

CLASSIC REPRINT SERIES

---

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

---

Vol. 1

---

by James Hastings

Forgotten Books

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

Vol. 1

by

James Hastings

Published by Forgotten Books 2013

Originally published 1916

PIBN 1000233214

www.ForgottenBooks.org

Copyright © 2013 Forgotten Books

eBook Terms & Conditions

www.forgottenbooks.org

1. This eBook* may be

- a. Copied for personal and educational use.
- b. Printed for personal and educational use.

2. This eBook* may NOT be

- a. Distributed in any form.
- b Sold individually or as part of a package.
- c. Modified in any way.
- d. Reversed-engineered.

This eBook* and all its content including images are Copyright © 2014 FB &c Ltd - All rights reserved.
Forgotten Books is a registered trademark of FB &c Ltd.

FB &c Ltd, Dalton House, 60 Windsor Avenue, London SW19 2RR Company number 08720141. Registered in England and Wales.

*eBook' refers to this PDF and any of its content including pages and images in either electronic or printed form.

The paperback edition of this book can be purchased from

amazon.com

amazon.co.uk

amazon.de

amazon.fr

amazon.es

amazon.it

Over 1,000,000 eBooks
are available to read at

Forgotten Books

www.forgottenbooks.org

484,473 eBooks
are available to read at

Forgotten Books

www.ForgottenBooks.org

Alchemy

“In changing the base metals into gold and silver by the projection of the Stone, it follows (by an accelerated process) the method of nature, and therefore is natural.”

The New Pearl of Great Price, by Peter Bonus, 1338 AD

www.ForgottenBooks.org/Alchemy

Free App Download

Available on the
App Store

Windows Store

ANDROID APP ON

Google™ play

Enjoy

484,473 Books

wherever you go

www.ForgottenBooks.org/apps

Dictionary of the Apostolic Church

EDITED BY JAMES HASTINGS, D.D.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF
JOHN A. SELBIE, D.D.
AND
JOHN C. LAMBERT, D.D.

VOLUME I
AARON—LYSTRA

NEW YORK: CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

EDINBURGH: T. & T. CLARK

1916

COPYRIGHT, 1916, BY
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

The above copyright notice is for the protection of articles copyrighted in the United States.

Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, have the sole right of publication of this DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH in the United States and Canada.

PREFACE

It has often been said that the Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels is of more practical value than a Dictionary of the Bible. From all parts of the world has come the request that what that Dictionary has done for the Gospels another should do for the rest of the New Testament. The DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH is the answer. It carries the history of the Church as far as the end of the first century. Together with the Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, it forms a complete and independent Dictionary of the New Testament.

The Editor desires to take the opportunity of thanking the distinguished New Testament scholars who have co-operated with him in this important work.

309202

AUTHORS OF ARTICLES IN THIS VOLUME

---

- ALLEN (WILLOUGHBY CHARLES), M.A.
Archdeacon of Manchester; Principal of Egerton Hall, Manchester; author of 'The Gospel according to St. Matthew' in The International Critical Commentary.
Anointing, Children of God, Gospels, Kingdom of God.
- ALLWORTHY (THOMAS BATESON), M.A. (Camb.), B.D. (Dublin).
Perpetual Curate of Martin-by-Timberland, Lincoln; Founder and First Warden of S. Anselm's Hostel, Manchester.
Ampliatius, Andronicus, Apelles, Aristobulus, Asyncritus, Epænetus, and other proper names.
- BANKS (JOHN S.), D.D.
Emeritus Professor of Theology in the Wesleyan Methodist College, Headingley, Leeds; author of A Manual of Christian Doctrine.
Christian, Contentment.
- BATIFFOL (PIERRE), Litt.D.
Prêtre catholique et prélat de la Maison du Pape, Paris; auteur de Tractatus Origenis de libris scripturarum (1900), Les Odes de Salomon (1911), La Paix constantinienne et le Catholicisme (1914).
Ignatius.
- BECKWITH (CLARENCE AUGUSTINE), A.B., A.M., S.T.D.
Professor of Systematic Theology in Chicago Theological Seminary; author of Realities of Christian Theology; departmental editor of the New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge.
Beast, Blindness, Blood, Dysentery, Fever, Gangrene, Lamb, Lion.
- BERNARD (JOHN HENRY), D.D. (Dublin), Hon. D.D. (Aberd.), Hon. D.C.L. (Durham).
Bishop of Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin; sometime Archbishop King's Professor of Divinity, Dublin, and Dean of St. Patrick's Cathedral.
Descent into Hades.
- BOYD (WILLIAM FALCONER), M.A., B.D. (Aberd.), D.Phil. (Tübingen).
Minister of the United Free Church of Scotland at Methlick.
Alexander, Crown, Desert, Gog and Magog, Israel, Jew, Jewess, and other articles.
- BROOKE (ALAN ENGLAND), D.D.
Fellow, Dean, and Lecturer in Divinity at King's College, Cambridge; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of S. Alban's; author of A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Johannine Epistles.
James and John, the Sons of Zebedee, John (Epistles of).
- BULCOCK (HARRY), B.A., B.D.
Minister of the Congregational Church at Droylsden, Manchester.
Anger, Care, Cheerfulness, Comfort, Commendation, Fool, Grief, and other articles.
- BURKITT (FRANCIS CRAWFORD), M.A., F.B.A., Hon. D.D. (Edin., Dublin, St. And.), D. Theol. h.c. (Breslau).
Norrisian Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge; author of The Gospel History and its Transmission.
Baruch (Apocalypse of).
- BURN (ANDREW E.), D.D.
Vicar of Halifax and Prebendary of Lichfield; author of The Apostles' Creed (1906), The Nicene Creed (1909), The Athanasian Creed (1912).
Confession, Hallelujah, Hymns, Intercession.
- CARLYLE (ALEXANDER JAMES), M.A., D.Litt., F.R. Hist. Soc.
Lecturer in Economics and Politics at University College, Oxford.
Alms, Community of Goods.
- CASE (SHIRLEY JACKSON), M.A., B.D., Ph.D.
Professor of New Testament Interpretation in the University of Chicago; author of The Historicity of Jesus, The Evolution of Early Christianity; managing editor of The American Journal of Theology.
Allegory, Interpretation.
- CLARK (P. A. GORDON).
Minister of the United Free Church at Perth.
Divination, Exorcism, Lots.
- CLAYTON (GEOFFREY HARE), M.A.
Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge.
Corinthians (Epistles to the), Eucharist, Love-Feast.

- CLEMENS (JOHN SAMUEL), B.A., Hon. D.D. (St. And.).
Governor of the United Methodist College at Ranmoor, Sheffield.
Bondage, Constraint, Liberty, Lord's Day.
- COBB (WILLIAM FREDERICK), D.D.
Rector of the Church of St. Ethelburga the Virgin, London; author of Origines Judaicae, The Book of Psalms, Mysticism and the Creed.
Antipas, Balaam, Euphrates, Hymenæus, Jannes and Jambres, Jezebel, and other articles.
- COOKE (ARTHUR WILLIAM), M.A.
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Wallasey, Cheshire; author of Palestine in Geography and in History.
Elamites, Galilee.
- COWAN (HENRY), M.A. (Edin.), D.D. (Aberd.), D.Th. (Gen.), D.C.L. (Dunelm).
Professor of Church History in the University of Aberdeen; Senior Preacher of the University Chapel; author of The Influence of the Scottish Church in Christendom, John Knox, Landmarks of Church History.
Apphia, Archippus, Epaphras, Epaphroditus.
- CRUICKSHANK (WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Kinneff, Bervie; author of The Bible in the Light of Antiquity.
Arts, Clothes, Games, Jerusalem, Key, Lamp, and other articles.
- DAVIES (ARTHUR LLYWELYN), M.A.
Simcox Research Student, Queen's College, Oxford.
Ascension of Isaiah, Assumption of Moses, Enoch (Book of).
- DEWICK (EDWARD CHISHOLM), M.A. (Camb.).
Tutor and Dean of St. Aidan's College, Birkenhead; Teacher of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Liverpool; author of Primitive Christian Eschatology.
Eschatology.
- DIMONT (CHARLES TUNNACLIFF), B.D. (Oxon.).
Principal of Salisbury Theological College; Prebendary of Salisbury; Chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury.
Business, Labour.
- VON DOBSCHÜTZ (ERNST), D.Theol.
Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the University of Breslau.
Communion, Fellowship, Hellenism, Josephus.
- DONALD (JAMES), M.A., D.D. (Aberd.).
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Keith-hall and Kinkell, Aberdeenshire.
Dispersion, Gentiles, Heathen, Libertines.
- DUNCAN (JAMES WALKER), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Lassodie, Dumfriesshire.
Canaan, Haran.
- DUNDAS (WILLIAM HARLOE), B.D.
Rector of Magheragall, near Lisburn.
Authority, Dominion.
- FAULKNER (JOHN ALFRED), B.A., B.D., M.A., D.D.
Professor of Historical Theology in Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, N.J.
Benediction, Doxology.
- FELTOE (CHARLES LETT), D.D.
Rector of Ripple, near Dover; sometime Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge; author of Sacramentarium Leonianum, The Letters and other Remains of Dionysius of Alexandria.
Akeldama, Candace, Chamberlain, Ethiopians, Ethiopian Eunuch, Judas Iscariot.
- FLETCHER (M. SCOTT), M.A., B.D., B.Litt.
Master of King's College, University of Queensland, Brisbane, Australia; author of The Psychology of the New Testament.
Edification, Enlightenment, Exhortation.
- FREW (DAVID), D.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Urr.
Barnabas, Esdras (The Second Book of), Herod.
- GARVIE (ALFRED ERNEST), M.A. (Oxford), D.D. (Glas.).
Principal of New College, London; author of The Ritschlian Theology, Studies in the Inner Life of Jesus, Studies of Paul and his Gospel.
Evil, Fall, Good.
- GORDON (ALEXANDER REID), D.Litt., D.D.
Professor of Hebrew in McGill University, and of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis in the Presbyterian College, Montreal; author of The Poets of the Old Testament.
Judgment-Hall, Judgment-Seat, Justice, Lawyer.
- GOULD (GEORGE PEARCE), M.A., D.D.
Principal of Regent's Park College, London; Ex-President of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland.
Berenice, Drusilla, Felix, Festus, Lysias.
- GRANT (WILLIAM MILNE), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Drumoak, Aberdeenshire; author of The Religion and Life of the Patriarchal Age, The Founders of Israel.
Assembly, Building, Day-Star, Foundation, Genealogies, Gospel, and other articles.
- GRENSTED (LAURENCE WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.
Vice-Principal of Egerton Hall, Manchester; joint-author of Introduction to the Books of the New Testament.
Colossians (Epistle to the), Ephesians (Epistle to the).
- GRIEVE (ALEXANDER JAMES), M.A., D.D.
Professor of New Testament Studies and Christian Sociology in the Yorkshire United Independent College, Bradford.
Form, Friendship, Fruit, Image.
- GRIFFITH-JONES (EBENEZER), B.A. (Lond.), D.D. (Edin.).
Principal, and Professor of Dogmatics, Homiletics, and Practical Theology, Yorkshire United Independent College, Bradford; author of The Ascent through Christ, Types of Christian Life, The Economics of Jesus, The Master and His Method, Faith and Verification.
Abiding, Abounding, Acceptance, Access, Account, Answer.

HAMILTON (HAROLD FRANCIS), M.A., D.D.
Ottawa, Canada; formerly Professor in the University of Bishop's College, Lennoxville, Quebec.

Barnabas (Epistle of).

HANDCOCK (P.S.P.), M.A.

Member of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; Lecturer of the Palestine Exploration Fund; formerly of the Department of Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities in the British Museum; author of Mesopotamian Archaeology, Latest Light on Bible Lands.

Dog, Eagle, Goat, Hospitality, Locust, and other articles.

HOOKE (SAMUEL HENRY), M.A. (Oxon.), B.D. (Lond.).

Professor of Oriental Languages and Literature in Victoria College, Toronto.

Heaven, Immortality, Lake of Fire.

JAMES (JOHN GEORGE), M.A., D.Lit.

Author of Problems of Personality, Problems of Prayer, The Coming Age of Faith, The Prayer-Life.

Cross, Crucifixion, Custom, Dream.

JORDAN (HERMANN), Ph.D.

Professor of Church History and Patristics in the University of Erlangen.

Catholic Epistles, Epistle, Letter.

LAKE (KIRSOPP), M.A. (Oxford), D.D. (St. And.).

Professor of Early Christian Literature in Harvard University; author of The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul.

Acts of the Apostles, Acts of the Apostles (Apocryphal), Luke.

LAMBERT (JOHN C.), M.A., D.D.

Fenwick, Kilmarnock; author of The Sacraments in the New Testament.

Antichrist, Body, Conscience, Flesh, Life and Death, Light and Darkness, and other articles.

LAW (ROBERT), D.D. (Edin.).

Professor of New Testament Literature in Knox College, Toronto; author of The Tests of Life: A Study of the First Epistle of St. John.

Covetousness, Formalism, Fulness, Generation, Glory, Hour.

LIGHTLEY (JOHN WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.

Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature and Philosophy in the Wesleyan College, Headingley, Leeds.

Epicureans.

LOFTHOUSE (WILLIAM F.), M.A.

Professor of Philosophy and Old Testament Language and Literature in the Wesleyan College, Handsworth, Birmingham; author of Ethics and Atonement, Ethics and the Family.

Conversion, Creation, Forgiveness, Freedom of the Will.

MACKENZIE (DONALD), M.A.

Minister of the United Free Church at Oban; Assistant Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Aberdeen, 1906-1909.

Abstinence, Feasting, Fornication, Harlot, Lust, and other articles.

MACLEAN (ARTHUR JOHN), D.D. (Camb.), Hon. D.D. (Glas.).

Bishop of Moray, Ross, and Caithness; author of Dictionary of Vernacular Syriac; editor of East Syrian Liturgies.

Adoption, Angels, Ascension, Baptism, Demon, Family, and other articles.

MAIN (ARCHIBALD), M.A. (Glas.), B.A. (Oxon.), D.Litt. (Glas.).

Minister of the Church of Scotland at Old Kilpatrick; examiner in Modern and Ecclesiastical History and in Political Economy in St. Andrews University; member of the Examining Board of the Church of Scotland.

Cymbal, First-Fruit, Harp.

MARSH (FRED. SHIPLEY), M.A.

Sub-Warden of King's College Theological Hostel and Lecturer in Theology, King's College, London; formerly Tyrwhitt and Crosse Scholar in the University of Cambridge.

Clement of Rome (Epistle of), Galatians (Epistle to the), Hebrews (Epistle to the).

MARTIN (A. STUART), M.A., B.D.

Formerly Pitt Scholar and Examiner in Divinity in Edinburgh University and Minister of the Church of Scotland at Aberdeen; author of The Books of the New Testament.

Grace, Justification.

MARTIN (G. CURRIE), M.A., B.D.

Lecturer in connexion with the National Council of Adult School Unions; formerly Professor of New Testament at the Yorkshire United College and Lancashire College.

Hell.

MATHEWS (SHAILER), A.M., D.D. (Colby, Oberlin, Brown).

Dean of the Divinity School, and Professor of Historical Theology, in the University of Chicago; President of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America; author of The Messianic Hope in the New Testament.

Assassins, Judas the Galilæan.

MAUDE (JOSEPH HOOPER), M.A.

Rector of Hilgay, Downham Market; formerly Fellow and Dean of Hertford College, Oxford; author of The History of the Book of Common Prayer.

Ethics.

MITCHELL (ANTHONY), D.D.

Bishop of Aberdeen and Orkney; formerly Principal and Pantonian Professor of Theology in the Theological College of the Episcopal Church in Scotland.

Hermas (Shepherd of).

MOE (OLAF EDVARD), Dr. Theol.

Professor of Theology in the University of Christiania.

Commandment, Law.

MOFFATT (JAMES), D.Litt., Hon. D.D. (St. And.), Hon. M.A. (Oxford).

Professor of Church History in the United Free Church, Glasgow; author of The Historical New Testament, The New Testament: A New Translation.

Gospels (Uncanonical).

- MONTGOMERY (WILLIAM), M.A. (Cantab.), B.D.
(London).
Lecturer in Divinity in the University of Cambridge; author of St. Augustine.
Book of Life, Book with the Seven Seals, James the Lord's Brother, James (Epistle of).
- MONTGOMERY (W. S.), B.D.
Minister of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland at Ballacolla, Queen's County.
Beating, Buffet, Chain, Fire, Jailor.
- MORGAN (WILLIAM), M.A., D.D. (Aberd.).
Professor of Systematic Theology and Apologetics in Queen's Theological College, Kingston, Ontario; Kerr Lecturer for 1914.
Judgment.
- MOSS (RICHARD WADDY), D.D.
Principal, and Tutor in Systematic Theology, Didsbury College, Manchester; author of The Range of Christian Experience.
Aaron, Aaron's Rod, Anathema, Condemnation, Curse, Levite.
- MOULTON (WILFRID J.), M.A. (Cantab.).
Professor of Systematic Theology in the Wesleyan College, Headingley, Leeds; author of The Witness of Israel.
Covenant.
- MUIRHEAD (LEWIS A.), D.D.
Minister of the United Free Church at Broughty-Ferry; author of The Terms Life and Death in the Old and New Testaments, The Eschatology of Jesus.
Apocalypse.
- NICOL (THOMAS), D.D.
Professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberdeen; Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, 1914.
Assurance, Education, Election, Foreknowledge, and other articles.
- NIVEN (WILLIAM DICKIE), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Blairgowrie; co-examiner in Mental Philosophy in the University of Aberdeen.
Cerinthus, Doctor, Ebionism, Emperor-Worship, Essenes, Gnosticism.
- PEAKE (ARTHUR SAMUEL), M.A., D.D.
Rylands Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Manchester and Tutor in the Hartley Primitive Methodist College; sometime Fellow of Merton College and Lecturer in Mansfield College, Oxford; author of The Problem of Suffering in the Old Testament, A Critical Introduction to the New Testament, Christianity: its Nature and its Truth.
Cainites, Jude the Lord's Brother, Jude (Epistle of).
- PLATT (FREDERIC), M.A., B.D.
Professor of Systematic and Pastoral Theology in the Wesleyan College, Handsworth, Birmingham; author of Miracles: An Outline of the Christian View.
Atonement.
- PLUMMER (ALFRED), M.A., D.D.
Late Master of University College, Durham; formerly Fellow and Senior Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford; author of 'The Gospel according to S. Luke' in The International Critical Commentary, and other works.
Apostle, Bishop, Church, Deacon, Evangelist, and other articles.
- POPE (R. MARTIN), M.A. (Cantab. and Manchester).
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Keswick; author of Expository Notes on St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy and Titus, and other works.
Abba, Christian Life, Conversation, Gifts, Judging.
- REID (JOHN), M.A.
Minister of the United Free Church at Inverness; author of Jesus and Nicodemus, The First Things of Jesus, The Uplifting of Life; editor of Effectual Words.
Æon, Age, Aged, Honour.
- ROBERTS (JOHN EDWARD), M.A. (London), B.D. (St. Andrews).
Minister of the Baptist Church at Manchester; author of Christian Baptism, Private Prayers and Devotions.
Apollos, Aquila and Priscilla, Bar-Jesus, Gallio, and other articles.
- ROBERTS (ROBERT), B.A. (Wales), Ph.D. (Leipzig).
Rhualt, St. Asaph.
Expediency.
- ROBERTSON (ARCHIBALD THOMAS), M.A., D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Interpretation of the New Testament in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.; author of A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research, and other works.
Bond, Debt, Deliverer, Destruction.
- ROBINSON (GEORGE L.), Ph.D., D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Biblical Literature and English Bible in McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.
Cæsarea.
- ROBINSON (HENRY WHEELER), M.A. (Oxon. and Edin.).
Professor of Church History and of the Philosophy of Religion in the Baptist College, Rawdon; sometime Senior Kennicott Scholar in the University of Oxford; author of 'Hebrew Psychology in Relation to Pauline Anthropology' in Mansfield College Essays, The Christian Doctrine of Man, The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament.
Adorning, Ear, Eye, Feet, Hair, Hand, Head.
- SANDAY (WILLIAM), D.D., LL.D., Litt.D., F.B.A.
Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford; Chaplain in Ordinary to H.M. the King.
Inspiration and Revelation.
- VON SCHLATTER (ADOLF).
Professor of New Testament Introduction and Exegesis in the University of Tübingen.
Holy Spirit.
- SCOTT (CHARLES ANDERSON), M.A., D.D.
Professor of the Language, Literature, and Theology of the New Testament in Westminster College, Cambridge; author of The Making of a Christian, and other works.
Christ, Christology.
- SIDNELL (HENRY CARISS JONES), B.A., B.D. (London).
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Ilkley.
Admonition, Chastisement, Discipline, Excommunication.

- SMITH (SHERWIN), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Burnley.
Abomination, Clean and Unclean.
- SOUTER (ALEXANDER), M.A., D.Litt.
Regius Professor of Humanity and Lecturer in Mediæval Palæography in the University of Aberdeen; formerly Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis in Mansfield College, Oxford; author of A Study of Ambrosiaster, The Text and Canon of the New Testament.
Augustus, Cæsar, Caligula, Citizenship, Diana, Domitian, and other articles.
- SPOONER (WILLIAM ARCHIBALD), D.D.
Warden of New College, Oxford; Hon. Canon of Christ Church, Oxford; Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Peterborough.
Lucius.
- STEVENSON (MORLEY), M.A.
Principal of Warrington Training College; Hon. Canon of Liverpool; author of Handbook to the Gospel according to St. Luke, and other works.
Author and Finisher, Circumcision, Divisions, Forerunner, Heresy, Judaizing.
- STEWART (GEORGE WAUCHOPE), M.A., B.D.
Minister of the Church of Scotland at Haddington (First Charge); author of Music in the Church.
King, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, Lord.
- STEWART (ROBERT WILLIAM), M.A., B.Sc., B.D.
Minister of the United Free Church at Duthil (Carr Bridge).
Apostolic Constitutions.
- STRACHAN (ROBERT HARVEY), M.A. (Aberd.), B.A. (Cantab.).
Minister of the Presbyterian Church of England at Cambridge.
Consecration, Fast (The), Holiness, Holy Day.
- STRAHAN (JAMES), M.A., D.D.
Professor of Hebrew and Biblical Criticism in the M'Crea Magee Presbyterian College, Londonderry; Cunningham Lecturer; author of Hebrew Ideals, The Book of Job, The Captivity and Pastoral Epistles.
Abraham, Colours, Elements, Galatia, Hypocrisy, and other articles.
- THUMB (ALBERT).
Professor of Comparative Philology in the University of Strassburg; author of Handbook of the Modern Greek Vernacular.
Hellenistic and Biblical Greek.
- TOD (DAVID MACRAE), M.A., B.D. (Edin.).
Minister of the Presbyterian Church of England at Huddersfield; formerly Hebrew Tutor and Cunningham Fellow, New College, Edinburgh.
Faith, Faithfulness, Ignorance, Knowledge.
- VOS (GEERHARDUS), Ph.D., D.D.
Charles Haley Professor of Biblical Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, N.J.
Brotherly Love, Goodness, Joy, Kindness, Longsuffering, Love.
- WATKINS (CHARLES H.), D.Th.
Minister of the Baptist Church at Liverpool; Lecturer in the Midland Baptist College and University College, Nottingham; author of St. Paul's Fight for Galatia.
Ambassador, Blessedness, Brethren, Conspiracy.
- WATT (HUGH), B.D.
Minister of the United Free Church of Scotland at Bearsden; Examiner for the Church History Scholarships of the United Free Church of Scotland.
Didache.
- WELLS (LEONARD ST. ALBAN), M.A. (Oxon.).
Vicar of St. Aidan's, South Shields; sub-editor of the Oxford Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.
Alpha and Omega, Amen.
- WILLIS (JOHN ROTHWELL), B.D.
Canon of St. Aidans, Ferns, and Rector of Preban and Moyne.
Angels of the Seven Churches, Collection, Contribution.
- WORSLEY (FREDERICK WILLIAM), M.A., B.D.
Subwarden of St. Michael's College, Llandaff; author of The Apocalypse of Jesus.
Areopagite, Baal, Babbler, Calf, Damaris, Dioscuri, Idolatry, Jupiter.
- ZENOS (ANDREW C.), D.D., LL.D.
Professor of Historical Theology in the M'Cormick Theological Seminary, Chicago.
Dates.
- ZWAAN (J. DE), D.D. (Leiden).
Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the University of Groningen.
'Acts of Thomas' in Acts of the Apostles (Apocryphal).

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

I. GENERAL

App. = Appendix.
 Arab. = Arabic.
 art., artt. = article, articles.
 A.S. = Anglo-Saxon.
 Assy. = Assyrian.
 AT = Altes Testament.
 AV = Authorized Version.
 AVm = Authorized Version margin.
 Bab. = Babylonian.
c. = circa, about.
cf. = compare.
ct. = contrast.
ed. = edited, edition.
Eng. = English.
Eth. = Ethiopic.
 EV, EVV = English Version, Versions.
f. = and following verse or page.
ff. = and following verses or pages.
fol. = folio.
fr. = fragment, from.
Fr. = French.
Germ. = German.
Gr. = Greek.
Heb. = Hebrew.
Lat. = Latin.

lit. = literally, literature.
 LXX = Septuagint.
m., marg. = margin.
 MS, MSS = manuscript, manuscripts.
n. = note.
 NT = New Testament, Neues Testament.
N.S. = new series.
 OT = Old Testament.
pl. = plural.
q.v., qq.v. = quod vide, quæ vide, which see.
Rhem. = Rhemish New Testament.
rt. = root.
 RV = Revised Version.
 RVm = Revised Version margin.
Sem. = Semitic.
sing. = singular.
Skr. = Sanskrit.
Syr. = Syriac.
Targ. = Targum.
tr. = translated, translation.
 TR = Textus Receptus, Received Text.
v. = verse.
v.l. = varia lectio, variant reading.
 VS, VSS = Version, Versions.
 Vulg., Vg. = Vulgate.

II. BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

Old Testament.

Gn = Genesis.	Ca = Canticles.
Ex = Exodus.	Is = Isaiah.
Lv = Leviticus.	Jer = Jeremiah.
Nu = Numbers.	La = Lamentations.
Dt = Deuteronomy.	Ezk = Ezekiel.
Jos = Joshua.	Dn = Daniel.
Jg = Judges.	Hos = Hosea.
Ru = Ruth.	Jl = Joel.
1 S, 2 S = 1 and 2 Samuel.	Am = Amos.
1 K, 2 K = 1 and 2 Kings.	Ob = Obadiah.
1 Ch, 2 Ch = 1 and 2 Chronicles.	Jon = Jonah.
Ezr = Ezra.	Mic = Micah.
Neh = Nehemiah.	Nah = Nahum.
Est = Esther.	Hab = Habakkuk.
Job.	Zeph = Zephaniah.
Ps = Psalms.	Hag = Haggai.
Pr = Proverbs.	Zec = Zechariah.
Ec = Ecclesiastes.	Mal = Malachi.

Apocrypha.

1 Es, 2 Es = 1 and 2 Esdras.	To = Tobit.
	Jth = Judith.

Ad. Est = Additions to Esther.	Sus = Susanna.
Wis = Wisdom.	Bel = Bel and the Dragon.
Sir = Sirach or Ecclesiasticus.	Pr. Man = Prayer of Manasses.
Bar = Baruch.	1 Mac, 2 Mac = 1 and 2 Maccabees.
Three = Song of the Three Children.

New Testament.

Mt = Matthew.	1 Th, 2 Th = 1 and 2 Thessalonians.
Mk = Mark.	1 Ti, 2 Ti = 1 and 2 Timothy.
Lk = Luke.	Tit = Titus.
Jn = John.	Philem = Philemon.
Ac = Acts.	He = Hebrews.
Ro = Romans.	Ja = James.
1 Co, 2 Co = 1 and 2 Corinthians.	1 P, 2 P = 1 and 2 Peter.
Gal = Galatians.	1 Jn, 2 Jn, 3 Jn = 1, 2, and 3 John.
Eph = Ephesians.	Jude.
Ph = Philippians.	Rev = Revelation.
Col = Colossians.

III. BIBLIOGRAPHY

- AGG* = Abhandlungen der Göttinger Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften.
AJPh = American Journal of Philology.
AJTh = American Journal of Theology.
ARW = Archiv für Religionswissenschaft.
AS = Acta Sanctorum (Bollandus).
BJ = Bellum Judaicum (Josephus).
BL = Bampton Lecture.
BW = Biblical World.
CE = Catholic Encyclopedia.
CIA = Corpus Inscip. Atticarum.
CIG = Corpus Inscip. Græcarum.
CIL = Corpus Inscip. Latinarum.
CIS = Corpus Inscip. Semiticarum.
CQR = Church Quarterly Review.
CR = Contemporary Review.
CSEL = Corpus Script. Eccles. Latinorum.
DB = Dict. of the Bible.
DCA = Dict. of Christian Antiquities.
DCB = Dict. of Christian Biography.
DCG = Dict. of Christ and the Gospels.
DGRA = Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiquities.
DGRB = Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography.
DGRG = Dict. of Greek and Roman Geography.
EBi = Encyclopædia Biblica.
EBr = Encyclopædia Britannica.
EGT = Expositor's Greek Testament.
ERE = Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics.
Exp = Expositor.
ExpT = Expository Times.
GAP = Geographie des alten Palästina (Buhl).
GB = Golden Bough (J. G. Frazer).
GGA = Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen.
GGN = Nachrichten der königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen.
GJV = Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (Schürer).
Grimm-Thayer = Grimm's Gr.-Eng. Lexicon of the NT, tr. Thayer.
HDB = Hastings' Dict. of the Bible (5 vols.).
HE = Historia Ecclesiastica (Eusebius, etc.).
HGHL = Historical Geography of the Holy Land (G. A. Smith).
HI = History of Israel (Ewald).
HJ = Hibbert Journal.
HJP = History of the Jewish People (Eng. tr. of GJV).
HL = Hibbert Lecture.
HN = Historia Naturalis (Pliny).
ICC = International Critical Commentary.
ISS = International Science Series.
JA = Journal Asiatique.
JBL = Journal of Biblical Literature.
JE = Jewish Encyclopedia.
JHS = Journal of Hellenic Studies.
JPh = Journal of Philology.
JPTH = Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie.
JQR = Jewish Quarterly Review.
JRS = Journal of Roman Studies.
JThSt = Journal of Theological Studies.
KAT<sup>2</sup> = Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament<sup>2</sup> (Schrader, 1883).
KAT<sup>3</sup> = Zimmern-Winckler's ed. of the preceding (a totally distinct work), 1902-03.
KIB = Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek.
LCBI = Literarisches Centralblatt.
LNT = Introd. to Literature of the New Testament (Moffatt).
LT = Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (Edersheim).
MGWJ = Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums.
NGG = Nachrichten der königl. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen.
NKZ = Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift.
NTZG = Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte (Holtzmann and others).
OED = Oxford English Dictionary.
OTJC = Old Testament in the Jewish Church (W. R. Smith).
Pauly-Wissowa = Pauly-Wissowa's Realencyklopädie.
PB = Polychrome Bible.
PC = Primitive Culture (E. B. Tylor).
PEF = Palestine Exploration Fund.
PEFSt = Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement.
PRE = Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche.
PSBA = Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology.
RA = Revue Archéologique.
RB = Revue Biblique.
REG = Revue des Études Grecques.
RGG = Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart.
RHR = Revue de l'Histoire des Religions.
Roscher = Roscher's Ausführliches Lexikon der griech. und röm. Mythologie.
RS = Religion of the Semites (W. Robertson Smith).
SBAW = Sitzungsberichte der Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften.
SBE = Sacred Books of the East.
Schaff-Herzog = The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia (Eng. tr. of PRE).
SDB = Hastings' Single-vol. Dictionary of the Bible.
SEP = Memoirs of Survey of Eastern Palestine.
SA = Studien und Kritiken.
SWP = Memoirs of Survey of Western Palestine.
ThLZ = Theologische Literaturzeitung.
ThT = Theol. Tijdschrift.
TS = Texts and Studies.
TU = Texte und Untersuchungen.
Wetzer-Welte = Wetzer-Welte's Kirchenlexikon.
WH = Westcott-Hort's Greek Testament.
ZATW = Zeitschrift für die alttest. Wissenschaft.
ZDMG = Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft.
ZKG = Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte.
ZKWL = Zeitschrift für kirchl. Wissenschaft und kirchl. Leben.
ZNTW = Zeitschrift für die neuest. Wissenschaft.
ZTK = Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche.
ZWT = Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie.

DICTIONARY OF THE APOSTOLIC CHURCH

A

AARON.—By name Aaron is mentioned in the NT only by St. Luke (Lk 1<sup>5</sup>, Ac 7<sup>40</sup>) and by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (5<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>), and in his personal history very little interest is taken. Officially, he was represented to be the first of a long line of high priests, specifically appointed such (Ex 28<sup>14</sup>) in confirmation of the status already allowed him in Arabic usage (Ex 4<sup>14</sup>); and, though his successors were probably not all in the direct line of descent, they found it convenient to claim relationship with him (Ezr 2<sup>61f.</sup>), and gradually the conceptions involved in high-priesthood were identified with the name of Aaron. That continued to be the case in the apostolic period; and it became a familiar thought that the high priest was a type of Christ, who was viewed as the antitype of all true sacerdotal persons and ministries.

In this typical relation between Aaron as the embodiment of priestly ideas and Christ as their final expression, an attempt was made to trace differences as well as correspondences. Christ was thought of, not as identical with His prototype, but as invested with higher qualities, of which only the germ and promise are to be found in Aaron.

1. In regard to vocation, both were appointed by God (He 5<sup>4</sup>); yet to the priesthood of Christ no Aaronic (7<sup>11</sup>), or Levitical (7<sup>14</sup>), or legal (9<sup>8</sup>) measure may be put. He was a man like Aaron (2<sup>16f.</sup>), capable of sympathy both by nature and from experience (4<sup>15</sup>); yet His priesthood is distinctly of a higher and eternal order (5<sup>9</sup>), limited neither to an earthly sanctuary (9<sup>24</sup>), nor to the necessity of repeating the one great sacrifice (9<sup>25f.</sup>), nor in efficiency to the treatment of offences that were chiefly ceremonial or ritual (9<sup>8</sup>. 14).

2. In the consecration of the high priest the supreme act was anointing with oil (Lv 8<sup>12</sup>), from which, indeed, the designation Messiah ('anointed one') arose. Yet such was the lofty position of Jesus, and such was His consciousness, that He could say, 'I consecrate myself' (Jn 17<sup>19m</sup>), on the very eve of His priestly sacrifice.

3. In function Aaron stood between God and the congregation, representing each to the other. On the one hand, not only were the priests gathered together into an embodied unity in him, but in his annual approach to God he brought a sacrifice even for the 'ignorances' of the people

(He 9<sup>7</sup>), and purified the sanctuary itself from any possible defilements contracted through the sins of its frequenters (9<sup>19f.</sup>; cf. Lv 16<sup>16</sup>). As the representative of God, he wore the sacred Urim and Thummim in the pouch of judgment upon his heart (Ex 28<sup>30</sup>), indicating his qualification to communicate God's decision on matters that transcended human wit; and through him and his order the blessing of God was invoked. In the Christian thought of the apostolic age all these functions pass over to Jesus Christ, with modifications emphasizing their ethical effect and the intrinsically spiritual benefit that follows. One of the most general statements is He 2<sup>17</sup>, where the phrase 'things pertaining to God' covers both sides of the relations between God and man, though prominence is given, as in the passages that speak of Christ as our Advocate with God, to the work done by Him as representing men. Much the same is the case with the great passage on mediatorship (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>). As He is the Saviour, so He is the High Priest, of all men, 'specially of them that believe' (1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>). In virtue of His immanence as God, as well as of His priestly rank and sympathy, He fitly represents all men before God, while for those who have put themselves into a right attitude towards Him He acts as Paraclete (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), promoting their interests and completing their deliverance from sin. On the other hand, as representative of God, He bestows gifts upon men (Eph 4<sup>8</sup>), communicating to them the will of God and enriching them with every spiritual blessing. He is not only the Revealer of the Father; but, just as He offers His sacrifice to God in the stead of man, so He represents to man what God is in relation to human sin, and what God has devised and does with a view to human redemption. Between God and man He stands continuously, the medium of access on either side, the channel of Divine grace and of human prayer and praise.

See, further, art. MELCHIZEDEK.

LITERATURE.—See art. 'Aaron' in HDB, DCG and JE, and Comm. on Hebrews, esp. those of A. B. Davidson and B. F. Westcott, A. S. Peake (Century Bible), E. C. Wickham (Westminster Com.); also Phillips Brooks, Sermons in English Churches, 1883, p. 43; J. Wesley, Works, vii. [London, 1872] 273.

R. W. MOSS.

AARON'S ROD.—Aaron's rod is mentioned only in He 9<sup>4</sup>, which locates the rod in the ark. An earlier tradition (Nu 17<sup>10</sup>; cf. 1 K 8<sup>9</sup>) preserves it 'before' the ark, on the spot on which it had budded (see HDB i. 3<sup>b</sup>). In either case the object was to secure a standing witness to the validity of the claims of the Aaronic priesthood (so Clement, 1 Cor. § 43). The rod has sometimes been identified as a branch of the almond tree; and both Jewish and Christian fancy has been busy with it. For early legends associating it symbolically with the cross, or literally with the transverse beam of the cross, see W. W. Seymour, The Cross in Tradition, History, Art, 1898, p. 83. R. W. Moss.

ABADDON.—The word is found in the NT only in Rev 9<sup>11</sup>. In the OT text 'abaddon occurs six times (only in the Wisdom literature), AV in each case rendering 'destruction', while RV gives 'Destruction' in Job 28--31<sup>1</sup>, Ps 88<sup>11</sup>, but 'Abaddon' in Job 26<sup>6</sup>, Pr 15<sup>11</sup> 27<sup>0</sup>, on the ground, as stated by the Revisers in their Preface, that 'a proper name appears to be required for giving vividness and point.' Etymologically the word is an abstract term meaning 'destruction,' and it is employed in this sense in Job 31<sup>12</sup>. Its use, however, in parallelism with Sheol in Job 26<sup>6</sup>, Pr 15<sup>11</sup> 27<sup>0</sup> and with 'the grave' in Ps 88<sup>11</sup> shows that even in the OT it had passed beyond this general meaning and had become a specialized term for the abode of the dead. In Job 28--31, again, it is personified side by side with Death, just as Hades is personified in Rev 6<sup>8</sup>. So far as the OT is concerned, and notwithstanding the evident suggestions of its derivation (from Heb. 'abadh, 'to perish'), the connotation of the word does not appear to advance beyond that of the parallel word Sheol in its older meaning of the general dwelling-place of all the dead. In later Heb. literature, however, when Sheol had come to be recognized as a sphere of moral distinctions and consequent retribution, Abaddon is represented as one of the lower divisions of Sheol and as being the abode of the wicked and a place of punishment. At first it was distinguished from Gehenna, as a place of loss and deprivation rather than of the positive suffering assigned to the latter. But in the Rabbinic teaching of a later time it becomes the very house of perdition (Targ. on Job 26<sup>6</sup>), the lowest part of Gehenna, the deepest deep of hell (Emek Hamelekh, 15.3).

In Rev 9<sup>11</sup> Abaddon is not merely personified in the free poetic manner of Job 28--31, but is used as the personal designation in Hebrew of a fallen angel described as the king of the locusts and 'the angel of the abyss,' whose name in the Greek tongue is said to be Apollyon. In the LXX 'abaddon is regularly rendered by ἀπώλεια; and the personification of the Heb. word by the writer of Rev. apparently led him to form from the corresponding Gr. verb (ἀπολλω, later form of ἀπόλλυμι) a Gr. name with the personal ending ων. Outside of the Apocalypse the name Abaddon has hardly any place in English literature, while Apollyon, on the contrary, has become familiar through the use made of it in the Pilgrim's Progress by Bunyan, whose conception of Apollyon, however, is entirely his own. Abaddon or Apollyon was often identified with Asmodeus, 'the evil spirit' of To 3<sup>8</sup>; but this identification is now known to be a mistake.

LITERATURE.—The artt. s.vv. in HDB and EBI; art. 'Abyss' in ERE; ExpT xx. [1908-09] 234 f. J. C. LAMBERT.

ABBA.—Abba is the emphatic form of the Aram. word for 'father' (see Dalman, Aram. Gram. p. 98, for אבא and its various forms; also Maclean, in DCG, s.v.). It is found only in three passages in the NT, viz. Mk 14<sup>36</sup>, Ro 8<sup>15</sup>, Gal 4<sup>6</sup>; in each case ὁ πατήρ is subjoined to Ἀββᾶ, the whole expression being a title of address. [The use of ὁ πατήρ, nominative with the article, as a vocative, is not a Hebraism, as Lightfoot thought, but an emphatic vocative not unknown to classical Greek and common in the NT: 'nearly sixty examples of it are found in NT'; see Moulton, Gram. of NT Greek, Edinburgh, 1906, p. 70.]

Lightfoot on Gal 4<sup>6</sup> argues that the bilingual expression is a liturgical formula originating with Hellenistic Jews, who, while clinging to the original word which was consecrated by long usage, added to it the Greek equivalent; but he supports an alternative theory that it took its rise among Jews of Palestine after they had become acquainted with the Greek language, and is simply an expression of importunate entreaty, and an example of that verbal usage whereby the same idea is conveyed in different forms for the sake of emphasis. As illustrations of this repetition, he quotes Rev 9<sup>11</sup> (Ἀπολλύων, Ἀβδδων) 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup> (Σατανας, Διάβολος). Thayer, in HDB (s.v.), points out that, though devotional intensity belongs to repetition of the same term (e.g. κυρίε, κυρίε), it is also expressed by such phrases as ναὶ ἡμῖν, 'Hallelujah, Praise the Lord,' where the terms are different. The context of each passage where 'Abba, Father' is found appears to prove that the Greek addition is not merely the explanation of the Aramaic word, such as, e.g., St. Peter might have added in his preaching—a custom to be perpetuated by the Evangelists, as suggested by the passage in Mk.; but is rather an original formula, the genesis of which is to be sought further back, perhaps in the actual words used by our Lord Himself. Thus Sanday-Headlam on Ro 8<sup>15</sup> (ICC, 1902) remark:

'It seems better to suppose that our Lord Himself, using familiarly both languages, and concentrating into this word of all words such a depth of meaning, found Himself impelled spontaneously to repeat the word, and that some among His disciples caught and transmitted the same habit. It is significant however of the limited extent of strictly Jewish Christianity that we find no other original examples of the use than these three.'

Thus, the double form is due to the fact that the early Christians were a bilingual people; and the duplication, while conveying intensity to the expression, 'would only be natural where the speaker was using in both cases his familiar tongue.' F. H. Chase (TS i. iii. 23) suggests that the phrase is due to the shorter or Lucan form of the Lord's Prayer, and that the early Christians repeated the first word in the intensity of their devotion, coupling a Hellenistic rendering with the Aramaic Abba. He argues that the absence of such a phrase as ὁ ἐστιν, or ὁ ἐστὶ μεθερμηνευόμενος, in Mk 14<sup>36</sup> is due to the familiarity of the formula; and that, while the Pauline passages do not recall Gethsemane, they suggest the Lord's Prayer as current in the shorter form. Moulton (op. cit. p. 10), combating Zahn's theory that Aramaic was the language of St. Paul's prayers—a theory based on the Apostle's 'Abba, Father'—remarks that 'the peculiar sacredness of association belonging to the first word of the Lord's Prayer in its original tongue supplies a far more probable account of its liturgical use among Gentile Christians.' He mentions the analogy (see footnote, loc. cit.) of the Roman Catholic 'saying Paternoster,' but adds that 'Paul will not allow even one word of prayer in a foreign tongue without adding an instant translation'; and further refers to the Welsh use of Pader as a name for the Lord's Prayer.

It seems probable (1) that the phrase, 'Abba, Father,' is a liturgical formula; (2) that the duality of the form is not due to a Hebraistic repetition for the sake of emphasis, but to the fact that the early Christians, even of non-Jewish descent, were familiar with both Aramaic and Greek; (3) that Abba, being the first word of the Lord's Prayer, was held in special veneration, and was quoted with the Greek equivalent attached to it, as a familiar devotional phrase (like Maran atha [1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>], which would be quite intelligible to Christians of Gentile origin, though its Greek translation, ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς [Ph 4<sup>5</sup>], was also used; cf. Did. 10<sup>5</sup>, where 'Maran atha' and 'Amen' close a public prayer); and (4) that our Lord Himself, though this cannot be said to be established beyond doubt, used the double form in pronouncing the sacred Name, which was invoked in His prayer.

In conclusion, it should be noted that, while the phrase is associated with the specially solemn occasion of the Gethsemane agony, where our Lord is reported by St. Mark to have used it, both examples of its use in the Pauline writings convey a similar impression of solemnity as connected with the Christian believer's assurance of sonship—and sonship (let it be noted) not in the general sense in which all humanity may be described as children of God, but in the intimate and spiritual connotation belonging to υιοθεσία, or 'adoption,' into the family of God.

LITERATURE.—See art. 'Abba' in HDB, DCG, and JE, an art. in ExpT xx. [1909] 356, and the authorities cited above.

R. MARTIN POPE.

ABEL.—Ἀβελ has the first place in the roll of 'the elders' (οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, He 11<sup>1</sup>), or men of past generations, who by their faith pleased God and had witness borne to them. It is recorded of him that he offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice (πλείονα θυσίαν) than his elder brother (He 11<sup>4</sup>). In the original story (Gn 4<sup>1-7</sup>) his offering was probably regarded as more pleasing on account of the material of his sacrifice. It was in accordance with primitive Semitic ideas that the occupation of a keeper of sheep was more pleasing to God than that of a tiller of the ground, and accordingly that a firstling of the flock was a more acceptable offering than the fruit of the ground. The ancient writer of the story (J) evidently wished to teach that animal sacrifice alone was pleasing to God (Gunkel, Genesis, 38; Skinner, 105). The author of Hebrews gives the story a different turn. The greater excellence of Abel's sacrifice consisted in the disposition with which it was offered. The spirit of the worshipper rather than the substance of the offering is now considered the essential element. Abel's sacrifice was the offering of a man whose heart was right. Through his faith he won God's approval of his gifts, and through his faith his blood continued to speak for him after his death. In a later passage of Heb. (12<sup>24</sup>) that blood is contrasted with 'the blood of sprinkling,' by which the new covenant is confirmed. The blood of Abel cried out from the ground for vengeance (cf. Job 16<sup>18</sup>, Is 26<sup>21</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>28</sup>; also Rev 6<sup>9, 10</sup>); it was such a cry as is sounded in Milton's sonnet, 'Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints'; but the blood of the eternal covenant intercedes for mercy.

St. John (1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>) uses the murder of Abel by his brother to illustrate the absence of that spirit of love which is the essence of goodness. The writer indicates that the new commandment, or message (ἀγγελία), which has been heard from the beginning of the Christian era, was also the fundamental law of the moral life from the beginning of human history. Cain was of the evil one (ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ), and slaughtered (ἐσφαξεν) his brother.

LITERATURE.—Besides the art. in the Bible Dictionaries, see W. G. Elmslie, Expository Lectures and Sermons, 1892, p. 164; J. Hastings, Greater Men and Women of the Bible, vol. i. [1913] p. 63; G. Matheson, The Representative Men of the Bible, i. [1902] 45; A. P. Peabody, King's Chapel Sermons, 1891, p. 317; A. Whyte, Bible Characters, i. [1896] 44.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ABIDING.—As in the Gospels, so in Acts and Ephesians we find both the local and the ethical connotations of this word, which in almost every case is used to render μένω or one of its numerous compounds (ἐπι-, κατα-, παρα-, προσ-, ὑπο-). With the purely local usages we have here no concern; but there is a small class of transitional meanings which lead the way to those ethical connotations which are the distinctive property of the word. Among these may be mentioned the several places in 1 Co 7, where St. Paul, dealing with marriage and allied questions (? in view of the Parousia), speaks of abiding in this state or calling. In the same Epistle note also 3<sup>14</sup> 'If any man's work abide,' and 13<sup>13</sup> 'And now abide faith, hope, love.'* Similarly we are told of the persistence (a) of Melchizedek's priesthood (He 7<sup>3</sup>), (b) of the Divine fidelity even in face of human faithlessness (2 Ti 2<sup>13</sup>), and (c) of the word of God (1 P 1<sup>23</sup>).

It is, however, in the 1st Ep. of John, as in the Fourth Gospel, that we get the ethical use of abiding most fully developed and most amply presented. But, while in the Gospel the emphasis is laid on the Son's abiding in the Father and Christ's abiding in the Church, in 1 Jn 2<sup>4-7</sup> the stress is rather on the mutual abiding of the believer and God (Father and Son). Note the following experimental aspects of the relation in question.

1. The believer as the place of the abiding.—A somewhat peculiar expression is found in 1 Jn 2<sup>27</sup>, where we read: 'The anointing . . . abideth in you.' By χρίσμα is meant the gift of the Holy Spirit (cf. 2 Co 1<sup>21</sup>), whose presence in the heart gives the believer an independent power of testing whatever teaching he receives (cf. 'He shall take of mine and shall show it unto you,' Jn 16<sup>10</sup>).† In 1 Jn 2<sup>14</sup> it is said that the word of God abideth in 'young men'; but it is also the meaning in v. 24; while in 3<sup>4</sup> Christ is mentioned as abiding in them 'by the Spirit.' In each passage we have a subtle instance of the perfectly natural way in which the operation of the risen Christ on the heart is identified with that of the Spirit. The believer's soul is thus mystically thought of as the matrix in which the Divine energy of salvation, conceived of in its various aspects, is operative as a cleansing, saving, and conserving power, safeguarding it from error, sin, and unfaithfulness.

2. The abiding place of the believer.—In 1 Jn 2<sup>24</sup> we have the promise that 'if the [word] heard from the beginning' remains in the believer's heart, he shall 'continue in the Son' and in the Father (cf. 3<sup>6</sup>). This reciprocal relation between the implanted word and the human environment in which it energizes is peculiarly Johannine. Secondary forms of the same idea are found in 2<sup>10</sup> ('he that loveth his brother abideth in the light'), and in 3<sup>14</sup> ('he that hateth his brother abideth in death'). In 2<sup>5</sup> we have the fact that the believer abides in Christ made the ground for a practical appeal for consistency of life, and in v. 28 the reward of such living is that the believer 'abideth for ever,' i.e. has eternal life. As a general principle, in the use of this word we find a striking union of the mystical and the ethical aspects of the Christian faith.

LITERATURE.—G. G. Findlay, The Things Above, 1901, p. 237; G. H. Knight, Divine Upliftings, 1906, p. 85; F. von Hügel, Eternal Life, 1912, p. 365 f.; and also the art. 'Abiding' in DCG, and the literature there cited.

E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

ABOMINATION (βδέλυγμα).—Like the word 'taste'—originally a physical, then a mental term,—'abomination' denotes that for which God and His people have a violent distaste. It refers in the OT to the feeling of repulsion against prohibited foods (Lv 11<sup>10</sup>, Dt 14<sup>3</sup>), then to everything * Popular opinion, based on a well-known hymn (Par. 491<sup>3f</sup>), very erroneously makes faith and hope pass away, only love abiding.

† As indicated in HDB i. 101b, the words of 1 Jn 2<sup>27</sup> gave rise to the practice of anointing with oil at baptism.

connected with idolatry (Dt 7<sup>25</sup>, Ro 2<sup>22</sup> [Gr.]).* Thence it acquires a moral meaning, and together with fornication stigmatizes all the immoralities of heathendom (Rev 17<sup>4-5</sup>). Its intensest use is reserved for hypocrisy, the last offence against religion (Lk 16<sup>15</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup>, Rev 21<sup>27</sup>).

SHERWIN SMITH.

ABOUNDING.—The English word 'abound' in the Epistles of the NT is the translation of the Gr. words πλεονάζω and περισσεύω. There is nothing of special interest in these terms; perhaps the former has the less lofty sense, its primary connotation being that of superfluity. As used by St. Paul, however, there seems little to choose between them, although it is worth noting that, where he speaks (Ro 5<sup>20</sup>) of the 'offence' and 'sin' abounding, he uses πλεονάζειν. Yet he employs the same term in Ro 6<sup>1</sup> of the 'abounding of grace,' and in Ph 4<sup>17</sup> of the fruit of Christian giving. His favourite term, however, is περισεύω (in one case υπερπερισεύω, 'overflow,' Ro 5<sup>20</sup>), whether he is speaking of the grace of God (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>), the sufferings of Christ (2 Co 1<sup>5</sup>), or the Christian spirit that finds expression in liberality (2 Co 8<sup>7-9</sup>), contentment (Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>), hope (Ro 5<sup>15</sup>), service (1 Co 15<sup>38</sup>). This list of references is not exhaustive, but it is representative. These words and the way in which they are used give us a suggestive glimpse into—

1. The religious temperament of the Apostle.—His was a rich and overflowing nature, close-packed with vivid, ever-active qualities of mind and heart. His conception of the gospel would be naturally in accordance with the wealth of his psychic and moral nature; he would inevitably fasten on such aspects of it as most thoroughly satisfied his own soul; and he would put its resources to the full test of his spiritual needs and capacities. It is fortunate that Christianity found at its inception such a man ready to hand as its chief exponent to the primitive churches, and that his letters remain as a record of the marvellous way in which he opened his heart to its appeal, and of the manifold response he was able to make to that appeal. In all ages our faith has been conditioned by the human medium in which it has had to work. The ages of barrenness in Christian experience have been those which have lacked richly-endowed personalities for its embodiment and exposition; and vice versa, when such personalities have arisen and have given themselves wholeheartedly to the Divine Spirit, there has been a wide-spread efflorescence of religious experience in the Church at large. Ordinary men and women are pensioners religiously, to a peculiar degree, of the great souls in the community. St. Paul, Origen, Augustine, Bernard, Luther, Wesley, etc., have been the focal points through which the forces of the gospel have radiated into the world at large, and lifted its life to higher levels.

2. The superabundant wealth of the gospel as a medium of the Divine energies of redemption.—The Christian faith is full of spiritual resources on which the soul may draw to the utmost of its needs. In the teaching of our Lord, the prodigality of His illustrations, their varied character, and the frequency with which He likens the Kingdom to a 'feast,' with all its suggestions of a large welcome and an overflowing abundance of good things, are very characteristic of His own attitude towards the gospel He preached; and St. Paul is pre-eminent among NT writers for the way in which he has grasped the same idea, and caught the spirit of the Master in his exposition of spiritual realities. (Cf. 'How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare' [Lk 15<sup>17</sup>] with 'the grace of God, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many' [Ro 3<sup>15</sup>; also vv 17, 19, 20, 21], and many other passages.)

3. The call for an adequate response on the part of believers to the varied and abundant resources of the gospel.—Here, again, St. Paul exhausts the power of language in urging his converts to allow the Divine energies of salvation to have their way with them. The normal type of Christian is not reached till his nature is flooded with the grace of God, and he in turn is lifted into a condition which is characterized by an abounding increase of hope, grace, love, good works, and fruitfulness of character. 'Therefore, as ye abound in (everything), see that ye abound in this grace also' (2 Co 8<sup>7</sup>) expresses one of his favourite forms of appeal. He was not satisfied to see men raised to a slightly higher plane by their faith in Christ; they were to be 'transformed in the spirit of their minds' (Ro 12-); they were always to 'abound in the work of the Lord' (1 Co 15<sup>58</sup>; cf. 2 Co 9<sup>8</sup>); and, as 'they had received' of him how they might walk and 'to please God,' they were exhorted to 'abound more and more' (1 Th 4<sup>1</sup>), and that especially because they knew what commandments 'had been given them by the Lord Jesus' (1 Th 4<sup>2</sup>). It was a subject for joyfulness to him when he found his converts thus responding to the power of God (see 2 Co 8<sup>14</sup>). As regards his realization of this Divine abundance in his own experience, we find him breaking out into an ecstasy of thanksgiving at the thought of what God has done for him, and of the sense of inward spiritual abundance which he consequently enjoys, so that he feels quite independent of all outward conditions, however hard they may be (cf. Ph 4<sup>11-13</sup>). This is the language of a man who enjoys all the resources of the Godhead in his inner life, and who can, therefore, be careless of poverty, misfortune, sickness, and even the prospect of an untimely end.

LITERATURE.—See Sanday-Headlam, and Lightfoot (especially Notes on Epistles of St. Paul), on the passages referred to, also Phillips Brooks, The Light of the World, 1891, p. 140, and ExpT viii. [1897] 514<sup>a</sup>.

E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

ABRAHAM (Ἀβραάμ).—Addressing a Jewish crowd in the precincts of the Temple, St. Peter emphasizes the connexion between the Hebrew and the Christian religion by proclaiming that 'the God of Abraham . . . hath glorified his servant (παῖδα; cf. RVm) Jesus' (Ac 3<sup>13</sup>). This Divine title, which is similarly used in St. Stephen's speech (7<sup>32</sup>), was full of significance. All through the OT and the NT the foundation of the true religion is ascribed neither to the Prophets nor to Moses, but to Abraham. Isaac (Gn 26<sup>24</sup>) and Jacob (31<sup>4</sup>) worshipped the God of Abraham, but Abraham did not worship the Elohim whom his fathers served beyond the River (Jos 24<sup>2-14-15</sup>). He was the head of the great family that accepted Jahweh as their God. Jews, Muslims, and Christians are all in some sense his seed, as having either his blood in their veins or his faith in their souls. To the Jews he is 'our father Abraham' (Ac 7-; Ro 4<sup>12</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>). 'our forefather (τὸν προπάτορα) according to the flesh' (Ro 4<sup>1</sup>). To the Muhammadans he is the 'model of religion' (imam, or priest) and the first person 'resigned (muslim) unto God' (Qur'an, ii. 115, 125). To the Christians he is 'the father of all them that believe' (Ro 4<sup>11</sup>), 'the father of us all' (4<sup>16</sup>). Taking the word Abraham to mean (according to the popular word-play, Ro 4<sup>17</sup> || Gn 17<sup>5</sup>) 'a father of many nations,' St. Paul regards it as indicating that Abraham is the spiritual ancestor of the whole Christian Church.

1. In the Epistles of St. Paul.—As Abraham was the renowned founder of the Jewish nation and faith, it was crucially important to decide whether the Jews or the Christians could claim his support in their great controversy on justification. The ordinary Jews regarded Abraham as a model legalist, whose faith in God (Gn 15st.) consisted in the fulfilment of the Law, which he knew by a kind of intuition. According to the Jewish tradition (Bereshith Rabb. 44, Wünsche), Abraham saw the whole history of his descendants in the mysterious vision recorded in (Gn 15st.) Thus he is said to have 'rejoiced with the joy of the Law' (Westcott, St. John [in Speaker's Com.], 140). In the philosophical school of Alexandria there was a much higher conception of faith, which was regarded as 'the most perfect of virtues,' 'the queen of virtues,' 'the only sure and infallible good, the solace of life, the fulfilment of worthy hopes, . . . the inheritance of happiness, the entire amelioration of the soul, which leans for support on Him who is the cause of all things, who is able to do all things, and willeth to do those which are most excellent' (Philo, Quis rer. div. her. i. 485, de Abr. ii. 39). In these passages faith, in so far as it expresses a spiritual attitude towards God, does not differ much from Christian faith. Nor could anything be finer than the Rabbinic Mechilta on Ex 14th: 'Great is faith, whereby Israel believed on Him that spake and the world was. . . . In like manner thou findest that Abraham our father inherited this world and the world to come solely by the merit of faith whereby he believed in the Lord; for it is said, and he believed in the Lord, and He counted it to him for righteousness' (Lightfoot, Galatians, 162). But the ordinary tendency of Judaism was to give Abraham's life a predominantly legal colour, as in 1 Mac 2nd: 'Was not Abraham found faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness?'

* Cf. the well-known expression, 'abomination of desolation,' applied to a heathen altar (Dn 12<sup>11</sup>; cf. 1 Mac 15<sup>4</sup>, Mt 24<sup>15</sup>, Mk 13<sup>14</sup>). See art. 'Abomination of Desolation' in ADB.

To St. Paul faith is the motive power of the whole life, and in two expositions of his doctrine—Ro 4, Gal 3—he affirms the essential identity of Abraham's faith with that of every Christian. He does not, indeed, think (like Jesus Himself in Jn 8th) of Abraham as directly foreseeing the day of Christ, but he maintains that Abraham's faith in God as then partially revealed was essentially the same as the Christian's faith in God as now fully made known in Christ. Abraham had faith when he was still in uncircumcision (Ro 4th), faith in God's power to do things apparently impossible (4th-19), faith by which he both strengthened his own manhood and gave glory to God (4th). Abraham believed 'the gospel' which was preached to him beforehand, the gospel which designated him as the medium of blessing to all the nations (Gal 3rd). And as his faith, apart from his works, was counted to him for righteousness, he became the representative believer, in whom all other believers, without distinction, may recognize their spiritual father. It is not Abraham's blood but his spirit that is to be coveted (3rd); those who are of faith (oi ek pisteως) are 'sons of Abraham,' are 'blessed with the faithful Abraham' (3rd-9); upon the Gentiles has come 'the blessing of Abraham' (3rd); all who are Christ's, without any kind of distinction, are 'Abraham's sons,' fulfilling, like him, the conditions of Divine acceptance, and inheriting with him the Divine promises.

St. Paul uses the narratives of Genesis as he finds them. Before the dawn of criticism the theologian did not raise the question whether the patriarchal portraits were real or ideal. To St. Paul Abraham is a historical person who lived 430 years before Moses (Gal 3rd), and who was not inferior to the great prophets of Israel in purity of religious insight and strength of inward piety. It is now almost universally believed that the faith ascribed to the patriarchs was itself the result of a long historical evolution. But, while the maturer conceptions of a later age are carried back to Abraham, the patriarch is not dissolved into a creation of the religious fancy. 'The ethical and spiritual idea of God which is at the foundation of the religion of Israel could only enter the world through a personal organ of divine revelation; and nothing forbids us to see in Abraham the first of that long series of prophets through whom God has communicated to mankind a saving knowledge of Himself' (Skinner, Genesis [ICC, 1910], p. xxvii).

2. In the Epistle of St. James.—St. James (2nd-23) uses the example of Abraham to establish the thesis, not that 'a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law' (Ro 3rd), but that 'by works a man is justified, and not only by faith' (Ja 2nd). While the two apostles agree that Christianity is infinitely more than a creed, being nothing if not a life, they differ in their conception of faith. The meaning which St. James attaches to the word is indicated by his suggestion of believing demons and dead faith (2nd-20). St. Paul would have regarded both of these phrases as contradictions in terms, since all believers are converted and all faith is living. Asked if faith must not prove or justify itself by works, he would have regarded the question as superfluous, for a faith that means self-abandonment in passionate adoring love to the risen Christ inevitably makes the believer Christlike. St. James says in effect: 'Abraham believed God, proving his faith by works, and it was counted to him for righteousness.' With St. Paul righteousness comes between faith and works; with St. James works come between faith and righteousness. Had St. James been attacking either Galatians or Romans, and in particular correcting St. Paul's misuse of the example of Abraham, his polemic would have been singularly lame. Such a theory does injustice to his intelligence. But, if he was sounding a note of warning against popular perversions of evangelical doctrine, St. Paul, who was often 'slandereously reported' (Ro 3rd), must have been profoundly grateful to him. See, further, art. JAMES, EPISTLE OF.

It is interesting to note that Clement of Rome co-ordinates the doctrines of the two apostles. Taking the typical example of Abraham, he asks, 'Wherefore was our father Abraham blessed?' and answers, 'Was it not because he wrought righteousness and truth through faith?' (Ep. ad Cor. § 31). If the two types of doctrine could be regarded as complementary sets of truths, justice was done to both apostles. But the difference assumed a dangerous form in the hard dogmatic distinction of the Schoolmen between fides informis and fides formata cum caritate, the latter of which (along with the 'epistle of straw' on which it seemed to be based) Luther so vehemently repudiated.

3. In the Epistle to the Hebrews.—The writer of Hebrews bases on the incident of Abraham's meeting with Melchizedek (He 7; cf. Gn 14) an argument for a priesthood higher than the Aaronic order (v. 11th). To the king-priest of Salem Abraham gave tithes, and from him received a blessing, thereby owning his inferiority to that majestic figure. As Abraham was the ancestor of the tribe of Levi, the Aaronic priesthood itself may be said to have been overshadowed in that hour and ever afterwards by the mysterious order of Melchizedek. This is the conception of the writer of Ps 110, who identifies God's vicegerent, seated on the throne of Zion, not with the Aaronic order, but with the royal priesthood of Melchizedek. When the Maccabees displaced the house of Aaron, and concentrated in their own persons the kingly and priestly functions, they found their justification in the priestly dignity of Melchizedek, and called themselves, in his style, 'priests of the Most High' (Charles, Book of Jubilees, 1902, pp. lix and 191). Finally, when Christ had given a Messianic interpretation of Ps 110, it was natural that the writer of Hebrews should see the Aaronic priesthood superseded by an eternal King-Priest after the ancient consecrated order of Melchizedek.

For divergent critical views of the Abraham-Melchizedek pericope of Gn 14 see Wellhausen, Comp. 2, 1889, p. 211 f.; Gunkel, Genesis, 253; Skinner, Genesis, 269 f. Against Wellhausen's theory that the story is a post-exilic attempt to glorify the priesthood in Jerusalem, Gunkel and Skinner argue for an antique traditional basis.

The writer of Hebrews illustrates his definition of faith (11<sup>1</sup>) by three events in the life of Abraham.—(1) The patriarch left his home and kindred, and 'went out not knowing whither he went' (He 11<sup>8</sup>). His faith was a sense of the unseen and remote, as akin to the spiritual and eternal. In obedience to a Divine impulse he ventured forth on the unknown, confident that his speculative peradventure would be changed into a realized ideal. The doubting heart says, 'Forward, though I cannot see, I guess and fear'; the believing spirit, 'Look up, trust, be not afraid.'—(2) Abraham remained all his life a sojourner (παροικος και παρελθωνος = ערומ, Gn 23<sup>4</sup>) in the Land of Promise (He 11<sup>9</sup>). He left his home in Chaldæa, and never found another. Wherever he went he built an altar to God, but never a home for himself. He was encamped in many places, but naturalized in none. His pilgrim spirit is related to his hope of an eternal city—a beautiful conception transferred to Genesis from the literature of the Maccabean period (En. 90<sup>28, 29</sup>, Apoc. Bar. 32<sup>3, 4</sup> etc.).—(3) By faith Abraham offered up Isaac, 'accounting that God is able to raise up, even from the dead' (He 11<sup>19</sup>). Here again the belief of a later age becomes the motive of the patriarch's act of renunciation. The narrative in Gn 22 contains no indication that the thought of a resurrection flashed through his agonized mind.

LITERATURE.—F. W. Weber, Syst. der altsyn. paläst. Theol. aus Targum, Midrasch, u. Talmud, 1880, ch. xix.; J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians, 1865, p. 158 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>2</sup>, 1902, p. 102 ff.; W. Beyschlag, NT Theology, 1894-96, i. 364 ff.; A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1896, p. 116 ff.; G. B. Stevens, Theology of the NT, 1901, p. 289; B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, 1882-83, i. 437 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ABSTINENCE.—Introduction.—The whole of morality on its negative side may be included under Abstinence. Christian moral progress (sanctification) includes a holding fast (κατέχεσθαι) of the good, and an abstaining from (ἀνέχεσθαι) every form of evil (1 Th 5<sup>22</sup>). While Christianity has general laws to distinguish the good from the bad, yet for each individual Christian these laws are focused in the conscience, and the function of the latter is to discriminate between the good and the bad—it cannot devolve this duty on outward rules. With it the ultimate decision rests, and on it also lies the responsibility (Ro 14<sup>5</sup>, He 5<sup>14</sup>). The lists of vices and virtues,* of 'works of the flesh' and 'fruits of the spirit,' given in the NT are not meant to be exhaustive, but typical; nor are they given to make needless the exercise of Christian discernment. The NT is not afraid to place in the Christian conscience the decision of what is to be abstained from and what is not, because it believes in the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, and because it exalts personal responsibility. It is necessary to make this clear, because, as we shall see, the ultimate tribunal of appeal in matters of abstinence in the ordinary sense (i.e. in the sphere of things indifferent) is the Christian conscience. The ideal of Christian conduct is sometimes said to be self-realization, not self-suppression; consecration, not renunciation. These antitheses are apt to be misleading. In the self with which Christianity deals there are sinful elements that have to be extirpated. Christian sanctification takes place not in innocent men, but in sinners who have to be cleansed from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit (2 Co 7<sup>1</sup>). To purify oneself (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>) is not simply to realize oneself; it is to do no sin.

In all moral conduct there is suppression; in Christian conduct there is extirpation. This negative side of Christian conduct is abstinence. It is the crucifying of the flesh—death unto sin—and it is the correlative of 'living to righteousness,' 'being risen with Christ,' etc. Abstinence in this sense is an essential and ever-present moment in the Christian life.

More narrowly interpreted, abstinence is a refraining from certain outward actions—as eating, drinking, worldly business, marriage, etc. It is thus applied to outward conduct, while continence (ἐγκράτεια) is used of inward self-restraint. Cicero makes this distinction, though, from the nature of the case, he cannot always consistently apply it (see Lewis and Short, Lat. Dict., s.v. 'Abstinentia').

We may look first at the outward side of abstinence, and then try to find out what the Christian principles are (as these are unfolded in the apostolic writings) that determine its nature and its limits.

I. ASCETIC PRACTICES.—1. Fasting.—(a) Fasting, or abstinence from food and drink, may be unavoidable or involuntary (e.g. Ac 27<sup>21, 22</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>5</sup> * 11<sup>-7</sup>, * Ph 4<sup>12</sup>). Such fastings have a religious value only indirectly. They may overtake the apostate as well as the apostle. If they are caused by devotion to Christian service, they are, like all other privations so caused, badges of fidelity; and they may be referred to with reasonable pride by Christ's ministers (2 Co 6<sup>4</sup>, 11<sup>23</sup>). They ought to silence criticism (cf. Gal 6<sup>17</sup>, where St. Paul speaks of his bruises as στίγματα του 'Ιησου), and they enforce Christian exhortation (Col 4<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>1</sup>). On the principle that he who chooses the end chooses the means, such fastings are real proofs of fidelity to Christ. They are like the scars of the true soldier.

(b) An absorbing pre-occupation with any pursuit may be the cause of fasting. The artist or the scientist may forget to take food, in the intensity of his application to his work; or any great emotion like sorrow may make one 'forget to take bread.' Such a fast we have in Ac 9<sup>9</sup>, where St. Paul, we are told, was without food for three days after his conversion. As Jesus fasted in the wilderness (Mt 4<sup>1-11</sup>), or at the well forgot His hunger (Jn 4<sup>31</sup>), so the ferment of the new life acted on St. Paul thus also. Fasting is not the cause of such pre-occupation, but the effect; and so its value depends on the nature of the emotion causing it.† Such involuntary privations, however, are not fasting in the proper sense. In themselves they are morally indifferent, as they may overtake any one irrespective of moral conditions; but, when borne bravely and contentedly in the line of Christian duty, they are not only indications of true faith, but in turn they strengthen that faith (Ro 5<sup>3-5</sup>, Ph 4<sup>11</sup>).

(c) Real fasting is purposive and voluntary. It is a total or partial abstinence from food for an unusual period, or from certain foods always or at certain times, for a moral or religious end. Such a fast is mentioned in Ac 13<sup>-3</sup> 14<sup>-3</sup> in connexion with ordination. It is associated with prayer. Some hold that it was the form to 'be permanently observed' in such cases (Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, p. 122). There is no mention, however, of fasting at the appointment of Matthias (Ac 1<sup>24</sup>), or of the seven (6<sup>6</sup>). We cannot, therefore, take it as inherently binding on Christian Churches at such solemnities. It is rather the survival of ancient religious practices (like the fasting on the Day of Atonement), which on the occasions referred to were adopted through the force of custom, and served

* See Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904, p. 406 ff., for lists.

* These are sometimes explained as voluntary fasts—to use Hooker's expression (Ecc. Pol. v. 72. 8)—but the contexts seem decisive against that view.

† This was probably what Jesus had in view in the saying in Mt 9<sup>15</sup>.

to solemnize the proceedings. The Atonement fast (Ac 27<sup>9</sup>) is mentioned only as a time limit after which navigation was dangerous. It is not said that St. Paul fasted on that day, though probably he did.

These Jewish survivals were conserved without investigation by the Palestinian Church, though, after what Jesus had said on fasting, we may believe that the spiritual condition of the believer, rather than the performance of the outward rite, would be the essential element. Pharisaism, however, follows so closely on the heels of ritual that in some quarters it very early influenced Christianity (cf. Did. i. 3: 'Fast for those who persecute you'; and Epiph. Har. lxx. 11: 'When they [i.e. the Jews] feast, ye shall fast and mourn for them'; cf. also Polycarp, vii. 2; Hermas, Vis. iii. 10. 6; and, in the same connexion, the interpolations in the NT [Mt 17<sup>21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>3</sup>, Ac 10<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>]). Even the Pharisaic custom of fasting twice a week (Monday and Thursday) was adopted in some quarters, though these days were changed to Wednesday and Friday (Did. viii. 1). These are the later dies stationum or oráreis (cf. Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 12, p. 877). See ERE v. 844<sup>b</sup>.

To evaluate the practice of fasting, we must look to the end aimed at and the efficacy of this means to attain that end. (1) In many cases it would be mainly a matter of tradition. On any eventful occasion men might practise fasting, to ratify a decision or induce solemnity, as those Jews did who vowed to kill St. Paul (Ac 23<sup>12</sup>). Under such a category would fall the Paschal and pre-baptismal fasts. Though not mentioned in the NT, they were early practised in the Christian Church (Eus. HE v. 24; Did. vii.; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 61). There can be no doubt that ordination and baptismal and Paschal fasts may serve to solemnize these events, yet there is no warrant for making them an ecclesiastical rule. In such traditional fasting there is often, consciously or unconsciously, implicated the feeling that God is thereby pleased and merit acquired, and the result in such cases is Pharisaic complacency and externalism. Jesus, following the great prophets (Is 58<sup>5-7</sup>, Zec 8<sup>19</sup>), had relegated outward rites to a secondary place. He demanded secrecy, sincerity, and simplicity in all these matters, and the Apostolic Church never wholly lost sight of His guidance. St. James, while emphasizing the value of prayer (5<sup>17-20</sup>), says nothing of fasting, and he makes real ritual consist in works of mercy and blameless conduct (1<sup>27</sup>). Even when fasting was enjoined, the danger of externalism was recognized (Hermas, Sim. v. 1; Barn. ii. 10; Justin Martyr, Dial. 15). St. Paul had to prove that such fastings could not be redemptively of any value, that they were not binding, that they did not place the observer of them on a higher spiritual plane than the non-observer, that even as means of discipline they were of doubtful value, and that they were perpetually liable to abuse (Col 2<sup>20-23</sup>).

(2) Fastings were used in certain cases to induce ecstatic conditions. This is a well-known feature in apocalyptic writings. Perhaps the Colossian heretics did this (cf. δ εβρακεν ἐμβρατευων, Col 2<sup>18</sup>). St. John and the other Apostles with him are said to have fasted three days before writing the Fourth Gospel (Muratorian fragment). The Apocalypse, however, though a ορασις (vision), is lacking in the usual accompaniments of a vision, viz. prayer and fasting (contrast Hermas, Sim. v. 1). St. Peter's vision (Ac 10<sup>9-16</sup>) was preceded by hunger, but it was not a voluntary fast; nor is there any reference to fasting in the case of St. Paul's visions (Ac 16<sup>9</sup> 18<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>), and the reference in the case of Cornelius (Ac 10<sup>30</sup>) is a later interpolation. It was more when direct prophetic inspiration became a memory rather than when it was a reality that men resorted to fasting in order to superinduce it.

(3) Fasting was resorted to also that alms might be given out of the savings.

'If there is among them a man that is poor and needy, and they have not an abundance of necessities, they fast for two or three days, that they may supply the needy with necessary food' (Aristides, Apology, xv.). Cf. also Hermas, Sim. v. 3. 7: 'Reckon up on this day what thy meal would otherwise have cost thee, and give the amount to some poor widow or orphan, or to the poor.'

Origen (hom. in Levit. x.) quotes an apostolic saying which supports this practice:

'We have found in a certain booklet an apostolic saying, "Blessed is also he who fasts that he may feed the poor"<sup>5</sup>.' ('Invenimus in quodam libello ab apostolis dictum—Beatus est qui etiam jejunaat pro eo ut aliat pauperem').

This saying might legitimately be deduced from such passages as Eph 4<sup>3</sup> and Ja 2<sup>16</sup>, but the practice easily associated itself with the idea of fasting as a work of merit.

'More powerful than prayer is fasting, and more than both alms.' 'Alms abolish sins' (2 Clem. xvi. 4; cf. Hermas, Sim. v. 8).

Fasting done out of Christian love to the brethren is noble; but, when done to gain salvation, it becomes not only profitless but dangerous. 'Though I give all my goods to feed the poor and have not love, it profiteth me nothing' (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>).

(4) Again, fasting may have been viewed as giving power over demons (cf. Clem. Hom. ix. 9; Tertullian, de Jejuniis, 8: 'Docuit etiam adversus diriora demonia jejuniis praeliandum'; cf. Mt 17<sup>21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>29</sup>). Some find this view in the narrative of the Temptation (see EBi, art. 'Temptation'). This view of fasting, grotesque as it appears to us, is akin to the truth that surfeiting of the body dulls the spiritual vision, and that the spiritual life is a rigorous discipline (cf. 1 Co 9<sup>24-27</sup>).

What strikes one in the apostolic writings generally, as contrasted with later ecclesiastical literature, is the scarcity of references to fasting as an outward observance. Nowhere is the traditional Church ascetic held up to imitation in the NT, as Eusebius (HE ii. 23) holds up St. James, or Clement of Alexandria (Pæd. ii. 1) St. Matthew, or the Clem. Hom. (xii. 6, xv. 7) St. Peter, or Epiphanius (Har. lxxviii. 13) the sons of Zebedee.

In the NT the references to fasting are almost all incidental, and apologetic or hostile. It is regarded as due to weakness of faith, or positive perversion. Neither St. John, St. James, St. Jude, nor St. Peter once mentions it as a means of grace. This silence, it is true, ought not to be unduly pressed; yet it is surely a proof that they considered fasting as of no essential importance. Its revival in the Christian Church was due to traditionalism and legalism on the one hand, and to ascetic dualism (Orphic, Platonic, Essenic) on the other. In the NT the latter influence is strenuously opposed (Colossians and Pastors), and the former is as vigorously rejected when it makes itself necessary to salvation, although it is tenderly treated when it is only a weak leaning towards old associations. The whole spirit of apostolic Christianity regards fasting as of little or no importance, and the experience of the Christian Church seems to be that any value it may have is infinitesimal compared with the evils and perversions that seem so inseparably associated with it. According to Eusebius (HE v. 18), Montanus was the first to give laws to the Church on fasting. The NT is altogether opposed to such ecclesiastical laws. The matter is one for the individual Christian intelligence to determine (Ro 14<sup>5</sup>).

St. Paul's language in 1 Co 9<sup>24</sup> has been adduced in support of self-torture of all kinds; but, while we must not minimize the reality of Christian discipline, nothing can be legitimately deduced from this passage or any other in favour of fasting or flagellation as a general means of sanctification, nor is the Apostle's view based on a dualism which looks on matter and the human body as inherently evil. It may be said that interpolations like 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup> (cf. Ac 10<sup>30</sup>, Mt 17<sup>-1</sup>, Mk 9<sup>29</sup>) reveal the beginnings of that ascetic resurgence which reached its climax in monastic austerities, and that there is at least a tinge of ascetic dualism in certain Pauline passages (e.g. Ro 8<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>1-8</sup> 9<sup>27</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>10-11</sup>, Col 3<sup>5</sup>); but even those who hold this view of these Pauline passages admit 'that there is very little asceticism, in the ordinary sense, in St. Paul's Epistles, while there is much that makes in the opposite direction' (McGiffert, Apostol. Age, 1897, p. 136). We shall see, however, when we come to deal with the principles of abstinence as unfolded by St. Paul, that even this minimum residuum has to be dropped.

We may conclude, then, that, according to the NT, fasting is not enjoined or even recommended as a spiritual help. The ideal is life with the Risen Christ, which involves not only total renunciation of all sinful actions but self-restraint in all conduct. When the individual Christian finds fasting to be a part of this self-restraint, then it is useful; but one fails to find any proof in the NT that fasting is necessarily an element of self-restraint. When it is an effect of an absorbing spiritual emotion, or when practised to aid the poor, or involuntarily undergone in the straits of Christian duty, then it is highly commendable.

2. The use of wine.—While drunkenness as well as gluttony is sternly condemned, nowhere is total abstinence, in our sense, enforced. In one passage it has even been contended that St. Paul indirectly opposes it (1 Ti 5<sup>23</sup>), but his words in our time would be simply equivalent to medical advice to the effect that total abstinence as a principle must be subordinated to bodily health. Thus, while total abstinence is in itself not an obligatory duty, it may become so on the principle that we ought not to do anything by which our brother stumbles, or is offended, or is made weak (1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>). This principle, which is equally applicable to fasting, must be considered in deciding the Christian attitude towards all outward observances. While Christianity recognizes the indifferent nature of these customs, while its liberty frees Christians from their observance, yet cases may arise when this liberty has to be subordinated to love and the interests of Christian unity. In 1 Co 8 the Apostle is dealing with the conditions of his own time; our conditions did not engage his attention. Christian abstainers can find an adequate defence for their position in the degrading associations of strong drink in our modern life. On the other hand, total abstinence from strong drink is no more a universally binding duty than fasting is, nor are ecclesiastical rules called for in the one case more than in the other.* Both these customs fall within the sphere of things indifferent, and are to be determined by the individual in the light of the nature of the Christian life, which is 'neither meat nor drink, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>).

3. Marriage and celibacy.—We are not here concerned with the NT doctrine of marriage (q.v.) in its totality, but with the question as to whether celibacy is commanded as a superior grade of living, and as to whether this is based on a dualistic view which regards the sexual functions as in their very nature evil. To begin with, marriage is viewed by St. Paul as being in general a human necessity, as indeed a preventive against incontinency. It is a 'part of his greatness that, in spite of his own somewhat ascetic temperament, he was not blind to social and physiological facts' (Drummond, quoted in EGT on 1 Th 4<sup>3</sup>). He recommends those who can to remain single as he is himself. In view of the approaching world-end in which he believed, marriage meant the multiplication of troubles that would make fidelity to Christ more difficult; and perhaps in this light also the propagation of the race was undesirable. It is possible also that he may have been here influenced unconsciously by his Rabbinical training, and that he interpreted his own case as too generally applicable. He was a celibate for the Kingdom of Heaven's sake (Mt 19<sup>10-12</sup>), and he may have made the mistake of desiring to universalize his own exceptional case.

Yet there is no ground for the view that celibacy in itself is a superior form of life.* St. Paul does not say that it can produce that life or is necessary to it, but when it is a consequence of it, then it is of value. It is the supremacy of single-hearted devotion to Christ that he holds out as an ideal, and his view is that in some cases marriage endangers this. Again, marriage is not to him simply a preventive against uncleanness (see art. SOBERNESS). It is also the object of sanctification, and its relations have their own honour (1 Th 4<sup>4</sup>; see MARRIAGE, VIRGINITY). He uses it as an illustration of the highest relationship; he opposes those who prohibit it (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>) owing to a false asceticism. It is true he does not there give reasons, as he does in the case of abstinence from food, because the same principle applies to both cases. While, then, we may admit that on this question his view was narrow, we may say with Sabatier (The Apostle Paul, Eng. tr., 1891, p. 164) that 'this narrowness, for which he has been so greatly blamed, does not arise from a dualistic asceticism. There is no dualism to be found in Paul's doctrine.'

4. World-flight is not encouraged in the NT. Slaves even are warned to abide in their situations, knowing that they are God's freemen (see art. ABUSE). The necessity of labour is unfolded in the Thessalonian Epistles, against the practice of those who had given up work 'under eschatological influences. World-flight is not conquering the world, but rather giving up the idea of conquering it, abandoning the battlefield, and, as such, is contrary to the apostolic view. St. Paul did not, it is true, expatiate after the manner of modern moralists on the dignity of labour,† but he did insist on 'the divineness of those obligations and ties which constitute man's social life. . . . The institutions of society—'marriage, the state, the rights of possession—are of Divine appointment, and must be upheld and honoured, however short the time before the order to which they belong shall pass away forever' (Stevens, Theol. of NT, 1899, p. 454).

II. ASCETIC PRINCIPLES.—Abstinence is wider than fasting or outward observances; it implies principles by which these external actions are determined, and it keeps in view also the inner reality of which they are the expression. It includes character as well as conduct. Indeed, it is this inward reality which is mainly of value in the Christian ideal of abstinence.

1. The verb ἀσκειν occurs only once in the NT (Ac 24<sup>16</sup>), in this sense of a life whose activities are explained, in the way both of omission and commission, by an inner principle. St. Paul was accused of deliberately offending Jewish legal sus-

* Harnack (on Did. xi. 8) thinks Eph 5<sup>32</sup> recommends celibacy as a higher life for the Christian. See, however, Schaff, The Oldest Church Manual, 1885, p. 202.

† See Harnack's What is Christianity? (Eng. tr., 1904, p. 123 ff.) for remarks qualifying the idea underlying the phrase, 'the dignity of labour.'

* The 'water-folk' found in the Eastern Church in the 3rd cent. (who objected to wine at the Lord's Supper), cannot appeal to NT principles for a justification of their actions.

ceptibilities. He denies the charge. While he adheres to the heresy of 'the Way,' he does so without intentionally coming into collision with the customs or prejudices of others. Not only so, but his plan is a studied attempt to conform to all customs of Jew and Gentile, of 'weak' and 'strong,' consistently with his faithfulness to God and his being under law to Christ. This is his δοκίμιος for the gospel's sake (1 Co 9<sup>19-22</sup>). His whole life is an illustration of this. He yielded to Jewish susceptibilities (Ac 16<sup>3</sup> 18<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>26</sup>), and bore with Gentile immaturity (1 Th 2<sup>12</sup>). This conduct was not due to fickleness or guile (1 Co 2<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>), but to love (2 Co 5<sup>13</sup>), and it was done in simplicity and godly sincerity of conscience (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, Ac 24<sup>16</sup>). It was different from the loveless superior liberty of Corinthian liberalism, and from the servile man-pleasing of weak Judaism (Gal 1. 2). It was, in short, a reproduction of that κένωσις of self (so different from selfish human acquisitiveness) which was the great feature of the life of Christ (Ph 2<sup>8</sup>).

To St. Paul this involved very real asceticism. In striking language he figures himself as in the course of his Christian race undergoing privations, abstinences, and self-discipline as great as any runner for the Isthmian prize or as any pugilist. It is not simply that this asceticism involved abstinence from sin—Christianity demands that from all; it involved also the giving up of privileges and rights, and the denial to self of anything that would hinder his being sure of the prize or that would weaken others or cause them to stumble. It is a warning to Christian liberalism in Corinth not to degenerate into licence and so to fall. Christian asceticism is the remedy against this. We are not to infer that St. Paul practised bodily torture, that he went, as it were, out of his way to invent austerities, self-imposed fastings, or flagellations. What he refers to here is the effect on his whole life of his absorbing passion for men's salvation. That was the expulsive power which made him an ascetic in this sense, which made him abnegate his rights of maintenance at Thessalonica and Corinth, which made him work at night though preaching through the day, which overcame his bodily weaknesses, which brought him into dangers by land and sea without being deterred by the fear of pain or privation.

Nor was this δοκίμιος of his a superior form of life which was binding only on a few choice souls. St. Paul has no double morality. No one can empty himself too much for Christ or endure too much for Him. In this way must we explain the manifold passages where the Christian life is compared to a race, to an athletic contest, to military life and warfare. Just as these involve abstinence, so also does Christianity. This asceticism is, however, not arbitrarily imposed or cunningly invented; it is the consequence of fidelity to Christ's cause. It arises out of the very nature of the Christian life. Its outward manifestation is accidental. What is essential is the presence of the self-denying spirit, which spends and is spent willingly out of love to Christ. It is a complete perversion to suppose that outward austerities can create this spirit. Outward hardships of any sort must be effects, not causes. This Christian asceticism is not due to any disparagement of the body or undervaluation of earthly relationships or a false view of matter. The asceticism born of these is at best only a σωματική γυμνασία* (1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup>), while Christian asceticism is one whose end is piety. The one is of little profit, the other of eternal worth. This gymnastic for holiness arises out of the providential disciplines furnished copiously by a strict adherence to the line of Christian duty. It is the κοπιᾶν καὶ ὀνειδίζεσθαι, the exhaustive labouring, and the abuse (or earnest conflict [ἀγωνίζεσθαι]) of the man who sets his hope on the living God (1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>).

2. What, then, are the principles that determine the nature and limits of Christian abstinence? We may learn these by considering the general word for 'abstinence' (ἀπεχεσθαι) in the NT (Ac 15<sup>20, 29</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>3</sup> 5-, 1 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>). These principles did not disengage themselves all at once in the Church's consciousness. The first real attempt at such a disengagement is found in the so-called Apostolic Decree (Ac 15). This was nothing more than a working compromise to ease the existing situation. Attempts have been made often and early to moralize it and so find in it a valid basis for Christian abstinence. Thus 'blood' was explained as 'homicide,' and 'things strangled' were omitted, as in Codex D; but such attempts are beside the point as surely as the attempts to Judaize the document completely by making 'fornication' mean 'marriage within the prohibited degrees.' For our purpose the Decree is valuable historically rather than morally. It is a land-mark in the liberating of Christianity from ceremonial Judaism, similar to the evangelizing of Samaria by Philip and his baptizing of the eunuch, or the dealing of St. Peter with Cornelius. It does not, however, supply a logical or lasting basis for abstinence. Such a basis is furnished by St. Paul (1 Th 4<sup>1-8</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>1-9</sup>, Gal 5<sup>18</sup> etc.; cf. 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>). The ground of Christian abstinence is found in the nature of the Christian life, which is a holy calling—a fellowship with the Holy One—whose animating principle is the Holy Spirit. The Christian man—body, soul, and spirit—is in union with Christ. Hence the very nature of the Christian life gives a positive principle of abstinence. Everything carnal is excluded. 'The carnal mind is enmity against God, it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be' (Ro 8<sup>7</sup>). This determines positively what is of necessity to be avoided, and lists of these sins are given in the NT (see above, Introduction). These are 'the works of the flesh.' At the very lowest foundation of the Christian life there must be personal purity. ἁγιασμός is wholly opposed to ἀκαθαρσία (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>).

Some have maintained that St. Paul tends to regard sanctification as mainly absence from sensual sin (Wernle, Beginnings of Christianity, Eng. tr., 1904, ii. 334), and others that he, possibly from his own bitter experience of this sin, emphasized this aspect of sanctification (A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, p. 264). But St. Paul's view of sanctification includes the whole personality. He was keenly alive to the 'inconceivable evil of sensuality,' although he himself had the charism of continence (1 Co 7<sup>7</sup>). The reason for his emphasis on personal purity is found in the immoral state of Grecian cities—'the bottomless sexual depravity of the heathen world' (Schaff, op. cit. p. 202)—and in the sensual bias of human nature. Christians had to learn this grace of purity (1 Th 4<sup>4</sup>).

The Christian life, then, is a positive life—a life that is being sanctified; and this includes all along a negative element, for Christianity does not deal with innocent men, but with sinners. Hence the crucifying of the flesh, with its affections and lusts, and the mortifying of the bodily members are just the negative side of advance in holiness.

It is sometimes held that at first St. Paul's teaching on this point was tinged with dualism, and that he tended to regard the body itself as essentially evil, and that it was only later on, when the full consequences of his early views were carried into effect, as in Colossians and the Pastorals, that he came to repudiate this dualistic asceticism (Baring Gould, A Study of St. Paul, 1897 [see Index, under 'Asceticism']), or it is maintained that his attitude towards the flesh changes—that at times he views it as something to be extirpated, while at other times and oftener 'his exhortations to his Christian readers have reference commonly not to the Christian's attitude towards his fleshly nature, but to his relation to Christ or the Divine Spirit within him' (McGiffert, Apostol. Age, p. 137f.). The truth is that the change was not in St. Paul's principle, but in the circumstances and conditions with which he happened to be at any time dealing, and that this opposition between a negative and a positive attitude is not a contradiction, but only exhibits the opposite sides of the one Christian principle of sanctification. Abstaining and retaining, pruning and growth, are not contradictory but complements. Even McGiffert, as we have seen, admits that 'there is very little asceticism, in the ordinary sense, in Paul's epistles, while there is much that makes in the opposite direction' (op. cit. p. 136). These distinctions, however, are largely irrelevant. To St. Paul the Christian life was a life of sanctification, and this included both aspects.

* This σωματική γυμνασία is not athletics in our sense; it is a bodily discipline dictated by a philosophico-religious view of the body—a dualistic view of things (cf. 1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup>).

This positive principle, then, of Christian abstinence is found in the very nature of the Christian life, which includes the affirmation of all the personality and its relationships as instruments of the spirit, and also the negation of the flesh and the world, or of personality and its relationships as alienated from the Spirit of God.

This principle, just because it contained these two moments, was apt to be misunderstood. Its twofold unity was apt to be disrupted, and we may well believe that the later Gnostic dualism and licentious libertinism may both have appealed to the authority of St. Paul. The Apostle, however, had a second principle of abstinence which helps us to correct this antagonism. He clearly distinguished between those things that in their very nature were hostile to the Christian life and those things that were indifferent. The neglect or abuse of this principle is apt to confuse the whole question of abstinence. The difficulty is intensified by the fact that in this region of the indifferent we are dealing with the application of a universal principle to changing conditions, so that, to use logical language, while the major premiss is the same, the minor premiss varies, and thus the right conclusion has to be discovered from the nature of the conditions with which we are for the moment dealing. Thus we find that the conditions at Rome and Corinth were not the conditions present in Colossians or the Pastorals, and accordingly St. Paul deals with each according to its merits. His general principle in regard to indifferent things is, 'All things are lawful.' This is universally applicable only inside this universe of discourse. It is not applicable to our relation to those things that by their very nature are inimical to the Christian life. To apply the principle to the latter sphere is to degenerate into libertinism such as St. John, St. Jude, and St. Peter had to face.

While St. Jude and St. Peter are content with combating this libertinism mainly by denunciation and exhortations to Christians, St. John applies St. Paul's positive principle of abstinence to refute it. He points out the inadmissibility of sin (1 Jn 2<sup>96</sup>). By this neither he nor St. Paul means perfectionism, nor yet are they speaking ideally of the Christian life. It is not true, as the Gnostics say, that the gold of Christianity is not injured by the mud of impurity (Irenæus, c. Hæc. i. 6. 2). Some so explained the saying ascribed to Nicholas (cf. Rev 2<sup>15</sup>), δὲν παραχρησθαι τῇ σαρκί ('the flesh must be abused'). According to Clem. Alex. (Strom.

ii. 20), 'abandoning themselves like goats to pleasure, as if insulting the body, they lead a life of self-indulgence.' It is this that St. John is confuting in these perfectionist passages, just as St. Paul confutes ascetic severity towards the body in Colossians, by pointing to the nature of the new life the Christian has in Christ.

This Christian principle of abstinence, then, 'All things are lawful,' does not apply to sin. It has further limitations. These are unfolded in 1 Cor. and Romans. The abstainers in both these cases were in the minority. They did not base their views on a material dualism. They were under the influence of an atmosphere rather than a system, and they were apt to be treated in a high-handed fashion. They were not endangering the very basis of Christianity as a free service of God, as the Galatians were. Hence they had to be defended rather than condemned. St. Paul says all he can in their favour, although he ranges himself in principle on the other side. He tells the advocates of liberty that love is superior to the Christian's freedom towards things indifferent, that it makes liberty look as much on the weakness of others as on its own strength. The interests of brotherly love and Christian unity make liberty impose restraints on itself. This restraint is a noble asceticism. 'The liberty of faith is found in the bondage of love' (Sabatier, Paul, p. 163). He warns the advocates of liberty also that they may apply this principle to matters that are essential and not indifferent. This warning was necessary, because idolatry was so identified with all social functions that it was difficult to escape it. Why not—to advert to the coming conditions—adore the image of the Emperor? Why not throw incense into the fire? Just because by so doing the first and major principle of Christian abstinence was destroyed, viz. that it was a holy life in fellowship with the risen Christ; and its second principle of freedom in things indifferent did not consequently apply.

Yet this second principle was distinctly valuable. It was a great step in advance to have it clearly enunciated. For the weak brother, as in Galatia, might become intolerant; he might become the victim of false views, which would look on the observance of indifferent rites as a necessary qualification of full salvation and Christian privilege. Then Christian liberty in its fullness must be maintained (Gal 5<sup>1</sup>). This liberty—rightly understood—contains in itself the real principle of abstinence from what is sinful. Nowhere have we fuller lists of the works of the flesh given than in the Galatian Epistle.

Or, again, as in Colossians and the Pastorals, a false asceticism might be present which regarded matter and body as evil, in which case both principles would be used to destroy such a view.

(a) In regard to indifferent matters like food and drink God has given freedom. The argument is the same as that used by Jesus when He purified all meats (Mk 7<sup>19</sup>). These minutiae of fasting are human inventions, not Divine commands; and to respect them casuistically is to blur the distinction between the essential and the indifferent. We get what God meant us to get from perishable meats when we joyfully use them with a thankful spirit towards God. They, like the bodily appetites which they satisfy, do not belong to the eternal world, but to the natural. Yet the natural world and its relations to us, our bodies and their requirements, are of God and can all be used to His glory. Our bodies, souls, and spirits are His. It is not by using severity towards the body or by abstaining from marriage or leaving our earthly callings that we can gain further sanctification. In fact, St. Paul says that this ἀφειδία σώματος—severity towards the body—is of little practical value (Col 2<sup>3</sup>). Its aim is to destroy the body, not to fit it for God's service. Logically carried to its issue, this false asceticism would not only enfeeble the soul by debasing the body, but would destroy the body and matter altogether. But God's ideal for the body is different (cf. Ph 3<sup>21</sup>), so that what is to be aimed at by the Christian is the destruction of the flesh (σάξ), not of the body as such (σῶμα).

But (b) the Apostle uses the primary principle of Christian abstinence to refute this dualistic asceticism. He shows that Christianity is not a matter of prohibitions, but of a renewed life—a walking in the Spirit. Asceticism at its best leaves the house empty. It is doubtful from history and physiology if it can even do that, but the new life in Christ has an expulsive power against sin and a constructive power of holiness.

These, then, are the principles that govern Christian abstinence: (1) The Christian life as a 'holy calling' demands abstinence from all sin. This prohibits not only sinful actions but sinful thoughts. This is what may be called essential abstinence. (2) Besides this, there may be abstinence in indifferent matters, but it rests with the individual conscience to determine when this is necessary for the furtherance of the new life in Christ. This sphere by its very nature is not subject to obligatory ecclesiastical rules, nor must such abstinence be made the basis of salvation or of a higher moral platform, nor must it be based on a false view of matter or of the human body or of human relationships.

See also artt. SELF-DENIAL and TEMPERANCE.

LITERATURE.—Consult the books referred to in the article and the various Commentaries. See also J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians<sup>8</sup>, 1879, p. 397 ff.; C. E. Luthardt, Christian Ethics before the Reformation, tr. Hastie, Edinburgh, 1839; O. Zöckler, Kritische Gesch. der Askese, Frankfurt am M., 1897; A. Harnack, History of Dogma, Eng. tr., 1894-99; H. J. Holtzmann, NT Theologie, Tübingen, 1911, bk. iv. ch. vii.; A. B. D. Alexander, The Ethics of St. Paul, Glasgow, 1910; A. Ritschl, Entstehung der altkathol. Kirche, Bonn, 1857, p. 173 ff.; E. Hatch, The Influence of Greek Ideas and Usages upon the Christian Church (Hibbert Lecture, 1888), London, 1890, Lecture vii. DONALD MACKENZIE.

ABUSE, ABUSERS.—The Latin abūtor means either (1) 'use badly,' 'misuse,' or (2) 'use to the full.' In this second sense Cicero uses the word of spending one's whole leisure time with a friend (see Lewis and Short, Latin Dict., s.v. 'Abūtor').

The Greek verb καταχραῖναι had both these meanings. Thus in Plato (Menæx. 247 A) it means 'use wrongly'; and Clem. Alex. Pæd. i. (p. 142, Potter) speaks of 'using fully every device of wisdom.' In older English the verb had both meanings. Cranmer's Bible has 'abuse' = 'use to the full' in Col 2<sup>2</sup>. In both 1 Co 7<sup>31</sup> and 9<sup>18</sup> καταχραῖναι means 'use to the full.' The RV translates it so in 9<sup>18</sup> and marginally so in 7<sup>31</sup>.

(a) 1 Co 7<sup>31</sup>.—The connexions (e.g. marriage), circumstances (e.g. sorrow and joy), and concerns (e.g. business and wealth) of life have in Christianity an emotional interest. Stoicism would expel these emotions and leave the soul empty. Christianity determines them eschatologically (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>29-31b</sup>). To avoid abuse of the world is to use it sub specie finis. Abuse here borders on our meaning of misuse (cf. French abuser—on abuse celui qui se laisse captiver; and Mark Pattison's note on Pope's Essay on Man, ii. 14); and that perhaps is why RV retains 'abuse.' Texts like this apply in their original freshness and strength to times of crisis (cf. Luther's hymn, 'Gut, Ehre, Kind, und Weib . . . lass fahren dahin'), when the dissolution of society seems imminent, but in essence they are applicable to all time, as human life is always uncertain. They do not, however, encourage aloofness from or slackness in social duties (cf. St. Paul's attitude towards the non-workers in Thessalonica, 2 Th 3<sup>10f.</sup>).

(b) 1 Co 9<sup>18</sup>.—One phase of St. Paul's accommodating conduct (συγκατάβασις) for the gospel's sake was the voluntary abridgment of his rights of maintenance by the Corinthians (1 Co 9<sup>7-14</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>8</sup>). This accommodation must be distinguished from men-pleasing (cf. Gal 1<sup>10</sup>). As the height of right may be the height of injury (summum ius summa iniuria), so conversely the abnegation of Christian rights for the gospel's sake enhances the power of both Evangelist and Evangel (cf. Mk 10<sup>29b</sup>).

Summary.—A lawful use of the world (1 Co 7<sup>31</sup>) or even of Christian rights (9<sup>18</sup>) becomes harmful when dissociated from eternal issues, or pursued without regard to others. The lower planes of life gain significance in subordination to the highest. Rights legally due may, if pressed without regard to love, become injurious.

(c) In 1 Co 6<sup>9</sup> and 1 Ti 1<sup>10</sup> ἀρσενοκοίται is translated 'abusers of themselves with mankind' (cf. Ro 1<sup>7</sup> written from Corinth). This unnatural vice is that known in Greek literature as παιδεραστία. In St. Paul's view sins of uncleanness were the inevitable Divine penalty of forgetfulness of God—a view strengthened by the association between uncleanness and the worship of Aphrodite in places like Corinth.

LITERATURE.—Grimm-Thayer, s.v. καταχράσθαι; HDB, vol. i. art. 'Abuse'; the Comm. on above passages, e.g. Edwards in EGT and Hand-Com.; cf. also C. J. Vaughan, Lessons of Life and Godliness, London, 1870, Sermon xix.; F. W. Robertson, Sermons, vol. iii. sermon xiv.; W. G. Blaikie, Present Day Tracts, no. 4, 'Christianity and the Life that now is.' On παιδεραστία consult W. A. Becker, Charikles, 3 vols., Berlin, 1877-78, vol. ii. p. 252 ff.

DONALD MACKENZIE.

ABYSS.—This is the RV rendering of the word ἀβυσσος which occurs in Lk 8<sup>31</sup>, Ro 10<sup>7</sup>, Rev 9<sup>1-2</sup>, 11<sup>7</sup>, 17<sup>8</sup>, 20<sup>1-3</sup>. In Lk. and Rom., AV translates 'deep'; in Rev., 'bottomless pit'—no distinction, however, being made between τὸ φρέαρ τῆς ἀβυσσος in 9<sup>1-2</sup> (RV 'the pit of the abyss') and ἡ ἀβυσσος simply in the remaining passages (RV 'the abyss'). ἀβυσσος (from a intens. and βυσσός, Ion. for βυθός, 'the depth') occurs in classical Greek as an adj. meaning 'bottomless,' but in biblical and ecclesiastical Greek almost invariably as a substantive denoting 'the bottomless place,' 'the abyss.' The word is found frequently in the LXX, usually as a rendering of the Heb. tehom, and primarily denotes the water-deeps which at first covered the earth (Gn 1<sup>2</sup>, Ps 103 (104)<sup>6</sup>) and were conceived of as shut up afterwards in subterranean storehouses (32 (33)<sup>7</sup>). In Job 38<sup>16</sup>, the abyss in the sense of the depths of the sea is used as a parallel to Hades; and in 41<sup>23</sup> (LXX) the sea-monster regards the Tartarus of the abyss as his captive. In Ps 70 (71)<sup>4</sup> 'the abyss' is applied to the depths of the earth, and is here evidently a figurative equivalent for Sheol, though it is nowhere used in the LXX to render the Heb. word. In the later Jewish eschatology, where Sheol has passed from its OT meaning of a shadowy under world in which there are no recognized distinctions between the good and the bad, the wicked and the weary (cf. Job 3<sup>17</sup>, Ec 9<sup>5</sup>), and has become a sphere of definite moral retribution, the conception of the abyss has also undergone a moral transformation. The Ethiopian Book of Enoch is especially suggestive for the development of the eschatological conceptions that appear in pre-Christian Judaism; and in the earliest part of that book the fallen angels and demons are represented as cast after the final judgment into a gulf (χάος) of fire (10<sup>13, 14</sup>), while in 21<sup>7</sup> the chasm (διακοπή) filled with fire (cf. τὸ φρέαρ in Rev 9<sup>1-2</sup>) is described as bordered by the abyss. Apparently the abyss was conceived of as the proper home of the devil and his angels, in the centre of which was a lake of fire reserved as the place of their final punishment.

The previous history of the word explains its use in the NT. In Ro 10<sup>1</sup>, where he is referring to Dt 30<sup>13</sup>, St. Paul uses it simply as the abode of the dead, Sheol or Hades—a sense equivalent to that of Ps 70 (71)<sup>10</sup>. In Lk 8<sup>31</sup> the penal aspect of the abyss comes clearly into view; it is a place of confinement for demons. In Rev. we are in the midst of the visions and images of apocalyptic eschatology. In 9<sup>1-2</sup> 'the pit of the abyss' sends forth a smoke like the smoke of a great furnace. The abyss has an angel of its own whose name is Abaddon (q.v.) or Apollyon (v.11). From it 'the beast' issues (11<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>8</sup>), and into it 'the old serpent which is the Devil and Satan' is cast for a thousand years (20<sup>1-3</sup>).

LITERATURE.—The Commentaries and Bible Dictionaries; art. 'Abyss' in ERE. J. C. LAMBERT.

ACCEPTANCE.—The noun itself is not found in the AV of the NT, though we come very near it in 'acceptation' (ἀποδοχή), 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>. Instances of the verb and adjective are frequent, and are mostly equivalents of δεχόμεαι and its derivatives, as the following list shows: δέχομαι, 2 Co 6<sup>1</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>; δεκτός, Ph 4<sup>18</sup>; ἀποδεκτός, 1 Ti 2<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>; προσδέχομαι, He 11<sup>35</sup>. εὐπρόσδεκτος, Ro 15<sup>16</sup> 31, 2 Co 6<sup>2</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5</sup>. We also find λαμβάνω, Gal 2<sup>6</sup>; εὐαρεστος, * Ro 12<sup>1-14</sup> 18, 2 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, Eph 5<sup>10</sup>, Ph 4<sup>18</sup>, Col 3<sup>0</sup>, Tit 2<sup>9</sup>, He 13<sup>21</sup>, and εὐαρέστω. * He 12<sup>3</sup>; χάρις, 1 P 2<sup>0</sup>; and χαριζώ, Eph 1<sup>6</sup>. It should be noticed that in the RV the adjective 'well-pleasing' often takes the place of the AV 'acceptable'; and that in Eph 1<sup>6</sup> the familiar expression '(his grace) wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved' gives place to the more correct 'which he freely bestowed upon us,' etc. See the commentaries of Westcott and Armitage Robinson, in loc.

2 Co 8<sup>17</sup> (Titus 'accepted the exhortation') and He 11<sup>35</sup> ('not accepting deliverance') do not call for comment. With 2 Co 11<sup>4</sup> on the non-acceptance of another gospel than that of Paul, compare 1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup> and 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>; see also for the 'accepted time' (the day of opportunity for accepting the Divine message) 2 Co 6<sup>1-2</sup> (cf. Lk 4<sup>19</sup>). In Ro 15<sup>31</sup> St. Paul hopes that the collection for the Jerusalem poor may be acceptable to the saints; and, referring to the same project in 2 Co 8<sup>12</sup>, lays down the principle that contributions are acceptable in proportion to the willingness with which they are given.

We are now left with the passages which speak of God's acceptance of man. Christians are 'children of light,' are to 'prove what is acceptable (or well-pleasing) to the Lord' (Eph 5<sup>10</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>0</sup>), to test and discern the Lord's will (Ro 12<sup>2</sup>). They are 'to make it their aim,' whether living or dying, 'to be well-pleasing to him' (2 Co 5<sup>9</sup>).

What then are the principles and practices that ensure this happy consummation? We may first notice the familiar negative proposition set forth in Gal 2<sup>6</sup> and Ac 10<sup>34</sup> 'God accepteth no man's person' (i.e. the mere outward state and presence); and over against it the comprehensive declaration of Ac 10<sup>35</sup> 'In every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is acceptable to him.' This furnishes a starting-point for a detailed enumeration of the courses which are 'well-pleasing' to God, and which may be set forth as follows: the offering of our bodies as a living sacrifice (Ro 12<sup>1</sup>); the serving of Christ by not putting stumbling-blocks before weaker brethren (14<sup>18</sup>); missionary work—the 'offering up' of the Gentiles (15<sup>16</sup>); the gift of the Philippian Church to St. Paul in prison

(Ph 4<sup>18</sup>; cf. Mt 25<sup>31-46</sup>); filial affection to a widowed mother (1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup>); supplication and intercession for all men (1 Ti 2<sup>3</sup>); undeserved suffering patiently endured (1 P 2<sup>20</sup>). All these may be looked upon as examples of the 'spiritual sacrifices' (1 P 2<sup>5</sup>), the offering of 'service with reverence and awe' (He 12<sup>28</sup>; cf. 13<sup>16</sup>), which are 'acceptable' to God. He it is who 'works in us that which is well-pleasing in his sight through Jesus Christ' (He 13<sup>1</sup>).

It is interesting and instructive to compare the grounds of 'acceptance' in the circle of OT thought with those in the NT. In the former these grounds are partly ceremonial (Lv 22<sup>0</sup>), and partly ethical (Is 1<sup>1-12</sup>, Jer 6<sup>0</sup> etc.), though here and there a higher note is struck (cf. Pr 21<sup>3</sup>, Mic 6<sup>8</sup>, Dt 10<sup>4</sup>); in the latter the ceremonial association has entirely vanished except in a metaphorical sense, and become purely ethico-spiritual, as the above references prove. It was largely due to the prophets that the old ceremonial ground was gradually ethicized; and, though it never died out under the earlier 'dispensation' (which, indeed, reached its most rigid and mechanical development in the degenerate Pharisaic cult of N<sup>1</sup> times), the way was effectually prepared for the full proclamation of the spiritual message of the gospel by Jesus, who was Himself the perfect embodiment of all that was acceptable and well-pleasing to God (cf. Mk 1<sup>1</sup>, Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, Jn 8<sup>29</sup> etc.).

There is a theological problem of importance raised by these passages—What is it that constitutes the ground of our acceptance with God? The full treatment of this problem must be sought under the art. JUSTIFICATION, but the following considerations may be properly adduced here. Unquestionably the Christian religion is a religion of Grace, as contra-distinguished from Judaism and other faiths, which are religions of Law. Salvation, according to the NT throughout (explicitly in the writings of St. Paul, more or less implicitly elsewhere), is of God, and not of man; not our own doings, but willingness to accept what He has done for us, and what He is ready to do in us, is the condition of initial inclusion within the Kingdom of Divine love and life. This is the watershed which determines the direction and flow of all subsequent doctrinal developments in Christian theology; it is what settles the question whether our thoughts and practice are distinctively Christian or not. There are, however, two alternative perils to be carefully avoided—antinomianism, on the one hand, which assumes our continued acceptance with God irrespective of our moral conduct afterwards; and the doctrine of salvation by works, on the other, which makes moral conduct the condition of acceptance, thus surreptitiously introducing the legal view of religion once more. This 'Either—Or' is, however, a false antithesis, from which we are saved by the recognition of the 'mystical union' of the believer with God in Christ. By that act of faith, in virtue of which the sinner 'accepts' Christ and appropriates all that He is and has done, he passes from a state of condemnation into a state of grace (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>), and is henceforth 'in Christ'—organically united to Him as the member is to the body (1 Co 12<sup>1-4</sup>), as the branch is to the vine (Jn 15<sup>1-4</sup>). This 'justifying faith' is, however, not an isolated act; it is an act that brings us into a permanent relation with the source of spiritual life. Now, 'good works' in the Christian sense are a necessary proof and outcome of this relation, and as such are well-pleasing or 'acceptable' to God, because (a) they are a manifestation of the spirit of Christ in us (Gal 2<sup>0</sup>; cf. v.<sup>1</sup>); and (b) a demonstration of the continuance of the believer 'in Christ' (Jn 15<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 5<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>10</sup>). The relation of the believer to Christ, in other words, while it is religious in its root, is ethical in its fruit, and the quality and abundance of the latter naturally show the quality and potency of the faith-life of which it is the expression and outcome. Thus our 'works' do not constitute our claim for acceptance with God after entering the Kingdom of Grace any more than before; but they determine our place within the Kingdom. There is an aristocracy of the spiritual as well as of the natural life; the saved are one in the fact of salvation, but not in the magnitude of their attainments or the quality of their influence; and they are more or less acceptable to God according to the entireness of their consecration and the value of their service. There is thus an adequate motive presented to us for perpetual striving after perfection, and St. Paul's spiritual attitude—'not as though I had already attained, but I follow after' (Ph 3<sup>1-2</sup>)—is the normal attitude of every true believer (cf. Col 1<sup>10-11</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>1-3</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>22</sup>). It was given only to One to be altogether well-pleasing to God; but it is the unfading ideal, and the constant endeavour of His true disciples to follow in His steps, and in all things to become more and more like Him, as well as 'well-pleasing' to Him.

* On the use of these words in inscriptions see A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, 214f. The use of ἀρετός, 'pleasing,' and the verb ἀρεσκω in the NT should also be noted.

See, further, artt. JUSTIFICATION, etc., and Literature there specified. E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

ACCESS.—This word in the Epistles of the NT is the translation of the Greek word προσαγωγή (Ro 5, Eph 2<sup>18</sup> 3<sup>1-2</sup>; cf. 1 P 3<sup>18</sup>, where the verb is used actively). It has been treated very thoroughly in DCG (s.v.). Here we shall confine ourselves to—

1. The connotation of the word.—In classical Greek, the term προσαγωγέως was used primarily for 'one who brings to,' 'introduces to another as an intermediary,' mainly in a derogatory sense (cf. προσαγωγέως λημμάτων, one who hunts for another's benefit—a jackal [Dem. 750. 21; cf. Aristid. ii. 369, 395]; the spies of the Sicilian kings were called προσαγωγείς, 'tale-bearers' [Plut. ii. 522 D]). It was, however, used later in a technical sense, the court προσαγωγέως being a functionary whose business it was to bring visitors or suppliants into the king's presence. προσαγωγή came thus to mean access to the royal presence and favour. It is from this association of ideas that the word derives its religious connotation in the NT. God is conceived in the kingly relation (as frequently in the OT), as one whose favour is sought and found, and Christ as the προσαγωγέως who introduces the sinner into the Divine presence. It is thus a form of words representing Him in the light of a Mediator between God and man; and it throws light on the relation of the three parties in the transaction.

2. The light thrown on the character and attitude of God towards man.—The kingly concept represents God as supreme, one to whom all allegiance is due, and who has the power of life and death over all His subjects. In the OT, Jahweh, especially in the Psalms, is often represented as the King of His people Israel (cf. Ps 10<sup>16</sup> 24<sup>8-10</sup> 44<sup>4</sup> 47<sup>2</sup> 68<sup>24</sup> etc.). It is noticeable, however, that in most of these passages the Oriental awe in which all potentates were habitually held is suffused with a sense of joy and pride in God as Israel's King; His power, favour, and victorious character are mainly dwelt on. The idea which lies behind the NT references, however, is rather that of the difficulty of approach to the King's presence, not merely on account of His loftiness and majesty, but of His alienation, which demands a process of reconciliation. It suggests that the normal relation of the King and His subjects has been disturbed by rebellion or wrong-doing. The Divine dignity has been outraged, and His claim to obedience set at defiance. There is thus no longer a right of admittance to the Divine presence, unless the wrong is righted and the lost favour restored; and, till that has been secured, the protection and kindly attitude of God can no longer be relied on.

3. The light thrown on the condition and attitude of man towards God.—The suggestion is that man is conscious of being alienated from God by sin; that he has no confidence in approaching God in consequence, being uncertain of his reception; that he knows of nothing which he can do to restore the lost relation; and that he is deeply sensible of the shame and peril of his condition. The conception of the effects of evil-doing as separating God and man is one that runs through the priestly ritual of Judaism (cf. also the prophetic declaration in Is 59<sup>2</sup> 'your iniquities have separated between you and your God'), and corresponds to a fact in the consciousness of all awakened sinners. In the earlier experience of . . . Paul this feeling was evidently poignantly emphasized; and the sense of deliverance that came to him through the gospel may be taken as the measure of the pain and sorrow from which he had been delivered.

4. The function fulfilled by Christ as the One through whom the renewal of the lost relation between God and man was accomplished.—The word προσαγωγή is insufficient to represent this function. In itself it stands for the work of a functionary whose role is to act as a merely official link between the two parties, having no active part in the process of reconciliation, and having therefore no claim to the gratitude of the beneficiary in the process. On the other hand, the apostolic use of the word in its reference to the person and work of Christ includes the suggestion that the 'access' to God referred to has been accomplished by Christ Himself, and an overwhelming sense of gratitude is awakened by this fact. This appears in the four passages in which the word is used, especially in the last (1 P 3<sup>18</sup>). According to this, the bringing of man to God is effected through the work of Christ in His Passion; 'because Christ also suffered for sins once (απαξ, meaning here 'once for all'—a fact accomplished), the righteous for the unrighteous, that He might bring us (προσαγάγῃ) to God,' i.e. restore us to His favour, and lead us to the benefits of the Divine reconciliation. In Ro 5, again, the 'access' receives its meaning and privilege through its consummation in and by Christ, 'through whom we have also (καί, 'copulat et auget' [Toletus], 'answering almost to our "as might be expected"' [Alford]) got (εσχήκαμεν) our (την) access (introduction) by our (τῆς) faith, into this grace wherein we stand' (see DCG i. 13<sup>a</sup>). Here the Person of the προσαγωγέως is chiefly thought of ('this has come to us through Him'); and the resulting benefit is urged as a reason for holy exultation, since it means justification as a ground for 'rejoicing in the hope of glory.' In Eph 2<sup>18</sup> a slightly different emphasis is suggested: 'for through Him we both (i.e. Jew and Gentile) have our access in one spirit unto the Father.' Here that revelation of God, not as universal King but as the All-Father, which came through Jesus Christ, is included in the benefit secured by Him for mankind at large, and the reconciliation of humanity at variance with itself as well as with God is brought into the circle of mediation (cf. v. 14 'for he is our peace [i.e. He is the peace-maker, the προσαγωγέως between us, Jew and Gentile, who were once far off from each other] who hath made both one' by His blood [v. 13]). Through this word we are thus led into the deep places of the gospel as the reconciling agency of God to man, man to God, and man to man.

LITERATURE.—To the literature in the DCG add John Foster, Lectures, 1853, ii. 69; R. W. Dale, The Jewish Temple and the Christian Church, 1877, p. 205; A. J. Gordon, The Twofold Life, 1886, p. 175; W. M. Macgregor, Jesus Christ the Son of God, 1907, p. 175.

E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

ACCOUNT.—It will be sufficient merely to mention the use of the verb 'account' (λογίζομαι) in the sense of 'reckon,' 'deem,' 'consider' (Ro 8<sup>36</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>1</sup>, He 11<sup>19</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>15</sup>). Simple uses of the noun are found in Ac 19<sup>10</sup>, when the 'town-clerk' (q.v.) of Ephesus warns his fellow-citizens of the difficulty of giving 'account' (λόγος) of this concourse'; and in Ph 4<sup>17</sup> 'the fruit that increaseth to your account.' The only significant passages where the word is found are those dealing with the Judgment.

The declaration in Ro 14<sup>12</sup>, 'Each one of us shall give account of himself to God,' must be studied in the light of the paragraph (vv. 7-12) of which it is the conclusion. Those who are themselves liable to judgment must not set themselves up as judges of one another, either to make light of sincere scruples or to reprove laxity. For one man to judge another is to usurp the prerogative of God, to whom alone (as universal sovereign and object of worship) man is answerable. The passage should be compared with 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, where the 'judgment-seat' is called Christ's; see also 1 Co 4<sup>5</sup>. St. Paul applies this doctrine, which is found in the Synoptic Gospels and was an integral part of primitive Christian teaching, to Jew and Gentile, to himself and his converts, to those who have died before the Parousia and those who are alive at it. The life in the body provides the opportunity for moral action, and by the use they have made of it men are sentenced (cf. Gal 6<sup>8</sup>). A. Menzies (Com. on 2 Cor.) calls attention (a) to this aspect of the Judgment in contrast with that which represents the saints as judging the world and angels (1 Co 6-4; cf. Mt 19-8); (b) to the inconsistency between the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and the doctrine of final judgment of men according to their actions. There is, however, in the present writer's opinion, no inconsistency here. The NT generally represents the saved as judged as well as the unsaved. The judgment of the latter, however, is retributory and involves rejection; that of the former is for a place, higher or lower, within the heavenly Kingdom; and this place is in accordance with the faithfulness and quality of their service while in the body. St. Paul, as the above references prove, is emphatic as to the fact and nature of this judgment (cf. 1 Co 3<sup>12-15</sup>), and shows that, however true it is that salvation is by grace, there will be gradations in standing and in reward in the after-life. This is in harmony with the teaching of our Lord in the Synoptics, especially in the parables of service and reward (Lk 19<sup>18-20</sup> etc.; cf. Mk 10<sup>40</sup>). Cf. also, as to the fact of the saints having to give an account of their earthly stewardship, He 13<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>5</sup>: '[evildoers and slanderers of Christians] shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead' (in 1<sup>17</sup> to the Father, in 1<sup>18</sup> and 5<sup>4</sup> to Christ). These may be regarded as special instances of the General Judgment already referred to. The expression ἀποδοῖναι λόγον generally implies that defence is not easy.

LITERATURE.—See lit. on art. JUDGMENT; the Comm. in locc.; W. N. Clarke, An Outline of Christian Theol., 1898, p. 459 ff.

E. GRIFFITH-JONES.

ACCURSED.—See ANATHEMA.

ACCUSATION.—See TRIAL-AT-LAW.

ACELDAMA.—See AKELDAMA.

ACHAIA.—Achaia (Ἀχαΐα) was, in the classical period, merely a strip of fertile coast-land stretching along the south of the Gulf of Corinth, from the river Larissus, which separated it from Elis, to the Sythas, which divided it from Sicyonia, while the higher mountains of Arcadia bounded it on the south. Its whole length was about 65 miles, its breadth from 12 to 20 miles, and its area about 650 sq. miles.

The Achæans were probably the remnant of a Pelasgian race once distributed over the whole Peloponnesus. Though they were celebrated in the heroic age, they rarely figured in the great Hellenic period, keeping themselves as far as possible aloof from the conflicts between the Ionian and Doric States, happy in their own almost uninterrupted prosperity. It is not till the last struggle for Hellenic independence that they appear on the stage of history.

The cities which formed the famous Achæan League became the most powerful political body in Greece; and, when the Romans subdued the country (146 B.C.), they at once honoured the brave confederation and spared the feelings of all the Hellenes by calling the new province not Greece but Achaia. As constituted by Augustus in 27 B.C., the province included Thessaly, Ætolia, Acharnania, and part of Epirus (Strabo, XVII. iii. 25), being thus almost co-extensive with the modern kingdom of Greece. As a senatorial province Achaia was governed by a proconsul, who was an ex-prætor. In A.D. 15 Tiberius took it from the Senate, adding it to Macedonia to form an Imperial province under the government of a legatus; but in 44 Claudius restored it to the Senate. 'Proconsul' (ἀρχὴντρος, Ac 18<sup>12</sup>) was therefore the governor's correct official title at the time of St. Paul's residence in Corinth. Nero, as 'a born Philhellene,' wished to make Greece absolutely free.

'In gratitude for the recognition which his artistic contributions had met with in the native land of the Muses . . . [he] declared the Greeks collectively to be rid of Roman government, free from tribute, and, like the Italians, subject to no governor. At once there arose throughout Greece movements, which would have been civil wars, if these people could have achieved anything more than brawling; and after a few months Vespasian re-established the provincial constitution, so far as it went, with the dry remark that the Greeks had unlearned the art of being free' (Mommson, Provinces, i. 262).

To the end of the empire Achaia remained a senatorial province. The administrative centre was Corinth (q.v.), where the governor had his official residence. During a prolonged mission in that city, St. Paul was brought into contact with the proconsul Gallio (q.v.), the brother of Seneca. The rapid progress of the gospel in Achaia is partly explained by the fact that Judaism had already for centuries been working as a leaven in many of the cities of Greece. Sparta and Sicyon are named among the numerous free States to which the Romans sent letters on behalf of the Jews about 139 B.C. (1 Mac 15-3), and Philo's Legatio ad Gaium (§ 36) testifies to the presence of Jews in Bœotia, Ætolia, Attica, Argos, and Corinth. Only three Achæan cities are mentioned in the NT—Athens, Corinth, and Cenchreæ—but the address of 2 Cor. to 'all the saints who are in the whole of Achaia,' and the liberality of 'the regions of Achaia' (2 Co 9<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>10</sup>), prove that there must have been many other unnamed centres of Christian faith and life in the province. While 1 Co 16<sup>15</sup> refers to the house of Stephanas as 'the firstfruits of Achaia,' Ac 17<sup>34</sup> rather indicates that the Apostle's brief visit to Athens had already borne some fruit, 'Dionysius, Damaris, and others with them' being Achæan believers. Athens (q.v.) was either reckoned by itself or else entirely overlooked.

LITERATURE.—The Histories of Polybius and Livy; A. Holm, History of Greece, Eng. tr. London, 1894-98, vol. iv.; T. Mommsen, The Provinces of the Roman Empire, Eng. tr., London, 1919, i. 260 ff.; J. Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverwaltung, new ed., Leipzig, 1885, i. 321 f.; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr. i. (London, 1897) p. 303 ff.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 256 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ACHAICUS.—One of many worthies whose character adorned the early Church, and whose service edified it, but whom we know only by a casual reference in the NT. In 1 Co 16<sup>17</sup> St. Paul rejoices 'at the coming of Stephanas and Fortunatus and Achaicus.' Probably they formed a deputation from the Corinthian Church; they may have been bearers of the letter of inquiry which St. Paul answers in ch. 7 ff. His language suggests that their coming somewhat reassured him after the disquieting news brought by Chloe's household, and other ugly rumours (1 Co 5<sup>1</sup>). Perhaps they represented the parties in Corinth; yet they must have been trusted by the Church and must also have shown themselves loyal to the Apostle. Achaicus is such a rare name that some authorities call it 'Greek,' others 'Roman.' The suggestion that Achaicus was a slave—either of Stephanas or of Chloe—does not comport either with his position as a delegate or with St. Paul's appeal to the Church to 'acknowledge such,' i.e. to recognize the quality of their service and to treat them with becoming deference.

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB on 'Achaicus,' and 'I. Corinthians,' i. 487<sup>a</sup>; Comm. on 1 Cor. by Findlay (EGT), 950, and by Godet, ii. 467; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> [London, 1897] pp. 113, 305, 319, ii. [do. 1895] p. 320; Expositor, 8th ser. i. [1911] 341 f. J. E. ROBERTS.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.—

I. Text—

1. Greek MSS.
2. The Latin Versions.
3. The Syriac Versions.
4. The Egyptian Versions.
5. Secondary Versions.
6. Early Quotations.
7. Textual theories: Westcott and Hort, Rendel Harris, Chase, Blass, von Soden.

II. Tradition as to authorship—

1. In favour of Lucan authorship.
2. Against the tradition.

III. The date of Acts and reception in the Canon—

1. The date of the Lucan Gospel.
2. The abrupt termination of Acts.
3. Knowledge of Josephus in Acts.
4. Reception in the Canon.

IV. The composition of Acts—

1. The obvious facts.
2. The purpose of the whole narrative.
3. The sources used in Acts.
  - (1) The we-clauses.
  - (2) The earlier chapters.
  - (a) The Antiochene tradition.
  - (b) The Jerusalem tradition.

V. Historical value of the various traditions—

1. The Gospel of Luke and Ac 1.
2. The Jerusalem and Galilean traditions.

VI. Chronology of Acts—

1. The death of Herod Agrippa.
2. The famine in Judæa.
3. Gallio's proconsulate.
4. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome.
5. The arrival of Festus in Judæa.

VII. The theology of Acts—

1. Christology.
2. Eschatology.
3. The OT and Jewish Law.
4. The Spirit.
5. Baptism.

I. TEXT.—The text of the Acts is preserved in Greek MSS, in Latin, Syriac, Sahidic, Bohairic, Armenian, and other secondary Versions, and quoted extensively, though not nearly so fully as the Gospels, by the early Fathers.

1. Greek MSS.—The most complete study of the whole mass of Greek MSS is that of von Soden in his Schriften des Neuen Testaments (Berlin, 1902-10). As his grouping of the MSS is almost entirely independent of his theories as to the early history of the text, and represents facts which cannot be overlooked, it is best to give the main outlines of his classification, dividing the MSS into H, K, and I recensions, and following his numeration; in the brackets are given the numbers of these MSS in Gregory's Prolegomena to Tischendorf's Editio Major octava. It has not seemed necessary to give also Gregory's new numeration, as this is not any better known than von Soden's, and does not belong (and apparently will not belong in the immediate future) to a full critical edition.

(1) H.—This is represented by 81 (B), 82 (N), 83 (C), 84 (A), 86 (ψ), 848 (13), 74 (389), 1008 (Pap. Amh. S. sæc. v.-vi.), 103 (25), 102 (61), 257 (33). Of these MSS 81 and 82 represent a common archetype 81-2, which is much the best authority for H. 81 is better than 82, which is, however, somewhat better in Acts, apart from scribal errors, than it is in the Gospels. 74 and 102 are specially good representatives of H, but no single witness is free from K or I contamination. There is a special nexus between 848 and 257, but 848 is considerably the better of the two.

(2) K.—It is impossible to give here the full list of K MSS; roughly speaking, 90 per cent of the later MSS belong to this type. Two groups may be distinguished from the purer K MSS:—Kr, a mediaeval revision of K for lectionary purposes, critically quite valueless; and Kc, a text with enough sporadic I readings to raise the question whether it be not an I text which has been almost wholly corrected to a K standard; it is called Kc because MSS of this type seem to be represented in the Complutensian edition.

(3) I.—The I recension is found in three forms: I<sup>a</sup> I<sup>b</sup> I<sup>c</sup>. I<sup>a</sup> is best represented by 85 (D=Codex Bezae*), 1001 (E=Codex Laudianus f); by three pairs of connected MSS, 7 (Apl. 261)-204 (233), 200 (83)-332 (231), 70 (505)-101 (40); and by a few other MSS which have suffered more or less severely from K contamination. It is also well represented in the text of the commentary of Andreas (A<sup>TP</sup>). I<sup>b</sup> is found in two branches, I<sup>b1</sup> and I<sup>b2</sup>. The best representatives of I<sup>b1</sup> are 62 (498), 6602 (200), 365 (214=a<sup>scr</sup>) and a few other minuscules; the best representatives of I<sup>b2</sup> are the pair 78 ('von der Goltz's MS') and 171 (7) which are almost doublets, and 157 (29). I<sup>c</sup> is also found in two branches I<sup>c1</sup> and I<sup>c2</sup>. The best representatives of I<sup>c1</sup> are 208 (307), 370 (353), 116 (-), 551 (216); the best representatives of I<sup>c2</sup> are 564 (137)† and a series of other MSS contaminated in varying degrees by K.

2. The Latin Versions.—The Old Latin or ante-Hieronymian text is not well represented. As in the Gospels, it may be divided into two main branches, African and European.

(1) The African is represented by Codex Floriacensis (h), now at Paris, formerly at Fleury, containing a text which is almost identical with that of Cyprian; it is in a very fragmentary condition, but fortunately the quotations of Cyprian and Augustine (who uses an African text in Acts, though he follows the Vulgate in the Gospels) enable much of the text to be reconstructed. (The best edition of h is by E. S. Buchanan, Old Latin Biblical Texts, v. [Oxford, 1907].) According to Wordsworth and White, a later form of the African text can be found in the pseudo-Augustinian de Divinis Scripturis sive Speculum (CSEL xii. 287-700), but the character of this text is still somewhat doubtful.

(2) The European text is best represented by g (Gigas) at Stockholm, which can be supplemented and corrected by the quotations in Ambrosiaster and Lucifer of Cagliari (see esp. A. Souter, 'A Study of Ambrosiaster,' TS vii. 4 [1905]). A branch of the European text of a Spanish or Provençal type is found in p, a Paris MS from Perpignan, and in w, a Bohemian MS now in Wernigerode, but in both MSS there is much Vulgate contamination. Other primarily European mixed MSS are s, a Bobbio palimpsest (sac. v.-vi.) at Vienna, x in Oxford, and g<sub>2</sub> in Milan.

A Spanish lectionary of perhaps the 7th cent. known as the Liber Comicus, which has many early readings, has been edited by G. Morin from a Paris MS of the 11th cent. and is quoted by Wordsworth and White as t.

(3) Besides these purely Latin MSS, we have the Latin sides of the Græco-Latin MS 85 (D) or d (Codex Bezae), and of the Latino-Greek MS 1001 (E) or e. The latter of these agrees in the main with the European text as established by g-Ambrosiaster-Lucifer, but the text of d is in many ways unique, and may possibly have been made for the private use of the owner of 85, or perhaps of the archetype of 85.

(4) The Vulgate.—It is impossible here to enumerate the hundreds of Vulgate MSS of the Acts. Their study is a special branch of investigation, which has little bearing on the Acts, and for all purposes, except that of tracing the history of the Vulgate, the edition of Wordsworth and White may be regarded as sufficient.

3. The Syriac Versions.—It is probable from the quotations in Aphraates and Ephraim that there existed originally an Old-Syriac Version of Acts, corresponding to the Evangelion da-Mepharreshe represented by the Curetonian and Sinaitic MSS; but no MS of this type has survived.

* This MS is adequately described by F. G. Kenyon (Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT<sup>2</sup>, 88 ff.) or in other well-known handbooks.

† Besides the details noted in the handbooks, it should be observed that this MS, after being used by Bede in Northumbria, passed to Germany, whence it was probably obtained by Laud, who gave it to the Bodleian Library.

‡ As an instance of the advance in knowledge which von Soden's labours have produced, it should be noted that this MS used to be regarded as one of the principal authorities for the 'Western' text, and was at one time deemed worthy of a separate edition.

(1) The oldest Syriac Version of the Acts is therefore the Peshitta, probably made by Kabbula, Bishop of Edessa (411-435) (see F. C. Burkitt, 'S. Ephraim's Quotations from the Gospel,' TS vii. 2 [1901] p. 57 f.). (N.B.—The Peshitta is quoted by Tischendorf as Syr<sup>sch</sup>.)

(2) Besides the Peshitta we have the Harklean made by Thomas of Harkleia. This was based on an earlier Syriac text, made in 506 by Polycarp for Philoxenus, Bishop of Mabug (Hierapolis, the modern Membij on the Euphrates), which is no longer extant for Acts. Thomas of Harkleia revised the Philoxenian with the help of Greek MSS in the Library of the Enaton at Alexandria, and enriched his edition with a number of critical notes giving the variants of these Greek MSS which often have a most remarkable text agreeing more closely with Codex Bezae than with any other known Greek MS. (N.B.—It is quoted by Tischendorf as Syr<sup>p</sup>.)

(3) There is also a lectionary of the so-called 'Palestinian' type, which was probably in use about the 7th cent. in the neighbourhood of Antioch. (On the nature of the 'Palestinian' Syriac literature see F. C. Burkitt, JThSt ii. [1901] 174-185.)

4. The Egyptian Versions.—The two Versions, Bohairic and Sahidic, which are extant for the Gospels, exist also for Acts, and there are a few fragments of Versions in other dialects. The relative date of these Versions has not been finally settled, but the opinion of Coptic scholars seems to be increasingly in favour of regarding the Sahidic as the older form. The Bohairic agrees in the main with the H text, but the Sahidic has many I readings (see E. A. W. Budge, Coptic Biblical Texts, London, 1912, for the best Sahidic text).

5. Secondary Versions.—Versions of Acts are also found in Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Georgian, Persian, and other languages; but none of them is of primary importance for the text.

6. Quotations in early writers.—The earliest quotations long enough to have any value for determining the text are in Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria, who may be regarded as representing the text of the end of the 2nd cent. in Gaul, Africa, and Alexandria. For the 3rd cent. we have Origen and Didymus, representing the Alexandrian school; Cyprian for Africa, and Novatian for Italy. For the 4th cent. Athanasius and Cyril represent the later development of the Alexandria text; Lucifer, Jerome, and Ambrosiaster represent the text of Rome and Italy; Augustine, that of Africa; Eusebius and Cyril of Jerusalem the Palestinian text, which according to von Soden is I; the later Church writers mostly use the K text, though they sometimes show traces of probably local contamination with H and I.

7. Textual theories.—As soon as textual criticism began to be based on any complete view of the evidence, it became obvious that the chief feature to be accounted for in the text of Acts was the existence of a series of additions in the text in the Latin Versions and Fathers, usually supported by the two great bilingual MSS 85 and 1001 (D and E), frequently by the marginal readings in Syr<sup>Harc</sup>, and sporadically by a few minuscules; opposed to this interpolated text stood the Alexandrian text of 81, 82 (B &), and their allies; while between the two was the text of the mass of MSS agreeing sometimes with one, sometimes with the other, and sometimes combining both readings.

(1) The first really plausible theory to meet even part of the facts was Westcott and Hort's (The New Testament in Greek, vol. ii. [Cambridge, 1882]), who suggested that the later text (K) was a recension based on the two earlier types. They regarded 85 (Codex Bezae) as representing the 'Western' text, and 81 and 82 as representing as nearly as possible the original text. The weak point in their theory was that they could not explain the existence of the Western text.

(2) Founded mainly on the basis of their work, two theories were suggested to supply this deficiency.

(a) Rendel Harris ('A Study of Codex Bezae' in TS ii. 1 [1891], and Four Lectures on the Western Text, [Cambridge, 1894] and F. H. Chase (The Old Syriac Element in the Text of Codex Bezae, London, 1893) thought that retranslation from Latin and Syriac would solve the problem; but no amount of retranslation will account for the relatively long Bezan additions.

(b) F. Blass (Acta Apostolorum secundum formam quæ videtur Romanam, Leipzig, 1897, and also in his commentary, Acta Apostolorum, Göttingen, 1895) thought that Luke issued the Acts in two forms: one to Theophilus (the Alexandrian text), and the other for Rome (the Western text); but his reconstruction of the Roman text is scarcely satisfactory, and the style of the additions is not sufficiently Lucan.

(3) More recently von Soden (Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, 1902-1910, p. 1834 ff.), using the new facts as to the MSS summarized above, has revived Blass's theory in so far that he thinks that the interpolated text witnessed to by 85 and the Latin Versions and Fathers really goes back to a single original; but, instead of assigning this original to Luke, he attributes it to Tatian, who, he thinks, added a new recension of Acts to his Diatessaron. The weak point in this theory is that the only evidence that Tatian edited the Acts is a passage in Eusebius* which states that he emended 'the Apostle.' This may refer to Acts, but more probably refers to the Epistles. According to von Soden, the I text did not contain all the interpolations, K contained still fewer, and H contained none. He thinks that in the 2nd cent. there existed side by side the Tatianic text and a non-interpolated text which he calls I-H-K. From these two texts there arose the Latin Version—predominantly Tatianic—and most of the early Fathers were influenced by Tatian. Later on, in the 4th cent., three revisions were made: (a) H, by Hesychius in Alexandria, which preserved in the main the text of I-H-K without the Tatianic additions, but with a few other corruptions; (b) K, by Lucian, in Antioch, which had many Tatianic corruptions, as well as some of its own; (c) I, in Palestine, possibly in Jerusalem, which preserved many Tatianic additions, though in a few cases keeping the I-H-K text against H. 85 (D) is the best example of this text, but has suffered from the addition of a much greater degree of Tatianic corruption than really belongs to the I text, owing to Latin influence.

The general relations of the various forms of the text, according to von Soden, can be shown roughly in the following diagram:

Obviously this complicated theory cannot be dismissed without much more attention than it has yet received. It may prove that the 'text with additions' is not Tatianic but is nevertheless a single text in origin. It is also very desirable to investigate how far it is possible to prove that there was an I text, derived from I-H-K, which nevertheless did not possess, in its original state, all the 'Bezan' interpolations.* If it were possible to say that the interpolations were a connected series (whether Tatianic or not is of minor importance), the text in which they are imbedded would become extremely valuable, and we should have no right to argue, as is now often done, that, because the interpolations are clearly wrong, therefore the text in which they are found is to be condemned. For instance, in Ac 15<sup>28</sup> the Latin text interpolates the Golden Rule into the Apostolic decrees. That is no doubt wrong. But it does not follow that the text omitting πικτόν, in which this interpolation is placed, is not original.

* τοῦ δ' ἀποστόλου φασὶ τομῆσαι τινὰς αὐτὸν μεταφράσαι φωνᾷ ὡς ἐπιδιόρθουμένων αὐτῶν τὴν τῆς φράσεως συνταξίν (Eus. HE iv. 29. 6). This scarcely sounds as though a series of interpolations was intended.

LITERATURE.—The general textual question can be studied in H. von Soden, Die Schriften des NT, Berlin, 1902-1910, esp. pp. 1649-1840; F. G. Kenyon, Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT, London, 1912; E. Nestle, Einführung in das griech. NT, Göttingen, 1909 (the Eng. tr. is from an older edition of the period before von Soden); K. Lake, The Text of the NT, London, 1911. Important for the study of the Latin are von Soden, 'Das lat. NT in Afrika zur Zeit Cyprians,' TU xxxiii. [Leipzig, 1909]; and Wordsworth-White, Nov. Test. Dom. nost. Ies. Christi secundum edit. S. Hieronymi, vol. ii, pt. i. (Oxford, 1905) which also gives a clear statement of the best editions of the separate MSS of the Old Latin and the Vulgate (pp. v-xv).

II. TRADITION AS TO AUTHORSHIP.—So far back as tradition goes, the Acts is ascribed to St. Luke, the author of the Third Gospel, and companion of St. Paul (see, further, LUKE). This tradition can be traced back to the end of the 2nd cent. (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. 12; Tertull. de Jejuniiis, 10; Iren. adv. Hær. i. xxiii. 1, iii. xii. 12 ff., iv. xv. 1; and the Canon of Muratori). If the connexion with the Third Gospel be accepted, as it certainly ought to be, the fact that Marcion used the Gospel is evidence for the existence of Acts, unless it be thought that the Gospel was written by a contemporary of Marcion who had not yet written Acts. Farther back tradition does not take us: there are no clear proofs of the use of Acts in the Apostolic Fathers (see The New Testament in the Apostolic Fathers, Oxford, 1905) or in the early Apologists. (For the later traditions concerning Luke and his writings see LUKE.)

The value of this tradition must necessarily depend on the internal evidence of the book itself. The arguments can best be arranged under the two heads of favourable and unfavourable to the tradition.

1. In favour of the tradition of Luke's authorship is the evidence of the 'we-sections,' or passages in which the writer speaks in the first person. These are Ac 16<sup>10-17</sup> 20<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>18</sup> 27<sup>1</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>. They form together an apparent extract from a diary, which begins in Troas and breaks off in Philippi, on St. Paul's second journey; begins again in Philippi, on his last journey to Jerusalem; and continues (with only the apparent break of the episode of St. Paul and the Ephesian elders [20<sup>18-38</sup>] which is told in the third person) until Jerusalem is reached and St. Paul goes to see James; then breaks off again during St. Paul's imprisonment in Jerusalem and Cæsarea; begins again when St. Paul leaves Cæsarea; and continues until the arrival in Rome, when it finally ceases.

It is, of course, theoretically possible that these sections are merely a literary fiction, but this possibility is excluded by the facts (a) that there is no conceivable reason why the writer should adopt this form of writing at these points, and these only, in his narrative; (b) that by the general consent of critics these passages have all the signs of having really been composed by an eye-witness of the events described. It is, therefore, only necessary to consider the other possibilities: (1) that we have here from the writer of the whole work the description of incidents which he had himself seen; (2) that the writer is here using an extract from the writing of an eye-witness and has preserved the original idiom.

The only way of deciding between these two possibilities is to make use of literary criteria, and this has been done in recent years with especial thoroughness by Harnack in Germany and Hawkins in England. For any full statement of the case reference must be made to their books; the principle, however, and the main results can be summarized.

If the writer of Acts is merely using the first person in order to show that he is claiming to have been an eye-witness, the writer of the 'we-clauses' is identical with the redactor of the Gospel and Acts. Now, in the Gospel we know that he was using Mark in many places, and, by noting the redactorial changes in the Marcan sections of Luke, we can establish his preference for certain idioms. If these idioms constantly recur in the 'we-clauses,' it must be either because the 'we-clauses' were written by the redactor, or because the redactor also revised the 'we-clauses,' but without changing the idiom. As a fact we find that the 'we-clauses' are more marked by the characteristic phraseology of the redactor than any other part of the Gospel or Acts. We are, therefore, apparently reduced to a choice between the theory that the redactor of the Gospel and Acts wrote the 'we-clauses,' and the theory that he redacted them with more care than any other part of his compilation, except that he allowed the first person to stand. The former view certainly seems the more probable, but not sufficient attention has been paid to the observation of E. Schurer (ThLZ, 1906, col. 405) that the facts would also be explained if the writer of the 'we-clauses' and the redactor of Acts came from the same Bildungssphäre. It would be well if some later analyst would eliminate from both sides the idioms which are common to all writers of good Greek at the period, for undoubtedly an element of exaggeration is introduced by the fact that in the Marcan source there were many vulgarisms which all redactors would have altered, and mostly in the same way. It should also be noted that there are a few 'Lucanisms' which are not to be found in the 'we-clauses.'

The details on which this argument is based will be found best in J. C. Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ<sup>2</sup>, Oxford, 1909, pp. 174-193; A. Harnack, Lukas der Arzt, Leipzig, 1906, pp. 19-85. There is also a good résumé in J. Moffatt, LNT, p. 294 ff.

2. Against the tradition it is urged (1) that the presentment of St. Paul is quite different from that in the Pauline Epistles, (2) that on definite facts of history the Acts and Epistles contradict each other; and it is said in each case that these facts exclude the possibility that the writer of Acts was Luke the companion of St. Paul.

(1) The presentment of St. Paul in the Epistles and in Acts.—It has been urged as a proof that the writer of Acts could not have been a companion of St. Paul, that whereas St. Paul in the Epistles is completely emancipated from Jewish thought and practice, he is represented in the Acts as still loyal to the Law himself, and enjoining its observance on Jews. The points which are really crucial in this argument are (a) St. Paul's circumcision of Timothy (Ac 16<sup>3</sup>), as contrasted with his teaching as to circumcision in the Epistles; (β) his acceptance of Jewish practice while he was in Jerusalem (Ac 21<sup>21ff.</sup>), as contrasted with his Epistles, especially Galatians and Romans; (γ) the absence of 'Pauline' doctrine in the speeches in Acts; (δ) St. Paul's acceptance of a compromise at the Apostolic

* The de Rebaptismate has not yet been sufficiently studied from this point of view. A monograph analyzing its evidence on the lines of F. C. Burkitt's Old Latin and the Italia might be valuable.

Council (Ac 15), as contrasted with the complete silence of the Epistles as to this agreement.

If these four propositions were sound, they would certainly be strong evidence against the Lucan authorship of Acts. But there is much to be said against each of them on the following lines.

(a) In Ac 16<sup>3</sup>, St. Paul circumcises Timothy, but the reason given is that he was partly Jewish. There is no evidence in the Epistles that the Apostle would ever have refused circumcision to a Jew: it was part of the Law, and the Law was valid for Jews. The argument in the Epistles is that it is not valid for Gentiles; and, though logic ought perhaps to have led St. Paul to argue that Jews also ought to abandon it, there is no proof that he ever did so. It is also claimed that the incident of Titus in Gal 2<sup>3</sup> shows St. Paul's strong objection to circumcision; but in the first place it is emphatically stated that Titus was not a Jew, and in the second place it is quite doubtful whether Gal 2<sup>3</sup> means that Titus, being a Greek, was not compelled to be circumcised, or that, being a Greek, he was not compelled to be circumcised, though as an act of grace he actually was circumcised. (β) It is quite true that in Ac 21<sup>21ff.</sup> St. Paul accepts Jewish custom: what is untrue is that it can be shown from his own writings that he was likely to refuse. (γ) There certainly is an absence of 'Pauline' doctrine in the speeches in the Acts, if we accept the reconstructions which are based on the view that in the Epistles we have a complete exposition of St. Paul's teaching. But, if we realize that the Epistles represent his treatment by letter of points which he had failed to bring home to his converts while he was with them, or of special controversies due to the arrival of other teachers, there is really nothing to be said against the picture given in the Acts. (δ) If the exegesis and text of Acts be adopted which regard the Apostolic decrees as a compromise based on food-laws, it is certainly very strange that St. Paul should have said nothing about it in Galatians or Corinthians, and this undoubtedly affords a reasonable argument for thinking that the account in Ac 15 is unhistorical, and that it cannot have been the work of Luke. But it must be remembered that there is serious reason for doubting (i.) that the text and exegesis of Ac 15<sup>28</sup> point either to a food-law or to a compromise, (ii.) that Galatians was written after the Council (see G. Resch, 'Das Aposteldecret,' TU xxviii. [1905] 3; J. Wellhausen, 'Noten zur Apostelgeschichte,' in GGN, Göttingen, 1907; A. Harnack, Apostelgeschichte, Leipzig, 1908, p. 188 ff.; K. Lake, Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911, pp. 29 ff., 48 ff.).

(2) Rather more serious are the objections raised to the accuracy of certain definite statements, in the light of contrasting statements in the Epistles, and the conclusion suggested that the writer of Acts cannot have been a companion of St. Paul. Many objections of this kind have been made, but the majority are trivial, and the serious ones are really only the following: (a) the description of glossolalia in Ac 2 as compared with 1 Co 12 ff.; (b) the account of St. Paul's visits to Jerusalem in Acts as compared with Gal 2; (c) the movements of St. Paul's companions in Macedonia and Achaia in Ac 17<sup>15</sup> 18<sup>5</sup> as compared with 1 Th 3<sup>14</sup> 6.

(a) The account given of glossolalia in 1 Co 14 shows that it was in the main unintelligible to ordinary persons. 'He that speaketh in a tongue edifieth himself, but he that prophesieth edifieth the congregation' (1 Co 14<sup>4</sup>; cf. vv. 5, 14, 23); 'If any man speaketh in a tongue let one interpret' (1 Co 14<sup>27</sup>). On the other hand, the narrative in Ac 2 describes the glossolalia of the disciples as a miraculous gift of speech that was simultaneously intelligible to foreigners of various nations, each of whom thought that he was listening to his own language. It is argued that this latter glossolalia is as unknown to the historian of psychology as the glossolalia described in 1 Co. is well known; and it is suggested that Luke or his source has given a wrong account of the matter. In support of this it must be noted that the immediate judgment of the crowd, on first hearing the glossolalia of the disciples, was that they were drunk, and Peter's speech was directed against this imputation. It is not probable that any foreigner ever accused any one of being drunk because he could understand him, and so far the account in Acts may be regarded as carrying its own conviction, and showing that behind the actual text there is an earlier tradition which described a glossolalia of the same kind as that in 1 Co 12-14. But, if so, is it probable that a companion of St. Paul would have put forward so 'un-Pauline' a description of glossolalia? There is certainly some weight in this argument; but it is to a large extent discounted by the following considerations. (a) It is not known that Luke was ever with St. Paul at any exhibition of glossolalia. Certainly there is nothing in Acts to suggest that he was in Corinth. (β) In all probability we have to deal with a tradition which the writer of Acts found in existence in Jerusalem more than twenty years after the events described. Let any one try to find out, by asking surviving witnesses, exactly what happened at an excited revivalist meeting twenty years ago, and he will see that there is room for considerable inaccuracy. (γ) To us glossolalia of the Pauline type is a known phenomenon and probable for that reason; it is a purely physical and almost pathological result of religious emotion, while glossolalia of the 'foreign language' type as described in Acts is improbable. But to a Christian of the 1st cent. both were wonderful manifestations of the Spirit, and neither was more probable than the other.

The whole question of glossolalia can be studied in H. Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, Göttingen, 1899; H. Lietzmann's Commentary on 1 Co. in his Handbuch zum NT, iii. 2, Tübingen, 1909; J. Weiss, '1 Co.' in Meyer's Krit.-Exeg. Kommentar, Göttingen, 1910 (9th ed. of '1 Co.').

(b) The accounts given in Acts and Galatians of St. Paul's visits to Jerusalem.—The points of divergence, which are serious, are concerned with (a) St. Paul's actions immediately after the conversion; (β) his first visit to Jerusalem; (γ) his second visit to Jerusalem.

(a) St. Paul's actions immediately after the conversion.—The two accounts of this complex of incidents are Ac 9<sup>10-30</sup> and Gal 1<sup>15-24</sup>. The main points in the two narratives may be arranged thus in parallel columns:—

ACTS.	GALATIANS.
1. Visit to Damascus immediately after the conversion.	1. Visit to Arabia immediately after the conversion.
2. Escape from Damascus and journey to Jerusalem.	2. A 'return' to Damascus.
3. Retreat from Jerusalem to Tarsus in Cilicia.	3. A visit to Jerusalem 'after three years.'
	4. Departure to the 'districts of Syria and Cilicia.'

The difference between these accounts is obvious, and it is hard to avoid the conclusion that Acts is here inaccurate. It should be noted, however, that the inaccuracy apparently consists in telescoping together two visits to Damascus and omitting the Arabian journey which came between them. St. Paul, by speaking of his 'return' to Damascus, implies that the conversion had been in that city and in 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>. ('in Damascus the ethnarch of Aretas the king guarded the city of the Damascusenes to take me, and I was let down in a basket through a window') we have a corroboration of the escape mentioned in Acts, though it clearly must come after the visit (probably of a missionary character) to Arabia, in order to account for the hostility of Aretas. Thus, so far as the enumeration of events is concerned, the inaccuracy of Acts resolves itself into the omission of the Arabian visit, and the consequent telescoping together of two visits to Damascus along with a proportionate shortening of the chronology.

(8) St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem.—The details of this visit are a more serious matter, and Acts and Galatians cannot fully be reconciled, as is plain when the narratives are arranged in parallel columns.

Ac 9:26-30.

Gal 1:18-23.

'And when he was come to Jerusalem, he assayed to join himself to the disciples: and they were all afraid of him, not believing that he was a disciple. But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how at Damascus he had preached boldly in the name of Jesus. And he was with them going in and coming out at Jerusalem, and he spake and disputed against the Hellenists; but they went about to kill him.'

'After three years I went up to Jerusalem to become acquainted with Cephas, and tarried with him fifteen days. But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother. Now touching the things which I write to you, before God, I lie not. Then I came into the districts of Syria and Cilicia. And I was still unknown by face unto the churches of Judaea which were in Christ: but they only heard say, He that persecuted us once now preacheth the faith of which he once made havoc.'

No argument can alter the fact that Acts speaks of a period of preaching in Jerusalem which attracted sufficient attention to endanger St. Paul's life, while Galatians describes an essentially private visit to Peter; probably both documents refer to the same visit, as they place it between St. Paul's departure from Damascus and his arrival in Cilicia, but they give divergent accounts of it.

(7) St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem.—It is possible that the difficulties here are due to a mistaken exegesis rather than to any real divergence between Acts and Galatians. If we start from the facts, it is clear that St. Paul describes in Gal 2:1-10 his second visit to Jerusalem. In the course of this he held a private interview with the apostles in Jerusalem, in consequence of which he was free to continue his preaching to the Gentiles without hindrance. It is also clear from Ac 11:27ff. 12:25 that St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem was during the time of the famine. If we accept the identification of the second visit according to Acts with the second visit according to Galatians, there is no difficulty beyond the fact that Acts does not state that St. Paul and the other apostles discussed their respective missions when they met in Jerusalem; but, since this discussion altered nothing—the Gentile mission had already begun—there was no special reason why Luke should have mentioned it. Usually, however, critics have assumed that the visit to Jerusalem mentioned in Gal 2:1-10 is not the second but the third visit referred to in Acts, so that the interview with the apostles described in Gal 2 is identified with the 'Apostolic Council' in Ac 15. Great difficulties then arise: it is obviously essential to St. Paul's argument that he should not omit any of his visits to Jerusalem, and it is not easy to understand why, if he is writing after the Apostolic Council, he does not mention the decrees. There would seem to have been a party in Galatia which urged that circumcision was necessary for all Christians; this point had been settled at the Apostolic Council. If the Council had taken place, why did St. Paul not say at once that the Judaizing attitude had been condemned by the heads of the Jerusalem Church?

These difficulties have been met in England since the time of Lightfoot by assuming that the Apostolic decrees had only a local and ephemeral importance, in which case it does not seem obvious why they are given so prominent a place in Acts. In Germany this difficulty has been more fully appreciated, and either the account in Ac 15—identified with Gal 2—has been abandoned as wholly unhistorical, or the suggestion has been made that the account in Gal 2 is really a more accurate statement of what happened during St. Paul's interview with the apostles, which probably took place during the famine, while the 'decrees' mentioned in Acts really belong to a later period—perhaps St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem—and have been misplaced by Luke.

All these suggestions (and a different combination is given by almost every editor) agree in giving up the accuracy of Ac 15. On the other hand, if the view be taken that Gal 2 refers to an interview between St. Paul and the Jerusalem apostles during the time of the famine, and that it settled not the question of circumcision, but that of continuing the mission to the Gentiles which had been begun in Antioch, there is no further difficulty in thinking that Ac 15 represents the discussion of the question of circumcision which inevitably arose as soon as the Gentile mission expanded. It is, therefore, desirable to ask whether the reasons for identifying Gal 2 and Ac 15 are decisive. The classical statement in English is that of Lightfoot (Epistle to the Galatians, p. 123 ff.), who formulates it by saying that there is an identity of geography, persons, subject of dispute, character of the conference, and result. Of these identities only the first is fully accurate; and it applies equally well to the visit to Jerusalem in the time of the famine. The persons are not quite the same, for Titus and John are not mentioned in Acts. The subject is not the same at all, for in Galatians the question of the Law is not discussed (and was apparently raised only by St. Peter's conduct later on in Antioch), but merely whether the mission to the uncircumcised should be continued,* while in Acts the circumcision of the Gentiles is the main point. The character of the conference is not the same at all, for in Galatians it is a private discussion, in Acts a full meeting of the Church; and the result is not the same, for the one led up to the Apostolic decrees, while the other apparently did not do so. Lightfoot to some extent weakens these objections by suggesting that St. Paul describes a private conference before the Council, but in so doing he weakens his own case still more, for he can give no satisfactory reason why St. Paul should carefully describe a private conference, but omit the public meeting and official result to which it was preliminary.

Thus, if the identification of Gal 2 and Ac 15 be abandoned, the objections which are raised against the account in Acts fall to the ground, and the resultant arguments against the identification of the writer of Acts with Luke are proportionately weakened.

The question may be studied in detail in C. Clemen, Paulus, Giessen, 1904; A. C. McGiffert, A History of Christianity in the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897; A. Harnack, Apostelgesch., Leipzig, 1908; J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians, Cambridge, 1865; K. Lake, Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, London, 1911; C. W. Emmet, Galatians, London, 1912.

(c) The movements of St. Paul's companions in Macedonia and Achaia in Ac 17:15-18<sup>s</sup> compared with 1 Th 3:1, 6.—The difference between these narratives is concerned with the movements of Timothy and Silas. According to Acts, when St.

* From the context it is clear that τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς ἀκροβυστίας . . . τῆς περιτομῆς means the gospel for the Uncircumcision (i.e. the Gentiles) and the Circumcision (i.e. the Jews).

Paul went to Athens he left Timothy and Silas in Berea, and sent a message to them either from Athens or from some intermediate point, asking them to rejoin him as soon as possible, but they did not actually join him until he reached Corinth (Ac 18<sup>5</sup>). This arrival of Timothy at Corinth is mentioned in 1 Th 3<sup>6</sup>, but, according to the implication of 1 Th 3<sup>16</sup>, Timothy (and Silas?) had already reached Athens and been sent away again with a message to Thessalonica. In this case Acts omits the whole episode of Timothy's arrival at and departure from Athens, and telescopes together two incidents in much the same way as seems to have been done with regard to St. Paul's visits to Damascus immediately after the conversion. This is the simplest solution of the question, though it is possible to find other conceivable theories, such as von Dobschütz's suggestion that 1 Th 3<sup>1</sup> need not mean that Timothy came to Athens, as the facts would be equally covered if a message from St. Paul had intercepted him on his way from Berea to Athens and sent him to Thessalonica.

The best account of various ways of dealing with the question is given by E. von Dobschütz, 'Die Thessalonicherbriefe,' in Meyer's Krit.-Exeget. Kommentar<sup>7</sup>, Göttingen, 1909.

Summary.—The general result of a consideration of these divergences between Acts and the Epistles suggests that the author was sometimes inaccurate, and not always well informed, but it is hard to see that he makes mistakes which would be impossible to one who had, indeed, been with St. Paul at times but not during the greater part of his career, and had collected information from the Apostle and others as opportunity had served. On the other hand, the argument from literary affinities between the 'we-clauses' and the rest of Acts remains at present unshaken; and, until some further analysis succeeds in showing why it should be thought that the 'we-clauses' have been taken from a source not written by the redactor himself, the traditional view that Luke, the companion of St. Paul, was the editor of the whole book is the most reasonable one.

III. DATE OF ACTS AND RECEPTION IN THE CANON.—The evidence for the date is very meagre. If the Lucan authorship be accepted, any date after the last events chronicled, i.e. a short time before A.D. 60 to c. A.D. 100, is possible. The arguments which have been used for fixing on a more definite point are: (1) the date of the Lucan Gospel, which by the evidence of Ac 1<sup>1</sup> is earlier; (2) the abrupt termination of Acts; (3) the possibility that the writer knew the Antiquities of Josephus, which cannot be earlier than A.D. 90.

1. The date of the Lucan Gospel.—It has usually been assumed that this must be posterior to the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, but it is doubtful whether there are really any satisfactory proofs that this was the case. The only argument of importance is that in the apocalyptic section of Mark (ch. 13) expressions which might be supposed to refer to the fall of Jerusalem have been altered to correspond with the real facts of the siege. Actually, however, the most striking change is merely that the vague Marcan reference to Daniel's 'abomination of desolation' has been replaced by a description of Jerusalem surrounded by armies. Of course, if we knew that Luke was later than the fall of Jerusalem, it would be a rational assumption to think that the change was due to the influence of the facts on the writer; but the force of the argument is not so great if we reverse the proposition, for to explain 'the abomination of desolation' as a prophecy of a siege is not specially difficult. The most, therefore, that can be said is that this argument raises a slight presumption in favour of a date later than A.D. 70.

2. The abrupt termination of Acts.—Acts ends apparently in the middle of the trial of St. Paul: he has been sent to Rome, and has spent two years in some sort of modified imprisonment, but no verdict has been passed. From this Harnack has argued (Neue Untersuchungen zur Apostelgeschichte, p. 65 ff.) that the Acts must have been written before the end of the trial was known.

This argument would be important if it were the only explanation of the facts. But two other possibilities have to be considered. In the first place, it is possible, though perhaps not very probable, that Luke wrote, or intended to write, a third book beginning with the account of St. Paul's trial in Rome. In the second place, it is possible that the end of Acts was not so abrupt to the ears of contemporaries as it is to us, for the two years may be the recognized period during which a trial must be heard, and after which, if the prosecution failed to appear, the case collapsed. The case of St. Paul had been originally a prosecution by the Jews, and probably it still kept this character, even though the venue was changed to Rome. But the Jews, as Luke says in Ac 28<sup>-1</sup>, did not put in an appearance, and therefore the case must have collapsed for lack of a prosecution, after a statutory period of waiting. What this period was we do not know, but a passage in Philo's in Flaccum points to the probability that it was two years. According to this, a certain Lambon was accused of treason in Alexandria, and the Roman judge, knowing that he was dangerous, but that the evidence was insufficient to justify a condemnation, kept him in prison for two years (διετίαν), which Philo describes as the 'longest period' (τὸν μήκιστον χρόνον). If this be so, Luke's termination of Acts is not really so abrupt as it seems, but implies that St. Paul was released after the end of the two years, because no Jews came forward to prosecute; it is easy to understand that, as this was not a definite acquittal, Luke had no interest in emphasizing the fact.

3. The knowledge of Josephus shown in Acts.—The evidence for this is found in the case of Theudas. The facts are as follows. In Ac 5<sup>35</sup> Gamaliel is made to refer to two revolts which failed—first, that of Theudas, and after him that of Judas the Galilean in the days of the Census (i.e. A.D. 6). Both these revolts are well known, and are described by Josephus; but the difficulty is that Judas really preceded Theudas, whose revolt took place in the procuratorship of Fadus (c. A.D. 43–47).

The revolt of Theudas was thus most probably later than the speech of Gamaliel, and the reference to it must be a literary device on the part of Luke, who no doubt used the speeches which he puts into the mouths of the persons in his narrative with the same freedom as was customary among writers of that period. But the remarkable point is that Josephus in Ant. XX. also mentions Judas of Galilee after speaking of Theudas; * and the suggestion is that Luke had seen this and was led into the not unnatural mistake of confusing the dates. He apparently knew the correct date of Judas, and remembered only that Josephus had spoken of him after Theudas, and was thus led into the mistake of thinking that Theudas must have been earlier than Judas.

If the case of Theudas be admitted, it is also possible that in the description of the death of Herod Agrippa some details have been taken by Luke from the description of the death of Herod the * After describing Theudas' revolt, Josephus continues: πρὸς τοῖς δὲ καὶ οἱ παῖδες 'Ιουδα τοῦ Γαλιλαίου ἀνῆλθον, τοῦ τὸν λαὸν ἀπο- 'Ρωμαίων ἀποστησαντος Κυρινίου τῆς 'Ιουδαίας τιμηθέντος, ὡς ἐν τοῖς πρὸ τούτων ἐξηλωσάμεν, 'Ιακώβος καὶ Σίμων οὓς ἀνασταυρῶσαι προσέταξεν ὁ Ἀλέξανδρος (Ant. XX. v. 2).

Great as given by Josephus. But the evidence is here much less striking, and, if Theudas be not conceded, has no real strength. The case of Theudas is, however, very remarkable; it falls short of demonstration, but not so far short as the other arguments for dating the Acts.

So far it has been assumed that Luke was the writer of Acts; and in this case the probable length of his life gives the terminus ad quem for dating his writings, i.e. c. A.D. 100. If his authorship be disputed, the terminus ad quem is the earliest known use of the book or of its companion Gospel. This is to be found in the fact that Marcion (c. A.D. 140) used the Gospel of Luke. It is, of course, possible that some of the isolated Evangelical quotations in the Apostolic Fathers may be from Luke; but no proof of this can be given. As, however, Marcion's text is a redaction of the canonical text, and Luke's Gospel was taken into the Four-Gospel Canon not long afterwards, it must have been in existence some time previously, so that, even if the Lucan authorship be doubted, A.D. 130 is the latest date that can reasonably be suggested. Even this appears to be very improbable if attention be paid to some of the characteristics of Acts. For instance, Acts never uses the triadic formula: baptism is always in the name 'of the Lord,' or 'of Jesus'; there is no trace of the developed Docetic controversy of the Johannine Epistles or of Ignatius; χριστός is habitually used predicatively, and not as a proper name, and in this respect Acts is more primitive than St. Paul.

On the other hand, the weakening of the eschatological element, and the interest in the Church, as an institution in a world which is not immediately to disappear, point away from the very early date advocated by Harnack and others. The decennium 90-100 seems, on the whole, the most probable date, but demonstrative proof is lacking, and it may have been written thirty years earlier, or (but only if the Lucan authorship be abandoned) thirty years later.

4. Reception in the Canon.—There is no trace of any collection of Christian sacred books which included the Four-Gospel Canon, but omitted the Acts. That is to say, throughout the Catholic Church within the Roman Empire, Acts was universally received as the authoritative and inspired continuation of the Gospel story.

It appears also probable that in the Church of Edessa Acts was used from the earliest time as the continuation of the Diatessaron, for the Doctrine of Addai specifies as the sacred books 'the Law and the Prophets and the Gospel . . . and the Epistles of Paul . . . and the Acts of the Twelve Apostles,' of which the last item probably means the canonical Acts (see F. C. Burkitt, Early Eastern Christianity, London, 1904, p. 59).

Moreover, the Marcionites and other Gnostic Christians do not appear to have ever used the Acts. Later on the Manichæans seem to have used a corpus of the five Acts of Paul, Peter, John, Andrew, and Thomas, as a substitute for the canonical Acts; and the Priscillianists in Spain so far adopted this usage as to accept this corpus as an adjunct to the canonical Acts. (For the more detailed consideration of these Acts, both as a corpus and as separate documents, see ACTS OF THE APOSTLES [Apocryphal].)

IV. THE COMPOSITION OF ACTS.—The question of the composition of this or any other book is one partly of fact, partly of theory. In the sense of determining the arrangement of the sections, and the relations which they bear to one another, it is a question of fact and observation; but, when the question is raised why the sections are so arranged, and how far they represent older sources used by the writer, it becomes a question of theory and criticism.

1. The obvious facts.—The first point, therefore, is the establishment of the facts, and in the main these admit of little discussion. Acts falls immediately into two chief parts—the Pauline, and the non-Pauline parts—with a short intermediate section in which St. Paul appears at intervals. The Pauline section, again, falls into the natural divisions afforded by his two (or three) great journeys; and a cross-division can also be made by noting that the author sometimes uses the first person plural, sometimes writes exclusively in the third person. The earlier sections in the same way can be divided—though the division is here much less clear—into those in which the centre of activity is Jerusalem, and those in which it is Antioch, while a further series of subdivisions can be made according as the chief actor is Peter, Philip, or Stephen. Finally, still smaller subdivisions can be made by dividing the narrative into the series of incidents which compose it.

The table on p. 22 serves to give a general conspectus of the facts; a somewhat more minute system of subdivision has been adopted in the earlier chapters, which are especially affected by the question of sources, than in the—from this point of view—more straightforward later chapters. This analysis is sufficient to show that the writer must have been drawing on various sources or traditions for his information, and we have to face three problems: What was the purpose with which the writer put together this narrative? How far is it possible to distinguish the sources, written or oral, which he used? What is the relative value of the sources which he used?

2. The purpose with which the whole narrative was composed.—It is, of course, clear that the writer has not attempted to give a colourless story of as many events as possible, but is using history to commend his own interpretation of the facts. This is corroborated by his own account at the beginning of the Gospel, in which he defines his purpose as that of convincing Theophilus of the certainty of the 'narratives in which he had been instructed' (ὡς ἐπαγγέλλομαι ἐν τοῖς βιβλίοις τοῖς ἁγίοις [Lk 1<sup>1</sup>]). In other words, he wishes to tell the story of the early days of Christianity in order to prove the Christian teaching.

If we consider the narrative from this point of view, we can see several motives underlying it. (a) The desire to show that the Christian Church was the result of the presence of the Spirit (πνεῦμα, τὸ πνεῦμα, τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα are the usual expressions, but πνεῦμα κυρίου in 5<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>39</sup> [the text is doubtful], τὸ πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ in 16<sup>7</sup>), which is the fulfilment of the promise of Jesus to send it to His disciples (Ac 1<sup>5f.</sup>; cf. Lk 3<sup>16</sup> 24<sup>48f.</sup>). The Spirit manifested itself in glossolalia, in the working of miracles of healing, and in the surprising growth of Christianity. This is perhaps the main object of Luke's writings, and to it is subordinated, both in the Gospel and in Acts, the eschatological expectation which is most characteristic of Mark and Matthew; though many traces of this still remain.—(b) The desire to show the unreasonableness and wickedness of Jewish opposition is also clearly marked, and is contrasted with the attitude of Roman officials. It is, therefore, not impossible that the writer desired to dissociate Christianity from Judaism, and to defend Christians from the imputation of belonging to a sect forbidden by the State. If we knew the time when Christianity was, as such, first forbidden and persecuted, this might be a valuable indication of date, but at present all that is known with certainty is that (cf. Pliny's correspondence with Trajan) it was forbidden by the beginning of the 2nd cent., and that in 64 it was probably (but not certainly) not forbidden, as the Neronic persecution was not of the Christians as such, but of Christians as suspected of certain definite crimes. It is, however, in any case clear that this feature of Acts supports the view that one purpose cherished by the writer was the desire to protest against the view that Christians had always been, or could ever be, regarded as a danger to the Empire.—(c) As a means towards the accomplishment of his other purposes, the writer is desirous of showing how Christianity had spread from Jerusalem to the surrounding districts, from there to Antioch, and from Antioch through the provinces to Rome. He also explains in what way the Christians came

Church, and the early history of the Church in Jerusalem. In discussing them it is simplest to begin with the most marked feature—the ‘we-clauses’—and then work back to the earlier chapters.

(1) The ‘we-clauses.’—As was shown above, the balance of evidence seems at present to be strongly in favour of the view that the writer of these sections intended to claim that he had been a companion of St. Paul, and that he was himself the editor of the whole book. If this be so, we have for the rest of the ‘Paul’ narrative a source ready to our hand—the personal information obtained by Luke from St. Paul himself, or from other companions of St. Paul whom he met in his society. This may cover as much as Ac 9<sup>1-20</sup> 11<sup>27-30</sup>

REFERENCE.	PLACE.	GENERAL DESCRIPTION.	CHIEF ACTORS.
11-11, 112-26.	Jerusalem.	The Ascension and promise of the Spirit. Choice of Matthias.	Jesus and the Twelve. Peter and the Twelve.
21-47.	"	Speech of Peter. Gift of the Spirit. Glossolalia.	Peter and the Twelve.
31-36.	"	Speech of Peter. Healing miracle by Peter and John.	Peter [and John].
41-22	"	Speech of Peter. Imprisonment of Peter and John.	Peter [and John].
42-31.	"	Speech of Peter. Their release. Meeting of the Church.	Peter [and John].
482-516.	"	Gift of the Spirit. Communism in the Church.	Peter, Barnabas [Ananias, Sapphira]. Peter [and John].
517-42.	"	Imprisonment of Peter and John.	Peter [and John].
61-7. 68-16.	"	Speech of Gamaliel. Appointment of the Seven. Preaching of Stephen.	The apostles. Stephen.
71-83.	"	His arrest. Speech of Stephen.	Stephen.
84-25.	Samaria.	His death. Philip's preaching. Simon Magus.	Philip, Peter [and John]. Simon Magus.
826-40. 91-31.	The road to Gaza. The road to Damascus.	Philip's conversion of the Ethiopian. Conversion of Saul, and extension of the Church.	Philip. Paul.
932-1048.	Lydda, Joppa, Cæsarea.	Peter's journey through Lydda, Joppa, Cæsarea. Conversion of Cornelius.	Peter.
111-18. 1119-26.	Jerusalem. Antioch.	Speech of Peter. Peter's speech on Cornelius' conversion. Foundation of Gentile Christianity.	Peter. Hellenistic Jews, Barnabas, Paul.
1127-30. 121-24.	" Jerusalem.	Collection for Jerusalem. Herod's persecution. Peter's imprisonment. Death of Herod.	Barnabas, Paul. Peter.
1225.	"	Return of Barnabas and Saul to Antioch.	Barnabas, Paul.
131-1428. 151-35. 1536-1822.	Journey. Jerusalem. Journey.	First missionary journey. Apostolic Council. Second missionary journey.	Paul. Peter, James, Paul. Paul.
1823-2116. 2117-2311.	" Jerusalem.	Third missionary journey. Paul's dealings with James. His arrest. Speech to Sanhedrin.	Paul. Paul.
2312-2632.	Cæsarea.	Paul's imprisonment in Cæsarea. Felix. Festus. Agrippa.	Paul.
271-2816. 2817-31.	Journey. Rome.	Journey to Rome. Paul and Jews in Rome.	Paul. Paul.

to preach to Gentiles without insisting on the Jewish Law, and how this had been perceived to be the work of the Spirit by the Jewish apostles who recognized the revelation to this effect to St. Paul and to St. Peter (Ac 9<sup>15ff.</sup> 22<sup>31</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 15<sup>1ff.</sup>).

3. The sources used in Acts.—The most superficial examination of Acts shows that it is divided most obviously into a ‘Peter’ part and a ‘Paul’ part; it is, therefore, not strange that the critics of the beginning of the 19th cent. thought of dividing Acts into narratives derived from a hypothetical ‘Acts of Peter’ and a hypothetical ‘Acts of Paul.’ But further investigation has gone behind this division: it has been seen that important questions are involved in the relation of the ‘we-clauses’ to the rest of the narrative relating to St. Paul, the story of the Antiochene

12<sup>23-31</sup> or even more. There is nothing in these sections which cannot have come from St. Paul or his entourage, and the inaccuracies in the narrative, as compared with the Epistles, do not seem to point to any greater fallibility on the part of the writer than that to be found in other historical writers who are in the possession of good sources. At the same time, this does not mean that the assignment of these chapters to a ‘Paul’ source is final or exclusive of others. Some sections within these limits (e.g. Ac 15) may come from some other Jerusalem or Antiochene source, and some sections outside them (e.g. the story of Stephen's death) may have come from the ‘Paul’ source.

If, on the other hand, it should ultimately appear that the evidence from style has been exaggerated or misrepresented, it will be necessary to regard the 'we-sections' as representing a separate source, and consider the question whether the rest of the chapters mentioned above came from one or several sources. At present, however, no one has shown any serious ground for thinking that we can distinguish any signs of change of style, or of doublets in the narrative, to point in this direction.

(2) The problems presented by the earlier chapters are much more complicated. The chief point which attracts attention is that in the first half of these chapters the centre of interest is Jerusalem, or Jerusalem and the neighbourhood, while in the second half it is Antioch. Here again it is easier to begin by taking the later chapters first, and to discuss the probable limits of the Antiochene tradition, together with the possibility that it may have lain before the writer of Acts as a document, before considering the Jerusalem tradition of the opening chapters.

(a) The Antiochene tradition.—The exact limits of this tradition are difficult to fix. It is clear that to it the section describing the foundation of the church at Antioch and its early history (Ac 11<sup>19-26</sup>) must be attributed; but difficulties arise as soon as an attempt is made to work either backwards or forwards from this centre, as the later sections, which can fairly be attributed to Antiochene tradition, can also be attributed to the Pauline source, while the earlier sections of the same kind might be attributed to the Jerusalem tradition. It is obvious that the οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες of Ac 11<sup>19</sup> picks up the narrative of 8<sup>1-4</sup>. In 8<sup>1-4</sup> the story of Stephen's death is brought to a close by the statement that ἐγένετο δὲ ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ διωγμὸς μέγας ἐπὶ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τὴν ἐν Ἱερουσολύμοις; πάντες δὲ διεσπάρησαν κατὰ τὰς χώρας . . . οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες διήλθον εὐαγγελιζόμενοι τὸν λόγον. Then the writer gives two instances of this evangelization by Philip and Peter in Samaria, and by Philip alone on the road to Gaza. Next he explains how the conversion of St. Paul put an end to the persecution, and how the conversion of Cornelius led to the recognition of preaching to Gentiles by the Jerusalem community. Finally, he returns to where he started from, and picks up his story as to the Christians who were dispersed after the death of Stephen, with the same formula—οἱ μὲν οὖν διασπαρέντες in 11<sup>19</sup>.

Thus there is an organic unity between 8<sup>1</sup> and 11<sup>19</sup>. But 8<sup>1</sup> is the end of the story of the Hellenistic Jews, their seven representatives, and the persecution which befell them; and the beginning of this story is in 6<sup>8</sup>. Between 6<sup>8</sup> and 8<sup>1</sup> there is no break—unless it be thought that the whole speech of Stephen is the composition of the editor, as may very well be the case. Is, then, 6<sup>8</sup>–8<sup>1</sup> to be regarded as belonging to the Antiochene tradition? Harnack thinks so, and it is very probable. But it is also true that 6<sup>8</sup>–8<sup>1</sup> might have come either from Jerusalem or from St. Paul himself, and it is hard to see convincing reasons why the Antiochene source which Harnack postulates should not have come from the 'Paul' source.

The same sort of result is reached by considering the sections following 11<sup>19-24</sup>. Is 11<sup>25-30</sup> 'Pauline' or 'Antiochene'? The following section, 12<sup>1-24</sup>, is clearly part of the Jerusalem tradition, but what follows, 12<sup>25-13</sup>, might again be either Pauline or Antiochene, and the same is true of 15<sup>1-35</sup>, in which the account of the Council might be Antiochene or Pauline, but is less likely to represent Jerusalem tradition. These exhaust the number of the passages which are ever likely to be attributed to the Antiochene source. To the present writer it seems that, unless it prove possible (so far it has not been done) to find some literary criterion for distinguishing between the 'Pauline' and 'Antiochene' sources, it will remain permanently impossible to draw any line of demarcation between what Luke may have heard about the early history of Antioch from St. Paul and what he may have learnt from other Antiochene persons. It also seems quite impossible to say whether he was using written sources. This, of course, does not deny that the so-called 'Antiochene source' represents Antiochene tradition. All that is said is that this Antiochene tradition may have come from St. Paul quite as well as from any one else. On the merits of the case we can go no further (for the possibility that Luke was himself an Antiochene see LUKE).

(b) The Jerusalem tradition.—It is obvious that Ac 1<sup>1-5</sup> represents in some sense a Jerusalem tradition, and it is scarcely less clear that 8<sup>1-40</sup> 9<sup>31-11</sup> 12<sup>1-24</sup> represent a tradition which is divided in its interests between Jerusalem and Caesarea. It is, therefore, necessary to deal first with the purely Jerusalem sections, and afterwards with the Jerusalem-Caesarean narrative, before considering whether they are really one or more than one in origin.

(a) The purely Jerusalem sections.—The most important feature of Ac 1<sup>1-5</sup> is that 2<sup>1-47</sup> seems to contain doublets of 3<sup>1-4</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, and that the suggestion of a multiplicity of sources is supported by some linguistic peculiarities.

- |        |   |         |
|--------|---|---------|
| 21-13  | The gift of the Spirit, accompanied by the shaking of the house in which the Apostles were. | 431     |
| 214-36 | A speech of Peter.  | 31-26   |
| 237-41 | The result of this speech is an extraordinarily large number of converts (5000, 3000).      | 44      |
| 242-47 | The communism of the Early Church.  | 434, 35 |

Of this series of doublets the twice-told story of the early 'communism' of the first Christians and the repetition of the shaking of the house at the outpouring of the Spirit are the most striking, but the cumulative effect is certainly to justify the view that we have two accounts, slightly varying, of the same series of events.

This result finds remarkable corroboration in certain linguistic peculiarities of Ac 3 f. as compared with ch. 2. In the former the word ἀναστήσας is used in the sense 'raised up to preach' (3<sup>6</sup>; cf. 3<sup>1</sup>), and ἤγειρε is used of the Resurrection, but in the latter ἀναστήσας is used of the Resurrection. In Ac 3 f. Jesus is described as a παῖς θεοῦ (3<sup>13, 26</sup> 4<sup>27, 30</sup>), but in ch. 2 as ἄνδρα ἀποδεδειγμένον ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ. In Ac 3 f. Peter is almost always accompanied by John (3<sup>1, 3, 4, 11</sup> 4<sup>19</sup>), but in ch. 2 he appears alone or 'with the other apostles.'

That Ac 2 and 3 f. are doublets is thus probable; moreover, as the linguistic characteristics of 3 f. are peculiar and not Lucan, it is more probable here than anywhere else in Acts that we are dealing with traces of a written Greek document underlying Acts in the same way as Mark and Q underlie the Lucan Gospel. To this branch of the Jerusalem tradition Harnack has given the name of 'source A,' and to Ac 2 the name of 'source B.' According to him, the continuation of A can be found in 5<sup>1-16</sup>, and he also identifies it with the Jerusalem-Caesarean source (see below). B is continued in 5<sup>17-42</sup>. Ac 1 more probably, he thinks, belongs to B than to A, but may have a separate origin.

If A be followed, we get a clear and probable narrative of the history of the Jerusalem Church, but it begins in the middle. According to it, Peter and John went up to the Temple and healed a lame man; in connexion with the sensation caused by this wonder Peter explained that he wrought the cure in the name of Jesus, whom he announced as the predestined Messiah. As the result of this missionary speech a great number of converts were made (about 5000 [4<sup>1</sup>]). Peter and John were arrested, but later on released after a speech by Peter, and a practical defiance of the command of the authorities not to preach in the name of Jesus. Then follows a description of the joy of the Church at the release of Peter and John, and an account of their prayer—δος τοις δούλοις σου μετὰ παρρησίας πάσης λαλεῖν τὸν λόγον σου. In answer to their prayer, the Spirit was outpoured and the shaking of the room in which they were, after which they were able, as they had asked, to speak the word μετὰ παρρησίας. Finally, a picture is drawn of the prosperity of the Church, and of the voluntary communism which prevailed.

The narrative gives an intelligible picture of the events which led to the growth of the Jerusalem Church and of an organization of charitable distribution that ultimately led to the development described in Ac 6. Moreover, it has several marks of individuality, and an early type which suggests that we have here to do with a source used by Luke, probably in documentary form, rather than a Lucan composition. This applies especially to Peter's speech, which is in some ways one of the most archaic passages in the NT. Peter does not describe Jesus as having been the Messiah, but as a παις θεοῦ (more probably 'Servant of God' than 'Child of God,' and perhaps with a side reference to the 'Servant of Jahweh' in Is 53, etc.)—a phrase peculiar to source A, 1 Clement, the Martyrdom of Polycarp, and the Didache. He then goes on to announce that God has glorified this παῖς by the Resurrection, and that He is the predestined Messiah (τὸν προσκεχειρισμένον Χριστόν), who will remain in the Heavens until the 'restoration of all things.' Recent research in the field of eschatology and Messianic doctrine has brought out clearly the primitive character of this speech. The same can also be said of the prayer of the Church in 4<sup>2f.</sup>, in which the phrase τὸν ἅγιον παῖδά σου Ἰησοῦν, ὃν ἔχρισας ('made Christ'?) is very remarkable.

Thus source A commends itself as an early and good tradition, but it begins in the middle and tells us nothing about the events previous to the visit of Peter and John to the Temple. Apparently it was to fill up this gap that Luke turned to source B, which seems to relate some of the same events, but in a different order; and, though Harnack doubts this, it seems, on the whole, probable that Ac 1, or at least vv. 6-12, ought to be regarded as belonging to it. According to this narrative, the disciples received the Spirit on the Day of Pentecost amid the shaking of the room, after which Peter made a speech, in many points resembling that in Ac 3, but without the characteristic phraseology of A, and with the addition of many more 'testimonia' as to the Resurrection. A great number of converts (about 3000) were made; and, in the enthusiasm which prevailed, a spirit of voluntary communism flourished, and an organization of charitable distribution came into being.

This narrative does not seem so convincing as that of source A. But if Ac 1 be regarded as belonging to it, it has the advantage of connecting the story of the Church at Jerusalem directly with the events that followed the Crucifixion—a period on which A is silent. Now, it is tolerably clear that A was a written Greek source used by Luke, just as he used Mark in the Gospel; for, although it has been 'Lucanized,' it still retains its own characteristic expressions. Presumably, therefore, a copy of this document came into Luke's possession, and he supplemented it at the beginning with B; but, whether B was a written source or oral tradition, it is impossible to say. The question presents in this respect a remarkable parallel to the state of things in the last chapters of the Gospel of Luke. Here also the writer made use of a Greek document—Mark—and supplemented it with a Jerusalem tradition—whether written or oral it is impossible to say—either because the Marcan narrative broke off, as it breaks off in the existent text of Mark, or because he desired to correct the Marcan tradition. It is, moreover, plain that this Jerusalem tradition at the end of Luke is the same as that in source B of the Acts. The question then suggests itself whether source A—the written source of Acts—may not belong to the same document as 'Mark'—the written source of the Gospel. If we suppose that the original Mark contained a continuation of the Gospel story down to the foundation of the Church in Jerusalem, and either that Luke disliked the section referring to the events after the Crucifixion, or perhaps that his copy had been mutilated, the composition of this part of Acts becomes plain;* but it also becomes a question whether the John who accompanies Peter in source A (and nowhere else) is not John Mark, rather than John the son of Zebedee.

All this, however, is hypothetical. The actual existence of the source A in ch. 3f. and of the supplementary source B in ch. 2 is a point for which comparative certainty may be claimed.

The problem then arises, how far these sources can be traced in the following chapters of Acts. Harnack is inclined to see in 5<sup>1-41</sup> a doublet of 4<sup>1-22</sup>, and to assign the latter to A, the former to B. This is not improbable, but it is not so certain as the previous results. It is, for instance, by no means improbable that the apostles were twice arrested, and, as the story is told, 5<sup>17</sup> seems a not unnatural continuation of ch. 4. It is, however, true that the characteristic 'Peter and John' is not found in 5<sup>17f.</sup>; but, on the other hand, the rather curious phrase αρχηγόν is applied to Jesus in 3<sup>15</sup> and 5<sup>31</sup> (elsewhere in NT only in He 2<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>21</sup>), which militates somewhat against the view that these chapters belong to different sources. In the same way the story of Ananias and Sapphira in Ac 5<sup>1-11</sup> would fit quite as well on to B as on to A, with which Harnack connects it. Linguistically there is no clear evidence, but it may be noted that φθόρος is a characteristic of the Christian community in B in 2<sup>43</sup>, and is repeated in 5<sup>6-11</sup>. It is not found in A, though from the circumstances of the case not much weight can be attached to this. It therefore must remain uncertain whether Ac 5 ought to be regarded as wholly A, wholly B, or be divided between the two sources.

(8) The Jerusalem-Cæsarean sections.—These are Ac 8<sup>5-40</sup> 9<sup>31-1118</sup> 12<sup>1-23</sup>, which describe Philip's evangelization of Samaria, followed by the mission of Peter and John, Philip's conversion of the Ethiopian on the road to Gaza, and his arrival in Cæsarea, Peter's mission to Lydda, Joppa, and Cæsarea, and return to Jerusalem, Peter's arrest, imprisonment, and escape in Jerusalem, and Herod's death in Cæsarea. Harnack thinks that all these passages represent a Jerusalem-Cæsarean tradition, which he identifies with source A. It is certainly probable that 8<sup>14-5</sup> belongs to A, owing to the characteristic combination of Peter and John, and it may be regarded as reasonable to think that this also covers the rest of the section, so that 8<sup>5-40</sup> may be attributed to A. It is more doubtful when we come to the two other sections. If, however, any weight be attached to the suggestion that A is connected with Mark, it is noteworthy that 12<sup>1-23</sup> is also very clearly connected with the house of Mark and his mother.

The section 9<sup>31-1118</sup> remains. This is much more clearly Cæsarean than either of the others, and might possibly be separated from them and ascribed to a distinct Cæsarean source. If so, the suggestion of Harnack and others that the source might be identified with the family of Philip, which was settled in Cæsarea, is not impossible; from 21<sup>8</sup> (a 'we-clause') we know that Luke came into contact with him there. It is also obvious that the information given by Philip might be the source of much more of that which has been tentatively attributed to source A, or on the other hand might conceivably be identified with source B; the truth is, of course, that we here reach the limit of legitimate hypothesis, and pass into the open country of uncontrolled guessing.

* See Burkitt, Earliest Sources of the Gospels, London, 1911, p. 79f., where the suggestion is made that the early part of Acts may represent a Marcan tradition, though the bearing on this theory of the double source A and B in Acts is not mentioned.

The result, therefore, of an inquiry into the sources of the Jerusalem tradition is to establish the existence of a written Greek source, A, in Ac 3f., with a parallel narrative B—apparently the continuation of the Lucan Jerusalem narrative in the Gospel; and these two sources, or one of them, are continued in ch. 5. In 8<sup>5-40</sup> is a further narrative which has points of connexion with A. Ac 9<sup>31-11<sup>18</sup></sup> is a Cæsarean narrative, probably connected with Philip, and this raises difficulties in relation to A, for 8<sup>5-40</sup> has also points of connexion with Philip. Finally 12<sup>1-23</sup> is a Jerusalem narrative connected with Peter and Mark; but here also the possibility of a connexion with Cæsarea remains open.

V. HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE VARIOUS TRADITIONS.—So far as the 'we-clauses' and the probably Pauline tradition are concerned, this question has already been discussed. While there are traces of probable inaccuracy, there is no reason to doubt the general trustworthiness of the narrative. The Antiochene narrative and the Jerusalem-Cæsarean narrative (the 'Philip' clauses) can be judged with more difficulty, as we have no means of comparing the narratives with any other contemporary statements. Here, however, we have another criterion. It is probable that Luke is dealing with traditions, and, at least in the case of A, with a document. We cannot say how far he alters his sources, for we have no other information as to their original form, but we can use the analogy of his observed practice in the case of the Gospel. Here we know that he made use of Mark; and we can control his methods, because we possess his source. In this way we can obtain some idea of what he is likely to have done with his sources in Acts. On the whole, it cannot be said that the application of this criterion raises the value of Acts. In the Gospel, Luke, though in the main constant to his source Mark, was by no means disinclined to change the meaning of the story as well as the words, if he thought right. It is possible that he was justified in doing so, but that is not the question. The point is that he did not hesitate to alter his source in the Gospel; it is therefore probable that he did not hesitate to do so in the Acts.

Besides this, on grounds of general probability, various small points give rise to doubt, or seem to belong to the world of legend rather than to that of history—for instance, the removal of Philip by the Spirit (or angel?) from the side of the Ethiopian to Azotus; but the main narrative offers no real reason for rejection. The best statement of all the points open to suspicion is still that of Zeller-Overbeck (The Acts of the Apostles, Eng. tr., London, 1875-76), but the conclusions which Zeller draws are often untenable. He did not realize that in any narrative there is a combination of really observed fact and of hypotheses to explain the fact. The hypotheses of a writer or narrator of the 1st cent. were frequently of a kind that we should now never think of suggesting. But that is no reason why the narrative as a whole should not be regarded as a statement of fact. The existence, in any given narrative, of improbable explanations as to how events happened is not an argument against its early date and general trustworthiness, unless it can be shown that the explanation involves improbability not only in fact but also in thought—it must not only be improbable that the event really happened in the manner suggested, but it must be improbable that a narrator of that age would have thought that it so happened. Judged by this standard, the Antiochene and Jerusalem-Cæsarean traditions seem to deserve credence as good and early sources.

The same thing can be said of source A in the purely Jerusalem tradition. But the problem raised by source B is more difficult. If it be assumed that Ac 1 does not belong to it, it can only be compared with source A. To this it seems inferior, but on the whole it narrates the same events, and it would certainly be rash to regard B as valueless. No doubt it is true that, if the events happened in the order given in A, they cannot have happened in the order given in B, but it is quite possible that many details in B may be correct in spite of the fact that they are told otherwise or not told at all in A.

If, on the other hand, Ac 1 be assigned to B, the question is more complicated. According to Ac 1, the Ascension took place near Jerusalem forty days after the Resurrection, and the inference is suggested that the disciples, including Peter, never left Jerusalem after the Crucifixion. That this was Luke's own view is made quite plain from the Gospel, except that there does not appear to be any room in the Gospel narrative for the forty days between the Resurrection and the Ascension. The problems which arise are therefore: (1) How far can the Gospel of Luke and Acts 1 be reconciled? (2) Is it more probable that the disciples stayed in Jerusalem or went to Galilee?

1. How far can the Gospel of Luke and Acts 1 be reconciled?—Various attempts have been made to find room in the Gospel for the 'forty days.' They have not, however, been successful, as the connecting links in the Gospel narrative are quite clear from the morning of the Resurrection to the moment of the Ascension, which is plainly intended to be regarded as taking place on the evening of the same day. According to Lk 24<sup>36</sup>, the sequence of the events was the following. Early on Sunday morning certain women went to the tomb, and to them two men appeared who announced the Resurrection; the women believed, but failed to convince the disciples. Later on in the same day (ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ) two disciples saw the risen Lord on the way to Emmaus, and at once returned to Jerusalem to tell the news (ἀναστάντες αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρᾳ). While they were narrating their experience the Lord appeared, led them out to Bethany, and was taken up to heaven. The only place where there is any possibility of a break in the narrative is v. 44 (εἶπεν δέ), but this possibility (in any case contrary to the general impression given by the passage) is excluded by the facts that εἶπεν δέ is a peculiarly Lucan phrase (59 times in Luke, 15 times in Acts, only once elsewhere in the NT), and that it never implies that a narrative is not continuous, and usually the reverse. Moreover, that Lk 24<sup>32</sup>, whatever text be taken, refers to the Ascension is rendered certain by the reference in Ac 1<sup>2</sup>. Thus, there is no doubt that the Gospel places the Ascension on the evening or night of the third day after the Crucifixion. It is equally clear that Acts places the Ascension forty days later, if the text of 1<sup>3</sup> (δι' ἡμερῶν τεσσαράκοντα) is correct; and, though there is, it is true, some confusion in the text at this point, it is not enough to justify the omission of 'forty days' (see esp. F. Blass, Acta Apostolorum secundum formam quæ videtur Romanam, Leipzig, 1896, p. xxiii). The only possible suggestion therefore, is that the writer found some reason to modify his opinions in the interval between writing the Gospel and the Acts. Whether he was right to do so depends on the judgment passed on various factors, which cannot be discussed here, but may be summed up in the question whether the evidence of the Pauline Epistles does not suggest that the earliest Christian view was that Ascension and Resurrection were but two ways of describing the same fact, and whether this is not also implied in the speeches of Peter in Ac 2 and 3* (cf. especially Ro 8<sup>24</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>, Ac 23<sup>3</sup> 313-15). The evidence is not sufficient to settle the point, but it shows that the problem is not imaginary.

2. Is it more probable that the disciples stayed in Jerusalem or went to Galilee?—The evidence that the disciples went to Galilee is found in Mark.† The end of Mark is, of course, missing, but there are in the existing text two indications that the appearances of the risen Christ were in Galilee, and therefore that the disciples must have returned there after the Crucifixion. (a) Mk 14<sup>27</sup>, 'All ye shall be offended: for it is written, I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. But after I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee.' This seems intended to prepare the way for the flight of the disciples after the arrest in Gethsemane; the meaning of the second part, 'I will go before you into Galilee,' is obscure, but in any case it implies a return to Galilee. (b) Mk 16<sup>7</sup> (the message of the young man at the tomb), 'Go, tell his disciples and Peter that he is going before you into Galilee, there shall you see him.' Here it is quite clearly stated that the first appearance of the risen Christ to the disciples is to be in Galilee, and once more it must be urged that this implies that the disciples went there.

On the other hand, the evidence of Luke and the Acts is that the disciples did not leave Jerusalem, and that, so far from the risen Lord announcing His future appearance to the disciples in Galilee, He actually told them to remain in Jerusalem.

That the two traditions thus exist cannot be questioned, nor can they be reconciled without violence. If, however, we have to choose between them, the Galilean tradition seems to deserve the preference. It is in itself much more probable that the disciples fled to Galilee when they left Jesus to be arrested by Himself, than that they went into Jerusalem. If they were, as the narrative says, panic-stricken, Jerusalem was the last place to which those who were not inhabitants of that city would go. Moreover, it is not difficult to see that the tendency of Christian history would have naturally emphasized Jerusalem and omitted Galilee, for it is certainly a fact that from the beginning the Christian Church found its centre in Jerusalem and not in Galilee. Why this was so is obscure, and there is a link missing in the history of the chain of events. This must be recognized, but what either source B or Luke himself (if Ac 1 be not part of source B) has done is to connect up the links of the chain as if the Galilean link had never existed. So far as this goes, it is a reason for not accepting Ac 1 as an accurate account of history; and this judgment perhaps reflects on source B and certainly in some measure on Luke. It must, however, be noted that it ought not seriously to affect our judgment on Luke's account of later events. The period between the Crucifixion and the growth of the Jerusalem community was naturally the most obscure point in the history of Christianity; and, even if Luke went wrong in his attempt to find out the facts at this point, that is no special reason for rejecting his evidence for later events when he really was in a position to obtain sound information. All that is really shown is that, unlike Mark, he was never in close contact with one of the original Galilean disciples.

VI. CHRONOLOGY OF ACTS.—There are no definite chronological statements in the Acts, such as those in Lk 3<sup>1</sup>. But at five points synchronisms with known events can be established and used as the basis of a chronological system. These are the death of Herod Agrippa I. (Ac 12<sup>24</sup>); the famine in Judæa (11-12<sup>15</sup>); Gallio's proconsulate in Corinth (18<sup>12</sup>); the decree of Claudius banishing all Jews from Rome (18-); and the arrival of Festus in Judæa (25<sup>1</sup>).

1. The death of Herod Agrippa.—Agrippa I., according to the evidence of coins* (if these be genuine), reigned nine years. The beginning of his reign was immediately after the accession of Caligula, who became Emperor on 16 March, A.D. 37, and within a few days appointed Agrippa, who was then in Rome, to the tetrarchy of Philip, with the title of king; to this in 39-40 the tetrarchy of Antipas was added. Later on, Claudius added Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee. The difficulty is that Josephus says that Agrippa died in the seventh year of his reign. This would be between the spring of 43 and that of 44, but it does not agree with the evidence of the coinage, unless it be supposed that Agrippa dated his accession from the death of Philip rather than from his appointment by Caligula.

2. The famine in Judæa.—Our information for the date of this event is found in Josephus and Orosius. Josephus (Ant. XX. v.) says that the famine took place during the procuratorship of Alexander. Alexander's term of office ended in A.D. 48, and this is therefore the terminus ad quem for the date of the famine. His term of office began after that of Fadus. It is not known when Fadus retired, but he was sent to Judæa after the death of Herod Agrippa I. in A.D. 44, so that Alexander's term cannot have begun before 45, and more probably not before 46. Thus Josephus fixes the famine within a margin of less than two years on either side of 47.

Orosius (VII. vi.), a writer of the 5th cent., is more definite, and fixes the famine in the fourth year of Claudius, which, on his system of reckoning (see Ramsay, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? London, 1898, p. 223, which supplements and corrects the statement in St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do. 1895, p. 68 f.), was probably from Sept. 44 to Sept. 45, or possibly from Jan. 45 to Jan. 46. This statement has, of course, only the value which may be attributed to the sources of Orosius, which are unknown; but it supports Josephus fairly well, and it is not probable that Orosius was acquainted with the Antiquities, so that his statement has independent value.

3. Gallio's proconsulate.—This date has recently been fixed with considerable definiteness by the discovery of a fragment of an inscription at Delphi† which contains a reference to Gallio as proconsul (which must be proconsul of Achaia), and bears the date of the 26th 'acclamation' of the Emperor Claudius. This acclamation was before 1 Aug. A.D. 52 (CIL vi. 125b), as an inscription of that date refers to the 27th acclamation, and after 25 Jan. 51, as his 24th acclamation came in his 11th tribunician year (i.e. 25 Jan. 51-24 Jan. 52). Moreover, it must have been some considerable time after 25 Jan. 51, as the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th acclamations

* Of course, if this be so, there is a contradiction between Ac 1 and 2, and it becomes more probable (a) that Ac 1 is from a separate tradition from source B; (b) that source B, like A, was a written document when used by Luke.

† Secondary evidence is to be found in Mt 28, Jn 21, and the 'Gospel of Peter,' but Mark is the primary evidence.

* See F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews, London, 1881, p. 130.

† First published by A. Nikitsky in Russian, in Epigraphical Studies at Delphi, Odessa, 1898, and now most accessible in Deissmann's Paulus, Tübingen, 1911.

all came in the 11th tribunician year, and the 25th acclamation has not yet been found, so that really the end of 51 is the earliest probable date for the 26th acclamation. Thus the Delphi inscription must be placed between the end of 51 and 1 Aug. 52. At this time Gallio was in office. The proconsul usually entered on his office in the middle of the summer (cf. Mommsen, Rom. Staatsrecht<sup>3</sup>, ii. [Leipzig, 1888] 256), and normally held it for one year only, though sometimes he continued in it for another term. According to this, Gallio must have come to Corinth in July 51. Twelve months later is not absolutely impossible, though it is improbable, for we do not know whether Claudius had been acclaimed for a long or a short time before 1 Aug. 52, merely that by then his 27th acclamation had taken place. According to Ac 18<sup>12</sup>, St. Paul's trial took place Γαλλίωνος δὲ ἀνθυπάτου ὄντος, and this is usually taken to mean 'as soon as Gallio became proconsul.' Probably this is correct exegesis, though scarcely an accurate translation; and, if so, St. Paul's trial must have been in the summer of 51, or, with later date for Gallio, in the summer of 52.

4. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome.—According to Ac 18<sup>1</sup>, the Emperor Claudius banished all Jews from Rome. The same fact is mentioned by Suetonius (Claudius, 25), who says: 'Indæos, impulsore Chresto, assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit,' but no date is given. Tacitus does not mention the fact; nor does Josephus. Orosius (VII. vi. 15) states that it was in the ninth year of Claudius, which probably means Sept. 49–Sept. 50. He states that this date is derived from Josephus, which is clearly a mistake, unless he is referring to some other writer of that name (cf. Deissmann, Paulus), but the date agrees very well with that of Gallio's proconsulate; for, if the trial before Gallio was in Aug. 51, and St. Paul had been in Corinth 18 months (Ac 18<sup>12</sup>), the Apostle must have reached Corinth in April 50, at which time Aquila had just arrived in consequence of the decree of Claudius.

5. The arrival of Festus in Judæa.—This date is unfortunately surrounded by great difficulties. The facts are as follows: Eusebius, in his Chronicon, places the arrival of Festus in the second year of Nero, which probably means not Oct. 55–Oct. 56—the true second year of his reign—but, according to the Eusebian plan of reckoning, Sept. 56–Sept. 57. Josephus states that Felix, whom Festus replaced, was prosecuted on his return to Rome, but escaped owing to the influence of Pallas his brother. But Pallas was dismissed, according to Tacitus, before the death of Britannicus, and Britannicus was, also according to Tacitus, just 14 years old. Britannicus was born in Feb. 41, so that Festus must have entered on his office, according to this reckoning, before A.D. 55. Nevertheless, Josephus appears to place the greater part of the events under Felix in Nero's reign, and this can hardly be the case if he retired before Nero had reigned for three months. It is thought, therefore, either that Tacitus made a mistake as to the age of Britannicus, or that Pallas retained considerable influence even after his fall. Various other arguments have been used, but none is based on exact statements or has any real value. Thus, in view of the fact that the combination of statements in Josephus and Tacitus seems to give no firm basis for argument, we have only Eusebius and general probability to use. General probability really means in this case considering whether the Eusebian date fits in with the date of St. Paul's trial by Gallio, and has, therefore, most of the faults of circular reasoning. Still, the Eusebian date comes out of this test fairly well. St. Paul was tried by Gallio in

Aug. A.D. 51. We may then reconstruct as follows:—

Trial by Gallio—Aug. 51.
Corinth to Antioch—end of 51.
Arrival at Ephesus—summer of 52.
Departure from Ephesus and arrival at Corinth—autumn of 54.
Arrival at Jerusalem and arrest—summer of 55.
Two years' imprisonment—55 to summer 57.
Trial before Festus—summer 57.

In view of the evidence as to Gallio, this is the earliest possible chronology, unless we suppose that two years in prison means June 55–summer 56, which is, indeed, part of two years, though it is doubtful whether it could have been described as διετίας πληρωθείσης—the phrase used in Ac 24<sup>7</sup>.

Summary.—These are the only data in Acts for which any high degree of probability can be claimed. The date of Gallio is by far the most certain. If we combine with them the further data in Galatians, we obtain a reasonably good chronology as far back as the conversion of St. Paul. The second visit to Jerusalem in Galatians is identical either with the time of the famine or with that of the Council. If the former, it can be placed in +46, if the latter, in +48; and the conversion was either 14 or 17 years before this, according to the exegesis adopted for the statements in Galatians; though, owing to the ancient method of reckoning, 14 may mean a few months more than 12, and 17 a few months more than 15. Thus the earliest date for the conversion would be A.D. 31, the latest 36.

It should, however, be remembered that the period of 14 years reckoned between the first and second visits of St. Paul to Jerusalem depends entirely on the reading ΔΙΑΙΔΕΤΩΝ in Gal 2<sup>1</sup>, which might easily have been a corruption for ΔΙΑΔΕΤΩΝ (= 'after 4 years'), and that the 14 years in question are always a difficulty, as events seem to have moved rapidly before and after that period, but during it to have stood relatively still. The possibility ought not to be neglected that the conversion was 10 years later than the dates suggested, i.e. in 41 or 46. This is especially important, in view of the fact that the evidence of Josephus as to the marriage of Herod and Herodias suggests that the death of John the Baptist, and therefore the Crucifixion, were later than has usually been thought (see K. Lake, 'Date of Herod's Marriage with Herodias and the Chronology of the Gospels,' in Expositor, 8th ser. iv. [1912] 462).

LITERATURE.—For literature on the subject see A. Harnack, Chronologie, Leipzig, 1897–1904, i. 233–9; the art. in HDB on 'Chronology' by C. H. Turner (older statements are almost entirely based on K. Wieseler's Chronol. des apost. Zeitalters, Hamburg, 1848); C. Clemen, Paulus, Giessen, 1904.

VII. THE THEOLOGY OF ACTS.—The theology of Acts is, on the whole, simple and early, showing no traces of Johannine, and surprisingly few of Pauline, influence. In common with all other canonical writings, it regards the God of the Christians as the one true God, who had revealed Himself in time past to His chosen people the Jews; and it identifies Jesus with the promised Messiah, who will come from heaven to judge the world, and to inaugurate the Kingdom of God on the earth. There is, however, just as in the Third Gospel, a noticeably smaller degree of interest in the Messianic kingdom than in Mk. and Mt., and a proportionately increased interest in the Spirit. This may probably be explained as due to the fact that the writer belonged to a more Gentile circle than those in which Mk. and Mt. were written. It is strange that in some respects Acts is less 'Gentile' or 'Greek' than the Epistles. This is partially explained by the fact that much of so-called Paulinismus has been read into the Epistles; but, even when an allowance has been made for this fact, the difficulty remains. The points on which the theology of Acts requires discussion in detail are its christology, eschatology, attitude to the OT and Jewish Law, doctrine of the Spirit, and doctrine of baptism.

1. Christology.—In Acts Jesus is recognized as the Christ, but the Christology belongs to an early type. There is no suggestion of the Logos-Christology of the Fourth Gospel, or even of the Epistles of the Captivity. 'The Christ' appears to have the quite primitive meaning of 'the king of the kingdom of God, who is appointed by God to judge the world' (cf. ἔστησεν ἡμέραν ἐν ἣ ἡ μέλλει κρίνειν τὴν οἰκουμένην ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ ἐν ἀνδρὶ ᾧ ὤρισεν, πίστιν παρασχὼν πᾶσιν ἀναστήσας αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, 17<sup>31</sup>). At what point Jesus became Christ, according to Acts, is not quite clear. Harnack (Neue Untersuchungen zur Apostelgesch., p. 75 ff.) thinks that Luke regarded the Resurrection as the moment, in agreement with one interpretation of Ro 1<sup>4</sup>. In favour of this view can be cited Ac 13<sup>31-2</sup> (St. Paul's speech at Antioch in Pisidia), ταυτην [i.e. ἐπαγγελίαν] ὁ θεὸς ἐκπεπλήρωκεν τοῖς τέκνοις ἡμῶν ἀναστήσας Ἰησοῦν, ὡς καὶ ἐν τῷ ψαλμῷ γέγραπται τῷ δευτέρῳ υἱὸς μου εἶ σύ, ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε, which, strictly interpreted, must mean that Jesus became God's Son at the Resurrection, for in the context ἀναστήσας can be given no other translation. On the other hand, it must be remembered that many critics think that this same quotation from Ps 2 is connected with the Baptism in Lk 3-*,<sup>1</sup> in which case the further quotation in Lk 4<sup>18</sup>, πνεῦμα κυρίου ἐπ' ἐμέ, οὗ ἐνεκεν ἔχρισέν με, κτλ., acquires increased force, for the connexion of ἐχρίσεν with Χριστός is obvious. This, again, reflects light on Ac 10<sup>38</sup> (ὡς ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεὸς πνευματικῇ ἀγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει) and the similar phrase in 4<sup>27</sup>. It must remain a problem for critics how far this difference between Ac 13<sup>31-2</sup> and 10<sup>38</sup> and 4<sup>27</sup> is accidental (or merely apparent), and how far it is justifiable to connect it with the fact that Ac 13 (which agrees with Ro 1<sup>4</sup>) belongs to the Pauline source, while Ac 4 and 10 belong to the Jerusalem source A and the closely connected or identical Jerusalem-Cæsarean source (which agree with at all events one interpretation of the meaning of the Baptism in Mk 1).

The possible difference must, however, in any case not be exaggerated. The whole of early Christian literature outside Johannine influence is full of apparent inconsistencies, because Χριστός sometimes means 'the person who is by nature and predestination the appointed Messiah,' sometimes more narrowly 'the actual Messiah reigning in the Kingdom of God.' In the former sense it was possible to say εἶναι τὸν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν† (Ac 18<sup>28</sup>), or that ἔδει παθεῖν τὸν Χριστὸν (17<sup>3</sup>). In the latter sense it was possible to speak of Jesus as τον προκεχειρισμένον ὑμῖν Χριστὸν (3<sup>20</sup>), where, in the light of the whole passage, the τὸν προκεχειρισμένον ὑμῖν most probably has reference to the Resurrection, though other interpretations are possible; or to say κύριον αὐτὸν καὶ Χριστὸν ἐποίησεν ὁ θεὸς τοῦτον τὸν Ἰησοῦν (2<sup>36</sup>), which with less doubt may be referred to the Resurrection. The point seems to be that, on the one hand, Luke wishes to say that Jesus is the Christ, and that, on the other, he does not wish to say that the life of Jesus was the Messianic Parousia or 'Coming,' and does wish to say that by the Resurrection Jesus became the heavenly, glorious Being who would come shortly to judge the world.

It should be noted, as an especially archaic characteristic, that in Acts Ἰησοῦς Χριστός is not used as a name except in the phrase τὸ ὄνομα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (2<sup>38</sup> 3<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 8<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 15<sup>36</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>); elsewhere Χριστός is always predicative. In this respect Acts seems to be more archaic than the Pauline Epistles.

The death of the Christ has in Acts but little theological importance. In one place only (20<sup>-3</sup> τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ κυρίου [but θεοῦ N B vg, a few other authorities, and the TR] ἦν περιεποιησάτο διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ ἰδίου) is there anything which approaches the Pauline doctrine, and it is noticeable that this passage is from the speech of Paul to the Ephesian elders. In the speeches of Peter and Stephen, the death of the Christ is regarded as a wicked act of the Jews rather than as a necessary part of a plan of salvation. The most important passage is 3<sup>17-18</sup>: καὶ νῦν, ἀδελφοί, οἶδα ὅτι κατὰ ἄγνοιαν ἐπράξατε, ὥσπερ καὶ οἱ ἄρχοντες ὑμῶν. ὁ δὲ θεὸς ἂν προκατήγγειλεν διὰ στόματος πάντων τῶν προφητῶν παθεῖν τὸν Χριστὸν αὐτοῦ ἐπλήρωσεν οὗτος. μετανοήσατε οὖν, καὶ ἐπιστρέψατε, πρὸς τὸ ἐξαλειφθῆναι ὑμῶν τὰς ἁμαρτίας, ὅπως ἂν ἔλθωσι καιροὶ ἀναψύξεως ἀπὸ προσώπου τοῦ κυρίου καὶ ἀποστείλῃ τὸν προκεχειρισμένον ὑμῖν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν, ὃν δεῖ οὐρανὸν μὲν δέξασθαι ἄχρι χρόνων ἀποκαταστάσεως πάντων, κτλ. Here there is a verbal connexion between the suffering of the Christ and the blotting out of sins, but no suggestion of any causal connexion. The writer says that the Jews put the Messiah to death, as had been foretold, but they did it in ignorance; and, if they repent, this and other sins will be blotted out, and Jesus will come as the predestined Messiah. The cause of the blotting out of sins is here, as in the OT prophets, repentance and change of conduct (ἐπιστρέψατε); nothing is said to suggest that this would not have been effective without the suffering of the Messiah.

2. Eschatology.—There is comparatively little in Acts which throws light on the eschatological expectation of the writer. As compared with Mark or St. Paul, he seems to be less eschatological, but traces of the primitive expectation are not wanting. In 1<sup>11</sup> the Parousia of the Messiah is still expected: 'This Jesus who has been taken up into Heaven shall so come as ye have seen him go into Heaven'; and, though it is not here stated that the witnesses of the Ascension shall also live to see the Parousia, this seems to be implied. The same sort of comment can be made on 3<sup>-16</sup> and 17<sup>31</sup>; but otherwise there is little in Acts to bear on the eschatological expectation. This was, indeed, to be expected in a book written by Luke, who in his Gospel greatly lessened the eschatological elements found in Mark and Q.

3. The OT and Jewish Law.—For the writer of Acts the OT was the written source of all revelation. The sufficient proof of any argument or explanation of any historical event was to be found in the fact that it had been prophesied. Like all Greek-writing Christians, he uses the LXX and does not stop to ask whether it is textually accurate.

But a distinction must be made between the OT as prophecy and the OT as Law. In the latter sense the position taken up in Acts is that the Law of the OT is binding in every detail on Jewish Christians, but not binding at all on Gentile Christians. The most remarkable example of this is the picture given in ch. 25 of St. Paul's acceptance of the Law in Jerusalem, and the circumcision of Timothy. Whether this can be reconciled with the Apostle's own position is a point for students of the Epistles to settle; the present

* The text is doubtful: the editors usually give σὺ εἰ δὲ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπῶς, ἐν σοὶ ἠγάπησα with N B L 33 fam 1, fam 13, and the mass of MSS (i.e. the II and K texts, and at least two important branches of I [J and Hr]), but Harnack prefers to read the quotation from Ps 2 with D a b c ff al. Aug. Clem<sup>alex</sup>. (thus possibly the text of I and certainly of a text coeval with I-H-K [if such a text existed]); probably he is right.

† This must mean that the Messiah (of whom all men know) is Jesus (of whom they had previously not heard); and emphasizes the fact that, whereas Christology means to most people of this generation an attempt to give an adequate doctrinal statement of Jesus, it meant for the earliest generation an attempt to show that Jesus adequately fulfilled an already existing doctrinal definition of the Messiah.

writer believes that in this respect Acts gives a faithful representation of St. Paul's own view (see the admirable discussion in Harnack, Apostelgesch., pp. 8 and 211-217). The reason for thinking that the Law was still binding on Jews but not on Gentiles must be sought in a distinction between the Law as source of salvation—it was not this for any one—and the Law as command of God—this it was for the Jew, but not for the Gentile.

As prophecies, the OT books are accepted without question, and there is no trace of the Jewish controversy which raised the dispute as to the correct exegesis of the OT. This controversy can be traced in the Epistle of Barnabas, and found its extreme result in the attitude of Marcion, but in Acts it cannot be found, and apparently this is because the dispute had not yet arisen. (For the best summary of this question see Harnack, Apostelgesch., p. 8 n.)

4. The Spirit.—It is not quite clear whether Acts regards all Christians as inspired by the Holy Spirit, but it is at least certain that it regards this as true of all the leaders, and of all who were fully Christians. It would appear possible, however, from such episodes as that of the Christians in Ephesus who had been baptized only in John's baptism, that a kind of imperfect Christianity was recognized; these Ephesians are described as μαθητάς, even before they had been baptized. On the other hand, the inadequacy of their baptism was discovered by St. Paul because they had not received the Spirit, so that even from this passage it would seem that Christians were regarded normally as inspired by the Holy Spirit. This Holy Spirit is usually referred to as τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον or τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα (21 times), or as τὸ πνεῦμα (9 times), or as πνεῦμα ἅγιον (16 times), once as πνεῦμα κυρίου, once as τὸ πνεῦμα κυρίου, and once as τὸ πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ.

A problem which has as yet scarcely received the attention which it deserves is, whether the Spirit was regarded as one or many (or, in other words, what is the difference between τὸ πνεῦμα and πνεῦμα). The exact meaning of the very important phrase τὸ πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ is also obscure. Was it the Spirit which had been in Jesus, with which God had anointed (ἐχρίσεν) Him? Or was it the Spirit-Jesus, as He had become after the Resurrection, in agreement with the Pauline phrase 'The Lord is the Spirit' (2 Co 3<sup>1</sup>)? In any case it is clear that the gift of the Spirit was regarded as in some sense the work of the exalted Jesus (Ac 2<sup>33</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>49</sup>) but ultimately derived from God.

A further development is found in Acts—that the gift of the Spirit can be ensured either by baptism (see § 5) or, more probably, by the 'laying on of hands' of the Apostles (ἐπιθεῖς χειρῶν; cf. 8<sup>17ff.</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 19<sup>6</sup>), though this power, if one may judge from 8<sup>17ff.</sup>, was not shared by all other Christians.

This developed doctrine of the Spirit is the most marked feature of Acts, and the Lucan Gospel is clearly intended to lead up to it. The Christians were inspired by the Holy Spirit, and the Resurrection and Ascension of the Christ are related to this fact, rather than, as seems to be the case in Mark, to the coming of the Messianic kingdom. It is true that in Ac 2 the gift of the Spirit and the consequent glossolalia are explained as a sign that the last days are at hand, but the whole tendency of the Acts is to look on the possession of the Spirit as the characteristic of the Church, rather than of an eschatological kingdom, and the work of Christ is already regarded as the foundation of this inspired Church in the world, rather than as the inauguration of the Kingdom of God instead of the world. In some respects Luke is more archaic than St. Paul, but not in this.

** Copyright, 1916, by

5. Baptism.—There is no doubt that the writer of Acts regarded baptism as the normal means of entry into the Christian Church. There is also no doubt that he represents an early stage of Christian practice in which baptism was 'in the name of the Lord Jesus' (or 'of Jesus Christ'), not in the triadic formula (Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>). This agrees with the practice of St. Paul so far as it can be discovered (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Gal 3<sup>2</sup>; cf. 1 Co 1<sup>14ff.</sup>), with Didache 8 (but not 7), Hermas, Sim. ix. 17. 4, and the Eusebian text (if that refer, as is probable, to baptism) of Mt 28<sup>19</sup> (but not with the usual text of this passage, or with the later Christian practice). Difficulty is, however, raised by the question whether the writer (or his sources) makes the gift of the Spirit depend on baptism or on the laying on of hands, either invariably or as a general rule. It is, on the whole, most probable that he regards baptism as a necessary preliminary to the gift of the Spirit, but not as the direct means by which the Spirit was given, whereas the 'laying on of hands' was the direct means of imparting this gift; though, under some exceptional circumstances, the gift was directly conferred by God without any ministerial interposition.

The passages which seem at first to identify baptism with the gift of the Spirit are especially Ac 2<sup>38</sup> and 19<sup>2-6</sup>. In 2<sup>38</sup> St. Peter says: 'Repent and be baptized . . . and ye shall receive the gift of the Spirit.' This seems decisive, but in the context we are not told that those baptized received the Spirit—only that they were added to the Church. Was this the same thing for the writer? Or did he mean that after reception into the Church they would receive it? In the same way in Ac 19<sup>2-6</sup> St. Paul asks the Ephesians whether they have not received the Spirit; and, hearing that this is not so, he inquires further into their baptism. Nevertheless, in the end, the gift of the Spirit in their case is directly connected with the 'laying on of hands.' This conclusion is, of course, supported by the other passages in which baptism and the gift of the Spirit are distinguished: of these 8<sup>17ff.</sup> and 10<sup>4</sup> are the most important. (A full discussion will be found in ERE ii. 382 ff.)

LITERATURE.—See at the end of the various sections and throughout the article.

KIRSOPP LAKE.

**ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (Apocryphal).—

I. INTRODUCTORY.—The most important of the Apocryphal Acts are the five (Peter, Paul, John, Andrew, Thomas) which sometimes are referred to as 'the Leucian Acts,' because they are supposed to have been composed by a certain Leucius. Before they can be discussed separately, it is therefore necessary to deal with the problem of the Leucian corpus, and inquire whether such a collection existed in early times, what was its nature, and how far the name of 'Leucian' may be applied to it. The direct source of the later tradition that there was a Leucian corpus is no doubt a statement of Photius (Bibliotheca, cod. 114):

ἀνεγνωσθῆ βιβλίον, αἱ λεγόμεναι τῶν ἀποστόλων περιόδοι, ἐν αἷς περιέχοντο πράξεις Πέτρου, Ἰωάννου, Ἀνδρέου, Θωμᾶ, Παύλου· γράφει δὲ αὐτὰς, ὡς δηλοῖ τὸ αὐτοῦ βιβλίον, Λευκίος Χάρινος.

From this it is plain that Photius had seen a corpus of Acts, and interpreted some passage in the text to mean that the five Acts were all written by Leucius Charinus. It is therefore desirable to examine earlier literature for (1) mention of Leucius, (2) mention of the five Acts of Peter, John, Andrew, Thomas, and Paul, either as a corpus or as separate writings.

1. References to Leucius.—i. IN THE EAST.—Epiphanius (Panar. li. 6), when speaking of the Alogi, mentions as famous heretics Cerinthus and Ebion, Merinthus and Cleobius or Cleobulus, Claudius, Demas, and Hermogenes, and says they were controverted by St. John καὶ τῶν ἀμφὶ αὐτὸν, Λευκίου καὶ ἄλλων πολλῶν. Presumably, therefore, Epiphanius was acquainted with some book in which Leucius appeared as a companion of St. John, but it will be noted that he does not suggest that Leucius was in any way heretical, but rather that he controverted heretics. Apart from this solitary mention there is no trace of Leucius in Greek Christian writings until Photius.

Charles Scribner's Sons.

ii. IN THE WEST.—It is quite different in the West; here there is a series of witnesses to Leucius. (1) Pacian († c. 390), bishop of Barcelona.—In Ep. iii. 3 Pacian writes to Semp. Novatianus concerning the Proclan party of the Montanists,* who claimed some connexion with Leucius, which Pacian denied; and the natural interpretation of his words seems to be that he regarded Leucius as an orthodox Christian to whom the Montanists tried to attach their origin; but the passage is obscure:

‘Et primum hi plurimis utuntur auctoribus; nam puto et Graecus Blastus ipsorum est. Theodotus quoque et Praxeas vestros aliquando docuere: ipsi illi Phryges [i.e. Montanists] nobiliores, qui se animatos mentiuntur a Leucio, se institutos a Proculo gloriantur.’

(2) Augustine.—In the contra Felicem, ii. 6, written earlier in the 5th cent., Augustine says:

‘Habetis etiam hoc in scripturis apocryphis, quas canon quidem catholicus non admittit, vobis autem [i.e. the Manichæans] tanto graviore sunt, quanto a catholico canone secluduntur . . . in actibus scriptis a Leucio (codd. ‘Leutio’) quos tamquam actus apostolorum scribit, habes ita positum: “etenim speciosa figmenta et ostentatio simulata et coactio visibilium nec quidem ex propria natura procedunt, sed ex eo homine qui perseipsum exterior factus est per seductionem.”’

As is shown later, Augustine was acquainted with the Apocryphal Acts of Peter, Andrew, Thomas, John, and Paul, of which the first four were accepted only by Manichæans, the last (Paul) probably by Catholics also. There is nothing, however, to show from which he is quoting here, and the passage is not in any of the extant fragments. Thomas is excluded, as we probably have the complete text, and the passage is unlike what we possess of the Acts of Peter or Paul. It is therefore probable, as Schmidt argues (Alle Petrusakten, p. 50), that he is referring to Andrew or John—the two Acts for which the Leucian authorship is otherwise most probable. But the point is not certain, and the possibility remains that he is referring to a Manichæan corpus of Acts, collected by Leucius.

(3) Euodius of Uzala.—In the de Fide contra Manichæos, ch. 38 (printed in Augustine’s works [ed. Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. xlii.]), written by Euodius, the contemporary of Augustine, the Acts of Andrew is attributed to Leucius. The full quotation is given by Schmidt (p. 53), who thinks that it probably, though not certainly, implies that Euodius also regarded Leucius as the author of a corpus of Acts, but argues that this opinion was probably based only on an interpretation of the passage of Augustine quoted above. However this may be, it remains clear that Euodius regarded the Acts of Andrew as Manichæan and the work of Leucius.

(4) Innocent I.—In a rescript of 405 to Exsuperius, bishop of Toulouse, Innocent says:

‘Cetera autem quae vel sub nomine Matthiae vel sub nomine Iacobi minoris, vel sub nomine Petri et Iohannis quae a quodam Leucio scripta sunt [vel sub nomine Andreae quae a Nexocharide et Leonida philosophis], vel sub nomine Thomae et si qua sunt alia (v.l. talia), non solum repudianda verum etiam noveris damnanda.’

The words enclosed in brackets are probably an interpolation (see Zahn, Acta Joannis, 209), and Nexocharides and Leonidas the philosophers are otherwise unknown persons. The text is certainly not quite in order, but Leucius is clearly indicated as the author of the Acts of Peter and of John.

* From pseudo-Tertullian, Refut. omn. Har. viii. 19, x. 26, it appears that some Montanists were κατὰ Πρόκλον, others κατὰ Λισχίνην (see Th. Zahn, Acta Joannis, p. lxvi, n. 1).

(5) The Decretum Gelasianum (6th cent.).—After rejecting as apocryphal the Acts of Andrew, Thomas, Peter, and Philip, the writer goes on to give a list of Apocryphal Gospels, and then continues: ‘Libri omnes quos fecit Leucius discipulus diaboli, apocryphi.’ As there follow several Manichæan writings, it is tolerably certain that here, as elsewhere, ‘disciple of the devil’ means ‘Manichæan,’ but it is not clear to which books reference is made. There is a slight presumption that the books made by Leucius are not identical with any already mentioned, and this would suggest either the Acts of John, which are not otherwise mentioned, or possibly the Acts of Pilate, which in the Latin version are connected with the name of Leucius Charinus. Schmidt, however, while thinking that the Acts of John are certainly intended, is inclined to believe that the writer may have meant the whole Manichæan collection.

(6) Turribius of Astorga (c. 450).—In a correspondence with his fellow-bishops, Idacius and Creponius, Turribius discusses the literature of the Manichæans and Priscillianists. Among these he mentions ‘Actus illos qui vocantur S. Andreae, vel illos qui appellantur S. Ioannis, quos sacrilego Leucius ore conscripsit, vel illos qui dicuntur S. Thomae et his similia, etc.’ Here clearly Leucius is regarded as the author of the Acts of John, and presumably not of the others—though, if a certain laxity of syntax be conceded, the Acts of Andrew might be added—certainly not of the Acts of Thomas.

(7) Mellitus.—The writer of a late Catholic version of the Acts, who took to himself the name of Mellitus, probably intending to identify himself with Melito of Sardis (c. 160–190), says: ‘Volo sollicitam esse fraternitatem vestram de Leucio quodam qui scripsit apostolorum actus, Ioannis evangelistae et sancti Andreae vel Thomae apostoli, etc.’; so that he must have regarded Leucius as the author of these three Acts, but there is no suggestion of the full corpus of five. Schmidt thinks that he probably derived his knowledge from the letter of Turribius and a list of heretical writings, which was once annexed to it, though it has now disappeared; the letter was probably taken up into the works of Leo, with whom Turribius corresponded (see Schmidt, p. 61). It does not appear probable from internal evidence that Mellitus had any first-hand knowledge of the Apocryphal Acts.

(8) Further traces of Leucius, under the corrupt form of Seleucus, can perhaps be traced in pseudo-Hieronymus, Ep. ad Chromatium et Heliodorum, and in literature dependent upon it (see Schmidt, p. 62); but no importance can be attached to this late and inferior composition.

It would appear from these data that (a) the earliest traditions connected Leucius with St. John, and did not regard him as heretical. (b) A quite late tradition regarded him as the author of the corpus of five Acts—Paul, Peter, John, Andrew, and Thomas—which the Manichæans used as a substitute for the canonical Acts, and the Priscillianists in addition to the canonical Acts. (c) External evidence suggests that Leucius was probably the author of the Acts of John, and, with less clearness, of Andrew, but not of Peter, Paul, or Thomas; and this conclusion is supported by internal evidence.

2. The evidence for the Acts as a collection.—

i. IN THE WEST.—(1) Philastrius of Brescia (383–391).—In his Liber de Haeresibus, 88, we have the earliest evidence for a corpus of Apocryphal Acts. He begins by referring to those who use ‘apocrypha, id est secreta,’ instead of the canonical OT and NT, and mentions as the chief of those who do this the ‘Manichaei, Gnostici, Nicolaitae, Valentiniani et alii quam plurimi qui apocrypha prophetarum et apostolorum, id est Actus separatos habentes, canonicas legere scripturas contemnunt.' Later on he gives more details in a passage where the text is unfortunately clearly corrupt:

'Nam Manichaei apocrypha beati Andreae apostoli, id est Actus quos fecit veniens de Ponto in Greciam [quos] conscripserunt tunc discipuli sequentes beatum apostolum, unde et habent Manichaei et alii tales Andreae beati et Joannis actus evangelistae beati et Petri similiter beatissimi apostoli et Pauli pariter beati apostoli: in quibus quia signa fecerunt magna et prodigia, etc.'

Whatever may be the true text of this passage, it clearly implies (a) that the Manichaeans used a corpus of Apocryphal Acts in place of the canonical Acts of the Apostles; (b) that this corpus contained the Acts of Andrew, John, Peter, and Paul; (c) the Acts of Thomas is not mentioned (Schmidt [p. 44] thinks that this is merely accidental); (d) Leucius is not mentioned.

(2) Augustine.—In the controversial writings of Augustine against the Manichaeans there are many allusions to the Apocryphal Acts. Reference may especially be made to (a) the de Sermone Domini in Monte (i. 20, 65), in which allusions can be traced to the Acts of Thomas; (b) the contra Adimantum, 17, where allusions to the Acts of Thomas and Acts of Peter can be identified; (c) the contra Faustum Manicheum (lib. xiv. and xxx.); (d) the contra Felicem; and (e) the de Civitate Dei. Schmidt (44 ff.) has shown, from the consideration of these passages, that the Manichaeans used the five Acts of John, Andrew, Peter, Thomas, and Paul, while the Catholics rejected the first four, but accepted the Acts of Paul. The crucial passage for this conclusion is c. Faustum, xxx. 4, in which Faustus the Manichee says:

'Mitto enim ceteros eiusdem domini nostri apostolos, Petrum et Andream, Thomam et illum inexpertum veneris inter ceteros beatum Johannem . . . sed hos quidem, ut dixi, praetereo, quia eos vos [i.e. the Catholics] exclusistis ex canone, facileque mente sacrilega vestra daemoniorum his potestis importare doctrinas. Num igitur et de Christo eadem dicere poteritis aut de apostolo Paulo, quem similiter ubique constat et verbo semper praetulisse nuptis inuuptas et id opere quoque ostendisse erga sanctissimam Theclam? quodsi haec daemoniorum doctrina non fuit, quam et Theclae Paulus et ceteri ceteris adnuntiaverunt apostoli, cui credi iam poterit hoc ab ipso memoratum, tamquam sit daemoniorum voluntas et doctrina etiam persuasio sanctimonii?'

As Schmidt says, it is clear that Faustus gave up the use of the Acts of Andrew, John, Peter, and Thomas, because his opponents refused to recognize their authority, but relied on a Pauline document relating to Thekla. Before the discovery of the Acts of Paul it was possible to think that this might be the so-called Acts of Paul and Thekla. It is now, however, fairly certain that this latter document in its present form is merely an extract from the older Acts of Paul; there is no reason, therefore, to doubt that Augustine and Faustus both recognized the Acts of Paul, which had not yet been entirely deposed from the Canon.

(3) Innocent I. and Exsuperius.—A correspondence (in A. D. 405) between Innocent I. and Exsuperius, bishop of Toulouse (see the quotation above), shows that the Apocryphal Acts were used in Spain not only by Manichaeans but also by Priscillianists. It is not quite clear to which Acts Innocent refers. Besides mentioning the Acts of Peter and John (of which certainly the latter and probably the former also are ascribed to Leucius), he refers to Acts of Matthias and of James the less, which do not elsewhere appear in the Manichaean corpus, as well as to those of Andrew, which in some texts (see Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, Leipzig, 1888-92, ii. 244 ff.) are ascribed to Nexocharide (v.l. Xenocharide) and Leonidas; Fabricius (Codex Apocryphus, ii. 767) thinks that these names are a corruption of Charinus and Leucius.

(4) Leo the Great and Turribius (440-461).—Forty years after the time of Innocent, the correspondence between Leo and Turribius, bishop of Astorga in Spain, throws more light on the use of the Apocryphal Acts by the Priscillianists. Leo complains that the Priscillianists 'scripturas veras adulterant' and 'falsas inducunt.' Turribius found that the Priscillianists and Manichaeans were making great progress in Spain, and for this reason had elicited a letter of condemnation from Leo. He also expressed himself further in his letters to Idacius and Creponius, and apparently annexed a selection of heretical passages from the Apocryphal Acts to justify his disapproval. This selection is, however, unfortunately no longer extant, but it is plain that he was acquainted with the Acts of Thomas, Andrew, and John (for text see above, 1. (6)). He also refers to a Memoria Apostolorum, 'in quo ad magnam perversitatis suae auctoritatem doctrinam domini mentiuntur, qui totam destruit legem veteris Testamenti et omnia quae S. Moysi de diversis creaturae factorisque divinitus revelata sunt, praeter reliquias eiusdem libri blasphemias quas referre pertaesum est.'

This Memoria Apostolorum is also mentioned by Orosius (Consultatio ad Augustinum, in Patr. Lat. xlii. 667), and Schmidt (p. 50) thinks that it is the source of a quotation from a Manichaean writing which Augustine could not trace:

'Sed Apostolis dominus noster interrogantibus de Iudaeorum prophetis quid sentire deberet, qui de adventu eius aliqui cecinisse in praeteritum putabant, commotus talia eos etiam nunc sentire respondit: 'Demisistis vivum qui ante vos est et de mortuis fabulamini.''

ii. IN THE EAST.—(1) Eusebius.—In HE iii. 25. 6 the Acts of John and Andrew are mentioned together with 'those of the other apostles,' and are regarded as books used by heretics. In iii. 3. 2 the Acts of Peter are mentioned, and in iii. 3. 5 and iii. 25. 4 the Acts of Paul. The Acts of Thomas are not quoted, nor is any reference made to Leucius.

(2) Ephraim Syrus (c. 360).—In his commentary Ephraim says that the apocryphal correspondence between Paul and the Corinthians was written by the followers of Bardesanes, 'in order that under cover of the signs and wonders of the Apostle, which they described, they might ascribe to the name of the Apostle their own godlessness, against which the Apostle had striven.' This apocryphal correspondence was contained in the Acts of Paul, but it also circulated in some Syriac and Armenian NT MSS; no doubt it was an excerpt from the Acts, but it is not clear whether Ephraim knew the Acts or the excerpt. It is, however, much more probable that Ephraim is here referring to the Acts, as the correspondence alone does not seem ever to have been regarded by the Syriac Church as heretical.

(3) Epiphanius.—In the Panarion Epiphanius mentions the Acts of Thomas, Andrew, and John in connexion with the Encratites (Pan. xlvii. 1), the Apostolici (ib. lxi. 1), and other heretics (cf. xxx. 16, lxiii. 2). But there is no sign of any consciousness that there was a Manichaean corpus, or that there was any connexion with Leucius. At the same time a note in Photius (Bibl. cod. 179) states that Agapius used the Acts of Andrew, so that the Eastern Manichaeans must have used at least some of the Acts.

(4) Amphilochius of Iconium (c. 374).—At the Second Council of Nicaea (787) a quotation was read from Amphilochius' lost book περί τῶν ψευδο-επιγράφων τῶν παρὰ αἱρετικῶν, in which he proposed δείξομεν δὲ τὰ βιβλία ταῦτα, ἃ προφέρουσιν ἡμῖν οἱ ἄπιστα-ται τῆς ἐκκλησίας, οὐχὶ τῶν ἀποστόλων πράξεις ἀλλὰ δαιμόνων συγγράμματα. It also appears from the Acts of the Council that the Acts of John was quoted and condemned. It was resolved that no more copies were to be made and those already existing were to be burnt.

(5) John of Thessalonica (c. 680).—In the preface to his recension of the τελειωσις Μαρίας (M. Bonnet, ZWT, 1880, p. 239 ff.), John explains that the Acts of Peter, Paul, Andrew, and John were heretical productions, but seems to argue that they made use of genuine material, just as had been the case with the τελειωσις.

From this evidence, which is given with a full and clear discussion in his Alte Petrusakten (cf. also his Acta Pauli, 112 f.), C. Schmidt draws the following conclusion: (a) The Manichæans had formed a corpus of the five Acts, but were not themselves the authors of any of them. They used this corpus instead of the canonical Acts, and the Priscillianists used it in addition to the Canon. (b) In the course of the struggle between the Manichæans and the Church the view was adopted that the corpus was the work of a certain heretical Leucius. (c) The name of Leucius originally belonged to the Acts of John alone, and was erroneously attributed to the other books. (d) In this way the Acts of Paul, which was originally recognized as orthodox if not canonical, came to be regarded as heretical.

On the evidence as we have it no serious objection can be made to these propositions; it might, however, be a matter for investigation whether the corpus of the Manichæans was also used by the Eastern Manichæans, or was the peculiar possession of the Western branch.

II. THE INDIVIDUAL ACTS.—1. The Acts of Paul.—By far the most important discovery concerning the Apocryphal Gospels in recent years was the Coptic text of the Acts of Paul found by C. Schmidt in the Heidelberg Papyrus 1, and published by him in his Acta Pauli, Leipzig, 1903 (and in a cheaper form without the facsimile of the text, in 1905). This is not indeed complete, and there are still minor problems connected with the order of the incidents, but the main facts are now plain; and the general contents of the Acts may be regarded as roughly established, with the exception of certain rather serious lacunæ, especially at the beginning and in the middle. The contents, as we have them, can be divided most conveniently as follows:

(1) In Antioch.—Paul is in the house of a Jew named Ancharos and his wife Phila, whose son is dead. Paul restores the boy to life, and makes many converts; but he is suspected of magic, and a riot ensues in which he is ill-treated and stoned. He then goes to Iconium.

(2) In Iconium (the Thekla-story).—Here the well-known story of Thekla is placed, and on the way to Iconium we are introduced to Demas and Hermogenes, who are represented as Gnostics with a peculiar doctrine of an ἀνάστασις not of the flesh. In Iconium Paul was entertained by Onesiphorus, and preached in his house on ἀνάστασις and ἐγκράτεια, with the result that Thekla, the daughter of Theokleia, abandoned her betrothal to Thamyras and vowed herself to a life of virginity. Theokleia and Thamyras therefore raised persecution against Paul and Thekla. Paul was scourged and banished from the town; Thekla was condemned to be burnt. From the flames she was miraculously preserved, and went to Antioch, where she found Paul. In Antioch her beauty attracted the attention of Alexander, a prominent Antiochian, and her refusal to consent to his wishes led to her condemnation to the wild beasts. A lioness protected her, but ultimately, after a series of miraculous rescues, she was forced to jump into a pond full of seals and committed herself to the water with the baptismal formula. Ultimately the protection of Queen Tryphæna and the sympathy of the women of Antioch secured her pardon. She returned to the house of Tryphæna and converted her and her servants, and then followed Paul in man's clothing to Myrrha. Then she returned to Iconium, and finally died in Seleucia. The text of this whole story is very defective in Coptic, but it is preserved separately in Greek, and enough remains in the Coptic to show that the Greek has kept fairly well to the original story.

(3) In Myrrha.—Thekla left Paul in Myrrha. Here he healed of the dropsy a man named Hermokrates, who was baptized. But Hermippus the elder son of Hermokrates was opposed to Paul, and the younger son, Dion, died. The text is here full of lacunæ, but apparently Paul raised up Dion, and punished Hermippus with blindness, but afterwards healed and converted him. He then went on to Sidon.

(4) In Sidon.—On the road to Sidon there is an incident connected with a heathen altar, and the power of Christians over the demons or heathen gods, but there is unfortunately a large lacuna in the text. In Sidon there is an incident which apparently is concerned with unnatural vice, and Paul and other Christians were shut up in the temple of Apollo. At the prayer of Paul the temple was destroyed, but Paul was taken into the amphitheatre. The text is defective, and the manner of his rescue is not clear, but apparently he made a speech and gained many converts, and then went to Tyre.

(5) In Tyre.—Only the beginning of the story is extant, but apparently the central feature is the exorcism of demons and the curing of a dumb child. After this there is a great lacuna, in which Schmidt places various fragments dealing with the question of the Jewish law; and it appears possible that the scene is moved to Jerusalem and that Peter is also present.

(6) Paul in prison in the mines.—In this incident Paul appears as one of those condemned to work in the mines (? in Macedonia), and he restores to life a certain Phrontina. Presumably he ultimately escaped from his imprisonment, but the text is incomplete.

(7) In Philippi.—The most important incident connected with Philippi is a correspondence with the Corinthians, dealing with certain heretical views, of which the main tenets are (a) a denial of the resurrection of the flesh; (b) the human body is not the creation of God; (c) the world is not the creation of God; (d) the government of the universe is not in the hands of God; (e) the crucifixion was not that of Christ, but of a doctetic phantasm; (f) Christ was not born of Mary, nor was he of the seed of David.

(8) A farewell scene.—The place in which this scene is laid cannot be discerned from the fragments which remain, but it contains a prophecy of Paul's work in Rome, placed in the mouth of a certain Cleobius.

(9) The martyrdom of Paul.—The last episode gives an account of the martyrdom of Paul, and the text of this is also preserved as a separate document in Greek. According to it, Paul preached without any hindrance, and there is no suggestion that he was a prisoner. On one occasion, while he was preaching, Patroclus, a servant of Nero, fell from a window and was killed. Paul restored him, and he was converted. When Nero heard of this miracle, Patroclus acknowledged that he was the soldier of the βασιλεὺς Ἰησοῦς Χριστός. Nero caused him and other Christians to be arrested, condemned Paul to be beheaded, and the other Christians to be burnt. In prison Paul converted the prefect Longinus and the centurion Cestus, and prophesied to them life after death. Longinus and Cestus were told to go to his grave on the next day, when they would be baptized by Titus and Luke. At his execution milk spouted from his neck instead of blood, and afterwards he appeared to Nero, who was so impressed that he ended the persecution. The narrative ends with the baptism of Longinus and Cestus at the grave of Paul.

The testimony of early writers to the Acts of Paul.—Since the discovery of the Coptic Acts, which show that the 'Acts of Paul and Thekla' is an extract from the Acts of Paul, there is no justification for doubting that Tertullian refers to the Acts of Paul in de Baptismo, 17:

'Quodsi qui Pauli perperam inscripta legunt, exemplum Theclae ad licentiam mulierum docendi tinguendique defendunt, sciant in Asia presbyterum, qui eam scripturam construxit quasi titulo Pauli de suo cumulans, convictum atque confessum se id amore Pauli fecisse loco decessisse.'

This statement is extremely valuable, because it gives us clear evidence as to the provenance of the Acts, proves that it is not later than the 2nd cent., and shows that it was composed in the great Church, not in any heretical or Gnostic sect.

Origen quotes the Acts in de Principiis, i. 2, 3, and in in Johannem, xx. 12. In both cases he gives the Acts of Paul definitely as the source of his quotation, but neither passage is found in the extant texts. He apparently regards the Acts as only slightly inferior to the Canonical Scriptures.

Eusebius in HE iii. 25 ranks the Acts of Paul, with the Shepherd of Hermas, Ep. of Barnabas, the Apoc. of Peter, the Didache, and possibly the Johannine Apocalypse, as among the vôtha. But he does not appear to place it with the Acts of Andrew and John and 'the other apostles' (perhaps the Acts of Peter and Thomas) which are ἀποκα πάντη καὶ δυσσεβῇ. Hence he probably did not regard the Acts of Paul as heretical.

In the Claromontane list of books of the OT and NT the Acts of Paul comes at the end in the company of 'Barnabae epistula, Johannis revelatio, Actus Apostolorum, Pastor, Actus Pauli, Revelatio Petri,' which suggests somewhat the same judgment as that of Eusebius.

From the Commentary of Hippolytus on Dn 3<sup>9</sup> it seems clear that he regarded the Acts of Paul as definitely historical and trustworthy. Combating those who doubted the truth of the story of Daniel in the lions' den, he says:

εἰ γὰρ πιστεύομεν ὅτι Παύλου εἰς θηρία κατακριθέντος ἀφέβηθαι ἐπ' αὐτὸν ὁ λέων εἰς τοὺς πόδας ἀναπασσὼν περιέλειχεν αὐτόν, πῶς οὐκ καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ Δανιὴλ γένόμενα πιστεύομεν;

This incident is not extant in the Coptic texts, but a full account, stated to be taken from the Περὶ ὁδοῦ Παύλου, is given by Nicephorus Callistus (cf. Zahn, Gesch. d. NT Kanons, ii. 2. p. 880 ff.), and there is therefore no doubt but that Hippolytus regarded the Acts of Paul as little less than canonical.

Finally, the passage quoted above from Augustine, c. Faust. xxx., makes it clear that in the Church of Africa, as late as the time of Augustine, the Acts of Paul was accepted as authoritative and orthodox, even if not canonical.

The date of the Acts of Paul.—The testimony of early writers furnishes a safe terminus ad quem. The Acts must be earlier than Tertullian's de Baptismo. The precise date of this tractate is uncertain, but at the latest it is only a few years later than A.D. 200, so that the Acts must at all events belong to the 2nd century. The question is whether it is a great deal or a very little earlier. Schmidt is influenced by the frequent use of the canonical Acts and the Pastoral Epistles to choose a date not much earlier than 180; on the other hand, Harnack thinks that the complete silence as to the Montanist movement, or anything which could be construed as anti-Montanist polemics, points to a date earlier than 170. Between these two positions a choice is difficult: probably we cannot really say more than that between 160 and 200 is the most likely period for the composition of the Acts of Paul. (See especially C. Schmidt, Acta Pauli, 176 ff., where the whole question is thoroughly discussed, and reference made to the literature bearing on the subject.)

The theology of the Acts of Paul.—From the theological point of view the Acts of Paul has exceptional value as giving a presentment of the ordinary Christianity of Asia at the end of the 2nd cent., undisturbed by polemical or other special aims.

So far as the doctrine of God is concerned, the teaching of the Acts is quite simple—it is that 'there is one God, and his Son, Jesus Christ,' which is sometimes condensed into the statement that there is no other God save Jesus Christ alone. It is thus in no sense Arian or Ebionite, but at the same time distinctly not Nicene. It is also definitely not Gnostic, for the Supreme God is also the Creator, and the instigator if not the agent of redemption. The general view which is implied is that the world was created good, and man was given the especial favour of being the son of God. This sonship was broken by the Fall, instigated by the serpent. From that moment history became a struggle between God, who was repairing the evil of the Fall, through His chosen people Israel and through the prophets, and the prince of this world, who resisted His efforts, had proclaimed himself to be God (in this way heathen religion was explained), and had bound all humanity to him by the lusts of the flesh. The result of this process was the existence of ἀγνοσία and πλάνη followed by φθόρα, ἀκαθαρσία, ἡδονή, and θάνατος, and the need of an ultimate judgment of God, which would destroy all that was contaminated. But in His mercy God had sent His Holy Spirit into Mary, in order in this way, by becoming flesh, to destroy the dominion of evil over flesh. This Holy Spirit was (as in Justin Martyr) identical with the spirit which had spoken through the Jewish prophets, so that the Christian faith rested throughout on the Spirit, which had given the prophets to the Jews and later on had been incarnate in the Christ who had given the gospel. It should be noted that there is no attempt to distinguish between the Logos and the Spirit. 'Father, Son, and Spirit' is a formula which seems to mean Father, Spirit or Logos, and the Son or Incarnate Spirit. It is clear that this is the popular theology out of which the Sabellian and Arian controversies can best be explained. For the reconstruction of late 2nd cent. Christology in popular circles the Acts of Paul is of unique value. There is also a marked survival of primitive eschatological interest: the expectation of the coming of Christ, and the establishment of a glorious kingdom in which Christians will share, is almost central. The means whereby Christians ensure this result are asceticism and baptism. The latter is probably the necessary moment, and is habitually called the σφραγίς; but asceticism is equally necessary, and involves an absolute abstinence from all sexual relations, even in marriage. There is no trace of any institution of repentance for sin after baptism; for this reason, baptism appears usually to be postponed, and in these respects the Acts of Paul agrees more closely with Tertullian than with Hermas. The Eucharist is primarily a meal of the community, and the theology underlying it is not clearly expressed; the most remarkable feature is that here, as in all the other Apocryphal Acts, water takes the place of wine. This feature used to be regarded as Gnostic, but in view of more extended knowledge of the Acts as a whole this opinion is untenable.

For the best statement of the theology of the Acts is in C. Schmidt's Acta Pauli, 183 ff. This also gives full references to earlier literature.

2. The Acts of Peter.—The Acts of Peter is no longer extant in a complete form. But, apart from late paraphrastic recensions, which re-edit older material in a form more agreeable to Catholic taste, three documents exist, two of them in a fragmentary form, which probably represent portions of the original Acts. These are (1) a Coptic text of a Πράξεις Πέτρου, (2) the Codex Vercellensis, or Actus Petri cum Simone, and (3) a Greek text of the Martyrium Petri.

(1) The Coptic Πράξεις Πέτρου.—This fragment was found by C. Schmidt at the end of the Gnostic Papyrus P. 8502 in the Egyptian Museum at Berlin (Sitzungsber. d. K. Preuss. Akad. xxxvi. [1896] 839 ff.), and published by him in Die alten Petrusakten, Leipzig, 1903. This relates the story of Peter's paralyzed daughter. At the beginning of the incident, Peter, who had been twitted with the paralysis of his daughter in spite of his powers of miraculous healing, cured her for a short time, and then restored her paralytic condition. Having thus shown his power, he explained that she had originally been paralyzed in answer to his own prayer, in order to preserve her virginity, which was threatened by a certain Ptolemæus. By this miracle Ptolemæus had been converted to Christianity, and dying soon afterwards left land to Peter's daughter, which Peter sold, giving the proceeds of it to the poor.

(2) The Codex Vercellensis (Bibliothec. capitul. Vercellensis, cviii. 1).—This MS contains either an extract from or a recension of the last part of the Acts. It begins by describing Paul's departure from Rome to Spain, and the arrival of Simon Magus, who makes Aricia his headquarters. Meanwhile, however, Peter, who had finished 'the twelve years which the Lord had enjoined on him' (on this legend see esp. Harnack's Expansion of Christianity, i. [1904] 48 n.), was directed to go to Rome to oppose Simon. Simon, who was first in Rome, perverted Marcellus, a convert of Paul; and, as soon as Peter arrived, a contest was waged for his faith on the question of the respective powers of Simon and Peter to raise the dead. In this contest, which is long drawn out, Peter was successful, and Simon retreated. Later on, the latter made an effort to restore his reputation by flying in the air, but the prayer of Peter caused him to fall and break his thigh. He was carried to Aricia and thence to Terracina, where he died.

The story then relates the events which led up to the martyrdom of Peter. The main reason was the decision of the converted concubines of Agrippa the prefect to refuse any further intercourse with him, and the similar conduct of Xanthippe the wife of Albinus, a friend of Nero, and of many other wives who all left their husbands. Peter was warned of the anger of Agrippa, and at first was persuaded by the Christians to leave Rome. At this point the Codex Vercellensis is defective, but the missing incidents can be restored from the Martyrium Petri, which overlaps the Codex Vercellensis. From this it appears that Peter on his departure from Rome was arrested by a vision of Christ going to Rome and saying, 'I am going to Rome to be crucified.' Peter therefore applied this vision to himself, and went back to Rome, where he was crucified by the orders of the prefect Agrippa. Here the Codex Vercellensis is again extant, and runs parallel with the Martyrium to the end. Peter at his own request was crucified head downwards, in order to fulfil the saying of the Lord, 'Si non feceritis dextram tamquam sinistram, et sinistram ut dextram, et quae sunt sursum tamquam deorsum, et quae retro sunt tamquam ab ante, non intrabitis in regna coelorum'—a saying which is also found in the Gospel of the Egyptians. After Peter's death Marcellus took down his body and buried it in his own tomb, after costly embalming. But Peter appeared to him in a vision and rebuked him for not having obeyed the precept 'Let the dead bury their dead.' Finally, the narrative explains that Nero was angry with Agrippa because he wished to have inflicted worse tortures on Peter, but, while he was planning further persecution of the Christians, he was deterred by a vision of an angel, so that Peter was the last martyr of that persecution. The Codex ends with the obviously corrupt line 'actus Petri apostoli explicuerunt cum pace et Simonis amen.' Lipsius (Acta Apocrypha, p. 103) suggests with great probability that 'et Simonis' is a misplaced gloss. In this case the 'actus P. apostoli explicuerunt. Amen,' would be the conclusion of the original Acts of Peter, of which the Codex Vercellensis is an extract, giving the Roman episode and martyrdom.

(3) The Martyrium Petri.—The text of this early extract from the Acts of Peter is preserved in two MSS. (a) Cod. Patmiensis 48 (9th cent.). This was copied by C. Krumbacher in 1885 and published by Lipsius in 1886 in the Jahrbücher für Protest. Theologie, pp. 86–106.—(b) Cod. Athous Vatoped. 79 (10th–11th cent.). This was copied by Ph. Meyer and published by Lipsius in his Acta Apocrypha. There are also Slavonic and Coptic (Sahidic) versions, the latter preserved directly in three fragments and indirectly in Arabic and Ethiopic translations (see further Lipsius, Act. Apocr. liv f.). Lipsius thinks that the Patmos MS is the best. The contents of the Martyrium are the same as the second part of the Codex Vercellensis, beginning with Simon's flight in the air, and from the comparison of the Codex with the Greek Martyrium it is possible that the original form of this part of the ancient Acta can be reconstructed with some probability.

The place of origin of the Acts of Peter.—There is no unanimity among critics as to the community in which the Acts of Peter was first produced. There is of course a natural tendency to consider in the first place the possibility that the document is Roman. In favour of this view the most complete statement is that of Erbes ('Petrus nicht in Rom, sondern in Jerusalem gestorben,' ZKG xxii. 1, pp. 1–47 and 2, pp. 161–231). He lays special emphasis on the fact that the writer is acquainted with the entrance to Rome both from the sea and by road, and knows that the paved way from Puteoli to Rome is bad to walk upon and jars the pilgrims who use it. He also emphasizes the correctness of the narrative in placing the contest between Peter and Simon Magus in the Forum Julium, on the ground that, according to Appian (de Bello Civili, ii. 102), this forum was especially reserved for disputes and closed to commerce. He makes other points of a similar nature, but not of so striking a character.

Against this it is urged by Harnack (Altchristl. Literaturgesch. ii. 559) and Zahn (Gesch. des NT Kanons, ii. 841) that the local references to Rome are really very small, and do not give more knowledge than was easily accessible to any one in the 2nd or 3rd century. For instance, that Aricia and Terracina are towns not far from Rome is a fact which must have been quite generally known.

Other arguments seem to point to Asia rather than Rome for the composition of the Acts. Apart from the OT and NT, the books which clearly were made use of by the redactor of the Acts of Peter are the Acts of Paul and the Acts of John. Now we know with tolerable certainty that the Acts of Paul was written in Asia, and it is usually thought that the Acts of John came from Ephesus or the neighbourhood. It is, therefore, not improbable that the Acts of Peter came from the same district. Other possibilities are Antioch or Jerusalem, but there is less to be said in favour of these than either Rome or Asia.

The date of the Acts of Peter.—The terminus ad quem is some time earlier than Commodian the African Christian poet, who was clearly acquainted with both the Acts of Paul and the Acts of Peter, probably in a Latin version, and appears to have regarded them as undoubted history (cf. esp. Commodian, Carmen Apologeticum, 623 ff.). Commodian is generally supposed to have written c. A.D. 250, so that some years earlier than this (to allow for the spread of the Acts, their translation, and the growth of their prestige) is the earliest possible date. The terminus a quo is more difficult to find. It is generally conceded that the date  $\pm$  165 adopted by Lipsius (Apokr. Apostelgesch., ii. 1, p. 275) is too early, and opinion usually fixes on the decennium either side of the year 200 as the most probable for the writing of the Acts. Harnack thinks that early in the 3rd cent. is the most probable time (Altchr. Lit., ii. 553 ff.), but Erbes and C. Schmidt incline rather to the end of the 2nd century. The most important argument is concerned with the compassionate attitude towards the lapsi, which is very marked in the Acts. Harnack thinks that this is not intelligible until 230, while Erbes and Schmidt maintain that in the light of the Shepherd of Hermas a much earlier date is possible. Obviously this sort of reasoning is somewhat tentative, and it is apparently not possible at present to say more than that 180–230 seems to be the half-century within which the composition ought probably to be placed.

The sources used by the Acts of Peter.—Apart from the OT and NT, both of which the writer uses freely and accepts as equally inspired, the use can clearly be traced of the following books. (a) The Acts of Paul. Apart from various smaller points of contact, the whole account of the martyrdom of Peter is clearly based on the martyrdom of Paul. The whole subject is worked out in full detail by C. Schmidt in his Petrusakten (p. 82 ff.); but it should be added that there is perhaps still room for doubt whether that portion of the Codex Vercellensis which deals with Paul really belongs to the Acts of Peter, and is not an addition made by the redactor who formed the excerpt, rather than by the author of the Acts itself. The fullest statement of this possibility is given by Harnack (TU xx. 2 [1900], p. 103 ff.), and a discussion tending to negative his conclusions is to be found in Schmidt's Petrusakten, 82 f. —(b) The Acts of John. The frequent verbal dependence of the Acts of Peter on the Acts of John is demonstrated by the long list of parallel passages given by M. R. James in Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. p. xxiv ff. James, however, thought at that time that this list proved the identity of authorship of the two books; but Schmidt has shown conclusively that the facts must be explained as due to dependence rather than to identity of authorship. His most telling argument is the large use of the OT and NT made by the Acts of Peter as contrasted with their very limited use in the Acts of John. —(c) Schmidt also argues that the Acts used the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου. Probably he is right, but our knowledge of the Κήρυγμα is too small to enable the question to be satisfactorily settled.

The theology of the Acts of Peter.—In general the account given above of the theology of the Acts of Paul will serve also for the Acts of Peter. But in some passages which depend on the Acts of John there is an appearance of a pronounced Modalism or almost of Docetism. Lipsius and others, who believed, with Zahn and James, that the Acts of Peter was written by the author of the Acts of John, used to think that these passages pointed to a heretical and Gnostic origin. But Harnack (Altchr. Lit. ii. 560 ff.) and Schmidt (Petrusakten, p. 111 ff.) have argued very forcibly that this is not the case, and that the Acts of Peter represents the popular Christianity of the end of the 2nd cent. rather than any Gnostic sect.

No complete edition of the text exists: the Codex Vercellensis and the Greek text of the Martyrium are critically edited by R. A. Lipsius in Acta Apocrypha, i. (Leipzig, 1891); the Coptic Πραξεις Πέτρου by C. Schmidt, Die alten Petrusakten (TU xxiv. 1), Leipzig, 1903. Very important is the treatment of Harnack in his Chronologie, 1897, i. 559 ff., and the article of Erbes in ZKG xxii. 1, p. 1 ff. and 2, p. 161 ff. under the title 'Petrus nicht in Rom, sondern in Jerusalem gestorben.'

3. The Acts of John.—Recent research has added much to our knowledge of the Acts of John; and, though the text is fragmentary and uncertain, it is now possible to reconstruct the greater part of the original. No single MS is complete, but, from the comparison of many, the following incidents can be arranged:

(1) In Ephesus.—John comes from Miletus to Ephesus and meets Lykomedes, with whom he lodges. Here Cleopatra, the wife of Lykomedes, dies, and her husband also falls dead from grief, but John raises both to life. Lykomedes obtains a picture of the Apostle, and worships it in his room until John discovers it and shows him his mistake. The next episode at Ephesus is in the theatre, where John makes a long speech and heals many sick. John is then summoned to Smyrna, but determines first to strengthen the Ephesian community. On the feast day of Artemis he goes to the Temple, and after a speech inflicts death on the priest. He then encounters a young man who has killed his father because he had accused him of adultery. John raises the father, and converts both father and son; he then goes to Smyrna.

(2) Second visit to Ephesus.—John returns to Ephesus to the house of Andronicus, who had been converted during his first visit. Drusiana, the wife of Andronicus, dies from the annoyance caused her by a young man Kallimachus, but after her burial John goes to the tomb and sees Christ appear as a young man; he is instructed to raise up Drusiana and also a young man, Fortunatus, who has been buried in the same place. Fortunatus is, however, not converted, and soon dies again.

(3) The most important fragment of the Acts is that which seems to follow upon the episode of Drusiana, as she remains one of the chief persons. This was discovered in 1886 by M. R. James in Cod. Vind. 63 (written in 1324) and published in 1897 in TS v. 1. It gives a long and extremely Docetic account of the Passion of Christ, and of a revelation which the true Christ made to the disciples while the phantasmal Christ was being crucified, and includes a hymn which was used, among others, by the Priscillianists (Augustine, Ep. 237 [253]).

(4) The death of John.—During the Sunday worship John makes a speech, and partakes with the brethren of the Eucharist. He then orders his grave to be dug, and after prayer, and emphasis on his virgin life, lies down in the grave and either dies or passes into a permanent trance.

The testimony of early writers, and the date of the Acts of John.—The earliest writer to use the Acts of John is Clement of Alexandria. In the Adumbrationes to 1 Jn 1<sup>1</sup> (ed. Potter, p. 1009) he says:

'Fatur ergo in traditionibus quoniam Johannes ipsum corpus quod erat extrinsecus tangens manum suam in profunda misisse et ei duritiam carnis nullo modo reluctatam esse sed locum manui tribuisse discipuli.'

This is a certain reference to the Acts of John (ed. Bonnet, 195 f.), and these Latin 'adumbrationes' are generally recognized as derived from the Hypotyposes. A similar reference, but less certain, is in Strom. vi. 9. 71:

ἀλλ' ἐπὶ μὲν τοῦ σωτήρος τὸ σῶμα ἀπαίτε'ν ὡς σῶμα τὰς ἀνγκαίας ὑπηρεσίας εἰς δαιμονιὴν γελῶς ἀν εἶη, ἔφαγεν γὰρ οὐ διὰ τὸ σῶμα, δυνάμει συνεχόμενον ἁγία, ἀλλ' ὡς μὴ τοὺς συνοῦντας ἄλλως περὶ αὐτοῦ φρονεῖν ὑπεισελθεῖν, ὡσπερ ἀμέλει νωτερον δοκῇσι τινες αὐτὸν πεφάερωσθαι ὑπελαβόν, αὐτὸς δὲ ἀπαξάπλως ἀπαθῆς ἦν εἰς ὃν οὐδὲν παρὲσδύεται κίνημα παθητικόν, κτλ.

Perhaps later than Clement, but probably early in the 3rd cent., is the writer of the Monarchian Prologues, in which the statement as to John, 'qui virgo electus a Deo est quem de nuptiis volentem nubere vocavit Deus,' clearly refers to the Acts of John (ed. Bonnet), p. 212: ὁ θέλοντί μοι ἐν νεότητι γῆμαι ἐπιφάνεις καὶ εἰρηκῶς μοι, Χρήζω σου, Ἰωάννη. It is noteworthy that neither Clement nor the author of the Prologues seems to have any consciousness that he has used a source of doubtful orthodoxy.

Later on, Augustine and other writers against the Manichæans make tolerably frequent mention of the Acts; a full collection of all the quotations is given by Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. i. 83 ff. Here, of course, there is no longer any doubt as to the heterodoxy of the book, which is condemned together with the other Acts, with the sole exception of the Acts of Paul.

The evidence of Clement is the chief, if not the only, testimony as to the date of the Acts of John. It proves that it belongs to the 2nd cent., but there is really no evidence to say how much earlier than Clement it may be. Twenty years either side of 160 seem to represent the limits.

The provenance of the Acts of John.—This remains quite uncertain. The only evidence is that the centre of the Acts is Ephesus, and this points to Asia as the place of origin. Nor is there any serious argument against this view, for there is certainly no connexion between the destruction of the temple of Artemis by the Goths in 282 and the attack on this temple attributed to John and his friends in the Acts. Probably, therefore, Ephesus, or more generally Asia, may be taken as the place of composition, but not much should be built on this view.

The theology and character of the Acts.—The theology of the Acts appears to be markedly Docetic and Gnostic. It represents Jesus as possessing a body which varied from day to day in appearance, and was capable even of appearing to two observers at the same time in quite different forms. His feet left no mark on the ground. This certainly seems Docetic, but it is curious that Clement of Alexandria quotes part of this passage as historical without any hesitation in accepting it, and Clement was not a Docete. The fact that at the moment of the Crucifixion Jesus appears to John on the Mount of Olives is also prima facie Docetic, but it is hard to say where mysticism ends and Docetism begins.

The Gnosticism of the document is chiefly supported by the reference in the great hymn to an Ogdoad and a Dodecad, but it is not certain that this is really a reference to a Gnostic system. The Ogdoad is sun, moon, and planets, and the Dodecad is the signs of the zodiac. The distinction between Gnosticism and Catholicism was not that one believed in an Ogdoad and the other did not, but in the view which they took of it. In just the same way the Valentinians and others explained that the Demiurge had made seven heavens above the earth, and while Irenæus resisted this teaching, he never denied the existence of the seven heavens, as is shown by his 'Apostolic Preaching.'

The best statement of the case against the Gnostic theory is in C. Schmidt, Petrusakten, 119 ff. The case for a Gnostic origin is best given, though very shortly, by M. R. James in Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. (TS v. 1), Cambridge, 1897, p. xviii ff., and for a definitely Valentinian origin, by Zahn (NKZ x. 211 ff.).

Apart from the suspicion of Docetism and Gnosticism, the theology of the Acts is not unlike that of the Acts of Paul. Especially noticeable is the ascetic objection to marriage; in this respect the Acts of John is quite as stern as the Acts of Paul or of Thomas. But in other respects the Acts of John seems to come from a far higher mystical religion, and is altogether finer literature than the Acts of Paul. Some of the mystical passages reach a magnificent level, and may be ranked with the best products of 2nd cent. religion.

The Acts of John may be studied best in Lipsius and Bonnet, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, ii. 1, Leipzig, 1898. This is the only complete text of all the known fragments. See also M. R. James, Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. (TS v. 1); Th. Zahn, Acta Joannis, Erlangen, 1880, and E. Hennecke, Neutest. Apokryphen, Tübingen, 1904, and Handbuch zu den Neutest. Apokr., do. 1904. Especially important is the section on the Acts of John in C. Schmidt, Die alten Petrusakten (TU xxiv. 1), Leipzig, 1903, p. 120 ff.

4. The Acts of Andrew.—No MS is extant which gives even as good a representation of the original Acts as is found in the other early Acts. We possess in quotations of Eusebius of Uzala (end of the 4th cent.) some valuable fragments, of which traces are also found in Augustine; from these, and on the grounds of general resemblance to the Acts of John, it appears probable that a fragment in Cod. Vatican. Gr. 808 (10th–11th cent.), dealing with Andrew in prison, belongs to the early Acts; and from a variety of sources it is also possible to reconstruct with some accuracy the story of the martyrdom of Andrew.

The text of the fragment in Cod. Vat. 808 begins in the middle of a speech of Andrew, who is in prison in Patras. The general situation is that the Apostle is being prosecuted by a certain Ægeates—which is perhaps 'an inhabitant of Ægea' rather than a personal name—because he perverted his wife Maximilla by Eucharistic doctrine against married life. A prominent part is also played by Patrocles the brother of Ægeates but a friend of the Apostle. The fragment ends, as it begins, abruptly in the middle of a speech by Andrew.

The death of Andrew was by crucifixion, but the legend ascribing an unusual shape to the cross used seems to be of later origin. For three days and three nights he remained on the cross exhorting the multitude; at the end of this time a crowd of 20,000 men went to the proconsul to demand that Andrew should be released. Ægeates was obliged to comply, but Andrew refused, and prayed that having once been joined to the cross he might not be separated from it. He then died, and was buried by Stratolles and Maximilla.

The date and provenance of the Acts of Andrew.—These points depend largely on the view taken of the authorship of the Acts. If, as is usually thought, the Acts of Andrew is really Leucian, i.e. written by the same author as the Acts of John, Asia is the most probable place for its origin, and the end of the 2nd cent. the most probable date. If this view be given up, Greece, in which the scene of the Acts is laid, becomes the most probable place, and the date must be decided by internal evidence, for the Acts appears not to be quoted before the time of Origen (Eus. HE iii. 1). At present the Leucian hypothesis perhaps holds the field (see esp. James, Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. pp. xxix ff.), but it is not at all certain.

The theology of the Acts.—So far as the fragments preserved enable us to discover, the theology of the Acts of Andrew resembles most closely that of the Acts of John, and thus supports the Leucian theory. There is the same emphasis on asceticism even in marriage, and the cross also plays a large part.

The text is given in Lipsius and Bonnet, Acta Apocrypha, ii. 1, and valuable discussions are given in Harnack, Chronol. ii. 175, and by M. R. James in Apocrypha Anecdota, ii. p. xxix ff. Somewhat out of date, but still valuable in some respects, is R. A. Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, Brunswick, 1883-87, i. 543 ff.

5. The Acts of Thomas.—(1) Contents.—Judas Thomas is sold by Jesus to the messenger of an Indian prince. At the wedding-feast of the daughter of the king of Andrapolis he is discovered to be an inspired person and forced by the king to pray over the bride and bridegroom. On entering the inner room Jesus is found sitting with the bride. He explains to the bridegroom that He is not Thomas, and converts the couple to a complete abstinence from sexual relations (Act i.). Thomas is ordered by his master, King Gundaphorus, to build a palace. Spending the money on alms, he erects a palace in heaven which is shown to the disembodied soul of the king's deceased brother, who is afterwards restored to life and receives the Eucharist with his brother, both being 'sealed' with oil by the Apostle. On this occasion the Lord appears as a youth bearing a lamp. Having preached to the people, Thomas is ordered by the Lord to depart (ii.). Thomas finds a youth killed by a dragon, which forthwith appears, acknowledging Thomas as 'twin of the Christ,' and professes to be the serpent from paradise. The dragon is summoned to suck the venom again out of the body, after doing which it perishes. The youth is restored to life, and says that he saw Thomas as a double person: one exactly like him standing by and telling him to resuscitate the body (iii.). While this happens, the colt of an ass addresses the Apostle as the 'twin of the Christ,' and invites him to ride on its back to the town (iv.). A woman is delivered from a demon that had been doing violence to her for five years. To protect her for the future, she is 'sealed' and partakes of the Eucharist (v.). At this moment a young man's hands are withered in the act of taking the Eucharistic bread. He confesses that he has murdered a woman for repudiating him after her conversion by Thomas. Restored to life, she recounts horrible visions from the lower world. After a general conversion, Thomas's final words culminate in an exhortation to abstinence from marriage and in emphasis on the permanence of spiritual possession (vi.). All India being evangelized, a general of king Misdaeus visits Thomas and prays him to deliver his wife and daughter from a cruel pair of demons (vii.). On the road the Apostle asks the general to command some wild asses to draw his carriage. One of these is afterwards ordered by the Apostle to summon the demons from the house. In the courtyard this same ass preaches a sermon to the multitude, and exhorts the Apostle to give the bodies of the women back to life, since they had died as the demons were leaving them (viii.). Mygdonia, a relative of the royal family, comes to hear Thomas preaching. The same night her husband Charisius has a dream which contains a foreboding of the consequences of this preaching for the married life. On the next day and night this comes true. His wife flees from his embraces. In the morning Thomas is arrested, and while in prison sings the 'Hymn of the Soul.' At home, however, Charisius finds his fervent supplications again scorned. His wife escapes to receive the 'seal,' and encounters Thomas on her way proceeding as a prince with many lights (ix.). Thomas follows her and returns to prison, having administered the sacraments to her and her foster-mother. That morning Mygdonia preaches a sermon to her husband on Jesus as the heavenly bridegroom. Thomas is now ordered by the king and besought by Charisius to make Mygdonia alter her conduct; but his feeble commands are refuted by her from his own teaching (x.). Tertia the queen pays a visit to Mygdonia and returns convinced (xi.). Thomas is again imprisoned, and converts Vazanes the king's son. An attempted torture being miraculously frustrated, he is conducted back and speaks a long prayer (xii.). Jesus, mostly in the form of Thomas, leads the converts and with them Mnesara, the wife of Vazanes, to the prison. They enter Vazanes' house, where they are 'sealed' and baptized by Thomas. After the Eucharistic meal, Thomas returns to the prison (Martyrium). The Apostle, followed by a multitude, is taken to a mountain and there pierced with swords. On the mountain Sifor the general and Vazanes receive orders as presbyter and deacon (xiii.).

(2) Original language.—After Schröter (ZDMG, 1871, p. 327 ff.), Noldeke (ib. 670-679 and in Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii.<sup>2</sup> [1884] 423-425), and Macke (Th. Quartalschr., 1874, pp. 3-70), Burkitt has settled the question (JThSt i. [1900] 280-290). The existence of a Syriac original is proved by a series of errors in the Greek arising from Syriac idioms or writing.

(3) Text.—(a) The Syriac (ed. Wright, Apocr. Acts, Lond. 1871, i. 172-333, text; ii. 146 ff., translation) is preserved in Br. Mus. Syr. Add 14645 (A.D. 936). Another MS is at Berlin: Sachau 222, a double of this at Cambridge (P. Bedjan, Act. Mart. and Sanct. iii. Paris, 1892, gives variants from the Berlin MS). Fragments from the 6th cent. in a Sinai palimpsest, Syr. Sin. 30, have been published by Burkitt (Stud. Sin., Cambridge, 1900, vol. ix. app. 7). Search should be made in the East for MSS of this text and its Oriental and Greek versions. Our present text is not always superior to the Greek version. On the text of the hymns (in Acts i. and ix.), cf. A. A. Bevan, 'The Hymn of the Soul,' T.S.v. 3 [1897]; Hoffmann, Z.N.T.W., 1903, pp. 273-309; E. Preuschen, Zwei gnost. Hymnen, Giessen, 1904; but see Burkitt, ThT, Leyden, 1905, pp. 270-282; Duncan Jones, JThSt vi. [1905] 448-451.

(b) The Greek version (ed. Bonnet, Acta Apost. Apocr., ii. 2, Leipzig, 1903). The 13 'Acts' + the Martyrium exist as a whole in two MSS. The best text is Cod. U (Rome, Vallicell. B 35, 11th cent.). This is the only Greek MS of the 'Hymn of the Soul' (Act ix. chs. 108-113). On the text of this Hymn in Nicetas of Salonicia, cf. Bonnet, Preface, p. xxiii. The other complete MS is P (Paris, græc. 1510, 12th or 13th cent.). The (19) other MSS give but selections. We must, therefore, review separately the MSS for part (A) = Acts i. ii., part (B) = Acts iii.-xii., part (C) = Act xiii. + Martyrium. Besides U, 15 copies preserve (A), of which CXBHTG have no trace of (B) or (C), while V gives here only the exordium of (A); 9 copies preserve (B), of which VYRD have no selections beyond Act viii., while SFQZL give here no more than the 'prayers' of Act xii., which, against the order of these MSS and P, Bonnet has inserted here, following U + Syr.; 11 copies preserve (C), of which KOM omit (A) and (B) altogether, while Q gives here only the exordium of Act xiii. Identical selections: FRXC (pp. 99-146<sup>20</sup> Bonnet), BH (99-145<sup>24</sup>), SFZL (251<sup>10</sup>-258<sup>22</sup>, see Pref. p. xxii), SFZ (275<sup>10</sup>-288). The genealogy is still obscure. In part (A) Bonnet distinguishes two types of text: Γ and Δ. The Γ text = GHZ and B (1st half). The Δ text = A (Paris, græc. 881, 10th cent.) + fam. Φ (= the rest of the MSS, U and P included). Both types have several unimportant variations in common, which must derive from a not very distant ancestor. But, as they more often differ on serious points, the tradition of the Greek text appears to be not very reliable. In part (C) again two types occur, viz. A + fam. Ω (= KORUV) and P + fam. Σ (= FLΣZ). All these MSS belonged to the Δ text in part (A), Z only excepted (Petersb. imp. 94, 12th cent.); cf. 'identical selections' above. In part (B) the MSS are grouped on their textual merits and in a descending order: UVYR, P, D. On the MSS neglected by Bonnet cf. Pref. p. xxiv ff. A Brussels MS (ii. 2047) might be of some interest. Several MSS are still hidden in Smyrna, Jerusalem, Athos (the catalogues of the most important libraries, Lavra and Vatopedi, are still unpublished). Bonnet's text might be improved. Only from pp. 197-250 could due influence be allowed to the Syriac and its ally, Cod. U, Burkitt having then convinced the editor that the Greek was but the version of a Syriac original (Pref. p. xxi).

(c) The Armenian version should be better known. A MS exists at Paris (Bibl. nat. fonds arm. 46111), which Vetter is expected to publish in the Or. Christ. The 'Hymn of the Soul' is not in it. Preuschen (Hennecke, Neutest. Apokr. ii. 563) was impressed by its variations, not by the quality of its text. In Conybeare's opinion the Arm. version derives from the Syriac (op. cit. i. 475).

(d) Of other versions, the Ethiopic is wholly, the Latin not entirely, useless (cf. Fabricius, Cod. apocr. NT, Hamburg, 1903, ii. 687 f.; Bonnet, Acta Thomæ, 1883, p. 96 ff.).

(4) Provenance and date.—For the history of opinion, cf. Harnack, Allchr. Lit., ii. 1 (1897), 545–549 with ii. 2 (1904), 175–176. Early Gnostics and Eastern Christianity have appeared to differ less in vocabulary than in other regards. Moreover, several coincidences with Gnostic phraseology have been intensified in the Greek, or are even due to wrong translation. The intellectual pursuits of the Gnostic mind are absent, while the rigoristic ethics have close parallels in early Syriac Christianity. All this exactly suits Bardesanes (A.D. 154–222) and his school (see Burkitt, Early Eastern Christianity, London, 1904, pp. 170 n., 199, 205 ff., and Nau, Dict. Theol. Cath., Paris, 1907, ii. 391–401, artt. 'Bardesane' and 'Bardesanites'; also Krüger, GGA, 1905, p. 718, and Noldeke, ib. p. 82). The language (with the proper names) points to Syria, the figure of Thomas to Edessa, the character and style ('Acts' ix f., the 'Hymn of the Soul' in this 'Act') to the literary capacities of Bardesanes' environment. R. Reitzenstein (Hellenist. Wundererzählungen, Leipzig, 1906, p. 104 ff.) raises the question whether the material of the story was created in Edessa or imported. He points out that miracle-stories ('aretologies') were a literary genre, spread by several petites religions from Egypt on the waves of universal syncretism. The pagan theology of Hermetic monotheism has left its traces among the mediæval Sabians of Carrhæ (near Edessa). It seems, however, that he is over-stating the importance of the existing analogies.

The date of the Acts is fixed by Lipsius (LCBl, 1888, no. 44, p. 1508, Apokr. Apostelgesch., ii. 2, p. 418 note [on i. p. 225 f.]) as the time of the translation of the relics of Thomas to Edessa (A.D. 232). It is impossible to clench this argument, but it is certain that one of the component parts of Act ix., the 'Hymn of the Soul,' was composed before the rise of the Sasanid power in A.D. 226, since 'Parthian kings' are mentioned in i. 38 (ed. Bevan, TS v. 3). Therefore we must not go much beyond that time, and may reserve the middle quarters of the 3rd cent. as the latest probable date for the whole.

(5) Integrity.—Suspensions are raised by the fact that most MSS of the Greek version give but selections. If this should occur also in the Oriental tradition, our collection of 13 Acts might seem the result of a process of agglomeration. Noldeke (GGA, 1905, p. 82) suspects interpolations and detects a nucleus in Acts i. and ii. (except the Andrapolis episode). He supposes a rather intricate genesis for our collection. Following this line of literary criticism, the vigorous style of Acts ix.–xii. causes them to stand out as another unit. Acts iii.–viii. and the remaining parts might come in as later accretions. It seems, however, unsafe to indulge much in literary criticism before a more adequate knowledge of the original text is available. Reitzenstein has emphasized (op. cit.) the probability of literary sources. One author may have composed the whole by adapting pagan stories to Thomas's name. In this case the different shades of style may be due to close adherence to or free expansion of such sources. Future criticism may even see its way to combine this point of view with the first. Possible sources certainly deserve serious consideration (cf. Gutschmid, Kleine Schriften, ii. [Leipzig, 1890] 332 ff., advocating Buddhism; Preuschen in Henneke, i. 477, Parsism; Hilgenfeld, ZWT, 1904, p. 240, Persian influences).

(6) Hymns.—The Bridal 'Ode' (ch. 7, 1st Act) is in our Syriac a mystic song of the Church. It is not safe to abandon this ancient exegesis, since its Gnostic astrology and scenery do not differ in degree from the rest of the Acts. It does not even go much beyond the Apocalypse or the Patristic comments on the Song of Songs. Excision from its context is impossible without leaving scars. The 'Hymn of the Soul' (Greek, 'Psalm') in chs. 108–113 (and also a long doxology after ch. 113; only Syriac and for the largest part omitted by Sachau 222; cf. Henneke, i. 592–594) is omitted in most MSS. It is a document of the religious life, not of the metaphysics of Gnosticism (Bevan, p. 7). An orthodox bishop of Salonicæ, Nicetas, explained it in the 11th cent. without any suspicion (cf. above (3) and Burkitt, Early East. Christianity, p. 227). This proves that its character is not obtrusively Gnostic. Preuschen (op. cit., but cf. recensions in ThT and JThSt, quoted under (3)) defines the character of both hymns as Ophite or Sethian. Apart from this should be considered his exegesis of the 'psalm' of chs. 108–113 as a 'Hymn of the Christ.' Reitzenstein supports his views (for the Bridal Ode with less decision: op. cit. 142). He explains its curious implications—Christ cheated by demons, defiled by communion with them, serving the Lord of this world, plunged in a sleepy forgetfulness of His heavenly origin and supreme task—by assuming a 'fast ratselhaft' strong influence of pagan literature (op. cit. 122). On the 'sleepy forgetfulness' cf. Conybeare, JThSt vi. 609–610. Identification of the soul and Christ is present in the Odes of Solomon. Hilgenfeld (ZWT, 1904, pp. 229–241) advocates a Greek original ('the Son of the King and the Pearl') sprung from a pagan Gnostic movement in the new Sasanid empire.

All critics with this last exception, but Preuschen included (cf., however, his art. in Henneke, i. 479), agree in ascribing the 'Hymn of the Soul' to Bardesanes or to his school. Bevan (op. cit. p. 5 f.) has shown that it contains just those 'heresies' for which Bardesanes, according to Ephraim, was excluded by the Edessene Church. With regard to its inclusion in the Acts, Burkitt remarks (Early Eastern Christianity, p. 212 note):

'I cannot help expressing a private opinion that the Hymn was inserted by the author himself, just as he used the Lord's Prayer in a later prayer of Judas Thomas. That the Hymn itself is independent of the Acts is certain, but it is not so clear that the Acts is independent of the Hymn. It may, in fact, have become a part of the recognised teaching of the sect to which the author of the Acts belonged (cf. Ephraim's Commentary on 3 Corinthians, p. 119).'

(7) Theology of the Acts.—The Acts presupposes the universal acceptance of a theology counting only the supernatural world as real, and individual salvation as the chief end of man. Asceticism, especially abstinence from sexual relations even in marriage, is urged as self-evident. Even before meeting the Apostle, Vazanes had seen this (Act xiii.). Mygdonia shows a firmer grasp of the implications of his doctrine than Thomas himself (Act x.). The supernatural world is not described: the Gnostic cosmogonies and esoteric doctrines are absent. Against this fact coincidences in phraseology seem to carry little weight. Perhaps it is only its reckless Puritanism which separates the Acts of Thomas from the B'nai Q'yama, Aphraates, and other leaders of early Syriac Christianity (cf. Burkitt, Early East. Christianity, pp. 118–154; Schwen, Afrat, Berlin, 1907, pp. 96–99, 130–132).

The Church and its dignitaries are practically absent (cf. Acts v. vi. and the Martyrium). The sacraments are much in evidence as the only means of attaining to the life among the inhabitants of the world of light (chs. 121, 132, 158). Baptism immediately followed by the Eucharist is the rule. It occurs in the story of the woman in Act v. (ch. 49), Mygdonia, Act x. (ch. 121), Siphor, Act x.

(ch. 132), Vazanes, Act xiii. (chs. 153–158). In the story of Gundaphorus and Gad, Act ii. (chs. 25–27), the Greek and Syriac differ; both omit the Eucharist.

(8) Ritual.—(a) Instruction (132); (b) prayer (25, 156); (c) consecration of the oil (157); (d) imposition of hands (49); (e) outpouring of oil on the head (27 Gr. et rell.); (f) unction (27 Gr. 157); (g) prayer over the unction (27 Gr. 121, 157); (h) immersion (27 Syr. 121, 132, 157); (i) chrism (27 Syr.); (j) prayer over the chrism (27 Syr.); (k) prayer for the Eucharist (49, 121, 132, 158); (l) allocation before partaking (49, [121], 132, 158); (m) partaking of the bread (49, 121, 132, 158); (n) of the cup (121, 158). A response from heaven occurs in ch. 121, and a Christophany in chs. 27, 153. The fullest* account is that of chs. 153–158. The whole act of unction and immersion is called ‘sealing’ (121), therefore in chs. 49 and 27 (Gr.) the immersion may have been omitted. Outpouring and unction constitute a double act (157). Uction may have extended to more parts of the body for exorcistic purposes (cf. ch. 5 and JThSt, i. 71; F. E. Brightman, The Sacramentary of Serapion of Thmuis, p. 251; Hennecke, Neutest. Apokr. ii. 565). While the Greek in 27 has a double unction (JThSt i. 251) or, perhaps, unction and chrism, the Syriac has baptism followed by chrism. Elsewhere the Eucharist seems always to occupy the place of the last part of later baptismal ritual, viz. the confirmation and ‘sealing’ by the chrism. Renunciation in a formal way is absent, renunciation from sexual intercourse is understood (promised, 152). Consecration of the water is not found, though running water is but once used (121). Trinitarian formulæ and Logos-terminology are used rather indiscriminately. Gnostic phraseology occurs side by side with it. The baptismal formula is always Trinitarian. Ordinary bread and water appear as Eucharistic elements. The bread seems to be more essential (body and blood in ch. 158).

(9) The most impressive element in the Acts is Thomas's character as a twin of the Christ (see above (1)). W. Bauer (Das Leben Jesu im Zeitalter der neutest. Apokr., Tübingen, 1909, p. 445, note 3) takes this as proof that the Acts wishes to reduce the Virgin birth ad absurdum, and quotes ch. 2: ‘I, Jesus, son of Joseph the carpenter.’ This would be quite a solitary cloud of scepticism in an atmosphere saturated with syncretistic thought. Reitzenstein seems to open a field where Rendel Harris (The Dioscuri in the Christian Legends, London, 1903, and Cult of the Heavenly Twins, Cambr., 1906) had already found a way. That, in fact, Dioscuric attainments are ascribed to Thomas is evident, and just here a parallel between Bardesanian literature and our Acts comes in (cf. Burkitt, 170 note and 199). The name Thomas = ‘twin’ has been the point de depart, the cult of Aziz (the morning star) a presupposition. Probably it was this Dioscuric god, whose month of free-markets (cf. Harris, Cult of the Heavenly Twins, p. 158) and whose place as a patron of Edessa Thomas was honoured with (cf. Jn 11<sup>16</sup> 20<sup>-4</sup>; Pauly-Wissowa, i. 2644 [Cumont]; R. Duval, Histoire politique, relig. et litt. d'Édesse, Paris, 1892, p. 74 ff.). The ways and by-paths of syncretistic monotheism are still obscure to us, but research in this field is certainly destined to cast light on the dark places of the Acts of Thomas.

Besides the works already quoted, see F. Cumont, Die or. Rel. im röm. Heidentum, Leipzig, 1910; P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-römische Kultur, Tübingen, 1907; R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Leipzig, 1910, also Poimandres Stud. z. griech.-ägypt. u. frühchristl. Lit., do.

* The sacramental usage in the Acts is not fixed: the 14 points occur in various combinations.

1904; F. J. Dölger, Sphragis, eine altchr. Taufbezeichnung in ihren Beziehungen zur prof. und relig. Kultur des Altertums, Paderborn, 1911; F. Haase, Zur bardesanischen Gnosis, Leipzig, 1910.

6. Later Acts.—Besides the five Apocryphal Acts which have been discussed, there are several others of later date, but they are comparatively unimportant. The most valuable is the ‘Acts of Philip,’ which is edited by Bonnet in Acta Apocrypha, ii. 2. It describes the adventures of Philip in Phrygia, Asia, Samaria, etc., in the company of his sister Mariamne. It may be as early as the 3rd cent., and belongs either to a mildly Gnostic sect or to the same Modalistic Christianity as the Acts of Peter. It is discussed by Lipsius in Die apok. Apostelgeschichten, Supplement, pp. 65–70, and by Zahn, Forschungen, vi. 18–24. Besides this a series of Acts, growing ever shorter and less valuable, can be found attached to the name of every Apostle or Teacher in NT times in the Acta Sanctorum, arranged under the date assigned in the calendar to the saint in question.

7. Catholic recensions.—In the course of the Manichæan controversy the view was adopted that the miracles in the ‘Leucian’ Acts were genuine, but that the doctrine connected with them was heretical. This view finds its clearest expression in the Prologue of pseudo-Mellitus:

‘Volo sollicitam esse fraternitatem vestram de Leucio quodam qui scripsit Apostolorum actus, Ioannis evangelistae et sancti Andreae vel Thomae apostoli qui de virtutibus quidem quae per eos dominus fecit, plurima vera dixit, de doctrina vero multa mentitus est.’

The result was a series of Catholic recensions which left out, speaking generally, the speeches, and preserved or even added to all the miracles. Of these Catholic recensions, which are very numerous, the most famous are the ‘Prochorus’ edition of the Acts of John (the text is best given by Zahn, Acta Joannis, Erlangen, 1880), and the so-called ‘Abdias’ collection. The disentangling of various recensions of the separate Acts is very difficult, and not very profitable.

The materials for a more detailed statement of the Catholic recensions can be found in Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur, Leipzig, i. [1893] p. 123 ff., and in R. A. Lipsius, Die apokryphen Apostelgeschichten, 1883–87.

KIRSOPP LAKE and J. DE ZWAAN.*

ADAM (ʾĀdām).—Adam was the first man (אָדָם = man) and the parent of the human race.—1. When the writer of Jude (v. 14) thinks it worth noting that Enoch (q.v.) was ‘the seventh from Adam’ (εβδομος ἀπὸ ʾΑδάμ), he probably has in mind the sacredness of the number seven. It seems to him an interesting point that God, who rested from His work on the seventh day, found a man to walk in holy fellowship with Him in the seventh generation.

2. In 1 Co 11<sup>9f.</sup> and 1 Ti 2<sup>13f.</sup> the doctrine of the headship of man and the complete subjection (πάσα ὑποταγή) of woman is based upon the story of creation. Man was not created for woman, but woman for man; Adam was created first and sinned second, Eve was created second and sinned first; therefore let woman ever remember that she is morally as well as physically weaker than man, and let her never attempt either to teach or to have dominion over him (αυθεντεῖν ἀνδρός). With the premisses of this argument one may compare the words of Sirach (25<sup>24</sup>): ‘From a woman was the beginning of sin (ἀπὸ γυναικὸς ἀρχὴ ἁμαρτίας), and because of her we all die.’ St. Paul did not take pleasure in this quaint philosophy of history, as many of the Rabbis did; but, with all his reverence for womanhood, he felt that the accepted belief in woman's creation after and her fall before man's clearly established her inferiority. It was not a personal and empirical, but a traditional and dogmatic judgment.

* The section on the Acts of Thomas is from the pen of de Zwaan; the rest of the art. is by Kirsopp Lake.

3. St. Paul had, and knew that many others had, a religious experience so vivid and intense that ordinary terms seemed inadequate to do it justice. It was the result of a Divine creative act. If any man was in Christ, there was 'a new creation' (καινη κτισις); old things were passed away; behold, they were become new (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>). Not legalism or its absence, but 'a new creation' (Gal 6<sup>15</sup>) was of avail. Reflexion on this profound spiritual change and all that it involved convinced the Apostle that Christ was the Head and Founder of a new humanity; that His life and death, followed by the gift of His Spirit, not merely marked a new epoch in history, introducing a new society, philosophy, ethics, and literature, but created a new world. 'Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive.' As St. Paul brooded on the stupendous series of events of which Christ was the cause, on the immeasurable difference which His brief presence made in the life of mankind, there inevitably took shape in his mind a grand antithesis between the first and the second creation, between the first and the last representative Man, between the intrusion of sin and death into the world and the Divine gift of righteousness and life, between the ravages of one man's disobedience and the redemptive power of one Man's perfect obedience (Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>).

It is to be noted that the Apostle does not advance any new theory of the first creation. He knew only what every student of Scripture could learn on that subject. He had no new revelation which enabled him either to confirm or to correct the account of the beginning of things which had come down from a remote antiquity. He no doubt regarded as literal history the account of the origin of man, sin, and death which is found in Gn 2-3. He did not imagine, like Philo, that he was reading a pure allegory; he believed, like Luther, that Moses 'meldet geschehene Dinge.' It is remarkable, however, with what unerring judgment he seizes upon and retains the vital, enduring substance of the legend, while he leaves out the drapery woven by the old time-spirit. He says nothing of a garden of Eden, a miraculous tree of life, a talking serpent, an anthropomorphic Deity. But he finds in the antique human document these facts: the Divine origin and organic unity of the human race; man's affinity with, and capacity for, the Divine; his destiny for fellowship with God as an ideal to be realized in obedience to Divine law; his conscious freedom and responsibility; the mysterious physical basis of his transmitted moral characteristics; his universally inherited tendency to sin; his consciousness that sin is not a mere inborn weakness of nature or strength of appetite, but a disregard of the known distinction between right and wrong; the entail of death, not as the law obeyed by all created organisms, but as the wages of his sin. The narrative which blends these elements in a form that appealed to the imagination of primitive peoples has a 'depth of moral and religious insight unsurpassed in the OT' (Skinner, Genesis [ICC, 1910] 52).

The teaching of St. Paul with regard to sin and death does not materially differ from that of his Jewish contemporaries and of the Talmud, in which the same sense of a fatal heredity is conjoined with a consciousness of individual responsibility. 'O Adam, what hast thou done? For if thou hast sinned, thy fall has not merely been thine own, but ours who are descended from thee' (2 Es 7<sup>48</sup>). Yet 'Adam is not the cause of sin except in his own soul; but each of us has become the Adam of his own soul' (Bar 54<sup>19</sup>). According to the Talmud, 'there is such a thing as transmission of guilt, but not such a thing as transmission of sin' (Weber, System d. altsyn. palästin. Theol., Leipzig, 1880, p. 216).

The 'immortal allegory' of Genesis cannot now be regarded as literal history. 'The plain truth, and we have no reason to hide it, is that we do not know the beginnings of man's life, of his history, of his sin; we do not know them historically, on historical evidence; and we should be content to let them remain in the dark till science throws what light it can upon them' (Denney, Studies in Theol., London, 1894, p. 79). Science knows nothing of a man who came directly from the hand of God, and it cannot accept the pedigree of Adam as given by Moses or by Matthew. Its working hypothesis is that man is 'a scion of a Simian stock,' and it is convinced that man did not make society but that society made man. Beyond this it has not yet done much to enlighten theology. 'We do not know how Man arose, or whence he came, or when he began, or where his first home was; in short we are in a deplorable state of ignorance on the whole subject' (J. A. Thomson, The Bible of Nature, Edinburgh, 1908, p. 191).

4. Art has made it difficult to think of our first parents without adorning them with all graces and perfections. 'But when we get away from poetry and picture-painting, we find that men have drawn largely from their imaginations, without the warrant of one syllable of Scripture to corroborate the truth of the colouring' (F. W. Robertson, Corinthians, 242). To St. Paul (1 Co 15<sup>45-49</sup>) the primitive man was of the earth, earthy (χοϊκός), a natural as opposed to a spiritual man, crude and rudimentary, with the innocence and inexperience of a child. 'The life of the spirit is substantially identical with holiness; it could not therefore have been given immediately to man at the time of his creation; for holiness is not a thing imposed, it is essentially a product of liberty, the freewill offering of the individual. God therefore required to begin with an inferior state, the characteristic of which was simply freedom, the power in man to give or withhold himself' (Godet, Corinthians, ii. 424). St. Paul's conception is that, while 'the first man Adam,' as akin to God, was capable of immortality—potuit non mori—his sin made him subject to death, which has reigned over all his descendants. Cf. 2 Es 3<sup>7</sup>: 'And unto him (Adam) thou gavest thy one commandment: which he transgressed, and immediately thou appointedst death for him and in his generations.' Formally as a deduction from the story of Adam, but really as his own spiritual intuition, the Apostle thus teaches the unnaturalness of human death. This is apparently opposed to the doctrine of science, that death is for all organisms a natural law, which reigned in the world long before the ascent of man and the beginning of sin—a debt which, as it cannot be cancelled, man should pay as cheerfully as possible. And yet his sense of two things—his own greatness and God's goodness—convinces him that it is radically contra rerum naturam.

'He thinks he was not made to die,
And Thou hast made him, Thou art just'
(Tennyson, In Memoriam).

Christianity confirms his instinctive feeling that death is in his case a dark shadow that should never have been cast upon his life. Acknowledging that it is not the mere natural fate of a physical organism, but the wages of sin, the Christian believes that it is finally to be abolished. 'In Christ shall all be made alive.' 'The last Adam,' having vanquished death, 'became a life-giving spirit' (1 Co 15<sup>22-45</sup>). See also artt. LIFE AND DEATH, SIN.

LITERATURE.—B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT, 1882-83, i. 331 ff., 409 ff.; W. Beyschlag, NT Theology, 1894-96, ii. 48 ff.; C. v. Weizsacker, Apostolic Age, 1894-95, i. 149 ff.; G. B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology, 1906, p. 122 ff., Theology of the NT, 1901, p. 349 ff.; A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1896, p. 125 ff.; D. Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 1897, p. 86 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans, 1902, p. 136 ff.; A. Deissmann, St. Paul, 1912, pp. 59, 107, 155 ff.; H. Wheeler Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man, 1911, p. 112 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ADJURE.—See OATH.

ADMINISTRATION.—The word occurs in the AV in two places, 1 Co 12<sup>5</sup> and 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup>, in both of which the RV has substituted 'ministration,' just as in 2 Co 8<sup>19a</sup>. 'administer' (AV) has given place to 'minister' (RV; Gr διακονέω). In 1 Co 12<sup>5</sup> and 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup> the word is the tr. of Gr. διακονία, which originally means 'the service (or duty) rendered by a διδάκων, i.e. a servant, particularly a waiter at table (Lat. minister), who pours out wine to the guests individually. In 1 Co 12<sup>5</sup> the aspect alluded to is especially that of practical service rendered to a master [including that of 'deacon' rendered to our 'Lord'], whereas in 2 Co 9<sup>12</sup> it is particularly the concrete form of that service which is intended, in its Godward and manward aspects.

The administration of the Roman Empire is never directly referred to in the NT, and is best considered under its various aspects (CÆSAR, PROCONSUL, etc.).

A. SOUTER.

ADMONITION.—Obedience to God's law and submission to His will are essential for progressive spiritual life. Human nature being what it is, there is need for constant admonition (2 P 1<sup>10-21</sup>). In the NT reference is made to this subject in its family, professional, and Divine aspects.

1. νοουτέω and νοουθεσία (a later form for νουθέτης) are not found in the NT outside the Pauline Epp., except in St. Paul's speech, Ac 20<sup>31</sup>. For the former see Ro 15<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>1-14</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>15</sup>; for the latter 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>, Eph 6<sup>4</sup>, Tit 3<sup>10</sup>; cf. Is 8<sup>16</sup> 30<sup>8a</sup>, Hab 2<sup>2a</sup>, Dt 31<sup>19a</sup>. The terms are used in classical Greek (e.g. Aristoph. Ranæ, 1009), but are more common in later Greek (Philo, Josephus). The root idea is 'to put in mind' (ἐν τῷ νῷ τιθέναι), to train by word, always with the added suggestion of sternness, reproof, remonstrance, blame (cf. Æsch. Prom. 264; Aristoph. Vesp. 254; Plato, Gorg. 479A). The implication is 'a monitory appeal to the νοῦς rather than a direct rebuke or censure' (Ellicott). To admonish is the duty of a father or parent (Eph 6<sup>4</sup>; cf. Wis 11<sup>10</sup>, Pss.-Sol. 13<sup>8</sup>), or brother (2 Th 3<sup>15</sup>). The object and reason of such admonition must be realized if it is to be a means of moral discipline. The admonition and teaching of Col 1<sup>28</sup> correspond to the 'repent and believe' of the gospel message.

2. παραίνέω signifies 'recommend,' 'exhort,' 'admonish' (Ac 27<sup>9-22</sup>; cf. 2 Mac 7<sup>3-5</sup>, 3 Mac 5<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>12</sup> A). This word is common in classical Greek, and is also found in the Apocrypha. St. Luke would be familiar with it as a term used for the advice of a physician. Its presence in a 'We' section is suggestive. St. Paul as a person of position and an experienced traveller gives advice in an emergency, as a skilled doctor would admonish a patient in a serious illness (see Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, 1899, p. 153).

3. χρηματίζω in the active signifies 'transact business' (χρῆμα), 'give a Divine response to one consulting an oracle,' 'give Divine admonition' (cf. Jer 25<sup>30</sup> 31-, Job 40<sup>8</sup>). The passive is used of the admonition given (Lk 2<sup>8</sup>; cf. χρηματισμός, Ro 11<sup>4</sup>, 2 Mac 2<sup>4</sup>), and of the person thus admonished (Mt 21<sup>2</sup>—, Ac 10<sup>22</sup>; cf. 11<sup>26</sup> and Ro 7<sup>3</sup> where 'called' is the translation; He 8<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>7</sup>; cf. 12<sup>25</sup>). This meaning of 'Divine oracle' is found chiefly in the NT, with the underlying idea that the mind and heart must be suitably prepared for its reception. For private and public exhortation by preachers, teachers, and communities, see Gal 2<sup>14</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>. See also CHASTISEMENT and DISCIPLINE.

H. CARISS J. SIDNELL.

ADOPTION.—1. The term.—The custom of adopting children is explicitly alluded to by St. Paul alone of biblical writers; he uses the word 'adoption' (υιοθεσία, Vulg. adoptio filiorum, Syr. usually simath benayā) five times: Ro 8<sup>15.23</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>, Gal 4<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>. This Greek word is not found in classical writers (though θερὸς υἱός is used for 'an adopted son' by Pindar and Herodotus), and it was at one time supposed to have been coined by St. Paul; but it is common in Greek inscriptions of the Hellenistic period, and is formed in the same manner as νομοθεσία, 'giving of the law,' 'legislation' (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>; also in Plato, etc.), and ὁμοθεσία, 'bounds,' lit. 'fixing of bounds' (Ac 17<sup>26</sup>). It is translated 'adoption' in Rom., but 'adoption of sons' in Gal., 'adoption as sons' (RV; AV 'adoption of children') in Ephesians. The classical Greek word for 'to adopt' is εἰσποιεῖσθαι, whence εἰσποίησις, 'adoption.'

2. The custom.—St. Paul in these passages is alluding to a Greek and Roman rather than to a Hebrew custom. Its object, at any rate in its earliest stages, was to prevent the dying out of a family, by the adopting into it of one who did not by nature belong to it, so that he became in all respects its representative and carried on the race. But, though the preventing of the extinction of a family was thought important by the Israelites, and though adoption was a legal custom among the Babylonians (Box, in ERE i. 114), it was not in use among the Hebrews. With them childlessness was to some extent met by the levirate, or in the patriarchal period by polygamy (cf. Gn 16<sup>1a</sup>), or at a later date by divorce. The few instances of adoption in the OT (e.g. Moses by Pharaoh's daughter, Esther by Mordecai) exhibit a different reason for the act from that stated above, and are the result of foreign surroundings and influence. On the other hand, the custom was very common among both Greeks and Romans. It was at first largely connected with the desire that the family worship of dead ancestors should not cease—a cultus which could be continued only through males (Woodhouse, in ERE i. 107 and 111). In Greece it dates from the 8th cent. B.C. It was afterwards used as a form of will-making. If a man had a legitimate son, he could not make a will; but, if he had no legitimate son, he often adopted one that he might secure the inheritance to him rather than to relatives, who would otherwise be heirs. The adopted son at once left his own family and became a member of that of his adopter, losing all rights as his father's son. If he was adopted while his adopter was still living, and sons were afterwards born to the latter, he ranked equally with them; he could not be disinherited against his will. Roman adoption was founded on the same general ideas; it was called arrogatio if the person adopted was sui juris, but adoptio if he was under his own father's potesas (Woodhouse, loc. cit.). In the latter case he came under the adopter's potesas as if he were his son by nature.

It appears, then, that St. Paul in the five passages named above is taking up an entirely non-Jewish position; so much so that some have doubted whether a Jew, even after he had become a Christian, could have written Epistles which contained such statements (cf. Ramsay, Galatians, p. 342). This, however, is one of the many instances of the influence of Greek and Roman ideas on St. Paul. W. M. Ramsay has endeavoured to show that, in so far as these differed from one another in the matter under discussion, it is to Greek custom rather than to 'the Roman law of adoption in its original and primitive form' that the Apostle refers in dealing with Gal 3<sup>6ff</sup>, but that he uses a metaphor dependent on Roman law when writing to the Romans in Ro 4<sup>11</sup> (ib. pp. 339, 343; see also art. HEIR). But this has been disputed.

3. St. Paul's metaphor of adoption.—The Apostle applies the metaphor to the relation of both Jews and Christians to the Father. (a) Somewhat emphatically he applies it to the Jews in Ro 9<sup>4</sup>. The adoption, the glory [the visible presence of God], the covenants [often repeated], the giving of the Law, the service [of the Temple], the promises, the fathers, all belonged to the Israelites, 'my kinsmen according to the flesh,' of whom is Christ concerning the flesh—a passage showing the intense Jewish feeling of St. Paul, combined with the broader outlook due to his Græco-Roman surroundings (see above, § 2). Here the sonship of Israel, for which see Ex 4<sup>2</sup> ('Israel, my son, my first-born'), Dt 14<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>6</sup>, 19<sup>5</sup>, Ps 68<sup>5</sup> 103<sup>13</sup>, Jer 31<sup>9</sup>, Hos 11<sup>1</sup>, Mal 2<sup>10</sup>, etc., is described as 'adoption.' It is noteworthy that the adoption is before the Incarnation, although it could only be 'in Christ.' Lightfoot (on Gal 4<sup>5</sup>) observes that before Christ's coming men were potentially sons, though actually they were only slaves (v.<sup>3</sup>). Athanasius argues that, since before the Incarnation the Jews were sons [by adoption], and since no one could be a son except through our Lord [cf. Jn 14<sup>6</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>, and see below, § 5], therefore He was a Son before He became incarnate (Orat. c. Arian. i. 39, iv. 23, 29).

(b) But more frequently St. Paul applies the metaphor of adoption to Christians. 'Sonship in the completest sense could not be proclaimed before the manifestation of the Divine Son in the flesh' (Robinson, Eph., p. 27 f.). We Christians 'received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father,' for 'we are children of God' (Ro 8<sup>16</sup>). It was not till the fullness (τὸ πλήρωμα—for the word see Robinson, pp. 42, 255) of the time came that God sent forth His Son that we might receive adoption (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>). In its highest sense adoption could not be received under the Law, but only under the Gospel. The context in these passages shows that the Spirit leads us to the Father by making us realize our sonship; He teaches us how to pray, and puts into our mouth the words 'Abba, Father' (cf. κραζον Gal 4<sup>6</sup> with κράζομεν Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). We notice that St. Paul, though addressing those who were not by any means all Jewish Christians, but many of whom, being Gentiles, had come directly into the Church, yet seems at first sight to speak as if Christ's coming was only to give adoption to those whom, being under the Law, He redeemed. But, as Lightfoot remarks (Com. in loc.), the phrase used is τοὺς ὑπὸ νόμον, not ὑπὸ τὸν νόμον; the reference is not only to those who were under the Mosaic Law, but to all subject to any system of positive ordinances (so perhaps in 1 Co 9<sup>20</sup>). The phrase 'redeem . . . ' is thought to reflect the Roman idea that the adopter purchased a son from the father by nature; adoption was effected before a prætor and five witnesses, by a simulated sale.

(c) Just as the adoption of Jews was inferior to that of Christians, so that of Christians is not yet fully realized. Adoption is spoken of in Ro 8<sup>3</sup> as something in the future. It is the redemption (ἀπολύτρωσις) of our body, and we are still waiting for it; it can be completely attained only at the general resurrection. The thought closely resembles that of 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>; we are now the children of God, but 'if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him'; the sonship will then be perfected.

4. Equivalents in other parts of NT.—Although no NT writer but St. Paul uses the word 'adoption,' the idea is found elsewhere, even if expressed differently. Thus in Jn 1<sup>12</sup> those who 'receive' the Word and believe on His name are said to be given by Him the right to become children of God. On this passage Athanasius remarks (Orat. c. Arian. ii. 59) that the word 'become' shows an adoptive, not a natural, sonship; we are first said to be made (Gn 1<sup>26</sup>), and afterwards, on receiving the grace of the Spirit, to be begotten. As Westcott observes (Com., in loc.), 'this right is not inherent in man, but "given" by God to him. A shadow of it existed in the relation of Israel to God.' This passage is closely parallel to Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, where we are said to be all sons of God, through faith, in Christ Jesus. So in 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>, it is a mark of the love bestowed upon us by the Father that we should be called children of God [the name bestowed by a definite act—κληθώμεν, aorist]; and (the Apostle adds) 'such we are.' The promise of Rev 21<sup>7</sup> to 'him that overcometh' equally implies adoption, not natural sonship: 'I will be his God, and he shall be my son'; and so (but less explicitly) do the sayings in He 2<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>9</sup> that Jesus 'brings many sons unto glory' (see below, § 5), and that God deals with us 'as with sons.' The figure of adoption appears as a 're-begetting' in 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>. 23. we are begotten again unto a living hope by 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' by means of the resurrection of Jesus (see below, § 5), and therefore call on Him as Father (v.<sup>17</sup>). And, indeed, our Lord's teaching implies adoption, inasmuch as, while He revealed God as Father of all men, He yet uniformly (see next section) differentiates His own Sonship from that of all others.

5. A Son by nature implied by the metaphor.—The use by St. Paul of the figure of adoption in the case of Jews and Christians leads us by a natural consequence to the doctrine that our Lord is the Son of God by nature. In the same context the Apostle speaks of Jesus as God's 'own Son' (τὸν αὐτοῦ υἱόν), sent in the likeness of sinful flesh, therefore pre-existent (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>; cf. v.<sup>32</sup> τοῦ ὁμοῦ υἱοῦ). In Gal 4<sup>4</sup> he says that God sent forth His Son (τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ) . . . that we might receive adoption; Jesus did not receive it, because He was God's own Son. And so our Lord explicitly in Jn 20<sup>17</sup> makes a clear distinction between His own sonship (by nature) and our sonship (by adoption, by grace): 'my Father and your Father,' 'my God and your God.' He never speaks of God as 'our Father,' though He taught His disciples to do so. Athanasius cites the ordinary usage of our Lord in speaking of 'My Father' [it is so very frequently in all the Gospels, and in Rev 2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>; cf. also Mk 8<sup>38</sup>] as a proof that He is 'Son, or rather that Son, by reason of whom the rest are made sons' (Orat. c. Arian. iv. 21 f.). The same thing follows from the language of those NT writers who use phrases equivalent to those of St. Paul. If Christians become children of God (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>; see § 4 above), Christ is the Only-begotten Son of God, who was sent into the world that we might be saved, or live, through Him (Jn 3<sup>16-18</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>9</sup>). If we are the sons brought to glory by Jesus (He 2<sup>10</sup>), He is emphatically 'a Son over [God's] house' (He 3<sup>6</sup> RVm; cf. Nu 12<sup>7</sup>). St. Peter speaks of God as the Father of Jesus in the very verse in which he speaks of our being begotten again by Him (1 P 1<sup>3</sup>, see § 4 above). It is this distinction between an adoptive and a natural sonship which gives point to the title 'Only-begotten' (γ. v.); had Jesus been only one out of many sons, sons in the same sense, this title would be meaningless (for endeavours to evacuate its significance see Pearson, On the Creed<sup>3</sup>, art. ii. notes 52, 53). The distinction of Jn 20<sup>17</sup> is maintained throughout the NT.

As Augustine says (Exp. Ep. ad Gal. [4<sup>5</sup>] § 30, ed. Ben. iii. pt. 2, col. 960), St. Paul 'speaks of adoption, that we may clearly understand the only-begotten (unicum) Son of God.' For we are sons of God by His lovingkindness and the favour (dignitate) of His mercy; He is Son by nature who is one with the Father (qui hoc est quod Pater).

6. Adoption and baptism.—We may in conclusion consider at what period of our lives we are adopted by God as His sons. In one sense it was an act of God in eternity; we were foreordained unto adoption (Eph 1<sup>5</sup>). But in another sense St. Paul speaks of it as a definite act at some definite moment of our lives: 'Ye received (ἐλάβετε: aorist, not perfect) the spirit of adoption' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). This points to the adoption being given on the admission of the person to the Christian body, in his baptism. And so Sanday-Headlam paraphrase v. 1<sup>5</sup> thus: 'When you were first baptized, and the communication of the Holy Spirit sealed your admission into the Christian fold,' etc. We may compare Ac 19- RV: 'Did ye receive (ἐλάβετε) the Holy Ghost when ye believed (πιστεύσαντες)?'—a passage in which the tenses 'describe neither a gradual process nor a reception at some interval after believing, but a definite gift at a definite moment' (Rackham, Com., in loc.; cf. Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, 1909, pp. 204, 342). The aorists can mean nothing else. In the case of the 'potential' adoption of the Jews (to borrow Lightfoot's phrase), it is the expression of the covenant between God and His people, and therefore must be ascribed to the moment of entering into the covenant at circumcision, the analogue of baptism. Yet in neither case is the adoption fully realized till the future (above, § 3 (c)). In view of what has been said, we can understand how 'adoption' came in later times to be an equivalent term for 'baptism.' Thus Payne Smith (Thesaur. Syr., Oxford, 1879-1901, ii. 2564) quotes a Syriac phrase to the effect that 'the baptism of John was of water unto repentance, but the baptism of our Lord [i.e. that ordained by Him] is of water and fire unto adoption.' And in the later Christian writers υιοθετία became a synonym for 'baptism' (Suicer, Thes.<sup>3</sup>, 1846, s.v.).

LITERATURE.—Athanasius, Orationes contra Arianos, passim (the general subject of this magnificent work is the Sonship of Christ); J. Pearson, On the Creed (ed. Burton, Oxford, 1864), art. i. p. 49, art. ii. note 57, p. 250; W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on the Galatians, London, 1899, § xxxi.; G. H. Box, in ERE, art. 'Adoption (Semitic)'; W. J. Woodhouse, ib., art. 'Adoption (Greek)' and 'Adoption (Roman)'; J. S. Candlish, in HDB, art. 'Adoption'; H. G. Wood, in SDB, art. 'Adoption.' See also J. E. Lightfoot, Com. on Galatians (1st ed., 1865, many subsequent edd.); Sanday-Headlam, Com. on Romans (1st ed., 1895); J. Armitage Robinson, Com. on Ephesians (1st ed., 1903).

A. J. MACLEAN.

ADORNING.—Simplicity of personal attire has been no infrequent accompaniment of moral and religious earnestness, even when not matter of prescription. Two passages of the NT (1 Ti 2<sup>3,10</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3,4</sup>) warn Christian women against excessive display in dress, fashion of the hair (see the art. HAIR), and use of ornaments, and contrast it with the superior adornment of the Christian virtues. At the end of the 2nd cent. both Clement Alex. (Pæd. ii. 10 f. [Eng. tr. 11 f.]) and Tertullian (de Cultu Feminarum) found it necessary to protest in much detail against the luxurious attire, etc., prevalent even amongst Christians of their day. The better adornment is frequently named in the intervening literature. The righteous, like their Lord, are adorned with good works (1 Clem. xxxiii. 7), and with a virtuous and honourable life (ii. 8). Ignatius contrasts the adornment of obedience to Christ with that of a festal procession to some heathen shrine (Eph. ix.).

The reference to the subject in 1 P 3<sup>3,4</sup> has some psychological interest. The adornment which is praised is that of 'the hidden man of the heart,' the meek and quiet spirit which is precious in God's sight, and incorruptible. This use of 'man' in the sense of personality suggests the well-known Pauline contrast between the inner and the outer man (2 Co 4<sup>16</sup>; cf. Ro 7<sup>22</sup>, Eph 3<sup>16</sup>), and may be a further example of that dependence of 1 Peter on Pauline writings which is now generally recognized (Moffatt, LNT<sup>2</sup>, p. 330). It has often been maintained (e.g. by Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der NT Theol. ii. 14, 15) that this contrast is a product of Hellenistic dualism. But it can be adequately explained from that Hebrew psychology which is the real basis of the Pauline and Petrine ideas of personality. The heart (or, in Pauline terminology, the 'mind' [Ro 7-2]) is the inner personality, as the apparelled members are the outer personality. Both are necessary, according to Hebrew thought, to make the unity of the whole man. See further on this point the article MAN.

H. WHEELER ROBINSON.

ADRAMYTTIUM (Ἀδραμύττιον; in the NT only the adjective Ἀδραμυττινός [Ac 27<sup>2</sup>] is found; WH Ἀδραμυττινός).—This flourishing seaport of Mysia was situated at the head of the Adramyttian Gulf, opposite the island of Lesbos, in the shelter of the southern side of Mt. Ida, after which the Gulf was also called the 'Idæan.'

Its name and origin were probably Phœnician, but Strabo describes it as 'a city founded by a colony of Athenians, with a harbour and roadstead' (xii. i. 51). Rising to importance under the Attalids, it became the metropolis of the N.W. district of the Roman province of Asia, and the head of a conventus iuridicus. Through it passed the coast-road which connected Ephesus with Troy and the Hellespont, while an inland highway linked it with Pergamos.

It was in 'a ship of Adramyttium'—larger than a mere coasting vessel—probably making for her own port, that St. Paul and St. Luke sailed from Cæsarea by Sidon and under the lee (to the east) of Cyprus to Myra in Lycia, where they joined a corn-ship of Alexandria bound for Italy (Ac 27<sup>2-6</sup>). The modern town of Edremid, which inherits the name and much of the prosperity of Adramyttium, is 5 miles from the coast.

LITERATURE.—Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, 1877, ii. 381 f.; J. Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul<sup>4</sup>, 1880, p. 62 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 316.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ADRIA (ὁ Ἀδρίας [WH Ἀδρίας], 'the Adrias,' RV 'the [sea of] Adria').—The name was derived from the important Tuscan town of Atria, near the mouths of the Padus, and was originally (Herod. vi. 127, vii. 20, ix. 92) confined to the northern part of the gulf now called the Adriatic, the lower part of which was known as the 'Ionian Sea.' In later times the name 'Adria' was applied to the whole basin between Italy and Illyria, while the 'Ionian Sea' came to mean the outer basin, south of the Strait of Otranto. Strabo, in the beginning of our era, says: 'The mouth (strait) is common to both; but this difference is to be observed, that the name "Ionian" is applied to the first part of the gulf only, and "Adriatic" to the interior sea up to the farthest end' (vii. v. 9). Strabo, however, indicates a wider extension of the meaning by adding that 'the name "Adrias" is now applied to the whole sea,' so that, as he says elsewhere, 'the Ionian Gulf forms part of what we now call "Adrias"' (ii. v. 20). Finally, in popular usage, which is followed by St. Luke (Ac 27<sup>27</sup>), the term 'Adria' was still further extended to signify the whole expanse between Crete and Sicily.

This is confirmed by Ptolemy, who wrote about the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. 'With the accuracy of a geographer, he distinguishes the Gulf of Adria from the Sea of Adria; thus, in enumerating the boundaries of Italy, he tells us that it is bounded on one side by the shores of the Gulf of Adria, and on the south by the shores of the Adria (iii. 1); and that Sicily is bounded on the east by the Sea of Adria (4). He further informs us that Italy is bounded on the south by the Adriatic Sea (14), that the Peloponnesus is bounded on the west and south by the Adriatic Sea (16), and that Crete is bounded on the west by the Adriatic Sea (17) (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul<sup>4</sup>, 163 f.).

The usage current in the first and second centuries is similarly reflected by Pausanias, who speaks of Alpheus flowing under Adria from Greece to Ortygia in Syracuse (viii. 54. 2), and of the Straits of Messina as communicating with the Adriatic and the Tyrrhenian Sea (v. 25. 3). Propertius (Bel. Vand. i. 14) makes the islands of Gaulos and Melita (Gozo and Malta) the boundary between the Adriatic and the Tyrrhenian Sea. The meaning of the term 'Adria' was the debatable point of the once famous controversy as to whether St. Paul suffered shipwreck on the Illyrian or the Sicilian Melita, i.e. on Meleda or Malta (see MELITA). His ship was 'driven through Adria' (διαφερόμενων ἡμῶν ἐν τῷ Ἀδρία, Ac 27<sup>27</sup>); perhaps not 'driven to and fro in the sea of Adria' (RV) (unless St. Luke made a landsman's mistake), but slowly carried forward in one direction, for probably 'she had storm sails set, and was on the starboard tack, which was the only course by which she could avoid falling into the Syrtis' (Smith, op. cit. 114). An interesting parallel to St. Paul's experience is found in the life of Josephus, who relates that his ship foundered in the midst of the same sea (κατὰ μέσον τὸν Ἀδρίαν), and that he and some companions, saving themselves by swimming, were picked up by a vessel sailing from Cyrene to Puteoli (Vit. 3).

LITERATURE.—J. Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul<sup>4</sup>, 1880, p. 162 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 334.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ADULTERY.—See MARRIAGE.

ADVENT.—See PAROUSIA.

ADVERSARY.—This renders three Greek words in the NT: 1. αντίδικος, properly an adversary in a lawsuit, and used of an earthly adversary in Mt 5<sup>25</sup>, Lk 12<sup>58</sup> 18<sup>3</sup>—all these with a legal reference. It is used of an enemy of God in 1 S 21<sup>0</sup> (LXX), and in 1 P 5<sup>8</sup> of 'the enemy,' Satan; in this last passage διάβολος is anarthrous, as a proper name, while αντίδικος has the article (see DEVIL and SATAN).

2. ἀντικείμενος, used in Lk 13<sup>17</sup> of our Lord's Jewish opponents, and in 21<sup>15</sup> of all adversaries of the disciples, is employed by St. Paul to denote those who oppose the Christian religion, probably in all cases with the suggestion that the devil is working through them. Such are the 'adversaries' of 1 Co 16<sup>9</sup>, Ph 1<sup>28</sup>; in 1 Ti 5<sup>14</sup> Chrysostom takes the 'adversary' to be Satan, the 'reviler' (cf. v. 15), or he may be the human enemy as prompted by Satan. In 2 Th 2<sup>4</sup> 'he that opposeth' (ὁ ἀντικείμενος) is Antichrist (q.v.), whose parousia is according to the working of Satan (v. 9); and it is interesting to note that the letter of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons (Euseb. HE v. i. 5) uses this expression absolutely of Satan, or of Antichrist, working through the persecutors, and 'giving us a foretaste of his unbridled activity at his future coming.'

3. ὑπερπύριος is used in He 10<sup>27</sup> of the adversaries of God, apostates from Christ, probably with reference to Is 26<sup>11</sup>, where the LXX has the same word. A similar phrase in Tit 2<sup>9</sup> is 'he that is of the contrary part,' an opponent, ὁ ἐξ ἐναντίας. In Col 2<sup>14</sup> the word ὑπερπύριος is used of an inanimate object: 'the bond . . . which was contrary to us.'

A. J. MACLEAN.

ADVOCATE.—See PARACLETE.

ÆNEAS (Ἀλφίας).—The name occurs only once in the NT (Ac 9<sup>33</sup>, 34). The person so called was a dweller in Lydda or Lod, a town on the plain of Sharon about ten miles south of Joppa, to which many of the Christians had fled after the persecution which dispersed the apostles and the church of Jerusalem. On a visit of St. Peter to the place, Æneas, who had for eight years been confined to bed as a paralytic, was healed by the Apostle. The cure seems to have had a very remarkable influence in the district, causing many of the dwellers in Sharon and Lydda to accept Christianity. Nothing further is known of the man. Probably he became a Christian at the date of his cure.

W. F. BOYD.

ÆON (αἰών, αἰῶνες, 'age,' 'ages').—There is some uncertainty as to the derivation of the word αἰών. Some relate it with ἀνμι, 'to breathe,' but modern opinion connects it with αἰ, aiel (= alFaw), and finds as other derivatives the Latin æcum and the English 'aye.' In the LXX αἰών is used to translate עולם in various forms, as עולם, Gn 6<sup>4</sup>; עולם, 1 K 1<sup>31</sup>; עולם, Gn 21<sup>33</sup>; עולם, Ec 3<sup>1</sup>. It is of frequent occurrence in the NT. The instances number 125 in TR, and 120 in critical editions. Following these, it is noteworthy that in the Gospels and Acts, where it occurs 34 times, it is only once used in the plural (Lk 1<sup>33</sup>). In the rest of the NT the use of the plural predominates (54 out of 86 instances). In Rev. the word occurs with great frequency (26 times). In every case it is used in the plural, and, except in two places, in the intensive formula εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων—a form which is never found in the Gospels or Acts. αἰών is variously translated as 'age,' 'for ever,' 'world,' 'course,' 'eternal.' It expresses a time-concept, and under all uses of the word that concept remains in a more or less definite degree.

1. It expresses the idea of long or indefinite past time, ἀπ' αἰῶνος, 'since the world began' (EV; Lk 1<sup>70</sup>, Ac 3<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>18</sup>; cf. עולם, Gn 6<sup>4</sup>, Is 64<sup>4</sup>, ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος, Jn 9<sup>32</sup>). In these instances, the phrases express what we mean when, speaking generally and indefinitely of time past, we say 'from of old' or 'from the most ancient time.'

2. The common classical use of αἰών for 'lifetime' is not found in the NT; but there are instances where the phrase εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα seems to have that significance; e.g. 'The servant abideth not in the house for life, but the son abideth for life,' Jn 8<sup>35</sup> (also Mt 21<sup>19</sup>, Jn 13<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>13</sup>).

3. The phrase εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα or τοὺς αἰῶνας is frequently found in the NT as a time-concept for a period or 'age' of indefinite futurity, and may be translated 'for ever.' Strictly speaking, in accordance with the root idea of αἰών, the phrase indicates futurity or continuance as long as the 'age' lasts to which the matter referred to belongs. The use of the intensive form εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων (Gal 1<sup>5</sup>, Eph 3<sup>21</sup>, He 13<sup>21</sup>, and Rev. passim) indicates the effort of Christian faith to give expression to its larger conception of the 'ages' as extending to the limits of human thought, by duplicating and reduplicating the original word. The larger vision gave the larger meaning; but it cannot be said that the fundamental idea of 'age,' as an epoch or dispensation with an end, is lost. In the Fourth Gospel the phrase is sometimes employed as a synonym for 'eternal life' (Jn 6<sup>51</sup>, 58).

4. The plural αἰῶνες expresses the time-idea as consisting of or embracing many ages—æons, periods of vast extent—'from all ages' (RV, Eph 3<sup>9</sup>), 'the ages to come' (Eph 2<sup>7</sup>, etc.). Some of these 'ages' are regarded as having come to an end—'but now once in the end of the world' ('at the end of the ages' RV) hath he appeared to put away sin' (He 9-6). The idea of one age succeeding another as under ordered rule is provided for in the suggestive title 'the king eternal' (EV 'the king of the ages') (1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>; cf. אֵל עוֹלָם, Gn 21<sup>33</sup>). In He 1<sup>2</sup> 'through whom also he made the worlds' (ages), and He 11<sup>3</sup> 'the worlds (ages) were made by the word of God,' we have the striking conception of the 'ages' as 'including all that is manifested in and through them' (Westcott, Com. in loc.). (In Wis 13<sup>9</sup> there is a curious instance of αἰών as referring to the actual world, 'For if they were able to know so much that they could aim at the world [στοχάζεσθαι τὸν αἰῶνα], how did they not sooner find out the Lord thereof?')

5. There is also attached to the word the significance of 'age' as indicating a period or dispensation of a definite character—the present order of 'world-life' viewed as a whole and as possessing certain moral characteristics. It is unfortunate that there is no word in English which exactly expresses this meaning. The general translation in AV and RV is 'world,' though 'age' appears always in RVm and in the text at He 6<sup>5</sup>. There is undoubtedly at times a close similarity of connotation between αἰών and κόσμος as indicating a moral order. In the Gospel and Epp. of John αἰών is never used in this sense, but κόσμος is employed instead: e.g. 'Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out' (Jn 12<sup>31</sup>, also 15<sup>19</sup> etc.), 'If any man love the world' (1 Jn 2<sup>15</sup> etc.). They are almost, if not altogether, synonymous in 'Where is the disputer of this world ('age,' αἰών)? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world (κόσμος)?' (1 Co 1<sup>20</sup>). That St. Paul recognized a distinction between them is evident from the phrase κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, which is translated both in AV and in RV 'according to the course of this world' (Eph 2-). Plainly αἰών describes some quality of the κόσμος. We have no term to express it exactly, but our phrase 'the spirit of the age' comes very near to what is required.

6. This 'world' or 'age' as a moral order includes the current epoch of the world's life. It is an epoch in which the visible and the transitory have vast power over the souls of men, and may become the only objects of hope and desire. It is described simply as αἰών, 'the world' (Mt 13-; Mk 4<sup>19</sup>), and its end is emphatically affirmed (Mt 13<sup>39, 40, 49</sup> 24<sup>3</sup> 28<sup>9</sup>). But more frequently it is referred to as in contrast to a coming age. It is described as ὁ αἰών οὗτος, 'this world' (Mt 12<sup>32</sup>, Lk 16<sup>8</sup>, Ro 12<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>0</sup>, etc.); as ὁ νυν αἰών (1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>, etc.); as ὁ αἰών ὁ ἐνεστώς, 'the present . . . world' (Gal 1<sup>4</sup>). The future age is described as ὁ αἰών μέλλων, 'the world to come' (Mt 12<sup>32</sup>, He 6<sup>5</sup>); ὁ ἐρχόμενος, 'the world to come' (Mk 10<sup>30</sup>, etc.); and as ὁ αἰών ἐκείνος, 'that world' (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>). The present 'age' has its God (2 Co 4<sup>1</sup>), its rulers and its wisdom (1 Co 2<sup>6-8</sup>), its sons (Lk 16<sup>8</sup>), its fashion (Ro 12<sup>2</sup>), and its cares (Mt 13-). Men may be rich in it (1 Ti 6<sup>17</sup>), and love it (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>). It is an evil age (Gal 1<sup>4</sup>), yet it is possible to live soberly, righteously, and godly in it (Tit 2<sup>12</sup>), and it has an end (Mt 13<sup>40</sup>). In the future 'age' there is 'eternal life' (Mk 10<sup>30</sup>, Lk 18<sup>30</sup>). Those who are counted worthy of it 'neither marry nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more' (Lk 20<sup>35</sup>). It has 'powers' that may be 'tasted' in the present age (He 6<sup>5</sup>).

The contrast is regarded as that which is described in Jewish writings as הָאָהַר הַזֶּה וְהָאָהַר הַבָּא, 'this age' and 'the age that is to come.' These are identified with the age before and after the coming of the Messiah. There is much uncertainty as to the time when this contrast first arose. Dalman says that 'in pre-Christian products of Jewish literature there is as yet no trace of these ideas to be found' (The Words of Jesus, p. 148). It is difficult to believe that a nation which expected so much from the advent of the Messiah did not form some idea, at a date before the days of Jesus Christ, of the vast changes which would be produced when He did come, and look upon the age which was so marked as one to be contrasted with the age in which they were living. We cannot follow Dalman when he says: 'It is not unlikely that in the time of Jesus the idea of "the future age," being the product of the schools of the scribes, was not yet familiar to those He addressed' (ib. p. 135). Dalman apparently doubts whether Jesus used the term Himself, but says: 'The currency of the expressions "this age," "the future age," is at all events established by the end of the first Christian century.' He makes the reservation that 'for that period the expressions characterised the language of the learned rather than that of the people' (ib. p. 151).

7. Among the Gnostics (see Gnosticism) the Æons were emanations from the Divine. But this meaning of the word belongs to a time when the Gnostic ideas and terminology were more fully developed than in the first century of the Christian era. It is enough to quote the opinion of Hort in his Judaistic Christianity, 'There is not the faintest sign that such words as . . . αἰών . . . have any reference [in the NT] to what we call Gnostic terms' (p. 133, also p. 146).

LITERATURE.—G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr. Edinburgh, 1902, pp. 147 ff., 162 ff.; HDB, art. 'World'; Westcott, Com. on the Epistle to the Hebrews, in locis; F. Rendall, Expositor, 3rd ser., vii. [1885] 266-278; Wilke-Grimm, Clavis Novi Testamenti, s.v.; ERE, artt. 'Æons' and 'Ages of the World'; F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge and London, 1894, pp. 133, 146; H. B. Swete, Gospel according to St. Mark, London, 1902, pp. 65, 217; J. T. Marshall, ExpT, x. [1898-99] 323; Lightfoot, Com. on Colossians and Philemon<sup>3</sup>, London, 1879, p. 73 ff.; C. Geikie, Life and Words of Christ, do. 1877, p. 625; J. Agar Beet, Last Things, do. 1913, pp. 70 f., 132 f.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>2</sup> (1CC, 1902).

JOHN REID.

AFFLICTION.—See SUFFERING.

AGABUS (Ἀγαβος, a word of uncertain derivation).—The bearer of this name is mentioned on two separate occasions in the Acts (11<sup>2-30</sup> 21<sup>10-11</sup>) and also by Eusebius (HE ii. 3). He is described as a prophet who resided in Jerusalem, and we find him in A.D. 44 at Antioch, where he predicted that a great famine (q.v.) would take place 'over all the world,' i.e. over all the Roman Empire. The immediate effect of this prediction was to call forth the liberality of the Christians of Antioch and lead them to send help to the poor brethren of Judæa (Ac 11<sup>29</sup>). The writer of the Acts tells us that this famine took place in the reign of Claudius. Roman historians speak of wide-spread and repeated famines in this reign (Sueton. Claudius, xviii.; Dion Cass. ix.; Tac. Ann. xii. 43), and Josephus testifies to the severity of the famine in Palestine and refers to measures adopted for its relief (Ant. III. xv. 3, XX. ii. 5, v. 2). Though Syria and the East may have suffered most on this occasion, the whole Empire could not fail to be more or less affected, and it is hypercritical to accuse the author of the Acts of 'unhistorical generalization' for speaking of a famine 'over all the world,' as is done by Schürer (GJV<sup>4</sup> i. [1901] 543, 567; cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, p. 48 f., and Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, 1898, p. 251 f.).

Again in A.D. 59 we hear of Agabus at Cæsarea, where he met St. Paul on his return from his third missionary journey. Taking the Apostle's girdle, he bound his own hands and feet, and in the symbolic manner of the ancient Hebrew prophets predicted that so the Jews would bind the owner of the girdle and hand him over to the Gentiles (Ac 21<sup>10-11</sup>). The prophecy failed to move St. Paul from his resolve. There is no means of ascertaining whether Agabus was a prophet in the higher NT sense—a preacher or forth-teller of the Word; or whether he was merely a successful soothsayer. It is difficult to see what good end could be served by the second of his recorded predictions. Tradition makes him one of the 'seventy' and a martyr at Antioch.

W. F. BOYD.

AGE.—The general significance of 'age' is a period of time, or a measure of life. Specially, it expresses the idea of advancement in life, or of oldness. Several Greek words are employed in NT for 'age.' (1) αιων (see ÆON). (2) γενεα, 'a generation,' loosely measured as extending from 30 to 33 years. In Eph 3<sup>5, 21</sup> RV rightly puts 'generations' for 'ages.' (3) τελειος, 'full-grown' or 'perfect.' In He 5<sup>14</sup> for AV 'to them that are of full age' the RV substitutes 'fullgrown' in the text, and 'perfect' in the margin (cf. 1 Co 2<sup>6</sup>, where the RV has 'perfect' in the text, and 'full-grown' in the margin). (4) ηλικια is the most exact Greek term for 'age,' and especially for full age as applied to human life. It includes also the ideas of maturity or fitness, and of stature, as when a person has attained to full development of growth. In Eph 4<sup>13</sup> 'the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (EV) is somewhat difficult to interpret. The phrase is co-ordinate with the words 'a perfect (or fullgrown, τελειος) man,' which precede it in the text. Both phrases describe the ultimate height of spiritual development which the Church as the body of Christ is to reach. The latter phrase explains what the former implies. The general line of interpretation is that the whole Church as the body of Christ is to grow into 'a fullgrown or perfect man,' and the standard or height of the perfect man is the stature of Christ in His fullness (see Comm. of Meyer, Eadie, Ellicott, in loc.; Field, Notes on the Tr. of the NT, 1899, p. 6; Expositor, 7th ser., ii. [1906] 441 ff.). In Gal 1<sup>4</sup>, where the compound συνηλικιωτας is used, the word has its primary meaning of 'age' (= 'equals in age').

The question of age was of importance as regards fitness for holding office in the Church (see NOVICE). In later times the canonical age varied, but in general it was fixed at thirty (see Cathol. Encyc. art. 'Age'). It was also considered in relation to the dispensing of the charity of the Church, at least in the case of widows. In 1 Ti 5<sup>9</sup> it is said: 'Let none be enrolled as a widow under threescore years old.' The question naturally arises, Were only widows of advanced years eligible for assistance? It is possible that younger widows might be in greater need of help. Because of this it is supposed by some (Schleiermacher, etc.) that the reference is to an order of deaconesses—a supposition that becomes an argument for a late and un-Pauline date for the Epistle. Others think that the reference is to an order of widows who had duties which somewhat resembled those of the presbyters (Huther, Ellicott, Alford). De Wette believes that probably there were women who vowed themselves to perpetual widowhood, and performed certain functions in the Church; but evidences of such an order belong to a later date in the Church's history. On the whole, and especially if the Epistle belongs to an early date, it is best to regard the instruction as a direction about widows who were entirely dependent on the charity of the Church. Younger widows would receive help according to their need, but were not enrolled like the older widows as regular recipients of the Church's charity. The age limit for an old age pension is not a new idea. It is impossible to determine if the widows who were enrolled were bound to give some service in return for the assistance which they received. The probability is that they were not, assuming, of course, the early date of the Epistle (see H. R. Reynolds, in Expos., 1st ser., iii. [1880] 382-390; HDB, art. 'Widows').

The dispensing of charity to widows was a great and grave problem in the early Church. The rule about enrolment only when the threescore years had been reached was evidently intended to restrict the number of those who were entitled to receive regular help. Nestle calls attention to 'the punning observation in the Didascalia (= Const. Apost. iii. 6) about itinerant widows who were so ready to receive that they were not so much χηραι as πηραι' (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, p. 109, note). The pun may be rendered in English as 'not so much "widows" as "wallets."'

In 1 Ti 5<sup>1</sup> and 1 P 5<sup>5</sup> 'elders' (πρεσβυτεροι) has the primitive signification of 'men of advanced age.' Cf. also the following article.

JOHN REID.

AGED.—In Philem<sup>9</sup> the writer speaks of himself as Παῦλος πρεσβυτης (AV and RV 'Paul the aged,' RVm 'ambassador'). In strictness the translation 'ambassador' requires πρεσβευτης, a word which does not occur in the NT. The two forms may have been confused in transcription or in common use. The translation 'ambassador' is more fitting because Philemon, as father of Archippus, who was old enough to hold some 'ministry' in the Church (Col 4<sup>17</sup>), must have been the equal, or nearly the equal, of St. Paul in age; and there would be little or no ground for an appeal based on considerations of age. It is also to be noticed that the phrase 'ambassador and . . . prisoner of Jesus Christ' is practically repeated in Eph 6<sup>20</sup>, 'an ambassador in bonds.' Taking the word as meaning 'ambassador,' the appeal would have in it a note of authority. It is not a relevant objection to say that St. Paul is beseeching Philemon 'for love's sake' (v.<sup>9</sup>). It is the peculiarity of the Christian ambassador that he beseeches those whom he addresses. Love and authority are commingled in his mission, as in 2 Co 5<sup>14, 20</sup>. The likelihood of 'ambassador' being the right translation is strengthened by the fact that here as elsewhere (2 Co 5<sup>0</sup>, Eph 6<sup>0</sup>) St. Paul uses a verbal and not a noun form to express his position as an ambassador. See J. B. Lightfoot, Com. on Col. and Philemon<sup>3</sup>, 1879, in loc.; and cf. art. AMBASSADOR.

JOHN REID.

AGRIPPA.—See HEROD.

AIR.—The apostles, like other Jews of their time, regarded the air as a region between earth and the higher heavens, inhabited by spirits, especially evil spirits. In Eph 2<sup>2</sup> the air is the abode of Satan (see below); in Eph 6<sup>12</sup> 'the heavenlies' (τα ἐπουρνια)—a vague phrase used also in Eph 1<sup>3, 20, 26, 310</sup> to denote the heavenly or spiritual sphere, the unseen universe*—is where the wrestling of the Christian against the spiritual hosts of wickedness takes place, and is apparently in this case equivalent to 'this darkness' (cf. Lk 22<sup>53</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup> 'power of darkness,' i.e. tyranny of evil). In Rev 12<sup>7</sup> the war between Michael and the dragon is in 'heaven.' This can hardly refer to the first rebellion of Satan, nor yet can we with Bede interpret 'heaven' as the Church; but rather the fighting is in the heavens, a struggle of Satan to regain his lost place, ended by his final expulsion. 'As the Incarnation called forth a counter-manifestation of diabolic power on earth, so after the Ascension the attack is supposed to be carried into heaven' (Swete, Com. in loc.). But the conception is not unlike that of St. Paul as noted above.

There are several parallels to these passages in that class of literature which is thought to be a

* The Peshitta renders it 'in heaven,' except in 6<sup>12</sup> where it significantly has 'under heaven.'

Christian rehandling of Jewish apocalyptic writings. In the Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs (q.v.) we read of the 'aerial spirit Beliar' (Benj. 3). In the Ascension of Isaiah (q.v.) there is described an ascent 'into the firmament,' where were Sammael and his powers, and there was a great fight (vii. 9); Christ descends from the lowest heaven to the firmament where was continual warfare, and takes the form of the angels of the air (x. 29). In the Slavonic Secrets of Enoch the apostate angels are suspended in the second heaven awaiting the Last Judgment (§ 7; see Thackeray, Relation of St. Paul to Contemp. Jewish Thought, London, 1900, p. 176 f.). These works in their present form probably date from the latter part of the 1st or the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D. The ideas seem to have had much currency among Christians, for we find Athanasius (de Incarn. 25) speaking of the devil having fallen from heaven and wandering about 'our lower atmosphere,' 'there bearing rule over his fellow-spirits . . .,' 'while the Lord came to cast down the devil, and clear the air and prepare the way for us up into heaven.'

The prince of the power of the air (Eph 2<sup>2</sup>) is Satan. That he had authority over the evil spirits whose abode is in the air was the general Jewish belief, except among the Sadducees. St. Paul does not, however, here say 'powers of the air,' i.e. evil spirits, but the 'air-power' or 'air-tyranny' (for this meaning of ἐξουσία see Lightfoot's note on Col 1<sup>13</sup>). Satan is the arch-tyrant whose abode is in the air.

LITERATURE.—See art. DEMON.

A. J. MACLEAN.

AKELDAMA ('Ακελδαμάχ WH, 'Ακελδαμά TR).—Akeldama is said to be equivalent to χωρίον αἵματος in Ac 1<sup>19</sup>, and to ἀγρός αἵματος in Mt 27<sup>8</sup>: in that case the word represents Aram. ܐܬܪ ܕܚܝܬ and the final χ (which is retained also in the best Vulg. text, acheldemach) transliterates κ (which is only rarely so found). It has, therefore, been suggested as possible that the second part of the word represents Aram. ܩܝܡܬܝܬܝܐ, 'cemetery,' which accords better with St. Matthew's explanation, though not with St. Luke's. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that we have here an instance of the occasional discrepancies and inaccuracies which have from an early period crept into the text of the NT. It would certainly seem as if the explanation of the title 'field of blood' given in Mt 27<sup>8</sup> is radically different from that suggested in Ac 1<sup>19</sup>, and that the former is more in accordance with the facts, though still an incorrect translation of the Aram. title, while it is probable that the whole section vv.<sup>18, 19</sup> (with or without v.<sup>20</sup>) of the latter passage is not part of St. Peter's speech, but a comment or gloss either by the author of the book (St. Luke) himself or even by some later editor or transcriber, who has incorporated a less trustworthy tradition in the text.

The site of Akeldama is the modern Hakk ed-Dumm, on the south side of the Valley of Hinnom. See, further, art. s.v. in HDB and DCG.

C. L. FELTOE.

ALEXANDER ('Αλέξανδρος, 'helper of men').—This name is found in the NT in five different connexions, and possibly designates as many different individuals.

1. The son of Simon of Cyrene, who bore the cross to Calvary (Mk 15<sup>21</sup>), and the brother of Rufus. In all probability Alexander and his brother were well-known and honoured men in the Church of Rome (cf. Ro 16<sup>13</sup> and art. RUFUS), to which the Gospel of Mark was addressed, as St. Mark identifies the father by a reference to the sons. We may regard the allusion as an interesting instance of the sons being blessed for the father's sake.

2. A leader of the priestly party in Jerusalem at the period subsequent to the death of Christ. After the healing of the impotent man we are told that Alexander was present at a meeting of the Jewish authorities along with Annas, Caiaphas, and John, and 'as many as were of the kindred of the high priest' (Ac 4<sup>6</sup>). It is probable, though not quite certain, that this indicates that Alexander belonged to the high-priestly class; and it is impossible to identify him with Alexander the 'alabarch' of Alexandria and brother of Philo.

3. A leading member of the Jewish community at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>33</sup>), who was put forward by the Jews at the time of the Ephesian riot to clear themselves of any complicity with St. Paul or his teaching, but whom the mob refused to hear. He may have been one of the 'craftsmen,' though on the whole it is unlikely that a Jew would have any connexion with the production of the symbols of idolatry. There are, however, slight variations in the MSS of Ac 19<sup>33</sup>, and different views have been taken with regard to Alexander and the intention of the Jews. Meyer holds that Alexander was a Jewish Christian who was put forward maliciously by the Jews in the hope that he might be sacrificed (cf. Com. in loco). The omission of τις, 'a certain,' before his name has been regarded as an indication that Alexander was a well-known man in Ephesus at the time.

4. A Christian convert and teacher, who along with Hymenæus (q.v.) and others apostatized from the faith, and was excommunicated by the Apostle Paul (1 Ti 1<sup>19-20</sup>).

5. Alexander the coppersmith, who did St. Paul much evil and whom the Apostle desires to be rewarded according to his works (2 Ti 4<sup>14-15</sup>). This Alexander has been identified with both 3 and 4. We are able to gather certain facts regarding him which would seem to connect him with 3.—(1) His trade was that of a smith (see COPPERSMITH), a worker in metal, originally brass, but subsequently any other metal, which might associate him with the craftsmen of Ephesus. (2) The statement regarding him was addressed to Timothy, who was settled in Ephesus. On the other hand, we are told that Alexander greatly withstood St. Paul's words—a reference which seems to indicate a bitter personal hostility between the two men, as well as controversial disputes on matters of doctrine which might rather connect him with 4, the associate of Hymenæus. It is possible that 3, 4, and 5 may be the same person, but Alexander was a very common name, and the data are insufficient to allow of any certain identification. Those who hold the Epistles to Timothy to be non-Pauline regard the statement in Ac 19<sup>33</sup> as the basis of the references in the Epistles, but the only thing in common is the name, while there is no indication in Acts that Alexander had any personal connexion with St. Paul.

LITERATURE.—R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900; Comm. of Meyer, Zeller, Holtzmann; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, p. 279; art. in HDB and EBi.

W. F. BOYD.

ALEXANDRIA ('Αλεξάνδρεια).—The city of Alexandria almost realized Alexander the Great's dream of 'a city surpassing anything previously existing' (Plutarch, Alex. xxvi.). Planned by Dinocrates under the king's supervision, and built on a neck of land two miles wide interposed between the Mediterranean Sea and Lake Mareotis (Mariut), about 14 miles from the Canopic mouth of the Nile, it became successively the capital of Hellenic, Roman, and Christian Egypt, 'the greatest mart in the world' (μέγιστον ἐμποριον τῆς οἰκουμένης, Strabo, xvii. i. 13), and next to Rome the most splendid city in the Empire. About 4 miles long from E. to W., nearly a mile wide, and about 15 miles in circumference, it was quartered—like so many of the Hellenic cities of the period—by two colonnaded thoroughfares crossing each other at a great central square, terminating in the four principal gates, and determining the line of the other streets, so that the whole city was laid out in parallelograms. The three regions into which it was divided—the Regio Judæorum, Bruchesium, and Rhacotis—corresponded generally with the three classes of the population—Jews, Greeks, and Egyptians—while representatives of nearly all other nations commingled in its streets (Dio Chrys. Orat. 32). Diodorus Siculus, who visited it about 58 B.C., estimates (xvii. 52) its free citizens at 300,000, and it probably had at least an equal number of slaves.

'Its fine air,' says Strabo, 'is worthy of remark: this results from the city being on two sides surrounded by water, and from the favourable effects of the rise of the Nile,' one canal joining the great river to the lake, and another the lake to the sea. 'The Nile, being full, fills the lake also, and leaves no marshy matter which is likely to cause exhalations' (xvii. i. 7).

The name of the city does not occur in the NT, but 'Alexandrian,' as noun and adj. (Ἀλεξανδρινός), is found 4 times in Acts. There was a synagogue of Alexandrians in Jerusalem (6<sup>9</sup>), fanatical defenders of the Mosaic faith, roused to indignation by the heresies of Stephen. Apollos was 'an Alexandrian by race, a learned man (ἀνὴρ λόγιος; AV and RVm, 'eloquent'), mighty in the scriptures' (18<sup>24</sup>). In one Alexandrian ship St. Paul was wrecked at Melita (27<sup>9</sup>), and in another he continued his voyage to Puteoli (28<sup>11</sup>). Here are references to the three most striking aspects of the life of Alexandria—her religion, culture, and commerce. We invert the order.

1. Commerce.—Alexandria was built on a site uniquely adapted for maritime trade. Served on her northern side by the Great Harbour and the Haven of Happy Return* (εὐνοστός), which were formed by a mole seven stadia in length—the Heptastadium—flung across to the island of Pharos,† and on her southern side by the wharves of Mareotis, Alexandria entered into the heritage of both Tyre and Carthage, and drew to herself the commerce of three continents. Under the Ptolemys Egypt largely took the place of the lands around the Euxine as a grain-producing country, and 'corn in Egypt' became as proverbial as it had been in the days of the Pharaohs.

'The corn which was sent from thence to Italy was conveyed in ships of very great size. From the dimensions given of one of them by Lucian, they appear to have been quite as large as the largest class of merchant ships of modern times' (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul<sup>3</sup>, 1880, p. 71 f.).

The cruisers and coasters of Alexandria traded with every part of the Mediterranean, and it was an ordinary occurrence to find vessels bound for Italy in the harbours of Myra and Malta (Ac 27<sup>6</sup> 28<sup>11</sup>). Seneca gives a vivid picture of the arrival of the Alexandrian fleet of merchantmen at Puteoli (Ep. 77). The trade which came to Lake Mareotis from the Nile and the Red Sea was equally important.

'Large fleets,' says Strabo (xvii. i. 13), 'are dispatched as far as India and the extremities of Ethiopia, from which places the most valuable freights are brought to Egypt, and are thence exported to other places, so that a double amount of custom is collected, arising from imports on the one hand, and from exports on the other.'

2. Culture.—It was the great ambition of the Ptolemys to make their capital not only the commercial but the intellectual centre of the world. Alexandria really succeeded in winning for herself the crown of science, and was for centuries the foster-mother of an international Hellenic culture.

* Its inner basin, Kibotos, greatly enlarged, forms the modern harbour.

† On the eastern point of the island was the famous Lighthouse, one of the 'Seven Wonders' of the world.

The proofs of her devotion to letters were seen in the Bruchesium, or central quarter of the city, which contained not only the mausoleum* of Alexander, the palaces of the Egyptian kings, the Temple of Poseidon, and, at a later date, the Cæsarium† in which divine honours were paid to the Roman emperors, but the Museum, which in many ways resembled a modern university, with lecture halls and State-paid professors, and the Library, in which were accumulated the books of Greece, Rome, Egypt, and India, to the number (according to Josephus, Ant. XII. ii. 1) of more than half a million. In this home of endowed research the exact sciences flourished; Alexandria had on her roll of fame the names of Euclid in geometry, Hipparchus in astronomy, Eratosthenes in geography; and her physicians were the most celebrated in the world. For literature her savants did a noble work in collecting, revising, and classifying the records of the past. On the whole, however, her literary school was imitative rather than creative; her poets trusted more to learning than to imagination, and the muses rarely visited the Museum. The artificial atmosphere of literary criticism, which was the breath of life to grammarians, philologists, and dialecticians, chilled rather than fostered original genius. Alexandria's most brilliant scholars, detached from the realities of life, immured in academic cloisters, were connoisseurs, not writers, of classics.

In the Roman period 'numerous and respectable labours of erudition, particularly philological and physical, proceeded from the circle of the savants "of the Museum," as they entitled themselves, like the Parisians "of the Institute"; but . . . it was here very clearly apparent that the main matter was not pensions and rewards, but the contact . . . of great political and great scientific work' (Mommsen, Provinces<sup>2</sup>, ii. 271 f.).

3. Religion.—While the eclecticism of Alexandrian religion was represented in its pagan aspect by the cultus of the Serapeum, the most famous of the city's temples, in which the attempt was made to blend the creeds of Greece and Egypt, the grafting of Judaism on Hellenism flowered into a system which had far more influence upon the permanent thought of the world. The migration of the Jews to Egypt, which began at the time of the downfall of Jerusalem (Jer 42<sup>14</sup>), increased rapidly under the Ptolemys, who welcomed them as colonists, giving them equal civic rights with the Macedonians and Greeks—rights which both Julius Cæsar and Augustus confirmed to them. Occupying their own quarter of the city—the north-eastern—and forming, under their ethnarch or 'alabarch,' a community within a community, they were yet profoundly influenced by their environment, and developed not only a genius for trade but a passion for learning. In the beginning of our era they amounted to an eighth part of the population, and nowhere else was the scattered race so wealthy, so cultured, or so influential. Alexandria became the greatest of Jewish cities, the centre of Semitism as well as of Hellenism (q.v.). Naturalized in a foreign city and inevitably breathing its spirit, the Jews showed themselves at once pliant and stubborn. Glorifying in the retention of their monotheistic faith, they yet dropped their sacred Hebrew language. Their Scriptures, translated into Greek‡ for their own use, came into the hands of their Hellenic neighbours, who gave them * Near the centre of the city, perhaps represented by the present mosque Nebi Daniel.

† Near it were 'Cleopatra's Needles,' one of which is now in London, and the other in New York.

‡ The legend of the composition of the Septuagint, contained in the Letter of Aristeas, is probably based on facts. The initiative seems to have been taken by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who doubtless wished to promote the use of Greek among the Jewish population of the city. The Law was translated in the 3rd cent. B.C., the Prophets (probably) in the 2nd, and most of the 'Writings' in the 1st, while Ecclesiastes and Daniel were not translated till the 2nd cent. A.D.

in exchange the classics of Athens. Alexandria thus became the meeting-place of Eastern and Western ideals. Both races were sensitive to impressions: while the Jews felt the subtle influence of a rich civilization and a lofty philosophy, the Greeks were attracted by a strange note of assurance regarding God. In an eclectic age and city, the endeavour was consequently made to harmonize the religion of Moses with that of Plato. Mommsen remarks that they were the clearest heads and the most gifted thinkers who sought admission either as Hellenes into the Jewish, or as Jews into the Hellenic, system (Provinces<sup>2</sup>, ii. 167). With perfect sincerity, if by faulty exegesis, the Jewish men of culture made their Scriptures yield up the doctrines of the Academy and the Stoa. The literary exponent of this spiritual rapprochement is Philo (q.v.), who probably did little more than give expression to the current opinions of his countrymen in the time of our Lord. While not a little of his Neo-Judaism must, on account of his persistent allegorizing, be regarded as pseudo-Judaism, he had the supreme merit of combining the highest Eastern with the highest Western view of the universe; of identifying the Hebrew 'wisdom' with the Greek 'reason'; of developing Plato's conception of the world as the θειον γεννητόν, the εἰκων τοῦ ποιητοῦ, the μονογενής (the Divine Child, the Image of its Maker, the Only-begotten) into that of the κόσμος νοητός or λόγος, which is the Invisible God's πρωτόγονος or πρωτότοκος, His ἀπαύγασμα or χαρακτήρ; and of thus facilitating that fusion of Hellenism and Hebraism out of which so much Christian theology has sprung. Alexandrian thought provided the categories—in themselves cold and speculative—into which Christianity, as represented by the writers of Colossians, Hebrews, and the Fourth Gospel, poured the warm life-blood of a historic and humane faith. And if the Alexandrian exegetical method was often unscientific—as when it made Moses identify Abraham with understanding, Sarah with virtue, Noah with righteousness, the four streams of Paradise with the four cardinal virtues—yet the writer of Hebrews could scarcely have built a bridge between Judaism and Christianity unless he had been trained in a school which taught its disciples to pass from symbols to ultimate realities. Apollos (q.v.), the learned and eloquent (λόγιος, δυνατός ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς), was a true Alexandrian, not impossibly 'of the Museum'; and Luther was happily inspired in suggesting that he may have been the writer who used the Hebrew-Hellenic theology of Egypt to interpret the manger of Bethlehem. See also the following article.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Alexandria' in HDB, SDB, EBI, and in Pauly-Wissowa; H. Kiepert, Zur Topog. des alten Alexandria, Berlin, 1872; J. P. Mahaffy, Alexander's Empire, London, 1888, and The Silver Age of the Greek World, do. 1906; T. Mommsen, Prov. of Rom. Emp.<sup>2</sup>, 2 vols., do. 1909; J. Drummond, Philo-Judeus, 2 vols., do. 1888; cf. also W. M. Ramsay's art. 'Roads and Travel (in NT)' in HDB, v. 375 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ALEXANDRIANS.—Among the active opponents of St. Stephen were 'certain of them that were of the synagogue called the synagogue . . . of the Alexandrians' (Ἀλεξανδρέων, Ac 6<sup>9</sup>).

Grammatically the sentence is not in good form, and admits of a variety of interpretations. Some exegetes (Calvin, Bengel, O. Holtzmann, Rendall) assume that the Libertines, Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and Asiatics residing in Jerusalem all worshipped in one synagogue. Others (Wendt, Zockler, Sanday, Knowling, Winer-Moulton) think that the first three classes of Jews had one synagogue and the last two another—an idea favoured by the τῶν . . . τῶν after τινές. T. E. Page groups the Libertines in one place of worship, the men of Alexandria and Cyrene in a second, and those of Cilicia and Asia in a third. Finally, some scholars (Schürer, Meyer, Weiss, Hackett) believe that each of the five classes had its own distinctive synagogue in the holy city. A synagogue of the Alexandrians in Jerusalem is mentioned in Jerus. Megilla, 73d, where it is also said that there were in all no fewer than 425 synagogues in the city—a statement which Schürer (HJP II. ii. 73) dismisses as an insipid Talmudic legend, but which Renan (The Apostles, Eng. tr., 113) is disposed to accept as 'by no means improbable.'

The Jews of Alexandria (q.v.) were in a very different position from the people of any modern Ghetto. They were amongst the most opulent and influential citizens. They formed a distinct municipal community, and possessed extensive political privileges. At the foundation of the city Alexander gave them equal rights with the Greeks (ἔδωκε το μετοικεῖν κατὰ τὴν πόλιν ἐξ ἰσοτιμίας πρὸς Ἕλληνας), and the Diadochoi permitted them to style themselves Macedonians (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 7). Of the five quarters (μοῖραι) of the city, named after the first five letters of the alphabet, two were called 'Jewish' (Ἰουδαϊκαὶ λέγονται [Philo, in Flac. § 8]). While one quarter, known as Delta, was entirely peopled by Jews (BJ II. xviii. 8), many more of the race were scattered over all the other parts (ἐν ταῖς ἄλλαις οὐκ ὅλγοι σποράδες [Philo, loc. cit.]), and none of them were without their house of prayer (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, § 20). The special Regio Judæorum lay in the N.E. of the city, beyond the promontory of Lochias, in the neighbourhood of the royal palace. Till the time of Augustus the Jews were presided over by an ethnarch, who, according to Strabo (quoted by Josephus, Ant. XIV. vii. 2), 'governs the people and administers justice among them, and sees that they fulfil their obligations and obey orders, just like the archon of an independent city.' Augustus instituted a council or senate (γερονσία), which was entrusted with the management of Jewish affairs, and over which a certain number of ἀρχοντες presided. The reign of Caligula was marked by the first rude interruption of the policy of toleration. The governor Flaccus issued an edict in which he termed the Jews of Alexandria 'strangers,' thus depriving them of the rights of citizenship which they had enjoyed for centuries. He ordered 38 archons to be scourged in the theatre, and turned the Jewish quarters into scenes of daily carnage (Philo, in Flac. §§ 6-10). But one of the first acts of Claudius was to re-affirm the earlier edicts, and Josephus states that in his own day (c. A.D. 90) one could still see standing in Alexandria 'the pillar containing the privileges which the great Cæsar (Julius) bestowed upon the Jews' (τὴν στήλην . . . τὰ δικαιώματα περιέχουσαν ἃ Καῖσαρ ὁ μέγας τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ἔδωκεν [c. Apion. ii. 4; cf. Ant. XIV. x. 1]). Some Alexandrian Jews held responsible positions as ministers of the Ptolemys, and others were in the service of the Roman Emperors (c. Apion. ii. 5). Philo's brother Alexander and others filled the office of 'alabarch' (see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 280).

For a time the 'Alexandrians' were doubtless bilingual, but ultimately they forgot their Hebrew or Aramaic, and adopted Greek as the language of the home and the synagogue as well as of the market. Living in a great university town, many of them became highly educated; the school of Philo in particular assimilated many elements of Greek philosophy; and the Judaism of Egypt was gradually differentiated from that of Palestine. Even before becoming a Christian, the Alexandrian Apollos had doubtless a breadth of sympathy, as well as a richness of culture, which could not have been attained among the Rabbis of Jerusalem. Yet in the great mass of the 'Alexandrians,' as throughout the Dispersion generally, the Jewish element predominated, and it need occasion no surprise that those of them who chose to reside in the Holy City were as zealous for the Mosaic traditions, and as strenuously opposed to innovations, as any Hebrew of the Hebrews.

LITERATURE.—See list appended to preceding article.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ALIEN.—See STRANGER.

ALLEGORY.—The word is derived from the Greek ἀλληγορία, used of a mode of speech which implies more than is expressed by the ordinary meaning of the language. This method of interpreting literature was practised at an early date and among different peoples. When ideas of a primitive age were no longer tenable, respect for the ancient literature which embodied these ideas was maintained by disregarding the ordinary import of the language in favour of a hidden meaning more in harmony with contemporary notions. The word 'allegory' has come to be used more particularly of a certain type of Scripture interpretation (q.v.) current in both Jewish and Christian circles. Its fundamental characteristic is the distinction between the apparent meaning of Scripture and a hidden meaning to be discovered by the skill of the interpreter. In allegory proper, when distinguished from metaphor, parable, type, etc., the veiled meaning is the more important, if not indeed the only true one, and is supposed to have been primary in the intention of the writer, or of God who inspired the writer. Jewish interpreters, particularly in the Diaspora, employed this means of making the OT acceptable to Gentiles. They aimed especially at showing that the Jews' sacred books, when properly interpreted, contained all the wisdom of Greek philosophy. This interest flourished chiefly in Alexandria, and found its foremost representative in Philo (q.v.), who wrote early in the 1st cent. A.D. His Allegories of the Sacred Laws is one of his chief works, though all his writings are dominated by this method of interpretation. Similarly Josephus (q.v.), a half-century or so later, says that Moses taught many things 'under a decent allegory' (Ant. Procem. 4). Allegory was used freely also by Palestinian interpreters, though less for apologetic than for homiletic purposes. They were less ready than Philo to abandon the primary meaning of Scripture, but they freely employed allegorical devices, particularly in the Haggadic midrashim.

When Christians in the Apostolic Age began to interpret Scripture, it was inevitable that they should follow the allegorical tendencies so prevalent at the time. Yet the use of this method is far less common in the NT than in some later Christian literature, e.g. the Epistle of Barnabas (q.v.). St. Paul claims to be allegorizing when he finds the two covenants not only prefigured, but the validity of his idea of two covenants proved, in the story of Hagar (q.v.) and Sarah (Gal 4<sup>24-30</sup>). Allegorical colouring is also discernible in his reference to the muzzling of the ox (1 Co 9<sup>9a</sup>), the following rock (10<sup>4</sup>), and the veil of Moses (2 Co 3<sup>13a</sup>). The Epistle to the Hebrews is especially rich in these features, which are much more Alexandrian in type than the writings of St. Paul (e.g. 8<sup>2</sup>, 9<sup>23</sup>, 10<sup>4</sup>, 11<sup>1,3</sup>, 12<sup>7f</sup>). Certain Gospel passages also show allegorical traits, where in some instances the allegorical element may have come from the framers of tradition in the Apostolic Age (e.g. Mk 4<sup>13-20</sup> = Mt 13<sup>18-25</sup> = Lk 8<sup>11-15</sup>; Mk 12<sup>1-12</sup> = Mt 21<sup>33-46</sup> = Lk 20<sup>9-19</sup>; Mt 13<sup>24-30, 36-43</sup>, Jn 10<sup>1-16</sup>, 15<sup>1-7</sup>).

LITERATURE.—See list appended to art. INTERPRETATION.

S. J. CASE.

ALMIGHTY.—See GOD.

ALMS.—The duty of kindness to and provision for the poor is constantly taught in the OT; in the later Jewish literature, and especially in Sirach and Tobit, it is even more emphatically asserted. It is clear that our Lord and the Apostolic Church taught this as a religious obligation with equal force. In the Sermon on the Mount, almsgiving is assumed to be one of the duties of the religious life (e.g. Mt 6<sup>1-4</sup>), and in several places the principle is expressed directly. Our Lord says to the rich young ruler, 'Sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven' (Mk 10<sup>21</sup>); in the parable of the Judgment, the place of men is decided on the ground that they have or have not helped and relieved the Lord's brethren (Mt 25<sup>34-46</sup>), and in St. Luke our Lord is reported as saying: 'Sell that ye have, and give alms; make for yourselves purses which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not' (Lk 12<sup>33</sup>).

We find the same principles assumed in the literature of the Apostolic Church. In the Acts we read of the Church of Jerusalem: 'All that believed were together, and had all things common; and they sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all, according as any man had need' (Ac 2<sup>44-45</sup>; cf. 4<sup>32-34, 35</sup>). What relation this may have to the community of goods is considered elsewhere (see art. COMMUNITY OF GOODS); but it is at least clear that the Church in Jerusalem recognized the paramount obligation of the maintenance of the poor brethren, and it is worthy of notice that the first officers of the Christian community of whose appointment we have direct mention are the Seven who were appointed to carry out the ministrations of the Church to the poor widows of the community (Ac 6<sup>1-4</sup>).

In the letters of St. Paul we have frequent references to the obligation of helping the poor (e.g. Ro 12<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>28</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>18</sup>), and in certain letters we find him specially occupied with the collections which were being made for the poor Christians in Jerusalem (Gal 2<sup>10</sup>, Ro 15<sup>25, 26</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>1, 2</sup>, 2 Co 8 and 9). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of such deeds of charity as being sacrifices well-pleasing to God (He 13<sup>16</sup>). It is in the First Epistle of St. John, however, that the principle of the responsibility of Christian men for the maintenance of their brethren is most emphatically expressed: 'Whoso hath this world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?' (1 Jn 3<sup>17</sup>). For St. John the notion that any man can love God without loving his brother is a falsehood (1 Jn 4<sup>20</sup>).

The Christian literature of the end of the 1st cent. carries on the same principles. The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (iv. 8) says: 'Thou shalt not turn away from him that is in need, but shalt share all things with thy brother, and shalt not say that they are thine own: for if ye are sharers in that which is immortal, how much more in those things which are mortal.' The Epistle of Barnabas contains almost exactly the same phrases. We have thus in the NT and the sub-apostolic literature the clearest enunciation of the principle whose effect and practical applications we have to study in the history of the Early Church and of Christian civilization. There can be no doubt that our Lord and the writers of the NT looked upon the maintenance of the poor as a primary obligation of the Christian life.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Almsgiving' in IIDB; 'Alms' in EBi and Smith's DB 2; 'Charity, Almsgiving (Christian)' in ERE; G. Uhlhorn, Christian Charity in the Ancient Church, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1883; A. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity 2, London, 1908, i. 147; A. F. W. Ingram, Banners of the Christian Faith, London, 1899; W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, do. 1894; B. F. Westcott, The Incarnation and Common Life, do. 1893; J. L. Davies, Social Questions, do. 1886.

A. J. CARLYLE.

ALPHA AND OMEGA.—These are the first and last letters of the Gr. alphabet; cf. Heb. 'Aleph to Tau'; Eng. 'A to Z.' The title is applied to God the Father in Rev 1<sup>8</sup> 21<sup>6</sup>, and to Christ in Rev 22<sup>13</sup> (cf. 2<sup>3</sup>). The ancient Heb. name for God, יהוה, has been very variously derived, but its most probable meaning is the 'Eternal' One—'I am that I am'

(Ex 3<sup>14</sup>). This idea of the Deity, further emphasized in Is 41<sup>4</sup> 43<sup>10</sup> 44<sup>6</sup>, is expressed in the language of the Apocalypse by the Greek phrase 'Α and Ω,' which corresponds to a common Heb. expression 'Aleph to Tau,' of which the Talmud and other Rabbinic writings furnish many examples. R. H. Charles adduces similar phrases in Latin (Martial, v. 26) and Greek (Theodoret, HE iv. 8) to express completeness. To those who believe in a Jewish original for the NT Apocalypse, its presence there will cause no surprise, and its application to Christ will constitute an instance of the Christian remodelling which that book has undergone. Moreover, Jewish writers (e.g. Kohler) have given another explanation of its use as a title for God, calling it the hellenized form of a well-known saying, 'The Seal of God is Emeth (אמת = 'truth'), a word containing first, middle, and last letters of the Heb. alphabet (cf. Gen. Rab. lxxxi.; Jerus. Sanh. i. 18a; Sanh. 64a; Yoma 69b). Josephus (c. Apion.) probably refers to this saying (cf. also Dn 10-11 אמת נכתב, 'the writing of truth'). Similar is the use of Justin (Address to Greeks, xxv.). Whatever may be the origin of the phrase, its chief significance for Christians lies in its constant application to Christ, of which this passage in the Apocalypse supplies the first of countless instances. Charles and Müller agree that Patristic commentators invariably referred all these passages to the Son, and in so doing they plainly claimed the Divine privilege of eternity for the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ, and established the claim set forth in the later creeds that 'the Word of God was equal with God.'

Not only was this the universal opinion of the earliest commentators, as of the Christian author or editor of the Apocalypse; it was an opinion deeply rooted in the convictions of the Christian congregations. We hear of no attempt to dispute it; and, relying on this as an established fact, the Gnostic teachers sought to deduce by various means and numerical quibbles the essential identity of all the Persons of the Trinity (cf. Iren. adv. Har. i. xiv. 6, xv. 1). Among others, Tertullian (Monog. v.), Cyprian (Testimon. ii. 1, 6), Clem. Alex. (Strom. iv. 25, vi. 16), Ambrose (Exp. in septem Vis. i. 8), emphasized this view of the matter; and, before the last persecution of Diocletian was over, many inscriptions had been put up on tombstones, walls of catacombs, etc., in which these two letters stood for the name of Christ. At a subsequent period the practice became universal all over the Christian world, and countless examples are still extant to prove the general popularity of this custom.

In most cases the letters are accompanied by other symbols and titles of the Master, e.g. ✕; in a few examples they stand alone as a reverent way of representing the presence of the Redeemer. Most numerous in the period from A.D. 300-500, they decline in number and importance during the early Middle Ages, and are rare, at least in the West, after the 7th and 8th centuries. It is significant to note that in none of those hundreds of examples do the letters (often rudely scrawled by poor peasants) refer to any one but Jesus Christ. It is hard to conceive of any fact more suited to emphasize the deep-rooted belief of the early Christians in the true Divinity of their Lord and Master, who had created the world, existed from the beginning, and was still alive and ready to succour His faithful followers.

LITERATURE.—R. H. Charles, art. in HDB; B. W. Bacon, art. in DCG; K. Kohler, art. in JE; W. Müller in PRE<sup>3</sup> (full account of extant inscriptions); C. Schoettgen, Hor. Heb., Leipzig, 1733.

L. ST. ALBAN WELLS.

ALTAR.—In the NT, as in the LXX, the usual term for 'altar' is θυσιαστήριον—a word otherwise confined to Philo, Josephus, and ecclesiastical writers—while βωμός, as contrasted with a Jewish place of sacrifice, is a heathen altar. The most striking example of the antithesis is found in 1 Mac 1<sup>54-59</sup>. Antiochus Epiphanes erected a small altar to Jupiter—'the abomination of desolation' (v. 64)—upon the θυσιαστήριον of the temple, and 'on the twenty-fifth day of the month they sacrificed upon the idol-altar (βωμός) which was upon the altar of God (θυσιαστήριον).' The NT contains only a single distinct reference to a pagan altar—the βωμός which St. Paul observed in Athens bearing the inscription 'Ἀγνώστω Θεῷ' (Ac 17<sup>23</sup>).

1. The altar on which sacrifices were presented to God was indispensable to OT religion. Alike in the simple cultus of patriarchal times and the elaborate ritual of fully developed Judaism, its position was central. The altar was the place of meeting between God and man, and the ritual of blood—the supposed seat of life—was the essence of the offering. Whatever details might be added, the rite of sprinkling or dashing the blood against the altar, or allowing it to flow on the ground at its base, could never be omitted. The Levitical cultus was continued in Jerusalem till the destruction of the Temple by the Romans in A.D. 70, and the attitude and practice of the early Jewish-Christian Church in reference to it form an interesting and difficult problem. It has been generally assumed that, when our Lord instituted the New Covenant in His own blood (Mk 14<sup>24</sup>, Lk 22<sup>20</sup>), He implicitly abrogated the Levitical law, and that, when His sacrifice was completed, the disciples must at once have perceived that it made every altar obsolete. But there is not wanting evidence that enlightenment came slowly; that the practice of the Jewish-Christian Church was not altered suddenly, but gradually and with not a little misgiving. Hort observes that 'respecting the continued adherence to Jewish observances, nothing is said which implies either its presence or its absence' (Judaistic Christianity, 42). But there are many clear indications that the first Christians remained Jews—McGiffert (Apostol. Age, 65) even suggests that they were 'more devout and earnest Jews than they had ever been'—continuing to worship God at the altar in the Temple like all their countrymen. 'They had no desire to be renegades, nor was it possible to regard them as such. Even if they did not maintain and observe the whole cultus, yet this did not endanger their allegiance. . . . The Christians did not lay themselves open to the charge of violating the law' (Weizsacker, Apostol. Age, i. 46). They went up to the Temple at the hour of prayer (Ac 3<sup>1</sup>), which was the hour of sacrifice; they took upon themselves vows, and offered sacrifices for release (21<sup>20, 21</sup>); and even St. Paul, the champion of spiritual freedom, brought sacrifices (προσφορας) to lay on the altar in the Holy City (24<sup>17</sup>). The inference that the New Covenant left no place for any altar or Mosaic sacrifice is first explicitly drawn by the writer of Hebrews (see TEMPLE).

2. Apart from a passing allusion to the altars which were thrown down in Elijah's time (Ro 11<sup>3</sup>), St. Paul makes two uses of the θυσιαστήριον in the Temple. (1) In vindicating the right of ministers of the gospel to live at the charge of the Christian community, he instances the well-known Levitical practice: 'those who wait upon the altar have their portion with (συνμερίζοντα) the altar' (1 Co 9<sup>13</sup>), part of the offering being burnt in the altar fire, and part reserved for the priests, to whom the law gives the privilege 'altaris esse socios in dividenda victima' (Beza). Schmiedel (in loc.) thinks that the reference may be to priests who serve 'am Tempel der Heiden wie der Juden,' but probably for St. Paul the only θυσιαστήριον was the altar on which sacrifice was offered to the God of Israel. (2) In arguing against the possibility of partaking of the Eucharist and joining in idolatrous festivals, St. Paul appeals to the ethical significance of sacrifice, regarded not as an atonement but as a sacred meal between God and man. The altar being His table and the sacrifice His feast, the hospitality of table-communion is the pledge of friendship between Him and His worshippers. All who join in the sacrifice are partakers with the altar (κοινωνοὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου), one might almost say commensals with God. 'According to antique ideas, those who eat and drink together are by the very act tied to one another by a bond of friendship and mutual obligation' (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem.<sup>2</sup>, 247). How revolting it is, then, to pass from the altar of God or, by parity of reasoning, from the τράπεζα του Κυρίου, to the orgies of pagan gods, the τράπεζα δαιμονίων.

3. The writer of Hebrews refers to the old Jewish altar and to a new Christian one. (1) Reasoning somewhat in the manner of Philo, he notes the emergence of a mysterious priest from a tribe which has given none of its sons to minister at the altar, and on this circumstance bases an ingenious argument for the imperfection of the Levitical priesthood, and so of the whole Mosaic system (He 7<sup>13</sup>). (2) Against those Christians who occupy themselves with (sacrificial) meats the writer says: 'We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle' (13<sup>10</sup>). Few sentences have given rise to so much misunderstanding. 'ἔχομεν can only denote Christians, and what is said of them must be allegorically intended, for they have no τῆ σκηνῇ λατρεύοντες, and no θυσιαστήριον in the proper sense of the word' (von Soden). The point which the writer seeks to make is that in connexion with the great Christian sacrifice there is nothing corresponding to the feasts of ordinary Jewish (or of heathen) sacrifices. Its τύπος is the sacrifice of the Day of Atonement, no part of which was eaten by priest or worshipper, the mind alone receiving the benefit of the offering. So we Christians serve an altar from which we obtain a purely spiritual advantage. Whether the writer actually visualized the Cross of Christ as the altar at which all His followers minister, like λειτουργοὶ in the Tabernacle, —as many have supposed—is doubtful. Figurative language must not be unduly pressed.

The writer of Rev., whose heaven is a replica of the earthly Temple and its solemn ritual, sees underneath the altar the souls of martyrs—the blood poured out as an oblation (cf. Ph 2<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>6</sup>) representing the life or ψυχῇ—and hears them crying, like the blood of Abel, for vengeance (Rev 6<sup>9-10</sup>; cf. En. 22<sup>5</sup>). In 8<sup>3</sup> and 9<sup>13</sup> the θυσιαστήριον is not the altar of burnt-offering but that of incense (see INCENSE). In 14<sup>18</sup> the prophet sees an angel come out from the altar, the spirit or genius of fire, an Iranian conception; and in 16<sup>7</sup> he personifies the altar itself and makes it proclaim the truth and justice of God.

LITERATURE.—I. Benzinger, Heb. Arch., Freiburg, 1894, p. 378 f.; W. Nowack, Heb. Arch., Freiburg, 1894, ii. 17 f.; A. Edersheim, The Temple, its Ministry and Services, London, 1874; Schurer, HJP., ii. i. 207 f.; W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem.<sup>2</sup>, London, 1894; J. Wellhausen, Reste arab. Heidenthums, Berlin, 1887, p. 101 f.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostol. Age, Edinb. 1897, p. 36 f.; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostol. Age, 2 vols., London, 1894-95, i. 43 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

AMBASSADOR.—Although this word occurs twice (2 Co 5<sup>20</sup> and Eph 6<sup>20</sup>) in the EV of the NT, the corresponding Greek noun (πρεσβευτής) occurs nowhere. Instead, we find the verb πρεσβεύω, 'to be an ambassador,' while the cognate collective noun (RV 'ambassage') is used in Lk 14<sup>32</sup> 19<sup>14</sup>. *

* πρεσβεύω and πρεσβευτής were the recognized terms in the Greek East for the Legate of the Roman Empire (Weissmann, Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 379).

In the OT the idea behind the words translated 'ambassador' (generally mal'akh) is that of going or being sent, and of this the etymological equivalent in the NT is not 'ambassador' but 'apostle' (ἀπόστολος, 'one sent forth'); but both the OT terms and the NT ἀπόστολος have to be understood in the light of use and context rather than of derivation. In this way they acquire a richer content, of which the chief component ideas are the bearing of a message, the dealing, in a representative character, with those to whom one is sent, and the solemn investiture, before starting out, with a delegated authority sufficient for the task (cf. Gal 1<sup>15-17</sup>).

The representative character of ambassadorship is emphasized by the repeated ὑπέρ, 'on behalf of,' in 2 Co 5<sup>20</sup>, with the added 'as though God were intreating by us.' The same preposition (ὑπέρ) occurs in Eph 6<sup>20</sup>; thus πρεσβεύω is never found in the NT without it. So also in Lk 14<sup>32</sup> 19<sup>14</sup> the context shows that the πρεσβεία is representative.

There is no very marked difference between 'ambassador' and 'apostle.' πρεσβεύω, having πρέσβυς ('aged') as its stem, does suggest a certain special dignity and gravity, based on the ancient idea of the vastly superior wisdom brought by ripeness of years. Probably, however, St. Paul was not thinking of age at all, for πρεσβεύω had lived a life of its own long enough to be independent of its antecedents. His tone of dignity and of pride springs not so much from his metaphor as direct from his vividly realized relation to God: ὑπέρ is more emphatic than πρεσβεύω. It is in exactly the same tone that he claims the title 'apostle' (see, e.g., Gal 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>9-10</sup>); cf. Gal 1<sup>15</sup>, where his 'separation to preach' expresses the same thought in yet another form. Nevertheless, his is a humble pride, for only grace has put him in his lofty position (cf. 1 Co 15<sup>9</sup>). Moreover, his commission is not to lord it over others, but to 'beseech' them; nay, God Himself only 'intreats' (2 Co 5<sup>20</sup>). It is He who seeks 'arrangements for peace' with men (cf. Lk 14<sup>32</sup>). On the πρεσβυτης of Philem<sup>9</sup> (AV and RV 'the aged,' RVM 'an ambassador') see art. AGED. C. H. WATKINS.

AMEN.—The lack of a common language has always been a barrier to the mutual knowledge and intercourse of the great nations of mankind, all the more that the days when the educated men of all European nations were wont to converse in Latin have long since passed away. To a certain extent the gulf has been bridged for men of science by a newly-invented vocabulary of their own, and a general use of Latin and Greek names for all the objects of their study. In the world of religion it still remains a great obstacle to all attempts to realize a truly catholic and universal Church. The Latin of the Roman Catholic missal, which seems so unintelligible to the mass of the worshippers that a sign language (of ritual) is largely the medium by which they follow the services when not absorbed in the reading of devotional manuals in their own mother tongue, is but a caricature of such a general medium of interpretative forms of worship. It is, therefore, a matter of great interest to study the use of those few words of ancient origin which have taken root in the religious language of so many great Christian nations, and have come to convey, in all the services where they are used, the same or a similar meaning. Of these, perhaps the most familiar are the words 'Amen' and 'Hallelujah.' These old Heb. phrases were taken, of course, from the Bible, where, save in the case of Luther's edition and the LXX version of the earlier books of the OT, no attempt has been made to replace them by foreign equivalents. They have a deep interest for Christians, not merely as a reminder of their essential unity and their ancient history, and as a recollection of the debt which we owe to a race so often despised, but as a reminiscence of the very words which came from our Lord's own mouth, in the days when He was sowing the seed of which we are reaping the fruits.

A brief examination of the history of the word 'Amen' will be sufficient to prove the meaning which it had, the way in which it acquired this meaning, and the certainty that it was one of the very words which fell from the Master and had for Him a message of rare and unusual significance. The original use of the word (derived from a Heb. root אָמַן, meaning 'steadfast,' and a verb, 'to prop,' akin to Heb. אֱמֶת, 'truth,' Assy. temenū, 'foundation,' and Eth. amēna, 'trust' [Arab. aminun = 'secure']) was intended to express certainty. In the mouth of Benaiah (1 K 1<sup>36</sup>) and Jeremiah (Jer 28<sup>6</sup>) it appears as first word in the sentence, as a strong form of assent to a previous statement. It was not till after the Exile that it assumed its far commoner place as the answer, or almost the refrain in chorus, to the words of a previous speaker, and as such took its natural position at the close of the five divisions of the Psalms. It is uncertain how far this formed part of the people's response in the ritual of the Temple, but it is certain that it acquired a fixed place in the services of the synagogues, where it still forms a common response of the congregation. This was sometimes altered later, in opposition to the Christian practice, and 'God Faithful King' was used instead. The object of this use of 'Amen' was, in Massie's words, 'to adopt as one's own what has just been said' (HDB i. 80), and it thus finds a fitting place in the mouth of the people to whom Nehemiah promulgated his laws (Neh 5<sup>13</sup>). To express emphasis, in accordance with Hebrew practice the word was often doubled, as in the solemn oath of Nu 5<sup>22</sup> (cf. Neh 8<sup>6</sup>). This was further modified by the insertion of 'and' in the first three divisions of the Psalter. 'Amen' later became the last word of the first speaker, either as simple subscription—as such it stands appended to three of the Psalms (41, 72, 89), and in many NT Epistles, after both doxologies (15 times) and benedictions (6 times in RV)—or as the last word of a prayer (RV only in Prayer of Manasses; but 2 others in Vulgate, viz. Neh 13<sup>31</sup>, To 13<sup>18</sup>). In two old MSS of Tobit (end), as in some later MSS of the NT, it appears by itself without a doxology. The later Jews were accustomed to use 'Amen' frequently in their homes (e.g. after grace before meals, etc.), and laid down precise rules for the ways of enunciating and pronouncing it. These are found in the Talmudic tract B'rākhōth ('Blessings'), and are intended to guard against irreverence, haste, etc. So great was the superstition which attached to it that many of the later Rabbis treated it almost as a fetish, able to win blessings not only in this life but in the next; and one commentator, Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, went so far as to declare that by its hearty pronunciation in chorus the goddess in Israel who lay in the penal fires of Gehenna might one day hope for the opening of their prison gates and a free entrance into the abode of the blessed, though Hogg suggests that this sentiment was extracted from a pun on Is 26<sup>2</sup> (Elijah's Zutta, xx.; Shab. 119b; Siddur R. Amram, 13b; cf. Yalk. ii. 296 on Is 26<sup>2</sup>).

'Amen' would naturally have passed from the synagogues to the churches which took their rise among the synagogue-worshippers, but the Master Himself gave a new emphasis to its value for Christians by the example of His own practice. In this, as in all else, He was no slavish imitator of contemporary Rabbis. He spoke 'as having authority and not as the scribes' (Mk 1<sup>22</sup>), and in this capacity it is not surprising that He found a new use for the word of emphasis, which neither His predecessors nor His followers have ventured to imitate, though the title applied to Him in Rev 3<sup>14</sup> is founded upon His own chosen practice. In His mouth, by the common evidence of all the Gospels (77 times), the word is used to introduce His own words and clothe them with solemn affirmation. He plainly expressed His dislike for oaths (Mt 5<sup>34</sup>), and in Dalman's view (Words of Jesus, 229)—and no one is better qualified to speak on the subject—He found here the word He needed to give the assurance which usually came from an oath. But in doing this 'He was really making good the word, not the word Him,' and it is therefore natural that no other man has ever ventured to follow His custom. That it was His habitual way of speaking is doubly plain from a comparison of all four Gospels, even though St. Luke, who wrote for men unacquainted with Hebrew, has sought where possible to replace the word by a Greek equivalent (ἀληθως, etc.). St. John has always doubled the word, probably for emphasis, since Delitzsch's explanation from a word אָמַן = 'I say' is shown by Dalman (p. 227 f.) to be wrong and based on a purely Babylonian practice.

The rest of the NT presents examples of all the older uses of the phrase, though the earliest is found only in the Jewish Apocalypse (Rev 7<sup>12</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>) which has probably been worked up into the Christian Book of 'Revelation,' and in one passage (22<sup>20</sup>) christianized from it. Here it is perhaps a conscious archaic form, brought in to add to the mysterious language of the vision, which may originally, like the Book of Enoch or Noah, have been ascribed to some earlier seer. The language of St. Paul in 1 Co 14<sup>16</sup> shows that the synagogue practice of saying 'Amen' as a response early became habitual among the worshippers of 'the Nazarene,' even if we had not been led to infer this by the growing reluctance of the Jews to emphasize this feature of their service. The use (? Jewish) in Rev 5<sup>14</sup> corresponds with this custom (cf. Ps 106<sup>48</sup>). It is plain that the complete absence of the word in Acts—itsself a link with the Third Gospel—must be ascribed to the peculiar style and attitude of the author, and not at all to the actual practice in the churches.

Twice in the NT (2 Co 1<sup>20</sup>, Rev 3<sup>14</sup>) the word 'Amen' is used as a noun implying the 'Faithful God,' but it is hard to tell whether this is to be understood as a play on words based on Is 65<sup>16</sup> (אָמֵן, 'truth,' being read as אֱמֶן, 'Amen'), or whether it is connected with the manner in which the Master employed the phrase as guaranteed by His own authority and absolute 'faithfulness.'

The Church of the Fathers made much of the word 'Amen' in all its OT uses, and introduced it into their services, not only after blessings, hymns, etc. (cf. Euseb. iv. 15, vii. 9), but after the reception of the Sacrament—a custom to which Justin refers in his [the earliest] account of the manner in which this service was conducted (Apol. i. 64, 66). This is confirmed by Ambrose. The practice is still in vogue in the Eastern Church, was adopted in the Scottish Liturgy of 1637, and dropped only in the 6th cent. by the Western Church. Sometimes the 'Amen' was even repeated after the lesson had been read. From the Jews and the Christians it passed over to the Muhammadan ritual, where it is still repeated after the first two sūras of the Qur'an, even though its meaning is wholly misunderstood by the Muslim imams who guess at various impossible explanations. In the Book of Common Prayer it appears in various forms—as the end of the priest's prayer, as the response of the people, or as the unanimous assent of both priest and people. Curiously enough, among Presbyterians it is said by the minister only. One relic of the Gospel language is retained in the Bishops' Oath of Supremacy, which commences almost in the style of one of Christ's famous declarations. In legal terminology the term has been introduced to strengthen affirmation, and formed an item in the 'style' of proclamations until the 16th century. Hogg notes that in English, as in Syriac, it has come to mean 'consent,' and has been enabled thus to acquire the sense of 'the very last,' even though it commenced its career as first word in the sentence.

The foregoing remarks may enable the reader to judge of the strange changes to which the meaning of this word has been subjected, the important part it has played, and the historical interest which attaches to its every echo.

LITERATURE.—The artt. in HDB, DCG, EBi, and JE; G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinb. 1902, p. 226 ff.; H. W. Hogg, in JQR ix. [1896] 1-23; Oxf. Heb. Lex., s.v. אֲמֵת; Grimm-Thayer, s.v. ἀμὴν; artt. in Expt viii. [1897] 190, by Nestle, and xiii. [1902] 663, by Jannaris.

L. ST. ALBAN WELLS.

AMETHYST (ἀμέθυστος, Rev 21<sup>20</sup>).—A variety of quartz of rock-crystal, of purple or bluish violet colour. Derived from ἀ, 'not,' and μεθυσκειν, 'to intoxicate,' it was regarded as a charm against the effects of wine. Quaffed from a cup of amethyst, or by a reveller wearing an amulet of that substance, the vine-juice could not intoxicate. This was doubtless a case of sympathetic magic, wine being amethystine in colour. In the LXX (Ex 28<sup>19</sup>, etc.) 'amethyst' stands for ahlāmāh, a stone which was regarded as a charm against bad dreams. The amethyst was used as a gem-stone by the ancient Egyptians, and largely employed in classical antiquity for intaglios. Naturally it was often engraved with Bacchanalian subjects. Being comparatively abundant, it is inferior in price to true gems, and is not to be confounded with the oriental amethyst, a variety of corundum, or sapphire of amethystine tint, which is a very valuable gem of great brilliancy and beauty. JAMES STRAHAN.

AMOMUM (ἄμωμον, perhaps from Arab. hamma, 'heat').—An aromatic balsam used as an unguent for the hair, made from the seeds of an eastern plant which has not been identified with certainty. Josephus (Ant. xx. ii. 2) speaks of Harran as 'a soil which bare amomum in plenty,' and Vergil (Ecl. iv. 25) predicts that in the Golden Age 'Assyrium vulgo nascetur amomum.' The word came to be used generally for any pure and sweet odour. In Rev 18<sup>13</sup> AV (with B<sup>95</sup>) omits the word; RV (with N*AC) accepts it and translates 'spice' (RVm 'Gr. amomum'). The term is now applied to a genus of aromatic plants, some species of which yield cardamoms and grains of paradise.

JAMES STRAHAN.

AMPHIPOLIS (Ἀμφίπολις).—This Macedonian city played an important part in early Greek history. Occupying an eminence on the left bank of the Strymon, just below the egress of the river from Lake Cercinitis, 3 miles from the Strymonic Gulf, it commanded the entrance to a pass leading through the mountains into the great Macedonian plains. It was almost encircled by the river, whence its name 'Amphi-polis.'

Thucydides (i. 100) says that the Athenians 'sent 10,000 settlers of their own citizens and the allies to the Strymon, to colonize what was then called the "Nine Ways" ('Εννέα ὁδοί), but now Amphipolis.' It was the jewel of their empire, but they lost it in 422 B.C., and never recovered it. It was under the Macedonian kings from 360 till the Roman conquest of the country in 167 B.C. The Romans made it a free city and the capital of the first of four districts into which they divided Macedonia. It lay on the Via Egnatia, which connected Dyrrachium with the Hellespont. From Philippi it was 32 miles to the south-west, and 'this was one of the most beautiful day's journeys Paul ever experienced' (Renan, Saint Paul, Eng. tr., p. 91). The Apostle and his fellow-travellers evidently remained in Amphipolis over night, and next day went on to Apollonia (Ac 17<sup>1</sup>). It is now represented by Neochori.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Leake, Northern Greece, London, 1835, iii. 131 f.; G. Grote, Hist. of Greece, new ed., do. 1870, iii. 284 ff.; Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, do. 1872, i. 374 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

AMPLIATUS (Ἀμπλιάτος [Ro 16<sup>8</sup> N*ABFG], a common Lat. name of which AV Amplias [Ἀμπλιάς, DELP] is a contraction).—Saluted by St. Paul and described as 'my beloved in the Lord' (τὸν ἀγαπητὸν μου ἐν Κυρίῳ). The only other persons described in Ro 16 as 'my beloved' are Epænetus (v.<sup>5</sup>) and Stachys (v.<sup>9</sup>). A woman is saluted—perhaps with intentional delicacy—as 'Persis the beloved' (v.<sup>12</sup>). The precise phrase 'my beloved in the Lord' does not occur again in the NT. The special term of Christian endearment might suggest that Ampliatus was a personal convert of St. Paul's or closely associated with him in Christian work. Such friends, however, are referred to as 'beloved child' (Timothy, 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>), 'beloved brother' (Tychicus, Eph 6<sup>21</sup>), 'beloved fellow-servant' (Epaphras, Col 1<sup>7</sup>), etc. (cf. art. BELOVED). Nothing whatever is known of Ampliatus beyond this reference.

Assuming the integrity of the Epistle and the Roman destination of these salutations, he was perhaps a Roman, whom St. Paul had met on one of his missionary journeys, and who was known by the Apostle at the time of writing to be residing in or visiting Rome. It is interesting to find the name Ampliatus several times in inscriptions belonging to the Imperial familia or household (see Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 174, and Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, 1902, p. 424). Sanday-Headlam also refer to a Christian inscription in the catacomb of Domitilla belonging to the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. in which the name occurs, possibly as that of a slave or freedman prominent in the Church. If the view be held that the salutations in Ro 16 were part of a letter to the Church of Ephesus, Ampliatus must have been a Roman, resident in Ephesus, with whom St. Paul became acquainted during his long stay in that city. It is possible that he was a Jew who had taken a Latin name (cf. the names Paulus, and Lucius a 'kinsman,' i.e. a Jew, Ro 16<sup>21</sup>).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

ANANIAS (Gr. Ἀνανίας; Heb. אֲנָנְיָה, 'Jahweh is gracious').—A very common name in later Jewish times, corresponding to Hananiah or Hanani of the OT. We find it occurring frequently in the post-exilic writings and particularly in the Apocrypha. In the history of the Apostolic Church, we meet with three persons bearing this name.

1. An early convert to Christianity, best known as the husband of Sapphira (Ac 5<sup>1-5</sup>). Along with his wife, Ananias was carried into the early Church on the wave of enthusiasm which began on the day of Pentecost, but they were utterly devoid of any understanding or appreciation of the new religion they professed. In this period of early zeal many of the Christians sold their lands and handed the proceeds to the community of believers (cf. BARNABAS, COMMUNITY OF GOODS). Ananias and his wife, wishing to share in the approbation accorded to such acts of generosity, sold their land and handed part of the price to the community, pretending that they had sacrificed all. When St. Peter rebuked the male offender for his duplicity, Ananias fell down dead, and was carried out for burial; his wife also came in and was overtaken by the same fate. The narrative does not indicate that the two were punished because they had in any way violated a rule of communism which they had professed to accept. The words of St. Peter, 'Whiles it remained, did it not remain thine own, and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power?' (Ac 5<sup>4</sup>) at once dispose of any view of the incident which would regard communism as compulsory in the early Church. The sin for which Ananias and Sapphira were punished is described as 'lying unto God' (v.<sup>4</sup>). It was, says Knowling, 'much more than mere hypocrisy, much more than fraud, pride or greed—hateful as these sins are—the power and presence of the Holy Spirit had been manifested in the Church, and Ananias had sinned not only against human brotherhood, but against the Divine light and leading which had made that brotherhood possible. . . . The action of Ananias and Sapphira was hypocrisy of the worst kind,' an attempt to deceive not only men but God Himself. Most critics admit the historicity of the incident (e.g. Baur, Weizsacker, Holtzmann, Spitta), while it is undoubted that in the narrative the cause of death is traced to the will and intention of St. Peter, and cannot be regarded as a chance occurrence or the effect of a sudden shock brought about by the discovery of their guilt. Much has been written on the need in the infant Church of such a solemn warning against a type of hypocrisy which, had it become prevalent, would have rendered the existence of the Christian community impossible.

LITERATURE.—F. C. Baur, Paulus, Leipzig, 1866, i. 23 ff.; A. Neander, Planting of Christianity, ed. Bohn, i. [1880] 27 ff.; C. v. Weizsacker, Apostol. Age, i. [1894] 24; R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, in loco; Comm. of Meyer, Zeller, Holtzmann, Spitta.

2. A Christian disciple who dwelt in Damascus, and to whom Christ appeared in a vision telling him to go to Saul of Tarsus, who was praying and had seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in and laying his hands on him that he might receive his sight (Ac 9<sup>10-17</sup>). On hearing this command, Ananias, knowing the reputation of Saul as a persecutor, expressed reluctance, but was assured that the persecutor was a chosen messenger of Christ to bear His name to the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel. Thus encouraged, Ananias went and laid his hands on Saul, who received his sight and was baptized. In his speech before the multitude at Jerusalem (Ac 22<sup>1-16</sup>) St. Paul describes Ananias as 'devout according to the law,' and as one 'to whom witness was borne by all that dwelt' at Damascus.

Later tradition has much to say regarding Ananias. He is represented as one of the 'Seventy,' and it is possible he may have been a personal disciple of Jesus. He is also described as bishop of Damascus, and reported to have met a violent death, slain by the sword of Pol, the general of Aretas, according to one authority (Book of the Bee, by Solomon of Basra [1222], ch. xxix., ed. Wallis Budge), or, according to another (see Acta Sanctorum, Jan. 25 [new ed. p. 227]), stoned to death after undergoing torture at the hand of Lucian, prefect of Damascus. His name stands in the Roman and Armenian Martyrologies, and he is commemorated in the Abyssinian Calendar.

3. The high priest who accused St. Paul before Claudius Lysias in Jerusalem (Ac 23<sup>1ff.</sup>), and who afterwards appeared among the Apostle's enemies before Felix at Cæsarea (Ac 24<sup>1ff.</sup>). He is not to be identified or confused with Annas (q.v.) of Ac 4<sup>6</sup>, Lk 3<sup>2</sup>, or Jn 18<sup>13</sup>. He was the son of Nedebeus, and is regarded by Schürer (GVV ii. 272) as the twenty-first high priest in the Roman-Herodian period. He retained his office, to which he had been appointed by Herod of Chalcis, for about twelve years (A.D. 47-59). During the time of his administration, bitter quarrels broke out between the Jews and the Samaritans, which led to a massacre of some Galileans by Samaritans and to the plundering of Samaritan villages by Jews. Ananias was summoned to Rome and tried for complicity in these disturbances, but, at the instigation of Agrippa the younger, was restored to office. He ruled in Jerusalem with all the arbitrariness of an Oriental despot, and his violence and rapacity are noted by Josephus (Ant. XX. ix. 2), while his personal wealth made him a man of consideration even after he was deprived of his office. He did not scruple to make frequent use of assassins to carry out his policy in Jerusalem, and his Roman sympathies made him an object of intense hatred to the national party. When the war broke out in A.D. 66, he was dragged from his place of concealment in an aqueduct and murdered by the assassins whom he had used as tools in the days of his power (Josephus, BJ II. xvii. 9).

LITERATURE.—Josephus, Ant. xx. ix. 2, BJ II. xvii. 9; E. Schürer, GVV ii. [1907] 256, 272, 274.

W. F. BOYD.

ANATHEMA.—The transliteration of a Gr. word which is used in the LXX to represent the Heb. hêrem, 'a person or thing devoted or set apart, under religious sanctions, for destruction' (Lv 27<sup>28-29</sup>, Jos 6<sup>17</sup>). It is capable of use in the good sense of an offering to God, but was gradually confined to the sense of 'accursed,' which is the rendering adopted in AV in all NT passages except 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>. Around the Heb. term there gathered in course of time an elaborate system of excommunication, with penalties varying both in amount and in duration, the purpose being sometimes remedial of the offender and sometimes protective of the community; but these developments are mainly later than our period. They may have suggested lines on which a system of official discipline in the Christian Church was afterwards constructed, but it would be an anachronism to read them into the simpler thoughts of the apostolic literature. In patristic times the word denoted some ecclesiastical censure or form of punishment, for which a precedent may have been sought in the teaching or practice of St. Paul. To the Apostle, the OT allusion would be predominant, and his chief, if not his only, thought would be that of a hopeless spiritual condition, from which emergence could be effected, if at all, only with extreme difficulty and by special forbearance on the part of God.

In the Pauline Epistles the word 'anathema' occurs four times, once in reference to the Apostle himself, and on the other occasions in reference to the maltreatment of his Lord.

1. The personal passage is Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, where there is no serious difficulty to those who do not look for strict reasoning in the language of the heart. St. Paul has just expressed (8<sup>39</sup>) his belief that nothing conceivable could separate him from the love of God; and now, in his yearning over his fellow-countrymen, he announces that for their sakes he would be willing, if it were possible, to be even hopelessly separated from Christ. Clearly 'anathema' need not, and does not here, carry any sense of formal excommunication; it denotes a spiritual condition of which the two features are exclusion from the redemption in Christ and permanent hopelessness.

2. Greater difficulty attaches to Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, where the Apostle, again under strong emotion, imprecates anathema upon others. The case he imagines is one that would warrant extreme indignation, though the language is that of justifiable passion and not to be interpreted literally. St. Paul would be the last of Christian teachers to withdraw all hope from a man, and it is possible that in this case he thought of anathema as being remedial and temporary. He was the bond-servant of Christ, and as such he resented entirely any conduct or teaching that dishonoured his Lord. That such teaching reflected also on himself would be a matter of little consequence; but Christ was sacred to him, and the preacher of another gospel, whether one of his own colleagues or even 'an angel from heaven,' was not to be tolerated. His teaching made and proved him a person set apart for destruction; but whether that destruction was final or only corrective would depend upon the man's impenitence or reform. Free association with him would be no longer possible, and to that extent the beginnings of a system of discipline may be traced in the phrase, as in 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup> and 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, where the ultimate restoration of the man is distinctly in view. But the reference to 'an angel from heaven' is sufficient to prove that ecclesiastical censure, carrying finality with it, was not the main thought.

3. and 4. Twice in 1 Cor. the word 'anathema' occurs in the course of the sharp conflict excited by the extreme party among converted proselytes to Judaism; and the great idea is that everything in the religion of a professed Christian is determined by his real relationship to Christ. Over against the party of which the watchword was 'Jesus is Lord,' was a party whose irreligion was manifested by their cry 'Jesus is anathema' (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>). They were in a sense within the Christian community, and conscious therefore of certain obligations to Christ; but they were so provoked by the attempt to set Jesus on the same level with the supreme God, and by the apparently absolute incompatibility of that belief with their fundamental conviction of the unity of God, that they were prepared to renounce Jesus and even to denounce Him rather than to confess His Godhead and submit to His claims. Or, introduced into the Church from some form of paganism, they had been so familiar with the evil inspiration that swept them along to the worship of 'dumb idols' (12-) as to be disposed to plead inspiration for any tongues or doctrines of their own, to whatever extent Jesus was degraded therein. In response St. Paul sets up the great antithesis between real inspiration and counterfeit. The Spirit of God is the author of any confession that Jesus is Lord; ecstasy or even demoniac possession may be pleaded for the assertion that Jesus for His teaching is destined to Divine destruction, but never the breath of the Holy Spirit. Between those two extremes there are many halting-places, and the insecurity of each of them is in proportion to its remoteness from the confession of Jesus Christ as Lord. So much is the Apostle affected by this dishonour done to his Lord, that it recurs to his memory as the Epistle is being closed, and suggests the footnote of 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>. He adopts the word used by the men of whom he was thinking, and condenses his indignation into a curt dismissal, 'If any one loveth not the Lord, let him be anathema. Maran atha.' In such a place again the word cannot denote official ecclesiastical censure. It is really an antithesis to the prayer for grace in Eph 6<sup>4</sup>, the handing over of the unloving man to Satan, the refusal to have anything more to do with him until at least some signs of a newborn love for Christ are given.

As to the addition of Maran atha, both the meaning of the words and their relation to the context have been subjects of controversy. For a discussion of the Aramaic phrase, with related questions, see HDB iii. 241 ff. It is either an assertion, 'Our Lord cometh' (so RVm), or, more probably, an ejaculatory prayer, 'O Lord, come,' with parallels in Ph 4<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>7</sup>, Rev 22<sup>20</sup>, devotional rather than minatory in its character and intention. If it be taken as an assertion, it may mean, 'Let those who do not love the Lord fear and be quick to amend, for He is at hand in triumph,' though the expected Parousia is not a recurring feature of the Epistle. Or the idea may be, 'The Lord is coming soon, and there is no need to trouble further with these men, for with greater wisdom thought may be given to Him.' But the term is better detached entirely from the reference to anathema, and considered simply as a little prayer, in which the normal yearning of the Apostle expresses itself, before he closes a letter or group of letters, in the writing of which his pastoral heart must have been pained again and again. The sudden way in which the expression is introduced suggests that it had already become a popular form of something like greeting in common use among the disciples, and had supplanted the earlier 'The Lord is risen,' unless both were used, the one on meeting and the other on parting. That would explain the absence of any attempt to translate it from the vernacular, and is confirmed by the usage of the next generation; cf. Didache, x. 6, where also the word follows a warning; and Apost. Constitutions, vii. 26, where any thought of enforcing a penalty is rendered impossible by the jubilant tone of the section.

In course of time 'anathema' came to mean excommunication, for which sanction was found in the Pauline use of the word, which again was carried back to our Saviour's teaching (Mt 18<sup>17</sup>). Such men as are referred to in 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup> would of necessity find themselves excluded from association with disciples, and rules for their treatment were prescribed (1 Co 5<sup>9</sup>, Tit 3<sup>10</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>10, 11</sup>), and eventually expanded in great detail. But, while this kind of ostracism was a natural accompaniment of anathema from the beginning, the word itself implied a certain relation to God, a spiritual condition with which God alone could deal, and with which He would deal finally or remedially. Execration and not official discipline is the dominant idea, with the censure of the Church as a corollary. See also artt. DISCIPLINE, EXCOMMUNICATION.

LITERATURE.—See artt. 'Curse,' 'Excommunication,' 'Maranatha,' in HDB; Grimm-Thayer and Cremer, s.v. ἀνάθεμα; and the NT Comm. on the passages cited.

R. W. MOSS.

ANCHOR (figurative).*—In He 6<sup>19</sup> the writer describes the hope set before the Christian, to which he has just referred in the preceding verse, as 'an anchor of the soul.' The use of an anchor as a figure of hope was not new, for it is found in pre-Christian Greek and Latin authors, and an anchor appears on ancient pagan medals as an emblem of hope. The figure would naturally suggest itself to any one who reflected on the nature and power of the faculty of hope. For it is of the essence of hope to reach into the future and lay hold of an invisible object, as an anchor drops into the sea and catches hold of the unseen bottom. Hope has power to keep the soul from wavering in times of storm and stress, just as an anchor by its firm grip keeps the ship from drifting with the winds and tides. But Christian hope reaching out towards the eternal world is something much greater than our familiar human hopes of blessings yet unrealized; and the use which this writer made of an anchor to represent the hope of the Christian soul at once transformed the figure (as the Catacombs bear witness) into one of the dearest symbols of the Christian religion.

Simple and beautiful as the figure is, however, some exegetical difficulties have to be faced in determining the extent of its application in the passage. These difficulties are reflected in the various renderings of AV and RV. In the original the word 'hope' of v. 18 is not repeated in v. 19. Strictly rendered, the verse runs, 'which we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast and entering into that within the veil—a statement which has been understood in two different ways. AV, by supplying ‘hope’ at the beginning of the verse, makes ‘sure and steadfast’ apply to the anchor, and by introducing a comma at this point leaves it doubtful whether the anchor is also to be thought of as entering within the veil. RV, by inserting ‘a hope’ immediately after ‘soul,’ limits the figure to a declaration that hope is an anchor of the soul, and makes the three epithets ‘sure,’ ‘steadfast,’ and ‘entering’ apply to hope itself and not to its symbol the anchor. The most obvious construction of the Gr. vindicates RV in making the three epithets hang together as all relating to one subject. On the other hand, AV is so far supported by the fact that ασφαλῆ and βεβαία (lit. ‘not failing’ and ‘firm’) suggest that the idea of an anchor was immediately in the writer’s mind. It is probably right, therefore, to conclude that he means to say that the anchor is sure, steadfast, and entering into that which is within the veil, viz. the Holy of Holies. This is really a mixture of metaphors—the metaphor of an anchor entering into the unseen world to which Christian hope clings, and another metaphor by which the Holy of Holies becomes a type of that world unseen. But, in view of what the writer says at a later stage about the Most Holy Place with its ark of the covenant and cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat (9<sup>4c</sup>) as a pattern of heaven itself where Christ appears before God on our behalf (v.<sup>24</sup>), the figurative faultiness of the language is more than atoned for by its rich suggestiveness as to the Christian’s grounds of hope with regard to the world to come. It is the appearance of our great High Priest ‘before the face of God for us,’ he means to say, that is the ultimate foundation of the Christian hope. Cf. John Knox on his death-bed calling to his wife, ‘Go read where I cast my first anchor!’ with reference to our Lord’s intercessory prayer in Jn 17. Cf. also his answer, when they asked him at the very end, ‘Have you hope?’ ‘He lifted his finger, “pointed upwards with his finger,” and so died’ (Carlyle, Heroes, 1872, p. 140).

* For anchor in the literal sense see art. SHIP.

LITERATURE.—The Comm. on Hebrews, esp. A. B. Davidson’s; Expositor, 3rd ser. x. 45 ff. J. C. LAMBERT.

ANDRONICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος, a Greek name).—Saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>7</sup>, his name being coupled with that of Junias or Junia.* (1) The pair are described as ‘my kinsmen’ (τοὺς συγγενεῖς μου), by which may be meant fellow-Jews (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>), possibly members of the same tribe, almost certainly not relatives. This last interpretation has given rise to one of the difficulties felt in deciding the destination of these salutations. Another ‘kinsman’ saluted is Herodion (v.<sup>11</sup>), and salutations are sent from three ‘kinsmen’ in v.<sup>21</sup>. The only relative of St. Paul known to us is a nephew (Ac 23<sup>16</sup>).

(2) Andronicus and Junia(s) are also described as ‘my fellow-prisoners’ (συναιχμαλώτους μου, lit. ‘prisoners of war’). The meaning may be that they had actually shared imprisonment with St. Paul (the only imprisonment up to this time known to us was the short confinement at Philippi [Ac 16<sup>23</sup>, but see 2 Co 11<sup>23</sup>]). Possibly they may not have suffered imprisonment with the Apostle at the same time and place; but, as enduring persecution for Christ’s sake, they were in that sense ‘fellow-prisoners.’ The only other mention of ‘fellow-prisoner’ is in a description of Aristarchus (Col 4<sup>10</sup>) and Epaphras (Philem.<sup>23</sup>). The meaning in these cases is evidently literal, both sharing the

* It is impossible, as this name occurs in the accus. case, to determine whether it is masculine or feminine. See art. JUNIAS.

Apostle’s captivity at Rome, whether compulsorily or voluntarily.

(3) The pair are further described as ‘of note among the apostles’ (ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις). Two interpretations of this phrase are possible: (a) well-known and honoured by the apostles, (b) notable or distinguished as apostles. The latter, although a remarkable expression (and all the more so if the second name is that of a woman), is probably to be preferred. This makes Andronicus and Junia(s) apostles in the wider sense of delegated missionaries (see Lightfoot, Gal., 1876, p. 92 ff. and note on p. 96).

(4) Lastly, Andronicus and Junia(s) are said to have been ‘in Christ before me’ (ὁὶ καὶ πρὸ ἐμοῦ γέγοναν ἐν Χριστῷ), i.e. they had become Christians before the conversion of Saul. Seniority of faith was of importance in the Apostolic Church. It brought honour, and it may have also brought responsibility and obligation to serve on behalf of the community (cf. Clement, Ep. 42; and see 1 Co 16<sup>15c</sup>; also art. EPENETUS). Note the prominence given to Mnason (q.v.) as an ‘early’ or ‘original’ disciple in Ac 21<sup>16</sup>.

The name Andronicus occurs in inscriptions belonging to the Imperial household (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, 1902, p. 422).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

ANGELS.—1. The scope of this article.—The passages in the apostolic writings in which angels are mentioned or referred to will be examined; some of them are ambiguous and have been interpreted in various ways. The doctrine of the OT and of the apocryphal period on the subject has been so fully dealt with in HDB that it is unnecessary to do more than refer incidentally to it here; and the angelology of the Gospels has been treated at length in DCG (see Literature below). But the other NT writings have not been so fully examined, and it is the object of this article to consider them particularly. Of these the Apocalypse, as might be expected from the subject, calls for special attention; no book of the OT or the NT is so full of references to the angels, and it is the more remarkable that the other Johannine writings have so few. The Fourth Gospel refers to angels only thrice (1<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>28</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>; 5<sup>4</sup> is a gloss [see below, 5 (b)]), and the three Epistles not at all. There are frequent references to the subject in Hebrews, and occasional ones in the Pauline and Petrine Epistles and in Jude.

2. The literal meaning of ἄγγελος.—ἄγγελος = ‘messenger,’ is found only once in the NT outside the Gospels: in Ja 2<sup>25</sup>, it is used of Joshua’s spies (in Jos 6<sup>25</sup> [LXX], which is referred to, we read τοὺς κατασκοπεύσαντας οὓς ἀπέστειλεν Ἰησοῦς). In the Gospels ἄγγελος is used of John Baptist in Mt 11<sup>10</sup>, Mk 1<sup>2</sup>, Lk 7<sup>27</sup> (from Mal 3<sup>1</sup> but not from LXX, which, however, also has ἄγγελος), of John’s messengers in Lk 7<sup>24</sup>, and of Jesus’ messengers to a Samaritan village in Lk 9<sup>52</sup>. In Ph 2<sup>25</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>23</sup> ἀπόστολος is translated ‘messenger.’

3. The angels as heavenly beings.—From the earliest times the Israelites had been taught to believe in angels, but after the Captivity the doctrine greatly developed. Yet some of the Jews rejected all belief in them, and this sharply divided the Pharisees from the Sadducees, who said ‘that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit’; the Pharisees confessed both (Ac 23<sup>8</sup>).

Angels are creatures, as the Jews had always taught (Thackeray, Relation of St. Paul to Jewish Thought, p. 150). They were created in, through, and unto Christ (Col 1<sup>16</sup>), who is the beginning as well as the end of all things (cf. 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>). They are not inferior deities, but fellow-servants (συνουλοὶ) with man (Rev 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>). Therefore they may not be worshipped (id.); the worship of angels was one of the grave errors at Colossæ (Col 2<sup>18</sup>). So idolatry is described as a worshipping of demons (Rev 9<sup>10</sup>).

Much emphasis is laid, lest it should be thought that angels were of the same degree as our Lord, on the fact that Jesus is immeasurably higher than they; as in He 1<sup>4</sup> (no angel is called 'the Son'; angels worship the Firstborn), 1<sup>13</sup> (no angel set at the right hand of God), 2<sup>5</sup> (the world to come is not made subject to angels, but to man—v. 8<sup>6</sup> shows that the Representative Man is meant, who condescended to be, in His Incarnation, made a little lower than the angels). In 1 P 3<sup>22</sup> 'angels and authorities and powers' are made subject to the ascended Christ; and so in Eph 1<sup>1</sup>. In Col 2<sup>15</sup> (an obscure verse), we may understand either that our Lord, putting off His body, made a show of the principalities and the powers, triumphing over them in the cross (so the Latin Fathers); or, with the Greeks, that He, having stripped off and put away the principalities, made a show of them, etc.—i.e. that He repelled their assaults. Here the evil angels are spoken of. But the complete subjection of the powers of evil to Jesus will not take place till the end of the world (1 Co 15<sup>38</sup>).

Angels are spirits (He 1<sup>7</sup> 14; cf. Rev 16<sup>14</sup>, 'spirits of demons.' In Ac 23<sup>8</sup> they seem to be differentiated from 'spirits' ('no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit . . . what if a spirit hath spoken to him or an angel?'). But this is not so. The 'angel' is the species, the 'spirit' the genus (Alford). All angels are spirits, though all spirits are not angels. In v. 8 the Pharisees are said to confess 'both,' i.e. both the resurrection and angel-spirits; only two categories are intended. We must also remember that in v. 9 non-Christian Jews are speaking.

But, though they are spirits, angels are not omnipresent or omniscient, for these are attributes of Deity. For their limited knowledge cf. Eph 3<sup>10</sup> (whether good or bad angels are there spoken of); it is implied in 1 P 1<sup>12</sup> (the angels desire to look into the mysteries of the gospel) and in 1 Co 2<sup>6</sup>, if 'rulers of this world' are the evil angels (see DEMON). It is explicitly stated in Mt 24<sup>36</sup>, Mk 13<sup>32</sup>. The limitation of the angels' knowledge is also stated in Ethiopic Enoch, xvi. 3 (2nd cent. B.C.?), where the angels who fell in Gn 6<sup>2</sup> (so 'sons of God' are interpreted) are said not to have had the hidden things yet revealed to them, though they knew worthless mysteries, which they recounted to the women (ed. Charles, 1893, p. 86f.). In the Secrets of Enoch (Slavonic), xxiv. 3 (1st cent. A.D.?), God says that He had not told His secrets even to His angels. Ignatius says that the virginity and child-bearing of Mary and the death of the Lord were hidden from (ἐλαθεῖν) the ruler of this age (Eph. 19; for this idea in the Fathers see Lightfoot's note).

The good angels are angels of light, as opposed to the powers of darkness (2 Co 11<sup>14</sup>; cf. Eph 6<sup>1</sup>); so, when the angel came to St. Peter in the prison, a light shone in the cell (Ac 12<sup>7</sup>). The name 'seraph' perhaps means 'the burning one,' though the etymology is doubtful; cf. also Ps 104<sup>4</sup>.

They neither marry nor are given in marriage; and so in the resurrection life there is no marrying, for men will be 'as angels in heaven' (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>, Mk 12<sup>25</sup>), 'equal to angels' (ισάγγελοι, Lk 20<sup>36</sup>). Some have thought that they have a sort of counterpart of bodies, described in 1 Co 15<sup>40</sup> as 'celestial bodies' (Meyer, Alford), though this is perhaps improbable; St. Paul's words may refer to the 'heavenly bodies' in the modern sense (Robertson-Plummer), or to the post-resurrection human bodies (cf. v. 48); or not to good men as opposed to bad (Chrysostom and others of the Fathers).

They are numberless (Rev 5<sup>11</sup> [from Dn 7<sup>14</sup>], He 12<sup>2</sup>, 'myriads'; in the latter passage they are perhaps described as a 'festal assembly' [RVm, ἀγγέλων πανηγυρεῖ]).

The unfallen angels are holy (Rev 14<sup>10</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup>, Lk 9<sup>5</sup>, and some MSS of Mt 23<sup>31</sup>; so perhaps 1 Th 3<sup>13</sup>, Jude 14 [see below, 5 (a)]; cf. Zec 14<sup>5</sup> 'all the holy ones'). This is the meaning of 'elect' angels in 1 Ti 5<sup>21</sup>—not angels chosen to guard the Ephesian Church; they are mentioned here because they will accompany our Lord to judgment or (Grimm) because they are chosen by God to rule.

4. Ranks of the angels.—There was a great tendency in later Jewish writings to elaborate the angelic hierarchy. In Is 6<sup>2-6</sup> we had read of seraphim; in Ezk 10 of cherubim. But in Eth. Enoch, lxi. 10 (these chapters are of the 1st cent. B.C.?), the host of the heavens, and all the holy ones above, the cherubim, seraphim, and ophanim (= 'wheels'; cf. Ezk 1<sup>15</sup>), angels of power, angels of principalities, are mentioned (cf. lxxi. 7); in the Secrets of Enoch (20) we read of archangels, incorporeal powers, lordships, principalities, powers, cherubim, seraphim, 'ten troops.' The 'genealogies' of 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> and Tit 3<sup>8</sup> are thought by some to refer to such speculations. St. Paul shows some impatience at the Colossian fondness for elaborating these divisions; yet in the NT we find traces of ranks of angels. In Jude 9 the archangel (Michael) is mentioned; so in 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>, where Michael is doubtless meant. In Romans, Colossians, and Ephesians no organized hierarchy is mentioned; and sometimes the reference seems to be to the whole angelic band, sometimes to the evil angels, when principalities, powers, dominions, thrones are referred to (Col 1<sup>16</sup> θρόνοι, κυριότητες, ἀρχαί, ἐξουσίαι; 2<sup>10-15</sup> ἀρχή, ἐξουσία; Eph 1<sup>21</sup> ἀρχή, ἐξουσία, δυνάμεις, κυριότης; 3<sup>10-12</sup> ἀρχαί, ἐξουσίαι; Ro 8<sup>38</sup> ἀγγελοι, ἀρχαί, δυνάμεις; 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup> ἀρχή, ἐξουσία, δυνάμεις). In the passages in Col. and Eph. St. Paul takes the ideas current in Asia Minor as to the ranks of the angels, but does not himself enunciate any doctrine; indeed, in Eph 1<sup>21</sup> he adds, 'and every name that is named [ονομάζεται, i.e. revered] both in this age and in that which is to come.' Some have thought that he refers to earthly powers; but, though these may perhaps in some cases be included, there can be little doubt that he is speaking primarily of angelic powers, good and bad. 'Whatever powers there may be, Christ is Lord of all, far above them all.' In Eph 3<sup>10</sup> only evil angelic powers are referred to—they are in the heavenly sphere (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις); and so in 6<sup>12</sup>, where they are contrasted with 'flesh and blood' (see also below). With these passages we may compare 1 P 3<sup>2-2</sup> 'angels and authorities and powers'; and possibly 2 P 2<sup>10f.</sup>, where the 'lordship' (RV 'dominion'), 'glories' ('dignities'), and angels are thought by some to refer to ranks of angels; if so, the highest rank is 'angels,' who are 'greater in might and power' than the 'glories.' The cherubim of the ark (Ex 25<sup>18</sup>) are mentioned in He 9<sup>5</sup>.

The Christian Fathers and the heretical teachers greatly elaborated the angelic hierarchy; of these perhaps the writer who had most influence was pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (de Cael. Hier. vi.-ix., c. A.D. 500), who divided the heavenly host into three divisions, with three subdivisions in each: (1) thrones, cherubim, seraphim; (2) powers (ἐξουσίαι), lordships (κυριότητες), might (δυνάμεις); (3) angels, archangels, principalities (ἀρχαί). On the analogy of this list, the Syriac-speaking Churches divided the Christian ministry into three classes, each with three sub-classes. For other divisions of angels in post-apostolic times see Lightfoot's note on Col 1<sup>16</sup>.

Very few names of angels occur in the NT. Of the holy angels only Gabriel (Lk 1<sup>19-26</sup>) and Michael (Jude 9, Rev 12<sup>7</sup>) are named (from Dn 8<sup>16-9-10</sup> 10<sup>13-21</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>). We also have the proper names Satan (thirty-one times, nineteen outside the Gospels), Beelzebub (Gospels only, six times), and Belial or Beliar (2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>). See DEVIL, BELIAL. In the Apocrypha we have Raphael in To 12<sup>15</sup>, Uriel in 2 Es 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>-8</sup>, and Jeremiel in 2 Es 4<sup>36</sup> (the last book perhaps is to be dated c. A.D. 90). Many other names are found in Jewish writings; see D. Stone, Outlines of Chr. Dogma, London, 1900, p. 38; Edersheim, Life and Times, App. xiii.; Eth. Enoch, 20 (Uriel, Rafael, Raguel, Michael, Saraqael, Gabriel; the Gr. fragment [Charles, p. 356 f.] has Sariel for Saraqael, and adds Remiel [= Jeremiel]).

5. Function of the angels.—The NT represents the angels as having a double activity, towards God and towards man. Both these aspects are found in He 1<sup>14</sup> (see below), as in Is 6<sup>1-7</sup>, where the seraphim worship before God, and one of them is sent to the prophet, and in Lk 1<sup>19</sup>, where Gabriel is said to stand in the presence of God, and to be sent to Zacharias.

(a) Towards God.—The angels are 'liturgic spirits' (Λειτουργικά πνεύματα, He 1<sup>14</sup>; cf. Dn 7<sup>10</sup> λειτουργούν ἀντὶ [Theodotion; the version in our Gr. OT] for ἀντὶ; 'ministered unto him'; the Chigi LXX has ἐθεράπευον αὐτόν); their ministry is an ordered one, before the throne of God: 'the whole host of His angels . . . minister (λειτουργοῦσιν) unto His will, standing by Him' (Clem. Rom. Cor. 34; cf. the 4th cent. Ignatian interpolator, Philad. 9, 'the liturgic powers of God'). 'They worship God in heaven' (Rev 5<sup>11</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>1-4</sup>; cf. Job 1<sup>6</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>), and on earth (Lk 2<sup>13a</sup>); they worship the Firstborn when He is brought into the world (He 1<sup>6</sup>), and are witnesses of the Incarnation (1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> 'seen of angels'—but Grimm interprets ἀγγέλους here as the apostles, witnesses of the risen Christ, and Swete thinks the reference is to the Agony in Gethsemane [Ascended Christ, 1910, p. 24]). To this heavenly worship there seems to be a reference in 1 Co 13<sup>1</sup> 'tongues of angels.' In Jewish thought there were 'angels of the presence,' the highest order of the hierarchy, who stood before the face of God, within the veil (Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 122; To 12<sup>15</sup>; Eth. Enoch, 40). There may be a reference to these in Rev 1<sup>4</sup> 'the seven spirits which are before his throne' (Swete interprets this of the sevenfold working of the Holy Spirit); 8<sup>2</sup> 'the seven angels which stand before God' (cf. v. 4); Mt 13<sup>10</sup> 'in heaven [the little ones] angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven'; and in Lk 1<sup>19</sup> (see above).

They will attend on the Son at the Last Judgment (1 Th 4<sup>16</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, Rev 3<sup>6</sup>); and this seems to be the most probable reference in 1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> 'with all his saints' (or 'holy ones'—τῶν ἁγίων αὐτοῦ) and in Jude 1<sup>4</sup> 'with ten thousands of his holy ones' (or 'with his holy myriads,' ἐν ἁγίαις μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ), where the words are quoted from Enoch, i. 9, the text of the latter in the Gizeh Greek fragment being σὺν τοῖς (sic) μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτοῦ. The words in Jude are certainly to be understood of the angels, and this makes the similar interpretation of 1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> more likely. But Milligan (Com. in loc.) thinks that the latter reference is to 'just men made perfect,' who are said to judge, or to be 'brought with' Jesus at the Judgment (1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>, Mt 19<sup>-3</sup>, Lk 22<sup>30</sup>; cf. Wis 3<sup>8</sup>; for 1 Co 6<sup>3</sup> see 7 below). No doubt the saints will rule with Christ (Rev 2<sup>26f</sup>, 20<sup>4</sup> etc.); but, as all men will themselves be judged (Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>), the interpretation of the above passages as implying that the saints will themselves be judges at the Last Day is somewhat doubtful. The attendance of the angels on the Great Judge is mentioned in all four Gospels (Mt 13<sup>41</sup> 16<sup>27</sup> 24<sup>31</sup> 25<sup>31</sup>, Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 13<sup>27</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> 12<sup>8f</sup>, and Jn 1<sup>51</sup> [where the reference is to Gn 28<sup>12</sup>]).

(b) Towards man.—The angels do service (διακονία) to man as heirs of salvation (He 1<sup>14</sup>).

They ministered to our Lord on earth, in His human nature, after the Temptation in the wilderness (Mt 4<sup>11</sup>, Mk 1<sup>13</sup>, not in || Lk.), and at Gethsemane (Lk 22<sup>43</sup>: this may not be part of the Third Gospel, but is certainly part of a 1st cent. tradition; it could not have been invented by the scribes [see Westcott-Hort, NT in Greek, ii. App., p. 67]). The present writer has argued for its being older than Lk., and reflecting the same stage of thought as Mk. [DCG ii. 124<sup>b</sup>]. In Mt 26<sup>53</sup> Jesus says that angels would have ministered to Him, had He so willed, when Judas betrayed Him.

The angels are spectators of our lives: 1 Co 4<sup>9</sup> 'a spectacle (θεάτρον) to angels'; 1 Ti 5<sup>21</sup> 'in the sight of God and Christ Jesus and the elect angels'; 1 P 1<sup>12</sup>, the angels 'look into'—'glance at,' or perhaps 'pore over' (see Bigg, Com. in loc.)—the Church and its Gospel; they rejoice over the sinner's repentance (Lk 15<sup>10</sup>).

They are messengers to man. This is the office of angels which is most prominent in the NT; see Ac 7<sup>35, 38</sup> (Moses) 8<sup>26</sup> (Philip) 10<sup>3, 7, 22, 30</sup> (Peter, Cornelius) 11<sup>13</sup> (Peter) 12<sup>7-11</sup> (Peter in prison) 23<sup>9</sup> (Paul) 27<sup>23</sup> (Paul on his voyage), He 13<sup>2</sup> (reference to Abraham, Gn 18), and frequently in Rev. (e.g. 1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>26</sup>). St. Paul alludes to this work of the angels in Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, which suggests that they must be proved, as spirits must be (1 Co 12<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>, etc.; see DEMON, § 2), to see whether they are true or false, and in Gal 4<sup>14</sup>, where there is a climax: 'as an angel of God, nay, as one who is higher than the angels, as Christ Jesus himself.' For this function in the Gospels see Mt 1<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>13, 19</sup> 28<sup>2-5</sup>, Mk 16<sup>5-7</sup>, Lk 1<sup>11, 13, 19, 26, 30, 35</sup> 9<sup>9f, 21</sup> 24<sup>4, 23</sup>, Jn 12<sup>29</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>; here we note that the 'angel of the Lord' in the NT is not the same as the 'angel of Jahweh' in the OT: it merely means an angel sent by God. This office of the angels does not exclude the Divine message coming directly to man (Ac 9<sup>5</sup> 22<sup>8</sup> 26<sup>14</sup>, Gal 1<sup>12</sup>).

They are helpers of our worship. They offer the 'prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar' (Rev 8<sup>3f</sup>). Their presence at Christian worship is a reason for decorum and reverence (1 Co 11<sup>10</sup>: a woman should be veiled in the assembly of the faithful 'because of the angels'; this seems to be the meaning, not 'because of the clergy who are present,' as Ambrose, Ephraim Syrus, Primasius, nor 'because of the evil angels,' with a reference to Gn 6<sup>14</sup>, as Tertullian [de Virg. Vel. 7; cf. 17], nor yet 'because the angels do so,' i.e. veil themselves before their Superior [Is 6<sup>2</sup>]; see Robertson-Plummer, Com. in loc.). For the presence of angels at worship cf. Ps 138<sup>1</sup> LXX and Vulg., To 12<sup>12, 15</sup>, Three 3<sup>7</sup>.

They fight for man against evil, under Michael (Jude 9, Rev 12<sup>7f</sup>, 19<sup>14, 19</sup> 20<sup>1-3</sup>); they are 'armies' (στρατεύματα, Rev 19<sup>14</sup>) and a 'host' (στρατιά, Lk 2<sup>13</sup>; not in He 12<sup>22</sup> RV where μυριάδων is translated 'innumerable hosts'). They are the 'armies' sent out by the King in the Parable of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22<sup>7</sup>).

They were the mediators of the Law (Ac 7<sup>53</sup>, Gal 3<sup>19</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup>); i.e. they assisted at the giving of the Law. St. Paul and the writer of Hebrews argue from this the superiority of the Gospel as being given without the interposition of created beings (Lightfoot on Gal 3). The presence of angels is not mentioned in Ex 19, but cf. Dt 33<sup>2</sup>, Ps 68<sup>7</sup>; it was emphasized by the Jews as extolling the Law (see Thackeray, op. cit. p. 162), and this is perhaps the meaning in Ac 7<sup>53</sup>.

At death the angels carry the faithful departed to Abraham's bosom (Lk 16<sup>22</sup>). This was a common Jewish belief (DCG i. 57<sup>a</sup>).

At the Judgment they will be the reapers of the harvest (Rev 14<sup>17-19</sup>, Mt 13<sup>39, 49</sup>).

They are messengers of punishment (Ac 12<sup>23</sup> [Herod], Rev 14<sup>10</sup>), and of judgment (Rev 8<sup>5f</sup>).

19<sup>11-14</sup>; cf. the pouring out of the bowls, 16<sup>1-17</sup>, and the seven angels having seven plagues, 15<sup>1</sup>). In 1 Co 10<sup>10</sup> the 'destroyer' (δολοφρενής) is not Satan, but the angel sent by God to smite the people (the reference is to Nu 16, where no angel is mentioned; but cf. Ex 12<sup>-3</sup>, 2 S 24<sup>16</sup>). Satan is sometimes called 'the destroyer' (απολλων, Rev 9<sup>11</sup>), but δολοφρενής is not used elsewhere in the Bible (see Robertson-Plummer on 1 Co 10<sup>10</sup>).

They intervene on earth to help man: an 'angel of the Lord' releases the apostles (Ac 5<sup>19</sup>) and Peter (12<sup>1</sup>); and, according to an ancient gloss, probably African, originating before the time of Tertullian, who quotes it (de Bapt. 5), 'an angel of the Lord' also 'troubled' the water of Bethesda (Jn 5<sup>4</sup>). (Tertullian applies this text to Christian baptism, over which he says an angel presides.) Generally, the angels guard men from evil. This leads us to the question of guardian angels. It is an ancient idea that each human being, or even every creature animate and inanimate, has allotted to it one or more special angelic guards. This idea is to some extent confirmed by the words of our Lord about the 'angels of the little ones' in Mt 18<sup>10</sup>. It was a popular belief that these guardians took the form of the person guarded, and the people assembled in the house of Mary the mother of Mark thought that Peter, when escaped from prison, was 'his angel' (Ac 12<sup>15</sup>). This Jewish conception was long retained by the Christians. Tertullian thought that the soul had a 'figure,' a certain corporeity, an 'inner man, different from the outer, but yet one in the twofold condition' (de Anima, 9); this is not quite the same idea, but we find it more clearly in the 4th cent. Church Order, the Testament of our Lord (i. 40), where all men have 'figures of their souls, which stand before the Father of Light,' and which in the case of the wicked 'perish and are carried to darkness to dwell.' Similarly there are angels of fire (Rev 14<sup>18</sup>), of water (16<sup>3ff.</sup>; cf. 7<sup>14</sup> and Jn 5<sup>4</sup>), of winds (Rev 7<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ps 104<sup>4</sup>), of countries (Dn 10<sup>13-20</sup>; cf. Sir 17<sup>17</sup>); and the angel of the abyss, Abaddon (q.v.) or Apollyon (Rev 9<sup>11</sup>; cf. 20<sup>1</sup>). For Rabbinical ideas see Thackeray, op. cit. p. 168, and Edersheim, op. cit. App. xiii.

6. Angels of the Churches.—In Rev 1<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>. 8. 12. 18 3<sup>1</sup>. 7. 14 the Seven Churches are said each to have an 'angel.' These angels represent the Churches; what is said to them is said to the Churches (3<sup>-2</sup>; cf. 1<sup>4</sup>); things done by the Churches are said to be done by them. Various interpretations have been offered. (a) They are said to be angels as in the rest of the book. The strongest arguments for this view are the writer's usage elsewhere, and the mention of Jezebel (2<sup>20</sup>: 'thy wife' in some MSS), which is clearly symbolic. The difficulty is the sin ascribed to these angels, as in any case a good angel must, if this interpretation be taken, be meant; if so, the meaning must be that the angels bear the sins of the Churches as representing and guarding them. (b) They are thought to be earthly representatives of the Churches, either delegates to Patmos or the bishops or presbyters of the Churches. This view accords better with the later than with the earlier date assigned to Rev., with the time of Domitian than with that of Nero. (c) They are thought to be ideal personifications of the Churches. On the whole the first view seems to be the most probable. Compare and contrast the following article.

7. Fallen angels.—In the NT both good and evil angels are mentioned; but when the word 'angel' occurs alone, a good angel is to be understood unless the context requires otherwise, though perhaps 1 Co 6<sup>3</sup> is an exception (see below). The fall is mentioned in Jude<sup>6</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>4</sup>; and probably in 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, where it is ascribed to pride (see DEVIL,

§ 2). The Incarnation was not intended to help the angels. Jesus did not 'take hold' of, to help, the angels (or, as AV, did not take hold of their nature); see Westcott on He 2<sup>16</sup>. Yet in Col 1<sup>20</sup> God is said to reconcile through (the death of) Christ 'all things' to Himself—the whole universe material and spiritual (Lightfoot); but it was not by delivering them from death (Alford): the fallen angels are not saved by Christ's death. According to some interpretations, St. Paul says that angels will be judged by men (1 Co 6<sup>3</sup>). Robertson-Plummer interprets this verse, tentatively, as meaning that, as Christ judges, i.e. rules over, angels, so will saints, who share in that rule; but, if the Last Judgment is intended, then fallen angels must be meant here, for good angels, not having fallen, cannot be judged. For 1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> see above, 5 (a). In the end Satan is bound, and Babylon falls (Rev 18 and 20); nothing is said of his angels, but the inference is that his angels fall with him, and this is expressly said in Mt 25<sup>41</sup>. See further, ADVERSARY, AIR, BELIAL, DEMON, DEVIL.

Metaphorically the 'stake in the flesh' is called an angel (messenger) of Satan (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>). See art. PAUL.

8. Comparison of apostolic and other teaching.

—(a) Comparison with that of our Lord.—Oesterley (SDB, 32) contrasts Jesus' teaching with that of the Evangelists and other NT writers, and says that our Lord taught that the abode and work of the angels are in heaven, not here below, while His disciples taught (as the Jews did) that they are active on earth. On the other hand, Marshall (DCG i. 54<sup>a</sup>) maintains the complete identity of teaching between Jesus and the Evangelists. To the present writer the latter view seems to be the right one. It is true that in our Lord's words the work of angels on earth is not prominent. But in Jn 1<sup>51</sup> (our Lord is speaking) the order 'ascending and descending' shows that the angels are 'already on earth, though we see them not' (Westcott, Com. in loc.). The account of the angelic ministry at the Temptation, like that of the Temptation itself, could by its very nature have come only from our Lord's own lips. Moreover, in Jesus' teaching, the angels come to the earth to fetch Lazarus' soul (Lk 16<sup>-2</sup>) and to reap the Harvest (Mt 13<sup>39</sup>, 49).

(b) Comparison with the doctrine of false teachers.

—In Colossians we find an elaborate angelology, taught by professing Christians whom St. Paul attacks. Their heresy was partly Jewish, partly Gnostic, though some think that two different sects are meant. The Gnostic element shows itself in the tendency to put angels as intermediaries between God and man, and to make angels emanations from God with an elaborate hierarchy of powers, dominions, etc. Against such teaching St. Paul asserts that Christ is the only mediator (Col 1<sup>15-22</sup> 29<sup>-15</sup>), and forbids the worship of angels because it denies this. In the unique mediation of our Lord lies the significance of the repeated phrases 'in the Lord,' 'unto the Lord' (3<sup>18</sup>. 20. 23). Jesus is the one ἀρχή, or 'beginning' (1<sup>18</sup>; cf. Rev 3<sup>14</sup>), of creation, as against the idea of angelic intermediaries when the world was made (see Lightfoot's essay on the Colossian heresy [Col., p. 71 ff.]). Perhaps also in the assertion of the unique mediation of Christ lies the significance of the rhetorical passage in which St. Paul says that no heavenly powers, good or bad, can separate us from the love of God (Ro 8<sup>38</sup>). Passages in Eph. (above, 4) seem to show that the Colossian heresy was known also on the Asian seaboard.

A later stage of angelological error is found at the end of the 1st cent. in Cerinthus' teaching, which resembled that of the Colossian heretics. Cerinthus (q.v.) taught that the world was not made by God, but by an angel, or by a series of powers or angels, who were ignorant of God; the Mosaic Law was given by them (cf. above, 5 (b)). Cerinthus is the link between the Gnosticism at Colossæ and the developed Gnosticism of the 2nd century (for his doctrine see Irenæus, Hær. i. 26; Hippolytus, Refut. vii. 21, x. 17). He claimed to have had angelic visions, and was a millenarian of the grossest sort (Caius in Eusebius, HE iii. 28). See also Lightfoot, op. cit., p. 106 ff.

Speculations such as those attacked by St. Paul found a congenial soil in 'Asia' and Phrygia. Even in the 4th cent. at the Council held at the Phrygian Laodicea (c. A.D. 380), Christians are forbidden to leave the Church of God and invoke (δουλάειν) angels (can. 35; see Hefele, Councils, Eng. tr., iii. 317). It is the proper jealousy for the One Mediator, on the other hand, which has led many moderns to reject the doctrine of the existence of angels altogether. But both heavenly and earthly beings can help man without being mediators, as we see when one man helps another by intercessory prayer. The NT teaching about angelic helpers, so potent an antidote to materialism, in no way asserts that we are to pray to God through the angels, or contradicts the doctrine that Christ is the only Mediator between God and man.

(c) Comparison with current Jewish teaching and that of the later Rabbis.—The apostolic teaching is quite free from the wild speculations of Jewish angelology. (For differences between it and current Jewish ideas see Edersheim, op. cit. i. 142 and App. xiii.) Of Jewish speculations the most elaborate were those of the Essenes (q.v.), which had a decided Gnostic tinge. This Jewish sect had an esoteric doctrine of angels, and its members were not allowed to divulge their names to outsiders (Jos. BJ II. viii. 7; Lightfoot, Col., p. 87; Edersheim, i. 330 f.). A few Jewish speculations may be mentioned. It was thought that new angels were always being created—an idea derived from a wresting of La 3<sup>23</sup> (Thackeray, op. cit. p. 150). The angels taught Noah medicine (Book of Jubilees, 10). The righteous will become angels (Eth. Enoch, li. 4). An angel troubled the waters of Bethesda for healing (gloss in Jn 5<sup>4</sup>). An elaborate hierarchical system and numerous names were invented for them (above, 4). Contrasted with these ideas, we have in the NT a wise reserve, which refuses to go beyond the things which are written.

One Jewish speculation must be noticed more fully. The Rabbis taught that none of the angels was absolutely good, that they opposed the creation of man and were jealous of him (Edersheim, ii. 754). Thackeray (p. 151 f.) considers that St. Paul also makes them all antagonistic to God. If so, he contradicts the teaching both of our Lord and of the other NT writers (above, 3). But this view, based on St. Paul's language about principalities, powers, etc., and on the idea that all the angels are the enemies who must be put under Christ's feet (1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>), appears to be untenable. St. Paul, while affirming that some 'powers' are evil, does not say that they all are so. See above, 4.

9. Nature of NT angelophanies.—It is unprofitable to ask whether angels took material bodies when they appeared to men or whether they merely seemed to do so. At any rate, they took the form of men to the mind, though in some cases there was something about them that produced wonder or fear (Lk 1<sup>12</sup>, Mt 28<sup>4</sup>, etc.). The accounts of the angels who were seen after the Resurrection vary. In Mt 28<sup>2</sup> the angel who rolled away the stone was like lightning, his raiment white as snow. In Mk 16<sup>5</sup> we read only of a young man in a white robe. In Lk 24<sup>4</sup> there are two men in dazzling apparel (cf. v. <sup>23</sup> 'vision of angels'). In Jn 20<sup>12</sup>

there are two angels in white, sitting. In Ac 1<sup>10</sup> there are 'two men . . . in white apparel.' To Cornelius the angel was 'a man . . . in bright apparel' (Ac 10<sup>30</sup>). Stephen's face was filled with superhuman glory, 'as it had been the face of an angel' (Ac 6<sup>15</sup>; so we reflect, as in a mirror, the glory of the Lord, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>). For an argument that the appearance of the angels was 'objective' see Plummer on Lk 1<sup>11</sup>; but this is largely a matter of definition. At the death of Herod (Ac 12<sup>3</sup>) no appearance of an angel is necessarily intended.

10. The immediate successors of the apostles.—Angelology was a favourite topic of the time; but, the literature of the sub-apostolic period being very scanty, the references are few. For Clement of Rome see above, 5 (a). Ignatius says that the knowledge of angelic mysteries was given to martyrs (Trall. 5): 'heavenly things and the dispositions (τοποθεσίας) of angels, and mustering of rulers (συναγωγὴ ἀρχοντικὰς), seen and unseen' (cf. Col 1<sup>16</sup>). The 'dispositions' would be in the seven heavens. The ἀρχοντες, 'rulers,' would be St. Paul's ἀρχαί, i.e. angels (Lightfoot, Ign. ii. 165). In Smyrn. 6 it is said that the angels, if they believe not in the blood of Christ, are judged; this seems to imply that their probation is not yet ended. See also above, 3. Papias (quoted by Andreas of Cæsarea, in Apoc., ch. 34, serm. 12; Lightfoot-Harmer, Apostol. Fathers, p. 521) says that to some of the angels God 'gave dominion over the arrangement (διακοσμήσεως) of the universe . . . but their array (τάξις) came to naught, for the great dragon, the old serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole earth, was cast down, yea, was cast down to the earth, and his angels' (quotation from Rev 12<sup>9</sup>). Papias seems to date the fall of the angels after the creation of the world. Hermas (for his possibly early date see Salmon, Introd. to NT, xxvi.) describes the building of the tower [the Church] upon the waters by six young men (cf. Mk 16<sup>5</sup>), while countless other men bring the stones; and the former are said to be the holy angels of God, who were created first of all; the latter are also holy angels, but the six are superior to them (Vis. iii. 1, 2, 4). In the Martyrdom of Polycarp, 2, martyrs are said to become angels after death (see above, 8). In the Epistle to Diognetus, 7, God is said to have sent to men a minister (ὑπηρέτην) or angel or ruler (ἀρχοντα). Justin interprets Ps 24<sup>7</sup> [LXX] as addressed to the rulers appointed by God in the heavens (Dial. 36). To angels was committed the care of man and of all things under heaven, but they transgressed through the love of women (Apol. ii. 5, referring to Gn 6<sup>1ff.</sup>). Angels, like men, have free will (Dial. 141).

LITERATURE.—A. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah<sup>9</sup>, London, 1897, i. 142, ii. 748 (Appendix, xiii.), etc.; H. St. J. Thackeray, The Relation of St. Paul to Contemporary Jewish Thought, do. 1900; A. B. Davidson in HDB, art. 'Angel' (almost entirely for OT); W. Fairweather in HDB, vol. v., art. 'Development of Doctrine in the Apocryphal Period', § iii.; J. T. Marshall in DG, art. 'Angels'; and the Commentaries, esp. H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John, London, 1906; B. F. Westcott, Hebrews<sup>3</sup>, do. 1906; G. Milligan, Thessalonians, do. 1908; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon, do. 1900 (1st ed. 1875); A. Robertson and A. Plummer, 1 Corinthians, Edinburgh, 1911.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.—The general practice of NT writers points to the conclusion that the word 'angels,' used in this connexion, is employed to denote superhuman and celestial personalities. We are not, however, without examples of its being used to indicate ordinary 'messengers' (cf. Lk 7<sup>24</sup> 9<sup>52</sup>, Ja 2<sup>25</sup>, etc.). In this case it would be equivalent to the ἀπόστολοι ἐκκλησιῶν (2 Co 8<sup>23</sup>; cf. Ph 2<sup>25</sup>), who were in some sense the official, if temporary, delegates of one Church to another. The fact that in the Apocalypse these 'angels' are to such a degree the recipients of praise and blame would seem to put both these simple interpretations out of court.

Many ingenious attempts have been made to employ the expression as a collateral or subsidiary proof that episcopacy had already been established within the lifetime of the Johannine author. The passages adduced from the OT in support of this view are certainly irrelevant; for, while it is conceivable that the chief minister of a Church should be styled ἄγγελος Κυρίου (cf. Hag 1<sup>13</sup> and Mal 2<sup>7</sup>; see also Is 44<sup>5</sup> and Mal 3<sup>1</sup>), it is difficult to understand the application to him of the designation ἄγγελος ἐκκλησίας (Rev 2<sup>1</sup>, etc.). Nor, again, can the contention be sustained that the expression had its origin in the office of the sheliakh zibbar, the messenger or plenipotentiary of the synagogue—for, as Schürer has pointed out, these 'messengers' were not permanent officials (see HJP II. ii. 67), but persons chosen for the time by the ruler to pronounce the prayer at public worship (cf. Lightfoot, Dissertations on Apostol. Age, 1892, p. 158).

In supporting the contention that by the 'angels' of the Churches are meant the bishops, the strange conclusion has been maintained that in the words τὴν γυναῖκα [σου] Ἰεράβηλ (Rev 2<sup>20</sup>) the author is referring to the Thyatiran bishop's wife (see Grotius, Annotationes in Apoc., ad loc.). It ought to be pointed out that this theory is as old as Jerome, who in his commentary on 1 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> adopts a similar interpretation; and Socrates (HE iv. 23) describes Serapion as 'the angel of the church of the Thmuitæ' (cf. Jerome, de Vir. illustr. 99, where he mentions Serapion as 'Thmucos Egypti urbis Episcopus'). The same conception is attached to the expression by the 6th cent. commentators, Primasius the African (Com. in Apoc.) and Cassiodorus the Italian (Complexiones in Apoc.) in their reflexions on Rev 1<sup>20</sup>.

An examination of the use of the word ἄγγελος in the NT Apocalypse, apart from its connexion with the Churches, shows that the author invariably employs it to describe a spiritual being attached to the service of God or of Satan. We are, therefore, confronted with the difficulty of accounting for its presence here in a sense so completely different as the episcopal theory involves. There is, indeed, no valid reason to suppose that the author, even in a work as highly symbolical as this, attaches an essentially different idea to the word when he speaks of 'the Angels of the Seven Churches.'

If we can accept the textual purity of the Ascension of Isaiah, iii. 15, there is a remarkable parallel: 'the descent of the angel of the Christian Church, which is in the heavens, whom He will summon in the last days.' Even on the supposition that the Ethiopic version, supported by some Greek MSS, is a correct translation of the original, and the simple word 'Church' is substituted for 'angel of the Christian Church,' we are confronted by the primitive identification of the Church and its angel (see Charles, Asc. of Isaiah, ad loc.).

Perhaps the most curious feature of the letters to the Asian Churches is the way in which the writer expresses himself in terms of stern reproof or of encouragement to their 'angels.' The objection to this difficulty is considered by Origen, who finds cause for marvel at the care shown by God for men: 'forasmuch as He suffers His angels to be blamed and rebuked on our behalf' (hom. in Num. xx. 3; cf. in Luc. xiii.).

As we have already seen, however, it is difficult to suppose that the writer intended the words to be understood as referring literally to angels who presided over the Churches. There is, no doubt, a natural inclination to see in his use of the phrase a reminiscence of the 'princes' of the Apocalypse of Daniel (ὁ ἄρχων βασιλείας Περσῶν, Dn 10<sup>13</sup>; cf. Μιχαὴλ ὁ ἄγγελος, v. <sup>1</sup>). A similar belief with respect to the guardianship of individuals is referred to incidentally as held by Jesus (Mt 18<sup>10</sup>), and we need not be surprised to find it applied to Churches in their corporate capacity by a writer whose teaching on the activity and functions of angels is so advanced.

Taking into account the symbolism of the whole book and the obviously symbolic mention of Jezebel (Rev 2<sup>20</sup>; cf. Milligan on Rev 10<sup>1-3</sup> in Schaff's Pop. Com. on the NT), there seems to be no interpretation more in harmony with the spirit of the writing than that which sees in this expression the personification of the characteristic spiritual tone and genius of each Church.

If we accept this conclusion as being most consonant with the general trend of thought throughout the writing, it may not be amiss to refer to the remarkable parallel in the fravashis, or 'doubles,' of Parsism. Whatever the connexion between Persian and Jewish angelology—and it is not necessary to insist on a direct borrowing—it seems to be certain that, in the period immediately subsequent to the Captivity, Parsi influence shaped, at least indirectly and remotely, the development of Hebrew thought. 'The fravashi of a nation or community is a conception found in three Avestan passages. . . . The fravashi is no longer a being necessarily good, but becomes a complete spiritual counterpart of the nation or the church, and capable therefore of declension and punishment' (HDB iv. 991<sup>b</sup>; cf. JThSt iii. 520 ff.). The nexus may be, and probably is, not so mechanical and direct as J. H. Moulton seeks to establish. On the other hand, it seems as if a relationship of some kind between the allied forces of Magianism and Zoroastrianism, as they were refracted by the medium of Hellenistic culture and Hebrew thought, must be regarded as inevitable. It is enough to say that the 'angel' is the personified embodiment of the spiritual character and ethos of the Church. If this use of the word by the author has led to confusion and obscurity, the reason lies probably in the limitations of that symbolism which was the characteristic vehicle of Jewish apocalyptic literature (see W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches, 1904, pp. 57-73). Compare and contrast § 6 of the preceding article.

LITERATURE.—See the works referred to throughout the art., and the Commentaries on the Apocalypse.

J. R. WILLIS.

ANGER.—1. Human anger.—Except by the stoical mind which finds no place for strong emotion in a moral scheme, anger has been recognized as a quality which, under certain conditions and within certain limits, may not only be permissible but commendable. Its ready abuse has, however, led to its being commonly placed among the evils of human nature. The teaching of the early Christian Church recognizes both aspects. Condemnation of the abuse of anger is not wanting in the apostolic writings. Among the manifest works of the flesh are enmities, strife, jealousies, wraths (θυμοί), factions (Gal 5<sup>20</sup>). St. Paul fears lest he shall find these evils in the Church when he comes to Corinth (2 Co 12<sup>9</sup>). One of the marks of the greatest of Christian virtues is that it 'does not blaze forth in passionate anger' (οὐ παροξύνεται [1 Co 13<sup>7</sup>]). In Christian circles, all bitterness and wrath and anger must be put away (Eph 4<sup>31</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>8</sup>). The holy hands lifted up in prayer must be unstained with anger and strife (1 Ti 2<sup>8</sup>). The 'bishop' must be blameless, as God's steward, not self-willed, not soon angry (Tit 1<sup>7</sup>). St. James bids his readers be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath, for the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God (1<sup>19, 20</sup>). 'Be not prone to anger,' says the Didache (iii. 2), 'for anger leadeth to murder: nor a zealot, nor contentious, nor quick-tempered, for murder also is the outcome of these.'

On the other hand, Christian morality recognizes a righteous anger. The section of the Sermon on the Mount which teaches that whosoever is angry with his brother is in danger of the judgment (Mt 5<sup>14</sup>) is primarily aimed at something other than passion—it is an emphatic condemnation of the spirit which despises and seeks to injure a brother. The violation of the law of brotherly love, manifest in the anger of Mt 5<sup>22</sup>, might, indeed, provoke a legitimate wrath, e.g. in the series of woes, terrible in intensity of language, pronounced by Jesus against the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23<sup>34</sup>). We should hesitate to acknowledge a man as morally and spiritually great who could remain unmoved in the presence of the world's wrongs. The early preachers would have been poor souls had they been able to hide their indignation at the murderers of Jesus (Ac 3<sup>13,14</sup> 5<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>51,2</sup>). Could Peter well have been calm with Ananias and Sapphira (Ac 5<sup>1</sup>), and later, with the commercially-minded, religious adventurer, Simon Magus (8<sup>20,1</sup>)? A certain principle of discrimination seems, however, to have been observed. Anger at personal insult or persecution was discouraged. Anger provoked by personal injury may have a protective value in a lower stage of the world's life, but the attitude of Christian ethics to this type is governed by the law of non-resistance laid down by the Sermon on the Mount. Man must return good for evil, show kindness to his enemy, leave retribution to God (Ro 12<sup>19, 20</sup>). St. Paul claims that, 'when reviled, we bless; when persecuted, we bear it patiently; when slandered, we try to conciliate' (1 Co 4<sup>1</sup>), thus following the example of Jesus (1 P 2<sup>3</sup>). One is tempted to regard the apology which followed the momentary outburst of St. Paul's passion against the high priest (Ac 23<sup>3</sup>) as an expression of the Apostle's principles of non-resistance rather than as an acknowledgment of priestly rights. But there is an altogether different attitude when that which is to be defended is a righteous principle, a weaker brother, or the faith or ethical standard of the Church. Elymas, the sorcerer, seeking to hinder a work of grace, provokes a vigorous anger (Ac 13<sup>10,11</sup>). On behalf of the purity of faith St. Paul resists St. Peter to the face (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>). The Epistle to the Galatians is a piece of passionate writing, and a note of indignation runs through the later chapters of 2 Cor. (cf. 1 Co 1<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, etc.). The man who does not love the Lord Jesus, or the one who preaches a false gospel, let him be accursed—ἀνάθεμα (1 Co 16<sup>2</sup>). The indignation (ἀγανάκτησις) of the Corinthian Church against the guilty person in the case of immorality, to which St. Paul has drawn attention, is commended by him (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>). Similarly, the Church at Ephesus is congratulated on its hatred of the Nicolaitans (Rev 2<sup>6</sup>). St. Paul 'burns' if another is 'made to stumble' (2 Co 11<sup>29</sup>). In these instances, anger seems to have been regarded as compatible with, and indeed expressive of, Christian character. The obvious danger of mistaken zeal for a cause or creed must, however, be kept in mind. The case of St. Paul's early life provides an illustration (Gal 1<sup>13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>3</sup>). There may be a zeal for God, not according to knowledge (Ro 10<sup>2</sup>).

But even legitimate anger may readily pass into a sin. Passions beyond the control of the rational self can hardly be justified, whatever the cause. Self-control is a cardinal Christian virtue. Hence the apostolic caution of Eph 4<sup>26</sup>, 'Be ye angry and sin not,' i.e. if angry, as one may rightly be, do not allow the passion to become an evil by its excess. The wrath against which the warning is given seems indicated by the following clause—'let not the sun go down on your παροργισμός' ('a noun which differs from οργή in denoting, not the disposition of anger, or anger in a lasting mood, but exasperation, sudden violent anger' [Salmond]). There is no reference to deliberate indignation on a matter of principle, such as the resentment which, the author of Ecce Homo claims, was felt by Jesus towards the Pharisees to the end of His life.

2. Divine anger.—Most minds must have felt the objection expressed by Origen, Augustine, and the Neo-Platonist theologians generally, that we cannot treat the Supreme as a magnified man and attribute to Him such perturbation of mind as is suggested to us by the term 'anger.' But we may allow—and must do so unless we are prepared to deny personality in God—that the quality, which we find expressed under human conditions as the righteous anger of a good man, must exist in God, although in a form which we cannot adequately conceive, owing to our inability to realize absolute conditions. We may be helped to some extent by recognizing that behind the human agitations of personality in love, pity, indignation, etc., there are certain principles and attitudes which no more depend for their quality on the element of agitation than the existence of steam depends upon the appearance of white vapour which we ordinarily associate with it. This underlying quality we may attribute to the Deity, in whom life and personality, here expressed only in finite and conditioned forms, have their perfect and unconditioned being (Lotze).

The objection that anger, unlike love, is unworthy of the highest moral personality (Marcion) may be met by the answer that Divine love and anger are not two opposing principles, but expressions of the one attitude towards contrary sets of human circumstances. The Divine anger is actually involved in the Divine love (Tertullian, Martensen, etc.). The one Lord whose name is Truth and Love is, because of this, a consuming flame to wrong (He 10<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>29</sup>).

The idea of the 'Divine anger'—this attitude of Deity towards certain courses of human life—is a justifiable inference from the intuitions of conscience, but another and an unsound argument played a part in the historical formation of the doctrine. In the early stages of religious thought the conception of the wrath of God would naturally come to men's minds from contemplation of the ills of human life. The chieftain punished those with whom he was angry, either by direct action or by withholding his protection. Did not, then, physical calamities, pestilences, reverses of fortune, defeat in battle, indicate the displeasure of Deity (Jos 7, 2 S 21<sup>1</sup> 24, etc.)? Such misfortune, when no ethical cause could be recognized, would encourage the doctrine of unwitting and non-ethical offences (e.g. the violation of tabu) and of non-ethical propitiation. The ills of life—especially death—suggested later a world lying under a curse, due to Adam's sin. Against the popular doctrine that misfortune indicated Divine displeasure, the Book of Job is a protest. Human suffering has educative values, and does not necessarily indicate the disapproval of God (He 12<sup>34</sup>).

Yet even in early times the idea of the Divine anger did not rest wholly on the facts of human suffering. Men realized that the world, as they found it, was not in harmony with their conceptions of the Highest, and thus in times of prosperity, which, according to this theory, would indicate God's contentment with His people, prophets such as Amos argued for coming doom. From the consciousness of the holiness of God it was inferred that there must be Divine displeasure.

The turning away of the Divine anger.—Two attitudes in regard to this problem appear among the Hebrews, even as early as the 8th cent. B.C. The prophets of that period 'do not recognize the need of any means of reconciliation with God after estrangement by sin other than repentance' (Hos 14-, Am 5--<sup>24</sup>, Is 1<sup>3-17</sup>, Mic 6<sup>8-9</sup>). On the other hand, while repentance was always insisted upon by Israel's religious teachers, there was a tendency to assert the need of supplementary means in order to bring about the reconciliation of God and man. The conception may have originated in the practice of offering a propitiatory gift or legal compensation to an outraged person (Gn 20<sup>16</sup> 32<sup>13</sup>; cf. 1 S 26<sup>18</sup>, 2 S 24<sup>18f</sup>), or in the primitive view of sin as having a material existence of its own which called for an appropriate ritual treatment beyond the mental change of repentance, or in the customs of Levitical 'sin-offerings,' which, although originally made in view of ceremonial faults, for which ethical repentance was strictly impossible, must have come to suggest that, in addition to repentance, a sacrificial operation was needful even in cases of moral transgression.

From the period of the Exile, prayer, fasting, almsgiving, and especially the sufferings of the righteous, were regarded as substitutes for material sacrifices (see art. 'Atonement' in JE). Is 53 is the 'earliest expression of a conception [viz. the atoning value of the sufferings of pious men] which attained wide development in later times and constantly meets us in the teaching of the Jewish synagogues' (O. Whitehouse). One of the seven brothers, during the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, prays that 'in me and my brothers, the wrath of the Almighty may be appeased' (2 Mac 7<sup>38</sup>). 4 Mac 6<sup>29</sup> gives a prayer, 'Let my blood serve for purification, and as an equivalent for their life (ἀντίψυχον) take my own' (cf. 4 Mac 11<sup>9-24</sup> 17<sup>20-22</sup> 18<sup>4</sup>). These passages supply an interesting link between the old Leviticism and the NT doctrine of the sacrificial death of Jesus.

The doctrine of propitiation receives no support from the teaching of Jesus as given in the Synoptics. Repentance and new life are the conditions of the restoration of the Divine favour. Jesus does not appear to have ever taught that reconciliation depended upon His own death as a propitiation (see DCG, art. 'Sacrifice'), although He did teach that the spiritual ministration involved suffering and sacrifice, so that the death of Jesus might be figuratively regarded as a 'ransom for many' (Mk 10<sup>35-45</sup>). Moreover, the teaching of Jesus is not favourable to the view that legal right claims a compensation beyond repentance, before the Father will forgive. The moral of the parables of the Prodigal and the Labourers (cf. Lk 23<sup>43</sup>) is that forensic conceptions are altogether inappropriate in the religious sphere. Harmony with God is a matter of attitude, not of purchase or compensation.

The teaching of the Acts of the Apostles agrees with that of the Synoptics. There is no hint in the early preaching of the Church, as recorded in this work, of a propitiatory value in the death of Jesus. Jesus is, indeed, described as a 'Saviour,' but in the sense that He gives 'repentance to Israel and remission of sins' (Ac 5<sup>31</sup>), i.e. He is able to bring about a change in the hearts of men, and, in accordance with prophetic teaching, pardon follows repentance (cf. the description of the preaching of the Baptist, as that of 'repentance unto remission of sins,' Mk 1<sup>4</sup>).

But, with the exception of the authors of the Synoptics, the Acts, and the Epistle of James, the writers of the NT are strongly influenced by the propitiatory theory of the death of Jesus. The passage of the 'Suffering Servant' (Is 53<sup>4f</sup> 10<sup>4f</sup>) suggested a doctrine which seemed to throw light upon the ignominious death of Jesus upon the Cross. The 'stumbling-block' to the Jewish mind became the Christian's boast. How the sacrifice was regarded as operating is not clear—the analogy of Levitical blood sacrifices was evidently sometimes in the mind of the writers (Ro 3-5, 1 P 1<sup>19</sup>, Jn 1<sup>29</sup>, etc.). St. Paul also holds the idea that the death of Jesus is a sign of His human submission to the elemental world-powers of darkness, who, since Adam, have held the world under their grievous rule (HDB, art. 'Elements'; also Wrede, Paul, Eng. tr., 1907, p. 95). But, being more than man, He rises from the dead. The Resurrection is a sign that Death—one of the elemental principalities and powers, and representative of the rest—has no longer dominion over Him (Ro 6<sup>9</sup>), or over those in 'faith' union with Him. But these 'world-powers of darkness,' whose dues the death of Jesus was conceived as satisfying, are but a thinly disguised form of God's retribution for Adam's sin. Ultimately the propitiation is still made to God, although the emphasis is drawn from the wrath of God to the love which inspired the propitiatory action (cf. Jn 3<sup>16</sup>, Ro 3<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, etc.). From this point, St. Paul follows the anti-legal teaching of Jesus in asserting that 'justification'—right relations with God—depends on the new attitude of 'faith,' not on 'works'; but legalism with St. Paul must be satisfied by the prior transaction of Jesus on the Cross.

The difficulty in the doctrine of propitiation does not lie in the fact that no ultimate distinction can be made between the Power to whom propitiation is offered and the God of love who offers it. Independently of the interests of this particular doctrine, we must accept the paradox that the same God who works under the limitation of law ordains the law which limits Him. But we cannot accept the interpretation of the death of Jesus as an exalted Levitical blood sacrifice, or as a transaction with the 'world-powers of darkness,' nor can we be satisfied with a presentation of an angry God, who needs compensation or some mollifying gift before He will turn away the fierceness of His wrath. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart He will not despise (Ps 51<sup>17</sup>). It would seem more satisfactory to follow the suggestions of the Synoptics and the Acts, and find the reconciling work of Jesus, as directed not towards God, but towards men, bringing about in them a repentance which makes possible their harmonious relations with the Father.

The death of Jesus may be regarded partly as a vicarious sacrifice of the order recognized in the Synoptics—suffering and self-denial for the sake of the Kingdom of God, for conscience, and men's uplifting. The justification of this law of sacrifice ('Ever by losses the right must gain, Every good have its birth of pain' [Whittier, The Preacher]) is that it makes possible the expression of moral qualities. In order that love may have significance, it must pay a price—must be written upon a hard resisting world, as labour and self-denial. This demand of law is obviously not indicative of Divine displeasure or opposition.

The death of Jesus may also be regarded as part of the penalty of human sin. If men had not been selfish, hypocritical, apathetic to goodness and justice, there would not have been the tragedy on Calvary. In virtue of race solidarity, the sins of an evil and adulterous generation fell upon Him. This dark law—that the innocent must suffer the results of transgression along with the guilty—has an educative value in demonstrating the evil and disastrous nature of sin, which is doubly terrible since the suffering which it creates falls upon the just as well as upon the unjust, sometimes even more upon the former than upon the latter. The penalty of sin indicates the Divine displeasure towards sin, but not necessarily towards those who pay the penalty, for obviously God cannot be conceived as being angry with innocent sufferers, involved in the results of others' sins. Neither must we regard God as angry with a repentant sinner because he continues to reap what he has sown. The forgiveness of sin is distinct from the cancelling of its results, which, in accordance with educative moral law, must run their course.

One's trust in the forgiveness of God rests upon the sense of the divinity of human forgiveness—'By all that He requires of me, I know what God Himself must be' (Whittier, Revelation). If we must judge the anger of God from the righteous indignation of a good man, we cannot think of His cherishing any vindictiveness, or needing any propitiation to induce Him to forgive, when the sinner seeks His face. Nor can a view of reconciliation held by the most sternly ethical of the OT prophets, and by the purest soul of the NT, be considered as weakening the sense of sin, and minimizing the grace of pardon.

The Day of Wrath.—From the time of Amos, OT prophetism had conceived a darker side to Israel's still more ancient conception of the Day of the Lord. It would be a time when human wrongdoing, much of which was apparently overlooked in this age, would receive its sure reward, although genuine repentance would apparently avert the coming anger (Jl 2, Am 5<sup>4ff</sup>, Jer 18<sup>5</sup>). That 'great and notable Day' (Ac 2-9), with its darker aspects, entered largely into NT thought (Mt 3<sup>7</sup> 7<sup>22</sup>, Lk 10<sup>12</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, etc.). It is to this coming Dies Irae that the actual term 'wrath of God' (οργη του θεου) is almost uniformly applied by NT writers. Some of the Divine indignation may be manifested in the present operation of moral law—the penalties experienced by the ungodly heathen seem to be part of the Divine wrath which 'is being revealed' (ἀποκαλύπτεται) from heaven (Ro 1<sup>8</sup>); and, according to 13<sup>4</sup>, the temporal ruler punishing evil-doers is 'a minister of God, an avenger for (Divine) wrath,' i.e. a human instrument carrying out in this age the Divine retribution. But the emphasis is upon 'the wrath to come.' In the present age, moral law only imperfectly operates. The sinner is treasuring up for himself 'wrath in the day of wrath' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>), when upon every soul that worketh evil shall be wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish (v. 9; cf. Rev 11<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, 17, where the Divine anger is spoken of as 'the wrath of the Lamb'). Repentance before the Day of Wrath will save one from the coming doom (Ac 2-4 38, 40, Eph 2<sup>3</sup>), and the provision of these days of grace modifies the conception of the Divine sternness (Ro 9-). The 'Law,' in making transgression possible, 'worketh wrath' (Ro 4<sup>15</sup>), but Christ, by His reconciliation of man and God, delivers the believer from the 'wrath to come' (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>). The NT significance of οργη θεου is illustrated in Ro 5<sup>9</sup>, where St. Paul argues from the fact of present reconciliation with God that the saints will be delivered from the 'wrath of God.' Even where the Divine anger is described as having already had its manifestation, the reference may really be eschatological (Ritschl). The aorist of 1 Th 2<sup>16</sup> (ἐφθάσεν δὲ ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ὀργὴ εἰς τέλος) seems to indicate that, in the Apostle's judgment, some historical manifestation of God's wrath upon the Jews has already taken place, but St. Paul may regard such an indication of the Divine anger as the preliminary movements of the Day of Wrath. The clouds were already gathering for that consummation which the Apostle was expecting in his own lifetime (1 Th 4<sup>15</sup>).

LITERATURE.—A. Ritschl, de Ira Dei, Bonn, 1859, Justification and Atonement, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1900; R. W. Dale, The Atonement, London, 1878; D. W. Simon, Redemption of Man, do. 1906; O. Lodge, Man and the Universe, do. 1908, chs. 7 and 8; P. Gardner, Exploratio Evangelica, do. 1899, chs. 29, 31. For human anger: J. Butler's Sermons, 8 and 9; J. R. Seeley, Ecce Homo, 1866, pp. 21-23; Tolstoy, Essays and Letters, ch. 12.

H. BULCOCK.

ANNAS (Gr. Ἀννας, Heb. אֲנָס, 'merciful' [in Josephus, Ananias]).—Annas the son of Sethi, appointed high priest by Quirinius in A.D. 6 or 7, retained office till he was deposed by Valerius Gratus in A.D. 15 (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 1, 2). Josephus tells us that he was regarded as the most fortunate of men, for he had five sons who all held the office of high priest (Ant. XX. ix. 1). From the Fourth Gospel we learn that Joseph Caiaphas, the high priest at the date of the Crucifixion, was a son-in-law of Annas (Jn 18<sup>13</sup>). His removal from office in A.D. 15 did not by any means diminish his influence. Being extremely wealthy, he was able to exert the powers of high priest long after he was deposed. His wealth and that of his sons was acquired by the institution of the 'booths or bazaars of the sons of Annas,' which enjoyed the monopoly for the sale of all kinds of sacrificial requirements. These booths were situated either in the temple court (Keim, Jesus of Nazara, v. 116; Edersheim, LT iii. 5) or on the Mount of Olives (J. Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire . . . de la Palestine, 1867, p. 465). The words of Jesus regarding the unholy traffic (Mt 21<sup>12</sup>, Lk 19<sup>46</sup>) aroused the hostility of the priestly party and led to His arrest and examination by Annas (Jn 18<sup>12-4</sup>). The Talmud accuses the sons of Annas of 'serpentine hissings' (or whisperings [Pes. 57a]). Probably the meaning is that they exerted private influence on the judges and perverted justice for their own ends. Their attitude towards Jesus and the apostles as revealed in the NT seems to bear out this interpretation. Although, as we have seen, Annas was deposed from the high-priestly office in A.D. 15, he retains the title all through the NT. Both Josephus and the writers of the NT uniformly give the title 'high priest' not only to the actual occupant of the office at the time, but to all his predecessors who were still alive, as well as to all the more influential members of the families from which the high priests were selected. The phrase in Lk 3<sup>2</sup> 'in the high-priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas' is unique, and may be accounted for by the fact that the combination had become so familiar in connexion with the history of the Crucifixion that St. Luke couples the two together here (Ewald, HI, vol. vi. [1883] p. 430, n. 3).

The important and influential position held by Annas even after his deposition is proved by the fact that it was to him that Jesus was first sent before He appeared at the more formal tribunal of the Sanhedrin (Jn 18<sup>13</sup>). The interview with Annas (Jn 18<sup>19-23</sup>) determined the fate of the prisoner, and probably Annas was the chief instigator in compassing the death. In Ac 4<sup>6</sup> Annas again appears as the head of the party who tried the apostles and enjoined them to keep silent about the Resurrection.

LITERATURE.—Josephus, Antiquities, passim; A. Edersheim, LT i. [1886] 263; T. Keim, Jesus of Nazara, 1867-1882, vi. 36 ff.; E. Schürer, GVJ 4 ii. [1907] 256, 270, 274, 275.

W. F. BOYD.

ANNIHILATION.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

ANOIDING.—Anointing was used in antiquity in three chief connexions: (1) as a part of the toilet, to beautify, strengthen, and refresh the body; (2) medicinally; (3) as a part of religious-ceremonial. From the last-named sprang (4) the use of terms of anointing in a metaphorical sense to signify, e.g., the imparting of the Divine Spirit, whether to the Messiah or to the Christian disciple.

1. So far as the first use is concerned, examples within our period may be found in the anointing of the Lord's feet (Lk 7<sup>38</sup>, 46, Jn 12<sup>3</sup>) and in Mt 6<sup>17</sup> 'anoint thy head, and wash thy face.'

2. Instances of the second occur in Jn 9<sup>8</sup>, 11, Rev 3<sup>18</sup> 'eyesalve to anoint thine eyes,' and are generally found in Mk 6<sup>13</sup> 'they anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them,' and Ja 5<sup>14</sup> 'Is any among you sick? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' The commentators on these texts generally quote passages to prove that the use of oil was well known in medicine, and leave it to be understood that the apostles in the Gospel and the elders in the Epistle are thought of as making use of the simplest healing remedy known to them. This method of interpretation does not seem satisfactory, because the parallels quoted do not bear out the point. In Is 1<sup>6</sup> and Lk 10<sup>34</sup> oil is used as a remedy for wounds, not for internal sickness. Herod in his last illness was placed in a bath of warm oil (Jos. BJ 1. xxxiii. 5), but this was only one amongst several methods of treatment used in his case, and was no doubt employed because of the open and running sores on his body. Galen (Med. Temp., bk. ii.) speaks of oil as the 'best of medicines for withered and dry bodies,' but that does not mean that he would have advocated the indiscriminate use of oil in cases of sickness due to various causes. Philo's praise of oil for imparting vigour to the flesh (Somm. ii. 8) must not be pressed into an advocacy of it as a panacea against all forms of disease. It must remain doubtful whether the two NT passages can be reasonably understood to mean that oil was used as a simple medical remedy without deeper signification.

3. The use of anointing in religious ceremony was very varied. It was applied both to persons—as, e.g., to the kings and high priests—and to inanimate things. This is not the place to investigate the original signification of the act of anointing in religious ceremonies (see Robertson Smith, Rel. Sem.<sup>2</sup>, 1894, pp. 233, 383; ERE, HDB, SDB, EBi, art. 'Anointing'), but it seems clear that it came to signify the consecration of persons and things to the service of God, and also the communication to, e.g., the kings, of the Divine Spirit (see E. Kautsch, in HDB v. 659). That is to say, anointing had in part the nature of a sacrament. And it seems probable that something of this sort underlies the passages Mk 6<sup>13</sup>, Ja 5<sup>14</sup>. The anointing oil was not merely medicinal, but consecrated the patient to God, and, together with prayer, was the means of conveying to him the Divine healing life. We may compare a passage in the Secrets of Enoch (22<sup>3</sup>), where Enoch, when carried into the presence of God, is anointed with holy oil, with the result (56<sup>2</sup>) that he needs no food, and is purged from earthly passions.

4. Instances of the metaphorical use of anointing to signify the communication of the Divine Spirit are to be found in 1 Jn 2<sup>20-7</sup> 'ye have an anointing from the Holy One,' 'his anointing teacheth you all things.' 'Anointing' here means the material, not the act, of anointing, and so the grace of the Holy Spirit. The same metaphorical use is found in 2 Co 1<sup>21</sup>, 'He that hath anointed us is God'; and in the passages in which Christ is spoken of as having been anointed, Ac 4<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>, He 1<sup>9</sup> (OT quot.). A passage in the recently discovered Odes of Solomon (36<sup>2</sup>), 'He hath anointed me from his own perfection,' may be referred to here. It is uncertain whether the speaker is Christ or the Christian. Allusions to a custom of anointing dead bodies are found in Mk 14<sup>8</sup> and the parallels, and in Mk 16<sup>1</sup>.

Lastly, reference should be made to the abstention from anointing by the Essenes (Jos. BJ 11. viii. 3). This is explained by Schürer (HJP 11. ii. 212) as a part of an attempt to return to the simplicity of nature; by Bousset (Rel. des Jud.<sup>2</sup>, Berlin, 1906, p. 442) as a protest against the priesthood, whose authority rested upon anointing.

LITERATURE.—See the artt. 'Anointing' in ERE, HDB, and EBi; and, for the development of the doctrine of Extreme Unction in the Church, J. B. Mayor on Ja 5<sup>14</sup> (Ep. of St. James<sup>3</sup>, 1910); see also ExpT xvii. [1906] 418 ff., and the literature there cited. WILLOUGHBY C. ALLEN.

ANSWER.—Passing over the very large number of occurrences of this word in the common sense of 'reply' (ἀποκρίνομαι, ἀπάντησις), there are one or two interesting usages to note before we come to the most theologically significant use of the term. Thus in Tit 2<sup>9</sup> slaves are enjoined not to 'answer again' (AV; RV 'gainsay,' ἀντιλέγω); in Gal 4<sup>25</sup> 'this Hagar is Mount Sinai in Arabia and answereth to i.e. 'corresponds with,' συστοιχείω) the Jerusalem that now is'; in Ro 11<sup>4</sup> St. Paul, discussing the despair of Elijah, asks 'What saith the answer (χρηματισμός, 'Divine oracle') of God unto him?'

The passages with which we are most concerned, however, are those which speak of the Christian answer or 'defence' (so usually in RV) against critics from within or without the Church (ἀπολογία, ἀπολογία). In the life of St. Paul we have, e.g., his 'answer' or apologia before Felix (Ac 24<sup>10ff.</sup>), before Festus (25<sup>25ff.</sup>), and before Agrippa (26<sup>1ff.</sup>). The charges brought against him were that he had incited the people to sedition (24<sup>5</sup> 25<sup>5</sup>), that he had profaned the Temple (24<sup>8</sup>), and that he was a ring-leader of the Sect of the Nazarenes (24<sup>9</sup>). His defence was skilfully directed in each case to the rebutting of the charges, to the conciliation of his judges, and to the demand that as a Roman citizen he should be tried before Cæsar. Before Agrippa and Festus he defended himself so successfully that they agreed that, if he had not appealed to Cæsar, he might have been set at liberty, but having made the appeal he could no longer withdraw. In 2 Ti 4<sup>16</sup> St. Paul is represented as complaining that at his 'first answer' (before Cæsar) no man took his part, but that 'all men forsook him' (cf. 1<sup>15</sup>). With these instances may be compared the remarkable 'answer' of St. Stephen before the Sanhedrin (Ac 7).

Of probably even greater interest than these defences before civil tribunals are St. Paul's answers to those who denied his Apostleship, the Judaizers who followed him from place to place and attempted to undermine his teaching and influence among his converts in his absence—a fact to which we largely owe the letters to the Galatians and the Corinthians, or at least the most characteristic and polemical portions of them. The same or other enemies charged him with inconsistency (1 Co 10<sup>2-11</sup> etc.), and brought other charges against him (11<sup>7-8</sup>, 9, 1 Co 9<sup>2</sup>), such as the charge of being mean in appearance (10<sup>7-10</sup>), of being rude of speech (11<sup>6</sup>), of being a visionary (12<sup>7</sup>), and of other things not mentioned, which evidently inspired certain obscure references throughout these chapters. St. Paul's apologia meets these charges with a vehement assertion of his innocence, of his full Apostleship, of his competency to utter forth the gospel from fullness of knowledge (11<sup>6</sup>), and of his abundant sufferings and self-denial for the sake of his converts. The large space given to these apologues and personal rejoinders is remote from our modern habit of mind, but it should be borne in mind that every educated man in these days was expected by the Greeks to be ready to take free part in polemics of this kind, and to defend himself vigorously against attack. In 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> we have the well-known injunction to be 'ready always to give answer to every man that asketh you a reason concerning the hope that is in you,' whether before a judge or in informal conversation—which should probably be interpreted in this sense. In v. 21 of the same chapter 'the answer (AV) of a good conscience towards God' is a difficult phrase, and the commentaries should be consulted. ἐπερωτημα can hardly mean 'answer,' and the RV translates 'interrogation' (see a long note in Luther in Meyer's Com. pp. 192-197). C. Bigg (ICC, in loc.) interprets it of the baptismal question or demand.

The Epistle to the Hebrews has been called 'the first Christian apology,' in the sense of a definite and reasoned defence of the Christian faith and position. It had its forerunners in the speeches of St. Paul already referred to, and its successors in the long line of Ante-Nicene 'apologies,' of which those of Justin Martyr and Tertullian are two outstanding examples.

LITERATURE.—Comm. on the passages cited; E. F. Scott, The Apologetic of the New Testament, 1907; H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church History, 1909, ch. xi., and similar works; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, 1895; T. R. Glover, The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire, 1909.

E. GRIFFITH JONES.

ANTICHRIST (ἀντίχριστος).—The word is found in the NT only in 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>. 22 4<sup>8</sup>, 2 Jn 7, but the idea further appears in the Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and above all in the Apocalypse. It is not, however, an idea original to Christianity, but an adaptation of Jewish conceptions which, as Bousset has shown (The Antichrist Legend), had developed before the time of Christ into a full-grown Antichrist legend of a hostile counterpart of the Messiah who would make war against Him but whom He would finally overthrow. The NT references to the subject cannot be rightly appreciated without some previous consideration of the corresponding ideas that were present in Judaism before they were taken over by Christianity.

1. The Antichrist of Judaism.—Although the word 'Antichrist' does not occur till we come to the Johannine Epistles, we have many evidences in pre-Christian Jewish literature, canonical and extra-canonical, that there was a widely spread idea of a supreme adversary who should rise up against God, His Kingdom and people, or His Messiah. The strands that went to the composition of the idea were various and strangely interwoven, and much obscurity still hangs over the subject. But it seems possible to distinguish three chief influences that went to the shaping of the Jewish conception as it existed at the time of Christ.

(1) Earliest of all was the ancient dragon-myth of the Babylonian Creation-epic, with its representation of the struggle of Tiamat, the princess of chaos and darkness, against Marduk, the god of order and light. The myth appears to have belonged to the common stock of Semitic ideas, and must have become familiar to the Hebrews from their earliest settlement in Canaan, if indeed it was not part of the ancestral tradition carried with them from their original Aramæan home. In any case, it would be revived in their minds through their close contact with the Babylonian mythology during exilic and post-exilic times. Traces of this dragon-myth appear here and there in the OT, e.g. in the story of the Temptation in Gn 3, where, as in Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, the serpent=the dragon; and in the later apocalyptic literature a dragon represents the hostile powers that rise up in opposition to God and His Kingdom (Pss. Sol. ii. 29). But it was characteristic of the forward look of Prophetism and Messianism that the idea of a conflict between God and the dragon was transferred from cosmogony to eschatology and represented as a culminating episode of the last days (Is 27<sup>1</sup>, Dn 7).

(2) Side by side with the dragon-myth must be set the Beliar (Belial) conception, a contribution to Jewish thought from the side of Persian dualism, with its idea of an adversary in whom is embodied not merely, as in the Babylonian Creation-story, the natural forces of chaos and darkness, but all the hostile powers of moral evil. In 1 Gh 21<sup>1</sup> Satan is evidently represented as God's adversary, just as we find him in later Jewish and primitive Christian thought. And in the interval between OT and NT Beliar is frequently used as a synonym for Satan, the Devil or arch-demon (e.g. Jubilees, 15; cf. 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>). The Beliar idea was a much later influence than the dragon-myth, for Babylonian religion offers no real parallel to a belief in the Devil, and Cheyne's suggested derivation of the name from Belili, the goddess of the under world (EBi, art. 'Belial'), has little to recommend it. But a subsequent fusion of Beliar with the dragon was very natural, and we have a striking illustration of it when in Wis 2<sup>24</sup> and elsewhere the serpent of the Temptation is identified with the Devil. Cf. Rev 12<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, where 'the dragon, the old serpent,' is explained to be 'the Devil and Satan.'

(3) But the development of the Messianic hope in Judaism was a more determinative influence than either of those already mentioned. The Jewish Antichrist was very far from being a mere precipitate of Babylonian mythology and Iranian eschatology. It was, above all, a counterpart of the Messianic idea, as that was derived from the prophets and evolved under the experiences of Jewish national history. Ezekiel's prophecy of the overthrow of Gog and Magog (Ezk 38); Zechariah's vision of the destruction of the destroyers of Jerusalem (Zec 14); above all, the representation in Daniel, with reference to Antiochus Epiphanes, of a world-power that waxed great even to the host of heaven (Dn 8<sup>10</sup>), and trod the sanctuary under foot (v. 13), and stood up against the Prince of princes until it was finally 'broken without hand' (v. 26)—all contributed to the idea of a great coming conflict with the powers of a godless world before the Divine Kingdom could be set up. And when, by a process of synthesis, the scattered elements of Messianic prophecy began to gather round the figure of a personal Messiah, a King who should represent Jahweh upon earth, it was natural that the various utterances of OT prophecy regarding an evil power which was hostile to God and His Kingdom and people should also be combined in the conception of a personal adversary. Ezekiel's frequent references to Gog (chs. 38, 39) would lend themselves to this, and so would the picture in Daniel of the little horn magnifying itself even against the prince of the host (8<sup>11</sup>). And the preoccupation of the later Judaism with utterances like these, sharpened as it was by hatred of the heathen conquerors not merely as political enemies but as enemies of Jahweh and His Kingdom, would render all the easier that process of personalizing an Antichrist over against the Christ which appears to have completed itself within the sphere of Judaism (cf. Apoc. Bar. 40, Asc. Is. 4<sup>9-11</sup>).

2. Antichrist in the NT.—Deriving from Judaism, Christianity would naturally carry the Antichrist tradition with it as part of its inheritance. That it actually did so Bousset has shown by a comprehensive treatment of the later Christian exegetical and apologetic literature, which evidently rests on a tradition that is only partially dependent on the NT (op. cit.; cf. EBi i. 180 ff.). But, so far as the NT is concerned, the earlier Antichrist tradition is taken over with important changes, due to the differences between Judaism and Christianity, and especially to the differences in their conception of the Messiah Himself. At the same time it must be noticed that nothing like a single consistent presentation of the Antichrist idea is given by the NT as a whole. Elements of the conception appear in the Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, the Apocalypse, and the Johannine Epistles; but in each group of writings it is treated differently and with more or less divergence from the earlier Jewish forms.

(1) In the Gospels.—In the Synoptic Gospels it is everywhere apparent that Jesus recognized the existence of a kingdom of evil under the control of a supreme personality, variously called the Devil (Mt 4<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>35</sup>, etc.), Satan (Mt 4<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 10<sup>18</sup>, etc.), or Beelzebub (Mt 12<sup>45</sup> ||), who sought to interfere with His own Messianic mission (4<sup>1-11</sup> 16<sup>23</sup> ||), and whose works He had come to destroy (Mk 12<sup>4</sup> 34 31<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>15</sup>, etc.; cf. He 2<sup>14</sup>). But from all the crude and materialistic elements of the earlier tradition His teaching is entirely free. In the reference to the 'abomination of desolation' standing in the holy place (Mt 24<sup>15</sup>; cf. Mk 13<sup>14</sup>, Lk 21<sup>20</sup>), which occurs in the great eschatological discourse, some critics have seen a parallel to 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup> and an evident allusion to the Jewish Antichrist tradition; but they do so on the presumption that the words were not spoken by Jesus Himself and are to be attributed to a redactor of the original source. If they were uttered by our Lord, it seems most probable that they portended not any apocalypse of a personal Antichrist, but the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman armies—a calamity which He had already foreshadowed as coming upon the city because of its rejection of Himself (23<sup>37</sup>). For the adversaries of the Son of Man, the real representatives of the Antichrist spirit in His eyes, were the false Christs and false prophets by whom many should be deceived (24<sup>5-4</sup>)—in other words, the champions of that worldly idea of the coming Kingdom which He had always rejected (Mt 4<sup>12</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>, Jn 6<sup>15</sup>), but to which the Jewish nation obstinately clung.

(2) In the Pauline Epistles.—A familiarity on the part of St. Paul with the Antichrist tradition is suggested when he asks in 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>, 'What concord hath Christ with Belial?' and when he speaks in Col 2<sup>15</sup> of Christ triumphing over 'the principalities and powers.' This familiarity becomes evident in 'the little apocalypse' of 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup>, where he introduces the figure of the 'man of sin,' or more correctly 'man of lawlessness.' Nestle has shown (ExpT xvi. [1904-5] 472) that the Beliar-Satan conception underlies this whole passage, with its thought of an opponent of Christ, or Antichrist, whom the Lord at last shall 'slay with the breath of his mouth and bring to nought by the manifestation of his coming' (v.<sup>8</sup>). But the distinctive character of this Pauline view of the Antichrist is that, while features in the picture are evidently taken from the description of Antiochus Epiphanes in Daniel (cf. v.<sup>4</sup> with Dn 7<sup>25</sup> 11<sup>35</sup>), the Antichrist is conceived of, not after the fashion of the later Judaism as a heathen potentate and oppressor, but as a false Messiah from within the circle of Judaism itself, who is to work by means of false signs and lying wonders, and so to turn men's hearts away from that love of the truth which brings salvation (v.<sup>9</sup>). See, further, MAN OF SIN.

(3) In the Apocalypse.—As follows naturally both from its subject and from its literary form, the Apocalypse is more permeated than any other book in the NT with the idea of the Antichrist. For its subject is the speedy return of Christ to subdue

His enemies and set up His Kingdom (Rev 17<sup>216</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>, etc.), and its form is an adaptation to Christianity of the ideas and imagery of those Jewish Apocalypses, from Daniel onwards, which were chiefly responsible for the growth of the Christian Antichrist conception. It would be out of place to enter here into any discussion of the conflicting interpretations of the symbolism of the dragon and the beasts that appear and reappear from ch. 11 to the end of the book (see artt. APOCALYPSE, DRAGON). But in ch. 11 'the beast that cometh up out of the abyss' was evidently suggested by the dragon-myth as embodied in the Jewish Antichrist tradition, while the 'great red dragon' of 12<sup>3</sup>, who is also described as 'the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan' (v.<sup>9</sup>), and who is clearly represented as the Antichrist (vv. 4<sup>5</sup> 17), reproduces both the mythical dragon and the later Beliar-Satan conception, now fused into one appalling figure. Again, the scarlet-coloured beast of 13<sup>1-10</sup> and the realm of the beast in ch. 17 are described in language which recalls the apocalyptic imagery of Daniel (see esp. ch. 7), and clearly applies to a hostile and persecuting world-power represented by its ruler. In Daniel that power was the kingdom of the Seleucids under Antiochus Epiphanes; here it is very plainly indicated as the Roman Empire (17<sup>3.9.15</sup>) with the Emperor at its head (13<sup>5-8</sup>). But to these pre-Christian forms of the Antichrist tradition—the dragon, Satan, and a hostile world-power—the Apocalypse contributes two others which are peculiar to Christianity and which play a large part in the Christian tradition of later times.

The first of these is found in the application to Christian ideas of the Antichrist of the contemporary Nero-saga, with its dream of a Nero Redivivus who should come back to the world from the realms of the dead (cf. Sib. Or. iv. 119 ff.; Suetonius, Nero, 47; Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xx. 19). That Nero is referred to in 13<sup>18</sup> is most probable, the number 666 being the equivalent of Nero Cæsar (ΝΕΡΩΝ ΚΑΙΣΑΡ) when written in Heb. characters (נרן נרן). And the legend of his return from the under world of the dead explains in the most natural way the healing of the beast's death-stroke (13<sup>3.12</sup>) and the statement that it 'shall ascend out of the bottomless pit . . . and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder when they behold the beast, how that he was, and is not, and shall come' (17<sup>8</sup>). See also art. APOCALYPSE.

The second contribution was the idea of the false prophet (16<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup>), who is to be identified with 'another beast' of 13<sup>11</sup> a. It is most probable that the false prophet represents the Imperial priesthood as propagandists of the Cæsar-cult, but it seems not unlikely that elements in the representation are taken from the legend that had grown up around the name of Simon Magus (cf. Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 26, 56; Irenæus, c. Hær. i. 23). To the early Church, Simon with his magic arts and false miracles was the arch-heretic and the father of all heresy, and suggestions of his legendary figure loom out from the description of the second beast (13<sup>13-15</sup>), even while the author attributes to it functions and powers that belong more properly to the ministers of the Emperor-worship (v.<sup>12</sup>).

(4) In the Johannine Epistles.—In these writings, where the word 'Antichrist' appears for the first time, the idea is spiritualized as nowhere else in the NT except in the teaching of Jesus. The Antichrist is not, as in the Apocalypse, a material world-power threatening the Church from without, but a spirit of false doctrine rising up from within (1 Jn 2<sup>19</sup>). It is true that Antichrist is spoken of as still to come (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>), so that some culminating manifestation is evidently expected—probably in a definite personal form. But even now, it is said, there are many antichrists (2<sup>18</sup>; cf. 2 Jn 7), and the spirit of Antichrist is already in the world (1 Jn 4<sup>3</sup>). And the very essence of that spirit is the denial of 'the Father and the Son' (2--), i.e. the refusal to acknowledge the Son as well as the Father; more explicitly it is the refusal to confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (4<sup>2,3</sup>; 2 Jn 7). The spirit of Antichrist, in other words, is a spirit of heresy—such heresy as flourished in Asia Minor towards the close of the 1st century through the doctrines of Cerinthus (q.v.).

When the NT utterances regarding the Antichrist are looked at in their variety and as a whole, it is difficult to derive from them any justification for the view that the Church should expect the advent of a personal Antichrist as an individual embodiment of evil. The NT authors were evidently influenced in their treatment of the subject by contemporary situations as well as by an inheritance of ancient traditions. To St. Paul, writing out of his own experience of Jewish persecution and Roman justice and protection, Judaism was the 'man of lawlessness,' and Rome the beneficent restraining power. To the Apocalyptist, writing to a Church which had known Nero's cruelty and now under Domitian was passing through the flames once more, Antichrist was the Roman Empire represented by a ruler who was hostile to Christianity because it refused to worship him as a god. In the Johannine Epistles, Antichrist is not a persecuting power but a heretical spirit, present in the world already but destined to come in fuller power. The ultimate authority for our thoughts on the subject must be found in the words of Jesus when He teaches us to pray for deliverance from 'the evil one' (Mt 6<sup>13</sup>), and warns us against false Christs and false prophets who proclaim a kingdom that is not His own (24<sup>24</sup>).

LITERATURE.—H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, Göttingen, 1895; W. Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, Eng. tr., London, 1896; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Evolution of the Messianic Idea, do. 1908; C. Clemen, Primitive Christianity and its Non-Jewish Sources, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1912; artt. 'Antichrist' in PRE<sup>3</sup>, ERE, and EBI, and 'Man of Sin' in IJD; H. Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex., s.v.; J. Moffatt, 'Revelation' in EGT; ExpT xvi. [1904-5] 472, xxiii. [1911-12] 97.

J. C. LAMBERT.

ANTINOMIANISM.—See LAW.

ANTIOCH (Ἀντιόχεια).—1. In Syria.—About 20 miles from the Mediterranean, the Orontes, turning abruptly westward, enters a fertile plain, 10 miles long and 5 wide, which separates the great Lebanon range from the last spurs of the Taurus. Here Seleucus Nicator, after his defeat of Antigonus at Issus in 301 B.C., discovered an ideal site for the capital of his Syrian kingdom, the Asiatic portion of the vast empire of Alexander the Great, and here he built the most famous of the 16 Antiochs which he founded in honour of his father Antiochus. Planned by Xenarius, the original city occupied the level ground between the river and Mt. Silpius, and, like all the Hellenistic foundations in Syria, it had two broad colonnaded streets intersecting at the centre, or Omphalus. The Seleucid kings vied with one another in extending and adorning their metropolis. A second quarter was added on the eastern side, perhaps by Antiochus I.; a third, the 'New City,' was built by Seleucus Callinicus on an island—similar to the island in the Seine at Paris—which has since disappeared, probably owing to one of those seismic disturbances to which the region has always been peculiarly subject; and a fourth, on the lowest slopes of Silpius, was the work of Antiochus Epiphanes. Henceforth the city was known as a Tetrapolis, or union of four cities (Strabo, xvi. ii. 4). Such was the magnificent Greek substitute for the ancient and beautiful but too essentially Semitic capital of Syria—Damascus. A navigable river and a fine seaport—Seleucia of Pieria—made it practically a maritime city, while caravan roads converging from Arabia and Mesopotamia brought to it the commerce of the East. It attained its highest political importance in the time of Antiochus the Great, whose power was shattered by the Romans at Magnesia. In 83 B.C. it fell into the hands of Tigranes of Armenia, from whom it was wrested by the Roman Republic in 65 B.C. Thereafter it was the capital of the province of Syria, and the residence of the Imperial legate. Pompey made it a civitas libera, and such it remained till the time of Antoninus Pius, who made it a colonia. The early emperors often visited it, and embellished it with new streets and public buildings.

During the Jewish wars (69 B.C.) 'Vespasian took with him his army from Antioch, which is the metropolis of Syria, and without dispute deserves the place of the third city in the habitable world that is under the Roman Empire, both in magnitude and in other marks of prosperity' (Jos. BJ iii. ii. 4). In the 4th cent. Chrysostom estimated the population at 200,000, of whom 100,000 were then Christians, and probably he did not reckon slaves and children.

Antioch was called 'the Beautiful' (ἡ καλὴ [Athen. i. p. 20]), but its moral reputation was never high. 'In no city of antiquity was the enjoyment of life so much the main thing, and its duties so incidental, as in "Antioch upon Daphne," as the city was significantly called' (Mommson, Prov.<sup>2</sup>, 1909, ii. 123). The pleasure-garden of Daphne, 5 miles from the city, 10 miles in circumference, with its sanctuary of Apollo, its groves of laurel and cypress, its sparkling fountains, its colonnades and halls and baths, has come down through history with an evil name. Daphnici mores were proverbial, and Juvenal flung one of his wittiest jibes at his own decadent Imperial city when he said that the Orontes had flowed into the Tiber (Sat. iii. 62), flooding Rome with the superstition and immorality of the East. The brilliant civilization and perfect art of the Greek failed to redeem the turbulent, fickle, and dissolute character of the Syrian. Instead of either race being improved by the contact, each rather infected the other with its characteristic vices. Cicero flattered Antioch as a city of 'most learned men and most liberal studies' (pro Arch. iii.), but the sober verdict of history is different.

'Amidst all this luxury the Muses did not find themselves at home; science in earnest and not less earnest art were never truly cultivated in Syria and more especially in Antioch. . . . This people valued only the day. No Greek region has so few memorial-stones to show as Syria; the great Antioch, the third city of the empire, has—to say nothing of the land of hieroglyphics and obelisks—left behind fewer inscriptions than many a small African or Arabian village' (Mommson, op. cit. 130, 131f.).

No city, however, after Jerusalem, is so closely associated with the Apostolic Church. From its very foundation it had in its population a strong Jewish element, attracted by the offer of 'privileges equal to those of the Macedonians and Greeks' (Jos. Ant. xii. iii. 1). The Jewish nation 'had the greatest multitudes in Antioch by reason of the size of the city. . . . They made proselytes of a great many of the Greeks perpetually, and thereby, after a sort, brought them to be a portion of their own body' (BJ vii. iii. 3). While the Judaism of Antioch did not assimilate Hellenic culture so readily as that of Alexandria, and certainly made no such contribution to the permanent thought of the world, it yet did much to prepare the city for the gospel. 'Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch,' who was early won to Christianity, and is named among the Seven of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 6<sup>5</sup>), was evidently one of that great number of Antiochene Greeks who had previously felt the spell of the Jewish faith. And it was the mixture of national elements in the Church of Antioch—pure Greeks with Greek-speaking Jews—that peculiarly fitted her to play a remarkable part in the Apostolic Age. Her distinction was that, while unquestionably the daughter of the Jewish Christian community at Jerusalem, full of filial gratitude and devotion, she became the first Gentile Church, and the mother of all the others. The diaspora that followed the death of Stephen brought many fugitive Jewish Christian preachers to Antioch, and some Cypriotes and Cyrenians among them inaugurated a new era by going beyond the Hellenist Jews for an audience and preaching to 'the Greeks also' (Ac 11<sup>20</sup>). καὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἕλληνας is probably the correct reading, in spite of 'many ancient authorities' who have Ἑλληνιστάς; otherwise the historian's words would be singularly pointless. The new evangelism resulted in many conversions (11<sup>21</sup>), and the vigilant Church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas down, if not to assist in the work, at least to supervise it. It was the merit of Barnabas that he could not be a mere onlooker. Grasping the situation, and flinging himself impetuously into the novel movement, he went, apparently without consulting anybody, to Tarsus to summon Paul to his lifework. In Antioch the two men exercised a united and fruitful ministry for a year (11<sup>22-26</sup>). It was at this time and in this place that 'the disciples were first called Christians' (11<sup>26</sup>), the designation probably coming from the lively populace, who quickly noted the new phenomenon in their midst, and justified their reputation for the invention of nicknames. Their wit never spared anybody who seemed worthy of their attention.

'The only talent which indisputably belonged to them—their mastery of ridicule—they exercised not merely against the actors of their stage, but no less against the rulers sojourning in the capital of the East, and the ridicule was quite the same against the actor as against the emperor.' While Julian 'met their sarcastic sayings with satirical writings, the Antiochenes at other times had to pay more severely for their evil speaking and their other sins' (Mommsen, Provinces, ii. 134, 135).

But the 'Christians' gratefully accepted the mocking sobriquet bestowed upon them, changing it into the most honourable of all titles (cf. 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>). And the first Gentile Church was now to become the first missionary Church. While Antioch was never wanting in respect for Jerusalem, contributing liberally to its poor in a time of famine, and consulting its leaders in all matters of doctrine and practice, her distinguishing characteristic was her evangelistic originality. Her heart was not in Judæa but in the Roman Empire. The fresh ideas of Christian liberty and Christian duty, which the mother-Church at Jerusalem was slow to entertain, found ready acceptance in the freer atmosphere of the Syrian capital. That the victory over Judaism was not easily won even there is proved by the fact that not only Peter but Barnabas vacillated under the alternate influence of cosmopolitan liberalism and Judean narrowness, till Paul's arguments and rebukes convinced them of their error (Gal 2<sup>14</sup>). But contact with the great world and sympathy with its needs probably did more than the force of reason to lighten the Antiochene Church of the dead-weight of Judaism. Christians of Hellenic culture and Roman citizenship taught her a noble universalism, and it was accordingly at the instance of the Church of Antioch that the Council of Jerusalem sent to the Gentile converts a circular letter which became the charter of spiritual freedom (Ac 15<sup>23-29</sup>). Above all, it was from Antioch that Paul started on each of his missionary journeys (Ac 11<sup>1-3</sup> 15<sup>36</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>), and to Antioch that he returned again and again with his report of fresh conquests (14<sup>26</sup> 18<sup>22</sup>). It was the master-minds of Christian Antioch who at length changed the pathetic dream of 'a light to lighten the Gentiles' into a reality.

Antioch gave rise to a school of Christian thought which was distinguished by literal interpretation of the Scriptures and insistence upon the human limitations of Jesus. Theodore of Mopsuestia was one of its best representatives. Between the years 252 and 380, ten Councils were held at Antioch. Antakiyeh is now but a meagre town of 600 inhabitants, though its environs 'are even at the present day, in spite of all neglect, a blooming garden and one of the most charming spots on earth' (Mommsen, ii. 129).

LITERATURE.—C. O. Müller, Antiquitates Antiochenæ, Göttingen, 1839; Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, London, 1872, i. 149 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, do. 1895, also Church in Rom. Emp., do. 1893, chs. ii.-vii., xvi.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., London, 1897.

2. In Pisidia (Ac 13<sup>14</sup> RV, 'A. τὴν Πισιδίαν, 'Pisidian Antioch,' which is the correct reading, instead of 'A. τῆς Πισιδίας).—This city was probably founded by Seleucus Nicator (301-280 B.C.) about the same time as Syrian Antioch, being another of the many cities which he called after his father Antiochus. It was intended as a garrison town and a centre of Hellenic influence in the heart of Asia Minor, commanding the great trade route between Ephesus and the Cilician Gates. Guided by Strabo's description of the place (XII. viii. 14), as standing 'on a height' to the south of a 'backbone of mountains, stretching from east to west,' Arundell identified it in 1833 with the extensive ruins of Yalowatch, on the skirts of the long *Sultan Dag*h, about 3600 ft. above sea-level, overlooking the great plain which is drained by the river Anthios.

After the battle of Magnesia (190 B.C.), which cost Antiochus the Great the whole of his dominions north of the Taurus, the Romans made Antioch a free city. In 39 B.C. Mark Antony gave it to king Amyntas, after whose death in 25 B.C. it became a city of the vast Roman province of Galatia. At some time before 6 B.C., Augustus raised it to the rank of a colony—Pisidarum colonia Cæsarea (Pliny, HN v. 24)—and made it the governing and military centre of the southern half of the province. Its importance increased when the first emperors found it necessary to pacify the 'barbarian' highlanders of Pisidia. 'In the mountain-land proper no trace of Hellenistic settlement is found, and still less did the Roman senate apply itself to this difficult task. Augustus did so; and only here in the whole Greek coast we meet a series of colonies of Roman veterans evidently intended to acquire this district for peaceful settlement' (Mommsen, Provinces, i. 336 f.). Roman roads connected Antioch with all the other colonies founded in the district—Olbasa, Comama, Cremna, Parlais, and Lystra. The work of pacification was in especially active progress during the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41-54), in which St. Paul visited Antioch. The city was not yet 'Antioch in Pisidia' (AV), being correctly styled by Strabo 'Antioch towards Pisidia' ('A. ἡ πρὸς Πισιδίαν καλουμένη' [XII. viii. 14]), in distinction from Antioch on the Mæander; but St. Luke already calls it 'Pisidian Antioch,' to differentiate it from Antioch in Syria. The boundaries of Pisidia gradually moved northward till it included most of Southern Phrygia, and then 'Antioch of Pisidia' became the usual designation of the city. At a still later period Pisidia was constituted a Roman province, with Antioch as its capital.

On the South-Galatian theory, in the form advocated by Ramsay (Church in Rom. Emp., 74 ff.), Antioch is regarded by St. Luke as belonging to the Phrygio-Galatian region (τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν, Ac 16<sup>6</sup>), Phrygian being a geographical term and Galatic a political, the one used by the Greeks and the other by the Roman government. In Ac 18<sup>23</sup> the region is simply called 'Phrygian,' and if, as many think, Φρυγίαν is here to be taken as a noun, the sense is still much the same (see GALATIA and PHRYGIA). St. Paul's first mission to Antioch was so successful that the whole political regio of which this colony was the centre soon heard of the new faith (Ac 13<sup>49</sup>). In no other Asian city, except Ephesus, was the influence of his preaching so far-reaching. His success was no doubt in great measure due to the strong Jewish element in the population, even though it was Jewish persecution that compelled him to leave the city for a time (Ac 13<sup>45-50</sup>). The early Seleucid kings settled Jews in many of their cities, and gave them the same civic rights as the Greeks, finding them to be trustworthy supporters and often real Hellenizers. Antiochus the Great settled 2000 Jewish families in Lydia and Phrygia (Jos. Ant. xii. iii. 4), many of whom must have found a home in Antioch. Trade doubtless attracted others to so important a centre, and thus the Jewish leaven had been working for a long time before Christianity was introduced. Ramsay thinks that 'the Jews are likely to have exercised greater political power among the Anatolian people, with their yielding and easily moulded minds, than in any other part of the Roman world' (Hist. Com. on Gal., 193); and their spiritual influence was at least as great. St. Paul found many 'devout proselytes' in Antioch (Ac 13<sup>43</sup>), and his presence attracted 'the whole city' to the synagogue (13<sup>44</sup>). While the native Phrygian type of religious feeling was more eastern than western, and thus had a certain natural affinity with the Semitic type, the Phrygian Jews, whose laxity gave deep offence to the rigidly orthodox, no doubt increased their power among their neighbours by their freedom from bigotry. The attraction of the Jewish faith for Gentile women (τὰς σεβόμενας γυναῖκας, Ac 13<sup>50</sup>) was a familiar theme in ancient writings (Juvenal, vi. 543; Jos. BJ ii. xx. 2); and the influence of 'women of honourable estate' (τὰς εὐσχημονας), not only in Antioch but in Asia Minor generally, is one of the most striking features in the social life of the country (Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, i. 219; Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp., 67). Strabo (loc. cit.) mentions another fact which may help to explain the rapid progress of Christianity in Antioch: 'In this place was established a priesthood of Men Arcaeus, having attached to it a multitude of temple slaves and tracts of sacred territory. It was abolished after the death of Amyntas by those who were sent to settle the succession to his kingdom.' This drastic action of the Romans had removed one of the greatest obstacles to the new faith—the vested interests of an old and powerful hierarchy.

LITERATURE.—F. V. J. Arundell, Discoveries in Asia Minor, London, 1884, i. 281 f.; Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, do. 1872, i. 204 f.; W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Gal., do. 1899, pp. 196-213, Church in Rom. Emp., do. 1893, passim; J. R. S. Sterrett, Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor, Boston, 1888, p. 218 f. JAMES STRAHAN.

ANTIPAS.—See HEROD.

ANTIPAS (shorter form of Antipater [Jos. Ant. xiv. i. 3: 'this Antipatros was at first called Antipas'] as Hermas is of Hermodorus, Lucas of Lucanus, and Silvas of Silvanus).—Antipas, otherwise unknown, is mentioned in Rev 2<sup>13</sup>. Later Greek tradition made him bishop of Pergamum, martyred under Domitian by being thrown into a brazen bull which stood at the temple of Diana, and so roasted alive.* The name has been allegorized as anti-pas (= 'against all') or anti-papa. The character of the Apocalypse, again, admits the hypothesis that the name refers to the God Pan. Pan was worshipped at Ephesus and in many cities in Asia Minor—no record of his worship at Pergamum is extant—under the strong influences of Arcadian and Peloponnesian cults. It is not impossible, therefore, that the Christian Church at Pergamum is praised for its opposition to the heathen Pan. Cf. BALAAM, NICOLAITANS.

LITERATURE.—AS, April, ii. [1866] 3 ff., 961; Roscher, iii. 1369; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse, ad loc.; H. Alford, Gr. Test., ad loc.; W. M. Ramsay, Church in the Roman Empire, 1897, Letters to the Seven Churches, 1904; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr. 1894; A. C. McGiffert, Hist. of Christianity in the Apost. Age, 1897. W. F. COBB.

ANTIPATRIS (Ἀντίπαρις).—Antipatris, a Hellenistic town of Palestine, stood at the eastern edge of the Plain of Sharon, where the military road from Jerusalem to Caesarea left the hills. Under the protection of a body of Roman cavalry and infantry, St. Paul was brought thither by night, and thence, with a diminished escort, to Caesarea (Ac 23<sup>31-32</sup>). Antipatris was a border town between Judæa and Samaria (Neubauer, Geogr. du Talm., 1868, p. 80 f.), and after it was reached there would be less danger of a Jewish attack. Josephus (Ant. xvi. v. 2) gives an account of its foundation:

'Herod erected another city in the plain called Kapharsaba, where he chose out a fit place, both for plenty of water and goodness of soil, and proper for the production of what was there planted, where a river encompassed the city itself, and a grove of the best trees for magnitude was round about it: this he named Antipatris, from his father Antipater.'

The historian elsewhere identifies it with Kapharsaba (Ant. xiii. xv. 1), and Robinson (Biblical Researches, iv. 139 f.), followed by Schürer (ii. i. 130 f.), naturally concludes that the site must be the modern Kefr Sābā; but, as the latter place cannot be described as well-watered, Conder, Warren, G. A. Smith, and Buhl all favour Ras-el-'Ain, a little farther south, at the source of the Ajajah. JAMES STRAHAN.

ANTITYPE.—See TYPE.

ANTONIA.—See CASTLE.

ANXIETY.—See CARE, CAREFUL.

APELLES (Ἀπέλλης, a Greek name possibly contracted from Apollodorus, and apparently common among Jews of the Dispersion [cf. Hor. Sat. i. 5. 100: credat Iudæus Apella, and Gow's suggestion, ad loc., that, as modern Jews take a Gentile name which closely resembles their Hebrew name, so in ancient times a Jew called Abel might choose the name Apelles]).—Apelles, saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>10</sup>, is called 'the approved in Christ' (τὸν δοκιμὸν ἐν Χριστῷ). The phrase may indicate that he had been specially tested and tried by affliction or persecution, or that he was a Christian who had gained the approbation of the Church, sufficiently perhaps to be called to the ministry (cf. 1 Ti 3<sup>10</sup>). Nothing is known of Apelles beyond this reference.

Assuming the Roman destination of these salutations, he was probably a Jewish convert residing in Rome as a member of the Imperial household. As the salutation which follows is that to 'the household of Aristobulus,' it has been suggested that Apelles' Christian activity may have lain in that direction. If Aristobulus (q.v.) was the grandson of Herod, Apelles would no doubt find in his 'household' many members of his own race. The name Apelles is known to have belonged to the Imperial household. It was borne by a famous tragic actor in the time of the Emperor Caius (see Lightfoot, Philippians 4, 1878, p. 174).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

APOCALYPSE.—I. INTRODUCTION.—1. The word 'apocalypse' in the NT.—ἀποκάλυψις ('revelation') occurs some eighteen times in the NT. The general sense is 'instruction concerning Divine things before unknown—especially those relating to the Christian salvation—given to the soul by God or the ascended Christ, especially through the operation of the Holy Spirit (1 Co 2<sup>10</sup>)' (Grimm-Thayer). The word was important to St. Paul when he wished to express his independence of the first apostles in reference to his knowledge of the gospel and even to the steps taken to come to an understanding with them (Eph 3<sup>3</sup>, Gal 2<sup>2</sup>). The object of ἀποκάλυψις is, therefore, a mystery (Ro 16<sup>25</sup>). The gospel without it would remain unknown, with it it is an 'open secret.* The source, as also the end or object, of ἀποκάλυψις is God or Jesus Christ, and the mode may be vision or ecstasy (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>). It may also be, however, events which strike the general eye, e.g. 'the righteous judgment of God' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>); 'ἀποκάλυψις of the sons of God' (8<sup>19</sup>), i.e. 'the glory that is manifestly given to some, showing them to be sons of God'; 'ἀποκάλυψις of the glory of Christ' (1 P 4<sup>13</sup>), i.e. 'the glory with which He will return from heaven' (Grimm-Thayer). The return is called the 'ἀποκάλυψις of the Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>2, 13</sup>). As a prophet is one to whom truth comes not from man but from God, what he utters may be called an ἀποκάλυψις, and he himself may be said to 'have an ἀποκάλυψις,' or to speak ἐν ἀποκαλύψει (1 Co 14<sup>26</sup>; cf. v. 6). It is a fact of much suggestiveness for the subject of this article (see below) that, so far as the NT is concerned, the prophet and the apocalypstist may be considered one and the same.

* Neumann (Der Rom. Staat u. die allgemeine Kirche, 1890, i. 15) suggests that Antipas was the only martyr who suffered in Pergamum, but Ramsay (Letters to the Seven Churches, 288) maintains that he was the first of a long series.

2. The NT Apocalypse of John as the type of apocalyptic writings.—Though in the sense of the Christian creed the whole Bible is by pre-eminence the literature of apocalypse or revelation, there is only one book in each Testament to which the name has been given. In the NT we have the Apocalypse of John and in the OT we have the Book of Daniel, which is unmistakably both in style and substance of the same literary genus. The latter is—apart from what may be called apocalyptic fragments in the older prophetic writings, e.g. Is 24—the oldest known Apocalypse, and has served as a model for subsequent writings of the class. Daniel and the Apocalypse of John mark respectively the beginning and the end of what may be called the apocalyptic period, which thus covers upwards of 260 years (say 163 B.C. to A.D. 96).† It thus appears that, while there is an apocalyptic element in practically all the books of the NT (see below), there is only one writing belonging to the Apostolic Age which is as a whole of the apocalyptic class, and which, despite much controversy in the early centuries,‡ has held its place among the books of authority recognized by the Christian Church. This circumstance alone might warrant the almost exclusive devotion of this article to an account of this book, but such concentration offers, besides, the advantage of showing the leading features of the apocalyptic style as they appear, so to speak, synthetically, interwoven with an actual situation—a crisis—on which the mind of the apocalypstist reacts. In regard to the uncanonical apocalypses, if one may not say, after studying the Apocalypse, 'Ex uno disce omnes,' one may remember the attention paid to the lesser apocalypses during the last half-century, and say that the creepers have not suffered from the overshadowing of the cypress.§

* Denney, et al.

† Daniel belongs to the time of the persecution of the Jews under the Greek-Syrian king Antiochus Epiphanes (168–165 B.C.); the Apoc. of John probably to the persecution of the Christians under the Roman emperor Domitian (A.D. 81–96).

‡ The canonicity of the Apocalypse was controverted, esp. in the Eastern Church, and it was not till A.D. 255 that the Western Church, under the leadership of Hippolytus, accepted it. The East finally yielded to the West.

§ Verg. Ecl. i. 251., quoted by Moffatt (EGT v. 295).

3. Non-canonical apocalypses of the Apostolic Age.—As, however, both the Apocalypse and the other books of the NT contain implicit references, and, in at least one case,* an explicit reference to other apocalypses, a list may here be given of the non-canonical apocalypses, either wholly or partly extant, and of others whose existence may be inferred from quotations of them found in the early Fathers. They may be classified under three heads: (A) Jewish, (B) Jewish-Christian, (C) Hellenic or Gentile.

(A) Under this head fall: (a) The cycle known as Enoch, which includes: (a) The Ethiopic Enoch, so called because it survives chiefly in an Ethiopic Version. It includes: (1) chs. 1–36, 72–108 (c. 100 B.C.); (2) chs. 37–71 ('Book of Similitudes'), which belongs probably to the early days of the Herodian dynasty, and is therefore close to the Christian era. In this book † occur those references to the pre-existent Messiah under the title 'Son of man,' which Hilgenfeld and others have ascribed to Christian interpolation, but whose direct debt is probably only to Daniel (see esp. Dn 7<sup>13</sup>). (b) The Slavonic Secrets of Enoch, before A.D. 70.—(b) Assumption of Moses (q.v.) not later than A.D. 10.—(c) Apocalypse of Ezra, usually cited as Fourth Ezra (= 2 Esdras [q.v.] of English 'Apocrypha,' chs. 3–14), after A.D. 90.—(d) Apocalypse of Baruch (q.v.), about the same time as 4 Ezra.—(e) The Testament of Abraham, perhaps the 1st cent. A.D.—(f) The Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs (q.v.), probably the 1st cent. A.D.—(a), (b), (d), and (f) are best accessible to the English reader in the careful editions of R. H. Charles, Oxford, 1893, 1897, 1896, 1908. In regard to (c), we have, in addition to the scholarly editions of James and Bensly, G. H. Box's The Ezra-Apocalypse (London, 1912). For (e), we have the edition of M. R. James (Cambridge, 1892). N.B.—See now also R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, Oxford, 1913.

Closely related to the apocalyptic books are: (g) The Psalms of Solomon, 64–40 B.C., edited by Ryle and James (Cambridge, 1891) under the alternative title Psalms of the Pharisees.—(h) The Book of Jubilees, probably before Christ. See Charles' translation in JQR vi. [1894] 710, vii. [1895] 287.—(i) The Ascension of Isaiah (q.v.)—Jewish part—the Martyrdom of Isaiah (2<sup>1</sup>–3<sup>12</sup> and 5<sup>1</sup>–14), Charles' edition (London, 1900). In addition to these extant books are 4, which are known to us only through citations in Origen and other Fathers: (j) The Prayer of Joseph; (k) The Book of Eldad and Medad; (l) The Apocalypse of Elijah; (m) The Apocalypse of Zephaniah.

(B) Under this head would fall not so much apocalypses written independently by Jews who were Christians—for, if we except the Apocalypse of John, such books are hardly known to have existed—as (a) Selections from Jewish apocalypses of matter embodying beliefs common to Jews and Christians; and (b) Christian interpolations of Jewish apocalypses. Of these (a) are by far the more frequent. The OT was the Bible of the early Christians, and such an example as that of Jude 14<sup>f</sup>. (cf. En. 1<sup>9</sup>), taken along with the implicit references to apocalyptic writings which are found in the Apocalypse and other books of the NT (see below), reveals a tendency among the Christians to extend the range of the Canon; it points at the same time to the large amount of matter, both within and beyond the Canon, that was common to Jews and Christians. It is, indeed, a fact worthy of special notice that at an early period, which we may date roughly from the fall of the Jewish State in A.D. 70, apocalyptic literature begins to lose interest for the Synagogue in proportion as it gains it for the Christian Church. This fact invests the apocalyptic literature with a peculiar interest for the student of the Apostolic Age. There is the general question as to how that age of early Christians came to value and even to produce apocalyptic books, which we convert here into the more concrete question, How could it produce the Apocalypse of John? There is the dogmatic question, What are the elements in this book which entitle it to the position of authority it holds to this day? For (b), examples of Christian interpolation may be found in The Ascension of Isaiah, which is Christian in all but 2<sup>1</sup>–3<sup>12</sup> and 5<sup>2</sup>–14; and in chs. 1 and 2, and 15 and 16 of 4 Ezra which are sometimes quoted as 5 and 6 Ezra respectively.

(C) Hellenic apocalypses.—The Sibylline Oracles (q.v.), 'Jewish works under a heathen mask' (Schürer), are the best instance under this head. They are the work of Hellenistic Jews, and are written in Greek hexameters for Gentiles, under names which have authority for such readers. The fact that they have been subjected to considerable Christian interpolation testifies to the extent of their circulation. Much the best edition of them, based on 14 MSS, is that of Rzach (Oracula Sibyllina, Vienna, 1891). English readers may consult Schürer's I.J.P. ii. iii. 288–92; Edinb. Review (July 1877); Deane's Pseudepigrapha (1891), 276 ff.; Charles' Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, ii.

As an example of distinctively Christian work, produced under more decidedly Hellenic influence than is to be found in works of Jewish origin, may be mentioned the Apocalypse of Peter, a large part of which was edited for the English reader in 1892. Strong claims to canonicity were made for it in early times, and its teaching largely influenced later Christian ideas of heaven and hell. 'It is as strongly Greek as Revelation [the Apoc. of John] is Jewish, having a close relation to the Greek Orphic Literature. It concerns the lot of souls after death, whereas Revelation, like the Jewish apocalypses, is more concerned with the course of world-history' (Porter, from whose Messages of the Apoc. Writers, 7 ff., these lists are mainly taken).

* Jude 14<sup>f</sup>; cf. Eth. En. 1<sup>9</sup>.

† 45<sup>2f</sup> 62<sup>2</sup> etc. See L. A. Muirhead, The Times of Christ, Edinburgh, 1905, pp. 141f., 147.

4. Period and general characteristics of apocalyptic literature.—Before passing to an account of the Apocalypse of John we must try to form a definite idea of the characteristic features of apocalyptic literature—its design, form, and leading ideas. From the point of view of the student of the NT, apocalypse must be considered as of purely Jewish growth.* As we have seen, the period within which apocalyptic literature was produced occupied over a century and a half before the birth of Christ and about a century after. It is thus the accompaniment and interpretation of the last great struggle of the Jewish people for that political independence—with an implicit idea of supremacy—which seemed to be due to the Chosen People. Within this period fall the comparative victory (Maccabæan triumph), varying fortunes (political importance, accompanied with decline of religious fervour; dissensions between the lax hellenizing and the puritanical patriotic party), and the ultimate seeming extinction (capture of Jerusalem by Titus A.D. 70) of this ideal. The apocalyptists are the instructors and encouragers of the people in the name of God in reference to that Kingdom which, in spite of the greatness of the world-powers that are their rivals and the enemies of Jahweh, is yet to come to them from God and to be realized in the world. In Daniel, which belongs to the period of the Maccabæan struggle, we may see the high-water mark of spiritual faith reached by this ideal; in the fact that after the fall of the Jewish State, the kernel † of the nation, the Jews of the stricter synagogue, ceased to cherish the apocalypses and perhaps even suppressed ‡ them, we have an index of the limitations of the ideal. The Kingdom, however loftily conceived by the seers of the nation, was still in the actual thought of the orthodox Jew too much of this world and of his own nation. Between this flow and ebb lies the history of apocalypse, as it is to be read within the limits of Judaism. It is a record of great hopes and fidelities, but also of great disappointments and of failures both in conception and fulfilment. The great apocalypses were written in periods of stress. Judging from Daniel, we may say, perhaps, the greater the stress the truer the inspiration of the apocalyptist. The leading ideas are simple but great; the tribulation is real. It will last for a measured while, and even increase. The troubling powers are fierce and violent. They rage like wild beasts and seem to be of great power; but their power passes, and the Kingdom comes to the faithful and the patient. Death does not end everything either for the faithful or for the lawless, and there is special bliss for those who lose life for righteousness' sake.§

As to the literary form of the apocalypses, the most salient distinguishing feature is a certain

* That is to say, questions as to the affinities of its phraseology and conceptions with those of heathen mythology belong rather to the study of the OT. Long before 'John' writes, the mythological conceptions have passed through the mill of the spirit that is distinctive of the Jewish faith. What further refinement they need is supplied by the mill of the Christian fulfilment.

† Yet what is here said is not altogether true of the Jews of the Dispersion.

‡ The apocalypses survive for the most part not in their native Hebrew or Aramaic but in Greek, and in the dialects of the districts where they were received, and where they were read more by Christians than by Jews.

§ Dn 12<sup>2</sup> is fairly cited as probably the only passage in the OT that clearly teaches a bodily resurrection for individual Israelites. The resurrection would seem to be universal as regards Israel (though this is doubtful), but nothing is said of the heathen.

obscurity of imagery, which sometimes takes the form of a grotesqueness, and of an incongruity in details, which are excusable only upon the supposition that the awkward imagery was capable of the twofold task of conveying the meaning to those for whom it was intended, and of veiling it from others.

This obscurity of style is connected with the fact that apocalypses were, so far as we know, in nearly every case pseudonymous. Daniel was not written, like the prophecies of Isaiah or Jeremiah, to be spoken. It was written to be read. Probably in the case of the author of Daniel, the pseudonymity was due, not so much to the feeling* that he would not be accepted by his fellow-countrymen as a prophet, as to the necessity of eluding the hostility and even the suspicion of the Syrian authorities. A prophet might be arrested in the street, a living author might be traced to his desk. But what could the Syrian do with the influence of writings that were three centuries old? The example of the author of Daniel made pseudonymity a fashion. Writers who had no cause to fear arrest, but some perhaps to fear neglect, wrote in the names of prophets or saints of bygone days. It is difficult for us to conceive how any one able to handle a pen could have been deceived by such fictions. On the other hand, there is a certain impressiveness in the fact that questions regarding the real state of matters (in the literary sense) do not seem to have emerged. Readers and interpreters of the apocalypses were concerned with their message for their own time. If an interpreter had thoughts of his own regarding the literary structure of an apocalypse, he suppressed them. His instinct told him, as its equivalent tells the modern preacher, that a text does not become the word of God until it is released from bondage to its historical meaning. At the same time their artificial literary style takes from the spiritual value of the apocalyptic writings. If real history, in so far as it deals with the past, is a veil—though a transparent one—between God and the spirit of the reader, the fiction of history, behind which the apocalyptic writer found it necessary (even were it in the interest of his message) to conceal himself, becomes, at least for later readers, a veil that is opaque. Parables that are puzzles can hardly be edifying. Some of the parables of Daniel are puzzles to this day. It is a question of some moment how far such criticism applies to the canonical Apocalypse of the NT.

Besides community in general ideas and in pseudonymity, apocalypses have a certain community in imagery. There is, as it were, a sample stock of images always accessible to the apocalyptist.

On the side of good, we have (to take great examples) God and His throne, angels such as Michael and Gabriel, or angelic beings resembling men (of whom the chief, when he appears at all, is the Messiah), books written with the names of the saints, the paradise of God with its trees of healing and nourishment, the new creation with its wonders specialized in the new city and temple. On the side of evil, we have Satan, the opposer, deceiver, accuser, the monster of the deep (dragon or crocodile), wild beasts of the land, which, however, rise out of the deep, † a 'man of lawlessness' who embodies all blasphemy, a 'great whore' who incarnates all the abominations of the heathen world. In view of this sameness of the underlying imagery, the originality of an apocalypticist is to be seen more in the use of his material than in the material itself. The forces of good and evil remain the same, the general aspect of conflict between them—the inherent strength of God's rule and the imminent collapse of the devil's—remains to the prophetic eye the same, but persons and events change. The apocalypticist of truly prophetic spirit has his eye fixed on God and his own time; and, while he uses what, abstractly considered, seems a cumbrous and partly alien literary form, he does so not to exercise a literary gift but to convey a message, the urgency of which lies on his spirit as a 'burden' of the Lord. An obvious criterion of the rightfulness of his claim to be a prophet will be the ease and freedom with which he is able to adapt the material, imposed by his choice of the apocalyptic form, to the purpose of his message.

* The feeling was, however, undoubtedly present. The author's appeal to 'books' is a confession of it (Dn 9<sup>2</sup>; cf. Jer 23<sup>11</sup>). See L. A. Muirhead, The Eschatology of Jesus, London, 1904, p. 71 ff.

† Cf. Rev 13<sup>1</sup> ff., Dn 7<sup>3</sup> ff., 4 Ezr. 13<sup>1</sup> ff. In the last passage the figure of 'one like a man' (the Messiah) rises from the sea, and then flies among the clouds, and the explanation is given: 'As none can find out what is in the depths of the sea, so none of the inhabitants of the earth can see my Son and his companions save at the hour of his day' (v. 5<sup>f</sup>). The depth of the sea rather than the height of heaven seemed to 'Ezra' the surest

Judged in this way, the Apocalypse of John shines in a light which no student of early Christian literature can call other than brilliant. Whatever difficulties were felt by the early Fathers in giving it a place in the Canon, there is no book of the NT whose claim, once admitted, has been less a matter of subsequent doubt. Until less than a century ago, the Apocalypse was supposed to contain a forecast* of the entire career of the Church in time, but the modification of this view through the clear perception that both prophets and apocalypticists wrote for their own time, attaching to its needs and prospects a certain finality, has not altered the belief of Christians in the permanent spiritual value of this unique book.

II. THE APOCALYPSE OF JOHN.—1. Scheme of the book.—It is not possible to supply in this article anything like a Commentary or even an adequate Introduction to the Apocalypse. Yet it may be useful to precede a discussion of some of its salient features with the following scheme of its contents, which is an abbreviated version of that given by F. C. Porter in his invaluable manual (op. cit. 179 f.).

Superscription, 11-13.

A. The messages of Christ to His Churches represented by the Seven Churches of Asia, 14-22.

(a) Introduction, including salutation, theme, attestation, 1-8.

(b) The Seer's Call, 19-20.

(c) The Seven Messages, chs. 2 and 3.

B. Visions of Judgment, composing the body of the book (chs. 4-20) intersected at chs. 7, 11, 14, and 19, with visions of the victory and bliss of the faithful.

(a) Visions of God and Christ respectively performing and revealing, chs. 4 and 5.

(b) First stages of the Judgment, including the opening of six seals,† the salvation of the faithful, and the destruction of one-third of mankind at the sounding of six trumpets, chs. 6-9.

(c) Last stages of the Judgment, issuing in the final overthrow of Satan and Rome, especially the imperial cultus (the 'Beast'), and in the General Resurrection and Judgment. The Seer receives a new commission. He describes the conflict between the worshippers of the Beast and the followers of the Lamb, and his vision of the wrath of God in seven bowls, chs. 10-20. Note that a large portion of this section consists of assurances to the faithful and of songs of triumph, and much the greater part of the judgment portion (chs. 12, 17, 18, and 19) describes the fall of Rome.

C. The Blessed Consummation, including the coming of God stronghold of secrets that should be inaccessible to men. On the representation of this idea in the Genesis narratives of creation and the relation of the latter to the Babylonian myth of Marduk and Tiamat, see Gunkel, Schöpfung u. Chaos, 1895.

* In an obvious sense, of course, the book did contain such a forecast. As with every prophet, the end is within the vision of the writer. In his case it is to come 'shortly'—i.e. most likely within his own generation.

† There are pauses after the 6th seal and the 6th trumpet. The 7th seal contains, as it were, the 7 trumpets, and the 7th trumpet contains the 7 bowls.

to dwell with men and the descent of the Heavenly Jerusalem, chs. 21 and 22. Note that both the Epilogue and the Prologue of the book solemnly emphasize the claim to be considered 'prophecy' (22:18; cf. 13).

2. Examples of the problems.—A few specimens may be given of the many fascinating problems which emerge for the student regarding: (1) the literary structure of the Apocalypse; (2) the significance of some of its more prominent details.

(1) In spite of its being, more than almost any other book of the NT (see below), saturated with reminiscences of books of the OT (esp. Dan., Ezek., Is., Jer., Joel, and generally all the portions of the OT which describe visions of God or offer pictures of bliss or woe), the book leaves the reader with a strong impression of its spiritual unity. The writer is a Christian and a prophet. His central positive theme is Christ Crucified, Risen, and Ascended (17:1, 5<sup>6</sup>, 1<sup>18</sup>). The warrant, substance, and spirit of his prophecy are 'the testimony of Jesus,' a phrase in which the of seems to include both a subjective and an objective meaning* (19:10; cf. 1<sup>18</sup>). The world to come is imminent, and its inheritors are the worshippers of God and the Lamb (15:1, 7<sup>9a</sup>, etc.).

It is evident, however, as a few examples will be sufficient to show, that this general unity goes along with great looseness in the assimilation of borrowed material.

Examples: (a) Ch. 11 is made up of portions of two apocalypses, one of which (represented by vv. 1-2) belongs to the time of the siege of Jerusalem (c. A.D. 70), and the other embodies a portion of the Antichrist legend, which related how Antichrist would slay Enoch and Elijah, returned from heaven, who would, however, be raised up by God or His angels Gabriel and Michael (see Bousset's Antichrist; and Tert. de Anima). In the Apocalypse, Enoch becomes Moses, and what was previously described (v. 2) as the 'holy city' becomes 'spiritually Sodom and Egypt, where the Lord was crucified' (v. 8). The general purpose—to teach that the worshippers of the true God are safe (vv. 1-2), and that the powers of wicked men will not prevail against the testimony of law and prophecy to the true God (vv. 3-12)—is evident. But it is equally evident that the author is hampered in the expression of this message by a superabundance of borrowed and not quite congruous material. Though the time of the testimony of the two witnesses in v. 3 corresponds with that during which the holy city is to be trodden under foot by the Gentiles (cf. vv. 2-3), the situation of the city at v. 13 does not correspond with that indicated at v. 2 any more than the holy city of the latter verse corresponds with 'Sodom and Egypt' of v. 8.

(b) An example of composite structure, better known to modern students of the Apocalypse (through Gunkel's Schöpf. u. Chaos), but more difficult to exhibit with precision, is the vision in ch. 12 of the Messiah-mother and the Dragon seeking to devour her child. The teaching of 'John' is, again, evident enough. Satan has been overthrown by the birth and ascension of the Messiah. He has been cast down from heaven, but he is still permitted to persecute the Messianic community on earth. If his wrath is fierce, it is because his time is short. Let the persecuted lend their ear to the loud voice saying in heaven: 'Now is come salvation—and the Kingdom of our God' (vv. 17, 12-13). It is clear, however, that, apart from a desire to use materials which lay to his hand in fragments of Jewish apocalypses, which borrowed and combined Babylonian, Egyptian, and Greek myths, he would not have expressed his meaning in the way we find in this chapter. The scene begins in heaven, and the woman is described (v. 1) in language appropriate to a goddess. Then she appears (v. 9), without explanation, on the earth, where she finds refuge and nourishment in the wilderness. The Dragon is then cast out of heaven to the earth (v. 9), although this ejection seems already to be assumed at v. 4, and on the earth he pursues the woman to her retreat in the wilderness. A Christian meaning can doubtless be put into it all, but no one narrator could ever spontaneously have told the story in this way. For a brief and lucid attempt to conceive the possible process through which the immediate and remote materials passed in the hands of 'John,' see Porter, op. cit. 236 ff.

(2) Of problems turning on more special points we have good instances in ch. 13. We may feel satisfied that the first Beast is, in general, the Roman Empire embodied in the person of the Emperor, while the second (the lamb that 'spoke as a dragon,' v. 11) is the priesthood of the Imperial cultus exercising a lamb-like office with all the ferocity of dragon-like tyrants. We may be satisfied also that under the imagery of the first Beast the author must have thought both of Nero and Domitian. Still the questions remain: (a) What is the 'deadly wound' that was healed (v. 17)? (b) Who is the 'man' whose number is the number of the Beast (v. 18)? (c) Is the 'number' 666, or, as in some MSS, 616? These three questions are closely interdependent. It has been argued that, as the Beast is rather the Empire than an individual Emperor, the wound should refer to some event of public rather than of personal import. To the objection that v. 18 speaks expressly of the 'number of a man,' it is replied that, on the analogy of 21<sup>17</sup>, this may simply mean that the number is to be reckoned in a human and not in a heavenly or angelic way. It is found that the Greek letters * of the phrase meaning 'the Latin Kingdom' give the number 666, while the value of the letters in 'the Italian Kingdom' is 616. Against the identification of the Beast with Nero it is further argued that the Hebrew equivalent of 'Nero Caesar,' rightly spelt (i.e. with the yod [י] in 'Caesar'), † gives not 666 but 676. Accepting this point of view, we should still have to ask, What were the events that were respectively the inflicting and the healing of a deadly wound, and we are presented with the alternative theories: assassination of Julius Caesar (wound), accession of Augustus (healing); end of the Julian dynasty in Nero (wound), rise of the Flavian dynasty (healing). On the other hand, it is contended that, apart even from v. 18, the whole passage is too intense and too definite in its reference to exclude particular Emperors from the view of the author or his readers. He must have thought of Nero. Almost as certainly he must have thought of Domitian, whom he conceived as Nero Redivivus (17<sup>11</sup>), and, not improbably, he also thought of Caligula, to whose attempt to set up his own statue in Jerusalem the Apocalypse of the blasphemous beast (considered as material borrowed by 'John') might be supposed to have originally referred. ‡ This might explain the variant 616, which is the number of Caligula's name. The omission of the yod in writing the Hebrew form of Caesar is not a serious difficulty (see Moffatt, op. cit.). Finally, Gunkel, finding the Bab. original of the Beast in the chaos-monster Tiamat overcome (in the creation myth) by Marduk, has shown that the Heb. words תְּהוֹם קַדְמוֹנִיָּה (T'hom kadhmōnīyah = 'the primitive monster') give the number 666. It might be supposed, therefore, that what struck 'John' was that the number of this primæval beast, traditionally familiar to him, was also the number of a man, viz. Nero. There are serious linguistic objections to this view (see Moffatt), but it may suggest to us that the number containing three sixes had a traditional meaning. It may have meant the constant effort and failure of what is human to attain the Divine perfection, of which the number 7 was the symbol: so near yet so far off, 'O the little more, and how much it is.'

* The words 'the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy' are a gloss (see the Commentaries), but they are entirely true to the writer's thought (11), and form with 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup> an interesting witness to the test applied to prophets in the early Church.

All these varying views of 'John's' meaning cannot be true in every particular. Yet we are, perhaps, nearer the truth in saying that portions of all of them must have passed through his mind than in deciding dogmatically in favour of one of them. It seems to the present writer that the loose way in which the prophet and pastor who wrote the Apocalypse dealt with the traditional material that lay to his hand was probably as intentional as the frequent grammatical anomalies and harsh Hebraisms of his text, which no Greek scholar supposes to be due to inadvertence. The man who had the literary genius and the prophetic inspiration to write the songs of triumph and the hortatory portions of the Apocalypse may be believed to have had a method in his carelessness. He was certainly capable of adopting a fixed style of writing and carrying it through in the way that style on the whole required. If he left some strings flying for his readers to cut or fasten up as the spirit might lead them, may it not be a sign that he considered himself and his companions in the 'kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ' to occupy a sphere which, just because it was supreme and Divine, was not hermetically sealed to the rest of the world, but was open, like the New Jerusalem, to receive testimony and tribute from every quarter?

3. The Apocalypse of John as a product of the Apostolic Age, and a testimony to Jesus as the Christ.—Enough has perhaps been said to show that questions regarding the importance and function of apocalyptic literature in the faith and life of the Apostolic Age are best answered in connexion with a study of the Apocalypse of John. No known apocalyptic writing of the same or greater bulk is comparable with it in vitality of connexion with primitive Christianity; and there is no likelihood that any such writing existed. Attention may be fastened on three matters: (a) the historical situation, (b) the relation of apocalypse to prophecy, (c) the hortatory and dogmatic teaching of the Apocalypse.

(a) The historical situation.—We have seen that the period of apocalyptic literature is roughly the 250 years of the last struggles of the Jewish people for political and religious independence. The first apocalypse of the OT is contemporaneous with the great sacrifices made by the élite of the Jewish people to maintain the national testimony to Jahweh. The sacrificial spirit passed into the community that confessed Jesus of Nazareth, crucified, risen, and ascended, as Lord and Messiah. Very early the sacrificial spirit was called forth. But the first persecutors were not heathen in name. They were the representatives of the city which 'spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also the Lord was crucified' (Rev 11<sup>8</sup>; cf. 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>1-12</sup>). To St. Paul the power of Antichrist lay in the jealousy of the Jewish synagogue, and it would seem from the passage in 2 Th 2 that the power 'that restrains' (ὁ κατέχων, τὸ κατέχον) is the Roman Empire. Certainly the representation in the Acts of the Apostles favours this view (16<sup>37</sup> 21<sup>32</sup> 22<sup>25</sup>, 25<sup>10</sup>). Between the ministry of St. Paul and the time of the Apocalypse a change had taken place. In the Apocalypse the Roman Empire is clearly the instrument of Antichrist. The Dragon gives power to the Beast (13<sup>4</sup>), and it is obvious that in 'John's' time, and especially in the province of Asia, Christians were persecuted under Imperial authority simply because of their Christian profession. Christianity was a crime punishable with death, in so far as it was inconsistent with the worship of the Emperor (1<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>16</sup>). Doubtless there were differences in the administration of the law, but the tone of the Letters to the Seven Churches (chs. 2 and 3) and of the whole Apocalypse indicates a time when the worst might be apprehended. The beginning of this Imperial attitude to the Christians may perhaps be found in the summer of A.D. 64, when, as Tacitus informs us (Ann. xv. 44), Nero sought to fasten on

* The letters of both the Greek and the Hebrew alphabets have each a numerical value.

† קסר נות קסר; cf. art. ANTICHRIST.

‡ Cf. v. 5 with the description of Antiochus Epiphanes in Dn 11<sup>36ff</sup>. It seems to the present writer that 'John' may have thought of Domitian as combining Caligula and Nero in himself in much the same way as the Beast, which is Rome (13<sup>3</sup>), combines in itself all the ferocities of Daniel's first three beasts (lion, bear, leopard, Dn 7<sup>4ff</sup>). Like 4 Ezr. 12<sup>10ff</sup> he would consider Daniel's fourth beast to be Rome.

the Christians the odious charge of incendiarism, and it has been held that the Apocalypse belongs to the time of the Neronian persecution. This view may now be regarded as superseded. Nero is certainly a figure in the Apocalypse (see above), but he is a figure of the past. The Beast is alive in his bestial successor Domitian, whom 'John' considers Nero Redivivus* (cf. 13<sup>3</sup> with 17<sup>11</sup>).

It was under Domitian that persecution of the Christians first became a part of the Imperial policy. It is this legalized persecution and the fact that the centre of the storm lies among the Churches of Asia that rouse the spirit of prophecy in the author of chs. 2 and 3, and, as we venture to think, of the whole Apocalypse. And, assuredly, it was the spirit of prophecy, and not of delusion, that gave him the certainty that the Lord Jesus would 'come quickly' to deliver His people from a situation in which the choice lay between death and unfaithfulness to Him. Every prophet is an eschatologist. He sees the end of what is opposed to the will of holiness and love. It is only for a moment—though the moments of God and history may be long—that cruelty and violence can reign or the meek and righteous be oppressed.

13<sup>17</sup> seems to indicate an edict actually in force or about to be issued, under which ordinary contracts of exchange should not be legal apart from vows of allegiance to the Emperor as a Divine person. This meant that Christians were excluded from the business of the world, and so from the world itself, and to 'John' it seemed justly a challenge of God's supremacy, which God and His Christ could not delay to take up. Quite apart from the peculiar genius of its author, the Apocalypse must have been to its first readers a message of comfort and power. Its appeal lay in its inevitableness. In the situation as described, no message short of that contained in the Apocalypse could have seemed worthy of God or a 'testimony of Jesus Christ.' Prophecy is never in vacuo. God's word is in the mouth of His prophet because it is first in the events which His providence ordains or permits. It would be difficult to rate too highly the literary and spiritual genius of 'John,' yet the authoritativeness of his message for his own time and ours lies not in this but in its correspondence with a situation of crisis for the Kingdom of God. So long as it is possible for a situation to emerge in which we cannot obey man's law without dishonouring God's, the Apocalypse will be an authority ready for use in the hands of the godly.

(b) Apocalyptic and prophecy.—If this view is just, it contains the answer to two closely related questions: (1) Is the writer, as he represents himself, a 'companion in tribulation' of those to whom he writes (1<sup>9</sup>), or does he, like other apocalypticists, including Daniel, write under the name of some great personage of the past? (2) Is he really a prophet as well as an apocalypticist?

(1) The former question should be kept apart from the question whether the writer can reasonably be identified with the Apostle John. There is nowhere in the book the slightest hint of a claim to apostleship; 21<sup>14</sup> and 18<sup>20</sup> suggest rather that the author distinguished himself from the 'holy apostles and prophets' and from the '12 apostles.' We do not know enough regarding the Churches of Asia in the 1st cent. to say with confidence that only one who was as highly esteemed as John the Apostle (Ramsay) or John the Presbyter (Bousset) could be confident that his message would come with authority to those to whom it was addressed. On the other hand, it is more than possible, in view both of the literary apocalyptic convention of pseudopigraphy and of the probability that concealment of the author's name was an act of warrantable prudence, that 'John' was not the author's real name, and that (almost by consequence) the banishment in Patmos was, so far as he was concerned, fictitious. But the matter of real importance is not the question whether the names of person and place are fictitious; it is the fact that—supposing them to have been fictitious—here the fiction ends. The writer is a Christian. He is in the same situation with those he addresses. He neither desires nor attempts to place himself in the distant past. The Christian Church has its own prophets. Our author solemnly claims to be one of them, and the Church since the beginning of the 3rd cent. has taken him at his own estimate.*

(2) But is not an apocalypticist, ipso facto, only a pale shadow of a prophet? Must not 'John' be conceived, as regards inspiration, to stand to a speaking prophet, say of Ephesus, as 'Daniel' stands to the real Daniel or to some prophet of the time of Nebuchadnezzar? It seems to the present writer that the entire absence from the Apocalypse of such a fiction as that in Daniel, in which the past is in one part (the alleged writer's time) adorned with legendary features, and in a much greater part (the centuries between the Exile and the Syrian Persecution) is treated fictitiously as future, separates it longo intervallo from apocalyptic writings of the purely Jewish type, or even from Christian apocalypses like the Apoc. of Peter, which resemble the Jewish type in the feature of impersonation. It may be probable, though it is far from certain, that 'John' conceals his real name, but the suggestion that he tried to personate any one, or sought any authority for his message other than what belonged to it as the testimony of Jesus given to himself, seems to be as destitute of probability as of proof.

What, we may ask, is a Christian prophet but one who has an ἀποκαλύψις (revelation) from God through Jesus Christ concerning matters pertaining to His Kingdom (1 Co 14<sup>24ff.</sup>, esp. v. 26; cf. Rev 19<sup>10</sup>)? If a Christian could speak so as to bring home to his brethren the reality of the promised Kingdom, or so as to flash the light of the Divine judgment on the darkened conscience of an unbeliever, he had the χάρισμα or gift of prophecy (1 Co 14<sup>22-24f.</sup>). St. Paul himself must have possessed the gift in an eminent degree. We judge so not simply from what is told in the Acts or from what he himself tells regarding the source from which he derived the contents and manner of his preaching or the directions necessary for his missionary journeys. We judge so rather from the correspondence existing between his claim to direct access to this source and the still operating influence of his personality upon the conscience and conduct of mankind. If it be said that St. Paul was a preacher, and 'John' was, so far as we know, only a writer, it may be asked in reply: What do we know of Paul the preacher that we do not learn best from his own writings? No companion of 'John' has told us (as Luke did of Paul) how he preached, but surely we may say that no one could write as 'John' does without being, under favourable conditions, a preacher, and that probably as much in proportion of 'John's' Apocalypse as of St. Paul's Epistles might have been * Porter (op. cit. 183) asks whether the Apocalypse is 'a direct or a secondary product of that new inspiration' [Christian prophecy], and he replies, rather disconcertingly: 'Our impression is that it is secondary.' No one has a better right to speak with authority than Porter. But if the inspiration of the Apocalypse is secondary, what measure have we by which to judge of that which is primary?

* The 'seven kings' of 17<sup>10ff.</sup> are the seven emperors—exclusive of the usurpers Galba, Otho, and Vitellius—from Augustus to Nero. The 'eighth that is of the seven' (v. 11) is Domitian, considered as Nero Redivivus.

preached as it stands to his own contemporaries. When it is remembered how apocalypses incomparably inferior in spiritual quality to the Apocalypse were cherished by the early Church and even quoted as Scripture, it will not seem hazardous to assert that in the Apostolic Age the distinction between apocalypse and prophecy, which is marked in the pre-Christian period by the separation of Daniel in the Hebrew Canon from 'the Prophets,' has ceased to exist. Two things, unnaturally separated (through the spirit of artifice), have come together again. The prophet is the man who has a 'revelation,' and the man who has a 'revelation,' whether he speak it or write it, is a prophet. If our argument is sound, we may venture to say that once at least this ideal unity of apocalypse and prophecy has been realized. It is realized in the Apocalypse of John.

(c) The hortatory and dogmatic teaching of the Apocalypse.—The best proof of the soundness of the above argument lies in the abundance of hortatory and dogmatic material of permanent value to be found in the Apocalypse. 'John' is, in a sense, the Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel of the NT. This is eminently true of the messages to the Seven Churches (chs. 2 and 3). Ramsay's Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia (Lond. 1904) probably exaggerates the extent to which the writer may have had in his mind facts of geography and history relating to the places mentioned; but such a book—from the pen of an unrivalled authority on the antiquities of Asia Minor—could not have been written of the messages in chs. 2 and 3 of the Apocalypse did they not proceed from one who was thoroughly conversant with everything in the environment of the Churches of Asia which had a bearing on their spiritual condition. A writer who closes each message with the formula, 'he that hath ears, etc.' (27. 11. 17. 3. 36. 13. 2.; cf. Mt 13<sup>9-41</sup>, etc.), claims to stand to those whom he addresses in the relation of a speaking prophet to his hearers. Those who remember the function these chapters still serve in that best type of Christian oratory in which preaching is prophesying, may justly feel that the onus probandi rests with those who deny the claim. But the immediately edifying elements of the Apocalypse are not confined to these chapters. The book is written, as it claims to be, in an atmosphere of worship.* The inspiration came to 'John' on the day in which Christians remembered the Resurrection of the Lord. The book is a message from the Lord in heaven. Those who read and obey are blessed because the time of their deliverance is at hand. The sense of holy omnipotent power, not dominated by but manifested through suffering—for the power is redemptive—pervades the book. Its refrain is Glory to God and to the Lamb (15<sup>2</sup>), and the note of the triumphant thanksgiving of the faithful sounds, throughout, loudly behind the curtain of judgment that shrouds the wicked world (5<sup>1-14</sup> 6<sup>9ff.</sup> 7<sup>3-7</sup> 8<sup>3ff.</sup> 11<sup>15ff.</sup> 12<sup>10-12</sup> 13<sup>9ff.</sup> 14<sup>1-7</sup> 12<sup>ff.</sup> 15<sup>1-4</sup> 19<sup>1-3</sup> 11-16 20<sup>4-6</sup> 21. 22). The worship-element in the book is exquisitely beautiful as literature, but it was too vital to the spiritual situation to be intended as ornamental. The crucial element in the situation is the liberty of worship. History has proved that the day of martyrs is eminently the day when this liberty is denied or ignored.

The ethical teaching of the book is perhaps best seen in such passages as 6<sup>9-11</sup> 13<sup>9-10</sup> 14<sup>11-13</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>. The essential virtues of the saints are patience and courage. The weapon of force is not permitted to them (13<sup>10</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>52</sup>), but patience and faith prevail. On the other hand, patience is not mere passivity. The command to worship the Beast must be courageously disobeyed. Compliance is fatal. First among those who have their part in the 'second death' are 'the fearful' (21<sup>8</sup>). The vital connexion of this teaching with the situation is obvious. Not less but even more obvious is its connexion with the dogmatic teaching of the book. As we have seen, the Apocalypse must be considered, so far as the Apostolic Age is concerned, a thing of Jewish origin and growth.* There are, indeed, few direct quotations from the OT in the Apocalypse; but there are more OT reminiscences in it than in almost any other book of the NT.† This, no doubt, is due largely to the comparatively stereotyped character of the apocalyptic imagery. But, in view of the emphasis—in some cases excessive—which many scholars have laid on the Jewish character of the Apocalypse, a word seems necessary on the question of how far the distinctive Christian belief that Jesus is the Messiah has modified the type of teaching peculiar to a Jewish apocalyptic book.

At first sight the change seems more formal than real. The Apocalypse comes from Jesus Christ (1<sup>1</sup>), but, beyond the features of His death and resurrection, there is nothing in the description of the sublime Personage who overwhelms 'John' with His manifestations (1<sup>7</sup>) suggestive of any feature distinctive of the human Jesus of the Gospels. The description of the Figure in 17. 13<sup>ff.</sup> and in 19<sup>11ff.</sup> owes more to Daniel,‡ Zechariah,§ and Isaiah|| than to anything that is original in the Gospels. Such a fact gives a certain colour to the view, propounded by Vischer in 1886, that the book is a Jewish Apocalypse set in a Christian framework (chs. 1-3, and 22<sup>6-7</sup>), and slightly interpolated. This extreme view has, however, yielded to the strong impression of its unity and Christian character, which, in spite of its eclectic form, the book produces on the mind of the critical no less than of the ordinary reader. As to the alleged absence of the features of the Christ of the Gospels, two considerations seem specially relevant. The one is that the absence of the human features of Jesus is scarcely more marked in the Apocalypse than it is in every other book of the NT outside the Gospels. Are references to the human Jesus frequent or marked in the Acts of the Apostles, though that book was written by a man who also wrote a Gospel? Are they marked—or even, in the latter case, at all present—in the Epistles which bear the names of Peter and John? Notoriously they are so little marked in the known writings of the greatest figure of the Apostolic Age that their absence has supplied its one position of apparent strength to the 'modern Gnosticism' associated with the names of Jensen and Drews, and has made the effort to exhibit real points of contact between St. Paul and Jesus of Nazareth a main task of modern Apologetics. Yet one of St. Paul's companions was Mark, and another was Luke. We do not know all that St. Paul either * 110. The opinion of scholars is against the rendering: 'I was, through the Spirit, in the Day of the Lord (or the Day of Judgment),' though this rendering cannot be said to be grammatically impossible; and though it has the advantage of attaching a good traditional meaning to 'Day of the Lord,' which would thus retain its OT sense (Is 21<sup>2</sup>, Am 5-7, etc.), yet it is hardly likely that it would be used both in the instrumental and the local sense in one short sentence; and the analogy of 17<sup>3ff.</sup> 21<sup>10</sup> suggests that, had the author intended this meaning, he would have used a verb of transference ('I was carried by the Spirit to, etc.'). The 'Day of the Lord' is, therefore, the Christian Sabbath, the day of worship.

* That is to say, its affinities with pagan mythology may be ignored, as belonging to the sphere of OT research.

† According to Huhn, Matthew has 37 direct quotations from the OT against 3 in the Apocalypse. But the latter has 452 reminiscences against 437 in Matthew. Thus Matthew comes near the Apocalypse in this respect; Luke, with 474 reminiscences, goes beyond it. All the other books are much behind it (Attest. Citate u. Reminiscenzen im N.T., 1900, p. 269 ff.).

‡ Dn 7<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>5ff.</sup>

§ Zec 12<sup>10</sup>.

|| Is 11<sup>4</sup> 63<sup>1ff.</sup>

spoke or wrote, but we do know that, contemporaneously with the accomplishment of his mission to the Gentiles, or, at least, well within the Apostolic Age, a demand for written reminiscences of Jesus arose both in the Jewish and in the Gentile portion of the Church. Men possess reminiscences of personalities who have exercised a determining influence upon them long before they think of committing them to writing, and often, if not usually—as witness the cases of Matthew and Mark—the task of writing is undertaken only by request (Euseb. HE iii. 39). If, then, the silences of St. Paul, the contemporary of Jesus (who yet possibly never saw Him in the flesh), do not, on fair consideration, surprise us, why should those of a man some thirty years younger, a Christian prophet of the time of Domitian, offend us?

The other consideration is more positive in character. It is that of what may be called the eschatological outlook of the Apostolic Age. It was believed by all the NT writers of the first generation that the return of Christ to His own in glory and power would be witnessed by some in their own time while they were yet in the flesh. The expectation appears in the Gospels (Mk 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>11</sup>), and it is a matter much discussed how far it is due to convictions definitely entertained and expressed by our Lord Himself. It was certainly entertained by St. Paul (1 Co 15<sup>51</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>13a</sup>); and, though on the whole it hardly affected, and never unwholesomely,* his ethical teaching, it surely explains why letters to fellow-Christians, who had been for the most part his own converts and catechumens, in so far as they were not occupied with matters of immediate perplexity and duty, should be concerned rather with prospects of the Lord's coming and glory than with reminiscences of the days of His flesh. If St. Paul had been asked to state his essential creed as briefly as possible, he might fairly be conceived to reply: For the past, Christ died in the flesh for our sins; for the present, Christ rose and lives for our justification; for the future, Christ will come to confirm and receive His own to Himself in the glory of God. Would the modern religious man, whose creed has any title to be associated with the NT, say anything, even in regard to the future, that is really different from this?

Whatever worth may belong to these considerations in reference to St. Paul belongs to them a fortiori in reference to a writer whose express aim is to show to the servants of God the 'things that must shortly come to pass' (1<sup>1</sup>). Even if we put out of account the limitations of apocalyptic literary method, the last thing we shall expect such a writer expressly to deal with will be reminiscences of the historic Jesus. If we assume that the Apostolic Age, whatever may be its defects, supplies the norm of the religion which is final, we shall require of the Christian prophet 'John' only that he accomplish his declared purpose in a manner conformable both to the situation he has in view and to the spirit and teaching of the apostolic faith. No critic contends that chs. 2 and 3 do not indicate a writer who is in the matters of main account in close touch with the communities he addresses, and who writes to them in prophetic vein, on the whole just as he might be conceived to speak. In the rest of his book, he drops special reference to the Asiatic Churches, devotes himself to the recounting of visions, mainly of final judgment, which are of account for the whole Church and world of his time, and makes, as the nature of his theme requires, larger use of material that is more or less common to all imaginative religious speech or literature.* He has the definite belief that the last instrument of Antichrist is the Roman Imperial system, and that with the removal of the 'Great Whore' (19<sup>2</sup>)—the 'Babylon' which is Rome—especially the cult of the Emperor, the last obstacle to the glorious advent of the Kingdom will be taken away. It is true there is nothing in his general estimate of the situation of the worshippers of the true God, suffering from the Roman persecution, that might not have been conceived by 'Daniel' or any other OT prophet. There is scarcely a detail in the wonderful lament of triumph over the fall of the Roman Babylon (ch. 18) that has not its close parallel in Isaiah and Jeremiah (for the details see Porter, op. cit. 267).

But what significance has such a fact other than that of illustrating, in general, the claim of Christianity to fulfil OT prophecy, and, in particular, the claim of this Christian seer to be in the succession of the prophets (1<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>7a</sup>, 19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>18a</sup>)? Once it is seen that it is the work of a Christian, and that every detail in it has to the author's own mind a significance, determined by his own attitude and that of his readers to the Messiah who was crucified (1<sup>6a</sup>, 11<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>), the book must be allowed to possess a unique value for edification both in itself and in reference to the place assigned it by Christian authority—that of closing the canonical record of revelation contained in the Bible.

* A good instance of the author's eclecticism, acting under control of spiritual insight, is his combination of an earthly and a heavenly view of the Consummation. The binding of Satan and the thousand years' reign of the martyred saints precedes the final destruction of the Antichristian power and the descent of the Heavenly City (ch. 20; cf. with chs. 21 and 22). Why does the prophet not close his book at 19<sup>10</sup>? It is the poorest conceivable answer to say that he continues his text for literary reasons, having a desire to utilize traditional material that was too good to be neglected. But the reason may well be that, while the destruction of the colossal imposture of the Roman Imperial cult is the last preliminary to the Consummation that comes within his definite conviction, a complex instinct, which we may consider part of his prophetic equipment, warns him against the danger of confounding definiteness of result with definiteness of time and manner. The large doings of God permit of fluctuation in detail, and the prophet is practical as well as inspired. One matter that genuinely concerned him as a prophet, and had concerned brother-prophets before him (cf. Dn 12<sup>1a</sup>, En. 91<sup>1a</sup>, Bar 40<sup>3</sup>, and, for a Christian example, 1 Co 15<sup>20a</sup>), was the question what special reward would be granted to those who had maintained their faithfulness to God at the cost of their lives. And here the traditional idea of a reign of the saints preliminary to the Final Consummation came to his aid. In En. 91<sup>1a</sup> (cf. Bar 40<sup>3</sup>) we find a scheme according to which all human history, including the reign of the Messiah, is divided into heavenly weeks. In 4 Ezr. 7<sup>28</sup> the period of the reign of the Messiah is 400 years—a number which, as the Talmud (Sanh. 99) explains, is obtained by combining Gn 15<sup>4</sup> with Ps 90<sup>15</sup>. The 1000 years of our prophet would be obtained in a somewhat similar fashion by combining Gn 1<sup>1a</sup> (the 'day' of the Creation-narrative) with Ps 90<sup>4</sup>. The 'day' (=1000 years) is the rest-day of God's saints, who are in particular the martyrs. In the Jewish tradition (cf. Jub. 4<sup>30</sup> and Secrets of Enoch 33<sup>1a</sup>) the seventh 'day' was the reign of the Messiah. With 'John' it is the reign of the Messiah with His faithful martyrs, and of course neither they nor He die at the end of it, as in 4 Ezr. 7<sup>28</sup>. Satan, however, is unbound and leads the powers of evil in a final assault upon the saints of the earth. He is overthrown and cast into the 'lake of fire' with the Beast and the False Prophet. Then follows the General Judgment, in which those whose names are not found in the 'book of life' are cast into the lake of fire, and the rest who are faithful join the saints of the Millennium in the final bliss. It is obvious that these details are not strictly reconcilable with those of the Apocalypse that ends at 19<sup>10</sup>, and again at 19<sup>21</sup>. But surely we may credit the prophet with being aware of the inconsistency. He handles his manifold material freely. What is important to him is not to reconcile discrepant details, but to express through them ideas of destiny that are worthy of God and His Messiah. And it was manifestly important to him, as it was also, in part, to St. Paul, to express the ideas: (1) that believers who died before the Advent suffered no disadvantage above others (1 Th 4<sup>13a</sup>; cf. Rev. 6<sup>9a</sup>); (2) that the earth needed to be prepared for the final glory by the prevailing presence in it of the saints (1 Co 15<sup>2a</sup>, 6<sup>2a</sup>; cf. Rev. 20<sup>4-10</sup>); (3) that there were special rewards for those who made special sacrifices, in particular the sacrifice of life, for the sake of the Kingdom (2 Ti 2<sup>11a</sup>; cf. Mk 10<sup>28a</sup>, and passages in Rev. above cited).

* 1 Co 7<sup>29a</sup> seems to the present writer an illustration rather than an exception.

The following examples may be given of the teaching of the Apocalypse on definite articles of the Christian creed. (1) The Messiah is the historical Person of the seed of David, who was crucified at Jerusalem (5<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>8</sup>).—(2) Grace and peace come from Him equally with Him who 'is and was and is to come' and with the 'seven spirits which are before the throne' (manifest apocalyptic equivalents for the Father and the Spirit). He is the 'faithful witness,' the 'First-begotten of the dead, the Prince of the kings of the earth' (14<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>10</sup>).—(3) The 'revelation' contained in the book is not only mediated by Jesus Christ, it is the revelation of Him (1<sup>1</sup>). The prophets are those who have the 'testimony of Jesus,' and the latter is the 'spirit of prophecy' (19<sup>10</sup>). The prophet is a fellow-servant and companion of all faithful believers in Jesus. For they also have the testimony. They are made prophets as well as priests and kings (1<sup>6</sup> 9).—(4) The fundamental work of the Messiah is the redemptive self-sacrifice. No doubt the 'Lamb' is a leader and a warrior, whom His servants follow. His 'wrath' is the destruction of His enemies. Yet even in the glory of His power 'in the midst of the throne' He remains for the Christian seer a 'Lamb as it had been slain,' and the innumerable multitude of the glorified faithful in heaven are those whose robes have been 'made white in the blood of the Lamb.' The motive of service even in heaven is the gratitude of those who have been forgiven and cleansed (14<sup>1-4</sup> 19<sup>11a</sup> 7<sup>9a</sup>). Agreeably with this, the fundamental virtues of the saints are 'patience and faith'; though, as there is a 'wrath of the Lamb,' so there is a certain fierceness in the conflicts and triumphs of the saints. Those who find fault with the vindictiveness of the Apocalypse should make allowance for the dramatic style of the book and should not forget that at bottom the battle between the saints and their oppressors is a battle between patience and violence (18<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>9c</sup> 14<sup>1-3</sup>).

(5) The conception of Christian duty and bliss, similarly, is profoundly ethical and spiritual. The saints must show no half-hearted timidity in resisting the order that is supreme in the world. The resistance is to be maintained in the sense in which maintenance is victory. The promise is to 'him that overcometh,' and no sacrifice is too great (2<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>7c</sup>). The reward of this holy sacrificial attitude of the will is complete union with Christ, and participation in all the privileges of sonship. The sun that lightens the city of pearls and makes its splendours real is none other than God Himself and the Lamb. Its bliss is the life of its citizens (7<sup>15a</sup> 19<sup>7a</sup> 22<sup>3a</sup>). The guests at the marriage-supper of the Lamb do not wear jewellery. They wear the 'crown of life,' and the 'fine linen of the righteousness of the saints' (2<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>). In reference to the fidelity of the servants of God, the emphasis laid on worship is noticeable. It is not accidental. It is due to the twofold fact that the book reflects a situation in which liberty of worship was denied, and that worship in spirit and in truth is the loftiest expression of the soul's loyalty. The emphasis is negative as well as positive. Twice over, the seer is warned not to worship him that showed him these things. The worship of angels was a heresy not unknown in the Asiatic Churches. Perhaps 'John' felt that the elaboration of the conception of angelic agency and mediation, however inevitable in apocalyptic literature or even in the thoughts proper to true religion, had its dangers (19<sup>10</sup> 22<sup>9</sup>; cf. Col 2<sup>18a</sup>).

(6) Finally, the spirit of gracious evangelism that finds expression in 22<sup>17</sup> deserves acknowledgment. Evangelism is scarcely to be expected in a book announcing finalities, and concerned so largely with the Judgment. 'John' does not believe that there is much more chance of repentance for the rank and file of those who have yielded to the apostasy of his time than for the Beast and the False Prophet who have led it. There is not much chance, for there is not much time (1<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>10c</sup>). Yet the last word of the book—as from the Spirit (in, say, the prophet himself), as from the Church, already the 'Bride,' as from the chance hearer, and as from the Nameless who is above every name—is 'Come': 'whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.' On all these points—and others might be named—the close touch of the Apocalypse with the teaching of the other books of the NT is obvious.

III. THE APOCALYPTIC ELEMENT IN OTHER BOOKS OF THE NT AND IN CHRISTIANITY.—Though it is impossible to treat the subject here in detail, a word may be said in conclusion regarding what is commonly called the 'apocalyptic element': (1) in the other books of the NT; (2) in Christianity itself. We use the phrase 'apocalyptic element' with reserve, because it may well appear from our study of the Apocalypse that the whole of Christianity is an apocalypse or revelation whose containing sphere is the Person of Jesus Christ (Col 2<sup>3-9</sup>). The view of the NT and of the early Fathers (see Didache, 11) regarding the Christian prophets is that expressed by St. Paul (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>), viz. that they are next in rank to the apostles. Yet what distinguished the apostles from the prophets was accidental. The apostles were received as witnesses of Jesus at first hand, men who had 'seen the Lord' (1 Co 9<sup>1</sup>). They moved from place to place, and founded churches. In the sub-apostolic Church these functions probably passed over largely to the prophets, who in any case were one with the apostles in the essential qualification of having received their commission not from man but from God and who spoke and acted by ἀποκάλυψις (Ac 4<sup>19</sup> 20-4 21<sup>10a</sup>, Gal 1<sup>2-3</sup>). The expression 'apocalyptic element' indicates phrases, sentences, or longer passages in the apocalyptic style occurring in writings that do not on the whole bear the literary character of apocalypses. It is obvious even at a superficial glance that, so understood, the apocalyptic element in the NT is considerable; and when we remember that it includes phrases directly relating to the order that already exists in heaven or to the processes through which it will come to earth, we shall, perhaps, feel that apocalypse is a leaven rather than an ingredient in the NT. The life reflected in the NT is saturated with the supernatural.

1. The Gospels.—Besides words and phrases, the Synoptic Gospels contain long passages of alleged discourses of Jesus—notably, e.g., Mk 13|—which are entirely in the apocalyptic style. In view of the fact that Jesus, when before Caiaphas, declared Himself the Messiah in words that were virtually a quotation of Dn 7<sup>13</sup> (Mk 14<sup>62</sup>), it cannot be said to be impossible that He spoke the contents of Mk 13| substantially as they are reported. On the whole, however, it is probable that the Evangelists incorporated in their texts a Jewish-Christian apocalypse which gave the substance of our Lord's utterance in a form adapted to the case of the Christians in Jerusalem at the time of the Jewish-Roman war (A.D. 66-70). It may surely be said with truth and reverence that our Lord Himself was the best example of a speaking apocalypticist, or of the union between apocalypse and prophecy. The saying recorded in Lk 10<sup>18</sup> would alone be sufficient to prove the point.

In the Gospel of John matters lie in a different perspective. The heavenly has come rather than is coming. That does not mean, however, that there is no room for apocalypse. It means that all is apocalypse. The Gospel is an account of the manifestation in the flesh of the Word that was God (1<sup>1-14</sup>).

2. The Acts of the Apostles.—Just as to John (the Evangelist) the appearance and action of Jesus in the world are themselves an apocalypse, so to Luke in the Acts the events that mark the progress of the gospel are largely sensible apocalypses of the Divine favour or power. Ch. 2 (wind, and tongues of fire), 3 (healing), 4 (earthquake), 5 (strokes of judgment, death by a word), 7 (transfiguration, 6<sup>15</sup>; cf. 7<sup>55</sup>), 10 (coincident visions), 12 (deliverance through an angel) are conspicuous instances.

3. The Epistles.—(a) In general, the expectation of the Lord's coming, and coming soon, is dominant in all these writings, except (for wholly accidental reasons) Philemon and 2 and 3 John. Even in the later writings, where the colour of the expectation may be supposed to be more sober, the sense of the imminence of the coming glory is not lost. Even John is confident that it is the 'last time' (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>). The difference between earlier and later appears chiefly in the choice in the later writings of phrases indicating the manifestation of a Divine reality already existing rather than the coming from heaven of something new (Col 3<sup>12</sup>; cf. Eph 5<sup>8-14</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>12</sup>). The apocalyptic element, even in the literary sense, in 2 Peter—perhaps the latest writing in the NT—is sufficiently obvious (2 P 3<sup>3-13</sup>).

(b) Of special interest are the earlier Epistles of St. Paul, 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., and 1 and 2 Thessalonians. The passages 1 Co 7<sup>29ff.</sup> 15<sup>21ff.</sup> have already been referred to. Those in 1 Co 12<sup>1ff.</sup> and 14<sup>28ff.</sup> on the tests of prophecy (cf. Did. 11) and on its value for edification and conversion are of peculiar interest to the student of Christian prophecy as manifested in the Apostolic Age (14<sup>22-24f.</sup> 31<sup>ff.</sup>). In the enumeration in 14<sup>26</sup>, the prophet is clearly the person who 'has an αποκάλυψις.' Prophecy and 'tongues' might be alike in respect of impermanence (13<sup>9</sup>), but prophecy, while it lasted, was by far the more valuable gift (14<sup>39</sup>). St. Paul probably believed that prophecy, exercised under proper self-control, would last until the Advent, whereas the rationalistic spirit, however little it deserved to be encouraged, would quench the inspiration of the tongues (cf. 14<sup>39ff.</sup> with 13<sup>9ff.</sup> and 1 Th 5<sup>19ff.</sup>). In our study of the Apocalypse we have seen something of the difficulty or even impossibility of finding an eschatological scheme of perfect consistency in detail even in so purely apocalyptic a writer as 'John.' The eschatology of St. Paul is beyond the range of this article. Yet it is pertinent to make two remarks. The one is that St. Paul is as certain of the need and value of prophesying and of the reality of the supernatural happenings with which prophecy is concerned as any apocalyptic writer could be. We prophesy, indeed, in part; still we must prophesy so long as we believe. The other is that, where St. Paul enters, so to speak, upon the sphere of the apocalypticist, as he does so markedly in the Corinthian and Thessalonian Epistles,* his practical motives are clear and cogent. They are the same as the motives of 'John,' viz. to encourage believers to continue in patience and hope. The proposition will bear examination that in practically every case where believers are addressed in the NT regarding the final glory that is to come soon—presumably within their own life-time—a leading motive of the utterance is to insist that other important things must happen first.* This is a paradox, but it is true—as true as the more comprehensive paradox that the Bible is the most eschatological book in the world and, at the same time, the most ethical.

4. In Christianity.—May we extend the paradox to Christianity itself as the spirit and power of the religion of the 20th century? Or are those 'modernists' right who say that the Christianity of the future must be stripped of 'eschatological delusions'? The question, perhaps, cannot be answered with perfect satisfaction to the mind without the aid of psychology and metaphysics; and possibly the new 'intuitionism' of our day, associated with the name of Bergson, may help some religious men, whom mental training has fitted to desire and receive such aid. We could hardly be satisfied with the impossibility of searching out God to perfection unless it were permissible, or, for some, even necessary, to attempt the task. Yet, on the whole, the moral and spiritual life of mankind goes its own way independently of philosophy. But it does not proceed independently of God. He 'is and was and is to come,' and He 'reveals' Himself to those who trust and obey Him. Our situation in reference to Him is paradoxical. We rest in Him, yet cannot rest, for His promise leads us forward to horizons that vanish and enlarge as we approach. We suffer, yet we hope. We are disappointed, yet we are comforted; for the fulfilment is greater than the hope. Life is an experiment, not a theory, and the object of the experiment is God. Those who thus think will look rather to history and to personal and social religious experience than to philosophy for a solution of the eschatological question.

Could Jesus be the Revealer of God and of Sonship with God and yet be under illusion as to the end of the world? Yes, because human life involves this ignorance, and the Son of God was made flesh. And yes, again, because the illusion was to Him the transparent veil of the certainty that the Righteous Father lived and reigned.

But what of the religion of the future? Must we not leave eschatology and put evolution in its place? No, because these are not alternatives. Evolution no more excludes eschatology than science excludes religion. No, again, because one cannot have religion without eschatology. To the religious man human history is not a mere spectacle. It is a work in which he is involved as a partner with God. It is the working out of God's purpose. And it must have an end, because God must fulfil Himself. Only, let our eschatology be a thing of dignity and freedom. Let it be reserved even when it speaks with effusion. Let it never be separated from the spirit of moral discipline and religious worship. Let it be 'in the spirit on the Lord's Day,' and go with Him to a height where we see more than 'all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them' because we see Him. Let it be 'a companion in tribulation' with the humblest of men and women, who are the servants of God and the redeemed of Jesus Christ. Fulfilling these conditions, it will recover (should it have lost it) the note of authority that is struck in the NT and attains such lofty expression in the Apocalypse of John. If we do not call this note science, it is because we must use a greater word and call it prophecy. The heart of Christian prophecy is the 'testimony of Jesus.' It is the confidence gained not from man but from God, that history has no other end than the reconciliation of sinful man to God through Jesus Christ, and the reign of holiness and love in their hearts. The 'Lamb' is also

* This point is clearly and admirably brought out in reference to our Lord in C. W. Emmet's article (Expositor, 8th ser. xxiii. [1912] 423) entitled, 'Is the Teaching of Jesus an Interim-ethik?'

* Loc. cit. in 1 Cor., also 2 Co 5<sup>1ff.</sup> 12<sup>1ff.</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>13ff.</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>1ff.</sup>

'the Lion of the tribe of Judah' who has prevailed to open the book of human destiny. 'John' used largely the language of primitive religious imagination to convey his prophecy, and who will say that in his hands the language has not shown itself fit? If the modern Christian prophet thinks he can do better with the language of evolution, let him put his belief to the test of experiment.

In its passage seawards, the river of life is joined by innumerable tributaries. But there is only one force of gravity, and only one main stream. The tributaries reach the ocean only by first reaching the main stream. There is something in God that is akin to everything that is human, yet it may well be that nothing human reaches the end or fulfilment of God—nothing, as 'John' might say, receives the 'crown of life' or finds its 'name written in the Lamb's book of life'—save through the channel of the sacrificial will and the heart of faith. These do not come by evolution or any involuntary process. They come through the travail of self-discipline and prayer and sympathy with our fellows. And, when they come, it is by vision and revelation. It may surely be claimed that the abiding and the loftiest witness to this in literature is the Apocalypse of John.

LITERATURE.—The handbooks, C. A. Scott's 'Revelation,' in the Century Bible, London, 1905, and F. C. Porter's The Messages of the Apocalyptic Writers, do. 1905, will be found (esp. the latter) extremely helpful. Of the larger commentaries may be mentioned: J. Moffatt (EGT); see esp. 'Literature' in the Introduction; Lücke-deWette, Bonn, 1852 (epoch-making for the modern method of interpretation); W. Bousset, Göttingen, 1906 ('Excursus' and history of the interpretation of the Apocalypse specially valuable); J. Weiss, in Schriften d. NT neu übersetzt u. für d. Gegenwart erklärt, do. 1908. For Biblical Eschatology may be noted: A. Titius, Die neueste Lehre von der Seligkeit, Tübingen, 1895–1900; E. Haupt, Die eschat. Aussagen Jesu in den syn. Evang., Berlin, 1895; and L. A. Muirhead, Eschatol. of Jesus, London, 1904 (the two last for the Gospels). For the Epistles of St. Paul: H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, do. 1904; R. Kabisch, Esch. d. Paulus, Göttingen, 1893. On Jewish Eschatology in general, see the great relative works of W. Bousset and P. Volz, and the still valuable work of A. Hilgenfeld, Die jüd. Apokalyptik, Jena, 1857. On the mythical groundwork of eschatology: H. Gunkel, Schöpfung u. Chaos, Göttingen, 1895; H. Gressmann, Der Ursprung der israel.-jüd. Eschatologie, do. 1905.

Readers of German will find readiest and fullest access to the texts of most of the extra-canonical apocalypses in the invaluable work, representing many scholars, Die Apokryphen u. Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments, 2 vols., ed. E. Kautzsch, Tübingen, 1900. The texts are given in German translations. There are critical introductions and notes.

LEWIS A. MUIRHEAD.

APOLLONIA (Ἀπολλωνία).—A town of Mygdonia in Macedonia, S. of Lake Bolbe (Athen. viii. 334), and N. of the Chalcidian mountains. It lay on the Via Egnatia, and St. Paul 'passed through' Amphipolis and Apollonia on his way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Ac 17<sup>1</sup>). The intermediate towns were probably remembered by him as resting-places. According to the Antonine Itinerary, Apollonia was 37 Roman miles from Amphipolis, and 37 from Thessalonica. Leake identifies it with the modern village of Pollina.

J. STRAHAN.

APOLLOS.—In Ac 18<sup>24, 25</sup> Apollos is described as 'a Jew, an Alexandrian by race, a learned man, mighty in the Scriptures, instructed in the way of the Lord, fervent in spirit,' who came to Ephesus when Aquila and Priscilla had been left there by St. Paul to do pioneering work pending the Apostle's return. Apollos 'spoke and taught carefully the things concerning Jesus'; but his knowledge of Jesus was limited, for he knew 'only the baptism of John.'

It is not easy to elucidate the meaning of the rather obscure phrases in 18<sup>25, 26</sup>. Schmiedel cuts the knot by making 18<sup>25c</sup>. 26<sup>bc</sup> later accretions. Wendt throws out the whole of v. 25, regarding Apollos as a Jew having no connexion with John or with Jesus. McGiffert is of opinion that the description of Apollos as 'instructed in the way of the Lord' and as teaching 'the things concerning Jesus' is erroneous; v. 25<sup>a</sup> must have been added by St. Luke. 'We are to think of Apollos as a disciple of John who was carrying on the work of his master and preaching to his countrymen repentance in view of the approaching kingdom of God' (Apostolic Age, 291 f.). Harnack says: 'Apollos would appear to have been originally a regular missionary of John the Baptist's movement; but the whole narrative of Acts at this point is singularly coloured and obscure' (Expansion of Christianity, i. 331 n.).

Without falling back on any of these somewhat contradictory explanations, we gather that Apollos had an imperfect hearsay acquaintance with the story of Jesus, though enough to convince him of His Messiahship. If the twelve men found in Ephesus by St. Paul (Ac 19<sup>1, 2</sup>) may be treated as disciples of Apollos, he had not heard 'whether the Holy Ghost was given.' His bold eloquence in the synagogue attracted Aquila and Priscilla (g.v.), who 'took him unto them and expounded the way of God more carefully.' This indefinite expression does not carry us very far. It seems unlikely that Apollos was baptized at Ephesus, for the twelve disciples are still ignorant of baptism, nor was there a Christian Church in Ephesus until after St. Paul's return later. In this connexion, the Western reading is interesting: that 'the brethren' who encouraged Apollos to go to Achaia were Corinthian Christians. Perhaps they recognized the need of fuller instruction than could be given in Ephesus for such a promising disciple, who was likely to become a powerful Christian teacher.

The work of Apollos in Corinth is described as 'helping them much which had believed through grace' (Ac 18<sup>27</sup>). St. Paul's mission must have left a number of uninstructed Christians in Corinth. These converts had been persuaded to 'believe through grace.' But the Christian life of some was undeveloped; and the powerful preaching of Apollos did much to help them.

This conception of the work of Apollos in Corinth is in accord with St. Paul's words in 1 Co 3<sup>6</sup>, 'I planted; Apollos watered.' It is justifiable also to recognize Apollos in St. Paul's reference to men who 'build on the foundation' he had laid (3<sup>11, 12</sup>), and to 'tutors in Christ' (4<sup>15</sup>) in contrast to himself as their 'father.' Evidently Apollos' work was not so much preaching the gospel to the unconverted as buttressing the faith of Christians, partly by an eloquent exposition of the OT, and partly by a powerful apologetic which silenced opponents and strengthened believers.

But this confirming work done by Apollos in Corinth had other effects which were less useful. It appears to have been influential in determining the subsequent character of the Church. Preaching to recent converts whose intellectual equipment was slender and whose Christian knowledge must have been elementary, Apollos, whose own instruction had been imperfect, would inevitably put the impress of his own mode of thinking upon them. Thus there arose a party in the Corinthian Church with the watch-word 'I am of Apollos.' Although some of these had been converted by St. Paul's preaching, they had been 'much helped' by Apollos. Under the influence of their 'tutor in Christ,' their interpretation of Christian truth and duty took on the hue of Apollos rather than of St. Paul.

The distinctive elements in the preaching of Apollos may be gauged from two considerations. (1) He was 'a Jewish Christian versed in the Alexandrian philosophy,' whose 'method of teaching differed from that of Paul, in the first place in being presented in a strikingly rhetorical form, and also by the use of Alexandrian speculation and allegorical interpretation of Scripture. . . . Apollos sought to reinforce the Gospel which was common to both [Paul and himself], by means of the Alexandrian philosophy and methods of exegesis' (Pfleiderer, i. 145 f.). It is questionable, however, whether the gospel he preached was in all respects 'common to both Paul and himself.' It cannot be without significance that St. Paul has to emphasize the work of the Holy Spirit so definitely as he does in 1 Cor. (cf. 2<sup>10-16</sup> 3<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>1-4</sup>). Apollos when he arrived in Ephesus did not know of the giving of the Holy Spirit. Even in Corinth his efforts were to show by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ (Ac 18<sup>28</sup>). It seems likely that his preaching had this Jewish tone all through, and lacked the spiritual note so dominant in St. Paul's preaching. It was not Judaistic; it was 'a middle term between Paulinism and Judaism' (Pfleiderer, i. 148).

The last NT reference to Apollos (Tit 3<sup>13</sup>) connects him with 'Zenas the lawyer,' probably a convert from the Jewish scribes. This confirms the idea that Apollos maintained a Hebraistic type of preaching, though his Alexandrian training differentiated him from the 'Judaizers' who pursued St. Paul so relentlessly. Apollos did not recognize that he was anti-Pauline. But the inevitable result of his preaching was to produce a different type of Christian from the type St. Paul desired.

(2) Despite Weizsäcker's disclaimer, some of the results of the teaching of Apollos can be recognized in those irregularities in the Corinthian Church to which St. Paul refers in 1 Corinthians. Would not his eloquence, his philosophical bent, and his reiterated emphasis on Jesus as the Christ, lead to imperfect conversions? And may not the preference for the gift of tongues, or the difficulties about marriage, be traced naturally to this eloquent ascetic? In Corinth, St. Paul resolved 'not to know anything save Christ, and him crucified' (1 Co 2-). Apollos was less conscious of the dangers of another mode of preaching; and his convincing eloquence might win converts who had not 'believed through grace.' This judgment is in harmony with St. Paul's references to Apollos. They scarcely justify the remark of Pfleiderer that St. Paul and Apollos were 'on the best of terms' (i. 146). The relations were correct, but hardly cordial. The two men were friendly; but they occupied different standpoints, and could not always agree. St. Paul was very anxious to avoid friction in Corinth. Therefore he wrote about 'the parties' in a conciliatory spirit, acknowledging generously the work of Apollos. In the same spirit, Apollos did not accept the invitation of the Corinthians (1 Co 16<sup>12</sup>). But there are hints that St. Paul did not reckon Apollos among the great Christian teachers. He is not mentioned among the founders of the Church in 2 Co 1<sup>9</sup>. In 1 Co 16<sup>12</sup> he is referred to only as 'the brother,' where other people's work is described with enthusiasm. St. Paul's references to his own preaching 'not in wisdom of words'; to 'wood, hay, stubble' as possibly built on the foundation he has laid; to 'ten thousand tutors in Christ' who may conceivably mislead: these are compatible at least with St. Paul's fear lest the work of Apollos might be somewhat subversive of his own. Then in Tit 3<sup>13</sup> St. Paul links Apollos with Zenas in a kindly spirit, but not as if he were an outstanding leader. Probably, whilst sincerely respecting each other, they recognized frankly the differences between them; and in a very creditable manner each man went on his own way. Like St. Paul, Apollos tried to avoid fomenting the party spirit in Corinth; and the NT leaves him in Crete, as a travelling preacher.

Several scholars favour the theory, suggested by Luther, that Apollos was the author of 'Hebrews.' Probably we must accept Bruce's summing up: 'Apollos is the kind of man wanted. With this we must be content' (HDB ii. 333<sup>a</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB and EBi on 'Apollos,' 'Corinth, 'Corinthians'; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 252, 267 ff.; O. Pfleiderer, Prim. Christianity, do. 1906, i. 145-160; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> [do. 1897] 319-322, ii. [1895] 97; A. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup>, do. 1908, i. 79; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 290 ff.; A. Wright, Some NT Problems, London, 1898, p. 309; A. Deane, Friends and Fellow-Labourers of St. Paul, do. 1907, p. 20; F. J. A. Hort, JThSt., Oct. 1905; and Schaff-Herzog, art. 'Apollos.' For authorship of 'Hebrews,' see Comm. on Heb. by M. Dods (EGT), 229, and art. in HDB on 'Hebrews, Epistle to.'

J. E. ROBERTS.

APOLLYON.—See ABADDON.

APOSTASY.—The Gr. word ἀποστασία (apostasia) is found twice in the NT, but in neither case does EV render 'apostasy.' In Ac 21<sup>21</sup> a charge is brought against St. Paul of teaching all the Jews who are among the Gentiles 'to forsake Moses' (lit. 'apostasy from Moses'). In 2 Th 2<sup>3</sup> St. Paul assures the Thessalonian disciples that the day of the Lord shall not come 'except the falling away (lit. 'the apostasy') come first, and the man of sin (marg., with better textual justification, 'lawlessness') be revealed.' It is sometimes assumed that the word 'first' indicates that the revelation of the 'man of sin' must be preceded in time by the apostasy (cf. art. MAN OF SIN, and HDB iii. 226); but the relation of v.<sup>2</sup> to v.<sup>3</sup> makes it more natural to understand 'first' as signifying that the apostasy and the revelation of the 'man of sin,' regarded as contemporaneous, must come before the day of the Lord. This is confirmed if we accept Nestle's contention (Expt xvi. [1904-1905] 472) that ἡ ἀποστασία in this passage should be taken as a translation of the Heb. בְּרִיַּתָּהּ (Belial [q.v.])—a rendering that occurs frequently in Aquila's version and also in 3 K 21<sup>13</sup> in the Cod. Alexandrinus. In any case the Apostle's reference is to the wide-spread expectation in the primitive Church (Mt 24<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>; cf. Dn 12<sup>11</sup>) that the return of Christ would be preceded by such a revelation of the power of the Antichrist (q.v.) as would lead to apostasy from the faith on the part of many professing Christians.

J. C. LAMBERT.

APOSTLE.—The term 'Apostle' (Gr. ἀπόστολος) is more definite than 'messenger' (Gr. ἄγγελος) in that the apostle has a special mission, and is the commissioner of the person who sends him. This distinction holds good both in classical and in biblical Greek. There is no good reason for doubting that the title 'apostle' was given to the Twelve by Christ Himself (Lk 6<sup>13</sup>=Mk 3<sup>14</sup>, where 'whom he also named apostles' is strongly attested). That the title was used in the first instance simply in reference to the temporary mission of the Twelve to prepare for Christ's own preaching is a conjecture which receives some support from the fact that, in the Apostolic Church, Barnabas and Paul are first called 'apostles' (Ac 14<sup>4, 14</sup>) when they are acting as envoys of the Church in Antioch in St. Paul's first missionary journey. On this hypothesis, the temporary apostleship, though not identical with the permanent office, was typical of it and preparatory to it (Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 28 f.).

There is fundamental agreement between the work of the apostles during Christ's ministry and their work after the Ascension: their functions undergo no radical change. But the changes are considerable. Christ chose them in the first instance (Mk 3<sup>14</sup>) 'that they might be with him,' to be educated and trained, 'and that he might send them forth to preach' and do works of mercy

Instruction is the main thing, and 'disciples' is the usual designation; mission work is secondary and temporary. After the Ascension their mission work becomes primary and permanent. Apostleship is now the main thing; in Acts 'apostles' is the dominant appellation, and in the Epistles 'disciples' are not mentioned. Instead of being led and guided, the Twelve now become leaders and guides; or rather, instead of having a visible Guide, they now have an invisible one—instead of Jesus, 'the Spirit of Jesus' (Ac 16<sup>7</sup>), who helps them to lead others. The guidance of the Spirit is the dominant idea in the Apostolic Church. Nevertheless, the other way of stating the change is true; they have become teachers rather than disciples. But the purpose is the same; their mission is unchanged. With enlarged experience, with powers greatly augmented at Pentecost, and with an enormously extended sphere of work, they have to make known the Kingdom of God. Cf. art. DISCIPLE.

This extension of sphere is one of the special marks of the transfigured apostleship. It is no longer restricted to 'the lost sheep of the house of Israel,' but is to embrace 'all the nations' throughout 'all the world.' The tentative mission to the inhabitants of Palestine at a peculiar crisis has become one which has no limitations of either space or time (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup> Ac 1<sup>8</sup>). But this universality of sphere was not the only or the most important characteristic of the new mission. The chief mark was the duty of bearing witness. The Twelve seem to have been selected originally because of their fitness for bearing witness. They were not specially qualified for grasping or expounding theological doctrines; nor were such qualifications greatly needed, for the doctrines which the Master taught them were few and simple. Yet they had difficulty in apprehending some of these, and sometimes surprised their Master by their inability to understand (Mk 7<sup>18</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 9<sup>3</sup>). But because of their simplicity they were very credible witnesses of what they had heard and seen. They had been men of homely circumstances, and their unique experiences as the disciples of Christ made a deep impression upon them, especially with regard to the hopeless sense of loss when He was put to death, and to the amazing recovery of joy when their own senses convinced them that He had risen again. They were thus well qualified to convince others. They evidently had not the wit to invent an elaborate story, or to retain it when it had been elaborated, and therefore what they stated with such confidence was likely to be true. They were chosen to keep alive and extend the knowledge of events that were of the utmost importance to mankind—the knowledge that Jesus Christ had died on the Cross, and had risen from the grave. That He had died and been buried was undisputed and indisputable; and all of them could testify that they had repeatedly seen Him alive after His burial. This was the primary function of an apostle—to bear witness of Christ's Resurrection (Ac 1<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>-33</sup>), and the influence of the testimony was enormous. The apostles did not argue; they simply stated what they knew. Every one who heard them felt that they were men who had an intense belief in the truth of what they stated. There is no trace in either Acts or the Epistles of hesitation or doubt as to the certainty of their knowledge; they knew that their witness was true (Jn 21<sup>24</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>1-3</sup>). And the confidence with which they delivered their testimony was communicated to those who heard it all the more effectually because, without any sign of collusion or conspiracy, they all told the same story. They differed in age, temperament, and ability, but they did not differ when they spoke of what they had seen and heard.

Nay, this still held good when one whom they had at first regarded with fear and suspicion (Ac 9<sup>26</sup>) was added to their company. Greatly as Saul of Tarsus differed from the Twelve in some things, he was entirely at one with them respecting fundamental facts. He, like them, had seen and heard the risen Christ (1 Co 9<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>8-11</sup>; Latham, Pastor Pastorum, 1890, pp. 228-230).

It was probably owing to St. Paul's persistent claim to be an apostle, equal in rank with the Twelve (Gal 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>1</sup>), that it became customary from very early times to restrict the appellation of 'apostle' to the Twelve and the Apostle of the Gentiles; but there is no such restriction in the NT. It is certainly given to Barnabas, but perhaps primarily as being an envoy from the Church of Antioch (Ac 13<sup>1,2</sup> 14<sup>14</sup>), rather than as having a direct mission from Christ. St. Paul seems to speak of him as a colleague, recognized by Peter and John as equal to himself in the mission to the Gentiles (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>), and as one who, like himself, used the apostolic privilege of working for nothing, although he had a right to maintenance (1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>). We need not doubt that Barnabas continued to be called an apostle in a general sense after the mission from Antioch was over.

Perhaps the simplest and most natural way of understanding Gal 1<sup>19</sup> is that James, the Lord's brother, had the title of 'apostle' in the wider sense. It may be regarded as certain that this James was not one of the Twelve. But 1 Co 15<sup>7</sup> ought not to be quoted as implying either that there was a company of apostles larger than the Twelve or that James was a member of this larger company. 'Next he appeared to James; then to the whole body of the apostles.' There is no emphasis on 'all,' implying an antithesis between 'to one, then to all.' Such an antithesis, as well as the idea that James was in some sense an apostle, is foreign to the context. The 'all' probably looks back to 'the twelve' in v. 10, which is an official and not a numerical designation, for only ten were there, Thomas and Judas being absent. 'Then to all the apostles' probably means that on that occasion the apostolic company was complete (for Thomas was present) rather than that some were there who were called apostles although they were not of the original Twelve. It is highly probable that James, the Lord's brother, was such a person, but 1 Co 15<sup>7</sup> ought not to be quoted as evidence of this. It is after the murder of James the son of Zebedee that James the Lord's brother comes on the scene. He may have taken the place of his namesake in the number of the Twelve.

That Silvanus and Timothy were regarded as apostles in the wider sense is not improbable. In both 1 and 2 Thess. they are associated with St. Paul in the address, and in both letters the first person plural is used with a regularity which is not found in any other group of the Pauline Epistles: 'our gospel,' i.e. 'the gospel which we apostles preach,' is specially remarkable (1 Th 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>). Still more remarkable is the casual addition, 'when we might have been burdensome as apostles of Christ' (1 Th 2<sup>6</sup>).

Ro 16<sup>7</sup> probably means that Andronicus and Junias were distinguished as apostles; but there are two elements of doubt: ἐπίσημοι ἐν τοῖς ἀποστόλοις might mean 'well known to the apostles,' but it more probably means that among the apostles they were illustrious persons; and Ἰουνίαν may be masc. or fem., Junius or Junia. If Junia is right, the probability that Andronicus and Junia (?man and wife) were distinguished members of the apostolic body is lessened. But Chrysostom does not shrink from the thought that a woman may be an apostle. He says that to be an apostle at all is a great thing, and therefore to be illustrious amongst such persons is very high praise; and 'how great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be even counted worthy of the appellation of apostle!' (Sanday-Headlam, ad loc.).

The fact that there were people who claimed, without any right, the title of 'apostle' (2 Co 11<sup>13</sup>, Rev 2<sup>2</sup>) amounts to proof that in the Apostolic Church there were 'apostles' outside the Twelve with the addition of St. Paul. It is incredible that there were people who claimed to belong to a body so well known as the Twelve, or any who tried to personate St. Paul; and 'it would be unprofitable to waste words on the strange theory that St. Paul is meant by these false apostles' (Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894, p. 163). Very soon, though not in the NT, the title of 'apostle' was given to the Seventy. It is not likely that Joseph Barsabbas and Matthias were the only persons among the 120 gathered together after the Ascension (Ac 1<sup>15</sup>) who had the apostolic qualification of having seen the Lord; probably most of them had been His personal disciples. All of those who took to missionary work would be likely to be styled 'apostles'; and it is not impossible that the 'false apostles' who opposed St. Paul had this qualification, and therefore claimed to have a better right to the title than he had.

The cumulative effect of the facts and probabilities stated above is very strong—so strong that we are justified in affirming that in the NT there are persons other than the Twelve and St. Paul who were called apostles, and in conjecturing that they were rather numerous. All who seemed to be called by Christ or the Spirit to do missionary work would be thought worthy of the title, especially such as had been in personal contact with the Master. When it is said that this reasonable affirmation, based entirely upon Scripture, is confirmed by the account in the Didache of an order of wandering preachers who were called 'apostles,' we must be careful not to exaggerate the amount of confirmation. There is no proof, and there is not a very high degree of probability, that the 'apostles' of the Didache are the same kind of ministers as those who are called 'apostles' in the NT, although not of the number of the Twelve. We must not infer that they are the lineal descendants, officially, of workers such as Silvanus, Andronicus, and Junias. But the fact that in the sub-Apostolic Age there were itinerant ministers called 'apostles' does give confirmation to the assertion that in the NT there were, outside the apostolic body, ministers who were known as 'apostles.' Chief among these were Paul, Barnabas, and James, of whom Paul certainly, and the other two probably, were regarded by most Christians as equal to the Twelve. Like the Twelve, Paul and Barnabas had no local ties: they retained a general authority over the churches which they founded, but they did not take up their abode in them as permanent rulers. They trained the churches to govern themselves. The Twelve are to be twelve Patriarchs of the larger Israel, twelve repetitions of Christ (Harnack, Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr., 1904-5, i. 72), and at first they were the whole ministry of the infant Church. The first act of the infant Church was to restore the typical number twelve by the election of Matthias; and it is worthy of note, as indicating both the undeveloped condition of the ministry and also the germs of future developments, that in Acts all three terms, 'diaconate' (1<sup>17-18</sup>), 'bishopric' (1<sup>20</sup>), and 'apostleship' (1<sup>25</sup>), are used in connexion with the election of Matthias. There is no good ground for the conjecture that the choice of Matthias did not receive subsequent sanction, that he was set aside, and that St. Paul was Divinely appointed to take his place. It is true that he subsequently falls into the background and is lost from sight; but so do most of the Twelve.

The absence from Christ's teaching of any statement respecting the priesthood of the Twelve, or respecting the transmission of the powers of the Twelve to others, is remarkable. As the primary function of the Twelve was to be witnesses of what Christ had taught and done, especially in rising from the dead, no transmission of so exceptional an office was possible. Even with regard to the high authority which all apostles possessed, it is not clear that it was a jurisdiction which was to be passed on from generation to generation. Belief in the speedy return of Christ would prevent any such intention. The apostles were commissioned to found a living Church, with power to supply itself with ministers and to organize them.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works already cited, see J. B. Lightfoot, Galatians, ed. 1892, pp. 92-101; E. Haupt, Zum Verständnis des Apostolats im NT, Halle, 1896; H. Monnier, La Notion de l'apostolat, Paris, 1903; P. Batiffol, L'Eglise naissante, do. 1909, pp. 46-68; also art. 'Apostle,' in HDB, DCG, EB, and EBR<sup>11</sup>. ALFRED PLUMMER.

APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS AND CANONS.—

This work (of the 4th or 5th cent. A.D., but based on more ancient materials) is divided into eight books, dealing, in rambling and hortatory fashion, with the problems of church life and discipline. The chief interest of its contents lies in the miscellaneous information afforded regarding the customs of an early period; the theological leanings, if definitely present at all, are difficult to determine; the copious Scripture quotations often support 'Western' readings. At the end of the eighth book come 85 'Apostolic Canons,' which have attracted special attention.

The claim made by its title (Διατάγαι τῶν ἁγίων ἀποστόλων διὰ Κλήμεντος τοῦ Ῥωμαίων ἐπισκόπου τε καὶ πολιτοῦ. Καθολικὴ διδασκαλία) is re-stated in the conclusion and amplified in vi. 14, 18: 'We now assembled, Peter and Andrew, James and John, Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, James the son of Alphæus, and Lebbæus who is surnamed Thaddæus, and Simon the Canaanite, and Matthias who instead of Judas was numbered with us, and James the brother of our Lord and bishop of Jerusalem, and Paul . . . and have written to you this catholic doctrine [which] we have sent by our fellow-minister Clement.' The direct authority of Christ is also adduced in ii. 1: 'Concerning bishops we have heard from our Lord'; and in v. 7: 'We teach you all these things which He appointed by His constitutions.' The collective apostolic authorship is recalled to the reader's mind from time to time by casual phrases such as 'we twelve,' 'Philip our fellow-apostle'; while by a curious device, from time to time, without any break in the discourse, one or other of the apostles takes the word out of the common mouth and speaks in his own name, especially at points where the reference is to his personal experience; as ii. 57: 'Read the gospels which I, Matthew and John, have delivered unto you,' and v. 14: 'I arose up from lying in His bosom.' Near the end the apostles in turn each deliver one or more 'constitutions.'

For any modern reader a cursory glance will dispose of these claims. The detailed injunctions about ordinations and festivals, the triumphant proof of the possibility of the Resurrection by a reference to the phoenix, do not strike the apostolic note; and it is easy to remark definite points such as the reference to the heresy of Basilides (vi. 8), and the conversion of the Romans (vi. 24), which show the suggestion of the title to be unwarranted. The author, however, found the apostolic claim made in the sources he used; his own contribution to the fiction is the assertion that Clement was the channel of communication.

In 692 the Trullan Council of Constantinople repudiated the 'Constitutions' as having been tampered with by heretics, but accepted the 85 Canons; while, although in the Gelasian Decree they are called apocryphal, Dionysius Exiguus (c. A.D. 500) had translated 50 of the Canons into Latin, and thus these 50 obtained acceptance in the West. The 85 Canons were translated into Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, Arabic; and, though the 'Constitutions' was not translated as a whole, and, in the West, remained unknown, we find Nicetas (A.D. 1154) quoting books v. vi. vii. in his book contra Latinos. After the first publication of the Greek text at Venice, in 1563, by the Jesuit Turrianus from a good Cretan MS, the spuriousness of their authority soon came to be recognized. The convenient edition of W. Ülzen (Schwerin and Rostock, 1853) is based on this text.

Modern criticism, it may be said summarily, has shown that the 'Apostolic Constitutions' is a compilation made by a single writer, often referred to as pseudo-Clement, who seems identifiable with the author of the spurious Ignatian epistles; that it is of Syrian origin, and that it must be dated in the 4th or early in the 5th century. One leading consideration is the absence of a polemical theological note, which demands a period sufficiently subsequent to the Council of Nicæa (A.D. 325). Interest is thus transferred to the task of distinguishing the older materials present, and tracing in them, and in the modifications made by the compiler, and by still later hands (especially in book viii., which, being most in practical use, was subject to current alteration), the flux of ecclesiastical usages—a task in which the Church historian still waits to some extent for the textual critic.

Books i.–vi. are based on the Didascalia, a book originally written in Greek, but known only through a single MS of the Syriac version, now in Paris, published as Didascalia apostolorum syriace by P. Lagarde (Leipzig, 1854), by M. D. Gibson with Eng. tr. in Horæ Semitice, i., ii. (Cambridge, 1903), by H. Achelis in TU xxv. 2 [1904]. This document is to be placed in Syria about the middle of the 3rd century. It contemplates a large city-church attended by all sorts and conditions, conscious of the gulf between Christians and pagans, yet apparently neither persecuted nor unpopular. After some general exhortations to men and women, the subject of the bishop and his duties is treated in detail. Remarkable emphasis is laid on a ready and kindly reception of the penitent. We hear of Church courts for civil cases between Christian disputants, which are to meet on Monday, so that feeling may be cooled before the days of worship. The church building lies eastwards—in the direction of the earthly Paradise—and is arranged with special seats for the Presbytery and the different sexes and ages in the congregation. Deacons, sub-deacons, deaconesses, widows, orphans, martyrs, readers, are mentioned as special classes. By a strange chronology of the Passion, a foundation is offered for Easter regulations evidently requiring defence, whether as new or as in conflict with neighbouring custom. There are some Jewish-Christian members, and at the close these are specially addressed. The style throughout is homiletic, with copious citations from Scripture. A short account of this book is given in Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup> (tr. Moffatt, London, 1908), ii. 157, 158.

The work of the compiler of the 'Constitutions' is seen in the additional Scripture references, moral reflexions and exhortations. He makes, for example, an unhappily conceived attempt at an elaborate analogy between a well-arranged church and a ship, the deacons being the sailors, the congregation passengers, and so forth. He revises the account of the Passion referred to, in the interests of the shorter fast of his day (v. 14). He boldly reverses the direction to follow the Jewish computation for Easter (ib. 17). He refers to the Roman adoption of Christianity (vi. 24), where instead the Didascalia mentions persecution.

Book vii. consists of an amplification of the Didache (q.v.) with modifications. An injunction to fear the king (ch. 16) and pay taxes willingly is inserted. The permission of warm water at baptism is omitted (ch. 20). The rule about weekly fast-days is taken to apply to the Easter fast. The connexion of Eucharist with Agape, apparent in the Didache, is avoided. A number of liturgical forms are appended, among which the baptismal symbol in ch. 41 has been doubtfully attributed to Lucian of Antioch—a suggestion which might, as Achelis points out, connect the 'Constitutions' with his congregation. For a comparison of book vii. with the Didache see Harnack, 'Didache,' in TU ii. 2 [1884], and art. DIDACHE below.

Behind book viii. are various sources. The first two paragraphs are thought by Achelis to be founded on Hippolytus' lost work περί χαρισμάτων. After there treating of the diversity of spiritual gifts, the writer goes on to 24 chapters, in which the apostles, gathered in council, deliver singly, in turn, 'constitutions' concerning the choice and ordination of bishops and other officers; concerning presbyters, deacons, sub-deacons, readers, widows, exorcists, and their functions; concerning tithes and offerings, the reception of catechumens, holy days, church services and prayers. The main source is thought to be the 'Egyptian Church Order,' originally in Greek, but known through its Coptic and Ethiopic versions, this in turn being based upon the 'Canons of Hippolytus' (c. A.D. 220). Both of these may be compared with the 'Constitutions' in TU vi. 4 [1891], pp. 39–136. The dependence of the 'Constitutions' on these Canons, though not noted in the complete MSS (unless, indeed, the old conjecture were revived that in the title, after Κλήμεντος . . . ἐπίσκοπου should be read καὶ Ἰππολύτου, instead of τε καὶ πολίτου), is pointed out by the title Διατάξεις τῶν ἀγίων ἀποστόλων περί χειροτονιῶν διὰ Ἰππολύτου, in excerpts from book viii. Whether, however, the 'Egyptian Church Order' needs to be inserted as a link between book viii. and the 'Canons of Hippolytus' has been disputed.

The most noteworthy sections of book viii. are those containing a complete liturgy for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The catechumens, hearers, unbelievers, and heterodox are to depart. Mothers are to 'receive' their children—that is, to keep them quiet, else they would continue straying to and fro between the women's seats and their fathers, as may still be seen in Eastern Christian worship. Two deacons are to fan away flies from the cups. The high priest consecrates, the service proceeds with responses and prayers. First the bishop, then the presbyters and deacons partake, and then the people, who after further prayer are dismissed with the benediction 'Depart in peace.' To the older source the compiler of the 'Constitutions' adds that the high priest puts on 'his shining garment' and crosses himself; and, after the deacons, adds a long list of classes of partakers, ending with the children; and orders Ps 33 to be said while the distribution takes place.

In comparison with its sources, book viii. shows a hardening of ecclesiastical rule, e.g. in the decision that a confessor must not on any account be dispensed from the need of being ordained if he proceeds to office. A still later change is seen in the suppression of all mention of porters in this book. This cannot be due to pseudo-Clement, for he names them in the preceding books; when they had disappeared in practice, the references must have been deleted from the familiar book viii., but left unnoticed elsewhere.

The 85 'Canons' at the end of book viii. gained, as we have seen, a partly independent currency: 20 are derived from the Synod of Antioch (A.D. 341); at least 24 repeat regulations from the 'Constitutions'; the others are likelier to be taken from various sources than to be original inventions. They are to be put a little later than the 'Constitutions.' The most remarkable is that which enumerates the canonical books of Scripture, omitting the Apocalypse from the NT canon, but inserting the two epistles of Clement and the 'Apostolic Constitutions,' and, after this audacity, with an artistic touch modestly placing 'the Acts of us Apostles' at the bottom of the list.

Other matters contained in the 'Apostolic Constitutions' may be briefly noticed. In the 'bidding prayers' in book viii. a touching light is thrown on the composition of the Church by the reference to those in bitter servitude (viii. 10; cf. the instruction to admit a slave concubine to membership if faithful to her master [ib. 32]). A different aspect of affairs is revealed by the list in iv. 6 of those whose gifts should not be received—adulterers, cruel employers, idol-makers, thieves, unjust publicans, drunkards, usurers. A strange piece of advice follows—that, if such contributions have to be taken, they shall be expended in fuel for the needy rather than in food, as the putrid sacrificial meat is ordered in Lv 19<sup>6</sup> to be burnt.

The transition from 'Sabbath' (Saturday) to 'the Lord's day' (Sunday) as the day of worship is seen in process. Book ii. 36 enjoins observance of Sabbath; in ch. 47 the language suggests both days, although the thought has in view perhaps only one; ch. 59 shows the hesitancy of a time of change, saying first 'principally on the Sabbath,' then 'on the Lord's day meet more diligently.' Bk. v. 20 enjoins both days; vii. 23 enjoins first both, then says 'there is one only Sabbath to be observed in the whole year,' that before Easter, as a fast, for then Christ was in the tomb. Book viii. 33 enjoins rest for slaves on both days. As regards other holy days, Christmas, Epiphany, Holy Week, are mentioned (v. 14, 15); further, Pentecost and St. Stephen's Day (viii. 33).

Baptism ritual is elaborate. Before and after immersion there is anointing. Presbyters can baptize, though not ordain (iii. 10, 11). Deaconesses are useful, especially in the baptism of women (ib. 15). Canon 50 orders trine immersion.

The bishop is to be ordained by two or three bishops after he is chosen by the people, who are to be repeatedly asked for their consent to procedure (viii. 4). A chief duty of his, requiring acuteness and tact and honour, is the charge of the almsgiving (ii. 4). Exorcists are recognized as doing good work, though they are not to be ordained.

In public worship (ii. 57) the bishops and presbyters sit, the deacons stand near, the congregation are seated according to age and sex, children may stand beside their parents. Deacons walk about to check whispering, laughing, or sleeping. Lessons from the historical and poetical books of the OT respectively are followed by a Psalm sung solo, the congregation joining 'at the conclusions of the verses'; then comes a lesson from the Acts or Epistles, and after this all stand at the reading of the Gospel. If visiting bishops, presbyters, or deacons are present, they are to be recognized as such, and, especially visiting bishops, are to be asked to speak. There is daily morning and evening service (ii. 59, viii. 34, 35), and temptation both to neglect it and to attend heathen and Jewish services.

Curiosities of thought and diction are: warnings to males against dressiness—they may thus snare the frail fair (i. 3); warnings to women not to paint the face, 'which is God's workmanship' (ib. 8); the reason in favour of secrecy in almsgiving, that thus comparisons and grumbling are prevented among the recipients (iii. 14); an elaborate comparison of spiritual and physical healing (ii. 41), which gives a vivid picture of contemporary medicine and surgery, at least as it appeared to the author's imagination:

'If it be a hollow wound or great gash, nourish it with a suitable plaster; . . . if foul, cleanse with corrosive powder, that is, words of reproof; if it have proud flesh, eat it down with a sharp plaster—threats of judgment; if it spreads, cut off the putrid flesh; . . . but if there is no room for a fomentation, or oil, or bandage, then, with a great deal of consideration, and the advice of other skilful physicians, cut off the putrefied member, that the whole church be not corrupted. . . . Be not hasty with the saw, but first try lancing.'

A quaint story is told by Peter (vi. 8 f.) about Simon Magus, who, to recommend his heresies, flew in the air in a Roman theatre supported by demons, till Peter exorcized them and Simon fell and broke his legs, whereupon the people cried out: 'There is only one God, and Peter rightly preaches the truth.'

LITERATURE.—In addition to the references already given, full notes will be found in H. Achelis' valuable art. 'Apostol. Konstitutionen u. Kanones' in PRE<sup>3</sup> i. [1896]. The 'Ante-Nicene Library' (vol. xvii.) contains an Eng. translation. See also the notices in A. Harnack, Gesch. der altchristlichen Literatur, pt. i. [Leipzig, 1893]; A. J. Maclean, Recent Discoveries illustrating Early Christian Life and Worship, London, 1904; W. E. Collins, art. 'Apostol. Constitutions' in EB<sup>11</sup> ii. [1910].

R. W. STEWART.

APPEAL.—See TRIAL-AT-LAW.

APPEARING.—See PAROUSIA.

APPHIA (in some MSS and VSS Aphphia or Appia).—A Christian lady of Colossæ, designated by St. Paul (Philem<sup>2</sup>) as 'sister' (ἀδελφή, so N ADE), in the Christian sense. AV, following inferior MS testimony, substitutes 'beloved' (ἀγαπητή); some MSS have both words. Grotius regards the name as a softened and hellenized form of the Latin Appia; but Lightfoot (Col. and Philem.<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 306) and Zahn (Introd. to NT, 1909, i. 458) show that the name is Phrygian and is found in numerous ancient Phrygian inscriptions.

Most commentators (following Chrysostom and Theodoret) regard Apphia as Philemon's wife, since otherwise her name either would not have been introduced at all in a private letter, or at least would have been put after the name of Archippus (q.v.), who was an office-bearer. As the wife of Philemon, Apphia would have some claim to be consulted in such a matter as the forgiveness and emancipation of a slave. The possibility, however, of her being the sister (literally) of Philemon is not grammatically excluded if the reading 'sister' be accepted.

The ancient Greek Martyrology represents Apphia (along with Philemon) as suffering martyrdom under Nero on Nov. 22 (see Meneæ for November).

LITERATURE.—See under PHILEMON. HENRY COWAN.

APPI FORUM.—See APPIUS, MARKET OF.

APPIUS, MARKET OF (Ἀππίου φόρον, Ac 28<sup>15</sup>; AV Appii Forum).—A town on the Via Appia, the usual resting-place for travellers from Rome at the end of the first day's journey, though Horace says of himself and his companion: 'Hoc iter ignavi divisimus' (Sat. i. v. 5). The site of the town is marked by considerable ruins, near the modern railway station of Foro Appio, where the 43rd ancient milestone is still preserved. It was the northern terminus of a canal (fossa), which extended, parallel with the line of road, through the Pomptine marshes as far as the neighbourhood of Tarracina. Strabo says that travellers from the South usually sailed up the canal by night, 'embarking in the evening, and landing in the morning to travel the rest of their journey by road' (v. iii. 6). Pliny mentions Appii Forum among the municipal towns of Latium (III. v. 9). Horace (loc. cit. 4-15) sets down his vivid recollections of a place 'crammed full of boatmen and extortionate tavern-keepers,' where 'the water was utterly bad,' where at night 'the slaves bantered the boatmen and the boatmen the slaves,' where 'troublesome mosquitoes and marsh frogs' kept sleep from his eyes. St. Paul and St. Luke remembered it gratefully as the first of two places—Tres Tabernæ (see THREE TAVERNS), 10 miles further north, being the other—whither brethren came from Rome to greet them and escort them on their way. J. STRAHAN.

APRON.—The word σικκίνηθια (pl.), a modified form of the Latin semicinctia, occurs only in Ac 19<sup>1</sup>, where it is translated 'aprons,' and placed in an alternative relation to σινδάρια (see HANDKERCHIEF). The two articles are not to be identified. The σικκίνηθιον is, as the derivation suggests, a half-girdle, or forecloth; not an essential of dress, like the girdle itself, but an accessory, worn by artisans and slaves for protection of their clothes during work. Presumably the material was linen or cotton. Still there is some doubt as to its precise nature (see L. S. Potwin, Here and There in the Greek New Testament, New York, 1898, p. 169, where a parallel from Martial, xiv. 151 ff. is quoted).

It is not said that the aprons were the property of St. Paul; but, judging from the word used for body (αὐτὸ τοῦ χιτῶνος), this is not impossible. The deduction has been made that he used them in pursuing his craft as a tentmaker. All that was needed, however, was that the articles should have touched his person, and thereafter those suffering from disease (cf. Lk 8<sup>44</sup>). For the usage, and belief underlying, cf. Ac 5<sup>15</sup>, and for modern instances, HDB (s.v.), and S. I. Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion To-Day, London, 1902, p. 91 f.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

AQUILA AND PRISCILLA (or PRISCA).*—The references to this husband and wife are Ac 18, Ro 16<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>, and 2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>. These passages suggest that Aquila and Priscilla were, in St. Paul's eyes, people of importance in the early Church, though ecclesiastical tradition has little to say about them. The careful description of Aquila as 'a Jew, a man of Pontus by race' (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>), rather implies that Priscilla his wife was not a Jewess; because her name is usually put first, it is thought that she was of higher social standing than her husband. Evidence has been offered by de Rossi that Priscilla was a well-connected Roman lady. Discussing this evidence, Sanday and Headlam suggest that both Aquila and Priscilla 'were freedmen of a member of the Acilian gens' (Romans<sup>5</sup>, 420). But they admit the possibility of Priscilla being 'a member of some distinguished Roman family.' Ramsay strongly urges this theory, and it explains much in the story—their social position, their command of money, their influence in Rome, their freedom from Jewish prejudices, etc. Another explanation of why Priscilla's name comes first may be that she was the more vigorous and intelligent Christian worker. Thus Harnack describes them as 'Prisca the missionary, with her husband Aquila' (Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup>, i. 79).

Aquila and Priscilla came from Italy to Corinth, 'because Claudius had commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome' (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>). Suetonius says the expulsion was caused by a series of disturbances 'due to the action of Chrestus' (Claud. 25); i.e. Christian ferment was one cause of the edict. It is probable, therefore, that Aquila and Priscilla had been influenced in Rome by Christian teaching, though it cannot be decided whether they were already converts to Christianity. For this reason they were compelled to leave the country, though the edict was not rigidly enforced on all Jews. Priscilla accompanied her Jewish husband to Corinth, where they followed their trade as tent-makers. They seem always to have been able to maintain a fair position, for their house was a meeting-place for the Church both in Ephesus and in Rome. Probably, then, they were people of considerable means, though their expulsion from Rome limited their resources for a time. Comradeship in trade is given as the reason why St. Paul lodged with Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth; but their favourable attitude to Christianity must have been a strong inducement on both sides. Under St. Paul's influence they became not only earnest Christians, but also enthusiastic helpers of the Apostle. Writing to the Corinthian Church in after years, the Apostle says: 'Aquila and Priscilla greet you much in the Lord' (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>). This is a warm personal greeting, in the way not merely of friendship but of love and service to Christ—a suitable greeting from those who had helped St. Paul to found the Church.

* St. Luke uses the form Priscilla (in Acts), St. Paul the form Prisca (in his Epistles).

When St. Paul went to Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla went with him and remained there to do pioneer work whilst he visited Jerusalem. They shrank from the responsibility, and wanted the Apostle to remain (Ac 18<sup>9</sup>). But he urged them to stay, promising to return. So the initial work in Ephesus was done by Aquila and Priscilla. They tried to prepare the ground before St. Paul returned, and to sow the seed of Christian teaching as far as they were able. During this time Apollos (q.v.) came to Ephesus, with his imperfect apprehension of Christianity. Aquila and Priscilla admired his learning and his earnestness; and, recognizing that such a man must either be a strong supporter of the cause or an influential opponent, they did their best to instruct him more carefully (Ac 18<sup>26</sup>). Subsequent events throw doubt on the ability of this couple, who were themselves recent converts, to educate the eloquent Alexandrian in the Pauline interpretation of the gospel. Would not his presence overshadow Aquila and Priscilla, tending to make their work more difficult? The elementary and even chaotic state of things in Ephesus at this period is shown by the incident of the twelve men 'knowing only the baptism of John' whom St. Paul found when he returned to the city (Ac 19<sup>15</sup>). As nothing is said about the baptism of Apollos, and as the twelve men 'had not heard whether the Holy Spirit was given,' it seems unlikely that there had been any Christian baptism in Ephesus before St. Paul came to superintend the work. Nevertheless, Aquila and Priscilla seem to have fulfilled their mission with skill and courage; and, when a Church was gathered, the members met in their house (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>). This may explain their presence in Rome when the Epistle to the Romans was written. As St. Paul left them in Ephesus to do pioneering work, so he seems to have sent them to Rome to prepare the way for his coming there. The decree of expulsion was not enforced permanently; their connexion with a leading Roman family made it more possible for them to return to Rome than for Jews with no influence; whilst their knowledge of the city, their social standing, as well as their experience in Corinth and in Ephesus, with their devotion to himself, fitted them pre-eminently for such work as St. Paul contemplated.

The recognition of the social position of this devoted couple, and of their valuable pioneering work, invests them with special interest as having assisted St. Paul in his missionary labours in a unique way. Their devotion to the Apostle was signalized in some remarkable fashion, apparently when he was in danger. His description of them as 'my fellow-workers in Christ Jesus, who for my life laid down their own necks; unto whom not only I give thanks but also all the churches of the Gentiles' (Ro 16<sup>34</sup>), sets them side by side with the Apostle. They have laboured along with him in a pre-eminent manner, and have attested their worth as independent workers (cf. Weizsäcker, i. 394). 'They furnish the most beautiful example known to us in the Apostolic Age of the power for good that could be exerted by a husband and wife working in unison for the advancement of the Gospel' (McGiffert, 428).

The references to Aquila and Priscilla have been used as arguments against the historicity of parts of Acts and in favour of treating Ro 16 as not part of that Epistle. But the two reasons relied on are not strong enough to carry the conclusions. It is supposed that both were Jews (so Weizsäcker, McGiffert; cf. Lightfoot on Phil.<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 16)—though Priscilla was probably a Roman; and their migratory life is fully explained if they were people of means, who became enthusiastic helpers in St. Paul's missionary labours, and whom he selected to do pioneering work in Ephesus and in Rome. In particular their return to Ephesus at a later period (2 Ti 4<sup>19</sup>) is quite comprehensible. Not only would they have trade connexions with the city, but also their presence would be specially welcome because they had been actually the founders of the Church.

Aquila and Priscilla have been selected by some scholars as likely authors of 'Hebrews.' Harnack has argued strongly for this suggestion, and Rendel Harris favours it. M. Dodds says: 'All that we know of Aquila seems to fit the conditions as well as any name that has been suggested' (Com. on 'Hebrews' [EGT], 234). It has to be said, however, that the suggestion implies a closer intimacy with Judaism than seems likely in their case. The influence of the Roman wife probably preponderated over the Jewish influence of the husband. They were not Christians of the Judaistic type, but cordial workers on Pauline lines among Gentiles. At the same time, the discussion of a Jew's difficulties by such a vigorous mind as Priscilla possessed may have qualified Aquila to write 'Hebrews' with his wife's help. It is a question, however, whether their authorship would harmonize with the independent use of Pauline thoughts characteristic of the Epistle (cf. Expositor, 8th ser., v. 371 ff.).

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB on 'Aquila,' 'Priscilla,' 'Corinth,' 'Corinthians'; in EBi (by Schmiedel) on 'Acts' and 'Aquila'; and in Schaff-Herzog on 'Aquila'; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, Edinburgh, 1902, Introd. § 3, and p. xl, also pp. 418-420; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 253 ff., 267 ff.; A. Harnack, Expansion of Christianity<sup>2</sup>, do. 1908, i. 75 and 79; C. v. Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> [do. 1897] 307 ff.; O. Pfeiderer, Primitive Christianity, i. [do. 1906] 246; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, pp. 273, 427 f.; EGT, 'Hebrews,' Introd. p. 228, 'Acts of Apostles,' p. 383, 'Romans,' pp. 560, 718 f.

J. E. ROBERTS.

ARABIA.—Arabia (Ἀραβία, from אַרַב), which now denotes the great peninsula lying between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, was in ancient times a singularly elusive term. Originally it meant simply 'desert' or 'desolation,' and when it became an ethnographic proper name it was long in acquiring a fixed and generally understood meaning. 'Arabia' shifted like the nomads, drifted like the desert sand. It did not denote a country whose boundaries could be defined by treaty, shown by landmarks, and set down in a map. Too vast and vague for delimitation, it impressed the imagination like the steppe, the prairie, or the veldt, while it had a character and history of its own. To the settled races of Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine, it meant any part of that hinterland, skirting the confines of civilization, which was the camping-ground of wandering tribes for ever hovering around peaceful towns and spreading terror among their inhabitants. It was the dim border region, not so wholly unproductive as to be incapable of supporting life, interposed between cultivation and the sheer wilderness. So uncertain was the application of the term, that there was no part of the semi-desert fringe extending from the lower Tigris to the lower Nile which was not at one time or another called Arabia. To the prophets of Israel the word had one meaning, on Persian inscriptions another, and to Greek writers (Herod. ii. and iii.; Xenophon, i. v. 1, vii. viii. 25) still another. Every one used it to denote that particular hinterland whose tribes and peoples were more or less known to him; that was his Arabia.

But by the 3rd cent. B.C. the Arab tribe of the Nabatæans had become a powerful nation, with Petra as their capital, and from that time onward Arabia began to be identified, especially in the Western mind, with the Nabatæan kingdom. While 1 Mac. still distinguishes the Nabatæans from other Arabs (5<sup>25</sup> 9<sup>35</sup>), 2 Mac. speaks of Aretas, the hereditary king of the Nabatæans, as 'king of the Arabs' (5<sup>8</sup>). In the time of Josephus this people 'inhabited all the country from the Euphrates to the Red Sea' (Ant. i. xii. 4). Soon after taking possession of Judæa, the Romans sent an expedition, under Marcus Scaurus, against the Nabatæans (59 B.C.); and, though their subjugation was not accomplished at that time, it must have taken place not much later. From the days of Augustus the kings of the Arabians were as much subject to the Empire as Herod, king of the Jews, and they had the whole region between Herod's dominions and the desert assigned to them. To the north 'their territory reached as far as Damascus, which was under their protection, and even beyond Damascus, and enclosed as with a girdle the whole of Palestinian Syria' (Mommson, Provinces<sup>2</sup>, Lond. 1909, ii. 148 f.). The Arabians who were present at the first Christian Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>11</sup>) were most likely Nabatæans, possibly from Petra.

The Nabatæan kings made use of Greek official designations, and St. Paul relates how 'the governor' (ὁ ἐθνάρχης) of Damascus 'under Aretas the king' was foiled in the attempt, probably made at the instigation of the Jews, to put him under arrest soon after his conversion (2 Co 11<sup>34</sup>). This episode, which has an important bearing on the chronology of St. Paul's life, raises a difficult historical problem. Damascene coins of Tiberius indicate that the city was under direct Roman government till A.D. 34; and, as the legate of Syria was engaged in hostilities with Aretas till the close of the reign of Tiberius, it is very unlikely that this emperor yielded up Damascus to the Nabatæan king. But the accession of Caligula brought a great change, and the suggestion is naturally made that he bought over Aretas by ceding Damascus to him. The fact that no Damascene coins bearing the Emperor's image occur in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius is in harmony with this theory (Schurer, HJP i. ii. 357 f.). The view of Mommson (Provinces<sup>2</sup>, ii. 149), following Marquardt (Rom. Staatsverwaltung, Leipzig, 1885, i. 405), is different. Talking of the voluntary submission of the city of Damascus to the king of the Nabatæans, he says that 'probably this dependence of the city on the Nabatæan kings subsisted so long as there were such kings (i.e. from the beginning of the Roman period till A.D. 106). From the fact that the city struck coins with the heads of the Roman emperors, there follows doubtless its dependence on Rome and therewith its self-administration, but not its non-dependence on the Roman vassal-prince; such protectorates assumed shapes so various that these arrangements might well be compatible with each other.' See, further, ARETAS.

In the Galatian Epistle (1<sup>17</sup>) St. Paul states that after his escape from Damascus he 'went away into Arabia,' evidently for solitary communion with God; but he does not further define the place of his retreat, and Acts makes no allusion to this episode. When he quitted the city under cover of darkness, he had not a long way to flee to a place of safety, for the desert lies in close proximity to the Damascene oasis. Possibly he went no further than the fastnesses of Hauran. Lightfoot (Gal. 87 f.), Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, Lond. 1877, p. 50), and others conjecture that he sought the solitude of Mt. Sinai, with which he seems to show some acquaintance in the same Epistle (Gal 4<sup>25</sup>). But he could scarcely have avoided specific reference to so memorable a journey, which would have brought him into a kind of spiritual contact with Moses and Elijah. Besides, the peninsula of Sinai was about 400 miles from Damascus; and, as military operations were being actively carried on by the legate of Syria against Aretas in A.D. 37—the probable year of St. Paul's conversion—it would scarcely have been possible for a stranger to pass through the centre of the perturbed country without an escort of soldiers.

In A.D. 106 the governor of Syria, Aulus Cornelius Palma, broke up the dominion of the Nabataean kings, and constituted the Roman province of Arabia, while Damascus was added to Syria. For the whole region the change was epoch-making.

'The tendency to acquire these domains for civilisation and specially for Hellenism was only heightened by the fact that the Roman government took upon itself the work. The Hellenism of the East . . . was a church militant, a thoroughly conquering power pushing its way in a political, religious, economic, and literary point of view' (Mommson, op. cit. ii. 152).

Under the strong new régime the desert tribes were for the first and only time brought under control, with the result that no small part of 'the desert' was changed into 'the sown.' 'Rome won the nomads to her service and fastened them down in defence of the border they had otherwise fretted and broken. . . . Behind this Roman bulwark there grew up a curious, a unique civilisation talking Greek, imitating Rome, but at heart Semitic' (G. A. Smith, HGHL, London, 1894, p. 627).

LITERATURE.—E. Schürer, HJP i. ii. 345 ff.; J. Euting, Nabataische Inschriften aus Arabien, Berlin, 1885; H. Vincent, Les Arabes en Syrie, Paris, 1907; G. A. Cooke, North-Semitic Inscriptions, London, 1903; and the art. 'Arabs (Ancient),' by Th. Nöldeke, in ERE i. 659. JAMES STRAHAN.

ARAMAIC.—See LANGUAGE.

ARATUS.—See QUOTATIONS.

ARCHANGEL.—See ANGEL.

ARCHIPPUS (Ἀρχιππος).—An office-bearer of the Apostolic Church referred to in Col 4<sup>17</sup> as exercising a ministry 'in the Lord,' i.e. in fellowship with, and in the service of, Christ. He is addressed by St. Paul as 'fellow-soldier'—a designation possibly occasioned by some special service in which the two had been engaged together during St. Paul's three years' abode at Ephesus, where the Apostle had severe conflicts with assailants (1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>). More probably, however, the expression refers to the general fellowship of the two men in evangelistic work (cf. Ph 2<sup>25</sup>). The military figure may have been suggested by the Apostle's environment at Rome.

Archippus may have been a presbyter bishop, a leading deacon, an evangelist, or a prominent teacher at the time when St. Paul wrote. From Philem<sup>2</sup> he appears to have been a member of Philemon's household, and he is regarded by most commentators (after Theodore of Mopsuestia) as his son. Accordingly, it is generally supposed (after Chrysostom) that Archippus was an office-bearer of the Colossian Church. Against this inference Lightfoot adduces (1) the mention of Archippus in Col. immediately after a reference to Laodicea; (2) the alleged unlikelihood of Archippus being addressed in Col 4<sup>17</sup> indirectly instead of directly, if he were himself an official of the Church to which St. Paul was writing; (3) the tradition (embodied in the Apost. Constitutions, vii. 46) that Archippus became 'bishop,' or presiding presbyter, of Laodicea. Lightfoot infers that Archippus fulfilled his ministry at Laodicea, which was not many miles from Colossæ; and the mention of him in Philem. is accounted for by supposing that St. Paul (through Tychicus, the bearer of his letter to Philemon) might have suggested that Onesimus should be employed not in the city where he had lived as a slave, but in the Laodicean Church under Archippus. The usual supposition, however, that Archippus lived with Philemon at Colossæ and also laboured there, appears, on the whole, more natural and probable.

The message conveyed to Archippus ('Take heed [look] to the ministry,' etc.) is held by Lightfoot (Coloss. 3 42 f.) to imply a rebuke, as if Archippus had been remiss or unfaithful in the discharge of official duty; and Lightfoot, believing that Archippus held office at Laodicea, compares the admonition to him with the censure on account of lukewarmness administered in Rev 3 to the angel and church of the Laodiceans. The message, however, to Archippus can hardly be regarded as necessarily suggesting more than that his work was specially important and arduous, demanding from himself earnest watchfulness, and from an older 'fellow-campaigner,' like St. Paul, the incentive of sympathetic exhortation and warning. Theophylact, in his commentary, supposes that the apostolic message is purposely made public, instead of being conveyed in a private letter, not so much to suggest Archippus' special need of admonition, as to enable him, without offence, to deal in like manner with brethren under himself.

In the Greek Martyrology, Archippus appears (in the Menæa under Nov. 22) as having been stoned to death, along with Philemon, at Chonæ, near Laodicea. His alleged eventual 'episcopate,' or presiding presbyterate at Laodicea is at least possible, and even probable; but the inclusion of his name in the pseudo-Dorothean list (6th cent.) of the Seventy of Lk 10 is quite incredible.

LITERATURE.—J. A. Dietelmaier, de Archippo, Altdorf, 1751; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians<sup>3</sup>, 1879, pp. 42 f., 303 ff.; see also Literature under PHILEMON. HENRY COWAN.

AREOPAGITE, AREOPAGUS.—In Ac 17<sup>34</sup> the title 'the Areopagite' is given to one Dionysius, a convert to the Christian faith at Athens, implying that he was a member of the council of the Areopagus.

Areopagus (Ac 17<sup>19</sup> AV and RV; v. 22 AV 'Mars' Hill,' RV 'Areopagus'; the RV is correct in rendering 'Areopagus' in both places, as it preserves the ambiguity of the original).—(a) The name denominated a rocky eminence N.W. of the Acropolis at Athens, which was famous in the history of the city. Between the hill and the Acropolis was a narrow declivity, now largely filled in. On the N.E. the rock is precipitous, and at the foot of the precipice the worship of the propitiated Furies as the Eumenides was carried on, so that the locality was invested with awesome associations. It is approached from the agora, or market-place, by an old, worn stairway of sixteen steps, and upon the top can still be seen the rough, rock-hewn benches, forming three sides of a square, upon which the court sat in the open air, in order that the judges should not be under the same roof as the accused.—(b) The expression was also used of the court itself (Cicero, ad Att. i. 14. 5; de Nat. Deor. ii. 74; Rep. i. 27). From time immemorial this court held its meetings on the hill in question, and was at once the most ancient and most revered tribunal in the city. In ancient times it had supreme authority in both criminal and religious matters, and its influence, ever tending to become wider, affected laws and offices, education and morality. It thus fulfilled the functions of both court and council. Pericles and his friend Ephialtes (c. 460 B.C.) set themselves to limit the power of the court (Aristotle, Const. Ath. 25), and it became largely a criminal court, while religious matters seem to have been controlled, at least in part, by the King Archon. But the reforms of Ephialtes mainly concerned interference in public affairs; and the statements of Æschylus in the tragedy Eumenides, which appeared at the time in defence of the court, appear to be exaggerated. In any case, in the Roman period it regained its former powers (Cicero, ad Fam. xiii. 1. 5; de Nat. Deor. ii. 74). As to the origin of the court, according to popular legend Ares was called before a court of the twelve gods to answer for the murder of Halirrhottus (Paus. i. xxviii. 5), but Æschylus (Eum. 685 ff.) attributes its foundation to Athene.

The questions which arise out of the narrative of Acts are these: Was St. Paul taken before the council or to the hill? Or did he appear before the council sitting in the traditional place? Was he in any sense on trial?

The King Archon held his meetings in the Stoa Basileios, and it was there that Socrates had been arraigned on a matter similar to that which exercised the minds of the philosophers in the case before us. It seems probable that this Stoa became identified with the discussion of religious questions, and that, when the council of the Areopagus regained its full powers, it held its meetings here, reserving its old judgment-seat for cases of murder (so Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, Berlin, 1894, ii. 523 f., Stadtgesch. von Athen, do. 1891, p. 262 f.; but Harnack, Acts of the Apostles, Lond. and N.Y., 1909, p. 108, remarks: 'Curtius' explanation seems to me untenable'; see also Conybeare, in HDB i. 144). The whole picture, indeed, is in favour of this view. There is no reason why the Stoics and Epicureans should have carried away the Apostle to an isolated spot. Further, Ramsay truly remarks: 'The Athenians were, in many respects, flippant; but their flippancy was combined with an intense pride in the national dignity and the historic glory of the city, which would have revolted at such an insult as that this stranger should harangue them about his foreign deities on the spot where the Athenian elders had judged the god Ares and the hero Orestes' (St. Paul the Traveller, Lond. 1895, p. 244). Moreover, the Apostle's speech was not a philosophical disquisition but rather a popular oration, suited to the general populace of idle Athenians and dilettante Roman youths whose education was not considered complete until they had spent some time in the purlieus of the ancient university. If the council happened to be sitting, as was evidently the case, it was a most natural impulse to hurry the newcomer, who 'babbled' apparently of two new deities, Jesus and 'Resurrection' (for so they would understand him), to its meeting-place, that the question might be settled as to whether or not he was to be allowed to continue. Yet it can hardly be said that the proceedings were even remotely connected with a judicial inquiry. It was no anakrisis, or preliminary investigation, though the philosophers may have hoped that something of the sort would be the outcome. It is of little importance whether the phrase 'they took him and brought him' implies friendly compulsion or inimical intent. The feelings of the listeners would be very mixed, and they would quite naturally be excited by the curious message of the new preacher. The professing teachers were all interested in new ideas and yet resented unwarranted intrusion. The council was in the habit of making pronouncements on the subject of new religious cycles of thought, and it was no doubt felt that, if their attention was drawn to the subject, official proceedings would follow. It is evident that there was much in the address of St. Paul that awoke sympathy in his audience. One member of the council, at least, was converted, to wit, Dionysius. There may have been others. But the general effect produced by the mention of the Resurrection was contempt. A few were ready to hear more on the subject, possibly a minority suggested a more formal examination; but the result of the hearing, as of the visit, outwardly and visibly, was failure. The council of the Areopagus made judicial procedure impossible, by refusing to treat the matter seriously, and the Apostle left them, a disappointed, and no doubt a somewhat irritated man.

LITERATURE.—Besides the authors quoted, see W. M. Ramsay, in Expositor, 5th ser. ii. [1895] 209, 261, also x. [1899]; E. Renan, St. Paul, Eng. tr. 1890, p. 193 f.; A. C. McGiffert, History of the Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 257 ff.; EBR 9, art. 'Areopagus'; R. J. Knowling, in EGT ii. [London, 1900] 368 f.

F. W. WORSLEY.

ARETAS (Ἀρέτας, Arab. Hāritha).—The Gr. form of a name borne by several rulers of the Nabatean Arabs, whose capital was Petra in Arabia.

1. The first known to history, 'Aretas, prince of the Arabians,' is said to have had the fugitive high-priest Jason shut up at his court (2 Mac 5<sup>8</sup>; the Gr. text is doubtful). His designation as 'prince' (τῦραννος) indicates that the hereditary chieftain of the tribe had not yet assumed the dignity of kingship. The royal dynasty was founded by Erotimus about 110–100 B.C., when the Greek kings of Syria and Egypt had lost so much of their power, 'ut adsiduis proeliis consumpti in contemptum finitum venerint praeadaeque Arabum genti, imbelli antea, fuerint' (Trog. Pomp. ap. Justin., xxxix. 5. 5–6).

2. The second Aretas, called ο' Ἀράβων βασιλεὺς, is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. XIII. xiii. 3) in connexion with the siege of Gaza by Alexander Janneus in 96 B.C.

3. Aretas III., who reigned from about 85 to 60 B.C., is known as 'Aretas the Philhellene,' this being the superscription of the earliest Nabatean coins that are known. Under him the mountain fortress of Petra began to assume the aspect of a Hellenistic city, and the Nabatean sway was extended as far as Damascus. He incurred the displeasure of the Romans by interfering in the quarrel of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, but the war which Scaurus waged against him left his power unbroken (Ant. XIV. v. i.; BJ i. viii. 1). He could not, however, prevent Lollius and Metellus from taking possession of Damascus (Ant. XIV. ii. 3; BJ i. vi. 1), which thereafter was permanently under the suzerainty of Rome.

4. Aretas IV., Philopatris, the last and best-known, had a long and successful reign (c. 9 B.C.–A.D. 40). He was originally called Æneas, but on coming to the throne he assumed the favourite name of the Nabatean kings. He soon found it necessary to ingratiate himself with Rome.

Augustus 'was angry that Aretas had not sent to him first before he took the kingdom; yet did Æneas send an epistle and presents to Cæsar, and a crown of gold of the weight of many talents.' . . . The Emperor 'admitted Aretas's ambassadors, and after he had just reproved him for his rashness in not waiting till he had received the kingdom from him, he accepted his presents, and confirmed him in the government' (Jos. Ant. xvi. ix. 4, x. 9).

This Aretas' daughter became the wife of Herod Antipas, who divorced her in order to marry Herodias (Mk 6<sup>17</sup>). Border disputes gave the injured father an opportunity of revenge. Again acting, at this new juncture, without consulting Rome, he attacked and defeated Antipas (A.D. 28); and again fortune smiled on his daring disregard of consequences. The belated expedition which Vitellius, governor of Syria, at Tiberius' command, led against Petra, had only got as far as Jerusalem, when the tidings of the Emperor's death (A.D. 37) caused it to be abandoned.

There is circumstantial evidence, though perhaps too slender to be quite convincing, that Tiberius' successor Caligula favoured the cause of Aretas. St. Paul was converted probably about A.D. 36 (so Turner), and, some time after, the Jews of Damascus conspired to kill him (Ac 9<sup>24</sup>). In recalling this fact he mentions a detail (2 Co 11<sup>32</sup>) which the writer of Acts omits, namely, that it was the governor (ἐθνάρχης) under Aretas the king who—doubtless at the instigation of the Jews—guarded the city to take him. The question is thus raised when and how Aretas became overlord of Damascus. It is inconceivable either that he captured the city in face of the Roman legions in Syria, or that Tiberius, who in the end of his reign was strongly hostile, ceded it to him. But it is probable that Caligula favoured the enemy of Herod Antipas. One of his first imperial acts was to give the tetrarchy of Philip and Lysanias to Agrippa (Ant. xviii. vi. 10), and he may at the same time have given Damascus to Aretas as a peace-offering. It was better policy to befriend than to crush the brave Nabatæans. Antipas was ultimately deposed and banished in 39.

It was only for a short time, however, that Rome relaxed her direct hold upon the old Syrian capital. There are Damascene coins with the figure of Tiberius down to A.D. 34, and the fact that none has been found with the image of Caius or Claudius is significant of a change of régime; but the image of Nero appears from 62 onwards. To the view of Marquardt (Rom. Staatsverwaltung, 1885, i. 405) and Mommsen (Provinces<sup>2</sup>, 1909, ii. 149), based on 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, that Damascus was continuously in subjection to the Nabatæan kings from the beginning of the Roman period down to A.D. 106, there are the strongest objections (see Schürer, HJP i. ii. 354). Cf. art. ARABIA.

More coins and inscriptions date from the time of Aretas IV. than from any Nabatæan reign. While the standing title of Aretas III. was φιλέλληγνος, that which the last chose for himself was ἠγαπῶν, 'Lover of his people.' He set country above culture; he was a Nabatæan patriot first and a Hellenist afterwards. It was probably this successful reign that Josephus had in view when he wrote of the extension of the Nabatæan kingdom from the Euphrates to the Red Sea (Ant. I. xii. 4).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the authorities cited in the body of the art., see Literature appended to art. ARABIA, and P. Ewald, art. 'Aretas,' in PRE<sup>3</sup>. JAMES STRAHAN.

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀριστάρχος). — A Macedonian Christian and a native of Thessalonica who became one of the companions of St. Paul on his third missionary journey. He is first mentioned on the occasion of the riot in Ephesus, where along with another companion of the Apostle named Gaius (q.v.), probably of Derbe, he was rushed by the excited multitude into the theatre (Ac 19<sup>29</sup>). He seems to have been an influential member of the Church of Thessalonica, and was deputed along with Secundus (q.v.) to convey the contributions of the Church to Jerusalem (Ac 20<sup>4</sup>). He was thus present in the city at the time of St. Paul's arrest, and seems to have remained in Syria during the two years of the Apostle's imprisonment in Cæsarea, for we find him embarking with the prisoner on the ship bound for the West (Ac 27<sup>2</sup>). It is not certain that he accompanied St. Paul to Rome. He may, as Lightfoot supposes (Phil. 4<sup>34</sup>), have disembarked at Myra (Ac 27<sup>5</sup>). On the other hand, Ramsay (St. Paul<sup>3</sup>, 316) believes that both Aristarchus and St. Luke accompanied the Apostle on the voyage as his personal slaves. In any case Aristarchus was present in Rome soon after St. Paul's arrival, and it is not impossible that he came later with contributions from the Philippian Church to the Apostle. When the Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon were written, Aristarchus was with the Apostle in Rome. In the former (Col 4<sup>10</sup>) he is called the 'fellow-prisoner' (συναιχμάλωτος) of the writer, and we find the same term, which usually indicates physical restraint, applied to Epaphras (q.v.) in Philem<sup>3</sup>. While the idea in the Apostle's mind may be that Aristarchus, like himself, was taken captive by Jesus Christ, it is more probable that Aristarchus shared St. Paul's prison in Rome, either as a suspected friend of the prisoner or voluntarily as the Apostle's slave—a position which he and Epaphras may have taken alternately. In Philem<sup>24</sup> he is called 'fellow-labourer' of the writer. Nothing is known of his subsequent history. According to tradition he suffered martyrdom under Nero.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller<sup>3</sup>, London, 1897, pp. 279, 316; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon<sup>3</sup>, do. 1879, p. 236, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, do. 1878, p. 34; artt. in HDB and in EBI; R. J. Knowling, in EGT ii. [1900] 414.

W. F. BOYD.

ARISTOBULUS (Ἀριστόβουλος, a Greek name frequently adopted by Romans and Jews, and borne by several members of the Maccabean and Herodian families).—In Ro 16<sup>10</sup> St. Paul salutes 'them which are of the household of Aristobulus' (τοὺς ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοβούλου), i.e. the Christians in his familia or establishment of freedmen and slaves (perhaps known as Aristobuliani, for which the Greek phrase would be equivalent). Lightfoot thinks that Aristobulus was a grandson of Herod the Great, and brother of Agrippa and Herod. This Aristobulus lived and died in Rome in a private station (see Jos. BJ II. xi. 6, Ant. xx. i. 2). After his death it is supposed that his 'household' passed over to the Emperor, but retained the name of their former master. The 'household of Aristobulus' would naturally include many Orientals and Jews, and therefore probably some Christians. The name Herodion (q.v.), which immediately follows, suggests a connexion with the Herodian dynasty. If Lightfoot is right, the reference to the 'household of Aristobulus' is strong evidence for the Roman destination of these salutations. The Christians in the 'household' would naturally form one of the distinct communities of which the Church at Rome was apparently made up (cf. v.<sup>11</sup> and the phrases in vv. 6, 15). We have no knowledge as to whether the master himself was a convert. See Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 174 f.

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

ARK.—The LXX and the NT use κιβωτός = a wooden chest or box, as a terminus technicus both for Noah's ark (תֵּבָה), and for the ark (אֲרוֹן) of the covenant.

1. An interesting account of the successive phases of modern opinion regarding the former ark will be found in EBR<sup>11</sup> (s.v.). The writer of Hebrews (11<sup>7</sup>), taking the story as he finds it, refers to Noah's forethought as a supreme instance of that faith which is the conviction of things not seen—a faith by which he not only virtually condemned the world, bringing its careless infidelity into strong relief, but became heir of that righteousness which is faith's crown and reward (τῆς κατὰ πίστιν δικαιοσύνης). St. Peter (1 P 3<sup>18a</sup>), supplementing a tradition which is found in the Book of Enoch (6–16; cf. Jubilees, 5), imagines Christ, as a bodiless spirit, preaching, in the days between His Passion and His Resurrection, to the spirits in prison. These are the disobedient and, to St. Peter (himself like a spirit in prison during those three days), unhappy children of the unlawful union between angels and the daughters of men, condemned rebels who in vain sought the intervention of Enoch on their behalf in that time of Divine long-suffering when Noah was preparing the ark in which he saved himself and his family (see R. H. Charles, Bk. of Jub., Lond. 1902, p. 43 ff.).

2. The writer of Hebrews mentions the ark of the covenant (τὴν κιβωτὸν τῆς διαθήκης) as the innermost and most sacred piece of furniture contained in the Tabernacle. His description of it as 'completely overlaid with gold' (περικεκαλυμμένην παντοθεν χρυσῷ) corresponds with the directions given in Ex 25<sup>11</sup> (ἐξωθεν καὶ ἐξωθεν χρυσώσεις αὐτήν). The designation 'the ark of the covenant,' which was probably coined by the writer of Deut., was historically later than 'the ark of Jahweh,' and 'the ark of God' (JE), and earlier than 'the ark of the testimony' (P). It was a contraction for 'the ark containing the tables of the covenant,' the Decalogue being a summary of the terms which Israel accepted on entering into covenant with God. In Kautzsch's Heilige Schrift it is rendered die Lade mit dem Gesetz, 'the ark with the law.' When the Decalogue came to be known as 'the testimony,' the new name ἡ κιβωτὸς τοῦ μαρτυρίου was introduced, but it did not displace the older phrases. The golden pot of manna (the adj. is an embellishment upon Ex 16<sup>33</sup>) and Aaron's rod that budded, which in the original narratives were laid up before the Lord (ἐναντίον τοῦ θεοῦ, Ex 16<sup>33</sup>; ἐνώπιον τῶν μαρτυρίων, Nu 17<sup>10</sup>) are supposed by the writer of Hebrews to have been within the ark.

The ultimate fate of the κιβωτὸς is involved in obscurity. The popular imagination could not entertain the idea that the inviolable ark was irrecoverably lost, and there arose a tradition that before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., the Tabernacle with all its sacred furniture was hidden by Jeremiah (or, according to the Talmud, by Josiah) in a cave of Mt. Nebo (2 Es 10<sup>22</sup>; cf. 2 Mac 2<sup>5</sup>), whence it was to be miraculously restored to its place at the coming of the Messiah. In the second and third Temple the Holy of Holies contained no ark. 'In this was nothing at all,' is Josephus' emphatic testimony (BJ v. v. 5). Pompey, on entering, found 'vacuam sedem et inania arcana' (Tac. Hist. v. 9). The thought of that emptiness oppressed the minds both of devout Jews and of Jewish Christians, and in Rev 11<sup>19</sup>, when the seventh angel has sounded, and the temple of God in heaven is opened, the ark of the covenant is there. 'All we have willed or hoped or dreamed of good shall exist; not the semblance but itself.'

LITERATURE.—Besides the art. in IDB (J. Macpherson and A. R. S. Kennedy), SDB (A. R. S. Kennedy), and especially ERE (R. H. Kennett), see R. Kraetzschmar, Die Bundesvorstellung, Marburg, 1896; H. Couard, 'Die religiöse nationale Bedeutung der Lade,' in ZATW xii. [1892]; Volck, art. 'Bundeslade,' in PRE<sup>3</sup>. JAMES STRAHAN.

ARMAGEDDON.—See HAR-MAGEDON.

ARMOUR.—As Jews, the disciples of our Lord—not to speak of Himself—were exempt from military service. They had the privilege of ἀσπαρεῖα, which Lentulus conceded to the Jews of Asia (Jos. Ant. xiv. x. 13 f.), and Julius Cæsar to those of Palestine (ib. x. 6). The Roman auxiliaries who garrisoned Judæa were recruited wholly from the Greek cities of Palestine, such as Sebaste and Cæsarea. Probably, therefore, none of the disciples ever wore armour, or, with the possible exception of Simon the Zealot, became skilled in the use of weapons. St. Peter once carried a sword, but made a very blundering use of it (Mk 14<sup>47</sup>, Jn 18<sup>10</sup>). The only sword of which Christianity approves is that which is the symbol of the punitive ministry of the magistrate (Ro 13<sup>4</sup>). Nevertheless, it was impossible for Christians not to be profoundly interested in the brave men who were taught that it was dulce et decorum pro patria mori, and Christ Himself sanctioned the use of illustrations drawn from the warfare of kings (Lk 14<sup>31</sup>). It is not surprising, therefore, to find that St. Paul regards the valour and endurance of the world's conquerors and the Empire's defenders as worthy of emulation, and that he transfigures the armour of the Roman legionary into the panoply of the Christian soldier (Eph 6<sup>11a</sup>).

Descriptions of the equipment of soldiers are frequent in Greek authors. (1) Homer lets us see his πρόμαχοι arming before they go forth to battle. Paris (Il. iii. 323 ff.) cases his limbs in greaves (κνημίδες); a splendid cuirass (θώραξ) covers his breast; a baldric sustains the sword (ἔλφος) that glitters at his side; his great round shield (σάκος) is then displayed; over his brows he places his helmet (κυνέη) with nodding plume; and last of all he grasps his spear (ἐγχεος) in his hand (cf. Il. iv. 132 ff., xi. 15 ff., xvi. 130 ff., xix. 364 ff.). 'The six pieces of armour are always mentioned in the same order, in which they would naturally be put on, except that we should expect the helmet to be donned before the shield was taken on the arm' (Leaf's Homer, i. 106).—(2) Polybius (vi. 23) describes the armour of Roman soldiers in the time of the Punic wars. The heavy-armed carried an oblong shield (thureos, scutum), 4 feet by 2½, incurved into the shape of a half-cylinder; the helmet (περικεφαλαια) of bronze had a crest of three feathers; and a greave protected the right leg. The wealthier soldiers wore a cuirass of chain-armour (lorica), the poorer a bronze plate 9 inches square. For defence they all carried a Spanish sword (μάχαιρα), straight, double-edged, and pointed, which was used for both thrust and cut; and two long javelins (vossol, pila), which were either hurled at a distance or used at close quarters like modern bayonets.—(3) Josephus (BJ III. v. 5) describes the equipment of Roman soldiers under the Empire. The heavy-armed had a helmet (κράνος), a cuirass, a long sword worn on the left side and a dagger on the right, a pilum (ξυστόν), and a scutum (θυρεός). The detachment which attended the commander had a round shield (ἀσπίς, clipeus) and a long spear (λόγχη). The cavalry wore armour like that of the infantry, with a broadsword (μάχαιρα), a buckler slung from the horse's side, a lance, and several javelins (ἀκοντες), almost as large as spears, in a sheath or quiver.

In his enumeration of the weapons of spiritual warfare St. Paul omits the spear, and by implication adds girdle and shoes (ζωστήρ and caligæ). The complete equipment consists of six pieces, defensive and offensive—the girdle of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the sandals of readiness to carry good tidings, the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit. The Christian soldier is clad cap-à-pie in supernatural armour—the panoply which is the gift of God. There is no defence for the back, which should never need any.

'The next day they took him [Christian] into the armoury, where they showed him all manner of furniture, which the Lord had provided for pilgrims, as sword, shield, helmet, breastplate, all-prayer, and shoes that would not wear out. And there was enough of this to harness out as many men for the service of their Lord as there be stars in the heaven for multitude' (Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress).

In 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup> the breastplate (θυρεός) is faith and love. In the realm of the imagination a happy idea will present itself in various aspects to different minds, and even to the same mind at different moments. Isaiah (59<sup>17</sup>) had already suggested the thought of a panoply in which God Himself is clothed, and the writer of Wisdom had worked it out thus (5<sup>17-20</sup>): 'He shall take His jealousy as complete armour; . . . He shall put on righteousness as a breastplate, and shall array Himself with judgment unfeigned as with a helmet; He shall take holiness as an invincible shield, and He shall sharpen stern wrath for a sword.'

LITERATURE.—In addition to the sources cited in the article, see art. 'Arma,' in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. 3, London, 1891, and art. 'Armour, Arms' (A. R. S. Kennedy), in SDB.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ARMY.—This term occurs in Ac 23<sup>27</sup>, Rev 9<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>14, 19</sup> (in the last three instances referring to armies [στρατεύματα] of apocalyptic vision). On the outbreak of a tumult in the Temple at Jerusalem, the chief captain of the band came on the scene, as he afterwards reported, συν τῷ στρατεύματι (AV 'with an army,' RV 'with the soldiers'). The little force thus described (Ac 23<sup>27</sup>) was a fraction of the vast army which maintained law and order throughout the Roman Empire. In the first month of 29 B.C., a year after the battle of Actium, the gates of the temple of Janus at Rome were closed for the first time in 200 years. That significant act was the beginning of the Pax Romana. The Civil War was ended, and the State had no more foreign foes to fear. Augustus found himself master of three standing armies, his own and those of Lepidus and Antony, amounting to 45 legions. He at once undertook that task of military reorganization which was perhaps his greatest and most original achievement. By ruthlessly eliminating inferior elements he obtained a thoroughly efficient force of 25 legions. The time for great field forces, such as Scipio and Cæsar had wielded, was now past. An army that could be swiftly mobilized was no longer a necessity, and might easily become a menace, to the Empire. Augustus initiated the policy, which was respected by his successors down to the time of the Antonines, of 'maintaining the dignity of the Empire, without attempting to enlarge its limits' (Gibbon, Hist., ch. 1). His conservative policy determined his use of the army. Distributing the legions in the frontier provinces of the Empire—which had the Atlantic as its boundary on the west, the Rhine and the Danube on the north, the Euphrates on the east, and the deserts of Arabia and Africa on the south—he charged them to guard the borders which were exposed to the attacks of restless barbarians. Italy itself was garrisoned by the Prætorian cohorts (see PRÆTORIUM).

The legions were recruited from the Roman citizens of Italy and the provinces. Each consisted of 6000 heavy infantry divided into ten cohorts, with a troop of 120 horsemen to act as dispatch riders. The legion was no longer under six tribunes commanding by turns. The supreme authority was now entrusted to a legatus legionis, who was the deputy of the Emperor as commander-in-chief of the whole army. The efficiency of the soldiers depended largely upon the 60 centurions, who formed the backbone of the legion. The term of service was 20 years, and on discharge the legionary received a bounty or land. Many coloniae were formed for the purpose of providing homes for veterans. Each legion bore a title and a number, e.g., 'VI. Victrix' stationed at York, 'III. Gallica' at Antioch.

But the legions were not the only guardians of the peace of the Empire. Augustus developed a new order of auxilia. Regiments of infantry (cohortes) or cavalry (alæ), 500 to 1000 strong, were recruited from the subjects, not the citizens, of the provinces, and formed a second force equal in numbers if not in importance to the first. It is estimated that the two forces together made up a regular, long-service army of 400,000 men. The auxiliaries were more lightly armed than the legionaries (see ARMOUR); they were not so well paid; and on their discharge they received a bounty or the Roman franchise.

As Judæa was a province of the second rank, governed by a procurator, it was not (like Syria) garrisoned by legionaries, but by auxiliaries, who had their headquarters in Cæsarea. The cohortes and alæ were recruited from the Greek cities of Palestine, from which they derived their names, such as 'Cohors Sebastenorum,' or 'Tyriorum.' The Jews were expressly exempted from military service under the Roman banners and eagles, which they regarded as idolatrous. Julius Cæsar's edict granting this privilege is preserved by Josephus (Ant. XIV. x. 6).

At the time of the death of Herod Agrippa (A.D. 44), an alæ of cavalry and five cohorts were stationed at Cæsarea (Jos. Ant. XIX. ix. 1-2). Probably they had once belonged to the army of Herod the Great, and had been taken over by the Romans after the deposition of his son Archelaus in A.D. 6 (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 51). They are often mentioned in the period A.D. 44-66 (Ant. XX. vi. 1, viii. 7), and they were finally drafted into Vespasian's army in A.D. 67. The relation of the Italian and Augustan cohorts (see AUGUSTAN BAND and ITALIAN BAND) to these auxiliaries is a difficult question. The cohort (σπεῖρα), military tribune (χιλάρχος), and centurions (ἐκατονταρχαί) mentioned in the story of St. Paul's arrest at Jerusalem and transference to Cæsarea (Ac 21-23) certainly belonged to the Judæan auxilia. A single cohort formed the normal garrison of the Holy City (Jos. BJ v. v. 8, where τάγμα is used instead of the more correct σπεῖρα). The barracks (παρεμβολή, used six times in the same narrative) adjoined the fortress of Antonia, close to the N.E. corner of the Temple area (see CASTLE). At the Jewish festivals a stronger body of troops was drafted from Cæsarea for the purpose of keeping order among the pilgrims in the crowded Temple precincts, as the Turkish soldiers now do at Easter among the Christian sects in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. St. Paul was escorted from Jerusalem to Antipatris by 200 foot-soldiers, 70 horsemen (ἵππεις), and 200 spearmen (δεξιολάβοι), and thence to Cæsarea by the horsemen alone. The precise function of the δεξιολάβοι (an exceedingly rare word, meaning apparently 'those who grasped their weapons with the right hand') is very doubtful; see Schürer, I. ii. 56, and Meyer, in loco.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Exercitus' in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. 3, London, 1891 (by W. Ramsay), and in Pauly-Wissowa, (by Liebenam); E. Schürer, HJP I. ii. 49 ff.; E. G. Hardy, Studies in Roman History, London, 1906-09; and art. 'Army' (A. R. S. Kennedy) in SDB.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ARTEMAS.—Artemas is mentioned only in Tit 3<sup>12</sup>. St. Paul urges Titus to 'give diligence to come to' him, 'when I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Tychicus.' This implies that Artemas was capable of relieving Titus in the oversight and organization of the Church in Crete. Therefore he must have been a Christian of considerable experience and of high character, and free to devote himself to Christian work; one of St. Paul's companions from whom the 'apostolic legates' were selected. The name is Greek; but that tells nothing about his nationality.

LITERATURE.—Arth. in HDB on 'Artemas,' 'Titus,' and 'Titus, Epistle to'; EGT on Tit 3:2. J. E. ROBERTS.

ARTEMIS See DIANA.

ARTS.—This article surveys the industrial arts of the Apostolic Age, from data furnished by the NT, the Gospels excepted. 'Art' may be co-ordinated with 'craft,' which, however, has been replaced by 'trade,' 'business,' in RV (see Ac 18<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>25-27</sup>). 'craftsman,' 'craftsmen' being retained (Ac 19<sup>24-28</sup>, Rev 18<sup>22</sup>, where 'craft' also survives).

In the writings of St. Paul are numerous indications of the close contact of the Apostle with the artisan class, which is to be expected in view of what is known concerning his own manner of life. This point is emphasized by Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, London, 1911, p. 316 ff.; but cf. Review of Theology and Philosophy, viii. [1912-13] p. 317). 'Work,' 'works' (and derivatives) figure prominently in the Pauline vocabulary (Eph 2<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>28</sup>, Col 3-3, 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, etc.). Many social relationships proceed upon a work-basis, e.g. masters, servants (slaves), bond, bondmen (Eph 6<sup>5-6</sup>, Col 3-3, etc.; cf. 1 P 2<sup>16-18</sup>, Rev 13<sup>16</sup>).

1. About one-half of the references to labour within the apostolic writings refer to agriculture, which, in the widest sense of the term, also belongs to the industrial arts. In so far as these references are quite general, or purely metaphorical, and such as are common to literature in all ages, we shall omit them. Toilers on the land are here regarded more in their relation to craftsmen of whatsoever craft (Rev 18<sup>22</sup>). The time had passed when agriculture was a self-contained industry; there were now many departments, and much subdivision of labour. Behind the actual tillers of the soil stood those who were owners of land, such as are mentioned in Ac 4<sup>35</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> (cf. Josephus, Life, 76). The care of the crop and of animals occupied so much time that commerce in grain (Ac 27<sup>38</sup>, Rev 18<sup>13</sup>) and in stock had to be made over to others. The workers with agricultural implements could not at the same time fashion them, at least to advantage. Thus it came about that the carpenter, the smith, the worker in leather, found their customers largely among the agricultural community. The plough, the yoke (so frequent in St. Paul's metaphors: 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup>, Gal 5<sup>1</sup>, Ph 4<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 15<sup>10</sup>), the goad (Ac 26<sup>14</sup>), instruments for reaping (e.g. the sickle, Rev 14<sup>14</sup>) and for threshing, the muzzle (1 Co 9<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>, only in quotation), the bridle (Ja 3<sup>3</sup>), and harness in general, millstones (Rev 18<sup>21-22</sup>), weights and measures (Rev 6<sup>6</sup>)—all these more or less called for the skill of the artisan proper. In rural parts milling and baking may indeed have continued to be woman's work in the house (or tent), but in towns there had arisen millers and bakers, the latter in particular exercising their craft in shops, many of which were found in the same district or quarter, as is still the practice in the East to-day.

We read once of the shambles (μάκελλον = macellum, 1 Co 10<sup>25</sup>), which in reality was a meat and provision market, with many booths or shops, such as every great city of the time could boast. The market-place (ἀγορά, forum, Ac 17<sup>17</sup>), although put to many other uses, was not without significance as a trade centre.

Specialized forms of agriculture, relating to the vine, the olive, and the fig, are less frequently alluded to (Ja 3<sup>12</sup>; cf. Ro 11<sup>16-24</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>7</sup>, Rev 6<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>4</sup> 14<sup>18</sup>), but the products of wine and oil are named as matters of common knowledge (Rev 6<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>13</sup>). The importance of the olive in particular has been shown by Deissmann (St. Paul, London, 1912, p. 39 ff.; cf. Ramsay, Pauline and other Studies, do. 1906, p. 219 ff.). It may be noted that the palm figures only in Rev 7<sup>9</sup>, although at this time it was also an important culture (Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 1). Certain articles of commerce enumerated in Rev 18<sup>13</sup>—cinnamon, spice, etc.—presuppose at some point or other an activity in intensive arboriculture. For basket-making, see art. BASKET.

The rearing of cattle, sheep, horses, etc. is but slightly referred to (1 Co 9<sup>9</sup>, Ja 3<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 2-5, Rev 18<sup>13</sup>), but products come to light in the industries of tanning and weaving. From the prevalence of sacrifice, pagan (Ac 14<sup>13</sup>, 15<sup>20-29</sup> etc.) no less than Jewish, we may also infer that this gave support to several important branches of industry.

2. Next to the arts concerned with food supplies come those connected with clothing and shelter. Spinning and weaving were fundamental industries, then, as aforesaid, embracing the coarser fabrics involved in the tent-cloth (see TENT, TENT-MAKING) made of goat's hair, for which Cilicia was famed, and at the making of which St. Paul and his companions, Aquila and Priscilla, wrought (Ac 18<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>34</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>9</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>8</sup>), and the finer sorts for human wear, culminating in articles embroidered, inwrought with gold and silver, adorned with precious stones and pearls, such as the royal apparel of Ac 12<sup>21</sup> (cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>, Rev., passim). The treatment of the material, probably while in the raw state, with dye (producing purple, scarlet, etc.), and with minerals for bleaching (i.e. the process of fulling), was an allied industry (see especially Ac 16<sup>14</sup> and cf. art. CLOTHES, etc.). The art of the tailor was less in evidence, perhaps, his place being taken by the weaver and by the women in the home (cf. Ac 9<sup>39</sup>), although in Talmudic times he figures among other artisans.

3. The care of the person was then carried to a great degree. The elaborate system of baths which prevailed must have provided work for many, including the apothecary, who supplied unguents and salves (Rev 3<sup>18</sup> 18<sup>13</sup>). The barber (Ac 18<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>24</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>16</sup>) had also a well-established position.

4. The tanner has been brought into prominence by one instance (Simon [q.v.], Ac 9<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>6-32</sup>). While an important craft, this was a despised one, and the fact of Simon's house having been by the seaside was due as much to enforced separation from the town as to the necessities of business. The preparation of leather for foot-wear (see SHOE, SANDAL) was but a small part of the tanner's occupation. He was a necessary coadjutor of the maker of articles for house-furnishing, and also of the harness-maker.

5. Building arts.—The first part of the Apostolic Age witnessed great activity in building within Palestine, notably the completion of Herod's ambitious projects. The Temple was finished, only to be demolished again by the Romans. The conquerors took up the like work for themselves, but along lines of their own. References to building in the Apostolic writings are, however, few. The work of the mason underlies such passages as Ro 15<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>9f</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>5f</sup>, He 3<sup>3f</sup>. Specific parts of buildings are named in the 'middle wall of partition' (Eph 2<sup>14</sup>, perhaps reminiscent of the Temple), the 'foundation' and 'chief corner-stone' (Eph 2<sup>20</sup>). The builder's measuring-rod (reed) is mentioned in Rev 11<sup>1</sup>. Carpentry appears only metaphorically in 1 Co 3<sup>12</sup>, and in the figure of speech employed in Col 2<sup>14</sup>.

6. Workers in metal.—The numerous references to arms within the apostolic writings show that the art of the smith must have been familiar in those days. No doubt it was largely extraneous to Palestine, being maintained, however, for behoof of the conquering Romans. There and elsewhere it was an industry that affected the early Christians adversely, being associated for the most part with prisons and detention, e.g. spearmen, etc. (Ac 23<sup>3</sup>), chains (Ac 12<sup>6</sup> 21<sup>33</sup> 28<sup>0</sup>, Eph 6<sup>0</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>), iron gate (Ac 12<sup>10</sup>). The Apocalypse is especially rich in warlike imagery: breast-plates of iron (9<sup>9</sup>), chariots (9<sup>9</sup> 18<sup>13</sup>), sword (1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>12</sup> etc.). See also Eph 6<sup>15a</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>. Cf. art. ARMOUR.

In connexion with ships and boats the smith's (and carpenter's) art must also have been largely in evidence: anchor (He 6<sup>19</sup>), rudder (Ja 3<sup>1</sup>); cf. the narrative of St. Paul's voyage. It must be remembered that navigation was itself an art, requiring a shipmaster and mariners (Rev 18<sup>17</sup>), a steersman (Ja 3<sup>1</sup>), etc. But, as in the case of arms, this activity stood largely apart from the life of the early Church.

Thus far the crafts have been regarded on a large scale. But iron-work (see IRON) took finer forms (Rev 18<sup>1</sup>): e.g. certain parts of the warrior's equipment; also the balance, if made of this metal (Rev 6<sup>5</sup>). This is equally true of working in wood: idols (Rev 9<sup>30</sup>); thyine wood, most precious wood, in juxtaposition to ivory (Rev 18<sup>1</sup>); footstool (Ja 2<sup>3</sup>); vessels (2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>). The coppersmith (q.v.) is expressly named in 2 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>. With the free use of iron at this time it is probable the copper-smith worked mostly on ornamental lines, being skilled in alloys, refining, engraving, burnishing (Rev 15<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>). Mirrors (1 Co 13<sup>12</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>, Ja 1<sup>23</sup>) were among the articles produced (see MIRROR). 'Brass' should in all probability be replaced by 'bronze' or 'copper' throughout the NT.

Still finer was the work done in gold, silver, and precious stones. The silversmiths of Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>4</sup>) were a powerful gild, working at a particular craft, viz., the making of silver shrines or models of the Temple of Diana (see Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 112 ff.; and art. DIANA). This was part of a wider practice of fashioning idols in the precious metals (Ac 17<sup>3</sup>, Rev 9<sup>9</sup>). These elements entered into dress and personal ornament (1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>, Ja 2<sup>2</sup>), as also into house furniture (2 Ti 2<sup>20</sup>). The references in Rev. are too numerous to mention, including garments (girdle, etc.), articles for food and drink (bowl, cup, etc.), and even altar and throne. Although these here appear as seen in vision, they were all of them possible to antiquity.

The use of gold, silver, etc., in coinage should not be overlooked. See artt. GOLD, SILVER.

7. There were also workers in stone and clay (including terra-cotta) along artistic lines. When graven by art and device of man (Ac 17<sup>29</sup>), stone, especially marble, took high value (Rev 9<sup>0</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>). Tablets of stone were also fashioned for commemorative purposes (Ac 17<sup>23</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>7</sup>, Rev 2<sup>17</sup>), attached to statues, tombs, etc., and the inscriptions in certain cases remain, yielding welcome archaeological evidence.

The potter's art (see POTTER) was as necessary as ever for household use (2 Co 4<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>0</sup>, Rev 2<sup>4</sup>). It provides St. Paul with a well-known metaphor (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>). Interesting details regarding Jewish pottery of this period are to be found in Conferences de Saint-Etienne, 1909-10, p. 99 ff. Glass appears only figuratively (Rev 21<sup>18</sup>, 21; cf. 4<sup>6</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>). But it was quite a common article of manufacture at this time (see, further, art. LAMP, etc.).

A whole system of trade (Ac 12<sup>20</sup> 27<sup>2-6</sup>, Ja 4<sup>13</sup>, Rev 18<sup>14</sup>) was built upon the practice of such arts as have here been passed in review, giving a livelihood to merchants, money-lenders, and also tax-collectors. The correspondence necessitated by trade and by the diffusion of knowledge must also have given occupation to many who prepared the materials for writing (parchment, papyrus, pen, ink, etc.).

8. Serious as most arts were, we yet learn that many spent their lives in following after pseudo-arts, e.g. the 'curious arts' (τα περίεργα) of Ac 19<sup>19</sup>; cf. Simon Magus (Ac 8<sup>9a</sup>), Elymas (Bar-Jesus; Ac 13<sup>6a</sup>), and the masters of the Philippian maid (Ac 16<sup>19</sup>). As seriously taken as any were the gymnastic arts: running, boxing (1 Co 9<sup>24a</sup>), and wrestling (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>). See art. GAMES.

LITERATURE.—The art. 'Arts and Crafts' in SDB may be consulted. An exhaustive list of authoritative works will be found in HDB v. 57<sup>b</sup>, appended to the art. 'New Testament Times.' Another very complete list of a specialized order appears in S. Krauss, Talmud. Archäologie, Leipzig, 1910-11, ii. 249. This work is very important. M. B. Schwalm, La Vie privée du peuple juif à l'époque de Jésus-Christ, Paris, 1910, written from the sociological standpoint, is useful. The works of W. M. Ramsay and A. Deissmann are also helpful.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

ASCENSION 1. NT statements. The historical account of the Ascension is given in Ac 1<sup>2-12</sup>, for the Gospel story does not carry us so far. The Ascension, the last of the series of the post-Resurrection appearances, is a new subject, and the description of it begins a new book. This is the case whatever view we take of the text of Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, as that in any case is no detailed description of the event, but only a brief summary of the incidents. The First and Fourth Gospels end before the final departure, and so probably did the Second, the conclusion of which (after 16<sup>8</sup>) we have lost.

The place of the Ascension was Olivet (Ac 1<sup>12</sup>, Ἐλαιών—so, according to some editors, we ought to read the word in Lk 19<sup>29</sup> 21<sup>37</sup>), usually called the Mount of Olives. It was 'over against Bethany' (Lk 24<sup>50</sup>), and therefore on the far or S.E. side of the hill, looking down on Bethany, which lies in a hollow; the reputed site overlooks Jerusalem, and is unlikely to have been the real one (Swete, Appearances, p. 103; but see C. Warren, in HDB iii. 619). As they were talking, Jesus lifted up His hands and blessed the disciples (Lk 24<sup>50</sup>), and in the act of blessing He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>). Two angels ('men in white apparel') appeared and assured them of His future return to earth, and they went back to Jerusalem (v. 10<sup>a</sup>) with great joy (Lk 24<sup>52</sup>). There had been no record of angelic appearances when the risen Jesus was seen by the disciples, as we might have expected from Jn 1<sup>51</sup>; the angels appeared only to announce the Resurrection and to explain the Ascension. The account in Lk 24<sup>50-52</sup> can hardly apply to any other parting than the Ascension, even if with 'Western' authorities (DA, some Old-Lat. MSS, Augustine*) we omit the last half of v. 51: 'was carried up into heaven.' On no other supposition can the 'joy' of the disciples be understood. At any rate, the person who inserted the words, whether the Evangelist or a scribe, so took them.

The NT is full of references to the Ascension. It is called an 'assumption' (ἀνάληψις), in the hymn quoted in 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> ('received up [ἀνελήφθη] in glory'), in the Appendix to Mk. (16<sup>19</sup>, ἀνελήφθη) and Lk 9<sup>51</sup> ('the days of his assumption', ἀνάληψις), as in Ac 1<sup>2</sup> 11. 22 (cf. ὑπελαβεν, v. 9). The same verb is used of Elijah (2 K 2<sup>11</sup> LXX, Sir 48<sup>9</sup>) and of Enoch (Sir 49<sup>14</sup>), and also of the vessel received up into heaven in St. Peter's vision (Ac 10<sup>16</sup>). On the other hand, we read of an 'ascension' (ἀνάβασις) in * Augustine inserts the words once, and omits them once. Syr-sin is also quoted for the omission; it reads: 'when he blessed them, he was lifted up (ettrūm) from them,' which seems to be an abbreviation of the fuller text, and, if so, to be a witness against the omission (the tr. 'taken away' is possible but less probable; D-lat has 'discessit'). Syr-sin also omits 'and they worshipped him,' with 'Western' texts. The Peshitta Syriac has the full text (with elhpreshē, 'was separated,' for the first verb), as has the Latin Vulgate. The omission may be due to homoioteleuton.

Jn 6<sup>62</sup> 20<sup>17</sup>, and in Eph 4<sup>8t</sup>, where Ps 68<sup>18</sup> is quoted, the first clause nearly following the LXX, the latter differing from it. St. Paul was probably guided by an old Jewish interpretation (Robinson, Com. in loc.); so in Ac 2<sup>34</sup> St. Peter says that David did not ascend (ἀνέβη) into the heavens. The word 'ascension' has less of a mystical meaning than 'assumption,' and emphasizes the historical side of the matter; 'assumption' may be misinterpreted in a Docetic sense, as it is in the Gospel of Peter, 5, where our Lord's death is so called (ἀνελήφθη) by the Docetic author. For this reason Irenæus speaks of the Ascension as an 'assumption in the flesh' (ἐνσαρκον ἀναλήψιν [Hæc. I. x. 1]); see also Svete, Ap. Creed, 70). Other words are used elsewhere in the NT. Jesus is the High Priest who has 'passed through' (διελθυσθῶτα) the heavens (He 4<sup>14</sup>)—the reference is to the idea of seven heavens (cf. 7<sup>26</sup> 'made higher than the heavens'); He 'entered' (εἰσῆλθε) within the veil as a forerunner on our behalf (6<sup>20</sup>), not into a holy place (ἁγία) made with hands, but into heaven itself (9<sup>12</sup> 24). The Ascension was a 'departure' (Jn 16<sup>7</sup>, ἀπέλθω), a 'parting' (Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, διέστη), according to many MSS a 'carrying up' into heaven (ib., ἀνεφέρετο [see above], a verb used of the taking up of the disciples to the Mount of Transfiguration, Mt 17<sup>1</sup>, Mk 9<sup>1</sup>), a 'lifting up' (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>, ἐπῆρθη, a verb used of lifting up the eyes to heaven, Lk 18<sup>13</sup>, Jn 17<sup>1</sup>), and a 'journey' (1 P 3<sup>2</sup>, πορευθεῖς, used of the nobleman who went into a far country, a parable looking forward to the Ascension, Lk 19<sup>12</sup>).

The Ascension of our Lord was not a death. David did not ascend, though he died and was buried (Ac 2<sup>29</sup> 34). So in Jn 3<sup>13</sup> those who had died had not 'ascended.' This verse would hardly have been recorded if the Evangelist had not assumed the Ascension of Jesus as a historical fact, and it is in effect a prophecy of that event; it asserts the pre-existence (καταβάς), and points forward to the Ascension, though it does not assert that our Lord had at that time actually ascended (ἀναβέβηκεν).

The Ascension is implied by the expected return or 'descent' of our Lord, 1 Th 4<sup>16</sup> (καταβήσεται), a return called a 'revelation' (ἀποκάλυψις) of the Lord Jesus in 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>. The disciples did not look for any other appearance such as had taken place in the Forty Days, until He should come at the end of the world.

2. Session and exaltation of our Lord.—In the passages given above, the Ascension is described as the parting of Jesus from the disciples at the last of the Resurrection appearances; for thereafter there were no such manifestations as those in which Jesus had been touched by the disciples and had eaten in their presence (Mt 28<sup>9</sup>, Lk 24<sup>43</sup> and probably vv. 30, 35, Jn 20<sup>27</sup>—though St. Thomas perhaps did not actually touch the Lord when invited to do so—and possibly 20<sup>17</sup>); the appearances to St. Paul at his conversion and to St. John in Patmos were of quite another nature. In the description of the parting a symbolical tinge is seen. The glorified body is received by a cloud as it gradually vanishes from the disciples' eyes. But 'up' and 'down' are symbolical words; heaven is not a place vertically above the Mount of Olives, nor is it a place at all, but a state; the Ascension is a transition rather from one condition to another than from one place to another (Milligan, The Ascension, p. 26). The fact that men were accustomed to speak symbolically of heaven being 'above' was doubtless the reason of the last disappearance taking the form that it did; it would seem that when Jesus disappeared on former occasions during the Forty Days (for the Gospels describe His Resurrection body as being not bound by the ordinary laws of Nature) He did not vanish by an apparently upward movement. In the statements about the ascended life of our Lord symbolism has to be still more freely employed, as no human language can adequately describe the new conditions. Just as symbol was necessary to describe the Temptation of our Lord, or the overthrow of Satan by the efforts of the Seventy disciples (Lk 10<sup>17t</sup>), or the eventual triumph over evil foretold in the Apocalypse, so was it necessary in describing the heavenly life of Jesus. The use of symbolism, of which the Bible from beginning to end is full, does not mean that the incident or condition described is mythical, but that it cannot be expressed in ordinary human words. Sanday, in his striking lecture on 'The Symbolism of the Bible' (Life of Christ in Recent Research, Oxford, 1907), defines it as 'indirect description.'

The symbolism used to describe our Lord's ascended life is that of Ps 110<sup>1</sup>, which is quoted directly in Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Mt 22<sup>44</sup>, Ac 2<sup>34t</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>, He 1<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>12t</sup>, and indirectly in numerous passages which speak of Jesus being, sitting, or standing, on God's right hand till all His enemies are subdued. In some passages it is said that He 'sat down' (ἐκάθισεν, He 1<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>, Mk' 16<sup>19</sup>) or 'hath sat down' (κεκάθικεν, He 12<sup>2</sup>, inferior MSS ἐκάθισεν); so in Eph 1<sup>20</sup> it is said that God 'made him to sit' (καθίσας), and in Rev 3<sup>21</sup> Jesus says 'I sat down (ἐκάθισα) with my Father in his throne' (cf. 12<sup>5</sup>). In other passages Jesus is said to 'be sitting,' as in Col 3<sup>1</sup> (ἐσθίν . . . καθήμενος); so in Mk 14<sup>62</sup> and || (see below). While the former method of expression emphasizes the historic fact of the Ascension on a certain day, the latter denotes that the Session was not an isolated, but is a continuous, action. The latter point of view is seen also in Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>22</sup> ('who is at the right hand'), and in Ac 7<sup>55t</sup> where Stephen sees the Lord 'standing' at the right hand of God—ready (such seems to be the meaning) to help His martyr (cf. also Rev 5<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>). And we note that in Ps 110<sup>1</sup> [LXX] the imperative 'sit' (κάθου) marks the continuance of the Session (Westcott on He 1<sup>13</sup>). This variation in biblical usage is reflected in the use of both 'sitteth' and 'sat down' (sedet, sedit) in different Creeds. The former is the usual form, e.g. in the 'Constantinopolitan' form of the Nicene Creed (καθεζόμενος; cf. Tertullian, de Virg. Vel. 1, 'sedentem nunc'). But the latter is sometimes found, especially in the 4th cent., as in the Creed of Jerusalem (Cyr. Jer. Cat. xiv. 27, καθίσαντα ἐκ δεξιῶν τοῦ Πατρὸς); in the Testament of our Lord (ii. 8); the Verona Latin fragments of the Didascalia (ed. Hauler, p. 110); the Egyptian and Ethiopic Church Orders; and in the Creeds of the Abbot Pirminius (8th cent.), of the Bangor Antiphony (7th cent.), of the Gallican Sacramentary (7th cent.; Codex Bobiensis), and of the Missale Gallicanum (Mabillon); cf. also Tert. de Præscr. 13, 'sedisse.'

The Session is 'at the right hand of God'—either ἐκ δεξιῶν or ἐν δεξιᾷ; the former in Ps 110<sup>1</sup> [LXX] ('at my right hand') and in the quotations of it in Mt 22<sup>44</sup>, Mk 12<sup>36</sup>, Ac 2<sup>34</sup>, He 1<sup>13</sup>, also in the allusions to it in Mk 14<sup>62</sup> and || Mt 26<sup>64</sup> (both 'of power') and || Lk 22<sup>69</sup> ('of the power of God') and Mk' 16<sup>19</sup>, Ac 7<sup>55t</sup> twice ('of God'). But St. Paul, St. Peter, and the writer of Hebrews prefer ἐν δεξιᾷ: Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, He 10<sup>12</sup> (though v. 13 is a quotation from Ps 110<sup>1</sup>), Col 3<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>2</sup> (all these have 'of God'); so He 1<sup>3</sup> ('of the Majesty on high') 8<sup>1</sup> ('of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens') 12<sup>2</sup> ('of the throne of God'), Eph 1<sup>20</sup> ('his right hand'). With these phrases cf. Ac 2<sup>33</sup> ('being therefore by the right hand of God exalted, ὑψωθείς') 5<sup>31</sup> ('him did God exalt with his right hand'), in both of which places RVm reads 'at' for 'by' or 'with.'

The symbolism of Session, according to Pearson

(On the Creed, art. vi.) and Westcott (Historic Faith, 1890, p. 52), is that of perfect rest from all pain, sorrow, disturbance, and opposition. Yet, as Swete points out (Ascended Christ, p. 14), this is, at best, incomplete. The seated monarch on earth is not idle, and so the seated Christ 'rests not day nor night from the unintermitting energies of heaven.' The symbolism of the right hand is unmistakable. It expresses the exaltation and glory of the Ascended Christ as Man. Jesus did not merely return to His former glory (cf. Jn 17<sup>5</sup>: 'which I had with thee before the world was'), but, in addition, was glorified in His human nature. For the exaltation see Lk 24<sup>26</sup> ('to enter into his glory'—the glory which was His due), Jn 7<sup>39</sup> 12<sup>16</sup>, Ac 2<sup>36</sup> ('God hath made him—caused him to be recognized as—both Lord and Christ'; with reference to the Session), 2 Co 3<sup>13-18</sup>, Ph 2<sup>9</sup> (αὐτὸν ὑπερυψώσε, 'highly exalted him,' in consequence of the self-emptying and self-humiliation), 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> ('received up in glory'), He 2<sup>9</sup> ('crowned with glory and honour'), and the passages given above. The exaltation or 'lifting up' (ὑψωσις) is spoken of by our Lord in immediate reference to the Crucifixion (Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>32-34</sup>), but doubtless with the further thought that death leads to glory (cf. Jn 13<sup>31</sup>; see also Milligan, op. cit. p. 78 f.).—It is not improbable that the period of Forty Days was one of increasing glory, of which the Ascension was the consummation. In Jn 20<sup>17</sup> our Lord says to Mary Magdalene, 'I ascend' (ἀναβαίω), that is, not 'I shall ascend,' as our looser English use of the present tense may suggest, but 'I am ascending.' 'The Resurrection had begun the great change; from Easter morning He was already ascending' (Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, p. 374). But the last parting was the definite act of Ascension.

3. The work of the ascended Christ.—(a) Jesus has ascended to make intercession for us as our Priest, Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, He 7<sup>25</sup> (a perpetual intercession). The High-Priesthood of Christ is one of the great themes of Hebrews, and Ps 110<sup>4</sup> is quoted in He 5<sup>6, 10</sup> 7<sup>17, 21</sup>. Jesus is High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek, not of the Aaronic order (see below). He is our 'great priest' (10<sup>-1</sup>). One of the meanings of 'Paraclete' is 'Advocate' or 'Intercessor,' and Jesus is our Paraclete (1 Jn 2<sup>1</sup>), as He Himself implies in calling the Holy Ghost 'another Paraclete' (ἄλλον Παράκλητον, Jn 14<sup>16</sup>). His very presence in heaven is the intercession which He offers. He 'appears before the face of God for us' (He 9<sup>-4</sup>). This is the meaning of the references in Hebrews to the high priest entering into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (4<sup>14-16</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>27</sup> 8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>7, 12, 24</sup> etc.). But we must notice two differences between the type and the antitype. The earthly high priest stands to offer (10<sup>11</sup>), while Jesus is usually (though not always) depicted as sitting (above, § 2). And the earthly high priest enters into the Holy of Holies alone, leaving the people outside, while Jesus carries the people with Him within the veil and gives them access to the Father (yv. 19-22). Jesus is the Mediator (8<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>-4</sup>), and on His mediation all human intercession is based (1 Ti 2<sup>1-5</sup>). Mediation and intercession are not, indeed, quite the same thing. A mediator brings the contending parties together. But our ascended Mediator goes further, and offers intercession for all men (see Swete, Asc. Christ, p. 93). In this connexion we must notice that there is no contradiction between the intercession of the Holy Ghost and that of our ascended Lord. St. Paul speaks of both intercessions in the same context (Ro 8<sup>26, 34</sup>). The two are not to be separated; they are really one act, though the insufficiency of human language makes them seem two. The intercession of our Lord in heaven and that of the Spirit in the hearts of believers are one. Christ in heaven sends the Holy Ghost to intercede within us. This double conception is parallel with that of the Holy Spirit coming down to us here on earth at the same time that we are taken up to 'the heavens' with Jesus (Eph 2<sup>6</sup>).

It has long been disputed when the High-Priesthood of Christ began. He was the Priest-Victim on the Cross, and some passages in Hebrews point to a Priesthood on earth, while others point to one in heaven only. Westcott (Hebrews<sup>3</sup>, p. 229, Add. Note on 8<sup>1</sup>) says that Christ fulfilled two types, and that there are two aspects of His Priesthood, one as fulfilling the Levitical High-Priesthood on earth before the Session, and the other as fulfilling that of Melchizedek thereafter. The priesthood was thus, as it were, completed by the Ascension. But Milligan (op. cit. p. 72 ff.) denies the two types of priesthood, and says that our Lord's Priesthood began with His glorification, and that the Death was part of this glorification, falling in the sphere of the heavenly Priesthood. There seems to be much truth in both views. The Priesthood of Christ is one, but as the earthly high priest only fulfilled his priesthood when he brought the blood of the victim within the Holy Place, so Christ did not fulfil His Priesthood till the Ascension (see J. H. Bernard, in ERE ii. 157).

(b) Jesus has ascended to rule over and to fill all things; He is our King. This is specially emphasized in Rev (1<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 19<sup>12, 16</sup> 20<sup>4</sup>). Jesus is the ruler of the kings of the earth, and is worthy to receive the power and the might; the kingdom of the world is become the Kingdom of our Lord [the Father] and of His Christ; Jesus has many diadems on His head, and is King of kings and Lord of lords; He reigns with His saints for a thousand years. St. Paul also emphasizes the Kingship of the Ascended Christ. He must (δεῖ)—it is fitting that He should—reign till His enemies are conquered (1 Co 15<sup>25</sup>). He is seated far above all rule, authority, and power, both in this and in the coming age (Eph 1<sup>-1</sup>); He ascended that He might fill all things (Eph 4<sup>10</sup>; cf. 3<sup>19</sup>). His rule is with a view to the restoration of the universe to order, and is not only over Christians, but over all. He was exalted that in His name every knee should bow throughout the whole universe (Ph 2<sup>9</sup>), i.e. in the name which the Father gave Him (v. 9), namely, the Divine Majesty: to the Divine Jesus all shall do homage (see Lightfoot's note). He is the Head of the Church, and in all things has the pre-eminence (πρωτεύων), for in Him all the fulness dwells (Col 1<sup>19</sup>. for πληρωμα, see Robinson, Ephesians, p. 255); cf. Eph 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>23</sup>. So St. Peter speaks of angels and authorities and powers being made subject to the Ascended Christ (1 P 3<sup>-2</sup>). All authority in heaven and earth has been given to Him (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>). He is the Priest-King, the 'priest upon his throne' of Zec 6<sup>13</sup>; and His Kingship assures us that good will triumph over evil.

(c) The office of the Ascended Jesus as Prophet is not so explicitly mentioned in the NT as His Priesthood and Kingship. Yet it is clearly implied. His prophetic or teaching office did not cease at the Ascension; on the contrary, He thereafter teaches more plainly; not, as formerly, in proverbs (Jn 16<sup>-3</sup>); the teaching is through the gift of the Spirit, who was to teach us all things (14<sup>26</sup>), and guide us into all the truth, not speaking from Himself, 'for he shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you' (16<sup>13</sup>). This is illustrated by the outpouring of the gift of prophecy upon the infant Church; 'the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy' (Rev 19<sup>10</sup>). Now the Ascension is intimately connected with the gift of the Spirit. The Ascension was not a mere spectacle to reassure the disciples, but the mode by which we are given a new life. Until Jesus was glorified it was not possible for the new mode of His presence to take effect (Jn 7<sup>39</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>49</sup>). Hence the necessity of our Lord's death: otherwise the grain of wheat could not bear fruit (Jn 12<sup>-4</sup>). The Ascended Christ became a life-giving Spirit (1 Co 15<sup>45</sup>). The connexion between the Ascension and the gift of the Spirit is also seen from the fact that the last words of Jesus (Ac 1<sup>3</sup>) were that the disciples should receive power when the Holy Ghost should be come upon them, and so they would be Jesus' witnesses in all the world. This explains to us the purport of the words 'after he had spoken to them,' in the Appendix to Mk. (16<sup>19</sup>).

(d) Another work is referred to in He 6<sup>20</sup>. The Ascended Christ has entered within the veil on our behalf as a Forerunner (πρόδρομος [see FORE-RUNNER]), to prepare a place for us (Jn 14-; for the 'many resting-places,' see Swete, Asc. Christ, 105 ff.), that we may sit with Him on His throne (Rev 3<sup>-1</sup>).

4. Interval between the Resurrection and the Ascension.—In Ac 1<sup>3</sup> Jesus is said to have appeared to the disciples 'by the space of forty days' (δι' ἡμερῶν τεσσαράκοντα). This interval has been usually taken as exact, and when the Festival of the Ascension was instituted, in the 4th cent., the sixth Thursday after Easter was selected for the purpose (Ap. Const. v. 20; cf. viii. 33, ed. Funk), and has been so observed ever since. But St. Luke's words do not necessarily imply an exact period of forty days, and there have been other calculations. In the Third Gospel he describes all the events which took place after the Resurrection till the 'parting' of 24<sup>51</sup> (see above, § 1), without any note of time, and the deduction has been drawn that when he wrote the Gospel he supposed that all the post-Resurrection appearances which he describes took place on Easter Day itself, but that he learnt a more accurate chronology before he wrote Acts (cf. art. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, V. 1). This is scarcely credible, and assumes that the Gospels are what they never claim to be—chronological biographies, like modern 'Lives.' This view makes St. Luke get in all the events which happened after the evening meal at Emmaus (v. 29), including the return journey of the two disciples 7 or 8 miles to Jerusalem, before nightfall, for none of the authorities suggests that the Ascension took place at night. In Lk 24 we have a series of events foreshortened (probably because the author had already planned Acts), and no note of time is suggested.

There are, however, some indications that the words 'forty days' were not always taken exactly. 'Barnabas' makes the Ascension take place on a Sunday (§ 15); but he does not say that it was the same Sunday as the Resurrection ('the eighth day . . . in which also Jesus rose from the dead, and, having been manifested, ascended up to heaven'). He mentions the 'eighth' rather than the 'first' day because it follows the seventh day or Sabbath, of which he is treating; he hints at the replacement of the Jewish Sabbath by the Christian Lord's day, but only obscurely. With this we may compare the fact that in the Edessene Canons (4th cent.) the Ascension was commemorated on Whitsunday, and so in the Pilgrimage of 'Silvia' (Ethiopia), though in that work the fortieth day after Easter was observed for another purpose; see the present writer's art. 'Calendar, The Christian,' in DCG i. 261<sup>a</sup>. This is some confirmation of the suggestion that the Ascension took place on a Sunday. There are also some speculations of an extravagant nature, such as the Valentinian idea that the interval between the Resurrection and the Ascension was 18 months, or that of certain Ophites that it was 11 or 12 years, or that of Eusebius in one place (Dem. Evng. viii. 2) that it was as long as the Ministry before the Crucifixion; see Swete,

Ap. Creed, p. 69 f. All that we can deduce from these facts is that, while the Ascension may have taken place on the Thursday, it may also have happened on the following Sunday, or on any day between or close to these dates.

5. Modern objections to the Ascension.—The present article is mainly concerned with the facts, and the reader may be referred for an answer to objections from a philosophical point of view to A. S. Martin's article in DCG i., which is very full on this head. Here it is enough to say (a) that the objection that it is impossible for a body to disobey the laws of gravity and to ascend instead of fall, presupposes that the Resurrection body of our Lord was under the same material conditions as His body before Easter Day, which all the Evangelists' accounts show not to have been the case. Objections on this head are therefore really objections to the Resurrection, not to the Ascension. (b) It is impossible to regard the account in Ac 1 as a myth unless we adopt the now exploded theory that the whole gospel story is such. The narrative bears the same stamp of truth as the evangelical records. For example, Sanday well points out the authentic touch about the disciples desiring the restoration of the earthly kingdom of Israel (v. 6-; see HDB ii. 643<sup>a</sup>). However we may interpret the narrative, there can be little doubt that it represents what the eye-witnesses believed to have taken place.

But an allegation of Harnack must be briefly noticed here, as it deals with the facts. He says that the special prominence given to the Ascension in the Creeds is a deviation from the oldest teaching, and that in the primitive tradition the Ascension had no separate place (Das apost. Glaubensbekenntnis, Berlin, 1892). He alleges the silence of the Synoptists, of St. Paul in 1 Co 15<sup>37</sup>, and of the chief sub-apostolic writers; the placing, in some old accounts, of the Session after the Resurrection as if they were one act; and the discrepancy noted above as to the interval between the Resurrection and the Ascension. These allegations have been ably answered by Swete (Ap. Creed, ch. vi.). The argument from silence (always precarious) is invalid in the case of Mt. and Mk., which do not carry the narrative so far as the Ascension (the end of Mk. is lost); at best it hardly applies to Lk. (see above, § 1), and the mention of the Ascension in 1 Co 15<sup>37</sup> would have been irrelevant to St. Paul's argument. Moreover, the Ascension belongs to the history of the Church rather than to the gospel narrative, and therefore it is not to be expected that it should be found there except in allusion. It is hard to see any force in the argument from St. Paul's silence in one place when elsewhere he so emphatically states his belief in the Ascension. As to the sub-apostolic writers, the Ascension is explicitly mentioned by 'Barnabas' (§ 15), by Justin (Dial. 38), and is probably referred to by Ignatius (Magn. 7). The allegation that the Session and the Resurrection were regarded as one act may be tested by Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, where St. Paul names successively the Death, Resurrection, Session, and Intercession of Christ. If the second and third of these are one act, why not also the first and fourth? The argument from the interval has already been dealt with (above, § 4). For fuller details, see Swete, Ap. Creed. It is quite intelligible that those who believe that our Lord is mere Man should find difficulties in the doctrine that He ascended; but it is not really possible to maintain that the disciples did not believe it.

6. Importance of the Ascension for the practical life.—This has been indirectly pointed out above (§ 3). The Ascension shows that the work of Christ for man has never ceased, but is permanent, although He has never needed to repeat His sacrifice. It has brought Jesus into closer touch with us; He has never ceased to be Man, and in the heavenly sphere is not removed far away from us, but is with us until the end of the world (Mt 28<sup>9</sup>). He raises our ideals from earthly things to heavenly; and, giving us through the Spirit the new life which enables us to follow Him, by His Ascension teaches us the great Sursum Corda: 'Lift up your hearts; we lift them up unto the Lord.'

LITERATURE.—W. Milligan, The Ascension and Heavenly Priesthood of our Lord (Baird Lecture), London, 1892; H. B. Swete, The Apostles' Creed, Cambridge, 1894, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament, London, 1909, Appendix E, The Appearances of our Lord after the Passion, do. 1907, The Ascended Christ, do. 1910; J. Pearson, On the Creed, art. vi.; J. Denney, art. 'Ascension,' in HDB i.; W. Sanday, art. 'Jesus Christ,' ib. ii.; A. S. Martin, art. 'Ascension,' in DCG i.; J. G. Simpson, art. 'Ascension,' in SDB; J. H. Bernard, art. 'Assumption and Ascension,' in ERE ii.; B. F. Westcott, Com. on Hebrews, London, 1906; R. L. Ottley, The Rule of Faith and Hope, do. 1912, p. 82ff.; A. J. Tait, The Heavenly Session of our Lord, do. 1912; S. C. Gayford, elaborate review of foregoing, in JThSt xiv. [1913] 458.

A. J. MACLEAN.

ASCENSION OF ISAIAH.—This is an apocryphon now extant in a complete form in the Ethiopic Version alone. It is composite in structure, and contains three separate parts of different authorship, one being of Jewish and two of Christian origin, but all alike apparently composed during the 1st cent. A.D. It is thus of considerable importance in the light which it throws upon the views held in certain circles of the Christian Church of the apostolic period with regard to the doctrines of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Resurrection, the Seven Heavens, the Antichrist, angels and demons. It adds, moreover, to our knowledge of the internal and external conditions of the Church, and of the stage which had been reached in the development of its organization. In phraseology and ideas it presents interesting parallels with the New Testament.

1. Composite character.—The title 'Ascension of Isaiah' is strictly appropriate only to the latter part of the work, chs. 6–11, in which Isaiah is successively led through the firmament and six lower heavens to the seventh heaven, and receives disclosures regarding the descent, birth, works, crucifixion, and ascension of the Beloved. The first five chapters deal in the main with Manasseh's wickedness and Isaiah's martyrdom, with a curious insertion (3<sup>13b</sup>–4<sup>18</sup>) which claims to be a vision foretelling the life of Christ and the fortunes of His Church, awkwardly introduced as explaining the wrath of Beliar which occasioned the martyrdom of Isaiah. A careful examination of the diction and subject-matter of each section leads to the clear discrimination of three distinct sources.

(a) The Martyrdom of Isaiah (1<sup>1</sup> 2a. 6b–13a 21–32 51b–14). This narrates how in the twenty-sixth year of his reign Hezekiah called Manasseh to receive accounts of visions which he had seen (1<sup>1</sup>–2). Isaiah, who is present, warns the king of Manasseh's future wickedness, and foretells his own martyrdom (1<sup>7</sup>–13). After Hezekiah's death, Manasseh, as foretold, forsakes the service of God and serves Satan, whereupon Isaiah withdraws first to Bethlehem and then to the desert with his companions (21–11). Meanwhile Belchira, a brother of the false prophet Zedekiah, son of Chenaanah, accuses Isaiah and his fellow-prophets to the king, of prophesying evil against Jerusalem, and claiming to have seen God, and calling Jerusalem Sodom, and the princes the people of Gomorrah (21–3<sup>10</sup>). Manasseh seizes Isaiah and has him sawn asunder with a wood-saw. Isaiah dies with wonderful firmness and constancy, communing with the Holy Spirit till the end. This narrative is mainly historical in form, and contains nothing specifically Christian. In its outlook it might well be Jewish, and this supposition is confirmed by the Patristic references (e.g. in Origen and Jerome) which attribute the account of the sawing asunder of Isaiah to Jewish traditions, and also by the fact that the Talmud contains a similar account of Isaiah's death. Further, the original was probably written in Hebrew. In 2<sup>1</sup> a play upon words appears when the passage is re-translated into Hebrew (מַלְחִירָה, מַלְחִירָה). The name 'Malchira' in 1<sup>8</sup> is a transliteration of מַלְחִירָה, as S. A. Cook has observed. Above all, the curious term 'a wooden saw' can hardly be explained except as a misrendering of מַלְחִירָה, 'a wood-saw.'

(b) The Vision of Isaiah (6–11). In the twentieth year of Hezekiah, Isaiah, in the presence of the king, when speaking in the Holy Spirit, is taken up in mind (cf. 2 Co 12<sup>2-4</sup>) through the firmament and each of the six lower heavens in turn, and finally arrives at the seventh heaven, to which he is admitted by special command of the Lord Christ. There he sees all the righteous from the time of Adam, including Abel, Seth, and Enoch, stript of the garments of the flesh, not sitting on their thrones nor as yet wearing their crowns of glory, until the Beloved has descended to earth (9<sup>12</sup> 13) and ascended again (9<sup>18</sup>). He sees the Great Glory, and on His right the Lord (the Beloved) and on His left the Holy Spirit. He worships the three, and his Lord and the Holy Spirit worship the Great Glory. The Father commissions the Son to descend to earth, and tells of His ascension and final judgment. The Son descends through each heaven in turn, assuming in each the form of the angels who dwell in them, and finally passes through the firmament and then the air to the earth. There Isaiah beholds His wonderful birth, miracles, and crucifixion, resurrection, mission of the Twelve, ascension, and session on the right hand of the Great Glory. Isaiah returns to his body and binds Hezekiah to secrecy concerning the vision.

The date of this narrative is probably in the 1st cent. A.D. The vision is quoted not only by Jerome, Com. in Isaiam, lxiv. 4 (Vallarsi, iv. 761), but also by the Actus Petri Vercellenses, ch. xxiv. (p. 72, ed. Lipsius), and by Hieracas the heretic, according to Epiphanius, Hær. lxxvii. 3. There is also a remarkable parallel between Ignatius, Ep. ad. Ephes. xix. and Asc. Is. 11<sup>16</sup>. There appears to be a reference to the sawing asunder in He 11<sup>37</sup>. The author wrote in Greek, and was a Christian with a Docetic tendency and a crude conception of the Trinity.

The title 'Ascension of Isaiah' properly belongs to this section of the work. Jerome so quotes it. Epiphanius refers to it as τὸ Ἀναβατικὸν Ἰσαίου. The Ethiopic, Slavonic, and Latin texts of 6<sup>1</sup> imply the title 'Vision of Isaiah,' and so does Montfaucon's Canon.

(c) The Testament of Hezekiah, a Christian Apocalypse (3<sup>13b</sup>–4<sup>18</sup>). This title is given in Cedrenus i. 120–121 (ed. Bonn), and is appropriate only to the above section. As Charles observes: 'that such a work was incorporated in the Ascension might also be inferred from 12b–5a, which describe the contents of Hezekiah's vision.' It describes, briefly stringing together various details in the manner of an epitome, the coming and death of the Beloved; the descent of the angel of the Christian Church; the ascension; the falling away of the Church, and the prevalence of error, impurity, strife, and covetousness; the coming of Beliar in the likeness of a lawless king, a matricide, who claims to be God, and demands Divine worship, and persecutes the saints for three years, seven months, and twenty-seven days. This persecution is ended by the second coming of the Lord, who drags Beliar into Gehenna, and gives rest to the godly, sets up a kingdom of the saints, who afterwards are transformed, and ascend, apparently, to heaven. The final judgment follows, and the godless are annihilated.

The date cannot be later than A.D. 100, for 4<sup>18</sup> presupposes that there were a few still alive who had seen the Lord in the flesh. The fusion of the three originally distinct conceptions of the Antichrist, of Beliar, and of Nero Redivivus cannot well be put earlier than A.D. 88 (see Charles, Asc. Is. pp. li-lxxiii). So the date of this section falls between A.D. 88 and 100.

2. Importance for New Testament study.—(a) The Trinity.—i. The First Person is called 'the Great Glory' (9<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>3</sup>), 'the Most High' (6<sup>8</sup> 7<sup>-3</sup> 10<sup>6</sup>), and 'Father' (8<sup>18</sup>; cf. 7<sup>8</sup> 10<sup>6</sup> 7 in Charles' restored text).

ii. The Second Person is generally referred to as 'the Beloved' (1<sup>4</sup> 5<sup>7</sup> 13 31<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>18</sup> 18 13 6<sup>9</sup> 9<sup>18</sup> 21 51<sup>5</sup> 71<sup>7</sup> 23 81<sup>8</sup> 25 91<sup>2</sup>) or 'my Lord' (81<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>7</sup> 16<sup>17</sup>), and also once as 'Lord of all those heavens and these thrones' (8<sup>9</sup>). His name is as yet unknown. He is 'the Only-Begotten, . . . whose name is not known to any flesh' (7<sup>3</sup>), 'the Elect One whose name has not been made known, and none of the heavens can learn His name' (8<sup>7</sup>). The title 'Christ,' and the phrase 'who will be called Jesus' (see 9<sup>5</sup> note in Charles' ed.) are probably original to the work. The title 'Son of Man' in the Latin and Slavonic versions of 11<sup>1</sup> is probably original, and was excluded by the editor of the present Greek version for doctrinal reasons (see Charles, Asc. Is. p. xxvi).

It is noteworthy that the title 'the Beloved' is bestowed on Christ by the Bath Qol in Mk 1<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>, and it is used by St. Paul in Eph 1<sup>6</sup>. As Armitage Robinson (HDB ii. 501) points out, it was probably a pre-Christian Messianic title. It is used in the OT of Israel, and so would naturally be transferred from the people to the Messiah, like the titles 'Servant' and 'Elect.' It was, moreover, a term interchangeable with the Messianic title 'the Elect,' as Luke (9<sup>35</sup>) substitutes ὁ ἐκλεκτός (Ν Β, etc.) for ὁ ἀγαπητός (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, Mk 9<sup>7</sup>). In early Christian writings also the title is applied to Christ, e.g. Ep. Barn. iii. 6, iv. 3. 8; Clem. Rom. lix. 2f.; Ign. Smyrn. inscr.; Herm. Sim. ix. 12. 5. No doubt the writer thought the term most appropriate in a work claiming to be an ancient Jewish prophecy of Christ, but its vagueness also betrays the undeveloped Trinitarian conceptions of the period. The Son and the Holy Spirit receive worship (9<sup>33-36</sup>), but they in turn worship the Great Glory (9<sup>40</sup>). They stand, one on His right hand and the other on His left (9<sup>35</sup>). (We may compare the Hieracite doctrine in Epiph. Her. lxvii. 3.) The command to descend to earth is given by the Father (10<sup>9</sup>). The conception of the gradual transformation in form, suggests a Gnostic colouring, and possibly a Docetic tendency, as do also the statement that the Beloved escaped recognition at each stage, and the miraculous appearance of the born babe two months after the Virgin's conception. The Proter. Jacobi and the Actus Petri have interesting parallels to the narrative here (11<sup>3-14</sup>), while we can hardly doubt that it is the source of Ignatius' words in ad. Ephes. xix., καὶ ἔλαθεν τὸν ἀρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἢ παρθενία Μαρίας καὶ ὁ τοκετὸς αὐτῆς, ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ θάνατος τοῦ Κυρίου. 'The concealment of the real nature of Christ is the entire theme of 10<sup>8</sup>-11<sup>19</sup>.' He is, however, really crucified, and descends to the angel of Sheol (11<sup>19</sup>. 20. cf. 10<sup>8</sup>). In His ascension He has resumed His proper form, and all the angels of the firmament and the Satans see Him and worship Him (11<sup>-3</sup>; cf. 10<sup>15</sup>). On arriving in the seventh heaven, He sits down (not stands, as in 9<sup>35</sup>) on the right hand, and the Holy Spirit on the left (11<sup>3</sup>-33). His session with God, however, will not be realized by the angels of the world until the final judgment (10<sup>14</sup>).

The significance of the crucifixion is nowhere noticed, but in 9<sup>16</sup> the 'plundering of the angel of death' (cf. Ign. ad. Magn. ix.; Mt 27<sup>52</sup>. 53; Evangel. Nicodem. i. i, xi. 1 [ed. Tisch.]) is regarded as the result of the descensio in inferna (cf. 1 P 3<sup>19</sup> 4<sup>6</sup>). In the Test. Hez. (i.e. 31<sup>30-418</sup>) His work includes the founding of the Church ('the descent of the angel of the Christian Church,' 31<sup>5</sup>), and, after coming forth from the tomb on the shoulders of Gabriel and Michael, the sending out of the Twelve. Those who believe in His cross will be saved, and many who believe in Him will speak through the Holy Spirit. The Ascension, not the Resurrection, is the distinctive object of faith to the believer in 2<sup>9</sup> 31<sup>8</sup>. At His second coming the Lord will Himself drag Beliar into Gehenna (41<sup>4</sup>), and give rest to the godly still alive in the body (cf. 2 Th 1<sup>6</sup> 7, 1 Th 4<sup>17</sup>). The saints (i.e. the departed) will come with the Lord (1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>) and descend and be present in this world (41<sup>6</sup>), and the Lord will minister to those who have kept watch in this world (cf. Lk 12<sup>35</sup>). Apparently an earthly Messianic Kingdom is implied (cf. Rev 20<sup>4-6</sup>). It is followed by a spiritual translation to heaven, the body being left in the world (41<sup>7</sup>). Then follows '[a resurrection and] a judgment,' and the godless are entirely destroyed by fire from before the Beloved (41<sup>8</sup>).

iii. The Third Person is spoken of as an angel, the angel of the Spirit (42<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>39</sup>. 40 10<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>4</sup>) or the angel of the Holy Spirit (31<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>-3</sup> 9<sup>36</sup> 11<sup>33</sup>). In communion with Him, Isaiah endures his martyrdom, and also is carried in spirit to the third heaven. The Holy Spirit stands (9<sup>33</sup>), and after the Ascension sits (11<sup>33</sup>) on the left hand of the Great Glory. The angel of the Holy Spirit in 31<sup>6</sup> must be regarded as Gabriel, and in 11<sup>4</sup> He performs the part of Gabriel in the Annunciation.

(b) The Resurrection is apparently a spiritual one. The 'garments,' i.e. spiritual bodies, are reserved for the righteous, with the robes and crowns in the seventh heaven (41<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>-3</sup> 81<sup>4</sup>. 5<sup>6</sup>). These garments are received at once after death (81<sup>4</sup> 91<sup>1</sup>), the thrones and crowns not till after the Ascension of Christ (91<sup>2</sup> 13). The living whom the Lord finds on His return will be 'strengthened in the garments of the saints.' There is a temporary Messianic Kingdom, and (?) a feast (41<sup>6</sup>), followed by a spiritual consummation in heaven (cf. Ph 3<sup>-1</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>. 53). The righteous from Adam downwards are already in the seventh heaven, stript of the garments of the flesh, though not yet seated on their thrones and crowned (9<sup>9</sup>). The Final Judgment is referred to in 41<sup>8</sup> and 10<sup>14</sup>.

(c) Beliar.—The idea of demonic possession is very prominent in the Martyrdom of Isaiah. Beliar is regarded as served by Manasseh and ruling in his heart (18. 9. 11 21. 4. 7 31<sup>1</sup> 51. 15), and as aiding Belchira (53). The name 'Beliar' is absent from the Vision, and in the Test. Hez. it has quite another meaning, the Beliar Antichrist appearing in the form of a man—Nero (4- 14. 16. 18). In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs Beliar appears in both meanings, at times as the source of immoral deeds, and at times as the Antichrist (see Charles, Asc. Is. 1<sup>8</sup>n.). In the Sibylline Oracles, ii. 167 he is to come as the Antichrist, working signs; in iii. 63-73 to proceed from the Roman Emperors, deceive the elect, and finally be burnt up. He is also called Matanbuchus (24) and Mechembechus (53). His relation to Sammael is puzzling. In part the two seem identical; both dwell and rule in the firmament (7<sup>9</sup> 4-), take possession of Manasseh (21 19 31<sup>1</sup> 51), are wroth with Isaiah for his visions (51<sup>5</sup> 31<sup>3</sup> 51), and cause Isaiah to be sawn asunder (114<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>5</sup>). But in part Sammael seems to be subordinate. He exerts himself to win Manasseh as the subject of Beliar (18). Beliar has kings under him (41<sup>6</sup>), and is the prince of this world (13 4-; cf. 41<sup>8</sup>). He will finally be cast into Gehenna with his armies (41<sup>4</sup>). In 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup> St. Paul asks 'What concord hath Christ with Beliar?' Here either meaning of Beliar is possible. In 2 Th 2<sup>1-2</sup> the two ideas appear to be fused with yet a third—that of a human sovereign with miraculous powers. The 'man of lawlessness' is possibly a translation of 'Beliar' (cf. LXX: ἀνὴρ παράνομος in Dt 13<sup>13</sup> etc.). In Asc. Is. 2<sup>4</sup> Beliar is the angel of lawlessness, and makes Manasseh strong in apostatizing and lawlessness (cf. 2<sup>7</sup>). The sins specified are witchcraft, magic, divination and auguration, fornication, and the persecution of the righteous. The 'falling away' of 2 Th 2<sup>3</sup> is referred to in Asc. Is. 3<sup>21</sup>: 'on the eve of His approach, His disciples will forsake . . . their faith and their love and their purity.' Cf. 'few in those days will be left as His servants' (4<sup>13</sup>; cf. Lk 18<sup>8</sup>).

(d) The Antichrist and Nero Redivivus.—In 4<sup>2</sup> we are told:

'Beliar the great ruler, the king of this world [cf. Jn 12<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>11</sup>] will descend, who hath ruled it since it came into being; yea he will descend from his firmament [cf. Eph 2- 6<sup>12</sup>] in the likeness of a man, a lawless king, the slayer of his mother [i.e. Nero; cf. Sib. Or. iv. 141, v. 145. 363, viii. 71] . . . will persecute the plant which the Twelve Apostles . . . have planted [i.e. the Church]. Of the Twelve, one [i.e. Peter] will be delivered into his hands. . . . There will come with him all the powers of this world [cf. Rev 16<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>-9</sup>]. . . . At his word the sun will rise at night [cf. Rev 13<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>20</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>9</sup>]. . . . He will say "I am God" [cf. 2 Th 2<sup>4</sup>] . . . and all the people in the world will believe in him, and they will sacrifice to him [cf. Rev 13<sup>4</sup> 8. 12]. . . . And the greater number of those who shall have been associated together to receive the Beloved, he will turn aside after him [cf. Mt 24<sup>24</sup>, Mk 13<sup>22</sup>; contrast 2 Th 2<sup>10</sup> 12]. . . . And he will set up his image . . . in every city [cf. Rev 13<sup>14</sup>].'

The time of his sway will be 3 years, 7 months, and 27 days (4<sup>12</sup>). This period points back to Dn 7<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>7</sup> (cf. Rev 12<sup>14</sup>); but in 4<sup>14</sup> the time is given as (one thousand) three hundred and thirty-two days. During this period the few believers left flee from desert to desert (4<sup>13</sup>; cf. Rev 12<sup>6-14</sup>). Beliar is finally destroyed, not by Michael but by the Lord Himself (4<sup>14</sup>).

(e) Angels.—While there is no reference to the functions of good angels as mediators or intercessors, spiritual powers are conceived of as the true cause of all action. Manasseh and Belchira are only agents of Beliar and Sammael and Satan. Nero Redivivus is only an embodiment of Beliar (4-). Angels, authorities, and powers rule in this world under Beliar their prince (1<sup>3</sup>; cf. Eph 1<sup>21</sup> 3<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>10</sup>, 15, 1 P 3<sup>2</sup>). The angel of the Christian Church (cf. Rev 21. 8. 1- etc.) descends from heaven after our Lord's passion. The Holy Spirit and the angel of the Holy Spirit (see under 'Trinity') are identical, except perhaps in 3<sup>16</sup> and 11<sup>4</sup>. There is an angel of death (9<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>), and an angel of Sheol (11<sup>19</sup>). Each heaven has its angels, with the superior ones to the right of the throne. The sun and the moon also have each an angel (cf. Rev 19<sup>17</sup>). The judgment of the angels is referred to in 1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>18</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>.

(f) The Seven Heavens.—The conception of the seven heavens which we find e.g. in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and in Slavonic Enoch is not to be found in the Asc. Is. Evil is found only in the firmament and the air; it is entirely absent from all the heavens. Nor is there any reference to natural phenomena or heavenly bodies in them. Each heaven is merely a duplicate of the one above, with no distinction, except of glory, until the sixth and seventh are reached (8<sup>1-7</sup>). The sixth is not under any subordinate angel or 'throne,' but is ruled by the Great Glory in the seventh. There is an angel over the praise-giving of the sixth heaven, however, who challenges Isaiah when proceeding to the seventh (9<sup>1-4</sup>). In the seventh are the Patriarchs, the righteous, the crowns and thrones and garments of the righteous, the Great Glory, the Beloved, and the angel of the Holy Spirit.

(g) The Christian Church and its circumstances.—

The angel of the Christian Church which is in the heavens will be summoned by God in the last days (3<sup>15</sup>). The Church is the plant planted by the Twelve Apostles (4<sup>3</sup>). It consists of those who are 'associated together to receive the Beloved' at His Second Coming (4<sup>9</sup>). A great persecution is regarded as imminent, in which the few faithful remaining will 'flee from desert to desert, awaiting the coming of the Beloved.' For the expectation of the Coming, cf. 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>7</sup>, Ph 3<sup>20</sup>, He 9<sup>28</sup>. The Neronic Antichrist is regarded as destroying one of the Twelve Apostles (4<sup>3</sup>), and deceiving many of the faithful (4<sup>9</sup>). In 3<sup>21-31</sup> we have a contemporary picture of the Christian Church regarded as guilty of serious declension from its high calling. Church organization is not yet developed. We have mention of pastors and elders (3<sup>4</sup> 29). There is a general disbelief in the Second Coming and in prophecy generally (3<sup>3-27</sup> 31), but prophecy is still existent, though there are 'not many prophets save one here and there in divers places.' The 'faith' (3<sup>21</sup>) is spoken of objectively, as in the Pastoral Epistles (e.g. 1 Ti 1<sup>19</sup>). Faith, love, and purity are the distinctive Christian virtues (as in 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>). There are lawless elders (3<sup>24</sup>), and much hatred exists among the Church leaders (3<sup>29</sup>). Covetousness and slander are common vices (cf. 2 Ti 3<sup>1-2</sup>). The 'spirit of error' (3<sup>28</sup>) is at work among Christians (cf. 1 Jn 4<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). Caesar-worship is already a difficulty (4<sup>7-11</sup>).

(h) Apocryphal work.—The only reference to another apocryphon occurs in 4<sup>24</sup>, where the book 'Words of Joseph the Just' is probably to be identified with the Προσευχή τοῦ Ἰωσήφ (Fabricius, Cod. Pseud. V.T. i. 761-769; see HDB ii. 778).

3. The text.—(a) In its complete form the Asc. Is. is found only in the Ethiopic Version, and even this needs to be corrected and at times supplemented by other authorities. Of this Version there are three MSS, one at the Bodleian, and two inferior ones in the British Museum.

(b) There are two Latin Versions.—(i.) The fuller of the two was printed at Venice in 1522 from a MS now unknown, and reprinted by Gieseler in 1832.—(ii.) The other version occurs in two fragments discovered by Mai in 1828 in the Codex Rescriptus of the Acts of Chalcedon, Vat. 5750, of the 5th or 6th century.

(c) The Greek Versions are likewise twofold: (i.) a lost Greek text on which the Greek Legend was based; (ii.) the Greek text from which the Slavonic and the fuller Latin Versions were derived. Of this text 2<sup>4-44</sup> have been recovered in the Amherst Papyri by Grenfell and Hunt.

The Greek Legend was found by O. von Gebhardt in a Greek MS of the 12th cent. (no. 1534, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris). This work is really a lection for Church use, and so takes liberties in the way of rearranging and abbreviating the text. The Martyrdom is brought to the end, and other details are added. It is, however, very valuable for correcting and restoring the text.

(d) The Slavonic Version is extant in a MS in the Library of the Uspenschen Cathedral in Moscow. It belongs to c. A.D. 1200.

In all these authorities two recensions may be traced. The Greek Papyri, the Ethiopic, the Slavonic, and the fuller Latin Version follow the second recension of the Greek; the Greek Legend and the Latin fragments support the first Greek recension. Charles in his edition of the Asc. Is. (1900) has produced a critical text founded on all these authorities. To this work the present writer would express his deep indebtedness.

LITERATURE.—I. CRITICAL INQUIRIES.—R. Laurence, Ascensio Isaie Vatis, Oxford, 1819, pp. 141-180; K. I. Nitzsch, SK, 1830, pp. 209-246; G. C. F. Lücke, Einleit. in die Offenbarung des Johannes 2, Bonn, 1852, pp. 274-302; A. Dillmann, Ascensio

Isaiah, Leipzig, 1877, pp. v-xviii; G. T. Stokes, art. 'Isaiah, Ascension of,' in DCB iii. [1882] 298-301; W. J. Deane, Pseudepigrapha, Edinburgh, 1891, pp. 236-275; J. A. Harnack, Gesch. der altchristl. Litteratur, Leipzig, 1893 ff., i. 854-856, ii. 573-579, 714; C. Clemen, 'Die Himmelfahrt des Jesaja,' ZWT, 1896, pp. 388-415, also 1897, pp. 455-465; J. A. Robinson, art. 'Isaiah, Ascension of,' in HDB, ii. 499-501; G. Beer, in Kautzsch's Apok. und Pseudepig., Tübingen, 1900, ii. 119-123; R. H. Charles, Ascension of Isaiah translated from the Ethiopic Version, which, together with the New Greek Fragment, the Latin Versions, and the Latin Translation of the Slavonic, is here published in full, London, 1900, also Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Oxford, 1913, ii. 155-158; E. Littmann, JE vi. [1904] 642 f.

II. EDITIONS.—(a) Ethiopic Version.—R. Laurence, A. Dillmann, and R. H. Charles, opp. cit. supra. (b) Latin Versions.—(i.) J. K. L. Gieseler, in a Göttingen programme, 1832; (ii.) A. Mai, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio, Rome, 1825-38, iii. 238 f.; both are given in the editions of Dillmann and Charles as above. (c) Greek Versions.—(i.) The Greek Legend—a free recension: O. v. Gebhardt, in Hilgenfeld's ZWT, 1878, p. 330 ff.; R. H. Charles, Asc. of Isaiah, pp. xviii-xxxii, 141-148; (ii.) Papyrus fragment: Grenfell and Hunt, Ascension of Isaiah, London, 1901; R. H. Charles, Asc. of Isaiah, pp. xxviii-xxxi, 84-95. (d) Slavonic Version.—R. H. Charles, Asc. of Isaiah, pp. xxiv-xxvii, 93-139.

A. LL. DAVIES.

ASCETICISM.—See ABSTINENCE.

ASHER.—See TRIBES.

ASHES.—See HEIFER and MOURNING.

ASIA (Ἀσία).—Asia had a great variety of meanings in ancient writers. It might denote (1) the western coast-land of Asia Minor; (2) the kingdom of Troy (poetical); (3) the kingdom of the early Seleucids, i.e. Asia Minor and Syria (frequent in 1 and 2 Mac.); (4) the kingdom of Pergamum (Livy); (5) the Roman province Asia; (6) the Asiatic continent (Pliny). In Strabo's time—the beginning of the 1st cent. A.D.—the province was ἡ ὀδὴ καλουμένη Ἀσία (Geog. p. 118), and in the NT (where the name is found 22 times—15 times in Acts, 4 times in the Pauline Epistles, once in 1 Peter, twice in Rev.) Asia almost invariably denotes proconsular Asia. St. Paul the Roman citizen naturally assumed the Imperial standpoint, and made use of Roman political designations, while the Hellenic Luke, though he frequently employed geographical terms in their popular non-Roman sense, was probably to some extent influenced by St. Paul's practice of using the technical phraseology of the Empire.

The province of Asia was founded after the death of Attalus III. of Pergamum (133 B.C.), who bequeathed his kingdom by will to the Roman Republic. The province was much smaller than the kingdom had been, until, on the death of Mithridates (120 B.C.), Phrygia Major was added to it. Cicero indicates its extent in the words: 'Namque, ut opinor, Asia vestra constat ex Phrygia, Caria, Mysia, Lydia' (Flac. 27); but the Troad and the islands of Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Patmos, and Cos should be added. Pergamum, so long a royal city, naturally became the capital of the province, and officially retained this position till the beginning of the 2nd cent. A.D.; but long before that time Ephesus (q.v.) was recognized as the real administrative centre. When the provinces were arranged by Augustus in 27 B.C., Asia was given to the Senate; it was therefore governed by proconsuls (ἀνθύπατοι, Ac 19<sup>38</sup>). Its beauty, wealth, and culture made it the most desirable of all provinces.

The only passage in which St. Luke certainly uses 'Asia' in the popular Greek sense is Ac 2<sup>9</sup>, where he names Asia and Phrygia together as distinct countries, whereas in Roman provincial language the greater part of Phrygia belonged to Asia. In such an expression as 'the places on the coast of Asia' (Ac 27<sup>2</sup>) the sense is doubtful; but it is probable that, where the historian refers to Jews of Asia (Ac 6<sup>9</sup> 21<sup>27</sup> 24<sup>18</sup>), to 'all the dwellers in Asia' (19<sup>10</sup>; cf. 19<sup>38</sup>), and to St. Paul's sojourn in Asia (19<sup>32</sup> 20<sup>18</sup> 18), he has the province in view. St. Paul almost certainly uses the word in its Roman sense when he speaks of 'the firstfruits of Asia' (Ro 16<sup>5</sup> RV), the churches of Asia (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), afflictions in Asia (2 Co 1<sup>8</sup>), apostates in Asia (2 Ti 1<sup>15</sup>).

Though the Roman meaning of Asia is generally assumed by adherents of the S. Galatian theory, it is not incompatible with the other view. Thus Lightfoot, an advocate of the N. Galatian theory, holds that, while St. Luke usually gives geographical terms their popular significance, 'the case of Asia is an exception. The foundation of this province dating very far back, its official name had to a great extent superseded the local designations of the districts which it comprised. Hence Asia in the NT is always Proconsular Asia' (Gal.<sup>5</sup>, 1876, p. 19, n. 6). Only those who find 'the Phrygian and Galatic region' (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>) in the north of Pisidian Antioch are obliged (like Conybeare-Howson, i. 324) to assume that Asia 'is simply viewed as the western portion of Asia Minor,' for the Paroreios belonged to proconsular Asia, in which preaching was expressly forbidden (Ac 16<sup>6</sup>). See PHRYGIA and GALATIA.

1 P 1<sup>1</sup> is a clear instance of the use of geographical terms in the Roman administrative sense. The four provinces named—Bithynia and Pontus, though here separated, being really one—sum up the whole of Asia Minor north of Taurus. The Seven Churches of Revelation were all in proconsular Asia (Rev 1<sup>4</sup> 11), and it is possible that the so-called 'Epistle to the Ephesians' was an encyclo to a group of churches in that province.

For the 'Asiarchs' (RVm) of Ac 19<sup>31</sup>, see following article.

LITERATURE.—F. J. A. Hort, The First Epistle of St. Peter, London, 1898, p. 157 f.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 273 f.; W. M. Ramsay, Church in Roman Empire, London, 1893, and St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, do. 1895, passim. JAMES STRAHAN.

ASIARCH.—In Ac 19<sup>31</sup> RVm reads 'Asiarchs' for RV 'chief officers of Asia' and AV 'chief of Asia.' The word is a transliteration of the Gr. Ἀσιάρχης, derived from Ἀσία, 'province of Asia,' and ἄρχειν, 'to rule,' and belongs to a class of names, of which Βαθυνιάρχης, Γαλατάρχης, Καππαδοκάρχης, Λυκάρχης, Ποντάρχης, Συριάρχης are other examples. The titles are peculiar to Eastern, Greek-speaking, Roman provinces. As the real rulers of these provinces were the Roman Emperor and the Roman Senate, with their elected representatives, it is clear that such titles must have been honorary and complimentary. With regard to the duties and privileges attached to the dignities thus indicated there has been much discussion. The titles occur rarely in literature, much more often in inscriptions; and the lessons we learn from inscriptions are in direct proportion to their number. Several scholars of repute have held the view that the term Ἀσιάρχης is equivalent to ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀσίας ('high priest of Asia'), the president of the Diet of Asia (κοινὸν τῆς Ἀσίας, commune Asiæ). This Diet of Asia was a body composed of a number of representatives, one or more of whom were elected by each of a number of cities in the province. The principal duty of the president of this body was to supervise the worship of Rome and the Emperor throughout the province (see under art. EMPEROR-WORSHIP). Certain considerations, however, militate against the view that the terms 'Asiarch' and 'high priest of Asia' are interchangeable. The word Ἀσιάρχης is never feminine, whereas the title 'high priestess of Asia' is often applied to the wife of the high priest. There was only one ἀρχιερεὺς Ἀσίας (without further designation) at a time, whereas there were a number of Asiarchs. Another (civil) office could be held concurrently with the Asiarchate, but not with the chief priesthood of Asia. Further, the title 'Asiarch' was held only during a man's period of office (probably one year*), but he was eligible for re-election. The origin of the view that 'Asiarch' and 'high priest of Asia' are two convertible terms is to be found in the Martyrdom of Polycarp (A.D. 155), where two separate persons named Philippos have been confused: (1) Philip of Smyrna, Asiarch, who superintended the games; (2) Philip of Tralles, who was high priest of Asia (the latter had been an Asiarch a year or two before). It is clear, therefore, that the honorary position of Asiarch was inferior to the office of high priest of Asia. Yet there was a connexion between the two. The high priest presided over the games, etc., but the Asiarchs did the work and probably paid the cost. Their election by their fellow-citizens to this honorary position was rewarded by games and gladiatorial shows. Both the Asiarchs and the high priest disappear after the early part of the 4th cent., for the obvious reason that, as the Empire was henceforth officially Christian, the machinery for Emperor-worship had become obsolete.

When we come to study the connexion of the Asiarchs with the Acts narrative, we are puzzled. It seems at first sight so strange that men elected to foster the worship of Rome and the Emperor should be found favouring the ambassador of the Messiah, the Emperor's rival for the lordship of the Empire. This is only one, however, of a number of indications that the Empire was at first disposed to look with a kindly eye on the new religion. Christianity, with its outward respect for civil authority, seemed at first the strongest supporter of law and order. Artemis-worship, moreover, bulked so largely in Ephesus as perhaps to dwarf the Imperial worship. Thus St. Paul, whose preaching so threatened the authority of Artemis, may have appeared in a favourable light to the representatives of Cæsar-worship, as likely to create more enthusiasm in that direction.

See also artt. DIANA and EPHEBUS.

LITERATURE.—C. G. Brandis, s.vv. 'Asiarches,' 'Bithyniarches,' 'Galatarches,' in Pauly-Wissowa, Stuttgart, 1894 ff.; J. B. Lightfoot, Appendix, 'The Asiarchate' in his Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii. vol. iii., London, 1889, p. 404 ff.; W. M. Ramsay in Classical Review, iii. [1889] 174, and St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 230 f.

A. SOUTER.

ASP (ασπίς).—The Greek word occurs in the classical writings of Herodotus (iv. 191) and Aristotle (de Anim. Hist. iv. 7. 14), and generally represents the Heb. אֲשָׁפִית (pethen) in the LXX (pethen is translated 'asp' in Dt 32<sup>33</sup>, Job 20<sup>14</sup>,<sup>16</sup>, and Is 11<sup>8</sup>, but 'adder' in Ps 58<sup>4</sup> 91<sup>13</sup>). In the NT the 'asp' is mentioned only once (Ro 3<sup>13</sup>: 'The poison of asps [τὸς ἀσπίδων] is under their lips'). Here it is introduced in a quotation from Ps 140<sup>3</sup> (139<sup>4</sup>), where the Heb. word used is אֲשָׁפִית (a asaf leq. and probably corrupt, perhaps read אֲרָכִית, 'spider'), but the LXX word is ασπίς, as in Romans. The general meaning of the passage is obvious (cf. Ja 3<sup>8</sup>: 'The tongue can no man tame—a restless evil—full of deadly poison'), and the position of the poison-bag of the serpent is correctly described.

The serpent referred to is without doubt the Naja haje, or small hooded Egyptian cobra, which, though not found in the cultivated parts of Palestine, is well known in the downs and plains S. of Beersheba (cf. Tristram, Natural History of the Bible, p. 270), and frequents old walls and holes in the rocks (cf. Is 11<sup>8</sup>: 'And the sucking-child shall play on the hole of the asp'). It does not belong to the viper tribe (Viperidae) but to the Colubridæ, which includes the ordinary British grass-snake. The chief peculiarities of cobras are: (a) a clearly defined neck, which they can dilate at will, and (b) the equality in size of the scales on the back with those on the other parts of the body. There are about ten different species, of which the Naja haje, or Egyptian asp, and the Naja tripudians, or Indian cobra, are the best known. The latter is the species upon which Indian snake-charmers usually practise their skill, while the Naja haje is used for this purpose in Egypt.

See also SERPENT, VIPER.

LITERATURE.—H. B. Tristram, Natural History of the Bible<sup>19</sup>, London, 1911, p. 270 f.; SWP vii. 146; R. Lydekker in The Concise Knowledge Natural History, 1897, p. 424; Bae-deker's Palestine and Syria<sup>3</sup>, 1912, p. lvi; W. Aldis Wright, The Bible Word-Book<sup>2</sup>, 1884, p. 50, for the use of the word; cf. also Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>3</sup>, 1902, p. 79; Driver, Deuteronomy<sup>2</sup>, 1896, p. 372; HDB, vol. iv. p. 459; EBi, vol. iv. col. 4394; Murray's DB, p. 67; SDB, p. 837.

P. S. P. HANDCOCK.

ASSASSINS (or, more properly, Sicarii [cf. Ac 21<sup>38</sup>], 'dagger-men').—The name given, according to Josephus, to a body of radicals in the Jewish Messianic agitation which culminated in the outbreak of A.D. 66. The name was derived from the short daggers worn by the members of the body (sica, a short, curved, possibly Persian sword), which they kept concealed in their clothing and used to stab people among the crowds. The Sicarii seem to have appeared first during the procuratorship of Felix, although Josephus in BJ vii. viii. 1 might be interpreted as ascribing their origin to a somewhat earlier period. He has a number of references to these men, whom he describes as follows (BJ ii. xiii. 3):

'There sprang up another sort of robbers in Jerusalem who were called Sicarii, who slew men in the daytime in the midst of the city, especially at the festivals, when they mixed with the multitude, and concealed little daggers under their garments, with which they stabbed those that were their enemies; and when any fell down dead, the murderers joined the bystanders in expressing their indignation, so that from their plausibility they could by no means be discovered. The first man who was slain by them was Jonathan the high priest, after whom many were slain every day, and the fear men were in of being so treated was more harassing than the calamity itself, everybody expecting death every hour, as men do in war. So men kept a look-out for their enemies at a great distance, and even if their friends were coming, they durst not trust them any longer, but were slain in the midst of their suspicions and precautions. Such was the celerity of the plotters, and so cunning was their contrivance against detection.' See also BJ vii. x. 1.

It is difficult to say whether these Sicarii at first constituted an organized body, although such a view would seem to be implied by Josephus (BJ vii. viii. 1). They joined the Zealots (ib. ii. xvii. 7), and inaugurated the reign of terror which filled Jerusalem after the outbreak of the Revolution. Subsequently they seized the great fortress of Masada (ib. iv. vii. 2), and there maintained themselves by plundering the neighbouring country, until they were besieged by the Romans under Flavius Silca. Their commander was one Eleazar (ib. vii. viii. 1), whom Josephus describes as an able man and a descendant of that Judas who had led the revolt against the census under Quirinius. After a considerable siege the Romans were on the point of taking the fortress when the Sicarii massacred themselves, one old woman alone escaping.

In Ac 21<sup>38</sup> they have 'the Egyptian' as a leader. Josephus mentions this Egyptian as having appeared during the procuratorship of Felix, but does not connect the Sicarii with him (Ant. xx. viii. 6; BJ ii. xiii. 5). The Sicarii seem to have dispersed after the Roman war and to have disappeared from history, the references to Sicarii in the Mishna (Bikkur. i. 2, ii. 3; Gittin v. 6; Machsh. i. 6) probably being to robbers in general.

* But see Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. ii. vol. iii. p. 412 ff.

LITERATURE.—See E. Schürer, Gal 1<sup>3</sup> i. [Leipzig, 1901] p. 574, n. 31 (HJP i. ii. 178), where further references will be found.

SHAILER MATHEWS.

ASSEMBLY.—In the Acts and Epistles (AV and RV) the English word 'assembly' occurs as follows, but in each instance a different Greek noun is translated by it.

1. In Ac 19<sup>32, 39, 41</sup> 'assembly' (ἐκκλησία) stands for the tumultuary mob gathered by Demetrius and his fellow-gildsmen in Ephesus to protest against the teaching of St. Paul, which was destroying the business of the shrine-makers. Though ἐκκλησία strictly denotes an assembly of the citizens summoned by the crier (κῆρυξ), this was a mere mob, with all a mob's unreasonableness: 'Some cried one thing, and some another, for the assembly was confused, and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together.' So runs St. Luke's 'logical, complete, and photographic' narrative. (For a similar description of a Roman gathering, cf. Virgil, Æn. i. 149: 'Saevitque animis ignobile vulgus.') In Ephesus the man revered for his piety and worth was the Secretary of the City (γραμματεὺς [see TOWN CLERK]), who calls the gathering a riot (στάσις), and a concourse (συντροπή). If Demetrius and his gildsmen had just ground of complaint, they should have carried their case before the proper court, over which the proconsul presided, for the present gathering was outside the law, and had 'no power to transact business.' He, therefore, referred them to the lawful (AV) or regular (RV) assembly (ἡ ἐννομος ἐκκλησία), which is 'the people duly assembled in the exercise of its powers' (Ramsay). The Revisers' change of 'lawful' into 'regular' is perhaps hypercritical; for in practice, under the Roman rule, the distinction is not appreciable.

2. Ac 23<sup>7</sup>: 'The assembly [RV; AV the multitude] was divided' (ἐσχίσθη τὸ πλῆθος). The reference is to the council (παν τὸ συνέδριον, 22<sup>30</sup>) summoned by Lysias the tribune of the Roman garrison in the tower of Antonia, consequent upon the tumult in the Temple, and St. Paul's arrest. We are not to understand a regular sitting of the Sanhedrin, but an informal meeting for what is known in Scots Law as a precognition ('a meeting of the councillors, aiding the Tribune to ascertain the facts' [Ramsay]). As Lysias called the meeting, he probably presided and conducted the business. This would account for St. Paul's ignorance of the fact that Ananias was the high priest, and explains his apology. As to the charge made against him, the Apostle conducted his defence in a way that won for himself the sympathy of the Pharisees. It is a needless refinement to find here difficulties of an ethical kind. 'Luke saw nothing wrong or unworthy in this, and he was best able to judge. Paul was winning over the Pharisees not merely to himself but to the Christian cause. Paul states the same view more fully in 26<sup>6-8</sup> where there is no question of a clever trick, for there were no Pharisees among his judges' (Ramsay, Pictures of the Apostolic Church, 1910, p. 283). The result of this defence was that τὸ συνέδριον became τὸ πλῆθος.

3. Ja 2<sup>2</sup>: 'If there come into your assembly' (AV and RVm; RV and AVm 'synagogue': εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν).—James, writing 'to the twelve tribes scattered abroad,' uses the old familiar word 'synagogue,' which had become hallowed in the ears of the Dispersion by associations of worship and fellowship. This usage is a delicate indication (unintentional on the writer's part, of course) that the Christian meeting had its ties not with the Temple, but with the synagogues which for ages had nourished the faith of Israel.

4. He 12<sup>1</sup>: 'Ye are come . . . to innumerable hosts of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven' (RV; μυριάσιν ἀγγέλων, πανηγύρει καὶ ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων ἀπογεγραμμένων ἐν οὐρανοῖς). In classical usage πανήγυρις is the festal assembly of the whole nation, gathered for some solemnity, such as the Olympic Games. But the word occurs only here in the NT, though it is found in LXX Ezk 46<sup>11</sup>, Hos 2<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>, Am 5<sup>21</sup>. The passage has given rise to considerable variety of interpretation, indication of which may be seen in RV text and margin. The difficulty is to determine how many classes are referred to.

(a) A. B. Davidson ('Hebrews,' Bible Class Handbooks, in loco) holds that the only subject is angels, and translates: 'to myriads of angels,—even a festal assembly and convocation of first-borns enrolled in heaven.' In this interpretation he is followed by A. S. Peake (Century Bible, 'Hebrews').

(b) On the other hand, Westcott (Hebrews) contends for two classes—angels and men; and renders the passage: 'to countless hosts of angels in festal assembly, and to the Church of the first-born enrolled in heaven.' So also Farrar (Cambridge Bible for Schools) and Edwards (Expositor's Bible).

Against this latter interpretation, it may be pointed out that men are mentioned separately—'and to the spirits of just men made perfect'—and it is improbable that the groups occur twice. 'Tens of thousands' is an almost technical term for angels; and, though 'firstborn' is not elsewhere applied to them, it is a quite natural name for the sons of God. Besides, if living Christians are referred to, as this interpretation seems to imply, it is awkward 'to speak of their coming to a company which includes themselves' (A. S. Peake). On the whole it appears better to abide by the first interpretation. It is the picture of noble souls returning home to God, and welcomed with the 'joy that is in the presence of the angels of God.' Students of Dante will compare the corresponding passage in the Convivio: 'And, as his fellow-citizens come forth to meet him who returns from a long journey, even before he enters the gate of his city; so to the noble soul come forth the citizens of the eternal life.' Bernard's great hymn (Neale's translation) 'Jerusalem the Golden' may also be cited as instinct with the spirit of He 12<sup>23</sup>.

W. M. GRANT.

ASSOS (Ἄσσος).—An ancient Greek city on the Adramyttian Gulf, in the south of the Troad. Originally an Æolic colony, it was re-founded, under the name of Apollonia, by the Pergamenian kings, whose dominions were converted into the Roman province of Asia in 133 B.C. Its situation was one of the most commanding in all the Greek lands. 'It is a strong place,' says Strabo, 'and well fortified with walls. There is a long and steep ascent from the sea and the harbour. . . . Cleanthes, the Stoic philosopher, was a native of this place. . . . Here also Aristotle resided for some time' (XIII. i. 58). The walls are still well-preserved, and the harbour mole can be traced by large blocks under the clear water. The summit of the hill was crowned by the Doric temple of Athene (built c. 470 B.C.), the panels of which—now mostly in the Louvre—are among the most important remains of ancient Greek art. The modern town, Behram Kalessi, is still the chief shipping-place of the southern Troad.

On a Sunday afternoon, probably in the spring of A.D. 56, St. Paul, having torn himself away from the Christians of Troas, walked or rode the 20 miles of Roman highway which connected that city with Assos, first passing along the western side of Mt. Ida, then through the rich Valley of the Tuzla, and finally reaching the Via Sacra, or Street of Tombs, which still extends a great distance to the N.W. of Assos. In the haven he joined his ship, which had meanwhile taken his companions round the long promontory of Lectum (Ac 20<sup>34</sup>).

LITERATURE.—J. T. Clarke, Assos, 2 vols., Boston, 1882 and 1898; C. Fellows, Travels and Researches in Asia Minor, London, 1852; Murray's Handbook of Asia Minor.

JAMES STRAHAN.

ASSUMPTION OF MOSES.—A curious state of affairs exists with regard to the so-called 'Assumption of Moses.' The title is incorrectly applied to what is really the 'Testament of Moses,' a work which is extant in a more or less complete form in a Latin fragment discovered by Ceriani in a 6th cent. MS in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published by him in 1861. The true 'Assumption' survives only in quotations and references in the NT and early Christian writers; but from certain facts it appears that it was at a very early date appended to the 'Testament.' For example, in Ceriani's Latin MS in 10<sup>14</sup> we have the reading 'From my death [assumption] until His advent.' Here the duplicate reading 'assumption' would appear to be an attempt to prepare for the account of the Assumption appended to the Testament. Moreover, as early as St. Jude's Epistle, we find quotations from both works in close juxtaposition. Under these circumstances, the present article includes an account of both works.

Both works alike must have been written in the 1st cent. A.D., and the former, if not the latter, in Hebrew, between the years 7 and 29. A Greek version of both, of the same century, is presupposed by the quotations and parallels in Ac 7<sup>36</sup>, Jude 9, 16, 18, 2 Baruch, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. The author was a Pharisaic Quietist. His silence with regard to the Maccabean rising and its leaders is most significant. There could be no severer censure on the political and bellicose Pharisees of his time. For him Eleazar and his seven sons had been the true heroes, and not Judas and his brethren. He expects the ultimate triumph of Israel, but this is to be brought about by Divine intervention and not by the sword, and the human conditions prerequisite are a stricter observance of the Law and a national repentance.

The work is of great value in the stress it lays on spiritual religion and quietism. In this and in its singular freedom from the Jewish doctrine of merit it affords a parallel to NT teaching. On the other hand, it is thoroughly Judaic in its exaltation of the person of Moses, which seems to be set up as a Jewish counterpart to that of our Lord, while the pre-existence of Moses and Jerusalem is expressly asserted in 11<sup>4, 17</sup>.

1. Contents (historical and other allusions are explained in brackets).—i. In the 2500th year from the Creation, after the Exodus, Moses calls Joshua and appoints him his successor as minister of the people and of the tabernacle of the testimony, at the same time committing to his charge certain books which were to be preserved in the place which God had made from the beginning of the world (Jerusalem).—ii. After Joshua has secured to Israel their inheritance, the people are to be ruled for eighteen years (i.e. the fifteen judges, and the three kings, Saul, David, and Solomon) by chiefs and kings, and for nineteen years (the nineteen kings of Israel) the ten tribes shall break away. The two tribes maintain the Temple worship for twenty years (reigns), of which, however, four are evil and idolatrous.—iii. Then a king from the East (Nebuchadnezzar) shall come and burn their 'colony' (Jerusalem) and the Temple and remove the sacred vessels. The two tribes are carried into captivity, and confess their punishment to be just, as also do the ten tribes.—iv. At the end of the 77 years' captivity, one who is over them (Daniel) will pray for them.

A king (Cyrus) has compassion on them, and parts of the two tribes return, while the ten increase among the Gentiles in their captivity.—v. Even the faithful two tribes sin, and are punished through the kings who share in their guilt (the Seleucids). They are divided as to the truth, and pollute the altar with their non-Aaronic priests, 'not priests but slaves, sons of slaves' (Jason and Menelaus).—viii. A 'second visitation' follows. The king of the kings of the earth (Antiochus Epiphanes) crucifies those who confess to circumcision, and compels them to blaspheme the law and bear idols, and persecutes them with tortures.—ix. Thereupon a man of the tribe of Levi, named Taxo (= Eleazar), exhorts his seven sons to fast for three days and on the fourth to go into a cave and die rather than transgress the commands of the Lord of lords.—vi. Next there are raised up kings bearing rule who call themselves priests of the Most High God (the Maccabees). They work iniquity in the Holy of Holies. They are succeeded by an insolent king not of the race of the priests (Herod), who will carry out secret massacres and rule for 34 years. His children are to reign for shorter periods. A powerful king of the West (Varus, governor of Syria) invades the land, burns part of the Temple, and crucifies some of the people.—vii. The times shall then be ended. Destructive and impious men (Sadducees) shall rule—treacherous, hypocritical, gluttons, oppressing the poor, and lawless. Though unclean in hand and mind, they say, 'Do not touch me, lest thou shouldest pollute me.'—x. Then God's kingdom shall appear, and Satan shall be no more, and the angel who has been appointed chief (Michael) shall avenge them of their enemies. The earth is shaken, the sun and moon fail, and the sea and the waters dry up. The Gentiles are punished, and Israel is happy, and triumphs over the Eagle (Rome), is raised to the stars, and beholds his enemies in Gehenna and rejoices over them. Until this advent of God there shall be 250 times from Moses' death.—xi. Joshua mourns that he is not able to take Moses' place as guide and teacher, prophet and advocate. The Amorites will assail Israel when Moses is not among them.—xii. Moses replies by placing Joshua in his own seat, and assures him that all is foreseen and controlled by God.

At the end of ch. vii. and again at the end of ch. xii. the MS breaks off in the middle of a sentence. Chapters viii. and ix. are read between v. and vi., as Charles suggests in his edition (pp. 28-30). They obviously refer to the Antiochian persecution, and are quite out of place after ch. vii., which describes the Sadducees who were contemporaries of the author. Burkitt argues (HDB iii. 449) that 'the Theophany in x. comes in well after the story of the ideal saint Taxo in ix., but very badly after the description of the wicked priests and rulers in vii.' But ch. vii. is mutilated at the end, and we cannot argue from the last reference which happens to be preserved in it. He suggests that the author 'filled up his picture of the final woes from the stories of the Antiochian martyrs.' But surely he would not need to borrow his picture of the ideal saint of the last times (and his name) from the same period.

2. Date.—The date of composition is clearly fixed by the words in 6<sup>1</sup> 'and he (Herod) shall beget children who succeeding him shall rule for shorter periods.' As this is a prediction which was falsified by the event, for Antipas reigned forty-three years and Philip thirty-seven (while Herod reigned thirty-four), we must postulate a date earlier than thirty-four years from Herod's death, i.e. A.D. 30. A date nearer to the deposition of Archelais in A.D. 6, which would suggest the impending deposition of his brothers, would be still more suitable.

3. Author.—The author is generally supposed to have been a Zealot (so Ewald, Wieseler, Dillmann, Schürer, Deane, and Briggs). But, while well aware of the Maccabean movement, he shows his aversion to Maccabean methods by his silence in regard to the exploits of Judas and his brethren. His hero, Taxo, instead of taking up arms, withdraws into a cave to die, with the words 'Let us die rather than transgress.' It is not militancy but God's direct and personal intervention that will bring in the kingdom.

The same arguments prove that he was no Sadducee. His was no earthly ideal, but that of a heavenly theocratic kingdom (10<sup>9c</sup>). A Resurrection is not taught, it is true, but it is implied in the consummation of Israel's happiness in these verses. The Sadducees are attacked, and in 7<sup>3.6</sup> there is a play on their name and their claim to be just (צדיקים and צדקים).

He was not an Essene. He is a strong patriot and keenly interested in the fortunes of the nation. The Law is of perpetual obligation and is itself sufficient. The Temple is built by God Himself (2<sup>4</sup>) in the place He prepared from the creation (1<sup>18</sup>). Its profanations are often mentioned (2<sup>8.9</sup> 3- 5<sup>3.4</sup> 6<sup>1.9</sup>). The sacrificial system is regarded as valid (2<sup>6</sup>), and its cessation is a cause of lamentation (4<sup>8</sup>). The altar is polluted only by injustice (5<sup>4</sup>). The Essenes did not value the Temple sacrifices, and objected to animal sacrifice altogether. The future heavenly abode of the righteous, and the future punishment of Israel's enemies in Gehenna, are distinctively Pharisaic ideas. The pre-existence of Moses in 1<sup>14</sup> is regarded as a unique distinction. The Essenes believed in the pre-existence of all souls alike.

We must conclude, therefore, that the author was a 'Pharisee of a fast-disappearing type, recalling in all respects the Chasid of the early Maccabean times, and upholding the old traditions of quietude and resignation' (Charles, 1897, p. liv).

4. The Latin text.—The Latin text presents a difficult task to the critical reconstructor of the original Hebrew text. To begin with, Ceriani's MS is a palimpsest, in which whole verses are at times indecipherable. In the next place, it is not the original Latin translation but a copy, in which the Latin itself has been corrected and corrupted. Thus in 5<sup>6</sup> we have six lines of duplicate rendering, and there are dittographies also in 6<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>13</sup>. In 11- the copyist has misread 'eum' as 'cum,' and corrects 'Monse' into 'Monse' accordingly. The version, however, is very literal, and, in spite of corruptions and carelessness, its Greek source is occasionally evident; and the original Hebrew idiom is frequently preserved. Greek words like clibsis (= θλίψις, 3<sup>7</sup>) and heremus (= ἐρημος, 3<sup>11</sup>), and even a reading like finem in 2<sup>7</sup>, which presupposes δρον in Greek [corrupt for δρουν], suffice to prove translation from the Greek; while corrupt passages like 4<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>12</sup> (see Charles' text) require re-translation into the original Hebrew in order to explain the corruption. In 7<sup>3</sup> we have a play on the name Sadducees (צדיקים).

'dicentes se esse justos (צדיקים)'

which is possible only in Hebrew. An Aramaic original postulated by Schmidt, Merx, and others is not necessitated by the order in 1<sup>10</sup> 3<sup>2</sup> (see Charles, 1897, pp. xxviii-xlv).

5. The original 'Assumption of Moses.'—The subject-matter of the extant work (preserved largely in Ceriani's Latin MS) proves it to be a Testament of Moses, as it deals with the dying predictions and charges of Moses as related to Joshua, quite in the manner of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (q.v.). It nowhere describes his 'Assumption,' and only in an interpolation (10<sup>12</sup>) refers to it. The opening words have been thus restored by Charles to fill the gap in the MS—'Testamentum Moysi | Quae praecepit aīo vijtae eius

Cmo et xxmno.' Throughout the work Moses is to die an ordinary death (e.g. 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>12.14</sup>). In a Catena quoted in Fabricius (Cod. Pseud. Vet. Test. ii. 121, 122), and again in Section xiii. of Vassiliev's Anecdota Graeco-Byzantina (pp. 257-258), we find references to a natural death of Moses, which may be derived from the original ending of the 'Testament.' In Vassiliev's work the words that follow seem to be derived from the true 'Assumption,' while Josephus (Ant. iv. viii. 48) seems to be aware of the new claims put forth for Moses' Assumption, while explaining the Scripture statement of his death as a precaution against deification of the national hero: νόθους αἰφνιδίον ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ σταντος, ἀφανίζεται κατὰ τινος φάραγγος. Γέγραφε δ' αὐτὸν ἐν ταῖς ἱεραῖς βίβλοις τεθνεῶτα, δέσας μὴ δι' ὑπερβολὴν τῆς περὶ αὐτὸν ἀρετῆς πρὸς τὸ θείον αὐτὸν ἀναχωρήσαι τολμήσωσιν εἰπεῖν.

The fragments of the true 'Assumption of Moses' preserved in various sources are as follows.—We read in Jude 9: 'But Michael the archangel, when, contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing judgment, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee."' Clem. Alex. quotes this verse in Adumbrat. in Ep. Judae (Zahn's Supplement. Clementin., 1884, p. 84), and adds: 'Hic confirmat Assumptionem Moysi.' Didymus Alex. in Epist. Judae Enarratio, and the Acta Synodi Nicæn. ii. 20 also refer to St. Jude's words as a quotation from 'Moyses Assumptio' or 'Ἀνάληψις Μωυσέως. The Devil's claim which Michael thus rebutted was (1) that he was lord of matter (οὗτι ἐμὸν τὸ σῶμα ὡς τῆς ὕλης δεσπότης) [Cramer's Catena in Ep. Cath., 1840, p. 160: also Matthæi's edition of Sept. Cath., Riga, 1782, pp. 238, 239]; (2) that Moses was a murderer.

The answer to the second claim is not given, but the answer to the first is in fuller form than in St. Jude, in Acta Synodi Nicæn. ii. 20: ἀπὸ γὰρ πνεύματος ἁγίου αὐτοῦ πάντες ἐκτίσθημεν, thus claiming all creation as the handiwork of God's Holy Spirit. Origen (de Princip. iii. 2. 1) adds a reproach uttered by Michael to the serpent: 'a diabolō inspiratum serpentem causam exstittisse praevaricationis Adae et Evae.'

The Assumption finally 'takes place in the presence of Joshua and Caleb, and in a very peculiar way. A twofold presentation of Moses appears: one is Moses 'living in the spirit,' which is carried up to heaven; the other is the dead body of Moses, which is buried in the recesses of the mountains' (Charles, p. 106). So Clem. Alex., Strom. vi. 15; Origen, hom. in Jos. ii. 1; Euodius, Epist. ad. Augustin. 258, vol. ii. p. 839 (Ben. ed. 1836). This 'twofold presentation' would appear to be due to an attempt to reconcile Dt 34<sup>11</sup> with the Jewish legend. Cf. Josephus, quoted above.

6. Value for New Testament study.—i. Parallels in phrasology.—These are confined to five passages: (a) Stephen's speech in Ac 7<sup>36</sup>, where the words 'in Egypt and in the Red Sea and in the wilderness forty years' are the same as in Ass. Mos. 3<sup>11</sup>. Cf. also Ac 7<sup>38.39</sup> with Ass. Mos. 3<sup>12</sup>.—(b) Jude 16: cf. Ass. Mos. 7<sup>1</sup> 'complainers'; 7<sup>9</sup> 'and their mouth will speak great things'; 5<sup>5</sup> 'respecting the persons of the wealthy.' Jude 18 'in the last time'—Ass. Mos. 7<sup>1</sup> 'the times shall be ended.'—(c) With 2 P 2<sup>13</sup> cf. Ass. Mos. 7<sup>4</sup> 'lovers of banquets at every hour of the day,' and with 2<sup>3</sup> cf. 7<sup>6</sup> 'devourers of the goods . . . saying that they do so on the ground of justice (or mercy).'

The signs of the end in sun, moon, and stars in Ass. Mos. 10<sup>5</sup> resemble those in Mk 13<sup>24.25</sup>, while the phrase in 8<sup>1</sup> 'there will come upon them a second visitation and wrath, such as has not befallen them from the beginning until that time,' is nearer Mt 24<sup>-1</sup> than Dn 12<sup>1</sup> and Rev 16<sup>18</sup>.

There is also the well-known reference to the lost 'Assumption' in Jude<sup>9</sup> (generalized in 2 P 2<sup>10,11</sup>)—'Yet Michael the archangel,' etc.

ii. Parallels in doctrine and ideas.—(a) The parallels with the NT doctrine of Christ are remarkable. Moses appears to fill the place which would be taken by Christ in Christian belief, as a Divinely appointed mediator, bound by no limitations of time or space, interceding on behalf of God's people. His pre-existence and mediatorship are asserted in 1<sup>14</sup>. He was 'prepared before the foundation of the world (cf. Mt 25<sup>34</sup>) to be the mediator of His (God's) covenant' (cf. Gal 3<sup>10</sup>). Christ, too, was 'before all things' (Col 1<sup>17</sup>, Jn 1<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>58</sup> 17<sup>5</sup>), and was the Mediator of a new and better covenant (He 8<sup>6</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>). Baldensperger sees in 11<sup>7</sup> a definite attack on Christian views. The body of Moses would know no local sepulchre, nor would any dare to move his 'body from thence as a man from place to place.' This seems to imply the Jewish view that not only was Christ buried, and His body moved from the cross to the grave, but that His disciples had removed it from the sepulchre (Mt 28<sup>13</sup>). In 11<sup>9</sup> Joshua says: 'Thou art departing, and who will feed this people [cf. the commission to Peter in Jn 21<sup>15-17</sup>], or who is there who will have compassion on them, and . . . be their guide by the way (cf. Mt 9<sup>36</sup>), or who will pray for them, not omitting a single day?' cf. 11<sup>17</sup> (Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, He 7<sup>25</sup>). But not only is Moses regarded as shepherd, compassionate guide, and intercessor; in 11<sup>16</sup> he is described as 'the sacred spirit who was worthy of the Lord (cf. Wis 3<sup>6</sup> 7-), manifold and incomprehensible, the lord of the world, who was faithful in all things (He 3<sup>5</sup>), God's chief prophet throughout the earth, the most perfect teacher in the world.' Cf., in regard to Christ, Jn 3<sup>2</sup> 'Thou art a teacher come from God,' 6<sup>68</sup> 'Thou hast the words of eternal life.' For the 'manifold Spirit,' cf. 1 Co 12<sup>11-13</sup>, and for Christ as Spirit, 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup> 'the Lord is that Spirit.' In 12<sup>6</sup> Moses is 'appointed to pray for their (Israel's) sins and make intercession for them' (cf. He 7<sup>25</sup>). Moses also was the appointed revealer of God's hidden purpose (11<sup>2, 13</sup>). God had 'created the world on behalf of his people' (a common Jewish view; contrast He 1<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup>, Ro 11<sup>36</sup>, Jn 1<sup>3</sup>—where Christ is the final cause of creation). 'But he was not pleased to manifest this purpose of creation from the foundation of the world in order that the Gentiles might thereby be convicted' (by their own false theories). Cf. Ro 16<sup>5, 26</sup> ' . . . the preaching of Jesus Christ . . . the revelation of the mystery which hath been kept in silence through times eternal, but now is manifested . . . unto all the nations unto obedience of faith.' In Eph 1<sup>9</sup> the mystery of God's will, 'according to his good pleasure, which he purposed in him,' is not Israel but Christ as the goal of all creation. In Eph 3<sup>4-11</sup> it includes the bringing in of the Gentiles into the scheme of final restoration. In 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>, Eph 3<sup>9</sup>, Ro 16<sup>5</sup> the purpose precedes the creation of the world.

(b) Justification and good works.—The Rabbinic doctrine of man's merit is entirely absent. Cf. 12<sup>7</sup> 'Not for any virtue or strength of mine, but in His compassion and long-suffering, was He pleased to call me.' Cf. Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>.

(c) Day of repentance.—Jerusalem is to be the place of worship till 'the day of repentance in the visitation wherewith the Lord shall visit them in the consummation of the end of the days' (1<sup>18</sup>). This repentance in Mal 4<sup>6</sup> and Lk 1<sup>16, 17</sup> is to be brought about by Elijah. It is the theme of John the Baptist (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>) and of Christ (1<sup>15</sup>). It is to usher in the 'visitation,' or the establishment of the theocratic Kingdom by God Himself in person.

(d) Michael is regarded as the chief antagonist of Satan and of Israel's foes. In 10<sup>2</sup> he is appointed chief, and 'will forthwith avenge them of their enemies.' Cf. Rev 12<sup>7</sup>.

(e) Gehenna is still the place, not where the wicked and immoral suffer, but into which Israel's foes, the Gentiles, are cast. The dividing line between the future blessed and accursed is a national and not a moral one.

(f) Messianic Kingdom.—There is no Messiah. In 10<sup>7</sup> we are told 'the Eternal God alone . . . will . . . punish the Gentiles.' The Kingdom will come upon a general repentance (1<sup>17</sup>) 1750 years (10<sup>12</sup>) after Moses' death, i.e. between A.D. 75 and 107. The ten tribes share in the promises (3<sup>9</sup>) and in the final restoration (10<sup>8</sup>). Israel is finally exalted to heaven (10<sup>24</sup>) and beholds its foes in Gehenna (10<sup>10</sup>).

LITERATURE.—(a) CHIEF EDITIONS OF THE LATIN TEXT.—A. Ceriani, Monumenta sacra et profana, i. l. (1861) 55-64; A. Hügenfeld, NT extra Canonem receptum, 1876, pp. 107-135; G. Volkmar, Mose Prophetie und Himmelfahrt, Leipzig, 1867; Schmidt-Merx, 'Die Assumptio Mosis . . .' (Archiv f. wissen. Erforsch. des AT, ed. Merx, 1868, i. ii. 111-152); O. F. Fritzsche, Libri Apocryphi V.T., 1871, pp. 700-730; R. H. Charles, The Assumption of Moses . . . the unemended Text . . . together with the Text in its . . . critically emended Form, London, 1897; C. Clemen, The Assumption of Moses, Cambridge, 1904. (b) CHIEF CRITICAL INQUIRIES.—Ronsch, ZWT, xi. (1868) 76-108, 466-468, xii. (1869) 213-228, xiv. (1871) 89-92, xvii. (1874) 542-562, xxviii. (1885) 102-104; F. Rosenthal, Vier apoc. Bücher, 1885, pp. 13-38; E. Schürer, HJP ii. iii. 73-83; W. Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 1888, pp. 25-31; W. J. Deane, Pseudepigrapha, 1891, pp. 95-130; E. de Faye, Les Apocryphes juives, 1892, pp. 67-75; R. H. Charles, op. cit. xiii-ix; C. Clemen, in Kautsch's Apok. und Pseud., ii. (1900) 311-331; F. C. Burkitt, in HDB iii. 448-450; R. H. Charles, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, Oxford, 1913, ii. 407-424. A. LI. DAVIES.

ASSURANCE.—1. The word and its Greek equivalents.—'Assurance' (with the kindred forms 'assure,' 'assured of,' 'assuredly') is employed in the EV to render several Gr. words expressing certitude, or setting forth grounds of certainty.—(1) In Ac 17<sup>31</sup> it is used to render πίστις, 'faith,' which has the meaning here of 'pledge' or 'guarantee,' the Resurrection of Christ being taken by St. Paul, in addressing the Stoics and Epicureans of Athens on Mars' Hill, as warranting the faith, or imparting certainty to the conviction, of judgment to come.—(2) It is used in He 11<sup>1</sup> (RV) to translate ὑπόστασις, 'substance,' 'confidence,' where πίστις itself is defined as 'the assurance of things hoped for, the proving (ἐλεγχος) of things not seen.'—(3) In 1 Jn 3<sup>19</sup> we find the verb employed to translate πείσμεν from πείθειν: 'Hereby shall we know that we are of the truth and shall assure our heart before him,' where πείσμεν, translated 'shall assure,' signifies the stilling and tranquillizing of the heart that has been agitated by doubts, misgivings, or fears. (πείσμεν is only once again employed in the NT in this sense: in Mt 28<sup>14</sup>, where it is rendered 'persuade,' and where Tindale's quaint translation is 'pease' [appease], the object of the persuasion being the Roman governor at Jerusalem.)—(4) In 2 Ti 3<sup>14</sup> the passive form of the verb is found as the rendering of ἐπιστῶθης, 'thou hast been assured of,' referring to Timothy's training in the knowledge of the 'sacred writings which are able to make thee wise unto salvation.'—(5) In Ac 2<sup>26</sup> we find the adverb 'assuredly' employed to translate ἀσφάλως, 'surely,' 'certainly,' recalling ἀσφάλειαν in Lk 1<sup>4</sup>.—(6) In Ac 16<sup>10</sup> the word συμβιβάζων, 'combining,' 'putting this and that together,' is translated in AV 'assuredly gathering,' which in RV has given place to the word of logical inference, 'concluding.'

(7) The word, however, of which 'assurance' is the definite and specific rendering is πληροφορία (1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, Col 2<sup>2</sup>, He 6<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>2</sup>), with which may be taken the kindred verb πληροφορεῖν, passive πληροφορεῖσθαι. In determining the precise meaning of the Gr. original we receive no help from Gr. literature in general, where the word is not found at all till a late period. The word πληροφορεῖν, however, has been found in papyri signifying 'to settle fully an account,' 'to give satisfaction as to a doubtful matter,' 'to be completely satisfied with regard to something that was owing' (A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, London, 1910, p. 82). It occurs once in LXX (Ec 8<sup>11</sup>). Otherwise its use is exclusively NT and Patristic.—(α) πληροφορία is used absolutely in 1 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, and, though RVm gives 'much fulness' as the translation of πολλή πληροφορία, this is weak and inadequate, and 'full assurance' of AV and RV brings out the proper force of the word and really expresses the Apostle's thought. The second term of the composite word (-φορία, -φορεῖν, -εἶσθαι) seems to carry with it a subjective force both in the noun and in the verb, as may be gathered from examples in the NT and in the Fathers. To this 2 Ti 4<sup>2</sup> and Lk 1<sup>1</sup> may be exceptions. We are justified, therefore, in rendering in Col 2- 'full assurance of the understanding'; in He 6<sup>11</sup> 'full assurance of hope'; and in 10- 'full assurance of faith.' In 1 Clem. xlii. 3 μετα πληροφορίας πνεύματος ἁγίου is 'with full assurance produced by the Holy Spirit,' although it might be 'with full reliance upon the Holy Spirit.' This Clementine passage has the verb also (πληροφορηθέντες) and is peculiarly instructive as to the nature of the 'assurance' which possessed the apostles as they went forth to be ambassadors of Christ: 'Accordingly having received instructions and having attained to full assurance (πληροφορηθέντες) through the Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ and having been put in trust with the word of God, they went forth in full reliance upon the Holy Spirit, preaching the glad tidings that the kingdom of God was about to come.'—(β) πληροφορεῖσθαι has the subjective force we have attributed to it in most of the Pauline and Patristic examples of its use. Of Abraham it is said that he was 'fully assured' (πληροφορηθείς) that what God had promised he was able also to perform (Ro 4<sup>21</sup>). In regard to doubtful questions in the Apostolic Church, St. Paul bids each man be 'fully assured' in his own mind (Ro 14<sup>5</sup> RV). The prayer of St. Paul and his friends for the Colossian Christians is that they may stand perfect and 'fully assured' (πεπληροφορημένοι) in every thing willed by God (Col 4<sup>12</sup>). In the Epp. of Ignatius, who contends so strenuously against Docetic views of the Person of Christ, we find the saint and martyr employing the verb in the same sense as St. Paul. He bids his readers be on their guard against the seductions of error and be fully assured (πεπληροφορησθαι) of the Birth, Passion, and Resurrection as historical facts, for these things were truly and certainly done by Jesus Christ 'our Hope, from which hope may it never befall any of you to be turned aside' (Magn. 11). Elsewhere, speaking of the OT prophets, Ignatius declares that they were inspired by the grace of Christ Jesus 'to the end that unbelievers might be fully assured (εἰς τὸ πληροφορηθῆναι) that there is one God who manifested Himself through Jesus Christ, His Son' (Magn. 8).

2. The doctrine in the teaching of the apostles.

—From an examination of the words employed by the NT writers to express Christian certainty, with the illustrations, which might easily be added to, from the Apostolic Fathers, we can gain a clear outline of the character of 'assurance.' It embraces a conviction of the truth of the Christian history, of the historical reality of the Birth, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ; trustful reliance upon the promises of God in Jesus Christ His Son; the exercise of the intelligence and the reasoning powers to know without doubt what God requires of His people; and the consciousness of a personal interest in Christ and His great redemption, wrought by the Spirit in the individual soul. This outline we are able to fill in from the apostles' teaching in passages where the word itself is not employed. Assurance, as an experience of the apostolic writers and their readers, meets us in nearly every one of the Epistles. St. James, in his Epistle, negatively urges it when he dwells upon the evils of the divided mind, and he has words of commendation for the perfected faith of Abraham (Ja 1<sup>6</sup>.<sup>8</sup> 2-17.). St. Jude knows the secret when he commends the readers of his brief Epistle to Him that is able to keep them from falling and to present them faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy (Jude 4-). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, when he bids his readers show diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end (He 6<sup>11</sup>), means 'that your salvation may be a matter of certainty, and not merely of charitable hope' (A. B. Bruce). And pointing to the blood of sprinkling, and the rent veil, and the new and living way, and the heavenly High Priest, he bids them keep approaching 'with a true heart in full assurance of faith' (10-). But St. Peter, St. John, and St. Paul have teaching on the subject which may be a little more fully drawn out.

(1) St. Peter's teaching is given in Acts and in the Epistles that bear his name. St. Peter's speeches, on the day of Pentecost and afterwards, set forth the grounds of the assurance of the Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus which possessed the apostles and their believing hearers. These grounds are (α) the prophetic words of Scripture finding their fulfilment not in David or any other, but in Jesus; (β) the personal testimony of the apostles to the things which they had seen and heard; (γ) the manifestation of the risen Lord's presence and power in the miracles wrought in His name; (δ) the inner witness of the Spirit—'we are witnesses of these things and so is the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him' (Ac 5<sup>32</sup>)—'the historical witness borne to the facts and the internal witness of the Holy Ghost bringing home to men's hearts the meaning of the facts' (Knowling, ad loc.; cf. 2<sup>16-34</sup> 4<sup>20ff.</sup>). It is this assurance which the Apostle holds forth to the sojourners of the Dispersion in his First Epistle (1 P 1<sup>3-9</sup>), whom the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ had begotten again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; 'who by the power of God are guarded through faith unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.' Whether 2 Peter be the production of St. Peter or of some disciple writing in his spirit at a later time, it is the voice of full assurance we hear when the author says: 'We did not follow cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but we were eye-witnesses of his majesty' (2 P 1<sup>16</sup>). Thus convincingly does the external and the internal witness blend in St. Peter's doctrine of assurance.

(2) St. John's teaching in his Epistles lays the chief stress upon the ethical tests, and has less to say of the inner witness. Not that the latter is overlooked. 'The anointing which ye received of him,' he says, referring to the Holy Spirit or a function of the Spirit, 'abideth in you, and ye have no need that any one teach you' (1 Jn 2-7). But St. John's doctrine of assurance embraces great Christian certainties. 'We know and have believed the love which God hath in us' (1 Jn 4<sup>16</sup>). 'We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren' (3<sup>14</sup>). 'Hereby shall we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him' (3<sup>19</sup>). 'We know [being the children of God and recipients of redeeming love] that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is' (3-). 'We know that we have come to a knowledge of him, if we keep his commandments' (23). 'Hereby we know that we are in him; he that saith he abideth in him ought himself also to walk even as he walked' (25<sup>f</sup>).

Law aptly characterizes St. John's doctrine of personal assurance when he says: 'With St. John the grounds of assurance are ethical, not emotional; objective, not subjective; plain and tangible, not microscopic and elusive. They are three, or, rather, they are a trinity: Belief, Righteousness, Love. By his belief in Christ, his keeping God's commandments, and his love to the brethren, a Christian man is recognised, and recognises himself as begotten of God' (Tests of Life, Edinburgh, 1909, p. 297).

St. John applies his doctrine of assurance to prayer. 'Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, we have boldness toward God; and whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments' (32<sup>ff</sup>). 'And this is the boldness which we have towards him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us' (54<sup>f</sup>). And while this assurance gives boldness and confidence in prayer, it also gives boldness in the Day of Judgment: 'Herein is love made perfect with us, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment; because as he is, even so are we in this world. There is no fear in love: but perfect love casteth out fear' (47<sup>f</sup>).

(3) St. Paul's teaching lays the stress upon the inner witness which we desiderated in St. John. And yet in his enumeration of graces under the designation of 'fruit of the Spirit' we have sure evidences of the Spirit's indwelling whereby to 'assure our hearts' before Him. St. Paul's assurance rests also upon a broad basis of fact in the Person and work of Christ: 'I know him whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to guard that which I have committed unto him against that day' (2 Ti 1-). When, however, he uses the expression 'we know,' uttering his assurance of personal immortality, he attributes it to God who gave him the earnest of the Spirit (2 Co 5<sup>ff</sup>). In two great passages, Rom 8<sup>1ff</sup> and Gal 4<sup>ff</sup>, St. Paul sets forth the witness of the Spirit to the sonship of the believer, which is the ground of his full assurance, by the childlike confidence which it works and the perfect liberty which it brings. And so he can exclaim: 'We know that to them that love God all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to his purpose. . . . For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord' (Ro 8-8. 38<sup>f</sup>).

But, although St. Paul cherishes this assurance and has no doubt or misgiving as to his personal salvation, this assurance does not cause him to slacken in the fulfilment of service and the pursuit of the eternal prize. Even he is moved by the wholesome fear lest he who had preached to the wholesome yet himself become a castaway (ἀδοκιμος, 1 Co 9<sup>ff</sup>), and be cast out of the lists as one who had not contended according to the rules.

'We must remember,' says a Christian writer before the middle of the 2nd cent., 'that he who strives in the corruptible contest, if he be found acting unfairly, fouling a competitor in the race, or trying with guile to overreach his antagonist, is taken away and scourged and cast forth from the lists. What then think ye? If one does anything unseemly in the incorruptible contest, what shall he have to bear?' (2 Clem. vii.). It is in the same spirit that the author of the Didache, writing before the close of the 1st cent., says: 'For the whole period of your faith will profit you nothing unless ye be found fully perfected at the last' (Did. xvi. 2; cf. Ep. of Barn. iv. 9).

LITERATURE.—F. H. R. von Frank, System of Christian Certainty, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1886; W. J. Townsend, H. B. Workman, and G. Eayrs, New Hist. of Methodism, London, 1909; R. Seeberg, in PRE vi. 160; the art. 'Assurance,' in UDB, SDB, and DCG; art. 'Certitude,' in CE, and art. 'Certainty (Religious),' in ERE, with the literature there cited.

T. NICOL.

ASYNCRITUS (Ἀσύγκριτος, or Ἀσυνκρίτος, a Greek name).—The first of a group of five names (all Greek) of persons 'and the brethren with them' saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16<sup>14</sup>. Nothing is known of Asyncritus or of any member of this group. It is suggested that together they formed a separate ἐκκλησία, or church, within the Church of Rome. That such little communities existed in Rome, each with its own place of meeting, would appear from other similar phrases in Ro 16: 'the church that is in their house' (v. 5), 'all the saints that are with them' (v. 15), and from the references to the Christian members of the 'households' of Aristobulus and Narcissus (vv. 10-11). This, of course, assumes the Roman destination of these salutations. If the Ephesian destination be preferred, there is evidence of similar house-churches at Ephesus in 1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>, and perhaps in Ac 20<sup>20</sup> (see art. PATROBAS). The name Asyncritus has been found in an inscription of a freedman of Augustus (see Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup>, 1902, p. 427).

T. B. ALLWORTHY.

ATHENS (Ἀθῆναι).—Athens, which St. Paul visited in the autumn of A.D. 48 (Harnack), or 50 (Turner), or 51 (Ramsay), was now in some respects very different from the city of Pericles and Plato. Her political and commercial supremacy was gone. Greece had for two centuries been the Roman province of Achaia, of which Athens was not the capital. The governor had his residence at Corinth, and the merchant-princes had forsaken the Piræus for Lechæum and Cenchreæ. But Athens was still the most beautiful and brilliant of cities, the home of philosophy, the shrine of art, the fountain-head of ideals. As the metropolis of Hellenism she had, indeed, a wider and more pervasive influence than ever, which the Roman conquerors, like the Macedonians before them, did their best to extend. 'From the Philhellenic standpoint, doubtless, Athens was the masterpiece of the world' (T. Mommsen, Provinces of the Roman Empire<sup>2</sup>, London, 1909, i. 258). To be among her citizens was to breathe the atmosphere of culture. Her Lyceum by the Ilissus, her Academy by the groves of Cephissus, her Porch in the Agora, and her Garden near at hand, were still frequented by Platonists, Peripatetics, Stoics, and Epicureans. Her University drew to itself a host of foreign students, especially from Rome, and became the model of the younger foundations of Alexandria, Antioch, and Tarsus.

Neither the Republic nor the Empire ever fully applied the subject-relation to Greece, and the Athenians were always treated with special kindness. 'The Romans, after their conquest, finding them governed by a democracy, maintained their independence and liberty' (Strabo, ix. i. 20). Even in the Mithridatic war, when an ordinary town behaving as Athens did would have been razed to the ground, 'the citizens were pardoned, and, to this time, the city enjoys liberty, and is respected by the Romans' (ib.).

The outward aspect of Athens was little altered in St. Paul's time. Plutarch, who wrote half a century later, says in regard to Pericles' public edifices: 'In beauty each of them at once appeared venerable as soon as it was built; but even at the present day the work looks as fresh as ever, for they bloom with an eternal freshness which defies time, and seems to make the work instinct with an unfading spirit of youth' (Pericles, xiii.). Cicero conveys the impression which the city made upon every cultivated mind in his time: 'Valde me Athenæ delectarunt, urbe dumtaxat et urbis ornameto, . . . sed multum ea philosophia' (Ep. ad Att. v. 10). The Philhellenism of the Empire surpassed that of the Republic, and of all the Roman benefactors of Athens the greatest was Hadrian, who not only completed the temple of Zeus Olympius, which had remained unfinished for 700 years, but embellished the city with many other public buildings, and gave the name of Hadrianopolis to a new quarter.

But, though Athens was outwardly as splendid as ever, she was inwardly decadent, being, in philosophy, letters, and art, a city living upon traditions. Her first-rate statesmen and orators, poets and thinkers, did not outlive the nation's freedom.

'The self-esteem of the Hellenes, well-warranted in itself and fostered by the attitude of the Roman government . . . called into life among them a cultus of the past, which was compounded of a faithful clinging to the memories of greater and happier times and a quaint reverting of matured civilisation to its in part very primitive beginnings. . . . The bane of Hellenic existence lay in the limitation of its sphere; high ambition lacked a corresponding aim, and therefore the low and degrading ambition flourished luxuriantly' (Mommson, op. cit. i. 280, 283).

The decay of Athens was due less to the exhaustion of her creative energy, with the substitution of imitative for original work, than to the simple fact that the thought and art of her citizens were no longer wedded to noble action and brave endurance. Full of aesthetes and dilettantes, loving the reputation more than the reality of culture, letting a restless inquisitiveness and shallow scepticism take the place of high aspiration and moral enthusiasm, she became blind to the visions, and deaf to the voices, which redeem individual and collective life from vanity.

The devouring appetite of the Athenians for news had long been one of their best-known traits.

Demosthenes (Phil. i. p. 43) pictures them bustling about the Agora inquiring if any newer thing is being told (πυνθανόμενοι κατὰ τὴν ἀγορὰν εἰ τι λέγεται νωτέρον), the tragedy being that, while they were talking, Philip was acting. Thucydides (iii. 38) makes Cleon say to them: 'So you are the best men to be imposed on with novelty of argument, and to be unwilling to follow up what has been approved by you, being slaves of every new paradox, and despisers of what is ordinary. Each of you wishes above all to be able to speak himself. . . . In a word, you are overpowered by the pleasures of the ear, and are like men sitting to be amused by rhetoricians rather than deliberating upon State affairs.'

Among the philosophers of St. Paul's time the penchant for news took the form of an eagerness to hear the latest novelty in speculation or religion which any σπερμολόγος (picker-up of scraps of information) might have to publish (Ac 17<sup>21</sup>), in order that they might exercise their nimble wits upon it, and most probably hold it up to ridicule.

Though St. Paul spoke the language of Hellas, and acknowledged himself a debtor to the Hellenes (Ro 1<sup>14</sup>), yet Athens does not seem to have exercised any fascination over him. She did not beckon him like Rome; he did not see her in his dreams, or pray that he might be prospered to come to her; he never exclaimed, with a sense of destiny, 'I must see Athens.' That he ever visited her at all was apparently the result of an accident. He was hurried away from Berea before he had time to mature his plans of future action, and he merely waited at Athens for the arrival of his friends, Silas and Timothy (Ac 17<sup>15f</sup>). To picture him wandering among temples and porticos, lost in admiration of works of genius, and 'perhaps witnessing the performance of a play of Euripides,' is to misunderstand him. He did not spend his leisure in Athens, any more than Luther in Rome, in appraising the masterpieces of plastic and dramatic art. They were both 'provoked'* by what they saw as they passed by. They were consumed with the prophetic zeal which seeks to replace a false or imperfect religion with a true and perfect one. St. Paul, indeed, knew the Hellenic world too well to imagine that, while the city was 'full of idols' (κατείδωλον), its men of culture were given to idolatry. In their case the worship of the gods survived only in that cultus of physical beauty to which innumerable sculptured forms bore silent witness, while such spiritual faith as they still retained found expression rather in altars Ἀγνώστῳ Θεῷ; to the existence of which Pausanias (i. i. 4) and Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. vi. 2) testify (see UNKNOWN GOD).

St. Paul's address before the court or council of Areopagus (q. v.) is a noble attempt to find common ground with the Athenian philosophers, an appreciation of what was highest in their religion, an expression of sympathy with their sincere agnosticism, an appeal to that groping, innate sense of spiritual realities, that universal instinct of monotheism, which lead to the true God who is near to all men, and who, though unseen, is no longer unknown. Renan suggests that St. Paul was 'embarrassed' by all the wonders that met his eyes in Athens, as if Athene herself had perhaps cast her spell upon him and made him somewhat doubtful of the Galilæan; but there is no sort of foundation for such a fancy. It is certain, however, that the Apostle had a new experience of a different kind in Athens. Faced by an audience half-courteous and half-derisive, he was first ridiculed and then ignored, when he would have preferred to be contradicted and persecuted. Not driven from the city by hostile feeling, but quitting it of his own accord, too unimportant to be noticed, too harmless to be molested, he departed with a crushing sense of failure, and, apparently as a consequence, began his mission in Corinth 'in weakness and fear and much trembling' (1 Co 2<sup>3</sup>). It is possible that he felt he had made a mistake. All that he said to the philosophers of Athens was true; but ineffective. It did little or nothing to storm the enemy's citadel. In a modern phrase, it was magnificent, but it was not war. Another power was needed to humiliate the wise, as well as to end the long reign of the gods of Greece. It is significant that in Corinth the Apostle determined—not, indeed, for the first time, but certainly with a new emphasis—not to know anything save Jesus Christ and Him crucified (1 Co 2-), who was for both Jews and Hellenes the power of God and the wisdom of God (1<sup>24</sup>).

The Athenian synagogue (Ac 17<sup>17</sup>), in which St. Paul met some 'devout persons'—σεβόμενοι, Gentiles more or less influenced by Judaism—was probably small, for the university city did not attract his compatriots like Corinth, the seat of commerce. His reasoning 'in the Agora every day with those who met him' naturally recalls those Socratic disputations in the same place, of which Grote gives a lively account in his History of Greece (London, 1869, viii. 211 f.). That the address before the Council of the Areopagus was not entirely fruitless is proved by the conversion of a man holding so important an official position as Dionysius the Areopagite (q. v.).

LITERATURE.—W. J. Conybeare and J. S. Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., London, 1877, i. 403 f.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, p. 237 f.; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 257 f.; E. Curtius, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, Berlin, 1894, ii. 528 f.; A. Mommson, Athenæ Christianæ, Leipzig, 1868; J. P. Mahaffy, Greek Life and Thought, London, 1887, and The Silver Age of the Greek World, do. 1906; A. Holm, History of Greece, Eng. tr., London, 1894-98.

JAMES STRAHAN.

**ATONEMENT.—Although found only once in the NT (Ro 5<sup>11</sup>) and there in the AV alone, this word has become the elect symbol in theological thought to indicate the doctrine in the Apostolic Church which placed the death of Christ in some form of causative connexion with the forgiveness of sins and with the restoration of men to favour and fellowship with God. The development of a doctrine of atonement in the NT is almost entirely the product of the experience and thought of the * παροξύνουμαι is often used in the LXX to express a burning Divine (and prophetic) indignation against idolatry (IIos 8<sup>5</sup>, Zec 10<sup>3</sup>).

Apostolic Church. It moved along two lines; these were neither divergent nor exactly parallel, nor is it probable that one was precisely supplementary to the other; they are best considered as converging towards an ultimate point of unity in which Godward and manward aspects are merged. They have been contrasted as objective and subjective, juridical and ethical, substitutionary and mystical. They correspond also to two definitions of the word itself. Originally and etymologically the word means 'at-one-ment'; it is a synonym for 'reconciliation' as an accomplished fact. Historically its usage signifies 'a satisfaction or reparation made by giving an equivalent for an injury, or by doing or suffering that which is received in satisfaction for an offence or injury' (Imperial Dict., s.v.). Here its synonym is 'expiation' as a means to reconciliation. Theologically it has been chiefly used in this latter sense, to indicate 'the expiation made by the obedience and suffering death of Christ to mark the relation of God to sin in the processes of human redemption.' A decided modern tendency is to return to the more original use of the word. It will probably be seen that both uses are required to state the fullness of the apostolic doctrine.

The literature preserved in the NT witnesses to the undoubted fact that the Apostolic Church had very early established a close connexion between the death of Jesus the Messiah and the redemption of men from their sins. Within seven years of His death—or probably considerably less—a 'doctrine of the cross' was freely and authoritatively preached in the Christian community; it appears to have been distinctly Pauline in general character; it held a primary place in the apostolic preaching; it was declared to be the fulfilment of the OT Scripture; it was set forth as the essence of the gospel, and was definitely referred to the teaching of Jesus for its ultimate authority. This much seems to be implied in what is probably the earliest testimony, if regard be had to the date of the writings in which it occurs, concerning the apostolic doctrine of the atonement. It is St. Paul's confident assertion, 'I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>). This is undoubtedly typical of the teaching accepted by the primitive Church; whatever St. Paul's differences with other apostolic teachers on other matters may have been, agreement seems to be found here. The confidence of this common witness so early in the Apostolic Church raises many interesting questions, some of which must be considered. To what extent can we find the more elaborate Pauline doctrine, which we shall find elsewhere in his writings, presented in such fragments of the teaching of the first Christians as we possess? How far is the apostolic interpretation of Christ's death sustained by appeal to the experience and teaching of Jesus Himself? By what means had the swift transition been made by the apostolic teachers themselves from the state of mind concerning the death of Jesus which is presented in the Synoptic Gospels to the beliefs exhibited in their preaching in the Acts? How was the unconcealed dismay of a bewildering disappointment changed into a glorying? It is clear from the contents of the Synoptic Gospels that, whatever the confusion and distress in the minds of His disciples which immediately followed the death of Christ, they were already in possession of memories of His teaching which lay comparatively dormant until they were awakened into vigorous activity by subsequent events and experiences; these, together with the facts of their Lord's life and the incidents of His death, may be spoken of as the sources of the apostolic doctrine of the atonement, as to its substance. For the forms into which it was cast we must look to the religious conceptions—legal, sacrificial, ethical, and eschatological—which constituted their world of theological ideas, and the background against which was set the teaching of Jesus.

I. SOURCES.—1. In the Synoptic Gospels.—Briefly summarized these are: (1) The intense and consistent ethical interpretation that Jesus gave to the Kingdom He came to establish, and to the conception of the salvation He taught and promised as the sign of its establishment in the individual soul and in the social order. It was no mere change of status; it was a becoming in ethical and spiritual character sons of God in likeness and obedience; it was actual release from the selfishness of the unfilial and unbrotherly life, and access into living communion in holy love with His God and Father.

(2) The Baptism and the Temptation of Jesus, which initiated Him into the course of His public ministry, were events associated in the minds of those who preserved the Synoptic tradition with the voice from heaven, 'Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased' (Lk 3--). Apparently the consciousness of Jesus as He realized His vocation, judging from what He afterwards taught His disciples of its inner meaning, was aware of this combination of Ps 2<sup>7</sup> with Is 42<sup>1ff</sup>.—the Son of God as King, and the suffering Servant of the Lord. The inference Denney draws, though obviously open to keen criticism from the eschatological school, has a suggestive value: the Messianic consciousness of Jesus from the beginning was one with the consciousness of the suffering Servant; He combined kingship and service in suffering from the first.* This finds support in the accounts of the Temptation, which was supremely a temptation to avoid suffering by choosing the easy way.

(3) All the Synoptics assure us that, when Jesus received the first full recognition of Messiahship from His disciples, He instantly met it by the open confession that His suffering and death were a necessity. 'The Son of Man must (δεῖ) suffer—must go up to Jerusalem and be killed' (Mk 8<sup>31</sup>, Mt 16<sup>21</sup>, Lk 9<sup>22</sup>). Henceforth His constant subject of instruction was concerning His death, which, when 'the Son of Man was risen from the dead,' His disciples were to interpret. The necessity associated with His death was not merely the inevitable sequence of His loyalty to His ideal of righteousness in face of the opposition of His enemies. It was that, but it was more. In the career of one such as Jesus the violent and unjust death to which He was moving could not be separated in thought from the Father's will to which He was so exquisitely sensitive, and which He came perfectly to fulfil. What was in His Father's will was appointed and could not be the mere drift of circumstances into which He was cast and from which the Divine purpose was absent. The necessity was inward, and identical with the will of God as expressed in Scripture; to His disciples it was incomprehensible.

(4) Jesus described His death as for others and as voluntarily endured. Definite terms are selected in which the meaning more than the fact of the death is set forth. 'The Son of Man came . . . to minister, and to give his life a ransom (λύτρον) for many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>). Whether we approach the meaning of this term (see RANSOM) from Christ's conception of His life-work as a whole, or by closer exegetical or historical study of the word itself, it is clear that the giving of His life was to Jesus much more than the normal experience of dying; it was a dying which was to issue in largeness and freedom of life for mankind—it was probably even more than 'on behalf of,' 'in the service of'; it was 'instead of' (ἀντὶ) men. From what He is to release them, however, is not definitely stated. The objection often made that the term is an indication of Pauline influence on Mark is part of the general problem of Paulinism in the Gospels, too large for discussion here. The saying is in perfect harmony with its setting.

* Death of Christ, 14 f.

(5) The other selected term is connected with the critically difficult passages recording the institution of the Supper. 'This is my blood of the covenant [possibly the 'new' covenant] which is shed for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26<sup>3</sup>). Here the purpose or ground of the death of Jesus is set forth. It is only just to say that Matthew alone makes the reference to 'remission of sins.' The earliest account of the Supper—St. Paul's (1 Co 11<sup>3-6</sup>)—omits this reference; he is followed by Mark and Luke. Questions also turn on the sacrificial significance of 'blood of the covenant.' The reference is obviously to the solemn ratification by blood-sprinkling of the covenant of Sinai (Ex 24<sup>8</sup>). Whether this was strictly sacrificial blood with expiatory value is debated. Robertson Smith* and Driver† may both be quoted in favour of the view that 'sacrificial blood was universally associated with propitiatory power.'‡ Whilst too much should not be built upon a single authority for the precise word of Jesus, the criticism does not touch the value of the citation as an index to the mind of the Apostolic Church.

(6) The awful isolation of the cry of Jesus on the cross, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' (Mk 15<sup>34</sup>) cannot easily be separated in the experience of the sinless Son of God from some mysterious connexion with the sin He clearly came to deal with by His death. It is at least capable of the suggestion that for a time His consciousness had lost the sense of God's presence, whose unbroken continuity had hitherto been the ethical and spiritual certainty of His spirit.

To complete the material provided for the apostolic doctrine in the Synoptics there should be added to the points already mentioned the minuteness and wealth of detail—quite without parallel in the presentation of other important features of His life—with which the death of Jesus is recorded, and also the extent to which the writers insist upon the event as a fulfilment of the OT Scriptures. We have, therefore, in the Synoptics, whatever view may be taken of the position largely held, that they were the issue of 'the productive activity' of the early Church under the stimulating influence of redemptive experiences attributed to the death of Christ, at least the starting-point of the ethical and juridical views of the atonement subsequently developed in the primitive community; they lack doctrinal definiteness, and distinctly favour the ethical more than the legal view of the process of redemption; they are also accompanied by evidences that the disciples listened unintelligently or with reluctant acquiescence to the words of Jesus concerning His death. This last feature indicates the dependence of the apostolic doctrine upon another source.

2. The apostolic experience.—The doctrine of atonement arose out of the Christian experience; it was the issue of a new religious feeling rather than a condition of faith. The springs of this new spiritual emotion must be sought, if the doctrine which is its result in the Apostolic Church is to be rightly appreciated. In this way also we shall provide a statement of the transition from the desolation wrought by the death of Jesus in the hopes of His followers to the triumphant temper and abounding joy of the primitive faith and preaching. The elements of this experience are:

(1) The Resurrection.—This is the starting-point of the new experience: the ultimate root of the apostolic doctrine of atonement was the presence of the Risen Christ in the consciousness of the primitive Christian community; for it was the secret of the restoration and enrichment of personal faith, the re-creation of the corporate confidence of the community, which 'was begotten again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead' (1 P 1<sup>3</sup>). It was also the revealing light that brought meaning into the mystery of His death. Now and for always these two—death and resurrection—stood together. When the apostles stated the one, they implied the other; the Resurrection was the great theme of the apostolic preaching because it interpreted the significance of the Death. Both were closely and instinctively connected with the forgiveness of sins: 'The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew, hanging him upon a tree. Him did God exalt with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins' (Ac 5<sup>30f</sup>). The redeeming virtue issues from the Death and Resurrection as from a common source, though the cross ultimately became its chosen symbol. Beginning to search the Scriptures to discover whether death had a place in the prophetic presentation of the Messiah, the disciples were surprised into the apprehension of the meaning of the words of Jesus spoken whilst He was yet with them; they thus came to see that the Death was only the shadow side of an experience by which He passed to the exaltation and authority of His redeeming work; the catastrophe was seen to have a place in the moral order of God, and the scandal of the cross was transfigured into the glory of the Divine purpose of redemption. This experience was followed by—

(2) The Great Commission.—The terms of this are influential for discerning the apostolic doctrine. As they appear in Mt. (28<sup>19f</sup>) and in Mk. (16<sup>15f</sup>) associated with baptism, which in the primitive Church was always connected with remission of sins, they are suggestive, but not free from critical difficulties. As they appear in Lk. (24<sup>44f</sup>), from an excellent source, they have their chief significance; they are there bound up with 'my words which I spake unto you while I was yet with you'; with the fulfilling of the Scriptures concerning the necessity that 'the Christ should suffer and rise again from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name'; and especially with the opening of the minds of those who were to be 'witnesses of these things' that they might understand them. The historicity of this as conveying the experience and convictions of the Apostolic Church is strong, and it affords exactly the link needed to unite what we find in the Synoptics with what appears as preaching and teaching in the primitive society. The illumination of the apostolic mind for its construction of a doctrine of atonement resulting from the Resurrection and the Great Commission was perfected by the experiences of—

(3) Pentecost.—The coming to abide with them of the Holy Spirit, 'the promise of the Father' (Ac 1<sup>4</sup>), 'the Spirit of Christ,' was for the Apostolic Church the ultimate certainty of guidance into all the truth, and the supreme authority for its adequate utterance. The work of the Spirit as Jesus had defined it was: 'He shall take of mine and shall declare it unto you' (Jn 16<sup>14</sup>). To the fullness of His ministry the Apostolic Church owed the interpretation of the cross, the inspiration of its preaching, the construction of its doctrine, and especially the moral and spiritual results in the life of the individual and of the community which were the living verification of its power, and also the justification of the moral grounds on which the declaration and experience of remission of sins were based. The meaning of the words of Jesus is understood through the works of His Spirit; the significance of His death can be apprehended only in the light of the experience it creates. Only so can an adequate soteriology be reached. From first to last the apostolic doctrine of the atonement is the effort to interpret this experience in the relations in which it was conceived to stand to the Christian conceptions of God and man.

* Rel. Sem., London, 1891, p. 319 f.

† JDB, art. 'Propitiation,' iv. 132.

‡ Denney, Death of Christ, 53.

II. THE DOCTRINE PREACHED.—1. In the Acts of the Apostles.—The early chapters of the Acts contain the one particular account of the earliest form the doctrine of atonement took in the Apostolic Church; for it is generally admitted that some source of considerable value underlies the speeches of Peter. Both their christology and soteriology are primitive in type—it is surely not the doctrine of the 2nd century. In this account the sufferings and death of Jesus the Messiah have a fundamental place. The cross is now more than a scandal; the 'word of the cross' is more than an apologetic device for getting over the difficulties of accepting a crucified Messiah. Although the great feature of the apostolic preaching is not the explanation of the death of Christ in relation to the remission of sins, but its power in spiritual renewal, it contains much which enables us to perceive how the primitive community was taught to regard it. Summarized, this is—(1) The death of Christ was a Divine necessity, appointed by God's counsel and foreknowledge. It was a crime whose issue God thwarted for His redeeming purpose (Ac 2<sup>3</sup> 31<sup>8</sup>).—(2) Jesus as the Messiah is identified with the suffering Servant of the Lord (4<sup>27</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>–35). This conception, abhorrent to the Jewish mind and a sufficient ground for rejecting the Messianic claims of Jesus, is the assertion of the vicarious principle of the righteous one suffering for the unrighteous many and also the sign of a Divine fellowship.—(3) The great gift of the gospel—remission of sins—is set in direct relation to the crucified Jesus (2<sup>38</sup> 31<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>31</sup> 10<sup>43</sup>). The prominence given to this in every sermon suggests that this connexion cannot be considered accidental.—(4) Reference to the frequent observance of the Lord's Supper (2<sup>4</sup>). When it is remembered that nothing in the Apostolic Church is more primitive than the sacraments, and that both of them bear implications of Christ's relation to the remission of sins, this reference is significant.—(5) Christ's death is not distinctly represented as the ground of forgiveness, by setting forth the Messiah's death as a satisfaction for sin or as a substitute for sin's penalty. It is set forth as a motive to repentance and a means of turning men away from sin, but its saving value is not more closely defined. It is certain, however, that the early Apostolic Church attached a saving significance to the death of Christ.

2. In 1 Peter.—It is usual to associate with the indications of the doctrine in the early chapters of Acts the constructive tendencies found in 1 Peter. The Epistle of James is too uncertain in its date and authority, and its aim is too purely practical to warrant appeal to it on the apostolic doctrine of atonement. Indeed, 1 Peter is far from being free from difficulty when used for this purpose. The signs of Pauline influence are too strong for its use as a source of primitive Christian ideas without some hesitation. Still, the fact that St. Paul and St. Peter are represented as in harmony on the significance of the redemptive work of Christ, when they are manifestly at variance in other important factors of the primitive faith, is not without its value; it is possible also that their similarities may be accounted for by their common loyalty to the accepted Christian tradition. Taken as it stands, St. Peter's contribution may be epitomized thus: (1) Whilst the suffering death of Christ holds, as elsewhere in apostolic writings, the central place, its strongest appeal is made in regard to the moral quality of the sufferings. The patience and innocence of the Sufferer for righteousness' sake control its theological presentation. The exhortation to suffer with Christ by expressing His spirit in the life of discipleship obviously emphasizes the ethical appeal of His example, but this is based upon a due appreciation of His sufferings on our behalf. Quite a procession of theological ideas thus emerges.—(2) The covenant idea with its sacrificial implication in 'sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' is present (1<sup>2</sup>), possibly reminiscent of the words at the Supper.—(3) Ransomed 'with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ' (1<sup>19</sup>), combines the idea of the sacrificial lamb with possibly an echo of the 'ransom' of Mk 10<sup>45</sup>.—(4) The close connexion of Christ who 'suffered for you, leaving you an example, that ye should follow his steps,' and its ethical appeal, with the clear interpretation of the Passion as a sin-bearing, 'who his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree' (2<sup>24</sup>), and its profound moral issues, 'that we having died unto sins, might live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed'—shows how intimately what are termed the objective and subjective conceptions of the atonement are associated in the writer's thought; the end is moral and dominates the means, but the means are clearly substitutionary, to the extent that the obligations to righteousness involved in 'our sins' are assumed by the sinless Lamb of God.—(5) The writer once again glides with simple ease and familiarity from the force of the example of Christ to the abiding fact of His sin-bearing (3<sup>18</sup>): 'Because Christ also suffered for sins once (ἅπαξ, 'once for all'), the righteous for (υπερ) the unrighteous, that He might bring us to God.) Access to God is regarded as a high privilege obtained by a great self-surrender and not as a native right to be taken for granted. Of course these ideas, which the writer of 1 Peter discusses in this apparently incidental way, are closely akin to those of the righteousness by faith and ethical obedience 'in Christ' which St. Paul discusses so fully and of set purpose in Ro 3 and 6 respectively, and this may suggest his influence. If so, then the evidence of 1 Peter will fall into the later Pauline period of apostolic doctrine, which we shall now consider at length; but that would not depreciate its value as a witness to the faith of the Apostolic Church in its wider range.

III. THE DOCTRINE DEVELOPED.—1. The Pauline type.—It will be obvious to any reader of the literature of the Apostolic Church that its doctrine of atonement was the subject of considerable development in form. In tracing this the Pauline writings must be our main source. Of all NT writers, St. Paul goes into the greatest detail and has most deliberately and continually reflected upon this subject. Indeed, the abundance of the material he provides is embarrassing to any one seeking a unified doctrine. In St. Paul we find for the first time a philosophy of the death of Christ in relation to the forgiveness of sins, which is ultimately based upon an analysis of the Divine attributes and their place in the interpretation of the doctrine of the cross. At the same time the emphasis he lays upon this is regarded by him as in accordance with the belief and teaching of the primitive community; it is the centre of his gospel and theirs. It may be assumed, therefore, that we are as likely to learn from him as from any other source what was the inner meaning of the primitive Christian belief. He declared that what he preached concerning the dying of Christ for our sins according to the Scriptures he 'received' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>). Whilst it is possible that this statement finds a fuller definition in his further assertion, 'Neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ' (Gal 1<sup>1</sup>), it seems clear that St. Paul's doctrine rested upon the common apostolic data given in (1) the words of Jesus respecting the necessity of His death on man's behalf; (2) the very early Christian idea that it was included in the Divine purpose; (3) the conception of the vicarious sufferings of the righteous and their merit founded on Is 53 which had been elaborated in later Jewish thought.* Although it seems clear that this late Jewish doctrine was a source of St. Paul's theory, it underwent partial transformation at his hands; it was ethicized; moreover, it was probably the vicarious idea, as it was associated with the prophetic rather than with the priestly or legal conceptions, that he appropriated; it was not the literal legal substitution and transfer, but the vicariousness of a real experience in which the righteous bear upon their hearts the woes and sins of the sinful.†

(1) St. Paul's early preaching.—The earliest indication of St. Paul's view of atonement would naturally be sought in his preaching during the fifteen or more years before he wrote the letters in which he sets forth more deliberately and with obvious carefulness his matured doctrinal judgments. The author of the Acts gives little light on St. Paul's method of setting out his interpretation of the death of Christ in his discourses; how he was accustomed to place it in relation to forgiveness of sin in his earliest preaching does not definitely appear. The discourse at Antioch in Pisidia may illustrate the character of his reference to it: 'through this man is preached unto you forgiveness of sins' (Ac 13<sup>38</sup>); but nothing is defined more closely. To the Ephesian elders at Miletus he speaks about 'the Church of God, which he purchased with his own blood' (20<sup>28</sup>). St. Paul himself gives us the only valuable account of his preaching. Its dominant topic was the crucifixion—'the preaching of the cross' (1 Co 1<sup>18</sup>); 'I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified' (2-). No explanation is given. But the fact that he made the cross supreme when it was regarded as a direct antagonism and provocative by those he sought to win—a scandal to Jews and foolishness to the Gentiles—implies that it was associated with an interpretation that made it something different from a martyrdom. Such a martyrdom neither Jew nor Greek would have regarded with the scorn they exhibited for the interpretation St. Paul gave them in order to meet their challenge for explanation.

(2) The Pauline Epistles.—On the whole, St. Paul's preaching carries us no further towards a knowledge of any reasoned doctrine of atonement than the position reached in the preaching of his fellow-apostles—that 'Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures.' Of course this is in itself a vast doctrinal implication. Still, for the structure of the Pauline doctrine we are shut up to his teaching in his Epistles. In his earliest writings—the Thessalonian Epistles—we practically get no further towards his doctrine than in his preaching, except perhaps that the idea emerges that in some way Christ identifies Himself with our evil that He may identify us with Himself in His own good (1 Th 5<sup>9f.</sup>). We meet the organized body of his doctrine in the well-authenticated group of his writings to the Galatians, Romans, and Corinthians, with a supplementary view in the Imprisonment Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians. We may differentiate this teaching, but it has throughout most important underlying principles in common. It falls conveniently into five divisions—Atonement and Law; Atonement and Righteousness; Atonement and Personality; Atonement and Newness of Life; Atonement and the Universe. In briefly reviewing these, it should be remembered that according to St. Paul the love of God is the first and last motive of redemption, and that none of the atoning processes is separable from the full activities of the Divine Personality.

(a) Atonement and Law.—This is the form in which St. Paul construes his doctrine in the Galatian Epistle, which deals more exclusively than any other NT document with the significance of the death of Christ. 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for (ὡς ἐπὶ) us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth upon a tree' (Gal 3<sup>13</sup>). The conception here is distinctly juridical; whether it is also penal will depend upon the definition of 'penal.' If punishment implies guilt, the sufferings of Christ were not strictly penal, for He is always set forth as guiltless; moreover, guilt cannot be transferred as guilt. His sufferings did, in St. Paul's judgment, serve the end of punishment; they were representatively penal; Christ took the place of the guilty as far as it involved penal consequences; for special emphasis is laid upon the instrument of death—the cross—and upon its curse, though there seems nothing to justify the attributing to Christ of the position suggested by the allusion to Dt 21<sup>23</sup> of one 'accursed of God' which has at times been pressed by expositors. That He endured the consequences of such a position and in this sense was 'made a curse on our behalf' is the Apostle's application of it. This endurance is regarded as the recognition of the just requirement of the law of God—not the ceremonial law alone, but also the moral demands arising out of God's holy and righteous nature, and especially those which empirically St. Paul had put to the test in vain in his seeking after personal righteousness. St. Paul does not deny the authority of this law; he asserts it, but the fact that it was added to the promise for 'the sake of transgression' resulted in its making men sinful; it brought a curse: 'Cursed is every one which continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law, to do them' (3<sup>10</sup>). With this curse in its consequences Christ identifies Himself, as in the Apostle's thought He had identified Himself with mankind in being 'born of a woman, born under the law' (4<sup>1</sup>). By thus making Himself absolutely one with those under ban, absorbing into Himself all that it meant, He removed the obstacle to forgiveness in the righteous attitude of God towards sin which could not be overcome until sin had been virtually punished. It was thus that the way was opened for man to identify himself by personal faith and living experience with Christ's death, so that St. Paul was justified in saying: 'For I through the law died unto the law, that I might live unto God. I have been crucified with Christ; yet I live; and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me' (2<sup>19f.</sup>).

This conception of St. Paul's adds the ethical idea of atonement to the juridical, which other passages reiterate (5-6<sup>14</sup>). It is, however, essentially Pauline to regard the ethical as depending for its possibility and efficacy in experience upon the juridical; otherwise 'Christ died for nought.' God must vindicate His law so that He may justly forgive; the operation of grace is connected with the assertion of justice. But ultimately St.

* Cf. Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 59, 122.

† Cf. G. A. Smith, Mod. Crit. and Preaching of OT, London, 1901, p. 120 ff.

Paul's conception really transcends these contrasts; for it is God Himself who in His love provides the way to be both just and gracious; He, not another, provides the satisfaction. In the last analysis God is presented as removing His own obstacles to forgiveness; the death in which His righteous law is exhibited is the provision of His antecedent love; the commending of His love is the prior purpose resulting in Christ being 'made a curse on our behalf.'* Consequently the whole Christian life is resolved into a response to God's love exhibited in the death of His Son; it does away with the hindrance to forgiveness in God's law, and at the same time inspires the faith which conducts into ethical conformity to Christ in man's experience.

(b) Atonement and Righteousness.—This is dealt with exhaustively in the Epistle to the Romans; the great question the Epistle discusses is—How shall a sinful man be righteous with God? and the answer is—By receiving 'a righteousness of God' which is 'revealed from faith to faith.' In the interpretation of this answer we reach the heart of the apostolic doctrine, and upon it the great bulk of later historical discussions has turned. For more than the briefest hints here given of the points of exegesis involved, reference should be made to commentaries on the Epistle. St. Paul distinctly states the two sides of the meaning of atonement referred to in the beginning of this article. But his interest is primarily absorbed by the efficient cause of at-one-ment as the ideal end, viz. the atonement, the Divine provision of the satisfaction which the Divine righteousness requires to be exhibited in order that forgiveness of sins may be bestowed and a restoration of fellowship between God and man achieved. To this he devotes his utmost strength; he regards it as primary in the order of thought as well as in the redemptive process. Still he is nobly loyal to both conceptions, if, indeed, they were for him really two; for he thinks of the unity of the process with the end as exhibiting the perfectness of the Divine purpose of grace. This point will be discussed later. Meanwhile it must be pointed out that the strong divergencies revealed in the interpretation of the apostolic doctrine have frequently resulted from regarding one or other of these phases of the Pauline doctrine as in itself adequate to explain the whole. Ethical theories have sought to ignore the juridical means; juridical theories have often stopped short of the ethical end. The Pauline doctrine does neither. Both are met in the conception, essential to his doctrine, of the ideal and actual identification of Christ with man in his sin, and of man with Christ in newness of life; and also in the identification of both with God in His unchanging righteousness and in His eternal love; for St. Paul with ceaseless loyalty carries all the processes of redemption in time up to the initiative and executive of the Divine purpose.

Righteousness is the starting-point of his discussion; it is seen in 'the wrath of God revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men' (Ro 1<sup>8</sup>). God can never be at peace with sin. Law brings no righteousness; 'by the law is the knowledge of sin' (3<sup>20</sup>). All have sinned; not one is righteous; the necessity for a righteousness apart from the law is obvious. The provision of this, 'even the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe' (3--), is the Divine atonement. This implies, of course, in its completion a great moral and spiritual change in the nature and character of those who 'have received the atonement'; that end does not yet receive St. Paul's attention; his mind is preoccupied with the means. He is not even at present intent on demonstrating the necessity of this ethical transformation; he is in subjection to the arresting fact that all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men was exposed to the Divine wrath, and is constrained to show how the wrath was withheld. This was not primarily to besought in the measure in which men might be arrested by the fact and cease to sin; they must and would do that in proportion as they received the atonement. But for the time being St. Paul is confining his thought entirely to the 'objective' work of Christ in the atonement, whereby was provided and set forth the means by which the 'subjective' work of Christ in personal union with the believing soul might be possible; indeed, in some respects it had been actual also in the past, for sins had already been remitted by God. 'Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood, to show his righteousness, because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God; for the showing, I say, of his righteousness at this present season: that he might himself be just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus' (3<sup>4ff</sup>).

Thus St. Paul conceived the method of deliverance from the wrath of God which was inevitable in the presence of unrighteousness; it is an objective work and is in response to faith, however full of personal renewal in righteousness its ethical implications may eventually become; for the destruction of sin and the gift of life are regarded as depending upon a free bestowal on sinners of a righteousness of God. The interpretation of this crucial passage and its context depends upon the meaning assigned to the terms 'righteousness of God' and 'propitiation.' The idea expressed in the former term occupies the central place in St. Paul's conception of atonement. Righteousness was his passion; its quest the summum bonum of his life; 'he had sought it long in vain, and when at length he found it he gave to it a name expressive of its infinite worth to his heart: the righteousness of God.'* To this title—'a righteousness of God'—he firmly adheres; it is distinctive; to him it is something belonging to the Christian man, yet it is not his personal righteousness of character; he receives it. It also belongs to God, but it is not His personal righteousness which is imparted to the believer. St. Paul's conception of it does not occur in the Gospels, where the term stands for the righteousness of which God is the centre, which is His essential attribute. The nearest approach to the Pauline sense in the teaching of Jesus is the grace of God in the free pardon of sin. In St. Paul, righteousness is a 'gift' from God to him who believes in Christ. He is dealt with as righteous. To regard the righteousness of God as essentially self-imparting, taking hold of human lives and filling them with its Divine energies, without any reference to the problem sin has created, is not Pauline. To St. Paul, as well as to all NT teaching, God's righteousness was the affluent, overflowing source of all the goodness in the world, but he felt that sin made a difference to God; it was sin against His righteousness; and His righteousness had to be vindicated against it; it could not ignore it.

Any view which failed to appreciate this problem would miss the characteristic solution that St. Paul unceasingly presents in the 'propitiation' in the blood of Christ, 'whom God had set forth to show his righteousness in passing over sins done aforetime.' Ritschl's view, that always in St. Paul the righteousness of God means the mode of procedure which is consistent with God's having the salvation of believers as His end,* overlooks the emphatic contention of the Apostle, that it is the ungodly to whom God is gracious rather than the faithful within the covenant privilege; this latter is the class referred to in the Psalms and Second Isaiah, to whom God exhibited His righteousness in presence of the wrongs done them by their enemies. Ritschl's conception is an attractive presentation of the meaning of the term in other relations, but it is irrelevant to St. Paul's distinctive meaning. The suggestive view of the term expounded by Seeberg in Der Tod Christi, that the righteousness of God means simply His moral activity in harmony with His true character, the norm of which is that He should institute and maintain fellowship with men; that if He did not do so He would not be righteous and would fail to act in His proper character, leaves unanswered in any distinctive Pauline fashion the question what means God takes to secure fellowship with sinful men so that He may act towards the ungodly in a way which does justice to Himself. St. Paul does not leave the presentation of Christ as a means by which this fellowship may be instituted, without a much closer definition; he clearly relates it to the vicarious principle lying for him in his elect word 'propitiation,' whether it be taken as a strictly sacrificial term or not (see, in addition, art. PROPITIATION).

* Cf. P. Wernle, Anfänge unserer Religion, Tübingen, 1901, p. 146; Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 67.

* Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 146.

Denney, who discusses these views at length,† maintains that the righteousness of God has not the same meaning throughout this passage (3<sup>21ff</sup>); it has 'in one place—say in v.—the half-technical sense which belongs to it as a summary of St. Paul's gospel; and in another—say in v.—the larger and more general sense which might belong to it elsewhere in Scripture as a synonym for God's character, or at least for one of His essential attributes.' But these two views are not unrelated; they cannot be discussed apart; we see them harmonized as complements in the true meaning of 'propitiation.' Christ is set forth by God as a propitiation to exhibit their unity and consistency with each other. When the Pauline view of 'propitiation,' as 'relative to some problem created by sin for a God who would justify sinners,' is accepted in a substitutionary sense and the argument of the passage reaches its climax, the two senses of the righteousness of God in it 'have sifted themselves out, so to speak, and stand distinctly side by side.'‡ God is the Just in His own character; and at the same time, in providing a righteousness of God through faith, which stands to the good of the believing sinner, He is the Justifier. That both these meanings are present in atonement and are there harmonized with one another, is what St. Paul seeks to bring out.

St. Paul would show God righteous in His forbearance in 'the passing over of sins done aforetime.' But, as he defines the effects of the propitiation, he leaves the wrath of God in the background; the forbearance of God becomes the centre of his thought; that is a gracious fact and must be accounted for. Why has God never dealt with sinful men according to their sins? He has always been slow to anger and of great kindness, a gracious God and merciful; sins done aforetime were passed over. Does the doing of this impugn His righteousness? St. Paul finds his apology for, and explanation of, the universal graciousness of God in the propitiation which He has set forth in Christ by His blood. God cannot be charged with moral indifference because He has always been God, the Saviour. Sin has never been a trivial matter; any omission to mark it by inflicting its full penal consequences has been due to forbearance, which now in the propitiation justifies itself to His righteousness. If, apart from this, God had invested with privilege those whose sin deserved the manifestation of His wrath, He would, St. Paul thinks, have suppressed His righteousness. To show the Justifier, whether 'in respect of sins done aforetime' or 'at this present season,' to be Himself just, St. Paul holds the setting forth of His righteousness by the propitiation in the blood of Christ to be necessary. Christ's death, therefore, was something more than a great ethical appeal of the love of God in suffering for sin to the heart and conscience of men; it had been rendered necessary by the remission of sins in ages before the Advent, as well as to justify the readiness and desire of God to remit the sins of any man who 'at this present season' 'hath faith in Jesus.'

This exaltation of the forbearance of God as the ultimate explanation of the propitiation is intended to make known the ultimate fact that the wrath of God against sin lies within the supreme constraint of the love of God—'His own love' which He commendeth toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us (5<sup>6ff</sup>). Christ was set forth by God Himself; His love provided the propitiation; there was no constraint upon Christ. He gave Himself up for us; there was no conflict between the Divine wrath and the Divine love; they were reconciled in God, and their reconciliation set forth in the propitiation in the blood of Christ. The wrath is the expression and minister of the love; mere self-consideration is unknown in the Divine activity. Moreover, where the love has prevailed, the wrath fails, 'While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us; much more then being now justified in his blood shall we be saved through him from the wrath. For if while we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life' (5<sup>8ff</sup>). The achievement of redemption in its ethical value proceeds from the death of Christ as the supreme demonstration of the Divine love, by evoking in sinful souls the response of a personal surrender to the newness of life to which it constrains. This may introduce the classical passage in St. Paul's writings on the doctrine of atonement. 'All things are of God, who reconciled us to himself through Jesus Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses, and having committed unto us the word of reconciliation. We are ambassadors therefore on behalf of Christ, as though God were entreating by us; we beseech you on behalf of Christ, be ye reconciled to God. Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5<sup>18ff</sup>). The Pauline doctrine receives its most satisfying and probably its most permanent interpretation in the restoration of acceptable personal relations between God and man, and the perfecting of these in a fellowship of holy love.

(c) Atonement and Personality.—Love, the perfect expression of the Divine Personality, constrained God to identify Himself in Christ with us, and constrains us to identify ourselves in Christ with God. Personality finds its perfection in fellowship; self-identification with others is the ultimate of fellowship. Identification is the principle on which an interpretation of reconciliation most easily proceeds (see RECONCILIATION). Love is essentially self-impartation. Reconciliation is an exchange, the giving and receiving of love; 'at-one-ment' is its issue. This is based in the Pauline thought upon the Divine initiative. God 'made him who knew no sin to be sin on our behalf,' that there might be identification of righteousness as well as of love in the reconciliation, 'that we might become the righteousness of God in him,' 'not reckoning unto men their trespasses.' These words suggest the idea of such an identification of men 'in Christ' that there is on God's part a general justification of mankind in the form of a non-imputation of sins, on the purely objective ground of God's satisfaction by self-giving in Him who knowing no sin was made sin on our behalf. Individual identification of man will follow, as, in response to God's entreating, each man is reconciled to God. 'For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died; and he died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but to him who for their sakes died and rose again' (2 Co 5<sup>14f</sup>). As the race died in Christ, His death is a true crisis in every man's history; there is a new creation, which includes both a new status and a new creature. That all died in Christ is neither wholly subjective nor wholly objective. St. Paul's full doctrine requires both; their death is died by Him, and His death is died by them. But in the order of thought He must first die their death, that they may die His. We never read that God has been reconciled; He reconciled Himself to the world in Christ, but men are reconciled or 'receive the reconciliation.' St. Paul's judgment is that the atonement is a finished work, but that the 'at-onement' is progressive; reconciliation is first a work wrought on men's behalf before it is wrought within their hearts; it is a work outside of men, that it may be a work within them; there is objective basis for the subjective experience.

* Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, ii. 117.

† Death of Christ, 161 ff.

‡ Ib. 165.

Some interpreters, e.g. Denney,* would limit the reconciliation to what God in Christ has done outside of us; others, e.g. Kaftan,† hold that nothing is to be called reconciliation unless men are actually reconciled. St. Paul's doctrine is consistent with the view that reconciliation is both something which is done and something which is being done. The expression of that which is done and the source of that which is being done are seen in the solemn assertion that God made Him who knew no sin to be sin on our behalf. No exegesis is more than a halting interpretation of the profound significance of this saying. At least the words mean that He died for our sin in regard to its consequences. They seem, however, to mean more; but in what sense God's love in the gift of Christ can be said to be identified with 'sin on our behalf,' it is impossible to say. Certain it is that St. Paul had other and more usual ways of saying that the sinless One was a sin-bearer in the sense of an offering for sin. The strength of the saying is that He died to all that sin could mean, and that, in this dying unto sin once for all, the race with which He identified Himself in His sufferings and death died with Him; it is a death which contains the death of all, rather than solely a death which would otherwise have been died by all; in it their trespasses are not imputed unto them, and by the constraint of its demonstration of love they live not unto themselves but unto Him who died for them and rose again. The statement that all this was the work of 'God in Christ' suffices to refute any reading of the process of reconciliation which suggests a contrast that approaches competition between the righteousness of God and the love of Christ. It is identification which is supreme here. For, while it is no doubt true that the conception of Christ as substitute suits the interpretation of His death as sacrificial, the idea of representation best accords with the whole group of passages from which by induction St. Paul's law of redemption is to be gathered. In these, Christ appears as a central Person, in whom the race is gathered into an ethical unity, having one responsibility and one inheritance. In this identity even those realities usually regarded as inseparable from personality, such as sin and righteousness, are treated as separable entities passing freely from the one participant in the identification to the other—sin to the Sinless One, righteousness to the unrighteous. An objective identity of this order, however, does not permanently satisfy so keen a thinker as St. Paul; he cannot rest short of subjective identity between Redeemer and redeemed. Not only in virtual oneness by Divine appointment, but in actual union by living experience, is identification to be achieved. This provides the basis for St. Paul's teaching on—

(d) Atonement and Newness of Life.—The work of redemption was not wholly a matter of juridical substitution and imputation. Another line of thought of great importance is pursued, besides the freeing from the curse and the deliverance from wrath. The relation of men to the salvation of Christ is not purely passive.* They must enter into intimate union of life with Him. They must die in effect with Christ to sin on His cross, and rise with Him in newness of life. Through their faith they constitute His mystical body; they have corporate identity with Him in 'the life which is life indeed'; they are saved from the power as well as the guilt of sin; freedom from the law of sin and death completes the release from its condemnation; the release from past sin in the atonement in Christ's death does not exhaust its aim; it involves the actual renunciation of the selfish life and the realization of the life of holy love.

Although this conception is not wholly out of mind in chs. 3 and 4 of Romans and elsewhere (cf. Gal 2<sup>19f</sup>, Col 2<sup>20</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9f</sup>), in which the juridical view of Christ's death is developed, it finds its full presentation in reply to an imaginary objection to the juridical view in Ro 6 and the following three chapters. The question, Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? starts St. Paul upon an exposition of the essential relation between the righteousness which is by faith in Christ as 'propitiation,' and the righteousness which is personal and real, through vital fellowship with His death and resurrection; 'crucified with him, buried with him, raised with him,' believers also walk with Him 'in newness of life.' There is something in the experience of Christ which they repeat so far as its ethical implications can be realized in their own experience; for the closest of links exists between the saving deed of Christ and the ethical issues of the salvation it has brought about. Although St. Paul does not make any direct use of the spotless holiness and perfect obedience of Christ save in so far as they issue in His death, still these ethical qualities of the Redeemer become the ethical demand in the redeemed as their union of life with Him is unfolded. The great Pauline conception 'in Christ' is required to complete on its ethical side the salvation which is 'through Christ' on the legal side.

In recent exposition the relation between these two—the 'subjective-mystical' view of salvation and the 'objective-juridical'—has been much discussed. Is the former an addition, a supplement, a correlative, or a transformation of the latter? 'Probably a majority of recent scholars hold that the conception of freedom from sin through a new moral life is primary in the thought of the Apostle';† others reverse this relation.‡ Denney strongly maintains that Christ's substitutionary death is primary, and that the ethico-mystical views are directly deduced from it; the latter

* A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 120.

† E. g. Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 70; W. Beyschlag, NT Theol., Eng. tr., 1895, ii. 198-201; C. v. Weizsäcker, Das apostolische Zeitalter, Freiburg i. B., 1890, p. 139 (Eng. tr., London, 1895, ii. 104 f.).

‡ E. g. O. Pfleiderer, Das Urchristentum, Berlin, 1887, p. 229; E. Menegoz, Le Peche et la Redemption d'apres St. Paul, 1882, ii. 251 ff.

* Death of Christ, 145.

† Dogmatik, § 52 ff.

indicate the inevitable result of a true appropriating faith in the substitutionary death of Christ, the sole object of which was to atone for sin; gratitude to Christ for this redemptive act of love being sufficient to evoke the whole experience of salvation on its ethical side. St. Paul's thought has only one focus—Christ's 'finished work,' His 'atonement outside of us.* A. B. Bruce fears that the practical schism between these two experiences of faith in the objective work of Christ and personal union in His death and resurrection is too real for such a view; he thinks that the doctrine of an objective righteousness wrought out by Christ was first elaborated, that this 'met the spiritual need of the conversion crisis,' and that 'the doctrine of subjective righteousness came in due season to solve problems arising out of Christian experience'; consequently they are 'two doctrines,' two revelations serving different purposes, but not incompatible with or cancelling one another.† Lipsius regards the two lines of thought as parallel or interpenetrating.‡ H. J. Holtzmann makes the interesting suggestion that the expiatory doctrine is built up by St. Paul's use of popular Jewish conceptions and sacrificial categories applied to Christ's death, while the ethico-mystical view is the more direct product of his experience interpreted through Hellenistic ideas, especially the contrast of flesh and spirit.§ Whilst the two doctrines lie side by side within the same Epistle, it is difficult to regard them as separate doctrines representing quite distinct epochs of thought or experience in St. Paul. His teaching elsewhere on the work of the Holy Spirit should not be ignored in making adjustments between the two sides of his view of the atonement. It is on the interpretation of the place of St. Paul's ethical teaching on this doctrine that most marked differences exist; his doctrine of expiation is expounded with substantially the same results by scholars of the most divergent theological tendencies.||

(e) Atonement and the Universe.—In two of the Epistles of the Imprisonment—those to Eph. and Col. (Phil. repeats the same circle of ideas as Rom. and Gal.)—St. Paul extends the reconciliation wrought by the death of Christ from the human race to the universe as it sustains moral relations to God; it is the cosmic view of the atonement, and is a result of seeking to provide a basis for the ruling idea of the absoluteness of his gospel. The 'world' for which Christ died is no longer the world of sinful men, as in 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup> and Ro 3<sup>19</sup>; it is vaster (cf. Ro 8<sup>19ff</sup>); it includes angelic and possibly super-angelic beings, 'things in (or above) the heavens' (Eph 1<sup>10</sup>); God has been pleased 'through him to reconcile all things unto himself, having made peace through the blood of his cross, through him, whether they be things on earth, or things in heaven' (Col 1-6). Here we pass from the region of the historical and experimental into that of vision and spiritual imagination. How far the categories of juridical and ethical, into which St. Paul's doctrine has been cast elsewhere, may be applied to the processes of the restoration of the whole universe to perfect unity with God in Christ, it is difficult to say. R. W. Dale¶ argues that they are fulfilled in removing the objective cause of estrangement; but it is evident that, if this is in itself inadequate for the realized salvation of the human race, it will not be likely to suffice for a higher race of moral intelligences; the personal union of sympathy and life implied in the subjective and mystical view will still be necessary for at-one-ment.

The Pastoral Epistles, though probably much later than St. Paul's earlier group in which his doctrine is chiefly stated, add no fresh ideas to his interpretation. This may imply that his doctrine had already become fixed in form and could be taken for granted, or that it is unwise to lay stress upon the view that it was a slowly developed teaching. The influence upon other NT writers of St. Paul's doctrine of the relation of the death of Christ to the forgiveness of sins should be carefully considered; the subject goes beyond the scope of this article.

2. The type presented in the Epistle to the Hebrews.—This is distinctive. Some suspect possible affinities with the thought of the apostolic group in the Church at Jerusalem. The writing exhibits many resemblances in language to the Pauline type, but the same terms are used with a different connotation, and there is an absence of many of St. Paul's characteristic forms of thought; the Pauline principle of substitution prevails, but it is presented more in the spirit and method of the Alexandrine exegesis and philosophy of religion—the relation of shadow to reality—or in the symbolism of the Jewish sacrificial system. Although one of the most theological of all the NT writings, it assumes rather than states a philosophy of the Christian redemption. The death of Christ is regarded as exclusively sacrificial. As atonement it is presented mostly on the objective side; even more than St. Paul, the writer emphasizes the work Christ does outside us, 'on our behalf.' St. Paul's supplement to this view in his ethico-mystical doctrine is only slightly considered. The term 'in Christ' does not occur; the circle of ideas it represents is absent; ethical implications of the vicarious view are found, but they are different and slighter. The idea of finality is the characteristic conception which dominates the presentation of Christ's redeeming work; it is 'eternal' in this sense. The ethical value of a sinless Offerer in perfect sympathy with His sinful brethren, for whom He presents His sacrifice perfect and without blemish, is a prominent characteristic in the doctrine of the atoning work. The perfect humanity implied makes it possible to start the interpretation of the doctrine of atonement in the Epistle, with Westcott, from the Incarnation; or, with Seeberg, from the Passion of the Offerer as identical with the historic Jesus. As His perfect Priesthood, which is almost identical with the latter, also includes the former, both in the historic fact and in the mind of the writer of the Epistle, it is more satisfactory to adopt it as the ruling idea.

(1) Priesthood.—Priesthood is the clearest way of access to the writer's main teaching; it unifies the distinguishable orders of sacrifice—sin-offering, burnt-offering, etc.—in the one characteristic function of the priest, which is to offer sacrifice and so to establish and to represent the fellowship of God with man, which is the root-idea of atonement. Such fellowship is visible and incorporate in the priest's person; through him the people draw near to God themselves, have their fellowship with Him, and become His people. The necessity for a priest and his mediation is that sin stands in the way of this fellowship; it cannot be ignored; its defilement is the acute problem in thought and experience which constrains the writer to set forth the Divinely appointed way for its removal. For this end God has appointed His own Son a High Priest for ever, that He may make 'propitiation'

* Death of Christ, 179–192.

† St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 214 ff.

‡ Dogmatik<sup>3</sup>, Brunswick, 1893, p. 510.

§ NT Theol. ii. 117 f.

¶ E.g. Stevens, Christian Doctrine of Salvation, pt. i. ch. iv.; Denney, Death of Christ, ch. iii.; Pfeiderer, Paulinismus<sup>2</sup>, Leipzig, 1890, ch. iii. (Eng. tr., 1877); Ménégot, Le Peche, etc., ii. ch. iii.; H. J. Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 97–121; H. Cremer, Die Paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre, Gütersloh, 1900, pp. 424–448.

¶ The Atonement<sup>3</sup>, 253 ff.

for the sins of His people (He 2<sup>17</sup>). This is possible in only one way—sacrifice. The OT conception, upon the analogy of which this NT structure is built, is that propitiation must be made for sin, if sinful men are to have fellowship with God at all; the only propitiation known is the shedding of blood in sacrificial offerings. A root-principle, therefore, of the writer's theory is: 'Apart from shedding of blood there is no remission' (9<sup>2</sup>). This sacrifice Christ provides in His blood; He is at once Priest and Sacrificial Offering; He is on this account capable of dealing effectively with sin as the obstacle to the fellowship of God and man; 'once (ἀπαξ—'once for all') at the end of the ages hath he been manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself' (9<sup>26</sup>).

(2) Sacrifice.—This offering of Himself is illustrated from the three elements of the Levitical system—(a) the sin-offering, (b) the covenant-offering, (c) the offering on the great Day of Atonement. As sin-offering, Christ's death was a final sacrifice for sins (10<sup>12, 18</sup>), it made propitiation for the sins of the people (2<sup>17</sup>), it put away sin (9<sup>26</sup>). As a covenant sacrifice, it ratified the new covenant, of which He was the mediator, by 'blood of sprinkling' (12<sup>24</sup>); for this covenant also, that it might become operative, His death was necessary. As the high priest entered every year into the Holy Place, Christ has entered into the heavenly sanctuary to appear before the face of God for us (9<sup>24</sup>). He also suffered without the camp (13<sup>11</sup>). The writer dwells much upon the fact that all these were only symbolic and morally ineffective as types. Only in Christ's sacrificial offering of Himself and in the functions of His changeless Priesthood could be provided the eternal reality (see SACRIFICE). The writer also further defines all that Christ did and suffered in its relation to God—and especially to His love. It was by the grace of God that He tasted death for every man (2<sup>9</sup>). God is not conceived in any sense as a hostile Being who is to be won over by sacrificial gifts to be gracious to man; these are never said to 'reconcile' God. The Priesthood of Christ was God's appointment and calling (5<sup>4</sup>). Christ's supreme ministry was 'to do thy will, O God' (10<sup>7</sup>). The same will was fulfilled 'through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all' (ἀπαξ, 10<sup>10</sup>). Christ's life and death are in perfect obedience to God, and are a revelation of the mind and love of God; such is God's gracious way of making it possible for the sinful to have fellowship with Him, of 'bringing many sons unto glory' (2<sup>10</sup>); it was entirely congruous, the writer asserts, with God's perfect ethical nature and with man's sinful state. It is in the latter sense that the writer defines further the relation of the sacrifice of Christ to sin. His work is described as 'having made purification of sins' (1<sup>3</sup>). He was offered to bear the sins of many (9<sup>28</sup> 2<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>12ff.</sup>). By whatever sacrificial illustrations His offering of Himself in His blood is set forth, the expiatory significance is common to them all; they represent the Divinely appointed way of dealing with sin as a hindrance to communion with God.

(3) Theory.—Beyond the relation to God and sin referred to, it is not easy, without going outside the pages of the Epistle, to state a doctrine which explains to the reason the grounds on which the sacrificial ministry of Christ as Priest and Offering becomes available for the establishing of the fellowship with God which is plainly set forth as its object. It is said 'to sanctify' men (2<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>10, 14</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>); to enable them 'to draw near to God' (4<sup>16</sup> 7<sup>19ff.</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>); 'to make perfect' (2<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>19</sup> 10<sup>14</sup>); 'to purify' (9<sup>14</sup>). It is difficult, however, to give a close definition of these terms. Primarily they refer to status; men's relation to God is altered rather than their character changed into ethical states befitting these terms as symbols of personal qualities; the immediate effect upon men is religious rather than ethical. But ultimately this effect is inadequate. As much as this was acknowledged to have been accomplished by the ancient priesthood and sacrifices, and it is the persistent plea of the writer that these ceased because they were inadequate: the blood of bulls and of goats can never take away sin or serve for the purification of the conscience. Christ's Priesthood and Offering were, on the other hand, 'better,' 'perfect,' 'eternal,' or final; they did what others could not do. In the end, therefore, those who shared their benefits would enter into possession and enjoyment of the ethical realities for which they were the surety; such persons were to become partakers of Christ (3<sup>14, 16</sup>). Identification was to follow the more strictly vicarious relation. Meanwhile, however, the writer is Pauline to this extent that, whilst not excluding the ethical from the results of Christ's substitutionary work, he emphasizes first and strongly the objective benefits. He holds that eventually conscience and character will share in the blessings assured by access to God, but the ethical change is considered as the outcome of the change in the religious and juridical relation. Before the 'sanctified' become sinless or the 'perfect' faultless or the 'purified' pure, they have the status towards God of these, which is expressed in the privilege of fellowship. This is the effect of Christ's 'finished work' in His death: it is primary; and the moral renewal, though assured as its outcome, is secondary. Christ's death has done something in regard to sin once for all, and by one offering has brought men for ever into a perfect religious relation to God. That such an objective result is thus brought about seems clear from the Epistle, but what it is precisely which in God is related to this work is not stated by the writer, nor what constitutes the necessity in God for the Divinely appointed death of Christ. He does not go behind the Divine appointment; that God wills it is sufficient; this is for him axiomatic; in what its absoluteness lies is not stated. How far it is legitimate to read into the Epistle the Pauline ideas is doubtful; it has only the value of inference. The efficiency of the fact that Christ's death is the putting away of sin is the writer's contribution to the apostolic doctrine of atonement rather than its explanation. Denney finds the one hint of an attempt at explanation in 'Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God' (9<sup>14</sup>). The sinlessness of Jesus gave to His offering an absolute and ideal character beyond which nothing could be conceived as a response to God's mind and requirements in relation to sin. The ideal obedience even unto death may be the clue—the spiritual principle of the atonement that gives the work of Christ its value. The Epistle lays great stress on Christ's identification of Himself with man.

3. The Johannine type.—This is a sufficiently definite term to stand for a characteristic view of the atonement in the Apostolic Church found in the Fourth Gospel, in the three Catholic Epistles bearing the name of John, and in the Apocalypse. Criticism still leaves the problem of authorship in much uncertainty, but tends to greater agreement in 'ascribing all these writings to the same locality, to pretty much the same period, and to the same circle of ideas and sympathies.* Reflecting probably the thought and experience of the last quarter, or even the last decade of the first century, they are later than all our other sources; and, being dominated by theological interest, they are of particular importance for judging the views taken of the death of Christ and its relation to sin towards the close of the Apostolic Age.

* Denney, Death of Christ, 241.

Whilst the Epistle which deals with the death of Christ presents a more reflective interpretation of it than is found in the Gospel, both unite in dwelling upon the ethical and spiritual results of Christ's death in the experience and possibilities of the Christian sanctification rather than upon its relation to the satisfaction of the Divine law of righteousness. But the latter is by no means overlooked; it is present frequently by implication, it is occasionally explicitly referred to. The Johannine type is distinctly more favourable to the conception of 'at-one-ment' than to that of atonement; it is ethical and mystical rather than juridical. So much is this so that selected sayings could be collected which would easily weave themselves into a theory that Jesus saves by revelation, by the illumination of Divine light which becomes the light of life and the assurance of our fellowship in the life eternal. Redemption by revelation would be a fair interpretation, say, of the Prologue to the Gospel and of those portions of it in which the ideas of the Prologue rule. Salvation is in Christ's Person: 'this is life eternal, that they should know thee the only true God and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ' (Jn 17<sup>3</sup>). Jesus redeems men by revealing to them the truth about God in Himself; His work is supremely that of the Prophet of God, who so redeems His people into fellowship with God. Knowledge of God as He is draws men from sin. Christ dies, but this is inevitable because He is the Word made flesh, and must therefore share the end of all flesh and die, and 'so fulfil the destiny of a perfect man by a perfect death as by a perfect life.'* Broadly speaking this is true, but it is certainly not the only Johannine view of the saving work of Christ. It may be suggestive to discern the contrast between the Pauline view that revelation is by redemption, and the Johannine that redemption is by revelation, but it is not exhaustive; for the Johannine writings are also pervaded by a conviction of the necessity and saving value of Christ's death; He is as truly 'propitiation' as 'revelation.' St. Paul's view that, apart from His purpose of dying for redemption, Christ would not have come in the flesh at all, is not avowed by St. John, but it is not contradicted by him; his main interests are much more with the realities and issues of redemption than with its presuppositions and processes. Sin is the real problem for him as for St. Paul, and the death of Christ is the only means of removing it. This is stated in Gospel and Epistle with a wealth of variety. Whether they afford material for a full theory of expiation, as some expositors assume, may be questioned; but that they clearly state a connexion between the death of Christ and the cleansing away of sin, and indicate a theory of this relation which has affinities with the Pauline view and with that of the writer to the Hebrews, cannot reasonably be doubted.

Whilst in the very brief review of these references we must refrain from reading the Pauline meaning into the Johannine ideas and terms, we must not decline to recognize such similarities as we find are present in the writings.

(1) References in Gospel.—These fall into characteristic groups:—(a) The references to the Lamb of God.—Whether the saying put into the mouth of the Baptist (Jn 1<sup>29</sup>) be critically valid or not, it is good evidence of the Johannine thought. We accept the saying as referring to Jesus who 'taketh away the sin of the world.' Its chief value is the use of the sacrificial symbol, 'the lamb'; Jesus takes away sin by the sacrificial method. The references in the Apocalypse to 'the Lamb' as it had 'been slain' (Rev 5<sup>6, 12</sup>), to 'those who have washed their robes in the blood of the Lamb' (7<sup>14</sup>), who overcame 'because of the blood of the Lamb' (12<sup>11</sup>), indicate that the power and purity of the new life in Christ were definitely associated with the shedding and sprinkling of His blood in the sacrificial sense. The phrase 'in the Lamb's book of life' (13<sup>8</sup>), though it may not bear the strain of the idea of an eternal redemption, since 'from the foundation of the world' belongs grammatically to 'written' (see art. BOOK OF LIFE) rather than to 'slain,' indicates nevertheless that there is salvation in no other.—(b) The references to 'the lifting up' (Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>). These are best expounded by the comment of the writer himself. 'This said (Jesus), indicating by what kind of death he was to die' (12<sup>33</sup>). They refer to the lifting up on the cross, though the exaltation that followed may be implied, in order that men might see Him in order to live and be drawn to Him by the appeal of His cross. If there be any expiatory idea here, it is implicit; it is not stated.—(c) The references to eating His flesh in Jn 6. Alone these might well be satisfied by the ethical interpretation of a spiritual appropriation of Christ; this conception is natural in the context; but, as it is scarcely possible at the late period of this writing to deny a reference to the 'Supper' and its connexion with remission of sins, the expiatory idea is most probably involved. In the exposition of any Johannine writings the place held by the sacraments in the Apostolic Church should never be ignored.—(d) The references to the laying down of His life.—'The Good Shepherd' (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>), the prophecy of Caiaphas (11<sup>50</sup>), the corn of wheat (12<sup>23ff</sup>), life laid down for friends (15<sup>13</sup>)—these with distinction of aspect show the application to Jesus of the vicarious principle; in the first and last instances the voluntary character of the self-sacrifice is important, whilst in the context of the third the soul-troubling of Jesus in presence of death suggests that the death was neither ordinary nor accidental. But there is no indication of a theory of how His death avails for the benefit of others. The one explanation that is sure is that He lays down His life in obedience to the constraint of love's necessity. This love is regarded by the writer both as Christ's own love and as the Father's. 'God so loved that he gave.' Love in each case is the gift of self.

(2) References in Epistle.—In passing from the Gospel, where the Johannine writer has emphasized the fact of the self-surrender in the death of Christ, obviously bringing it in wherever possible without attempting a definition of its relations, to the Epistle, we find a closer definition of these realities awaiting us. But here also the stress is laid upon the correlation of the death of Christ with the actual cleansing from sin rather than with the cancelling of guilt or the satisfaction of the law. Still, whilst the realization of purification, and not merely a provision of the means of its cleansing, is the primary meaning of the references to the redemptive work of Christ as the bearer of light and salvation, the latter is set forth in terms so intimately allied with the sacrificial terminology of the writers of the earlier apostolic Epistles, that the contention that there lies behind the passages the assumption of a judicial satisfaction for sin cannot be fairly evaded. The passages are: 'The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>); 'And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world' (2<sup>1f</sup>); 'Your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake' (2<sup>12</sup>); 'And ye know that he was manifested to take away sins; and in him is no sin' (3<sup>5</sup>); 'Hercin is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be a propitiation for our sins' (4<sup>10</sup>). With these it is convenient to associate the strongest saying in the Apocalypse on the subject: 'Unto him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins in his blood' (Rev 1<sup>5</sup>). That the immediate interest in these references is to the ethical and spiritual results issuing from the death of Christ in its relation to sin will not be doubted. The question at issue is how far the inference from them, that they assume an antecedent value belonging to the death of Christ in putting away the judicial obstacle to the cleansing in the law and righteousness of God, can be established. The cleansing obviously depends upon the 'death' and the 'blood' of Christ.

* Cf. B. F. Westcott, Epistles of St. John, London, 1883, p. 31 ff., Epistle to the Hebrews, London, 1889, p. 293 ff.; H. Schultz, Die Gottheit Christi, Gotha, 1881, p. 447.

We need not draw the distinction made by Westcott,* between the blood in the double sense of a life given and of a life liberated and made available for men, in order to justify a backward as well as a forward look in the symbol. The main burden of proof that the Johannine doctrine includes an objective as well as a subjective work of Christ is upon the use of 'propitiation.' It is not the same word (ἱλασμός, not ἱλαστήριον) as is used in the Pauline Epistles, but it is very closely akin. Is it likely, in being applied here to the same object, to have a different meaning? Used in the same Christian community within approximately the same period, and dealing with the same element in a common faith, is not the term probably used in the same accepted sense by the Johannine writer as by the writer to the Hebrews and St. Paul? If we are to interpret it, these usages are the only means at our disposal unless the Johannine literature itself provides others. This is not done. On the contrary, other terms are used that suggest that the place of ἱλασμός is in the same system of redemptive ideas that we find in the other apostolic writings. It is, for instance, co-ordinated with Jesus Christ as 'the righteous,' standing thereby in some relation to the moral order of the world, and with 'an Advocate,' which touches the judicial system of ideas; it is connected also with ideas of sacrifice and intercession which relate it to a system of mediating priesthood; the marked contrast between 'loveth' and 'loosed' in the operation of the love of Christ, which is the source and efficient cause of redemption in His blood from our sins in Rev 1<sup>5</sup>, may also suggest a combination between the progressive liberation from our sins and the achievement once for all of our redemption in Him. The further statement that the 'propitiation' is not for our sins only but also for 'the whole world,' is not satisfied by the merely personal, and therefore for the present partial, experience of a subjective salvation. These are only inferences and nothing more, but they are of value in construing the Johannine witness into terms of the general apostolic teaching. The supreme value, however, of this witness is the matchless grace with which the writer relates 'propitiation' to the love of God. St. Paul had taught this as the ultimate source of redemption, but had associated with its expression the righteousness of law and the wrath of God against sin. The Johannine writer transcends these in dwelling with holy joy upon the issues of the propitiation, not only in actual cleansing from sin, but in lifting men into the presence of an eternal reality in which propitiation is an interchangeable term with the Divine love itself. In 4<sup>10</sup> he defines propitiation in terms of love: 'He loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins'; in 3<sup>16</sup> he reverently identifies love with 'propitiation'—'In this have we known love, in that he (ἐκεῖνος) for us (ὕπὲρ ἡμῶν) laid down his life.' The contrast such love implies is the ultimate of the apostolic doctrine of the atonement—it is the perfect expression of what the writer means when he declares that 'God is love.'*

4. The sub-apostolic period.—In the age immediately succeeding the apostolic, the Church appears to have exhibited no desire to interpret the relation of the death of Christ to the forgiveness of sins either with greater fullness than, or by any divergence of view from, that found in the apostolic writings; the forms exhibited there were found sufficient. The early Fathers treated the atonement as a fact, without any attempt to explain its grounds. They had no theory: they describe it mostly in the actual words of Scripture, with little or no comment; the types of interpretation given were sufficient to satisfy their intelligence concerning the experience of forgiveness of sins which so richly satisfied their heart. Clement of Rome in his First Epistle exhorts the Corinthians to 'reverence the Lord Jesus Christ, whose blood was given for us' (xxi.), who 'on account of the love He bore us gave His blood for us by the will of God; His flesh for our flesh and His soul for our souls' (xlix.). There is no clear statement as to the reasons that moved the will of God. The ethical appeal of the death of Christ is predominant; it is the supreme motive to gratitude, humility, and self-sacrifice. The references in the writings of Ignatius are chiefly that the death of Christ on the cross reveals His love, and that through His death we become partakers of spiritual nourishment in His body and blood (cf. Trall. viii. and Rom. vi.). Polycarp reminds his readers that 'the earnest of their righteousness' is Jesus Christ, who 'bore our sins in His own body upon the tree; who did not sin, neither was guile found in His mouth, but endured all things for us, that we might live in Him' (Phil. viii.). The Epistle ascribed to Barnabas deals with the subject in its relation to the sacrifices of the Jewish Temple, which are abolished in order that 'the new law of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is without the yoke of necessity, might have a human oblation' (ii.). The Son of God is spoken of as One who 'suffered that His stroke might give us life'; 'let us therefore believe that the Son of God could not have suffered except for our sakes' (vi.). Our Lord's sufferings were necessary; why, it is not said. (For catena of quotations, consult R. W. Dale, The Atonement, 270 ff.; Moberly, Atonement and Personality, 326 ff.; Scott Lidgett, Spiritual Principle of Atonement, 420 ff.).

IV. CONCLUSION.—1. Is there an apostolic doctrine of the atonement?—Clearly the passages we have examined, which form the data for a doctrine of atonement, are brief and fragmentary in character. It is frequently pointed out that the books from which they are taken are in no strict sense a unity, and were not written with the object of being related to each other to form a unified volume; that they are only parts of a larger and richer whole which interpreted the faith of the Apostolic Age; that their unity is factitious.† This view is plausible. It must be admitted that the doctrine of atonement found no uniformity of expression in the Apostolic Church; but there is little room for doubt that there existed a central unity around which varied statements consistently moved; the latter were not a mere fortuitous grouping; they were orderly, and their movements were organized in response to a central gravity. The fact that the death of Christ had a direct relation to the forgiveness of sins and to the restoration of fellowship between God and man is fundamental to the most divergent interpretations of the fact. The occasion of the reference, the purpose of the writers, and especially their immediate conception of the character of God and His relation to the moral order of the world, largely account for the varying forms of expression and illustration. For, taken apart, the aspects in which the death of Christ is viewed in the apostolic writings give sufficient warrant for the main types—legal and ethical—which mark the history of the doctrine in the subsequent thought of the Church.

* Cf. Denney, Death of Christ, 276.

† Ib. p. 2, for typical illustrations.

* Epistles of St. John, 34 ff.; Epistle to the Hebrews, 293 ff.

But the most critical survey of these aspects does not sanction the contention of some recent writers that an apostolic doctrine of the atonement cannot be constructed.* A perfect doctrine may be so deeply grounded and so many-sided that no personal or corporate thought can completely expound it, and there may be many theories each having its value. The judgment expressed by R. F. Horton, 'The NT has no theory about the Atonement,'† is too easy a release from the intellectual necessity of seeking an interpretation of the profound fact which dominated the whole of the apostolic experience and teaching. The materials are certainly present in the apostolic literature for the construction of a theory—and more, a theory itself is potentially present and virtually expressed in the common experience and preaching of apostolic times where it is not formally defined. It is quite contrary to the spirit and attitude of the Apostolic Church to speak of the atonement, as Coleridge does, as 'the mysterious act, the operative cause transcendent. Factum est: and beyond the information contained in the enunciation of the FACT, it can be characterized only by the consequences.'‡ The apostolic writers regard fact and theory as permanently inseparable; 'reconciliation' involves its 'logos,' and they attempt an explanation of the great fact which had become the ground and appeal of their evangel; a fact of such a kind as the death of Christ, so rich in rational, ethical, and emotional content, and appealing to the whole ethical and spiritual being of man, could not be left without a 'meaning.' The simple connexion in any degree of causal relation between the fact of the death of Christ and the experience of forgiveness of sins is itself a profound theory as well as the mother of theories.

2. General character of the apostolic doctrine.—This, as presented in the literature of the Apostolic Age, is a unity in diversity. The diversity is apparent; it emerges as the stress of the interpretation of the death of Christ falls upon that which is accomplished by it objectively to man's inner experience and moral desert, in contrast with the effects subjectively achieved in the spiritual history of the individual believer and of the Christian community. The former represents what God does in and of and by Himself which, as exhibited in the life and death of His Son, justifies to Himself and in Himself the manifestation of His grace in the remission of sins; the latter is what man experiences in actual cleansing from sin and in conscious reconciliation with God in Christ; the former is represented as accomplished once for all in the sacrificial obedience of Christ even unto death; the latter is realized in the self-surrender of man under the constraint of the love of God in Christ, so that he enters into an inward spiritual fellowship with the suffering death of Christ, and in the power of his resurrection experiences the reality of ethical union with Christ; the former is regarded as a finished work, the latter as a progressive achievement; the former is atonement, the latter is 'at-one-ment.' The presence of this diversity of view in the faith of the Apostolic Church seems undeniable. Both aspects are dwelt upon; neither appears to be adequate alone. Each is carried back to the abiding purpose of God and regarded as the interpretation of His eternal love; the juridical stands for a reality in His nature as truly as the ethical; much in the apostolic doctrine is not covered by the conception of atonement which represents it as a perfect confession of sin on behalf of man by Christ as man's Representative; the juridical conception is not fairly stated as an argumentum ad Judæos, or as the mere inheritance of Jewish thought. For, although the idea of literal substitution lay so near to hand in later Jewish theology and was everywhere enriched for them by historic and Divinely-appointed ritual observance, the apostolic thinkers so deepen and transfigure it that it no longer tolerates the superficial conventional idea of an easy or mechanical transfer of man's guilt and penalty to another so that the sinner is exempt from further responsibility.

An objective view of atonement exaggerated into a system of imputations and equivalents is not found in the teaching of the Apostolic Church, neither is it ever set forth as a device for overcoming God's reluctance to forgive sins. We are presented rather with an intensely ethical conception of God's requirements and with a mystical view of man's relation to Christ as the Representative of the race. Substitution is thus deepened into moral identification and solidarity; even the outstanding feature of the apostolic view of atonement as 'propitiation' is explicitly correlated with the ethical nature of God; behind the figures of speech and juridical phraseology the redeeming work of Christ is presented as concerned primarily with personal relations and moral realities. In this reference in the processes of reconciliation to the Divine purpose and activity—'God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself'—and, still further, in the recognition of the fact that the sufferings of the righteous benefit the unrighteous, the unity of the apostolic doctrine is found. Objective and subjective views being thus regarded as manifestations of the self-imparting love of God, originating in Him, not in Christ apart from Him, justice and mercy as contrasted attributes in the Divine nature are transcended. The apostolic mind also rests more upon the declaration of the Divine righteousness in the blood of Christ than upon its satisfaction thereby. God declares Himself reconciled by something He had done whilst men were yet sinners. On Christ's part the reconciliation takes place through an act of self-emptying prior to, but manifest in, the Incarnation, with its obedience unto death, even the death of the cross. The unity of 'objective' and 'subjective' is verified also in the true experience of personal redemption, which is never regarded in the apostolic teaching as adequate apart from an ethical surrender of the self to God in Christ by the obedience of faith. Union with God in Christ is in the apostolic teaching a closer definition of having 'received the reconciliation.'

3. Finality and authority of the apostolic doctrine.—The interesting question whether the apostolic doctrine of the atonement is final for the thought of the Church and binding upon her teachers, is a phase of the living controversy respecting the permanent place of apostolic teaching in Christian thought, and lies beyond the scope of this article. It must suffice to point out that the teaching of the Apostolic Church gives no sanction for the view that the illumination of the minds of men respecting the significance of the death of Christ is limited to one type of interpretation or to one generation of men. It is possible to recognize a distinction between the contingent thought-forms of the Apostolic Age and the essential spiritual life with its fundamental certainties in an experience of reconciliation, made real by God in Christ, which these thought-forms sought to express. This experience in the Apostolic Age, as in every other, was something more than a composite of the terms used in its interpretation, even when these terms were the coinage of the apostolic mind. The usual conditions for the discovery of truth which satisfies the intellectual nature will prevail here as elsewhere. The one way in which truth, which is the only reality having authority for the mind, reveals its authority is in taking possession of the mind for itself.* Truth justifies itself in the mind that receives it; it derives its authority in the realm of the moral and spiritual by the experience it creates. The mind, once it has come to know itself, cannot submit to receive its convictions on blank authority; even when that authority is an utterance of the apostolic mind, it must commend itself to the Christian consciousness by its power rationally to justify the facts to which that Christian consciousness knows it owes its existence. The question, therefore, whether the forms of the apostolic explanation of the relation of the death of Christ to the forgiveness of sins are final and binding upon faith, will depend upon their adequacy permanently to interpret the experience that Christian men will always owe to their knowledge of those facts in which the Christian experience first originated. The conviction that those facts have been mediated to the world through the Apostolic Church, will probably always suggest that the apostolic explanation of them will antecedently be regarded with attention commensurate with the unique value of its source. It seems fair, therefore, to expect that where the modern mind finds the unity of the apostolic doctrine of the atonement, it will also find its finality; and, where finality is found, permanent authority is readily acknowledged. But finality is in the living truth of the doctrine, not in its human source.

* Cf. Life and Letters of Dean Church, London, 1895, p. 274.

† Faith and Criticism, London, 1893, p. 222.

‡ Aids to Reflection, ed. London, 1913, Com. xix.

LITERATURE.—I. More directly on the apostolic doctrine: A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, Edinburgh, 1894; A. Cave, The Scriptural Doctrine of Sacrifice and Atonement, do. 1890; T. J. Crawford, The Doctrine of Holy Scripture respecting the Atonement, London, 1874; R. W. Dale, The Atonement, do. 1875 (1892); J. Denney, The Death of Christ: its Place and Interpretation in the NT, do. 1902; R. J. Drummond, The Relation of the Apostolic Teaching to the Teaching of Christ, Edinburgh, 1900; C. C. Everett, The Gospel of Paul, Boston, 1893; J. Scott Lidgett, The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, London, 1897; E. Ménégoz, Le Péché et la Rédemption d'après St. Paul, Paris, 1882, and La Théologie de l'Épître aux Hébreux, Paris, 1894; G. Milligan, The Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews, Edinburgh, 1899; G. F. Moore, art. 'Sacrifice' in EBi; A. Ritschl, Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, Bonn, 1895–1902 (Eng. tr. The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, by Mackintosh and Macaulay, 1902); W. Sanday, Priesthood and Sacrifice, London, 1900; A. Seeberg, Der Tod Christi, Leipzig, 1895; G. Smeaton, The Doctrine of the Atonement as taught by the Apostles, Edinburgh, 1870; G. B. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, do. 1905; W. L. Walker, The Gospel of Reconciliation, do. 1909; relevant sections in (a) Bible Dictionaries, (b) NT Theologies (esp. those of H. J. Holtzmann [1911], B. Weiss [3 1880], G. B. Stevens [1899]), (c) Commentaries on the Apostolic Epistles (esp. Sanday-Headlam and B. Jowett on Rom., and Westcott on Hebrews and the Johannine writings).

II. Dealing with the doctrine generally: Anselm, Cur Deus Homo?, 1098; E. H. Askwith, in Cambr. Theol. Essays, London, 1906, p. 175 ff.; Athanasius, de Incarnatione (c. 360); A. Barry, The Atonement of Christ, London, 1871; A. B. Bruce, The Humiliation of Christ, Edinburgh, 1881, pp. 317–400; H. Bushnell, The Vicarious Sacrifice, London, ed. 1891; J. McLeod Campbell, The Nature of the Atonement, do. 1878; R. S. Candlish, The Atonement: its Efficacy and Extent, do. 1867; A. B. Davidson, OT Theology, Edinburgh, 1904, div. iii. ch. 2; D. C. Davies, The Atonement and Intercession of Christ, do. 1901; J. Denney, The Atonement and the Modern Mind, London, 1903; C. A. Dinmore, Atonement in Literature and Life, Boston, 1906; A. M. Fairbairn, The Place of Christ in Modern Theology, London, 1893; P. T. Forsyth, The Cruciality of the Cross, do. 1909; C. C. Hall, The Gospel of the Divine Sacrifice, New York, 1896; T. Haring, Zur Versöhnungslehre, Göttingen, 1893; W. Herrmann, Der Verkehr des Christen mit

Gott (Eng. tr. The Communion of the Christian with God, London, 1906); F. R. M. Hitchcock, The Atonement and Modern Thought, do. 1911; A. A. Hodge, The Atonement, Philadelphia, 1867; J. T. Hutchinson, A View of the Atonement, New York, 1897; T. W. Jenkyns, The Extent of the Atonement in its Relation to God and the Universe, Boston, 1835; J. Kaftan, Dogmatik, Tübingen, 1897, p. 531 ff.; G. Kreibitz, Die Versöhnungslehre, Berlin, 1878; W. F. Lofthouse, Ethics and Atonement, London, 1906; A. Lyttelton, 'Atonement' in Luz Mundi, 1891, p. 201 ff.; F. D. Maurice, The Doctrine of Sacrifice, new ed., London, 1893; R. C. Moberly, Atonement and Personality, do. 1901; W. H. Moberly, 'The Atonement' in Foundations, A Statement of Christian Belief in Terms of Modern Thought, do. 1912; H. N. Oxenham, Catholic Doctrine of the Atonement, London, 1865; E. A. Park, The Atonement, Boston, 1863; L. Pullan, The Atonement, London, 1906; J. Riviere, Dogme de la redemption, Paris, 1905; A. Sabatier, La Doctrine de l'expiation et son évolution historique, do. 1903 (Eng. tr., London, 1904); D. W. Simon, Reconciliation by Incarnation, Edinburgh, 1898; Turretin, On the Atonement of Christ, Eng. tr., New York, 1859; T. V. Tymms, The Christian Idea of the Atonement, London, 1904; W. L. Walker, The Cross and the Kingdom, Edinburgh, 1902; R. Wardlaw, The Extent of the Atonement, Glasgow, 1830; B. F. Westcott, The Victory of the Cross, London, 1888; G. C. Workman, At Onement, New York, 1911; The Atonement in Modern Religious Thought: a Theological Symposium, London, 1900; relevant artt. in Bible Dictionaries and sections in Systematic Theologies, e.g. W. N. Clarke, An Outline of Christian Theology, Edinburgh, 1898, pp. 321–362; J. A. Dörner, A System of Christian Doctrine, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1880–82, iv. 1–124; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology, London, 1873, ii. 464–591; W. B. Pope, A Compendium of Christian Theology, ii. [London, 1877] 141–316; W. G. T. Sheed, Dogmatic Theology, ii. [Edinburgh, 1889] 378 ff.; A. H. Strong, Systematic Theology, Philadelphia, 1907, ii. 713 ff.

FREDERIC PLATT.

ATTALIA (Ἀττάληα, Tisch. and WH -la).—This maritime city of Pamphilia was founded by, and named after, Attalus II. Philadelphus, king of Pergamos (159–138 B.C.), who desired a more convenient haven than Perga (15 miles N.E.) for the commerce of Egypt and Syria. It was picturesquely situated on a line of cliffs, over which the river Catarrhactes rushed in torrents—or cataracts—to the sea. Attalia differed from its rival Perga, a centre of native Anatolian religious feeling, in being a thoroughly Hellenized city, honouring the usual classical deities—Zeus, Athene, and Apollo. Paul and Barnabas sailed from its harbour to Antioch at the close of their first missionary tour (Ac 14<sup>25</sup>). Both politically and ecclesiastically it gradually overshadowed Perga, and to-day it is the most flourishing seaport, with the exception of Marsina, on the south coast of Asia Minor. It has a population of 25000, including many Christians and Jews, who occupy separate quarters. The name has been slightly modified into Adalia.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Geog. of Asia Minor, London, 1890, p. 420; C. Lanckoronski, Villes de la Pamphylie et de la Pisidie, i. [Paris, 1890].

JAMES STRAHAN.

AUGUSTAN BAND.—During his voyage from Cæsarea to Italy, St. Paul was in the charge of the centurion Julius, of the σπεῖρα Σεβαστή, or 'Augustan cohort' (Ac 27<sup>1</sup> RVm). Two widely different views prevail as to the composition of this body of soldiers.

1. The theory of Schürer (HJP i. ii. 51 f.) is mainly based on data supplied by Josephus. While legionary soldiers, who were Roman citizens, were sent only to provinces of the first order, governed by legati, those of the second order, administered by procurators—e.g. Judæa—were garrisoned by auxiliary cohorts of provincials, each from 500 to 1000 strong, usually attended by an ala of cavalry, and each named after the city from which it was recruited, e.g. 'cohors Sebastenorum.' At the time of the death of Herod Agrippa (A.D. 44) there was an ala of Καίσαρεῖς and Σεβαστηνοὶ with five cohorts stationed in Cæsarea (Jos. Ant. xix. ix. 1 f.). For their indecent demonstrations of joy at the king's death, they were at first threatened with banishment, but were ultimately forgiven and taken over by the Romans. They are frequently referred to during the period A.D.

* Cf. Denney, The Atonement and the Modern Mind, 6 ff.; W. L. Walker, The Gospel of Reconciliation, 60 ff.

44-66 (Ant. XX. vi. 1 || BJ II. xii. 5; Ant. XX. viii. 7 || BJ II. xiii. 7). In A.D. 67, Vespasian finally drafted from Caesarea into his army five cohorts and one ala of cavalry (BJ III. iv. 2). Schürer holds that the 'Augustan cohort' is undoubtedly one of these five cohorts. He does not, however, regard σπειρα Σεβαστή as synonymous with σπειρα Σεβαστηνών. Σεβαστή is rather a title of honour, equivalent to Augusta, and the full name of the cohort in question would probably be cohors Augusta Sebastenorum (HJP I. ii. 53).

2. Mommsen, followed by Ramsay, attempts to connect the σπειρα Σεβαστη with a body of officers detached from the foreign legions and known as frumentarii, who were employed under the Empire not only, as their name indicates, in connexion with the commissariat, but as agents maintaining communications between the central government and the distant provinces. As they were constantly passing backwards and forwards, it was natural that prisoners should be entrusted to them, and in time they became hated as police-agents and spies. When Julius (q.v.), who on this theory was one of these couriers, arrived in Rome, he handed over his charge (Ac 28<sup>16</sup>, AV and RVm) to the στρατοπεδάρχης, which is commonly translated 'captain of the Prætorian Guard.' Mommsen, however, thinks that the præfectus prætorio cannot have had laid upon him the humble duty of receiving prisoners, and prefers another interpretation based upon the term princeps peregrinorum, which appears in an Old Lat. version (called Gigas) as the equivalent of στρατοπεδάρχης. Peregrini, 'soldiers from abroad,' was the name given to the frumentarii while they resided at Rome, and their camp on the Cælian Hill was called Castra Peregrinorum. It is suggested (1) that Luke, who as a Greek was careless of Roman forms and names, used the Greek term σπειρα Σεβαστη not as the translation of an official Roman designation, but as 'a popular colloquial way of describing the corps of officer-couriers' (Ramsay, St. Paul<sup>3</sup>, London, 1897, p. 315); and (2) that his στρατοπεδάρχης is an equally unofficial title, for which the Latin translator, being more at home in Roman usages than Luke, was able to supply the correct technical term. It is admitted that 'this whole branch of the service is very obscure. Marquardt considers that it was first organized by Hadrian; but Mommsen believes that it must have been instituted by Augustus' (ib. 349). The chief objection to the present theory is that the foundation seems too slender for the superstructure. There is no clear evidence that the title princeps peregrinorum came into use before the time of Septimius Severus (193-211). On the other hand, St. Paul's case would seem to be on all fours with that of an appellant mentioned in the correspondence of Trajan and Pliny (Ep. 57), regarding whom the Emperor gives this rescript: 'vinetus mitti ad præfectos prætorii mei debet.'

LITERATURE.—On the one side, Th. Mommsen, Sitzungsberichte d. Berl. Akad., 1895, p. 493 f.; W. M. Ramsay, loc. cit. supra; F. Rendall, Acts, London, 1897, p. 340. On the other side, Schürer, loc. cit.; Th. Zahn, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1900, i. 60, 551 ff.; A. C. Headlam, art. 'Julius' in IDB; P. W. Schmiedel in EBI i. 909.

JAMES STRAHAN.

AUGUSTUS.—1. The name.—The Lat. name Augustus occurs only once in the RV of the NT, namely in Lk 2<sup>1</sup>. The word, cognate with augur, had a sacred ring about it, having been applied (a) to places and objects which either possessed by nature or acquired by consecration a religious or hallowed character; (b) to the gods. It was a new thing to apply it to a human being, and the Senate felt and intended it to be so, when it conferred the title upon Octavian on 16 Jan., 27 B.C. By this title they went as near to conferring deification upon a human being as robust Italian common-sense would allow. 'It suggested religious sanctity and surrounded the son of the deified Julius with a halo of consecration' (Bury, A History of the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 13). The official Gr. equivalent of Augustus was Σεβαστός. It is noteworthy that Luke in his own Greek narrative keeps the Latin word, whereas he puts the Greek Σεβαστός into the mouth of Festus (Ac 25-<sup>1</sup>, 25; AV 'Augustus,' RV 'the emperor,' RVm 'the Augustus'). The difference is important. A Greek Christian like Luke could only use the word Σεβαστός (which meant 'to be worshipped,' 'worthy of worship') of God Himself: being a Greek, writing his own language, he had not the same objection to the foreign word Augustus, and he had to be intelligible. The absence of θεός ('god,' diūs), with the name of the deceased and deified Emperor in Lk 2<sup>1</sup>, is also perfectly consistent with the Christian attitude (on Ac 27<sup>1</sup>, see AUGUSTAN BAND).

2. Life.—The Emperor of whom we commonly speak as Augustus was originally named Gaius Octavius [Thurinus], like his father, and was born on 22 Sept., 63 B.C., the year of Cicero's consulship. The ancestral home of his race was Velitræ (modern Velletri) in the Volscian country, at no great distance from Rome. The family was equestrian and rich, the father of the future Emperor being the first of his race to enter the Senate. He had an honourable and successful official career, attaining to the prætorship and the governorship of the province of Macedonia. He died suddenly, and left three children, one of them the future Emperor (aged 4), whose mother was Atia. This Atia was the daughter of M. Atius Balbus and Julia, the sister of the great dictator Julius Cæsar. Augustus was thus the grand-nephew of the dictator. He received the dress of manhood at 15, and was allowed to accompany his grand-uncle to Spain (47 B.C.), where he already showed the quality of courage. Soon after he was sent to Apollonia on the other side of the Adriatic, to pursue his studies. He was still there when the dictator was assassinated, on 15 March, 44 B.C. It was then that he revealed what was in him. Though only eighteen and a half years of age, he, having been adopted into the Julian family by the will of his grand-uncle, whose heir he was at the same time constituted, took the name Gaius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, and immediately left for Italy, to claim not only the private but also the public inheritance of his grand-uncle. His great career is best followed in the next section. His private and family history may be summed up here. As a young man he was betrothed to a daughter of P. Servilius Isauricus, but he broke off this engagement, and for political reasons married Claudia, step-daughter of Mark Antony, in her extreme youth. Her he immediately divorced, and afterwards Scribonia, his second wife. Immediately after the second divorce he robbed Tiberius Claudius Nero of his wife, Livia Drusilla (38 B.C.), and with her he lived all the rest of his life. His immediate household consisted of her, her two sons by her previous husband, the future Emperor Tiberius (q.v.), and Drusus, as well as his own daughter Julia, Scribonia's child. Julia bore five children to the second of her three husbands, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, namely Gaius, Lucius, Agrippa, Julia, and Agrippina. Gaius and Lucius were adopted by their grandfather, but died early. All his direct descendants in fact died early or disgraced him, and he was forced to fall back on his step-son Tiberius for the succession. Drusus having perished in 9 B.C., Tiberius was compelled in his turn to adopt his nephew Germanicus. Augustus died 19 August, A.D. 14.

3. Official career.—The stages in Augustus' official career may be summed up as follows. He was recognized by the Senate in 44 B.C.; received praetorian imperium against Antony, on 19 August made consul (though hardly twenty years of age), elected triumvir rei publicae constituendae (with Antony and Lepidus) for five years, 43; appointed augur, 37 (or later); first conferment of tribunicia potestas, 36; between 37 and 34 elected XVuir sacris faciundis; 30, fourth consulship (hence annually, with certain exceptions, until the 13th was reached in 2 B.C.); 27, title Augustus and imperial powers; 23, the tribunicia potestas conferred on him for life; 22, a special cura annonae; 18, imperial powers renewed for 5 years; 16 (before this date), elected septemviri epulonum; 15, coinage of gold and silver for the Empire reserved to Emperor; 12, elected pontifex maximus; 8, imperial powers renewed for ten years; 2, received title of pater patriae; A.D. 3, imperial powers renewed for ten years, and again in A.D. 13. The 'deification' took place on 17 Sept., 14.

4. Achievements.—This bare enumeration marks the steps by which the power of Augustus was gradually consolidated, and with it the Empire itself. The achievements of Augustus which led to this result can only be briefly enumerated. Amongst the most important, because without them nothing further could have been attained, are his military achievements. His military career, with few exceptions, was continuously successful. It began by the driving of Antonius into Gallia Transalpina (43 B.C.), and was followed up by the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi (42), the defeat of Sextus Pompeius (36), and the defeat of Cleopatra and Antonius at Actium (31). At this point civil war ends, all his Roman enemies and rivals are removed, and he can give attention to frontier problems. A succession of frontier wars ends in victory for the Romans: in 19 the Cantabri were exterminated, in 15 the Raeti and Vindelici were conquered. The German wars gave great trouble throughout the later part of his reign, in which most valuable help was rendered by his step-sons Tiberius and Drusus. In the earlier period Augustus was most fortunate in possessing such an able lieutenant as M. Vipsanius Agrippa.

In other respects also Augustus was extremely active—in the spheres of law, religion, architecture, and building. He did all he could to restore the sapped virtue of the Italians by his encouragement of family life and his attempts to recover the simplicity of the ancient Italian religion. He was a patron of literature, and was greatly helped in his aims by the writings of Virgil and Horace. In all his schemes for the betterment of Rome, Mæcenas, an Etruscan knight, himself a patron of literature, was his right-hand man. Among the important statutes passed were the Lex Iulia de adulteriis (18 B.C.), the Lex de maritandis ordinibus, and the Lex Papia Poppæa—all in the interests of a worthy family life, which Augustus recognized to be the indispensable foundation of a truly great State. The Lex Ælia Sentia (4 B.C.) regulated the status of manumitted slaves, a large class of growing influence in the State (see CLAUDIUS). Augustus' interest in religion was shown by his acceptance of several sacred offices, as well as by the restoration of many decayed temples and rituals. His boast that he had found Rome made of brick and left it made of marble probably means no more than that he faced the (regular) brick core of buildings with marble slabs, but he certainly spent vast sums on building. Among the most important monuments of his reign are the Portus Iulius (37 B.C.), the Templum Divi Iuli (29), the temple of Apollo on the Palatine

Hill, equipped with public libraries of Greek and Latin literature (28), and the theatre of Marcellus (11). The personal ability of Augustus is sometimes unjustly depreciated. It may be questioned if he owed more than inspiration to his grand-uncle.

5. Administration.—The Emperor's administration covered not only the whole of Italy, but the imperial (or frontier) provinces, where an army was required. He had financial agents also in the senatorial provinces. The great achievement of Augustus was that he ruled the Roman Empire as a citizen (though the chief citizen, princeps), under constitutional forms. In theory the Empire ceased with the death of the Emperor, but under these constitutional forms he laid the foundations of a lasting despotism. Luke refers in 2<sup>1</sup> to a census of the whole Empire ordered by him. This was one of his administrative reforms, and the census recurred every 14 years. A census of Roman citizens, as distinguished from subjects of the Empire, was taken twice in his reign, in 28 and 8 B.C. Cf. art. CÆSAR.

LITERATURE.—There are many vexed questions connected with the career of Augustus, which will make one always regret that T. Mommsen did not write the fourth volume of his Römische Geschichte, which was to cover Augustus' reign; cf., however, the second edition of the Res Gestæ Divi Augusti (Berlin, 1883), edited by him; V. Gardthausen's Augustus und seine Zeit, Leipzig, 1891 ff. (2 parts, each in three volumes, first part text, second part notes), has not filled the gap. Chronology of chief events is best given by J. S. Reid in A Companion to Latin Studies (ed. J. E. Sandys, Camb. 1910), 129 ff. The theory of the Empire is best expounded in the same writer's chapter in the Cambridge Medieval History, i., Camb. 1911; a splendid account is found also in H. F. Pelham, Outlines of Roman History, London, 1893; A. v. Domaszewski's Gesch. der röm. Kaiser, 2 vols., Leipzig, 1909, vol. i. pp. 11–250, by a master of Roman history and antiquities; etc. The chief ancient authorities are the Monumentum Ancyranum, Suetonius' Life of Augustus, Velleius Paterculus, Appian, Dio Cassius, and the early chapters of Tacitus.

A. SOUTER.

AUTHOR AND FINISHER.—In He 12<sup>2</sup> Jesus is called the 'author (AV and RV; AVm 'beginner', RVm 'captain') and finisher (AV; RV 'perfecter') of (our) faith.' The Gr. word rendered 'author' (ἀρχηγός) occurs in three other passages, viz. Ac 3<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>31</sup> and He 2<sup>10</sup>. It is translated 'captain' in He 2<sup>10</sup> (AV; but RV 'author'); in Ac 3<sup>15</sup> 'prince' (AV and RV; AVm and RVm 'author'); in Ac 5<sup>31</sup> 'prince.' In classical Greek it is used for a 'leader,' one who precedes others by his example, and so for an 'originator.'

The reference in He 12<sup>2</sup> is to the previous chapter. The writer, in summing up the list of heroes of faith, bids us look unto Jesus, who is pre-eminently the Leader in that great company, and the Perfect Example of that virtue of which to a certain extent they have been witnesses. The insertion of the word 'our' in the EV obscures the meaning. 'The faith' refers to that which has been the main theme of ch. 11.

Alford, Bleek, Ebrard, Wordsworth, and A. B. Davidson translate ἀρχηγός in He 12<sup>2</sup> by 'leader'; Wyclif has 'the maker'; but Tindale, Cranmer, the Geneva and the Rheims all have 'author.'

As Jesus is the Leader in the great army of the Faith, so is He also the Finisher or Perfecter (τελειωτής). Therefore we run the race looking unto Him as our Leader and the only one who can sustain us to the end and perfect that which He has begun (cf. Davidson, in loc.).

MORLEY STEVENSON.

AUTHORITIES.—The word occurs thrice in the English NT: Lk 12<sup>11</sup> RV (AV 'powers'; Gr. ἐξουσίαι), Tit 3<sup>1</sup> RV (AV 'powers'; Gr. ἐξουσίαι), and 1 P 3<sup>22</sup> (Gr. ἐξουσίαι). This is by no means a complete list of the occurrences of ἐξουσία (sing. and plur.) in a quasi-concrete sense in the NT. It is characteristic that in the first and second of these places the word should be united with ἀρχαί, and in the third with δυνάμεις. This collocation of words denoting power in some manifestation or other is due to the later Jewish theology, which postulated the existence of a number of spiritual powers (cf. artt. DOMINION, POWER, PRINCIPALITY, THRONE, etc.) inhabiting the air. These powers were defined in Greek under the various aspects of δύναμις (physical force), ἀρχή (magisterial power), and ἐξουσία (moral authority). At first each of the words was, no doubt, intended to carry a precise signification, and the complete list would comprise every sort of spiritual power man could conceive; but later the enumeration became so familiar as to be repeated without any clear distinction between the individual terms (so 1 P 3<sup>22</sup>). The frequency of the use to indicate spiritual powers has a reflex effect. The word ἐξουσία is used in the first and second passages with reference to earthly powers. It does not seem possible to say precisely what powers are intended, but in the Gospel passage (where the wording is peculiar to Luke) it is probable that the Sanhedrin and the Roman procurator of Judæa would be included, while in the Titus Epistle the reference is to all those set in authority over the people—the Emperor, the governor and his suite, as well as the local magistrates. See also the following article.

A. SOUTER.

AUTHORITY.—This word, which occurs much more frequently in RV than in AV, in most cases represents the Gr. ἐξουσία. It is used of delegated authority in Ac 9<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>10, 12</sup>; of the authority of an apostle in 2 Co 10<sup>8</sup> and 13<sup>10</sup> (RV); of earthly rulers ('authorities') in Tit 3<sup>1</sup> (RV), cf. Lk 12<sup>11</sup>; and in RV of Apocalypse is substituted frequently for AV 'power'; cf. Rev 6<sup>8</sup> 12<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>4-12</sup> 17<sup>12</sup> (in 17<sup>12</sup> it replaces AV 'strength'). Yet in many places RV still retains 'power' as the translation of ἐξουσία; cf. Ac 8<sup>19</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>, Ro 13<sup>1-3</sup>, Rev 9<sup>10</sup> 11<sup>6</sup> etc. In 1 Co 11<sup>10</sup> ἐξουσία is used in a peculiar sense ('for this cause ought the woman to have ἐξουσίαν on her head, because of the angels'), where a veil appears to be meant. Here AV gives 'power,' RV 'a sign of authority,' with 'have authority over' in the margin.

In several passages ἐξουσία is used to designate a created being superior to man, a spiritual potentate, viz. 1 Co 15<sup>4</sup>, Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, Col 2<sup>10</sup>, and, in the plural, Eph 3<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>12</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>15</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>22</sup>. In 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup> and 1 P

3<sup>22</sup>, AV and RV render 'authority' and RV also in Eph 1<sup>21</sup>, the reason probably being that δύναμις also occurs in these verses for which the word 'power' was needed. In the other references the translation is 'power' or 'powers.' Seeing that ἐξουσία appear to be a class of angelic beings distinct from δυνάμεις, it would have been conducive to clearness if the word 'authority' had been used in all these passages. In Eph 6<sup>1</sup> evil principles are obviously referred to (cf. 2<sup>2</sup>); in 1 Co 15<sup>4</sup> both good and evil angels may be included (Lightfoot, Col. 3 1879, p. 154). See, further, under PRINCIPALITY, and cf. the preceding article.

In a few places 'authority' in AV represents other Gr. words, viz. Ac 8<sup>7</sup> AV, RV, 'a eunuch of great authority' (δυναστὴς); 1 Ti 2<sup>2</sup> AV 'for kings and for all that are in authority' (ἐν ὑπεροχῇ), RV 'in high place'; 1 Ti 2<sup>12</sup> AV 'I suffer not a woman . . . to usurp authority over the man' (αυθεντεῖν ἀνδρός), RV 'to have dominion over'; Tit 2<sup>15</sup> 'rebuke (AV reprove) with all authority' (ἐπιταγῆς).

W. H. DUNDAS.

AVENGING.—See VENGEANCE.

AZOTUS (Ἀζωτός).—Azotus, the Gr. form of 'Ashdod,' occurs often in 1 Mac. (4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>68</sup> 10<sup>77</sup>. 83<sup>1</sup> etc.), and once in the NT. St. Philip met the Ethiopian on 'the way that goes down from Jerusalem to Gaza,' and, after baptizing him, 'was found at Azotus' (Ac 8<sup>6-40</sup>). Ashdod was the most important of the Philistine cities which formed the Pentapolis. Situated midway between Joppa and Gaza—about 25 miles from each—it passed through many vicissitudes. It appears often in the historical and prophetic books of the OT, in the Assyrian records, in the Maccabæan annals, and in Josephus. Herodotus (ii. 157) says that the siege which Azotus endured before it was subdued by Psammeticus, king of Egypt, was the longest on record, lasting 29 years. Ashdod survives in the modern Esdūd, a village on the slope of a wooded artificial mound (tell)—once, no doubt, a strong fortress—about 3 miles from the sea-coast, where the traces of a harbour have been found. The ancient city lies beneath the sand-drift that now threatens to bury the mud hovels of the village, among which some remains of old stone buildings are to be seen. The wide plain to the east is exceedingly fertile.

JAMES STRAHAN.

B

BAAL.—Baal (Ro 11<sup>4</sup>, in a quotation from 1 K 19<sup>18</sup>) was a generic name for a god among Semitic peoples, the literal meaning being 'owner' or 'lord.' Attempts have been made to show that this was the original name of the Sun-god, or that it represents the Supreme Being worshipped by the Canaanites. Neither of these contentions can be proved; indeed it is evident that the Baal of one place differed from that of another. Thus the reference in the text is to Melkart, the Baal of Tyre. The feminine article (τῇ Βαάλ) in the Greek of Ro 11<sup>4</sup> is due to the frequent substitution of bēsheth (in Greek αἰσχύνῃ), 'shame,' for Baal by the Hebrews.*

LITERATURE.—A. S. Peake, art. 'Baal' in HDB; G. F. Moore in EBi; L. B. Paton in ERE; W. R. Smith, RS 2, London, 1894, p. 93 ff. F. W. WORSLEY.

* Hence frequently in LXX ἡ Βαάλ (= ἡ αἰσχύνῃ), though in 1 K 19<sup>18</sup> the reading is τῷ Βαάλ.

BABBLER (Ac 17<sup>18</sup>).—Augustine and Wyclif wrongly derive the word σπερμολόγος from σπεῖρω λόγους and translate it 'sower of words.' It is properly derived from σπέρμα, 'seed,' and λέγειν, 'to gather.' Originally an adjective, the derived substantive was used of small birds gathering crumbs (Aristophanes, Av. 233, 580). It was afterwards applied to loafers in the market-place who gained a precarious livelihood by what they could pick up, and it thus connotes 'a vulgar fellow,' 'a parasite.' Greek writers used it as a term of contempt for plagiarists and pseudo-philosophers (cf. Eustathius on Homer, Odys. v. 490), and Zeno thus names one of his followers. W. M. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, p. 242) speaks of the word as 'characteristically Athenian slang, clearly caught from the very lips of the Athenians.' The word thus contemptuously implies one who is an outsider and yet wishes to pose as one of the inner circle, and probably does not refer to anything that the Apostle had said. It would seem, therefore, that the expression was used by the philosophers who have just been mentioned rather than by the populace in general. They resented the intrusion of one who had no credentials, and from the first viewed him with hostility (see, further, Ramsay, 'St. Paul in Athens,' in Expositor, 5th ser., ii. [1895] 262 ff.

F. W. WORSLEY.

BABBLINGS (1 Ti 6<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>16</sup> βεβήλους κενόφρωνας).—The 'profane babblings, and the oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called' are all profitless speculation and empty religious talk which only minister questions, but have no value in the equipment of a man of God, or in the building up of the Church. The implied contrast is between intellectualism in religion and genuine piety in heart and life (cf. F. Godet, Expositor, 3rd ser., vii. [1888] 45 ff.).

Some have seen in 'the oppositions (ἀντιθέσεις) of the knowledge which is falsely so called,' a reference, covert or open, to Marcion's Antitheses; but this has scarcely been made out, and it is better to take the words as pointing to an incipient Gnosticism, hardly yet conscious of itself, against which the writer—be he St. Paul or a Paulinist—warns his readers (cf. M. Dods, Introd. to NT, London, 1888, p. 174). The Greek mind was always desirous of being saved by dialectic, and ready to hear or to tell some newer thing (cf. Ac 17<sup>21</sup>). In the fermenting vat of the Greek cities in the Apostolic as well as in the sub-Apostolic Age there were frothy, windy men who knew everything about religion except 'the practick part' (cf. Didache, ii. 40-45: οὐκ ἔσται ὁ λόγος σου ψεύδης, οὐ κενός, ἀλλὰ μεμεστωμένος πράξει.—'Thy speech shall not be false, nor empty, but filled with doing'). Practical piety is the writer's theme, and he calls Christians to cultivate simplicity as it is in Jesus; not to lose themselves in a cloud of words, but to be direct and devout. Cf. A. Rowland (1 Tim., London, 1887): 'It is easier to quibble over Christ's words than to imitate His life.' To the same effect, Butler (Charge to the Clergy) advises them 'not to trouble about objections raised by men of gaiety and speculation,' but to endeavour to beget a practical sense of religion 'upon the hearts of the people' (cf. EBi iv. 5094).

The standing type of the religious babblers is Bunyan's 'Talkative,' who will 'talk of things Heavenly or things Earthly . . . things sacred or things profane, things past or things to come, things more essential or things circumstantial.' To this masterly characterization 'of the evil excesses of some of the prophets, lunatic preachers, and loquacious hypocrites' in Puritan times may be added R. H. Hutton's description (Contemporary Thought and Thinkers, London, 1894, i. 257) of a certain rampant sceptic of yesterday as a man 'hurling about wildly loose thoughts over which he has no intellectual control.' These are the profane babblers of the Pastoral Epistles. They were not only unsettling to the Church—'If I had said "I will speak thus," I should have been faithless to the generation of thy children,' Ps 73<sup>15</sup>—but the unreal words corrupted the babblers himself, as the writer not obscurely hints. His nature is subdued to what he works among (cf. Emerson: 'I cannot listen to what you are saying for thinking of what you are').

To use unreal words, to be constantly dealing with the greatest things, and yet to be too shallow or flippant to realize their majesty, was, in the Apostolic Age, and ever since has been, the peculiar snare and peril of religious speakers, and gives point to the taunt of Carlyle: 'When a man takes to tongue-work, it is all over with him.' The Carthusian student who went to a teacher and got the text 'I will take heed to my ways that I sin not with my tongue,' found that enough for a lifetime.

On the whole subject Newman's lines ('Flowers without Fruit,' in Verses on Various Occasions) are an apt and instructive commentary:

'Prune thou thy words, the thoughts control
That o'er thee swell and throng.'

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works cited above, see A. Whyte, Bunyan Characters, i. [Edinburgh, 1895] 180; J. Kelman, The Road, i. [do. 1911] 180; Joseph Butler, Sermons, ed. Gladstone, Oxford, 1896, no. 4. W. M. GRANT.

BABYLON.—See APOCALYPSE and PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF.

BACKBITING.—See EVIL-SPEAKING.

BALAAM.—The somewhat prominent place that Balaam holds in the Apostolic Age may be appraised by the three references to him in the NT (2 P 2<sup>15</sup>, Jude 11, and Rev 2<sup>14</sup>); by the legends which grew round his name in Hellenistic and Haggadic literature, and later in Muhammadanism; and perhaps by the apparent popularity of the discussion of the 'Blessings of Balaam' by Hippolytus. Balaam has become the representative of false teachers and sorcerers, and we may suspect a play on his name in Rev 2<sup>14</sup> (perhaps = 'lord of the people'), in order to brand certain Gnostic teachers as making gain for themselves out of the simple folk by the use of magic and by the teaching of a gnosis which tended to laxity of practice. (It is not improbable that in the Nicodemus of Jn 3 is enshrined a counter-play of words—the Jewish party also, it is hinted, had a false and carnal doctrine of their own.) Balaam becomes in legend a counsellor of Pharaoh; he and his two sons Jannes and Jambres (q.v.) were compelled to flee from Egypt to Ethiopia, where Balaam reigned as king till conquered by Moses. On this he and his sons returned to Egypt and became the master-magicians who opposed Moses. Finally, Phinehas attacked Balaam, who by his magic flew into the air, but was killed by Phinehas in the power of the Holy Name. See NICOLAITANS; also JE ii. 468 f.

W. F. COBB.

BALAK.—Balak is named in Rev 2<sup>14</sup> along with Balaam. Like Balaam (q.v.), Balak is to be regarded here as a typical figure. The former teaches doctrine which is false in itself, corrupt in its motive, and immoral in its fruits; while Balak is, as in the OT, the heathen power which thrusts Balaam's sorceries on the faithful. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that, if Balaam is the teacher of Gnosticism, Balak is the Roman power which has adopted syncretism and seeks to compel the Christians to adopt its ways also, and so makes them fall into the corruptions attendant on pagan worship.

W. F. COBB.

BAND (σπεῖρα, always 'cohort' in RVm).—As a province of the second rank, governed by procurators, Judæa was not garrisoned by legionaries, who were Roman citizens, but by auxiliaries, who were levied from subject races. Each cohort, varying from 500 to 1000 infantry, usually strengthened by an ala of cavalry, was named after the Greek city from which it was recruited—'cohors Sebastenorum, Ascalonitarum,' etc. The Jews themselves were exempted from military service. Various data supplied by Josephus (see the references in Schürer, HJP i. ii. 51 f.) indicate that the Judæan forces were originally the troops of Herod the Great, which were taken over by the Romans after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. At ordinary times Jerusalem was garrisoned by one cohort—called by Josephus a τάγμα (BJ v. v. 8)—which was stationed at the tower of Antonia, on the north side of the Temple, under the command of a chiliarch (Ac 21<sup>31</sup>). Part of this cohort—200 infantry, 70 horsemen, and 200 δεξιολάβοι, an obscure term translated 'spearmen' (see Schürer, op. cit. 56)—formed St. Paul's protecting convoy when he was transmitted by Claudius Lysias to the governor Felix in Caesarea.

JAMES STRAHAN.

BAPTISM.—1. Christian baptism in the NT.—It will be convenient at the beginning of this article to collect the narratives of and allusions to Christian baptism in the NT. The command of our Lord to make disciples of all the nations by baptism (Mt 28<sup>19</sup>; see below, 4 and 8) was faithfully carried out by the first disciples. Actual baptisms are recorded in Ac 2<sup>38-41</sup> (the 3000 converts), 8<sup>12f. 16</sup> (Samaritans, men and women, and Simon), 8<sup>36. 38</sup> (the Ethiopian eunuch), 9<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>16</sup> (Saul), 10<sup>47f.</sup> (Cornelius and his friends), 16<sup>15</sup> (Lydia and her household), 16<sup>33</sup> (the Philippian jailer 'and all his'), 18<sup>8</sup> (Crispus and his house, and many Corinthians), 19<sup>5</sup> (about twelve Ephesians), 1 Co 1<sup>14. 16</sup> (Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanas).

In addition to these narratives there are many allusions to Christian baptism in the NT—Ro 6<sup>3f.</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>, baptized into Christ Jesus, into His death, buried with Him in baptism: a common thought in early times—e.g. Apost. Const. ii. 7 and often in that work (see A. J. Maclean, Ancient Church Orders, 123).—1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>, sanctification and justification connected with the washing of baptism; three aorists, referring to a definite event: 'ye washed away (ἀπολουσασθε, middle) [your sins] . . . in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God'; cf. Ac 22<sup>16</sup> (above): 'arise and be baptized' (βαπτίσαι, 'seek baptism') and wash away (απολυνσαι) thy sins.—1 Co 12<sup>13</sup>, [Jews and Gentiles] all baptized in one Spirit into one body.—Gal 3<sup>27</sup>, baptized into Christ, put on Christ.—Eph 4<sup>5</sup>, 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism.'—Eph 5<sup>26</sup>, Christ sanctified the Church, having cleansed it by the washing (λουτρω) of water with the word. The 'word' is said by Robinson (Com. in loc.) to be the 'solemn invocation of the name of the Lord Jesus'; Westcott (in loc.) adds: 'accompanied by the confession of the Christian faith, cf. Ro 10<sup>9</sup>'; Chase (JThSt viii. 165) interprets it of the word or fiat of Christ, and compares Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. iii. 5).—Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, 'by the washing of regeneration (διὰ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας) and renewing of the Holy Ghost'; see below, 8.—He 6<sup>4-7</sup>, the first principles are repentance, faith, teaching of baptisms (βαπτισμῶν) and of laying on of hands, resurrection, and judgment; Christians were once enlightened (φωτισθέντας) and tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost; hence the name 'illumination' (φωτισμός) and 'illuminated' for 'baptism' and 'the baptized' in Justin (Apol. i. 61, 65) and elsewhere. Westcott interprets the 'teaching' [διδάχης, but B reads -ην, which is adopted in RVm and by WH] of baptisms 'as instruction about the difference between Christian baptism and other lustral rites. Chase (Confirmation in Apostol. Age, p. 44 f.) denies this, and interprets the phrase of the baptism of different neophytes, 'the Christian rite in its concrete application to individual believers': the 'heavenly gift' is one part of the illumination or baptism, i.e. the gift of the Son, of Eternal life, or sonship (Chase); the partaking of the Holy Ghost is the other part. In any case the ἐπίθεσις χειρῶν must refer to the laying on of hands which followed immersion (see below, 6), though Westcott would extend it to benedictions, ordinations, etc., as well.—He 10<sup>4-7</sup>, 'our body washed with pure water' (our sacramental bathing contrasted with the symbolic bathings of the Jews [Westcott]), 'let us hold fast the confession (ὁμολογίαν) of our hope.'—In 1 P 3<sup>21</sup> baptism is the 'antitype' of the bringing of Noah safe through the water; the antitype is here the 'nobler member of the pair of relatives' (Bigg, ICC, in loc.), the fulfilment of the type; but in He 9<sup>24</sup> it is used conversely, as it often is in Christian antiquity when the Eucharistic bread and wine are called the antitype of our Lord's body and blood, e.g. Verona Didascalia (ed. Hauler, p. 112) 'panem quidem in exemplar quod dicit Graecus antitypum corporis Christi'; so Cyr. Jer., Cat. xxiii. 20; Tertullian similarly uses 'figura' (adv. Marc. iv. 10), and Serapion ὁμολογία (Liturgy, § 1). For other instances, see Cooper-Maclean, Test. of our Lord, Edinburgh, 1902, p. 172 f., and Apost. Const. v. 14, vi. 30, vii. 25. In Ps.-Clem. 2 Cor. 14 the flesh is the 'antitype' of the Spirit.

In the Gospels, Christian baptism is three times referred to: Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, 'Mk' 16<sup>16</sup>, Jn 3<sup>5</sup>. In the last passage the words ἐξ ὕδατος, read in all MSS and VSS, have been judged by K. Lake (Inaug. Lecture at Leyden, 17th Jan. 1904, p. 14) to be an interpolation, as they are not quoted by Justin. This deduction is very precarious (for an examination of it, see Chase, JThSt vi. [1905] 504, note, who deems the theory unscientific); but in any case the 'birth of the Spirit' could not but convey to the Christian readers of the Fourth Gospel a reference to baptism. Westcott truly remarks (Com. in loc.) that to Nicodemus the words would suggest a reference to John's baptism. An attempt to explain 'water' here without reference to baptism is examined by Hooker (Eccl. Pol. v. 59), who lays down the oft-quoted canon that 'while a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst' (see below, 8).

In these passages water is not always mentioned; but the word βαπτίζω, which to us is a mere technical expression, and its Aramaic equivalent (rt. כּבַּל) would to the first disciples at once convey the idea of water. The element is mentioned or alluded to in Ac 8<sup>36</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>13</sup> ('drink of one Spirit'), Eph 5<sup>26</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>22</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>20</sup>, and is necessitated by the metaphor of burial in baptism in Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>. Justin (Dial. 14) emphasizes the element used, by calling baptism the 'water of life': so in Hermas (Vis. iii. 3) the Church (the tower) is built on the waters, 'because your life is saved and shall be saved by water.'

More indirect allusions to Christian baptism are found in the NT. The Israelites, by a metaphor from it, are said to have been baptized into (eis) Moses in the cloud and in the sea (1 Co 10<sup>2</sup>). Whatever view is taken of baptism for the dead (1 Co 15<sup>29</sup>), it alludes to the Christian rite. It has been interpreted (a) of vicarious baptism on behalf of those who had died unbaptized (cf. 2 Mac 10<sup>43ff.</sup>, offering made for the dead); this was the practice of some heretics (so Tert., de Res. Carn. 48, adv. Marc. v. 10, and Goudge, Alford). But there is no evidence that it existed in the 1st cent., and the practice may have originated from this verse; could St. Paul have even tacitly approved of such a thing?—(b) The words ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν are rendered by many Greek Fathers 'in expectation of the resurrection of the dead'; but this forces the grammar, and gives no good sense to ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν, which is the best attested reading at the end of the verse; also 'they which are baptized' means not all Christians, but some of them.—(c) Others interpret the verse of people being drawn to the faith and to baptism out of affection for some dead friend; Robertson-Plummer (ICC, in loc.) incline to this.—(d) Estius and Calvin render 'as now about to die,' jamjam morituri; but see (b).—(e) Luther renders 'over the graves of the dead'; here again see (b). Many other suggestions have been made. It is probable that the problem is insoluble with our present knowledge, and that the reference is to some ceremony in the then baptismal rite at Corinth of which we hear no more, but not to vicarious baptism (see Plummer in HDB i. 245).

Other allusions to baptism (the complete rite, see below, 6) may probably be found in the metaphors of anointing and sealing. For anointing, see 2 Co 1<sup>21</sup> (χρίσας, aorist), 1 Jn 2<sup>20, 27</sup> (the anointing abides in us and is not only a historical act). Though anointing may have accompanied the rite in the NT, and Chase (Confirmation, 53 ff.) decides that it was so used, yet it is also not improbable that its institution at a very early age of the Church may have been due to these very passages—that the practice came from the metaphor. We notice that in the Didache, § 7, anointing is not mentioned, but that in Apost. Const. vii. 22 (4th cent.), which incorporates and enlarges the Didache, it is introduced. It was certainly used very early. Irenaeus says that some of the Gnostic sects anointed after baptism (c. Haer. i. xxi. 3 f.); and as the Gnostic rites were a parody of those of the Church, this carries the evidence back to c. A.D. 150. It is mentioned by Tert., de Bapt. 7, de Res. Carn. 8; by Cyr. Jer., Cat. xxii. 1. From the anointing came the custom of calling the baptized 'christs', χριστοί (Cyr. Jer., loc. cit.; Methodius, Banquet of the Ten Virgins, viii. 8, where 1's 105<sup>15</sup> LXX is quoted). In the NT, χρίειν is used metaphorically of our Lord; cf. Lk 4<sup>18</sup>, Ac 4<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>38</sup>, He 1<sup>9</sup>.

For sealing, see 2 Co 1<sup>22</sup> (same context as the anointing), Eph 1<sup>13</sup> ('having believed ye were sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise'), 4<sup>30</sup> ('sealed in the Holy Spirit'). The aorists in all three passages, which connect the Holy Ghost with the sealing, point to the definite time when they became believers (Chase, Confirmation, p. 52). (The metaphor is used in Ro 4<sup>11</sup> of circumcision; and otherwise in Jn 3<sup>33</sup> 6<sup>27</sup>, Ro 15<sup>-8</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>2</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>19</sup>.) Hence in Christian antiquity the baptismal rite, either as a whole or in one or other of its parts, is frequently called 'the seal,' σφραγίς; e.g. Hermas, Sim. ix. 16, 'the seal is the water'; cf. viii. 6; Ps.-Clem., 2 Cor. 7; Clem. Alex., Quis dives, 42; Tert., de Spect. 24 (signaculum); Cyr. Jer., Cat. iv. 16, etc.

To these passages must be added those which speak of Christian adoption: Ro 8<sup>15, 23</sup>, Gal 4<sup>5</sup>, Eph 1<sup>5</sup>; for these see art. ADOPTION.

2. Predecessors of Christian baptism.—(a) The words βαπτίζω, βαπτισμός, βάπτισμα are used in the NT of various ceremonial washings of the Jews. The verb is derived from βάπτω, 'to dip' (found in the NT only in Lk 16<sup>-4</sup>, Jn 13<sup>26</sup>, and some MSS of Rev 19<sup>13</sup>, always literally), and has in classical Greek the same meaning. In the NT βαπτίζω is used either metaphorically, of the Passion of our Lord (Mk 10<sup>38</sup>, Lk 12<sup>50</sup>, and some MSS of Mt 20<sup>22</sup>—so also βάπτισμα) and of the descent of the Holy Ghost at Pentecost (Ac 1<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>16</sup>, see below, 6), or else of baptism and of Jewish ablutions. For these last, see Mk 7<sup>4</sup> (the Jews 'baptize,' v.l. sprinkle, themselves before meat and have 'baptizings,' βαπτισμούς, of vessels), Lk 11<sup>38</sup> (of washing before breakfast, ἐβαπτίσθη πρὸ τοῦ ἀρίστου), He 9<sup>10</sup> (divers 'baptisms,' i.e. washings).* Ceremonial ablution was a common practice of the Jews (Ex 29<sup>4</sup> etc., Mk 7<sup>3</sup> πυγμὴ νίψονται, Jn 2<sup>6</sup> 3<sup>25</sup>); and the allusions to washing in connexion with baptism (above, 1) would be familiar to the early Christians, who also had the metaphor of cleansing; see 2 Co 7<sup>1</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>, Rev 1<sup>5</sup> (some MSS) 7<sup>14</sup>; cf. 2 P 2<sup>-2</sup>.

* βαπτισμός is used of Christian baptism in Col 2<sup>12</sup> (v.l. βάπτισμα), and in the plural in He 6<sup>2</sup> (see above, 1); Josephus (Ant. xviii. v. 2) uses it of John's baptism. βάπτισμα is used in the NT 12 times of John's baptism and 3 (or 4) times of Christian baptism; for its metaphorical use see above.

(b) Baptism of proselytes.—The Jews admitted 'proselytes of righteousness,' i.e. full proselytes, with baptism, circumcision, and sacrifice. This custom was very common in Rabbinical times, though Josephus and Philo do not mention it, and some have therefore concluded that it did not exist in the 1st cent.; but Edersheim has clearly proved from ancient evidence that it was then in use (LT ii. 746, App. xii.). It may be added that the Jews in later times would not have borrowed baptism from the Christians, though it is intelligible that first John and then our Lord and His disciples should have adopted a custom already existing and have given it a new meaning. Such a baptized person was said by the Rabbis to be as a little child just born (cf. Tit 3<sup>5</sup>; see Edersheim, loc. cit.).

(c) The baptism of John is described in all the Gospels. It was a preparatory baptism (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>), the baptism of repentance (Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>3</sup>, Ac 13<sup>24</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>), intended, by an outward symbol, to induce repentance which is the essential requisite for the reception of spiritual truth. So marked a feature of his teaching was baptism, that John is called pre-eminently 'the Baptist' (ὁ βαπτιστής, Mt 3<sup>1</sup> 11<sup>14</sup>, Mk 8<sup>28</sup>, Lk 7<sup>20, 33</sup> 9<sup>19</sup>; Josephus, Ant. xviii. v. 2; in Mk 6<sup>14, 24</sup>, ὁ βαπτίζων). But he himself shows the difference between his baptism and that of Jesus, in that the latter was to be with the Holy Ghost (Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Mk 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup>, Jn 1<sup>33</sup>) and with fire (Mt., Lk.). For the meaning of baptism 'with the Holy Ghost,' see below 6 and 8 (e). Baptism 'with fire' is explained in Mt 3<sup>12</sup>; it is a baptism of judgment separating the wheat from the chaff, and burning the chaff with fire unquenchable (Allen, Com. in loc.; so || Lk 3<sup>17</sup>). This interpretation, however, is denied by Plummer (ICC on Lk 3<sup>16</sup>), who prefers a reference to the purifying power of the grace given, or to the fiery trials that await Christians. Others see a reference to the 'tongues like as of fire' at Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>3</sup>). However this may be, the fundamental difference between the two baptisms is that John's was a ceremonial rite symbolizing the need of repentance and of washing away sin, while that of our Lord was, in addition, the infusing of a new life; see below, 8. The baptism of John is mentioned in the NT outside the Gospels in Ac 1<sup>5, 22</sup> 10<sup>37</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>24</sup> 18<sup>25</sup> 19<sup>34</sup>. The last two passages show that it survived after Pentecost among those who had not yet received the gospel.

To this preparatory stage is also to be assigned the baptism of Jesus by John; it was not the institution of Christian baptism, though it paved the way for it, and in some sense our Lord may be said to have thereby sanctified 'water to the mystical washing away of sin.' Such also was the baptizing by Jesus' disciples during His earthly ministry (Jn 3<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>2</sup>); we note that our Lord carried on the Baptist's teaching about the approach of the kingdom and about repentance (Mk 1<sup>15</sup>; cf. Mt 3-), though in His teaching the Good Tidings predominated, while in that of John repentance was the chief note (Swete, Com. in loc.).

3. Preparation for baptism.—Instruction in Christian doctrine before baptism is to some extent necessary, because otherwise there cannot be faith and repentance. Our Lord commanded the disciples to teach (Mt 28<sup>20</sup>, διδάσκοντες) as well as to baptize. St. Peter instructed the people and Cornelius before he commanded them to be baptized (Ac 2<sup>14-38</sup> 10<sup>34-43, 48</sup>). Philip instructed the Samaritans and the Eunuch before baptism (8<sup>5f.</sup> 12, 35). The instruction of Theophilus (Lk 1<sup>4</sup>) was probably at least in part, before baptism. Lydia's baptism followed a preaching (Ac 16<sup>13</sup>), as did that of the Corinthians (18<sup>5</sup>). But in most of these cases the teaching was very short, in some of them not lasting more than one day. And no instruction that can be properly so called is mentioned in the case of Saul (Ac 9<sup>18</sup> 22<sup>16</sup>), or the Philippian jailer (18<sup>8</sup>; note 'immediately'), or the twelve Ephesians (19<sup>5</sup>). Apollos had been instructed (ἦν κατηχημένος) in the way of the Lord, but only imperfectly, and Priscilla and Aquila taught him more carefully (ἀκριβέστερον, Ac 18<sup>26</sup>). The allusions to the instruction of Christians in 1 Co 14<sup>19</sup>, Gal 6<sup>6</sup> (κατηχέω), Ro 12<sup>7</sup>, Col 1<sup>-8</sup> etc. (διδάσκω), have no special reference to baptism. In Ro 2<sup>18</sup> κατηχέω is used of Jewish instruction.

At a later period, persons under instruction for baptism were called catechumens (κατηχούμενοι, 'those in a state of being taught'; cf. Gal 6<sup>6</sup>), and their preparation was called catechesis (κατήχησις; cf. our word 'catechism' from κατηχισμός, through Latin). The catechumens were taught the Creed, or Christian doctrine, during their catechumenate, and their instruction was called the 'traditio symboli'; they professed their faith at baptism, and this profession was called the 'redditio symboli' (see below, 5). The baptism in later times normally took place in the early morning of Easter Day, and the selection of candidates for baptism took place on the 40th day before (Cyr. Jer., Cat., Introd. § 4; it was called the 'inscribing of names,' ὀνοματογραφία); thenceforward the selected candidates were called 'competentes,' συναϊτούντες. In the 4th cent. the catechumenate lasted two years (Elvira, can. 42) or three years (Ap. Const. viii. 32, and several Church Orders); but this was never a hard and fast rule. Catechumens were not allowed to be present at the main part of the Eucharist or at the Agape (Didache, 9, and often in the Church Orders). See, further, A. J. Maclean, op. cit. pp. 16-19, 97; DCA, art. 'Catechumens.'

4. Formula of baptism.—It is not quite clear what words were used for baptism in NT times. In Mt 28<sup>19</sup> our Lord bids His followers make disciples of all the nations, baptizing (βαπτίζοντες, present part.) them into the name (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, AV 'in the name,' see 8) of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. These words are in all MSS and VSS, but F. C. Conybeare (ZNTW, 1901, p. 275 ff.; HJ i. [Oct. 1902] 102 ff.) and K. Lake (Inaug. Lect. at Leyden, 17th Jan. 1904) dispute their authenticity, because Eusebius often quotes the text without them or with 'make disciples of all the nations in my name.' The careful refutation of this view by Chase (JThSt vi. 483 ff.) and Riggenbach ('Der trinitar. Taufbefehl Matth. 28<sup>19</sup>,' in Beiträge zur Förderung christl. Theol., Gütersloh, 1903) has made this position untenable, and we can with confidence assert that the full text is part of the First Gospel. It has, however, been denied that the words were spoken by our Lord. But the view that He made some such utterance, of which the words in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> are doubtless a much abbreviated record, is the only way in which we can comprehend how such a Trinitarian passage as 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup> could have been written, or understand the numerous passages in the NT which affirm the Godhead of the Son and of the Holy Ghost (Chase, JThSt vi. 509 f.; see also art. 'God' in SDB).

In Acts we read of people being baptized (almost always in the passive) 'in (ἐν) the name of the Lord Jesus' (2<sup>38</sup> [v. l. ἐπὶ]), or 'into (εἰς) the name of the Lord Jesus' (8<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>), or 'in (ἐν) the name of Jesus' ('Christ') (10<sup>48</sup>). In the Pauline Epistles we read of baptism into Christ Jesus, into His death (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>), into Christ (Gal 3<sup>27</sup>); with these passages cf. 1 Co 1<sup>13. 15</sup> ('into the name of Paul,' 'into my name'), 10<sup>2</sup> ('into Moses'), 12<sup>13</sup> ('into one body'), Ac 19<sup>3</sup> ('into what?'—'into John's baptism'); all these passages also have the passive 'to be baptized,' except 1 Co 10<sup>2</sup> which (according to the best reading) has the middle ἐβαπτίσαντο (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>, Ac 22<sup>16</sup>; above, 1); 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup> has 'in (ἐν) the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God.' Of these passages only Ac 8<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>48</sup> 19<sup>5</sup> are narratives of baptisms.

The Pauline references clearly do not refer to the formula used, though 1 Co 1<sup>13. 15</sup> makes it probable that in some form the 'Name' was mentioned in the words of baptism. Do the other passages refer to a formula? On this point there is much diversity of opinion. (a) It is maintained that the formula at first ran 'in the name of the Lord Jesus' or the like; and that the First Evangelist introduced into his Gospel the Trinitarian formula which was in use towards the end of the 1st century (Robinson, EBl, art. 'Baptism'). It is not easy to see how, if the other formula was the original apostolic usage, this one could have been invented in the third or even in the last quarter of the 1st cent., unless indeed our Lord had really spoken such words as are found in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>; and in that case it is hard to see why the apostles should have used a quite different formula.—(b) It is thought that the passages in Mt. and Acts alike refer to the formula used, but that baptism into Christ's name is necessarily the same as baptism into that of the Holy Trinity. The latter statement is quite true, but it does not meet the whole difficulty.—(c) It is said that none of the passages in Acts refers to a formula at all, but only to the theological import of baptism (see below, 8). This is quite probable; at least the differences of wording show that if a formula is referred to at all in Acts, it was not stereotyped in the first age.—(d) Assuming that our Lord spoke, at any rate in substance, the words recorded in Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, many think that He did not here prescribe a formula, but unfolded the spiritual meaning of the rite (so Chase, JThSt vi. 506 ff., viii. 177; Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, p. 124; W. C. Allen, ICC, in loc.). This view is extremely probable, whatever interpretation we put upon the passage, for which see below, 8. It was our Lord's habit not to make regulations but to establish principles; so Socrates (HE v. 22), speaking of the keeping of Easter, contrasts the practice of Jesus with that of the Mosaic Law in the matter of the making of rules.

It is quite possible that no formula of baptism is given in the NT at all, and even that at first there were no fixed words. It is probable that all the NT passages refer primarily to the theological import of the rite, though they may have a remote allusion to the mode of baptizing. But though we cannot assert that there was in the Apostolic Age a fixed form of words, it was a sound instinct which induced the Church, at least from the 1st cent. onwards, to adopt the Trinitarian formula, and it would be rash indeed to depart from it. If our Lord's words did not prescribe a form of words, at least they suggested it. We find it in the Didache (§ 7: 'baptize into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost'), though in describing Christians in § 9 the writer speaks of them as 'baptized into the name of the Lord.' So Justin paraphrases: 'They then receive the washing with water in the name (ἐπ' ὀνόματος) of God, the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit,' and says that 'he who is illuminated (see above, 1) is washed in the name of Jesus Christ . . . and in the name of the Holy Ghost' (Apol. i. 61). Tertullian says that the formula has been prescribed [by Christ], and quotes Mt 28<sup>19</sup> exactly (de Bapt. 13; note especially that he translates εἰς τὸ ὄνομα by 'in nomen' though Migne, apparently by error, gives 'nominē'). In de Praescr. 20 he paraphrases the text: 'He bade them . . . go and teach the nations who were to be baptized (intinguendas) into the Father (in Patrem), and into the Son, and into the Holy Ghost'; and in adv. Prax. 26 thus: 'He commands them to baptize into the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, non in unum'—i.e. not into one Person. The Trinitarian formula is the only one found in the Church in ancient times. It is prescribed or referred to in Origen, Hom. in Lev. vii. § 4, in the Church Orders (Can. of Hipp. xix. [ed. Achelis, § 133]; Ap. Const. iii. 16, vii. 22; Ethiopic Didascalia, 16, ed. Platt; Test. of our Lord, ii. 7), in the Acts of Xanthippe twice (M. R. James, Apocr. Anecd. i. [= TS ii. 3, Cambridge, 1893] p. 79), and in the Apostolic Canons [c. A.D. 400], can. 49f. The fact that this last work forbids any other form probably shows that in some heretical circles other words were used.

Most of the Eastern Churches, Orthodox or Separated, use the passive voice 'N. is baptized,' or the like. The Westerns, on the contrary, always use the active: 'N., I baptize thee.' The latter is perhaps the older form; it is found in the Canons of Hippolytus and (in the plural, 'We baptize thee') in the Acts of Xanthippe (as above); and it is favoured by Mt 28<sup>19</sup> itself ('baptizing them') and Didache, 7 ('baptize,' imperative). It is also found among the Copts and Abyssinians (DCA i. 162<sup>b</sup>; H. Denzinger, Ritus Orientalium, Wurzburg, 1863, i. 208, 230, 235).

We may ask what is meant by the invocation of the Divine name over the persons who were being baptized, of which we read in Justin, Apol. i. 61 ('the name of God is pronounced over him') and Ap. Const. iii. 16 ('having named, ἐνονομάσας, the invocation, ἐπικλησιν, of Father and Son and Holy Ghost, thou shalt baptize them in the water, ἐν τῷ ὕδατι'). In connexion with this, Ac 22<sup>16</sup> ('calling on his name') is quoted; but there it is the baptized, not the baptizer, who 'invokes'; baptism is given in response to the prayer of the candidate. More to the point are Ac 15<sup>17</sup> ('the gentiles upon whom my name is called,' from Am 9<sup>1-2</sup>), and Ja 2<sup>7</sup> ('the honourable name which was called upon you,' RVm, τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς); cf. Nu 6<sup>27</sup>, where God's name is put upon the Israelites by the threefold blessing, and Ac 19<sup>13</sup>, where the Jewish exorcists named the name of the Lord Jesus over the demoniacs, saying, 'I adjure you by Jesus . . .' It is quite possible that in the NT passages there may be some reference to the words used in baptizing, which, as we have seen, probably (at least in the ordinary way) included a mention of the Name. But there is no evidence that any invocation was part of the rite in apostolic times, and Chase denies that it was so (JThSt viii. 164). Is it necessary to suppose that Justin and the writer of the Apostolic Constitutions refer to anything else than the Trinitarian formula of baptism?

5. Baptismal customs.—Some traces of customs which were part of the rite in the early Church are found in the NT. (a) A profession of faith and renunciation of evil is common in ancient times (e.g. Justin, Apol. i. 61, where the candidate undertakes to be able to live according to the faith; Tert. de Bapt. 6, de Idol. 6, de Cor. 3, de Spect. 4—Tertullian mentions the renunciations, for which see ERE i., art. 'Abrenuntio'). To such a profession the gloss of Ac 8<sup>37</sup>, which is older than Irenaeus who mentions it (c. Haer. iii. xii. 8), is the oldest certain reference. But it is possible that there is an allusion to it in 1 Co 15<sup>3-8</sup>—or at least to an instruction before baptism—though no form of Creed can be intended (note v.<sup>3</sup>: 'I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received'—the 'delivery' of the faith to the catechumens, see above, 3); also in Ro 6<sup>17</sup> 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13f.</sup>, He 10<sup>22f.</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>21</sup> (for this verse see ERE i. 38), Jude<sup>3</sup>. While, however, it is extremely probable that some sort of a profession of faith was always made at baptism, the NT passages fall short of proof of the fact.

(b) Trine immersion is a very early custom, being mentioned in the Didache (§ 7) and by Tertullian (de Cor. 3, adv. Prax. 26). The practice of immersion would probably be suggested by the word βαπτίζω (see above, 1). But J. A. Robinson (JThSt vii. 187 ff.) denies this, and says that as the word is used of ceremonial washings in Mk 7<sup>4</sup>, Lk 11<sup>38</sup>, it need not imply immersion, though βαπτω (see above, 2) does; but need only denote ceremonial cleansing with water. Chase (JThSt viii. 179 f.) replies that the vessels in Mk 7<sup>4</sup> must have been dipped in order to be cleansed, and also that Lk 11<sup>38</sup> means bathing; to this may be added that ceremonial 'baptizing' of 'themselves' in Mk 7<sup>4</sup> is shown by v.<sup>3</sup> to mean the dipping of their hands into water. However this may be with regard to those passages, it seems more than probable that the word βαπτίζω to the first disciples, when used of baptism, conveyed the idea of immersion, both because it would be difficult otherwise to explain the metaphor of baptismal burial and resurrection (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>), and because the Jewish practice in proselyte-baptism (see above, 2) was to undress the candidate completely, and to immerse him so that every part of his body was touched by the water (Edersheim, LT ii. 745 f.; the candidate also made a profession of faith before the 'fathers of the baptism' or sponsors). But it is also probable that total immersion could not always be practised, as in the case of the Philippian jailer; and that when this was the case the candidate stood in the water, which was then poured over him.

There is no trace in the NT of trine immersion, which doubtless was founded on the Trinitarian formula, though this is no evidence against its existence in the apostolic period. Flowing ('living') water, if it can be had, is prescribed in the Didache (§ 7) and in several Church Orders (Maclean, p. 104). In case of necessity the Didache (loc. cit.) expressly allows affusion. Immersion is implied in Ep. of Barnabas, § 11, where we read of going down into the water laden with sin, and rising up from it bearing fruit in the heart.

(c) Clothing the neophytes.—In the early Church the putting off of the clothes of the candidates before baptism, and the clothing of them afterwards, usually in white robes, were emphasized as ceremonial actions; but of this we have no certain evidence before the 4th century. Constantine was buried in his baptismal robes (τα ἐμφώτια, DCA i. 162). The Church Orders make a great point of the clothing, and the Test. of our Lord mentions white robes (ii. 12, see Maclean, p. 105), as does Ambrose, de Myst. 34 (vii.). Even from the first, whether immersion was total or partial, there must have been an unclothing and a re-clothing; and this, as it would seem, gives point to the metaphor about 'putting off' (ἀπεκδυσάμενοι) the old man, and 'putting on' (ἐνδύσασθαι) the new, in Col 3<sup>9f.</sup>, and about 'putting on' Christ in baptism in Gal 3<sup>27</sup>; cf. Ro 13<sup>14</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup>. The metaphor goes back in some degree to OT times; in Zec 3<sup>3f.</sup> Joshua the high priest is stripped of his filthy garments as a symbol, and Justin (Dial. 116) perhaps applies this to Christian baptism: 'even so we . . . have been stripped of the filthy garments, that is, of our sins.' Josephus tells us (BJ ii. viii. 5) that the Essenes clothed themselves in white veils and bathed as a purification, and then partook of a common meal with benediction before and after it; then, laying aside their garments, they went to work till the evening. But there was apparently no symbolism about this clothing.

(d) The kiss of peace after baptism is common in Christian antiquity. Justin (Apol. i. 65) describes it as taking place after the newly-baptized are received among the faithful and after the people's prayers, i.e. at the Eucharist which followed the rite of baptism. Cyprian (Ep. lviii. 4, ad Fidum) alludes to it at the baptism of infants. In the Church Orders it is used at Confirmation, as well as at the Eucharist, and (apparently) at all times of prayer (Macleane, pp. 18 f., 108). Tertullian (de Orat. 18) says that some did not observe it in times of fasting. There could be no better symbol of Christian love than this, and it is highly probable that it was used in worship in NT times; such would seem to be the suggestion of the 'holy kiss' in Ro 16<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 13<sup>12</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>26</sup>, and of the 'kiss of love' in 1 P 5<sup>14</sup>. But there is no evidence in the NT as to its use in baptism.

(e) For a possible use of anointing in the NT, see 1; for the laying on of hands, see 6. The sign of the cross was used in early times, and was often called the 'seal' (Macleane, p. 108; Cyr. Jer., Cat. xiii. 36). Some think that this is referred to in the passages cited above in 1 about 'sealing'; but this is more than doubtful.

(f) Of three other early baptismal customs there is no trace in the NT. (a) Sponsors are mentioned by Tertullian in de Bapt. 18 ('sponsores'); cf. de Cor. 3 ('inde suscepti'). They were called 'susceptores' (αναδοχοι) because they 'received' the newly-baptized when they came up from the font; cf. αναληφθεῖς, Socrates, HE vii. 4. They are found in the Church Orders (Macleane, p. 98 f.); and, especially in the case of infants, when they make the responses for them, they might be the parents or others of their 'houses' (Test. of our Lord, ii. 8). In Justin (Apol. i. 61) 'he who leads the person that is to be washed to the laver' seems to be the baptizer. (β) Fasting before baptism is ordered in the Didache (§ 7), and is mentioned by Justin (Apol. i. 61) and Tertullian (de Bapt. 20; cf. de Jejun. 8), and frequently in the Church Orders (Macleane, pp. 133 f., 137 f.). This is analogous to the fasting in Ac 13<sup>2</sup> before the sending forth of Barnabas and Saul. (γ) The tasting of milk and honey by the newly-baptized after baptism (and communion) seems originally to have been an Egyptian and 'African' custom only. It is mentioned by Tertullian (de Cor. 3, adv. Marc. i. 14), by Clement of Alexandria (Paed. i. 6), and in the Egyptian and Ethiopic Church Orders, the Canons of Hippolytus, and the Verona Didascalia (all these four are probably Egyptian), but not in the Test. of our Lord or in the Apostolic Constitutions (see Macleane, p. 46). It was, however, probably introduced into Rome by the 4th cent., for Jerome mentions it (Dial. c. Luciferianos, 8), and he was baptized in Rome c. A.D. 365. Thereafter it is several times mentioned in the West. It is suggested by Ex 3<sup>3</sup>, which describes the promised land as flowing with milk and honey; though the Canons of Hippolytus (xix. [ed. Achelis, §§ 144, 148]) say that it is because the neophytes are as little children whose natural food is milk and honey, or because of the sweetness of the blessings of the future life.

6. The complement of immersion: the laying on of hands.—In Acts we have two detailed accounts of baptism in the Apostolic Age (8<sup>10-17</sup> 19<sup>1-6</sup>), and in both cases we read first of an immersion and then of a laying on of hands, the latter being expressly connected with the gift of the Holy Ghost. In Ac 8 Philip, one of the Seven, had preached to the Samaritans, and they were baptized. But as yet the Holy Ghost had fallen upon none of them, only they had been baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus. Then the apostles Peter and John, who were sent down from Jerusalem by their fellow apostles, prayed for the newly-baptized that they might receive the Holy Ghost, and laid their hands upon them; and they received the Holy Ghost. In ch. 19, St. Paul finds about twelve men at Ephesus who had received John's baptism; these are 'baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus,' and St. Paul himself lays his hands upon them and the Holy Ghost comes upon them. We may note in passing that 'there is nothing in the narrative to lead us to suppose that he followed at Ephesus a course which he did not follow elsewhere' (Chase, Confirmation, p. 32). With these passages we may take He 6<sup>17</sup> (see above, 1), where the 'teaching . . . of the laying on of hands' is added to that of 'baptisms' as part of the 'foundation.' Even if it does not refer exclusively to the baptismal imposition of hands after immersion, it at least includes it.

The meaning of this laying on of hands will be considered in § 8 below. Here we must notice the other passages of the NT which speak of the gift of the Holy Ghost. But two preliminary remarks must be made. (a) It would save much confusion of thought if it were remembered that in Christian antiquity 'baptism' is constantly used to comprehend the whole rite, immersion, and also laying on of hands, and other similar actions. It would therefore be well if we more often used the word 'immersion' (including in it all possible varieties of usage, total or partial immersion or affusion) when we are speaking of the action at the font, rather than the technical name 'baptism.' We are apt to put ancient references to baptism into a wrong perspective because we are accustomed to the long-continued separation of the two parts of the rite in the West.—(b) In studying Acts we shall do well to remember that St. Luke does not attempt in his narrative to give all the details of the historical actions which he records. As W. M. Ramsay truly observes, an author like St. Luke 'seizes the critical events, concentrates the reader's attention on them by giving them fuller treatment, touches more lightly and briefly on the less important events, omits entirely a mass of unimportant details' (St. Paul, London, 1895, p. 3).

In numerous passages of the NT the gift of the Spirit is explicitly connected with baptism (in its fullest sense), as in Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>15-17</sup> 9<sup>17</sup>. 10<sup>44</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> (before baptism) 19<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>13</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>, He 6<sup>1-4</sup> 10<sup>29</sup> (which appears to refer to the repudiation of the baptismal confession and covenant; see Westcott, Com. in loc.; cf. v. 22<sup>1</sup>), and in the passages which refer to 'sealing,' 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>30</sup> (see above, 1); also in the Gospels, Mt 3<sup>11</sup>, Mk 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 3<sup>16</sup>, Jn 1<sup>33</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, see above, 2 (c). The close connexion between the gift of the Spirit and baptism is seen also in the fact that our Lord calls the Descent at Pentecost a baptism (Ac 1<sup>5</sup>; cf. 11<sup>16</sup>), although in the case of those on whom the Holy Ghost then came there was no immersion.

To these passages we may add several where a definite historical bestowal of the spirit is mentioned: Ro 5<sup>5</sup> (δοθέντος), 8<sup>14</sup> (ἐλάβετε), 1 Co 2<sup>12</sup> (ἐλάβομεν), 2 Co 5<sup>5</sup> (δοῦν), 11<sup>4</sup> (οὐκ ἐλάβετε, speaking of a 'different Spirit' in contrast to the Holy Ghost), Gal 3<sup>2</sup> (ἐλάβετε; cf. v. 3 'having begun in the Spirit,' and v. 5 where the present participle marks the continuance of the gift of the Spirit), 4<sup>6</sup> (ἐξαπέστειλεν), 1 Th 4<sup>7</sup> (ἐκάλει, the definite call, connected with τὸν διδόντα, 'who ever giveth' the Spirit: some MSS have the aorist δόντα; G. Milligan, Com. in loc., takes the present part. as meaning 'the Giver of the Spirit'), 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> (εἰλετο), 1 Jn 3<sup>24</sup> (ἐδωκεν; cf. 4<sup>13</sup>, where the perfect δεδωκεν denotes the permanent effects of the gift; Brooke, ICC on 3<sup>24</sup>). These aorists* point to a definite event, and, taken with the passages in the preceding paragraph, would seem to refer to the Christian initiation.

* The RV has often been criticized as having too slavishly followed the Greek aorist in a way that does not suit the

In the other records of baptisms the imposition of hands is not mentioned, and in some the gift of the Holy Ghost is not alluded to. It would be unsafe (see above), especially in view of He 6<sup>7</sup>, to infer that the laying on of hands was not practised except in the cases where it is explicitly referred to. But the case of Cornelius must be specially considered. Here the Holy Ghost was given before baptism and without any outward sign such as the laying on of the Apostle's hands. Yet St. Peter does not judge that, even after such a signal mark of God's favour, it is unnecessary for Cornelius and his household to be baptized in the usual manner. From this we may with Chase (Confirmation, p. 28) see on the one hand that it is wrong to undervalue the sacraments, and on the other that God is not tied down to them, but may give His grace without the interposition of outward ordinances. He is not bound, if we are. The same thing was seen at Pentecost, when the Spirit was given without the outward act of immersion having preceded.

Again, other reference to the laying on of hands after immersion is seen by some in 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup> (which is usually taken to refer to Timothy's ordination, though Chase refers it—not 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup>—to his baptism, i.e. confirmation). In Ac 9<sup>17</sup> (cf. v. 12) also, Ananias lays his hands on Saul before baptism; but the allusion in both cases is doubtful. For the anointing, see above, 1.

The name confirmation, i.e. 'strengthening,' for the complement of immersion is not found before the 5th cent.; it may be founded on the use of βεβαιῶ in 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup> with the allusion there to baptism.

For many centuries the baptismal rite—immersion, anointing (when practised), and laying on of hands—was normally one, and took place at one time. Tertullian (de Bapt. 8) speaks of the immersion, unction, and imposition of hands with invocation of the Holy Ghost as being administered on the same occasion; and the Church Orders are equally definite (Maclean, pp. 18 f., 105 ff.). Laying on of hands is also referred to in Tert. de Res. Carn. 8 (with immersion, unction, sealing with the sign of the cross, and communion), and by Cyprian (Ep. lxxi.), who speaks of those who have been baptized by heretics being received into the Church with imposition of hands that they might receive the Holy Ghost (cf. Ep. lxxii. 9, referring to Ac 8). Origen (de Princ. i. iii. 2) says that the Holy Spirit was given by the laying on of the apostles' hands in baptism; so Athanasius, ad Serap. Orat. i. 6. It is curious that Cyril of Jerusalem (Cat. xx.-xxii.), who mentions immersion, anointing, and the communion of the neophytes, omits the laying on of hands, seeing that the contemporary Church Orders strongly emphasize it. It is a mistake to suppose that this custom ceased with Tertullian. The baptismal Eucharist with the first communion of the neophytes follows immediately in the Church Orders; cf. also Tertullian and Cyril as above, and Justin (Apol. i. 65).

In case of necessity there might be an interval between the immersion and the imposition of hands, as there had been in Ac 8. The Council of Elvira (c. A.D. 305, can. 38, 77) says that in such a case if the baptized dies before [his confirmation], he may be justified by the faith which he has professed; cf. also Jerome, Dial. c. Lucif. 9, who mentions the laying on of hands.

English idiom. Whatever justification there may be for this criticism in a version intended for public reading (though even there it is surely important that the hearers should know what the sacred writers exactly meant), yet it cannot be too strongly asserted that it is essential for the student to pay the greatest attention to the accuracies of the Greek tenses.

For the theological significance of the laying on of hands, see below, § 8.

7. Minister of baptism.—We gather from the NT that the apostles themselves did not usually baptize; their task was 'to preach the Gospel,' and St. Paul only rarely administered the sacrament himself, lest any should say that his converts were baptized into his name (1 Co 1<sup>14-17</sup>). It is not recorded who baptized the 3000 at Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>41</sup>), or the Samaritans (8<sup>1-6</sup>, probably Philip), or Lydia and her household (16<sup>15</sup>), or the jailer at Philippi and 'all his' (16<sup>33</sup>), or the Corinthians (18<sup>8</sup>), or the Ephesians (19<sup>5</sup>); St. Peter's companions clearly baptized Cornelius and his company (10<sup>48</sup>): he 'commanded' them to be baptized. Philip baptized the Eunuch (8<sup>38</sup>), and evidently Ananias baptized St. Paul (9<sup>18 22 46</sup>). It has been suggested that baptism was one of the functions of John Mark as 'minister' (πρωτοεργος) to Barnabas and Saul (13<sup>5</sup>; Rackham, Com. in loc.). On the other hand, St. Peter and St. John laid their hands on those who had been baptized in Samaria (8<sup>17</sup>), and St. Paul laid his hands on the Ephesian neophytes (19<sup>6</sup>; cf. v. 9).

A similar rule is found in the baptismal customs of the succeeding ages. In the Church Orders the bishop is normally present at baptisms, but the presbyters actually immerse, and the deacons assist; then the newly-baptized are immediately brought to the bishop for anointing and laying on of hands; though the custom as to the person who anoints and the number and place of the unctions in the rite varies, the bishop always lays on hands (for details, see Maclean, p. 104 ff.). When, therefore, it is said that the bishop was the normal minister of baptism, it is not meant that he actually immersed, though doubtless he sometimes did so. St. Ambrose (de Myst. 8 [iii.]) speaks only of the bishop (summum sacerdotem) interrogating, and hallowing (the water, or the oil [?]). As time went on, either the immersion and the confirmation had to be separated, or else the latter was administered by the presbyter with oil consecrated by the bishop.

Deacons were allowed at Elvira (can. 77) to baptize in case of necessity; and so Tertull. de Bapt. 17 (who, like Elvira, allows laymen to baptize in such a case), Test. of our Lord, ii. 11, Didascalia, iii. 12 (ed. Funk); but this is forbidden in Ap. Const. viii. 28, 46 (ed. Funk). The Ap. Const. (iii. 9) and the 'Fourth Council of Carthage,' A.D. 398 (can. 100, Hefele, Councils, Eng. tr., ii. [18<sup>6</sup>] 417), forbid women to baptize. There is perhaps a permission to deacons to baptize in country places, in Cyr. Jer., Cat. xvii. 35; but this is uncertain. There may be a trace of presbyters confirming in the Sacramentary of Serapion and in the Ap. Const. (see Maclean, pp. 107, 110, 155).

8. Theological aspects.—(a) A study of the NT leads us to the conclusion that baptism is no mere ceremony whereby outsiders are fitly received into the Christian Church. It is a means of grace—it conveys by an outward sign the grace of God, but always under certain conditions, for which see below (f). St. Peter says that water after a true likeness (αντιτυπον) saves us, even baptism: a cleansing of the body, but also a cleansing of the soul; the outward part, water, is the symbol or sign of the inward washing (1 P 3<sup>21</sup>). God saved us (ἔσωσεν, aorist) through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost (Tit 3<sup>5</sup>). The writer of the Appendix to Mk. says that 'he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved' (16<sup>16</sup>). And this is in accordance with God's usual way of working. He normally uses outward instruments and means, though He is not bound by them and can work otherwise if He wills. On the one hand, He uses human beings as His instruments (cf., e.g., Ac 9<sup>15</sup> 13<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>15t</sup>, Eph 3<sup>7</sup> for men as preachers of the gospel), and, on the other hand, He uses inanimate things or outward actions. Thus the 'gift of God' is conveyed by imposition of hands (2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). Jesus ordinarily (but not always) used outward means in healing and in doing other mighty works (DCG i., art. 'Gestures,' 1). So He instituted outward means (water, bread, and wine) for the two sacraments of the gospel. Among OT analogies may be noted the cloud and pillar of fire, which symbolized God's presence. By using outward means, God shows that matter is not, as Gnostic dualism asserted, naturally evil, but that it is consecrated by Him for His sacred purposes.

The same truth may be expressed by saying that baptism is a pledge or witness of grace, by which God assures us that He will perform His part of the covenant between Him and man; cf. the passages where the gift of the Spirit, the earnest (ἀρραβών) of our inheritance, is associated with faith, and by implication with baptism (Eph 1<sup>13t</sup>; see above, 1).

(b) Baptism is a union with God. The baptized is incorporated into the Divine Being, united with Christ, apart from whom we can do nothing (Jn 15<sup>5</sup>). This baptismal union is clearly asserted in Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Gal 3<sup>2</sup>, and by contrast is implied in 1 Co 1<sup>13</sup>.<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>2</sup>; it is made possible only by the Incarnation, and by the glorifying of Jesus' humanity; see Jn 7<sup>39</sup>. It involves sonship by adoption (Ro 8<sup>15t</sup>. [note the aorist ἐλάβετε, pointing to a definite time], Gal 3<sup>26t</sup>. 4<sup>4t</sup>. see art. ADOPTION). This aspect of baptism as an incorporation into God holds good whatever view we take of the meaning of the Lord's command to baptize, which must now be considered carefully, as it is essential to the understanding of baptism.

(c) Meaning of baptism 'in' or 'into the Name.'—The words εἰς τὸ ὄνομα (or εἰς alone) in the baptismal passages are usually interpreted as denoting incorporation into a person or society, and the purpose for which the baptism is administered; but another view interprets the words in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> as meaning 'by the authority of.' (For a full discussion, see F. H. Chase in JThSt vi. 500 ff., viii. 161 ff.; J. A. Robinson in JThSt vii. 186 ff., and EBi, art. 'Baptism.')

It is agreed that by a Hebrew idiom common in Hellenistic Greek 'the name' of a person is used for the person himself. To believe in the name of some one is to believe in him (Jn 1<sup>1</sup>-2<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>13</sup> πιστεύω εἰς; 1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup> πιστ. with dative—for the difference, see Westcott on Jn 5-4 8<sup>30t</sup>; cf. Ac 3<sup>16</sup>); to come, or to act, or to receive a person, in the name of some one, is to come or act or to receive one as his representative (Mt 18<sup>5</sup> 21<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>39</sup>, Mk 9<sup>37</sup> 11<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>6</sup>, Lk 13<sup>35</sup>, Jn 5<sup>13</sup> 10<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>26</sup>, all with ἐν [τῷ] ὀνόματι; Mt 24<sup>5</sup> with ἐπὶ ὀνόματι); to hope in God's name is to hope in Him (Mt 12-1, with simple dative, = Is 42<sup>4</sup> LXX with ἐπὶ); to have life in Christ's name is to receive life from Him (Jn 20<sup>31</sup>); to ask or give thanks in (ἐν) Christ's name is to do so in Him, i.e. for His merits (Jn 14<sup>13t</sup>. 15<sup>16</sup> 16<sup>23t</sup>. 26, Eph 5<sup>10</sup>); to adjure in (ἐν) the name of a person is to adjure by him (Ac 16<sup>18</sup>; cf. 1 Co 1<sup>10</sup> δῖά); to receive remission of sins through (διὰ) Jesus' name is to receive it through Him (Ac 10<sup>43</sup>). In Jn 17<sup>11t</sup>. Jesus prays the Father to keep the disciples 'in (ἐν) thy name which thou hast given me' (so best text; cf. Ph 2<sup>9</sup>), and says that He has kept them while on earth in the Father's name—a very difficult passage. The latter phrase must mean 'as the Father's representative' (as above); for the former, cf. 17<sup>6</sup>. 26, where the 'name' stands for God and His attributes, and we may perhaps paraphrase: 'in thyself, with whom I am one' (cf. 10<sup>30</sup>). In Col 3<sup>17</sup> to do all in (ἐν) the name of Christ is to do all 'in Christ,' however we are to understand that characteristic Pauline phrase (see J. A. Robinson, Ephes., London, 1903, p. 22 ff.). So again in Lk 6-2 'cast out your name' is equivalent to 'cast you out'; in Ac 15-6 Barnabas and Paul are said to have hazarded their lives for the name of Jesus, i.e. for Him.

In the above passages the translation 'by the authority of' is not possible. But 'in the name' can well be so translated in some passages, as when the disciples spoke or preached in Jesus' name, Ac 4<sup>17t</sup>. (ἐπὶ) 9<sup>27</sup> (ἐν); cf. Lk 24<sup>47</sup> (ἐπὶ); though here also it can be rendered 'as the representatives of.' So 'by the authority of' suits best in passages where devils are cast out or mighty works done 'in the name,' as Mt 7<sup>22</sup> (dative without prep.), Mk 9<sup>38t</sup>. (ἐν, ἐπὶ), 'Mk' 16<sup>17</sup> (ἐν), Lk 9<sup>49</sup> (ἐν, v.l. ἐπὶ), Ac 3<sup>6</sup> (ἐν; cf. 4<sup>10</sup>. 10); and in Lk 10<sup>17</sup>, where demons are subject in (ἐν) Christ's name.

Three passages remain to be considered. Mk 9<sup>4</sup> has 'in (ἐν) name that ye are Christ's,' which is usually treated as an idiom: 'because ye are Christ's' (RV, Swete; the text followed by AV is faulty here), though Chase (JThSt viii. 170) renders 'in the Name, because ye are Christ's.' In Mt 10<sup>42t</sup>. 18<sup>20</sup> εἰς is used. In the former passage, 'into the name of a prophet' or 'disciple' can only mean 'as a prophet' or 'disciple,' i.e. with a view to the prophetic office or to discipleship. In the latter, 'gathered together into my name' is best rendered as 'drawn nigh to me'; cf. Dt 12<sup>5</sup>, 1 K 9<sup>3</sup> (so Chase, loc. cit.).

Another line of interpretation of the passages with 'in the name' is that of F. C. Conybeare, who makes 'in the name of Jesus' a theurgic formula, an application of ancient magic (JQR ix. 66, 581). For an answer to this theory, which is quite inapplicable to several of the passages cited above, and which takes no account of the OT use of 'the Name,' see G. B. Gray in HDB iii. 480.

We may now consider the baptismal passages. In Mt 28<sup>19</sup>, Ac 8<sup>16</sup> 19<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>13</sup>.<sup>15</sup> we read of baptism 'into (εἰς) the name'; and so 1 Co 10- 'into Moses,' 12<sup>13</sup> 'into one body,' Ac 19<sup>3</sup> 'into John's baptism,' Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup> 'into Christ,' or 'into his death'; while in Ac 2<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>48</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>11</sup> we read of baptism 'in (ἐν) the name.' The usual interpretation, at least of the former set of passages, is that the neophytes are in baptism incorporated with the Holy Trinity, or with Christ, with a view to (εἰς) remission of sins (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>) or to dying with Christ; the disciples of John are baptized with his baptism. Further, 'into the name' implies proprietorship: we are baptized so as to belong to God; and the same idea attaches to ἐπὶ ὀνόματος, by which Justin explains baptism to the heathen (above, 4; see Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, p. 125; Chase, JThSt vi. 501). If βαπτίζω conveyed to the first Christians the idea of immersion (above, 5), this interpretation follows necessarily. In that case, what is the difference, if any, between baptism 'in' and 'into'? Chase, who upholds the above interpretation, thinks that both involve the idea of incorporation or union, though the latter emphasizes the entrance into the name, while the former conveys the idea of the name encompassing the baptized (JThSt viii. 177, 184).

This line of interpretation is denied by Robinson (EBi, art. 'Baptism,' and JThSt vii. 191), who holds that εἰς and ἐν are synonymous in the NT, as they undoubtedly are in the Modern Greek vernacular, which has entirely lost ἐν except in a few phrases, εἰς having taken its place. On this view, 'in the name' is the translation preferred, and it is taken to mean 'by the authority' of the person mentioned. The statement that the two prepositions have the same meaning in the NT is hardly borne out by the facts. It is true that the tendency to confuse them had begun in the Apostolic Age; but it had not got very far, hardly beyond a fondness for 'constructio praeagnans,' as in Mk 1<sup>9</sup>, where ἐβαπτίσθη εἰς τὸν Ἰορδάνην = 'went into the Jordan and was baptized there' (in v.<sup>5</sup> we have ἐβαπτίζοντο ἐν τῷ Ἰορδάνῃ), or else = 'was immersed in Jordan' (Swete, Com. in loc.); cf. also Ac 8<sup>40</sup> εὐρέθη εἰς Ἀζωτον, 'went to Azotus and was found there,' and Lk 4<sup>41</sup>. The nearest approach to a real confusion of the prepositions is in Mt 5<sup>34</sup>: 'Swear not . . . by (ἐν) the heaven . . . nor by (ἐν) the earth . . . nor by (εἰς, RVm 'toward') Jerusalem,' where Chase (JThSt viii. 166) suggests that ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις is avoided so as to exclude a local meaning, and that εἰς represents the direction of the oath, just as in Ac 2<sup>5</sup>, Eph 5<sup>32</sup>, He 7<sup>14</sup> εἰς can only mean 'with reference to.'

In the opinion of the present writer no argument can be deduced from the fact that our Lord spoke Aramaic, and that both εἰς τὸ ὄνομα and ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι represent the simple phrase ܐܡܢ. For (though we know little of the Palestinian Aramaic of the 1st cent.) the preposition in Syriac not infrequently denotes motion; see Payne Smith, Thesaur. Syr., Oxford, 1879-1901, i. 430. And, as Chase remarks (JThSt vi. 507), the argument from the Aramaic preposition is robbed of all its force by the consideration that the Peshitta uses it in Ro 6<sup>3</sup>, Gal 3<sup>27</sup> for 'into Christ [Jesus],' which can only denote incorporation. Therefore the Aramaic phrase ܐܡܢ can mean '(incorporation) into the name.'

The grave objection to Robinson's interpretation is that it does not suit the Pauline passages, which cannot be put aside as irrelevant. That 'Paul was not crucified for the Corinthians and they were not baptized into his name' (1 Co 11<sup>34</sup>), is a proposition in direct contrast to the statement that 'all we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death' (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>). The latter passage denotes incorporation, and so therefore must the former. Indeed, the passage in 1 Cor. would lose all force if it were translated 'by his authority.'

For a long list of Greek Fathers who interpret Mt 28<sup>19</sup> of incorporation, see Chase, JThSt viii. 173 ff. On the other hand, Robinson says that the Western formula 'in nomine' can only mean 'by the authority.' This is not clear, and in any case it is significant that Tertullian, the father of ecclesiastical Latinity, understood Mt 28<sup>19</sup> otherwise, for he translates by 'in nomen,' and paraphrases by 'in Patrem,' etc.; see above, 4. He clearly understood the baptismal command to denote incorporation.

The issue does not rest on the question whether εἰς and ἐν are interchangeable. It is the whole sentence in Mt 28<sup>19</sup> which must be considered, and it is difficult to follow Robinson in thinking that it conveyed no idea of immersion to the first Christians. No doubt our Lord gave a new and more spiritual significance to a Jewish method of speech, but this is just what He did frequently in His teaching. If, as is probable, the account in Mt. is greatly condensed (above, 4), there is no difficulty about this. No doubt He explained His meaning to the disciples; we are led to interpret it by the writings of the disciples themselves. For these reasons the present writer cannot but think that Chase's interpretation is right, and that the RV has properly given the words as 'into the name.'

(d) Meaning of 'being born anew' or 'from above.'—In Jn 3<sup>3, 5</sup> our Lord speaks to Nicodemus of another birth, which He connects with water (see above, 1) and the Spirit, and which is requisite for seeing or entering the Kingdom of God; this birth is ἄνωθεν, which may be translated 'anew' (RV, and Westcott, Com. in loc.) or 'from above' (RVm, and Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, p. 131). In favour of the latter is Jn 3<sup>31</sup> ('he that cometh from above,' ἄνωθεν) and 19<sup>11</sup>, and the fact that the writer often speaks of our being begotten of God

(Jn 1<sup>13</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup> 4<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>1, 4, 18</sup> in Jn 3<sup>3, 5</sup> the word is γεννηθῆναι). In this case it is a heavenly birth that Jesus speaks of. In favour of the former is Gal 4<sup>9</sup> (πάλιν ἄνωθεν = 'over again'), but especially the fact that Nicodemus takes this meaning (v.<sup>4</sup>), and also that the term 'regeneration' (παλιγγενεσία), which was used in the Apostolic Church (Tit 3<sup>5</sup>) can best be explained as a reminiscence of our Lord's words on such an occasion, handed down orally. But may not both meanings of ἄνωθεν in Jn 3 be valid? The birth is both 'from above' and 'new.' A single word with more than one meaning is often used to express more than one truth.

This new or heavenly birth is the new start, the implanting of the new life, which is given to us by the Ascended and Glorified Christ through the Holy Ghost. And this new life is expressly connected with Christian baptism, whatever view we take of ἐξ ὕδατος in Jn 3<sup>5</sup>; St. Paul speaks (Col 2<sup>12</sup>) of the Christian having been buried with (συνταφέντες) Christ in baptism, 'wherein (not 'in whom,' i.e. Christ) ye were raised with him (συνηγέρθητε), . . . and you being dead . . . did he quicken together with him (συνεζωοποίησεν)'—note the aorists, denoting an action at a given time; cf. also Eph 2<sup>5</sup> (the 'sitting in heavenly places' in v.<sup>6</sup> is not future, but present). This new implanting of life is called 'regeneration' in Tit 3<sup>5</sup> (as above), and is effected by washing or a laver (λουτροῦ), that is, by baptism. (παλιγγενεσία is used in Mt 19-8 of the new age hereafter [cf. Ac 3-1 'the restitution of all things']; the application of it to the present age, as has been lately suggested, is most unlikely: for its use by non-Christian writers, see Swete, Holy Spirit in NT, p. 390, App. M.)

But the new life is like a seed. It may blossom and flourish, or it may die. It is the opportunity, the talent; but if it is not seized and put to good use, it is of no avail to the recipient, and even condemns him; see, further, below (f).

The figure of a new birth is very common in the Fathers in connexion with baptism; e.g. Justin, Apol. i. 61, 66, and Irenaeus, c. Haer. i. xxi. 1, III. xvii. 1 (αναγεννησις); Tert. adv. Marc. i. 28, de Res. Carn. 47 (regeneratio).

(e) Baptism and the gift of the Spirit.—We have seen (above, 6) how closely the gift of the Spirit is connected with baptism in the NT. We may now consider the meaning of that gift. Though the Holy Ghost is the Agent of all the Divine working, and therefore must be the Giver of life (cf. Ro 8-<sup>11</sup> etc.) at the immersion, yet the gift of the Spirit is said in Ac 8<sup>16</sup> not to be bestowed then, but at a later stage of the same rite—at the laying on of hands (see above, 6). Tertullian remarks (de Bapt. 6) that 'in the waters we do not receive the Holy Spirit, but, having been cleansed in the water under the influence of an angel (sub angelo), we are prepared for the Holy Spirit.' What, then, did St. Peter and St. John pray for when they prayed that the Samaritans might receive the Holy Ghost (Ac 8<sup>15</sup>)? What was the gift of the Holy Ghost received in v.<sup>17</sup>? One answer which has been given to this question must be dismissed as quite insufficient—that the miraculous signs vouchsafed in the infancy of the Church were the gift. It may be said that in v.<sup>18</sup> Simon saw that the Holy Ghost was given, and that therefore there must have been some outward manifestation. In Ac 19<sup>6</sup> the neophytes spoke with tongues and prophesied (cf. 2<sup>10</sup> 10<sup>46</sup>). To state the matter in this way, however, is to confuse the outward evidences of the activity of the Spirit with the gift of the Spirit Himself. No one could suppose that all that the Church received on the Day of Pentecost was a mere speaking with 'other tongues.' To understand what the gift is, we cannot do better than consider our Lord's promise of the gift, in Jn 14-16. As He describes it, it is a gift of guidance and teaching (14<sup>26</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>3</sup>, 13<sup>37</sup>), and, above all, a continued presence of the Spirit with us for ever (14<sup>16a</sup>). It was not to be a gift for one generation only, but for us in modern times as well as for the first Christians. There is nothing in these chapters about the gift of tongues or other wonderful signs. Indeed, as Chase remarks (Confirmation, p. 114), 'in the teaching of the Apostles the thought of extraordinary charismata has a quite subordinate place.' When Saul received the Holy Ghost (Ac 9<sup>17</sup>) there appear to have been no outward phenomena. And, whether the laying on of hands in 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup> was at baptism or at ordination (see above, 6), it is significant that the 'gift of God' which was in Timothy by the laying on of St. Paul's hands was the 'spirit of power and love and discipline' (σφρονισμοῦ). Indeed, it is difficult to suppose that the apostles could have laid so much stress on the gift if it was merely a speaking with tongues (which St. Paul somewhat disparages in 1 Co 14-), or prophesying. Throughout the Epistles, the gift of the Spirit is a very different thing; it is that inward strengthening which enables the Church to fight the battle with the hosts of evil and to win the victory. And this is what our Lord promised in the Johannine chapters quoted above.

(f) Baptism not a magical charm.—To say that God uses outward means or instruments as the normal manner in which He gives His grace is not to assert, on the one hand, that all who receive the outward means receive the grace, or, on the other hand, that God cannot give the grace otherwise. Hence the emphasis on the need of repentance and faith in those who are baptized; e.g. cf. Ac 2<sup>38</sup> for repentance, 18<sup>8</sup> for faith: 'believed and were baptized'; in 19<sup>4</sup> 'when ye believed' is equivalent to 'when ye were baptized' (πιστευσαντες—ἐβαπτισθητε). One or two references to the early Fathers (out of a large number) will show how strongly they felt this. Repentance and faith are both insisted on by Justin (Apol. i. 61). Origen says that the Spirit may leave the unworthy Christian after baptism (in Joann. vi. 33). Cyril of Jerusalem says that the outward rite will not convey the gift of the Spirit if the candidate does not come in faith (Cat. xvii. 35 ff.). It is equally recognized in Christian antiquity that it is possible for man to receive the grace without the outward sign in cases of necessity. For example, the 'baptism in blood' of unbaptized martyrs is recognized as sufficient by Tertullian, de Bapt. 16, and in the Church Orders (Test. of our Lord, ii. 5; Can. of Hippolytus, xix. [ed. Achelis, 101]; Egyptian Church Orders, 44) and elsewhere. The work of God is mighty, though the instrument is insignificant. Thus Tertullian (de Bapt. 2, 4) remarks on the simplicity of baptism, which makes people disparage the greatness of its effect, not realizing that the Spirit sanctifies the water.

9. Infant baptism.—There is no historical account in the NT of an infant being baptized; but the indirect evidence of the practice is strong. In view of the analogy of circumcision, it would be strange, supposing that infants had been excluded from baptism, that such exclusion should not have been mentioned. If infants needed to be brought into the inferior covenant by the outward sign of circumcision, still more would they need to be brought into the higher covenant by the outward sign of baptism. The Talmud says that infant children of proselytes are to be baptized with their parents (John Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Mt 3<sup>6</sup> in Works, xi. [London, 1823] 53 ff.), and this was probably the custom in the 1st cent. (see above, 2). Our Lord by blessing little children with an imposition of hands (Mk 10<sup>13a</sup> παιδία; Lk 18<sup>15</sup> βρέφη, 'babes') shows that they are capable of receiving grace. In Mt 10<sup>42</sup>, Jesus speaks of giving 'one of these little ones' a cup of cold water 'in the name of a disciple,' i.e. as a disciple (above, 8), showing that infants can be disciples. No limit is placed on the baptismal command of Mt 28<sup>19</sup> ('all the nations,' not 'all the adults'). The households of Lydia, the Philippian jailer, Crispus, and Stephanas, not improbably included some infants, but all were baptized (cf. Ac 16<sup>33</sup>, 'all his'). It is disputed whether 1 Co 7<sup>14</sup> refers to infant baptism (Robertson-Plummer, Com. in loc., think that it does not), but at least it seems to point to the right of children to baptism, for otherwise could they be called 'holy' or 'consecrated' (ἁγια)? Cf. Goudge and Alford, Comm. in loc.

When we turn from the NT to the successors of the apostles, we find that the practice of infant baptism was probably in force at least c. A.D. 69. For Polycarp at his martyrdom (c. A.D. 155: for the date see Lightfoot, Apostol. Fathers, pt. ii. vol. i. [1889] 437 ff.) says that he had served Christ for 86 years. It is extremely unlikely that he was older, or at any rate more than 3 or 4 years older, than this at his death, and he must therefore have been baptized when he was an infant, or at least as a very young child; he seems to have been born of Christian parents (ib.). Justin speaks of men and women of 60 or 70 who had been made disciples (ἐμαθητεύθησαν) from childhood (Apol. i. 15), and compares baptism to circumcision (Dial. 43). Irenaeus (c. Haer. II. xxii. 4) says that Jesus came to save all who through Him are born again to God—infants, children, boys, youths, and old men. He passed through every age, becoming an infant for infants, thus sanctifying infants, etc. Tertullian (de Bapt. 18), who advocates delaying baptism lest it should be rashly administered, especially in the case of infants, bears witness to the common practice of his day. It is to be noted that he does not blame infant baptism as a novelty, as he assuredly would have done had it been such. And thereafter the evidence of its existence is very abundant; see, e.g., Cyprian, Ep. lviii.; Can. of Hipp. xix. (113, ed. Achelis), and all the Church Orders.

It is objected to these arguments that faith is required in the NT for baptism, and that infants cannot have faith. But this is not a true objection. If an adult coming to baptism has not faith, he puts the barrier of non-faith between God and himself; he cannot be in a neutral condition, but, if he does not believe in God, must disbelieve in Him. With an infant it is not so. In the age of innocence he cannot put a barrier between God and himself, and therefore the fact that he has not yet learnt to have an active faith does not preclude the working of the grace of God within him.

LITERATURE.—R. Hooker, Eccl. Pol., bk. v. (ed. Bayne, London, 1902), esp. chs. lviii.-lxvi.; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the New Testament 2, do. 1910, esp. App. I and J; D. Stone, Holy Baptism, do. 1899; A. J. Mason, The Relation of Confirmation to Baptism 2, do. 1893; D. Maclean, The Heavenly Citizenship of Infants, do. 1891; F. H. Chase, Confirmation in the Apostolic Age, do. 1909; A. C. A. Hall, Confirmation, do. 1900; F. E. Warren, Liturgy and Ritual of the Ante-Nicene Church 2, do. 1912; A. J. Maclean, The Ancient Church Orders, Cambridge, 1910; artt. on 'The Lord's Command to Baptize' in JThSt vi. [1904-05], vii. [1905-06], viii. [1906-07], by F. H. Chase and J. A. Robinson; artt. on 'Baptism' in IBDi. (A. Plummer), DCG i. (M. Dods), SDB (C. A. Scott), EBi i. (J. A. Robinson), ERE ii. (J. V. Bartlet, K. Lake, H. G. Wood); art. 'Laying on of Hands' in IBDi iii. (H. B. Swete); art. 'Confirmation' in ERE iv. (H. J. Lawlor and H. Thurston).

A. J. MACLEAN.

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD.—See BAPTISM.

BARAK.—Barak (Βαράκ) was the ally of Deborah in the life-and-death struggle of Israel with the Canaanites. He won the great battle of Kishon (Jg 4. 5). He is named in the roll of the OT heroes of faith (He 11<sup>32</sup>). He was one of those who διὰ πλοῦτος 'waxed mighty in war, turned to flight armies of aliens' (11<sup>34</sup>). JAMES STRAHAN.

BARBARIAN.—The Greeks of the age of independence divided mankind into two classes—Hellenes or Greeks, and Barbarians, the latter term having a special reference to those who did not speak the Greek language and were thus unintelligible to the inhabitants of Hellas. The word itself is almost certainly onomatopoeic, being an imitation of the way in which the peoples seemed to speak. It occurs for the first time in Homer (Il. ii. 867), and is used of the Carians (Καρες βαρβαρῶφωνοι). Plato divides the human race into Hellenes and Barbarians (Polit. 262 D). Even the Romans called themselves Barbarians till Greek literature came to be naturalized in Rome; and both Philo and Josephus regard the Jews and their tongue as barbarous. By and by the word came to be used as descriptive of all the defects which the Greeks thought foreign to themselves and natural to all other peoples, but the first and the main idea conveyed by the term is that of difference of language.

In the NT history of the early Church we find the term used in four different places.—(1) In Ac 28-<sup>4</sup> it is applied by St. Luke to the Phœnician inhabitants of Malta, perhaps with a slight hint of contempt on the part of the author. (2) The Apostle Paul in 1 Co 14<sup>11</sup> refers to the ecstatic speaking with tongues, and declares that if any speak in an unknown tongue, 'I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me.' Here the word is used in the original sense of one who speaks in an unknown tongue. (3) In the statement (Ro 1<sup>14</sup>), 'I am a debtor both to Greeks and to Barbarians,' St Paul uses the common conventional division of mankind; and, like Philo and Josephus, classes the Jews among the Barbarians. (4) In Col 3<sup>11</sup> we have a looser use of the term 'Greek and Jew . . . barbarian and Scythian.' The Apostle has been speaking of the abolition of all distinction in the offer of the gospel, and the classes selected are not mutually exclusive but mentioned with reference to heresies in the Colossian Church (cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians<sup>3</sup>, 1879, p. 216). The Apostle offers the gospel not merely to learned Greeks but to barbarians, and even to Scythians, who are popularly regarded as the lowest type of this class.

LITERATURE.—Grimm-Thayer, s.v.; see also artt. in HDB and EBi. W. F. BOYD.

BAR-JESUS.—In Ac 13<sup>6</sup> Bar-Jesus is described as 'a certain sorcerer, a false prophet, a Jew' whom Barnabas and Paul found at Paphos in the retinue of the proconsul in Cyprus. The comparison of him with 'the modern gipsy teller of fortunes' is 'misleading and gives a false idea of the influence exerted on the Roman world by Oriental personages like this Magian' (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 78); nor can he be called an impostor. He was a representative of a class of men, very numerous in that day, 'skilled in the lore and uncanny arts and strange powers of the Median priests' (cf. HDB, art. 'Barjesus'), who possessed a familiarity with the forces of Nature not shared by their fellows, and which was commonly regarded as supernatural in its origin. They were both magicians and men of science; moreover, their system presented a religious aspect to the world. The presence of an influential exponent of such a current religious and philosophical system in the train of the comites of a Roman governor was quite natural; nor is there any need to suppose that Sergius Paulus (who was 'a man of understanding') was dominated by the Magian in any other sense than that Bar-Jesus had considerable influence and credit with his patron—an influence he was able to turn to his own private advantage. Hearing of Barnabas and Paul as travelling teachers in the island, the governor, a highly educated man, interested in science and philosophy, invited them to his court. He listened with such pleasure to their exposition that it became clear to all his retinue that they were making a marked effect on him. This was a challenge to Bar-Jesus, who had been the dominant religious influence in the court. He took steps to minimize the effect and to retain the governor's interest in himself and his system. The challenge was accepted by Paul, who superseded Barnabas as the chief Christian protagonist at this point. Special interest attached to the incident as an early but typical case of the meeting of two religious systems; it was the first collision of Christianity with the great religious force of Magianism. The result was a striking manifestation of the superior power residing in the Christian missionary, by which Bar-Jesus was struck blind for a season, and which deeply impressed the proconsul in favour of Christianity.

A phrase occurs in v.<sup>8</sup> which has caused perplexity: 'Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation).' All attempts to explain Elymas as the interpretation of Bar-Jesus have failed. This has been used to discredit the historicity of the narrative. Thus Schmiedel says it suggests the 'amalgamation of two sources,' and illustrates the tendency of Acts to establish a 'parallelism between Peter and Paul' (EBi i. 480 f.)—a theory urged by Weizsacker, who considers this portion of Acts 'is far from being historical' (i. 275, 239-240), and finds a proof of double authorship in the use of the two names 'Saul who is also called Paul.' But Ramsay has explained the latter usage most convincingly. It was the fashion in bilingual countries to have two names, the native and the Greek. Amongst Jewish surroundings Paul's Jewish name 'Saul' was used naturally; but 'by a marvellous stroke of historic brevity' (Ramsay, 83) the author sets forth by a formula how in the court of the Roman governor, when the Apostle challenged the system represented by Bar-Jesus, he stood forth as Paul the Roman citizen, a freeborn member of that Greek-Roman world to which he carried his universal gospel. Does not the same explanation hold good for his opponent? Bar-Jesus is a Jewish name—the name of 'a Jew, a false prophet.' Elymas is the man's Greek name. It is the Greek form of an Arab word alim meaning 'wise,' and ô māyos ('the sorcerer,' AV and RV) is its translation. From the Jewish point of view the encounter was between Saul the Jewish teacher and Bar-Jesus the Jewish prophet. From the wider point of view it was between Paul the Roman citizen who championed Christianity, and Elymas the Greek philosopher and magician. It was not only Bar-Jesus the Jewish false prophet whom Paul blinded, but Elymas the Magian, the representative of that Oriental theosophy which Christianity was destined to meet so often. Luke the historian has special interest in describing the first encounter between the systems, and the signal victory won by the Christian Apostle over one who practised the occult arts. Paul probably shared the opinion of educated Judaism, that magic was associated with idolatry and the realm of darkness, and was therefore to be shunned as demoniacal. This explains the vigour of his denunciation.

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB on 'Barjesus' (Massie) and 'Magic' (Whitehouse), and in EBi (Schmiedel) on 'Barjesus'; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, London, 1895, pp. 73-88 (cf. Was Christ born in Bethlehem?, do. 1898, p. 54); C. v. Weizsacker, Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> do. 1897, pp. 80, 111, 240, 274; A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, pp. 174-176; EGT on 'Acts,' 1900, p. 287. J. E. ROBERTS.

BARNABAS (otherwise Joses [AV] or Joseph [RV]).—A member of the primitive Church of Jerusalem and a close associate of Paul in the early years of his Christian career. He is not to be identified with Joseph called Barsabbas (Ac 1<sup>23</sup>), though he is sometimes substituted for him by ecclesiastical writers (see JOSEPH [BARSABBAS]). Information regarding him is mostly derived from Acts. According to 4<sup>36</sup>, the surname Barnabas was given him by the apostles, presumably as an honourable distinction, and signifies 'son of consolation or exhortation' (υἱὸς παρακλήσεως = Aram. bar, 'son,' and Heb. root which appears in nābhi, 'prophet'). This etymology draws upon two different languages, and leaves the terminal form unexplained. Besides, the name may have been self-assumed, in accordance with a common practice of the Jews in their intercourse with the Gentile world. Other derivations therefore have been proposed, which give 'the son of Nebo,' 'the son of peace' (=Aram. bar n'vāhāh), etc., as the meaning. In any case, the statement of Acts implies that Barnabas was noted for his prophetic or preaching gifts; and comparison with 14<sup>12</sup> probably warrants the further inference that he was more fluent in Aramaic than in Greek.

In Ac 4<sup>36f.</sup> Barnabas is introduced as a Levite of Cyprus, who sold land that he possessed, and devoted the proceeds to the use of the Church. No other Levite is mentioned by name in the NT. His ownership of land, in contravention of the law (Dt 10<sup>9</sup>) which excluded Levi from part or inheritance with his brethren, is not surprising, as in later times this Deuteronomic prohibition cannot have been enforced (Jer 32<sup>7-12</sup>; Jos. Vita, 76). From Cyprus the youthful Barnabas may have passed over to the neighbouring Tarsus, famous in his time for its culture as well as its commerce, and there made the acquaintance of Paul. At any rate, he appeared as his friend, and stood sponsor for him on his first visit to Jerusalem, when other members of the Church regarded him with distrust (9<sup>36f.</sup>). Thereafter Paul retired to Tarsus, but Barnabas remained in Jerusalem till tidings reached the mother Church of the success of the gospel in Antioch, when he was commissioned to visit that city and confirm the disciples. Having sought out Paul at Tarsus, he induced him to join him in his work in Antioch. After a year of service there, the two fellow-labourers were dispatched to Jerusalem with alms for the needy Christians of Judaea (11-2-30). Soon after their return to Antioch they were solemnly set apart by the Church for special evangelization work, and started on what is usually called the first missionary journey, in the course of which they visited Cyprus and the southern parts of Asia Minor, accompanied as far as Perga in Pamphylia by John Mark (q.v.)—a relative of Barnabas (Col 4<sup>10</sup>)—whom they had brought with them from Jerusalem. In the account of the journey, the independent character of Paul appears in the precedence gradually accorded him over Barnabas, whose name has previously had first place in the narrative, probably because he had been better known in Antioch and Cyprus. Following upon this mission came a prolonged stay at Antioch, broken at length by another visit to Jerusalem, in consequence of dissensions that had arisen over the necessity of circumcision. A judgment on this question having been obtained from the leaders of the mother Church met in Council, Paul and Barnabas repaired again to Antioch, and began to consult about another missionary journey. As Barnabas, however, insisted on taking Mark with them, in spite of his defection on the previous journey, a sharp contention took place between them, with the result that Paul chose Silas as his companion, and proceeded to Syria and Cilicia, while Barnabas set sail with Mark for Cyprus (12-3-15<sup>41</sup>). There is no further notice of Barnabas in Acts.

Galatians (chs. 1-2) partly covers the same ground as Acts, but between the two narratives a discrepancy appears which has provoked much discussion. Reviewing his association with the Church of Jerusalem, Paul asserts that it did not extend beyond two visits. One of these (1<sup>18</sup>) seems to have been the occasion of his introduction by Barnabas, and the other (2<sup>1</sup>) has usually been identified with the visit to the Council; but, in that case, what becomes of the intervening visit in Acts—that on which Paul and Barnabas conveyed the offerings of the Antiochene Christians? Its comparative recentness and the asseveration of 12<sup>20</sup> preclude the supposition that it could have been forgotten or passed over by the Apostle. One solution of the difficulty is obtained by rejecting entirely the story of this visit in Acts, and taking the rendering of the facts only from Gal. (EBi i. 486). Others endeavour to harmonize the two accounts with a smaller sacrifice of the credibility of Acts. Such is the suggestion of Neander, Lightfoot, and others that, while Paul and Barnabas were both commissioned to carry the contributions from Antioch to Jerusalem, only the latter actually accomplished the journey; and that the author of Acts, finding the record of the appointment in his sources, naturally assumed that Paul had fulfilled his part of the mission. Such also is the view very generally held that the second and third visits of Acts were really one and the same—the visit to the Council recorded in Galatians; but that, as it was undertaken with the twofold object of bearing alms to the poor and discussing circumcision with the leaders of the Church, two accounts of it came into existence which the author of Acts erroneously supposed to refer to separate events. A third form of solution has been advanced by Ramsay and others, which would identify the second visit of Gal. with the second visit of Acts. Recently this view has been ably maintained by C. W. Emmet (The Eschatological Question in the Gospels, Edinburgh, 1911, p. 191 ff.), who also contends that Gal. was written before the third visit of Acts had taken place, that is, before the Council of Jerusalem. On this theory, the accuracy of Acts is fully vindicated, but an early date is required for Galatians, which may not be generally conceded. Cf., further, GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO.

On one point—the parting of Paul and Barnabas—Gal. has been regarded as supplementing Acts. In Paul's account of the trouble with Peter at Antioch over the eating with Gentiles (21<sup>1-14</sup>), his co-worker is represented as taking part with his opponents. Probably, for the moment, the mediating character of Barnabas betrayed him into a policy of vacillation which was the real origin of his disagreement with the Apostle. Their quarrel may have culminated in a separation over John Mark, but its actual cause was a matter of principle. From a subsequent reference of Paul to Barnabas (1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>) it may be inferred that they were reconciled in later years, though not necessarily that they were again associated in their work.

Tradition has been busy with the name of Barnabas, but has preserved little that is deserving of trust. According to one legend, he was a personal disciple of Christ, even one of the Seventy mentioned in Lk 10<sup>1</sup>, and preached the gospel in Rome during the lifetime of our Lord. Another asserts that he was the founder and first bishop of the Church of Milan, though Ambrose makes no mention of him as one of his predecessors in that

see. A third makes him the missionary or apostle to Cyprus, and states that he died by martyrdom at Salamis in A.D. 61. From an early date also the writing of an Epistle has been ascribed to him: (1) the Epistle to the Hebrews, the authorship of which was claimed for him by Tertullian; and (2) the Epistle to which his name has been attached since the time of Clement of Alexandria (see following article). In both cases the internal evidence is strongly against the authorship of Barnabas, such references, for instance, being made to the Jewish Law as were not likely to come from a member of the Jerusalem Church and a sympathizer with Peter at Antioch. McGiffert (Apostol. Age, Edinburgh, 1897, p. 598 f.) argues very ingeniously in favour of Barnabas as the author of 1 Peter; but the reasons adduced by him, though plausible, are scarcely sufficient to establish his theory. There is nothing in the Epistle to necessitate a Levite authorship, and Barnabas need not have remained anonymous (Moffat, LNT, 343 n., 437).

LITERATURE.—In addition to references already given, see works generally on Paul, Acts, Galatians, and the Apostolic Age. D. FREW.

BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF.—1. Object.—The chief object of the author of this Epistle was to impart to his readers a knowledge of what pertains to salvation that they might be saved in the Day of Jesus Christ (ii. 10, iv. 1, 9). The two lessons he impresses upon them are: (1) that the literal observance of the Mosaic Law is useless for salvation; (2) the necessity and duty of a moral life. This is the letter of a true Christian pastor of much moral and spiritual earnestness; he is deeply concerned for the salvation of his flock and desirous of imparting to them the best that he has.

2. Moral interest.—It is only right to emphasize our author's moral and spiritual aims because a large part of what he says, consisting of allegorical interpretations of the Mosaic Law, appears to modern minds strangely unreal and fantastic. But if his letter abounds in allegory, it is only because he is deeply impressed with the idea that the Law, if literally observed, will make shipwreck of men's salvation (iii. 6). His earnest advice is: 'Let us flee from all vanity, let us entirely hate the works of the evil way' (iv. 10; cf. 9). In his closing chapters (xix.-xxi.) he forsakes the allegorical method entirely, and devotes himself to a setting forth of 'the two ways,' the way of light and the way of darkness. The duties of loving, fearing, praising, and obeying God are named first. Then follows a series of injunctions, some negative and some positive in form, concerned chiefly with one's relations to others. A man's neighbour must be loved more than his own soul. The way of the 'Black One' is set forth in the form of a catalogue of vices and evil actions. Only two Commandments are quoted from the Decalogue—the third and the seventh. There is no direct appeal to either the teaching or the example of our Lord.

3. Attitude towards Judaism.—The main interest which the Epistle has for us to-day lies in the light which it throws upon the relations between Judaism and the Church. In order to appreciate the position of this Epistle in early Christian literature, it is necessary to make a brief review of the transition from Judaism to Christianity. Christianity did not come into the world at a point where there was a religious vacuum. It was founded by One who claimed to be the Anointed One of a definite national religion, which had existed for many centuries. He and His apostles believed in the Jewish religion, as the only true religion, used the Jewish Scriptures as the very word of God, and observed the national forms of worship as the Divinely-appointed mode of serving God. How then did His followers ever come to abandon the Law? Did they at any point make a complete break with all that was Jewish and begin afresh on an entirely new basis? By no means; there was no break, but merely a reorganization. The followers of Jesus believed that He, as Messiah, had authority from God to institute a new Covenant between God and His people Israel, and that He actually did so when He offered Himself on the cross as a sacrifice for sin. The logical consequences of this belief were not perceived all at once, but were bound to come to light as time went on.

(1) If the death of Jesus is sufficient to obtain salvation, the observance of the Law cannot be essential any longer. Hence, though believing Jews may continue to observe the Law if they will, there is not sufficient ground for compelling Gentiles who turn to God and believe on Jesus to do so also. This recognition of the Gentiles is the first step in the process, and is the position reached at the Council of Jerusalem (Ac 15). The next step was to admit that it was not necessary for believing Jews to observe the Law, when such observance caused them to separate from their Gentile brethren. This step was being taken during the lifetime of St. Paul (Gal 2nd, 1 Co 9-1). The last step was to condemn all observance of the Law, whether by Jewish or by Gentile believers.

This last step is reflected in the pages of our Epistle. There is, however, this peculiarity about its position: the main stream of Christian thought believed that the Mosaic Law had been given by God to the Jews to be literally fulfilled. Our author, however, does not believe that the Law ever was intended to be taken literally; he says it was uttered in a spiritual sense which the Jews did not understand (x. 9). This error of the Jews was the work of an evil angel (ix. 4; cf. viii. 7); the true spiritual interpretation is known to Christians because God circumcised their ears (ix. 4). This spiritual interpretation of the Law is nothing more or less than a series of allegories. The scapegoat of the Day of Atonement is the type of Jesus who was to suffer (ch. vii.). The prescription that certain animals must not be eaten is explained as meaning that one must have no dealings with certain kinds of evil persons (ch. x.). If Abraham is said to have circumcised 318 men, the real meaning is Jesus and the Cross, because 'in the number 18, I stands for ten, H for eight. Here thou hast Jesus (IHΣΟΥΣ). And because the cross in the T was to have grace, he saith also three hundred. So he revealeth Jesus in the two letters and in the remaining one the Cross' (ix. 8; cf. his treatment of the Red Heifer of Nu 19 in ch. viii.).

This position is supported by citing the prophetic condemnation of the idea that sacrifice and ritual can be made a substitute for a moral life (chs. ii. and iii.). In dealing with circumcision, our author seizes on those passages which speak of a circumcision of the heart (Jer 4th, Dt 10th, Jer 9th), and argues that the Jewish circumcision 'is abolished, for he hath said that a circumcision not of the flesh should be practised' (ix. 4). The six days of creation are in reality 6000 years; hence the true Sabbath cannot be observed until the coming of the Son of God (ch. xv.). Similarly the building of a material Temple was a mistake; the true Temple is a spiritual Temple—the hearts of those with whom God dwells (ch. xvi.); thus all that is outwardly distinctive of the Jewish religion is interpreted in a spiritual sense: distinctions of clean and unclean, circumcision, the Sabbath and the Temple.

(2) Another logical consequence of belief in Jesus as Messiah will further illustrate the mind of our writer. If the Messiah has indeed come in the person of Jesus, then the national religion of the Jews is not destroyed but proved to be the true service of the Living God, and its claim that it had received a direct Divine revelation is not exploded but vindicated by God Himself. Every one who believed in Jesus, believed that He came in fulfilment of promises made by God to the Jewish fathers; hence a Christian believer could not but regard the ancient Jewish Scriptures as the record of a unique revelation and treat them as the very word of God. This, too, is the position of our author; for, though he regards the literal observance of the Law as having been from the very first a fatal mistake, yet all his proofs of this are drawn from the OT itself and from what he believes to be its true exegesis. 'The Lord has made known to us by His prophets, things past and present.' The words of Scripture he constantly quotes as words spoken from the mouth of God (ii. 4, 5, 7, iii. 1, iv. 8, v. 5, 12, etc.; cf. iv. 7, 11, v. 4, etc.). Moreover, he uses the Scriptures to explain the mystery of the suffering of the Son of God. 'How did He endure to suffer at the hand of men? Understand ye. The Prophets receiving grace from Him, prophesied concerning Him' (v. 5, 6, 13, 14; cf. vi. 6, 7, x., xi.). The OT was his only source of authority in religion; he does not appeal to any Christian writing, or even to the words of Jesus; he feels he has fully proved his point if he can show that his doctrine is grounded in the Jewish Scriptures.

(3) If Jesus was the Messiah, He was clothed with full authority to mould the national religious life according to the will of God. Those who refused to believe and obey Him refused to obey and believe God, and by this act of disobedience cut themselves off from the Covenant and the mercies of God. On the other hand, those who did believe God and were obedient to His Messiah, became the true people of God, the New Israel, the present possessors of all the privileges that once belonged to the Jewish nation, and the recipients of all the Messianic blessings. If the purpose of God in creating the world and in calling Abraham had been fulfilled in Jesus, then it was not for the sake of unbelieving Jews but for the sake of the believers in the Messiah that the world had been created and Abraham called. They are the new People and yet the old, for they have been latent in God's intention since the Creation. Thus the Christians denied to the Jews any share whatever in the glorious heritage of the Jewish nation, and claimed it entirely for themselves.

This position throws light upon the mind of our writer. He is sure that the patriarchs from Abraham to Moses stood in a special relation to God and received special promises from Him (v. 7, xiii. 7, xiv. 1). But, whereas St. Paul would say that the physical descendants of Abraham were not cut off from this special relationship until they cut themselves off when they refused to believe in Jesus (Ro 11), our author thinks that they were cut off long before this, as long ago as the day of Aaron's golden calf. A Covenant, he says, was given to Moses to deliver to the Jews, but it was never really received. 'He hath given it (the Covenant), but they themselves were not found worthy to receive it by reason of their sins' (xiv. 1); for, when Moses perceived their idolatry, he cast out of his hands the two tables which he had received in the Mount, and they were broken in pieces (xiv. 1-4, iv. 6-8). St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews know of two Covenants—an old and a new; and the old was in force until the coming of the Messiah (Ro 7th, Gal 3rd, 4th, He 8th). The Epistle of Barnabas says that only one Covenant was ever in force—the Covenant of Jesus.

Our author does not cut Christianity away from all historic connexion with the Jewish past; on the contrary, he denies a place of privilege to the Jews after Mount Sinai, in order to show that that place really belonged to the Christians. There are two peoples—the Jews and the Christians. Of these, the Jews, the elder, are in the position of Esau and of Manasseh, who, though the first-born of their respective fathers, did not inherit the blessing; the Christians, like Jacob and Ephraim, though in each case the younger, have been made the recipients of the promises (ch. xiii.). Accordingly, to our author, the Christians have now come into what was always their own and had never belonged to the nation of Israel. 'Do not then say, "Our covenant remains to them also." Ours it is, but they have lost it in this way for ever, when Moses had just received it' (iv. 6; cf. 8). The Christians are 'the new people' of God (v. 7, vii. 5; cf. xiii. 6), a holy people (xiv. 6), who have been cleansed, forgiven (vi. 11), whose hearts have been redeemed out of darkness (xiv. 5), 'created afresh from the beginning' (xvi. 8), 'a new type' (vi. 11); 'He Himself prophesying in us, He Himself dwelling in us, opening for us who had been in bondage unto death. . . . This is the spiritual temple built up to the Lord' (xvi. 9, 10; cf. vi. 15).

It is not correct, then, to say with Krüger (Hist. of Early Christian Lit., New York, 1897, p. 21) that to the writer of this Epistle 'Judaism was an error with which Christianity could have nothing to do, but which it must reject.' Our author accepts the Jewish Scriptures, the patriarchs, the promises, Moses, and the Law in its (to his mind) correct spiritual interpretation. His animus is against the Jews, not against the Jewish religion; from Sinai onwards they have in reality stood outside that religion; its privileges were always the peculiar property of the Christians, held in reserve for them until the coming of the Messiah.

4. Christology.—In the facts of the earthly life of our Lord the Epistle of Barnabas has but little interest. From incidental notices one gathers that Jesus had performed wonders and miracles (v. 8); that He had chosen twelve apostles to preach His gospel (v. 9, viii. 3); that He was crucified, set at naught and spit upon (vii. 9); that He was given vinegar and gall to drink (vii. 3). It is evident that the writer did not think that his readers stood in need of instruction in the details of the life of Christ.

Nor does he aim at expounding a doctrine of Christ's Person and work; but when one gathers together from different parts of his work the passages which refer to our Lord, one can see that his teaching is in line with that of the Catholic Church. Christ is 'the Beloved' of God (iii. 6, iv. 3, 8). He 'manifested Himself as the Son of God' (v. 9, 11, vii. 9), who was pre-existent, being present at and taking an active part in the Creation (v. 5, 10, vi. 12); One who came among men in the flesh (v. 6, 10, 11, vi. 7, 9, 14, xii. 10); who should not be called Son of David but Son of God, for David himself called him not son, but Lord (xii. 10, 11); who is about to come again, and that quickly, to judge both the quick and the dead (v. 7, vii. 2, xxi. 3).

His teaching on the Atonement belongs to the same early period of Christian teaching. He knows that Christ suffered for us (v. 5, vii. 2) and as a sacrifice for our sins (vii. 3, 5, v. 2), that we might be forgiven, sanctified (v. 1), and saved (v. 10); and that we may reign with Him hereafter when we have been made perfect (vi. 18, 19); that He might annul death, show the resurrection (v. 6) and give us life (vii. 2, xii. 5); that He might sum up the tale of the sins of those who persecuted His prophets (v. 11; cf. xiv. 5). He has no theory of the Atonement and no definition of sacrifice; he is content to show that according to the Scriptures Christ died for our sins and that we are thereby saved.

5. Authorship.—The Epistle is anonymous. Tradition, however, has ascribed it to Barnabas the fellow-worker of St. Paul. Clement of Alexandria quotes it as the work of 'the Apostolic Barnabas, who was one of the seventy and a fellow-worker of Paul' (Strom. ii. 20; cf. ii. 6, 7, 15, 18, v. 8, 10). Origen speaks of 'the Catholic Epistle of Barnabas' (c. Cels. i. 63). Eusebius calls it 'the Epistle of Barnabas,' i.e. the Apostle (HE vi. 14, iii. 25). It seems to have been held in high esteem in Alexandria towards the end of the 2nd cent.; and, since it is found in Codex Sinaiticus beginning on the leaf where Revelation ends, one may conclude that it was once read in churches. In the West it was never regarded as canonical. Eusebius objected to it, and finally its connexion with the NT was severed entirely.

The external evidence is thus wholly in favour of the apostolic authorship. But, coming as it does from a period as late as the closing years of the 2nd cent., this testimony cannot overbalance the weighty considerations drawn from internal evidence which make it impossible to ascribe it to the companion of St. Paul. What we know of the apostolic Barnabas indicates that he took a view of the Mosaic Law wholly different from that reflected in this Epistle. The 'Son of Consolation' belonged to the earliest stage of the Jewish Christian controversy; he was ready to give the Gentiles liberty, but by no means ready to say that the Jews might abandon the Law altogether (Gal 2<sup>13</sup>). It is, of course, quite possible that, after the incident of Gal 2, Barnabas might have come to acknowledge the entire freedom of the Jews, but even this would not bring him into the atmosphere of our Epistle; for here there is no question as to whether a believing Jew may or may not abandon the Law; the main idea is that no Jew, believing or unbelieving, ought ever to have observed the Law at any time, even before Christ came. Such an attitude as this lay altogether outside the purview of the thoughts of St. Paul's companion, if we may judge from what St. Paul tells us of him. And it is difficult to think that any Jew, born under the Law, and nurtured in the stirring traditions of its maintenance in the face of cruel persecution, could come to feel so little enthusiasm for and interest in the national struggles and heroisms that he could sweep them all away as things which never ought to have been. A soul so dead to patriotism was no true Jew. None but an alien could be so unsympathetic to the national history of the Jews.

Not very much more can be added to this. The author was probably one of the class distinguished by a charisma or 'gift' of teaching. Though he disclaims any intention of writing professionally, yet he was conscious of possessing 'some claim to a deferential hearing' (Bartlett, EB<sup>11</sup> iii. 409). Two theories are advanced to account for the ascription of the Epistle to Barnabas. It was the work of a namesake of St. Paul's companion; or, it was known as coming from Alexandria, and hence was ascribed to Barnabas as to one prominent in the early history of that Church.

6. Place.—There is a general agreement among scholars that Alexandria is the probable scene of its composition. The general style and the use of the allegorical method are thoroughly Alexandrian. At Alexandria, again, the Jews were particularly strong, and in constant conflict with the Christians. Hence the bitter opposition to the Jews as a nation, and the anxiety to cut off all sympathy with Jewish practices. It has been observed that there are serious blunders in the descriptions of Jewish rites; our author agrees neither with the OT nor with the Talmud. But possibly his knowledge is derived from Alexandria rather than from Palestine. Kohler, in JE ii. 537, remarks that the letter shows an astonishing familiarity with Jewish rites.

7. Date.—There is much less agreement on the question of the date of the Epistle. It is plainly later than the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70, for it alludes to that event (xvi. 4). Again, it is earlier than the second destruction under Hadrian in A.D. 132; otherwise, as Lightfoot remarks, some reference to this event would have been found.

A closer determination of the date depends mainly on the interpretation of a passage from ch. iv. This chapter contains a warning that 'the last offence' is at hand; for the Lord has shortened the times and the days that His beloved may come quickly. As a proof that the last offence, i.e. the Antichrist, is at hand, the writer quotes a prophecy from the Book of Daniel (Dn 7<sup>24</sup>) to the effect that ten kings shall reign, and after them shall arise a little king who shall subdue three of the kings in one (ὁφ. εἷς). It is evident that the writer thinks that this prophecy has been, in part at least, fulfilled; he has seen something in recent history which corresponds with this vision. Thus much then seems clear; when he wrote this, there had been ten Cæsars on the Imperial throne. Unless we are to omit some of the Emperors from the list—a proceeding for which there seems no justification—the tenth Emperor brings us to the reign of Vespasian. If the 'little horn' had already appeared when the Epistle was written, then we must look for three Emperors subdued by the successor of Vespasian. And this, of course, Titus did not do. Hence it seems better to interpret the little horn as Antichrist, who has not yet been revealed, for this gets rid of the difficulty of finding one Emperor who had already subdued three. The writer found this reference to three kings in his text of the prophecy, and meant to leave it to the future to show who the three were and how they would be overthrown. But no matter how this point is settled, the tenth horn can scarcely be other than Vespasian, and this fixes the date of the Epistle at between A.D. 70 and 79. Another chapter (xvi.) is sometimes referred to as having a bearing on this question. This chapter speaks of a building of the Temple of God. Many commentators, including Harnack, take this as referring to the material Temple at Jerusalem, which they say the Jews expected Hadrian to rebuild. Hence they place this Epistle c. A.D. 120. But this rests on a misinterpretation of ch. xvi. It seems certain that the writer has in view the spiritual Temple built up in the hearts of believers, and hence the passage has no bearing on the question of date (cf. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 241). Certain other considerations, such as the absence of a reference to Gnosticism and the apparent possibility of a relapse into Judaism, have also been brought forward. Suffice it to say that none of these is incompatible with the date given above.

8. Text.—Until the discovery of the famous Codex Sinaiticus (N) in 1862, this Epistle was known only in a Latin translation and in eight Greek MSS. The Latin Version is found in a MS of the 8th cent., but the translation was made from a text supposed by Müller to be earlier than N. It does not contain the last four chapters. The Greek MSS all lacked exactly the same portion of the Epistle—the first five and a half chapters—and joined the remainder of Barnabas on to the end of the Epistle of Polycarp as though it were all one letter. Being thus plainly descended from a common source, they are not independent witnesses for the text. With the publication of N by Tischendorf in 1862 a complete Greek text appeared for the first time. In this Codex our Epistle follows Revelation, and is followed by the Shepherd of Hermas. Another complete Greek MS was discovered in Constantinople by Bryennios in 1875. A good account of the MSS will be found in Harnack's Altchristl. Litteratur, i. 58-61, and in Gebhardt-Harnack's Pat. Apost. Op. i. 2, pp. vii-xx.

9. Integrity.—Attempts have been made by Schenkel, Heydecke, J. Weiss, and others to show that the Epistle contains many interpolations. Hefele, Hilgenfeld, and Gebhardt-Harnack have maintained the opposite. Of special interest is the relation of our Epistle to the Didache (q.v.); for both set forth much the same moral teaching under the title of 'The Two Ways.' Rendel Harris (Teaching of the Apostles, Cambridge, 1888, pp. 17-20) maintains that the writer of Barnabas knew the Didache and quoted it from memory. Harnack, however, seems more successful in showing that the writer of the Didache used and improved upon our Epistle (cf. Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel, Leipzig, 1884, pp. 81-87).

LITERATURE.—English translations will be found in J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 1 vol., London, 1891; The Writings of the Apostolic Fathers, tr. Roberts, Donaldson, and Crombie (= Ante-Nicene Christian Library, i.), 97 ff.; K. Lake, Apostolic Fathers, London, 1912. Reference should also be made to Gebhardt-Harnack, Patrum Apost. Op. i. 2 [Leipzig, 1878], who give a complete list of titles down to 1878 on pp. xlii-xliv; A. Harnack, Gesch. der altchristl. Litteratur, Leipzig, 1893; A. Bardenhewer, Gesch. der altkirchl. Litteratur, Freiburg i. B., 1902-03; J. Donaldson, Apostolic Fathers, London, 1874 (= new ed. of vol. i. of Crit. Hist. of Christ. Lit. and Doct.); W. Cunningham, A Dissertation on the Epistle of St. Barnabas, do. 1877; C. J. Hefele, Pat. Apost. Op. iv. 8 [Tübingen, 1855]; S. Sharpe, Epistle of Barnabas, London, 1880; G. Salmon, Introd. to the NT, London, 1892, pp. 513-519; K. Kohler in JE ii. [1902] 537 f.; W. Milligan in DCB i. [1877] 260 ff.; J. Vernon Bartlet in EB iii. [1910] 408 f.; J. G. Müller, Erklärung des Barnabasbriefes, Leipzig, 1869.

HAROLD HAMILTON.

BARSABBAS.—See JOSEPH, JUDAS.

BARUCH, APOCALYPSE OF.—The subject of this article is a Jewish work composed not long after the Destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, and now preserved only in Syriac. This Syriac is a translation from the Greek, of which only a tiny fragment is extant; the Greek itself seems to have been a translation from an Aramaic or Hebrew original.

The Apocalypse of Baruch was first published as a whole by Ceriani from the Ambrosian MS of the Peshitta OT (6th cent.). The Latin translation appeared in 1866, and the Syriac text in 1871. An English translation with full critical and explanatory commentary by R. H. Charles appeared in 1896. In Patrologia Syriaca, vol. ii. [1907] 1055-1306, M. Kmosko gives the Syriac, together with an amended text of Ceriani's translation. The Greek fragment appeared in 1903 in Oxyrhynchus Papyri, vol. iii. pp. 3-7. By some oversight Kmosko does not notice this important discovery.

1. Contents.—The work professes to be written by Baruch, the scribe of Jeremiah, immediately after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. It does not readily fall into sections, but may be analyzed as follows:

i.-xx. The capture of Jerusalem, and the vindication of God's power and justice in respect to it.

Baruch is miraculously shown the destruction of the wall of Jerusalem by angels and the hiding of the holy vessels* (vi. vii.), after which the Chaldeans enter. Baruch laments over Zion (j. 6-xii. 4); after seven days God reveals to him that justice will be done on the heathen (xiii. 5-12); the Fall of Jerusalem is a step towards the final judgment (xx. 2).

xxi.-xxxiv. Prayer of Baruch, and first Messianic revelation to him.

* Note that the seven-branched candlestick is not included: that was actually carried in triumph by Titus.

The world will last until all the predestined sons of Adam have been born (xxiii. 4, 5). At the end will come the Messiah, the Manna will descend again, and Behemoth and Leviathan will be there for the saints to eat (xxix.). After that comes the resurrection of the dead (xxx.).

Baruch assembles the people and warns them that Zion will be rebuilt and then again destroyed; the tribulation at the end of time is the worse (xxxii. 2, 6).

xxxv.-xlvi. Vision of the cedar and the vine.

The cedar is the Roman Empire, the vine is Messiah (xxxix. 5, 7); in the end the last great heathen ruler will be destroyed by Messiah (xl.).

Baruch again warns the people to keep the Law (xliv. 3, xlv. 5).

xlvii.-lxxvii. Second prayer of Baruch, followed by a revelation to him about the resurrection of the good and the bad, and the vision of the black and the bright waters.

The dead will rise unaltered, but the righteous will then become glorious while the wicked waste away (l. li.). All history is divided into 12 parts: the black waters are the six bad periods, beginning with the Fall ('O Adam, what hast thou done to all those who are born from thee?' xlviii. 42); the bright waters are the short alternating gleams of righteousness, beginning with Abraham (lvi.-lxxii.). At the end the saints will have a glorious time (lxxiii. f.).

Baruch again warns the people to keep the Law: if they do so, those left in the Holy Land will never be removed (lxxvii. 5, 6). To the captive Jews in Babylon he sends a letter by hand (lxxvii. 17), while to the lost Nine-and-a-half Tribes he sends a letter by an eagle (lxxvii. 19 f.).

lxxviii.-lxxxvii. Baruch's letter to the Lost Tribes.

Baruch tells them of the destruction of Jerusalem, announces the approaching end of all things, and exhorts them to keep the Law. 'If we set our hearts straight we shall receive everything that we have lost and more' (lxxxv. 4).

2. Problems raised by the book.—The chief problems connected with the Apocalypse of Baruch are (1) its place in Jewish thought, especially in connexion with 4 Ezra (i.e. '2 Esdras' in the English Apocrypha, which it much resembles); and (2) its literary history in Syriac and the relation of the Syriac text to the underlying Greek. It will be convenient to take this second group first.

(1) Literary history, etc.—The Ambrosian MS is the only one that contains the whole work, but the Epistle of Baruch (chs. lxxviii.-lxxxvii., see above) is extant in several Syriac MSS and found a place in the Paris and London Polyglots. This extract must be of exclusively Jacobite origin: it appears as a sort of Appendix to Jeremiah and is included in the Jacobite Massora. Its readings are inferior to that of the full text preserved in the Ambrosian Codex,* where it is dissociated from Jeremiah and immediately precedes 4 Ezra.

The Syriac style indicates a very early date for the translation. It is idiomatic and flowing, like the Syriac translation of Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History. So full, indeed, is it of genuine Semitic idiom that various perfectly good Syriac phrases have actually been regarded by R. H. Charles as the survival of original Hebrew idioms, persisting through the lost Greek intermediary. Especially is this the case with regard to the use of the infinitive absolute for emphasis, which is quite good Syriac and occurs in the Ev. da-Mepharreshe, though the construction is usually avoided in later forms of the Syriac NT.† And this general impression has been signally confirmed by the discovery of the Oxyrhynchus Fragment. Short as the fragment is, it gives us enough of the Greek text of chs. xii. xiii. and xiv. to tell us in what manner the Syriac translator has gone to work. Especially important is xiii. 12, where the Greek has [υμεῖς γὰρ εὐεργετοῦμενοι ἀὲν ἡχαρισεῖτε (ἀεὶ)],* but the Syriac is 'For always I have been benefiting you, and ye have been denying benefit always.' This sentence sufficiently shows how difficult it would be to reconstruct the Greek from the Syriac of Baruch, and how impossible to argue back to the wording of a hypothetical Hebrew or Aramaic original. At the same time 'denying benefit' (kāphar b'cāibūthā) is actually used for ἀχάριστος in 2 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> and in Lk 6<sup>35</sup> syr.-sin. (not Pesh.): in a word, the Syriac of Baruch is akin in style to the earliest Syriac translations of the NT.

* Here and there the extract is better, e.g. lxxxii. 4, where all the editors rightly prefer 'drop' (= σαγαιον, Is 40<sup>15</sup>) to 'pollution.'

† A good instance is Eus. HE iv. 15. 29, where ταῦτα οὐν μετὰ τοσούτου τάχους ἐγένετο βαττον ἢ ἐλέγετο is rendered in Syriac, 'And these things quicker than they were said were indeed done (mest'aru est'ar).' It is obvious that such a rendering, while perfectly adequate, does not enable us to reconstruct the wording of the original.

The Apocalypse of Baruch contains no formal quotations from canonical Scripture, but several sentences are obviously moulded upon the OT. As Charles has founded an argument on these for a Hebrew original, it is necessary to point out that the evidence is really indecisive. 'The quotations from the OT agree in all cases but one with the Massoretic Hebrew against the Septuagint,' says Charles. In support of this he adduces eight passages. In four of these, however (iv. 2, vi. 8, li. 4, lviii. 1), Baruch agrees with the Peshitta, as we might expect in a work which pays so much attention to Syriac idiom and is so little of a word-for-word rendering of the Greek. In two others ('Thy wisdom is correctness,' xxxviii. 2; and 'fled under Thy wings,' xli. 4) the Syriac does not agree with any biblical text.† The allusion in xxxv. 2 is admitted by Charles to be merely a paraphrase. The remaining passage is lxxxii. 4, 5, where the heathen are said to be 'like a drop' and 'counted as spittle': this agrees with the LXX of Is 40<sup>15</sup> (ὡς σταγὼν . . . ὡς σπένδος), but not with the Hebrew or the Syriac.‡ Thus the biblical allusions in Baruch do not prove that the author was acquainted with the Massoretic text: they merely show that the Syriac translator was familiar with the Peshitta. It is possible, of course, if the Greek be a translation from Hebrew or Aramaic, that the Greek translator changed the wording of lxxxii. 5 to agree with the Greek Bible; but there is no actual evidence which points in that direction. The 'sirens,' the 'Lilith,' the 'devils,' and the 'jackals' of x. 8 are all found in the Peshitta of Is 13<sup>21</sup>, 22 and 34<sup>13</sup>, 14. It should be added that there is nothing to suggest that the Syriac translator of the Apocalypse was a Christian rather than a Jew.

(2) Relation to 4 Ezra.—It is obvious that the Apocalypse of Baruch and that of Salathiel, commonly known as 4 Ezra, have a great deal in common, both in ideas and in language.§ They must have issued from the same circle, if they are not actually the work of the same author. And, further, it is almost certain that they must have been originally composed in the same language, either both in Greek, or both in Hebrew or Aramaic. As has been indicated in the preceding paragraphs, most of the arguments for a Semitic origin of Baruch founded upon the Syriac text are inconclusive; but if the Latin text of 4 Ezra (which is undoubtedly a literal translation of the lost Greek) creates the impression that this Greek was itself a translation, then after all we must regard the Greek of Baruch also as a translation.

* The reconstruction is practically certain, except the last ἀεὶ.

† In xli. 4, Charles translates 'fled for refuge . . .' But 'ἔραγ means 'fled'; the 'taking refuge' which is inherent in the Heb. חָסָה (Ruth 2<sup>12</sup> etc.) is not expressed in the Syriac.

‡ The same comparisons are used in 4 Ezra 6<sup>56</sup>, which must similarly also be considered to show the influence of the Greek Bible.

§ A good account of these resemblances is to be found in H. St. J. Thackeray's art. 'Ezdras, Second Book of,' in HDB i. 763 f. See also G. H. Box in Charles' Apoc. and Pseudepigr. ii. 553 ff.

From the linguistic side the chief arguments concern the names used for God and the occurrence of the infinitive absolute. Beside words which imply Κυριος (as in the LXX), we find Altissimus and Fortis (e.g. 4 Ezra 9<sup>45</sup>) in both works; these must correspond to Ὑψιστος and Ἰσχυρος in the Greek.* Ὑψιστος in a Jewish writing corresponds to ܚܝܝܬ (Aram. ܚܝܬ); but as it was also a name of God in Greek its occurrence proves nothing as to the original language of our book. Ἰσχυρός, on the other hand, is only found as a name of God in translations, and implies ܠܐ (El); it is characteristic of the later Jewish translators Aquila and Theodotion, to a less degree of Symmachus, and not at all of the genuine LXX, which only uses ἰσχυρός as an adjective in the ordinary sense of 'strong' (Ps 71-41<sup>3</sup>). Thus a reader of the Greek Bible would not be likely to use it by itself as a proper name for 'the Almighty.' Its presence in Apoc. Baruch and 4 Ezra must therefore be held to suggest that the Greek texts of these works are translations.

The use of the infinitive absolute points in the same direction. If it were merely attested in Syriac, it might be explained away as an idiom introduced by the translator. But its frequent occurrence in the Latin text of 4 Ezra (e.g. excedens excessit, 4<sup>2</sup>) cannot thus be disposed of, and at present no real example of this idiom is known in works composed originally in Greek, though it is common in translations such as the LXX. The linguistic evidence, therefore, though not quite conclusively, points to a Semitic, and consequently to a Palestinian, origin for both 4 Ezra and the Apocalypse of Baruch. But, as explained above, we are very far from being able to reconstruct the text of this hypothetical Hebrew or Aramaic original (lxiv. 7, 8).

Not only the language, but also the contents, of Baruch favour a Hebrew or Aramaic original. The circle of thought and tradition is throughout Palestinian, and uninfluenced by Greek speculation and culture. The legends incidentally referred to are specifically Jewish, and can be illustrated from the Talmud, such as that of Behemoth and Leviathan created to be the food of the saints (xxix. 4); or the story of Manasseh, who was cast into the brazen 'horse' (i.e. mule), and who, though he prayed from it to God and was delivered, yet was finally tormented.†

3. Integrity.—In what has been said above, the Apocalypse of Baruch has been treated as an organic whole. This has been controverted by Charles, who splits the book up into no fewer than six (or seven) separate fragments, on the assumption that an apocalypticist's anticipations of the future will be clear-cut and self-consistent. But this is hardly to be expected in a work which reflects the mind of an orthodox Jew just after the Destruction of Jerusalem. The Temple with its priests and sacrifices, nay, the very national existence, had been brought utterly to an end by the heathen. The individual Jews that remained were left with nothing but the Law and a tumult of impossible hopes. The author is swayed by his subject. He may believe that the captured city was not the true, the heavenly Jerusalem (iv. 2-6), and that it had been destroyed by the angels of God before the enemy were allowed to capture it (vi.-viii.). Yet the catastrophe is too recent to allow him calmly to contemplate the Fall of Zion, and his lament over the ruins (x. 6-xii. 4) is uninterrupted by any gleam of hope. Surely this is what might be expected in a work of literature, apart from the fact that it is not till later in the book that revelations about the future are given to Baruch.

* The Greek fragment of Apoc. Baruch actually contains the word ἰσχυ(ρῶς).

† Another instance, important from the incidental manner of its occurrence, is in lxxvii. 25, where we read: 'Solomon also . . . whithersoever he wished to send or seek for anything, commanded a bird and it obeyed him.' This is a manifest allusion to the story of the wildfowl by which Solomon sent a letter to the Queen of Sheba at Kiftor (2nd Targum to Esther, i. 2), a legend familiar in Arabic, but not current in Greek.

While, however, absolute consistency is not to be expected, it is necessary to show that the Fall of Jerusalem is assumed all through the book. A Jewish apocalypticist may vary in his anticipations of the future, but after A.D. 70 he could never write as if the Temple were still standing. No great weight, indeed, can be laid on passages like ch. xxvii., where neither the building nor the destruction of the Herodian Temple is mentioned; for the historical situation implied throughout is that of Baruch lamenting over the ruins of the recently destroyed Solomonic Temple, it being obvious that the author often practically identifies himself with Baruch, and his own recently destroyed Temple with the Solomonic. But besides these passages it has been asserted that the present existence of a Temple at Jerusalem is assumed in xxxii. 2ff., lix. 4, and lxviii. 5. On closer examination, however, this is seen not to be the case. Ch. xxxii. is an address by Baruch to the Jews left in the land after the Fall of Jerusalem. He tells them that Zion will be built again (v.<sup>2</sup>); but that building will not last: it will be thrown down and remain desolate, and only afterwards will it be renewed in glory (vv.<sup>2-4</sup>). The whole context shows that it is a prophecy of the re-building of the Temple of Zerubbabel and its subsequent destruction, and we must interpret, or if necessary amend, the wording of v.<sup>2</sup> in accordance with that context. It is literally, 'Because after a little time the building of Zion will be shaken that it may be built again.' Either, therefore, this is an adaptation of Hag 2<sup>6</sup>, Ezk 37<sup>1</sup>, or the word for 'shaken' is a mistranslation for some word like 'set in motion.' In lix. 4 it is said that God showed Moses 'the likeness of Zion and its measurements, made in the likeness of the present Sanctuary.' But this phrase, corresponding to τὰ νῦν ἁγία, does not necessarily mean 'the Sanctuary which is now in good repair'; it need mean no more than 'the modern Temple,' as contrasted with the heavenly Pattern (Ex 25<sup>40</sup>). In lxviii. 5, Baruch is told that Zion will be built again, but in the later predictions of the final troubles before the advent of Messiah no mention is made of its subsequent destruction. But this is not conclusive, as no detailed historical predictions are made in lxix.-lxxiv. 'The Most High . . . alone knows what will befall' (lxix. 2).

In all this it must be borne in mind that Apoc. Baruch is known to us only from a single MS of a not very literal translation into Syriac of a Greek translation of a Hebrew or Aramaic original. It is, therefore, only likely that some minor incoherencies may be due to accidents of transmission. But they are, after all, very few.

4. General point of view.—The Apocalypse of Baruch, then, is here regarded as a unity, and as the work of a Palestinian Jew writing soon after A.D. 70. 4 Ezr. 3-14 may be described in similar terms. We have noticed some of the linguistic connexions between these works.* They coincide also in much of their teaching, in the division of history into 12 parts, in the importance attached to Adam's sin, in the legend of Behemoth and Leviathan, in the interest taken in the Lost Tribes,† in the stress laid on the permanence of the Law.

The chief difference between them lies in the

* Among single phrases, the political situation is reflected in habitatio Hierusalem (4 Ezr. 10<sup>4</sup>) and 'the habitation of Zion' (Bar. lxxx. 7), i.e. 'the fact that Jerusalem, or Zion, was inhabited.'

† It is possible that to this interest the books owed their preservation in Syriac. Edessa itself is situated on 'the other side' of the Euphrates, and those Edessenes who read the psychology of the writers. The fate they anticipate for Israel is similar, but it affects them differently. The author of 4 Ezra is not really a pessimist in the sense of believing that evil is ultimately victorious in this world. The eagle, i.e. Rome, is destroyed in the end; the last act in the world-drama is the glorious 400 years' reign of Messiah. Then comes the other world of full retribution. The scheme satisfies the Most High, who says, 'Let the multitude perish, which was born in vain' (9<sup>2</sup>). The really interesting thing is that it does not satisfy Ezra. 'This is my first and last saying,' says he, 'that it had been better that the earth had not given Adam, or else when it had given him to have restrained him from sinning' (7<sup>46</sup> [116]). 'We are tormented, because we perish and know it. Let the race of men lament and the beasts of the field be glad, for it is better with them than with us; for they look not for judgment, neither do they know of torments or of salvation promised unto them after death' (7<sup>64ff.</sup>).

There is nothing of this arraignment of Providence in the Apocalypse of Baruch. When the author thinks for a moment about the fate of apostate Israelites, he falls into intentional obscurity (xlii. 4, 5). In general, he is quite content to nerve himself to believe that the Mighty One will ultimately make the Israelites triumph in this world, and that, after that, in the world to come, the righteous will be abundantly rewarded and the sinners tormented. His main interests are immediate and practical. He has a definite message for his countrymen. Let those who are left in the Holy Land stay there (lxxvii. 6), and let one and all, especially the exiles, hold fast by the Law, though the Temple be destroyed. 'Zion hath been taken from us, and we have nothing now save the Mighty One and His Law' (lxxxv. 3); but 'if ye have respect to the Law and are intent upon wisdom, the lamp will not fail, and the shepherd will not depart, and the fountain will not run dry' (lxxvii. 16). This is the message of the last of the great series of Jewish Apocalypses. As Daniel shows us what was the spirit that nerved the Hasidim to resist Antiochus, so Baruch lets us see in what frame of mind it was possible for the Rabbis under Johanan ben Zakkai and his successors to sit down and adapt the religion and the hopes of Israel to the times of the long dominion of the Gentiles.

Cf. also art. ESDRAS (SECOND).

LITERATURE.—This is sufficiently indicated in the first paragraph of this article. In addition, since this article was written, the Apocalypse of Baruch has been re-edited by R. H. Charles in The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT, Oxford, 1913, ii. 470-526; but the positions adopted in that edition only differ in unimportant details from the separate edition of 1896, to which Charles frequently refers back for the discussion of details.

F. C. BURKITT.

BASKET.—Two different words for 'basket' are used in connexion with St. Paul's escape from Damascus, one, σφύρις or σφυρίς (Ac 9<sup>25</sup>), being the same as is found in the miracle of feeding the 4000 (Mt 15<sup>37</sup>, Mk 8<sup>8</sup>), the other, σαργάνη, being peculiar to the Apostle's own version of the incident (2 Co 11<sup>33</sup>). The former kind of basket plays an important part in relation to the miracles of feeding, and the argument for its larger size as compared with κόφινος is supported by a reference to its use in facilitating St. Paul's escape (but see DCG, art. 'Basket'). The latter calls for detailed treatment here. It has been thought of: (1) as flexible, coming near the idea of reticule or net; (2) as rigid: either braid-work (used especially of fish-baskets [EBi]), or wicker-work. This last seems to be nearest the truth. In Jewish usage the root כרר (karar) attaches to weaving in the rigid form (e.g. basket-making) as opposed to the flexible (e.g. spinning). One species of work-stool is called כררין. The basket-making industry was located in the neighbourhood of the Sea of Galilee, with headquarters at Scythopolis, and a ready outlet for the manufactured article was found in Damascus (see S. Krauss, Talmud. Archäologie, ii. [Leipzig, 1911] 269 f., where many kinds are specified).

Epistle may have half fancied that the Epistle of Baruch was addressed to their own ancestors.

In the absence of knowledge as to the nature and size of the window (thysis), and other details of St. Paul's escape, we cannot hope to attain to a precise result regarding the structure of the σαργάνη. It need not be said that present-day traditions in Damascus are of little value. Only the lower half of the wall dates possibly from NT times (see EBi, art. 'Damascus'). For the device of letting a person down through a window, see Jos 2<sup>12</sup> and 1 S 19<sup>12</sup>; cf. also Josephus, BJ i. xvi. 4.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

BEAST.—The word appears with three references. —1. It signifies simply an irrational animal (2 P 2<sup>12</sup>); a beast of burden (Ac 23<sup>-1</sup>); an animal used for food (Rev 18<sup>13</sup>), or for sacrifice (He 13<sup>11</sup>); or it is used as symbolizing Nature in its highest forms of nobility, strength, wisdom, and swiftness (Rev 4<sup>6ff.</sup>; cf. Ezk 1 and Is 6). —2. St. Paul writes that he fought with 'beasts' at Ephesus (1 Co 15<sup>32</sup>). If these were actual beasts, then the Apostle, who had come off conqueror in the fight, instead of being handed over to the executioner, was set free by the provincial magistrate (cf. C. v. Weizsacker, Das apostol. Zeitalter, 1886, p. 328 [Eng. tr., The Apostolic Age, i. (1894) 385]; A. C. McGiffert, The Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 280 ff.). The uncertainties and difficulties of this position are, however, so serious that it is commonly abandoned in favour of a metaphorical interpretation, and for these reasons: (a) St. Paul was a Roman citizen; (b) neither in Acts nor in 2 Cor. is there any allusion to an actual conflict with beasts; (c) had he so fought, he would not have survived. Ignatius, referring to his journey to Rome where he was to suffer martyrdom, wrote, 'I am bound to ten leopards, that is, a troop of soldiers . . .' (ad Rom. 5). Some explain St. Paul's allusion by Ac 19; but this tumult was probably later, and such explanation disagrees with 1 Co 16<sup>3-9</sup>. Ramsay alleges a mixture of Greek and Roman ideas—in the Greek lecture-room St. Paul would become familiar with the Platonic comparison of the mob with a dangerous beast, and as a Roman citizen he would often have seen men fight with beasts in the circus (St. Paul, 1895, p. 230 f.). Max Krenkel (Beiträge zur Aufhellung der Gesch. und der Briefe des Apost. Paulus, Brunswick, 1890, pp. 126–152) suggests that Christians used 'beast' (cf. Rev. 13) with a cryptic reference to Rome's power (cf. the four beasts in Dn 8<sup>ff.</sup>). We are certain only that St. Paul referred to some extreme danger from men through which he had passed in Ephesus, of which the Corinthians had heard (P. W. Schmiedel, Hand-Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, Freiburg i. B., 1893, p. 198). —3. In Rev. (11<sup>7</sup> 13<sup>1ff.</sup>) two beasts are described, one (13<sup>1-10</sup>; cf. Dn 7<sup>17ff.</sup>) symbolizing the hostile political world-power of Rome and the kings of Rome as vassals of Satan, the other (13<sup>11-18</sup>) the hostile religious power of false prophecy (cf. 16<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>-20</sup>) and magic, enlisted as ally of the political power—a false Christ or Antichrist, by which the worship of the Cæsar was imposed on the provinces. See, further, art. APOCALYPSE.

C. A. BECKWITH.

BEATING.—The AV uses the word 'beat' to express some form of corporal punishment, without defining the particular mode of infliction. 1. In Ac 5<sup>40</sup> 22<sup>19</sup> when δερω ('to scourge, so as to flay off the skin') is thus translated, the allusion is to the Jewish mode of castigation, inflicted with a leathern scourge, in the former instance by the authority of the supreme Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, in the latter by that of the rulers of the synagogues, or local Sanhedrins, at the instigation of Saul. St. Paul himself, during the period of his apostolic career previous to the writing of 2 Cor., was subjected to this species of chastisement on no less than five occasions (2 Co 11<sup>24</sup>), none of which is referred to in the Acts.

2. In Ac 16<sup>22</sup>, when ραβδίζω is rendered by the verb 'beat,' the allusion is to the Roman punishment with rods. In defiance of the Roman Law, which exempted every citizen from the disgrace of being scourged with rods or whips, the dumvirs at Philippi subjected St. Paul and Silas to this cruel form of maltreatment. St. Paul suffered from two other inflictions of the same sort, regarding which the Acts is silent.

3. In Ac 18<sup>17</sup> 21<sup>3</sup> the verb τύπτω is used to denote another mode of beating, namely, that inflicted by mob violence. In the case of Sosthenes, the assault, apparently by members of the Greek lower order, entailed no danger to the life or limb of the victim. In St. Paul's case, on the other hand, the onslaught by the fanatical Asiatic Jews was of such a violent character that nothing but the timely intervention of the Roman tribune prevented a fatal result.

See, further, art. SCOURGING.

W. S. MONTGOMERY.

BEAUTIFUL GATE.—See TEMPLE and DOOR.

BED, COUCH.—In the relevant section of the NT four different Greek words are translated 'bed.' In He 13<sup>1</sup>, where the imperatives of the RV should be noted, the marriage-bed (κοίτη) is referred to, and is synonymous with the state of marriage itself. In Rev 2<sup>22</sup> the clause βάλλω αὐτὴν εἰς κλίνην is to be taken metaphorically, representing the enforced recumbent position of the sick (cf. Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 7<sup>30</sup>, also Mt 8<sup>6-14</sup>), paralleled in the same verse by εἰς θλίψιν μεγάλην, the portion of τοὺς μοιχεύοντας μετ' αὐτῆς.

The remaining instances are concrete, involving κλινᾶριον ('beds') and κραβάττων ('couches') in Ac 5<sup>13</sup>, and κραβάττου (this time translated 'bed,' both in AV and RV) in Ac 9<sup>38</sup>. Regarding the former of these we find that κλινᾶριον, the reading of the principal MSS, has replaced an earlier κλινῶν. κραβάττων (Vulg. grabatis) has equal MS authority with κλινᾶριον, but κραβάττου (and κραββάτου) are alternative spellings, particularly in Ac 9<sup>38</sup>. It is difficult to distinguish between the two kinds of beds. κλινᾶριον is a 'small bed,' with or without reference to structure. In Jewish usage κράβατος appears to be descriptive, and to have some connexion with the bands of leather that were used to fill up the framework, by means of which a couch or seat by day could be converted into a bed by night. It is equated to σκιμπος, σκιμπόδιον, which is defined as a mean bed for accommodating one person (Grimm-Thayer), but may with equal propriety be taken as akin to couch or sofa (see S. Krauss, Talmud. Archäologie, i. [Leipzig, 1910] p. 66). Each kind was portable, and to this end a framework of some sort would have been of service, but was not essential. Meyer justly refuses to accept a distinction which makes the one word mean a soft, costly bed, and the other a poor, humble one. The story of Æneas (Ac 9<sup>33-34</sup>) suggests the presence of soft materials, which could be smoothed out (στρώσω; cf. Mk 14<sup>15</sup>). The references to bed and couch are indicative of simplicity, not to say poverty (cf. the fenum, bed of hay, characteristic of the Jews [Juvenal, Sat. iii. 14 and vi. 541]).

The refined and luxurious modes that without doubt prevailed in the Græco-Roman world are only matter of inference from Rev 18<sup>1</sup>.

Although there is no mention of bed in Ac 12<sup>8</sup>, the passage may be cited as affording a vivid picture of one rising up from sleep, ungirt, with sandals put off, and the upper garment laid aside or perhaps having been used as a covering by night. The passage He 11<sup>21</sup> may reasonably be brought within the scope of this article, since it is likely that 'staff' should be rendered 'bed' (cf. Gn 47<sup>31</sup>). See article STAFF.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

BEGINNING AND END.—See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

BELIAL, BELIAR.—This word occurs only once in the NT (2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>). To understand its meaning there we must trace its use in the OT. The word is Hebrew (בְּלִיַּל), but its etymology is uncertain. The ordinary derivation (from בְּלָא, 'without,' and rt. לַץ, which in Hiph. לִיץ — 'to profit') seems to be the best, and this makes the word mean 'worthlessness.' But T. K. Cheyne (Expos., 5th ser., i. [1895] 435 ff.; cf. also art. 'Belial' in EBi) makes it mean 'one may not ascend' (so suiting Sheol in Ps 18<sup>4f</sup>; see below), or 'hopeless ruin.' The Talmud makes it mean 'without the yoke' (עַל בְּלִיַּל). The Syriac lexicographers (see R. Payne Smith, Thesaur. Syr., Oxford, 1879-1901, i. 534) understand it to mean 'prince of the air'; they seem to have derived it from בְּלָא, ba'al, 'lord,' and the Syriac ܐܝܪ = āḥr, 'air.' But the last two derivations are certainly wrong.

Taking the meaning 'worthlessness,' we note that the ordinary use of 'Belial' in the OT suits it very well; 'sons of Belial' or 'men of Belial' means 'worthless or wicked men,' according to the common Hebrew idiom which substitutes a genitive for an adjective. The word is, however, twice used in the OT as a quasi-proper name. In Ps 18<sup>4f</sup> we read of 'the cords of death,' 'the floods of Belial,' 'the cords of Sheol,' 'the snares of death'; here Belial = the under world. Again, in Nah 1<sup>3</sup> we read that Belial shall no more pass through Judah; he is utterly cut off. In this passage Belial almost exactly corresponds to the 'man of lawlessness, the son of perdition' of St. Paul (2 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, on which see Milligan, Thessalonians, London, 1908).

In 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>, where the best MSS (B C L P N) and most of the VSS (but not the Vulgate) read 'Beliar' rather than 'Belial' (Peshitta 'Satan,' but the Harklensian Syriac 'Beliar'), the word is used as a proper name = Satan, or else Antichrist, Satan's representative. This use of the word is found frequently in the literature of the period. In the Test. of the XII Patriarchs (Benj. 3), Belial is the 'aerial spirit' (see AIR), and frequently in this book (c. A.D. 100?) is identified with Satan. In the Sibylline Oracles (iii. 63, 74, where the reference to the 'Augustans' or Σεβαστηνοί shows the passage to be a later interpolation, probably of 1st cent. A.D.; see also ii. 167), Belial is Antichrist. In the Ascension of Isaiah (iv. 2), Beliar is 'the great angel, the king of this world.' This work in its present form is probably not later than A.D. 100.

There are many forms of this name, chiefly due to the phonetic interchange of liquids: Belial, Beliar, Beliam, Belian, Beliab, Belias, Berial.

LITERATURE.—W. Baudissin in PRE<sup>3</sup> ii. [1897] 548, and in ExpT viii. [1896-97] 360, 423, 472, ix. [1897-98] 40; T. K. Cheyne in Expositor, 5th ser., i. [1895] 435, in ExpT ix. 91, 332, also in EBi, s.v.; P. Jensen in ExpT ix. 283; F. Hommel in ExpT ix. 567; W. Bousset, Der Antichrist, Göttingen, 1895, pp. 86, 99; R. H. Charles, Ascension of Isaiah, London, 1900, pp. ii, 6; Levi-Kohler in JE ii. 658.

A. J. MACLEAN.

BELIEF.—See FAITH.

BELOVED (ἀγαπητός, sometimes ἡγαπημένος; ἀγαπητός is also sometimes translated in EV 'dearly beloved' [Ro 12<sup>19</sup>] or 'well beloved' [16<sup>3</sup>, 3 Jn 1<sup>1</sup>]).—In the NT outside the Gospels 'beloved' is found as (a) a description of Christ, (b) a description of Christians.

(a) For the first usage, cf. Eph 1<sup>6</sup> (ἡγαπημένος); also 2 P 1<sup>17</sup>. This is my beloved (ἀγαπητός) Son, in whom I am well pleased.' The latter is a quotation from the gospel story (cf. Mt 17<sup>5</sup>).

(b) As applied to Christians the term is much more frequent. Sometimes it refers to their relation to God. 'ἀγαπητοὶ θεοῦ' is applied to Christians as being reconciled to God and judged by Him to be worthy of eternal life' (Grimm-Thayer, s.v. ἀγαπητός). Cf. Ro 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>4</sup>, Col 3<sup>12</sup> (the Gr. in the last two cases is ἡγαπημένος). The commonest usage, however, is in reference to the mutual relations of Christians one to another; cf. Philem 1<sup>6</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>2</sup>. 'Hence they are often dignified with this epithet in tender address, both indirect (Ro 16<sup>5, 8</sup>, Col 4<sup>14</sup>) and direct (Ro 12<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>14</sup>, He 6<sup>9</sup>, Ja 1<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>1</sup>)' (Grimm-Thayer). Particularly noteworthy is the phrase ἀγαπητός ἐν κυρίῳ (Ro 16<sup>8</sup>). In the sub-apostolic literature we find similar usages. ἡγαπημένος is used of Christ in Barn. 3<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>8</sup> (some place this work in the 1st cent. A.D., though a 2nd cent. date is more usual). In 1 Clem., which is generally admitted to be of the 1st cent., we have ἀγαπητός of the relation of Christians to God (8<sup>5</sup>); while in the same epistle it is also found of the mutual relation of Christians to one another, and was a mode of address: 'beloved' (1<sup>1</sup> 5 etc.). Cf. also Barn. 4<sup>19</sup>.

Origin and significance of the above usage.—In reference to Christ the origin of the term ἀγαπητός (ἡγαπημένος) is in Is 42<sup>1</sup>. As a name of our Lord it is parallel with ἐκλεκτός: both belong to the original Messianic stratum of early Christian theology, which, when set in opposition to the later developed 'pneumatic' Christology, receives the name of 'adoptionist.' Such opposition is, however, not necessary, as is shown by the occurrence of the term in Ephesians along with a highly developed Christology.

The use of ἀγαπητός to describe Christ is, however, undoubtedly closely associated with the description of Christians as ἡγαπημένοι θεοῦ. Cf. Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr., London, 1894-99, i. 185, note 4, where it is pointed out that 'Barnabas, who calls Christ the "Beloved," uses the same expression for the Church.'

As regards the usage in reference to the mutual relation of Christians one to another, the only points which need comment are its frequency, and the evidence this affords of the spirit of brotherhood which characterized the Primitive Church.

ROBERT S. FRANKS.

BENEDICTION (εὐλογία, benedictio).—This term has in the NT all the senses of berākāh in the OT. It signifies: (a) praises given to God or Christ (Rev 5<sup>12, 13</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>, Ja 3<sup>10</sup>); (b) in a sense exclusively biblical, favour or blessing from God (He 6<sup>7</sup>); (c) a blessing asked for (He 12<sup>17</sup>); (d) the blessing of the Christian gospel or calling (Ro 15<sup>29</sup>, Gal 3<sup>14</sup>, Eph 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>9</sup>); (e) the gifts or temporal goods bestowed on others (2 Co 9<sup>9</sup>); (f) by a figure, the cup of the Lord's Supper, on account of the thanksgiving and praise offered in connexion with it (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>); (g) the fine and flattering speeches (Ro 16<sup>18</sup>) used by false teachers to lead away Christians—the only place in the NT where the word has its classical sense. It is the thought of the Apostle that Christianity is specially a religion which leads its followers to help and bless others (Ro 12<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>12</sup> 14<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>9</sup>)—an altruistic faith which reminds one by contrast of the luxuriant use of anathema and excommunication in the Middle Ages. From the verb εὐλογεῖν has come the purely biblical and ecclesiastical word εὐλογητός, Vulg. benedictus, 'blessed,' which is the LXX translation of bārūk, participle of bārāk. God is called thus because praises are made to Him and He is the source of blessings (Ro 1<sup>28</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>3</sup> 11<sup>31</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>).

The word 'benedictions' is more commonly used of those well-wishings or spiritual blessings in Christ which form such a characteristic part of the closing sentences of the Epistles of the NT, especially those of St. Paul. One of these benedictions, under the title of the Apostolic Benediction, has passed into use in the public worship of many Churches of Christendom. Let us take these sentences in chronological order. (1) 'The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you' (1 Th 5<sup>3</sup>). The verb in these greetings is omitted, but it is better, with nearly all scholars, to interpret them as prayers, and so supply εἰν, than as declarations and supply ἔστί.* The usual closing good wish in the letters of this period was εἰρωσο or εἰρωσθε = vale, 'farewell,' lit. 'be strong.' With St. Paul everything was looked upon from the standpoint of Christ, and even courtesies were to receive a new significance. (2) 'The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all' (2 Th 3<sup>18</sup>). This is preceded by a statement that the greeting is added by St. Paul in his own handwriting, and that this will be a constant custom as a certificate of genuineness. Compare the σσημειώμαι ('I have noted [or written, or sealed]'), generally contracted into σση, with which many of the Egyptian papyrus letters and ostraca close,† or the postscript in one's own handwriting (ἐνυμῶλον) which guaranteed an ancient letter.‡ (3) 'The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit, brethren. Amen' (Gal 6<sup>18</sup>). The word 'spirit' is added as in keeping with the emphasis on spirit in the letter, and the word 'brethren' is given as a token of St. Paul's affection in closing an Epistle in which he had to use stern rebuke. (4) 'The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. My love be with you all in Christ Jesus. Amen' (1 Co 16<sup>3-4</sup>). The second clause is peculiar here. It is explained by the fact that St. Paul had been compelled to use censures, and he wished the Corinthians to know that his love was still abounding towards them. It never failed (13). It was, as Chrysostom says, 'something spiritual and exceedingly genuine.' But that love is only in the sphere of Christ, so that everywhere the verb of desire (εἶν) is to be understood, as in the strict sense St. Paul could not love those who did not love the Lord (v.<sup>2</sup>) or who destroyed God's temples (3<sup>17</sup>). § P. Bachmann speaks of St. Paul's final benediction here in these fitting words: 'So ends a sound of faith, of hope and of love out of the deepest soul of the writer, and after such changing and manifold discussions he turns in his conclusion to the sentiment of his friendly and warm beginning.'|| (a) 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all' (2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>). The genitives here are subjective. It is the love which God has to us. This is always the use of St. Paul after ἀγάπη, 'love' (Ro 5<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>39</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>13</sup> etc.). It is not communion with the Holy Spirit as an object, but a communion belonging to the Spirit, of which the Son is the founder and centre, and of which the Spirit is the means and vital force. The verse prays for a holy fellowship in the Divine life mediated by the Spirit, and it is a fitting conclusion to an Epistle agitated by strife. This triple benediction is well called by Bengel a 'striking testimony' to the Holy Trinity. 'It offers,' says J. H. Bernard, 'a devotional parallel to the Baptismal Formula of Mt 28<sup>19</sup>; and the order of its clauses receives its explanation in the later words of St. Paul in Eph 2<sup>18</sup>. It is the Grace of Christ which leads us towards the Love of God, and the Love of God when realised through the Spirit's power, promotes the love of man (1 Jn 4<sup>11</sup>), the holy fellowship fostered by the indwelling Spirit.* The passage is one of the many evidences of how thoroughly part of the consciousness of the first Church were those ideas out of which grew the completely developed doctrine of the Trinity. That doctrine was thus not a deposit of Greek speculation on Jewish ground, but was the expression of the innermost life and thought of Christians from the beginning. At least it was of St. Paul, and in this respect he never had to defend his views. His view of the Son and Spirit as having their roots in the eternal life of the Godhead was taken as a matter of course by both Jewish and Gentile Christians. He never had to support the words of 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup> against the charge of blasphemy. Their relegation of Christ and the Spirit to a substantial equality with God apparently offended no Christian sentiment.

J. Weiss recognizes this fact, and acknowledges that a growth in the estimate of Christ by the early Christians is hardly to be traced. It started at the full. He says: 'There is hardly a trace of gradual development; almost at once the scheme of the Christology was completed; already in the New Testament the principal conceptions of the later dogma are essentially present, though to some extent only in germ; and there one detects already all the difficulties, which the later church had to face. . . . This regarding of God and Christ side by side, which exactly corresponds to the enthronement of the two together, is characteristic of primitive Christian piety. . . . The historian is bound to say that Christianity from its earliest beginnings, side by side with faith in God as Father, has also proved the veneration of Christ to be to it a perfectly natural form of religion. . . . The early Christians . . . believed that they were acting in complete accordance with Christ's mind, when they adored him and sang hymns to him quasi Deo.'†

(6) 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you' (Ro 16<sup>20</sup>). (7) 'Grace be with you' (Col 4<sup>18</sup>). Notice the brevity. Von Soden speaks of the 'Lapidarstil' of the Epistle. (8) 'The grace of our [some authorities, 'the'] Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen' [best authorities omit 'Amen'] (Philem<sup>5</sup>). (9) 'Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith, from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in uncorruptness' (Eph 6<sup>3-4</sup>). St. Paul's benedictions are usually addressed directly to the reader, but here the third person is used, as is appropriate in a circular letter. Wieseler thinks that 'brethren' refers to the Jewish Christians and 'all' to the Gentiles, but this idea is fanciful. 'Peace' here is not simply a salutation of well-wishing, but has the Christian connotation of that peace which comes from reconciliation with God. Both peace and love go with faith, which is always presupposed in making the Christian. The 'love' is not Divine love but brotherly love, which shows itself where faith is, and through which faith works (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). The primal cause and fountain is God the Father, the mediate and secondary is Jesus. This is always the order with St. Paul, and must be in Christianity if it is a monotheistic religion. 'Grace': it is the grace, besides which there is no other—the loving favour of our God.‡ The 'incorruptness'

* For an able defence of the contrary view (ἔστι), see J. J. Owen in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1862, p. 707 ff.

† G. Milligan, St. Paul's Ep. to the Thessalonians, 1908, p. 130.

‡ Deissmann, Licht vom Osten, 105 (Eng. tr., Light from the Ancient East, 1911, p. 153).

§ G. G. Findlay, EGT, '1 Cor.' 1900, p. 953. See also the excellent remarks of Robertson-Plummer, 1 Cor. (ICC, 1911), p. 402.

|| Der erste Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, Leipzig, 1905, p. 480.

* EGT, '2 Cor.' 1903, p. 119.

† Christ: The Beginnings of Dogma, Eng. tr., 1911, pp. 12, 47, 48.

‡ See excursus on χάρις and χαριτόν in J. A. Robinson, Ephesians, 1903, pp. 221-225.

(ἀφθαρσία) does not at all mean 'sincerity' as in AV, but imperishableness (cf. Ro 27, 1 Co 15<sup>42, 50</sup> etc., 2 Ti 1<sup>10</sup>), and refers to the quality of their love. They have taken hold already of that endless and unbroken life in which love has triumphed over death and dissolution.* The true Christian's love is like God's, eternal, and it is directed towards, not simply God the Father (that is a matter of course), but towards Jesus, who with the Father is the object of his faith, hope and love, that is, of his worship. (10) 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit' (some MSS, but not the best, 'with you all') (Ph 4<sup>3</sup>). The chronological order of the rest of the Epistles is not so certain. We follow that of Zahn. (11) 'Peace be unto you all that are in Christ' (1 P 5<sup>14</sup>). 'Peace': the simple Hebrew salutation proper in St. Peter's autograph. (12) 'Grace be with you' (1 Ti 6<sup>1</sup>). The same as in Col.; some MSS read 'with thee.' The plural in itself is not sufficient to show that the Epistle was intended for the Church as a whole. 'The study of papyrus letters,' says J. H. Moulton,† 'will show that singular and plural alternated in the same document with apparently no distinction of meaning.' (13) 'The Lord be with thy spirit. Grace be with you' (2 Ti 4<sup>22</sup>). 'Lord' here means Christ, as generally in the Epistles. See Grimm-Thayer with references. Close personal association between Jesus and Timothy is prayed for. (14) 'Grace be with you all' (Tit 3<sup>15</sup>). (15) 'Grace be with you all. Amen' (He 13<sup>20</sup>). (16) 'Peace unto thee' (3 Jn 1<sup>4</sup>). This is a Jewish greeting; cf. Jn 6<sup>3-19</sup>. (17) 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with the saints' (Rev 22<sup>4</sup>). On the true reading see textual note in EGT and the references there given. Moffatt thinks this sentence was used at the close of the reading in worship, and from that custom slid into the text here. 'Apocalypses were sometimes cast in epistolary form, used in worship, and circulated by means of public reading.'‡ It will be seen from the above that in apostolic times there was no stereotyped form of benediction, just as there was not either then or later any stereotyped form of public worship.

We extend the list to a few benedictions in extra-canonical Epistles in or near apostolic times. (18) 'The peace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you and with all men in all places who have been called by God and through Him, through whom be glory,' etc. (Clement of Rome, Ep. to Corinthians, 65 [A.D. 97]). (19) 'The Lord of glory and of every grace be with your spirit' (Ep. of Barnabas, 21 [A.D. 75-130, date uncertain]). Ignatius gives nothing like the apostolic benedictions, but the simple: 'Fare ye well in God the Father and in Jesus Christ our common hope' (ad Eph. 21), 'Fare ye well in godly concord' (Mag. 15), 'Fare ye well unto the end in the patient waiting for Jesus Christ' (Rom. 10), 'Fare ye well in Christ Jesus our common hope' (Phil. 11), 'Fare ye well in the grace of God' (Smyr. 13), and 'Fare ye well in the Lord' (ad Pol. 8).

The Aaronitic benediction (Nu 6--26), though always used in the synagogue, does not appear in our ancient sources or in any Church liturgy (except in the Spanish) until Luther introduced it in his Mass (1526). It was also used in the German Protestant Masses. For the use of benedictions in later Church history, see the articles in PRE<sup>3</sup> ii. 588 ff.; DCA i. 193 ff.

LITERATURE.—See the brief but excellent article in F. Vigouroux, Dict. de la Bible, Paris, 1891-99, i. 1581-83; W. J.

* J. A. Robinson, op. cit. 137-138, gives a long discussion. See also almost any scientific commentary, like Meyer, Lange, Ellicott, Alford, etc.

† Expositor, 6th ser., vii. [1903] 107.

‡ See Moffatt, EGT, 'Revelation,' 1910, p. 493 f.

Yeomans in Princeton Rev. xxxiii. [1861] 286-321; J. H. Bernard in Expositor, 6th ser., viii. [1903] 372 ff.; and the works mentioned above.

J. ALFRED FAULKNER.

BENJAMIN.—See TRIBES.

BEOR.—Beor, the father of Balaam, is named in 2 P 2<sup>15</sup> (AV, with some ancient authorities, Bosor, which may be a corruption of Pethor [Grotius], or may be due to the Greek sibilant taking the place of the Heb. guttural [Vitringa]). Balaam by his great wisdom became vain, so a fool (ben bē'ôr), said Jerus. Targ. to Nu 22<sup>9</sup>; cf. JE ii. 468; C. Vitringa, Observ. Sacrae, i. 936 f. W. F. COBB.

BERENICE, BERNICE (Ac 25<sup>13, 23</sup> 26<sup>30</sup>).—Berenice, eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., was born in A.D. 28, and early betrothed to Marcus, son of Alexander who was alabarch at Alexandria. On the death of Marcus, Berenice was given by her father to his brother and her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis, in the Lebanon. Two sons were the issue of this marriage. Herod of Chalcis died in A.D. 48. Berenice then joined her brother, who was to be known later as Herod Agrippa II., at Rome. The pair obtained an infamous notoriety, and are pilloried by Juvenal (Sat. vi. 156 ff.). After a considerable interval, Berenice 'persuaded Polemon, who was king of Cilicia, to be circumcised, and to marry her' (Jos. Ant. xx. vii. 3). This union was soon terminated by the return of Berenice to Agrippa. The two are next heard of on the occasion of their visit to Caesarea to greet the newly arrived Procurator Festus. Of Berenice's part in the interview with the Apostle Paul we are told only that she appeared 'with much display.' Just before the outbreak of the insurrectionary movement in A.D. 66 she was at Jerusalem 'to perform a vow which she had made to God' (Jos. BJ ii. xv. 1), and availed herself of the opportunity to beseech the Procurator Florus to abate the cruelties which were goading the Jews to war. When hostilities commenced, Agrippa and his sister took throughout the side of the Romans. This brought them into contact with Vespasian and Titus. Titus became enamoured of Berenice. On his return to Rome, he had her to live with him in his palace—to the scandal of the Roman populace (Dio Cass. lvi. 15). The intrigue was not continued after the accession of Titus to the Imperial throne in A.D. 79. 'Berenicen statim ab urbe dimisit invitum' (Suet. Titus, vii.). From that time Berenice is lost to view. A fragment of an inscription in her honour at Athens gives no indication of time or occasion. G. P. GOULD.

BERCEA.—Berœa (Βέροια, some MSS Βέροια) was a city of Southern Macedonia, in the district of Emathia (Ptol. iii. 12). It stood on the lower slope of Mt. Bermios (Strabo, vii. Frag. 26), and commanded an extensive view to north, east, and south over the plain of the Axios and the Haliacmon. Its streets and gardens were abundantly watered by rills from an affluent of the latter river. Five miles to the S.E. of the town the Haliacmon broke through the Olympian range to enter the plain. Berœa was about 50 miles S.W. of Thessalonica, 30 miles S. of Pella, and 20 miles W. of the Thermaic Gulf. Its name survives in the modern Verria or Kara-Verria, which is one of the most pleasant towns in Rumili (Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, iii. 290 ff.).

To this city St. Paul and Silas withdrew when their converts, solicitous for their safety, sent them away from Thessalonica (Ac 17<sup>10</sup>). It was an out-of-the-way town—oppidum devium (Cic. in Pis. xxxvi. [89])—and therefore a suitable place of retreat for the apostles, who continued to hope that the obstacles at Thessalonica would soon be removed and that they would be enabled to return—a hope which was not realized (1 Th 2<sup>18</sup>). Their city of refuge, however, proved a sphere of successful missionary activity. It was large and prosperous enough to have attracted a colony of Jews, whom the historian commends as more noble in spirit (ευγενέστεροι) than those of Thessalonica, comparatively free from jealousy, less fettered by prejudice, more receptive of new truth. They daily examined the Scriptures (τὰς γραφάς)—especially, no doubt, the passages brought under their notice by the preachers, but not these alone—to find if the strange things taught found confirmation there, with the result that many of them believed (Ac 17<sup>1</sup>). Nor were the labours of the apostles confined to the synagogue. It is stated that ‘of the Greeks and of those of honourable estate, men and women in considerable numbers believed’ (v. 12). This is the true rendering of the Greek words (καὶ τῶν Ἑλληνίδων γυναικῶν τῶν εὐσχημόνων καὶ ἀνδρῶν οὐκ ὀλίγοι) rather than that in the RV, ‘also of the Greek women of honourable estate, and of men, not a few.’

St. Paul’s residence in Berea probably lasted some months (W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul, 1895, p. 234). For the searching of the Scriptures daily (το καθ’ ἡμέραν), for the preaching of the gospel in the city as well as in the synagogue, and the consequent conversion not only of ‘many’ Jews but also of ‘not a few’ Gentiles, a considerable time was required. St. Paul would doubtless be slow to move farther south, and thereby put a longer distance between himself and Thessalonica, where his heart was. At length, however, malicious Jews came all the way from that city to Berea, and so stirred up the baser passions of the crowds (σαλευντες τοὺς ὄχλους), that the Christians thought it advisable to send St. Paul forth ‘to go as far as to the sea’ (not ὡς but ἕως ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν being the true reading in v. 14). That he was the real object of hatred is indicated by the fact that Silas and Timothy could safely remain behind (v. 14). Contrary to his usual practice, the historian does not name the seaport of Berea, but it was probably from the town of Dium, the great bulwark of the maritime frontier of South Macedonia, that St. Paul and his escort set sail for Athens (v. 15). Sopater, who is mentioned in Ac 20<sup>4</sup> as one of St. Paul’s later associates, was a Berean. There is a tradition (Ap. Const. vii. 46) that Onesimus was the first bishop of the Church of Berea.

LITERATURE.—W. Smith, DGRG i. [1856] 393; E. M. Cousinery, Voyage dans la Macédoine, 1831, i. 57 ff.; Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, i. 399 ff.; T. Lewin, St. Paul, 1875, i. 235 ff.; W. M. Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, 1835, iii. 290 ff. JAMES STRAHAN.

BERYL.—Beryl (βηρύλλος [Rev 21<sup>0</sup>], a word of unknown etymology) is a mineral which differs little from the emerald except in colour. It never exhibits the deep rich green of that gem, being in general pale green, and sometimes yellowish, bluish, brownish, or colourless. Its finer varieties, which are transparent, are called aquamarine. It usually takes the form of long six-sided prisms, vertically striated. It was much prized as a gem-stone by the ancients, and very fine specimens of Greek and Roman engraving in beryl are extant. Its great abundance in modern times has depreciated its value. In RVm of the OT, ‘beryl’ stands for shōham, which Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 620<sup>b</sup>) identifies with green felspar.

JAMES STRAHAN.

BIGAMY.—See MARRIAGE.

BIRTHRIGHT.—See FIRST-BORN.

BISHOP, ELDER, PRESBYTER.—The origin of the episcopate is, and is likely to remain, unknown. All the available evidence has been carefully collected, sifted, and estimated, and it is insufficient. Equally honest and equally capable critics infer different theories of the episcopate from it, and no solution of the problem can claim demonstration. We may hold, and perhaps be able to convince others, that one solution is more probable than another, but we cannot prove that it is the true one. All conclusions are tentative.

The problem is an old one, and as early as the 4th cent. there were two leading theories respecting the origin of the episcopate—that of Theodore of Mopsuestia and that of Jerome—but they are theories and no more. These two writers drew inferences from facts, or what they believed to be facts; they did not know more about the origin than we do. And they both start from the same fact, viz. that in the NT ‘bishop’ and ‘presbyter’ (or ‘elder’) are synonyms; they are two names for the same official. This is so generally recognized that there is no need to repeat the evidence. The two names are still synonymous in Clement of Rome (Cor. 42, 44), and by implication in Polycarp (Phil. 1) and the Didache (15), which we may date about A.D. 130–150. Ignatius is the earliest writer known to us who clearly separates ‘bishop’ from ‘elder’; with him ‘bishop’ means the monarchical ruler of a local church, distinct from, and superior to, the ‘presbyters’ or ‘elders.’

Starting from the original identity of ‘bishop’ and ‘presbyter,’ Theodore (on 1 Ti 3<sup>1-8</sup>) infers that episcopacy existed from the first. The first bishops, among whom were Timothy and Titus, were consecrated by apostles, governed whole provinces, and were sometimes called ‘apostles.’ Theodore erroneously supposed that ‘laying on of the hands of the presbytery’ (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>) meant consecration of Timothy by some of the Twelve. He was consecrated by St. Paul with certain elders (2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). ‘The presbytery,’ which in Lk 22<sup>66</sup> and Ac 22<sup>3</sup> means the body of elders in the Sanhedrin, here means a body of Christian elders. The details of Theodore’s theory need not detain us; the central point in it is the proposition that the apostles instituted a distinct class of officials to be their successors. But did they? The question admits of no secure answer. It must be remembered that we have no evidence that either Christ or the apostles ever prescribed any particular form of government for the society which they founded; and there is the improbability that men who believed that Christ would very soon return would think it worth while to devise and prescribe a particular form of government for the increasing number of Christian communities. On the other hand, it is probable that, as the apostles passed away, and the Lord still did not appear, the communities would be driven to devise some form of government for themselves.

Jerome (Ep. 146, ad Evangelum) answers the question in the negative. The apostles did not institute distinct officials to be their successors. Churches were governed by a council of presbyters. But when presbyters began to form parties, and each presbyter thought that those whom he baptized belonged to him, it was decreed throughout the world that one of them should be elected and set over the others, and that on him should rest the general supervision of the Church. On Tit 1<sup>5</sup> he says that it is ‘by custom rather than by the Lord’s arrangement’ that bishops are a higher order.

There is no need to assume that party spirit was in all cases, or even in most, the chief reason for setting one presbyter above the rest. The more usual reasons would be the obvious advantage of having one person to whom doubtful matters might be referred, and the fact that in most colleges of presbyters there was one who was manifestly more capable than the others. When once a particular presbyter had been either formally elected, or allowed more and more to take the lead, his special functions would be likely to grow. The dignity of bishops appears to have developed rapidly. They led their congregations in public worship, regulating liturgical forms and the distribution of the alms. They also regulated the congregation's power of punishing and forgiving offenders. They represented their congregations in all relations, Godward and manward. They gradually absorbed the functions of the expiring charismatic ministry, and were at once prophets and teachers, and they conducted the correspondence with other local churches. The frequent appearance of questionable doctrines greatly augmented the importance of bishops, who came to be regarded as teaching with unique authority. Montanism was a revolt against this official episcopacy—an attempt to restore the charismatic ministry of the prophets, and when it failed, the triumph of episcopacy was complete. And it deserved to fail, not merely because of its extravagances, but because of its rebellion against external forms. In one sense, forms are unessential; the realities which the forms express are the things which matter. But it is only by continuity in the forms that the realities can be preserved; 'formlessness inspired by enthusiasm melts away. . . . The elaboration of a close hierarchical organization and the setting up of a fixed dogmatic teaching were proved to be the necessary means of self-preservation, if the Gospel itself was not to be lost in the vortex of Gnosticism' (Dobschütz, Apostol. Age, Eng. tr., London, 1909, pp. 122, 141). The bishops were witnesses to the deposit of faith, and as such decided as to the soundness of doctrines.

Probably the first function that was assigned to the bishop was that of being leader and guide in public worship. But we know very little about the beginnings of this worship. The influence of the synagogue in determining the form was considerable, and it is possible that certain heathen mysteries exercised some influence, but the latter point has been exaggerated. Clement's Epistle shows that the trouble at Corinth was about persons—whether certain presbyters had been rightly deposed; not about principles—whether government by presbyters could be rightly maintained. Clement himself was not a bishop in the later sense: he was president of the college of presbyters in Rome. But such a president would be likely to develop into a monarchical bishop. Clement is the first Christian writer to take the fateful first step of interpreting the nature of office in the Church by reference to Jewish institutions, for which, to a certain extent, the way is prepared in 1 Co 9<sup>9</sup> and 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup> (Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, London, 1910, p. 72). He draws a parallel between the Jewish priest and Levite and the Christian priest and deacon, and bases an argument from analogy on the resemblance (Cor., ch. 40). It is doubtful whether the mention of the high priest has any reference to a monarchical episcopate.

In James, the brother of the Lord, we seem to have the first instance of a monarchical ruler in a Christian community. But it is improbable that in connexion with him the idea of one ruler for the whole Church arose, and still more improbable that Mt 16<sup>18</sup> was written as a protest against any such claim being made for one who was not one of the Twelve. It was not in Jerusalem, but in Asia Minor, that the monarchical episcopate as a permanent Christian institution had its rise, owing to causes which are unknown to us.

There are three possibilities with regard to the origin of both bishops and elders, and what is true of one need not be true of the other. Each may be (1) copied from Jewish synagogue officials, or (2) copied from Gentile municipal officials, or (3) due to spontaneous production. On the whole, it is probable that elders or presbyters were adopted from the synagogue, and that bishops arose spontaneously. But here we must carefully distinguish between origin and subsequent development. It is possible in both cases, and probable in the case of bishops, that the development of the office was influenced by secular municipal institutions.

In neither case does the word give us any definite information. By 'elders' (πρεσβυτεροι) may be meant either (1) seniors in age, or (2) people to be honoured for personal excellence, or (3) members of a council. The term 'bishop' (ἐπίσκοπος) denotes a supervisor or inspector, but tells us nothing of what he supervises or inspects. It may be buildings, or business, or men. In the NT it means an overseer of men in reference to their spiritual life, and is closely connected with the idea of shepherding; 'the shepherd (ποιμήν) and overseer (ἐπίσκοπος) of your souls' (1 P 2<sup>5</sup>); 'the flock (ποίμνιον) in the which the Holy Ghost had made you overseers (ἐπίσκοποι) to tend (ποιμαίνειν) the Church (ἐκκλησία) of God' (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>). Only once in the NT is 'shepherd' or 'pastor' used of Christian ministers (Eph 4<sup>11</sup>); but it is used of Christ in He 13<sup>20</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>; cf. Jn 10<sup>11, 14</sup>.

The term 'overseer' or 'bishop' (ἐπίσκοπος) having been used of Christ as 'the Overseer of souls,' it would be natural to use it of those of His ministers who in a special way continued this work; and it is more probable that the Christian use of the title arose in this way than that it was adopted in imitation of the secular ἐπίσκοπος in a city. As the specially gifted persons known as 'apostles, prophets, and teachers' became less common, their functions would be transferred to the permanent local officials, especially to the highest of them, viz. the bishops (Didache, 15<sup>1, 2</sup>). Neither bishops, elders, nor deacons appear in the lists of ministers and ministerial gifts in 1 Co 12<sup>28, 30</sup>, Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>. But this does not prove that St. Paul did not know or care about such officials. Where these officials existed, they were as yet only local ministers, and there was no need to mention them in speaking of gifts to the Church as a whole.

Timothy and Titus were not monarchical bishops. They were temporary delegates or representatives of St. Paul at Ephesus or in Crete; they were forerunners of the monarchical bishops, not the first examples of them. Nor can the 'angels' of the Seven Churches (Rev 1-3) be regarded as the bishops of those Churches. 'The invariable practice' of the writer of that book 'forbids such an interpretation' (Swete on Rev 1<sup>0</sup>). Excepting James, and perhaps 'the Elder' in 3 Jn., there is no instance of the monarchical episcopate in the NT; but it was established in Asia Minor before A.D. 100, and had become wide-spread in Christendom by 150.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians, London, 1891 ed., pp. 95-99, 181-263, Dissertations, do. 1892, pp. 137-246 (which contains additional notes to the essay in Philippians); M. R. Vincent, Philippians, Edinburgh, 1897, pp. 36-51; J. H. Bernard, Pastoral Epistles, Cambridge, 1898, pp. lvi-lxxv; Priesthood and Sacrifice, a conference ed. by W. Sanday, Oxford, 1900; A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, tr. Grieve, Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 154-157, 230; A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr. 2, London, 1908, i. 445-482; P. Batiffol, L'église naissante, Paris, 1909, pp. 115-152 (Eng. tr., Primitive Catholicism, London, 1911, pp. 97-163). See also works mentioned under CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

ALFRED PLUMMER.

BITHYNIA.—Bithynia (Βιθυνία) was a fertile and highly civilized country in the N.W. of Asia Minor, bounded on the W. by the Propontis and the Bosphorus, on the N. by the Euxine, on the S. by the range of Mysian Olympus, and on the E. by a doubtful line, some distance to the right of the river Sangarios (Strabo, XII. iv. 1; Pliny, v. 43). One of the kings of Bithynia changed the history of Asia Minor by inviting the marauding Galatians to cross the Bosphorus (278 B.C.). Nicomedes III., the last king, made the Romans his heirs (73 B.C.), and after the expulsion of Mithridates of Pontus (64 B.C.), Pompey formed the dual province of Bithynia et Pontus, which was governed by a proconsul, residing at Nicomedeia. On the division of the provinces by Augustus in 27 B.C. it remained senatorial.

The presence of Jews in Bithynia is indicated by Philo (Leg. ad Gaium, 36). In his second missionary journey, St. Paul, always drawn to the great centres of Græco-Roman civilization, attempted with Silas to enter Bithynia (ἐρεῖραζον εἰς τὴν Βιθυνίαν πορευθῆναι), intending probably to evangelize Nicæa and Nicomedeia, but the Spirit of Jesus, who was leading them on westward, did not permit them (Ac 16'). The province which so nearly became an apostolic mission-field had not, however, to wait long for the gospel. 1 P 1<sup>1</sup> affords evidence of the early introduction and rapid progress of Christianity in the province of Bithynia. Details, however, are wanting.

* For Bithynia, like Cappadocia, we have no primitive Christian record: but it could hardly remain long unaffected by the neighbourhood of Christian communities to the South-West, the South, and probably the East; even if no friend or disciple took up before long the purpose which St. Paul had been constrained to abandon, when a Divine intimation drew him onward into Europe' (F. J. A. Hort, First Ep. of St. Peter: I. 1-II. 17, 1898, p. 17).

In A.D. 112 the younger Pliny was sent to govern the province of Bithynia, which had become disorganized under senatorial administration. His correspondence with Trajan bears striking testimony to the expansion of the Christian religion, which seemed to him a superstitio prava immodica (Epp. x. 96, 97). Not only in the cities but in the rural villages the temples were almost deserted and the sacrificial ritual interrupted. While the letters describe a state of things which was true of the province as a whole, there are some indications that Amisos in the Far East was the first city on the Black Sea to which Christianity spread (Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, 1893, p. 224 f.).

LITERATURE.—W. Smith, DGRG i. [1856] 404; Carl Ritter, Kleinasien, i. [1858] 650 ff.; E. G. Hardy, Plinii Epistolæ ad Trajanum, 1889; W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Geog. of Asia Minor, 1890; Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877.

JAMES STRAHAN.

BITTERNESS (πικρία).—‘Bitter’ means lit. ‘biting’ (A. S. bitan, ‘to bite’), and πικρός, ‘sharp’ (from the same root as pungo, ‘pike,’ ‘peak’). το πικρόν, as that which has an acrid, pungent taste, is opposed to το γλυκύ (Ja 3<sup>11</sup>). In LXX πικρία is often used to translate πικρῶς, a bitter and poisonous plant, which is always used figuratively. Moses says that the man or woman, family or tribe, that turns from Jahweh will be ‘a root that beareth gall and wormwood’ (ρίζα ἄνω φύουσα ἐν χολῇ καὶ πικρίᾳ, Dt 29<sup>18</sup>). There is an echo of this saying in He 12<sup>15</sup>, where any member of the Church who introduces wrong doctrines or practices, and so leads others astray, becomes a ‘root of bitterness springing up’ (ρίζα πικρίας ἀνω φύουσα); and there may be another echo of it in Ac 8<sup>23</sup> (RVm), where Peter predicts that Simon Magus will ‘become gall (or a gall root) of bitterness’ (εἰς χολὴν πικρίας ὡς ὅτι σε ὄντα) by his evil influence over others, if he remains as he now is. But χολὴν πικρίας may be a genitive of apposition and the Apostle may mean that Simon is even now ‘in Bitterkeit, Bosheit, Feindseligkeit, wie in Galle’ (H. J. Holtzmann, Apostelgeschichte<sup>3</sup>, 1901, ad loc.). In Ro 3<sup>14</sup> bitterness of speech is joined with cursing, and in Eph 4<sup>31</sup> πικρία is an inward disposition (cf. ζῆλον πικρόν, Ja 3<sup>14</sup>) which all Christians are to put away in order that they may be ‘kind one to another, tender-hearted.’

JAMES STRAHAN.

BLACK.—See COLOURS.

BLASPHEMY (βλάσφημία, vb. βλάσφημεῖν, adj. and noun βλάσφημος; perhaps derived from βλάπτειν, ‘to injure,’ and φημι, ‘speech’).—In ordinary usage and in Eng. law this word denotes profane, irreverent speaking against God or sacred things; but the Greek word has a wider sense, including all modes of reviling or calumniating either God or man. In 2 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> the RV has ‘railers’ instead of ‘blasphemers’; in Ac 13<sup>45m</sup> and 18<sup>26m</sup> it gives ‘rail’ as an alternative, and in Rev 2<sup>29m</sup> ‘revile.’ ‘As we be slanderously reported’ (βλασφημουμένης, Ro 3<sup>3</sup>); ‘why am I evil spoken of?’ (τί βλασφημοῦμαι; 1 Co 10<sup>30</sup>); ‘to speak evil of no man’ (μηδέν βλασφημεῖν, Tit 3<sup>2</sup>); ‘these . . . rail at dignities’ (δόξας βλασφημοῦσιν, Jude<sup>8</sup>; cf. 2 P 2<sup>10</sup>) are other examples of the use of the word with a human reference. The two meanings of βλάσφημία are combined in Ac 6<sup>11</sup>, where Stephen is accused of speaking blasphemous words (ῥήματα βλάσφημα) against Moses and God (εἰς Μωσῆν καὶ τὸν θεόν).

According to the Levitical law the punishment for blaspheming the name of Jahweh was death by stoning (Lv 24<sup>10-16</sup>); but as Roman subjects the Jews had not power to put any man to death. Though they attempted to observe the regular forms in their trial of Stephen for blasphemy, his death was not a judicial execution, but the illegal act of a solemn Sanhedrin changed by fanatical hatred into a murderous mob.

After Jesus had come to be acknowledged as the Messiah, the denial of His status and the insulting of His name were regarded by His followers as conscious or unconscious blasphemy. St. Paul recalls with shame and sorrow the time when, in this sense of the term, he not only was guilty of habitual blasphemy (τὸ πρότερον ὄντα βλάσφημον, 1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>), but strove to make others blaspheme (ἠνάγκαζον βλασφημεῖν, Ac 26<sup>11</sup>). The fortitude of those who resisted his efforts made a profound impression on his mind, and probably did more than anything else to pave the way for conversion. Like Pliny afterwards in Bithynia (Epp. x. 97), he doubtless found it was all but impossible to make men and women speak evil of their so-called Messiah—‘maledicere Christum’—or submit to any other test that would have indicated disloyalty to Him: ‘quorum nihil cogi posse dicuntur, qui sunt re vera Christiani’ (ib.). When, on the other hand, St. Paul began to preach Jesus as His own Messiah, the blasphemies of his countrymen against that Name became his daily fare. The Jews of Pisidian Antioch ‘contradicted the things which were spoken by Paul and blasphemed’ (Ac 13<sup>45</sup>); those of Corinth ‘opposed themselves and blasphemed’ (18<sup>6</sup>); and the historian might have multiplied instances without end.

Blasphemy was not exclusively a Jewish and Christian conception. To the Greeks also it was a high offence βλασφημεῖν εἰς θεούς (Plato, Rep. 281 E). The majesty of the gods and the sacredness of the temples were jealously guarded. St. Paul, who reasoned against idolatry, never used opprobrious language about the religion of Greece or Rome. It was better to fight for the good than to rail at the bad. The town-clerk of Ephesus reminds his fellow-citizens, roused to fury at the bare suspicion of dishonour to Artemis, that St. Paul and his companions were no blasphemers of their goddess (οὐτε βλασφημοῦντες τὴν θεὰν ὑμῶν, Ac 19<sup>37</sup>). Towards the cult of Caesar, which was still kept within some bounds, the Apostle always maintained the same correct attitude. But in the Apocalypse, written in the reign of Domitian, there is a startling change. That emperor, 'probably the wickedest man who ever lived' (Renan), was the first to demand that Divine honours should be paid to himself in his lifetime. Not content, like his predecessors, with the title Divus, he caused himself to be styled in public documents 'Our Lord and God.' In Asia Minor the deification of Caesar, the erection of temples in his honour, and the establishment of communes for the promotion of his worship became imperative, while the offering of incense to his statue was made the ordinary test of loyalty to the Empire. To the prophet of Ephesus all this seemed rank blasphemy, and he delivered his soul by denouncing it. He personified the Empire as the Beast whose seven heads had names of blasphemy (Rev 13<sup>1</sup>), to whom was given a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies (13<sup>5</sup>), who opened his mouth for blasphemies against God, to blaspheme His name and His tabernacle (13<sup>6</sup>); as the scarlet-coloured Beast who was covered all over with names of blasphemies (17<sup>3</sup>). That a creature called an emperor should assume the attributes of the Creator, and compel the homage of an infatuated world, was nothing less than a Satanic triumph; and whether men knew it or not, they 'were worshipping the dragon' (13<sup>4</sup>). Cf. art. EMPEROR-WORSHIP.

LITERATURE.—In addition to artt. on 'Blasphemy' in HDB, EBI, SDB, and ERE, with the literature there cited, see the relevant Commentaries, esp. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>8</sup> (ICC, 1902); H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, 1907; J. Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, 1903. See also CE, s.v., and Roman Catholic literature cited there.

JAMES STRAHAN.

BLASTUS.—Blastus, a chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I., is mentioned in Ac 12<sup>10</sup> in connexion with an embassy which the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon sent to Herod at Caesarea in order to obtain terms of peace. The ambassadors obtained an audience of the prince through the influence of Blastus, who no doubt had been liberally bribed for his services. The incident of the embassy is not mentioned by Josephus nor is the name of Blastus, and this omission has been regarded by some (e.g. Krenkel) as throwing doubt on St. Luke's narrative, while others regard the incident as a proof of St. Luke's independence, or as an intentional supplement to the account of the Jewish historian. W. F. BOYD.

BLESSEDNESS This word occurs three times in the AV (Ro 4<sup>8-9</sup>, Gal 4<sup>15</sup>), but rightly disappears in the RV,* for the Gr. word μακάριος means not blessedness itself, but a pronouncement that some one is blessed. 'Blessedness' is simply a convenient generalization, expressing the meaning which NT writers convey by the adjectives translated 'blessed' or 'happy' (μακάριος, εὐλογητός) and the participle εὐλογημένος, 'blessed' (practically an adjective); cf. the verb ἐνευλογέομαι (Ac 3<sup>5</sup>, Gal 3<sup>8</sup>) and μακαρίζω (Lk 1<sup>43</sup>, Ja 5<sup>11</sup>). The various forms of εὐλογέομαι refer, literally, to being 'well spoken of,' and apparently always contain at least the latent thought of praise being conferred or happiness ascribed; μακάριος, however, expresses simply the possession of a quality, and for the ascription of this by others the verb μακαρίζω is needed.

Blessedness being a personal possession, any kind of action or utterance by others is of secondary importance in regard to it. Hence the crucial word is μακάριος, not εὐλογέομαι, etc. The RV has in Jn 13<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> altered the AV tr. of μακάριος from 'happy' to 'blessed'; it might well have made the same alteration in Ro 14<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>40</sup>. Massie would banish 'happy' from the NT except in Ac 26<sup>2</sup> (HDB, art. 'Happiness'). In the OT יָשָׁר, 'O the happiness (or blessedness) of,' has been even more frequently translated 'happy' when it might have been rendered 'blessed' (cf. Ps 89<sup>15</sup> with 144<sup>15</sup>, where the Hebrew is יָשָׁר in both cases). Still, 'happy' is more suitable in the OT than in the NT, for the rewards promised to the OT saints are of a far more material and temporal order (see Ps 13<sup>6</sup>; the epilogue even of Job 42<sup>10-17</sup>; and HDB, art. 'Blessedness'). For the NT it is significant not only that μακάριος, which occurs very frequently, represented to the Greeks the higher and even the Divine bliss, but also that the lower and more ordinary word εὐδαίμων, with its suggestion of good luck, is entirely absent. For the use of μακάριος in the Gospels, see art. 'Beatitude' in HDB and in DCG. This was the regular term in NT times for 'departed' (to the world of blessedness); cf. Germ. selig, and see Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 166. On the whole, it bears an exceedingly lofty meaning, though it is less spiritual in Luke than in Matthew. In 24<sup>47</sup> Matthew need not be understood as offering a coarsely material 'blessedness'; the servant is advanced in the confidence of his master. There is no need to question the inwardness of any blessedness offered elsewhere in Matthew. In Lk 12<sup>37-38</sup> the spread table, and the flattering attentions received thereat, are somewhat prominent; but Jesus is speaking metaphorically, and elsewhere literal, materialistic views are rebuked (11<sup>27-28</sup> and perhaps 14<sup>15ff.</sup>). Too much stress must not therefore be laid on G<sup>20</sup>. 21, although there the blessedness of being 'filled' seems to refer to food rather than, as in Matthew, to righteousness.

* In the two passages in Rom. the RV substitutes 'blessing,' in Gal. 'gratulation.'

In the rest of the NT μακάριος is less used than in the Gospels. St. Paul has it twice only (Ro 4<sup>7-8</sup>), and then in an OT quotation. In 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup> and 6<sup>15</sup> (never in the Gospels) it is applied to God, but in this sense εὐλογητός is usual. In regard to men, it is applied to those who give (Ac 20<sup>35</sup>), who are forgiven (Ro 4<sup>7-8</sup>), who endure temptation (Ja 1<sup>12</sup>), who act according to the perfect law of liberty (Ja 1<sup>25</sup>), who die in the Lord (Rev 14<sup>13</sup>; see also Rev 1<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>13</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>6</sup> 22<sup>7-14</sup>). It stands for a good which is above happiness, and dwells not least with those who are counted worthy to sacrifice happiness for conscience' sake. It is based, partly, on a character which is its own 'better and abiding possession' (He 10<sup>34m</sup>). While it remains itself, it is above all adequate earthly reward and beyond all earthly overthrow. Above all, it is based in the spiritual world; to the 'pure in heart' the highest blessedness is to 'see God' (Mt 5<sup>8</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>2-3</sup>).

For various aspects of the idea of blessedness, as expressed in the NT by quite other words, see art. 'Blessedness' in HDB.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Blessedness' in HDB, SDB, and DCG; also F. C. Kempson, The Future Life, 1907, p. 308; J. M. Hodgson, Religion—The Quest of the Ideal, 1911, p. 106; T. G. Selby, The Imperfect Angel, 1888, p. 25; T. Binney, King's Weight House Chapel Sermons, 1869, p. 71; J. B. Lightfoot, Sermons in St. Paul's Cathedral, 1891, p. 178.

C. H. WATKINS.

BLESSING.—See BENEDICTION.

BLINDNESS.—Only once does this term refer to the absence of physical sight (Ac 13<sup>11</sup>), yet even there moral blindness is symbolized (cf. also the case of St. Paul, Ac 9<sup>8ff.</sup> 20<sup>11</sup>, a temporary condition due to suggestion, or to sudden severe nervous tension which soon gave place to normal sight). All the other references to blindness (Ro 2<sup>19</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>13</sup> 1 P 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>, Rev 3<sup>17</sup>) are metaphysical and indicate a moral condition. Apart from the general fitness of such a figure to signify a moral condition, a special reason for its use by St. Paul is found in his experience before and after his conversion.—1. Blindness is alleged as a simple fact without explanation (2 P 1<sup>9</sup>, Rev 3<sup>17</sup>).—2. It is referred to the character and influence of the world, from which some of those who have joined themselves to the Christian community have not yet emerged—they still remain in the darkness in which they were before (1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>).—3. The god of this world, or Satan, who is supposed to have power over the course of affairs in the present age, is assigned as the cause of this condition (cf. Eph 6<sup>12</sup>; Ascension of Isaiah, ed. Charles, 1900, pp. 11, 24, where Beliar=the ruler of this world).—4. To God is attributed in part the activity which results in moral blindness (Ac 28<sup>6</sup>, Ro 11<sup>8, 10</sup>). This conception belongs to the circle of Jewish religious ideas—the prophetic doctrine of the absoluteness of God, the Pharisaic teaching of Divine predestination. Both of these lay in the background of St. Paul's thought (cf. Is 6<sup>9, 10</sup>, Ps 69<sup>3</sup>, Ro 9<sup>20ff.</sup>), yet other elements also entered into and modified it. From the point of view of the Divine absoluteness, the Apostle did not doubt that God had the unquestioned right to be the sole cause of blindness in one or of sight in another—a prerogative which, however, He refrained from exercising. Hence a somewhat different explanation was to be sought for the blindness of Israel. That God had rejected the Jews as a whole was for the Apostle abundantly evident. Yet this did not contradict God's election and promise. Israel's guilt had, indeed, for the time being, annulled these; still, this was only one side of the reality. God's rejection of Israel was neither without purpose nor was it irrevocable. God's purpose was universal, embracing Gentiles as well as Jews, and if it appeared to pass from the Jews to the Gentiles, this was not the whole truth, nor was it final. For, firstly, some Jews had always remained faithful to the election, and secondly, the blindness of the remainder was only temporary—until the 'fullness of the Gentiles,' when all Israel, beholding the salvation of the Gentiles, should once more turn to God. The blindness is marked by two features. It is conceived of as pertaining not to individuals, but to the community; and it is one stage in the unfolding of a vast theodicy. The latter fact does not, however, relieve the community of either responsibility or guilt. Whether all the community living in the interim, that is, previous to the removal of the social blindness, will share in the recognition and acceptance of the election, is not considered by the Apostle. In the other passages of the AV the Greek words which are translated 'blinded' (Ro 11<sup>7</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>14</sup>) and 'blindness' (Ro 11<sup>25</sup>, Eph 4<sup>18</sup>) are replaced in the RV by their proper equivalents 'hardened' and 'hardness,' which express also insensibility to the truth of the gospel.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Blindness' in DCG; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902); J. Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, 1903, p. 264 ff.; B. F. Westcott, Ephesians, 1906, p. 66; JThSt iii. [1901-02] 81.

C. A. BECKWITH.

BLOOD.—1. Meaning of the term.—Among its simplest designations, 'blood' represents the blood which flows from wounds in the body (Ac 22<sup>0</sup>); the extremity of human endurance of evil (He 12<sup>4</sup>). The phrase 'flesh and blood' signifies the lower sensuous nature (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>; cf. Mt 16<sup>17</sup>); any one whatever (Gal 1<sup>16</sup>); the substantial basis of human life (He 2<sup>14</sup>); and human power antagonistic to the gospel (Eph 6<sup>1</sup>). Thus 'blood' may symbolize any aspect of human life inferior to that of the 'spirit.'

2. Origin.—The meaning of the term is derived from OT usage, as in St. Peter's reference to the portents of the Day of the Lord, quoting Joel's words, 'blood . . . the moon [shall be turned into] blood' (Ac 2<sup>19, 20</sup>; cf. Jl 2<sup>30, 31</sup>). The same usage together with dependence on the story of the plagues in Egypt appears in Rev. (6<sup>1</sup>-8<sup>7, 8</sup> 11<sup>6</sup> 16<sup>3, 4</sup>). Blood thus represents the greatness, awfulness, and finality of the Divine judgment, by which either a wicked condition is simply brought to an end (cf. also Rev 19<sup>13</sup>), or a temporary, dispensation gives place to the last age of human earthly existence in the fulfilment of God's purpose.

3. Usage.—(1) The word is related to Jewish ordinances. Among the prohibitions put forth by the council at Jerusalem was one enjoining abstinence from blood (Ac 15<sup>20-29</sup> 21<sup>25</sup>; cf. Lv 3<sup>17</sup>). The reason for the edict was doubtless that assigned for the earlier restriction, that 'the life of all flesh is in the blood' (Lv 17<sup>14</sup>). (2) Blood further symbolizes the life violently taken (Ac 1<sup>19</sup> 22<sup>3</sup>, Ro 3<sup>15</sup>, Rev 16<sup>6</sup>), for which the murderer is responsible (Ac 5<sup>28</sup> Rev 17<sup>6</sup> 18<sup>1</sup>), and liable to the just judgment of God (Rev 6<sup>10</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>); perhaps, in poetic justice, a punishment like the crime (cf. 14<sup>20</sup>). It may also signify the un pitying violence with which men treat their fellows (Ro 3<sup>15</sup>). (3) In his denunciation that blood shall be upon one's own head, St. Paul meant that the Corinthians who had refused belief in the gospel were both responsible for their rejection and exposed to God's judgment against them (Ac 18<sup>6</sup>; cf. 5<sup>38</sup>, 2 S 1<sup>16</sup>, Mt 27<sup>25</sup>). In like manner one might be 'guilty of the . . . blood of Christ' (1 Co 11<sup>27</sup>). (4) Blood represents the life of men capable of redemption, for which any herald of the gospel is responsible and of which he may be found guilty if he fails in his duty as a preacher of Christ (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>). (5) It signifies the life given up for an atonement, both as presented to God and as having reconciling virtue for men (He 9<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>4</sup> 12<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>11, 20</sup>).

4. The term used in connexion with the work of Christ.—The most important uses of the word centre in the work of Christ. In the Epistle to the Romans the reference to blood involves its relation on the one hand to the sacrificial-offering, on the other hand to the sin-offering, wherein it appears that the sacrificial is the sin-offering. In other letters of St. Paul the references to blood are incidental and determined by the particular feature of redemption in the mind of the Apostle at the moment. In the Epistle to the Hebrews the meaning of the word is derived from the analogy of the OT Scriptures, which in a very inadequate manner prefigured the offering which Christ made of Himself. Revelation is dominated by the OT usage of the word and is in a large degree influenced by prophetic language, although the common note of redemption through the blood of Christ is heard here also. As related to the work of Christ, then, the apostolic teaching concerning blood involves the following specific features: (a) It is connected with sacrifices, as that of the Day of Atonement (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, He 9<sup>7ff.</sup>), by means of which the relation of men to God, and indeed of God to men (cf. Ro 5<sup>10</sup>), broken by sin, is restored by the death of Christ. According to the Epistle to the Hebrews, while the animal sacrifices as such were irrational, destitute of personal consent, intermittent, incapable of purifying, spiritual efficacy (He 10<sup>4</sup>), this lack was more than set off by the blood of Christ. (b) As in the Old Dispensation all persons ministering at the altar, utensils of service and worship, and means of approach to God were cleansed with blood as a medium of purification (cf., however, Lv 5<sup>11ff.</sup>), so the blood of Christ signifies that all that which pertains to salvation in the heavenly sanctuary into which both He and His followers enter has been for ever purified in His blood (He 9<sup>22ff.</sup>). It is as if the author of the Hebrews conceived of sin as having penetrated and defiled even the unseen heavenly world, which therefore needed to be set free from contamination and made holy in the same way as things belonging to the earthly tabernacle. (c) It is the sign and pledge of Christ's free surrender of Himself to His atoning death (He 9<sup>12-14</sup>, Rev 1<sup>5</sup>), and symbolizes the experience through which Jesus must pass on His way to perfected communion with God and the final stage of His mediatorial agency (He 10<sup>19</sup> 13<sup>12</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>8-9</sup>; cf. 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>, Rev 19<sup>13</sup>). (d) The blood is also the means for the ratification of the New Covenant (1 Co 11<sup>25</sup>, He 9<sup>15-16</sup> 10<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>0</sup>; cf. Mt 26<sup>28</sup>, Ex 24<sup>6-8</sup>). It could not but be that a ceremony, the meaning of which was so deeply embedded in the religious experience of the race, and which was so well fitted to symbolize the solemn consecration to mutual obligations, should find its significance completely expressed in the blood of Christ through which God would reunite Himself in even more spiritual bonds to the lives of Christ's followers. (e) The blood is represented as the purchase price of deliverance from sin (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>, Eph 1<sup>4</sup>, Col 1<sup>14</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>19</sup>, Rev 5<sup>9</sup>; cf. He 9<sup>22</sup>). The vivid imagery of this word receives nowhere a closer definition: its force lies in its suggestion of one aspect of the experience of the man who passes from the consciousness of the bondage of sin to the joyful freedom of forgiveness. (f) Hence the word is associated with forgiveness of sins. As a sacrificial offering Christ was at the same time a sin-offering (Ro 3<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, He 9<sup>12</sup>), and as such His offering has expiatory efficacy. (g) By His blood as our High Priest He enters into the presence of God on our behalf (He 9<sup>12-24</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>), there both perfectly realizing fellowship with God for Himself and carrying forward His mediatorial work. (h) The blood has efficacy in the actual life of believers, disclosing its energy in their progressive personal sanctification (He 9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 12<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>7</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup>, Rev 1<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>14</sup>), and in the power which it confers on them to overcome that which resists the Christian aim from without (Rev 12<sup>11</sup>). (i) Blood is also a symbol of the inner fellowship of believers with one another and with God—the reference is social (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>, He 13<sup>12</sup>).

Looking back over this subject as a whole, it is evident that the apostolic writers do not let their attention rest on blood as such, but only on blood as it is a vehicle and symbol of life. For the blood represents the life, even if this is taken by violence. Christ's blood freely given, with the sole aim of recovering men in sin to fellowship with God and to their Divine destination as children of God. The efficacy of the life of Christ thus given is continuous from the unseen world and in the purpose of God. Thus the blood which flowed once for all is not of transitory worth, but is endowed with the energy perpetually to create new redemptive personal and social values—it is eternal.

LITERATURE.—B. F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, 1883, 'Additional note on i. 71,' p. 34 ff., also The Epistle to the Hebrews, 1889, note 'On the Use of the term "Blood" in the Epistle,' p. 293 f.; W. Sanday and A. C. Headlam, The Epistle to the Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902), p. 91 ff.

C. A. BECKWITH.

BLOODY FLUX.—See DYSENTERY.

BOASTING.—This term is employed by AV with considerable frequency to render the group of words καυχᾶσθαι, καύχησις, καύχημα. They are found about 40 times in LXX, and about 60 times in the NT (exclusively in St. Paul's Epistles, except He 3<sup>6</sup>, Ja 1<sup>9</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>). The forms ἐγκαυχᾶσθαι (2 Th 1<sup>4</sup>) and κατακαυχᾶσθαι (Ro 11<sup>18</sup>, Ja 3<sup>14</sup>) are also found. The group belongs to what Lightfoot (Com. on Ph 3<sup>5</sup>) calls 'the tumultuous eagerness of the Apostle's earlier style'; the words appear most frequently in 2 Cor., where personal feeling is deeply stirred. Whereas in AV they are rendered by 'boasting' and 'glorying' in about equal proportions, in RV 'boasting' has almost completely disappeared, and 'glorying' is found instead. The only place where 'boast' is now found is in Ja 3<sup>1</sup>—'the tongue also is a little member and boasteth great things'; but here the verb is not καυχᾶται but αἰχθεῖ, and the idea 'is properly to stretch the neck and hold up the head in pride, and hence to speak with proud confidence' (Hort, ad loc.). 'Boastful' still appears twice in RV (Ro 1<sup>30</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>2</sup>), taking the place of AV 'boasters,' and is the equivalent of δλαζών, the abstract noun δλαζονεία being rendered in Ja 4<sup>16</sup> 'vaunting' and in 1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup> 'vainglory,' the only two places where it occurs. The δλαζών ('boastful') has evil associations in both passages—in Ro 1<sup>30</sup> with those who have been given over to a reprobate mind, and in 2 Ti 3<sup>2</sup> with the 'proud,' blasphemers, and such like. Similarly δλαζονεία is found in Patristic literature in lists of vices and corrupt practices—in Didache (v. 1) along with 'self-will,' 'covetousness,' and others; in 1 Clem. xxxv. 5 bracketed with υπερηφάνια, 'pride,' in such a list; and in Ep. to Diognetus (iv. 6) in conjunction with πολυπραγμοσύνη, 'meddlesomeness.' Aristotle saw in the δλαζών, 'not merely one making unseemly display of things which he actually possesses, but vaunting himself in those which he does not possess' (quoted in Trench, Synonyms of NT<sup>8</sup>, Lond. 1876, p. 96). In no such category could St. Paul be placed when he speaks of himself, using καυχᾶσθαι or its cognates, as 'boasting' (2 Co 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>4</sup>). The RV, however, has replaced the word by 'glorying,' except in some cases where it uses 'rejoicing' (Ro 5<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>, but in Ja 4<sup>16</sup> 'rejoice' of AV has also given place to 'glory'). 'Glorying' (or 'boasting') 'in the law,' or 'in works' as a ground of acceptance with God, or 'in men' as watchwords of sects or parties, is condemned by St. Paul (Ro 3<sup>27</sup>, Eph 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>1</sup>). But the word expresses well the high level at which he lived, exulting in Christ Jesus. He gloried in the Cross (Gal 6<sup>14</sup>), in free grace (Ro 5<sup>11</sup>), in an approving conscience (2 Co 1<sup>1</sup>), in his independence as an apostle (2 Co 11<sup>10</sup>), in his convert-ship (2 Th 1<sup>4</sup>), and above all in Christ Jesus (Ro 15<sup>17</sup>) and in God (1 Co 13<sup>1</sup>), in the spirit of the Psalmist (44<sup>8</sup>), and of the Prophet (Jer 9<sup>3</sup>) who said in the name of God, 'Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom . . . but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth, and knoweth me, that I am the Lord.' T. NICOL.

BOAT.—See SHIP.

BODY.—1. The term.—In EV 'body' represents 3 different terms in the original. Once (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>) it renders χρῶς, which properly denotes the skin or the surface of the body. Thrice (Rev 11<sup>8</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>) 'dead body' is the equivalent of πῶμα, which corresponds to Lat. cadaver, Eng. 'carcase.' In all other cases 'body' stands for σῶμα in the Gr. text. Occasionally σῶμα is used of a dead body, whether of man (Ac 9<sup>40</sup>, Jude<sup>9</sup>) or beast (He 13<sup>11</sup>), but ordinarily it denotes the living body of animals (Ja 3<sup>8</sup>) or of men (1 Co 6<sup>15</sup> etc.). When distinguished from σὰρξ (EV 'flesh'), which applies to the material or substance of the living body (2 Co 12<sup>7</sup>), σῶμα designates the body as an organic whole, a union of related parts (1 Co 12<sup>1</sup>); but σῶμα and σὰρξ are sometimes used in connexions which make them practically synonymous (cf. 1 Co 5<sup>3</sup> with Col 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>10</sup> with v. 11). In Rev 18<sup>13</sup> σώματα is rendered by 'slaves' (marg. 'bodies'), the body only of the slave being taken into account by ancient law. From the literal meaning of σῶμα as an organism made up of interrelated parts comes its figurative employment to describe the Christian Church as a social whole, the 'one body' with many members (Ro 12<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>1-7</sup> etc.). Symbolically the bread of the Lord's Supper is designated as the body of Christ (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 11<sup>24-27-29</sup>).

2. The doctrine.—Outside of the Pauline Epistles the references to the body are few in number, and do not furnish materials for separate doctrinal treatment. It is almost wholly with St. Paul that we have to do in considering the doctrinal applications of the word. His use of it is threefold—a literal use in connexion with his doctrine of man, a figurative or mystical use in his doctrine of the Church, a symbolic use in his doctrine of the Lord's Supper.

(1) THE LITERAL BODY.—The assumption is frequently made that St. Paul's doctrine of man was formed under Hellenistic influences, and that he sets up a rigid dualism between body and soul, matter and spirit (cf. Holtzmann, NT Theol. ii. 14f.). It is true that he makes use of the contrasted terms 'flesh' and 'spirit,' 'body' and 'soul,' which had become general among the Jews through familiarity with the LXX, and were thus indirectly due to contact with the Greek world. But, notwithstanding his use of these terms, St. Paul's doctrine of man was firmly rooted in the soil of OT teaching, and anything like the Greek dualistic antithesis between body and soul was far from his thoughts. For him, as for the OT writers, the psycho-physical unity of the human personality was the fundamental feature in the conception of man. The body, no less than the soul, was essential to human nature in its completeness, though the body, as the part that links man to Nature, held a lower place than the soul or spirit by which he came into relation with God. These two strands of thought—the essentiality of the body to a complete human nature, and its subordination to the soul—run through all the Apostle's anthropological teaching, and come into clear view in his teaching on the subjects of sin, death, sanctification, and the future life.

(a) The body and sin.—It is here that the argument for a positive dualism in the Pauline teaching regarding the body finds its strongest support. It must be admitted that St. Paul often speaks of the body and its members not only as instruments of sin, but as the seat of its power (e.g. Ro 6<sup>1-19</sup> 7<sup>3-36</sup>). But it has been further alleged that he saw in the body the very source and principle of sin (Pfleiderer, Paulinismus, Leipzig, 1890, p. 53ff.). The argument depends on the interpretation given to the word 'flesh' (σάρξ) in those passages where it is employed in an ethical sense in contrast with 'spirit' (πνεῦμα). It is assumed by Pfleiderer and others that σάρξ in such cases simply denotes the physical or sensuous part of man, in which the Apostle finds a substance essentially antagonistic to the life of the spirit, making sin inevitable. But the objections to this view seem insuperable. In St. Paul's category of the 'works of the flesh' (Gal 5<sup>19ff.</sup>) most of the sins he enumerates are spiritual, not physical, in their character. When he charges the Corinthians with being 'carnal' (1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>), he is condemning, not sensuality, but jealousy and strife. His doctrines of the sanctification of the body (1 Co 6<sup>12-19</sup>) and of the absolute sinlessness (2 Co 5<sup>1-11</sup>) of one born of a woman (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>) would have been impossible if he had regarded the principle of sin as lying in man's corporeal nature. The antithesis of flesh and spirit, then, cannot be interpreted as amounting to a dualistic opposition between man's body and his soul. It is a contrast rather between the earthly and the heavenly, the natural and the supernatural, what is evolved from below and what is bestowed from above. The 'carnal' man, with his 'mind of the flesh' at enmity with God (Ro 8<sup>7</sup>), is the same as the 'natural' man who receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God (1 Co 2<sup>14</sup>), and so is to be distinguished from the 'spiritual' man in whom a supernatural and Divine principle is already at work (v. 13ff.; cf. 3<sup>1-3</sup>).

But while the Apostle does not find in the body the very principle of sin, he does regard it as a lurking-place of evil and a constant source of liability to fall (Ro 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>3-4</sup>). Hence his determination to bring the body into subjection (1 Co 9<sup>27</sup>), and his summons to others to mortify its deeds (Ro 8<sup>13</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>5</sup>).

(b) The body and death.—In his teaching about death, St. Paul lends no support to the doctrine of those Greek philosophers who saw in it a liberation of the soul from bondage to the body as such (cf. Plato, Phaedo, 64ff.). The emphasis he lays on the inner and spiritual side of personality enables him, it is true, to conceive of existence, and even a blessed existence, in the disembodied state (2 Co 5<sup>8</sup>). His sense, too, of the weakness of the flesh and its subjection to the forces of evil leads him to describe the present body as a tabernacle in which we groan, being burdened. But in the same passage he expresses his confidence that the house not made with hands will take the place of the present tabernacle, and that those who have heretofore been burdened will be so clothed upon, that what is mortal shall be swallowed up of life (2 Co 5<sup>1-4</sup>). He longs not for deliverance from the body, but for its complete redemption and transformation, so that it may be perfectly adapted to the life of the spirit. In his view, death was not a liberation of the soul from bondage, but an interruption, due to sin (Ro 6<sup>3</sup>), of the natural solidarity of the two component parts of human nature. But as Christ by His Spirit dwelling in us can subdue the power of sin, so also can He gain the victory over death—the culminating proof of sin's power (1 Co 15<sup>56</sup>). In Christ the promise is given of a body not only raised from the grave, but redeemed from the power of evil, and thus capable of being transformed from a natural body into a spiritual body (v. 44; cf. Ph 3<sup>21</sup>).

(c) The body and sanctification.—St. Paul's view of the body as an essential part of the human personality appears further in his doctrine of the bodily holiness of a Christian man. In Corinth the perverted notion had grown up that since the body was not a part of the true personality, bodily acts were morally indifferent things (1 Co 6<sup>13ff.</sup>). To this the Apostle opposes the doctrine that the body of a Christian belongs to the Lord, that it is a member of Christ Himself and a sanctuary of the Holy Ghost—thus making the personal life which unites us to Christ inseparable from those other manifestations of the same personal life which find expression in the bodily members. Yet this view of the communion of the body in man's spiritual life and its participation in the sanctifying powers of the Divine Spirit did not blind him to the fact that the body, as we know it, is weak and tainted, ever ready to become the instrument of temptation and an occasion of stumbling (Ro 6<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>7</sup>). And so, side by side with the truth that the body is a Divine sanctuary, he sets the demand that sin should not be allowed to reign in our mortal bodies, that we should obey it in the lusts thereof (Ro 6<sup>12</sup>).

(d) The body and the future life.—Here, again, the same two familiar lines of thought emerge. On the one hand, we have an overwhelming sense of the worth of the body for the human personality; on the other, a clear recognition of its present limitations and unfitness in its earthly form to be a perfect spiritual instrument. The proof of the first is seen in St. Paul's attitude to the idea of a bodily resurrection. To him the resurrection of Christ was a fact of the most absolute certainty (Ro 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>5ff.</sup>); and that fact carried with it the assurance that the dead are raised (v. 15<sup>5ff.</sup>). Had he thought of the body as something essentially evil, had he not been persuaded of its absolute worth, his hopes for the future life must have centred in a bare doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and not, as they actually did, in the resurrection of the body. But while he clung passionately to the hope of the resurrection, he did not believe in the resurrection of the present body of flesh and blood (1 Co 15<sup>50</sup>). He looked for a body in which corruption had given place to incorruption (vv. 42-43) and humiliation had been changed into glory (Ph 3<sup>21</sup>). His doctrine of the resurrection includes the assurance that when the dead in Christ are raised (he has little to say of the physical resurrection of others), it will not be in the old bodies of their earthly experience, but in new ones adapted to heavenly conditions (1 Co 15<sup>47ff.</sup>), bodies that are no longer psychical merely, i.e. moving on the plane of man's natural experience in the world, but pneumatical (v. 44<sup>ff.</sup>), because redeemed from every taint of evil and fitted to be the worthy and adequate organs of a spiritual and heavenly life.

(2) THE FIGURATIVE OR MYSTICAL BODY.—In 1 Co 12<sup>12ff.</sup> (cf. Ro 12<sup>3</sup>), St. Paul describes the relations in which Christians stand to Christ and to one another under the figure of a body and its members; and towards the end of the chapter (v. 27) he says of the Corinthian Church quite expressly, 'Now ye are a body of Christ (σῶμα Χριστοῦ), and members in particular.' In ancient classical literature the figure was frequently applied to the body politic; and the Apostle here transfers it to the Church with the view of impressing upon his readers the need for unity and mutual helpfulness. As yet, however, the figure is plastic, and the anarthrous σῶμα suggests that it is the Church of Corinth only which St. Paul has immediately in view. This may be regarded, accordingly, as the preliminary sketch of that elaborated conception of the Church as Christ's mystical body which is found in two later Epistles. In Ephesians (1<sup>1-4</sup>, 4<sup>12</sup>) and Colossians (1<sup>18</sup>, 24) 'the body of Christ' (τὸ σῶμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ) has become a fixed designation of the universal and ideal Church. Moreover, this further distinction is to be observed, that whereas in Rom. and 1 Cor. Christ is conceived of as the whole body of which individual Christians are members in particular, in Eph. and Col. the Church has become the body of which Christ as the head is ruler, saviour, and nourisher (Eph 5<sup>3ff.</sup>, Col 2<sup>19</sup>). In its later form the figure suggests not only the unity of the Church as the mystical body of Christ, but its absolute dependence upon Him who is the Head for its strength and growth and very existence.

(3) THE SYMBOLIC BODY.—The words, 'This is my body,' applied by Jesus to the broken bread of the Supper (Mt 26<sup>26</sup>, Mk 14<sup>22</sup>, Lk 22<sup>19</sup>), are repeated by St. Paul in his narrative of the institution (1 Co 11<sup>24</sup>). And the Apostle not only repeats the Lord's words in their historical connexion, but himself describes the sacramental bread as being Christ's body. 'The bread which we break,' he writes, 'is it not a communion of the body of Christ?' (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>). In like manner he says that whosoever shall eat the bread of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body of the Lord (11<sup>27</sup>), and that a participant of the Supper eats and drinks judgment unto himself 'if he discern not the body' (v. 29). There are wide differences of opinion among Christians as to the full significance of this identification of the bread of the Lord's Supper with the body of the Lord Himself. But whatever further meanings may be seen in it, and even under theories of a Real Presence, which is something other and more than a purely spiritual presence, the bread which Jesus broke at the Last Supper was, in the first place, a symbol of His own body of flesh and blood which was yielded to death in a sacrifice of love.

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lex. 3, Edinburgh, 1880, s.v.; relevant sections in J. Laidlaw, Bible Doct. of Man, do. 1879; F. Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychology, Eng. tr., do. 1867; and the NT Theologies of Holtzmann [Tubingen, 1911], Weiss [Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1882-83], and Beyschlag [Eng. tr., do. 1895]. See, further, W. P. Dickson, St. Paul's Use of the Terms Flesh and Spirit, Glasgow, 1883; H. H. Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1892, i. 156; H. W. Robinson, 'Heb. Psychology in relation to Pauline Anthropology,' in Mansfield College Essays, London, 1909; F. Paget, Spirit of Discipline, do. 1891, p. 80 ff. J. C. LAMBERT.

BOLDNESS.—'Boldness' (with the allied expressions 'bold,' 'boldly,' 'to be bold') has several Greek equivalents in the apostolic writings.—(a) In the sense of daring, we find it used to render τολμᾶν, 'to dare,' 'to be bold' (2 Co 10<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>, Ph 1<sup>14</sup>). The cognate adverb τολμηρῶς in the compar. τολμηρότερον is used by St. Paul (Ro 15<sup>15</sup>). The verb, in composition with the strengthening prep. ἀπό, is used in Ro 10<sup>20</sup>, where ἀποτολμᾶν has the force of 'to be very bold.'—(b) In the sense of being of good courage it is employed to render θαρρεῖν in 2 Co 5<sup>6</sup>, 8 7<sup>16</sup> (RV); the AV having 'confident,' 'confidence' in these places). In 2 Co 10<sup>1-2</sup>, where the same verb is rendered 'to be bold' in AV, the RV prefers 'to be of good courage'; and similarly 'we may boldly say' of AV in He 13<sup>6</sup> is rendered in RV 'with good courage we say.' In Ac 23<sup>15</sup> θάραρος occurs in the expression used regarding St. Paul—'he thanked God and took courage.' θάραρος and θαρσύνης are used in the sense of 'over-confidence,' 'insolence' in Patristic literature in company with such words as πλεονεξία, 'covetousness,' and ἀλαζονεία, 'boastfulness' (Didache iii. 9, v. 1).—(c) In the sense of liberty and frankness of speech it is employed to translate παρρησία and the derived verb παρρησιάζεσθαι. In classical usage παρρησία (πᾶν and ῥῆσις) is the frank and outspoken expression of opinion which was the cherished privilege of Athenian citizenship. In NT usage it denotes the glad and fearless confidence in drawing near to God, and having communion with Him, which is the dearest privilege of the Christian heart (Eph 3<sup>12</sup>, He 4<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>-3</sup>). It is contrasted with shrinking back from fear or shame (Ph 1<sup>20</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>-3</sup>). In reference to speech, it is plainness and candour without reserve or ambiguity, without parable or metaphor, without hesitation or misgiving, in the utterance of it (Jn 7<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>14</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>, 29, Ac 4<sup>29</sup> 13<sup>46</sup> where παρρησιάζεσθαι is used). 'When it is transferred from words to actions, it appears always to retain the idea of "confidence, boldness"' (Lightfoot on Col 2<sup>15</sup>).

The chief usages of the word in the apostolic writers may be given as follows:

(1) Fearlessness and frankness in the public proclamation of the gospel.—Examples are St. Peter on the day of Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>21</sup>), St. Peter and St. John before the Council (4<sup>13</sup>), and in setting forth Christ to the people (4<sup>9</sup>, 31), St. Paul at Rome preaching to all and sundry (23<sup>31</sup>). In this sense παρρησιάζεσθαι is used of Saul at Damascus and Jerusalem (9<sup>27ff.</sup>), of St. Paul and Barnabas at Antioch of Pisidia (13<sup>46</sup>), of Apollos at Ephesus (18<sup>-9</sup>), of St. Paul himself at Thessalonica (1 Th 2<sup>2</sup>; cf. Eph 6<sup>19ff.</sup>).

(2) Confidence in prayer and communion with God through Christ.—This is the privilege which St. Paul (Eph 3<sup>12</sup>) commends to his readers when he speaks of 'boldness and access in confidence' which are theirs through their faith in Christ. The same fearless confidence is dwelt upon by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>).

This joyous confidence in prayer is specially notable in St. John's First Epistle (3<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>14</sup>). It comes of abiding in Christ (2<sup>28</sup>), of the presence in the heart of the love which casts out fear (4<sup>17</sup>), of a clear conscience and an obedient life (3<sup>20-23</sup>).

(3) Candid speech towards Christian brethren (2 Co 7<sup>4</sup>, Philem<sup>8</sup>, and possibly 2 Co 3<sup>12</sup>, if Chrysostom's interpretation be correct).

(4) Fearless bearing in the Church and before the world acquired through the faithful discharge of duty (1 Ti 3<sup>13</sup>, Ph 1<sup>20</sup>).

(5) Fearless confidence at the appearance of Christ and before His judgment seat (1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>17-19</sup>).—The Scriptural opposite is the shame of the man without the wedding-garment who was speechless (Mt 22<sup>12</sup>). Clement's words are a good illustration: 'The good workman takes with boldness the bread which is the reward of labour, but the slothful and the indolent dare not meet the eye of their employer' (1 Clem. xxxiv. 1). Cf. also Wis 5<sup>1</sup>: 'Then [in the judgment] shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before the face of them that afflicted him.'

LITERATURE.—D. Russell Scott, art. 'Boldness (Christian)' in ERE ii. 785, with lit. there cited; also J. H. Jowett, The Transfigured Church, 1910, p. 181. T. NICOL.

BOND (Col 2<sup>14</sup>).—The point here lies in the word χειρόγραφον. For 'bond' in the sense of δούλος, see 1 Co 12<sup>13</sup> etc., and in that of σύνδεσμος (ligament in surgery [very often]), see Col 2<sup>19</sup>, etc. Col 2<sup>14</sup> is the only instance in the NT of the word χειρόγραφον, though there are other compounds with χειρ (χειραγωγέω, Ac 9<sup>8</sup>; χειραγωγός, Ac 13<sup>11</sup>; χειροποιήτος, Eph 2<sup>11</sup>, and ἀχειροποίητος, Col 2<sup>11</sup>; χειροτονεύω, Ac 14<sup>-5</sup>). This synthetic compound means originally 'handwriting' or 'autograph,' and occurs in this sense in Polybius (xxx. 8. 4), Dion. Hal. (v. 8), etc. Its technical use is for 'a note of hand, a bond or obligation, as having the "sign manual" of the debtor or contractor' (Lightfoot, Col.<sup>3</sup>, 1879, in loc.); so To 5<sup>3</sup> ἔδωκεν αὐτῷ τὸ χειρόγραφον. See also Plut. (Mor. p. 829 A) and Artem. (Oneir. iii. 40). Its position as a κοινὴ word is greatly strengthened by the papyri, where it is very common (Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 247). Some of these bonds in papyri texts are crossed out with the Greek cross-letter X, thus cancelling the note (cf. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 336 f.). A number of these 'crossed-out' bonds are in the papyri lists at Berlin, Heidelberg, and elsewhere. This was the method of official as well as private cancellation (see the Florentine Papyrus [A.D. 85], where the Governor of Egypt ordered the bond to be 'crossed out' [χιασθῆναι]). There is no evidence for the notion that these bonds were cancelled by hanging on nails (perforation). There are examples of inscribed leaden rolls being perforated and hung on nails, but not for cancellation by the nails (Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 273 f.). St. Paul piles up his metaphors, as he often does, by the use of ἐξαιλέψας ('blotting out'; cf. χιάζω, 'cross out'), ἤρκεν ἐκ τοῦ μέσου ('take out of the midst'; note change to indicative and perfect for notion of permanent removal). Dibelius (Handbuch zum NT, 'Kolossier,' 1912, p. 81) cites Epictetus' use of αἶπε ἐξω, αἶπε ἐκ τοῦ μέσου as synonymous. As to προσηλώσας τῷ σταυρῷ ('nailing to the cross'), E. Haupt (Meyer-Haupt, Kom. Kol., 1902, in loc.) points out that with St. Paul it is not the cancelling by nailing, but the nailing to the cross that is dominant. These three metaphors all accentuate the main idea of the cancellation of the debt.

What the bond is in Col 2<sup>14</sup> scholars are not agreed. Probably the general notion of law is correct, since Gentiles as well as Jews seem to be included, rather than the Mosaic Law or the narrower notion of the purely ceremonial law. The addition of τοῖς δόγμασιν, difficult as to syntax, points to formulated commandment (Peake, EGT, 'Colossians,' 1903, in loc.) of some kind (cf. Eph 2<sup>15</sup>), though 'the moral assent of the conscience' (Lightfoot, in loc.) is surely involved also. No stress is to be laid on the fact of the law being written or not written (the autograph idea in χειρόγραφον) by the sinner, though, if the primary reference be to the Jews, they might be said to have signed the contract in giving assent to the law as represented in Dt 27<sup>14-26</sup>. The central idea is that the bond of moral obligation which was against us (καθ' ἡμῶν and ἡ ὑπεραντίον ἡμῶν) has been removed by the death of Christ on the Cross. It has been cancelled (crossed out) and hung up for all to see (nailed to the cross) as an obligation from which we are now free. It is a bold picture of grace versus works as the method of salvation. Christ has paid the debt and destroyed the note against us. Cf. St. Paul's offer to pay Philemon for the debt of Onesimus (Philem<sup>18</sup>).

A. T. ROBERTSON.

BONDAGE.—'Bondage' in the EV uniformly represents δουλεία, which can equally well be rendered 'slavery.' Note the Vulg. servitus and Wyclif's corresponding term, 'servage.'

1. So far as literal slavery is meant in the use of this and kindred expressions, see art. SLAVERY.

2. 'Bondage' has an important figurative use in the Epistles in relation to spiritual experience. It denotes the state of sin. The place filled by slavery in the social structure of that age made such a figure natural and forceful. St. Paul conspicuously employs this description of the sinful state in his discussion of human sin in Ro 5-7. It is evident that he was far more deeply interested in man's spiritual bondage and his deliverance than in slavery as an institution open to challenge in the cause of humanity. No slavery in his view was comparable with that of a man 'sold under sin,' whether lord or slave. This became a commonplace in the thought of the early Church. The writings of St. Augustine and St. Chrysostom notably furnish many instances of its vigorous enforcement. Similar sentiments, it should be added, were held by Plotinus (3rd cent.) and the Neo-Platonic School of Alexandria. (In the NT note the description of man as enslaved to sin, Ro 6<sup>17</sup>; or to passions and pleasures, Tit 3<sup>3</sup>; cf. 2<sup>3</sup>.)

The bondage of the will ('the will, deprived of liberty, is led or dragged by necessity to evil' [Calvin, Inst. iii. 2]), a theologoumenon figuring so largely in the Augustinian and the Reformed theology, strains Pauline teaching and finds little or no illustration in the Ante-Nicene Fathers.

3. The righteous life, on the other hand, is also described as a bondage (Ro 6<sup>18</sup>). This servitude, which is that of the οἰκτοί of God, or of Christ (1 Co 7<sup>-24</sup> etc.), is freedom in relation to that of sin (as per se, cf. 'Whose service is perfect freedom,' Book of Common Prayer), and vice versa. But St. Paul surely uses a gentle irony in representing sinners as 'free' from the bondage of righteousness (Ro 6<sup>-9</sup>).

4. The term is used of other forms of religious life in contrast to the liberty of the Christian life. Thus in the allegory, wrought out in Rabbinical fashion, in Gal 4<sup>21</sup>, Judaism spells bondage; the gospel, freedom. In v. 3 and vv. 8-10 slavery πρὸς τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου includes apparently reference both to Jewish legalism and to Gentile devotion to false gods. In this connexion must be noted Ro 8<sup>15</sup> (cf. Gal 4<sup>4-7</sup>) with its striking contrast between the servile temper of fear characterizing life under law, so vividly depicted in Ro 7, and the filial spirit of happy confidence pertaining to Christian experience. For another instance of the association of bondage with fear and the antithesis between the filial and the servile condition, see He 2<sup>14c</sup>.

5. In Ro 8<sup>21</sup> all creation is represented as being in bondage—'servitude to decay'—but hoping for deliverance and for that freedom which characterizes 'the glory of the children of God.' With this contrast the reference in 2 P 2<sup>19</sup> to 'the bondage of corruption' as=moral degradation.

J. S. CLEMENS.

BONDS.—See PRISON, CHAIN.

BOOK.—See WRITING.

BOOK OF LIFE.—The actual phrase occurs in six passages only of the NT: Ph 4<sup>3</sup>, Rev 3<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>12, 15</sup> 21<sup>27</sup> (in 22<sup>19</sup> the evidence for the reading 'book of life' [AV] instead of 'tree of life' [RV] is negligible). Of these passages the most important for the purpose of determining the meaning is Rev 20<sup>12, 15</sup>, because there the book of life is distinguished from certain other books: 'and the books were opened, and another book was opened which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things that were written in the books, according to their works . . . and whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire.' The natural implication here is that the other books were records of works, but that the book of life was simply a register of the names of those destined for life—an interpretation which fits all the above-noted passages.

An interesting exegetical point comes up in connexion with Rev 13<sup>8</sup>. The words 'from the foundation of the world' may grammatically refer either to 'written' or to 'the Lamb which hath been slain.' But in 17<sup>8</sup>, where the same phrase occurs, the only natural way to take it is as referring to 'written'; and this is practically decisive for 13<sup>8</sup> also (so Swete, Apoc. of St. John<sup>2</sup>, London, 1907, and RV). The phrase thus carries a suggestion of predestination; but this is not thought of as absolute, since the idea of blotting out a name from the book of life occurs quite freely.

With the above-noted passages there fall into line a number of others where the same conception is clearly implied: Lk 10<sup>-9</sup>, Dn 12<sup>1</sup>, Ps 69<sup>-8</sup>, Ex 32<sup>32, 33</sup>. The conception of a register found in all these passages seems to be based on the analogy of citizen-lists, registers of the theocratic community, such as are referred to in Is 4<sup>3</sup>: 'He that is left in Zion shall be called holy, every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem' (cf. Neh 12<sup>-2, 23</sup>, Ezk 13<sup>9</sup>). To be written in the heavenly counterpart of such a list meant to be assured of being a sharer in the blessings destined for the true Israel. Other passages which associate themselves more or less closely with this conception are 1 S 25<sup>-9</sup>, Ps 87<sup>6</sup> 139<sup>16</sup>, Is 48<sup>19</sup>, Jer 22<sup>30</sup>, He 12<sup>23</sup>.

The conception of a heavenly record of man's actions, which we found clearly distinguished from the above in Rev 20<sup>12-15</sup>, appears equally distinct in Dn 7<sup>10</sup> as compared with 12<sup>1</sup>. See also Ps 56<sup>8</sup>, Is 65<sup>6</sup>, Mal 3<sup>16</sup>.

Different again is the conception of the Book with the Seven Seals in Rev 5, for that is thought of as the book of destiny—the prophetic history of the world.

All three conceptions appear in the Book of Enoch. When the Head of Days 'seated Himself on the throne of His glory, and the books of the living were opened before Him' (En. xlvii. 3), the context makes it clear that the purpose of the opening of the books is not a great assize, it is a vindication of the righteous that is at hand, and 'the living' means, not all living, but the righteous. Charles remarks that 'books of the holy ones' in En. cviii. 3 has practically the same meaning. The complementary conception 'the book of those that shall be destroyed' appears in Jub. xxx. 22.* The second conception, that of a record, appears in En. lxxxix. 70 ff., where the evil deeds of the shepherds are recorded and read before the Lord; cf. xc. 17, 20, xcvi. 7, 8, civ. 7 (a daily record). The idea of a book of fate or prophetic history, is represented by the 'heavenly tablets,' lxxxi. 1, 2, xciii. 1 ff.; but this should be kept separate. See, further, following article.

As regards the origin of the conception, if we take the heavenly book in the wider sense of a record of men's actions or a prophetic world history, it is obviously one of those conceptions for which it is not easy to establish a relation of dependence between one religion and another, since it is likely to arise independently in various places. A. Jeremias (Babylonisches im NT, Leipzig, 1905, p. 69 ff., and art. 'Book of Life,' in ERE) has pointed to the Bab. New Year's Festival, at which it was conceived that an assembly of the gods determined the events of the year, and especially the duration of men's lives, which was written down in a 'tablet of life.' For the narrower conception of the book of life as set forth above, the most interesting literary parallel is that cited by Jeremias from the Akhmim fragments of the Coptic Apoc. of Sophonias (Zephaniah), tr. L. Stern, in Zeitschr. für ägypt. Sprache, xxiv. [1886]. There the seer inquires about two angels whom he sees, and is told by his angel guide: 'These are the angels of the Lord Almighty who inscribe all the good works of the righteous in His scrolls, sitting at the gate of heaven. They give these scrolls to me, to take them to the Lord Almighty, in order that He may write their name (sc. names of the righteous) in the Book of the Living.' This passage is not of any value as evidence for the source of the conception, for the work shows in many places dependence upon Rev., but it probably indicates correctly how the relation of the book of life to the other books in Rev 20<sup>12</sup> is to be conceived. As Alford there explains it, on internal grounds, the other books are, so to speak, the 'vouchers' for the book of life.

In the Apostolic Fathers the conception occurs in 1 Clem. xlv. 8: 'Those who remained faithful, inherited glory and honour, were exalted and were inscribed by God in His memorial for ever'; Hermas, Vis. i. 3. 2: 'Cease not to admonish thy children, for I know that if they shall repent with their whole hearts they shall be inscribed in the books of life with the saints,' and Sim. ii. 9: 'He that does these things shall not be abandoned by God, but shall be inscribed upon the books of the living'; cf. Mand. viii. 6: 'Refrain thyself from all these things, that thou mayest live to God, and be enrolled with those who exercise self-restraint therein.'

Among homiletic expositions of the passage Rev 20<sup>12</sup> one of the most impressive is that of St. Augustine in de Civ. Dei, xx. 14. Taking the book of life as a record of men's deeds, he observes that it cannot be understood literally, since the reading of such a record would be interminable. 'We must therefore understand it of a certain Divine power by which it shall be brought about that every one shall recall to memory all his own works, whether good or evil, and shall mentally survey them with a marvellous rapidity, so that this knowledge will either accuse or excuse conscience, and thus all and each shall be simultaneously judged.'

LITERATURE.—R. H. Charles, The Book of Enoch<sup>2</sup>, Oxford, 1912, note on xlvii. 3; H. Zimmern, KAT<sup>3</sup>, Berlin, 1903, p. 401 ff.; A. Jeremias, art. 'Book of Life' in ERE; W. Bousset, Com.

* It is interesting to note that the Old Latin (Donatist) text in Jer 17<sup>13</sup> has 'recedentes a te scribantur in libro mortis' (see Burkitt, Old Latin and Itala [TS iv. 3 (1896)], p. 87).

(Göttingen, 1896) on Rev 3<sup>2</sup>; B. Duhm, Com. (Göttingen, 1902) on Is 4<sup>3</sup>; A. Bertholet, Stellung der Israeliten u. der Juden zu den Fremden, Freiburg and Leipzig, 1896.

W. MONTGOMERY.

BOOK WITH THE SEVEN SEALS.—There is no more impressive piece of symbolism in the Apocalypse than that connected with the seven-sealed book (Rev 5). Much of the imagery of Rev. strikes the modern Western mind as exotic and unattractive; it is only by a determined use of the historical imagination that we can bring ourselves to a sympathetic understanding of it. But here the qualities which we look for in great painting or in epic poetry are plainly to be seen. And this applies both to the imagery and to the dominant thought. The unnamed Presence in the glory of light on the central throne, the representatives of humanity and nature grouped around and before Him, the concentration of interest in these seven-sealed book held out upon (ἐπὶ, acc.) His hand, the dramatic challenge, the dread pause when there seems no answer, emphasized by the grief of the Seer, the triumphant approach of the Lion of the tribe of Judah—each point in the progress of the drama seizes the reader's imagination and increases the tension of his sympathies, till at last they are afforded relief by the magnificent burst of acclamation which follows.

And the thought, as has been said, is worthy of its setting, for this sealed book is the book of destiny, the prophetic history of the world as fore-known in the purpose of God; and the fact that the Lion of the tribe of Judah alone prevails to open the book is the symbolic expression of what would be described in modern language as the central significance of Christ in history. That the Lion is also the Slain Lamb attaches this significance especially to His sacrifice of Himself: 'For thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood . . . and hast made us unto our God, kings and priests.' In a word, the purpose of history is the founding of a redeemed humanity.

To touch on some of the details—the conception of a book containing the future history of the world is found in Enoch, lxxxi. 1, 2: 'And he said unto me: O Enoch, observe the writing of the heavenly tablets and read what is written thereon . . . and I read the book of all the deeds of men, and of all the children of flesh that will be upon the earth to the remotest generations'; and more especially xciii. 2, 3: 'Concerning the children of righteousness . . . I will speak to you . . . according to that which I have learned from the heavenly tables.' (Then follows a prophetic scheme of the history of Israel divided into seven weeks.)

The seals obviously imply the secret nature of the record (not here, directly, ratification), as in Dn 12<sup>4</sup>. If the vision of ch. 5 stood alone, the sevenfold sealing might simply emphasize this idea, but the successive opening of the seals implies that the leaves of the book or parchment-roll are sealed down in successive portions, and the idea of completeness in the seven is thus referred to the history (cf. the seven weeks of Israel's history in Enoch).

The visions connected with the opening of the several seals are of less central interest, belonging rather to the general furniture of apocalyptic. The second to the sixth signify clearly war, famine, pestilence, persecution, convulsions of nature. As to the meaning of the first horseman, expositors are not agreed. Swete takes the first two together as representatives of war in its two aspects of victory and carnage. At the seventh vision the scheme, instead of moving directly to its completion, branches out into new ramifications.

LITERATURE.—See Literature at end of preceding article.

W. MONTGOMERY.

BOSOR.—See BEOR.

BOTTOMLESS PIT.—See ABYSS.

BOWL.—The word is used in the RV instead of 'vial' to translate φιάλη, which occurs 12 times in Revelation. The change was desirable, as the former word, a modification of 'phial,' has come to mean a small glass vessel or bottle, as in Milton's 'precious vialled liquors.' φιάλη meant in classical Greek (after Homer, to whom it was a cinerary urn) a broad shallow bowl used in drinking or in offering libations. Its saucer shape allowed its contents to be poured out at once or suddenly. It was often of finely-wrought gold or silver (Herod. ii. 151; Pind. Nem. ix. 122), and it is a familiar object in classical art. In the LXX φιάλη denotes a bronze bowl or basin (πῖλ.) used in the sacrificial ritual of Tabernacle or Temple (Ex 27<sup>3</sup>)—the vessel in which the priest caught the warm blood of the victim, to dash it upon the altar. These uses of the word, with striking modifications, are reflected in Revelation. (1) In a single passage (5<sup>8</sup>) it is employed with its classical connotation, except that the offering which the vessel holds is not the pagan libation of wine, but the Levitical gift of incense. 'The ζῶα and the πρεσβύτεροι [representing perhaps all Nature and all saints] fell down before the Lamb, having . . . golden bowls [φιάλας χρυσᾶς] full of incense.' The Vulg. has 'phialas aureas,' but the proper Lat. equivalent of φιάλη was 'patera,' as in Virg. Geor. ii. 192, 'pateris libamus et auro.' The subjoined interpretation of the bowls and their contents as 'the prayers of the saints' is probably an editorial gloss suggested by Rev 8<sup>4</sup> (see INCENSE). (2) In every other passage where the word occurs the φιάλη does not exhale a cloud of fragrant incense, sent up with the adoration of saints, but is filled with the hot, bitter, poisonous wine of the wrath of God, which earth is made to drink—a figure resembling the prophetic 'cup of reeling' (Is 51<sup>17, 22</sup>), but even more appalling. The seven angels who have the seven bowls are 'laden with the seven last plagues' (Rev 21<sup>9</sup>). Every emptied φιάλη means an added judgment falling on land or sea or air (16<sup>14</sup>). Hence in common speech the words 'vials' and 'wrath' have become almost inseparably linked together.

JAMES STRAHAN.

BREAKING OF BREAD.—See LOVE-FEAST, EUCHARIST.

BREASTPLATE.—See ARMOUR.

BRETHREN.—In the OT this term refers to: (1) birth from the same parent or parents (very frequently, e.g., in Gn 37–50); (2) membership of the same nation (e.g. Ex 2<sup>11</sup>), with special emphasis on the bond thus established between the various single tribes (e.g. Nu 18; Dt 3<sup>9</sup>), even when one of them is separated off (Dt 10<sup>9</sup> 18<sup>2, 7</sup>); (3) membership of other groups lying between the family and the nation, i.e. clans and single tribes (see Dt 18<sup>7</sup>, where the Levite's 'brethren' are his fellow-Levites); (4) metaphorical applications which are too general and too various for exact delimitation.

The OT and NT alike use only one word for 'brethren' (πῖλ. and ἀδελφοί respectively), and trust to its flexibility to express every needed shade of meaning. ἀδελφός is of great frequency (about 40 times in Mt. and still oftener in Acts). In the Gospels the literal use predominates; in the Acts and Epistles various metaphorical uses. The literal use is especially clear in Mt 10<sup>21</sup> 12<sup>46</sup> 13<sup>35</sup> 22<sup>25</sup>, but Mt. tends more than any other Gospel to a metaphorical sense; cf. 5<sup>22, 23, 24, 47</sup> 12<sup>48–50</sup> 13<sup>15</sup> 23<sup>8</sup> 23<sup>40</sup> 23<sup>30</sup>, to which only Lk 8<sup>1, 17</sup> provide even a partial parallel. The 'brother' intended is especially one's fellow-Christian, and Mt. in this way leads over from the Gospels to the rest of the NT, much of which is, however, chronologically earlier.

ἀδελφός in the purely family sense (see (1) above) occurs in Ac 12<sup>2</sup>, Gal 1<sup>19</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>6</sup>, and perhaps 2 Co 8<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>18</sup> (A. Souter in ExpT xviii. [1906-07] 285). In its second sense it occurs in Ro 9<sup>3</sup> (cf. Ac 22<sup>1,5</sup> 23<sup>1,5,6</sup>, where St. Paul is addressing Jews). Usually, however, 'the brethren' (cf. ἀδελφότης, 'the brotherhood' [1 P 2<sup>17</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>]) means the Christian community (e.g. Ac 1<sup>15</sup>), and this is much more definitely marked off from non-Christians than in Mt. (cf. 1 Co 5<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>; the whole spirit of Gal., especially the privileged 'household of the faith,' 6<sup>10</sup>; and the alienation from 'the world' in Jn. and 1 Jn.).

ἀδελφός was common at this time in the Greek East as meaning 'member of a community' (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 82f., Light from the Ancient East<sup>2</sup>, do., 1911, p. 107), but it would be a mistake to minimize on that account its fervent tone in the NT, or its importance as suggesting a fulfilment of such words of Jesus as Jn 13<sup>35</sup> concerning mutual love. This love is a command (Jn 13<sup>34</sup>), a fundamental thing taught directly by God (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>), a test of living or not living in God (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>). Denney in HDB (art. 'Brotherly Love') points out that it found expression in two special ways—hospitality and care for persecuted Christians. The word 'brethren' is continually used in exhortation and appeal, sometimes strengthened by ἀγαπητοί ('beloved'), as in 1 Co 15<sup>58</sup>; or καὶ ἐπιποθήτοι ('and longed for') may further be added (Ph 4<sup>1</sup>). Again, brethren are called πίστοι ('faithful' or 'believing'), as Col 1<sup>2</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, or ἅγιοι ('holy'), as Col 1<sup>2</sup>, He 3<sup>1</sup>. Frequently 'brother' has a pathetic tone (1 Co 8<sup>11</sup>, Philem 7. 16. 20, 2 Th 3<sup>15</sup> Ja 2<sup>15</sup>). It is often a humble or a humbling word (Gal 3<sup>15</sup> 6<sup>1</sup>, Ph 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 Th 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>1</sup>). In Ac 9<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>12</sup> (see Commentaries) it breathes a fine magnanimity. Gal 6<sup>18</sup> is noteworthy in that this most fiery of St. Paul's letters is the only one which has 'brothers' as its closing note.

C. H. WATKINS.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD.—See JAMES, EP. OF.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM.—See artt. FAMILY and MARRIAGE.

BRIMSTONE.—Brimstone (θεῖον)* or sulphur, is scientifically one of the most important of the non-metallic elements, widely distributed in the mineral world, sometimes pure, and sometimes chemically combined with other elements, forming sulphates and sulphides. It is found in greatest abundance in volcanic regions, and is extensively employed in arts and manufactures. Most of what is used in modern Europe is obtained from Sicily, which finds therein one of the sources of its wealth. The ancients used brimstone for ordinary fumigations and especially for religious purifications.

'Bring hither fire, and hither sulphur bring To purge the palace'

(Homer, Od. xxii. 481f.).

In the Græco-Roman period the hot sulphur springs of Palestine, on both sides of the Dead Sea, at Tiberias, and in the valley of the Yarmuk, were used medicinally. At the direction of his physicians, Herod the Great 'went beyond the river Jordan, and bathed himself in the warm baths that were at Callirrhoe, which, besides their other general virtues, were also fit to drink' (Jos. Ant. xvii. vi. 5). But the biblical meaning, which is invariably determined by Gn 19<sup>24</sup>, reflects the ideas of a pre-scientific age, in which the commercial value and domestic utility of brimstone were unsuspected, while electric currents and their sulphurous fumes were regarded as indications of the wrath of heaven. 'Fire and brimstone and a burning wind' (Ps 11<sup>6</sup>), 'an overflowing shower, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone' (Ezk 38<sup>2</sup>), were not the mere symbols, but the actual media of Divine judgment. The association of lightning and brimstone was wide-spread and persistent, the ozonic odour which accompanies electric discharges being ascribed to the presence of sulphur. 'Fulgmina, fulgura quoque,' says Pliny, 'sulfuris odorem habent, ac lux ipsa eorum sulfurea est' (HN xxxv. l. [15]). 'Sulfur aethereum' (Lucan, vii. 160) and 'sulfur sacrum' (Pers. ii. 25) are synonyms for lightning, and Shakespeare's 'stones of sulphur' are thunderbolts.

The prophetic writer of Revelation naturally retains the old picturesque language with its dread suggestion. His armies of angelic horsemen have breastplates of fire and of hyacinth and of brimstone—red and blue and yellow—and their breath is fire and smoke and brimstone (9<sup>17</sup>). The worshippers of the Beast and his image are to be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the angels and the Lamb (14<sup>10</sup>). And the destruction of the wicked in the end of the age will be a magnified repetition of the overthrow of the cities of the Ghor—the godless multitude are to be cast into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone, which is the second death (2<sup>18</sup>; cf. 19<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>10</sup>).

JAMES STRAHAN.

BROTHER.—See FAMILY.

BROTHERHOOD.—See BRETHREN, FELLOWSHIP.

BROTHERLY LOVE.—1. Meaning of the words and usage.—The word φιλადελφία occurs in the NT in Ro 12<sup>10</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>, He 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1-, 2 P 1<sup>7</sup>. The AV renders it in the first three passages 'brotherly love,' in the fourth 'love of the brethren,' in the last 'brotherly kindness' (in order to mark a qualitative as well as a quantitative distinction between φιλადελφία and the following ἀγάπη). The RV has in all passages 'love of the brethren,' which is more correct, since in the Greek word the second part takes the place of an objective, not a subjective, genitive. The adjective φιλάδελφος is found in 1 P 3<sup>8</sup>. The original meaning of the word is the literal one of love for brothers (and sisters) by blood-relationship (cf. Xen. Mem. ii. iii. 17, 'loving one like a brother'; Jos. Ant. iv. ii. 4, where the word is used of Moses and Aaron; Lucian, Dial. Deor. xxvi. 2, where it is used of Castor and Pollux). In the NT it has only the metaphorical sense of love towards the fellow-members of the Church—a usage which already occurs in earlier Jewish writings (cf. 2 Mac 15<sup>14</sup>, the love of Israelite towards Israelite). It should be noted that 'the brotherhood' (1 P 2<sup>17</sup>) to which this love applies is nowhere in the NT humanity as such. 'Brethren' is not the correlate of the universal Fatherhood of God, but of that specific paternal relation which God sustains to believers (cf. Mt 23<sup>8,9</sup>). The NT conception has its root in the redemptive experience of Israel (Zec 11<sup>14</sup>, Mal 2<sup>10</sup>) and of the Apostolic Church. It obtains its significance for universalism through the missionary extension of this, not through philosophical abstraction from all positive differences as is the case with the Hellenic idea of cosmopolitanism. Even where the duty of love for all men is based on kinship by nature, this is traced back to creation in the image of God (Ja 3<sup>9</sup>). In 1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> love towards the fellow-members of the Church and towards all is explicitly distinguished, but it is uncertain whether 'all' here means all Christians or all men. In 2 P 17 'love' appears as something supplementary to 'brotherly love'; the context here requires the reference of this 'love' to man; the distinction between φιλὰδελφία and ἀγάπη must therefore lie in the range of extent; at the same time the difference in the word used suggests the deeper and more intimate character of brotherly love (cf. φιλεῖν in Jn 5<sup>20</sup> 16<sup>27</sup>). In Gal 6<sup>10</sup> a distinction is made between the working of good toward 'all men' and toward 'them that are of the household of the faith.'

* θεῖον is a word of uncertain etymology. It may be the neut. of θεῖος and mean Divine incense, from the supposed purifying and contagion-preventing virtue of burning sulphur; but Curtius allies it with θεῖω and fumus. Brimstone is the O.E. 'brenston' and Scot. 'bruntstane.'

2. The primacy of love in Christianity.—The distinctiveness of Christianity lies not so much in the theoretical discovery or proclamation of the principle of love, either as constitutive in the Divine character or as regulative for human conduct, but rather in the production of forces and motives which give to the principle a new concrete reality in the life of men (cf. Mk 12<sup>32</sup>, Lk 10<sup>-7</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>). Still, even as a subject of teaching, love occupies a prominent place in the apostolic writings. It appears not merely as one important factor among others in the Christian life, but as its chief and most characteristic ingredient, greater even than faith and hope (1 Co 13<sup>13</sup>). The Pastoral Epistles utter a warning against the absorption of the religious interest by the false gnosis and its asceticism or impure love to the detriment of true Christian love (1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>22-25</sup> 3<sup>1-4</sup> 10). The primacy of love also finds expression in such passages as Ro 13<sup>8-10</sup>, Eph 1<sup>4</sup>, Ja 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 2<sup>4</sup>.

3. Love for God.—The love thus made prominent is, before all else, love towards God. Ritschl's view, that the NT writers, especially St. Paul, conceive of love towards God as something difficult of attainment, and therefore hesitate to speak of it, except in the quotation which underlies Ro 8<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>, Ja 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>, is not borne out by the facts. Against it speaks 2 Th 2<sup>5</sup>. Conceptions like 'living unto God' (Ro 6<sup>10</sup> 11, Gal 2<sup>19</sup>), 'pleasing God' (Ro 8<sup>5</sup>, Gal 1<sup>10</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>1</sup>), 'offering sacrifice to God' (Ro 12<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>16</sup>, Ph 4<sup>18</sup>, He 13<sup>15</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>), 'serving God' (Ro 1<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>6</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>, He 9<sup>14</sup>), all imply that the Christian's religious life is inspired by an affection directly terminating upon God (cf. also 1 Co 14-, Rev 2<sup>10</sup> 13). It is unwarranted, where the conception of love occurs without further specification of the object, to think exclusively of the fraternal affection among Christians mutually. In many cases the writers may have had in mind primarily the love for God. The very fact that Christian love must be exercised in imitation of Christ favours this primary God-ward reference (Eph 5-). Nor is it correct to say that the only mode of expressing love to God lies in the service of men. 1 Jn 4<sup>12</sup> is often quoted in proof of this, but the passage in the context means no more than that the invisibility of God exposes man in his feeling of love for Him to the danger of self-deception, which can be guarded against by testing oneself in regard to the actual experience of love for the brethren. Hence in 5 the opposite principle is also affirmed, viz. that the assurance of the genuineness of one's love for the brethren is obtainable from the exercise of love and obedience towards God. Only in so far as the love of God assumes the form of concrete deeds of helpfulness, it cannot serve God except in the brethren.

4. Interdependence of the love for God and love for the brethren.—The love for God and the love for the brethren are not, according to the apostolic teaching, two independent facts. In examining their relation, it should be remembered that the love for God and the love for Christ are to the NT practically interchangeable conceptions, Christ no less than God being the source and recipient of religious devotion (Eph 3<sup>19</sup>). This may be most strikingly illustrated by a comparison of the Gospel and the First Epistle of John: in the latter, love is derived from and attached to God precisely after the same manner as in the Gospel it is derived from and attached to Christ. The close union of love for God (and Christ) and love for the brethren can be traced both objectively and subjectively. Objectively it may be followed along these lines: the Divine purpose and the redemptive process do not contemplate the production of love for God in isolated individuals, but in the Church as the organic community of believers. It is through the conjoined love for God and the brethren that the Church is and works as an organism (1 Co 12, Eph 3<sup>17</sup>), 'rooted and grounded in love' (Eph 3<sup>17</sup>, cf. Col 3<sup>14</sup> 'the bond of perfectness'); hence the same term, κοινωνία, 'communion,' is used for the fellowship with God and Christ and the fellowship with the brethren (1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>4</sup>, Ph 1<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>7</sup>); the act which produces love for God simultaneously produces love for the brethren, and the same Spirit which underlies and inspires the former likewise underlies and inspires the latter (Ro 15<sup>30</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>6</sup>, Gal 5<sup>-2</sup>, Eph 1<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>-3</sup>, Col 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>); the inseparableness of the two also finds expression in the figure of the family or household of God (Gal 6<sup>10</sup>, Eph 2<sup>19</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>9</sup> 5<sup>1</sup> [where, however, 'him that is begotten' may refer to Christ and not to the fellow-believer]). Subjectively the interdependence of love for God and love for the brethren presents itself as follows: through the recognition of the inclusiveness of the love of God the experience of the same acts as a motive-power for the Christian to include those whom God loves in his own love likewise; the Christian also recognizes that he is not merely the object of the Divine love, but also the instrument of its manifestation to others; he serves man in the service of God (Ro 6<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>-3</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>6</sup>); the love of God and Christ shown him becomes to the believer an example of love to the brethren (Ro 14<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>3</sup> 9, Eph 4<sup>32</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>4ff</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>11</sup>); the idea of a close union between the two also underlies the formula 'faith energizing through love' (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). Here faith as the right attitude towards God as Redeemer begets love for Him, which in turn becomes the active principle of service to others (cf. v. 13). Because the love for others is thus founded on, and regulated by, the love for God, it not only does not require but forbids fellowship with such as are in open opposition to God and Christ (1 Jn 2<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>16</sup>, 2 Jn 10, Rev 2<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>).

5. The origin of brotherly love.—Religious love in general is a supernatural product. It originates not spontaneously from a sinful soil, but in response to the sovereign love of God, and that under the influence of the Spirit (Ro 5<sup>-8</sup> 8<sup>28</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>3</sup> [where 'is known of him' = 'has become the object of his love'], Gal 4<sup>9</sup> [where 'to be known by God' has the same pregnant sense], 1 Jn 4<sup>10</sup> 19). Love for the brethren specifically is also a product of regeneration (1 P 1<sup>22</sup> 23; cf. 1<sup>2</sup> 3). Especially in St. Paul, the origin of brotherly love is connected with the supernatural experience of dying with Christ, in which the sinful love of self is destroyed, and love for God, Christ, and the brethren produced in its place (Ro 6<sup>10ff</sup> 7<sup>4</sup> 8<sup>1-4</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>14-16</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19</sup> 20). Accordingly, love for the brethren appears among other virtues and graces as a fruit of the Spirit, a charisma (Ro 15<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 13, Gal 5<sup>22</sup> 6<sup>8-10</sup>). Although this is not explicitly stated in Acts, there is no doubt that St. Luke (if not the early disciples themselves) derived the manifestation of love in the Mother-church from the influence of the Spirit.

6. The essence of brotherly love.—A psychological definition of brotherly love is nowhere given in the apostolic writings, but certain notes and characteristics are prominently brought out.

These are: (1) On the positive side.—(a) Personal attachment and devotion. The formulæ for this are 'to give oneself,' 'to owe oneself,' 'to seek the person' (2 Co 8<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>14</sup>, Philem 19). There is among the brethren an inner harmony of willing (Ac 4<sup>32</sup>). As such an inward thing true love goes beyond all concrete acts of helpfulness: it means more even than feeding the poor or giving one's body to be burnt (1 Co 13<sup>3</sup>); it involves an absolute identification in life-experience, which goes to the extent of bearing the burden of sorrow for the sins and the weaknesses of others (Ro 15<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>3</sup>, Gal 6<sup>2</sup>).—(b) An energetic assertion of the will to love. Love does not consist in mere sentiment; it is subject to the imperative of duty. St. Paul speaks of it as a matter of pursuit and zealous endeavour (1 Co 14<sup>1</sup>); it involves strenuous labour (1 Th 1<sup>3</sup> [where 'the labour of love' is not the labour performed by love, but the labour involved in loving]). Hence also its voluntariness is emphasized (2 Co 9<sup>7</sup>), and the continuance of its obligation insisted upon (Ro 13<sup>8</sup>).—(c) Concrete helpfulness to others. The NT throughout preaches the necessity for love to issue into practical furtherance of the interests of others. This is emphatically true even of St. Paul, notwithstanding his insistence on faith as the sole ground of salvation. The Apostle, because governed by the principle of the glory of God as subserved by the love of God, requires the work as essential to the completeness of love. 'Good works' is a standing formula in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Ti 2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 26<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>17</sup>, Tit 1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>8</sup>); but it also appears in Ac 9<sup>36</sup>, Ro 13<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup> 10<sup>31</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>8</sup>, Eph 2<sup>10</sup>, Col 1<sup>10</sup>, He 10<sup>4</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>12</sup>, Rev 2<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>2</sup> 23<sup>2</sup> 32<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>14</sup> 20<sup>12</sup> 22<sup>12</sup>. Hence the reference to the 'members' as organs of the service of God (Ro 6<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>). The test of love lies in its helpfulness (Ro 14<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>1</sup>). Love 'edifies,' i.e. builds up, the fellow-Christian (1 Co 8<sup>1</sup>). It contributes, however, not exclusively, nor even primarily, to the material or intellectual, but to the spiritual benefit of others (1 Co 8<sup>1</sup>). The NT avoids the errors both of the Jewish and of the Hellenic practice of ethics. In Judaism the external acts had become too much detached from the personal spirit of devotion. In Hellenism the interest was too much turned inward and absorbed by a self-centred cultivation of virtue as such. Because all conduct is thus determined by the supreme principle of love as helpfulness, all casuistry is excluded and ethical problems are all reduced to the one question: what will benefit my brother? This absence of all casuistic treatment of ethical questions is characteristic of St. James as well as of St. Paul.

(2) On the negative side.—The negation of self. Love for the brethren originates only through the death of the sinful love of self. Those who die this death no longer live to themselves (2 Co 5<sup>15</sup>, Gal 2<sup>19</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, Ph 2<sup>21</sup>); love is the opposite of all self-pleasing and self-seeking (Ro 15<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 2<sup>4</sup> 7 Gal 1<sup>10</sup> 1 Th 2<sup>5</sup>, Eph 6<sup>8</sup>, Ph 1<sup>16</sup>, Col 3<sup>2</sup>). It excludes every selfish cult of individuality (Ro 12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>2</sup>), all vain-glorious and excessive self-consciousness (Ro 3<sup>27</sup> 12<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, Ph 3<sup>3</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>6</sup>), all envious comparison of self with others (Ro 12<sup>3</sup>, Gal 4<sup>17</sup>), all personal anger or resentment (2 Co 2<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>20</sup> Gal 5<sup>20</sup>, Eph 4<sup>26</sup> 31 6<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>17</sup>, Col 3<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>); it is not, however, inconsistent with wrath for the sake of Christ and God (2 Co 2<sup>7</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>14-16</sup> Rev 2<sup>15</sup>, 19 6<sup>10</sup>, 16 14<sup>10</sup>), with a strong sense of the independence of men in the service of God (1 Co 9<sup>19</sup>, Gal 2<sup>5</sup>), with the right to glory in the distinction which God's grace has conferred (1 Co 13<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>14</sup> 7<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>7</sup> 11<sup>10</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>, Gal 6<sup>14</sup>, Ph 2<sup>10</sup>).

7. Forms of manifestation of brotherly love.—

As such the following are conspicuously mentioned. (1) The external expression of the inward unity of love in the form of common meals, the ἀγάπαι (Ac 2<sup>42</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>17-34</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>13</sup>, Jude 12). (2) The κοινωνία

of benevolence through the altruistic use of private means (Ac 4<sup>32</sup>, Ro 12<sup>10</sup> 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>2-5</sup> 9<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>14</sup>, 15 Gal 2<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, He 6<sup>10</sup> 13<sup>16</sup>). This κοινωνία was not, however, in the early Church a 'community of goods' in the modern sense (cf. Ac 4<sup>34-35</sup> with 5<sup>4</sup>). In the case of enemies, benevolence becomes the only form in which love can express itself (Ro 12<sup>20</sup>, Gal 6<sup>10</sup>). (3) The missionary extension of the blessings of salvation to others. The duty of missions is distinctly put on the basis of love. Primarily this means love for God and Christ (Ro 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>17</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>2</sup>); but secondarily it signifies also love towards men (Ro 1<sup>4</sup>; cf. 13<sup>8</sup> and Eph 5<sup>28</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>10</sup>). It is characteristic of apostolic missions that they are not related to the individual but to the organism of the Church, and conceived not as an unconscious influence, nor as a secret propaganda (like the Jewish mission), but as an open proclamation and a deliberate pursuit. In the last analysis this is due to the consciousness that the Church as an organism is the instrument through which God and Christ bring their love to bear upon the world.

LITERATURE.—A. Harnack, The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, Eng. tr., 1908, i. 147-198; W. Lütgert, Die Liebe im Neuen Testament, Leipzig, 1905; E. Sartorius, The Doctrine of Divine Love, Eng. tr., 1884; B. Wilberforce, Sanctification by the Truth, 1906, p. 180. GERHARDUS VOS.

BUFFET.—The word 'buffet' is used in AV as the translation of κολαφίζω (lit. 'to give one blows with the fists, or slaps on the ear'), which means 'to treat with violence and contempt.' The verb is found only in the NT and later ecclesiastical writers, and is probably colloquial. In the exhortation to slaves in 1 P 2<sup>20</sup> it is used to describe the rough usage to which such persons were subjected by heathen masters as a punishment for their offences. The fact that it is so used, is probably the reason why it is preferred to other terms of similar import in 1 Co 4<sup>11</sup> ('we are buffeted'), where it is vividly descriptive of the ill usage which St. Paul constantly experienced in pursuit of his apostolic mission, especially when contrasted with the happier fortune of his Corinthian converts ('ye reigned as kings'). 1 Co 9<sup>7</sup> RV gives 'buffet' as the rendering also of υποπιάζω (from υπο and πιάνω, 'to hit under the eye,' and then 'to beat black and blue'), a word admirably fitted to express the hardships and sufferings endured by St. Paul in the course of his ministry, and patiently submitted to as a salutary means of spiritual discipline. The fact that the Apostle speaks of himself as the agent in producing the discipline ('I buffet my body') need not be taken as evidence that ascetic practices, or bodily mortifications, are intended. He regarded his body as an antagonist to be subdued by the willing acceptance of adverse circumstances fitted to promote his personal sanctification. W. S. MONTGOMERY.

BUILDING.—The usual NT word is οικοδομή = οικοδομησις, a building in course of construction, as distinguished from οικοδομημα, a finished structure.

1. 1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>.—'Ye are God's husbandry (RVm 'tilled land'), God's building.' Without pressing the change of metaphor, it is, however, to be noted, as indicating the intensity of the Apostle's thought, how his mind grasps first one method of increase and then another. The Kingdom grows like the organic development in the vegetable world, where outside substances are incorporated and assimilated into the organism itself. Or it grows as a building from the foundation; stone is laid upon stone, according to a preconceived plan, till the whole is complete. Under his metaphor St. Paul describes the Church as God's, and the leaders of the Church as His instruments ('the saints build up the fabric'). In this light the factions of Corinth are manifested. They have not grasped the Divine idea of the Church, and therefore they are rebuked: 'I could not speak unto you as unto spiritual but as unto carnal' (3<sup>1</sup>). With a tender smile of blame he calls them 'babes in Christ,' who have not grown into the height and freedom of their calling as God's fellow-workers (συνεργοί). Kindled with his metaphor, the Apostle rises to the thought of the gradual upbuilding of the Church (by transformation and accretion) through the ages, by many builders, and with varied material, but all on the once-laid foundation, to the glory not of the builders, but of the hand that guided and the heart that planned (cf. Longfellow's poem The Builders, and O. W. Holmes, The Living Temple and The Chambered Nautilus).

2. 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>.—'We know . . . we have a building (οικοδομήν) from God, a house not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens.' The punctuation in AV is wrong, and the sense of RV would be more explicit if it read 'We have in the heavens a building from God, an house not made with hands, eternal' (so Alford, de Wette, Meyer, and most Moderns). The house to which St. Paul looks forward is not heaven itself, though it is in the heavens, and comes from God as His gift. The Apostle is here moving among the conceptions of what he calls 'the spiritual body' (1 Co 15<sup>42-45</sup>), adumbrating in his paradox thoughts which are really unspeakable. Cf. also Ph 3<sup>21</sup> 'the body of our humiliation . . . the body of his glory.'

3. Eph 2<sup>21</sup>.—'Each several building (πασα οικοδομή) fitly framed together, groweth into a holy temple' (RVm 'sanctuary'). AV has 'all the building,' and the difference ought to be carefully noted in point both of grammar and of thought. The weight of the best MSS favours the omission of the article, and Meyer translates accordingly 'every building.' Moule (Ephesians [in Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1886]) and Ellicott (Com. in loc.) contend that the article is implicit; the latter calls its omission 'a grammatical laxity,' and the former is of opinion that the law of the article is in some respects less precise in the NT than in the classics. This does not appear to be made out, and it is safer to abide by the established usage than to allow an ad sensum interpretation (which really assumes the point in dispute). Westcott (Ephesians, 1906) prefers to abide by the classical use (cf. ExpT xviii. [1906-07] 2 for a note on the similar expression in Eph 3<sup>15</sup>). πας without the article = 'a various whole,' and this is the Apostle's thought. 'The image is that of an extensive pile of buildings, such as the ancient temples commonly were, in process of construction at different points over a wide area' (Findlay, Ephesians [Expositor's Bible, 1892], 146). Uniformity is not necessary to unity. The true catholicity is found in Jesus Christ Himself, the chief corner-stone, and not in external uniformity. The reading adopted in RV may be claimed as an incidental testimony to the early date of the Epistle. In point of fact, in the 2nd cent. the desire for formal unity would have rendered impossible the text 'each several building.' 'The Church swallowed up the churches' (Findlay). But here in the Apostolic Age, with the variety of circumstance, attainment, and social aspect in the churches, the essential idea of unity is nevertheless preserved, for 'each several building' is destined to be 'fitly framed together.' Each serves to make up the ideal temple of God, which is being built for ever. Each is a true part of that mystical body of Christ, the habitation of God through the Spirit.

4. He 9<sup>21</sup>.—'But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, of this building' (AV); better

RV 'but Christ having come a high priest of the good things that are come (RVm), through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation (οὐ ταύτης τῆς κτίσεως). The tabernacle is immaterial and spiritual as contrasted with the heaven and the earth. F. Field (Notes on the Translation of the NT [= Otium Norvicense, iii.], Cambridge, 1899, p. 142; || Farrar, Hebrews [in Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1883], p. 139 f.) would translate 'not of ordinary construction.' 'Human skill had nothing to do with its structure, for man's work finds its expression in the visible order of earth, to which this does not belong' (Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, p. 258). For the different meanings assigned to 'tabernacle' and their bearing on the true humanity of our Lord, see TABERNACLE.

5. Rev 21<sup>18</sup>.—'The building (ἐνδόμησις) of the wall thereof was jasper.' The word is passive and denotes the structure, what was built in. Cf. 'I will make thy battlements jasper' (Is 54<sup>12</sup> [LXX]). Some clear stone is intended, and not our modern jasper, which is generally red or brown.

W. M. GRANT.

BUSINESS.—The word occurs in the AV in Ac 6<sup>3</sup> (χρεία), Ro 12<sup>11</sup> (σπουδή, 'diligence,' RV) 16<sup>3</sup> (πράγμα, 'matter,' RV), and 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup> (τὰ ἔθια). The last named passage, 'Study to be quiet, and to do your own business,' implies that every Christian is expected to have an occupation. Christianity introduced a new ideal in this respect. Greek ethics regarded only certain occupations as being fit for those leading the highest life, and from these commercial activity was excluded (Plat. Rep. 495 C). Jewish teaching improved on this by requiring that every boy should learn a trade (Schürer, HJP II. i. 318). But even under this rule some trades were condemned, e.g. those of tanner, butcher, miner, goldsmith, and even the physician's calling (F. Delitzsch, Jewish Artisan Life in the Time of Christ, 1902, p. 56). Fishermen, on the other hand, were esteemed as being generally pious—an interesting fact in the light of our Lord's choice of some of them to be His apostles. The notion that some trades were necessarily degraded was abolished by Christianity, and St. Peter did not hesitate to lodge in the house of a tanner (Ac 9<sup>43</sup>).

In the conduct of their business Christians are required to set an example to the world. They are to be honest (1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>), to owe no man anything (Ro 13<sup>8</sup>), to avoid covetousness which leads to dishonesty (He 13<sup>6</sup>), and to refuse to go into partnership with extortioners (1 Co 5<sup>11</sup>). Business disputes between Christians are not to be carried before heathen tribunals (1 Co 6<sup>5-8</sup>). The actual giving up of rights may sometimes be demanded by faithfulness to the gospel. It is evident that, at any rate in Corinth, converts found it difficult at first in ordinary business dealings to rise to the new standard. Somewhat later arose another danger, which is still familiar, that men should use religion in order to improve their business prospects (1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>). This inevitably led to a low commercial morality, such as that to which Hermas confesses (Mand. iii.). Even as a Christian he had been for some years accustomed to regard lying in business transactions as quite permissible.

While the first Christians looked upon all honest occupations as honourable, they refused to see anything sacred in the vested interests of trades which only exist by wronging others. At Philippi St. Paul put an end to the exploitation of the girl with second sight (Ac 16<sup>16ff.</sup>), and at Ephesus showed no tenderness for the profits of idolatrous silver-smiths (19<sup>24-27</sup>). It is evident that persecution was often instigated by pagans whose business had been thus affected by the new faith. St. Paul experienced this in the two instances mentioned, and Pliny's letter to Trajan testifies that there was much feeling against Christians amongst those who sold fodder for the victims used in heathen sacrifices.

LITERATURE.—Besides Commentaries on the texts mentioned, see E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London and N.Y., 1904, passim; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 199 f.
C. T. DIMONT.

C

CÆSAR, CÆSAR'S HOUSEHOLD.—In origin the name 'Cæsar,' which has had such a wonderful history, culminating in the German Kaiser and the Russian Tsar, was simply a cognomen (or surname), indicating one branch of the gens Iulia, one of the old patrician families of Rome, which was said to have been descended from Æneas of Troy and Venus, through their son Iulus (Ascanius). The earliest known member of the family is Sex. Iulius Cæsar, prætor in 208 B.C.; the greatest is of course C. Iulius Cæsar, the dictator (lived from about 100 to 44 B.C.). The name was kept by all the early Emperors except Vitellius (and even he used it sometimes), in spite of the fact that after Nero no Emperor had a drop of Cæsarian blood in his veins. The complete official names of the Emperors who reigned during the hundred years following the birth of Christ are Imperator Cæsar Augustus (see AUGUSTUS), Tiberius Cæsar Augustus (see TIBERIUS), Gaius Cæsar Germanicus (nicknamed Caligula [q.v.]) (A.D. 37–41), Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus (see CLAUDIUS), Imperator Nero Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus (see NERO), Imperator Servius Sulpicius Galba Cæsar Augustus (9 June 68–15 Jan. 69) (see GALBA), Imperator Marcus Otho Cæsar Augustus (15 Jan.–25 Apr. 69) (see OTHO), Imperator Aulus Vitellius Cæsar or Aulus Vitellius Imperator Germanicus (2 Jan. 69–20[?] Dec. 70) (see VITELLIUS), Imperator Vespasianus Cæsar Augustus (69–79) (see VESPASIAN), Imperator Titus Vespasianus Cæsar Augustus (71–81) (see TITUS), Imperator Domitianus Cæsar Augustus (81–96) (see DOMITIAN), Imperator Nerva Augustus Cæsar (96–98) (see NERVA), Imperator Cæsar Nerva Traianus Augustus (97–117) (see TRAJAN). This enumeration shows how fixed the name Cæsar had become as part of the Emperor's name, quite irrespective of relationship. It will also explain how in all the places of the NT but two the name 'Cæsar' alone (with or without the article) is familiarly used, as equivalent simply to 'the Emperor.' In the Gospels the reference is to Tiberius (cf. Mk 12<sup>14-17</sup> and parallels), in Acts and Philipians (4<sup>22</sup>) to Nero. Where the historian seeks to date an event, he is naturally more precise (Cæsar Augustus, Lk 2<sup>1</sup>, Tiberius Cæsar, Lk 3<sup>1</sup>).

There are two aspects in which the Cæsar appears in the Gospels. In the section Mk 12<sup>13-17</sup> it is the question of giving tribute to Cæsar that comes up. The inhabitants of Judæa, a Roman Imperial province, governed by one of the Emperor's agents, called a procurator, were by law bound to pay tax to the Emperor. The term used, κηνόσος, is the Latin word census, which means 'census' in our sense, but much more. The census paper was in the Roman Empire also an income- and property-tax return, on the basis of which the assessment of tax was made by the Imperial officials. Hence the word in the Gospels might almost be translated 'income-tax.' Luke alters his original to the good Greek word φóρος (Lat. tributum, war-tax; cf. Lk 23). The second aspect in which the Cæsar appears in the Gospels is that of the Messiah's rival to lordship over the chosen people. Jesus is charged with 'saying that he is an anointed king' (Lk 23<sup>2</sup> · cf. Jn 19<sup>12-15</sup>, Ac 17<sup>7</sup>), for so we ought to translate it. When Pilate asks Him if He is the King of the Jews, He casts the word back to him, 'You say it, the word is yours' (Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshê, 1904, ii. 53). Throughout the Apostolic Age and later, the Christians continue to use of their King in the spiritual sense the very same epithets as the pagans use of the Emperor. This fact must have accentuated the hostility of the Empire to the Church.

In Ac 25 and following, the Cæsar is appealed to by St. Paul, after his unjust arrest at Jerusalem. The right of appeal (provocatio) was one of the bulwarks of the original republican constitution. By it a citizen could appeal to his fellow-citizens in assembly against any injustice on the part of a magistrate. The plebeians were later also protected by their special officials, the tribuni plebis. By the Imperial constitution the Emperor possessed tribunicia potestas (see AUGUSTUS). Any aggrieved citizen could thus appeal to him, and the Emperor could quash the verdict of a lower court, and substitute his own verdict. The Emperor had also the ius gladii, the right of life and death, and this he could delegate to subordinates. St. Paul's experiences before purely Roman tribunals had been on the whole so satisfactory that he decided to risk appeal to the highest tribunal of all, knowing how valuable for the success of his mission a favourable verdict would be. His appeal was received by Festus, and he proceeded to Rome. Hartmann (see below under Literature) does not consider that St. Paul's appeal was an appeal in the proper sense of the term, but it seems better to follow Ramsay, especially as Luke's language is quite plain. In the silence of history, scholars are divided as to the result of the Apostle's appeal. Some consider that the conclusion of Acts (q.v.) means that it was unsuccessful, and that he was condemned and beheaded. Those who accept the genuineness of the Pastoral Epistles believe that he was acquitted and released.

Cæsar's household.—St. Paul, writing from Rome to the Philippian Church in A.D. 60 or 61, sends greetings from all the Christians in Rome, but 'especially' from 'them that are of Cæsar's household' (Ph 4<sup>2</sup>). The date shows that the 'Cæsar' is Nero, and the word οἰκία, translated 'household,' is doubtless a translation of the Latin familia. The word familia is the later form of the older famulus, derived from famulus, a household-slave, and in Latin carries with it the idea especially of the collection of slaves and freedmen in a house. The relations between slaves and masters in the Roman world were generally good, the slave being regarded more as an integral part of the family than hired servants are in modern times. In the Imperial palace at Rome they can hardly have numbered fewer than 2000, and an idea of the variety of their occupations can be got from a study of the list of nouns joined to a, ab in J. C. Rolfe's art. in the Archiv für lateinische Lexikographie, vol. x. [1898] p. 481 ff. or the Thesaurus Lingue Latine, vol. i. [1905] cols. 22 and 23. It is remarkable that the list of names in Ro 16 coincides almost exactly with names of members of the Imperial household recovered in Roman inscriptions, as Lightfoot first showed at length. The number of examples has since increased. No epigraphist could doubt that ch. 16 is an integral part of the Epistle to the Romans, and that most of the persons there named were 'of Cæsar's household.' Our knowledge of the life of such persons is mainly derived from Statius (e.g. Silvæ v. 1) and Martial.

For Cæsar-worship, see EMPEROR-WORSHIP and ROMAN EMPIRE.

LITERATURE.—Official names of Roman Emperors in R. Cagnat, Cours d'épigraphie latine<sup>3</sup>, Paris, 1898, p. 177 ff.; on the tributum see A. H. J. Greenidge, Roman Public Life, London, 1901, p. 429 ff.; on Cæsar and the Messiah as rivals cf. the artt. of P. Wendland in ZNTW v. [1904] 335-353 and H. A. A. Kennedy in Expositor, 7th ser. vii. [1909] 289-307; on the appeal (provocatio, appellatio) see T. Mommsen, Röm. Strafrecht, 1899, 8er Abschnitt, p. 463 ff., Gesammelte Schriften, iii. [1907] 431-446, reprinted from ZNTW ii. [1901] 81 ff.; art. 'Appellatio' by Hartmann in Pauly-Wissowa; J. S. Reid in Journal of Roman Studies, i. [1911-12] 68 ff.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 1895, p. 311 ff. On Cæsar's Household see the excursus in Lightfoot, Epistle to the Philippians<sup>1</sup>, 1878, p. 171, and E. Riggensbach, in Neue Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, i. [1892] 498 ff.; best collection of inscriptions in H. Dessau, Inscr. Lat. Selectæ, i. [Berlin, 1892] ch. vi.

A. SOUTER.

CÆSAREA (Καϊσάρεια or Καϊσάρεια Σεβαστή, named in honour of Augustus; known also as Cæsarea Palæstinæ, and in modern Arabic as el-Kaisariyeh; to be distinguished clearly from Cæsarea Philippi).—Cæsarea was situated on the Mediterranean coast, 32 miles N. of Joppa, 25 S. of Carmel, and 75 N.W. of Jerusalem. It was once the chief port of Palestine. It was rebuilt by Herod the Great on the site of 'Straton's Tower' (Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 6). The city is closely associated with the history of the Apostolic Church, being especially notable as the place where the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the Gentiles (Ac 10<sup>45</sup>). The name occurs in Acts only. Philip the deacon seems to have resided at Cæsarea (8<sup>40</sup> 21<sup>8</sup> 16). St. Paul was sent hence to Tarsus (9<sup>30</sup>). Cornelius, a Roman centurion, influenced by a vision to send to Joppa for St. Peter, here became the first convert of the Gentiles (10<sup>1</sup> 24 11<sup>11</sup>). Here Herod Agrippa I. died (12<sup>19</sup>). Here St. Paul landed on his way from Ephesus (18<sup>22</sup>), being later escorted hither on his return from Jerusalem (23-3. 33), and here he was imprisoned for two years, and tried before Festus (25<sup>1</sup> 4. 6. 13).

In apostolic times Cæsarea was politically the capital of the province of Judæa, and the residence of the Roman procurators. Tacitus describes it as 'the head of Judæa' (Hist. ii. 78). Among its inhabitants there were both Jews and Greeks. The city was elaborately beautified with temples, theatres, palaces, arches, and altars. It was especially famous for its harbour (Jos. Ant. xv. ix. 6). Aqueducts supplied the inhabitants with water from Carmel and the Crocodile River. In the 3rd cent. A.D., it became the seat of a famous school of theology, in which Origen taught; also of the bishopric of Syria, Eusebius being the most celebrated of those occupying the office. Under the Arabs it unfortunately lost its former prestige and rapidly degenerated. At the time of the Crusades it was rebuilt by Baldwin II. Saladin took it in 1187. In 1251 it was re-fortified by St. Louis. Finally, in 1265, it was completely destroyed by the Sultan Bibars, since whose time it has remained in ruins.

Little is now left to mark the ancient city. Porter, writing in 1865, says: 'I saw no man. The Arab and the shepherd avoid the spot' (Giant Cities, 235). Thomson also (Land and Book, i. 72) speaks of it as 'absolutely forsaken.' Since 1889, however, a few Bosnians have settled among the ruins and carried on a small trade in brick. Most of the stones of the ancient city were used by Ibrahim Pasha in constructing the new fortifications at Acre. To the missionary, Cæsarea is one of the most interesting spots on earth, having been the cradle of the Gentile Church.

LITERATURE.—Josephus, Ant. xiv. iv. 4, xvii. xi. 4, BJ i. xxi. 5, ii. ix. 1; G. A. Smith, HGH 138 ff., art. 'Cæsarea' in EBI, i. 617; C. R. Conder, art. 'Cæsarea' in UDB, i. 337, Tent Work in Palestine, new ed., 1887, pp. 107-110; Schürer, HJP, index, s.v.; SWP ii. [1882], sheet x.; Baedeker, Palestine and Syria<sup>2</sup>, 1912, p. 237 ff.; A. Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, 1868; G. Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, 1890, p. 474; H. B. Tristram, Bible Places, 1897, p. 75; J. L. Porter, The Giant Cities of Lashan, 1873, p. 233 ff.; W. M. Thomson, The Land and the Book, 1881, i. 69 ff.; W. Smith, DB<sup>2</sup>, art. 'Cæsarea.'

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

CAIAPHAS (Καϊάφας).—Caiaphas, or Joseph Caiaphas, was appointed high priest in A.D. 18 by Valerius Gratus, and held office till A.D. 36, when he was removed by Vitellius (Jos. Ant. XVIII. ii. 2, iv. 3). He was son-in-law of Annas (cf. art. ANNAS). Like most of the priests at this period, Caiaphas was a Sadducee in religion. By his masterly policy of conciliating his Roman masters he was able to retain his office for an unusually long period. His craft and subtle diplomacy as well as his supreme disregard for justice and religion are revealed in the advice he gave to the assembled Sanhedrin after Jesus had won the people by the raising of Lazarus—'It is expedient that one die for the people' (Jn 11<sup>50</sup>). Caiaphas saw clearly that if a popular movement in favour of Jesus were aroused, his power and position under Rome would be at an end, and he sought at once to give effect to his own advice. The trial of Jesus in his presence was a travesty of all legal procedure. Failing to obtain evidence from witnesses, he adjured the prisoner to declare whether or not He was the Messiah; and on Jesus declaring He was, the pious hypocrite rent his clothes, shocked at the blasphemy of the answer. Caiaphas is a type of the wily ecclesiastical opportunist, who places the success of himself and the institution he represents before all claims of truth or justice. Such a character is always ready to persecute, and in the Apostolic Church Caiaphas appears as a bitter persecutor of the apostles (Ac 4<sup>6</sup>). He is probably the high priest referred to in Ac 5<sup>17-21</sup>. 27 7<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> who imprisoned Peter and John, presided at the trial of Stephen, caused the persecution recorded in Ac 8, and gave Saul of Tarsus letters to Damascus to apprehend the Christians there.

LITERATURE.—Josephus, passim; Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup> ii. [1907] 256, 271; art. 'Caiaphas' in UDB (McClintock) and DCG (C. A. Scott); E. Nestle, 'The Name "Caiaphas,"' in ExpT x. [1893-99] 185; W. M. Clow, In the Day of the Cross, 1898, p. 9 ff.; J. B. Lightfoot, Sermons in St. Paul's Cathedral, 1891, p. 75; A. MacLaren, Christ in the Heart, 1886, p. 255.

W. F. BOYD.

CAIN.—See ABEL.

CAINITES.—According to the scanty information we possess about the Cainites, they seem to have formed one of the Gnostic sects which are classed together under the somewhat inadequate and perhaps misleading name 'Ophites,' though the serpent, from which the name 'Ophite' is derived, seems to have played no part in their system. Our oldest source is to be found in Irenæus, adv. Hær. i. 31. He tells us that the Cainites regarded Cain as derived from the higher principle. They claimed fellowship with Esau, Korah, the men of Sodom, and all such people, and regarded themselves as on that account persecuted by the Creator. But they escaped injury from Him, for Sophia used to carry away from them to herself that which belonged to her. They regarded Judas the traitor as having full cognizance of the truth. He therefore, rather than the other disciples, was able to accomplish the mystery of the betrayal, and so bring about the dissolution of all things both celestial and terrestrial. The Cainites possessed a fictitious work entitled 'The Gospel of Judas,' and Irenæus says that he had himself collected writings of theirs, where they advocated that the work of Hystera should be dissolved. By Hystera they meant the Maker of Heaven and Earth. They taught, as did Carpocrates, that salvation could be attained only by passing through all experience. Whenever any sin or vile action was performed by them, they asserted that an angel was present whom they invoked, claiming that they were fulfilling his operation. Perfect knowledge consisted in going without a tremor into such actions as it is not lawful even to name. Epiphanius (Hær. 38) characteristically gives a much longer account, in substantial harmony with what Irenæus says. He appears to have had some source of information independent of Irenæus. He speaks of Abel as derived from the weaker principle—a statement which bears the marks of authenticity. He also says that Judas forced the Archons, or rulers, against their will to slay Christ, and thus assisted us to the salvation of the Cross. Philaster, on the other hand, assigns the action of Judas to his knowledge that Christ intended to destroy the truth—a purpose which he frustrated by the betrayal.

The account given by Irenæus is unduly curt and the text not quite secure, but it is not difficult to form a general estimate of the sect from it, especially with the assistance of our other sources. Like other Gnostics, the Cainites drew a distinction between the Creator and the Supreme God. Presumably they identified the Creator with the God of the Jews. They viewed Him and those whom He favoured with undisguised hostility; redemption had for its end the dissolution of His work. They claimed kinship with those to whom He showed antagonism in His book, the Old Testament, and shared themselves in the same hostility. Nevertheless He was the weaker power, who could do them no permanent harm, for Sophia, the Heavenly Wisdom, drew back to herself those elements in their nature which they had derived from her. Presumably, then, they thought of a division of mankind into two classes—the spiritual and the material, the latter belonging to the realm of the Creator and deriving their being from Him, but doomed to dissolution, while the former class contained the spiritual men, imprisoned, it is true, in bodies of flesh, but yet deriving their essential being from the highest Power, opposed by the Creator and His minions, but winning the victory over them as Cain did over Abel. Unfortunately we cannot be sure what view they took of redemption. There is no doubt that they applauded the action of Judas in the betrayal, but our authorities differ as to the motive which prompted him. The view that Judas through his more perfect γνώσις penetrated the wish of Jesus more successfully than the others, and accomplished it by bringing Him to the Cross through which He effected redemption, is intrinsically the more probable.

So far as the moral character and conduct of the Cainites is concerned, there is no doubt that Irenæus intended to represent them as shrinking from no vileness, but rather as deliberately practising it. Carpocrates, we are told, defended this practice by a theory of transmigration. It was necessary to pass through all experiences, and hence the soul had to pass from body to body till the whole range of experience had been traversed. If, however, this could all be crowded into a single lifetime, then the transmigration became unnecessary. We have no ground to suppose that the Cainites held such a view, but they seem to have professed the belief that this fullness of experience was essential to salvation. We have no substantial justification for doubting the truth of Irenæus' account, though accusations of immorality urged against heretics should always be received with caution. G. R. S. Mead (Fragments of a Faith Forgotten, 1900, p. 229) thinks that originally they were ascetics, while N. Lardner (History of Heretics, bk. ii. ch. xiv. [= Works, 1829, viii. 560]) questions whether a sect guilty of such enormities ever existed. But there is no valid reason to deny the generally accepted view that the Gnostic attitude to matter did lead to quite opposite results. To some it would seem a duty to crush the flesh beneath the spirit by the severest austerity, but the premiss might lead to a libertine as well as to an ascetic conclusion: if the spirit alone was important, the flesh but contemptible and perishable, what happened to the latter might seem a matter of complete indifference, inasmuch as its degradation could not stain the white purity of the spirit. The principle that the jewel is undimmed though its casket lie in the mire, or that the Gnostic may do what he will for he is saved by grace, probably found quite faithful expression in the attitude of such Gnostics as Carpocrates and the Cainites.

It is held by several scholars that some of the Ophite sects date back into the pre-Christian era, and, if this view is correct, Pfeleiderer (Das Urchristentum<sup>2</sup>, Berlin, 1902, vol. ii. pp. 52–54, 82, 97 f. = Primitive Christianity, London, 1910, vol. iii. pp. 72–74, 114, 136 f.) may be right in thinking that the Cainites whom we know from Irenæus were the successors of the people who were attacked by Philo in his de Posteritate Caini. Whether the reference in Jude<sup>11</sup> is to the Cainites must be regarded as very doubtful (see JUDE).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the Literature named in the article, the following may be consulted: H. L. Mansel, Gnostic Heresies, London, 1875; A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristenthums, Leipzig, 1884; A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur, i. [Leipzig, 1893] p. 163 ff., ii. [1897] p. 538 ff. The subject receives some discussion in Church Histories and Histories of Doctrine. Of articles in Dictionaries special mention may be made of that in DCB by G. Salmon.

ARTHUR S. PEAKE.

CALF.—'Calf' (Ac 7<sup>41</sup>, He 9<sup>1–19</sup>, Rev 4<sup>7</sup>) should be rendered 'ox' or 'steer.' 1. The expiatory virtue of sacrifices of blood formed part of the Semitic belief from earliest times. In Lv 17<sup>11</sup> the reason given is that the life or soul of the animal is in the blood (cf. Gn 9<sup>4</sup>, Dt 12<sup>3</sup>), which gives peculiar efficacy to the sacrifice (see art. 'Sacrifice' in the Bible Dictionaries). 2. The second of the four living creatures in the Apocalypse had the likeness of an ox, presumably as the symbol of strength. It was certainly for this reason that the bull was chosen as the symbol of Jahweh by Aaron (Ac 7<sup>41</sup>) and Jeroboam (B. Duhm, Theol. der Propheten, Bonn, 1875, p. 47; A. Dillmann, Exodus, Berlin, 1880, p. 337; J. Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, Edinburgh, 1892, pp. 215–220; similarly Kuenen and Vatke). The four living creatures remind us of certain of the signs of the zodiac (bull, angel, lion, eagle), and possibly they have some connexion with that source (so Moffatt and Gunkel). Irenæus (III. xi. 8) associates the living creatures with the four evangelists, and holds that the 'calf,' signifying the priestly and sacrificial character of Jesus, is the symbol of St. Luke. These traditions continued after his time, but there was considerable variety in the application of the symbols (see Zahn, Forschungen, Erlangen, 1881–1903, ii. 257 ff.; Swete, Gospel according to St. Mark<sup>2</sup>, London, 1902, p. xxxvi ff.).

F. W. WORSLEY.

CALIGULA.—Caligula ('little boots') was a pet name given by the soldiers in his father's army to the boy who was afterwards known officially as Gaius Cæsar Germanicus. In a similar way the name 'Caracalla' or 'Caracallus' was applied popularly to Emperor Cæsar Marcus Aurelius Antoni-nus (A.D. 198–217), and ‘Elagabalus’ to Emperor Cæsar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus (A.D. 218–222). These sobriquets had no official currency, but were useful as brief ways of referring to the names of Emperors, whose ancestors by nature or adoption had names so like their own, that confusion was certain to occur in conversation or writing about them. Caligula, who was named at birth Gaius Iulius Cæsar, was the third son of the distinguished general Germanicus, and Agrippina (the elder). As Germanicus was a son of Drusus, the adopted son of Augustus, and as Agrippina was a daughter of (Agrippa and) Iulia, the daughter of Augustus, Caligula was thus both by nature and by adoption a great-grandson of the Emperor Augustus. He is commonly said to have been born in the camp of his father (Tac. Ann. i. 41); but Suetonius (Gaius, 8) points out that the boy was born before his father left for his province. The date of his birth was 31 Aug., A.D. 12. From a very early time he displayed signs of the insanity which was to break out in the most signal manner when he attained to manhood. His mania took three forms—inordinate lust, inordinate vanity, and a homicidal tendency. No doubt, as in the case of other Emperors, we must allow for the influence of evil-minded gossip on our historical records, but there remains ample evidence to justify this statement. He was proclaimed Emperor on the death of his grand-uncle Tiberius on 18 March, A.D. 37. He was offered the honorary title of pater patriæ in the early days of 38, and died on 24 Jan. 41 at the hands of an assassin, C. Cassius Chærea, in one of the vaults of the palace on the Palatine Hill. He was thrice married, first to Iunia Claudilla, daughter of a patrician, M. Silanus.* She died in childbirth, and he afterwards married Lollia Paulina, daughter of M. Lollius, whom he had robbed from her husband Memmius. He soon afterwards divorced her. His third wife was Milonia Cæsonia. Caligula left no descendants.

Caligula's reign was as uneventful as it was short. The machine of government had been left in such perfect condition by Augustus and Tiberius that the recklessness of a Caligula could not in such a short time do serious harm. But one thing he could and did do: he wasted the savings of his predecessors. He succeeded to the Empire because he was the personal heir of Tiberius, not because he had been in any sense his partner in the Empire. It was the theory of the principate that it came to an end on the death of each Emperor, and that power returned to the Senate and people as in the days of the Republic; but in practice it was difficult, if not impossible, to pass over the Emperor's heir, and Gaius was thus proclaimed Emperor. His reign began with a relaxation of many of the restrictions of Tiberius' rule, but his only aim throughout was the pursuit of excitement and pleasure. There is no need to detail the countless variety of his insane actions. Towards the end of his principate he revived the reign of terror, which was such a feature of Tiberius' time.

Certain changes were made in the Eastern provinces in the reign of Gaius. The territory of Antiochus of Commagene, which had been made a province by Tiberius, was restored to his son: it ran along the northern side of the province of Cilicia. Herod Agrippa received the tetrarchy of his uncle Philip, along with Abilene. Later he obtained also Samaria, after Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias had been expelled by the Emperor at his instance. Thrace was also restored to a member of the old dynasty which had ruled it. To his kinsmen Polemo and Cötys, Gaius gave Pontus Polemoniæ and Lesser Armenia respectively. The Arabian Sohæmus was made ruler over the Ituræans. Ptolemæus, King of Mauritania, was executed, and steps were taken to convert his kingdom into two provinces. The most useful thing Gaius did in the way of provincial government was to put the legion which was in the province of Africa under the command of an Imperial legatus. Hitherto Africa had been the only senatorial province with Roman troops in it. This legatus had also civil functions in the Numidian part of Africa.

One aspect of Caligula's activity had a serious effect on the Jews, and thus drew forth two of the most interesting historical tractates of the Roman Empire, Philo's Legatio ad Gaium and contra Flaccum. The Emperor claimed to be worshipped as a god. This claim was naturally rejected by the Jews of Judæa and of Alexandria. The governor of Egypt, with ill-timed zeal, required them to set up statues of Gaius in their synagogues. The riots which resulted caused many deaths. In the year A.D. 40 the Jews of Alexandria sent an embassy to the Emperor to get the governor's decree rescinded. This embassy was unsuccessful, and but for the speedy death of the Emperor the consequences of the proposed sacrilege would have been most serious.

LITERATURE.—The ancient authorities are Suetonius, Gaius; Philo, contra Flaccum and Legatio ad Gaium; Dio Cassius; etc. The relevant parts of Tacitus (Annals, bk. vii. ff.) are lost. Modern books are J. B. Bury, A History of the Roman Empire, London, 1893, pp. 168, 214 ff., etc.; V. Duruy, A History of Rome, Eng. tr., do. 1884–86, iv. 370 ff. (splendidly illustrated); H. Schiller, Gesch. der röm. Kaiserzeit, Gotha, 1883, i. 304–314; A. von Domaszewski, Gesch. der röm. Kaiser, Leipzig, 1909, ii. 1–20.

A. SOUTER.

CALL, CALLED, CALLING These terms in the NT are for the most part the rendering of καλεῖν in its various parts and derivatives (κεκλημένοι, κλητοί, κλήσις), or in one or other of its various compounds. Among its meanings are invitation (καλεῖν, -εἶσθαι [Mt 9<sup>13</sup> 22<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>27</sup>, Rev 19<sup>9</sup>], προσκαλεῖσθαι [Ac 3<sup>39</sup>]); designation (καλεῖν, -εἶσθαι [Mt 12<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>, Ac 14<sup>12</sup>, He 2<sup>11</sup> 11<sup>18</sup>], ἐπικαλεῖν, -εἶσθαι [Mt 10<sup>25</sup>, Lk 22<sup>3</sup>, Ac 1<sup>3</sup>, He 11<sup>16</sup>]); invocation (ἐπικαλεῖσθαι [Ac 2<sup>21</sup> 7<sup>59</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>17</sup>]); summons (μετακαλεῖν, -εἶσθαι [Ac 7<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>32</sup>]).

In the OT a call of God to His servants and His people is part of His gracious dealing with mankind. It was in response to a Divine call that Abraham (Gn 12<sup>1–3</sup>), Moses (Ex 3<sup>10</sup>), Bezaleel (Ex 31<sup>1</sup>), David (Ps 78<sup>10</sup>), Isaiah (Is 6<sup>8–9</sup>), Jeremiah (Jer 1<sup>4–5</sup>), Ezekiel (Ezk 2<sup>3</sup>) and other eminent servants of God entered into covenant with Him and fulfilled the tasks committed to them. Not only was Israel thus called as the people of God, but complaint is again and again made by the Prophets that they refused to hearken and stopped their ears that they should not hear (Is 6<sup>9</sup>, Zec 7<sup>11–13</sup>). The Prophets, moreover, had visions of the day when the Gentiles should be called into the covenant and service of Jahweh (Is 55<sup>4–6</sup>). Of this OT meaning examples in the NT are our Lord's call of His apostles (Mt 4<sup>21</sup>), the Spirit's call of Barnabas and Saul (Ac 13<sup>1</sup>), the call of the High Priest of the old dispensation (He 5<sup>4</sup>), where a Divine call to special service is given and accepted.

In the Epistles, and particularly in St. Paul, there is found the more definite meaning of the word as the call of God to the blessings of salvation. It is here intimately associated with the eternal purpose of God in human redemption. This is an advance upon what we find in the Gospels. In the Gospels ‘the called’ (οἱ κλητοί) are distinguished from ‘the chosen’ (οἱ ἐκλεκτοί), the former being those to whom the invitation to the gospel feast is addressed, and the latter the more select company who had heard and accepted it (Mt 22<sup>14</sup>). In the Epistles ‘the called’ are ‘the chosen' (Ro 9<sup>24</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13, 14</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, where γένος ἐκλεκτόν are those whom God 'called out of darkness into his marvellous light'). The κλητοί are the manifestation of the ἐκλεκτοί; 'of a κλησις which does not include the ἐκλογή the Scripture knows nothing' (R. Seeberg, in PRE<sup>3</sup>, art. 'Berufung'). With St. Paul and also with St. Peter, it is more than an invitation, it is an invitation responded to and accepted, and it is so because 'the called' are already 'the chosen' (2 Th 2<sup>13, 14</sup>, Ro 8<sup>3</sup>).

* So Suet. Gaius, 12; but Bury, on what authority the present writer does not know, names Orestilla, wife of Cn. Piso, as his first wife (A History of the Roman Empire, p. 221).

'The called' (οἱ κλητοί) to whom St. Paul addresses the Epistle to the Romans, are 'called to be Jesus Christ's' (Ro 1<sup>6</sup>) and they are 'called to be saints' (Ro 1<sup>7</sup>), the meaning of the word being identical with our 'converted.' They are 'called according to his purpose' (Ro 8<sup>28</sup>)—God's electing purpose from all eternity: 'for whom he foreknew, he also foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren: and whom he foreordained, them he also called: and whom he called, them he also justified: and whom he justified, them he also glorified.' 'The called' in the thought of St. Paul are 'the elect' from all eternity, and their 'calling' through the gospel and the means of grace is the realization in time of God's purpose with them from eternity: 'that he might make known the riches of his glory upon vessels of mercy which he afore prepared unto glory, even us whom he also called not from the Jews only but also from the Gentiles' (Ro 9<sup>4</sup>). This thought of St. Paul's is also St. John's. We find it in the Revelation, where St. John pronounces the victorious followers of the Lamb 'called and chosen and faithful' (Rev 17<sup>14</sup>, κλητοὶ καὶ ἐκλεκτοὶ καὶ πιστοί)—a description entirely in keeping with St. John's record of the words of Christ: 'all that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me' (Jn 6<sup>37, 38</sup>), and His promise concerning the sheep to whom He gives eternal life and whom no man shall pluck out of His Father's hand (Jn 10<sup>28</sup>). 'The calling' (ἡ κλήσις) is 'not of works' but of the sovereign grace of God (Ro 9<sup>11</sup>), 'who saved us and called us with a high calling (ἀγία κλήσει), not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given in Christ Jesus before times eternal' (2 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>). The call which thus comes from God is 'in Christ' (1 P 5<sup>10</sup>) and 'through the gospel' (2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>), to 'the fellowship of his Son' (1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>), to 'freedom' (Gal 5<sup>13</sup>), not 'for uncleanness but in sanctification' (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>), to 'eternal life' (1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>), to holiness 'like as he which hath called you is holy' (1 P 1<sup>15</sup>). It is, therefore, well designated 'the high calling of God (ἡ ἀνω κλήσις τοῦ Θεοῦ) in Christ Jesus' (Ph 3<sup>14</sup>), 'a heavenly calling' (κλησις ἐπουράνιος, He 3<sup>1</sup>); and those who are partakers of it are exhorted to make their 'calling and election sure' (2 P 1<sup>10</sup>). For the goal, though predestined and prepared aforetime (Ro 8<sup>28, 9<sup>24</sup></sup>), is not attained without labour and conflict; as St. Paul exhorts Timothy: 'Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on the life eternal, whereunto thou wast called, and didst witness the good confession in the sight of many witnesses' (1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>). That 'the calling' is to more than a Christian profession is clear from the experiences which St. Paul associates with it; for, if he is 'a called apostle' (Ro 1<sup>1</sup>), the particulars of his call, which was his conversion, are given when he tells how it pleased God to separate him from his mother's womb and to call him by His grace and to reveal His Son in him (Gal 1<sup>15, 16</sup>). 'The calling' carries with it a great hope—'ye were called in one hope of your calling' (Eph 4<sup>4</sup>)—for they that experience it do not only in this life partake of justification, adoption, and sanctification, but know that when Christ who is their life shall appear they also shall appear with Him in glory (1 Th 2<sup>12</sup>).

For this 'the called' are kept (τηρημένοις κλητοῖς, Jude<sup>1</sup>); and, many though the adversaries and difficulties be, 'faithful is he that called you, who will also do it' (1 Th 5<sup>4</sup>).

The call which St. Paul and the apostolic writers generally have in view exercises upon those who are the subjects of it a grace and a power which are of the Holy Spirit, who, in the words of the Westminster Divines, 'convincing us of our sin and misery, enlightening our minds in the knowledge of Christ, and renewing our wills, doth persuade and enable us to embrace Jesus Christ, freely offered to us in the Gospel' (Shorter Catechism, 31).

LITERATURE.—Sanday-Headlam, Romans (ICC, 1902), 12f., 215 f.; R. Seeberg, PRE<sup>3</sup> ii. [1897] art. 'Berufung'; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology, ii. [1872] 639-732; art. 'Call' in HDB; 'Call, Calling' in DCG. T. NICOL.

CALLIMACHUS.—See QUOTATIONS.

CANAAN (AV Chanaan, Ac 7<sup>11</sup> and 13<sup>19</sup>).—In the NT Palestine is referred to as 'the Land' or 'the Land of Israel' (Mt 2<sup>9</sup>). The old designation 'Canaan' is used by St. Stephen, in making reference to the famine which sent Jacob's sons into Egypt; and by St. Paul at Antioch when referring to the destroying of the Canaanites and the giving of the Land of Promise to Israel.

J. W. DUNCAN.

CANDACE.—Candace (Κανδάκη) is mentioned in Ac 8<sup>7</sup> as 'queen of the Ethiopians,' i.e. of Meroe (see ETHIOPIA and ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH). It appears from various ancient authorities that this was a name always borne by the queen-mother of the Ethiopians, and that in many cases she reigned still as dowager: e.g. we read Κανδάκη Αἰθίοπες πᾶσαν τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως μητέρα καλοῦσιν (J. A. Cramer, Catena in Acta Apostolorum, 1844, p. 143), an extract from an anonymous author who proceeds to quote Bion (of Soli) thus: Αἰθίοπες τοὺς βασιλεῖων πατέρας οὐκ ἐκφαίνουσιν, ἀλλ' ὡς ὄντας υἱὸς ἡλίου παραδιδόσιν· ἐκάστου δὲ τὴν μητέρα καλοῦσι Κανδάκην; cf. Athen. xiii. 566 and Pliny, HN vi. 29. The name in its Egyptian form is said to occur on the monuments, and a queen so named tried conclusions with the Romans during the reign of Augustus 24-21 B.C. and obtained some measure of success. The expression in Ac 8<sup>27</sup> that the εὐνοῦχος δυνάστης, whom Philip baptized, 'was over all her treasure' suggests that this monarch was powerful and wealthy.

C. L. FELTOE.

CANDLE, CANDLESTICK.—See LAMP, LAMP-STAND.

CANKER.—See GANGRENE.

CAPPADOCIA (Καππαδοκία).—Cappadocia was an elevated table-land, with ill-defined and varying boundaries, in the east centre of Asia Minor. It was drained chiefly by the Halys and its tributaries, and intersected by great mountains, the highest of which, Argæus, is 13,000 feet above the sea. 'Persons who ascend it (but they are not many) say that both the Euxine and the Sea of Issus may be seen from it in clear weather' (Strabo, XII. ii. 7). Cappadocia was traversed by the great road of commerce from Ephesus to the Euphrates, by the pilgrims' route from Constantinople to Jerusalem, and by roads from the Cilician Gates to the cities of the Euxine. It was an excellent country for corn and pasturage, and it had some important centres of commerce. Jews had found their way into the country before the Maccabean period, and in 139 B.C. the Roman Senate sent a letter to Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, directing him 'not to seek their hurt' (1 Mac 15<sup>19, 22</sup>). Philo (Leg. ad Gaius, 36) also refers to Jews in Cappadocia. On the death of King Archelaus in A.D. 17, the country was formed into a Roman province (Tacitus, Ann. ii. 42). It was administered by a procurator until the time of Vespasian, who joined it to Armenia and placed it under a legatus.

Jews of Cappadocia were sojourning in Jerusalem at the time of the first Christian Pentecost (Ac 2<sup>9</sup>). The elect of the Dispersion in the province of Cappadocia are addressed in 1 P 1<sup>1</sup>. Pagan Cappadocia was devoted chiefly to the cult of Ma, and the strength of its anti-Christian forces is indicated in Strabo's description of two leading cities, Comana and Morimene.

The priest of Comana 'presides over the temple, and has authority over the hierodouli belonging to it, who, at the time I was there, exceeded in number 6000 persons, including men and women. A large tract of land adjoins the temple, the revenue of which the priest enjoys. He is second in rank in Cappadocia after the king, and in general the priests are descended from the same family as the kings' (xii. ii. 3). 'In Morimene, among the Venasili, is a temple of Jupiter, with buildings capable of receiving nearly 3000 hierodouli. It has a tract of sacred land attached to it. . . . The priest is appointed for life like the priest of Comana, and is next to him in rank' (xii. ii. 7).

Yet Christianity made rapid progress in Cappadocia, and its triumph in Cæsarea, the capital, so offended Julian the Apostate that he deprived the city of its freedom. Some of the other cities of Cappadocia—Nysa, Nazianzus, Tyana, Samosata—are celebrated in Church history.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1893, p. 445 ff.; Th. Mommsen, Provinces of the Rom. Empire<sup>2</sup>, Eng. tr., do. 1909, i. 323 f., 332 f., ii. 19, 41, 63; E. Chantre, Mission en Cappadoce, Paris, 1898; G. Long, in DGRG, i. 506 ff.; art. 'Cappadocia' in HDB and EBI.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CAPTAIN OF THE TEMPLE (Ac 4<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>24, 26</sup>, ὁ στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ).—This is St. Luke's name for the commander of the Levitical guard who kept order in the Temple precincts and guarded the house. He was not a civil officer, but a priest; and his duty, besides keeping the peace, was to make his rounds by night, visit all the gates, and see that the sentries were awake. The office appears in Neh 11<sup>1</sup>, Jer 20<sup>1</sup>, etc. In 2 Mac 3<sup>4</sup> he is called προστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ, and is said to be of the tribe of Benjamin. If the reading is correct, this would be an irregularity. In the time of Claudius Caesar, one Ananus, the commander of the Temple, was sent in bonds to Rome to answer for his actions in a Jewish-Samaritan tumult (Jos. Ant. xx. vi. 2). For the name cf. also BJ vi. v. 3.

In the NT period, some of the high priests were blamed for nepotism, because, among other things, they made their sons 'captains of the Temple.'

In Ac 4<sup>1</sup> the captain intervened on the ground that the peace of the Temple was likely to be broken by the preaching of the apostles, who were regarded as unauthorized speakers, and as such were under the ban of Jer 29<sup>6</sup>: 'that there might be an overseer in the house of the Lord for every man who is insane and prophecies, and that thou mightest put him in the stocks and in the block.'

In Ac 5<sup>4-26</sup> the captain of the Temple re-arrested Peter and John, who had escaped from prison the previous night. But clearly he was uncertain of his position, and recognized that popular opinion was on the side of the apostles. It was the policy of the Sadducees to avoid disturbance, and to give no excuse for the intervention of the Roman power. Therefore the arrest was effected courteously, 'without violence, for they feared the people lest they should be stoned.' W. M. GRANT.

CAPTIVITY.—See BONDAGE.

CARE, CAREFUL The English word 'care' is used in two senses: (a) attention to something or someone, not necessarily painful (Lat. cura); and (b) anxiety, painful attention. This sense was due to the A.S. caru, 'sorrow,' becoming confounded with the Latin cura, 'attention' (see HDB, art. 'Care'). This confusion was not unnatural, since excessive attention, or conflicting attention (cf. μέριμνα 'drawing in different directions,' or Eng. 'distraction'), readily becomes painful. The sense of distress is not conveyed by the adjectival and adverbial forms—careful and carefully, careless and carelessly.

(a) Instances of commendable human care are to be found in concern for personal righteousness (He 12<sup>15</sup>, Tit 3<sup>3</sup>); zeal (σπουδή) for correcting a wrong (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>); interest in the welfare of one's fellows, especially those who are of the household of faith (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>12</sup> 8<sup>16</sup>, Ph 2<sup>0</sup> 4<sup>10</sup>); anxiety for the churches (2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>). (b) Care is condemned when it has an unworthy object, e.g. forethought (πρόνοια) for the flesh to fulfil its lusts (Ro 13<sup>14</sup>); the worship of mammon (1 Ti 6<sup>9, 10</sup>, He 13<sup>5</sup>); or when it is purely selfish (Ph 2<sup>21</sup>). (c) Care which distracts from the love and service of God becomes an evil. Marriage was regarded as legitimate and honourable in the early Church, but St. Paul saw in the cares of married life a menace to spiritual zeal and labour (1 Co 7<sup>3</sup>). A lawful temporal care was recognized. He who made no provision (προνοεῖ) for those dependent upon him, and especially for his own family, had denied the faith and was worse than an unbeliever (1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>; cf. 2 Th 3<sup>8-15</sup>, Ro 12<sup>11</sup>). But how readily the cares of the world crushed out the love of God! (2 Ti 4<sup>10</sup>, He 13<sup>5</sup>, etc.). (d) Human care has its remedy in the spirit which puts first of all the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. The secret of St. Paul's indifference to human loss (Ph 3<sup>7a</sup>), and his contentment in whatsoever condition of life he happened to be (4<sup>11</sup>), lay in the fact that the ordinary human interests of life had become utterly subordinate to the interests of God (cf. 1 Co 7<sup>1</sup>, 'Were you a slave when God called you? Let not that weigh on your mind'). (e) Again, 'the strain of toil, the fret of care' is relieved in the thought of God's providence (Ph 4<sup>6</sup>, 'in nothing be anxious'; 1 P 5<sup>7</sup>, 'casting all your anxiety upon God, because he careth for you'; cf. He 13<sup>5</sup>). Providence does not guarantee freedom from human pain, sorrow and persecution (2 Co 4<sup>8a</sup> 11<sup>23a</sup>, etc.), but embraces these and all things, in a wide scheme of goodness (Ro 8<sup>3-35-37</sup>. cf. Mt 10<sup>8-9</sup>, 'God cares for the sparrows that fall to the ground'). Care is relieved for the Christian, not so much by the hope of a change of human circumstances, as by his changed estimate of human values. Temporal things 'shall vanish all—the city of God remaineth' (2 Co 4<sup>16a</sup>). See also art. COMFORT.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Care' in HDB and DCG; R. W. Dale, Laws of Christ for Common Life, London, 1899; T. C. Upham, Life and Religious Opinions of Madame Guyon, New York, 1877; W. C. E. Newbolt, Counsels of Faith and Practice, 1894, p. 161; H. Black, Christ's Service of Love, 1907, p. 42.

H. BULCOCK.

CARNAL.—In two cases (Ro 8<sup>7</sup>, He 9<sup>10</sup>) the adj. 'carnal,' and in one (Ro 8<sup>6</sup>) the adv. 'carnally,' are used in AV to render the gen. of σάρξ 'flesh'; in Ro 8<sup>6, 7</sup> RV substitutes 'of the flesh.' The 'carnal mind' or 'mind of the flesh' (Ro 8<sup>6, 7</sup>) denotes, according to St. Paul's frequent usage, human nature as fallen, sinfully conditioned, and hostile to the influences of the Holy Spirit; 'carnal ordinances' (He 9<sup>10</sup>) are material ordinances as contrasted with those that are spiritual.

On the other occasions when 'carnal' is found in the Epistles it represents the adjectives σάρκινος and σαρκικός, which, according to their strict meanings, correspond respectively to the Lat. carneus and carnalis, and the Eng. 'fleshy' and 'fleshly.' Belonging to the general class of proparoxytone adjectives in -ivos which are used to denote the material of which a thing is made (cf. ξύλινος, wooden, λίθινος, made of stone, etc.), σαρκινός properly describes that which is composed of flesh. It is the more literal and grosser term, while σαρκικός has an abstract and ethical application as denoting the 'fleshy' or what pertains to the flesh.

With regard to the use of the two words in the Pauline Epp., a difficulty arises owing to the way in which they are interchanged in different MSS. In the view of some scholars, σάρκινος, which was much the more familiar word of the two, has been substituted in some cases for σαρκικός, an adjective almost wholly unknown outside of biblical Greek (Winer, Gram. of NT Gr., tr. Moulton, ed. 1882, p. 122). Others, conversely, are of opinion that σαρκικός as the more abstract term may have taken the place of the grosser σάρκινος, which might seem to a copyist less appropriate to the Apostle's meaning (Cremer, Lexicon, s.v.). There are cases, however (e.g. Ro 7<sup>14</sup>), where according to the best readings σάρκινος stands when σαρκικός might have been expected. According to some commentators (Tholuck, Alford), St. Paul used the two adjectives indiscriminately. Meyer, on the other hand, who lays stress on the difference of meaning between the two words, thinks that the Apostle sometimes of set purpose employed σάρκινος as the stronger expression in order to indicate more emphatically the presence of the unspiritual element. He calls the Corinthians σάρκινοι (1 Co 3<sup>1</sup>) because the flesh appeared to constitute their very nature; he says of himself in Ro 7<sup>14</sup> 'I am carnal' (σάρκινος), to show by this vivid expression the preponderance in his own case of that unspiritual nature which serves as the instrument of sin.

The use of σάρκινος in such cases, however, is not to be taken as lending any support to the view that St. Paul recognized in the body the source and principle of sin. The language he uses in Gal 5<sup>19a</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>3</sup> suggests rather that his contrast of 'carnal' and 'spiritual' (Ro 8<sup>5a</sup>) is equivalent to the contrast he elsewhere makes of 'natural' and 'spiritual' (1 Co 2<sup>13a</sup>). The 'carnal mind' or 'mind of the flesh' is the mind which is not subject to the law of God (Ro 8<sup>7</sup>) because it has not received the Spirit of God (1 Co 2<sup>12, 14</sup>). See, further, FLESH, BODY.

LITERATURE.—H. Cremer, Lex. of NT Greek<sup>3</sup>, Edinburgh, 1880, and R. C. Trench, Synonyms of the NT<sup>8</sup>, London, 1876, s.vv. σαρκικός, σάρκινος; Comm. of Alford and Meyer on passages referred to; J. Laidlaw, Bible Doct. of Man, new ed., Edinburgh, 1895, ch. vi.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902), pp. 181, 412; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, pp. 190, 214.

J. C. LAMBERT.

CARPUS (Καρπος).—Carpus was an inhabitant of Troas in whose house St. Paul probably lodged on his last journey to Rome. St. Paul writes from his prison to Timothy, and asks him to bring the cloak, books, and parchments which he had left at Troas with Carpus (2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>). Possibly the Apostle was arrested in Troas and compelled to leave these articles behind. Nothing further is known with any certainty regarding Carpus. The name is Greek, but his nationality is unknown. He is supposed by later tradition to have been one of 'the Seventy,' and the Greek Church honours his memory on May 26, the Roman and Syrian Churches on October 13. Both Hippolytus and Dorotheus include his name in their lists of the Seventy, and report that he became bishop of Berythus or Bercæ in Thrace (Acta Sanctorum, May 26, Oct. 13; Menologion, May 26; N. Nilles, Kalendarium Manuale, Innsbruck, 1896, i. 165, 461).

W. F. BOYD.

CASTAWAY.—This word has disappeared from the RV (1 Co 9<sup>27</sup>), and its place has been taken by 'rejected' (ἀδόκιμος). The word is the negation of δόκιμος, 'acceptable,' 'accepted after trial,' and means 'unacceptable,' 'rejected after trial,' as in the LXX Is 1<sup>22</sup> there is found 'your silver is rejected' (τὸ ἀργύριον ὑμῶν ἀδοκιμον). St. Paul, however, somewhat extends the metaphor, for the context shows that the ancient games, or, as he is writing to Corinthians, the Isthmian games, are in his mind. He contemplates the possibility of rejection, after having been successful in the contest, for not having contended in accordance with the rules. It would be distressing in the extreme after all his exacting training and his arduous struggle to be found by the umpire disqualified for neglect of the conditions. To have preached to others, and yet, through lack of Christian watchfulness, to have allowed the flesh to re-assert the mastery and so to become a castaway, to be rejected in the final scrutiny, is a possibility which urges the Apostle himself to more arduous exertions and lends earnestness to his appeal to the Corinthians. For an apposite parallel see 2 Clement, vii. See also art. ASSURANCE.

T. NICOL.

CASTLE.—The word παρεμβολή, translated 'castle' six times in Acts, meant in the Macedonian dialect an encampment, and in the LXX it is used for the camp of the Israelites in the desert (Ex 29<sup>14</sup>, etc.). In the vivid narrative of St. Paul's arrest in Jerusalem (Ac 21. 22) it probably denotes the barracks of the Roman soldiers who were stationed at the castle of Antonia, though the RV as well as the AV identifies it with the castle itself.

The history of this fort goes back to the time of Nehemiah, who speaks of procuring 'timber to make beams for the castle (the Birah) which appertains to the house' (2<sup>8</sup>; cf. 7<sup>2</sup>). Probably on the same site John Hyrcanus, high priest from 135 to 105 B.C., built the Hasmonæan castle, which Josephus calls 'Baris' (Ant. xv. xi. 4; BJ i. xxi. 1). 'When Herod became king, he rebuilt that castle, which was very conveniently situated, in a magnificent manner, and because he was a friend of Antonius, he called it by the name of Antonia' (Ant. xviii. iv. 3). Situated at the corner of the north and west cloisters of the Temple, it commanded, especially from its lofty S.E. tower, a view of the whole sacred precincts, while two staircases (ἀναβαθμοί, Ac 21<sup>35</sup>, καταβάσεις, Jos. BJ v. v. 8) led down from it to the cloisters; and in the Roman period the soldiers of the cohort (σπεῖρα), which was always stationed in the city, 'went several ways among the cloisters, with their arms, on the Jewish festivals, in order to keep watch over the people' (Jos. loc. cit.).

The narrator of St. Paul's arrest was evidently well acquainted with this locality, and he graphically reproduces the details of the scene. News of a Temple riot—no uncommon occurrence—came up (ἀνέβη φάσις) to the commander of the cohort (χιλίαρχος, 'military tribune' RVm), who at once took soldiers and ran down (κατέδραμεν) to the fanatical crowd, probably just in time to prevent bloodshed (Ac 21<sup>31, 32</sup>). As St. Paul was about to be conducted up one of the staircases leading to the barracks, he was swept off his feet by the rising human tide, and had literally to be carried out of danger by the soldiers; but, recovering himself on the upper steps, he asked and obtained permission to address the baffled and still raging crowd, who turned a sea of angry faces upon him from below. His beckoning hand and his Aramaic speech secured a temporary silence, which enabled him to tell his vast audience the story of his conversion, but he could not get beyond the fatal word 'Gentiles' (22<sup>21</sup>), and, leaving behind him a yelling mob, he was marched into the barracks. Fort Antonia was for some days his place of confinement. Hither came his nephew with a message which saved him from falling into the hands of fanatical conspirators (23<sup>16</sup>), and here Christ Himself seemed to stand by him with words of good cheer (v.<sup>14</sup>). From the castle he was taken by night to Antipatris, and thence to Cæsarea (23<sup>31-33</sup>).

LITERATURE.—T. Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1875, ii. 135 ff.; Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1856, ii. 311 ff.; H. A. A. Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek, 1895, p. 15; artt. 'Castle' and 'Jerusalem' in EBi, 'Castle' in HDB.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CASTOR.—See DIOSCURI.

CATECHUMEN.—See BAPTISM.

CATHOLIC EPISTLES.—The title 'Catholic Epistles,' as applied to a group of seven Epistles in the NT, viz. those of James, Peter (two), John (three), and Jude, is first met with in Eusebius (HE II. xxiii. 25[bis] and VI. xiv. 1), and, somewhat later, in Cyril of Jerusalem (Catecheseis, iv. 36) and the original 'Euthalius' (ed. Zaccagni, 1698, i. 405, 409). We can thus trace the title in the above sense as far back as c. A.D. 310, and even then it comes before us as a long-established and familiar designation, the origin of which we may therefore assign to the 3rd century. As regards its usage by Eusebius, the context of the first passage cited (II. xxiii. 25) shows us that it cannot bear the meaning of 'canonical' or 'apostolic,' since he there employs it simply in the sense of Epistles not addressed to a definite and relatively narrow circle of readers. With this usage we may compare his application of the term 'catholic' to the Epistles of Dionysius of Corinth in HE IV. xxiii. 1, where he presumably makes use of an already current designation of that group of seven (!) Epistles, which, though directed to particular communities, might nevertheless, so far as their character and contents are concerned, have been addressed to any community in Christendom. The title 'Catholic Epistle,' again, as applied to a particular letter, is used, c. 260, by Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Eus. HE VII. xxv. 7, 10) of 1 John—in contradistinction to the other two Epistles of John, which are not addressed to the Church at large; the term is used more frequently by Origen of 1 John, Jude, and 1 Peter, as also, in a single instance, of the Epistle of Barnabas (c. Cels. i. 63). The letter of the Apostolic Council in Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>23-29</sup>) is referred to as 'catholic' by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. IV. xv. 97) c. 205, and he applies the same attribute to Jude in his Hypotyposeis (T. Zahn, Forschungen zur Gesch. des NT Kanons, pt. iii. [1884] 83, Gesch. des NT Kanons, i. [1888] 319 f.). The anti-Montanist Apollonius speaks (197) of a 'Catholic Epistle' which the Montanist Themiso had composed in imitation of the Apostle (ap. Eus. HE v. xviii. 5)—probably St. John in his First Epistle.

We may therefore assume that, by the end of the 2nd century, the title 'catholic' was applied to certain Epistles which, as contrasted above all with the Epistles of Paul, were not explicitly addressed to particular churches, and that it was likewise used on similar grounds of 1 John as contrasted with 2 and 3 John. From this point, again, a further step was taken, probably in the first half of the 3rd century, in applying the attribute 'catholic' to all the non-Pauline Epistles in the sacred collection, even although the term as hitherto used was not appropriate to 2 and 3 John. These, however, were by that time closely linked with 1 John. The usage of the term as equivalent to 'general' or 'encyclical' was still recognized by Leontius of Byzantium (de Sectis, ii. 4) and Ecumenius (Com. in Ep. Cath. Jacobi). The change by which the attribute 'catholic' came to signify the opposite of 'non-apostolic' or 'uncanonical' took place in the West, and it was there also that this group of seven Epistles in the NT came to be known generally as the Canonical Epistles (cf. Council of Damasus of 382; see C. H. Turner, JThSt i. [1899-1900] 554, and E. v. Dobschütz, Decret. Gelasianum, 1912, p. 28; Pseudo-Didymus, in Ep. Can. [in the Latin version], and Cassiodorus, de Instit. Div. Lit., 8). It would thus appear that these terms were resorted to as a mere makeshift, and that they are of very little service to us either as regards the history of the canon or from the literary point of view.

LITERATURE.—Histories of the NT Canon, and Introductions to the NT, esp. H. A. Schott, Isagoge hist.-crit. in libros Novæ Fæderis, Jena, 1830, pp. 371-5, and E. Reuss, Gesch. der heiligen Schriften Neuen Testaments, Brunswick, 1860, § 301 (Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1884); E. T. Mayerhoff, 'Über die Bedeutung des Namens επιστολὰι καθολικαὶ' in Hist.-krit. Einleitung in die petrinischen Schriften, Hamburg, 1835, pp. 31-42; A. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, p. 243 f. (Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1901, p. 50 ff.); the relevant excursions of Jan van Gilse and W. C. L. Ziegler ('Animadversiones in sensum nominis epist. cathol.') in J. Dahl, Commentatio exegetico-critica de atheniis epist. petr., Rostock, 1807.

H. JORDAN.

CAUDA.—Cauda (Clauda in AV; Καῦδα in B, supported by Gaudus in Pliny, HN IV. xii. 61, and Pomp. Mela, ii. 14; Κλαῦδα in N and most authorities, supported by Κλαῦδος in Ptolemy, III. xvii. 11) was a small island 23 miles S. of Crete. From the modern forms of the name—Gavdho in Greek, Gozzo in Italian—Ramsay argues that preference should be given to the ancient form which omits the letter 'l.' Favoured by a soft south wind, the ship in which St. Paul was sailing for Italy had rounded Cape Lithinos (now Cape Matala), four or five miles west from Fair Havens, and was making in a W.N.W. direction across the Bay of Messara for Port Phenice (q.v.), which there was the prospect of reaching in a few hours, when she was suddenly struck by a 'typhoon' (ἄνεμος τυφωνικός), or E.N.E. squall (see EURAQUILO), sweeping down from Mount Ida, and, not being able to face the gale (ἀντοφθαλμείν), she had to run before it (ἐπιδόντες ἐφερόμεθα) till she was fortunate enough to get under the lee of Cauda, where the comparatively smooth water enabled the crew to bring her to and prepare her to weather the storm (Ac 27<sup>12-17</sup>). 'The ship must have been laid to on the starboard tack under the lee of Cauda, for it was only on this tack that it was possible to avoid being driven on the African coast' (Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, London, 1880, p. 97 ff.).

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul, London, 1895, p. 326 ff.; A. Breusing, Die Nautik der Alten, Bremen, 1886, p. 169 ff.; artt. 'Cauda' in HDB and 'Clauda' in EBi.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CELIBACY.—See MARRIAGE.

CENCHREÆ.—Cenchreæ (not 'Cenchrea,' as in AV; Κεγχρεαί [Tischendorf], Κερχρεαί [WH]; now the village of Kichries) was the eastern port of Corinth, 7 miles from the city, on the Saronic Gulf, opposite to Lechæum on the Corinthian Gulf. 'Cenchreæ,' says Strabo, 'serves for the trade with Asia, and Lechæum for that with Italy' (VIII. vi. 22). From the town of Schœnus—4 miles north of Cenchreæ—where the isthmus is less than 5 miles wide, a tramway (δίοικος) was laid to the other side, upon which vessels of smaller tonnage were conveyed bodily from sea to sea, avoiding a circuitous passage by the stormy headland of Malea. In A.D. 67, Nero, impressed by an idea which had previously commended itself to greater minds—notably to that of Julius Cæsar—made an abortive attempt to cut a canal across the Isthmus, a piece of engineering which was not accomplished till the end of the 19th century (1881-1893). Between Cenchreæ and Schoenus was a famous sanctuary, in which stood 'the temple of Isthmian Neptune, shaded above with a grove of pine-trees, where the Corinthians celebrated the Isthmian games' (Strabo, loc. cit.). From the pines were cut those garlands for the brows of the victors in the stadium, which St. Paul contrasts with immortal crowns (1 Co 9-4<sup>27</sup>). At Cenchreæ, St. Paul, on the eve of his sailing for Syria to attend the Passover, had his head shorn on account of a vow (Ac 18<sup>18</sup>). During his prolonged residence in Corinth, Cenchreæ had become the seat of a church, of which Phœbe was a διάκονος—if not a deaconess in the full technical meaning of later times, at any rate in a more definite sense than is implied by 'servant' (Ro 16<sup>1</sup>). She was a προστάσις—succourer, patroness, guardian—of many wayfaring Christians who passed through that bustling seaport (16-). It has generally been assumed that this Cenchrean lady, whom St. Paul so warmly commends, was the bearer of the Roman Epistle to its destination (Renan, St. Paul, 1869, p. 219), but there is strong reason to believe that Ro 16 is a letter meant for Ephesus (see ROMANS).

LITERATURE.—Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1856, ii. 224; T. Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1875, i. 299 ff.; J. G. Frazer, Pausanias, 1898, iii. 6 ff.; E. B. Redlich, St. Paul and his Companions, 1913, index, s.v.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CENSER.—1. The writer of Hebrews mentions the 'golden θυμιατήριον' first among the pieces of furniture which belonged to the Holy of Holies (9<sup>4</sup>). He had in view Ex 30<sup>1-10</sup>, which is generally regarded as one of the latest strata of P. His words raise a question as to the meaning of the word θυμιατήριον, and another as to the position of the article so named, both of which questions have been the subject of much controversy. (1) AV and RV, following the Vulgate—'aureum habens thuribulum'—render θυμιατήριον by 'censer'; but RVm and American RV, like Clement Alex., Calvin, and most modern scholars, translate it as 'altar of incense.' Etymologically the word—a neut. adj.—may mean anything employed in the burning of incense, whether a censer in which, or an altar upon which, the act is performed. When θυμιατήριον occurs in the LXX—2 Ch 26<sup>19</sup>, Ezk 8<sup>11</sup>, 4 Mac 7<sup>11</sup>—it no doubt means 'censer,' being a translation of תְּנִיף, while the altar of incense is τὸ θυσιαστήριον θυμιάματος (or -των) in Ex 30<sup>1-27</sup>, Lv 4<sup>7</sup>, 1 Ch 7<sup>49</sup>, etc. But it is also certain that θυμιατήριον became the usual Hellenistic name for the altar of incense, and Philo (Quis rer. div. hæc. 46, Vit. Mos. iii. 7), Josephus (Ant. iii. vi. 8, viii. 2, 3, BJ v. v. 5), and the versions of Symmachus and Theodotion use the word with this meaning in Ex 30<sup>1</sup>. Unless the writer of Hebrews follows the same usage, he entirely ignores the altar of incense in his description of the furniture of the tabernacle, which is scarcely credible. (2) Prima facie, the author of Hebrews has fallen into error in naming this altar among the furnishings of the most holy place. He may be supposed to have been misled (a) by the ambiguous instructions regarding it given in Ex 30<sup>6</sup>: 'thou shalt put it before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy-seat that is over the testimony'; (b) by its designation as αγιον των αγιων in Ex 30<sup>10</sup>; and (c) especially by the fact that in Ex 25<sup>3-40</sup> 26<sup>35</sup>, only the candlestick and the table are mentioned as standing in the holy place. Such a mistake on the part of the writer, whose acquaintance with the ritual practice of Judaism was second-hand, would not prove him the Monstrum von Unwissenheit that Delitzsch suggests. Still, it is not certain that he was really wrong. He does not say that the Holy of Holies contained the θυμιατήριον (contrast ἐν τῷ in He 9<sup>3</sup>), but that it had (ἔχουσα) such an altar. Evidently he was thinking, not of the local position of the altar, but of its intimate relation to the ministry of the inner sanctuary on the Day of Atonement.

2. In Rev 8<sup>3-5</sup>, λίβανωτός, which is strictly 'frankincense,' the gum exuding from the λίβανος, is used instead of λίβανωτης (or -της) for 'censer,' corresponding to the πυρεῖον (πυρίον) or θυσιαστήριον ('fire pan') of the LXX. In the prophetic symbolism this censer holds (1) the fire which burns the incense that is added to the prayers of the saints, and (2) the fire, or hot ashes, of God's vengeance, which are cast upon a hostile and impenitent world. See INCENSE.

LITERATURE.—Grimm-Thayer, s.v. θυμιατήριον; Schürer, HJP ii. i. 295; T. Zahn, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., 1909, ii. 363; H. B. Swete, Apocalypse of St. John, 1907, p. 108; ExpT i. [1889-90] 74, ii. [1890-91] 18; see also art. 'Censer' in HDB and Literature there cited.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CENTURION.—See ARMY.

CEPHAS.—See PETER.

CERINTHUS.—Probably Cerinthus was educated in Egypt (Hippol., vii. 7, 33; x. 21 [ed. Duncker]); certainly he taught in proconsular Asia contemporaneously with John, the writer of the Gospel and Epistles, i.e. in the last quarter of the 1st cent. A.D. (Polycarp, quoted in Iren., adv. Hær. iii. iii. 4). Cerinthus is one of the earliest of the Gnostics. The world, he taught, was made not by the Supreme God, but by a Power inferior to, and ignorant of, Him. He denied the virgin birth of Jesus, who was, however, pre-eminent for righteousness, prudence, and wisdom. He separated Jesus and Christ. Christ descended on Jesus after baptism and left Him before the crucifixion. Jesus suffered and rose again, but Christ, a pure spirit, was impassible (Iren., adv. Hær. i. xxvi. 1; cf. iii. xi. 1; Hippol., vii. 33, x. 21; Pseudo-Tertullian, adv. omn. Hær. x.).

It is not incredible that Cerinthus judaized to the extent of teaching the obligation of circumcision and the Sabbath (Epiph., Hær. chs. i. and ii., and Philaster). Though Judaizing and Gnosticism afterwards became inconsistent with each other, at Cerinthus' stage such a limited alliance is not unthinkable. It is, however, his christology that is most important, and it is an interesting query—Is it this that is attacked in 1 John? Beyond doubt St. John has an actual heresy in view; he gives no mere general warning against errors that may arise. The crucial passage is 1 Jn 4<sup>2-3a</sup>, which, literally translated from the critical texts, reads: 'Hereby know ye the spirit of God; every spirit which confesses Jesus Christ come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which confesses not Jesus is not of God.' The use of 'Jesus' alone in v.<sup>2a</sup> makes it almost certain that v.<sup>2</sup> should be taken to mean 'confesses Jesus as Christ come in the flesh.' Thus it is not Docetism that is opposed, but a separation such as Cerinthus made between Jesus and Christ. Further, according to Socrates (HE vii. 32), 'confesses not' in v.<sup>3</sup> was substituted for an original 'dissolves' or 'disrupts' (λύει, so Vulg. solvit). If we accept this, the case may be said to be proved. It is exactly the christology of Cerinthus that is attacked. So in 1 Jn 2-, the denial that Jesus is Christ can scarcely be the old Jewish denial, but a refusal like that of Cerinthus to identify Jesus with Christ. Again, in 1 Jn 5<sup>6</sup> 'blood' probably refers either to the birth or to the death of Christ, both of which Cerinthus denied. Quite possibly other errors are in St. John's mind as well as Cerinthianism. Docetism, no doubt, was a real danger, and passages like 1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup> seem to have it in view. But it is probable in the highest degree that it is mainly Cerinthus who is to St. John the enemy of the truth.

The errors dealt with in 1 John had antinomian consequences. According to Gaius of Rome (quoted by Euseb., HE iii. 28), Cerinthus taught the coming of a millennium of sensual delights. Too much credence, however, is not to be attached to such statements. In early days, as always, heretics were readily and rashly painted as moral delinquents, and, as noted above, John may have others besides Cerinthus in view.

Other views have been attributed to Cerinthus, but the evidence is so scanty, confused, and contradictory, that it is not worth while to state them.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon<sup>3</sup>, London, 1879; H. L. Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, do. 1875; A. Hilgenfeld, Ketzergeschichte, Leipzig, 1884, p. 411 ff.; D. R. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellenkritik d. Epiphanius, Vienna, 1865, p. 328 f.; R. Law, The Tests of Life, Edinburgh, 1909, chs. ii. and xiii.; art. 'Cerinthus,' by A. S. Peake, in ERE iii. 318. W. D. NIVEN.

CERTAINTY.—See ASSURANCE.

CHAIN, BONDS.—The word ἀλυσίς is used of the coupling-chain or manacle by which the prisoner was attached to his guard, as distinguished from πέδη, the foot-fetters. It differs apparently from δεσμοί in conveying the idea of attachment rather than confinement. Among the Romans, it was customary to attach the prisoner by a light chain to the soldier responsible for his safe custody. One end of the chain was fastened to the right wrist of the captive, and the other to the left wrist of his custodian, whose right hand was thus free. It is to this method of confinement that St. Paul alludes, when speaking of his 'chain' (Ac 28<sup>20</sup>, Eph 6<sup>30m</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>). Sometimes, for greater security, the prisoner was bound to two soldiers, one on each side of him, in which case, of course, the use of two chains would be necessary. This more rigorous method of confinement is the sort to which St. Peter was subjected during his imprisonment (Ac 12<sup>6</sup>), and also St. Paul during the early days of his captivity at Jerusalem (Ac 21<sup>33</sup>). Later on, at Caesarea and Rome, the latter Apostle, although still kept in strict military custody, was permitted to enjoy a considerable measure of freedom (Ac 24<sup>23</sup> 28<sup>30f.</sup>). More frequently, the less precise and graphic terms δεσμοί and δεσμά, 'bonds' or 'imprisonment' are used to describe the condition of persons in captivity. St. Paul, speaking of himself as a prisoner, makes repeated allusions to his 'bonds' (Ph 1<sup>7</sup> 13. 14. 16, Col 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, Philem 10. 13). The neuter and masculine forms are used with distinct shades of meaning, δεσμά referring to the fetters by which the person was bound (Ac 16<sup>36</sup> ['bands'] 20<sup>23</sup>, 26<sup>24</sup>), δεσμοί to the state of captivity into which the person had been thrown. W. S. MONTGOMERY.

CHALCEDONY (χαλκηδών).—Chalcedony is the precious stone with which the third foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem is garnished (Rev 21<sup>19</sup>). The ancient meaning of the word is uncertain. In modern mineralogy the chalcedony is 'a micro-crystalline form of quartz . . . a translucent substance of rather waxy lustre, presenting great variety of colours, though usually white, grey, yellow or brown' (EBr<sup>11</sup> v. 803). But the chalcedony of Pliny (HN xxxvii. 72-73) was a green stone—an inferior kind of emerald—from the copper-mines of Chalcedon in Bithynia, whence its name. Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 621<sup>a</sup>) suggests that it was 'diopase' or silicate of copper.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CHAMBERLAIN.—The only person clearly designated as such in the NT is Blastus, ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως (sc. Herod Agrippa I.), whom the Tyrians and Sidonians persuaded to befriend them against the king's displeasure at Caesarea, and to obtain peace for them 'because their country was nourished by the king's country' (Ac 12<sup>10</sup>). The office he held would obviously involve great intimacy and influence with the king. Erastus, who is called 'the chamberlain of the city' in Ro 16<sup>23</sup> (AV; RV 'treasurer'), held a different office (see STEWARD). The eunuch of Ac 8<sup>27ff.</sup> also held a different office; he 'was over all' the queen's 'treasure' (see ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH).

C. L. FELTOE.

CHANAAN.—See CANAAN.

CHARISMATA.—See GIFTS.

CHARITY.—See ALMS, LOVE.

CHARITY, FEAST OF.—See LOVE-FEAST.

CHASTISEMENT.—The subject of chastisement and chastening is frequently mentioned in the OT and the NT. The NT terms are παίδεω and παῖδα, which correspond to רָם and רָמַם of the OT. In classical usage these words refer to the whole of the education of the παις, including the training of the body. Sometimes they are used of the results of the whole process. They do not contain, however, the idea of chastisement. In the OT, Apocrypha, and NT this idea of correction, discipline, chastening, is added to that of the general cultivation of mind and morals: the education is 'per molestias' (Augustine, Enarr. in Pss., 119<sup>66</sup>); see Lk 23<sup>16</sup>, He 12<sup>5-7</sup>, 8, Rev 3<sup>19</sup>; cf. Lv 26<sup>18</sup>, Ps 6<sup>1</sup>, Is 53<sup>5</sup>, Sir 4<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>26</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>1</sup>—(see Westcott on He 12<sup>7</sup>; Trench, NT Syn.<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 23; Milligan, Greek Papyri, 1910, p. 94). In Ac 7<sup>22</sup> there is found the only NT instance of the verb in its general Greek sense. In 2 Ti 3<sup>16</sup> the noun is used for disciplinary instruction, the correction of mistakes and curling of passions, that virtue may be increased. Pilate uses the verb in speaking of the terrible scourging of Jesus (Lk 23<sup>16</sup>, 22; cf. Dt 22<sup>18</sup>), but it is a very mild term for the fearful flagellatio.

Chastisement, as part of the moral discipline of character, is the positive duty of a father (Eph 6<sup>4</sup>). In this passage, 'chastening' is substituted by RV for AV 'nurture,' which is too weak a word, but 'discipline' might be better still. The same idea of parental correction of the faults of children is found in He 12<sup>9</sup>, where the fathers are described as παῖδευται (cf. Plato, Dialogues, tr. Jowett, 1892, index, s.v. 'education'). In this fatherly fashion God Himself chastens His children for their ultimate good (He 12<sup>11</sup>; cf. Pr 3<sup>11f.</sup>, Rev 3<sup>19</sup>). The evils with which God visits men are rods of chastisement (1 Co 11<sup>32</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>9</sup>; cf. Pr 19<sup>18</sup> 29<sup>17</sup>, Wis 3<sup>4b</sup>, 11<sup>10ff.</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>4</sup>). Such treatment is not a sign of antipathy or rejection, but an evidence of true love. God does not leave His wayward children to their fate, but strives to bring them to becoming reverence and reformation. Sometimes the chastisement is of such a terrible character that the one who suffers is said to be 'delivered unto Satan' (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>0</sup>; cf. Job 2<sup>6</sup>, Ps 109<sup>6m</sup>, Ac 26<sup>1b</sup>). But even in these cases the ultimate object is the recovery of the sinner, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus' and 'that they might be taught not to blaspheme.' The 'thorn in the flesh' afflicted St. Paul so grievously that he called it 'a messenger of Satan' (2 Co 12<sup>7ff.</sup>; cf. Lk 13<sup>16</sup>, Jub. x. 2), but it saved him from being 'exalted overmuch' and became a means of such abundant grace that he was led positively to glory in his weakness. This same grace of God, which brings salvation to all who receive it, does not always appear in gentle instruction, but sometimes takes the form of stern chastisement; in a word, whatever means is necessary for the perfect redemption of the soul, that means will grace employ (see Tit 2<sup>11a</sup>). To those who submit to this process of chastening, the rewards are immense and enduring. Compared with them the 'affliction' is 'light,' and the pain of the present moment is transformed into 'an eternal weight of glory' (2 Co 4<sup>16-18</sup>).

As to the relation between paideia and voutheia, 'chastening and admonition' of Eph 6<sup>4</sup>, T. K. Abbott (Eph. and Col. [ICC, 1897] 178) maintains that paideia is, as in classical writers, the more general, voutheia the more specific term, for instruction and admonition. On the other hand, Grotius, followed by Ellicott, Alford, and many others, declares: 'paideia hic significare videtur institutionem per poenas; voutheia autem est ea institutio quae fit verbis.' The Vulg. translates 'in disciplina et correptione.' The probability is that the former word refers to training by 'act and discipline,' the latter to training by 'word.' See also ADMONITION and DISCIPLINE.

LITERATURE.—H. A. A. Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek, 1895, p. 101; R. C. Trench, NT Synonyms<sup>8</sup>, 1876, p. 107 f.; H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John<sup>2</sup>, 1907, p. 63; the Commentaries on Ephesians, esp. J. Armitage Robinson, 1903; ExpT xiv. [1902-03] 272; see also art. 'Chastening' and 'Nurture' in HDB. H. CARISS J. SIDNELL.

CHEERFULNESS (O.E. chere, 'face,' 'look'; L. Lat. cara, 'the face').—The abundance of expressions of buoyant gladness in a weak and persecuted community, as was the Christian Church of the first century, is striking. Whereas we might expect depression and sighing, we find everywhere singing at midnight in the prison houses (Ac 5<sup>41</sup> 16<sup>25</sup>, Ro 8<sup>35-37</sup>, 1 P 16<sup>8</sup>, etc.). Although St. Paul is described as once saying that his service has been with tears (Ac 20<sup>19.31</sup>), and in his letter to Corinth confesses that he writes with many tears and with deep suffering and depression of spirit (2 Co 2<sup>4</sup>), such utterances stand isolated among a multitude of phrases suggestive of rejoicing and exultation. The Apostle's references to depressing circumstances of life are usually to indicate his triumph over them (Ph 3<sup>7.8</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>7</sup>, 6<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>30</sup> 12<sup>9</sup>). Is there affliction? That may be joyfully regarded as filling up what was lacking in the sufferings of Christ (Col 1<sup>4</sup>), as building up character (Ro 5<sup>3</sup>; cf. He 12<sup>1</sup>, Ja 1-), as winning an eternal weight of glory (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>). Even martyrdom for faith is a thought inspiring joyfulness (Ph 2<sup>17.18</sup>). Are there those who preach Christ out of envy and contentiousness? No matter, Christ is being preached (Ph 1<sup>15-16</sup>). St. Paul's very imprisonment is having happy results—the Imperial guards have thereby heard of Christ, and other brethren have been inspired by St. Paul's sacrifice to bolder service (Ph 1<sup>12-14</sup>). There is much in human life to give gladness—meetings with friends (Ph 2<sup>23.29</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Jn 1<sup>2</sup>), even the very remembrance of them (Ph 1<sup>4</sup>), the sharing of the joys of others (Ro 12<sup>15</sup>, 1 Co 12<sup>26</sup>), the success of one's work (Ph 2<sup>16</sup>), the faithfulness of converts (1 Th 2<sup>19.20</sup>), their repentance after error (2 Co 7<sup>9</sup>), their thoughtful liberality (Ph 4<sup>19</sup>). One may rejoice in a good conscience (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>), in the joy set before those running the good race (He 12-), in the inspirations and consolations of Christian faith (Ro 5<sup>-11</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup> 5<sup>6</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>8</sup>). Not only is there cause for joy in the argued inferences from Christian beliefs—in the direct experience of the Holy Spirit there is joy and peace which the world cannot give (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>; cf. the characteristic features of mysticism in W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, London, 1902, lects. 16 and 17). Christian cheerfulness is not based on a denial of the reality of the dark things of life, but on the proportioning of them by the larger elements of joyful Christian faith and experience. A shallow, worldly cheerfulness must not be confused with the joy of the Christian in God. Human good cheer is only for a season (1 Co 7<sup>30</sup>); there is a laughter which should be turned to grief, and gladness to shame (Ja 4<sup>9</sup>). Exhortations to rejoice are found in 1 Th 5<sup>16</sup>, Ro 5<sup>3</sup> (cf. Col 1<sup>11</sup>) 12<sup>12</sup>, Ph 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>4</sup> ('χαλπετε expresses the predominant mood of the Epistle, a mood wonderfully characteristic of Paul's closing years' [H. A. A. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians,' 1903, p. 466]). H. BULCOCK.

CHERUBIM (χερουβim).—Among the symbolic ornaments of the Tabernacle the writer of Hebrews mentions 'the cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy-seat' (9<sup>5</sup>). In Solomon's Temple there were two colossal cherubim whose out-spread wings filled the most holy place (1 K 6<sup>23-28</sup>), but in the ideal description of the Tabernacle two much smaller figures are represented as standing on the ark of the covenant itself (which was only about four feet long), facing each other and overshadowing the place of God's presence. The cherubim were 'das beliebteste Ornamentstück der Hebräer' (Benzinger, Heb. Arch., Freiburg, 1894, p. 268). It is significant that while precise directions are given regarding their material, position, and attitude, nothing is said of their shape except that they were winged. Their enigmatic form made them fitting symbols of the mysterious nature of the Godhead. Originally, no doubt, they were far from being merely allegorical. They had lived long in the popular imagination before they came to be used as religious emblems. They were mythical figures probably suggested by the phenomenon of the storm-cloud, in which God seemed to descend from heaven to earth, the thunder being the rushing of their wings and the lightning their flashing swords (cf. Ps 18<sup>10.11</sup>). While Lenormant (Les Origines, 1880-84, i. 112 f.) and Friedrich Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies?, 1881, p. 150 f.) connect them with the winged bulls which guarded the entrance to Assyrian palaces, others associate them with the Syrian griffins (probably of Hittite origin) which were supposed to draw the chariot of the sun-god (Cheyne, EBi i. 745). Behind the cherubim of Ezekiel (10<sup>14</sup>) which are the original of the 'living creatures' of Rev 4<sup>6-8</sup>, there may be the signs of the zodiac (Gunkel).

When the later Hebrews wished to represent the presence of Jahweh among them in the Temple at Jerusalem, they adopted the cherubim as the awful symbols alike of His nearness and of His unapproachableness. It is improbable that these works of art had a purely human appearance. Schultz (OT Theol., Eng. tr., 1892, ii. 236) inclines to the view that they were 'composite figures, with the feet of oxen, the wings of eagles, the manes of lions, and the body and face of men.' A. Jeremias (The OT in the Light of the Anc. East, 1911, ii. 126), following Klostermann, thinks it possible that 'the conception is that of four cherubim (two cherubim, each with a double face).' As the symbols were blazoned on the doors, walls, and curtains of the Temple, their general appearance must originally have been quite well known, but time once more threw a veil of mystery over them, and Josephus declares that 'no one can tell or guess what the cherubim were like' (Ant. VIII. iii. 3).

LITERATURE.—I. Benzinger, Heb. Arch.<sup>2</sup>, 1907, index, s.v. 'Kerube'; A. Furtwangler, in Roscher, Lex. i. 2, col. 1742 ff. art. 'Gryps'; art. 'Cherub' in EBi and 'Cherubim' in HDB. JAMES STRAHAN.

CHIEF PRIEST.—See PRIEST.

CHILD, CHILDREN.—See FAMILY.

CHILDREN OF GOD, SONS OF GOD.—Amongst the many ways current in antiquity of expressing the relationship existing between God and man (Creator, King, Lord, Husband, Father), two were derived from human relationships of the family life—God is the Husband or Bridegroom of His people, or He is their Father. With the former we are not now concerned. The latter plays a large part in the teaching of the NT. It will be convenient to examine this teaching under four heads: (1) the doctrine of St. Paul, (2) that of the Johannine writings, (3) that of 1 Peter, (4) that of the remaining books.

1. St. Paul.—It is natural that we should find in this writer, who was the champion and protagonist of the movement for the extension of Christianity to the Gentiles, the most unrestricted expression in the NT of the sonship of mankind as related to God. In Ac 17<sup>28</sup> he bases an argument upon the phrase of the poet Cleanthes 'for we are his offspring.' If Eph 3<sup>15</sup> 'the Father from whom every family in heaven and earth is named' should more rightly be translated 'of whom all fatherhood in heaven and earth is named,'* we have here the thought that Fatherhood is an element in the very being of God, and that all other forms of paternity are derived from Him. The words of Eph 4<sup>6</sup> 'one God and Father of all' will then be naturally interpreted of this universal Fatherhood of God. It is, however, natural enough that in a Christian writer this conception of the universal Fatherhood of God should find little emphasis, and that it should be of infrequent occurrence, for the conception of sonship was wanted to express a closer and more vital relationship than that between God and unredeemed humanity. St. Paul, therefore, generally uses it to denote the relationship between God and the disciples of Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles. Writing in the stress of the Jewish controversy, he finds it necessary to vindicate the claims of the Gentile Christians to the name 'children or sons of God.' Gentile Christians are 'children of promise' (Gal 4<sup>23</sup>). It is they who as 'children of promise' are Abraham's seed (Ro 9<sup>8</sup>). And this sonship had been foretold by Hosea (Ro 9<sup>25</sup>). To express the process by which the Christian becomes a son of God, St. Paul takes from current Greek and Roman terminology the metaphor of 'adoption': † so in Ro 8<sup>15</sup> 'ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father'; so again in Gal 4<sup>4-6</sup> 'God sent forth his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons . . . and because ye are sons, God sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father.' The metaphor occurs twice besides in connexion with the genesis of the idea of adoption in the mind of God, and with its complete realization in the future. In Eph 1<sup>5</sup> St. Paul speaks of God as 'having foreordained us unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto himself.' In Ro 8<sup>23</sup> he speaks of Christians who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, who therefore have already received in some measure the spirit of adoption, as 'waiting for our adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.' He seems to mean that only at the resurrection, when the body rises incorruptible, will the process of adoption be really completed, and made manifest. Adoption to sonship, then, according to St. Paul, presupposes the revelation of the Son of God: 'God sent forth his Son that we might receive the adoption of sons' (Gal 4<sup>6</sup>). It was effected by the imparting to the disciple of the Spirit of the incarnate Son, or, in other words, of the Spirit of God. 'God sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts' (v. 6); 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God' (Ro 8<sup>14</sup>). This involves real likeness to the Son of God: 'He foreordained them to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born amongst many brethren' (v. 29). Cf. such passages as 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup> 'we all . . . are being changed into the same image.' At the unveiling or apocalypse of Christ there will also be an unveiling, or manifestation, of the sons of God (Ro 8<sup>19</sup>), in which in some sense the whole created universe will share (v. 21). Lastly, adoption involves fellowship with the Son of God (1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>) and joint participation with Him in present suffering, and in future glory (Ro 8<sup>16-17</sup>).

2. Johannine writings.—In this literature the terms 'the Father,' 'the Son' are most characteristically used to express the relationship between God and the Word of God incarnate in Jesus Christ. Whether God is spoken of as the Father of all men is doubtful. The same question arises here as in the Synoptic Gospels. There Christ speaks repeatedly to His disciples of God as 'your Father': in Mt., commonly, e.g. 5<sup>16</sup>, 45, 48; in Mk., twice, 11-5, 26; in Lk., thrice, 6<sup>38</sup> 12<sup>30</sup>, 82. They are to address Him in prayer as 'our Father' (Mt 6<sup>9</sup>) or 'Father' (Lk 11<sup>2</sup>). They are so to imitate Him that they may be His sons (Mt 5<sup>40</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). In the Fourth Gospel we find for 'your Father' the simple 'the Father.' Of course we may read into these phrases the idea of the universal Fatherhood of God; and the general tenour of Christ's teaching, interpreted in the light of history, makes it certain that He meant to imply this. But we must remember that He was speaking to Jews, who had long been accustomed to think of God's Fatherhood as a term specially applicable to the pious Jew, or to the Jewish nation. His hearers would not, therefore, necessarily have read a universalistic sense into His words, and He nowhere explicitly speaks of God as Father of all men outside His own disciples (members of the Jewish nation). The nearest approximation to this would be His use of 'the Father' in speaking to the Samaritan woman (4<sup>21-23</sup>). For the term 'Father' as applied to God in the OT and in the later Jewish pre-Christian literature, where it is generally used to denote the relationship between God and the individual pious Jew, see W. Bousset, Rel. des Jud., Berlin, 1903, p. 355 ff.; G. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1902, p. 184 ff. The phrase, 'the children of God who were scattered abroad' (Jn 11<sup>5</sup>), probably refers to the members of the Gentile churches of the writer's own period. These became 'children of God' when they became Christians. In connexion with sonship as used of the relation between God and the disciple of Christ the most characteristic feature of the Johannine writings is the use of the metaphor of re-birth. In Jn 11<sup>2</sup>, it is said that those who receive the incarnate Word, or who believe on His name, are given authority to become children of God. (It is just possible that we have here an allusion to the Pauline conception of sonship by adoption.) Then follows a description of the process by which this position of 'children' was reached. They were begotten, not along the lines of physical birth, but 'of God.' There is a very interesting variant reading (Western) which makes these words descriptive not of the spiritual birth of the Christian disciple, but of the birth in a supernatural manner ('not of a husband') of the Word, who thus became flesh. And even if that be not the original reading, it would seem that the writer in choosing terms in which to describe the spiritual birth of the disciple has selected terms which presuppose acquaintance with the tradition of the birth from a virgin. The disciple, like the Lord Himself, was born, not by physical generation, nor of fleshly passion, nor at the impulse of a human husband, but of God. In 3<sup>3</sup> the necessity of thus being born from above, or anew, is once more emphasized. In 3<sup>5</sup> the birth is described as a begetting of the Spirit which takes place at baptism ('of water,' unless these words are an early gloss). In the First Epistle the idea recurs. The communication of the Divine life from God in this spiritual birth is connected, as in St. Paul, with 'faith.' 'Every one who believes that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God,' 1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup> (cf. Gal 3<sup>26</sup> 'sons through faith'). But 'love,' and 'doing righteousness' are also the external signs of spiritual birth (cf. 4<sup>7</sup> 'Every one that loveth is born of God,' and 2<sup>29</sup> 'Every one that doeth righteousness is begotten of Him'). And just as in St. Paul adoption to sonship involved an increasing conformity to the likeness of the Son of God, so in St. John the birth from God involves the idea of freedom from sin. 'Every one that is begotten of God does not commit sin' (3<sup>9</sup>; cf. 5<sup>18</sup>). It carries with it also the certainty of victory over 'the world.' 'Whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world' (5<sup>4</sup>). Just as it is characteristic of St. Paul, with his metaphor of adoption, to speak of Christians as 'sons,' so it naturally follows from St. John's preference for the idea of re-birth to speak of them as 'children.' And lastly, just as St. Paul seems to look forward to the resurrection as the moment when adoption to sonship shall be consummated, so St. John looks forward to the manifestation of Christ as the moment when likeness to Him, which is involved in sonship, will be perfected (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup> 'Beloved, now are we the children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. But we know that if he [or it] shall be manifested we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is').

* See J. Armitage Robinson, Ephesians, 1903, p. 83 f.

† See W. M. Ramsay, Historical Commentary on the Galatians, p. 337 ff.

3. 1 Peter.—Here, too, we find the conception that Christians have passed through a process of re-birth. The word used is not the simple 'to beget,' as in Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, but a compound 'to beget again,' which is found also in 'Western' authorities of Jn 3<sup>5</sup>. Thus when St. Peter speaks of God who 'begat us again,' he describes the life of Christians as a new life into which they had entered, and at the same time emphasizes this life as having originated by a Divine act of God. In 1<sup>23</sup> he speaks of Christians as 'being begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God.' The seed here seems to describe the Divine nature (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>), and the 'word' apparently means the message of the Gospel of the incarnate 'Word.' It is in harmony with this conception of the re-birth of Christians that St. Peter speaks of them as invoking 'a Father' (1<sup>17</sup>).

4. The idea of sonship finds little expression in the remaining books of the NT. In He 12<sup>7, 8</sup> affliction is regarded as a proof that God deals with the sufferers as with sons. This is merely metaphorical. More to our point is He 2<sup>10</sup>. 'It became him, through whom are all things, and all things through him, in bringing many sons to glory, to make the leader of their salvation perfect through sufferings. For he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one.' Some would see in the 'sons' a reference to the universal Fatherhood of God, but more probably it is Christians who are meant, who have become 'sons' by uniting themselves with the one Son. Consequently He and they are all sons of one common Father. The use of 'sons' is in this case parallel to that of 'children' in Jn 11<sup>52</sup>. The conception of sonship does not occur in James, 2 or 3 John, 2 Peter, or in Jude, for the phrase 'God the Father' in 2 P 1<sup>17</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>3</sup>, and Jude<sup>1</sup> seems to have reference rather to the relationship between God and Christ than to that between God and men. In the Apocalypse it occurs only in 21<sup>7</sup>, where it is to be the privilege of those who inherit the new Jerusalem that they will be sons of God.

If we now try to summarize the teaching of the Apostolic Age as expressed in the writings of the NT on the conception of sonship of God, the following appear to be the main lines of thought: (1) There is a recognition of the universal Fatherhood of God, to be seen in the teaching of Christ when once it was detached from a literal Jewish interpretation (cf. especially the Parable of the Prodigal Son, and the use of the term 'the Father' in the conversation with the woman of Samaria). It appears, too, in St. Paul's words to the non-Christian Athenians. Whether the inference that God is the Father of all men, from Eph 3<sup>15</sup>, is a necessary one may be more doubtful. The correlative to this thought of the Fatherhood of God should logically be that of the universal sonship of men. But this receives very scanty expression in the NT (cf. again the Parable of the Prodigal Son, Ac 17<sup>3</sup>, and perhaps He 2<sup>10</sup>). (2) In a unique sense Jesus Christ is the Son of God. (3) The Christian disciple by virtue of his union with Christ becomes a son, or child, of God. In the language of St. Paul he is adopted to be a son. In the language of St. John and St. Peter he is born or begotten again. The condition of such sonship is faith. It is characterized by guidance by the Spirit, and it manifests itself in love and in righteousness. Consisting in the gift of new life from God (incorruptible seed, or the Spirit), it implies growth, i.e. a progressive assimilation to Christ Himself. The consummation of this process will be a final adoption at the resurrection (St. Paul), or likeness to Christ at His manifestation (St. John).

LITERATURE.—For Sonship of God by new birth, in antiquity, see A. Dieterich, Eine Nithrasliturgie, Leipzig, 1903, p. 157 ff.; for Adoption, see W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Galatians, London, 1899, p. 337 ff. and art. 'Adoption' in ERE. For Sonship of God in the NT, see the Theologies of the NT, e.g. G. B. Stevens, Edinburgh, 1899, pp. 69 ff., 591 f. For Sonship in St. John, see B. F. Westcott, Epistles of St. John, London, 1883, p. 120 f.; O. Pfeiderer, Primitive Christianity, Eng. tr., 1. [1906] 365 ff., iv. [1911] 227 ff. W. C. ALLEN.

CHILIARCH.—See ARMY.

CHILIASM.—See PAROUSIA, ESCHATOLOGY.

CHIOS (ἡ Χίος; now 'Scio').—The name was given to a beautiful island in the Aegean Sea, separated from the mainland of Asia Minor by a picturesque channel, 6 miles wide, which is studded with islets. Its capital was also called Chios. In the 5th cent. B.C. its inhabitants were said to be the wealthiest in Greece. It produced 'the best of the Grecian wines' (Strabo, XIV. i. 35). Under the Roman Empire it was a free city of the province of Asia, till the time of Vespasian, who included it in the Insularum Provincia.

St. Paul passed Chios in his last recorded Aegean voyage (Ac 20<sup>15</sup>). Sailing in the morning from Mitylene in Lesbos, his ship, after a run of 50 miles, cast anchor at night near the Asian coast, opposite Chios (Ἀντικύριον Χίου) and under the heul-land of Mimas. Next day she struck across the open sea (παρεβόλουεν) for Samos. Chios was one of the seven claimants to the honour of being the birth-place of Homer, and its pretensions received stronger support from tradition than those of any of its rivals. 'The blind old bard of Chios' rocky isle' was familiar with the course pursued by St. Paul, for he represents Nestor as standing in his ship at the Lesbian Bay and doubting—

'If to the right to urge the pilot's toll . . .
Or the straight course to rocky Chios plough,
And anchor under Mimas' shaggy brow'
(Od. iii. 168-172).

Josephus describes a voyage of Herod the Great in the opposite direction. 'When he had sailed by Rhodes and Cos, he touched at Lesbos, as thinking he should have overtaken Agrippa there; but he was taken short here by a north wind, which hindered his ship from going to the shore, so he remained many days at Chios. . . . And when the high winds were laid he sailed to Mitylene, and thence to Byzantium' (Ant. XVI. ii. 2).

LITERATURE.—Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, new ed., London, 1877, ii. 262 f.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul, do. 1895, p. 292 f.; T. Bent, in Eng. Hist. Review, iv. [1889] pp. 467-480; Murray's Guide to Asia Minor. JAMES STRAHAN.

CHLOE.—St. Paul was told of the factions in Corinth ὑπὸ τῶν Χλόης, 'by them of Chloe' (1 Co 1<sup>11</sup>). It is not said that she was a Christian, nor is it clear whether she lived in Corinth or in Ephesus. Probably she was an Ephesian Christian lady, whose 'people' (i.e. her Christian slaves, or companions, or even children) had brought back disquieting news after visiting Corinth. Her name is an epithet of a goddess and was often given to slaves; hence it has been conjectured that she was a freedwoman of property.

LITERATURE.—Artt. in HDB on 'Chloe' and on '1 Cor.inthians,' p. 487*; Comm. on 1 Cor. by Findlay (EGT, 1904), pp. 735, 763, and by Godet (1889), i. 21, 64. C. v. Weizsacker discusses the situation in Corinth, and takes a different view about Chloe: see his Apostolic Age, i. 2, London, 1897, pp. 305, 318, 325, 335. J. E. ROBERTS.

CHRIST, CHRISTOLOGY.—In studying 'Christology' the object is to ascertain what were the opinions, convictions, or dogmas regarding the Person of Christ which were held by particular authorities or by the Christian Church as a whole at any particular time. In the period now under review 'dogmas' do not enter into consideration, seeing that the Apostolic Age does not furnish any instance of common opinion enforced by authority, which is what 'dogma' consists in. On the other hand, the limits of our period are set not by the 'Age of the Apostles' strictly understood, but by the documents which form our NT, even though some of them may be held to proceed from a generation subsequent to that of the apostles.

It has been usual to divide the subject into pre-Pauline and Pauline (with post-Pauline) Christology; and the division only does justice to the great place occupied by St. Paul in the interpretation of Christian experience and the correlation of Christian thought. But the classification is open to a two-fold objection. In the first place, it tends unduly to depreciate the importance, indeed the normative value, of Christian experience and reflexion anterior to St. Paul; and, in the second place, by grouping the other forms of Christology as 'post-Pauline' or 'sub-Pauline,' it assumes or alleges a relation of dependence between them and the Christology of the Apostle; whereas the fact of this relation and the measure of it are parts of the whole problem, and call for careful investigation. It is preferable, therefore, to consider first primitive Christology, and then sub-primitive Christology, without assuming any continuous line of development.

I. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF THE PRIMITIVE COMMUNITY.—1. Sources.—The material for the study of this period is far from copious, and its value has been much disputed. Yet its importance is so great that it demands careful examination. The possible sources may be classified under three heads: (1) the Acts of the Apostles, especially the earlier half; (2) certain statements and allusions in St. Paul's Epistles as to views held in common by himself and the primitive Christian community; and (3) certain elements in the Synoptic Gospels, in which, it has been suggested, we find reflected the Christological idea of a later generation. We shall take these in the reverse order.

(1) The Synoptic Gospels.—Here it is not proposed to make any use of what some claim to recognize as 'secondary' material in the Synoptic Gospels. Firstly, even if the presence of such material be admitted as a possibility, there is the greatest uncertainty as to its amount and its distribution. While there has undoubtedly been a tendency in some critical writers to exaggerate the influence of later theology on the Synoptic record, it is also quite possible that the criteria to which they appeal may need to be revised. Neither the absolute nor the relative dates of the NT documents have been ascertained with sufficient certainty, nor yet has the inner history of the period been realized with sufficient precision, to make the discrimination of such material anything but very precarious. But, secondly, even if there were much more certainty than there is as to the Synoptic material which is really secondary in character, it would be of little use for our purpose, seeing that the criterion by which it is distinguished is precisely its harmony with the views of a later period; and on that account it cannot be expected to yield any new and positive information as to the opinion held in the period to which ex hypothesi it belongs.

(2) The Epistles of St. Paul.—These provide at least valuable confirmation of what may be otherwise ascertained as to the opinion held by the primitive community, partly through direct statement by the Apostle as to what was the gospel he had 'received,' and partly through inference which may be made from his own views, as to that out of which they had developed. But beyond this we cannot go. The Epistle of James, even if its date be early, would add nothing to our knowledge of the primitive Christology. The First Epistle of Peter, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Apocalypse all represent a stage in some degree in advance of the common basis from which they started; and the Johannine Gospel and Epistles embody the results of still longer experience and deeper analysis.

(3) The Acts of the Apostles.—There remains, as the chief source of material for constructing the pre-Pauline Christology, the Book of Acts, more especially the first eleven chapters. Not many years ago it would have been difficult to justify at the bar of scholarly opinion the use of this document as a trustworthy source. No book was so seriously discredited as a historical source by the representatives of the 'Tubingen theory.' Now, however, that the governing historical principle of that theory has been shown to be untenable, and the conclusions based upon it have been either abandoned or seriously modified, the way has been opened for a reconsideration of the Acts as to both its date and its historical value. In the opinion of most competent scholars, the authorship may now be restored to St. Luke and the date placed within the first century, some assigning it to the nineties, some to the eighties. Quite recently a strong case has been made out by Harnack for the still older view that it was written in the sixties before the death of St. Paul.

But what is more important for our purpose than the possible revision of the date is the abandonment of the charge of history-making for party (or eirenical) purposes, and the recognition that St. Luke was not simply an echo of St. Paul (see Julicher, Introd. to NT, Eng. tr., 1904, p. 437; J. Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 301). In particular there is an increasing disposition to acknowledge that in the speeches of the earlier chapters we have the thought of the primitive community preserved and reproduced with singular fidelity. The admission of Schmiedel in his art. on the Acts (EBi i. 48) is significant:

'A representation of Jesus so simple, and in such exact agreement with the impression left by the most genuine passages of the first three gospels, is nowhere else to be found in the whole NT. It is hardly possible not to believe that this Christology of the speeches of Peter must have come from a primitive source.'

In the Acts of the Apostles most of the material is contained in the five speeches of Peter and the speech of Stephen, those of Peter being (a) on the day of Pentecost (2<sup>14ff.</sup>); (b) in Solomon's portico (3<sup>1-ff.</sup>); (c) the first before the Sanhedrin (4<sup>8ff.</sup>); (d) the second before the Sanhedrin (5<sup>29ff.</sup>); and (e) the short speech at Joppa (10<sup>34ff.</sup>). When we proceed to collect and classify the relevant statements in this part of the Acts, we find that they point to the following conclusions. (i.) The Christians of the early days identified Jesus with the Messiah. (ii.) They appealed for confirmation of this conviction to the fact that God had 'raised him from the dead'; and also that He had been 'exalted' by, and to, the right hand of God, the Resurrection and Exaltation marking a decisive moment in the Messiahship. (iii.) At the same time they referred back behind the Resurrection to facts and characteristics of His earthly ministry. (iv.) In spite of the dignity and authority to which they believed Him raised, they consistently referred to Him in terms of humanity, as to one who had been, while upon earth, a man among men. (v.) They promptly began to attach to Him certain OT titles and types, some of which had already been recognized as Messianic, others possibly not; e.g. 'Son of Man,' 'Servant of God,' 'Leader of Salvation,' 'Saviour,' 'Judge,' and 'Lord.' (vi.) They connected the death of Jesus, on the one hand, very definitely with the determined purpose of God; and, on the other, with the blotting out of sin. And for these reasons this Jesus was the subject of the 'good news' (5<sup>42</sup>), the object of faith (9<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>), and the cause of faith in men (3<sup>16</sup>).

(i.) The first point hardly requires to be illustrated. Not only the speeches but the narrative as a whole bear witness to the fact that the 'disciples,' to use St. Luke's word, identified Jesus who had died but risen again with the Messiah of Jewish expectation. This was indeed the one point which at the outset distinguished them from the other Jews in Jerusalem. Other grounds of distinction, ultimately leading to separation, were doubtless latent in their minds—recollections of the Master's teaching, of His attitude to the Law and the ritual of the Temple. But in the meantime 'the disciples' are found haunting the Temple and observing the formal hours of prayer; St. Peter proudly claims that no unclean or forbidden food has passed his lips (10<sup>14</sup>), and, thirty years later, St. James can assure St. Paul that all the thousands of Jewish Christians in Jerusalem are 'zealous of the law' (21<sup>20</sup>). But with an enthusiasm which no scorn could quench, a determination which neither threats nor imprisonment could weaken, they proclaimed to high and low their conviction that the Jesus they had known was the Messiah. It is one of the water-marks of the primitive character of St. Luke's narrative that he everywhere shows his consciousness that this is the meaning of χριστός. He never employs it as a proper name. His name for our Saviour is either 'Jesus' or 'the Lord'; and χριστός when it stands alone always means 'Messiah.' This is specially significant in passages where 'Christ' and 'Jesus' occur together, in apposition; e.g. 3<sup>0</sup>, 'that he may send the Messiah who has been before appointed—Jesus'; 5<sup>42</sup> 17<sup>8</sup> 18<sup>5</sup> 18<sup>8</sup>, 'showing by the scriptures that Jesus was the Messiah.' The completeness with which this fact is attested must not blind us, however, to two uncertainties, which immediately arise. The first may be stated thus: What did the disciples understand by the Messiah? What character, rôle, or function did they assign to Him? And the second thus: At what point did they understand Him to have entered on His Messiahship? They identified Jesus with the Messiah of Jewish expectation; but did that mean that He had been (and was still, and was to return as) Messiah, or that the Messiahship was a dignity conferred on Him after death and at the Resurrection? The answer to these questions follows on the examination of the other elements in the primitive conviction.

(ii.) That conviction rested upon, and appealed to, the Resurrection as the conclusive proof of the Messiahship of Jesus. But the Resurrection was uniformly connected with the Exaltation to the right hand of God, or with its equivalent—the participation of Jesus in the Divine 'glory.' In each of St. Peter's recorded speeches these two factors are significantly combined (2<sup>32</sup> 33 3<sup>13</sup> 7<sup>55</sup> 10<sup>40</sup> 42). The Resurrection is thus regarded as the externally visible side of a great transaction which has its true significance in the Exaltation of Jesus to Messianic rank and honour in heaven; it was a public declaration of His station; the man whom they had seen crucified now occupied the place of dignity and authority which prophecy and apocalyptic had assigned to the Messiah. God had now 'made him both Lord and Christ' (2<sup>36</sup>). The word 'Lord' (κύριος), like 'Christ,' is probably used as an official title; but in any case the phrase witnesses to the belief that the Resurrection and Exaltation had marked a decisive moment in the Messiahship of Jesus.

(iii.) At the same time, St. Peter is careful to emphasize on more than one occasion the ministry which had preceded the Crucifixion and Resurrection. He marks the limits of that ministry (12<sup>1-22</sup>) in accordance with those set by the Gospels. In his first speech (2<sup>-ff.</sup>) he describes its character—'Jesus the Nazarean (cf. 3<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>8</sup> 24<sup>5</sup> and 26<sup>9</sup>), a man approved of God unto you by mighty works and signs and wonders, which God did by him in the midst of you, even as ye yourselves know.' And specially in the address preceding the baptism of Cornelius (10<sup>36ff.</sup>), St. Peter, having begun with words which make echoes of Messianic passages in Isaiah (52<sup>7</sup>; cf. Nah 1<sup>15</sup>), proceeds to remind his hearers of something already familiar to them—the ministry of 'Jesus the one from Nazareth,' which began from Galilee after the baptism proclaimed by John. Him God had anointed with the Holy Spirit, and He had gone about doing deeds of kindness and healing all who were tyrannized by the devil. Of all that He had done also in Judæa and Jerusalem (as well as of the Resurrection) St. Peter and his comrades were appointed to bear witness. The only epithets applied to Jesus which might throw light on the impression He had made are 'holy' and 'righteous' (3<sup>14</sup> 4<sup>27</sup> [cf. 4<sup>30</sup>] 7<sup>5-</sup> [cf. 22<sup>14</sup>]). The ascription of the characteristic 'righteous' is probably due to a reminiscence of a description already traditional for the Messiah (cf. En. 38<sup>2</sup> 46<sup>3</sup> 53<sup>8</sup>), and the collocation of 'holy' and 'servant' may have a similar origin; but in 3<sup>14</sup>, where both epithets are applied to the historical Jesus, the contrast drawn in the following paragraph with the 'murderer' for whom the Jews had asked suggests that the words at the same time connote the consciousness that they fitly describe the character of Jesus.

(iv.) This Jesus, whether He be referred to in the days of His flesh or in His present Exaltation at the right hand of God, is consistently represented in terms of humanity. It cannot be said that any special stress is laid on His human nature. The time had not yet come when it was necessary to emphasize His true manhood over against Docetic or Gnostic tendencies. If some slight emphasis is to be detected, it is due rather to wonder that One to whom so much honour is assigned, through whom so much is expected, was One with whom the disciples had been on familiar terms. This is suggested by the frequency with which the simple name 'Jesus' is used (three times as often as the title 'Christ'), by the reiterated designation 'Jesus the Nazarean,' and by the emphatic demonstration which occurs more than once—'This Jesus did God raise up' (2<sup>32</sup>; cf. 2<sup>36</sup>). It is 'Jesus' whom Stephen sees standing at the right hand of God (7<sup>55</sup>), and 'Jesus' who speaks to Saul from heaven. It was in the fact that St. Peter and St. John had been companions of 'Jesus' that the members of the Sanhedrin found some explanation of their boldness and powers of speech (4<sup>13</sup>). It was in the name of 'Jesus' that they taught (4<sup>18</sup>), and in the same name that they wrought miracles. The miracles of Jesus Himself were not ascribed to His independent initiative; they were wonders which 'God did by him' (2<sup>22</sup>); and the explanation of His power which is given elsewhere (10<sup>38</sup>) is that God had anointed Him with the Holy Ghost, and that God 'was with him' (10<sup>38</sup>). For God had 'raised him up' in the sense in which He 'raised up' prophets of old, and 'sent him to bless' His people in turning away every one of them from their iniquities (3-6). In all this we see the tokens of a very early form of Christology; one, moreover, which would be very difficult to account for either as the invention or as the recollection of a later generation.

(v.) But this is not a complete account of the Christological phenomena of these chapters. There are numerous indications that from the very outset the minds of some at least of the disciples were at work on the material provided for them by (a) their recollection of what Jesus had been, said, and done; (b) the facts of His Crucifixion and Resurrection; and (c) the promises and predictions of the OT, together possibly with some of the language of the apocalypses. The result of this reflexion is seen in the ascription to Jesus as Messiah of certain important titles and functions which indicate more precisely the relation in which He stands towards God or the function He discharges towards men. In his speech on the day of Pentecost St. Peter was ready with a quotation from Ps 16, and an exegetical interpretation of it which was sufficiently in accord with contemporary methods of exegesis to commend it to his hearers. Not long after, we find him making the definite general statement that God had fulfilled the things which He foreshowed 'by the mouth of all his prophets that his Christ should suffer' (3<sup>18</sup>; cf. also 3<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>43</sup>). We are justified, therefore, in looking to the writings of the prophets for the sources of phrases and ideas now connected with Jesus as the risen Messiah.

(a) The Servant of God.—That is undoubtedly the source of the striking description, τὸν παῖδα αὐτοῦ (sc. Θεοῦ), which occurs twice in St. Peter's second speech (3<sup>12</sup>, 6) and twice (τὸν ἀγιον παῖδά σου) in the prayer of thanksgiving (4-7<sup>30</sup>). The rendering familiar to English ears through the AV translates παῖδα by 'Son' in the first two passages, by 'child' in the last two. But according to the view now generally held it is the alternative meaning of παῖς which is here intended, viz. 'servant'; and we have in the phrase a deliberate echo of the language of Deutero-Isaiah concerning the 'Servant of the Lord.' Such a usage, in the first place, is a further indication of the primitive character of St. Luke's material. It is found elsewhere only in Clement, the Didache, and the Martyrdom of Polycarp. It is an early Messianic title for our Lord which is not repeated in the later books of the NT (see further A. Harnack, Date of Acts and Synoptic Gospels, Eng. tr., 1911, p. 106; History of Dogma, Eng. tr., i. [1894] 185, note 4).

Further, the application of this title to Jesus is very significant, whether it is traced to independent reflexion on the part of the apostles, or whether it be due to appreciation on their part of the same factor in the consciousness and in the utterances of Jesus. Its effect was to link on to the traditional conception of the Messiah a series of ideas of quite a different character, including humility, submission, vicarious suffering and death. The importance of this identification is illustrated by the exposition of Is 53<sup>7</sup> given by Philip to the Ethiopian eunuch (8<sup>35</sup> 'beginning from this scripture he preached unto him Jesus'); and the same interpretation probably underlies St. Paul's statement, 'Christ . . . died for our sins according to the scriptures.'

(β) Prince and Saviour.—The same OT context is probably the source of another striking designation, ἀρχηγὸν καὶ σωτήρα. 'Him did God exalt unto his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour' (5<sup>31</sup>; cf. 3<sup>15</sup> 'ye slew the Prince of life'; and He 2<sup>10</sup> 'the author [prince, or captain] of their salvation'; also 12<sup>2</sup> 'author and finisher' [Westcott, 'leader and consummator']). The variety in the renderings reflects an ambiguity in the word ἀρχηγός. It describes one who both inaugurates and controls; and the ἀρχηγός τῆς ζωῆς at once inaugurates and controls the Messianic experience of salvation here described as ζωή. There is thus a close parallelism between the two phrases 'Prince of life' and 'Prince and Saviour'; and when they are taken together, and weighed with the context in which the first is found, their connexion with the language of Isaiah becomes plain, e.g. Is 60<sup>16</sup> ἐγὼ Κύριος ὁ σωζων σε, and 55<sup>4</sup> ἰδοὺ μαρτυριον ἐν ἔθνεσιν ἔδωκα αὐτὸν, ἀρχοντα καὶ προστάσσοντα τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. The 'sufferings of the Christ' had been foretold 'by the mouth of all the prophets'; and the same prophecies, to the study of which the apostles had been led by His death, supplied forms for the expression of their faith in Him.

(γ) Son of Man.—This title for Jesus occurs once only—in the account of the martyrdom of Stephen (7<sup>55</sup>). Stephen 'looked up stedfastly to heaven and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God; and he said, Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing at the right hand of God.' Two things are clear: the name 'Jesus' and the title 'Son of Man' are already felt to be interchangeable, and the title belongs to Jesus as the Messiah. There is no other instance of the phrase in the NT outside the Gospels, Rev 1<sup>13</sup> being no exception. It provides, as Bartlett says (ad loc.), 'a water-mark of the originality of this utterance,' and even the most cautious critics admit that this speech of Stephen reached St. Luke from a very early source. These two facts—the early date to which the phrase must be assigned and its uniqueness outside the Gospels—point to its being a reminiscence of what is attested by the Gospels—our Lord's custom of describing Himself by this title, and describing Himself with a veiled allusion to His Messiahship. But even if the primitive community was itself responsible for this identification, and did not take it over from our Lord Himself, that would not diminish the significance of the phrase for the primitive Christology. 'This identification of the historical Jesus with the "Son of Man" of Daniel and Enoch is very significant, because directly it is accomplished, the further thought can no longer be resisted, that Jesus of Nazareth is not simply a man, who in the future is to be exalted to heavenly glory, but an original heavenly being, who came down to accomplish this work of his on earth' (J. Weiss, Christ, Eng. tr., 1911, p. 59 f.). The community, for which this was a just and intelligible description of Jesus, was preparing and prepared for any interpretation of His being which is contained in the NT.

(δ) The phrase Son of God is also used, but only once—in 9<sup>30</sup>. St. Paul 'preached Jesus, that he is the Son of God.' But the title is used in its Messianic and official sense, founded on Ps 27 (cf. Mt 16<sup>16</sup>, Jn 14<sup>9</sup>); and the sentence implies no more than the closing words of v. 2—'proving that this is the Christ.' A later generation failed to recognize this, and the consequence is seen in the TR of 9<sup>30</sup>, where 'Christ' has been substituted for 'Jesus'—a useful illustration of the way in which the copyists felt the lack of the word 'Christ' as a name, and therefore introduced or substituted it (some nine times in all in Acts).

(ε) The Lord.—Χριστός, παῖς θεοῦ, ἀρχηγός τῆς σωτηρίας, ἀρχηγός καὶ σωτὴρ, υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου—these are elements out of which a rich Christology might rapidly develop. And there is still one to add, which is probably the most pregnant of all—the title ὁ Κύριος. The Synoptic Gospels witness to the habit of addressing the Master, or speaking of Him, as ὁ Κύριος; and there it is simply an expression of profound respect. As such the word was also in common use among the Hellenists of the Empire, applied alike to gods and to Emperors. St. Paul shows himself conscious of this when he says (1 Co 8<sup>5</sup>) that there are in fact many 'gods and lords so-called.' But when he asserts the claim of Jesus to the title in a unique sense, he is only doing what the infant Church had done before him. 'Indubitably therefore let the whole house of Israel know that God has made him Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified' (Ac 2<sup>36</sup>). 'He is Lord of all' (10<sup>36</sup>). This became in fact the chosen and prevailing appellation of Jesus Christ, especially among the Gentile Christians, where the historical significance of 'Christ' was unfamiliar. But how far the usage was from originating in Gentile circles we learn from its familiarity there in the Aramaic form of 'Maran atha,' i.e. 'Our Lord comes' or 'Our Lord, come.' That St. Paul could count on this being understood by the Christians at Corinth betokens antecedent and wide-spread usage of the formula in Palestinian circles.

The special and unique significance of the title as now applied to Christ arises out of its use in the LXX as the usual euphemistic equivalent of 'Jahweh.' For those familiar with the OT in the Greek version, ὁ Κύριος was a synonym for God; the outstanding fact in connexion with the Christology of the Acts and Epistles is that the same word has become the common, the preponderating designation of Jesus Christ. And the connotation which is involved in its application to Him is the same. This follows from the transference to Christ not merely of the title but also of phrases from the OT, the original reference of which was to Jahweh. When the believers on Christ are described as οἱ ἐπικαλούμενοι τὸ ὄνομα τοῦτο, 'those who call upon this name,' sc. the name of Jesus our Lord (9-1; cf. 9<sup>14</sup> 2-1 22<sup>16</sup> and Ro 10<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>2</sup>), language is appropriated to Christ which in the OT had been used to describe the worshipper of the true God (cf. Gn 4-6 12<sup>3</sup>, 2 K 5<sup>11</sup>). Stephen dies 'calling upon (the Lord) and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit'; and Peter postulates universal dominion of the same Person—'He is Lord of all' (10<sup>36</sup>).

'There cannot be the least doubt,' says J. Weiss (Christ, p. 46 f.), 'that the name has now a religious significance. To make clear the religious import of the use of the name "Lord" by the early Christians, one would have to cite the whole of the NT. For in the expression "Our Lord Jesus Christ" the whole primitive Christian religion is contained in germ. Dutiful obeisance, reverence, and sacred fear lest he should be offended, the feeling of complete dependence in all things, thankfulness and love and trust—in short, everything that a man can feel towards God, comes in this name to utterance. . . . That which is expected from God, the Lord can also impart.'

Corresponding with these significant titles there are certain functions ascribed to the risen Christ, which throw valuable light on the conception of Him which prevailed in the primitive community. He is represented (α) as One whom it is natural to approach in prayer, (δ) as One who can forgive and save, and (c) as One who is destined to be the Judge of quick and dead.

(α) The practice of addressing prayer to Christ is established in the case of St. Paul (see below), and his references to the practice give no ground for the supposition that it was a novelty which originated with him. Rather do they suggest a practice which was already familiar, and requiring no defence, and so serve to confirm the evidence of the Acts to the effect that from the beginning the disciples addressed the Risen Lord in prayer. It is in this sense that the Christians in Damascus are described by Ananias as 'those who call upon thy name' (9<sup>14</sup>), with this significance that the dying Stephen cries, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit,' and 'Lord, lay not this sin to their charge,' and it is at least possible that the same idea underlies St. Peter's quotation from Joel (Ac 2-1), for the speech to which it is prefixed leads up to the conclusion that Jesus has been made Lord and Christ (see Zahn, Die Anbetung Jesu<sup>3</sup>, 1910).

(β) The words of Stephen are addressed to One who has the power to forgive; and the title of 'Saviour' is no empty form. That 'salvation,' which, whatever be the precise contents of the term, always stands for the highest good, can be obtained through Him, and through no other. In 4<sup>12</sup> ('there is no other name,' etc.) St. Peter is probably contemplating Jews only, and salvation as conceived by them, i.e. as the Messianic deliverance of the future. This Jesus, who is the Christ, is to return, after 'seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord' at 'the time of the restoration of all things' (3-1). That return will prove the culminating and final fulfilment of predictions made by Moses and the prophets who followed him, concerning both the glories and the judgment of the Messianic times.

For, (c) when He comes, Christ will fulfil the function for which He has been destined by God; He will act as Judge of quick and dead (10<sup>42</sup>).

These last are the only references in the early chapters of Acts to the Parousia of Christ and its attendant circumstances. We have to observe therefore the sobriety and the reticence of the expectation, especially when compared with the exuberance of earlier and contemporary writing on the subject. There is no reference to the restoration of the Kingdom to Israel, or to the humiliation and destruction of Israel's foes—features of the future which were part of the common form of Messianic expectation. In fact, the tone of these speeches is strangely different from what we should have expected from a Jew speaking under the conviction that the Messiah had been manifested in Jesus, and would shortly return to fulfil the Divine programme. We miss even the eschatological scenery connected with the Return, with which the apocalyptic sections of the Synoptic Gospels have made us familiar, and also that emphasis on the imminence of the Return which appears in the early Epistles of St. Paul. And yet, in the announcement that Christ comes to judge the quick and the dead, St. Peter ascribes to Him a function which sets Him on the plane of God (see Scheel in RGG i. 1743, foot). The exalted Jesus, despite the clearness with which He is defined as a man, is yet One to whom men pray, One who exercises the Divine functions of forgiving, saving, and judging. And 'what is honoured in worship stands wholly and without qualification on the side of God' (Bousset, Kyrios Christos, p. 185).

(vi.) Further light is shed upon the conception of Christ held by the primitive community by the significance assigned to His death. It is true that the references to this subject are unexpectedly few, brief, and general. The early chapters of Acts present a very exact reproduction of the natural situation in which the death of Jesus was a fact known to all, one which called for explanation, and, in the absence of explanation, was without religious value; but one for which an explanation was emerging under the guidance partly of the OT, partly of reminiscences of the Master's teaching, and partly of the spiritual experience of the disciples. The following points are to be noted.

(a) The death of Jesus was very definitely referred to 'the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God' (2<sup>3</sup>). Herod and Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles and the Jews as a people had only carried out what had been ordained to happen by the hand and will of God (4-8). In this there is nothing that goes beyond the Jewish doctrine of the Divine foreknowledge; but the statement of it involved a problem which was calling for solution. To what end had God ordained the death of the Messiah?

(β) This death, though the fact had hitherto been ignored, had actually been predicted by the prophets of the OT. 'Those things which God before showed by the mouth of all the prophets that his Christ should suffer, did he thus fulfil' (3<sup>18</sup>; cf. 10<sup>43</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>10</sup>, Lk 24<sup>25ff.</sup> 44st.). The repeated emphasis on 'all the prophets' (cf. 3<sup>24</sup>) is not to be explained as due merely to hyperbole. It arises from, and illustrates, the conviction that Christ was the goal and the fulfilment of the whole prophetic anticipation of redemption; though St. Peter might have found difficulty in quoting many prophetic words directly bearing on the death of Christ, the conviction he expresses is that that death must now be recognized as an essential element in the working out of the redemptive purpose.

(γ) The disciples commemorated the death of Jesus by a frequently repeated eucharistic meal in which they 'showed forth the Lord's death.' That this practice began so promptly after the birth of the community (2<sup>46</sup>) is a fact which must be due to recollection of the Last Supper, and so involves conscious remembrance of the significance which the Master had attached to the breaking of the bread, at least according to the shortest form in which the words are reported: 'This is my body which is on your behalf' (1 Co 11<sup>-4</sup>). Behind that would lie recollections of other things He had said bearing upon His death which had been vague and cryptic at the time.

In these factors—the correlation of the death of Jesus with the whole redeeming purpose of God, the foreshadowing by prophecy of the vicarious value attaching to the death of the innocent servant of God, and the remembered attitude of Jesus towards His own death—we have the conditions for a rapid evolution of a doctrine of reconciliation through the Cross. The doctrine itself is not here; but distinct approximation to it can be traced in the collocation of Jesus as suffering Messiah with an appeal for 'repentance unto remission of sins' (3<sup>18.19</sup>). In 2<sup>38</sup> when the people have heard the declaration that God has made Jesus Lord and Christ, and ask, 'What are we to do?' the answer is 'Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ unto remission of your sins.' There is a superficial similarity to the summons issued by John the Baptist, but a fundamental distinction in that the ground of the apostolic appeal is the fact of Christ, a fact as yet unanalyzed; and the baptism is to be 'in the name of Jesus Christ,' i.e. it involves and symbolizes the confession of Jesus as the Christ, and heart-felt submission to His Personality. In 5<sup>31</sup> ('Him did God exalt to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance and remission of sins'), if, as is probable, 'God' is to be understood as the subject of the infinitive clause (cf. 11<sup>8</sup> and Ro 2<sup>4</sup>), the Exaltation and indirectly the death have remission of sins in part for their object and result.

More cannot be said. The nature of the connexion between the death of Jesus and the Divine plan remains obscure. To explain it was the work of a longer Christian experience, a deeper comprehension of sin, and a higher conception of the ethical demands of God. But when the explanation came, it was an unfolding of the primitive conviction that there was a profound connexion between the death of Jesus and the removal of sin. On this point, as on others, investigation of the primitive consciousness entirely confirms, as it is confirmed by, St. Paul's statement of the gospel as it had been communicated to him, that 'Christ . . . died for our sins according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15<sup>3</sup>).

(δ) The summary of the 'gospel' here given by St. Paul, while it is notably lacking in certain elements which are commonly supposed to be essential to Paulinism, corresponds very closely with the impression concerning the missionary preaching which is made by the later chapters of Acts. It is of course maintained by many scholars, and by some regarded as axiomatic, that the similarity between the speeches of St. Peter and those of St. Paul is due to the fact that they were all the work of one man, neither St. Peter nor St. Paul, but either an unknown writer in the second cent. or St. Luke working up old material at the end of the first. The alleged similarity calls for careful examination. The result will probably be the recognition that it arises from an inward harmony between the two apostles as to the essentials of their message, and especially as to their conception of Christ, combined with a diversity of tone and emphasis which is specially marked when the speeches of St. Paul are compared with one another, and extends to his speeches as a whole when compared with St. Peter's. And whatever explanation be given of the composition of the speeches of St. Paul, the primitive character of the Christology they present remains a fact, and one which is more easily accounted for if they reproduce the essentials of the Apostle's mission preaching, than if we have to suppose St. Luke, with the knowledge of St. Paul's later preaching which he must have possessed, deliberately excluding what was characteristically Pauline. The discrepancy between the Christology reflected in St. Paul's speeches in Acts and that of his Epistles may actually be reflective of the true facts of the case.

In regard to their Christology the speeches of St. Paul witness to practically the same elements as those of St. Peter, and to no other, or at most to one. Just as in the speech of Stephen, and (less conspicuously but not less really) in the speeches of St. Peter, so in the speech of St. Paul at Pisidian Antioch, Jesus of Nazareth is set forth as the goal of Israel's history and the crowning fulfilment of Jewish prophecy. The good news of the gospel which its messengers proclaim is the promise to the fathers now fulfilled (Ac 13<sup>32</sup>; cf. 26<sup>6</sup>, Ro 15<sup>8</sup>). From Thessalonica we have a specimen of St. Paul's missionary preaching, according to which for three Sabbath days or 'weeks' (RVm) he reasoned with the Jews 'from the scriptures,' to the effect that the Christ 'was bound to suffer,' and the same appeal to Scripture is repeated in Ac 26<sup>22</sup> 28<sup>23</sup>; cf. 13<sup>7</sup>. The object of the appeal is to show both that this is the Messiah, and that His death is part of the redemptive process. He refers to Christ in the same striking way as ὁ δίκαιος (22<sup>14</sup>; cf. 7<sup>52</sup>), and describes Him as the One appointed by God to judge the world (17<sup>31</sup>). St. Paul further presents Christ as an object of faith (22<sup>19</sup>; cf. 9<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>17</sup>, and possibly 3<sup>16</sup>), and claims that the consistent burden of his preaching has been 'repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (20<sup>21</sup>; cf. 26<sup>0</sup>). In 13<sup>38</sup> he declares 'through this man is proclaimed unto you remission of sins.' If in the following verse ('and from all the things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses, by him is justified every one that believeth') St. Paul seems to cross the line into 'Paulinism,' he does not go very far. 'Justified' has the same significance here as it has in the Parable of the Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18<sup>14</sup>); and ἐν τούτῳ δικαιούνται involves the same conception as the words of St. Peter in 15<sup>11</sup> διὰ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ πιστεύομεν σωθῆναι, or in 4<sup>12</sup> οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ἄλλῳ οὐδενὶ ἢ σωτηρία. There is one phrase, however, in which St. Paul, as reported in the Acts, states in dogmatic form a conviction to which we find no verbal parallel in the speeches of St. Peter. In 20<sup>28</sup> he refers τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ ἣν περιποιήσατο διὰ τοῦ αἱματος τοῦ ἰδίου. (The probability is strong that υἱοῦ has been accidentally omitted from the text at a very early stage; or otherwise ἰδίου must be construed as a substantive = ἀγαπητοῦ.) Here we have undoubtedly a seed-thought of much that we recognize as specifically Pauline. But it is still in the form of a seed. Ps 74<sup>2</sup> in the LXX runs μνησθήρι τῆς συναγωγῆς σου ἧς ἐκτίσω ἀπ' ἀρχῆς | ἐλυτρώσω ῥάβδον τῆς κληρονομίας σου. St. Paul, echoing the thought rather than quoting the words, takes the two words ἐκτίσω and ἐλυτρώσω, combines them, then breaks up the compound into two new elements—purchase and price; and, guided further by such phrases as 'I have given Egypt for thy λύτρον' (Is 43<sup>3</sup>), 'He smote all the first-born of Egypt' (Ps 78<sup>51</sup>), he sets the fact that 'Christ died for our sins' in this pregnant form: that the new holy community like the old one has been redeemed at the cost of blood, the blood of God's own beloved Son.

2. Primitive conception of Christ.—(1) Jesus as the Messiah.—We have now examined the material available for answering the question with which we started—What significance did the primitive community attach to the Messiahship of Jesus, and what led them to recognize Him as Messiah and as a Messiah with this significance? It would not further our inquiry to enter on an examination of antecedent or contemporary Jewish conceptions of the Messiah and the functions He was to discharge. These conceptions were at once so various and so fluid, and the extent to which any one of them prevailed at any particular time is so difficult to estimate, that even when we know all there is to know on the subject, we have only a bewildering variety of possibilities. We must and can find what we want within the NT. We begin by marking the two extremes between which the conception of the Messiah moved. The one is presented quite clearly at the opening of Acts, before the experience of Pentecost. The disciples put the question to the Risen Christ: 'Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?' (1<sup>6</sup>)—a question reflecting the same conception as the words of the disciples on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>21</sup>), viz. that of a Messiah whose function was primarily and mainly the political enfranchisement of the nation. The other extreme is found in such a saying as 'Christ also suffered for sins once . . . that he might bring us unto God' (1 P 3<sup>18</sup>), or in 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup> 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.'

The way to test any conception of the Messiah is to observe from what He is expected to deliver—from the tyranny of the earthly oppressor or from the tyranny of moral and spiritual evil. Now, when we apply this test to the conception which lies behind the language of the primitive community, we find that, while it has very definitely moved away from the political, it has not yet reached a developed consciousness of the ethical deliverance. We find the reiterated and triumphant assertion that Jesus is the Messiah, but no trace subsequent to Pentecost of any idea that He is to restore the kingdom to Israel. On the other hand, the record of the early days furnishes no clear exposition of the character of the deliverance He brings. We learn that in no other than Christ is σωτηρία; but the nature of the σωτηρία remains undefined. This is true in spite of allusions to 'remission of sins' in connexion with this manifestation of His death. According to contemporary Jewish thought, 'remission' or 'blotting out' of sin was a condition antecedent to, not part of, the Messianic salvation. There is, therefore, something really new in the presentation of the Christian Messiah as instrumental in the remission of sins. It was to antedate His traditional activity. 'Unto you first,' says St. Peter (3<sup>6</sup>), 'God, having raised up his Servant, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from your iniquities.' That had been a function of Jesus in the days of His flesh; and the saying indirectly testifies to one of the felt consequences of His fellowship. But now, says St. Peter, 'repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost' (2<sup>38</sup>). So in 10<sup>43</sup> ('Through his name every one that believeth on him shall receive remission of sins') the declaration is followed, and so confirmed, by the bestowal of the Holy Ghost. This gift of the Holy Spirit is recognized as the first-fruits of the Messianic salvation and a pledge of its ultimate completion. The condition of receiving it is the remission of sins; and that follows on 'believing on him,' or, what is synonymous, 'repenting and being baptized in the name of Jesus Christ,' which again signifies the solemn confession of belief in Jesus as the Christ. Christ is not described as the One who bestows forgiveness (though the prayer of Stephen shows the near emergence of the idea) or as One for whose sake forgiveness is bestowed; but He is set in such relation to forgiveness that all is ready for the next step. When His disciples begin to have a deeper conception of sin, and to emphasize the idea of salvation as deliverance from it, a profounder explanation of the Messiah's relation to sin and its removal will be demanded. Meanwhile, the conception of His function is plainly transitional, cut loose from the Judaic but only approximating to the Pauline.

The burden of the testimony borne by the primitive community was to the effect that Jesus is the Christ; He is also to return as the Christ; had He been the Christ while yet on earth? No conclusion to the contrary can be drawn from Ac 2<sup>38</sup>, seeing that there is no indication of the point of time at which the 'making' took place; and even though it appears most natural to connect it with the Resurrection (cf. Ro 1<sup>4</sup>), the 'making' probably implies the further recognition and promulgation of a status rather than the bestowal of it. On the other hand, there are not wanting indications which seem to carry back the Messianic status into the earthly ministry. He had been 'raised up' by God (3<sup>6</sup>; cf. 7<sup>37</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>) as it had been predicted by Moses that God would raise up 'a prophet' (3<sup>2</sup>). He had been sent by God as one blessing His people, and by God 'anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power' (10<sup>38</sup>). This last expression probably means 'appointed as Messiah,' the occasion referred to being the Baptism of Jesus. 'Since Is 11<sup>2</sup> the conception of the Messiah in Jewish theology had been indissolubly linked with that of the Spirit. The Messiah is the bearer of the Spirit' (Bruckner, in RGG ii. 1208), so that the anointing with the Spirit is equivalent to installation as Messiah.

(2) The Resurrection and the Messiahship.—To what was the conviction that Jesus was the Messiah due? It is sometimes easily assumed that it was produced by the Resurrection. But taken by itself the Resurrection was not sufficient to create belief that Jesus was the Messiah. It is not as if there had been any antecedent expectation that the Messiah would rise from the dead; such an expectation was indeed excluded by the absence of any idea that death was an element in the Messiah's experience. There is no reason to suppose that when St. Peter appealed to the verses in Ps 16, he was guided in the interpretation he gave of v. 10 by any tradition concerning the Messiah. Nor was there in the fact of resurrection itself any demonstration that such a rank belonged to the subject of it. It had been reported concerning John the Baptist that he was risen from the dead (Mk 6<sup>14</sup>), but the only inference drawn was that 'therefore do these powers work in him.'

The Resurrection did not create faith in Jesus as Messiah; it revived it. He had died as One who claimed to be, and by some was believed to be, the Christ. 'We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel' (Lk 24<sup>1</sup>); and the effect of the Resurrection was to vindicate this claim made by Jesus and for Him on behalf of His followers.

The form and contents of that belief began to undergo a rapid change, as we have seen; but beyond this, the disciples are found taking up a religious attitude to the Risen Master which is not accounted for by their belief that He was the Messiah. They behold Him as set by the right hand of God; and the vision is the ideal expression of the devotion, allegiance, and hope which move in their hearts towards Christ. To what again is this profoundly significant attitude due—for which there is no sufficient explanation in traditional ideas of the Messiah? The explanation may be sought in two directions.

(3) The historic Jesus.—The attitude is due, firstly, to the impression made on the disciples by the historic Jesus. He had never attempted to demonstrate the claim which He made. But they had tacitly admitted its validity. He had claimed to stand in a universal and at the same time unique relation to men; He had postulated that their attitude to Himself was the determining factor in life both present and future. He had demanded for Himself and for His cause an allegiance which outweighed the claims of any other relationship. And He made known to them in Himself such a character, such a personality, that these claims, stupendous as they were, seemed reasonable, and were, indeed, admitted and acted upon—'Lord, we have left all and followed thee.' And the very failure on the part of these same men to grasp the inmost significance of His message and His life enhances their witness to the moral pressure they experienced, leading them to submit even where they imperfectly understood. When St. Peter made what is called the great confession, 'Thou art the Christ,' he was doubtless seeking to crytallize the total impression into a categorical form. But the form itself was not adequate. To acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah was to assign to Him the highest rank and dignity within the intellectual range of the apostles. But the motives which led to the confession, the attitude and personal relation which lay behind it, found only incomplete expression in the recognition of Him as the Messiah. Jesus had done what no one had ever conceived of the Messiah doing. He had touched the inner springs of their life. He had deepened indefinitely their apprehension of essential things, the joy of life as lived by those who have a Father in God, the sorrow that springs from the fact of human alienation from that Father. According to the measure of their capacity He revealed to them the Father, and it was by leading them to know Himself. And so, for those who attached themselves to Him, Jesus became Messiah and more. And as the conviction that He was Messiah was revived by the Resurrection from the death-blow which it received through the Crucifixion, so the experience of 'the more' was also latent in the consciousness of the disciples, waiting to be quickened by a corresponding event, and developed by a future experience.

(4) Pentecost.—That event which corresponded to the Resurrection, and displays itself as the second moving cause of the attitude to Christ which we find taken up by the infant Church, was the experience of Pentecost, described as the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Fundamental as the Resurrection was, it did not stand alone as a basal fact on which the faith and life of the young Church were built; nor is it possible to explain what followed in the development of life or thought from the Resurrection by itself. That was succeeded after a short interval by Pentecost and the indowment with spiritual power of those who believed in Jesus as the glorified Messiah. To the fact of the Resurrection was added the experience of a Spirit-filled life; and quite apart from any questions as to the form in which this experience manifested itself, it is to this highly intensified and concentrated perception of God's activity in the lives and wills of those who submit themselves to Him in Jesus Christ, working on the complex of facts illuminated by the Resurrection, that the unfolding of systematic Christian thinking is due. As to the narrative of Pentecost itself, it was only natural, in view of the character of the phenomena, that tradition should seize on the externally marvellous and enhance it, to the obscuring of the really significant. And in particular the tradition as it reached St. Luke was so shaped either before him or by him that the central feature in the account (2<sup>6-11</sup>), the declaration by men of many different nationalities, 'we do hear them speaking in our tongues the mighty works of God,' differs from every other item of evidence as to the meaning of the glossolalia or 'speaking with tongues.' That this phenomenon, the speaking with 'new' or strange tongues, was a familiar one in the first generation of Christians, we know from St. Paul's Epistles; that the first manifestation of it is what St. Luke is describing we may be sure; but inasmuch as a marked characteristic of glossolalia in all other contexts is incomprehensibility and the necessity for interpretation, we may take it that on the first occasion also the phenomenon was that of ecstatic speech, not comprehended by the hearers except in the sense that, being infected by the like enthusiasm, they felt themselves in mental communication with the speakers, though they did not understand their words. The essential thing is that something occurred of a public and striking description which not only called for explanation, but justified St. Peter in seeing in the experience shared by him and so many others the fulfilment of Christ's words about 'the promise of the Father' (1<sup>4</sup>; cf. Lk 24<sup>49</sup>, Gal 3<sup>14</sup>).

The fulfilment of this promise became the second moment in the development of a deeper and richer Christology. On the one hand, it involved, and so revealed, a relation between God and 'His Christ' of a different quality from what had hitherto been recognized. That relation had been conceived as something due to positive choice, as external, official; and the Spirit was bestowed on Jesus as part of His Messianic equipment. The Christian experience of Christ sets up a process at the end of which we find St. Paul boldly identifying Christ and the Spirit, and the writer of the Fourth Gospel interpreting the parting words of Jesus in terms of that identification. And the effect of this identification on the Christology is to provide an explanation of the attitude of believers to the Risen Lord in their recognizing Him as united to God in a relation which was not official but inherent, not mediated in time but eternal and unchangeable. And once more the stage in this process which we find reflected in the Acts is the intermediate one. The glorified Messiah is no longer the subject of the Spirit's influence (as in the Synoptic Gospels), nor is He as yet identified with it; but he is the instrument and channel of the Spirit's bestowal. That bestowal is conditioned by faith in Him (2<sup>38</sup>), by obedience to Him (5<sup>22</sup>). On the other hand, the bestowal of the Spirit, which was afterwards recognized and described as 'the Spirit of unity and brotherly love,' involved and revealed a new relationship between all those who received the gift from Christ. That is the real meaning of Pentecost so far as it has been identified with the birth of the Church. We are told of the 3000 souls that were added to the infant community that they were steadfastly adhering to the teaching of the apostles, and to the fellowship (κοινωνία), the breaking of bread, and the prayer (2<sup>42</sup>). We have here a new word for a new thing, the new consciousness of sacred union connecting the believers, knitting them together in what St. Paul afterwards called the Body of Christ. Hort (Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 44) understands by κοινωνία here 'conduct expressive of and resulting from the strong sense of fellowship with the other members of the brotherhood.' Pentecost had for its most striking result the creation of the sense of brotherhood within a body of men and women whose common bond was not only a common allegiance to Christ, but common participation in His Spirit. No doubt the extreme form which the principle at first assumed—community of goods—proved unworkable, and was of temporary duration; but underlying it we see a whole series of new ethical ideals in operation—mutual service, mutual self-sacrifice, the merging of the individual in the corporate whole, 'love of the brethren' as a governing motive of the new life.

And with the consciousness of a new binding fellowship created by Christ, there came a new conscience. The new relations involved new responsibilities, the possibility of new offences, new sins. The earliest case of sin which is recorded within the new community was in fact sin against the community itself and the principle of brotherhood; and it was recognized and dealt with as sin against the Holy Ghost.

These ethical consequences of the bestowal of the Spirit which was traced to the action of the Risen Christ had far-reaching results not only in the life but in the thought of the Church. Participation in the Spirit was the privilege, as it was the mark, of every true Christian. The act of believing on Jesus, the surrender to Him which found symbolic expression in baptism, was followed by a great religious experience, the effect of which was manifold. Incorporated in a community which had died to earthly ambition, whether personal or national, and which was permeated with a holy enthusiasm towards Him who was felt to be the source of its life, and with genuine love to 'all the brethren,' the individual became conscious of a new 'life,' ethical and religious; and he saw in Jesus the Christ, the Founder and Pioneer of that life. Conscious that it was as moved by the proclamation of that Messiah crucified but risen that he, repenting and turning to God, had found peace of conscience, deliverance from fear of the wrath, he hailed in Christ a σωτήρ, and connected Him with the great experience of ἀφεσις των αμαρτιων. The connexions and implications of these experiences and convictions were still undeveloped. But the motive power and the material for the development were there. The influence of the Spirit realized from day to day alike in the individual and in the corporate life, and in the inter-action of the two, meant that not only were the disciples secure of salvation in the future; they had it now. The Kingdom was theirs in both senses. It belonged to them as an inheritance; it was already in their possession. They were on the way to St. Paul's great discovery, 'The kingdom of heaven consists in . . . righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>). And to Him, to whom they traced the bestowal of the best they had ever been led to hope for from God, and also the revelation and bestowal of gifts such as 'had not entered into the heart of man to conceive,' they lifted their hearts as hitherto they had done only to God Himself.

II. THE CHRISTOLOGY OF THE SUB-PRIMITIVE COMMUNITY.—The records, scanty though they are, thus provide sufficient evidence to show that most, if not all, of the chief elements in later Christology were already present, at least in germ, within the consciousness of the primitive community. From the year A.D. 50 or thereabouts we are able to trace the development of these elements in Epistles from various hands. But the lines of development are not continuous. Although there are doubtless lines of cross-connexion, e.g. between St. Paul and St. Peter, between St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is more in accordance with the historical situation to regard them as radiating from the common centre of primitive thought. Arranging these lines in the order of James, the Apocalypse, Peter, Paul, Hebrews, John, we find an increasing measure, not of divergence from the primitive type, but of originality and penetration in the analysis of the convictions which were common to them all. Some at least of these lines appear to be focused again in the Fourth Gospel, along with some which turn back independently to the original base.

A broad comparison between these various types of Christian thought which may be described as sub-primitive shows that the characteristic which distinguishes the Pauline from all the other types is not primarily a distinction in respect of doctrine in general or of Christology in particular. It is a distinction in the aspects of religious experience which are respectively emphasized. In neither case is the emphasis an exclusive one; that is to say, it must not be taken as excluding the aspect which is not emphasized. But, while for St. Paul the dominating interest in Christological reflexion lies in the explanation of, and preparation for, the ethical union between believers and their Lord, for St. Peter and the others Christological reflexion runs on more concrete lines, developing the thought of Christ as external to men, as Preacher of Righteousness, as Example, as Priest, as Authority. Ultimately the distinction depends upon the place assigned by St. Paul to the πνεῦμα and to the category of πνευματικός. This subtle but indubitable difference of atmosphere has to be steadily borne in mind. To it may be due not a few apparent divergences of expression, while on the other hand apparent correspondences of language may represent real distinction of thought.

1. The Epistle of James.—It is hardly possible to speak of the Christology of an Epistle in which the word Χριστός occurs only twice (1<sup>1</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>). But it is to be noted that in both places the writer gives the full title τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, that in 1<sup>1</sup> he presents himself as in the same sense δοῦλος of God and of Christ, and that in 2<sup>1</sup> he adds to the title the striking appellation τῆς δόξης (so Mayor, ad loc., following Bengel). To this there may be a parallel in 2 P 1<sup>1</sup> (cf. also Col 1<sup>7</sup>, Ro 9<sup>1</sup>, Jn 1<sup>14</sup>); and in view of the prevailingly Judaic tone of the Epistle there may be an allusion to Christ as the Shekinah (cf. 1 S 4-, Ps 78<sup>61</sup>). In 2<sup>7</sup> (βλασφημοῦσιν τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς) there is probably a reference to the name of Christ as used in baptism (cf. Ac 2<sup>38</sup>), and in 5<sup>14</sup>, whether τοῦ κυρίου should stand in the text or not, a reference to the same name as the secret of prevailing prayer. If we add 5<sup>8</sup>, 'The Parousia of the Lord is at hand,' and couple with it the phrase in the following verse, 'Behold, the Judge is at the door,' we have probably exhausted the references to Christ. But the fact that the writer in the same context and frequently elsewhere puts Κυριος=Θεός must be allowed due weight, and similarly it is to be noted how in 5<sup>8</sup> the 'Second Coming' is equated with the old object of expectation, the Kingdom of God.

The Christology which is suggested rather than defined in the Epistle is lacking in several of the details which appear even in that of the primitive community, most notably perhaps in all reference to the Holy Spirit; but it is wholly consistent with it, and the inadequacy of its expression is probably due rather to the character of the document than to any defect in the writer's views as compared with those, e.g., of St. Peter.

2. The Apocalypse of John.—It is best to consider the Apocalypse of John at this point, because its Christology also represents the Christology of the primitive community, not developed by intellectual analysis, or even through the interpretation of Christian experience, but expanded through the emotional magnification of the heavenly Christ. In no book in the NT do devotion to, and adoration of, Christ, and recognition of His participation in the glory and authority of the Father, find such copious, such exalted, expression. Yet the forms in which this expression is cast are for the most part not original. On a much larger scale than by the primitive community, so far as our records show, the OT has been laid under contribution; so also has the literature of the Interval. Attributes and functions, descriptions and imagery which had played their part in setting forth the majesty and the Almighty power of God, are gathered from all available sources and attached to the Person of the heavenly Christ.

Characteristic of the whole book is the representation of Christ in the opening vision (1<sup>13ff.</sup>), where He appears as the 'one like unto a son of man' of the Danielic vision, but the details of His appearance are some of those which in that earlier scene are attributed to the 'Ancient of Days.' Divine titles are ascribed to Him, as 'Lord of lords, and King of kings' (17<sup>14</sup> 19<sup>16</sup>), and Divine functions, in the searching of heart and reins (2<sup>3</sup>; cf. Ps 7<sup>9</sup>), and a share both in the throne of God (22<sup>1</sup> 'the throne of God and of the Lamb') and in the worship paid to God, even the worship paid by angels (5<sup>11</sup>). He holds the keys of Hades and of death (1<sup>18</sup>), which according to Jewish tradition was one of the prerogatives of the Almighty. It is before His wrath that men are to tremble in the Day of Judgment (6<sup>16</sup> 17), and He is to come again in power and glory to judge the world and to save His people (17<sup>14ff.</sup> 22<sup>20</sup>). The throne on which He has taken His place is His Father's throne (3<sup>21</sup>), and to Him He stands in a relation of unique sonship (1<sup>6</sup>), while at the same time it is from His Father that He receives His power (2<sup>7</sup>), and He is made to speak of Him as 'my God' (3<sup>-12</sup>).

This antithetical emphasis upon the Divine honour and dignity assigned to Christ and the ideas of humility, submission, and suffering which are also connected with Him are vividly brought out by the fact that it is under the title of 'the Lamb' that many of the highest prerogatives are assigned to Him. This is indeed the most characteristic appellation in the book, and occurs some 28 times. He is 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' (13<sup>8</sup>), and even now appears as one 'that has been slain' (5<sup>6</sup> 12<sup>12</sup>); but it is also as Lamb that He receives the worship of Heaven (5<sup>11</sup> 14), that He takes His place by the side of God, and opens the seals of the Book of Destiny. It is 'in the blood of the Lamb' that the saints have 'washed their robes and made them clean' (7<sup>14</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>), or, by another figure, it is with His blood that He has purchased unto God (ἀγοράζειν; cf. Gal 3<sup>13</sup>) 'men of every tribe' and nation (5<sup>9</sup>; cf. 14<sup>3</sup> 4). On the other hand, the name 'which no one knoweth but he himself,' 'Word of God' (ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, 19<sup>13</sup>), is not further applied or expanded, and, though it may mark a line of connexion between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel, it cannot be said to throw any clear light on the Christology of this book.

There is a class of passages which appears to claim for Christ a life co-eternal with that of God. 'I am the first and the last and the living One'—ὁ ὢν (17<sup>17</sup> 18); 'I am the Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end' (22<sup>13</sup>; cf. 21<sup>6</sup>); with which must be compared Is 44<sup>6</sup>, where Jahweh says, 'I am the first and the last, and beside me there is no God,' and Rev 1<sup>8</sup>, where the same majestic self-description is ascribed to the Almighty. Such language may well seem to imply the pre-existence of Christ; yet the predicate in that form is probably to be regarded rather as a necessary inference from the language of the writer, who carries the equating of Christ with God to the furthest point short of making Them eternally equal. Christ is still 'the beginning of the creation of God' (ἡ ἀρχὴ τῆς κτίσεως τοῦ θεοῦ, 3<sup>14</sup>), by which is probably to be understood (cf. Col 1<sup>18</sup> ἀρχή, πρωτότοκος τῶν νεκρῶν; also Col 1<sup>15</sup>) that He Himself was part of the κτίσις.

The Apocalypse of John as a whole leaves the impression of a conception of Christ so exalted, so majestic in the history of mankind, that it could not be carried further without either impinging on the writer's monotheism or demanding the employment of metaphysical categories which were beyond his range of thought. It has been maintained by some (e.g. Bousset) that in the description of Christ as Alpha and Omega the writer goes beyond St. Paul, and actually represents the furthest point in the development of Christology within the NT. B. Weiss says that 'the fact that the Messiah is an originally divine Being (göttliches Wesen) is taken for granted' (Bib. Theol. of NT, Eng. tr., 1882-83, vol. ii, p. 172). But it may be doubted whether this outgoing of St. Paul by the Apocalypse is not more apparent than real. The impression is due partly to the continuous occupation of the author's mind with the same theme. Christ is the Hero of every scene in the drama of the end. There is none of that wide sweep of interest in things both human and Divine which marks the letters of St. Paul. It is due also in part to the natural tendency of the modern reader to accept as evidence of a theory or conception of Christ's Person what for the author was only concrete imagery gathered from many sources to set forth and enhance the glory of his Lord. It may indeed be doubted whether he held any proposition regarding Christ which was not included in the convictions of the primitive community. All that he has to say was involved in the tacit assertion that Christ is an object of worship and a hearer of prayer. And with all the Divine honours and attributes which he lavishes on the Glorified Messiah he never loses sight of His identity with the man Jesus. After the title 'the Lamb' he uses with most frequency the simple name 'Jesus' (nine times). The phenomenon was so noticeable that in several passages inferior MSS have inserted the word 'Christ,' which copyists felt to be missing. It was 'for the testimony of Jesus' that John was in Patmos (1<sup>9</sup>; cf. 12<sup>17</sup> 19<sup>10</sup>); it was with the blood of 'the martyrs (or witnesses) of Jesus' that Rome was intoxicated; and in 22<sup>16</sup> the heavenly Christ speaks of Himself by this human name—'I Jesus have sent my messenger,' while the response to the message with which the book closes addresses the Risen Christ in the same form, reminiscent of 'the days of his flesh'—'Even so, come, Lord Jesus.' The Apocalypse, therefore, is no exception to the rule that, so far from being accompanied by a loosening of the tie between Christ and the historical Jesus, the increasing emphasis on His Divine significance for the world goes along with the same or even clearer assertion of the oneness of Jesus and the Christ. The Christ they worshipped was the Jesus whom they had known.

3. The Christology of St. Paul.—The material for Christology which was already present in the consciousness of the primitive community, or within its grasp, received its fullest and richest development at the hands of St. Paul. The task of the student is to do equal justice to what he received from, and shared with, those who were before him in Christ, and to those elements which were original with him. This will supply the right answer to a question which has become a living issue for modern Christology—Is the Pauline Christology a legitimate and necessary development of the relevant material provided by the contents of the Gospels and the experience of the Church, or does it represent a new departure, a conception of Christ so distinct from, and disparate to, what had gone before, that it must be held to rest not on the revelation of Jesus, but on the speculation of the Apostle? There has been for some time a tendency in one school of NT criticism to exaggerate beyond all reason the distinction between Christianity according to the Gospels and Christianity according to St. Paul, and to do so by minimizing or eliminating what is 'Pauline' in the Gospels and by over-emphasizing the 'Pauline' elements in St. Paul. Whatever is distinctive in St. Paul—his 'calvinism,' his 'sacramentarianism,' his 'mysticism,' his 'eschatology'—is apt to be isolated and exaggerated, with the result, if not the intention, of differentiating him more emphatically from his Master. It needs to be borne in mind that we are working here in a highly charged electric field, where men of all schools of thought are in danger of being swayed even unconsciously by a general præjudicium.

In examining the evidence as to St. Paul's conception of Christ, certain general considerations have to be kept in view. It is now commonly agreed that it is a mistake to regard St. Paul as one who was constructing or had constructed a system of dogmatic theology. We are probably nearer the truth if we think of him as a man supremely interested in the practical conduct of life, whose mind was speculative in the sense that he was not content to register phenomena, but must seek for their relations and their causes, and that he constantly referred details to their correlative principles. That he was moved to this by the impulse of a practical demand rather than of an intellectual necessity is plainly suggested by what we can gather concerning his 'missionary preaching.' The Epistles to the Thessalonians furnish evidence as to its comparatively elementary character up till A.D. 52. And it is within the last ten years of his life that we are to place those Epistles in which his distinctive theological ideas are developed and exposed, within six of these last ten years that we place the great group of Epistles in which they find their classical and all but final expression. Everything points to the fact that the specifically Pauline combinations or inferences were due to the stimulus of specific situations or to the demands created by definite opposition. St. Paul's mind 'is logical enough when his spiritual experience demands it, but a large part of his affirmations regarding the religious life and destiny of men is thrown off, as occasion prompts, in vague hints, in outbursts of intense spiritual emotion, in pictures set within the framework of his inherited training, in arguments devised to meet the needs of a particular church or a particular group of converts' (H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul's Conceptions of the Last Things, 1904, p. 22). It is impossible to separate the practical and ethical from the doctrinal, in the interests of the Apostle; and only imperfect success can attend any attempt to study Pauline conceptions by isolating their intellectual expression.

(1) SOURCES FOR PAULINISM.—For our information regarding the thought and teaching of the Apostle we are almost wholly dependent on his own letters. From the Acts we learn the details of his conversion, the course and method of his missionary activity, but concerning his teaching only what may be gathered with caution from his speeches reported there. The Letters are conveniently divided into four groups.

(a) The Epistles to the Thessalonians, written from Corinth some twenty years after his conversion, in which we have an echo and some record of that mission-preaching which had been the task of St. Paul's life since that event. (b) The Epistle to the Galatians may possibly be earlier still, though by most authorities it is grouped with those to the Romans and the Corinthians, written some five years later, in which we find the Apostle at the height of his intellectual energy, stimulated to the discovery and enunciation alike of the relations and of the foundations of those truths which had formed the centre of his gospel. (c) A third group, commonly known as the Epistles of the Imprisonment—those to the 'Ephesians,' the Colossians, and the Philippians—belongs probably to A.D. 62-63, and shows the Apostle responding to hostile stimulus of a different kind, and carrying yet further certain of the lines of thought laid down in earlier Epistles. (d) There is a fourth group of Epistles, that known as the 'Pastorals,' addressed to Timothy and Titus, written, if they were written by St. Paul, after he had been released from his imprisonment. The much-disputed question of their authenticity is hardly material to our present purpose, seeing that the Pastorals have little additional to contribute to Pauline Christology. When Christ is referred to as the 'one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus' (1 Ti 2<sup>5</sup>), He is presented under an aspect which does not appear in St. Paul, though it does in the Epistle to the Hebrews; but in general the Christology of the Pastorals is important rather as a criterion of their authorship than as adding material for the Pauline Christology.

The convictions of St. Paul regarding Christ began at the same point as those of the primitive community. Through a like experience of Jesus as Living, Risen, and Glorified, he was seized by the conviction that He was the Messiah. In his case, however, the personal recollection of what Jesus had been and taught, of the Messianic claim made by Him and for Him, was replaced by the testimony of those disciples who had already believed on Him, and had sealed their belief by steadfastness under persecution. That doubtless gave the content of St. Paul's belief; what created it was the vision of Christ as risen: 'last of all he was seen of me also' (1 Co 15<sup>8</sup>). To St. Paul also, as to the earlier disciples, came the gift of the Spirit (Ac 9<sup>17</sup>). And 'straightway in the synagogues he proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God' (9<sup>20</sup>), i.e. that He is the Messiah, the phrase having still its Messianic significance (cf. Jn 1<sup>49</sup>), and finding its equivalent in v. 22 'proving that this is the Christ.' It was in the Scriptures of the OT that he too sought for the proof (Ac 18<sup>28</sup>), as also for proof of the further affirmation that it behoved the Christ to suffer (17<sup>3</sup>). Like Peter and like Stephen, but by a different series of steps, he traces the history of Israel down to the manifestation of Jesus (13<sup>14</sup>). He preached to Jews and Greeks alike 'that they should repent and turn to God, doing works worthy of repentance' (26<sup>40</sup>); moreover, he also connected the promise of forgiveness with the revelation of Christ (13<sup>38</sup>), and recognized in Jesus One whom God had 'appointed to judge the world in righteousness' (17<sup>31</sup>). And to this Exalted Christ St. Paul also in the Acts gives the pregnant title Kyrios. This is specially significant in his speech to the Elders at Miletus, in which there is a note of personal attachment and devotion to the One he there describes (20<sup>19</sup>, 21, 24, 32-33) which is not struck elsewhere in the Acts, common as the title itself is throughout. This prepares us for the evidence of the Thessalonian Epistles, and for the subsequent development of the implication of the name. There is thus scattered up and down the later chapters of Acts evidence as to the character of St. Paul's preaching, which suggests that it included the same elements as are found in that of the Jerusalem Church; and there is so far no reason to suppose that it contained any elements peculiar to himself, with the one important exception that he claimed for the Gentile as Gentile, and not as Gentile become Jew, the full privileges of Christian salvation. And again this corresponds with what may be gathered from the Thessalonian Epistles.

(2) CHRISTOLOGY OF EPISTLES TO THE THESSALONIANS.—These Epistles are too commonly studied almost exclusively for the light they throw on Pauline eschatology; but it is to be observed that the directly eschatological passage occupies only one-seventh of the First Letter, while before it is reached the letter has passed what looks like an intended close (1 Th 3<sup>11-13</sup>), and in the earlier portion the references to the Parousia are brief and wanting in elaboration. Nor are the proportion and emphasis very different in the Second Epistle.

The really striking feature of these Epistles is the equal emphasis on Christ the Lord and God the Father as severally and jointly the source of all Christian experience, and the ground of all Christian hope. In the opening verse of each Epistle, Christ and the Father are combined as the sphere in which the Church at Thessalonica has its being. In 1 Th 3<sup>11</sup> the words 'our God and Father and our Lord Jesus Christ' appear as the subject of a verb in the singular number, expressing a prayer that the Apostle may be guided on his way (cf. 2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>). It is from Christ no less than from God that the Apostle claims to have received his commission (1 Th 2<sup>6</sup>), and it is 'through the Lord Jesus' that he utters his precepts (1 Th 4<sup>1</sup> [cf. 5<sup>27</sup>], 2 Th 3<sup>6-12</sup>). And though Christ is not in these Epistles directly referred to as Judge, it is implied that in the work of Judgment the Son will also have a part (1 Th 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 5-, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>8</sup>).

It will be already plain that ὁ Κύριος is the constantly recurring description of Christ; but, more than that, it is used only of Him. For the phrase consecrated by OT usage, 'the Lord God,' St. Paul has in fact substituted 'God the Father and the Lord.' The usage of various names for Christ in these Epistles has been examined by G. Milligan (St. Paul's Epp. to Thess., 1908, p. 135) with the following results. The human name 'Jesus' by itself is found only twice (1 Th 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>14</sup>). The name 'Christ' standing alone is also comparatively rare, occurring four times ('apostles of Christ,' 'gospel of Christ,' 'dead in Christ,' 'patience in Christ'). The combination 'Christ Jesus' denoting the Saviour alike in His official and in His personal character, the use of which in the NT is confined to St. Paul, occurs twice. On the other hand, Kyrios occurs twenty-two times in all, eight times with, and fourteen times without, the article. The fact that nearly two-thirds of these instances are anarthrous shows how completely the word was already accepted as a proper name, and appropriated to Christ.

It is consistent with the significance we have assigned to this use of Kyrios that the phrase ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, which in the OT means 'the Day of Jahweh,' is employed here without hesitation and without explanation to describe the day of Christ's return in judgment (1 Th 5-; cf. 2 Th 2-). Of like significance are the parallel use and the interchange of 'God' and 'Lord,' e.g. 1 Th 5-3 'the God of peace himself,' and 2 Th 3<sup>16</sup> 'the Lord of peace himself'; 1 Th 1<sup>4</sup> 'brethren beloved of God,' and 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> 'brethren beloved of the Lord.' These phenomena are the more remarkable inasmuch as they occur in Epistles which otherwise are distinguished for an unusually persistent expression of what may be called 'God-consciousness.' It is not so much a doctrine concerning God that forces itself on the attention, as a habit of referring everything to 'God.' It is God who has called the Thessalonians (1 Th 2<sup>12</sup>), the gospel of God that they have received (2<sup>2</sup>), to God that they have turned from idols (1<sup>9</sup>), faith toward God that they show (1<sup>3</sup>). It is God whose love they experience (1<sup>4</sup>), whose rule is their supreme authority (4<sup>3</sup> 5<sup>18</sup>), who gives them the Holy Spirit (4<sup>8</sup>), who is to sanctify them wholly (5<sup>23</sup>), who is to bring again the dead (4<sup>14</sup>). All these references (and they are not exhaustive) are in the First Epistle; and further illustration of the same characteristic is furnished by the Second.

It is, therefore, in letters which at the same time testify so continuously and so emphatically to the unchallenged monotheism of the Apostle that we find equally striking evidence that even at this stage he assigned to Christ rank, dignity, authority, and sovereign importance for religion, such as are surpassed in none of his later writings. And yet it cannot be said that in any essential particular these Epistles carry us beyond the Christology of the pre-Pauline Church. The fact is that all, or nearly all, that St. Paul ever taught concerning the Person of Christ is involved in His 'Lordship.'

'The confession of Christ's Lordship is the confession of His Divinity. There is no doubt that to Paul and the mass of believers the Man Christ Jesus, Risen and Exalted, . . . was the object of worship. In Him they saw God manifested in a human form. In His influence upon them they perceived the influence of the Spirit of God. Of His Divine power they had the most convincing evidence in the consciousness of the new life, with the moral strength it imparted, which He had quickened within them. . . . The ease and naturalness with which Paul passes from the thought of God to that of Christ shows that he knew of no other God save the God who was one with Christ and Christ with Him, that in turning in faith and prayer to Christ he was conscious he was drawing near to God in the truest way, and that in calling on God he was calling on Christ, in whom alone God was accessible to men' (D. Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ, 1897, p. 145 and 144 n.).

This is possibly to anticipate the results of the examination of the other Epistles, but only in details. The central fact of Pauline Christology is already evident in the Epistles to the Thessalonians, viz. that while betraying no sign that his monotheism is in danger, or that his way of interpreting it is either singular or calling for defence, he gives to the Exalted Man, Christ Jesus, the value and many of the attributes of God.

A Messiah who is Messiah and more, One whose function it is to save from the wrath that is impending, but One to be in relation with whom is to have found already the basis of new life in an ethical sense, the condition of a new relation to God, and One who therefore draws to Himself faith, obedience, worship—that is in briefest form St. Paul's conception of Christ as set forth in these Epistles. In subsequent letters St. Paul analyzes the relation of Christ to God and of Christ to mankind, which this conception involves; but nothing can justify the suggestion that this central conception was built up, as it were, out of the elements into which it could subsequently be resolved. It was one which reached St. Paul whole and complete at the crisis of his conversion. That there was some preparation, psychological and even intellectual, for that transforming experience is quite possible, though St. Paul himself would probably have denied it. But that it can be accounted for merely as the result of any subjective process is a suggestion quite irreconcilable with the evidence. We have the concurrent testimony of St. Paul himself (Gal 1<sup>18ff.</sup>; cf. 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>) that at the moment of his conversion he was aflame with persecuting zeal against those who believed in Jesus as Messiah, and of Acts (8<sup>3</sup> 9<sup>1ff.</sup>), that the martyrdom of Stephen was followed by an outburst of calculated fury against the Christian heretics. And the revelation of the Risen Christ resulted in something more than the mere reversal of Saul's opinion regarding Jesus, and the confession that He was indeed the Messiah; it resulted in a conversion of the whole man so complete that the change of opinion which was its intellectual expression was of secondary importance. There was an ethical change which demands for its explanation a religious as well as an intellectual revolution; and the explanation is that from the time of his conversion St. Paul found in Jesus not only Χριστός but Κύριος.

The proof of this ethical change lies in his subsequent life and in all his Epistles. It is seen alike in the ideals which he inculcates and in the degree in which he himself approximates to these ideals. And he asserts the closest causal connexion between the qualities of this new life, life of this quality, and Christ, so that the ethical experience of himself and his fellow-believers has contributed largely to his Christology. Already in 1 Thess. (1<sup>3</sup>) we find the triad of Christian virtues—faith, love, and hope—recognized as being the natural fruit of being 'in Christ'; and Christ as the active source of 'increase' in that love wherewith they have been 'taught of God' to love one another (1 Th 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>9</sup>). In 1 Th 5 we have the picture of a Christian community wherein this 'love' was to be operative in curbing the unruly, in comforting those of little spirit, in supporting the weak, in showing longsuffering towards all; where men were to abstain from every form of evil, and to hold fast τὸ καλόν. These and other ethical ideals for the common life receive their sanction in the conviction that, as Christians, men belong 'not to the night' but 'to the day' (5<sup>5</sup> 8), i.e. in a certain sense they are already living in the light of the world to come. And within this series of precepts lies one which more than anything else reveals the power over human nature which St. Paul assigns to faith in Christ. 'At all times be joyful; pray without ceasing; in every circumstance give thanks. For this is what God makes known to you in Jesus Christ as his will.' A trust in God which would enable men to accept everything which came to them as part of a Father's will, and so enable them in every circumstance to be thankful, to be free from care—however this reached St. Paul as part of the new ideal, it testifies to an ethical harmony between him and Jesus. St. Paul's explanation of it would be, 'It pleased God to reveal His Son in me'; and again the ethical experience must be taken into account in the development of his Christology.

(3) THE DEVELOPED CHRISTOLOGY OF ST. PAUL.—This may conveniently be studied under three aspects, according as it bears upon the conception of Christ: (a) as He now is, in glory; (b) as He was upon earth; (c) as He had been before coming to earth.

A. The glorified Christ.—St. Paul's faith was in a living Christ, a Being who was continuously active in and on behalf of those who had been redeemed to God through Him, whether they were regarded as individuals or as a corporate whole. Accordingly, it is only natural that his thought dwells preponderatingly on various aspects and activities of Christ as He is now, in 'glory' and in the Church; but along with this there goes always the recollection, whether tacit or expressed, of what had preceded the glory, viz. the death, and the manifestation in earthly life.

The four Epistles of the second group (Gal. Rom., 1 and 2 Cor.) in the first place give greater definiteness to the 'Lordship' of Christ as the central fact to be grasped and acknowledged by men. The necessary but sufficient condition for being reckoned a Christian was the sincere acknowledgment of the religious relation to Christ involved in confessing Him as 'Lord.' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved' had been St. Paul's word to the jailer of Philippi; and in Ro 10<sup>8ff.</sup> the same principle is laid down and expanded. The 'word,' which in the mouth of Moses (Dt 30<sup>14</sup>) stood for the Mosaic Law, is now represented by the gospel, the word of faith proclaimed by the apostles. And as accepted and openly acknowledged by those who believe that God raised Jesus from the dead, it takes this form, 'Jesus is Lord'; and this acknowledgment is the external condition of salvation. In the same context St. Paul shows why this is so all-important. He appeals to two passages of the OT, in each of which the original reference is to Jahweh ('who-soever believeth on him shall not be ashamed,' from Is 28<sup>16</sup>, and 'whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved,' from Jl 2<sup>3</sup>); but he predicates them of the Lord Jesus. Nothing could show more simply or more completely the place which the Risen Jesus had taken in the religious consciousness of the Church. The homage, the prayer, the dependence which were due to God were due to Him; and the protection, the security, the salvation which were to be looked for from God might be claimed at His hand. In like manner, according to 1 Co 12<sup>1</sup> ('no one is able to say that Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Spirit'), this acknowledgment is traced to the Spirit's inspiration and is offered as a test whereby the inspiration of a speaker may be ascertained. And in Ph 2<sup>a</sup>.<sup>11</sup> in all probability it is this name of 'Lord' which the Apostle describes as the 'name above every name,' the bestowal of which upon Jesus at His Exaltation involved His right to the homage of all created beings. St. Paul here expresses his consciousness of the wonder of what he believes to be the fact—that God has bestowed on Jesus His own glorious name, that whereby He had so long been known and addressed by the Jews, who shrank from pronouncing 'Jahweh' (cf. Ac 2<sup>36</sup>; and W. Lueken ad loc. in Schriften des NT, ii. [1908] 379).

(a) Son of God.—If St. Paul thus connects our Lord's entry on the title and dignity of Κύριος with His Resurrection and Exaltation, does he do the same in reference to His status as Son of God? The governing passage is in Ro 1<sup>4</sup> τοῦ ὁρισθέντος υἱοῦ θεοῦ ἐν δυνάμει κατὰ πνεῦμα ἀγιάσωντος ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν—'declared (or installed) Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness in virtue of resurrection from the dead.' The emphasis is probably on the words 'with power.' Ἀς γενόμενος ἐκ σπέρματος Δαβὶδ, Jesus had been Χριστὸς κατὰ σάρκα and υἱὸς θεοῦ in the Messianic sense, and was crucified ἐξ ἀσθενείας (2 Co 13<sup>4</sup>). But after and in consequence of the Resurrection, He has entered on the status of Son of God in an exalted form, set free from 'the likeness of (weak and) sinful flesh,' He has been promulgated as 'in power.' This open acknowledgment of His true character was 'in accordance with his spirit of holiness.'

'The Resurrection was to Paul the disclosure of the nature of Christ. It was not only the crowning stage in the development of the Life that had been lived on earth, its natural consummation, but as such it was also the revelation of the inner nature of Christ and of the forces of His personal life that were concealed, as well as hindered in their proper exercise on others, as long as He was in the flesh' (Somerville, op. cit. p. 17; see, further, below).

In three other passages St. Paul refers to Christ as 'the Son of God' (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>13</sup>). In others again he speaks of Christ as 'the Son' (1 Co 15<sup>23</sup>) or 'his Son' (Ro 1<sup>8.9</sup> 5<sup>10</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, Gal 4<sup>4</sup>). Some of these passages may still refer to the Messianic Sonship; but others more probably belong to another class, of which Ro 8<sup>3.4</sup> (τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ υἱὸν πέμψας—τοῦ ἰδίου υἱοῦ οὐκ ἐφέλσας) and Col 1<sup>13</sup> (τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ) furnish the clearest examples. In these passages the conception of Christ's Sonship has passed over into a conception other and deeper than the official Messianic one; and it seems to involve a 'community of nature between the Father and the Son' (Sanday-Headlam, ad loc.), and a relationship independent of any historical experience. At this point, therefore, St. Paul does advance beyond any position which is attested for the primitive community. It is useless as well as needless to raise any question as to whether he conceived the relation metaphysically or otherwise. St. Paul is content to recognize it as intimate, personal, unique. 'It is clear that in the scale of being the son is the one who in origin and nature is nearest to God' (J. Weiss, Christ, p. 66).

This deeper conception of the Sonship is borne out by the frequent and spontaneous use of the name 'Father' for God. The full name for God in the Church of the NT is 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (e.g. Ro 15<sup>6</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>31</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>). And as such He is described absolutely as ὁ πατήρ, and known experimentally by those who have in their hearts the Spirit 'whereby we cry Abba, Father' (Ro 8<sup>15</sup>). All this circle of ideas testifies to the recognition of a Sonship not only in the sense in which it was equivalent to Messiahship, but in the sense of a relationship which is intrinsic and unique.

It is quite unnecessary to go far afield to find the source from which St. Paul derived this conception of Christ's Sonship. It is attested by the Synoptic Gospels as an element in the self-consciousness of Jesus. There is nothing to suggest that it was a discovery or a conclusion due to St. Paul. As J. Weiss says:

'Paul shows no trace of uneasiness nor gives any hint of a tradition as to how the relation of sonship arose or what its actual significance was. When in Col 1<sup>15</sup> he speaks of Christ as the first-born of all creatures, we must not by any means conclude that Paul had in mind a begetting or birth, or any special creative act. But neither is there in a single syllable any suggestion of an emanation in the sense of the later Gnosticism, or an election. It is significant that Paul does not feel the least need to account for the existence of this Son of God by any story of creation or birth, i.e. by what the Science of Religion calls "Myth" (Christ, p. 69f.).

This means that neither intellectual construction nor speculation gave rise to the conception. It came from Jesus. And as the Resurrection put the seal of Divine authentication on His Messianic consciousness, so did it put the seal of Divine acknowledgment upon that filial consciousness which had been the deepest thing in His personality.

Conversely, of course, this prompt and spontaneous recognition of the filial relationship between Jesus and God provides confirmation of the gospel record so far as it reflects this element in His consciousness. On the broad foundation of the Lordship of Christ and the Sonship of Christ—the one a fact of religious experience, the other a factor in the consciousness of Jesus—St. Paul builds his specific Christology. And he postulates for Christ three different relationships: he sets Him in a relationship amounting to identity with the Spirit of God; he presents Him as Head of a new race of men, the second Adam; and he claims for Him a creative relation to the world of intelligent being.

(β) The Lord the Spirit.—The evidence for this identification is partly direct and partly indirect. In 2 Co 3<sup>17</sup> the Apostle makes the categorical statement, 'The Lord is the Spirit,' and the same idea is probably echoed in the following verse, 'even as from the Lord the Spirit' (the genitive πνεύματος being probably in apposition to Κυρίου—so Schmiedel, Lietzmann). But the same idea also underlies the Apostle's habit of using πνεῦμα [θεοῦ], πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ and Χριστός as practically interchangeable. Christ is 'a life-giving Spirit' (1 Co 15<sup>45</sup>), but the Spirit also gives life (2 Co 3<sup>6</sup>; cf. Gal 5<sup>22</sup>). And in Ro 8<sup>9.10</sup>.<sup>11</sup> St. Paul passes indifferently from the one to the other, referring to the Divine Spirit in one verse the effect which in the next he refers to Christ. For him 'Christ' and 'the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus' are practically synonymous.

The basis for the identification which St. Paul asserts is not any idea of metaphysical unity, but an observed harmony of ethical and spiritual influence. St. Paul had no doctrine of the Trinity. The Spirit of God, or Holy Spirit, was for him (apart from the identification with the Risen Christ) the energy of the Divine nature, universal in its operation, influencing the will and the intelligence of men, the source of the sevenfold gifts described in Is 11<sup>2</sup>, and specially the creator of 'life' in the new sense in which it was a prerogative of the Messianic age, and practically synonymous with 'salvation.' The identification of this Spirit with the Risen Christ followed on the combination of the experience of Easter with that of Pentecost. Together they formed the source and the basis of new life for the believers. This was for them the meaning of salvation, and the proof that they were being saved. The subjective certainty was given in new moral power to follow new ideals. Both the power and the ideals were traced to the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>); but they came to each individual after and in consequence of his faith in Christ as Risen Lord. So this life-giving energy of God which by the primitive community had been explained as 'shed abroad' by the Exalted Christ, is by St. Paul identified with Him. What would further contribute to this conclusion would be the necessity of attributing to Christ existence in a super-physical or 'spiritual' form, and the further necessity of accounting for the universality of His presence, with each and with all of the believers everywhere.

There is a further indication here of the way in which the conception of salvation as the highest good belonging to the life to come was giving place to the conception of it as a present experience. With all its antecedent conditions—e.g. justification (=acquittal), cleansing, redemption from the dominion of evil—and with all its expected contents—peace with God, tranquil confidence, hope and joy—salvation was within men's grasp. Men who had received the Spirit had received it as ἀπαρχή or ἀρραβών, at once the first-fruits and the guarantee of eternal life; they knew that they had received the Spirit because the fruits of the Spirit were produced in them and among them (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>); and that these were fruits of the Spirit of Christ, or the Spirit that was Christ, they knew, because they corresponded with what they knew of His character and teaching.

The recognition of this element in St. Paul's Christology has certain consequences.—(i.) It throws light on the use so freely made by the Apostle of the phrase ἐν Χριστῷ. (ii.) It leads to a change in the way of conceiving the Spirit which has recently been described as 'die Christificierung des Geistes.' The Spirit being recognized as entering into personal relations with man, of the same character as those of Christ with man, there is formed a conception of the Spirit which can only be described in terms of personality. (iii.) If as Κύριος Christ exercises the authority of God, and as πνεῦμα at once enspheres men (cf. Ac 17<sup>28</sup>) and dwells in them, producing the fruits of the Spirit, the true grounds are provided for regarding Him as Divine.

'It is . . . because He works in us with an energy of love and holiness that is identified with the Spirit of God, and commands our obedience with an absoluteness that is identical with the authority of God, that we are to recognise Christ as truly Divine and to acknowledge the presence in Him of powers of Godhead that constitute Him the object of our faith and worship' (Somerville, op. cit. p. 112).

(γ) The Second Adam.—Another line of advance was opened for the Apostle partly through the universalism of his gospel, leading him to find in Adam, the head and founder of humanity which fell, a type of Christ as founder and head of the humanity which He had redeemed. Redeemed humanity was indeed a καὶνὴ κτίσις (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>, Gal 6<sup>15</sup>; cf. Col 3<sup>10</sup>, where the parallel with the creation-narrative in Genesis is distinctly suggested). The new creature is a citizen of a new world (Ph 3<sup>-9</sup>), belongs no longer to the kingdom of darkness but to the kingdom of God's Son (Col 1<sup>13</sup>), and lives under a new covenant, or basis of relationship, between God and man (2 Co 3<sup>8</sup>). In all these particulars he is seen to be a member of a new race; and Adam, the founder of the original race, was τύπος τοῦ μέλλοντος (Ro 5<sup>14</sup>): i.e. Christ as ὁ μέλλων bore the same relation to the new race as Adam to the old.

In two passages St. Paul makes use of this analogy, in both cases assuming its validity, not proving it. According to the first, Adam is typical of Christ in the way in which his fall involves consequences affecting the relation to God of his whole posterity. That is to say, in Christ, as Second Adam and Representative Man, humanity makes a new beginning; it recovers its pristine relation to God, the Divine likeness in which it was first created. And as Adam by his disobedience had entailed on all who followed the heritage of sin and death, so Christ by His perfect fulfilment of the Divine will had secured for 'all' participation in righteousness and life (Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>).

In the second passage (1 Co 15<sup>45-47</sup>) St. Paul applies the same relation and contrast between Adam and Christ to support his statement that there is not only 'a natural (=psychical) body' but also a 'spiritual' (=pneumatic) one. It is quite in accordance with his method of using Scripture that the verse of Genesis which he quotes has no reference to σῶμα; and yet we can see its relevancy. Ἐγένετο ὁ [πρῶτος] ἄνθρωπος [Ἀδὰμ] εἰς ψυχὴν ζῶσαν, where the bracketed words are added to the text of the LXX and emphasize the direction of the Apostle's thought; Adam, the first man, was made a psychic person, or a 'natural man.' Then he proceeds (without indicating what is the case, viz. that he is no longer quoting): 'the last Adam (was made) a spirit, a life-giving soul.' He states, in fact, the same view of Christ as that just considered—'the Lord is the Spirit'—but leaves unexpressed the inference he would have men draw, viz. that as Adam and all who derive from him had a 'psychic body,' so Christ and all who owe 'life' to Him have a 'pneumatic body.'

It is only then (if at all) that St. Paul recalls the famous interpretation put by Philo upon the double narrative of the creation of man (Gn 1<sup>27</sup> and 2<sup>7</sup>)—διττὰ ἀνθρώπων γένη ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἐστὶν οὐράνιος ἄνθρωπος, ὁ δὲ γήινος. ὁ μὲν οὖν οὐράνιος ἄτε κατ' εἰκόνα Θεοῦ γεγενῆσθαι φθαρτὴς καὶ συνόλως γεώδους οὐσίας ἀμέτοχος, ὁ δὲ γήινος ἐκ σποράδος ὕλης ἦν χοῦν κέκληκεν ἐπάργη (Legum allegor. [ed. Mangey, vol. i. p. 49]; cf. de Opif. Mundi [vol. i. p. 32]). Not a few modern writers are disposed to find the root of St. Paul's 'higher Christology' in this doctrine of Philo concerning 'the heavenly man.' But this is probably a mistaken view. Along with obviously close correspondence in phrasing the passage shows fundamental divergence from the Philonic conception. Pfeleiderer and B. Weiss agree that the passage contains no reference to Philo's doctrine of the ideal man. J. Weiss (Christ, p. 74), after positing that there is 'no evidence of literary dependence, i.e. borrowing from any work of Philo's,' makes a careful comparison of the two conceptions, and concludes that Philo's doctrine shows no trace of what is most characteristic in St. Paul.

'The Alexandrine does not attribute the least eschatological significance to the heavenly man. He shows no trace of the belief that he who came into being in the image of God, at the end of all things shall appear as Messiah. But with Paul it is just this which is the essential thing. His doctrine of the heavenly and earthly man, or of the first and last Adam, or of Adam and Christ, is most pointedly apocalyptic in character' (ib. p. 77 f.).

If there is any allusion to Philo's view, it is referred to only to be contradicted: 'the pneumatic was not first, but the psychic; then came the pneumatic.' At this point (v. <sup>48</sup>) the Apostle's mind reverts to his original subject—the constitution respectively of the psychic and of the pneumatic man. The first man was sprung from earth, earthy in his constitution; the second man was, is, or shall be from heaven, and is the heavenly man. And the same law whereby members of Adam's race reproduce his earthy, psychic constitution secures that those who derive their life from the heavenly man shall receive a pneumatic frame or constitution. But the frame or σῶμα is now described as εἰκών, the image or concrete expression of personality which produces an impression on the beholder. The 'image of the heavenly' in v. <sup>49</sup> is the same as the 'image of his glory,' or 'his glorious likeness' of Ph 3<sup>21</sup>, into which the Lord is to change the 'body of our humiliation.' And the 'image of his glory,' the 'image of the heavenly man' alike describe the pneumatic σῶμα, frame or form, which the Risen Christ had taken to Himself.

When we examine these verses, freed from the obligation of reading into them Philo's theory of creation, the OT figure which is suggested by ὁ ἐπουράνιος is not the supposed Urmensch of Gn 1, nor yet a Pauline complement of the earthly Adam of Gn 2, but the figure in Dn 7<sup>13</sup>, ἰδὼν μετὰ τῶν νεφέλων τοῦ οὐράνου ὡς υἱὸς ἀνθρώπου ἐρχόμενος. It is true that there is not elsewhere in St. Paul's writings any certain allusion to the 'Son of Man'; but this may well be due to the incomprehensibility of the phrase in Gentile ears. And there is no reason to suppose that St. Paul was either ignorant of, or indifferent to, the Messianic significance of the Danielic figure. The view which these verses postulate is therefore this: that the Messiah, the heavenly man of Daniel, is at the same time the head of the new race, the second Adam, and is known to be such because He has been made a 'life-giving Spirit'; those who believe on Him are by Him made alive.

At what point did this take place, in the opinion of St. Paul? Was it at the 'creation,' or at His coming to earth, or at His Exaltation? Probably the first of these possibilities is the one which corresponds with the first impression the words make; the description is in both cases that of the original condition of the first and the second Adam respectively. And that is the interpretation insisted upon by those who find the source of St. Paul's Christology in the conception of a pre-existent ideal man. On the other hand, it is at least not necessary to look for the source of both parts of the statement in the Genesis-narrative. It is quite in accordance with St. Paul's manner of handling Scripture that he should add to a direct quotation a proposition which rests on quite other ground (cf. Ro 3<sup>20</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). Nor, in the second place, is it necessary that the verb ἐγένετο (granting that it is to be supplied in the second clause of v. 45) should refer in both cases to the same point of time, or to synonymous moments in the experience of the first and second Adam. All that is necessary is that in both cases the experience must be one capable of being described by the word ἐγένετο, and the illuminating parallel is that in Ac 2<sup>30</sup>: 'God made him Lord and Christ.'

Once more, the whole passage must be viewed and interpreted in its bearing on the solution of the question, With what body do they come? What is really contrasted with the σῶμα ψυχικόν which clothed the ψυχήν ζῶσαν of the first Adam is the σῶμα πνευματικόν through which the πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν of the Second Adam is manifested. And as the σῶμα πνευματικόν is the glorified body of the Risen Lord, so it was at His Resurrection that He 'was made a life-giving Spirit.' It would not follow that St. Paul did not regard Him as having been πνεῦμα or even πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν in some sense anterior to the Resurrection, any more than it is necessary to put a similar interpretation on Ac 2<sup>30</sup>. As 'the first-born from the dead,' He was also 'the first-born among many brethren,' inasmuch as they were destined in advance to be conformed to His 'image,' i.e. to the form of His existence in glory (Ro 8<sup>29</sup>; see Denney, ad loc.). He was the Second Adam because He was at once the Source, the Type, and the Head of the new race; and as surely as filiation from the first Adam had shown itself in the physico-psychic constitution, so surely would vital relation to Christ show itself in the bearing of a spiritual-heavenly body, the habitation not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

It appears, therefore, that in 1 Co 15<sup>45</sup> St. Paul has nothing to tell about the pre-existent Christ; and the same is probably the case in regard to the other factors in St. Paul's description of Christ—the recognition of Him as εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ and the declaration that in Him dwells 'the whole fullness of the Godhead.' In both passages (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup> and Col 1<sup>15</sup>) where he refers to Christ as 'the image of God,' the context suggests that the idea is more than that of simple likeness, reflexion, or even representation. Christ as εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ is and has all that Adam had in consequence of being made ἐν εἰκόνι θεοῦ without suffering any of the subsequent diminution or cancelling of powers or privileges which in Adam's case followed upon transgression. This phrase, therefore, like 'the Second Adam,' sets Him forth as the archetypal man. But the phrase has had a history since its origin in Hebrew literature, and St. Paul may have had that also in mind. It appears in a modified form in Wis. (7-6) in a description of the Divine Wisdom personified: ἀπαναγασμα γὰρ ἐστὶ φωτὸς αἰδίου . . . καὶ εἰκὼν τῆς ἀγαθότητος αὐτοῦ. From an Egyptian inscription of 196 B.C. Wendland quotes the description of an apotheosized prince as εἰκόνας ζωῆς τοῦ θεοῦ (Hellen.-röm. Kultur, 1907, p. 75). But there is no need to go beyond the passage in Wis., which indeed seems also to have influenced the language of 2 Co 4<sup>4</sup> and He 1<sup>3</sup>, and possibly Col 1<sup>17</sup>. The εἰκὼν evidently connotes light, glory, radiant effulgence; and when St. Paul applies the description to Christ, he means that the otherwise invisible God is manifested and revealed through Him (cf. Jn 14-1 ἐμφανίσω ἑαυτόν). Its true significance is in fact explained by 2 Co 4<sup>6</sup>: 'Seeing it is God . . . who shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.' St. Paul neither denies nor asserts that Christ had been 'the image of God' from the beginning; but what he does say on the subject is properly referred to Christ as Exalted.

(δ) The fullness of the Godhead.—It pleased God that 'in him the whole fullness of the Godhead should make its abode' (Col 1<sup>19</sup>; cf. 2<sup>9</sup> ἐν αὐτῷ κατοικεῖ πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος σωματικῶς, καὶ ἐστὶ ἐν αὐτῷ πεπληρωμένοι). It has now been made clear that as the foregoing description has its roots in the Hebrew record of creation, so this one is not unrelated to contemporary theosophic speculation. St. Paul makes this assertion regarding Christ in response to a challenge, which had been delivered, tacitly at least, by the false teachers at Colossæ against the sole and sufficient supremacy of the Lord. On the lips of those whom he was controverting, as well as on his own, the phrase stood for the totality of the Divine powers or agencies. But for the false teachers the totality was distributed among a plurality, a countless host, of mediators—'thrones, dominions, principalities, powers,' τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου. St. Paul had found in Christ another view of the universe, according to which all this imagined hierarchy of intermediaries became irrelevant. Thus it is probable that in both sentences in which the phrase occurs a strong emphasis should be placed on the words ἐν αὐτῷ. Not in that cloud of unknown spiritual forces but in Christ resides that whole fullness of which they speak; and it resides σωματικῶς, i.e. not 'in bodily form,' but 'in completeness and abiding reality' (so Klöpper, Dibelius).

The term, in its origin, or as used by the theosophists of Colossæ, may be metaphysical or not; in the mouth of the apostle it expresses a religious truth, a truth of reflection based on religious experience, the truth learnt in communion with the Risen Lord, that in Him there is a full endowment of life by the Spirit of God that answers to all the religious needs of human nature' (Somerville, op. cit. p. 158).

It is to be noted in connexion with each of these later aspects of Christ recognized by St. Paul, that it is held or revealed by Him in order to be imparted or conveyed to men. If He is the Son and the Image of the Invisible God, it is in order that men who believe on Him may become sons of the same Father and conformed to the same Image. If the fullness of God has taken up its abode in Him, that has had for a result 'ye have been fulfilled in him,' and then we find the Apostle in Eph 3<sup>19</sup> praying that the brethren may by the indwelling of Christ be 'fulfilled' till they attain to the pleroma of God. At the same time, this participation of believers in the highest attributes of Christ is (i.) mediated through Him, is theirs only through their organic union with Him; and (ii.) only partial and fragmentary at any time in the individual believer. No individual believer, however closely he may resemble his Master, can ever reproduce all that Christ is. It is the body of believers, believers as a body, who are destined to attain 'to the perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ' (Eph 4<sup>13</sup>). All the attributes of the heavenly Christ have reference to, and are applied to, the salvation of man; but they are conveyed by Him; apart from Him they are not within the reach of men.

B. The historical Jesus.—St. Paul traced the origin of his faith, and ascribed the life he now lived, to the Risen and Exalted Christ, Lord and Spirit. But it is not true to say that he was either ignorant of, or indifferent to, the manifestation of Jesus 'in the days of his flesh.' The references which he makes to the 'historical Jesus' may be few in number, but they are emphatic and essential to his total conception of Christ's Person and Work. In the first place, he admits and relies on the authority of Jesus as the rule of life. In Ac 20<sup>35</sup> he is heard definitely recalling 'the words of the Lord Jesus,' as in 1 Co 11<sup>23f.</sup> he quotes as authoritative the terms in which Jesus instituted the Last Supper. The discussion on marriage and divorce in 1 Co 7 illustrates his attitude. On the one hand, in regard to the marriage of 'virgins,' he says frankly that he 'has no commandment of the Lord,' just as in reference to married life he has disclaimed any Divine authority (1 Co 7<sup>9</sup>); but in regard to divorce he takes a very different tone, because for that question he has the authority of the historical Jesus, whose deliverance on the subject he quotes. In like manner he claims to 'follow Christ,' meaning the historical Jesus, as the supreme example (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>), and urges his converts to do the like (Ph 2<sup>4f.</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>14</sup>, Eph 5<sup>1</sup>).

It is on the human manifestation of Christ that St. Paul's whole gospel is based—'Christ died for our sins'; and it was as Jesus of Nazareth that He died; it was 'in the flesh' that He 'condemned sin,' 'in the body of the flesh' that God 'reconciled men to himself' (Col 1<sup>22</sup>). And the fact of His humanity is absolutely essential to the Apostle's theory of salvation. It provides the identification of the Redeemer with the race He would redeem, in all human experience save the consciousness of having sinned. It is wholly a mistake to represent the emphasis which St. Paul puts upon the Risen Christ as excluding interest in, or knowledge of, the historical Jesus; 'the heavenly man' had no meaning for him except for His being the same as 'the man Christ Jesus.'

And he leaves no room for doubt that the Christ of faith was one with the Jesus of the Gospels. He was 'born of a woman' (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>; cf. Job 14<sup>1</sup>). The phrase neither includes nor yet does it exclude a supernatural factor in the birth of Jesus; it asserts His true participation in our common humanity. He was 'born under law' (Gal 4<sup>4</sup>). Whether significance is to be attached to the absence of the article (Lightfoot) or not (Lietzmann), the context shows that it is His identification with the Jewish race that St. Paul is emphasizing. He is represented as a lineal descendant of David (Ro 1<sup>3</sup>), and an argument is founded upon His descent from Abraham (Gal 3<sup>16</sup>). This descent had special significance, inasmuch as by becoming 'a minister of circumcision' (or 'of the circumcision'; cf. 2 Co 3<sup>9</sup>) He confirmed the promises made to the forefathers of Israel (Ro 15<sup>8</sup>; cf. 2 Co 1<sup>0</sup>). So that it is one of the distinguishing privileges of Israel that the Messiah belongs to them 'as far as the flesh is concerned' (Ro 9<sup>5</sup>). In 2 Co 5<sup>16</sup>, where St. Paul repudiates, for the period subsequent to his conversion, any knowledge of 'Christ after the flesh,' he postulates at least the hypothetical possibility of his having known Him so, and probably refers to a claim which others founded upon their personal acquaintance with the historical Jesus.

There remain two passages of special importance for the light they shed on the Apostle's view of the constitution of our Lord's human personality. The first is in Ro 8<sup>3</sup>—ὁ θεὸς τὸν εαυτοῦ Υἱὸν πεμφσας ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας κτλ. The allusion to a pre-existent state from which God 'sent His own Son' (see below) is followed by the carefully chosen phrase 'in the likeness of sin's flesh' (cf. Ph 2<sup>7</sup> 'was made in the likeness of men'). It is possible, but it would be mistaken, to read these words as though their purpose was to assert that Christ was 'like' but only 'like' to men. What the phrase does convey is that the likeness is true and complete as far as it can be, sin being excepted. By the introduction of ὁμοίωμα St. Paul 'wishes to indicate not that Christ was not really man, or that His flesh was not really what in us is σὰρξ ἁμαρτίας, but that what for ordinary men is their natural condition is for this Person only an assumed condition' (Denney, ad loc.). The rendering of AV (also RV) 'of sinful flesh' gives a wrong impression and creates unnecessary difficulty. 'Of sin's flesh' refers to the physical constitution of man not as originally or inherently sinful—which was never St. Paul's view—but as it had come to be, historically and experimentally, an appanage of sin. Christ entered into humanity as it was conditioned by sin, tyrannized and enslaved by it—sin being regarded as an almost personal conqueror and tyrant.

But He who, according to Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, was thus made 'in the likeness of sin's flesh,' according to the second passage (Ro 1<sup>4</sup>) manifested, in contradistinction to all others who appeared in human form, 'a spirit of holiness'; and it was in harmony with that ethical uniqueness that a unique glory was assigned to Him, inasmuch as His death was followed by a Resurrection whereby He was declared (or installed) by God as 'Son of God with power.' Thenceforward His Messiahship was indubitable; it was demonstrated by the 'power' which was wielded by the Risen Lord. This passage, like the former one, starts with a possible allusion to the pre-existent Sonship (τοῦ Υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ), and at least suggests a state of humiliation as antecedent to the state of glory and power. There is at the same time no suggestion of a time at which Jesus became possessed of the 'spirit of holiness,' such as meets us in the Synoptic Gospels. Rather is the spirit referred to as 'the principle of personality in Jesus.' It is the 'spirit of holiness' which binds the earthly existence alike to what went before and to what came after (cf. Feine, Theol. des NT, 1910, p. 260). And the same thought may underlie the phrase in Ro 8<sup>3</sup>: 'the law (=principle) of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death.' ὁ νόμος here means 'authority' (so Sanday-Headlam), or in modern speech, the 'governing principle.' Sin and death are contrasted as governing principles with the living (and life-giving) spirit that was in Christ Jesus—the same 'spirit of holiness.'

The passage in Philippians (2<sup>5-11</sup>) which is chiefly valued for the light it throws on St. Paul's view of the pre-existent Christ has importance also for his view of the historical Jesus. He 'was found,' σχήματι ὡς ἄνθρωπος, i.e. in outward appearance, in all that presented itself to the senses, 'as a man'; and that because He was 'made in the likeness of men' (ἐν ομοιώματι ἀνθρώπων). But the description of the human manifestation opens with the phrase μορφὴν δούλου λαβών, by which the Apostle indicates something which, while going deeper than the σχῆμα or the ομοίωμα, yet does not touch the essential personality. Christ, that is to say, entered upon a real, but not a permanent, servitude. In what sense? It will not suffice to say, with Lightfoot (ad loc.), 'For ἄνθρωπος the stronger word δοῦλος is substituted. He who is Master of all becomes the slave of all.' For this gives insufficient distinctness to the two clauses, and inadequate force to the former one. It is more probable that the two clauses, μορφὴν δούλου λαβών and ἐν ομοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος are parallel in reverse order to the two clauses in Gal 4<sup>1</sup>, γενομένου ἐκ γυναικός and γενόμενον ὑπὸ νομον; and the power to which St. Paul declares that Jesus submitted Himself as δοῦλος is the Law and the whole dispensation of which it was the symbol. He voluntarily placed Himself under its yoke, made Himself 'a debtor to keep the whole law.' It was in virtue of this submission that He could undergo its curse, be 'made a curse for us,' and redeem us (Jews) from 'the curse of the law.' This subjection to the Law was thus a special case of Christ's submission to the disabilities of 'the flesh,' through which He could be 'made sin' for us (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>). The σάρξ which He assumed was truly human flesh; it was, for such it had come to be historically, 'sin's flesh'—flesh that was in the grasp of sin. He 'knew no sin' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>), and yet in His case the σάρξ was the medium of sin's assault upon Him. It brought Him into relation, a relation always hostile, with the whole series of forces which were opposed to God, the forces which were in control of 'this present world,' the 'principalities and powers' (Col 2<sup>15</sup>), the 'world' rulers of this darkness (Eph 6<sup>12</sup>). And it was in, by means of, this σάρξ that He 'condemned sin,' that He 'triumphed' over the hostile powers, stripping them off from Himself along with the σάρξ, when on the Cross He died from under the control of 'the spiritual forces of the world' (Col 2<sup>15, 20</sup>).

Thus the historical man, Jesus of Nazareth, was a fact of cardinal importance for St. Paul, not only as an authority supreme in the realm of conduct, but as embodying the conditions by which alone redemption could be accomplished.

C. The pre-existent Christ.—The material for ascertaining St. Paul's conception of Christ is now nearly complete. By far the larger part of it refers to the 'post-existent' Christ, the Lord in glory. Another element, smaller in extent, but not for that reason unimportant, has to do with the historic Jesus. There remains a third element consisting of allusions to Christ as having been existent and active before He appeared on earth. That element is certainly present both in the mind and in the language of St. Paul. The difficult and delicate task is to weigh its importance, and to account for its presence in his thinking.

The evidence is unevenly distributed. In the four 'chief' Epistles we have a number of allusions; in each of two of the 'captivity' Epistles, Philippians and Colossians, we find an explicit statement. The allusions in the earlier Epistles are, if anything, more important than the statements in the later ones; for they suggest that St. Paul was dealing with a conception regarding Christ which was already familiar, which, so far from requiring to be proved, was widely accepted as a necessary inference from other facts. Further, the references are 'so incidental as to suggest the inference that, while intimately related to his own deepest convictions about Christ, this doctrine formed no part of his formal teaching, until, at least, the necessity for it arose in the special circumstances of the Church at Colosse' (Somerville, op. cit. p. 185; cf. Beyschlag, NT Theol., Eng. tr., 1895, ii. 78). The language of Gal 4<sup>1</sup> ('God sent forth his Son') and Ro 8<sup>3</sup> ('God, sending his Son in the likeness of sin's flesh') implies this previous existence for the Son, an existence under different conditions, with which subjection to the Law and participation of flesh are contrasted. Consistently with this suggestion the Apostle in 2 Co 8<sup>9</sup> alludes to the fact that 'he who was rich, for our sakes became poor,' a phrase which links up with the statement in Philippians, inasmuch as it traces the impoverishment to the action of Christ Himself. In 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> there is a suggestion of the idea which is developed in Colossians, where St. Paul speaks of 'one Lord, Jesus Christ, by whom are all things and we by him'; and in 1 Co 15<sup>27, 48</sup>, though it is in His Exaltation that He is recognized as the 'Second Adam,' yet as contrasted with the first Adam, who belongs to earth, He is represented as belonging to heaven, and being 'the heavenly one.' Indirectly, the language of 1 Co 10<sup>4</sup> involves the same idea ('They drank of that spiritual rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ'); but the immediate significance of the saying is that the Apostle puts 'Christ' where Jewish legend had put 'Jahweh.'

We come now to the two passages in which St. Paul appears to make detailed allusion to the pre-existent Christ. The first is in Ph 2<sup>4-11</sup>. The first point to notice is the context. Not only is the example of Christ appealed to as a ground and norm for Christian humility, and the duty of each one 'looking not on his own things but on the things of others,' but the conclusion also of the whole passage is relevant, inasmuch as it displays the Exaltation of Christ as a supreme illustration of God's recognition of this spirit of self-effacement: διὸ καὶ ὁ θεὸς αὐτὸν ὑπερύψωσεν. To illustrate the true character of Christian humility St. Paul refers to the action of Christ, which took place before His appearance upon earth. And again the description is calculated to remind rather than to inform; it is penned for them who already know (Dibelius, ad loc.). Christ had been originally (ὑπάρχων) ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ. What sense are we to attach to this phrase? Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 127 fl.), after an exhaustive examination of the use of the words μορφή and σχῆμα in philosophic literature, comes to the conclusion that μορφή 'must apply to the attributes of the God-head,' that it implies not the external accidents but the essential attributes, so that the possession of μορφή involves participation in the ουσία also.

'Thus in the passage under consideration the μορφή is contrasted with the σχῆμα, as that which is intrinsic and essential with that which is accidental and outward. And the three clauses imply respectively the true divine nature of our Lord (μορφή θεοῦ), the true human nature (μορφή δούλου), and the externals of human nature (σχῆματι ὡς ἄνθρωπος).'

With the interpretation of μορφή goes the explanation of εἶναι ἰσα θεῷ, 'equality with God,' as something which was already Christ's possession but which He refused to regard as a prize to be tentaciously held (οὐχ ἀρπαγυὶν ἡγήσατο); but so far from this, He divested Himself (ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτὸν) not of His Divine nature, for this was impossible, but of the glories, the prerogatives of Deity. This He did by taking upon Him the form of a servant.

This interpretation is open to several objections. —(i.) In effect it reads into St. Paul's language the conclusions of a later Christology, inasmuch as the meaning which it gives to μορφή (as involving essential participation in the ουσία or substance) must be carried through in both clauses, and we get consequently a personality which has taken the substance of humanity without laying aside that of Deity. (ii.) It gives a forced meaning to δοῦλον, and at the same time an inadequate one; for if the word means no more than 'man,' we have an inexplicable tautology—three, or at least two, clauses in succession which make no advance in the thought. (iii.) It gives an unsatisfactory rendering to ἀπαγκυβός, which is rather 'a thing to be clutched at' than 'a thing to be held.'

For these and other reasons the other interpretation is to be preferred, according to which St. Paul is using the terms μορφή, σχήμα, etc., in a popular sense rather than as philosophic terms, and μορφή means 'form,' which is separable from essence, though more truly characteristic than σχήμα; in the case of Christ the μορφή θεοῦ stands for 'the glory which he had with the Father.' Having this glorious form as a Spirit-Being, the Image of God, He might have grasped at the yet higher prize to be 'equal unto God.' But (here comes in the parallel with what is expected of Christians) He refused to look on His own things, and for the sake of others (men) emptied Himself of the heavenly spiritual form, took the form of one who was subject to inferior powers, including possibly the Law, and humbled Himself to the last stage of humiliation, the death on the Cross. And therefore (here comes in the parallel with what the self-effacing Christian may expect) God has highly exalted Him, has conferred upon Him the very equality which He refused to grasp, bestowing upon Him the name that is above every name, that 'every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord.'

The Christological passage in Philippians assumes the pre-existence of Christ; the second passage, in Colossians (1<sup>15-18</sup>), states it (αὐτός ἐστιν πρὸ πάντων), and founds on it a doctrine of the relation between Christ and all created beings. He is 'the firstborn of every creature' (AV, not RV), antecedent to them all. It is not necessary to extend the scope of St. Paul's language here so as to include what we call 'Nature,' inanimate creation. The meaning of 'all things' is not wider than 'every creature,' and, so far as 'the unseen' among the 'all things' are concerned, they are here described as living intelligences—'thrones, principalities, powers, dominions,' i.e. angelic powers in 'the heavenlies.' It is only such living intelligences that are capable of being 'reconciled to him' (v.-9). And it is of them that St. Paul says that they all, whether on earth or in heaven, whether seen or unseen, were created 'in' Christ, 'through' Christ, and 'unto' Christ, that 'in Him' they have still the basis of their existence (τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνεστήκεν). They were created 'in Christ' (not 'by') as the sphere within which the Divine will operates for salvation; 'through Him' as the agent for the effecting of the same purpose; and 'unto Him' as the end or goal of their history, which provides the norm of their experience.

What we have here is in fact the half-defined working of the idea which found definite expression in the Logos-Christology of the Fourth Gospel. Here, if anywhere, St. Paul betrays the influence of speculations which are best known to us through the works of Philo. The words εἰκὼν, πρωτότοκος, συνέστηκεν, are all employed by Philo for the exposition of the relation of the Logos to the origin and maintenance of created things. How this conception and the nomenclature reached St. Paul, it is impossible to say. There was enough in the OT doctrine of Wisdom as co-operative with God in the work of creation to furnish a foundation for the conception. Details and the terms he employs may have reached him through the cosmological speculations of the false teachers. They interposed between God and His world, as agents of creation and intermediaries of Divine working, the hierarchy of unseen spirit-forces. St. Paul may have been dealing a blow to right and to left when he said in effect, to one school of thought, 'your Logos is our Christ,' to another, 'your spirit-forces were called into being by Him and have their very existence conditioned by Him.'

It remains to call attention to two general facts of a character apparently opposite to those we have been considering. (α) St. Paul never gives to Christ the name or description of 'God.' Two passages have been appealed to as proving that he does: (i.) 2 Th 1<sup>12</sup> κατὰ τὴν χάριν τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, 'according to the grace of our God and (the) Lord Jesus Christ.' It seems natural at first sight to take this phrase as describing one Person, Jesus Christ, as both God and Lord. But according to the practically unanimous opinion of modern commentators (B. Weiss, Dibelius, ad loc. in Handbuch zum NT, 1911), the phrase must be treated as a double one referring to God and Christ (so AV and RV). (ii.) Ro 9<sup>5</sup> ἐξ ὧν ὁ Χριστὸς τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, ὁ ὢν ἐπὶ πάντων θεὸς εὐδοχῆτος εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας. Both AV and RV render 'Christ . . . who is over all, God blessed for ever.' WH in the margin of their Gr. text put a colon after σάρκα, Hort remarking that this alone 'seems adequate to account for the whole of the language employed, more especially when it is considered in relation to the context.' Westcott adds that 'the juxtaposition of ὁ Χριστὸς κατὰ σάρκα and ὁ ὢν κτλ. seems to make a change of subject improbable,' indicating his opinion that it is Christ who is described as 'God over all'; Sanday-Headlam also, after a full discussion of the passage, take the doxology as ascribed to Christ; so also B. Weiss, but in the sense that not Godhead but Divine Exaltation is postulated for Him.

Not so the later commentators, who for the most part find here a doxology addressed to God, 'God who is over all be blessed for evermore.' Evidence of a grammatical or linguistic character is evenly balanced in favour of the two renderings; but in favour of the latter there is the strong general reason that on the other interpretation we should have a phrase which would inevitably infringe St. Paul's monotheism and challenge the monotheism of his readers. And, reviewing the whole of his utterances regarding Christ, the total impression is that of a monotheistic conviction consistently resisting the impulse to do this very thing—to call Jesus God. On the other hand, nothing, not even the Cross, could have offered a greater stumbling-block to the people whom St. Paul was seeking to influence than the proclamation of a second God. And the entire absence from the NT of any indication of opposition to such teaching, or of necessity to explain teaching which would be so distasteful, points conclusively in the same direction.

(β) This conclusion is borne out by the second general consideration, viz. the frequent and emphatic references in St. Paul to the subordination of the Son. In 1 Co 3<sup>-4</sup> we have the striking climax, 'All things are yours, for ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's'; cf. 1 Co 11<sup>3</sup> 'the head of every man is Christ; the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God.' The very name of 'Son' implies a measure of subordination, and even the supreme Exaltation of the Son when every tongue shall 'confess that Jesus Christ is Lord' (Ph 2<sup>11</sup>) is 'to the glory of God the Father.' The same idea underlies the representation of Christ as the organ of God's revelation, of creation, of reconciliation.

And it is brought out with almost startling force in 1 Co 15<sup>3</sup> 'When all things shall have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all.'

Whether St. Paul was ever conscious of the problem which his Christology thus presents, it is impossible to say. He held with equal conviction and emphasis two propositions which seem contradictory: 'There is one God and Father of all, who is above all and through all, and in you all,' and 'Christ is God for me'; and perhaps they find their synthesis in that saying which is at once the simplest and the profoundest account of the whole matter: 'God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself' (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>).

4. The First Epistle of Peter.—This Epistle opens with a phrase ('the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' 1<sup>3</sup>; cf. 2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>, Eph 1<sup>3</sup>) which puts its Christology on the same plane with what was central in the Christology of St. Paul, but at the same time common to the primitive community (see Hort's notes ad loc.). But its predominantly practical character does not offer the opportunity for developing the Christological conception in detail. There is no reference to Christ as Son of God (except indirectly in the phrase quoted above), as Son of Man, or as Spirit. The word 'Christ' is frequently used as a proper name, sometimes in combination with 'Jesus,' sometimes by itself. The starting-point of Christian 'hope' and of Christian experience is the Resurrection of Christ (1<sup>3</sup>); but that experience is described in terms of re-birth, recalling the language of the Fourth Gospel (cf. 1 P 1<sup>3, 23</sup> with Jn 3<sup>3 1-13</sup>). The goal of Christian hope is 'the revelation of Jesus Christ' (1 P 1<sup>7, 13</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>; cf. 1<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>). In the interval the supreme religious duty of Christians is to 'sanctify in their hearts Christ as Lord' (3<sup>15</sup> RV). St. Peter is here quoting (and adapting) the language of Is 8<sup>1-13</sup> in the LXX version, which concludes with Κυριον αὐτὸν ἀγιασάτε. Whatever be the precise way in which his words should be rendered, the significant thing is that he substitutes the word Χριστον for the αὐτόν by which the prophet meant Jahweh. He demands for Christ the same reverence, submission, and dependence as the prophet claimed for God, and he makes the rendering of these the central thing in religion. In 2<sup>3</sup> we find a similar application to Christ of the language of Ps 34<sup>9</sup>.

Christ 'is at the right hand of God, having gone into heaven (cf. Ac 3<sup>21</sup>), angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him' (3<sup>2</sup>). For 'God has raised him from the dead, and given him glory' (1<sup>1</sup>); cf. Ac 3<sup>13</sup> ἐδοξασεν τον παῖδα αὐτου and Is 52<sup>13</sup> LXX ο παῖς μου δοξασθησεται σφόδρα. This glorified Christ is the 'chief shepherd' (5<sup>4</sup>), the 'shepherd and overseer of your souls' (2<sup>25</sup>), by a figure which, though familiar in the OT (e.g. Ps 23, Zec 13<sup>7</sup>, Is 40<sup>11</sup>) and also in the Gospels (e.g. Mt 9<sup>36</sup>, Jn 10) and in the Epistle to the Hebrews (13<sup>4</sup>), is never applied to Christ by St. Paul. It is possible that St. Peter also represents Him as 'ready to judge the quick and the dead' (4<sup>5</sup>), though in 1<sup>17</sup> it is God who is the Judge.

The Epistle is distinguished from all other documents of the NT in that it appears to assign to Christ a redeeming activity in the interval between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. 'Being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the Spirit, in which also he went and preached to the spirits in prison' (3<sup>18, 19</sup>); cf. 4<sup>6</sup> 'the gospel was preached to the dead also.' The idea of our Lord's descent into Sheol and temporary abode there underlies the interpretation put by St. Peter upon Ps 16<sup>10</sup> in Ac 2<sup>31</sup> and is possibly reflected in Eph 4<sup>9</sup> (cf. Lk 23<sup>43</sup>). But the exposition which is given to it in the Epistle is probably due to the influence of speculation, traces of which are found in apocalyptic writings, concerning the ultimate fate of fallen spirits in the under world. The Book of Enoch in particular, acquaintance with which is traceable elsewhere in this Epistle (cf. 1<sup>1</sup> with En. 1-), deals with this subject in several passages (60<sup>2</sup> 64 69-6, ed. Charles) and hints at an opportunity of repentance allowed to sinners of the antediluvian period between the first judgment of the Deluge and the final one. En. 69-6, referring apparently, after a long interpolation, to the fallen angels of ch. 64, says, 'There was great joy among them, and they blessed and glorified because the name of the Son of Man was revealed unto them.' The reference to Noah in both contexts makes it highly probable that the Enoch literature is the source of the special idea behind the passages in 1 Peter. Christ was understood to have preached 'to the Spirits in prison' in fulfilment of the expectation that the name of the Son of Man would be revealed to them.

Concerning the historic Christ the Epistle declares, quoting Is 53<sup>9</sup>, that 'he did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth' (2-); it refers to Him as 'a lamb without spot and blameless' (1<sup>19</sup>), as 'rejected of men' but 'chosen of God' (2<sup>4</sup>), as the 'righteous' who died 'for the unrighteous' (3<sup>18</sup>). Special emphasis is laid upon His patient endurance of suffering as an example to be followed by all Christians (2<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>1-13</sup>); and of these sufferings the writer claims to be a 'witness,' possibly meaning an eye-witness (5<sup>1</sup> μαρτυς τῶν τοῦ Χριστοῦ παθημάτων). In fact, the Epistle testifies to the thorough working out of that analogy between the suffering servant in Isaiah and the crucified Messiah, the pregnant use of which has been noted in St. Peter's speeches in Acts.

The Christological figure which belongs to the Petrine speeches of Acts and the First Epistle of Peter distinctively, being traceable elsewhere only in a few primitive liturgical passages, . . . is the Isaian figure of the suffering Servant of Yahweh' (B. W. Bacon, Jesus the Son of God, 1911, p. 100).

Those who find in this Epistle the doctrine of the pre-existent Christ rely on two passages—1<sup>11</sup> and 1<sup>20</sup>. In the first of these the prophets are said to have searched 'what time, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them (τὸ ἐν αὐτοῖς πνεῦμα Χριστοῦ) did signify'; and it is inferred that the writer ascribes their inspiration to the Spirit of the (pre-existent) Christ. But both in this clause and in the following one 'Christ' probably stands for 'Messiah'; and the meaning is, 'what time . . . the Messiah-spirit in them did signify when it testified beforehand the sufferings leading up to (or destined for) Messiah.' This is the view of Hort (First Ep. of Peter, 1898, p. 53), who adduces as parallels Is 61<sup>1</sup>, Ps 105<sup>15</sup>, 2 S 23<sup>1</sup> LXX, and remarks:

'It must be remembered that the sharp distinction which we are accustomed to make between the prophet on the one side and the Messiah of whom he speaks on the other does not exist in the OT itself. The prophet, the people to whom he belongs and to whom he speaks, and the dimly seen Head and King of the people, all pass insensibly one into the other in the language of prophecy; they all are partakers of the Divine anointing, and the Messiahship which is conferred by it.'

In the second passage (1<sup>20</sup>) Christ is described as 'foreknown before the foundation of the world, but manifested at the end of the times' (προεγνωσμένον μὲν πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου), from which it is argued that both the implication of the word 'manifested' and its correlation with 'foreknown' strongly favour the idea of personal pre-existence. But this argument probably lays an unjustifiable stress on the etymology of προεγνωσμενον, and overlooks the significance suggested by its usage. The meaning 'to have prescience of' does not well suit either this passage or Ro 8-9 (οὐς προέγνω καὶ προωρίσεν) or Ro 11<sup>2</sup> (οὗκ ἀπώσαστο ὁ θεὸς τον λαὸν αὐτου διν προγνω). So Hort points out (ad loc.), and adds: 'a comparison of these passages suggests that in them προγεννώσκω means virtually pre-recognition, designation to a function or position' (cf. Jer 1<sup>5</sup>, Is 49<sup>5</sup>). The idea of the designation of the Messiah in the counsel of God before all worlds is expressed more or less distinctly in other language in Eph 1<sup>3</sup>, 10, Col 1<sup>26</sup>, and does not necessarily imply pre-existence for the Messiah. The same idea is illustrated in this Epistle in 1<sup>2</sup>, according to which the recipients of the letter are 'saints according to the foreknowledge of God' (κατὰ πρόγνωσιν Θεοῦ). It is probable therefore that the Epistle does not contain any reference to the pre-existent Christ.

As a whole it displays this perplexing combination—the presence of linguistic echoes of Pauline phraseology, and the absence of everything that is specifically Pauline in thought. We look in vain for any reference to justification or reconciliation, to the mystical participation in Christ's death and resurrection or the union between Christ and the believer, to Christ as the Son of God or as 'sent into the world from a pre-existent state.' There are lines of connexion with the Epistle to the Hebrews, e.g. the superiority of Christ to angels (3<sup>22</sup>; cf. Bacon, op. cit. p. 91), the conception of faith approximating to hope, the reference to 'sprinkling' (1-), and the description of Christ as 'Shepherd' (2<sup>25</sup>). But the Epistle, especially in its Christology, stands distinctly nearer to the common primitive basis than to Paulinism in its present form.

*The writer is by no means a Paulinist. His attitude is rather that of the common practical consciousness pervading the churches—a consciousness which was prior to Paul, and in which Paulinism, for the most part, operated merely as a ferment. The proper appreciation of this central popular Christianity in the apostolic age is vital to the proper focus for viewing the early Christian literature' (Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 330 f.).

5. The Epistle to the Hebrews.—This Epistle contributes a very original development of the primitive conception of Christ in closest connexion with a special view of the character of His redeeming work. The address of the Epistle 'to Hebrews' is probably as misleading as its traditional ascription to St. Paul as its author was mistaken. And it is a great gain to NT theology that it is now examined apart from any of the former pre-suppositions as to either authorship or address. The phenomena of the Epistle 'converge on the conclusion that Paul had nothing to do with it; the style and religious characteristics put his direct authorship out of the question, and even the mediating hypotheses which associate Apollos or Philip or Luke with him are shattered upon the non-Pauline cast of speculation which determines the theology' (Moffatt, LNT, p. 428). Compared with the letters of St. Paul it runs far more on the lines of a rhetorical address, and may have been intended in the first place for a quite small and homogeneous community of Christians, not specially distinguished by either Jewish or Gentile origin and proclivities. In its fundamental purpose it is 'a word of exhortation' (13-), and its key-note is struck in 2<sup>1-4</sup>, especially 2<sup>3</sup>, 'how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' The Christian salvation is seen to be 'so great,' because after an exhaustive comparison between it and the salvation offered under the OT covenant, it is seen to be superior at every point, and this most conspicuously in the Person of Him through whom it has been mediated (9<sup>15</sup>; cf. 7<sup>22</sup> 12-4).

What is most characteristic in the Christology of Hebrews is that each of the two normative elements in the primitive conception of Christ—the reality of His human nature and experiences, and the glorious efficacy of His Divine Sonship—is reiterated and developed with a new emphasis and with new detail. This is specially true of the Divine Sonship, which, even more than the High-priesthood, expresses for the writer the highest claim for Christ. This is the subject into which he bursts without any preface, in the opening sentences of his letter. God, the same who spoke to the fathers by the prophets, has spoken to us by 'the Son,' whom He has 'made the heir of all things,' 'by whom also He made the worlds.' The description which follows, of the Son as 'the effulgence of his glory, the expression of his essence,' makes clear at once that the Sonship is conceived in the absolute sense, and this is the case throughout (1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>5</sup> 5<sup>6</sup> 8 7<sup>28</sup>), probably even where the full phrase (ο υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ) is employed (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>3</sup> 10<sup>29</sup>). As Son He is already κρείττων γενόμενος τῶν ἀγγέλων (1<sup>4</sup>), and as Son, who through the Resurrection has become πρωτότοκος, i.e. Representative and Head of the whole family of God, He is to be again brought into the world (1<sup>6</sup>), when His eternal glory and sovereignty will be yet more conspicuously displayed. It would not be safe to infer, however, that the author intended all the language of the OT passages which he proceeds to quote to apply literally and specifically to Christ; and in particular the quotation from Ps 45 ('Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever,' 1<sup>8</sup> RV; see marg.) is of such uncertain interpretation, both in the LXX and here, that it cannot be claimed as proof that the writer addressed Christ as θεός (see Westcott, ad loc.). Nevertheless, the successive clauses of the opening paragraph point to One who belongs to the eternal order, and holds at once a unique and a universal relation to all created things. The timeless character of the Son's existence is indirectly brought out by the analogy of Melchizedek, who 'having neither beginning nor end of days,' is therein 'made like unto the Son of God' (7<sup>3</sup>).

In all this there is both likeness and unlikeness to the Christology of St. Paul—likeness in the conception of Sonship as involving radiant revelation (cf. εἰκὼν τοῦ Θεοῦ) of Christ as connected with the creation and sustaining of all created being (1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>, Col 1<sup>16</sup>); unlikeness, if not in substance, yet in the greater sweep and definiteness of the conception and in the probable extension of meaning here given to τα πάντα. While in both cases the passage in Wis. (7-<sup>sup</sup>) has unmistakably left its mark on the language, in the case of Heb. we must probably allow also for the influence of Philo's elaboration of the same nexus of ideas.

But there is a deeper distinction in the use of the Sonship-conception as between St. Paul and Hebrews. There is nothing in the latter corresponding to the note of tenderness and intimate affection which St. Paul seems to have recognized in the relationship (e.g. Ro 8<sup>3</sup> 3<sup>2</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>). The 'Sonship' in Hebrews shows not so much a change of quality from the official Messianic conception as an extension of it into a timeless past. And this is confirmed by the absence from the Epistle of any reference to God as the Father whether of Christ or of men in Christ. St. Paul's pregnant phrase, 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,' makes no appearance; nor do we find 'our Lord Jesus Christ' at all, but in its stead the very rare ὁ κύριος ἡμῶν (7<sup>14</sup> 13-9; otherwise only in 1 Ti 1<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 P 3<sup>18</sup>).

This 'Son' has now entered into 'heaven itself' (9<sup>24</sup>; cf. 4<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>25</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>2</sup>, Ac 3-1, 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>), and taken His seat 'at the right hand of the majesty on high' (1<sup>8</sup>; cf. 8<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 12<sup>3</sup>). But He has entered not only as the glorified Messiah, the Lord, who exercises kingly rule, but also as the great High Priest, in whom the high priests (and priests) of the old dispensation, with the whole system of sacrifices and purifications which they represent, find their antitype and consummation.

(1) The High-Priesthood.—Just as in the Synoptic Gospels the Messiahship, so here the High-Priesthood, is a function of the Sonship. It is presented in two aspects: first, as typified in the Levitical High-Priesthood; and second, as typified in the Priest-King Melchizedek. The title ιερεύς (ἀρχιερεύς), which in this Epistle alone of the books of the NT is applied to Christ, appears quite abruptly at 2<sup>17</sup> and again at 3<sup>1</sup>, but its contents are developed from 4<sup>14</sup> onwards. Christ corresponds with the type, the Levitical High-Priesthood, in that He too is able 'to bear gently with the ignorant and errant' (5-; cf. 4<sup>10</sup>), in that He too holds the office by Divine appointment (5<sup>5,6</sup>), and in that He provides an effective offering and purification for sins (7<sup>21</sup>; cf. 13<sup>217</sup>). But to this Priesthood He is superior in that He requires not to make any offering for His own sins (7<sup>27</sup>); and by a single offering, the offering of His body once for all (10<sup>10</sup>), He 'has perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (10<sup>14</sup>). But, argues the writer, it would be a mistake to stop short at the analogy of the Levitical priesthood, when there is another equally applicable, and itself belonging to a higher category. 'Leaving the story of the beginning of the Christ (the first stage), let us be borne on to His culmination (6<sup>1</sup>); though it be a long story we have to tell, and one difficult of interpretation' (5<sup>11</sup>). The culmination of the Priesthood of Christ followed on His Exaltation, when He became a 'priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek' (6<sup>0</sup>; cf. 5<sup>9π</sup>, 7<sup>28</sup>). That is to say, the writer agrees with St. Paul in ascribing a great accession of power and dignity to Christ consequent upon the [Resurrection and] Exaltation, but he applies to Christ as Priest the enhancement of significance which St. Paul applies to Him as 'Son of God' (Ro 1<sup>4</sup>).

This Priesthood after a new 'order,' corresponding to the 'better covenant' of which Christ was the Mediator and the Pledge (7<sup>2</sup>-9<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>-4</sup>), transcended every other form of priesthood in that (a) it was 'after the power of an endless life' (7<sup>16</sup>); (b) it was confirmed by an oath of God (7<sup>22</sup>, 28); (c) the type to which it conformed included kingly as well as priestly functions and prerogatives, and moreover could be shown by a historical illustration to be superior to the Levitical priesthood (7<sup>1-10</sup>); and (d) it was unchallengeable, unique, absolute (7<sup>-4</sup> ἀπαράβατος; see Westcott ad loc.). Such a High Priest, 'holy, harmless, undefiled' in personal character, 'separated from sinners' and 'higher than the heavens' in regard to the conditions of His existence, is One who answers to human need (7<sup>28</sup>). There 'he ever liveth to make intercession' (7<sup>-5</sup>; cf. 7<sup>2</sup>-9<sup>14</sup>); through Him men offer 'the sacrifice of praise to God' (13<sup>15</sup>); and for them He secures access to 'the holy place' (4<sup>18</sup>; cf. 10<sup>19-22</sup>). These priestly functions He continues to exercise; but 'the modern conception of Christ pleading in heaven His Passion, "offering His blood," on behalf of men has no foundation in the Epistle. His glorified humanity is the eternal pledge of the absolute efficacy of His accomplished work. He pleads, as older writers truly expressed the thought, by His Presence on the Father's Throne' (Westcott, Hebrews, 1889, p. 230).

(2) The historical Jesus.—This conception of the eternal representation of humanity in the presence of God as an essential part of Christ's redeeming function is related to the emphasis on the reality of His human nature, which runs through the Epistle, concurrent with the emphasis on His Divine glory and dignity. The human name 'Jesus' appears with marked frequency and emphasis, nine times in all, and in nearly every case is placed emphatically at the end of a clause. Though there is no reference to the birth of Jesus, and only one to His Resurrection (13<sup>-9</sup>), stress is laid upon His death as a death of suffering (29<sup>-10</sup>), and the scene in Gethsemane as well as the locality of the Crucifixion are indicated with unexampled detail (5<sup>7π</sup>, 12<sup>3</sup>). In character He is described as

'holy, harmless, undefiled' (7<sup>-6</sup>), and 'faithful to him that appointed him' (3-). He Himself was 'made for a season lower than the angels' (29-), and is specifically described as a sharer in 'the blood and flesh of men' (2<sup>14</sup>), seeing that 'it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren' (2<sup>17</sup>). In particular, the likeness in experience extended to temptation, and the temptation was such as arose from His likeness to men, though there was no sin either as its cause or as its result (2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>15</sup>). The writer does not shrink from ascribing to His human nature progress and also weakness and shrinking from death: 'in the days of his flesh . . . though he was Son yet learned he obedience through the things which he suffered'; 'he offered prayers and supplications to him that was able to save him from death with strong crying and tears' (5<sup>7-10</sup>).

The author does not, however, even in this passage (καὶ τελειωθείς) teach that Christ was delivered from moral infirmity, and so made morally perfect. A study of the word τελειωσις and its cognates, as used in the Epistle, shows that it connotes 'complete development,' arriving at the destined end, consummation. 'To "make perfect" does not mean to endow with all excellent qualities, but to bring to the end, that is, the appropriate or appointed end, the end corresponding to the idea' (A. B. Davidson, ad loc.). Here the idea is adequacy to be the Author of Salvation (2<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>), or Sanctifier (2<sup>11</sup>), or High Priest (7<sup>-8</sup>; cf. 6<sup>1</sup>). It is in this sense that Christ was 'made perfect,' and that 'through suffering'; and in this sense that He is the Author [or Pioneer] and Perfecter of faith (12-).

6. The Johannine literature.—It is now commonly understood that the Fourth Gospel contains two elements, combined in proportions which are still uncertain—history and its religious interpretation. And these so interpenetrate one another that not only is it difficult to separate them, but the form given to the history is in a lesser or greater degree affected by the interpretation. What we are concerned with here is the conception of Christ which gave rise to the interpretation, and left its mark on the historical material. At least the first of the Johannine Epistles, proceeding from the same source, adds its witness to the same conception.

The Christology of the Johannine literature is remarkable, in the first place, for the combination and reproduction of practically all the elements which had emerged in the earlier documents of the NT. Christ is presented as Messiah (Son of God, Son of Man), Son, Priest, Judge, and Creator, and also as adequately replaced by the Spirit. The combination is the more remarkable when justice is done to the large measure of independence among the documents in which these aspects of Christ are severally emphasized. The various lines which radiate from the common centre of primitive conceptions are brought together again in the Johannine Christology. Only the title Κυριος practically disappears (except in 20<sup>28</sup>) from the Gospel and the Epistles alike, a fact in which Bousset (op. cit. p. 187) sees the effect of the same deep mysticism which claims for the disciples the position of friends.

But though these elements are present in the same form, their connotation is modified in comparison with the earlier writings. Each of them has undergone a subtle change, partly in consequence of their being subsumed under one general conception, and partly because of the character of that over-ruling principle, which is commonly but inadequately described as the 'Logos-idea.' One general rule applies to, and partly explains, these subtle changes. The Johannine conception of Christ differs from those that had gone before in that it is static, not dynamic. All that Christ has since become to the Church or been discovered to be, He must have been from the beginning. That eternal and intrinsic relation to God towards the expression of which other writers had been moving, has now become the central and governing idea, in the light of which all His other relations, all His functions, are beheld and set. And there is no need, because there is no room, for the recognition of crises in His experience, such as the Baptism and the Transfiguration, or 'being declared the Son of God with power,' or being 'made a priest for ever' at the Exaltation. The only change allowed for is a change of form, at the beginning from the Logos to the Logos made flesh, and again at the end from the human manifestation to the spiritual condition of being.

The writer distinctly states the purpose he had in view when composing his Gospel (20<sup>31</sup>): 'these [signs] are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name.' But the two titles have interchanged their relative importance. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is 'Son of God' because He is Messiah, in accordance with the interpretation of Ps 2<sup>7</sup>. Here He is Messiah because He is Son of God. And the Sonship is uniformly conceived as a relation, intrinsic, unique, and eternal, involving and resting upon essential unity with the Father (1<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>10</sup> etc.).

'The idea of Sonship, which in Paul is carefully subordinated to a strict monotheism, is accepted in its full extent. In the generation succeeding Paul the name "Son of God" had gradually assumed the more definite meaning which the Greek language and forms of thought attached to it. The Fourth Evangelist employs it deliberately in the sense which it would convey to the ordinary Greek mind. Jesus as the Son was Himself of the same nature as the Father. All the divine powers and attributes devolved on Him in virtue of His inherent birthright as Son of God' (E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 1906, p. 194).

As Son, Christ is now in heaven, whither He has ascended (3<sup>13</sup>); He is 'in the bosom of the Father' (1<sup>18</sup>). But He is also with and in the Church on earth. He has returned, in a very real sense, though not 'with the clouds of heaven.' And the story of His life on earth is written from the point of view of those who know Him to be, and to have been all along, the Son of God from heaven (3<sup>17-31</sup> etc.). He has been recognized as Divine, and Divine in such a sense that even in His human manifestation He retained attributes of Godhead. Omniscience is not obscurely claimed for Him (1<sup>48</sup> 2<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>17-39</sup>); and His miracles are not so much works of mercy as signs (σημεία) of supernatural power.

The miracles are specially represented as attesting His claim to be Messiah (10<sup>38</sup>). And that claim is made for Him (1<sup>41-45</sup>) from the very outset of His Ministry, and by Himself (4<sup>-6</sup> 10<sup>37</sup>), in the plainest terms; while belief that He is the Messiah is represented as the condition of salvation (8<sup>24</sup>; cf. 10<sup>35</sup>). From the beginning also He exercises His Messianic authority (e.g. in the cleansing of the Temple, 2<sup>13-17</sup>), and 'reveals his [divine] glory' (2<sup>11</sup>). The Baptist points to the descent of the Spirit 'as a dove from heaven' (1<sup>32-34</sup>) as the proof of His Messiahship, not as the occasion of its inauguration.

The title 'Son of Man' also reappears in the Fourth Gospel (12 times), and still as the self-designation of Jesus. It retains what is probably the most significant feature of its use in the Synoptic Gospels, viz. the suggestion of contrast; but whereas in the Synoptic Gospels the contrast may be either between the real glory of the Messiah and the lowliness of His appearance or between the real lowliness of Jesus and the glory of His future, here it is uniformly the latter (1<sup>51</sup> 'Hereafter ye shall see heaven opened and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man'; 12<sup>33</sup> 13<sup>31</sup> 'Now is the Son of man glorified'). This is still the case in the three instances which refer to the lifting up of Christ (3<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>28</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>), where the 'lifting up' involves not the Crucifixion alone but the Crucifixion as the preliminary to power and glory. Viewed as one factor in the Johannine conception of Christ, the title lays stress on the weakness, humility, and obscurity of His earthly manifestation.

But the Messiahship itself is looked at through the experience of intervening years. The transmutation of eschatology has already been accomplished. The Kingdom of God is such that it can be seen, and entered, only by those who have been 'born again,' those who are 'spirit' (3<sup>3-5</sup>). It follows that the function of the Messiah in relation to that Kingdom is differently conceived. It is to declare the Father (1<sup>18</sup>), to give that knowledge of God which itself 'is life eternal' (17<sup>3</sup>).

To Christ is assigned here also the function of Judge; but it is no longer that of iudex futurus. His presence in the world acts already as a κρίσις (3<sup>17-19</sup> 5<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>39</sup>), even when He waives the function, it is because the words He has spoken have judgment-force (12<sup>47</sup>). It is to save the world that He has come, the Life, the Light, the Truth, or, in one chosen name, the Word of God.

This 'Logos-conception' is neither the dominating conception which has given shape to the contents of the Gospel, nor is it an after-thought. The Evangelist comes to that conception with his belief in Christ as the Divine Son of God already complete, with the various aspects of His nature and function already correlated and harmonized under that idea; and adopts as a means of relating his central conception to contemporary Hellenistic thought the description of Logos for the Son of God.

'The Johannine Logos shows nothing of the fluctuating ambiguity which forms the characteristic quality of the Philonic. He is Personality through and through, and (what for Philo is an impossible thought) has entered on the closest union with the σάπς, the anti-Divine principle' (Bauer, 'ad Jn 1<sup>1</sup>', in Handbuch zum NT, 1912, p. 7; cf. also Bousset, Kyrios Christos, 1913, p. 187 note).

It would be the direct converse of that method, to begin with the conception of the Logos as current in Hellenistic speculation, and, having analyzed its contents, proceed to fit into harmony with its several elements the records of the life of Jesus which were relevant to his purpose. He introduces the Logos as a term already familiar to his readers; he reminds them of the nature, the prerogatives, the activity of the Logos, His sharing in the nature of God, His timeless being, His part in the work of creation; and then says in effect, 'This Logos is our Christ; He became flesh; and we beheld His glory, glory as of the only begotten of the Father.' And throughout the subsequent relation of His acts and words, that glory is allowed to shine.

But not to the obliteration of His humanity, or to the obscuring of His dependence upon God. The glory was visible to those who believed on Him; but they were fully persuaded of the reality of His human nature too (1 Jn 1<sup>1-3</sup>). To others He appeared as a man (4<sup>-9</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 7<sup>46</sup> 9<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>33</sup>), with a human father and mother (6<sup>42</sup>). They relied on the evidence of their senses when they accused Him of blasphemy, 'because thou being a man makest thyself God' (10<sup>33</sup>). The Evangelist does not shrink from reporting the words of Philip when he described Him as 'Jesus the son of Joseph' (1<sup>45</sup>), or those of the Baptist referring to Him as ἄνθρωπος (3<sup>7</sup>); he even reports Jesus as referring to Himself in the same terms—νῦν δὲ ζητεῖτέ με αποκτεῖναι ἄνθρωπον ὃς τὴν ἀλήθειαν ὑμῖν λελάληκα (8<sup>40</sup>).

His humanity is emphasized with a detail unknown in the Synoptic Gospels—He could be wearied (4<sup>6</sup>), thirsty (19<sup>-8</sup>), troubled in spirit (13<sup>-1</sup>). He Himself says, 'Now is my soul troubled' (12<sup>27</sup>), and prays that He may be saved 'from this hour' (cf. He 5<sup>7</sup>). He formed ties of intimate personal friendship and affection (11<sup>5</sup>), and at the tomb of Lazarus He 'wept' (11<sup>25</sup>). The attempt to explain such instances of emphasis on the human nature of Jesus as due to the 'schematism' of the writer is an attempt to get rid of the problem left by the Johannine Christology by evading one of the factors, and it is wrecked on the simplicity and naturalness of each of the instances. A schematism which so successfully concealed the inner meaning of the language would defeat its own object.

Nor is it possible to explain away the repeated witness to the sense of dependence upon God acknowledged by Jesus, and the derivation of His power from Him. The Father who is 'greater than all things' (10<sup>29</sup>) is 'greater than' the Son (14<sup>28</sup>). From the Father the Son derives the things which He speaks to the world (8<sup>-6</sup>; cf. 8<sup>40</sup> 12<sup>49</sup> 15<sup>15</sup>), and also the power to do His 'works.' He 'can do nothing of himself' (5<sup>19</sup>; cf. 5<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>-8</sup>). He submits Himself continuously to the Father's commands (15<sup>10</sup>; cf. 8<sup>29</sup>), and finds His spiritual nourishment in obedience (4<sup>34</sup>). It is in this document where the human nature of the Son and His dependence on the Father are asserted with the strongest emphasis that His Divinity is for the first time expressly acknowledged (1<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>-3</sup>). If John thus leaves an unsolved problem for posterity to attack it is better to recognize that it is so.

'How it was possible that this essential divine possession, the exclusive endowment of a heavenly, spiritual being, could be manifested in a being of flesh, is not a subject on which he seems to have pondered—it is to him simply a marvel for reverent contemplation! One thing only is clear, that with equal energy he defends both positions: truly become flesh, and yet in complete possession of those qualities which constitute the nature of the Deity' (J. Weiss, op. cit. p. 151).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the authorities cited above, see W. Lock, 'Christology of the Earlier Chapters of the Acts,' in Expositor, 4th ser., iv. [1891] 178; W. Sanday, Christologies Ancient and Modern, Oxford, 1910; G. H. Box, 'The Christian Messiah in the Light of Judaism,' in JThSt xiii. [1912] 321; B. W. Bacon, Jesus the Son of God, London, 1911; J. Granbery, Outline of NT Christology, Chicago, 1909; A. E. Garvie, Studies of Paul and his Gospel, London, 1911; A. Deissmann, St. Paul, Eng. tr., London, 1912; M. Brückner, Die Entstehung der paulinischen Christologie, Strassburg, 1903; W. Olschewski, Die Wurzeln der paulinischen Christologie, Königsberg, 1909; S. Monteil, La Christologie de Saint-Paul, Paris, 1906; A. Jülicher, Paulus und Jesus, Tübingen, 1907; J. Weiss, Jesus im Glauben des Urchristentums, do. 1910, and 'Christologie des Urchristentums,' in RGK I. [1909] 1712 ff.; A. S. Peake, 'The Person of Christ in the Revelation of St. John,' in Mansfield College Essays, London, 1909, p. 89; F. Loofs, What is the Truth about Jesus Christ?, Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1913; H. R. Mackintosh, The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ, Edinburgh, 1912; W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, Göttingen, 1913.

C. ANDERSON SCOTT.

CHRISTIAN (Χριστιανός).—We might expect that, in the case of so renowned a name as 'Christian,' the occasion and circumstances of its origin would have been recorded with all possible detail, but such is not the case. Its first appearance is noticed in the most simple, matter-of-fact way without further explanation. 'The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch' (Ac 11<sup>-6</sup>). Then, as far as the NT is concerned, the name almost disappears; it is mentioned only twice again (Ac 26<sup>-8</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>). In the former passage Agrippa says: 'Thou wouldest fain make me a Christian'; in the latter, Peter's words, 'If a man suffer as a Christian,' are spoken from a persecutor's standpoint. Even in Agrippa's day the designation was understood (c. A.D. 44), and, when I Peter was written (A.D. 64-67), it must have been in common use. In the other Epistles the name does not occur. There the terms used are such as 'disciples,' 'believers,' 'the faithful,' 'brethren,' 'saints.' The only two points definitely indicated in Ac 11<sup>-6</sup> are the time and place, and both these are in every way appropriate.

The missionary work of the Church was about to begin from Antioch as its starting-point.

There a considerable church had been formed by the united labours of Barnabas and Saul. Driven from Jerusalem by persecution, disciples had gone to Cyprus and preached to the Jews there. Thence some came over to Antioch and preached to 'Greeks also' ('Ελληνες; another reading has 'Ελληνιστάς, 'Grecian Jews'), with the result that 'a great number believed.' Barnabas came from Jerusalem on an errand of inquiry, and under his ministry 'much people was added to the Lord.' Barnabas then fetched Saul from Tarsus; both laboured in Antioch 'a whole year' and taught 'much people' (ὄχλον ἱκανόν). Here was the first considerable church on Gentile soil; a common name was necessary and was forthcoming—providentially, we cannot doubt, but how is not so clear.

The city of Antioch (q.v.), the capital of Syria, a splendid centre of Greek life and culture, became after the Fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) a second home of the Church and the mother-church of Gentile Christianity. Although it does not figure prominently in the NT, in subsequent history it plays a great part as a rival of Alexandria, Rome, and Constantinople. Chrysostom, the prince of early Christian preachers, won his first fame there. This Antioch school of theology represented a type of interpretation more akin to modern thought than any other in those days. Ignatius, martyr and writer of the famous letters, was bishop of Antioch. Chrysostom writes: 'As Peter was the first among the apostles to preach the Christ, so was this city the first to be crowned with the name of Christian as a diadem of wondrous beauty.'

As to the mode in which the name 'Christian' originated, there is great difference of opinion. We seem compelled to accept one of three explanations. (1) All agree that the name did not originate with the Jews. On their lips it would have been a tacit acknowledgment of the Messiahship of Jesus. While the first disciples were Jews, the Jewish element soon became a diminishing quantity in the Church. Their name for believers in Christ was Nazarenes. Their attitude, as we see in the Acts, was increasingly one of estrangement and hostility.

(2) The suggestion has been made that the designation originated with Christians themselves. Eusebius (4th cent.), usually well-informed and trustworthy, supports this view. An argument in its favour is its eminent appropriateness. Nothing could better signalize the central position of Jesus in Christianity. St. Paul's attitude on this question represents the Church of all ages. Systems like Muhammadanism and Buddhism, once established, are independent of their founders. Not so Christianity: 'Christianity is Christ.' His person, life, and work are the key-stone of the arch, the alpha and omega of the gospel. Yet, if this opinion were correct, we should expect some intimation to this effect in Ac 11<sup>-6</sup>. Still more, the name is not found in the NT outside the three passages mentioned, and, as far as records go, for some time afterwards. In writers of the 2nd cent. it is of common occurrence—in pagan writers, the Apologists, the author of the Didache, and so on. Speaking of the Neronian persecution, Tacitus (A.D. 116) says: 'They whom the populace (vulgus) called Christians (Christianos).' Suetonius (A.D. 120) and Pliny (A.D. 112) use the same designation. P. W. Schmiedel (EBi s.v.) says that Christian writers did not use it because they did not need it. 'Saints,' 'brethren,' etc., served their purpose. 'It follows that, notwithstanding its absence from their writings, the name of Christian may very well have originated at a comparatively early time.' As we have seen, Ac 26<sup>-8</sup> and 1 P 4<sup>16</sup> imply that the term was in use. As to scanty references, many early Christian writings have perished.

(3) The opinion most in favour is that the term originated in Gentile circles outside the Church. The people of Antioch with their quick wit had a reputation for the invention of party names. A title so apt, almost obvious, once suggested, would persist with a vitality of its own. Coming from outside, it was not at once accepted by believers, but slowly grew in favour. This explanation on the whole presents the fewest difficulties and fits the circumstances of the case. We need not accept the view that the title was used at first derisively. There is nothing of this character in the title itself, although Conybeare-Howson and others think that it was so meant. A. Carr in an essay in his Horæ Biblicæ takes this view. He thinks that St. Paul's preaching of the Kingdom, carrying with it the idea of Christians as an army, would suggest comparison with the followers of great military leaders (Pompeians, Herodians), greatly to the discredit of Christ and Christians. This meaning is not expressed in the term itself, but, if it were a fact, would arise out of the memory of the Crucifixion. Antiochene ingenuity could certainly have discovered a better expression for such an idea. At a much later date the Emperor Julian saw nothing discreditable in the name, for he forbade its use and replaced it with Galilean. (The incidental character of the origin of a great name is not without analogy. In v. 30 of the same chapter we have the first mention incidentally of 'presbyters'—the office out of which the countless forms of church polity have grown. So again with regard to deacons in Ac 6<sup>3</sup>.)

It has been argued that the term Χριστιανός implies a Western and Latin origin. But the termination -avos was in wide use among Greeks everywhere (HDB i. 384).

The use of this name was the first step in the differentiation of Christians from Jews in the public eye. Previously the two classes had been confounded; and the confusion was advantageous to Christians in many respects, as the Jews were a privileged nation before the Roman law. As the Church grew in numbers the confusion ceased, and the new name emphasized the distinction.

As the name Χριστός was often confused with χρηστός ('good,' 'useful'), so Χριστιανός was often misspelt Χρηστιανός. This was intelligible enough in pagan writers. Suetonius says that Claudius expelled the Jews from Rome because they were always raising tumult under the instigation of Chrestus. Christian writers are not disinclined to turn the mistake to account. Tertullian (Apol. 3) does this intentionally, saying to pagans: 'When you wrongly say Christians [Chrestianos] (for your knowledge of the name is limping), it is composed of suavity and benignity' (de suavitae et benignitate). Clem. Alex. (Strom. ii. 4) also writes: 'They who believe in Christ both are and are called good (χρηστοί)'; Justin (Apol. i. 4): 'You ought rather to punish those who accuse (us) because of our name. For we are accused of being Christians; but it is unjust for that which is good (τὸ χρηστὸν) to be hated'; Lactantius (Div. Inst. iv. 7): 'Ignorant of our affairs, they call Christ Chrest (Christum Chrestum) and Christians Chrestians (Christianos Chrestianos).'

We can imagine nothing more fitting than that Christians should bear their Master's name (Christ) in their own (Christian). There was more than accident in such an origin. The name betokens the vital union between Christ and believers, of which the Epistles make so much ('they that are Christ's'). An early Liturgy says: 'We thank thee that the name of thy Christ is named upon us, and so we are made one with thee.' What a Christian is called he is. He has the mind of Christ. He thinks and feels, loves and acts, as Christ does.

His name is an index to his heart. 'We are called children of God, and such we are.' 'A Christian is one who has Christ in his heart, mouth and work' (à Lapide). Passages like Mt 19<sup>9</sup> 24<sup>9</sup> found a literal fulfilment in the Church: see Mk 9<sup>1</sup>, 'Because ye are Christ's,' and margin, the name standing for the person; Ac 4<sup>12</sup>, 'Neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved.' To believe on the name is to believe on Christ (Jn 1<sup>12</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Comm. of Meyer, Rackham, Alford, Wordsworth on Ac 11<sup>26</sup>; artt. in HDB, EBI, DCG, and Kitto's Cyclopædia, s.v.; Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1877, i. 146f.; A. Carr, Horæ Biblicæ, 1904; F. H. Chase, The Credibility of the Book of Acts, 1902.

J. S. BANKS.

CHRISTIAN LIFE The type of moral and religious life which was lived by the Christians of the Apostolic Age had already been so far fixed as to be described in the phrase κατὰ χριστιανισμὸν ζῆν by Ignatius (Magn. x. 1) towards the close of that period; and the Didache (xii. 4), possibly at an earlier date, used the title Χριστιανός, showing that the name which Antioch invented (Ac 11<sup>26</sup>; cf. 26<sup>28</sup> and 1 P 4<sup>16</sup>) was now accepted as specifying a person whose life was distinctive alike in ideal and practice. If we take the year A.D. 100 as marking the extreme limit of the Apostolic Age, our authorities for determining the characteristics of Christian practice and of the Christian life in its inner and outer aspects are but meagre, consisting of the NT writings, the Didache, 1 Clement, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Epistles of Ignatius, some fragments of Papias and Hegesippus preserved by Eusebius, and a few contemporary references in pagan writers like Tacitus and Suetonius. There is a difficulty in using and classifying the information of these authorities, inasmuch as the chronology of the NT writings is a subject of inquiry and even of controversy; while the traditional origin and authorship of writings like the Epistle to the Ephesians and the Pastoral Epistles, of the Johannine writings and several others, are disputed by competent critics (see art. DATES). Some scholars (e.g. Gwatkin) regard the Didache as one of the earliest works of Christian literature; while others, like von Dobschütz, place it beyond the limits of the Apostolic Age. Nevertheless, in spite of the various opinions on questions of chronology and authorship, it is possible to arrive at some definite conclusions on universally accepted premises, and to form a clear, if in details an incomplete, conception of the practice of the Christian life exhibited by Christian communities from the death of Christ to the close of the 1st century.

One general principle may be laid down by way of preface. The earliest witnesses of Christianity are more concerned with Christ than with a system of Christian morals. It is not primarily a new code of ethics which they unfold; it is a new Personality. Not the teaching, but the Teacher is their theme. The summum bonum had been realized in the life of Jesus. The Sermon on the Mount, indeed, entered into the apostolic consciousness, as we see from the precepts of Ro 12; but the Law-giver, as on the occasion of its utterance, is more than His precepts (Mt 7<sup>9</sup>). The devotion to a living historical Person, the Son of God and Redeemer of the world, who was capable of communicating His Spirit to all mankind—this is the note of the earliest preaching of the gospel.* The apostles preach 'Christ and him crucified.' 'They seem to think that if they can only fill men with true thankfulness for the gift of life in Christ, morality will take care of itself' (Gwatkin, Early Church Hist. i. 55). What results did such a presentation of truth produce on the age to which it was given? This question can be answered only by a study of moral conditions within the Christian Church. We must go for our enlightenment, not to any general studies of Christian ethics, but to the extant authorities of the age, which treat of the Christian life in: (1) the Jewish-Christian period; (2) the Pauline period; and (3) the post-Pauline period. In the evolution of the Christian communities, there is a direct connexion between ethical conditions and the official or institutional organization of the churches, which grew naturally out of these conditions; but it will be necessary to narrow our survey to religious and moral aspects, and to disregard in detail problems of a historical and institutional character, e.g. Baptism, Lord's Supper, ritual and worship in general, bishops and elders, the relation of St. Paul to the Jerusalem Council, and the like (see artt. CHURCH, BAPTISM, EUCHARIST, BISHOP, etc.).

* Incidentally we may regard this feature as one of the reasons why Christianity in the Roman world vanquished all competitors—Isis or Attis or Mithra or the redeemer-god of Oriental mystery-religions. The Redeemer-God of Christianity was a historical personality.

1. Jewish Christianity.—The followers of Christ at the time of His death were distinguished from the majority of their fellow-Jews by their conviction that Jesus was the Messiah. They were thus to their contemporaries a Messianic sect within the pale of Judaism, conforming to the rites and moral code of their religion. Their Master, while condemning the defects of representative leaders of religion, like the Pharisees, had never rejected the observances of the Jewish religion—true to the spirit of His mission, which was rather to fulfil than to destroy. Weizsacker seems to go too far when he suggests (Apostol. Age, ii. 341) that there is disharmony between the evidence of the Synoptics and the Acts, on the ground that the latter shows the primitive Church more bound up with Judaism than Jesus Himself was, and the Pharisees actual patrons of the apostolic community. The fact is that both Jesus and the early Church accepted the outward symbols of Judaism, e.g. the Temple and national festivals, while in spirit they had already advanced beyond the national faith (cf. Ac 24<sup>o</sup>).

The primitive Christians of Jerusalem, while following the rules of the Jewish religion for everyday life (Ac 15), and for worship and devotional observances (3<sup>1</sup>), come before us in the early chapters of the Acts as a distinctive community, given to prayer (1<sup>14</sup>). Prayer was at once the source and seal of that unity or spirit of brotherhood which was to find further expression in a common social life characterized by ἀγαλλιασις καὶ ἀφελότης καρδίας, and in a community of goods (24-46). The latter feature represented merely the socialism of self-sacrifice, its real motive being not a desire for social innovation, but the support of the poor; and it may have been suggested by Essene models (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS). The Christians lived a happy family life; the members were 'brethren'; new converts were received into the fellowship by baptism (2<sup>41</sup>); the practice of charity produced noble examples of generosity like that of Barnabas (4<sup>36</sup>), and incidentally provoked unworthy ambition, of which the deceit of Ananias and Sapphira (ch. 5) was a dark and memorable result. Women such as Mary, the mother of John Mark, and Sapphira held an independent position in the community, and slowly the influence and aims of the brotherhood broadened out. They were known as 'disciples,' men 'of the Way' (Ac 9<sup>2</sup> 24<sup>14</sup>), and 'saints.' The appointment of the seven Hellenists (Ac 7) which quelled the internal differences between the Hebrews or pure Jews and the Hellenists, their Greek-speaking brethren of the Dispersion, indicates not only the large-hearted charity of the Christian apostles, but their gradual alienation from the narrowness of Judaic legalism. This spirit of alienation came to a head in the extreme views of St. Stephen, the leader of the Hellenists, who paid the penalty of his undisguised anti-Judaism in martyrdom. It is easy to see that the ideas of St. Stephen anticipated the essential principles of Pauline Christianity, and further, that they were in advance of minds like that of St. Peter, who still maintained a loyal observance of Jewish law and felt scruples about entering a Gentile house (Ac 10) and joining St. Paul, Barnabas, and other Gentile Christians (Gal 2<sup>11</sup>). Thus, while the Hellenists were scattered abroad, being found in Samaria and as far north as Antioch, the Petrine section remained at Jerusalem to find a new head in St. James, who in A.D. 51 is associated with St. Peter and St. John and in 58 is sole leader of the Church. The Apostolic Decree (Ac 15), which was intended to solve the differences of Jewish and Gentile Christianity, was a compromise which shows at once the strength and the weakness of the Jewish-Christian position: its strength lay in its jealousy for pure morality—Gentile Christians are to abstain from meat offered to idols, blood, things strangled, and fornication; its weakness lay in its ceremonialism and in its distrust of the Gentile per se. The later factors of Jewish Christianity represented by the Johannine literature and such writings as the Epistle of James are treated below.

Palestinian Christianity, in spite of its reverence for Jewish law, did not escape persecution. The Christian Jews fled to Pella before A.D. 70, and refused to join the Bar Cochba rebellion, and finally became a sect beyond the Jordan, known as Ebionites or Nazarenes. The saint of Palestinian Christianity is undoubtedly James, the Lord's brother, already referred to (see the glowing account of him by Hegesippus, preserved in Euseb. HE ii. 23); he was 'the Just,' a Nazirite in practice, but consecrated to God, a typical priest of righteousness to the Jewish-Christian mind. The martyrdom of St. Stephen and that of St. James in their several ways indicate the undying influence of Christ's example and teaching. It is probable that in this community the oral teaching of our Lord had a wider vogue than in Pauline circles. His sayings were circulated and known in the sphere of His earthly ministry, and produced a new type of personality and conduct (see Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, 156 f.). We may sum up the features of Christian life in its earliest environment as a moral ideal, coloured and modified by loyalty to the tenets of Judaism; but issuing, under belief in the Messianic Jesus and by the power of His Spirit, in brotherliness, sympathy, love of enemies, heroic confession of faith, and purity of life.

2. Pauline Christianity.—The conversion of St. Paul was a new departure in the Christian witness, and opened a new epoch for Christianity. His own Christianity was not in essence so much a negation of or a revolt from Judaism as a fresh inspiration, the result of a moral crisis in his inner life. One of the results of the crisis, it is true, was to reveal to him what he calls τὸ ἀδύνατον τοῦ νόμου (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>), and to bring about his rejection of the Jewish ideal of salvation; but his conception of Christianity was based on the positive conviction rooted in experience that newness of life consisted in a personal union with Christ. Faith in Christ transfigured a man's personality, and thereby gave him a new ethic, together with the power to carry it into practice. The Pauline morality is the offspring of the Apostle's doctrine of salvation by faith. 'He who was united to Christ could not help practising the Christian virtues' (Gardner, Religious Experience of St. Paul, 159). His insistence on ethics reveals his abhorrence of antinomianism, even when that abhorrence is not as expressly stated as it is in Ro 6<sup>10</sup> and Gal 5<sup>18f</sup>. The difference between Pauline morality and the morality of the Judaizers who were found all over the Greek-speaking world, lay in the fact that Gentile Christianity formed an independent ethic, while the ethic of the Jewish Christian 'merely looked like an addition to the commandments, an ennobling and purifying of the rule of the pious, law-abiding Jew' (see Weizsacker, ii. 346). This distinction arose naturally from the exalted view which St. Paul held as to the Person of Christ; wherever the Deity of our Lord is proclaimed, as in the Fourth Gospel and 1 John, 1 Peter, and the Ignatian Epistles, we find, as McGiffert notes (see art. 'Apostolic Age' in ERE), that the Pauline idea of moral transformation by the indwelling of the Divine becomes prominent. On the other hand, elsewhere in the NT and in Clement's First Ep. to Corinthians, where the Jewish type of theology prevails, salvation is placed in the future as the reward of the faithful. For the message of the Pauline Epistles and the ethical life and problems of the Christian communities as portrayed therein the reader is referred to artt. on the individual Epistles, but a general summary of the evidence of his writings may be added here.

We may often infer from St. Paul's warnings the general perils to which the Christians were liable. We see that the Christian standard is not attained at once (Ph 3<sup>1-</sup>); there are express references to flagrant examples of moral failure necessitating a ban of excommunication; and the 'saints' are good men and women still in the making; hence the hortative form so largely adopted by this Apostle. True to his essential convictions, the Apostle assigns to the direct action of the Spirit the transforming of human character. He appeals not to Scripture or law, but to the Christian consciousness. Christ is the fulfilment and end of the Law (Ro 10<sup>4</sup>) and the founder of a new law of love (Gal 6-, 1 Co 9<sup>-1</sup>), in that His Spirit is a new vital power. With the truth of the Incarnation several of his greatest precepts are allied (2 Co 8<sup>8</sup>, Ph 2<sup>5</sup>, Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Col 3<sup>13</sup>, Ro 15<sup>7</sup>), and there is often a direct connexion between his ethics and his theological and christological doctrine. His distinction between 'flesh' and 'spirit' colours all his thought regarding personal morality. His insistence on sexual chastity (in 1 Cor. he reveals his preference for celibacy, and his sympathy with the ascetic ideal, while he denounces its excesses), and his warnings against sins of the flesh are everywhere prominent. The body is a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6<sup>19</sup>). His memorable indictment of pagan vice in Ro 12<sup>1ff</sup> is pointed by the actual life of Corinth, the city from which he wrote the Epistle, and there is hardly an Epistle in which reference is not made to sexual vice (cf. Col 3<sup>5ff</sup>). The famous 'hymn of love' (1 Co 13) places love at the head of his ethical system, and is indirectly an indictment against all forms of self-seeking elsewhere specified: e.g. covetousness (Col 3<sup>5</sup>), the spirit of faction and the love of pre-eminence (Ph 1<sup>15-17</sup>), and dishonesty (1 Th 4<sup>9</sup>). In Ro 12<sup>1ff</sup> we have the moral life set forth as a λογική λατρεία, and its motive the fulfilment of God's will. The duty of prayerfulness* is frequently proclaimed (Ro 12<sup>12</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>, Ph 4<sup>6</sup>, Col 4<sup>2</sup>). The spirit of revenge is condemned, the love of one's enemy (Ph 1<sup>10</sup>) and returning of good for evil are expressly inculcated. Ordinary conversation is to be wholesome and yet pleasing (Col 4<sup>6</sup>). The gentler virtues which found no place in pagan ethics, such as sincerity, humility, reasonableness (Ph 4<sup>5</sup>), patience, meekness, brotherly love, kindness (Gal 5-), are united with love and temperance or self-control; while joy, peace, and thankfulness (cf. Ph 4<sup>6</sup>, εὐχαριστία) are the resultant graces of Christian conduct.

The domestic and social virtues are frequently urged on the Christian convert—love of husband for wife, of wife for husband, of children for parents, of slave for master, of master for slave (cf. Ro 3<sup>18</sup>, Col 3<sup>18-21</sup>). In all social relations St. Paul is conscious of the need of Christian tactfulness and discretion (Col 3<sup>21</sup> and Ph 1<sup>9</sup>). 'To walk worthily of the gospel of Christ' (Ph 1-7) is his comprehensive formula for Christian conduct. The Christian's relation to the heathen outsiders and to his less strict or 'weak' brother, and to heathen practices and use of heathen tribunals, is set forth in 1 Cor., which is a manual of social Christianity. He did not attack the slave-system or proclaim a social revolution: he sought to Christianize the relationship of master and slave by Christianizing both master and slave (see art. PHILEMON). In 1 Thess. he warns men against the moral perils of 'an overstrained Parousia-expectation'; in 2 Thess. he proclaims the dignity and duty of labour.

Finally, there is the duty of the 'strong' to help the weak (Gal 6<sup>1</sup>), the care for and liberality towards the poor (see 1 Co 16), and, above all, obedience to civic and Imperial authorities (Ro 13<sup>1-10</sup>). In dealing with social and civil responsibilities, the ethics of Pauline Christianity are opposed to revolt or agitation. The sanctification of the individual and the community is their aim and object. For his views with regard to the subordination of women (1 Co 7), St. Paul has frequently been criticized, but on the whole they made for domestic purity and the strengthening of the marriage tie, in an age when the matrimonial relationship was losing its binding and sacred sanctions. His doctrine of the solidarity of society—a sin against a brother is a sin against Christ (1 Co 8<sup>1-</sup>)—and of the equality of all men in Christ (Gal 3<sup>-8</sup>, Col 3<sup>11</sup>) prepared the way for the uplifting of the masses, and identified Christianity with the spirit of brotherhood, even though the references to love of the brethren are more frequent than to love of mankind as a whole (see art. FELLOWSHIP). In fact, Christianity, as we find it set forth by St. Paul and exemplified however imperfectly by the Pauline churches, already exhibits the new ethical passion and power which were eventually to win the Empire and the world.

3. Post-Pauline Christianity.—For this period our chief authorities are the later writings of the NT. These include, in addition to the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistle to the Ephesians (now widely regarded as sub-Pauline), the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1 Peter, the Johannine writings, Revelation, James, and Jude. We have also the Ignatian Epistles, 1 Clement, and the recently discovered Odes of Solomon (q.v.), to which Harnack assigns the date of c. A.D. 100. The interest of the Odes is doctrinal and ceremonial rather than ethical, although it appears that they were associated with the teaching of the catechumens. 1 Peter, Revelation, and Hebrews belong to the time of the persecution under Domitian, in which Christians and Jews alike suffered. The Pastorals apparently have reference to the earlier or Neronian persecution (A.D. 64), in which a large number of the Christians perished because they were convenient scapegoats (Tac. Ann. xv. 44) for Nero's unreasoning anger. Both Ephesians and the Pastorals give us the Pauline type of morality, Ephesians being influenced by and modelled on Colossians. In fact, the influence of St. Paul is manifest not only in those Epistles traditionally assigned to him, but generally in the later literature, which is really the offspring of a Jewish-Christian type of thought, e.g. 1 Peter, Hebrews, and the Johannine writings.

* See, for models of prayer in the Apostolic Age, Didache, 10, and 1 Clem. 59-61.

For the special characteristics of this post-Pauline literature, see artt. on the several books.

In 1 Peter, Hebrews, and the Epistle to the Roman Church to the Church of Corinth (1 Clem.) we find ourselves in touch with the Church at Rome. In Hebrews the Christians addressed had already passed through the Neronian persecution and become a 'gazing-stock' (10<sup>33</sup>) to the world. The didactic purpose was to show the preparatory character of the Jewish religion; but throughout we find the hortatory element prominent: it was a λογος παρακλήσεως (13-). The peril was shrinking from confession of Christ, a failure of παρήστια (10<sup>19</sup>), their lack of Christian knowledge (6<sup>1</sup>); on the other hand, good works are praised (6<sup>10</sup>)—brotherly love, hospitality, care for the sick and imprisoned; the great need is πίστις, not intellectual belief, but the moral assurance of a future reward—'a better country.' 1 Peter similarly lays stress on the consolatory power of ἐλπίς—the 'living hope' of a future life—in the midst of sufferings. 1 Clem. shows that the Church at Rome had not lost its stability, nor forgotten the duty of intercession especially for captive fellow-members. On the other hand, at Corinth since the 40 years when St. Paul wrote, there is little change; there are the defects of licentiousness and rebellion against authority. Throughout the Epistle we are conscious of St. Paul's influence; ch. 49, e.g., is an imitation of the 'hymn of love.' 1 Peter, while sent from Rome, is addressed to the Churches of Asia Minor.

Possibly Ephesians belongs to the same period. While emphasizing knowledge (1<sup>9-17</sup> 3<sup>3</sup>), it gives the premier position to love, which surpasses knowledge and is its object (3<sup>19</sup>). In 1 Peter the favourite word is ἀγαθοποιία. In Ephesians the old sins of paganism recur—uncleanliness, lasciviousness, lusts; in 1 Peter malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, and evil-speaking. The life of paganism is ἀγνοία, darkness, death: Christianity brings knowledge (Eph 4<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>14</sup>), light (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>2</sup>), and life (Eph 2<sup>14</sup>) or effective power (1<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>). Incidentally we note the emergence of new faults—drunkenness (Eph 5<sup>18</sup>), the habit of the ἀλλοτριεπισκοπος, or meddling in other people's concerns (1 P 4<sup>15</sup>), and extravagance of ornamentation in women (3<sup>3</sup>). Both 1 Peter and Ephesians show an advance on St. Paul in their appeal to the OT, which Jewish Christianity made the Bible of the Gentile world. The Pastoral Epistles exhibit the beginnings of Gnosticism (g.v.) and the influence of the false teaching prevalent in Asia Minor (cf. Jude, which warns especially against a far-reaching licentiousness), the discrediting of prophecy and the conception of εὐσέβεια. The Epistle of James, with which may perhaps be associated the Didache (although the date of the latter is uncertain), gives us the strong ethical ideal of Palestinian Christianity; its insistence on works does not imply retention of the Jewish code; the 'law of liberty' is a new law given by Christ, or 'the yoke of the Lord' (Did.). Revelation is also Jewish-Christian in its standpoint, and presents some valuable cameos of church life in Asia Minor in the letter to the Seven Churches (see art. APOCALYPSE). It treats the Christian life on the broad basis of history, and recognizes the heroism of both Jewish and Gentile Christians in the world-conflict; the proofs of Christianity are to be seen in 'the heroic virtues of martyrdom and virginity.' The Ignatian Epistles, which also glorify martyrdom, are remarkably silent regarding the gross sins of paganism. They deal with the contrast between Christian and non-Christian, the peril of nominal Christianity, and the duties of confession and Church unity; they reflect the growing Church-consciousness which anticipates the later Catholicism. The Fourth Gospel and the Johannine Epistles clearly express the equal recognition of Jewish and Gentile Christians. The author, though a Jew, is 'denationalized' in his standpoint, which yet is to be distinguished from St. Paul's in its generally mystical and idealistic nature. The spirit of his ethic is 'contemplative and exclusive' (Weizsäcker, ii. 397). Faith in Jesus as the Son of God is the condition of 'eternal life' and the sonship of God; while the Person of Christ involved a universal redemption. The truth of the new birth is Pauline; while the view of sin as ἀνομία shows the Jewish veneration for the old Law; even 'the new commandment' is an old commandment (1 Jn 2<sup>7</sup>) rightly viewed. The Christian life is characterized in a series of splendid generalizations—love, truth, light, with the antitheses of death and hatred, sin, the world, and darkness. The ideal is the overcoming of the world, the spirit of which is independence of God. The distinction between deadly and venial sins, the recognition of false forms of faith, the presence of official ambition which resents all ecclesiastical development (in Diotrephes [3 Jn]), are features which point to a later and more regulated stage of Christian life than we find in the Pauline letters, with their advocacy of the unfettered action of the Spirit.

To sum up, the Christian life, as exhibited in the literature of the Apostolic Age and viewed in the many phases and fluctuations which were due to its environment, the immaturity of its professors, the development of speculative thought, the errors of undue asceticism and moral laxity, presents on the whole a fixed and established type based on ethical and religious principles, which were destined to live and to transform the world because they owed their origin to faith in the historical Son of God, who had opened the Kingdom of Heaven to all believers.

LITERATURE.—A. C. McGiffert, Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897, and art. 'Apostolic Age' in ERE; E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., London, 1904; C. von Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., ii. [do. 1895]; A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr., do. 1905; H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church History, do. 1909; J. Moffatt, LNT, Edinburgh, 1911; P. Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul, London, 1911.

R. MARTIN POPE.

CHRONOLOGY.—See DATES.

CHRY SOLITE (χρυσόλιθος, Rev 21<sup>20</sup>).—In modern usage the name 'chrysolite' is applied to a transparent variety of olivine, used as a gem-stone and often called 'peridot.' The ancients applied the word to various yellowish gems. The LXX gives it as the equivalent of χρῆς, which Flinders Petrie (HDB iv. 620<sup>b</sup>) is inclined to identify with yellow jasper. The later Greeks gave the name chrysolite to the topaz, which was unknown in earlier times.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CHRY SOPRASE (χρυσόπρασος, from χρυσός, 'gold,' and πρασον, 'a leek').—This stone is the tenth foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21<sup>10</sup>). The name is now applied to an apple-green variety of chalcedony or hornstone, prized in jewelry and sometimes used for mural decorations. But this chalcedony was probably unknown to the ancients, and the χρυσόπρασος of the Greeks was 'not improbably our chrysoberyl' (EB<sup>11</sup> vi. 321). The word is not found in either of the LXX lists of precious stones (Ex 28<sup>17-20</sup>, Ezk 28<sup>13</sup>) with which the writer of Rev. was familiar. JAMES STRAHAN.

CHURCH.—The history of the Church in the Apostolic Age may be treated under the following heads: (1) Sources, (2) Importance, (3) Name, (4) Origin, (5) Growth, (6) Conflict between Jewish and Gentile elements, (7) Character, (8) Relation to the State and other systems.

1. Sources.—Our sources of information are not nearly so full as we might wish, but some of them are excellent; and, although we are obliged to leave several important questions open, yet criticism enables us to secure solid and sure results. Our earliest sources are the Epistles of St. Paul, and the large majority of those which bear his name are now firmly established as his. Doubts still exist with regard to the Pastoral Epistles, but it is generally admitted that they contain portions which are by the Apostle, and at any rate they are evidence as to a period closely connected with his age. Hebrews, whoever wrote it, is evidence respecting a similar period. With the possible exception of 2 Peter, all the other Epistles and the Apocalypse are sources. More full of information than the Pauline Epistles, though later in date, is the Book of Acts, now firmly established as the work of St. Luke, the companion of St. Paul. Those who fully admit this differ considerably in their estimate of the value of Acts as a historical document, but the trend of criticism is in the direction of a high estimate rather than of a low one. Microscopic investigation and a number of recent discoveries show how accurate a writer St. Luke generally is. We have to lament tantalizing omissions much more often than to suspect serious inaccuracies. The Gospels give some help; for what they record explains many features in the Epistles and Acts.

Outside the NT, but within the 1st cent., we have the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians and the Epistle of Barnabas, one representing Gentile and the other Jewish Christianity. Within the first three decades of the 2nd cent., we have the writings of three men whose lives overlapped those of some of the Apostles—Ignatius, Polycarp, and Papias; and to the same period probably belongs the Didache or Teaching of the Twelve. Something of considerable value may also be obtained from two writers near the middle of the 2nd cent.—Hermas and Justin Martyr; and even so late as the last quarter of the cent. we can find apostolic traditions of great value in the writings of Irenæus. From outside the Christian Church we have good material, especially respecting the great crisis of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, from the Jewish writer, Josephus; and also some important statements from the heathen writers, Tacitus, Suetonius, and Pliny, who were contemporary with Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

2. Importance.—The importance of the history of the Apostolic Church is very great, but it is sometimes misunderstood. The sources mentioned above tell us something about the beliefs, organization, and ritual of the first Christians; and they are all very simple. It is sometimes supposed that if we take these simple elements and close our eyes to later developments, we get the essence of Christianity, free from unessential forms, and that this constitutes the importance of the primitive Church. It is the model to which all Church reformers ought to look, with a view to restoring its simplicity. Two considerations show that this estimate is erroneous. Essence without form is unattainable. The Apostolic Church had forms which were the outcome of the conditions in which the Church existed. Some of those conditions changed very quickly, and the forms changed also. The restoration of the simplicity of the primitive forms will have little value or vitality unless we also restore the primitive conditions, and that is impossible. Secondly, the sources do not tell us the whole truth. On some important points we can obtain nothing better than degrees of probability because the evidence is so inadequate; on other points there is no evidence, and we have to fall back on pure conjecture. If it had been intended that all subsequent ages should take the Apostolic Church as a model, then we might reasonably expect that a complete description of it would have been preserved. A sketch which has to be gathered piecemeal from different sources, and which, when put together, is incomplete both in outline and in contents, cannot be made an authoritative example. 'Christianity is not an archaeological puzzle' (J. H. Ropes, Apostolic Age, London, 1906, p. 20).

Nevertheless, the importance of this age is real and great. (a) The spiritual essence of Christianity may be said to consist in the inner relation of each soul to God, to His Christ, and to His Spirit, and in the inner and outer relations of all believers to one another. In the first age of the Church this essence existed in such simple vigour that it gave reality and life to forms which had not yet had time to become mistaken for essentials. About the simplicity of these beginnings there is no doubt; it is an established fact; but that does not prove that this primitive simplicity is a binding authority for all ages. (b) This age produced the NT—the group of writings which has had greater influence for good than any which the world has ever known: a group of writings which reflects the ideas and habits of that age and must be interpreted by a knowledge of those ideas and habits. (c) This age exhibits the first effects which the gospel produced upon Jew and Gentile—two very different soils, which might bear very different fruits. (d) It is the first stage in the complex development of the Church and the churches; and in order to understand that development, we must study its beginnings.

3. Name.—The name 'Church' is in itself strong evidence of the connexion between the Old Covenant and the New. In the OT, two different words are used to denote gatherings of the chosen people or their representatives—eduhh (RV 'congregation') and qahal (RV 'assembly'). In the LXX, συναγωγή is the usual translation of edhah, while qāhāl is commonly rendered ἐκκλησία. Both qāhāl and ἐκκλησία by their derivation indicate calling or summoning to a place of meeting; but 'there is no foundation for the widely spread notion that ἐκκλησία means a people or a number of individual men called out of the world or mankind' (F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia, London, 1897, p. 5). Qāhāl or ἐκκλησία is the more sacred term; it denotes the people in relation to Jahweh, especially in public worship. Perhaps for this very reason the less sacred term συναγωγή was more commonly used by the Jews in our Lord's time, and probably influenced the first believers in adopting ἐκκλησία for Christian use. συναγωγή quickly went out of use for a Christian assembly (Ja 2<sup>21</sup>), except in sects which were more Jewish than Christian. Owing to the growing hostility of the Jews, it came to indicate opposition to the Church (Rev 2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>). ἐκκλησία, therefore, at once suggests the new people of God, the new Israel.

We do not know who so happily adopted the word for Christian use. It is not impossible that Christ Himself may have used it, for He sometimes spoke Greek. He used it or its equivalent in a Christian sense (Mt 16<sup>18</sup>); but Mt 18<sup>17</sup>, though capable of being transferred to Christians, must at the time when it was spoken have meant a Jewish assembly. St. Paul probably found the word already in use, and outside the Gospels it is very frequent in the NT. We find three uses of the term: the general body of believers (Ac 5<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>); the believers in a certain place (1 Th 1<sup>1</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>1</sup>); an assembly for public worship (1 Co 11<sup>18</sup> 14<sup>19, 35</sup>).

It had already become a technical term with strongly religious associations, which were partly borrowed from a Jewish ideal, but had been so enriched and transfigured as to indicate a body that was entirely new. The Jewish idea of a chosen people in relation to God received a fuller meaning, and to this was added the idea of a chosen people in relation to the Incarnate and Risen Son of God and to the Spirit of God. ἐκκλησία is nowhere used of heathen religious assemblies.

4. Origin.—Whether or no the Christian community owes its name of 'Church' (ἐκκλησία) to Christ, beyond reasonable doubt it owes its origin to Him. It is a strange misreading of plain facts to elevate St. Paul into the founder of the Christian Church. The theory that in Christianity, as in some other religions, there was a gradual deification of the founder, continues to be advocated, but it will not bear serious investigation. If St. Paul originated Christianity, who originated St. Paul? What was it that turned Saul the persecutor of the Church into Paul the apostle of Jesus Christ? It was the indelible conviction that Jesus was the Messiah, and that He had risen from the dead and conversed with him on the road to Damascus, that converted and ever afterwards controlled St. Paul. The conviction that the Messiah had been crucified, and had risen, and was now the Lord in heaven, was reached very quickly and surely by large numbers, who had good opportunities of ascertaining the truth and staked everything on the result. This conviction was based upon the experiences of those who were quite certain that the Risen Christ had appeared to them and conversed with them. Those appearances were realities, however we may explain them; they are among those things which prove themselves by their otherwise inexplicable results; and the convictions which they produced remain undestroyed and indestructible. It was upon them that the Apostolic Church was built. From the Risen Christ it had received the amazing commission to go forth and conquer the world; about that there was no doubt among those who joyously undertook this stupendous work. The apostles must have known whether Christ intended them to form a Church; and their view of His intention is shown by the fact that, immediately after His withdrawal from their sight, they set to work to construct one. If the new religion was to conquer the world, it must be both individualistic and social; it must provide for communion between each soul and God, and also for communion between its adherents. In other words, there must be a Church. Christ showed how this was to be done. He was not content with being an itinerant teacher, preaching to casual audiences. He selected a few disciples and trained them to be His helpers and His successors. It is manifest that He intended them to found a society; for although He gave few rules for its organization, yet He instituted two rites, one for admission to it and one for its preservation (W. Hobhouse, The Church and the World [Bampton Lectures, London, 1910], p. 17 ff.). 'An isolated Christian' is a contradiction, for every Christian is a member of Christ's Body. In reference to the world Christians are 'saints' (ἅγιοι); in reference to one another they are 'brethren'; in reference to Christ they are 'members.' In the original constitution of the human body God placed differently endowed members, and He has done the same in the original constitution of the Church (1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>). Both are in origin Divine, the product of the creative action of Father, Son, and Spirit.

5. Growth.—The growth of the Apostolic Church was very rapid. The first missionary efforts of the original believers were confined to Jerusalem and its immediate neighbourhood, and the converts were Palestinian or Hellenistic Jews who were living or sojourning in or near the capital. At first the Hellenists were in a minority, but this soon ceased to be the case. Persecution caused flight from Jerusalem, and then missionary effort was extended to Jews of the Dispersion and to Gentiles. At Antioch in Syria the momentous change was made to a mixed congregation containing both Jews and Christians. Then what had seemed even to the Jews themselves to be a mere Jewish sect became a universal Church (Ac 11<sup>19-26</sup>). As soon as it was seen that Judaism, in spite of all its OT glories, would never become a universal religion, missions to the heathen became a necessity. The first missionaries to the Gentiles, the men who took this momentous step of bringing the gospel to pagans, are for the most part unknown to us. Who won the first Gentile converts at Antioch? Who first took Christianity to Rome? Whoever they were, there had been a long and complex preparation for their work, which goes a considerable way towards explaining its success. This indeed was to be hoped for in accordance with Christ's command (Mt 28<sup>18</sup>, Lk 24<sup>47</sup>) and St. Peter's Pentecostal promise 'to all that are afar off' (Ac 2<sup>39</sup>); but we can see some of the details which helped fulfilment.

The only thing which adequately explains the great expansion of Christianity in the 1st cent. is the fact of its Divine origin; but there were a number of causes which favoured its spread and more than counteracted the active opposition and other difficulties with which it had to contend.

(a) The dispersion of the Jews in civilized countries secured a knowledge of monotheism and a sound moral code.

(b) Roman law had become almost co-extensive with the civilized world. Tribal and national ideas, often irrational and debasing, had given place to principles of natural right and justice. Roman law, like the Mosaic Law, was a παιδαγωγός to lead men to Christ.

(c) The splendid organization of the Roman Empire gave great facilities for travel and correspondence.

(d) The dissolution of nationalities by Roman conquests prepared men's minds for a religion which was not national but universal; and it is not impossible, in spite of the horror which the writer of the Apocalypse exhibits towards the worship of the Emperor, that that worship, which was nominally universal, sometimes prepared people for a worship of the Power to which they owed existence, and not merely fitful security and peace.

(e) The Macedonian conquest had made men familiar with a type of civilization which seemed to be adaptable to the whole world, and had supplied a language which was still more adaptable. Greek was everywhere spoken in large towns, and in them converts were most likely to be found. Through the LXX, Greek was a Jewish as well as a pagan instrument of thought, and had become very flexible and simple, capable of expressing new ideas, and yet easily intelligible to plain men. Greek was the language of culture and of commerce even in Rome. It was also the sacred language of the world-wide worship of Isis. Hardly at any other period has the civilized world had a nearer approach to a universal language. The retention of a Greek liturgy in the Church of Rome for two centuries was due partly to the fact that the first missionaries taught in Greek and that the Greek Bible was used; partly to the desire to preserve the unity of the Church throughout the Empire. Its abandonment by the Roman Church prepared the way for the estrangement between East and West.

(f) There was a wide-spread sense of moral corruption and spiritual need. 'A great religious longing swept over the length and breadth of the empire. The scepticism of the age of enlightenment had become bankrupt' (E. v. Dobschütz, Apostol. Age, Eng. tr., London, 1909, p. 39). The prevalent religions and philosophies had stimulated longings which they could not satisfy. Speculations about conscience, sin, and judgment to come, about the efficacy of sacrifices, and the possibility of forgiveness and of life after death, had prepared men for what Christianity had to offer. Even if the gospel had not been given, some religious change would have come. The gospel often awakened spiritual aspirations; more often it found them awake and satisfied them. It satisfied them because it possessed the characteristics of a universal religion—incomparable sublimity of doctrine, inexhaustible adaptability, and an origin that was recognizable as Divine. The Jew might be won by the conviction that the law was transfigured in the gospel and that prophecy was fulfilled in Christ and His Church. St. Peter began his Pentecostal address to the assembled Jews by pointing out that the outpouring of the Spirit was a fulfilment of Jewish prophecy (Jl 2<sup>28-31</sup>) and an inauguration of 'the last days,' which were to precede the coming of the Messiah in glory. But to the Gentile these considerations were not impressive. The great pagan world had to be won by the actual contents of Christianity, which were seen to be better than those of any religion that the world had thus far known. They were not only new, but 'with authority'; and they stood the test of experience by bearing the wear and tear of life. Christianity was at once a mirror and a 'mystery': it reflected life so clearly and it suggested something much higher. It was a marvel of simplicity and richness. It was so plain that it could be told in a few words which might change the whole life. It was so varied and subtle that it could tax all the intellectual powers and excite the strongest feelings.

When the proconsul Saturninus said to the Scillitan Martyrs, 'We also are religious people, and our religion is simple,' one of the Christians replied, 'If you will grant me a quiet hearing, I will tell you the mystery of simplicity' (Acts of the Scillitan Martyrs [TS i. 2, 1891, p. 112]; cf. 1 Co 2<sup>7</sup>).

The number of Christians at the close of the 1st cent. is very uncertain. We read of a good many centres throughout the Empire; but we know little about the size of each of these local churches. In some the numbers were probably small. In Palestine they were numerous (Ac 21<sup>20</sup>).

(g) The zeal and ability of the first missionaries were very great. We know the names of comparatively few of them, but we know some of the results of their work. The extension of the Church in the 2nd cent. is proof of the good work done in the 1st. In accordance with Christ's directions (Mk 6<sup>7</sup>; cf. Lk 10<sup>1</sup>), these missionaries commonly worked in pairs (H. Latham, Pastor Pastorum, Cambridge, 1890, p. 296 f.). St. Paul as a general rule had one companion, and probably seldom more; and his ability in planning missions is conspicuous. He selected Roman colonies, where, as a Roman citizen, he would have rights, and where he would be likely to find Jews, and men of other religions, trading under the protection of Rome. A synagogue was at first the usual starting-point for a Christian mission. But very soon the Jews became too hostile; so far from listening to the preachers, they stirred up the heathen against them (T. R. Glover, The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire, London, 1909, ch. vi.).

It is impossible to say which of the forces which characterized Christianity contributed most to its success: its preaching of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, its lofty monotheism, its hope of immortality, its doctrine of the forgiveness of sins, its practical benevolence, its inward cohesion and unity. Each of these told, and we may be sure that their combined effect was great.

6. Conflict between Jewish and Gentile elements.—It is remarkable how soon this conflict in the Apostolic Church began. Not long after Christianity was born, it was severed from the nation which gave it birth, and, since the final destruction of Jerusalem, it has only in rare cases found a secure hold on Jewish soil. But it is not a just statement of the case to say that the Gentile Church first stripped Judaism of everything, the Scriptures included, and then left it by the wayside half dead; or that the daughter first robbed her mother, and then repudiated her. That is an inversion of the truth; it was the mother who drove out the daughter and then persistently blackened her character. As to the Scriptures, there has been no robbery, for both have possessed them. But the daughter has put them to far better account and has increased their value tenfold. Christianity did not come forward at first as a new religion aiming at ousting the Jews. Its Founder was the Jewish Messiah, the fulfilment of OT prophecies. It was the Jews who forced the opposition. The relation of Judaism to Christianity was, almost from the first, a hostile one. And, as it was the energetic Jew of Tarsus who led the first persecution of the Christians, so it was the Apostle of the Gentiles who caused the final separation of the Church from the Synagogue. In the Fourth Gospel, 'the Jews' are the opponents of the Christ. In the Apocalypse, they are 'the synagogue of Satan' (2<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>9</sup>; cf. Didache, 8). Barnabas goes still further: the Jews have never been in covenant with God (iv. 6-9, xiv. 1); the Jews are the sinners (xii. 10). Judaism is obsolete: the Christian Church has taken its place and succeeded to all its privileges. Hence the lofty enthusiasm of the first Christians, whose language often assumes a rhythmic strain when the Church is spoken of (Eph 4<sup>3</sup>, Col 1<sup>18</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, He 12<sup>2</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>, Mt 16<sup>18</sup>). It was through the Christian Church that God filled the world with His Spirit; to it belonged the glorious future and the final triumph; for by it the religion of an exclusive nation had been transformed into a religion for the whole world.

It was inevitable that the Jews should resent such claims on the part of Christians, and especially of Gentile Christians; and the resentment became furious hostility when they saw the rapidity with which Christians made converts as compared with their own slowness in making proselytes here and there. Until the Maccabean princes used force, not many had been made. Since then, religious aspirations had combined with interested motives to bring adherents to Judaism, and it was from these more serious proselytes that the Christian missionaries obtained much help. Under their roof both Jews and Gentiles could meet to hear the word of God (Ac 18<sup>7</sup>). Christianity could offer to a dissatisfied and earnest pagan all that Judaism could offer and a great deal more. Such inquirers after truth now ceased to seek admission to the Synagogue and joined the Church, and the downfall of Jerusalem accelerated this change. The Jewish war of A.D. 66-70 was regarded by the Christians as a judgment for the murder of the Messiah, and also for the more recent murder in 62 of the Messiah's brother, James the Just. That catastrophe destroyed both the centre of Jewish worship and also the Jews themselves as a nation. The loss of the Temple was to some extent mitigated by the system of synagogues, which had long been established. But that destruction, both in its immediate effect and in its far-reaching consequences, marks a crisis which has few parallels in history. Christianity felt both. The destruction of Jerusalem left the Gentile Churches, and especially the Church of Rome, without a rival, for the Jewish Church of Jerusalem sank into obscurity, and never recovered; nor did any other community of Jewish Christians take its place. When a Christian community arose once more in the restored Jerusalem, it was a Gentile Church. Jewish Christianity was far on the road towards extinction. The Judaizing Christians persisted in regarding Judaism as the Divinely appointed universal religion, of which Christianity was only a special offshoot endowed with new powers. The Pauline view involved the hateful admission that the OT dispensation was relative and transitory. The Judaizers could not see that Christianity, although founded on the OT and realizing an OT ideal which had been seen but not reached by the prophets, was now independent of Judaism. Judaizing was a passing malady in the life of the Church, and had little influence on ecclesiastical development. The Judaizing Christians either gave up their Judaism or ceased to be Christian.

The Tübingen theory that the leading fact in the Apostolic Church was a struggle between St. Paul and the Twelve has been illuminating, but closer study of the evidence has shown that it is untenable. There were some differences, but there was no hostility, between St. Paul and the Twelve. The hostility was between St. Paul and the Judaizers, who claimed to represent the Twelve. It is possible that some of these Judaizing teachers had seen Christ during His ministry, and therefore said that they had a better right to the title of 'apostle' than he had. In the mis-called 'Apostolic Council' at Jerusalem, which was really a conference of apostles, elder brethren, and the whole Church of Jerusalem (Ac 15<sup>6</sup>. 12. 22. 23), there was no conflict between the Twelve and St. Paul. St. Paul's rebuke to St. Peter at Antioch (Gal 2<sup>11-14</sup>) is no evidence of a difference of principle between them. St. Peter is blamed, not for having erroneous convictions, but for being unfaithful to true ones. He and St. Paul were entirely agreed that there was no need to make Gentile converts conform to the Mosaic Law; but St. Peter had been willing to make unworthy concessions to the prejudices of Jewish converts who were fresh from headquarters, by ceasing to eat with Gentile converts. He had perhaps argued that, as it was impossible to please both parties, it was better, for the moment, to keep on good terms with people from Jerusalem. He temporized in order to please the Judaizers.

'But what it amounted to was that multitudes of baptized Gentile Christians, hitherto treated on terms of perfect equality, were now to be practically exhibited as unfit company for the circumcised Apostles of the Lord who died for them. . . . Such conduct, though in form it was not an expulsion of the Gentile converts, but only a self-withdrawal from their company, was in effect a summons to them to become Jews if they wished to remain in the fullest sense Christians. St. Paul does not tell us how the dispute ended: but he continued on excellent terms with the Jerusalem Apostles' (F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, Cambridge, 1894, pp. 78, 79).

The leading facts in the history of the Apostolic Church are—the freedom won for Gentile converts, the consequent expansion of Christianity and Christendom, and the transfer of the Christian centre from Palestine to Europe. When the Apostolic Age began, the Church was overwhelmingly Jewish; before it ended, the Church was overwhelmingly Gentile. Owing mainly to the influence of St. Paul—a Hebrew of Hebrews—whose Jewish birth and training moulded his thoughts and language, but never induced him to sacrifice the freedom of the gospel to the bondage of the law, the break with Judaism became absolute, and, as Gentile converts increased, the restrictions of Judaism were almost forgotten. The Judaizing Christians, especially after the second destruction of Jerusalem under Hadrian, drew further and further away from the Church, and ceased to influence its development.

7. Character.—The character of the Apostolic Church is not one that can be sketched in a few strokes. Simple as it was in form, it had varied and delicate characteristics. By its foundation in Jerusalem, which even the heathen regarded as no mean city, Christianity became, what it continued to be in the main for some centuries, a city-religion, a religion nearly all the adherents of which lived in large centres of population. It was in such centres that the first missionaries worked. For eighteen years or more (Gal 1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>1</sup>) Jerusalem continued to be the headquarters of at least some of the Twelve; but even before the conversion of St. Paul there were Christians at Samaria (Ac 8<sup>14</sup>), Damascus (9<sup>19</sup>), and Antioch (11<sup>-10</sup>), which soon eclipsed Jerusalem as the Christian metropolis.

It has been pointed out already that the Church is necessarily social in character; and it resembles other societies, especially those which have a political or moral aim, in requiring self-denying loyalty from its members. But it differs from other societies in claiming to be universal. The morality which it inculcates is not for any one nation or class, but for the whole of mankind. In the very small amount of legislation which Christ promulgated, He made it quite clear that in the Kingdom social interests are to prevail rather than private interests; and also that all men have a right to enter the society and ought to be invited to join it. The Church, therefore, is a commonwealth open to all the world. Every human being may find a place in it; and all those who belong to it will find that they have entered a vast family, in which all the members are brethren and have the obligations of brethren to promote one another's well-being both of body and soul. This form of a free brotherhood was essential to a universal religion; and the proof of its superiority to other brotherhoods lay in its being suitable to all sorts and conditions of men. It prescribed conduct which can be recognized as binding on all; and, far more fully than any other system, it supplied to all what the soul of each individual craved. The name 'disciples' did not last long as a name for all Christians; the name 'brethren' took its place. St. Paul does not speak of Christians as 'disciples'; that word came to be restricted to those who had been the personal disciples of Christ. He speaks of them as 'brethren,' a term in harmony with the Christians' 'enthusiasm of humanity,' an enthusiasm which set no bounds to its affection, but gave to every individual, however degraded, full recognition. The mere fact of being a baptized believer gave an absolute claim to loving consideration from all the rest. This brotherhood of Christians was easily recognized by the heathen.

Lucian (Death of Peregrinus Proteus) says: 'It was imposed upon them by their original lawgiver that they are all brothers from the moment that they are converted. . . . An adroit, unscrupulous fellow, who has seen the world, has only to get among these simple souls, and his fortune is soon made.' By pretending to be a 'brother' he can get anything out of them.

There is a stronger bond than that of belonging to one and the same society, commonwealth, and brotherhood. Seeing that the brotherhood implies that the Father of the family is God, there would seem to be nothing stronger than that. And yet there is: Christians are members of one Body, the Body of Christ, which is inspired by one Spirit. Just as no one did so much as St. Paul to free the new society from its cramping and stifling connexion with Judaism, so no one did so much as he to develop the idea of a free Christian Church, and of the relation of the Spirit to it. The local ἐκκλησία of believers is a temple in which God dwells by His Spirit; it is Christ's Body, of which all become members by being baptized in one Spirit. No differences of rank or of spiritual endowments can destroy this fundamental unity, any more than the unity of a building or of the human body is destroyed by the complexity of its structure. In Ephesians, the Apostle looks forward to an ἐκκλησία, not local, but including all Christians that anywhere exist. The same Spirit dwells in each soul and makes the multitude of the faithful, irrespective of locality or condition, to be one (see Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, London, 1909, p. 308). From the ideal point of view, there is only one Church, which is imperfectly, but effectively, represented and realized in the numerous organizations in Christendom. Not that Christendom is the whole of which they are the constituent parts—that is a way of looking at it which is not found in the Apostolic Church, and it may easily be misleading. The more accurate view is to regard each member of a Christian organization as a member of the universal Church. The Church consists of duly qualified individuals; the intermediate groups may be convenient or inevitable, but they are not essential.

Separate organizations, or local churches, came into existence because bodies of Christians arose at different places and increased. These bodies were independent, no one local church being in subjection to another. The congregations at Ephesus, Thessalonica, Philippi, Corinth, etc., were independent of one another and of the earlier churches of Antioch and Jerusalem. Their chief bond of union was that of the gospel and of membership in Christ. Besides this, the churches just named had the tie of being the product of one and the same founder; and, as children of the same spiritual father, they were in a special sense 'brethren.' St. Paul appeals to this fact and to their relationship to other churches. But, although he teaches that a church in need has claims upon the liberality of other churches, he nowhere gives one church authority over others. Nevertheless, even in apostolic times, congregations in the same district appear to have been regarded as connected groups, and it is possible that the congregation in the provincial capital had some sort of initiative in virtue of the importance of the city where they dwelt. Thus, we have 'the churches of Galatia' (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>, Gal 1<sup>1</sup>), 'the churches of Asia' (1 Co 16<sup>19</sup>), 'the churches of Judæa' (Gal 12-), 'the seven churches of Asia' (Rev 1<sup>1</sup>). In this way there arose between the local city church and the universal Church an organization which may be called the provincial Church (A. Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, Eng. tr., London, 1910, p. 160).

Besides these close ties of relationship and membership, the first Christians were held together by unity of creed. It is true that primitive Christianity was an enthusiasm rather than a creed; but there was a creed. It may be summed up in two strong convictions, one negative and the other positive. The negative one united the Christians with the Jews; the positive one was the chief cause of separation between the two. Both Jew and Christian declared with equal emphasis that the gods of the heathen were no-gods (Dt 32<sup>17</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>9</sup>): they were Shedim, nullities. But the Divine nature of the Incarnate, Crucified, and Risen Son of God was what the Christian affirmed as confidently and constantly as the Jew denied it. Here no compromise was possible. The Divinity of the Crucified, which is such a difficulty to modern thought, appears to have caused little difficulty to the first Christians. It has been suggested that familiarity with polytheistic ideas helped them to believe in the Divinity of the Son. Possibly; but, on the other hand, their rejection of polytheism was absolute, and they died rather than make concessions. Heathen philosophers, who saw that polytheism was irrational, had a colourless theism which could make compromises with popular misbeliefs. Thinkers like Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch could talk indifferently of God and gods, of the Divine Being and the deities; but for the early Christians that was impossible. They were not theologians, and they had only the rudiments of a creed; but they were quite clear about the necessity of worshipping God and His Christ, and about the folly and wickedness of worshipping men or idols. Hence, with all their simplicity of doctrine they had deep convictions which formed a strong bond of union. The heathen mysteries had something of the same kind.

P. Gardner has pointed out three common characteristics, all of which bring them into line with Christianity: rites of purification, rites of communion with some deity, and means of securing happiness in the other world. He holds that the Christian mystery of which St. Paul speaks is 'the existence of a spiritual bond holding together a society in union with a spiritual lord with whom the society had communion, and from whom they received in the present life safety from sin and defilement, and in the world to come life everlasting' (The Religious Experience of St. Paul, London, 1911, p. 79).

8. Relation to the State and other systems.—The question of the relation of the Church to the State was only beginning to arise towards the end of the apostolic period. The Church was developing its organization for its own purposes, without thinking of producing a power which might rival and oppose the State. The State had not yet become aware of any Christian organization, and it dealt with Christians as eccentrics, who sometimes became a public nuisance. The Jews were tolerated, less because they were not offensive to the Roman Government than because it was inexpedient to persecute them; and so long as Christians were regarded as a Jewish sect, they shared the immunity of the Jews and were generally unmolested. When the difference between Jews and Christians became manifest—and the Jews often pointed it out—Christians were persecuted whenever the temper of the magistrates or of the mob made it expedient to persecute. The State was intolerant on principle; it allowed no other corporation either inside or outside itself. While it freely permitted a variety of cults, it insisted on every citizen taking part in the State religion, especially in the worship of the Emperor. It was here that the Church came into complete and deadly collision with the Roman Empire, as the Apocalypse again and again shows. Nero was not fond of being styled a god; it seemed to imply that he was about to be translated from earth by death, and he preferred popularity during this life to worship after it was over. Domitian had no such feeling. He was not popular, and could not make himself so; but he could make his subjects worship him; and in the provinces, especially in the province of Asia, where Emperors were not often seen, but where the benefits of good government were felt, subjects were very willing to render Divine honours to the power that blessed them. Domitian began the formal letters which his procurators had to issue for him with the words: 'Our Lord and God orders this to be done' (Suet. Dom. 13). Festivals for the worship of the Emperor were often held by the magistrates at places in which there were Christians, e.g. at Ephesus, Sardis, Smyrna, and Philadelphia; and to refuse to take part in them was rebellion against the Government and blasphemy against the Augustus. Some magistrates were friendly, like the Asiarchs towards St. Paul (Ac 19<sup>31</sup>), but the possibilities of persecution for refusing to worship the Emperor or the local deities were so great that we may suspect that many attacks on Christians took place about which history records nothing (Swete, Apocalypse, London, 1907, Introd. ch. vii.; J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, pt. i. vol. i. [1890] p. 104).

Even if this danger had not existed, the mere fact that the Church was a self-governing body, within the State—imperium in imperio—but not of it, was enough to bring it into collision with the Government. The attitude of the Church was as loyal as was possible. The apostles respected the civil power, even when represented by a Nero, as a Divinely appointed instrument for the preservation of order; but they could not allow it to interfere with their duty to Him who had ordained both the civil power and the Church. The Church was no leveller or democrat in the modern sense of those terms. Rulers are to be respected by subjects, masters by slaves, husbands by wives, and parents by children. St. Paul does not teach the fallacy that all men are equal; he teaches that in spiritual things all souls have equal value. As regards the things of this life, all men are brethren, and in this he went far beyond Stoicism; even now, perhaps, we have not yet grasped the full significance of his teaching. To both the Government and the governed the Christians were an enigma. They seemed to regard suffering as a dreadful thing, for they were always striving to relieve it; and yet to disregard it entirely, for they were always willing to endure it. In an age in which there were no charitable institutions, the whole congregation was a free institution for dispensing practical help; and yet, when their cult was in question, they scorned pain and misery. They fought against involuntary poverty as an evil, and yet declared that voluntary poverty was a blessing. And there was another paradox—Christianity was at once the most comprehensive and the most exclusive of all religions. All were invited to enter, because the yoke was so easy; and all were warned to count the cost, because the responsibilities were so great. Converts were told that they must begin by taking up the cross and that they must abjure the world. In practice, the severance between the Church and the world was not insisted upon (1 Co 6<sup>10</sup>): it was a difference of thought and life rather than of social intercourse. Many Christians mixed freely with heathens, and many heathens came sometimes to Christian services, without any thought of seeking baptism. Some heathens thought that the Way was good, but that there were other ways which were equally good. The mixture of Church and world began very early.

Among rival religious systems, none was more dangerous to the success of Christianity than Mithra-worship. Except in the form of 'Mysteries,' the old Greek religion had not much power; its gods and goddesses were openly ridiculed. But Mithraism was full of life; it could excite not only powerful emotions but moral aspirations as well. It inculcated courage and purity, and it taught the doctrine of rewards and penalties here and hereafter. Mithra would come one day from heaven, and there would be a general resurrection, after which the wicked world would be destroyed by fire and the good would receive immortality. Some Church teachers regarded it as a gross caricature of Christianity. As a missionary religion, it had the advantage of being able to make terms with paganism; its adherents had no objection to idolatrous rites, and therefore never came into collision with the Government. It probably gained thousands who might otherwise have accepted the gospel. The elastic simplicity and freedom of primitive Christianity exposed the Apostolic Church to perils of another kind. The troubles of Gnosticism, Manichaeism, and Montanism grew out of the contact of Christianity with Greek and Oriental systems of religion and philosophy, whose ideas found entrance into Christianity and were sometimes an enrichment and sometimes a corruption of it. The balance was on the side of gain.

The gospel continued to supply the plain man with a simple rule of life, and it began to supply the philosopher with inexhaustible material for thought. This is a permanent cause of success.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the important works cited above, see W. W. Shirley, The Church in the Apostolic Age, Oxford, 1867; P. Schaff, Apostolic Christianity, Edinburgh, 1883, vol. ii.; A. Harnack, Sources of the Apostolic Canons, Eng. tr., London, 1895; C. v. Weizsäcker, The Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., do. 1899; A. C. McGiffert, The Apostolic Age, Edinburgh, 1897; W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, London, 1900, St. Paul the Traveller, do. 1902, Letters to the Seven Churches, do. 1904, Pictures of the Apostolic Church, do. 1910; C. Bigg, The Origins of Christianity, do. 1909; H. M. Gwatkin, Early Church Hist., do. 1909; L. Duchesne, Early Hist. of the Christian Church, Eng. tr., do. 1909-1912.

ALFRED PLUMMER.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT.—Christ left a small body of disciples under the direction of the apostles, with a charge to convert the world; but He gave nothing which can be called either a constitution or a code, and He explained the commandments as giving principles, not rules. About the development of a constitution we know little; but the Pastoral Epistles and 3 John, which must be placed early, whoever wrote them, show that the process began soon and continued rapidly, when it became clear that Christ's return might be long delayed. The process and its rapidity probably differed somewhat in different centres. At first the camps scattered about the eastern half of the Mediterranean had each its own tentative regulations. When the camps became a network of fortifications, spreading westward and inward and communicating with one another, the regulations became more settled and uniform. Thus the Christian organization developed until it became an object of suspicion and dread to the Roman Government, which at last it vanquished. Then the Christian organization did for the Empire what the Roman organization with all its statesmanship and military discipline had failed to do: it gave it cohesion and unity.

The first line of distinction is between the apostles and the other believers; and this line is continued as a distinction between rulers of any kind and those who are ruled—the Seven, elders, deacons, etc., on the one side, and the laity on the other. The great commission was given by the risen Christ to the whole Church and not to any select body in it. Yet this primary fact does not quite justify the phrase, 'the priesthood of the laity.' What the NT gives us is the priesthood of the whole Church without distinction between clergy and laity (1 P 2<sup>5</sup>, Rev 1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>10</sup> 20<sup>6</sup>), and no individual can exercise it without the authority of the Church. All Christians are priests alike; but, inasmuch as it is by the Spirit that the whole Church is consecrated to the priesthood, so the special ministers need a special consecration by the Spirit. The NT speaks clearly of special functions which are confined to a select minority and are not shared by the rest. It was by the Spirit that the 'charismatic' ministries worked. This is manifestly true of the apostles and the Christian prophets. It might or might not be true of those whom St. Paul or his deputy (Ac 14<sup>28</sup>, Tit 1<sup>5</sup>) chose for their capacity for governing. These derived their authority from the Spirit (Ac 20<sup>28</sup>), but they did not necessarily possess the gift of prophecy or even of teaching. But officials chosen to do spiritual work in a spiritual community needed spiritual gifts of some kind; and what these men received in ordination was a spirit of power and love and discipline (2 Ti 1<sup>7</sup>) (see Westcott, Ephesians, 1906, p. 169; Svete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, pp. 103, 317, 320).

We are accustomed to think of the first Christians as having no government, other than that of 'Peter with the Eleven' (Ac 2<sup>14</sup>). Harnack (Const.

and Law of the Church, p. 20 f.) has pointed out that they had a number of authorities, to be loyal to all of which was sometimes perplexing. They had inherited from Judaism the ordinances of the Jewish Church. To administer these there was the Sanhedrin. There were the known commands of Christ, which included the authority of the whole community to forgive and to punish offenders. There were the occasional promptings of the Spirit (Ac 6<sup>3, 10</sup> 8-<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 11<sup>1-28</sup> 16<sup>7</sup>). There were also the brethren of the Lord, who had some kind of authority. Perplexity might arise as to reconciling Jewish ordinances with the commands of Christ, and there might be differences between the Twelve and the Lord's brethren. We know that there was collision between the Divine commands and the decrees of the Sanhedrin, and that of course it was the latter that were disobeyed (4<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>29, 32</sup>). Nevertheless, none of these provided a constitution, and the common view that the germs of one are to be looked for in the Twelve is not far from the truth.

The Twelve left the selection of the Seven, which was a first step towards development, to the whole body of Christians, most of whom were Palestinian Jews. These showed their liberality by electing men, all of whom bear Greek names and were presumably, but not certainly, Greek-speaking Jews, who would be more acceptable to the murmuring Hellenists. One of the Seven was only a proselyte, and we have here a very early illustration of the expansive power of the Church. St. Luke's silence about elders in this connexion is the more remarkable, because distribution of the means of life was one of their functions (Ac 11<sup>30</sup>). The common identification of the Seven with the deacons is questionable. Probably they were temporary officials, scattered by the persecution which was fatal to Stephen, and never re-established. See DEACON.

The apostles' plan of leaving the choice of the Seven to the community was perhaps followed by St. Paul in his earlier work. In Romans he mentions no body of commissioned clergy. We cannot be sure from this that the Church in Rome was not yet organized: possibly there was no need to mention officials. In 1 and 2 Cor. there is no trace of a sacerdotal class; and it is possible that there and elsewhere the Apostle was trying the experiment of a Christian democracy without any hierarchy. Corinth had its charismatic ministry, and this seems to have sufficed for a time. The charismatic ministry came to an end very quickly there and elsewhere. There is little trace of it later than the Didache (A.D. 100-150). While it lasted, it supplied teachers, not rulers. The infant Gentile churches seem to have governed themselves under the direction of the Apostle who founded them. The Apostle does not address his letters to any official at Thessalonica, Corinth, or Rome. He leaves it to the congregation to punish and pardon offenders, to manage the collection of money, and to decide who shall take charge of the fund. These Gentile churches have gifted persons who take the lead in public worship, 'apostles, prophets, and teachers' (1 Co 12-<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>11</sup>; cf. Ro 12<sup>7-8</sup>), but they form no part of the permanent organization of the local church. They do not govern, nor are they tied to one community; they may go from one local church to another. They are not classes of officials each with special duties; they are individual believers with special gifts, with which they edify congregations. They are ministers of the word, proclaiming and explaining the gospel, and their business is to convert and instruct rather than to rule. They are 'spiritual' men (πνευματικοί), endowed by the Spirit (πνεύμα) with powers (χαρίσματα) which are not common to all Christians; and their authority depends not upon election or appointment by others, but upon these personal endowments, exercised with the consent of the congregation.

Yet it is scarcely credible that the infant Gentile churches remained very long without rulers of any kind. Congregations which consisted chiefly of Jewish Christians had 'elders' analogous to 'elders' among the Jews; and in the Gentile communities something similar would grow up, with or without the suggestion of the Apostle who founded the church. The converts who were senior, whether by standing or age, and persons of social position or secular experience, would naturally be looked upon as leaders; e.g. 'the elder brethren,' which is the true reading in Ac 15-<sup>3</sup>. There are similar leaders at Ephesus. St. Luke calls them 'the elders of the Church,' but he does not report that St. Paul in his address to them does so (Ac 20<sup>17-35</sup>). Except in the Pastorals, St. Paul does not mention 'elders.' In the earliest of his letters (1 Th 5<sup>1</sup>) he exhorts his Gentile converts 'to esteem exceeding highly them that labour among you and guide (προϊσταμένους) you in the Lord and admonish you.' F. J. A. Hort (Christian Ecclesia, 1897, p. 126) points out that although προϊσταμένους cannot be the technical title of an office, standing as it does between labouring and admonishing, yet the persons meant seem to be office-bearers in the Church. The words which follow, 'Admonish the disorderly, etc.,' appear to be addressed to these guardians. But here again these guides, like the 'apostles, prophets, and teachers,' seem to owe their appointment to personal qualities. The difference is that they guide and admonish rather than teach. But no strict line would be drawn between leading and teaching. The same man would often have a gift for both, and would be specially influential in consequence. When official appointments began to be made, persons with this double qualification would be chosen, and they became 'presbyters' or 'elders' in the technical sense.

There seems to be a transition stage between the purely charismatic and the official ministry in Ac 13<sup>1-4</sup>, about A.D. 47. There is a fast and a solemn service conducted by prophets and teachers at Antioch. During the service, the Spirit (through one of the prophets) says: 'Since you desire to know (δῆ), separate for me Barnabas and Saul,' who were present. There is another fast and service, and then the two are separated by the laying on of the hands of the other prophets and teachers. This ordination was for mission work, but ordination for the work of ruling congregations was probably similar. In 1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup> Timothy is reminded of the gift (χάρισμα) which was given him by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. 'By prophecy' probably refers to utterances of prophets which marked him out for ordination (1<sup>8</sup>) as a helper of St. Paul; and the presbyters of the local church joined with St. Paul in ordaining him. Here for the first time 'presbytery' is used of a body of Christian elders. In Lk 22<sup>26</sup> and Ac 22<sup>5</sup> it is used of the Sanhedrin. 'In none of these instances of the laying on of hands is there any trace of a belief in the magical virtue of the act. It is simply the familiar and expressive sign of benediction inherited by the Apostles from the Synagogue and adapted to the service of the Church' (Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, p. 384). The laying on of hands was used in blessing; and the person who blesses does not transmit any good gift which he possesses himself: he invokes what he has no power to bestow, but what he hopes that God will bestow. When this symbolical action was used by a minister in connexion with an appointment to the ministry, the idea of transmission naturally arose. But the action is a symbol, not an instrument of consecration. The gift which Timothy received at his ordination was just such as was required for ruling infant churches: it was 'a spirit of power, and love, and discipline' (2 Ti 1<sup>5-7</sup>). Cf. art. ORDINATION.

Permanent local officials were required in the first instance for the regulation of public worship. St. Paul gives the earliest directions respecting this, and what he lays down for the Corinthians is based on principles which can be applied everywhere. He gives no directions as to special ministers, but he recognizes them where they exist (Ph 1<sup>1</sup>). He and Barnabas appointed elders in every church (Ac 14<sup>-3</sup>). It is here that the influence of the synagogue is so marked. 'Elders' are borrowed from it. The ritual which Jewish and Christian elders regulate is similar—praise, reading of Scripture, exposition, and prayer. The discipline exercised by both is similar; they deal with much the same kind of offences, and the chief penalty in both cases is excommunication. When Christians were told not to take their disputes into Roman civil courts (1 Co 6), that involved the growth of Christian civil law, which the permanent officials had to administer; and here the influence of Roman legislation came in to develop what was derived from Christ's teaching and that of the OT.

The development of Church organization and the complete separation of the clergy from the laity were the work of the post-apostolic age. The remark that 'no soldier on service entangleth himself in the affairs of this life' (2 Ti 2<sup>4</sup>) contributed to this separation, for it was interpreted to mean that the clergy must abjure secular occupations. Already in apostolic times the clergy had three distinct rights: honour and obedience (1 Th 5<sup>12</sup>); maintenance (1 Co 9<sup>1-14</sup>); and freedom from frivolous accusations (1 Ti 5<sup>19</sup>). Before the end of the 2nd cent. most of the elements of the later development were already found in the Church.

Certainty is not attainable, and there is nothing approaching to it in favour of the theory that Christ gave a scheme of Church government to the apostles, and that they delivered it to the Church. There is little evidence to support either of these propositions. The far more probable theory is that Church government was a gradual growth initiated and guided by the Spirit, to meet the growing needs of a rapidly increasing community. This theory is supported by a good deal of evidence, and it is in harmony with what we know of God's methods in other departments of human life.

LITERATURE.—See works mentioned under APOSTLE and BISHOP; C. Gore, The Church and the Ministry, London, 1888; R. C. Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, do. 1897; J. Wordsworth, Serapion's Prayer-Book, do. 1899, The Ministry of Grace, do. 1901; T. M. Lindsay, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, do. 1902; A. W. F. Blunt, Studies in Apostol. Christianity, do. 1909; A. Harnack, Constitution and Law of the Church, Eng. tr., do. 1910; Robertson-Plummer, 1 Corinthians, Edinburgh, 1911, pp. xl-xlvi, 278-284; C. H. Turner, Studies in Early Church History, Oxford, 1912, Essays i. and ii.

ALFRED PLUMMER.

CILICIA (Κιλικία).—Cilicia was a country in the S.E. of Asia Minor, bounded on the west by Pamphylia, on the north by Lycaonia and Cappadocia, and on the east by the Amanus range. It was drained by four rivers, the Calycadnus, the Cydnus, the Serus, and the Pyramus, which descend from Taurus to the Cyprian Sea. It fell into two well-marked divisions. Cilicia Tracheia (Aspera), a rugged mountainous region with a narrow seaboard, was the immemorial haunt of brigands and pirates, whose subjugation was a difficult task for the Roman Republic and Empire; Cilicia Pedsea (Campestris), the wide and fertile plain lying between the Taurus and Amanus chains and the sea, was civilized and Hellenized. Its rulers in the Hellenistic period were partly the Egyptians, whose royal house gave its name to different townships, and partly the Seleucids, after whom the most considerable town of West Cilicia was named Seleucia on the Calycadnus.

In the NT 'Cilicia' invariably means Cilicia Pedsea. Though this country formed a part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, its political, social, and religious affinities were rather with Syria than with the lands to the north and west. The reason was geographical. It was comparatively easy to cross the Amanus range, either by the Syrian Gates (Beilan Pass) to Antioch and Syria, or by the Amanan Gates (Baghche Pass) to North Syria and the Euphrates. Hence it was natural that, at the redistribution of the provinces by Augustus in 27 B.C., Cilicia Pedsea, which had been Roman territory since 103 B.C., should be merged in the great Imperial province of Syria-Cilicia-Phoenice. It was equally natural that St. Paul, who boasted of being 'a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia' (Ac 21<sup>39</sup> 22<sup>3</sup>), should regard 'the regions of Syria and Cilicia' as forming a unity (Gal 1<sup>21</sup>). The writer of Acts does the same (15<sup>-3, 41</sup>), and the author of 1 Peter, who enumerates in his superscription the Roman provinces of Asia Minor, omits Cilicia, which lay beyond the barrier of Taurus and belonged to a different order of things.

The presence of Jews in Cilicia probably dated from the time of the early Seleucids, who settled many Jewish families in their Hellenistic cities, giving them equal rights with Macedonians and Greeks. St. Paul enjoyed the citizenship of Tarsus not as an individual, but as a unit in a Jewish colony which had been incorporated in the State. Jews of Cilicia are mentioned by Philo in his Leg. ad Gaium (§ 36). Among the Jews of Jerusalem who rose against Stephen there was a synagogue of Cilicians (Ac 6<sup>9</sup>). After his conversion St. Paul spent seven years in his Cilician homeland, engaged in a preparatory missionary work of which there are no recorded details. Probably he was founding the churches to which allusion is made in Ac 15<sup>-3, 41</sup>. He began his second missionary journey by passing through Cilicia to confirm these churches, after which he must have crossed the Cilician Gates to Lycaonia (16<sup>1</sup>); and probably he took the same road on his third journey (18<sup>-3</sup>). Syria and Cilicia were the first centres of Gentile Christianity, from which the light radiated over Asia Minor into Europe.

LITERATURE.—C. Ritter, Kleinasien, 1859, ii. 56 ff.; J. R. S. Sterrett, The Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor, 1888; W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Geog. of Asia Minor, 1890, p. 361 ff.; Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geog., i. [1856] 617; see also art. 'Cilicia' in HDB and Literature there cited.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CINNAMON (κιννάμωμον from κινν).—Cinnamon is mentioned in Rev 18<sup>13</sup> among the merchandise of 'Babylon,' i.e. of Imperial Rome. The name probably came with the thing from the remote east; Rodiger (Gesenius, Thes. Add., 1829, p. 111) compares it with the Malay kainamanis. It was known to the Hebrews (Ex 30<sup>-3</sup> Pr 17<sup>7</sup>, Ca 4<sup>14</sup>); and Herodotus (iii. 111) speaks of 'those rolls of bark (τὰ ῥα τὰ κάρφεια) which we, learning from the Phœnicians, call cinnamon.' The finest cinnamon of commerce is now obtained from Ceylon; it is the fragrant and aromatic inner rind of the stem and boughs of a tree which grows to a height of 30 ft. Oil of cinnamon, which is used in the composition of incense, is got from the boiled fruit of the tree. But the cinnamon of the ancients was probably the cassia lignea of S. China.

JAMES STRAHAN.

CIRCUMCISION.—The origin of circumcision and its practice by the Jews and other peoples may be studied in HDB and ERE. This article is concerned with the difficulties caused in the Apostolic Church by the desire of the Judaizing party to enforce the rite upon the Gentile Christians. The crisis thus brought about is described in Ac 15 and Gal 2<sup>1-10</sup>.

As the work of the Church extended, the problem of the reception of Gentile converts presented itself for solution. Should such converts be compelled to be circumcised and keep the Mosaic Law or not? The answer to this question led to great difference of opinion and threatened to cause serious division in the Church. It must be remembered that the first Christians were Jews, born and brought up in the Law and taught to observe it. To them such rites as circumcision were almost second nature. To abrogate the Law of Moses was to them inconceivable. The idea of the passing away of the Law had not yet penetrated their understanding. The headquarters of those who held these opinions were at Jerusalem, where the Temple services and the whole atmosphere served to strengthen them in this belief. The very name of the party—'They that were of the circumcision' (Ac 11<sup>2</sup>)—shows how closely they were attached to the observance of this rite. On the other hand, we can trace the gradual growth in the Church of the opposite view: the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch (q.v.) by Philip; the admission of Cornelius and his friends by St. Peter; the mission of certain evangelists to the Gentiles at Antioch; and finally the work of St. Paul and St. Barnabas, who turned to the Gentiles and freely admitted them into the fellowship of the Church.

It was obvious that the question must be settled. The Judaizing party were quite definite in their teaching. 'Certain men which came down from Judæa taught the brethren and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved' (Ac 15<sup>1</sup>). This was a position which it was impossible for St. Paul and St. Barnabas to admit. It was destructive of their work and of the catholicity of the Church. No wonder that 'there was no small dissension and disputation.' An appeal was made to the mother church at Jerusalem; and, among others, St. Paul and St. Barnabas went up. St. Paul's own statement is, 'I went up by revelation' (Gal 2-). He also tells us that Titus, an uncircumcised Gentile, accompanied him. They were well received by the church at Jerusalem, but certain of the Pharisees, who were believers, laid it down 'that it was necessary to circumcise them' (Ac 15<sup>5</sup>), and thus the issue was joined.

The question was so important that it could not be settled at once. There must be an interval for consideration. How this interval was spent we are told in Gal 2. The Judaizing party found that an uncircumcised Gentile—Titus—had been brought into their midst, and they immediately demanded his circumcision. With this demand St. Paul was not inclined to comply. The principle for which he was contending was at stake. On the other hand, circumcision to him was nothing, and there was the question whether he should yield as a matter of charity. The course which he took has always been a matter of undecided controversy, but the opinion of the majority of authorities is that Titus was not circumcised.*

After this episode St. Paul had an opportunity of discussing his gospel privately with those of repute, viz. James, Cephas, and John. They were evidently moved by the account of his work among the Gentiles, and recognized the hand of God in it, and they were influenced by the fervour and spirit of the Apostle. They gave to him and St. Barnabas 'the right hand of fellowship.' They recognized that their sphere was among the Gentiles, as that of the other apostles was among the Jews. The result of the conference was a compromise: Gentiles were not to be circumcised, but they were to abstain from certain practices which were offensive to their Jewish brethren.

The teaching of St. Paul on circumcision may be further illustrated from his Epistles. In Ro 2<sup>25-29</sup> he shows that circumcision was an outward sign of being one of the chosen people, but that it was of no value unless accompanied by obedience, of which it was the symbol. The uncircumcised keeper of the Law was better than the circumcised breaker of it. The true Jew is he who is circumcised in heart, i.e. he who keeps God's Law and walks in His ways. In ch. 4 he discusses the case of Abraham, and asks whether the Divine blessing was conferred upon him because he was the head of the chosen race and the first person of that race who was circumcised. He shows that the promise came before circumcision, and therefore not in consequence of it. Circumcision followed as the token or sign of the promise, so that he might be the father of all believers whether they were circumcised or uncircumcised.

In the Epistle to the Philippians, St. Paul utters grave warnings against those who insist on circumcision. He speaks of the rite, when thus insisted on, not as circumcision but as 'concision' (κατατομή, Ph 3-).* The circumcision which the Judaizers wished to enforce was to Christians a mere mutilation such as was practised by the idolatrous heathen. The verb κατατέμνειν is used in the LXX of incisions forbidden by the Mosaic Law: e.g. κατετέμνοντο κατὰ τὸν ἐθισμόν αὐτῶν (1 K 18<sup>28</sup>; cf. Lv 21<sup>5</sup>). In contrast to this, Christians have the true circumcision (Ph 3<sup>3</sup>), not of the flesh but of the heart, purified in Christ from all sin and wickedness. This contrast between circumcision of the flesh and of the spirit occurs in other passages of the Pauline Epistles, e.g. Col 2<sup>11</sup>, Eph 2<sup>11</sup>. No doubt the Apostle had certain OT passages in mind which use circumcision as a metaphor for purity, e.g. Lv 26<sup>41</sup>, Dt 10<sup>16</sup>, Ezk 44<sup>7</sup>.

LITERATURE.—Artt. on 'Circumcision' in HDB, ERE, DCG, and JF, with Literature there cited; the relevant Commentaries, esp. Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902); also E. v. Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904; K. Lake, The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul, 1911; E. B. Redlich, St. Paul and his Companions, 1913; H. Weinel, St. Paul, Eng. tr., 1906; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> [1897], ii. [1895].

MORLEY STEVENSON.

CITIZENSHIP (πολιτεία, ciuitas).—The conception of citizenship among the ancient Greeks and Romans was deeper than among ourselves. We can think of human existence and life apart from citizenship, but to the ancient member of a πολις or ciuitas citizenship was life and life was citizenship. This explains why St. Paul could use πολιτεῖσθαι practically in the sense of 'to live' (Ac 23<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1-<sup>7</sup>; cf. 3-<sup>0</sup> πολίτευμα). The life of a city is a development out of the more primitive life of the village-community (κῶμη, vicus). A πολις in fact consists of a number of κῶμαι, each of which consists of a number of families (οἶκος, domus). The unity was generally based on blood-relationship. The regular πόλις in the Greek world was on the model of the constitution of Athens. This constitution had a council (βουλή, senatus) or advisory body, and a popular assembly (δῆμος, ἐκκλησία, Ac 19<sup>32-39</sup>, 41), for membership of both of which free citizens were eligible. For citizenship the requirement was free birth within the community, the father being a citizen. It could be conferred on foreigners by a decree of the people. Each community contained also those who were not full citizens, but had certain privileges, viz. resident aliens (μέτοικοι; cf. the scriptural πάροικοι, παρεπίδημοι, Eph 2<sup>19</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>11</sup>, etc.). There was also a third class, ξένοι, strangers with no privileges at all, and a fourth class, the slaves, who were mere chattels. In such a constitution each citizen had to be enrolled in a particular tribe (φύλη, tribus). St. Paul refers with pride to his citizenship of Tarsus in Cilicia, his native city (Ac 21<sup>39</sup>). As a citizen of Tarsus he must have belonged to a particular tribe, and it has been plausibly conjectured by W. M. Ramsay that the 'kinsmen' of St. Paul referred to in Ro 16 were his fellow-tribesmen of Tarsus.

* For the contrary view see R. B. Rackham on Ac 15 (Oxford Com., 1901); and on the vexed chronological and other questions cf. artt. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES and GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO.

* The paronomasia of κατατομή and περιτομή used by St. Paul here is one of several instances in which he employs that figure of speech: e.g. μηδεν εργαζομένους ἀλλὰ περιεργαζομένους (2 Th 3<sup>11</sup>).

One kind of citizenship in the Apostolic Age swamped every other, and that was citizenship of Rome. This fact is well illustrated by a much earlier document—Cicero's speech, pro Balbo (56 B.C.). In it the principle is affirmed that 'no one could be a citizen of Rome and of other cities at the same time, while foreigners who were not Roman citizens could be on the burgess-rolls of any number of cities' (ed. J. S. Reid, 1878, p. 18). The spread of the Roman citizenship kept pace with the growth of the Empire. At first only inhabitants of Rome could be Roman citizens, but the citizenship was gradually extended as a result of Rome's conquests. It could be conferred both on communities and on individuals. Moreover, it was of two kinds or grades. In addition to the full citizenship, a limited citizenship existed till about 200 B.C.—ciuitas sine suffragio, implying that the persons who possessed it had all the privileges of a Roman citizen except the power to vote in the assemblies and to hold office. The constant conferment of this limited ciuitas added greatly to the Roman army and territory, and was not intended for the subjects' good. By the end of the 2nd cent. B.C. there were many country towns of Italy (municipia) which possessed citizen rights, and, as the result of the Social War and the Lex Julia (90 B.C.), the Lex Plautia Papiria (89 B.C.), a senatorial edict of 86 B.C., and a law of Julius Caesar (49 B.C.), all peoples in Italy south of the Alps obtained the Roman citizenship. Such communities were created also outside Italy by Julius Caesar, Claudius, Vespasian, and others, until in A.D. 212, under Caracalla, every free inhabitant of the Roman Empire obtained the full Roman franchise.

The inhabitants of coloniae required no grant of citizenship because they were of necessity Roman citizens from the first; a colonia was in origin simply a bit of Rome set down in a foreign country, to keep a subject people in check. It had complete self-government (see art. COLONY). The smaller fora and conciliabula had in Republican times incomplete self-government. The municipia, referred to above as incorporated bodily in the Roman State, had complete self-government, differing thus from the praefecturae, which were also communities of Roman citizens but without complete self-government.

The partial citizenship known as Latinitas or ius Latii deserves mention. It conferred commercium (the right to trade with Rome, and to acquire property by Roman methods, etc.), but not conubium (the right of intermarriage with Romans). It was thus a kind of intermediate condition between citizenship and peregrinity, and such rights were not infrequently conferred on communities as a kind of step towards the full citizenship. The name is explained by the origin of the practice. It began in Rome's early days as the result of her relations with other towns in the Latin League, and in 172 B.C. was first extended beyond Latium. Magistrates in such towns became ipso facto full Roman citizens.

The conferment of citizenship on individuals has a special interest for students of the Apostolic Age. During the whole of the Republican period the extension of the body of burgesses was the right of the comitia tributa. This assembly conferred the citizenship from time to time on individual strangers (peregrini) as well as on communities. Commissioners for carrying out colonization or divisions of ager publicus could confer it on a very limited number of persons, and C. Marius received such a power. About the time of the civil wars, Roman commanders conferred the citizenship on individual foreigners who had aided the Roman military operations. This must often have been done without the authority of any statute, but no one was ever disfranchised in consequence. Pompey, however, obtained the right, by the Lex Gellia Cornelia of 72 B.C., to confer the citizenship on individuals after consulting with his body of advisers. It was probably either from him or from Julius Caesar that the father or grandfather of St. Paul obtained the Roman citizenship. Tarsus as a community had not received the Roman franchise, nor was it a colonia. The possession of this honour (Ac 16<sup>37</sup> 22<sup>25ff.</sup>) shows that his family was one of distinction and wealth. Members of such provincial communities who possessed the Roman citizenship constituted the aristocracy of these communities. During the Empire the burgesses could be added to by the Emperor only, and every citizen had the right to a trial at Rome. Of this right St. Paul took advantage (Ac 25<sup>10</sup>).

LITERATURE.—ON GREEK CITIZENSHIP: P. Gardner and F. B. Jevons, A Manual of Greek Antiquities, London, 1895, bk. vi.; G. Gilbert, Handbuch der griechischen Staatsaltertümer, i.<sup>2</sup> [Leipzig, 1893], ii. [1885] (Eng. tr. of vol. i.<sup>2</sup>=The Constitutional Antiquities of Sparta and Athens, London, 1895); K. F. Hermann, Lehrbuch der griechischen Antiquitäten, i.<sup>6</sup> [Freiburg i. B., 1889-1892], ii. [1895].—ON ROMAN CITIZENSHIP: J. Muirhead, Historical Introduction to the Private Law of Rome, Edinburgh, 1886 (new ed. by H. Goudy, 1899); J. S. Reid, 'On Some Questions of Roman Public Law,' in Journal of Roman Studies, i. [1911] 68-99; J. E. Sandys, A Companion to Latin Studies, Cambridge, 1913, vi. 1 (J. S. Reid), vi. 7, 8 (B. W. Henderson) and Literature cited there; Th. Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht<sup>13</sup>, Leipzig, 1887.—ON ST. PAUL'S ROMAN CITIZENSHIP: W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 30 f., 225.

A. SOUTER.

CLAUDA.—See CAUDA.

CLAUDIA (Κλαυδία).—Claudia was a Christian lady of Rome who was on friendly terms with the Apostle Paul at the date of his second imprisonment, and who, along with Eubulus, Pudens, and Linus (qq.v.), sends a greeting to Timothy (2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). This is all we know with any certainty regarding her. The name suggests that she belonged to the Imperial household, and various conjectures have been made as to her identity, though there is very little in the nature of certain data. Probably she was a slave, but it is not impossible that she was a member of the gens Claudia. In the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) she is regarded as the mother of Linus (Λίνος ὁ Κλαυδίας). An inscription found on the road between Rome and Ostia (CIL vi. 15066) to the memory of the infant child of Claudius Pudens and Claudia Quinctilla has given rise to the conjecture that this was the Claudia of St. Paul and that she was the wife of the Pudens of 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>. Another ingenious but most improbable theory identifies Claudia with Claudia Rufina, the wife of Aulus Pudens, the friend of Martial (Epigr. iv. 13, xi. 34), and thus makes her a woman of British race. This Claudia of Martial has again been identified with an imaginary Claudia suggested by a fragmentary inscription found at Chichester in 1722 which seems to record the erection of a temple by a certain Pudens with the approval of Claudius Cogidubnus, who is supposed to be a British king mentioned in Tacitus (Agricola, xiv.) and the father of the Claudia who had adopted the name (cognomen) Rufina from Pomponia the wife of Aulus Plautius, the Roman governor of Britain (A.D. 43-52). E. H. Plumptre in Ellicott's NT Commentary (ii. 186) confidently asserts the identity of the Claudia of St. Paul with the friend of Martial and the daughter of Cogidubnus. All such identification is, however, extremely precarious. The theory that Claudia is the daughter of the British prince Caractacus who had been brought to Rome with his wife and children is a product of the inventive imagination. Lightfoot (Apostolic Fathers, i. i. 76-79) discusses the whole question of identification, and decides that, apart from the want of evidence, the position of the names of Pudens and Claudia in the text 2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup> disposes of the possibility of their being husband and wife—a difficulty which Plumptre evades by the supposition that they were married after the Epistle was written. The low moral character of Martial's friend Pudens can hardly be explained away sufficiently to make him a likely companion of St. Paul (cf. Merivale, St. Paul at Rome, 149).

LITERATURE.—E. H. Plumptre, in Ellicott's NT Com., 1884, vol. ii. p. 186: 'Excursus on the later years of St. Paul's life'; J. B. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 1890, i. i. 76-79; C. Merivale, St. Paul at Rome, 1877, p. 149; T. Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1875, ii. 397; artt. in HDB and EBi; Conybeare-Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1877, ii. 582, 594. W. F. BOYD.

CLAUDIUS.—Claudius, or, to give him his full Imperial style, Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus (to which the honorary titles Britannicus and Sarmaticus [see Papyr. Brit. Mus. 1178 = G. Milligan, Selections from the Greek Papyri, 1910, no. 40] are sometimes added), the son of Nero Claudius Drusus (38-9 B.C.), stepson of Augustus, and Antonia Minor (the younger daughter of the triumvir Mark Antony and Octavia, sister of Augustus), was born on 1 Aug. 10 B.C. at Lugudunum (Lyons). His father died the year after. The boy inherited both physical and mental weakness, and was in consequence neglected. There was no room in Roman life for weaklings; exposure of newly born children was frequent, and until Christianity came there was little care for the physically or mentally defective. Claudius was left to the society of his social inferiors, and coarse tastes were developed in him. The one bright side in his life was his devotion to scientific, especially historical, studies. Augustus saw some good in him, but kept him from the public gaze. At the succession of Tiberius in A.D. 14 he began to take some slight part in public life, but most of his time was spent on country estates. Gaius, grandnephew of Tiberius and nephew of Claudius, succeeded to the purple in A.D. 37, and raised his uncle to the consulship at once. Soon after, however, the feelings of the maddest of all the Emperors changed, and Claudius was once more in a position of disgrace. Claudius had married Plautia Urgulanilla (before A.D. 20), who bore him a son and a daughter, but was afterwards divorced for adultery. His marriage with Ælia Pætina, by whom he had a daughter, had the same end. The notorious Valeria Messalina was his third wife, and by her a daughter was born about the year 40, and a son called Britannicus in 41. It is said that Claudius, after the murder of his nephew, was dragged from a remote part of the palace, where he was cowering in terror, and made Emperor almost unawares (25 Jan. 41) by the army. He now changed his name from Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus Germanicus to that given above. His reign of thirteen years was very much more successful than might have been anticipated.

Some of the more important events of his reign may be enumerated in the order of their occurrence.

In A.D. 41 certain reforms were made in the regulation of the corn supply, etc., which had suffered in Gaius' reign. Many of these reforms were doubtless due to the Emperor's freedmen, Narcissus, the ab epistulis, M. Antonius Pallas, the a rationibus, etc., who exercised a tremendous influence during his reign and acquired colossal fortunes in his service. In this year successes were gained in Mauretania and also against the Catti and Chauci in Germany; the eagle of Varus, captured in A.D. 9, was now recovered. Privileges were granted to the Jews of Alexandria; Agrippa (q.v.) had his kingdom extended by the addition of Judæa and Samaria, and was thus ruler of all the territory that had once been Herod's (A.D. 42). To facilitate the supply of corn to Rome, the building of a harbour at Ostia, the mouth of the Tiber, was decided on. War in Mauretania continued, and the district was made into two provinces, Mauretania Tingitana and Mauretania Cæsariensis, which were each put under the command of an Imperial procurator. Pretenders to the Imperial throne were crushed (A. D. 42). Lycia, owing to disturbances, was made an Imperial province, under a legatus pro prætoribus. Britain was invaded for the first time since Julius Cæsar (55 B.C.). A. Plautius landed with a strong army and fought against the Trinovantes in the south of the island. Claudius followed in person, defeated the enemy on the Thames, captured their chief city Camulodunum (Colchester), and returned to the continent after a sixteen days' stay. The southern half of England was made into a province, and A. Plautius was appointed the first governor (43). King Agrippa of Judæa died, and his kingdom was again made a Roman province and put under a procurator. In this and next year (44-45) the pacification of Britain was continued. In A.D. 46 King Rhemetalses II. of Thrace having been murdered, his territory was made into a Roman province and put under a procurator. This was also the year of the great famine in Palestine (Ac 11<sup>28</sup>; Ramsay, St. Paul, pp. 49, 68, Expositor, 6th ser. xii. [1905] 299). In 47 the censorship was revived after a long period of disuse, the Emperor taking the office, and endeavouring to improve public morality. The eight-hundredth anniversary of Rome was celebrated with great éclat. New aqueducts and roads were built, and three letters were added to the alphabet. These last were to represent sounds as yet imperfectly represented, but they did not survive Claudius' reign. A number of edicts were issued by the Emperor. A. Plautius was recalled from Britain, given an ovation, and succeeded by P. Ostorius Scapula, who had to repel an attack immediately on arrival. Cn. Domitius Corbulo gained victories in Germania Inferior. A census taken in the year 48 revealed a total of 5,994,072 Roman citizens (other reports vary, the largest number given being 6,941,000). Messalina was married according to legal form to C. Silius in October; immediately afterwards they and all their accomplices were put to death. Claudius married as his fourth wife his own niece, Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. Her son, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the future Emperor Nero, had the way thus paved for his accession. On the death of Herod, king of Chalcis, or soon after, his kingdom was given to Agrippa II., son of Claudius' old friend. In the year 49, we see Agrippina at once occupying a position of authority in the State equal to if not greater than that of her husband. She betrothed her son to Octavia, Claudius' daughter, and put him under the tuition of the great philosopher L. Annaeus Seneca. The Ituraean country and perhaps also Abilene were added to the Province Syria. Scapula was successful in Britain. In A.D. 50 the young Domitius was adopted by Claudius, as future colleague to his own son Britannicus. Other events are the war in Germany; the great success of Scapula—the wife, daughter, and brothers of Caractacus falling into the hands of the conqueror; Claudius' edict expelling the Jews from Rome (Ac 18<sup>2</sup>), on account of their dissensions. The result of this edict was that for the four years 50-54 the Church of Rome was bereft of its Jewish members. The year 51 saw the danger of famine and the Emperor's relief measures. In 52 astrologers were banished from Italy. Laws were passed as to children born of unions between free and slaves. Quarrels arose between Jews and Samaritans. Felix received the government of the whole of Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and Perea. Scapula warred against the Silures and died; he was succeeded by A. Didius Gallus, who drove the Silures out of Roman territory. In 53 Nero advanced, and Britannicus kept in the background. Agrippa II. received, in place of his district Chalcis, the former tetrarchy of Trachonitis, Batanaea, Gaulanitis, and Abilene as his kingdom. In 54 Claudius was poisoned at the instance of Agrippina on 13 October.

Claudius was deified after his death. A skit preserved among the works of Seneca, and called 'The Pumpkinification of Claudius,' is among the most amusing relics of Latin literature.

This bald enumeration will show that much was done during the reign of Claudius. It is true that at all times he was too much under the dominion of evil women, and that he never thoroughly cast off the brutish habits contracted in his youth, but yet his reign was the most important for the Roman Empire in the period between the reigns of Augustus and of Trajan. The Empire was extended in various directions; much social legislation was carried out; and great public works, such as roads, aqueducts, harbours, were accomplished. The Emperor, like most of his class, was a hard worker, or countenanced the hard work of his freedmen. The position of importance occupied by these men is in fact a leading characteristic of the reign, and was most obnoxious to the old aristocracy, which may be said to have thus received its death-blow. The power of the Senate was greatly circumscribed. Claudius was, inter alia, something of an author. It was in fact the rule rather than the exception that Romans of high birth should, among their other accomplishments, be wielders of the pen. He began to write a history, but abandoned it unfinished. A second historical work was published, and some fragments of it have survived. He also wrote eight books of autobiography, and worked at Etrurian and Carthaginian history. The greater part of a speech he delivered in the Senate has been preserved on a bronze tablet at Lyons. His style is not without merits.

LITERATURE.—Much valuable material has been found in the article by Groag and Gaheis in Pauly-Wissowa, iii. cols. 2778–2839: cf. also A. v. Domaszewski, Gesch. der röm. Kaiser, ii. [Leipzig, 1909] pp. 21–46. On the chronology of events in the Claudian period referred to in the NT see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, London, 1895, pp. 48 ff., 68 f., Was Christ born at Bethlehem?, do. 1898, p. 223 f., Expositor, 6th series, xii. [1905] 299; the latest general treatment of Pauline chronology by the erudite French scholar, M. Goguel, in 'Essai sur la chronologie paulinienne' (RHR lxx. [1912] 235–339). A. SOUTER.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS.—See LYSIAS.

CLAY.—See POTTER and PREDESTINATION.

CLEAN, UNCLEAN, COMMON.—'Common' (κοινός, communis) is an honourable word in classical Greek = 'shared by the people.' In Hellenistic Greek, it has sometimes this same meaning (Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup>, Jude 3), but sometimes a less honourable one (= Lat. vulgaris). This depreciation arose out of the transcendence of religion to the Eastern mind. What was 'shared by the people' had become profaned for the god (cf. the English word 'worldly,' meaning first secular, then unspiritual). We see the process with κοινός in He 10<sup>29</sup>—'counted the blood of the covenant a common [i.e. secular] thing.' In Rev 21<sup>27</sup> we go a step further, and 'anything common' means the worldly, the unspiritual (cf. Jos. Ant. XII. ii. 14, XIII. i. 1). Elsewhere 'common' corresponds to positive, active uncleanness (Ac 10<sup>14</sup> 28 11<sup>8</sup>, Ro 14<sup>14</sup>, 1 Mac 1<sup>47</sup> 62, Jos. Ant. XI. viii. 7; the verb is found in Ac 21<sup>28</sup>, He 9<sup>13</sup>).

The distinction, 'clean' (καθαρός) and 'unclean' (ἀκάθαρτος), refers in the OT and primitive religions to definite departments of life, such as food, sanitation, contact with the dead, and marriage (Lv 11–15). In the OT it is mainly a common-sense distinction, made, however, from religious motives, and becoming part of the ritual of the Hebrews. It was thus a practical differentiation between them and surrounding peoples. It arose out of a good idea, but when separated from this idea grew into a proud national badge. Such national and religious customs, so long held, seem stronger than they are. One push of a new movement will often destroy, almost in a moment, the habits of centuries. We find this process to-day in the East. In the NT it may be seen in the case of Simon Peter; he combined Christian beliefs and Jewish distinctions without at first being willing to perceive their variance. His vision (Ac 10) woke him, and, though he relapsed for an instant (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>), the work was done; and when that generation passed away, the religious nature of these distinctions had gone from Christianity; cleanliness, instead of being godliness, was next to godliness. These details of conduct were left to the reason and the conscience. The transition stage, where some cling to the old laws and others obey the new spirit, with its problems of faith and charity, is treated in Ro 14.

There is another ground for this ceremonial distinction of 'clean' and 'unclean,' i.e. contact with idolatry, which in the OT makes unclean (Dt 7<sup>25</sup>). St. Paul allows (1 Co 8) that an idol is nothing and cannot affect meats offered to it. But idolatry is something—its atmosphere, its offerings, its gatherings into temples. It becomes the embodiment of demons (1 Co 10–9); there is a 'table' of demons, an agreement with hell, and no man can with impunity associate with even the outward forms which this agreement takes, or frequent the places where it is most generally made. The Apostle treats marriage (g.v.) in a similar way. He would place restrictions on the marriage of believers with unbelievers. It is as if a Christian were participating in idolatry (1 Co 10<sup>18–20</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>14–16</sup>), or trying to mingle the communion of God with the communion of devils. If, however, they are already married, the principle of faith triumphs over all forms. The believing partner sanctifies the unbelieving one, and their children are holy (1 Co 7<sup>14</sup>). St. Paul recognizes the value of forms for the human spirit, but he subordinates them to the conscience. Many of the old tabus on food, marriage, travel, the Sabbath, were rooted in fact. They were based on laws of health, decency, human nature; but they were not deeper than that. They were not religious principles to be obeyed without thought and absolutely guaranteeing purity.

Men are always tending to revert to forms, and there was yet another movement in later NT times, which felt after this old distinction. It adopted that of matter and spirit, in which spirit is clean, matter unclean. It had ordinances like 'Touch not, taste not, handle not' (Col 2–1), it tried to refine in all manner of ways, it forbade men to eat meat and to marry (1 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>). St. Paul answers in Tit 1<sup>16</sup>: All the external refinements in the world will not avail to give purity; purity of heart, the will to be pure, alone secures it in body and spirit.

LITERATURE.—HDB, art. 'Unclean'; W. R. Smith, RS2, 1894, Additional Note B; F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894, chs. 6, 7; J. B. Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon, 1879, pp. 83 ff., 408–414; R. C. Trench, NT Synonyms, 1876, p. 308. SHERWIN SMITH.

CLEANTHES.—See QUOTATIONS.

CLEMENT.—Mention is made of Clement in Ph 4<sup>3</sup> as one of St. Paul's fellow-workers. If μετα καὶ κλήμεντος is connected with συλλαμβάνον, Clement was urged to help in the work of reconciling Euodia and Syntyche. But it is better to connect the phrase with συνηθλησαν, so including Clement among those with whom these women and St. Paul 'laboured in the gospel'; i.e. he had been conspicuous in Christian work in Philippi. But the reference does not suggest that he was in Philippi when St. Paul wrote; it is too oblique for that. Would he not have been asked to use his good offices to effect a reconciliation? Two things are possible: (a) he may be dead, though his memory is fragrant (the reference to other 'fellow-workers whose names are in the book of life' is not inconsistent with this suggestion); (b) he may be with St. Paul, one of the band who gathered about him in his imprisonment and through whom the Apostle carried on his work. In that case Clement was in Rome, and one of the arguments against identifying him with Clement, bishop of Rome, who wrote the Letter to the Church of Corinth, would disappear. The difficulty of date is, however, serious, though not insuperable. If Clement were a promising convert from Philippi, who after serving there with marked success became a pupil and companion of St. Paul, he could not very well have been less than 35 or 40 years of age when Phil. was written from Rome about A.D. 60. If this Clement is to be identified with Clemens Romanus, he must have lived to extreme old age. The identification, first made by Origen, cannot be proved; it is even precarious; but Kennedy goes too far when he calls it 'absurd' (EGT, 'Philippians,' ad loc.).

The name is a common one.

LITERATURE.—J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878 (esp. note on p. 168 ff.); H. A. A. Kennedy, EGT, 'Philippians', 1903; art. on 'Clement' in HDB; E. B. Redlich, St. Paul and his Companions, 1913, p. 223. J. E. ROBERTS.

CLEMENT OF ROME, EPISTLE OF.—1. Occasion.—The Epistle of Clement itself supplies complete information as to the circumstances under which it was written. Dissension had arisen within the Christian community at Corinth, and the Church was torn asunder. The original ground of contention is not mentioned, but the course of the strife is clearly indicated. A small but powerful party of malcontents (i. 1, xlvii. 6) had used their influence to secure the deposition of certain presbyters, men duly appointed according to apostolic regulations, who were, moreover, of blameless reputation and unfailing zeal in the performance of their duties (xlv. 3). A fierce controversy was raging, and the Corinthian Church, hitherto renowned for its virtues, especially such as are the outcome of brotherly love (i. 2-ii.), had become a stumbling-block instead of an example to the world (xlvii. 7). Once before, the Church of Corinth had shown the same spirit of faction (1 Co 1<sup>10</sup>. 12). History was now repeating itself, but the latter case was much worse than the former. Then, the contending parties had at least claimed to be following the lead of apostolic men, but now the main body of the Church was following 'one or two' contumacious persons in rebellion against their lawful rulers (xlvii.).

The news of this state of things was brought to Rome. How it came it is impossible to say. Ill news travels apace, and Rome is within easy reach of Corinth. It seems clear that no direct appeal was made to Rome by either contesting party. Yet in the ordinary course of things the Roman Church would soon hear of the Corinthian trouble, for communication seems to have been fairly frequent between the principal Christian communities in the early days (note the stress laid on the duty of hospitality, i. x. xi. xii. xxxv.). At any rate the Christians at Rome heard of the Corinthian dissension while it was still at its height (xvi. 9). When the tidings first came, they themselves were suffering under the stress of external persecution (i. 1, vii. 1), but as soon as the storm had abated, a letter was written in the name of the Church at Rome to the Church at Corinth, expressing the sorrow which the Corinthian feud had caused to the Christians at Rome, and admonishing the Corinthians to remember the primary duty of φιλადελφία and bring their strife to an end. That Epistle has survived to the present day. It is known as 'the First Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.'

2. Date and authorship.—(1) Date.—The terminus a quo for the dating of the Epistle is fixed by its reference to the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul (v. 4, 6), and its use of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xxxvi. xliii.). Even if we accept the earliest possible dates for the death of the apostles and for the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of Clement cannot have been written before A.D. 70. The terminus ad quem is also fixed by the fact that Clement's Epistle was indubitably used by Polycarp in his Epistle to the Philippians (Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. [Apostol. Fathers, pt. i., 1890] vol. i. p. 149 ff.). If Lightfoot be correct—as seems most probable—in dating Polycarp's letter c. A.D. 110 (St. Ign. and St. Polyc.<sup>2</sup> [Apostol. Fathers, pt. ii., 1889], vol. i. p. 423 ff.), the date of Clement's Epistle must fall between the years A.D. 70 and A.D. 110.

Fortunately it is possible to reduce these limits very considerably. The Epistle contains distinct allusions to two serious persecutions already suffered by the Church at Rome. During the former of these, we are told, 'women suffered cruel and unholly insults as Danaids and Dirce,' and 'a vast multitude of the elect' endured 'many indignities and tortures' before 'they reached the goal in the race of faith and received a noble reward' (vi. 1, 2). When the Epistle was written this persecution was a matter of past history, but its victims are still spoken of as 'those champions who lived very near to our own time' and 'the noble examples which belong to our generation' (τοὺς ἐγγύστα γενομένους ἀθλητάς . . . τῆς γενεᾶς ἡμῶν τὰ γενναῖα ὑποδείγματα, v. 1). The second persecution was still in progress when the news of the Corinthian schism was brought to Rome. The Epistle opens with an apology for the delay in writing which has been caused by 'the sudden and repeated calamities and reverses which have befallen us' (τὰς αἰφνιδίους καὶ ἐπαλλήλους γενομένας ἡμῖν συμφορὰς καὶ περιπτώσεις, i. 1). The writer's words suggest that the method of attack adopted in the later persecution was different from that of the earlier one. That the two are not to be identified is made plain in vii. 1, where a clear distinction is drawn between the martyrs of an earlier date and 'us' who 'are in the same lists,' whom 'the same contest awaits.'

Now it is a well-established fact that during the 1st cent. A.D. the Roman Church suffered two, and only two, serious persecutions. The first was that of Nero (c. A.D. 64), in the course of which, according to an ancient tradition, St. Paul lost his life. The second was that of Domitian. Nero's persecution was a savage onslaught on all Christians indiscriminately; that of Domitian took the form of sharp intermittent attacks aimed at individuals. In fact, the difference between the two was precisely the difference between the two persecutions mentioned in the Epistle of Clement. It seems, therefore, a safe conclusion that the references of the Epistle are to the persecutions of Nero and Domitian, and that the Epistle was written either just before or just after the termination of the latter of the two, i.e. c. A.D. 95-96. This date suits admirably the other indications of time contained in the Epistle, all of which point towards the close of the 1st cent. A.D. An earlier date is precluded by the following facts: (a) the Church of Corinth is already called αρχαία (xlvii. 6); (b) presbyters are mentioned who have succeeded successors of the apostles (xlv. 3); (c) the language used of the Roman envoys 'who have walked among us from youth unto old age unblameably' (lxiii. 3) seems to imply that a generation has almost passed since the Church of Rome was founded. On the other hand, the Epistle cannot have been written later than the end of the century, because (a) St. Peter and St. Paul are included amongst the 'examples of our own generation' (v. 1); (b) ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος are still regarded as interchangeable terms (xlv. 4, 5), whereas very early in the 2nd cent. they were used to denote distinct offices (Ign. Epp., passim). Finally, external evidence of an early and reliable kind (a) connects the Epistle with the episcopate of Clement, third bishop of Rome, and (b) places his episcopate in the last decade of the 1st cent. A.D. (Hegesippus, ap. Eus. HE iv. 22; Dion. Cor. ap. Eus. HE iv. 23; Iren. adv. Hær. iii. iii. 3). In view of this accumulation of evidence, it is impossible to doubt that the Epistle of Clement was written about A.D. 95-96.

(2) Authorship.—The Epistle itself claims to be the letter not of an individual but of a community. The author's name is nowhere mentioned. Nor indeed do we find in the statements of Hegesippus, Dionysius of Corinth, and Irenæus, the three earliest writers who connect the Epistle with the name of Clement, any definite assertion that Clement was the author. Eusebius, to whom we owe our knowledge of Hegesippus, does indeed declare that that writer 'makes some remarks concerning the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians' (HE iv. 22), but the title here given to the letter is due to the historian and not to Hegesippus, whose own words have unfortunately not been preserved. Dionysius of Corinth, c. A.D. 170 (ap. Eus. HE iv. 23), speaks of τὴν πρότερον ἡμῖν διὰ Κλήμεντος γραφείσαν (sc. ἐπιστολήν), but his statement is ambiguous. διὰ Κλήμεντος might mean that Clement was the author, the amanuensis, or even the bearer of the Epistle. Similarly the language of Irenæus (c. A.D. 180) is indefinite as to the actual authorship of the letter: ἐπὶ τούτου οὖν τοῦ Κλήμεντος . . . ἐπέστειλεν ἡ ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἐκκλησία ἱκανωτάτην γραφὴν τοῖς Κορινθίοις (adv. Hær. III. iii. 3). Yet it must be admitted that there is nothing in the language of any of these three writers to exclude the possibility of believing that they regarded Clement as the author of the Epistle. The absence of more explicit statement on the subject is probably due to the fact that they looked upon the letter as the utterance of the whole Roman Church rather than of one man. The Epistle is first definitely ascribed to Clement of Rome in the writings of his namesake of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200), who, though his usage is not quite uniform, on at least four occasions speaks of Clement as the author (Strom. i. 7, iv. 17-19, v. 12, vi. 8). All later writers are unanimous in accepting this opinion (Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. vol. i. p. 160 ff.).

It is unreasonable to doubt that they are justified in doing so. That Clement was head of the Roman community at the time of the Corinthian schism is as well attested as any fact of early Church history, and as such he would be the natural mouthpiece of the Church of Rome in its communications with a sister community. At any rate, this function is attributed to him by the writer of 'Hermas' (πέμψει οὖν Κλήμης εἰς τὰς ἑξὼ πόλεις, ἐκεῖν γὰρ ἐπιτρέψονται, Vis. II. iv. 3), and 'Hermas' may have been written as early as A.D. 110-125 (V. H. Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, pt. i. pp. 34-41). Again, however worthless as historical documents the Clementine Recognitions and Homilies may be, they at least bear witness to the fact that, by the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D., Clement was regarded as an author. It is difficult to understand what could have given rise to that opinion except the belief that he was the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians. Certainly at that date no other writings of importance were attributed to him. But the real value of the Epistle depends not so much on its authorship as on its date, which is sufficiently indicated by purely internal evidence.

3. Contents.—Introductory.—(a) Opening salutation from 'the Church of God which sojourneth in Rome to the Church of God which sojourneth in Corinth.' (b) Apology for apparent lack of interest in the Corinthian trouble. The Romans' previous silence due to the 'sudden and repeated calamities' which have befallen them.

(1) The Corinthian trouble—its cause and the remedy.—Now at last we have an opportunity of speaking our mind about 'the detestable and unholy sedition which a few headstrong and self-willed persons have kindled' till the once honoured name of the Church of Corinth is now greatly reviled (i. 1). For indeed the Church of Corinth has hitherto been a model of Christian virtues, especially of sobriety in all things, of self-sacrifice and moderation (i. 2-ii.). But, like Israel of old, you have been spoiled by your good progress. Excellence has given way to jealousy and envy (iii.). Envy and ill-will always result in suffering. So much we may learn from the stories of Cain, of Jacob, of Moses, Aaron and Miriam, of Dathan and Abiram, and of David (iv.). Or think of those who suffered martyrdom 'nearest our own time'—of Peter and Paul and the multitude of others (v. vi.). These examples ought to warn us who have to face the same expression of the world's envy to be free from envy ourselves. If we have not kept ourselves free from it, then let us use the 'grace of repentance' which Christ's death won for man (vii.), even as the men of old repented at the preaching of Noah and of Jonah (vii. 5 ff.).

The Holy Spirit Himself, through the prophets, calls men to repentance (viii.). Let us be obedient to His call, following the example of Enoch and Noah (ix.). Obedience to God brought blessings upon Abraham (x.); faith and care for others saved Lot from the fate of Sodom (xi.), and Rahab from the fate of Jericho (xii.). 'Arrogance and conceit and folly and anger' must be laid aside. The promises of the Scriptures and of the Lord Jesus are for the humble-minded (xiii. xiv.), who are genuinely so (xv.). What an example of humility was set by Christ Himself (xvi.) and by the saints of old—Elijah, Elisha, Ezekiel, Abraham, Job, Moses (xvii.) and David (xviii.)! Self-seeking and discord are contrary to the will of the Creator (xix.); the harmony of the natural world proves His own long-suffering and love of settled order (xx.). Let us therefore act as befits the servants of such a Master, for He reads the secrets of all hearts. Let us reverence rulers, honour elders, and train our families to do the same (xxi.); for Christ, through the Holy Spirit, and the Father both commend the single-hearted and condemn such as are double-minded (xxii. xxiii.). The Lord will come quickly (xxiii.).

(2) The resurrection of the body. Faith and works the means by which the elect obtain this and the other blessings of God.—Let us have no doubt about the resurrection of the dead. Life out of death is the very law of Nature. Day grows out of night, the plant from the death of the seed (xxiv.), the phoenix from its parent's ashes (xxv.). In the Scriptures God has promised a resurrection. His promise and His power are alike sufficient, for He is almighty and cannot lie. Therefore let our souls be bound to Him with this hope (xxvi.-xxviii.).

We must approach Him in holiness of soul, for we are His 'elect,' His 'special portion' (xxix.); as such we must put away all lust, strife, contention, and pride. 'Boldness and arrogance and daring are for them that are accursed of God; but forbearance and humility and gentleness are with them that are blessed of God' (xxx.). This, then, is how the blessing of God is obtained. We see it in the case of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (xxxi.). They were blessed 'not through themselves, in their own works or righteous doing,' but because they accepted the will of God, i.e. through faith. So we are justified by faith (xxxii.).

Yet we must never be slack in works. Does not the Creator rejoice to work unceasingly? We must follow His example, for we are made in His image (xxxiii.). We must imitate the diligence of the angels, if we would win the promises of God (xxxiv.). How blessed and marvellous are the gifts which God prepares for them that patiently await Him! If we would enjoy them, we must first have done with all bitterness and strife, vainglory and inhospitality, which are hateful to Him (xxxv.). Jesus Christ, 'the Guardian and Helper of our weakness,' will aid us in our efforts, and He is mightier than any angel (xxxvi.).

(3) Discipline is indispensable in a corporate society: provision made for this in the Mosaic Law and in the Divinely appointed ministry of the Church.—We are Christ's soldiers (στρατευόμεθα, xxxvii. 1); soldiers must be under discipline, each in his own rank. Look at the soldiers in the Roman army; think of the limbs in a human body; 'all the members conspire and unite in subjection, that the whole body may be saved' (xxxvii.). So the members of the Christian body must perform each his own function for the common weal (xxxviii.). Only 'senseless and stupid and foolish and ignorant men' seek power and exaltation, forgetting the utter nothingness of man, and the condemnation of the Scriptures for such as themselves (xxxix.).

Regard for order and decency is Divinely taught in the Mosaic Law, which expressly prescribes how, when, and by whom each of its rites shall be performed, every man having his own appointed place, whether high priest, priest, Levite, or layman (xl.). So we, who are under the Christian Law, must be content to perform the function which is appointed for us (xli.).

The Christian ministry is a Divinely appointed order. Jesus Christ was sent forth from God, and Himself sent forth the apostles. They, in turn, when they had preached in town and country, appointed such of their converts as were approved by the Spirit, to be 'bishops and deacons unto them that should believe' (xlii.). In this they followed the example of Moses, who appointed a succession of priests, and to prevent all future dispute, confirmed the appointment of Aaron's line by the miracle of the budding rod (xliii.). The apostles, too, were Divinely warned that strife would arise over the bishop's office. They therefore provided for a regular succession of the ministry from generation to generation (xliv. 1, 2).

(4) The Corinthians have disobeyed not only a specific ordinance of God, but also the fundamental Christian law of love. May they speedily repent.—You have sinned grievously in thrusting from their office men who were duly appointed according to the apostles' directions, and have faithfully discharged the duties of a bishop (xlv. 3-6). It is monstrous that God's officers should be persecuted by those who profess to be God's servants. Read your Bible, and you will learn that when righteous men have suffered persecution—e.g. Daniel and the three Holy Children—they have suffered at the hands of the ungodly (xlv.). Surely you ought to be found on the side of the righteous rather than of the persecutors. We worship one God. We are one body in Christ, we have one spirit of grace. How can you bear such strife if you remember that we are members one of another? Remember what Jesus our Lord said concerning those who cause offence as you have done (xli.). St. Paul rebuked you for the same fault, but things are worse now. Then at least you professed to follow apostles or apostolic men, but now 'the steadfast and ancient Church of the Corinthians, for the sake of one or two persons, maketh sedition against its presbyters' (xlvii.). Let us have done with such feuds, and in penitence pray God to restore our former harmony (xlviii.).

Love is all-powerful: love, His own attribute, is acceptable to God: seek love, and you shall be saved (xlix. 1). Love is the only ground on which we can hope for God's forgiveness. Let us therefore—and especially those who have caused strife—confess our offences and not harden our hearts as Pharaoh did, lest like Pharaoh we perish (li.).

God asks nothing of man but contrition, prayer, and praise (lii.). Remember how Moses fasted and prayed forty days on the mountain, offering his life for the life of his people (liii.). Let those of you who are the occasion of strife, copy his self-effacement (liv.), and follow the examples of those noble heathens—rulers and citizens, even women—who over and over again in the course of history have been willing to give up all for the good of their nation (lv.).

Let us intercede for one another. Let us be ready to give and to receive admonition. In God's hands, chastisement is an instrument of mercy (lvi.). You especially, who first stirred up the strife, be first to repent—'submit yourselves unto the presbyters, and receive chastisement unto repentance.' The Scriptures contain many threats against the stubborn and impenitent (lvii.). Let us by obedience escape them, for they who obey God's will shall be saved (lviii.). 'But if certain persons should be disobedient unto the words spoken by Him through us . . . they will entangle themselves in no slight transgression and danger; but we shall be guiltless of this sin' (lix.).

(5) Prayer for all mankind: final admonition and benediction.—We pray that God will keep His elect intact. We pray for inward light, for all who need, for the Gentiles' conversion, for pardon and cleansing, for peace and concord, for deliverance from those who hate us wrongfully, for the grace of obedience to temporal authority, for earthly rulers, that they may govern in accordance with God's will in peace and gentleness. We offer our praises to the Almighty Father 'through the High Priest and Guardian of our souls, Jesus Christ' (lix.-lxi.).

We have said enough about the Christian life; about faith, repentance, love, temperance, sobriety, patience, righteousness, truth, longsuffering. We have spoken gladly, knowing that we spoke to men who have studied the oracles of God (lxii.). Follow the example of the Fathers; submit yourselves to authority. You will give us great joy if you cease from strife. With the letter we have sent faithful and prudent men who shall be witnesses between us (lxiii.).

May God endue with all virtues those who call on His name through Jesus Christ our High Priest and Guardian (lxiv.). We commend Claudius Ephebus, and Valerius Bito, who, with Fortunatus also, are the bearers of this letter. Send them back speedily with good news.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you and all men.

4. Teaching.—The object of the Epistle was strictly practical. It is therefore unreasonable to expect to find in it precise definitions of Christian doctrine. Yet, in enforcing his practical lesson, the writer alludes to the main articles of the faith as he had learned it, and these incidental allusions are historically the more valuable, because they represent not the belief of one man but the tradition of a community.

The tradition, which lies behind the Epistle, is above all things catholic, in its recognition of the many-sidedness of Christian truth. It embraces almost every type of apostolic teaching which is expressed in the Epistles of the NT—the type of St. James no less than of St. Paul, of St. Peter as well as of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The one element which is lacking is the mysticism of St. John, probably because the Johannine writings were not yet in existence (Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. vol. i. p. 95 ff.).

At the same time it must be admitted that the Epistle betrays a certain failure to grasp the full meaning of the more profound doctrines of the NT. This is especially evident in its treatment of the Pauline idea of justification by faith. To St. Paul faith is the mainspring of the Christian life, the source of all Christian virtues. To the writer of the Epistle, faith is nothing more than one amongst many virtues. He is conscious of no incongruity in placing 'faith' and 'hospitality' side by side as equal conditions of salvation (xii. 1; cf. Lightfoot, Clem. Rom. vol. i. p. 397).

(1) Doctrine of God.—The terms in which the Epistle speaks of God are unmistakably borrowed from the language of the OT and the Jewish synagogue. God is 'the Almighty,' 'the all-seeing Master' (lv. 6), 'the Creator and Master of the universe' (xxxiii. 2), 'the Father of the ages, the All-holy One' (xxxv. 3); 'the Father and Maker of the whole world' (xix. 2; cf. lx. and lxii.); 'the King of the ages' (lxi. 2); 'He that embraceth the whole universe' (xxviii. 4). His unceasing activity in the natural world displays both His beneficence and His love of harmony (xx. xxxii.). Amongst men He is made known as 'the Creator and Overseer . . . the Benefactor of all spirits and the God of all flesh' (lix. 3). To the elect He is revealed as a 'gentle and compassionate Father' (xxix. 1), 'the champion and protector of them that in a pure conscience serve His excellent Name' (xlv. 7).

So much might have been said by a conscientious Jew; but in two passages at least, the language of the Epistle passes beyond the mere monotheism of Judaism: 'Have we not one God and one Christ and one Spirit of grace that was shed upon us?' (xvi. 6); 'as God liveth and the Lord Jesus Christ liveth, and the Holy Spirit, who are the faith and the hope of the elect . . .' (lviii. 2). The simple and natural way in which the Son and the Holy Spirit are here linked with the Father as equal objects of Christian faith and hope is quite inexplicable unless the writer was convinced of their essential Divinity and essential equality with the Father.

(2) Christology.—A clear allusion to the pre-existence of Christ is contained in the statement that He speaks through the Holy Spirit in the OT Scriptures (xxii. 1). A similar reference is probably to be found in the words 'Jesus Christ was sent forth from God' (xlii. 1). He is never actually called God,* but His Divinity is implied when He is described as 'the sceptre of the majesty of God' (xvi. 2), who showed us 'as in a mirror' the very 'face' of God (xxxvi. 2).

But most frequently the Epistle speaks of Christ in His relation to mankind. He came to earth 'to instruct, to sanctify, to honour us' (lix. 3), to be our pattern of lowliness (xvi.). Yet He was no mere example to men. He shed His blood for our salvation (vii. 4, xii. 7, xxi. 6), and 'gave His flesh for our flesh and His life for our lives' (xlix. 6). By His death He 'won for the whole world the grace of repentance' (vii. 3). God raised Him from the dead, and we shall one day share His resurrection (xxiv. 1). Meanwhile He is 'the High Priest of our offerings, the Guardian and Helper of our weakness' (xxxvi. 1; cf. lxi. 3, lxiv.). 'Through Him we taste the immortal knowledge' (xxxvi. 2), 'the full knowledge of the glory of God's Name' (lix. 2). Through Him we have our access to the Father (xx. 11, lxi. 3, lxiv.).

(3) The Holy Spirit.—In times past the Holy Spirit inspired the message of the prophets (viii. 1, xlv. 1). In the present He is a living power poured out upon the Church (xvi. 6). His indwelling was the source of the manifold virtues which had formerly distinguished the Church of Corinth (ii. 3). The writer of the Epistle claims that his own words were written 'through the Holy Spirit' (τοῖς ὑφ' ἡμῶν γεγραμμένοις διὰ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος, lxiii. 2).

(4) Justification by faith and works.—Salvation was won for man by the blood of Christ (vii. 4, xii. 7, etc.). On man's part the necessary condition of salvation is 'faith' (xxxii. 4). Faith must find expression in good works (xxxiii.), for 'we are justified by works and not by words' (xxx. 3). By 'faith and hospitality' Rahab was saved (xii. 1). Abraham was blessed 'because he wrought righteousness and truth through faith' (xxxi. 2). 'So we, having been called through His (sc. the Father's) will in Christ Jesus, are not justified through ourselves or through our own wisdom or understanding or piety or works . . . but through faith, whereby the Almighty God justified all men that have been from the beginning' (xxxii. 4). Yet we must 'hasten with instancy and zeal to accomplish every good work' (xxxiii. 1), even as the Creator maintains without ceasing His beneficent activity. In this way the writer of the Epistle co-ordinates the divergent language of St. Paul and St. James on the question of faith and works. Yet he certainly fails to rise to the full meaning of faith as it was understood by St. Paul.

* The one possible exception is the passage ii. 1 which ends καὶ τὰ παθήματα αὐτοῦ ἦν προὐδὲν ὁδὸν ὁδῶν. The question turns on a doubtful reading. As the antecedent of αὐτοῦ Cod. A reads τοῦ θεοῦ. If this be correct, the statement made above is not quite true. But the weight of MS authority (O and all three versions) is in favour of the reading τοῦ Χριστοῦ.

(5) The resurrection of the dead.—The truth of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is dwelt upon at considerable length (xxiv.–xxvi.). In proof of it, analogies are quoted from the natural world. The sequence of night and day, the growth of the plant from the death of the seed, and the story of the phoenix are all pressed into service. But the final argument is the promise of God in the Scripture, and the precedent of the Resurrection of Christ who is 'the first-fruits' of the harvest of the dead. The passage dealing with the Resurrection interrupts the argument of the Epistle, and it is not quite evident why the subject is introduced at all. It does not seem to have had any connexion with the Corinthian disagreement. Possibly it may have been suggested to the writer by a recent perusal of 1 Co 15 (see xlvii. 1).

(6) The Christian ministry.—The Epistle gives a full account of the origin of the Christian ministry. 'The apostles received the gospel for us from the Lord Jesus Christ. . . . So then Christ is from God and the apostles are from Christ. Both therefore came of the will of God in the appointed order. Having therefore received a charge . . . they went forth with the glad tidings that the kingdom of God should come. So preaching everywhere in country and town, they appointed their first-fruits, when they had proved them by the Spirit, to be bishops and deacons unto them that should believe' (xlii.). 'And our apostles knew through our Lord Jesus Christ that there would be strife over the name of the bishop's office. For this cause, therefore, having received complete foreknowledge, they appointed the aforesaid persons, and afterwards they provided a continuance,* that if these should fall asleep, other approved men should succeed to their ministration' (xliv.). Clearly the writer has no doubt concerning the Divine origin of the ministry or the necessity of preserving the apostolic succession. To thrust from their office men thus Divinely appointed is 'no light sin' (xlv. 4).

But the most striking feature in his statements concerning the ministry is that he uses ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος as interchangeable terms, denoting different aspects of the same office. Twice he speaks of 'bishops and deacons' as a summary description of the Christian ministry, where it is inconceivable that the 'presbyters' should not be mentioned if they were recognized as a separate order (xlii. 4, 5); and once at least he applies both of the terms ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος to men of the same rank (xliv. 1, 4, 5). In this he follows the usage of the Apostolic Age (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>1-2</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>1-7</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3-7</sup>), according to which the words indicate different functions of the same person (cf. Lightfoot, Phil.<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 97 ff.; for a defence of the view that separate orders are meant cf. J. H. Bernard, Pastoral Epistles [Camb. Gr. Test., 1899], p. lxii ff.).

5. Permanent value.—The history of the first beginnings of the Christian Church can easily be reconstructed from the data supplied by the NT writings. The stage of growth which it had reached towards the end of the 2nd cent. is amply illustrated by the writings of Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. But for the intermediate period, the sub-apostolic age, the available sources of first-hand evidence are very slight. The primary value of the Epistle of Clement arises from the fact that it is one of them and the earliest. It helps us to characterize the sub-apostolic age, and hints at the reason why its literary remains are not more extensive. It suggests a period not of keen or original thought, but rather of scrupulous fidelity in preserving intact Christian doctrine and Christian practice as they had been handed down by the apostles, a time of combining and co-ordinating different types of apostolic teaching rather than of assimilating their deepest meaning. The evidence supplied by such an Epistle is quite sufficient to dispose of the idea that the Church of the 2nd cent. was the product of a compromise between a Jewish and a Pauline party, who in the 1st cent. were wholly antagonistic.

Secondly, the Epistle throws important light upon the position occupied in the early Church by the See of Rome. The whole tone of the letter makes it quite clear that as yet no Roman supremacy de iure was recognized, even by the Church of Rome. But already it is possible to see the beginning of the process by which Rome ultimately gained a not unmerited supremacy de facto. Apostolic institutions were being disregarded at Corinth and the peace of the Church was threatened. No appeal was made by the contending parties either to Rome or elsewhere. Yet, as a matter of principle, it was the business of any Christian community to step in and try to heal the breach, and as a matter of fact it was the Church of Rome which actually did so. Such an act was characteristic of the early Roman Church, and it was a succession of such acts, combined with its central position, its own undoubted orthodoxy, and the prestige of the Imperial city, which in the early Church gave the Roman See its position as 'primus inter pares.'

If the Epistle of Clement already displays something of the Imperial mind of the later Roman Church, it also foreshadows the bent of later western theology. For the writer's regard for theology is not for its own sake, but for its bearing on life and conduct. The questions which interest him most are practical and moral. Perhaps it is not merely fanciful to suggest that the writings of Clement and Ignatius mark the point of divergence of the two great streams of Christian thought, the eastern primarily philosophical and speculative, and the western mainly ethical and practical.

Thirdly, the Epistle is a valuable witness on certain biblical questions. It contains the earliest known reference to the Book of Judith (lv.). Its frequent quotations from the OT, which in the main are taken from the LXX, present some interesting problems to the student of the Greek versions of the OT.

*The reading is doubtful. Cod. A has ἐπινομήν; C, ἐπιδόμην; Lat lex; Syr. ܠܐ ܕܕܕ ܘܠ i.e. ἐπὶ δοκίμῃ; the Coptic paraphrases. None of these provides tolerable sense, and most editors adopt the conjectural emendation ἐπιμονήν first suggested by Peter Turner in the 17th century.

*(a) Clement's text of the LXX inclines in places to that which appears in the NT, and yet presents sufficient evidence of independence; (b) as between the texts of the LXX represented by B and A, while often supporting A, it is less constantly opposed to B than is the NT; and (c) it displays an occasional tendency to agree with Theodotion and even with Aquila against the LXX' (Swete, Introd. to the OT in Greek<sup>2</sup>, 1902, p. 410).

To the student of the growth of the NT Canon, Clement's Epistle has both a positive and a negative value. Negatively, it shows that as yet the NT writings were not definitely counted amongst the Scriptures. Sayings of our Lord are indeed quoted as of equal weight with the writings of the OT, and in a form which resembles passages in the Synoptic Gospels (xiii. 2, xlvii. 8), but their authority is that of the speaker, not of the written word. (On the form of Clement's quotations see Sanday, Inspiration<sup>3</sup>, 1896, p. 299 ff.; Stanton, op. cit. pt. i. p. 5 ff.)

Positively, the Epistle provides clear evidence that by the end of the 1st cent. many of the apostolic writings were known and studied in the Church of Rome. For it contains an express reference to St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians (xlvii. 1 ff.), indubitable traces of the influence of Romans (xxxiii.-xxxvi. xlvii. 1.) and Hebrews (xxxvi. xliii.; cf. xvii. 1), and possible reminiscences of the phraseology of Acts (ii. 1), the Pastoral Epistles (ii. 7, lxi. 2), 1 Peter and James (xxx. 2, xlix. 5).

An apocryphal work is quoted in xxiii. 3 with the formula ἡ γραφή αὐτῶν. The same quotation occurs in an amplified form in the so-called Second Epistle of Clement (xi.). Possibly, as Lightfoot suggests (Clem. Rom. vol. ii. p. 80), it may have been taken from the lost pseudepigraphic book of Eldad and Medad, which was certainly known to the primitive Roman Church (see Hermas, Vis. ii. 3). Whatever the source may have been, it is the only book quoted by Clement which is outside the Canon of the Greek Bible.

Fourthly, the Epistle of Clement contains historical allusions which are of great interest. Not only does it provide contemporary evidence for the persecutions of Nero and Domitian, both of which occurred during the writer's lifetime, but it also adds fresh detail to our knowledge of the life-story of St. Paul. For the statement that the Apostle 'taught righteousness to the whole world' and 'reached the furthest bounds of the west' (ἐπὶ τὰ τέμνα τῆς οὐσέως ἐλθὼν, v. 7), occurring in an Epistle written from Rome, seems most naturally to mean that before his death St. Paul fulfilled his intention, expressed in Ro 15<sup>24</sup>, of making a missionary journey to Spain. An allusion is made to the same journey by an anonymous writer two generations later (Muratorian Fragm. ap. Westcott, Hist. of NT Canon<sup>5</sup>, 1881, p. 521 ff.).

Finally, the long prayer with which the Epistle concludes (lix.-lxiv.) is full of interest to the liturgologist. Lightfoot has pointed out the strong Jewish colouring which it has in common with the rest of the Epistle, and especially its marked affinity with the 'eighteen benedictions' of the synagogue service (Clem. Rom. vol. i. p. 393 ff.). Furthermore, as the same writer observes, 'it is impossible not to be struck with the resemblances in this passage to portions of the earliest known liturgies. Not only is there a general coincidence in the objects of the several petitions, but it has also individual phrases, and in one instance [lix. 4] a whole cluster of petitions, in common with one or other of these' (op. cit. p. 384 f.). Yet it would be straining the evidence too far to conclude that Clement is quoting an actual form of prayer already in use in the Roman Church. The utmost that can be said is that the passage in question is 'an excellent example of the style of solemn prayer in which the ecclesiastical leaders of that time were accustomed to express themselves at meetings for worship' (Duchesne, Christian Worship, Eng. tr. from 3rd Fr. ed., 1903, p. 50).

6. MSS and versions.—Two early Greek MSS and three ancient versions of the Epistle are known.

(1) MSS.—(a) Cod. A.—The oldest Greek MS which contains the Epistle is the famous 5th cent. uncial, generally known as Codex Alexandrinus. Cod. A originally included the whole of the Old and New Testaments. The Epistle of Clement stands at the end of the NT, immediately after the close of the Apocalypse and before the spurious 'Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.' One whole leaf of Clement's Epistle is missing (i.e. from lvii. 7 to the end of lxiii.), and the edges of the remaining leaves are considerably mutilated. Many editions of the Epistles of Clement based on the text of Cod. A have appeared since the 'editio princeps' of Patrick Young, published in 1633. It is still the chief authority for the text.

(b) Cod. C.—The second Greek MS, which, amongst other patristic writings, contains the Epistles of Clement, was made known to the world in 1875, when Bryennios, then Metropolitan of Serræ, published the first complete text of 1 and 2 Clement. This MS, which bears the date A.D. 1056, was found at Constantinople, in the library of the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Its chief value is that it enables us to fill in the gaps in Cod. A, but on the whole its text is distinctly inferior to that of the earlier MS.

(2) Versions.—(a) Syriac.—Almost simultaneously with the discovery of Bryennios, the first ancient version of Clement's Epistle came to light. A MS of the Harklean (Syriac) Version of the NT, then acquired by Cambridge University, was found to include Clement's Epistles, placed after the Catholic and before the Pauline Epistles. The date of the MS is A.D. 1170. As an authority for the text of Clement it is superior to Cod. C, but inferior to Cod. A. An edition of this Syriac text of 1 and 2 Clem. was published in 1899.

(b) Latin.—Much more remarkable, in view of the lack of any real acquaintance with Clement's Epistle on the part of the early Latin Church, was the discovery by G. Morin in 1894 of an ancient Latin version. The MS which contains it was written in the 11th cent., but the available evidence clearly shows that the translation is at least as old as the 4th cent., and perhaps as old as the 2nd. The Greek text which it represents is independent of that of all the other authorities, and probably ranks second only to that of Cod. A. The Latin text was published by Morin in 1894. (For an estimate of its value see R. Knopf, TU xx. 1 [1901]; also CQR xxxix. [1894] 190-195, and JThSt ii. [1900] 154).

(c) Coptic.—More recently still a Coptic version of Clement has been discovered in a papyrus book ascribed to the end of the 4th century. The text was published by Carl Schmidt in 1908 (TU xxxii. 1). The most interesting feature of this version is its omission of the name of Clement from the title, which runs 'Epistle of the Romans to the Corinthians.' Owing to the loss of five leaves from the middle of the book, the text is defective from xxxiv. 6 to xlii. 2. The underlying Greek text, though good, is inferior to that of Cod. A or of the Latin version (C. H. Turner, Studies in Early Church Hist. p. 257).

LITERATURE.—Editions of the Epistle of Clement: O. v. Gebhardt and A. Harnack (1875); F. X. Funk (1878-81); J. B. Lightfoot (Apostol. Fathers, pt. i., 1890); R. Knopf (1901). Art. on Clement of Rome: 'Clemens Romanus,' by G. Salmon, in DCB i. [1877]; 'Clement i.,' by John Chapman, in CE iv. [1908]; 'Clemens von Rom,' by G. Uhlhorn, in PRE<sup>3</sup> iv. [1898] and 'Clement of Rome,' in Schaff-Herzog, iii. [1909]. General works: A. Harnack, Geschichte der altchristl. Litt. i. [1893], Chronologie, ii. [1891]; C. H. Turner, Studies in Early Church History, 1912; V. H. Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, pt. i. [1903]. Versions: Syriac, ed. Bensley (1899); Latin, ed. Morin (1894); Coptic, ed. Schmidt (1908).

F. S. MARSH.

CLOKE * (φαλὼνης, etc.).—The most important passage in which this word figures is 2 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>, where the cloke, left behind at Troas with Carpus, is mentioned together with the books, especially the parchments. This grouping has led to the cloke being identified with a bag or case for books (since the time of Chrysostom). In HDB it is stated that the cloke 'may have been a light mantle like a cashmere dust-cloak, in which the books and parchments were wrapped.' In DCG it is taken as 'a heavy woollen garment, generally red or dark yellow in colour, worn as a protection against cold and rain, at first especially by travellers and by artisans and slaves. . . . It appears to have been of one piece, circular or ellipsoid in shape, with a hole in the middle for the insertion of the head, and with no sleeves. According to Seyffert's Dictionary of Classical Antiquities, s.v. 'Pænula,' it was buttoned or stitched up in front, in the direction of its length—a description which would lead to some modification of the idea of there being a simple opening for the head. An interesting addition to the last-named account is the mention of the cucullus or hood, to serve as a head-covering. Most accounts agree in describing it as a travelling-cloke, for rich and poor, and for both sexes. It belongs to the category of vestimenta clausa. It was worn in Rome (see Suet. Nero, 48), and was also in common use throughout the East, being well known to Greeks, Jews, and Syrians. The Jewish and Syriac forms of the word have caused it to be confused with the pallium (ἱμάτιον) or mantle.

The Latin pænula (= φανδῶλης, φενδῶλης) is interesting in view of the transposition of ν and λ, as found in φαλὼνης, φελὼνης of the NT, which are said to be erroneous forms. There seems to be great diversity of opinion among lexicographers on the point. For the relation of the cloke to the chasuble and other matters connected with ecclesiastical vestments, see DCG, s.v. 'Clope.' In this connexion R. Sinkler, Essays and Studies, Cambridge, 1900, pp. 87-97, and W. Lowrie, Christian Art and Archaeology, New York, 1901, p. 396 ff., should also be consulted.

The phrase 'before winter' (2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>) is a fortuitous sequence, and is not to be brought into relation to ν.<sup>13</sup> As to this and further speculations regarding the history of St. Paul's cloke, see F. W. Farrar, Life and Work of St. Paul, London, 1897, p. 682, where a noteworthy parallel is cited. Cf. also A. Plummer, The Pastoral Epistles (Expositor's Bible), 1888, p. 411 ff.

The word 'cloke' appears in an extended meaning: (1) ἐν προφάσει πλεονεξίας, 'a cloke of covetousness' (1 Th 2<sup>5</sup>); and (2) ἐπικάλυμμα τῆς κακίας, 'a cloke of wickedness (or malice)' (1 P 2<sup>16</sup>). These passages call for no remark.

W. CRUICKSHANK.

CLOTHES. †—Many words of general meaning relating to clothing are used in the Acts, Epistles, and especially in the Apocalypse. In a number of instances these are metaphorical, particularly in the case of verbs, e.g. 'putting on,' 'putting off,' 'encircled,' etc. (2 Co 5<sup>3-4</sup>, Eph 4<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>11</sup>, Col 3<sup>10</sup>). The clothing of the angels and visionary figures is indeterminate, except as to aspect and colour, e.g. white, shining, pure, purple, scarlet, sprinkled (or dipped). Even with regard to luxury in dress, kingly or otherwise, there is little or no mention of particular garments (cf. Ac 12<sup>1-3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>). In a passage quoted from the OT (He 1<sup>11-12</sup>) another indefinite term (περιβόλαιον; cf. 1 Co 11<sup>15</sup>) is employed. Little is said to indicate the condition of poverty (except Ja 2<sup>3</sup>); 'naked,'

'nakedness,' occur mostly in connexion with persecutions, which were also marked by the wearing of sheepskins and goatskins (He 11<sup>37</sup>)—this, however, in pre-Christian times. The restricted meaning of 'naked' is probably found in Ac 19<sup>16</sup> (cf. 7<sup>58</sup>). The minimum in respect of clothes is hinted at in the σκεπάσματα of 1 Ti 6<sup>8</sup> (where some have found 'shelter' implied as well), and enjoined in the (ἐν) καταστολή κοσμίῳ of 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, where a contrast is made between modest apparel and the other extreme, which is also vividly pictured in one of the parties entering the synagogue, and having favour shown by the rulers (Ja 2<sup>2-3</sup>). The moth-eaten garments (5<sup>3</sup>) of the rich also tell an evident story.

1. Under-garments.—The χιτών, or under-garment, is expressly mentioned in few places. We find that Dorcas made coats (χιτωνάς) and garments (ἱμάτια), the two chief categories of dress (Ac 9<sup>39</sup>). In Jude<sup>23</sup> the garment (χιτών) spotted by the flesh may be understood literally, the χιτών being brought into immediate contact with the body. But it would not warrant the conclusion that there was no other under-garment known or worn at this time. The χιτών may also be inferred from Ac 12<sup>3</sup>, where the girdle is evidently implied (see GIRDLE). Sackcloth is mentioned only in the imagery of Rev. (6<sup>1-11</sup>3). See COAT.

2. Outer covering (or coverings).—ἱματίον (ἱμάτια, pl.), while no doubt generically employed, is also the specific word for the outer garment, equivalent to Heb. הלבש and Latin pallium (see Mt 5<sup>40</sup>, 'cloke'). στολή, 'robe,' appears only in Rev. (sing. and pl.), and the compound καταστολή in 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>. ποδήρη (accus. of ποδηρῆς), in Rev 1<sup>13</sup>, a garment reaching to the feet, appears to combine the notions of dignity and priestly sanctity. The outer garment (mostly in pl.) figures in the Acts in connexion with certain activities, viz. the stoning of Stephen (7<sup>58</sup>); preparation for going forth (12<sup>3</sup>); rending, as a token of grief (14<sup>14</sup>); rending, as an act of violence (16--); shaking out, to indicate being done with (18<sup>6</sup>); throwing off, as a sign of rage (22<sup>3</sup>). For outer coverings see further CLOKE, MANTLE.

3. Head-dress.—No distinctive head-covering for men is mentioned, but in view of the treatment of the head by shearing and shaving some protection must have been worn (Ac 18<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>4</sup>), and may be deduced from 1 Co 11<sup>4</sup>. The difficult paragraph (vv. 4-16) need be regarded here only in so far as it evidences a practice of veiling of women (not indeed of the face), indoors and out-of-doors, as a sign of authority (RV), which authority is either another's, and this is the usual interpretation, or her own (see W. M. Ramsay, Luke the Physician, London, 1908, p. 175). St. Paul makes use of the face-veil (cf. Ex 34<sup>33-35</sup>) for spiritual purposes in 2 Co 3<sup>12-18</sup>. The crown (στέφανος), frequently mentioned in St. Paul's Epistles and in Rev., is either part of gala-attire (cf. στέμματα, Ac 14<sup>13</sup>), or distinctive of saints and allegorical figures seen in vision. Such word-pictures may, however, have had a basis of fact in the fillets, chaplets, and other head-gear of the Greeks and Romans. For the influence of Asia Minor on the dress of Rev. (c.g. 7<sup>9ff.</sup>) see A. Deissmann, Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1895, p. 285 ff. (Eng. tr., Bible Studies, Edinburgh, 1901, pp. 368-370).

4. Footwear.—See art. SHOE, SANDAL.

5. Handkerchief, Apron.—See separate articles under these titles.

6. Articles of military wear are treated under ARMOUR.

7. Clothes relating to marriage and burial.—Rev 21<sup>2</sup> contains the only mention of the 'bride adorned,' and details are equally lacking as to burial customs. Ac 5<sup>6</sup>, referring to Ananias (συνέ-

* This spelling, instead of the modern 'cloak,' is retained by the RV.

† This art. includes such terms as 'dress,' 'garment,' 'robe,' 'vesture' (the last not in RV).

στεῖλαν αὐτόν, 'they wrapped him round'), does not convey much.

8. Ornaments.—The single reference to 'baggage' (Ac 21<sup>16</sup>) is significant of the absence of superfluous articles of wear in the equipment of St. Paul and his companions in travel. But many of those who remained at home were not so indifferent to luxury. To the indications already given may be added the mention of a mirror (1 Co 13<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>18</sup>, Ja 1<sup>3</sup>), in actual practice doubtless as much for ornament as for use. Plaiting the hair (1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>) is open to censure, and anointing likewise seems to have been carried to excess in these times (ointment, Rev 18<sup>13</sup>). The χρυσοδακτύλιος of Ja 2<sup>2</sup> paves the way for the wider domain of female ornamentation, as given in the gold, pearls, costly raiment of 1 Ti 2<sup>9</sup>, and the jewels of gold and putting on of apparel of 1 P 3<sup>3</sup>. This culminates in the royal apparel of Ac 12<sup>1</sup> (cf. Jos. Ant. XIX. viii. 2), and the great pomp of Agrippa and Bernice (Ac 25<sup>23</sup>). The city-life of the age certainly afforded scope for the practice of the luxurious and extravagant in dress, as can be gathered from the indictment of Rev 18 (cf. 17<sup>3</sup>, 4), in which is to be found a storehouse of materials falling under this head. The purple (cf. Ac 16<sup>14</sup>) and scarlet, the fine linen and silk (or rather, mixture containing silk), are the last word in luxury of materials, and to them must be added embroidery (Rev 19<sup>16</sup> [?]) and inworking of gold and silver, precious stones and pearls. The λίνον or λθον of Rev 15<sup>6</sup>, and the fine linen, bright and pure (19<sup>8</sup>), white and pure (19<sup>14</sup>), etc., have transcendent value.

9. Washing of clothes.—(οὐκ) ἐμόλυναν (Rev 3<sup>4</sup>), ἐπλυναν (7<sup>14</sup>; cf. 22<sup>14</sup>), ἐλεύκαναν (7<sup>14</sup>), although used allegorically, are indicative of processes connected with the fulling and washing of clothes. The kindred process of dyeing underlies the imagery of 19<sup>13</sup> (if βεβαμμένον be read). See also 'purple and scarlet' above, § 8.

LITERATURE.—Art. 'Dress' in HDB (G. M. Mackie), SDB (A. R. S. Kennedy), EBi (I. Abrahams and S. A. Cook), DCG (E. W. G. Masterman); art. 'Costume,' JE (W. Nowack); see further I. Benzing, Heb. Archäologie 2, Tübingen, 1907, pp. 73-87, and especially S. Krauss, Talmud. Archäologie, vol. i. [Leipzig, 1910] pp. 127-207 (preceded by a very important list of dictionary articles and books); G. M. Mackie, Bible Manners and Customs, 1898. W. CRUICKSHANK.

CLOUD (νεφέλη, νέφος).—Ruskin says that we never make the clouds a subject of thought, otherwise we should witness 'scene after scene, picture after picture, glory after glory' (Fronde Agrestes, 1875, p. 36 f.). The Apostolic Church was not blind to the beauty of the 'brave, o'erhanging firmament,' which was far from seeming to her a mere 'congregation of vapours.' But in her the æsthetic sense was subordinated to the religious. Her thoughts were to a large extent shaped by those of the great Hebrew writers, who conceived of God as making the cloud His chariot (Ps 104<sup>3</sup>), spreading it for a covering (105<sup>39</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>), descending in it (Ex 34<sup>9</sup>), speaking out of it (Nu 11<sup>25</sup>, Dt 5-), leading His people in it (Ex 13<sup>1</sup>, Ps 78<sup>14</sup>). She brooded over Daniel's vision of the Son of Man coming with the clouds of heaven. She heard that when the three disciples were on the Holy Mount a bright cloud overshadowed them, that they feared as they entered into the cloud, and that a voice spake out of the cloud (Mt 17<sup>5</sup>, Mk 9<sup>7</sup>, Lk 9<sup>34</sup>, 35). Thus for the early Church the cloud sometimes served a higher purpose than that of watering the thirsty earth—it was regarded as the vesture of Deity, of angels, or of saints.

1. When Christ had spoken His last words to His disciples, 'he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight' (Ac 1<sup>9</sup>). His body did not suddenly vanish, as in other post-Resurrection manifestations; nor was His Ascension accomplished in a blaze of glory. He was in human form when He parted from His Church and entered within the veil. The Church still thinks of Him, and prays to Him, as He was when the cloud enveloped Him.

2. St. Paul regards the cloud which indicated God's presence among the Israelites as having a sacramental virtue to them (1 Co 10<sup>1-2</sup>). When they were under it, and when they passed through the sea, they were initiated into the service of Moses, as the Christian is initiated by baptism into the service of Christ. 'They were neither wet with the cloud nor with the sea, much less were they immersed in either . . . nor is the term baptism found in the writings of Moses. But Paul uses this term with great propriety, because (1) the cloud and the sea are in their own nature water, (2) the cloud and the sea took the fathers out of sight and restored them again to view, as the water does to those who are baptized. . . . The sacraments of the OT were more than two, if we take into account these extraordinary ones' (Bengel's Gnomon, in loco).

3. At one time St. Paul expected that he and other believers, still alive at the Parousia, would be caught up in clouds to meet the Lord in the air (1 Th 4-). The absence of the art. indicates that these are no common clouds, but 'eigne Vehikel' (Schmiedel, Hand-Kom. in loc.). Whether St. Paul thinks of Christ descending to meet the saints on their way to heaven, or simply of their ascending to join Him in the air—i.e. in heaven—is not made quite clear; but probably the former idea is what is meant. The essential fact is contained in the words which follow: 'So shall we ever be with the Lord.' At a later time St. Paul welcomed the thought of joining Christ in another way—'janua mortis, janua vitæ' (1 Co 15<sup>51</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup>, Ph 1<sup>1-3</sup>).

4. In the Apocalypse a gigantic angel comes down out of heaven, arrayed with a cloud (Rev 10<sup>4</sup>). Christ Himself comes with clouds (1<sup>7</sup>), as in the Danielic vision. He is enthroned upon a white cloud (14<sup>14</sup>, 15, 16).

In He 12<sup>1</sup> the innumerable witnesses for Christ in past ages are compared to a cloud (νέφος) encircling believers who are now running their race. The example (perhaps not without the superadded thought of the real presence) of the multitude who have finished the course and won the prize is an inspiration to the present-day runner.

In Jude<sup>17</sup> hypocrites, uttering swelling words of vanity, are likened to mists and clouds which promise abundant showers for the thirsty earth but never give them. JAMES STRAHAN.

CNIDUS (Κνίδος).—Cnidus was a city of Caria, at the S.W. angle of Asia Minor, between the islands of Cos and Rhodes. It lay at the end of a long peninsula—Triopium—which juts into the Ægean Sea and forms the southern shore of the Sinus Ceramicus. Strabo (xiv. ii. 15) accurately describes it: 'Cnidus has two harbours, one of which is a close harbour, fit for receiving triremes, and a naval station for twenty ships. In front of the city is an island, seven stadia in circuit; it rises high, in the form of a theatre, and is joined by a mole to the mainland, making Cnidus in a manner two cities, for a great part of the inhabitants live on the island, which shelters both the harbours.' In the lapse of time the mole has become a sandy isthmus. The situation of the city in the highway of the seas gave it much commercial importance. It was a free city of the Roman Empire. Jews were settled there in the Maccabæan period (1 Mac 15<sup>23</sup>).

St. Paul's ship of Alexandria sailed from Myra 'slowly' and 'with difficulty,' probably on account of adverse winds rather than of calms, taking

'many days' to come 'over against Cnidus.' The distance between the two ports was 130 miles, which with a fair wind could have been run in one day. After passing the point which divides the southern from the western coast, the ship was in a worse position than before, having no longer the advantage of a weather shore, and being exposed to the full force of the N.W. winds—called Etesian—which prevail in the Ægean towards the end of summer. Instead of taking a straight course to the north of Crete—the wind not permitting this (μή προσέωντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου)—she had to run under the lee of the island. Some interpret St. Luke's words as meaning that the crew made a vain attempt to reach Cnidus, 'the wind not allowing' them; but there was apparently no reason why they should not have entered the southern harbour, which was well sheltered from N.W. winds.

LITERATURE.—C. T. Newton and R. P. Pullan, Hist. of Discoveries at Halicarnassus, Cnidus and Branchidæ, 1863; T. Lewin, St. Paul, 1875, ii. 190; Conybeare-Howson, St. Paul, 1856, ii. 390 ff.; W. Smith, Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geog. i. [1855] 638 ff.

JAMES STRAHAN.

COALS (ἀνθρακες, prumæ).—The coal of the Bible is charcoal. The knowledge of the process of preparing charcoal from timber dates from a remote period. True coal is not found in Syria except in one part of Lebanon, where it was mined for a short time about 1834 (C. R. Conder, Tent Work in Pal., London, 1878, ii. 326). Pieces of charcoal in process of combustion were called 'coals of fire' (ἀνθρακες πυρός=שָׂרִיף), and glowing coals heaped upon the head became a figure for the burning sense of shame which an enemy feels when he receives a return of good for the evil he has done (Ro 12<sup>o</sup> || Pr 25<sup>o</sup> --). Another view (held by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Grotius, etc.), that the 'coals of fire' are Divine judgments which will fall on the sinner's head if he hardens his heart against persevering love, is impossible. Benevolence tainted by such a thought is scarcely better than malevolence. Jerome says rightly: "Carbones ignis congregabis super caput eius," non in maledictum et condemnationem, ut plerique existimant, sed in correctionem et poenitudinem' (contra Pelagianos, i. 30; cf. Meyer, Romans, ii. [1874] 272).

JAMES STRAHAN.

COAT (χιτών, Lat. tunica, both words probably related to the Eastern כִּתְמָה; Assy. Kitinne, 'linen'), or 'tunic' (Jn 19<sup>o</sup> RVm).—The word was used to designate the under-garment of all classes and both sexes, over which the cloak (ἡζούρ, haurion, pallium) was worn. On entering the upper-room in Joppa where the body of Dorcas lay, Peter was surrounded by widows showing the χιτῶνας καὶ ἱμάτια which her hands had made (Ac 9<sup>o</sup>). Tunics naturally varied in material and shape according to the position, means, and taste of the wearer. Wool and flax were the native products of Syria; fine linen (bysus) was largely imported from Egypt; the silk of the East was unknown till the beginning of our era, and its use was deemed an evidence of extreme luxury (Rev 18<sup>o</sup>; 'silk' in Ezk 16<sup>o</sup> is probably a mistake). The Jewish prisoners in Sennacherib's marble reliefs, who are evidently carved from life, have tunics fitting fairly close to the body and reaching nearly to the ankles. This was the garment worn by free townsmen; that of peasants and slaves was no doubt shorter and looser. The coat of white linen with long skirts and sleeves (Gn 37<sup>o</sup>) was a mark of honour, wealth, and leisure. In later times even the poorer classes adopted a somewhat more elaborate toilet. Josephus mentions a slave in the time of Herod the Great who was found to have an incriminating letter of his master's concealed in his inner tunic, or true shirt (Ant. xvii. v. 7). The χιτών was made of two pieces of cloth sewn together at the sides, or of one piece which required a single seam; or it was entirely seamless (ἀπῆφος, unsewed), being 'woven from the top throughout' (Jn 19<sup>o</sup>), a process for which a special loom was needed.

The χιτών of the Greeks was of two sorts. The Ionian was a linen tunic with sleeves, reaching to the feet (τερμύεις [Od. xix. 242]); the Dorian was a square woollen tunic with short sleeves or mere armholes. Among the Romans a tunic with long sleeves was thought very effeminate; 'et tunicae manicas habent' are words uttered in scorn (Virg. Æn. ix. 616). The proverb 'Tunica proprii pallio est' was like the English 'Near is my shirt, but nearer is my skin.' Cf. also art. CLOTHES.

JAMES STRAHAN.

COHORT.—See ARMY.

COLLECTION.—At a very early stage in the history of the Christian Church the consciousness of its members expressed itself in voluntary efforts to ameliorate the condition of the poor and destitute (Ac 4<sup>o</sup> 32 6<sup>o</sup>). That this somewhat naïve attempt proved a failure was, perhaps, inevitable. Its apparently early abandonment leads to the conclusion that its promoters soon realized that a permanent settlement of social evils could never be arrived at by practical communism. Indeed, it is conceivable that, instead of curing the ills of poverty, widespread and deep-seated as it was in Jerusalem, it aggravated and perpetuated them. As we shall see, other and more powerful causes were at work; but, even if we minimize the historical value of the early chapters of Acts, enough remains to prove that this earliest and most self-sacrificing attempt of Christian men to realize their obligation to their poor brethren contributed to, rather than allayed, the evil it sought to destroy. See art. COMMUNITY OF GOODS.

The next instance of a systematic collection of money for the purpose of relieving distress in Judæa and Jerusalem is found in the history of the Church of Antioch (Ac 11<sup>o</sup> 27<sup>o</sup>). A threatened famine roused the sympathy of the Antiochene Christians, whose activity in the matter reveals their knowledge that the conditions of life amongst many of their Jewish brethren were those of chronic poverty and distress. The agents (διὰ χειρὸς) employed on this occasion for bringing relief (εἰς διακονίαν) were Barnabas and Saul. It was probably the example thus set that gave St. Paul the idea of his great and prolonged effort. Other causes were doubtless at work in the mind of the Apostle. As time went on, and misunderstandings grew up between Jewish and Gentile Christians, some attempt to bring them together was necessary if permanent disruption was to be avoided. In his letter to the Galatian Church he mentions an injunction laid on him and Barnabas by the 'pillar' apostles, 'that we should remember the poor' (Gal 2<sup>o</sup>). It is also of interest to note that public subventions from the Imperial exchequer to cities or provinces in distress formed part of a settled policy of the Emperors, while private benefactions by wealthy citizens in cases of real or fancied need were almost universal (see S. Dill, Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, 1904, bk. ii. ch. ii.). The Jews of the Dispersion, moreover, recognized their obligation to their poor brethren of Jerusalem by organized help from time to time (cf. Robertson-Plummer, 1 Corinthians [ICC, 1911] 382); and doubtless as Christian teaching spread and was accepted by the people, and converts became gradually separated from the rest of the community, they would lose their share of these gifts. Another cause for a poverty so acute and wide-spread may well have been the general belief in the nearness of the Parousia which threatened the ordinary daily business of Christian men (2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>; cf. 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup>).

In his references to the carefully planned collection from the different churches St. Paul uses seven different words. All these occur in his letters to the Corinthians and Romans, and are as follows: λογία (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>), χάρις (16<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>1</sup>), κοινωνία (Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>4</sup>, etc.), ἀδρότης (8<sup>-0</sup>), εὐλογία (9<sup>5</sup>), leitourgia (9<sup>12</sup>), διακονία (8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>; cf. Ac 11<sup>29</sup>). In the report of his defence before Felix two other words occur in the same connexion (ελεημοσύναι and προσφοράι [Ac 24<sup>17</sup>]). The word λογία occurs nowhere else in the NT, and is of obscure origin. By some it is supposed to be used here for the first time in Greek literature, and probably to have been coined by St. Paul for his purpose (T. C. Edwards, Com. on 1 Cor.<sup>2</sup>, 1885, p. 462). A variation (λογεῖα), however, is found in the papyrus documents from the 3rd cent. onwards and in the compound words ἀνδρολογία, παρὰλογεῖα (A. Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, pp. 142 f., 219 f.). It is also found associated with the Pauline word leitourgia (F. G. Kenyon, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, 1893, i. 46), and is frequently employed 'in papyri, ostraca, and inscriptions from Egypt and elsewhere,' when the writer is speaking of 'religious collections for a god, a temple, etc.' (see Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr.<sup>2</sup>, 1911, p. 104 ff.). The Codex Vaticanus (B) has the form λογεῖα, but as this MS shows a tendency to orthographic changes in this direction its evidence must be discounted (see Westcott, Introd. to NT in Greek, 1882, p. 306). It also appears in a compound form in Jewish literature (κατ' ἀνδρολογείον, 2 Mac 12<sup>43</sup>) where the question of the collection of money-supplies is alluded to.

That St. Paul attached very great importance to the success of his collection for the poor Christians of Judæa is evident from the care with which he organized the scheme, and the perseverance he displayed in carrying it out. From the tone of his reference to this work which he began in Galatia (1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) we are able to infer not only that he exercised his apostolic authority but that he gave detailed directions to the churches there in accordance with arrangements (διέταξα) personally thought out by himself. The instructions sent by letter to the Corinthians are no doubt a brief epitome of those delivered to the Galatian Christians (οὕτως καὶ ὑμεῖς ποιήσατε), and include details as to the careful and systematic ear-marking by each Christian believer of his personal subscription 'on every first day of the week' (κατὰ μίαν σαββάτου). They were to appoint and approve by letters of credit (cf., however, Robertson-Plummer's interpretation of the passage, making the Apostle the writer of the commendatory letters [δὲ ἐπιστολῶν τοιούτους πέμψω, κτλ. 16<sup>3</sup>]) delegates who should carry their gift to Jerusalem (τὴν χάριν ὑμῶν). The laborious nature of the undertaking may be realized from St. Paul's own references to the centres of activity. Galatia, Asia, Achaia, and Macedonia constituted the fields of his labours, and it is not improbable that his definite allusion to the collection in his Epistle to the Romans was intended as a hint to them to join with the other churches in 'ministering to the saints' (διακονῶν τοῖς ἁγίοις, Ro 15<sup>-5</sup>; see Bengel, Gnomon of NT<sup>7</sup>, 1873, on Ro 15<sup>27</sup>; cf. 12<sup>13</sup>).

It is not too much to say that the Apostle did not regard his work in these four great provinces as completed until the fruit of his prolonged labours had been reaped (cf. σφραγισάμενος, Ro 15<sup>-8</sup>). So long as this zealously undertaken (ἐσπούδασα, Gal 2<sup>10</sup>) task remained unfinished he felt himself hindered from extending his missionary operations (τοῦτο οὖν ἐπιτελέσας). For a long time he was eagerly determined to visit Rome (see Ro 1<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>-4</sup>), but at the time of writing to that church he explains that he is prevented from doing so by an obligation to visit Jerusalem. On this journey he was accompanied by envoys or messengers (ἀπόστολοι, 2 Co 8<sup>-3</sup>) from the churches contributing (Ac 20<sup>4</sup>), and so keen was his desire to bring the undertaking to a successful issue that no consideration of the dangers involved could turn him from his purpose (see Ac 20<sup>3</sup>, 22<sup>1</sup>). The result of this visit shows that the risks foreseen and spoken of beforehand (see Ac 21<sup>10ff.</sup> 24<sup>17ff.</sup>, etc.) were neither imaginary nor exaggerated.

In order to appreciate rightly the necessity for this work of good-will (εὐδοκῆσαν, Ro 15<sup>-2f.</sup>), it will be useful to recall the wretched condition of the poor in Jerusalem at this time (all the Jewish Christians were not amongst the poor [see εἰς τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν ἁγίων, Ro 15<sup>-6</sup>]). The plundering and bloodshed accompanying the successive administrations of the procurators Ventidius Cumanus and Felix brought about a state of anarchy, chronic rebellion, and famine (Jos. Ant. xx. viii. 5, etc., B.J. ii. xii. 1, ii. xiii. 2, etc., Tacitus, Ann. xii. 54; cf. Ja 2<sup>2-6</sup>; W. Fairweather, The Background of the Gospels, 1908, p. 199 f.; Schürer, HJP i. ii. [1890] p. 172 f.). The Zealots, whose fanatical policy kept the country seething with the wildest revolution, were replaced by the Sicarii or Assassins (cf. Ac 21<sup>38</sup>). Murderous bands infested the provinces, and the streets of Jerusalem witnessed innumerable deeds of cruelty and bloodshed. Those suspected of the least friendliness with the Romans were unhesitatingly robbed and assassinated; and although Felix endeavoured to stem the wild religious and political torrent by wholesale crucifixion, the disorders increased. The procurators Festus, Albinus, and Florus, who succeeded Felix, were not less unfortunate in their experience (Jos. Ant. xx. viii. ix. xi.), and the internecine struggles of the Jewish factions ended in the advent of Titus and the final destruction of Jerusalem. Famine, bitter and chronic, was the inevitable outcome of these conditions, and none suffered so severely as the humble disciples of the despised Nazarene.

The relief-fund, the earliest attempt to organize and perpetuate Christian fellowship, was not only a failure in itself, but must soon have disappeared in these social upheavals. An appeal to outside sources became necessary, and one result of the compromise effected at his meeting with the 'pillar' apostles in Jerusalem was the initiation by St. Paul of his scheme of systematic collection (see Gal 2<sup>10</sup>). There can scarcely be a doubt that the halting decision of the apostles of the circumcision, while it left the cardinal point of difference much where it had been, quickened St. Paul's anxiety to adopt a plan which should emphasize the spirit of toleration and good-will then established (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>). Having returned to Antioch, he was compelled to renew in a more pronounced form the controversy which had been partially settled at the Jerusalem Conference. After some little time (μετὰ δέ τινας ἡμέρας, Ac 15<sup>36</sup>) he proceeded in company with Silas to revisit by the shortest route—the Cilician Gate—the older churches of Galatia. The purpose of this visit was not only to strengthen and establish (ἐπιστηρίξων, Ac 15<sup>41</sup>) spiritually these communities, but also to set on foot the collection for the poor among the Christians of Jerusalem (cf. Gal 6<sup>10</sup>). In spite of the discouraging defection of the Galatian Christians, the Apostle feels himself justified in keeping this purpose before them, recalling its origin, and reminding them of its spiritual value (cf. Gal 6<sup>6ff.</sup>). It was probably early in A.D. 57 that he visited the Galatian churches for this purpose, and from this time until he presents the fruit of his toil during the feast of Pentecost in A.D. 58 he never loses sight of the importance and justice of the collection, not alone as it affected those who were to receive it, but also as it affected the givers (see Ro 15<sup>27</sup> 2 Co 9<sup>8</sup> 8<sup>5f</sup>. 12). It is instructive, too, to note how he stimulates each community by mentioning the others in terms of generous praise (cf. 2 Co 8<sup>1-5</sup> 9<sup>1-5</sup>, Ro 15<sup>26f</sup>). It is a good example of the Apostle's method, and recalls the accusation of wiliness (πανούργος δόλω, 2 Co 12<sup>16</sup>) brought against him by the Corinthian Christians.

The character of the dispute which raged so long and so fiercely between St. Paul and the church in Corinth was to a large extent developed and moulded by the niggardliness (ἐὰν δὲ ἄξιον ἢ τοῦ κἀμὲ πορεύεσθαι [1 Co 16<sup>4</sup>; cf. 9<sup>11f</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>5f</sup>. 12<sup>13</sup>]) and suspicious meanness of its members. Their response to the appeal of Titus, who was the original deputed organizer of the Corinthian collection, was prompt and willing (τὸ θέλειν); and yet, in spite of the fact that they had so early (προ-εἰρήξαθε ἀπὸ πέρυσι, 2 Co 8<sup>10</sup>) given their assent to his wishes, they seem to have repented soon of their promised support and to have accused St. Paul of having hurried them deceitfully into an unwelcome undertaking (ἐγὼ οὐ κατεβάρησα, 2 Co 12<sup>16</sup>). The disingenuous nature of their charges appears again and again in his vigorous self-defence (see his words, ἡδικήσαμεν, ἐφθέλαμεν, ἐπλεονεκτήσαμεν, 2 Co 7<sup>2</sup>). Of one fact he constantly reminds them—he never accepted the smallest help towards his own support during his two visits to Corinth (cf. Ac 18<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>12</sup>. 15. 18 2 Co 11<sup>7f</sup>.); and if, as seems very probable, his Second Epistle to the Corinthians is represented by the last four chapters of our Canonical Second Epistle (see J. H. Kennedy, The Second and Third Epistles to the Corinthians, 1900), we find that the Apostle's indignation was so keen that he expressly determined, before he wrote the more conciliatory Third Epistle (2 Co 1-9), never to accept monetary aid at their hands (2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>. 1-12<sup>14</sup>). It is satisfactory to note that this intense and proud independence was met by a complete reconciliation; and the success of his mission was such that he was moved to exclamations of thankfulness and praise (2 Co 9<sup>15</sup>). Perhaps an even more significant proof of his feeling in this respect is to be discovered in the tone of friendliness with which he mentions his Corinthian friends in the document written immediately afterwards (Ro 16<sup>11</sup>. 23). At the time of writing the Epistle to the Romans he was the guest of Gaius in Corinth, and the unpleasant character of his relations with the Corinthian Church had undergone a complete change.

What measure of success attended the Apostle's prolonged and anxious efforts it is difficult to estimate. If we are to judge by his silence and the solemn warning in his Epistle to the Galatians (6<sup>7</sup>), the scheme would appear to have been only a partial success or even to have fallen through. Again, if we are allowed to draw an inference from the list of delegates who accompanied him (Ac 20<sup>4</sup>), it would seem that the amount of the Corinthian collection was so small that there was little or no need for a representative. As early as the latter part of A.D. 57 the Macedonian churches had appointed their delegates (2 Co 8<sup>19</sup>; see HDB iii. 712<sup>a</sup>). On the other hand, as the Apostle intended to spend the winter months in Corinth, the selection would naturally await his arrival; and more especially would this delay occur as the bitter quarrel had only just been amicably settled. From the scanty evidence available it would not be safe to dogmatize. It may be that his reference to the example of the Galatian collection (see the emphatic μεῖς, 1 Co 16<sup>1</sup>) points to a work already successful. Again, as the time of his journey to Jerusalem drew near, confidence in a not unworthy response by the Corinthian Church seems to have been restored (see his παρρησία, καύχησις, 2 Co 7<sup>4</sup>; περισσεύετε, 8<sup>7</sup>; προθυμία, 8<sup>11</sup>; τὴν οὖν ἐνδείξιν τῆς ἀγάπης ὑμῶν, 8<sup>24</sup>; cf. 9<sup>2</sup>. 7. 13. 15). It is not improbable that the triumphant joyousness (ἡ καρδία ὑμῶν πεπλάτυνται, 2 Co 6<sup>11</sup>) of his late appeal to them was due to their having chosen himself as their ambassador or representative to convey their 'gracious' gift (ἀπενεγκεῖν τὴν χάριν ὑμῶν εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ, 1 Co 16<sup>3</sup>) to its destination. His satisfaction that all discontent and suspicion were at an end is expressed by his sending before him to Corinth along with Titus two well-known and tried brethren (οὗ ὁ ἔπαινος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, ὃν εδοκιμάσαμεν ἐν πολλοῖς, 2 Co 8<sup>18</sup>. 22), to complete the collection and to have everything in readiness against his arrival in company probably with some Macedonian representatives (2 Co 9<sup>4</sup>; cf. Ac 20<sup>4</sup>). It is pleasant to learn that the unsavoury bickerings in Corinth were forgotten when, during that winter's sojourn there, St. Paul penned his stately and calm Epistle to Rome. In that document he refers only to the good-will and the pleasure with which the Corinthians adopted and carried out the purpose of his pacificatory labours (τὸν καρπὸν τοῦτο, Ro 15<sup>28</sup>). The depth of the Apostle's sympathy for the sufferings of his fellow-countrymen may be gauged by the reasons on which he bases his claims on their behalf. The spiritual debt which the Gentiles owed to the Jews (ὀφείλεται εἰσὶν αὐτῶν, Ro 15<sup>27</sup>; cf. Gal 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>11</sup>) demanded an answering service (λειτουργεῖν) in ministering to their temporal needs (see the contrast involved in the words πνευματικοῖς . . . σαρκικοῖς, Ro 15<sup>27</sup>). Another reason which he adduces arises out of the duty which wealth universally owes to poverty (mark again the contrast, περίσσευμα . . . ὕστέρημα, 2 Co 8<sup>14</sup>), in order that, as equal opportunities in things spiritual is the norm of Christian life, there may also be equality (ὅπως γένηται ἰσότης, 2 Co 8<sup>14</sup>) in the satisfaction of worldly necessities. The repeated use of the word κοινωνία in this connexion by St. Paul justifies us in assuming that he deliberately set himself the task of conciliating the jealousy of the Jewish Christians by establishing a bond of fellowship and communion between them and the Gentile converts (2 Co 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>13</sup>; cf. Ro 12<sup>13</sup>).

All this is the more remarkable as at this period the sinister machinations of the Jews in both Corinth and Jerusalem were active and unrelenting (Ac 20<sup>3</sup>; cf. Ro 15<sup>31</sup>). Instead of sailing direct, he made the return journey through Macedonia, where he celebrated the Passover (Ac 20<sup>6</sup>), and only arrived in Jerusalem in time for the feast of Pentecost, when he finally discharged the task he had set himself to carry out (cf. Ac 24<sup>17</sup>).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works mentioned throughout the art., see Conybeare-Howson, The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, new ed., 1886; G. G. Findlay, art. 'Paul the Apostle' in HDB iii. 696 ff.; A. Harnack, Mission and Expansion of Christianity, Eng. tr., 1908; A. Hausrath, A Hist. of NT Times: The Time of the Apostles, Eng. tr., 1895, vols. iii. and iv.; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895, also art. 'Corinth' in HDB i. 479 ff.; F. Rendall, 'The Pauline Collection for the Saints' in Expositor, 4th ser. viii. [1893] 321 ff.; J. Armitage Robinson, art. 'Communion' in HDB i. 460 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans<sup>5</sup> (ICC, 1902); C. v. Weizsacker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i. 2 [1897], ii. [1895]. J. R. WILLIS.

COLONY.—The careful reader of Ac 16<sup>12</sup>, the only place in the NT where the term 'colony' (κολωνία, a mere transliteration of the Latin original) occurs, sees at once that a Roman colony must have been very different from what we understand by the word 'colony.' Colonia (from colonus, 'settler,' 'husbandman,' from colere, 'to cultivate') was a word applied by the Romans to a body (usually 300) of their citizen-soldiers (in earlier days the two terms were convertible), transferred from the city of Rome itself to some outlying part of Italy or (later) to some other land. These men remained Roman citizens after transference, and were collectively, in fact, a portion of Rome itself planted amidst a community not itself possessed of Roman citizenship. The object of the earliest colonies was the holding in subjection to Rome of the particular country in which they were planted. It was not usually a fresh city that was thus founded. The rule was that a community was already resident there, and the body of Roman soldiers was stationed there, thus making the place into a garrison city. The coloniæ were connected by military roads, beginning at Rome, and troops could be marched along those roads to relieve the coloniæ in the shortest possible time, supposing a rising (tumultus) should occur, too powerful to be quelled by the local garrison. (A good example is the case of the Lombardy Plain and the campaigns of Marius.) A Roman colony, then, means a garrison city, and implies the presence of Roman soldier-citizens.

This was the Roman colonia in origin and purpose. We find, however, that, after danger from the enemy had ceased, coloniæ continued to be planted during the Empire in peaceful districts. This new style of colonia continued to mean a body of Roman citizens, but the military aspect was lost sight of. It was an honour for a provincial city to be made into a colonia, because this was a proof that it was of special importance, specially dear to the Emperor, and worthy to be the residence of Roman citizens, who were the aristocracy of the provincial towns in which they lived.* (It was not till A.D. 212, the time of Caracalla, that all the subjects of the Roman Empire received the Roman citizenship.)

A number of towns mentioned in the NT were coloniæ at the time the events narrated there took place: Corinth (since 44-43 B.C.), Puteoli (since 194 B.C.), Philippi (42 B.C.), Pisidian Antioch (before 27 B.C.), Syracuse (21 B.C.), Troas (between 27 and 12 B.C.), Lystra (after 12 B.C.),† Ptolemais (before A.D. 47). All these places are mentioned by the writer of Acts, and yet to one only does he attach the epithet 'colony,' namely Philippi. The whole manner in which he refers to this place shows personal pride in it, and it is hard to refrain from believing that he had a special connexion with it.

The comparatively large proportion of places holding the dignity of colony, which were visited by St. Paul, illustrates very forcibly the plan of his evangelization. He aimed at planting the gospel in the leading centres, knowing that it would spread best from these.

LITERATURE.—Kornemann, art. 'Coloniæ' in Pauly-Wissowa. (Kornemann's statement that there is no up-to-date comprehensive work on coloniæ outside Italy appears to be still true.) On Philippi as colonia see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, London, 1893, p. 206 ff.; Iconium not a colonia till Hadrian, see W. M. Ramsay, Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, do. 1899, pp. 123, 218 f., and later works. A. SOUTER.

COLOSSÆ (Κολοσσαί in the opening of the Epistle, 1<sup>2</sup>; in the title, which is not original, there is about equal authority for Κολοσσαεῖς and Κολασσαι; in the subscription the authority for Κολασσαι predominates).—The name was given to an ancient Phrygian city on the S. bank of the Lycus (Churuk Su), an affluent of the Mæander. It was situated at the lower end of a narrow glen about 10 miles long. Herodotus says that at Colossæ 'the river Lycus, falling into a chasm of the earth, disappears; then, reappearing at a distance of about five stadia, it discharges itself into the Mæander' (vii. 30). No such chasm, however, exists at Colossæ, and the historian has apparently misreported what he heard of the underground passage of the river at its source, as accurately described by Strabo (XII. viii. 16).

Colossæ was one of three sister cities which received the gospel about the same time (Col 4<sup>13</sup>), Laodicea lying about 10 miles farther down the Lycus valley, and facing Hierapolis, which was picturesquely seated on a plateau 6 miles to the north. Behind Colossæ and Laodicea rose the mighty snow-capped range of Cadmus (Baba Dagħ, 'Father of mountains'), over 8000 ft. above sea-level. Commanding the approaches to a pass in this range, and traversed by the great trade-route between Ephesus and the Euphrates, Colossæ was at one time a place of much importance. Herodotus (op. cit.) calls it 'a great city of Phrygia,' and Xenophon describes it as πόλιν οἰκουμένην ευδαίμονα καὶ μεγάλην (Anab. I. ii. 6). But as Laodicea and Hierapolis grew in importance, Colossæ waned, and in the beginning of the first century Strabo reckons it as no more than a πόλις (XII. viii. 13). Pliny, indeed, names it among the oppida celeberrima of Phrygia (HN v. 41), but he is merely alluding to its illustrious past. It was visited, however, by streams of travellers passing east and west, who made it conversant with the freshest thought of the time. Its permanent population consisted mostly of Phrygian natives and Greek colonists. Jews had also been attracted to the busy trade-centres of the Lycus valley, a fact which accounts for the Jewish complexion of some of the errors refuted in the Colossian Epistle. Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.) transplanted 2000 Jewish families from Babylonia and Mesopotamia to Lydia and Phrygia (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4). The freedom and prosperity which they enjoyed probably induced many others to follow them, and there is a bitter saying in the Babylonian Talmud that the wine and baths of Phrygia separated the ten tribes from their brethren (Shab. 147<sup>b</sup>, quoted by A. Neubauer, Geogr. du Talmud, Paris, 1868, p. 315). Cicero (pro Flacc. 28) speaks of the multitudo Judæorum who inhabited the district in his time.

The Church of Colossæ was not directly founded by St. Paul. There is no indication that he ever preached in any of the cities of the Lycus valley. In his second journey he was debarred from speaking in Asia (Ac 16<sup>9</sup>), the province to which Colossæ politically belonged, and in his third tour 'he went through the Galatic region and Phrygia [or Galatic and Phrygian region] in order, confirming the disciples,' and 'having passed through the upper country (τὰ ἀνωτερικά μέρη) he came to Ephesus' (Ac 18<sup>23</sup> 19<sup>1</sup>). It is not impossible that—as Renan suggests (Saint Paul, Paris, 1869, pp. 331 f., 356 f.)—he followed the usual route of commerce down the Lycus valley, going straight to his destination without pausing to do any work by the way. But it is more in harmony with St. Luke's carefully chosen words, as well as with the language of Col., to suppose that he took the shorter hill-road by Seiblia and the Cayster valley, a road practicable for foot passengers but not for wheeled traffic (W. M. Ramsay, The Church in the Rom. Emp. p. 94). During his three years' residence in Ephesus, 'all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks' (Ac 19<sup>10</sup>; cf. 19<sup>46</sup>), and it was probably at this time that the churches of the Lycus were founded. The truth proclaimed in the virtual capital of the province—the primacy of Sardis was now only nominal—was soon carried to the remotest towns and villages. Epaphras and Philemon, citizens of Colossæ, were probably converted in Ephesus, and the former was speedily sent, as St. Paul's delegate or representative (ὅπερ ἡμῶν, instead of ὑμῶν, is the true reading in Col 1<sup>7</sup>),

* The British coloniæ were Colchester, Gloucester, York, and Lincoln.

† Not Iconium till the time of Hadrian.

to evangelize his native valley. Five or six years afterwards, St. Paul, a prisoner in Rome, wrote to the Colossian Christians, of whose faith and love he had heard (Col 1<sup>4-9</sup>) from Epaphras and perhaps from Onesimus, but who had never seen his face (2<sup>1</sup>). He felt as great a solicitude for them as if they had been his own spiritual children. Indirectly they were indebted to him for their knowledge of the gospel (cf. following article).

One of the non-Christian beliefs and practices which quickly threatened to submerge the Colossian Church was the cult of angels, or elemental spirits, who were supposed to intervene between a pure, absolute, unapproachable God and a world of evil. This idea proved almost ineradicable. One of the canons (the 35th) of the Council of Laodicea (held probably about A.D. 363) ran thus: 'It is not right for Christians to abandon the Church of God and go away and invoke angels (ἀγγέλους ὀνομάζειν). . . . If, therefore, any one is found devoting himself to this secret idolatry, let him be anathema.' About a century later, Theodoret, commenting on Col 2<sup>18</sup>, says: 'This disease (τοῦτο τὸ πάθος) remained long in Phrygia and Pisidia . . . and even to the present time oratories (εὐκτήρια) of the holy Michael may be seen among them and their neighbours.' The Byzantine historian Nicetas Choniates—Chonæ, on a spur of Cadmus, took the place of decaying Colossæ—mentions τὸν ἀρχαγγελικὸν ναὸν as standing, μέγιστον καὶ καλλεῖ καλλίστον, in or near the ancient city; and the fantastic legend of 'the Miracle of Chonæ' (Ramsay, The Church in the Rom. Emp. p. 465 f.) reflects a popular belief in the mediation of Michael to save the inhabitants from an inundation.

LITERATURE.—W. M. Ramsay, The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, London, 1895-97, vol. I., The Church in the Roman Empire, do. 1893, ch. xix. JAMES STRAHAN.

COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.—1. Introduction.—St. Paul himself had never preached in the Lycus valley. On his third missionary journey he took another route (Ac 19<sup>1</sup>), and that he did not visit that district during his two years' stay at Ephesus is sufficiently proved by the allusions in his letter to the Church at Colossæ (Col 1<sup>4-7-9-21</sup>). Colossæ was at this time a small town of declining importance, overshadowed by its great neighbours, Laodicea and Hierapolis, some 10 miles downstream. In all three towns churches had been founded by the labours of Epaphras (17 4<sup>12-13</sup>), himself a native of Colossæ (4<sup>12</sup>), who had met St. Paul, probably at Ephesus, and had become a disciple. The date of the foundation of these churches may be assigned with some confidence to about the years A.D. 55 and 56 (adopting C. H. Turner's dating; cf. art. 'Chronology in HDB), and Epaphras may well have been acting as the direct agent of St. Paul (cf. the better reading 'on our behalf' in 17). This would account in some degree for the authoritative attitude which St. Paul takes in his letter.

Though Colossæ itself was but a small town, its Church may well have been the most important of those in the Lycus valley. It was evidently closely connected with the Church at Laodicea (2<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>16</sup>), and it is even possible that the work in the latter place was in charge of Archippus, the son of Philemon of Colossæ (4<sup>17</sup>, Philem<sup>2</sup>). In each place the work seems to have centred in the house of one of its most prominent members; cf. the house of Aquila and Priscilla at Rome, Ro 16<sup>5</sup> (if, indeed, Ro 16 was not addressed to Ephesus), that of Philemon (Philem<sup>2</sup>) in Colossæ, that of Nymphas, or Nympha, in Laodicea (Col 4<sup>15</sup>). A well-attested reading suggests that the latter, a woman's name, may be correct in spite of the improbability of this Doric form being used. If this is so, Nympha, like Priscilla, takes her place with the women who played an honoured part in the life of the early Church.

Colossæ lay in Phrygian territory, and its population was doubtless largely Phrygian, with a veneer of Greek civilization. Philemon's wife, Apphia (Philem-), bore a Phrygian name. The Jewish trader had doubtless reached Colossæ, but there is no sign of any permanent settlement of Jews there such as was made by the Seleucid kings at Laodicea or Tarsus. That the Church there was entirely or at least predominantly Gentile is shown clearly enough by the Epistle (1<sup>21-27</sup> 2<sup>13</sup>; cf. St. Paul's anxiety in 4<sup>11</sup> to show how few among his helpers are of Jewish race—'who alone of the circumcision are my fellow-workers . . .'). And the Jews of Laodicea, together with any who may have dwelt at Colossæ, were doubtless, like most of the Jews of the Diaspora, largely affected both by local tendencies of thought and by the wider influences which centred in Alexandria.

The Church of Colossæ had been in existence only a few years when Epaphras rejoined St. Paul, then in prison for the faith (1<sup>24</sup> 4<sup>10-18</sup>). He brought with him good news of the infant Church (1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>). But yet there were grave reasons for anxiety. Both at Colossæ and at Laodicea (4<sup>16</sup>) a new and dangerous form of teaching was abroad. Who the teachers were we do not know. The heresy may even have been due to some one influential leader (cf. Zahn's comment on 2<sup>18</sup>, where the participles are in the singular [Introd. to NT, i. 479]). But whether the teachers were one or more, it is at least clear that it was not with a recurrence of the Galatian trouble that St. Paul had now to deal. The stress of this new 'philosophy' lay not so much upon the Law as upon theosophical tenets and ascetic practices, which were supposed to constitute a higher Christianity (2<sup>-3-8</sup>).

For the present this teaching had not made much headway in the Church at Colossæ. But St. Paul saw the need of striking while there was yet time. And he had other reasons for sending one of his agents to Asia at this time. There was Onesimus, the converted slave of Philemon, ready at St. Paul's bidding to return to his master. There was also the desirability of sending a pastoral letter to the Churches of Asia. Tychicus was at hand, ready to convey both the circular letter, now known as the Epistle to the Ephesians, and the short note to Philemon about Onesimus. By his hand, therefore, St. Paul writes to the brethren at Colossæ.

There has been much discussion whether a fourth letter, to Laodicea, accompanied the other three, based on the command to the Colossians that they should read the Epistle 'from Laodicea.' The old hypothesis of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Calvin that this was a letter written from the Laodicean Church to St. Paul is rendered impossible by the context. It remains therefore to decide whether this is some lost letter by the Apostle or whether it can be identified with any of his existing letters. The suggestions of John of Damascus, who identifies it with 1 Tim., and of Schneckenburger, who identifies it with Heb., can safely be passed over. In 1844 Wieseler suggested that Philemon really lived at Laodicea, and that the lost letter is our Epistle to Philemon. This would certainly make it easier to account for the apparent connexion of Archippus with Laodicea, but otherwise the theory has little point and has not met with any acceptance. A more probable hypothesis is to be found in the identification of this letter with Ephesians. If this was a circular letter, intended for all the Asiatic churches, it would naturally come to Colossæ as a letter brought by Tychicus from Laodicea (see art. EPHESIANS). If this identification is rejected the letter to the Laodiceans is lost beyond recall. It is interesting that more than one attempt was made to supply this gap in the Pauline Canon during the early days of the Church. In several MSS the words 'written from Laodicea' were added at the end of 1 Timothy. More curious still, an Epistle was made up out of a collection of Pauline phrases, possibly as early as the 2nd cent. (so Zahn) but probably later, and was given the title ad Laodicensens. Jerome (Vir. Illustr. v.) mentions this work, 'legunt quidam et ad Laodicensens, sed ab omnibus exploditur,' and, despite his condemnation, it was widely read throughout the Middle Ages. Traces of this Epistle have been found only in the West, and it has commonly been regarded as a Western forgery. Lightfoot, however, argues that it shows traces of being from a Greek original, despite the fact that all known MSS are in Latin. The early date of the document also points in the same direction. (This Ep. ad Laod. is discussed at length by Lightfoot in an appendix to his Colossians, p. 274 ff.; cf. also Westcott, Canon of NT<sup>5</sup>, 1881, Appendix E; A. Souter, Text and Canon of NT, 1913, p. 193.)

2. Contents.—St. Paul, associating Timothy with himself in his opening greeting (11-2), passes on in his customary manner to a thanksgiving for the good news which he has heard from Epaphras. In this thanksgiving he alludes especially to the true gospel which had been preached to his readers by Epaphras, and reminds them that it is this gospel and no other that has borne fruit in all the world (13-8). This is followed by a prayer which widens out, as in Eph., into a statement of doctrine with regard to the Person of Christ (18-23). This doctrinal section is expanded with a special view to the heresies which it is St. Paul's purpose to combat. In opposition to the 'philosophy' which was being preached, he prays that the Colossians may be filled with 'all spiritual wisdom and understanding' (19). In opposition to the theosophy which recognized and trembled before 'the principalities and the powers,' he thanks God that they have been delivered from 'the power of darkness' and made members of 'the kingdom of the Son of His love' (13). In opposition to the position accorded to angelic beings, he breaks into a psalm in honour of the Son (α) as sole Redeemer (14); (β) as the visible Representative of the invisible God (15); (γ) as prior to and supreme over all creation, including these very angelic powers; as the present stay, and ultimate consummation, of creation (15-17); (δ) as the supreme Head of the Church in virtue of His Resurrection (18); (ε) as One in whom abide completely all the perfections of the Godhead (19); (ζ) as One whose death has made atonement not only for human sin but also for all the disorder that exists in heavenly places, so that not only are the angels unable to 'make peace,' but they themselves need the mediation of the Son (20-23). St. Paul then passes on to emphasize his own position as a minister of this, the one true gospel, a gospel which does not merely save a few elect, but which is valid for every man who will receive it (24-29).

Ch. 2 is devoted to warnings against the false teaching which had been reported by Epaphras. It opens with a renewal of the prayer of 19. St. Paul again reiterates that in Christ alone, and not in any human plausibility, can the hidden treasures of knowledge and wisdom be found (21-5). He warns his readers against esoteric cults which have dealings with the angel world, instead of with Christ, the supreme Head of all (26-10). He reminds them that as Christians they need no special and mysterious ceremonies, but only faith in Christ, who has cancelled all ceremonial obligations through the power of the Cross, thereby depriving hostile spiritual powers of their weapon against mankind (211-15). The Colossians are therefore not to be misled into thinking that there is some higher way of leading the Christian life, consisting in special ordinances or a higher asceticism, even if commended by a show of esoteric knowledge (216-23).

In ch. 3, St. Paul passes, by way of contrast, to the practical implications of life in Christ. For Christians there is indeed a true asceticism, but it consists in a putting to death of the 'old man,' and a putting on of the 'new man,' not merely in a mortifying of the flesh, for that, for the Christian, is already accomplished in the renewal of the spirit 'after the image of him that created him' (311-11). The rule for the Christian must therefore be not the rule of ascetic ordinances but the warm and living rule of love, of Christ dwelling in the heart (312-17).

A short passage follows in which brief words of counsel are addressed to wives, husbands, children, fathers, servants, masters (318-41), and one or two general exhortations lead up to the salutations with which the letter closes (42-18).

3. Date and place of composition.—It has been customary to regard the four 'Epistles of the Captivity' as all written from Rome during the two years (A.D. 59-61) alluded to in Ac 28<sup>30</sup>. There is no good reason for giving up this view in the case of Colossians. Phil. at least must be from Rome.

If, with Bleek and Lightfoot (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 30), we place Col. later than Phil., on the ground of the closer affinity of the latter with Rom. both in style and doctrine, the Roman origin of Col. would be unquestionable. It is not possible, however, in a writer like St. Paul, to postulate so orderly an advance in these respects. His doctrine at least must have been thought out long before he wrote Romans. And, on the other hand, the allusions in Ph 1<sup>7</sup>, 12, 13, 20-25, 22<sup>3</sup> point to a date near the very close of the Roman imprisonment. We must thus date Col. earlier (Ph 1<sup>7-14</sup> seems to reflect Col 4<sup>3-4</sup>). But this leaves open the possibility that it was written not from Rome but during the two years spent at Cæsarea. This view has been held by quite a number of scholars, e.g. Meyer, Sabatier, Weiss, and Haupt. So also recently E. L. Hicks, Interpreter, 1910. But the arguments on the other side, as set out e.g. by Peake ('Col.' in EGT, p. 491), seem conclusive. Haupt's argument that a considerable interval of time must lie between the statements of doctrine found in Phil. and Col. has no weight. Weiss points out that St. Paul gives a different account of his plans in Phil., where he is hoping to visit Macedonia, from that in Philem., where Colossæ is his goal. But the two statements are not incompatible in letters both written from Rome. The one plan might easily involve the other. And, further, there are serious objections to the Cæsarea hypothesis. It is impossible to think that St. Paul at Cæsarea was already planning a visit to Colossæ. It was upon Rome that his eyes were fixed, and at least towards the end of his days at Cæsarea he knew that he would be sent thither. But most decisive of all is the little companion note to Philemon. It must have been at Rome, the natural refuge of the runaway slave, that St. Paul came across Onesimus, and from Rome that he sent him back to his master with Tychicus. Finally, it would be most remarkable, in a letter written from Cæsarea, that there should be no salutation from Philip.

In view of the fact that Col. and Philem. were probably sent together, it has caused comment that there is some variation in the salutations. Not only is the order of the names different—a point of little significance—but in Col. Aristarchus, in Philem. Epaphras, is given the place of honour as 'my fellow-prisoner.' The reason for this is obscure. Fritzsche's suggestion that St. Paul's friends took turns in sharing his captivity is only a suggestion. As Peake points out, the divergence is a proof of the authenticity of both Epistles, since no imitator would have made so unnecessary and self-condemnatory an alteration.

4. External evidence for authenticity.—This is quite as strong as could reasonably be expected. At the end of the 2nd cent. Col. was known to Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. It is mentioned by name in the Muratorian Canon. Its acceptance by Marcion carries the knowledge of it at Rome to before 150. This renders the description by Justin of Christ as 'first-born of all creation' (Dial. 84, 85, 100) an almost certain echo of 1<sup>15</sup>, especially as the parallel phrase in Philo is not πρωτόκοκος but πρωτόγονος. Earlier references are all rather uncertain, especially in Barnabas and Clement of Rome. It is, however, probable that Ignatius quotes Col 2<sup>14</sup> in Smyrn. i. 2, and 1<sup>16</sup> in Trall. v. 2. Lightfoot also points out Ignatius' use of σύνδουλος as a term for deacons; cf. 1<sup>7</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>. This evidence is insufficient in itself to prove authenticity, and throws us back upon a discussion of the many problems which the Epistle itself presents.

5. The Colossian heresy.—The teaching attacked by St. Paul is described in 2<sup>8</sup>, 16-23, verses which in addition to their brevity present many problems both of translation and of text. Theories as to its character have been varied and numerous. The principal facts that can be gleaned are as follows:

(1) The teaching was Christian; cf. 2<sup>19</sup>, which, however, suggests that it did not give Christ His due position.

(2) It was, at least in part, Judaistic. This would not necessarily be proved by the reference to 'the bond written in ordinances' in 2<sup>14</sup>, though it is on the whole probable that the Mosaic Law is intended. But the specific allusions in 2<sup>16</sup>, 'in meat or in drink or in respect of a feast day, or a new moon, or a sabbath day,' are obviously Jewish. It is true that the Law says nothing about 'drink,' but the later Rabbinism certainly included such regulations, as is shown by He 9<sup>10</sup>. And this very Rabbinism is clearly alluded to in 2<sup>8</sup>, 'the tradition of men.' The references to circumcision (2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>) show that the false teachers assigned some value to it. Yet this Judaism cannot have been very like that attacked in Gal., as the whole tone of the letter shows. It was less definite, and mingled with other elements of a peculiar type.

(3) It claimed to be a 'philosophy' (2<sup>8</sup>), which St. Paul calls a 'vain deceit.' It seems to have been regarded as the revelation of a secret 'wisdom and knowledge' (2<sup>2, 3</sup>). Here, just as much as in 1 Co 1, we are certainly moving in Greek, or at least Hellenistic, regions of thought. Philo could speak of a 'Jewish philosophy.' And the Judaism of Colossæ, like that of Alexandria, was at least given a Hellenic colour. As Hort has shown (Judaistic Christianity, p. 119 ff.), the term 'philosophy' might easily have been used of esoteric lore about angels, or even, though this usage is a later one, of an ascetic ethical cult, features which both appear at Colossæ.

(4) Some sort of worship of angels seems to have been practised, and possibly, if the reading is correct, emphasis was laid upon visions communicated by them (2<sup>18</sup>). St. Paul charges the teachers with reliance upon the spirits that control the elements of the universe rather than upon Christ (2<sup>8</sup>). That this is the true meaning of στοιχεῖα in this passage, as well as in Gal 4<sup>8, 9</sup>, is shown by the exegesis, which implies in each case personal agents. And the emphasis laid by St. Paul upon the superiority of Christ to 'thrones or dominions or principalities or powers' (1<sup>16</sup>; cf. 1<sup>30</sup> 2<sup>15</sup>) confirms this view. That there was angelolatry of some sort is certain, though the language in which it is described cannot be pressed too closely, since St. Paul may be using the language of his own angelology to describe the view of his opponents. In the 4th cent. the Council of Laodicea found it necessary to condemn angel-worship. In the 5th cent. Theodoret says that the archangel Michael was worshipped in the district, and this worship continued for several centuries (see Zahn, op. cit. p. 476f.; cf. Lightfoot, Col. p. 68).

(5) Whatever 2<sup>-3</sup> precisely means, it shows that stress was laid upon asceticism, for which special rules were given (2<sup>16, 20, 21</sup>). This was the natural outcome of a 'philosophy' in which the spirits that ruled material things were the objects of fear and reverence. The angels who were the objects of the Colossian cult were powers who if not propitiated might be hostile to man, who must therefore guard himself by mortifying his material body. This is the point of St. Paul's counter-statement of the true Christian asceticism (3<sup>5ff.</sup>).

It has been made clear by the work of recent scholars that there is nothing in all this which need point to a date later than A.D. 60. The Tübingen school, from Baur to Hilgenfeld, thought that Col. reflected the great Gnostic systems of the 2nd century. The powers, etc., were the Valentinian æons, forming the Pleroma, to which they saw an allusion in 1<sup>19</sup>. Asceticism, again, was a typical Gnostic feature, as was the emphasis on a secret wisdom or Gnosis (cf. 2<sup>8</sup>) confined to an inner circle of initiates or τέλειοι (cf. 1<sup>28</sup>, where St. Paul declares that every man is to be made τέλειος by the gospel). The Judaistic references were explained on this theory to be due to some sort of Gnostic Ebionism, on the lines of the pseudo-Clementines. That there were Gnostic tendencies at Colossæ need not be denied. The emphasis on knowledge is enough to prove that. But there is no hall-mark of any particular 2nd-cent. system. The word πλήρωμα in 1<sup>19</sup> loses most of its point if it is used in the later technical sense (on the word see Lightfoot, Col. p. 323; J. A. Robinson, Eph., 1903, p. 255; Peake on Col 1<sup>19</sup>). It is far more probable that the later Gnostics derived their usage from that of St. Paul.

More recently the theory has been held in a modified form, recognizing a genuine Pauline Epistle, directed against a Jewish-Christian theosophy, but regarding it as having been expanded by a 2nd-cent. writer (so Pileiderer, Primitive Christianity, Eng. tr., 1906-11, who saw allusions to Gnostic Ebionism though he did not attempt to reconstruct the original Epistle; Holtzmann and Soltan, who depend, however, rather on literary criticism; see below). The arguments for this also fail if the known tendencies of the 1st cent. are sufficient to cover the facts. And there is no hint in the Epistle of any such division in the object of St. Paul's attack.

More plausible is the attempt to find in Col. an attack on the 1st cent. Gnosticism of Cerinthus (so, e.g., R. Scott). Here we find both the emphasis on Judaism, though the Jewish angels have taken the position later occupied by the Gnostic æons, and the reduced Christology in which the Christ is supposed to have descended upon the man Jesus at His baptism. This has clear affinities with the Colossian heresy; but, as Lightfoot has shown (Col. p. 108 ff.), it is difficult to think that the teaching at Colossæ had as yet taken so definite a form. St. Paul would surely have made a more definite and incisive reply. And, further, the angelic powers could still be regarded as objects of worship. They are not yet either ignorant of or hostile to the Supreme God. And the emphasis on the identity of Jesus with the Christ (2<sup>6</sup>), while it would have point against Cerinthus, is hardly an attack upon him. It is thus more natural to see in this heresy that tendency of thought which led up to Cerinthus than the direct outcome of his teaching.

It has been suggested, especially by Lightfoot and Kloppe, that there was some connexion with the Jewish ascetic sect known as Essenes. But (a) before A.D. 70 there is no trace of Essenism except on the shores of the Dead Sea. The somewhat similar Therapeutæ, in Egypt, are only known from Philo, de Vit. contempl., a much-disputed treatise. Lightfoot tries to find parallels in Acts for the use of magic (cf. Ac 19<sup>18</sup> with Jos. BJ II. 8. 6 ad fin.) and in the fourth book of the Sibylline Oracles, probably written in Asia c. A.D. 80. Neither parallel amounts to much. (b) The Essenes jealously guarded the names of the angels (Jos. BJ II. viii. 7). This is a poor parallel for the Colossian cult, which more probably arose through a syncretistic admixture with Phrygian ideas. (c) The evidence that the Essenes forbade flesh and wine is disputable (see Zahn, op. cit. p. 376), though they certainly had extremely rigid ceremonial rules as to food. Of the specific Essene prohibition of marriage there is no trace at Colossæ. (d) There is no sign in Col. of the alleged Essene sun-worship, of their communal life, their ablations, their very severe probation and initiation. (e) The allusions to 'sabbaths' and circumcision in Col. are merely Judaistic. There is no hint of the very strict sabbatarian rules of the Essenes. It is true that Lightfoot and Klopper, especially the latter, argue merely for Essenistic tendencies at Colossæ. But even this can hardly be said to be proved. The real value of the suggestion is that it shows that within Judaism itself it was possible for strange esoteric cults to appear. (For the Essenes see esp. Jos. BJ II. viii.; Lightfoot, Col. pp. 82 ff., 115 ff.; Zahn, op. cit. p. 376 f.)

We are thus driven to the conclusion that the Colossian heresy found its stimulus in contemporary Judaism, doubtless with syncretistic Phrygian features. Hort (Judaistic Christianity, 116 ff.) has shown that there is nothing in the language which need imply any other source. The one surprising point is the worship of angels. But even if this is not derived from some local Phrygian cult, it was quite a natural application of contemporary Judaism. In the later Jewish view all God's activity in Nature was mediated by angels, and, though angel-worship among the Jews is not known at this date, it certainly sprang up within a short time, being alluded to in the Evangelium Petri, by Celsus, and several times in the Talmud. No objection to the authenticity of the Epistle need therefore be maintained upon this ground.

6. The theology of the Epistle.—It has been objected to Col. that it is un-Pauline in its Christology. It is true that there is a speculative advance with regard to the Person of Christ. St. Paul is now opposing a speculative 'philosophy,' and, as has been shown in dealing with the contents of the letter, he is forced to draw out the speculative implications of his own position. And in the advance made there is nothing to cause surprise. That Christ is prior to, and the principle of, all creation (1<sup>15-17</sup>) is the thought implicit in 1 Co 8<sup>6</sup> and in the whole doctrine of the Man from Heaven (15<sup>47</sup>) regarded as pre-existent. That Christ is regarded also as the goal of creation (Col 1<sup>16</sup>) is only in form an advance upon 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>, for it is only when the consummation in Christ is reached that lie is to surrender all things to the Father; and even so, in virtue of His unity with the Father, they remain His own (cf. Ph 2<sup>9-10</sup>). In Col. St. Paul is especially emphasizing the indwelling in Christ of the whole Godhead (1<sup>20-29</sup>). And, indeed, in 1<sup>20</sup> the most natural rendering implies exactly the doctrine of 1 Co 15<sup>28</sup>, Ro 11<sup>36</sup>. In any case, even if there is a real advance here, it is one that St. Paul might easily have made, and which was the natural answer to teachers who were assigning cosmic significance to angelic beings.

This raises the question of St. Paul's angelology. Here again objection has been taken to Colossians. There is certainly little direct reference to angels in the other Pauline Epistles. But yet such references do occur, and, so far as they go, they tend to confirm the view that St. Paul might naturally have taken up the position adopted here. Further, the Rabbis of the period was full of speculations about the angels, and there is no reason why St. Paul should have abandoned such speculations upon his conversion. They must have been taken up into his Christianity, even though, in preaching to Gentiles, it was seldom necessary to dwell upon them. The principal features found in Col. are these:

(1) The universe is animated by elemental spirits (2<sup>8</sup>). This conception appears also in Gal 4<sup>3-9</sup>, and is in line with that of Ps 104<sup>4</sup>, a passage which has been taken over in He 1<sup>7</sup>, though with a change of thought characteristic of later Judaism. Both the Book of Jubilees and Enoch speak of the spirits of such things as fire, mist, hail, the sea (cf. Rev 14<sup>18-16</sup>).

(2) There are different ranks of angels (1<sup>16</sup> 2<sup>10-15</sup>; cf. Ro 8<sup>38</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>24</sup>, where substantially the same language is used). This conception perhaps starts from Dt 4<sup>19</sup>, where the nations are allotted to 'the host of heaven.' In Daniel each nation, including Israel, has its angelic 'prince.' It was a natural development that led to the conception of orders of angelic powers in heaven itself (cf. En. lxi. 10). In the later Rabbis ten orders were enumerated (cf. also the angels of the churches in Rev.).

(3) In 2<sup>14-15</sup> there is perhaps an allusion to the ministry of angels in the giving of the Law. This characteristic idea of the Rabbis was derived from Dt 33<sup>2</sup> (LXX). It is alluded to in Ac 7<sup>53</sup>, He 2<sup>2</sup>, Jos. Ant. xv. v. 3.

(4) The angels, even the angel or angels of the Law, may be morally imperfect, and need reconciliation through the Cross (1<sup>20</sup> 2<sup>15</sup>). This is typically Pauline (cf. Ro 8<sup>38</sup>, 1 Co 2<sup>8-9</sup> 6<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>10</sup> 15<sup>24</sup>, Gal 1<sup>9</sup>). It does not seem to be a very early Jewish conception, unless it appears in Gn 6<sup>1-4</sup>. Such ministers of evil as the destroying angel of Ex 12 are non-moral. But in the later writings angels are frequently charged with weakness of different kinds; cf. Ps 82<sup>1-2</sup>, Job 4<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>15</sup>. It was only at a late date that the distinction between absolutely good and absolutely bad angels arose. It was not the characteristic view of St. Paul's day, and there is no reason why we should expect to find it in his writings. There thus seems to be nothing particularly un-Pauline in the angelology of Colossians. (On this subject see esp. O. Everling, Die paulinische Angelologie und Dämonologie, 1888; A. S. Peake, Introd. to 'Col.' in EGT; M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus, 1909.)

7. Relation to Ephesians.—It is at once obvious that there is a close literary connexion between Colossians and Ephesians. The structure of the two Epistles is largely the same, though naturally the special warnings of Col. find no parallel in Eph., and a second thanksgiving and prayer in Eph 2-3<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>14-19</sup> has no parallel in Colossians. The exhortations at the end show close agreement in detail. And, most significant of all, there is a remarkable series of verbal parallels, running through verse after verse of the two Epistles. Only two alternatives are possible. Either both letters are by one writer, or one has been deliberately modelled on the other.

It has commonly been asserted that Eph. is based on Col., and in that case no presumption against Col. arises. Holtzmann, however, showed that the literary criticism did not work out so simply. Sometimes one Epistle, sometimes the other, seems to be prior. Accordingly, he regarded Eph. as based upon a shorter Col., which was subsequently expanded from Eph. in view of Gnosticism. But the tests by which he proposed to recover the original Col. do not work out well. The division of the heresy into two parts is not at all easy. And the literary criteria are altogether too minute. A similar and even more elaborate theory has been worked out by Soltan. Von Soden, however, in examining Holtzmann's view, only admitted 1<sup>15-20</sup> 2<sup>10-15</sup> 18<sup>10</sup> as later insertions, and has subsequently reduced even this amount, rejecting only the Christological passage in ch. 1. The majority of scholars now accept the whole Epistle as Pauline.

As to the relations with Eph., it seems to the present writer that sufficient stress has not been laid upon the curious interweaving of the phraseology of the two Epistles. Even Holtzmann's hypothesis does not do justice to the way in which phrase after phrase is used in connexion with different trains of thought. The author of Eph. did not copy Col. at all as the two later Synoptists copied St. Mark. He simply used its language, and to a most extraordinary extent. He is writing for a different purpose, and applies to that purpose phraseology used with quite different implications in Colossians. Thus Eph 2<sup>11-17</sup> is full of the language of Col 2<sup>11-13</sup>, and yet the points of the passages are quite different. Is it possible that such a phenomenon could have arisen at all except in the work of a single writer writing a second letter while the language of the first was still fresh in his mind?

8. Style and language.—It has been objected that these are un-Pauline, but this holds only if the four great Epistles are taken as the final norm as to what St. Paul might have written. Of the 46 words not used elsewhere by St. Paul the majority are connected either with the heresy or with its refutation. Further, 11 Pauline words occur which are used by no other NT writer. It should be noted that St. Paul was now at Rome, in the midst of new associations, which would naturally affect his vocabulary. The suggestion has been made that Timothy, who is associated with St. Paul in the salutation, may have had a large share in the actual composition of the letter.

This suggestion might also help to account for the change in style from the earlier Epistles. The movement of thought is less abrupt, and the sentences are often longer and more involved. Particles, even those of which St. Paul is most fond, such as ἀρα, διό, διότι, are replaced to a great extent by participial constructions. This, however, may well be due to the lack of urgency. The danger was not so great as it had been in Galatia or in Corinth.

In the second chapter the difficulty of translating is very great, and it is possible that in some cases the text has suffered from corruption lying further back than all our existing MSS; 2<sup>18</sup> and 2<sup>23</sup> are the most notable examples (in 2<sup>18</sup> C. Taylor's ἀέρα κερεμ-βατεύων has been favoured by Westcott and Hort and Zahn, and is commonly accepted). The translation of 2<sup>18</sup> presents almost as many difficulties.

LITERATURE.—EDITIONS.—Col. has been edited by H. J. Holtzmann (1872), A. Klopfer (1882), H. von Soden (1891), and Haupt (in Meyer's Com., 1899). J. B. Lightfoot's Colossians (1st ed., 1875) is the standard Eng. work. Of recent Eng. commentaries the most valuable are those by A. S. Peake (EGT, 1903), T. K. Abbott (ICC, 1897), and G. G. Findlay (Pulpit Commentary, 1886). GENERAL.—F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 1894; W. Sanday, art. in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, 1893; T. Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, 1897 (Eng. tr., Introd. to NT, 1909); H. von Soden, art. in JPTTh, 1885-87; J. Moffatt, LNT, 1912. L. W. GRENSED.

COLOURS.—Among the writers of the NT the sense of colour is strongest in the author of the Revelation, who partly reproduces the colour-symbolism of earlier authors, priestly, prophetic, and apocalyptic, and partly is original. Colour distinctions were perhaps not so fine in ancient as in modern times; at any rate the colour vocabulary was more limited. The associations of colour vary greatly in different ages and peoples.

1. White (λευκός, connected with lux; λαμπρός, 'bright' in RV, fr. λαμπω 'to shine'), the colour of light, is the symbol of purity, innocence, holiness; it is the primary liturgical colour. The head and hair of the Son of Man are white as wool or snow (Rev 1<sup>14</sup>). Angels are arrayed in white (15<sup>6</sup>; cf. Ac 1<sup>10</sup>). The elders (Rev 4<sup>4</sup>), the martyrs (6<sup>11</sup>), the great multitude (7<sup>9</sup>) are clothed in white raiment: but their robes were not always white; they have washed them and made them white (ἐλευκαναν) in the blood of the Lamb (7<sup>14</sup>). Such raiment one of the Seven Churches is counselled to buy (3<sup>18</sup>). A hypocrite has not the white robe; he is only like a whitewashed wall (τοιχὴ κεκοιμημένη, Ac 23<sup>3</sup>; cf. Mt 23<sup>27</sup>). White is the colour of victory; the first rider on a white horse (Rev 6<sup>2</sup>) represents a conquering secular power, probably Parthia; the second is the Faithful and True (19<sup>11</sup>), whose triumphant followers are clad in white uniform (19<sup>14</sup>). The Son of Man is seen enthroned on a white cloud (14<sup>14</sup>); and the great throne of God—unlike the sapphire throne in Ezk 1<sup>26</sup>—is white.

2. Red, the first of the three primary colours of science, is in Greek πυρρος, from πυρ, 'fire.' 'Light and fire, when regarded ethically in Holy Scripture, are contrasts: light, the image of beneficent love; and fire, of destroying anger' (Delitzsch, Iris, Eng. tr., 1889, p. 73). The swordsman upon the red horse (Rev 6<sup>5</sup>) represents war and bloodshed; the great red dragon (12<sup>3</sup>) the same, probably with the added idea of fire.

3. Black (μελας) indicates the absence of light: a white object is one which reflects nearly all the light of all colours; a black object absorbs nearly all. Ethically considered, the withdrawal of light is weird and appalling. The revelation at Sinai was made in 'blackness (γρόφος, gloom) and mist and tempest' (He 12<sup>18</sup>). Black is the colour of famine; the third of the four riders in the Apocalypse, who brings dearth, goes forth on a black horse (Rev 6<sup>5</sup>). A great earthquake makes the sun black as sackcloth of hair (6<sup>12</sup>; cf. Jl 2<sup>30, 31</sup>; Ass. Mos. x. 4f.; Virg. Georg. i. 463f.). For men whose lives belie their profession there is reserved the blackness of darkness (ὁ ὄψος τοῦ σκότους, 2 P 2<sup>17</sup> || Jude<sup>13</sup>; cf. Homer, Il. xxi. 56).

4. Purple (πορφύρα, purpura) now denotes a shade varying between crimson and violet, but to the ancients it was a red-purple dye, which might even be mistaken for scarlet (cf. Jn 19<sup>2</sup> with Mt 27<sup>3</sup>). It was obtained from a shellfish (purpura, murex) found near Tyre and on the shores of Tarentum and Laconia. The throat of each mollusc yielded one drop of the precious fluid. The manufacture and sale of the dye was the monopoly of the Phœnicians. Pliny says of Tyre that, while she once 'thirsted so eagerly for the conquest of the whole earth . . . all her fame is now confined to the production of the murex and the purple' (HN v. 17). Cloth of purple was the emblem of royalty and nobility—purpura regum (Virg. Georg. ii. 495). The soldiers arrayed Christ with it in derision (Mt 15<sup>17, 20</sup>). It was among the costly merchandise of Imperial Rome (Rev 18<sup>12</sup>). The Maccabees noted that the sober-minded Romans of the Republic did not wear it (1 Mac 8<sup>14</sup>), but Pliny remarks on 'the frantic passion for purple' in his time (HN ix. 60). The prophet of the Revelation knows that the great city is arrayed in it (Rev 18<sup>16</sup>). The apocalyptic harlot clothes herself with it (17<sup>4</sup>). The finest kind of purple was 'the Tyrian dibapha (double-dyed), which could not be bought for even 1000 denarii per pound' (Pliny, ix. 63). Lydia (Ac 16<sup>14, 15, 40</sup>) was a seller of purple (πορφυρόπωλις), but it is now generally believed that the Thyatiran dye, which she was engaged in selling, was the modern turkey red, which is extracted from the madder root (rubia).

5. Scarlet (κόκκινος) was obtained from the female of the kermes insect (Arab. kirmiz, whence the synonymous 'crimson'), which, when impregnated, attaches itself to the holm-oak, and was long supposed to be a red berry or seed—a mistake found in Pliny (HN xvi. 8). The insect (Coccus ilicis) is of the same family as the cochineal of Mexico, which yields a finer dye that has superseded the ancient scarlet. Wool dyed scarlet was used in the Jewish ritual of sacrifice (He 9<sup>19</sup>). Scarlet fabrics were among the merchandise of Rome (Rev 18<sup>1</sup>)—'rubro cocco tincta vestis' (Hor. Sat. ii. vi. 102f.). The glaring colour was the symbol of luxury and splendour. The great city was attired in it (Rev 18<sup>16</sup>). The woman arrayed in purple and scarlet, and sitting on a scarlet-coloured beast, is an image of flaunting licentiousness (17<sup>3-5</sup>).

6. Pale is one of the translations of χλωρός, an indefinite hue, applied as an epithet to objects so different as fresh green grass (Mk 6<sup>39</sup>) and yellow sand (Soph. Aj. 1064). Both meanings were common from Homer downwards. The pale horse in Rev 6<sup>8</sup> has the livid hue of death.

7. Hyacinthine (υακινθίνος) is one of the three colours of the breastplates of the fiendish horsemen in Rev 9<sup>17</sup>. υακινθος is the LXX tr. of הַצִּיָּתִי, a dye obtained from another shellfish on the Tyrian coast. It was blue-purple as distinguished from red-purple; the Oxf. Heb. Lex. gives 'violet.' The cuirasses were also red like fire (πυρίνους) and yellow as brimstone (θειάδεις).

The brilliant hues of the foundations, walls, gates, and streets of the New Jerusalem, and those of the robes of the inhabitants, suggest that 'the beauty of colour . . . will contribute its part to the blessedness of vision in the future world' (Delitzsch, Iris, 61).

JAMES STRAHAN.

COMFORT.—The word παράκλησις is generally translated in RV 'comfort'; 'exhortation' is used in Ac 13<sup>15</sup>, Ro 12<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 8<sup>17</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>, He 12<sup>5</sup> 13<sup>22</sup>; 'encouragement,' He 6<sup>18</sup>; 'consolation' or 'exhortation,' Ac 4<sup>36</sup> 15<sup>31</sup>. These translations indicate that the NT use of παράκλησις is more nearly equivalent to the root meaning of 'comfort' (L. Lat. confortare, 'to strengthen') than to the narrowed present sense of 'consolation.' (The use of παράκλησις as 'request' occurs in 2 Co 8<sup>17</sup>; παραμύθια is rendered 'consolation' in 1 Co 14<sup>3</sup>; παραμύθιον, translated 'consolation,' rather indicates persuasive address in Ph 2<sup>1</sup>; the verb is used in 1 Th 2<sup>11</sup>. παρηγορία = 'comfort' in Col 4<sup>11</sup>.)

It is one of the great functions of religion to transform the human pain, sorrow, and discouragement of life. The man of faith cannot escape the inevitable sorrows of the common human lot, but he can modify their values by his religious faith and hope. When faith does not remove mountains, it can give strength to climb them. The 'thorn in the flesh' may remain, but the Divine grace proves 'sufficient' (2 Co 12<sup>8-9</sup>). God is recognized as the real source of all comfort (2 Co 1<sup>3</sup>; cf. Ro 15<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 7<sup>6</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>16</sup>). He operates through the 'comfort of the Scriptures' (Ro 15<sup>4</sup>, He 12<sup>5</sup>; cf. the name 'consolation' [nehemeta] given by the Jews to the Prophetic literature), through the faithfulness, love, and prosperity of the churches (2 Co 7<sup>6-7</sup> etc.), and the sustaining comradeship of friends (Col 4<sup>11</sup>, Philem<sup>7</sup>). Ac 9<sup>31</sup> supplies the phrase 'the comfort of the Holy Ghost,' although the translation is uncertain (see R. J. Knowling, EGT, 'Acts,' 1900, p. 244); but the idea is present in Jn 14-17, the section which commences with the note of comfort given in view not only of the coming bereavement, but of the difficulties of Christian life and work.

The term 'comforter' in these chapters appears to be an inaccurate and inadequate translation of παράκλητος. παρακαλέω has a double sense: (1) 'call in as a helper,' (2) 'comfort.' The passive form requires the former meaning—the Paraclete is the one called in to help, advise, defend. 'Comforter' would be παράκλητωρ as in Job 16<sup>2</sup> (see HDB, art. 'Paraclete'). But the fact of having a Paraclete is itself a comfort and encouragement. The recognition and experience of the Divine in human souls inspires and sustains. The description of the Paraclete in these chapters of St. John's Gospel, as possessing mainly an intellectual function, makes the narrow identification with the ecstatic Pentecostal spirit of Acts improbable. The term rather indicates the growing inward Logos, developed by the demands put upon the disciples after the death of Jesus ('If I go not away the Paraclete will not come unto you,' Jn 16<sup>7</sup>; cf. the thought in Emerson's essay on 'Compensation'—'The angels go out that the archangels may come in').

(a) One of the most obvious needs of the Church in NT times was that of comfort under circumstances of persecution for Christ's sake (1 Th 3<sup>3</sup> etc.). The grounds of such comfort might be found in the thought that Jesus, the Captain and Perfecter of their faith, had similarly suffered (He 12<sup>3</sup>,

1 Th 2<sup>15</sup>), and that they who shared His sufferings would share His glory (2 Co 4<sup>10</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>); in the recognition that in their case it was nobility of spirit which provoked the world's persecution (1 P 4<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>12</sup>, Ac 5<sup>40</sup>; cf. Jn 15<sup>19</sup>); that afflictions were the signs of God's sonship (He 12<sup>5-9</sup>); and that the worthy bearing of them resulted in ripened character (v.<sup>11</sup>), demonstrated the strength of God in human weakness (2 Co 12<sup>10</sup>), qualified one to minister to others (2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>), and worked an eternal weight of glory in comparison with which the passing affliction was light (2 Co 4<sup>17</sup>; cf. Rev 7<sup>13-17</sup> etc.). The 'promise' which sustained the ancient heroes of faith amid much affliction was still an inspiration (He 11). (b) The Christian worker might be discouraged by his own limitations and the disappointing results of his labour; his comfort must be that, despite diversity of ministration, 'all service ranks the same with God' (1 Co 12), and that his service in the Lord would not be in vain (Gal 6<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 15<sup>58</sup>; cf. Rev 14<sup>13</sup>). (c) The common burden of life was lightened for the Christian believer in the consciousness of the Divine love. Apart from what Jesus had actually done to comfort and encourage mankind, His very Coming was a symbol of the eternal goodness, love, and care of God. Would not the Father, who had not spared His own Son, with Him freely give His children all things? (Ro 8<sup>32</sup>). Again, the present 'age' with its pain and sorrow was not destined to continue for ever. The whole creation was moving towards a Divine event; to those in sympathy with goodness, all things were working together for good (Ro 8). The world was God's ('there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things' [1 Co 8<sup>6</sup>]), who finally would again be all in all (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>). (d) Bereavement and the fear of death were relieved by the strong Christian faith in the Resurrection (1 Co 15, etc.). The First Thessalonian Epistle sought to give comfort to those whose friends had 'fallen asleep' by the fact and manner of the Parousia (1 Th 4<sup>13-18</sup>). A deeper element of faith was realized in the consciousness that behind the world, visible and temporal, was a world, unseen and eternal, and if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God eternal in the heavens (2 Co 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>1</sup>). Whether the Christians lived or died, they belonged to the Lord (Ro 14<sup>8</sup>). Uncertain as to what the future state would be (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>), they could nevertheless be sure of the Divine Fatherhood and care. 'Neither life nor death, things present nor things to come,' could separate the children of God from His love (Ro 8<sup>38</sup>; cf. the closing verses of Whittier's The Eternal Goodness). The fourth voice from heaven (Rev 14<sup>13</sup>) proclaims the blessedness of those who die in the Lord.

The duty of mutual comfort is enjoined in 1 Th 4<sup>18</sup> ('Wherefore comfort one another with these words'; cf. 5<sup>11</sup>). Among a list of Christian duties in 5<sup>14</sup> is that of 'comforting the faint-hearted' (παραμυθίσαι τοὺς ὀλιγοψύχους). παράκλησις is described as part of a Christian minister's equipment (1 Ti 4<sup>13</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 3-), and that the term is not confined to mere exhortation is suggested by 2 Co 1<sup>4</sup>. The detailed results of 'prophesying' are given in 1 Co 14<sup>3</sup> as 'edification and comfort and consolation' (RV). The penitent offender in the Corinthian Church must not only be forgiven, but comforted, lest by any means such a one should be swallowed up by his overmuch sorrow (2 Co 2<sup>7</sup>; cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>1-2</sup>).

LITERATURE.—Artt. 'Comfort' in HDB; 'Comfort,' 'Consolation,' and 'Care' in DCG; the relevant Commentaries, esp. J. B. Lightfoot, Philippians 4, 1878, p. 107, and G. Milligan, Thessalonians, 1908, p. 17; A. Nairne, The Epistle of Priesthood, 1913, p. 432; H. B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the NT, 1909, pp. 96f., 228f., 372f.; H. Black, Christ's Service of Love, 1907, p. 52; S. A. Tipple, Days of Old, 1911, p. 107; W. P. DuBoise, The Reason of Life, 1911, p. 183.

H. BULCOCK.

COMING.—See PAROUSIA.

COMMANDMENT.—In so far as primitive Christianity, in contrast to the OT, appeals to the conscience as the supreme tribunal of moral judgment (1 Co 8<sup>7ff</sup>, Ro 14<sup>5</sup> 14-23; cf. 2<sup>15</sup>), and calls upon Christians themselves to determine what is the will of God (Ro 12<sup>2</sup>, Eph 5<sup>10</sup> 17 1 Jn 2<sup>20</sup>; cf. Jer 31<sup>34</sup>), it may be said to proclaim the ethical autonomy of the individual Christian. This, of course, involves the assumption that the Christian apprehends the character of God as revealed in Jesus Christ; and accordingly the ethical maxim of primitive Christianity is that the believer should have the mind of Christ (Ph 2<sup>5ff</sup>) and should follow Him (1 Co 11<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>1ff</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>3</sup> etc.).

But, on the other hand, the apostles, including St. Paul, make reference to a tradition of authoritative Divine commandments, and indeed they themselves lay down a number of precepts designed to serve as guides for the moral judgment of Christians (ἐντολαί, δόγματα, παραγγέλαι, παραδόσεις, etc.). We note the following categories.

1. Commandments of the Mosaic Law.—We have in the first place those commandments of the Mosaic Law, or of the OT, which are regarded as of Divine authority not only by the Jewish-Christian apostles, but also by St. Paul; cf. Ja 2<sup>8-11</sup>, Ro 7<sup>8-13</sup> 13<sup>9</sup>, Gal 5<sup>14</sup>, Eph 6<sup>2</sup>. Of the laws of Moses, the Decalogue, as we might expect, is assigned a position of peculiar importance; it forms the fundamental law of the Old Dispensation (2 Co 3<sup>3</sup>: 'tables of stone'), and is therefore always cited when the leading commandments are under consideration (Ro 13<sup>9</sup>, Ja 2<sup>11</sup>). It is worthy of remark, however, that here both St. Paul and St. James take into account only the commandments of the second table, asserting that the whole Law is summed up in the command to love one's neighbour (Gal 5<sup>14</sup>, Ro 13<sup>8ff</sup>), 'the royal law' (Ja 2<sup>8</sup>), though it is true that in Eph 6<sup>2</sup> St. Paul quotes a commandment from the first table ('Honour thy father,' etc.).* The sequence of the laws quoted in Ro 13<sup>9</sup> and Ja 2<sup>11</sup> agrees with that of the LXX version of Ex 20<sup>13</sup> in putting adultery before murder. So far as the Decalogue shares the statutory character of the Law as a whole, it also, according to St. Paul, is involved in the abrogation of 'the law of commandments' (Eph 2<sup>15</sup>), as is evident from what is said regarding the law of the Sabbath, the obligatory character of which, according to Ro 14<sup>5</sup>, Gal 4<sup>9ff</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>, is in principle surrendered. Hence Luther's interpretation of this commandment is the right one; though, in view of 1 Co 7<sup>17</sup>, St. Paul probably maintained that it should remain binding upon Jewish Christians (see art. LAW).

Further, St. Paul (as also the other apostles) cites not only the Decalogue, but the rest of the Torah as well, in support of his own ethical precepts (1 Co 9<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>34</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>; cf. Ja 2<sup>11</sup>; in all these passages, however, the reference is to commandments which justify themselves to the Christian consciousness). He avails himself of the principle laid down in 1 Co 10<sup>11</sup>, Ro 15<sup>4</sup>, Col 2<sup>17</sup>, i.e. he applies the OT commandments to the Messianic era in an allegorical or typological sense; thus 1 Co 9<sup>9</sup> (maintenance of Christian teachers) = Dt 25<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>13</sup> = Nu 18<sup>3</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7ff</sup> = Ex 12<sup>3ff</sup> (the putting away of leaven). He likewise reinforces his own admonitions by sayings from the Psalms and the Prophets, as, e.g., 2 Co 9<sup>9</sup> = Ps 112<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>31</sup> = Jer 9<sup>23</sup>, Ro 12<sup>19</sup> = Dt 32<sup>35</sup>. cf. Ja 4<sup>6</sup> = Pr 3<sup>34</sup>, He 3<sup>7-11</sup> = Ps 95<sup>7-11</sup>. Finally, St. Paul and the rest frequently give their precepts in the form of OT exhortations; cf., e.g., Ro 12<sup>30</sup> = Pr 25<sup>1ff</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>17</sup> = Pr 24<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>10ff</sup> = Ps 34<sup>13ff</sup>, He 12<sup>5ff</sup> = Pr 3<sup>11ff</sup>.

2. Commandments of God and Jesus.—(1) The commandments of God frequently referred to in the Epistles of John and in Rev. (1 Jn 3<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>, 2 Jn<sup>6</sup>, Rev 12<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>12</sup>; cf. the Pauline usage, 1 Co 7<sup>19</sup>) should doubtless be regarded as the OT commandments in the NT acceptance (i.e. as applied by Jesus); cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>7ff</sup>, where the commandment to love one's brother is spoken of as at once old and new, and 1 Jn 4<sup>21</sup>, where brotherly love in Christ's sense is combined with love to God (cf. Mt 22<sup>37ff</sup>. and parallels).

(2) Apart from this the apostolic Epistles refer but seldom to the commandments of Jesus. In James, 1 Peter, Hebrews, and Revelation we meet with no utterance of the earthly Jesus, while 1 and 2 John allude to His commandments only in general terms (1 Jn 2<sup>3ff</sup> 3<sup>23</sup> [brotherly love]; cf. 2 Jn<sup>9</sup>). Nor will it surprise us to find that the Pauline Epistles likewise contain but few references to the commandments of the Lord. Apart from Ac 20<sup>35</sup> (which, it is true, implies a more extensive use of the Lord's words in the oral teaching of St. Paul; cf. the pl. λόγων), we find such references only in 1 Co 7<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>14</sup> (11<sup>23-25</sup>), Gal 6<sup>2</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>. The first of these passages refers to the prohibition of divorce; the second to the apostles' right to live by preaching the gospel (cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>18</sup>). Gal 6<sup>2</sup> to 'the law of Christ,' i.e. mutual service; and 1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup> to the words of Jesus in general (cf. 4<sup>6</sup>). But the explicit distinction which St. Paul draws between what the Lord did and did not command shows that he had an accurate knowledge of the Lord's words—just as he also distinguishes between his own precepts and the Lord's commandments. To trace this distinction to the difference between a greater and a less degree of certainty in the inward revelation (Baur) is the sheerest caprice; cf. the historic tense in 1 Co 9<sup>14</sup>. That St. Paul in general based his moral teachings on the authority of Jesus Himself appears from 1 Th 4<sup>2</sup>, where he reminds his readers of the charges he delivered to them 'through the Lord Jesus'; cf. 1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>, where, as the context shows, his 'ways which are in Christ' are the ethical precepts for which Christ was his authority. In using here the somewhat vague expression 'in Christ,' he simply indicates that his precepts are not mere repetitions of the words of Jesus, but that they are 'Christian' in the wider sense—like, let us say, the 'Teachings of the Lord through the Twelve Apostles' in the Didache. The commandments of Jesus are frequently cited also by the Apostolic Fathers; cf. 1 Clem. xiii. 3; 2 Clem. iii. 4, iv. 5 ff., xvii. 3. 6; Ign. Eph. ix. 2; cf. Magn. xiii. 1 (δόγματα του Κυρίου και των αποστόλων); Did. xi. 3 (δόγμα του εὐαγγελίου).

3. Commandments of the apostles.—From the commandments of Jesus appealed to by the apostles it is an easy transition to those of the apostles themselves (cf. 2 P 3<sup>3</sup>); it should be noted, however, that the term ἐντολαί is restricted to the commandments of God and Jesus, while the apostolic 'commandments' are denoted by other terms: δόγματα (Ac 16<sup>4</sup>), παραγγέλαι (1 Th 4<sup>2</sup>; cf. 2 Th 3<sup>10</sup>), παραδόσεις (1 Co 11<sup>2</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>6</sup>), and the like. But although St. Paul, in 1 Co 7, distinguishes between his own 'judgment' (v. 25 γνῶμη) and the commandment of the Lord, he nevertheless demands obedience to the former, inasmuch as he is possessed of the Spirit of God (1 Co 7<sup>40</sup>; cf. Ac 15<sup>28</sup>), and, accordingly, he can even assert that what he writes is 'the commandment of the Lord' (1 Co 14<sup>37</sup>). It is true that he sometimes appeals, as in 1 Co 10<sup>15</sup>, to the personal judgment of his readers, but it is clear, from 11<sup>16</sup> and 14<sup>37ff</sup>, that he attached no decisive importance to such judgment. In any case,

* Just as, e.g., in Mt 19<sup>19</sup> and its this commandment is appended to those of the second table (nos. 6, 7, and 8). It is impossible to decide whether the Jewish, the Eastern and Reformed, or the Roman Catholic and Lutheran arrangement of the commandments is followed here.

all opposition must give way before the consensus of apostolic usage (11<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>30</sup>), and St. Paul always assumes that such a consensus really exists; cf. Ro 6<sup>17</sup> τυπος διδασχης ('fixed form of moral teaching'), 16<sup>17</sup> (where 'the teaching' = moral teaching).

This common ethical tradition would include, above all, the so-called Apostolic Decree (Ac 15<sup>28</sup> 16<sup>4</sup>). It must certainly have comprised the injunctions regarding things sacrificed to idols, and fornication, an echo of which is still heard in Rev 2<sup>20</sup> 24 (cf. v. 24 the phrase 'cast upon you none other burden' with Ac 15<sup>28</sup>), and which the Apostle, not only according to Ac 16<sup>4</sup>, but also in 1 Co 6<sup>12-20</sup> and 10<sup>14-33</sup>, expressly urges upon Gentile Christians. Cf. further artt. LAW and MOSES.

We must also take account of the lists of vices and virtues given in various forms by the apostles: Gal 5<sup>19-21</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>20</sup>, Ro 1-9-31 13<sup>13</sup>, Col 3<sup>8-9</sup>, Eph 4<sup>31</sup> 5<sup>21</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>2-5</sup>, Rev 21<sup>8</sup> 22<sup>15</sup> (vices); Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Col 3<sup>12-15</sup>, Eph 4<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>22-5</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5-8</sup> (virtues). Similar lists are found in Did. ii. 1-v. 2, Barn. 18-20, Polycarp, ii. 2-iv. 3. Though such tables were in their origin dependent upon Jewish and Greek models (e.g. Wis 12<sup>3ff.</sup> 14-17; cf. Mt 15<sup>19</sup>; Diog. Laert. vii. 110-114)—as St. Paul indeed indirectly recognizes in Ro 1<sup>32</sup>, Ph 4<sup>8</sup> (cf. the Stoic phrase τα μη καθηκοντα, Ro 1<sup>28</sup>)—they nevertheless reveal, especially as regards the virtues, their distinctively Christian character.

Along with the lists of vices and virtues should be mentioned also the so-called 'house-tables,' i.e. the groups of precepts for the various domestic relationships—husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and slaves (e.g. Eph 5<sup>22-6</sup>, Col 3<sup>18-4</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>18-37</sup>). These, as will be seen, make their first appearance in the later Epistles, but they may well have attained an oral form at an earlier date. Finally, the Pastoral Epistles, in addition to the family precepts, give several series of directions for the various orders of Christians—bishops, deacons, widows, etc., thus furnishing in fact a kind of Church organization, the social duties of the various relationships being made more or less subordinate to the ecclesiastical point of view (cf. 1 Ti 2<sup>1-6</sup>, Tit 1<sup>5-3</sup>).

The reduction of Christian morality to concrete details was a matter of historic necessity. Just as the spirit of Christianity was not, even at the outset, possessed by all believers in the same degree, but was found pre-eminently in the apostles and prophets, so it was not present so fully in the later period as in the earlier. Hence, when the apostles were nearing their end, they felt it necessary, for the sake of the succeeding generation, to commit to writing the more detailed ethical teaching which no doubt they had to some extent already brought into an oral form. Cf. further art. LAW.

LITERATURE.—The NT Theologies of B. Weiss, P. Feine, and H. Weinel; G. B. Stevens, The Pauline Theology, 1892; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, Eng. tr., i. 2 [1897] 154; A. Seeberg, Der Katechismus der Urchristenheit, 1903, p. 1 ff.; O. Moe, Paulus und die evangelische Geschichte, 1912, p. 56 ff.; A. B. Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, p. 293 ff.; E. v. Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904, p. 399 ff. OLAF MOE.

COMMENDATION (from Lat. com- and mando, 'commit to').—'Commend' is used in AV and RV as a translation of (a) παραισθημι, in the sense of entrusting (cf. 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit,' Lk 23<sup>46</sup>) in Ac 14<sup>23</sup> and 20<sup>4</sup>, in reference to the solemn committing of the heads of the churches to God. The same verb is translated 'commit' (to God) in 1 P 4<sup>19</sup> ('Let them that suffer . . . commit their souls . . . to a faithful creator'); cf. Lk 12<sup>48</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>18</sup> 6-8, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup> 14 21.

(b) παριστημι is translated 'commend' in 1 Co 8<sup>8</sup> ('Meat commendeth us not to God') in the sense of presenting to God; 'non exhibebit nos

Deo' (Meyer); 'will not bring us into God's presence' (Weymouth).

(c) 'Commend' is used to translate συνίστημι (1) in Ro 3<sup>5</sup>, in the sense of demonstration, setting in clearer light ('but if our unrighteousness commendeth the righteousness of God, what shall we say?'); (2) in Ro 5<sup>8</sup>, in the sense of making proof of ('God commendeth his own love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us'); (3) in the sense of introduction in Ro 16<sup>1</sup> ('I commend unto you Phœbe our sister'). συνίστημι is the technical word for this kind of recommendation, which was equivalent to a certificate of church membership' (Denney, EGT, 'Romans,' 1900, p. 717). Greek teachers used to give ἐπιστολαὶ συστατικαὶ (Diog. Laert. viii. 87). The Ephesian Christians wrote such a letter for Apollos to the Church at Corinth (Ac 18<sup>27</sup>). St. Paul in 2 Co 8<sup>16-24</sup> gives an introduction for Titus and his companions to the Corinthian Church. In 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup> St. Paul finely points out that no such introduction is necessary in his own case, either for or from his readers. They themselves are a letter of commendation in a double sense—they are ever written in his heart; no need for others to commend them to his interest and care; again, as his converts, they are his letter of credential to themselves and to all the world. (4) The verb, reflexively used to convey the idea of self-praise, occurs in 2 Co 3<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>12</sup> 18 (where the pronoun coming before the verb occupies the prominent position); (5) but in 4<sup>2</sup> 6<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> (where the pronoun follows the verb) the reference is to legitimate demonstration of one's faith and work; e.g. zeal for purity is such a commendation (7<sup>11</sup>). An apostle's true credentials are unwearied labour, self-sacrifice, character, and loftiness of spirit (6<sup>4</sup>).

H. BULCOCK.

COMMERCE.—See TRADE.

COMMON.—See CLEAN.

COMMUNION.—The Greek word κοινωνία has a wider scope (see FELLOWSHIP) than the English word 'communion,' which the EV uses particularly in regard to the Lord's Supper (1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>). St. Paul's expression is somewhat ambiguous. In what way may the cup and the bread be said to be a communion? They may either be a symbol for communion or may constitute a communion by sacramental influence. What does the blood of Christ mean? Is it the blood which was shed at His death, or does it signify the death itself or its effects? Or does St. Paul perhaps think of the blood as some transfigured heavenly substance? And what does the body of Christ mean? Is it the material body, which Jesus wore on earth, and which hung on the cross, or the immaterial body of the heavenly Lord? Or, again, is it the spiritual body, whose head is Christ, i.e. the Church? And lastly, what does communion of the blood and of the body mean? Is it communion with, i.e. partaking of, the blood and the body, or is it a communion whose symbol and medium are the blood and the body? In former times all attempts at interpretation distinguished sharply between those various meanings; nowadays there is a tendency towards accepting the different views as being present at the same time in the author's mind and in the mind of his first readers, not as entirely separate ideas, but all together in fluctuating transition. Grammar and vocabulary are not decisive in such a case. We have to start from the general view of communion which early Christianity held. In this the particular meaning of communion in regard to the Lord's Supper will be included.

There can be no doubt but that early Christianity had a double conception of fellowship: all menbers of the Church were in close fellowship one with the other, and at the same time each and all of them were in fellowship with the heavenly Lord. The former conception was the more prominent; but the latter no doubt was the basis of faith. Now in the Lord's Supper we find both these ideas present. St. Paul complains of the divisions at Corinth (1 Co 11<sup>18</sup>): the members of the Church do not share their meal in a brotherly way, nor do they wait for one another (i.e. probably for the slaves who could not be present early). Here we have the purely social and moral idea. But St. Paul, in speaking of 'the Lord's Supper' (11<sup>20</sup>), indicates another point of view, which may be called the religious and sacramental conception: the Lord's Supper is not only a supper held at the Lord's command, or a supper held in honour of the Lord (cf. 11<sup>23, 26</sup>), but it is also a supper in communion with the Lord, where the Lord is present, participating as the Host. In this way the Lord's Supper is not only the expression of an existing communion with Him, but it realizes this communion every time it is held. Now the question is: Is it the common supper which constitutes the communion, or are we to think of the particular elements, bread and wine, as producing the communion? We shall try to find an answer by noting some analogies from the comparative history of religions.

W. Robertson Smith started the theory that the origin of all sacrifice lies in the idea of a sacramental communion between the members of a tribe and the tribal deity, which is realized by the common eating of the flesh of the sacrifice and the drinking of its blood. The theory as a complete explanation is inadequate, but we may admit sacramental communion in this sense as one of the different views underlying the practice of sacrifice. In ancient Israel the so-called peace-offering may be taken as illustrating this view. In later Judaism, however, this rite held but a small place, and Rabbinical transcendentalism would not allow any thought of sacramental communion with God the Most High. To adduce analogies taken from primitive culture is of no value. According to Dieterich, primitive man had the idea that, by partaking of the flesh of any sacrificial animal offered to a god, he was partaking of the god himself, and thus entering into sacramental communion with him. This theory has not been proved, and in any case it is beside the point here. We find better analogies in the Hellenism of the Apostolic Age, where we may distinguish two sets of parallels. (a) In the Mysteries certain sacred foods and drinks were used to bring man into communion with the god; (b) on the other hand, many clubs held an annual or monthly supper, which generally took place in a temple, and was at any rate accompanied by religious ceremonies which were to constitute a communion between the members and the god or hero (very often the founder of the club) in whose honour the supper was given. So we have two conceptions of communion: one mystical, individual, magical; the other moral, social, spiritual. In the former, particular food is supposed to bring the partaker into communion with the god physically (or rather hyper-physically), to transfer the essence and virtues of the god into the man and so to make him god (deify him); in the latter, it is the community of the meal which unites all partakers to one another and to the hero in the same sense as marriage or friendship unites distinct personalities.

The evidence of these parallels brings the early Christian conception of the Lord's Supper into close affinity with the communion of the club suppers, which had their analogy in suppers held in the Jewish synagogues of the Hellenistic Dis-person. The Mysteries did not influence Christian thought before the 2nd century. St. Paul, it is true, starts the idea of an unio mystica between the individual Christian and Christ (Gal 2<sup>9</sup>); this idea is prevalent in his doctrine of baptism (Ro 6<sup>4</sup>, Col 2<sup>12</sup>); but his predominant line of thought is the other view, which regards the two personalities as apart from each other, and may be described as the idea of 'fellowship.' The same may be said about St. John's view, in spite of all mystical appearances.

Now, when we turn to 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> again, we see clearly that it is not the bread and the wine that constitute sacramental communion by themselves; nor is communion the partaking of Christ's material body and blood. Bread and wine in relation to body and blood were given by tradition, but, as far as performing a sacramental communion is concerned, they represent only the common meal, which brings men into communion with the Lord, who through His death entered upon a heavenly existence. From this conception of the transfigured body it is easy to pass to the other one of a spiritual body whose members are the partakers (v. 17).

This interpretation is further supported by the comparison, made by St. Paul himself, of Jewish and Gentile sacrifices. When he says that the Jews by eating the sacrifices have communion with the altar, he means spiritual communion with God whose representative is the altar (note that the phrase 'communion with God' is avoided—a true mark of Rabbinism); and when he says that to partake of a supper connected with a heathen sacrifice brings men into communion with demons, he does not accept the popular idea that the food itself was quasi-infected by demonic influence (he declares formally that to eat such flesh unconsciously does not harm a Christian); but he says: 'ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils: ye cannot partake of the table of the Lord and of the table of devils,' because partaking of the table constitutes a spiritual and moral communion which is exclusive in its effect. See EUCHARIST.

LITERATURE.—W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, new ed., 1903, RS<sup>2</sup>, 1894; A. Dieterich, Eine Mithrasliturgie, 1903; E. Reuterskiöld, Die Entstehung der Speisesacramente (Religionswissenschaftliche Bibliothek, 1912); L. R. Farnell, 'Religious and Social Aspects of the Cult of Ancestors and Heroes,' in HJ vii, [1909] 415-435. For memorial suppers, see inscriptions collected by H. Lietzmann, Handbuch zum NT, iii, [1907] 160 ff.; E. Lucius, Die Anfänge des Heiligtums, 1904. For Jewish suppers in synagogues, see E. Schürer, GVF iii, [1909] 143; O. Schmitz, Die Opferanschauung des späteren Judentums, 1910; W. Heitmüller, Taufe und Abendmahl bei Paulus, 1903; E. v. Dobschütz, 'Sacrament und Symbol im Urchristentum,' in SK, 1906, pp. 1-40; F. Dibelius, Das Abendmahl, 1911. Cf. the Commentaries on 1 Cor. by L. I. Ruckert (1836), C. F. G. Heinrich (1880), T. C. Edwards (21885), P. W. Schmiedel (1891), H. Lietzmann (1907), P. Bachmann (1905, 21910), J. Weiss (in Meyer<sup>9</sup>, 1910).

E. VON DOBSCHÜTZ.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS.—There are two passages in the Acts of the Apostles which seem to suggest that there was established in the Church in Jerusalem a system of community of goods. 'And all that believed were together and had all things common; and they sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all, according as any man had need' (Ac 2<sup>44</sup>). 'And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and soul: and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things common. . . . For neither was there among them any that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto each, according as any one had need' (4<sup>32, 34, 35</sup>). The Didache (iv. 8) contains a phrase which must be put beside this: 'Thou shalt not turn away from him that is in need, but shalt share all things with thy brother, and shalt not say that they are thine own; for if ye are sharers in that which is immortal, how much more in those things which are mortal.' The so-called Epistle of Barnabas contains almost exactly the same phrase (xix. 8), and it is most probable that in these works it came from some common source. We confine ourselves in this art. to the 1st cent., but a statement of Justin Martyr must be cited. He says in the First Apology that the Christians brought what they possessed into a common stock, and shared with every one in need (xiv.).

At first sight it would seem as if the passages in Acts indicated the existence in the Christian community of a definite system of communism, and there are some things in the Gospels which might seem to point in the same direction. The blessedness of poverty, the subtle dangers of riches, are taught in many passages. The rich young man is told to sell all that he has and give to the poor, and our Lord observes upon the incident that it is hard for them that have riches to enter into the Kingdom of God (Mk 10<sup>17-23</sup> ||). In Lk 6<sup>0-24</sup> our Lord is reported as saying, 'Blessed are ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God. . . . But woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation.' It is possible that we must allow for the influence of different tendencies in the Gospel narratives; for instance, in St. Matthew's Gospel, this benediction upon the poor is given a strictly spiritual turn (Mt 5<sup>3</sup>). Again the Epistle of St. James seems to indicate that the Christian communities are composed of poor people, while the rich are their enemies. 'Hearken, my beloved brethren; did not God choosethem that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him? . . . Do not the rich oppress you, and themselves drag you before the judgment-seats?' (Ja 2<sup>04</sup>).

When, however, we examine the passages in the Acts more carefully, it seems to be clear that the evidence does not warrant us in concluding that there was any definite system of community of goods, even in the Church in Jerusalem. It is plain from the story of Ananias and Sapphira that there was no compulsion about the sale of goods and lands for the common fund. St. Peter is reported as saying to Ananias: 'Whiles it remained, did it not remain thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thy power?' (Ac 5<sup>4</sup>). When we turn from the Acts to the Pauline Epistles we find no trace of any system of community of goods. St. Paul constantly exhorts his converts to liberality to the poor, especially to those in Jerusalem (1 Co 16<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 8. 9, Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>18</sup>), and the nature of his exhortation seems to imply that the individual Christian retained his own possessions. The same thing is implied in the Epistle to the Hebrews (13<sup>16</sup>), and seems to be the most natural interpretation of the phrase in 1 John (3<sup>17</sup>).

It cannot be said that the references in the NT justify us in asserting that a system of community of goods was part of the normal constitution of the primitive Christian communities; but it is not impossible that the conception that this was the most perfect form of the religious life may have come into Christianity from such contemporary forms of Judaism as that of the Essenes, among whom the community of goods was apparently practised. But on the whole it would seem that the NT passages are sufficiently explained by the very high sense of the claim of brotherhood among Christian people. The discussion of the full significance of this would take us into the later history of the Church, and would therefore be out of place here. But so much may be said, that the NT principles are wholly inconsistent with the view that the Christian man has any absolute right of property as against his fellow-man. There can be no doubt that a great Father like St. Gregory the Great rightly interprets the spirit of the NT when he says that when we give what they need to those who are in want, we give them that which is their own; we are not giving away what is ours, we are rather discharging an obligation of justice than performing a work of mercy (Lib. Reg. Pastor. pt. iii. ch. xxi.).

LITERATURE.—E. Troeltsch, Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen, 1912; R. W. and A. J. Carlyle, A History of Medieval Political Theory in the West, vol. i. ('The 2nd cent. to the 9th,' by A. J. Carlyle), 1903; E. B. Redlich, St. Paul and his Companions, 1913, p. 7; O. Cone, Rich and Poor in the NT, 1902, p. 143 ff.; E. Schürer, GJV 3 ii. [1898] 564 ff. A. J. CARLYLE.

COMPASSION.—See PITY.

CONCISION.—See CIRCUMCISION.

CONCUPISCENCE.—See LUST.

CONDEMNATION.—Not only from the Gospels, but from the rest of the RV as well, the word 'damnation' disappears, 'condemnation' taking its place in Ro 3<sup>8</sup> and 1 Ti 5<sup>12</sup>, 'destruction' in 2 P 2<sup>3</sup>, and 'judgment' in Ro 13<sup>2</sup> and 1 Co 11<sup>29</sup>. The reason is that the process of degeneration, which had begun before the translation of the AV, linked up the term with conceptions of finality and eternity, originally alien to it, and thus made it no longer representative of apostolical thought. With the exception of 2 P 2<sup>3</sup>, the same Greek root occurs in all instances, and the context in the various passages is mainly responsible for the different shades of meaning. In the case of the verb, an exception must also be made of Gal 2<sup>11</sup>, where the idea is that the act of Peter needed no verdict from outside, but carried its own condemnation, as in Ro 2<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>23</sup> and Tit 3<sup>11</sup>.

Little difficulty attaches to the use of the term in the sense of 'destruction' in the case of Sodom (2 P 2<sup>6</sup>), to the reference to the ark as a visible sign of the destruction about to come upon the unbelieving (He 11<sup>7</sup>), or to the denunciation by James (5<sup>6</sup>) of men who unjustly ascribe blame to others and exact penalty for the imagined fault. The wanton are rightly condemned for the rejection of the faith whose value they had learnt by experience (1 Ti 5<sup>12</sup>). Sound speech, on the other hand, cannot be condemned (Tit 2<sup>8</sup>). The man who fails to judge and discipline himself is reminded of his duty by Divine chastening; and if that fail, he shares in the final judgment with the lost (1 Co 11<sup>31a</sup>; cf. Mk 9<sup>42c</sup>). In Ro 5<sup>16, 18</sup> condemnation is the consequence of an original act of evil, and suggests the antithesis of a single act of righteousness, the effects of which overflow to the potential justification of all men; and the freedom from condemnation continues beyond the initial stage of forgiveness and ripens into all the assured experiences of union with Christ (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>).

In several passages the term is involved in a context which to some extent obscures the meaning. The justification of evil as a means to good is indignantly dealt with in Ro 3<sup>8</sup>; with the authors of the slander that he shared that view the apostle refuses to argue, but he leaves them with the just condemnation of God impending. That God 'condemned sin in the flesh' (Ro 8<sup>3</sup>) has been taken to mean that the sinlessness of Christ was by contrast a condemnation of the sin of man, or that the incarnation is a token that human nature is essentially sinless; but the previous phrases connect the thought with the death rather than with the birth of Christ. For Him as man death meant the crown of sinlessness, the closure of the last avenue through which temptation could approach Him; and in virtue of union with Christ, the believer who is dead with Him is free from sin, though not immune from temptation. In 2 Co 3<sup>9</sup> 'condemnation' is antithetical to 'righteousness,' and synonymous with 'death' in v. 7. The argument appears to be that sin is so horrible that the law which reveals it is glorious; a fortiori the covenant that sweeps it out exceeds in glory. 'This condemnation' of Jude<sup>4</sup> ought grammatically to be retrospective, but NT usage allows a prospective use with an explanatory phrase in apposition. The meaning is that ungodliness of the kind described is self-condemned, as has been set forth in various ways in Scripture (cf. Jn 3<sup>19</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>1-3</sup>) as well as in Enoch, i. 9 (cf. Jude 14-16). 'The condemnation of the devil' (1 Ti 3<sup>6</sup>) is a comparison of his fall with that of any vainglorious member of the hierarchy. Both being God's ministers to the people, the similarity is one of circumstance, not necessarily of degree.

R. W. MOSS.

CONFESSION.—1. Confession of Christ.—The duty of confessing Christ before men was very plainly taught by the Lord. He promised (Mt 10<sup>32</sup>) that He would Himself acknowledge a faithful disciple before His Father and the holy angels. He had challenged by a leading question the confession of St. Peter: 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Mt 16<sup>16</sup>), which He commended. In the Acts we find the same root ideas carried into practice. St. Peter and the other apostles openly confessed Jesus as the Christ (Ac 2<sup>31</sup>). The references to baptism into the name of the Lord most probably refer to the confession of faith in Him which was made by all candidates for baptism. Probably the little creed put into the mouth of the Ethiopian eunuch (Ac 8<sup>37</sup> 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God') is an interpolation, and represents the creed of some Church in Asia Minor, since it was known to Irenæus.

The Epistles bear the same witness: 'No one can say that Jesus is the Lord, save in the Holy Ghost' (1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>). 'If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved' (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>). St. Paul here implies that the Lord Jesus is one with the Lord Jahweh on whom the prophet Joel bade men call when he predicted 'this word of faith.' Our difficulties begin when we try to piece together any sort of longer confession which might be regarded as the archetype of the later creeds. It is so difficult to keep an open mind and refrain from reading too much into the evidence.

The Epistle to the Hebrews confirms the testimony of the earlier Pauline Epistles. He 3<sup>1</sup> reads, 'consider the Apostle and High Priest of our confession, even Jesus.' In Westcott's words (Ep. to Hebrews, 1889, ad loc.): 'In Christ our "confession," the faith which we hold and openly acknowledge, finds its authoritative promulgation and its priestly application.' In 4<sup>1</sup> the idea is expressed of clinging to faith in one who is truly human and truly Divine. In 10<sup>23</sup> this confidence is described as the confession of our hope, by which it is shaped. There is an interesting parallel in Clement, ad Cor., ch. 36, who calls Christ 'the High Priest of our offerings.'

The Johannine Epistles correspond to the Pauline. In 1 Jn 2<sup>23</sup> confession is contrasted with denial as entailing the privilege of having the Father. The true inspiration of the Spirit is shown in confession of 'Jesus Christ come in the flesh' (4<sup>2</sup>) uniting the Divine and the human in one person. 'The recognition of the revelation of God is the sign of the presence of God' (Westcott, Epp. of St. John, 1883, p. 146): 'Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him and he in God' (4<sup>15</sup>).

There is an interesting parallel with Johannine teaching in Polycarp's Epistle, ch. 7, where he urges confession of Jesus Christ come in the flesh, echoing 1 Jn 4. Polycarp's teacher, Ignatius of Antioch, has much more to say on the lines of the developed teaching about the person of Christ in opposition to Docetic heresy. Thus he writes to the Ephesians (ch. 7): 'There is one only physician, of flesh and of spirit, generate and ingenerate, God in man, true Life in death, Son of Mary and Son of God, first passible and then impassible, Jesus Christ our Lord.' This is a good illustration of the way in which the simple primitive creed was analyzed to meet new phases of thought which were felt to impoverish its full meaning. But there is great risk in the attempts which have been made to extract a full parallel with a later baptismal creed, such as the Old Roman, from passages like the following. Ignatius writes to the Trallians (ch. 9): 'Be ye deaf therefore, when any man speaketh to you apart from Jesus Christ, who was of the race of David, who was the Son of Mary, who was truly born and ate and drank, was truly persecuted under Pontius Pilate, was truly crucified and died in the sight of those in heaven, and those on earth, and those under the earth; who moreover was truly raised from the dead, His Father having raised Him, who in the like fashion will so raise us also who believe on Him—His Father, I say, will raise us—in Christ Jesus, apart from whom we have not true life.' It is reasonable to argue from this and similar passages (ad Eph. 18, ad Smyrn. 1) that for purposes of catechetical instruction Christian teachers would soon prepare a precise statement of the great facts of the Lord's life and death and resurrection. But there is no evidence that it had as yet been fitted into the setting of the Trinitarian baptismal formula. Ignatius expresses his faith in the Trinity—'in the Son, and in the Father, and in the Spirit' (ad Magn. 13; cf. 2 Co 13<sup>14</sup>)—clearly enough. But he does not bring it into connexion with his confession of Christ.

From a study of Ignatius we may work backwards to the problem of the confession of faith in the Pastoral Epistles of St. Paul. We are not concerned here to defend their authenticity, but only to ask whether it is possible to extract from them, as Zahn attempts to do, an Apostolic Creed of Antioch. St. Paul reminds Timothy of the confession which he made before many witnesses, we may suppose at his baptism (1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>). He calls it the beautiful confession to which Christ Jesus has borne witness before Pontius Pilate, and charges Timothy 'before God, who quickeneth all things, to keep the commandment undefiled, irreproachable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.' The reference is to the Lord's avowal that He was a King (Jn 18<sup>36</sup>). The word 'confession' seems to draw attention to the fact that He confessed rather than to any form of words. In the Martyrdom of Ignatius, ch. 1, it is referred to the martyrdom of one who witnesses by bloodshedding—that is to say, in deed, not in word.

'A form of sound words' was indeed needed by Timothy as a teacher, and he is exhorted to teach as he had been taught (2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>), 'in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.' 'Remember Jesus Christ, risen from the dead, of the seed of David, according to my gospel' (2<sup>9</sup>). We can safely say that that gospel included teaching about God who quickeneth all things, reference to Pontius Pilate, to the resurrection, and to the return to judgment; but the inference is most precarious by which Zahn puts them all into the creed with confession of the Holy Spirit, who is named in 2 Ti 1<sup>14</sup>, but not with emphatic correlation of His Person to the Persons of the Father and the Son (cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup>). The thought is rather that of 1 Co 12<sup>3</sup>, quoted above, where St. Paul teaches that it is under the influence of the Spirit that any man confesses Jesus as the Lord.

It is very unsafe in the face of these reflexions to restore an Apostolic Creed of the NT as several writers have attempted to do. A. Seeberg of Dorpat (Der Katechismus der Urchristenheit, 1903) suggests the following as a reconstruction of St. Paul's creed: 'The living God who created all things sent his Son, Jesus Christ, born of the seed of David, who died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and was buried, who was raised the third day according to the Scriptures and appeared to Cephas and the Twelve, who sat at the right hand of God in the heavens, all rules and authorities and powers being made subject unto him, and is coming on the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.' This is much less like the earliest forms of developed creed both in East and West than Harnack's more famous reconstruction of 'our oldest creed,' which he was careful to explain 'is not a creed that was ever used or ever likely to be used': 'I believe in (one) God Almighty, in Christ Jesus, His Son, our Lord, who was born of a Virgin, under Pontius Pilate suffered (crucified), and rose again (from the dead), sat on the right hand of God, whence He is coming (in glory) to judge living and dead, and in the Holy Ghost.'

It is important, however, to remember that the fact of confession is of greater importance than any form in which it is made. Of that there is no doubt. It comes out incidentally in a passage about idol meats, where St. Paul implies that it is not the eating of flesh in itself, but with the open confession, 'I am a Christian,' that makes the difference (Ro 14<sup>14</sup>). Again, it is not generally understood that one form of the interfering with other men's matters spoken of by St. Peter (1 P 4<sup>15c</sup>) might be the pressing forward with open confession of Christianity during another man's trial. Such unwholesome fanaticism under the cloak of zeal began early. On the other hand, the definite teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews takes a sad tone when the writer thinks of recent acts of apostasy. If, as von Dobschütz thinks, the Epistles to Timothy represent the transition to Catholicism, the exhortations to fearless confession may be explained by opposition to a Gnosticism that fought shy of confession (2 Ti 1<sup>8</sup> 2<sup>3</sup>). In this case, the apostle who was not ashamed of his bonds might certainly appear to his successors a pattern putting them to shame (1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>9ff</sup> 4<sup>6ff</sup>). But we need not wait for 2nd cent. Gnosticism to suggest motives for cowardice. The temptation is rife in every generation. In Revelation the condition of the churches varies widely, but it is only the Church of Philadelphia which sets the pattern of joyous confession coupled with active missionary zeal (3<sup>7ff</sup>). Such joy is also expressed in Clem. ad Cor. 5, 6, some words of which may fitly conclude this part of our subject:

'Let us set before our eyes the good Apostles. There was Peter, who by reason of unrighteous jealousy endured not one nor two but many labours, and thus having borne his testimony went to his appointed place of glory. By reason of jealousy and strife Paul by his example pointed out the prize of patient endurance. . . . Unto these men of holy lives was gathered a vast multitude of the elect, who through many indignities and tortures, being the victims of jealousy, set a brave example among ourselves.'

LITERATURE.—A. Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, Eng. tr., 1894–99; F. Kattenbusch, Das apostol. Symbol, Leipzig, 1894–1900; H. B. Swete, The Apostles' Creed, 1894; C. H. Turner, Hist. and Use of Creeds, 1906; A. E. Burn, An Introd. to the Creeds, 1898.

2. Confession of sin.—In the Apostolic Age this had its root in ancient Jewish practice. The ceremonial of the Day of Atonement, the confessions in the Books of Ezra and Daniel, the Penitential Psalms must be remembered when we reflect on the confessions made publicly by disciples of John the Baptist. The language of penitence lay in the OT ready for use when John's fervent appeal stirred the consciences of men into self-accusation. Among these men were reckoned some of the chief apostles of Christ.

(1) Confession to God.—The repentance demanded from all candidates for Christian baptism (Ac 2<sup>38</sup>) must have included confession of sins as a necessary element, in private if not in public. The teaching of 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup> expressly makes it a condition of forgiveness. St. Paul's teaching on repentance leaves no doubt that he also regarded it as a primary duty. For him conscience was supreme arbiter. No troubled conscience can find relief save in full acknowledgment of fault.

(2) Confession before men.—This brings us to a more difficult problem. In 1 Jn 1<sup>9</sup> confession of sins is connected with the Divine blessing, and the word implies open acknowledgment in the face of men. But nothing is said as to the mode, though it is implied that it will be definite and specific, not in mere general terms. St. Paul is represented as receiving many confessions publicly at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>18</sup>), when many 'came, confessing, and declaring their deeds,' and there was a bonfire of books of magic. The case of discipline at Corinth, when St. Paul was constrained to condemn a brother so sternly for incest, led to public confession not only by him but also by those who had been implicated in shielding him (2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>). St. James records, it would seem, the practice of the Church in Jerusalem in relation to visits of the elders of the Church to sick persons whom they anointed with prayer: 'Confess therefore your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed' (Ja 5<sup>16</sup>). The word ἀμαρτίας refers to sins against God, though it may include sins against neighbours. Much has been made of Cardinal Cajetan's opinion that this does not relate to sacramental confession (Epp. S. Pauli, Paris, 1532, f. cxii). But however limited be the meaning put on the words, e.g. by Mayor (Epistle of James<sup>3</sup>, 1910, p. 175), who supposes reference 'merely to such mutual confidences as would give a right direction to the prayers offered,' the practice in the sickroom corresponds to the common practice of the Church in the next generation.

Both Clement and Hermas witness to the custom of public confession. Clement writes to the Corinthians (57): 'Ye therefore that laid the foundation of the sedition, submit yourselves unto the presbyters and receive chastisement unto repentance, bending the knees of your heart.' We must interpret these words in the light of others, e.g. ch. 51: 'For it is good for a man to make confession of his trespasses rather than to harden his heart' (cf. ch. 54). Hermas, the prophet, tells us bluntly in the Shepherd of the confessions of untruthfulness and dishonesty which he was constrained to make publicly (Mand. iii. 3). He was constrained also to confess neglect of his home, double-mindedness, and doubts. It is no ideal picture which he draws of his own conduct or of the life of his fellow-Christians. But, as von Dobschütz says, these confessions reveal 'the magnificent moral earnestness of the man, and not of him only, but of the Christianity of his time' (Christian Life in the Primitive Church, p. 315). The Epistle of Barnabas is evidence for the preciseness with which the Church in Alexandria at the end of the 1st cent. interpreted the Moral Law. The writer teaches definitely: 'Thou shalt confess thy sins' (ch. 19), and also speaks of the spiritual counsel which one is to give to another: 'Be good lawgivers one to another; continue faithful counsellors to yourselves; take away from you all hypocrisy' (ch. 21).

* A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole<sup>3</sup>, Breslau, 1897, p. 390.

Ignatius of Antioch, writing to the Philadelphians (ch. 8), regards the bishop with his council as in charge of the discipline of the Church: 'Now the Lord forgiveth all men when they repent, if repenting they return to the unity of God and to the council of the bishop.'

These hints about the public penitential system of the primitive Church do not carry us very far, but they certainly prepare us for the famous description given by Tertullian, which applies no doubt to the practice at the beginning, as at the end, of the 2nd century.

'This confession is a disciplinary act of great humiliation and prostration of the man; it regulates the dress, the food; it enjoins sackcloth and ashes; it defiles the body with dust, and subdues the spirit with anguish; it bids a man alter his life, and sorrow for past sin; it restricts meat and drink to the greatest simplicity possible; it nourishes prayer by fasting; it inculcates groans and tears and invocations of the Lord God day and night, and teaches the penitent to cast himself at the feet of the presbyters, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God, and to beg of all the brethren to intercede on his behalf' (de Pœn. ch. 9).

LITERATURE.—E. von Dobschütz, Christian Life in the Primitive Church, Eng. tr., 1904; N. Marshall, The Penitential Discipline of the Primitive Church, new ed., 1844.

A. E. BURN.

CONFIDENCE.—The term 'confidence' ('confident,' 'confidently') is in the RV of the NT almost wholly confined to the Pauline Epistles, the only exception being He 3<sup>14</sup>. In AV it renders παρρησία of 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> and 5<sup>14</sup>, but is replaced in RV by 'boldness' (q.v.). The verb θαρρύνω of 2 Co 5<sup>6a</sup>, in AV is rendered by 'to be confident'; in RV 'to be of good courage' is substituted. In RV of 1 Ti 1<sup>7</sup> and Tit 3<sup>8</sup> διαβεβαιωνομαι is now rendered 'confidently affirm.' In both AV and RV 'confidence' is three times employed to render the difficult and many-sided word υποστασις (2 Co 9<sup>4</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> He 3<sup>14</sup>).

The words, however, that most concern us here are πεισθηναι, 'to be confident,' and πεισθησις, 'confidence,' the latter being in the NT an exclusively Pauline word and found only once in the LXX (2 K 18<sup>19</sup>). They both belong to the language of deep personal feeling, and it is not surprising that they appear more frequently in 2 Cor. and Phil. than in all the other Epistles put together. The confidence cherished by St. Paul is a state of mind springing out of faith and rising to the firm persuasion that God's purposes with himself, with his converts, and with all that pertains to the kingdom of Christ are right and cannot fail of accomplishment. In this 'confidence' he enjoys his boldness in Christ and access through Christ to God (Eph 3<sup>12</sup>). He is 'confident of this very thing, that he which began a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1<sup>6</sup>). His 'confidence' as regards himself (Ph 2<sup>24</sup>, AV and RV 'trust'), and as regards his converts and their compliance with his counsels, is in God (Gal 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Th 3<sup>4</sup>, Philem 2<sup>1</sup>). It comes from union with Christ, and has God for its ultimate goal (2 Co 3<sup>4</sup>). Clement in 1 Corinthians (xxvi. 1) speaks of those who have served God religiously 'in the confidence of an honest faith.' He mentions, too, many wonderful gifts of God—'life in immortality, splendour in righteousness, truth in boldness, faith in confidence, and temperance in sanctification' (xxxv. 2).

Whilst there is such a confidence, there is also a confidence which is misplaced—confidence in ourselves (Ro 2<sup>19</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>9</sup>), in the flesh (Ph 3<sup>3a</sup>), the confidence of which Hermas says (Sim. ix. 22. 3) that 'vain confidence is a great demon.'

T. NICOL.

CONFIRMATION.—(a) The word 'confirm' in the NT sometimes represents στηρίζω or ἐπιστηρίζω, used of the strengthening of Christians, of love, faith, etc., in Ac 14<sup>22</sup> 15<sup>32</sup> 41; cf. 18<sup>23</sup> (RV 'stablish,' AV 'strengthen'). στηρίζω is usually (about 12 times) translated 'stablish' or 'establish' (in Lk 16<sup>6</sup> it is used of the 'fixing' of a gulf).—(b) 'Confirm' and 'confirmation' are used to translate βεβαιῶ and βεβαιῶσις in Ro 15<sup>8</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup>, He 2<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>7</sup>, Mk<sup>16</sup>, with the same meaning. The same Gr. verb is rendered 'stablish' or 'establish' in 2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>, Col 2<sup>7</sup>, He 13<sup>9</sup>.—(c) 'Confirm' is also the word used for κυρῶ or προκυρῶ in connexion with a covenant or will (Gal 3<sup>15</sup> 17, which may refer to what we should call 'registration'; see W. M. Ramsay, Hist. Com. on Galatians, 1899, p. 354); in 2 Co 2<sup>8</sup> it is used of love.—(d) In Tit 3<sup>8</sup> διαβεβαιῶ is translated 'affirm.' In He 6<sup>17</sup> μεσσηνέω is rendered in AV 'confirm,' in RV and AVm 'interpose,' in RVm 'mediate.'

For the rite of confirmation, see BAPTISM, §§ 6, 8.

A. J. MACLEAN.

CONGREGATION.—In Tindale's Version (1534) and in Cranmer's (1539) 'congregation' was used instead of 'church' to translate both ἐκκλησία and  συναγωγή. But Wyclif had used 'church,' and the Geneva Version, followed by AV, reverted to it. RV, with one exception, has 'church' exclusively in the text, though in several places 'congregation' appears in the margin. The exception is He 2<sup>12</sup>, where in the quotation from Ps 22<sup>25</sup> 'congregation' is in the text and 'church' in the margin. F. J. A. Hort (The Christian Ecclesia, London, 1897) chose 'Ecclesia' as a word free from the disturbing associations of 'church' and 'congregation,' though the latter has not only historical standing (as above) but also the advantage of suggesting some of these elements of meaning which are least forcibly brought out by the word 'church' according to our present use (cf. ExpT viii. [1896-97] 386). So far, however, as there is any substantive difference between the two words as found in the English Bible, the 'congregation' of RVm points to an actual church assembled in one place.

In the NT ἐκκλησία naturally designates the Christian Church. The associations of  συναγωγή were against its Christian use, though it is retained in Ja 2<sup>2</sup> to describe an assembly of Jewish-Christians; but this is explained by the destination of the letter—'to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion.'

In St. Paul's address to the elders of Miletus (Ac 20<sup>17</sup>) we see the old Jewish  συναγωγή in the process of passing into the more distinctively Christian ἐκκλησία. He quotes Ps 74<sup>2</sup> 'Remember thy congregation which thou didst purchase of old'; but for the LXX  συναγωγή he puts ἐκκλησία. Thus in the Apostle's hands this passage becomes 'one of the channels through which the word "ecclesia" came to denote God's people of the future' (ExpT viii. 387). Cf. also art. ASSEMBLY; and, for the Heb. and Gr. terms in the OT, art. 'Congregation' in HDB.

W. M. GRANT.

CONSCIENCE (συνείδησις).—1. The word and its history.—Both the Lat. conscientia, from which 'conscience' is derived, and the Gr. συνείδησις, of which it is the invariable rendering in the NT, have originally the more general meaning of 'consciousness'—the knowledge of any mental state. Down to the 17th cent., as the AV itself bears witness, 'conscience' too was sometimes used in this wider sense. In 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup> 'conscience of the idol,' and in He 10<sup>2</sup> 'conscience of sins,' would now be better rendered 'consciousness.' Some exegetes would prefer 'consciousness' to 'conscience' in 1 P 2<sup>19</sup> 'conscience toward (or of) God.' With these exceptions, 'conscience' in the NT denotes not consciousness generally, but the moral faculty in particular—that power by which we apprehend moral truth and recognize it as having the authority of moral law. The history of the words 'conscience,' con-

scientia, συνείδησις, shows that it is entirely fanciful to suppose on etymological grounds that the prefixes con and syn point to the subject's joint knowledge along with God Himself. The joint knowledge denoted is knowledge with oneself, a self-knowledge or self-consciousness in which the inner 'I' comes forward as a witness. This does not, of course, exclude the further view that, as man is made in the image of God, and as his individual personality is rooted in that of the absolute moral Ruler, the testimony of conscience actually is the voice of God bearing witness in the soul to the reality and authority of moral truth.

It is a significant fact that the word 'conscience' is nowhere found in the OT text, though in Ec 10<sup>10</sup> both AV and RV give it in the margin as an alternative for 'thought,' to represent the Heb. עָלַם, which LXX here renders by συνείδησις. In ancient Israel it was an external law, not an inward law-giver, that held the seat of authority; and though the prophets addressed their appeals to the moral sense of their hearers (cf. Mic 6<sup>8</sup>), they furnished no doctrine of conscience. Nor does the word occur either in the Synoptics or the Fourth Gospel; for the clause of Jn 8<sup>9</sup> where it is found does not belong to the correct text (see RV). Jesus in His teaching constantly addresses Himself to the conscience, and clearly refers to it when He speaks of 'the light that is in thee' (Mt 6<sup>3</sup>, Lk 11<sup>35</sup>), but His mission was to illumine and quicken the moral faculty by the revelation He brought, not to analyze it, or define it, or lay down a doctrine on the subject. In the Acts and Epistles, however, the effects of the revelation in Christ become apparent. We have the word 'conscience' 31 times in AV and 30 times in RV—the latter reading συνηθεία for συνείδησις in 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>. Heb. has it 5 times and 1 Pet. thrice; with these exceptions it is a Pauline word. There are anticipations of the NT use of it in the Apocrypha (Wis 17<sup>11</sup>, Sir 14<sup>2</sup>, 2 Mac 6<sup>11</sup>), and suggestions for St. Paul's treatment of it in contemporary Greek teaching, and especially in the moral philosophy of the Stoics. But it was Christian faith that raised it out of the region of ethical abstraction and set it on a throne of living power.

2. The NT doctrine.—(1) The nature of conscience.—According to its etymology, conscience is a strictly cognitive power—the power of apprehending moral truth; and writers of the intuitional school frequently restrict the use of the term to this one meaning (cf. Calderwood, Handbook of Moral Philosophy, p. 78). Popularly, however, conscience has a much wider connotation, including moral judgments and moral feelings as well as immediate intuitions of right and wrong; and it is evident that in the NT the word is employed in this larger sense so as to include the whole of the moral nature. When conscience is said to 'bear witness' (Ro 2<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>) or to give 'testimony' (2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>), it is the clear and direct shining of the inner light that is referred to. When it is described as 'weak' or over-scrupulous (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup> 10<sup>12</sup>), and is contrasted by implication with a conscience that is strong and walks at liberty, the reference is to those diversities of opinion on moral subjects which are due to variations of judgment in the application of mutually acknowledged first principles. When it is spoken of on the one hand as 'good' (1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup> 19, He 13<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>16</sup> 21) or 'void of offence toward God and men' (Ac 24<sup>16</sup>), and on the other as 'defiled' (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>), 'wounded' (v. 12), 'evil' (He 10<sup>22</sup>), 'seared (or branded) with a hot iron' (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>), the writers are thinking of those pleasant or painful moral feelings which follow upon obedience or disobedience to moral law, or of that deadness to all feeling which falls upon those who have persistently shut their ears to the inward voice and turned the light that is in them into darkness.

The fundamental passage for the Pauline doctrine is Ro 2<sup>14</sup> 15. The Apostle here seems to lay down as unquestionable, (a) that there is a Divine law written by Nature on the heart of every man, whether Jew or Gentile; (b) that conscience is the moral faculty which bears witness to that law; (c) that in the light of that witness there is an exercise of the thoughts or reasonings (λογισμοί), in other words, of the moral judgment; (d) that, as the result of this judgment before the inward bar, men are subject to the feelings of moral self-approval or self-reproach. Covering in this passage the whole ground of the moral nature of man, St. Paul appears to distinguish conscience as the witness-bearing faculty from the moral judgments and moral feelings that accompany its testimony. But elsewhere, as has been already shown, he frequently speaks of conscience in that larger sense which makes it correspond not only with the immediate apprehension of moral truth, but with the judgments based upon the truth thus revealed, and the sentiments of satisfaction or dissatisfaction to which these judgments give rise.

(2) The authority of conscience.—However men differ in their theories as to the nature and origin of the moral faculty, there is general agreement as to the authority of the moral law which it enjoins. Few will be found to challenge Butler's famous assertion of the supremacy of conscience: 'Had it strength as it has right, had it power as it has manifest authority, it would absolutely govern the world' (Serm. ii.). And while adherents of the sensational school of ethics may dispute Kant's right to describe the imperative of morality as 'categorical' in its nature (Metaphysic of Ethics, p. 31), even they will not seek to qualify his apostrophe to duty (p. 120) or the exalted language in which he describes the solemn majesty of the Moral Law (p. 108). For the NT authors conscience is supreme, and it is supreme because in its very nature it is an organ through which God speaks to reveal His will. In the case of the natural man it testifies to a Divine law which is written on the heart (Ro 2<sup>15</sup>); in the case of the Christian man this law of Nature is reinforced by a vital union with Jesus Christ (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>) and by the assenting witness of the Holy Spirit (Ro 9<sup>1</sup>). The claim of right which Butler makes on behalf of conscience is transformed for St. Paul into a law of power. The pure and loyal Christian conscience has might as it has right; it not only legislates but governs. What the law could not do in that it was weak through the flesh, is actually fulfilled in those who take Christ to be the companion of their conscience and who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit.

In Acts we have many examples of the way in which conscience, in Butler's words, 'magisterially exerts itself' in the case alike of bad men and of good. The suicide of Judas (1<sup>8</sup>; cf. Mt 27<sup>35</sup>), the heart-pricks of the men of Jerusalem under St. Peter's preaching (2<sup>37</sup>), the claim of St. Peter and St. John that they must obey God rather than men (4<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>29</sup>), Saul's experience that it was hard to kick against the pricks (9<sup>5</sup>), Felix trembling as St. Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come (24<sup>25</sup>)—all these are examples of the authority of conscience. And what in Acts we see practically exemplified is laid down in the Epistles as a matter of rule and doctrine. St. Paul enjoins submission to the civil authority (Ro 13<sup>15</sup>), but vindicates its right to govern on the ground of the higher authority of conscience (v. 5). The writer of Heb. represents the sin-convicting conscience as a sovereign power which impelled men to lay their gifts and sacrifices on the altar, but was never satisfied until Jesus Christ 'through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God' (He 9<sup>9</sup>. 14 10<sup>2</sup>. 22). St. Peter teaches that, in a matter of conscience before God, men must be willing to 'endure griefs, suffering wrongfully' (1 P 2<sup>19</sup>). Nor is it only the personal conscience whose dignity and supremacy must be acknowledged; a like reverence is to be shown for the conscience of others. St. Paul sought to commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God (2 Co 4<sup>2</sup>; cf. 5<sup>11</sup>). He taught that the exercise of Christian liberty must be limited by regard for another's conscience (1 Co 10<sup>29</sup>), and that even when that conscience is weak, it must not be wounded or bewildered or defiled (8<sup>7</sup>. 10. 12) lest the other's sense of moral responsibility should thereby be impaired.

The source of this magisterial authority of conscience is represented by the NT writers as lying altogether in the Divine will, of which conscience is the instrument. For St. Paul conscience is not an individualized reflexion of social opinion, nor a subtle compound of feelings evolved in the course of the long struggle for existence, nor yet a mysterious faculty that claims to regulate the life of man by virtue of some right inherent in its own nature. Its authority is that of a judge, who sits on the bench as the representative of a law that is higher than himself. Its function is to bear witness to the law of God (Ro 2<sup>15</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup>); its commendation is a commendation in His sight (2 Co 4<sup>2</sup>); its accusation is an anticipation of the day when He shall judge the secrets of men (Ro 2<sup>15</sup>. 16). Similarly for St. Peter a matter of conscience is a question of 'conscience toward God' (1 P 2<sup>19</sup>). Some commentators would render συνηθης θεου in this verse by 'consciousness of God'; and the very ambiguity of the expression may suggest that in the Apostle's view conscience is really a God-consciousness in the sphere of morality, as faith is a God-consciousness in the sphere of religion.

(3) Varieties of conscience.—What has just been said as to the absolute and universal authority of conscience may seem difficult to reconcile with the distinctions made by the NT writers between consciences of very varied types. There are consciences that are weak and timid, and others that are strong and free (1 Co 8<sup>7ff.</sup>). A conscience may be 'void of offence' (Ac 24<sup>16</sup>), or it may be defiled and wounded (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>. 12, Tit 1<sup>16</sup>). It may be good (1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>. 19, He 13<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>16</sup>. 21), or it may be evil (He 10<sup>22</sup>). It may be pure (1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>), or in need of cleansing (He 9<sup>14</sup>). It may possess that clear moral sense which discerns intuitively both good and evil (He 5<sup>14</sup>), or it may be 'seared with a hot iron' (1 Ti 4<sup>2</sup>) and condemned to that judicial blindness to which nothing is pure (Tit 1<sup>15</sup>). The explanation of the difficulties raised by such language lies in the fact already noted that 'conscience' in the NT is used to denote not the power of moral vision only, but the moral judgment and the moral feelings. As the organ which discerns the Moral Law, conscience has the authority of that law itself; its voice is the voice of God. It leaves us in no doubt as to the reality of moral distinctions; it assures us that right is right and wrong is wrong, and that 'to him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin' (Ja 4<sup>17</sup>). But for the application to particular cases of the general law of duty thus revealed, men must depend upon their moral judgments; and moral judgments are liable to error just as other judgments are. It was a want of 'knowledge' that led some in the Corinthian Church to shrink from eating meat that had been offered to an idol (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>), and a consequent mistake of judgment when they came to the conclusion that such eating was wrong. Their consciences were weak because their moral judgments were weak. And as the result of their weakness in the decision of moral questions, their moral feelings were misdirected, and so their consciences were stained and wounded by acts in which a man of more enlightened conscience saw no harm. Similarly, when a conscience is said to be 'good' or 'pure' or 'void of offence,' the reference is to the sense of peace and moral harmony with God and man which comes to one who has loyally obeyed the dictates of the Moral Law; while an uncleansed or evil conscience is one on which there rests the burden and pain of sin that is unatoned for and unforgiven. A 'seared' or 'branded' conscience, again, may point to the case of those in whom abuse of the moral nature has led to a perversion of the moral judgment and a deadening of the moral sentiments. Compare what St. Paul says of those whose understanding is darkened, whose hearts are hardened, and who are now 'past feeling' (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>).

(4) The education of conscience.—Some intuitionals have held that conscience, being an infallible oracle, is incapable of education; and Kant's famous utterance, 'An erring conscience is a chimera' (op. cit. p. 206), has often been quoted in this connexion. But it is only in a theoretical and ideal sense that the truth of the saying can be admitted—only when the word of conscience is taken to be nothing less and nothing more than the voice of God, and its light to be in very reality His 'revealing and appealing look' (J. Martineau, Seat of Authority in Religion, London, 1891, p. 71). In the NT, however, as in general usage, 'conscience' is not restricted to the intuitive discernment of the difference between right and wrong, but is applied to the whole moral nature of man; and when understood in this way there can be no question that it shares in the general weakness of human nature, and that it is both capable of education and constantly in need of an educative discipline. The distinction made by the NT writers between a good and an evil conscience implies the need of education; their moral precepts imply its possibility. St. Paul says that he 'exercised himself' to have a conscience void of offence toward God and men (Ac 24<sup>16</sup>); the author of Heb. speaks of those who 'by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil' (5<sup>14</sup>).

In various aspects the necessity for this exercise or training of the moral faculty comes before us. Even as a power of intuition or vision by which the Moral Law is discerned, conscience is capable of improvement. Ignorance darkens it (Eph 4<sup>18</sup>), sin defiles it (Tit 1<sup>15</sup>); and only an eye that is purged and enlightened can see clearly. 'My conscience is not so,' said Queen Mary to Knox. 'Conscience, Madam,' he replied, 'requyres knowledge; and I fear that rycht knowledge ye have none' (Knox, Works, ed. Laing, Edinburgh, 1864, ii. 283). But conscience is also a faculty of moral judgment, and in moral matters, as in other matters, human judgments go astray. The 'weak' conscience is the natural accompaniment of the weak and narrow mind (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>); a selfish and impure heart usually compounds with its conscience for the sins to which it is inclined, and a conscience that accepts hush-money is apt to grow dumb until contact with another conscience stronger and purer than itself makes it vocal once more (Ac 24<sup>5</sup>). Moral sentiments, again, gather around a false judgment as readily as around a true. Christ's apostles were killed by men who thought that they were thereby doing God service (Jn 16<sup>2</sup>), and St. Paul himself once believed it to be his duty 'to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth' (Ac 26<sup>9</sup>). In such cases persecution to the death carried no self-reproach with it, but a sense of moral complacency.

Granting, then, that conscience needs to be educated, how, according to the NT, is the work to be done? Three ways are especially suggested—the ways of knowledge, obedience, and love; in other words, the way of the mind, the way of the will, and the way of the heart. (a) Knox said to Queen Mary that conscience requires knowledge; and that is what St. Paul also taught (1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>). Before the man of God can be ‘furnished completely unto every good work’ he has need of ‘instruction in righteousness’ (2 Ti 3<sup>16, 17</sup>). Education of this kind can be obtained from many masters, but the best teachers of all are Scriptures inspired of God (ib.). St. Paul’s own Epistles are full of instruction as regards both the broad principles of Christian ethics and their application under varying circumstances to all the details of personal, family, and social life. And in the teaching of Christ Himself, above all in that Sermon on the Mount whose echoes are heard so frequently in the Epistle of James, enlightenment comes to the human conscience through the revelation of the fundamental laws of the Divine Kingdom.

(b) Conscience is educated, in the next place, by obedience to the Divine law when that law is recognized. It is the use of knowledge already possessed that exercises the senses to keener moral discernment (He 5<sup>14</sup>); it is the man who is willing to do God’s will who comes to know the Divine voice whenever he hears it (Jn 7<sup>17</sup>). The ethics of the NT are not the ingenious elaboration of a beautiful but abstract moral scheme; they are practical through and through. Christians are called upon to acknowledge not the right of conscience only, but its might; they are commanded everywhere to bring their dispositions, desires, passions, and habits into captivity to its obedience. To follow Christ is to have the light of life (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>); while to hate one’s brother is to walk in darkness with blinded eyes, and so to lose the knowledge of the way (1 Jn 2<sup>11</sup>; cf. Jn 12<sup>35</sup>). Obedience, in short, is the organ of spiritual knowledge (cf. F. W. Robertson, Sermons, 2nd ser., new ed., London, 1875, no. viii.). A good conscience goes with a pure heart (1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>). But sin so perverts and blinds the inward eye that the very light that is in us is darkness (Mt 6<sup>23</sup>).

(c) But something more is required before the education of conscience is complete. Knowledge is much, and the will to obedience is more, but what if the power of love be wanting? In that case the conscience will not be void of offence toward God and men. According to the NT writers the conscience must be set free by being delivered from the sense of guilt through the atoning power of Christ’s sacrifice (He 9<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>); it must learn its close dependence upon the mystery of faith (1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup>; cf. 1<sup>19</sup>); it must be taught that love out of a pure heart and a good conscience and faith unfeigned are ‘the end of the charge’ and the fulfilling of the law (1<sup>5</sup>). To be perfectly educated, in short, a conscience must experience the constraining and transforming power of the love of Christ, in whom men are new creatures, so that old things are passed away and all things are become new (2 Co 5<sup>14, 17</sup>). Thus, in the view of the NT writers, ethics passes into religion, and the Christian conscience is the conscience of one who lives the life of faith and love, and who can say with St. Paul, ‘I live, and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me’ (Gal 2<sup>20</sup>).

LITERATURE.—J. Butler, Analogy and Sermons, London, 1852, Sermons ii. iii.; I. Kant, Metaphysic of Ethics, Eng. tr., 1809, p. 240 ff.; T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, Oxford, 1883, p. 342 ff.; H. Calderwood, Handbook of Moral Philosophy, London, 1872, pt. i.; H. Martensen, Christian Ethics, Edinburgh, 1881–82, i. 356 ff.; Newman Smyth, Christian Ethics, do. 1892, index s.v.; ITDB, art. ‘Conscience’; PRE, art. ‘Gewissen’; B. Weiss, NT Theol., Eng. tr., Edinburgh, 1882–83, i. 476, ii. 40, 211. J. C. LAMBERT.

CONSECRATE, CONSECRATION.—The word ‘consecrate’ occurs twice in the AV of Hebrews

(7<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>). In the first passage it is the translation of τετελειωμένον; in the second of ενεκαίνισεν. In neither case is the translation quite suitable.

1. He 7<sup>28</sup>: υἰὸν εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τετελειωμένον. Full consideration of τελειώω would encroach on the art. PERFECT (q.v.); but there are certain special points connected with this passage that may usefully be noted. τελειουν τας χειρας is frequently used in the LXX, but only in the Pentateuch (Ex 29<sup>9, 29, 33, 35</sup> [Lv 4<sup>5</sup>] 8<sup>33</sup> 16<sup>32</sup>, Nu 3<sup>8</sup>), to translate the obscure Hebrew phrase mille' yad—‘fill the hand,’ i.e. ‘consecrate’ (a priest). Elsewhere in the Pentateuch and Historical Books (once in Ezekiel [43<sup>26</sup>]) parts of πληρῶω, ἐμπλήρωμι, πλήρωμι are employed. τελείωσις is used alone (Ex 29<sup>22, 26, 27, 31, 34</sup>, Lv 7<sup>37</sup> 8<sup>22, 28, 29, 31, 33</sup> 9<sup>33</sup>) for the Heb. millū'im (= ‘consecration’ [RV]). In Lv 21<sup>10</sup> τετελειωμένος is used without the rest of the phrase = ‘consecrated,’ although many MSS supply τὰς χειρας αὐτοῦ. These last uses would at least point to the conclusion that τελειώω and τελείωσις tended to become semi-technical terms for the consecration of the priest, having originally been used to translate the verb in the Heb. phrase, which is quite obscure. Most probably its original sense is suggested in the corresponding Assy. kātū mullā—‘hand over to one (or make one responsible for) a person or thing or office’ (cf. F. Delitzsch, Assyr. Handwörterbuch, 1896, p. 409<sup>b</sup>: ‘Rammianirari, whom Asur has endowed with a dominion incomparable’; and HDB iv. 71<sup>a</sup>).

It follows, then, that He 7<sup>28</sup> and the other passages where τελειώω occurs (see art. PERFECT) indicate that the writer is making use of a technical expression and, in harmony with his system of thought, hellenizing it (cf. Moffatt, LNT, 1911, p. 427). There can be little doubt that in Hebrews τελειώω is used in the Aristotelian sense of bringing to the τέλος or final end. Jesus, as High Priest, is ‘perfected’ for evermore, as distinct from the τελείωσις of the Aaronic priesthood. There can be no idea of a moral development in character. Jesus is ‘perfected [and there is also the further idea of exaltation to office] for evermore’ in the sense that He is endowed with an experience of human suffering in life and in death (He 4<sup>15</sup>); so A. B. Davidson, Hebrews (Handbooks for Bible Classes), pp. 145 f., 207 f.; von Soden, Hebräerbrief<sup>3</sup> (Handkommentar zum NT, Tübingen, 1899), p. 28 n.; but cf. A. B. Bruce, Hebrews, 1899, p. 283 ff.; M. Dods, EGT, ‘Hebrews,’ 1910, pp. 265, 319, who argue for the sense of moral perfecting.

2. He 10<sup>20</sup>: τὴν εἰσόδον . . . ἣν ἐνεκαίνισεν ἡμῖν ὁδὸν πρόσφατον καὶ ζῶσαν διὰ τοῦ καταπετάσματος. ἐγκαίνιζω is used also in He 9<sup>18</sup>. In AV of 10<sup>20</sup> the word is ‘consecrated,’ and in 9<sup>18</sup> ‘dedicated.’ In RV in both cases ‘dedicated’ is used. In the LXX ἐγκαίνιζω is used to translate two Heb. words, hānīkh (‘initiate,’ ‘consecrate,’ Dt 20<sup>5</sup>, 1 K 8<sup>63</sup>) and hiddesh (‘renew,’ ‘make anew,’ 1 S 11<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 15<sup>8</sup>, 1’s 50<sup>12</sup>). ἐγκαίνιζω in He 10<sup>20</sup> might seem to combine both meanings, implying that some kind of way existed before (cf. Sir 33 [36]<sup>9</sup>). In He 9<sup>18</sup>, also, the word means simply ‘inaugurate,’ unless the pre-existence of a covenant is supposed (cf. 9<sup>20, 23</sup>) before the ceremony of vv. 19–21. That the sense of ‘renewal,’ however, is strongly emphasized is seen also in the use of πρόσφατον (‘fresh,’ ‘hitherto untrodden’). ζῶσαν implies ‘a way that really leads and carries all who enter it into the heavenly rest,’ as opposed to ‘a lifeless pavement trodden by the high priest, and by him alone’ (Delitzsch, Hebrews, Eng. tr., ii. [1870] 171). It also implies a way that would never become old, worn, or obsolete. ἣν must be taken as referring to εἰσόδος. Jesus has, by bursting the veil of His flesh in death, ‘inaugurated’ a new entrance into the Presence of God (cf. Mk 15<sup>38</sup>). The flesh of Jesus is regarded as symbolic of the 'veil' or 'curtain' which was removed as the sacrificial blood was carried into the Holy of Holies. ἐγκαθίστω 'includes the motive of leading into life' (von Soden, Hebräerbrief<sup>3</sup>, p. 64). Probably the literal idea of εἰσόδος (= 'entrance to a house') is also symbolically present (cf. Neh 3<sup>1</sup> [LXX]). The 'house' in this case is the Church, the new Temple (cf. παρθενίαν) in 10<sup>19</sup>, and its use in 3<sup>8</sup> and 4<sup>16</sup> is opposed to the attitude of the θεράπων (3<sup>5</sup>). The feast of ἐγκαίνια (Jn 10-) was instituted by Judas Maccabæus (164 B.C.) in memory of the cleansing of the Temple from the pollution of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 4<sup>59</sup>).

LITERATURE.—In addition to the references in the course of the article, see R. W. Dale, The Jewish Temple and the Christian Church, 1902, pp. 144 ff., 231 ff.; F. Paget, The Spirit of Discipline, 1903, p. 191 ff.; J. B. Mozley, University Sermons, 1900, p. 244 ff.; artt. s.v. in DCG (Tasker), HDB (Hastings), and ERE (Fetloe). R. H. STRACHAN.

CONSOLATION.—See COMFORT.

CONSPIRACY, PLOT.—The Gr. word translated 'conspiracy' (συνωμοσία) occurs only once in the NT (Ac 23<sup>13</sup>), but the thing for which it stands is much more frequent. In the OT the corresponding word (שָׁקַד) is fairly common, as also is the cognate verb שָׁקַד 'to make a conspiracy,' lit. 'to bind.' συνωμοσία means, literally, the mutual taking of an oath, and its etymological equivalent in Latin is coniuratio. Of this we have no strict equivalent in English, for 'conjure' means something quite different; 'conspiracy' is the working equivalent.

(1) The συνωμοσία of Ac 23<sup>13</sup> was entered into by 'more than forty' Jews with the object of killing St. Paul. To this end they tried to induce the 'chief captain' to bring him once more before the Sanhedrin—which had already entered upon his trial—that they might 'judge of his case more exactly.' Along the route the conspirators were to be lying in wait, and St. Paul would not reach the council-chamber alive. The scheme was frustrated by the vigilance and the intervention of 'Paul's sister's son' (v. 16<sup>f</sup>). The 'chief captain' at once decided to send his prisoner to Cæsarea under guard, and by night. This narrative is of special importance here for two reasons: (a) v. 30 states that the conspiracy was the sole reason why St. Paul was sent to the governor Felix at Cæsarea; and the consequences of that step extend to the end of the Acts. With this turning-point in the life of St. Paul, however, two other crises should be compared: (α) the earlier one described in Ac 22<sup>21-22</sup> (cf. Eph 3<sup>1</sup> from Ac 22-- onwards there might be said to be one chain of events leading to the prison house at Rome); (β) the later one described in Ac 25<sup>10-12</sup> 26<sup>32</sup> (the appeal to Cæsar). (b) In 23<sup>30</sup> the 'conspiracy' is spoken of as a 'plot' (i.e. συνωμοσία is practically identified with ἐπιβουλή), and thus the NT passages which speak of an ἐπιβουλή (all referring to St. Paul) are brought within the scope of this article.

(2) The most important of these passages is Ac 20<sup>19</sup>, where the Apostle speaks of the trials and temptations (πειρασμοί) which befell him by the plots (ἐπιβουλαί) of the Jews at Ephesus. They seem to have been many and grievous (cf. the 'tears,' v. 19); notorious ('Ye yourselves know,' v. 18); and probably additional to the opposition mentioned in Ac 19<sup>9</sup> ('speaking evil of the Way before the multitude'), and the troublesome competition of the 'strolling Jews, exorcists,' in 19<sup>13<sup>f</sup></sup>; certainly additional to the stirring up of disturbance by the 'combine' of Gentile idol-makers (19<sup>16</sup>). If so, the fact that these many and grievous plots are not mentioned in ch. 19 shows how many there may have been elsewhere, which are likewise unmentioned. Others do find mention in 9-4 20<sup>3</sup>, where the Gr. is again ἐπιβουλή. Another instance occurs in 25<sup>3</sup>, where 'lay wait' (RV) = ἐνέδραν ποιεῖν, with which compare ἐνέδρα (ambush) in 23<sup>16</sup> and ἐνεδρεύειν in 23<sup>21</sup>.

(3) It is still necessary to mention at least three other conspiracies: (a) the trial of Stephen (Ac 6-7) turns on a plot which reveals numerous and close resemblances to the case of Jesus. In fair debate his opponents are silenced (6<sup>10</sup>); then false witnesses are 'suborned' (vv. 11-13); the people also are 'stirred up' (v. 1-); and one of the accusations relates to threats directed against the 'holy place' (vv. 13-14; cf. Mk 14<sup>58</sup>). This plot is the more important because Saul is declared to have been present at Stephen's martyrdom, to have agreed with it, and to have kept the clothes of those who threw the stones (Ac 7<sup>58</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 22-9); and he was very likely one of the worshippers at the Cilician synagogue in Jerusalem, mentioned in 6<sup>9</sup>. This martyrdom was probably one of the chief factors in impressing Saul, against his will, with some vague, and for a time unrecognized, feeling for the possible Divinity of the Church and faith of Jesus (note 6<sup>10</sup>, 15 -55-56, 59-60).

(b) In Gal 2<sup>1</sup> St. Paul speaks of an important conspiracy, but the grammatical constructions in the immediate context are very uncertain, and these difficulties are increased by the variant reading in 2<sup>5</sup>, where some excellent scholars, including Zahn, J. Weiss, and K. Lake, omit the words of negation (ὅς οὐκ), thus arriving at the statement 'we yielded for an hour on account of the pseudo-brethren.' Those who accept this are divided as to the nature of the concession referred to. Weiss (with Spitta) believes that St. Paul 'yielded' by circumcising Titus; Zahn, that he yielded by going up to Jerusalem for consultation at all, but did not circumcise Titus. If the invasion of the pseudo-brethren be connected with 'we did not yield,' it will simply have defeated itself by stiffening St. Paul's resolution in the contrary direction; but with whatever it be connected, while the negative in v. 5 is retained, it cannot be supposed to have accomplished much.

The scene of this uninvited visit was probably Antioch (see Ac 15<sup>1</sup>), possibly Galatia (see Gal 2<sup>5</sup> 'continue with you'); almost certainly not the Council at Jerusalem, to which the 'spying out' is not appropriate. It is quite possible that St. Paul speaks somewhat too severely, for he writes the Epistle to the Galatians at a time of acute 'dissension' (cf. Ac 15<sup>2</sup>). But, if the plot was as reprehensible as he says, it would account for much of the bitterness of the Epistle, for in this he is fighting much the same battle over again, and has to deal with a similar, and almost equally perilous, invasion of his churches.

(c) In Gal 2<sup>11<sup>f</sup></sup> St. Paul refers to a conspiracy against the 'truth of the gospel' at Antioch, in which Peter, the 'rest of the Jews' there, and 'even Barnabas,' are all implicated. Its object, according to St. Paul, was to rebut the claim of the Gentiles to equality by refusing to eat with them. The vigour of his language is noteworthy: 'to the face,' 'condemned' (v. 11); so also 'fearing' (v. 12); 'dissembled,' 'dissimulation' (v. 13); 'not uprightly,' '(not) according to truth,' 'before them all' (v. 14). The Apostle appears to draw a conscious and pointed contrast between his own conduct and that of his opponents at Antioch, especially St. Peter; and certainly his portrayal of the scene forms in effect a telling reply to—almost a turning of the tables on—any insinuations current in Galatia as to his own weakness and dissimulation (see, e.g., 1<sup>10</sup> and, more generally, Ro 3<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>11-12</sup> 12<sup>16</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>3</sup>).

LITERATURE.—The relevant Commentaries, esp. Zahn, Ramsay, Lightfoot, etc., on Galatians; F. Spitta, Die Apostel-

geschichte, Halle, 1891; J. Weiss, SK, 1893, p. 480 ff., and 1895, p. 252 ff.; C. v. Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, i.<sup>2</sup> (1897) 175-216, 252-275; T. Zahn, Introd. to NT, 1909, i. 152-202; Douglass Round, The Date of St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 1906; W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 1895.

C. H. WATKINS.

CONSTRAINT.—Neglecting παρὰβιάζουαι, used in Ac 28<sup>19</sup> (cf. Lk 24<sup>29</sup>) simply of the pressure of hospitable invitation, we have two terms in the NT expressing the notion of 'constraint'—ἀναγκάζειν and συνέχειν.

1. ἀναγκάζειν is to constrain to some course of conduct as a matter of necessity (ἀνάγκη). In Gal 6<sup>1-2</sup> the Judaizers appear as an example of the sinister exercise of constraint, rushing the bewildered Galatian converts into circumcision exemplo suo et importunitate (Bengel, ad loc.). Again, St. Paul himself speaks of his experience of constraint arising from a solemn sense of duty (1 Co 9<sup>16</sup>). In neither case is the ἀνάγκη an arbitrary, irresistible fate that drives men to act thus and thus. Otherwise the Galatians could not have been blamed by St. Paul for listening to his opponents, nor could he have said of himself, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel.'

In 1 P 5<sup>3</sup> pastors are exhorted to do their duty 'not of constraint' (μὴ ἀναγκαστως); but this is not in conflict with St. Paul's position in 1 Co 9<sup>16</sup>. Service can only be satisfactory when along with the fundamental sense of duty there is a willing response to its demand.

In Jude<sup>3</sup> the kindred phrase ἀνάγκην ἔσχον = our simple 'I could not help' (sc. writing).

2. συνέχειν appears in 2 Co 5<sup>14</sup>, and being predicated of 'the love of Christ,' cannot have here any suggestion of irksome pressure as in some other instances of its use. 'The love of Christ grips us,' says the Apostle, adding explicitly that his overmastering sense of that love arose from his view of the Lord's death.

J. S. CLEMENS.

CONTENTMENT.—The idea of 'contentment' is more prominent in Scripture than appears on the surface. The word, indeed, is seldom used, St. Paul being the only NT writer who treats the subject explicitly. But whether the word is there or not, the thing is there. Seeing that the virtue is one of the constituent elements of earthly life and happiness, it would be strange if it were absent from the ethics of Scripture. No amount of worldly fortune or success, without a contented mind, brings happiness, while contentment makes straitened means enough. We are not surprised that the subject enters into all ethical schemes and has been a favourite text of essayists in all lands and ages.

1. The Stoic idea.—Contentment, reaching even to the point of self-denial, was a distinctive feature in the Stoic system of ethics, which prevailed so widely among the educated classes of the Roman Empire in the first Christian centuries. There were many points both of resemblance and of difference between its teaching and the teaching of Christianity on this subject. Seneca, one of Nero's ministers, a Stoic of Stoics, was a contemporary of St. Paul; and they have so much in common that some writers think that one borrowed from the other, or that both were indebted to a common source. Lightfoot discusses the point in his essay 'St. Paul and Seneca' (Philippians<sup>4</sup>, 1878, p. 270 ff.), and comes to a negative conclusion. Still more famous Stoics are Epictetus, a Greek slave of Rome, and the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, the saint of ancient paganism.* 'The sentences of Seneca are stimulating to the intellect; the sentences of Epictetus are fortifying to the character; the sentences of M.

Aurelius find their way to the soul' (Arnold). Myers remarks that in these three writers the system grows more practical. 'We hear less of its logic, its cosmogony, its portrait of the ideal Sage. It insists on what may be termed the catholic verities of all philosophers, on the sole importance of virtue, the spiritual oneness of the universe, the brotherhood of men.' The weakness of Stoicism and of Stoic ethics was that its religion was a minus quantity, just as the strength of Christianity is in the religious spirit of its ethics. Without arguing that ethics is impossible without religion, we may say that it is immeasurably richer and nobler with religion. The Stoic writers indeed often speak of God; but whether they mean more by the name than the order of Nature or universal law and reason is open to debate. They have no explicit doctrine of God. To imitate or obey God and to follow Nature seem to be the same thing. Lightfoot speaks of the system both as 'material pantheism' and 'pantheistic materialism.' W. L. Davidson in his Stoic Creed (1907) holds that the creed makes Fate superior to God; in other words, Fate is the supreme law of the universe. With these abatements the great Stoics plead for virtue most impressively. Their picture of the good man battling with the forces of evil is very noble. Scarcely anything has been said by later moralists respecting virtue and righteousness generally, and contentment in particular, which is not in substance anticipated by the Stoics. Joseph Butler's powerful arguments for virtue from its natural effects and tendencies, from man's self-interest in the highest sense, from the instincts of human nature rightly understood, are quite in the Stoic, and indeed in the Christian, vein. The Stoic idea of contentment with life as it comes or is fixed for us by unchangeable law is often pushed to the extreme of apathy, insensibility, impassiveness (ἀπάθεια). This is not to endure pain, but to deaden the sense of pain. Here Stoicism betrays its Eastern origin, and joins hands with Hindu and Buddhist asceticism.

Christian moralists have rightly appealed to Stoic teaching as a preparation for Christian ethics. Two notable English writers on contentment are Sanderson in two sermons, and Barrow in five sermons, on Ph 4<sup>1</sup>, the former sententious and pointed, the latter manly and copious in thought and expression. Both are greatly strengthened by abundant quotation from the three great Stoics, as well as from Horace, Cicero, Chrysostom, and others. Still, their main source of material and proof is Scripture. In this mode of treatment they are examples of the Anglican and Puritan literature of their age. While Scripture is the supreme court of appeal, the abundant references to ancient writers show the harmony of Christian thought with general belief, and seem to imply some kind of Divine revelation or guidance in the pre-Christian world.

2. St. Paul's teaching.—In two passages St. Paul expressly teaches the lesson of contentment, both by word and by his own example: 'I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content. I know how to be abased, and I know how to abound; in everything and in all things I have learned the secret both to be filled and to be hungry, both to abound and to be in want' (Ph 4<sup>11-12</sup>); 'Godliness with contentment is great gain' (1 Ti 6<sup>6</sup> and context). In the second passage St. Paul, in opposition to those who turn godliness into material gain, emphasizes the true gain of godly contentment in guarding against the moral dangers of avarice (vv.<sup>9, 10</sup>). His Stoic contemporaries would have joined in his counsels: 'For we brought nothing into the world, for neither can we carry anything out; but having food and covering we shall be therewith content'—food and covering, a modest sufficiency. 'The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil'—of lying, dishonesty, overreaching, oppression. In the first passage he is guarding himself against the suspicion of a mercenary spirit. He has never sought for himself the contributions which he has received from the churches, thus making gain of godliness. 'I have learned' (ἐμαθόν): contentment, like all other virtues, is not a growth of nature, but a plant of grace's planting and nurture. Seneca said 'Nature does not give virtue; to become good is an art.' Contentment is a lesson learnt in the school of experience at the feet of a Divine teacher. St. Paul has learned to reduce his desires to his means, 'in whatever state I am (ἐν οἷς εἰμι), be it high or low, rich or poor, base or honourable, easy or painful, prosperous or troublous; all that God sends is welcome.' 'To be content'—αὐτάρκης, 'sufficient in oneself,' 'independent'; αὐτάρκεια, 'sufficiency in oneself,' 1 Ti 6<sup>6</sup>; see Lk 3<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>9</sup>, He 13<sup>5</sup>. 'I have learned the secret'—a striking phrase representing a single word in the text, μεμύημαι (μνέω), 'I have been initiated,' a reference to the ancient religious mysteries. 'I have learned the secret of contentment in all circumstances'—is there not here a playful turn in comparing the art of submission to all that happens to us with instruction in esoteric mysteries?* Of course the self-sufficiency or independence spoken of is not original or absolute, but derived and conditioned. 'I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me' (Ph 4<sup>13</sup>)—'True contentedness of mind is a point of high and holy learning, whereunto no man can attain unless it be taught him from above' (Sanderson). 'I have learned'—learning is gradual, advancing from the alphabet to perfect knowledge. Moral progress is not by leaps and bounds, but step by step, invisible to subject and spectator as the growth of tree and flower. It is 'forgetting the things which are behind and stretching forward to the things which are before,' from the great to the greater, from the high to the higher.

* We have ample means of knowing these writers in various essays and translations: the essays of Matthew Arnold, F. W. H. Myers, F. W. Farrar; translations by George Long, G. H. Rendall, A. Stewart, Elizabeth Carter, and G. Stanhope.

3. Difference between OT and NT doctrine.—The reason of the whole difference between the Christian bearing in the problems of life and that of the Stoic and natural moralist lies in the Christian conception of God, more especially in God's providential reign over and care for the world and the individual. Faith in that truth determines the Christian attitude, especially in times of adversity and suffering. As to the doctrine, the difference between OT and NT is one only of degree—a great difference we admit—but even the early revelation of this truth is glorious. After making every allowance for development in the OT records, we must admit that their presentation of God's relation to the world and to man—personal, living, intimate, loving, like that of human father and son—was quite unique at the time. The lives of patriarchs, leaders, prophets, as well as the national history, show us Providence at work. We have there, as in the NT, righteousness as the rule of Divine dealing and final destiny. We see righteousness also as the supreme endeavour of human life. What infinite pathos of Divine love, compassion, tenderness, patience, faithfulness, slowness to anger, readiness to forgive, speaks in Psalm and Prophecy (Ps 23. 32. 36. 63. 73. 103, Is 40. 43. 53. 54. 55. 60. 61, Jer 31, Ezk 34. 36. 37, etc.). The Book of Job casts a flood of light on the Divine mission of affliction. The meaning of the providential discipline of life emphasized in He 12<sup>5ff</sup> is taken from the OT. The contrast between the OT portrayal of God as a moral Ruler and of His government as administering Moral Law and the glorification of might in contemporary kingdoms and even in later Rome, is striking in the highest degree. The confirmation of all this in the facts of experience in Butler's treatise (pt. i. ch. 3) is unanswerable. The case of the good suffering misfortune and the evil prospering is, in the final issue of the whole, exceptional (see Job, Ps 73).

The NT fulfilment is the crown of a great preparation. It is all summed up in the idea of God as Father of the individual, which pervades the entire NT teaching from first to last. 'Your Father, my Father,' are words ever on the lips of the supreme Teacher and Revealer. 'When ye pray, say, Our Father.' 'How much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?' 'Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need' of food and clothes. The Divine Fatherhood is the strongest foundation of prayer. We know how much St. Paul and St. John make of the correlative relation of believers as children of God, St. Paul speaking of them as both 'sons' and 'children,' St. John using only the title 'children' (Ro 8<sup>14-16</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>1</sup>). For the children nothing is too good for God to promise and give. 'It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' (Lk 12<sup>3</sup>). The whole section Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup> is a perfect antidote to anxiety and fear. 'To them that love God all things work together for good' (Ro 8-8) corresponds to OT sayings like Ps 34<sup>10</sup> 103<sup>13</sup>. Human faith, called forth and justified by such promises, never rose so high in the sphere of natural reason as in Ro 8<sup>35-39</sup>. It is in passages like Jn 13-17 that the tenderness of God's love for His earthly children finds the highest expression. These selections from a wide field may suffice to set forth the grounds of Christian submission to all that God sends or permits, gives or withholds, of earthly good.

Contentment seems a weak word to describe the Christian attitude to the Divine appeal. It has all the Divine character and revelation in word and act behind it. Even the adverse and painful is seen to have Divine purpose in it. We 'rejoice in tribulation' and 'manifold trials' (Ro 5<sup>3</sup>, Ja 1<sup>2</sup>), not for their own sake but for the fruit they bear. Trials and difficulties nurse strength and courage. The greatest sufferers have been the greatest heroes. Patient endurance is the highest evidence of strength. The strongest souls are often found in sick chambers. 'God's peace stands sentry, keeps guard over them' (Ph 4<sup>7</sup>)—an echo again of an OT benediction, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee' (Is 26<sup>3</sup>). This age-long, world-wide extent of personal experience guarantees the truth and reality of what lies behind Christian resignation and trust. We may repeat the vow of Epictetus to God, with deeper meaning:

'For the rest use me to what thou pleasest. I do consent unto thee and am indifferent. I refuse nothing which seemeth good to thee. Lead me whither thou wilt; put on me what garment thou pleasest. Wilt thou have me to be a governor or a private man, to stay at home or to be banished away, to be poor or to be rich? I will, in respect to all these things, apologise for thee with men' (quoted in Barrow, Works, iii. 36).

LITERATURE.—Sermons on Ph 4<sup>11</sup> will be found in I. Barrow, Works, iii. [1831] 1-106; R. Sanderson, Works, i. [1854] 112-172; R. Sibbes, Works, v. [1863] 177-193; Commentaries on Philippians, esp. C. J. Ellicott (<sup>1865</sup>), M. R. Vincent (<sup>1897</sup>), H. A. A. Kennedy (<sup>EGT</sup>, 1903); see also J. Guthrie, Divine Discontent, 1913; H. W. Smith, The Life Worth Living, 1912, p. 7; Lord Avebury, Peace and Happiness, 1909, p. 99 ff.; J. I. Vance, Royal Manhood, 1899, p. 165 ff.; D. Watson, In Life's School, 1902, p. 145 ff. J. S. BANKS.

CONTINENCE.—See ABSTINENCE.

CONTRIBUTION.—The significance of the word κοινωνία, twice translated 'contribution' in the RV, is understood best from its employment and the employment of its cognates in various connexions in the NT. The root-idea is that of personal relationship. The fellowship or communion which it denotes, while it is essentially inward and spiritual, is at the same time a living and active union based on mutual co-operation between persons or personified subjects (cf. 1 Jn 13<sup>6</sup>, Ac 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>14</sup> 13<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, etc.; for συγκοινωνειν and συγκοινωνος see Ph 4<sup>14</sup>, Eph 5<sup>11</sup>, Rev 18<sup>4</sup>). From this it came to express the acts by which this vital fellowship is manifested through the agency of the Holy Spirit, or by acts of brotherly kindness between members of the scattered Christian communities (cf. Ph 2<sup>1</sup>, He 13<sup>16</sup>; see B. Weiss, Biblical Theology of the NT<sup>3</sup>, 1893, i. 188). In the Didache we find the same conception of brotherly love emphasized as the visible expression of a personal spiritual communion (συγκοινωνήσεις δὲ πάντα τῷ ἀδελφῷ σου . . . εἰ γὰρ ἐν τῷ θανάτῳ κοινωνοὶ ἐστέ, πῶς οὖν μᾶλλον ἐν τοῖς θνητοῖς, iv. 8). Here the meaning has not yet reached the degenerate stage at which it arrived in patristic Greek theology, where it is almost equivalent to ἐκκλημοσύνη (see Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Lexicon of NT Greek, Eng. tr.<sup>4</sup>, 1895, p. 363). We are thus able to apprehend the supreme importance which St. Paul attached to the contributions of the Gentile Churches to the poor among the Christians of Judaea (Ro 15<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 9<sup>13</sup>, etc.; see also art. COLLECTION). His conception of the undertaking is not merely that Gentile and Jew should be participators in the common blessings of plenty, to a share in which each Christian has a claim. If that were all, we should look for the word μετέχευε (cf. 1 Co 10<sup>17</sup>, He 2<sup>14</sup>, etc.), which has both a narrower and a more external connotation than κοινωνεῖν (see Westcott, Epistle to the Hebrews<sup>3</sup>, 1903, pp. 74, 336; Robertson-Plummer, 1 Corinthians [ICC, 1911], pp. 212, 215, 217; cf., however, Ellicott's Commentary, 1887, on 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup>).

* There are similar turns in Ro 12<sup>11</sup> 'in diligence not slothful'; 1 Th 4<sup>11</sup> 'be ambitious to be quiet.'

The giver and the receiver are both involved in κοινωνία, and in the acts of giving and receiving they throw into objective reality their complete personal union in the Body of Christ. To achieve this end no sacrifice was too great (λειτουργήσαι, Ro 15<sup>27</sup>), for a debt inestimable was resting on those who, from outside, had been received into the spiritual fellowship of Jesus Christ (ὀφείλεται). By discharging their obligation in this respect, the Gentiles not only witnessed to the profound spiritual principle of communion in the Christian society, but also used an instrument whereby the union, thus expressed, would be realized on the other side. Arising out of the movement initiated by St. Paul we find that contributing to the needs of the saints (κοινωνοῦντες, Ro 12<sup>13</sup>) is enjoined as a general duty of Christians (cf. κοινωνικούς, 1 Ti 6<sup>18</sup>, where the thought involves the formation of the habit and character of generosity with a view to 'the life which really is life' [see the translation in Moffat's Historical New Testament<sup>2</sup>, 1901, p. 575]).

J. R. WILLIS.

CONVERSATION.—This is the AV rendering of the Gr. ἀναστροφή in Gal 1<sup>13</sup>, Eph 4<sup>22</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>12</sup>, Ja 3<sup>13</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>15-18</sup> 2<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>1</sup>, 2<sup>16</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>; of πολίτευμα in Ph 3<sup>20</sup> (πολιτεύεσθε, Ph 1<sup>27</sup>), and of τρόπος in He 13<sup>9</sup>. The English word is founded on the Vulg. conversatio (conversor) and signifies 'manner of life' (= RV rendering; for examples of this use of 'conversation,' see Murray's OED s.v.). πολίτευμα and πολιτεύεσθαι definitely associate the conception of life with relationship to a πολις. They are characteristically Greek expressions; for 'conduct to a Greek was mainly a question of relation to the State' (J. A. Robinson on Eph 2<sup>3</sup>). On the other hand, ἀναστρέφεσθαι (with its noun ἀναστροφή) is in the NT practically synonymous with words expressing a manner or 'walk' of life, such as περιπατεῖν (a favourite Pauline and Johannine word) and πορεύεσθαι (which is found in Luke and Acts and elsewhere in the NT, but not in Pauline and Johannine writings); cf. also στοιχεῖν, Gal 5<sup>25</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, Ph 3<sup>16</sup> (see HDB, art. 'Conversation,' for discussion of the distinction between περιπατεῖν and ἀναστρέφεσθαι as drawn by E. Hatch in his Essays in Biblical Greek, 1889, p. 9). 'Conversation,' therefore, is an excellent rendering of ἀναστροφή if it be understood in the general sense of 'conduct' or regulation of life, the signification which it bore in English before being limited by common usage to intercourse in speech.

We find ἀναστρέφεσθαι used in this ethical sense not only in the NT writings, but in the Apostolic Fathers (Ign. Magn. ix. 1; Hermas, Mand. xi. 12; 1 Clem. xxi. 8; Ep. of Barn. xix. 6, and also in the Didache iii. 9 repeating Ep. of Barn. xix. 6, μετὰ δικαίων . . . ἀναστροφῇ). Deissmann, Bible Studies, Eng. tr., 1901, p. 88 (cf. Light from the Ancient East, Eng. tr.<sup>2</sup>, 1911, pp. 107, 315), points out that 'the moral signification se genere which ἀναστρέφεσθαι bears in 2 Co 1<sup>12</sup>, Eph 2<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>17</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>18</sup>, He 10<sup>33</sup> 13<sup>18</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, is illustrated by Grimm, needlessly, on the analogy of the Hebrew הלך, and shows that it is not to be explained as a Hebraism (cf. ib. p. 194), by quoting the 'Inscription of Pergamus No. 224 A (middle of 2nd cent. B.C.), where it is said of some high official of the king ἐν πᾶν καίροις ἀμέμπτως καὶ ἀδ[ε]λῶς ἀναστρέφόμενος' (cf. also Moulton, Grammar of NT Greek, 1908, p. 11, and T. Nägeli, Wortschatz des Apostels Paulus, 1905, pp. 34, 38).

The ethical use of ἀναστροφή and ἀναστρέφεσθαι is thus quite frequent in Hellenistic Greek; and neither noun nor verb is Hebraic, nor peculiar to the language of the NT, but common, as Deissmann states, to the ancient world as a whole. The etymology conveys the idea of movement within certain limits or a given sphere. Such activity, however, is more expressly defined by the words denoting 'walking' or 'going' mentioned above. All such expressions may be illustrated by the term 'the Way' used in the Acts (see 9<sup>2</sup> 19<sup>9</sup> 22<sup>4</sup> 22<sup>14</sup>) of the path of the Christians (see art. CHRISTIAN LIFE), which is marked out by Divine revelation, as opposed to αἵρεσις (Ac 24<sup>14</sup>), the way a man chooses for himself.

R. MARTIN POPE.

CONVERSION.—1. Terminology.—The conception of conversion, as of so much else in the NT, rests on what had become familiar in the OT. But we find nothing like a definite doctrine of conversion in either; much less a theology or a psychology. The most common word in the OT is 'turn' (שׁוּב), which is quite general in meaning; it may be accomplished by the sinner himself (Ezk 18<sup>1</sup>) or, more rarely, by God (Jer 31<sup>18</sup>). In the NT, as far as the Acts and Epistles are concerned, the noun occurs only once (Ac 15<sup>3</sup>), but the verb is comparatively frequent: e.g. Ac 3<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>16</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>25</sup>. It is significant that it occurs 12 times intransitively, 4 times transitively; and the tense (aorist) used most commonly implies that the action is regarded as momentary more often than continuous (there is implied continuity in Ac 14<sup>15</sup> 15<sup>19</sup>, Gal 4<sup>9</sup>, as against Ac 3<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, 2 Co 3<sup>16</sup>, Ja 5<sup>19</sup>). It may be added that in all cases, except 4 (Ac 3<sup>19</sup> 28<sup>7</sup>, Ja 5<sup>19</sup> 20), RV translates by 'turn.' The verb is only twice used literally (Rev 1<sup>12</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>23</sup>), and it is used once in Galatians (4<sup>9</sup>) and twice in a single passage, 2 P 2<sup>21</sup> 22, quoting from the OT (Pr 26<sup>11</sup>), of perversion.

2. Suggestions from the context.—What are the causes and accompaniments of conversion? It appears as the result of preaching (Ac 14<sup>15</sup>), or of 'signs' (9<sup>35</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>). It is connected with repentance (3<sup>19</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>) and followed by bond-service and endurance (1 Th 1<sup>9</sup>); and in the story of Cornelius and his friends, as St. Peter is preaching, at the moment when he describes remission of sins as given to those who believe on Christ, the Holy Spirit falls on them, and they speak with tongues and 'magnify God' (Ac 10<sup>44-46</sup>). They are then baptized. The same thing happens to the 12 disciples of Apollos at Ephesus (Ac 19<sup>17</sup>.) after they have been baptized and St. Paul has laid his hands upon them. (In 1 Co 12<sup>10</sup> and 14 passim nothing is said to connect the gift of 'tongues' with conversion.) This glossolalia is the only outward sign of conversion mentioned in the NT; it is true that the men in Stephen's unrepentant audience were 'cut to the heart' (Ac 7<sup>54</sup>); but abnormalities such as those which accompanied the early stages of the Methodist movement, the American camp-meetings, or the Welsh revival, are altogether absent from the history of apostolic preaching and its results.

3. Parallel expressions.—Although the actual descriptions of conversion are few (see below, § 7), references to the great transition are numerous. The converts are reminded that they were reconciled (2 Co 5<sup>20</sup>), that they died with Christ (Col 2<sup>20</sup>), that they were made alive together with Christ (Eph 2<sup>5</sup>), that they were baptized into Christ (Gal 3<sup>27</sup>), that they obtained mercy (Ro 11<sup>30</sup>). The word of the truth of the gospel is increasing in the Colossians, since the day that they heard and knew the grace of God in truth (Col 1<sup>6</sup>; cf. He 10<sup>5-6, 32</sup>). They have renounced the hidden things of darkness; they have believed, they are washed, they are sanctified (1 Co 6<sup>11</sup>). The general term 'salvation' is used in 1 Co 1<sup>1-1</sup>, Ro 10<sup>13</sup>, Tit 3<sup>5</sup>; St. Peter writes to those who are elect, begotten again (1 P 1<sup>1-3</sup>; cf. 2 P 1<sup>10</sup>). In all these phrases, stress is laid sometimes on the action of God, sometimes on the response of man; nor is it always easy to see whether the writers are referring to the actual moment of conversion or not; they would seem to think more frequently of the new life, introduced by a definite experience (cf. St. Paul's use of the perfect tense, ἡλικότες, 1 Co 15<sup>19</sup>, πεπisteυκα, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>), than of the exact moment of transition. The language of St. John, as might have been expected, makes but little reference to the change as an event happening in time; his thought is rather of belief or knowledge as an abiding attitude of mind (1 Jn 2<sup>12-13</sup>); but we may compare the striking phrase in 1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup> 'have passed from death unto life,' with that of St. Paul (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>), 'if any man is in Christ, it is a new creating.'

References in the Apostolic Fathers to the conversion of unbelievers are surprisingly few. These writers are rather concerned to hold a high ethical standard before their readers. Clement of Rome speaks of those who have been called through His will in Christ Jesus as being justified through faith (xxxii.), and constantly emphasizes the need of repentance. The Didache makes no reference to the conversion of outsiders as such, though one would think that the members of the Church must have regarded the exhortations of the 'Two Ways' as more applicable to outsiders than to themselves. Barnabas, who, like the Didache, quotes the 'Two Ways,' speaks of the apostles as 'those who preached unto us the forgiveness of sins' (viii.); refers to the time before belief on God, 'when the abode of our heart was corrupt and weak, a temple truly built with hands' (xvi.); and adds the significant passage: 'He that desireth to be saved looketh not to the man, but to Him that dwelleth and speaketh in him, being amazed at this that he has never at any time heard these words from the mouth of the speaker, nor himself ever desired to hear them' (ib.).

4. Conversion is from heathenism.—This is the great difference in the use of the term in the NT from that in the OT and in much of our modern religious phraseology. All the NT converts had definitely broken with their old surroundings. The language of the NT is the language of the first stage in the history of a missionary church. In the OT even sinners are for the most part members of the chosen nation; the prophets call the people back to a holiness which they are regarded as having previously lost. Even Ezekiel, who alone seems to regard the history of Israel as one of disobedience from the beginning, feels that the nation has somehow been in touch with Jahweh all along. In our own times, the majority of converts have been brought up in a more or less Christian atmosphere; there has been a lengthened period of suggestion followed at last by a decision. Even where conversion seems most sudden, much teaching has often preceded. NT preaching was very different. To the Jews, it occasioned an intellectual shock, for the most part at first highly resented (Ac 7<sup>54</sup>). With Gentiles this was even more definitely the case. The shock was moral and social as well. To the Jews, a great deal of the morality of the apostolic preaching would be familiar, especially the emphasis upon personal purity in speech and conduct; and the Jews, in the Gentile world, were already a distinct community (cf. the Rabbinic treatise, Aboda Zara) like the Christians in India. For the Gentiles, that preaching demanded a complete renunciation of their existing habits, friendships, moral ideas, and often of their business (cf. 1 Co 10<sup>32</sup>; and Tert. de Idol.—equally true a century before he wrote). Stanley's well-known description of baptism, as symbolizing the definite rupture with one society and the identification with another, is far more true of the 1st cent. than of any other (Christian Institutions<sup>4</sup>, London, 1884, ch. i.).

5. Conversion and baptism.—The new convert was not, indeed, regarded as being perfect from his conversion onwards. His morals might be very deficient (Eph 4<sup>22</sup>, ὁ κλέπτων), and there was much need of teaching (cf. the emphasis laid on this point in the Pastorals). There must have been a large number of 'babes in Christ.' But the practice of modern missionaries in delaying baptism was unknown in early times. Baptism followed the profession of belief (Ac 2<sup>41</sup>), and, as soon as belief and repentance were professed, the convert was felt to have broken with the old life (2<sup>42</sup> and 8<sup>16, 38</sup>). Often both belief and repentance are only implied in the actual narratives (2<sup>38</sup> 16<sup>15</sup>).

