 4<sup>8</sup> it is the ζῶα who offer the ascription of praise in the form of the Trisagion. If they are taken as representing Nature, and the forces of the natural world, ἅγιος here no doubt emphasizes the sense of 'absolute life and majestic power' (J. Moffatt, EGT v. [1910] 381). There is a reminiscence of Is 6<sup>3</sup>, but with a remarkable absence of the overwhelming impression of moral purity in the prophet's vision. The ethical content of the OT conception is apparent, however, in Rev 6<sup>10</sup>. There the thought has affinity with Is 5<sup>16</sup>, where God is said to 'sanctify' Himself, by inflicting righteous punishment on the sinners of Israel. The blood of the martyrs cries for the Divine vengeance, and the holiness of God must always express itself in the form of intense antagonism to the suffering of the innocent and the sin of the oppressor. Probably another side of the same idea is present in Jn 17<sup>11</sup>, where the Saviour appeals to the holiness of the Father that, in view of the trials and persecutions likely to come upon them, the disciples who are 'in the world' may be protected and vindicated (cf. vv. 17-25). The Father, as holy, transcends and is separate from the world, but condescends to the needs of the disciples—in other words, 'saves' them (H. J. Holtzmann). The usage in 1 P 1<sup>15</sup> is interesting; ἅγιος ought to be translated as predicate. The exhortation is based on Lv 11<sup>44</sup>, and has no direct connexion with the more profound thought of Mt 5<sup>48</sup>. The 'holiness' inculcated in the Leviticus passage involves the disuse as food of certain 'creeping things' regarded as repugnant and an 'abomination' to God. As often, holiness and physical purity tend to coalesce. God has called Israel out of Egypt to be a 'separate' nation, and He is 'holy' or 'apart from' the impure usages of heathen nations (cf. Skinner, HDB ii. 397<sup>b</sup>; E. Kaetzsch, ib. v. 682). The idea in Leviticus does not go beyond ceremonial purity (see under II.). Similarly in 1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, while the idea of God has of course become moralized, and He is spoken of as 'Father,' the exhortation is essentially to abandon the 'former lusts,' on the ground that they too are repugnant to the nature of God and unfit men for the service of the 'living God.' The stress is still on the outward behaviour. As regards the expression ἁγιασθητω τὸ ὄνομα σου in the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>, Lk 11-), 'name' is of course used in the ordinary biblical sense, and is equivalent to the revealed nature of God, especially as revealed in Jesus—His Fatherhood. There is an implied contrast with a pagan type of prayer (v. 7<sup>11</sup>), which consists in formal and ceremonial repetitions of the same words. Jesus here applies the same revolutionary principle to prayer, in so far as it implies a conception of the character of God, as when He abrogates the ceremonial in conduct as a term of fellowship with God (Mt 15<sup>11</sup>, Mk 7<sup>15</sup>). God is 'the Holy One of Israel,' and His name is hallowed or sanctified, or 'counted as holy,' when men revere His majesty (Is 29<sup>23</sup>), by recognizing, in willing and trustful submission, His Providence (Mt 6<sup>3</sup>). The whole context in Mt 6<sup>1-8</sup> is useful as determining the sense in which holiness is here ascribed to God by Jesus. The 'hallowing' of the name is opposed to ostentatious worship, which profanes it. The ethical content given to the word (v. 5) by our Lord is profound and far-reaching. The God, and Father, of Jesus is indeed 'exalted above' men in the perfection of His 'goodness' (Mk 10<sup>18</sup>, Mt 19<sup>17</sup>); but He is also infinitely accessible to all those who seek Him. Universalism is therefore latent in this opening petition.

The noun ἁγιότης is used of God (a) in 2 Co 1<sup>12</sup> (ἐν ἁγιότητι καὶ ἐλλικρινεῖα τοῦ θεοῦ); and (b) also in He 12<sup>10</sup> (εἰς τὸ μεταλαβεῖν τῆς ἁγιότητος αὐτοῦ) (cf. 2 Mac 15<sup>7</sup>).

(a) Another reading is ἀπλότητι (8<sup>c</sup>DEGL, the Latin and Syrian VSS). ἀπλοτή is supported by 8*ABCKMP 17, 37, 73 and the Bohairic. St. Paul is claiming that his conduct is characterized by these Divine qualities, and 'in so far as they are displayed in men they are God's gift, as he goes on to explain' (J. H. Bernard, EGT iii. [1903] 42). Denney finely paraphrases: 'In a holiness and sincerity which God bestows, in an element of crystal transparency, I have led my apostolic life' (2 Corinthians [in Expositor's Bible, London, 1894], p. 30). Here, again, the affinity is apparent between the conceptions of purity and holiness. St. Paul is claiming to have walked 'in the light, as he is in the light.' The thought is akin to the Johannine idea 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>).

(b) The word in Hebrews is used similarly to indicate a holiness of God that can be imparted to men. The conception here is not of a holiness that is only possible after death (H. von Soden). We may compare 12<sup>14</sup>, 'without holiness, no man shall see the Lord,' where, however, the word is ἁγιασμός, or 'consecration' (see SANCTIFICATION), the process, of which ἁγιότης is the result. Here, again, we can detect, shining through the depth of ethical meaning, the fundamental idea of holiness as 'separation.'

"Holiness" or sanctity in God is properly separation or distance from the world and elevation above it; holiness in men is separation from the world and dedication unto God' (A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, p. 238).

It is significant, as indicating the immense progress attained in the Christian idea, that in the only two instances in the NT where the ἁγιότης of God is spoken of as an abstract term, men are represented as sharing in it.

Th. Haering (The Christian Faith, Eng. tr., London, 1913, i. 345) aptly cites the words 'ye would not' (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>) as the expression of a love that is also holiness, in its reaction against sin. These are words, he says, 'which in their simple seriousness are not surpassed by the awful saying in He 12<sup>29</sup>.' The love of God in the NT is awe-inspiring in its holiness, which, equally with love, is a term that may be used to express the glorious fullness of His moral excellence. Holiness is the principle and standard of God's love, which is His desire 'to impart' Himself and all good to other beings, and to possess them as His own in spiritual fellowship (W. N. Clarke, Outline of Christian Theology, Edinburgh, 1898, p. 98 f.). The reaction of the nature of God against sin is itself love, because thereby it exercises the means for overcoming the opposition to love. The 'wrath' of God (e.g. Ro 1<sup>18</sup>) is a conception that can be adequately expressed and understood only in terms of the biblical conception of His holiness. Holiness, it has to be remembered, is not strictly an attribute, but the fullness of the Divine nature, as love is. We cannot set these two conceptions naively side by side. One of the theological tasks of the present is to procure an adequate adjustment of these two aspects of the Divine nature to one another. No theological writer of modern times has realized and met the need so strikingly as Haering (see esp. ii. 494 ff. of his work already quoted).

'We are . . . face to face with the mystery of the Divine personality, of which we are compelled to think as life capable of being moved to its utmost depths, without however being able to press this necessary idea [of holiness] to its logical conclusions' (ib. ii. 495).

We must recognize that the love of God, like all perfect love, has 'height,' as well as 'depth,' if we would be filled 'unto all the fulness of God' (Eph 3<sup>18f.</sup>).

(2) The holiness of Jesus.—In Lk 1<sup>35</sup> the child Jesus in His pre-natal existence is called τὸ γεννωμενον ἅγιον, 'that holy thing that is being generated' (cf. Mt 1<sup>20</sup>). The expression has no special significance in connexion with the subject of this article. The Holy Spirit is regarded as the origin of the physical existence of Jesus; and therefore the embryo is entirely holy, as deriving existence from God. The application of the term to the physical nature of Jesus must be regarded as the result of reflexion, no doubt influenced by Hellenistic thought, and perhaps in opposition to Docetic theories of His Person. It belongs to a milieu where the theological idea of the pre-existence of Jesus has given way to a more popular conception of His physical birth (cf. Lk 1<sup>16</sup>) (see art. HOLY SPIRIT). We are also faced here with the problem of a possible interpolation in vv. 34, 35 (Moffatt, LNT, p. 268 ff.).

Jesus is also referred to as 'the Holy One of God' (Μὴ 1<sup>2</sup>, Lk 4<sup>34</sup>, Jn 6<sup>69</sup> [acc. to the true reading]). The phrase is evidently a designation of the Messiah. The demons are represented as acknowledging that Jesus is 'the Holy One of God,' i.e. One who has been chosen, equipped, and consecrated for the service of humanity against the might of the demonic powers that brought disease and madness by taking possession of the bodies of men. This was regarded in contemporary Jewish thought as a function of the Messiah. The epithet 'holy' is used in the same sense of consecration to special service in Jn 6<sup>69</sup>, which again may be compared with Jn 10<sup>36</sup>: ὁὐ ὁ πατὴρ ἡγίασεν, i.e. set apart for a special mission. No feature, however, of the consciousness of Jesus in the Johannine Gospel is more marked than the emphasis on the idea that Jesus in His essential nature transcends the ordinary Messianic categories. Therefore, although ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ cannot be regarded as the reading in Jn 6<sup>69</sup>, the same conception of the moral and religious relationship of Jesus with God, His unique Sonship, as transcending Messianic categories (μονογενής), expressed so frequently in the Johannine writings by ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, or ὁ υἱός, must be regarded as implicit in ὁ ἅγιος τοῦ θεοῦ (cf. ρηματα ζωῆς αἰώνιου ἔχεις [v. 68]). Jesus is called ὁ ἅγιος absolutely in Rev 3<sup>7</sup> (ὁ ἅγιος ὁ ἀληθινός) and in 1 Jn 2<sup>0</sup>. In the latter passage the idea of the transference of the χρίσμα may or may not have an affinity with Hellenistic mystery-religion (R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Leipzig, 1910, p. 206 f.); but in any case the χρίσμα itself is to be connected with such passages as Ex 29<sup>7</sup> 30<sup>31</sup>, and Jesus is 'holy' because He has been 'anointed' or set apart for His particular mission, wherein He perfectly reveals and perfectly does the will of God. In Johannine thought, the Holy Spirit is conferred on Jesus without measure (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>); it 'abides' in Him (1<sup>3-4</sup>). It is the source of His unique filial consciousness, and in this sense He is set apart by God for His mission, and perfectly carries it out. It is extremely questionable if the Johannine writings ever contemplate the metaphysical notion of the essential oneness of the Father and the Son, however justifiable it may be to deduce that conception from the main position adopted, viz. a 'oneness' of love and will. The Johannine position, however, as to the 'oneness' of God and Jesus is clearly developed in the face of physical notions of union with deity, derived from the Hellenistic mystery-religions (cf. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, Göttingen, 1913, p. 186 ff.). It is significant that the relationship expressed by ἀγάψεν between God and Jesus is one that may be conferred on men by Jesus (cf. Jn 17<sup>17-19</sup>).

In the Book of Acts Jesus is called τὸν ἅγιον καὶ δίκαιον (3<sup>14</sup>), where the epithet is simply an equivalent for the Messiah; and it has the same meaning in 4<sup>27</sup> (τὸν ἅγιον παῖδά σου), where παῖδα is to be translated 'servant' in the sense of Is 52<sup>13</sup> 61<sup>1</sup> (see R. J. Knowling, EGT ii. [1900], on Ac 3<sup>13</sup>).

Hitherto we have been dealing with instances of the use of ἅγιος. In Ac 2<sup>27</sup> τὸν δούλον σου follows the LXX translation of Ps 16<sup>10</sup>, and is rendered in the AV and RV 'Thy holy one.' δούλος is generally used in the LXX to render hāsīd (cf. Dt 33<sup>3</sup>, 2 S 22<sup>36</sup>, etc.). Hāsīd seems to be governed in its primary meaning by that of hesed (= 'loving-kindness'), and to mean 'one who is the object of God's loving-kindness.'

'In its primary sense the word implies no moral praise or merit; but it came, not unnaturally, to be connected with the idea of chesed as "loving-kindness" between man and man, and to be used of the character which reflected that love of which it was itself the object; and finally was applied even to God Himself' (A. F. Kirkpatrick, Psalms, Cambridge, 1902, Appendix, note L, p. 835 f.).

δούλος is applied to God only in Rev 15<sup>4</sup> 16<sup>5</sup> in the NT. It is again applied to Jesus in He 7<sup>26</sup> (ἀρχιερεὺς δούτος δικαίος), where the root distinction between δούτος and ἅγιος becomes apparent. The writer is speaking of Christ's moral fitness to be our High Priest, and therefore lays stress on the fact that He is δούτος, as exhibiting a perfect filial reverence and devotion to His Father's will. δούτος here is the summary, and also indicates the common source of those inward qualities that constituted the 'holy' character of Jesus. It is interesting to note that οἶσος is conjoined with δίκαιος (οἰκτρῆς with δικαιοσύνη in Lk 1<sup>15</sup>; οἶσος with δικαίως in 1 Th 2<sup>10</sup>) in most of the instances of its use in the NT. This is also frequently the case in classical usage. The central idea in both οἶσος and δίκαιος is conduct sanctioned by Divine Law; and δούτος seems to express the Godward, δίκαιος the manward, side of such conduct.

It is perplexing to find that in classical usage οἶσος came to mean also 'profane,' but this is accounted for if we remember that a 'profane' place is one that may be trodden by all without doing violence to the majesty of the god; 'profane' conduct, i.e., is conduct allowed by the god. Of the latter usage there is no trace in the NT. The word used is always βέβηλος.

οἶσος, therefore, comes to mean 'holy,' approaching much more nearly to our use of the word in English. In all the uses of the word in the NT, even in the semi-technical applications to Messiah quoted from Acts, the reference is to moral conduct, considered as fitness for the service of God (cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>). (For the Greek conception of δούτος see art. 'Holiness [Greek]' in ERE.)

In Ro 1<sup>4</sup> St. Paul says that Jesus was 'designated (almost='installed,' ὀρισθέντος) Son of God with power according to the Spirit of holiness (κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης) by a resurrection of the dead.' πνεῦμα ἁγιοσύνης cannot here be merely an equivalent of 'Holy Spirit' (but see Feine, Neutest. Theologie, pp. 346 f., 452). The expression 'characterises Christ ethically, as κατὰ σάρκα (v. 3) does physically' (Denney, EGT ii. 586). It is along the lines of this clearly implied distinction between πνεῦμα and σάρξ that the meaning must be found. There is, however, here no accurate and definite theological distinction between the Divine and the human nature of Jesus. St. Paul is thinking of the complete Personality of Jesus (as also when he says previously κατὰ σάρκα), and he means the human πνεῦμα (as the human σάρξ) of Jesus, the former distinguished by a unique 'holiness' (cf. He 2<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). This 'holiness,' as always, consists in complete and unswerving consecration to God, and is manifested in all those qualities that constituted the Personality of Jesus. The Resurrection of Jesus is the signal acknowledgment by God of the fact. The idea is part of a Messianic apologetic against current Jewish notions. The holiness of Jesus is His complete response to the choice of God in sending His Son to be the Saviour of men, and evokes an equivalent response on the part of God in the miracle of the Resurrection. It is the holiness of men, as constituting an indestructible relationship with God, that is the basis of the flickering hope of immortality in the sense of an endless life with God that we find here and there in the OT. Men have committed themselves to Him, with all that the step involves for conduct, and the promise of the future rests on His faithfulness and power (cf. Ps 73<sup>17</sup>, where 'sanctuary' is really 'the holy things of God' or 'the ultimate deeds of God in the full character of His holiness' [G. A. Smith, Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the OT, London, 1901, p. 206]). It is not without significance, both for the conception of αγιωσύνη in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> as applied to Jesus and for the connexion of the Resurrection of Jesus with human immortality, that St. Paul here uses the phrase, strange in this connexion, ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν, evidently meaning a resurrection in which others will share.

(3) Holy Spirit (see art. HOLY SPIRIT).

(5) Holiness as applied to men.—A large part of what is appropriate to this heading will be found under the article SAINT. This is a very common term, especially in the writings of St. Paul, Hebrews, and Revelation, for the ordinary member of the Christian community. The 'saints' are those 'consecrated' to the service of God. The word does not imply necessarily perfection of moral character, but it does imply, and is used frequently to enforce the teaching, that those that are 'holy' in this sense must become daily more fitted, morally and spiritually, for the service to which they are committed (Ro 6<sup>17.18.22</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>15.16</sup>).

The usage of the word ἅγιος as applied to men may be expected to be governed by the idea, applicable also to things and places, that what is related to God or is used in His service is itself 'holy.' Accordingly we find such usages as αγίαι προφῆται (Lk 1<sup>70</sup>, Ac 3<sup>21</sup>, 2 P 3-); ἅγιοι ἀποστόλοις (Eph 3<sup>5</sup>); ἅγαι γυναῖκες (1 P 3<sup>5</sup>). All these are so spoken of, primarily, as those who have been or are the special instruments of the Divine will and in intimate fellowship with God in the work of revelation and redemption.

Those uses of αγιάζω in the NT where the dominant application of the term seems to be deliverance from the guilt of sin by the death of Jesus are not included in this article, but will be dealt with under SANCTIFICATION. In the OT 'guilt' or the sense of guilt is the objective effect of sin (see art. SIN; Schultz, OT Theology, ii. 306 ff.). It is a state of alienation from God, a rupture of the relationship between God and man, or God and the nation, which can be restored only by an act of expiation. It must be carefully noted that where ἅγιος or αγιάζω is employed in the NT in this sense the primary meaning of the words as 'in relationship with God' is still retained. In one passage St.

Paul seems to use αγιάζω as practically synonymous with δικαίω (1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>) (cf. Feine, Neutest. Theologie, p. 436). The Corinthians are 'justified' or 'acquitted' 'in the name of' Jesus, i.e. restored to a relationship of love with God (cf. Eph 5<sup>25</sup>, He 10<sup>10.29</sup>). Christian holiness in its moral aspect is expressed by καθαρίζω in He 9<sup>14</sup> (cf. O. Pfleiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr., London, 1877, ii. 68 ff.).

Two Pauline passages call for special mention: Ro 11<sup>16</sup> and 1 Co 7<sup>14.34</sup> (cf. Eph 5<sup>25</sup>). In both of these the conception is that the sanctification of the part involves the sanctification of the whole. In the one case St. Paul is stating the grounds on which he bases his confidence in the future of Israel. He bases it upon the holiness of the Patriarchs (v. 28) from whom they are descended.

'By the offering of the first-fruits, the whole mass was considered to be consecrated; and so the holiness of the Patriarchs consecrated the whole people from whom they came' (Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 326, in loco). The thought is on the analogy of Nu 15<sup>19-21</sup>.

In the second passage, the Apostle is dealing with the problem of marriage with an unbeliever, and argues against dissolution of the tie in such cases, on the ground that the Christian partner, as one member of the relationship, thereby 'sanctifies' the other, in virtue of the fact that they are one. The result attaches to the children also. We must be careful, however, not to attach too great moral significance to 'sanctify.' The thought moves strictly within the biblical conception of holiness. Only such marriages are contemplated as have taken place before conversion (2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>). The unbelieving husband is introduced by union with the believing wife into the sphere of 'holiness.' Holiness is not a moral but a religious condition. At the same time, it is not going beyond the actual thought of the Apostle to say that the effect of his words on the believer would be to create a new conception and a new sense of moral and spiritual responsibility for the unbelieving partner. The word αγιάζω is in this passage, as it were, caught in the act of passing from the ceremonial to the moral meaning. It is a legitimate inference that the Christian's friends, or possessions, or abilities—all that is indissolubly connected with his personality—should in this sense be holy. At the same time, the emphasis on physical descent in Ro 11<sup>16</sup> shows that St. Paul has not completely transcended materialistic and ceremonial notions in the conception of holiness; and a similar emphasis may be detected in the passage from 1 Corinthians. The idea is still present that holiness can be transferred by physical contact (cf. Ex 29<sup>7</sup>, Is 65<sup>5</sup>, reading 'lest I make thee holy').

In conclusion, it is advisable to point out the reason for laying stress on the primary conception of αγιος in our interpretation of the term in the NT. It is impossible to miss, in the application of αγιωσύνη to Jesus in Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, or in the frequent conjunction of the ἅγιος and καθαρός groups of words, as in Eph 5<sup>6-8</sup>, He 9<sup>14</sup>, or in many of the uses of αγιος (e.g. 1 P 1<sup>16</sup>), the sense that perfection of moral character is intimately bound up with the term, and is never absent in the thought of the NT writers. Wherein, then, consists the significance of the fact that the primary meaning of a relationship to God or to Christ is always dominant? Why is it so pre-eminently a religious rather than an ethical conception? It is very remarkable that an idea common to all ancient religions, where often it has an origin and expression in materialistic forms of thought, should so persistently reappear in the early Christian religion. Undoubtedly thereby the content of the ideal Christian character has been enlarged, deepened, and purified. Holiness comes before morality, as the source before the river. In the Christian ethics, there is no divorce between holiness and virtue, nor can there be. The choice of men by God, His call, and His setting of them apart for His service—an act sometimes conceived as not a thing of time merely, but begun in the far-off moment of pre-mundane existence 'in Christ Jesus' (Eph 1<sup>4</sup>)—must have increased a thousand-fold the grandeur of the moral motive presented even to the weakest, most despicable, and most unworthy 'saint.' The thought is indeed conceived in the Spirit of Him who invited all to receive the love He came to reveal, and established for all time in the heart of His Church the value of each individual life before God, the Father. Moreover, the gift of the Holy Spirit meant essentially that all the graces of the Christian character had their origin in the gift and grace of God Himself. The initiative lies with Him. Love is the fulfilling of the Law. Christian conduct is not a task set by God, but a sharing of the Divine nature; not a doctrine, but a life.

'To the men who wrote the NT and to those for whom they wrote, the Spirit was not a doctrine but an experience; they did not speak of believing in the Holy Spirit, but of receiving the Holy Spirit when they believed' (Denney, DCG i. 731<sup>a</sup>).

The gospel of Christ has ever been attended with the risk of antinomianism, a risk that it has always been willing to take and able to meet (Gal 5<sup>13</sup>, Ro 6<sup>14</sup>). The present-day phenomenon of 'practical' Christianity, as distinct from spiritual and devotional—'enthusiasm for humanity'—is really, in its fundamental conception, out of accord with the teaching of the NT on holiness, as a summary of the Christian character. What characterizes the NT writers everywhere is their 'enthusiasm for God,' as revealed in Jesus, and the social conscience is a manifestation from the same religious source. 'Thy brother for whom Christ died' is the conception that has revolutionized social life. The term ἅγιος in its moral demand dredges the conscience of men, and reaches to the very springs of human conduct (cf. 2 Co 7<sup>1</sup>). The same predicate ἅγιος can be used of God and of man; and where the need of a substitute is felt, none worthier can be found than in the great saying, ἔσεσθε οὖν υμῖς τέλει ὡς ὁ πατήρ ὑμῶν ὁ οὐράνιος τέλειός ἐστιν (Mt 5<sup>48</sup>). The notion of 'Christian perfection' found in 1 Jn (5<sup>18</sup>, etc.) can only be reached by realizing that in the Johannine thought the OT conception of holiness is for the most part expressed in more or less mystical fashion under the influence of Greek thought as 'union with God in Christ,' but that, notwithstanding, the Johannine 'sinlessness' is not in the end faultlessness. It is rather the inevitable issue in character of complete loyalty to Jesus Christ (see PERFECT, PERFECTION).

II. PURITY.—There are two groups of words in the NT that are translated 'pure,' 'purify,' 'purge,' or 'cleans.' In the RV 'cleans' is substituted for 'purge' of the AV in certain passages, but is retained in 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>21</sup>, He 13<sup>9</sup> 14<sup>22</sup>. (1) καθαρός, καθαρίζω (Hellenistic form of καθαίρω), καθαρισμός, καθαρότης; καθαίρω; διακαθαρίζω; κάθαρμα, περικάθαρμα; ἀκάθαρτος, ἀκαθάρσια; (2) ἁγνός, ἁγνίζω, ἁγνότης, ἁγνός; ἁγνεία; ἁγνισμός. In addition we have βαπτισμός, in the sense of 'cleansing,' in Mk 7<sup>4</sup>, He 6<sup>2</sup> 9<sup>10</sup>; παντίζω, παντισμός (tr. 'sprinkle,' 'sprinkling'), especially in Hebrews; εὐκρινής ('pure').

The ideas of purity and holiness are most clearly associated if we consider their joint affinity with the ancient religious notion of tabu. The subject cannot be fully entered upon here, but Robertson Smith (RS<sup>2</sup>, p. 152 ff.) and A. S. Peake ('Unclean, Uncleanliness in IIDB) should be consulted. It is of advantage, for the sake of clearness of thought, to note that in ancient religion the notion of 'uncleanliness' is primary and positive, and that 'cleanness' is really its opposite, and the negative form. This consideration is of importance as being really the origin of that negative morality connected with Jewish ceremonial religion which Jesus abrogated for ever (Lk 11<sup>24</sup> -6).

'In rules of holiness the motive is respect for the gods, in rules of uncleanness it is primarily fear of an unknown or hostile power, though ultimately, as we see in the Levitical legislation, the law of clean and unclean may be brought within the sphere of divine ordinances, on the view that uncleanness is hateful to God and must be avoided by all that have to do with Him' (Robertson Smith, RS<sup>2</sup>, p. 153).

The attitude of Jesus towards ceremonial uncleanness does not properly fall within the scope of this article (see art. 'Purification,' 'Purity' in DCG ii.). The scribes, by an elaborate system of casuistry, laid down minute regulations and interpretations of the ceremonial laws of purity; and these dominated the whole religion of Judaism in our Lord's day. They became a grievous burden, under which men became 'weary and heavy-laden.' The gracious invitation of Mt 11<sup>-8</sup> is also the herald of a great religious revolution, and it is in connexion with the ceremonial requirements connected with hand-washing that Jesus enunciates the great law, repealing all the Levitical rules as to unclean meats (Mk 7<sup>18-23</sup>, Mt 15<sup>2-20</sup>). No longer ceremonial, but only moral, defilement is possible.

As regards the practice of the Apostolic Church, the incident of Ac 10<sup>9-16</sup> is instructive. We may be certain that St. Peter was not the only one who was 'much perplexed within himself' as to the full scope of Jesus' principle that the real seat of defilement is within. The Apostolic Decree of Ac 15<sup>-3</sup> was essentially a concession to Jewish prejudices, but at the same time was no doubt actuated by the spirit of Christian love, which forbids one's doing violence to the conscience of a brother, merely for the purpose of asserting an abstract and selfish liberty (1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>, 10<sup>23-5</sup>). It has to be borne in mind: (1) that religious scruples are to be respected (Mk 1<sup>44</sup>); (2) that when, for example, St. Paul became a Jew to the Jews, and submitted to a rite of purification (Ac 21<sup>26</sup>), he did so all the more easily that he himself did not cease to be a Jew (see art. FAST). The instances of obedience to the Jewish ceremonial Law in the NT are not entirely to be explained by a theory of deliberate and conscious concession or adaptation.

The conception of purity, however, in the NT (as in the prophetic teaching of the OT) is entirely ethical. If we are to make any distinction between ἁγνός and καθαρός, it will be found in the direction of the distinction laid down in Westcott's comment on 1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup> (Ep. of St. John, London, 1883, p. 98): ἁγνός connotes the feeling, and καθαρός the state. ἁγνός implies a certain inward shrinking from pollution and is applied to Jesus, while καθαρός expresses simply the fact of cleanness (cf. IIDB, art. 'Purity'). In the LXX ἁγνός and καθαρός are used indiscriminately to translate Heb. tāhōr (lit. 'brightness'); καθαρός occasionally for bor (lit. 'separate'). ἁγνός (as also ἁγνότης) is always ethical in meaning; ἁγνίζω has a ceremonial sense in Jn 11<sup>55</sup>, Ac 21<sup>24</sup>, 26 24<sup>18</sup>; ἁγνεία = 'chastity' in 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>. καθαρός and its cognates vary in meaning between the ceremonial and the ethical. In such a passage as Jn 15<sup>3</sup> we see the word in process of passing from the ceremonial to the ethical meaning.

The word εὐκρινής (Ph 1<sup>10</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>1</sup>) and its noun εὐκρινεία (1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>17</sup>) are worthy of special treatment. In the instance quoted from 2 Peter, it is to be suspected that the usage of the writer is not very accurate. He is fond of 'bookish' words. The etymology is very doubtful, but the sense is abundantly clear. In Ph 1<sup>10</sup> the mind that is εὐκρινής is enabled δοκιμάζειν τὰ διαφέροντα ('to approve the things that are excellent,' RV; cf. Ro 2<sup>18</sup>). Bengel's note is 'non modo prae malis bona sed in bonis optima.' There is a type of character which may hold fast the good, and miss the best (cf. our Lord's Parables of the Treasure hid in the Field, and the Pearl of Great Price). The character described possesses such clear moral perception that it is enabled to welcome and understand and love the 'highest' when it sees it. The goal and ultimate standard of human conduct is the judgment-seat of Christ—'the day of Christ,' as the Philippian passage has it. In Plato, Phædo, 81 B, C, the ψυχή ελίκρινής is contrasted with the ψυχή μεμιασμένη καὶ ἀκάθαρτος, stained and polluted by its connexion with the body. The use of ελίκρινής in the NT is an example of the way in which a word is ennobled and enriched by being taken over into Christian thought. The Orphic doctrine of the defilement of the spirit by contact with the body (σῶμα σῆμα—the body the prison-house of the soul*), elaborated by Plato, is cast aside, and the great result of pure ethical vision is attained through the discipline and control of the passions. The meaning seems to be that form of ethical purity which is expressed in a mind uncontaminated and unwarped by sensual or sordid passion. Clearly St. Paul uses it in this sense in 2 Co 1<sup>12</sup> and 2<sup>17</sup>. His motives are unmixed (cf. the phrase 'the unleavened bread of ελίκρινελας' in 1 Co 5<sup>8</sup>). All that he has done, or is doing, is worthy to be seen as in an atmosphere of pellucid clearness, ἐν ἀγνότητι καὶ ελίκρινελα τοῦ θεοῦ, οὐκ ἐν σοφίᾳ σαρκικῇ ἀλλ' ἐν χάριτι θεοῦ. The purity of which he speaks must be regarded as a gift of God. It is remarkable that in Phædo 81 A the soul that is ελίκρινής is compared with the experience by the initiated of the Divine Vision. In any case, the emphasis is on the comprehensive ethical quality of purity, in the sense of 'sincerity' or 'reality,' which plays such a dominant part in the Pauline ethics (2 Co 13<sup>8</sup>; cf. Weinle, Biblische Theologie des NT, p. 349 f.). (For the Stoic conception of ελίκρινελα cf. Posidonius, ap. Sext. Emp. adv. Math. ix. 71-4; Cicero, Tusc. Disp. i. 40, 42, 43; and E. Bevan, Stoics and Sceptics, Oxford, 1913, pp. 107-8.) παντισμός (παντίζω; παίρω in classical Greek) is translated 'sprinkling' in the EV. It is applied to the cleansing influence of the sacrifice of Jesus on the human conscience (He 9<sup>13</sup>, 2<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2</sup>). It is frequently used in conjunction with αἷμα. Its use can be understood only if we remember that 'in the consciousness of the pious Israelite, sin, guilt, and punishment are ideas so directly connected that the words for them are interchangeable' (Schultz, OT Theology, ii. 306). Guilt is a state of impurity which manifests itself in a consciousness of alienation from God, and antagonism to the Divine Law, and it is from the sense of guilt that the blood of Jesus is said to 'sprinkle' or 'cleanse' men. We may also compare He 12<sup>4</sup>, where 'a blood of sprinkling' is spoken of as 'speaking better things than that of Abel.' The blood of Abel cried for vengeance (Gn 4<sup>10</sup>); the life-blood of Jesus is a more powerful appeal than the mere martyr blood. We shall seek in vain for any theoretical principle, on the basis of which the NT writers—especially the writer of Hebrews—apply the symbolism of the OT sacrificial system to the Death of Jesus. The situation is simply that what was experienced in the worship of the OT was experienced in full and satisfying reality in the conscience of the NT believer. The probability is that no principle suggested itself or was felt to be needed (cf. A. B. Davidson, Hebrews, p. 176 ff.). This fact suggests a profound application to the question of religious unity to-day, especially in connexion with sacraments and orders. In this region, emphasis on the necessity of principles tends to disunion, on common experience to real and fundamental unity. In both OT and NT thought the 'cleansing' that is denoted by παντισ-

μός is the removal of the obstacle to taking a real part in the religious services of the sanctuary (Nu 19). In the NT the obstacle is conceived as a guilty conscience, and the profundity of the NT conception consists in the fact that a guilty conscience is thought of as an obstacle to the service of God in the fullest ethical sense. It is a hindrance arising no longer in the external region of bodily defilement, but in the inner sphere of a man's own consciousness. Here we have another link connecting the ideas of 'purity' and 'holiness' (cf. also Pfeiderer, Paulinism, ii. 66 ff., and art. SANCTIFICATION).

HOLY DAY.—The term was employed in the Jewish Law to denote a day set apart for the service of God. Especially it is used of the Sabbath. It might be a day on which certain restrictions were laid on individual liberty. The scope of this article is confined to the attitude adopted by the Apostolic Church towards the Jewish 'holy days.' The subject is really part of a much larger one—the question of its attitude towards the Jewish Law. Jesus, while completely abrogating the ceremonial Law (see art. HOLINESS), yet attended Jewish feasts; and St. Paul, notwithstanding his attitude towards the Jewish Law, is represented in Ac 20<sup>16</sup> as hastening his sea-journey, in order to be at Jerusalem for the day of Pentecost.

To discuss the whole question of the Sabbath in relation to the Apostolic Church would be to transgress the limits of this article, but the position that must in general be adopted is that there is no trace in the NT of an arbitrary and conscious substitution of the Lord's Day for the Jewish Sabbath. The process of early Christian thought in this connexion, as in connexion with holy days in general, was really determined not by enactment, but by the action of the great guiding principles of spiritual freedom and brotherly love. Indeed, the original motive of the institution of the Jewish Sabbath, before its observance was overlaid with minute Rabbinical details, was not so much that the Israelite should rest himself, as that he should give others rest. The life and work, the example and precept, and above all the Resurrection of Jesus, implied the complete abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation; but as that dispensation was still part of the personal environment, and eventually bound up with the personal religion of individual Christians—both Jew and Gentile—for many generations, it is not to be expected that its cogency would at once cease to be felt. 'The dead leaves of Judaism fell off gradually, they were not rudely torn off by man' (HDB iii. 139<sup>b</sup>). It is only by keeping the principle laid down by Jesus Himself in Lk 5<sup>39</sup> fully in view that the relationship of the Apostolic Church to holy days in general, and to the Sabbath in particular, can be understood. As will be seen, the determining factor in the gradual displacement of the Sabbath by the Lord's Day, in the Christian Church, determined also the general attitude to all holy days. That factor was the Resurrection of Jesus, the experience of the New Creation, and the inevitable sense of victory over all that would fetter Christian freedom (see further, art. SABBATH).

Bearing in mind what has been said, we are not surprised to discover a certain amount of compromise, wherever the Apostolic Church had to give conscious expression to its views and to give guidance to its members on the question of the observance of holy days. The Apostolic Decree of Ac 15<sup>19-21</sup> has only a very general bearing on our particular subject, but the matters with which it deals—the problems of meals and heathen religious practices—are closely connected. We must also remember that as Christianity in the course of its missionary expansion came in contact with Hellenistic Judaism, the Pagan religious spirit, with its insistence on the observance of heathen festivals, would encourage a return to and an emphasis upon 'holy days.' There are three passages in St. Paul's writings that may be adduced in illustration.

1. Gal 4<sup>10</sup>.—'Ye observe days, and months, and seasons, and years.' St. Paul is really combating the influence of those who were making the attempt to judaize, insisting that submission to Jewish rites was necessary for salvation, and discrediting the freedom of the Pauline gospel as antinomianism. At the same time, it is apparent from the context that the Galatians had, no doubt through the influence of Pagan festivals, laid great stress on the observance of these days as connected with deliverance from the power of the στοιχεια, which are undoubtedly intermediate beings, connected with the growth of angelology in later Judaism, and readily identified by the Galatians with heathen demonic powers, in which they once believed (cf. A. S. Peake, EGT, 'Colossians,' London, 1903, p. 522 f.; following F. Spitta, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas, Halle, 1885, p. 263 f.). They were in bondage to them which by nature are 'no gods' (v.<sup>8</sup>). Such observances would destroy the spirit of sonship (v.<sup>9</sup>), the privilege of immediate access to the Father, which constituted the gospel he had preached to them. Accordingly we may conjecture that, apart from the demand for circumcision, St. Paul is not here condemning the observance of holy days as such, but only as leading, by way of a revived Judaism, back to Paganism. The Galatians are accused not so much of wickedness, as of 'foolishness' (ἀνόητοι Γαλάται, 3<sup>1</sup>), or want of judgment. No doubt it was really moral earnestness that led them astray. To follow the definite moral precepts of Judaism, taken over into Christianity, impressed them as a safer course than to venture on the broad sea of Christian freedom and the guidance of the Spirit.

2. Ro 14<sup>5-6</sup>.—The situation in Rome was somewhat different. The reference here to the observance of 'days' is connected with the question of the responsibility of the strong for the conscience of the weak (v.<sup>1</sup>). The weak in faith are those who have an inadequate grasp of the great principle of salvation by faith in Christ. They are the 'scrupulous' in conscience, who, like the Galatians, are afraid to be guided except by definite legal enactments. It is interesting to note that St. Paul does not call the weak brother ἀσθενής, but speaks of τὸν ἀσθενοῦντα = 'one who may become strong' (F. Godet, Com. on Romans, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1881-82, ii. 329). He is one whose conscience has to be considered, but within limits, as the rebuke to his censoriousness in v.<sup>4</sup> shows. The days mentioned are not necessarily Sabbath days, but may be any holy day—a fast or a feast. It is held by some (E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London, 1904, p. 126; J. Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' 1900, p. 702) that St. Paul has in view a definite sect of vegetarians. If that be so, the days in question would be days on which flesh might or might not be eaten, while in some cases complete abstinence from flesh might be demanded. In any case, it is significant that 'eating' is closely conjoined with the observance of the 'day'; and whether the day were feast or fast or Sabbath, the principles inculcated by St. Paul apply equally well. The day in itself, like the eating, is indifferent, and therefore the Christian is free to observe it or not according as the spirit of Christian brotherhood and a regard for the unity and peace of the Church may dictate. By indifference to external observances, a 'free' Christian may injure the conscience of another. At the same time conduct here, as always, is determined ultimately not by direct reference to the 'weak' brother, but by reference to Christ. No man liveth to himself, but 'to the Lord' (v.<sup>7</sup>). It is His interest alone that is to be considered, and the weak brother is to be considered as one 'for whom Christ died.' St. Paul, in his impartial fashion in dealing with all such questions, rather creates an atmosphere in which the elements for decision are clearly seen than lays down any legislative enactment. The authority of the Church is neither more nor less than the authority of Jesus, interpreted by the individual conscience, in close Christian relationship to those who constitute the Church a body of believers. There is nothing whatever that is purely legal and statutory in the Christian religion. 'All shall stand before the judgment-seat of God,' and St. Paul asks the Romans to remember that both those who observe the 'days,' and those who do not, are striving for the same end. They both are regarding the day 'to the Lord,' or with His interests in view (v.<sup>6</sup>).

The particular difficulty in Rome was probably of Essene origin, akin to that in Colossæ (B. Weiss, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., London, 1837-88, i. 330; Denney, loc. cit.). A. C. McGiffert (Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 368) contends that it was due to some form of Alexandrian Judaism. Certainly the difficulty is not occasioned by Pharisaic Legalists, as in Galatia.

3. Col 2<sup>16</sup> (in the AV ἐορτῆς of this verse is translated 'holyday,' the only instance of the word in the EV of the NT). The argument is practically the same as in Ro 14<sup>5</sup>. 'Let no man judge you on the basis of eating and drinking, or in the matter of a feast or a new moon or a Sabbath.' St. Paul means that such ground is inadequate for moral judgment of a man. ἐν μέρει εορτῆς, κτλ. cannot be translated 'in the partial observance of' (Chrysostom). As regards the character of the movement which is opposed by St. Paul, and finds its expression in the legal observance of holy days, it seems to have been a theosophy, consisting of a blend of Judaism with some form of syncretistic religion. It is impossible to identify the foreign element exclusively with Essenism or Mithraism. It is simply the product of that 'Hellenism' which everywhere confronted the Christian missionary (cf. E. Bevan, Stoics and Sceptics, Oxford, 1913, ch. iii.). The 'days' were evidently connected with the worship of στοιχεια or 'intermediate beings' (see above), whose functions were 'not only creative but also providential, in a sense, resembling those of the saints in Roman Catholicism' (Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 152). One result seems to have been asceticism (2<sup>11</sup>). The material was contrasted unfavourably with the spiritual, and the body was considered as the tomb of the soul (the ultimate issue of the σῶμα σημα of Plato). Moreover, this insistence on 'days' carried with it an emphasis on individual speculative and mystical attainments which destroyed the universality of the gospel (3<sup>11</sup>).

The aim of this article has been to indicate the complexity of the movement in the Apostolic Church that issued in the gradual weaning of Christianity, as interpreted by St. Paul, and those who adhered to him, from the observance of Jewish holy days. Missionary activity made plain in experience that the multiplied observance of 'days, and months, and seasons, and years' as legal enactments formed a congenial soil on which heathen conceptions of deity might take fresh root within the Christian Church. The missionary activity of the Christian Church to-day is also exercising a similar profound influence on Christian thought. No one ought to pretend that the discipline of the Church, so far as it is expressed in the weekly day of rest and worship, or in the observance of seasons or sacraments, is without significance for the Christian life. It directs attention to aspects of the Christian faith that would otherwise find no place in the mechanical routine of ordinary life; yet not even the religious observance of the first day of the week ought to be regarded as legal or statutory. An act of faith was the source in which it originated, and its maintenance must be conducted in the free atmosphere of faith. Many things are yet to break forth upon the mind of the Church from the Word of God, and none are more significant than the principles relating to holy days that were brought into being through the contact of the apostolic faith with contemporary practice and thought. It is only by 'being fully assured in our own mind,' by contracting the habit of deciding for ourselves in such matters, and at the same time by having regard to the mind of Christ, as expressed in the constraint of Christian brotherhood, that true Christian freedom of conscience will be developed, and that fear, which so often manifests itself in scrupulosity, obscurantism, and legalism, will be cast out.

HOLY SPIRIT.—The community brought together by the disciples of Jesus was sustained by the conviction that it possessed the Spirit of God, and in that possession it saw the peculiar feature which distinguished its members alike from the Greeks and from the Jews. This is a fact of fundamental importance for the entire subsequent history of Christianity.

I. THE PRESUPPOSITIONS OF THE CONVICTION.—1. The Jewish doctrine of Scripture as the sole medium of the Spirit.—The term 'Holy Spirit,' רוח הקודש, was coined by the theology of the Palestinian Synagogue. The adjunct 'holy' was rendered necessary by the fact that the word 'spirit' was also applied to the force from which emanated man's inward life generally. The addition of the adjective 'holy' signifies that the spirit so distinguished belongs to God. The phrase derives its content from what the prophets say regarding the nature of their prophetic experience, which they ascribe to their being moved by the Spirit of God. Hence the tradition of the Synagogue associates the conception with the writings by which the message of the prophet is mediated to the community. By the time the Church of the New Testament took its rise, the doctrine of Inspiration was already formulated as a dogma, and dominated the whole religious life of Judaism. The expression 'Holy Spirit,' in its connexion with the written word, was at once taken over by Christianity (Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Mt 22<sup>43</sup>, Ac 1<sup>16</sup> 28<sup>25</sup>, He 3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1-2</sup>). The absolute bondage of the Synagogue to the Scriptures had the result that the Holy Spirit was assigned only to the prophets of past times, and not to persons then living. As the community now possessed no prophets, but was wholly dependent upon Scripture, its tradition included the principle that 'the Holy Spirit had been taken away from it.' But as the communion of God with His people had not been broken off, that principle did not exclude the possibility that the Holy Spirit might be bestowed upon individuals (cf. Lk 2<sup>25</sup>)—at times, namely, when the gift of prophecy was vouchsafed to them—or that the conduct of the people as a whole might be directed by the Holy Spirit (cf. the saying of Hillel, Tôsephthā Pēsāhēm, iv. 2). The actual scope of this idea, however, was circumscribed by the fact that the nation's portion in God was based upon the Law. It was therefore necessary that the individual should learn God's will from Scripture, and practise obedience thereto by his own effort. This excludes the idea of a Divine work manifesting itself in the inner life of man. Hence even the teachers of the Law abstained from tracing their learning to the action of the Spirit, and based their authority upon the experience which they had derived from their knowledge of the Law and tradition. When Scripture proved inadequate to the clear ascertainment of the Divine will, recourse was had to signs, and especially to voices coming from above. These facts show clearly how far the primitive Church's belief that it was guided by the Spirit of God transcended the prevailing religious ideas of contemporary Judaism.

2. The Messiah as the new vehicle of the Spirit.—The second presupposition of the Christian conviction regarding the Spirit lay in the fact that, in accordance with the promises, the Messiah was expected to be the vehicle of the Spirit. Since it was His function to bring perfection to His people, the gift that distinguished the earlier servants of God was His in a superlative degree. Accordingly He has the Spirit 'not by measure' (Jn 3<sup>34</sup>). By the Spirit He is one with God, and is able to work the work of God in men. This principle is common to the Messianic hope, the preaching of John the Baptist, the witness of Jesus to Himself, and the message of His disciples in all its various forms. The conviction was intensified by the culminating events of the life of Jesus, since, as the Risen One, He reveals in Himself the work of the Spirit; the Spirit giveth life. Then, as He still maintains in His state of exaltation His intercourse with His disciples, and does this in such a way that, like God, He is present with them and reigns over them, the Spirit becomes the medium by which He consummates His work. Thus the avowal of the Messiahship of Jesus involved the doctrine that the Spirit of God is effectively operative in man. The man whom Christ rules is guided by the Spirit, and he who is united with Christ partakes of the Spirit.

3. The prophetic idea that the Spirit would be given to all.—The conception of the perfected community connoted also the idea—derived from prophecy—that in it the Spirit would be vouchsafed to all. This idea likewise was ratified by the life of Jesus, inasmuch as He placed His relation to His disciples wholly under the law of love. Between Himself and them He established a perfect communion, and thus all that belonged to Him passed over to them. His filial relation to God made them children of God; His Word, with full authority to do wonders, was imparted to them too; His passion called them to suffering and death; His risen life and His coming dominion invested them also with glory. The perfect character of the fellowship which Jesus instituted between Himself and His disciples involved the conviction that they likewise should receive the Spirit of God, even as it had been imparted to Him. Thus the events of Easter by which that fellowship was consummated after His death were directly linked with the belief that now the disciples also had become possessed of the Spirit; the breath of the Risen Lord imparts the Spirit to them (Jn 20<sup>22</sup>).

II. THE COMING OF THE SPIRIT TO THE DISCIPLES OF JESUS.—1. A fact of historical experience.—In the primitive community's recollections of its beginnings it stands out as a significant fact that the descent of the Spirit is regarded as a particular experience, taking place on a particular day, and associated with the founding of the Church (Ac 2). The doctrine of the Spirit thus becomes more than a theological inference from the character of God or of Christ, and does not remain a mere hope derived from the utterances of Scripture or of Jesus; on the contrary, it expresses, for the religious consciousness of the primitive Church, something that it had actually experienced, and it possesses the certitude of historical fact. The type of tradition given in Ac 2 appears also in St. Paul, in the fact, namely, that he regards the sending of the Spirit, no less than that of the Son, as a work of God—as the work, indeed, by which the Advent of the Son was fully realized (Gal 4<sup>4-6</sup>). The same idea appears in St. John, who speaks of the descent of the Spirit as the act of the Exalted Christ (Jn 7<sup>39</sup> 14<sup>16, 26</sup> 16<sup>13</sup>). This interpretation of religious history was fraught with most important consequences, inasmuch as it dissociated the conception of the Spirit from the subjective religious states of the individual. Believers were now convinced that their possession of the Spirit was not dependent upon their purely personal experience. The message of the Spirit's presence came to all men as a historical fact no less secure than the message of the Advent of Christ Himself. It is true, of course, that the individual could recognize the effects of the Spirit's presence in his personal experience, and he might accordingly be asked whether he had on his part received the Spirit (Ac 19<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>), but his certainty in the matter did not rest wholly upon his inward condition. Hence the assertion of the Spirit's operation still remained unshaken even when an individual or a community proved unsteadfast; the belief that they were partakers of the Spirit was safeguarded against every doubt (cf. Gal 3<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>16</sup> with 3<sup>6</sup> 19<sup>13</sup>). That belief flowed directly from the Christology of the primitive Church, and could become liable to doubt only by the dissolution of the union between the community and Christ.

2. Connexion with the inauguration of apostolic work.—It was, again, a matter of the utmost importance for the religious experience of the primitive community that it associated the coming of the Spirit with the beginnings of apostolic labour. The day of Pentecost was not, indeed, included in the Easter period, though with the glorified life of Jesus was associated the conviction that the Spirit had now laid hold of the disciples too. But the occurrences which manifested to the disciples the descent of the Spirit were distinguished from the events of Easter: the latter perfected the fellowship of Jesus with His disciples, while the former inaugurated their apostolic work and laid the foundation of the Church. In the NT doctrine of the Spirit this continues to manifest itself in the fact that the Spirit is always associated with the task imposed upon the Church. The Spirit equips the Church to witness for Jesus, and endows it with power for its Divinely-given work. The conception of the Spirit is not associated with the personal blessings which the individual craves for, as, e.g., with his progress in knowledge, his felicity, or his moral growth and perfection; what was expected from the Spirit was rather the equipment for the effective work necessary to the preaching of Christ and the institution of the Church. Hence the apostles were regarded as in a supreme degree the mediators of the Spirit (cf. Ac 8<sup>15a</sup>, 19<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>), this pre-eminence extending also to such as were actively engaged in the evangelization of the nations (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>). In sending forth evangelists and in defining their spheres of labour (Ac 13<sup>2</sup> 16<sup>6a</sup>), in the judicial procedure by which they withstood sin (Ac 5<sup>2</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>), in prescribing the moral regulations which were to prevail in the community (Ac 15<sup>28</sup>), their action was at once appropriate and effective in virtue of the Spirit's guidance. But this did not involve any opposition between them and the community at large, as the latter was called to full and complete fellowship with them as partakers of the Divine grace. Thus the possession of the Spirit was not the exclusive privilege of an official class, but was granted to the entire community entrusted with the service of God, and baptism is accordingly offered to all in view of the promise of the Spirit (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 19<sup>2a</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>).

3. The Spirit sent by Christ.—The community believed that the sender of the Spirit was Christ (Ac 2<sup>33</sup>). Accordingly it sought to prove the Messiahship of Jesus by the fact that the Spirit was revealed in the community (Ac 5<sup>32</sup>; cf. art. PARACLETE). This made it impossible to separate the doctrine of the Spirit from the doctrine of Christ, or to regard the former as superseding or transcending the latter. On the contrary, the statements which set forth the operations of the Spirit serve in reality to enunciate the presence and work of Christ. The Spirit who animates the community is the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>, Ac 16<sup>7</sup>). This inseparable union between Christ and the Spirit, making it impossible for any one to receive the Spirit except in personal connexion with Christ, is clearly formulated by St. Paul in the words: 'the Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). This point of view had two closely inter-related consequences: first, that primitive Christian faith continued to base itself upon the earthly life of Jesus; and, secondly, that it did not consist merely of recollections of that life, but developed into fellowship with the Exalted Christ. Had the Spirit occupied a position independent of Christ, the primitive faith would inevitably have acquired that mystical tendency which finds the evidences of Divine grace exclusively in the inner life of man. But, as it is the Spirit's function to lead men to Christ, the message which makes known Christ's life and death is the foundation-stone of the community. Thus the conviction that one was living in the Spirit involved no disdain of the body, no opposition to nature and history; on the contrary, the sure token of the Spirit's influence was not the belief which separated Christ, as the mere semblance of a heavenly being, from nature and history, but the confession that He had truly come in the flesh (1 Jn 4<sup>2a</sup>, 2 Jn 7). Nor, again, did the believer's relation to Christ consist merely in his knowledge of the Saviour's earthly career; and, in point of fact, that consciousness of unlimited fellowship with Christ which forms one of the essential characteristics of the NT Epistles is based upon the belief that the earthly work of Jesus is still carried on in the operations mediated by the Spirit.

4. The Spirit imparted to the community by God.—The doctrine that the Spirit reveals Christ implies another, viz. that it is God who imparts the Spirit to the community, and that He Himself dwells with it in the Spirit. That theological type of Christology according to which Christ is the Son who is one with God in the sense that God works through Him passes over into the doctrine of the Spirit. The formulæ which speak of the work of Christ as a manifestation of Divine power are therefore applied also to the work of the Spirit. The Spirit is conceived, not as a substitute for the action of God, but as its medium; nor is it regarded as a power installed between God and man; its function, rather, is to bring to man the very presence of God Himself. Thus the community and its individual members are spoken of as the Temple of God—as the place in which He dwells (1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>16</sup>, Eph 2<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>19</sup>). In this we can trace the root of the Trinitarian conception of God. Christ and the Spirit are regarded co-ordinately as the two agents through whom the grace of God completes its work in man, and through both the one will expressive of the Divine grace is realized. Thus the work of Christ and that of the Spirit are in complete harmony with each other and with the work of the Father. It is this formulation of the Trinitarian conception with which St. Paul introduces his enumeration of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Co 12<sup>4-6</sup>; cf. 1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>1-6</sup>); and it appears also in the account of what Jesus said to Nicodemus (Jn 3<sup>3-11</sup>), where the sequence is the new birth due to the Spirit, belief in the Son, and the deeds 'wrought in God.' Essentially the same formulation is found in the salutation of 1 Peter (1<sup>2</sup>), and in a like sense we must interpret the baptismal formula in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, where the one Name into which the nations are to be baptized embraces the Son and the Spirit as well as the Father, because the work of calling man to God and of bringing him within the Divine grace is effected by Christ through the medium of the Spirit.

It is supposed by many, indeed, that in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> we have a formula from a later theology, dating from the post-apostolic period, and interpolated into the Gospel. We must bear in mind, however, that the teaching of Jesus certainly contained the statement that He would work through the Spirit, and that He would do so by imparting the Spirit to His people. It is inconceivable that in primitive Christian times there could have been a form of baptism in which the Spirit was not named. Moreover, even if in that age the Gospel still clung closely to the Jewish expectation of the Messiah, dissociating the working of the Spirit from the present, and assigning it wholly to the coming dispensation—the idea being that the Spirit would raise from the dead all who had been baptized into Christ—yet, even on that hypothesis, the preaching of Christ must still have embraced the promise of the Spirit.

Of a formulistic use of the Trinitarian designation of God the NT shows no trace. Thus, when the Christian community is questioned regarding the nature of its Deity, it may give a complete answer by saying that beside the one Father it sets the one Lord (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>); and in baptism it was only necessary to invoke the name of Christ (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>, Gal 3<sup>7</sup>). But in such cases it is always implied that Jesus manifests Himself to men as Lord by acting upon them through the Spirit (cf. Ac 2<sup>33</sup> 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>). Primitive Christianity, however, felt the overt recognition of the Spirit to be of the utmost importance, because it saw the crowning work of Divine grace, not in its general action upon human beings through the invisible government of God, or in its manifestation in the earthly work of Christ, but rather in its operations in man himself—in its quickening of his thoughts and his love, and in its enrichment of the inner life.

5. The relation of the Holy Spirit to the human spirit.—The relation of the Holy Spirit to the spirit of man is not dealt with separately in the NT. The principles which here guided the thoughts of the apostles sprang directly from the distinctive characteristics of Divine action. The intense desire to clothe the knowledge of God in clear and pregnant words never tempted them to seek to solve the mystery that veils the creative operations of God. Hence, too, they never tried to explain how the Spirit of God acts upon the human spirit, how it enters into and becomes one with it. St. John, in intentionally placing near the beginning of his Gospel Christ's reference to birth from the Spirit as an insoluble mystery (Jn 3-), is but adhering to a principle which the apostles in their teaching never departed from. But the Divine action has the further characteristic that it frames its perfect designs with absolute certainty. Hence the action of the Spirit likewise is set forth in unconditional statements. The Spirit endows man with no mere isolated gifts, but creates him anew. The Spirit gives life; by it men are born of God (Jn 3<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>39</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>42</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>). Man's knowledge is guided by the Spirit in the way of perfect truth (1 Co 2<sup>10-15</sup>, 1 Jn 2-). The faith, hope, and love which the Spirit bestows are enduring gifts (1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>). As the Spirit makes the human will perfectly obedient to the Divine will, the entire demand which is set before believers may be summed up in the precept, 'Walk by the Spirit' (Gal 5<sup>16</sup>). Thus the operation of the Spirit is not restricted to any particular function, as, e.g., the increase of knowledge, or the arousing of joy, or the strengthening of the will. On the contrary, the Spirit lays hold upon human life in its entire range, and brings it as a whole into conformity with the ideal: it gives man power and knowledge, the word and the work, faith and love, the ability to heal the sick, to raise the fallen, to institute and regulate fellowship. It is in virtue of the efflux of the Divine action out of the Divine grace that the work of the Spirit reveals itself in the endowment which raises man to his true life and true autonomy. Thus the thought of the Spirit is associated with the idea of freedom (2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>, Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, Gal 5<sup>18</sup>), inasmuch as man receives from the Spirit a power and a law that are really his own. It is this that distinguishes the operations of the Spirit from morbid processes, which impede the proper functions of the soul. The mental disturbances and the suspension of rational utterance which may be conjoined with experiences wrought by the Spirit are not regarded as the crowning manifestation of the Spirit. Its supreme work consists not in rendering the human understanding unfruitful, but in endowing it with Divine truth, and permeating the human will with Divine love (1 Co 14<sup>14</sup>, Ro 12<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>).

Hence the apostolic doctrine of the Spirit involved no violation of human reason, as would have been the case had it absolved the intellectual processes from the laws of thought; nor did it assign a mechanical character to the will, as it would have done if the prompting of the Spirit had superseded personal decision. The Spirit gives man the power of choice, makes his volition effective, and induces him to bring his will into subjection to the Divine Law. The thought of the Spirit does not do away with the sense of responsibility, but rather intensifies it, and the Law now lays upon the soul a sterner obligation. As 'the conscience bears witness in the Holy Spirit' (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>), its authority is inviolable. Those who live in the Spirit are therefore required to walk after the Spirit by submitting to its guidance (Ro 8<sup>4-13</sup>, Gal 5<sup>25</sup>). Nor does the Spirit lift one above the possibility of falling away. If man receives the gifts of the Spirit in vain, refusing its guidance, and in selfish desire applying these gifts to his own advantage, his sin is all the greater (Eph 4<sup>6</sup>, He 6<sup>4-6</sup>). To this line of thought attaches itself quite consistently the fact that the community suffers no loss of liberty through the doings of those who speak and act in the Spirit. The Spirit gives no man the right to assume despotic power in the community. Hence the injunction not to quench the Spirit is conjoined with the counsel to test all the utterances that flow from the Spirit (1 Th 5<sup>19-22</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>29-31</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>).

As the government of God, the Creator, embraces both the external and the internal, the operation of the Spirit finally extends also to the body. From the Spirit man receives the new, incorruptible, and immortal body (Ro 8<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>41-46</sup>). This manifestation, however, does not take place in the present age, but is connected with the revelation of Christ yet to come. As regards the present, the experience of the Spirit generates the conviction that the goal has not yet been reached, and that the perfect is not yet come, for meanwhile the Spirit makes manifest the Divine grace only in the inner life of man. It is true that in the propositions setting forth the action of the Spirit, the Divine grace finds supreme expression. In them the consciousness of being reconciled to God is clearly set forth. Man's antagonism to God is at an end, and his separation from Him has been overcome. Fellowship with God has been implanted in the inner life, and this determines man's whole earthly career and his final destiny. At the same time, however, the doctrine of the Spirit lays the foundation of hope, and sets the existing Church in the great forward movement that presses towards the final consummation. For it is but in the inner man, and not in the body, or in that side of our being which nature furnishes, that our participation in the Divine grace is realized. Hence the Spirit is called the first-fruits, and the earnest that guarantees the coming gift of God (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>). Thus from the apostolic experience of the Spirit, side by side with faith there arises hope; and, as both have the same source, they reinforce each other.

Here again, therefore, there was a profound cleavage between the Christian doctrine of the Spirit and the pre-Christian ideas regarding it. The former dissociated itself not only from the mantic phenomena that occupy a prominent place in polytheistic cults, but also from the ideas with which the Jewish Rabbis explained the operations of the Spirit in the prophetic inspiration of Scripture. The intervention of the Spirit had been universally represented as the suppression of human personality. This view was founded upon the assumption that a revelation of God could be given only in the annulment of the human, that the voice of God became audible only when man was dumb or asleep, and that the operations of God were visible only when man was deprived of volition by an overpowering impulse. Such notions are far remote from the propositions expressive of the Spirit's work among Christians, although they may to some extent survive in the early Christian view of the OT Scriptures, and the exegetical tradition with which these were read. The profound revolution of thought seen here was not the result of any merely psychological change, or of fresh theories regarding the nature and action of the human or the Divine Spirit, but was due to the transformation wrought in the conception of God by the earthly career of Jesus. The faith that found its object in Jesus penetrated all the ideas by which the Christian community interpreted the government of God, and subordinated them to its recollections of Jesus. The figure of Jesus became the pattern to which all its thoughts about the Holy Spirit were conformed. The disciples had seen in Him a human life marked by a clear certainty, a solemn vocation, and a power of freedom, which were quite individual and personal. Yet that life was wholly given to the service of God, at once revealing His character and fulfilling His will, because the will of God manifested itself in the life of Jesus as grace. This fact did away with the idea that the Spirit of God operates in man only as a force that lays hold of and overpowers him—a view which could seem the sole possible one only so long as the unreconciled mind regarded God as an enemy to be feared. Similarly, there was now no place for the thought that the Spirit of God acted only upon the human understanding, simply endowing the mind with ideas. This view, again, rested upon the belief that the will of man as such was evil, and incapable of being used in the service of God. But Jesus had implanted faith and love in the hearts of His disciples, and their sense of being reconciled to God transformed their thoughts about the Holy Spirit. No longer did they think of the Spirit as annulling the human functions of life, for they now realized that the Holy Spirit made it possible for man to live, not from and for himself, but from and for God.

6. The Spirit given in a special measure to some.—With the belief that the Spirit lays hold of all who accept Jesus was connected the fact that some were regarded as in a special sense 'spiritual' (πνευματικοί). That the Divine love made all men equal was an ideal quite alien to the Apostolic Church. It was expected that the Spirit would establish the fellowship of believers in such a way that each member should retain his own individual type. The fact that the same Spirit operated in all guaranteed the unity of the Christian body. That unity, however, did not degenerate into uniformity, for, since the Spirit works in all as a life-giving power, the community combined in itself an infinite profusion of national, social, and individual diversities. From the one Spirit, accordingly, proceeds the 'one body' (1 Co 12<sup>12</sup>, Ro 12<sup>5</sup>, Eph 4<sup>4</sup>), and this implies that the many who compose the community have not all the same power and function, but differ from one another in their gifts and vocations. Hence, besides the continuous activities which constitute the stable condition of the Christian life—besides faith, love, repentance, knowledge, etc.—there are special and outstanding occasions on which the individual or even an assembly is 'filled with the Holy Spirit' (Ac 4<sup>8-31</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>). Similarly, certain individuals stand forth from the mass as in a peculiar sense the vehicles of the Spirit, and as making its presence and operations known to the community.

To the link with Israel and the acknowledged validity of the OT was due the fact that the highest position among the πνευματικοί was assigned to the prophet. The paramount gift for which the community besought God was the Word, and the prophet was one in whom the Word asserted itself in such manner as to be clearly distinguishable from his own thoughts, and to give him the conviction that he spoke as one charged with a Divine commission. We have here the remarkable fact that prophecy once more arose with extraordinary power in connexion with the founding of the Church. It burst forth in Jerusalem—in Barnabas, Agabus, Judas Barsabbas, Silas, the daughters of Philip—and this fact shows conclusively that the pneumatic character of the Church was not a result of the Apostle Paul's work, but was inherent in itself from the first. In the Gentile communities too, however, prophecy manifested itself immediately upon their foundation; thus we find it in Antioch (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>), probably also in Lystra (1 Ti 1<sup>18</sup>), in Thessalonica (1 Th 5<sup>19</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>2</sup>), in Corinth (1 Co 14), in Rome (Ro 12<sup>6</sup>), in the Churches of Asia (Ac 20<sup>7</sup>); women likewise had the prophetic gift (1 Co 11<sup>5</sup>). As the prophet did not receive the word for himself alone, but was required to make the Divine will known to all, or to certain individuals (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>), he came to occupy a position in the community that had the dignity of an office. To his utterances was ascribed the authority of a Divine commandment binding upon all. Still, the term 'office' can be applied to the position of the prophet only under one essential restriction, viz.

that his function stood apart from anything in the nature of judicial administration, being based upon an inner experience which was independent alike of his own will and the decrees of the community. Thus, besides the vocations of the prophets and the πνευματικοί, certain special offices—the episcopate and the diaconate—were created for the discharge of functions necessary to the life of the community—offices which did not demand any peculiar charismatic gift, but only an efficient Christian life (1 Ti 3). From this development of ecclesiastical order, however, it must not be inferred that there was any secret antagonism to the prophets, or any lack of confidence in the leading of the Spirit. On the contrary, the procedure of the apostles and the communities in instituting these offices simply gave expression to the feeling that special provision must be made for the activities which are indispensable to spiritual fellowship. With that procedure was conjoined gratitude for the prophetic gift which on special occasions helped the community to form decisions without misgiving. The Apostle Paul assisted his communities alike in securing prophetic instruction and in instituting offices (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1</sup>).

Correlative with the word which came from God and was audible in the community was the worship offered by the community; and here, again, besides the thanksgiving that united all before God, there was a special form of prayer, which flowed from a particular operation of the Spirit and was given only to some. This was that form of religious worship for which the community framed the expression 'speaking with a tongue.' It took its rise in Palestine (Ac 2<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>46</sup>), and manifested itself also in the Gentile communities, as in Corinth and Ephesus (1 Co 14, Ac 19<sup>6</sup>). This kind of prayer was specially valued because it directed the speaker's mind towards God with powerful emotion (1 Co 14<sup>2-28</sup>), and because its singular mode of utterance broke through the ordinary forms of speech. As on high the angels praise God with angelic tongues, so the earthly Church worships Him not only with human tongues, but with new tongues—the tongues of angels (1 Co 13<sup>1</sup>). With this was associated the further idea that the utterance given by the Spirit united mankind in the worship of God, those who were meanwhile kept apart by the diversity of tongues being made one in faith and prayer (Ac 2).

As belief in the Spirit involves the idea that it manifests the power of God, a place beside the prophet and the 'speaker with a tongue' was assigned also to the worker of miracles. The special manifestations of the Spirit include that singular intensification of trust in God which brings help to those in special distress, and, in particular, to the sick and those possessed with demons (1 Co 12<sup>9*</sup>). The belief of the community regarding this aspect of the Spirit's work was moulded by its memories of the life of Jesus, and in part also by its ideas regarding the OT prophets. The 'sign' was an essential element in the equipment of the prophet. This appears from the fact that in the miraculous narratives of the NT miracles are not represented as every-day events that may occur in the experience of all believers, but are valued as a peculiar provision for the work of those who bear a special commission. The Gospels, the Book of Acts, and the utterances of St. Paul regarding his 'signs' (2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>), all show distinctly that miracles were intimately related to the apostolic function.

Further, the πνευματικοί as a special class bring out the difference between the religious life of the Christian Church and that of the Synagogue. The prophet was then unknown in the latter, and the Divine word came to it exclusively through the Scriptures. Now, however, the prophetic word taken over from Israel was supplemented in the Church by an operative utterance of God. And just as the Rabbis did not arrogate to themselves the inspiration of prophecy, so they disclaimed the power of working miracles. They did, however, always recognize a supernatural factor in the ordering of human affairs, and in prayer, in dreams, in times of distress, the thoughts of the devout often dwelt upon the Divine omnipotence. On the other hand, the need of ascertaining the Divine will from signs, of interpreting dreams, of listening for Divine utterances, of inferring from one's feelings in prayer that the prayer was heard, of deducing the eternal destiny of the dying from their last words—of all this the NT knows nothing, and that not in spite of, but precisely in virtue of, its doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Inasmuch as the Spirit brings men into conscious union with God, there is no further need for signs—such need having a place in religion only so long as men bow before an unknown God and an inscrutable will. The certitude of the NT worker of miracles who felt that he had a right to invoke the aid of Omnipotence forms the counterpart to the certitude of the prophet who was convinced that he spoke under a Divine compulsion, and it sprang from a conviction that held good for all, viz. that God had revealed Himself in Christ in such a way that the personal life of the believer was rooted in His perfect grace.

III. DIFFERENT TYPES OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE SPIRIT IN THE NT PERIOD.—1. The Pauline.—The considerations by which St. Paul was led towards his new and distinctive theology prompted him also to frame a doctrine of the Spirit.

(a) The Spirit and the Law.—For St. Paul the religious problem had assumed the form: Either the Law or Christ; and he effected his union with Jesus by a resolute turning away from the Law. A religious life based upon the Law forms a clear antithesis to life in the Spirit, for a law externally enjoined upon man—the transgression of which was guilt, and obedience to which was desert—excludes the idea that God Himself acts upon man inwardly. The Law, in short, sets man at a distance from God, making him the creator of his own volition and the originator of his own sin and righteousness. In this fact the Apostle, as a Christian, saw the plight of the Jews, and of mankind in general; for righteousness can be won, not by any performance of the Law, but only by a manifestation of the righteousness of God. Thus from man's own spiritual state arises the problem of how he is to be brought into that relationship with God which is grounded in God's own work and the gift of His grace. The gift of His grace cannot consist merely in a change of man's external condition, as if he had only to look forward to a transformation of nature and a re-organization of the world. To seek for help in that direction would be to deny the Law, the holiness of which consists precisely in this, that it makes obedience to God the condition of His fellowship with man. Hence the grace of God must move man from within, and must so act upon him as to make him obedient to God. That operation of God in man in virtue of which man surrenders himself to God the Apostle finds in the work of the Holy Spirit (Ro 8<sup>1-4</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22*</sup>). Subjection to the Law is thus superseded by subjection to the Spirit (Ro 7<sup>6</sup>), and legal worship gives place to worship offered through the Spirit (Ph 3<sup>3</sup>). Christians are thus absolved from the Law in such a way that the Law is really fulfilled.

(b) The Spirit and the Scriptures.—The obedience rendered by the Jews was based upon their belief that the Divine will had been revealed to them in the Scriptures. The knowledge of God was therefore to be obtained by study of the holy writings delivered to them. The Law produced the scribe, the theological investigator (1 Co 1<sup>20</sup>). As a Christian, St. Paul, however, rejected this method of seeking the knowledge of God as decisively as he rejected the meritorious character of Pharisaic works. How is man to become possessed of the knowledge of God? He knows God only when he is known by Him. But how is he to acquire a knowledge of God that does not come to him through Scripture or tradition, but is given by the Divine leading of his inner life? The knowledge of God is shed forth in man by the Spirit (1 Co 2<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>14</sup>; cf. 3<sup>3</sup>). Here we have the root of that vital contrast between the letter and the spirit which forms one of the distinctive features of the Pauline theology (Ro 7<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>).

(c) The Spirit and the flesh.—St. Paul uses the term 'flesh' to denote man's incapacity to bring his desires into conformity with the Divine Law. The Apostle thereby gives expression to the idea that the inner life of man is dependent upon bodily processes. In deriving the evil state of man from that dependence he was not simply thinking of the impulses which are directly subservient to the needs of the body, but he also recognized in the dimness of man's consciousness of God and the meagreness of his religious experience that despotism of the flesh to which our whole inner life lies in subjection. From ancient times 'flesh' had been used as the correlative of 'spirit.' How is man to rise above himself, and be delivered from the thralldom of sensuous impressions and bodily appetites? The power that sets men free from selfish desire—natural though such desire may be—and turns him towards the Divine purposes, is the Spirit (Ro 8<sup>5-8</sup>).

(d) The Spirit and the work of Christ.—St. Paul recognized in the Death and Resurrection of Jesus the factor which determined the relation of all men to Jesus Himself. That the Messiah had been crucified and raised again from the dead was, in the Apostle's view, the good tidings of God. What St. Paul saw here was not Law, which dooms man to death, but Love, which dies for man; nor was it the separation of the guilty from God, but rather the proffer of such fellowship with Him as takes sin away by forgiveness; it was not the preservation of the flesh, but the complete surrender of it—the judgment of the Divine Law upon the flesh, and the beginning of a new life, a life no longer subject to natural conditions, but one that makes manifest the glory of God. By what means, then, can Christ carry on in man the experience which He had consummated in His own person, and so effect the due issue of His Death and Resurrection? For St. Paul the only answer that could be given to that question was that Christ reveals Himself through the Spirit. Love asks for the fellowship that rests upon an inward foundation, and draws men to Christ not by force but through their own volition. Thus love rises supreme above the interests of the flesh, and is directed to an end that wholly transcends nature. Man now becomes a mirror of Christ's glory (2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>), and his end is to know Christ as the power which raises him from the dead (Pl 3<sup>107</sup>).

(e) The Spirit and faith.—Once St. Paul had come to recognize a revelation of God in the Death and Resurrection of Jesus, it was for him a fact beyond dispute that man's participation in the Divine grace rests upon faith. Man's need of the Divine forgiveness, as well as his actual experience of it, finds its consummation in the fact that he gives his trust to God, and possesses righteousness in faith alone. This attitude implies, however, that he is now delivered from self-centred desire, and has renounced all the cravings of the flesh. But the act of thus committing oneself wholly to the Divine grace is the work of the Spirit. Only in virtue of that work can our faith become our righteousness. The very fact that faith has a source lying above human nature makes it possible for faith to influence our thoughts and desires, so that we can now act by faith, as those who no longer commit sin, but do the will of God.

(f) The Spirit and the Church.—St. Paul, in regarding the Church as the fellowship of faith, thereby made the Church free—the sanctuary of the perfect sincerity which safeguards each from undue accommodation to others, and the home of that perfect love which actuates each to labour with all his capacity on behalf of the common fellowship. St. Paul's confident belief that the communities maintain their unity, even though that community is not protected by external force or strengthened by an outward bond, could have its source only in his conviction that the unity of the Church was rooted in the Spirit. Because he believed in the one Spirit he believed in the one body.

Thus all the lines which exhibit the characteristic tendencies of the Apostle's thought converge in his doctrine of the Spirit. As St. Paul aspired to a righteousness apart from the Law, and to a knowledge of God apart from the wisdom of the world; as he sought to secure the victory over evil by emancipation from the flesh; as he drew from the Cross the conviction that Jesus binds men to Himself in a perfect union, and as he thus came to have faith, and found fellowship with all through faith, he could not make his gospel complete without the doctrine that the Spirit of God dwells in man. Apart from that principle, his doctrine of sin becomes a torment, his opposition to the Law would be antinomianism, his union with the Crucified an illusion, his idea of the righteousness of faith a danger to morality, and his doctrine of the Church a fanaticism. For the vindication of his gospel it was therefore necessary that his Churches should exhibit the workings of the Spirit; only in that way could they become the Epistles of Christ and set their seal upon the Apostle's commission (2 Co 3<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>3</sup>).

The structure of St. Paul's theology renders it unlikely that his doctrine of the Spirit was materially affected by his intercourse with philosophically-minded Greeks. Nowhere in St. Paul do we find concrete parallels either to the Platonic repudiation of sense in favour of reason, or to the Cynic protest against culture, or to the mystical teachings which implied that the soul is an alien sojourner in the body. It is certainly possible, perhaps even probable, that the forceful way in which he made use of the antithesis between flesh and spirit as a means of evoking faith and repentance was in some manner related to the dualistic ideas which prevailed in Greek metaphysics and ethics. But his conscious and successful rejection of all the Hellenistic forms of doctrine in that field is clearly seen in the remarkable fact that there is not a single passage in his letters which would go to prove that the antithesis between the materiality of nature and the immateriality of God, between the concrete image of sense and the pure idea, had any meaning for him at all.

2. The primitive type of the doctrine and its relation to the Pauline type.—It would be altogether erroneous to think that the conviction of the Spirit's indwelling in believers was first introduced into the Church by St. Paul. Every single document of primitive Christianity implies that the possession of the Spirit is the distinctive feature of the Christian society. When Christians spoke of themselves as 'saints,' and thus indicated the difference between them and the Jews, they had in mind not the measure of their moral achievements, but the fact that they were united to God through their knowledge of Christ. Their union with God, however, was rendered effective and manifest precisely in virtue of the Spirit's work in their lives. But while St. Paul relates every phase of the Christian life to the Spirit, so that believers may learn to think of their entire Christian experience as life in the Spirit, and so that the Church may recognize the working of the Spirit in all that it does, the leaders of the Church in Jerusalem keep the thought of the Spirit apart from their own self-consciousness. It is certainly the case that here the Church's relation to God is conceived as determined by the new covenant which the coming of the Spirit has brought to all. The individual believer, however, was not encouraged to find the basis of that belief in the work of the Spirit which he could trace in his own experience; on the contrary, each found the adequate ground of his conviction in that manifestation of the Spirit which is apparent to all. In the eyes of the Church the apostles are those who teach in the Spirit, perform miracles in the Spirit, and administer judgment in the Spirit, and beside them stand prophets who make manifest to all the reality of the new Divine covenant. The conception of the Spirit, however, was not thereby rendered particularistic, nor was its action regarded as restricted to the special class of the πνευματικοί. It was, in fact, impossible for those who confessed Christ, the Perfecter of the community, to divide the community into two groups—those who know God and those who know Him not, or those who obey Him and those who resist Him. Only in the indwelling of the Spirit as shared by all was it made certain that the members of the Church were members of the Kingdom of God. When all is said, however, the consciousness of believers in which they know that they are under the influence of Divine grace is much more vigorously developed in the Epistles of St. Paul than in the documents bearing the Palestinian stamp, viz. the writings of James, Matthew, Peter, and John.

(a) The Epistle of James.—St. James assures those who draw near to God with sincere repentance that God will draw near to them (4<sup>8</sup>). But he does not describe how the presence of God becomes an experience in the penitent. The wisdom that produces pride he reproves as sensual (ψυχική [3<sup>15</sup>]); the true wisdom, on the contrary, is spiritual; but he is content to say of it simply that it comes from above. To one who is in perplexity as to his course, St. James gives the promise that he shall receive wisdom in answer to prayer (1<sup>5</sup>). Here too, therefore, a work of God is said to take place in the inner life—a Divine operation regulating the thoughts and desires of man. That directing power of God acting from within is just what St. Paul calls Spirit, but this term is not used here. Again, man is born of God, through the word of truth (1<sup>18</sup>), and the doer of the Law is brought into the state of liberty (1<sup>25</sup>). Both of these assertions approximate to what is expressed elsewhere in Scripture by statements referring to the Spirit. We thus see that the exhortations of the Epistle are nowhere based upon the legalistic point of view. The injunction of Scripture or the precept of the teacher is never regarded as taking the place of one's own ethical knowledge. Casuistry is set aside, as is also the idea of merit. The individual is called upon to submit to God in his own knowledge and love. But the writer does not deal with the manner in which this autonomous turning of the will towards God is brought about.

(b) Matthew.—An obvious parallel to this appears in St. Matthew. Here baptism into the Spirit implies that, besides the work of the Father and the Son, that of the Spirit likewise avails for all who are called to follow Jesus (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>). Except in this connexion, however, the Spirit is only once referred to, viz. as a special support to those who have to proclaim the message of Jesus before the secular powers (10<sup>-9</sup>).* Nevertheless, the vocation of the disciples, in all its grandeur and its solemn obligation, is realized with extraordinary vividness and most impressively depicted in the First Gospel. The disciples are the light of the world, the stewards of the treasure committed to them by Jesus, the loyal husbandmen through whose labours the vineyard yields fruit for God, the fishers of men who must cast out the net, the sowers to whose exertions the harvest is due. But the Gospel does not show how Christians are to acquire the inward provision for their task. In the conviction that they are the guardians of the commission of Jesus lies also their glad confidence that they are able to discharge it.

(c) First Epistle of Peter.—As Matthew concludes with a distinct reference to the Trinity, so the First Epistle of Peter opens with one (1-). The sequence of the Persons here—God the Father, the Spirit, Jesus Christ—which finds a parallel in the salutation at the beginning of Revelation (1<sup>4</sup>), is probably to be explained by the fact that Jesus is quite unmistakably represented as man, even when He is associated with the Father and the Spirit. The same fact appears also in the statement that His blood and His obedience are the means by which the sanctification imparted by the Spirit is won, in accordance with the foreknowledge of God. The mention of Jesus, accordingly, follows that of the Spirit through whom the humanity of Jesus was endowed with Divine power and grace, just as believers are enabled to participate in what the Cross of Christ secures for them in virtue of the sanctification bestowed upon them by the Spirit. In 1 Pet. the Spirit is spoken of also as constituting the endowment of those who had carried the gospel to Asia Minor (1<sup>12</sup>), and as thus setting them beside the prophets in whom the Spirit of Christ spoke (1<sup>11</sup>). Since the new birth is effected by the Word (1<sup>23</sup>), it is not surprising that the community should be called the Temple. The sacrifices which it offers bear the impress of the Spirit (2<sup>5</sup>). Those who are brought before secular tribunals for Christ's sake are assured that the Spirit of God rests upon them (4<sup>14</sup>), and here the promise which Jesus gave to His disciples is extended to the Church at large. Those who after death obtain the gift of life receive it through the Spirit (4<sup>6</sup>), just as Jesus Himself, after being put to death, was quickened by the Spirit (3<sup>18</sup>). We thus see that this hortatory Epistle proceeds upon the idea that it is the Spirit of God that secures for the Church its portion in the Divine grace. But the Epistle furnishes nothing that can compare with the great utterances of St. Paul regarding the operations of the Spirit, as e.g. in Ro 8, Gal 5, 1 Co 2. 12, 2 Co 3. Its exhortations appeal to the ethical knowledge and the power of volition which reside in believers themselves.

(d) The Johannine writings.—(1) Revelation.—A similar representation is given in the Revelation of St. John. That Jesus governs the Christian society through the Spirit is attested here by its having received the gift of prophecy. What the Apocalypse speaks of figuratively as a writing of Jesus to the angels of the Churches it also design-

* It is true that in 1231f. Christ and the Spirit are conjoined as the revealers of Divine grace, and in such a way as to imply that the offer of Divine grace is consummated through the Spirit, so that the guilt of those who speak against it is irreversible. Yet it is not distinctly said here that the Spirit will become manifest also after the earthly mission of Jesus. The primary reference of the passage is to the revelation of God which is effected by the works of Jesus.

nates literally as a speaking of the Spirit to the Churches (2<sup>d</sup>, etc.; cf. 19<sup>9</sup>). When consolation is given to those who are dying in the Lord, or when the Church prays for the Coming of Jesus, it is the Spirit that speaks (14<sup>13</sup> 22<sup>17</sup>). As every prophet receives the Spirit in such wise as to possess Him individually, the Spirit is also referred to as plural: God is the Lord of the spirits of the prophets (22<sup>6</sup>; cf. 1 Co 14<sup>32</sup>). The relation of the Spirit to Christ is set forth in the assertion that the Lamb has seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God (5<sup>6</sup>): the Spirit gives Jesus the power of vision by which He surveys the world from the throne of God. The Spirit's relation to God is expressed in the figurative statement that the seven spirits burn as lamps before the throne (4<sup>5</sup>; cf. 1<sup>4</sup>): the Spirit is the light of heaven. These figures do not imply, however, that St. John regarded the Spirit as broken up into seven independent and co-ordinate beings. That no such idea was in his mind is evident from the fact that he ascribes these seven Spirits to God and Christ, in whom the unity of personal life is inviolable. Whether the metaphor was in some way suggested by astronomical conceptions, as e.g. the seven heavens, or the seven planets, it is impossible to determine, as other metaphors of the Apocalypse speak only of a single heaven, and never refer to the planets at all. On the other hand, it is clear that the form of the metaphor was in some way influenced by the Messianic interpretation of Zec 4<sup>10</sup>.

The Spirit, however, is not nearly so prominent in St. John's prophetic visions as are the angels. While the Spirit is the source of knowledge—of the omniscience of Jesus and God, and of the certitude of the Christian which surveys the Last Things—yet, when the catastrophic interventions of Divine power in the world's history are to be portrayed, it is the angels who appear as the agents of the Divine purposes. Still St. John summons Christ's people to that heroic conflict and that service of perfect love in which they are ready to die for Christ's sake, and to stand against the world even when, under a single head, it concentrates all its force to make war upon Christ. In this, however, their eyes are not bent upon their own spiritual standing; rather they are turned away from man towards the higher realm where the Lamb seated upon the throne of God rules all things.

(2) Gospel.—The great theme of St. John's Gospel is the Divine sonship of Jesus; the faith of the disciples finds its object in Him, and their love is service to Him. His credentials consist in His possession of the Spirit (1<sup>32</sup> 3<sup>34</sup>). The Spirit is the medium through which Jesus accomplishes His work. Hence the two metaphors with which St. John expresses the work of Jesus, viz. 'life' and 'light,' apply also to the work of the Spirit. The Spirit is one with the word of Jesus, and makes that word the source of life (6<sup>63</sup>). It is associated with baptism in such wise that the water initiates the new life in man (3<sup>5</sup>); it works in the flesh and blood of Jesus, so that they can be eaten and drunk, and thus give life to believers (6<sup>63</sup>). After the departure of Jesus, moreover, the Spirit is the power by which the disciples complete their task, for the truth dwells in them through the Spirit (cf. art. PARACLETE). The Spirit institutes the new type of worship in the community (4<sup>23</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel, therefore, the Spirit is in its Divine pre-eminence exalted above the human consciousness. It is manifested only in its work, and this is simply the Christian life—the faith directed to Jesus, and the love tendered Him; for the Spirit does not reveal itself, but glorifies Christ.

(3) First Epistle.—According to the First Epistle of St. John, again, it is the Spirit that bestows the word—not only the word of prophecy, but also that of confession (4<sup>1-6</sup>). The Spirit becomes manifest in leading men to confess Jesus. Hence it is conjoined with the water and the blood as the power that generates faith in Christ (5<sup>8</sup>), and therefore it is also that gift which manifests and safeguards the perfect fellowship of Jesus with believers (3<sup>4</sup>). It keeps the community from the seduction of error, for it teaches and reveals the truth (2<sup>1-27</sup>). The community must have absolute confidence in the guidance of the Spirit; by its possession of the Spirit it secures fellowship with the apostle, since the Spirit makes it submissive to him (4<sup>6</sup>), and at the same time it secures its independence, since it discovers knowledge for itself, and is not fettered to the apostle. The designation here applied to the Spirit, viz. 'oil of anointing' (χρίσμα [2<sup>7</sup>]), reminds the readers of what imparted the Spirit to them: they possess Him as the property of the Anointed (Χριστός), who consummates His fellowship with them, and shares with them His chrism, in the fact that the Spirit leads them to knowledge and certitude.

The references to the Spirit in all the three documents just dealt with reveal their specifically Johannine colouring in their speaking of the Spirit as the source of knowledge. As the Christian life consists in the knowledge of God, it is the Spirit also that brings about the new birth from God.

That point of view common to all the Palestinian teachers, which distinguishes their utterances regarding the Spirit from the Pauline doctrine, is clearly related, both positively and negatively, to the religious attitude of the Jews. From that attitude sprang the Christian sense of being under obligation to God, and the Christian estimate of obedience as the chief element in religion. The promise of the Spirit did not lead the Christians of Palestine to observe its work in themselves, to find their joy therein, and to enrich and perfect their spiritual life thereby; it prompted them, rather, to do the will of God in obedience to Jesus. It was therefore enough for them that the work of the Spirit should be manifest in the existence of the Church and the word that sustained it. Simultaneously, however, their controversy with the Jews wrought with profound effect upon the religious standpoint of the Christians. The Jew, in virtue of his Divine calling, acquired a proud self-consciousness, and, after every religious effort he put forth, he was inclined to display and admire it. Thus the apostolic preaching came to be a ceaseless striving against religious vainglory. Might not the conviction that the Church possesses the Spirit engender pride? Must it not prove positively baneful that man should discern the workings of Divine grace in the movements of his thought and will? With a humble but bold sincerity the leaders of the Palestinian Church sought to prevent believers from dwelling upon their personal experiences of the Spirit, and discountenanced introspection except as a means of maintaining their union with Jesus in penitence and obedience. In this attitude we see also the strength of the hope which turned their longings towards the coming world and the coming Christ: in that consummation the work of the Spirit will at length be fully manifested in those whom it raises from the dead.

3. Hellenistic-Jewish tendencies.—The tendencies introduced into the Gentile Churches by Hellenized Jews were fraught with important consequences. The issues are seen with special clearness in the Epistles to the Corinthians, but it is evident from 1<sup>h</sup> 3 that similar phenomena had emerged in Rome and Macedonia, while the Pastoral Epistles and the Johannine writings show that they had appeared also in Asia Minor. In this Gentile soil the gift of the Spirit was accounted the supreme prerogative of Christians. But the idea of perfection was taken over from the Greek and Jewish religious tradition, and fused with faith in the Spirit. In Corinth this led to the zealous cultivation of glossolalia—partly because of the state of devout exaltation to which the gift raised the speaker and in which he experienced a strange delight, partly because of the admiration which its striking manifestations evoked. That one who prays should be exalted above reason by the Spirit was regarded as something eminently desirable. Here too, however, Christianity simultaneously acquired an intellectualistic tendency. The Spirit endows man with knowledge, and sets him among the wise who can interpret the work of God. In his conduct, again, the πνευματικός attests his privilege by the daring which enables him to do what for others would be a sin. He enters heathen temples without fear (1 Co 8<sup>10</sup>); he does not need to shun impurity (6<sup>13</sup>), and he can even contract a marriage revolting to ordinary human feeling (5<sup>1</sup>). In Corinth, likewise, the possession of the Spirit was supposed to be attested by contempt for the natural, and this in turn gave rise to ascetic tendencies (7<sup>1</sup>). As the perfectionist finds complete satisfaction in the communion with God bestowed upon him by the Spirit, his hope for the future dies away (15<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>); for naturally such a religious attitude could have no final ideal standing supreme above present attainment. It thus tended to arrest that forward process into which St. Paul had brought his churches (Ph 3). Moreover, the link with the earthly career of Jesus was dissolved. The moral intensity of His call to repentance was not realized, and, accordingly, His Death upon the Cross lost all significance. The Exaltation of Jesus could, therefore, no longer be based upon the self-humiliation in which He became obedient to the death of the Cross (Ph 2<sup>3-11</sup>). The immediate outcome of these views was a division of the Church into distinct groups, since the πνευματικοί had sought to institute a spiritual despotism over it (1 Co 3<sup>5-23</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>-9</sup>), treating the rest—those who did not possess the characteristic tokens of the Spirit—as spiritual minors. These facts explain the manner in which the later Epistles of St. Paul speak of the Spirit; and, with regard to the Johannine writings as well, we must take into consideration not only their relation to the Palestinian type of Christianity, but also their opposition to the πνευματικοί who made the Spirit subservient to religious egotism. Similar considerations must be kept in view in our interpretation of the Epistle to the Hebrews. This Epistle does not treat of the doctrine of the Spirit with anything like the elaboration we find in its Christology; it says very little of the Spirit's work in the Church. It refers to it once as the power which lends authority to the words of those who preach Jesus (2<sup>4</sup>); and, again, it brings out the awful degree of guilt incurred by those who fall away, by pointing to the greatness of the gift they have despised (6<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>).

The apostles sought to maintain the purity of their views regarding the Spirit and to prevent its being made a mere tool of religious egotism by making the Church subordinate to Jesus, and engaging it in the practical tasks necessary to the formation of pure and perfect fellowship within its own circle and in all the natural relations of life. It was the operation of that ideal that led to the ranking of faith above knowledge, and to the expulsion of the egoistic tendency from the religious life of the Church. The preaching of the Resurrection of Jesus as the act of God that procures life for the world (1 Co 15); the concentration of personal volition on the one aim of knowing Christ (Ph 3); the Johannine representation of the unity of Jesus with the Father as that which exalts Him above all; the portrayal of Jesus in Hebrews as the One Priest, who, having Himself been made perfect through sufferings, has also made us perfect—all these converge in a single point: they show that the essential element of the Christian life is faith in Jesus Christ. Perfectionism with its egotistic tendency is thus overcome, for faith turns us away from ourselves, and looks to the grace of Christ as the source of our righteousness and of our spiritual life. In this way the Christian society maintains its place in the great forward process which presses towards the realization of the perfect in the future age.

And with faith in Jesus the apostles co-ordinated the commandment of love, calling upon the Church to engage in the tasks that arise out of our intercourse with one another. This, again, meant not only the overcoming of the intellectualistic tendency which would have made the Church the arena of theological disputation, but also the repudiation of all opposition to the natural relations of human life, for love becomes perfect only when it takes account of our neighbour's situation as a whole, and cares for his natural as well as his spiritual needs. Thus the labours and controversies of the Apostolic Age had as their outcome the establishment of the principle that the Spirit of God manifests His work in man by endowing him with faith and love (cf. 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>).

A. SCHLATTER.

HOME.—1. The English word 'home' represents more than one Greek word; most commonly oikos gives the idea. Thus κατ' οἶκον = 'at home' (Ac 2<sup>46</sup> RV and AVm, and 5<sup>42</sup> RV; AV 'from house to house' and 'in every house'); while κατ' οἴκους in 20<sup>-9</sup> = 'from house to house', AV and RV, private as opposed to public teaching being referred to; and κατὰ τοὺς οἴκους in 8<sup>3</sup> = '[entering] into every house.' 'At home' renders ἐν οἴκῳ in 1 Co 11<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>35</sup>. In 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup> widows' children are bidden εὐσεβεῖν τὸν ἴδιον οἶκον, 'show piety at home' (AV), or 'towards their own family' (RV). In Tit 2<sup>5</sup> RV the young married women are to be οἰκουργοί, 'workers at home' (AV οἰκουροί, 'keepers at home'; the former word is not found elsewhere, but is attested by all the best MSS).

The same idea is given by τὰ ἴδια, lit. 'their own belongings,' in Ac 21<sup>6</sup> ('returned home');* and figuratively in 2 Co 5<sup>6-8</sup> by ἐνδημεῖν, 'to be at home' (lit. 'among the people'), and ἐκδημεῖν, 'to be absent from home'; perhaps also by the phrase, ἐν τοῖς τοῦ Πατρὸς μου, 'in my Father's house' (figuratively, or else lit. of the Temple), of Lk 2<sup>49</sup>. Again, πόλις (Lat. civitas) conveys the idea of a 'home' (cf. He 11<sup>10</sup>, 16 12<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>, and especially Mt 12<sup>-5</sup>: πόλις ἡ οὐκιά). To us the word 'city' conveys the idea of streets and buildings; to a Greek or Roman, and so to an early Christian, it means an organized society which is the home of those who inhabit it (see B. F. Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, p. 388 ff.). So also we may paraphrase Ph 3<sup>20</sup> thus: 'Our home (πῶλος) is in heaven, while on earth we are only travellers and passers-by.'

* Cf. οἱ ἴδιοι, 'one's own people,' in 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>, and especially in Jn 1<sup>11</sup>, where both expressions are joined together. The Incarnate came to His own home (τὰ ἴδια), but His own chosen people, the Jews (οἱ ἴδιοι), received Him not.

2. The idea of home is much dwelt upon in the Pastoral Epistles. There is a striking difference in the NT between the qualifications of an 'apostle' in the widest sense, of a travelling missionary having oversight of the churches (such is also the meaning of 'apostle' in the Didache), and of the local 'bishop' or 'presbyter' and deacon. The 'apostle' may be married (1 Co 9<sup>5</sup>), but his home life is not emphasized; while in the case of the local officials the home is much spoken of. Thus in the Pastoral Epistles the bishop must be husband of one wife, given to hospitality, ruling well his own house, having his children in subjection; for ruling his family well leads to his ruling his flock well; a test of his having trained his children well is that they believe, and are not accused of riot and are not unruly (1 Ti 3<sup>1-5</sup>, Tit 1<sup>6</sup>). Deacons must be husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well (1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>). These Epistles also deal generally with Christian home life: the faithful are to provide for their own households (1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>); married women must be good house workers (above, 1; cf. the virtuous woman of Pr 31<sup>10a</sup>), and must love their husbands and children (Tit 2<sup>4</sup>). Among widows' qualifications is that of having brought up children, who in turn are bidden to requite their parents by supporting the widowed mother and grandmother (1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>; cf. vv. 4<sup>10</sup>). We have several distant glimpses of devout Christian homes in the NT—of Timothy with his mother and grandmother at Lystra, of Philip with his daughters at Caesarea, and of some others, for which see FAMILY.

3. Hospitality is closely connected with the idea of 'home.' For the large guest-rooms which made this possible on a comparatively extended scale, see HOUSE. Instances of hospitality are common in the apostolic writings. Simon the tanner entertains St. Peter (Ac 10<sup>6</sup>), Lydia at Philippi shows hospitality to St. Paul (16<sup>15, 40</sup>), the jailer there brings the apostles into his house and sets meat before them (16<sup>34</sup>); Titus Justus at Corinth (18<sup>7</sup>), Philip at Caesarea (21<sup>8</sup>), Mnason of Cyprus at Jerusalem, or at a village between Caesarea and Jerusalem (21<sup>16</sup>; see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 302 f.), Publius in Malta (28<sup>7</sup>)—all entertained the Apostle hospitably. In Ro 16<sup>23</sup> Gaius is famous for this quality; he is the host of the whole Church, apparently at Corinth (cf. 1 Co 1<sup>14</sup>). It is just possible that he may be the same as the hospitable Gaius of 3 Jn<sup>1, 5</sup>, but the name is a common one. With the last passage contrast the want of hospitality shown by Diotrophes in 3 Jn<sup>9, 10</sup>.

The duty of showing hospitality is insisted on in the case of a 'bishop' in 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>8</sup> (he is to be φιλόξενος), and in the case of a widow in 1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup> (ἐξενδοχῆσεν); and Christians in general are bidden to 'pursue' (Ro 12<sup>13</sup>) and 'not to forget' (He 13<sup>2</sup>) love unto strangers (φιλόξενια), to be 'lovers of strangers' (φιλόξενοι, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>), i.e. not to be givers of feasts but to receive strangers (C. Bigg, St. Peter and St. Jude [ICC, 1901], 173; cf. Job 31<sup>32</sup>). In these injunctions there is a reminiscence of our Lord's words, 'I was a stranger, and ye took me in' (Mt 25<sup>35</sup>). See, further, art. HOSPITALITY.

HONEST.—1. The word 'honest' in the AV bears the Latin (honestus, fr. honor = 'honour') and the older English senses of (a) 'regarded with honour,' 'honourable,' and (b) 'bringing honour,' 'becoming' (art. 'Honest, Honesty' in HDB). It is used in translating (1) μαρτυροῦμένος (Ac 6<sup>2</sup>); the 'deacons' must be men of 'honest report' (AV), i.e. of honourable repute (cf. He 11<sup>2, 39</sup>, etc.). (2) καλός; it is a Christian duty 'to take thought for things honourable' (AV, 'honest') in the sight of all men' (Ro 12<sup>17</sup>), i.e. to live morally above suspicion in the eyes of the world. The same phrase (taken from the LXX translation of Pr 3<sup>4</sup>) occurs in 2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>. St. Paul's precautions to avoid slander in the administration of Church funds provide an illustration of the principle. καλός is translated in the RV 'honourable' ('honest,' AV) in 2 Co 13<sup>7</sup>, and 'seemly' ('honest,' AV) in 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>. Since integrity wins men's moral respect, 'honestly' is retained as the RV translation of καλῶς in He 13<sup>18</sup>, and the RVm rendering of καλῶν ἔργων in Tit 3<sup>14</sup> is 'honest occupations.' (3) εὐσχημόνως (Ro 13<sup>13</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>12</sup>); both the AV and the RV translate 'honestly,' but 'becomingly' or 'worthily' seems preferable (the same adverb is translated 'decently' in 1 Co 14<sup>40</sup>). (4) σεμνα; 'whatsoever things are honest' (AV; 'honourable,' RV) . . . think on these things' (Ph 4<sup>8</sup>). Various renderings have been suggested—'reverend' (AVm), 'seemly' (Ellicott), 'venerable' (Vincent), 'whatever wins respect' (Weymouth), 'the things which produce a noble seriousness' (M. Arnold). The corresponding noun in 1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup> is translated in the RV 'gravity.'

2. The idea of honesty in our modern sense is fairly conspicuous in the writings of the Apostolic Church (cf. the Gospels, where there is practically no direct reference to this virtue; see art. 'Honesty' in DCG). Thieves and avaricious men shall not enter the Kingdom of God (1 Co 6<sup>8-10</sup>). Liars cannot enter the New Jerusalem (Rev 21<sup>27</sup> 22<sup>15</sup>): their part is in the fiery lake (21<sup>8</sup>). Deceit (δόλος) finds its place in the black list of pagan vices (Ro 1<sup>29</sup>): it is one of the signs of an unregenerate world (3<sup>13</sup>; cf. 2<sup>21</sup>); the Christians, becoming new men, must put away falsehood, and speak truth, each man with his neighbour (Eph 4<sup>25, 26</sup>, Col 3<sup>9</sup>). He that stole must steal no more, but must work with his hands 'in honest industry' (Eph 4<sup>28</sup>). None must suffer disgracefully for thieving (1 P 4<sup>15</sup>). The dishonesty of Ananias and Sapphira meets with terrible punishment (Ac 5). Fair dealing in sexual relations is recognized (1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>). A contemptible form of dishonesty is that of a religious teacher whose motive is self-interest, and who is so degraded as to trick his hearers (2 Co 2<sup>17</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>, Ro 16<sup>18</sup>, Eph 4<sup>14</sup>). St. Paul, in contrast, asserts his own purity of motive (1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>16a</sup>, Ac 20<sup>33</sup>) and honesty of message (2 Co 4<sup>2</sup>). The burden of the social-reform prophets of the OT is repeated in the denunciations of the unscrupulously rich—'Behold, the hire of the labourers, who mowed your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth out' (Ja 5<sup>4</sup>). See further art. 'Honest, Honesty' in HDB for literary illustrations of the use of the word 'honest.'

H. BULCOCK.

HONEY (μέλι).—The words of God are often compared to food that is exceedingly agreeable to the palate—sweeter than honey (Ps 19<sup>10</sup> 119<sup>103</sup>). The prophet of the Revelation received from an angel's hand a little book (βιβλαριδιον)—evidently some special source, probably Jewish, which he has incorporated in his own work—and was enjoined to eat it (Rev 10<sup>8</sup>). In his mouth it was sweet as honey (cf. Ezk 3<sup>3</sup>), but as soon as he swallowed it he felt its bitterness (Rev 10<sup>10</sup>). To be taken into God's council and made cognizant of His purposes gave promise of the most delightful experiences; but a prophet's sense of the reaction of Divine holiness against the world's sin, and his call to be the herald of Divine judgments, often made his ministry anything but enviable. Jeremiah, to whom God's revelation, when first received, was the joy of his heart, afterwards found the truth so bitter that he refused to publish it, until it began to be like a fire shut up in his bones (Jer 15<sup>16</sup> 20<sup>9</sup>). Every true messenger of God, resolute in facing hard facts, endured sufferings to which the false prophet, optimistically predicting smooth things, was an utter stranger. 'The persecutions, the apostasies, the judgments of the Church and people of the Lord saddened the spirit of the Seer and dashed his joy at the first reception of the mystery of God' (Alford on Rev 10<sup>10</sup>). The alternation of spiritual joy and sorrow—the μελι and the πικρία of evangelism—has been the lot of every true prophet, ancient and modern. 'Laughter was in this Luther, as we said; but tears also were there. Tears also were appointed him; tears and hard toil. The basis of his life was sadness, earnestness' (Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-Worship, 1872, p. 131).

JAMES STRAHAN.

HONOUR.—In the NT two Gr. words, in various forms, are thus translated: (1) δόξα, δοξάζειν, as in the phrases 'by honour and dishonour' (2 Co 6<sup>8</sup>), and 'one member be honoured' (RVm 'glorified,' 1 Co 12<sup>6</sup>); the words are derived from δοκέειν, 'to think,' 'hold an opinion,' or 'hold in repute or honour'; hence the noun has the significance of 'good-repute,' 'honour,' 'glory'; (2) τιμή, τιμᾶν, τίμιος (from the root τιεω, 'to pay a price' and then 'to pay honour'). τιμή is the most frequent word for 'honour' in the NT. Primarily it means the price which is paid or received for something, as in the phrase 'the price of blood' (Mt 27<sup>6</sup>, also Ac 4<sup>34</sup> 5-19<sup>19</sup>). The metaphorical sense, indicating something of price, worth, or value, naturally follows, like 'dignity,' 'veneration,' 'honour,' and 'ornament,' as in the expression 'a vessel for honour' (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>), 'in honour preferring one another' (Ro 12<sup>10</sup>), 'honour to whom honour' (Ro 13<sup>7</sup>). The verb τιμᾶν is used in the sense of valuing, as 'the price of him that was priced, whom certain of the children of Israel did price' (Mt 27<sup>9</sup>); but elsewhere it has the meaning 'to venerate,' 'hold in honour,' as 'Honour thy father and mother' (Eph 6<sup>2</sup>), 'honoured us with many honours' (Ac 28<sup>10</sup>).

The words δόξα and τιμή and their verbal forms are employed in the LXX to translate כבוד, הדר, and הדר. The two words 'glory' and 'honour' appear together in descriptions of the Exaltation of Christ—'crowned with glory and honour' (He 27<sup>9</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>); of the bliss of the future world—'glory, honour, and immortality' (Ro 27<sup>10</sup>); of what the kings are to bring into the heavenly Jerusalem—'They shall bring the glory and honour of the Gentiles (ἐθνῶν) into it' (Rev 21<sup>6</sup>). The two words are also used together in the description of the triumph of faith's trial 'that it might be found unto . . . glory and honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ' (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>), and in doxologies ascribing 'praise, honour, and glory' to Christ (Rev 5<sup>12</sup>, 13), and to God (1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>, Rev 4<sup>9</sup>, 11 7<sup>13</sup>).

Three passages where τιμή occurs require separate treatment. In 1 Ti 5<sup>17</sup>, 'Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially those who labour in the word and teaching' (RV), the context plainly indicates that the 'honour' is to be taken as 'honorarium' or 'stipend.' The reason given for such treatment is expressed in the words which follow: 'For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his hire' (1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>; cf. J. R. Dummelow, The One Volume Bible Commentary, p. 999; H. R. Reynolds, in Expositor, 1st ser. vol. iv. p. 47; see also HDB v. 441).

In 1 P 2<sup>7</sup> the phrase ὅντιν ἡ τιμὴ τοῖς πιστευουσιν is variously translated: 'Unto you therefore which believe he is precious' (AV); 'For you therefore which believe is the preciousness' (RV); 'in your sight . . . is the honour' (RVm). In the preceding context reference is made to Christ as a 'precious stone' (1 P 2<sup>4</sup>), and if that connexion is maintained in v. 7, the sense would be 'unto you who believe Christ is all that God had declared; you have seen Him as precious, the preciousness.' But it is possible to connect the words with the phrase immediately before them, and read them by way of amplification—'He that believeth on Him shall not be put to shame; unto you therefore who believe he is the honour, or ornament,' i.e. 'instead of shame you find the honour or ornament of your life in Christ.' Our opinion favours the latter rendering.

The other passage is in Col 2<sup>23</sup>, οὐκ ἐν τιμῇ τινὶ πρὸς πλησμονὴν τῆς σαρκός, which is translated, 'not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh' (AV), 'not of any value (honour, RVm) against the indulgence of the flesh' (RV). Both translations are unsatisfactory: the AV because it does not give any clear or practical meaning, and the RV because, though it gives a good sense, it gives a somewhat strained force to πρὸς. Eadie's translation and interpretation seem to us the best: 'Which things, having indeed a show of wisdom in superstition, humility, and corporeal austerity, not in anything of value, are for, or minister to, the gratification of the flesh.' 'The apostle means to condemn these precepts and teachings; his censure is that they produce an effect directly the opposite to their professed design' (Com. in loco). Other commentaries on the passage may be consulted for the various interpretations which are attached to it. WH bracket the words along with the three which precede them, as indicating a doubtful text. It is possible that some word or particle has dropped out of the passage.

The man of the world's conception of honour does not appear in the NT.

JOHN REID.

HOPE (ἐλπίς).—'Hope may be defined as desire of future good, accompanied by faith in its realization. The object both of faith and of hope is something unseen. Faith has regard equally to past, present, or future, while no doubt in Scripture referring mainly to the future. Hope is directed only to the future. Expectation differs from hope in referring either to good or evil things, and therefore lacks the element of desire' (J. S. Banks in HDB, s.v.).

We shall divide our study of the word and idea in the Apostolic Church into two parts: (1) the Pauline conception of hope; (2) the idea of hope in other apostolic and sub-apostolic writings, exclusive of the Gospels.

1. The Pauline conception.—According to St. Paul, hope has for its object those benefits which, though promised to the Christian Church, are not yet within its reach (Ro 8<sup>4</sup>). It is therefore described generally as the hope of salvation (1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>; cf. Ro 8<sup>24</sup>), as indeed the last term includes generally deliverance from all evils and the bestowment of all good. It is the hope of the resurrection (1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>), inasmuch as the resurrection is at once deliverance from death and the beginning of future felicity. It is the hope of glory or of the glory of God (Ro 5<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>27</sup>; cf. 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>), in so far as the happiness of the future state is set forth under the figure of splendour and brightness, involving the perfection of the outward as well as of the inward life. Again, it is the hope of righteousness (Gal 5<sup>5</sup>), i.e. of justification, inasmuch as justification, or the acceptance by God of believers as righteous, is the necessary condition of and prelude to final felicity. Once more, as all these benefits are to be realized at the Parousia of Christ, it is spoken of as the hope of the Lord

(1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). Again, inasmuch as these same blessings are to be enjoyed in heaven, our hope is said to be laid up in heaven (Col 1<sup>5</sup>); and as the mystical indwelling of Christ is the earnest and promise of future salvation (cf. the present writer's Man, Sin, and Salvation, 95 ff.), Christ in us is spoken of as 'the hope of glory' (Col 1<sup>7</sup>).

Hope is also variously characterized by St. Paul in reference to the foundation on which it rests. It is the hope of the gospel (Col 1<sup>2</sup>), inasmuch as it is guaranteed by the gospel promises; it is the hope of the Scriptures (Ro 15<sup>4</sup>), inasmuch as it rests upon those of the O.T. It is the hope of the Divine calling (Eph 1<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>4</sup>), in so far as it is substantiated to the individual by the immediate call of God. It is hope in Christ (1 Co 15<sup>19</sup>), as founded in faith upon Him; while God is the God of hope (Ro 15<sup>13</sup>), as its Object, Inspirer, and Giver (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>).

In Ro 5 St. Paul has described the growth of hope with experience. As justified, we already rejoice in the hope of the glory of God (v.-). Tribulations, however, serve to intensify and deepen our hope. Tribulation works patience, and patience experience (δοκιμην, the approved character of the veteran), and experience hope (vv.<sup>3</sup> 4); and this hope never disappoints, because the love of God is shed abroad in the heart through the Holy Spirit given unto us (v.<sup>5</sup>).

Finally, hope is one of the most distinctive marks of the Christian life in opposition to the hopelessness of the Gentile world (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>; cf. 1 Th 4<sup>13</sup>).

2. In the other apostolic and sub-apostolic writings.—The only difference between St. Paul and the other apostolic and sub-apostolic writers is that, just as they have less of a theological system than St. Paul, so the references to hope in their writings have a less distinctly theological character. But the substance of the idea is the same.

Christians are heirs of salvation in hope (Tit 1<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>). Christ is our hope (1 Ti 1<sup>1</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup>; Ign. Eph. xxi. 2, Magn. xi., Trall. Intro. ii. 2, Phil. xi. 2). We hope in Him (Ep. Barn. vi. 3, viii. 5, xi. 11, xvi. 8), in His Cross (xi. 8). God has united us to Himself by the bond of hope (He 7<sup>19</sup>, 1 Clem. xxvii. 1; cf. Ac 24<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>); we hope in Him (1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>17</sup>).

A striking expression for the value of hope in the Christian life is found in 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>: God has begotten us again unto a living hope by the Resurrection of Christ from the dead. Cf. Ep. Barn. xvi. 8, ἐμψυχίζετε . . . ἐπενοθεύα καὶ νοῦν; cf. also Herm., Sim. ix. xiv. 3, 'When we were already destroyed, and had no hope of life, (the Lord) renewed our life.' Hope, in fact, is the content of the Christian's life (1 P 1<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, He 3<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>; Clement, ad Cor. li. 1, lvii. 2; Ep. Barn. xi. 8; Herm. Vis. i. i. 9, Mand. v. i. 7, Sim. ix. xxvi. 2; Ign. Magn. ix. 1, Phil. v. 2). In the beautiful language of He 6<sup>19</sup> it is, moreover, 'an anchor of the soul, both sure and stedfast, and entering into that which is within the veil; whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us.'

Looking at the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic Age as a whole, St. Paul included, we may say that hope is one of its chief characteristics. 'We are accustomed to describe the Apostle Peter as the Apostle of Hope on the ground of the first letter ascribed to him, but wrongly, in so far as the strong emphasis on hope is not peculiar to him, but can be demonstrated equally in all other writings of this time, although indeed certain nuances exist' (A. Titius, Die NT Lehre von der Seligkeit, iv. 71). The special fervour of hope in the NT and the Apostolic Fathers is, of course, in part traceable to the belief in the immediate nearness of the Parousia, which is common to the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic Age as a whole. The hope of the Parousia brought the future vividly into connexion with the present. Hence Titius in the above-mentioned work thus describes the age in question: 'The value of the present consists (for it), though not exclusively, yet essentially, in that the future belongs to it. If the expectations of the future should turn out to be deceitful, therewith everything which makes the present religiously valuable would be annihilated' (loc. cit.). Christianity, therefore, differs from what has gone before it just in its 'newness of hope' (Ign. Magn. ix. 1), its better hope (He 7<sup>19</sup>).

We may effectively illustrate the meaning of St. Paul's contrast between the hopelessness of the heathen world and the hope of the Christian Church by a reference to E. Rohde, Psyche<sup>3</sup>, ii. 393 f. Here a dark picture is given of the later Hellenic culture. There were certainly hopes of continued existence after death, scattered abroad in the Greek world. But they had no definite or dogmatically defined content. 'And it is forbidden to no one to give his dissentient thoughts a hearing in his own mind and a voice upon his tombstone, though they should lead to the opposite pole from these hopes. A doubting "If" frequently inserts itself in the inscriptions on the graves before the expression of the expectation of conscious life, full sensibility of the dead, the rewarding of souls after their deeds: "if there below is still anywhere anything." The like is to be found often.'

Sometimes even doubt is put on one side, and it is definitely declared that there is no life after death. All that is told of Hades with its rewards and punishments is an invention of the poets. The dead become earth or ashes, pay the debt of nature, and return to the elements whence they were made. 'Savage accusations of the survivors against death, the wild, loveless one, who, without feeling, like a beast of prey has torn from them their dearest, allow us to recognize no gleam of hope of the preservation of the departed life' (p. 394). But, again, complaints are declared to be useless, resignation alone remains. "'Be of good cheer, my child, no one is immortal," runs the popular formula, which is written on the graves of the departed. "Once I was not yet, then I was, now I am no more, what is there further?" says the dead on more than one tombstone to the living, who soon will share the same lot. "Live," he cries to the reader, "since to us mortals nothing sweeter is given than this life in the light" (ib.).

Finally we meet with the thought that the dead lives on in the memory of posterity, in general form and still more in the devotion of his family; this is the only comfort which many a one in this late Hellenism can find to enable him to bear the thought of his own transitoriness.

Over against this sombre background, then, Christianity shines out in the ancient world like a Pharos, radiating the light of a clear and certain hope into the darkness. Nor is that hope absolutely bound up with the nearness of the expectation of the Parousia, though there is no doubt that it was that which gave to the early Christian hope its extreme keenness. The essence of the Christian hope is the hope of immortality guaranteed by God in Christ; as the contrast with the uncertainty of the decadent Hellenic culture well shows.

HORN (κέρας).—Except in Lk 1<sup>69</sup> ('horns of salvation'), the only allusions to 'horns' in the NT are in the Apocalyptic Visions (Rev 5<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>, 11 17<sup>3</sup>, 7. 12. 16). The horn as an emblem of strength and power is obviously derived from the animal world. The bull has always been recognized among primitive peoples as a fitting symbol for strength; hence the horn of a bull, which is the characteristic feature of that animal and its natural weapon of offence, acquired a special significance. We thus find it used symbolically by the Babylonians and Assyrians, the horned cap being the distinguishing mark of the gods. The first occurrence of its emblematic use in the OT is in Dt 33<sup>17</sup>, where Ephraim is said to have the horns of a wild ox (עֲרֵב). Other examples will be found in 1 S 2<sup>1</sup>, 10 and also in 1 K 22<sup>11</sup>, where Zedekiah is said to have made 'horns of iron,' whereby Israel would 'push the Syrians, until they be consumed.' In the later books of the OT the horn is used as 'the symbol of a dynastic force' (cf. Zec 1<sup>18</sup>, Dn 7<sup>7</sup>, 8<sup>3</sup>), and it is used in the same sense in Rev 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>, 11 17<sup>3</sup>.

In Rev 5<sup>6</sup> the 'seven horns' symbolize the power of the Lamb as the victorious Christ, and the 'seven,' which throughout the OT and the NT represents fullness, here denotes the all-sufficiency of that power. In the 'horns of the golden altar' in Rev 9<sup>13</sup> we seem to have an echo of Ex 27<sup>1</sup>, 2; as H. B. Swete says (The Apocalypse of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 121), there may here be some allusion to the 'four corners of the earth' mentioned in 7<sup>1</sup>, and the 'single' voice is a suitable mouthpiece for the single-hearted and unanimous desire of the Church throughout the world. In Rev 12<sup>3</sup> the great red dragon is furnished with ten horns. The horns, however, are not crowned, and it is interesting in this connexion to compare and contrast the account of the wild beast of the sea (13<sup>1</sup>), where the beast is represented as having ten diadems on its ten horns. The ten crowned horns in the latter passage (13<sup>1</sup>) denote ten kings and represent the forces which, arising out of the Roman Empire itself, like horns out of a beast's head, would ultimately bring about its dissolution. The second beast (Rev 13<sup>11</sup>) is of a different character: he has 'two horns like unto a lamb,' but, notwithstanding his gentle and docile appearance, 'he spake as a dragon.' He represents a religious power, and at once recalls the 'false prophets (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>) which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves.' Lastly, 'a scarlet-coloured beast . . . having seven heads and ten horns' (Rev 17<sup>3</sup>), is the undoer of 'the great harlot' (v. 16). The reference is again to the doom of the Roman Empire. The ten horns are 'ten kings which have received no kingdom as yet' (v. 12), but are destined to 'receive authority as kings, with the beast, for one hour.' Both the kings and the beast to whom 'they give their power and authority' will be impotent in their attack against the Lamb, but nevertheless they are destined to be the willing or unwilling agents of the Divine purpose—'they shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh and shall burn her utterly with fire. For God did put in their hearts to do his mind.' The harlot is the great city (i.e. Rome; v. 18), and she was to receive her death-blow at the hands of those who 'have received no kingdom as yet.' The Seer's prediction was amply verified by the numerous invasions of barbarian hordes, which blackened the page of Rome's history in the 5th and 6th centuries A.D., and finally laid its long-established Empire in ruins.

HORSE In the NT, as in the OT, the horse is always the war-horse, never the gentle, domesticated creature beloved by the modern Arab. Asses, mules, and camels were the beasts used by the Jews in common life, both for riding and burden-bearing.

(1) When Christian art depicts the conversion of St. Paul, it usually represents him as falling from an affrighted horse to the earth. The narrative in Acts does not state that he was riding at all, but it seems probable that as the emissary of the High Priest, engaged on important and urgent business (Ac 9<sup>12</sup>), he would not make a journey of 150 miles on foot. His task and his spirit were warlike—he was breathing threatening and slaughter—and he may have taken a small troop of horsemen with him. Strict Pharisees, however, never rode on horseback, and it is at least as likely that he and his companions were mounted on asses or mules.

(2) When St. Paul was arrested in Jerusalem, and had to be taken beyond the reach of conspirators, he was escorted to Cæsarea by a company of 70 horsemen (Ac 23<sup>3</sup>, 3-4). These cavalry, which had been temporarily assisting the Roman garrison in Judæa, had their headquarters at Cæsarea. Josephus makes repeated reference to an ala of Sebastian and Cæsarean horsemen that was attached to the auxiliary cohorts (see Schürer, HJP i. ii. [1890] 52). The single cohort which was stationed in Jerusalem all the year round was apparently re-inforced at the time of the Passover by cavalry and infantry from Cæsarea.

(3) St. James (3<sup>4</sup>) uses the bridling of the horse, whose 'whole body' is thereby turned at the rider's pleasure, to illustrate the complete self-control which a man achieves by merely bridling his lips. It is generally true that if the tongue does not utter the angry word, the hand does not grasp the sword, the feet do not run to evil and make haste to shed blood.

(4) The horse is conspicuous in the symbolism of the Apocalypse (15 references). Like the fiery steed in Job (39<sup>19-25</sup>), he goes forth to meet the armed men, and smells the battle from afar. Whether he belongs to the Church militant, or to some worldly power, or to the under world, he is always the war-horse—always 'prepared unto battle' or 'running to battle' (Rev 9<sup>7</sup>, 9). He is familiar with 'the sounds of chariots' (9<sup>9</sup>). When he appears, we expect to see the rider's drawn sword (19<sup>1</sup>); we are not surprised at the sight of blood; and in one gruesome scene the deep pools of gore come up to the horses' bridles (14<sup>6</sup>). A white horse represents victory, a red horse carnage, a black horse famine, and a pale horse death (6<sup>2-8</sup>). One victorious trooper carries a bow (6<sup>1</sup>); he is the light-armed Parthian, whose shafts were so dreaded by the Romans—'fidementque fuga Parthum versique sagittis' (Virg. Georg. iii. 31). A host of fiendish mounted horses, 200,000,000 strong, armed with breastplates of red, blue, and yellow (of fire and hyacinth and brimstone, 9<sup>17</sup>), are more like the steeds of those heavy-armed Parthians who appeared at Carrhæ 'with their helmets and breastplates flashing with flame . . . and the horses equipped with mail of brass and iron' (Plut. Crassus, 24). But these fiend-horses are monsters, which have the heads of lions, and breathe fire and smoke and brimstone (cf. Wis 11<sup>18</sup>; Virg. Æn. vii. 281). Against the armies of earth and Hades Christ comes forth from the opened heavens sitting on a white horse, and all His followers ride on white horses and are clad in white uniform (Rev 19<sup>11</sup>, 14). The combined forces of evil make war in vain against this Rider and His horsemen (19<sup>19</sup>), who are, in the phrase of a later time, Knights of the Holy Ghost.

JAMES STRAHAN.

HOSEA (Ὡσηέ).—This prophet's gracious words in 2<sup>3</sup>, containing a Divine promise that faithless Israel will be restored to God's favour and be for ever His faithful people, receive in St. Paul's revolutionary exegesis (Ro 9<sup>54</sup>) a new application to the Gentiles, who had not, till the Christian era, been the people or the beloved of God, but who at length become the objects of His love and are called the sons of the living God. Before the coming of the Messiah there was probably no more Christ-like teacher than the prophet of Mount Ephraim, who provided our Lord with His favourite quotation, 'I will have mercy [= hesed, love] and not sacrifice'; and it is evident that his prevision of a new covenant, linking Divine and human love in everlasting bonds, was scarcely less precious to the Apostle of the Gentiles than to the Saviour of the world.

JAMES STRAHAN.

HOSPITALITY (φιλοξενία, lit. 'love of strangers').—Hospitality, by which is meant the reception and entertainment of travellers, is and always has been regarded as one of the chief virtues in the East; it is therefore not surprising to find comparatively frequent references to the duty of its strict observance throughout the pages of the NT (Lk 7<sup>44ff.</sup>, Ro 12<sup>13. 20</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, Tit 1<sup>8</sup>, He 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>, 3 Jn 5<sup>6ff.</sup>). The customs of hospitality were clearly recognized as binding in the time of Christ (Lk 7<sup>44ff.</sup>), and hospitality was regarded as the proof of righteousness, and the natural test of a man's character in the final judgment (Mt 25<sup>35</sup>). The conditions of the time made hospitality practically a necessity for travellers, while it was vital to the very existence of the early Christian Church. The ordinary ties of friendship as well as kinship had in many cases been severed, and Christians regarded themselves and were regarded by the outside world as aliens, bound together as the members of one family. The coherence of that family required that, whenever a Christian migrated from one place to another, he should be received as a welcome guest by the Christians residing there (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> [ICC, 1902], 363) and, indeed, without such hospitality missionary work would have been out of the question (cf. Ac 10<sup>6</sup> 21<sup>16</sup>, Ro 16<sup>23</sup>). We accordingly find it commended and enjoined as a duty incumbent on the various Christian communities in the letters of the apostles, as well as in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers (e.g. Clement*). Thus St. Paul, in writing to the Romans, urges them to 'communicate to the necessities of the saints,' and to be 'given to hospitality.' The duty of entertaining the ordinary wayfarer was not indeed ignored. Thus in He 13<sup>2</sup> the faithful are enjoined not to forget 'to show love unto strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares,' while later on, the heathen writer Lucian† ridicules the liberality shown by Christians towards strangers. Discrimination must, however, be exercised, and no hospitality is to be accorded to those who come as the heralds of another gospel—'receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed: for he that biddeth him God-speed is partaker of his evil deeds' (2 Jn 10<sup>10</sup>).

But the Christian, though under an obligation to strangers in general, was obviously under a greater obligation to his fellow-Christian. The distinction between these two obligations is recognized in 1 Ti 5<sup>10</sup>, where the writer, in his enumeration of the various virtues which qualify women to be 'enrolled' as widows, says, 'if she hath used hospitality to strangers, if she hath washed the saints' feet,' i.e. accorded especial hospitality to Christians as opposed to strangers. The washing of a guest's feet by his host was a mark of honour to the guest and of deep humility on the part of the host (cf. 1 S 25<sup>41</sup>); hence the significance of our Lord's rebuke to Simon the Pharisee (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>), and of His own action at the Last Supper (Jn 13<sup>4ff.</sup>). Again, kissing was and is another act of courtesy usually accorded to strangers of distinction, but significantly denied to our Lord by His Pharisaical host (Lk 7<sup>45</sup>). In Palestine to-day the natives may be seen kissing the mouth, the beard, and even the clothes of their honoured guests (cf. Geikie, The Holy Land and the Bible, i. 143). They refuse all remuneration for their services, but, after three days, the host may ask his guest whether he intends to prolong his stay, and, if so, the host may provide him with work. For three days the hospitality accorded is regarded strictly as a right to which the guest is absolutely entitled, and the guest can, of course, on the expiration of three days, take up his abode in another tent in the same place, and thus renew his right. During his sojourn, the person of the guest is inviolable, and this is the case even if he be the sworn enemy of the man of whose hospitality he is partaking. The Oriental view of the binding nature of this virtue is well expressed in the two local proverbs—'every stranger is an invited guest,' and 'the guest while in the house is its lord.'

HOURL (figurative).*—As in the literal sense 'hour' signifies a point in, or part of, the course of a day, so in the NT it is used metaphorically to signify a point or period in a course of historical development. In Ro 13<sup>11</sup> the use is vividly realistic. The present time of trial is like the dark and gloomy night, but 'salvation' draws nigh; already, therefore, it is 'the hour to awake out of sleep.' With this single exception, the metaphorical sense of the word is peculiar to the Johannine group of writings (cf. Jn 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>3</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>, etc.), and may be defined as the fixed time, in distinction from καρπός, the fit time ('the boast of heraldry, the pomp of power . . . await alike th' inevitable hour'). Thus the Apocalypse speaks (14<sup>15</sup>) of the 'hour' for reaping the harvest of the earth, which is the 'hour' of God's judgment (14<sup>7</sup>) upon the pagan world. To the faithful church in Philadelphia (3<sup>10</sup>) safe-keeping is promised from the 'hour of testing' which is about to come upon the whole earth, i.e. the period of trial which is to usher in the Messianic deliverance. This is defined (13<sup>14-17</sup>) as a time of seduction to the worship of the Beast (the Imperial cult); but in 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup> the sign of this 'last hour' is already seen in the rise of Antichrist, yea, of 'many antichrists,' i.e. the Gnostic propagandists. In many passages the appearance of false teachers is foretold or discerned as a symptom that the last hour of this world's day is running its course (Mt 24<sup>6. 11. 23. 24</sup>, Lk 21<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>1-3</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>3</sup>, etc.).

NT to the structure and appointments of a house will be collected together, and a description of a house in apostolic times will be given, with illustrations from the present writer's observations in his Eastern travels. For 'house' in the sense of those who inhabit the building, and of descendants, see FAMILY.

1. Foundations and materials.—Great attention was paid to the foundations; they were if possible of stone, even if the walls were of mud. The foundations (the apostles and prophets) and the cornerstone (Christ) are the principal elements in the spiritual house (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>). The importance of the foundations of the wall of the holy city is illustrated in Rev 21<sup>14</sup>, by their being adorned with precious stones. It thus happens in the present day that in the ordinary Eastern house the foundations often cost as much as all the rest of the building put together. In places where stone is plentiful all houses are built of that material; otherwise only the very rich men's houses are of stone and all others are built of sun-dried bricks (sometimes of kiln-dried bricks, which are more expensive), or even of mud set in layers, each layer being left to dry hard before the next layer is placed on the top of it. The sun-dried bricks are made simply of clay with which chopped straw is mixed (Ex 5<sup>7</sup>), and are set to dry in the sun for a few days before they are wanted for the building. Thus brick-making and house-building go on together on the same ground. The perishable nature of the material explains why, with the exception of the royal palaces, which were built of stone, nearly all Nineveh has completely vanished. If Layard's rather doubtful theory is correct (Nineveh and its Remains, London, 1849, vol. ii, p. 236 ff.), that vast city of 'three days' journey' [round the walls] (Jon 3<sup>3</sup>) occupied the large area between the fortresses, which alone remain to this day, and was some 75 miles in circumference; but of the buildings in the centre of the area there is not a trace. The same thing also explains the references to 'digging through' houses in Mt 6<sup>19</sup> 24<sup>43</sup>, Lk 12<sup>39</sup>; this is quite an easy thing to do.

2. The roof (δῶμα; sometimes στέγη, Mt 8<sup>8</sup>, Lk 7<sup>6</sup>).—This is flat, made of mud laid on beams of wood, crossed by laths, and covered with matting. It is used in summer as a sleeping-place, and by day (especially in the evening) as a sitting-room, or often as a promenade, for roofs of adjacent houses in the villages are frequently joined together. It is possible sometimes to walk from one end of the village to the other without descending the ladders or staircases to the courtyards and streets. Hence in time of persecution the fugitive would do well to flee along the roofs rather than fall a prey to the enemy in the streets (Mt 24<sup>17</sup>, Mk 13<sup>15</sup>, Lk 17<sup>31</sup>). So St. Peter goes to the roof to pray (Ac 10<sup>9</sup>). The roof is a favourite place for village gossip; this is the 'proclamation on the housetops' of Mt 10<sup>27</sup>, Lk 12<sup>3</sup>. The nature of the material of the roof explains how easy it was to dig through it (Mk 2<sup>4</sup>, ἐξορύξαντες; cf. Gal 4<sup>15</sup>) in order to let the paralytic down; the mention of tiles in || Lk 5<sup>19</sup> is merely a paraphrase adopted by St. Luke for the comprehension of his more Western readers—or at least of readers less acquainted with the customs of Palestine than those of St. Mark (W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, 1898, p. 57 f.).

3. The windows (θυρίδες).—In the East these now usually look into the courtyard, not into the street, as privacy is of the greatest importance. Such was probably the case in Ac 20<sup>9</sup>, where Eutychus, sitting in a window, falls from the third story (ἀπὸ τοῦ τριστέγου); as Eastern houses are usually of two stories (for the kitchen see below), we must here have an exception to the general rule. It is not common for windows to be in the outside wall of a town; yet this must have been the case in Ac 9<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>33</sup>, where St. Paul is let down through the town wall and escapes, in both cases from Damascus, for both passages seem to refer to the same incident (cf. also Rahab, Jos 2<sup>15</sup>). Except in the better houses, no glass is used in the windows; oiled cotton or paper serves instead of glass in the winter, being removed in the summer. Glass (other than that used for mirrors) is mentioned in the NT only in Rev 4<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>18</sup> -1; its costliness in ancient times, as in the modern East, is seen by its being coupled with gold in Job 28<sup>17</sup> RV.

4. The house-gate.—The door or gate itself is θύρα (Mk 2-, Jn 18<sup>16</sup>, figuratively in Rev 3<sup>20</sup>), but πύλων is the gateway or entry of a house, especially if large, as well as of a city (Mt 26<sup>71</sup>, Lk 16<sup>20</sup>, Ac 10<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>38</sup>); in the last passage the full expression 'door of the gate' (θύρα τοῦ πύλωνος) is used, but in v. 14 πύλων includes θύρα, for it is 'opened' by Rhoda; cf. artt. DOOR and GATE). For a house-gate πύλη is not ordinarily used; it is the gate of a city, and so of a public building like the Temple or a prison (Ac 3<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>10</sup>, but 3<sup>2</sup> has θύρα). The house-gate was naturally kept locked in troublous times, as in Ac 10<sup>17</sup> 12<sup>13-16</sup>, and was guarded by a porter (Mk 13<sup>34</sup>, ὁ θυρωρός) or a portress (Jn 18<sup>16</sup>, ἡ θυρωρός; cf. Mk 14<sup>69</sup>, Ac 12<sup>13</sup>), just as the figurative sheepfold in Jn 10<sup>3</sup> is guarded by 'the porter,' probably the Holy Spirit (H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, p. 146). The entry (πύλων) is either the same as, or else leads into, the fore-court (προαυλιον) of Mk 14<sup>68</sup>, where || Mt 26<sup>71</sup> has πύλων. Outside the gate of the great houses the beggars sit (Lk 16<sup>20</sup>, Lazarus), as they did at the gate of the Temple (Ac 3<sup>2-10</sup>). Inside the gate, perhaps in the fore-court, were the water-pots for washing (Jn 2<sup>6</sup>); evidently not in the guest-room.

6. The kitchen.—The kitchen itself is not mentioned in the NT, though the oven (Mt 6<sup>20</sup>) and kitchen utensils (Mk 7<sup>1</sup>) are referred to. Yet in all but the richer houses it is the most commonly used part of the house, and the family ordinarily live in it; in some Eastern countries it is emphatically called 'the house' as opposed to 'the rooms.' The oven is a hole in the floor; the fire, of dried manure, is kindled at the bottom; and the sides are made of hardened clay, to which the flaps of dough adhere until they are baked and ready to be hooked out as bread. Other food is cooked over the fire in pots. As there is no chimney (in our sense of the word), the kitchen must necessarily be of one story only, to allow of a hole in the roof for the escape of the smoke.

7. The rooms.—(a) There is not in the East, in the ordinary houses, the distinction usually found in the West between bedrooms and sitting-rooms. The latter are turned into bedrooms by spreading the bedclothes on the floor. Thus the 'bed-chamber' (κοιτών, Ac 12<sup>20</sup>) of which Blastus was guardian would be unusual except in a great house such as that of Herod.

(b) Most houses, even of the comparatively poor, have a fairly large room or rooms, often, but not always, on the first floor, to entertain guests who come unexpectedly, for Eastern hospitality is great

(see HOME). Hence we read that the upper room (ἀνώγειον or ἀνώγειον or ἀνωγέων or ἀνάγειον) of Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, Lk 22<sup>14</sup>, was large, and it is expressly called a 'guest-chamber,' κατάλυμα, i.e. a place where the guests unpack their baggage; it may be doubted if κατάλυμα in Lk 27 is rightly rendered 'inn,' for this in 10<sup>34</sup> is called πανδοχείον. Probably the κατάλυμα was a guest-chamber in a house where Joseph expected to lodge, but it is a word elastic in meaning (see A. Plummer, St. Luke<sup>2</sup> [ICC, 1898], 54). The upper room of the Last Supper was very probably the place where the Ten and the rest were assembled on Easter Day, and if so must have been somewhat large, though the word used (ἡθροισμένοι, Lk 24<sup>33</sup> RV; cf. v. 9) suggests crowding, just as the compounds συνθηροισμένοι, συναθροίσας in Ac 12<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>25</sup> suggest a large assembly. In Acts the word used for such an upper room is υπερώον, 1<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>37</sup>. 39 (Dorcas) 20<sup>8</sup> (at Troas). The room mentioned in 1<sup>13</sup> must have been large, for it held 120 people; and it was perhaps the same as the coenaculum of Mk 14<sup>14</sup>, for it is called 'the upper room' (RV). It has been suggested that as different words are used, the rooms must have been different; yet this would not account for St. Luke's using ἀνώγειον in his Gospel, and always υπερώον in Acts. It was no doubt in such a guest-chamber on the first floor that Jesus healed the paralytic, for it was under the roof. (With this arrangement for an upper room we may compare the ordinary provision in a caravanserai of a room or rooms over the gateway for the guests, while the stables are below, and round the courtyard.) Such an upper room is probably the ξενία in Philem<sup>22</sup>, Ac 28<sup>23</sup>—a lodging in a private house. In response to St. Paul's request, Philemon would doubtless offer his own guest-room. When the Apostle arrived in Rome he probably at first lodged, guarded by soldiers, in the guest-room of a friend, though afterwards he hired a private house (μίσθωμα, Ac 28<sup>30</sup>). For the use of these guest-rooms as the first Christian churches, see FAMILY.

8. Paving of the rooms.—This is very seldom of wood (except in Solomon's Temple, 1 K 6<sup>15</sup>. 30, where the wood was overlaid with gold), but, even on the upper floors, of beaten mud, sometimes of a sort of cement. In rich houses pavements of stone or marble were used; thus the Gabbatha (Λιθόστρωτον) of Jn 19<sup>13</sup> was probably a hall paved with stone.

9. Furniture of the rooms.—Very little is said of this in the NT; and, in truth, Eastern houses need little furniture. Carpets (with straw mats under them to protect them from the mud floor), mattresses, and bedclothes are practically the only necessities. When we read in the NT the various words for a 'bed' as used for sleeping in—κλίνη (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Lk 5<sup>18</sup>), κλινίδιον (Lk 5<sup>19</sup>. 24; the same as κλίνη, v. 16), κράββατον (Mk 2<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>55</sup>, Jn 5<sup>5</sup>)—only mattresses and bedclothes are meant. The man who rises in the morning 'takes up his bed,' and, rolling it up in an outer cover, places it against the wall, where it serves as a cushion in the day-time. The same is probably true of κλίνη in Mk 7<sup>30</sup>, Lk 17<sup>34</sup>, Rev 2<sup>22</sup>, where either sense is possible; and of the κλινάρια καὶ κράββατα in Ac 5<sup>15</sup> (inferior MSS substitute κλιναι for the former word), where the sick are laid in the streets. On the other hand, the low couches (κλιναι, triclinia, τρικλινια [the last not in the NT]) used for meals are clearly articles of furniture in Mk 4<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>4</sup> (here a 'Western' addition, but it may be genuine), Lk 8<sup>16</sup>; for a lamp may be put under them (cf. ἀρχιτερλκινος, Jn 2<sup>8</sup>). On these couches the people reclined; hence ἀνακειμαι is 'to sit at meat' (Mt 9<sup>10</sup>, etc.), and the guests are ἀνακείμενοι (Mt 22<sup>10</sup>). It seems doubtful if bedsteads are ever mentioned in the NT; see, further, art. BED, COUCH. The 'candlestick' or lamp-stand (λυχνία) mentioned in the above passages is also a piece of furniture, set in the middle of the room to hold the light. Chairs and tables are not much used by non-westernized Orientals to this day; but sometimes a low stand is placed on the floor to hold food at meals, though more often the meats are placed on a tablecloth on the ground. Thus 'table' in the Bible does not usually denote an article of furniture, except in the case of the money-changers in Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>15</sup>, where a house is not being spoken of. The throne (βῆμα), of a king is mentioned in Ac 12<sup>1</sup>, and figuratively the θρόνος of God and the θρόνοι of angels or men (Mt 19<sup>8</sup>, Rev 20<sup>4</sup>, etc.) are spoken of; but ordinary people sat, as they still sit in the true East, on the ground, or on cushions, though chairs or seats (καθέδραι) were not unknown (Mt 21<sup>1</sup>, Mk 11<sup>15</sup>).

HUMILITY (ταπεινοφροσύνη).—1. In the OT.—The word is common in the NT, but, according to Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 109), does not occur earlier. 'Even the adjective ταπεινόφρων and the verb ταπεινοφρονεῖν, though occurring once each in the LXX (Pr 29<sup>23</sup>, Ps 130<sup>7</sup>), appear not to be found in classical Greek before the Christian era.' Moreover, in heathen writers ταπεινος has almost invariably a bad meaning: it signifies 'grovelling,' 'abject.'

'It was one great result of the life of Christ,' says Lightfoot (loc. cit.), 'to raise "humility" to its proper level; and, if not fresh coined for this purpose, the word ταπεινοφροσύνη now first became current through the influence of Christian ethics.'

All the same, it is to be recognized that the virtue of humility is greatly commended in the OT, and its place in the Christian ethic can only be properly understood when we remember this. Especially in the Psalms and Proverbs and some of the Prophets is the value of humility recognized, and the NT writers sometimes enforce what they have to say on the subject by a quotation from the OT (cf., for instance, Pr 3<sup>34</sup>, Ja 4<sup>6</sup>).

2. In the NT.—The value of humility was a chief point in the teaching of Jesus Himself, and the apostolic writers follow Him in their estimate of it. The root of humility, as it is described in the NT, is a true estimate of oneself as in the sight of God. It presupposes, therefore, a knowledge of our weakness. 'Recognizing this, man ceases to hold himself of great account, and therefore easily believes that others are more excellent than himself, nor takes it amiss that they are preferred before him' (J. F. Buddeus, Institutiones Theologiae Moralis, Leipzig, ed. 1727, p. 141).

Above all, however, the recognition of one's position in the sight of God leads to humility towards Him. Before Him no one can boast (1 Co 4<sup>6</sup>); whatever merit one possesses rests upon the Divine grace (1 Co 4<sup>7</sup>). 'He is humble before God, who attributes nothing to himself, or to his own strength, and regards himself as simply unworthy of all Divine benefits' (Buddeus, loc. cit.; cf. 1 P 5<sup>6</sup>, Ja 4<sup>16</sup>, Ac 2<sup>20</sup>).

But, as has been already indicated, humility is also to be exercised towards our fellow-men. St. Paul and St. Peter alike enforce the need of such humility (Ph 2<sup>3-5</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>; cf. 1 Co 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>5</sup>). St. Paul, moreover, adduces as the great example of such humility the humility of Christ in the Incarnation, in that He laid aside the form of God, and took upon Him that of a servant, becoming obedient to death, even the Death of the Cross (Ph 2<sup>5-8</sup>). It is not necessary here, in simply treating of the virtue of humility in the apostolic writings, to go on to discuss the Kenosis, on which so much has been said and written; but it may perhaps fitly be pointed out how this instance of the Lord's humility in the Incarnation has been made use of in Catholic Christianity from Augustine onwards. Pride, according to St. Augustine, is the root of all sins; therefore to cure it God wrought in the Incarnation by introducing into humanity the antidote of humility. The humility of Christ is the cure of man's pride. By St. Francis of Assisi this humility of Jesus was connected closely with the thought of His earthly privations; and thus was struck the key-note of the peculiar mediæval piety of the imitation of the lowly Jesus.

3. In the Apostolic Fathers.—Among the sub-apostolic writings outside the NT, 1 Clem. stands out because of its particular emphasis on humility. It may indeed almost be regarded as a sermon on humility, with many instances, examples, and exhortations. The emphasis on this particular virtue follows naturally from the situation at Corinth, which the Epistle of the Roman Church through Clement is intended to deal with. A contention has taken place in the Church, in which two parties are involved. The majority of the community are on the one side, led by a few headstrong and self-willed persons (1<sup>1</sup>). On the other side are the officers of the Church, the presbyters, with very little support in the Church. During the conflict some presbyters have actually been deposed by the Church (44<sup>6</sup>). The Epistle of the Roman Church, indited by Clement, is intended to bring about the submission of the Church to its presbyters, and so restore unity. No wonder then that such stress is laid on the virtue of humility. What is aimed at is to produce a proper submission to constituted authority in place of the present sedition against it. To quote the passages on humility would occupy too much space. ταπεινός occurs in xxx. 2, lv. 6, lix. 3; ταπεινοφρονέω in ii. 1, xiii. 1, 3, xvi. 1 f., 17, xvii. 2, xxx. 3, xxxviii. 2, lxii. 2; ταπεινοφροσύνη in xxi. 8, xxx. 8, xxxi. 4, xlv. 3, lvi. 1, lviii. 2; ταπεινοφρων in xix. 1; ταπεινός in xviii. 8, 17, lix. 3; and ταπεινούς in xvi. 7, liii. 2, lv. 6. Two passages will give an idea of the general drift of the exhortation and argument on the point of humility. 'Let us therefore be lowly-minded, brethren, laying aside all arrogance and conceit and folly and anger, and let us do that which is written. For the Holy Ghost saith, Let not the wise man boast in his wisdom, nor the strong in his strength, neither the rich in his riches; but he that boasteth, let him boast in the Lord, that he may seek Him out, and do judgment and righteousness' (xiii. 1 [Lightfoot's tr.]). 'For Christ is with them that are lowly of mind, not with them that exalt themselves over the flock. The sceptre [of the majesty] of God, even our Lord Jesus Christ, came not in the pomp of arrogance or of pride, though He might have done so, but in lowliness of mind, according as the Holy Spirit spake concerning Him [here are quoted Is 53<sup>1-2</sup> and Ps 22<sup>6-8</sup>]. Ye see, dearly beloved, what is the pattern that hath been given unto us; for if the Lord was thus lowly of mind, what should we do, who through Him have been brought under the yoke of His grace' (ib. xvi. 1, 2, 17).

The Epistle of Barnabas also commends humility: it is a point in the way of light (xix. 3). Cf. also Ign. Smyrn. vi. 1, 'Let no one's position puff him up; for faith and love are everything, of which things nothing takes precedence.' Cf. yet again Hermes, Mand. xi. 3, where humility appears as the mark of the true prophet, by which he may be surely known from all false prophets.

4. St. Paul and false humility.—In conclusion, mention must be made of St. Paul's condemnation of a false humility in Col 2<sup>18-23</sup>. Certain false teachers had appeared at Colossæ, who maintained that a perfection beyond that attainable by ordinary Christians could be realized only by a γυμνάσις, which paid special worship to the angelic powers, and revered the particular ordinances enjoined by them. 'Amongst these ordinances were Jewish circumcision and the observance of Jewish feast-days, new moons and sabbaths. We may remember that Paul himself in Gal. (3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>3</sup> 8-10) regards the Jewish ceremonies as ordinances of the angels of the Jewish law. But it was not merely the Jewish law which was observed by the Colossian teachers; they added other precepts of their own of an ascetic character by the observance of which especially communion with the angels might be attained. The idea is that, as the angels are above this world, so the ascetic, by cutting himself off from the things of the world, draws near to the angels, and becomes fit to associate with them' (R. S. Franks, Bible Notes on the Writings of St. Paul, 1910, p. 76).

St. Paul declares all such subservience to the angels to be a false humility, inasmuch as it detracts from the true reverence due to Christ alone, who is the Head of the angels, whose power over the world, moreover, He has broken by His Cross, by dying on which He annulled the bond they held against men in the Law (Col 2<sup>14-15</sup>).

HYACINTH.—See JACINTH.

HYMENÆUS.—Hymenæus is a heretic mentioned in 1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup> in conjunction with Alexander (q.v.) as one who had made shipwreck of the faith and, therefore, had been delivered to Satan. He is also mentioned in 2 Ti 2<sup>17</sup> in conjunction with Philetus as teaching a doctrine which ate into the body of the Church like a gangrene—the doctrine that the resurrection was past already. Nothing further is known of the three teachers mentioned in the two texts, and their sole importance to the student lies in the nature of their doctrine. It came from the masters of Gnosticism, who from Simon Magus onwards had taught the inferior or evil character of matter, in opposition to the fathers of the Catholic Church, who assigned to the world a sacramental character. According to Irenæus (adv. Hær. II. xxxi. 2), the followers of Simon and Carpocrates taught that 'the resurrection from the dead was simply an acquaintance with that truth which they proclaimed.' Tertullian (de Res. Carn. xix.) charged his adversaries with alleging that even death itself was to be understood in a spiritual sense, since death was not the separation of body and soul, but ignorance of God, by reason of which man is dead to God, and is not less buried in error than he would be in the grave.

'Wherefore that also must be held to be the resurrection, when a man is re-animated by access to the truth, and having dispersed the death of ignorance, and being endowed with new life by God, has burst forth from the sepulchre of the old man, even as the Lord likened the Scribes and Pharisees to "whited sepulchres" (Mt 23<sup>27</sup>). Whence it follows that they who have by faith attained to the resurrection are with the Lord after they have once put Him on in their baptism.'

The ground for this spiritualizing of death is given in a homily of Valentinus quoted by Clement Alex. (Strom. iv. 13):

'Ye are originally immortal, and children of æonian life, and ye willed that death should be your portion, that you might exhaust it and consume it, so that death might die in you and through you. For, when you release the world, you yourselves are not undone, but are lords over creation and over all corruption.'

According to Clement, Basilides also held that a 'saved race' had come down from above in order to remove death, and that the origin of this death was to be sought in the Demiurge. And a little later in the same chapter Clement tells us that the followers of Valentinus called the Catholics 'psychical,' as did the 'Phrygians,' the implication being that the Catholics thought, when death was mentioned, of the death of the body, and the Gnostics of the death of the soul. A further implication is that the moment of regeneration, or of passing through the third gate, overshadowed in the Gnostic mind the incident of physical death, as not merely giving a change of status, but as being an actual admission into the Divine world, and therefore into a world over which physical death had no jurisdiction. With this should be compared the passage in Rev 20<sup>6</sup>, which speaks of 'the first resurrection' and of the blessed and holy state of him who had part in it. 'It is "the souls" of the martyrs that St. John sees alive; the resurrection is clearly spiritual and not corporeal' (H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 1907, p. 266). In agreement with this we have Jn 5<sup>21</sup>, which says that both Father and Son quicken the dead and raise them up; and v. 24, which declares that he who has come to put his trust in the Son hath passed out of death into life. (The clause which refers the resurrection to the last day in Jn 6<sup>40, 44, 54</sup> may be suspected, with J. Kreyenbühl [Das Evang. der Wahrheit, Berlin, 1905, ii. 52], to be an interpolation.)

The delivering of Hymenæus and Alexander to Satan is to be understood as an excommunication from the fold of grace and safety, and a consequent transition into the world outside the Church where Satan has his throne—the world of suffering, disease, and death. It is not impossible that 'Hymenæus' is an ironical nickname denoting that the bearer was one who shared the Gnostic dislike of marriage, or else scoffing at the Gnostic doctrine of the mystic marriage of the soul with the spirit. Cf. ANTIPAS, BALAAM, NICOLAITANS.

HYMNS.—The hymns of the Apostolic Church included the OT Psalms and the Evangelical Canticles of Lk 1 and 2. We possess also some fragments embedded in NT writings, which show how they were used to express religious emotion both in public and in private. St. Paul suggests further that they should be used for instruction and warning (Col 3<sup>16</sup>). He distinguishes (as in Eph 5<sup>19</sup>) between three kinds—psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs (odes) (see PSALMS, SPIRITUAL SONGS). The word 'psalm' (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>, Ja 5<sup>13</sup>) properly includes the idea of a musical accompaniment (Basil, Hom. in Ps. 44; Greg. Nyss., Hom. in Ps., ch. iii.). The word 'hymn' might be used of a song of praise to God whether accompanied or not. The word 'song' ('ode') applies to all forms of song, and was in fact a general term for lyrical poetry. In Eph 5<sup>19</sup> the terms 'singing' and 'playing' correspond with the words 'hymns' and 'psalms.' They are to be addressed 'to the Lord,' just as Pliny in his famous letter to Trajan (Ep. x. 97) describes the Christians as meeting before dawn and singing a hymn to Christ as God anthropomorphically (secum invicem).

The fragment in Eph 5<sup>14</sup>

'Awake, thou that sleepest,
And arise from the dead,
And Christ shall shine upon thee' is possibly a fragment of a hymn addressed to a convert at baptism.

Another fragment is 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>:

'He who was manifested in the flesh,
Justified in the spirit,
Seen of angels,
Preached among the nations,
Believed on in the world,
Received up in glory.'

Such examples throw light on the difficult question of the source of the quotation in 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> which is apparently a free translation or paraphrase from the Hebrew of Is 64<sup>1</sup>. Clem. Rom. (ad Cor. xxxiv.) mixes it up with the LXX. According to Jerome, the passage occurs in the Ascension of Isaiah and the Apocalypse of Elias. Origen (on Mt 27<sup>9</sup> [Migne, Patr. Græca, xiii. 1769]) says St. Paul quotes from the latter. As Lightfoot puts it (Notes on Epistles of St. Paul, 1895, p. 177), 'If it could be shown that these apocryphal books were prior to St. Paul, this solution would be the most probable.' But they are not. So we fall back on the suggestion that St. Paul (and they also?) quoted an early Christian hymn based on Isaiah like the Sanctus of the liturgies.

The doxologies in 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup> may likewise have been fragments of hymns. Only one of the hymns in the Apocalypse alludes to the situation described in the vision, i.e. 5<sup>8</sup>, referring to the opening of the Book with the Seven Seals. The rest express generally the praise which the Church offers to God and to Christ. It is quite natural that reminiscences of Christian hymns should find their way into the seer's book. On the other hand, if they are the first effort of an inspired imagination, we may regard them as types of future hymnody. The Song of Moses in 15<sup>3</sup>, like the older Song of Moses in Dt 32, which was used as a Sabbath hymn in the Jewish liturgy, found its way into the liturgical Psalter of Codex Alexandrinus.

The Song of the living creatures in 4<sup>8</sup> varies from the Sanctus of Isaiah's vision which is followed in the Liturgies and the Te Deum. It is addressed to God as Almighty, and evokes the response of the elders, who in the words 'our God' claim 'a relation to Him which the Creation as such cannot claim' (H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 1907, p. 74).

In 5<sup>12</sup> the angels offer a fuller doxology to the Lamb, and the response of all creation with a four-fold doxology, and of the living creatures with the familiar 'Amen' which ended the eucharistic thanksgiving of the Church on earth, is 'highly suggestive of the devotional attitude of the Asiatic Church in the time of Domitian towards the Person of Christ' (Swete, op. cit. p. 84). Of a similar character is the Song inserted in the prophecy (11<sup>15-18</sup>) when 'great voices' announce the coming of the kingdom, and the elders respond:

'We give thee thanks, O Lord God, the Almighty,
Which art, and which wast;
Because thou hast taken thy great power, and didst reign.
And the nations were wroth,
And thy wrath came,
And the time of the dead to be judged,
And to give their reward to thy servants, the prophets,
And to the saints,
And to them that fear thy name,
The small and the great;
And to destroy them that destroy the earth.'

The writings of the Apostolic Fathers add nothing to our knowledge, though Ignatius delights in the thought of the hymn of praise for his martyrdom which the Church in Rome will sing (ad Rom. 2): 'that forming yourselves into a chorus in love ye may sing to the Father in Jesus Christ, for that God has vouchsafed that the bishop from Syria should be found in the West, having summoned him from the East' (cf. Eph. 4).

From these hints we may construct an outline of the psalmody of the early Church, to which we may probably add a very interesting collection of private psalms recently discovered by Rendel Harris and published by him in 1909—the Odes of Solomon (q.v.). He found them with the Psalms of Solomon in a MS of the 15th or 16th cent. from the neighbourhood of the Tigris. He thinks that they were written in Palestine about the year A.D. 100 (Batiffol [Les Odes de Salomon, Fr. tr. by Batiffol and Labourt, 1911] gives the date as 100–120). On the other hand, Harnack (TU, 3rd ser. v. 4 [1910]) regards all the Christian allusions as interpolations of the date c. A.D. 100 in an earlier Jewish collection of c. A.D. 70. He calls the finding of the Odes the most important discovery since the Didache, and epoch-making for the higher criticism of the Gospel of John, because these Jewish Odes (not only the Christian edition) contain all the essential elements of the Johannine theology, together with its religious tone. F. C. Burkitt, however (JThSt xiii. [1912–13] 374), who has found a Nitrian MS of the 15th cent. in the British Museum, regards them as later, as 'part of the literary activity of the Syriac Monophysite community in Egypt.' He attributes absence of direct references to Baptism and the Eucharist to the fact that the author was 'writing in the style appropriate for pseudepigraphical composition.' One feels that superhuman skill would be required by a writer who attempted to reconstruct the undeveloped theology of the Odes without betraying his later standpoint.

Harnack, with justice, calls the writer an original poet, whose metaphors and similes are excellently chosen and arrest attention by their beauty and strength. His mystical teaching on peace and joy and light and living water is thoroughly Johannine.

Ode 4 opens with a historical allusion to some attempt to alter the site of the Lord's Sanctuary, probably a reference to the closing and dismantling of the temple of Onias, at Leontopolis in Egypt, by the Romans in A.D. 73: 'No man, O my God, changeth thy holy place; and it is not [possible] that he should change it and put it in another place: because he hath no power over it.'

As a specimen of the style Ode 7 may be quoted: 'As the impulse of anger against evil, so is the impulse of joy over what is lovely, and brings in of its fruits without restraint. My joy is the Lord and my impulse is towards Him: this is my excellent path: for I have a helper, the Lord. He has caused me to know Himself, without grudging, by His simplicity: the greatness of His kindness has humbled me. He became like me, in order that I might receive Him: He was reckoned like myself in order that I might put Him on; and I trembled not when I saw Him: because He is my salvation. Like my nature He became that I might learn Him, and like my form, that I might not turn back from Him. . . and the Most High shall be known in His saints, to announce to those that have Songs of the Coming of the Lord; that they may go forth to meet Him, and may sing to Him with joy and with the harp of many tones. The seers shall come before Him and they shall be seen before Him, and they shall praise the Lord for His love: because He is near and beholdeth, and hatred shall be taken from the earth, and along with jealousy it shall be drowned: for ignorance has been destroyed, because the knowledge of the Lord has arrived.'

It would be easy to multiply quotations, but this is impossible here. There are many phrases which arrest attention, like the first words of Ode 34, which Harnack calls the 'pearl of the collection': 'No way is hard when there is a simple heart.' But even more attractive than the phrases and the metaphors is the consistent spirit of joyfulness: 'Grace has been revealed for your salvation. Believe and live and be saved.' Thus the last words of Ode 34 lead up to the triumphant 'Hallelujah' which closes each hymn. Whatever may be the final verdict of critics as to the date, the beauty of the thoughts is an abiding possession for all who are interested in early Christian hymns.*

HYPOCRISY (ὑπόκρισις).—The noun ὑποκριτής does not occur after the Synoptic Gospels, but ὑπόκρισις is found in Gal 2<sup>13</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>1</sup>, and the compound verb συνυποκρίνεσθαι, 'to dissemble along with another,' is used in Gal 2<sup>13</sup>.

The development of the meaning of ὑποκρίνεσθαι can be clearly traced. In Homer and Herodotus it meant 'to reply,' e.g. 'to give an oracular answer' (Herod. i. 78, 91); then 'to answer on the stage,' 'to speak in dialogue,' 'to play a part' (Arist. Pol. v. xi. 19); then 'to be an actor in real life,' 'to dissemble,' 'to feign,' 'to pretend.' The last is probably the only meaning of the word in the NT, though E. Hatch (Essays in Biblical Greek, 1889, p. 92) thinks that among Greek-speaking Jews ὑποκρισις had come to mean 'irreligion,' 'impiety.'

'Sincerity, a deep, great, genuine sincerity, is the first characteristic of all men in any way heroic' (Carlyle, Heroes and Hero-Worship, 1872, p. 42). The hypocrite does not dare to show himself as he is. His fear of criticism compels him to wear a mask. ὑπόκρισις includes both simulation and dissimulation. Bacon's definitions (Essays, vi.) are clear and sharp as usual:

'There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling of a man's self. The first, Closeness, Reservation, and Secrecy; when a man leaveth himself without observation, or without hold to be taken, what he is. The second, Dissimulation, in the negative; when a man lets fall signs and arguments, that he is not that he is. And the third, Simulation, in the affirmative; when a man industriously and expressly feigns and pretends to be that he is not.'

Gal 2<sup>11–14</sup> alludes to a crisis in which even the Apostle Peter dissembled, the other Jewish Christians of Antioch dissembling with him (συνυποκρίθησαν), and even Barnabas, against his better judgment, was carried away by their ὑπόκρισις. The fear of offending the narrow guardians of Judaistic orthodoxy was the cause of all this inconsistency on the side of the party of Christian liberty and progress. St. Peter did not really believe that he would be defiled by eating Gentile food. At Joppa he had learned to cast his ceremonial scruples to the winds (Ac 10<sup>9–16</sup>); at Caesarea he had preached in the house of the Italian Cornelius, keeping company with 'one of another nation' (ἀλλοφύλῳ, v.<sup>28</sup>), and witnessing a Gentile Pentecost (vv. 44–47); and with the Greek Christians of Antioch he at first saw no more harm in eating and drinking than in singing and praying. But circumstances arose in which he had not the courage to continue putting his principles into practice. When he had to choose between giving the cold shoulder to his Gentile brethren and displeasing the circumcised, the vacillating weakness of his character was illustrated once more. He was not even yet quite worthy of his great name—Peter, the man of rock. Concealing his liberal convictions, he behaved as if he were a strictly conservative Jew. And his example proved infectious, for he could not act as a mere private individual. The influential leader of the Twelve Apostles drew after him many Jewish Christians, including even

* The Christian teaching includes references to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (19, 23), the Son of God and Son of Man (36, 3), born of a Virgin (19), the pre-existent (19), who became Man (7), suffered (31), died on the Cross (27, 42), descended into Hell (42), was justified (31), and exalted (41).

St. Paul's fellow-apostle, who had been living for years in intimate fellowship with the ceremonially unclean. Whatever excuses may be made for St. Peter's conduct—which some modern scholars (like most of the Fathers of the early Church) are disposed to regard in a much more favourable light than St. Paul did (A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 206 f.)—it was a betrayal of the cause of spiritual freedom. His silent withdrawal from his Gentile brethren was as eloquent as any words could have been. It did as much harm as if he had issued a proclamation, 'Before we Jews can eat with you Gentiles, ye must bend your necks to the yoke of the law.' It was because in his heart he no longer believed anything of the kind that his action was rightly called ὑπόκρισις. But the terms in which he is elsewhere spoken of in the same letter (1st 27th) make it evident that his aberration was only temporary, and that there remained no essential difference between 'the gospel of the uncircumcision' and 'the circumcision' (27).

In 1 Peter, which many critics still accept as genuine, this same Apostle enjoins his readers to put away all hypocrisies, and to make a fresh start as if they were new-born babes (2nd). The injunction implies the possibility. It is sometimes pessimistically said that there is no remedy for hypocrisy. J. R. Seeley (Ecce Homo, 1873, p. 116) calls it 'the one incurable vice.' The Divine Comedy represents the hypocrite as clothed for ever in a robe of lead—'O in eterno faticoso manto!' (Inferno, xxiii. 67). J. B. Mozley (University Sermons<sup>2</sup>, 1876, p. 34) says: 'The victim of passion then may be converted, the gay, the thoughtless, or the ambitious . . . they may be converted, any one of these—but who is to convert the hypocrite? He does not know he is a hypocrite. . . . The greater hypocrite he is, the more sincere he must think himself.' It is perhaps faithless, however, to despair of any man, and one may doubt whether our Lord would have expended such a passionate energy of scorn—which, in a heart like His, is a form of love—upon incurables (Mt 23). 'Every son of Adam can become a sincere man, . . . no mortal is doomed to be an insincere man' (Carlyle, op. cit. p. 116).

HYSSOP (ὑσσώπος, ὕσσω).—Hyssop is a wall-growing plant used by the Jews in ritual sprinklings. It is mentioned by the writer of Hebrews in his review of the ordinances of the OT (He 9th). Scarcely any other Scriptural plant has given rise to so much discussion. The hyssop cannot be the ὑσσώπος of Greek authors (Hyssopus officinalis), which is not a native of Syria. Among the many suggestions that have been made (see J. G. B. Winer, Bibl. Realwörterbuch<sup>3</sup>, Leipzig, 1847-48, s.v. 'Ysop'), the choice seems to lie between the caper (Capparis spinosa) and a kind of wild marjoram (Satureja thymus) which the Arabs call sātar. Both these plants grow on Syrian rocks and walls. Tristram argues for the caper (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, 1867, p. 455 f.). One objection to this plant is that its prickly branches and stiff leaves make it unsuitable for forming a bunch or wisp; another, that it is differently named in Scripture (אֶרְבֵּי הַשִּׁטִּי in Ec 12th). The sātar was first suggested by Maimonides (de Vacca Rufa, iii. 2), followed by D. Kimchi (Lex. s.v.). It is excellently adapted for use as a sprinkler. Its identity with the hyssop is accepted by Thomson (Land and Book, new ed., London, 1910, p. 93), who describes it as 'having the fragrance of thyme, with a hot, pungent taste, and long, slender stems,' and by G. E. Post, who says (Smith's DB, Am. ed., p. 1115, foot-note): 'The fact that many stalks grow up from one root eminently fits this species for the purpose intended. The hand could easily gather in a single grasp the requisite bundle or bunch all ready for use.'

ICONIUM (Ἰκόνιον, now Konia or Konyeh).—This city, which was partly evangelized by St. Paul, occupied one of the most beautiful and fertile inland sites of Asia Minor, compared by T. Lewin (The Life and Epistles of St. Paul<sup>2</sup>, 1875, i. 144 f.) to the oasis of Damascus. Lying in a crescent of Phrygian hills at the western limit of the vast upland plain of Lycaonia, and watered by perennial streams which, through irrigation, make it to-day a garden-city, it must have been a place of importance from the earliest times. Xenophon, the first writer who mentions it (Anab. i. ii. 19), says that Cyrus, travelling eastward, came 'to Iconium, the last city of Phrygia; thence he pursued his route through Lycaonia.' The inhabitants always regarded themselves as Phrygian, not of Lycaonian, extraction, and the strongest evidence that they were right was their use of the Phrygian language. On the other hand, many writers—Cicero (ad Fam. xv. iv. 2), Strabo (XII. vi. 1 [p. 568]), Pliny (HN v. 25), and others—having regard to the later history of Iconium, invariably designate it as a city of Lycaonia (q.v.). During the 3rd cent. B.C. it was ruled and, to a great extent, hellenized by the Seleucids. After the battle of Magnesia (187 B.C.), it was presented by the Romans to the king of Pergamos; but as he never took effective possession of it, the Galatians appropriated it about 165 B.C.

Mark Antony, the 'king-maker,' gave it to Polemon in 39 B.C. and transferred it in 36 to Amyntas, king of Galatia, whose wide dominions, after his death in 25 B.C., were formed into the Roman province Galatia. Under Claudius the city was honoured with the name of Claud-Iconium, a proof of its strong Roman sympathies, but it was not raised to the rank of a Colonia till the reign of Hadrian. It remained a city of the province Galatia till A.D. 295, when Diocletian formed the province Pisidia, with Antioch as its capital and Iconium as its 'second metropolis.' In 372 Iconium became the capital of the new province Lycaonia, an arrangement which held good all through the Byzantine period.

When St. Luke relates that the Apostles Paul and Barnabas, being persecuted at Iconium, 'fled into the cities of Lycaonia' (Ac 14th)—an expression which implies that in his view Iconium was not Lycaonian—he adheres to the popular and ignores the official geography. So central and prosperous a city, traversed by a trade-route leading direct to the Cilician Gates, and connected by a cross-road with the great high-way to the Euphrates, naturally attracted many traders and settlers from the outside world. Well-chosen as a sphere of missionary activity, the first attempt to preach the gospel in it proved very successful, and though the enmity of the Jews compelled the apostles to desist from their efforts for a time, St. Luke speaks of the faith of 'a great multitude both of Jews and of Greeks' (Ac 14<sup>1</sup>).

Iconium figures largely in the Galatian controversy. What is certain is that St. Paul and Barnabas preached and made many converts in the city during their first missionary campaign, and that they re-visited it on their homeward journey, 'confirming the souls of the disciples' (14<sup>1-2</sup>). The persecutions which St. Paul endured there are alluded to in 2 Ti 3<sup>11</sup>. On the South-Galatian theory, he paid the city two more visits, if, as Ramsay and others assume, Iconium is included in 'the region of Phrygia and Galatia' (16<sup>5</sup>) and in 'the region of Galatia and Phrygia' (18<sup>2</sup>). In the interval between the Apostle's last two visits, he received the alarming tidings that his Galatian churches—which, on this hypothesis, were Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe—were being perverted by Judaizers, whose fatal errors his Epistle to the Galatians was immediately written to confute. Some indication that his vehement letter and his final visit accomplished his purpose is afforded by the fact that the Galatian Church contributed part of the Gentile love-offering to the poor saints in Jerusalem (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>). On the North-Galatian theory St. Paul, using 'Galatians' in the popular, not the Roman, sense, wrote to churches which he had founded in Galatia proper, which Livy calls Gallo-Græcia (see GALATIA).

It is a mere legend that Sosipater (Ro 16<sup>21</sup>) was the first and Terentius or Tertius (16<sup>22</sup>) the second bishop of Iconium. The city is the principal scene of the Acta Pauli et Theclæ, which date back to the 2nd cent. and have a foundation in fact (see W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Rom. Emp., 1893, p. 375 ff.). The Council of Iconium was held in 235. When the city became the capital of the Seljuk State, which was founded about 1072, its splendour gave rise to the proverb, 'See all the world; but see Konia.' To-day it has a population of 50,000.

IDOLATRY.—So deep-rooted was the Jewish hatred of idolatry, and so general had been the condemnation of the practice, that our Lord found no reason for insistence upon the generally accepted commandments on the subject. But as soon as the gospel message began to be preached outside the pale of Judaism, the matter became one of the pressing questions of the day. Protests against the popular practice had not been wanting from the older Greek thinkers; Heraclitus, Xenophanes, and Zeno had all raised their voices against image-worship. But the popular mind was not affected by their teaching, and many were the apologists who wrote in favour of the established custom. It is not surprising to read (Ac 17<sup>16</sup>) that, when St. Paul visited Athens, 'his spirit was provoked within him, as he beheld the city full of idols,' even though the statement is not strictly accurate. His whole training rendered him antagonistic to anything approaching idolatry; and in his letters the same feeling is expressed. No Christian was to keep company with idolaters (1 Co 5<sup>10c</sup>), who could not inherit the Kingdom of God (6<sup>9</sup>, Eph 5<sup>5</sup>). He reminds the Thessalonians that they had abandoned the old idolatrous worship 'to serve the living God' (1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>). Yet from the Christian point of view there is only one God, and the true Christian cannot but recognize that thus 'no idol is anything in the world' (1 Co 8<sup>4</sup>).

But there are two aspects of idolatry which caused the greatest anxiety in the primitive Church.

(a) The decision of the Jerusalem Council as to the duties incumbent upon heathen converts contains the significant phrase, 'that they abstain from the pollutions of idols' (Ac 15<sup>20</sup>), 'from meats offered to idols' (v. 29). The command is intended as a comprehensive one, meaning that idolatry in every form is to be avoided; 'participation in the idolatrous feasts is especially emphasised, simply because this was the crassest form of idolatry' (A. Harnack, The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909, p. 257). But it was also the means of subtle temptation, which gave rise to a serious question. The probability was that most of the meat sold in the markets as well as that set before the guests at Gentile tables had been 'offered to idols.' What was the Christian to do? Was he to buy no meat? Must he refuse all such invitations? It must not be forgotten that the breach between St. Paul and the Judaizers had never been really healed. The partisans on either side were ever on the look-out for opportunities to widen it. The leaders did their utmost to heal the quarrel. Therefore, in dealing with the questions raised by the Corinthian Church, St. Paul was compelled to remember that he must not give any offence to the Judaizing section, which was evidently represented there (1 Co 1<sup>10d</sup>), since he had acquiesced in the Apostolic Decree. It is true that this was only in the nature of a compromise, but its recommendations must be carried out as far as possible. On the other hand, the Gentile section of the community, which was responsible for raising the question, was in favour of a broad-minded view. And St. Paul's dilemma was increased by the fact that his sympathies were with them. He lays the greatest stress, therefore, upon the principle that idolatry is wholly hateful and must be carefully guarded against (1 Co 10<sup>14</sup>). In the worship of Israel, to eat the sacrifices of the altar is to have communion with the altar. It is true that the idol is nothing, and the sacrifice therefore has no meaning, yet idolatry among the heathen is demon-worship rather than the worship of God; would they wish to have communion with demons? (1 Co 10<sup>15d</sup>). It was all very well to shelter behind the fact that Christians really know that there is only one God; but all have not this knowledge: consequently the weaker brethren—that is, those who are perplexed and troubled by these questions—may be led into danger by our actions. Yet a compromise is possible. They are to buy what is offered, and eat what is set before them, asking no questions (v. 28<sup>c</sup>). If either the seller or the host say, 'This has been offered to idols,' whether in a friendly or a hostile spirit, the Christians must have nothing to do with it. It is all a matter of expediency and, in part, of love. God's glory must come first; neither Jew nor Greek nor the Church must be needlessly offended.

(b) The second aspect of idolatry afforded even more grievous trials, and was eventually the source of serious persecution: it was the rise of Emperor-worship. It is not difficult to see that such a cult was almost inevitable under existing circumstances. There had always been a tendency among Greeks and Romans to deify heroes of the past, but the practice gradually grew up of erecting temples in honour of living heroes (Plutarch, Lysander, xviii.; Herodotus, v. 47). It was perhaps not unnatural that a cult of the all-victorious city of Rome should arise, and as early as 195 B.C. there was a temple in its honour at Smyrna. Taking all these facts into consideration, the development of the Imperial cult under the Empire was only to be looked for. After the death of Julius Cæsar a temple in his honour was erected at Ephesus (29 B.C.), and it was only a step to pay a like honour to Augustus during his lifetime (Tacitus, Ann. iv. 37). Such men as Gaius and Domitian were ready enough to encourage the idea (Suetonius, Domit. xiii.). In the province of Asia the cult was hailed with delight, and the result, as touching Christians, is seen in the Apocalypse (13). Such a cult was bound to change the whole relationship between Christianity and the Roman power. As a general rule it would be quite possible to escape offending susceptibilities with regard to the worship of the older gods, but the new cult was so universal and so popular that it soon became fraught with grave danger for members of the Christian community. Antichrist had indeed arisen, and fierce warfare could be the only result.

IGNATIUS.—1. Life.—From the date of the Apostolic Decree (Ac 15<sup>23-29</sup>) onwards, i.e. from about A.D. 50, there is absolutely no evidence as to the history of the Church of Antioch. In the time of Origen and Julius Africanus, Ignatius was considered as the second of the Antiochene bishops. Between him and Theophilus († c. 185) three bishops were usually placed—Hero, Cornelius, and Eros, of whom nothing was known but their names. Euodius was regarded as Ignatius' predecessor (Harnack, Chronologie, i., Leipzig, 1897, p. 210). But as a matter of fact, as Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers<sup>2</sup>, pt. ii. vol. ii., London, 1889, p. 471) says: 'The dates of the first century, the accession of Euodius A.D. 42, and the accession of Ignatius A.D. 69, deserve no credit.' The information to be gleaned from the Apost. Constit. vii. xvi. 4 (ed. Funk, Paderborn, 1905), such as that Euodius was ordained bishop by St. Peter and Ignatius by St. Paul, does not seem to be of any greater value than the foregoing. St. John Chrysostom, in the panegyric which he pronounces at Antioch on St. Ignatius, supposes that Ignatius knew the apostles and received the laying on of hands from them (in S. Martyrem Ignatium, 1 and 2 [Migne, Patrologia Græca, i. 587 f.]). The Apost. Constit. and St. John Chrysostom represent the same legend in formation. The extent of Eusebius' information (HE iii. xxxvi. 2) was that St. Peter was the first bishop of Antioch and that Ignatius was his second successor, Euodius being the first. He depends for his knowledge on Origen (Hom. in Lucam, 6), and is in turn followed by Jerome (de Vir. illustr. 16).

Apart from the fact that he was bishop of Antioch and the details furnished by his authentic letters, the history of Ignatius is absolutely unknown. Some critics have tried, with more zeal than discretion, to fill up the gaps in the history with conjectures, but these are quite worthless. For example, E. Bruston (Ignace d'Antioche, Paris, 1897, p. 112 f.) advances the theory that Ignatius was neither Greek nor Syrian, but Roman, his proof being that Ignatius' name is a Latin one (cf. Forcellini-De-Vit., Onomasticon, s.v. 'Ignatius = Egnatius'), and that he has all the characteristics of the Roman mind, which is essentially practical! Von Dobschütz (Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904, p. 235 f.) says, with equal justification: 'Ignatius is a genuine Syrian. His diction, which, for Greek, is almost intolerably affected, everywhere reveals the fiery rhythm of Syriac poetry with its wonderful richness of colouring and imagination.'

In the signature of each of his seven letters, Ignatius calls himself Ἰγνάτιος ὁ καὶ Θεοφόρος. On the analogy of expressions like Σαῦλος ὁ καὶ Παῦλος (Ac 13<sup>9</sup>), we may suppose that Θεοφόρος is not an epithet but a proper name (Lightfoot, p. 22). Zahn (p. 3) compares it with Οὐέντιος Ἐπάγαθος in Eusebius, HE v. i. 9. As to when and why Ignatius took the name of Θεοφόρος, we have to confess complete ignorance.

The author of the Passion of Ignatius, entitled the Martyrium Colbertinum (Funk, ii. 276), calls him a 'disciple of the Apostle John' and 'a thoroughly apostolic man,' but he gives no evidence for the truth of his statements. In his Letter to Polycarp

(i. 1) Ignatius seems to say that he has just met Polycarp for the first time (Funk, Kirchengeschichtl. Abhandlungen, ii. [Paderborn, 1899] 340). As Polycarp was an Asiatic disciple of St. John, this would be a proof that Ignatius was not a co-disciple of his. Besides, Ignatius is absolutely silent on the subject of the Apostle John, which, had Ignatius known him, would be very puzzling, considering that Ignatius wrote a long letter to the Ephesians.

An attempt has been made to find in Romans, iv. 3, an indication that Ignatius was a slave. But the text has probably a spiritual and not a literal meaning (cf. Philadelphians, viii. 1; Lightfoot, p. 210). It is inconceivable that a slave should ever have been put at the head of a Christian community.

Ignatius was not a Roman citizen, since he was condemned to be thrown to the beasts. The modest expressions that Ignatius uses in speaking of himself suggest that he was not a Christian by birth, but became one later on. His previous life may have had some analogy with that of the Apostle Paul before his conversion. 'But for myself I am ashamed to be called one of them [i.e. the Antiochene Christians]; for neither am I worthy, being the very last of them and an untimely birth' (Romans, ix. 2).* There are similar protestations of humility in Eph. xxi. 2, Trall. xiii. 1, and Smyrn. xi. 1.

Eusebius places the martyrdom of Ignatius in the time of Trajan (A.D. 98-117)—a wide choice of date to which no objection can be raised (Lightfoot, p. 469 f.). There seems good reason, however, for deciding on the last years of Trajan's reign as the most likely date (Harnack, Chronologie, i. 406).

According to the Martyrium Colbertinum, ii. 1-2 (Funk, ii. 276), Ignatius appeared before Trajan in the 9th year of his reign (26 Jan. 106-26 Jan. 107), when the latter was passing through Antioch on a march against the Parthians (the war against the Parthians, however, only began in 112). He was condemned by the Emperor and sent to Rome, where he died on 20 Dec. 107, in the consulate of Sura and Senecio (vii. 1, p. 284). This date is debatable, for the oldest known reference to the 'natale' of Ignatius, found in the Syriac Martyrology published by Wright, fixes the anniversary as 17 Oct. (Bolland, AS, Nov. i. 1 [1894], p. lxii. [text restored by Duchesne]: καὶ ἰζ', Ἰγνάτιος ἐπίσκοπος Ἀντιοχείας ἐκ τῶν ἀρχαίων μαρτύρων). The place of the martyrdom is not mentioned. Wright's Martyrology is certainly not later than the middle of the 4th cent., and appears to have been compiled in Antioch. This date (17 Oct.) is confirmed by St. John Chrysostom and other writers and documents (H. Quentin, Les Martyrologes historiques, Paris, 1908, p. 548). Lightfoot says (p. 434): 'The only anniversary, which has any claims to consideration as the true day of the martyrdom, is October 17.' If, then, the date of 20 Dec. for the martyrdom of Ignatius is not correct, no reliance can be placed on the date of the consulate of Sura and Senecio. The main part of the Martyrium Colber- tinum belongs to the 5th or, at the earliest, the end of the 4th century. For its chronology it depends on Eusebius' Chronicle, and even it gives no guarantee of absolute exactitude. All one can say is that Eusebius placed the martyrdom of Ignatius in the time of Trajan. Nothing more definite is given.

No historical value can be attached to the rest of the Martyrium Colbertinum, or to the Martyrium Vaticanum (which is independent of the foregoing and perhaps dates from the 5th cent.), or to the Latin, Armenian, or Greek texts where the two Martyria are combined (on this worthless hagiographic literature see Bardenheuer, Gesch. der altkirchl. Litt. i. pp. 143-145).

Apart from these documents, we have no information as to the circumstances in which the bishop of Antioch was imprisoned and then sent to Rome. But, if the martyrdom took place A.D. 110-117 we have the evidence of Trajan for this period, in his letter to Pliny (Pliny, Ep. xviii.) defining the legal position of Christianity: Christianity is a religio illicita, but public action can be taken against Christians only by means of the delatio; 'Puniendi sunt, si deferantur et arguantur.' It may be supposed, then, that Ignatius was delatus to the Roman magistrates of Antioch.

In Eph. xxi. 2, he writes: 'Pray for the church which is in Syria, whence I am led a prisoner to Rome—I who am the very last of the faithful there'; in Rom. ix. 1: 'Remember in your prayers the church which is in Syria, which hath God for its shepherd in my stead. Jesus Christ alone shall be its bishop—He and your love.' Some time after—i.e. on his arrival in Troas—Ignatius seems to have given up all anxiety about the Church of Antioch: 'Seeing that in answer to your prayer and to the tender sympathy which ye have in Christ Jesus, it hath been reported to me that the church which is in Antioch of Syria hath peace, it is becoming for you as a church of God, to appoint a deacon to go thither as God's ambassador, that he may congratulate them when they are assembled together, and may glorify the Name' (Philad. x. 1). He writes to Polycarp: 'Seeing that the church which is in Antioch of Syria hath peace, as it hath been reported to me, through your prayers, I myself also have been the more comforted since God hath banished my care' (vii. 1). To the Smyrnæans he is even more explicit: 'It is meet that your church should appoint, for the honour of God, an ambassador of God that he may go as far as Syria and congratulate them because they are at peace, and have recovered their proper stature, and their proper bulk hath been restored to them' (τὸ ἴδιον σωματεῖον: xi. 2); and he adds: 'It seemed to me a fitting thing that ye should send one of your own people with a letter, that he might join with them in giving glory for the calm which by God's will had overtaken them, and because they were already reaching a haven through your prayers' (xi. 3). If it were a question of a persecution limited to Antioch, it would not be very clear how peace could have restored its stature to the Church of Antioch, i.e. its spiritual stature, in the sense of Eph. inscr.: εὐλογημένη ἐν μεγάλῃ. We are, then, led to suppose that it is not peace after persecution but peace after discord that is meant. With Ignatius gone, the Church of Antioch was left without a pastor, and the community (σωματεῖον) had become disunited and was in a state of schism. The insistence with which Ignatius speaks of the return of the repentant rebels to union with God and communion with the bishop (Philad. iii. 2, viii. 1, Smyrn. ix. 1) is perhaps the consequence of the painful experience he has just passed through in Antioch.

Ignatius, though arrested and condemned in Antioch, is sent to Rome. He knows that he is condemned to be thrown to the beasts (Rom. v. 1-2). In Rom. iv. 1, he begs the Christians of Rome not to intervene to rob him of the martyrdom he awaits, and it is thus obvious that he must have been tried and found guilty in Antioch. The fact of his being condemned in Antioch and yet undergoing his sentence in Rome is not unique. Rome gathered victims from all the ends of the earth to take part in the cruel games of her amphitheatre.

In Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians, we find that Ignatius, on his arrival in Philippi in Macedonia, was no longer alone but in the same convoy as other Christians in chains (Phil. i. 1, ix. 1, xiii. 2). The journey from Antioch to Rome was made partly by land and partly by sea (Rom. v. 1); Ignatius was in chains, and a squad of ten soldiers guarded him night and day and spared him no ill-treatment (Rom. v. 1; cf. Passio Sanctæ Perpetuæ, iii. 6: '... concussuræ militum').

The first town we know of Ignatius' passing through is Philadelphia in proconsular Asia (Philad. vii. 1). Of the itinerary he followed between Antioch and that town we know nothing.

After Philadelphia we find him in Smyrna, where Polycarp is bishop. Later he thanks the Smyrnæans effusively for the welcome they gave him and his two companions Philo and Rheus Agathopus (Smyrn. ix. 2, x. 1). In Smyrna he made a comparatively long stay—time enough to get to know the Smyrnæan families he greets at the end of his letter (xiii. 1, 2). While he was in Smyrna the neighbouring churches sent deputations to greet him and console him in his imprisonment. From Smyrna itself Ignatius writes a letter of thanks to each of the churches who had sent delegates: the first is the Epistle to the Ephesians, the second the Letter to the Church of Magnesia on the Mæander, the third the Epistle to the Trallians. From Smyrna, too, Ignatius sends his Letter to the Romans, which alone bears a date—the ninth day before the Kalends of September, i.e. 24 Aug. (Rom. x. 3).

The zeal of the neighbouring churches to greet Ignatius is very remarkable. 'For when ye heard that I was on my way from Syria, in bonds for the sake of the common Name and hope . . . ye were eager to visit me,' writes Ignatius to the Ephesians (i. 2). The Ephesians sent their bishop, Onesimus (i. 3), their deacon, Burrhus (ii. 1), and several other Christians—Crocus, Euplus, Fronto, etc. (ib.). The Magnesians sent their bishop, Damas, the presbyters Bassus and Apollonius, and their deacon Zotion (ii.). At the end of his Epistle to the Magnesians, Ignatius writes: 'The Ephesians from Smyrna salute you, from whence also I write to you. They are here with me for the glory of God, as also are ye; and they have comforted me in all things, together with Polycarp, bishop of the Smyrnæans. Yea, and all the other churches salute you . . .' (xv.). The Trallians sent their bishop, Polybius (i. 1). To them Ignatius writes: 'I salute you from Smyrna, together with the churches of God that are present with me; men who refreshed me in all ways both in flesh and in spirit' (xii. 1). The way in which these three Asian churches vied with each other to pay court to Ignatius leads us to believe that other churches probably followed suit: 'I write to all the churches, and I bid all men know, that of my own free will I die for God . . .' (Rom. iv. 1); and again: 'My spirit saluteth you, and the love of the churches which received me in the name of Jesus Christ, not as a mere wayfarer: for even those churches which did not lie on my route after the flesh went before me from city to city' (ix. 3).

The Epistle to the Romans is not a reply to a direct deputation sent to Ignatius by the Church of Rome. Ignatius has been informed of the Romans' feelings towards him and of their design to snatch him from martyrdom if possible, and he forestalls them by begging them to do nothing. He sends them the letter by the hands of Ephesians who have apparently told him of the Romans' plans (x. 1), and who have means of transporting the letter to Rome. Ignatius uses this means, although he knows that Antiochene devotees have gone straight to Rome. He says of them: 'As touching those who went before me from Syria to Rome unto the glory of God, I believe that ye have received instructions; whom also apprise that I am near' (x. 2).

From Smyrna, Ignatius and his guard journey to Troas, probably by sea. From there Ignatius dispatches three letters: the first to the Church of Philadelphia ('The love of the brethren which are in Troas saluteth you,' xi. 2); the second to the Smyrnæans; and the third to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna. In the last letter Ignatius apologizes for not being able to write to all the churches, the reason being that he has just been suddenly ordered to embark at once for Neapolis in Macedonia, the port for Philippi.

Before leaving Troas, Ignatius receives comforting news of his beloved Church of Antioch. He suggests that Polycarp should depute one of the Smyrnæans to go to Antioch to show the love that the Church of Smyrna bears to the Church of Syria (vii. 2). 'I salute him that shall be appointed to go to Syria,' he writes. 'Grace shall be with him always, and with Polycarp who sendeth him' (viii. 2). He begs Polycarp to write to the churches lying between Smyrna and Antioch, enjoining them to send messengers or letters to the Church of Antioch as a token of their love (viii. 1). He writes to the same effect to the Philadelphians. 'As a church of God' they ought to elect a deacon and commission him to carry their congratulations to the devotees assembled together at Antioch and to glorify 'the Name' with them. If they do this, they will be following the example of several churches, some of whom have sent a bishop, and some presbyters or deacons (x. 1-2).

From Neapolis Ignatius is taken to Philippi. A few details of this journey may be gleaned from Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians, written in reply to a letter sent from the Philippians to Polycarp (iii. 1): 'Ye wrote to me, both ye yourselves and Ignatius, asking that if any one should go to Syria he might carry thither the letters from you. And this I will do, if I get a fit opportunity, either I myself, or he whom I shall send to be ambassador on your behalf also' (xiii. 1). From this passage we may infer that Ignatius wrote to Polycarp during his stay in Philippi; and that the Philippians wrote to the Church of Antioch at the same time as to Polycarp. The Philippians had given Ignatius a hearty welcome, and Polycarp commends them for having 'received the followers of the true Love and escorted them on their way . . . those men encircled in saintly bonds which are the diadems of them that be truly chosen of God and our Lord' (i. 1).

By the time Polycarp wrote this letter, Ignatius had left Philippi and was en route for Rome: 'Moreover, concerning Ignatius himself and those that were with him, if ye have any sure tidings, certify us' (xiii. 2). It would be difficult to believe that this request for news of Ignatius could by any possibility be later than the receipt of the tidings of his death. It is true that in another passage Polycarp commends the patience of 'the blessed Ignatius, and Zosimus, and Rufus,' and compares it with that of St. Paul and the other apostles, adding: 'all these ran not in vain . . . they are in their due place in the presence of the Lord, with whom also they suffered' (ix. 1, 2); but it is not unlikely that the last phrase refers only to St. Paul and the other apostles. On this hypothesis, then, Polycarp would not know the fate of Ignatius, Zosimus, and Rufus till after the dispatch of his letter to the Philippians.

From the time he left Philippi we know nothing further of Ignatius. Origen says that he fought against the beasts in Rome during the persecution. Eusebius (HE III. xxxvi. 3) repeats this statement, and adds that in Rome Ignatius became 'food for the beasts.' In this he was certainly influenced by Ignatius' letter to the Romans ('I am God's wheat, and I am ground by the teeth of wild beasts,' iv. 1). This Epistle is the sole extant reference to the martyrdom of Ignatius. Even in Rome itself there seems to have been no note made of the incident.

From Jerome we learn that Ignatius was buried in Antioch: 'Reliquiæ corporis eius in Antiochia iacent extra portam Daphniticam in cœmeterio' (de Vir. illustr. 16). This was written in A.D. 392, and, as far as we know, Jerome did not take his information from any written source, but probably speaks de visu.

'In his panegyric on Ignatius pronounced in Antioch (386-97), St. John Chrysostom celebrates the triumphal return of the martyr to his episcopal city, and the honours that were paid him by the cities on the route [Patr. Graeca, I. 594]. The orator no doubt takes his clue from spectacles of the same nature seen for some years previously in different centres of the Eastern Empire. It is quite evident that the remains of the holy martyr could not have been brought back in this way in the very thick of the persecution' (H. Delehaye, Les Origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels, 1912, p. 69; so also Lightfoot, p. 431 f.).

In the time of Theodosius II. (408-450), Ignatius' remains (or bones believed to be his) were transferred from the cemetery extra muros to the ancient Temple of Fortune, now turned into a basilica (Euagrius, HE i. 16 [ed. Bidez-Parmentier, London, 1899, p. 25 f.]).

The whole question of the transference of Ignatius' bones from Rome to Antioch is a difficult one. Delehaye writes: 'It is difficult to come to any finding on the question of the reality of the transference of St. Ignatius' remains from Rome and of the period when this took place' (loc. cit.). If St. Ignatius suffered martyrdom in Rome, and if, as Euagrius says, 'he met his death in the amphitheatre of Rome, finding his tomb in the bellies of the wild beasts in fulfilment of his own wish,' one may suppose that nothing remained of his body. In Rom. iv. 2 he wrote: 'Rather entice the wild beasts, that they may become my sepulchre and may leave no part of my body behind.' Of course one may always agree with Euagrius that at least Ignatius' 'tougher bones' were saved.

As to the time of the transference, if it did take place, we are equally at sea. By the end of the 4th cent., as we have seen above, public opinion was quite decided that Ignatius' remains were in cœmeterio in Antioch. But the transference of the remains in the 2nd or 3rd cent. would be an anachronism, and in the 4th cent. some note would undoubtedly have been taken of the fact. We must conclude, then, that, if the remains of Ignatius preserved in Antioch are authentic, it is quite possible that Ignatius did not suffer martyrdom in Rome at all, but returned to Antioch and died there. The existence of his tomb in Antioch is more probable on this supposition than on the hypothesis of the transference of his remains from Rome to Antioch.

2. MSS and YSS of the Epistles.—The words of Polycarp's Epistle to the Philippians (xiii. 2) are the earliest evidence of a collection of Ignatius' letters: 'The letters of Ignatius which were sent to us by him, and others as many as we had by us, we send unto you, according as ye gave charge; the which are subjoined to this letter; from which ye will be able to gain great advantage. For they comprise faith and endurance and every kind of edification, which pertaineth unto our Lord.' Eusebius (HE iii. 36) apparently knows of a collection of seven of Ignatius' letters, with Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians, which is identical with our present group of letters, even down to the order in which the Epistles are given: Eph., Magn., Trall., Rom., Philad., Polyc., Smyrn., and Polycarp's Philippians.

This original collection of letters fell into the hands of a forger, who made interpolations in the text of the authentic Epistles and also manufactured six additional letters—Mary of Cassobola (there is a Cilician town called Castabala, possibly the same as Cassobola) to Ignatius, Ignatius to Mary of Cassobola, to the Tarsians, to the Philippians, to the Antiochenes, and to Hero the Deacon. We have thus an Ignatian collection of thirteen letters. The identification of the forger with the unknown compiler of the Apostolic Constitutions is a theory highly favoured by Funk. Here regards him as having been a Syrian Christian of the beginning of the 5th cent., probably belonging to an Apollinarist order, and he even finds in his work points of contact with Theodore of Mopsuestia (Patr. apostol. opera, ii. pp. ix–xiii, and Kirchengeschichtl. Abhandlungen, ii. [Paderborn, 1899], pp. 347–359).

Three other spurious letters of Ignatius may be passed over quickly—one supposed to be addressed to the Blessed Virgin Mary, with the Virgin's reply, and two addressed to the Apostle John. The oldest witness to these three Latin letters is Denis of Chartreux († 1471); the oldest MS of them dates from the 12th century. These Epistles are usually regarded as forgeries of Latin provenance and of the Middle Ages.

In 1845, Cureton published Eph., Magn., and Rom. in a Syriac version, which comprises the three authentic Epistles in an abridged form. Cureton put forward the hypothesis that the Syriac text represents all that is authentically Ignatian, and that consequently Trall., Philad., Polyc., and Smyrn. are spurious compositions. This theory was accepted for some time by quite a number of critics, but it has now been abandoned: the three Syriac letters are nothing more nor less than an abridgment of the three Greek Epistles. (These apocryphal texts may be found in the editions of Zahn, Lightfoot, and Funk.)

We may now turn our undivided attention to the Greek collection of the seven authentic letters.

The authenticity of these Epistles was for long a matter of keen controversy. At first only the Latin collection comprising the Epistles to the Apostle John and the Virgin Mary, or the three apocryphal letters published in Paris in 1495, were known. Three years later (1498) Lefèvre d'Étaples published in Latin the collection comprising the thirteen spurious or interpolated letters, the Greek text of which was printed at Dillingen in 1557. This collection was speedily recognized to be unauthentic, but, though the Magdeburg Centuriators repudiated the thirteen letters en bloc, Baronius and Bellarmine defended them en bloc. The Protestant Scultetus, in his Medullae theologiae patrum syntagma (Neustadt, 1609) was of opinion that only the seven letters attested by Eusebius were authentic. In 1646 Vossius published the authentic Greek text of six of the seven letters, the Greek text of the seventh—the Letter to the Romans—being published by Ruinart in 1689. But it was a long time before the authenticity of these seven letters was generally accepted. It would be useless to retrace the history of this painful controversy with its tedious conflict of confessional (Saumaise, Blondel, Dailé) or pseudo-critical (Baur, Hilgenfeld, Lipsius) prejudices, which was finally terminated by Zahn's Ignatius von Antiochien (Gotha, 1873) and F. X. Funk's Die Echtheit der ignatianischen Briefe (Tübingen, 1883). E. Bruston's objections and conjectures (Ignace d'Antioche) were never taken seriously, nor were those of D. Volter (Die ignatianischen Briefe, Tübingen, 1892). See, however, M. Rackl, Christologie des heiligen Ignatius von Antiochien, Freiburg i. B., 1914, pp. 11–86.

A reply to the difficulties raised by the opponents of the authenticity of the letters will be found in J. Reville's Les Origines de l'épiscopat (pp. 442–81) and in E. Hennecke's Handbuch zu den neutest. Apokryphen (Tübingen, 1904, p. 191 f.). Difficulties naturally exist, writes R. Knopf, but they are not to be weighed against 'the uninventible form of these writings, the originality of the man which seems to speak forth from the pulsing lines, and the wealth of personal references which entwine the letters' (Das nachapostolische Zeitalter, Tübingen, 1905, p. 37; cf. O. Stahlin, Christl. griech. Litt., Munich, 1914, p. 975).

The seven Epistles of Ignatius are attested, as we have said, first by the Epistle of Polycarp, and then, at the beginning of the 4th cent., by Eusebius. Between these two witnesses we may insert Irenæus (adv. Haer. v. xxviii. 4), who does not name Ignatius but cites his Letter to the Romans: 'Quemadmodum quidam de nostris dixit, propter martirium in Deum adiudicatus ad bestias, "quoniam frumentum sum Christi et per dentes bestiarum molor ut mundus panis inveniar."' Harnack thinks that Clement of Alexandria is so closely dependent on Ignatius that he must have read him (cf. Pseudag. i. vi. 38, ii. viii. 63, Excerpt. Theod. 74 with Trall. viii. 1, Eph. xvii. 1, xix. 2); so also Origen (de Orat. 20 = Rom. iii. 3; Hom. vi. in Luc. = Eph. xix. 1; in Cant. Cantic. prolog. = Rom. vii. 2). Harnack ignores all doubtful witnesses like Melito, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Tertullian, the Lyons Martyrs, and the Acts of St. Perpetua. We shall pass over all attestations later than Eusebius (see Harnack, Die Ueberlieferung der altchristl. Litteratur, Leipzig, 1893, pp. 79–86).

The question whether Lucian the satirist, in lines 169–170 of his de Morte Peregrini, was thinking of Ignatius or even had direct knowledge of his letters is a point on which one hesitates to decide. Funk (Patr. apostol. i. pp. lx–lxi) and Reville (Origines de l'épiscopat, Paris, 1895, p. 448 f.) incline to an affirmative view, while Harnack (Ueberlieferung, p. 79) remains doubtful.

Smyrn. iii. 3–xii. 1 is preserved in the Papyrus-kodex 10581 (5th cent.) of Berlin (see C. Schmidt and W. Schubart, Altchristl. Texte, Berlin, 1910, pp. 3–12). The Greek text of all the authentic letters except the Epistle to the Romans is given in the Codex Laurentianus, lvii. 7 (11th cent.), fol. 242–252, which was used by Vossius for the editio princeps. The MS G. V. 14 (16th cent.) in the Casanate Library is a copy of the Laurentianus. The letter to the Romans is given in the Paris gr. 1491 (10th cent.), which was used by Ruinart. The separation of the Letter to the Romans from the six other authentic letters is perhaps due to the fact that the first collection of Ignatius' letters was made in Asia—witness what Polycarp says in his Philippians—and thus did not contain the Epistle to the Romans (so Harnack, Ueberlieferung, p. 76).

The Latin version published by Ussher (Oxford, 1644) was the work of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln (13th cent.); it was translated from an excellent Greek MS now lost, and is an extremely close rendering of the original. Ussher had at his disposal two Latin MSS—one the lost Codex Montacutianus and the other the existing Codex Caiensis, 395 of Cambridge (15th cent.). Grosse-teste's version comprises the first six authentic letters and the Martyrium Colbertinum, including the Letter to the Romans.

We also possess the seven letters in an Armenian translation possibly dating from the 5th cent., and some fragments of a Syriac translation which formed the basis for the Armenian rendering. Lightfoot and Harnack think that the Syriac collection of Eph., Magn., and Rom. in an abridged form published by Cureton is an excerpt from this Syriac translation of the seven authentic letters.

3. Ecclesiastical position.—(1) Church organization.—If one had to prove that the Christianity of the beginning of the 2nd cent. was a city-religion one would find ample material in the letters of Ignatius. The visible unity is the Church, and each church bears the name of the city where it is established: 'the church which is in Ephesus of Asia,' 'the church which is in Magnesia on the Meander,' 'the holy church which is in Tralles of Asia,' 'the church of God the Father and of Jesus Christ which is in Philadelphia of Asia,' 'the church of God the Father and of Jesus Christ the Beloved . . . which is in Smyrna of Asia'—so Ignatius styles the churches in the inscriptions of his letters.

The Church of Antioch is called 'the church which is in Antioch of Syria' (Philad. x. 1, Smyrn. xi. 1), but it is also spoken of as 'the church which is in Syria' (Magn. xiv., Eph. xxi. 2, Rom. ix. 1). Ignatius calls himself 'bishop from Syria' (Rom. ii. 2). This has been taken as an indication that Ignatius was bishop not only of Antioch but of the whole province of Syria, Syria being understood as including several lesser churches and several lesser bishops (K. Lübeck, Reichseinteilung und kirchliche Hierarchie des Orients, Munster, 1901, p. 43; Harnack, Mission und Ausbreitung, Leipzig, 1902, i. 384). The text of Philad. x. 2, which speaks of 'the churches which are nearest' (αἱ ἐγγιστα ἐκκλησίαι), does not say which city they are near; they may be churches of Asia or even of Cilicia (H. de Genouillac, L'Eglise chrétienne au temps de saint Ignace d'Antioche, Paris, 1907, p. 67f.). Even if it were proved that Syria contained other churches than Antioch, e.g. the churches of Apamia or Beroë, the bishop of Antioch might still have considered himself emphatically the bishop of Syria, without being in any sense a metropolitan. To speak of a metropolitan bishop in the time of Ignatius is an anachronism.

The Christian community bearing the name of the church of such and such a city is not a purely mystical body, but a visible unity having frequent assemblies. 'Let meetings (συναγωγαί) be held more frequently,' Ignatius writes to Polycarp (iv. 2, 3). 'Seek out all men by name. . . . Let slaves not desire to be set free at the public cost' (ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινού ἐλευθεροῦσθαι; note the expression τὸ κοινόν, a synonym for the local church [Philad. i. 1]). If the community can buy out slaves, it must have a common purse). In the Letter to the Smyrnaeans (vi. 2), the heretics are reproached for acting contrary to the Spirit of God: 'They have no care for love (ἀγάπης), none for the widow, none for the orphan, none for the afflicted, none for the prisoner, none for the hungry or thirsty.' In these words we have a résumé of the gospel of love, and an indication of the practical assistance rendered by every Christian community to those in need. Ignatius begs Polycarp to call together the faithful into a sort of deliberative assembly (συμβούλιον) to elect (χειροτονῆσαι) a messenger to go to Antioch (vii. 2; cf. Philad. x. 1 and Smyrn. xi. 2). The church assembles ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό, 'in one place': not to come ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό is to show pride and to stand self-condemned (Eph. v. 2): to come ἐπὶ τὸ αὐτό is to cast down the powers of Satan (xiii. 1). The faithful must give the Gentiles (ἔθνεσιν) no occasion to calumniate God's people (τὸ ἐν θεῷ πλῆθος, Trall. viii. 2); they must abide in concord and in common prayer (xii. 2); they must flee evil arts (κακοτεχνίας); women must be 'content with their husbands in flesh and in spirit' (Polyc. v. 1). If a Christian desires to abide in chastity to the honour of the flesh of the Lord, he may do so, but on condition that he does it without pride (v. 2; this is a somewhat remarkable recommendation, as it is a repudiation of the Enekratite conception of the Christian life). Each church has its widows, whom it has to care for (Polyc. iv. 1; Smyrn. xiii. 1). Ignatius recommends that those who marry—male or female—should not enter into wedlock without the consent of the bishop, for marriage should be 'after the Lord and not after concupiscence' (Polyc. v. 2).

Each church has a bishop at its head; this is true not only of Antioch, but also of Ephesus (Eph. i. 3), Magnesia (Magn. ii.), Tralles (Trall. i. 1), Philadelphia (Philad. i. 1), and Smyrna (Smyrn. xii. 1). Next to the bishop there is a πρεσβυτέρειον or group of πρεσβύτεροι: so at Ephesus (Eph. iv. 1, xx. 2), Magnesia (Magn. ii., xiii. 1), Tralles (Trall. ii. 2, xiii. 2), Philadelphia (Philad. vii. 1), and Smyrna (Smyrn. xii. 2). Under the presbyters, there are deacons (Eph. ii. 1, Magn. ii., Trall. ii. 3, iii. 1, vii. 2, Philad., subscr., vii. 1, x. 1, Smyrn. viii. 1, xii. 2).

The Epistles are a perpetual appeal to unity on the part of the Christian community by submission to the deacons, the presbytery, and the bishop. Ignatius writes to the Ephesians: 'I have received your whole multitude (πολυπληθὺν υμῶν) in the person of Onesimus' (Eph. i. 3). They will be sanctified if they submit to their bishop and presbytery (ii. 2), if they and their bishop have but one thought, if their presbytery is united to the bishop as 'its strings to a lyre' (iv. 1). The bishop is to be regarded as the steward, whom the proprietor (οἰκοδεσπότης) has entrusted with the management of his house (οἰκονομῶν); and even as the Master Himself (vi. 1). In Magn. (ii.) Ignatius commends Zotion the Deacon for submitting 'to the bishop as unto the grace of God and to the presbytery as unto the law of Jesus Christ.' The presbyters, again, are subject to their bishop, however young he may be (iii. 1). The bishop is but the visible bishop; above him is the invisible Bishop, God the Father, the universal Bishop (ὁ πάντων ἐπίσκοπος, iii. 1, 2). The bishop presides, and thus takes the place of God; the presbyters represent the council (συνέδριον) of the apostles; the deacons are entrusted with the diaconate of Jesus Christ (vi. 1: 'a service under Jesus Christ' [Lightfoot, ii. 120]). The Magnesians are to continue in union with their revered bishop, and 'with the fitly wreathed spiritual circlet of the presbytery, and with the deacons who walk after God' (xiii. 1). The same advice is found again in Trall. (ii. 1–2, iii. 1, xii. 2, xiii. 2), Philad. (ii. 1, iii. 2, vii. 1), and Smyrn. (viii. 1, xii. 2).

The ecclesiology of Ignatius does not regard union and discipline merely as a means of sanctification but as the condition of Christianity. Some call their chief 'bishop,' but 'in everything act apart from him,' and 'do not assemble themselves together lawfully according to commandment' (μὴ βεβαίως κατ' ἐντολὴν συναθροῖσθαι, Magn. iv.). 'Neither do ye anything without the bishop and the presbyters' (vii. 1). Apart from the bishop, the presbytery, and the deacons, 'there is not even the name of a church' (χρῆσις τούτων ἐκκλησία ου καλεῖται, Trall. iii. 1). Similar declarations may be found in Philad. (iii. 2). To the Smyrnaeans Ignatius writes (viii. 1-2): 'Let no man do aught of things pertaining to the Church apart from the bishop. Let that be held a valid (βεβαία) eucharist which is under the bishop or one to whom he shall have committed it. Whosoever the bishop shall appear, there let the people (πληθος) be. . . . It is not lawful apart from the bishop either to baptize or to hold a love-feast' (ἀγάπη; i.e. 'eucharist'). The Letter to Polycarp contains a still more striking piece of advice: 'Please the Captain in whose army ye serve, from whom also ye will receive your pay. Let none of you be found a deserter' (vi. 2).

A. Michiels (L'Origine de l'épiscopat, Louvain, 1900, pp. 396-98) has tried to show that Ignatius regards this three-grade hierarchy—and notably the episcopate—as of Divine institution. But Ignatius does not look at the problem from this point of view at all. He regards the Church as a sort of extension of the gospel by the apostles: 'I take refuge in the gospel as the flesh of Jesus and in the Apostles as the presbytery of the Church' (Philad. v. 1). The Church is the visible realization of salvation: 'For as many as are of God and of Jesus Christ, they are with the bishop; and as many as shall repent and enter into the unity of the Church, these also shall be of God, that they may be living after Jesus Christ' (iii. 2). And 'if any man followeth one that maketh a schism (σχίζοντι), he doth not inherit the Kingdom of God. If any man walketh in strange doctrine (ἐν ἀλλοτρίᾳ γνώμῃ περιπατεῖ) he hath no fellowship with the passion' (iii. 3). This is equivalent to saying that union with the local church, under the authority of the bishop, is the sine qua non for justification by the blood of Christ, for inheriting the Kingdom of God, and for life after Jesus Christ. Union with the Church is thus not a matter of ecclesiastical law or of individual choice, but one condition of salvation. If this is the view taken by Ignatius, how could he help believing that the visible and hierarchical Church was instituted by the will of God? 'He has an intensely clear perception that the mind of God for man's salvation has expressed itself not in any mere doctrine but in a divinely instituted society with a divinely authorized hierarchy. This is the mind of God . . . so clearly that he who would . . . run in harmony with the divine purpose must perforce have merged his individuality in the fellowship of the Church and submitted his wilfulness to her government' (C. Gore, The Ministry of the Christian Church, London, 1888-89, p. 299).

J. Reville (Les Origines de l'épiscopat, pp. 508-519) is very firm on the authenticity of the Ignatian letters, but sets himself the task of minimizing the witness they bear to the three-grade hierarchy and principally to the monarchical episcopate. First of all he holds that this episcopate took its rise in Asia, and that in the time of Ignatius it did not exist or scarcely existed outside Asia; he concedes, however, that Antioch had a monarchical episcopate. Let us say at the very beginning that nowhere—not even in his Letter to the Romans—does Ignatius lead us to think that the monarchical episcopate was found only in Syria or Asia: he even suggests that such an episcopate exists everywhere, when he says to the Ephesians: 'Even as the bishops that are settled in the farthest parts of the earth are in the mind of Jesus Christ' (οἱ ἐπισκοποι οἱ κατὰ τὰ πέριτα ὁρισθέντες, Eph. iii. 2; for the meaning of κατὰ τὰ πέριτα, cf. Rom. vi. 1: τὰ πέριτα του κόσμου). Reville is wrong in saying that 'the monarchical episcopate makes its entry into the history of the Church at the beginning of the 2nd cent.,' for in Ignatius' letters it is already an established institution. And even supposing Ignatius 'gives us his ideal rather than the ecclesiastic reality of his time,' this ideal is merely the submission, union, and perfect conformity of all to the bishop in each church; it is not the existence of a single bishop, for that is already an accomplished fact in each church. 'Ignatius' testimony presents us with the monarchical episcopate as firmly rooted, completely beyond dispute. . . . He speaks of the bishops as established in the farthest parts of the earth. He knows of no non-episcopal area' (Gore, op. cit., p. 300 f.). Harnack's conclusions on this point are hesitating (Entstehung und Entwicklung der Kirchenverfassung, Leipzig, 1910, pp. 60-63).

Each church has common worship. 'If the prayer of one and another hath so great force, how much more that of the bishop and of the whole Church?' (Eph. v. 2). The assembly is above all a gathering together for prayer, 'for thanksgiving to God and for his glory' (συνέρχεσθαι εἰς ευχαριστίαν θεου καὶ εἰς δόξαν, xiii. 1), prayer for all men that they may find God (x. 1), for the other churches (xxi. 2), or for any private individual (xx. 1). In the assembly there is to be but one prayer, one supplication, one mind in common (Magn. vii. 1). 'And do ye, each and all, form yourselves into a chorus (χορὸς γίνεσθε) that being harmonious in concord and taking the keynote of God (χρῶμα θεου) ye may in unison (συμφωνοί) sing with one voice' (ᾄδῃτε ἐν φωνῇ μιᾷ, Eph. iv. 2; this metaphor is to be understood of the unanimity of the Christians in each church, but it presupposes also the use of singing in Christian assemblies). The bishop presides at the assembly (Smyrn. viii. 1-2); it is he who sits in the chief place (προκαθήμενον, Magn. vi. 1).

Ignatius does not tell us the procedure for the election of a deacon, presbyter, or bishop, but three times over (Philad. x. 1, Smyrn. xi. 2, Polyc. vii. 2) the word χειροτονεῖν is used to express the method by which the assembly elects an ambassador to go to some distant church; it is not a far cry to suppose that the members of the hierarchy were elected in the same way by the general vote. But Ignatius believes that God ratifies this choice and the one elected is the elect of God; he congratulates the bishop of Philadelphia on having been invested with 'the ministry which pertaineth to the common weal (τὴν διακονίαν τὴν εἰς τὸ κοινόν), not of himself or through men, nor yet for vain glory, but in the love of God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ' (Philad. i.; this is not an allusion to party factions, as Réville maintains, but an echo of St. Paul [Gal i.] and an assimilation of the episcopate to the apostolate).

Nowhere in Ignatius' Epistles is there any mention of Christians credited with personal charismata, nor is there any word of local or itinerant prophets such as we find in the apostolic period (C. H. Turner, Studies in Early Church History, Oxford, 1912, p. 22 f.). The bishop, according to Ignatius, has the sole right of speaking in the name of the Spirit. As von Dobschütz says: 'It is interesting to see how in this quite Catholic-minded bishop [Ignatius], who thinks only of the great of the Old Testament past as prophets, there yet speaks to the Churches of Asia Minor a "minister of the spirit" (θεοφόρος), living wholly in ecstasy and revelations (Eph. xxi., Trall. v., Philad. vii., Polyc. ii.)' (Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 238).

Baptism is mentioned (Polyc. vi. 2) as a compact as binding as the relation of soldier to militia. No baptism may take place without the bishop (Smyrn. viii. 2). The Eucharist may not be celebrated without the bishop: 'Let that be held a valid eucharist which is under the bishop or one to whom he shall have committed it' (viii. 1). The one to whom the Eucharist is committed is someone lower than the bishop: apparently a presbyter. To celebrate the Eucharist is called ἀγάπην ποιεῖν (viii. 2). Mention is made of it again in Eph. xx. 2: '... that ye may obey the bishop and the presbytery without distraction of mind; breaking one bread (ἓνα ἄρτον κλωντες), which is the medicine of immortality (φάρμακον ἀθανασίας) and the antidote that we should not die but live for ever in Jesus Christ.'

In the Letter to the Philadelphians, again, we find: 'Be careful therefore to observe one eucharist (for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and one cup unto union in His blood . . .)' (iv.). The text of Smyrn. vi. 2-vii. 1 is less clear: the heretics 'abstain from eucharist (thanksgiving) and prayer, because they allow not that the eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ. . . . They therefore that gainsay the good gift of God (δωρεὰ του θεου) perish by their questionings.' By δωρεὰ του θεου Ignatius means the Incarnation; 'the "gift of God" is the redemption of man through the incarnation and death of Christ' (Lightfoot, ii. 307). To talk of the Eucharist being 'the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ' is a very direct expression of eucharistic realism, but it may have a secondary meaning and be used as a metaphor to designate the presence of Christ in the Church (C. Gore, The Body of Christ, London, 1901, p. 292f.). The ministry of the deacons stands in close relation with the celebration of the Eucharist. They are 'deacons of the mysteries of Jesus Christ'; they are not 'deacons of meats and drinks but servants of the Church of God' (Trall. ii. 3). διάκονοι μυστηρίων Ἰησοῦ Χριστου might be taken to refer to the eucharistic liturgy, but this interpretation is extremely conjectural, and 'mystery' probably means 'faith' (cf. Rom. vii. 3, where the terms ἄρτος and πῶμα, σὰρξ and αἷμα refer to Christ in heaven).

(2) The false teachers.—The unity in each church is contrasted with the divisions among heretics. Onesimus, bishop of Ephesus, praises his flock for their orderly conduct (ἐν θεῷ ενταξάν), for 'living according to truth,' and letting no heresy 'have a home among them' (οὐδεμία αἵρεσις κατοικεῖ, Eph. vi. 2). Ignatius, too, congratulates the Ephesians on the fact that there has never been any dispute among them (μηδεμία ἔρις), and that they have always 'lived after God' (viii. 1). But there are false teachers, men who bear the Christian name and yet act in a manner unworthy of God. These men are to be 'shunned as wild-beasts; for they are mad dogs, biting by stealth' (vii. 1). Ignatius praises the Ephesians for not allowing them to sow bad seed among them and for stopping their ears so as not to hear them (ix. 1). 'Woe to him who "through evil doctrine corrupts the faith of God," for he "shall go into unquenchable fire; and in like manner also shall he that hearkeneth unto him" (xvi. 2).

In his Letter to the Magnesians Ignatius gives some more definite characteristics of these false teachers. He seems to make a distinction between (1) ερεοδοξίαι and (2) μυθεύματα παλαιά ἀνωφελή (Μαγν. viii. 1). But this antithesis is probably purely verbal, μυθεύματα being the equivalent of ερεοδοξίαι, and both terms recalling 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, Tit 1<sup>14</sup>. So ἀνωφελής is probably an echo of Tit 3<sup>9</sup> and παλαιά possibly of 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Ignatius thus making use of St. Paul's language to designate the errors of his time. In the same Epistle Ignatius adds: 'For if even unto this day we live after the manner of Judaism, we avow that we have not received grace'—an expression which might be taken as meaning that the μυθεύματα are Judaistic errors, but this would be an abuse of the term ιουδαϊσμός, which is also taken from St. Paul (Gal 1<sup>13</sup>), and is diverted from its proper sense to signify here life without the grace of redemption. The Magnesians are to live 'after Christ' and not appeal to the 'prophets' as an excuse for living otherwise, for even the holy prophets lived 'after Christ' (viii. 2). They must no longer σαββατίζειν (i.e. live as a Jew—without grace, ix. 1), but learn to live 'as beseemeth Christianity' (κατὰ χριστιανισμόν); the first example of the use of χριστιανισμός, knowing that 'whoso is called by another name besides this, is not of God' (x. 1). They are to reject the old leaven (ζυμην την παλαιωθεισαν), and betake themselves to the new, which is Jesus Christ (x. 2). It is absurd to pronounce the name of Christ and practise Judaism (ιουδαῖζειν), for 'Christianity did not believe in Judaism, but Judaism in Christianity' (x. 3). Ignatius concludes his argument by saying: 'I would have you be on your guard betimes, that ye fall not into the snares of vain doctrine (κενοδοξία); but be ye fully persuaded concerning the birth and the passion and the resurrection' (xi.). The homogeneity of this exposition suggests that the false teaching Ignatius has in mind is Docetism, and that it is the Docetists that he accuses of 'judaising,' not that there was a party of Docetists on one side and a party of Judaizers on the other.

In his Epistle to the Trallians, Ignatius returns to the same subject: 'Take only Christian food (τῇ χριστιανῇ τροφῇ), and abstain from strange herbage, which is heresy' (vi. 1). 'Not indeed that I have known of any such thing [as heresy] among you' (viii. 1). Jesus Christ is a descendant of David and the son of Mary; He was born, ate and drank, suffered, died on the Cross, and was truly (ἀληθως) raised from the dead (ix. 1-2). The heretics Ignatius has in view deny the reality of the humanity of Christ (λέγουσιν τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι αὐτόν, x.), and herein lies their error—Docetism. 'Shun ye therefore those vile offshoots that gender a deadly fruit, whereof if a man taste, forthwith he dieth' (xi. 1).

In Phil. ii. 1 we find similar advice with regard to the κακοδιδασκαλίας, 'those noxious herbs, which are not the husbandry of Jesus Christ' (iii. 1). If anyone interprets the prophets in the sense of Judaism (ἐάν τις ιουδαϊσμόν ἐρμηνεύῃ ἡμῶν), the Philadelphians are not to listen; 'for it is better to hear Christianity from a man who is circumcised than Judaism from one uncircumcised' (vi. 1). The Docetists whom Ignatius accuses of 'judaising' are uncircumcised—apparently Greeks.

Again in Smyrn. ii., Ignatius repeats that Christ suffered really (ἀληθως ἔπαθεν), really rose again (ἀληθως ἀνέστησεν ἐαυτόν), and did not suffer only in appearance (τὸ δοκεῖν πεπονθέναι) 'as certain unbelievers say' (here the reference is apparently to the same Docetists as are described in Trall.). If it was only in semblance (τὸ δοκεῖν) that Christ lived His life on earth, then it is only in semblance that Ignatius is in chains (καγὼ τὸ δοκεῖν δέδεμαι, iv. 2); but Christ's Passion was as real as Ignatius', and what profit is it to him if men praise him and blaspheme the Lord, not confessing that He was a bearer of flesh? (v. 2). Here we have an indication that Docetists were to be found in Smyrna and that they were anxious to deal kindly with the captive Ignatius, but he would have none of them. The names of these men are the names of infidels (νόματα ἀπίστα), which he will not even write. 'Far be it from me even to remember them, until they repent and return to the passion' (v. 3), i.e. to faith in the reality of the Passion of Christ. Note that the Docetists he denounces had not penetrated to Ephesus, they had met with no success in Tralles, and Ignatius puts the Smyrnæans on their guard against these 'wild beasts in human form' (ἀπὸ τῶν θηρίων τῶν ἀνθρωπομορφῶν). The Smyrnæans are not to welcome them (παράδεχσθαι), nor even to meet them (συναντᾶν), but to pray for their conversion, however difficult such conversion may be (iv. 1). 'I have learned,' he writes to the Ephesians (ix. 1), 'that certain persons passed through you from yonder' (ἐκείθεν: here again, as in Smyrn., he mentions no names. The heretics may possibly have come from Smyrna, and, in any case, they infest Asia and are an equal peril to the Philippians. There is nothing to prove that Ignatius did not become acquainted with them in Antioch). In the Letter to the Romans, no heretics are mentioned.

The heretics denounced by Ignatius in Asia, and perhaps more definitely in Smyrna, are not Judaizers in the proper sense of the word, for they only 'judaize' to the extent of denying the flesh of Christ and the redemptive power of His Passion. They are at war with the hierarchy, are dissenters from the Church, and seem to have separated themselves voluntarily. Ignatius speaks of them as 'outside the sanctuary' (ἐκτὸς θυσιαστηρίου), i.e. 'without the bishop and presbytery and deacons' (Trall. vii. 2). Wheresoever the bishop is, there the people should be, 'even as where Jesus may be, there is the universal Church' (ἐκεῖ ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία, Smyrn. viii. 2). Here we have for the first time in history the term καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία in the sense of 'universal Church,' the universality of the Church throughout the world being contrasted with the local churches where each has its own bishop (Lightfoot, pp. 310-312; cf. Smyrn. i. 2: ἐν ἐνὶ σωματι τῆς ἐκκλησίας). The epithet καθολικὴ is used in a geographical sense, and not yet in its ecclesiastical sense, where 'catholic' is contrasted with 'heretical' (cf. 1 Clem. lix. 2 and Didache, ix. 4).

4. Sources of Ignatius' teaching.—Among the sources of Ignatius' teaching, first place must be given to St. Paul. In his letters Ignatius never fails to do special honour to the churches he addresses if they have received a letter from St. Paul, e.g. the Ephesians (Eph. viii. 1, xii. 2) and the Romans (Rom. iv. 3). In all his letters we find reminiscences of the Pauline Epistles, esp. 1 and 2 Cor., Rom., Gal., Phil., 1 and 2 Thess., Philem., Eph., Col., 1 and 2 Tim., and Titus (see E. von der Goltz, Ignatius von Antiochien als Christ und Theologe [=TS xii. 3, Leipzig, 1894], pp. 178-194, who gives parallel texts of Ignatius and St. Paul). We might add 1 Pet. (ib. p. 194 f.), but the dependence of Ignatius on Heb. and James is not evident.

According to von der Goltz, Ignatius did not know the Fourth Gospel, although his letters are full of Johannine thoughts, but merely participated in the Johannine Gedankenwelt, without actually reading the Gospel. It is more probable, however, that Ignatius used the Fourth Gospel, without quoting it. It is a very curious fact that in his Letter to the Ephesians Ignatius makes not the slightest allusion to the Apostle John. Ignatius certainly knew the Synoptic tradition, for there are clear traces of his dependence on Matthew, although we have no sign of dependence on Mark, and only one doubtful allusion to Luke.

Ignatius makes frequent appeal to what he calls εὐαγγέλιον, to the apostles, and to the prophets: 'taking refuge in the Gospel as the flesh of Jesus and in the Apostles as the presbytery of the Church. Yea, and we love the prophets also' (Philad. v. 1 f.). The prophets are the OT (Smyrn. v. 1); the Gospel gives us authentic knowledge of Jesus Christ (χριστομαθίαν, Philad. viii. 2). In this connexion Ignatius writes: 'For I heard certain persons saying, If I find it not in the charters (ἀρχαῖα), I believe it not in the Gospel. And when I said to them, It is written (γέγραπται), they answered me, That is the question (πρόκειται)' (no doubt a reference to the Docetists). The gospel is a written document about which there is much controversy. Further on Ignatius describes the contents of the gospel, i.e. the Incarnation or παρουσία τοῦ σωτῆρος, the Passion and the Resurrection (ix. 2). The gospel is a fulfilment of OT prophecy (ib.). The Lord and the apostles are nearly always mentioned together: 'Do your diligences (δόγματα) of the Lord and of the Apostles' (Magn. xiii. 1), and Jülicher was right in saying that the words of Serapion (bishop of Antioch, c. A.D. 200), 'We receive Peter and all the other apostles as Christ' (Euseb. HE vi. xii. 3), might have been pronounced a century earlier (Einleitung in das NT<sup>5, 6</sup>, Tübingen, 1906, p. 430). Yet in the time of Ignatius the canon of the NT was not 'a purely ideal canon,' as Jülicher thinks, and when Ignatius speaks of γεγραπται and ἀρχαῖα he is thinking of authentic documents, which have been accepted by the Church. There is no doubt, however, that Ignatius accepts elements foreign to our ecclesiastical canon, as e.g. the words of the Risen Christ: 'I am not a demon without body' (δαίμονιον σώματος, Smyrn. iii. 2), which may have originated in the Κήρυγμα Πέτρος, in the Gospel of the Hebrews, or in a gloss on Lk 24<sup>39</sup>. Another foreign element is the description of the wonderful Nativity star (Eph. xix. 2), which is probably a gloss on Mt 2<sup>2</sup> and an echo of Nu 24<sup>17</sup>.

5. Ignatius' theology, christology, and pneumatology.—The doctrine of Ignatius as shown in his vocabulary and ideas gives no hint of Hellenic culture. God is One; but the philosophic implications of this statement are not to be sought for. God manifested Himself through Jesus Christ His Son and Word (ἐἰς θεὸς ἔστιν, ὁ φανερώσας εαυτὸν δια Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, ὃς ἔστιν αὐτοῦ λόγος ἀπὸ σιγῆς προελθὼν, ὃς κατὰ πάντα εὐρέσθησεν τῷ πέμψαντι αὐτὸν, Magn. viii. 2). Jesus Christ pre-existed in God; He was with the Father before the worlds and appeared at the end of time (. . . 'Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὃς πρὸ αἰώνων, παρὰ πατρί ἦν καὶ ἐν τέλει ἐφάνη, vi. 1). Christ is One: 'He came forth from One Father and is with One and departed unto One' (ἐνα Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν τὸν ἀφ' ἐνὸς πατρὸς προελθόντα καὶ εἰς ἓνα ὄντα καὶ χωρήσαντα, vii. 2) [the last phrase is an allusion to the Ascension]. Christ was in God before time, invisible, impalpable, impassible, and it was for us He became visible and passible (Polyc. iii. 2). Christ is the Word coming forth from the silence of God, i.e. He is revealed to the world by the Incarnation (there is no reference to the part the Word had in the Creation); He comes forth from the Father to reveal Himself (no reference to the eternal generation of the Word—in fact, Christ is in God ἀγέννητος as He is ἀπαθης, Eph. vii. 2). See J. Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes, i. [Paris, 1905], p. 136.

Ignatius' christology is presented as a refutation of Docetism, which regards Christ as a pneumatic being, and special stress is therefore laid on the real humanity and the bodily and passible being of Christ. Christ was conceived in the womb of Mary (ἐκ κοίτης καὶ ὑπὸ Μαρίας), He is of the seed of David and of the Holy Ghost (ἐκ σπέρματος μὲν Δαυὶδ, πνεύματος δὲ ἁγίου); He was born and was baptized (Eph. xviii. 2). He was really born of a virgin (γεννημένον ἀληθῶς ἐκ παρθένου, Smyrn. i. 1). 'He was the son of Mary, who was truly born and ate and drank, was truly persecuted under Pontius Pilate, was truly crucified and died . . . ; who moreover was truly raised from the dead' (Trall. ix. 1, 2); 'truly nailed up in the flesh for our sakes under Pontius Pilate and Herod the tetrarch' (Smyrn. i. 2); 'He was in the flesh even after the resurrection; and when he came to Peter and his company (τοὺς περὶ Πέτρον) . . . they touched him, and they believed' (iii. 2).

Ignatius teaches the corporeity of Christ with such insistence because Christ is by nature πνεῦμα (Harnack, Dogmengeschichte<sup>4</sup>, Tübingen, 1905, i. 213; W. Sanday, Christologies Ancient and Modern, Oxford, 1910, p. 10). Christ is 'of flesh and of spirit, generate and ingenerate, God in man, true Life (i.e. God) in death (in a mortal body), son of Mary and Son of God, first passible and then impassible' (σαρκικός καὶ πνευματικός, γεννητὸς καὶ ἀγεννητός, ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ θεός, ἐν θανάτῳ ζωὴ ἀληθινή, καὶ ἐκ Μαρίας καὶ ἐκ θεοῦ, πρῶτον παθὴρὸς καὶ τότε ἀπαθὴς, Eph. vii. 2; cf. Polyc. iii. 2). Ignatius thus posits in Christ the dualism of σὰρξ and πνεῦμα: through the σὰρξ Christ is generate, born of Mary, passible and mortal; through the πνεῦμα He is ingenerate (i.e. without beginning), He is life, He is impassible, He is God; in a word, Christ is God come in the flesh (ἐν σαρκὶ γενόμενος θεός).

The interpretation that Christ in the flesh became God has the context against it, for Christ did not become ἀγεννητός, nor ἐκ θεοῦ: He realizes at one and the same time the two antinomial series of predicates. Through the πνεῦμα which is ἐν σαρκί, Christ is one with the Father: He is πνευματικῶς ἠνωμένος τῷ πατρὶ (Smyrn. iii. 3), and yet after the flesh He is subordinate to the Father ([ὑποταγείς] τῷ πατρὶ κατὰ σάρκα, Magn. xiii. 2) and has pleased God who sent Him (εὐηρέστησεν τῷ πέμψαντι αὐτόν, viii. 2). It is very difficult (in spite of Harnack [Dogmengesch.<sup>4</sup> i. 216]) not to recognize in these statements of Ignatius all the presuppositions of the doctrine of the two natures; in any case, adoptionism is excluded.

The union of man and God in Christ is nowhere defined by Ignatius, but one passage may be taken to have this meaning: 'If,' says Ignatius to the Ephesians (v. 1), 'I in a short time had such converse (τοιαντὴν συνῆθειαν) with your bishop, which was not after the manner of men but in the Spirit, how much more do I congratulate you who are closely joined with him (ἐγγεκεραμένους) as the Church is with Christ Jesus and as Jesus Christ is with the Father, that all things may be harmonious in unity' (ἵνα πάντα ἐν ἐνότητι σύμφωνα ᾗ). Here we have the union of Christ with the Father compared to the union of the Church with Christ, and the union of the believers with the bishop. The two terms συνῆθεια and ἐγγράσις are not equivalent, the second being metaphorical, and only the first counting. But it would be rather risky, especially when dealing with Ignatius, to base a whole logical theory on a single word.

Christ is called θεός, although He is distinct from the Father. Ignatius speaks, e.g., of 'the will of the Father and of Jesus Christ our God' (ἐν θεληματι τοῦ πατρὸς καὶ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν, Eph. inscr.). Even in His Incarnation Jesus is called θεός: ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χριστὸς ἐκνοφορήθη ὑπὸ Μαρίας κατ' οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ (Eph. xviii. 2; cf. Rom. inscr. and iii. 3). Von der Goltz is quite justified in saying that Ignatius distinguishes between Christ and the Father in so far as He is a person, pre-existent, historical, or exalted; all modalism is excluded, and only subordination remains possible. In the opinion of the present writer Ignatius regards Jesus Christ as God in His own person. Von der Goltz supposes that for Ignatius, Jesus Christ is God in relation to us, but Ignatius himself excludes relativism. In Eph. xv. 3 he writes: 'Nothing is hidden from the Lord, but even our secrets are nigh unto Him. Let us therefore do all things as knowing that He dwelleth in us, to the end that we may be His temples and He Himself may be in us as our God. This is so, . . . ' (ἵνα ὡμεν αὐτοῦ ναοὶ καὶ αὐτὸς ἐν ἡμῖν θεός· ὅπερ καὶ ἔστιν). Christ is our God not only in so far as He lives in us, but absolutely (ὅπερ καὶ ἔστιν). The expression θεός ἡμῶν does not give God a purely subjective value. Again, Jesus Christ is not only our God or God for us, He is very God: 'I give glory to Jesus Christ the God who bestowed such wisdom upon you' (δοξάζω Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν τὸν θεὸν τὸν οὕτως ὑμᾶς σοφίσαντα, Smyrn. i. 1); cf. Trall. vii. 1 and Smyrn. x. 1, where the designation θεός is given to Christ absolutely. We shall omit Smyrn. vi. 1, where a gloss has been inserted in the text.

The work of Christ consisted in giving man a knowledge of God. Jesus Christ is the λόγος of God, come forth from the silence of God (Magn. viii. 2). He is the mouth which lieth not, and in which the Father hath spoken truly (τὸ ἀψευδές στομα ἐν ᾧ ὁ πατήρ ἐλάλησεν ἀληθῶς, Rom. viii. 2). He is the knowledge of God: 'wherefore do we not all walk prudently, receiving the knowledge of God, which is Jesus Christ' (λαβόντες θεοῦ γνῶσιν, ὃ ἔστιν Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Eph. xvii. 2; cf. iii. 2). The teaching of Christ is a doctrine of incorruptibility (διδασχὴ ἀφθαρσίας, Magn. vi. 2). The incorruptibility is not the fruit of the διδασχὴ but the fruit of the Death and Resurrection of Christ. The Cross, 'which is a stumbling-block to them that are unbelievers, is to us salvation and life eternal' (σωτηρία καὶ ζωὴ αἰώνιος, Eph. xviii. 1). God became manifest in the flesh to prove the newness of imperishable life, and the destruction of death (καυνότητα διδίου ζωῆς . . . θανάτου κατάλυσιν, xix. 3). The Passion of Christ and His blood shed for us are an earnest of this renewal of humanity; it is what Ignatius calls οἰκονομία ἐς τὸν καὶνὸν ἄνθρωπον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν, ἐν τῇ αὐτοῦ πίστει καὶ ἐν τῇ αὐτοῦ ἀγάπῃ, ἐν πάθει αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀναστάσει (xx. 1). Ignatius gives no explanation of this mystery—either of the virtue of Christ's Passion or of the manner in which this virtue is communicated to the believing. But he lays great stress on the Passion of Christ and on the ἀφθαρσία it procures—an insistence which is explained when we remember not only that he was refuting Docetism but also that this tenet of Pauline theology was for him one of fundamental importance.

That the Spirit stands in opposition to the flesh we have already gathered from many examples. This was a familiar article of faith to Ignatius: the flesh is man, the Spirit is a principle which comes from God and acts in man (τὸ πνεῦμα . . . ἀπὸ θεοῦ ἐν) searching out his closest secrets (Philad. vii. 1). The prophets were the disciples of the Spirit (Magn. ix. 2). The Spirit inspires the spiritual man, and Ignatius is conscious of being so inspired: 'It was the preaching of the Spirit who spoke on this wise' [by my mouth] (τὸ πνεῦμα ἐκήρυσεν λέγον τάδε, Philad. vii. 2). On this point Swete shrewdly observes: 'It is interesting to observe that Ignatius can combine a claim to prophetic inspiration with a passionate zeal for a regular and fully organized ministry' (The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church, London, 1912, p. 14).

The believers are the 'building of God the Father' (οἰκοδομὴν θεοῦ πατρὸς), 'hoisted up to the heights through the engine of Jesus Christ (μηχανῆς Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), which is the Cross, and using for a rope the Holy Spirit' (σχοινίῳ χρώμενοι τῷ πνεύματι τῷ ἁγίῳ, Eph. ix. 1). Ignatius adjures the Magnesians to remain united in flesh and spirit (σὰρκα καὶ πνεύματι), by faith and love, in the Son, the Father, and the Spirit (ἐν υἱῷ καὶ πατρὶ καὶ ἐν πνεύματι, Magn. xiii. 1). The Spirit is named along with the Logos (ἐν ἀμύμῳ πνεύματι καὶ λόγῳ θεοῦ, Smyrn. inscr.). The apostles were obedient τῷ Χριστῷ καὶ τῷ πατρὶ καὶ τῷ πνεύματι (Magn. xiii. 2; it is difficult not to regard this as an example of the trinitarian baptismal formula [Harnack, Dogmengesch.<sup>4</sup> i. 175]).

The Father is plenitude (πληρωμα, Eph. inser.). The Son is the Logos of God (Magn. viii. 2), the thought of God (γνωμή θεου, Eph. iii. 2), and the knowledge of God (γνώσις θεου, xvii. 2). The Spirit is the χάρισμα of Christ (τὸ χάρισμα δὲ πεπομφεν ἀληθῶς ὁ κύριος, ib.), and in this sense the Spirit is the Spirit of Jesus Christ (Philad. inser.), although one cannot identify Christ and the Holy Spirit in any way, as Harnack would have us do (Dogmengesch.<sup>4</sup> i. 214), basing his argument on Magn. xv., where ἀδιακριτον πνεῦμα is a synonym of ὁμόνοια and not of ἅγιον πνεῦμα. The Word and the Spirit are not known except by their missions in time.

Christianity, in opposition to Judaism, is the life of Christ in us (Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς τὸ ἀληθινὸν ἡμῶν ζῆν, Smyrn. iv. 1; cf. Eph. iii. 2, xi. 1, Magn. i. 2, ix. 2), which is manifested through faith and love (Eph. xiv. 1; cf. Smyrn. vi. 1, Philad. ix. 2). This life is the fruit of the Spirit; it is the Spirit in contrast with the flesh. 'The σαρκικοί cannot do τὰ πνευματικά, neither can the πνευματικοί do τὰ σαρκικά' (Eph. viii. 2), and Ignatius even goes the length of saying, 'No man professing faith sinneth' (οὐδὲς πίστιν ἐπαγγελόμενος ἀμαρτάνει, Eph. xiv. 2).

As Christ is joined to the Father so the Church is joined to Christ (Eph. v. 1), for Christ is in every believer (xv. 3). He 'breathes incorruption upon the Church' (xvii. 1). He is the High Priest to whom is committed the holy of holies; to Him alone the secrets of God are confided, He is the door of the Father through which Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the Prophets, the Apostles, and the Church enter in (Philad. i. 9).

The time of the end is at hand ('These are the last times,' ἔσχατοι καιροί, Eph. xi. 1). All those who believe in Christ will rise again (Trall. ix. 2). The believers are members of Christ through His Cross and Passion, and the Head cannot exist apart from the members, so that in the end there will be unity, God Himself being Unity (τοῦ θεοῦ ἐνωσιν ἐπαγγελόμενον, ὃς ἔστιν αὐτός, Trall. xi. 2). We find no trace of millennialism and no apocalyptic imagery. The things of heaven (τὰ ἐπουράνια) are mentioned only in the abstract (Trall. v. 2), and with them the angelical orders (τὰς τοποθεσίας, τὰς ἀγγελικάς, τὰς συστάσεις, τὰς ἀρχοντικές; terms which seem to foreshadow Gnosticism). Cf. Polyc. ii. 2: 'And as for the invisible things, pray thou that they may be revealed unto thee' (τὰ δὲ ἀόρατα αἰτεῖ ἵνα σοι φανερωθῇ).

This short analysis of the theologoumena of Ignatius will have shown the justice of F. Loofs' verdict (Leitfaden zum Studium der Dogmengeschichte, Halle, 1906, p. 102) that 'Johannine and Pauline thoughts ring through the theology of Ignatius'; but it is not correct to say that his theology is 'a theology of Asia Minor' distinct from 'ordinary Gentile Christianity' (cf. Harnack, Dogmengesch.<sup>4</sup> i. 168). It is rather the theology of the presbyters quoted by Irenæus; his theology, as Harnack says (op. cit. i. 241) is of the same nature as that of Melito and Irenæus, 'whose predecessor he is'; it is the tutorist theology of tradition which afterwards triumphantly withstood the Gnostic crisis; it was not brought into being by that crisis, but must certainly have existed prior to it although later than the monarchical episcopate. Ignatius has no creative genius, but, as Sanday aptly says, 'the striking thing about him is the way in which he seems to anticipate the spirit of the later theology; the way in which he singles out as central the points which it made central, and the just balance and proportion which he observes between them' (Christologies, p. 10 f.).

What has given authority to Ignatius' letters is his martyrdom. His letters, written in an abrupt and nervous style, overloaded with metaphors, incoherent, popular, and lacking every Hellenic grace, are yet endowed with such pathetic faith and such passionate joy in martyrdom, with such overwhelming love of Christ, that they are one of the finest expressions of the Christianity of the 2nd century.

6. Special points raised by the Epistle to the Romans.—Some special questions raised by the Letter to the Romans, whose authenticity we assume as beyond question, have been reserved for separate treatment.

Ignatius says that he has been most eager to see the 'godly countenances' of the Christians of Rome, and he hopes to salute them 'for wearing bonds in Christ Jesus' (Rom. i. 1). He implores them to do nothing to save him from martyrdom; he dreads their very love; for 'it is easy for them to do what they will' (ὡμιν γὰρ ευχερές ἐστιν, ὃ θέλετε ποιῆσαι, i. 2), i.e. the Romans were in a position to ensure Ignatius' liberation. As Harnack says (Dogmengesch.<sup>4</sup> i. 486; cf. Lightfoot, p. 196), 'Ignatius presupposes great influence on the part of the separate members of the community in the higher ruling circles.' The insistence with which Ignatius endeavours to dissuade the Romans from any possible intervention on his behalf would seem to indicate that the Romans had some definite plan in hand and that he had been informed of it.

Again, in the Letter to the Romans (iii. 1) we find: 'Ye never grudged any one; ye were the instructors of others (ἀλλοὺς ἐδιδάξατε). And my desire is that those lessons shall hold good which as teachers ye enjoin' (ἐγὼ δὲ θέλω ἵνα καέκείνα βέβαια ἢ ἀ μαθητευόντες ἐντέλλεσθε). The word μαθητεῦν means 'to make disciples,' as μαθητεῦσθαι means 'to be a disciple' (Eph. iii. 1). Thus the Romans gave instruction, made disciples, and laid down precepts. Ignatius is here probably thinking of such documents as 1 Clement, where the Church of Rome instructs other churches in their duty (so Duchesne, Eglises séparées, Paris, 1896, p. 129; Harnack, loc. cit.; and Batiffol, Eglise naissante, Paris, 1909, p. 170), or he may have had in mind practical examples of martyrdom in the Church of Rome (in Eph. i. 2 he hopes to be able to follow the heroic example of these martyrs (ἵνα ἐπιτυχεῖν δυνηθῶ μαθητῆς εἶναι; cf. Magn. ix. 2, Rom. iv. 2, v. 3)). The second interpretation perhaps suits the context better (cf. Lightfoot, ii. 202).

In Rom. iv. 3 Ignatius says: 'I do not enjoin you, as Peter and Paul did. They were Apostles, I am a convict.' The word κατὰκριτος (condemnatus) is difficult to explain; but it may at any rate be taken as an expression of Ignatius' humility such as is found in Trall. iii. 3: 'I did not think myself competent for this, that being a convict I should order you as though I were an apostle' (ἵνα ὢν κατὰκριτος ὡς ἀπόστολος ὑμῖν διατάσσωμαι). The apostles were, after Jesus Christ, the authorities of most account. 'I do not command you, as though I were somewhat' (οὐ διατάσσωμαι ὑμῖν ὡς ὢν τις), writes Ignatius to the Ephesians (iii. 1; cf. 1 Co 7<sup>17</sup>). In the quotation from Rom. iv. 3 given above Ignatius mentions St. Peter and St. Paul because they alone of all the disciples had any dealings with the Romans: 'they had been at Rome and had given commandments to the Roman Church' (Lightfoot, ii. 209). This allusion to St. Peter is generally taken as evidence of the fact that St. Peter went to Rome (cf. F. Sieffert, art. 'Petrus' in PRE<sup>3</sup> xv. [1904] 200; F. H. Chase, art. 'Peter (Simon)' in HDB iii. [1900] 769).

While Ignatius is still in Asia, Christians of Antioch go directly before him from Syria to Rome 'unto the glory of God.' Ignatius is aware of this fact, and he writes to the Romans (x. 2): 'they are all worthy of God and of you, and it becometh you to refresh them in all things.'

From this we may learn that there were great facilities for communication between Antioch or Ephesus (x. 1) and Rome. The Christians from Syria were most heartily welcomed at Rome, and from that time onwards the Church of Rome was known for its hospitality and generosity. In the address of the Letter to the Romans, the Church of Rome is saluted in most emphatic terms. If we compare this with the addresses of the other letters we shall find that this emphasis is part of Ignatius' style (Polycarp, on the other hand, couches his address to the Philippians in the simplest terms); but, all the same, he salutes the Church of Rome with more emphasis than the other churches, which shows the great consideration shown at this time by other churches (esp. the Church of Antioch) to the Church of Rome. As Harnack says: 'However much one tones down the exaggerated expressions in his Letter to the Romans, so much is clear—that Ignatius assigns to the Roman community a position of real superiority over the sister-communities . . . the effusiveness of the address shows that he values and salutes this community as the foremost in all Christendom' (Harnack, loc. cit.).

Three of the predicates applied to the Roman Church by Ignatius in the address may now be considered.

(1) The believers are ἀποδιυλισμένοι ἀπὸ παντὸς ἀλλοτρίου χρώματος, 'filtered,' 'pure,' 'free from all polluting colouring matter' (cf. Lightfoot, p. 193). As we have already noted, Ignatius does not think there are any heretics in Rome, and here he praises the Romans for not mixing any foreign colouring matter with the purity which befits them, as elsewhere he expresses a wish that among the Ephesians there may be no plant of the devil (Eph. x. 3). In the case of the Ephesians it is a mere wish, but with the Romans it is an accomplished fact.

(2) The Church of Rome προκάθηται ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου Ῥωμαίων. The verb προκάθημαι is translated praesideo, προκάθισις sessio (in throno, in tribunalī); προκάθηται = 'has the chief seat, presides, takes the precedence' (Lightfoot, ii. 190). Ignatius applies this epithet elsewhere to the bishop and the presbytery (προκαθήμενον τοῦ ἐπισκόπου ἐς τόπον θεοῦ, καὶ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἐς τύπον συνεδρίου τῶν ἀποστόλων [Magh. vi. 1]; and again ἐνώθητε τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ καὶ τοῖς προκαθημένοις ἐς τύπον καὶ διδασχὴν ἀφθαρσίας [ib. 2]). Ignatius thus attributes to the whole Roman Church a gravity comparable with that of the bishop and the presbytery. Zahn thinks that ἐν τόπῳ is a bad reading, and suggests ἐν τύπῳ: 'Ecclesia igitur Romana tamquam exemplar, ab omnibus imitandum, hominibus imperio Romano subditis praest' ('Ignatii et Polycarpi Epistolae,' p. 57). This correction has not been accepted by any other critic, and indeed, if Ignatius had wanted to say that, he would have written rather ἐς τύπον. Then again, προκαθηται is not to be taken with χωρίου, as if Ignatius were saying that the Roman Church presided over the Roman region and 'the suburbicarian bishops' (Lightfoot, ii. 190); but it is to be understood absolutely, and ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου Ῥωμαίων designates the place where the Church presides. The curious tautology ἐν τόπῳ χωρίου must be equivalent to ἐν τόπῳ ἢ χωρίῳ, and thus signifies the town of Rome. This interpretation of Funk's seems more objective than Lightfoot's (p. 190 f.), who prefers to give the text a 'suburbicarian' meaning.

(3) The Church of Rome is called ἀξιόθεος, ἀξιόπαινος, ἀξιοεὐκρεντος, ἀξίαντος καὶ προκαθήμενῃ τῆς ἀγάπης, χριστόνομος, πατρώνυμος. This accumulation of epithets is an example of Ignatius' emphasis; but the expression προκαθήμενῃ τῆς ἀγάπης does have a more precise meaning. This time προκαθήμενῃ is not to be taken absolutely but construed along with ἀγάπης: the Roman Church presides over love. Lightfoot (p. 192) takes the meaning to be: 'the Church of Rome, as it is first in rank, is first also in love,' but it is doubtful if ἀγάπης has this causative sense of ἀγάπη or ἐν ἀγάπῃ. The Latin version of the interpolated Letters of Ignatius translates the words 'fundatur in dilectione et lege Christi,' but the verb προκαθήμεναι has not this meaning in Ignatius. Harnack's interpretation 'procuratrix fraterni amoris' is not exact either. The verb προκαθήμεναι with the genitive implies presidency over a city or a region: ἐκεῖνος τοιγαροῦν ὁ ὑψίστος καὶ μέγιστος Ζεὺς, ὁ προκαθήμενος τῆς λαμπροτάτης ὑμῶν πόλεως writes the Emperor Maximin Daia in a letter to the people of Tyre (Euseb. HE ix. vii. 7). Funk (Patr. apost. i. 253) quotes from Theodoret the expression applied to Rome: τῆς οἰκουμένης προκαθήμενῃ; and from John Malalas that applied to Antioch: προκαθήμενῃ τῆς ἀνατολῆς. We may compare also Philostorgius representing Constantine προκαθήμενῷ τῶν ἐπισκόπων (HE vii. 6 [ed. Bidez, 1913, p. 85]). Thus the word ἀγάπη must be a metaphorical word for some collectivity, which cannot be the Church of Rome, because here the Church of Rome is the subject of which προκαθήμενῃ is the epithet. It would be very extraordinary if ἀγάπη meant the Christian communities near Rome, or even the Christian communities of Italy, for that would be limiting arbitrarily the meaning of the word ἀγάπη. We are left then with the explanation that ἀγάπη is that in which the distant churches like Antioch and Ephesus are united to the Church of Rome. Ignatius writes to the Trallians (xiii. 1): ἀσπάζεται υἱὰς ἡ ἀγάπη Συμυριαίων καὶ Ἐφεσίων; and to the Romans (ix. 3): ἀσπάζεται υἱὰς . . . ἡ ἀγάπη τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν τῶν δεξαμένων με (cf. Philad. xi. 2 and Smyrn. xii. 1: ἀσπάζεται υἱὰς ἡ ἀγάπη τῶν ἀδελφῶν τῶν ἐν Τρωάδι). Just as the collectivity of the believers of one church is designated by the expression ἀγάπη τῶν ἀδελφῶν, and two or three churches are designated by the phrase ἀγάπη τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, so it is natural that προκαθήμενῃ τῆς ἀγάπης should mean προκαθήμενῃ τῆς ἀγάπης τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, 'president of the love or collectivity of the churches.'

The Letter to the Romans presents one difficulty formulated by J. Wordsworth (Ministry of Grace, London, 1901, p. 126) in these words: Ignatius 'twice speaks of himself as "Bishop of Syria" or "of the Church of Syria" (chs. 2 and 9): but he is entirely silent as to any such office in the Church of Rome. . . . If then, Clement, or any other single Church officer, had been "Bishop of Rome," in the sense that Ignatius was "Bishop of Syria," the language of the latter in writing to Rome would be almost inexplicable' (cf. also J. Réville, Origines de l'épiscopat, p. 510). If we take the trouble to read the Letter to the Romans carefully, we shall find still more extraordinary facts, viz. that Ignatius does not speak of presbyters or deacons either, so that if the objection of Wordsworth and Réville is valid, we should have to say that the Church of Rome, at the time of Ignatius' Letter, had no hierarchy, no deacons, no presbytery, no bishop. As a matter of fact, Ignatius regarded each church as having its unity in its totality, and his letters are addressed to churches, to each church as such (exc. the Epistle to Polycarp), just as the Epistle of Clement does not bear the name of Clement, but is addressed by 'the Church of God which sojourneth in Rome to the Church of God which sojourneth in Corinth.' It is very probable that Clement was προκαθήμενος, although in his time the line of demarcation between episcopate and presbytery was still blurred. It is difficult to say when the monarchical episcopate strictly began in Rome, but the episcopal lists of Rome, Antioch, Corinth, etc., must have been nothing but forgeries if there was not early in the communities a primus inter pares, at the head of the presbytery, such as Clement was when he wrote to the Church of Corinth (Harnack, Entstehung und Entwicklung, p. 72). Thus the silence of Ignatius in his Letter to the Romans cannot be taken as a proof that Rome had no hierarchy at the time at which it was written. On Ignatius and the Roman primacy see A. Harnack, 'Das Zeugnis des Ignatius über das Ansehen der römischen Gemeinde,' in SBAW, 1896, pp. 111-131; J. Chapman, in Revue Bénédictine, 1896, pp. 385-400; Funk, *Kirchengeschichtl. IGNORANCE.—As the apostolic writers dealt mostly with moral and spiritual matters, they usually spoke of ignorance in a sense that was not merely intellectual. Thus (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>) the ignorance of the Gentiles was associated with vanity of mind, darkening of understanding, alienation from God, and hardening of heart, in a way that linked it to the deeper faculties of the soul. Even vous is the faculty for recognizing moral good as well as intellectual truth, and διάνοια includes feeling and desiring as well as understanding. Ignorance arose, according to the apostles, as much from the condition of the conscience and the spirit as from the state of the mind (cf. 2 Ti 3<sup>7</sup>). Holding this conception, the apostles taught that ignorance sprang either from the state of the heart or from lack of the Christian revelation. The latter condition was much dwelt upon, for to all the apostles the Coming of Jesus Christ was the shedding forth of so great a light that all who had not seen that light dwelt in darkness, while they insisted also that light sufficient was given in the world to learn about God, if only men had not been led away by evil desires (Ro 1<sup>20</sup>). Thus arose the ignorance of God (Ac 17-<sup>3</sup>), the yielding to lusts (1 P 1<sup>14</sup>), the rejection of Jesus of Nazareth (Ac 3<sup>17</sup>), and, in St. Paul's own experience, the persecution of the followers of Jesus Christ (Ac 26<sup>5</sup>).

The double source of these sins of ignorance led to God's method of dealing with them. As they arose from evil in men, they were not left unpunished by God (Ro 1<sup>28</sup>); but, as they were done in ignorance of the full revelation, they were 'winked at' or 'overlooked' by God (Ac 17<sup>30</sup>), or in the forbearance of God were passed over (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>). This passing over (ἀράρεσις) did not exclude punishment, and was not equivalent to forgiveness (ἀφεσις); but it prepared the way for repentance (Ac 3<sup>19</sup>) and for the receiving of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus (1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>).

The densest ignorance came to those who had heard the gospel of Christ and had persisted in rejecting it, for on them the curse foretold by Isaiah was abiding (Ac 28<sup>26</sup>). Such people, whatever their superficial knowledge might be, were walking in such darkness that they were content to live in sin and to be guilty of hatred of their brothers (1 Jn 3<sup>21</sup>).

Even in the experience of those who had come to a knowledge of Christ as Saviour and Lord there existed much ignorance.

(1) If Christ Himself knew not the day of the Great Appearing, it was not to be wondered at that the times and the seasons for the coming of God's Kingdom in glory were hid from His disciples (Ac 1<sup>7</sup>). It is evident from some of the apostolic writings (cf. 1 Thess.) that many believed that the Great Day was to come almost immediately, and were totally ignorant of the delay that was to ensue.

(2) Another subject of which there was much ignorance was the state of the dead. The apostles in their eschatology did little to dispel the darkness connected with the present condition of the dead. Sometimes they referred to the blessedness of those 'with Christ' (Ph 1<sup>23</sup>), sometimes to their quiescence in a state of sleep (1 Co 15-<sup>9</sup>), and sometimes to the activities carried on (1 P 4<sup>6</sup>), but the intermediate state was comparatively uninteresting to the Apostolic Age, as their main thought centred in the Resurrection and the Parousia. Even with regard to these great events of the future there was not always assured knowledge; disciples of Christ were not only doubtful of the Resurrection, but even opposed to its teaching, and St. Paul laboured to dispel their ignorance; while many sorrowed about their brethren who had passed away as if they had lost the opportunity of being present at the Parousia of Christ, not knowing that both those asleep and those alive would then together meet the Lord in the air (1 Th 4<sup>13</sup>).

(3) According to the apostles, ignorance could never be wholly eliminated from Christian life, while the circle of knowledge must be constantly enlarged. The apostles were never content to leave even the humblest Christians in a state of ignorance, and one indication of this desire may be found in the phrase that recurs so often in the Epistles of St. Paul: 'I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren' (Ro 1<sup>3</sup> 11-<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>13</sup>). But the apostles acknowledged that ignorance was found even in the most mature Christian experience. Thus they taught that there had been revealed to all Christians the great end of their life, viz. the perfecting of salvation, but they indicated that there was constantly shown a real ignorance of what was needed at any particular crisis in life. Hence Christians knew not what to pray for as they should at particular moments (Ro 8-<sup>6</sup>), but in this ignorance the Holy Spirit helped within the heart by unutterable groanings. Still further, Christian experience was limited by its own capacity in face of the boundlessness of the Divine attributes. The apostles proclaimed that the love of God was made known pre-eminently in the life and death of Christ, but there were depths in God's love that could never be fathomed by human knowledge. Christians knew that love, but even at the end they had to confess their ignorance, for it passed knowledge (Eph 3<sup>19</sup>). The apostles had no hesitancy in believing in a real knowledge of God, but they declared that a complete or exhaustive knowledge lay beyond even the most mature Christian experience. The only thorough Agnosticism spoken of by the apostles was such as certain Corinthians were in danger of, according to St. Paul, and was associated with their low ethics, their heathen intimacies, and their disbelief in the Resurrection. These characteristics were liable to produce a persistent ignorance of God (ἀγνοσία θεου, 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>) which was shared with the worst of the heathen and from which they could be saved only by being aroused from the stupor of pride and sensualism.

ILLUMINATED.—See ENLIGHTENMENT.

ILLYRICUM (Ἰλλυρικόν).—This was the name of a Roman province bounded on the W. by the Adriatic, and extending from Pannonia on the N.

to Macedonia on the S. Though so near to Italy, it was for long comparatively unknown. Strabo writing about A.D. 20 says: 'Illyria was formerly neglected, through ignorance perhaps of its fertility; but it was principally avoided on account of the savage manners of the inhabitants, and their piratical habits' (vii. v. 11). It was subjugated by Tiberius in A.D. 9. When St. Paul contemplated a journey by Rome to Spain, he justified his desire for fresh fields by saying that from Jerusalem and round unto Illyricum (καὶ κυκλῶ μέχρι τοῦ Ἰλλυρικοῦ) he had fully preached the gospel of Christ (Ro 15<sup>19</sup>).

Meyer, Gifford, and others (in loco) explain κυκλῶ as the region round Jerusalem, i.e. Judæa, Syria and Arabia. But in order to bear this sense the word would require the article. The meaning is rather that all the countries between Jerusalem and Illyricum—Syria, Cilicia, Galatia, Asia, Macedonia, Achaia—forming a rough arc of a circle, have been evangelized by the Apostle.

The words 'unto Illyricum' do not necessarily imply that he had preached within this province. He may be indicating the exterior rather than the interior limit. In his third journey he revisited Macedonia, and 'having made a missionary progress through those parts' (διελθὼν δὲ τὰ μέρη ἐκεῖνα) he came to Greece (Ac 20<sup>2</sup>). 'Those parts' might include the south of Illyricum, but probably meant no more than the west of Macedonia. Strabo (vii. vii. 4), describing the Via Egnatia, which began at Dyrrachium (the modern Durazzo), notes that it traverses a part of Illyria before it enters Macedonia, and that 'on the left are the Illyrian mountains.'

'St. Paul would have followed this road as far as Thessalonica, and if pointing Westward he had asked the names of the mountain region and of the peoples inhabiting it, he would have been told that it was "Illyria." The term therefore is the one which would naturally occur to him as fitted to express the limits of his journey to the West' (Sanday-Headlam, in loco).

Writing as a Roman citizen to Christians in Rome, St. Paul avoids the ordinary Greek Ἰλλυρίς or Ἰλλυρία, and merely transliterates the Latin provincial term Illyricum. In the second half of the 1st cent. the name Dalmatia (g.v.), which had formerly meant the S. part of the province of Illyricum, began to be extended to the whole. For a time Illyricum and Dalmatia were convertible terms. Pliny has both; Suetonius marks the change from the one to the other; and from the Flavian period onward the term regularly used is Dalmatia. St. Paul, keeping pace with Roman usages, employs the new provincial name in a part of 2 Tim. which is generally accepted as genuine (4<sup>10</sup>).

St. Jerome and Diocletian were Illyrians. The region now comprises Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, and N. Albania, and is as wild and unsettled as ever.

'The eastern coast of the Adriatic is one of those ill-fated portions of the earth which, though placed in immediate contact with civilization, have remained perpetually barbarian' (T. Arnold, Hist. of Rome, 1838-43, i. 492).

IMAGE.—The use of this term in the apostolic writings may be conveniently discussed under three heads.

1. Connexion with idolatry.—Apart from Ro 1<sup>23</sup>, where St. Paul is reviewing the corruption of the pagan world and the perversity with which men neglected the living God for 'the likeness of an image' of men, birds, quadrupeds, and reptiles, all our references are found in the Apocalypse and concern the particular form of idolatry that acutely distressed the early Church, viz. the worship of the bust of Caesar. This 'image' is first brought forward in Rev 13<sup>14</sup> (but cf. 'Satan's throne' at Pergamum, 2<sup>13</sup>). The Seer has described the Roman Empire in the guise of a monster rising out of the sea (v. 1<sup>16</sup>), and its counterpart, a monster from the land (afterwards described as the false prophet), who represents the Cæsar-cult and its priests in the Eastern provinces. This sacerdotal land-monster is plausible and seductive, and his inducements to Christians to show themselves good citizens are backed up by miracles. The image or statue of the first monster, i.e. the bust of the Emperor, is set up among the statues of the gods to receive the offerings and devotion of the citizens, and through ventriloquy it seems to have the power of speech. The cult was enforced with all the resources that could be devised, and to counteract it an angel utters fearful judgment on all who worship the monster and his statue (14<sup>9-11</sup>). The supremely happy fate of those who resisted both blandishment and compulsion is depicted in 15<sup>2</sup> and 20<sup>4</sup>; the punishment of those who conformed, in 16<sup>2</sup> and 19-9. See, further, art. IDOLATRY.

We may note at this point that the word εἰκὼν (like εἰδωλον) in classical Greek usually stands for the portrait statues or paintings of men and women; seldom for images of the gods. An instance of its use in the NT which may be regarded as focusing the range of its varied application and as a transition from the above discussion to those which follow, is found in He 10<sup>1</sup>, where the Mosaic Law is spoken of as being a mere 'shadow' of the coming bliss, instead of representing its reality or being its 'very image.' 'The "shadow" is the dark outlined figure cast by the object . . . contrasted with the complete representation (εἰκὼν) produced by the help of colour and solid mass. The εἰκὼν brings before us under the conditions of space, as we can understand it, that which is spiritual' (B. F. Westcott, in loc.).

2. Christ as the image of God.—Two of the passages where Christ is spoken of as the image of God are Pauline—2 Co 4<sup>4</sup> ('the image of God'), and Col 1<sup>15</sup> ('the image of the invisible God'). The first is in a context which clearly points back to the Apostle's conversion experiences. All his thought turns on his doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, and the basis of that doctrine was the bright vision he had beheld on the way to Damascus. This was his distinctive gospel, that which marked him off from those who simply knew the human Jesus, blameless and pure though His life had been. In the second passage he is concerned to set before the people of Colossæ the overwhelming superiority of Christ as a mediator between man and God, over the many and strange spirits and forces which they thought of as intervening between the Divine and the human. Hence he uses the word εἰκὼν, which, even in its material sense already referred to, connotes true representation rather than accidental similarity, and representation of that which is at any rate temporarily out of sight. His thought is that Christ is the external expression as it were of God: at once His representation and manifestation. 'Ethically and essentially He is at once the Revealer and the Revelation of the Eternal Spirit' (J. Strachan, The Captivity and the Pastoral Epp. [Westminster NT, 1910], p. 41). It is not simply that He is like God—He is God manifest. And beyond the reference to the earthly life and ministry of Christ, even primarily perhaps, there is the implication that in the timeless heavenly life He is the εἰκὼν θεοῦ, God's representative acting in the sphere of the visible (cf. Jn 1<sup>18</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>). We may state it more fully thus: Christ is the outcome of His Father's nature, and so related to Him in a unique manner; and He is especially the means by which the Father has manifested Himself to all that is without, from the first moment of creation and for ever, though the centre and focus of that manifestation is the Incarnation. We recall at once the Johannine doctrine of the Logos; the one is a manifestation to the mind of man through Ear-gate, the other ('Image') through Eye-gate. A title given to the Logos in the Midrash, 'the light of the raiment of the Holy One,' is suggestive in this connexion. We are reminded also of Christ's own word recorded in Jn 14<sup>9</sup>: 'he that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (cf. also 8<sup>19-42</sup>). There are other modes of the Divine manifestation; through creation itself he who has an eye to see may behold 'the invisible things of God' (Ro 1<sup>20</sup>), but there is no revelation or manifestation so sure, so adequate, so satisfying as that in Christ.

At this point we may notice the striking expression in He 1<sup>3</sup> where Christ, in a passage reminding us of Colossians, is spoken of as 'the very image of God's substance.' The word used is χαράκτις, which meant originally a graving tool and then the impression made by such a tool, especially on a seal or die, and the figure struck off by such seal or die; hence the translations 'stamped with God's own character' (Moffatt), 'the impress of God's essence' (Peake). The Son is thus the exact counterpart of the Father, the exact facsimile, the clear-cut impression which possesses all the 'characteristics' of the original. Again it is noteworthy that Philo (de Plant. Nov. § 5) speaks of the Logos as the impression on the seal of God. Westcott (in loc.) distinguishes χαράκτις from εἰκὼν by saying that the former 'conveys representative traits only,' while the latter 'gives a complete representation under the condition of earth of that which it figures'; and from μορφή, 'which marks the essential form.'

3. Man as the image of God or of Christ.—The fundamental text, Gn 1<sup>26-27</sup>, is the basis of St. Paul's statement in 1 Co 11<sup>7</sup> (cf. Col 3<sup>10</sup>). Man is the image of God in those matters of rational and moral endowment which distinguish him from the humbler creation. St. Paul would no doubt have subscribed to Justin Martyr's statement that God 'in the beginning made the human race with the power of thought and of choosing the truth and doing right, so that all men are without excuse before God; for they have been born rational and contemplative' (Apol. i. 28). In neither the OT nor the NT are we to press for a difference between 'image' and 'likeness,' which are used as synonyms. The image has, however, been marred and obscured by men's sin. Yet there is the glorious possibility of its renewal and restoration. The new man in Christ Jesus bears once more the image of his Creator (Col 3<sup>10</sup>); he becomes akin to God, is able to know Him (εἰς ἐπύγνωσιν) and His will in all the affairs of life. In this perfected likeness to God human distinctions, whether of nationality, religious ceremonial, culture, or caste, fall away—'in it there is no room for Greek and Jew, circumcised and uncircumcised, barbarian, Scythian, slave or free man; Christ is everything and everywhere.' This agrees with Ro 8-9, in which the elect are spoken of as sharing the image of God's Son—that He might be the firstborn of a great brotherhood. Thus it matters little whether we speak of bearing Christ's image or God's, and it is fruitless to debate which is prior in time. The two are one. To be conformed to the image of Christ is to share not only His holiness but His glory—a thought brought before us in 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup> ('We all mirror the glory of the Lord with face unveiled, and so we are being transformed into the same image as himself, passing from one glory to another') and in 1 Co 15<sup>49</sup> ('as we have borne the image of material man so we are to bear the image of the heavenly Man'). In the first of these passages the spirit of the believer is likened to a mirror which receives the unobstructed impression of the glory of the Lord. That glory takes up its abode in the Christian, and instead of fading as in the case of Moses, becomes ever more glorious (cf. Ro 8<sup>11</sup>). The assimilation of Christ's mind and character involves the assimilation of His splendour. The outer man may perish but the inner man, the real man, waxes more and more radiant, strong, and immortal, till it dwells, like its Lord, wholly in the light. With these passages, and especially with the second, which points forward, we may compare 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>, 'We are to be like him, for we are to see him as he is.' While the primary implication is ethical and spiritual it is not the only one in the NT thought of our likeness to Christ.

IMMORTALITY.—The subject of immortality may be treated from many points of view—doctrinal, metaphysical, biological. But the scope of this article is necessarily limited to the historical method of treatment, and is further confined to a definite portion of the historical field—the 1st cent. of Christianity. Hence many aspects of the subject are excluded. For the previous development of the belief in immortality the reader is referred to the articles dealing with this and the related subjects in HDB, DCG, and ERE. The following is the outline of the treatment of the subject in this article:

I. General discussion of the place occupied in religious thought at the beginning of the Apostolic Age by the belief in immortality.

II. Particular history of the development of the belief during the Apostolic Age:

1. Pauline doctrine of immortality.
2. Petrine doctrine of immortality.
3. Johannine doctrine of immortality.
4. Apostolic Fathers' doctrine of immortality.

III. Conclusion. Literature.

I. GENERAL DISCUSSION.—At the beginning of the Apostolic Age the Græco-Roman world might almost be compared to the Pool of Bethesda at the critical moment of the angelic visitation. There was a troubling of the waters, and a steadily increasing number of seekers after spiritual health. The subject of immortality was, so to speak, in the air. The various Mystery-cults, with varying forms of ritual, all agreed in offering to the initiate the hope of a future life of bliss after death. Abundant evidence for this may be found in books and monographs dealing with the subject of the Mystery-cults in the Roman Empire. At the same time, along a totally different line of development, the Jew had arrived at a conception of immortality which was bound up with a spiritual conception of God and man's relation to God. In communion with God lay both the essence of immortality and its guarantee for faith. In Alexandrian Judaism, as represented by Philo, we have the blending of the Platonic doctrine of immortality, based on the distinction between the higher and the lower elements in man, with the Pharisaic assertion of the value of the individual to God and its grasp of the eternal character of the soul's communion with God. Hence we can discern at least three distinct elements at work in the formation of current ideas about immortality.

(1) The view of a future life which rested upon the Eastern dualistic attitude towards matter and spirit. This Eastern, and especially Persian, element which entered so largely into the Mystery-cults of the century before and the century following the birth of Christ, laid stress upon the deliverance of the soul, by purificatory rites and by asceticism, from the bondage of the body, and thus pointed a way to ultimate salvation and immortality by union with the god. The resemblance of the rites of the Mystery-cults to various elements in the Christian sacraments has led many scholars to trace the influence of these cults of the Græco-Roman world upon the form which Christianity assumed as it developed a system of ritual and doctrine. This point will be discussed briefly in dealing with St. Paul's doctrine of immortality.

(2) The Platonic element in Alexandrian Judaism, modified by Stoic influence, laying stress on the eternity of Reason, and hence offering an abstract form of immortality in which the continuance of personal identity was not involved.

(3) The Pharisaic doctrine of immortality with its insistence on the permanence of personal identity preserved in communion with God. The place of the body was not clearly defined, as Pharisaic Judaism held the immortality of the soul in combination with various forms of eschatological expectation, in which a body, spiritual or quasi-spiritual, was involved.

The Jewish view was, of course, not confined to Palestine, but, as we know, was spread throughout Egypt, Asia Minor, and all the Mediterranean coasts by means of the synagogue. All these elements intermingled and formed the basis of the popular attitude towards the future life, in the 1st cent. of Christianity.

But the form which the doctrine of immortality took in primitive Christianity is by no means explained when we have examined the conditions of thought under which it grew up. It certainly cannot be explained without them, but neither can it be explained wholly by them. Christianity gave its own definite form to all that it took up from the current thought of its time, and the outstanding factor in the form which the primitive Christian hope assumed is the Resurrection of Christ. It has been argued that the form which the belief in the Resurrection took, especially in St. Paul, was determined by these external influences, especially by the existence in various Mystery-cults of the idea of the death of the god and his resurrection. But these offer no true parallel to the belief in a historic Resurrection and do not explain either its existence or the peculiar moral value attached to the Resurrection of Christ by the primitive Church.

When we come to the historical account of the doctrine of immortality in the 1st cent. of Christianity, we find, in the first place, that it is inseparably connected with the Resurrection of Christ, and, secondly, that it is also inseparable from primitive Christian eschatology. 'The resurrection of the body and the life of the world to come' is the phrase which crystallizes the growth of the idea of immortality for the popular mind during the early stages of Christianity. We shall find, however, in both Pauline and Johannine teaching, much that transcends the form of belief as crystallized in the credal phrase.

II. PARTICULAR HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT.

—1. Pauline.—It is impossible to work through the Pauline treatment of the subject without discovering that St. Paul had no doctrine of immortality. He deals with the subject only so far as it arises out of the question of salvation through Christ and the implications of salvation. Hence the most illuminating method of understanding St. Paul's attitude towards immortality will be to trace the bearings of his theory of salvation as it is worked out in Romans, the most definitely soteriological of his Epistles. The following are the principal points that arise from the examination of the Epistle.

(1) Eschatological background.—There is an eschatological background to the whole of St. Paul's thinking on the subject of salvation. This is not to say that the ethical nature of the salvation is excluded; on the contrary, the ethical is inseparable from the eschatological, the connexion between life and righteousness being of the very essence of St. Paul's thought. But from the outset and right through, the eschatological outlook is apparent. In Ro 2<sup>7</sup>, one of the most general statements on the subject, St. Paul says that in the revelation of God's righteous judgment He will render eternal life to all those who are seeking glory and honour and immortality (αφθαρσία); in 5-, there is the justified boast in the hope of the glory of God; in 5<sup>17</sup>, those who receive the gift of righteousness shall reign in life; in 8<sup>11</sup>, the mortal bodies of those indwelt by the Spirit are to be quickened.

This eschatological colouring is more apparent in the earlier Epistles, e.g. 1 and 2 Thessalonians, than in the later. But even in the later Epistles, e.g. in Philippians, it appears: 3<sup>20, 21</sup>, 'for our citizenship is in heaven; from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things unto himself.'

Thus the eschatological element in the belief is not secondary or non essential; it shows in the first place that St. Paul's sense of the necessity of a future glorified life is part of a larger scheme of things—the future Kingdom of God and its manifestation on earth.

(2) Christ as an earnest of the future life.—The present condition of Christ's existence is both the pattern and the guarantee of the believer's future state of existence. This is perhaps the most characteristic and original part of St. Paul's thinking on this subject, and requires the most careful study. It is true that various elements existed in Apocalyptic and Rabbinical systems of thought in St. Paul's time which may have suggested in details the form of his thought. For example, the idea of a spiritual body was not new; it occurs in Midr. Rab. and in the Gnostic Hymn of the Soul (see Rendel Harris's edition of the Odes and Psalms of Solomon, 1909, Introduction, p. 67 f.) and the conception of the transformation of the righteous into the likeness of Messiah occurs first in Enoch xc. 38.

But the Death and Resurrection of Christ as historical facts are the decisive elements which St. Paul lays hold of and works out in their relation to the Kingdom of God, making new combinations of old ideas, throwing fresh light on the purpose of God, and filling the old categories of thought with a new vital force. No apocalyptic scheme offered any such conception as the Death and Resurrection of Messiah, and the acceptance by St. Paul of the Death and Resurrection of Jesus as historical facts, together with his identification of Jesus with the Messiah, set a train of thought working in his mind which yielded entirely new forms, not to be explained by any patch-work of older elements to be found in them. There are certain essential points of St. Paul's scheme of things which were never grasped by the Apologists and the early interpreters of Apostolic Christianity. This was partly because the eschatological element was not understood, and perhaps still more because St. Paul's attitude towards the human side of the Incarnation was not understood. The side upon which Irenæus lays stress, the answer to the question Cur Deus Homo? was fully grasped and developed, viz. the 'deification' of man through the Incarnation of the Son of God. But owing to the rise of christological controversies the emphasis laid by St. Paul and the primitive Church on the ethical value of the Resurrection of Christ and its implications dropped out of sight.

(a) First of all, then, for St. Paul the Resurrection of Christ has an ethical value which is of great importance in his view of the future life of believers. The Resurrection of Christ was not a foregone conclusion resulting from His Divinity, but it was intimately connected with Christ's faith and holiness as man. His Resurrection was according to the Spirit of holiness; He was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father. In His Resurrection the full working of the law of the Spirit of life was displayed. 'He lives to God.' The word 'glory' which St. Paul uses to describe the present state of the risen Christ as well as His future manifestation has both an ethical and a quasi-material significance. The full moral likeness to God which Christ displayed has its counterpart in His present state of existence, 'the glory of God in the face (ἐν προσώπῳ, possibly better rendered 'in the person' [cf. 2 Co 2<sup>10</sup>]) of Jesus Christ.'

(b) This resurrection state of Christ is spiritual. The historic Christ retaining His moral characteristics has passed into a spiritual condition, by the operation of a law made manifest for the first time in His case. Christ is identified with the Spirit. He is no longer limited in manifestation by time and space, but can dwell in those who receive Him by faith. It is the real Christ that St. Paul conceives of as dwelling in believers and thereby bringing into operation in them the same law that resulted in His own Resurrection and victory over 'the law of sin and death.'

(c) The ultimate result of this indwelling of the Spirit of Christ is to assert the complete triumph of life over death even in the bodies of believers (Ro 8<sup>11</sup>). The full manifestation of this life will bring deliverance for creation (v.<sup>21</sup>) from the bondage of corruption (φθορά). For St. Paul, then, immortality is not ἀθανασία, but ἀφθαρσία. It is an integral part of the triumph of the Kingdom of God, beginning with the Resurrection of Christ (1 Co 15<sup>20-23</sup>: ἀπαρχὴ Χριστός).

(3) The corporate nature of the future life.—The last point that comes out from the study of St. Paul's teaching on this subject is the corporate nature of the future existence, in strong contrast to the immortality presented by Plotinus and the later Neo-Platonists—an immortality of 'the Alone with the Alone.' The indwelling Spirit of Christ is the ground of unity, as well as the assurance of immortality; the future life of bliss is the life of a blessed community of glorified persons, united to Christ and like Him morally and spiritually, finding their joy in the activities of eternal life, doing the will of God.

The Pauline view of the subject is also bound up with the Parousia and with the closely allied subject of the resurrection of believers. Hence the reader is referred to the articles on these subjects in this Dictionary for supplementary discussion of the Pauline teaching.

2. Petrine and other primitive teaching.—For the sake of convenience, the general teaching of the Catholic Epistles and the Pastorals is taken together with the Petrine doctrine of immortality. The doctrine of 1 Peter may be said to represent the general standpoint of the primitive Apostolic Church on this matter, while the Pauline and the Johannine teaching contain developments which profoundly affected the thought of the Church but which were never wholly understood and accepted.

(1) The First Epistle of Peter shows the same eschatological background that we find in St. Paul and everywhere in the primitive Church, and the same view of the ethical value of the Resurrection of Christ: 'who through him are believers in God, which raised him from the dead, and gave him glory; so that your faith and hope might be in God' (1 P 1<sup>21</sup>).

But there is nothing of the extraordinary development of the consequences of the Resurrection-life of Christ in the Spirit, and the resultant view of the Kingdom as already manifested in its working. The most important passage for our purpose is 1 P 3<sup>18-20</sup>, the 'Descent into Hell' of the Creeds.

Rendel Harris (Side-lights on NT Research, 1908, p. 208) has proposed the emendation ἐν ᾧ καὶ Ἐνώχ on the supposition that Ἐνώχ has dropped out by haplography, and would refer the passage to a reminiscence of the visit of Enoch to the condemned watchers and his intercession for them (see Enoch xii., xiii.). But the interruption to the general sense of the passage is too serious, except on a very low estimate of the logical sequence of thought in the Epistle, to admit of the probability of this ingenious suggestion.

If the passage be interpreted to refer to the visit of Christ to the souls in Sheol during the interval between His Death and His Resurrection, then this is the only NT passage which supports such a conception, and it is a possible view that the Christian interpretation of the passage has been influenced by the strong belief which grew up in the primitive Church in the descent of Christ to Hades. But the passage requires fuller treatment than space allows of here (see, further, art. DESCENT INTO HADES). If the credal interpretation be accepted, the passage is evidence rather for an intermediate state than for any clearly defined doctrine of the immortality of the soul. It does not necessarily imply more than is implied in the later Jewish view of Sheol. Still more perplexing is 4<sup>6</sup>, if the same interpretation be attached to it. But it is possible to interpret both passages of the preaching of Noah to those who though dead now, were alive at the time when the Spirit of Christ in Noah preached to them. Then the last clause of 4<sup>6</sup> may be evidence for the future state of the condemned. After judgment they continue to live in spirit in relation to God. Apart from this the writer's attention is fixed on the coming 'glory,' 'the crown of glory,' to be revealed at the Parousia.

(2) Hebrews.—The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews retains the eschatological background common to the early Church, but adds to our inquiry one important new conception—that which is implied in the term τετελειωμένος. Christ in His present risen state is spoken of as τετελειωμένος (7<sup>25</sup>); the spirits in the heavenly Jerusalem are called the spirits of 'the perfected righteous,' δικαίων τετελειωμένων (12<sup>23</sup>; cf. also 5<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>40</sup>, Lk 13<sup>32</sup>). It is difficult to find the Pauline conception of a glorified body here. It would rather seem to present the Alexandrian Judaistic point of view that the righteous immediately after death reach their perfected state of bliss in full communion with God. The writer undoubtedly believes in the Resurrection of Christ and also in the ethical aspect of it already mentioned, but he does not seem to carry on, as St. Paul does, the consequences of this to the bodily resurrection of believers. But he clearly looks forward to a σαββατισμός for the people of God, a heavenly city, and a corporate immortality, all based upon the present risen life of Christ.

(3) The Pastoral Epistles add one or two points. The dogmatic conception of abstract immortality—what Friedrich von Hügel (Eternal Life) calls 'quantitative immortality'—perhaps appears in 1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup>: ὁ μόνος ἔχων ἀθανάσιαν. In 4<sup>8</sup> a sharp distinction is drawn between 'the life that now is and that which is to come,' a sign of the passing of the eschatological form of the distinction between 'the present age' and 'the coming age.' The rich are charged to lay hold on what is truly life (τῆς ὄντως ζωῆς, 6<sup>19</sup>).

In 2 Ti 1<sup>1</sup> we have the Pauline conception, 'the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus'; 2<sup>1</sup>, 'if we suffer with him we shall reign with him'; 4<sup>1</sup>, living and dead are to be judged by Christ at His appearing; 4<sup>18</sup>, 'shall save me unto his heavenly kingdom.' But the two most characteristic passages in this Epistle are 1<sup>10</sup>, where our Saviour Jesus Christ has annulled death and brought life and immortality (ἀφθαρσίαν) to light, through the gospel; and 2<sup>10</sup>, where speaking of 'the elect' the writer says 'that they too may obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory.' Tit 1<sup>1-2</sup> echoes the phrase of 2 Ti 1<sup>1</sup>, the hope of eternal life, still reflecting the eschatological colouring. In Tit 2<sup>12-13</sup> 'the present age' is contrasted with 'the appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Christ Jesus,' also spoken of as 'the blessed hope'; in 3<sup>5</sup> the bath of regeneration (παλυνγεσία) and the renewing of the Holy Ghost are connected with righteousness and the hope of eternal life after the Pauline manner.

3. Johannine.—The three groups of Johannine literature are here treated separately.

(1) The Apocalypse.—The phrase which is so characteristic of the Fourth Gospel, 'eternal life,' does not occur in the Apocalypse. For our subject we have the following passages: 2<sup>1</sup>, the overcomer 'shall not be hurt of the second death'; 3<sup>5</sup>, the overcomer's name will not be blotted out of the book of life. In 4<sup>1</sup> the 'elders' (who may possibly represent those who have attained—the 'elders' of He 11) are seen in the symbolic garb of victors. In 6<sup>9</sup> the souls of the martyrs are seen under the altar, crying for vengeance. In 7<sup>13-17</sup> there is a description of those who have come out of great tribulation and who enjoy perpetual bliss before the throne of God. In 20<sup>1</sup> those who are slain during the great tribulation are raised for the millennial kingdom, and reign with Christ for a thousand years. 20<sup>6</sup> adds 'the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were ended.' Then in 20<sup>11-13</sup> 'the dead small and great,' i.e. apparently 'the rest of the dead,' are raised and judged according to their works, and all not found written in the Book of Life are cast into the Lake of Fire.

Here again the eschatological interest is paramount. The future existence of individuals is not a question of psychological or philosophical interest, but is determined by the view of the future Kingdom of God. Hence 'quantitative immortality' does not appear. The righteous receive the reward of their works and patience, and enter on a blessing which appears to extend beyond the millennial kingdom, and at any rate reaches its climax there. The writer is not so interested in anything after that. But the future fate of the wicked is indeterminate. The view taken as to this depends upon our interpretation of the writer's symbolism. The fire may be destructive, purgative, or penal. The torment of the beast and the false prophet is spoken of, but the final end of the wicked is not explicitly stated. They are cast into the Lake of Fire.

(2) The Epistles.—In the Johannine Epistles the Parousia still forms the background of Christian hope, but the precise form of the hope is vague, and shows signs of transformation into a purely spiritual expectation. The contribution of the Epistles belongs rather to the subject of the Parousia (q.v.). The term 'eternal life' occurs frequently, but never with the eschatological sense in which it is used in St. Paul's Epistles and the Pastorals. But the profound ethical implication of likeness to God and to Christ fills the term with a new meaning. 'The life of the coming age,' the original sense of the term αἰώνιος, has become the life of God, expressed in Christ, imparted to the believer, working itself out in moral likeness to God, and perfected when Christ appears. He who dwells in God and God in him can never die, and he who loves dwells in God, and partakes of God's eternal life. Immortality is 'qualitative' wholly here, with no thought of duration.

(3) The Fourth Gospel.—Here the transformation of the eschatological background is practically complete. Subsequent developments really consisted, not in a deeper and richer spiritualization of the eschatological view-point, with all its stimulus and insistent pressure of the real world surrounding and penetrating the phenomenal world, but in the total abandonment of eschatology and consequent impoverishment of the Church's life. But in the Fourth Gospel the intensity and reality of the hope are retained, while the particular Jewish colouring and schemes of thought are quietly dropped, with a few exceptions.

In this Gospel 'eternal life' is the principal category under which the subject of immortality falls to be considered. The most important group of passages is in the 6th chapter. Here our Lord, after the miracle of the loaves, and evidently, in the mind of the author of the Gospel, explaining the significance of the miracle, claims that He is the living bread come down from heaven. Those who eat of this bread live for ever. Continuing to explain the saying, our Lord adds that the bread is His flesh and His blood, and that he who eats the flesh and drinks the blood of the Son of Man has eternal life, and will be raised by Christ at the last day. Again, 'he that eateth this bread shall live for ever.' It is possible that we must accept the predestinarianism of vv. 36-37 as part of the older eschatological colouring. But evidently a difficult point is involved here. Schweitzer would explain the passage as the expression of 'a speculative religious materialism which concerns itself with the problem of matter and spirit, and the permeation of matter by Spirit, and endeavours to interpret the manifestation and the personality of Jesus, the action of the sacraments and the possibility of the resurrection of the elect, all on the basis of one and the same fundamental conception' (Paul and his Interpreters, p. 202 f.). That is, broadly speaking, the immortality described in the Fourth Gospel is sacramental, conditioned entirely by participation in the sacraments which, through the communication to them of the Spirit of the Risen Christ, have received this potency.

Like so much of Schweitzer's exegesis, this is brilliant and stimulating, but not wholly sound. Throughout the Gospel the possession of eternal life is independent of sacraments and connected simply with faith in Christ: 'he that believeth on me hath everlasting life,' 'he that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and he that liveth and believeth on me shall never die.' The charge of 'unintelligent spiritualizing' is hasty and unfounded. As in the Synoptic Gospels, so also in the Fourth Gospel, Schweitzer has not recognized the peculiar ethical element which is the real basis of the primitive Church's view of the Resurrection of Christ, and of the resurrection and future state of believers.

So in the Fourth Gospel the immortality implied is at bottom ethical; it is the life of God which Christ is in Himself and has come to earth to reveal, and in order to impart it in its fullness He must enter upon the spiritual state. It is expedient for them that He should go away. After His departure they will know that He is in the Father, they in Him, and He in them.

Hence, while in St. Paul we have the eager movement of the new life towards its glorious consummation, in the Fourth Gospel we have rather the steady contemplation of the fully revealed nature of the life of God in this world now. In both cases all the interest is centred on the purpose of God in its realization, rather than on the individual man and his ultimate fate. So that we have the appearance of the conditional immortality which is found in Athanasius, really only apparent, because the nature of immortality as a dogma was not in question, but the wider issue of the coming in of the Kingdom of God. In the Fourth Gospel we have also the corporate nature of the life insisted on. In St. Paul, spirit, soul, and body are to be preserved to the day of Christ; there is no immortality of the soul conceived of as a mere abstraction, but the eternal gain for the Kingdom of God of a person, whole and entire. In the Fourth Gospel there is not the same prominence given to the resurrection of the body, but ultimately the body of him who possesses the life of God must pass under the law of eternal life, although the author of the Fourth Gospel never states the expectation in the same way; it is not 'your mortal bodies,' but 'I will raise him up.' The incident of the grave clothes also shows that the writer's conception of the Resurrection was purely spiritual: the Lord had become a Spirit, although capable of revealing His continued personal existence to His disciples. So for the Fourth Gospel the ultimate thing also is the gain of the individual: 'no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.'

4. The Apostolic Fathers.—Here we have much less of vital importance. The creative impulse has died away, and we can trace the process, already mentioned, of the gradual abandonment of much that was most characteristic of the teaching of St. Paul. Ignatius offers the closest affinities with the point of view of the Fourth Gospel, as is well enough known. The following are the principal relevant passages:

(1) 1 Clement.—The principal passage in this Epistle is in chs. xxiv.-xxvi. The future resurrection is based on the Resurrection of Christ, and the simile of the seed is used. Ch. xxvi. seems to limit the resurrection to the faithful, 'those who served Him in holiness, in the confidence of a good faith.' Those who have died as martyrs or in the faith are spoken of as having obtained the inheritance of glory and honour (cf. v. 3, 7, xlv. 7). In l. 3 'those who were perfected in love by the grace of God have a place among the pious who shall be made manifest at the visitation of the Kingdom of Christ.'

(2) 2 Clement.—has several interesting passages: v. 5, 'our sojourning in this world in the flesh is a little thing and lasts a short time, but the promise of Christ is great and wonderful, and brings us rest, in the kingdom which is to come, and in everlasting life.' In vi. 7 rest is contrasted with eternal punishment (αἰώνιου καὶ δόξης). The future existence depends on the keeping of the baptism undefiled; the first occurrence of this conception is in vi. 9, vii. 6, viii. 6. In ch. ix. there is the assertion of the resurrection of the flesh to judgment, based on the Incarnation and not on the Resurrection of Christ. Ch. xii. contains the curious Agraphon possibly from the Gospel of the Egyptians, 'When the two shall be one, and the outside as the inside, and the male with the female, neither male nor female.' It is interpreted by the author as referring to the moral perfection and asceticism suited to the kingdom.

In xiv. 5 we have an important passage. After a somewhat strained analogy of the flesh as the Church, referring to the Church as pre-existent and possessing the Spirit, the author says: 'So great a gift of life and immortality (ἀθανασία) has this flesh the power to receive if the Holy Spirit be joined to it.' In xix. 3, 4 we have a statement of immortality in fairly quantitative terms, and the expression 'the immortal fruit of the resurrection' (τὸν ἀθάνατον τῆς ἀναστάσεως καρπὸν). In xx. 5 Christ is the Saviour and Leader of immortality (ἀρχηγὸν τῆς ἀφθαρσίας).

(3) Ignatius.—We owe to Ignatius the famous phrase 'the medicine of immortality,' φάρμακον ἀθανασίας (Eph. xx. 2), which is so often repeated by later patristic writers. Ignatius frequently uses the word 'immortality,' but as frequently shows that his conception is ethical—qualitative, not quantitative. What he seeks is not mere duration of bliss, but true life (τὸ ἀληθινὸν ζῆν, xi. 1). Faith and love constitute this true life, the life of God (xiv. 1). Christ has breathed immortality on the Church (ἀφθαρσίαν, xvii. 1). At the Incarnation

'God was manifest as Man, for the newness of eternal life' (εἰς καινότητα αἰδίου ζωῆς), a reminiscence of Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, but αἰδίου is never used of life in the NT. In xx. 2 it is the Sacrament, the bread, which is the medicine of immortality.

Other passages are Magn. i. 2, ix. 2: a reference to the Descensus; Trall. ii. 1, ix. 2; Rom. vi. 2; Phil. ix. 2: the gospel is 'the perfecting of immortality' (ἀπάρτισμα ἀφθαρσίας); Smyrn. xii. 2, 'resurrection both fleshly and spiritual'; ad Polyc. ii. 3, 'the prize is immortality and eternal life.'

The remaining literature of our period adds nothing of importance.

III. CONCLUSION.—The principal trend of the teaching of the NT lies mainly along the lines laid down by our Lord, and expanded by the original thinking of St. Paul and St. John, if we may assume a name for the author of the Fourth Gospel for convenience' sake. The expansion followed lines which were principally determined by the acceptance of the Resurrection of Christ as a historical fact. The emphasis thus lies on the value of complete personality brought into the sphere of the operation of the Kingdom of God. Those operations take on the form of eschatological expectations, but express fundamental and eternal realities of religion. The pale and thin conception of mere duration of existence is of no interest to the apostolic writers. It was of fundamental importance to possess true life, the life of God; and as the meaning of the Incarnation was explored, the conception of eternal life grew in depth and breadth and height.

INCENSE (θυσία, generally plural).—The burning of aromatic substances on the altar of incense was part of the daily Temple-ritual, and the office for each occasion was assigned by lot to a priest who had never before enjoyed the honour. The moment for the beginning of the rite was carefully fixed, and served to mark the time of day. When the cloud of fragrant smoke ascended, the people outside the Temple bowed in prayer, in accordance with the ancient association of prayers and incense (Ps 141<sup>2</sup>). In the primitive Semitic cultus the perfume which rose into the upper air was supposed to give a sensuous pleasure to the Deity; but when more spiritual thoughts of the Divine nature and character prevailed, the incense, if it was to be retained, had to be regarded as a symbol of the prayers breathed from earth to heaven. In Rev 5<sup>8</sup> (which may, however, be a gloss) the golden bowls full of incense are expressly identified with the prayers of the saints. In Rev 8<sup>4</sup> the smoke of incense goes up before God out of the angel's hand for [so RVm, more accurate than with, RV] the prayers of the saints. Some interpreters think that the incense added by the angel is here supposed to give some kind of efficacy to the prayers; but, while interceding angels and archangels appear in the Book of Enoch (ix. 3-11, xv. 2, xl. 7, xlvii. 2, civ. 1), the thought in Rev. is probably no more than that the prayers of earth are ratified in heaven. The prophet's symbolism indicates that the saints are praying for things agreeable to God's will, so that their petitions cannot fail to be granted.

**INSPIRATION AND REVELATION.—Definition of terms.—Revelation is the 'discovery' or 'disclosure' (αποκαλύψις) of God (i.e. of the being and character of God) to man. Inspiration is the mode, or one of the modes, by which this discovery or disclosure is made; it is the process by which certain select persons were enabled, through the medium of speech or of writing, to convey special information about God to their fellows.

It will be obvious that the two terms must be closely related. To a large extent they are strictly correlative. Revelation is in large part the direct product of inspiration. The select persons of whom we have spoken imparted revelation about God because they were inspired to impart it. So far as revelation has been conveyed by speech or writing we call the process inspiration; we say that holy men of old spoke and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost (2 P 1<sup>21</sup>). What is meant by this we shall explain later.

A. REVELATION.—Revelation is the wider term. There is such a thing as revelation by facts, as well as by words. And revelation by facts is again of two kinds: there is the broad revelation of God in Nature; and there is also a special revelation of God in history.

1. Revelation by facts.—(a) Revelation of God in Nature.—The Jew under the OT rose up from the contemplation of Nature with an intense belief in Divine Providence. For him the heavens declared the glory of God, and the firmament showed His handiwork. The sight of the heavens brought home to him the contrast between the majesty of God and the littleness of man. The phenomena of storm and tempest heightened his sense of Divine power and of the goodness which intervened for his own protection. The beneficent ordering of Nature turned his thoughts to thankfulness and praise (Ps 65 104). The tendency of the Hebrew mind was towards optimism. His religious faith was so strong that the darker side of Nature did not trouble him; its destructive energies only filled him with awe, or else he regarded them as directed against his own enemies and God's. The questions that perplexed him most arose not so much from Nature as from the observation of human life.

The most pressing problem of all was the sufferings of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked. To this problem are devoted several Psalms and the whole Book of Job. But, however urgent the problem might be and however imperfect the solution, it never shook the deep-rooted faith that was Israel's greatest heritage. The same may be said even of the complicated questions which exercise the author of Ecclesiastes—a late and comparatively isolated phenomenon.

(b) Revelation of God in history.—The truth which Israel grasped with the greatest tenacity was the intimacy of its own relation to God as the Chosen People. Not all the shocks which it endured in its political career, tossed to and fro as a shuttlecock between its more powerful neighbours, could weaken its hold on this. It idealized its history—emphasized its deliverances, dwelt on its few moments of comparative greatness and prosperity, and explained its own decline as due to its faithlessness and disobedience. It saw the hand of God throughout, even through suffering and failure, guiding it in unexpected ways towards the better fulfilment of its mission. The nation became a Church; and even in exile and dispersion Israel still bore witness to its God. Then, on the top of all this, comes Christianity. Another apparently insignificant series of facts—the Life and Death of One who lived as a peasant in an obscure corner of the Roman Empire—is followed by enormous consequences. A wave of religious enthusiasm passed over an exhausted world, and its veins were filled with new life which has lasted down to the present day.

2. Revelation in word.—Ideally speaking, it might be supposed that the historical panorama roughly sketched above would impress itself on the mind of all observers; that, so far as it contained a revelation of God, that revelation would be intuitively apprehended. But to expect this would have been to expect too much, especially when we think of the poor and low beginnings from which the human race has gradually risen. It has always needed leaders and teachers. Large and penetrating views, such as those involved in the process we have been describing, have always belonged to the few rather than to the many, and have been mediated to the many through the few. In this way it will be seen that revelation by facts has had to be supplemented by revelation conveyed in words. The facts have been there all the time; but, apart from Divine stimulus and guidance, working upon minds sensitive to them, the great mass of mankind would have allowed them to pass unheeded. The pressure of mere physical needs is so great that ordinary humanity would be apt to be absorbed in them, if it were not for the influence of a select few more highly endowed than the rest. But these select few have never been wanting—not in Israel alone but in every race of men, and conspicuously in those races that we call the 'higher.' The Divine education of mankind has always worked in this way—by an infinite number of graduated steps, leading men onwards from one truth to another, from truths that are simple and partial and rude in expression to other truths that are more complex and more comprehensive, more nicely adjusted to the facts which they embrace.

There is thus a natural transition from revelation by fact to revelation by word. The fact comes first; it is there, so that all who run may read. But it is not read, because it is not understood; it is a bare fact; it needs an interpreter. And the interpretation is supplied by the inspired man who speaks and writes, who seizes on the secret and then publishes it to the world.

3. Apostolic treatment of these matters.—This, then, is substantially what we find in the OT, and in the Jewish writings which follow upon the OT. The prophets and psalmists and wise men lead the way in expressing the feelings aroused by the contemplation of God in Nature and in history. Such Scriptures as Ps 19<sup>1-6</sup> 65 104, Is 40<sup>1-17</sup> are spontaneous outbursts excited by the external world; such passages as Job 38 39 (cf. 2 Mac 9<sup>8</sup>) enforce the lesson of Ps 8<sup>3f.</sup>; Ps 77<sup>11-20</sup> 105 106, Hab 3 are typical retrospects of the hand of God in Israel's history; Pr 8<sup>2-31</sup>, Job 28, Sir 24, Wis 7 8 are equally typical examples of the praise of Divine Wisdom as expressed in creation and in the ordering of human life.

All this the apostolic writers inherited, and they go a step further in philosophizing upon it. They not only give expression to the feelings which the contemplation of the works of God excites in them, but they distinctly recognize the different forms of external revelation as parts of the method of Divine Providence in dealing with men. The most instructive passages from this point of view are to be found in the speeches of Acts, both in those addressed to heathen (as in Ac 14<sup>1-17</sup> 17<sup>-31</sup>) and in those addressed to Jews (as in Ac 7 13<sup>16-41</sup>). We need not enter into the question how far these speeches represent what was actually spoken on the occasions referred to, and how far they embody what the historian thought appropriate to those occasions. A comparison of the speeches attributed to St. Paul with the contents of the Pauline Epistles would suggest that, however much the shaping of the discourse may be due to the historian, he probably had before him some authentic notes or traditions of the discourses actually delivered (cf. JThSt xi. [1910] 171-173). In any case, the views expressed seem to have been practically common to all the leaders of Christian thought. We may, therefore, proceed to set them forth without discriminating between different circles. At the same time the major part of the extant evidence is derived (mediately or immediately) from St. Paul.

(a) Of the revelation of God in Nature.—It is to be noted that, although St. Paul shared to the full his countrymen's horror of idolatry—both as inherently wrong in itself and because of its corrupting influences—he nevertheless clearly recognized the elements of good in heathen religions, and regarded them as having a place in the wider order of Divine Providence. The heathen, too—with God's revelation of Himself in Nature before them—had ample opportunities of knowing God, and it was only by their own deliberate fault that they suppressed and ignored this knowledge (Ro 1<sup>18-21</sup>).

And yet all was not lost. God had implanted in the human breast the desire for Himself; men were seeking Him, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him; even pagan poets had realized that mankind was His offspring (Ac 17<sup>21-28</sup>). He took care that they should not be left without witness to His goodness, in that He gave them from heaven rains and fruitful seasons, filling their hearts with food and gladness (14<sup>17</sup>).

We observe how the Apostle singles out at once the best and the most prominent side of pagan religion, making abstraction of its worst features. The most urgent of human needs was that the earth should bring forth fruits in their seasons. Men were conscious of this, and they were really thankful for the bounty of Nature. At the bottom of most of the pagan cults that prevailed over the East—as, for instance, in the wide-spread worship under the names of Osiris, Adonis, Attis—was the celebration of seed-time and harvest. What there was of evil mixed up with such worship was a product of the root of evil in the human heart, and was capable of being eliminated without loss to the fundamental idea.

The revelation of God in Nature was thus not altogether in vain. And there was another form of revelation which came really under this head. There was a certain reflexion of God in the heart of man: His will was made known through the conscience. And here, too, there was many a pagan who, though without the privileges which the Jew enjoyed through the possession of a written law, faithfully observed such inner law as he had. St. Paul fully recognized this, and used it as an a fortiori argument addressed to his own Jewish converts, and to those whom he desired to make his converts.

Another point that may be worth noting is that, when St. Paul appeals to the revelation of God in Nature, he singles out in particular those attributes of God as revealed which the impression derived from Nature is best calculated to convey: 'the invisible things of him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being perceived through the things that are made, even his everlasting power and divinity' (Ro 1<sup>20</sup>; cf. Wis 13<sup>1</sup>). The truths that Nature can tell us about God are not the whole truth; it can tell us of His power and majesty and Divine sovereignty, but it cannot of itself make known the infinite tenderness of His love. Nature has its destructive aspect as well as its aspect of beneficence; and even Nature, as we see it, appears to be infected with the taint which is seen most conspicuously in man. To judge from external Nature taken by itself, it might well seem that a malign as well as a gracious Power was at work behind it. Caliban on Setebos is not wholly without reason. For a complete revelation of God we must supplement the data derived from this source by those which are derived from history, and especially from the culminating series of events in all history—the events bound up in the origin and spread of Christianity. It is these pre-eminently, and indeed these alone, which bring home to us the full conviction that God in the deepest depths of His being is essentially and unchangeably Love. (For strong indictments of Nature as it actually exists, see J. S. Mill, Three Essays on Religion, London, 1874, pp. 28-31; and the hypothesis of a Cacadæmon in R. A. Knox, Some Loose Stones, do., 1913, p. 25 f.).

(b) Of the revelation of God in history.—When the apostles or Christians of the first generation preach to Jews, their preaching, so far as we have record of it, is always an appeal to history, sometimes on a larger scale, sometimes on a smaller. When the preaching is fullest and most systematic, it starts from a survey, more or less complete, of the history of Israel as a Heilsgeschichte or scheme of Redemption, pre-determined in the counsels of God and worked out in the history of the Chosen People. This begins of right with the choice of Abraham and the patriarchs (Ac 7<sup>-16</sup> 13<sup>17</sup>; cf. 3<sup>13</sup>). Then come Moses and the deliverance from Egypt (7<sup>30-36</sup>) and the royal line culminating in David (7<sup>45f.</sup> 13<sup>22</sup> 15<sup>16</sup>). Both Moses and David prophesied of One who was to come in the aftertime—Moses, of a prophet like himself (3<sup>-1f.</sup> 7<sup>31</sup>); David, of a descendant of his own who should not see corruption (2<sup>29-31</sup> 13<sup>34-37</sup>). This leads on to a bold affirmation of the fulfilment of these and of other prophecies in the Life, Death, and Resurrection of Christ (2<sup>22-24</sup> 3<sup>13-15</sup>, 24 10<sup>39-43</sup> 13<sup>23-37</sup> 26<sup>22</sup>, 23). In the Epistles especial stress is laid upon the two salient facts of the Crucifixion and the Resurrection (1 Co 15<sup>3f.</sup>, Ro 4<sup>24f.</sup>, and in many other places). These two great acts have a significance beyond themselves, as the basis and guarantee of the Christian's hope of salvation. The historic scheme is completed by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, itself also a fulfilment of prophecy (Ac 2<sup>16-21</sup>, 33).

The long series of historical facts is given, and, taken together, they constitute a broad, definite, objective revelation. But if that revelation had remained alone without comment and interpretation, it would have passed unregarded, or at least imperfectly realized and understood.

(c) It is at this point that the other form of revelation comes in—revelation by word. And at the same point we may also cross over to the consideration of that other great factor in our subject—the inspiration by which the revelation is conveyed. There is what may be called a classical passage in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, in which the two conceptions meet in a way that throws clear light upon both.

B. INSPIRATION.—1. The fundamental passage—1 Co 2<sup>7-16</sup>.—We cannot do better than begin our discussion of inspiration with this passage, which must be given in full: 'We speak God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden, which God foreordained before the worlds unto our glory: which none of the rulers of this world knoweth: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory: but as it is written, Things which eye saw not, and ear heard not, And which entered not into the heart of man, Whatsoever things God prepared for them that love him. But unto us God revealed them through the Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? Even so the things of God none knoweth, save the Spirit of God. But we received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us by God. Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual. Now the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, and he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he should instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ.'

2. The two modes of inspiration.—We have seen that there are two distinct modes of revelation, which may be called primary and secondary, or objective and subjective: the one a series of facts, the other embodying the interpretation of those facts. Inspiration corresponds to the second of these modes; it has to do with interpretation; it is the process by which God has made known His nature, His will, and His purpose in regard to man. But there is some difference in the way in which inspiration works, according as it is (a) intermediate between the series of facts and the interpretation, dependent upon the facts and co-extensive with them, or (b) as it were, a new beginning in itself—what might be called a direct communication from God. Speaking broadly, it may be said that the prophetic inspiration of the OT was mainly of this latter type, while the Christian or apostolic inspiration of the NT was mainly of the former. Such distinctions are indeed only relative. The prophets also frequently presuppose those objective revelations through Nature and history of which we have spoken. And yet the great difference between the prophets and the apostles is just this, that the outstanding Christian facts—the Incarnation or Life, the Death, and the Resurrection of Christ—have intervened between them. In the one case a preparation had to be made, the first advances had to be taken and the foundation laid; in the other case the foundation was already laid, and the chief task which remained for the Christian teacher was one of interpretation. We shall return to this distinction presently, when we try to map out the course which the Christian revelation as a whole has taken. But in the meantime we must go back to our fundamental passage, and seek with its help to acquire a better understanding of the nature of inspiration.

3. The psychology of inspiration.—We begin by observing that the passage is descriptive specially of the Christian or apostolic inspiration. It is, indeed, possible to generalize from it and to treat it as applying to the inspiration of the OT as well as of the NT. Yet the passage implies throughout what we have called the Christian facts—the whole historical series of revelations culminating in Jesus Christ. The preaching which the Apostle has in his mind has for its object that those to whom it is addressed might know—i.e.

intelligently know, grasp, and understand—the things that were freely given to them by God, the whole bountiful purpose of God in Christ, the Incarnation with all that led up to it and that followed from it—its consequences nearer and more remote.

And now we must try to analyze the passage and see what it contains. There are two trains of thought.

(a) The knowledge which inspiration imparts is wholly exceptional and sui generis. It is not possessed by the worldly-wise or by the most powerful of secular rulers. It was their ignorance of it which led to the terrible mistake of not recognizing but crucifying the Messiah when He came. It is a knowledge—chiefly of values, of values in the spiritual sphere, of the spiritual forces at work in the world. The knowledge of these values is hidden from the mass of mankind. Any criticism of those who possess it by those who do not possess it is futile. It is as if the critics were devoid of a natural sense—like the varied hues of Nature to the colour-blind, or the world of musical sound to those who have no ear. The expert in this new knowledge stands apart by himself: he can judge, but he cannot be judged; he is superior to the world around him.

(b) If it is asked how he came by this knowledge, the answer is that it was imparted to him by the Holy Spirit acting upon his own spirit. It is a well-known peculiarity of the psychology of St. Paul that he often mentions the Divine Spirit and the human spirit together in such a way that they seem to run into each other. It is often hard to tell whether 'spirit' should be spelt with a capital or not; the thought passes backwards and forwards with the finest shades of transition. A good example may be seen in several passages of Ro 8: e.g. v. 9<sup>f</sup>: 'But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness'; and again, v. 14<sup>f</sup>: 'For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God. For ye received not the spirit of bondage again unto fear; but ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.' In the former passage, the domination of the spiritual part or higher self of man is brought about by the operation of the Spirit of God (or of Christ) which is described as 'dwelling in him,' and the result is that the human spirit is instinct with life and immortality, and triumphs over death. In the latter passage, a like operation of the Divine Spirit results in an attitude of the human spirit; without any line of demarcation between to indicate where the one ends and the other begins. The reason for these subtle transitions would seem to be that, while the subject of them is conscious of Divine influence within him, that influence is felt in a part of his being which is beyond the reach of conscious analysis; it is one of those sub-conscious and unconscious motions which are known only by their effects and do not come within the cognizance of the reflective reason. There is something more than an affinity between the human spirit and the Divine; when the one is in contact with the other, it is beyond our power to distinguish the point of junction or to say with dogmatic precision, 'Thus far and no further.'

When it is said that the Spirit searches the deep things of God and then bestows a knowledge of these deep things on men, it is not meant that there is a mechanical transference of information. The process is dynamic, and not mechanical. What is meant is that the same Holy Spirit which mirrors, as it were, the consciousness of Deity, so acts upon the human faculties, so stimulates and directs them, as to produce in them a consciousness of God which is after its own pattern. The self-consciousness of God must needs be in itself altogether transcendent and incommunicable; the reflexion of it in the heart of man is not absolute, but relative; it is expressed in human measures; it is still a reaching forth of the human soul towards God, feeling after Him if haply it may find Him. But it is such a reaching forth as is κατα θεόν (Ro 8<sup>27</sup>), what God would have it to be, a human product stamped with Divine sanction and approval.

4. Prophetic inspiration.—The above is an explanation—so far as explanation can be given—of the process of inspiration. It really covers all the varied forms that inspiration can take. But it is natural to ask in what relation it stands to the prophecy of the OT.

The prophetic inspiration is really the outstanding phenomenon of the OT. It is the fundamental attribute which gives to the OT its character as a sacred book; it marks the point at which God meets man; it is Israel's most characteristic possession.

Comparing what we know of OT prophecy with the account just given of inspiration by St. Paul, there is nothing that clashes or is essentially different. It is only the difference of a simpler and a more advanced dispensation. OT prophecy is best known by its effects. The main note of it is that certain men spoke with an authority conferred upon them directly by God; they were empowered to say, 'Thus saith the Lord.' In the earlier documents stress is frequently laid on the giving of 'signs' as proofs that a prophet's mission is from God (Ex 4<sup>1ff.</sup> 30<sup>1</sup>, 1 S 2<sup>34</sup>, 1 K 13<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 19<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>8ff.</sup>, Is 7<sup>10ff.</sup>), and a test is laid down for distinguishing true from false prophecy in Dt 18<sup>1ff.</sup>. But in the days when prophecy was most active the confidence (πληροφορία) with which the prophet spoke would seem to have been taken as credentials enough. Even when the prophet was unpopular and his message was resisted by king or people (as in the case of Micah and Jeremiah), it was with an uneasy conscience and with a sense of revolt against the Divine will.

It should be remembered that the existence of a prophetic order is characteristic of the NT as well as of the OT. We read in Ac 13<sup>1</sup> of 'prophets and teachers' as collected at Antioch. Individual prophets are repeatedly mentioned, as Agabus in Ac 11<sup>28</sup> 21<sup>10ff.</sup>, Judas and Silas in 15<sup>32</sup>, the daughters of Philip in 21<sup>9</sup>. A passage like 13<sup>1ff.</sup> supplies the key to others such as 16<sup>6ff.</sup> 20<sup>23</sup>; when it is said that 'the Holy Ghost' or 'the Spirit of Jesus' forbade such and such an act, or that the Holy Ghost 'testified' to such and such an effect, what is meant is the Holy Ghost speaking by the mouth of inspired prophets. In the Epistles 'prophets' are frequently mentioned along with, but after, 'apostles' as a standing office in the Church (1 Co 12<sup>28ff.</sup>, Eph 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>11</sup>). The difference between OT and NT prophets lies, not in the nature of the gift or of the functions in which it was exercised, but only in the comparative degree of their importance. The NT prophets were overshadowed by the apostles, who possessed the special qualification of having been in the immediate company of the Lord Jesus (Ac 1<sup>1ff.</sup>). Those who are mentioned expressly as 'prophets' occupy as a rule a secondary, rather than a primary, place in the history of the Church. At the same time it was quite possible for an apostle, and even a leading apostle like St. Paul, to be endowed with the gift of prophecy along with other gifts (cf. 1 Co 14<sup>18ff.</sup>).

5. Apostolic inspiration.—We may really couple together 'apostles' and 'prophets' as representing the characteristic forms of inspiration in apostolic times. But this inspiration must not be thought of as something isolated. It was not a peculiar and exceptional phenomenon standing by itself; it was rather the culminating point, or one of the culminating points, in a wide movement. This movement dates in its outward manifestation from Pentecost; it was what we should call in modern phrase a 'wave' of religious enthusiasm, the greatest of all such waves that history records, and the one that had most clearly what we call a supernatural origin. Language of this kind is always relative; it is not as if the supernatural was present in human life at certain periods, and absent at others. The supernatural is always present and always active, but in infinitely varied degrees; and the Incarnate Life of our Lord Jesus Christ, with its consequences, is an epoch in the world's history like no other that has ever been before or since; in it the Spirit moved on the face of the waters of humanity as it had done before over the physical waters of the Creation. This particular movement was, in a higher sense than any before it, spiritually creative.

The double character of the movement—a supernatural impulse and energy working upon and through natural human faculties—is well brought out in 1 Th 2<sup>13</sup>: 'For this cause we also thank God without ceasing, that, when ye received from us the word of the message, even the word of God, ye accepted it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God, which also worketh in you that believe.' With this should be taken the context immediately preceding, which shows how the Apostle concentrated all the gifts of sympathy and interest with which he was so richly endowed upon the service of his converts. He moved among them as a man among men; and yet they were conscious that there were Divine forces behind him. They were conscious that he was an instrument in the hand of God, the medium or vehicle of a Divine message—a message that was in its ultimate source none the less Divine because it was shaped by a human mind acting in accordance with its own proper laws.

Another very vivid picture of the apostolic ministry is given in 1 Co 2<sup>1-4</sup>: 'And I, brethren, when I came unto you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, proclaiming to you the mystery of God. For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching were not in persuasive words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.' The Apostle here discriminates, and the distinction is constantly present to his mind, between the resources which he brings to his work as man and the effect which he is enabled to produce by the help of the Spirit of God. He is nothing of an orator; he has none of the arts of rhetoric; when he first preached at Corinth, he was in a state of utter physical prostration. But all this only threw into stronger relief the success which he owed to a Power beyond himself; the wisdom and the force with which he spoke were not his but God's.

Besides these Pauline passages there is another classical passage outside the writings of St. Paul. This is contained in the opening verse and a half of the Epistle to the Hebrews: 'God, having of old time in many portions and in many modes spoken unto the fathers in the prophets, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son.' Here we have a historical retrospect of the whole course of revelation and inspiration. The history is mapped out in two great periods. There is the period of revelation by inspired men; and over against this there is the great concentrated and crowning revelation by Him who is not a prophet of God but His Son.

It is to be observed that in each case the preposition used is not (as in AV) 'by,' i.e. 'by means of,' 'through the agency of,' but 'in'—in the prophets and in the Son. In each case it is the same internal process of which we have been speaking above. The prophets spoke through the operation of the Holy Spirit working upon their own human faculties. The Son spoke through His own essential Deity acting through the like human faculties which He assumed at His Incarnation. When we think of this internal process we are reminded of the words of our Lord to the Samaritan woman: 'Every one that drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of this water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up into eternal life' (πρὸς ὕδατος ἀλλομένου εἰς ζωὴν αἰώνιον, Jn 4<sup>13, 14</sup>). There are few natural objects to which the process of inspiration can so well be compared as to a spring of what the Jews called 'living,' i.e. running, water. The cool fresh waters come bubbling and sparkling up from unknown depths; they gather and spread and speed upon their way in a fertilizing stream. Even so is the way of the Spirit.

We observe that the prophetic revelation is described as taking effect 'in many portions and in many modes.' This brings out a new point. It is not in accordance with God's methods to reveal the full truth all at once. He has revealed Himself piecemeal, in portions, a bit here and a bit there, 'line upon line and precept upon precept.' There has been a gradual development, a development in steps, each step marking an advance upon what had preceded.

For comprehensive illustration we only need to turn to the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5<sup>1-49</sup>). This, it will be remembered, is based upon an authority no less venerable and commanding than the Decalogue. 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Thou shalt not kill . . . Thou shalt not commit adultery . . . Thou shalt not forswear thyself . . . ye have heard that it was said, An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth . . . ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy.' And then, in each case, a corrected version of the commandment is given; a new commandment is placed by the side of the old: 'Ye have heard that it was said . . . but I say unto you . . .'. The last of these commandments brings home to us in a very vivid way at once the greatness and the limitations of the older inspiration. The old version was, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy.' The new version is, 'Love your enemies and pray for them that persecute you.' Again, there is the well-known incident of the Samaritan village which in accordance with the TR used to run: 'And when his disciples James and John saw this, they said, Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elias did? But he turned, and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. And they went to another village' (Lk 9<sup>54-56</sup>). The reading may not be original, but the sense is rightly given; the longer version does but expand the meaning of the shorter. Such instances may show how far our Lord Himself went in correcting or modifying portions of the older Scriptures, which in their original context had been truly inspired, but on a lower level.

It is difficult to exhaust the significance of this great passage from the Epistle to the Hebrews; but a word must just be said about that other phrase, 'In many modes.' It might be taken as including the different classes of persons through whom God spoke; not only prophets, but also psalmists and wise men. These classes too shared in a genuine inspiration, though they did not exactly use the special formula 'Thus saith the Lord.' The whole nation, as the Chosen People, was really a medium of Divine communication, though as a rule such communication was conveyed through individuals who were specially inspired.

Then there is the further question of the manner of the communication. There is a large body of evidence which goes to show that, under the New Dispensation as well as under the Old, the Holy Spirit made use of vision and trance and dream. Some of the examples—as, for instance, those from the 'we-passages' of the Acts—are very well attested indeed. Another strong example would be the vision of the Apocalypse, though that is probably the case of a book based upon a vision, rather than co-extensive with the actual vision. The book itself would seem to have been constructed upon literary methods. That would be another instance of the 'many modes.' The Gospels are really a new and special form of literature. The Epistles are of more than one kind. Some are what we should call genuine letters, others are rather treatises in the form of letters. When once the epistolary type was fixed it would be natural to employ it in different ways.

Before we leave the passage from Hebrews, we must go back to the main point: the distinction between revelation 'by' or 'in' the prophets, and revelation 'by' or 'in' the Son. The distinction is sufficiently explained by the words that are used. The prophets were 'spokesmen' of God; the Son was the Son—none other and none less. His inspiration came to Him as the Son. It was the product of His direct and constant filial communion with the Father. The nature of this inspiration is explained in that other famous verse: 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt 11<sup>27</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>).

For a further exposition we may turn to the prologue of St. John's Gospel, where the correct reading perhaps is: 'No man hath seen God at any time; God only begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>). The phrase 'who is in the bosom of the Father' denotes exactly that close and uninterrupted communion between the Son and the Father of which we have been speaking. The Son is admitted to the innermost counsels of the Father; and therefore it is that He is able to communicate them to men.

6. The historical setting.—When we were quoting above from the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we were really extracting a page or two from the autobiography of St. Paul; but the Apostle gives us plainly to understand that his experience was shared by many other Christians. That group of phenomena which we call inspiration was part of the movement described in general as the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; and St. Paul, with his natural bent for analysis, classifies and labels the different forms of manifestation which the gift of the Spirit assumed (1 Co 12<sup>4-11</sup>). Some of these concern us, and some do not; but the 'word of wisdom,' the 'word of knowledge,' 'prophecy and the discerning of spirits' are all directly in point. In these various ways the men of that day might have been seen to be carried out of and beyond their natural selves; and we possess a permanent written expression of the movement in the books of the NT. The gift of 'speaking with tongues' was a by-product of the same movement.

Like all other spiritual forces, these too needed to be regulated; they needed the controlling hand to fit them in orderly fashion into their place in the organized life of the society. Left to themselves, the exuberant outgrowths of spiritual exaltation were apt to run riot and cross and interfere with one another. It is such a state of things that St. Paul deals with in 1 Co 14. From a chapter like that we may form a good idea as to what the primitive assemblies for worship were like in a community that was, perhaps rather more than the average, subject to religious excitement. The Apostle lays down rules which, if observed, would keep this excitement within due bounds.

Great movements such as this which we have seen to be characteristic of the Apostolic Age do not come to an abrupt end, but shade off gradually into the more placid conditions of ordinary times. Hence, though it was natural and justifiable to regard the sphere of this special inspiration as co-extensive with the literature which claims to be apostolic, the extension of the inspiration to the whole of that literature and the denial of its presence in any writing that falls outside those limits, must not be assumed as an exact and scientific fact. The Epistles, e.g., of Ignatius of Antioch are not inferior to those which pass under the names of 2 Peter and Jude. There are two places in the Epistles of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (lix. 1 and lxiii. 2) which appear to make what we should call a definite claim to inspiration; and Ignatius reminds the Philadelphians (vii. 1) how, when he was present in their assembly he had suddenly exclaimed, under an impulse which he could not master, 'with a loud voice, with the voice of God: "Give heed to the bishop, to the presbytery, and to the deacons."' He clearly regarded this utterance as prompted by the Holy Spirit. He certainly did so in complete good faith; and there is no reason for disputing his claim, any more than there would be in our own day in the case of one who spoke under strong conviction, with deep emotion, and with a profound sense of direct responsibility to God. It would not follow, even so, that the claim, standing alone, was infallible—it would, like all such claims, be subject to 'the discerning of spirits'—but it would at least have a prima facie right to a hearing.

7. False claims to inspiration.—As in the case of the OT, so also in the case of the NT, we have to reckon with false claims to inspiration. There were prophets who were not deserving of the name. In both Testaments the prophets are regarded as forming a sort of professional class, which contained unworthy members. There is more than one allusion to false prophets of the elder dispensation (Lk 6<sup>26</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>1</sup>). The Jew Bar-Jesus (or Elymas) is described as a magician or false prophet (Ac 13<sup>6</sup>). But there are special warnings against false prophets (Mt 7<sup>15</sup>), more particularly in connexion with the troubled times which precede the destruction of Jerusalem (Mk 13<sup>22</sup>—Mt 24<sup>24</sup>; cf. v.<sup>11</sup>). False prophets are a fixed feature in the eschatological scheme. As a matter of fact, they must have been numerous towards the end of the Apostolic Age (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>1</sup>); and hence it is that in the Book of Revelation the class is summed up in the personification of the False Prophet (Rev 13<sup>11f</sup>, 16<sup>13f</sup>, 19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup>). The dangers from this source were met by a special gift of discernment between false inspiration and true (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup>).

8. Temporary element in the apostolic conception of inspiration.—The apostolic conception of inspiration did not differ in kind from that which prevailed in Jewish circles at the time. It was the product of reflexion upon the earlier period of the history when prophecy had been in full bloom. Under the influence of the scribes from Ezra onward, the idea of prophecy and of Scripture generally had hardened into a definite theologoumenon.

It was not to be expected that the doctrine thus formed should be checked by strict induction from the facts. The prophets spoke with authority, which they claimed to be Divine. They did not enter into any precise psychological analysis in accordance with which they distinguished between the human element in the process and the Divine. They knew that the impulse—the overpowering impulse and influence—came from outside themselves. It was only natural that they should set down the whole process to this. Thus there grew up the belief that the inspired word was in all respects Divine and endowed with all the properties of that which is Divine. The word of God, whether spoken or written, must be as certain in its operation as the laws of Nature. 'As the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, and giveth seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it' (Is 55<sup>10f</sup>). It was perfectly true that the broad Divine purpose as such was infallible. But it was a further step—and a mistaken step—to suppose that every detail in the human expression of that purpose shared in its infallibility. Yet the step was taken, and gradually hardened into a dogma (for the Jewish doctrine see W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums<sup>2</sup>, Berlin, 1906, p. 172). The apostles in this respect did not differ from their countrymen. The infallibility of the Scriptures—and indeed the verbal infallibility—is expressly laid down in Jn 10<sup>35</sup> (where the Evangelist is speaking rather than his Master). Yet the assertion of the doctrine in this instance is associated with an argument which, to modern and Western logic, is far from infallible. And the same must be said of St. Paul (Gal 3<sup>16</sup>), where he argues after the manner of the Rabbis from the use of the singular 'seed' instead of the plural 'seeds.' There is more to be said about the minute fulfilments which are so often pointed out by St. Matthew and St. John (Mt 1<sup>22</sup> etc., Jn 2<sup>22</sup> etc.); on these see esp. Cheyne, Com. on Isaiah, London, 1881, ii. 170–189.

Broadly speaking, it would be true to say that the application of the OT by the apostles shows a deepened grasp of its innermost meaning (e.g. St. Paul's treatment of 'faith,' of the election of Israel, the call of the Gentiles, the nearness of the gospel [Ro 10<sup>8ff</sup>] and the like). But these are instances of their deepened insight generally, and are not different in kind from the Rabbinical theology, which, though often at fault, from time to time shows flashes of great penetration.

Summary.—In regard to the conception of revelation and inspiration as a whole, the same sort of gradual shading off is to be observed. The idea itself is fundamental; it must hold a permanent and leading place in the mind's outlook upon the world and on human history. There is a certain amount of detachable dross connected with it, but the essence of it is pure gold. And this essence is not to be too closely circumscribed. There were adumbrations of the idea outside Israel. In Israel itself, in the prophetic order, the idea received its full provisional expression; but the coping-stone was placed upon it by Christianity; God, who in time past had spoken to the Chosen Race by the prophets, at the end of the ages spoke, not only to them but to all mankind, by His Son (He 1<sup>1</sup>).

INTERCESSION.—The word ἐντροχία, translated 'intercession' (1 Ti 2<sup>45</sup>), means literally 'drawing close to God in free and familiar intercourse.' But the modern use of the word, which limits the meaning to prayer for others, need not obliterate the original meaning. It is in proportion as the person praying for others is able to enlarge his own intercourse with God that he can be, like Moses, Samuel, Elijah, able to uphold others.

In the NT human capacity for this work is seen to be immeasurably increased through the example and teaching of the Lord Jesus, and by the co-operation of the Holy Spirit, who intercedes 'with groanings which cannot be uttered' and 'according to the will of God' (Ro 8<sup>6-21</sup>). We may expect, therefore, to find that the work of intercession will grow as the Church grows, with great widening of experience and influence. The enlarged teaching of St. Paul in his later letters corresponds with the facts narrated in the Acts, where intercessory services are quoted at all great crises. The apostles and brethren pray for guidance in the appointment of a successor to Judas (Ac 1<sup>4</sup>), as when they appoint the Seven (6<sup>6</sup>; cf. 13<sup>3</sup>), or pray for the deliverance of St. Peter from prison (12<sup>5</sup>). The farewell prayers with the elders of Ephesus (20<sup>36</sup>), and the whole congregation of Tyre (21<sup>5,6</sup>), are typical in all probability of many similar services.

The teaching and the practice of the mother Church in Jerusalem are reflected in the Epistle of James (5<sup>14</sup>), where the prayers of the elders of the Church on behalf of the sick are definitely enjoined; nor is sickness of the soul forgotten in prayer for forgiveness (5<sup>16</sup>).

1. The Epistles of St. Paul help our imagination to go further in reproducing the method of intercession in the Apostolic Church. Intercession is continually linked with thanksgiving. Making mention of the Thessalonians in his prayers, he refers to their faith, hope, and love (1 Th 1<sup>2-3</sup>), and their acceptance of his message as the Word of God (2<sup>13</sup>), 'praying exceedingly that he may see their face and may perfect that which is lacking in their faith' (3<sup>10</sup>). So in 2 Th 1<sup>11</sup> he prays that God may count them worthy of His calling and the name of the Lord Jesus Christ be glorified in them. In response he asks for their intercession that 'the word of the Lord may run and be glorified,' and he himself may be delivered from unreasonable and evil men (3<sup>11</sup>). There is a striking phrase in 2 Co 1<sup>11</sup>, when he has received the good news from Corinth, and pictures their prayers for his deliverance from peril: 'Ye also helping together on our behalf by your supplication; that, for the gift bestowed upon us by means of many, thanks may be given by many persons on our behalf.' J. A. Beet (ad loc.) translates 'from many faces,' a graphic word-picture of the upturned faces of the whole congregation.

To the Roman Christians, whom he has not yet seen, St. Paul writes that he makes mention of them unceasingly (Ro 1<sup>8-12</sup>), praising God for their faith, and praying that he may be enabled to come and impart to them some spiritual gift of grace. They can help him by mutual encouragement.

In Eph 1<sup>15ff.</sup>, rejoicing, as always, in what is fairest in the character of his friends, he prays that they may have 'a spirit of wisdom and revelation,' growth in that knowledge of God which alike proves our efficiency and increases it in our use of His revelation, when our eyes are opened to see the wealth of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and the greatness of His power. He speaks from his own experience of knowledge issuing in power.

In his next prayer (Eph 3<sup>1-14-19</sup>) St. Paul puts the need of Divine power first as 'a condition of ability to apprehend "the whole range of the sphere in which the Divine wisdom and love find exercise"' (Chadwick, p. 290). His social teaching here is noteworthy. Every family is enabled to live its common life in proportion as the individuals live up to their personal ideal. So he prays that Christ may dwell in each heart, for the strength of Christ is conveyed only to those who are fully strong enough to know the love of Christ.

Again, writing to the Colossians (1<sup>9ff</sup>), he prays that they may be 'endowed with all wisdom to apprehend [God's] verities and all intelligence to follow His processes, living in the mind of the Spirit—to the end that knowledge may manifest itself in practice' (J. B. Lightfoot, ad loc.). Having this sure grasp of principle, he can dare to pray for them as patient and long-suffering, and always thankful despite discouragement.

In Ph 1<sup>9-11</sup> he prays that love and knowledge and discernment may inspire them to approve things that are excellent with a pure conscience that offends none, and a life filled with the fruits of righteousness.

Thus the method of St. Paul is exactly parallel to the method of our Lord's High-Priestly prayer (Jn 17<sup>9</sup>), in which intercession is concentrated first on the needs of those given to Him out of the world. The hope of the future depends on the strengthening of Christian centres before anything is said about those 'who shall believe through their word.' The beauty of the Christian life is the irrefragable proof of the truth of Christian teaching; so it is to uphold the ideal of Christian character that St. Paul prays most earnestly. But this does not mean that the corporate intercessions should not take also a wider range. In 1 Ti 2<sup>1f.</sup> he exhorts that 'supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings, be made for all men, for kings and all that are in high place,' a direction which, as we shall see presently in the letter of Clement, was fervently followed in the Church in Rome, from which city he wrote this last Epistle.

It is a strange commentary on this teaching of St. Paul that Josephus should actually ascribe the origin of the war which ended with the destruction of Jerusalem to the refusal of the Jews, at the instigation of Eleazar, to offer prayer for Gentile rulers (BJ II. xvii. 2).

2. In the Epistle to the Hebrews (7<sup>-5</sup>) there is an important passage on the intercession of the Lord Jesus as our High Priest. 'In the glorified humanity of the Son of man every true human wish finds perfect and prevailing expression' (B. F. Westcott, ad loc.). In reliance upon Christ's advocacy as both social and personal, the writer naturally asks for the prayers of his readers (13<sup>18f</sup>), and especially that he may be restored to them the sooner.

3. In 1 John (5<sup>14</sup>) intercession is regarded as the expression of perfect boldness in prayer which consciousness of a Divine life brings to believers: 'The energy of Christian life is from the first social' (Westcott, ad loc.). Its prevailing power is assured on behalf of all who sin a sin not unto death, sins which flow from human imperfection. In regard to sin which wholly separates from Christ, the Apostle does not forbid, though he cannot enjoin (v. 16).

4. The teaching of the Apostolic Fathers follows the lines already laid down by the NT writers.

(a) Clement goes to the root of the troubles at Corinth when he asks that intercession should be made 'for them that are in any transgression, that forbearance and humility may be given them' (Ep. ad Cor. lvi.). And he shows what a prominent place in the eucharistic prayers of the Church was given to intercessions (lix.): 'Save those among us who are in tribulation; have mercy on the lowly; lift up the fallen; show Thyself unto the needy; heal the ungodly; convert the wanderers of Thy people; feed the hungry; release our prisoners; raise up the meek; comfort the faint-hearted. Let all the Gentiles know that Thou art God alone, and Jesus Christ is Thy Son, and we are Thy people and the sheep of Thy pasture.'

The prayer for rulers and governors may also be quoted (lxi.): 'Grant unto them therefore, O Lord, health, peace, concord, stability, that they may administer the government which Thou hast given them without failure. . . . Do Thou, Lord, direct their counsel according to that which is good and well-pleasing in Thy sight, that, administering in peace and gentleness with godliness the power which Thou hast given them, they may obtain Thy favour.'

(b) The joy of intercession finds striking expression in Hermas (Mand. x. 3), who teaches our need of cheerfulness and maintains that the intercession of a sad man hath never at any time power to ascend to the altar of God. He paints also in the Parable of the elm and the vine (Sim. ii.) the difficulties of the rich man, who in the things of the Lord is poor, and his confession and intercession with the Lord are very scanty, because he is distracted about his riches. As the vine seeks the support of the elm, let him help the poor man, who is rich in intercession, and gain the support of his prayers.

(c) Turning from the Church in Rome to the Church in Antioch, we find Ignatius on his way to martyrdom asking for intercession in the Eucharist that he may succeed in fighting with wild beasts (Eph. i.), and 'for the rest of mankind (for there is in them a hope of repentance), that they may find God' (ib. 10). He requests prayer for the Church in Syria in all his letters. 'For, if the prayer of one and another hath so great force, how much more that of the bishop and of the whole Church' (ib. 5). To the Romans he writes: 'Only pray that I may have power within and without' (ib. 3).

These quotations may suffice to show how thoroughly the practice of intercession was carried out by the primitive Church.

(d) Aristides in his Apology says: 'I have no doubt that the world stands by reason of the intercession of Christians' (ch. 16).

(e) In the Martyrdom of Polycarp (A.D. 155), viii., it is recorded how the aged Martyr remembered 'all who at any time had come in his way, small and great, high and low, and all the Universal Church throughout the world.'

(f) A little later Tertullian wrote these beautiful words (de Orat. 29): '[Christian prayer] has no delegated grace to avert any sense or suffering; but it supplies the suffering, and the feeling, and the grieving, with endurance: it amplifies grace by virtue, that faith may know what she obtains from the Lord, understanding what—for God's name's sake—she suffers. . . . Likewise it washes away faults, repels temptations, extinguishes persecutions, consoles the faint-spirited, cheers the high-spirited, escorts travellers, appeases waves, makes robbers stand aghast, nourishes the poor, governs the rich, upraises the fallen, arrests the falling, confirms the standing.'

INTERPRETATION.—This word is used in different senses by Christians in the Apostolic Age. (1) St. Paul applies it to that spiritual 'gift' which enabled one to expound the unintelligible utterance known as 'tongues' (ερμηνεία [1 Co 12<sup>10</sup> 14-6], διερμηνεύω [1 Co 12<sup>30</sup> 14<sup>5</sup>, 13<sup>27</sup>], διερμηνεύης [1 Co 14<sup>28</sup>]). (2) Later writers 'interpret' a foreign word by giving its Greek equivalent (ἐρμηνεύω [Jn 1<sup>42</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, He 7<sup>21</sup>], διερμηνεύω [Ac 9<sup>36</sup>], μεθερμηνεύω [Mt 1<sup>23</sup> Mk 5<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>22</sup> 34, Jn 13<sup>38</sup>, 41, Ac 4<sup>36</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>]). When Papias calls St. Mark St. Peter's interpreter (ἐρμηνευτής [Euseb. HE iii. 39]), he may be supposing that St. Peter preached in Aramaic (or Hebrew) and that St. Mark translated the sermon to the Greek audience. This is historically improbable, however, and possibly Papias means only that St. Mark, since he composed his Gospel on the basis of St. Peter's sermons, is thereby St. Peter's 'expounder.' (3) In the sense of Scriptural exposition, the word 'interpretation' is rarely used in the NT. The meaning of 'private interpretation' in 2 P 1<sup>20</sup> (ἰδίᾳ ἐπιλύσεως) is doubtful, though, in view of what follows, it seems to signify the prophet's complete subordination to God's will. In Lk 24<sup>27</sup> (διερμηνεύω) direct reference is made to Christian interpretation of the OT books—a practice which was very general and very important in the apostolic period.

The OT occupied a unique place in the life and thought of the first Christians. St. Paul presupposed his readers' acquaintance with its writings, which he assumed to be the final court of appeal in all argumentation. Apollos, whom certain Corinthians set up as St. Paul's rival, was also 'mighty in the scriptures' (Ac 18-4). OT language and thought are frequently appropriated by the NT writers. According to H. B. Swete (Introduction to the OT in Greek, Cambridge, 1900, p. 381 f.), there are 78 formal quotations in St. Paul, 46 in the Synoptists, 28 in Hebrews, 23 in Acts, 12 in John, and about a dozen in the remaining books. Even where formal quotations are lacking, OT phraseology is sometimes frequent (e.g. Rev.). The early Christians, like the Jews, believed in the Divine origin and authority of Scripture. In spite of his breach with Judaism, St. Paul still held the Law and the Commandments to be holy, righteous, and good (Ro 7<sup>12</sup>), and he repeatedly affirmed that these things were written 'for our sake' (Ro 4<sup>23f</sup>, 15<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>9f</sup>, 10<sup>6</sup>, 11). Here he found a clear revelation of God's purposes and an infallible guide for Christians in matters of conduct and doctrine (cf. Ro 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>, 10<sup>6f</sup>, 4<sup>3f</sup>, 8<sup>36</sup> 9<sup>6f</sup>, 10<sup>6f</sup>, 11<sup>9f</sup>, 26 13<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>3f</sup>, 21, 1 Co 6<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>, 13 10<sup>18</sup> 11<sup>8f</sup>, 14<sup>21</sup>, 24 15<sup>3</sup>, 45, 54, 2 Co 1<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>13f</sup>, 6<sup>16f</sup>, 8<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>, Gal 3<sup>16</sup>, 22). The Evangelists saw in the OT foreshadowings of Jesus' career and proof of His Messiahship (e.g. Mt 1<sup>22</sup> 25, 15, 23 4<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 11<sup>7f</sup>, 12<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>35</sup> 21<sup>5</sup>, Mk 1<sup>2f</sup>, 4<sup>11f</sup>, 11<sup>9f</sup>, 12<sup>10f</sup>, 36 14<sup>27</sup>, Lk 4<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>27</sup> 24<sup>44</sup>, Jn 1<sup>23</sup> 15<sup>25</sup> 17<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>24</sup>, 28, 36). For Matthew OT prophecy is virtually a 'source' of information about Jesus' career, as when Mk 11<sup>1-7</sup> is made to conform to the first evangelist's interpretation of Zec 9<sup>9</sup> (Mt 21<sup>1-7</sup>; see also Mt 1<sup>22f</sup>, 25<sup>f</sup>, 15<sup>17f</sup>, etc.).

OT language serves other important purposes in the Gospels. God speaks in this language at Jesus' Baptism, and again at His Transfiguration; it is used in the conversation between Jesus and Satan; and it furnishes phraseology for some of Jesus most forceful and solemn pronouncements, where sometimes the sound of Holy Writ seems to be prized above perspicuity (e.g. Mt 10<sup>34ff.</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup> 1<sup>33</sup> 15<sup>34</sup>). The history of the early community is also Scripturally authenticated (Ac 1<sup>10</sup> 2<sup>16ff.</sup> 4<sup>25ff.</sup>). Thus the NT writers derived not only incidental and descriptive details, but on occasion more important features of their narratives from the OT. This was only natural, since these sacred books were believed to be inspired of God, profitable for teaching, reproof, correction, and instruction, and able to make men 'wise unto salvation' (2 Ti 3<sup>15f.</sup>; cf. 2 P 1<sup>19ff.</sup>). Christians gave to the OT all the prestige it had in Judaism, believing that they, through their faith in Christ, had come into possession of the only key to all true interpretation.

The exact content and text of the first Christians' 'Bible' are not known. They were doubtless familiar with the three-fold division of the Jewish canon—the 'Law,' the 'Prophets,' and the 'Writings' (Lk 24<sup>44</sup> [?]), but they probably did not discuss questions of canonicity. Their feeling of spiritual elevation left no room for such academic discussions. And in the portions of Scripture used individual choice seems to have had free play. The evangelists favour the Prophets and the Psalms, while St. Paul and the author of Hebrews cite mainly from the Pentateuch. But there is scarcely a book of the OT with which some NT writer does not show acquaintance. Obad., Ezr., Neh., and Est. are the only exceptions (according to Toy, Quotations in the NT, p. vi, n. 1). Apocryphal books and popular legends are also used (cf. 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup>, Gal 3<sup>19</sup>, Ac 7<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, He 2<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>37</sup>, Jude 6. 8. 14). Textual problems seem to have been ignored. Quotations are mostly from the LXX, though use of the Hebrew text has sometimes been supposed. This is very difficult, if not impossible, to prove, since we do not know the exact form of Greek text which a NT writer may have used. A part of the early community ordinarily spoke Aramaic (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>), but Greek writers naturally followed the LXX rendering, even when the original tradition was in Aramaic or Hebrew. In fact, there seems to have been little thought about slavish adherence to any text. Christians possessed a superior understanding, which allowed them to alter phraseology, to paraphrase freely, or even to cite loosely from memory.

Thus their methods were more spontaneous than those of scribism, yet the general character of their interpretation was predominantly Jewish. Its free handling of the text, its disregard for the original setting, its logical vagaries, its slight tendency to become artificial, were all Jewish traits. To illustrate from the NT, Mk 12<sup>f.</sup> changes the wording of prophecy and disregards its natural meaning in order to make the Christian application possible. A logical non sequitur is illustrated in Mk 12<sup>6f.</sup>, where an original statement about the historic earthly career of Abraham is made the basis for an inference about his future heavenly career. St. Paul's argument from 'seed' and 'seeds' (Gal 3<sup>16</sup>), his comparison between Hagar and Sarah (Gal 4<sup>22ff.</sup>), and his interpretation of the OT injunction against muzzling the ox (1 Co 9<sup>9f.</sup>), all tend to become artificial. Christians appropriated and imitated Jewish Midrashim seemingly without hesitation, as when St. Paul made Christ the spiritual rock (1 Co 10<sup>4</sup>; cf. 'Rabbah' on Nu 1<sup>1</sup>). They argued from word-derivation (Mt 1<sup>1ff.</sup>), and from the numerical value of letters (Rev 13<sup>18</sup>; cf. art. 'Gematria' in JE); and they freely employed figures, types, analogies, allegories (q.v.). They also copied the more sober type of Haggadic Midrashim. Their emphasis upon the example of their Master, their preservation of His teaching, their harking back to the ancient worthies, are all in line with Jewish custom. The work of the NT interpreter is not so very unlike that of the ideal scribe of Sir 39<sup>12f.</sup>. Yet early Christian interpretation did not run to the same extreme of barren artificiality as that of the scribes, nor was it pursued merely for its own sake. As the handmaid of the new faith, it was subordinated to the consciousness of a new spiritual authority in personal experience, a fact which may explain why Christians were partial to OT passages dealing with personal religious life.

IRON (σίδηρος; adj. σιδήρεος).—Iron, the commonest, cheapest, and most useful of heavy metals, is mentioned (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>) among the merchandise of 'Babylon' (= Rome). The Iron Age of civilization succeeded the Ages of Copper and Bronze. 'In Egypt, Chaldaea, Assyria, China, it reaches far back, to perhaps 4000 years before the Christian era. Homer represents Greece as beginning her Iron Age twelve hundred years before our era' (EB,<sup>11</sup> xiv. [1910] 800). Rome was supplied with iron from India, the shores of the Black Sea, Spain, Elba, and the province of Noricum. The apocalyptic Messiah is to rule the nations with a rod of iron (Rev 2<sup>7</sup> 12<sup>5</sup> 19<sup>15</sup>), a symbol of inflexible justice (cf. Ps 29). The iron gate leading from the Fortress of Antonia into the city of Jerusalem opened to St. Peter and the angel of its own accord (αὐτομάτη, Ac 12<sup>10</sup>); cf. Homer's αὐτόμαται δὲ πύλαι μῶνον οὐρανοῦ, ἄς ἔχον Ὀραιο (Il. v. 749), and Virgil, Æn. vi. 81 f.

ISAAC (Ἰσαάκ).—Isaac, the son of Abraham and Sarah, was superior in a variety of ways to his half-brother Ishmael. He was 'the son of the free-woman' (ὁ δὲ ἐκ τῆς ἐλευθέρης, Gal 4<sup>23</sup>; τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἐλευθέρης, v.<sup>30</sup>); he was 'born through a promise' (δὲ ἐπαγγελίας, v.<sup>23</sup>) given to his parents in their old age; he was 'born after the Spirit' (κατὰ πνεῦμα, v.<sup>25</sup>), who gave the promise and perhaps the strength εἰς καταβολὴν σπέρματος (He 11<sup>11</sup>); and, as the true son—even called the only-begotten (τὸν μονογενῆ, v.<sup>17</sup>)—he inherited the covenant promises given by God to Abraham. His brother, on the other hand, was 'the son of the handmaid' (ὁ μὲν ἐκ τῆς παιδίσκης, Gal 4<sup>22</sup>; ὁ υἱὸς τῆς παιδίσκης, v.<sup>30</sup>); he was 'born after the flesh' (ὁ κατὰ σάρκα γεννηθεὶς, v.<sup>29</sup>); and he could 'not inherit with the son of the free-woman' (v.<sup>30</sup>).

St. Paul uses the relations of the two brothers to their father and to one another to help him to make good his distinction between 'the children of the promise,' who are 'reckoned for a seed,' and 'the children of the flesh,' who are not 'children of God' (Ro 9<sup>8</sup>). Grappling with the problem of the incidence in his own day of the promises first given to Abraham, he contends that while mere Jewish birth and upbringing do not constitute a claim of right to spiritual privileges, no barrier except unbelief can prevent the Gentiles from inheriting them. Compressing his teaching into a single suggestive sentence, he says: 'We [the Christian Church], like Isaac (κατὰ Ἰσαάκ), are children of promise' (ἐπαγγελίας τέκνα, Gal 4<sup>28</sup>; cf. τὰ τέκνα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, Ro 9<sup>8</sup>). Born in the fullness of time, made free by the gift of the Spirit, and destined for a great heritage, the Christians of every land are prefigured in Isaac. 'If ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, heirs according to promise' (Gal 3<sup>29</sup>). The carnal Ishmael, who in this daring allegory represents orthodox Judaism, may 'persecute' the Spirit-born Isaac (according to the Rabbinic interpretation of the originally innocent word 'playing' in Gn 21<sup>8</sup>); but, while the child of the freewoman (the Church) is established for ever in the Father's house by a covenant of grace, the son of the bondwoman (the Jewish people) is cast out. If—as Luther says on Gal 4<sup>24</sup>—'allegory is not argument,' it may at least be extremely effective illustration. The Apostle's strong imagination makes the simple old folk-tale suddenly flash with new meanings, which serve to illuminate a complex and difficult modern situation.

Two other incidents in Isaac's life are referred to in He 11<sup>17ff</sup>. (1) He was virtually offered up as a sacrifice to God (cf. Ja 2<sup>21</sup>); in a figure (εν παραβολῇ) he came back from the dead, passing through the likeness of death and resurrection (see ABRAHAM). (2) By blessing his son, he gave evidence of his faith concerning things to come (περὶ μελλόντων). His trust in God made future possibilities as real as present certainties. His faith corresponded to the definition in He 11<sup>1</sup>: it was the substantiating of things hoped for (ἐλπίζομένων ὑπόστασις).

JAMES STRAHAN.

ISAIAH (Ἰσαίας or Ἡσαίας, Vulg. Isaias, in the Fathers also Esaias).—Isaiah, the grandest figure among the prophets of Israel, is named 3 times in Acts (8-8, 30 28-3) and 5 times in Romans (9<sup>27</sup>, 29 10<sup>16</sup>, 20 15<sup>12</sup>). Nothing is said in the NT of his personal history, except that ἐπιβήσαν in He 11<sup>37</sup> probably alludes to the tradition—found in the Ascension of Isaiah (i. 9, v. 1), and repeated in Justin's Trypho (ch. 120, πρὶν ἐξιδὼν ἐπίστατε)—that he was sawn asunder, a tradition which, though not incredible, is without historical value. Every NT reference to the prophet's name is accompanied by a quotation from his writings, which were for the Apostolic Age the words that 'the Holy Ghost spake by Isaiah' (Ac 28-3). Yet certain spontaneous notes of appreciation from the lips and pen of St. Paul are precious as indications, slight but real, of the impression made upon one master-spirit by the writings of another. 'Isaiah crieth' (κράζει, Ro 9<sup>7</sup>) is an appraisement of the emphasis of his utterance; 'well (or finely) spake the Holy Spirit through Isaiah' (καλῶς ἐλάλησε, Ac 28-5) expresses hearty sympathy with the prophet's teaching and admiration of the language in which it is conveyed; and 'Isaiah is very bold' (Ἡσαίας δὲ ἀποτολμᾷ, Ro 10<sup>20</sup>) is one spiritual protagonist's tribute to another's personal courage. It needed heroism for Isaiah to proclaim, in the face of Israel's haughty exclusiveness, a gracious Divine purpose which embraced all the Gentiles; and St. Paul, whose life-work it was to fulfil that purpose in spite of fanatical Jewish opposition, was the man to appreciate a splendid boldness inspired by great faith.

The NT, of course, makes no distinction between a First, Second, and Third Isaiah. The prophet's name impartially covers a variety of writings which criticism now pronounces to be productions of widely different periods. He is equally the seer of the Root of Jesse (Is 11<sup>10</sup> || Ro 15<sup>12</sup>) and of the suffering servant of the Lord (Is 53<sup>7</sup> || Ac 8<sup>32</sup>). It was a passage in 'Isaiah the prophet' (ch. 53) that the Ethiopian was reading in his chariot when he was joined by St. Philip, whose interpretation of that mysterious utterance—the profoundest in the OT—in the light of Christ's Passion led the eunuch to faith and baptism.

Two NT writers had minds steeped in the prophecies of Isaiah—St. Paul and the writer of the Apocalypse. (1) The speeches attributed to St. Paul in Acts furnish evidence of his indebtedness to those writings. When he announces to the Jews of Pisidian Antioch his epoch-making decision to 'turn to the Gentiles,' it is in an utterance of Isaiah (49<sup>6</sup>) that he seeks the Divine sanction of his action: 'I have set thee for a light of the Gentiles' (Ac 13<sup>47</sup>). When he reasons with the Athenians as to the error of making the Godhead 'like unto gold or silver or stone, graven by art and man's device' (Ac 17<sup>20</sup>), he seems to echo the words, if not the ironical tones, of the prophet of the Exile (Is 40<sup>18</sup>). His experience among the Jews of Rome reminded him of what befell Isaiah in Jerusalem many centuries earlier. Both the prophet and the apostle seemed to be sent to hearers impervious to Divine truth, who could not be converted and healed. The Epistle to the Romans supplies the strongest proof of St. Paul's absorption in the prophecies of Isaiah. It is significant that most of his quotations occur in the chapters which contain his philosophy of the fall and rising again of Israel (9-11), and that many of them are taken from Deutero-Isaiah. His doctrine of election inevitably suggests the clay and the potter (Ro 9<sup>21</sup> || Is 45<sup>9</sup>). He is helped to face the Jewish rejection of the Messiah by the conception of the Remnant (τὸ κατὰλειμμα, Ro 9<sup>27</sup> || Is 10<sup>22</sup>)—a conception which seemed to the prophet so important that he gave one of his own children the symbolic name of 'Remnant-shall-return' (Is 7<sup>3</sup>). The thought of Christ as a stumbling-stone to the Jews is parallel to that of Jahweh as a stumbling-stone to the houses of Israel (Ro 9<sup>33</sup> || Is 8<sup>14</sup>). While the universal proclamation of the gospel suggests the 'beautiful feet' of those who preached deliverance from Babylon (Ro 10<sup>15</sup> || Is 52<sup>7</sup>), the sadness of speaking to deaf ears prompts the question, 'Who hath believed our report?' (Ro 10<sup>16</sup> || Is 53<sup>1</sup>). The preventient grace of God excites the wonder of both the prophet and the apostle (Ro 10<sup>6</sup> || Is 61<sup>1</sup>), and Israel's present insensibility seems to them both a spirit of stupor (Ro 11<sup>8</sup> || Is 29<sup>10</sup>). The assurance of the ultimate salvation of all Israel is based on the advent of a Deliverer (Ro 11<sup>26</sup> || Is 59<sup>0</sup>); but both writers confess a reverent agnosticism in presence of the mysteries of Divine providence (Ro 11<sup>34</sup> || Is 40<sup>13</sup>). The Epistles to the Corinthians also prove the affinity of these great minds. Both writers know the unprofitableness of mere earthly wisdom (1 Co 1<sup>19</sup> || Is 29<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>20</sup> || Is 38<sup>18</sup>); both believe in a spiritual creation which will make all things new (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup> || Is 43<sup>18</sup>); and both of them, with all their breadth of outlook, recognize the imperativeness of separation from heathendom (2 Co 6<sup>17</sup> || Is 52<sup>11</sup>). Isaiah's hope of immortality, the strongest that is found (apart from Daniel) in the prophetic writings, is used to clinch St. Paul's great argument for the resurrection of the dead—'death is swallowed up in victory' (1 Co 15<sup>54</sup> || Is 25<sup>8</sup>; εἰς νίκος, which takes the place of the prophet's 'for ever,' is due to the Aram. sense of the Heb. word).

(2) The other NT writer who especially felt Isaiah's spell was the author of the Apocalypse. His Christ, as the First and the Last, is clothed with the attributes of Isaiah's God (Rev 1<sup>17</sup> || Is 41<sup>4</sup> 44<sup>6</sup>). The trisagion of his living creatures was uttered by the seraphim in the heavenly Temple (Rev 4<sup>8</sup> || Is 6<sup>3</sup>). His vision of the rolling up of heaven as a scroll was Isaianic (Rev 6<sup>14</sup> || Is 34<sup>4</sup>), and his exquisite description of the final state of the blessed—'they shall hunger no more . . . wipe away every tear from their eyes'—is a cento of prophetic phrases, which are now used to picture the consummation of the redemptive work of the Lamb (Rev 7<sup>16f</sup>. || Is 49<sup>10</sup> 25<sup>8</sup>). 'Fallen is Babylon'—a voice of severa indignatio reminiscent of Rome's own 'Carthago est delenda'—was the doom of the real Babylon before it was pronounced upon the mystical one (Rev 14<sup>8</sup> || Is 21<sup>9</sup>). The description of the militant Messiah as clothed in a garment sprinkled with blood is suggested by the attributes of the Hero who came from the conquest of Edom (Rev 19<sup>13</sup> || Is 63<sup>4ff</sup>). The desire for a new heaven and a new earth was not itself new (Rev 21<sup>1</sup> || Is 65<sup>17</sup>), and the ideal city is depicted in Isaianic colours (Rev 21<sup>19, 24f</sup> || Is 60<sup>19, 2. 11</sup>). The free invitation with which the Revelation properly ends (22<sup>18-21</sup> being a harsh editorial postscript) only echoes the words of welcome uttered by the evangelical prophet (Rev 22<sup>17</sup> || Is 55<sup>1</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

ISRAEL.—Israel was the nation to which God's promises had been given. Generally the idea of privilege is associated with the use of the word, just as 'Israel' was originally the name of special privilege given by God to Jacob, the great ancestor of the race (Gn 32-3 35<sup>10</sup>). It differs from both 'Hebrew' and 'Jew,' the former standing, at least in NT times, for Jews of purely national sympathies who spoke the Hebrew or Aramaic dialect (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>); the latter, a term originally applied to all who belonged to the province of Judah, and, after the Babylonian captivity, to all of the ancient race wherever located. 'Israel,' on the other hand, is pre-eminently the people of privilege, the people who had been chosen by God and received His covenant. Thus frequently a Jewish orator addressed the people as 'men of Israel' (Ac 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>8, 10</sup> 5<sup>35</sup> 13<sup>16</sup> etc.).

In the Acts of the Apostles we find the word used historically with reference to the ancestors of the Jews of apostolic times and also applied to these Jews themselves. The past history of Israel as God's chosen people is referred to in the speeches contained in the Book of Acts, e.g. by St. Stephen (7<sup>23, 37, 42</sup>), and by St. Paul (13<sup>17</sup> 28<sup>31</sup>). It is usually assumed or suggested in the Acts that the Jews of the time, to whom the gospel was being preached, are the Israel of the day, the people for whom God had a special favour and who might expect special blessings (5<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>23</sup>).

But the refusal of the message of the apostles by many of those who by birth were Jews led to a change in the use of the term, which gives us what we may call the metaphorical or spiritual significance of the word. The Apostle Paul's contention with the legalistic Jews of his day led him to draw a distinction between the actual historical Israel and the true Israel of God. He speaks on the one hand of 'Israel after the flesh' (1 Co 10<sup>18</sup>), or of those who belong to the 'stock of Israel' (Ph 3<sup>9</sup>), and on the other hand of a 'commonwealth of Israel' (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>), from which many, even Jews by birth, are aliens, and into which the Ephesians have been admitted (v. 13), and also of the 'Israel of God' (Gal 6<sup>16</sup>). By this 'commonwealth of Israel' or 'Israel of God' the Apostle means a true spiritual Israel, practically equivalent to 'all the faithful.' It might be defined as 'the whole number of the elect who have been, are, or shall be gathered into one under Christ,' or, in other words, the Holy Catholic Church.

This true Israel does not by any means coincide with the nation or the stock of Abraham. 'They are not all Israel which are of Israel' (Ro 9<sup>6</sup>), i.e. by racial descent. Branches may be broken off from the olive tree of God's privileged people and wild olive branches may be grafted into the tree (Ro 11<sup>17-21</sup>). Sometimes it is difficult to determine the exact application of the term in different passages in the Pauline Epistles. Thus the sentence, 'All Israel shall be saved' (Ro 11<sup>26</sup>), refers not to the true or spiritual Israel in the sense of an elect people, as has been held by various commentators, e.g. Augustine, Theodoret, Luther, Calvin, and others, nor to an elect remnant, as is held by Bengel and Olshausen. The Apostle is speaking of the actual nation of Israel as a whole, and contrasting it with the fullness of the Gentiles. It is his belief that, when the fullness of the Gentiles is come in, Israel as a nation will also turn to God by confessing Christ. The phrase 'all Israel' does not necessarily apply to every member of the race, nor does the passage teach anything as to the fate of the individuals who at the Apostle's day or since then have composed the nation (cf. Meyer, Kommentar, p. 520; Denney in EGT, 'Rom.,' p. 683; H. Olshausen, Rom., p. 373; Calvin, Rom., p. 330).

Just as the ancient historical Israel was the recipient of special privileges and stood in a particular relation to God, so the spiritual Israel of apostolic times is the bearer of special privileges and stands to God in a unique relationship. Ancient Israel had 'the oracles of God' (Ro 3<sup>2</sup>). They had the sign of circumcision. To them, St. Paul declares, pertained 'the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the Law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came' (Ro 9<sup>4-5</sup>). The great essential features of these privileges are transferred to the spiritual Israel, the believing Church which has been grafted into the true olive tree. They have the adoption, they are sons of God (Ro 8<sup>15-17</sup>). They have the glory both present and future (Ro 8<sup>18</sup>). They are partakers of the new covenant which has been ratified by the death of Jesus Christ (1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>).

The analogy between the first and the second covenant is fully worked out by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who dwells upon the ritual and ceremonial aspect of ancient Israel's relationship to God, and shows the higher fulfilment of that relationship under the new covenant, where there is direct personal access to God. Here the human priesthood of the sons of Aaron and the sacrifices of bulls and goats are superseded by a Divine Mediator who offered Himself a sacrifice once for all (7<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>10</sup>). The Mediator of the new covenant has entered not into an earthly temple but into heaven itself, there to make continual intercession for His people (7<sup>25</sup>). The writer further emphasizes the superiority of the new covenant relationship of the spiritual Israel as being a fulfilment of the prophecy of Jer 31<sup>31-34</sup>, which presupposes that the old covenant had proved ineffective (He 8<sup>7</sup>). The Law is no longer to be written on tables of stone, but in the mind and the heart (v. 10).

In the Book of Revelation ancient Israel is referred to historically in connexion with Balaam, 'who taught Balak to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel' (2<sup>14</sup>). On the other hand, the symbolic or metaphorical use of the term applied to the spiritual Israel is found in connexion with the sealing of the servants of God which takes place according to the tribes of the children of Israel (7<sup>4</sup>), and also in the description of the New Jerusalem, where the names of the twelve tribes are engraven on the twelve gates (21<sup>12</sup>). The author of the Apocalypse, following the usage of St. Paul and the example of St. Peter (1<sup>1</sup>) and St. James (1<sup>1</sup>), applies the passage 7<sup>1-8</sup>, regarding the sealing of the tribes taken from a Jewish source, to the true spiritual Israel, who are to be kept secure in the day of the world's overthrow. It is the same class which is referred to in 7<sup>9-17</sup> who appear in heaven clothed in white robes and with palms in their hands (cf. J. Moffatt in EGT, 'Revelation,' 1910, p. 395 f.).

ISRAELITE.—An Israelite was one who belonged to the nation of Israel, regarded, more especially from the point of view of the nation, as the recipient of Divine favour and special privilege. An Israelite is a member of a chosen people and as such is the sharer of the blessings belonging to that people. It is a name of honour, and is to be distinguished from both 'Hebrew' and 'Jew,' the former being, at least in NT times, a Jew with purely national sympathies, who spoke the native Hebrew or Aramaic dialect of Palestine; while the Jew was one who belonged to the ancient race wherever he might be settled and whatever his views. Every Jew, however, regarded himself as a true Israelite, and prided himself on the privileges which he, as a member of the favoured nation, had received when other nations had been passed by. The Apostle Paul refers to these privileges when he describes his 'kinsmen according to the flesh' as Israelites 'whose is the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises' (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>). He knows the way in which the Jew boasts of them, and claims that he can share in that boasting as well as any of his detractors. 'Are they Israelites?—so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham?—so am I' (2 Co 11<sup>22</sup>). This feeling of exclusive national privilege led in many cases to the rejection of the gospel by the Jews, who did not wish their privileges to be extended to the heathen world. This rejection of his message by those who were Israelites by birth caused the Apostle to conceive of a true or spiritual Israelite as equivalent to a believer in Jesus Christ—one after the type of Nathanael of Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile (cf. art. ISRAEL). The Apostle applies the term in its natural sense to himself in Ro 11<sup>1</sup>, 'I also am an Israelite,' in order to show that all the members of the race have not been rejected by God, but that there is a remnant according to the election of grace—Israelites who are Israelites indeed, not merely by outward physical connexion, but also by moral and spiritual characteristics.

ISSACHAR.—See TRIBES.

ITALIAN BAND.—According to Ac 10<sup>1</sup>, the centurion Cornelius, of the σπεῖρα Ἰταλική, was in Cæsarea about A.D. 40. The adjective indicates that the 'cohort' (RVm) consisted of native Italians. Now, as a province of the second order, Judæa, of which Cæsarea was the administrative centre, was not garrisoned by legionaries, who were Roman citizens, but by auxiliaries, who were provincials. How, then, could an auxiliary cohort be called Italian? Josephus states that there were five cohorts, composed of citizens of Cæsarea and Sebaste, stationed in the former city at the time of the death of Herod Agrippa (Ant. XIX. ix. 2, XX. viii. 7), and Blass suggests (in loco) that one of the five may have been called the cohors Italica, as being composed of Roman citizens who had made their home in one or other of the two cities. Schürer has no doubt that one of the five is the Augustan cohort mentioned in Ac 27<sup>1</sup>, but he refuses to identify another (or the same one) with 'the Italian.' Indeed, while he produces monumental evidence that 'at some time or other a cohors Italica was in Syria,' he thinks that the story of Cornelius lies under suspicion, 'the circumstances of a later period having been transferred back to an earlier period' (HJP

I. ii. [1890] 53 f.). Ramsay regards this suspicion as groundless, and makes effective use (Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, 1898, p. 260 f.) of an inscription recently discovered at Carnuntum on the Upper Danube—the epitaph of the young soldier, Proculus, a subordinate officer (optio) in the second Italian Cohort, who died there while engaged on detached service from the Syrian army. Syrian troops, under Mucianus, were certainly engaged on the Lower Danube, and probably on the Upper, in 69 B.C. (Tacitus, Hist. iii. 46). When their campaign was ended, they were doubtless sent back to Syria; and the same legions frequently remained a very long period, sometimes for centuries, in one province.

'The whole burden of proof, therefore, rests with those who maintain that a Cohort which was in Syria before [A.D.] 69 was not there in 40. There is a strong probability that Luke is right when he alludes to that Cohort as part of the Syrian garrison about A.D. 40.' Besides, 'the entire subject of detachment-service is most obscure; and we are very far from being able to say with certainty that the presence of an auxiliary centurion in Cæsarea is impossible, unless the Cohort in which he was an officer was stationed there' (Ramsay, op. cit. 265, 268).

ITALY (Ἰταλία).—The name was originally confined to the extreme southern point of the Italian peninsula. For the Greeks of the 5th cent. B.C. it denoted the tract along the shore of the Tarentine Gulf, as far as Metapontum, and thence across to the Gulf of Posidonia. By the time of Polybius the name had been extended to the whole peninsula, for he speaks of Hannibal crossing the Alps into Italy, and of the plains of the Padus as part of Italy (Hist. ii. 14, iii. 39, 54). At a later time, it is true, Gallia Cisalpina was officially regarded as part of Cæsar's province, and therefore not strictly in Italy, which he did not enter till he crossed the Rubicon; but from the Augustan Age onward the word had its present-day meaning. Scarcely any country has more clearly-marked and obvious boundaries.

The Latin language was inscribed upon the Cross of Christ, but none of the books of the NT were written in it. The founders of Christianity were not so greatly influenced by Italian as by Hebraic and Hellenic ideals. Nor did Italy herself dream that she had any kind of evangel for the East which she conquered. Her plain task was to give and maintain law and order everywhere, and her Imperial ideal certainly found its counterpart in the apostolic conception of a world-wide Church. But her own spiritual mission, so far as she was conscious of having one, was merely to be the apostle of Hellenism, of which she had for some centuries been the disciple.

'The desire to become at least internally Hellenised, to become partakers of the manners and the culture, of the art and the science of Hellas, to be—in the footsteps of the great Macedonian—shield and sword of the Greeks of the East, and to be allowed further to civilise this East not after an Italian but after a Hellenic fashion—this desire pervades the later centuries of the Roman republic and the better times of the empire with a power and an ideality which are almost no less tragic than that political toil of the Hellenes failing to attain its goal' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 253).

Some of the cities of Italy—certainly Rome and Puteoli, and probably others, though there is no definite information on the point—had felt the presence of Judaism before they were offered Christianity. Josephus mentions the Jewish colony of Puteoli in his story of the Jewish impostor who claimed to be Alexander the son of Herod (c. 4 B.C.). 'He was also so fortunate, upon landing, as to bring the Jews that were there under the same delusion' (Ant. XVII. xii. 1), and 'he got very large presents' from them (BJ II. vii. 1); but Augustus himself was not so easily deceived (Ant. XVII. xii. 2). Over half a century later, the first Puteolan Christians, whose fellowship St. Paul enjoyed for a week on his way to Rome (Ac 28<sup>14</sup>), were evidently drawn from that same Jewish community and its proselytes. The presence of a great Jewish colony in Rome, dating from the time when Pompey brought his prisoners of war from Jerusalem, is abundantly attested by Latin historians and poets. It is equally certain that they made many proselytes. The swindling of Fulvia, 'a woman of great dignity, and one that had embraced the Jewish religion' (Ant. XVIII. iii. 5), by another Jew of the baser type was the signal for an outburst against the whole colony in the time of Tiberius (Tac. Ann. ii. 85; Suet. Tiber. 36). According to Ac 18<sup>2</sup> Claudius went the length of expelling all the Jews from Rome (cf. Suet. Claud. 25). Even if his decree only amounted to the interdicting of their assemblies (Dio Cassius, lx. 6), this milder measure would doubtless cause a great exodus from the city. Some of the exiles merely emigrated to the neighbourhood, perhaps to Aricia (for the evidence see E. Schürer, HJP II. ii. [1885] 238), but others went abroad. This was the occasion of the journey of Aquila and Priscilla 'from Italy' to Corinth (Ac 18-).

Italy was the destination of the prisoner Paul when he made his appeal to Cæsar (Ac 27<sup>1</sup>). The narrative of his journey from point to point—Cæsarea, Myra, Melita, Puteoli, and then overland by the oldest and most famous of Roman roads, the Via Appia—illustrates the fact that 'most of the realms of the ancient Roman Empire had better connections than ever afterwards or even now.' Dangers could not be wholly avoided, but 'travelling . . . was easy, swift, and secure to a degree unknown until the beginning of the nineteenth century' (L. Friedlander, Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire, 1908, i. 268).

In He 13<sup>24</sup> 'they of Italy' (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας) join the writer in sending salutations. οἱ ἀπὸ denotes persons who have come from the place indicated (cf. Mt 15<sup>1</sup>, Ac 6<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>-3</sup>). It is a mistake to imagine that the writer was himself in Italy, and that he was thinking of the Italian Christians around him there. On the contrary, the phrase implies that the author was absent from and writing to Italy, while there were in his company natives of Italy who had embraced Christianity, and who desired to be remembered to their believing compatriots in some part of the home-land. It is not an equally safe, but still a plausible, conjecture that Italy—probably Rome—was the writer's own home (see art. HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE).

IVORY (adj. ελεφάντινος, noun τὸ ελεφάντινον, fr. ἐλέφας; Skr. ebhas, Lat. ebur, Fr. ivoire).—Ivory was prized by all the civilized nations of antiquity. The OT contains a dozen references to its beauty and value. 'Every article of ivory' (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>) was found in the market of the apocalyptic Babylon (Rome). It was used for the adornment of palaces, for sculpture, for the inlaying of furniture and chariots, for numberless domestic and decorative objects. 'Ebur Indicum' (Hor. Car. i. xxxi. 6; cf. Verg. Georg. i. 57) was known to everyone. Statues (Georg. i. 480), sceptres (Ov. Met. i. 178), lyres (Hor. Car. ii. xi. 22), scabbards (Ov. Met. iv. 148), sword-hilts (Verg. Æn. xi. 11), seals (Cic. Verr. ii. iv. 1), couches (Hor. Sat. ii. vi. 103), doors (Verg. Æn. vi. 148), curule chairs (Hor. Ep. i. vi. 54) are samples of Roman workmanship in ivory. As the substance is so hard and durable, many ivory works of art have come down from the ancient world.

JACINTH (ῥάκινθος, Ital. giacinto).—Jacinth, or hyacinth, is the colour of the eleventh foundation-stone of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21<sup>20</sup>). The en-rasses of apocalyptic horsemen are partly hyacinthine (9<sup>17</sup>). The ῥάκινθος of the ancients was probably our sapphire (21<sup>20</sup> [RVm]). The modern hyacinth, a variety of zircon, of yellowish red colour, may have been the stone known in Gr. as λογυριον and in Heb. as leshem (the RV of Ex 28<sup>19</sup> 39<sup>12</sup> has 'jacinth' where the AV has 'figure'); but Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 620) suggests that the latter was yellow quartz or agate. Many Greek and Roman 'hyacinths,' used for intaglios and cameos, were probably only garnets.
JAMES STRAHAN.

JACOB (Ἰακώβ).—Jacob, the younger son of Isaac, was the father of the twelve patriarchs who were the heads of the tribes of Israel.

The story of the ante-natal struggle of Esau and Jacob (to which allusion is made in Hos 12<sup>3</sup>), and of the oracle spoken to their mother (Ro 9<sup>11</sup> || Gn 25<sup>23</sup>), is a folk-tale which vividly reflects the rivalries of Israel and Edom. The Hebrews boasted of their superiority to the powerful kindred race which dwelt on their southern border. To be more than a match for those hereditary foes, gaining the advantage over them either by force of arms or by nimbleness of wit, was a point of national honour. By hook or by crook the Israelites rarely failed to come off victorious over the Edomites. And the popular mind liked to think that the characteristics and fortunes of the two rival nations were mysteriously foreshadowed before the birth of their far-off ancestors. From the beginning God chose the younger son for Himself, and decreed that the elder should be servant to the younger. In the words of a prophet who on this matter expresses the general belief, God loved Jacob, but hated Esau (Mal 1<sup>2-3</sup>). St. Paul uses this Divine preference to illustrate that principle of election which he sees operating all through the history of Israel, and of which he finds startling contemporary evidence in the nation's apostasy from the Messiah, and God's choice of the Gentiles. That the elder brother (and nation) should serve the younger, that the natural heir should be foredoomed to lose the birthright and the blessing, that (apart from good or evil) the one should appear to be accepted and the other rejected—all this was evidence of an inscrutable selectiveness, by which God works out His universal purpose (ἡ κατ' ἐκλογὴν τοῦ θεοῦ πρόθεσις [see ESAU]). The election of grace (ἐκλογὴ χάριτος) is the central idea in St. Paul's philosophy of history. It is an attempt to give a rationale of the fact that 'Universal History, the history of what man has accomplished in this world, is at bottom the History of the Great Men who have worked here' (Carlyle, On Heroes and Hero-Worship, Lect. i.).

In a speech before the Sanhedrin, Stephen made allusion to the story of Jacob's sending his sons down to Egypt, of Joseph's sending for his father, and of Jacob's descent into Egypt and death there (Ac 7<sup>8-12-14</sup>). As an evidence of Jacob's faith, the writer of Hebrews selects a death-bed scene (11<sup>31</sup>). 'He blessed the two sons of Joseph,' giving them one of the finest benedictions ever uttered by human lips, invoking the God of history, providence, and grace to be their Shepherd-God (Gn 48<sup>15, 16</sup>). Then 'he worshipped leaning upon the top of his staff.' In the original (Gn 47<sup>31</sup>) this act precedes the blessing, and while the LXX reads 'upon the top of his staff,' other versions, including the English, have 'on the bed.' The difference of reading is due to Heb. punctuation (שָׁנָה 'the staff,' שָׁנָה 'the bed'), and does not greatly alter the sense. Jacob, who is here the ideal Israelite, gives conscious or unconscious proof of his faith by taking leave of life with a high dignity and solemnity. Meekly submitting himself to the will of God, he teaches all his posterity to worship the 'God of Jacob' with their latest breath.

Stephen refers (Ac 7<sup>46</sup>) to David's desire 'to find a habitation for the God of Jacob.' Here, too, Jacob is not an individual but a nation. The usage was common in every epoch of Hebrew literature: in the earliest period—'Come, curse me Jacob' . . . 'Who can count the dust of Jacob?' (Nu 23<sup>7, 10</sup>); in the Exile—'Fear not, thou worm Jacob' (Is 41<sup>14</sup>); and in the Maccabean age, when Judas 'made Jacob glad with his acts' (1 Mac 3<sup>7</sup>); after which it was naturally taken over into the NT. Jacob's other name 'Israel' had the same two senses, personal and national, a circumstance which gives piquancy to the Pauline dictum (Ro 9<sup>6</sup>): 'Not all who are of Israel (i.e. born of the patriarch) are Israel' (i.e. the chosen people of God). Many of them are only ὁ Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ σάρκα, Israelites by birth, whereas in a higher sense all Christians are ὁ Ἰσραὴλ τοῦ θεοῦ (Gal 6<sup>16</sup>). Naturally the name 'Jacob' never acquired this new meaning: Israel was the ideal people of God, whether Jewish or Gentile, Jacob the actual Jewish nation composed of very imperfect human beings. The two words are appropriately combined in St. Paul's prevision of a far-off Divine event which must be the goal of history: 'All Israel shall be saved, for . . . a Deliverer . . . shall turn away iniquity from Jacob' (Ro 11<sup>26</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

JAILOR.—The AV translates δεσμοφυλάξ in Ac 16<sup>38</sup> 'jailor,' and in vv. 27, 36 'keeper of the prison.' The RV adheres to the term 'jailor' in all three verses. The person so designated occupied the position of supreme authority as governor of the prison (cf. αρχιδεσμοφυλάξ, Gn 39<sup>22</sup> LXX), and must be distinguished from persons holding the subordinate position of guard or warder (φύλαξ, Ac 5<sup>23</sup> 12<sup>6</sup>; AV 'keeper'). It was to the custody of this official that the duumviri at Philippi committed St. Paul and Silas, with the strict injunction to 'keep them safely.' The fact that Philippi was a Roman colony lends a certain amount of probability to R. B. Rackham's suggestion that he was a Roman officer, occupying the rank of centurion (Com. on Acts, 1901). Chrysostom's attempt to identify him with Stephanas (1 Co 16<sup>15</sup>) overlooks the fact that Stephanas was among the 'firstfruits of Achaia,' not Macedonia; while a later suggestion that he was Epaphroditus, though it is more probable, lacks adequate data to support it.

Modern criticism seriously questions the credibility of the portion of the narrative (Ac 16<sup>25-34</sup>) containing the account of the jailor's conversion, on the ground of inherent improbabilities (B. Weiss, Weizsacker, Holtzmann, Harnack, Bacon, Cone). Most of the objections have been adequately dealt with by W. M. Ramsay in St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, pp. 221-223; and a summary of them, with their refutation, is given in an article by Giessekke (described in the ExpT ix. [1898] 274 f.). The legendary character of the narrative has been maintained for the further reason that it is not guaranteed by the 'we' section, which ends, it is alleged, with v. 24. 'Yet these verses betray such unimpeachable tokens of the style of St. Luke as to prevent us from even thinking of them as interpolated' (A. Harnack, Luke the Physician, Eng. tr., 1907, p. 113). Nor does it follow that the 'we' section ends with v. 24, because the first person is no longer used. After his separation from St. Paul and Silas, owing to their arrest and imprisonment, the narrator would, of necessity, proceed to describe the subsequent events, when he was no longer in their company, in the third person. The presence of the miraculous element, if the earthquake is to be so regarded, in no way militates against this assumption, for the 'we' sections are full of the supernatural' (Harnack, Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1909, p. 144).

Leaving aside the alleged improbabilities, it must be admitted that the description of the night-scene in the prison is most vivid and life-like. Assume the possibility of the earthquake, which in itself is a natural occurrence, treated in this case as a special instance of providential interference, and there is nothing absolutely inexplicable in the course of events which follows. The difficulties are largely due to the brevity of the narrative, which does not allow of entering into minute detail. The author (whether St. Luke or another) is not describing an 'escape' from prison, miraculous or otherwise, for the release of the captives takes place next morning. The interest of the narrative centres in the conversion of the jailor and his household, and it is as leading up to this most interesting and happy dénouement that the earlier incidents of the eventful night are depicted. When the main object of the story is borne in mind, the difficulties which it presents will not be regarded as sufficient to justify its wholesale rejection.

W. S. MONTGOMERY.

JAMES AND JOHN, THE SONS OF ZEBEDEE.

—1. In Synoptic Gospels.—The sons of Zebedee are mentioned in the following passages in the Synoptic Gospels. The call of the two brothers is related in Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup> (= Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>17</sup>). After the call of Andrew and Simon and their immediate response, Jesus goes on further and sees the two brothers James and John in their boat, mending their nets. Their response to His call is equally prompt; they leave their father and the hired servants in the boat and go away after Him. The Matthean account is practically identical with the Marcan, save for the omission of any reference to the hired servants, a characteristic cutting out of unnecessary detail. In these two accounts the call of the four disciples is the first event recorded after the beginning of the ministry; it is followed by the account of the entry into Capernaum and the teaching in the Synagogue. St. Luke in his Gospel places the incident later, after his record of events at Nazareth and Capernaum. It is not easy to determine whether his reason for the change is historical, to account for the promptness with which the call of an unknown stranger is obeyed, or whether he is following a different tradition. The relation of the Lucan account to the Johannine Appendix (ch. 21) is also difficult to determine. Competent scholars are found to maintain both the view that the Johannine narrative is based on an account (similar to the Lucan) of the call of Peter, and the view that St. Luke, in his record of the call to discipleship, has borrowed details from an account of a post-Resurrection appearance to Peter in Galilee. But the question has no direct bearing on the call of the sons of Zebedee, the Lucan additional matter having to do with Peter alone. The only detail which he adds with reference to John and James is that they were partners with Peter, which might have been deduced from the Marcan account. And the more obvious explanation of their prompt obedience is that suggested by the 1st chapter of St. John—previous acquaintance at an earlier stage, probably in connexion with the Baptist's preaching (cf. below, § 5).

In St. Mark's Gospel the four are represented as going with Jesus to Capernaum, and the same Evangelist also notices the presence of the sons of Zebedee in the house of Simon, on the occasion of the healing of his wife's mother. This detail finds no place in the other Gospels. Their names appear next in the calling of the Twelve where they are found in all three lists among the first four, the only difference being that St. Mark places them before, the other Synoptists after, Andrew; and St. Mark also adds the giving of the name Boanerges.

No thoroughly satisfactory explanation of either part of this word has been found. Boave is hardly a possible transliteration of בּוֹנֵי; it can only be accounted for on the supposition that it is due to conflation, either the o or the a being a correction of the other. The second half of the word has been connected with Aram. רַגֶּשׁ (=Heb. רַגֶּשׁ, tumultuatus est; cf. Ps 21, Ac 4<sup>25</sup>, and for רַגֶּשׁ, J1 314, streptitus, see Payne Smith, Thes. Syr. 1879-1901). But the root never has the meaning of 'thunder.' רַגֶּשׁ has also been suggested; cf. Job 37<sup>2</sup> בְּרָגֶשׁ, and 39<sup>24</sup> בְּרָגֶשׁ רַגֶּשׁ. But the meaning of the word is 'ragings,' not 'thunder.' Burkitt has suggested that the Syriac translator connected the word with Aram. רַגֶּשׁ (1 K 18<sup>11</sup> = רַגֶּשׁ 'crowd') of which he took רַגֶּשׁ for the status absolutus. Jerome conjectured that the name was originally בְּנֵי רַגֶּשׁ (on Dn 18, 'emendatus legitur bene-reem'), in which case the explanatory gloss, ὁ ὄνομα τοῦ βοανῆρος, is older than the corrupt transliteration; but it would be difficult to account for the corruption of a correct transliteration of בְּנֵי רַגֶּשׁ into Boavepyēs. Wellhausen suggests that possibly the name Ragasbal may point to Reges—'thunder,' a meaning of which he says no other trace is found (Ev. Marci<sup>2</sup>, 1909, p. 23).

We have no evidence as to the occasion of the giving of the name. The incident recorded in Lk 9<sup>54</sup> may have suggested it, or the character of the brothers. The later explanations which refer it to the power of their preaching do not give us any further information.*

The next mention of the brothers is in the story of the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5<sup>37</sup>, Lk 8<sup>51</sup>), where St. Mark and St. Luke record the admission of the three intimate disciples alone to the house of Jairus, a detail which does not appear in St. Matthew's account. All three Synoptists record the presence of the same three on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mk 9<sup>2</sup>, Mt 17<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28</sup>). The next recorded incident is that of the ambitious request (Mk 10<sup>35</sup>, Mt 20<sup>20</sup>), attributed by St. Mark to the brothers themselves, by St. Matthew to their mother on their behalf. The later character of the Matthean account is clearly seen in some details (use of προσκυνουσα; ἐπὶ for St. Mark's δὲς ἡμῶν; the omission of reference to the 'baptism' [?]), but the approved critical explanation of the change in the speaker is hardly convincing. To do honour to the sons of Zebedee by making them shield themselves behind their mother is a strange kind of reverence! The bearing of this incident on the question of the martyrdom of John must be discussed later. The indignation of the other disciples against the brothers is retained in both accounts. St. Luke omits the incident altogether. In Mk 13<sup>3</sup> (cf. Mt 24<sup>3</sup>, Lk 21<sup>7</sup>) the question which leads to the eschatological discourse is attributed to the four disciples, for which St. Matthew has οἱ μαθηταί, St. Luke τινες. In connexion with Gethsemane, the three are mentioned by name in Mk 14<sup>33</sup> and Mt 26<sup>37</sup>. St. Luke only mentions the disciples generally (22<sup>39</sup>; cf. v. 39).

* Cf. Cramer, Catena, 1844, i. p. 297, διὰ τὸ μέγα καὶ διαπρσιον, ἡχρησαι τῇ οἰκουμένη τῆς θεολογίας τὰ δογματα, and see Suicer, s.v. βροντή.

To these references, where the Synoptists seem to be almost wholly dependent on the Marcan account, we must add Lk 9<sup>54</sup>, the desire of James and John to call down fire from heaven on the inhospitable Samaritans, a story which may be connected with at least the interpretation of the name 'Boanerges.' On two occasions only is John mentioned without his brother. St. Mark (9<sup>38</sup>) and St. Luke (9<sup>49</sup>) record his confession that the disciples had 'forbidden' one who cast out devils in Jesus' name because he followed not with them. And St. Luke (22<sup>8</sup>) adds the detail that the disciples who were sent forward to prepare for the Passover were Peter and John.

In the Synoptic narrative, then, the sons of Zebedee are represented as forming with Peter, and occasionally Andrew, the most intimate group of the Lord's disciples. No special prominence is given to John; he almost always appears with his brother; thrice in St. Mark and once in St. Matthew he is characteristically described as 'the brother of James.' His position is very clearly that of the younger brother, who takes no independent lead. There is no reason to suppose that 'Q' contained any additional information about the brothers. The special sources on which St. Luke drew added a few details. It is noticeable that in the Lucan list of apostles the name of John precedes that of James. This corresponds with the history of the Acts, which must next be considered.

2. In Acts.—The sons of Zebedee are placed next to Peter in the list of apostles (Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), the name of John being placed before that of James, as in the Lucan Gospel. This is in accordance with the author's view, who assigns to John a place of importance second only to Peter in the history of the growth of the Church in Palestine. He is still the companion of Peter, as in the Gospel he was the 'brother of James,' but in Peter's company he is present at the healing of the lame man in the Temple (3<sup>1</sup>; see esp. v. 4: ἀνέστας δὲ Πέτρος εἰς αὐτὸν σὺν τῷ Ἰωάννῃ, and v. 11), and during the speech of Peter which follows. Apparently he is arrested with Peter (4<sup>1-3</sup>); at their examination the Rulers are said to notice the παρηγοία of Peter and John (4<sup>13</sup>), and he shares Peter's refusal to keep silence (4<sup>14</sup>). In 8<sup>14</sup> Peter and John are sent to Samaria in consequence of the spread of the faith there. After the imposition of hands, and the episode of Simon, their return to Jerusalem is recorded. There is no further mention of John in the Acts, except that in the account of his martyrdom James is described as the brother of John (12<sup>2</sup>). But the position assigned to John is fully borne out by the single reference to him in Gal 2<sup>9</sup>, as one of the 'pillars' who gave the right hand of fellowship to Paul and Barnabas, a passage which alone is adequate refutation* of the strange theory of E. Schwartz (Ueber den Tod der Söhne Zebedæi), who finds in the prediction assigned to Jesus in Mk 10<sup>39</sup> proof that both sons of Zebedee must have been killed by Herod on the same day! The account in Acts (12<sup>17</sup>) of the martyrdom of James at the Passover of the year 44 has been supposed to show traces of modification by cutting out any mention of the death of his brother (E. Preuschen, Apostelgeschichte, in Leitzmann's Handbuch zum NT, 1912, p. 75). The construction of v. 1, if harsh, is however not impossible, and the 'Western' addition in v. 3, ἡ ἐπιχείρησις αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τοῖς πιστοῖς (D Lat. [v. 3] v. 3<sup>cod</sup>) Syr. [h. 11<sup>ms</sup>]), even if original is adequately explained by the language of v. 1 (κακῶσαι τινάς).

3. Evidence of martyrdom of John.—The other evidence, however, for the martyrdom of John deserves serious consideration.

* Except on the hypothesis of a very early date for the Epistle to the Galatians.

(1) Papias.—So long as we had only the statement of Georgius Hamartolus (c. A.D. 850), or perhaps of some corrector of his text, whose additions are found in the Paris MS, Coislin. 305: [Ἰωάννης] μαρτυρίου κατηξίωται. Πάπιας γὰρ ὁ Ἱεραπόλεως ἐπίσκοπος, αὐτοπότης τούτου γενόμενος, ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ λόγῳ τῶν κυριακῶν λογίων φάσκει, ὅτι ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνγρέθη, it was possible, in the light of his reference to Origen, to explain the statement as due to homoioteleuton omission in his source of the Papias quotation, Ἰωάννης [μὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ Ῥωμαίων βασιλεως κατεδικάσθη μαρτυρῶν ἐς Πάτμον, Ἰάκωβος δὲ] ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνγρέθη. De Boor's discovery of the excerpts, probably going back to Philip of Side, in Cod. Baroccianus 142 (Oxford), among which is found the sentence, Πάπιας ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ λόγῳ λέγει, ὅτι Ἰωάννης ὁ θεολόγος καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ ἀδελφὸς αὐτοῦ ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνγρέθησαν places the matter in a wholly different position. There must have been some such statement about the death of John, the son of Zebedee, at the hands of the Jews, in Papias' work. As C. Clemen, whose discussion of the whole evidence should be consulted (Die Entstehung des Johannesevangeliums), says, this does not prove the historical accuracy of the statement, but it is important evidence of a different tradition from that which represents the son of Zebedee as living on in Ephesus to an advanced old age, and dying a peaceful death. Zahn's suggestion (Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., iii. 206), that the statement referred to John the Baptist, is hardly satisfactory in spite of the clear evidence of confusion between the two afforded by the Martyrologies. In the light of the common tradition, why should anyone have made the mistake? The silence of Eusebius is an important factor in the case, but it is not conclusive, as Harnack (Chronologie, Leipzig, 1897, p. 666) suggests, against the presence of such a sentence in Papias. Eusebius might well suppress as μυθικώτερον a statement so completely in contradiction to the received tradition on the subject. The real difficulty is to account for the growth of a different tradition at Ephesus, if the tradition of John's martyrdom was known at Hierapolis in Papias' time.

(2) The evidence of Heracleon (see Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. ix. 71) should never have been brought forward. Heracleon is distinguishing between those who confessed 'in life' and 'by voice' before the magistrates. No one could have included John among those who had not made the confession διὰ φωνῆς, in view either of Patmos or of the legend of the cauldron of oil. His absence from Heracleon's list therefore proves nothing.

(3) The evidence of the tract de Rebaptismate (Vienna Corpus, iii. p. 86), which shows that the saying of Mk 10<sup>38</sup> was interpreted of the baptism of blood, and the testimony of Aphraates (Homily 21), who speaks of James and John following in the footsteps of their Master, if they point to the tradition of martyrdom, also suggest the natural explanation of its origin, if it is not historical, viz. the attempt to find a literal fulfilment of the words of the Lord.

(4) The evidence of the Martyrologies also points to the same tradition, even if they are capable of another explanation. The Syriac Calendar which Erbes (ZKG xxv. [1904]) dates 411, and 341 for the part concerned, gives for Dec. 27: 'John and James, the Apostles, in Jerusalem.' Bernard's explanation that such a celebration does not necessarily imply martyrdom (see Irish Church Quarterly, i. [1908] 60 ff.) is not altogether convincing. The Latin Calendar of Carthage also gives for Dec. 27: 'Sancti Johannis Baptiste, et Jacobi Apostoli, quem Herodes occidit,' which may possibly point the same way, as June 24 is the day of commemoration of the Baptist. And according to Clemen (op. cit. p. 444) the Gothic Missal, 'which represents the Gallican Liturgy of the 6th or 7th century,' represents James and John as martyrs.

The evidence is certainly not negligible. Whether the tradition owes its existence to attempts to interpret the Synoptic saying, or is a reminiscence of actual fact, is in the light of our present knowledge difficult to determine. From the available evidence we must regard the martyrdom of John the son of Zebedee as probable. But as to time and place our ignorance is complete. Erbes' suggestion that the son of Zebedee met his death in Samaria in the troubles of the year 66 (ZKG xxxiii. [1912]) cannot be discussed fully here. It cannot be said to have risen above the class of ingenious conjectures, out of which it is unsafe to attempt to reconstruct history. The Synoptic saying about the cup and baptism (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>) is certainly insufficient proof of actual martyrdom. St. Mark, and even the other Synoptists, have much matter which later reflexion found it necessary to modify or did not care to emphasize. But everything was not cut out which caused difficulty. And we may perhaps venture to say that there are traces of modification and omission in regard to this very saying which suggest that it did cause difficulty. St. Matthew drops the mention of the baptism, retaining only the drinking of the cup, and St. Luke omits the incident altogether. The position assigned to John, as compared with James, in the Acts would be difficult to explain if he met with an early death.

4. John's residence in Ephesus.—Even if the story of John's death at the hand of the Jews is historical, it does not exclude the possibility of his residence at Ephesus, though it certainly overthrows the traditional account of his long residence there till the reign of Trajan and his wonderful activity in extreme old age as the last surviving apostle and 'over-bishop' of Asia.

In the question of the Apostle's residence in Ephesus we are confronted with another problem of which our present knowledge offers no certain solution. The absence of any reference to such a residence in the later books of the NT affords no conclusive evidence against the possibility that John visited Asia and resided there. The silence of the Ignatian letters is more significant. Why are the Romans reminded (Ep. ad Rom. iv. 3) of what Peter and Paul did for them, and the Ephesians addressed as Παῦλον συμμύστει (Ep. ad Eph. xii. 2), while there is no mention of John in the Ephesian Epistle? The immediate occasion of the reference to Paul—the passing through Ephesus of martyrs 'on their way to God'—precluded the mention of John. But the reference in the preceding chapter to the presence of apostles at Ephesus (xi. 2: οἱ καὶ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις πάντοτε συνῆσαν)—even if συνῆσαν and not συνήσαν be the true text—is not much to set against the absence of any direct reference.

The fact that Polycarp never mentions him in his Epistle to the Philipians has very little bearing on the question. The natural interpretation of Papias' Prologue is that at the time when he was collecting his information (c. A.D. 100) John the son of Zebedee was dead. His name occurs in the list, introduced by the past tense τί εἶπεν; as contrasted with the ἄτε λέγουσιν which follows. But this does not preclude an earlier residence at Ephesus.

It is probable that Polycrates of Ephesus, in his list of the μεγάλα στοιχεία of Asia which he gives in his letter to Victor of Rome (A.D. 190), regards as the son of Zebedee the John whom he places—no doubt in the chronological order of their deaths—after Philip 'the Apostle.' But his account of the ἐπιστήθιος is clearly legendary, and sufficient time had elapsed since the death of the John of

Ephesus (? 110), to whom he refers, for the growth of confusion, whether 'deliberate' or unconscious.

The evidence against the Asiatic residence of the Apostle which Corssen (ZNTW v. [1901], p. 2 ff.) finds in the Vita Polycarpi has been carefully discussed by Clemen (p. 421). It is not conclusive.

It is impossible to repeat in detail the well-known evidence of Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria, for the accepted tradition of their time. It is too wide-spread to be derived from any one single source, and is difficult to reconcile with the view that the son of Zebedee had no connexion at all with Asia and Ephesus. However we interpret the relation of Irenæus to Polycarp, and the former's account of the latter in his Letter to Florinus, we cannot be sure that the John of whom Polycarp used to speak was really the Apostle and not the 'Elder,' or the author of the Apococalypse (if these two are not to be identified). Justin's attribution of the Apocalypse to the Apostle proves that the tradition connecting his name with Asia is at least as old as the middle of the 2nd century. And if Irenæus derived from Papias not only the words of the Elders but also the description which he gives of them, the words 'non solum Joannem, sed et alios apostolos' (Iren. II. xxii. c.) would show that Papias also knew of the tradition.

On the whole, the least unsatisfactory explanation of the evidence, with all its difficulties and complexities, is the hypothesis that the Apostle did spend some years of his later life in Ephesus, where he became the hero of many traditions which belonged of right to another or to others.

5. The Fourth Gospel.—The use which may be made of the Fourth Gospel as a source of information about the sons of Zebedee depends on questions of authorship which cannot be discussed in this article. They are never mentioned by name in the Gospel, and only once in the Appendix (21-). Probably the author of this Appendix identified the 'disciple whom Jesus loved' with the younger son of Zebedee, and not with one of the ἄλλοι δύο, unless indeed he intends to introduce a new-comer in v. 20. He certainly identifies the loved disciple with the author of the Gospel (v. 24, if this verse comes from his pen). The natural interpretation of 19<sup>35</sup> distinguishes between the author and that disciple, if the 'witness' of that verse is to be identified with the loved disciple. The only other definite references to the disciple whom Jesus loved are 19-6 ('Behold thy son') and 13<sup>23</sup> (the unmasking of the Traitor). The customary identification of him with the ἄλλος μαθητής of 18<sup>15c</sup> (known to the high priest who gained admission for Peter into the αὐλή) and of 20<sup>36c</sup> (who went with Peter to the Tomb), is probable but not necessary. He is usually found in the other disciple of the Baptist, who at his suggestion followed Jesus (1<sup>37</sup>). The phrase τὸν ἀδελφὸν τὸν ἰδίον Σίμωνα cannot be pressed to indicate this. In the Greek of the period ἰδὸς is hardly more than synonymous with the possessive pronoun. And the natural interpretation of the passage is that Andrew first finds his (own) brother Simon, and next day, when wishing to return home to Galilee, Philip, to whom Jesus says, 'Follow me.' At the same time the whole story of Jesus' first meeting with the disciples who came over to Him from John contains much which is difficult to explain (see, however, M. Dibelius, Die urchristl. Überlieferung von Johannes d. Täufer in Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des alten und neuen Testaments, Göttingen, 1911, p. 106 ff.) as apologetic invention. It suggests the recollection of early and treasured experiences, and gives a wholly probable account of the relations between Jesus and John, and the undoubted connexion between the two, to which the Synop-tists bear witness, though other and later elements in the story are abundantly clear.

On the whole, though the pre-eminence of John in the Synoptic account is hardly such that he must have appeared in the Fourth Gospel, if he were not the author, yet the facts of the Gospel and the traditions of later times about it are most easily explained by the view that 'behind the Gospel stands the Son of Zebedee' (see Harnack, Chronologie).

A. E. BROOKE.

JAMES, THE LORD'S BROTHER.—In Mk 6<sup>3</sup> (|| Mt 13<sup>35</sup>) James is mentioned first, presumably as the eldest, among the brethren of Jesus. In Mk 3<sup>21</sup>. 31 ff. (|| Mt 12<sup>46</sup> f., Lk 8<sup>16</sup> f.) we hear of an attempt on the part of Jesus' mother and His brethren to restrain Him as being 'beside himself.' In Jn 7<sup>3</sup> we are told that 'his brethren did not believe on him.' In 1 Co 15<sup>7</sup>, however, St. Paul mentions an appearance of the risen Jesus to James.

According to the curious story which Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. ii.) quotes from the Gospel of the Hebrews, James (represented as present at the Last Supper) had vowed not to eat until he should see Jesus risen from the dead. Jesus accordingly appeared to him first and took bread and blessed and brake, saying, 'My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man is risen from them that sleep.'

In Gal 1<sup>19</sup> we find James closely associated with the apostles at Jerusalem, and in Gal 2<sup>9</sup> we hear how those who were 'accounted pillars'—James and Cephas and John—wished God-speed to Paul and Barnabas in their mission to the Gentiles. There is perhaps a hint of irritation in St. Paul's reference, a few verses earlier, to those 'who were accounted somewhat' (2<sup>6</sup>), as though the accord had not been reached without some difficulty, and in v. 12 we find that St. Peter's vacillation in the matter of intercourse with the Gentiles is attributed to the fear of certain who came 'from James,' though it does not follow that they represented his attitude. In Acts, James always appears as a leader. St. Peter sends the news of his escape 'to James and the brethren' (12<sup>17</sup>). At the Apostolic Conference he sums up the discussion, proposes a policy, and apparently drafts the decree (15<sup>13-1</sup>). In 21<sup>18</sup> f. he receives St. Paul at the close of his Third Missionary journey, and, it is implied, approves the fateful proposal designed to conciliate the legalist Christians.

He is understood to be meant by the modest self-designation 'James the servant of the Lord' (Ja 1<sup>1</sup>), and the author of the Ep. of Jude is content to describe himself as the 'brother of James.' In view of the fact that he seems to have remained constantly at Jerusalem, it is at least uncertain whether he is included among the brethren of the Lord who 'led about' a wife (1 Co 9<sup>3</sup>).

That the 'brethren of the Lord' were the sons of Mary and Joseph is the natural, though not inevitable, inference from the language of Scripture (Mt 1-2, Lk 2<sup>7</sup>, Mk 6<sup>3</sup>, etc.). Those who prefer to believe otherwise, hold either (1) that they were the sons of Joseph by a former marriage, or (2) the sons of Mary's sister. These three views are sometimes called, respectively, from their early defenders, the Helvidian, Epiphonian, and Hieronymian. (For discussion see J. B. Mayor, The Ep. of St. James<sup>3</sup>, pp. vi-xxxvi; J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians<sup>5</sup>, 1876, pp. 252-291; and art. 'Brethren of the Lord' in HDB, DCG, and SDB.)

Turning to the extra-canonical references, we find in Josephus (Ant. xx. ix. 1) an account of the circumstances of the death of James. The high priest Ananus (a son of the Annas of the Gospels), a man of violent temper, seized the opportunity of the interval between the death of Festus (c. A.D. 62) and the arrival of his successor Albinus to bring to trial 'James the brother of Jesus who was called Christ and some others' as law-breakers, and delivered them to be stoned. This account is inherently probable. It is sometimes rejected as an interpolation, on the ground that Josephus makes no other mention of Jesus or of Christianity; but it may be noted that F. C. Burkitt has lately defended the genuineness of the famous reference to Jesus in Josephus, Ant. xviii. iii. 3 (ThT xliii. [1913] pp. 135-144). Harnack has signified agreement (Internationale Monatsschrift, vii. [1913] pp. 1037-1068). If this be accepted, the present passage presents little difficulty. Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. HE ii. 23) gives a much more highly coloured account of James's martyrdom, representing him as hurled from the pinnacle of the Temple because he refused to make a pronouncement against Jesus (which the Scribes and Pharisees had confidently expected of him!). Among other personal traits Hegesippus mentions that James was a Nazirite and strict ascetic, and that, so constant was he in prayer, his knees had become hard as a camel's. There is a variant of the martyrdom story in Clem. Recog. l, lxix., lxx., where, after James has shown 'by most abundant proofs that Jesus is the Christ,' a tumult is raised by an enemy, and he is hurled from the Temple steps and left for dead, but recovers.

The tendency to exalt the position of James in later times is seen in the statement of Clem. Alex. (ap. Euseb. HE ii. 1) that Peter and James and John chose him to be bishop of Jerusalem; while in the letter of Clement prefixed to the Clem. Hom. he is addressed as 'lord,' and 'bishop of bishops.'

**JAMES, EPISTLE OF.—1. Literary characteristics.—The Epistle strikes us at once as the expression of a vigorous personality. The author plunges into his subject with a bold paradox, and his short, decisive sentences fall like hammer-strokes. He constantly employs the imperative, and makes much use of the rhetorical question. His rebukes contain some of the sharpest invective in the NT (4<sup>1</sup> 4 5<sup>1-6</sup>), and he knows when irony will serve him best (2<sup>19</sup>). He piles up metaphor upon metaphor until the impression becomes irresistible (3<sup>3-12</sup>), and multiplies attributes with the same effect of emphasis (e.g. 'earthly, sensual, devilish' [3<sup>10</sup>; cf. 1<sup>4</sup> 8. 19]). Like most vigorous writers, he delights in antithesis (cf. 1<sup>9f</sup>. 1<sup>22</sup>. 2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>). In his illustrations he uses direct speech with dramatic effect ('sit thou here in a good place,' etc. [2<sup>3</sup>; cf. 2<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>]). Every here and there are struck out, like sparks from the flint of this rather hard-edged style, phrases of arresting beauty and significance: 'the crown of life which the Lord promised to them that love him' (1<sup>12</sup>); 'the grace of the fashion of it perisheth' (1<sup>11</sup>); 'mercy glorieth against judgement' (2<sup>13</sup>); 'What is your life? For ye are a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away' (4<sup>14</sup>); 'Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, being patient over it, until it receive the early and latter rain' (5<sup>7</sup>); 'the supplication of a righteous man, when it puts forth its strength, availeth much' (5<sup>16</sup>).

The form is, in the main, the terse, gnomic form of the Wisdom literature, but the spirit that inspires it has deeper roots. It goes back to OT prophecy. It is an Amos that we seem to hear in the vigorous denunciation of 5<sup>1-6</sup>; Isaiah is the direct inspirer of the stately passage in 1<sup>10f</sup>., and the writer has distilled the quintessence of the prophets into that fine saying which sums up his teaching and comes home with special force to the modern world: 'Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to succour (cf. Lk 1<sup>68</sup>) the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world' (1<sup>27</sup>).

It is in part, at least, owing to this gnomic style and prophetic temper that the Epistle does not form a logically constructed whole, according to Western theories of composition. This is not to say that it has no cohesion. A considerable part of it is grouped round three or four main ideas—temptation, the bridding of the tongue, the danger of lip-religion, the relation of rich and poor. Within and between these groups the movement is determined, to an extent which seems curious to our ways of thought, by verbal associations. The emphatic word of one sentence becomes a catch-word linking it to the next.

It may be worth while to analyze a paragraph with a view to bringing this out. The salutation, 'James . . . to the twelve tribes . . . giveth joy' (1<sup>1</sup>), supplies the key-word for the apparently abrupt opening: 'And joy unmixed count it, brethren, when . . . ' (v. 1). Again, 'that ye may be perfect, lacking nothing' (v. 4). And if any lack wisdom [for the apparently abrupt introduction of wisdom, see below], let him ask . . . ' (v. 5), but let him ask in faith' (v. 6). This idea is then developed up to the end of v. 8. The transition to v. 9, 'Now let the lowly brother,' etc., is apparently again abrupt (see below). Verse 12 returns, as though vv. 4-11 might be considered as a digression, to the idea of temptation, and, passing from the sense of 'trial' to that of 'inducement to evil,' deals with some difficulties connected therewith. It is interesting to note that two abrupt transitions in the above can be explained, with considerable probability, as due to literary reminiscence. In v. 5 we want a connexion between 'wisdom,' which appears unexpectedly, and the ideas of 'perfect' and 'lacking'; and this certainly seems to be supplied by Wis 9<sup>6</sup>: 'For even if a man be perfect among the sons of men, yet if he wisdom that cometh from thee be not with him, he shall be held in no account.' Again in v. 9, where the transition appears quite abrupt, a connexion with the central idea of wisdom is supplied by Sir 11<sup>1</sup>: 'The wisdom of the lowly shall lift up his head,' and with the next verse Sir 3<sup>18</sup> may be compared: 'The greater thou art, humble thyself the more, and thou shalt find favour before the Lord' (cf. also, for the double antithesis, Sir 20<sup>11</sup>).

2. Religious attitude and teaching.—The main purpose of the Epistle is to protest against prevailing worldliness (4<sup>1</sup>), which finds expression in avarice (4<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>), pleasure-seeking (1<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>), the vaunt of a barren orthodoxy (2<sup>14f.</sup>), social arrogance and sycophancy (2<sup>1f</sup>), bitter contentions (4<sup>1f.</sup>), sins of the tongue (1-6 3<sup>5-10</sup>). Against these the author holds up the ideal of a life inspired by the 'wisdom which is from above' (3<sup>17</sup>), which here plays the part assigned to the Spirit (as gift) in St. Paul and the NT generally. (With 3<sup>17</sup> cf. Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, and with 1<sup>5</sup> cf. Lk 11<sup>13</sup> and Jn 3<sup>34</sup>.) This heavenly wisdom is above all things 'pure' (αγνη), primarily no doubt in the sense of unstained loyalty to God (cf. the reference in 4<sup>4</sup> to the worldly-minded as μοιχαλίδες, and see 2 Co 11-), and expresses itself in humility (1<sup>10</sup>), meekness (1<sup>19f</sup>. 3<sup>13</sup>), reasonableness (3<sup>17</sup>), peaceableness (3<sup>17f</sup>), mercifulness (2<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>), whole-hearted earnestness (3<sup>1f</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>. 8), active beneficence (1<sup>27</sup> 3<sup>17</sup>), dependence on the Divine will (4<sup>7</sup>. 10. 15), obedience inspired by faith (2<sup>21-25</sup>). It has often been remarked that purely theological conceptions occupy little space in the Epistle. And this is literally true; but there is a good deal of compressed theology in expressions like 'of his own will he brought us to birth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of firstfruits of his creatures' (1<sup>18</sup>; cf. Jn 1<sup>13</sup> 6<sup>63</sup>, Ro 10<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>19f.</sup>), 'the implanted word, which is able to save your souls' (1<sup>-1</sup>; cf. Ro 1<sup>16</sup>), 'the perfect law of liberty' (1<sup>25</sup>; cf. Mt 5<sup>17-20</sup>, Ro 8<sup>2</sup>), 'heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him' (2<sup>5</sup>), 'the parousia of the Lord is at hand' (5<sup>8</sup>); not to mention 2<sup>1</sup>, if with some very good scholars we take τῆς δόξης as in apposition to τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and understand 'our Lord Jesus Christ, the glory' (in conformity with 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>, He 1<sup>3</sup>, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>), as a reference to the Incarnation. It is remarkable, however, that the Epistle contains no reference to the Death and Resurrection of Jesus, or, in connexion with such a passage as 5<sup>10f.</sup>, to His earthly life.

The writer is apparently little interested in questions of organization (cf. the Didache, Clement, Ignatius). It is only incidentally that we hear of the 'elders of the Church' (5<sup>14</sup>)—the only officials mentioned; and we infer, rather than are told, that the teaching office was not strictly regulated (3<sup>1</sup>). Incidental, too, is the mention of the meeting for worship (2<sup>2</sup>), and we hear nothing as to its conduct. (For συναγωγή in the sense of a Christian assembly cf. Herm. Mand. xi. 9; Ignat. ad Polyc. iv. 2.)

3. Reception in the Church.—Re-ascending the stream of tradition from the point at which our present NT canon may be considered as definitely established in the Western Church (Third Council of Carthage, A.D. 397), we find that the acceptance of the Ep. of James long remained dubious. Jerome, de Vir. Illustr. ii. (A.D. 392) says that, while some asserted it to have been issued by another under the name of James ('ab alio quodam sub nomine eius edita'), it had gradually, as time went on, established its authority. Eusebius, HE iii. 25 (c. A.D. 314) mentions it along with Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, among the books which, although widely known, were 'disputed' (ἀντιλεγόμενα). Again, in ii. 23, after mentioning the martyrdom of James, he proceeds: 'whose epistle that is said to be which is first among the Epistles styled Catholic,' adding that it was not free from suspicion (lit. 'is held spurious' [sc. by some]), because many ancient writers make no mention of it, as was also the case with Jude, though all the Catholic Epistles were publicly read in most churches. Origen (c. 240) suggests the same uncertainty when he refers to it as the Epistle 'which goes under the name of James' (ἡ φερομένη Ἰακώβου ἐπιστολή [in Ioann. xix. 6]), though according to the Latin version of the Homilies he elsewhere quotes it as Scripture (Com. in Ep. ad Rom. iv. 1), and as by 'James the Lord's brother' (ib. iv. 8). It is noteworthy that in his Com. in Matt. (x. 17) he mentions the Ep. of Jude but not that of James. The Muratorian Canon omits it, along with Hebrews and 1 and 2 Peter (on the other hand, the Peshitta includes it, while omitting Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and the Apocalypse). Clement of Alexandria is said to have included a commentary on 'Jude and the rest of the Catholic Epistles' in his Hypotyposesis (Euseb. HE vi. 14); but, while his notes on 1 Peter, 1 and 2 John, and Jude are extant in a Latin translation, James is wanting. As regards the indirect evidence of quotations, the earliest work for which a dependence on James can be established with any high degree of probability is the Shepherd of Hermas, which is variously dated between A.D. 100 and 150. (For Hermas' use of James see the art. by C. Taylor in JPh xviii. [1890] 297 ff. on the priority of the Didache to Hermas.) Some critics are inclined to see in Clement of Rome evidences of the use of James. But none of the passages are decisive, and in an extended reference to the faith of Abraham (ad Cor. x. 1 ff.) Clement quotes Gn 15<sup>6</sup> in its proper context, following St. Paul; and, though he refers to the sacrifice of Isaac, he speaks of it as offered δι' ὑπακοῆς and not διὰ πίστεως.

4. Date and authorship.—As might perhaps have been expected from the character of the external evidence, the internal evidence is enigmatic. This will appear from a statement of some of the various theories, with the difficulties which each involves.

A. Take first the theory which, accepting the traditional authorship,* makes the Ep. prior to the main Epp. of St. Paul and unrelated to his teaching. Against this the following objections are alleged.

(a) There is strong evidence, it is held, that the passage in 2<sup>14f.</sup> has in view St. Paul's teaching in Ro 3 and 4, and is therefore subsequent to that Epistle. The arguments advanced in favour of this position are as follows. (1) In denying that a man is saved by faith without works, James is attacking a paradox; but no one is at pains to attack a paradox unless someone else has previously maintained it. Now there is no evidence that this paradox had been maintained previous to St. Paul. Faith had been praised and works had been praised, and, if we may accept 2 Esdras (whatever its actual date) as a witness to pre-Christian Jewish beliefs, the combination of faith and works had been praised (13<sup>3</sup>; cf. 9<sup>7</sup>), but the antithetic opposition of faith and works, to the apparent disparagement of the latter, originated, so far as our evidence goes, with St. Paul. (2) The Scripture example to which both writers appeal is much more favourable to St. Paul's argument than to James's. In Gn 15<sup>6</sup> 'Abraham believed God,' etc., refers specifically to belief in God's promise; James by an exegetical tour de force gives it a prospective reference to Abraham's 'works' in the sacrifice of Isaac. This is the procedure, not of a writer who is choosing his illustrations freely, but of one who must at all hazards wrest from an adversary a formidable weapon. (3) The passage is written in a technical phraseology: δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως, δικαιοῦσθαι ἐξ ἔργων, πίστις χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων, νεκρός (applied to faith, where St. Paul applies it to works). It is less probable, it is urged, that this terminology was invented by James, who only employs it in this controversial passage, than by St. Paul, for whom it is the necessary expression of some of his fundamental doctrines.

(b) In a number of other passages there are points of contact, and in some of them the suggestion of literary priority is distinctly on the side of St. Paul. For example, if we compare St. Paul's statement in Ro 8<sup>2</sup>, 'the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free (ἡλευθέρωσέ με [v.l. σε]) from the law of sin and death,' with James's references to the law of liberty (νόμος τῆς ἐλευθερίας [1<sup>25</sup> 2<sup>12</sup>]), the latter succinct, technical-looking expression has the air of an already coined and current phrase, while St. Paul seems to be stating a fact of experience.†

(c) With the exception of the language of Hebrews, the Greek is the most accomplished in the NT. There is a certain amount of rhetorical elaboration; there is an unusual proportion of non-LXX classical words; there are many allusions to the Hellenistic Wisdom literature, and apparently some to Greek classical literature. This is not exactly the style we should have expected from the James of tradition, who was of intensely Jewish sympathies and presided over the Aramaic-speaking church of Jerusalem. On the other hand, the possibility of its being a translation is denied by the great majority of those competent to speak on the point (whatever their opinion as regards the authorship).

* The term 'genuineness' is strictly inapplicable, since the Ep. makes no explicit claim to be by James the Lord's brother. It has occasionally been attributed to James the son of Zebedee. Pfeleiderer (Primitive Christianity, Eng. tr., London, 1906-11, iv. 311) thinks of some unknown James.

(d) The constitution of the membership of the Church, including a considerable proportion of rich people, does not point to an early date.

(e) While it would be rash to affirm that a declension of Christian life such as the Epistle implies could not have taken place within two or three decades, the vices of avarice and worldliness which are most prominent suggest a more settled and prosperous community than we should have expected.

(f) In the rebuke of the rich merchants for the irreligious temper in which they laid their plans, we should have expected, in these early decades, a reference to the imminence of the Parousia, rather than merely to the uncertainty of the individual life.

(g) We should also have expected some reference to the Death and Resurrection of Christ, and to Messianic doctrine, which, as all the evidence seems to show, formed the staple of early Christian preaching.

(h) The address itself constitutes a difficulty. If, as seems natural in a Christian writing, it means Jewish Christians in the literal Diaspora, where were these to be found prior to the Pauline missions? Moreover, there is no hint that the churches addressed contained Gentile Christians. But were there ever any purely Jewish-Christian churches except in Palestine? And how could they be described as in the Diaspora?

To these objections the following answers are given:

(a) (1) While we have no evidence on the point, it is not improbable, in view of the stress laid upon faith in the teaching of Jesus, that the faith-and-works paradox may have come up in early Christianity prior to St. Paul. (2) Abraham was, in the Jewish schools, a stock example of faith (see Lightfoot, Gal.<sup>5</sup>, London, 1876, p. 159 f.), so that James and St. Paul might have introduced him quite independently of one another; and the following passage shows that James's rather loose employment of Gn 15<sup>6</sup> is not peculiar to himself: 1 Mac 25<sup>2</sup>, 'Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness?' Mayor reverses the point of the argument by remarking that it is inconceivable, if James wrote after St. Paul, that he did not make an attempt to guard his position against so formidable an attack (Ep. of St. James<sup>3</sup>, p. xcvi). (3) The technical language may have been already in existence (see under (1)). Moreover, some of the terms used occur in a more clearly defined form in St. Paul (cf. Ro 3<sup>20</sup>. 22. 26. 28: εργα νομου, πιστις Χριστού or Ιησού Χριστού)—which points to a later date and a deliberate guarding against misunderstanding.

(b) Arguments of this kind depend so much upon subjective impression that no great stress can be placed on them.

(c) There is a good deal of evidence that Galileans were generally bilingual; and, as there was certainly a large Greek-speaking element in the church at Jerusalem, the leader of that church would need to acquire some facility in using Greek. Moreover, it is quite possible to exaggerate the excellence of the author's Greek. He avoids periods of any length; and, though more 'correct,' does not give the impression of writing with the same ease as St. Paul.

(d) (e) We have no sufficient evidence to enable us to pronounce definitely on these points, and individual estimates of probability are not an adequate ground on which to base arguments. Mayor refers those who are impressed with the declension of Christian morals 'to a study of the life of Fox or Wesley, or of any honest missionary journal' (op. cit. p. cliii).

(f) The author may be here using an argumentum ad hominem. Individual mortality was an undeniable fact; a reference to the imminence of the Parousia would depend for its impressiveness on the liveliness of the faith of those addressed. A little further on, when encouraging the faithful oppressed to patience, the author does refer to the Parousia.

(g) These facts were the staple of missionary preaching; here the author can assume them as known.

(h) Zahn (Introd. i. 76 f., 91 f.) takes the address as referring metaphorically to Christians generally, the existing Christians being, as a matter of fact, those of the Palestinian churches. Mayor (p. cxxxvii) refers it to the Christians of the Eastern Diaspora (cf. Ac 2<sup>9</sup> and St. Paul's raid on the Christians of Damascus [Ac 9<sup>2f</sup>]).

Further positive arguments in favour of the 'genuineness' and early date of the Ep. are: (a) the unassuming character of the writer's self-designation, which makes against forgery, while his authoritative tone implies a position of influence; (β) the number of apparent echoes from sayings of Jesus, which yet never take the form of quotations from the Gospels; (γ) the number of linguistic coincidences with the speech of James at the Apostolic Conference, and the Decree, which was apparently drafted by him (salutation χαίρειν [1<sup>1</sup> || Ac 15<sup>23</sup>]; name called 'upon' persons [LXX] [2<sup>7</sup> || Ac 15<sup>14</sup>]; 'hearken, brethren' [2<sup>5</sup> || Ac 15<sup>13</sup>]; ἐπισκεπτεσθαι [12<sup>7</sup> || Ac 15<sup>14</sup>]; ἐ-ιστρεφεῖν [19<sup>6</sup> || Ac 15<sup>19</sup>]; τῇρειν, διατρεῖν εαυτοῦς ἀπο [1-2 || Ac 15-3]; repetition of brethren (brother) [4<sup>11</sup> || Ac 15<sup>23</sup>]). (In favour of the historicity of the Decree see Lake, Earlier Epp. of St. Paul, 1911, pp. 30 ff., 48 ff.) (δ) In favour of an early date we have the unorganized character of the teaching office (3<sup>1</sup>), the mention of elders only (5<sup>14</sup>), the anointing of the sick with a view to healing (5<sup>14</sup>), the confession of sins one to another (5<sup>15</sup>).

B. Those who, while holding the traditional view as to the authorship, feel obliged to recognize in Ja 2<sup>14f.</sup> a reference to Pauline teaching, have recourse to the hypothesis that the Ep. was written either after the appearance of Romans or at least after James had received reports as to the Pauline teaching. Against this, the objection lies that, once the controversies raised by St. Paul's preaching had begun, it is inconceivable that an Ep. written to Jewish Christians of the Diaspora should contain no reference to the burning questions about the relation of Gentile converts to circumcision and the Law (cf. Mayor, pp. ex, exlv f., and Zahn, Introd. i. 136 f.). The present writer is not aware that any satisfactory answer has been given to this objection.*

C. The hypothesis that the Ep. is an originally Jewish work adapted by a Christian writer has been maintained by Spitta and Massebieau (see Literature below) on the ground of (1) the scantiness of specifically Christian doctrine—an unmistakably Christian reference is admitted only in 1<sup>1</sup> and 2<sup>1</sup>; (2) close affinities with Jewish literature; (3) the suggestion of interpolation in the curious position of τῆς δόξης in 2<sup>1</sup>, where a simplification would be introduced by omitting ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

To this it is replied (1) that there is more specifically Christian doctrine than these writers admit: e.g. in 1<sup>18</sup> the combination of the ideas of 'begetting,' 'word of truth,' and 'firstfruits' is much more naturally referred to Christian doctrine than to the original creation (as Spitta); and phrases like 'the coming (Parousia) of the Lord' (5<sup>7-8</sup>), 'the perfect law of liberty' (1<sup>25</sup>), 'the elders of the church' (5<sup>14</sup>), 'the goodly name by which ye are called' (2<sup>7</sup>), 'my beloved brethren' (1<sup>16</sup>, 19<sup>25</sup>), certainly suggest a Christian atmosphere. No evidence is produced that a faith-and-works controversy such as that implied in 2<sup>14f</sup>. had arisen in pre-Christian Judaism. (2) That the work should show close affinities with the OT and with Jewish Hellenistic literature is in no way surprising if the author was a Jewish Christian. (3) That a Christian interpolator should have been content to interpolate only in 1<sup>1</sup> and 2<sup>1</sup> is hardly conceivable. Accepting the text of 2<sup>1</sup> as it stands, there is nothing very violent in taking τῆς δόξης as an appellation of Christ, in apposition with τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; cf. Lk 2<sup>32</sup> and perhaps 1 P 4<sup>14</sup> (so Mayor and Hort, following Bengel; see Mayor<sup>3</sup>, p. 80 ff.).

Two further considerations against this view have to be added: (a) that, if there is little that is distinctively Christian, there is nothing distinctively Jewish. Harnack writes: 'Spitta has forgotten to consider what the Epistle does not contain.' Christianity was a reformation of Judaism which discarded a mass of religious and ritual material. Now of this Jewish material which Christianity discarded the Ep. contains no trace (Chronol. 489 n.). (b) Again, the apparent echoes from the teaching of Jesus are hardly satisfactorily accounted for by the hypothesis of a common source.

D. A theory which shares with the last the hypothesis that the name of Jesus in 1<sup>1</sup> and 2<sup>1</sup> is not original is that of J. H. Moulton, who holds that the Ep. was written by James the Lord's brother, but for non-Christian Jews, and that therefore distinctively Christian phraseology was deliberately omitted. The mention of the name of Jesus came in by way of a gloss (Expositor, 7th ser. iv. 45-55). This theory has the advantage of accounting for the textual difficulty in 2<sup>1</sup>, for the Judaistic tone combined with the presence of (unemphasized) Christian thoughts, and for the ultimate though late and disputed reception of the book.

Against this it is urged that (1) the curious subtlety of mind involved in the writing of the supposed veiled tract harmonizes ill with the sternness and vigour of the writer. (2) It is not clear what the writer could have hoped to accomplish by it. (3) Moreover, some of the more definitely Christian phrases quoted above are not easy to dispose of, and the difficulty about 2<sup>14f</sup>. remains, for those who cannot find its presuppositions entirely in Judaism.

E. There is the type of theory according to which the Ep. was written, not by James the Lord's brother and not in the Apostolic Age, but by an unknown author, late in the 1st or early in the 2nd century. The attractions of this type of theory are that it gets rid of the difficulty arising from the knowledge of the Pauline Epistles combined with absence of reference to the controversies about the Law, as also of that arising from the knowledge of Jesus' teaching combined with absence of reference to His life. It accounts for the moralism, the absence of Messianic doctrine, the slightness of the reference to the Parousia. It accounts, better than the early date, for the condition of the Church, with its worldliness and lip-religion.

Of the theories of this type the most definite is that of Harnack. He finds a positive indication of date in the references to persecution in 2<sup>5f</sup>. He understands this of the apostasy of worldly Christians and their betrayal of their fellow-Christians. To this he finds an exact parallel in Hermas, Sim. ix. 19, where the 'mountain black as soot' (ix. 1) represents those who have revolted from the faith and spoken wicked things against the Lord, and betrayed the servants of God (cf. also chs. 21, 26, 28). Such delations, as frequent occurrences, cannot be placed earlier than about A.D. 120. On the other hand, there is nothing in the Ep. which would require us to bring it down beyond the first third of the 2nd century. He therefore dates it between 120 and 130. But it is not to be thought of as a forgery, for (1) anyone composing an ostensible letter would have taken more pains to cast it into epistolary form; (2) a forger would have made it clearer who he professed to be; and (3) he would not have contradicted the generality of the address by the particularity of some of the references. The most probable hypothesis is, therefore, that it was a compilation from the writings of one of those prophetic teachers who, far down into the Post-Apostolic Age, still spoke with a sense of inspiration and an admitted authority. Shortly after his death this was issued by a redactor, anonymously. In its anonymous form it had a limited circulation among Palestinian Christians. About the end of the 2nd cent. it found its way into 'the early Catholic world,' and, in view of the conceptions then prevailing as to the primitive apostolic type of doctrine, it is not surprising that it should have been attributed to James. (In addition to Chronol. ii. 1. p. 485 f., see the excursus on the Cath. Epp. in TU ii. 1, p. 106 f., where the general presuppositions of the hypothesis are more fully and lucidly set forth.)

Against this theory the following objections are offered. (1) The hypothesis is unduly complicated. (2) The religious spirit of the Ep. gives the impression of being very much earlier than that of Hermas. (3) The ultimate association of the Ep. with James of Jerusalem and its consequent reception are not fully accounted for. The passage relied on to prove the date (2<sup>6f</sup>.) is susceptible of a different interpretation. The rich man and the poor man of 2<sup>2</sup> apparently both come into the Christian assembly as strangers, and there is nothing to show that the rich of v.<sup>6</sup> are Christians rather than outsiders. In fact, the latter relation is suggested by the fact that they are said to blaspheme the name by which 'you' (not 'they') have been called.

As is sufficiently apparent from the number and variety of the theories (of which this survey is by no means exhaustive), the problem of date and authorship admits of no easy and convincing solution. In a work of the present character it seems best simply to be content to say so.

JANNES AND JAMBRES.—These two men are referred to in 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup> as having withstood Moses; they are traditionally identified with two leading men among the magicians (Ex 7<sup>11-2</sup>; cf. Gn 41<sup>8-24</sup>). They are mentioned in the Gospel of Nicodemus (ch. 5) in the warning given to Pilate by Nicodemus that he should not act towards Jesus as Jannes and Jambres did to Moses. Origen (c. Cels. iv. 51) says that Numenius (2nd cent. A.D.; probably following Artapanus, an Alexandrian Hellenist of the 2nd cent. B.C.), related the story also; and in his commentary on Mt 27<sup>9</sup> he says that the reference in 2 Tim. was derived from a 'secret book' (perhaps the 'Liber qui appellatur Penitentia Jannæ et Mambrae,' an apocryphon referred to in the Decretum Gelasianum), as he suggests was the case with 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> and Mt 27<sup>9</sup> itself (Patr. Græca, xiii. 1769). Eusebius also quotes Numenius in his Præp. Ev. ix. 8 as relating the story to Jannes and Jambres, two 'Egyptian scribes' (cf. מִסְכָּרִים 'magicians' above, where the primary meaning is 'scribes,' and the secondary 'magicians'). The Acts of Peter and Paul (Ante-Nicene Christian Library, xvi. [1873] 268) makes the two apostles warn Nero against Simon Magus by the example of Pharaoh, who was drowned in the Red Sea through listening to Jannes and Jambres. The Apost. Const. (viii. 1) compares the action of Jannes and Jambres to that of Annas and Caiaphas. It is possible that the two magicians were identified by hostile Jews with John and Jesus (cf. Levy, Chald. Wörterbuch, p. 337), but the story seems older.

The licentious play of fancy which meets us everywhere in the superstitions about magicians throughout the two centuries before and the two centuries after Christ, is responsible for the variegated and contradictory legends about Jannes and Jambres. They were sons of Balaam, and accompanied him on his journey to Balak; they perished in the Red Sea; they were among the 'mixed multitude'; they were killed in the matter of the golden calf; they flew up into the air to escape the sword of Phinehas, but were brought down by the power of the Ineffable Name and slain. All these legends are in the style of the Midrash, pious but groundless, and serve only to illustrate the mind of the period in which they rose and took form. Whether the author of 2 Tim. is quoting from oral legend or from an apocryphal work is uncertain. Origen suggests the latter, Theodoret the former. Nor is there any final certainty about the origin and meaning of the names. The first has been identified with Johannes or John, and may have contained an allusive reference to Heb. מָשַׁח, 'to oppress' (cf., further, artt. BALAAM, NICOLAÏTANS). Jambres occurs in the form Mambres also (the b in both is probably euphonic only), and may have been treated as if from Aram. מְרִיב, 'rebellious' (cf. the opprobrious מְרִיב, 'heretic'). But the polemic use of the two terms as 'oppressor' and 'rebellious' does not explain their origin. H. Ewald (Gesch. des Volkes Israel, 1864-66, i. ii. 128), F. J. Lauth (Moses der Ebräer, 1869, p. 77), and J. Freudenthal (Alexander Polyhistor, 1875, p. 173) regard the names as Græco-Egyptian. In 1 Mac 9<sup>36</sup> the 'children of Jambri' are mentioned, an Arab tribe, and perhaps not Amorites, but there is no good ground for tracing Jambres to this.

We can only conclude, therefore, that all that is certain about Jannes and Jambres is that they were the names of two men who were believed in the Apostolic Age to have been the leaders of the magicians who withstood Moses, and that they have been made the centre of pious legends and the cause of much critical ingenuity.

JASON (Ἰάσων).—Jason is a Greek name, often adopted by Jews of the Dispersion, sometimes as not unlike the names Joseph or Joshua.

1. In Ac 17<sup>5ff.</sup>, the host of St. Paul and Silas at Thessalonica, who was seized with other converts and dragged before the politarchs. These authorities bound over Jason and his friends in security that there should be no further disturbance and perhaps that St. Paul should leave the city and not return (see Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 230 f.).

2. In Ro 16<sup>21</sup>, a person whose greetings St. Paul sends to his readers with greetings from Timothy, Lucius, and Sospiter, all of whom he describes as his 'kinsmen,' i.e. fellow-Jews or perhaps members of the same tribe. It is quite probable that 1 and 2 are the same man.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

JASPER (ἰάσπης, from Assyr. aspu).—The king on the heavenly throne is like a jasper stone (Rev 4<sup>3</sup>); the luminary of the New Jerusalem is like a stone most precious, as it were a jasper stone, clear as crystal (21<sup>4</sup>); and the first foundation stone of the wall is a jasper. The jasper of mineralogy is an opaque, compact variety of quartz, variously coloured—red, brown, yellow, or green. As this stone does not answer the description 'clear as crystal,' some think that the diamond is meant (Smith's DB s.v.), while others suggest the opal (EBi s.v.). The ἰάσπης of the LXX (Ex 28<sup>20</sup>) may have been the dark green jasper, which was known to the Egyptians and the early Greeks.

JEALOUSY.—Jealousy, as the translation of ζῆλος (vb. ζηλόω), denotes the state of mind which arises from the knowledge or fear or suspicion of rivalry. (1) It is often begotten of self-love. Those who have come out of heathen darkness into Christian light should no longer walk in strife and jealousy (Ro 13<sup>13</sup>), which are characteristics of the carnal or selfish mind (1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>). Bitter jealousy (ζῆλον πικρόν) and faction, in which rivals are 'each jealous of the other, as the stung are of the adder' (King Lear, v. i. 56 f.), and exult over (κατακαυχᾶσθε) every petty triumph achieved, are an antithesis of Christianity, a lying against the truth (Ja 3<sup>14</sup>). Where jealousy and faction are, there is anarchy (ἀκαταστασία) and every vile deed (3<sup>16</sup>). The Jewish opponents of the gospel were filled with jealousy, e.g. in Jerusalem (Ac 5<sup>17</sup>) and Pisidian Antioch (13<sup>45</sup>). 'Jealousies' (ζῆλοι, 2 Co 12<sup>20</sup>, Gal 5<sup>20</sup>) are the inward movements or outward manifestations of this un-Christian feeling.

(2) But the heat of jealousy (cf. ὄψιν) is not always false fire. To the Corinthians St. Paul says, 'I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy' (ζηλώ γὰρ ὑμᾶς θεοῦ ζηλώ, 2 Co 11-), i.e. with a jealousy like that of God. In the OT Jahweh is the husband of Israel, loving her and claiming all her love; in which sense He is a jealous God. A somewhat similar jealousy is once ascribed to Christ (in Jn 17, ζῆλος, 'zeal'); and St. Paul, who has betrothed the Corinthian Church to the Lord, and hopes to present her as a pure bride to Him, is jealous over her on His behalf, feeling the bare thought that she may after all give herself to another to be intolerable. Some take θεοῦ ζηλώ to mean 'with a zeal for God,' but the context demands a stricter sense of the word.

JEPHTHAH (Ἰεφθαῖ).—Jephthah, the Gileadite warrior who became the conqueror of the Ammonites, and whose vow compelled him to sacrifice his own daughter (Jg 11-12), is named among the men of the OT who achieved great things by faith (He 11<sup>32</sup>). He is mentioned after Samson, though he was historically earlier, the author probably trusting his memory, or not being over-studious of minute accuracy.

JAMES STRAHAN.

JERICHO (Ἰεριχώ, WH Ἰεριχώ).—The fall of the walls of Jericho is mentioned as an illustration of the miracle-working power of Israel's faith (He 11<sup>30</sup>). Enervated by the heat and fertility of the deep valley in which the city stood, the inhabitants of Jericho were always un-warlike, and the story in Jos 6 gives an idea of the astonishing ease with which their stronghold was captured. The site of Jericho shifted several times. The Canaanite city has been identified with a tell or mound, 1200 ft. long and about 50 ft. high, beside Elisha's Fountain. This has now been carefully explored under the direction of E. Sellin of Vienna, and the mud walls of the old town laid bare. See 'The German Excavations at Jericho,' in PEFSt, 1910, pp. 54-68.

JAMES STRAHAN.

JERUSALEM.—1. The name. Two forms occur in the NT: (a) Ἱερουσαλὴμ, the 'genuinely national form,' 'hieratic and Hebraising,' used 'where a certain sacred significance is intended, or in solemn appeals'; it occurs forty times in Acts, and is also found in the letters of St. Paul, in Hebrews, and in the Apocalypse; it is indeclinable, and without the article except when accompanied by an adjective; (b) Ἱερουσόλυμα, the hellenized form, favoured by Josephus, and occurring over twenty times in Acts, and in the narrative section of Galatians. As a rule it is a neuter plural, with or without the article. In each case the aspirate is doubtful. For a discussion of the forms see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, i. 259 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, Luke the Physician, London, 1908, p. 51 ff.; and T. Zahn, Introduction to the NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1909, ii. 592 ff.

2. Topography.—The chief authority for Jerusalem in the 1st cent. A.D.—its topography no less than its history—is the Jewish writer Josephus. His historical works cover the period with which we have here to deal, and it is to the details there furnished that we owe most of our knowledge of the fortunes and aspect of the city in the Apostolic Age. Any account of the topography of Jerusalem at this time must necessarily follow the descriptions of Josephus, as interpreted by the majority of modern scholars. It has always to be kept in mind, however, that there is considerable difference of opinion on many points, and that the views of the minority, or even of an individual, although we may not be able to accept them, are to be regarded with respect.

i. THE CITY WALLS, as they existed at the time of the siege in A.D. 70, first claim attention.

(a) First Wall.—In historical order, but not according to the standpoint of the besiegers, for whom the first wall was the third, the walls of Jerusalem on the north side proceed from the interior to the exterior of the city. At all times the south side of the city had only one encompassing wall, but during most of our period there were three walls—the third only in part—upon the north side. The first of these northern walls commenced on the W. of Jerusalem near the modern Jaffa Gate, and ran in an easterly direction along the northern face of the so-called S.W. Hill, crossing the Tyropœon Valley, which then markedly divided the city from N. to S., and joining the W. wall of the Temple enclosure. At its W. extremity it was marked by the three towers of Herod the Great—Hippicus, Phasael, and Mariamme (or Mariamme); and at the Temple end it ran near to the bridge which gave access from the S.W. Hill to the outer court of the Temple. This point is now marked by the modern Bab es-Silsileh, and Wilson's Arch found here stands over the remains of an older bridge which is doubtless the viaduct of Josephus's time. From the Tower of Hippicus the wall ran southwards and followed approximately the line of the modern W. wall, but it extended further south, turning S.E. along Maudslay's Scarp and proceeding in a straight course to the Pool of Siloam, at the mouth of the Tyropœon Valley. At this time the pool possibly lay outside the wall (F. J. Bliss and A. C. Dickie, Excavations at Jerusalem, 1894-1897, pp. 304, 325), although G. A. Smith places it inside (Jerusalem, i. 224). After crossing the Tyropœon, at some point or other, the wall was continued in a N.E. direction, running along the slope of Ophel to join the Temple enclosure at its S.E. angle. A considerable part of this wall upon the S. side of the city has been excavated by Warren, Guthe, Bliss, and Dickie. The last two explorers found remains of two walls with a layer of debris between. Bliss is of opinion that the under wall is the one destroyed by Titus, and he says further: 'There is no evidence, nor is it probable, that the south line was altered between the time of Nehemiah and that of Titus' (Excav. at Jerus., p. 319).

We are here concerned with the subsequent history of the wall upon the S. side only in so far as after the destruction by Titus it appears to have been rebuilt on a new line to form the S. side of the Roman camp upon the S.W. Hill, this being the line of the modern city wall on the S. The part upon the W., together with Herod's three towers, was spared by Titus and utilized by him for the 'Camp.' So also, we may infer, was the wall skirting the W. side of the Tyropœon, running N. and S. from the neighbourhood of the bridge to the region of the Pool of Siloam to form the E. boundary of the S.W. Hill. This wall is not mentioned by Josephus, but its presence may be concluded from the fact that Titus had to commence siege operations anew against that division of the city which stood on the S.W. Hill ('The Upper City'). According to C. W. Wilson, the ground enclosed by the walls of the Upper City extended to 74½ acres. The new wall drawn on the S. side over the summit of the hill reduced the area to about 48½ acres, only a little short of the normal dimensions of a 'Camp' (Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre, p. 143 f.).

(b) Second Wall.—According to Josephus, this commenced at the Gate Genath (or Gennath) in the First Wall, and circled round the N. quarter of the city, running up to Antonia, the castle situated at the N.W. corner of the Temple area. It had fourteen* towers, compared with sixty on the First Wall and ninety on the Third. Its extent was therefore limited in comparison with the others. There is much discussion as to its actual line in view of the importance of this for the determination of the site of Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre. This is a question that falls to be treated under the Gospel Age, although we have an interest in the projection of the wall towards the N., since upon this depends the view taken of the line of the Third Wall. With the majority of modern investigators we decide for a limited compass, no part being further N. than the extremity which went up from the Tyropœon to Antonia. The Gate Genath has not been located, but it must have been in the neighbourhood of the three great towers, and perhaps lay inside of all three. C. M. Watson concludes from a study of the records and from personal investigation of the site that the Second Wall was most probably built by Antipater, father of Herod the Great. He interprets Josephus as speaking of 'a new construction necessitated by the growth of the new suburb on the north-western hill' (The Story of Jerusalem, p. 85). The Second Wall is usually identified with the North Wall of Nehemiah (Smith, Jerusalem, i. 204). In the opinion of Smith 'we do not know how the Second Wall ran from the First to the Tyropæon; we do not know whether it ran inside or outside the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre' (ib. p. 249). Wilson also leaves the question open (Golgotha, p. 137).

(c) Third Wall.—As already noted, the line of the Third Wall is bound up with the question of the line of the Second Wall. Following Robinson, both Merrill (Ancient Jerusalem, ch. xxiv.) and Paton (Jerusalem in Bible Times, pp. 111–115) place it a considerable distance N. of the modern city wall. Most other students of the subject are content to accept the present North Wall as marking the site of the Third or Agrippa's Wall. Conder (The City of Jerusalem, pp. 162–166) occupies an intermediate position, giving a northerly extension beyond the present limits only on the side W. of the Damascus Gate. The wall was commenced about A.D. 41 on a colossal plan; but, suspicion having been aroused, operations had to be suspended by order of Claudius. The wall was hurriedly completed before the days of the siege. The main purpose of the Third Wall was to enclose within the fortified area of the city the new suburb of Bezetha, which had grown up since Herod the Great's time on the ridge N. of the Temple and Antonia. The most conspicuous feature on the wall was the Tower of Psephinus at the N.W. corner, which is named in conjunction with the three great towers of Herod, and may have existed at an earlier time (Smith, Jerusalem, ii. 487), being also the work of Herod (EBi ii. 2428). The W. extremity of the wall was at Hippicus; the N.W. point at Psephinus; the N.E. point, according to Josephus, at the Tower of the Corner, opposite the 'Monument of the Fuller'; and the E. extremity at the old wall in the Kidron Valley, i.e. the N.E. point of the Temple enclosure. Merrill's view (Anc. Jerus., pp. 44, 51) is that the line of this wall in its southerly trend would cut the line of the present wall a little E. of Herod's Gate; in other words, the present N.E. corner of the city was not within the walls of Jerusalem before its destruction by Titus. This view has much to commend it, although it is not admitted by those who advocate that the Third Wall followed the line of the present wall in its entire course (Smith, Jerusalem, i. 245 ff.).

ii. TEMPLE WALLS.—The remainder of the perimeter of the outer wall of Jerusalem was made up by the E. wall of the Temple, which in Herod's time coincided with the city wall (Smith, Jerusalem, i. 234 f.). The enclosure of the sanctuary did not, however, extend so far N. as it does to-day. Warren's Scarp, as it is called, marks the N. limit of the outer court of Herod's temple (ExpT xx. [1908–09] 66). This would cut the E. wall only slightly N. of the present Golden Gate. An extension to the N. was perhaps made by Agrippa I. (Smith, Jerusalem, i. 237 f.), but even then the N. boundary must have fallen considerably short of the present wall. The fore-court of Antonia must therefore have projected some distance into the present Haram area, and the rock on which the castle stood, while scarped on the other three sides, must on the S. have formed part of the same ridge as that on which the Temple lay. The N. Temple area wall presumably joined this rock, while the W. Temple area wall started from the S.W. point of the fore-court of Antonia and ran S. to meet the S. wall lower down the Tyropæon Valley. Examination of the rock levels has proved that the S.W. corner of the Temple area is upon the far side of the valley, i.e. upon the S.W. Hill.

A proper understanding of this complex of walls is essential to an appreciation of Josephus's narrative of the siege of A.D. 70, which in turn gives the key to the whole situation within Jerusalem in the time of the apostles. The city was fortified in virtue of its complete circuit of walls. When the most northerly wall was breached it still was fortified by the second N. wall and all that remained. When the second wall was taken, access was given to the commercial suburb (προδοστειον) in the Upper Tyropæon Valley. Antonia formed a fortress by itself, likewise the Temple both in its outer court and in the inner sanctuary. After the Temple was taken the way was open to the 'Lower City' and the Akra, which is almost synonymous with the 'Lower City,' i.e. the Lower Tyropæon Valley from the First Wall to the Pool of Siloam together with the S.E. Hill, of which Ophlas formed a part. Lastly, the S.W. Hill, on which stood the 'Upper City' with the 'Upper Agora,' was completely fortified, and doubtless the Palace of Herod at the N.W. corner of the 'Upper City' also was a strong place within four walls, with the three great towers upon the N. side.

iii. CHANGES IN THE CITY DURING THE APOSTOLIC AGE.—While there was nothing to equal the great building achievements of Herod the Great, activity was by no means stayed during the interval between the Death of Christ and the Destruction of Jerusalem (c. A.D. 30–70). This we judge from the fact that it was not until c. A.D. 64 that operations in the courts of the Temple were at an end. Even then the cessation of work involved about 18,000 men. To prevent disaffection and privation, they were transferred with the sanction of Agrippa II. to the work of paving the streets of the city (Jos. Ant. xx. ix. 7). Reference has already been made to the building of the Third Wall during the reign of Agrippa I., and this was necessitated by the growth of the suburb Bezetha, or New Town, lying north of Antonia and the Temple on the N.E. ridge. The Lower Aqueduct, which brought water to the Temple enclosure from a distance of 200 stadia, is ascribed to Pontius Pilate during the years preceding his recall and was in a way responsible for his demission of office (A.D. 36). Several palaces were built at this time—all overlooking the Tyropæon: that of Bernice, near the Palace of the Hasmonæans (see below); of Helena, Queen of Adiabene, who was resident in Jerusalem during the great famine (Ac 11<sup>3</sup>); of Monobazus, her son; and of Grapte, a near relative. Agrippa II. enlarged the Hasmonæan Palace, which was situated on the S.W. Hill near the bridge over the Tyropæon, and when finished overlooked the sanctuary. This was a cause of friction, and led to the building of a screen within the sacred area (Ant. xx. viii. 11). Most of these notable buildings were destroyed or plundered during the faction fights on the eve of the siege (BJ II. xvii. 6, IV. ix. 11) and during its course (VI. vii. 1).

While stone was freely used in construction, it ought to be realized that timber also played a large part—much more so than at the present day (Merrill, Anc. Jerus., pp. 136, 150, 152). The Timber Market was in Bezetha, the new suburb. For ordinary building purposes wood was brought from a distance, but during the siege the Romans availed themselves of the trees growing in the environs, totally altering the external aspect of the city. Still more fatal to its beauty was the havoc wrought by fire within the Temple area, and in the various quarters of the city after the victory of the Romans, and most of all in the execution of Titus's order to raze the city to the ground. In spite of Josephus's testimony, all writers are not of one mind regarding the extent of the ruin. Thus Wilson says of the 'Upper City' at least: 'Many houses must have remained intact. The military requirements of the Roman garrison necessitated some demolition; but there is no evidence that a plough was passed over the ruins, or that Titus ever intended that the city should never be rebuilt' (Golgotha, p. 52; cf. Merrill, Anc. Jerus., p. 179).

iv. SACRED SITES PERTAINING TO THE APOSTOLIC AGE.—For this department of our subject we must call in the aid of tradition, in so far as this appears to be in any measure worthy of credence. The sites to be dealt with are mostly suggested by the narrative of the Book of Acts.

(a) The Cenaculum.—Outside the present S. city wall on the S.W. Hill lies a complex of buildings, which since the 16th cent. have been in Moslem possession and are termed en-Nebi Dā'ūd. Underground is supposed to be the Tomb of David, but this part is not open to the inspection of Christians. Immediately above this is a vaulted room (showing 14th cent. architecture), which is now identified with the 'large upper room' in which the Last Supper was held, where Christ appeared to His disciples, in which the early Christians assembled, and where the Holy Ghost was given. It is supposed to be the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark. According to a later tradition—which probably arose from a confusion of this Mary with the Mother of Jesus—this is also the scene of the death of the Virgin. Here also Stephen was thought to be martyred (still later). The earliest tradition with which we are here concerned dates from the 4th cent. A.D., being preserved by Epiphanius (de Mens. et Pond. xiv. [Migne, Patr. Græca, xliii. col. 259 ff.]; cf. Wilson, Golgotha, p. 173):

'He [Hadrian] found the whole city razed to the ground, and the Temple of the Lord trodden under foot, there being only a few houses standing, and the Church of God, a small building, on the place where the disciples on their return from the Mount of Olives, after the Saviour's Ascension, assembled in the upper chamber. This was built in the part of Sion which had escaped destruction, together with some buildings round about Sion, and seven synagogues that stood alone in Sion like cottages.'

Since then there have been many changes in the buildings themselves and in their owners, but the tradition has been constant. What it is worth still awaits the test, but, as Stanley says: 'there is one circumstance which, if proved, would greatly endanger the claims of the "Cenaculum." It stands above the vault of the traditional Tomb of David, and we can hardly suppose that any residence, at the time of the Christian era, could have stood within the precincts of the Royal Sepulchre' (Sinai and Palestine, new ed., London, 1877, p. 456). It may be noted that the Tomb of David is now sought, although it has not been found, on the S.E. Hill, where, in the opinion of most, the 'City of David,' or Zion, lay (Paton, Jerusalem, p. 74 f.). From the language of Ac 2<sup>3</sup> the tomb was evidently in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (cf. Ant. XIII. viii. 4, XVI. vii. 1, BJ I. ii. 5). Sanday is prepared to give the tradition about the Cenaculum 'an unqualified adhesion' (Sacred Sites of the Gospels, p. 78), and proceeds to argue the matter at length (pp. 78-88). His argument is contested by G. A. Smith (Jerusalem, ii. 567 ff.), whose opinion is that 'while the facts alleged (by Dr. Sanday) are within the bounds of possibility, they are not very probable' (p. 568). Wilson is more favourable, and thinks that here 'amidst soldiers and civilians drawn from all parts of the known world, the Christians may have settled down on their return from Pella, making many converts and worshipping in a small building [see Epiphanius, as above] which in happier times was to become the "Mother Church of Sion," the "mother of all the churches"'

(Golgotha, p. 54; cf. T. Zahn, Introduction to the NT, ii. 447 f.).

(b) The Temple and its precincts.—Although tradition has fixed on one spot as being the special meeting-place of the first Christians, there can be no doubt they still continued to frequent the Temple. While they had indeed become Christians they did not cease to be Jews, at least not that section which remained in Jerusalem during the years preceding the Fall of the city. Accordingly we find in the Book of Acts a considerable body of evidence regarding the presence of Christians in and about the Temple. A detailed notice of all these references properly belongs to another article (TEMPLE), but a brief mention of those concerning the environs may here be made.

(a) 'Peter and John were going up into the temple at the hour of prayer' (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>). This is topographically exact, whether we take the outer court or the sanctuary proper, which only Jews could enter (Ac 21st). There were ramps and stairs and steps at many points. An exception would have to be made if we accepted Conder's identification of the Beautiful Door or Gate (Ac 3<sup>-10</sup>) as being the main entrance on the W., 'probably at the end of the bridge leading to the Royal Cloister' (The City of Jerusalem, p. 129). But for several reasons this cannot be entertained. A. R. S. Kennedy has shown (ExpT xx. 270 ff.; cf. Schurer, HJP II. i. [1885] 280) that the Beautiful Door is to be sought in the inner courts, and preferably on the E. side of the Court of the Women. Little value can be attached to the tradition that the Golden Gate above the Kidron Valley is the gate referred to in Ac 3<sup>1</sup>.

(β) The porch or portico along the E. side of the Temple area is the Solomon's Porch of Ac 3<sup>11</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>. Its appearance may be realized from the frontispiece (by P. Waterhouse) of Sacred Sites of the Gospels, where a full view is given of the so-called Royal Porch on the S. side. This is generally supposed to have had an exit on the W. by a bridge crossing the Tyropæon (see Conder, above) at Robinson's Arch, but Kennedy has shown that nearly all moderns are in error about this (ExpT xx. 67; cf. Jos. Ant. xv. xi. 5). On the W. and N. sides there were also porches or cloisters which met at the entrance to Antonia.

(c) Antonia.—This fortress is about the most certainly defined spot within the walls of Jerusalem. To-day it is occupied in part by the Turkish barracks, on the N.W. of the Haram area. In Herod the Great's time the castle was re-built on a grand scale and strongly fortified. Later it was occupied as a barracks (παρεμβολή, Ac 21<sup>34</sup>, 37, etc.) by the Romans, who here maintained a legion (τάγμα [BJ v. v. 8], understood by Schürer [HJP I. ii. (1890) 55] as 'cohort'; this is not accepted by Merrill [Anc. Jerus. 216 f.]). As shown above, it is probable that some slight re-adjustment of the forecourt of Antonia and of the N. side of the Temple area had taken place in the interval following Herod the Great's reign. From the vivid narrative of Ac 21st it is evident that the Temple area was at a lower level than the Castle, for stairs led down to the court. According to Josephus (BJ v. v. 8), on the corner where Antonia joined the N. and W. cloisters of the Temple it had gangways down to them both for the passage of the guard at the Jewish festivals. While the exact plan of the ground can hardly be determined, there seems to be no justification for 'a valley' and 'a double bridge,' as supposed by Sanday and Waterhouse (Sacred Sites, p. 108 and plan [p. 116]; cf. Smith, Jerusalem, ii. 499 n.). By cutting down the cloisters a barricade could be erected to prevent entrance to the Temple courts from the Castle, as was done by the Jews in the time of Florus (A.D. 66

[BJ II. xv. 6; cf. VI. ii. 9, iii. 1]). Opinion is divided as to whether the Roman procurator made his headquarters in Antonia or in Herod's Palace on the S.W. Hill, but the evidence seems to be in favour of the latter. This appears most clearly from the proceedings in the time of Florus (BJ II. xiv. 8, 9; see Wilson, Golgotha, p. 41 f.; Smith, Jerusalem, ii. 573 ff.). Antonia was certainly used as a place of detention, as is plain from Ac 22<sup>30</sup>. This leads us to remark on the position of—

(d) The Council House.—The meeting-place of the Sanhedrin in apostolic times is of some importance in view of the experience of St. Peter, St. John, and St. Paul. From data provided by Josephus we judge that it lay between the Xystus and the W. porch of the Temple, i.e. near the point where the bridge crossed the Tyropæon. From Josephus (BJ VI. vi. 3) we also infer that it was in the 'Lower City,' for it perished together with Akra and the place called Ophlas. It is reasonable to seek in proximity to the Council House the prison of Ac 4<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>; that of Ac 12<sup>1</sup> was probably in connexion with the Palace of Herod, where presumably Agrippa I. lived and maintained his own guard (see Ant. XIX. vii. 3). The traditional spot was shown in the 12th cent. E. of where this palace stood, in the heart of the 'Upper City,' while the present Zion Gate upon the S. was taken to be the iron gate of Ac 12<sup>10</sup> (Conder, The City of Jerusalem, p. 16).

(e) Sites associated with the proto-martyrs.—(1) St. Stephen.—The association of St. Stephen with the Cenaculum dates from the 8th cent., and with the modern Bâb Sitti Maryam (St. Stephen's Gate) from the 15th century. These traditions may be ignored, and attention fixed on the site N. of the city, where Eudocia's Church was built as early as the 5th century. Its site was recovered in 1881. It must be recalled that when St. Stephen perished (between A.D. 33 and 37) the Third Wall was not in existence, and the total irregularity of the proceedings at his stoning leads us to think that he was killed at the readiest point outside the city. If on the N. side, as the tradition bound up with Eudocia's Church seems to imply, it would probably be outside the gate of the Second Wall.

(2) James the Great, the brother of John, is supposed to have been beheaded in a prison now marked by the W. aisle of the Church of St. James in the Armenian Quarter—a tradition of no value. It is worthy of note, however, that, as in the case of St. Peter, the spot is not remote from the Palace of Herod.

(3) James the Just, the brother of Jesus, who was called the Christ' (Ant. XX. ix. 1), according to Hegesippus (preserved in Eusebius, HE II. xxiii. 4 ff.) also suffered a violent death (c. A.D. 62) after a mode which is very improbable (see HDB, art. 'James,' § 3), the stoning excepted, to which Josephus testifies. The Grotto of St. James near the S.E. corner of the Temple area, on the E. side of Kidron, is supposed to be his tomb (15th cent. tradition), or preferably his hiding-place (6th cent. tradition). While the tomb is as old as the days of the Apostle, or even older, the inscription above its entrance bears reference to the B'ne Hezir (S. R. Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of Books of Samuel<sup>2</sup>, 1913, p. xxi).

(f) The tree (with the bridge) where Judas hanged himself, and Akeldama, the field of blood (Ac 1<sup>19</sup>), are shown, but there are rival sites for the latter, and the former has often changed (Conder, The City of Jerusalem, p. 18 f.).

(g) Sites associated with the Virgin.—Besides the tradition of the Dormitio Sanctæ Mariæ, the scene of the Virgin's death, in proximity to the Cenaculum, the Tomb of the Virgin is marked by a church, originating in the 5th cent., in the valley of the Kidron, outside St. Stephen's Gate (Sanday, Sacred Sites, p. 85).

(h) The scene of the Ascension.—Discarding Lk 24<sup>50</sup>, Christian tradition early laid hold upon the summit of the Mount of Olives (cf. Ac 1<sup>12</sup>) as the scene of the Ascension. The motive for this will be understood from what has been written by Eusebius (Demons. Evang. vi. 18 [Migne, Patr. Græca, xxii. col. 457 f.]; cf. Wilson, Golgotha, p. 172):

'All believers in Christ flock together from all quarters of the earth, not as of old to behold the beauty of Jerusalem, or that they may worship in the former Temple which stood in Jerusalem, but that they may abide there, and both hear the story of Jerusalem, and also worship in the Mount of Olives over against Jerusalem, whither the glory of the Lord removed itself, leaving the earlier city. There, also, according to the published record, the feet of our Lord and Saviour, who was Himself the Word, and, through it, took upon Himself human form, stood upon the Mount of Olives near the cave which is now pointed out there.'

Constantine erected a basilica on the summit, where the Chapel of the Ascension now stands. His mother, the Empress Helena, built a church at the same point, and another, called the Eleona, to mark the cave where Christ taught His disciples (Watson, Jerusalem, p. 124). The latter has recently been discovered and excavated (RB, 1911, pp. 219-265).

3. History.—i. JERUSALEM UNDER ROMAN PROCURATORS; AGRIPPA I. AND AGRIPPA II. (A.D. 30-70).—The writings of Josephus afford evidence that it is possible to narrate the history of events in Jerusalem during the Apostolic Age without reference to the Christians. From our point of view we must sit loose to the fortunes of the Jews as such, in whom Josephus was interested; but for a due appreciation of the history of the Christian Church in Jerusalem a sketch of contemporary events must first be given, special note being made of points of contact with the narrative of Acts.

Pontius Pilate continued in office for some years after the Death of Christ. At the beginning of his term (A.D. 26) he had shown marked disregard for the feelings of the Jews by introducing ensigns bearing images of Cæsar into Jerusalem. Later, he gave further offence by appropriating the Corban in order to carry out his scheme for the improvement of the water-supply of the city and of the Temple. Even though the work proceeded, Pilate's cruelty in this instance was not forgotten and helped to swell the account against him, which resulted in his recall for trial (A.D. 36). Vitellius, governor of Syria, paid a visit to Jerusalem at the Passover of the same year, and adopted a more conciliatory policy, remitting the market-toll and restoring the high-priestly vestments to the custody of the Jews. The procurators of Caligula's reign (A.D. 37-41) may be left out of account.

The government now passed into the hands of King Agrippa I., who ruled in Jerusalem during the last years that the apostles as a body continued there (A.D. 41-44). Agrippa had already rendered service to the nation of the Jews by preventing Caligula from setting up his statue in the Temple. He was promoted by Claudius to be King of Judea, as his grandfather Herod had been. He journeyed to Jerusalem, and as a thank-offering dedicated and deposited in the Temple a chain of gold, the gift of Caligula, in remembrance of the term he had passed in prison before good fortune attended him.

While keeping the favour of the Emperor, he also took measures further to ingratiate himself with the Jews. According to Josephus, so good a Jew was he that he omitted nothing that the Law required, and he loved to live continually at Jerusalem (Ant. XIX. vii. 3). His Jewish, or rather his Pharisaical, policy seems to have been at the root of his scheme for building the Third Wall, and also explains his persecution of the Christians (Ac 12<sup>3</sup>). His coins circulating in Jerusalem bore no image, as an accommodation to Jewish scruples. Outside the Holy City, however, he was as much under the influence of the Græco-Roman culture of the age as his grandfather had been. After his death, in the manner described in Ac 12<sup>3</sup> (cf. Ant. XIX. viii. 2; see art. JOSEPHUS), Palestine reverted to the rule of procurators, so far as civil administration was concerned. In religious matters control was entrusted to Agrippa's brother, Herod the King of Chalcis, whom the younger Agrippa succeeded. Hence the intervention of the latter at the trial of St. Paul (Ac 25<sup>13ff.</sup>-26). With one or two exceptions the procurators who followed were distasteful to the Jews, whose discontent worked to a head in A.D. 66, when the open breach with Rome occurred.

Under Cuspius Fadus (A.D. 44-46) the custody of the high-priestly vestments was resumed by the Roman authorities, and once more they were guarded in Antonia, but this was countermanded upon a direct application of the Jews to Claudius. During the rule of Fadus and his successor Tiberius Alexander (A.D. 46-48) the people of Jerusalem, like their brethren throughout Judæa, were oppressed by the great famine (Ac 11<sup>28ff.</sup>), which Queen Helena of Adiabene, now resident in Jerusalem (see above), did much to relieve (Ant. XX. ii. 5, v. 2; cf. art. FAMINE). In the time of Ventidius Cumanus (A.D. 48-52) the impious act of a Roman soldier at the Passover season led to serious collision with the Roman power and to great loss of life (Ant. XX. v. 3, BJ II. xii. 1). This was the first of a series of troubles that led to Cumanus being recalled. Antonius Felix (A.D. 52-60) was sent in his stead, and under him matters proceeded from bad to worse. Owing to the violent methods of the Sicarii, life in Jerusalem became unsafe, and even the high priest Jonathan fell a victim to their daggers. Not only against Rome was there revolt, but also on the part of the priests against the high priests (Ant. XX. viii. 8). The events recorded in Ac 23 and 24 fall within the last two years of Felix's rule. Porcius Festus (60-62) succeeded Felix, and died in office. In the confusion following his death, which was fomented by Ananus the high priest, Agrippa II. intervened, and Ananus was displaced, but not before James, the brother of Christ, had suffered martyrdom at his hands (Ant. XX. ix. 1). The date (A.D. 62) is regarded as doubtful by Schürer (HJP I. ii. 187). Albinus (A.D. 62-64) devoted his energies to making himself rich, and under him anarchy prevailed, which became even worse under Gessius Florus (A.D. 64-66). His appropriation of the Temple treasures precipitated the great revolt from Rome, which ended with the Destruction of Jerusalem (Sept., A.D. 70).

Agrippa II. enters into the history of Jerusalem during the procuratorship of Festus, whose services he enlisted against the priests in their building of a wall within the Temple area counter to his heightened Palace (see above). Along with his sister Bernice he sought in other ways, outwardly at least, to conciliate the Jews. While Bernice performed a vow according to prescribed ritual (BJ II. xv. 1), Agrippa showed some zeal, but little discretion, in matters affecting the Temple. His efforts at mediation upon the outbreak of hostilities were in vain; he was forced to take sides with Rome, and appears in attendance upon Titus after he assumed the command.

The harrowing details of the last four years preceding the Fall of Jerusalem, the factions, privations, bloodshed, and ruin, lie apart from the history of the Apostolic Church, and are here omitted. At an early stage of the war the Christians escaped to Pella beyond Jordan (Euseb. HE

III. v. 3), where they remained till peace was concluded and a return made possible. This is usually dated fully half a century later, after the founding of the Roman city Ælia Capitolina in the reign of Hadrian (A.D. 136), but nothing is known for certain beyond the fact of the return (Epiphanius, de Mens. et Pond. xv. [Migne, Patr. Græca, xliii. col. 261 f.]). Some would date the return as early as A.D. 73 (see Wilson, Golgotha, p. 54 f.).

ii. THE CHRISTIANS IN JERUSALEM. — Apart from the Book of Acts there is little information regarding the Christians during the years that they tarried in Jerusalem. A not unlikely tradition gives twelve years as the period that the Twelve remained at the first centre of the Church. After that arose persecution and consequent dispersion. This may be dated in the short reign of Agrippa I. (A.D. 41-44). Subsequent to this the Church in Jerusalem, which from the first had been Jewish-Christian, became pronouncedly Judaistic, perhaps an essential to its own preservation. Up to the time of the revolt (A.D. 66), while there were indeed conflicts with the Jewish authorities, more or less coincident with interregna in the procuratorship, there was no open breach. The sect was tolerated, as others were, by the Jewish leaders, so long as there was outward conformity to the ritual of the Temple. The progressive movement in Christianity was external to Jerusalem and even to Palestine; the Church in the metropolis of the faith became increasingly conservative, and in the end ceased to have any standing within the Church Catholic. But this did not take place until the post-Apostolic Age. Attention must be fixed chiefly on the first few decades following the Death of Christ, years in which originated much that became permanent within the Church as well as features that were destined to pass away.

(a) The disciples and the Lord. — Throughout the Book of Acts emphasis is laid upon the fact that Christ had risen from the dead. So far as can be discovered, the first Christians had no concern for the scene of the Crucifixion nor yet for the empty tomb. It was not until the 4th cent. A.D. that these spots, so venerated in after ages, came to be marked by a Christian edifice. The thoughts of the early Christians were upon the living and not the dead. They cherished the hope of the speedy return of Christ to earth in all the glory of His Second Coming, and reckoned that they lived in the time of the end, when the fullness of Messiah's Kingdom was about to be ushered in. This being the case, they made no provision for posterity in the way of erecting memorials to the Christ who had sojourned among them in the flesh, and, as the extracts from Patristic writers (see small type above) reveal, after 'sacred sites' began to be marked, they were those associated with the post-resurrection life of the Lord.

(b) Relation of the Christians to other dwellers in the city. — The desire to make converts to the faith must have brought the Christians into contact with their fellow-citizens and with those of the Dispersion who chanced to be present in the city. Their assembling in the Temple, for instance, was not simply to fulfil the Law (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>), nor yet for the sake of meeting with each other (5<sup>1</sup>), but to work upon the mass of the people through the words and wonders of the apostles. Only by public activity could the numbers have grown with the rapidity and to the extent they did. Of necessity this propaganda was attended by a measure of opposition from those who were the traditional enemies of the Lord. But, so long as Roman rule was exercised, persecution could not make headway. While thus mixing to some extent with other elements in the city, the Christians also lived a life apart for purposes of instruction and fellowship, and for the performance of the simple ritual of the faith (Ac 2<sup>4</sup>-12<sup>12</sup>, etc.). There is no evidence that they possessed any special building like a synagogue. A private house, such as that of Mary, the mother of John Mark, would have served their purpose, and according to tradition (see above) this was the recognized centre. Even at the time of the so-called Council (Ac 15<sup>6</sup>) no indication is given that the assembly was convened in an official building.

(c) Organization.—Those who had companied with Jesus in the days of His public ministry were from the outset regarded as leaders in the Church, and were in possession of special gifts and powers. To the Twelve, who were Hebrews, there were shortly added the Seven, perhaps as an accommodation to the Hellenists (Ac 6<sup>1</sup>). This step probably marks the first cleavage in the ranks of the Christians, as they began to be called, and paved the way for the wider breach which in a few years severed those at the ancient centre of Jewish faith and practice from the numerically stronger division of Gentile believers in other places. Harnack regards it as possible that the Seven were 'Hellenistic rivals of the Twelve' (The Constitution and Law of the Church, 30), the chief being St. Stephen, whose adherents were persecuted after his death, the apostles themselves being let alone (The Mission and Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup>, i. 50 f.; cf. Ac 8<sup>1</sup>).

The appointment of the Seven reveals the fact that in one respect the initial practice of the Christians had been tentative and could not be sustained. The community of goods, which theoretically was an ideal system, ultimately proved unworkable, and was not imitated in other Christian communities. The poverty of the mother Church, which continued after Gentile churches had been planted at many points, has been regarded as the outcome of this experiment, but it is likely that the causes of this poverty in Jerusalem lay deeper than that. G. A. Smith (Jerusalem, ii. 563) has shown that Jerusalem is naturally a poor city, and he attributes her chronic poverty to the inadequacy of her own resources and the many non-productive members her population contained. These conditions were not altered in apostolic times. In view of the circumstance that at a comparatively late stage the further commission was given to St. Paul and Barnabas to remember the poor (Gal 2<sup>10</sup>), i.e. at Jerusalem, this may conceivably be grounded not upon special need but upon the analogy of the tribute paid by those of the Diaspora to headquarters. 'The church at Jerusalem, together with the primitive apostles, considered themselves the central body of Christendom, and also the representatives of the true Israel' (Harnack, Mission and Expansion<sup>2</sup>, i. 330 f.).

(d) The position of James, the Lord's brother.—More than any of the Twelve, who at first were so prominent, is James, the Lord's brother, associated with the Church in Jerusalem. He appears suddenly in Acts as possessed of authority equal to that of the greatest of the apostles, and at the Council he occupies the position of president. When St. Paul visited the city for the last time he reported himself to James and the elders. From extracts of Hegesippus preserved by Eusebius, and from Eusebius himself, we learn that James owed his outstanding position to his personal worth, as also to his relationship to Jesus, and it seems evident that he was the leading representative of Judaistic Christianity, of that section which by its adherence to the Law and the Temple was able to maintain itself in Jerusalem after others, even the chief apostles, had been compelled to leave the city. But James also suffered martyrdom (see above, 2, iv. (e)). He was followed by his cousin Symeon, whom Hegesippus (Euseb.) styles 'second bishop.'

There is great diversity of opinion as to when this appointment was made (Wilson, Golgotha, p. 55 n.). The date of his death is placed c. A.D. 107. As Eusebius learned that until the siege of Hadrian (A.D. 135) there were fifteen bishops, all said to be of Hebrew descent (HE iv. v. 2), the tradition is hard to believe. Harnack thinks that relatives of Jesus or presbyters may be included in the number (Mission and Expansion<sup>2</sup>, ii. 97).

(e) Effect of the Fall of Jerusalem upon the Church there.—The final destruction of the city in A.D. 70 is generally regarded as crucial not only for the Jews but also for the Christians, not because the latter were present at the time, but because there had perforce to be a severance from the former ways now that the Temple had ceased to be. But the importance of this event has been over-rated (A. C. McGiffert, The Apostolic Age, p. 546). As regards the Church Catholic, the centre, or centres, had already been moved, while the local church, which escaped the terrors of the siege, was small, tending indeed to extinction. The Church in Ælia Capitolina was Gentile-Christian, with Mark as first bishop. It fashioned for itself a new Zion, on the S.W. Hill; and when in the 3rd cent. Jerusalem became a resort of pilgrims, the 'sacred sites' did not include the Temple area, the Jewish Zion, which indeed was regarded by the Christians 'with an aversion which is really remarkable, and which increased as years passed by' (Watson, Jerusalem, p. 119).

JESSE (Ἰεσσαί).—Jesse is mentioned in Ac 13<sup>22</sup> and Ro 15<sup>12</sup> as the father of David.

JESTING (εὐτραπελία, Eph 5<sup>4</sup>).—That the Greek word is used in an unfavourable sense is shown by its association with 'filthiness' and 'foolish talking,' as well as by its characterization as 'not befitting.' But in itself (being derived from εὖ, 'well,' and τρέπω, 'I turn') it was morally neutral, and originally it had a good sense. 'On the subject of pleasantness in sport,' says Aristotle (Eth. Nic. ii. vii. 13), 'he who is in the mean is a man of graceful wit, and the disposition graceful wit (εὐτραπελία); the excess ribaldry, and the person ribald; he who is in defect a clown, and the habit clownishness.' And again (iv. viii. 3), 'Those who neither say anything laughable themselves, nor approve of it in others, appear to be clownish and harsh, but those who are sportive with good taste are called εὐτράπελοι, as possessing versatility,' etc. This was a characteristic of the Athenians, whom Pericles praised as 'qualified to act in the most varied ways and with the most graceful versatility' (εὐτράπελος [Thuc. ii. 41]). Aristotle admits that even 'buffoons are called men of graceful wit' (εὐτράπελοι), but questions their right to the term (iv.

viii. 3). The nearest Latin equivalent was urbanitas. But gradually the coinage was debased, and εὐρα-πελία came to mean no more than badinage, persiflage, wit without the salt of grace; in Chrysostom's striking phrase, it was 'graceless grace' (χαρὶς ἀχαρὶς). See R. Trench, NT Synonyms<sup>3</sup>, 1876, p. 119 f.

JESUS.—This is the Greek form of the Hebrew name Joshua ('salvation of Jahweh'), as we find it in the LXX and NT writings. It is thus applied to—

1. Jesus Christ; see art. CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY.

2. Joshua the son of Nun, who led Israel into Canaan; referred to by Stephen in his speech before the council (Ac 7<sup>45</sup>) and by the writer to the Hebrews (He 4<sup>9</sup>). See JOSHUA.

3. Jesus surnamed Justus (Col 4<sup>11</sup>), a Christian convert of Jewish descent who was with the Apostle Paul in Rome at the date of his writing the Epistle to the Colossians. He is described, along with Mark and Aristarchus, as a fellow-worker unto the Kingdom of God and as having been a comfort unto the Apostle. This reference singles out the three mentioned as the only members of the 'circumcision' who had been helpful to the Apostle in Rome, and reminds us of the constant hatred which the narrower Jewish Christians exhibited towards St. Paul, and also of the failure of many of the Roman Christians to assist and stand by the Apostle during his imprisonment (cf. Ph 2<sup>20, 21</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>). It has been pointed out that the mention of Jesus in this passage by the Apostle creates difficulties for those who impugn the authenticity of the Epistle and suggest that it is based on Philemon. If Philemon is genuine, why add an unknown name which might arouse suspicion? It is extremely unlikely that an imitator would add a name which so soon became sacred among Christians (cf. A. S. Peake, in EGT, 'Colossians,' 1903, p. 546). W. F. BOYD.

JESUS CHRIST.—See CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY.

JEW, JEWESS.—The term 'Jew' (Heb. יהודי, Gr. Ἰουδαίος) originally signified an inhabitant of the province of Judea, or, more strictly, a member of the tribe of Judah in contrast with the people of the Northern Kingdom of the ten tribes. After the Babylonian captivity, however, the term was applied to any member of the ancient race of Israel, wherever settled and to whatever tribe he may have belonged. Josephus, referring to Nehemiah's use of the term in addressing the returned exiles, says: 'That is the name they are called by from the day that they came up from Babylon, which [name] is taken from the tribe of Judah, which came first to these places; and thence both they and the country gained that appellation' (Ant. XI. v. 7).

The name is almost always regarded as a purely racial designation, marking off all who belonged to the ancient nation; but as the nation was distinguished from the heathen world by its religious views, the term came to signify one who was separated not only by race but by religion from the rest of mankind. The Jew himself preferred to be called an 'Israelite,' as the latter was the name of national honour and privilege (cf. art. ISRAEL), and we find 'Jew' to be the designation usually applied by foreigners to members of the Chosen People.

In the NT the term is found applied to those who belonged to the ancient race in contrast with various other groups or classes of men. The Jews themselves divided the whole world into Jews and Gentiles; and we find the Apostle Paul using this contrast in speaking of God's judgment on sin: 'tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile' (Ro 2<sup>9</sup>). Again the term is used in contrasting Jews and Samaritans (Jn 4<sup>9</sup>), the latter being descended from the mixed race of ancient Israelites and the settlers introduced by the Assyrian conquerors (cf. 2 K 17<sup>3-41</sup>).

The Jew is also contrasted with the proselyte who was a Jew by his adopted religious beliefs, but not by birth (Ac 2<sup>10</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel we find the term 'Jews' applied to those who opposed the teaching of Jesus, as contrasted with believers in Christ, whatever their nationality might be; but generally the Jewish rulers seem to be indicated by the name in this Gospel. Thus 'the Jews' censure the man for carrying his bed on the Sabbath (5<sup>10</sup>), and contend with the man born blind (9--). Perhaps this usage of the Fourth Gospel arose from the influence of later times, when the Jews, and especially the Jewish authorities, were bitterly opposed to the teaching of Jesus. In the other parts of the NT the term is never used in contrast with believers in Christ. Thus in Gal 2<sup>13</sup> 'the Jews' are the Christians of Jewish race. In the Epistle to the Romans (2<sup>28, 29</sup>) we find a distinction made between a Jew who is such outwardly and a Jew who is such inwardly. Here, as also in Ro 3<sup>1</sup>, the Apostle uses the term 'Jew,' where we should naturally expect to find 'Israelite,' to designate a member of the Chosen People as a recipient of special Divine favour. Some who belong to the Jewish race are not spiritually partakers of the blessings which attach to it. In the passage where the writer of the Apocalypse (2<sup>9 39</sup>) speaks of those 'who say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan,' he may be referring to men who made a false claim to belong to the Jewish nation, or to Jews by race who were far from belonging to the true Israel of God.

One of the most remarkable features in connexion with the Jews in the apostolic times was their world-wide dispersion. From Spain in the West to the Persian Gulf in the East Jews had settled in every large city. Their exclusive religion and their contempt of the heathen kept them together as a community within the larger population where they found a home, and their capacity for commerce often enabled them to become extremely wealthy. Their exclusiveness and the commercial dishonesty of many of them led to their being hated by the common people, while their wealth made them exceedingly useful to rulers and princes, who thus were induced to protect them. The Dispersion was one of the most important factors in the spread of the Christian faith in apostolic and sub-apostolic times. Wherever the apostolic missionaries went, they found a Jewish synagogue, where they had access not merely to the Jewish population, but to the more earnest among the heathen who had been attracted by the monotheism and the moral characteristics of Judaism, and who often formed the nucleus of a Christian Church. The Jewish religion was tolerated in the Roman Empire, being regarded as a religio licita; and, so long as Christianity grew up and flourished in the shelter of the synagogue, it too might be regarded as enjoying the same toleration. This fact no doubt enabled the new faith to secure a footing in these early days. In the Acts of the Apostles we see how the Roman proconsul Gallio (18<sup>1-17</sup>) simply regards Christianity as an insignificant variation of Judaism, and the same view is taken by King Agrippa (26<sup>3</sup>), as well as by the town-clerk of Ephesus (19<sup>37</sup>). The author of the Acts is careful to state these favourable opinions of officials. Probably, however, the popular hatred of the Jews, which was always smouldering and ready to burst forth at any moment among the excitable populace, was one of the first causes of Christian persecution, as it took some considerable time before Christianity was fully recognized as an independent religion. The Jews themselves became the most persistent and implacable persecutors of the Christians. They were ever ready to stir up the disaffected people and divert attention from themselves by turning it on the adherents of the new faith. Probably the expulsion of the Jews from Rome by Claudius (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>) was the result of dissensions regarding the new religion, which had sprung from Judaism and threatened to overwhelm it. The reference of Suetonius (Claudius, 20) to Chrestus, which is probably a mistake for Christus, seems to favour this idea, although various views have been taken of the passage (cf. R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts', p. 384f.).

In Rome, as well as in many other cities of the Empire, Jews obtained considerable influence, in spite of the popular aversion to them. Their wealth opened many doors which otherwise would have remained shut against them. Jews, and especially Jewesses, were to be found in many prominent Roman families, and intermarriage between Jewish women and Gentiles was by no means uncommon. Thus Eunice, the mother of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>), was a Jewess who had married a Greek, while Drusilla, the wife of Felix the governor of Syria (Ac 24<sup>24</sup>), is also described as a Jewess. In both references the word simply implies that the women belonged to the ancient race of Israel, without any thought of the particular tribe from which they may have claimed descent.

JEZEBEL.—Jezebel is referred to in the NT in Rev 2<sup>20</sup>: 'I have somewhat against thee, because thou dost tolerate the woman Jezebel who calleth herself a prophetess, and teacheth my servants to commit fornication and to eat of things offered to idols and leadeth them astray.' [Some MSS, NCP and about 10 minuscules, insert σου after γυναικα, so as to give the sense 'thy wife,' but the σου is placed in the margin by WH and rejected by Nestle. It probably reflects some copyist's view that the 'angel' of the Church was its bishop.] The passage goes on to say that her misdoing was of some standing, that the woman gave no sign of amending her ways, and that therefore she and her companions in sin would be cast into a bed, or triclinium, defined as great affliction, while her children would be smitten with death. One result of this punishment would be that all the Churches would recognize Jesus as the Searcher of the thoughts and wills. Further, this Jezebel taught what she and her followers called 'the deep things,' to which the author sardonically adds 'of Satan.'

It is fairly clear from these hints what 'Jezebel' stands for. In the first place, the opprobrious term may mark an actual prophetess. For Thyatira possessed a temple of Artemis and a temple of a local hero Tyrimnus taken over by Apollo, while outside the city was the cell of an Eastern Sibyl known as Sambethe (CIG 3509: Fabius Zosimus set up a burial-place for himself and his sweetest wife Aurelia Pontiana in a vacant place in front of the city in the neighbourhood or quarter where was a fane of the Chaldaean Sambethe [vol. ii. p. 840]. The date is probably about A.D. 120).

Though it is not at all probable that by Jezebel this Sibyl could be aimed at, seeing that the obnoxious teacher was within the Thyatiran Church, yet it is not improbable that a Chaldaean prophetess outside might stimulate a Christian prophetess inside the Church. It is of course always possible that Jezebel is not a personal name at all, but a scornful designation of a Gnostic group inside the Christian community at Thyatira, whose action and doctrine the author regarded as being like those of the OT Jezebel-religion, in that it tended to seduce its followers from the 'form of sound words.'

One characteristic of the civic life of Thyatira was to be found in the gilds into which the bakers, potters, weavers, and artificers in general were grouped. As one inscription (CIG 349) speaks of 'the priest of the Divine Father Tyrimnus,' and as all heathen religions celebrated periodically religious banquets, there is little doubt that from time to time Christian members of these gilds were faced by the question whether it was lawful for them to partake of these banquets as coming under the head of things offered to idols. Rigorists would hold that to eat at such banquets was to communicate with idols and so to commit spiritual fornication. Jezebel, whether a prophetess or a group, taught apparently that Christians might lawfully partake of these religious banquets, and this the writer of the Apocalypse regarded as equivalent to Jezebel's idolatry in the OT.

It is also plain that the followers of 'Jezebel' were Gnostics, for the latter were explicitly inquirers into the 'deep things,' the esoteric truths which the ordinary person was incompetent to understand. In 1 Co 2<sup>10</sup> St. Paul claims for his disciples that the Spirit who searches all things (same verb as is used in Rev 2<sup>13</sup>), yea, the deep things of God, had revealed these hidden things to them. The apocalyptic writer, however, is more concerned here with the opposite depths—those of Satan. Thus in 2<sup>9</sup> he speaks of the false Jews in Smyrna who formed a synagogue of Satan. In 2<sup>18</sup> he says that Satan had his throne at Pergamum. In 3<sup>9</sup> Philadelphia is charged with harbouring a synagogue of Satan. These passages, taken in connexion with the references to the teaching of Balaam in 2<sup>14</sup> and of the Nicolaitans in 2<sup>15</sup>, favour the interpretation of Jezebel which sees in the name a term of opprobrium applied dyslogistically to a heretical sect or form of doctrine. That the depths of Satan are Gnostic doctrines is clear from Iren. (II. xxii. 1), who says that the Ptolemæans said that they had found the mysteries of Bythus, a phrase repeated in II. xxii. 3 (cf. Hippol. Hær. v. vi., and Tertullian, adv. Valent. i., de Res. Carnis, xix.). The name Jezebel does not occur anywhere in the Apostolic Fathers. W. F. COBB.

JOB (יֹב).—Job is named by Ezekiel (14<sup>14, 20</sup>)—in the 6th cent. B.C., probably about two centuries before the writing of the Book of Job—along with Noah and Daniel as a proverbially righteous man. After the publication of the great drama, it was natural that he should be regarded rather as a model of patience in affliction (ὁ πόδες καὶ μακροθυμία, Ja 5<sup>10, 11</sup>). While the profound speculations of the book regarding the problems of pain and destiny, as well as the theological doctrine which the poet intended to teach, might be beyond the grasp of the ordinary reader, the moral appeal of the simple opening story came home to all suffering humanity. 'Ye have heard of the patience (τὴν υπομονήν) of Job' (5<sup>11</sup>). Similarly the conclusion of the tale, which revealed God's final purpose in regard to His servant (τὸ τέλος κυρίου), proving Him to be full of pity and merciful (πολύ-σπλαγχνος καὶ οἰκτιρῶν), presented a situation which all readers might be asked to observe. The imperative ἴδετε, which is as well supported as εἰδετε, calls their attention to a surprising fact, which they might well mark, learn, and inwardly digest. The Qur'an repeats the admonition and the lesson. 'And remember Job; when he cried unto the Lord, saying, Verily evil hath afflicted me: but thou art the most merciful of all those who show mercy. Wherefore we [God] heard him and relieved him from the evil which was upon him, and we restored unto him his family,' etc. (sura 21). 'Verily we found him a patient person: how excellent a servant was he' (sura 38).

JOEL (Ἰωήλ).—Joel is proved by internal evidence to have been one of the latest of the Hebrew prophets. The prominence in his writings of priests and ritual at home, and of a diaspora abroad, his reference to the distant sons of Greece, his use of Aramaic words, and the lurid apocalyptic colouring of his prophecies, clearly point to the Persian period. But Joel has not the wide outlook of some of the other prophets. He is not fascinated either by Isaiah's visions of Israel as the light of the Gentiles, or Malachi's of the heathen waiting upon Jahweh. He has not the humanitarian feeling of the author of Jonah, who may have been his contemporary. He is a rigid and exclusive Israelite. In his view the heathen, as being apparently beyond redemption, are to be destroyed, not to be won to the knowledge of God. But if he is narrow, he is intense; and while he cherishes the priestly ideals, his hope for Israel lies rather in such a diffusion of the prophetic spirit as shall create an inspired nation. Nothing less will satisfy him than the fulfilment of Moses' wish: 'Would to God that all Jahweh's people were prophets.' For him the goal of Hebrew history, the Divine event to which all things move, is that God shall, by the mighty working of His Spirit, so enlighten and control His people, so adapt them to share His confidence and receive His revelations, that the thrilling experiences which have hitherto been confined to the prophets shall then be shared by all Israel. 'Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions: and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my spirit' (2<sup>28</sup>, 29).

This particular prophecy wins for Joel a prominent place in the NT. St. Peter at once recognized its fulfilment in that outpouring of the Spirit, that baptism of fire, that Divine intoxication, which was experienced on the day of Pentecost. He quoted the prophet's words, and the question naturally arises how he interpreted 'upon all flesh.' Was he, like the prophet himself, still a particularist, extending the promised blessing to all the Jews of the Diaspora, but limiting it to them, and so making the old distinction of Israel from the heathen more marked than ever? Or did he there and then change his standpoint so as to include the nations in his purview? Did he in that hour of inspiration read into Joel's words the later universalism of St. Paul? Probably the issue did not become clear to his mind so soon. It was not a day for correct definitions but for overwhelming impressions. Enough that to the effusion of the Spirit there was meantime no limit of sex ('your sons and your daughters'), of age ('your young men, your old men'), or of condition ('my bondmen and my bondwomen'). Time would also show that there was to be no limit of race (Jew or Gentile); for however men (even prophets) may limit 'all flesh,' to Christ and His Church it means 'all humanity.'

JOHN, EPISTLES OF.—I. THE FIRST EPISTLE.

—1. Contents.—It is not easy to summarize the contents of the First Epistle. The 'aphoristic meditations' of this mystic writer are strung together in such fashion that they almost defy analysis. The most successful attempt is that of T. Haring ('Gedankengang und Grundgedanke des 1<sup>ten</sup> Johannesbriefs,' in Theol. Abhandlungen C. von Weizsäcker gewidmet, Freiburg i. B., 1892). If we cut off the first four verses, which are clearly an introduction, and also 5<sup>13-21</sup>, which form a final summary, the main body of the Epistle gives us a triple presentation of two leading ideas. The ethical thesis, 'Without walking in light, more specially defined as love of the brethren, there can be no fellowship with God,' is developed in the sections 1<sup>5-21</sup>, 2<sup>28</sup>, 3<sup>2-4</sup>, 4<sup>7-11</sup>. The christological thesis, 'Beware of those who deny that Jesus is the Christ,' is similarly developed in 2<sup>18-27</sup>, 4<sup>1-6</sup>, 5<sup>10-12</sup>. In the first presentation (1<sup>5-27</sup>) the two theses are stated without any indication of their mutual connexion; in the second (2<sup>28-46</sup>) they are again presented in the same order, but the verses (3<sup>23</sup>, 24) which form the transition from the one to the other are so worded as to bring out clearly the intimate connexion which the author finds between them ('his command is that we should believe, and love as he commanded'); in the third (4<sup>1-5</sup>) they are inseparably intertwined. A rough analysis may be attempted.

1<sup>1-4</sup>.—The introduction states the writer's purpose—to rekindle the true joy of fellowship in his readers, by recalling the old message of Life, which has been from the beginning, and of late has been manifested in Jesus, the Son of God (1<sup>1-4</sup>).

1<sup>5-27</sup>.—(a) The burden of that message is that God is Light. As the light must shine, so it is of His essence to reveal Himself to those whom He has made to share His fellowship. In spite of what some Gnostics may say, there is nothing in His nature that hides Him from all but a few select souls. But 'light' describes, so to speak, His character as well. Fellowship with Light is only possible for those who 'walk in light.' To claim fellowship, and go on committing deeds of darkness, is to tell a lie. But for those who try, He has prescribed a way of dealing with their partial failures (v. 7). Two similar false pleas are then set aside: the denial that sin is a real power, active for evil, in those who have sinned, and the denial that actual sin has been committed. They are shown to be contrary to experience, and to what we know of God's dealing with men (vv. 8-10). In 2<sup>1</sup> the writer sets aside a false inference which might be drawn from what he has said. The universality of sin might seem to be an excuse for acquiescence. The writer states that he writes to prevent, not to condone, sin. And this is possible, for in the Christian society the means are ready to hand for dealing with the sins which occur. The Paraclete is pleading their cause in heaven, and He is the propitiation He ministers. And men can know how they stand. Obedience is the sign of knowledge of God. Men are in union with God when they try to follow the steps of the Christ (vv. 5-6). In vv. 7-17 thesis and warning are put forward on the grounds of the readers' circumstances and experiences. Obedience to command suggests a general statement of the command to love. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour' is an old command. It received new force and meaning in the light of Christ's life, and the new life which Christians have learned to live. This is more clearly realized as in the new society the darkness passes away. A man cannot be in the light and hate his brother Christian. Love lights the path, so that he can walk without stumbling.

The writer then turns to immediate circumstances (vv. 1-17). The sin which keeps them far from God has been removed; the experience of the old and the strength of the young have secured victory (vv. 12, 13a). This explains how he could write as he has written. Their knowledge and strength made it possible for him to use the words he has penned (vv. 13b, 14). But there is need of hard striving. Love of the world may soon destroy all that they have gained. The world is passing; only that which is done according to God's will abides (vv. 15-17).

(b) So he passes to the first statement of the christological thesis (vv. 18-27). Faith in Jesus as the Christ is the test of fellowship with God. The passing of the transitory suggests the signs of the times. The last hour has struck. The saying 'Antichrist cometh' is being fulfilled in the many false teachers who have appeared. The Faith had gained a decisive victory, in the unmasking of the traitors, who had to go. The crisis had shown that all such false teachers, however they differed among themselves, were aliens, and no true members of the Body. This the readers knew, if they would use their knowledge. Their anointing had given to all of them knowledge to detect falsehood. Falsehood culminates in the denial that Jesus is the Messiah. This denial includes denial of the Father, in spite of Gnostic claims to superior knowledge. All true knowledge of the Father comes through the Son. It is gained in living and abiding union, the eternal life which He has promised (vv. 18-6). This much he must write about the deceivers. If his readers had used their knowledge, he need not have written it (vv. 27, 28). Let them abide, and confidence will be theirs when 'He' appears (v. 28). Who can have this confidence? Those who know that God is just, and who therefore learn in the experience of Christian life that the doing of righteousness is the true test of the birth from God (v. 29).

2-8-46.—(α) We pass to the second statement of the ethical thesis (2<sup>28</sup>(1)-3<sup>24</sup>): the doing of righteousness, i.e. love of the brethren, shown in active service, is the sign by which we may know that we are 'loving God.' In 3<sup>1-6</sup> thesis and warning are considered in the light of the duty of self-purification, laid upon us by the gift of sonship and the hope of its consummation. Everyone who has this hope must of necessity purify himself here and now. Lawlessness does not consist only in disobeying the injunctions of a definite code. There is a higher Law which is broken by every act of anapria, of failure to realize in life the ideal set before men in the human life of Jesus Christ. This is further explained in vv. 7-18, introduced by an earnest warning against deceivers. The doer of righteousness alone has attained to Christ-like righteousness. The doer of sin still belongs to the Devil, who has been working for sin throughout human history. So, if we realize that for us righteousness finds its clearest expression in love of the brethren, we gain a clear contrast: God's children, always striving to realize the ideal of sinless love, and the children of the Devil, striving after, or drifting towards, their own ideal of sinful hate and selfish greed. Sinlessness, i.e. righteousness, is not the monopoly of a chosen race, or section of men. It is the natural outcome of the new life which every man may have, if he will take it and use it, to follow Christ, not Cain, whose evil life found its natural expression in the final issue of hatred—murder with violence (v. 12). Verses 13-18 contain variations on the same theme. The world's hatred should not surprise them; it is the natural attitude of those who cannot stand the sight of good.

They really ought to know that love and death, murder and eternal life, have nothing in common. And Christ's example has shown what love is. At least they can show their love in helping their brethren. He who has not even got so far as that need not talk of God's love. With an exhortation to sincerity in loving service (v. 18) the meditation passes over once more to the tests of truth. How can we know that we are on the side of truth, and still the accusations of our consciences?—By throwing ourselves on God's omniscience. When a man feels confidence towards God and finds that his prayers are answered—that he wishes for and does the things that God wills—his conscience ceases to accuse (vv. 19-22). God's will is shown in His command—which is more than a series of precepts: He bids men have faith in Christ and love like His. These lead to fellowship with Him. Men know that they have it by their possession of the Spirit which He has given (vv. 23-4).

(b) Thus the interlacing of Faith and Love leads on to the second presentation of the christological thesis (4<sup>1-6</sup>), in such a way as to show its vital connexion with the ethical. The mention of the Spirit suggests the form of the new statement. All spiritual phenomena could not be regarded as the work of God's Spirit. The spirits must be tested by their attitude to the Christ. The reality of the Incarnation as a permanent union between God and man is the vital truth. The statement (4<sup>2-3</sup>) is followed by a short meditation (vv. 4-6) on the attitude of the Church and the world to the two confessions and those who make them. The spirits of truth and error are clearly discerned by the kinds of people who listen to them.

4<sup>7-5</sup>1.—In these verses, the last and most intricate section of the Epistle, we have the third presentation of the two theses. The remainder of ch. 4 is predominantly ethical, the opening verses of ch. 5 christological, or at least doctrinal. But the two theses are interwoven, and can hardly be separated. Love is the proof of fellowship with God, for God is Love. The true nature of love has been made clear, in terms intelligible to men, in the sending of His Son, as faith conceives it.

In the first explanation of the two combined ideas (4<sup>7-21</sup>), it is shown that love based on faith in the revelation of love given in Christ's life and work is the proof of 'knowing God' and of being 'loved of God.' In the second explanation (5<sup>10</sup>.) faith is first. Victory over the world—the forces opposed to God—is gained by faith in Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God. This faith rests historically on a three-fold witness—of the water (the Baptism in which He was set apart for His Messianic work), of the suffering (which culminated on the Cross, and which has dealt with sin), and of the Spirit (who interprets these facts to men). And the work of the Spirit continues in those who follow Christ as thus conceived. They realize the truth in their own experience.

5<sup>13-21</sup>—So the last christological statement passes out into yet another answer to the question, 'How can we know?' (vv. 13-17). True confidence is established when men know that prayer is heard because what is asked is in accordance with God's will. The true answer to prayer is the immediate consciousness that what is taken to God has reached His ear, and may be safely left in His care. Where intercession is possible it will succeed. Then (vv. 18-21), with a triple οὐδ' αὖν, the writer sums up the things he has to say which matter most. Sin can be conquered; we belong to God, whom we have learned to know in the revelation of Him which His Son has brought down to men. The Epistle closes with the terse warning that His 'children' must reject all meaner conceptions of God.

2. The false teachers.—If the analysis given of the teaching of the First Epistle is correct, it follows that edification and exhortation rather than controversy are the writer's primary objects. He reiterates the leading ideas of his teaching, already familiar to his readers, to kindle once more the enthusiasm of their faith and first love, which is growing cold, to guard them from the dangers which threaten, and to give them tests by which they may 'know' the security of their Christian position.

At the same time it is clear that in all he writes he has in view definite forms of false teaching which have proved dangerous, errors both doctrinal and ethical, the fascination of which is a serious menace to their Christian life.

A careful study of the language of the Epistle makes it probable that the author is combating more than one kind of false teaching. His opponents are not all to be found in the same camp. The opinions which he refutes might all have been held by the same opponents; but they do not form a complete system: still less can they be separated into a series of complete homogeneous systems. Probably he offers a few leading truths which in his opinion are the antidote to the manifold errors by which his readers are threatened, while there is one particular party, to whose opinions recent circumstances have given a predominant importance.

The expressions used suggest variety. Many antichrists have come (2<sup>18</sup>); all of them, whatever their differences may be, are aliens to the truth (v. 19). The repeated use of πας (v. 21-23) suggests manifold and varied opposition. 'Those who lead astray' are spoken of in the plural (v. 26). The one χρῖσμα, which all have, should have taught them all things. The same variety is suggested by ch. 4. Many false prophets are gone out into the world. Every spirit which does not confess (dissolves?) Jesus is 'not of God'; Antichrist is working in many subordinates (vv. 2-3). It is only in ch. 5 that the writer seems to narrow the issues down to one particular form of error: the denial that the sufferings and death of Jesus were an essential part of His Messianic work. Even here his method is the same. He emphasizes a few fundamental truths which should safeguard his readers from all the varied dangers which threaten. A special incident is the occasion of his writing. He has in view several forms of error.

(1) Judaism.—Jews who have never accepted Christianity are not the only enemy. The words ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐξῆλθον (2<sup>19</sup>) must refer to a definite secession of those who were generally recognized as Christians. But Jewish opposition is clearly a serious danger. This is shown by the writer's insistence on the confession that Jesus is the Messiah (2<sup>22</sup>; cf. 4<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>). The Jewish controversy is prominent throughout. The Jewish War and the Destruction of Jerusalem must have profoundly affected the relation of Judaism to Christianity. Jewish Christians were placed in a desperate position. Hitherto they had no doubt hoped against hope for the recognition of Jesus as Messiah by the majority of their countrymen. But the final catastrophe had come, and the Lord had not returned to save His people. Christians had not been slow to draw the obvious conclusion from the fate of Jerusalem. And Jewish Christians could expect nothing but the bitterest hostility from their fellow-countrymen. Apostasy was now the only possible condition of reunion. If some openly accepted the condition, many Jewish Christians must have been sorely tempted to think that their estimate of Jesus as Messiah had been mistaken, and to regard Him as a Prophet indeed, but not as Messiah, still less as the unique Son of God. This danger, which threatened Jewish Christians primarily, must have affected the whole body. The prominence of the Jewish controversy in the Fourth Gospel is now generally recognized. It is less prominent in the Epistle, but there is no essential difference of situation.

At the same time it is only one element in the situation. A. Wurm (Die Irrlehrer im 1. Johannesbrief, 1903) is not justified in deducing from the words of 2<sup>23</sup> the exclusively Jewish character of the false teaching combated. The author certainly deduces the fact that the opponents 'have not the Father' from their false Christology. It does not follow, however, that he and his opponents were at one in their doctrine of the Father. He could not have written as he has unless they claimed to 'have the Father'; but they may have claimed it in a different sense from that of orthodox Christians. The passage is more easily explained if we suppose that the writer has in view a claim to a superior knowledge of the Father imparted to a few 'spiritual' natures, unattainable by the ordinary Christian. All true knowledge of the Father comes through Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God. By rejecting the truth about Jesus they forfeited all claim to knowledge of the Father.

(2) Gnosticism.—There is no clear evidence in the Epistles of the fully developed Gnostic systems of the 2nd century. There are, for instance, many simpler explanations of the use of σπέρμα αὐτοῦ in 3<sup>9</sup> than Pfleiderer's hypothesis that it refers to the system of Basilides. But undoubtedly Gnostic ideas are an important element in the mental circumstances of the writer and his age. The burden of his message is that God is Light (1<sup>5</sup>), and the reiteration of this in negative form is probably aimed at the view that the Father of all is unknowable or that knowledge of Him is the monopoly of a 'pneumatic' minority. The Gnostic claim, real or supposed, that the πνευματικοί are superior to the obligations of the Moral Law is roughly handled. And the insistence with which intellectual claims are met by the challenge to fulfil the Christian duty of love and its obligations is significant. The confession demanded of 'Jesus Christ come in flesh' is a protest against the Gnostic doctrine of the impossibility of real union between the spiritual seed and flesh. And at the same time the writer's sympathy with Gnostic ideas is obvious. Here as elsewhere, he is always reminding his 'children' that they are old enough to refuse the evil and to choose the good.

Gnostic ideas afford no criterion for dating the Epistles of John. It is, of course, a perversion of history to assume that Gnostic ideas first came into contact with Christianity when Christians began to think in terms of Greek philosophy, towards the middle of the 2nd century. The movement is Oriental rather than Greek, and far older in date. But its reflexion in these Epistles is a patent fact.

(3) Docetism.—It is customary to speak of the Johannine Epistles, and also of the Gospel, as anti-Docetic (cf. Schmiedel [EBi s.v. 'John, Son of Zebedee,' § 57], Moffatt [LNT, 1911, p. 586]). If the term is used popularly of all teaching which denied or subverted the reality of the Incarnation, this is true. 'The Word was made Flesh,' 'Jesus Christ came in flesh,' are the watchwords of Gospel and Epistles. But there is no real trace in these writings of Docetism in the stricter sense of the term, i.e. the teaching denounced by Ignatius (Smyrn. 2 ff.; cf. Trall. 10 f.), which assigned a purely phantasmal body to the Lord. And it is probable that in the development of christological thought theories of pure Docetism are a later stage than the assumption of a temporary connexion between a Heavenly Power and the real manhood of Jesus of Nazareth (cf., however, Lightfoot and Pileilerer).

(4) Cerinthianism.—We have seen that the writer has to deal with dangers which threaten from several quarters. As the Epistle proceeds, his attack becomes more direct, and the christological passage in ch. 5 contains clearer reference to one definite form of error—the denial that Jesus, the Son of God, came by ‘blood’ as well as by ‘water,’ i.e. that the Sufferings and Death of Jesus were as essential a note of His Messianic work as the Baptism by John. This suits the teaching of Cerinthus as described by Irenæus (c. Hær. I. xxvi. 1): ‘post baptismum descendisse in eum ab ea principalitate quæ est super omnia Christum figura columbæ et tunc annunciasse incognitum patrem, et uirtutes perfecisse, in fine autem renouasse iterum Christum de Iesu, et Iesum passum esse et resurrexisse, Christum autem impassibilem perseuerasse, existentem spiritali.’ The traditional view that ch. 5 contains a reference to Cerinthianism has been held by the majority of scholars of all schools who have dealt with the Epistle. This view has been seriously challenged especially by Wurm (op. cit.) and Clemen (ZNTW vi. [1905] 271 ff.) on the ground that 2<sup>3</sup> excludes Cerinthianism, as it implies that the writer and his opponents are conscious of no difference of view in their doctrine of the Father. If the suggestion made above (§ 2 (1)) that that passage gains in point if the opponents claimed a superior ‘having the Father’ to that of ordinary Christians, the objection falls to the ground. The limits of this article preclude a general discussion of our knowledge of Cerinthianism. The present writer has discussed it at length in his Johannine Epistles (ICC, 1912), p. xlv ff.). There are good reasons for thinking that Hippolytus in his Syntagma ascribed to Cerinthus the view that the Spirit (not the Christ) descended on Jesus at the Baptism. If so, this gives additional force to the description in 5<sup>6</sup> of the proper function of the Spirit. It would seem that Cerinthus continued these Judaizing and Gnostic tendencies which the author of these Epistles regarded as most dangerous. But ‘many Antichrists had come to be’ even if Cerinthus is most prominently in his thoughts.

(5) Ethical error.—In his denunciations of ethical error there is no reason to suppose that the writer has a different class of opponents in view. He could not have connected his ethical and christological theses as he has, if the two sources of danger had been separate. At the same time, in his practical warnings as well as in his christological teaching his words have a wider reference than one particular body of opponents. There is no reason to suppose that any of the opponents had been guilty of the grosser sins of the flesh. The phrase ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός (2<sup>17</sup>) does not imply this. And the Epistle is not directed against Antinomianism, as has been sometimes wrongly inferred from 3<sup>4</sup>. It would seem that they claimed a superior knowledge of God to which ordinary Christians could not attain, while disregarding some at least of the requirements of the Christian code, especially the love which shows itself in active service for the brethren. They hardly recognized the obligation of the new command of Jn 13<sup>34</sup>. While condemning lawlessness (cf. 3<sup>4</sup>)—and many of them no doubt recognized the obligations of the Mosaic Law—they failed to see that all falling short of the ideal revealed as possible in the human life of Jesus is disobedience to God’s highest Law. The indifference of conduct, as compared with other supposed qualifications, as e.g. descent from Abraham, or possession of the ‘pneumatic’ seed, is clearly part of their ethical creed. In this sphere also a mixture of Judaizing and Gnostic tendencies such as may reasonably be attributed to Cerinthianism will explain the language of the Apostle in which the ethical shortcomings of the opponents are denounced.

3. Relation to the Gospel.—The authorship of the Epistles is closely connected with the question of the authorship of the Gospel. It is impossible to attempt here even a summary of the controversy. The relation, however, of the longer Epistle to the Gospel and to the shorter Epistles must be considered. The similarity of style and content is so marked that the obvious explanation of common authorship might seem to need no further discussion. But the views of an increasing number of competent critics cannot be neglected. Holtzmann’s articles (JPTH vii. [1881], viii. [1882]) are still the fullest and fairest statement of the views of those who reject the idea of common authorship. A rough estimate makes the vocabulary of the Epistle 295 words, of which 69 only are not found in the Gospel. The general impression formed by reading verses or chapters of the documents is probably a safer guide. There can be no doubt as to the prevalence of characteristic and distinctive words and phrases common to both. The similarity extends to common types of phrases variously filled up. Attention has often been called to the following points of similarity in style: the carrying on of the thought by the use of οὐ . . . ἀλλά, by disconnected sentences, by the positive and negative expression of the same thought; the use of the demonstrative, ἐν τούτῳ, etc., followed by an explanatory clause to emphasize a thought; the repetition of emphatic words. Such phenomena leave us with the choice between an author, varying his own phrases and forms of expression, and a slavish imitator.

The similarity extends to content as well. The leading ideas—the reality of the Incarnation, the life which springs from Christ and is identified with Him, abiding in Christ and in God, the sending of the Son as the proof of God’s love, the birth from God, the importance of witness, many well-known pairs of opposites—are equally prominent in both writings. They find that kind of similar but varied expression which suggests an author doing what he would with his own, rather than the work of a copyist. And the differences, though real, are not greater than are naturally explained by differences of time, circumstances, and object. The question of priority has also been the subject of long controversy. The priority of the Epistle has been maintained on the following grounds:

(1) The introductory verses are said to present an earlier stage of the Logos doctrine than the Prologue of the Gospel. The personal Logos is a stage not yet reached. Even if this is true, the facts might equally well be explained by the theory that in the Epistle we have a further accommodation to the growing Monarchianism of a later period. And if we take the whole Epistle into account, it is clear that the ‘personal differentiation’ of Father and Son is stated in the Epistle as definitely as in the Logos doctrine of the Gospel. And it is far easier to explain the opening expressions of the Epistle as a summary of that Prologue than vice versa.

(2) The ἄλλος παράκλητος of Jn 14<sup>16</sup> has been explained by the doctrine of the Epistle which presents Christ as παράκλητος. But the two ideas are different, and not mutually exclusive. The ἄλλος of the Gospel finds its natural explanation in the approaching withdrawal of the bodily presence of the speaker.

(3) The Epistle shows an immediate expectation of the Parousia which the author of the Gospel is said to have abandoned, substituting the Presence of the Spirit for the hope of the Coming. Again, the point, if true, is not decisive. It could as plausibly be explained as a modification of more original and less popular views. But serious divergence can only be maintained by the excision of 5<sup>26-29</sup> 6<sup>34f.</sup> and other inconvenient passages from the Gospel. The differences are definite, but not fundamental. The treatment of the Antichrist legend in the Epistle is as complete a process of 'spiritualization' as that of popular eschatology in the Gospel.

(4) It has also been maintained that on the subject of Propitiation the Epistle is nearer to the Pauline standpoint than the Gospel, which conceives of Christ's work merely as the glorifying of the Father by the Son's revelation of Him to men. Again there is a difference of relative prominence, but there is no reason to neglect what is involved in Jn 1<sup>36</sup> 9<sup>5ff.</sup>

(5) In the record of the piercing of the side a misunderstanding of 1 Jn 5<sup>6</sup> has been found by some writers. It is, however, more natural to see in the Epistle a reference to a well-known story, though the incident itself does not afford a complete explanation of the meaning of the verse.

(6) External evidence is equally indecisive. The probable 'quotation' of the Epistle by Polycarp proves nothing, especially if Schwartz and Lightfoot are right in their view that Papias knew and valued the Gospel.

On the other hand, there are many passages in the Epistle which seem unintelligible without a knowledge of corresponding passages in the Gospel to explain them. If there is no clear proof of borrowing in the Epistle, it is almost indisputable that 'the Gospel is original, the Epistle is not.' And it is hard to escape the general impression left by the study of the two documents, that in the Epistle the writer summarizes the important parts in the teaching of the Gospel, which his readers had failed to make their own. They were therefore in danger of falling victims to errors which their 'knowledge' ought to have enabled them to detect and avoid.

4. Relation to Mystery religions.—The time has hardly come for a satisfactory treatment of the question of the relation of the Johannine writings to the Mystery religions. The valuable work of Dieterich, Reitzenstein, and others is well known. But until the actual dates of documents can be determined with greater certainty than is at present possible, the influence of the Mysteries on early Christian thought and literature must remain a matter for conjecture. Reference may be made to the valuable treatise of C. Clemon (Der Einfluss der Mysterienreligionen auf das älteste Christentum, 1913) and to the admirable summary in Feine's Theologie des Neuen Testaments<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 556 ff. with reference to the Johannine books.

II. THE SHORTER EPISTLES.—1. Authorship.—It is unnecessary to waste time in discussing the common authorship of the two shorter Epistles. The close parallelism of their general structure, and the similarity of their style, vocabulary, and ideas (see Harnack, TU xv. 3 [1897]) leave us with as high a degree of certainty as such evidence can ever give, though the reference which many scholars find in the Third Epistle to the Second is improbable. Their relation to the First Epistle is less certain. External and internal evidence raises the possibility of different authorship. The problem, however, is clearly similar to that of the relation of the First Epistle to the Gospel. A study of the facts leads to a similar answer. It is a case of common authorship or conscious imitation. The freedom of handling of the same tools points to the former alternative. The shorter Epistles are the most obviously 'genuine' of the five books generally attributed to St. John. Common sense and sound criticism alike shrink from the hypothesis that either the Gospel or the First Epistle is modelled on them.

2. Contents of Second Epistle.—The object of the second letter is to give advice to the church or family addressed in it about hospitality to Christians from other churches. The question of the reception of the higher order of ministers who moved from place to place ('apostles, prophets, teachers, evangelists'), and who claimed authority over the resident officers, was a burning one in early days, and the situation presupposed in this Epistle is parallel with that found in the Didache. The stages of development are similar, though it does not follow that they had been reached at the same date in both centres. The answer given to the question is the application of the two tests, practical and doctrinal, of the First Epistle. Those who 'walk in love' and who confess 'Jesus Christ coming in flesh' are to be welcomed. (A possible interpretation of ἐρχόμενον as opposed to ἐληλυθότα (1 Jn 4<sup>2</sup>) suggests that doubts as to the Parousia had come into greater prominence, but this is far from certain.)

3. Destination of Second Epistle.—The controversy whether the letter is addressed to a church or an individual is still acute. The latter hypothesis has been ably maintained by Rendel Harris (Expositor, 6th ser. iii. [1901] 194 ff.) and others. The attempts to find a proper name either in Kyria or Eclecta are not convincing. If a lady is addressed, it is best to suppose that her name is not given. The language in which the writer's affection is expressed, and the subjects with which the letter deals, point to a church rather than to an individual. And the interchange of singular and plural in the use of the second person is almost decisive in favour of the former view.

4. Contents of Third Epistle.—The Third Epistle also deals with the question of hospitality to travelling missionaries and teachers, emphasizing in a particular instance the duty of Christians in this respect, as the Second deals with its necessary limitations. The objects of the letter are to claim a suitable welcome for some travelling missionaries about to visit the Church of Caius to whom the letter is addressed, and to re-instate Demetrius in the good opinion of the members of that church. The connexion of Demetrius with the missionary band is a matter of uncertainty. But it is clear that he had fallen under suspicion, and that Diotrephes, a prominent member of Caius's church, had succeeded in working on the resentment felt at the 'Elder's' support of a 'suspect,' to raise the question of the Elder's right to interfere in the affairs of the church, and to persuade his fellow-Christians to ignore a letter which the Elder had written to the church on the subject. On the whole, it is improbable that this letter (mentioned in v.<sup>9</sup>) is to be identified with the Second Epistle, which does not deal with the questions which must have been discussed in such a letter. But it is evident that the majority of the church are inclined to take the side of Diotrephes against the Elder, whose right of supervision is in serious danger of being set aside, though he is still confident that he can maintain it by personal intervention.

5. Historical background of the shorter Epistles.—Several interesting attempts have been made to reconstruct the historical background of the two shorter Epistles, among which mention should be made of the ingenious suggestions of J. Chapman (JThSt v. [1903-04] 357, 517), who finds the Demetrius of the Third Epistle in Demas (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>), and identifies the church addressed as Thessalonica, while in the Second Epistle (cf. v.<sup>4</sup> with Jn 10<sup>17c</sup>) he finds a warning addressed by the Presbyter, who may or may not be the son of Zebedee, to the Church of Rome (cf. 1 P 5<sup>13</sup>), against the False Teachers who are trying to get a hearing in the metropolis now that the First Epistle has closed the Asiatic churches to them. Vernon Bartlett's sound criticism (JThSt vi. [1904-05] 204) of the difficulties of these hypotheses should also be mentioned, and Rendel Harris's vigorous support of the view that the Second Letter is addressed to an individual lady and not to a church. Harnack's contribution (TU xv. 3) to the interpretation of the Epistles is of far more permanent value. He has shown the importance of their evidence as throwing light on an obscure period in the development of ecclesiastical organization in Asia, when the old missionary organization is breaking down, and the monarchical episcopate is beginning to emerge. He is, however, on less sure ground in arguing that the 'Presbyter' is fighting a losing battle against the new movement. It is at least as probable that he sees in it the best way of dealing with the dangers caused by the private ambitions of prominent members of the local churches, such as Diotrephes and other πρωτόκλεις. But Harnack is probably right in his view that the differences found in the Ignatian Epistles point to a stage of development later by some fifteen or twenty years.

6. Date.—The questions of authorship and date cannot be discussed satisfactorily apart from the wider question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel. If the view maintained above is correct, that the author of the Gospel wrote the Epistles at a somewhat later date, to emphasize those points in its teaching which seemed needed to meet the special dangers of somewhat changed circumstances, the date of the Epistles cannot be very long before or after the close of the 1st century. The only natural interpretation of the language of the first verse of the First Epistle is that the author claims to have been an eye-witness of the Ministry, unless indeed we are driven by other considerations to regard this as impossible. The tradition which assigned the two shorter Epistles to the 'Elder' offers the least difficult solution of a difficult problem. In the present state of our knowledge we must rest content with the suggestion that the same author is responsible for the First Epistle and the Gospel in something very like the form in which they have come down to us. It is probable that he has used the ideas and the recollections of another who was better qualified than himself to tell of the 'sacred words and no less sacred deeds' of the Lord, and to interpret them in the light of Christian experience.

The external evidence, which cannot be discussed in detail here, if naturally interpreted, points to similar conclusions. There is very little ground for doubting that Papias and Polycarp knew and valued the Epistles, or at least the first two Epistles. Probably the name of Ignatius should be added to the list. The traces of Johannine thought in his Epistles are clear. Reference may be made to the articles by H. J. Bardsley in JThSt xiv. [1912-13] 207, 489, though he has hardly succeeded in proving the literary use of apostolic documents. But the absence of direct references to the Apostle John, where we might reasonably expect them, are undoubtedly significant. The practically unanimous evidence of writers at the close of the 2nd cent. as to the Apostle's residence at Ephesus till the days of Trajan must be interpreted in the light of the probability of confusion between Elder and Apostle, and the strong probability that the work of Papias contained a statement of the martyrdom of John, the son of Zebedee. There are no serious grounds for setting aside the tradition which connects all the Johannine books with Asia Minor, and especially with Ephesus.

LITERATURE.—The only ancient Commentaries extant are those of Clement of Alexandria (on 1 and 2 John: extant only in Cassiodorus' Latin Summary [Clement, ed. Stahlin, iii., 1909]), Œcumenius, Theophylact, Augustine, and Bede. Among modern Commentaries may be mentioned those of F. Lücke<sup>3</sup> (1820-56), J. E. Huther<sup>4</sup> (in Meyer's Kommentar, 1855-80), H. Ewald (1862), E. Haupt (Eng. tr., 1879), R. Rothe (1878), R. F. Westcott (1883), B. Weiss (in Meyer's Kommentar, 1899), H. J. Holtzmann<sup>5</sup> (in Handkommentar zum NT, 1908), and H. Windisch (in Handbuch zum NT, 1911).

JOPPA (Ἰόππη; Josephus, Ἰόπη; Arab. Yāfā; modern name Jaffa).—Joppa is a maritime town of Palestine, 33 miles S.W. of Jerusalem. Built on an eminence visible far out at sea—whence its name, 'the conspicuous'—it owes its existence to a ridge of low and partly sunken rocks running out in a N.W. direction from the S. side of the town, and forming a harbour which, though small and insecure, is yet the best on the whole coast of Palestine.

Down to the time of the Maccabees, Joppa was a heathen town, which the Jews sometimes used but never possessed. Jonah's ship of Joppa was manned by a heathen crew (Jon 1<sup>5</sup>). One of the strongest proofs of the political sagacity of the three famous Maccabæan brothers lay in their resolve to make Judæa a maritime power. Each of them attempted to capture Joppa, and Simon succeeded. On the family memorial at Modin, meant for the eyes of 'all that sail on the sea,' he caused carved ships to be represented (1 Mac 13<sup>-9</sup>). The historian, in eulogizing his career, says: 'And amid all his glory he took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea' (14<sup>5</sup>). From that time, with but few interruptions, Joppa remained in the possession of the Jews for more than two centuries. When Pompey (66 B.C.) included Judæa in the province of Syria, Joppa was one of the cities which 'he left in a state of freedom' (Jos. Ant. xiv. iv. 4); and Julius Cæsar decreed 'that the city of Joppa, which the Jews had originally when they made a league of friendship with the Romans, shall belong to them as it formerly did' (x. 6).

No city was more completely judaized than this late possession. Joppa became as zealous for the Law, as patriotic, as impatient of Gentile control and culture, as Jerusalem herself. Herod the Great, who did much to hellenize Palestine, left the Pharisaic purity of Joppa untainted. Yet this stronghold of Jewish legalism was the city in which St. Peter received the vision which taught him that Jew and Gentile, as spiritually equal before God, must be impartially welcomed into the Church of Christ (Ac 10<sup>9-16</sup>). Nowhere was the contrast between the clean and the unclean—the devoutly scrupulous observers of the Law and the jostling crowd of foreigners—more marked. St. Peter probably never realized so intensely the need of ceremonial purification before his midday meal as when he brought into the tanner's house the defilement of contact with so many lawless and profane people. To his Jewish instincts such contamination was intolerable. But he experienced a swift and mysterious reaction, which was probably the result of much past brooding as well as of present prayer. While he lingered upon the housetop, waiting the call to eat, he became unconscious of the sights and sounds of the harbour beneath, and fell into a trance, in which he learned how different are God's thoughts of religious purity from man's. He became convinced that all manner of meats—and, inferentially, all manner of men—that were commonly counted unclean, were clean in God's sight. It is as the birthplace of this revolutionary principle, which virtually gave the death-blow to Judaism, that the old town of Joppa has a place in the history of human thought. St. Peter, always impulsive and uncalculating, went straight to pagan Caesarea, and delivered a speech which opened the gates of Christ's Church to 'every nation' (Ac 10<sup>35</sup>). Joppa has also a place in the history of Christian beneficence. It is remembered as the home of a gentlewoman who was believed to have been raised from death to life, and whose example has in all ages been an incentive to 'good works and almsdeeds' (Ac 9<sup>36-42</sup>).

To the ancient Greeks Joppa was known as the place where 'Andromeda was exposed to the sea-monster' (Strabo xvi. ii. 28). By primitive fancy the fury of the sea was ascribed to serpents and dragons. Modern writers rationalize the phenomenon. 'More boats are upset, and more lives are lost in the breakers at the north end of the ledge of rocks that defend the inner harbour, than anywhere else on this coast.' One cannot 'look without a shudder at this treacherous port, with its noisy surf tumbling over the rocks, as if on purpose to swallow up unfortunate boats. This is the true monster which has devoured many an Andromeda, for whose deliverance no gallant Perseus was at hand' (W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 1864, p. 516).

Jaffa is now famous for its orange gardens and orchards, each of which has an unlimited supply of water. 'The entire plain seems to cover a river of vast breadth, percolating through the sand en route to the sea' (W. M. Thomson, loc. cit.).

JOSEPH (Ἰωσήφ).—1. The elder of Jacob's two sons by Rachel, the eleventh Patriarch, the ancestor of the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. In St. Stephen's address before the Sanhedrin reference is made to Joseph's being sold by his brothers, God's presence with him in Egypt, his promotion to be governor of the land, his manifestation of himself to his brethren, his invitation to his father and all his kindred to migrate to Egypt (Ac 7<sup>9-14</sup>), and finally, at a much later date, the rise of a Pharaoh who 'knew not Joseph' (7<sup>18</sup>).

The question of the historicity of the narrative in Genesis was never raised by the Apostolic Church, nor by the modern Church till the dawn of the age of criticism. The critical verdict is that the story is based upon facts which have been idealized in the spirit of the earlier Hebrew prophets. That the tradition of a Hebrew minister in Egypt, who saved the country in time of famine, 'should be true in essentials is by no means improbable' (J. Skinner, Genesis [ICC, 1910] 441). Driver thinks it credible that an actual person, named Joseph, 'underwent substantially the experiences recounted of him in Gn.' (HDB II. 771b). See H. Gunkel, Genesis, 1910, p. 356 f.

In He 11<sup>21</sup> allusion is made to the blessing received by Joseph's two sons from his dying father. In 11<sup>22</sup> Joseph is placed on the roll of the 'elders'—saints of the OT—who by their words and deeds gave evidence of their faith. The particular facts selected as proving his grasp of things unseen—which is the essence of faith (11<sup>1</sup>)—are his death-bed prediction of the exodus of the children of Israel and his commandment regarding the disposal of his bones (Gn 50<sup>24, 25</sup>; cf. Jos 24<sup>32</sup>). Though he was an Egyptian governor, speaking the Egyptian language, and married to an Egyptian wife, he was at heart an unchanged Hebrew, and his dying eyes beheld the land from which he had been exiled as a boy, the homeland of every true Israelite.

2. Joseph Barsabbas, surnamed Justus, was one of those who accompanied Jesus during His whole public ministry and witnessed His Resurrection. He was therefore nominated, along with Matthias, for the office made vacant by the treachery and death of Judas Iscariot (Ac 1<sup>21-3</sup>). After prayer 'the lot fell upon Matthias' (1<sup>26</sup>). It is admitted even by radical critics that Jesus deliberately chose twelve disciples (corresponding to the twelve tribes of Israel), and it was natural that these should seek to keep their sacred number unimpaired. The name 'Barsabbas' (or 'Barsabas,' C, Vulg., Syrr.) has been variously explained as 'child of the Sabbath,' 'son of Sheba,' 'warrior,' or 'old man's son.' The Roman surname Justus was adopted in accordance with a Jewish custom which prevailed at the time—cf. 'John whose surname was Marcus' (Ac 12<sup>12, 25</sup>), and 'Saul, who is also Paulus' (13<sup>9</sup>). It is a natural conjecture—no more—that this Joseph was the brother of Judas Barsabbas (15<sup>22</sup>). Eusebius (HE i. 12) regards him as one of 'the Seventy' (Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), and records (iii. 39) that a 'wonderful event happened respecting Justus, surnamed Barsabbas, who, though he drank a deadly poison, experienced nothing injurious (μηδεν ἄγιος), by the grace of God.'

3. Joseph, surnamed Barnabas (Ac 4<sup>36</sup>). See BARNABAS. JAMES STRAHAN.

JOSEPHUS.—For a proper understanding of the Apostolic Age there are, apart from the Epistles of Paul and the Acts of the Apostles, no documents of such value as the writings of Josephus.

1. Life and character.—We have an account of the life of Josephus from his own pen. He was born in Jerusalem in A.D. 37, his father being Matthias, a priest of noble lineage, and belonging to the first course of the priesthood, i.e. Jojarib, while on his mother's side he was connected with the royal Hasmonæan house. He was a child of excellent parts, and received a superior education. He studied the principles of the three main sects of Judaism under professional teachers of each, and lived for three years in the society of an ascetic hermit named Banus—a discipline then regarded as a desideratum of good breeding (we find something of the same kind in the early life of Seneca). At the age of nineteen he attached himself to the Pharisaic party. In A.D. 64 he visited Rome, where, through the influence of a Jewish actor named Alityrus, he succeeded in gaining the ear of the Empress Poppæa—first the mistress, and from A.D. 62 the wife, of Nero—and so securing the liberation of some Jewish priests who had been put in bonds by Felix. Josephus had scarcely returned to Jerusalem when, in A.D. 66, he was drawn into the movement which, springing from the long-accumulating hatred of Rome among the Jews, and fanned by the agitation of certain fanatics, soon burst forth in the lurid flames of revolt and war. It is true that the more eminent priestly ranks to which Josephus belonged, as also the leaders of the Pharisaic party, were altogether averse to an insurrection against the overwhelming power of the Roman Empire. Presently, however, the movement resolved itself so decisively into a national cause, a war of the Lord, that Josephus was quite unable to stand aloof. He undertook the command of Galilee, where, in spite of the personal hostility of the zealot John of Gischala, he organized the Jewish defence during the winter of 66-67. For six weeks he withstood with great skill and daring the Roman assault upon Jotapata, a fortress commanding the line of approach from Ptolemais, and then played his part with such address that, falling into the hands of the Romans as the last survivor of the siege, he caught the personal notice of Vespasian by means of a prophecy. His life was spared, and when his prediction was at length fulfilled by the proclamation of Vespasian as Emperor (3 July, A.D. 69), he regained his freedom. From that time he called himself Flavius Josephus, and for the remainder of the war—during the siege of Jerusalem—the erstwhile leader in the rebellion acted as adviser and interpreter in the headquarters of Titus. Thereafter he accompanied the victorious Titus to Rome, and settled down as a litterateur, enjoying the esteem and the bounty of the Flavian Emperors, and devoting himself to the task of doing battle with spiritual weapons for the now politically shattered cause of his nation. As Josephus mentions the death of Agrippa II. (A.D. 100: Photius, Cod. 33), he must have survived till the reign of Trajan. He was four times married, and had five sons. According to Ens. HE III. ix. 2, a statue was raised in his honour, and his works were placed in the public library.

In personal character, as even the above brief outline of his career suffices to show, Josephus was not free from decidedly sinister traits. A thorough Jew, he was always able to make the most of his opportunities, and was not over-scrupulous as to the means he employed. Even his vanity serves to bring him into clearer light. As a man he was far from great. It is not, however, the man that concerns us here, but the historian; and if, even in that capacity, his talent was of a distinctly mediocre order, yet, in virtue of our interest in his subject, he is for us one of the most important historical authors we have.

2. Works.—(a) The Jewish War.—Josephus devoted his powers first of all to a work of the most vital moment for us, viz. a history of the Jewish war against Rome (Bellum Judaicum [referred to as BJ]). Although he had doubtless learned Greek in his youth, he felt that he could not yet write as a Greek author. He therefore composed his first work in his native language, i.e. Aramaic, and afterwards, with the help of literary collaborators, reproduced it in a Greek form, which, however, was not a mere translation, but rather a recast of the original. This Greek edition was published in the closing years of Vespasian's reign, between A.D. 75 and 79. As against the many unreliable and merely hearsay reports of the war, and the mischievous distortions of fact emanating from anti-Jewish feeling, Josephus proposed, as an eyewitness, to give an unbiased and veracious chronicle, which, by means of a just estimate of the Jewish people, of their good qualities and their military achievements, should not only exhibit in a clearer light the tragic element in the catastrophe they had brought upon themselves, but should also make manifest the real greatness of the Roman triumph. Accordingly, in the seven books of this work, after a survey of Jewish history from the Maccabæan revolt to the death of Herod the Great (bk. I.), he shows how events moved swiftly towards the rebellion: the mismanagement of affairs under the sons of Herod, the growing maladministration of the Roman procurators, and more particularly—after a short interlude of national Pharisaic ascendancy in the reign of Agrippa I.—of the incompetent Albinus and Gessius Florus (bk. II.). The history proper begins with the expedition of Vespasian to Judæa at a time when the whole land was already in arms: bk. III. describes the conquest of Galilee, with its two culminating points, the capture of Jotapata and that of Taricheæ; bk. IV. narrates the somewhat dilatory prosecution of the war to the time of Vespasian's being proclaimed Emperor, and his withdrawal to Egypt, and tells also of the anarchical state of Jerusalem; bks. V. and VI., starting from the return of Titus from Alexandria, describe the siege of the capital, and the internecine strife of the besieged, and close with the burning of the Temple (10th of the month Ab=July–August A.D. 70); and bk. VII. serves as an epilogue to the whole, recording the triumph of Titus and the long-protracted subjugation of the southern part of the country till the Fall of Masada (April 73). In bk

III. (ch. iii.) Josephus gives a description of Galilee, and in bk. V. (chs. iv. and v.) an account of Jerusalem, and of the Temple and its services. At the end of ch. V. he indicates his intention of dealing with the city more exhaustively in a later work.

(b) The Antiquities.—He fulfilled this design in his Antiquities of the Jews, which he completed in A.D. 93–94. The work was probably composed on the plan of the Roman Archaeology of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, published almost exactly a century before (8 B.C.). In the Antiquities Josephus recounts in twenty books the history of his people from the creation of the world. His principal source was the OT, with which, however, he deals very freely, and he does not scruple to introduce Haggadic elements. In bk. I. he carries the narrative to the death of Isaac, and in II. to the exodus from Egypt; III. describes the giving of the Law; IV. the wanderings in the desert, and Moses' directions for the organization of the future commonwealth; V. the conquest of Canaan under Joshua and the Judges; VI. and VII. the reigns of Saul and David respectively; VIII.–X. the reign of Solomon, and the period of the kings until the Exile; XI. the restoration of the nation under Cyrus, and its history till Alexander the Great; XII. Judæa under the Seleucids; XIII. the Maccabæan revolt, and the Hasmonæan rule till Alexandra's death (67 B.C.); XIV. the intervention of the Romans under Pompey, consequent upon the wars between the brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; XV. Herod's winning the crown, and his reign till the building of the Temple; XVI. the tragedy of Herod's family till the execution of Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne; XVII. the period from the execution of Antipater and the death of Herod till the deposition of Archelaus (A.D. 6); XVIII. the Roman administration; XIX. the period of the Emperors Gaius and Claudius—otherwise the reign of Agrippa I. († A.D. 44); XX. the last Roman procurators till the outbreak of the rebellion (A.D. 66). Thus bks. XIII.–XX. of the Antiquities run parallel with bks. I. and II. of the BJ.

(c) Minor works; projected works; pseudonymous works.—Josephus hoped to supplement his Antiquities by a narrative bringing down the history to the reign of Domitian—i.e. by an abridgment and continuation of the BJ (Ant. XX. xi. 3 [267]),* and he also projected an account of the Jewish faith and the Jewish Law in four books (ib. [263]). Neither of these works, if ever written, has come down to us. The Antiquities, however, is followed by an autobiography (Vita), written after A.D. 100, and here Josephus endeavours to meet the charges with which Justus of Tiberias assailed his conduct during the war in Galilee in A.D. 66–67. The apology for Judaism in two books, in which Josephus replies to the attacks of Apion, an Alexandrian litterateur (contra Apionem), may be regarded as in some degree a compensation for the second of the projected works, and was composed subsequently to the Antiquities. The two works entitled Of self-governing Reason (περί αυτοκράτορος λογισμῶν)—the so-called Fourth Book of Maccabees and Of the All (περί τοῦ παντός), ascribed to Josephus by Eusebius and Photius respectively, are certainly not his. The former was probably written by an Alexandrian Jew; the latter, which survives only in a small fragment, is in all likelihood the work of Hippolytus.

3. Literary methods.—The manner in which Josephus seeks to present Judaism to the Greek mind ranks him among the Alexandrian apologists of that faith, though he claims to write merely as a historian; and, as a matter of fact, he owes more to the tradition of Palestinian Rabbinism than to that of Alexandria. His hellenizing tendency manifests itself strikingly in his reproduction of biblical history; unlike Philo, he gives the biblical names in a Greek form, writing Adamos, Abelos, Abramios, Isakos, Iakobos, Esauos, Iosepos, etc.; and, what is more, he hellenizes even the ideas, especially in the speeches and prayers of the Patriarchs, which he introduces quite in the style of contemporary historical composition, as e.g. in Ant. I. xviii. 6 [272 f.]; other instances are Solomon's prayers at the dedication of the Temple (VIII. iv. 2 f. [107 ff.]), and his correspondence with Hiram of Tyre (VIII. ii. 6, 7 [51–54]). A genuinely apologetic idea lies in the statement that the Egyptians owed their far-famed proficiency in mathematics and astrology to Abraham (I. viii. 2 [167]). Josephus tells us, further, that Moses composed in hexameters (II. xvi. 4 [346]), and David in trimeters and pentameters (VII. xii. 3 [305]). He devotes considerable space to the traditions—taken from the Epistle of Aristaeas—regarding the Greek version of the Mosaic Law executed at the court of Ptolemy II., by seventy-two wise men from Jerusalem (XII. ii. [11–118]). But perhaps the most characteristic instance of his hellenizing tendency is his description of the Jewish sects (XIII. v. 9 [171–173], BJ II. viii. 2–14 [119–166]), which he seeks to divest of all political significance, and to represent as the exact counterparts of the philosophic schools of Greece (Pharisees=Stoics; Sadducees=Epicureans; and Essenes=Pythagoreans): an affinity which he tries to establish by introducing quite irrelevant considerations, such as their attitude to the problems of free-will and fate—thus misleading even modern investigators—while, as a matter of fact, the unphilosophical and non-Hellenic character of the sects reveals itself at every point. Thus Josephus, in spite of his Hellenic guise, is in all things a genuine Jew, a Palestinian Rabbi: witness, for instance—as compared with the tractates of Philo—his version of the story of Moses, where he not only gives us the name of Pharaoh's daughter (Thermuthis), but also relates how Moses as a child was presented to Pharaoh, and how, when the king put his diadem on the child's head, the latter threw it upon the ground; and again, how, when Moses had grown to manhood, and was in command of an Egyptian army in a war against Ethiopia, he broke a way into that all but inaccessible country by making use of ibises to destroy the serpents which obstructed the march, and further, how he captured the impregnable city of Saba (or Meroe; Philae, an island in the Nile?) by gaining the love of Tharbis, the daughter of the Ethiopian king (Ant. II. ix. 5, 7 [224–227, 232–237], x. 2 [243–253]). This is pure Rabbinical Haggada. Of the same character are the fabulous embellishments of the story of Joseph (II. iv. [39–59]), as also the many references to superstitions which the Jews of the day had in common with the Greeks, as e.g. in the stories about Solomon (VIII. ii. 5 [42 ff.]): here Josephus states that he had personally witnessed an exorcism which a Jew named Eleazar performed before Vespasian and his officers by means of a ring, a root, and certain incantations, all associated with Solomon. How little the horizon of Josephus extended beyond Palestine is shown also by the brevity with which he treats of the persecutions of the Jews in Alexandria, and of the famous embassy of Philo to the court of Gaius Caligula (XVIII. viii. 1 [257 ff.]).

4. Sources.—Josephus is throughout very dependent on his sources. Where the biblical narrative fails him, a constraint falls upon his language. Of the period between Cyrus and Alexander the Great he has nothing to record, and he lures the reader across the gap by a long extract from the Epistle of Aristaeas. For the history of the Maccabees he keeps close to 1 Mac. For the succeeding period he cites numerous documents, which, unlike the speeches, he did not invent but probably quoted verbatim (as found in a collection formed by Agrippa I.?). For the facts of universal history he was indebted first to Polybius (till 143 B.C.) and then to Strabo. For the reign of Herod the Great he manifestly utilizes the voluminous work of Nicolaus of Damascus, who, as the counsellor of Herod, had exalted his patron to the skies. It is true that Josephus controverts Nicolaus, but, while he sets many matters of detail in a different light, he borrows from him the actual facts; hence, too, the profusion of material in bks. XV.–XVII. as contrasted with the meagre data of the following period. But even for the latter he is not entirely dependent upon his own personal recollections, but falls back upon documents; and, in fact, while preparing this part of his Antiquities, he seems to have re-examined, and here and there to have more fully utilized, the same authorities from which he had already quoted more briefly in BJ I. and II. He has thus to some extent furnished us with the means of controlling his work as a historian.

5. Credibility.—Our estimate of the historic reliability of Josephus, despite the personal attestation of Titus and the sixty-two commendatory letters of Agrippa II. (c. Apion. i. 9 [51 f.], Vit. 65 [363 f.]), will scarcely be a favourable one if we compare the Vita with the relative sections of the BJ, inasmuch as each differs greatly from the other in the impression it conveys of his conduct during the Galilaean campaign. We must remember, however, that the former is really a book of personal reminiscences, and, like most works of its kind, exhibits the writer's tendency to exculpate himself; and it would therefore be far from right to found our judgment of Josephus as a historian upon the Vita. As regards the BJ, we may certainly affirm that it is a carefully executed work, and that in the Antiquities the author has in general reproduced—though with a veneer of Hellenism—what his sources supplied. But he exaggerates in his numerical data, and he over-praises the generosity of the Romans. As another misleading tendency we need only mention his having done his best to suppress the Messianic expectations of his people, or at least to purge them of all political import. He set the seal on this attitude by assuring Vespasian—the oppressor of his nation—in God's name that the coming sovereignty of the whole world should one day be his (BJ III. viii. 9 [401 f.]).

Nevertheless, the manner in which he has woven his materials into the texture of his narrative frequently arouses misgiving. A number of his references to other passages of his writings (cf. Ant. XI. viii. 1 [305], XVIII. ii. 5 [54]) cannot be verified in his extant works, and must therefore have been inadvertently taken over from the source he happened to be using. In chronology especially he shows himself to be a very unsafe guide. He has no regular method of dating—neither consulates nor reigns—and it is only occasionally that we find such chronological references as 'the third year of the 177th Olympiad, when Quintus Hortensius and Quintus Metellus were consuls' (Ant. XIV. i. 2 [4]), i.e. 67 B.C. Moreover, events from different sources and of different dates are thrown promiscuously together. A characteristic instance is found in the history of Pilate. While in BJ (II. ix. 2–4 [169–177]) Josephus refers to Pilate only in connexion with the two tumults which he caused by introducing into Jerusalem standards bearing the figure of the Emperor and by using the Temple funds for the construction of an aqueduct, he apparently gives a much fuller record in Ant. (xviii. ii. 2-iv. 2 [35-89]). Here, after referring to Valerius Gratus as the first procurator of Judæa under Tiberius (14-37)—the four successive changes in the high-priesthood being all that he thinks worthy of mention in the eleven years of that procuratorship—Josephus records (in xviii. ii. 2 [35]) Pilate's accession to the office, an event that cannot be dated earlier than A.D. 26. But before dealing (in xviii. iii. 1-2 [55-62]) with the tumults which he had already described in BJ, he describes from another source the founding of Tiberias by Herod Antipas (xviii. ii. 3 [36-38]), the embroilments among the Parthians consequent upon the death of Phraates (A.D. 16; Tac. Ann. ii. 1 f.), the extinction of the royal house of Commagene in the death of Antiochus (A.D. 17; Tac. ii. 42), and the murder of Germanicus (10 Oct. A.D. 19; Tac. ii. 69 ff.). Next, after recounting the two Jewish tumults referred to, he relates two events which evidently had already been conjoined in the Roman tradition (Cluvius Rufus?), for only the second belongs to his subject (as giving an example of the ill-fortune that beset the Jews): the first deals with the outrage in the Temple of Isis in Rome, where the priests lent themselves to a trick by which a Roman lady of repute was beguiled sub prætextu religionis to yield herself to a lover (xviii. iii. 4 [65-80]); the second with the fraud practised by four Jews upon another Roman matron—an incident which led to the expulsion of the Jews from Rome by the decree of Tiberius, and to the drafting of 4,000 recruits from amongst them to Sardinia (A.D. 19) (xviii. iii. 5 [81-84]; cf. Tac. Ann. ii. 85). Then at length the narrative returns to Pilate, for the purpose of showing that he was deposed by Vitellius in consequence of a revolt of the Samaritans (xviii. iv. 1 [85 ff.]), and that, after his ten years of office, he was sent to Rome to defend his actions before Tiberius, arriving there, however, only after the Emperor's death (16 March, A.D. 37). This outline will serve to show how little the narrative takes account of strict chronological sequence, as also—to take but one instance—how unwarranted it is of Schürer, on the supposed evidence of Josephus, to assign the foundation of Tiberias to a date after A.D. 25, while numismatists, with a considerable show of reason, had fixed it in A.D. 17. Similarly, from the statement of Josephus that the defeat of Herod Antipas in the war against his father-in-law Aretas of Arabia (an event which should probably be assigned to A.D. 36) was regarded as a punishment for his murder of John the Baptist, we have no right to draw conclusions as to the date of that event or to that of the entrance of Jesus upon His public ministry, as has been done by Keim and others, who have on the same grounds fixed upon A.D. 35 as the date of the Crucifixion.

6. Attitude to Christianity.—A question of the utmost importance is that of the attitude of Josephus to Christianity. As he describes the period in such minute detail, we naturally ask whether he ever alludes to that powerful movement amongst his fellow-countrymen; and his mention of the slaying of John the Baptist prompts the question whether he records the Crucifixion of Jesus and the martyrdom of His disciples. It is certainly true that in the Antiquities, between the two sections dealing, as noted above, with Pilate, we find the following passage (xviii. iii. 3 [63-64]):

'Now about this time appeared Jesus, a wise man, if indeed one may call Him a man; for He was a doer of marvellous works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with gladness, and He drew to Himself many of the Jews, as also many of the Greeks. He was the Christ; and when, on the indictment of the leading men amongst us, Pilate had sentenced Him to the Cross, those who loved Him at the first did not cease to do so; for on the third day He again appeared to them alive, as the divine prophets had affirmed these and innumerable other things concerning Him. And the race of Christians, which takes its name from Him, is not yet extinct.'

On the strength of this testimonium de Christo, which is quoted by Eusebius (HE i. xi. 7, 8; cf. Demonstr. Evang. iii. iii. 105; Theoph. v. 44), Josephus was reckoned among Christian writers by Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 13), and honoured as such throughout the Middle Ages. But modern criticism has thrown serious doubts upon the authenticity of the passage, and not without good reason. For not only does Origen seem to be unacquainted with it—otherwise he would certainly have referred to it in in Matth. tom. x. 17 and c. Celsum, i. 47—but, as regards its contents, it simply could not have come from a man like Josephus, more especially in view of the fact that, as we have seen, he anxiously avoids all reference to the Messianic expectations of his people. (The view, proposed by Burkitt and strengthened by Harnack, that Josephus used the failure of the Messianic movement in the case of Jesus for the purpose of demonstrating that no Messianic aspirations were left after this in the Jewish people, is not supported by the text as it stands.) Thus the only question that remains is whether an authentic statement of Josephus has been worked over by a Christian hand (so, recently, among others, the Roman Catholic scholar, J. Felten [NTZG, Regensburg, 1910, i. 618]), or whether the whole is an interpolation of Christian origin (so Niese, Naber, Schürer, and others). Even on the first alternative it is hardly possible to make out what Josephus himself could have written. The parallel cited by Zahn (Forschungen zur Gesch. des neutest. Kanons, vi. [Leipzig, 1900], p. 302) from the Acta Pilati belongs to the late Byzantine recension of that work, and is in reality an echo of the very passage under consideration.

A second passage of similar character is Ant. xx. ix. 1 [200 f.], where the judicial murder of James 'the brother of Jesus who was called Christ' (Messiah?) and of some others, by Ananus, the high priest, is referred to as having been disapproved of by the strict observers of the Law (Pharisees?). But here too the work of another hand is unmistakable: Origen (loc. cit., and also c. Celsum, ii. 13) had read a similar interpolation in Josephus, though in some other part of his works.

The whole question has become somewhat more complicated by A. Berendts' discovery of a Slavonic recension of the BJ. Just as, side by side with the accurate Lat. version of the Ant. executed at the instance of Cassiodorus, a very free translation of the BJ, the de Excidio Hierusalem of Hegesippus (the so-called Iosippus), bearing a thoroughly Christian character, was current—often under the name of Ambrose—in the West, so there was found among the Slavonic MSS a very peculiar form of the BJ, giving a detailed account of the trial of Jesus. Berendts propounded the theory that this really represented the original form of the BJ, and had therefore preserved authentic utterances of Josephus regarding Christ (the Slavonic Enoch, which in part goes back to a Judæo-Aramaic original, would furnish a parallel case). Berendts was able to show that in this Slavonic BJ we have a record largely divergent from the Greek text, and exhibiting a markedly anti-Roman bias—a record, too, which, as e.g. in the chapter dealing with the Essenes, appears to have been used by Hippolytus, so that, in spite of the legendary air of many of its features, it is hardly reasonable, with Schürer and others, to assign it to a late date. Moreover, its references to Jesus are not of a character that suggests interpolation from the Christian side. Hence, if we reject the hypothesis of Berendts, the only theory that we have to fall back upon is that of an early Jewish redaction, as proposed by R. Seeborg and Frey. A final verdict will be possible only when the complete text is in our hands.

7. Relation of St. Luke to Josephus.—Finally, a question of special importance for our knowledge of the Apostolic Age is that of the relation of St. Luke to Josephus. Many scholars believe that the numerous resemblances between them—intelligible enough surely where both writers are dealing with the same period—can be explained only on the theory that St. Luke made use of Josephus

Were this really the case, it would certainly be a fact of great importance, not only for our estimate of the Evangelist's credibility, but also for fixing the date of his works, which, on this theory, could not have been written till after the publication of the Antiquities (A.D. 93-94), i.e. the beginning of the 2nd century. The most thorough-going adherent of the theory is Krenkel (Josephus und Lucas), who finds, for instance, in St. Luke's narrative of the Infancy, a free reproduction from the Vita; but the majority restrict the theory to certain Lucan passages which they hold to be dependent on Josephus (e.g. Lk 3<sup>1</sup>, Lysanias of Abilene, and Ac 25<sup>13</sup>, Agrippa and Berenice with Festus, etc.). The crucial passage, however, is Ac 5<sup>36a</sup>, with its inaccurate historical sequence, Theudas—Judas of Galilee; and the error is supposed to be explained by Ant. XX. v. 1, 2 [97 f., 102], where the slaying of the sons of Judas by Tiberius Alexander is recorded after the crushing of Theudas's insurrection by Cuspius Fadus. The theory would impute to St. Luke an almost incredible misunderstanding, which would indeed presuppose his having used Josephus in a manner so superficial as to lead one to say that, if he had ever read the work of Josephus at all, he must have forgotten it entirely. The two authors, in point of fact, are obviously quite independent of each other. Thus St. Luke (13<sup>14</sup>) mentions a Galilaean revolt of which Josephus takes no cognizance, while the three revolts recorded by Josephus as having occurred under Pilate find no mention in Luke.

It is particularly instructive to compare their respective accounts of the death of Agrippa I. (Ant. XIX. viii. 2 [343-352]; Ac 12<sup>20-29</sup>). Here Josephus writes as follows:

'Now when [Agrippa] had reigned three years over all Judæa he came to the city of Cæsarea, which was formerly called Strato's Tower, and there he provided games in honour of Cæsar, thus instituting a festival for the emperor's health. To this festival a great number of the officials and eminent people of the province had come together. On the second day of the games he put on a robe made wholly of silver and of a wonderful texture, and came into the theatre at the dawn of day. The silver, illuminated by the first beams of the sun, shone forth in a strangely awe-inspiring manner and gleamed fearfully in the eyes of those who looked on. Presently his flatterers, one here, another there, called out words which were not to turn out to his good, addressing him as a god, and adding: "Be thou propitious; if till now we feared thee as a man, henceforth we confess that thou art exalted above mortal nature." This the king did not rebuke, nor did he reject the impious flattery. But when after a while he looked upwards, he saw the owl [in xviii. vi. 7 [195-200]] it is related that the owl had appeared to Agrippa at Rome] sitting on a rope over his head, and he perceived at once that it was a messenger of misfortune, as it had formerly been a messenger of good fortune, and he experienced an anguish that struck through his heart. He was seized with severe intestinal pain, which set in with great force. Springing up, he said to his friends: "A god in your eyes, I must nevertheless even now resign my life: fate thus immediately punishes the lies you falsely spoke, and I, whom you named immortal, am carried away by death; but a man must accept his destiny, as it pleases God; yet we have lived by no means ill, but in a splendour worthy of praise." Having spoken these words, he was seized with increasing agony. He was accordingly carried hurriedly into the palace, and the news of his imminent death soon spread to all. Then the multitude, with wives and children, all lying in sackcloth, according to their native custom, besought God for the king, and everything was full of sighing and lamentation. And when the king, lying upon the high roof, looked down and saw them thus prostrated in prayer, he could not himself refrain from tears. After he had been sorely tormented with intestinal pains for five days, he resigned his life, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and in the seventh of his reign.'

When we compare this diffuse narrative, with its sentimentality and superstition, with the short, vigorous, and sincerely pious record of St. Luke, we see at once the vast difference between the two writers: on the one side, Josephus, the hellenizing Jew; and, on the other, St. Luke, a Christian of heathen origin, reading history in the light of the Bible. For further comparison we might take, e.g., the account of St. Paul's shipwreck (Ac 27. 28) and that of a similar experience of Josephus (Vit. 3 [14 ff.]). Josephus is of importance for us, therefore, not as a source of St. Luke's writings, but as a means of supplementing and checking them; and, indeed, it would be impossible without his help to write a history of New Testament times.

JOSES.—See BARNABAS.

JOSHUA (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, later יֵשׁוּעַ, 'Jahweh is deliverance or salvation').—Joshua, the successor of Moses in the leadership of Israel, was named 'Ἰησοῦς in the LXX and NT, and therefore 'Jesus' in the English AV; but the Revisers, in accordance with their rule of reproducing OT names in the Hebrew rather than the Greek form, have changed this into 'Joshua.' St. Stephen in his apologia speaks of the fathers entering with Joshua into the possession of the nations (Ac 7<sup>45</sup>); and the writer of Hebrews, imbued with Alexandrian—i.e. Platonic and Philonic—teaching as to the distinction between visible things and their heavenly ideas, says that the rest which Joshua gave the Israelites, when he led them into the promised land, was after all not the Rest of God, but only the material symbol suggesting the spiritual reality—the Sabbath-rest which remains in the unseen world for the people of God (He 4<sup>8-9</sup>). JAMES STRAHAN.

JOY.—1. Context.—Various words correspond in the original to the word 'joy' of the English Bible, its derivatives and synonyms. The terms χαρά and χαίρειν (etymologically allied to χάρις, 'charm,' 'grace') denote pleasurable feeling experienced in the mental sphere. On the other hand, ἡδονή, ἡδεσθαι (the verb not found in the NT) largely denote joy in the sphere of the senses. Alongside of this distinction runs the other difference that χαρά stands for the wholesome, unreflecting joy which occupies itself with the object of its source, whereas ἡδονή designates the joy which subjectively dwells on its own sensation. In the NT the latter term is used only sensu malo (Lk 8<sup>14</sup>, Tit 3<sup>3</sup>, Ja 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>13</sup>). The terms εὐφραίνειν and εὐφροσύνη describe a genial, pleasurable state of feeling such as is engendered by good fare or some other happy festive condition (usually rendered by 'to be merry,' 'to make merry' [Lk 12<sup>19</sup> 15<sup>23, 24, 29, 32</sup> 16<sup>19</sup>, Ac 2<sup>26</sup> 7<sup>41</sup> 14<sup>17</sup>, Ro 15<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>2</sup>, Gal 4<sup>27</sup>, Rev 11<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>]). The terms εὐθυμος, εὐθυμω, εὐθυμειν are used of hopeful good cheer with reference to the outcome of some situation or undertaking (Ac 24<sup>10</sup> 27<sup>2-5, 36</sup>, Ja 5<sup>13</sup>). ἀγαλλίασις, ἀγαλλίαν stand for the deep joy of exultation, hence are joined by way of climax to χαίρειν (Mt 5<sup>12</sup>, Lk 14<sup>44, 47</sup> 10<sup>-1</sup>, Jn 5<sup>35</sup> 8<sup>56</sup>, Ac 2<sup>26, 46</sup> 16<sup>34</sup>, He 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>6, 8</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, Jude 2<sup>4</sup>, Rev 19<sup>7</sup>). In still another conception, that of καυχᾶσθαι, the element of joy is an inevitable ingredient, but the word as such denotes a specific state of mind, viz. 'glorying,' the exalted feeling in which the consciousness of the spiritual worth of the religious subject in its association with and subserviency to the glory of God expresses itself (for this conception cf. A. Ritschl, Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung<sup>2</sup>, ii. [1882] 365-371; A. Titius, Die neutest. Lehre von der Seligkeit, ii. [1900] 91-96).

2. Joy as a general characteristic of the Christian life.—Joy appears in the NT writings as an outstanding characteristic of the Christian life in the Apostolic Age. In the Pauline Epistles especially it figures prominently. It is one of the three great ingredients of the Kingdom of God (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>) it receives the second place in the enumeration of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>; cf. 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup>); the descriptions of the Christian life frequently refer to it (Ac 2<sup>46</sup> 8<sup>39</sup> 13<sup>52</sup> 16<sup>34</sup>, Ro 12<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>8</sup>). That this joy is not a mere by-product of the Christian state without inherent religious significance appears from the further fact that the constant cultivation of it is enjoined upon believers (2 Co 13<sup>1</sup>, Ph 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>4</sup> ['rejoice always'], 1 Th 5<sup>16</sup>, Ja 1<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>). The Apostle even makes it an object of prayer (Ro 15<sup>13</sup>), and represents its attainment as the goal of his apostolic activity for the churches (2 Co 1<sup>-4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>-5</sup>). The prevalence of a joyful state of mind in the early Church may also be inferred from the numerous references to thanksgiving as a regular Christian occupation (Ro 1<sup>21</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>2</sup>, Eph 5<sup>20</sup>, Ph 4<sup>6</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>). In view of all this, it may be surmised that the conventional formula of salutation by means of χαίρειν has perhaps, when used among believers, acquired a deeper meaning (cf. Mt 28<sup>9</sup>, Lk 12<sup>8</sup>, Ac 15<sup>22</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>11</sup>, Ja 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 Jn 10<sup>-11</sup>).

When we come to inquire into the causes of the facts just reviewed, the first place must be given to (a) the vivid consciousness of salvation which is present in the Apostolic Age. Through the restored fellowship with God and the forgiveness of sin a joy streams into the heart which is coloured by the contrast of the opposite experience belong-

A second cause may be found in (b) the highly pneumatic character of the religious experience in the Apostolic Age. The Spirit as the gift of the Ascended and Glorified Christ to His followers, manifested His presence and power in these early days after a most uplifting fashion, and among other things produced in believers an exalted state of feeling in which the note of joyousness predominated. The conjunction of joy and the Spirit, however, does not merely mean that the Spirit produces this joy: it is due to the inherent character of the Spirit, so that to be in the Spirit and to be filled with joy become synonymous (Ac 2<sup>46</sup> 13<sup>52</sup>, Ro 14<sup>17</sup>). The Spirit possesses this inherent character as a Spirit of joy because He is essentially the element of the life to come. This leads to the observation that in the third place (c) the joyfulness of the early Christian consciousness must be explained in the light of the fact that the Christian state is felt to be semi-eschatological, i.e. in many important respects an anticipation of the consummated life of the Kingdom of God. Through the entrance of the Messiah into glory, through His pneumatic presence and activity in the Church, and through the prospect of His speedy return, believers have been brought into real contact with the world to come. The specific character of the world to come is that of blessedness and joy, and to the same degree as this world projects itself through experience or hope into the present life, the latter also comes to partake of this joyful complexion. Especially in St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews can we trace this connexion, though it is not absent from any of the NT writings (Ro 12<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, He 10<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>6, 8</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, Jude 2<sup>4</sup>, Rev 19<sup>7</sup>). Jesus Himself had already represented the spiritual coming of the Kingdom, the time of His presence with the disciples as a period of joy, resembling a wedding-feast (Mk 2<sup>19</sup>), and had pointed forward to the dispensation of the Spirit as a period of joy (Jn 14<sup>28</sup> 15<sup>11</sup> 16<sup>20, 22, 24</sup> 17<sup>13</sup>). On this principle is to be explained the paradoxical character which the Christian joy assumes through entering into contrast with the tribulation and affliction of this present life. It even makes out of the latter a cause for rejoicing, inasmuch as the believer, from the power of faith which sustains him, receives the assurance of his 'approvedness' (δοκιμή) with God, and thus the strongest conceivable hope in the eschatological salvation. Ro 5<sup>3ff.</sup> is the classical passage for this, but the same train of thought meets us in a number of other Pauline passages, and occasionally elsewhere, sometimes in pointedly paradoxical formulation (Ac 5<sup>41</sup>, Col 1<sup>11</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>6</sup>, He 10<sup>34</sup>, Ja 1<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>13</sup>). Most frequently this specific kind of joy is expressed in connexion with the idea of καυχᾶσθαι, 'to glory' (cf. above; Ro 5<sup>2, 3</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>, Ja 1<sup>9</sup>).

3. The joy of St. Paul.—To be distinguished from this general joy as a common ingredient of all Christian experience is the specific joy which belongs to the servant of God engaged in the work of his calling. Of this joy of ministering, the delight and satisfaction that accompany the successful discharge of the apostolic task, the NT makes frequent mention. The Pauline Epistles are full of it. The Apostle runs his course with joy (Ac 20<sup>24</sup> [some textual authorities here omit 'with joy']); rejoices exceedingly over the obedience of believers (Ro 16<sup>19</sup>); though sorrowful, yet is always rejoicing in his work (2 Co 6<sup>10</sup>); overflows with joy on account of his converts (2 Co 7<sup>4</sup>); makes his supplication with joy on their behalf (Ph 1<sup>4</sup>); their progress in love and harmony makes full his joy (Ph 2-); he rejoices in the prospect of being offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith (Ph 2<sup>17</sup>); rejoices in his sufferings for their sake (Col 1-4); feels that no thanksgiving can adequately express his joy before God on their account (1 Th 3<sup>9</sup>). Specific developments in his ministry furnish occasion for special joy (1 Co 16<sup>17</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>13, 16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>18</sup> 2<sup>28</sup>; cf. Ac 11-3, He 13<sup>17</sup>, 2 Jn 4, 3 Jn 3-4). This joy in ministering coalesces with the prospective eschatological joy, inasmuch as in the day of the Lord the results of one's ministry will be made manifest and become for the servant of Christ a special 'joy' or 'crown of glorying' (2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, Ph 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>19</sup>).

JUDÆA (Ἰουδαία, used by the LXX in later books of the OT [Ezr., Neh., Dan.] instead of Ἰουδα, as the translation of יהודה or יהודה).—Judæa, the Grecized form of 'Judah,' was the most southern of the three districts into which Palestine was divided in the Greek and Roman periods, the other two being Samaria and Galilee. The territory occupied by the Jews who returned from Babylon was at first smaller than the ancestral kingdom of Judah, but it was gradually enlarged, e.g. by the Maccabæan capture of Hebron from the Edomites (1 Mac 5<sup>65</sup>), and the cession by Demetrius, king of Syria, of the Samaritan toparchies of Aphaerema, Lydda, and Ramathaim (11<sup>34</sup>). According to Josephus (BJ III. iii. 5), Judæa extended from Anuath-Borkaios in the north (identified with Aina-Berkit in PEFSt, 1881, p. 48) to the village of Jordas (perhaps Tell Arâd) on the confines of Arabia in the south, and from Jordan in the east to Joppa in the west. The sea-coast as far as Ptolemais, with the coast towns, also belonged to Judæa.

Josephus (loc. cit.) states that the country was divided into eleven toparchies (τοπαρχίαι or κληρουχίαι), all west of Jordan: Jerusalem, Gophna, Akrabattu, Thamna, Lydda, Emmaus, Pella, Idumea, Engaddi, Herodium, and Jericho. Pliny (HN v. xiv. 70) gives a list which contains the seven names given here in italics, along with Jopica, Betholeptephene, and Orine. Schürer (HJP II. i. [1885] 157) thinks 'we may obtain a correct list if we adopt that of Josephus and substitute Bethleptepha for Pella.' The division was no doubt made for administrative purposes, and especially for the collection of revenue.

Judæa proper was a small country, its whole area not being more than 2,000 sq. miles. Apart from the Shephelah and the Maritime Plain, it was a plateau of only 1,350 sq. miles. But the term was often loosely employed in a more comprehensive sense. Tacitus says that 'eastward the country is bounded by Arabia; to the south lies Egypt; and on the west are Phœnicia and the Mediterranean; northward it commands an extensive prospect over Syria' (Hist. v. vi.). Strabo very vaguely describes Judæa as being 'situated above Phœnicia, in the interior between Gaza and Antilibanus, and extending to the Arabians' (XVI. ii. 21). Herod the Great, who was called the king of Judæa, certainly had a territory much wider than Judæa proper. Ptolemy states that there were districts of Judæa beyond Jordan (v. xvi. 9), and it is difficult to obtain any other meaning from 'the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan' in Mt 19<sup>1</sup>, though A. B. Bruce thinks 'it is not likely that the writer would describe Southern Peræa as a part of Judæa' (EGT, 'The Synoptic Gospels,' 1897, p. 244). There can be no doubt that St. Luke often extends the term Judæa to the whole of Palestine west of the Jordan (Lk 4<sup>44</sup> [?] 23<sup>5</sup>, Ac 2<sup>9</sup> 10-7 26<sup>20</sup>).

After the death of Herod, his son Archelaus became ethnarch of Judæa. He was never really its king, though royalty is implicitly ascribed to him in the βασιλευει of Mt 2-, and explicitly in Josephus (Ant. XVIII. iv. 3). He was soon deposed, and from A.D. 6 till the overthrow of the State in 70 Judæa was under procurators, except during the brief reign of Agrippa I. (41-44). The procurators resided in Cæsarea (Ant. XVII. xiii. 5; XVIII. i. 1, ii. 1).

The statement of Josephus that Judæa was attached to the province of Syria and placed under its governor (Ant. xvii. xiii. 5; xviii. i. 1, iv. 6) appears to be incorrect; on the contrary, Judæa probably formed thenceforth a procuratorial province of itself (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire<sup>2</sup>, Eng. tr., 1909, ii. 185 n.; cf. Schürer, i. ii. 42 f.). The governor was a man of equestrian rank, so that Judæa belonged to the third class of imperial provinces mentioned by Strabo (xvii. iii. 25). The usual designation for such a governor—ἐπίτροπος—occurs frequently in Josephus, though he occasionally uses ἐπαρχος or ἡγεμῶν. The last term, which is equivalent to præses, is the one most often employed in the NT.

It was usual to speak of Jerusalem and Judæa, instead of 'and the rest of Judæa' (Mt 4-5, Mk 1<sup>5</sup>, Ac 1<sup>8</sup>, etc.). The Talmud explains this practice by saying that the holy city formed a division by itself (A. Neubauer, La Geogr. du Talmud, 1868, p. 56). The occurrence of Judæa between Mesopotamia and Cappadocia in Ac 2<sup>9</sup> is very peculiar. Jerome reads Syria instead; Tertullian suggests Armenia (c. Jud. vii.); and Bithynia, Idumea, and India have also been proposed (EGT in loco). When Palestine was divided into First, Second, and Third (Code of Theodosius, A.D. 409), Palæstina Prima comprehended the old districts of Judæa and Samaria; and this division is still observed in the ecclesiastical documents of the Eastern Church.

JUDAIZING.—It is obvious that the transition from Judaism to Christianity could hardly be made without difficulty. To the Jew it must have seemed almost incredible that he should divest himself of the observance of Mosaic Law, and equally incredible that the Gentile should be admitted into the Kingdom of God without accepting the same Law. It was inevitable that the question should soon arise in the early days of the Church, whether the Church of the future should be Catholic or Jewish. It was only to be expected that this controversy should give rise to a party in the Church who were in favour of the latter alternative, consisting of those who, being Christians, yet retained their affection for the Mosaic Law and wished to impose it upon every member of the Christian Church. On the other hand, the keen intellect of a Stephen or a Paul saw at once that any attempt to enforce the Mosaic Law or even the initiatory rite of circumcision upon the Gentiles, meant stagnation and death to the Church.

No inconsiderable part of the Acts and the Epistles is taken up with the description of the attempts of the Judaizers to gain their end, and of the resolute resistance to them of St. Paul and those who thought with him.

1. In the Acts.—In the Acts the three most important crises of this question are (a) the speech of St. Stephen, (b) the conversion of Cornelius, and (c) the Council at Jerusalem.

(a) The importance of St. Stephen's speech consists in the principles which underlie the historical summary which is its main feature. He had been accused of blaspheming the Temple and the Law. No doubt, the charges were exaggerated and his language distorted by false witnesses. But there was that half truth in them which made them colourable. The principles which come out in the speech are those which we can also trace in Christ's attitude towards Judaism, viz. that Christianity would fulfil and also succeed the older dispensation.

(b) The importance of the incident of Cornelius is emphasized by the two-fold account of it in the Acts and by the two special manifestations of the Divine will made to St. Peter to teach him what he should do. The vision of the sheet, with the clean and unclean animals, showed that the Apostle's act was a new departure, requiring special and Divine sanction; and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, prior to baptism, was needed to teach him that he might initiate his converts into the Christian Church by that sacrament.

(c) Now, as the first of these incidents had dealt with the general principles regulating the relation of Christianity to Judaism, and the second had shown that Gentiles were to be admitted into the Christian body, so the third determined what requirements, if any, should be made of Gentile converts. The four precepts required are not to be regarded simply as concessions to Jewish prejudices. Three out of the four deal with great mysteries of human life and induce corresponding forms of reverence. Nor were these precepts intended to be applied either universally or permanently, but rather to meet a local and temporary difficulty.

In addition to these three important incidents, there are many references in the Acts to this question, showing the prominent place it took in the Church thought and life of the day. We cannot go into all these references, but, as an example, we may quote the narrative in Ac 21-<sup>off</sup>, in which St. Paul is advised to take some step that may disarm the prejudices of the Judaizers against him.

2. In St. Paul's Epistles.—When we turn to the Epistles, we have to notice that St. Paul was attacked on personal as well as on doctrinal grounds, and that his authority as an apostle was called in question. This was especially the case at Corinth, as we learn from the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. In the First Epistle he had dealt with the divisions in that Church (see DIVISIONS). But in the Second Epistle he defends his own apostolic authority. He could produce no commendatory letter from the Church in Jerusalem as his opponents were able to do, nor would he do so; he did not derive his authority from any apostle, but direct from the Lord Jesus Himself.

When we turn to the Epistle to the Galatians, we find the controversy accentuated. The Galatians had been 'bewitched' by the Jewish emissaries. They had relapsed from the simplicity of the gospel into the ceremonialism of Judaism. The authority of the Apostle had been disparaged and denied. St. Paul was evidently deeply stirred, as well as fully conscious of the danger to Christianity which was caused by the action of the Judaizers. The result was an Epistle which, in burning words, pleads for the liberty of the gospel and warns against the retrograde step of again submitting to the bondage of the Law.

The Church in Colossæ was affected by the Judaism of the Dispersion, which differed in some respects from the Judaism of Jerusalem. The view of the Colossian heresy which was held formerly, as expounded by J. B. Lightfoot in his Commentary (<sup>3</sup>1879, p. 74 f.), was that this heresy was a form of Gnosticism, but F. J. A. Hort in his Judaistic Christianity (1894, p. 116 ff.) contends that St. Paul had in mind a form of Judaism rather than of Gnosticism. It is not the Judaism of Jerusalem which laid stress upon the importance of circumcision and the Law, but the Judaism of the Dispersion, which concerned itself with such questions as difference of food, difference of days, etc. (Col 2<sup>16</sup>. 20-<sup>1</sup>). According to this view, the φιλοσοφία of Col 2<sup>8</sup> refers to the detailed passage in Col 2<sup>16-3</sup>, and the meats, drinks, feasts, new moons, and Sabbaths, are Judaic.

Hort also takes the same view with regard to the Pastoral Epistles, and concludes his argument as follows:

'On the whole then in the Pastoral Epistles, no less than in Colossians, it seems impossible to find clear evidence of speculative or Gnosticising tendencies. We do find however a dangerous fondness for Jewish trifling, both of the legendary and of the legal or casuistical kind. We find also indications, but much less prominent, of some such abstinences in the matter of foods (probably chiefly animal food and wine) as at Colossæ and Rome, with a probability that marriage would before long come likewise under a religious ban. But of circumcision and the perpetual validity of the Law we have nothing' (p. 146).

3. In the Epistle to the Hebrews.—With all the mystery which surrounds the identity of the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the community to which it was addressed, it is clear that the whole argument is directed against the Judaizers. The people addressed are evidently in danger of apostasy. They do not see what the gospel can offer them in exchange for the loss they have sustained in being expelled from the synagogue.

It is not necessary here to detail the argument of the Epistle, which may be studied in the art. on HEBREWS, EP. TO THE, or in the article in HDB; but the superiority of Christ over Judaism is its main burden, and the Epistle is pregnant with the difficulties of Christianity confronted with Judaizing teachers. It deals with those who, as Hort says, 'without abjuring the name of Jesus, . . . treat their relation to him as trivial and secondary compared with their relation to the customs of their forefathers and their living countrymen' (p. 157).

In conclusion, we may say that Judaistic Christianity was a natural product of the circumstances of the Apostolic Age, a product which was destined to be a source of internal trouble to the primitive Church. It lived on for some time, with occasional outbursts of revival, and at length died naturally away.

Judaism decreased as Christianity increased. Jews who became Christians were not forbidden to observe the laws and customs to which they were attached, but were enjoined to seek beneath the letter of the ordinance for the truth of which it was the exponent. No attempt was to be made to enforce upon Gentile Christians the bondage of the Law or to take away the liberty with which Christ had made them free.

JUDAS BARSABBAS.—After the Council of the apostles and elders held at Jerusalem to settle the matter in dispute between the Jewish and Gentile Christians at Antioch, it was resolved to send to Antioch along with St. Paul and Barnabas two deputies entrusted with the letter containing the decrees of the brethren of Jerusalem. These deputies were Judas Barsabbas and Silas (Ac 15-<sup>7</sup>). The fact that they were selected as deputies of the Jerusalem Church on this important mission proves that they were men of considerable influence in the Church. They are called chief men among the brethren (ἡγούμενους), and were probably elders. The narrative tells us that both were endowed with the prophetic gift (v. 3-) and that they continued a considerable time in Antioch teaching and exhorting the believers there. After their work, the restoring of peace among the contending factions, was accomplished, they were free to depart. Judas returned to Jerusalem, while Silas remained and became the companion of St. Paul on his second missionary journey. The contention of some critics that Silas returned to Jerusalem with Judas and that v.<sup>34</sup> is spurious, is met by the view of Ramsay (St. Paul, p. 174 f.), who holds that v.<sup>33</sup> simply means that freedom was given to the two deputies to depart, and that v.<sup>34</sup> was omitted by a copyist who misunderstood v.<sup>33</sup> (cf. Zahn, Einleitung, i. 148).

Beyond these facts nothing certain is known of Barsabbas. It has been suggested that he was a brother of Joseph Barsabbas who was nominated to succeed Iscariot in the early days of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 1<sup>23</sup>), as Barsabbas is a patronymic son of Sabbas. If this be so, Judas had in all probability, like Joseph, been personally acquainted with Jesus, and a disciple. This would account, to some extent at least, for the influential position he seems to hold at the Council of Jerusalem. Attempts have been made to identify him with others bearing the name Judas, but all such attempts must be relinquished. The Apostle Judas 'not Iscariot' was the son of James (Lk 6<sup>16</sup> RV), and in the narrative in the Acts Barsabbas is clearly distinguished from the apostles. Some have suggested that he may be the writer of the Epistle that bears his name, but the writer describes himself as the brother of James (Jude<sup>1</sup>), and this James must either have been the son of Joseph the husband of the Virgin or the son of Alphæus (see art. JUDE)—in any case, not the son of Sabbas.

JUDAS (of Damascus).—In Ac 9<sup>11</sup> the disciple Ananias is told by the Lord in a vision to go to the street called 'Straight' and inquire in the house of Judas for one named Saul, a man of Tarsus. Nothing further is known of this Judas.

JUDAS THE GALILÆAN.—Judas the Galilæan, a Zealot leader at the time of the census under Quirinius, was probably the son of Hezekiah (Josephus, Ant. XVII. x. 5, BJ II. iv. 1), a leader of a band of robbers (i.e. revolutionists) in Galilee. Herod, while representing his father, had captured and summarily executed Hezekiah with a number of his followers without having recourse to the Sanhedrin or Hyrcanus (BJ I. x. 5, Ant. XIV. ix. 2, 3, XVII. x. 5). If this identification be correct (so Graetz, Schürer, Goethe; contra Krenkel, Schmiedel), it enables us to trace the development of the Zealot movement from its origin as the Messianic party favouring 'direct action.' The death of Hezekiah apparently left Judas at the head of a movement against Roman rule similar to that of Mattathias and his body of revolutionaries against the Syrians.

Josephus declares in Ant. XVIII. i. 1 that Judas was born in Gamala in Gaulonitis, but in BJ II. viii. 1 and elsewhere he calls him a Galilæan (so too Ac 5<sup>37</sup>). This discrepancy may be due to a confusion of a Galilæan Gamala with the better-known town of the same name east of Jordan; or to the fact that the activities of Judas were largely confined to Galilee; or to the loose use of the word 'Galilæan' to describe a Jew born near Galilee.

During the administration of Quintilius Varus (6-4 B.C.) Judas took advantage of the disorders following the death of Herod I. seized and plundered Sepphoris, and armed his followers with weapons taken from the city's arsenal. He is charged by Josephus (Ant. XVII. x. 5, BJ II. iv. 1) with seeking to make himself king. This accusation, however, like the description of his followers ('of profligate character') by Josephus, is probably to be charged to the bias of the historian. For, when Quirinius undertook to make a census of Judæa (see DCG i. 275<sup>a</sup>), Judas allied himself with a Pharisee named Zadok and raised the signal for a theocratic or Messianic revolt, calling upon the Jews to refuse to pay tribute to the Romans and to recognize God alone as their ruler (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, XX. v. 2, BJ II. viii. 1). Whether he succeeded in actually organizing a revolt is not altogether clear (Ant. XX. v. 2 is not so reliable as XVIII. i. 1), but in BJ VII. viii. 1 he is said 'to have persuaded not a few of the Jews not to submit to the census.' That he was the centre of actual disturbance is by no means improbable in the light of succeeding events; for from this combination of revolutionary spirit and Pharisaism emerged the fourth party of the Jews, the Zealots. From this time until their last stand at Masada, the Zealots were the representatives of a politico-revolutionary Messianism, as distinguished from the eschatological hopes of the Pharisees and Essenes. Judas ('a cunning Sophist' [BJ II. xvii. 8]) was evidently bent on putting into practice a political programme, and may very likely have undertaken to organize a theocracy without a human ruler. If so, we know nothing as to the actual results of his endeavours except that Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, 6) attributes to him and his 'philosophy' the violence and miseries culminating in the destruction of the Temple. This philosophy he describes as a compound of Pharisaic beliefs and revolutionist love of liberty.

We have no precise knowledge as to the fate of Judas, but in Ac 5<sup>37</sup> he is said to have 'perished.' From the fact that he is here mentioned after Theudas (q.v.), it has been conjectured that Luke has confused his fate with that of his sons. Too much weight, however, should not be given to this conclusion, for it seems hardly probable that Josephus should have omitted any misfortune coming to a man he so cordially disliked.

Judas left three sons, all of whom were leaders in the Zealot movement. Of these, two—Jacob and Simon—were crucified by Tiberius Alexander the procurator (A.D. 46-48), for leading a revolt (Ant. XX. v. 2), and the third, Menahem (also a 'Sophist'—a word indicating a propagandist as well as a revolutionist), became a leader of the extreme radicals during the first period of the war with Rome. After having armed himself from the Herodian arsenal at Masada, he became for a short time the master of a part of Jerusalem, but was tortured and executed, together with his lieutenants, by Eleazar of the high-priestly party.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.—The only biblical reference to Judas Iscariot by name outside the Gospels is Ac 1<sup>16-20</sup>,<sup>25</sup> and there he is called neither 'Iscariot' nor 'the traitor' (προδοτης, as in Lk 6<sup>16</sup>), nor is his action spoken of by the term παραδίδοναι. He is described in v.<sup>17</sup> as the one who 'became guide (ὁδηγός) to them that arrested Jesus,' and in v.<sup>20</sup> as having 'fallen away (παρέβη) from the ministry and apostleship to go to his own place' (see PLACE). It is interesting, however, to note the other allusions to our Lord's betrayal in the Acts and in the Epistles. (1) In Ac 3<sup>13</sup> St. Peter attributes it virtually to the Israelites themselves (ὅτι υμεῖς παρέδώκατε κτλ.; cf. 2<sup>23</sup>), and so again (2) in 7<sup>52</sup> does St. Stephen (τοῦ δικαίου οὐ νυν υμεῖς προδοταὶ καὶ φονεῖς ἐγένεσθε). (3) In Ro 4<sup>25</sup> St. Paul, quoting Is 53<sup>12</sup> (LXX), says less definitely that Jesus our Lord παρεδόθη διὰ τὰ παραπτώματα ἡμῶν; (4) but in 1 Co 11<sup>23</sup> the very act and time of betrayal are alluded to in connexion with the institution of the Last Supper (ἐν τῇ νυκτὶ ἣ παρεδόθητο κτλ.). On the other hand, St. Paul three times describes the betrayal from the point of view of our Lord's own voluntary submission, viz. (5) Gal 2<sup>20</sup>: παρεδόντος εαυτὸν ὑπὲρ ἔμου; (6) Eph 5<sup>2</sup>: παρέδωκεν εαυτὸν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν; (7) v. 25: εαυτὸν παρέδωκεν ὑπὲρ ἐκκλησίας (cf. 1 P 2<sup>23</sup>: παρεδίδου τῷ κρίνοντι δικαίως, and see Jn 10<sup>17, 18, 17<sup>19</sup></sup> etc.); and once (8) even of the Father Himself (ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν πάντων παρέδωκεν αὐτόν, Ro 8<sup>32</sup>).

As to Judas's grievous end itself, as recorded in the Acts, it is not necessary here to compare it in detail with the account given in Mt 27<sup>3ff.</sup>; it is sufficient to say that in the present state of our information the two accounts are well-nigh, if not quite, irreconcilable. But various points in the Lucan record remain to be reviewed.

(a) St. Peter in his opening address at the election of St. Matthias infers that the inclusion of the traitor in the number of the apostles and his obtaining a share in their ministry was a mysterious dispensation by which was fulfilled the prediction of Ps 41<sup>9</sup>, so recently quoted by our Lord Himself (Jn 13<sup>18</sup>), together with its necessary consequences as foreshadowed in two other Psalms (69<sup>25</sup> and 109<sup>8</sup>): that is, if v. 20 be an original part of St. Peter's speech, and not, as is possible, a part of the Lucan (or later) elucidation of the passage contained in vv. 18, 19. In any case, all three quotations, but specially for our purpose now, the last two, are of interest as illustrating the free use made of the text of Scripture and its secondary application. In Ps 41<sup>9</sup> the actual wording bears little likeness to the LXX, being a more literal rendering of the Hebrew, while its original reference is to some treacherous friend (e.g. Ahithophel, the unfaithful counsellor of David). In Ps 69<sup>25</sup> the text is more exact, but the original figure employed (ἡ ἔπαυλις αὐτῶν, not αὐτοῦ) suggests a nomad encampment of tents rendered desolate because of the cruel persecutions which their occupants had practised, while Ps 109<sup>8</sup> has in view one particular official, like Doeg or Ahithophel, who has been false to his trust, and therefore it is, to our modern notions, more appropriately and with less strain transferred to the case of Judas.

(b) The passage vv. 18, 19, with or without v. 20 (see above), would seem to be an editorial comment inserted in the middle of St. Peter's address either by the author of the Acts himself or, as has been thought, by some later glossator or copyist. Of the latter view there is, we believe, no indication in the history of the text. If, as is more likely, therefore, it is due to St. Luke, he has here adopted an account of the traitor's grievous end which is independent of, and in some details apparently irreconcilable with, St. Matthew's (27<sup>3ff.</sup>), but to a less extent, we are inclined to think, than is sometimes held. For it is not out of keeping with eastern modes of treating facts for St. Luke to speak of the 'field of blood' being acquired by the traitor himself with the price of his iniquity (quæ facit per alium, facit per se), which St. Matthew more accurately says was actually purchased by the chief priest, whilst the horribly graphic description of his suicide is little more than a conventional way of representing St. Matthew's simple ἀπελθὼν ἀπηγγατο.

(c) For the title Akeldama and its interpretation see separate article, s.v.

It remains to remark that St. Peter's expression, as recorded in his address, and the apostolic prayer of ordination, for which he was probably responsible and the mouthpiece, breathe much more of the spirit of primitive Christianity in their restrained and chastened style than the more outspoken and almost vindictive statements of vv. 18, 19, so that one would not be altogether surprised to find that the latter are, as has been suggested, a less genuine tradition of a later age. C. L. FELTOE.

JUDE, THE LORD'S BROTHER.—The list of the Lord's brothers is given in Mk 6<sup>3</sup> as 'James, and Josès, and Judas [AV 'Juda'], and Simon,' in Mt 13<sup>55</sup> as 'James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas.' It would be precarious, even apart from the variation in order, to infer that Judas was one of the younger brothers of Jesus; still, this is not improbable, especially if, as the present writer believes, 'the brethren of the Lord' were sons of Joseph and Mary. We know practically nothing of his history. If the statement in Jn 7<sup>5</sup> can be trusted, that at that time the brethren of Jesus did not believe in Him, he cannot be identified with 'Judas, the son of James,' who is mentioned in Luke's list of the apostles (Lk 6<sup>16</sup>, Ac 1<sup>13</sup>), and described in Jn 14<sup>22</sup> as 'Judas (not Iscariot).' We may assume from Ac 1<sup>14</sup> that in the interval between the incident recorded in Jn 7<sup>3-10</sup> and the Ascension, Jude and his brothers had recognized the Messiahship of Jesus. We gather from 1 Co 9<sup>5</sup> that 'the brethren of the Lord' were married to Christian wives, by whom they were accompanied on missionary journeys. Presumably these references included Jude. He seems to have taken no very prominent position in the Church, being overshadowed, like Josès and Simon, by James. The date of his death is uncertain, but the evidence of Hegesippus, quoted in Euseb. HE iii. xx., suggests that he died before Domitian came to the throne. Eusebius informs us that the grandchildren of Jude were brought before Domitian, as descendants of David, but released when the Emperor discovered that they were horny-handed husbandmen, who were expecting a heavenly kingdom at Christ's Second Coming. They survived till the reign of Trajan. The last statement suggests that a considerable interval elapsed between the interview with the Emperor and their death; and, inasmuch as the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96) was separated from that of Trajan (A.D. 98-117) only by Nerva's short reign of two years (A.D. 96-98), we should probably place the interview quite early in Domitian's reign. Since not Jude alone but presumably the father of these grandsons was apparently dead at the time, it is hardly likely that the death of Jude occurred at a later date than the decade A.D. 70-80, when he would be well advanced in years. This has an important though not decisive bearing on the question whether the Epistle of Jude is rightly assigned to him (see following article).

**JUDE, EPISTLE OF.—1. Relation to 2 Peter.—The striking coincidences between this Epistle and the Second Epistle of Peter, covering the greater part of the shorter writing, raise in an acute form the question of relative priority. It is best, however, to investigate each Epistle independently before approaching the problem of their mutual relations. Since, however, the present writer, in spite of the attempts made by Spitta, Zahn, and Bigg to prove the dependence of Jude on 2 Peter, is convinced, with the great majority of critics, that 2 Peter is based on Jude, the discussion of this question is not raised in this article but postponed to that on PETER, EPISTLES OF.

2. Contents.—The writer of the Epistle seems to have been diverted from the project of a more extensive composition by the urgent necessity of exhorting his readers 'to contend earnestly for the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints' (v. 3). Whether he had made any progress with his work on 'our common salvation,' or, if so, whether he subsequently completed his interrupted enterprise, we do not know. In any case, we possess no other work from his hand than this brief Epistle. The urgency of the crisis completely absorbs him. His letter is wholly occupied with the false teachers and their propaganda, which is imperilling the soundness of doctrine, the purity of morals, and the sanctities of religion. He does not refute them; he denounces and threatens them. Hot indignation at their corruption of the true doctrine and loathing for the vileness of their perverted morals inspire his fierce invective. The situation did not seem to him appropriate for academic discussion; the unsophisticated moral instinct was enough to guide all who possessed it to a right judgment of such abominations. History shows us their predecessors, and from the fate which overtook them the doom of these reprobates of the last time can be plainly foreseen (vv. 5-11). Indeed, it had been announced by Enoch, who in that far-off age had prophesied directly of the Divine judgment that would overtake them (v. 14f.).

But, while nothing is wanting to the vehemence of attack, we can form only a very vague impression as to the tenets of the false teachers. The writer assumes that his readers are familiar with their doctrines, and his method does not require any exposition of their errors such as would have been involved in any attempt to refute them. It is, accordingly, not strange that very divergent views have been held as to their identity. Our earliest suggestion on this point comes from Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 2), who taught that Jude was describing prophetically the Gnostic sect known as the Carpocratians. Grotius (Præp. in Ep. Jude) also thought that this sect was the object of the writer's denunciation; but, since he held that Jude was attacking contemporary heretics, he assigned the Epistle to Jude the last Bishop of Jerusalem, in the reign of Hadrian. This view has found little, if any, acceptance; but the identification of the false teachers with the Carpocratians has been widely accepted by modern scholars. There are certainly striking points of contact.

Carpocrates, who lived at Alexandria in the first half of the 2nd cent. (perhaps about A.D. 130-150), taught that the world was made by angels who had revolted from God. The soul of Jesus through its superior vigour remembered what it had seen when with God. He was, however, an ordinary man, but endowed with powers which enabled Him to outwit the world-angels. Similarly, any soul which could despise them would triumph over them and thus become the equal of Jesus. Great stress was laid on magic as a means of salvation. The immorality of the sect rivalled that of the Cainites. It was defended by a curious doctrine of transmigration, according to which it was necessary for the soul to go through various human bodies till it completed the circle of human experience; but if all of this—including, of course, the full range of immoral conduct—could be crowded into one lifetime, the necessity for such transmigration was obviated.

The language of the Epistle would quite well suit the Carpocratians, especially in its reference to the combination of error in teaching with lasciviousness in conduct. The railing at dignitaries with which the writer charges the false teachers (v. 8) would answer very well to the attitude of Carpocrates towards the angels. But we should probably reject any identification so definite. The characteristics mentioned by Jude were the monopoly of no sect. The indications point to teaching of a much less developed type. It is not even certain that it was Gnostic in character, though the signs point strongly in that direction. The Gnostics were wont to describe themselves as 'spiritual,' and the ordinary members of the Church as 'psychics.' If the false teachers were Gnostics, we understand why Jude should retort upon them the accusation that they were 'sensual' (lit. 'psychics'), 'not having the Spirit' (v. 19). They blaspheme that of which they are ignorant. The charge that they deny the only Master (v. 4) may be an allusion to the dualism of the Gnostics, which drew a distinction between the supreme God and the Creator. They are dreamers (v. 8), i.e. false prophets, who speak swelling words (v. 16). The statement that they have gone in the way of Cain (v. 11) reminds us very forcibly of the Ophite sect known as the Cainites (q.v.). But, while all these indications point to some rudimentary form of Gnosticism, it cannot be said that they definitely demand such a reference. Not only are they very vague and general; they could be accounted for without recourse to Gnosticism at all. The problem in some respects hangs together with that presented by other descriptions of false teaching which we find in the NT, especially in the Epistle to the Colossians, the Pastoral Epistles, the Letters to the Seven Churches, and the Epistles of John (q.v.). In the judgment of the present writer, the identification with a Gnostic tendency seems on the whole to be probable, but by no means so secure as to determine without more ado the question of date.

3. Date and authorship.—The determination of the date is closely connected with the problem of authorship. There can be no reasonable doubt that the clause 'the brother of James' (v. 1) is meant to identify the author as Jude, the Lord's brother. If the conclusions reached in the preceding article are correct, this Jude was probably dead at the latest by A.D. 80. The question whether the Epistle can have been written so early is not easy to decide. The author not only distinguishes himself from the apostles, which the Lord's brother would naturally have done, but he looks back on their age as one which has already passed away (v. 1), and is conscious that he is living in 'the last time,' when their prophecy of the coming of 'mockers' is being fulfilled (v. 18). The language has a striking parallel in 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>, and it would be easier to understand in the closing decade of the 1st cent. than twenty years earlier. Such phrases as 'the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints' (v. 3), or 'your most holy faith' (v. 9), are also more easily intelligible when the fluid theology of the primitive age was hardening into a definite creed. The external evidence can be reconciled with either view. It is true that the earliest attestation of the Epistle is late. If the usual view is correct, Jude was employed by the author of 2 Peter; but, since that work itself belongs in all probability to a date well on in the 2nd cent., its evidence is of little value on this point. Jude is reckoned as canonical in the Muratorian Canon; it is quoted by Tertullian (de Cultu Fem. i. 3), Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. iii. 8. 44, Strom. iii. 2), and Origen (in Math. x. 17, xv. 27, xvii. 30); not, however, by Irenæus. Eusebius (HE iii. 25. 31; cf. ii. 23. 25) regards it as one of the disputed books, and Jerome (de Vir. illustr. iv.) tells us that in his time it was rejected by many. But the lateness of any quotation of it and the suspicion entertained of it are of little moment. Its brevity would sufficiently account for the silence of earlier writers; the fact that it was not written by an apostle, or its reference (vv. 9. 14f.) to Jewish Apocalypses (The Assumption of Moses and The Book of Enoch), would explain its rejection by those to whom Eusebius and Jerome refer. These objections simply rest on a theoretical assumption of what a canonical work ought to be; no historical evidence lies behind them.

The opening words of the Epistle, 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James,' constitute a weighty argument in favour of the traditional view that it was written by Jude the Lord's brother. The attempt to treat this as embodying a false claim deliberately made by the author is open to grave objections. Apparently we have to reckon with the deliberate adoption of a pseudonym by the author of 2 Peter. But this case is probably solitary in the NT; and, unless we are driven to adopt such suggestions, it is desirable to avoid them as far as possible. Apart from this, however, it is not easy to see why the author should have hit upon a personality so obscure as Jude. If he did so because the relationship to James gave his name prestige, it might be asked why he should not have attributed it to James himself. The suggestion that it was sent to districts where Jude had laboured and was held in high regard is exposed to the difficulty that the recipients would naturally ask, How is it that we hear of this letter for the first time now that Jude has been some years dead? We are then reduced to the alternatives of admitting the authenticity, or of supposing that the identification with the Lord's brother was no original part of the Epistle. If the preceding discussion has pointed to the probability that the false teaching assailed was Gnostic in character, and that other phenomena in the Epistle make it unlikely that it was earlier than the closing decade of the 1st cent., the second alternative must be preferred. In that case the most probable explanation of the opening words is that the author's name was really Jude, and that the phrase 'and brother of James' was inserted by a scribe who wished to make it clear which Jude was intended. The precise date must of course remain very uncertain. Nothing compels us to go below the year A.D. 100. Moreover, the author has apparently a new situation to deal with. It ought, however, to be frankly recognized that the Epistle is quite conceivable as the work of Jude the Lord's brother in the decade A.D. 70-80.

4. Destination.—Nothing is known as to the destination of the Epistle, nor can anything be inferred with confidence. It is not clear whether the Epistle is catholic or is addressed to readers in a definite locality, though the former is perhaps the more likely view.

**JUDGE, JUDGING (Ethical).—No account of judging in the Apostolic Church can be complete which is not based on our Lord's prohibition, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged' (Mt 7<sup>12</sup>). This is not to be interpreted as a disparagement of the intellectual faculty of criticism per se, but as a limitation of it in harmony with the Christian standpoint. In the corresponding passage in Lk 6, the repression of the critical spirit is directly associated with the character of God, who makes no distinctions in His gifts, but is kind and merciful to all alike. The section in Matthew has rather a relation to the temper of the Pharisee, which was supercilious and narrowly strict in its judgments of others. The Pharisee 'despised others'; hence his incapacity to understand human nature, his judgments being rooted in contempt. The citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven, on the other hand, has to avoid the censorious temper and make the best of everyone and everything; he has to repress the tendency to be uncharitable; otherwise, when he is obliged to utter a moral verdict, it will be of small weight. But our Lord never countenances the easy-going tolerance which in effect abrogates the right of moral judgment. He does not absolve His followers from discriminating between right and wrong—even in the case of a 'brother' (Mt 18<sup>15-18</sup>)—and indeed urges upon them the duty of 'binding and loosing,' condemning and acquitting, according to the recognized moral standard of the Kingdom.

The teaching of St. James has many echoes of the ethical injunctions of our Lord, and the passage 4<sup>11</sup> in his Epistle recalls the spirit, if not the actual language, of the Sermon on the Mount. We are not to indulge in the habit of fault-finding: 'Who art thou that judgest thy neighbour?' We are never to judge from any other motive than the moral improvement of the person judged: we are to remember our own defects, and to utter our verdict with a due sense of responsibility; otherwise we 'speak against the law and judge the law.' The Apostle means by this that there is to be a proper standard of right and wrong, and not a subjective criterion formed out of our own likes and dislikes. If we make our own standard, we set ourselves above the law-giver and the law.

In similar strain St. Paul writes (Ro 14<sup>4</sup>), 'Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth.' The words are suggested by the relationship between the 'strong' and the 'weak.' The 'strong,' conscious of their freedom in Christ, may despise the 'weak,' who still feel it their duty to continue an ascetic habit, even though they have accepted Christ; on the other hand, the 'weak,' condemning what seems to them the laxity of the 'strong,' may be led into the habit of censorious judgment (see an admirable discourse by A. Souter in ExpT xxiv. [1912-13] 5 ff.). The same Apostle, however, while thus discountenancing the habit of judging one another, expressly advocates the duty of acting according to a moral standard in dealing with moral offences. In 1 Co 5, e.g., he condemns the Corinthians for allowing a case of immorality to go unchallenged and unjudged. At the same time the Christian Church is to limit its judgments to those that are within; those that are without are to be left to the judgment of God (1 Co 5<sup>13</sup>). It would appear, then, that the Apostle, while not absolving the Christian from the duty of judgment in offences against morality, advocates the widest tolerance in minor matters of everyday life, e.g. in Ro 14<sup>10</sup>—a passage which closes with the statement: 'we shall all stand before the judgement-seat of God.'

In the same way the apostolic writers press upon their readers the duty of discrimination according to certain standards of right and wrong. They are to 'test all things and hold fast that which is right' (1 Th 5<sup>-1</sup>), and to 'test the spirits whether they be of God' (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, the word δοκιμαζειν being used, which more definitely suggests the approval which results from a test or touchstone than the simpler and more familiar κρινειν). They are to pronounce anathema on the proclaimer of 'another' gospel (Gal 1<sup>9</sup>), and to refuse hospitality to a false teacher, on the ground that a welcome or salutation involves participation in his evil works (2 Jn 10<sup>f</sup>). Thus doctrine, like life and conduct, is to be brought to the test of a moral standard, and what is subversive of the person and teaching of the Lord is to be rejected. 'Happy,' says the Apostle Paul (Ro 14-), 'is he that judgeth not himself in that which he approveth' (δοκιμαζει). This passage appears to combine the two ideas which enter into the NT treatment of the subject: the Christian must avoid censorious judgment and yet courageously exercise his judgment in the realm of ethics and doctrine; he is happy in the strength of his faith, which enables him so to act as to escape self-condemnation or misgiving. In another passage (Ro 14<sup>13</sup>) St. Paul plays on the double use of κρίνω, viz. as indicating a hasty and uncharitable judgment, and as implying the determining of a course of conduct for oneself. 'Let us not judge one another any more, but judge ye this rather, that no man put a stumblingblock in his brother's way'—the latter sense being paralleled by 2 Co 2<sup>1</sup>, 'I formed this judgment or determination for myself,' and 1 Co 2<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>, Tit 3<sup>1</sup>. A similar usage occurs in the famous statement in 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, 'because we thus judge that if one died for all,' etc.—the word signifying a conviction that has been formed out of spiritual experience (cf. also 1 Co 11<sup>13</sup>, where there is an appeal to a judgment based on common sense).

For the judgments of others on the Christian there are two passages worth our notice, viz. Col 2<sup>16</sup>, where the false teaching which infected the Colossian Church is made the subject of warning, eating and drinking being, according to the Apostle, mere shadows of the reality, and therefore not matters on which a judgment should be based—'let no man take you to task in eating and in drinking': scrupulous ritual and asceticism are a return to an order of life which the gospel has rendered obsolete. The other passage is Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, 'So speak ye and so do as men that are to be judged by a law of liberty' (cf. 1-5). This is St. James's variation on St. Paul's 'law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus'—not a system of codified regulations enforced from without, but a law freely accepted and obeyed as the result of a new relationship to God. 'It will,' says J. B. Mayor (The Epistle of St. James<sup>3</sup>, 1910, p. 94), 'be a deeper-going judgment than that of man, for it will not stop short at particular precepts or at the outward act, whatever it may be, but will penetrate to the temper and motive.' And it destroys all morbid anxiety and questioning 'as to the exact performance of each separate precept' if there has been true love to God and man. 'The same love which actuates the true Christian here actuates the Judge both here and hereafter.'

The reader is referred to a concordance for the numerous passages in which God or Christ is spoken of as Judge of humanity; we have here limited our survey to the non-forensic side of judgment. There is a passage, however, which calls for comment, viz. 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>, 'Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?' This is to be taken along with a previous warning in 4<sup>5</sup>, 'Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come,' etc. The meaning is that the saints will be associated with their Lord in the act of judging the world at the Last Day, and their judgment will be exercised not only on the world, but on 'angels' (6<sup>3</sup>), meaning the hierarchy of evil or fallen spirits. This doctrine of the future is stated in Rev 20<sup>4</sup> and became a rooted conviction of the post-Apostolic Church, as we see from Euseb. HE vi. 42, where the saints are called μέτοχοι τῆς κρίσεως αὐτοῦ, 'associates in His judgment.' The Divine Judgeship is a truth essential to human thought. Experience deepens the sense of the ignorance and fallibility attaching to man's judgments. The epigram tout connaitre c'est tout pardonner is in effect an expression of human helplessness; and the aspiration of David, 'Let me fall now into the hand of the Lord . . . and let me not fall into the hand of man' (1 Ch 21<sup>13</sup>), is really the cry of humanity for ever conscious of the limitations of its own judgments.

JUDGMENT, DAMNATION.—The idea of judgment is involved in that of government: a ruler, if he is to assert his authority and maintain order, must call recalcitrants to account. Since the Deity has always been thought of as exercising some kind of sovereignty, the idea of judgment may be said to be co-extensive with that of religion.

1. The OT conception.—Long before the days of the great prophets, Israel worshipped Jahweh as a God of judgment. Jahweh avenged not only insults against His own honour, but also deeds of violence and wrong (Gn 4<sup>1</sup>, Jg 9<sup>56f</sup>). Justice was administered in His name, and as the supreme Judge He saw that right was done. It would, however, be too much to say that His actions were regarded as invariably regulated by a regard for justice. He had His favourites among individuals, and Israel was His favourite nation (1 S 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 12<sup>24</sup>). In the exercise of His despotic power, He could act in a certain way simply because it so pleased Him. For His rejection of Saul and His surrender of Israel into the hand of the Philistines the older tradition knew no reason. Not till we come to the great prophets do judgment and justice appear as equivalent terms.

The prophetic conception of Divine judgment can be summed up in a few sentences. Jahweh is the World-ruler and Judge: not only Israel but all nations of the earth stand at His bar (Am 1. 2). His judgments rest on purely moral grounds and are absolutely just (Is 28<sup>17</sup> 45<sup>1</sup>). Even in the case of Israel, justice must take its course (Am 3<sup>2</sup>). Though individuals are occasionally spoken of as suffering for their private sins, in the main it is not with the individual but with the nation that Jahweh reckons. The individual is merged in the State and shares its fate. The theatre of judgment is this earth: of reward or punishment beyond death the prophets know nothing. Good and bad alike descend to Sheol and share the same bodyless, pithless existence in separation from Jahweh (Is 14<sup>4-18</sup>, Ps 6<sup>5</sup>). Judgment, at least so far as Israel is concerned, never appears, except perhaps in Amos, as an end in itself and the ultimate law of Jahweh's working. Israel has a worth in Jahweh's eyes; He refuses to give her up; and, when His judgments have accomplished their disciplining work, salvation will surely follow (Is 40<sup>1</sup> 2). That the correspondence between desert and lot in the existing order is but imperfect, and salvation an object of hope rather than of experience, are facts to which the prophets are keenly alive. But their faith finds refuge in the conception of a great day in the near future, 'the day of the Lord,' in which Jahweh will interpose in a decisive way in human affairs, to overthrow His enemies and inaugurate a new and happier era. For Israel this day will be one of sifting and purging, for her oppressors a day of terror and anguish (Is 21<sup>1-18</sup>, Jl 2<sup>14-16</sup>). To this conception, as we shall see, the subsequent development attached itself.

With the Book of Daniel a new chapter opens in the history of Hebrew eschatology. 'I beheld,' we read, 'till thrones were placed, and one that was ancient of days did sit. . . . Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set and the books were opened. . . . And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt' (Dn 7<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>). Compared with the outlook of the great prophets, this conception of a resurrection of the dead for judgment and sentence is something altogether new. Written in the crisis of the Maccabean struggle (165 B.C.), the Book of Daniel forms the first of the long series of Jewish Apocalypses. For an understanding of NT eschatology these writings are of such cardinal importance that it is necessary to give some account of their leading ideas.

Apocalyptic had its roots in the hope held up before Israel by the prophets of a glorious day in the future, 'the day of the Lord,' when her oppressors would be overthrown, and she, purified by her sufferings, exalted to a position of unparalleled splendour and power. Through her fidelity to God and her supremacy among the nations God's reign on earth would be visibly realized, and Nature itself would be made fairer and more generous to grace the new order. This national hope proved itself vital enough to survive the most disillusioning experiences, but somewhere in the dark days of Persian or Greek ascendancy it was subjected to radical modification, and fitted into a world-view widely different from that to which it originally belonged. The new development was characterized in the first place by a thorough-going pessimism. In the eyes of apocalyptic writers the existing world or age is incurably evil, incapable of being transformed by any conceivable process of moral renewal into a kingdom of God. Human beings are in the mass hopelessly corrupt, and wicked men occupy the seats of power. And this is not all. A portentous development of the belief in evil spirits leads to apocalyptic pessimism a still darker hue. The world is the haunt of throngs of such spirits, who, under Satan their head, form a demonic hierarchy. With unwearied activity they prosecute their hellish work, thwarting the will of the Almighty, hounding on the heathen persecutors of His people, inciting men to wickedness and smiting them with disease. To these sinister figures God, by an inscrutable decree, has surrendered the government of the world. Satan is the world's real master. But, despite this pessimism with regard to the existing order, apocalyptic writers have no thought of surrendering their faith in God or in His promise to Israel. Only, their faith, finding nothing in the present to which it can attach itself, takes refuge in the future and becomes eschatological. The present world is given up to destruction, and religious interest transferred to the new and glorious world which God will reveal when the old has been swept away. With passionate eagerness the great catastrophe that shall open the way for the Kingdom is anticipated, and the horizon scanned for signs of its approach. When it arrives, its opening scene will be one of judgment. To the bar of the Almighty the whole world, Jews as well as Gentiles, and—what is still more significant—the dead as well as the living, will be gathered to answer for the deeds they have done. The fate of each soul having been decided, sentence will at once be executed. For the righteous there is reserved a blessed and deathless life in the presence of God; for the wicked, everlasting destruction.

Before leaving Jewish apocalyptic, two points must be more particularly noted as bearing on questions that will emerge later. The first relates to the personality of the Judge. In most writings it is God Himself who is represented as occupying the throne (Dn 7<sup>9, 10</sup>, En. i. 3-9, xc. 20, 2 Es 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>38</sup>). Sometimes, however, the Messiah or Son of Man appears as conducting the Judgment in God's name (En. li. 1, 2, lxix. 27; Apoc. Bar. lxxii. 2). There was no fixed doctrine on the subject; the one matter of importance was that the Judgment was a Divine Judgment. The second point relates to the fate of the wicked. Here again we find no uniform view, except that their fate involves final and irretrievable ruin. Many passages assume that only the righteous will be raised from the dead. For the sinner death will be the end (Ps.-Sol. iii. 13-16, Apoc. Bar. xxx.). Sometimes, however, Sheol, into which the dead descend, is itself transformed into a place of punishment, so that to be left there does not mean annihilation (Eth. En. xcvi., xcix., civ.). We have also passages in which Sheol is the abode of the lost only until the Day of Judgment, when they are thrust into Gehenna or hell, to suffer eternal torment, with devils for their companions (En. liii. 3-5, liv. 1, 2).

This belief in a resurrection of the dead and a universal judgment forms a landmark in the history of Hebrew religion. We see in it the victory of individualism. It is no longer the nation but the individual that is the religious unit. The worth of the individual is recognized, and he is set solitary before God. How is the rise of the apocalyptic conception of things to be explained? Partly, no doubt, by the calamitous situation of the Jewish people under Persian and Greek rule. A fulfilment of the prophetic promise through the means that the prophets had in view—inner reform, political revolution, a victorious leader—no longer seemed within the range of possibility. God had ceased to speak to the people through the living voice of prophecy, and a feeling was abroad that He had forsaken the earth. This explanation is, however, only partial. The pessimism and dualism of the apocalyptic world-view, its demonology and angelology, its conception of a death-struggle between the kingdom of Satan and the kingdom of God, its conception of a resurrection from the dead and a Final Judgment, can be accounted for only on the hypothesis of Persian influence.

2. In the teaching of Jesus.—So far as its outward form is concerned, Jesus' conception of judgment and punishment is wholly on apocalyptic lines. The Judgment will come at the end of the world; it will be a judgment of individuals; and it will be universal (Mt 22<sup>13</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>). The sentence pronounced will be final: nowhere do we find a hint of future probation. With respect to the person of the Judge, Jesus follows the tradition that assigns the office to the Son of Man. 'For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he render unto every man according to his deeds' (Mt 16<sup>-7</sup> 13<sup>41</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>). No particular significance is, however, attached to this fact: the emphasis falls, not on the personality of the Judge, but on the judgment He conducts. What is Jesus' teaching with regard to the doom of the lost? Uniformly He follows the tradition that regards them as consigned to Gehenna or hell (Mt 5<sup>-2, 29</sup> 10<sup>-3</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>). And, as in apocalyptic, Gehenna appears as a fiery furnace in which the wicked suffer unending torment (Mt 5<sup>-9</sup>, Lk 16<sup>24</sup>, Mt 25<sup>46</sup>). Jesus is no theologian, but something incomparably greater. In the main He appropriates the conceptions of His time, modifying or rejecting them only when they conflict with some vital religious or ethical interest. What is original in His teaching is not the theological conceptions but the new content with which they are charged. If His conception of the Judgment and of punishment is in formal respects that of Jewish apocalyptic, the spirit of which it is the vehicle is all His own. New is the moral earnestness with which He brings each individual soul face to face with the righteous Judge. 'And be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell' (Mt 10<sup>28</sup>). New also is the moral purity with which the conception of judgment is carried out. Everything national and sectarian falls away. Of a mechanical balancing of good and bad actions we hear nothing. The one test is character, and character in its deepest principle—the love in which lies the root of all morality and all religion. 'I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink. . . . Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me' (Mt 25<sup>35ff.</sup>). And what is true of Jesus' teaching about judgment is true also of His teaching about punishment. The element of originality is to be found not in the formal conceptions but in the spirit they enshrine. In the descriptions of hell in Jewish apocalyptic embittered national and ecclesiastical feeling is at least as much in evidence as moral hatred of iniquity. Far otherwise is it when we turn to Jesus. What comes to expression in His almost fierce words regarding the fate of the wicked is His burning indignation against all high-handed sin, particularly against hypocrisy and heartlessness, His deep sense of the infinite and eternal difference between right and wrong, His immovable conviction that the first means everlasting life to a man and the second everlasting death. 'And if thy hand or thy foot causeth thee to stumble, cut it off and cast it from thee: it is good for thee to enter into life maimed or halt, rather than having two hands or two feet to be cast into the eternal fire' (Mt 18<sup>8</sup>).

3. In the Apocalypse of John.—We begin our study of the apostolic writings with the Apocalypse of John, not because it is the earliest of these writings—in its present shape it cannot be dated before A.D. 95—but because the description it gives of the events of the End is by far the most detailed, and because we are probably justified in regarding it as, in the main, representative of primitive Christian views. In his programme of eschatological events the writer follows closely his Jewish models. At His Parousia, Christ will smite the nations of the earth assembled against Him in battle, and prepare the way for His millennial reign (19<sup>11</sup>-20<sup>6</sup>). The close of this reign will see a last uprising of the powers of evil, ending in their utter and final overthrow (20<sup>7-10</sup>). Then will come the general resurrection and the Judgment (20<sup>11-13</sup>). The Judgment, which is universal in its scope, is conducted not by Christ but by God (20<sup>11</sup>). Men are judged 'according to their works,' and out of certain books, one being singled out by name as 'the Book of Life.' The books contain a record of the deeds, good and bad, of each individual: the Book of Life is the list of God's elect people. Exceedingly brief is the account of the fate of the reprobate. 'Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire . . . and if any was not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire.' Though the writer describes this as 'the second death,' it is clear that he is thinking not of annihilation but of an eternity of suffering (14<sup>10, 11</sup>). It must be admitted that the Book of Revelation does not everywhere maintain the high level of the Christian spirit. It comes to us from a time when the Church was passing through the same harrowing experiences as were the lot of the Jewish people in the days when apocalyptic had its birth. And in the one case as in the other persecution has resulted in an exacerbation of feeling and a narrowing of sympathy.

4. In St. Paul.—For St. Paul as for the Christian community in general the Last Judgment is a great and dread fact with which believer and unbeliever have equally to reckon. He knows the terror of the Lord (2 Co 5<sup>11</sup>). 'We must all be made manifest before the judgment-seat of Christ; that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad' (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, Ro 2<sup>8-16</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>5</sup>). In this and in the majority of relevant passages it is Christ who sits as Judge. But that the point is not regarded as dogmatically fixed is shown by the fact that the Apostle can also speak of God as the Judge (Ro 9<sup>30, 11</sup> 14<sup>10</sup>). What is his teaching with respect to the fate of the wicked? The Book of Revelation gives us two pictures—one of the redeemed in Paradise, the other of devils and condemned souls in the lake of fire. Of the second picture there is not a single trace in the Pauline Epistles. The wicked simply disappear from the scene, the nature and term of their punishment being left shrouded in obscurity. By bringing together a number of scattered indications we may, however, arrive at a fairly certain notion of what the Apostle thinks regarding their fate. That he contemplates a universal restoration is an idea that may at once be put aside. Support has, indeed, been sought for it in certain statements of a general character: 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive,' 'God hath shut up all unto disobedience that he might have mercy upon all' (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>, Ro 11<sup>32</sup>, Col 1<sup>9</sup>, Eph 1<sup>10</sup>). But such statements cannot be pressed in their letter against the multitude of passages that assert in unambiguous terms the final ruin of the ungodly (Ro 2<sup>3, 12</sup>, Ph 3<sup>18</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>). They are but examples of the Apostle's sweeping and antithetical way of putting things. Quite decisive against the idea of restoration is the fact that nowhere do we find a single syllable that suggests future probation.

One point only is open for argument, whether the Apostle has in his mind annihilation or an eternity of suffering. With regard to this, the words used in describing the fate of the wicked are not in themselves decisive. Of these words the two most important, both from the frequency of their occurrence and from their intrinsic significance, are 'death' (θάνατος) and 'destruction' (ἀπώλεια). Death is for St. Paul sin's specific penalty, its wages (Ro 5<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>21, 23</sup> 8<sup>6</sup>). What does the term connote? Not necessarily annihilation, since, according to current ideas, the dead descended into Hades to lead there a wretched phantasmal existence. We can take from it nothing more than this—the loss of all that gives to life its value, the loss of all that is signified by salvation. Not materially different is the connotation of the term 'destruction.' The wicked are brought to utter ruin, swept from the place of the living and the presence of God. But, if a study of terms leaves the question of annihilation or eternal suffering an open one, the general tenor of the Apostle's thought points conclusively to the former alternative. Weight must be attached to the fact of an absence of any reference to a place of torment. The tribulation and anguish of Ro 2<sup>9</sup> need refer to nothing beyond the experience of destruction. On two things only does St. Paul lay stress—that the wicked have no inheritance in the Kingdom of God, and that they are cleared off the face of the world. Still more decisive is this other fact—that the universe he contemplates as the goal of redemption is one reconciled to God in all its parts. If the demonic powers are not ultimately reconciled, as in one passage he seems to indicate (Col 1<sup>19</sup>), they are abolished (1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>). God becomes all in all. St. Paul leaves us with the vision of a world that is without a devil and without a hell, without a shadow on its brightness or a discord in its harmony.

The Apostle's allusions to the Judgment are neither few nor ambiguous, yet we have to take account of the perplexing fact that, in those passages where he gives a detailed programme of the End, not only is all reference to the great event omitted, but no place seems to be left for it. In 1 Th 4<sup>13-17</sup> we read of a resurrection of believers who have died and of a gathering of these and of living believers to meet the Lord in the air and be for ever with Him, but there is no mention of a resurrection of the wicked and a Final Judgment. These events seem to be excluded. So is it also in 1 Co 15<sup>2-3</sup>. Though the picture here is more detailed, the resurrection of the wicked and the Judgment find no place in it. And in 2 Co 5<sup>1-8</sup> and Ph 1<sup>3</sup> the Apostle speaks as if death at once ushered the believer into the presence of Christ. To depart is to be with Christ. Here not only the Judgment, but the whole drama of the End, including the Parousia, falls away. How are we to account for this perplexing fact? That St. Paul ever consciously broke with the apocalyptic tradition in any of its main features is incredible. In Philippians, one of the later Epistles, he still bids his readers expect the Parousia (4<sup>5</sup>). More can be said for the hypothesis that his ardent longing for union with Christ leads him to overleap intervening events and hasten to the goal. This, however, is not the whole explanation. The truth is that there are elements in the Apostle's thought which, though he is hardly conscious of the fact, are carrying him away from the apocalyptic scheme. In Judaism the Judgment has its main significance as the instrument for effecting a separation between the righteous and the wicked. But for St. Paul this separation has already been virtually effected. By the fact of their unbelief the wicked are already condemned; by the fact of their faith the righteous are already justified. It is true that the Apostle does not think of the believer's present state of salvation as absolute. But against this we have to set the emphasis which he places on the element of assurance. 'Who is he that shall condemn? It is Christ Jesus that died!' Had the Judgment been to St. Paul all that it was to a pious Jew, he could hardly, in his account of the End and in his contemplation of death, have left it unnoticed. In the Fourth Gospel, to which we now turn, this drift from apocalyptic is much more pronounced.

5. In the Fourth Gospel.—No more than St. Paul does the writer of the Fourth Gospel contemplate a formal breach with the traditional apocalyptic ideas. 'The hour cometh,' Christ is represented as saying, 'in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his (the Son of man's) voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done ill unto the resurrection of judgment' (5<sup>28-29</sup>; cf. 12<sup>48</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>17</sup>). But, if the Evangelist yields this recognition to traditional views, his own peculiar thought moves on other lines. The judgment on which the stress falls is that which Christ accomplished in the course of His earthly ministry and is always accomplishing. While He lived on earth, He was already invested with the sovereign power to judge. 'For judgment I am come into the world, that they which see not might see, and that they which see might be made blind' (9<sup>39</sup> 5<sup>7</sup> 8<sup>15</sup> 16 12<sup>31</sup>). If passages appear in which He is made to disclaim the office of Judge—'I came not to judge the world but to save the world'—they are added in order, by seeming contradiction, to drive thought deeper (12<sup>47</sup> 5<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>17</sup>). His real purpose is, indeed, to save, but none the less His appearance in the world has the inevitable result that a separation is effected between the children of light and the children of darkness. The former are attracted to Christ, to find in Him their salvation; the latter are repelled and driven into hostility. In the attitude which a man takes up towards Christ he is already judged. 'This is the condemnation that light is come into the world, but men loved the darkness rather than the light' (3<sup>19</sup>). In the matter of doom we find a similar shifting of the centre of gravity from the future to the present. Sin's real punishment is not physical death or even suffering, but exclusion from the higher life that comes into being through the birth from above. 'He that heareth my word . . . hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgement, but hath passed out of death into life' (5<sup>24</sup>). The popular notion of hell disappears as completely as in St. Paul.

But notwithstanding this spiritualizing train of thought, the traditional apocalyptic notions—the Parousia, a resurrection of the just and unjust, final judgment by Christ and eternal punishment for the lost—succeeded in maintaining themselves in the Church's faith. Not till the introduction of the idea of purgatory do we meet with any important modification of this scheme. And it was not till the beginning of the 3rd cent., with Origen, Cyprian, and the Gregorians, that the idea of purgatory began to emerge.

6. Only one other point, and that of minor importance, remains to be noted. Not a few early Christian writers speak of a descent of Christ into Hades and a preaching to the dead. In 1 P 3<sup>19a</sup> it is the disobedient of the days of Noah to whom Christ brings the message of salvation; in Irenaeus (IV. xxvii. 2) it is the Patriarchs; in Marcion (Iren. I. xxvii. 3) it is Cain, the Sodomites, Egyptians, and other heathen. It is improbable that this conception was a creation of the Church; rather have we to think of the adoption and Christianizing of a current pagan myth of a saviour-god descending into the under world to wrest the sceptre from its powers. The mythological details are stripped off, and Christ's mission becomes one of preaching to those from whom in their lifetime the gospel had been withheld. Also from the ranks of the dead Christ will win His trophies. Judged according to men in the flesh, they will live according to God in the Spirit (1 P 4<sup>6</sup>) (see W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, 1913, p. 32 ff.). See, further, art. DESCENT INTO HADES.

JUDGMENT-HALL.—In ancient times justice was dispensed in the open, usually in the marketplace, near the city gate. With the development of civic life, however, special courts of justice began to be built. Thus Solomon had his 'throne-room' or portico erected within the complex of his palace buildings (1 K 7<sup>7</sup>), where justice continued to be administered no doubt till the latest period of the Monarchy. The Sanhedrin also convened for judgment in the 'Hall of Hewn Stone' on the south side of the great court of the Temple. In Rome, too, the Imperial Age saw the law-courts transferred to basilicae, or open colonnades near the Forum, and finally to closed halls, where cases were heard in secret (in secretario). The administration of justice in basilicae has been traced to Pompeii and other centres of Roman life, but was apparently not the custom in Palestine, the word translated 'judgment hall' in the AV (Jn 18<sup>3-33</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>, Ac 23<sup>35</sup>) being really πραιτωριον or palace.

A. R. GORDON.

JUDGMENT-SEAT.—The judge invariably sat on a special 'seat' or throne. Thus Jerusalem and the smaller cities alike had their 'thrones for judgement' (Jg 4<sup>5</sup>, 1 K 7<sup>7</sup>, Ps 122<sup>5</sup>, etc.). In Rome magistrate and jury were seated together on the raised tribunal, or 'bench,' the magistrate on his sella curulis, or 'chariot seat,' specially associated with the Roman imperium. The custom extended also to the provinces. In the NT κρισηρια ('tribunals') is used of law-courts generally (in 1 Co 6<sup>2-4</sup> and Ja 2<sup>6</sup>), while βῆμα, lit. 'step,' 'seat' (for parties in a law-suit), is applied to the 'judgment-seat' not only of the Emperor (Ac 25<sup>10</sup>), but also of the governors Pilate (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>, Jn 19<sup>13</sup>), Gallio (Ac 18<sup>1-16f.</sup>) and Festus (2s.<sup>6, 10</sup>), and even metaphorically of God (Ro 14<sup>10</sup>) and Christ (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>). JULIA (Ἰουλία, Ro 16<sup>15</sup>, a Latin name, the feminine form of Julius [the name of a famous Roman gens]). Both of these were extremely common names. The name Julia is very frequently found as a name of female slaves belonging to the Imperial household).—A woman saluted by St. Paul and coupled with Philologus. They may have been brother and sister, or more probably husband and wife. Other couples saluted in Ro 16 are Aquila and Prisca (v.<sup>3</sup>, the order being, however, 'Prisca and Aquila'), perhaps Andronicus and Junia (v.<sup>7</sup>; see JUNIAS), and Nereus and his sister (v.<sup>15</sup>). It has been conjectured that the names in this verse are those of persons forming a Christian family with a household church (καὶ τοὺς συν αὐτοῖς πάντας ἁγίους). If this be so, Philologus and Julia were perhaps the parents of Nereus and his sister (Nerius) and Olympas, and the leaders of the little community which gathered for worship at their home (cf. v.<sup>3</sup>, where a married couple are saluted as 'fellow-labourers' with the Apostle, and the salutation includes 'the church which assembles at their house'). The locality to which we assign this circle of Christians will depend upon our view of the destination of Ro 16<sup>3-20</sup>. Nothing further is known of any of these persons.

JULIUS (Ἰούλιος).—After the decision of Festus to send St. Paul to Rome, he was entrusted to the care of a 'centurion named Julius of the Augustan cohort' (Ac 27<sup>1-3</sup>). The Apostle was treated with kindness and consideration by the centurion, who, although he disregarded St. Paul's advice as to the place of wintering (vv.<sup>9-11</sup>), deferred to his recommendation regarding cutting away the boat (v.<sup>31</sup>), and, in order to save him, refused to allow the soldiers to kill the prisoners (v.<sup>4</sup>). On arriving in Rome Julius handed over his prisoner to the 'captain of the guard' (28<sup>16</sup>). Much discussion has gathered round the phrase 'Augustan cohort' to which Julius belonged. Ramsay regards it as probable that Julius belonged to the corps of official couriers, employed as emissaries to various parts of the Empire—the peregrini; and the 'captain of the guard' is supposed to have been their commanding officer (see artt. BAND, AUGUSTAN BAND).

As Julius was the family name of the members of the Roman Imperial house, it was assumed by many of the vassal kings from the days of Julius Caesar onwards. It was borne by all the Jewish princes from Antipater, the father of Herod the Great. Josephus mentions a Julius Archelaus, son-in-law of Agrippa I. (Ant. XIX. ix. 1; cf. Schürer, i. 561, also index, p. 69).

JUNIAS, JUNIA (Ro 16<sup>7</sup>).—A person saluted by St. Paul and coupled with Andronicus. As the name occurs in the accusative (Ἰουλίαν), it may be Junias, a masculine name contracted from Junianus, or Junia, a common feminine name; in either case a Latin name. If the name is that of a woman, she was the sister, or more likely the wife, of Andronicus. Other couples saluted in Ro 16 are Aquila and Prisca (v.<sup>3</sup>, the order, however, being 'Prisca and Aquila'), Philologus and Julia, Nereus and his sister (v.<sup>15</sup>). Andronicus and Junia(s) are described as 'kinsmen' of the Apostle, as his 'fellow-prisoners,' as 'of note among the apostles,' and as having become Christians before St. Paul (see ANDRONICUS). It is surely not at all impossible that St. Paul should include a woman among the apostles in the wider sense of accredited missionaries or messengers, a position to which their seniority in the faith may have called this pair. So Chrysostom understood the words (Hom. in S. Pauli Ep. ad Rom.).

JUPITER (Ac 14<sup>12, 13</sup> [RVm 'Zeus'] 19<sup>35</sup> [AV and RV 'the image which fell down from Jupiter'; RVm 'from heaven']]).—The Oriental setting of the events which took place at Lystra is strongly evident in the first of these passages. The miracle of healing at once causes the barbarians to suppose that the gods had come to pay them a visit, and the impassive Barnabas is regarded as the chief. 'True to the oriental character, the Lycaonians regarded the active and energetic preacher as the interior, and the more silent and statuesque figure as the leader and principal' (W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 57 n.). It was not that such visits were supposed to be common, but a well-known legend (Ovid, Metam. viii. 626 ff.; cf. Fasti, v. 495 ff.) told of such a visit, when the aged couple Philemon and Baucis had alone received the august visitors and had been suitably rewarded; this had been localized in several districts. The people cried out in the speech of Lycaonia, and the original name of the local god given by them to Barnabas has been here replaced by the Greek equivalent, Zeus. In v.<sup>13</sup> Codex Bezae has a slightly different phrase which reads, 'the temple of Zeus-before-the-city.' The participle in the phrase τοῦ οὗτου Διὸς Προπόλεως is used in a way characteristic of Acts, viz. to introduce some title or particular phrase, and we must consider that D is correct here. Zockler (ad loc.) and Ramsay (op. cit. p. 51 f.) compare an inscription at Claudopolis which has Zeus Proastios (i.e. 'Jupiter-before-the-town'). The title here, then, is Propoleos, which is actually found in an inscription at Smyrna. The Temple would be outside the city proper, and it is not quite clear whether 'the gates' where the sacrifice was prepared were those of the Temple, or of the city, or of the dwelling-house of the apostles. It is most probable that the Temple is referred to, the gates being chosen as a special place for the offering of a special sacrifice (Ramsay).

Baur, Zeller, Overbeck, and Wendt regard the whole incident as unhistorical, since such people would rather have considered that the miracle-workers were magicians or demons. But the local legends give ample support to the text.

In 19<sup>35</sup> the translation should follow RVm: 'the image which fell down from the clear sky.'

F. W. WORSLEY.

JUSTICE.—In his analysis of justice (δικαιοσύνη), Aristotle (Nicomachean Ethics, bk. v.) distinguishes the justice which is co-extensive with virtue—is, in fact, 'perfect virtue'—from the special justice which consists in fairness of dealing with our neighbours. The NT writers use the word δικαιοσύνη almost exclusively in the former sense, connecting it with the righteousness of God (see RIGHTEOUSNESS). The lesser righteousness is, however, included under the greater; and though the emphasis is laid on mercy or love as 'the fulfilling of the law' (Ro 13<sup>10</sup>), justice is also recognized as a duty towards Him who is 'just' as well as the merciful 'justifier' of them that believe (see LOVE). Thus the Apostle enumerates 'things just' (ὅσα δίκαια) in his catalogue of Christian virtues (Ph 4<sup>8</sup>). He urges his readers likewise to set their thoughts on that which is 'honourable' or 'seemly' (καλά), not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men (Ro 12<sup>17</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>). This Christian justice covers the whole round of life. All men are entitled to their full dues, alike of tribute, custom, fear, honour, service and wage. The Christian master respects the honour not merely of his wife and children, but even of his slaves (Eph 5<sup>22ff.</sup>, Col 3<sup>18ff.</sup>). The servant also deals justly with his master, not stealing or purloining, as heathen slaves were wont to do, but 'with good will doing service, as unto the Lord, and not unto men' (Eph 6<sup>3ff.</sup>, Col 3<sup>-ff.</sup>, Tit 2<sup>10ff.</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>18ff.</sup>). For such service the labourer is worthy of an honest wage (1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>). The same principle applies to the preacher of the gospel, even though he refuse to accept his privileges (1 Co 9<sup>13ff.</sup>). In their relations as citizens, Christian men are actuated by the most sensitive regard for honour. Though he stands for Christian freedom, the Apostle feels morally obliged to send back Philemon's slave, however helpful he found him to be; and he further takes on his own shoulders full liability for Onesimus' misdeeds (Philem<sup>10ff.</sup>). In order that public justice may be upheld, too, the Christian is urged to pray for kings and all in high places of authority (1 Ti 2<sup>1ff.</sup>), and to be subject to all their ordinances for the Lord's sake (Tit 3<sup>1ff.</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>13ff.</sup>). But he himself is entitled to justice before the law. No man suffered more for his Master's sake than St. Paul; and no one wrote more serious words on the sin of litigiousness (1 Co 6<sup>1ff.</sup>). Yet, in defence of his just rights as a citizen, he not only asserted his Roman freedom (Ac 16<sup>37</sup> 22-5 25<sup>10</sup>), but defended himself before the courts to the very last (Ac 24<sup>10ff.</sup> 25<sup>10ff.</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>16ff.</sup>). For to him the courts were there to secure justice for all. See TRIAL-AT-LAW.

JUSTIFICATION.—1. Considerations on the history of the doctrine.—Justification by faith formulates the distinctive principle of Protestantism. It has been a war-cry and word of passion, and embodies a spiritual and theological conflict. It claimed to be an advance on the Catholic idea, as more true to apostolic experience and more adequate to the sinner's need. It is advisable at the outset to investigate this claim as preparatory to a dispassionate analysis of the apostolic doctrine. Justification is a complex conception. Neither in Luther nor in the Council of Trent are ambiguities and inconsistencies wanting. The combatants on both sides in subsequent controversy have in consequence easily fallen into serious misunderstandings. The vital current re-animating modern religious theory is disclosing the fact,* and producing a better-proportioned perspective. Rid of the war-dust, we see clearly the salient features of the main respective positions and their conspicuous divergences. What are these? It is a rich, fresh experience Luther describes in his finest statement of his faith, The Liberty of the Christian Man. It finds no commensurate exposition in the Lutheran or Reformed Confessions. Luther himself was no theologian; and his varying expressions are difficult to harmonize. But the tendency of his teaching is plain.† The character of Tridentine teaching is as plain. Luther's is aus einem Gusse ('of one mould'), born of an intense travail of soul. The Catholic, polemical in import and comprehensive of aspect, has in view efficient discipline of souls. Grace, according to Luther, is known in personal relationship with Christ (Com. on Gal 2<sup>20</sup>); it is a sense of God's favour; it saves from God's wrath;

it saves at once and wholly by God's free mercy, is a complete and perfect thing, conditioned upon faith, bringing with it assurance of salvation (see Against Latomus). It is, in his own words, 'the favour of God not a quality of soul' (ib. 489), identical with forgiveness, release from His wrath, enjoyment of His favour, a present status rather than a new character. To receive such grace is to be justified. The Council of Trent* defines its doctrine in reference to three questions: the manner of gaining justification, of maintaining it, and of regaining it when lost through mortal sin. The answers are that it is gained in baptism, through which are received not only remission of sins but sanctification and renewal of the inner man (sess. vi. ch. 7); it is maintained by performance of good works, keeping the commandments of God and the Church, resulting in an increase of justification (ch. 10); it is regained by penance and penitential 'satisfactions' (ch. 14). 'That which truly justifies the heart is grace, which is daily created and poured into our hearts' (J. Fischer's Refutation of Luther, 1523). Grace on this view is a Divine substance,† ex opere operato imparted, increased by man's aid, dependent on faith and good works as co-ordinate in worth, all part and parcel of the same idea, 'the infusion of grace'—the novel feature in Catholic dogma. Catholic dogma, equally with Protestant, safeguards the Divine initiative and the work of Christ, but neither the honour of Christ nor individual assurance, since, concerning the former, Christ, though His righteousness is available for our salvation, is not regarded as indwelling in us as our Righteousness; and, concerning the latter, the organized machinery of means of grace brings in all the elements of uncertainty, leaving the doctrine unsatisfactory in the most crucial point. Luther's is a purely religious conception, vastly deeper within its limits than the other, comprising not only pardon of sin and escape from the Divine wrath, but peace of conscience and assurance of salvation. Its weakest features are the idea of faith, which is limited to belief and trust in Christ's satisfaction, apart from subjective appropriation of its experience through the indwelling Christ which faith makes possible, and the resulting unbridged chasm between justification and sanctification; and the lack of any really vital relation between the new status and the new character of the justified.‡ Judged by the standard of apostolic truth, both fall short. In the apostolic consciousness justification is more than merely God's favour or pardon of sins: it is release from the power as well as guilt of sin, a new character, in principle at least, with the new status. Therein the Catholic opposition to Luther was justified. But the new character is erroneously regarded by Catholicism as the gradual transformation of human nature (which is sanctification), a process in this life always incomplete, and liable to be imperilled by stagnation and lapse. Nor are the Catholic formulæ adequate to the profoundly spiritual and final representations in apostolic experience of the acts and operations of grace in the believing heart through the instrumentality of Christ's Person and Spirit. This, however, is a deficiency only in theology; it is compensated for in actual religious practice in the Sacrifice of the Mass, where faith is more genially receptive and heartfelt devotion more warmly active in realizing the real presence of Christ in all His justifying force. The Mass is to the creed in the Roman system what, so to speak, 'Hebrews' is to 'Romans'* in Pauline thought.

2. The problem of justification.—Justification is a religious problem, the answer to an interior inquiry of Christian experience. The OT cry, 'How is man just with God?' is deepened in the NT: 'How is God gracious?' and 'How are we sure of His grace?' That again is the problem of fellowship with God—the most engrossing of modern quests. Of fellowship with God the very foundation and certainty is justification. In consequence modern spiritual philosophy is eagerly interested. It is better equipped to cope with the exquisitely delicate character of the inquiry than any past age. The modern idea of Divine immanence in Nature and man adds immeasurably to our perception of the nature of the human spirit, its workings, their relation to the Divine Spirit; and furnishes a key to the representation and reconstruction of inner soul-processes beyond the apparatus of the older theology. The mystical emotion is its highest form, and is no exceptional super-addition to man's nature; rather it is his natural consummation. It is not merely the secret action of the mind upon itself; while an inborn instinct, it comes to distinct form and growth from causes objective to itself, operating on it by the inworking of external and historical circumstance and the exercise and outworking of ethical faculty. Psychologically it is not of the ordinary emotive life; it is higher, inclusive of all the parts of human nature, gathering up into itself all those inner powers in whose interplay under its guidance and inspiration in one harmonious unity its life consists. In operation it is wholly personal, conscious, energetic, intensely individual. Into it enters the force of historic fact, out of it passes the power of moral life; but itself is a self inbreathing the one, outbreathing the other. The constitution of this self is the modern construction of justification. The life of that self is communion with God; justification is its origin and basis.

What is the origin?—the Divine graciousness† (Luther) or Divine grace (Catholic); a 'reckoning righteous,' or a 'making righteous'‡ by God? Neither of these alternatives standing solitary is to-day an intelligible concept applicable to the Divine or the human personality; nor is the one or the other a felt fact of religious experience, the ultimate test of every theory. These are otiose ideas, as useless as absolute ideas. God and His grace cannot be otiose. 'He speaks and it is done.' His grace is at once, as grace, prescient and preventive, operans and co-operans, sufficient and efficient, and cannot be defined in merely legal or logical terms, or, in fact, in anything short of that 'interpenetration of essence' of God's self or character§ with man's self or character, bestowing on man's its profoundest promise and potency; and instantly translating it into the status and character of life that is being sanctified after His image, and on His initiative. What Protestant thought clumsily encloses within two notions, 'justification' and 'imputation,'|| may be regarded under one more modern—'development.' Then, man's self is appreciated from the Divine standpoint, as God saw creation in its first being, not as it actually is in present attainment, nor as it will be in perfect fruition, but as it is ideally becoming when put upon the right basis and in the right atmosphere, the condition we find in 'the stature of a perfect man'—Christ—the root and direction rather than the end or goal determining the judgment of its character. That appreciation is justification.

The faculty of self by whose exercise the new status and generation are attained is 'faith.' By 'faith' the Divine Life dwells in man's soul and Divine truth becomes power. Faith here is more than spiritual insight, it is spiritual grasp; more than a receptive force, it is also the bestowing fact, softening the harsh independence of these two realities. The truth is that every approach of God to man has a true tendency to create the faith without which the approach can never become a real entrance. Faith is man's welcome of Him, created in man's heart, as the face of a friend coming towards us reclaims us for his friendship. Faith again is more than assent or trust: it is the soul's entrance into healthy relationship to Him who is its true life; an entrance fuller or weaker according to the soul's capacity, and ever growing with the soul's growth. Faith thus understood widens its mental and emotional constituents. God and man underneath all obscuring media are of like nature; God is the 'element' of man's true life.* God is unceasingly solicitous in seeking man, and, finding man reciprocate, apprehends him, but as Life apprehending life, or the ocean refreshing the tide's eddy, or the tree quickening the branch. The term 'justification' may be technically a juridical one, but that which it aims at expressing is in idea and fact a spiritual transaction unexpressible in forensic terms, not even conceivable as a process having acts and stages. It may better be compared to a gem† having many facets, simultaneous, not successive, and glowing in enhancing splendour with every further advance into light. This is the essence of the idea in believing experience. It is also the essence of the idea in the apostolic conscience—the love of God seeking the love of man and finding it.‡

3. The apostolic doctrine of justification.—The apostolic doctrine is characterized by a singular originality, comprehensiveness, self-consistency, and spirituality. Its systematic statement is elaborate, developing itself consciously along three lines—experiential, historical, speculative. A careful analysis is necessary to separate its essential substance and abiding cogency from their first local form. Its originality is evident when compared with similar ideas in ethnic and Jewish religion; its comprehensive and self-consistent character by the exhibition of its contents; its spirituality by the demonstration of its purely religious validity; its permanent worth by the absoluteness with which it solves the religious problem of which avowedly it is an answer.

1. ORIGINALITY.—The idea of justification does not originate with Christianity, although truly it comes to its full expression there. Wherever religion becomes personal in actual communion with God, it brings with itself inquiry as to the specific nature of the power known and felt and the peculiar character of its working in the soul. This we find occurring in religious history generally, and especially in Hebrew religion. Ethnic faiths for the most part are so lacking in belief in a personal God that the inquiry hardly anywhere attains more than rudimentary shape. Even in more advanced faiths the Divine personality is mingled with such unworthy elements that fruitful conceptions are rare. The indelible convictions won are only two: the gravity of the need, and the failure of provision to meet the need. A more positive impetus enters with Semitic religion, in whose religious observances the reception of the Divine life is increasingly the centre of attention. The growing consciousness of Divine force is mediated in the Hebrew spirit by sacrifice, prayer, wisdom, and prophetic inspiration; in the experience of suffering also very notably, as in Jeremiah and Deutero-Isaiah; in mystical union with the righteous spirit of the Law, as in the finer Psalms; and realized as pardon of sin (Ps 32), life in God's favour (Ps 30), righteousness (Ps 4, etc.), mercy, and salvation, covering all aspects of the soul's state. 'The Law' at its best (Ps 119) was spirit and life, obedience to its precepts clothing the spirit and life of man with their imperishable energy, which is none other than that of God who gave them. Pre-Christian evolution deepened the conscience in at least three directions—the difficulty in the way of justification, the possibility of its accomplishment, the mode and means of its reality. The advent of Christ, the tout ensemble of His Person and Work as one organic influence, raised the whole problem in apostolic experience and thought to an incomparably richer plane, on which, while the difficulty is enlarged, the possibilities are matured and a final mode with adequate means provided. Here the centre of gravity is Christ and His own justification (1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>, He 3. 5. 6): 'being manifest in the flesh, he was justified in the spirit.' Wherein consists His being justified? The true answer is—in all that by which His higher origin was made known ('His glory' in St. John, manifested in words, works, resurrection [7<sup>16</sup> etc. 2<sup>11</sup> 3-14<sup>11</sup>; cf. Mt 7-9, Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, Ac 2<sup>36</sup>, etc.]; 'His high-priesthood' [He 3. 5. 6]; 'His righteousness' [Ro 10<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>30</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, etc., in St. Paul]). It is a description drawn in contrast with the preceding phrase, 'manifest in the flesh,' and includes all by which He is proved to be the very Person He truly was.* This general proof is further specialized into the events of His Death and Resurrection, its ultimate and most impressive parts, which as such procured the redemption from sin through which we are justified (Ro 5<sup>9</sup> 4-5, He 8. 9. 10). His own justification consisted in the accomplished fact of His perfect holiness and His risen life. It is ours after the same manner; only it is His righteousness that is mediated to us to become ours, and that in virtue of our union with Him by faith (Ro 3-5<sup>6</sup> 5). The old distress of man's nature is irrevocably dissolved under the assured potency of the new condition in which it stands.

ii. COMPLETENESS.—The general meaning of justification is clear, nay simple; but the greatly simple is the organization of the complex. And the apostolic exposition is complex. It comprehends many elements, commands a variety of relations. It derives its material from the Apostle's unique fellowship with the glorified Lord; and that experience, fundamentally the same in all, is varied by the diversity of individuality in each. Again, the reasoning of the apostles relates itself directly to immediate issues and is affected by the circumstances of the readers to whom it is addressed. Further, the intellectual equipment of the writers colours their statements. To all this we must add the fact that their doctrine had to establish itself on the successful displacement of two solutions already on the field, one of them strongly entrenched, viz. the ministration of the Law. The most systematic and dispassionate statement is given by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, with which is to be associated the subsidiary matter (more or less disputations) in Eph., 2 Cor., Gal., etc. Isolated references and aspects of the doctrine, more or less complete, are to be found in Acts, the General Epistles, and Hebrews. The relation of these to one another, and of them all to the Synoptic teaching of Jesus Himself, has to be adverted to.

The Apostle proceeds next to plead for its efficacy by contrasting it with two earlier attempts in the history of the race to restore man's righteousness—attempts which had miserably failed. There was first the working of the natural conscience in the Gentile world. There is a light of nature which offers knowledge sufficient to impress on men the fact that their just due to God is full obedience to His will. By their wilful disobedience that light that was in them had been turned to darkness, with the result not of heightening the possibilities of human nature, but rather of increasing its unrighteousness, in fellowship with the god of this world, the Devil; and now the world was lying in wickedness under God's wrath (Ro 1<sup>22-25</sup> 3<sup>9-10</sup>, Gal 3-, Eph 2-), and, in the individual heart, earnestly endeavouring to keep from its contamination, the conflict proved the prepotency of sin (Ro 7). Then there was the moral conscience trained under the Law of Moses. It was designed to remedy the moral disaster of the natural conscience. Was it successful?—It had been most ineffectual. Law could 'not make alive' (Gal 3-) either in its precepts or in their sanctions. It might furnish an ideal of right and deepen the consciousness of sin, and it might educate to a higher type of virtue. It could also, on the contrary, incite to larger disobedience and to fresh vices. Its rigours working on sensitive souls tended to paralyze the will. But the only solution must lie in re-inforcement of the will. In Christ alone was that end won. He is 'the Wisdom and Power' of God, to them who believe, ideal and motive force in one Spirit. Nothing short of the religious conscience renewed by Him could suffice. The religious conscience begins in one subjective act on man's part, the act of faith. It is preceded or accompanied by repentance, but it is itself the simple, childlike, submissive, enthusiastic, unconditional self-surrender of the man's whole being, intellect, affections, purpose, to the will of God in Christ.*

(2) St. James.—The Epistle of St. James emphasizes two practical consequences of faith. (a) It works in the heart as a new law, obedience to the perfect, royal law of liberty (1<sup>-5</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>). The point here is the contrast between the external compelling force of the older Law and the internal impelling force of the new, the 'word' in the heart, able to save the soul (1<sup>-1</sup>). (b) It works in the conduct as good works. The controversy that has arisen over the supposed antagonism between St. Paul and St. James is barren, and need not detain us. 'Faith' and 'works' have two different connotations in the two instances. St. James means by 'faith' not self-surrender so much as mental assent, and by 'works' not the legal deeds enjoined by the Law, but acts of mercy and kindness prompted by the law of love in the soul. The motive and interest of the two apostles differ; there is no room for opposition. Faith to St. James, as to St. Paul, is the pre-condition of good works, and the condition of acceptance with God. Like St. Paul also, he sees justifying energy active in the concrete circumstances of life—'a man is blessed not through but in his deed.' Further, there is no suggestion of merit in these good works of faith. The sub-apostolic age was not slow to materialize both 'the new law' and the 'merit of works,' but St. James is not responsible.†

(3) St. Peter.—From the speeches (Ac 3) and First Epistle we gather three features. (a) In justification the pardon of sins and clearing of guilt are explicitly connected with Christ's sufferings (Ac 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>19</sup> 2<sup>-4</sup>); also, as the righteous suffering for the unrighteous, Christ 'brings us to God' (3<sup>18</sup>). (b) The gift of grace is the result of Christ's Resurrection (1 P 1<sup>-1</sup>); it is the ground and guarantee of the new life and of the gift of strength to overcome Satan. (c) The coming of grace into the heart finds its necessary complement in the life of love for the brethren. In the Second Epistle both freedom from sins and the power to work the righteousness of God depend upon faith in and knowledge of Christ (1<sup>5-9</sup>). Knowledge here is akin to the Johannine idea—the inner personal apprehension of the saving Spirit of Christ.

(4) St. John.—The Epistles and Apocalypse do not share in the fullness of volume of mystical idealism pervading the Gospel. Yet the essential elements are here—the unity of life with God in Christ, the significance of Christ's Person, Death, Resurrection, fellowship with Him in 'sonship.' Especially emphatic is the writer on the two facts, that it is God's love to sinners, not sinners' love to God, that is the ground of faith and healing; that in sonship are to be included religious as well as moral ideals. In the Apocalypse the same ideas are central—but under sacrificial designations: Christ's Sacrifice (the Lamb) and Resurrection (alive for evermore) are the source of the stream of life proceeding from the very essence of God which, received by man, is in him a life of uninterrupted sacrifice.

(5) Hebrews.—This Epistle is a continuation of the Pauline 'apologia' for the gospel as against the claims of the Old Covenant. What is done in Romans for grace as against law is here done for Christ's sacrifice as against Levitical offerings. Justification by faith is expounded in connexions different from those St. Paul and St. John have in view, and the exposition stands midway between theirs, filling up an evident lacuna. Some scholars assert that the problem is here less deeply discussed, justification being narrowed to forgiveness and faith to spiritual insight apart from spiritual grasp. That would be to leave Hamlet out of the play. The author has a definite aim, and, notwithstanding an obscuring vocabulary and analogies, elaborates it admirably. His aim is to demonstrate the accessibility of God through Christ's sacrificial work. His demonstration puts in bold relief two aspects hitherto untouched in apostolic thought: (a) justification as a subjective fact as well as an objective act; (b) the principles of its mode. The justification of Christ (above, § 3. i.) is constituted by His sinlessness, effected as a spiritual fact in His own experience. The justification of the sinner as a spiritual fact in his experience is effected after the same manner as in Christ, and by Christ: viz. in 'the purging of the conscience from dead works to serve the living God,' and in resisting unto blood (9<sup>14</sup>). These aspects are set forth in detail and give the book its character. In both Christ and the believer the inner experience is identical (a) 'through eternal Spirit' (9<sup>14</sup>) and (β) through their vital union: 'he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one' (2<sup>11</sup>). The word 'sanctify' is used in this Epistle in its Hebraic sense of 'consecrate.'* Just as in St. Paul the justified are accepted and become members of the Body of Christ, so in virtue of membership in the New Covenant, the believer, according to Hebrews, is set in right relation to God, receives forgiveness, cleansing of conscience, and is αγιαζόμενος, even τετελειωμένος: 'by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (10<sup>14</sup>). The faculty in man rendering this possible is faith, whose full content it takes 'hope' (6<sup>19</sup> 7<sup>19</sup>), 'obedience' (5<sup>6</sup> 11), as well as 'faith' (11<sup>1</sup>), to express. It is not merely spiritual perception of the unseen; it is rather the power of soul which makes the unseen future present, the unseen present visible, and by so doing unites us to Christ in His present and future plenitude (10<sup>38, 39</sup>), from whom flows the transforming influence creative of the graces of life which are never separated from faith nor faith from them.

* We are not here concerned with the 'Rabbinic' form of St. Paul's argumentation nor with the character of his judgment on Gentile and Jew, but only with his thought.

† For a different view of St. James's position, see Piepenbring, Jesus et les Apôtres.

* Cf. the NT use of 'saint'—one of the covenant-people, the potentially holy—of whom moral qualifications are asserted not as a fact but as a duty. See F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter, i. 1–11. 17, London, 1898, p. 70.

The efficacy of His Sacrifice rests fundamentally on the majesty of His Person. His High-Priestly act is an expression of the eternal Spirit of the Divine love. By it He has destroyed every barrier of sin which lay between man and God. He has, as the sin-offering for humanity, freed all men potentially from the guilty consciousness of sin, and brought Christians to the heavenly rest of God. The emphasis is on what follows, viz.: 'the entering within the veil,' less the surrender of His life than its presentation within the veil, implying that the love and merciful kindness of God, which were manifested in time and in the earthly ministry, are eternal and changeless principles perpetually operative on our behalf. This must ultimately be the ground of our acceptance and the assurance of our life in communion with Him. The benefits and efficacy of His perfect Sacrifice are conditioned by our attitude of faith and trust.

(6) The apostolic doctrine in relation to Christ's teaching.—Is the apostolic teaching a necessary consequence of Christ's self-witness? Yes; if certain considerations be kept in view. We see, e.g., that it was not drawn by conscious deduction. It is an original construction derived from life, from their experience of Christ revealing Himself in them (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>), as Christ's is from the manifold fruitfulness and insight of His own sublime Personality. Then we see it elaborated under stress of the Judaistic and Hellenistic environment of that age, in the endeavour to establish and justify itself in the intellectual atmosphere of the nascent Church-life. It was not possible to accomplish this with success except by a process which should display the hidden significance of what at first seemed so simple, and is so simple to simple hearts.* That age, however, was not simple-hearted;† it was a highly intellectual, profoundly perplexed, saddened age, sobbing its heart out in weakness; requiring accordingly the doctrine that would strengthen and comfort with effect to be in the mould of its own speculation and intuition. Christ's teaching is a plain, positive statement on the practical religious plane, delivering itself as easily as the flow of the stream, in conflict only with the hindrances of indifference and want of faith. That attitude characterizes the General Epistles, which are close echoes of the Master's style, and directed to the same general consciousness of religion as His was. It is otherwise with the Pauline and Johannine Epistles: in them we have the underlying universal quality and principle of His teaching disclosed, beaten out inch by inch on the hard anvil of bitter controversy (Pauline); or reflecting the more lambent genius of the mystic (Johannine). The differences are great, but they are not oppositions, nor vitiations. The same facts are looked at and loved, by means of the same great powers of soul, and within the same great principles and convictions.‡ Nor must we forget that since Christ's Person is the source of this inspiration and enlightenment, their statement is coloured throughout its whole extent by that all-pervading fact. It is a fact which leaves the writers free to be careless of superficial harmonizations, conscious as they are of the substantial unity below all apparent divergences and dissonances. That unity is impressive; its outlines strong and vivid. In contrast with Gentile wisdom and Jewish Law, which were both powerless to redeem men from sin, Christ stands out as Saviour. He is the answer to the age-long cry, 'How shall man be just with God?' He is 'the new and living way' of access into God's presence (He 10<sup>20</sup>), as He Himself claimed (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>). By Him is proclaimed 'the forgiveness of sins' (Ac 13<sup>38</sup>). He is exalted to give forgiveness (Ac 5<sup>31</sup>), and gives it (Eph 1<sup>7</sup>, Col 1<sup>14</sup>, etc.). He has broken down the 'wall of partition' (Eph 2<sup>14</sup>) and 'rent the veil' of the Temple (Mt 27<sup>51</sup>, Mk 15<sup>38</sup>, Lk 23<sup>45</sup>). He has effected 'so great salvation' (He 2<sup>3</sup>) in His own body on the tree (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>), by eternal Spirit (He 9<sup>14</sup>), in Himself and for Himself, as the Author and Finisher of our faith, really, vitally, consciously, not with a dull sense of unintelligible burden, but wholly rationally, intensely spiritually, in an experience where the issues are of life and death, fought out in a fiery heat of thought and emotion, of deeply moving religious conscience. The apostolic consciousness has caught the rich impress of this travail of soul. It sets it forth for mankind in varying form and mode—the picture of the great and guiltless sorrow bearing the sins of the world, and, in bearing them, bearing them away. As the soul of the age was sobbing itself out, here a nobler soul shares the fellowship of its suffering and of all suffering, but not in weakness; for the pain is fully faced and taken up into conscious life, there to be transmuted into abiding life. Thus was Christ justified; thus are we.

iii. SPIRITUALITY AND ABSOLUTENESS.—Justification is a purely religious problem. The apostolic solution is purely religious. Its spirituality may be vindicated by reference to its source, its ground, its results.

(a) Grace the source.—Justification presupposes the election of grace (q.v.), to which is traced its unconditional freeness (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>, Eph 1<sup>7</sup>), its plenitude (Col 1<sup>14</sup>, Ro 5<sup>17</sup>, etc.), its Divine provision (1 Jn 4<sup>10</sup>, Ro 5<sup>8, 10</sup>). The riches and freeness of God's grace are manifested in the redemption they provide. It is a manifestation in which there is nothing else than a free, unprompted, unsolicited expression of God's own nature and love to mankind. It is conditioned by nothing in man but man's clamant need, by nothing in God but His own holy love. Men are not pardoned on account of their faith or by their faith. Pardon already is in God's attitude toward them; what they have to do is to realize it by faith, and enjoy its blessing.* Nor does God pardon because of Christ's satisfaction. Christ's sacrifice is the outcome of His forgiving mercy. It does not create or impel God's love, it displays it (Ro 5<sup>8, 10</sup>). The Atonement, so far from being inconsistent with the Fatherhood of God, is its most distinct proof. Faith in Christ's atoning love only makes more consciously clear God's paternal love, for it is the marvellous way He took to struggle down through human experience to give us healing. This assured love of God is the living root of the justified life; † in its amplitude all are pardoned if they would only realize it in actual standing. It is the cause also of confident and bold access to God (Eph 3<sup>12</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>28, 3-1</sup>) and the ceasing from confidence in the flesh (Ph 3<sup>3</sup>). Assurance of the Divine love in the forgiveness of sins already contained in it the whole idea of salvation, and holds together all the parts of the Divine life in their necessary nexus: the justification of the sinner before God and the principle of freedom for the consciousness of the justified subject

* As, e.g., in Christ's teaching.

* Theology even in its most dreary day never made faith the operative but simply the instrumental cause of justification.

† Cf. Calvin's Institutes, in which justification is related to predestination: 'comprehension of the divine purpose creating confidence in the elect' (bk. iii. ch. 2).

himself in all his relations.* In that principle lies securely embedded, along with our acceptance by God, our assurance of salvation.† Starting from God, who from eternity has been beforehand with us, held by His predestinating love, creating, calling, pardoning, we raise our fabric of life in continual growth for eternal glory (Ro 8<sup>21-39</sup>). All along it is of God's initiative, of grace; all along it is an appeal to faith; man's dependence is absolute.

(b) Christ's mediation the ground.—Here the apostolic teaching assumes the form of a three-fold presentation: (a) Christ's righteousness is made peace; (β) Christ's blood is made obedience; (γ) Christ's life is made presence. The first is Pauline, the second that of Hebrews, the third Johannine—in such a way that, while each of the three has its predominant element as thus classified, we are not to suppose that each has no affinities with the others; on the contrary, the fullness of truth is in each, but ranged around the predominant element of each type.

(a) The new righteousness.—‘Christ is made unto us righteousness’ (1 Co 1<sup>30</sup>); ‘he is our peace’ (Eph 2<sup>13-16</sup>). The argument is in Ro 3<sup>10, 19-24</sup>, and proceeds by a winding course through the following chapters to the eighth. There are three kinds of righteousness: ‘God’s righteousness,’ ‘our own righteousness,’ and ‘the righteousness of faith.’ Before God’s righteousness no man can stand. The attempt was made through His Law, given by Moses. The result was a self-righteousness that failed to bring peace between God and man for two reasons—firstly, the righteousness of the Law consisted in our own unaided obedience; and secondly, that self-righteousness was the condition of our acceptance with God. It contained all the elements of uncertainty of salvation. It was ineffectual. There is another righteousness never lost sight of under the Old Law, which has now appeared in Jesus Christ. By Him it is made ours. Presented in Him, it awakes in the sinner penitence and faith—a love of Christ’s holiness, a hatred of his own sinfulness; this by God’s grace. There is nothing in the self-righteousness of the righteousness of the Law to bridge the chasm between God and sin. The provision for that end is the very thing provided in Christ. How so? In Christ God gives His own righteousness, which is the end and meaning of all faith. He who receives it in initio receives it virtually in extenso; such is the mode of God’s gift of it. The condition of possible or future righteousness is the right attitude or intention of mind towards actual present unrighteousness. It is possible to justify or accept as right only that attitude which at the time is the nearest right possible for the person. In the initial moment of contrition, the only possible and right posture of the sinner is that consciousness of himself which could not be the beginning of his hatred of sin if it were not to the same extent the beginning of a love of holiness. Where this exists in truth and sincerity, even though it be but the beginning of an infinite process, it is possible and right to accept and treat as right that which as yet is only a first turning to and direction towards right (cf. 1 Jn 1<sup>8-10</sup>). Thus the righteousness of faith begins with our sense of sin and experience of impotence, and God’s loving acceptance of this repentance in us is the condition, starting-point, and earnest of a righteousness in us which is maintained and increased through Christ’s, in whom we see revealed all the presence and power of God in us, and in consequence all the power in ourselves necessary to its actual attainment and possession. Faith in Christ as our righteousness can justify us because it is based on the one condition in ourselves of becoming righteous—a loyal disposition—and the one power without ourselves to make us righteous—the righteousness of God. The grace of God in Christ makes the sinner righteous, by enabling him to make himself righteous. It starts the process by regarding and treating as righteous the penitent believer: * ‘justifying freely through grace by faith.’

(β) The new obedience.—‘He learned obedience by the things which he suffered’; ‘the obedience of faith’ (He 5<sup>8</sup>, Ro 5<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>-6</sup>, He 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>7</sup>. 10. 23. 24 12). A. B. Bruce† has made the invaluable suggestion that by the author of Hebrews the blood of Christ has been translated from body to spirit, and as such enters into heaven, and is available for our benefit. The blood of Christ, says St. John, is ever actively cleansing us from all sin (1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>). That blood-spirit becomes to us the law of all life because it is the law of the Spirit of life itself (Ro 8<sup>2</sup>). Obedience to that law clothes us with its power. How so?—Manifestly not simply as a general consequence of that which Christ has done for us, as if we found ourselves through the Atonement on the Cross under such changed relation to God as enables us to approach Him at will. That view is little distinguishable from the main position of Rationalism (Socinianism), whose central conviction is the assumption of a general order of Divine forgiveness independent of Christ, in accordance with which pardon is bestowed on the condition of the active obedience of faith. Ritschl‡ has demonstrated the hollowness of this assumption. Both ‘faith’ and ‘obedience’ lose their peculiar quality: for faith becomes merely assent to past teaching or trust in past acts; and obedience, instead of being motivated by faith in the sense of surrender to Christ’s spirit, is merely conformity to certain legal requirements. Nor is it enough to go a step further, and to conceive that Christ by His Death established a fund of merit of which we can on certain conditions make ourselves participants (Romanism). Scriptural figures of speech there are that seem to give some warrant to such a view of a spiritual reservoir of grace which waits only for our willingness to dive into it.

Faith’s view of the High Priest’s intercession in heaven will correct such notions. Nay, the narrow notion of faith may become a snare to us. It is, we admit, the first condition in our conscious looking for the new spirit of life. But we must not confound the possession of the condition with the bestowal of the gift, or make our qualification to receive supersede the act of the Giver. Something far more effectual happens. As we invoke His intercession, we do not merely awake an ancient memory; we hear a living voice and see a living form, our Advocate and Comforter, against every accuser (Ro 8<sup>33-34</sup>), and discern them reproduced in our hearts by His Spirit ‘who maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered’ (Ro 8<sup>26, 27</sup>). It is God that justifieth. It is the Son risen for our justification.

(γ) The new presence.—‘It is expedient that I go away; for I will send the Spirit’ (Jn 16<sup>7</sup>, Ac 1<sup>5</sup>); ‘Ye have an unction from the Holy One and know all things’ (1 Jn 2<sup>-3</sup>. 27); ‘If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God’ (3<sup>-1</sup>); ‘I saw in the midst of the Church the Son of man all glorious’ (Rev 1<sup>3-18</sup>). St. John views the justified life as a new life in the deepest sense—not a doctrine merely for the mind to embrace; not an event simply to be remembered with faith; not the constitution only of a new order of spiritual relations for fallen man; but a new power into the very centre of human nature, the power of a new Divine principle. Because of this new principle it is a new creation, a new creation which indeed does not annihilate the old but transmutes it, and fulfils it—a process possible because the principle of the new is, if not continuous with the organic principle of the old, still consistent with that principle, the Logos being the cosmic counterpart of the Spirit. That new power, new principle, in the very centre of humanity is Spirit, presence. How so? By organic, living, universal development. Christ's force was not intended to stop in the person of one man to be transferred soon after to heaven. Nor was it intended to be a fund or quantum to be applied subsequently in the way of outward imputation. It goes forth to heal and justify the world, not as something standing beyond itself and by a power external. He gathers humanity rather into His own Person, stretches over it the law of His own life, so that it holds in Him as its root. Into this new order of existence we are not transferred wholly at once. We are apprehended by Him, in the first place, only, as it were, at a single point. But this point is central. The new life lodges itself, as an efflux from Christ, in the inmost core of our personality—the inmost self (above, § 2, 'Problem of justification'). Here it becomes the principle or seed of our sanctification, conceived always not as a substance but as personal, a presence; Christ is in the soul as a magnetic centre (Jn 12<sup>3</sup>), producing in its life continually an inward nisus in the direction antagonistic to sinful impulse, a process which, if continued, will at last carry all in the soul its own way, as the soul's forces increasingly yield themselves in their totality to the totality of His Presence. The soul thus grows into His very nature. It is with reason that Schleiermacher speaks of the communication which Christ makes of Himself to believers as moulding the person (see Der christliche Glaube<sup>2</sup>, 1830–31, § 140). The Presence of Christ is the ground of all proper Christian personality, 'the new man' in Christ Jesus (Eph 2<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>). The end of the process is the higher justification (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>), the fruition of that first justification which was but the beginning. It is a process which from beginning to end is only and wholly of Divine life.

(c) Christ-in-us the result.—The feud between 'faith' and 'works' is an old one. Certain points are clear. It is not a question of sinners being justified by works whether 'legal' or 'good.' The impenitent are never justified. It is not a question of believers being justified by good works only. By his works the believer will be judged. These are bald positions easily excluded. The crux of the controversy is that works to be good must spring from no motive other than the one proper motive, the new life in Christ. There are three alternatives: (1) Our own merit. We can go beyond the legal requirements so far that we are able to compensate for our wrongdoing. (2) Others' merit. Others may compensate similarly for us, either by way of being our substitute or by way of transference of their supererogatory virtue to us. Both positions lose force in face of the Divine claims upon us and all men for the whole devotion of which we are capable at every moment; even then we are 'unprofitable servants.' (3) Not of merit but of faith. By this it is not meant that we are justified because faith shows that we have altered our ways and that faith can complete itself in good works, or because faith has in it the germ of all that God approves; we are justified by faith, not on the ground of the holy life that may follow, but on the ground of Him who by faith is indwelling in our spirits and implants us in a new world of spiritual reality, where love (as He is love) alone is power. 'Love is the fulfilling of all law.' In pre-Christian ages that principle might be in men like Abraham in unconscious operation and be credited to them for its worth. Similarly to-day in the world outside Christ. But implicitly or explicitly it must be present whenever this is so; good works are the outcome of character not of ordinances, of love not of law, and the character and love are of Christ in us. The apostles plainly conceive of Christ in this reference in an ascending scale of presence in the world. He is in the Cosmos as its principle. He is in humanity, of which He is the 'recapitulation.' He is in the Christian body, of which He is head. Good works are good from the principle underlying them. It is that principle that justifies the doers of them. That principle is Christ. The Epistle to the Hebrews labours to show that Christ as Priest and Victim is perfect, eternal, final, from the fact that He is character, not ordinances. The Johannine Epistles are pregnant with the idea that Christ in the heart is Love. But character and love are pure Spirit. Its implanting into us for ever saves our 'good works' from degenerating into a mere moral code, and furnishes us with a richer and more personal basis for our confidence in doing our goodness. Our virtues cannot be things without us: they must be self-determined; but, if my self is determined by Christ in me, we can truly say, and ought to say, of our good works, as of all else in our life, 'Not I, but Christ in me.' This, further, we can say from the first, and with assurance. The confidence is secure in the implanted principle; it is not bound to the good works, which are themselves not independent but based on the principle. No doubt the real and vital relation of the Christian to Christ is invariably and inevitably accompanied by its practical sense and the actual experience of its living results in his quickened and risen self; but it is not the accompaniment, it is the relation itself, that is the ground of certainty. Ritschl* is out of the true lineal descent of Reformed theology when he argues that the individual believer attains certainty of salvation only as in the exercise of his religious experience he reaches dominion over the world; he is back on the old plane of 'ordinances' and 'works' which incited Luther's polemic.

There Luther was on sure ground—true to his own experience, true to the apostolic mind. That mind conceived and solved the problem of justification with splendid invincible spirituality, as the act of God alone. In so doing it at the same time set its finality on the firmest foundation. If the idea of the union between the Divine and the human be true, and the actualization of it necessary to satisfy the deepest want of the human spirit, before it finds peace with God, all that the case * Ritschl's is the most exhaustive and original discussion in modern theology of the doctrine of justification. No references can give any idea of its wealth. The distinctive features of his definition are only partly true to Lutheran tradition. They are as follows: (1) the identification of justification and forgiveness of sins; (2) the denial of any punishment of sin except the sinner's separation from God; (3) the rejection of the ideas of the imputed righteousness of Christ and His substitutionary suffering; (4) the subordination of reconciliation to justification; (5) the ascription of justification to the Christian community; (6) the inclusion in the idea of justification of a reference to man's relation to the world.

The adequate reason of justification Ritschl maintains to be the fatherly love of God, not His judicial righteousness; the condition of its human appropriation is faith, which does not directly include love to man, but implies freedom from all law. This justification is primarily attached to the community of Christians and only to individuals as members of it. The best exposition in English is A. E. Garvie's Ritschlian Theology, Edinburgh, 1899. Good translations of vols. i. and iii. are now accessible, the former by J. Sutherland Black (Edinburgh, 1872), the latter by H. R. Mackintosh and A. B. Macaulay (do. 1900).

can possibly demand is met in Christ, in whom it is met not in idea merely but in reality. In every part of His life He shows a power of love. He offers Himself through its force unreservedly to God. Equally He offers Himself through its force unreservedly to men, for the purpose of drawing them to God and uniting them among themselves and with God. He is a centre of love, Divine and human, intensely interwoven with power to embrace the whole of humanity and to influence it without exhaustion of His fullness. Such an exhibition has never been paralleled or approached. There is no room to think higher than this. It cannot be transcended.

LITERATURE.—There is neither a good history of the doctrine nor a comprehensive discussion of the problems it raises. There are excellent articles in PRE<sup>3</sup> and CE, giving full statements of modern Protestant and Romanist ideas. The older books of Faber, Alex. Knox, Newman, simply confuse the issues. A thoroughly live investigation of the apostolic doctrine will be found in A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897; and of St. Paul's in Sanday Headlam, Com. on Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, do. 1902). Interesting expositions are those of C. Gore, Romans, London, 1899-1900; A. E. Garvie, Studies of Paul and his Gospel, do. 1911; W. P. DuBose, The Gospel according to St. Paul, New York, 1907. Of older books still worth study: Andreas Osiander, De justificatione, 1550, and De unico mediatore Jesu Christo et justificatione fidei, 1551; Erskine of Linlathen, The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel, Edinburgh, 1831. The Cunningham Lectures for 1866 by Jas. Buchanan furnish a full exposition of the 'Forensic Theory.' The few brochures of the immediate present show the tendency of thought to be that argued for in the article—that justification meets two needs—the sense of alienation from God and the sense of weakness to do right—by substituting a loyal disposition for the performance of a legal code. On the more general problems of Pauline thought to which justification is related, the following are worth study: E. von Dobschütz, Probleme des apostolischen Zeitalters, Leipzig, 1904; M. Goguel, L'Apôtre Paul et Jesus-Christ, Paris, 1904; A. Hausrath, NTZG<sup>2</sup>, Leipzig, 1873-77, and Jesus und die neuest. Schriftsteller, Berlin, 1908-09; H. J. KEEPER.—See GUARD.

KEY.—It is remarkable that 'key' in the concrete form does not occur in the apostolic writings. The four occurrences in Rev. are symbolical. There are certain passages in Acts where we should expect mention of a key, but the circumstances are exceptional, and 'key' is omitted (Ac 12<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>26</sup> 27). When a porter was in attendance, admittance was given from the inside, and a key to open was not necessary (cf. Ac 12<sup>14</sup> 15). From the fact that city gates were guarded, the need for a key was in this case also absent. It may be noted that the chains by which prisoners were secured, and the stocks in which their feet were made fast, were in all likelihood secured by the equivalent of a key (Ac 12<sup>6</sup> 7 16<sup>4</sup> etc.).

We remark the difference between the Hebrew word (מפתח), 'that which opens,' and the Greek and Latin (κλεις, clavis), 'that which shuts.' This seems to correspond with actual usage. Among the Hebrews the lock was arranged in such a manner that the key was requisitioned only for opening (see illust. in HDB ii. 836). The bar was shot, and the lock acted of itself, but it could be withdrawn only by aid of a key or opener. This advanced mode of making fast a door was doubtless preceded and attended by a simpler process, whereby the bolt or bar could be moved forwards and backwards by means of a hook passing through a slit in the door. This served to shut the door, but did not make it absolutely secure as in the other case. For the age with which we have to deal we must think of the key as a device by which one outside held command over the closed door. Having shut it in the first instance, one had power to open it by applying the key.

The imagery of Rev., so far as 'key' is concerned, implies power and authority on the part of one standing outside and having possession of the key. This power is in the hands of angelic beings, who are above earth, and chiefly in the hands of the Risen Christ. Their dominion is manifested upon earth and in the under world, over living and dead.

(1) Christ has the keys of death and of Hades (Rev 1<sup>8</sup>, RV). This power is Imperial, exercised from without and from above. There are interesting parallels to this, apart from Scripture, in literature, both earlier and later. When Ištar descended to the land of no-return she called imperiously to the porter to open the door, and threatened in case of refusal to shatter the door and break the bolt. Here the power is primitively conceived, and remains largely with the one within. For later and more advanced conceptions see Dante, Purg. ix. 65 ff., and Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 774 ff., 850 ff. In both these instances the power, although great, is still limited.

(2) Angelic authority is evident in Rev 9<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>, where the key of the 'pit' or 'well' of the abyss, or of the abyss simply, is spoken of. This power was delegated ('was given,' 9<sup>1</sup>). That some symbol of power was bestowed seems clear from 20<sup>1</sup>, where the key and a great chain for binding are seen in the angel's hand (or attached to his person). The figure of the key here directs our thought to the pits or wells of ancient times, whose opening was safeguarded against illegitimate use by a covering of some kind. The primitive setting of such coverings would naturally be horizontal, but here the imagery, extending to key, points rather to a door set upright and secured by bolt or lock. The stone doors of tombs may be compared.

(3) Upon earth itself Christ's unlimited authority is exercised over the churches, including that in Philadelphia (Rev 3<sup>7</sup>). The 'key of David' here mentioned is reminiscent of Is 22<sup>2</sup>, where some sort of investiture is in the writer's mind (HDB v. 172). In this instance power is exhibited in the most absolute form, and made over to the Church in the sense of a 'door opened,' for the enjoyment rather than for the extension of the gospel (see R. W. Pounder, Hist. Notes on the Book of Revelation, 1912, p. 140). It is not surprising that the reading of this verse should have been attracted to 1<sup>7</sup>, as appears in some inferior MSS (ἀδὸν for δαυειδ).

See further DCG, art. 'Keys.' For specimens of actual keys discovered in the course of excavation see R. A. S. Macalister, The Excavation of Gezer, 1912, i. 187 and ii. 271. Further illustrations in A. Rich, Dict. of Roman and Greek Antiquities<sup>3</sup>, 1873, s.v. 'Clavis.'

KINDNESS.—In its substantival, adjectival, verbal, and adverbial form this term occurs in the English NT in the following passages: Lk 6<sup>35</sup>, Ac 27<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>6</sup>, Gal 5<sup>-2</sup> (RV only), Eph 2<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>32</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup>, Tit 2<sup>5</sup> (RV only), 3<sup>1</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>7</sup> (AV only; RV 'love of the brethren'). In all these passages (except Ac 27<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>2</sup>, where it renders φιλανθρώπως, φιλανθρωπία, Tit 2<sup>5</sup>, where it renders ἀγαθός, and 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>, where 'brotherly kindness' renders φιλαδελφία) the original has χρηστός, χρηστότης, χρηστεύειν. These Greek words, however, occur in several other places, where the English NT does not employ the term 'kindness,' viz. Mt 11<sup>30</sup> ('easy'), Lk 5<sup>39</sup> (AV χρηστότερος, 'better,' RV χρηστός, 'good'), Ro 2<sup>4</sup> vis ('goodness'), 3<sup>12</sup> ('good'), 11<sup>22</sup> ('goodness'), 1 Co 15<sup>33</sup> ('good'), Gal 5<sup>22</sup> (AV 'gentleness,' RV 'kindness'), 1 P 2<sup>8</sup> ('gracious'). These passages will have to be taken into account in determining the precise meaning of the conception.

χρηστός is the verbal adjective of χράω, 'use.' Its primary meaning, therefore, is 'usable,' 'serviceable,' 'good,' 'adequate,' 'efficient' (of persons as well as of things). This utilitarian sense of 'goodness' passes over into the ethical sense in which it becomes the opposite to such words as πονηρός, μοχθηρός, αίσχρός. It further passes over into the more specialized ethical meaning of 'kind,' 'mild.' The process of the latter transition may perhaps still be observed in the phrase τὰ χρηστά = 'good services,' 'benefits,' 'kindnesses.'

In the NT there is only one instance where it has the sub-ethical meaning 'good for use,' viz. Lk 5<sup>39</sup>; here the old wine is said to be 'good' or 'better.' According to Trench (Synonyms of the NT, 1901, p. 233), even here the thought is coloured by the ethical employment of the word in other connexions, χρηστός = 'mellowed with age.' This is certainly true of Mt 11<sup>30</sup>, where Christ's yoke is called χρηστός because it is a figure for demands that are kind and mild. In all other instances the ethical application is explicit. The precise shade of meaning, however, attaching to the word in this sense is not easy to determine. In certain instances it may designate moral goodness in general. This seems to be the case in Ro 3<sup>12</sup> (ποιῶν χρηστότητα, a quotation from Ps 14<sup>2</sup>, where χρηστόν is the LXX rendering for צַדִּיק). In 1 Co 15<sup>33</sup> the proverbial saying φθείρουσιν ἡθὴ χρηστά ὁμίλῳ κακῷ, 'evil companionships corrupt good morals' (or 'characters'), has χρηστός in the same general sense, the opposite here being κακός. In all other cases there are indications that some specific quality of moral goodness is intended. Most clearly this is apparent in Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, for here χρηστότης stands among a number of Christian graces and is even distinguished from ἀγαθωσύνη, 'goodness.' A similar co-ordination is found in Col 3<sup>1</sup>, where χρηστότης occurs side by side with πραΐτης. Various attempts have been made at defining that conception. Jerome in his exposition of Gal 5<sup>22</sup> renders χρηστότης by benignitas (cf. the rendering by Wyclif and in the Rheims Version), and quotes the Stoic definition: 'benignitas est virtus sponte ad benefaciendum exposita.' The difference between χρηστότης and ἀγαθωσύνη he finds in this, that the latter can go together with a degree of severity, whilst it is inherent in χρηστότης to be sweet and inviting in its association with others. This, however, does not quite hit the centre of the biblical idea. Most shrewdly, it seems to us, the latter has been pointed out by Tittmann (de Synonymis in NT, 1829-32, i. 141) as consisting in the trait of beneficence towards those who are evil and ungrateful: 'χρηστός bene cupit, neque bonis tantum sed etiam malis.'

A closer inspection of the several passages will bear this out, at least as the actual implication of the NT usage, if not as the inherent etymological force of the word. In Lk 6<sup>35</sup> God is said to be χρηστός towards the unthankful and evil, and the statement serves to urge the preceding exhortation: 'love your enemies, do them good, and lend, never despairing.' The passages in Romans point to the same conclusion. In 2<sup>4</sup> the χρηστότης is associated with 'forbearance' and 'longsuffering'; it is that attitude of God by which doing good in the face of evil He leads men to repentance. In the second clause of this verse the word occurs in the form τὸ χρηστὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, which probably means the embodiment of the χρηστότης in acts. On the same principle in 11<sup>22</sup> χρηστότης is the opposite of ἀποτομία, 'severity'; 'to continue in the χρηστότης of God' means to continue in conscious dependence on this undeserved favour of God (cf. v. 21, 'be not highminded, but fear'). In 1 Co 13<sup>4</sup> we read of love that it 'suffereth long (χρηστεύεται), envieth not,' which indicates that a kindness is meant which overcomes obstacles. In 2 Co 6<sup>6</sup>, again, χρηστότης is found in conjunction with 'longsuffering,' and in a context which emphasizes the patient, forbearing character of the Apostle's loving ministration to his converts. In Gal 5<sup>22</sup> we meet with the same conjunction between 'longsuffering' and χρηστότης, and here, by distinction from ἀγαθωσύνη, 'benevolence,' and πραΐτης, 'meekness,' the sense is narrowed down to a benevolence which asserts itself either with a peculiar cheerfulness or in the face of peculiar difficulties. According to Eph 2<sup>7</sup> the Divine grace is shown in kindness; no matter whether χρηστότης is here taken as abstractum pro concreto = the embodiment of God's kind procedure in the work of salvation, or whether 'grace' be given an objective concrete sense; in either case the association of the two shows that the Divine χρηστότης is conceived as having for its object the sinful and unworthy. The context of Col 3<sup>1</sup> likewise emphasizes the forbearing and forgiving disposition required of the Christian in view of the forgiveness received from God, and the terms with which χρηστότης is here associated ('lowliness,' 'meekness,' 'longsuffering') are again terms that describe benevolence over against faults observed in fellow-Christians. The χρηστότης of Tit 3<sup>4</sup> is shown by the context to be God's kindness towards sinful, undeserving man, and held up as an example for the Christian of abstinence from evil-speaking, contentiousness, and pride. It came to such as were 'foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another.' Finally, in 1 P 2<sup>8</sup> (a quotation from Ps 34<sup>9</sup>) the general meaning 'gracious' seems to be indicated by the fact that the Divine χρηστότης is set in contrast to the wickedness and guile and hypocrisies and envies and evil-speakings, which the readers must put aside as new-born men (cf. 1<sup>23</sup> and the 'therefore' in 2<sup>1</sup>), and the putting aside of which is invited by their vivid experience in the new life that the Lord Himself is gracious.

GEERHARDUS VOS.

KING.—The title is applied to rulers of various degrees of sovereignty. We find it employed to designate the tetrarch Agrippa II. (Ac 25<sup>13</sup>); Aretas of Arabia (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>); Agrippa I., whose territory was co-extensive with that of Herod the Great, and who seems to have received the royal title (Ac 12<sup>1</sup>); and the Roman Emperor, whom it appears to have been the custom for Greeks and Orientals so to designate (1 Ti 2-, 1 P 2<sup>13, 17</sup>). An instance of the elasticity of the term is provided in Rev. 17, where the seven kings in v. 10 are Roman Emperors, while the ten kings in v. 12 are vassal kings.

1. Christ as King.—(1) The nature of Christ's Kingship.—It was made an accusation against St. Paul and Silas at Thessalonica (Ac 17<sup>7</sup>) that they were guilty of treason, inasmuch as they proclaimed another king, one Jesus. It was the revival of the charge brought against the Master (Lk 23-). It is true that the Christians did claim Kingship for their Lord, but His Kingdom was not of this world (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). His throne is in heaven, where He is set down with His Father (Rev 3<sup>21</sup>). There are various representations of His Kingship in the apostolic writings.

At one time His reign seems to have already begun. This is the thought suggested by the frequently recurring phrase, based on Ps 110<sup>1</sup>, 'sitting at the right hand of God' (Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, Eph 1<sup>20</sup>, Col 3<sup>1</sup>), which signifies Christ's participation in the Divine government. According to this view, Christ enters into His βασιλεία immediately on His Exaltation (B. Weiss, Bib. Theol. of the NT, Eng. tr., ii. [1883] § 99), in recognition of His obedience unto death (Rev 3<sup>21</sup>, He 12<sup>2</sup>, Ph 2<sup>8</sup>). On the literal interpretation of Col 1<sup>13</sup>, the Kingdom of the Son is present even now, and believers are already translated into it (so Lightfoot and Haupt, while others interpret the phrase proleptically). Their citizenship is in heaven, whence they look for Christ (Ph 3-<sup>6</sup>). The law they obey is called νόμος βασιλικός (Ja 2<sup>8</sup>), in virtue of its emanating from the King (Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, p. 265). At times this heavenly Kingship of Christ is represented as undisturbed by further conflict, and as peaceful sway over the powers which have been brought into subjection. So in 1 P 3<sup>2</sup> He is on the right hand of God, 'angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him' (cf. Eph 1<sup>20</sup>); and in He 10<sup>12</sup> He is represented as sitting down for ever at the right hand of God, 'from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.' According to this view, His work is finished; His present state is one of royal rest, and it remains for God to complete the subjugation of the hostile powers.

But there are other representations of Christ's Kingship. The most general view of His βασιλεία in the NT represents it as not already realized, but beginning at the Parousia (so O. Pfeiderer, Paulinism, Eng. tr., 1877, i. 268); and according to the programme sketched by St. Paul in 1 Co 15-<sup>48</sup>, His reign is no peaceful sway, but a ceaseless conflict against the powers of darkness. 'He must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet' (v. <sup>25</sup>). The last enemy to be overcome is Death; and when that is accomplished, then cometh the end, when He delivers up the sovereignty to God (v. <sup>24</sup>). According to this outline, Christ's reign is of the nature of an interregnum, to be terminated (in opposition to the εἰς τὸ διηνεκές of He 10<sup>12</sup>) when He resigns the power into the hands of God.

In the later Epistles this programme is not adhered to. In accordance with their more developed Christology, Christ becomes the end of Creation (Col 1<sup>16</sup>), and the final consummation is now represented, not as the reign of God, who is to be 'all in all' (1 Co 15-<sup>8</sup>), but as the Kingdom of Christ and God (Eph 5<sup>9</sup>), or even of Christ alone (2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), whose Kingdom is an everlasting one (2 P 1<sup>11</sup>), and whose sovereignty is declared to extend to the future æon (Eph 1<sup>21</sup>). Again, in the earlier representation Christ's Kingdom is to be established on earth at His Coming, but in the later versions it becomes a heavenly kingdom (2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>), corresponding to the kingdom of the Father which St. Paul had expected to succeed the interregnum of the Son.

In Revelation we again meet with the conception of a temporary reign of Christ, its duration being put at 1,000 years (20<sup>4</sup>). It is questionable whether that reign is here regarded as one of uninterrupted peace and blessedness, or of continuous conflict against the powers of evil. H. J. Holtzmann (NT Theologie<sup>2</sup>, 1911, i. 542 f.) thinks that the only original contribution made by the author of the Revelation in this picture of the millennium is the representation of the interregnum as a period of peace and rest (20<sup>2</sup> 3-7). On the other hand, F. C. Porter (HDB iv. 262) contends that the 1,000 years' reign is part of the last conflict against evil, the reigning and judging of Christ and His saints being the gradual subjugation of the powers of evil, and that there is no suggestion in Rev. that peace and rest characterize the millennium.

(2) Christ and earthly kings.—In the Pauline references to the sovereignty of Christ the hostile forces which He overcomes are not earthly potentates but the angelic principalities and powers, the world-rulers of this darkness (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>). To this corresponds the conflict with Satan in Revelation. But in the latter book there is also frequent representation of Christ's sovereignty over earthly potentates. He is Prince of the kings of the earth (1<sup>5</sup>), King of kings and Lord of lords (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>). Out of His mouth goeth a sharp sword with which to smite the nations, and He rules them with a rod of iron (19<sup>15</sup>). The kings of earth who have committed fornication with Babylon (17<sup>2</sup>), and who marshal their armies in support of the Beast (19<sup>19</sup>), are numbered among the enemies whom He has to subdue. Corresponding to this attitude of hostility to Christ on the part of the kings of the earth in Rev. is the spirit of hatred to the Roman Empire which the book breathes, as contrasted with that recommended in the other apostolic writings. St. Paul as a citizen of the Roman Empire recognizes in the higher powers the ordinances of God, and regards subjection to them as a religious duty (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>). St. Peter recommends submission to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, and exhorts to fear God and honour the king (1 P 2<sup>13</sup> 17). In 1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup> the injunction is given to pray for kings and for all in authority. But in Rev. we find a fierce hatred of Rome and longing for her destruction. She is to the author the throne of the Beast (16<sup>10</sup>), the very incarnation of the sin which Christianity sought to destroy, and his attitude towards the Imperial power is the direct opposite of that taken up by St. Paul.

2. God as King.—There is no power but of God (Ro 13<sup>1</sup>), and all kingly authority ultimately proceeds from Him who is King of kings and Lord of lords (1 Ti 6<sup>15</sup>). Christ has ultimately to deliver up the sovereignty to the Father, being subject to Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all (1 Co 15-<sup>48</sup>). In the song of Moses and of the Lamb (Rev 15<sup>3</sup>) God is praised as the King of nations, and in 1 Ti 1<sup>17</sup> a doxology is sounded to Him as King of the æons. The phrase may be chosen with reference to the Gnostic series of æons, and may mean 'King of the worlds.' Others take it as 'King of the world times,' the ruler who decrees what is to happen from age to age; while others render it, as in the AV, 'the King eternal.'

3. Believers as kings.—In Rev 1<sup>6</sup> the AV runs: 'and hath made us kings and priests unto God.' This is based on the reading βασιλεῖς, which must be abandoned for the better-attested βασιλείαν. But in 5<sup>10</sup>, where the same phrase occurs in the song of the angels concerning the Church (though here again there is a variant βασιλεῖς, which, however, would render the concluding clause superfluous), there is the further addition: καὶ βασιλεύουσιν ἐπὶ γῆς. N reads βασιλεύουσιν; and if we accept that reading, then the reference is to the future dominion of believers as represented in 20<sup>4</sup>, where they live and reign with Christ 1,000 years. Other references to this future sovereignty are found in Ro 5<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>, and 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup> (where they judge the world and the very angels). But if βασιλεύουσιν be retained, then the standpoint of the author is that already that sovereignty of the saints prophesied in Dn 7<sup>22-27</sup> has begun. The Church, down-trodden and oppressed, is already the dominant power in the world. St. Paul ironically congratulates the Corinthians on the assumption of kingly authority (1 Co 4<sup>8</sup>). Their vaunting may have been due to a perversion of this doctrine of the present sovereignty of the saints.

KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS.—The title 'King of kings,' assumed of old by the Babylonian monarchs and adopted by the Achæmenide, is proved by coins and inscriptions to have been laid claim to, about the beginning of the Christian era, by various other Oriental potentates, e.g. the kings of Armenia, the Bosphorus, and Palmyra (A. Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, 1908, p. 265). It had been applied by the Jews to their God (2 Mac 13<sup>4</sup>, 3 Mac 5<sup>35</sup>), and is combined with the appellation 'Lord of lords' (bestowed on Jahweh in Dt 10<sup>17</sup>, Ps 136<sup>3</sup>) to form the supreme title 'King of kings and Lord of lords,' with which God is invested in 1 Ti 6<sup>15</sup>. This heaping up of attributes has a parallel in 1<sup>17</sup>. It is not evident what is its precise purpose in the context. Some would explain it as a counterblast to Gnostic misrepresentations. H. Weinel (Die Stellung des Urchristentums zum Staat, 1908, pp. 22, 51), who recalls the Babylonian origin of the title, finds some trace of the old Babylonian astrology in the further course of the passage, 'who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach' (cf. Ja 1<sup>7</sup>, 'the Father of lights,' i.e. stars). The same lofty title is applied in Rev 17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup> to Christ, in earnest of the certainty of His triumph over the kings of the earth. In view of the hostility to the Roman Empire which breathes throughout the Book of Revelation, and the express references in it to the worship of the Emperor (13<sup>8, 15</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>), it is probable that this title is deliberately assigned to Christ in assertion of His right to that dignity and reverence which were falsely claimed by the Roman Emperor (see artt. KING and LORD).

KINGDOM, KINGDOM OF GOD.—1. References in Synoptic Gospels.—The conception of the Kingdom which occupies so large a place in the first three Gospels finds a relatively small place in the remaining books of the NT. In our earliest Gospel*—that of St. Mark—the Kingdom of God is the main topic of Christ's preaching. He began His ministry by announcing the good news that the Kingdom of God was at hand (1<sup>15</sup>). To His disciples was entrusted the 'secret plan' about the Kingdom (4<sup>11</sup>). The Parable of the Seed Growing Secretly explained that it would come like harvest after a period of growth, i.e. it would present itself in due time when the period of heralding its advent was over (4<sup>26-29</sup>). Its coming would not be long delayed, for some who heard Christ speak would see it come with power (9<sup>1</sup>). The possession of wealth was an impediment to entry into it; i.e. wealth hindered men from enrolling themselves as disciples of Christ, the coming King (10<sup>3-24</sup>). Elsewhere we read not of the coming of the Kingdom, but of the Coming of the Son of Man (so in 13<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>). The meaning attached to 'gospel' in this book as the good news of the coming Kingdom preached by Christ is primitive, and earlier than the Pauline use of 'gospel' for the good news about Christ.

In the First Gospel the term is changed. We read now of the 'kingdom of the heavens' rather than of the Kingdom of God. But the main line of idea is the same (see W. C. Allen, St. Matthew [ICC, 1907], pp. lxvii-lxxi). The emphasis which is placed in this Gospel upon the near coming of the Son of Man to inaugurate the Kingdom (cf. 16<sup>28</sup> 24<sup>3, 34</sup>, etc.) is due largely to the Matthaean collection of discourses used by the editor.

* It does not fall within the scope of this art. to consider at length the idea of the Kingdom in Christ's teaching.

St. Luke returns to the phrase 'the Kingdom of God,' and though in general outline the idea of the Kingdom is the same as in the two prior Gospels, there are one or two suggestions that St. Luke was beginning to realize that a considerable period of history might precede the coming of the Son of Man to inaugurate the Kingdom. Jerusalem is to be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled (21<sup>4</sup>). And there is a hint of the idea which was soon to overshadow the anticipation of the near approach of the Son of Man, that in a very real sense the Kingdom was already present (17<sup>1</sup>, 'within' or 'among you').

2. References in other NT books.—References to the Kingdom occur in St. Mark some 16 times, in St. Matthew some 52 times, and in St. Luke about 43 times. By contrast with this the comparative paucity of references to the Kingdom in the remaining books is very striking. In the Fourth Gospel it occurs only 5 times, and in all these passages the conception is that of a spiritual Kingdom which might be conceived of as now present. In Acts it occurs 8 times, 6 of them being references to speaking or preaching about the Kingdom. In the whole of St. Paul's Epistles it occurs only 13 times, in the Catholic Epistles only twice (Ja 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>11</sup>), in Hebrews only twice (1<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>), in the Apocalypse 5 times (16<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>10</sup>).

3. References to Christ as King.—Outside the Gospels there is also a very infrequent reference to Christ as King except in so far as this was involved in the title 'Christ' or 'anointed.' In the Gospels such references occur almost entirely in connexion with the events of the last few days of the Lord's life (entry into Jerusalem, trial before Pilate). The exceptions are Mt 2- (where the Magi inquire after the one who has been born King of the Jews), 25<sup>34</sup> (where the term 'king' is placed in the mouth of Jesus as descriptive of the Son of Man sitting upon the throne of glory), Jn 1<sup>49</sup> (where Nathanael addresses Him as 'King of Israel'), and 6<sup>15</sup> (where it is said that the multitudes wished to make Him a king). Nowhere in St. Paul, in the Catholic Epistles, or in Hebrews is the term applied to Christ. But in Ac 17<sup>7</sup> the accusation is made against Christians that they acted contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there was another king, one Jesus. Lastly, in the Apocalypse the exalted Lamb, and the Rider on the white horse, titled 'the Word of God,' are called 'King of kings and Lord of lords' (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>; see preceding article).

4. Reasons for paucity of references in apostolic literature.—If we now ask why the idea of kingship as applied to Christ finds so little space in the literature of the Epistles, the answer must be manifold. (1) The conception of kingship found partial expression in the terms 'Christ' and 'Lord.' (2) The avoidance of the term 'king' was an obvious precautionary measure. Ac 17<sup>7</sup> is significant in this respect. The early Christian teachers had enough difficulties to contend with without inviting the accusation that they were guilty of treason against the State. Apart from Matthew, which was probably intended originally for circulation amongst Jewish Christians, the only writing of the NT which in so many words assigns the title 'King' to Jesus is the Apocalypse, a book written at a time when State persecution had driven the writer to an attitude of definite hostility to the Roman Empire, and had induced him to throw over the cautious attitude of a previous generation towards the State. (3) It was soon felt that the teaching of Christ was many-sided and capable of more than one interpretation. Roughly, there were two ways of thinking about the Kingdom. It might be thought of eschatologically as a Kingdom to be founded when Christ returned. This is perhaps the view which prevails in the NT. It is difficult to prove this, because the passages which speak of the Kingdom are not brought into immediate connexion with those which speak of the Second Coming of Christ. And it is therefore often open to question whether the Kingdom referred to is a Kingdom to be established when He comes, or a Kingdom of which the Christian disciple feels himself even now to be an actual member by virtue of his relationship to God through Christ. But the eschatological sense is probable in 1 Th 2<sup>2</sup>, where St. Paul prays that his converts may walk worthily of God, who calls them 'to his kingdom and glory,' and in 2 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, 'that you may be accounted worthy of the kingdom of God, on behalf of which you suffer.' The same may be said of 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, 'his appearance and his kingdom,' and 2 Ti 4<sup>18</sup>, 'shall save me into his eternal kingdom.' This eschatological sense appears also in 2 P 1<sup>11</sup>, 'an entry shall be granted unto us into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour,' and less certainly in He 12<sup>8</sup>, 'receiving a kingdom which cannot be shaken.' But the word 'kingdom' here may perhaps rather mean that Christians even now become members of a spiritual kingdom which will remain unshaken even during the final catastrophe which will cause the dissolution of the material universe. The passages which speak of Christians as inheriting a kingdom may refer to the Kingdom in the eschatological sense, or, less probably, to the Kingdom conceived as present (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>9-10</sup>, Gal 5<sup>1</sup>, Eph 5<sup>5</sup>, Ja 2<sup>5</sup>).

But the phrase 'Kingdom of God' might also be interpreted of the present life which Christians now live, in so far as this is governed by obedience to Him. The writers of the NT seem sometimes to regard Christians as already members of the coming Kingdom, living according to its laws, and enjoying even now in some measure its privileges. So St. Paul in Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, 'the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and joy, and peace in the Holy Spirit,' and in 1 Co 4<sup>20</sup>, 'the kingdom of God is not in word but in power.' So too Col 1<sup>13</sup>, 'hath translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love.' On the whole, this sense seems to be not primary but derivative and consequential. Just as the writer of the Hebrews thinks of the true rest as still in the future, belonging to the world to come (4<sup>9-10</sup>), and at the same time feels that Christians in some sense anticipate and enter into that rest even now (4<sup>3</sup>), so the NT writers think of the Kingdom of God as waiting to be manifested when Christ comes again, and yet feel that in some sense the Christian is even now a member of it, and that, as the number of Christian disciples increases, the Kingdom widens here upon earth. But in the NT this belief is always conditioned by the certainty that the Second Coming of Christ is necessary to the full manifestation of the Kingdom.

This double-sidedness of the conceptions 'kingdom' and 'king' may in some measure explain why the apostolic writers avoid them.* And it is significant that another term which was closely connected with the doctrine of the Second Advent is also left unused outside the Gospels. The term 'Son of Man' is employed in the first three Gospels chiefly in connexion with the ideas circling round the thought of the Death, Resurrection, and Second Coming of Christ. Similarly in the Fourth Gospel it is used chiefly in passages which speak of the lifting up or glorification of the Son of Man. Outside the Gospels it occurs only once—in the mouth of Stephen; here too of the glorified state of the Messiah (Ac 7<sup>56</sup>). The remaining NT writers never use it. And yet the thought of the Coming runs like a silver thread of hope through all their writings. They seem to have felt that on the one hand the phrase 'Son of Man' was too technically Jewish for Gentile readers, and on the other that the terms 'King' and 'Kingdom' were open to grave misconception. The King for whose appearance they looked was no earthly monarch, and His Kingdom was no rival to earthly kingdoms, nor even in so far as it was now partially present did it prevent men from loyal obedience to the existing government. Hence they choose other terms in which to clothe the Gospel hope of Christ's return, and the state of felicity which would ensue. St. Paul uses such terms as the following: 'to wait for his Son from heaven' (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>), 'the parousia' of the Lord Jesus (1 Th 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>), 'the Lord descending from heaven' (1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>), 'the day of the Lord' (1 Th 5<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>8</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, Ph 1<sup>6</sup>), 'the apocalypse of the Lord Jesus from heaven' (2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>), 'waiting for the apocalypse' (1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>), 'until the Lord come' (1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>), 'until he come' (1 Co 11<sup>26</sup>), 'the day when God shall judge . . . through Jesus Christ' (Ro 2<sup>16</sup>), 'from whence we await the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ' (Ph 3<sup>20</sup>), 'the Lord is near' (Ph 4<sup>5</sup>), 'the manifestation of Christ' (Col 3<sup>4</sup>), 'the epiphany of our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Ti 6<sup>14</sup>), 'the epiphany of our Saviour Jesus Christ' (Tit 2<sup>13</sup>).

In the Catholic Epistles we have: 'the Parousia of the Lord is at hand' (Ja 5<sup>8</sup>), 'the apocalypse of Jesus Christ' (1 P 1<sup>13</sup>), 'when the chief Shepherd is manifested' (1 P 5<sup>4</sup>), 'the day of the Lord' (2 P 3<sup>10</sup>), the manifestation of Christ (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>); in Hebrews: 'he that cometh will come, and will not tarry' (10<sup>37</sup>); and in the Apocalypse, the many references to the Coming of Christ, beginning with 17.*

By thus expressing the Christian hope in terms of expectation of the Return of Christ, and by substituting for 'King' and 'Son of Man' such terms as 'Lord,' 'Saviour,' 'Chief Shepherd,' the apostolic writers were able to avoid suspicion of political propaganda, and to give to the thought of the Second Coming a far wider significance than any which they could have suggested by laying too much emphasis upon the future as the establishment of a Kingdom, however much they might have attempted to give to this term a spiritual and non-material connotation. For, after all, Christ is and will be more than king, and 'kingdom' does not go very far in expressing the conditions of the life with Him for which Christians long.

5. Apostolic conception of the Kingdom.—If we now ask what ideas the writers of the Apostolic Age attached to the term 'Kingdom of God' or 'of Christ,' the answer must be that for them as in the teaching of Christ in the Gospels it is a term to symbolize the inexpressible—that is to say, the future blessedness of the redeemed.† The Anointed King had risen from the dead, and was seated at the right hand of God. His reign had therefore begun. Why then did they not conceive of His Kingdom as a heavenly one into which His followers were admitted at death? Mainly, no doubt, because of the teaching, ascribed to Christ

* On the unique feature of the Apocalypse—the thousand years' reign of Christ upon earth—see A. Robertson, Regnum Dei, p. 113.

† It connotes, with infinite richness of meaning, all that is implied in the word "Salvation" (Robertson, op. cit. p. 50).

* Sanday finds in St. Paul's conception of 'righteousness' his equivalent for the Gospel term 'kingdom' (JThSt i. 481 ff.).

Himself, that He would return to gather together His elect. Partly, too, because of the common apocalyptic teaching that before the inauguration of the Messianic Kingdom there must be the final act in the present world-order, the general resurrection, final judgment, and transformation of this world to fit it to be the arena of the heavenly Kingdom. Thus the Kingdom was in being, but it awaited its manifestation. The King was crowned, His subjects could serve Him. But however close the union between Him and them, there was a sense in which they were now absent from the Lord, and awaited His coming. The Kingdom would be fully manifested only when He came. Meanwhile the Kingdom could be spoken of as a present reality rather because the Christian could be transported by faith into the presence of the King than because he brought (by his Christian life) the Kingdom down into this present world.

There is hardly any trace in the Epistles of the mediæval idea that the Church on earth was the Kingdom of God. And the idea of some modern theological writers, that this world as we know it will develop under Christian influence until it becomes the Kingdom, is quite alien to their thought. Indeed, the apostolic writers seemed to regard this world as incapable of becoming the arena of God's Kingdom. They felt that human nature as now constituted could reach a very imperfect measure of Christian perfection. Limited as we are, even Christian knowledge must be imperfect; 'now we see through a mirror, in a riddle,' cries St. Paul (1 Co 13<sup>12</sup>).

There was also the problem of physical death. So long as that remained, Christ's sovereignty could not be fully manifested. The ultimate perfection which is the goal of the individual Christian could only be dimly guessed at. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is' (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). And in a wonderful passage St. Paul seems to express the belief that physical nature as now known to us must undergo some transformation at Christ's return before it can be the scene of His Kingdom: 'we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain even until now.' 'For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God' (Ro 8<sup>19, 22</sup>).

Consequently, their anticipation for this world was far from being a hope of gradual amelioration. The period immediately preceding the coming of the Kingdom would be one of evil and not of good. Cf. 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, 'the wrath to come,' 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup>, 'in the last day evil times shall come,' 2 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>, and the Apocalypse, passim. The writer of 2 Peter stands alone in anticipating a destruction of the present world by fire (2 P 3<sup>7</sup>). If any one of these writers had been asked whether the Kingdom was now present, he would have answered, No. Christ was King, but His Kingdom would be manifested only when He came. If he had been further asked what that Kingdom would be, or in what relation it would stand to this present world, he would probably have answered that nearly all that constitutes this present world would have vanished—imperfection, sin, death; and that as to the nature of the new world he could say but little save that Christ would be there, and that His servants would serve Him, and that that was enough for anyone to know.

When modern writers ransack the records of Christ's teaching or the other apostolic writings for traces of the conception that the Kingdom of God is now present in human life, it is, of course, possible to find them. For, wherever a human soul is in communion with the absent King, there in some measure is the sovereignty of God exhibited and the reign of Christ realized. But in the NT the admission that the Kingdom is now in some sense present, whether in the subjection of the Christian soul to the law of Christ, or in the Church of which He is the Head, or in the life of God streaming down into the world through the Spirit of Christ in the forms of righteousness and peace, is always made on the understanding that these foreshadowings of the Kingdom of God imply a far more perfect realization of the Kingdom in the future, and that when Christ comes again the Kingdom will come in such sense that by comparison it will seem never to have come before. The relation between the Kingdom now and the Kingdom of the future is perhaps much the same as that between the presence of Christ now and His presence when He returns. None has ever so fully been conscious of the life of Christ in him as was St. Paul: 'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.' Yet none has ever looked forward more earnestly, with greater expectation of living hope, to the day of Christ's return. He could even speak of this present life as a condition of absence from the Lord (2 Co 5<sup>6</sup>). By contrast with such knowledge as we have of Christ now, vision of Him when He came again would be 'face to face' (1 Co 13<sup>12</sup>).

KNOWLEDGE.—The distinctive sense in which the apostles speak of knowledge has reference to the knowledge of God, and especially to the knowledge of God and the world through Jesus Christ.

1. The organ of knowledge.—St. Paul teaches clearly (Ro 1<sup>18-23</sup>) that, apart from any special revelation, God has exhibited so plainly His attributes of eternal power and divinity in creation that there is given to man an instinctive knowledge of God. There is a certain intelligence in mankind which, apart from the power of the senses, makes God known by the heart when He is not understood by the reason. Indeed, men became darkened in their understandings when they began to indulge in reasoning, and in trying to be wise they became fools. Thus St. Paul places the intuitive moral consciousness as the central organ of the true knowledge of God. When the Apostle speaks of the means by which the Christian knowledge of God is acquired, he develops this principle. It is true that St. Paul admits that for the knowledge of the facts of Christ's life he and others are indebted to the testimony of witnesses (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>), and that for bringing faith and knowledge the preaching of the word of truth is invaluable, but he insists pre-eminently that in all true knowledge of God in Christ the spirit of man is directly acted upon by the Spirit of God (1 Co 2<sup>4-6</sup>, Eph 3<sup>5</sup>).

St. Paul, who excelled in logic and speculation, cannot be regarded as unnecessarily decrying the logical faculty or the speculative gift, and yet he speaks of reasonings (λογισμούς) and of vaunting speculations ('every high thing,' παν υψωμα) as possible strengths of the enemy that required to be cast down, and of the need of bringing every thought into the obedience of Christ (2 Co 10<sup>5</sup>). Perhaps this attitude may have been accentuated for the Apostle by the fact that in his own experience so much of his knowledge should have come directly in visions, as in the vision of Jesus, the Exalted Christ (Ac 9<sup>3</sup>), in the vision of the man of Macedonia (16<sup>10</sup>), and in the vision of the third heaven (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>).

St. John declares that all men have the organ of spiritual vision by which God, who is light, is revealed to them. Many refuse to exercise this organ, and prefer to dwell in darkness, and thus lose the power of knowing, while spiritual vision becomes clearer and stronger by a purer and better moral life. Those who keep the commandments of God come to a growing knowledge (1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), and only those in whom love is abiding really possess this Divine knowledge (4<sup>1</sup>). Whoever persists in sinning does not know God (3<sup>6</sup>). The organ of knowledge is spiritual and ethical, not merely logical or speculative.

Thus both these apostles are alike in their insistence that the organ of Divine knowledge is to be found in this deep faculty of the soul. The apostles would agree in the saying: 'Pectus facit Christianum,' if not: 'Pectus facit theologum.'

2. The object of knowledge.—Much of the earliest teaching of the apostles was to demonstrate that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ of God (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>), and the object of all their knowledge and preaching might be summed up in the phrase of St. Paul: 'to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ' (2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>). This illumination (φωτισμός) came first to the apostles with the purpose of being conveyed by them to others who were in ignorance. Thus the object that is made known to all Christians is the glory of God as revealed in the person, character, and work of Jesus Christ, so that what was only dimly discerned before is now clearly seen. This is the open secret that believers in Christ have discovered and delight to make known. This is the μυστήριον that was hidden for long ages but is now revealed, so that the Divine plan of redemption is no longer a secret but is heralded forth in Jesus Christ (Ro 16<sup>25</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>). Thus St. Paul conceives of the glory of God as having been long concealed by the clouds of earth, but at last having shone forth in undimmed splendour; and those who believe that Jesus is the Lord receive a vision of God's glory that illuminates all life, history, and experience.

To St. John also Jesus Christ is the source of light on all the great matters of life. Through Him we know God (1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), and this provides the key to all knowledge.

The other apostles agree in the central place in their teaching being given to the knowledge of God in Christ, and the Epistle to the Hebrews (8<sup>11</sup>), in announcing that under the New Covenant there has come a universal knowledge of God, not only embodies the hopes of the OT prophets but also declares the faith of the NT teachers.

3. Implications of knowledge.—This Christian knowledge sheds its light on all the facts and aims of life. Thus individuals learn the outstanding features of their own characters (Ja 1-3), the sanctity of their lives as being the temples of God (1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>), the value of their bodies as members of Christ (6<sup>15</sup>), and the consecration of all the powers of body and mind as an acceptable service to God (Ro 12<sup>1</sup>). Christian knowledge leads to a better understanding of all the experiences of life, and to a conviction that in and through every event God is making all things to work together for good to them that love Him (Ro 8-8), and especially to a conviction that the trials of life do not come without Divine planning but are appointed by the will of God (1 Th 3<sup>3</sup>). Through Christ there comes likewise a better knowledge of social duties, e.g. in the relation of masters and servants. Servants are expected to render a whole-hearted service because they know that their real master is Jesus Christ, by whom they are to be recompensed.

Masters are required to carry out all their duties with justice and fairness, for they know that they have to account to their Unseen Master, the Lord in heaven (Col 3<sup>22</sup>). Even minor social problems like those of eating and drinking have new light cast upon them (Ro 14<sup>14</sup>), for the light of Jesus Christ has illuminated all life and brought knowledge where formerly there was doubt or ignorance.

In the Epistles of St. John this Christian gnosis has a predominant place, and it is interesting to note how wide and vital this knowledge becomes according to the Apostle. The knowledge of God is at the centre, and it radiates forth in every direction to a wide circumference, for it includes the knowledge of truth (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), of righteousness (2<sup>29</sup>), of love (3<sup>6</sup>), of spiritual life and inspiration (3-4 4<sup>1</sup>), and of the state of those beyond the grave (3<sup>2</sup>). In the light of God Christians possess a light that brings enlightenment to them on many problems of experience, perplexities of the present time, and mysteries of the future life.

4. Complements of knowledge.—The apostles uniformly recognize that knowledge of itself is imperfect and must be always associated with other Christian gifts. To reach its fullness it must be accompanied by abnegation (Ph 3<sup>3</sup>), by fellowship with God and with brethren (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>), by obedience to God's commands (2<sup>3</sup>), by attention to apostolic teaching (4<sup>9</sup>), and by faith, virtue, temperance, patience, godliness, love of the brethren, and love (2 P 1<sup>6</sup>).

Special notice should be taken of the connexion of knowledge and faith, and of knowledge and love. The apostles do not recognize any essential antagonism between faith and knowledge. Faith does not arise from ignorance but from knowledge (Ro 10<sup>17</sup>), and knowledge does not supersede faith but includes it (2 P 1<sup>6</sup>). The knowledge of God in Christ is synonymous with faith in Him, and in their essence the two are closely inter-related. In knowledge there is the recognition of the Divine by our spiritual nature, in faith there is the action of the will in virtue of this insight, so that the highest knowledge and the humblest faith go together. There is a kind of knowledge, however, that puffs up (1 Co 8<sup>4</sup>), and so far from its leading to faith it begets a self-sufficiency and pride that strike at the very foundations of all Christian faith.

At their best there is also no antagonism between knowledge and love. To know God is to love Him, and to reach the highest knowledge love is necessary. 'Every one that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth him' (1 Jn 4<sup>7</sup>). Christian knowledge is not a matter of the intellect but of the deeper moral and spiritual faculties that find their true expression in love. Still knowledge and love may come into conflict, and in the solution of many practical problems love is even more necessary than knowledge. St. Paul deals with this relation especially in his discussion of the attitude to be adopted to things sacrificed to idols. For his generation the difficulty was intense, as some Christians dreaded the slightest approval being given to idol-worship, while others were so convinced that idolatry was false that they considered it a negligible quantity. Among the latter were many Corinthian Christians, who had announced to the Apostle their conviction that the whole system of idolatry seemed so false that they could eat any food irrespective of its being associated with idol-worship. But St. Paul in his reply (1 Co 8<sup>15</sup>) argues that a mere intellectual conviction is not the only or the best guide in such a matter. In theory the Corinthians might be right, but in practice they must not be guided by knowledge alone. 'Knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth,' and in matters that are intimately concerned with the feelings and prejudices of others love is the safer guide. To a Christian even more than to a philosopher the saying of Aristotle must apply: τὸ τέλος ἐστὶν οὐ γνώσις ἀλλὰ πράξις (Nic. Eth. i. iii. 6).

5. Philosophy and theosophy.—The relation of Christian knowledge to philosophy and theosophy is discussed by St. Paul. The Apostle expounds the gospel as being not only 'power' but also 'wisdom,' yet he refuses to establish this wisdom by any of the current arguments or by the conclusions of Greek philosophy (1 Co 2<sup>12</sup>). He is proclaiming a gospel that is folly in the eyes of many, and yet it is the true wisdom to those who understand it. This higher philosophy has been hidden from the sight of men, otherwise they would not have crucified the Lord Jesus Christ. It comes through the indwelling of the Spirit of God, who alone can reveal it. Just as the spirit of man alone can understand the things of a man, so the Spirit of God in man alone can understand the Divine philosophy. 'The merely intellectual man' rejects this philosophy, as he does not possess the spiritual insight to discern its Divine wisdom. Even Christian people may be mere children in this respect, not able to understand this teaching; and among other indications of this childish mind was the party spirit by which so many were impelled. Thus St. Paul argues that the initiated Christians find in Christ a philosophy as well as a gospel.

Christian knowledge came into conflict with the theosophical tendencies that were so prevalent in many ancient schools of thought. In this connexion St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians is of chief importance. The Apostle deals in this Epistle with claims that had been made by certain Christians to a higher Christian life through means that involved ascetic and ritual practices, and from arguments that rested on speculative and theosophic principles. It is unnecessary for the present purpose to decide whether these heresies arose from a latent Gnosticism or from certain features of Judaism; but, if Judaism was the source, it was a Judaism influenced by the thought and spirit of the Diaspora. This may be judged by the kind of speculations in which they indulge, especially in the cosmical dualism that they shadow forth and in the belief in an endless series of angelic beings as mediators between God and men. St. Paul does not denounce all speculative knowledge, but opposes it by a higher knowledge of Jesus Christ. He develops the teaching about Christ so that He is presented not only as a full and perfect Saviour for men, but also as the Lord of the Universe, in whom all things, even angels, were created, and as the fullness of all things, by whom both men and angels were made at one with God. This insistence on the cosmical value of Christ carries with it the best refutation of all extra-Christian theosophical teaching.

LABOUR.—Greek and Roman thought regarded those who lived by labour as indispensable but contemptible necessities. Jewish teaching stood in strong contrast to this. 'Hate not laborious work' (Sir 7<sup>15</sup>) was accepted as a rule of life. Even the scholar was to spend some of his time in manual work (Schiirer, HJP II. i. [Edinburgh, 1885] § 25). The apostolic writers repeat and emphasize this principle. A man who does no work is to them a parasite (2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>). In the Thessalonian Church the expectation of the speedy return of the Lord had been made an excuse by many for the abandonment of their daily work. St. Paul meets this by reminding his converts how, when he had preached to them, he had taught them to welcome a life of labour. It brings with it three good effects—quietness of spirit, honourable standing among neighbours, and independence of other men's alms (1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>). To these he adds in Eph 4<sup>8</sup> the ability to help those who are in need. It is possible, as von Dobschütz suggests, that this had been forgotten not only at Thessalonica, but also at Jerusalem, and that that fact was one of the causes of the distress among Christians there.

St. Paul enforced his teaching by his own example. He had been taught at Tarsus the local trade of tent-making, and by practising this (cf. Ac 18<sup>3</sup>) maintained himself while evangelizing. That he might be no burden to others, he willingly worked overtime ('night and day,' 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>). His roughened hands showed the severity of his toil (Ac 20<sup>3-35</sup>). In 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup> he mentions Barnabas as another who lived by the same rule—a striking instance of self-discipline in view of his past history (cf. Ac 4<sup>36</sup>).

The justification of this high view of labour can be seen in St. Paul's treatment of the position of slaves (Eph 6<sup>5-9</sup>, Col 3<sup>2-4</sup>). There was a danger that slaves might suppose that, as in the eyes of God they were of equal value with their masters, they need not do their work very carefully. But St. Paul forbids all scamping of work ('not in the way of eyeservice'). It is to be done thoroughly, because they are servants not so much of earthly masters as of Christ, who has an absolute claim on their best, and will see to their reward.

It was the custom among Jewish artisans to maintain anyone of their own craft who was seeking work until his search was successful. In the Didache (xii.) a similar rule is laid down for Christians. But such help is to be given for two or three days only, to avoid imposture. If a man does not know a trade, he is to learn one. Similar advice is given in Ep. Barn. (x.), where Christians are forbidden to keep company with the idle.

Modern conditions call for a renewed emphasis on the apostolic teaching about labour. The principles which it embodies are a warning, to the wealthy not to consider themselves exempt from labour, if they would be accounted Christians, and to the workman not to be content with less than the best in his work, because anything less is unworthy of the Heavenly Master.

LAKE OF FIRE.—That particular conception of future punishment represented as 'the Lake of Fire' is found only in the Apocalypse of St. John among the Christian writings of the Apostolic Age. For a fuller account of the early history of the conception see 'Introductory' and 'Christian' sections of 'Cosmology and Cosmogony' in ERE, and 'Hinnom, Valley of,' in HDB; and, for the fuller discussion of the general subject, artt. HELL and FIRE in the present work. It will be sufficient to sum up briefly here the facts concerning the origin of the conception.

Both the Babylonian and the Persian cosmogonies contain the conception of the future destruction of the world by fire, closing an æon or period in the history of the world. But, while Persian eschatology shows the presence of the conception of penal fire (cf. SBE v. 125 ff.), there is, according to H. Zimmern (*KAT*³, 1902-03, p. 643), no trace of the conception in early Babylonian religion. Hence the presence of the idea in Jewish prophetic eschatology is held by many scholars to be due to Persian rather than to Babylonian influence.

1. In Jewish eschatology we find three related conceptions, each possibly a different topographical setting of the same central idea:

(1) The conception of the Valley of Hinnom (הַיְיִנוֹם) as a place of fiery torment for the wicked during the Messianic Age; cf. Is 66<sup>23-24</sup>, where the proximity of the place of punishment to Jerusalem shows that the Valley of Hinnom is intended.

(2) The conception of a fiery stream issuing from Jahweh, or from His throne; cf. Is 30<sup>33</sup>, Dn 7<sup>10</sup>. This form may possibly have links of connexion with the ancient conception of Jahweh as a volcano-god.

(3) The conception of a valley or sea of fire and sulphur; cf. Is 34<sup>9</sup>, where the topographical setting is in Edom. This conception goes back to the story of Sodom and Gomorrah, which again is connected by Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos) and Jeremias with the Babylonian cosmology (cf. A. Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, Eng. tr., 1911, ii. 40 f.; M. Jastrow, The Rel. of Bab. and Assy., 1898, p. 507). The whole valley of the Dead Sea is still called by the Arabs Wādy en-Nār, 'Valley of Fire.'

The conception as it appears in the Apocalypse is related rather to the forms (2) and (3) than to the Gehenna conception.

2. In the Apocalypse we have again three distinct conceptions.

(1) Hades (see artt. HADES, HELL), an intermediate place or state whose existence ends at the close of the millennial kingdom. Death and Hades are cast into the Lake of Fire (Rev 20<sup>14</sup>). Hades is not connected distinctly with the idea of punishment in the Apocalypse.

(2) The Abyss (20<sup>1</sup>), in which the dragon is bound during the millennial reign (cf. 9<sup>1</sup> and Lk 8<sup>31</sup>).

(3) The Lake of Fire, mentioned as existing before the beginning of the millennial kingdom (19<sup>0</sup>), the place into which the beast and the false prophet are cast after their defeat by the Lamb. It is also the place into which the devil is cast after the defeat of Gog and Magog (20<sup>10</sup>). Then, at the close of the Final Judgment, death and Hades are cast into the Lake of Fire (20<sup>14</sup>); and, lastly, everyone not found written in the Lamb's Book of Life is cast into the Lake of Fire (20<sup>15</sup>). An additional statement (21<sup>8</sup>) describes those who have their part in the Lake of Fire; cf. the description of those who are without the city (22<sup>15</sup>).

3. The relevant passages in the contemporary apocalyptic literature are: 2 Bar. xlv. 15 ('the dwelling of the rest who are many shall be in the fire,' in contrast to the blessing of the righteous in the new age [xlv. 12]), xlviii. 39, 43, lix. 2, lxiv. 7 (of Manasseh), lxxxv. 13; 2 Es. vii. 36 ('the pit of torment' and 'the furnace of Gehenna,' as the abode of the wicked after the 400 years' Messianic kingdom); Ass. Mos. x. 10 (the enemies of Israel are seen in Gehenna). Hence in the apocalyptic literature contemporary with the Apocalypse the precise form of the conception does not appear.

4. In the same way the passages in the Pauline Epistles, Hebrews, 2 Peter, and the Apostolic Fathers are all vague and general. Fire is one of the accompanying features of the Parousia; it is the real or metaphorical agent of punishment for the wicked, and only in 2 Peter do we find the definite conception of a final conflagration which will destroy the old heavens and earth.

The principal question then arising from the use of the conception in the Apocalypse is as to its relation to the future state.

(1) The Lake of Fire may be regarded as a place of the final annihilation of evil. The force of the expression 'second death' determines the writer's use of the conception. The 'second death' is a Jewish theologoumenon, e.g. in the well-known passage in the Jerus. Targum on Dt 33<sup>6</sup>, 'Let Reuben live in this age and not die the second death.'

In Jewish Rabbinical theology the expression seems to imply a non-participation in the life of the age to come; cf. the discussion in Sanh. 11 as to those who shall share the life of the coming age. Hence the meaning of annihilation is possible. Those who are not raised to the life of the world to come cease to exist. On the other hand, the writer of the Apocalypse holds the doctrine of a general resurrection to judgment at the close of the Messianic Kingdom. Hence it is also possible that he has given the Jewish phrase a new meaning. But for a fuller discussion of this point see art. IMMORTALITY.

(2) The writer's conception of the Lake of Fire may be penal. The beast and the false prophet are said to be tormented there day and night, and the unrighteous have 'their part' in the Lake of Fire, an expression which is most naturally interpreted in a penal sense. In the light of contemporary apocalyptic literature the penal sense would seem to be the most natural one.

(3) It is possible to maintain a purgative meaning for the conception, but this view finds no support in the NT literature itself.

S. H. HOOKE.

LAMB.—The point of view for this subject is suggested by Delitzsch: 'All the utterances in the New Testament regarding the Lamb of God are derived from this prophecy [Is 53<sup>7</sup>], in which the dumb type of the Passover now finds a tongue' (Com. on Isaiah, Eng. tr., 1890, ii. 297).—(1) In Philip's interpretation of this passage to the eunuch who questioned him concerning its meaning, he showed that its fulfilment was found in Jesus (Ac 8<sup>32</sup>).—(2) In 1 P 1<sup>19</sup>, Christ is compared with a sacrificial lamb; as an offering on behalf of sin He gave Himself (1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>), without blemish and without spot (cf. Lv 23<sup>11</sup>). If the allusion here is first to the descriptive terms of Isaiah, yet there is included an association derived from the Levitical ritual. Christ was not only a quiet, unresisting sufferer, but also a sacrificial offering for sin.—(3) The main use of the term 'Lamb' in the NT is in Revelation, where it occurs 28 times. The word of which it is a translation is a diminutive, and is peculiar to the Apocalypse. Many surprises await one who, familiar only with the significance of the Lamb in the Levitical sacrifices, traces the new forms in which the figure made itself at home in the visions of the Seer of Patmos. It is evident that the writer had been fascinated by the suggestion on account of which he first employed the term to designate the Exalted Christ (5<sup>b</sup>), and he was afterward conscious of no incongruity or embarrassment in continuing to use the title when he referred to Christ, even when he associated the most incompatible qualities, relations, and activities with it. In the interest of clearness and consistency one may try to substitute 'Christ' for 'Lamb' wherever the latter term occurs in this book, but it will be found that then something almost indefinable but very real has fallen out and that nothing of equal worth has taken its place. We move here in a region of prophecy, of symbolism, and of spiritual values, where the imagination supplies itself with wings, and where exact logical thought has to plod along as best it can afoot. According to Rev 5<sup>b</sup>, in the central place before the throne, in the midst of the four and twenty elders, and the four living creatures, the Revelationist turned to see a Lion, symbol of majesty and overmastering power, when lo! instead of a lion he beheld a Lamb, standing, bearing still the wound by which He was slain in sacrifice, yet with the emblems of power and wisdom in the highest degree. 'He looked to see power and force, whereby the foes of his faith should be destroyed, and he saw love and gentleness by which they should be conquered' (G. B. Stevens, The Theology of the NT, 1899, p. 542). The reason Hofmann offers why the Lion which has conquered appears as a Lamb is that He has gained His victory in that form (Weisagung und Erfüllung, 1841-44, ii. 328; cf. Is 53<sup>1</sup>). Attempts to trace the symbolism to astrology (cf. A. Jeremias, Babylonisches im NT, 1905) or to a Babylonian source discover a single reference to the blood of a lamb substituted as a sacrificial offering for men; but no influence of this on pre-Christian Messianism, or of contemporary cults on this particular symbolism, has been found (cf. J. Moffatt, EGT, 'Revelation,' 1910, p. 385). But always at the heart of every picture of the Lamb throughout this book is the never-to-be-forgotten fact of His sacrifice and victorious power, and all the properties and functions of the Exalted Christ take their rise from this fact. Among the functions assigned to Him is: (a) that of loosing the seals of the Divine judgments, i.e. of carrying history through its successive stages to its ultimate goal. Henceforth the life of the world must be dominated by the ideal which He has realized, and the power for its fulfilment must proceed from Him. (b) At the very centre of the heavenly host, together with God He receives universal homage from the highest beings in heaven—innumerable angels—and the entire animated creation (Rev 5<sup>b-13</sup> 7<sup>9-10</sup>). The significance of this worship, springing as it does from a convinced monotheistic faith on the part of the writer, is not to be mistaken. Not a higher and a lower worship are here, but the two are of the same order and unite in one stream. The Lamb does indeed share the throne of God (22<sup>1</sup>), yet the throne of God and of the Lamb is one. (c) To Him as slain the redeemed owe their power over sin and death (5<sup>b</sup>, 9-12 7<sup>10-14</sup> 12<sup>11</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>); nor in this connexion does the author shrink from the word 'purchase.' (d) To Him is entrusted the eternal welfare of men, symbolized by the 'book of life' (21-7; cf. 3<sup>9</sup>), the history and significance of which may be traced in Is 4<sup>3</sup>, Ex 32<sup>31</sup>, Ps 38<sup>16</sup> 89<sup>10</sup>, Ezk 13<sup>9</sup>, Mal 3<sup>16</sup>, Dn 12<sup>1</sup>, Enoch xlvii. 3, Apoc. Bar. xxiv. 1, Asc. Is. ix. 12, Lk 10<sup>-6</sup>, Ph 4<sup>3</sup>). (e) Still, as in the earthly life, the redeemed follow Him and He maintains the life which was begun through Him, by keeping them in fellowship with Himself and with God as the source of life (Rev 7<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>-4</sup>). As the vision unfolds, several startling paradoxes are thrown into the foreground. The Lamb bears the marks of a violent death at the hand of others, yet He is all-powerful (5<sup>b</sup>). He gave Himself in the surrender of a perfect love for the sake of sinners, yet He is moved by fierce wrath against evil-doers (6<sup>16</sup>). The Lamb becomes the great Shepherd of the sheep, whom He guides and they follow Him (7<sup>17</sup>). Hostile forces shall make war against the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them (17<sup>14</sup>). In the final chapters, the scene shifts and still more striking symbolism appears. The Lamb is pictured as the central figure in a marriage feast—the Bridegroom whose bride is the New Jerusalem (19<sup>7-9</sup> 21<sup>9</sup>), hidden with God until the fullness of time. Again the scene changes to the New Jerusalem, whose foundations are the twelve apostles of the Lamb (21<sup>14</sup>), whose temple is the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb (v.-2), and whose lamp is the Lamb (v. 23).

In closing we may summarize the significance of 'Lamb' in the Apocalypse. The meaning of the person and work of Christ is disclosed in sacrifice. The secret of His nearness to God, of His personal victory and power over others, and the common spirit by which His activity on earth is bound to that in heaven, is found in love. And still further, central in the throne of God, the law of the moral order of the world, the power which moves history to its goal, the all-pervading spirit of the angelic hosts, the principle in which the paradoxes of life are resolved, the magnet which draws heaven down to earth and domiciles it with men, and the light in which all social good is revealed and glorified is sacrificial love.

LAMP, LAMPSTAND.—Recent excavation in Palestine has greatly increased our knowledge of the types of lamps in use during the various epochs of antiquity. The recently published Memoir, The Excavation of Gezer (R. A. S. Macalister, 3 vols., 1912), has multiplied examples, and, together with Excavations in Palestine during 1898-1900 (F. J. Bliss and R. A. S. Macalister, 1902), allows us to trace the development very fully. We may now classify the lamps of the Apostolic Age under the head of 'closed' lamps, with divisions according to shape and ornamentation. It is likely that the most interesting forms lie outside our period (i.e. after A.D. 100)—those that bear Christian inscriptions, and others that show the conventional 'candlestick' pattern. Allowance must be made for the older 'open' type, which here and there persisted. It must also be remembered that Greek influence had to a large extent modified the national types. Roman forms are forthcoming, but they are rare. These remarks apply to lamps of the ordinary material, i.e. clay. Bronze lamps play little part in Palestine, and even terra-cotta forms are uncommon. All forms agree in certain general features, viz. the receptacle for oil, and the orifice for the wick. But there are many peculiarities in regard to shape, the mode of base and of handle, the number of wick-holes, the size of the reservoir opening, the presence of a slit for raising the wick, etc. In the type that retains the old saucer form, account must be taken of the number of points—one, four, and even seven ('multiple radiating' lamps)—which implies a corresponding number of wicks. The lamp is for the most part dissociated from its stand. Lampstands, for table and for floor, and candelabra, with ground base, as appearing in classical illustrations pertaining to the 1st cent. A.D., are highly ornate. It cannot be said that Palestine has produced many examples of these, although they were in use, fashioned from materials of wood, stone, and metal. Hanging lamps were also known, as can be judged by the form of the handles. For outdoor purposes the more primitive torch was used, consisting of a handle surmounted by a saucer-shaped protective disc, and having a receptacle for a bundle of wicks. These were saturated with oil, supplied from a separate vessel. The oil used was chiefly olive.

When we examine the biblical literature of the Apostolic Age we find that the essential words under this head are λύχνος, λυχνία, λαμπάς, 'lamp,' 'lampstand,' and 'torch,' according to the above description. In spite of our increased knowledge regarding specific forms, we cannot add much towards elucidation of the passages about to be enumerated. The 'lights' of Ac 16<sup>29</sup> (RV) (φῶτα, neut. plur.—not 'a light' as in the AV) cannot well be defined. The λαμπάδες (Ac 20<sup>8</sup>) in the upper chamber might as reasonably be lamps as torches, notwithstanding the term employed (on the reading ὑπολαμπάδες [D] see H. Smith in Expt xvi. [1904-05] 478, and J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan in Expositor, iv. [1912] 566). In Rev 4<sup>5</sup> the same word is translated in the RV 'lamps,' and in 8<sup>10</sup> 'torch,' which shows the perplexity attaching. R. C. Trench (NT Synonyms<sup>3</sup>, 1876, p. 159) is of opinion that the invariable rendering in the NT should be 'torches,' Mt 25<sup>1</sup> being no exception. The point need not be pressed.

Although candle has been dropped, candlestick (ἡ λυχνία—with one exception plur.) has been retained, and 'lampstand' placed in the margin (Rev 1<sup>12</sup> 13. 20 21. 5 11<sup>4</sup>). He 9<sup>2</sup> stands apart from this, 'candlestick' alone being employed. The reference in this case is to the furniture of the tabernacle (for a description of the Golden Candlestick [Lampstand] see HDB iv. 663f.). The remaining instances quoted, all in Rev., also hark back to OT parallels (Ex 25<sup>37</sup> 37<sup>23</sup>, Zec 4<sup>2</sup>). There is, however, difference amid similarity. By the necessity of the case, since there are seven churches (Rev 1<sup>4</sup> etc.), the lampstands are single and number seven, instead of being one shaft, divided into seven branches. The parallel to Zec 4<sup>2</sup> does not extend to the number of the lampstands (two in Rev 11<sup>4</sup>, one in Zec.), although the number of the olive trees is the same. This point is elaborated in HDB iv. 255.

In conclusion, reference may be made to the representation of the seven-branched lampstand on the Arch of Titus, often reproduced, which is probably a copy of the original (EBi, art. 'Candlestick'); to contemporary Roman practice in lighting (see H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, 1907, p. 240); and to the abundant materials for studying the development of the lamp within Christian times provided by H. Leclercq, Manuel d'archéologie chrétienne, 1907, ii. 509 ff., 556 ff.

LAODICEA (Σ has Λαοδικία everywhere. B has this form of the word in Col 2<sup>1</sup>, Rev 1<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, but Λαοδικεία in Col 4<sup>13</sup> 15. 16 [the latter is the form used by almost all Gr. authors]; Lat. Laodicea [incorrectly Laodicia]).—Laodicea was an important seat of commerce in the Roman province of Asia, one of three cities in the Lycus valley which were evangelized about the same time. It was 11 miles W. of Colossæ and 6 miles S. of Hierapolis. Founded probably by the Seleucid king Antiochus II. (261-246 B.C.), and named after his wife Laodice, it was known as 'Laodicea on the Lycus' (Λαοδικία ἡ πρὸς [ὁ ἐπὶ] τῷ Λυκῷ, Laodicea ad Lycum). Being some distance east of 'the Gate of Phrygia,' it is classed by Polybius (v. 57) and Strabo (XII. viii. 13) among Phrygian cities, while Ptolemy sets it down as Carian. It stood on a small plateau about 2 miles S. of the Lycus, and had behind it to the S. and S.W. the snow-capped mountains Salbakos and Kadmos, each over 8,000 ft. above sea-level. Designed, like the other Seleucid foundations in Asia Minor, to be at once a strong garrison city and a centre of Hellenic civilization, it occupied a strategic position on the great eastern trade-route, where the narrow Lycus gorge opens into the broad Mæander plain. 'Formerly a small town' (Strabo, XII. viii. 16), its prosperity dated from the peaceful time which followed the Roman occupation (133 B.C.).

'The country around Laodicea breeds excellent sheep, remarkable not only for the softness of their wool, in which they surpass the Milesian sheep, but for their dark or raven colour. The Laodiceans derive a large revenue from them, as the Colosseni do from their flocks, of a colour of the same name' (Strabo, XII. viii. 16).

The native religion of the district was the cult of Carian Men, whom the Hellenists of Laodicea identified with Zeus. His temple was at Attuda, 13 miles W. from Laodicea. In connexion with it, but probably in Laodicea itself, was 'a large Herophilian school of medicine under the direction of Zeuxis, and afterwards of Alexander Philaethes' (Strabo, XII. viii. 20). The physicians of Laodicea were skilful oculists, and a preparation for weak eyes, called 'Phrygian powder' (τέφρα φρυγία), was well known. Nearly the whole basin of the Mæander was subject to earthquakes (ib. 17). Imperial funds were usually given for the restoration of cities thus injured, and Laodicea accepted a grant from Tiberius after such a calamity, but of a later visitation Tacitus writes: 'The same year [A.D. 60] Laodicea, one of the most famous cities of Asia, having been prostrate by an earthquake, recovered herself by her own resources (propriis opibus revaluit), and without any relief from us' (Ann. XIV. xxvii.). She had long been rich and increased in goods, and had need of nothing (Rev 3<sup>17</sup>). More than a century before (in 51 B.C.), Cicero proposed to cash his treasury Bills of Exchange at a Laodicean bank (Ep. ad Fam. iii. 5).

Such a thriving commercial centre had great attractions for a colony of Jews. If the first settlers were sent thither by the founder of the city, or by Antiochus the Great, who is said to have planted 2,000 Jewish families in Phrygia and Lydia (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4), they would enjoy equal rights of citizenship with the Greeks. When Flaccus, Roman governor of Asia (62 B.C.), forbade the Jews to send contributions of money to Jerusalem, he seized as contraband twenty pounds weight in gold in the district of which Laodicea was the capital (Cicero, pro Flacco, 28). Calculated at the rate of a half-shekel for each man, this sum represents a Jewish population of more than 11,000 adult freemen, women and children being exempted. Josephus preserves a letter from 'the magistrates of the Laodiceans to Caius Rubilius' (c. 48 B.C.), guaranteeing religious liberty to the Jews of the city (Ant. XIV. x. 20).

The details of the founding of the Church of Laodicea have to be pieced together from allusions in the Acts and Epistles. St. Paul was not directly the founder. His words in Col 2<sup>1</sup>, 'I strive for ... them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh,' imply that he had not personally laboured in the Lycus valley. In his third missionary tour he did not go to Ephesus by the ordinary route of commerce, which would have brought him to the Lycus cities, but passed through 'the upper country' (τὰ ἀνωτερικά μέρη, Ac 19<sup>1</sup>), probably by Seiblia and the Cayster valley. His influence in the former region was indirect. During his three years' residence in Ephesus 'all they who dwell in Asia heard the word' (19<sup>10</sup>). The truths which he proclaimed in the metropolis were quickly repeated all over the province, and especially in the cities along the great roads. His evangelist of the Lycus glen was Epaphras, whom St. Paul regarded as his deputy (Col 1<sup>7</sup> [RV], reading ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν instead of ὑμῶν), and whose labour on behalf of the three communities evoked a warm encomium (Col 4<sup>1-13</sup>). The close relations subsisting between the churches of Laodicea and Colossæ are indicated by the injunction that the Epistle to Colossians should be read in the Church of the Laodiceans, and that the Colossians should read 'the Epistle from Laodicea.' The latter was perhaps the canonical 'Epistle to the Ephesians,' which Marcion expressly names the Epistle 'to the saints who are at Laodicea.'

The last of the Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia is addressed to Laodicea (Rev 3<sup>14-17</sup>). The severity of the prophet's rebuke has made 'Laodicean' for ever suggestive of lukewarmness in religion. Once fervent, Laodicea became so tepid that her condition excited a feeling of moral nausea. Each of the Seven Epistles is of course concerned with a Christian church rather than with a city, but the Christians were citizens, and the spirit of the city could not be kept out of the church. The allusions to the circumstances and character of Laodicea are unmistakable. The famous commercial and banking city, too proud to accept an Empire's aid, is invited to come to the poor man's market and buy from the Sender of the letter (παρ' ἐμοῦ is emphatic) gold refined by fire (vv. 17, 18). She who has innumerable flocks on her Phrygian hills, and whose fine black woollen fabrics are prized everywhere, has need of white garments to cover her own moral nakedness (v. 18). Her Æsculapian school of medicine has no Phrygian powder for the healing of her spiritual blindness, which requires the eye-salve (collyrium) of another Physician (v. 18). Rich Laodicea, well-clothed and well-fed, self-reliant and self-satisfied, is in danger of being rejected with loathing. Yet her absent Lord loves her, and writes her so incisively only because He hopes to find her chastened and penitent when He returns and knocks at her door (vv. 19, 20).

Little is known about the post-apostolic history of Laodicea. Traditions regarding Archippus, Nymphas (Col 4<sup>15</sup>), and Diotrephes (3 Jn 9) are worthless. The so-called 'Epistle to the Laodiceans' (in Latin) is a forgery. The subscription of 1 Tim., 'written from Laodicea, which is the chiefest city of Phrygia Pacatiana,' has no authority. The ruins of Laodicea are many but not impressive.

LAPIS LAZULI.—See SAPPHIRE.

the RV translates it so in all cases except Ro 13<sup>18</sup>, where the 'wantonness' of the AV is retained (cf. 2 P 2<sup>18</sup>). In 2 P 2<sup>7</sup> ἐν ἀσελγείᾳ is translated 'filthy conversation.'

2. Derivation.—The derivation of the word is unknown. The old derivation was from Selge, a city in Pisidia regarded by some as remarkably addicted to wantonness (Suidas, s.v.), and by others as noted for its sobriety (Etymologicon Magnum, s.v.; Strabo, xii.; Libanius, schol. in Dem. Orat.). In the first case the a- would be intensive, in the second privative. Moderns derive it from a + σέλγω (θέλγω) (see Trench, NT Synonyms<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 54, and T. K. Abbott, Ephesians and Colossians [ICC, 1897, p. 132]), or from ασ ('satiety') + ελγ, or from a + σαλαγ (σελας), in which case the primary meaning would be 'foul' (J. W. Donaldson, New Cratylus<sup>2</sup>, 1859, p. 692; Ellicott on Gal 5<sup>19</sup>).

3. Classical meaning.—The classical meaning of the word is excess of any kind—even inordinate size (see Donaldson, op. cit. p. 692), but particularly moral excess and outrage, contemptuous violence and insolence towards others. It has thus much the same range of meaning as ὕβρις. Trench brings out well the classical meaning of the word (op. cit. p. 54 ff.).

ἀσέλγεια or ἀκαθαρσία ('a man may be ἀκάθαρτος and hide his sin; he does not become ἀσέλγης until he shocks public decency' [J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians<sup>5</sup>, 1876, p. 210]) and πλεονεξία seem to be the two characteristic heathen vices.

Bengel (on Ro 12<sup>9</sup>), followed by Trench, maintains that psychologically man without God must seek satisfaction in either ἀσέλγεια (ἀκαθαρσία) or πλεονεξία, and ἀσέλγεια is associated in the NT with ἀσέβεια and seems to be characteristically a heathen sin (cf. Wis 14<sup>26</sup>, 3 Mac 2<sup>26</sup>). Abbott (op. cit. p. 133 f.) opposes this view of Bengel.

In Mk 7<sup>2-2</sup> and 1 P 4<sup>3</sup> it is possible to defend the classical sense of 'excesses.' 'Raphelius justly observes that if ἀσέλγεια were in this passage [Mk 7<sup>2</sup>] designed to denote lewdness or lasciviousness it would have been added to μοιχεύει and πορνείαι, vices of a like kind, in the preceding verse. But as it is joined with δόλος—deceit—he interprets it in general—an injury of a more remarkable and enormous kind; and shows that Polybius has in several passages used the word in this sense; cf. also Wetstein' (J. Parkhurst, Greek Lexicon to the NT<sup>4</sup>, 1804).

Against this, however, see the convincing note of H. B. Swete (St. Mark-, 1902, p. 154): 'Here the reference is probably to the dissolute life of the Herodian court, and of the Greek cities of Galilee and the Decapolis; if δόλος characterized the Jew, his Greek neighbour was yet more terribly branded by ἀσέλγεια.' In 1 P 4<sup>3</sup> the word is definitely used as a general term of the 'will of the Gentiles,' and is evidently the licentiousness which accompanied heathen feasts and lawless idolatries, while in Jude and 2 Peter it is the typical sin of the cities of the plain, which the libertines, under the guise of a spurious freedom, followed, and into which they inveigled others. In their case the sin of πλεονεξία was associated with it. While a rigid asceticism sprang from a horror of this sin, sensuality defended itself by the principle that the body did not count for spiritual life.

We may, then, conclude that the prominent idea in ἀσέλγεια in the NT is flagrant, shameless sensuality. While this was reckoned one of the ἀδιάρμοστα among the heathen, it was branded as deadly and loathsome by Christianity. In the heathen world 'sexual vice was no longer counted vice. It was provided for by public law; it was incorporated into the worship of the gods. It was cultivated in every luxurious and monstrous excess. It was eating out the manhood of the Greek and Latin races. From the imperial Cæsar down to the horde of slaves, it seemed as though every class of society had abandoned itself to the horrid practices of lust' (G. G. Findlay, Ephesians [Expositor's Bible, 1892], 272).

LASEA (Λασαία, WH Λασέα).—Lasea was a city near Fair Havens, on the southern coast of Crete (Ac 27<sup>9</sup>). It is not elsewhere mentioned by any ancient geographical or other writer, but as it was one of the smaller of the hundred cities of the island—'centum nobilem Cretam urbibus' (Hor. Ep. ix. 29)—this need cause no surprise. The conjecture of Captain Spratt in 1853 as to its site was confirmed by G. Brown, who examined the ruins in 1856. He found the beach buried under masses of masonry, and higher up discovered the ruins of two temples. 'Many shafts, and a few capitals of Grecian pillars, all of marble, lie scattered about. . . . Some peasants came down to see us from the hills above, and I asked them the name of the place. They said at once, "Lasea," so there could be no doubt' (J. Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul<sup>4</sup>, 1880, p. 268 f.).

The city was about 5 miles east from Fair Havens, and 1 mile east from Cape Leonda, which was so named from its resemblance to a lion couchant. As St. Paul's ship remained for 'much time' (καλον χρόνον) in the Havens, Lasea was perhaps frequently visited by the Apostle. It is quite possible that the evangelization of Crete, in which Titus afterwards laboured, was begun at that time.

LAYER.—'Laver' is the translation of λουτρόν in Eph 5<sup>6</sup> RVm, where the text has 'washing.' The same Greek word occurs in Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, where the RVm again gives 'laver.' This rendering is at least doubtful. In the LXX בִּיר, 'a laver,' is always rendered by λουτήρα, while λουτρόν is used for הֶחָרָץ, 'washing,' in Ca 4<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>6</sup>, Sir 31<sup>30</sup>. The phrase διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας, therefore, probably means 'through a washing, or bathing, of regeneration,' rather than 'through a laver, or font.' For patristic references confirming the translation 'washing,' see J. A. Robinson's Ephesians, 1903, p. 206.

JAMES STRAHAN.

LAW.—1. Introductory.—The subject of the Law formed one of the main problems, if not indeed the main problem, of the Apostolic Church, inasmuch as it involved the fundamental relation of primitive Christianity to Judaism on the one hand and heathenism on the other. Later Judaism, on its Pharisaic side, had carried legalism to extremes, and thus accentuated the separation between Israel and the Gentiles. The primitive Christian community, on the other hand, had been taught by its Founder to rank the freedom of Divine grace higher than human merit (cf. e.g. Mt 9<sup>9-13</sup> ||s and, generally, the attitude of Jesus to publicans and sinners), and to regard faith as of more importance than the distinction between Jew and Gentile (cf. Mt 8<sup>5-13</sup> ||s, 15<sup>1-8</sup> ||). In the evangelical record, moreover, the early Church had preserved the recollection of its Lord's outspoken utterances regarding the merely relative validity of the Jewish ceremonial Law (e.g. of the Sabbath, Mt 12<sup>1-14</sup> ||s; of cleanness, Mt 15<sup>10-20</sup> ||s)—or, at all events, of the interpretations recognized in the Synagogue ('the traditions of the elders,' Mt 15<sup>2-9</sup> ||). Still, the same record showed that in principle the attitude of Jesus to the Law as a whole was an avowedly conservative one (Mt 5<sup>17-19</sup>, Lk 16<sup>17</sup>), even as He had lived His life within the confines of the Law (cf. Gal 4<sup>4</sup>: γενομενος ὑπὸ νόμον); His supreme aim, indeed, was to bring out with full clearness and force the will of God made known in the Law. We thus see that, with regard to the Law, the evangelical tradition seemed capable of a double construction, or, at least, that it did not supply the means for deciding a question that soon became urgent. It is therefore easy to understand why the early Christian community in Jerusalem assumed at first a rigidly conservative attitude towards the Law, and regarded the faithful observance of it as praiseworthy (Ac 21<sup>20</sup>; cf. 2<sup>46</sup> 3<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>, 14 22<sup>12</sup>). St. Peter, e.g., required a special revelation before he would enter the house of the uncircumcised Cornelius and admit the first Gentile convert into the Church by baptism (10<sup>1-48</sup>)—a step which did not fail to arouse opposition on the part of those who 'were of the circumcision' (cf. 11<sup>1-18</sup>).

2. The view of St. James.—The principal representative of this zeal for the Law in the infant Church was St. James, the brother of the Lord, who, according to Acts, as also to the Pauline Epistles, occupied a leading position therein (Ac 15<sup>13-21</sup> 21<sup>18-26</sup>, Gal 2<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1<sup>19</sup>). St. James, by reason of his righteous life, is said to have been esteemed scarcely less highly by non-Christians than by believers (Hegesippus, in Eus. HE ii. 23). His great concern was to smooth the way by which Israel might come to Jesus Christ, and to put no stumbling-block before his people. From this point of view his attitude to the question concerning the Gentile Christians discussed at the Apostolic Council becomes readily intelligible. Here he shows himself to be a genuine disciple of Jesus in recognizing, after the example of Peter, the supremacy of grace, and in refusing to put the yoke of the Law upon the Gentile Christians, whom rather he receives as brethren, while he acknowledges St. Paul as the Apostle of the Circumcision (Ac 15<sup>13-21</sup>; cf. v. 11, Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). He thus came into direct conflict with the Pharisaic group of Jewish Christians—those who asserted that the salvation of the Gentiles depended upon their being circumcised and their acceptance of the Law (Ac 15<sup>1-5</sup>, Gal 2<sup>1-5</sup>). It was probably only for the sake of brotherly intercourse between circumcised and uncircumcised Christians that James proposed the restrictions to Gentile Christian liberty which were laid down in the so-called Apostolic Decree (Ac 15<sup>20f.</sup> 28f.). The reason given for the proposal (v. 1: 'For Moses from generations of old hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every sabbath') probably means simply that the four prohibitions in question—which formed the kernel of the so-called Noachian commandments, and correspond to the laws for proselytes—had come to be so impressed upon the minds of the Jews that they could not countenance any disobedience to them if their intercourse with their Gentile brethren in the Church was to be unconstrained. In formulating the injunctions of the Apostolic Decree St. James was in reality only following the practice of the Synagogue with regard to proselytes of the narrower class ('the God-fearing,' οἱ φοβούμενοι [or σεβόμενοι] τὸν θεόν), just as that practice no doubt had already prepared the way in the Christian mission to the Gentiles; for the fact that St. Paul makes no mention of the Apostolic Decree in Gal 2<sup>9c</sup> probably signifies that he had observed its provisions on his own initiative (so, in substance, A. Ritschl, B. Weiss, H. H. Wendt, etc.; cf., further, art. MOSES). But the question regarding the Gentiles was in no sense solved, as soon appeared in what occurred at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>11-14</sup>). If, for the sake of Christian fellowship, St. Peter had in that city ignored the Jewish regulations about food, and had eaten in the company of Gentile Christians, this did not coincide with the views of those who 'came from James.' These men took offence at St. Peter's practice—just as the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem had resented his action at Caesarea (Ac 10; cf. 11<sup>2c</sup>)—manifestly assuming that Jewish Christians, as the circumcised, were under an absolute obligation to the Mosaic Law, and that they ought not, even for the sake of Christian fellowship, to make any concession whatever to the liberty of the converted heathen. If concessions were to be made at all, they must come from the Gentile, not the Jewish, side. Whether this point of view is to be traced directly to St. James himself, or rather merely coincided with his position, is a much-debated question. It is probable, however, that in his view of the matter his concern for Israel bulked more largely than his regard for the Gentiles, and that accordingly he would have preferred to surrender the possibility of perfect Christian communion between Jewish and Gentile Christians rather than grant the former a dispensation from their regulations regarding food. Perhaps we may, with B. Weiss, see a suggestion of this point of view in what St. James says in Ac 15<sup>14</sup> regarding the mission to the Gentiles, viz. that God had taken out of them a people for His name—i.e. a new people of God, in addition to the old.

To this type of Jewish Christianity corresponds generally the religious standpoint of the Epistle which is ascribed to St. James. The letter shows so little of a distinctively Christian character, that Spitta has in all seriousness hazarded the theory of its being in reality a Jewish work in which the name of Jesus has been inserted here and there. As a matter of fact, however, the writer shows clearly that he is a Christian, not merely in his reference to Jesus Christ in his address (1<sup>1</sup>; cf. 2<sup>1</sup>), but also in his giving expression to specifically Christian ideas, as e.g. when he speaks of the regeneration of his readers by the word of truth (1<sup>18</sup>) and of the saving word as implanted in their hearts (1<sup>21</sup>). He betrays his Jewish Christian mode of thought, however, when, in enjoining his readers to be doers, and not merely hearers, of the word (1<sup>22</sup>), he presently replaces 'word' by 'law,' although 'the perfect law of liberty' means the law as given to, or as fulfilled in, human freedom. He thus shows that for him the central element in Christianity consists in fulfilment of the Law (cf. 1-2-25 with 2<sup>12</sup>). It is true that St. James's conception of the substance of the Law likewise shows the influence of Jesus, as he ranks the law of love to one's neighbour above the others (2<sup>8</sup>), and, generally, urges the pre-eminence of the commandments enjoining love and mercy (2-13. 15f. 126f. 4<sup>11</sup>, etc.), just as he specially denounces such sins as judging one's neighbour (cf. Mt 7<sup>1</sup>) and swearing (cf. Mt 5<sup>34-37</sup>), and condemns hatred as murder (Ja 4<sup>2</sup>). His commendation of the practice of mercy and of keeping oneself unspotted from the world as the true worship of God (1-6) is also wholly in the spirit of Jesus (cf. e.g. Mt 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>), while he is silent regarding all outward service and ceremony. It is quite unnecessary to follow modern criticism in regarding this spiritual and ethical conception of the Law as pointing to a post-apostolic date of composition, any more than the attack upon the doctrine of justification through faith alone (2<sup>14-26</sup>) need be regarded as post-Pauline. St. James's view of the Law, in fact, coincides on the whole with the view urged by Jesus: in substance the new Law does not differ from that of the OT, and in 2<sup>9-12</sup> he finds his examples in the latter (the Decalogue and Dt 1<sup>7</sup>); while there is no difficulty in seeing why he never makes the slightest reference to the ceremonial Law—for readers such as his it was quite unnecessary to insist upon that side of the old religion, nor, for that matter, did Jesus Himself lay any emphasis upon it. Further, if the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians who had not as yet broken off relations with the Synagogue (cf. e.g. 2<sup>18</sup>), it may be confidently assumed that they were not neglectful of the ceremonial Law. What they required rather was to be reminded of the ethical aspect of the Law, and above all, to be warned against the common Jewish delusion that hearing and speaking the word could take the place of doing it. In 2<sup>14</sup> the reference is not to 'the works of the Law,' but solely to works in the ethical sense. Moreover, as the theologians of the Synagogue had already turned their minds to the passage Gn 15<sup>6</sup> (cf. A. Schlatter, Der Glaube im NT<sup>2</sup>, Calw and Stuttgart, 1896, pp. 29 ff. 45 ff.), the antithesis of faith and works, and the contrast between a justification by faith and a justification by works, may quite well have been formulated in an age prior to St. Paul.

3. The view of St. Peter.—Besides St. James, the most outstanding representative of the Jewish Christian position in the primitive Church was St. Peter. But just as, according to Ac 10, he had been led by a Divine revelation to enter the house of an uncircumcised man, and to eat with the Gentiles (cf. 11<sup>3</sup>), we may infer also, from his speech in the Apostolic Council, and especially from his behaviour in the Gentile Christian community at Antioch, that he had a much clearer view than St. James of the merely relative obligation of the Law even for Jewish Christians. In certain circumstances he thought himself justified, for the sake of brotherly intercourse with Gentile Christians, in disregarding the rigour of the Law, since, after all, salvation did not depend upon the Law, whose yoke, indeed, neither the fathers nor the Jews then living were able to bear, but Jew and Gentile alike could look for salvation only to the grace of Jesus Christ, and to faith in Him (cf. Ac 15<sup>7-11</sup>, Gal 2<sup>12a</sup>). Hence St. Paul takes for granted that the subsequent vacillation of St. Peter at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>12b</sup>) was nothing but dissimulation, as it was due, not to any change of conviction, but simply to fear of the Jews. In principle St. Peter recognized the religious freedom of the Jewish Christians, not merely as regards the more general intercourse with their Gentile brethren sanctioned by the Apostolic Decree, but also as regards the closer intimacy involved in eating with them (cf. the Agapæ). In other words, he had, according to St. Paul, actually acknowledged that the Jewish Christians had the right to accommodate themselves to the freedom of the Gentiles. Only we must bear in mind that St. Peter was, in a much greater degree than St. Paul, a man of moods, and was therefore not always so consistent in his thinking.

It is remarkable that the two Epistles bearing the name of Peter do not refer to the Law. The Second Epistle obviously dates from a time when the question regarding the Law had given place to other controversies, and, at all events, it is concerned with a libertinism and a doctrine that lie beyond the purview of Jewish legalism. It is a striking fact that even the First Epistle, the authenticity of which is open to no decisive objection, does not so much as mention the Law, but speaks from a quite unstudied and non-legalistic point of view. As the writer implies that, e.g., the OT conception of the priesthood was first properly realized in the NT Church, and describes the latter as the true Temple of God (2<sup>56f.</sup>), it would seem that the OT legal system as a whole had for him only a typological value. This would certainly be strange if the Epistle was written, as B. Weiss and Kühl suppose, to Jewish Christians, i.e. prior to the time of St. Paul, but is quite intelligible if it was addressed to Gentile Christian, Pauline communities, and written under the influence of Pauline Epistles, as Romans and Ephesians—a hypothesis to which, in view of the editorial collaboration of Silvanus, the follower of St. Paul, no exception can be taken.

4. The view of St. Paul.—In point of fact, the first to decide the question of the Law upon grounds of principle was the Apostle Paul himself, though others had already pointed the way. In conformity with what has been said of St. Peter's views, it is perfectly credible that, as related in Acts, St. Peter was the first to baptize a heathen, and that he should make reference thereto in his address to the Apostolic Council (Ac 15<sup>7-9</sup>). Here, however, the most outstanding name is that of the martyr St. Stephen, who anticipated St. Peter in divining the essentially non-legalistic character of the gospel. St. Stephen, as a Hellenist, could of course more easily than St. Peter discern the merely relative validity of the Jewish legal system, and especially of the Temple ritual; and although his adversaries, in charging him with having in his preaching attacked the Holy Place and the Law, were undoubtedly doing him an injustice, yet the accusation was not altogether unfounded. His trenchant speech (Ac 7) not only attacks the Jews for their persistent rejection of the Prophets, but also pointedly criticizes their over-estimation of the Temple: 'the Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands' (7<sup>47-50</sup>). His general plea is that Divine revelation is independent of any particular holy place, and he honours Moses less as the Law-giver than as the prototype of Jesus, and as the one who foretold His coming (cf. 7<sup>35ff.</sup>). The very Law to which the Jews appealed they had not kept (v. 53).

It was no mere accident that in particular the personality and preaching of St. Stephen should have wrought powerfully on the young Pharisee Saul (7<sup>58</sup>). Saul probably belonged to the Cilician synagogue, whose members had disputed with St. Stephen, and in any case the latter's great vindictory speech must have still further opened the eyes of the zealous Pharisee to the inherently non-legal nature of the gospel, and rekindled his persecuting zeal against the followers of Jesus (cf. 6<sup>9f.</sup>).

Even before his conversion Saul must have been sensible of the great alternative which he sets forth in Gal 2<sup>15-21</sup>: either righteousness is through the Law, and Christ died for nought; or else the Crucified Jesus is truly the Christ, and righteousness is to be attained through faith alone. It need, therefore, occasion no surprise that in his conversion Saul had become convinced of the universality of Christianity, or that thereafter he maintained that the Law was not in a religious sense binding upon either Gentile or Jewish Christians (Gal 1. 2).

According to Gal 1<sup>15f.</sup> St. Paul saw at once that he was called to be a missionary among the heathen, and he seems to have laboured as such for a time without any interference whatever—a circumstance which will hardly seem strange when we remember that certain Hellenists who had been driven out in consequence of the persecution connected with Stephen had preached the gospel in Antioch even to the Gentiles, and that the numerous converts whom they had won from heathendom were recognized as brethren by the community in Jerusalem (Ac 11<sup>10-24</sup>). Nor does the Apostle make the slightest reference to the question of the Law in his earliest Epistles, 1 and 2 Thessalonians. It was in reality the aggression of certain Christian Pharisees—Judaizers (Ac 15<sup>5</sup>, Gal 2<sup>4</sup>)—that forced him into a thorough-going discussion of the significance of the Law, and this is his special theme in his Epistles to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans. In seeking to delineate here the Pauline doctrine of the Law, however, we must also draw upon the Epistles of the Imprisonment and the Pastorals.

(a) His use of the term 'Law.'—In discussing the Pauline conception of the Law, we note that the Apostle uses the term νόμος in somewhat different senses. It may mean the whole Pentateuch—the Torah in the wider sense—as in Ro 3<sup>1</sup> (the Law and the Prophets), Gal 4<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>34</sup>, and even the entire OT, which might be thus designated a parte potiori, as in Ro 3<sup>19</sup> (the Psalms also included under the term), 1 Co 14<sup>1</sup> (Is 28<sup>11f.</sup>). As a rule, however, νόμος is applied by St. Paul to the Law delivered by Moses, as recorded in the Mosaic Books from Exodus to Deuteronomy (cf. Ro 5<sup>13</sup>, 14: ἄχρι νόμου = μέχρι Μωσέως, Gal 3<sup>17</sup>: the Law given 430 years after the promise). Further, St. Paul sometimes uses the term with, sometimes without, the definite article, and the distinction must not be ignored. It is true that νόμος, even without the article, may mean the historically-given Law of Moses, the possession of which was the special prerogative of the Jews as distinguished from the Gentiles (Ro 2<sup>12-14</sup> 3<sup>20f.</sup> 5<sup>13f.</sup> 20). The omission of the article, however, generally points rather to 'law' as a principle; thus what is so said of 'law' would hold good of any other positive ordinance of God—if such existed at all (cf. Ro 2<sup>13-15</sup>: 'For not the hearers of law are just before God, but the doers of law shall be justified; for when Gentiles who have not law do by nature the things of the law, these having no law are law to themselves,' etc., and 5<sup>13</sup>: 'For prior to law sin was already in the world, but sin is not imputed when there is no law'). In both of these passages it is obvious that νόμος and ὁ νόμος equally refer to the Mosaic Law, but it is no less obvious that they assert principles, not merely historical facts; cf. also Gal 5<sup>18</sup>, 23, 1 Ti 1<sup>8f.</sup> ('The law is good, if a man use it lawfully, knowing that law is not made for a righteous man'). On the other hand, when St. Paul wishes to make a historical statement regarding the Law of Moses, he uses the phrase ὁ νόμος. The extent to which he can abstract from the concrete historical sense of νόμος, however, is seen in the fact that he occasionally uses νόμος, virtually as a purely formal concept, as equivalent to norma, 'rule': Ro 3<sup>7</sup> (the law of faith, i.e. the Divine ordinance which enjoins faith, not works; cf. 1<sup>5</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>6</sup>), 7<sup>3</sup> (the law of sin), 8<sup>2</sup> (the law of life=natural law), Gal 6-; cf. 1 Co 14<sup>21</sup> (the law of Christ).

As regards the proper signification of the term, however, the Law may be defined as the positive revelation of the Divine ordinance to the Israelites, who therein, as in the covenants, the promises, and the Temple service (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>), had a sacred privilege unshared by other peoples (cf. 2<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>19</sup>). The law of God, which in the heathen was but an inward and therefore vague surmise, was for the Jews formulated objectively and unmistakably in the written Law (Ro 2<sup>17-20</sup>; cf. 2 Co 3<sup>7</sup>), and the Jews, even if they broke that Law (Ro 2<sup>13f.</sup>), could yet boast of a moral advantage over the heathen (Gal 2<sup>15</sup>).

The Law, however, is a revelation not only of the Divine requirements, but also of the Divine promises and threats attached thereto. The Law, in short, contains a judicial system, in that it determines the relation between man and God by man's obedience to, or transgression of, the Divine commandments. If man keeps the whole Law, he is rewarded with 'life' (Gal 3<sup>12</sup>=Lv 18<sup>5</sup>), and this is bestowed not of grace, but of debt (Ro 4<sup>1</sup>: κατὰ ὀφειλὴν); while if he does not keep the Law in its entirety, he is accursed (Gal 3<sup>10</sup>=Dt 27<sup>-6</sup>), and passes into the power of death (Ro 6<sup>-3</sup> 7<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>).

The Law demands, not faith, but works (Gal 3<sup>12</sup>), and hence St. Paul speaks repeatedly of the 'works of the law' (ἔργα νομῶν, 'works prescribed by the law'; cf. Ro 3<sup>-0</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). By 'works of the law,' however, he means, not simply the externally legal actions in which the heart is not implicated, but no less the morally irreproachable fulfilment of the commandments, which claim the obedience of the soul as well as of the body, and forbid sinful desire as well as sinful action—just as, indeed, the requirement of the whole Law is summed up in the commandments of love (Ro 13<sup>9</sup>, Gal 5<sup>14</sup>). It is no doubt the case that for St. Paul outward rites and ceremonies are included in the characteristic ordinances of the Law (Gal 2<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>; cf. Ro 9<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>5</sup>). The Law as a whole consists of particular commandments of a statutory nature (τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασι, Eph 2<sup>15</sup>; cf. Col 2<sup>14</sup>).* In Gal. it is especially the ceremonial or ritual ordinances of the Law that are referred to, as St. Paul is here dealing mainly with the question of circumcision (cf. 2<sup>1</sup>-ff. 4<sup>3-10</sup> 5<sup>-ff.</sup>, also Col 2<sup>13</sup>. 20-22). In Rom., on the other hand, he is treating rather of the moral requirements of the Law (cf. 2<sup>1</sup>-<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>7-8</sup>). Nevertheless, we must not ascribe the conscious differentiation between moral law and the ceremonial Law to the Apostle himself. For him the Law is an indivisible whole (Gal 3<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>), though he certainly recognizes gradations of value in its commands (e.g. the commandment of love), and finds its kernel in the Decalogue (cf. Ro 13<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>3-7</sup>: the Law engraven in letters on tables of stone). All the Law is Divine. While it might seem as if in Gal. St. Paul designedly avoids speaking of the Law as the Law of God (cf. 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>19-21</sup>), but rather sets it, as the 'mere rudiments of the world' (4<sup>3.9</sup>; cf. Col 2<sup>8-10</sup>), on a level with the heathen stage of religion, the absence of any such design is shown by the fact that even in the same Epistle he exhorts his readers to fulfil the Law by love (5<sup>13</sup>), and thus asserts its holiness, while elsewhere (e.g. Ro 7<sup>-14</sup> 16. 22) he insists upon its Divine and spiritual character.

(b) His view of the function of the Law.—The most characteristic feature of St. Paul's doctrine of the Law, however, is found in his statements regarding its function. Here, in fact, he develops a view directly opposed not only to his own earlier Jewish conception, but also to the thoughts of the natural man, viz. that the Law is not meant to mediate life to man, but is rather a medium of death. In the abstract, of course, he still recognizes that the Law was designed to be a real channel of righteousness and life (Ro 7<sup>10</sup>: 'the commandment which was unto life,' 10<sup>5</sup>, Gal 3<sup>12</sup>: 'he that doeth them shall live in them'). In the actual circumstances of life, however, the matter has quite a different bearing, for no human being has ever fulfilled, or ever can fulfil, the condition of perfect obedience to the Law. The Law is thus quite incapable of bringing life to man; nor, indeed, was it given by the all-foreseeing God with any such design. On the contrary, it has primarily a purely negative aim and effect, viz. to intensify the moral and spiritual misery of the unsaved man, so that the greatness of the Divine grace may be the more clearly displayed; and it is only upon this background that the Law has any positive significance at all.

This estimate of the Law, so obnoxious to the Judaistic mind, the Apostle made good by an appeal to experience as well as to Scripture and sacred history. His demonstration is given more especially in the Epistles to the Galatians and the Romans. In the latter he starts from experience, which shows that not only the heathen who live without the Law but even the people of the Law themselves are all held fast under the power of sin. The Jews glory in the Law with their lips, but, when their conscience is appealed to, they have to confess that their deeds are little better than those of the heathen (Ro 1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>24</sup>). Next he shows from Scripture, from the Torah, which speaks to the Jews in particular, that they, equally with all mankind, are guilty before God (3<sup>9-20</sup>; cf. Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). moreover, the OT plainly declares that by the works of the Law shall no flesh be justified (Ro 3<sup>-0</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>=Ps 143-; the words 'by the works of the law' were added by St. Paul himself, but are quite in accordance with the sense). Finally, on the lines of sacred history, he deduces the impossibility of justification by the works of the Law from the fact that God has now manifested a new species of righteousness apart from the Law, viz. the righteousness that is through faith in Jesus Christ, who has been set forth in His blood as a ἱλαστήριον (Ro 3<sup>21</sup>. 23), i.e. an expiation, or a propitiation (Luther: Gnadenstuhl, 'throne of grace'), and has rendered satisfaction to the Law (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>; cf. 4<sup>5</sup>). This new mode of righteousness, moreover, was fore-shown by the Law and the Prophets, as is argued in greater detail in Ro 4, where St. Paul discusses the grand precedent of Abraham; for Abraham, the father of God's people, was justified not by works but by faith, and while as yet uncircumcised, in order that he should be the father of all who have faith (4<sup>1-12</sup>). Besides the case of Abraham, St. Paul appeals specially to the prophetic utterance of Hab 2<sup>4</sup> (Ro 1<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>11</sup>: 'The just shall live by faith'). In Gal. likewise he attaches great importance to the pattern of Abraham. Here he represents the Law as a secondary institution in comparison with the Promise. In man the Promise presupposes faith only, and may be compared to a testament, which could not be invalidated by a positive decree such as the Law delivered 430 years later (Gal 3<sup>15-18</sup>). In the section of Rom. (9-11) which deals with the rejection of Israel, he returns again to the biblical arguments for the righteousness of faith, which excludes justification by the Law (10<sup>3-17</sup>). But the decisive proof of his contention that the Law is incapable of justifying sinners lies for St. Paul in the Death of Christ proclaimed in the gospel (Gal 2<sup>16-17</sup>; cf. Ro 3<sup>-16</sup>). It is his absolute conviction that, if righteousness could be secured by the Law, then Christ died for nought (v.<sup>-1</sup>; cf. Ro 10<sup>3</sup>-ff.). Nor is the synthesis of the two kinds of righteousness a possible conception. The Law is no more based upon faith (Gal 3<sup>-1</sup>) than the grace of Jesus Christ (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>) is based upon works (Ro 11<sup>6</sup>: 'if by grace, then no more of works; otherwise, grace is no more grace').

How does it come about, then, that the abstractly possible righteousness by the works of the Law (Ro 2<sup>13</sup>) is impossible in the sphere of actuality? Or, otherwise, why is man incapable of fulfilling the Law? The answer is given in the Apostle's idea of the carnal constitution of man, which is antagonistic to the spiritual character of the Law (7<sup>14</sup>). Man, by reason of his carnal nature, is sold into the servitude of sin, for the mind of the flesh is hostile to God, and cannot become subject to His (spiritual) Law. No doubt the Law of God includes commandments which, because of their external character, may quite well be obeyed by the 'flesh' (Gal 3<sup>9</sup>; cf. 4<sup>10</sup>), but its most distinctive requirement, the law of love, is repugnant to the flesh. For with St. Paul the term 'flesh' (σάρξ) is by no means restricted to the sensuous corporeal aspect of human nature—as if the principle of sin were rooted in man's physical constitution (cf. Gal 5<sup>12ff.</sup>); on the contrary, the flesh penetrates even to his inmost soul, so that we may speak also of a 'mind of the flesh' (Col 2<sup>18</sup>). The 'works of the flesh,' accordingly, embrace not only sins of sensuality, but also sins of the selfish will (Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>), and hence, in a passage immediately preceding this, St. Paul contrasts brotherly love with the misuse of liberty as an occasion to the flesh (5<sup>13ff.</sup>). Even in the regenerate man, the Christian, the flesh maintains its power so persistently (5<sup>16-17</sup>) that he cannot conquer sin by the Law, but can triumph over it only by the Spirit of God (Ro 7<sup>14-15</sup>).

If, however, the Law does not bring salvation to man, and was not designed to do so, what is its real function? The most comprehensive answer to this question is given in Ro 3<sup>20b</sup>: 'through the law comes the knowledge of sin.' The answer is defined more concretely in a number of kindred statements (cf. 4<sup>15</sup>, 5<sup>13f.</sup>, 7<sup>5</sup>, 10<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>, Gal 3<sup>19</sup>). The Law not only serves to make sin known as sin, and to condemn the sins of men, but it resolves ill-doing into aggravated sin, giving it the character of trespass against the commandments of God: 'where there is no law, neither is there transgression' (Ro 4<sup>15</sup>), 'and therefore sin is not imputed' (5<sup>13</sup>). But the actual operation of the Law in thus resolving sin into positive transgression and guilt must, according to the teleology of the Apostle, have been the Divine purpose of the Law (Gal 3<sup>19</sup>: τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν, 'in order to bring forth the conscious transgressions as such'; cf. Ro 5<sup>0</sup>: 'that the Fall might be increased'; 7<sup>13</sup>: 'that sin might be shown to be sin').

Thus the Law produces a qualitative intensification of sin: sin becomes guilt. The evil done by those who have not the Law is relatively blameless. But the Law, which invests sin with the character of guilt, evokes wrath, i.e. in God (Ro 4<sup>15</sup>). Sin, however, is not only qualitatively intensified, but also quantitatively increased, by the Law. For, according to Ro 7<sup>5-13</sup>, the Law tends to rouse the slumbering power of sin, which then breaks out in all kinds of appetites and passions. Just as an innocent youth, who has, say, listened to some explanation of sexual matters, may thus be wrought upon by sinful inclinations hitherto unfelt, so—the Apostle's idea would seem to have been something of this kind—the as yet relatively blameless man is brought under the influence of evil desires by the Law's very prohibition of such desires. This in no sense, however, proves that the Law is sinful, but simply shows the awful power of the sin that dwells in the flesh; for man's conscience, his better self, agrees with the Law, and cannot but attest its holiness (cf. 7<sup>5</sup>, 7-13, 16, 22). Here the Apostle is probably not thinking of an outward multiplication of sins; he rather assumes, indeed, that generally the Jews live on a higher moral level than the heathen (Gal 2<sup>15</sup>; cf. Ph 3<sup>6</sup>), and his idea is in all likelihood that of an inward development—in the shape of sins of thought.

The Law, in thus aggravating the power of sin both qualitatively and quantitatively, brings man into a state of deeper misery than he ever experienced while still without the Law; it works in him the apprehension of God's wrath and curse (Ro 4<sup>15</sup>, Gal 3<sup>10</sup>), and of death (Ro 7<sup>10</sup>, 24, 2 Co 3<sup>6-9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>), and yet at the same time the most profound yearning for salvation.

It is true that death, as a result of Adam's sin, reigned over mankind even before the Law (Ro 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>14</sup>). Even so, however, the individual could live in relative unconcern (Ro 5<sup>13</sup>, 7<sup>9</sup>); the Law written in his heart asserted itself but feebly. Accordingly, when God determined to institute salvation for the race of man, and chose a people as its depository, He began by giving to Abraham, the father of that people, simply the Promise, the condition of which was faith alone; subsequently, however, He added the Law, not indeed with the design of laying down a new condition co-ordinate with, or as a substitute for, faith, but rather, as it were, for the purpose of keeping His people in ward and custody, the Law acting as a stimulus to the power and guilt of sin in such wise as to exclude every hope except that of justification by faith in Christ as the medium of salvation (Gal 3<sup>8-5</sup>, Ro 4<sup>13ff.</sup>). Had Christ appeared without the previous intervention of the Law, the misery of man would not have been so great; but also the glory of Divine grace would have been less transcendent (Ro 5<sup>0ff.</sup>). In the historical outworking of redemption, therefore, the Law had merely a pedagogic function; it was our moral guardian (παιδαγωγός) until Christ came, so that we might be justified through faith, and through faith alone (Gal 3<sup>23-25</sup>).

(c) The abolition of the Law.—If the function of the Law was, as we have just seen, merely pedagogic, it must also have been but temporary. 'Now that faith [for its object, Jesus Christ] is come, we are no longer under a tutor' (Gal 3<sup>25</sup>; cf. 4<sup>1-7</sup>); 'Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness to every one that believeth' (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>). In Eph 2<sup>15</sup> St. Paul asserts that Christ has actually abolished the law of commandments contained in ordinances; and, objectively, the Law, as a statutory system, was abrogated when Christ made satisfaction to it by His Death, or, as the Apostle puts it, bore its curse (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>, 3<sup>13</sup>; cf. Col 2<sup>14</sup>). But this is not to be understood in the sense that from the time of Christ's Death every man, every Jew, is absolved from the Law; subjectively, the individual is freed from its dominion only when he becomes a Christian, and is united to Christ by faith and baptism, so as personally to appropriate His Death and Resurrection. Just as Christ Himself was released from the Law's domain only through His Death on the Cross, in order that, as the Risen One, He might thereafter live a new life in immediate union with God, so His followers are loosed from the Law only through their communion with their Crucified and Glorified Lord (Ro 7<sup>1-6</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19ff.</sup>). This is to be taken, first of all, in a legal sense: 'the law hath dominion over a man as long as he lives.' Just as, when a husband dies, a wife is loosed from the law which bound her to him, and may marry another, so, when Christ died, His community became exempt from the Law, and was free to yield itself to another, viz. the risen Christ (Ro 7<sup>1-4</sup>). Once the curse of the Law, which is death, has been carried out upon the transgressors of the Law, the Law can demand no more; we are then redeemed not only from its penalty, but also from its obligation (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, 4<sup>4ff.</sup>). It is true that many interpreters refer this exemption from obligation not to Christ's passive but to His active obedience to the Law—an interpretation that may be right in so far as His active obedience was the precondition of the propitiatory significance of His passive obedience. But, taken all in all, the Apostle's view is that we have been made free from the Law by Christ's Death (cf. also Gal 2<sup>19ff.</sup>, Col 2<sup>14-15</sup>, Eph 2<sup>15</sup>).

St. Paul, however, goes far beyond this purely juridical conception. He also represents our deliverance from the Law as a transaction ethically conditioned. From the mystical union with the Crucified and Risen Lord comes a power which transforms and re-creates our nature, and thus enables us of ourselves to fulfil the requirements of the Law (Ro 8<sup>26</sup>, Gal 5<sup>18</sup>; cf. v.<sup>3</sup>). The Apostle traces this power to the Spirit of God and of Christ: 'if ye are led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law' (Gal 5<sup>18</sup>); against such as bring forth the fruits of the Spirit the Law is not valid (v.<sup>23</sup>); the Law is not imposed upon a righteous man (1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>). Thus freedom from the Law is in no sense a merely legal freedom; it is an ethical freedom which is quite different from mere arbitrary choice, and implies that we fulfil the demands of the Law not through compulsion or fear, but in zeal and love (cf. Ro 8<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup>). Hence the Christian is not free in the sense of being his own master; on the contrary, he is subject to the Lord Jesus and God (Ro 14<sup>7-9</sup>), but serves Him from the dictates of the inmost heart, having yielded himself with consuming gratitude and love to the Saviour who died for him (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>).

(d) The Law abolished yet continuing in force.—St. Paul thus teaches that the Law is abolished, and that nevertheless it abides. It is abolished by Christ in the sense that it has no longer any validity for the Christian as a statutory system; justification is effected through faith alone, and without the works of the Law (Ro 3<sup>8</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). This holds both for Jews and for Gentiles (Ro 1<sup>16</sup>, 3<sup>11</sup>); here there is no difference between them. The place of the Law is now taken by Christ (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>). Everything turns upon our union with Him, and works are not to the purpose; in other words, all depends upon faith, which is simply the acceptance of the gospel, or of Christ, and the invocation of His name (Ro 10<sup>5-17</sup>). In particular, the ordinances which had hitherto obstructed religious intercourse between different peoples, as Israelites and Goyim, had all been done away in Christ (Eph 2<sup>11-22</sup>; cf. Gal 3<sup>28</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup>). In Him circumcision is nothing, and uncircumcision nothing (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>19</sup>). Hence St. Paul, a Jew, can become as a Gentile to the Gentiles (1 Co 9<sup>1</sup>), just as St. Peter and other Jewish Christians had done in Antioch (Gal 2<sup>12-14</sup>). In the religious sense, i.e. as regards salvation, the Jewish Christians too were now free from the Law.

On the other hand, however, the Apostle also affirms the permanence of the Law. The imperative of the Law remains valid not only because it still retains its juridical authority over non-believers, but also because it furnishes the ethical standard of the Christian life generally, and of the religious life of Jewish Christians in a special degree. Thus the idea of a 'tertius usus legis,' of which the Reformers spoke, corresponds exactly to the Pauline view. Not only does St. Paul regard the all-embracing requirement of the Law—the commandment of love—as a permanent expression of the Divine will (Ro 13<sup>8-10</sup>, Gal 5<sup>14</sup>), but he also borrows moral precepts and rules of discipline from the Mosaic legislation (see art. COMMANDMENT). He is confident, no doubt, that the Spirit supplies not only moral power but also moral insight (Gal 5<sup>16</sup>; cf. Ro 12-); but the Spirit does not operate only in the individual soul, but operates also, and mainly, through prophecy and through the written Law, which indeed is spiritual (Ro 7<sup>14</sup>), and must therefore be spiritually understood (cf. e.g. 1 Co 9<sup>3-10</sup>).

Here we undoubtedly light upon a difficulty in the Pauline view. On the one hand, the Apostle incisively challenges the Judaistic claim to impose the ordinances of the Law upon the Gentiles, while, on the other, he upholds the authority of the Law under the term 'Scripture.' The latter contention might readily lead to a new kind of legalism, and has frequently in some measure done so. St. Paul himself, however, rejected this inference, and even suggested a rule for the spiritual application of the Law, viz. in his doctrine of the Law as having a typological or allegorical significance for Christianity; cf. Col 2<sup>16</sup>, where he says that the ordinances relating to foods, feast-days, etc., are only prefiguring shadows of the reality, which is Christ, just as the circumcision of the flesh has found its true fulfilment in Christian baptism (v.<sup>11</sup>).

In connexion with this problem we must also consider the peculiar relation of the Jewish Christians to the Law. According both to Acts and to the Pauline Epistles, the Apostle maintained that the Law had a peculiar binding force upon Christians belonging to the race of Israel. As regards Acts, we need refer only to 21<sup>21-25</sup> 16<sup>3</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>. When St. James spoke to St. Paul of the rumour that he taught the Diaspora to forsake Moses, St. Paul promptly gave the required practical evidence for the falsity of the report, and for his own allegiance to the Law (21<sup>18</sup>). He even circumcised Timothy, a semi-Gentile (16<sup>3</sup>). According to his own Epistles, again, he was to the Jews as a Jew (1 Co 9<sup>19</sup>), and he counsels the Jewish members of the Church in Corinth not to undo their circumcision (7<sup>18</sup>), since every man should remain in the condition in which he was called (v.<sup>20</sup>). In Gal 5<sup>3</sup> he solemnly declares that every one who receives circumcision is under obligation to keep the whole Law—an assertion designed to traverse the foolish idea which the Judaizers had tried to insinuate into the minds of the Galatians, viz. that circumcision was a matter of no great importance. This declaration, no doubt, was made from the standpoint of those who believed that justification was to be obtained by the works of the Law. At all events, where higher issues are at stake, the Apostle assumes that he is absolved from the strict letter of the Law, as, e.g., for the sake of brotherly intercourse with the Gentile Christians (cf. 1 Co 9<sup>21</sup> with Gal 2<sup>12-14</sup>). There is another fact that points in the same direction. In Ro 11 St. Paul asserts that the Chosen People are to occupy a permanently distinct position in the Divine process of history. But the persistence of the distinctively religious character of Israel would seem to involve their permanent retention of circumcision and the Law.* How such segregation is to be effected and maintained in mixed communities without violating full religious fellowship is a problem with which missions to the Jews are still greatly concerned; cf., e.g., the relation between the Sabbath and Sunday. But it is implied in the whole tenor of Pauline teaching that in such conflicts the principle of freedom shall in the last resort prevail. For, as has already been said, all the commandments are comprehended in the law of love, and rites and ceremonies, such as circumcision, purifications, and observance of the Sabbath, are but shadows of the reality that we have in Christ. In relation to God circumcision is in itself of no value. Hence, when St. Paul asserts that it is the doers of the Law who will be declared righteous in the Day of Judgment (Ro 2<sup>13</sup>), he is thinking, as the context shows, not of an external obedience, a performance of the law 'in the flesh,' but of a circumcision of the heart and of a moral righteousness (cf. 2<sup>14</sup>, 25<sup>-29</sup>).

(e) Survey.—When we survey the Pauline doctrine of the Law as a whole, we see that it is quite wrong to attribute to the Apostle any form of antinomianism. Of the operation and purpose of the Law he doubtless uses language which could not but have a decidedly antinomian sound to the ears of a Jewish Christian. When he speaks of the Law as a power that stimulates sin and brings about death, and of the ministration mediated by * Cf. on this point generally, A. Harnack, Neue Untersuchungen zur Apostelgeschichte, Leipzig, 1911, p. 21 ff.

Moses as a ministration of condemnation (2 Co 3<sup>6-11</sup>), one involuntarily asks how such utterances can be reconciled with the praise of, and the delight in, the Law which we find, e.g., in the Psalms (cf. Ps 19<sup>8f.</sup> 40<sup>9</sup> 119 passim). And how does his description of the period between Moses and Christ as a time during which there was no faith and the people groaned under the yoke of the Law (Gal 3<sup>19-25</sup>) harmonize with the OT?

As regards the latter question, the Apostle does not of course mean to deny that faith was a power among God's people after Moses as well as before him. He is quite assured that, besides the Mosaic legislation, Israel had also the adoption, the covenants, the Temple service, and the promises (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>), that it was the people of hope (Eph 2<sup>12</sup>), and that in a sense Christ was with it (1 Co 10<sup>4-9</sup>), just as in the wilderness wanderings the people received prototypes of the Christian sacraments (vv. 2-4), and in their sacrificial worship prototypes of the sacrifice of Christ (5<sup>7</sup>; cf. Eph 5-). As a matter of fact, St. Paul saw in the OT dispensation in general, as recorded in the Scriptures, a typical prefiguration of the NT dispensation (cf. 1 Co 10<sup>6-11</sup>, Ro 15<sup>4</sup>, Col 2<sup>17</sup>). And, although he speaks of the NT salvation in its universal application as having been a Divine mystery until its manifestation in Jesus Christ (Ro 16<sup>26f.</sup>, Eph 1<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>5-9</sup>, Col 1<sup>-5</sup>), yet he regards it as having been foreshown in the prophetic writings (Ro 1<sup>2</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> 16<sup>-6</sup>). Hence the people of the Law cannot have been wholly without faith, and thus what St. Paul means in Gal 3<sup>-3</sup> is simply that Christian faith as the one exclusive principle of righteousness was not revealed until Christ came.

In the OT, doubtless, the supreme principle was the Law. Yet the Law did not operate in a vacuum; devout Israelites always saw it against the background of grace. Every expression of delight in the Law presupposes faith in the gracious and merciful God who 'passes over transgression.' Moreover, the Law was not as yet recognized in all its depth and rigour; in reality, the people lived in a spiritual environment of mingled Law and grace. Such a state of matters, however, could not be permanently borne. The two elements necessarily tended to disengage and separate themselves from each other. In Pharisaic Judaism the principle of the Law moved ever further apart from the principle of grace, and the Law itself came to be regarded more and more as a legal contract by which performance and recompense were rigidly adjusted to each other. The religious untenability of such a position could remain unrecognized only so long as the Law was understood in a purely external sense. But as soon as it came to be interpreted in that profound inner sense which Jesus indicated, it necessarily became obvious that legalism could only lead to despair, and that there could be no other principle of salvation than grace. The Judaizers, the opponents of St. Paul who started from Pharisaism, were legalists in their way of thought, conceiving of grace—and faith—as in a proper sense merely supplementary to an imperfect fulfilment of the Law; in other words, they regarded Christianity as only a perfected Judaism. St. Paul, on the other hand, although his starting-point too was Pharisaic legalism, combined therewith that inward interpretation of the Law which Jesus had instituted, and saw that the question at issue was not that of a synthesis of Law and faith, but simply that of a choice between the two, i.e. between Judaism as a religion of Law and Christianity as the religion of grace. If we are to estimate aright his utterances regarding the function of the Law, we must always bear in mind that they have a polemical setting, and that he is speaking of the Mosaic legislation and the Old Covenant not in their historical conditions, but in their character as principles. This explains the apparent bias of his statements regarding the Law.

Taken as a whole, however, St. Paul's doctrine of the Law does not issue from a belief that the miserable state of mankind is due to the Law in itself, and that accordingly God had abolished the Law, and set grace in its stead. The Apostle's view is rather that human wretchedness arises from the sinful flesh, and from the Law only in so far as it is made impotent by the flesh (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), and so intensifies the misery of sin. Thus the work of Christ was to dissolve the immemorial connexion between these two powers—law and sin—on the one side, and man on the other. But what the work of Christ is in the last resort designed to secure is that the ideal demand of the Law shall be fulfilled (Ro 8<sup>4</sup>). The essential purport of the Pauline doctrine has been aptly expressed by Augustine in the words: 'The Law is given that Grace may be sought; Grace is given that the Law may be fulfilled.'

5. The Law in the Epistle to the Hebrews.—Paulinism was fully vindicated by the historical development that took place on the soil of Judaism. Not only did the Jews of the Diaspora harden their hearts more and more against the Pauline Christian mission, but those resident in Palestine, notwithstanding the conservative attitude of the mother Church towards the Law, became ever the more hostile to Christianity. In the sixth decade of the 1st cent. the antagonism developed into open persecution, and James the Just fell a victim to it. The Christians in Jerusalem, and in Palestine generally, were thus brought to a point where they had to choose between their affection for their fathers' religion and their confession of Jesus; in particular, their connexion with the fellowship of the synagogue and their participation in the Temple service were involved, and these at last could be retained only at the price of their cursing the name of Jesus. Such is obviously the situation presupposed in the Epistle to the Hebrews. In the opinion of the present writer, this Epistle can have been addressed only to Jewish Christians in Palestine who were tempted by their passionate attachment to their old religion to apostatize from Christ. The author of the Epistle will therefore exhibit the pre-eminence of the NT revelation and the NT priesthood. The essential core of the Epistle is its portrayal of Jesus as the Melchizedek high priest. Inasmuch as such a high priest has been installed, the old legal priesthood—the Aaronic—is eo ipso brought to an end. But, if the priesthood is changed, the change must necessarily also affect the Law (He 7<sup>12</sup>). The ancient commandment is annulled because of its weak and unprofitable character—'for the law made nothing perfect' (οὐδὲν ἐτελείωσεν, v. 19). Hebrews no doubt looks at the Mosaic Law mainly under the aspect of the priestly and sacrificial legislation, but its view comes to embrace the Old Covenant as a whole (8), in the place of which, as foretold by Jeremiah, God has instituted a New Covenant, writing His law upon the minds and hearts of men, entering into immediate fellowship with them, and forgiving their sins (8<sup>7-13</sup> 10<sup>16</sup>). The weakness of the Old Covenant really lay in the external nature of its institutions. Its oblations were carnal, and could not purge the conscience, and thus required to be continually repeated, just as, again, the priests themselves were mortal, and in turn gave place to others. Likewise the sanctuary was merely of this world, merely a copy of the true sanctuary in heaven, just as the benefits of the Old Covenant were of an earthly nature—a shadow of heavenly benefits to come (8-10). The leading idea of Hebrews, accordingly, is not so much that the Law is a tutor until Christ comes (see above, 4 (b)) as that it is an imperfect and now obsolete institution which Christians may therefore tranquilly leave behind.

Compared with St. Paul's doctrine of the Law, that of Hebrews is more restrained in so far as it attaches greater importance to the connexion between the Old Covenant and the New, i.e. that it more strongly emphasizes the typological character of the Law, and that it regards the OT faith as being more akin to that of the NT; or, to put it otherwise, it insists more upon the aspect of hope even in the NT faith (11<sup>1</sup>-12<sup>3</sup>). Again, however, the view of Hebrews is more radical than that of St. Paul in so far as it is of a more spiritual stamp (cf., e.g., the expression in 9<sup>10</sup>: 'only . . . carnal ordinances,' μόνον δικαιοῦματα σαρκός)—a feature connected with the fact that the author has in view mainly the ritual law. As a whole, the Epistle stands upon a basis of Paulinism, but it also bears the impress of the Alexandrian spiritualistic philosophy. The attitude of the author to the Jewish Christian problem in the narrower sense—as, e.g., the retention of circumcision and the Sabbath—cannot be directly inferred from the Epistle, but, if we may argue from his general standpoint, he must have regarded all such matters simply as adiaphora. The Epistle as a whole may be described as an appeal to the Jewish Christians to abandon Judaism without misgiving, since Christians have here no abiding city (Jerusalem), but seek the city which is to come (13<sup>14</sup>). The subsequent destruction of the Temple was the best illustration of that appeal.

6. The Law in the Johannine writings.—Echoes of the controversy about the Law may no doubt still be heard in the Johannine writings, but the question is no longer a living one. Paulinism had by this time fought to an end the decisive battle with Judaism, and the great catastrophe of A.D. 70 had exercised a liberating influence on Jewish Christianity. It is true that, of the Johannine writings, Revelation may have been written in the decade preceding the Fall of Jerusalem, but, though in the Epistles to the Seven Churches (2. 3) the influence of the Apostolic Decree is probably still traceable (cf. 2<sup>out</sup> with 24<sup>14</sup> and Ac 15<sup>8</sup>), yet the idea of the Law plays no part in the book. The Apocalypse no doubt attaches special importance to the 'commandments of God,' repeatedly enjoining their observance (12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>), and, similarly, great stress is laid upon the works of believers, since in the Judgment men are to be recompensed according to their works (23<sup>23</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>12</sup>; cf. 14<sup>13</sup>), while in five (RV; AV all) of the seven letters the direct address opens with the words, 'I know thy works' (2<sup>19</sup> 19<sup>31</sup> 8. 15). The works referred to, however, are in no sense the 'works of the Law,' but rather ordinary Christian actions, or Christian virtues; cf. the details of the letters and the lists of vices in 21<sup>8</sup> 27 22<sup>15</sup>. Nor, again, are the 'commandments of God' to be identified with the commandments of Moses. On the contrary, the peculiar way in which they are linked with the 'testimony,' or the 'faith of Jesus,' seems to indicate that the expression does not differ essentially in meaning from the phrase 'the word of God' occurring in a like connexion, and that it finds its explanation in 1 John, in which faith in the name of Jesus and brotherly love are represented as the two chief commandments of God (cf. Rev 1<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>2</sup> with 1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>1-8</sup>).

That the general religious attitude of Revelation is Jewish Christian may probably be inferred from such passages as 11<sup>2</sup> 20<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>12</sup> and 7<sup>1-8</sup>. But this does not imply that the work has a particularistic or an anti-Pauline standpoint; the truth is, rather, that the book presupposes throughout the universality of salvation (cf. 5<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> [21<sup>24-26</sup>]), just as, conversely, it says that the unbelieving Jews are not Jews but 'a synagogue of Satan' (2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>). And when (in 2<sup>24</sup>) the Lord assures believers that He will cast upon them no other burden than abstinence from things sacrificed to idols and from fornication (cf. 21<sup>14</sup> 9), we are reminded, as indicated above, of the ordinances of the Apostolic Decree for the Gentile Christians. The word 'law' (νόμος), however, does not occur in the book.

In the First Epistle of John—as in the Second and Third as well—we find no special reference to the Law. In the First Epistle an error is assailed which lies quite outside the question as to the validity of the Mosaic Law, viz. an ethical indifference which, side by side with a Docetic Christology, had apparently assumed a Gnostic complexion. When John, after a warning against being led astray, declares with emphasis that 'he (only) that doeth righteousness is righteous,' and that 'he that doeth sin is of the devil' (3<sup>7</sup>), he probably has in view some misapplication of the Pauline teaching on righteousness. There is nothing in the Epistle which points directly to antinomian tendencies, but something of that nature seems to be hinted at in the closing admonition against 'the idols' (5<sup>21</sup>), which would appear to point to the evils mentioned in Rev 21<sup>4</sup> 20. On the positive side, the exhortations of the Epistle are directed towards the true faith and towards walking in brotherly love; 'to walk in the light' consists in brotherly love (cf. 2<sup>9</sup> 11 3<sup>14</sup> 4. 5). St. John's well-known definition of sin as 'transgression of the law,' 'lawlessness' (ἀνομία [1 Jn 3<sup>4</sup>]), might seem to be of special interest for our present subject, but he does not further develop the thought, which is apparently only of a subsidiary character, to be compared with the references to the requirements of the Law with which on occasion St. Paul supports his admonitions (cf. Gal 5<sup>14</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8-10</sup>).

Finally, the Gospel of St. John shows its remoteness from the ecclesiastical conflict regarding the Law by the subordinate place which the idea of the νόμος occupies in it. This probably finds expression in the significant verse of the Prologue (1<sup>17</sup>) in which St. John compares the Old and the New Dispensation: 'the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ.' The antithesis of law and grace is genuinely Pauline; that of law and truth reminds us above all of the Epistle to the Hebrews: the Law was only an imperfect revelation of the nature of God, which has at length been declared by the only begotten Son (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>), 'full of grace and truth' (v. 14). Moreover, the references to the Law in the body of the Gospel are not so much meant, as in Mt., to interpret its requirements; here, in fact, the Law, or the Scripture, is adduced rather for purposes of argument (cf. 5<sup>39</sup> 45-47 with 7<sup>19-24</sup> 10<sup>34</sup>). ['your law' = Scripture, Ps 82<sup>6</sup>] cf. 12<sup>34</sup> ['the law' = Ps 110<sup>4</sup>, Is 9<sup>7</sup>, Dn 7<sup>14</sup>]). It is true that the law of the Sabbath is referred to in a special way, inasmuch as Jesus was on two occasions charged with violating the day, and vindicated His action (5<sup>9-13</sup> 16-18 7<sup>22-24</sup> cf. 9<sup>14</sup>) by appealing to the example of God His Father, who 'worketh even until now' (5<sup>17</sup>), and to the practice of circumcising on the Sabbath (7<sup>22</sup>). A passage like 7<sup>19</sup>, however, and still more decidedly 10<sup>34</sup> ('in your law'), seems to indicate a certain detachment from the standpoint of the Law generally. And the superiority of the Christian point of view, as contrasted with the Law, or with the legal worship, finds expression above all in the great utterance of Jesus regarding the true worship (4<sup>1-24</sup>): 'the hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father. . . . God is spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth.' The ethic of St. John's Gospel is most impressively brought to a focus in the new commandment of brotherly love (13<sup>34</sup> 15<sup>12</sup> 13. 17). While the discourses of Jesus in the first part of the Gospel, in which He addresses the people ('the world'), demand faith in His name, those in the second part (13-17), where He speaks to the disciples (those who have that faith, believers), all converge in the commandment of mutual love; here, accordingly, we have the same two-fold requirement which we found so simply expressed in the First Epistle of John (3-3). In the Gospel, no doubt, Jesus speaks not only of His commandment, but also of His commandments; by these, however, He must have meant, not the commandments of the OT, but in all likelihood simply the special aspects of the law of love.

1 John tends to set faith and love side by side (cf. Rev 14<sup>1</sup>: faith and the 'commandments of God'), and the Fourth Gospel shows the same collocation. In this point, accordingly, St. John differs from St. Paul, who indicated the subordination of love to faith in the phrase 'faith working through love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). In point of fact, however, St. John too has recognized the dependence of love upon faith, since, as just indicated, the first part of his Gospel is occupied with the preaching of faith (1-12), while in the second part (13ff.) brotherly love is regarded as being based upon the true foundation of discipleship, i.e. upon faith. Through faith comes life in the name of Jesus Christ (20<sup>31</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>13</sup>). No room is left, therefore, for legal merit or self-righteousness. Thus St. John homologates the Pauline conception of the gospel, but expresses his view in a manner much more simple, and therefore less precise.

7. The Law in the sub-apostolic writings.—In the post-apostolic writings of the 1st cent. the Law, as signifying the Mosaic legislation, plays no part at all. In the so-called First Epistle of Clement the term occurs but once (i. 3), and there in the plural form: 'Ye walked in the laws of God'—an utterance which, both according to the context and in view of the persons addressed (Gentile Christians in Corinth), can have no reference to the OT Law in the specific sense. It was in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers of the 2nd cent.—as, e.g., the Shepherd of Hermas and the Epistle of Barnabas—that Christianity came to be regarded as 'the new Law.' Barnabas says that God abolished the Jewish sacrifices in order that the new Law of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is without the yoke of compulsion, should involve no sacrificial gift, as that is but the work of man (ii. 6)—an idea that partly recalls St. James's phrase, 'the perfect law of liberty' (Ja 1<sup>25</sup>; cf. 2<sup>1</sup>). Hermas, again, speaks of Christ as the one who gave to the people (of God) the Law that He received from His Father, but also as the one who is Himself the Law; the Law is the Son of God, who was preached to the ends of the earth (Sim. viii. 3. 2)—i.e. the gospel has taken the place of the ancient Law, or, otherwise expressed, Christ in His example and His commandments has been constituted the sole moral authority of Christians. What distinguishes this sub-apostolic view from that of St. Paul, however, is that the idea of 'the new Law' not only verbally but also materially implies a moralism that was quite foreign to the Apostolic Age, inasmuch as the idea of Law has coloured the conception of the gospel.

When the strain between Law and gospel had at length been relieved, legalism gradually once more found its way indirectly into the Church. We can already trace the process in the Ancient Catholic Church, and still more distinctly in the Mediæval Church. At the Reformation, however, the primitive-Christian, Pauline solution of the problem of the Law was vindicated once more, and legalism and antinomianism were alike surmounted. The theology of the Reformation, in its interpretation of grace and faith, showed, with St. Paul as its guide, not only that, but also how, the Christian is constrained to do good works, and thus fulfil the Law of God (Augsburg Confession [1530], xx. 36, 'Apol.' [1531] iii. 15).

LAWYER.—In Israel the activities of the lawyer were limited by the Torah, or Law of Moses. His functions were three-fold: to study and interpret the Law (and the traditions arising from it), to hand it down by teaching, and to apply it in the Courts of Justice. The lawyers played an important part in the proceedings of the Sanhedrin, not only voting, but also speaking, if they saw fit, on either side of a case, though in criminal charges solely on behalf of the accused (Mishn. Sanhedrin, iv. 1). The Roman lawyers were more secular in their interests, and applied themselves more directly to the practical aspects of jurisprudence. Their work in the law-courts covered a wide range. The most general representative of law was the cognitor, or attorney, whose place (in Gaius's time) was partially filled by the procurator litis, or legal agent; but in court the case was pleaded by the patronus or orator, the skilled counsel of whom Cicero is so illustrious an example, often assisted by the advocatus, or legal adviser. The opinion of jurisconsulti, or professional students of law, could also be laid before the judges. See TRIAL-AT-LAW.

In the NT lawyers appear as νομικοί, 'jurists' (freq. in Lk., but elsewhere only in Mt 22<sup>35</sup> and Tit 3<sup>13</sup>), or νομοδιδάσκαλοι, 'doctors of the law' (only in Lk 5<sup>17</sup>, Ac 5<sup>34</sup>, and 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>); but they are clearly identical with the γραμματεῖς, 'scribes, who are mentioned so often in the Gospels and Acts. These lawyers are all of the Jewish type. The Roman lawyer appears, however, in the ρητωρ or 'orator' Tertullus, who pleaded the cause of St. Paul's prosecutors before the Roman governor Felix (Ac 24<sup>1ff.</sup>)—in order, no doubt, that the proper technicalities might be observed, and the case presented in the way most likely to win over the trained Roman mind. See TERTULLUS.

LAYING ON OF HANDS.—See ORDINATION.

LEAVEN (from levare, 'to raise'; ζύμη, ζυμοῦν; fermentum).—Leaven is a substance which produces fermentation, especially in the making of bread. It is properly a piece of already fermented dough, which is mixed with other dough in order to repeat the process. In the warm climate of Syria the fermentation is completed in 24 hours. The commandment against the use of raised bread during the Passover week (Ex 12<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>, etc.) was no doubt a survival from Israel's nomadic period, when (as among the nomads of to-day) all bread was unleavened. Fermentation was supposed to represent the process of corruption in the mass of the bread—an idea found in Plutarch, who says: 'Now leaven is itself the offspring of corruption, and corrupts the mass (το φυράμα) with which it is mixed' (Quæst. Rom. 109). Bread with the taint of putrefaction was regarded as unfit for use in religious ceremonies (see W. R. Smith, LS-, 1894, p. 220). On the eve of the first day of the Passover—the 14th Nisan—the Jews, in accordance with their immemorial custom, still carefully remove every trace of leaven which can be found in their houses. Fresh dough kneaded with pure water is used in the preparation of the cakes of unleavened bread which are to be eaten during the holy week.

As a figure of speech, 'leaven' is applied to any element, influence, or agency which effects a subtle and secret change either for the better or for the worse. On the one hand, the Kingdom of Heaven is a leaven which is destined to penetrate, and assimilate to itself, the whole of humanity (Mt 13<sup>33</sup>, Lk 13<sup>30</sup>). On the other, even an apparently insignificant sin, if tolerated and unchecked in a community, has great power of corruption, and St. Paul twice quotes the popular saying, 'A little leaven leavens the whole lump' (ὀλίγον το φύραμα, 1 Co 5<sup>6</sup>, Gal 5<sup>9</sup>). The followers of Christ are already unleavened (ἄζυμοι); virtually and ideally—in the purpose of God and in their own passionate desire—they are completely purged from the leaven of iniquity; but the ideal has still to be realized. They are therefore exhorted to set about and carry through their Passover cleansing of the soul—to rid themselves of all infected and infectious remains of their pre-Christian state—that they may keep not a seven-days' but a life-long feast with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth (1 Co 5<sup>6-8</sup>).

LEOPARD (πάρδαλις).—The Greek word seems to have been used indiscriminately by the classical writers to designate 'leopard,' 'panther,' or 'ounce.' The only NT reference to the 'leopard' is in Rev 13<sup>2</sup>, where it occurs in the description of 'the Wild Beast from the sea'—'the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard.' The concrete reality, of which the Wild Beast was the abstract emblem, was of course the Roman Empire. To the mind of the Seer, the attitude adopted by Rome towards the early Christian Church was that of a leopard. She exhibited the same agility (cf. Hab 1<sup>8</sup>) and cunning (cf. Hos 13<sup>7</sup>), as well as the same ruthless cruelty, as that much-dreaded inhabitant of Palestine and the East.

The leopard (Felis pardus, Arab. nimr, Heb. nāmer) is still found round the Dead Sea, in Gilead and Bashan, and also occasionally in Lebanon and the wooded districts of the west; but, judging from the numerous allusions in the OT and the occurrence of the word in place-names (e.g. 'Beth-Nimrah' or 'Nimrah'), it is reasonable to suppose that it was more common in early times. It usually lurks near wells or watering-places (cf. 'waters of Nimrim,' Is 15<sup>6</sup>, Jer 48<sup>4</sup>), and in the outskirts of villages (cf. Jer 5<sup>6</sup>), to pounce at night upon cattle and dogs. The beautifully spotted skins are often sold in the markets and are used as rugs and saddle-covers, while sometimes they are worn as an article of clothing.

The Felis pardus is found over the whole of Africa, S. Asia, China, Japan, and the islands of the Malay Archipelago.

Another animal of the leopard tribe, the well-known cheeta or hunting-leopard of India (Felis jubatus), is sometimes found in the hills of Galilee and in the neighbourhood of Tabor, but its occurrence is rare. It is much tamer than the Felis pardus, and in India it is often domesticated and kept for hunting antelopes and other animals.

LETTER.—The distinction between the 'true letter' and the 'epistle' was dealt with in the art. EPISTLE. In the Christian literature of the Apostolic Age till the end of the 1st cent. we have, besides Ac 15<sup>23-9</sup> and 23<sup>5-30</sup>, sixteen letters in the proper sense of the term—viz. the ten Epistles of St. Paul that may reasonably be regarded as authentic; the three Pastoral Epistles, which, if authentic, are undoubtedly real letters, and, if spurious, are at all events based upon genuine letters from the Apostle's hand; the Second and Third Epistles of St. John, both of which could at once be characterized rather as something like short private missives; and, finally, the First Epistle of Clement. Of the genuine Pauline letters, Romans comes nearest in character to the 'epistle,' though the fact that it is less personal and intimate in its tone and more suggestive of the treatise is quite well accounted for by certain psychological considerations—as, e.g., that the writer was not personally known to the community which he was addressing; we should not therefore be justified in saying that the letter-form is a mere artifice. On the other hand, the so-called First Epistle of Clement, which is written in the name of one entire community to another, is a peculiar composite of 'letter' and 'epistle'; it was certainly meant to be a true letter, arising out of the actual circumstances of the writer's own church at Rome, and having in view the actual circumstances of the church in Corinth, but it is quite clear that Clement was working upon a tradition of Christian letters and epistles, so that—especially in regard to the length of his message—he does not altogether succeed in maintaining the characteristics of a true letter. The Christian writers of the Apostolic Age, in fact, had not yet become proficient in such literary forms as the treatise, the dialogue, or the controversial pamphlet, and this explains why they had recourse to the letter as the simplest literary vehicle, and yet at the same time burst the trammels of its form. A comparison of the true letters of the Apostolic Age with true letters from approximately the same period of the heathen world shows that, while the similarities in style and diction are manifold and by no means insignificant, yet the former class display a very remarkable independence in their use of the traditional form.

LEVI.—See TRIBES, PRIEST, AARON.

LEVITE.—According to the view represented in the OT by the so-called 'Priests' Code, the Levites were originally the clan whose members were qualified for the priestly office. In the course of time a distinction arose, and the Levites became the principal attendants upon the priests, entrusted with minor sacerdotal duties but not competent to succeed to the full status. In the NT, outside the Gospels, the term occurs but once or twice. Barnabas of Cyprus, where there were numerous Jews and Christians (1 Mac 15<sup>-3</sup>, Ac 11<sup>19</sup>), was a landowner, though a Levite (Ac 4<sup>36</sup>), the old ordinance (Nu 18<sup>24</sup>) against the possession of real estate having long before fallen into abeyance, and probably having never been meant to apply to land outside Palestine. In He 7<sup>11</sup> the writer coins a word to enable him to write of 'the Levitical priesthood,' as though the hallowing of the tribe were concentrated in 'the order of Aaron' (so Westcott, ad loc.), or with a view to indicating the provisional character of all parts of the earlier sacrificial service and not merely of its central acts. The priestly tribe with all its privileges passes away; and another—the royal tribe (He 7<sup>14</sup>)—yields Him who is able really to save, and to 'save to the uttermost' (7<sup>25</sup>). In later times an assumed parallel between the historical and the true Israel was pushed, until the relation of deacons to bishops and presbyters was based upon that of Levites to priests. The theory has proved useful since the days of Cyprian, and may conceivably have originated in some of the Ebionitic Christian communities of our period; but the functions of the two classes, Levites and deacons, were quite distinct, and any analogy between them is artificial and an afterthought.

LEWD, LEWDNESS (Ac 17<sup>5</sup> 18<sup>14</sup>).—The English word occurs twice in the NT, once as an adjective (Gr. πονηρός, Ac 17<sup>5</sup>) and once as a substantive (ῥαδιούργημα, Ac 18<sup>14</sup>). In neither of these cases has it anything to do with sexual passion—the sense in which the word is now used; it just means 'vulgar,' 'worthless.'

1. Ac 17<sup>5</sup>.—The word πονηρός (AV 'lewd,' RV 'vile') is used to characterize the ἀγροαῖοι or loafers in the market-place whom the unbelieving Jews in Thessalonica incited to an act of popular insurrection against St. Paul. They were so far successful as to prevail on the politarchs to exact bail from Jason for peaceful behaviour, with the consequence that St. Paul and Silas had to escape to Berea by night.

* Owing to the dishonour in which manual pursuits were held in ancient days, every large city had a superfluous population of worthless idlers—clients who lived on the doles of the wealthy, flatterers who fawned at the feet of the influential, the lazzaroni of streets, mere loafers and loiterers, the hangers-on of forum, the claqueurs of law-courts, the scum that gathered about the shallowest outmost waves of civilisation' (F. W. Farrar, St. Paul, 1883, p. 370).

This class is well described by the adjective πονηρός. Aristotle distinguishes the wicked man (πονηρός) from the ἀπαρής, the weak man who sins though he does not mean to do so and who is unrighteous without premeditation (Eth. Nic. vii. 10). The wicked man sins with the full consent of his will. He is positively malignant and injurious to others. Nearly akin in meaning are φάλος and κακός, but as Trench says (NT Synonyms<sup>3</sup>, p. 304), in πονηρός 'the positive activity of evil comes far more decidedly out than in κακός.' Perhaps Knox's phrase—'the rascal multitude'—is as accurate a translation as we can get.

While the χρηστος is one who diligently follows his occupation and maintains himself by lawful work, the πονηρος or κακος indicates the man who is wicked in behaviour or in character. The words, however, in Greek are often used with the same latitude as we allow ourselves in English, when we use similar terms. The ordinary speech of the NT is not logically exact.

W. M. Ramsay discusses the question whether the reference to Satan in 1 Th 2<sup>18</sup>—'and Satan hindered us (from coming)'—is to be taken as referring to the hostility of the multitude. He concludes, however, that the reference is to the attitude of the politarchs, who, by exacting security for good behaviour from Jason, prevented the return of St. Paul to the city (St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 230 f.).

Weststein supplies parallels which throw light on the class denoted by ἀγροαῖοι (in loco).

2. Ac 18<sup>14</sup>.—Here the word 'lewdness' translates the Greek ῥαδιούργημα. The RV has 'villainy.' The word is associated with ἀδίκημα. The usual distinction between them is said to be that ἀδίκημα refers to illegality—something done contrary to the laws—whereas ῥαδιούργημα indicates moral delinquency. The distinction is probably to be maintained here, as Gallio is speaking judicially with reference to a definite charge. St. Paul is guilty neither of the one nor of the other, but according to Gallio the question is a mere dispute about words—a Jewish squabble.

ῥαδιούργημα occurs only here in the NT, nor is it found in the classics or in the LXX, but it occurs in Plutarch, Pyrrh. 6, and the allied term ῥαδιουργία occurs in Ac 13<sup>10</sup> of Elymas. The latter word occurs in papyri in the sense of 'theft' (see J. H. Moulton and George Milligan in Expositor, 8th ser. i. [1911] 477). It is not likely, however, that the term in Ac 18<sup>14</sup> is used in this restricted sense.

LIBERTINES.—Both the construction and the contents of Ac 6<sup>9</sup> are difficult. It consists, as Hort says, of 'a long compound phrase,' the Greek of which is 'not smooth and correct on any interpretation' (Judaistic Christianity, p. 50). An expositor can, therefore, lay claim to no more than a reasonable probability for his exegesis of the verse. St. Luke's statement is generally believed to have been derived from a written source. Thus, Harnack, although he argues persuasively in favour of St. Luke's having obtained a large part of the knowledge he committed to writing in Ac 1–12 from St. Philip at Cæsarea (cf. Ac 21<sup>8-9</sup>), yet thinks that he had a written (Antiochean) source for his narrative of St. Stephen's trial, speech, and death (The Acts of the Apostles, pp. 175, 188, 245). And Ramsay, writing on the 'Forms of Classification in Acts' (Expositor, 5th ser. ii. 35), explains the exceptional form of the list in Ac 6<sup>9</sup> as 'due to Luke's being here dependent on an authority whose expression he either transcribed verbatim or did not fully understand.' But it appears to the present writer possible that the form of the list is due to its having come to St. Luke in the way of oral communication. Its style may be termed colloquial: it looks as if the narrator were quoting from memory, or reporting the very words of a speaker with whom he had been conversing. May not the speaker have been St. Paul? The mention made of Cilicia in the list is in favour of this conjecture. Was there a synagogue in Jerusalem of which it is more likely that Saul of Tarsus had been a member or a leader than that which Cilician Jews frequented? The Apostle had, in the days of his unbelief, been one of the bitterest opponents of the Christian movement, and the part he had taken in St. Stephen's death was a subject of life-long self-reproach (Ac 22<sup>0</sup>). The depth of his feeling may have prevented him from referring to this often in preaching or otherwise, but would not have debarred him from doing so in conversation with a trusted friend like St. Luke.

Should this conjecture be well founded, it would help to settle the vexed question of whether five synagogues are specified in the list, or two, or only one. The present writer agrees with Hort (loc. cit.; cf. Swete, The Appearances of our Lord after the Passion, 114) that only one synagogue is mentioned, that of the Libertines, and that the following names are simply descriptive of origin, the members of the synagogue being partly from Cyrene and Alexandria, partly from Cilicia and Proconsular Asia. Possibly St. Stephen and St. Paul both belonged to this synagogue, but of this we cannot be sure.

The synagogue of the Λιβερτίνοι doubtless consisted, at least in the first instance, of Jews who had been prisoners of war, and had afterwards been set free and admitted to Roman citizenship (Chrysostom, Hom. on Acts: οἱ Ῥωμαίων ἀπελευθεροῦν). Philo tells us (Leg. ad Caium, 23) that most of the Jews of Rome were enfranchised captives, and the passages usually quoted from Tacitus (Ann. ii. 85) and Suetonius (Tiberius, 36) agree with this. Those freedmen who had returned to Palestine, and their descendants, must have formed a synagogue to which they gave their name, and most probably Jews from other parts of the world came in time to be affiliated to them. Although this statement is not supported by independent historical evidence, it may be regarded as a just inference from the text, when conjoined with other known facts. A large part of the population of Jerusalem consisted of foreign Jews, who had come to reside permanently there, that they might be near the Temple, and might be buried in the land of their fathers. Others came for their education, like St. Paul. Those Jews were most zealous in fulfilling their ritual obligations, and attached themselves to 'the strictest sect' of the Jews of Palestine (Ac 26<sup>5</sup>, Gal 1<sup>14</sup>; cf. Zahn, Introduction to the NT, i. 39 f., 60 f.; J. Moffatt in EBi iv. 4788; J. Patrick in HDB iii. 110). The first accusation brought against our Lord was based upon a misrepresentation of words of His about the Temple (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>, Mk 14<sup>58</sup>), and in Ac 6<sup>13, 14</sup> 7<sup>48-50</sup> we see that St. Stephen had not kept off this dangerous ground.

It is uncertain whether we should read της λεγομένης (TR) or τῶν λεγομένων (Tisch.) in Ac 6<sup>9</sup>; but, whichever reading be preferred, the sense is not affected. The absence of various readings in the substance of the text bars the way to any attempt to reconstruct it. Certain Armenian VSS and Syriac commentaries seem to have read Λιβύων (cf. the unique NT reference to Libya, Ac 2<sup>10</sup>), and this paved the way for the most famous conjectural emendation—that of Λιβυστίωνων for Λιβερτίωνων. J. Rendel Harris, in his art. in the Expositor, 6th ser. vi. 378 f., has traced the history of this emendation in an interesting manner from Beza (1559) to Blass (1898). From Beza's Annotationes he quotes the following sentence, in which the main difficulty of the text is well stated: 'Neque enim video quare Lucas istos [Libertinos] appellet ex conditione, ceteros vero ex gente ac patria.' Blass, in his Philology of the Gospels, 69 f., was not aware that the emendation had been proposed by anyone before himself, and he expressed his certainty that Λιβυστίωνων was the true reading. This word, which is used by Catullus (lx. 1, montibus Libystinis), would have been quite suitable for designating the towns lying westwards from Cyrene, had it been supported by good MS authority (cf. EBi iii. 2793, 2794; ExpT ix. 437<sup>b</sup>). The derivation of Libertini from a town Libertum in N. Africa is much less plausible, as no town of that name seems to have been known in the 1st century.

Among the older expositors, Bengel (Gnomon of NT) strongly maintains that the whole description of Ac 6<sup>9</sup> is that of one flourishing synagogue, composed of Europeans, Africans, and Asiatics, to which Saul belonged. His note is still worth reading.

JAMES DONALD.

LIBERTY.—Liberty (ἐλευθερία) occupies a prominent place in the thought of NT writers and appears in a variety of significations.—

1. In the political sense.—As denoting the status of a free citizen and in direct contrast with the state of slavery, the word figures in one of the great dichotomies used by the apostolic writers in classifying men from the standpoint of their age (Col 3<sup>1</sup>—'bondman, freeman'). We have no means of knowing even approximately in what proportions the churches of the apostolic and sub-apostolic times were made up of freemen and of slaves. Everything certainly goes to show that many of the latter class became Christians; in all probability, too, they usually formed the majority. It is precarious, however, to find positive evidence of this, as A. Deissmann does with regard to the Colossian Church, in the mere fact that (Col 3<sup>18-41</sup>) counsels addressed to slaves are given in ampler terms, those to masters quite briefly (St. Paul, Eng. tr., 1912, p. 216). Similar reasoning might argue from 1 P 3<sup>1-6</sup> that wives were in a majority and husbands in a minority!

The fact that St. Paul, a native of Tarsus, was a Roman citizen is treated as a matter of importance in Acts. It was the Roman Emperors who gave the people of the provinces power to enjoy the rights of citizenship. There is a dramatic turning of tables in Ac 22<sup>3</sup> when St. Paul is able to say quite simply (yet with a touch of pride), 'But I am a Roman born,' and Claudius, the captain, turns out to be but a parvenu who had had to spend a lot of money, somehow or other, to acquire the citizenship. The same status is claimed for Silas as well as St. Paul in Ac 16<sup>37</sup>.

Not a few of those who are mentioned by name in St. Paul's Epistles (e.g. Philemon, Gaius, Erastus, Aquila, Phoebe, etc.) must have been of the citizen class. The number of such increased as time went on. In the Ignatian Epistles (e.g. Smyrn. xii. and Polyc. viii.) we find similar references to devoted Christians (Tavias, Alce, Daphnus, 'the wife of Epitropus' [or 'of the governor'], Attalus, etc.) of the same rank. But Christianity had gained access to the palaces of the aristocracy before the 1st cent. was out, and had won adherents there who suffered for their faith—witness the well-known cases of T. Flavius Clemens, the consul, and his wife, Domitilla. And for the same period we have the evidence of an outsider in Pliny's famous Epistle to Trajan (x. 97), where he tells us that he found in his province large numbers of Christians 'of all classes' (omnis ordinis). What was true of Bithynia was most probably true of other parts of the Empire.

Citizenship and wealth, of course, did not necessarily go together. In the class of freemen were included people of all ranks, from artisans and labourers up to the wealthiest aristocrats. Unfortunately many citizens were but idle loafers, depending on the Imperial largesse. The existence of the huge, overgrown system of slavery had a sinister effect on the great mass of citizens, inasmuch as 'paid labour was thought unworthy of any freeborn man' (C. Bigg, The Church's Task under the Roman Empire, Oxford, 1905, p. 114). The poor, hired labourers, however, of Ja 5<sup>4</sup> were not technically δοῦλοι. The same Epistle shows us how soon the Apostolic Church experienced the evils too possibly attendant upon the appearance of the rich man within the circle of the Christian society (chs. 2 and 5).

Though civic freedom is quite evidently valued, we find little or nothing in the apostolic writings bearing on political questions. Lofty moral teaching and profound theology abound, but there is no feeling manifest that political freedom was a thing worth seeking for its own sake. It may indeed be said that in the 1st cent. 'the prevailing notions of freedom were imperfect, and the endeavours to realise them were wide of the mark' (Lord Acton, The History of Freedom, London, 1907, p. 16). See, further, art. SLAVE, SLAVERY.

2. In the sense of freedom of conscience.—'Liberty' is used in the NT to denote a man's freedom to decide what is right or wrong for himself, especially in relation to matters enjoined upon him by some form of external authority. The development of such a notion naturally followed upon the development of the notion of conscience itself, which in turn was bound up with the growing sense of human individuality and personal responsibility. In pre-Christian lines of philosophical and religious teaching (as e.g. in Stoicism) we mark in this respect a preparatio evangelica. As the ancient conception of man as merely a component unit in tribe or nation faded and gave way to the sense of his value for himself as well as for the community, and of his responsibility for himself, such consequences were bound to follow. So far from morality consisting simply in compliance with commands embodying the will of the community of which the man is a part (which commands may also be conceived as Divinely originated), when man realizes his individual responsibility to God, conscience emerges, and, criticizing those very commands, may disapprove as well as approve, whilst it may also find a whole area of moral interests which the injunctions of external authority do not touch and in which it must decide for itself.

To the rise of Christianity we very specially owe an advanced conception of conscience and its corollary, the claim to freedom to act in accord with the behests of conscience. 'Am I not free?' cries St. Paul (1 Co 9<sup>1</sup>); whilst 'Peter and the apostles' (Ac 5<sup>29</sup>) are heard declaring 'We must obey God rather than men.' These sayings might serve as watchwords of the new era as viewed from this standpoint (Judaism itself, it should be noted in passing, exhibited in course of time a similar development in its ethical teaching). And the clash between the new order and the old necessarily brought with it abundant scope for the outcrop of cases of conscience such as St. Paul handles in 1 Co 8 ff. and Ro 14 f.

Freedom of this kind can be properly claimed and used only by the conscientious man—the man who is above all else concerned for harmony between the laws and customs he is called to observe and the inward regulative principle, and who departs from such laws only when an enlightened conscience imperatively demands it. For another important pre-requisite is that the exercise of this freedom shall be based on intelligent judgment. 'Let each man be fully assured in his own mind' (Ro 14<sup>5</sup>) is a Pauline dictum of the first importance. Cf. the deeply significant logion ascribed to our Lord in Cod. D (Lk 6<sup>5</sup>) wherein He says to a man found working on the Sabbath, 'If thou knowest what thou art doing, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art accursed and a transgressor of the law.' A man cannot justifiably set at nought a positive commandment or institution unless he has sight of some higher principle which determines his course of action. The freedom an enlightened man asks is freedom to do what he sees he ought to do, and to do what he may do without injury to others.

For St. Paul very emphatically insists on the necessity of qualifying the exercise of one's own liberty by regard for the claims of others. It must not involve harm to others or an infringement of their liberty. Self-limitation for the sake of others is, indeed, an example of the truest exercise of freedom.

3. As a description of the Christian life and experience.—Social conditions being what they were in the 1st cent., it was most natural that the life resulting from faith in Christ, as that is presented in the NT, should be described in the apostolic writings by a cycle of metaphors centring in the word 'redemption' (Deissmann, op. cit., p. 149). This is specially characteristic of St. Paul.

The Christian life is represented as (a) freedom from the bondage of law.—St. Paul's treatment of this topic (found mainly in the Epistles to Romans and Galatians) is not easy to follow and is doubtless coloured by his own vivid personal experience. We do not find quite the same line taken in other early apostolic writings that have been preserved to us. By general consent, it is true, it came to be held that Jewish and Gentile Christians alike were free from obligation to observe the Jewish Law in its peculiar institutions and ceremonial rules. The old sacrificial system was abolished 'that the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is without the yoke of necessity, might have a human oblation' (i.e. the dedication of the man himself) (Epistle of Barnabas, ii.; so also Epistle to the Hebrews, and Epistle to Diognetus, iv. [regarding Sabbath, circumcision, 'kosher' foods, and the like]). But St. Paul has far more than this in view. He is thinking of all law as the expression of God's will for man's life and the severe revealer of man's sin as he departs from it: law that has only condemnation for the sinner (see the autobiographical Ro 7).

That the Apostle countenances an antinomian freedom he himself indignantly denies. Nor did he lack the true Jew's veneration for the Torah. With him law assumes the form of 'an imperious principle opposed to grace and liberty only when it is viewed as the condition of justification, the means of attaining to righteousness before God through the merit of good works.' As the expression of God's will and the guide of human obedience it is 'holy, just, and good' (Ro 7<sup>12</sup>; see E. H. Gifford, Romans [in Speaker's Commentary, 1881, p. 48]). Torah comes to its own in the new life which springs from Christian faith and the unio mystica between the Christian and his Lord. And if other early Christian writers present this life as lived under law (see Epistle of James, especially the happy expression, 'law of liberty,' ch 1<sup>25</sup>; also 1 Jn 3<sup>24</sup>), St. Paul likewise lays stress on 'the law of Christ' (Gal 6<sup>2</sup>) and gives us the far-reaching aphorism: 'Love is the fulfilment of law' (Ro 13<sup>10</sup>).

(b) Freedom from the bondage of sin.—Sin is here personified as a tyrannical master (see especially the line of treatment in Ro 6; cf. Jn 8<sup>34</sup>). An interesting parallel is furnished in the Discourses of Epictetus (iv. i.), where it is laid down that 'no wicked man is free.'

(c) Freedom from the bondage of idolatry.—See Gal 4<sup>8</sup>.—a point of material importance to the Gentile world in apostolic days.

(d) Freedom from the bondage of corruption

(Ro 8-1).—This rather belongs to the hope for the world at large which contemplates the social state wherein the new life is perfectly realized. 'The glory of the children of God' is a liberty which all creation sighs to share.

It remains briefly to point out that not only does the term 'redemption' (applied to the work of Christ in opening to men this new experience of life) derive from the social state in the midst of which Christianity was born, but 'adoption' as used by St. Paul (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>, 23, Gal 4<sup>5</sup>) similarly gains special significance as denoting entrance upon the life of liberty. Adoption, in a general way, was no uncommon phenomenon in the old world (see νόθεα in Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 239), but it was also one recognized way of giving freedom to a slave.

There is no inconsistency but only striking paradox when this experience which is described as freedom is also described as a servitude to God (cf. 1 P 2<sup>16</sup>, θεοῦ δούλοι, and Ro 6<sup>22</sup>, δουλωθέντες τῷ θεῷ). Here, too, it is of interest to recall that it was a Stoic doctrine of liberty that true freedom consists in obeying God, or, as Philo of Alexandria (see Tract, Quod sit liber quisquis virtuti studet) puts it, the following of God. Again, as the Christian is commonly described in the NT as a δοῦλος Χριστοῦ, the singular use of ἀπελευθερος (=libertus, freedman) in 1 Co 7<sup>22</sup> noticeably introduces the notion of enfranchisement to describe the gaining of freedom in Christ. There may be here the underlying thought that the 'freedmen' of Christ stand related to Him somewhat as the liberti stood to their patron, to whom they were bound to render, in the language of Roman Law, obsequium et officium.

LIBYA (Λιβύη, the country of the Libyes or Lubim).—Libya was the name given by the Greeks to the great undefined region lying to the west of Egypt. It was for a long time equivalent to Africa, a Roman term which did not embrace Egypt till the days of Ptolemy (2nd cent. A.D.). Libya was made known to Greece in the 7th cent. B.C. by the Dorian colonists who founded Cyrene. The beautiful and fertile country occupied and developed by them remained independent till it was annexed by the Macedonian conquerors of Egypt in 330 B.C. It finally (in 90 B.C.) came under the power of the Romans, who combined it with Crete to form a single province, Creta-Cyrene. Its original name was revived by Vespasian, who divided Cyrene into Libya Superior and Libya Inferior. This country attracted the Jews at an early period. Philo bears testimony to their diffusion in his time 'from the Katabathmos of Libya (ἀπὸ τοῦ πρὸς Λιβύην καταβαθμοῦ) to the borders of Ethiopia' (in Flaccum, 6). Jews from 'the parts of Libya about Cyrene' (τὰ μέρη τῆς Λιβύης τῆς κατὰ Κυρήνην) were in Jerusalem at the time of the first Christian Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>10</sup>). St. Luke's designation of Cyrenaica closely resembles that of Josephus, ἡ πρὸς Κυρήνην Λιβύη (Ant. XVI. vi. 1), and that of Dio Cassius, Λιβύη ἡ περὶ Κυρήνην (liii. 12). The possession of this fertile region was the bone of contention between the Turks and Italians in 1912

LIFE AND DEATH.—1. Life.—In a consideration of the subject of life as dealt with in the Acts and Epistles, three Gr. words—βίος, ψυχή, and ζωή—require to be distinguished.

(1) βίος denotes life in the outward and visible sense—its period or course (cf. 'the time past of our life,' 1 P 4<sup>3</sup>), its means of living (hence in 1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup> the RV renders 'goods'), the manner in which it is spent (cf. 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life,' 1 Ti 2-), its relation to worldly affairs (2 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>) and to the world's love of pomp and show (1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>).

(2) ψυχή (fr. ψύχω, 'breathe') originally means the breath of life, and in such an expression as 'his life is in him' (Ac 20<sup>10</sup>) would quite adequately be rendered 'breath.' But, as breathing is the sign of the presence in the body of an animating vital force, ψυχή (cf. Lat. anima) comes to mean 'life' in the sense of the animal soul, and especially the life of the individual as distinguished from other individual lives. This is the life that may be injured or lost through a shipwreck (Ac 27<sup>10</sup>, -2), counted dear or willingly surrendered (20<sup>24</sup>, Rev 12<sup>11</sup>); the life which Jesus Christ laid down for His people (1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), and which they should be prepared to lay down for Him (Ac 15<sup>-6</sup>) or for one another (Ro 16<sup>4</sup>, Ph 2<sup>30</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>16</sup>). From meaning the animal soul or life (anima), however, ψυχή comes to be used for the individualized life in its moral and spiritual aspects, the 'soul' in the deeper significance of that word (Lat. animus), the part of man which thinks and feels and wills (Ac 2<sup>7</sup>, Ro 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>23</sup>, etc.). See, further, SOUL.

(3) But of the three words for life ζωή for the purposes of the present article is much the most important. Occasionally it is employed in a way that makes it practically equivalent to βίος (1 Co 15<sup>19</sup>, 'If in this life only we have hoped in Christ'; cf. Lk 16<sup>25</sup>, 'in thy lifetime' [ἐν τῇ ζωῇ σου]), and more frequently in connexions not far removed from those of ψυχή in the sense of the vital energy or animal soul (e.g. Ac 17<sup>-5</sup>, Ja 4<sup>14</sup>), though even in these cases it is noticeable that ζωή does not denote, like ψυχή, the life of the individual, but life in a sense that is general and distributed. Ordinarily, however, ζωή stands for a life which is not existence merely, but existence raised to its highest power; not a bare life, but 'life more abundantly' (Jn 10<sup>10</sup>), a life which St. Paul describes as 'the life which is life indeed' (ἡ οὕτως ζωή, 1 Ti 6<sup>19</sup>), a life, i.e., which in its essential nature is full and overflowing, and in its moral and spiritual quality is perfect and complete. In this employment of it, ζωή is very frequently characterized as 'eternal' (αἰώνιος) life'; but the epithet does not impart any real addition to the connotation of the word as elsewhere used without the adjective, much less restrict its reference to the life after death; it only expresses more explicitly the conception of that life as something so full and positive that from its very nature it is unconquerable by death, and consequently everlasting. See, further, ETERNAL, EVERLASTING.

(a) In the usage of the NT this ζωή or ζωή αἰώνιος is first of all a Divine attribute—a view of it which finds its most complete expression in the Johannine writings. It inheres in God and belongs to His essential nature. 'The Father hath life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>-6</sup>), the life eternal is 'with the Father' (1 Jn 1-). The Father, however, imparts it to the Son, so that He also possesses 'life in himself' (Jn 5<sup>-6</sup>), and possesses it in a manner so copious that this endowment with life is predicated of Him as if it were the most characteristic quality of His being (Jn 1<sup>4</sup>). Thereafter this life which Christ possesses is communicated by Him to those who are willing to receive it, the record being that God gave unto us the eternal life which is in His Son (1 Jn 5<sup>11</sup>), and that he that hath the Son, viz. by believing on His name, hath the life (v. 1<sup>-4</sup>).

(b) The ζωή (αἰώνιος) thus becomes a human possession and quality; and it is with the manifestations in human character and experience of this life flowing from God through Christ that the apostolic writers are principally concerned in what they have to say about it. Their references bear chiefly upon the source from which it comes, the means by which it is obtained, its fruits or evidences, its present possession, and its completion in the world to come.

(a) As follows from the fact that this life inheres essentially in God, its primal source is God the Father, from whom it comes as a gift (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>11</sup>) and a grace (1 P 3<sup>4</sup>). But this gracious gift is manifested and mediated only by Christ (1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>). According to St. John, the eternal life which men enjoy resides in God's Son (1 Jn 5<sup>11</sup>), and that in so absolute a sense that 'he that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life' (v. 1-). Similarly St. Paul writes that it is through the Son that the gift of life is bestowed (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>), describes Christ as 'our life' (Col 3<sup>4</sup>), and declares that this life of ours 'is hid with Christ in God' (v. 3).

(β) But this gift of life is not bestowed arbitrarily or apart from the fulfilment of certain conditions. It is not thrust upon anyone, but needs to be laid hold of (1 Ti 6<sup>12, 19</sup>). In the symbolic language of the Apocalypse the fruition of the tree of life which is in the Paradise of God is promised to him that overcometh (Rev 2<sup>7</sup>). Various energies and attitudes of the soul are mentioned as conditioning the attainment of life, e.g. patience in well-doing (Ro 2<sup>7</sup>), endurance of temptation (Ja 1<sup>1</sup>), sowing to the Spirit (Gal 6<sup>3</sup>). But the fundamental conditions, on which all the others depend, are repentance (Ac 11<sup>18</sup>) and faith (13<sup>48</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>10-12</sup>). The old life must be renounced if the new life is to begin; that is what is meant by the demand for repentance. And life cannot be self-generated, but can only be received from a living source; that is the explanation of the call for faith.

(γ) Among the fruits or evidences of the possession of life St. Paul includes freedom from the bondage of sin (Ro 6<sup>6</sup>) and a way of walking in the world which is new (v. 4) and has God for its object (v. 11). Inwardly the life reveals its presence in a daily experience of renewal (2 Co 4<sup>16</sup>), in the possession of a spiritual mind (Ro 8<sup>6</sup>), in the consciousness of spiritual liberty (v. -). Outwardly its fruits are seen in holy living (Ro 6-), and its signature written even upon the mortal flesh (2 Co 4<sup>11</sup>). To St. John the great evidence of life is love to the brethren (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>). Everyone that loveth is born of God (4<sup>7</sup>); but the love which is the proof of this Divine birth and consequent Divine life must flow outwards the visible brother as well as towards the invisible God if there is to be any assurance of its reality (vv. 12, 20). In the mystical language of the author of the Apocalypse life has the evidence of a written record. The names of those who possess it are written in a book which is called 'the book of life' (Rev 3<sup>5</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>19</sup>), or more fully 'the Lamb's book of life' (13<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>27</sup>). With this may be compared St. Paul's use of the same figure in Ph 4<sup>3</sup>. See BOOK OF LIFE.

(δ) To the apostolic writers life or eternal life is a present possession. While distinct from the ordinary forms of earthly existence, with which it is contrasted (1 Ti 6<sup>19</sup>), it is not separated from them in time, but here and now interfused dynamically through them all. This is a conception which is especially characteristic of the Johannine writings. In the Fourth Gospel it occurs constantly (Jn 3<sup>38</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> etc.), and in the First Epistle we see it reappearing, as when the writer declares that he that hath the Son hath the life (1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>), and that those who possess eternal life may know that they possess it (3<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>13</sup>). But it is evident that St. Paul also conceives of life as a present reality when he proclaims that Christ is our life (Col 3<sup>4</sup>), and that our life is hid with Christ in God (v. 3), when he makes our baptism into Christ's Death, and resurrection in His likeness, determinative of our present walk in newness of life (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>), and declares that to be spiritually-minded is life and peace (8<sup>6</sup>).

(ε) And yet this life, though it is a present experience, is not realized in its totality in the present world. The promise given to godliness in 1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup> is said to be for the life that now is and that which is to come. Similarly it is in 'the time to come' that 'the life which is life indeed' arrives at its completion (6<sup>19</sup>). St. Paul gives especial prominence to this future aspect of the life in Christ. He anticipates a time when what is mortal shall be swallowed up of life (2 Co 5<sup>4</sup>), co-ordinates eternal life with immortality (Ro 2<sup>7</sup>; cf. 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>), and places it in direct antithesis with death (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>) and corruption (Gal 6-). And yet, though life for its completeness must wait for the full revelation of the powers of the world to come, which are only tasted here (He 6<sup>5</sup>), the present and the future life are essentially one and the same. It is because the Christian life is hid with Christ in God that it carries the assurance of immortality within itself. As, in St. Peter's language, it was not possible that Christ should be holden of death (Ac 2<sup>-4</sup>), so it is impossible that those whose very life Christ is (Col 3<sup>4</sup>) should not be sharers in His victory over death's pains and powers. To all who abide in the Son and through Him in the Father there belongs this promise which He promised us, even the life eternal (1 Jn 2<sup>-46</sup>). And in this promise there lies enfolded the hope not only of the immortality of the soul but of the resurrection of the body. It is the frailty and imperfection of the earthly body, its domination by the law of sin and death, that hinder the full enjoyment of eternal life in the present world (2 Co 5<sup>3-4</sup>). But when mortality shall be swallowed up of life, Christ's people, instead of being 'unclothed,' shall be 'clothed upon' (5<sup>-4</sup>). To the natural body will succeed a spiritual body (1 Co 15<sup>44</sup>), to the body of death (Ro 7<sup>24</sup>) a body instinct with the Lord's own life, to the house that must be dissolved a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens (2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>).

2. Death (θάνατος, to which in its various senses correspond the vb. ἀποθνήσκω, 'die,' and the adj. νεκρός, 'dead'). — Death is frequently used in the apostolic literature in its ordinary, everyday meaning of the end of man's earthly course (βίος) or the extinction of his animal life (ψυχή) through the separation of the soul from the body (Ac 2<sup>-3</sup>, 1 Co 3-, Ph 2<sup>27</sup>). Much more important than this purely physical employment of the word are its various theological uses, the chief of which may be distinguished as the punitive, the redemptive, the mystical, the spiritual and moral.

(1) For the NT writers, and above all for St. Paul, death has a punitive significance as the judicial sentence pronounced by God upon sin. When St. Paul writes, 'The wages of sin is death' (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>), or 'Through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin; and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned' (5<sup>12</sup>); or when the author of Hebrews links together the facts of death and the judgment and relates them to the Death and redeeming Sacrifice of Christ (He 9<sup>26-28</sup>): or when St. James says, 'He which converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and shall cover a multitude of sins' (Ja 5<sup>-9</sup>), death is used to denote the punitive consequences of sin and the state in which man lies as condemned on account of it. For, just as ζωή in the NT means not the earthly existence but the larger life of the Christian salvation, so θάνατος means not the end of the earthly existence merely but the loss of life in the full Christian conception of the word—the whole of the miserable results that flow from sin and constitute its penalty. Among these penal consequences certainly physical death is included, as passages like Ro 5<sup>12, 14</sup> and 1 Co 15<sup>11</sup> make perfectly clear. More than this, the death of the body is treated as 'the point of the punitive sentence, about which all the other elements in that sentence are grouped' (H. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex.<sup>3</sup>, 1880, p. 234). Death is the wages of sin (Ro 6<sup>23</sup>), it is the recompense received by the servants of sin (v. 16). Sin reigns in death (5<sup>1</sup>); it is the sting of death (1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>). The saving significance of the Death of Christ is due to this same punitive relation between death and sin. Hedied for our sins (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>); He bare our sins in His body upon the tree (1 P 2<sup>24</sup>). And it is through the Death of His Son that we are reconciled to God (Ro 5<sup>10</sup>). In including physical death among the penalties of sin, however, the apostolic writers are not to be held as meaning either that man was naturally immortal or that until he fell there was no natural law of death in the physical world. In neither the OT nor the NT is the assertion ever made that death entered into the natural world in consequence of the sin of man (the 'world' in Ro 5<sup>12</sup> is the moral world, as the context shows). And when man became liable to death because of sin (Ro 5<sup>12, 14</sup>; cf. Gn 2<sup>17</sup>), this does not imply that he was not created mortal (cf. Gn 3<sup>19</sup>). But it does imply that, mortal as he was, he differed from the rest of the animal world in a potentiality of exemption from the law of decay and death, owing to the fact that he was a spiritual being made in God's image; and that by his transgression he lost God's proffered gift of physical immortality (Ro 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>14</sup>).

But, while physical death is the point of the punitive sentence, the sentence of death stretches far beyond it. Just as ζωή has a future and other-worldly as well as a present reference, so is it with θάνατος. Sometimes it plainly refers to a death that is not an earthly experience but a future state of misery which awaits the wicked in the world to come (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>16</sup>). In Rev 2<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>6, 14</sup> 21<sup>8</sup> this future condition of woe is called 'the second death,' in contrast, viz., with the first death by which the life on earth is ended (see PUNISHMENT).

(2) At the other extreme from this punitive sense of death is the use of the word with a redemptive meaning. When St. Paul declares in Romans that we died to sin (6<sup>2</sup>), that we were buried through baptism into death (v. 4), that he that hath died is justified from sin (v. 11); or when in Galatians he says of himself, 'For I through the law died unto the law' (2<sup>19</sup>), the death he speaks of, as the last passage shows, is a legal or judicial death which carries with it a deliverance from the state of condemnation into which the sinner has been brought by his sin (Ro 6<sup>7</sup>). And when he speaks of this death as a dying with Christ (v. 8), and explains more fully that all died because one died for all (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>), he reminds us that this redemptive death is possible for Christians only because a punitive Death was endured by Christ on their behalf. If they can reckon themselves to be dead unto sin (Ro 6<sup>11</sup>), it is because 'Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>).

(3) Side by side with this redemptive death in Christ—a death to the penalty of sin—St. Paul sets a mystical dying—a dying to its power. The Christian's union with Christ in His redeeming Death is not only the ground of his justification but the secret source and spring of his sanctification. If the transition from the one to the other is not very clearly marked, the reason is that for St. Paul the two were inseparably joined together. He passes at a bound, and as it were unconsciously, from the legal aspect of the Christian's death in Christ to its mystical aspect, from a death in the eyes of the law against sin to a death to the principle of sin itself (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>). Baptism into Jesus Christ is the symbol and seal of a baptism into His Death, which means not only a dying to the retribution of the offended law but a crucifixion of the old man, a destruction of 'the body of sin,' so that we should no longer be in bondage to sin's power (Ro 6<sup>6-7</sup>; cf. Gal 2<sup>12</sup>). It may be that St. Paul's view of the body, not indeed as essentially sinful, but as the invariable seat and source of sin in fallen humanity (see art. BODY) helped him to think of the Crucifixion of Christ as carrying with it a destruction of the polluted flesh (cf. Ro 8<sup>3</sup>) through which the way was opened for a new life of holiness. But in any case death to the law meant life unto God, because crucifixion with Christ meant the death of the former self and the substitution for it of a life of faith in the Son of God (Gal 2<sup>19</sup>). Nor is it only to sin that the Christian died in Christ, but to the world (6<sup>14</sup>), to the world's doctrines and precepts (Col 2<sup>8-9</sup>), to the attitude and affections of the mind that is set on earthly things (3-). 'For ye died,' the Apostle writes, 'and your life is hid with Christ in God' (v. 3). And in this case, at least, it is plain that the death of which he thinks is not the judicial but the mystical dying, the dying which is at the same time the birth to a new life (cf. Jn 12<sup>46</sup>) that carries with it a putting to death of all that is earthly and evil in the natures of those whom Christ has redeemed (Col 3<sup>5</sup>).

(4) Once more, death is used to denote the spiritual atrophy and moral inability of fallen man in his unregenerate condition. This is the sense that belongs to it in the expression 'dead in trespasses and sins' (Eph 2<sup>1</sup>; cf. Col 2<sup>13</sup>), in the summons to the spiritual sleeper to awake and arise from the dead (Eph 5<sup>14</sup>), in the description of true believers as those that are alive from the dead (Ro 6<sup>13</sup>) and of false professors as having a name that they are living when they are really dead (Rev 3<sup>1</sup>), in the statements that the mind of the flesh is death (Ro 8<sup>6</sup>) and that the woman who lives in pleasure is dead while she liveth (1 Ti 5<sup>6</sup>). This, especially on the side of moral inability, is the death which St. Paul describes so powerfully in Ro 7<sup>14ff</sup>, from which, conscious of his helplessness, he cries to be delivered (v. 24), and from which he recognizes that no deliverance is possible except through the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus (8<sup>2</sup>).

LIGHT AND DARKNESS.—Apart from the literal and ordinary uses of the words 'light' (φως) and 'darkness' (σκότος, σκορία), they are frequently employed in metaphorical senses, and especially either in express combination and contrast or with a reference to each other that is latent but implied. This figurative use of the terms is an inheritance from the OT. There 'light' (אור=LXX φῶς) often denotes a state of happiness and well-being (Job 33<sup>23, 30</sup>, Ps 56<sup>13</sup>), but more particularly the salvation which comes from God, and God Himself as the giver of salvation and blessing to His people (Ps 4<sup>6</sup> 27<sup>1</sup> 36<sup>9</sup> 43<sup>3</sup>, Is 10<sup>17</sup>, Mic 7<sup>8</sup>). 'Darkness' (ἄνθη=LXX σκοτός), on the other hand, stands for ignorance, misery, and death (Job 10<sup>21</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>, Ps 18<sup>29</sup> 107<sup>10, 14</sup>, Ec 2<sup>14</sup>, Is 5<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>2</sup>, etc.), and generally for everything that is opposed to light as a symbol of life, happiness, and moral purity. The metaphors are very natural, and are by no means peculiar to the biblical literature. Reference may be made to the Babylonian Creation narrative with its struggle between Marduk, the god of light, and Tiamat, the god of darkness; to the Skr. name for deity—deva, 'a shining one' (cf. θεός and deus); to the Gr. conception of Olympus as a place where a bright radiance is diffused (cf. λευκή δ' ἐπιδέδρομεν ἀτλή, Od. vi. 45), and of the nether regions as a world of gloomy shades occupied by 'infernal' or subterranean deities; to the Zoroastrian antithesis—hardened into a definite dualism—between Ormazd, the god of light and life, and Ahriman, the evil power of death and darkness. But as we find them in the NT, and especially in the Johanneine and Pauline writings, the figures of light and darkness have been developed on Christian lines which impart a deeper and fuller meaning to each of the conceptions, and bring them into an opposition that is stronger than any known to the older religions, because it is more spiritual. The material relevant to the present art. may be conveniently treated as it bears upon the doctrines of (1) God, (2) Christ, (3) salvation and the Christian life.

1. God.—The fundamental passage here is 1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup>, 'God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.' The conception of God as light is familiar, as has been seen, not only to the OT but to all ancient religious thought. But in the Christian view the physical conceptions of light and darkness which cling to the ethnic and even to the Hebrew theologies entirely disappear, and purely spiritual conceptions take their place. In this passage, as the context shows (cf. vv. 6-10), 'light' stands for holiness and 'darkness' for sin. In 1 Ti 6<sup>16</sup>, again, where God is represented as dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, the metaphor of light is transferred from God Himself to His dwelling-place, with reference probably to Ex 33<sup>18-23</sup>. But the idea conveyed is that of a holiness that is absolute in its separateness from all human imperfection (cf. vv. 9-14). In Ja 1<sup>17</sup> God is called 'the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning.' And here also the idea of this light without shadow or eclipse is used to emphasize the fact, previously referred to, of the essential holiness of One who cannot be tempted with evil and who Himself tempteth no man (v. 13).

The darkness against which God's holy light shines is sometimes represented impersonally (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>). But in Col 1<sup>13</sup> St. Paul gives thanks to the Father 'who delivered us out of the power of darkness' (cf. Lk 22<sup>53</sup>); and the word for power (ἐξουσία) suggests the tyranny of an alien authority. This is confirmed when in Eph 6<sup>1</sup> we find the Apostle speaking of the 'world-rulers of this darkness, the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places.' When we read in 2 Co 11<sup>14</sup>, 'Even Satan fashioneth himself into an angel of light,' the evident suggestion is that Satan's true form is that of a prince of darkness, not an angel of light. In Ac 26<sup>18</sup> there is a significant parallelism between darkness and the power of Satan on the one hand, and light and the redeeming grace of God on the other; and in 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup> there is a

2. Christ.—As applied to God, the metaphor of light points to His essential nature; as applied to Christ, it denotes His special function as the revealer of God to man. In the one case the light is considered in its intrinsic glory; in the other, as shining forth upon the souls of men. It is in the Fourth Gospel that this conception of Christ as the light of men—a light by which they are at once illumined and judged—is fully worked out (cf. for the illumination Jn 1<sup>4, 9</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>46</sup>, and for the judgment 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>19-41</sup>). But in 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup> St. Paul declares that God has revealed the light of the knowledge of His glory in the face of Jesus Christ, and in Eph 5<sup>8</sup> he says of those who were once in darkness that they are now 'light in the Lord.' Similarly in 1 Jn 2<sup>8</sup>, where the revelation of Jesus Christ and His 'new commandment' are in view, the author declares: 'The darkness is passing away, and the true light already shineth.' In these passages the reference is to Christ's function as mediating the gracious Divine light to men and thus bringing them knowledge and salvation. But in 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup> Christ appears as a Judge, who by His coming 'will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts.' In this case, however, the penetrating judicial light of Christ is eschatologically conceived, and is not, as in the Fourth Gospel, a light by which men are already judged when they love the darkness rather than the light.

3. Salvation and the Christian life.—It is in this connexion that the metaphors of light and darkness most frequently occur in the relevant NT literature. (1) Christian soteriology has to do with sin and grace; and these two contrasted moments of human experience find fitting representation in terms of darkness and light. Salvation is frequently described as a transition from darkness to light. St. Paul was sent to the Gentiles 'to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light' (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>; cf. 13<sup>47</sup>); he says of his converts: 'Ye were once darkness, but are now light in the Lord' (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>); and so elsewhere he addresses them as 'sons of light and sons of the day,' who 'are not of the night nor of darkness' (1 Th 5<sup>5</sup>). In 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup> he compares the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, as it shines into the heart in the face of Jesus Christ, to the creative light shining at God's word out of the darkness. St. Peter contrasts the marvellous light into which God has called His people with the darkness in which they lived formerly (1 P 2<sup>9</sup>); while St. John, with a stronger sense perhaps of the progressive nature of the work of sanctification, reminds his 'little children' that the darkness is passing away before the shining of the true light (1 Jn 2<sup>8</sup>). The author of Hebrews uses the expression 'enlightened' (φωτισθέντες) to denote those who have had experience of the Christian salvation (6<sup>4</sup> 10<sup>32</sup>), by which he implies that before tasting of the heavenly gift they were in a condition of spiritual darkness.

(2) In Col 1<sup>12</sup> soteriology passes into eschatology. Christians have been already delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son; but 'the inheritance of the saints in light,' of which the Father has made them meet to be partakers, has clearly a future as well as a present reference (cf. Ro 13<sup>12</sup>, 'the night is far spent, the day is at hand'). In the world to come the inheritance of the saints in light has its counterpart in 'the blackness of darkness' spoken of in 2 P 2<sup>17</sup>, Jude 13. For those who reject the light of the Divine grace, because they prefer the darkness to the light, there is reserved a deeper and impenetrable darkness.

(3) But salvation has a human and ethical side as well as one that is transcendent and Divine; and this also is set forth under the imagery of light and darkness. When St. Paul declares that 'the fruit of the light is in all goodness and righteousness and truth' (Eph 5<sup>8</sup> [RV]), and contrasts that shining fruit with 'the unfruitful works of darkness' (v. 11), he is giving to light and darkness a plain moral content. When he asks in another Epistle, 'What communion hath light with darkness?' (2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>), the words that precede show that it is the antithesis between righteousness and unrighteousness that is in his thoughts. And when, after comparing the world as it exists at present with the night, and the approaching Parousia with the day, he adds, 'Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light' (Ro 13<sup>12</sup>; cf. 1 Th 5<sup>7,8</sup>), he is summoning his readers to that deliberate and strenuous choice and effort of the will in which all morality consists. Those who in the soteriological sense are already 'sons of light and sons of the day,' and accordingly 'are not of the night nor of darkness' (1 Th 5<sup>5</sup>), are not on that account exempt from the dangers of the encompassing moral and spiritual gloom or from the duties to which those dangers point. On the contrary, just because they are sons of the light they must gird on the armour of light, and because they are not of the darkness they must watch and be sober (vv. 6-8). Similarly in 1 Jn 1<sup>6</sup>, the writer calls upon his readers to 'walk in the light as Christ is in the light,' and brands as false those who profess to have fellowship with Him and yet continue to walk in darkness. And if they should ask for a definite test by which the moral life may be judged and its relationship to light or darkness determined, he refers them to the new commandment which the Lord has given (2<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jn 13<sup>34</sup>). 'He that loveth his brother abideth in the light' (2<sup>10</sup>). 'But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness' (v. 11).

LIGHTNING (ἀστραπή).—Lightning, the visible discharge of atmospheric electricity from one cloud to another, or from a cloud to the earth, is now known to be essentially the same as the electric flashes produced in the laboratory. To the ancients it seemed supernatural. Terrible in its dazzling beauty and power to destroy, it was associated with theophanies (Ex 19<sup>16</sup> 20<sup>18</sup>, Ezk 1<sup>13,14</sup>), and became one of the categories of Jewish and Christian apocalyptic (Rev 4<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>). LIKENESS.—See FORM.

LINEN (βύσσος, from βύσσις, adj. βύσσινος, λινον).—Linen was a characteristic product of Egypt, where the arts of spinning and weaving were carried to great perfection. Both in that land and in other lands to which it was imported it was the material used for priestly vestments. According to Herodotus (ii. 37), the Egyptian priests 'wear linen garments, constantly fresh washed, and they pay particular attention to this. . . . The priests wear linen only.' The Hebrew usage is indicated by the phrase 'the linen garments, even the holy garments' (Lv 16<sup>32</sup>); and Vergil (Æn. xii. 120) speaks of Roman priests as 'Velati lino, et verbera tempora vincti.' Linen—at least the best kind of it (βύσσος, or 'fine linen')—was too expensive for ordinary wear. It was the clothing of kings and their ministers (Gn 41<sup>42</sup>), of women of quality (Pr 31<sup>22</sup>), of ideal Israel in her royal estate (Ezk 16<sup>10,13</sup>).

These facts explain the references to linen in the imagery of the Revelation. (1) The seven angelic messengers who come out of the heavenly temple are 'arrayed in linen, pure and bright' (15<sup>8</sup>). In spite of good MS authority (AC) and the dubious parallel in Ezk 28<sup>13</sup>, the reading 'arrayed with precious stones' (RV)—λίθον for λινον—is extremely unlikely, and N has λινους. It is true that λινον was commonly applied to the flax-plant, but it was also used of linen cloth and garments (Il. ix. 661, Æsch. Supp. 121, 132). (2) Fine linen was part of the merchandise of Imperial Rome (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>); the city was arrayed in it (v. 16), the old republican simplicity having given place to a wide-spread luxury. (3) It is befitting that the bride of the Lamb arrays herself in fine linen, bright and pure (19<sup>8</sup>). The added words, 'for the fine linen is the righteous acts (δικαιώματα) of the saints' is perhaps a gloss. It is a happy inspiration that makes 'fine linen,' the clothing of priests and princes, the uniform of the armies in heaven that follow Him who is the Faithful and True (v. 14).

LINUS (Λίνος).—This is a name which holds a large place in the history of the early Church. We first find mention of it in 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, where St. Paul, writing from his Roman prison, conveys to his friend the greetings of Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, and Claudia. Linus was thus a friend of Paul and Timothy in the closing years of the Apostle's life. In the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) he is regarded as the son of Claudia of 2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup> (Λίνος ὁ Κλαυδίας), which is perhaps doubtful (see art. CLAUDIA). But the name Linus is found both in Irenæus (c. Hær. iii. iii. 3) and in Eusebius (HE iii. ii., iv. 9, xiii.), where he is regarded as the successor of St. Peter and the first bishop of Rome after the Apostles, although Tertullian (de Præscr. 32) assigns this dignity to Clement. No details of any kind are given regarding the episcopate of Linus, and the date of his tenure of office is uncertain. Although Eusebius regards Clement as the successor of Linus, and Tertullian reverses the order, it is not improbable that both held office at the same time and that the episcopal power as wielded by them was of a very attenuated nature. Perhaps both held their position during the lifetime of St. Peter. According to Eusebius (HE iii. xiii.) the episcopate of Linus lasted for a period of twelve years, but no dates can be fixed with any certainty. Harnack gives as probable A.D. 64-76. Linus has been regarded as the author of various works, but there is no evidence in support of this view. He is the reported author of (1) the Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul; (2) an account of St. Peter's controversy with Simon Magus; (3) certain decrees prohibiting women from appearing in church with uncovered heads. The Roman Breviary states that he was a native of Voltena in Etruria, and that he died as a martyr of the faith, being beheaded by order of Saturninus, whose daughter he had healed of demoniacal possession. His memory is honoured by the Western Church on 23 September, and the Greek Menæa regards him as one of the Seventy.

W. F. BOYD.

LION.—With the possible exception of 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>, the use of 'lion' in the NT from 2 Tim. onwards is dependent on the OT. An animal of great size and strength, of noble bearing as well as of extreme cruelty, he is a fitting symbol for moral and spiritual reference.

1. In 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>, man's adversary, the devil, is represented as always roaming about in search of prey, his very raging, which betrays his ravenous hunger, striking terror into the hearts of all.

2. In He 11<sup>33</sup>, the reference is to the actual wild beast. Among the heroic deeds of the worthies of the OT recounted by the author of the Epistle is that they 'stopped the mouths of lions' (cf. Samson, Jg 14<sup>5, 6</sup>; David, 1 S 17<sup>34-36</sup>; Benaiah, 2 S 23<sup>9</sup>). More remotely the story of Daniel suggests this mighty achievement, yet here God and not Daniel is said to have shut the lions' mouths (Dn 6<sup>22</sup>).

3. St. Paul declares that he had 'escaped the mouth of the lion' (2 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>; cf. Ps 22<sup>21</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>60</sup>). The allusion of the Apostle is to the punishment of being thrown to the lions. Some have indeed permitted a literal interpretation of 'lion' (A. Neander, History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., i. [1880] 345). Since, however, he was a Roman citizen and could claim the right of being beheaded (see BEAST), the more probable explanation is that the reference is not to an actual lion. Concerning this, various conjectures have been advanced. 'Lion' has been interpreted as Nero (Chrysostom); calamity, which would result from cowardice and humiliation (N. J. D. White, in EGT, '1 and 2 Timothy and Titus,' 1910, p. 182; cf. Ps 21<sup>22, 23</sup> [LXX]); 'the immediate peril' (Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 593), although the reference may be to St. Paul's having established his right as a Roman citizen not to be exposed to the wild beasts. If, however, the reference is to the lion's mouth, then Satan may be intended as a devouring adversary (cf. 1 P 5<sup>8</sup>, above), from which St. Paul had escaped. The time, place, and occasion of this reference have been variously conceived. (a) 2 Ti 4<sup>9, 11-13, 20, 21</sup> is a fragment, written from Caesarea, inserted in the Epistle, alluding to his address before the Sanhedrin (cf. Ac 22<sup>30</sup> 23<sup>11</sup>; B. W. Bacon, The Story of St. Paul, 1905, p. 198 ff.). (b) Writing from Rome in his first imprisonment, he says that, although the result of the preliminary hearing was a suspension of judgment, yet he had expectation that he would escape a final condemnation, and that too in the immediate future (A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 421). Writing from Rome in his second imprisonment, St. Paul says that at the close of his first imprisonment his pleading was so cogent and convincing that he was set at liberty (Eusebius, HE ii. 22, 1 Clem. 5; cf. T. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 441, ii. 1 ff.). (c) After his arrival in Rome the second time, the preliminary investigation had resulted in his remand; but the completion of the trial would not eventuate so favourably (Conybeare-Howson, op. cit. ch. xxvi.; N. J. D. White, op. cit. 181 ff.).

4. In the Apocalypse (5<sup>5</sup>) the Exalted Christ is presented under the guise of a lion, where the undoubted reference is to Gn 49<sup>9</sup>. He, who had overcome through death and the Resurrection, who had thus opened a way to God's sovereignty over men, and is therefore alone able to loose the seals of the Divine judgment, i.e. to carry history forward to its consummation, is symbolized by a being of the highest prowess and strength. Yet no sooner has this suggestion of overmastering might become effective than it is withdrawn to give place to another—its exact opposite—that of a lamb as though slain, a symbol of sacrifice and humiliation (see LAMB).

5. The same intimation of majesty and strength occurs in Rev 4<sup>7</sup>, where the Seer is taken up into heaven, and beholds the four and twenty elders about the throne, with the four living creatures, having the likeness respectively of a lion, a calf, the face of a man, and a flying eagle (cf. Ezk 1<sup>5ff.</sup> [esp. v. 10] 10<sup>14</sup>; also Is 6<sup>5ff.</sup>).

6. The remaining references in the Apocalypse revert to the terrorizing aspect of this king of beasts (9<sup>3</sup> [cf. Jl 1<sup>6</sup>] 9<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>8</sup> [cf. Is 5-9] 13<sup>2</sup> [cf. Dn 7<sup>4ff.</sup>]).

LIPS.—See MOUTH.

LIVING.—1. Outside of the Gospels 'living' does not occur as a noun in the AV of the NT, but is found three times in the RV, viz. in 1 P 1<sup>15</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>11</sup>, where it denotes the manner of life (AV 'conversation,' Gr. αναστροφή), and in Rev 18<sup>17</sup>, where 'gain their living (i.e. means of life) by sea' represents the AV 'trade by sea,' the RVm 'work the sea,' Gr. την θάλασσαν ἐργαζονται.

2. 'Living' as a verb is found in both the AV and the RV of Col 2<sup>20</sup>, 'living in the world,' where the Gr. is ζωντες; and Tit 3<sup>3</sup>, 'living in malice' (Gr. διάγοντες).

3. The adj. 'living' (Gr. ζων) occurs frequently and is used with various shades of meaning.—(1) In the ordinary sense of being alive in contrast with dead (Ro 12<sup>14</sup> 19, RV of Rev 1<sup>18</sup>). In Ac 10<sup>42</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup> both the AV and the RV translate ζωντες by 'quick.' In the 'living soul' of 1 Co 15<sup>45</sup> and Rev 16<sup>3</sup> the word has the same meaning; in the latter passage, however, the literal rendering of the Gr. is 'soul of life' (RVm).—(2) The 'living creatures' (RV; AV 'beasts'; Gr. ζωα, being the LXX equivalent of נֶחֱם in Ezk 1<sup>5</sup>, etc.) of Rev 4<sup>6, 8</sup>, etc., are so called as being not alivemere, but instinct with life and activity (cf. Ezk 1<sup>4</sup>).—(3) With an intensified force the word is used of God, who is called 'the living God' (Ac 14<sup>15</sup>, Ro 9<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>17</sup> [AV], He 3<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>22</sup>, Rev 7<sup>2</sup>) not only as being self-existent, but as possessing the fullness of life in absolute perfection.—(4) Figuratively, the expression is applied to the oracles given by God to Moses (Ac 7<sup>38</sup>, AV 'lively'); to the word of God generally (He 4<sup>12</sup>, AV 'quick'); to the way into the holy place which Jesus dedicated for us (10<sup>-9</sup>); to the hope unto which God has begotten us by the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, AV 'lively'); to the Stone rejected of men but with God elect, precious (2<sup>4</sup>), and the stones built up on that foundation into a spiritual house (v. 5, AV 'lively'); to the fountains of waters to which the Lamb shall lead His people (Rev 7<sup>17</sup> TR and AV; RV 'fountains of waters of life'). The precise force of 'living' in each of these cases is determined by the word to which it is attached and the context in which it is set. The word of God is living because, being God's, it is instinct with His own life; the way into the holy place because it is real and efficacious, as contrasted with the mere ceremony of entrance into the earthly sanctuary; the Christian hope because it is the result of a Divine begetting, and is therefore lasting and certain of fruition as human hopes are not; the heavenly fountains because they are ever 'springing up unto eternal life' (cf. Jn 4<sup>10, 14</sup>). The elect Stone and the stones built upon it are living stones because the persons whom they metaphorically represent are living persons—the One alive with the very life of God, the others sharing in that life through their union with Him.

J. C. LAMBERT.

LOCUST (ἀκρίς).—Apart from Mt 3<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>, the only references to the locust in the NT are contained in the Apocalyptic Vision—'the Fifth Trumpet or the First Woe' (Rev 9<sup>3-7</sup>)—where a swarm of locusts is represented as emerging out of the smoke of the abyss. There is probably here an allusion to the plague of locusts in Ex 10<sup>4ff.</sup> (cf. also Jl 1<sup>4</sup>), but both the power and the mission of these locusts are not that of the locust tribe. They have the power of 'scorpions,' the deadliness of whose sting was proverbial (cf. 1 K 12<sup>11, 14</sup>, 2 Ch 10<sup>11</sup>, Ezk 2<sup>6</sup>, Lk 10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>12</sup>), while in contradistinction to the usual habits and tastes of locusts, they are commanded not to hurt 'the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree.' Apparently the work of judgment on this part of creation had been sufficiently carried out by the hail which followed the First Trumpet (Rev 8<sup>7</sup>). It is interesting in this connexion both to compare and to contrast the part played by locusts in Exodus. There too they follow the hail, but in Exodus (10<sup>5</sup>) their mission is to 'eat the residue of that which is escaped, which remaineth unto you from the hail,' and to 'eat every tree which groweth for you out of the field,' whereas here they have a more important vocation—they are sent forth as the messengers of God's wrath upon 'those men which have not the seal of God on their foreheads' (Rev 9<sup>4</sup>), whom they are to torment with 'the torment of a scorpion' for 'five months.'

The appearance of these particular locusts is as unusual and unexpected as their mission (9<sup>7-10</sup>). 'The shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle': this part of the description would indeed be equally applicable to an ordinary swarm of locusts; it is borrowed from Jl 2<sup>4</sup>, and is a metaphor 'chosen partly on account of their speed and compact array, but chiefly on account of a resemblance which has often been observed between the head of a locust and the head of a horse' (see Driver, ad loc.). The next two features are peculiar to the locusts of the vision; they had 'crowns' on their heads 'like unto gold,' and 'their faces were as men's faces.' The crowns are indicative of their power and authority, while their human faces testify to the wisdom and capacity with which they were imbued. Further, they had 'hair as the hair of women,' and it has been supposed that we have here a reference to the long antennæ of locusts.

The locust belongs to the same genus as the grass-hopper (Acrididae). There is a number of different kinds, but the most destructive are the Edipoda migratoria and the Acridium peregrinum, of which the latter apparently predominate. The history of their development is somewhat strange: after emerging from the egg, which is laid in April or May, they enter the larva state, during which period they have no wings; in the pupa state, germinal wings enclosed in cases appear; while about a month later, they cast the pupa skin, and, borne on their newly emancipated wings, they soar into the air. Their hind-wings are generally very bright-coloured, being yellow, green, blue, scarlet, crimson, or brown, according to the species. It is noteworthy that, unlike moths, they pass through no chrysalis period. They only appear in swarms periodically, and when they do, they literally darken the sky (cf. Ex 10<sup>15</sup>), while the rattle of their wings is like a fall of rain (cf. Jl 2<sup>5</sup>). In the drier parts of the country they are at all times abundant, and are a constant source of annoyance to the husbandmen, whose crops they sometimes entirely devour. The larvæ are responsible for most of the havoc wrought; as they are unable to fly, they hop over the land around which they were hatched and destroy grass, plants, and shrubs promiscuously. It is, on the other hand, easier to drive off full-grown locusts that can fly, as they are quickly frightened; but at all stages of their development they are extremely voracious.

They are used as an article of diet by the natives to-day, just as they were in NT times, the legs and wings being first removed, and the body stewed with butter or oil. They are said to taste somewhat like shrimps.

LOIS (Gr. Λοῖς).—The word Lois is of Greek origin, related to λῶν and λῶστος, 'pleasant,' 'desirable.' Lois was a Christian believer of Lystra and the grandmother of Timothy. Her name is mentioned in 2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> along with Eunice (q.v.), the mother of Timothy. Probably Lois was a Jewess and the mother of Eunice, who in Ac 16<sup>1</sup> is described as a believing Jewess who had married a Greek. It is, however, not impossible that Lois may have been the mother-in-law of Eunice and a Gentile, in which case we must assume that she had married a Jew. This theory would account for the fact that both Lois and Eunice are Greek names, and also for the description of Eunice as a Jewess. But it was not uncommon for Hellenistic Jews to bear purely Gentile names, and the supposition that Lois was the mother of Eunice is on the whole more probable.

The Apostle refers to her 'unfeigned faith,' by which he no doubt means that Lois had accepted Christian faith, and not merely that she cherished the ancient faith of Israel. As we find Eunice described as a 'Jewess who believed' on the occasion of St. Paul's second visit to Lystra, probably both she and Lois were converted on the Apostle's first visit to the town. Timothy's knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures to which the Apostle refers (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>) was probably due not only to his mother but also to Lois, whom we may regard as a faithful Jewish matron attached to the ancient hopes of Judaism, and who, influenced by her knowledge of the Scriptures, readily accepted St. Paul's message on his first visit to Lystra. W. F. BOYD.

The Hebrew אָפַק אָפַק and the Greek μακρόθυμος absolutely coincide in their verbal structure. None the less there is to be noted a difference in the basic figure underlying each, which will explain the difference in usage. The Hebrew אָפַק specifically means 'anger,' 'wrath,' and accordingly the אָפַק 'א is one who is 'long,' in the sense of 'long-delaying' his anger; hence in many cases the word is rendered by 'slow to anger' in the English Bible. On the other hand, θυμός in μακρόθυμος does not specifically denote 'anger,' but has the general meaning of 'temper,' although it can also have the former specialized sense. A μακρόθυμος is therefore he who keeps his temper long, and this can be understood with reference to wilful provocation by man, in which case it will mean the exercise of restraint from anger; or with reference to trying circumstances and persons, in which case it will mean the exercise of patience. The Greek term thus comes to have a double meaning whilst the Hebrew equivalent has only one, never being used in the sense of 'patience.' Jer 15<sup>15</sup> is no exception to this, for when the prophet here prays, 'Take me not away in thy longsuffering,' he relates the longsuffering to his persecutors, and expresses the fear that God's deferring their punishment may result in his own death.

μακροθυμία is in the NT employed in both senses—that of 'longsuffering' and that of 'patience'—with reference to both God and man. The only instance of the meaning 'patience' in its application to God seems to be Lk 18<sup>7</sup>. Here it is said that God will 'avenge his elect that cry to him day and night (καὶ μακροθυμεῖ ἐπ' αὐτοῖς) although he is longsuffering over them.' The αὐτοῖς does not have for its antecedent the persecutors of the elect, but the elect themselves. The meaning is that God proceeds slowly and patiently in attending to their case (cf. 2 P 3<sup>9</sup>: βαδυνεῖ, 'the Lord is not slack concerning his promise'). In all other cases the word when used of God denotes specifically the restraint of His anger and the deferring of the execution thereof (= ὀργή); thus Ro 2<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>22</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>20</sup>.

This Divine longsuffering is exercised with a two-fold purpose: (a) to give its objects time for repentance (Ro 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>9-15</sup>); (b) to gain time and prepare the opportunity for the execution of His purpose in other respects (Ro 9<sup>2</sup>; here the 'enduring with longsuffering of the vessels of wrath' is placed side by side with the purpose of God [θέλειν] to show His wrath, and the μακροθυμία does not imply a reversal or suspense of this purpose [so Weiss], but simply a delay in its execution, among other things for the reason stated in v. 23, 'that he might make known the riches of his glory upon vessels of mercy').

μακροθυμία as exercised by men towards men may be both 'longsuffering' and 'patience.' It is not always easy to tell with certainty which of the two is in the mind of the writer, but in a case like Col 1<sup>11</sup>, where ὑπομονή, 'patience,' and μακροθυμία, 'longsuffering,' occur together, the meaning is plain. Trench (NT Synonyms<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 191) observes that μακροθυμία always refers to persons, never to things. This is not quite correct, for He 6<sup>12-15</sup> proves that it can be used in respect to circumstances or things as well as to persons. Patience can be exercised with reference to trying persons as well as to trying circumstances; and, from the nature of the case, where the former happens the distinction between 'longsuffering' and 'patience' will become more or less a fleeting one and the line will be hard to draw (cf. Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Eph 4<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>10</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>15</sup> on the one hand with Ja 5<sup>7-8-10</sup> on the other).

μακροθυμία in the sense of 'longsuffering' has for its synonym ἀνοχή; in the sense of 'patience,' ὑπομονή. The difference between μακροθυμία and ἀνοχή (Ro 2<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>26</sup>) seems to be that in ἀνοχή the idea of the temporariness of the suspension of punishment is given with the word as such, whereas μακροθυμία, so far as the word is concerned, might be never exhausted. As to ὑπομονή, this differs from μακροθυμία in having an element of positive heroic endurance in it, whilst the patience called μακροθυμία is a more negative conception which denotes the absence of a spirit of resistance and rebellion. As stated above, μακροθυμία occurs of God at least once in the sense of 'patience'; ὑπομονή is nowhere ascribed to God. θεὸς τῆς ὑπομονῆς (Ro 15<sup>5</sup>) is not 'the God who shows patience,' but 'the God who gives patience' (cf. Ro 15<sup>13</sup>, He 13<sup>0</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>10</sup>). It is predicated of Jesus in 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup>, He 12<sup>1-2</sup>.

GEERHARDUS VOS.

LORD.—In the AV the word 'lord' generally represents the Greek κύριος, with the exception of Ac 4<sup>24</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>1</sup>, Jude<sup>4</sup>, and Rev 6<sup>10</sup>, where it stands for δεσπότης. In the last three passages the RV renders 'master.' On the other hand, there are cases where κύριος is rendered 'master' both in the AV and the RV—e.g. Ac 16<sup>16, 19</sup>, Eph 6<sup>5, 9</sup>. As a common noun the word 'lord' is not of very frequent occurrence. It is used of the Roman Emperor (Ac 25<sup>26</sup>); of a husband (1 P 3<sup>6</sup>); of the heir of a property (Gal 4<sup>1</sup>); and of the angelic powers (1 Co 8<sup>5</sup>). But usually it is applied either to God or to Christ, and comes to be used almost as a proper name.

1. The name applied to God.—In the LXX κύριος is employed consistently to represent יהוה, which the Jews substituted in reading for the name יהוה, and hence it became the general designation of God. We meet with it frequently in the NT in this application, sometimes expanded into the title κύριος ὁ θεός, or even κύριος ὁ θεός ὁ παντοκράτωρ (Rev 4<sup>8</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>, etc.). God is addressed as κύριος in prayer (Ac 1<sup>4</sup>). The title is used predicatively of Him in Ac 17<sup>24</sup> ('Lord of heaven and earth'). In such phrases as 'even as the Lord gave' (1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>), 'if the Lord will' (4<sup>19</sup>; cf. Ro 1<sup>10</sup> 15<sup>32</sup>), 'chastened of the Lord' (1 Co 11<sup>32</sup>), the reference is probably to God rather than to Christ. Naturally it is God who is referred to where the term occurs in quotations from the OT, as Ac 3-, Ro 4<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>31</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>17</sup>; though, as we shall see, there are occasions where such quotations are interpreted as referring directly to Christ. The reference is likewise to God in various phrases which recall OT associations, such as 'the Spirit of the Lord' (Ac 5<sup>9</sup>), 'the fear of the Lord' (9<sup>31</sup>), 'the hand of the Lord' (11<sup>21</sup>). In Rev., with one or two exceptions, the title refers to God—e.g. 4<sup>8</sup> 11 11<sup>15, 17</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>—though on occasions Christ, in contrast to the kings of the earth, is called 'King of kings and Lord of lords' (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>). St. Peter, St. James, and Hebrews seem to use the term indifferently for God or Christ. In the Pauline Epistles the term usually designates Christ, but there are occasional exceptions, and we must determine from the context whether God or Christ is to be understood. Thus, e.g., in the phrase 'the word of the Lord,' i.e. the gospel (1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>), we should certainly expect 'the Lord' to refer to Christ, yet the phrase recurs in the following chapter in the form 'the word of God' (2<sup>13</sup>). So 'the Lord of peace' (2 Th 3<sup>16</sup>) corresponds to 'the very God of peace' (1 Th 5<sup>23</sup>); and 1 Co 3<sup>5</sup>, where some take κύριος to apply to Christ, is proved by v. 9 to refer to God. But indeed it is difficult to say with certainty in many cases who is intended, and sometimes St. Paul ascribes the same function now to God and now to Christ (e.g. 1 Co 7<sup>17</sup> compared with 2 Co 10<sup>13</sup>). Some (e.g. Cremer and Godet) would lay down the rule that in the NT κύριος is to be understood as referring to God only in the OT quotations and references (so also Lietzmann, so far as St. Paul is concerned); but it is evident from some of the cases already quoted that such a canon cannot be consistently observed.

2. The name applied to Christ.—For the most part, however, the term is employed in the NT to designate Christ.

(1) The subjection of the believer to Christ.—The simplest instance of the use of the word 'Lord' for Christ is in the Gospels, where it describes the relationship of Jesus to the disciples. In this sense it occurs in Ac 1<sup>6</sup> as a form of address of the Master, and in the phrase frequently recurring throughout the book—'the Lord Jesus,' e.g. 1<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>33</sup> 8<sup>16</sup>. But such employment of the term is innocent of the doctrinal implication that attaches to it as generally employed in the NT. We meet with it in various forms—sometimes simply κύριος or ὁ κύριος, sometimes ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν, usually with the addition of Ἰησοῦς or Ἰησοῦς Χριστός. What is suggested by this title as assigned to Christ? The simplest answer is that it calls up the relation of king and subject, conceived in the Oriental spirit as that of lord and slave (cf. 1 K 17<sup>3</sup>-29<sup>3</sup> [LXX]), as typical of that which obtains between Christ and the believer. St. Paul frequently calls himself δουλὸς Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (Ro 1<sup>1</sup>, Gal 1<sup>10</sup>, etc.); on one occasion he uses that term as a worthy designation of a faithful disciple (Col 4<sup>12</sup>), and reminds believers that such slavery is the condition into which they have surrendered themselves (1 Co 7-).

(2) The majesty of Christ.—The title κύριος as applied to Christ suggests something more than the relation of subjection in which the believer stands to Him. It is deliberately selected to assign a certain lofty dignity to Christ. It was the custom in the East to call gods by the title 'Lord' (Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, 253 ff.), and, as we have seen, the practice of the LXX had made this term the familiar one to the Jew for his God Jahweh. The title was deliberately transferred to Christ by the early Christians to signify that they worshipped Him as a Divine Being. In 1 Co 8<sup>5</sup>. St. Paul defines the Christian attitude to Christ by contrasting it with that of the worshippers of false gods. They worship many so-called gods and lords, but the Christian has but the 'one God, the Father, of whom are all things and we unto him, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him.' Here St. Paul places Christ alongside of God as entitled to Divine honour. How such a position is compatible with the strict monotheism of the 'one God, the Father,' he does not discuss. It may be, as Johannes Weiss (Christus, p. 26) suggests, that he selected the title 'Lord' for Christ here as predicating a dignity one rank lower than that of Supreme God, and so leaving room for that relation of subordination which the Apostle elsewhere assigns to Him (2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, Eph 1<sup>17</sup>). It was in virtue of the Resurrection that the Church came to invest Jesus with such unique dignity. This is the standpoint of Peter in Ac 2<sup>3</sup>-36. Jesus of Nazareth, 'a man approved of God' (v. 2-), has by the Resurrection and Exaltation been made by God 'both Lord and Christ.' So in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> St. Paul says that Jesus has been constituted (ορισθέντος) God's Son in power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead (cf. also Eph 1-<sup>off</sup>). And the well-known passage Ph 2<sup>9</sup>-11 accounts for Jesus' investment with the title 'Lord' along the same lines. After the humiliation of the Cross 'God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus [i.e. whenever the name is invoked in prayer by oneself or sounded in one's ears by others (W. Heitmüller, Im Namen Jesu, 1903, p. 66 f.)] every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things on earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' There is difference of opinion as to whether 'the name which is above every name' is the title 'Lord.' In view of the confession of Lordship to which the passage leads up, it seems natural to adopt this interpretation. By exalting Jesus, God has raised Him to supreme honour. He has bestowed on Him that name which He had hitherto borne Himself. The passage becomes pregnant with meaning when taken (as Weiss suggests [op. cit. p. 27]) in connexion with the LXX of Is 42<sup>3</sup>: ἐγὼ κύριος ὁ θεός, τοῦτό μου ἔστι τὸ ὄνομα, τὴν δόξαν μου ἑτέρῳ οὐ δώσω. But this name and this glory God has given to another. He has invested Jesus with the Divine name; He has given Him supreme sovereignty. All beings in heaven and earth must bow the knee before Him. He virtually takes the place of God, the monotheistic position being safeguarded in that concluding phrase, 'to the glory of God the Father.'

The whole of the NT goes to corroborate the lofty estimate of the dignity of Christ suggested by this title. As Lord He comes in the mind of the Church to take His position alongside of God, to exercise such functions as had been attributed to God, and to receive such reverence as had been accorded to God alone—according to an interpretation of Ro 9<sup>5</sup> which is linguistically unexceptionable, He is even called θεός (cf. also 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>). Prayer is addressed to Him (Ac 7<sup>60</sup>, Ro 10<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>8</sup>). He is expected to judge the world (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1-8</sup>), and is endowed with Divine omniscience (1 Co 4<sup>8</sup>). It is He who assigns their various lots to men (7<sup>17</sup>), who grants power of service and endows with grace (1 Ti 1<sup>12-14</sup>), who stands by and strengthens in time of trouble (2 Ti 4<sup>17</sup>), and delivers out of persecutions (3<sup>11</sup>). All authority in the Church proceeds from Him (1 Co 5<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 10<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>10</sup>). The most frequent form of benediction invokes His grace. Baptism is performed in His name (Ac 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup>). That name is invoked when the sick are anointed with oil (Ja 5<sup>14</sup>); and not only on such formal occasions, but in every word and deed (Col 3<sup>17</sup>), for that appears to be the significance of the phrase, one is to 'do all in the name of the Lord' (Heitmüller, op. cit. p. 69). He is the Creator of all things (1 Co 8<sup>5</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup>) and Lord over all beings (Ac 10<sup>36</sup>, Ro 10<sup>12</sup>), our only Master and Lord (Jude<sup>4</sup>).

But perhaps the most striking instance of all of how Christ comes to have the value of God in the Christian consciousness is afforded by the fact that, repeatedly in the NT, quotations from the OT which manifestly refer to God are immediately applied to Christ. Thus, e.g., the exhortation of the Psalmist to taste and see that the Lord is good (Ps 34<sup>8</sup>) is interpreted (1 P 2<sup>3</sup>) with reference to the experience of the believer of the salvation of Christ; and St. Paul finds an answer to the question of Is 40<sup>13</sup> (LXX), 'Who hath known the mind of the Lord?' in the triumphant declaration, 'But we have the mind of Christ' (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>). Other instances of this practice will be found in Ro 10<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>16-18</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>15</sup>. Such being the significance with which the title is invested, it is small wonder that St. Paul should have regarded acknowledgment of Christ's Lordship as the mark of the true believer (Col 2<sup>9</sup>). To confess Him as Lord with one's mouth, and to believe in one's heart that God has raised Him from the dead (observe the connexion between the Resurrection and Lordship), is to be assured of salvation (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>). In cases of ecstasy such confession was the infallible sign of the presence of the Holy Spirit (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>). The proclamation of Christ's Lordship was the central theme of the Apostle's preaching (2 Co 4<sup>5</sup>), the universal recognition of that Lordship the consummation of the Divine purpose (Ph 2<sup>11</sup>).

(3) The protest against Emperor-worship.—There remains to be noted one other aspect of the assertion of Christ's Lordship—the protest implied against the worship of the Emperor under the same title. Deissmann has shown (op. cit. p. 255 ff.) that already in the time of St. Paul the title was current as a form of address of the Emperor (cf. Ac 25<sup>6</sup>), if not in Rome, at any rate in the East. Caligula had ordered his statue to be erected in the Temple at Jerusalem, and required that he should be worshipped as God. Domitian is called in official reports 'our Lord and God.' When such was the tendency that was abroad, it is possible that even in the mouth of a man who, like St. Paul, urged subjection to the higher powers, the proclamation of the Lordship of Christ may have had a polemical nuance. In the middle of the 2nd cent. we find Polycarp laying down his life rather than say κύριος καὶ αὐτός (Mart. Polyc. viii. 2), and probably long before that time, on the lips of those who repeated it, if not by the men who first employed it, the formula 'our Lord Jesus Christ' was uttered with an emphasis on the word our which suggested repudiation of the claims made on behalf of the Emperor (Weinel, Die Stellung des Urchristentums zum Staat, p. 19). St. Paul could say of the Christian, 'our state is in heaven' (Ph 3<sup>0</sup>), and endeavour to keep his religion apart altogether from politics. But when politics invaded the sphere of religion and Cæsar laid claim to the things that are Christ's, it became the duty of the Christian to maintain the sovereignty of his Lord. Such passages as Ph 2<sup>9-11</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>5f</sup>, cannot fail to have been interpreted as a protest against the growing tendency to ascribe to the Emperor the reverence which belonged to Christ alone. We hear the same protest in the claim of Jude<sup>4</sup>, 'our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ,' and in a milder form in the subtle distinction made in 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>, 'Fear God, honour the king,' i.e. the Emperor. In Rev. the references to the Emperor worship become more explicit (13<sup>8, 12</sup> 14<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>), and the protest against it finds freer utterance. Christ is proclaimed King of kings and Lord of lords (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>), while the sovereignty of this world becomes the sovereignty of the Lord and of His anointed one, and He shall reign for ever and ever (11<sup>15</sup>).

LORD'S DAY.—1. Origin.—Before the apostolic period had wholly passed away 'the first day of the week' had become, or was well on the way to become, the stated weekly holy-day of the Christian Church, bearing the distinctive designation 'the Lord's Day' (ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα). It is evident that this day was regarded as of special importance from the beginning, and was placed alongside of the Sabbath in the esteem of Jewish Christians. In the course of time it became a substitute for the Sabbath itself. How this was brought about cannot be exactly stated. We cannot point to any definite act of institution, any such impressive story and legislative sanction as the Pentateuch supplies with reference to the Jewish Sabbath. No authority of the Lord Himself can be cited for it; there is no 'Jesus said' to correspond to 'God spake all these words, saying' (Ex 20<sup>1</sup>), or 'the Lord spake unto Moses, saying' (Lv 19<sup>1-3</sup>).

The materials afforded us by the NT are scanty indeed. Two things, however, are clear.—(a) In the brief Resurrection stories, as found in all the Gospels, conspicuous emphasis is laid on 'the first day of the week' as the day on which Jesus rose from the dead. See Mk 16<sup>2</sup>, Lk 24<sup>1</sup>, Jn 20<sup>1</sup> (τῇ μᾶ τῶν σαββάτων), Mt 28<sup>1</sup> (εἰς μίαν σαββάτον), the fragment Mk 16<sup>9-10</sup> (πρῶτῃ σαββάτῳ), Jn 20<sup>19</sup> (τῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκείνῃ τῇ μᾶ σαββάτῳ). Jn 20<sup>26</sup>, with its 'after eight days' (the octave), is specially interesting, for it has the faint suggestion of a custom-germ, or reflects the early-established practice of a weekly meeting on that day. Th. Zahn calls attention to the particularity with which John notes the days connected with the Passion and Resurrection, and explains it as due to the Christian week-scheme already fully established among the churches of Asia Minor, with which the Fourth Gospel was so closely associated (Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche, no. 5, p. 178).—(b) Early in the 2nd cent. the first day of the week appears as distinctively the sacred day of Christianity under the name of 'the Lord's Day.'

The connexion between (a) and (b) cannot be fortuitous. The tradition that the Lord rose again on the first day of the week naturally invested that day with special interest. Jesus' Resurrection from the first figured as a dominating fact concerning Him in early faith and evangelism. What wonder that that day should come to be regarded as par excellence the Lord's Day?

Those who deny the reality of the Resurrection as a unique event are hard pressed to account for the undeniable primitive association of the day with that occurrence. What is there convincing in the following suggestions? 'It is quite possible that the Christian Sunday was originally fixed—perhaps before the women's story was generally known—in some other way, e.g. by the events of the Day of Pentecost, or by the first appearance of the risen Christ in Galilee, or by the selection of the first available time after the Jewish Sabbath, and that the connexion of it with the date of the Resurrection was an afterthought' (J. M. Thompson, Miracles in the NT, London, 1911, p. 164). Later on the same author seems to treat the 'appearance' also as a fictitious afterthought grafted on to a Christian time-scheme of amazingly early development: 'Both the appearances take place on Sunday (Jn 20). This is another indication of the ecclesiastical and eucharistic atmosphere in which the Resurrection stories grew up' (p. 199; cf. A. Loisy, Autour d'un petit livre, Paris, 1903, p. 242f.).

The NT itself is not without evidence that this institution began its growth in apostolic times. The passages are few but familiar. In Ac 20<sup>7</sup> the first day of the week is associated with a Christian assembly for religious purposes (συνηγμένον ἡμῶν κλᾶσαι ἄρον). If a use of this kind had not already begun, what propriety or moment would there be in stating what day of the week it was? Again, at an earlier point in St. Paul's career we find him urging the Christians at Corinth to make weekly contributions towards the fund for the relief of the impoverished church at Jerusalem, and to do it on the first day of the week (1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>). It has been pointed out, not unreasonably, that this contribution is not represented as an offering to be collected at some meeting for worship (Deissmann, art. 'Lord's Day' in EBi), that, rather, the expression παρ' ἐαυτῷ simply points to setting aside such a gift at home, and so the passage yields no positive evidence for the observance of the day as in later times. When, however, it is suggested, as an alternative explanation, that the first day of the week is named because probably this or the day before was the pay-day for working folk at Corinth, we need some definite evidence for this which is not forthcoming. And when, as Zahn observes (op. cit. p. 177), we find that in the 2nd cent. there was a wide-spread custom of laying charitable gifts for the poor on the church dish in connexion with public worship, it is difficult not to connect this with St. Paul's words here. May not his action in this particular instance, indeed, have directly led to the institution of a collection for the poor on the Lord's Day, and especially in association with 'the breaking of bread'? It may be added that, as St. Paul urges this course so 'that no collections be made when I come,' and as the whole work is described in v. 1 as a 'collection' (λoγία), it is most natural to infer that there was not only a setting apart of gifts, but also a paying into a local fund week by week. This strengthens the view that 1 Co 16<sup>2</sup> incidentally gives evidence of early movements towards the setting up of the Lord's Day as an institution, especially when taken along with Ac 20<sup>7</sup>; for when could the contributions of the people be better collected in readiness for the Apostle than at their meetings on the special day of worship?

It is fair also to suggest (with Hessey, Sunday, p. 43) that the 'assembling' spoken of in He 10:5 must have taken place at stated times and that the time is most likely to have been the first day of the week.

The mention of ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα in Rev 1:10 calls for special notice, as this is the only instance in the NT of the use of the expression that subsequently became so established and familiar. But does it bear in this place the same significance as it came to possess and possesses still? Some have argued that what is meant is not 'the Lord's Day' as we understand it, but 'the Day of the Lord' in the sense in which the OT prophets employ the term, and as it figures in the eschatological outlook of the NT (e.g. 1 Th 5:1). Hort (Apoc. of St. John, I.-III., London, 1908, ad loc.) inclines to this view, thinking it suits the context better, and seeing no reason for mentioning the day on which the seer had his vision. He suggests as a possible rendering: 'I became in the Spirit and so in the Day of the Lord.' It is not surprising that he only ventures on this 'with some doubt.' Deissmann (loc. cit.) also favours this view, identifying 'the Lord's Day' here with 'the day of Jahweh,' the day of judgment—in the LXX ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ κυρίου (as also in St. Paul and elsewhere). But here we have an important point telling for the ordinary view. Neither in the LXX nor in the NT (nor in other early Christian writings) have we any instance of ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα (if not here) used as 'the Day of the Lord.' The term with this meaning is ἡ ἡμέρα (τοῦ) κυρίου. If the two expressions were equivalent and interchangeable, how strange that the latter should occur so regularly and the former be found in but one solitary instance!

On the other hand, we have an undisputed early example of the use of ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα (in noteworthy abbreviation) as 'Sunday' in Didache, xiv. 1 (κατα κυριακὴν δὲ κυρίου συναχθέντες κλάσατε ἄρτον; cf. Ac 20:7). The expression thus could not have been a new term c. A.D. 100, since κυριακή alone is used as 'Lord's Day,' and particularly in the striking collocation κυριακή κυρίου. The relevance of this is unaffected even if Turner is right in regarding the Didache as simply a rechauffé of a purely Jewish manual, and the curious phrase 'the Lord's day of the Lord' as 'only the Christian substitute for the Jewish "Sabbath of the Lord"' (Studies in Early Church History, Oxford, 1912, p. 8). Cf. also Ignatius, ad Magn. ix. 1 ('living in the observance of the Lord's Day' (κατα κυριακὴν ζῶντες). No difficulty in point of time emerges concerning the use of ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα in Rev., which is reasonably assigned to the reign of Domitian. And it is not used here as a newly-coined term. How much earlier than the time of Domitian it came into use none can say.

It is true we find the simple early name 'first day' or 'eighth day' continuing in use long after ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα emerges. Note particularly 'the eighth day, which is also the first,' used by Justin Martyr (Dial. xli., Apol. i. 67) and still later writers. But evidently there was in 'Lord's Day' an inherent suitability and felicity which caused it to outlive these primitive designations and become the permanent and characteristic Christian name of the day. It passed into Western use, not only figuring as dies dominica in the liturgical scheme of the week, but establishing itself in ordinary modern nomenclature (e.g. in French dimanche and Italian domenica).

2. The epithet κυριακή and its use.—We can hardly wonder that at one time κυριακός was regarded as a word 'coined by the apostles themselves' (Winer-Moulton, *Grammar of NT Greek*², Edinburgh, 1882, p. 296). In Wilke-Grimm's *Clavis Novi Testamenti*³, Leipzig, 1888, it is described as 'vox solum biblica et ecclesiastica,' and in Grimm-Thayer⁴, Edinburgh, 1892, this is reproduced, save that 'solum' is passed over. However, the papyri and inscriptions discovered more recently in Egypt and in Asia Minor abundantly prove that the word was in current use in the whole of the Greek-speaking world; e.g. κυριακος λόγος (=Imperial treasury) occurs in a government decree issued in A.D. 68, ὁ κυριος being a designation of the Emperor (cf. similar use of Lat. dominus). For other examples see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1901, p. 217 f.

But from the fact that early Christians did not coin the term κυριακος, but found it ready to hand in the vocabulary of the day, it does not necessarily follow that they used it as the pagan world used it. They set it in a new connexion. In their use of it they gave it a specific and distinctive character. Thus we find it used in specific association (which became permanent) with the Supper (κυριακὸν δεῖπνον, 1 Co 11:20), with the Day (as here), with the Sayings of Jesus (λόγια κυριακά, Papias), with the House, the domus ecclesiae (το κυριακόν).

In this connexion the following note from OED, s.v. 'Church,' may be of use: 'The parallelism of Gr. κυριακόν, church, κυριακή, Sunday (in 11th cent. also "church"), L. dominicum, church, dominica, dies dominica, Sunday, Irish domhnach, "church" and "Sunday," is instructive.'

Deissmann (loc. cit.) dissents from the view advanced by Holtzmann and others that our particular term (ἡ κυριακή ἡμέρα or ἡ κυριακή) 'is formed after the analogy of οἰκονομὸν κυριακόν.' He prefers (though, indeed, with a certain amount of caution) to regard this Christian mode of naming the first day of the week as analogous to the custom of the pagan world in Egypt and Asia Minor whereby the first day of each month was called Σεβαστή (=Imperial). Thus the Christian weekly 'Lord's Day' was the direct counterpart of a monthly 'Emperor's Day.' This, to say the least, is not self-evident; and Deissmann may well hesitate, as he does, to maintain that the Christians thus consciously copied the pagan use. We need not, indeed, argue a direct analogy to κυριακὸν δεῖπνον in particular. Perhaps we may more reasonably regard both these expressions and others given above as being independent but co-ordinate examples of the application of the epithet κυριακος. There could be no question from the first as to the κύριος it had reference to. Nor, again, need we suppose that Christians, in thus speaking of Jesus, were directly influenced by the use of ὁ κυριος or ὁ κυριος ἡμῶν as designating a deity or an emperor in the time of the Roman Empire. They had a sufficient precedent for this in the Jewish use of 'Adonai for God. At the same time the parallelism in such use among Jews, Christians, and pagans is a matter of some interest.

3. The relation of the Lord's Day to the Jewish Sabbath.—As shown by the few passages already noticed, the first day of the week evidently began from the earliest times to have a special value in the eyes of Christians. But, whatever the significance and use of that day, the day itself was not confounded with the Jewish Sabbath. Nor is there any sign that in apostolic times there was any thought of superseding the latter by the Lord's Day.

'L'idée de transporter au dimanche la solennité du sabbat, avec toutes ses exigences, est une idée étrangère au christianisme primitif' (Duchesne, *Origines du culte chrétien*⁴, p. 46). Similarly Zahn (op. cit. p. 188 f.) points out that no one belonging to the circle of Jewish Christians would think of relaxing one of Moses' commandments; and, even if already in apostolic times Sunday came to be observed, none could think that the Sabbath commandment would be fulfilled through a Sabbath-like observance of another day instead of the observance of the Sabbath itself.

For a considerable time the two existed side by side. The Jewish Christian who met with his fellow-Christians on the Lord's Day still observed the Sabbath of his fathers. Nothing in the use of the first day of the week as a day for Christian reunions could have been intended as hostile to the old Jewish institution. Clear evidence as to the two-fold observance of both the days is furnished by Ignatius (ad Magn. ix. [longer recension]), who exhorts Christians to keep the Sabbath, 'but no longer after the Jewish manner.' 'And after the observance of the Sabbath, let every friend of Christ keep the Lord's Day as a festival, the resurrection-day, the queen and chief of all the days.' Similarly in the Apost. Const. ii. 59: 'Assemble yourselves together every day, morning and evening, singing psalms and praying in the Lord's House (ἐν τοῖς κυριακοῖς) . . . but principally on the Sabbath day; and on the day of our Lord's Resurrection, which is the Lord's Day, meet more diligently,' etc. We have an interesting memorial of this primitive double observance in the Lat. and Gr. liturgical names for Sunday (dies dominica, κυριακή) and Saturday (sabbatum, σάββατον), the whole liturgical scheme of the week having come down from early times when Christians discarded the use of day-names associated with pagan gods.

It is true that Justin Martyr in a well-known passage (Apology, i. 67) uses the name 'Sunday' (τῇ τοῦ ἡλίου λεγομένη ἡμέρᾳ); but the expression 'the day called the day of the sun' clearly indicates that whilst Christians might use the ordinary name in intercourse with non-Christians they did not use it among themselves. Similarly in the same chapter Justin uses 'day of Saturn' (Saturday) instead of 'Sabbath.' Zahn (op. cit. p. 357) marks this as the only instance he knows of in which a Christian writer uses the term 'Sunday' in pre-Constantine times (see also ERE, art. 'Festivals and Fasts [Christian]').

As Duchesne (op. cit. p. 396) and others have pointed out, the observance of Sunday is one of a number of elements which Christianity had in common with the religion of Mithras. In Mithraism this was directly connected with the worship of the sun. It was inevitable that some should argue from this a vital connexion between the two religions. This was the case in primitive times. Tertullian (Apol. xvi.) vigorously repudiates the charge that Christians worshipped the sun as their god.

In the course of time, the distinction between church and synagogue growing wider, the Sabbath inevitably became less and less important and eventually fell into complete neglect among Christians, whilst the Lord's Day survived as their special sacred day of the week. (No institution of like kind was known in paganism.) It must be remembered that St. Paul was opposed to the introduction of OT festivals (including the Sabbath) into the churches he founded among the Gentiles, 'declaring that by the adoption of them the Gentile believer forfeited the benefits of the gospel, since he chose to rest his salvation upon rites instead of upon Christ (Col 2<sup>16</sup>; cf. Gal 4<sup>10</sup>, Ro 14<sup>5f.</sup>).' (G. P. Fisher, Beginnings of Christianity, 1877, new ed., 1886, p. 561; cf. Zahn, p. 189). We may reasonably conclude, indeed, that St. Paul himself, being one of the 'strong' (Ro 14<sup>5f.</sup>), shared the view of those who esteemed 'every day alike,' and that all days were alike sacred in his eyes, whether Sabbaths, Lord's Days, or others.

But the observance of the Lord's Day must have been a very different thing from that of the Jewish Sabbath. The commemoration of the Resurrection of Christ alone would make a great difference. Whether or not the apostles saw what the issue would be when the first day of the week began to be thus observed (in however simple a way), they must have given the growing custom their approval and welcomed the association of acts of joyful worship and almsgiving with the day. St. Paul could have been no exception in this respect; but apparently he did not foresee that the Christian 'first day' might in time assume those very features of the Jewish 'seventh day' Sabbath which made him deprecate the introduction of this ancient institution among Gentile Christians (see also art. SABBATH).

4. Primitive modes of observing the Lord's Day.—The fact that for Christians the one raison d'être of the Lord's Day was the commemoration of the Lord's Resurrection made it a weekly festival to be kept with gladness.

Somewhat later on, it is true, other associations were claimed for it as if to enhance the dignity of the day. E.g. a connexion with the first day of Creation and even with the Ascension was assumed; though these were trifling compared with some mediæval developments. Between the 11th and the 15th centuries we meet with a wide-spread fiction of a 'Letter from Heaven' inculcating Sunday observance, wherein the largest claims are made for the day; how that on it the angels were created, the ark rested on Ararat, the Exodus took place, also the Baptism of Jesus, His great miracles, His Ascension, and the Charism of Pentecost (see An English Miscellany, in honour of Dr. Furnivall, Oxford, 1901).

(a) We are frequently reminded by early Christian writers that it was the primitive custom to stand for prayer on that day instead of kneeling as on other days. Tertullian, amongst others, dilates on this (de Orat. xxiii.). Canon 20 of the Council of Nicæa plainly reflects a very old custom, as it enjoins that 'seeing there are some who kneel on Sunday and in the days of Pentecost . . . men should offer their prayers to God standing.'

(b) Cessation from all work does not appear to have been required in primitive times as an element in the observance of the day. So long as there were meetings for religious worship, Christians were not expected to cease from manual labour. But so far as Jewish Christians were concerned, if they observed Sabbath in such a way, they would hardly be likely to observe the day immediately following in the same way as well. For the rest it may be questioned whether social conditions made it practicable. We can hardly argue back to apostolic times from customs obtaining in society nominally Christian under nominally Christian government. Old Roman laws in pre-Christian times provided for the suspension of business (particularly in the law courts) on all feriæ or festivals. It was the Emperor Constantine who at length ordered that the same rule should apply to the Lord's Day, thus bestowing honour on the day as a fixed weekly festival (see Bingham, Antiquities of the Christian Church, bk. xx. ch. ii.). It is noticeable that in Ignatius (ad Magn. ix. [see above]) Christians are exhorted to keep Sabbath 'after a spiritual manner, rejoicing in meditation on the Law'; and abstinence from work is expressly discountenanced, while rest from labour is not demanded for the observance of the Lord's Day. Later on the practice of using Sunday as a day of rest from work came into vogue; and then it served as a sign distinguishing Christian from Jew.

Considerable light on this point is incidentally gained from the 29th Canon of the Council of Laodicea (4th cent.)—light as to what had long been the practice of Christians who clung to Jewish antecedents, and as to the conditions then prevailing. It reads: 'That Christians must not act as Jews by refraining from work on the Sabbath, but must rather work on that day, and, if they can, as Christians they must cease work on the Lord's Day, so giving it the greater honour.'

(c) The assemblies connected with the Lord's Day were two: the vigil in the night between Saturday and Sunday, and the celebration of the Liturgy on Sunday morning. One reason for meeting at such times was most probably the need for precaution in times of persecution and difficulty. An interesting account of Sunday worship of Christians at Jerusalem in the 4th cent. is to be found in a letter written by a Gallic lady who went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. The document, written in the vulgar Latin, is given by Duchesne in his Origines du culte chrétien, App. 5. No doubt the picture reflects in the main a usage which had existed from much earlier times. A crowd of people ('all who could possibly be there') gathers at the church doors 'before cock-crow' when the doors are first opened, then streams into the church, which is lit up by a large number of lamps (luminaria infinita). (Not that such zest in church attendance was universal in the early centuries. In a Homily on the Lord's Day by Eusebius of Alexandria [5th cent. ?] the slackness of people in coming to church is humorously treated and rebuked.) The worship includes inter alia the recitation of three psalms, responses, prayers, and the reading of the gospel story of the Resurrection. Justin Martyr's account of worship on the Lord's Day is also well known (Apol. i. 65-67), while—to go still further back to the very fringe of the Apostolic Age—we have Pliny's famous letter to Trajan wherein he describes Christians meeting early in the morning to sing hymns to Christ and (v.l. 'as') God, and joining in a sacramental act and a common meal. This took place, he says, stato die, and no doubt that fixed day was the first day of the week.

(d) Very possibly the sacramental meal ('breaking of bread') was the earliest distinctive feature in the Christian observance of the Lord's Day, the other exercises of prayer, reading, etc., being added later. 'To the sacramental meal of apostolic times, understood as a foretaste and assurance of the "Messianic banquet" in the coming Parousia, there was soon prefixed a religious exercise—modelled perhaps on the common worship of the Synagogue—which implied just those preparatory acts of penance, purification, and desirous stretching out towards the Infinite, which precede in the experience of the growing soul the establishment of communion with the Spiritual World' (E. Underhill, The Mystic Way, London, 1913, p. 335).

5. Modern names for Lord's Day.—The varying names by which the day has been known in later times reflect the confusion which has attended the history of the Lord's Day as a Christian institution.

(a) To speak of the day as 'the Sabbath' (even the expression 'Christian Sabbath' is only admissible on the ground of analogy) is to use a modus loquendi that primitive Christians could never have used. Their distinction between Sabbath and Lord's Day was as clear as between the first and the seventh day. It arises from the mistaken identification of the weekly festival of the Resurrection of Christ with the Sabbath of the Jews and of the Fourth Commandment in the Decalogue. The sanctions for the observance of the Lord's Day were wrongly sought in OT prescriptions (see Richard Baxter's treatise on 'The Divine appointment of the Lord's Day proved, etc.' in Works, ed. Orme, London, 1830, xiii. 363 ff.).

Less than ever is it of service now to appeal to the Fourth Commandment as an authority in urging the due maintenance of the Lord's Day; though, indeed, the Mosaic institution has its full value as a venerable exemplification of the naturally wise provision for a weekly release from daily business and toil. Christians must rely on other sanctions, and chiefly the definite association of the day with the Resurrection of our Lord, the true instinct by which with great spontaneity the first little Christian communities set the day apart, the continuous usage of the Church, the provision for the function of worship. Others who may be uninfluenced by specific religious considerations, and for whom the very term 'Lord's Day' may have no significance, may yet very well recognize the value of the underlying natural principle of the 'day of rest.'

(b) Again, the persistence, or survival, of the pre-Christian and pagan designation 'Sunday' is a matter of interest, especially since, being tacitly denuded of its ancient associations with sun-worship, it has come to be invested to the Christian mind with all the meaning attached to 'Lord's Day,' and used interchangeably with that name. We have seen how careful primitive Christians were to distinguish between the pagan name and that which they took for their own particular use. But the old nomenclature held its ground in the civil calendar notwithstanding the spread of Christianity. When Constantine (A.D. 321) publicly honoured the Lord's Day by enacting that it should be kept as a day of rest, he spoke of it as dies venerabilis solis. In the latter part of the 4th cent., in one of the laws of Valentinian II., there occurs the phrase: 'On Sunday, which our forefathers usually and rightly called the Lord's Day (Dominicum)'—a further evidence as to the triumph of the ancient name. It is curious to see 'Lord's Day' referred to as an old name that had fallen into abeyance (see Bingham, op. cit. xx. ii. 1).

An interesting subject of inquiry presents itself in the fact that among the Teutonic nations of Western Christendom this old pagan name, 'day of the sun,' has established itself in the calendar, whilst the modern Latin nations employ as the universal name the early Christian term dies dominica in various forms. (The futile attempt of the Quakers to supersede both forms and revert to NT simplicity by using the colourless expression 'first day' is a matter of history.) In the light of this divergence Zahn's plea for the day as alike valuable for Christians and non-Christians has point only when addressed to the Teutonic peoples. The weekly festival, he urges, should be upheld as 'a "Lord's Day" only, of course, for those who call upon the risen Jesus as their Lord, but as a "Sunday" for all men, a day when God's sun shines benignantly upon the earth' (op. cit. ad fin.).

LORD'S SUPPER.—See EUCHARIST.

LOT (Λώτ).—Lot, the nephew, and for a time the companion, of Abraham, is thrice over called 'righteous' in 2 P 27<sup>8</sup>. With all his faults, of which the spirit of compromise was the most conspicuous, he was relatively δικαίος, i.e. in comparison with the citizens of Sodom among whom he made his abode. The Vulg. and Erasmus assume that in v.<sup>8</sup> he is designated 'just in seeing and hearing'—'aspectu et auditu justus'—but it is better to read, 'in seeing and hearing he vexed his righteous soul.' The active voice (ἐβασάνισεν) implies that while he was no doubt continually vexed beyond measure by the conduct of the people around him, his troubles were ultimately of his own making. 'It was precisely his dwelling there, which was his own deliberate choice, that became an active torment to his soul' (H. von Soden in Handkom. zum NT, iii., Freiburg i. B., 1899, p. 203).

LOTS.—1. Definition.—The art. DIVINATION indicated how at an early period men felt it to be their duty and for their advantage to get into and maintain friendly relations with their divinities. There gradually grew up, on the one hand, methods by which the deities revealed their will to men; and on the other, methods by which men could learn the desire or decision of the deities. Among the latter, one of the most primitive and most widely diffused was kleromancy (κλήρος + μαντεία), divination by lot. While the efficacy of kleromancy in modern civilized life depends on the elimination of all possibility of human interference, in the lower culture it depends and depended on the certainty of Divine interference, the untrammelled exercise of the Divine will. This end was attained by (a) the use of certain things through which, according to tradition, the divinities could express their will. There were many such, as 'a rod' (ῥάβδος, ῥαβδος, hence ῥαβδομαντεία, 'rhabdomancy'), 'arrows' (βέλος, ῥα; hence βελομαντεία, 'belomancy'), knucklebones (ἀστράγαλος; hence ἀστραγαλομαντις, 'astragalomant'), and many others, as pebbles (ψήφος, ῥα), beans, etc.; (b) the reverent manipulation of sacred things through which the deity had indicated his pleasure to make known his will, a good example of which is the use by the Hebrew priests of 'the Urim and the Thummim'; (c) the selecting of a method by which the deity was perfectly free to express his will without human interference, a good example of which is seen in the action of Jonathan (1 S 14<sup>9-13</sup>). This latter use approaches very closely to the omen or the ordeal and to some kinds of rhabdomancy.*

2. Diffusion.—Kleromancy is a universal religious practice. It was resorted to by the Romans† and Greeks‡. It prevailed throughout the Semitic world. In the form of belomancy it was used by the Babylonians (Ezk 21<sup>1-6</sup>); 'he shook the arrows to and fro.'§ It was employed by the sailors of the ship of Tarshish (Jon 1<sup>7</sup>), by the Arabs,¶ and Assyrians (HDB iii. 152<sup>b</sup>), while the Persians resorted to it as a means of finding out lucky days (Est 3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>4-5</sup>). It flourishes in China and Japan and in all uncivilized countries to-day. In every case it is in close connexion with the worship of the deities, and often takes place in their presence or in their temples, and always under their auspices.

'Among the Hebrews in the oldest times the typical form of divine decision was by the lot, or other such oracle at the sanctuary.'¶ Later on, kleromancy was largely and regularly employed with the sanction of Jahweh, so that, apart from all human influence, passion, bias, or trickery, He might be able to dictate His will: 'The lot ῥαβ but the whole decision thereof comes from Jahweh' (Pr 16<sup>33</sup>).** This means not 'that the actual disposal of affairs might be widely different from what . . . the lot . . . appeared to determine' (Fairbairn, Imperial Bible Dictionary, ii. 118), but the exact opposite; hence it was clearly established that 'the lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty' (Pr 18<sup>18</sup>). We have a conspicuous example of rhabdomancy in the budding and fruit-bearing of Aaron's rod (Nu 17<sup>1-8</sup> [16-23]),†† and the practice is also referred to in Hos 4<sup>1</sup>, and probably in Is 17<sup>10</sup>. We find kleromancy practised in the form of belomancy in 2 K

13<sup>13-19</sup> * Under the form known as the Urim and the Thummim it was or became a mode used only by the priests.† Kleromancy had, of course, its largest sphere in acts directly connected with Jahweh. The decision as to which goat should be for sacrifice to Jahweh and which to Azazel was determined by lot (Lv 16<sup>8-10</sup>). A war was the war primarily not of Israel but of Jahweh, and that specially if it was for the punishment of wrongdoing; hence the members of a punitive expedition were chosen by lot (Jg 20<sup>9</sup>), hence also the spoil taken in war (Jg 5<sup>30</sup>), whether captives (2 S 8<sup>2</sup>, Nah 3<sup>10</sup>, Jl 3<sup>3</sup>) or sections of a conquered city (Ob 11). The services of the sanctuary were sacred; hence the priestly functions were assigned to the orders by lot (1 Ch 24<sup>5-7</sup>, Lk 1<sup>9</sup>), Shemaiah the scribe writing out the lots in the presence of a committee consisting of the king, the high priest, and other functionaries (1 Ch 24<sup>6-31</sup>). The musicians (1 Ch 25<sup>8</sup>), the custodians (1 Ch 26<sup>13-14</sup>), and the persons who should bring the wood and other offerings to the temple (Neh 10<sup>34</sup>), were all chosen by lot. So sacred was this procedure that a special official was entrusted with 'superintending the daily casting of the lots for determining the particular parts of the service that were to be apportioned to the various officiating priests' (E. Schürer, HJP II. i. 269, 293). It was even maintained by some Jews in later times that the high priest had been chosen by the same method (Jos. BJ IV. iii. 7, 8; c. Ap. ii. 24). As the king was the official representative of Jahweh, Saul was chosen by lot (1 S 10<sup>19-21</sup>). Godless or indiscriminate work is where no lot is cast (Ezk 24<sup>6</sup>). When the or or ban had been pronounced and violated, then the guilty person was detected whether the or was permanent (Jos 7<sup>14-18</sup>) or temporary (1 S 14<sup>41-4</sup>), in both cases presumably by the Urim and the Thummim.‡ As the Semites regarded the land inhabited by a nation as the possession of the god of the nation, Palestine belonged, as an allotment, to Jahweh (Dt 32<sup>9</sup>); hence it was His right and duty to put His people into actual possession (Ps 105<sup>11</sup>, 1 Ch 16<sup>18</sup>), which He did (Ps 78<sup>35</sup> 135<sup>12</sup>, Ac 13<sup>19</sup>), and to divide it up by kleromancy into allotments to the various tribes (Nu 26<sup>55-56</sup> 33<sup>54</sup> 36<sup>2</sup>).§ This accordingly was done in regard to the nine and a half tribes (Nu 34<sup>13</sup>, Jos 14<sup>2</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>1</sup> 17<sup>14-17</sup> Ps 78<sup>55</sup>), to the conquered land, to the land still unconquered after the first great effort (Jos 18<sup>6-11</sup> 19<sup>1-40</sup>), and at the death of Joshua (Jos 13<sup>6</sup>); also in regard to the towns for the Levites (Jos 21<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>54</sup>; Jos 21<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>61</sup>; Jos 21<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>62</sup>; 1 Ch 6<sup>63</sup>; Jos 21<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>65</sup>). This was done 'before Jahweh' (Jos 18<sup>6</sup>) and under the direction of a committee consisting of the high priest, the political chief, and the heads of the fathers' houses of the tribes (Jos 14<sup>1-7</sup>).

In course of time the procedure which had been primarily and essentially sacred was applied to secular affairs such as the selection of people to inhabit and guard a city (Neh 11<sup>1</sup>). A study of the Old Testament reveals how kleromancy coloured the thought and the theology of the Hebrew thinkers and poets.

3. In the New Testament.—At the Crucifixion of Jesus we see its secular and Roman use when the soldiers divided His upper garments among themselves by lot.

After the suicide of Judas it was decided that a successor should be appointed. The procedure (Ac 1<sup>21-26</sup>) was as follows. From the mass of the followers of Jesus, numbering about one hundred and twenty, those only were declared eligible who had proved their steadfastness by keeping in constant contact with Him from His baptism. From this short list they appointed (ἔστησαν; not 'put forward') two. Neither the parties who did this nor the method of doing it are mentioned. Then prayer was offered to Jesus* for His decision. The next step is not quite certain. If the words ἔδωκαν κλήρους αὐτοῖς, which is the correct reading, mean 'they gave the lots to them,' then that indicates that to each of the two there was given to place in the proper receptacle a tablet with his name or mark, and he whose tablet was first shaken out was held to be Divinely elected. But the phrase is not the classical nor the NT expression for casting lots, and if rendered 'they gave lots for them,' a quite legitimate rendering, then, as Mosheim held,† the election was by ballot. This, of course, is not in harmony with Jewish practice, as seen in the selection of the goats (Lv 16<sup>8</sup>). From the result being indicated by the words 'the lot fell' and not 'the Lord chose,' it has been argued that the election was unwarranted and that the Divine intention was that St. Paul should fill the place of Judas. This is a piece of pure imagination. Nor is there a shadow of proof that the eleven were in any special manner led either to appoint a successor or to appoint him by this method. The fact that the election took place before Pentecost has no vital significance. The act, in the face of the enemies of the Church, was, like the auctioning of the camp of Hannibal by the Romans, a boldly prudent step, a declaration to all that the Church was neither cowed by the death of her Lord nor dejected by the suicide of the traitor, but was girding herself for a forward march. When St. James was martyred there was no occasion for such an act, and no successor was appointed. Hence this remains the only official use of the lot in the Apostolic Church.‡ Kleromaney has left its mark on the thought, and specially on the soteriology, of the Apostolic Age. κλήρος is used in the secondary sense which it gradually gained as something assigned to man by a higher power. Judas had received τὸν κλήρον in the ministry carried on by Jesus (cf. II. xxiii. 862; Ac 1<sup>7</sup>), and his successor was to take not τὸν κλήρον (N C<sup>9</sup>E), but only his τόπον, 'place' (ABC<sup>9</sup>D; Ac 1<sup>-5</sup>), while in Simon Magus had neither μερίς οὐδὲ κλήρος, neither a share, a limited portion, nor an allotment (Ac 8<sup>-1</sup>). The πρεσβύτεροι must not exercise lordly mastery (cf. Ps 9 [10]<sup>5</sup>) over what is not theirs, but τῶν κληρῶν, allotments made to them (1 P 5<sup>3</sup>). Ignatius prays for grace εἰς τὸ τὸν κληρὸν μου ἀνεμποδίστως ἀπολαβεῖν, 'to cling to my lot without hindrance to the end' (Epistle to the Romans, i.). κληρονομία has its original sense of an allotment made by a higher power. Abraham went out from Ur into a τόπον, a district in which he was promised an allotment (He 11<sup>8</sup>), but in which he actually got none (Ac 7<sup>5</sup>), the allotment, and all its accompaniments, resting on nothing legal, but on a mere promise (Gal 3<sup>18</sup>). Similarly the called of God still receive only the promise of an allotment which is eternal (He 9<sup>15</sup>).

The transmission of an allotment was regulated by certain customs. A holder could convey it to another, as Isaac did to Jacob, and such transference could not be cancelled or altered (Gn 27<sup>33</sup>, He 12<sup>17</sup>). It was recognized that the son of a female slave could not share an allotment with the son of a free-born wife (Gn 21<sup>10</sup>, Gal 4<sup>30</sup>). Hence gradually the children, just because they were the children, of the possessor (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>) claimed the allotment on the death of the possessor as a thing to be divided among them (Lk 12<sup>13</sup>). Because a child came to be looked upon as the holder of the κλήρος, and when he attained the proper age (Gal 4<sup>1</sup>) entered on possession, κληρονομος (κλήρος + νέμωμαι, 'hold') came to mean what we call an 'heir' (He 11<sup>9</sup>).* In this sense the word is used proleptically in the expression, 'This is ὁ κληρονόμος, let us kill him and the κληρονομία will become ours' (Mt 21<sup>38</sup>, Mk 12<sup>7</sup>, Lk 20<sup>14</sup>). Similarly the higher things of life came to be looked upon as something the κλήρος of which a man could hold. Noah became the holder of the κλήρος of righteousness (He 11<sup>7</sup>). Very significant as attaching excellency to a name, as a condensed form of the whole personality, is the expression that the Eternal Son διαφορωτερον κεκληρονόμηκεν ὄνομα, had allotted to Him a more excellent name (He 1<sup>4</sup>), and thus became the One to whom all things were allotted (He 1-), κληρονόμον παντῶν. Salvation, whether as promised or bestowed, is, in its ultimate eschatological form, something allotted. St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles was to open the eyes that they might receive κλήρον, an allotment, a thing falling to their lot, among them that are sanctified (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>). God, who is able to give them a κληρονομίαν among all them that are sanctified (Ac 20<sup>32</sup>),† Himself causes them to become partakers τοῦ κληρον, of the allotment of the saints in light (cf. Ps 15 [16]<sup>6</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup>), the ἀραβιών, the arles of the allotment, being the gift of the Holy Spirit (Eph 1<sup>14</sup>), and the ministry of the angels (He 1<sup>14</sup>). The promises of God are given as an allotment to those who exhibit faith and patience (He 6<sup>12</sup>), and Christian graciousness to others (1 P 3<sup>9</sup>); while to him who overcomes temptation there is given as an allotment the blessing that only God can give (Rev 21<sup>7</sup>), and to those who comport themselves rightly to the home circle there is given as a recompense the allotment (Col 3<sup>-4</sup>). The saints in this way become, as Israel of old (Dt 4<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>26</sup> 29 32<sup>9</sup>), the allotment which belongs to God (Eph 1<sup>11</sup>), ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν (N BKLP), and, being the riches of His glory (1<sup>18</sup>), are the heirs of all the promises (He 6<sup>17</sup>). Just as the earth is an allotment made to the meek (Mt 5<sup>5</sup>), and eternal life an allotment to those who have left houses, etc. (Mt 19<sup>-4</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 10<sup>25</sup> 18<sup>18</sup>, Gal 5<sup>-1</sup>), so there is a Kingdom in which the unrighteous (1 Co 6<sup>9-10</sup>), in which flesh and blood (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>), in which fornicators, etc. (Eph 5<sup>5</sup>), cannot receive an allotment; for it is an allotment prepared only for the blessed of the Father (Mt 25<sup>-4</sup>). It is therefore a spiritual allotment, incorruptible, undefiled (1 P 1<sup>4</sup>). This possession passes to men not through force of a legal enactment, but through their showing themselves heirs to it by their ethical and spiritual conduct. Thus the allotment of this world, promised to Abraham, passes to those linked to him not by flesh and blood, but only by the righteousness of faith (Ro

4<sup>13</sup>, 14), and only those who are thus in Christ are Abraham's progeny, and κληρονόμοι according to the promise (Gal 3<sup>29</sup>). They are the heirs of eternal life, according to hope (Tit 3<sup>7</sup>), and because they have loved their Lord (Ja 2<sup>5</sup>). Hence it is that the Gentiles equally with the Jews are συνκληρονόμοι, fellow heirs (Eph 3<sup>6</sup>), and wives are συνκληρονόμοις, joint heirs of the grace of life (1 P 3<sup>7</sup>).* The conception of salvation as something allotted to man may have tended to obscure the necessity for diligence and earnestness in the pursuit of the Christian ideal, and this again may account for the absence of the idea from the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. In actual life at least we are not unfamiliar with something similar.

While kleromancy, it is true, 'appeared to take the responsibility of decision out of the hands of man and vest it in the presiding deity,'† yet, in reality, its tendency is not to exalt the Divine will but to enervate the human mind. It thus tends to destroy our sense of responsibility, and the duty of patiently permitting God to enlighten our minds as to what is right. It thus robs us of the moral and spiritual discipline of acting according as conscience, enlightened by Him, dictates, and besides opens up infinite possibilities of trickery and fraud. Through the action of the eleven, and age-long influences, Jewish and pagan, kleromancy continued to be practised in the Church. Augustine held that divisory lots were lawful in common things but not in disposing of ecclesiastical offices and lives of men,‡ and similar views continued to prevail till near the end of the 17th century.§ Jeremy Taylor still thought it 'not improbable, and in most cases to be admitted, that God hath committed games of chance to the Devil's conduct.'|| Wesley believed in Divine guidance being given by lot,¶ and in 1738 a journey to Bristol was finally decided on, after various appeals to the Sortes Sanctorum, by kleromancy.<sup>**</sup> Among the Moravians, whose first ministers were chosen by lot, in 1467, and whose church life was at first completely regulated by kleromancy, its sphere was steadily and gradually limited, and it is now scarcely recognized.†† Though down to the end of the 16th cent. it was frequently practised,‡‡ and the prevailing view was that 'lots may not be used, but with great reverence, because the disposition of them cometh immediately from God,' yet the arguments of Gataker§§ that such Divine interposition was 'indeed mere superstition,' and that 'lots were governed by purely natural laws,' gradually influenced educated men. Among the more illiterate sects kleromancy long lingered, and the scene in Silas Marner (ch. 1) was true to life. Pious but ignorant people still resort to it in one form or another. The rule that when a lower type of religion is absorbed or superseded by a higher the ceremonies of the former finally become games, and then children's games, is illustrated by the fact that the casting of lots, once sacred and solemn, is now totally confined to games.

LOVE.—1. Linguistic usage.—Two verbs are used by the NT to designate religious love—ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν. In the LXX a third term, ἐρᾶν, occurs, but only once sensu bono, viz. Pr 4<sup>8</sup> (love of wisdom), once in a neutral sense, viz. Est 2<sup>17</sup> (the king loved Esther), everywhere else as a figure of idolatry or political theocratic unfaithfulness (Jer 22-0-22, La 1<sup>9</sup>, Ezk 16<sup>33</sup>, 36, 37, 23<sup>5</sup>, 9, -2, Hos 2<sup>7</sup>, 10, 12, 13). That the NT does not employ ἐρᾶν at all is probably due to the sensual associations of the word. In regard to the difference between ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν the following should be noticed. The etymology of ἀγαπᾶν is uncertain, but it seems to be allied to roots expressing 'admiration,' 'taking pride in,' 'taking pleasure in.' This points to the conclusion that ἀγαπᾶν is the love of selection and complacency based on the perception of something in the object loved that attracts and pleases. This element of selective attachment shows itself in the fact that ἀγαπᾶν can mean 'to be contented with,' 'to acquiesce in,' 'to put up with,' and also in this, that ἀγαπᾶν is not used of the love of mere compassion. On the other hand, φιλεῖν seems to have as its fundamental root-meaning the intimacy of bodily touch, 'fondling,' 'caressing,' whence it can signify 'to kiss'; it therefore denotes the love of close association in the habitual relations of life—love between kindred, between husband and wife, between friends (Mt 6<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>37</sup> 23<sup>6</sup>, Lk 20<sup>46</sup>, Jn 11<sup>3</sup>-36 12<sup>25</sup> 15<sup>19</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup> [φιλαργυρία], 2 Ti 3<sup>4</sup> [φιληρόνος], Tit 2<sup>4</sup> [φιλανδρός], Ja 4<sup>4</sup> [φιλία τοῦ κόσμου]). In Latin diligere corresponds to ἀγαπᾶν, amare to φιλεῖν, except that amare covers a wider range, corresponding also to the Greek ἐρᾶν. From this distinctive and fundamental meaning the fact may be explained that in biblical Greek ἀγαπᾶν is used exclusively where man's love for God comes under consideration: it here implies the recognition of the adorable and lovable character of the Deity. φιλεῖν is never used of man's love for God as such, because the mental attitude of intimacy which the word implies would be out of place in the creature with reference to the Deity (it is different where the love of the disciples for Jesus is spoken of [Jn 16<sup>27</sup> 21<sup>15</sup>-16, 17 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>]). Scripture prefers the word which unambiguously puts human love in the religious sphere on a moral and spiritual basis, even if, in order to do so, it has to leave somewhat of the intensity of the religious affection unexpressed. As designations of the love extending from God to man both ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν may be used, the former in so far as God's love is not blind impulse or irrational sentiment, but a love of free self-determination, the latter because it is proper to God by a gracious condescension to enter into that close habitual friendship with man which the word connotes. As a matter of fact, however, φιλεῖν is but rarely used to describe the love of God towards man.

In extra-biblical Greek love as extending from the gods to man seems to be an unknown conception, for according to Aristotle and Dio Chrysostom both ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν have place not in those who rule with reference to those they rule over, but only in the opposite direction: ἀποπὸν φιλεῖν τὸν Δία (where Δία is the subject).

It is in keeping with the distinction above drawn that the specific term for brotherly love (see art. BROTHERLY LOVE) is φιλαδελφία, for the idea is derived from the family-relation, although, of course, ἀγαπᾶν here occurs with equal frequency. On the other hand, of the love for enemies enjoined in the NT φιλεῖν never occurs, being excluded by the nature of the case, whereas ἀγαπᾶν, involving a deliberate movement of the will, may apply to such a relation.

While it appears from what has been said that ἀγαπᾶν had by reason of its inherent signification and classical use an antecedent fitness to express the biblical idea of religious love, this should not be construed to mean that the word carried already in extra-biblical Greek all the content of the Scriptural conception. In the profane usage the moral, spiritual element was yet lacking, although the elements of choice and rational attachment were given. Like so many other words which possessed an antecedent affinity for the biblical world of thought from a formal point of view, it needed the baptism of regeneration in order to become fit for incorporation into the vocabulary of Scripture.

The noun ἀγάπη seems to have been coined by the LXX to translate the OT conception of religious love. It is not found in classical Greek, nor even with Philo and Josephus. Perhaps the fact that the profane literature does not have the noun is significant. It can be explained on the principle that only through transference into the moral, spiritual sphere could the habitual character of the act of loving, which is inherent in the noun, originate. The noun in the Vulgate is caritas, from carum habere, which admirably expresses the specific character of the biblical conception. Caritas in turn gave rise to the 'charity' of the English Bible (AV), in most passages used of love towards fellow-Christians (cf., however, 1 Co 8<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>, where there is no reason so to restrict it). The RV substitutes 'love,' in all passages where the AV has 'charity' (26 times in all), for the reason that 'charity' has in modern usage become restricted to the love of beneficence or forbearance.

The following discussion confines itself to the love existing between God and man. For love as between man and man see art. BROTHERLY LOVE.

2. Love in the apostolic teaching.—Love is in the apostolic teaching a central and outstanding trait in the disposition of God towards man. In this respect the view taken by Jesus is fully adhered to. If in the witness of the early Church, as recorded in Acts, no direct affirmation of this principle is made, that can easily be explained from the apologetic purpose of this witness. In the fellowship of the first Christians among themselves the indirect operation of the new force introduced by Jesus into the hearts of His followers manifests itself clearly enough (Ac 2<sup>41-47</sup> 4<sup>32-37</sup>).

i. ST. PAUL.—With St. Paul love is explicitly placed in the foreground as the fundamental disposition in God from which salvation springs and as that which in the possession of God constitutes for the believer the supreme treasure of religion. God is the God of love (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>). In Gal 3<sup>22</sup> love is named first among the fruits of the Spirit. It is associated with the Fatherhood of God (Eph 6<sup>23</sup>). In the apostolic salutations it stands co-ordinated with the grace of Christ (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 6<sup>23</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup>). It is the greatest of the three fundamental graces of the Christian life, and the sole abiding one of these three (1 Co 13<sup>8-13</sup>). This primacy love can claim even in comparison with faith. For, on the one hand, faith as well as hope is a grace made necessary by the provisional conditions of the present sinful world, and in both its aspects—that of mediate spiritual perception and that of trust—will be superseded by sight in the world to come (2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>); on the other hand, faith as compared with love is instrumental, not an end in itself; it brings the Christian into that fundamental relation to God, wherein his religious faculties, foremost among which is love, can function normally (Gal 5<sup>5</sup>). The prominence of faith in the Pauline teaching is not therefore indicative of its absolute and final preponderance in the Christian consciousness. It would, however, scarcely be in accordance with St. Paul's view to press the primacy of love to the extent of denying all independent significance to other religious states. There is an aspect in which faith in itself, and apart from its working through love, glorifies God (Ro 4<sup>2</sup>), and whatever thus directly contributes to the Divine glory has inherent religious value. The same must be affirmed of the knowledge of God. The emphasis thrown throughout the NT on the value of truth cannot be wholly explained from its soteriological utility. It expresses the conviction that knowing and adoring God are in themselves a religious act, apart from all fructifying influence on the believer's life. When St. Paul includes 'knowledge' (1 Co 13<sup>8</sup>) in the things that shall be done away, this applies only to the specific mode of knowledge in this life, the 'seeing in a mirror darkly,' the knowledge of a child, which will make place in the world to come for a full knowledge 'face to face,' analogous to the Divine knowledge of the believer (v. 12). 'Knowledge,' while of value, is not equal in value to love (1 Co 8<sup>3</sup>).

(a) The love of God.—It has been alleged that in two respects the Apostle's teaching on the love of God marks a retrogression as compared with the gospel of Jesus: on the one hand, St. Paul restricts the love of God to the circle of believers, thus making sonship co-extensive with adoption = justification; on the other hand, he emphasizes, side by side with love, the working of sovereignty and justice as equally influential attributes in God, whence also the effectual communication of the Divine love to the sinner cannot, according to the Apostle, take place except as a result of the sovereign choice of God and after satisfaction to His justice. This charge, however, rests on a misunderstanding of the teaching of Jesus. Jesus, by way of correction to the prevailing commercial conception of God's attitude towards man in Judaism, brings forward the love of God. Nevertheless the specific Fatherly love and the corresponding state of sonship are in His gospel, no less than with St. Paul, redemptive conceptions, pertaining not to man as such, but to the disciples, the heirs of the kingdom. This may be seen most clearly from the fact that in its highest aspect sonship is an eschatological attainment (Mt 5<sup>9</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36</sup>; cf. Ro 8<sup>23</sup>). It is true that a developed soteriology like St. Paul's, delimiting the mutual claims of the love and justice of God, is not found in our Lord's teaching. But this could not be expected before the supreme saving transaction—the Death of Christ—had actually taken place. The great principles on which the Atonement rests are enunciated with sufficient clearness (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). In comparisons between Jesus and St. Paul it is frequently overlooked that what corresponds to the Apostle's soteriology is the eschatological element in Jesus' teaching. As a matter of fact, St. Paul's doctrine of salvation was developed in the closest dependence on his eschatology. If the comparison be instituted with this in mind, it will be seen that in our Lord's eschatological utterances the sovereignty and justice of God occupy no less central a place than in the Pauline doctrine of salvation, and that the love of God in its eschatological setting is to Jesus as much a redemptive factor as it is in the Pauline gospel.

The phrase 'the love of God' occurs in the Pauline Epistles in Ro 5<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>39</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup>, Tit 3<sup>4</sup> (φιλανθρωπία); 'the love of Christ' occurs in Ro 8<sup>35</sup> (variant reading 'love of God'), 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, Eph 3<sup>19</sup>; 'the love of God in Christ' in Ro 8<sup>39</sup>. In all these cases the genitive is a subjective genitive. In 'the love of the Spirit' (Ro 15<sup>30</sup>) the genitive seems to be that of origin (cf. Col 1<sup>4</sup>). Some exegetes propose for Ro 5<sup>5</sup> and 2 Th 3<sup>5</sup> 'love towards God.' In the former passage the context is decisive against this (cf. v. 8, and the fact that the consciousness of 'the love of God' furnishes the basis for the certainty of the Christian hope). In 2 Th 3<sup>3</sup> the sense is determined by the parallel phrase, υπομονη του Χριστου; if this could mean the 'patient waiting for Christ' (AV), then αγαπη του θεου would be 'love for God.' Such a rendering, however, seems to be linguistically improbable, and the ordinary interpretation of υπομονη as 'patience,' 'steadfastness,' requires Χριστου as a subjective genitive. The meaning is not that the love of God and the patience of Christ are held up as models to the readers, but the Apostle prays that their hearts may be directed to a full reliance on the love of God and the steadfastness of Christ as the two mainstays of their salvation. In 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup> η γαρ αγαπη του Χριστου συνεχει ημας is not to be explained on analogy with the preceding 'fear of the Lord' (v. 11), nor in contrast to the knowledge of 'Christ after the flesh' (v. 16), in the sense of St. Paul's love for Christ; but, in close agreement with the following 'One died for all,' it is meant of the love Christ showed by His Death.

To St. Paul the love of God is throughout a specifically redemptive love. Its manifestation is seldom sought in Nature and providence (Ro 8<sup>23</sup>, 'all things'), but regularly in the work of salvation. Since this work culminates in the Death of Christ, the Cross is the crowning manifestation of the Divine love (Ro 5<sup>8</sup>). What thus finds supreme expression at its height underlies the entire process as its primordial source. The love of God is to St. Paul the fountain of redemption. It lies behind its objective part, what is theologically called 'the Atonement,' for St. Paul traces this in both its aspects of reconciliation and redemption to the one source. As regards reconciliation, the initiative of love is inherent in the conception itself, since God makes those who were objectively His enemies His friends, creating by the Death of Christ the possibility for His love to manifest itself (Ro 5<sup>8, 10, 11</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14, 18-21</sup>). The idea of redemption has the same implications, for it emphasizes the self-sacrifice of love to which God was put in saving man (Ac 20<sup>23</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>20, 7, 23</sup>). This love is unmerited love, hence its more specific name of χαρις, 'grace.' It is 'love,' not mere 'mercy' or 'pity,' which determines God's attitude towards the sinner. The mercy is enriched by the love (Eph 2<sup>4</sup>). The usual associations of αγαπην apply to the love of God for sinners only in so far as it is a deliberate movement of the Divine will and purpose, not because there is something admirable or attractive in the spiritual and ethical condition of man which would explain its origin. For the very reason that it springs spontaneously from God without objective motivation, this Divine love is a mystery 'passing knowledge' (Eph 3<sup>19</sup>). Salvation on its subjective side is derived by St. Paul even more clearly from the love of God. The gift of the Spirit is a pledge of it to the believer; hence with the pouring forth of the Spirit into the heart, the love of God is poured out therein (Ro 5<sup>5</sup>). On the consciousness of this love rests the certainty of hope in the completion of salvation (Ro 8<sup>24, 30</sup>). St. Paul calls the love underlying the application of redemption προγνωσις, 'foreknowledge' (Ro 8<sup>9</sup>); the simple γνωσκειν in this specific sense occurs in 1 Co 8<sup>3</sup>, Gal 4<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>19</sup>. This term denotes not an intellectual prescience; but, in dependence on the pregnant sense of the Hebrew יָדַע (Ex 2<sup>25</sup>, Hos 13<sup>6</sup>, Am 3<sup>2</sup>), it means that God sovereignly sets His affection upon a person. The absoluteness and unconditioned character of this prognosis are such that it can furnish proof for the proposition that all things work together for the good of believers. Hence it fixes as the destiny of believers ('predestination') eschatological likeness unto the image of the glorified Christ, and with infallible certainty moves forward through the two intermediate stages of vocation and justification to the goal of this glory (Ro 8<sup>28-30</sup>). The conception of ἐκλογη, ἐκλέγεσθαι (middle voice, 'to choose for one's self') has likewise for its correlate the sovereign love of God (Eph 1<sup>4</sup>). The association of the redemptive love of God with His prerogative or sovereign choice renders the word αγαπην especially suitable for describing the relation involved. It is in the interest of emphasizing both the sovereign Divine initiative and the energy and richness of effectuation of redemptive love that St. Paul affirms its eternity (connoted also by the προ- in προγνωσκειν [Eph 1<sup>4</sup>]).

The love of God does not exclude for St. Paul the co-ordination of other attributes in God as jointly determinative of the Divine redemptive procedure. In the Cross of Christ is the great manifestation of love, but it is not the love of God alone that the Cross proclaims. It also demonstrates the δικαιοσυνη=the justice of God (Ro 3<sup>25ff.</sup>). The attempt of Ritschl (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, ii. [1882-83], pp. 118, 218 ff.) and others to give to δικαιοσυνη in this context the sense of gracious righteousness, making it synonymous with the love of God, breaks down in view of the 'forbearance' of v. 25. If it was 'forbearance' which postponed under the Old Covenant the demonstration of God's righteousness, then this righteousness is conceived as retributive.

(b) The love of Christ.—The love of Christ St. Paul views chiefly as manifested in His Death (2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>), or in His life as entered upon and lived with a view to and culminating in His Death (Ph 2<sup>5ff.</sup>). The Incarnation is an act of self-kenosis, not in the metaphysical, but in the metaphorical sense (AV 'made himself of no reputation'), hence is described in 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> as a 'becoming poor.' It ought to be noticed that the love of Christ, as well as that of the believer, is in the first place a love for God, and after that a love for man. Christ lives unto God, even in the state of glory (Ro 6<sup>10</sup>), and gave Himself in the Atonement a sacrifice unto God (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>).

(c) Love towards God.—The references to the believer's love for God are not numerous in the Pauline Epistles. Explicit mention of it is made in Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>. From his anti-pietistic standpoint Ritschl would interpret this scarcity of reference in St. Paul and the NT generally (outside of St. Paul only Ja 1<sup>12, 25</sup>) as due to the feeling that love to God is something hardly within the religious reach of man. He observes that in 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> the phrase 'them that love God' is a quotation, and surmises that the same quotation underlies all the other passages except 1 Co 8<sup>3</sup> (op. cit. ii. 100). But this is a mere surmise, and St. Paul has at least in one passage appropriated the thought for himself. Besides this the analogy of the love of Christ for God favours the ascription of love for God to the believer. The same 'living for God' which is predicated of Christ (Ro 6<sup>10</sup>) is elsewhere attributed to the Christian (Gal 2<sup>19</sup>). As Christ sacrificed Himself to God (Eph 5<sup>2</sup>), so the believer's life is a spiritual sacrifice (Ro 1<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>). The Fatherhood of God and the sonship of the believer postulate the idea of a mutual love (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). The idea is also implied in the fact that St. Paul places at the beginning of the Christian life a crucifixion and destruction of the love for self and the world (Ro 6<sup>6</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>), since under the Apostle's positive conception of the Christian life something else must take the place of the previous goals. The glorifying of God in all things has for its underlying motive the love of God (Ro 14<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>31</sup>, Eph 1<sup>12</sup>).

ii. PASTORAL EPISTLES.—In the Pastoral Epistles the universality of the love of God is emphasized. In the earlier Epistles the Apostle's universalism is not deduced from the love of God but from other principles, and is distinctly of an international type. The Pastoral Epistles make of the love of God a universalizing principle and extend it to all men, not merely to men of every nation (1 Ti 2<sup>4-6</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>13</sup>, Tit 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>4</sup>). In some of these passages the context clearly indicates that a reference of God's love to all classes of men is intended (cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>4</sup> with vv. 1-2; Tit 2<sup>11</sup> with vv. 2-10). But the emphasis and frequency with which the principle is brought forward render it probable that some specific motive underlies its assertion. So far as the inclusion of magistrates is concerned, there may be a protest against a form of Jewish particularism which deemed it unlawful to pray for pagan magistrates. In the main the passages cited will have to be interpreted as a warning against the dualistic trend of Gnosticism. Gnosticism distinguished between two classes of men, the πνευματικοί and the ὕλικοι, the latter by their very nature being unsuceptible to, and excluded from, salvation, the former carrying the potency of salvation by nature in themselves. Over against this the Pastorals emphasize that the love of God saves all men, that no man is by his subjective condition either sunk beneath the possibility or raised above the necessity of salvation. Hence the φιλανθρωπία of God in Tit 3<sup>4</sup> is love for man as man, not for any aristocracy of the πνεῦμα. This philanthropy is not to be confounded with the classical conception of the same (cf. Ac 27<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>2</sup>), for the latter is not love towards man as such, but simply justice towards one's fellow-man in the several relations of life, and is conceived without regard to the internal disposition. Probably the choice of the word is in Tit 3<sup>4</sup> determined by the preceding description of the conduct required of believers for which the Divine 'philanthropy' furnishes the model. But that its content goes far beyond general benevolence may be seen from this, that it communicates itself through the Christian redemption in the widest sense (vv. 5-7). In all this there is nothing either calculated or intended to weaken the Pauline doctrine of the specific elective love of God embracing believers. The Pastorals affirm this no less than the earlier Epistles.

iii. EPISTLE OF JAMES.—The Epistle of James by calling the commandment of love 'the royal law' (2<sup>8</sup>) places love in the centre of religion. This love is not merely love for men but love to God (2<sup>5</sup>). It chooses God and rejects the world, the love for God and the friendship of the world being mutually exclusive (4<sup>1</sup>). It manifests itself in blessing God (3<sup>9</sup>). Behind this love for God, however, St. James, no less than St. Paul and St. John, posits the love of God for the sinner. God is Father of believers (3<sup>9</sup>). They that love God are chosen of God (2<sup>5</sup>). The Divine love is a love of mercy; even in the Day of Judgment it retains the form of mercy (2<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>20</sup>). It is a jealous love, which requires the undivided affection of its object (4<sup>5</sup>). An echo of the Synoptical preaching of Jesus may be found in this that St. James sees the love of God demonstrated in the gifts not merely of redemption, but likewise of providence (1<sup>7</sup>).

iv. EPISTLES OF PETER.—The Epistles of Peter dwell on the love of Christ rather than on that of God. Christ's love is a love of self-denial (1 P 2<sup>1</sup>) and of benevolence for evil-doers (3<sup>18</sup>). To it corresponds love for Christ in the heart of believers. St. Peter shows that this love is strong enough to assert and maintain itself in the face of the invisibility of Christ (1<sup>8</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>20</sup>). The love for God and Christ is consistent with and accompanied by fear (1 P 1<sup>17-18</sup>). God's love is implied in the mercy which lies behind regeneration (1<sup>3</sup>). God is the Father of believers (1<sup>17</sup>); they are the flock of God (5<sup>2</sup>); He (or Christ) is the Shepherd

v. HEBREWS.—The theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews—the perfect mediation of priestly approach unto God—coupled with the writer's vivid perception of the majesty of God brings it about that the love of God remains in the background. The Epistle emphasizes the fear of God even for believers (4<sup>1</sup> 11-13 12<sup>9</sup>). Still believers are sons of God (2<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>7</sup>), brethren of Christ (2<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>17</sup>). God loves His children as the Father of Spirits (12<sup>9-10</sup>). He is the God of His people in the pregnant sense (11<sup>16</sup>). The subsumption of the greater part of the religious consciousness under faith brings it about that the love of Christians is less spoken of here than elsewhere in the NT. It is mentioned in 6<sup>10</sup> as a love shown towards God's name, i.e. towards God, in the service of the brethren. The Epistle, on the other hand, makes much of the love of Christ for believers as it assumes the form of mercy. This mercy is, however, not motivated by the mere suffering as such, but specifically by the moral aspect of the suffering. It is compassion with the moral weakness and danger arising from suffering, because suffering becomes a source of temptation. Christ can exercise this mercy because He Himself has experienced the tempting power of suffering (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>).

vi. JOHANNINE LITERATURE.—There still remains to be considered the Johannine literature including the Gospel, so far as the statements of the Evangelist himself are concerned. Both the Gospel and the First Epistle represent love as the ultimate source and the ultimate goal of Christianity. There is this difference, that what is in the Gospel related to Christ as love of Christ and love for Christ, is in the Epistle related to God in both directions. In the Apocalypse love to Jesus appears in 2<sup>4</sup>, love of Jesus in 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>. 'The love of God' is not uniformly, as in St. Paul, the love which God shows, but partly this (1 Jn 2<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>9-12</sup>) and partly also the love cherished towards God (Jn 5<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>3</sup>). Possibly the construction is meant as an inclusive one: 'the love which God has made known and which answers to His nature' (so B. F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, 1883, p. 49). Love is to St. John as to St. Paul a specifically Divine thing. Wherever it appears in man, it must be traced back to God, and particularly to God's love (1 Jn 4<sup>10-19</sup>). Its source lies in regeneration (4<sup>7</sup>). The Divine primordial love is grace, not motivated by the excellence of human qualities, for it expressed itself in giving Christ as a propitiation for sin (4<sup>9-10</sup>). The supreme manifestation of God's love is the gift of Christ, and Christ's giving of His own life for man (3<sup>16</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>, Rev 3<sup>9</sup>). Hence the Gospel characterizes the love which Jesus showed in His Death as an αγαπήν εἰς τέλος ('to the uttermost'). The giving of the Spirit of God is an act of love not merely because the Spirit is an inestimable gift, but because in the Spirit God communicates Himself; herein lies the essence of love (1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>). The highest embodiment of this redemptive love is the state of sonship (1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). The Apocalypse uses for this, as extending to the Church collectively, the OT figure of the bride of God (Rev 19<sup>7</sup> 21<sup>2-9</sup>). Sonship is not represented, as in St. Paul, as awaiting its eschatological consummation, but rather as issuing into a higher, yet unknown, state (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). The summing up of the Christian life in love is represented as 'a new commandment,' which is at the same time old (2<sup>7-8</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 2<sup>2</sup>). It is old in so far as it goes back to the creation ('from the beginning' [2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>, 2 Jn 5<sup>6</sup>]); it is new in so far as through Jesus and His work it has now become an actuality in the life and experience of Christians; hence 'it is true in him and in you' (1 Jn 2<sup>8</sup>). In both the Gospel and the First Epistle

'to know God' is used as synonymous with 'loving God.' 'To know' is taken in such connexions in the pregnant sense which implies intimacy of acquaintance and the fellowship of affection. At the same time there is in this an indirect protest against the unethical intellectualism of the false Gnosis (1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup>. 4. 13. 14 3<sup>1</sup>. 6 4<sup>6</sup>. 7. 8. 16 5<sup>20</sup>).

Both the Gospel and the First Epistle emphasize the universalism of the love of God as demonstrated in the gift of Christ for the sin of 'the world.' In Jn 3<sup>16</sup> 'the world' (ὁ κόσμος) seems to be rather qualitatively than quantitatively conceived; the greatness of God's love is seen in this, that He loves that which is sinful (cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup>). Both the Gospel and the Epistle also lay stress on the primacy of love in the character of God (1 Jn 4<sup>8</sup>. 16). That the universalism must not be understood as appropriating the love of God in its most pregnant sense to every man indiscriminately appears from such statements as Jn 6<sup>37</sup>. 39. 44 13<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>19</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>. 9. 12. A predestinarian strand is traceable in St. John as well as in St. Paul. And that the clear statement about the primacy of love in God should not be construed to the exclusion of every other attribute or disposition in God appears plainly from the difference which both the Gospel and the Epistle make between God's and Christ's attitude towards the world and towards believers—a difference inconceivable were there in God no place for aught but love. The statement 'God is love' means to affirm that into His love God puts His entire being, all the strength of His character. In the Apocalypse it is most vividly brought out that in God, besides love for His own, there is wrath for His enemies (cf. even 'the wrath of the Lamb' [6<sup>16</sup>]), although it is to be noticed that the Apocalypse speaks as little as the Gospel and the Epistle of God's hatred towards His enemies. The latter term is reserved for the description of the attitude of the world towards God and Christ and believers. The hatred of the world explains the righteous wrath of God and believers against the world (Jn 3<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>18</sup>. 23. 24. 25 17<sup>14</sup> Rev 9<sup>5</sup>).

LOVE-FEAST.—The history of the Agapæ or Love-Feasts of the Christian Church is beset with peculiar difficulties, and has given rise to grave differences of opinion among scholars. It has even been maintained by Batiffol* that they were absolutely non-existent in the Apostolic Age; and, though this view has not found general acceptance, it certainly deserves to be treated with respect. The name is indeed found only in the Epistle of Jude (v. 12; cf. also 2 P 2<sup>13</sup>), the date of which is quite uncertain; and it is probable that in the earliest days the name was unknown. Still there is reason to believe that the common meals, which afterwards gained the name of Agapæ, were held by Christians from the beginning. These common meals were an external expression of the sense of brotherhood which was characteristic of the primitive Christian churches, and they were no doubt suggested by similar institutions, which seem to have been common among both Jews and Gentiles. It is also probable that the recollection of the Last Supper of our Lord with His disciples was an additional cause of the holding of these meals.

1. In the Acts.—The Acts of the Apostles gives us a picture of the life of the primitive Church at Jerusalem.* In Ac 2<sup>42</sup> we read that the converts 'continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers.' In v. 46 we read that 'day by day, continuing stedfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread at home, they did take their food with gladness and singleness of heart.' These passages are patient of an interpretation which excludes anything like an Agape. 'Breaking bread' may refer only to the Eucharist; and the reference to the taking of food may be merely an expression denoting their joyous manner of life. So it is understood by Batiffol.† But the view of Leclercq‡ seems more probable—that the breaking of bread was accompanied by a meal. For we know that that was the case at Corinth, and it is exceedingly probable that the communism of the Church at Jerusalem would involve common meals. Indeed, something of the kind seems to be indicated by Ac 6<sup>1</sup>. That this included the Eucharist there can be very little doubt, though it is unlikely that it was identical with the Eucharist. The 'breaking of the bread' is an unusual phrase, and as it seems clear that in Corinth the Eucharist took place during or at the end of a supper, so it probably did in Jerusalem. But the evidence is not sufficient to make any conclusion certain. In Ac 20<sup>7-11</sup> we read that at Troas on the first day of the week the Christians were gathered together to break bread. St. Paul spoke to them till midnight, broke bread and tasted it. Here the object of the meeting was the breaking of bread. And the whole context points to its having been a religious rite. There is no hint of a meal in the ordinary sense. The word γενομένου certainly does not necessarily imply it. It is, however, possible, though it seems unlikely, that such a meal took place.

2. In 1 Corinthians.—We now come to the account given in 1 Co 11<sup>18-34</sup> of the Eucharist at Corinth: 'When ye assemble yourselves together, it is not possible to eat the Lord's supper: for in your eating each one taketh before other his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken. What? have ye not houses to eat and drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and put them to shame that have not? . . . When ye come together to eat, wait one for another. If any man is hungry, let him eat at home; that your coming together be not unto judgement.' The most probable interpretation of the passage is that St. Paul blames the Corinthians for misbehaviour at the supper, which should be the Lord's Supper, but cannot be so regarded in view of their behaviour. It seems that the rich men brought their own food, and immediately on arrival formed groups, and began to eat their supper without waiting to see whether there were any poor men present who had nothing to eat. St. Paul suggests that if they are hungry, they had better have something to eat before they come. The whole supper is the Lord's, for He is the host. And St. Paul reminds them of the significance of what takes place at the supper, namely the Eucharist—a real Communion with the Body and Blood of Christ, and a memorial of His Death.

Batiffol, on the other hand, maintains that St. Paul blames them for associating the Eucharist with a meal at all, and the same view was previously taken by John Lightfoot.§ It must be admitted that his language in v. 22, 'Have ye not houses to eat and to drink in?' seems logically to imply that the assembly of Christians is not a suitable occasion for a meal. But his exhortation to them to 'wait one for another' seems to have no point unless there is to be a meal. While the considerations adduced by St. Paul no doubt were ultimately operative in bringing about a separation of the Eucharist from the Agape, yet it is highly probable that they were not carried to their logical conclusion at once, nor indeed intended to be so carried. There is no doubt that there was a supper at Corinth at the time when St. Paul wrote; that all the members of the Church came together to it, bringing their own contributions. This was apparently a sort of funeral memorial feast, sacred in its associations, but especially sacred because in the course of it the Eucharist was celebrated. This meal was desecrated by the Corinthians, who ignored its sacred character, making it no longer an expression of the brotherhood of the community, but an ordinary meal, and an occasion for display and gluttony.

3. In Jude and 2 Peter.—The writer of the Epistle of Jude speaks (v.<sup>1</sup>) of certain heretics who are 'hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you.' In the parallel passage in 2 P<sup>2</sup><sup>13</sup> the bulk of the MSS read ἀγάπαις for ἀγάπαις. J. B. Lightfoot* regards ἀγάπαις as an obvious error for ἀγάπαις, and Bigg† follows him in this view. The matter is of no importance for our purpose, as it is the opinion of the majority of scholars that 2 Peter is dependent on Jude, and there can be no reasonable doubt that in Jude ἀγάπαις is the right reading. Batiffol maintains that Jude is in the habit of using plurals instead of singulars, and understands him here to mean 'love' with no reference to the Agape. But this translation of the word does not seem possible; and we are clearly driven to the conclusion that, among the people to whom Jude wrote, the Agape was an established institution, and the name had already been given to it. But the destination of the Epistle is very doubtful. M. R. James‡ writes: 'We may place the community to which he writes very much where we please: Dr. Chase's conjecture§ that it was at or near the Syrian Antioch is as good as any.' There is nothing to indicate the relation of the Agape mentioned by Jude to the Eucharist. It seems most probable that, as in Corinth, the Eucharist took place at or near the end of the supper. St. Paul's words μετὰ τὸ δεῖνῃσθαι in 1 Co 11<sup>25</sup> make it fairly certain that Chrysostom is wrong in his statement that the Eucharist was followed by a meal. No doubt Chrysostom based his view on the customs of his own time, when fasting communion was the rule.

4. Analogies with Love-Feast.—A great deal of information has been collected by Leclercq|| about the prevalence of funeral banquets all round the Mediterranean. These banquets were originally for the benefit of the dead, though later they became simply memorial meals. These supply us with an analogy to the Agape. But it is probable that even more operative was the example of the common meals of the various guilds which were a prominent feature of social life in Greek cities. It would be most natural that converts to Christianity should welcome a Christian common meal, on the lines of those to which they were accustomed. Parallels are also to be found among the Jews.¶ Unfortunately, our evidence is not sufficient to enable us to draw a clear picture of what the Christian Agape was like. It was not purely a charity-supper, though the evidence of the Corinthians shows us that it was intended that this characteristic should not be wholly absent. It seems to have been primarily an expression of the sense of brotherhood which Christians felt. The fact that the Eucharist was associated with it gave it a specially sacred character, and makes it certain that it must have been connected in the minds of those who took part in it with the Last Supper. But abuses arose in connexion with it both in Corinth and—apparently—among those to whom the Epistle of Jude was written. The evidence which we have suggests plenty of reasons for the separation of the Eucharist from the Agape, which seems to have taken place at an early date.

LUCAS.—See LUKE.

LUCIUS.—Lucius of Cyrene was one of the prophets and teachers who presided in the Church at Antioch (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>). He seems to have belonged pretty certainly to the band of Cypriotes and Cyrenians by whom the Gentile Church at Antioch was founded (11<sup>4</sup>). Some commentators have rather absurdly identified him with St. Luke. The names are not identical or even very near one another, and there is no reason to think that St. Luke would have introduced himself in this haphazard way. He may be identified with the Lucius of Ro 16<sup>3</sup>.

W. A. SPOONER.

**LUKE.—I. INFORMATION AS TO HIS HISTORY.

—1. In the Pauline Epistles.—The Pauline Epistles contain various references to a certain Luke, who is in tradition always identified with the author of the Acts and Third Gospel. These references are: (1) ἀσπάζεταισθε υἱας Λουκᾶς ὁ ἰατρός ὁ ἀγαπητός (Col 4<sup>14</sup>); (2) ἀσπάζεταισθε . . . Λουκᾶς (Philem 24); (3) Λουκᾶς ἐστὶν μετ' ἐμοῦ (2 Ti 4<sup>11</sup>). From these scanty allusions we can gather that Luke was a companion of St. Paul at the time that Colossians (with its appendix Philemon) and 2 Timothy were written, and also that he was a physician. The trustworthiness of these statements may reasonably be regarded as falling short of the highest grade. The authenticity of Colossians (q.v.) is probable, but cannot be regarded as quite so certain as that of the earlier Epistles; there is a difference between the group Colossians-Ephesians and the group Corinthians-Galatians-Romans which extends to thought as well as to language, and raises the suggestion that the former group is either un-Pauline or has been much edited. It is on the whole perhaps probable that this doubt ought to be put aside on the ground that the theories of interpolation or pseudopigraphy cause more difficulties than they solve, but the point has not yet been sufficiently discussed by critics. In the same way and in somewhat greater measure the reference in 2 Timothy must be discounted, on the ground of doubts as to the authenticity of the Epistle. So long as these doubts exist, the possibility cannot be entirely excluded that the references to Luke ought to be regarded as the result of the tradition, rather than as the proof of its accuracy.

A similar element of doubt attaches to the question of the place in which Luke and St. Paul were working together (συνεργὸς μου in Philem<sup>24</sup> covers Luke). There is no critical agreement as to whether the so-called Epistles of the Imprisonment were written from Caesarea, from Rome, or (according to a more recent hypothesis) from Ephesus. It is, however, noticeable that, as Harnack points out (Lukas der Arzt, Leipzig, 1906, p. 2), Luke is not referred to as a 'fellow-prisoner,' and there is consequently a presumption that he had accompanied St. Paul in freedom and as a friend.

2. In tradition.—Very little is added by tradition to the information in the Pauline Epistles except (a) the constant attribution to Luke of the Third Gospel and Acts; (b) the statement that he was an Antiochene Greek; (c) somewhat less frequently, statements that he died in Bœotia, Bithynia, or Ephesus; (d) the statement, found only in late MSS, that the Gospel was written in Alexandria. The most important expressions of tradition are those of (1) Eusebius; (2) Jerome; (3) the Monarchian Prologues, found in Vulgate MSS, and possibly of Priscillianist origin; (4) notes appended to NT MSS.

(1) Eusebius.—

Λουκάς δὲ τὸ μὲν γένος ὦν τῶν ἀπ' Ἀντιοχείας, τὴν δὲ ἐπιστήμην ἱατρὸς, τὰ πλείστα συγγεγονὸς τῷ Παύλῳ, καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς δὲ οὐ παρέργως τῶν ἀποστόλων ὠμολήκως, ἡς ἀπὸ τούτων προσεκτετατοὺς ψυχῶν θεραπευτικῆς ἐν δυνάμει ὑποδείγματα θεοπνευστοῖς καταλλόειπε βιβλίοις τῷ τε εὐαγγελίῳ, ὃ καὶ χαράξαι μαρτυρεῖται, καθὰ παρέδοτο αὐτῷ ὁ ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρεταὶ γενόμενοι τοῦ λόγου οἷς καὶ φθινὴν ἐπ' αὐτῶν ἀπασιν παρηκολούθηκεναι, καὶ ταῖς τῶν ἀποστόλων πράξεσιν αὐς οὐκέτι δι' ἀκοῆς οὐθαλίμους δὲ αὐτοῖς παραλαβὴν συνετάξατο. Φασὶ δὲ ὡς ἄρα τὸν κατ' αὐτὸν εὐαγγελίου μνημονεύειν εἰωθεν ὁ Παῦλος ὁπρῆκα ὡς περὶ ἰδίου τινος εὐαγγελίου γράφων ἔλεγε· 'κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου' (HE iii. 4, 6).

This, which is the basis of almost all later statements, shows no knowledge beyond what can be deduced from the Epistles, combined with (i.) the belief that the same Luke wrote Acts and Gospel; (ii.) the statements in the preface to the Gospel; (iii.) the (undoubtedly mistaken) view that St. Paul was referring to a book when he spoke of 'his gospel' (Ro 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>); (iv.) possibly the text in some MSS (which may belong to that I recension which, on von Soden's view, was familiar to Eusebius) of Ac 11<sup>26</sup>: ἐν ταύταις ταῖς ἡμέραις κατὰ τὴν ἀπὸ Ἱεροσολύμων προφήται εἰς Ἀντιόχειαν συνεστραμμένον δὲ ἡμῶν ἔφη εἰς ἐξ αὐτῶν ὀνομαστὶ Ἀγαθὸς κτλ. (D p w Aug.); this is, however, by no means certain; and there is no proof that this text was known to Eusebius.

(2) Jerome.—

*Lucas medicus Antiochenis, ut eius scripta indicant, Græci sermonis non ignarus fuit, sectator apostoli Pauli et omnis peregrinationis eius comes scripsit evangelium, de quo demum Paulus: Misimus, inquit, cum illo fratrem cuius laus est in evangelio per omnes ecclesias; ed ad Colossenses: Salutat vos Lucas, medicus carissimus; et ad Timotheum: Lucas est mecum solus. Aliud quoque edidit volumen egregium quod titulo praxeis apostolorum prænotatur: cuius historia usque ad biennium Romæ commemorantis Pauli pervenit, id est, usque ad quartum Neronis annum. Ex quo intelligimus in eadem urbe librum esse compositum. Igitur per iohannis Pauli et Theclæ, et totam baptizati leonis fabulam, inter apocryphas scripturas computamus. [Then there follows the well-known passage about the Acts of Paul, quoting Tertullian (see Acts [APOCRYPHAL]). . . . Quidam suspicantur quotiescumque in epistolis suis Paulus dicit, Iuxta evangelium meum, de Lucæ significare volumine, et[?] at] Lucam non solum ab apostolo Paulodidicisse evangelium, qui cum domino in carne non fuerat, sed a ceteris apostolis; quod ipse quoque in principio sui voluminis declarat, dicens: Sicut tradiderunt nobis qui a principio ipsi viderunt et ministri fuerunt sermonis. Igitur evangelium, sicut audierat, scripsit. Acta vero apostolorum sicut viderat ipse composuit. Vixit octoginta et quatuor annos, uxorem non habens. Sepultus est Constantinopoli, ad quam urbem vicesimo Constantii anno ossa eius cum reliquiis Andræ apostoli translata sunt de Achaia' (de Vir. Illustr. vii.).

(3) The Monarchian Prologues.—

*Lucas Syrus natione Antiochenis, arte medicus, discipulus apostolorum, postea Paulum secutus usque ad confessionem eius, serviens deo sine crimine. Nam neque uxorem umquam habens neque filios LXXIII annorum obiit in Bithynia plenus spiritu sancto—qui cum iam descripta essent evangelia per Matthæum quidem in Iudæa, per Marcum autem in Italia, sancto instigante spiritu in Achaia partibus hoc scripsit evangelium, significans etiam ipse in principio ante alia esse descripta. Cui extra ea quæ ordo evangelicæ dispositionis exposcit, ea maxime necessitas laboris fuit, ut primum Græcis fidelibus omni perfectione venturi in carnem dei manifestata, ne Iudaicis fabulis intenti in solo legis desiderio tenerentur neque hereticis fabulis et stultis sollicitationibus seducti excederet a veritate, elaboraret, dehinc ut in principio evangelii Iohannis nativitate præsumpta cui evangelium scriberet et in quo electus scriberet, indicaret, contestans in se completa esse quæ essent ab aliis inchoata, cui ideo post baptismum filii dei a perfectione generationis in Christo inpletæ et repetendæ a principio nativitatis humanæ potestas permissa est ut requiritibus demonstraret, in quo adprehendens erat, per Nathan filium introitu recurrentis in deum generationis admissio indispertibilis dei, prædicans in hominibus Christum suum perfecti opus hominis redire in se per filium facere, qui per David patrem venientibus iter præbebat in Christo. Quod legitibus ac requiritibus deum etsi per singula expediri a nobis utile fuerat, scientes tamen, quod operantem agricolam oporteat de fructibus suis edere, vitavimus publicam curiositatem, ne non tam volentibus deum videremur quam fastidientibus proditis' (the full text of the Monarchian Prologues is given in Kleine Texte, i., by H. Lietzmann, Bonn, 1902, and there is a full discussion by P. Corsen in TU xv. 1 [1896]).

(4) Information in MSS of the Gospels.—Almost all the later MSS contain statements at the beginnings or ends of the various books relating to their authors. They are of course important as representing ecclesiastical tradition rather than as containing historical evidence. The most complete list of the Greek ones, is given by von Soden in Die Schriften des NT, i., Berlin, 1902, p. 293 ff. The most important items referring to Luke are the following:

(i.) συνεγράφη τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν εὐαγγέλιον μετὰ χρόνους αἵ (15) τῆς τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀναλήψεως ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ Ἑλληνιστί. There is also a form of substantially the same note beginning: ἐξεδόθη πρὸς Θεόφιλον ἐπίσκοπον Ἀντιοχείας, πρὸς ὃν καὶ αἱ πράξεις. This form is found in many late MSS with a great number of textual variants. (ii.) A remarkable form is found in ε 377: το κατὰ Λουκᾶν εὐαγγέλιον καὶ τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων αἱ πράξεις ὑψηγορεύθησαν ὑπὸ Πέτρου καὶ Παύλου τῶν ἀποστόλων, μετὰ χρόνους πέντε καὶ δέκα τῆς τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἀναλήψεως. Λουκάς δὲ ὁ ἱατρὸς συνέγραψε καὶ ἐκπύρξε καὶ ἐκοιμήθη ἐν Θηβαῖς ἐτῶν ὀγδοήκοντα τεσσάρων. (iii.) Further information confirming the Eusebian tradition that Luke was an Antiochene is found in some MSS, e.g. οὗτος ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς Λουκάς ἦν μὲν Ἀντιόχειος ὀδοῦκοντα τεσσάρων (ε 1156), and ὁ μακάριος Λουκάς ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς γέγονε Σύρος (ε 8006).

Added to these notes may be made also of the famous pseudo-Dorotheus, and the longer Sophronius. The text of the former is sufficient to illustrate their character:

Λουκάς ὁ εὐαγγελιστὴς Ἀντιοχέως μὲν τὸ γένος ἦν, ἱατρὸς δὲ τὴν τέχνην. συνεγράψατο δὲ τὸ μὲν εὐαγγέλιον κατ' ἐπιτροπὴν Πέτρου τὸν ἀποστόλου, τὰς δὲ πράξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων κατ' ἐπιτροπὴν Παύλου τοῦ ἀποστόλου. συναπεδήμησε γὰρ τοῖς ἀποστόλοις καὶ μάλιστα τῷ Παύλῳ, οὗ καὶ μνημονεύσας ὁ Παῦλος ἐγράψεν ἐν ἐπιστολῇ ἀσπάζεταιμαι υἱὰς Λουκάς ὁ ἱατρὸς ὁ ἀγαπῆτος ἐν κυρίῳ, ἀπέθανε δὲ ἐν Ἑβρώμ καὶ ἐτάφη ἐκεῖ. μετετέθη δὲ ὑστερον ἐν Κωνσταντινουπόλει μετὰ τῶν Ἀνδρόου καὶ Τιμοθέου τῶν ἀποστόλων κατὰ τοὺς καιροὺς Κωνσταντίνου βασιλέως υἱὸς Κωνσταντίνου τοῦ μεγάλου (the text, and that of Sophronius, are given in von Soden's Die Schriften des NT, i. 1, p. 306 ff.).

II. 'LUKE' AS AN AUTHOR.—The foregoing paragraphs summarize all that is known as to the 'historic Luke.' It now remains to discuss (1) the internal evidence supplied mainly by the Acts for and against the tradition which identifies the 'historic Luke' of the Epistles with the 'literary Luke' who wrote the Gospel and Acts; (2) the sources used by the 'literary Luke'; (3) his literary methods. It would also have been desirable to discuss his theology, but this has already been done in art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

1. The arguments for and against the Lucan authorship of the Third Gospel and Acts.—In favour of the Lucan authorship Harnack argues that the redactor of Acts, like Luke, was (1) a fellow-worker with St. Paul; (2) an Antiochene Greek; (3) a physician; (4) the writer of the 'we-sections.' The reasons for this argument are stated in his Untersuchungen zu den Schriften des Lukas (Leipzig, 1906-08) with great power, but with a certainty which is sometimes too great.

(1) It is of course abundantly evident that the Acts represents in the 'we-sections' the evidence of a companion of St. Paul, but until the linguistic argument has been accepted as convincing it does not follow that the redactor of the whole was the author of the 'we-sections.'

(2) In the same way it is abundantly clear that a great part of the Acts is concerned with Antioch; but if, as Acts states, Antioch was really the centre of the Gentile Christian movement, this is really a sufficient explanation, and throws no necessary light on the provenance of the writer. If anyone were to write the history of economics in England in the 19th cent., he would constantly be speaking of Manchester, but it would not follow that he was a Mancunian: similarly, the writer of Acts constantly speaks of Antioch, but he need not have been an Antiochene. That Luke was a Greek rather than a Jew is possibly true, but the evidence is poor. Harnack says:

'Lukas war geborener Grieche—Evangelium und Acta zeigen, was eines Beweises nicht erst bedarf, dass sie nicht von einem geborenen Juden, sondern von einem Griechen verfasst sind,' and adds in a note: 'Ob der Verfasser bevor er Christ wurde jüdischer Proselyt gewesen ist, lässt sich nicht entscheiden. Seine Erwähnung der Proselyten in der Apostelgeschichte lässt keinen Schluss zu. Seine virtuose Kenntnis der griechischen Bibel kann er sich sehr wohl erst als Christ angeeignet haben. Für seinen griechischen Ursprung zeugt übrigens allein schon das οἱ βαρβαροὶ in c. 28, 2. 4' (Lukas der Arzt, ch. i. [Eng. tr., 1907, p. 12 f.]).

It may fairly be urged that Harnack does not sufficiently emphasize the complete absence of direct evidence that Luke was a Greek. The facts seem to be quite adequately covered if we suppose that Luke was a Hellenistic Jew.

(3) That Luke was a physician is argued by Harnack—following up and greatly improving on the methods of Hobart—on the ground of his use of medical language. The argument is of course cumulative, and cannot be epitomized. It is beyond doubt that Luke frequently employs language which can be illustrated from Galen and other medical writers. The weak point is that no sufficient account has been taken of the fact that much of this language can probably be shown from the pages of Lucian, Dion of Prusa, etc., to have been part of the vocabulary of any educated Greek. It is, for instance, too 'keen' when it is alleged that the Lucan phrase καὶ ἐπέστρεψεν τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτῆς καὶ ἀνέστη παραχρημα in Lk 8<sup>55</sup> is a medical improvement on the Marcan καὶ εὐθὺς ἀνέστη τὸ κορδάσιον (5<sup>4</sup>). Could we stamp a writer as a physician at the present time because he spoke of 'bacilli,' or described a state of mind as 'pathological'? Yet it is doubtful whether there is anything so 'medical' in the Third Gospel or Acts as these expressions. The truth seems to be that, if we accept on the ground of tradition the view that the Gospel and Acts were written by a physician, there is a certain amount of corroborative detail in the language; but if we are not inclined to accept this view, the 'medical' language is insufficient to show that the writer was a physician, or used a more medical phraseology than an educated man might have been expected to possess.

(4) Far more important than these lines of argument, which seem to attempt to prove too much from too little evidence, is the thesis that linguistic argument shows that the writer of the 'we-sections' is identical with the redactor of the Third Gospel and the Acts. Here again the cumulative nature of the argument prohibits its complete reproduction. The pages of Harnack must be studied in detail. But the main outline is that, if we study the Third Gospel in comparison with Mark and any sort of reconstructed Q, we shall find out which idioms are especially Lucan, in the sense of belonging to the redaction of the Gospel. If then we find that the 'Lucan' phraseology is especially marked in the 'we-sections,' it follows that the writer of the 'we-sections' was the redactor of the whole. John C. Hawkins, in Hore Synopticae (Oxford, 1899, 1909), had already drawn attention to the fact that this line of research pointed to the unity of the Lucan writings and the identity of the scribe of the 'we-sections' with the redactor of the whole, and in Lukas der Arzt Harnack elaborates the argument very fully, and may be regarded as having proved his point, if it be granted that no redactor would have completely 'Lucanized' the 'we-sections' without altering the characteristic use of the first person. Unfortunately, this is a rather large assumption, and it is not impossible that the redactor kept the first person, because it implied that his source was here that of an eye-witness. It is clear from the preface to the Gospel that he attached importance to the evidence of eye-witnesses.

The arguments against the Lucan authorship of Acts (and the Third Gospel goes with them) have been given at length in dealing with Acts. In summary they are that a comparison between the Acts and the Epistles shows that, wherever Luke and St. Paul relate the same facts, they give discordant testimony, and that the Pauline and Lucan theology are evidently different (see Acts). It is not impossible to give an explanation of these facts consistent with the Lucan authorship, but their obvious bearing is to render that theory improbable, so that the results of these two lines of investigation, the linguistic and the historical and theological, do not point in quite the same direction. The linguistic argument as stated by Harnack goes a long way towards proving that the redactor of the Third Gospel and Acts is identical with the author of the 'we-sections' and the narratives immediately cohering with them. This conclusion is not seriously impaired if it be granted that in telling his story the writer often makes use of cliches relating to miraculous episodes found in the literary work of this or a slightly later period, e.g. in Philostratus,* and perhaps in the lost writings of Apollonius of Tyana. On the other hand, the historical and theological arguments support the contention that the author can scarcely have been a companion of St. Paul. Whenever it is possible to compare Acts and Epistles, discrepancies of varying seriousness are to be found, and the Acts shows very few or no signs of acquaintance with the Atonement-theology or the Christology of the Epistles.

Two ways may be suggested of combining these conflicting results. On the one hand, it is possible that the prima facie evidence of the linguistic facts is fallacious. The central point of Harnack's argument is that the same linguistic characteristics are to be found throughout the whole work as in the 'we-sections.' It is assumed that the latter and the cohering narratives may be taken as normative, and that they have been unchanged. But if this assumption be challenged, the argument falls to the ground. Suppose that the redactor found a source relating the greater part of St. Paul's life, and in places claiming that the writer was an eye-witness by the use of the first person, it would be not unnatural for the redactor carefully to preserve these important indications of the value of his source, while at the same time re-writing or touching up the rest of the language. It would then present all those signs of identity of literary style with the rest of the book which Harnack has emphasized. This theory circumvents the literary argument, and enables us to accept easily the historical and theological results which render doubtful the view that the redactor was a companion of St. Paul.

* This seems to be the most important result of E. Norden's Agnostos Theos (Leipzig, 1913); he does not really prove that the story of St. Paul at Athens or similar incidents are free literary compositions, and void of all historical foundation, but does show that a considerable use was made of literary cliches in setting out, illustrating, and adorning a narrative.

On the other hand, it may be that we are demanding too high a standard of accuracy in the Acts: after all, the inaccuracies and mistakes—for they can scarcely be anything less—are chiefly found in the earlier parts of Acts, and Luke may have been a companion of St. Paul, and yet never have thought of making very careful inquiry from him as to the events of his early career. This would be especially probable if, as the suggested use of Josephus implies, Luke wrote his two treatises for Theophilus late in life (c. A.D. 90). The theological difficulty is more serious: it is very difficult to understand how a companion of St. Paul can have had a theology and Christology which are on the whole more archaic than those of the Epistles. To some extent, no doubt, this can be explained by the different objects of the works. To some extent also it is no doubt true that we have gone altogether too far in reconstructing a 'Pauline theology' out of the Epistles; these were St. Paul's answers to controversial points, not statements of his central teaching. Probably the preaching of St. Paul was much more like the Acts than systems of Paulinism reconstructed out of the Epistles. At the same time, it is doubtful whether these considerations really carry us all the way. The theology of Acts—not linguistic characteristics or historical inaccuracies—is the greatest difficulty which faces those who accept the authorship of the Third Gospel and Acts by a companion of St. Paul. At present the matter is sub judice, and Harnack's powerful advocacy has turned the current of feeling in favour of the traditional view, but he has really dealt adequately with only one side of the question and dismissed the theological and (to a somewhat less extent) the historical difficulty too easily. It will not be surprising if a reaction follows when these points have been more adequately studied and expounded.

2. Luke's sources.—In the complete absence of any definite statements as to the sources used by Luke, with the exception of the preface to the Gospel, internal evidence can alone be used, and the results of its study are necessarily only tentative.

In the preface to the Gospel Luke tells us that he was acquainted with many previous attempts to give a διηγησιν τῶν πεπληροφορημένων ἐν ἡμῖν πραγμάτων—a difficult phrase, which, however, much more probably means 'the things accomplished among us' than the 'things most surely believed among us'—in accordance with the tradition of the original eye-witnesses, and that he also had decided to write an account of them because he was παρηκολουθήσας ἀνῶθεν πᾶσιν. From this passage it has sometimes been concluded that Luke disapproved of the previous efforts, and regarded himself as altogether superior to his predecessors. This, however, is not the natural meaning of the Greek; Luke says: 'Inasmuch as many . . . it seemed good to me also' (καὶ μοι), and the force of the 'also' is to class him with and not above his predecessors. A more serious problem is provided by the exact exegesis of πᾶσι, in 1<sup>3</sup>. Does it refer to the πολλοί of 1<sup>2</sup>, or to the πραγμάτων of the same verse, or to the αὐτόπται of 1<sup>2</sup>? No decision is possible; the probability is rather in favour of a reference to πολλοί, as carrying on and explaining the επειδήπερ πολλοί of the opening words, but the other alternatives are possible. In any case, the main object of Luke was to provide Theophilus with the proof (ἵνα ἐπιγνῶς . . . τὴν ἀσφάλειαν) of the λόγοι in which he had received oral instruction (κατηχηθήσῃς). Luke is therefore writing history with the object of giving the historical basis of the statements (presumably theological) which were current in the oral instruction given to converts.

(a) The written sources used by Luke.—In the Gospel at least two written sources can be detected.

(1) Mark, either exactly in the form now extant, or in one only slightly differing from it, was certainly used by Luke. This is one of the most secure results of the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels. (2) Besides Mark, Luke used a document commonly called Q (Quelle), which was also used by Matthew, and, according to some scholars (not, the present writer thinks, correctly), by Mark. The exact contents of Q cannot be defined. Nor can we say with certainty whether Q represents one or many documents. These points are at present among the most warmly debated and most intently studied problems in the Synoptic question. If, however, Q be used to cover all the material common to Matthew and Luke, and it be assumed that Q is only one document, it must have been Greek, not Aramaic, as the agreement between Matthew and Luke is often too close to admit the possibility that the two narratives represent two translations of a single Aramaic document. In the same way the Mark used by Matthew and Luke must have been Greek; it is, however, possible, though no sufficient proof has been given even by Wellhausen, that behind the Greek Mark and the Greek Q there were originally Aramaic texts. (3) It is doubtful whether Luke used other written sources in his Gospel. It is possible that the Peræan section 9<sup>51</sup>–18<sup>1</sup> may have had a written source, and the same may be said of the 'Jerusalem narrative' of the Passion and Resurrection; but it is also possible that their peculiarly Lucan passages rest on oral tradition. (4) In the Acts much depends on the view taken of the critical questions, but in any case the 'we-sections' must be referred to a written source, even though their source may have been a diary of the editor of the whole book. Whether the 'Antiochene' source was a written document is doubtful, and the same may be said of source B in the Jerusalem-Cæsarean tradition. It is, however, as probable as any point which is supported merely by literary evidence can be that source A (containing Ac 3–4, probably 8<sup>5-10</sup>, and possibly also ch. 5) depends from a written Greek source (see art. Acts for the fuller treatment of the question of the sources of Acts).

(b) The use of the LXX.—It remains a question which criticism has as yet found no means of solving whether Luke used, besides the foregoing sources, an Aramaic document for his narrative of the Nativity in the Gospel, or gave his version of a tradition which he had heard, casting it into a form based on the LXX. It is in any case certain that the LXX, and not the Hebrew, was the form of the OT which he habitually used, and his diction seems to have been greatly influenced by it.

(c) The use of other writings.—No other books seem to have been certainly used by Luke, with the possible (or, in the present writer's opinion, probable) exception of Josephus. The facts relating to Josephus in connexion with Theudas seem to point very strongly to a knowledge of the Antiquities (see art. Acts).

(d) The use of the Epistles.—There is no reason to suppose that Luke was acquainted with any of the Pauline Epistles. There is nothing in the Acts which resembles a quotation, and in relating facts alluded to in the Epistles there is more often difference than agreement, even though it be true that the difference is not always very serious.

3. Luke's methods.—In using his materials Luke's methods are in the main those of other writers of the same period. They are quite unlike those of modern writers. A writer of the present day seeks to tell his story in his own words and his own way, giving references to, and, if necessary, quotations from, his sources, but carefully avoiding all confusion between traditional fact and critical inference, and certainly never altering the direct statement of the earlier documents without expressly mentioning the fact. The method of antiquity was as a rule almost the reverse. The author of a book based on earlier materials strung together a series of extracts into a more or less coherent whole, giving no indication of his sources, and modifying them freely in order to harmonize them. Sometimes he would select between several narratives, sometimes he would combine, sometimes he would give them successively, and by a few editorial comments make a single narrative of apparently several events out of several narratives of a single event. As a method this is obviously inferior to modern procedure, but even an inferior method can be well or badly used. That Luke used this method is clear from a comparison of the Third Gospel with Matthew and Mark, but on the whole he seems to have used it well, especially if it be remembered that his avowed object was not to 'write history' but to provide the historical evidence for the Christian instruction which Theophilus had received. The crucial evidence for this view is the use made of Mark, which we can fortunately control. A comparison of Mark with Luke shows that Luke has been on the whole loyal to his source, though he has consistently polished the language. At the same time, it must be admitted that he had no objection to deserting it, or to changing its meaning. Two examples must suffice.

(1) In Mark the call of Peter precedes the healing of his mother-in-law; in Luke a different account of Peter's call is given the preference over the Marcan one, and the healing of his mother-in-law is placed before it, apparently to afford a motive for the obedience of Peter to the call. (2) In the narrative of the Passion and Resurrection Luke obviously prefers an alternative narrative to that of Mark. This narrative is different in the essential point that it places all the appearances of the Risen Christ in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, whereas Mark in 14<sup>28</sup>, etc., is clearly leading up to appearances in Galilee. But the story of the woman at the tomb seems to be taken from Mark, and this includes the message of the young man to the women to tell the disciples to go to Galilee, where they will see Jesus. This is inconsistent with the 'Jerusalem narrative,' and is changed by Luke into 'Remember how he spoke to you while he was still in Galilee,' and the whole narrative is freely re-written. If this were quite certain, it would show that Luke cannot be depended upon not to change the whole meaning of his sources. It is, however, possible that his modification is based on some other source; if so, this source can hardly have been originally independent of Mark. A detailed examination of the Lucan changes in the Marcan material, which has never yet been sufficiently thoroughly undertaken, is likely to give valuable evidence as to Luke's methods in dealing with his sources and the extent to which his statements may be trusted as really representing the earliest tradition, or discounted as being editorial alterations. It may be suggested that a study of the Lucan parallels to Mk 13 is especially needed; a superficial examination suggests that it will show that he was inclined to remove eschatological sayings or explain them in some other sense.

Another characteristic—or what at first sight appears to be one—is a tendency to separate and give to definite historical circumstances sayings which in Matthew are brought together. From this contrast between Matthew and Luke it has been assumed that Luke made special endeavours to find out the exact circumstances under which each saying was uttered. But this conclusion is more than the facts warrant. All that can really be said is that a comparison between Matthew and Luke shows either that Luke separated, or that Matthew combined, or that each did a little of both; but, as we do not know what was the arrangement of the material in the source, we cannot decide between these possibilities. It is sometimes overlooked that reconstructions of Q such as Harnack's or Wellhausen's, though otherwise admirable, are useless for this purpose, as they necessarily assume an answer to the question at issue. It is perhaps worth notice that the only safe guide which we have is Luke's treatment of the Marcan source. Here we find no trace of the supposed separation of sayings, nor do we find any traces in Matthew of the supposed combination of sayings. The logical deduction is that Luke and Matthew did not use the same edition of Q, if indeed there ever was a single document Q. Of course it is hazardous to press this point, but insufficient attention has hitherto been given to the value of Luke's treatment of Mark as the only objective standard which exists for deciding what his methods probably were in dealing with other sources.

K. LAKE.

LUKEWARM.—The word occurs only in Rev 3<sup>16</sup>—'because thou art lukewarm (χλιαρὸς), and neither hot nor cold, I will spew thee out of my mouth.' As tepid water causes nausea, so lifeless religious profession leads to Divine disgust and rejection (cf. Ecce Homo<sup>11</sup>, 1873, ch. xiii.). There is greater promise in men who are outside the pale of the Church than in those whose nominal allegiance to religion has created a false confidence, dulled all sense of need, and checked all spiritual growth (v. 15). The following verses (vv. 17, 18, for the local references of which see art. 'Laodicea' in HDB) suggest that this condition of tepid religion in Laodicea had been fostered by an excess of material prosperity. The Laodiceans had become so comfortable as not to need God, nor ought God to expect much more than patronage from so consequential a community. He must, in human fashion, be on good terms with a church with so satisfactory a worldly status, not inquiring too closely about their spiritual zeal. For an analysis of this lukewarmness see also F. W. Faber, Growth in Holiness, 1854, ch. xxv.

LUST.—1. Linguistic usage.—(1) The English word 'lust.'—The word 'lust,' which, in modern English, is restricted to sexual desire, had originally a wider application and could be used de neutro and de bono as well as de malo of desire in general, and, as Trench says, was 'once harmless enough' (NT Synonyms<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 313). The German Lust is still used in this wide sense.

There is no instance in the NT where the English word 'lust' is used de bono in the AV unless we supply the word in Gal 5<sup>17</sup>—'the flesh lusteth (ἐπιθυμεῖ) against the Spirit and the Spirit (lusteth) against the flesh.' The verb is absent in the Greek as in the English. Lightfoot (on Gal 5<sup>17</sup>) thinks that ἐπιθυμεῖ cannot be supplied, as it would be unsuitable to describe the activity of the Spirit by this term. But Rendall is probably right in saying that the word ἐπιθυμεῖ here is neutral and equally applicable to the good desires of the Spirit and the evil lusts of the flesh (EGT, 'Galatians,' 1903, in loc.). The English word 'lust,' however, is scarcely neutral in the AV, and yet, because there is no possibility of misunderstanding, no other verb is supplied to describe the action of the Spirit. Even the RV has not supplied a different verb in the second clause. This is not to say that the Revisers would consider 'lust' a fit word to describe the working of the Spirit.

It is true also that the passage in Ja 4<sup>5</sup>—'the Spirit which dwelleth in us lusteth to envy'—is now generally understood of the Indwelling Spirit of God, but it was not so understood by the AV translators. To them it was the evil, envious spirit of man. The Greek verb used here is ἐπιποθεῖν, which is frequently used in the NT, and always in a good sense. St. Paul uses it of his great longing to see his converts (1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>8</sup>; cf. also Ro 1<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>23</sup>). They are to him ἐπιποθητοί. It expresses the longing of Epaphroditus for the Philippians, and of the Judæan Christians for the Corinthians who had liberally helped them. St. Paul uses it also to express his longing for heaven (2 Co 5-), and St. Peter exhorts his readers to 'desire' the sincere (?) milk of the word (1 P 2<sup>2</sup>). The LXX uses it of the soul's longing for God (Ps 41<sup>2</sup> [EV 42-]). Analogy would thus lead us to suppose that St. James used the word in a good sense. The quotation in which the word occurs cannot be located in the OT with certainty (cf. 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup>, Eph 5<sup>14</sup>); otherwise the sense of the word would be beyond dispute. Some suppose that St. James is here quoting St. Paul (1 Co 3<sup>16</sup>, Gal 5<sup>14</sup>). The most likely meaning of the passage is: 'The Spirit which he caused to dwell in us yearneth (for us) unto jealousy.' The Spirit of God has such a longing desire to possess the whole Christian personality that its passion may well be called holy jealousy. If this be the meaning, the rendering 'lust' is erroneous. The RV is not decided on the interpretation, and has substituted 'long' for 'lust.' R.V.m. is probably correct.

There is no passage, then, in the NT where the English word 'lust' is used de bono.

(2) The Greek word ἐπιθυμῶν and its cognates.—

(a) The Greek word ἐπιθυμῶν with its cognates, although as a rule used de malo, is not always so used. It occasionally takes the place of ἐπιποθεῖν (1 Th 2<sup>17</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>, He 6<sup>11</sup>), which seems always to be used in a good sense. It is used of the desires of the prophets to see the deeds of the Messianic Age (Mt 13<sup>17</sup>; cf. also Lk 17-), of the desire of Lazarus to eat of the crumbs falling from the rich man's table (cf. Lk 16- 15<sup>16</sup>); perhaps the desire for food or drink or the sexual desire is the ordinary meaning of the word). It is used by the Saviour to express His desire to eat the Paschal feast with His disciples (Lk 22<sup>19</sup>), by St. Paul of the desire for the office of a bishop (1 Ti 3<sup>1</sup>), by St. Peter of the holy desires of the angels (1 P 1<sup>12</sup>), and, in the substantive form, St. Paul uses it of his desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better (Ph 1<sup>23</sup>), and of his longing to see his Thessalonian converts (1 Th 2<sup>17</sup>). The LXX also uses it in a good sense (Ps 102<sup>5</sup> [EV 103<sup>5</sup>], Pr 10<sup>24</sup>). In all these cases we have ἐπιθυμῶν translated by the word 'desire.' The word ἐπιθυμῶν in the Gr. NT is thus much wider than the word 'lust' in the Eng. NT, and even 'lust' itself in the AV is not to be restricted to 'sexual desire' but is used of unlawful desire in general, the context determining its specific application.

We find the same large use of the word ἐπιθυμία in Plato. Generally with him it means 'appetite' in the narrow sense—the motive element in the lowest part of man—yet he uses it also of the other higher departments of the personality. Even the rational soul has its high and lofty desires (Rep., bks. iv. and ix.).

(b) When the word is used without an object it generally refers to evil longings (cf. Ro 7<sup>13</sup> [from Ex 20<sup>14</sup>], Ja 4-, 1 Co 10<sup>6</sup>), not, however, in the restricted usage of sexual lust. The moral colouring is as a rule supplied by the context, either by the mention of the object desired, as in Mk 4<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>6</sup>, which is the ordinary classical usage, or by the mention of the source of the desire (commonly in the NT) or by a descriptive epithet (Col 3<sup>9</sup>). This transference of moral colouring from the object desired to the subject desiring is significant. It is in harmony with the NT moral standpoint. Here the stress is laid on the inwardness of morality, and the object of moral judgment is the character (καρπία), rather than bare outward actions, or the consequences of actions. In the NT the desire is morally judged according to its origin, i.e. the originative personality as a whole is dealt with rather than the desire per se. The NT is thus more concerned with change of character than with the reformation by parts of the individual.

'Scripture and reason alike require that we should turn entirely to God, that we should obey the whole law. And hard as this may seem at first, there is a witness within us which pleads that it is possible. . . . "Easier to change many things than one," is the common saying. Easier, we may add, in religion and morality to change the whole than the part. . . . Many a person will tease himself by counting minutes and providing small rules for his life who would have found the task an easier and a nobler one had he viewed it in its whole extent and gone to God in a "large and liberal" spirit to offer up his life to Him' (B. Jowett, Interpretation of Scripture and other Essays, London, n.d., p. 321).

The NT, however, does not hesitate to pass judgment on desires per se and on their consequences. We find such expressions as 'the corruption that is in the world through lust' spoken of (2 P 1<sup>4</sup>)—where corruption is the consequence of evil desire. We find the phrase 'polluting desires' (2 P 2<sup>10</sup>). We find pleasures (ἡδοναί) regarded as a turbulence of the soul (Ja 4<sup>1</sup>), as if desires destroyed the balance of the soul (cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>, Ro 7<sup>23</sup>). The NT has no meticulous fear in passing judgment on evil desires and on their consequences. It does not take up the immaculate, fastidious attitude of 'virtue for virtue's sake,' but its point of view is the whole personality, and on this is moral judgment for good or evil passed.

(c) Thrice in the NT we find the word ἐπιθυμία translated by 'concupiscence.' This term is a dogmatic one, which has played a large part in the theological controversy. It means the natural inclinations of man before these have passed into overt acts. It is different from consilium, which is the 'deliberata assensio voluntatis' (so Calvin, Institutes, bk. ii. ch. viii. 49). Two questions of importance arise in connexion with this concupiscence: (i.) What is its origin and nature? and (ii.) What is its relation to responsibility and redemption? The Pelagian theologian tends to identify it with man's nature as appetitive and in itself morally neutral. What makes the moral difference is the exercise of the will, and the will is free. It may be that there is weakness in man due to the removal of 'original righteousness' which Adam had before he sinned, but this removal does not impair human nature and it does not make virtue impossible. To this class of theologians free-will is the important matter. Sin is only conscious sinful actions. This is, generally speaking, the position of Abelard, Arminius, and the Tridentine Council. To Augustine and the Reformers, however, this concupiscence was prior to the individual's evil volition and in a sense caused it. Free-will was not sufficient to cope with it. The redemption of man was a radical affair, cleansing the whole personality, the will included. Concupiscence is not simply a defectus (morally indifferent) but an affectus of the soul resulting in a positive usus towards sin in man's nature. The soul as a whole is deflected from its true centre—God. As regards responsibility for concupiscence, this school distinctly teaches it while the other side denies it. The Reformers did not regard 'desire' viewed as a part of man's ideal nature as 'evil'; but, as a matter of fact, in actual experience the desires are found to be evil.

'All the desires of men we teach to be evil, . . . not in so far as they are natural, but because they are inordinate, and they are inordinate because they flow from a corrupt nature' (Calvin, Institutes, bk. iii. ch. iii. 12).

During the Middle Ages and in Aquinas concupiscence was identified with man's sensuous nature. The difference between flesh and spirit was physical. So concupiscence was supremely manifested in the lusts of the flesh interpreted in a sensual fashion.

The NT does not directly deal with these aspects of desire, but its spirit is more in harmony with the deeper analysis of Augustine. As regards responsibility and redemption in relation to concupiscence the Augustinian position is the Pauline. The word 'concupiscence' has been omitted altogether by the RV. In Ro 7<sup>8</sup> ἐπιθυμία is translated 'coveting.' It means illicit inclinations to follow one's own will as against God's law. With the arrival of self-consciousness there is already found in the personality the strong bias to sin which comes to light as man is brought face to face with law. Sin is regarded in a semi-personal fashion as receiving a basis of operation in this bias. The word ἐπιθυμία is thus well translated 'concupiscence' in the theological sense of the term. In Col 3<sup>2</sup> the English 'desire' is sufficient to express the thought, because it is as vague as the original.

(d) In 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup> the word ἐπιθυμία is used, as the context shows, of 'sexual lust.' The use of the term in Jude 16 approximates to this but seems to be wider. The same letter (v. 18) ascribes it to impiety. The passage 1 P 2<sup>11</sup> approximates closely to this meaning. In 2 P 2<sup>18</sup> it means 'lust' in our restricted sense. It is equated with σάρκος ἀσέλγεια. See also Apostol. Church Order (ed. Schaff, The Oldest Church Manual, 1885, p. 242), where it is said that ἐπιθυμία leads to fornication.

ἐπιθυμία, then, when used de malo of illicit desires is not wholly restricted to sexual depravity (exc. in 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup> and 2 P 2<sup>18</sup>; cf. Jude 16), although that is included, and owing to its obtrusiveness could not fail to be included. It means 'the whole world of active lusts and desires' (Trench, NT Syn.<sup>8</sup>, p. 312).

(3) Other Greek words.—(a) The Greek word πάθος is also translated 'lust' in 1 Th 4<sup>5</sup>, and ἐπιθυμία is subordinated to it as species to genus. This is the usage of Aristotle, who regards 'lust,' anger, fear, etc., as species of πάθος. It is usually maintained that the difference between the two is that πάθος refers to evil on its passive and ἐπιθυμία on its more active side. It is impossible, however, to prove this distinction from the NT, although in Gal 5<sup>24</sup>, where παθήματα and ἐπιθυμαί are found side by side, this distinction makes excellent sense. The words are used in a loose popular sense and not as the exact terminology of an ethical system.

(b) The same is true of the usage of ἡδοναί (Ja 4<sup>1</sup>), which is translated 'lusts.' It refers to pleasures in general; though sexual pleasures are included, and perhaps form the chief element, eating and drinking would also be meant. 'All men are by nature weak and inclined to pleasures,' and so injustice and avarice follow (Swete, Introduction to OT in Greek, 1900, p. 567).

(c) Similarly ὁρεῖς (Ro 12<sup>7</sup>)—a word used sometimes in classical writers of the highest desires—is used by St. Paul of the unnatural sexual lust of heathenism (see Trench, NT Syn.<sup>8</sup>, p. 314).

2. Genesis, growth and goal of lust.—(1) Genesis of lust.—We do not find any attempt to deal psychologically with this problem. What we find is various suggestions and incidental allusions. In Jn 8<sup>44</sup> the lusts of murder and deceit are traced back to the devil. The idea is the Jewish one that the devil tempted Cain to murder his brother Abel, and that the serpent deceived Eve (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>). This view that the devil is the originator of lust took various forms in Jewish thought (Sir 25-32<sup>ff.</sup>, 2 Es 4<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>35</sup>), and there are echoes of these in the NT. St. Paul (1 Co 11<sup>10</sup>) seems to regard the wicked angels as moved to sensual lust by unveiled women. The existence of an evil tendency (yezer hara) in human nature was a problem for Judaism. Sometimes it was simply referred to the fall of Adam (Wis 2<sup>23</sup><sup>ff.</sup>; cf. Ro 5<sup>12</sup><sup>ff.</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>21</sup><sup>ff.</sup>), sometimes it was ascribed to the devil, and sometimes to God. The last view is not found in the NT except to be refuted (Ja 1<sup>13-17</sup>). The good tendency (yezer hatob) was without difficulty ascribed to God, but the evil tendency could not be so treated. St. Paul (Ro 7<sup>12-24</sup>) simply states these two tendencies and connects the evil with the fall of Adam. Yet there is nothing to encourage the view that man is not responsible. In truth, where St. John mentions the devil (1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>) as the originator of evil desires, he is opposing the Gnostic view that the 'spiritual' man is not responsible for sensual sins. Yet it is certain that the problem of evil is not solved on NT principles by any atomistic view of human personality, and that the redemption of Christ has its cosmic as well as its personal aspects. St. Paul's teaching in Ro 7<sup>15-24</sup> was open to misunderstanding, but in principle it is the very opposite of libertinism.

Again, the origin of lust is ascribed to the cosmos (1 Jn 2<sup>15-17</sup>). It is whatever is opposed to the will of God. So in Tit 2<sup>12</sup> we read of 'worldly lusts' (cf. 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>). The world is the 'lust of the flesh,' the 'lust of the eyes,' and the 'pride of life.' It is the kingdom of evil as organized in customs and tendencies in human society and human hearts, including also evil spirits. It is found in man as the desires of the 'flesh and mind' (Eph 2<sup>3</sup>), and specifically called the lusts of men (1 P 4<sup>2</sup>). It might appear as if this ascription of lust to the 'world' destroyed personal responsibility, but such is never the case. The law of God recognized by man as good, i.e. as the law of his own conscience (Ro 7<sup>7</sup><sup>ff.</sup>), is against such lust, and the Christian command is to love God and do His will. The fact of responsibility is not proportional to ability in the NT, and so redemption is always regarded as primarily of grace.

Similarly, and characteristically, the origin of lust is ascribed to the flesh, i.e. the sinful personality as apart from God. The 'lusts of the flesh' mean much more than sensuality. 'It was not the corruptible flesh that made the soul sinful, but the sinful soul that made the flesh corrupt' (Aug., de Civ. Dei, xiv. 2, 3). It is true that the body (σῶμα) with its desires (Ro 6<sup>12</sup>) was a sort of armoury where sin got its weapons, but the body as such is not the origination seat of evil; otherwise St. Paul's view of the Resurrection would be meaningless. Platonism looked on the body as the tomb of the soul and as pressing down the soul (cf. 1 Co 9-7), but Rothe is scarcely warranted in making the sensuous nature the primary root of evil (Theol. Ethik<sup>2</sup>, 1870, ii. 181-7).

Again, the heart is viewed as the origin of evil desires (Ro 1<sup>24</sup>; cf. Sir 5<sup>7</sup>). This centres the origin in man's personality as a whole, not in any one part of the personality. But it is the personality apart from God. So we read in Jude not only 'their own desires,' but also (v. 18) 'their own desires of impieties,' i.e. evil desires originating in their impious state. A similar thought is found in Ro 1-6<sup>ff.</sup> (cf. Tit 2<sup>12</sup>). Evil tendencies develop pari passu with God's judicial withdrawal.

It might thus appear that those who make selfishness (φιλαυτία) the root of sinful desires are nearest the truth. Philo does so and Plato. 'The truth is that the cause of all sins in every person and every instance is excessive self-love' (Laus, v. 731); but in the NT the 'self' is not an entity that can be understood apart from the redemption of Christ, and the Christian personality is so complex that we cannot safely limit to any single strand the origin of sin. What the NT is concerned with is not the origin—an insoluble problem—but the abolition of evil desires. Man himself is the moral origin, and the great question is how to redeem sinful man. In other words, these questions are discussed not from the point of view of genetic psychology but from the point of view of redemption.

(2) Growth and goal of lust.—St. James gives a graphic picture of how ἐπιθυμία develops. She is pictured as a harlot enticing man. Like the fisherman she baits her hook, and traps her prey as the hunter does. Then sin is produced, and sin completed brings forth death. It is clearly stated that 'lust' is not of God. It is man's own, and the inference is that man can resist it. There is no mention of God's grace in the specific Christian sense, although in v. 18 we seem to have this strongly emphasized. Perhaps the writer loosely holds both the Jewish notion of free-will as itself sufficient to resist desire, and the Christian sense of God's grace. It is possible to restrict the whole passage (1<sup>15-17</sup>) to sexual lust, but the wider sense is probable.

Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. iii.) gives a long list of evil desires leading to death, but to him strife and envy are characteristically causative of this result, as in the case of Cain (iv.). In the Apostol. Church Order (ed. Schaaf, p. 242), lust is pictured as a female demon. It leads to fornication, and it darkens the soul so that it cannot see the truth clearly (cf. Ro 1<sup>6ff.</sup>).

St. Peter associates lust with ignorance (1 P 1<sup>14</sup>) and St. Paul with deceit, the opposite of 'truth' (Eph 4<sup>22</sup>). Since the time of Plato desire has been regarded by philosophers as aiming at a good (true or false). The end is always viewed sub specie boni. This is an aspect which the NT does not emphasize. But it does say that evil desires leave the soul unsatisfied and produce disorder (Ja 4<sup>2</sup>). It is possible to be always seeking some new thing and never coming to the knowledge of the truth (2 Ti 3<sup>6ff.</sup>). Knowledge alone is not sufficient, however, for St. Paul regards the law as both revealing desire and intensifying it (Ro 7<sup>7</sup>). Redemption is necessary to cope with evil desires.

The desiring of evil things St. Paul regards as the moral ground of all sinful acts (1 Co 10)—of sensuality both as fornication and idolatry—of unbelief in its varied forms. This desiring does not work in vacuo; it is active in an atmosphere already tainted with idolatry, sensuality, and devilry (1 Co 10<sup>15ff.</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>5</sup>, Eph 6<sup>10ff.</sup>). God allows this testing of men, but He also affords a way of escape from it, so that men with this hope can bear up under temptations. The consequence of following one's own lust is regarded both subjectively and objectively. It produces corruption of the personality, ending in complete φθορά (Eph 4<sup>2</sup>; cf. 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>, where φθορά is said to be the fruit of lust), whereas the will of God leads to righteousness and holiness. The man who sets his heart on riches falls into many foolish and hurtful desires, and these bring him to the depth of destruction (δελθος and ἀπώλεια are the inevitable consequences). Lust is also said to pollute the soul (2 P 2<sup>10</sup>). Besides this, lust brings one face to face with God's destructive anger against sin (cf. 1 Co 10 and Dt 32<sup>37ff.</sup>).

It is not possible, however, from the NT to arrange in psychological order the stages in the development of lust. The progress is as varied as life itself. Catalogues of sins are given because these sins are closely connected in actual experience, and in experience the cause is often the effect and the effect the cause.

St. John (1 Jn 2<sup>15-17</sup>) is not to be taken as making the 'lust of the flesh' the origin of the 'lust of the eyes' and of the 'pride of possession,' nor are these a complete summary of sin. They are comprehensive and characteristic, but not necessarily exhaustive. The genitives in this passage are of course subjective, i.e. 'the lust springing from the flesh,' etc. Here again the 'flesh' is the origin of evil desire—not the body as such, but the sinful personality (Law [Tests of Life<sup>3</sup>, 1914, p. 149] explains 'flesh' otherwise here, but the very fact that the 'flesh' is regarded as causing desire is against him). To St. John also the issue of sinful desire is destruction, as it is contrary to the abiding will of God.

To the NT, then, evil desires contaminate, corrupt, and destroy the soul itself and bring upon it God's punishment. These desires, however, are already proofs of a personality out of order, and to set the desires right the personality must be set right. This is done by the new gracious creation of God through His mercy which operates through Christ. Thus man is made God's ποιῆμα by the Spirit. To walk in the Spirit is the privilege of the new creature (Eph 2<sup>31</sup>), and in this way he can overcome the desires of the 'flesh' (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>), and learn to do the will of God.

LYCAONIA (Λυκαονία).—Lycaonia, the country of the Lycaones, who spoke Λυκαονιστί ('in the speech of Lycaonia,' Ac 14<sup>11</sup>), was a vast elevated plain, often called 'The Treeless' (το ἄδενον), in the centre of Asia Minor. It was bounded on the N. and E. by Galatia and Cappadocia, on the W. and S. by Phrygia, Pisidia, and Isauria; but its limits were very uncertain and liable to change, especially in the N. and S. Its physical character is described by Strabo (XII. vi. 1):

'The places around the mountainous plane of Lycaonia are cold and bare, affording pasture only for wild asses; there is a great scarcity of water, and wherever it is found the wells are very deep. . . . Although the country is ill supplied with water, it is surprisingly well adapted for feeding sheep. . . . Some persons have acquired great wealth by these flocks alone. Anyntas had above 300 flocks of sheep in these parts.'

Having no opportunity and perhaps little capacity for self-government, the Lycaonians had no history of their own. Driven eastward by the Phrygians, they were always under the sway of some stronger power, which cut and carved their territory without ever asking their leave. In the 3rd cent. Lycaonia belonged to the empire of the Seleucids, who more or less hellenized its larger towns, such as Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. After the Roman victory over Antiochus the Great at Magnesia (190 B.C.), it was given to the Attalids of Pergamos; but as they never effectively occupied it, the northern part of it was claimed by the Galatians, while the eastern was added to Cappadocia. When Pompey re-organized Asia Minor after the defeat of Mithridates (64 B.C.), he left northern Lycaonia (somewhat curtailed) to the Galatians, and eastern Lycaonia (also diminished) to Cappadocia, while he attached southwestern Lycaonia (considerably increased) to the province of Cilicia. Mark Antony gave the last part, including Iconium and Lystra, to Polemon in 39 B.C., but transferred it in 36 to King Amyntas of Pisidia, who at the same time became king of all Galatia. Soon afterwards this brilliant soldier—the most interesting of Asiatic Gaels—overthrew Antipater of Derbe, with the result that the whole of Lycaonia, except the so-called Eleventh Strategia (which about this time was given to King Antiochus of Commagene, to be henceforth called Lycaonia Antiochiana) was now included in the Galatian realm. After the untimely death of Amyntas in 25 B.C., his kingdom was converted into the Roman province of Galatia. This arrangement lasted for nearly a century, except that Claudius apparently presented the S.E. corner of Lycaonia, including the important city of Laranda, to the king of Commagene.

When St. Paul brought Christianity to Lycaonia, he confined his mission to that part of it which was in the province of Galatia. On reaching the frontier city of Derbe, he retraced his steps. Laranda, in Antiochian Lycaonia, was beyond his sphere. If the S. Galatian theory is to be accepted, he passed through Galatic Lycaonia four times (Ac 14<sup>o</sup>–16<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>); he addressed the mixed population of its cities—Lycaonians, Greeks, and Jews—as all alike ‘Galatians’; and the Christians of Lycaonian and Phrygian Galatia, not the inhabitants of Galatia proper, are the ‘foolish Galatians’ (Gal 3<sup>1</sup>) about whom he was so ‘perplexed’ (Gal 4<sup>20</sup>). But see GALATIANS.

Nothing remains of the Lycaonian language except some place-names; but the Christian inscriptions found in Lycaonia are very numerous, and show how widely diffused the new religion was in the 3rd cent. throughout this country which was evangelized by St. Paul in the 1st.

LYCIA (Λυκία, Eth. Λυκίος).—Lycia was a secluded mountain-land in the S.W. of Asia Minor, bounded on the W. by Caria, on the N. by Phrygia and Pisidia, on the N.E. by Pamphilia, and on the S. by the Lycian Sea. It was ‘beyond the Taurus’ (ἐκτὸς τοῦ Ταύρου). The ribs of that huge backbone of the country extended from N. to S. (in some places over 10,000 ft. in height), and between them were well-watered and fertile valleys, the homes of a highly civilized race, who in their love of peace and freedom resembled the Swiss. They were not Greek by race, but they were early hellenized. They had many overlords—Persians, Seleucids, Ptolemys, Romans—but for the most part their autonomy was undisturbed, and they had one of the finest constitutions in ancient times.

As the Lycians were suspected of favouring the Imperial party in the Civil Wars of Rome, Brutus and Cassius almost annihilated the beautiful city of Xanthus (43 B.C.), and the country never recovered its old prosperity. Pliny says that in his time the cities of Lycia, formerly 70 in number, had been reduced to 36 (HN v. 28). In A.D. 43 it was made a Roman province, and in A.D. 74 Vespasian formed the united province of Lycia-Pamphilia. Lycia is named in 1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup> as one of the Free States to which the Romans sent letters in favour of the Jewish settlers. Two of its principal seaports—Patara and Myra—are mentioned in Acts (21<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>5</sup>). But it appears to have been one of the last parts of Asia Minor to accept Christianity. Among the provinces addressed in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> as having been partly evangelized, neither Lycia nor Pamphylia—both south of the Taurus—finds a place.

LYDDA (Λύδδα, Heb. Lód, Ar. Ludd).—Lydda was a town about 10 miles S.E. of Joppa, on the line where the Maritime Plain of Palestine merges into the Shephelah or Lowlands of Judæa. Its importance was largely due to its position at the intersection of two highways of intercourse and traffic—the road from Joppa up to Jerusalem by the Vale of Ajalon, and the caravan route from Egypt to Syria and Babylon. Re-occupied by the Jews after the Exile (Neh 11<sup>25</sup>), it was nevertheless governed by the Samaritans till the time of Jonathan Maccabæus, when the Syrian king Demetrius II. made it over to Judæa (1 Mac 11<sup>24</sup>). In the time of Christ it was the capital of one of the eleven toparchies ‘of which the royal city of Jerusalem was the supreme’ (Jos. BJ III. iii. 5). During the civil strife of the Romans (c. 45 B.C.) Cassius sold the inhabitants of Lydda into slavery for refusing the sinews of war, but Antony gave them back their liberty (Ant. XIV. xi. 2, xii. 2–5). Lydda was visited by St. Peter, whose preaching, aided by the miraculous healing of Æneas, is said, ‘in a popular hyperbolic manner’ (Meyer on Ac 9<sup>35</sup>), to have resulted in a general conversion of the Jewish population to Jesus as the Messiah. From this town the Apostle was called to Joppa on behalf of Dorcas (9<sup>36</sup>). In the Jewish Wars Lydda was a centre of strong national feeling. It was captured and burned by the Syrian governor, Cestius Gallus, on his march to Jerusalem (A.D. 65), and it surrendered without a struggle to Vespasian in 68 (BJ II. xix. 1, IV. viii. 1). After the fall of the holy city it became one of the refuges of Rabbinical learning. Later, it was known as Diospolis, though its old name was never displaced, and it became the seat of a bishop. At the Council of Diospolis in A.D. 415 the heresiarch Pelagius was tried, but managed to procure his acquittal. By this time Lydda had begun to have a wide fame as the reputed burial-place of a Christian soldier named Georgios, who in Nicomedia had torn down Diocletian's edict against Christianity and welcomed martyrdom. His relics were taken to Lydda, and round his name was gradually woven a tissue of legend, in which the Greek myth of Perseus and Andromeda (see JOPPA), the Moslem idea of Elijah (or alternatively of Jesus) as the destined destroyer of the Impostor (al-dajjāl) or Antichrist, and the old Hebrew story of the fall of Dagon before the ark, were all inextricably intertwined, till Lydda became the shrine of St. George the Slayer of the Dragon, whom the English Crusaders made the patron-saint of their native land.

Lydda is now ‘a flourishing little town, embosomed in noble orchards of olive, fig, pomegranate, mulberry, sycamore, and other trees, and surrounded every way by a very fertile neighbourhood.’ The ruins of the Crusaders' Church of St. George, have ‘a certain air of grandeur’ (W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 1910, p. 523). The town has a station on the Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway.

LYDIA.—The woman who bears this name in Ac 16<sup>14f</sup> is described as ‘a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, one who worshipped God.’ The implication is that Lydia was more or less closely attached to the Jewish religion—a 'proselyte of the gate,' in later Rabbinic phraseology. We are told that she was found by St. Paul on his visit to Philippi at a small Jewish meeting for prayer held at the river-side on the Sabbath day. On hearing the message of the Apostle, she was converted and baptized along with the members of her household, and thereupon entreated the missionary to lodge in her house during his stay in the town. As a seller of purple garments—among the most expensive articles of ancient commerce—Lydia was no doubt a woman of considerable wealth. Probably she was a widow carrying on the business of her dead husband, and her position at the head of a wealthy establishment shows the comparative freedom enjoyed by women both in Asia Minor and in Macedonia. Her generous disposition, manifested in her pressing offer of hospitality to the Apostle, may perhaps be reflected in the frequency and liberality with which the Philippian Church contributed to the Apostle's wants (Ph 4<sup>15-16</sup>). She holds the distinction of being the first convert to Christianity in Europe, and her household formed the nucleus of the Church of Philippi, to which St. Paul addressed the most affectionate and joyous of all his Epistles.

The fact that the Apostle Paul does not mention her by name in the Epistle has given rise to two different suggestions. Some have thought that shortly after her conversion Lydia may have either died or returned to her home in Thyatira (as Milligan in HDB, art. 'Lydia'). Others have put forward the idea that Lydia was not the personal name of the convert, but a description of her nationality as a native of Thyatira in the province of Lydia—'the Lydian'; and further, that the Apostle may refer to her either as Euodia or Syntache (Ph 4<sup>2</sup>). Renan takes this latter view of the name, and suggests also that Lydia became the wife of the Apostle and bore the expenses of his trial in Philippi (St. Paul, p. 148). Ramsay (HDB, art. 'Lydia') regards the name as a familiar name (nickname), used instead of the personal proper name and meaning 'the Lydian' (so Zahn, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 533). Others, however, point to the frequency with which the name is found applied to women in Horace (Od. i. 8, iii. 9, iv. 30), and regard it as a proper name.

W. F. BOYD.

LYDIA (Λυδία).—Lydia, the fairest and richest country of western Asia Minor, was bounded by Mysia in the N., Phrygia in the E., Caria in the S., and the Aegean Sea in the W. Long mountain chains, extending westward from the central plateau, divided it into broad alluvial valleys. The regions between the ranges of Messogis, Tmolus, and Temnus, watered by the Cayster and the Hermus, were among the most fertile in the world. The trade and commerce of Lydia contributed more to its immense wealth than the mines of Tmolus or the golden sand of Pactolus. In the time of Alyattes and Cræsus, who reigned in splendour at Sardis, the kingdom of Lydia embraced almost the whole of Asia Minor west of the Halys, but Cyrus subdued it about 546 B.C., and a succession of satraps did their best to crush the spirit of the race. After the triumphal progress of Alexander the Great, Lydia was held for a time by Antigonus, and then by the Seleucids. After Magnesia (190 B.C.) the Romans presented it to their ally Eumenes, king of Pergamos (1 Mac 8<sup>3</sup>). From 133 onwards it formed part of the Roman province of Asia. Before the time of Strabo (XIII. iv. 17) the Lydian language had been entirely displaced by the Greek.

The religion of the Lydians—the cult of Cybele—was a sensuous Nature-worship, perhaps originally Hittite; their music—'soft Lydian airs'—was voluptuous; and the prostitution at their temples, whereby their daughters obtained dowries (Herod. i. 93), made 'Lydian' a term of contempt among the Greeks. Many Jewish families were settled in Lydia (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4), and it is probable that in the great centres of population not a few Gentiles turned to them in search of a higher faith and a purer morality. Among these was the purple-seller of Thyatira, who was St. Paul's first convert in Europe (Ac 16<sup>14-40</sup>). 'Lydia' was most probably not her real name, but a familiar ethnic appellation. She was 'the Lydian' to all her Philippian friends (E. Renan, St. Paul, 1869, p. 146; T. Zahn, Introd. to the NT, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 523, 533). See preceding article.

In Ezk 30<sup>5</sup> the RV has changed Lydia into Lud, and the country Lydia is never mentioned in the NT. The Roman provincial system created a nomenclature which most of the writers of the Apostolic Age habitually employ. Like many other geographical and ethnological names, Lydia ceased to have any political significance. St. Paul, the Roman citizen, uses the provincial name Asia, and never Lydia. John writes to five Lydian churches, along with one in Mysian Pergamos and one in Phrygian Laodicea, but all the seven are 'churches which are in Asia' (Rev 1<sup>4-11</sup>). It is contended, indeed, by Zahn (op. cit. i. 187) that the Grecian Luke, to whom the unofficial terminology would come naturally, uses Asia in the popular non-Roman sense as synonymous with Lydia, to which F. Blass (Acta Apostolorum, 1895, p. 176) would add Mysia and Caria. J. B. Lightfoot, however, states good reasons for maintaining that 'Asia in the New Testament is always Proconsular Asia' (Galatians<sup>5</sup>, 1876, p. 19 n.), and W. M. Ramsay strongly supports this view, refusing now to admit an exception (as he formerly did [The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 150]) even in the case of Ac 2<sup>9</sup>.

JAMES STRAHAN.

LYING (ψεῦδεσθαι, 'to lie'; ψῆδος, ψεύσμα, 'a lie'; ψευδής, 'false'; ψεύστης, 'a deceiver').—1. It is the glory of Christianity that this religion reveals 'the God who cannot lie,' ὁ ἀψευδὴς θεός (Tit 1<sup>2</sup>), qui non mentitur Deus (Vulg.). He is true in both senses of the word—ἀληθινός and ἀληθής, verus and verax. He cannot be false to His own nature, just as men, made in His image, cannot lie without being untrue to themselves. It is likewise impossible to imagine His Revealer departing from the truth in word or deed. While Hermes, the so-called messenger of the gods, was often admired for his dexterous lying, Christ is loved because He is the Truth (Jn 14<sup>6</sup>), the faithful and true Witness (Rev 3<sup>14</sup>), through whom men are able, amid all earthly changes and illusions, to lay hold on eternal realities.

2. The detection and exposure of imposture was an urgent duty of the early Church. The speedy appearance of false teachers was one of the most remarkable features of the Apostolic Age, and the Church was enjoined not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits (1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>). There were ψευδο-ἀδελφοί (Gal 2<sup>4</sup>), ψευδο-ἀποστόλοι (2 Co 11<sup>13</sup>), ψευδο-προφῆται (Ac 13<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, Rev 16<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup>), ψευδο-λόγοι (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>), ψευδο-διδασκαλοί (2 P 2<sup>1</sup>). These deceivers were as the shadows which always accompany the light. To the apostolic founders of Christianity the bare thought of being ever found false witnesses of God (ψευδομαρτυρεῖς τοῦ θεοῦ, 1 Co 15<sup>15</sup>) was intolerable. St. Paul often protests, and solemnly calls God to witness, that he does not lie (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, Gal 1<sup>20</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>7</sup>). The Church of Ephesus was praised because she had tried soi-

disant apostles and found them false (ψευδεις, Rev 2<sup>2</sup>). If there were false teachers, there were also false disciples, who claimed the Christian name without having Christ's spirit, and John had to formulate some clear and simple tests by which 'the liar' (ὁ ψευστῆς) could be known (1 Jn 2<sup>14, 22</sup> 4).

3. The same writer emphasizes the gravity of certain moral and intellectual errors—the denial of personal sin (1 Jn 1<sup>10</sup>), the rejection of the historical Christ (5<sup>10</sup>). He brands them as blasphemous assertions that God (whose Word calls all men sinners, and whose Spirit inwardly witnesses to the truth of the gospel) is a liar.

4. Christians must not lie one to another (Col 3<sup>9</sup>). In the pagan, e.g. the Cretan (Tit 1<sup>12</sup>), lying is bad; in the Jew (Rev 2<sup>9</sup>) it is worse; in the Christian it should be impossible. The Law was made for the repression of liars (1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>); the gospel gives every believer the spirit of truth (1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup>). 'All liars,' 'every one that loveth and maketh a lie,' end the black list of the condemned (Rev 21<sup>8</sup> 22<sup>15</sup>), who shall not in any wise enter the City of God (21<sup>27</sup>).

LYSIAS.—Claudius Lysias was the chiliarch, the tribune, in command of the Roman troops stationed at the Tower of Antonia at the time of St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem. The conjecture is probable that he was by birth a Greek, and that he adopted the name Claudius when 'with a great sum' he obtained the station of a Roman citizen (Ac 22<sup>28</sup>; see R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 463; cf. Ac 21<sup>37</sup>). The Tower of Antonia communicated by a stairway with the cloisters of the Temple (see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, 1898, ii. 495 f., and art. JERUSALEM for the position of the tower), and care was taken to have soldiers there in readiness for any emergency, especially at the time of the Jewish festivals (Jos. BJ v. 5. 8), like that of Pentecost, which St. Paul was attending. News was quickly brought up to the Tower of the riotous attack made upon the Apostle in the Temple at the instigation of 'Jews from Asia' (21<sup>27-28</sup>). It was suggested to Lysias, or the idea occurred spontaneously to him, that the object of the fury of the mob might be a man whom he was anxious to apprehend—viz. the leader of a recent seditious movement, who had managed to escape when the procurator Felix fell upon him and the crowd of his followers (Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 6, and BJ ii. 13. 5). Hence the surprise with which the chiliarch turns to St. Paul, so soon as he had been snatched from his assailants, with the question: 'You are not, then, the Egyptian . . . ?' (Ac 21<sup>38</sup>). After allowing St. Paul to address the people from 'the stairs,' Lysias had him taken within the Tower, and had given orders that he should be examined by scourging, when he was made aware that his prisoner was a Roman citizen, whom 'it was illegal to subject to such treatment' (22<sup>35ff.</sup>). Seeking to obtain the information he desired by other means, Lysias convened a meeting of the Jewish Council on the following day, 'and brought St. Paul down and set him before them' (v. 39). The tumult that arose on St. Paul's statement that he was a Pharisee, and was called in question 'touching the hope and resurrection of the dead,' was so great that he had to be rescued by the soldiers, who took him again to the Tower. Then followed the 'plot of certain of the Jews to kill St. Paul,' if the chiliarch could be induced to bring him again before the Council. News of this was carried to Lysias by 'Paul's sister's son.' Thereupon the resolution was taken to send the Apostle for greater safety to Caesarea (23<sup>16ff.</sup>). With the escort, Lysias sent a letter to the Governor Felix (v. 24<sup>ff.</sup>). In writing, he forgot the misconception about 'the Egyptian' under which he had first apprehended St. Paul. Uppermost in his mind was the fact that he had been the means of rescuing 'a Roman' from the mad fury of the Jews. Not unnaturally it is that fact he emphasized when writing to the Governor. No further trace of Lysias is forthcoming. G. P. GOULD.

LYSTRA (Λύστρα, which is fem. sing. in Ac 14<sup>6, 21</sup> 16<sup>1</sup>, and neut. pl. in Ac 14<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>11</sup>).—Lystra was a Roman garrison town of southern Galatia, built on an isolated hill in a secluded valley at the S. edge of the vast upland plain of Lycaonia, about 18 miles S.S.W. of Iconium. Itself 3,780 ft. above sea-level, it had behind it the gigantic Taurus range, whose fastnesses were the haunts of wild mountaineers living on plunder and blackmail. It was the necessity of stamping out this social pest that raised the obscure town of Lystra into temporary importance. In 6 B.C. Augustus made it an outpost of civilization, one of 'a series of colonies of Roman veterans evidently intended to acquire this district for peaceful settlement' (T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., 1909, i. 337). The others were Antioch, Parlais, Cremna, Comama, and Olbasa. In all these cities the military coloni formed an aristocracy among the incolae or native inhabitants. Latin was the official language, and Greek that of culture, but the Lystrans used among themselves 'the speech of Lycaonia' (Ac 14<sup>11</sup>), of which no trace is left, except that 'Lystra'—which the Romans liked to write 'Lustra,' on account of its resemblance to lustrum—is, like 'Ilistra' and 'Kilistra,' which are also found in the country, doubtless a native place-name. The site and colonial rank of Lystra were alike unknown till 1885, when J. R. S. Sterrett's discovery of a pedestal in situ, with an inscription containing the words Colonia Iulia Felix Gemina Lustra, settled both these points. Coins bearing the same legend have since been found.

Lying some distance westward from the great trade-route which went through Derbe and Iconium, Lystra can never have been an important seat of commerce. Still it was prosperous enough to attract some civilians as well as soldiers to its pleasant valley. Its blending of Greek and Jewish elements is strikingly illustrated by the mixed parentage of Timothy, whom St. Paul circumcised 'because of the Jews that were in those parts' (Ac 16<sup>1-4</sup>). No mention, however, is made of a synagogue in Lystra, and probably the Jewish colony was small. Some measure of Greek culture among the Lystran natives is prima facie suggested by the existence of a temple of Zeus 'before the city' (πρὸ τῆς πόλεως, Ac 14<sup>13</sup>)—cf. S. Paolo fuori le Mura at Rome—as well as by the naïve identification of Barnabas and St. Paul with Zeus and Hermes. But these facts prove nothing as to the real character of the Lystran worship, for the arbitrary bestowal of classical names upon Anatolian gods—an act of homage to the dominant civilization—had but little effect upon the deep-rooted native religious feeling. The motive of the priest who wished to sacrifice to the supposed celestial visitants (v. 13) does not lie on the surface. That he acted in good faith, being thrilled with awe before superhuman miracle-workers, is more probable than that, knowing better, he cleverly used a wave of religious excitement to serve his own base ends. All the Lystrans were probably familiar with the legend—told by Ovid, Met. viii. 626 ff.—that Zeus and Hermes once visited Phrygia in the disguise of mortals, and found no one willing to give them hospitality, till they came to the hut of an aged couple, Philemon and Baucis, whose kindness Zeus rewarded by taking them to a place of safety before all the neighbourhood was suddenly flooded, and thereafter metamorphosing their cottage into a magnificent temple, of which they became the priests.

It is stated (Ac 14<sup>19</sup>) that, during St. Paul's sojourn in Lystra, Jews came thither from Antioch (130 miles) and Iconium (18 miles), but whether in the ordinary course of trade, or on set purpose to persecute the Apostle, is not made quite clear. The close connexion between Antioch and Lystra is proved by a Greek inscription on the base of a statue which Lystra presented in the 2nd cent.: 'The very brilliant sister Colonia of the Antiochians is honoured by the very brilliant colony of the Lystrans with the Statue of Concord' (J. R. S. Sterrett, Wolfe Expedition in Asia Minor, 1888, p. 352). Lystra was more closely associated with its Phrygian neighbour Iconium than with the more distant Derbe, though the latter was, like itself, Lycaonian (Ac 16<sup>2</sup>). At Lystra the apostles had experience of the swift changes of the native popular feeling, as well as of the malice of their own race. First they were worshipped as gods come down to bring healing and blessing; then St. Paul was stoned as a criminal not fit to live (cf. 2 Co 11<sup>25</sup>). Timothy was an eye-witness of the cruel assault of the rabble (2 Ti 3<sup>11</sup>). The Apostle re-visited Lystra in the homeward part of his first missionary tour (Ac 14<sup>21</sup>); again in his second journey (16<sup>1</sup>); and, if the South-Galatian theory is correct, once more during the third journey (18<sup>-3</sup>). Little is known of the later secular or sacred history of Lystra. The veterans whom Augustus planted there 'notably restricted the field of the free inhabitants of the mountains, and general peace must at length have made its triumphal entrance also here' (Mommson, op. cit.). Having thus completed the work of a border fortress, the colony of Lystra lost its raison d'être, and the town sank back into its original insignificance.
